Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

8 Jan. 1906.

1. (Chairman.) Will you kindly state what your present post at the Local Government Board is?—I am at present legal adviser to the Local Government Board.

2. Previous to holding that appointment, what office did you fill?—I was an assistant secretary for many years.

3. You are, of course, aware of the purport of this Commission; and that we are anxious that you should give evidence to us as regards the existing Poor Laws applicable both to England and to Wales. Now, the evidence you will have to give will be very voluminous; how would you propose to divide it?—The range of subjects covered by the existing law relating to the relief of the poor in England and Wales is so wide as almost of necessity to make elimination a condition of any practical survey which is to take the form of oral evidence; and there are other reasons for elimination. Matters covered by the actual wording of the reference to this Royal Commission have been or are already in course of investigation by other Royal Commissions or by Departmental Committees. For example, taxation for local purposes, so far as those purposes are connected with the relief of the poor, would undoubtedly, at first sight, appear to form an important branch of the present inquiry; but local taxation, as a whole, has been investigated by the Commissioners appointed on the 15th August, 1896; their reports were published some years ago, and legislation and proposals for legislation have ensued upon those reports. The Valuation Bill which was introduced into Parliament in the session of 1904 may perhaps be cited as in itself a sufficient indication of the fact that the subject of local taxation is no longer within the province of inquiry. Hence, I propose to exclude altogether from my evidence any reference to that part of the Law which is concerned with the valuation and rating of property for Poor Law purposes. Again, it is to be noted that in 1904 a Royal Commission was appointed to consider the existing methods of dealing with idiots and epileptics and with imbecile, feeble-minded or defective persons not certified under the Lunacy Laws. An investigation of this sort must inevitably include much that touches the Poor Law. The fact that the investigation is still proceeding seems to justify the sparing treatment in evidence of matters which might otherwise be regarded as fully within the scope of the present inquiry. Accordingly, I propose, especially in relation to pauper imbeciles, to avoid any such detailed discussion of the law as might involve needless repetition of the same topics. Another matter as to which elimination appears to be desirable, includes certain educational aspects of the Poor Law. On the 18th September, 1894, the President of the Local Government Board appointed a Departmental Committee to inquire into the then existing systems for the maintenance and education of children under the charge of managers of district schools and boards of guardians in the Metropolis, and to advise as to any changes that might be desirable. The report of that Departmental Committee, and the action taken upon the report, will doubtless receive the consideration of the present Commission; but from the legal point of view, the fact of the previous inquiry serves as a justification for abstaining from the statement of many details which should otherwise be noticed. Lastly, the subject of vagrancy has engaged the attention for some time of a Departmental Committee; and in this case also there seem to be good grounds for considering the matter to be outside the range of my evidence. After applying the process of elimination in the way already indicated, I propose to group what I have to say concerning the Poor Law of England and Wales under the following heads:— (1) The Central Authority; (2) Local Authorities; (3) Poor Law Unions; (4) Combinations; (5) Relief in Division of Subjects.

* N.B.—It should be borne in mind that, since the dates at which this witness appeared before the Royal Commission, various Statutory enactments and judicial decisions have, in several respects, affected the legal position as described in his evidence.

General ; (6) In-door Relief ; (7) Out-door Relief ; (8) Finance ; (9) Pauper Lunatics ; (10) Settlement and Removal ; (11) Bastardy ; and (12) Miscellaneous. It is quite obvious that an exhaustive treatment of all the subjects suggested by each of these heads would be out of place in such a summary as I suppose to be required of me. Many of the subjects bristle with technicalities and as to most, a complete statement of the law must be gathered not only from statutes and judicial decisions, but also from codes of regulations which often vary in effect to meet the circumstances of particular localities. I am compelled, therefore, to attempt nothing more ambitious than an outline of the main features of the law under each head. I shall endeavour to exclude technicality where this is not of direct interest in its relation to principles ; and, so far as possible, I shall limit my use of the judgments of the Courts and of the rules and opinions of the Central Authority to the illustration of the law in its practical working with regard to particular classes of persons.

THE CENTRAL AUTHORITY.

4. Taking the first of the subjects with which you propose to deal, what do you wish to say to us concerning the central authority ?—In the Report of the Commission of Inquiry there was the following recommendation :—" We recommend, therefore, the appointment of a Central Board to control the administration of the Poor Laws, with such Assistant Commissioners as may be found requisite ; and that the Commissioners be empowered to frame and enforce regulations for the government of workhouses, and as to the nature and amount of the relief to be given, and the labour to be exacted in them ; and that such regulations shall, as far as may be practicable, be uniform throughout the country." The Poor Law Amendment Act of 1834 gave effect to this recommendation by authorising the appointment, by warrant under the Royal Sign Manual, of three fit persons to be Commissioners, with the style of the Poor Law Commissioners for England and Wales. The Commissioners were empowered to sit as a Board of Commissioners for carrying the Act into execution ; they were to have a seal ; they were to be incapable of being elected or sitting as Members of the House of Commons ; and they were to hold office for a limited period. The first appointments of Commissioners were made four days after the passing of the Act, that is to say, on the 18th August, 1834.

The Poor Law Commissioners.

The Poor Law Board.

5. These Poor Law Commissioners were subsequently superseded by the Poor Law Board, I believe ?—On the 23rd July, 1847, the Poor Law Board Act, 1847, was passed. That Act superseded the original body by a new set of Commissioners for administering the laws for relief of the poor in England. The new Commissioners were to be appointed by letters patent or Commission under the Great Seal ; and they were to comprise certain ex officio Commissioners, namely, the President of the Council, the Lord Privy Seal, the principal Secretary of State for the Home Department, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Commissioner first named in the letters patent or Commission was to be styled " President ; " and the President and one of the Secretaries, whom the new Commissioners were required to appoint, might sit in the House of Commons. This second body of Commissioners, by Section 21 of a subsequent Act (the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1849, 12 and 13 Vic., c. 103), received express authority to use the name of the Poor Law Board. Under that name the Commission, which, like the early Commission, was temporary only, was continued by renewal until 1867, when the Poor Law Amendment Act of that year (30 and 31 Vic., c. 106, which was passed on the 20th August, 1867) by repealing the enactment limiting the duration of the second Commission, placed the Poor Law Board upon a permanent footing.

6. Then the difference between the original Poor Law Commissioners and the Poor Law Board in one sense was that the former were not represented in Parliament except through the Home Secretary and that the latter were directly represented ?—That is so.

7. The establishment of the Poor Law Board was followed by another change, was it not ?—Yes.

8. What was the nature of that change ?—The Poor Law Board continued on a permanent footing until the 19th of August, 1871, when the appointment of the first President of the Local Government Board, under the Local Government Board Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 70), had the effect of transferring to the Board thereby created the functions of the Poor Law Board and of other departments. To the Local Government Board there was nominally given a rather wider constitution than that of the Poor Law Board ; and its ex officio members include the Lord President of the Council, all the principal Secretaries of State, the Lord Privy Seal, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

The Local Government Board.

Reports and General Orders of Local Government Board.

9. Are there any points which you would wish to note at this stage of your evidence in connection with the powers and duties of the central authority so established ?—What has to be said with regard to the powers and duties of the Central Authority will, for the most part, fall more conveniently under the various heads to which the particular subjects of administration will be referred. It may, however, be convenient to note here that in pursuance of sec. 13 of the Poor Law Board Act, 1847, the Local Government Board are required once in every year to submit to His Majesty a general report of their proceedings ; and that every such general report is to be laid before both Houses of Parliament within six weeks after the date thereof, if Parliament be then sitting, or, if Parliament be not then sitting, within six weeks after the next meeting of Parliament. Also, under section 1 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868, the Local Government Board are required to cause a copy of every general rule, order, or regulation issued by them to be laid before both Houses of Parliament as soon as practicable after its publication.

Ex-officio members of Local Government Board.

10. I think you mentioned that there was a committee connected with the Local Government Board consisting of certain high officers of State ?—The Local Government Board includes the Lord President of the Council, the principal Secretaries of State, the Lord Privy Seal, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

11. I assume, however, that any order issued by the Local Government Board, if it has the approval of the President of the Board, is legal without the assent of the other members ?—Quite so. About thirty years ago there was, I believe, a temporary arrangement for obtaining the signatures to orders of some of the ex officio members ; I do not think that the arrangement lasted very long, but I have seen a practice of that character.

12. So that their functions really are consultative rather than executive in practice ?—Their functions are not executive in any other than a ministerial sense.

LOCAL AUTHORITIES.

13. If that finishes the evidence you wish to give as regards the central authority, will you now please give us an account of the local authorities and their connection with the Poor Law ?—Turning to the constitution of the Local Authorities for Poor Law administration, I have first to say a few words about the appointment of overseers of the poor ; of their powers and duties it will be better to speak under particular heads of administration. The Poor Relief Act, 1601, by sec. 1., as amended by the Poor Law (Overseers) Act, 1814 (54 Geo. III. c. 91), enacted that the churchwardens of every parish, and four, three, or two substantial householders, as should be thought meet (having respect to the proportion and greatness of the parish), to be nominated yearly on the 25th of March or within fourteen days after the 25th of March under the hand and seal of two or more justices of the peace in the same county, whereof one was to be of the quorum, dwelling in or near the same parish or division where the same parish lay, should be called overseers of the poor of the parish. The effect of later Acts, namely, the Poor Law (Overseers) Act, 1849 (12 and 13 Vict. c. 8,) the 12 and 13 Vict. c. 64, and the Justices Jurisdiction Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 38), was that overseers for a parish in a city or borough might be appointed by any justices having jurisdiction within the city or borough. It may be proper here to say something about an officer, who, in the past, often had important duties in connection with the relief of the poor. This officer is the assistant-overseer. The appointment of assistant-overseers was first authorised by Sturges Bourne's Act (59 Geo. III. c. 12, sec. 7). The vestry were thereby empowered to nominate and elect and the justices to appoint a discreet person with a salary. The vestry were to determine what duties were to be executed by the assistant-overseer ; and these duties very frequently included the duties of the overseer in the matter of relief. The Poor Law Commissioners also issued Orders authorising the guardians of various unions to appoint assistant-overseers.

Overseers.

Assistant Overseers.

nt slation ting rseers Assistant seers.

14. What has been the effect of more recent legislation with regard to the appointment of overseers?—Subsequent legislation has generally placed the appointment of overseers on a different footing. Under sec. 5 of the Local Government Act, 1894, in the case of a rural parish having a parish council the power and duty of appointing overseers have been transferred to and vested in the parish council. Sub-sec. 2 of the same section provides that the churchwardens of every rural parish shall cease to be overseers, and that an additional number of overseers may be appointed to replace the churchwardens. Also in the case of a rural parish not having a parish council the power and duty of appointing overseers were transferred under sec 19 (5) of the same Act to the parish meeting. Further, by sec. 33 of the Act of 1894, the Local Government Board are empowered, on the application of the council of a municipal borough (including a county borough) or of any other urban district, to make an order conferring on the council or some other representative body within the borough or district the appointment of overseers. Again, by section 11 (1) of the London Government Act, 1899, the council of each metropolitan borough became the overseers of every parish within the metropolitan borough. Lastly, many local Acts contain provisions which depart materially from the general law with respect to the appointment and functions of these officers. In the case of the assistant-overseer, also, somewhat similar changes have been brought about. By the Local Government Act, 1894, the power of appointing and revoking the appointment of assistant-overseers in rural parishes was transferred to and vested in the parish council, or in the parish meeting where there is no parish council (secs. 7 and 19). Section 81 (6) repealed so much of any enactment as authorised the appointment of assistant-overseers by a board of guardians. Sec. 33 of the same Act extended to assistant-overseers; and many local Acts have authorised exceptional arrangements with regard to the appointment and employment of these officers. Lastly, sec. 30 (1) of the London Government Act, 1899, provided for the transfer to the metropolitan borough council of assistant-overseers and other officers employed in the performance of the duties of overseers.

15. Are we to assume that the modern overseer has nothing to do with the allocation or distribution of the poor rate?—In exceptional cases he has authority to give relief; I shall come to those cases under the head of relief.

e Board of ardians.

16. Now we come to the boards of guardians, I think?—Yes. The next poor law authority to be referred to are the boards of guardians. Sections 38 and 39 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, gave powers for the constitution of boards of guardians of the existing type; but the Local Government Act, 1894, effected very extensive changes in the law relating to the qualification and election of guardians, and these matters are now the subject of a somewhat elaborate and voluminous series of enactments and rules.

17. Will you please describe the constitution of a board of guardians?—I do not propose to set out in all its details the scheme of the existing law with respect to the constitution of a board of guardians; but the following summary will, I think, show the more prominent features. The persons who elect guardians are the parochial electors, and if a parish is divided into wards the electors of the guardians for each ward are such of the parochial electors as are registered in respect of qualifications within the ward (Local Government Act, 1894, Section 20). With regard to the electors it is to be observed that every person whose name is on the register of parochial electors is entitled to vote unless prohibited by an Act of Parliament (Local Government Act, 1894, Section 44). The following are disqualified:—Any person who is in receipt of relief given to himself or his wife or child, or who has been in receipt of relief on any day during the year last preceding the election. In the case of a person objected to on this ground a certificate from the clerk to the guardians is sufficient evidence of the person having received relief; and his disqualification is not affected or removed by the Medical Relief Disqualification Removal Act, 1885. Other disqualifications apply to any person convicted of treason or felony, or convicted or reported guilty of a corrupt practice at a Parliamentary election or at a municipal election, or convicted of corruption as or with respect to a member, officer or servant of a public body; and a person who is an alien is also disqualified. Guardians are elected only for parishes in urban districts; but parishes may be divided into wards for the purposes of election. The number of guardians assigned to each parish may be fixed by the Order constituting the union, or by an Order of a county council, or of a joint committee of county councils; and for fixing or altering the number of guardians to be elected for each parish, a county council or joint committee of county councils, may exercise powers of adding parishes and dividing parishes into wards (Local Government Act, 1894, Section 60). In the case of rural districts, the persons elected as rural district councillors act as guardians. A person is not qualified to be elected or to be a guardian unless he—(a) is a parochial elector, that is a person registered in the register of parochial electors, which register consists of the Local Government Register of Electors, and the Parliamentary Register of Electors (so far as relates to the parish), and the separate list of parochial electors printed at the end of the other lists (Local Government Act, 1894, Sec. 44 (6 and 8)); or (b) has during the whole of the twelve months preceding the election resided in the union, or (c) in the case of a parish wholly or partly within a borough, is qualified to be elected a councillor for the borough. With regard to the qualifications above detailed, it should be explained that the Local Government Register of Electors so far as it relates to a parish consists of men, unmarried women and widows registered in respect of the occupation as owner or tenant of—(1) a house, warehouse, counting house, shop or other building; (2) some land or tenement of the clear yearly value of not less than £10. The Parliamentary Register of Electors means a register of persons entitled to vote at any Parliamentary election (52 and 53 Vic. c., 63, Sec. 17, Sub-Sec. 2); and, so far as relates to a parish, it comprises men registered in respect of—(3) the ownership of freehold, copyhold or leasehold property of the requisite value; (4) the occupation, as tenant, of land or tenements of a yearly rent of not less than £50—a qualification which applies only to persons already on the register in 1884; (5) the occupation, as owner or tenant, of some land or tenement of the clear yearly value of not less than £10; (6) the occupation, as inhabitant occupier, of a dwelling house, or of some part of a house separately occupied as a dwelling; and (7) the occupation, as lodger, of lodgings of a clear yearly value if let unfurnished of £10 or upwards. The separate list of parochial electors comprises—(8) men and unmarried women entitled to vote as parochial electors, but who are not entitled to be registered for voting as County or Parliamentary electors; and (9) married women entitled to be registered and to vote as parochial electors. The enactments relating to the qualification of a councillor for a borough are those contained in Secs. 11 and 12 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882. They are as follows—(1) The councillors shall be fit persons elected by the burgesses. (2) A person shall not be qualified to be elected or to be a councillor unless he (a) is enrolled and entitled to be so enrolled as a burgess; or (b) being entitled to be so enrolled in all respects except that of residence, is resident beyond seven miles, but within fifteen miles of the borough, and is entered in the separate non-resident list directed by the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, to be made; and (c) in either of those cases is seised or possessed of real or personal property or both to the value or amount, in the case of a borough having four or more wards, of £1,000 and in the case of any other borough of £500, or is rated to the Poor Rate in the borough, in the case of a borough having four or more wards, on the annual value of £30 and in the case of any other borough of £15. (3) Provided that every person shall be qualified to be elected and to be a councillor who is at the time of election qualified to elect to the office of councillor; which last-mentioned qualification for being elected shall be alternative for and shall not repeal or take away any other qualification. (4) But if a person qualified under the last foregoing proviso ceases for six months to reside in the borough he shall cease to be qualified under that proviso, and his office shall become vacant, unless he was at the time of his election and continues to be qualified in some other manner. Lastly, it is enacted that a person shall not be entitled to be enrolled as a burgess unless he is qualified as follows—(a) is of full age; and (b) is on the 15th of July in any year, and has been during the whole of the then last preceding twelve months in occupation, joint or several, of any house, warehouse, counting-house, shop or other building in the borough; and (c) has during the whole of those twelve-months resided in the borough or within seven miles thereof; and (d) has been rated in respect of the qualifying property to all Poor Rates made during those twelve months for the parish wherein the property is situate; and (e) has on or before the 20th of the same July paid all such rates including borough rates (if any) as have become payable by him in respect of the qualifying property up to the then last preceding 5th of January. It is also enacted that every person so qualified shall be entitled to be enrolled as a burgess unless he (a) is an alien; or (b) has within the twelve months aforesaid received union or parochial relief or other alms; or (c) is disentitled under any Act of Parliament. The effect of Sec. 45 (8) of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, is that every person enrolled in the burgess roll shall be deemed to be enrolled as a burgess and every person not enrolled in the burgess roll shall be deemed to be not enrolled as a burgess. It should be added with reference to the parochial elector that, in the case of a parish in an urban district or in the County of London or in a county borough, the expression means a person who would be a parochial elector if the parish were a rural parish (Local Government Act, 1894, Sec. 75, Sub-Sec. 2).

18. Putting all technicalities on one side then, the qualification for entitling an elector to vote for the board of guardians is somewhat wider than the Parliamentary franchise?—Yes.

19. That is, it includes those entitled to the Parliamentary franchise plus certain others?—It includes some persons who are disqualified for the Parliamentary franchise.

20. Before we pass from this part of your evidence would you give the Commission the date of the Medical Relief Disqualification Removal Act?—That Act was passed in 1885, and I propose at a later stage to dwell rather fully upon it.

Disqualifications for office of guardian.

21. Now I think you have something to say concerning the qualification of guardians?—Yes, that is, I propose to say something about disqualification. No person is disqualified by sex or marriage for being elected or being a guardian (Local Government Act, 1894, Sec. 20); but a person is disqualified if he (a) is an infant or alien; or (b) has within twelve months before his election or since his election received union or parochial relief; or (c) has within five years before his election, or since his election, been convicted either on indictment or summarily of any crime, and sentenced to imprisonment with hard labour without the option of a fine, or to any greater punishment, and has not received a free pardon; or has, within or during the time aforesaid, been adjudged bankrupt, or made a composition or arrangement with his creditors; or (d) holds any paid office under the board of guardians; or (e) is concerned in any bargain or contract entered into with the board of guardians, or participates in the profit of any such bargain or contract or of any work done under the authority of the board of guardians. But disqualification does not arise by reason of interest (a) in the sale or lease of any lands, or (b) in any loan of money to the board of guardians, or in any newspaper in which any advertisement relating to the affairs of the board of guardians is inserted; or (c) in any contract with the board of guardians as a shareholder in a joint stock company; but the guardian interested must not vote at any meeting of the board of guardians on any question in which the company are interested, except that in the case of a water company or other company established for the carrying on of works of a like public nature this prohibition may be dispensed with by the county council (Local Government Act, 1894, Sec. 46, Sub-Secs. 1 and 2). Disqualification in the case of bankruptcy, composition or arrangement ceases when the adjudication is annulled, or when the bankrupt obtains his discharge with a certificate that his bankruptcy was caused by misfortune without any misconduct on his part, and in case of composition or arrangement, on payment of his debts in full. (Local Government Act, 1894, Sec. 46, Sub.-Sec. 4). Other grounds of disqualification arise out of corrupt practices at various elections or convictions under the Public Bodies Corrupt Practices Act, 1889.

Election of guardians, acceptance of office, fine, casual vacancies.

22. Does that finish the list of disqualifications?—Yes.

23. Now will you describe the procedure for the election of a guardian?—A candidate for the office of guardian must be nominated in writing by two parochial electors, and in this and in other matters relating to the election the proceedings are regulated by rules framed by the Local Government Board under the Local Government Act, 1894, and by various enactments applied by that Act. Every poll is to be taken by ballot (Local Government Act, 1894, Sec. 48, Sub-Sec. 3). Every qualified person elected or deemed to be elected to the office of guardian, unless exempt, must accept the office by making and subscribing a declaration or must pay a fine summarily recoverable. He must not act in the office until he has made and subscribed the declaration except in administering the declaration. If he omits to sign the declaration, his office becomes void and a casual vacancy arises. If a guardian is absent from meetings of the board of guardians for more than six months consecutively, except in case of illness or for some other reason approved by the board of guardians, his office becomes vacant (Local Government Act, 1894, Sec. 46, Sub-Sec. 6).

24. You have mentioned the liability to a fine; do you know if that fine has ever been imposed?—In certain cases I think it has been. I do not recall any very recent instance, but questions have frequently arisen as to whether the particular circumstances of the case justified any remission of the fine, or whether any remission could be given.

25. Then it is an effective part of the law?—Clearly.

26. As I understand he is fined if he refuses to act?—That is, if he does not accept the office which is now regarded as being on the same footing as a municipal office.

27. Is the amount of the fine stated in the Statute?—No; the amount of the fine depends upon the rules.

28. Who would determine the fine; would it be the Local Government Board?—It is determined by the rules; but I have not a copy of those rules with me. It comes from an application of provisions of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882.

Term of service of guardian.

29. That I think finishes your evidence as regards the procedure for election, and we now come to the term of service; what have you to say about that?—The normal term of office of a guardian is three years (Local Government Act, 1894, Sec. 20, Sub-Sec. 6). Subject to the directions of the county council, guardians may retire by thirds on the 15th of April in each year, or they may retire simultaneously on the same day in every third year. Orders made under the Local Government Act, 1894, by a county council or Joint Committee of county councils with respect to the retirement of guardians may be rescinded in pursuance of the District Councillors and Guardians (Term of Office) Act, 1900 (63 and 64 Vict. c.16).

Ex-officio nominated guardians.

30. In the old days there were ex officio guardians I believe?—Yes.

31. What is the modern substitute?—Prior to the coming into operation of the Local Government Act, 1894, the Poor Law Acts had authorised an ex officio element in the constitution of each board of guardians. The ex officio guardians were the local justices of the peace. Also, under Sec. 79 of the Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867, the Local Government Board were empowered to nominate guardians either from among the resident justices or from among resident ratepayers assessed on an annual value of not less than £40. By Sec. 20 of the Local Government Act, 1894, however, it is enacted that there shall be no ex officio or nominated guardians. In substitution, the Act of 1894 by Sec. 20, Sub-Sec. 7, empowers a board of guardians to elect a chairman or vice-chairman or both, and not more than two other persons from outside their own body, but from persons qualified to be guardians of the union. Any person so elected becomes an additional guardian and member of the board of guardians.

Additional guardians.

32. The qualification of the person so elected being the same as that of the other guardians?—Yes.

Guardians under Local Acts.

33. Have you any observations to make respecting guardians under local Acts?—The provisions that I have already summarised are by Sec. 60, Sub-Sec. 4 of the Local Government Act, 1894, made applicable to the case of guardians elected under local and personal Acts; but by Sub-Sec. 6 it is provided that nothing in the Act shall alter the constitution of the corporation of the guardians of the poor within the city of Oxford, or the election or qualification of the members except those members who are elected by the ratepayers of parishes.

34. Apparently the local Acts are insignificant in number?—I think there are twelve, but I am not quite sure as to the number.

eetings and oceedings guardians.

35. Now I think we come to the meetings and proceedings of guardians; what have you to say on that subject?—No guardian has power to act in virtue of his office except as a member at a meeting of the board of guardians (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, Sec. 38). A meeting of a board of guardians must not be held in premises licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquor, except in cases where no other suitable room is available either free of charge or at a reasonable cost (Local Government Act, 1894, Sec. 61). Sec. 199 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and the unrepealed provisions of Schedule 1 to that Act are applied to boards of guardians by Sec. 59 of the Local Government Act, 1894. The guardians accordingly are to make regulations with respect to the summoning, notice, place, management and adjournment of their meetings, and generally with respect to the transaction and management of their business. Other matters with which provisions in the schedule to the Public Health Act of 1875 are expressly concerned are—the quorum (one-third and not more than seven), the chairman, the record of members and votes, decisions, chairman's casting vote, the validity of proceedings, minutes of evidence, and the annual meeting. Nothing, however, in Sec. 59 of the Local Government Act, 1894, is to affect any powers of the Local Government Board with respect to the proceedings of guardians. The power thus reserved is that conferred by Sec. 15 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, and in a case in which, notwithstanding the prohibition in Sec. 61 of the Local Government Act, 1894, a board of guardians continued to meet at a licensed public house, the Local Government Board were advised by the law officers on the 2nd of August, 1898, that the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, gave the Board power to make an order with respect to the place of meeting of a board of guardians, and that this power was reserved to the Board who could by its exercise forbid future meetings at the public-house.

OOR LAW NIONS.

36. I think that completes your evidence as regards the powers of the local authority, and that we may therefore go now to the question of areas. Do you give a summary of the provisions relating to the area and jurisdiction of a board of guardians, of which there is some modern definition, I understand?—For use after the commencement of the Interpretation Act, 1889, that Act in Sec. 15 has supplied a convenient expression to denote the area of jurisdiction of a board of guardians. The Act says—"The expression 'Poor Law Union' shall as respects England and Wales mean any parish or union of parishes for which there is a separate board of guardians." The board of guardians referred to in the definition may be either a board of guardians elected under the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, or a board of guardians or other body of persons performing under any local Act the like functions to a board of guardians under the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834.

rmation Poor Law nions.

37. Will you describe the powers for the formation of Poor Law Unions?—The powers conferred by the Poor Law Amendment Act 1834 for the formation of unions are contained in Sec. 26. That section enables the Central Authority by an Order to declare so many parishes as they might think fit to be united for the administration of the laws for the relief of the poor. The section continues—"And such parishes shall thereupon be deemed a union for such purpose, and thereupon the workhouse or workhouses of such parishes shall be for their common use." A certain limitation upon these powers was afterwards imposed by the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844. Section 64 of that Act provided that when the relief of the poor had been administered in any parish by guardians appointed under a local Act and not by overseers, and the parish, according to the last enumeration of the population published by authority of Parliament, contained more than 20,000 persons, it should not be lawful for the Poor Law Commissioners after the passing of the Act of 1844 without the consent in writing of two-thirds at least of the guardians, to declare the parish to be united with any other parish for the administration of the laws for the relief of the poor. The section was afterwards repealed as regards the Metropolis by the Metropolitan Poor Act 1867 (Sec. 78); and other legislation has rendered it unimportant at the present time. With regard to single parishes the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, provided by Sec. 39 that, if the Commissioners should by any Order under their hands and seal direct that the administration of the laws for the relief of the poor of any single parish should be governed and administered by a board of guardians, the board should be elected and constituted and authorised and entitled to act for the single parish in like manner in all respects as was provided in respect to a board of guardians of a union.

Alteration or dissolution of Poor Law Unions.

38. If that is all you have to say as regards the formation of Poor Law Unions will you now tell us something about the power of altering or of dissolving Poor Law Unions?—The Poor Law Commissioners had power under Sec. 32 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, by Order to declare a Poor Law Union not united for purposes of settlement or rating to be dissolved, or any parish or parishes to be separated from and added to the union. But the concurrence of a majority of not less than two-thirds of the guardians was necessary. This condition was practically abrogated by the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844. Section 66 of that Act gave the Poor Law Commissioners a free hand by enacting that they might proceed without the concurrence of the guardians, and that the Commissioners might also, if they saw fit, cause a board of guardians to be elected under the Act of 1834 for a single parish separated from a union, notwithstanding the provisions of any local Act in force in the parish.

39. With reference to the answers you have given us as to the formation of Poor Law Unions and their alteration and dissolution, are we to understand that the Local Government Board have power, regardless of the views of the board of guardians, to alter and change the area?—That is so at the present day.

40. Have they to report the scheme and get the approval of Parliament?—No. The instances in which a Provisional Order will be necessary I shall mention later on; they involve cases where there are local Acts.

41. Then this power is a power which is now absolutely vested in the Local Government Board?—Yes.

Difficulties due to Gilbert Act Incorporations.

42. I think you wish to mention certain obstacles that arose in the early formation of Poor Law Unions?—Yes.

43. Those, I understand, originated from the existence of unions and parishes under Gilbert's Act?—Yes.

44. As we are not all as learned as you, perhaps you will shortly define Gilbert's Act?—I propose to do so. The difficulty arose from the fact that the unions and parishes formed under that Act were scattered about the country. The Act known as Gilbert's Act was the 22 George III., c. 83. It was an adoptive Act, that is to say, in any parish two thirds of the owners or occupiers in number and value according to the poor rate and assessed after the rate of £5 per annum at the least, were empowered at a public meeting to notify their desire to adopt the Act, and to nominate persons from whom the justices might select for each parish a salaried official, namely, a guardian of the poor. The owners and occupiers also nominated candidates for the post of salaried governor of the poor-house—an appointment which the justices made from the nominees. Provision was made for the union of parishes, and the guardians of the united parishes were required to apply to the justices to appoint a visitor of the poorhouse out of a list of the guardians' nominees. The visitor, who could appoint a deputy, was a superior functionary whom the guardians and governors were bound to obey. It was to the provisions relating to the poorhouse and the administration of relief that the Commissioners took special exception. Their main trouble arose from the opinion of the Attorney General that in Gilbert Act Unions the guardians were bound to find employment out of the workhouse for persons professing willingness to work, but inability to obtain employment. The matter belongs now to past history; but it deserves mention here because, although the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, by Sec. 37 prevented the formation of future Gilbert Act Unions without the consent of the Commissioners, it was not until 1868 that the Poor Law Amendment Act of that year by Sec. 4 gave the power of dissolution which in 1835 the Attorney General thought to be the only way out of the difficulties of the Poor Law Commissioners.

Difficulties due to Local Acts.

45. Now will you tell us what the position was and is with regard to local Acts?—In 1867 difficulties of another kind, namely those presented by the metropolitan group of local Acts, were effectually removed. This object was attained by Secs. 73 to 78 of the Metropolitan Poor Act 1867. In that same year Guardians outside the Metropolis were enabled by Sec. 2 of the Poor Law Amendment Act 1867 to co-operate with the Poor Law Board in getting rid of obsolete local Acts. The guardians were empowered to apply for a Provisional Order to repeal or alter any local Act controlling or regulating relief, or the making and levying of the poor rate in their Poor Law Union; and the Poor Law Board were empowered to make and issue such an order and to obtain Parliamentary confirmation. These powers were in the next year extended to the Metropolis by the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868 (Sec. 3); and afterwards, by the Poor Law Act 1879 (Sec. 9), the like facilities were afforded to churchwardens, overseers and others having powers or duties under any such local Act. Now also, by the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act 1876 (Sec. 11), it is enacted that if it shall appear to the Local Government Board that it is expedient for rectifying or simplifying the areas of management or otherwise for the better administration of the relief of the poor that any Union, whether formed under the Poor Law Amendment Act 1834 or otherwise, should be dissolved, the Board may, after inquiry held in some one of the unions to be affected, after public notice, so that all persons interested in the same may attend and be heard thereat, issue their order for the dissolution of any such union, and such dissolution shall have the same effect and be attended with the same consequences as in the case of a union dissolved under the provisions of the Poor Law Amendment Act of 1834. Likewise by the Act of 1876 (Sec. 13) the Local Government Board are empowered to change the name of a union and direct how the change of name is to be published.

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian. C.B., K.C.

8 Jan. 1906.

46. That brings us down to a period about 30 years back; there has been more recent legislation affecting Poor Law Unions, has there not?—Yes. New machinery for the alteration of unions was made applicable by the Local Government Acts of 1888 and 1894. Secs. 57 and 59 of the Act of 1888 gave power to County Councils, according to an opinion given in 1890 by the law officers, and the late Mr. Justice Wright (then Mr. R. S. Wright), to make alterations of poor law unions as consequent upon parochial changes, though not, apparently, according to a subsequent opinion of the law officers in 1894, as a consequence of the alteration of rural districts. Again, under Sec. 58 of the Local Government Act 1888, the Board are empowered in the case of a Poor Law Union situate in more than one county to provide that the union shall continue to be one union for the purposes of in-door paupers, or any of those purposes, and shall be divided into two or more poor law unions for the purpose of out-door relief, and to make such provisions as seem expedient for determining all other matters in relation to which the union is to be one union or two or more unions. Further, in cases in which under Secs. 52, 54 or 55 of the Local Government Act 1888, the Board are authorised by Provisional Order to make alterations of boundary affecting counties or boroughs or to bring about the other local changes mentioned in the sections, they are enabled by Sec. 59 to make incidental changes in relation to areas and authorities which include poor law areas and poor law authorities; and also to amend any local act.

Union changes under Local Government Acts, 1888 and 1894.

47. You have mentioned certain powers that county councils have of altering boundaries; were those powers subject to the approval of the Local Government Board?—Such powers as the County Council exercise under Sec. 57 of the Local Government Act with regard to alterations of parishes would necessitate confirmation by the Local Government Board.

48. Speaking generally is the assent of the Local Government Board always required as regards the alteration of area?—Confirmation is always required in the case of Orders making parochial alterations which affect the union.

49. Are there any provisions on this point which you wish to allude to in the Local Government Act, 1894?—The Local Government Act, 1894, gave an express power to county councils by Sec. 36, Sub-Sec. 6, to provide for alterations of Poor Law Unions in consequence of the provisions of the Act; but by virtue of Sub-Sec. 13 the power was intended for temporary use, and there was a special reservation of the powers of the Local Government Board. A permanent power was, at the same time, conferred upon joint committees of councils where alterations of the areas mentioned in Sec. 57 of the Local Government Act, 1888 would alter the boundaries of Poor Law Unions situate in two or more counties (Sec. 36, Sub-Sec. 11).

Adjustments on alteration or dissolution of Poor Law Unions.

50. Will you now give an account of the procedure consequent upon the alteration or dissolution of a Poor Law union?—It was from the first recognised that the alteration or dissolution of Poor Law unions necessitated the safeguarding of the rights and interests of the parishes affected. Accordingly, the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, by Sec. 32, made provision for adjustment. To facilitate the needful winding up of affairs an Act of 1870—the Dissolved Boards of Management and Guardians Act, 1870—provided for the continuance in office of the last acting members of a board of guardians for the purpose of paying and discharging the debts and liabilities of a Poor Law union dissolved or altered. The same Act dealt with the machinery for adjustment—a process which, as the result of successive enactments, had become exceedingly complicated. The methods prescribed by the Poor Law Acts continued in use for adjustment purposes for some years after the Local Government Act, 1888, had, in relation to changes under that Act, introduced procedure for adjustment by agreement of the authorities interested, or failing agreement, by the award of an arbitrator. With the two systems at work side by side during the years subsequent to the coming into operation of the Act of 1888, it was impossible not to recognise the elasticity of the more modern machinery as giving distinct advantages over the procedure under the Poor Law Acts. An attempt by the Local Government Board to use their powers under the Poor Law Acts for the purpose of making the adjustment of property in the form of an annuity dependent upon changing rateable values, though upheld by the Queen's Bench Division, was not supported by the Court of Appeal in the case of the Queen v. The Local Government Board and the Guardians of Willesden (Law Reports 1901, 1 Q.B., 210; 70 Law Journal, Q.B., 272). Still more recently a flaw in the provisions of the Dissolved Boards of Management and Guardians Act, 1870, with respect to the transfer of stock was disclosed in Morton and others v. The Bank of England (Law Reports, 1904, 1 Chancery, 664; 73 Law Journal, Chancery, 503). These cases led the Board to the conclusion that legislation was needed to put matters on a better footing than was possible under the somewhat antiquated provisions of the Poor Law Acts as they then stood. Accordingly, the aid of Parliament was invoked, and the needful amendment of the law was effected by the Poor Law (Dissolution of School Districts and Adjustment) Act, 1903, and the Poor Law Authorities (Transfer of Property) Act, 1904.

51. Now will you state the effect of the chief provisions of the Acts that you have just mentioned?—By Sec. 2 of the first-mentioned Act (3 Edward VII., c. 19), agreements may be made by boards of guardians and other authorities affected by the alteration of any Poor Law areas or authorities for the adjustment of any property, income, debts, liabilities and expenses. Sec. 62 of the Local Government Act, 1888, which relates to adjustments consequent upon the operation of that Act or things done under it, was applied, with modifications, to the case of Poor Law authorities; and the making of agreements and carrying out of agreements or awards for adjustment were included among the purposes for which persons continue in office under the Dissolved Boards of Management and Guardians Act, 1870. The other Act (4 Edward VII., c. 20) got rid of the uncertainty which arose out of the proceedings in Morton and others v. The Bank of England with regard to the survival of the corporate body of management, such as the managers or guardians, after the dissolution of a Poor Law district or union. As regards Poor Law Unions Sec. 1 enacts that the board of guardians of any Poor Law Union which has been dissolved or added to another Poor Law Union shall, by virtue of the Act, be dissolved, or, in the case of Poor Law Unions so dealt with before the passing of the Act, shall be deemed to have been dissolved as from the date of the dissolution or addition. Sec. 2 provides for the automatic vesting in their successors of the property and liabilities of a board of guardians dissolved or deemed to have been dissolved. The section further provides that where, at the date of dissolution, stock stands in the books of a company in the name of the board of guardians, the company, on the request of the successors, and the production of a statutory declaration verifying the stock and the identity of the persons making the request, with a certificate of the Local Government Board verifying the succession, shall enter the stock in the names of the successors and pay them the dividends. Sec. 3 gives the Local Government Board power to revoke, extend or alter any Order relating to the dissolution or alteration of a Poor Law Union or to the continuance in office of the successors of a dissolved board of guardians, and empowers the Local Government Board also to make orders with regard to procedure.

52. Then in your opinion these new Acts have worked satisfactorily ?—We have had very few cases under them, but so far as they have gone they have been satisfactory. The procedure is very much more elastic than was the old procedure under Sec. 32 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834.

53. This is rather a general question ; but as the alterations which must arise must sometimes be a very pressing matter, have the Local Government Board, do you think, sufficient powers under these new Acts ?—As regards the procedure consequent upon alterations of areas, I think they have ; anyhow the principle of the system has now been established so long, practically since 1888, that one might fairly regard it as firmly fixed.

54. I think that completes your evidence as regards areas and that now we may come to the subject of the combinations ; what is the first of these combinations that you wish to speak about ?—The law affords facilities for the creation of other authorities than boards of guardians, with similar functions, but exercisable over a wider area. An example of voluntary combination on these lines may be found in Sec. 8 of the Poor Law Act, 1879. This sort of combination is not available in London. The enactment I refer to is in the following terms :—"Where, on any representation, it appears to the Local Government Board that the combination of two or more unions not in the Metropolis for any purpose connected with the administration of the relief of the poor would tend to diminish expense, or, would otherwise be of public or local advantage, the Board may, with the consent of the guardians of the unions to be combined, make an Order for combining such unions for the purposes named therein, and for constituting for the execution of such purposes a Joint Committee of the guardians of each of the combined unions. The Order shall define the powers, rights, duties, liabilities and obligations of the Joint Committee, and regulate the election, meetings and officers of the Joint Committee, the mode of defraying the expenses of the Joint Committee, and any other matter or thing (including the adjustment of present and future liabilities and property), which it appears necessary or proper to regulate for the better carrying into effect the Order. The guardians of a union included in such combination shall, save as otherwise provided by the Order, cease to exercise any powers and rights, and to be subject to any duties, liabilities, and obligations vested by the Order in the Joint Committee. All property acquired by the Joint Committee shall be vested in the boards of guardians of the unions included in the combination as tenants in common. An Order may be made for amending, adding to, or revoking any Order previously made under this Section."

55. What has been done under this enactment which you have just quoted ?—Orders have been issued under that enactment for the erection and maintenance of special institutions for the reception of particular classes of paupers. The classes so treated have included imbeciles and epileptics. In a recent case it has been proposed to provide in this way for epileptic persons not certified as lunatics ; and feeble-minded persons who have not been so certified and who, by reason of mental deficiency, are incapable of receiving proper benefit from ordinary instruction, or are incapable of using ordinary means or precautions for protecting themselves from injury or improper usage or treatment, or incapable of maintaining themselves by work, and who are, in the opinion of a medical officer of a workhouse of any of the combined unions, suitable persons for treatment in the institution to be provided for the combination. These illustrations of what has been proposed under Sec. 8 of the Act of 1879 do not exhaust the possibilities of the enactment. The combination, it will be seen, may be "for any purpose connected with the administration of the relief of the poor ; " and the scope of the section, may, therefore, be most comprehensive.

56. Another form of combination is the school district, I believe ; what have you to say about that ?—I have already assumed that the educational aspect of the Poor Laws is hardly one which will specially engage the attention of this Commission ; and so I do not propose to enter at any length into the details of the enactments which authorised the formation of school districts. But I may say that by Sec. 40 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, the Local Government Board are empowered by Order to combine unions or parishes not in unions, or such parishes and unions into school districts. The object of the combination is described as "the management of any class or classes of infant poor not above the age of sixteen years, being chargeable to any such parish or union, who are orphans, or are deserted by their parents, or whose parents or surviving parent or guardians are consenting to the placing of such children in the school of such district."

School Districts.

57. I am afraid I do not quite understand ; there are certain children whose education is to be provided at the public expense ; but have the guardians power to send them to schools outside their district ?—I am here dealing with combinations, which, as I shall proceed to explain, are under the charge of managers, the managers being elected by the boards of guardians, but having separate powers for the maintenance of schools.

58. Then perhaps you will describe to us now what the powers and duties of managers are ?—The Act of 1844, by Sec. 42, provides for the constitution of a board of managers elected by the guardians. The managers have such of the powers and duties of guardians "for the relief and management of the poor within any school," "and for the appointment, payment, and control of paid officers" (Sec. 43) as the Local Government Board direct. The managers are to be members elected from amongst the persons rated within the district to the relief of the poor, and the Local Government Board have power to fix the qualification for membership, this qualification to consist in being rated within the district to the relief of the poor but not so as to require a qualification exceeding the net annual value of £40. The managers are to be elected at such periods not exceeding three years, and in such proportions and in such manner as the Board direct. The chairman of every board of guardians is to be an ex officio manager (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, Sec. 42). In the Metropolis the Local Government Board may nominate fit persons from among the justices resident in the district, or from among resident ratepayers assessed to the Poor Rate on an annual value of not less than £40, or partly from one, and partly from the other ; but the nominees are not to exceed one-third of the full number of elected members (Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867, Sec. 49). Then school districts may be altered and dissolved (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, Sec. 43 ; Metropolitan Poor Amendment Act, 1869, Sec. 1, Poor Law (Dissolution of School Districts and Adjustments) Act, 1903, Sec. 1). It may be added that the summary of provisions with regard to the incidents and consequences of the alteration or dissolution of a Poor Law Union will apply, with modifications, to the alteration or dissolution of a school district.

Boards of Management of District Schools.

59. What are the particular duties of the managers ?—The supervision of the children in the schools which they have power to erect.

60. They have power to erect schools, then ?—Yes, they provide special schools.

61. And those, I take it, are schools which are built entirely in connection with the Poor Law ?—Quite so.

62. I think you wish now to mention another combination for which power was given by the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844 ?—Yes. It may be well to say a few words about a scheme which the Act authorises for the temporary relief of the houseless poor in certain towns. Sec. 41 recites that it is expedient that more effectual means should be provided for the temporary relief of poor persons found destitute and without lodging within the district of the Metropolitan Police or the City of London, and Liverpool, Manchester, Bristol, Leeds and Birmingham. An object which the section also had in view was to avoid the introduction of infectious disease by the reception of these poor persons into the workhouses established for the ordinary relief of the poor. Provision is accordingly made for the combination of unions and parishes into districts for the purpose of providing and managing asylums for the temporary relief and setting to work therein of destitute, houseless poor who are not charged with any offence and who may apply for relief or become chargeable to the poor rates within any such parish or union. As in the case of the school district provision was made for the constitution of a board of management and for other essentials.

63. Has anything been attempted or done at any time in the way of combining under these enactments?—A district was formed, but difficulties ensued. The combination was found to be unworkable, and by Secs. 14 and 15 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1851, the Poor Law Board obtained power to dissolve asylum districts of this type, and to provide for winding up the affairs; nevertheless the enactment is still on the Statute Book, and still in a limited sense available, one might say.

Metropolitan Asylum Districts.

64. Now we come to the Metropolis; there, I think, there has been a more recent form of combination?—Yes. Of modern combinations the most important are undoubtedly those authorised for the first time by the Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867. The circumstances which led to the legislation embodied in the Act are explained at length in the report of the Poor Law Board for the year 1866-67. Briefly put, the position may be described thus: In 1865 the inquiries into the deaths of two workhouse inmates disclosed defects in the state and management of the sick wards. General inquiry into the condition of all the metropolitan workhouses was then set afoot, and the result was to show that partial reconstruction or addition might make the existing buildings fit for all the requirements of a workhouse in the majority of cases; and that, in the remainder the buildings might probably be used for the reception of particular classes. "But" said the Poor Law Board, "it appeared necessary to remove from the workhouse cases of fever or smallpox, the imbeciles and harmless lunatics, and also the children; and the establishment of separate hospitals or asylums for these classes, of dispensaries for the administration of medical relief to the out-door poor, and also of buildings for the sick or other classes of the poor in unions or parishes whose workhouses were inadequate and incapable of enlargement—objects which could not be effected without special legislation." The Poor Law Board further mentioned the considerable outlay consequent upon the contemplated improvements, and the need of relieving the poorer parishes of some of the liabilities which would otherwise be imposed upon them. "We therefore," said the Poor Law Board, "on full consideration of the subject thought it desirable that those charges which were to a certain extent limited in their nature, and could not give rise to extravagant expenditure, should be provided for by a fund raised by contributions from the several unions, parishes, and places in the Metropolis, according to their annual rateable value."

65. Will you now describe the object of these metropolitan combinations?—The combinations authorised by the Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867 are combinations for the provision of asylums. Asylums according to Sec. 5 of the Act are institutions to be provided under the Act and to be supported and managed according to the provisions of the Act, and their purpose is defined as the "reception and relief of the sick, insane or infirm or other class or classes of the poor chargeable in unions and parishes in the Metropolis." The next Section enacts that in order to the provision of asylums the Local Government Board may from time to time by order combine into districts, unions or parishes, or unions and parishes in the Metropolis as they think fit, and may from time to time alter any such district by addition, sub-division and separation of part or otherwise. A later enactment—the Metropolitan Poor Amendment Act, 1869 (Sec. 1)—enables the Board to dissolve any such district. The incidents and consequences of alteration or dissolution of asylum districts in London have special features which hardly need separate mention; but they are essentially similar to those which have been described in relation to unions. Then for each district I may add there is to be an asylum or asylums, as the Local Government Board direct.

Boards of Management of Metropolitan Asylum Districts.

66. Have you anything to say about the management of metropolitan asylums?—For the asylum a body of managers is to be constituted and the managers are to be incorporated with a common seal and power to hold land for the purposes of the asylum district (Secs. 7 and 8). The managers are in part elective, in part nominated. Managers of the former class are elected by the Guardians from among themselves or from among ratepayers qualified as prescribed by the Local Government Board, or partly from one and partly from the other (Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867, Sec. 10; Metropolitan Poor Amendment Act, 1869, Sec. 6). The nomination of managers rests with the Local Government Board. Their nominees are to be selected from among resident justices or from among ratepayers assessed to the poor rate on an annual value of not less than £40; or the choice may be made partly from one class and partly from the other (Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867, Secs. 9 and 11; and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868, Sec. 9). The total number of managers is to be prescribed from time to time by order of the Local Government Board, who are also to prescribe the proportion of the elective and nominated managers—the prescribed number of the nominees being never in excess of one-third of the prescribed number of the elective. The Local Government Board are also to prescribe the number of elective managers to be elected for each union or parish and the qualifications, tenure of office, mode and times of election of the elective managers (Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867, Sec. 12). The acts or proceedings of the managers are not to be invalid by reason only of a vacancy, failure to elect or nominate, irregularity in election or nomination, or want of qualification or disqualification (Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867, Sec. 13) The managers may appoint committees; and in the exercise and discharge of their powers and duties the managers like guardians are to be subject to the orders of the Local Government Board (Secs. 27 and 28).

Powers, &c. of managers.

67. Have you anything that you wish further to say respecting the powers and duties of these managers?—The managers may be directed to purchase or hire or to build and in either case to fit up a building for the asylum; and they have the powers of guardians for the purchase or hiring of land (Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867, Sec. 16). Moreover, one body of managers, namely, the managers of the Metropolitan Asylum District, have special powers of land purchase. Thus under Sec. 5 of the Poor Law Act, 1889, they may, with the consent of the Local Government Board, purchase such land adjacent to an asylum as is required for the purposes of the asylum, and for the purpose of the purchase the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875, incorporating certain provisions of the Lands Clauses Acts, and authorising the putting in force by Provisional Order of the provisions which relate to purchase otherwise than by agreement are made applicable. For the asylum the managers are to provide the necessary fixtures, furniture and conveniences (Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867, Sec. 20). A building in use for a workhouse may with the needful alterations be used for an asylum (Sec. 18). The managers have the like powers as guardians for the relief, maintenance and management of the inmates of the asylum; and the mode of admission to the asylum, and the government of the asylum and the inmates, are matters to be controlled by the rules, etc. of the Local Government Board (Sec. 21-23).

Classes of poor for whom Metropolitan Asylums are provided.

68. Who may be received as inmates in the metropolitan asylums?—An asylum to which these provisions extend may include a workhouse or other building for the reception of any class or classes of the chargeable poor (Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876, Sec. 40); and it may also include a ship, vessel, hut, tent or other temporary erection (Metropolitan Poor Act, 1871 Sec. 1). The classes for whom asylums may be provided have been extended to sufferers from diphtheria, children suffering from ophthalmia or other contagious diseases of the eye, children suffering from contagious diseases of the skin or scalp, children requiring special treatment during convalescence or the benefit of seaside air, children who by reason of defect of intellect or physical infirmity cannot properly be trained in association with children in ordinary schools, and children who are ordered by two justices or a magistrate to be taken under the Industrial Schools Act, 1866, to a workhouse or an asylum of the district.

Expenses of Metropolitan Asylums.

69. Have you anything to say about the outlay on Metropolitan asylums?—Subsequent legislation for sanitary purposes has widened the functions of one body of managers under the Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867, namely, the Metropolitan Asylum Board; and they are thus brought into relation with and incur expenses on account of persons who are not paupers. But when the position of the several Boards of Management is considered solely with reference to the pauper inmates of their asylums, the rules with regard to their outlay may be stated as follows:—The expenses of purchasing, hiring, building, repairing and fitting up, rent or compensation for use of a workhouse, the expenses of fixtures, furniture, conveniences, medicines, medical and surgical appliances, salaries, maintenance and officers, are to be defrayed by contributions from the constituent unions and parishes in proportion to the rateable value of the property comprised therein (Metropolitan Poor Act 1867, Secs. 31 & 55). The expenses of food, clothing, maintenance, care, treatment, relief and burials are to be separately charged to the unions or parishes from which the inmates are sent (Sec. 32). Some of the expenses of managers are repayable out of the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund; but the needful explanation of the working of this fund may be conveniently postponed.

LIEF IN NERAL. gulations Central thority.

70. Now we enter upon the general subject of relief; you would like, I believe, at this stage to say something concerning the regulations of the Central Authority?—Yes. Reference has already been made to the recommendation of the Commission of Inquiry in 1832 with regard to the powers of the Central Authority in the matter of regulations. As I am now approaching the subject of relief and its sub-divisions, indoor relief and outdoor relief, the opportunity offers for a few words about these powers of the Central Authority. Nowadays, the practice of confiding subordinate legislation to Government departments, and indeed, on certain conditions, to local bodies, is so well established that criticism of proposals of the kind is quite rare. But it was otherwise seventy years ago. When the Bill based upon the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry was before Parliament, the question of the powers to be conferred on the Central Authority received much consideration. On the 21st July, 1834, the Lord Chancellor, in moving the second reading of the Bill in the House of Lords, argued strenuously in support of the proposal. "I have said," observed his lordship, "that extensive and effective reform in the administration of these laws can only be accomplished by entrusting large discretionary powers to the Commissioners. Of this no doubt can exist, and a very slight attention to the subject will convince you of it. The bad practices have taken such root, and spread so widely, that a strong hand alone can extirpate them. But it must be not only strong—it must be ever ready; in other words, all must be left to the discretion of the men entrusted. . . . One uniform, inflexible rule prescribed by a statute can therefore never be applied . . . . and hence the operation must be performed by a discretionary power lodged somewhere that the hand which works may feel its way and vary its course according to the facilities or obstruction it may encounter; nay, an arbitrary discretion—to use a word which has been employed invidiously towards the measure—and arbitrary to a certain extent it must be, because it must be both ample and unconfined in order that the rules for its exercise may not paralyse its movements."

71. Subsequently did Parliament inquire into the mode in which the powers of the Poor Law Commission had been exercised?—The powers which were conferred upon the Poor Law Commissioners, and which in 1834 were described as unconstitutional, were closely watched by Parliament. In 1837 a Select Committee was appointed to inquire into the administration of the relief of the poor under the orders and regulations issued by the Poor Law Commissioners. The Select Committee reported in July, 1837, that the authority of the Poor Law Commissioners had, in the opinion of the Committee, been exercised with great discretion, and that "a more difficult task could scarcely have devolved on any department of Government." Another Select Committee was appointed by the House of Commons in November of the same year; and this Committee reported in August, 1838. They made a variety of suggestions for the amendment of the law, and they specially noted the fact that, in the important duties committed to them, the Commissioners had evinced zeal, ability and great discrimination.

Judicial decisions upholding discretionary powers of Central Authority

72. Questions arising out of the exercise of these powers came also before the Courts of Law, did they not?—Yes. For present purposes it is perhaps more useful to cite the support of the superior courts in the application of legal principles to the new system of procedure by departmental rules. It was, indeed, essential that these rules when questioned before the Court of King's Bench on the proceedings by certiorari under the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, should be criticised with the fullest allowance for administrative discretion. That the rules were so judged will appear from the following quotations. In the King v. the Poor Law Commissioners, in the matter of the Newport Union (6 Adolphus & Ellis. 54) it was admitted on behalf of those who sought to quash an order for the purchase of a workhouse site that the only question was whether the Poor Law Commissioners had exercised a sound discretion. "It is clear," said Lord Denman, the Chief Justice, "beyond all doubt that this court cannot entertain such a question;" and the other judges concurred. The Lord Chancellor was equally emphatic in disclaiming authority to interfere with the exercise of the discretion of the central authority. On an appeal in Chancery proceedings against the Poor Law Commissioners and the Guardians of the Holborn Union with a view to stop the enlargement of the workhouse, the Lord Chancellor said "that so long as the Commissioners confined themselves to acts within their jurisdiction, the Court of Chancery would not interfere or examine into the question whether they had used their discretion judiciously; but that if they exceeded their jurisdiction the Court would treat them as persons dealing with property without legal authority." (The Queen v. the Poor Law Commissioners, etc, 6 Adolphus & Ellis, 56 & 73 (Note).) Again, in 1841, in the case of the Queen v. the Guardians of the Poor of the Braintree Union (1 Queen's Bench Reports, 130), the validity of an order of the Commissioners directing the appointment of a chaplain to the workhouse was in question. In enforcing compliance with the order by the award of a peremptory mandamus, Lord Denman observed: "We say nothing on the return which merely offers reasons of expediency and policy against this particular exercise of discretion. Of such matters those to whom the discretion is confided are the sole judges." The position was at a later date (1852) described more tersely by Lord Campbell in the Queen v. Greene (17 Queen's Bench Reports, 793). There, on an objection that the Act of 1834 did not require that any order which the Poor Law Board might choose to make should have force till a certiorari could be obtained, Lord Campbell remarked: "The clause must be understood with a limitation—if, in making their order, they have acted in pursuance of the statute; at least thinking that they carried it into effect. The protection would not apply if they ordered that a man should be beheaded."

Incidents, &c., of regulations of Central Authority.

73. Have you anything to say about the regulations of the Poor Law Commissioners?—The Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, rendered liable to penalty on summary conviction persons wilfully neglecting or disobeying rules, orders or regulations of the Poor Law Commissioners or Assistant Commissioners, or guilty of contempt of the Commissioners sitting as a Board (Secs. 98–101). And rules, orders or regulations of the Central Authority can only be removed by certiorari into the King's Bench Division of the High Court (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, Secs. 105–108); while no writ of certiorari is to be granted unless the certiorari be moved or applied for within twelve months next after the day when the copy of the Order has been sent to the local authority concerned (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1849, Sec. 13).

The older Poor Law.

74. Do you wish at this stage to say anything about the older methods of poor relief?—Of late years there has been much discussion as to the exact effect of the provisions of the older law, including the statute of the 43rd of Elizabeth; so that before passing to the consideration of the subject of relief since the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, it may be useful to offer a brief comment upon the system as it existed at and shortly after the passing of the Poor Relief Act, 1601. It has been claimed for that Act that it is the foundation or the headstone of the existing Poor Law. On the other hand, it has been pointed out that the characteristic features of the existing law owe nothing to the statute of Elizabeth. These features have, it has been urged, a common law origin. It has been pointed out that, according to the passage quoted from Horne's Mirror in Coke's Institutes (part 3, c. 40, folio 103) it was ordained by kings before the Conquest that the poor should be sustained by parsons, rectors and the parishioners "so that no one should die for lack of sustenance." ("Ordeine fuit que les povres fuisent susteinus per les parsons, rectors, et les parochians cy que nul ne morust per default de susteinance.") This enunciation of the common law principle, even if we put the production of the Mirror as late as the reign of Edward II., precedes by about two centuries the earliest Tudor legislation; and we meet with recognition of the principle long after the Tudor period. Thus the question of a possible exception to that principle was mooted about 100 years after the Poor Relief Act, of 1601. That was in the case of an unsettled foreigner in the second year of George I. (St. Giles' v. St. Margaret, 1 Sessions Cases) which was cited as decided by Lord Holt; see the King v. the Inhabitants of Eastbourne (1803, 4, East, 103); and the principle itself is expressly affirmed in 1756 in the case of the King v. the Inhabitants of Aythrop Rooding (Burrow: Settlement Cases, 412).

The Poor Law immediately before and after 1601.

75. Do you wish to make any observations on the system in operation before and after 1601?—I do not propose to attempt here any illustration of the methods by which effect was given to the common law rule which is said to have established parochial chargeability; but I think that in order that its true place and value may be assigned to the Poor Relief Act, 1601, something should be said about the working of the Poor Law before and immediately after it. It is to be observed, then, that the Act of 1601 was a temporary measure; it was, as Lord Coke says (2 Institutes, 733), a probationer. Its details too were largely a reproduction of an earlier statute—the 39 Elizabeth c. 3. In both respects the tentative character of the measure is clearly shown. The Act indeed closed the series of experimental legislation which, throughout the Tudor period, was concerned with those whom at one time it was usual to class as the impotent poor. Further the renewals of the Act of 1601 were experimental; each occasion of renewal (1 James I. c. 25, Sec. 23, and 3 Charles I, c. 4, Sec. 22) being used to make a fresh development. Thus on the first renewal an amendment to facilitate apprenticeship was introduced; while on the second renewal this amendment was coupled with a new provision designed to enlarge the scope of the possible employment of the poor, for which purpose the overseers, with the justices' consent, were authorised to set up, use and occupy any trade mystery or occupation. And after the Poor Relief Act of 1601 was made perpetual—that is by virtue of the 16 Charles I. (1641)—the experimental character of the Act was not wholly lost; for the Act seems to have been regarded as in effect adoptive (in our modern sense), and there is ground for believing that the operation of the Statute of Elizabeth was for many years partial. Moreover, it is well, I think, to bear in mind the fact that the legislation of Queen Elizabeth did not extend or profess to extend to every class of poor. For, as Lord Mansfield said in 1785 in the King v. Thames Ditton (2 Bott. pl. 272): "The Poor Law began in the time of Queen Elizabeth, perhaps before villeinage was out of use. Villeinage in gross may not perhaps be now"—that is in 1785—"abolished. But none of those statutes apply at all to villeinage. The legislature never thought of it."

Summary of Tudor legislation respecting the poor.

76. Now you can give us some account of the Tudor legislation respecting the poor?—The Tudor Acts, which ended with that of 1601, had for their chief aim the prevention of begging. The series begins with the 11th Henry VII., and the first compulsory assessment was reached when the 14th Elizabeth, c. 5 was passed. Up to that Act the effect of the Tudor statutes is summarised by Dr. Burn in his "History of the Poor Laws." I will quote the summary, but for convenience of reference I will add to each paragraph a note of the Acts upon which it is founded. Dr. Burn writes thus: "First, the poor were restrained from begging at large, and were confined to beg within certain districts (11 Henry VII. c. 2; 19 Henry VII., c. 12; 22 Henry VIII., c. 12). Next the several hundreds, towns corporate, parishes, hamlets, or other like divisions were required to sustain them with such charitable and voluntary alms, as that none of them of necessity might be compelled to go openly in begging, and the churchwardens or other substantial inhabitants were to make collections for them, with boxes on Sundays, and otherwise by their discretions. And the minister was to take all opportunities to exhort and stir up the people to be liberal and bountiful (27 Henry VIII., c. 25). Next houses were to be provided for them by the devotion of good people, and materials to set them on such work as they were able to perform. Then the minister after the Gospel every Sunday was specially to exhort the parishioners to a liberal contribution (1 Edward VI., c. 3). Next the collectors for the poor on a certain Sunday in every year, immediately after Divine Service, were to take down in writing what every person was willing to give weekly for the ensuing year; and if any should be obstinate and refuse to give, the minister was gently to exhort him. If he still refused, the minister was to certify such refusal to the bishop of the diocese, and the bishop was to send for and exhort him in like manner. If he stood out against the Bishop's exhortation, then the bishop was to certify the same to the justices in sessions, and bind him over to appear there; and the justices at the said sessions were again gently to move and persuade him; and finally if he would not be persuaded then, they were to assess him what they thought reasonable towards the relief of the poor. And this brought on the general assessment in the 14th year of Queen Elizabeth (5 and 6 Edward VI., c. 2; 5 Elizabeth, c. 3)." Thomas Harman published in 1567 an edition of his book "A Caveat or Warening for Commen Cursetors, etc." The book sufficiently shows that the beggars' trade was at that date thriving. Certainly, if a rogue could earn 13s. 4d. a day in Elizabethan money as a counterfeit crank or pretended sufferer from the falling sickness the calling must have been very lucrative. Twenty years later Harrison, in his "Description of England" (published in 1586) estimated that, although not quite sixty years had passed since the trade began, the beggars numbered about 10,000. The last statute in Dr. Burn's Summary—the 14 Elizabeth, c. 5—aimed at the suppression of the roaming beggar by a measure also designed for the local care of the aged, decayed and impotent. The Justices by Sec. 16 were empowered to appoint meet and convenient places for the habitations and abidings of the latter class. Those who refused to be bestowed in the appointed abiding places or left them to beg were to be punished as rogues or vagabonds (Sec. 18). The Act may also deserve mention as recognising the principle of non-resident relief. It seems that Bath and Buxton were the resorts of a great number of the poor, who repaired "to the baths there for ease of their grief." These persons were to be not only licensed by justices, but also "provided for by the inhabitants of such hundreds, parishes or places from whence they shall so be licensed to travel." Twenty-five years later these persons appear again on the Statute Book; but this time in very bad company, for the Act of 39 Elizabeth, c. 4, is entitled "An act for the punishment of Rogues and Vagabonds," and Section 7 of that Act remained in force until the 12th year of Queen Anne. It should be added that the Act of the 14 Elizabeth was shortly afterwards amended by the 18 Elizabeth, c. 3, and that the later Act required provision to be made of a competent stock of wool, hemp, flax, iron, or other stuff to be delivered to the poor, who might work the stock into yarn or other matter, and receive payment according to the desert of the work. For those who refused or spoilt work or went abroad begging or lived idly, houses of correction were to be provided.

77. There was a curious expression you referred to, namely, "To ease their grief"; what is the modern interpretation of that phrase?—I suppose it was to ease their gout. It is sad to find them coupled with the rogues later on.

78. Does that exhaust the Tudor statutes?—There is one more—the 39th Elizabeth, c. 3. That Act, as has been already pointed out, anticipates much of the legislation of 1601. In particular two leading purposes were common to the Act of 1597, and the Act of 1601. Those were (a) "Setting to work all such persons, married or unmarried (as) having no means to maintain them, use no ordinary and daily trade of life to get their living by"; and (b) "Necessary relief of the lame, impotent, old, blind and such other among them being poor and not able to work." Except for the clerical error arising from the omission of

"as" from the Act of 1601, the language of the two statutes is in these passages the same; so that when we learn what was regarded as feasible under the Act of 1597 we have a clue to the possibilities of the Act of 1601.

79. Now can you give us an illustration of the actual practice under the Act of 39 Elizabeth, c. 3?—In a Report of the Historical Manuscripts Commission on the Collection of the Marquess of Lothian at Blickling Hall (Cd. 2319, 1905) there is on page 76 a copy of orders which apparently are those of Somersetshire justices in relation to the 39 Elizabeth, c. 3. The system set up by these orders made little provision with regard to work. The only direction under this head is that "the pore that doth worke in his own garding to have 2d a daye in week that he so worketh; so that it may appere to the overseers that there groweth good to the partie and Commonweale therby." Begging from door to door outside the parish was forbidden. Within the parish the beggar could only go to "such houses in such order as they shall be assigned by the overseers." This direction and the directions with regard to relief suggest that an attempt was to be made to work the proviso to Sec. 10 of the Act of 1597. The section forbade wandering abroad to beg, and the proviso was in these terms: "Provided always that this present Act shall not extend to any poor people which shall ask relief of victuals only in the same parish where such poor people do dwell so the same be in such time only and according to such order and direction as shall be made and appointed by the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the same parish according to the true intent and meaning of this Act." The following directions would be within the proviso. "That the overseers assigne none to fetch releif at any house but as be merelie impotente or under the age of seven yeres and such as the overseers shall well prove that theire parents are not able to releif by theire worke or livelihoode: that such as shall be assigned to fetch any releife at any howse, be assigned to some howse nere and certeyne to fetch it, not wander about or from howse to howse at theire pleasures, and the howses to be assigned when they shall fetch theire releife." The rate on the other hand was to be applied "for the releif of hospitalls and spitle howses and such as receive losse by water or fyer within this sheire and for the releif of the poore persons of the Kings Bench or Marshalsye." So that the general view of the working of the Poor Law in these Somersetshire parishes is of beggars and recipients of relief in kind made to follow an appointed round within the parish, of payments to the working poor out of the moneys derived from other sources than the rates, and of a free use of the House of Correction for the idle and petty offenders.

80. Have you any note of higher authority than these Justices' orders for the procedure under the Act of 1597?—From Lambard's Eirenarcha (Book 2, Chapter 7) it is perhaps to be inferred that the Somersetshire orders were framed with some knowledge of the resolutions ascribed to Her Majesty's Justices at Westminster. These resolutions, which, according to Lambard, tended much to the right execution of the 39th of Elizabeth, contained a clause to the effect that "None may be suffered to take reliefe at any man's door, though within the same parish, unlesse it be by the order of the overseers according to the statute, neither may any bee suffered to begge by the highwaies, though in their owne parish." Again, the resolutions laid down the rules that "If the parents be able to worke and may have worke they are to finde their children by their labor and not the parish. But if they bee overburthened with children it shal bee a verie good way to procure some of them to be placed apprentices according to the statute. Noe man is to bee put out of the towne where he dwelleth nor to be sent to their place of birth or last habitation but a vagaraunt rogue, nor to be found by the towne except the partie be impotent, but ought to set themselves to labour if they bee able and can get worke; if they cannot, the overseers must set them to labour. Such persons as bee of any parish and have able bodies to worke, and be no wanderers abroade out of the parish, though they refuse to worke at such wages as is taxed (or commonly given) in those partes are notwithstanding not to be sent to their place of birth or last dwelling by the space of an yeare, but to the house of correction upon consideration had of both the statutes of the poore and rogues. But if they have any lawfull meanes to live by, though they be of able bodies and refuse to worke, yet they are not to bee sent to the House of Correction"

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

8 Jan. 1906.

81. Have you anything to say about the funds from which assistance was provided for the poor when the system you have described was in vogue?—The Acts of 1597 and 1601 were alike in requiring quarter sessions to assess contributions from the parishes in their county towards the relief of poor prisoners in the King's Bench and the Marshalsea. In each Act, too, provision was made for contribution to hospitals and almshouses. The attention of the Commission has already been drawn to the fact that in the Somersetshire orders the only rate mentioned was one for these purposes. As an appendix to the book entitled "The Parish," by the late Toulmin Smith, there is printed an interesting series of extracts from the records of a Wiltshire parish during the first twenty-five years after the Poor Relief Act, 1601. These extracts are described as a "Register of. . . . Vestries or church reckonings, about ye stock and maintenance for ye poore." There are recorded dealings with a parish stock of money variable in amount and placed out at interest. Those who borrowed were apparently the poorer inhabitants. They had to find bondsmen and to pay interest usually at the rate of about 10 per cent. This interest was distributed for the benefit of the poor, or was sometimes added to the stock. But throughout the whole period, there is no mention of a rate, either as the source of the poor stock or as a means for providing for purposes outside the range of the poor stock. The last entry in these parish records is dated the 26th December, 1628.

Parish "Stocks" in 17th century.

82. Was there not a special enquiry by Royal Commission about that date; and did that Commission deal at all with the subject of rates or finance?—On the 5th January, 1630, a Royal Commission was appointed for putting in execution of the laws and statutes for relief of the poor, punishment of rogues, and employment of gifts to charitable uses. The Commissioners were empowered to set down and give such orders and directions "as that all and every the said laws and other necessary statutes may be duly and effectually executed." But the only mention of rating in the Commission is with reference to the sums appointed by the Poor Relief Act, 1601, for the relief of soldiers and mariners. It is true that the directions issued by the Privy Council under the authority of this Commission enjoined that the weekly taxations for relief of the poor and other purposes mentioned in the 43rd Elizabeth be raised to higher rates; but the same directions in ordering that the gift of money or stock for the relief of the poor should be no occasion of lessening of the rates, suggest that, as a matter of practice, voluntary contributions had been substituted for the compulsory levy. That there are to be found examples of assessments in conformity with these and similar directions may of course be admitted; nevertheless, I think that there exists no clear and overwhelming proof of inaccuracy in the statement quoted by Sir Frederick Eden ("State of the Poor," Vol. I, p. 144) from a pamphlet of 1698, that though parishes were enabled (by the 43rd Elizabeth) to make rates, and the owners of estates obliged to the payment, yet in many places no such rates were made in twenty, thirty or forty years after. Further, it seems to me to be doubtful whether even in 1673 the pamphleteer, whose estimate of £840,000 a year, Sir Frederick Eden, at page 188, accepted as the earliest account of the amount of the poor rate, is in fact an authority for the levy of a rate to that amount. We must, I think, look upon the estimate as a calculation of the total expenditure from all sources; for as an estimate of the produce of rates, it could not be easily reconciled with an estimate of the Board of Trade, in 1696, which arrived at the very different total of £400,000.

Royal Commission of 1630. Estimates of expenditure in 17th century.

83. Did the Board of Trade state that £400,000 was levied?—That was an estimate of the Board of Trade, and in that estimate John Locke was specially concerned. The materials for the estimate, I believe, were obtained through the Archbishops, who communicated with the various parishes, and the whole was digested under, I think, the superintendence of John Locke.

84. Is that the first authentic evidence you have of anything like a general rate?—That estimate of 1696, as will appear from a passage which I propose to quote later from the report of a Select Committee in 1817, was then treated as by no means absolutely acceptable.

85. What would be your deductions as to the extent to which the Poor Relief Act of 1601 was operative before the Revolution of 1689 ?—Perhaps on the authority of Sir Matthew Hale's "Discourse touching Provision for the Poor" it may be assumed that before 1683, the date of publication, there were rates in most of the populous parishes; but the inference from the same writer would be that the provision thus made for the poor unable to work was insufficient, while the supply from the rates of a stock for setting the poor to work was altogether rare. On the whole, therefore, the safest conclusion to adopt with regard to compulsory rating in the 17th and 18th centuries, seems to be that of a Select Committee appointed by the House of Commons in 1817 "to consider of the Poor Laws." That Committee reported as follows:—"What might have been the amount of the assessments for the poor during the 17th and 18th centuries the Committee have no means of ascertaining." The report then alludes to the fact that "the preamble of 13 and 14 Charles II. states 'the necessity, number and continued increase of the poor to be very great and exceeding burthensome.'" The Committee also remarked that in the year 1699, King William thus expressed himself in a speech from the Throne:—"'The increase of the poor is become a burthen to the Kingdom and their loose and idle life does in some measure contribute to that depravation of manners which is complained of, I fear, with too much reason; whether the ground of this evil be from defects in the laws already made, or in the execution of them, deserves your consideration.'" The report continues: "Though complaints appear certainly to have been since made of the increasing numbers of the poor, yet it was not till the present reign, in the year 1776, that authentic accounts of this expenditure were required under the authority of the legislature." So that it seems to be permissible to put forward the following deductions with respect to the Poor Relief Act, 1601, namely, (i) that the Act was originally intended for the regulation of a particular class only of the poor; (ii) that there is ground for the belief that long after its passing many parishes maintained their poor without recourse to its provisions; and (iii) that there is no sufficient ground for the belief that, at any time during this period, the use made of the means of setting the poor to work on a parish stock was other than exceptional.

Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, Sec. 15.

86. You now wish to pass on to the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834; what provisions in that Act do you note with respect to relief in general ?—With regard to relief in general, the effect of Sec. 15 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, is that the administration of relief to the poor throughout England and Wales, according to the then existing laws or such laws as shall be in force at the time being, is to be subject to the direction and control of the Central Authority. The Local Government Board are accordingly authorised and required from time to time, as they shall see occasion, to make and issue all such rules, orders, and regulations for the management of the poor, and for the guidance and control of all guardians, vestries, and parish officers, so far as relates to the management or relief of the poor and the keeping, examining, auditing and allowing of accounts and making and entering into contracts in all matters relating to such management or relief, or to any expenditure for the relief of the poor and for carrying the Act of 1834 into execution in all other respects as the Local Government Board shall think proper. Power to suspend, alter or rescind rules, orders and regulations was at the same time conferred. Sec. 15 concludes with a proviso that nothing in it shall be construed as enabling the Local Government Board to interfere in any individual case for the purpose of ordering relief.

Accounts and audit.

87. Sec. 15 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, mentioned accounts and audit; have you anything to say about these matters ?—Yes. Following the enumeration of subjects in Sec. 15 of the Act of 1834, I draw attention to a selection of enactments relating to matters ancillary to the general purpose of relief. First, as to the keeping, examining, auditing and allowing of accounts, I have to point out that the law has been greatly developed since the Act of 1834 gave the Poor Law Commissioners power to make rules. The present system of accounts and audit is largely the outcome of a report by the Poor Law Commissioners in 1843 on Local Taxation. In that report the Commissioners at page 61 said: The essential requisites for the efficacy of any system of accounts are—first, that the officer responsible for the balance should be himself solvent or should afford solvent security for all the funds placed at his disposal; second, that what he ought to receive should be ascertained and defined; third, that what he is empowered to pay should be defined; fourth, that his account in detail should be enforceable effectually before an auditing officer, competent to surcharge, reduce and disallow items of account; and fifth, that effectual remedies be given for the recovery of the balances found. With regard to the keeping of accounts, the chief rules of general application are those contained in a general order issued by the Poor Law Board on the 14th of January, 1867. These rules have been supplemented in relation to various details from time to time. The most important of the additions was made when, on a change in the manner of providing for the expenses of audit, the District Auditors Act, 1879, imposed a scale of stamp duties, and by Sec. 3 enacted that where the accounts of the receipts and expenditure of a local authority are audited by a district auditor, the local authority should prepare and submit to the district auditor a financial statement in duplicate in the prescribed form, and containing the prescribed particulars. One duplicate is to have the stamp affixed, and the auditor, at the conclusion of the audit, is to cancel the stamp and certify the expenditure audited and allowed. With respect to the audit, provision had been made by the Act of 1834 in Sec. 47, but after the report on Local Taxation in 1843 very important alterations were made by the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844. That Act authorised the combination of parishes and unions into audit districts. For these districts, auditors were to be elected by the chairmen and vice-chairmen of the boards of guardians. This mode of appointment lasted until 1868. By Sec. 24 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868, the power of appointment was transferred to the Poor Law Board, and the auditors, by virtue of Sec. 25, became civil servants. The existing powers of the Local Government Board with regard to the appointment and districts of auditors, are derived from Sec. 4 of the District Auditors Act, 1879.

88. Have you anything to add about the powers and duties of the auditor ?—The chief functions of the auditor and the chief features of the audit are to be gathered from the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, and the Poor Law Audit Act, 1848. An outline of these is all that can here be attempted. The scope of the enactments of 1844 and 1848, though widened by successive legislation so as to include purposes other than those of the Poor Law, primarily concerns monies assessed for and applicable to the relief of the poor. The auditor has authority to examine, audit, allow or disallow of accounts and of items therein; to charge in every audited account the amount of any deficiency or loss incurred by the negligence or misconduct of any person accounting, or of any sum for which any such person is accountable but not brought by him into account; to certify money, books, deeds, papers, goods or chattels found by him to be due from any person; and to recover monies certified by him to be due.

The audit

89. Have you anything to say about appeals ?—The auditor's decision with regard to any allowance, disallowance or surcharge is subject to appeal. In one class of cases, however, the finality of his decision is recognised by Statute, with the result that in these cases appeals can be entertained only on equitable grounds. The cases are those of untaxed law costs incurred by overseers or boards of guardians. Sec. 39 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, enacts that, if any bill of this kind for business performed on behalf of a parish or union be not taxed before it is presented to the auditor, his decision on the reasonableness as well as the legality of the charges shall be final. Accordingly, the allowance or disallowance of the charges cannot be removed into the High Court by certiorari (Queen v. Napton, 25 Law Journal, Queen's Bench, 296; 2 Jurist, New Series, 1138). Generally, a person aggrieved may require the Auditor to state in the book of account his reasons for the allowance, disallowance or surcharge. The person aggrieved may then apply for a writ of certiorari to remove the allowance, disallowance or surcharge into the King's Bench Division. The auditor must appear and defend, and is to be reimbursed from the rates the costs of his defence. An alternative appeal is authorised. The person aggrieved, instead of going to the King's Bench Division, may apply to the Local Government Board to inquire into and decide upon the lawfulness of the auditor's reasons. The powers of the Local Government Board on an appeal are wider than those of the High Court, for the Board have an equitable jurisdiction and may decide according to the merits of the case. Moreover, under the Local Authorities (Expenses) Act, 1887, expenses paid by any Local Authority whose accounts are subject to audit by a district auditor, are not to be disallowed by the auditor if they have been sanctioned by the Local Government Board.

90. I understand that these powers are now in operation?—That is so. They have also been extended to the accounts for other purposes than those of the Poor Law.

91. Then, practically, there has been no alteration as regards the powers of auditors and the statutes thereupon?—That is so—except the extension to which I have referred.

92. Have you any remarks to make on the subject of contracts?—Yes. By Section 49 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, it is enacted that any contract which shall be entered into by or on behalf of any parish or union for or relating to the maintenance, clothing, lodging, employment or relief of the poor, or for any other purpose relating to or connected with the general management of the poor, which shall not be made and entered into in conformity with the rules, orders or regulations of the Central Authority in that behalf in force at the time of making and entering into the same, or otherwise sanctioned by them, shall be voidable, and if the Central Authority so direct, shall be null and void; and all payments made under or in pursuance of any contract not made and entered into in conformity with such rules, orders, or regulations at any period after the Central Authority shall have declared the same to be null and void, shall be disallowed in passing the accounts of the overseer, guardian or other officer by whom such payments shall have been made. The rules made by the Central Authority respecting contracts will be found in the General Consolidated Order of the Poor Law Commissioners of the 24th of July, 1847, and in a General Order issued by the Local Government Board on the 31st of December, 1877.

93. Perhaps you will put those Orders in?—Yes, certainly. I will put in extracts from the General Consolidated Order, and a copy of the other General Order. (See Appendix, Vol. I. (A), No. I. (2).)

ers, intment, s, re- ration, issal.

94. Now, I think that you wish to summarise certain provisions relating to officers?—Yes. Under the general head of relief may be noted the provisions with regard to the local staff of officers. By Section 46 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, the Local Government Board are enabled by order to direct the appointment of such paid officers with such qualifications as the Board think necessary, for superintending or assisting in the administration of the relief and employment of the poor, and otherwise carrying the provisions of the Poor Law Acts into execution. The Board may define and specify and direct the execution of the respective duties of the officers, and the places or limits within which the duties are to be performed, and determine the continuance in office or dismissal of the officers, and the amount and nature of the security to be given by such of the said officers as the Board think ought to give security. When the Board see occasion they may regulate the amount of salaries, the time and mode of payment, and the proportionate contributions of parishes or unions. The Local Government Board may by order under Sec. 48 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, either upon or without any suggestion or complaint from the overseers or guardians, remove a workhouse master, or assistant overseer or other paid officer whom the board deem unfit for or incompetent to discharge the duties of his office, or who refuses or wilfully neglects to obey and carry into effect any rules, orders or regulations of the Board, and may require the appointment of a fit and proper person in the place of the removed officer. If the order dismissing a paid officer declare that the urgency of the case requires that the order shall take effect within the period of fourteen days, the Order will come into force at such time as the Board direct (5 and 6 Vic., c. 57, Sec. 4).

95. I understand that in certain cases of failure the Local Government Board have power to appoint officers?—That is so. If a board of guardians fail for twenty-eight days after the receipt of a requisition of the Local Government Board to appoint, either originally or on a vacancy, any officer whom the guardians are lawfully required to appoint, the Local Government Board may, at the expiration of the time, by Order appoint a fit person to be the officer, and determine the salary or remuneration to be paid to him by the guardians. The person so appointed shall recover his salary by action, and will have the same powers, rights and privileges, and shall discharge the same duties and incur the same responsibilities as if the appointment had been duly made by the guardians (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868, Sec. 7). This enactment had been preceded by a somewhat similar provision applicable to the Metropolis and to the managers of asylums and dispensary committees under the Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867, and to the guardians of Metropolitan Poor Law Unions (Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867, Sec. 80). In that case the period after failure was only fourteen days.

Liabilities of officers.

96. Have you anything to say respecting the liabilities of officers?—With regard to the liabilities of officers, it may be pointed out that so much of the Poor Relief Act, 1815, (55 George III., c. 137) as inflicts a penalty on persons having the management of the poor, if concerned in providing or in any contract for the supply of goods, materials or provisions for the use of a workhouse or otherwise for the support or maintenance of the poor for their own profit, is made applicable to every officer appointed under the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834 (Sec. 51). A workhouse master or other paid officer, or any other person employed by or under the authority of the guardians, who purloins, embezzles or wilfully wastes or misapplies moneys, goods or chattels is liable to a penalty not exceeding £20, and treble the amount or value purloined, embezzled, wasted or misapplied; and becomes on conviction incapable of serving office under the Poor Law Acts (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, Sec. 97). So also a person removed from office by the Local Government Board becomes incompetent to be appointed to or to fill a paid office connected with the relief of the poor in a Poor Law Union without the consent of the Board (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, Sec. 48).

Protection of officers.

97. Have you anything to say about the protection of officers?—Protection is afforded to officers by several statutory provisions. A person convicted of assault upon a workhouse officer, a relieving officer, or any other officer in the due execution of his duty, or upon a person acting in aid of the officer may be sentenced to imprisonment (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1850, Sec. 9; Poor Law Amendment Act, 1851, Sec. 18). The guardians may pay or reimburse the expense necessarily incurred by an officer in repairing or restoring his property, when unlawfully, wilfully and maliciously damaged injured, or destroyed by an applicant for relief; and such costs and expenses of prosecution as may not be allowed by the court trying the case (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1851, Sec. 5; 14 & 15 Vic. c. 105).

Superannuation of officers.

98. Will you now give us the effect of the provisions relating to superannuation?—The superannuation of Poor Law officers is the subject of important provisions in the Poor Law Officers' Superannuation Act, 1896, and in the Poor Law Officers' Superannuation Amendment Act, 1897. The Act of 1896 confers the right to superannuation on every officer and servant in the service or employment of the guardians of a Poor Law Union, who becomes incapable of discharging his duties with efficiency by reason of permanent infirmity of mind or body, or of old age, or who has attained the age of sixty years, and has completed an aggregate service of forty years, or has attained the full age of sixty-five years. The guardians may enforce retirement when an officer or servant has attained the age of sixty-five. Section 3 of the Act prescribes a scale of allowances. The Act also provides for the aggregation of service (Sec. 4), and for the addition of years, not exceeding ten, in the computation of allowances in certain cases (Sec. 5). Contributions according to a percentage are made out of the salary or wages of officers and servants (Secs. 12 and 13). An officer or servant who is dismissed or resigns, or otherwise ceases to hold office in consequence of any offence of a fraudulent character, or of grave misconduct, forfeits his claim to a superannuation allowance, but the guardians may return his contributions. The return of contributions and the grant of gratuities are authorised in specified cases (Sec. 8).

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

8 Jan. 1906.

The Act expressly applies to the managers of district schools and sick asylums, to the managers of the metropolitan asylum district, and to their officers and servants, and to superintendent registrars and registrars of births and deaths; and the expression "guardians" as used in the Act includes the trustees or overseers of a parish under a local Act, and a vestry or other authority charged with the administration of the relief of the poor for any union, parish, or other area (Sec. 19). Under Sec. 15 of the Act, officers might, within three months after its commencement signify their intention not to avail themselves of its provisions; and by the Act of 1897 special provisions of similar scope were made applicable to female nurses.

99. Compensation, too, is sometimes payable to officers, I think?—Yes.

100. What are the cases?—Compensation for loss of office or emolument is secured to officers on changes of Poor Law areas. On the dissolution of any union, or the addition or separation of a parish and consequent deprivation of office, the Local Government Board may award compensation either in a sum certain or by way of annuity (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1867, Sec. 20; Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868, Sec. 15). Other changes, involving also diminution of profits or determination or variation of contracts with officers of metropolitan workhouses, may likewise be the subject of compensation to be awarded by the Local Government Board (Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867, Sec. 59; Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876, Secs 7 and 41). Further, in the Metropolis, compensation which is chargeable on the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund may be awarded on the dissolution of an asylum or school district as well as on Poor Law Union changes (Metropolitan Poor Amendment Act, 1869, Sec. 1). Dissolution of school districts elsewhere may give rise to compensation, as in the case of a dissolution of a union (Poor Law (Dissolution of School Districts and Adjustments) Act, 1903, Sec. 1).

Relief: Liability of husbands and fathers.

101. We have finished that branch of the subject, I think; and, therefore, we come now to another head of the general subject of relief; what do you range under this head?—Under this general head—relief—may be grouped various provisions relating to incidents and consequences of relief, and to methods of reimbursement and connected matters. In the first place, it may be well to consider the provisions affecting husbands and fathers. By Sec. 56 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, it is enacted that all relief given to or on account of the wife, or to or on account of any child or children under the age of sixteen, not being blind, or deaf and dumb, shall be considered as given to the husband or to the father, as the case may be. Every man who marries a woman having a child or children at the time of marriage, whether the child or children be legitimate or illegitimate, is liable to maintain the child or children as a part of his family. The man will be chargeable with all relief granted to or on account of the child or children until the attainment of the age of sixteen, or until the death of the mother (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, sec. 57). A soldier is liable to contribute to the maintenance of his wife, and children, and to the maintenance of a bastard, to the same extent as if he were not a soldier; and deductions may be made from his pay (Army Act, 1881, Sec. 145; Army Annual Act, 1883, Sec. 7; Army Annual Act, 1891, Sec. 7).

Neglect of duty to maintain.

102. Will you now mention the provisions available for enforcing the duty of maintaining a family?—Every person being able wholly or in part to maintain himself or his family by work or other means, and wilfully refusing or neglecting to do so, by which refusal or neglect he or any of his family whom he may be legally bound to maintain have become chargeable, is to be deemed an idle and disorderly person and to be liable to imprisonment and hard labour for a time not exceeding a calendar month (Vagrancy Act, 1824, 5, Geo. IV., c. 83, Sec. 3). It has been held that these provisions did not extend to the case of a man whose wife had left him and committed adultery (King v. Flintan; 1 Barnewall and Adolphus, 227), or to one who, being summoned for refusing to maintain his child, proved that there had been a separation three years before the child was born, and that since the separation the wife had led the life of a prostitute (Sibbet v. Ainsley, 3 Law Times, New Series, 583).

Contributions by husband to relief of wife.

103. What is the effect of the enactments for contribution by a husband to the relief of his wife?—When a married woman requires relief without her husband, the guardians may apply to the justices in petty sessions, and, after a summons to the husband and hearing the wife, or receiving other sufficient evidence, the justices may make an order upon the husband to pay a sum towards the relief of the wife (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868, Sec. 33). On the removal of a lunatic wife to an asylum, her husband may, on the application of the guardians, be summoned to show cause why an order should not be made upon him to maintain or contribute towards the maintenance of his wife in the asylum. The justices upon the man's appearance, or proof of the service of the summons, may make an order to pay a sum towards the maintenance of the lunatic (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1850, Sec. 5; Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876, Sec. 20).

Desertion.

104. Are there any provisions against desertion?—A person running away and leaving his wife or child chargeable, or whereby the wife or child becomes chargeable, is to be deemed a rogue and vagabond, and is liable to imprisonment for a time not exceeding three calendar months (Vagrancy Act, 1824, Sec. 4). The guardians may take proceedings at any time within two years after the commission of the offence, and the summons or warrant may be issued upon the information of a relieving officer stating that he is informed and believes that the husband or parent has left the wife or child and gone away (Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876, Sec. 19). With reference to this provision, it should be noted that where a man was prosecuted for running away and leaving his children chargeable, a Metropolitan police magistrate refused to convict, as the man had been three times charged and twice convicted of the offence. But it was held, on a case stated for the opinion of the High Court, that the offence was continuing, the children having been continuously chargeable, and the prisoner having kept away and evaded arrest (Bannister v. Sullivan; 91 Law Times, New Series, 380). It was also held that a deserted wife, who, having no means to maintain her children, left them so that they became chargeable, could not be convicted as a rogue and vagabond under these provisions (Peters v. Cowie, Law Reports, 2 Queen's Bench Division, 131; 46 Law Journal, Magistrates' Cases, 177). A similar conclusion was reached in the case of a widow who left her children at the workhouse gate with an order for admission (Queen v. Parr, 10 Common Bench, New Series, 99; 30 Law Journal, Magistrates' Cases, 241).

Relief: Liability of wives, widows and mothers.

105. You now come, I think, to the provisions relating to the position of wives, widows and mothers in the matter of relief; will you give the substance of those?—Where the husband of a married woman, having separate property, becomes chargeable, the justices in petty sessions may, on the application of the guardians, issue a summons against the wife, and afterwards make an order upon her for contribution to the maintenance of the husband (Married Women's Property Act, 1882, Sec. 20). A married woman having separate property is subject to all the liability for the maintenance of her children and grandchildren to which the husband is now by law subject. But his liability is not relieved by that of his wife (Married Women's Property Act, 1882, Sec. 21). Relief given to or on account of a child or children under the age of sixteen of a widow is to be considered as given to the widow (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, Sec. 56). So long as it appears that the husband of a woman is beyond the seas, or in custody of the law, or in confinement as a lunatic or idiot, all relief given to the woman or to her child or children shall be given as if she was a widow (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, Sec. 25). This provision extends to a married woman living separate from her husband (Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876, Sec. 18). The mother of a bastard, so long as she is unmarried or a widow, is bound to maintain the bastard until the attainment of the age of sixteen. All relief granted to the bastard under the age of sixteen is to be considered as granted to the mother (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, Sec. 71).

Relief by relations.

106. Will you now give a short account of the law respecting relief by relations?—The Poor Relief Act, 1601, Sec. 6, enacts as follows:—"The father and grandfather and the mother and grandmother and the children of every poor, old, blind, lame and impotent person or other poor person not being able to work, being of a sufficient ability, shall, at their own charges, relieve and maintain every such poor person in that manner and according to that rate as by the justices . . . . shall be assessed." (Poor Relief Act, 1601, Sec. 7; Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868, Sec. 36). The needful orders under the Act of 1601 may be obtained by the guardians (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1848, Sec. 8). Orders can be made only in cases of blood relationship. A grandfather is liable to support a grandchild, but there is no reciprocal liability; and the grandfather's liability may be enforced though the father is alive, and whether the father is or is not able to support the child (The King v. Cornish, 2 Barnewall & Adolphus, 498). Originally the Poor Relief Act, 1601, attached a penalty to failure to comply with an order of the justices in any such case. But the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868, by Sec. 36 repealed the old provisions as to penalties, and enacted that maintenance orders should be enforced in the manner prescribed by the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848. Previously, therefore, to the Act of 1868, neglect to comply with a justices' order of maintenance was a criminal offence. But the effect of the Act of 1868, and of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, was to make the money due a civil debt; and an order for the payment of a civil debt is not, failing distress or otherwise, enforceable by imprisonment, unless it be proved that the defaulter has, or has had since the order, the means to pay the debt (In re Gamble, Law Reports, 1899, 1 Queen's Bench, 305).

107. Did that alteration in the law apply to the previous cases you mentioned?—It applied to such cases of orders upon relations as I have been dealing with.

108. And not as regards husbands?—Such orders as are authorised by the Poor Relief Act of 1601 are applicable only to cases of blood relationship such as the father, grandfather, and so on.

ıburse- of relief.

109. Are there any other provisions you would like to mention with regard to the reimbursement of relief?—As regards the reimbursement of relief, it is to be observed that Sec. 58 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, provides that any relief, or the cost price thereof, which shall be given to or on account of any poor person above the age of twenty-one, or to his wife, or any part of his family under the age of sixteen, and which the Local Government Board shall by any rule, order or regulation declare or direct to be given or considered as given by way of loan, and whether any receipt for such relief or engagement to repay the same or the cost price thereof or any part thereof shall have been given or not by the person to or on account of whom the same shall have been so given, shall be considered and the same is declared by the Section to be a loan to such poor person. Power is given to the justices to attach wages in the hands of a master or employer to recoup relief (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, Sec. 59); or the relief may be recovered in the county court (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1848, Sec. 8). Where the wife or child or stepchild of a merchant seaman during his absence becomes chargeable, the Poor Law Union is entitled to be reimbursed out of the seaman's wages, provided the amount does not exceed half the wages where one is chargeable, and two-thirds of the wages where two or more are chargeable. Notice is to be given by the guardians to the shipowner, who will retain the proportion of wages, and is to give notice to the guardians of the seaman's return and notice to the seaman of the guardians' claim. The guardians may afterwards apply to a Court of Summary Jurisdiction for an order for reimbursement, and the order will be an authority for the payment by the shipowner of the amount to be reimbursed (Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, Secs. 182 and 183). If destitute Lascars or other natives of India, brought as seamen, or for employment as seamen, or for employment by the owner of the ship bringing them, are relieved and maintained by a board of guardians, they may obtain from the Secretary of State in Council of India repayment out of the revenues of India of the amount expended (Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, Sec. 185).

110. In what way can property be made available for the repayment of relief?—Recoupment from the property of a pauper is permissible in certain circumstances. Thus, where a pauper has in his possession or belonging to him any money or valuable security for money, the guardians may take and appropriate so much of the money or the produce of the security "or recover the same as a debt before any local court as will reimburse the said guardians for the amount expended by them . . . . in the relief of such pauper during the period of twelvemonths prior to such taking and appropriation, or prior to such proceeding for the recovery thereof, as the case may be." In the event of the death of a pauper having in his possession or belonging to him any money or property, the guardians may reimburse themselves the expenses incurred by them in and about the burial of the pauper, and in and about the maintenance of the pauper at any time during the twelve months previous to the decease (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1849, Sec. 16). This enactment does not restrict the Common Law right of guardians to recover from the executor of a will under which a pauper child was entitled to a legacy, the cost of the child's maintenance for a period of six years (re Clabbon, deceased, and re F. W. Clabbon, an infant; Law Reports, 1904, 2 Chancery, 465; 73 Law Journal, Chancery 853). And where a woman had for more than six years prior to her death been maintained as a pauper lunatic, and during that period had been entitled to an annuity which had not been paid to her, it was held that the guardians were entitled to repayment for the twelve months before death and that for a further period of five years they could claim as ordinary creditors (Lambeth Guardians v. Bradshaw, 57 Law Times, New Series, 86). Again, a pauper lunatic became entitled to a fund; and thereupon the guardians on a summons in lunacy claimed six years' arrears for past maintenance. An order was made by the Court in Lunacy for the appointment of a receiver, and for the payment by him out of the fund to the guardians of part of the arrears, the balance being applied to future maintenance. On the death of the lunatic there was a balance in the hands of the receiver. The guardians then commenced a creditor's administration action in the Chancery Division against the lunatic's administrators, to obtain payment of the balance of the six years' arrears. It was held by the Court of Appeal that the balance was a valid legal debt enforceable after the lunatic's death (In re Taylor, Guardians of Edmonton Union v. Deely; Law Reports, 1901, 1 Chancery, 480). But the guardians are ordinary and not preferential creditors (Laver v. Botham and Sons; Law Reports, 1895, 1 Queen's Bench, 59).

111. Are there any other methods of reimbursement that you can mention?—Among other methods of reimbursement are the assignment of or charges on military and naval pensions (Pensions Act, 1839), payments by trustees out of annuities or periodical payments (Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876, Sec. 23), and payments by trustees or managers out of sums payable by a friendly or benefit society, where the pauper has no wife or relative dependent on him, and the guardians or their relieving officer have declared the relief to be given on loan, and have notified the secretary or trustees within thirty days (Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876, Sec. 23; Poor Law Amendment Act, 1879, Sec. 1). It may be noted that it has been held that a trade union is not a benefit or friendly society within these enactments (Winder v. Kingston-upon-Hull Guardians; Law Reports, 20 Queen's Bench Division, 412; 58 Law Times New Series, 583). This decision was based on the following ground, namely, that the language of Sec. 23 of the Act of 1876 contemplates legal liability, and is inapplicable to funds which, as in the case of trade unions under Sec. 4 of the Trade Unions Act, 1871, are as regards collection and distribution not subject to interference by the High Court. That was the ground of the judgment of Mr. Justice Mathew. This reasoning, however, since the decision of the House of Lords in the Yorkshire Miners' Association and Others v. Howden (Law Reports, 1905, Appeal Cases, 256; 92 Law Times, New Series, 701) is not unassailable; and the decision in the earlier case must, I think, be now regarded as questionable. Also it may be pointed out that where trustees or managers decline to make a payment and the guardians apply to the justices to make an order, the justices cannot intervene unless the right of the pauper to receive the periodical payment is undisputed (The Queen v. Richardson, Law Reports, 1894, 2 Queen's Bench, 323; 63 Law Journal, Magistrates' Cases, 212; 70 Law Times, New Series, 805).

Pensions, annuities, payments by friendly societies.

112. Now we come to the point of electoral disqualification; I assume that the observations that you wish to make on this subject would be only in connection with its limited association with the Poor Law?—Quite so. The subject of electoral disqualification is, I think, for the most part outside the scope of the present inquiry; but the subject has, to a limited extent, an association with the Poor Law. For illustration of this aspect of the matter, I do not consider it expedient to attempt any exact explanation of details. The main object of what I have to say on the subject is to bring under the notice of the Commissioners some instances of the inter-relation of the Poor Law and Election Law.

Electoral disqualification.

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

Disqualifying relief or other alms.

113. Would your observations be confined to the case of the Parliamentary franchise?—Yes. The general effect of Sec. 36 of the Reform Act, 1832 (2 William IV., c. 45), as extended by the Representation of the People Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict., c. 102, Sec. 40) now is that no person shall be entitled to be registered in any year as a Parliamentary voter for any county, city, or borough, who within twelve calendar months next previous to the 15th day of July in that year has received parochial relief or other alms.

Medical Relief Disqualification Removal Act, 1885.

114. Has the original disqualification been modified?—The disqualification arising from parochial relief has been modified to a considerable extent by the Medical Relief Disqualification Removal Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict., c. 46). Sec. 2 of that enactment is to the effect that where a person has in any part of the United Kingdom received for himself, or for any member of his family, any medical or surgical assistance, or any medicine at the expense of any poor rate, such person shall not by reason thereof be deprived of any right to be registered or to vote as a Parliamentary voter. The term "medical or surgical assistance" in the Act includes all medical and surgical attendance, and all matters and things supplied by or on the recommendation of the medical officer having authority to give such attendance and recommendation at the expense of any poor rate (Sec. 4).

Honeybone v. Hambridge.

115. Has this Act been the subject of interpretation by the Courts of Law?—There are two judicial decisions on this enactment. The first of these, (Honeybone v. Hambridge; Law Reports, 18 Queen's Bench Division 418; 56 Law Journal, Queen's Bench 46), illustrates the beneficial interpretation to which the Act has been subjected. In that case, the wife of the appellant asked a relieving officer for an order for the attendance of a medical man during her confinement. The guardians authorised the relieving officer to give such an order. That officer did not in fact give it, but he sent an uncertificated midwife to the woman and afterwards paid the midwife. The Revising Barrister decided adversely to the claim of the appellant to be registered. The High Court, however, were of opinion that the midwife's services were "medical or surgical assistance" within the Act of 1885. It was pointed out that the rights of the husband were not to depend upon the character of the attendant, but upon the nature of the service rendered, and that the fact of the woman being satisfied with the assistance of a less qualified person than the medical officer, could not make the attendance less "medical or surgical attendance" within the meaning of the Act.

Kirkhouse v. Blakeway.

116. Have you a note of any other cases before the High Court?—The second case (Kirkhouse v. Blakeway; Law Reports, 1902, 1 King's Bench, 306; 71 Law Journal, King's Bench, 130) affords some guide to the discrimination of ordinary relief and medical relief. The wife of the claimant in this second case had, during the whole of the qualifying period, been maintained at the cost of the poor rate as a pauper patient in the Gloucester county lunatic asylum, and nothing had been contributed by the claimant towards her maintenance. The Revising Barrister thought that the permanent maintenance of a lunatic or imbecile was distinguishable from the medical treatment of a patient under a temporary attack of mental disease, and that such maintenance was not medical assistance within the meaning of the Act of 1885. He thought it analogous to the maintenance of a disabled or crippled pauper in the workhouse, and that such medical assistance, if any, as was rendered to the patient was an incident additional to the maintenance. The Revising Barrister therefore rejected the claim. The court considered that in the decision of the Revising Barrister there was a finding of fact, which they could not and ought not to disturb.

Extract f judgment Kirkhous Blakeway

117. Did the court give any detailed reasons for this judgment?—The following passage from the judgment of the court shows the grounds on which it was based: "It seems to us that in all cases in which relief is given which is more or less of the nature both of medical relief and ordinary relief, a question of fact arises for the decision of the Revising Barrister. When in consequence of illness (and insanity is undoubtedly illness), a voter or claimant, or a member of his family whom he is bound to support, is given medical relief, it is not the less medical relief, within the statute because a certain amount of ordinary sustenance is given as well as medicine. And so where a pauper in a workhouse is removed to the infirmary in consequence of his illness, he would, whilst in the infirmary, still be receiving relief other than medical relief within the meaning of the statute. It would be a question of fact for the Revising Barrister in all such cases what the real character of the relief was, and which kind was merely incidental to the other. Where a member of a voter's or claimant's family is attacked with insanity, and is in consequence removed to an asylum at the expense of the union, we should have no doubt, and the Revising Barrister in this case seems to have had no doubt, that the case was in the first instance one of medical relief. But when the insane person, being a person for whose support the voter or claimant is liable, remains permanently in the asylum, and no payment is made by the voter or claimant, we think a question of fact arises as to whether the relief has not become ordinary relief, as distinguished from medical. When any payment is made, even although it is not as great as the cost to the union of the maintenance of the lunatic in the asylum, the inference might fairly be drawn that there is no ordinary relief, but this is for the Revising Barrister. Where the maintenance has continued for a long time without any payment whatever, we cannot say that the Revising Barrister is wrong in coming to the conclusion that the voter or claimant is in receipt of relief other than medical relief."

Magarill Overseers Whitehav &c.

118. Have you any cases to cite with regard to ordinary relief?—Yes. With regard to the effect of relief other than medical relief as a ground of disqualification for the Parliamentary franchise, the cases in which illustrations can be drawn from decisions of a Court of Law are comparatively few. Brief mention, however, may be made of some of these, and of the principles to be deduced from the judgments of the courts. At a time of distress, a claimant, on application to a relieving officer, was set to work at breaking stones. The quantity of stones to be broken according to the task of work was four bushels a day. The claimant for a day's work received 1s. 3d., and the employment continued for six weeks. The guardians were apparently unable to obtain such a price for the broken stones as would recoup them for their expenditure. And their allowance to the claimant was relief measured by his wants, and not by the quantity of his work. The Revising Barrister expunged the name of the claimant from the Register, and it was subsequently pointed out by the High Court, in upholding the decision of the Revising Barrister, that the work done by the claimant was not, so far as the ratepayers were concerned, remunerative, and that it was quite plain that it was intended to be and was received as parochial relief (Magarrill, appellant v. The Overseers of Whitehaven and Preston Quarter, Whitehaven, respondents; Law Reports, 1885, 16 Queen's Bench Division, 242; 55 Law Journal, Queen's Bench Division, 38).

119. That is rather an important case. Do I understand the law is that where work is given to a person by a Poor Law authority, and the profits from the work given do not compensate the pay given, the person is supposed to be in the receipt of poor relief and to be disqualified?—That is the effect of that particular decision.

Trotter Trevor, Queen Ireland

120. Are there any cases in which the question arose as to the effect of relief to a father?—The father of a claimant became an inmate of a workhouse. His son was called before the guardians and told that, if he did not pay something towards the maintenance of his father, he would be summoned before the justices to show cause why he should not be ordered to maintain his father. The claimant then made an offer to contribute 1s. 6d. a week, and the guardians accepted the offer. The Revising Barrister held that the claimant was not disqualified. The Court of Common Pleas supported the Revising Barrister. The Chief Justice observed: "It is said that because the support of the pauper cost the parish funds more than the sum so paid (by the son), the excess must be considered as parochial relief given to the son, inasmuch as it relieved him from a burden which was cast upon him by the law. I cannot concur in that view (Trotter, appellant v. Trevor, respondent; 16 Common Bench, New Series, 48; 32 Law Journal, Common Pleas, 59). In a municipal case, the claimant's father had been in receipt of parochial relief, and it was contended that relief to the father was relief to the son, but the Court of Queen's Bench rejected this contention, and Mr. Justice Blackburn, referring to Sec. 56 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, said: "I do not think before the Act, relief to the father could be said to be relief to the son, and it certainly cannot be said to be since" (The Queen v. Ireland, 3 Law Reports, Queen's Bench, 130; 37 Law Journal; Queen's Bench 373).

121. Are there any other points that you would like to refer to before we go from this branch of the subject? —Yes. Among other things I should like to mention that excusal from the payment of the poor rate on the ground of poverty is not parochial relief (Mashiter v. Dunn; 6 Common Bench, 30; 18 Law Journal, Common Pleas, 13). On the question of the disqualifying effect of relief by way of loan where the loan is in fact repaid, there is no clear judicial decision. But the inference from the report of one case (Devenish, appellant v. Digby, respondent; 13 Common Bench, New Series, 28) is that the Court of Common Pleas, in the absence of argument and a formal judgment, did not think it necessary to interfere with the decision of the Revising Barrister who, in such circumstances, struck out the name of a claimant on the ground that the granting of the loan was a granting of relief notwithstanding the subsequent repayment. It has been suggested that a different view might be taken in reliance upon what was said in Kirkhouse v. Blakeway as to the consequences of payment by the husband of a contribution towards the wife's maintenance. On the other hand, it has been argued that the principle of the judgment in Harrison v. Carter (Law Reports, 2 Common Pleas Division, 26; 46 Law Journal, Common Pleas, 57) applies notwithstanding the repayment, and that the original receipt of the relief establishes, in the words of the latter judgment, "the absence of that independence which is essential to the qualifications of a voter." Lastly, it may be noted that if the name of a person, to whom objection might be taken on the ground of the receipt of parochial relief, remains on the Parliamentary Register after revision, in consequence of no such objection having been made, his vote would not be struck off on a scrutiny. The Register is conclusive, except only in the case of "persons prohibited by any Statute or by the Common Law of Parliament." But the prohibition refers to some inherent, or for the time irremovable, quality in a person, such as sex, the holding of offices etc., and does not extend to a failure in incidents or elements such as the receipt of parochial relief which might be matter of objection at the revision (Stowe, appellant v. Jolliffe, respondent; Law Reports, 9 Common Pleas 734). Further, in the absence of notice of objection, a Revising Barrister is not bound at his revision of the Register to expunge the name of a person who has received relief (Hayward, appellant, v. Scott, respondent; Law Reports, 5 Common Pleas Division, 231; 49 Law Journal, Common Pleas, 167).

122. (Mr. Booth.) Does that mean, unless the Revising Barrister is asked to do so?—Yes; unless there was a notice of objection, the Revising Barrister is not under any obligation to take out the name.

123. (Chairman.) Even if the fact is brought to his knowledge, he is not bound, you say, to strike out the name of the man who has received the relief, unless somebody formally objects?—Unless there is a proper objection.

124. (Mr. Bentham.) Has it not been held that the lists which are given to the overseers by the Relieving Officers are objections?—Not in themselves, for the purposes of this particular decision, I think. There must have been special notice of objection in any case brought before the Revising Barrister.

125. By the overseers; that is, by those who make up the lists?—Possibly the decision might recognise notice by any one of the representatives of the sides appearing before the Revising Barrister.

126. (Mr. Petten-Macdougall.) Is there no duty upon the Relieving Officer to bring the list under the notice of those who are making up the roll?—He should undoubtedly supply the overseers with the names of persons who have received relief, and should produce his books to the overseers; but I take it that the objection which is in contemplation here might include an objection raised by one or other of the representatives of the parties appearing before the Revising Barrister.

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

8 Jan. 1906.

127. (Mr. Gardiner.) Ought not the relieving officer to call the attention of the overseers to the fact that these people had received Poor Law relief?—Certainly. He furnishes lists, and produces his books.

128. And they are bound to act on them?—Yes. The documents in the overseers' possession would be at the Revision Court, but the mere presence of those documents in court, I take it, would not, within this decision, amount to such an objection as the court required the Revising Barrister to have before him. I am speaking now of the mere physical presence of the documents at the court.

129. In compiling the list which is to go before the Revising Barrister ought not the overseers to take into account the relieving officer's statement?—That is another matter. My answer is Yes, but that is not concerned with the revision—that is a matter preceding the revision. What the duty of the relieving officer to the overseer may be, is clear. The question here is, what is the duty of the Revising Barrister at the Revision Court?

130. (Miss Hill). Is it not the duty of the overseer to strike out the names?—There is no doubt as to what the duty of the overseer would be; but here we are considering the case where the overseer has left the names on the list for some reason or other.

131. I take it you use the term "the duty of the overseer" in a legal sense as well as in a moral sense; the overseer would be legally bound to strike out the name, would he not?—He should do it. As to the legal point I am not altogether prepared to say what the provision is for enforcing any obligation of this kind. Clearly the name ought not to be on the list.

132. It ought not to be on the list, and the question is, whose duty is it to see that it should be taken off the list —that is what one would like to know?—The only point decided in that case was that if on the list when the list comes before the Revising Barrister, he, without a special objection, is not bound to take it out.

133. (Sir Samuel Provis.) I think the practice is this, is it not—the relieving officer sends to the overseers a list of persons who have received relief?—Yes.

134. The overseers then strike out the names of the persons who have received relief according to that list, or at all events are expected to strike them out?—Certainly, the overseers should strike them out.

135. If the overseers fail to do that, then a man's name cannot be removed from the list, unless objection is taken formally before the Revising Barrister?—That seems to be the position.

INDOOR RELIEF.

136. (Chairman.) That I think finishes the question of qualification, and now we go to the question of indoor relief. What reference to this question do you note in the Poor Law Amendment Act of 1834?—By Sec. 15 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, the government of workhouses is enumerated as a special purpose to which rules, orders and regulations made by the Local Government Board may relate. Other purposes are set out in Secs. 26 and 42. These are classification, the nature and amount of the relief to be given to, and the labour to be exacted from, the persons relieved, and the preservation of good order.

Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, Secs. 15, 26, & 42.

137. Do you wish to say anything about the expression "workhouse" as used in the Act of 1834?—In Sec. 109 of the Act there is a definition of the term "workhouse." The word, according to this interpretation, is to be construed to include "any house in which the poor of any parish or union shall be lodged and maintained, or any house or building purchased, erected, hired, or used at the expense of the poor rate by any parish, vestry, guardian, or overseer for the reception, employment, classification or relief of any poor person therein at the expense of such parish."

Definition of "workhouse."

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

8 Jan. 1906.

Types of buildings included in definition.

138. Why was the definition so wide?—Respecting this definition, it is necessary for the better understanding of provisions to be hereafter explained that something should be said now about the state of things existing in 1834. The Act of that year had special reasons for the comprehensive terms of the definition which it contained. It was intended to bring under some measure of control all kinds of local institutions maintained for the reception of inmates at the cost of the Poor Rate. Of these institutions the houses under Jonas Hanway's Act (7 Geo. III. c. 39) for the reception of Metropolitan children were specially mentioned in Sec. 15 of the Poor Law Amendment Act 1834; but all other establishments, whether under local Acts or under the general law, were intended to be swept in by the definition. The definition was intended to include: (1) Poorhouses provided for the impotent under Sec. 4 of the 43 Elizabeth, c. 2, and at first taking the form of cottages or larger structures on the waste, or, at a much later date, buildings on ground purchased or leased by the churchwardens and overseers, (59 Geo. III. c. 12, Secs. 8–10.) (2) Buildings provided under a long series of local Acts beginning with a Bristol local Act of 1696, and designed at the outset to combine with the housing of the impotent (including the insane) facilities for carrying on manufactures by the labour of the inmates. It was probably to places of this kind that Sec. 2 of the 56 Geo. III. c. 129, was specially applicable in its prohibition of the chaining or confinement by chains or manacles of any poor person of sane mind. (3) Buildings originally designed either as part of the buildings of class 2, or separately, to answer the purposes of Houses of Correction for persons who did not employ themselves to work (43 Elizabeth, c. 2, Sec. 2), or for rogues, as in the case of the workhouses for London and Westminster under the 13 and 14 Ch. II. c. 12, Sec. 4. (4) Buildings provided under the general law during the period between the passing of the 9 Geo. I. c. 7 (Sir Edward Knatchbull's Act) and the passing of the 36 Geo. III. c. 23 (Sir William Young's Act). There was a remarkable difference in the characteristics of the workhouses of this period. The workhouse of the 9 Geo. I. c. 7, belongs to a system of the strictest administration; for if a pauper refused relief in a workhouse of that type, he was declared to be "not entitled to ask or receive collection or relief from the churchwardens and overseers of the poor" (9 Geo. I c. 7, Sec. 4). On the other hand, the workhouse of Gilbert's Act (22 Geo. III. c. 83) may be said to have given effect to local option in the direction of laxity; for the workhouse under that Act was not a place in which the test of labour could be applied.

Recommendations of Commission of Inquiry as to workhouses.

139. What was the plan of dealing with these workhouses under the new Poor Law Act of 1834?—With buildings of these various classes in existence, the Commissioners of Inquiry in 1832 (p. 312) came to the conclusion that, although a considerable proportion of parishes were without workhouses, their combination into unions would leave few districts in which the existing workhouse room would not suffice. The plan indicated in the Report of the Commissioners was followed when the Act of 1834 was framed. A definition wide enough to include every kind of existing establishment was adopted. And the Act of 1834 was directed specially to the utilisation of those establishments under the control of the Central Authority; while for the building of new workhouses the consent of the localities interested was made necessary. In principle the law at the present day is as the Act of 1834 left it.

Provision of new workhouses.

140. Will you state the effect of the law as regards the provision of new Workhouses?—By Sec. 23 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, the Central Authority, with the consent in writing of a majority of the guardians of a union not having a workhouse, or with the consent of a majority of the ratepayers and owners of property, may order and direct the guardians to build a workhouse, and to purchase or hire land for the purpose, or to purchase or hire a workhouse or a building for the purpose of begin used as or converted into a workhouse.

Alterations of workhouses.

141. What are the powers of the Local Government Board for the alteration of workhouses?—With the like consent, the Local Government Board may direct the enlargement or alteration of an existing workhouse, or the provision of an additional workhouse. But as regards existing workhouses, the Local Government Board under Sec. 25 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, may, without requiring the consent mentioned in Sec. 23, direct the guardians having a workhouse or a building capable of being converted into a workhouse to enlarge or alter the premises. Where the cost of an enlargement, alteration or improvement of the workhouse, or its premises, drainage or other appurtenances, does not exceed £500, the guardians may do what is necessary, with the consent, but without a formal order of the Local Government Board (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1866, Sec. 8). Also the power of the Local Government Board to give directions by an Order under Sec. 25 of the Poor Law Amendment Act 1834 is, by Sec. 8 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868, made applicable to the provision of proper drainage, sewers, ventilation, fixtures, furniture, surgical and medical appliances and other conveniences at a workhouse.

Acquisition of land for workhouses.

142. What is the law as regards the acquisition of land?—With respect to the acquisition of land, the Union and Parish Property Act, 1835 (5 & 6 William IV., c. 69), empowered corporations and persons under disability to sell or exchange lands or buildings for use as or conversion into a workhouse, or as a site for a workhouse or for occupation with a workhouse or for any other purposes approved by the Central Authority. Guardians, by Sec. 3, are empowered, with the approval and subject to the rules, orders and regulations of the Central Authority, and, in the case of a union, with the consent of the owners and ratepayers of the parish concerned, to sell, exchange, or let or otherwise dispose of any workhouse or property, and to apply the proceeds towards the purchase or building of a workhouse or otherwise for the benefit of the Poor Law Union. The Act of 1835 further by Sec. 4 provided that all powers and authorities under a number of Acts which include the 59 Geo. III., c. 12 (Sturges Bourne's Act), the Poor Relief Act, 1831 (1 & 2 William IV., c. 42 and 1 & 2 William IV., c. 59) should be exercised by the guardians under the control and subject to the rules, orders, and regulations of the Poor Law Commissioners. The section continues: "All the aforesaid powers and authorities relating to the enclosing, purchasing, hiring or taking any waste, common, or other land for the purpose or purposes in the said Acts mentioned shall extend and apply to, and may be so exercised as aforesaid by the said . . . guardians for the purpose of being used as the site of a workhouse or of being occupied with a workhouse or for any other purposes of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834."

Applied visions Poor Re Act, 18 respecti land.

143. Have you any comments to make upon the passage which you have just quoted?—Of the old statutes to which Sec. 4 of the Act of 1835 refers, it may suffice to say that the most important is probably Sturges Bourne's Act or the Poor Relief Act, 1819 (59 Geo. III. c. 12). I refer to this enactment in connection with indoor relief because, whatever may be the practical value of the provision at the present time, it would seem that if the powers are exercisable they must be mainly, at least, if not invariably, exercised in connection with a scheme for housing the persons assisted.

144. Will you give the words of the provision in Sturges Bourne's Act?—I quote Sec. 12 of the Poor Relief Act, 1819, "And whereas by an act passed in the forty-third year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth the churchwardens and overseers of the poor are directed to set to work certain persons therein described. And whereas by the laws now in force sufficient powers are not given to the churchwardens and overseers to enable them to keep such persons fully and constantly employed. Be it further enacted that it shall be lawful for the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of any parish with the consent of the inhabitants thereof in vestry assembled, to take into their hands any land or ground which shall belong to such parish, or to the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of such parish, or to the poor thereof, or to purchase or to hire and take on lease for or on account of the parish any suitable portion or portions of land within or near to such parish not exceeding twenty acres in the whole, and to employ and set to work in the cultivation of such land, on account of the parish, any such persons as by law they are directed to set to work, and to pay to such of the poor persons so employed as shall not be supported by the parish reasonable wages for their work, and the poor persons so employed shall have such and the like remedies for the recovery of their wages and shall be subject to such and the like punishment for misbehaviour in their employment as other labourers in husbandry are by law entitled and subject to."

145. There were amendments of this provision, were there not?—By the Poor Relief Act, 1831 (1 & 2 William IV. c. 42) the area of land to be hired or taken on lease for the employment of the poor was enlarged to an extent not exceeding fifty acres (Sec. 1). The parish officers with the consent of the lord of the manor and majority of commoners were empowered to enclose not exceeding fifty acres of waste for cultivation. By the 1 & 2 William IV. c. 59, Sec. 1, the powers of the Poor Relief Act, 1819, were made applicable to forest or waste lands belonging to the Crown, of which plots not exceeding fifty acres might be enclosed.

146. Perhaps you would explain to the Commission why you have drawn special attention to this Act?—I have quoted Sec. 12 of Sturges Bourne's Act in extenso, because it is a provision about which of late years much discussion has arisen. This discussion led the Local Government Board in 1893 to submit a case to the law officers. The opinion of the law officers upon the questions put with regard to the operative effect, at the present day, of the enactment above mentioned was that all the powers conferred on overseers under Sec. 12 of Sturges Bourne's Act had passed to the guardians by virtue of the Union and Parish Property Act, 1835, that the guardians could exercise their power under the first-mentioned provision and the amending Act (the Poor Relief Act, 1831) to the extent of fifty acres in respect of each parish, but that the power would be subject to the control of the Local Government Board in the direction of reducing but not increasing the acreage to be taken. The law officers were also of opinion that it was intended that the relief of persons to be set to work under the Poor Relief Act, 1601, should be given in the form of wages. The law officers further considered that the words in the Act of 1601 which refer to persons who "use no ordinary and daily trade of life to get their living by" would include persons out of employment who are, at the time in question, carrying on no daily trade. On the legal aspect of the matter I only wish to add that with regard to the law officers' interpretation of the Poor Relief Act, 1601, as including persons carrying on no daily trade through being at the time out of employment, it is to be noted (1) That when in the case of The Attorney-General v. Merthyr Tydvil Union the Act of 1601 was considered by the Master of the Rolls in 1900, his Lordship said that he had not succeeded in finding any judicial interpretation of the words; and (2) That such contemporary explanation as is to found outside the reports of decided cases seems rather to favour the conclusion that the words may have originally described the habitual loafer, or, as the instructions to justices in the preceding reign phrased it, "the man that useth no trade whereby he may attain his living in truth to set his wife, children and families to work." Subsequently the President of the Local Government Board in the House of Commons stated his views on the position arising out of the existing law. It would probably be desirable that a copy of this statement should be handed in (see Appendix Vol. I. (A) No. 1 (b)).

147. You have stated that the law officers of the Crown gave their opinion that the Local Government Board had the power of limiting the amount of land to be purchased; had they the power of prohibiting any land to be purchased?—They had the power to reduce below fifty acres, not to increase.

148. And not to prohibit?—The opinion did not expressly mention prohibition.

149. Have you any other comments to make on the Act of 1819?—It may be well now to draw attention to a few facts about the Act of 1819 and the amending provisions of 1831. The first fact is that an important proviso, which has no direct bearing upon the Poor Law, was attached to Sec. 12 of the Act of 1819. The proviso is to be found in the following section (13) and is to this effect: "Provided that for the promotion of industry amongst the poor, it shall be lawful for the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of any parish, with the consent of the inhabitants in vestry assembled, to let any portion and portions of such parish land as aforesaid, or of the land to be so purchased or taken on account of the parish to any poor and industrious inhabitant of the parish, to be by him or her occupied or cultivated on his or her own account, and for his or her own benefit at such reasonable rent and for such term as shall by the inhabitants in vestry be fixed and determined. Another fact is that it was in the main for the sake of this proviso that the extension to fifty acres was commended to Parliament by the member who brought forward the Bill which afterwards became law as the Poor Relief Act, 1831. So at least is to be gathered from the report in Hansard of the observations of Mr. Briscoe and Mr. Sturges Bourne on the introduction of the Bill. Thus, Mr. Briscoe, who moved to introduce the Bill, referred to it as a measure to amend the 59 George III. c. 12 "so far as it relates to the letting and leasing of land to labourers." Mr. Sturges Bourne approved of the proposed alteration. Another member instanced in support of the motion the case of many persons who had accepted small spots of ground on condition of not receiving parish relief, and who had all done well and brought up large families. Sir J. Shelley thought that parishes ought to take a quantity of land in order to give employment to their own poor; and thus in some measure enable the pauper to contribute to his own support. Another member, who thought that such a plan would be impracticable, and objected to patching up the then existing system, favoured the letting of small portions of land by private individuals to poor men who would thus be enabled to support themselves without entirely depending on parish assistance. In the House of Lords, on the other hand, the Duke of Richmond is reported in terms which are consistent with the view that the Bill had his support because it would enable the overseers to provide employment.

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

8 Jan. 1906.

150. The Act of 1831, I understand, was afterwards amended; what have you to say about the amendment?—Another fact worthy of note in connection with the letting of land to the poor is that in 1832, that is, in the next session after the passing of the 1 and 2 William IV. c. 42, and the 1 and 2 William IV. c. 59, the view of those measures as designed to facilitate the provision of allotments for poor persons desiring to rent them is illustrated by the extension, for the purposes of these Acts, of the 2 William IV., c. 42, which is entitled, "an Act to authorise (in parishes enclosed under any Act of Parliament) the letting of the poor allotments in small portions to industrious cottagers."

151. Do you wish to say anything about the origin of Sections 12 and 13 of Sturges Bourne's Act?—The origin of these Sections is probably traceable to a report of the Select Committee appointed by the House of Commons in 1817 to consider of the Poor Laws. In that report the Committee discussed at some length (p. 17) the question of the possible effect of interpreting the Poor Relief Act, 1601, as having for its object the finding of work for all by the State. The Committee considered that this was a condition which it was not in the power of any law to fulfil. Experimentally, however, they recommended that all possible facility of providing employment should be given; care being taken that the local work to be supplied should be such as would least sensibly interfere with existing occupations and trades. In country parishes agriculture, in the opinion of the Committee, afforded the most obvious and useful source of employment. They instanced the cases of two parochial farms in Kent. The Committee then observed: "Yet great benefit might, in the opinion of your Committee, be derived from some parishes being enabled to possess themselves of as much land as might produce at least an adequate supply of provisions for those whom they are bound to maintain, and would afford the means which otherwise might be wanting of bringing to the test the willingness to work of some of the applicants for employment; but it would operate still more beneficially if it enabled parishes collectively, under proper restrictions, to follow the example of those individual proprietors of land, who have been in the practice of letting very small portions of land on reasonable terms to industrious labourers to cultivate on their own account."

Report of Select Committee of 1817 respecting parish farms.

152*. Will you now return to your description of the modern Poor Law respecting the acquisition of land?—The guardians, by virtue of Section 7 of the Union and Parish Property Act, 1835, were for the purposes of that Act incorporated and empowered to accept, take and hold for the benefit of the union, buiid ings, lands, or other property; but the later machinery provided by the Lands Clauses Acts has only partially been made available for the transactions of the guardians. The instance in which the Lands Clauses Acts are applied occurs in the Metropolitan Poor Act of 1867, as explained by the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868, Sec. 35. By Sec. 52 of the Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867, the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts Amendment Act, 1860, were incorporated for the purposes of the Poor Law Acts not only in the case of guardians but also in that of managers. In a limited way, too, the Act of 1867, by Secs. 53 and 54, authorises the use of so much of the Lands Clauses Acts as relates to compulsory purchase. The restrictions on the use of the provisions relating to compulsory purchase are: (1) That these provisions shall only be put in force for the enlargement of a workhouse, hospital or school existing at the passing of the Act of 1867; and (2) That the Local Government Board shall direct the purchase by an order after advertisement and notice to the owners. The guardians may also, with the approval of the Local Government Board, but without an order, hire or take on lease for a term not exceeding five years, land or buildings for the relief or employment of the poor, and the use of the guardians or their officers.

Workhouse management.

152. Now perhaps you will indicate to us the provisions for workhouse management?—With regard to the management of a workhouse, mention may be made of the provisions of Sec. 21 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834. By that section all statutory powers of preparing poorhouses or workhouses for the reception of poor persons, and the dieting, clothing, employing and governing of the poor, together with "all powers of regulating and conducting all other workhouses whatsoever and of governing, providing for, and employing the poor therein," and all auxiliary powers, are to be exercised under the control of the Local Government Board and subject to their rules, orders and regulations. But on the formation of a Union, under the Act of 1834, the workhouse of the union is to be governed by the Board of Guardians (Sec. 38). And the same result is to ensue upon the constitution of a board of guardians for a single parish (Sec. 39). There are, however, certain matters which Parliament has thought fit to make subjects of special enactment, instead of leaving them entirely to the regulations of the Local Government Board and their predecessors. A few instances may be given. The admission of the applicant for relief in a workhouse is in certain cases a matter of urgency. Where the person who applies professes to be a destitute wanderer or wayfarer, the master, porter or other officer, or the relieving officer or overseer to whom the application is made, may search the applicant or cause him to be searched, and may take from him any money found upon him and deliver it to the guardians. This provision is contained in the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1848, Sec. 10. That section continues: "Every person who shall apply for relief at any workhouse, or to any relieving officer or overseer, having at the time of such application in his possession and under his immediate control any money or other property, of which on enquiry made by the guardians or their officers, or by overseers, he shall not make correct and complete disclosure, shall be taken to be an idle and disorderly person within the meaning of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, and shall be punishable accordingly."

Workhouse discipline.

153. Have you anything further to say respecting the provisions relating to workhouses?—Yes, I have something to say in respect of discipline. Adults in a workhouse since the Poor Relief Act, 1814 (Sec. 7), have been exempt from corporal punishment; but refusal to work, drunkenness, or other misbehaviour, may, on conviction, subject a pauper to imprisonment by virtue of Sec. 5 of the Poor Relief Act, 1815, and Sec. 58 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844. These enactments, however, do not apply to the case of a pauper, who, being able bodied, refused to obey an order to transfer himself from one workhouse to another into which able-bodied paupers were receivable (Mile End Guardians v. Sims; Law Reports, 1905, 2 King's Bench, 200: 74 Law Journal, King's Bench, 647; 92 Law Times, New Series, 238). The unauthorised introduction of spirituous or fermented liquor into a workhouse is an offence rendering the offender liable to apprehension by the master or an officer acting under the master's direction, and upon conviction to a penalty or imprisonment in default (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, Sec. 92).

Offences workhou inmates.

154. Are there any other enactments that you wish to enumerate as to the punishment of offences in workhouses?—Under Section 3 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, every person "being able wholly or in part to maintain himself . . . by work, or by other means, and wilfully refusing or neglecting so to do, by which refusal or neglect. . . he shall have become chargeable . . . shall be deemed an idle and disorderly person." This enactment was considered by the High Court in St. Saviour's Union v. Burbridge (Law Reports, 1900, 2 Queen's Bench, 695; 69 Law Journal, Queen's Bench, 886). A relieving officer had knowledge that the defendant was suffering from delirium tremens at his own residence, and that he was dangerous to himself and others. The man was removed to the union infirmary as an alleged lunatic. On admission he was found to be suffering from delirium tremens, and thereupon an order of detention was obtained under the Lunacy Acts. He was discharged after having been chargeable for five days. The Magistrate before whom the summons obtained by the guardians was heard, dismissed the case. The High Court upheld the view of the Magistrate, and considered that the fact that the illness which rendered the defendant incapable of maintaining himself was produced by his own voluntary acts of intoxication did not render the omission to maintain himself neglect within the meaning of the enactment. The offence of absconding from a workhouse with clothes, linen or other goods or things belonging to the workhouse, entails liability to imprisonment with hard labour on conviction (Poor Relief Act, 1815, Sec. 2; Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, Sec. 58; Poor Law Amendment Act, 1850, Sec. 8). The Poor Law Amendment Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Victoria, c. 57) by Sec. 5 gives authority for prescribing "a task of work to be done by any person relieved in any workhouse in return for the food and lodging afforded to such person." The Pauper Inmates Discharge and Regulation Act, 1871, with regard to pauper inmates who are not casuals, enacts by Sec. 7 that any pauper who refuses or neglects to do the work or observe the regulations prescribed shall be deemed an idle and disorderly person within the Vagrancy Act, 1824; and that any pauper who commits the same offence, after previous conviction, is to be deemed a rogue and vagabond within the same Act.

Detentio workhou inmates.

155. Have you anything to add about detention?—The Act of 1871 also confers special powers of detention with regard to paupers who are not casuals. Thus Sec. 4, as amended by Sec. 4 of the Poor Law Act, 1899, provides that the guardians may direct that any pauper inmate of the workhouse, or the paupers of any class therein, shall be detained after giving notice to quit for times not exceeding the following limited periods; that is to say—(1) If the pauper has not previously discharged himself within a month before the notice—twenty-four hours; (2) If he has discharged himself once or oftener within the month—forty-eight hours; (3) If he has discharged himself more than twice within two months—seventy-two hours; (4) If he has in the opinion of the guardians discharged himself frequently without sufficient reason—one hundred and sixty-eight hours. These rules are subject to provisoes, of which the effect, as gathered from the two Acts, is as follows: (1) The guardians may alter or rescind their direction, and they, or in the interval between their meetings, the Visiting Committee (whose direction is to be entered in the Visitors' Book) may exempt, either wholly or partially, any pauper from the operation of Sec. 4 of the Act of 1871. (2) The master may, if the guardians be not sitting, or the Visiting Committee be not in attendance, discharge a pauper to whom Sec. 4 of the Act of 1871 applies before the expiration of a period, if any circumstances in his opinion require this to be done. The master is to report the facts to the guardians at their next meeting. (3) Sec. 4 of the Act of 1871 is not to apply to casual paupers. (4) A direction requiring a longer notice than seventy-two hours to be given must be entered in the Minutes, and must specify the name or names of the pauper or paupers to whom it applies.

Further offences workhou inmates.

156. Is there any law as to the prevention of such offences as absconding from workhouses?—A pauper who absconds or escapes from or leaves a workhouse during the period for which he may be detained therein or wilfully gives a false name or makes a false statement for the purpose of obtaining relief, is to be deemed an idle and disorderly person. If he commits either offence after previous conviction, or if he wilfully destroys or injures his own clothes or damages any of the property of the guardians, he is to be deemed a rogue, and vagabond. And it may be added that by a later Act, that is to say, the Casual Poor Act, 1882, which is to be construed as one with the Act of 1871, the scope of possible offence has been enlarged; so that a person who, for the purpose of obtaining relief "for himself, or for any other person wilfully gives a false name, or makes or uses a false statement to the guardians of any Union or any of their officers" is to be deemed an idle and disorderly person within Sec. 3 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824 (Casual Poor Act, 1882, Sec. 5). In the case of a pauper who absconds or escapes from or leaves a workhouse when suffering from bodily disease of an infectious or contagious character, the Justice convicting him of the offence may suspend the execution of the warrant, or may order the pauper to be taken back to the workhouse to be cured. When the pauper is cured, the warrant is to be executed. A pauper absconding, escaping or leaving, may be apprehended by a workhouse officer or a constable without previous summons or warrant. The officer or constable may take the pauper when apprehended before a justice, and on the order of the justice may take the pauper back to the workhouse, Sec. 8 of the Act of 1871 enacts that the master or porter of the workhouse may take before a justice an inmate charged with any disorderly conduct, offence or misbehaviour, punishable upon a summary conviction without a summons or warrant. If the inmate be commited to gaol, and there be no constable present to execute the warrant, the master or porter may convey the inmate to gaol. For the purposes of this Section, the master or porter will have all the powers and authorities of a constable.

ention of khouse ates ering n rium nens or ctions ases.

157. Are there any other circumstances you wish to mention in connection with detention in a workhouse?—Another instance of detention is that authorised by Sec. 22 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1867, as amended by Sec. 342 of the Lunacy Act, 1890. The amended section is to the effect that when there is in any workhouse a poor person suffering from delirium tremens or from bodily disease of an infectious or contagious character, and the medical officer of the workhouse, upon examination reports in writing that the person is not in a fit state to leave the workhouse without danger to himself or others, the guardians may direct the master to detain the person in the workhouse, or, if the guardians be not sitting, the master of the workhouse may, until the next meeting of the guardians, detain him therein, and the person so detained is not to be discharged from the workhouse until the medical officer in writing certifies that the discharge may take place. The enactment is not to prevent the removal of a poor person after the parent or next of kin has given to the guardians such an undertaking as they deem satisfactory to provide for the removal, charge, and maintenance of the person with due care and attention while the malady continues, hts, &c., workhouse ates.

158. Have you anything to say about the rights and privileges of workhouse inmates?—Certain rights and privileges of workhouse inmates are the subject of express legislation. Thus a husband and wife, both above the age of sixty, are not to be compelled to live separate and apart from each other (Poor Law Board Act, 1847, Sec. 23). Also where either husband or wife is infirm, sick, disabled by injury, or above sixty, the guardians may permit the husband and wife to live together. Every such case is to be forthwith reported to the Local Government Board (Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876, Sec. 10). No rules, orders or regulations or bye-laws may oblige an inmate to attend a religious service celebrated in a mode contrary to his religious principles. Any licensed minister of the religious persuasion of an inmate may at all times in the day, on the request of the inmate, visit the workhouse for the purpose of affording religious assistance to the inmate, and also for the purpose of instructing the inmate's child in the principles of their religion (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, Sec. 19). A licensed minister means a person in holy orders, and a person teaching or preaching in any congregation for religious worship, whose place of meeting is certified and recorded according to law (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, Sec 74). Every inmate for whom a religious service according to his own creed is not provided in the workhouse, is to be permitted, subject to regulations to be approved of or ordered by the Local Government Board, to attend, at such times as they allow, some place of worship of his own denomination within a convenient distance of the workhouse, if there be such in the opinion of of the Board But the guardians may, for abuse of the permission, or on some other special ground, refuse permission to any particular inmate. In that case the guardians must cause an entry of the refusal and its grounds to be made in their minutes (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868, Sec. 21.) As regards children, it is to be observed that no rules, orders, regulations, or bye-laws may authorise the education of a child in a workhouse in any religious creed other than that professed by the parents or surviving parent, and to which the parents or surviving parent shall object, or, in the case of an orphan, to which the godfather or godmother shall so object (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, Sec. 19).

Creed register, &c.

159. What is the effect of the enactments relating to the creed register?—The master of a workhouse or the master or superintendent of a pauper school is to keep a register of the religious creed of the pauper inmates separate from all other registers, and in such form, and with such particulars as are prescribed by the Local Government Board by an order under their seal. Upon the admission of an inmate, the master or superintendent is to make due inquiry into the religious creed of the inmate and enter the religious creed in the register (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868, Sec. 16). In the case of a child under twelve, whether either of its parents be in the workhouse or not, or whether it be an orphan, or deserted child, the master or superintendent is to enter in the creed register as the religious creed of the child, the religious creed of the father, if the master or superintendent know or can ascertain it by reasonable inquiry, or if it cannot be so ascertained, the creed of the mother, if it be known to or can in like manner be ascertained by the master or superintendent. The creed of an illegitimate child under twelve is to be deemed to be that of its mother, when that can be ascertained (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868, Sec. 17). If a question arises as to the correctness of an entry in the creed register, the Local Government Board may, if they think fit, inquire into the circumstances of the case, and determine the question by directing the entry to remain or to be amended according to their judgment (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868, Sec. 18). Every minister of a denomination officiating in the church, chapel, or other registered place of religious worship of the denomination which shall be nearest to a workhouse or school or any ratepayer of any parish in the union is to be allowed to inspect the creed register at any time of any day, except Sunday, between the hours of 10 a.m. and 4 p.m. (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868, Sec. 20). The minister may, in accordance with such regulations as the Local Government Board approve or prescribe, visit and instruct an inmate entered in the creed register as belonging to the religious creed of the minister, unless the inmate, being above fourteen, and after having been visited at least once by the minister, object to be instructed by him (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868, Sec. 20). No child who is regularly visited by a minister of his own religious creed for the purpose of religious instruction shall, if the parents or surviving parent, or, in the case of orphans or deserted children, if the minister make request in writing to that effect, be instructed in any other religious creed, or to be required or permitted to attend the service of any other religious creed than that entered in the creed register, except a child above twelve, who desires to receive instruction in some other creed, or to attend the service of any other religious creed, and who is considered by the Local Government Board to be competent to exercise a judgment on the subject (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868, Sec. 22).

Burial of workhouse inmates.

160. Now will you state the law respecting the burial of deceased inmates?—The burial of workhouse inmates is a matter for which statutory provision has been made. The workhouse is to be considered as situated in the parish in the union, where an inmate resided last previously to his removal to the workhouse. (Union Chargeability Act, 1865, Section 10). The guardians may cause the dead body (unless the deceased or the husband, wife or next of kin have otherwise desired) to be buried in the churchyard or other consecrated burial ground belonging to the parish, division of parish, chapelry or place in which the death may have occurred (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, Sec. 31). The burial fee or fees payable by the custom of the place, or under the provisions of an Act of Parliament, will be payable out of the poor rates to the person who by the custom or the Act is entitled to receive the fee. No officer connected with the relief of the poor may receive money for a pauper burial, or act as undertaker for personal gain or reward, or receive money from a dissecting school, or school of anatomy or hospital or from any person to whom the body may be delivered, or derive any personal emolument whatever for, or in respect of, the burial or disposal of the body (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, Sec. 31). Guardians may contribute such a sum as the Local Government Board may approve towards the enlargement of any churchyard or consecrated public burial ground of the parish, in which the workhouse is situated, or in any other parish of the union, or towards obtaining any such consecrated burial ground. The guardians may bury in the ground so enlarged or obtained. But the obligation to bury elsewhere, if the deceased or the husband, wife or next of kin shall have so requested, will not be discharged or varied (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1850, Sec. 2).

Transfer of inmates to other workhouses.

161. (Chairman.) Yesterday we finished the subject of the law relating to the burial of deceased inmates; the next question, I think, on which you propose to tender evidence to the Commission is, what powers of transfer of workhouse inmates have the guardians of two or more unions?—The Poor Law Acts give facilities for the accommodation in the workhouse of one union of the paupers of another union, where the exigencies of the case make this course desirable. An example may be taken from the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1849. In Section 14 of that Act the circumstances in which recourse may be had to its provisions are described as: Overcrowding, Prevalence or Reasonable Apprehension of Epidemic or Contagious Disease, or Emigration. In such circumstances, the guardians may, with the consent of the Local Government Board, receive, lodge, and maintain in the workhouse, upon terms mutually agreed upon, any poor person belonging to another Poor Law Union. The poor person so received shall, while in the workhouse, be treated in all respects in like manner and be subject to the same regulations and liabilities as the other persons in the workhouse. The poor person also is to be deemed to be chargeable, in the first instance, to the Poor Law Union in the workhouse of which he is received. But, in all other respects, the abiding of the poor person in the workhouse is to be attended with the same legal consequences, as if the workhouse had been situated within the Poor Law Union from which the poor person has been sent. These provisions in 1876 were extended by Section 22 of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act to the case of the managers of a district or other asylum, and to every case where the Local Government Board deem it expedient and give their consent, until the consent is withdrawn. Section 6 of the Poor Law Amendment Act 1851 (14 and 15 Vic. c. 105) as altered by the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1866, Sec. 16, provides that where in a Poor Law Union there is a workhouse or building having adequate provision for the reception, maintenance and education of poor children, and there is more accommodation than the guardians require for the poor children of their own Poor Law Union, the guardians may, with the consent of the Local Government Board, contract with the guardians of another Poor Law Union for the reception, maintenance, and instruction of poor children under sixteen who are chargeable to the latter Poor Law Union, are orphans or deserted, or whose parents or surviving parent, consent. With the necessary modifications, the incidents and consequences recognised in the case of adult paupers attach to the children maintained and instructed in the foreign workhouse. Further, the guardians, with the consent of the Local Government Board, may send an idiotic, imbecile, or insane pauper, who may lawfully be detained in a workhouse to the workhouse of any other Poor Law Union with the consent of the guardians of that Poor Law Union, and pay the cost of the maintenance, clothing, and lodging of the pauper in the workhouse, as well as the cost of his conveyance thereto, or removal therefrom, and his burial expenses (Poor Law Amendment Act 1868, Sec. 13).

Transfer of inmates to other workhouses: Metropolitan provisions.

162. What is the law with regard to the transfer of inmates in London?—In the case of London the Local Government Board may initiate a transfer of inmates. Thus Section 50 of the Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867, enacts that where, in the opinion of the Local Government Board, the workhouse of a Metropolitan Poor Law Union is adapted only for the reception of poor persons of a particular class or particular classes, but is capable of accommodating poor persons of that class or those classes from any other Metropolitan Poor Law Union, the Local Government Board may direct the guardians to receive, lodge, and maintain poor persons of that class or those classes; and the guardians are accordingly to receive these inmates on agreed or prescribed terms. Incidents similar to those mentioned in connection with Section 14 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1849, attach to the reception in the Metropolitan Workhouse. In that case there is the additional provision that every guardian of the Poor Law Union from which a poor person is sent may at all reasonable times enter the workhouse and inspect any part thereof. The power of receiving inmates from other Poor Law Unions is extended by Section 17 of the Metropolitan Poor Amendment Act, 1869, to cases where wards or portions of workhouses are set apart for the reception of particular classes or descriptions of poor persons for whom separate maintenance and treatment are provided.

163. Do you know whether this power of the Local Government Board in reference to the Metropolitan area has been one which has been largely utilised?—I think it has been used, but I could not say precisely to what extent.

Regulations as to Indoor Relief.

164. Do you wish to make any comments on the regulations affecting indoor relief?—The part played by the regulations of the Central Authority in the control of indoor relief is most important. But the variety of cases which the regulations are designed to meet necessarily results in diversity of codes; also the needs of particular establishments frequently involve adaptations of, and departures from, accepted models. So that, for present purposes, it is difficult to attempt an illustration of what may be done by regulations in every department of indoor relief. But there is one code of very general application for purposes of workhouse management, and some account of this code may prove useful. The collection of rules to which I refer is usually known as the General Consolidated Order. It was issued by the Poor Law Commissioners on the 24th of July, 1847, and, with a substantially similar Order of the 8th of December, 1847, represented the final revision by the Commissioners of the rules made from time to time during their tenure of office.

165. Could you give us any account of what was in operation before the General Consolidated Order?—The procedure of the Commissioners may be described briefly thus: In their 8th Report they explained that in the early stages they found it more convenient to issue separate orders to each Union. It would have been nearly impracticable for them, at that time, to issue their regulations in the form of General Rules, that is, orders addressed simultaneously to several Unions. That course would have necessitated repeated rescission of existing orders and the issue of General Rules in substitution, as often as each new Union was formed. But in 1842, when nearly the whole of England had been brought under the operation of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, and the regulations of the Commissioners had been for some time in force throughout the majority of the Unions, the Commissioners thought that they might safely rescind the existing separate orders and issue General Rules. These General Rules, however, were, in the issue of 1842, embodied in a number of orders according to subjects. So that, for example, workhouse regulations were in one order, and regulations as to the duties of officers in another. The work accomplished in 1847 was the consolidation of these separate orders, with certain exceptions and with amendments, in one general order. It may be said, I think, that in essentials the General Rules of 1842 and 1847 are the same. A comparison of the Order of 1847 with the first experimental orders of twelve years earlier discloses the important fact that much of the model Order for workhouses which is printed at page 96 of the first Report of the Poor Law Commissioners can be traced in the General Consolidated Order of 1847. So that it seems to be worth noting that the earliest regulations of the Poor Law Commissioners are at least shown to have stood the test of seventy years' experience, and that the amplified edition of those original regulations which was put forth by the Commissioners in 1842 embodied the greater part of the material improvements in the later edition of 1847.

166. Will you describe the contents of the General Consolidated Order as regards workhouses?—The General Consolidated Order in that part which relates to the government of the workhouse contains an explicit declaration that, subject to the rules and regulations therein contained, the guidance, government and control of every workhouse and of the officers, servants, assistants and paupers within the workhouse shall be exercised by the guardians of the unions. This declaration is in complete harmony with the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834 (Secs. 21 and 54), and it may be explained and emphasised by pointing out, in the language of the Local Government Board's Circular of the 29th of January, 1895, on workhouse administration, that the responsibility for the management of the workhouse and the welfare of the inmates rests with the guardians and the officers under their control. The General Consolidated Order contains provisions on the following subjects: Admission of paupers, classification of paupers, discipline and diet of paupers, punishment for misbehaviour of paupers, Visiting Committee, and repairs and alterations of the workhouse.

ates.

167. Let us take those subjects in the order that you have given them. What have you to say first about the admission of paupers?—Under the first head, "Admission of Paupers," are detailed regulations, in Articles 88 to 97, as to orders of admission and cases in which paupers may be admitted without orders, as to the examination of paupers on admission, and as to the cleansing, clothing and searching of paupers. The order does not deal exhaustively with the possible conditions under which a person may be received into a workhouse. There are cases arising under Statutes which appoint the workhouse as a place of reception, and the following instances may be mentioned: A workhouse may be a place of safety to which a child cruelly treated may be taken under the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1904 (Section 5); then certain lunatics or alleged lunatics may be conveyed thither under the Lunacy Acts. A workhouse is also a place to which children may be remanded under the Industrial Schools Act, 1866 (Section 19).

Classification of workhouse inmates.

168. Now we come to classification; will you state what is the effect of the Articles relating to classification?—Under the second head, "Classification of Paupers," the General Consolidated Order, in Articles 98 to 101, provides for the division of inmates into seven classes and the assignment of special quarters to each class. These classes are, with the exception of a variation of the ages of the boys and girls, the same as those prescribed in the earliest orders of the Poor Law Commissioners. But the guardians may under the General Consolidated Order subdivide any of the classes with reference to the moral character or behaviour, or the previous habits of the inmates, or to such other grounds as may seem expedient. Provision is also made with regard to married couples, to the employment of the inmates of certain classes, to exceptional classification of individual boys or girls, to children under seven years of age, and to interviews of parents and children. An important regulation is to the effect that the guardians are not to admit into the workhouse or any ward a larger number or a different class of paupers than that fixed by the Local Government Board, and any case of excess is to be reported by the clerk.

Discipline and diet of workhouse inmates.

169. Discipline and diet are the next subject: Will you please summarise the Rules on those points?—Under the head of "Discipline and Diet," it should first be noted that a recent Order known as The Workhouse Regulation (Dietaries and Accounts) Order, 1900, regulates the diet of the poor in workhouses with much elaboration, and for dietary purposes authorises a special classification of inmates. The Order was issued on the 10th of October 1900. Also by a General Order of the 8th of March, 1894, the guardians are empowered to cause dry tea, with sugar and milk, to be supplied to such of the female inmates of the workhouse as they may consider should be supplied. The quantity allowed in each case or in any class of cases is to be such as the guardians prescribe. With respect to discipline, the General Consolidated Order, in Articles 102 to 126, contains a variety of rules. The Order appoints times to be observed by the inmates for rising, work, leaving off and going to bed, with intervals for meals. There are also rules for a roll call, the places for meals, the clothing of inmates, their employment, the instruction of children, temporary absences, visits (including those of Ministers of religion), prayers and divine service, and the attendance of inmates at Church or Chapel. The circulation of papers of improper tendency and cards or games of chance are prohibited, and no pauper may have in his possession matches or other articles of a highly combustible nature. The original prohibition of smoking has been relaxed. Tobacco, under a General Order of the 3rd of November, 1892, may be allowed to inmates who are not able-bodied, or are employed on work of a specially disagreeable character. But no pauper may smoke, except in rooms and at times allowed by the guardians. One article under the head of Discipline and Diet seems to call for special mention. This is Article 115, which relates to discharges. The effect of subsequent legislation with respect to detention need not be here considered, and the Article may be discussed as having reference to cases not affected by that legislation. The Article provides that any pauper may quit the workhouse upon giving to the Master or (during his absence or inability to act) to the Matron, a reasonable notice of his wish to do so; and in the event of any able-bodied pauper, having a family, so quitting the house, the whole of such family shall be sent with him, unless the guardians shall for any special reason otherwise direct. The Article adds to the effect that the directions are to be in conformity with the regulations of the Central Authority. I mention the Article because it has been considered by the High Court in a case which went to the Court of Appeal. The case is that of Burge v. Power and others and a report will be found in 2 Times Law Reports, 760. The plaintiff sued a committee of the guardians for damages for maliciously and negligently refusing to allow him to leave the workhouse for a short time, without his family, in order to obtain employment. On one occasion, the plaintiff alleged, the defendants did not hear his application properly. On another occasion they refused to read a written statement of his position and prospects of work. The plaintiff was non-suited. A new trial was refused by the Divisional Court, and the Court above dismissed the appeal to them. Lord Justice Bowen pointed out that, assuming that such an action would lie, the plaintiff was bound to bring the case home to each individual member of the committee. The guardians acted under Article 115 of the Consolidated Order, and, under that Article, the family must leave with the pauper unless some special reason was shown. The guardians had to enquire whether any such special reason existed, and the Court had to see whether there was any evidence that the defendants acted maliciously in such enquiry. That the guardians acted promptly in refusing leave was no evidence of malice, and the other incidents in the case, whatever their value might be, were not brought home to any of the defendants. The non-suit on every ground was right.

Punishment for misbehaviour of inmates.

170. What is the effect of the rules relating to punishment?—Under the head "Punishment for Misbehaviour of the Paupers" the General Consolidated Order contains a number of detailed provisions in Articles 127 to 147, the effect of which may be shortly stated as follows: Inmates who misbehave are divided into two classes—the disorderly and the refractory. The disorderly inmate is one who is guilty of certain offences against discipline which are of a comparatively minor character. By repeating any such offence within seven days, a disorderly inmate may become refractory, and offences of a graver character may subject an inmate at once to the consequences of being deemed refractory. The disorderly pauper may be punished by a change of diet, on the authority of the master with or without the direction of the guardians, and the punishment may last for a time not longer than forty-eight hours. The case of the refractory pauper requires a special direction by the guardians. His punishment may extend to confinement in a separate room for not more than twenty-four hours, unless a longer time should be necessary, when it is deemed right that the pauper should be carried before a justice. Circumstances of aggravation in the case of a refractory pauper may justify the master, without any direction of the guardians, in placing the refractory pauper in confinement for any time not exceeding twelve hours; but the confinement is to be reckoned as part of any punishment afterwards imposed by the guardians There are many safeguards against abuse of the rules about punishment. Mitigation of punishment is permissible in the case of a refractory pauper who may be punished as disorderly only. If punished as disorderly, he is not afterwards to be punished as refractory. If punished as refractory he is not afterwards to be punished as disorderly. Only in certain circumstances may an offence committed before the last admission to the workhouse be punishable. A medical certificate is necessary in the case of the sick and infirm, children under twelve, adults above sixty, and women who are pregnant or suckling. A bed and bedding and proper conveniences must be supplied in cases of punishment by confinement between 8 p.m. and 6 a.m. No child under twelve may be punished by confinement in a dark room or during the night. Only the schoolmaster or workhouse master may inflict corporal punishment on a male child, and both if possible, should be present. The rod or other instrument must be approved by the guardians or the Visiting Committee. Two hours must elapse after the commission of the offence. Flogging is not permissible in the case of a male above fourteen. No corporal punishment may be inflicted on a female child. A workhouse punishment book is to be kept by the master and submitted to the guardians for consideration and directions. A pauper above fourteen who unlawfully introduces or attempts to introduce spirituous or fermented liquor into the workhouse, or who absconds from the workhouse with clothes belonging to the guardians may be taken forthwith before a justice by the master. The case must be reported to the guardians. The master is to cause a legible copy of the articles describing offences to be kept suspended in the dining hall, in the room in which the inmates usually eat their meals, and also in the board room.

Visita workh

171. What provision is made for the visitation of workhouses?—Articles 148 and 149 of the General Consolidated Order relate to the Visiting Committee and their duties. This part of the Order is supplemented by a later General Order of the 26th of January, 1893. That order, by Article 1, authorises any guardian at any time to visit and examine any part of any workhouse of the Poor Law Union. Article 2 of the Order enables the guardians to appoint a Committee, or Committees of women, whether members of the board of guardians or not, and assigns to such a Committee the duty of visiting and examining the parts of the workhouse in which female paupers or pauper children are maintained, and to report to the board of guardians; but the appointment of such a Committee is not to affect the duty of the guardians to appoint one or more Visiting Committees as required by the Orders, nor the powers and duties of any such Committee. It may here be stated that if the guardians neglect to appoint a Visiting Committee for the purpose of visiting the workhouse, or when three months have elapsed during which the Committee have neglected to visit the workhouse, the Local Government Board are required by the Poor Law Board Act, 1847, Sec. 24, to appoint a visitor, not being a guardian, at a salary. The appointment of the visitor is to cease at the expiration of three calendar months next after the appointment of a Visiting Committee by the guardians, subject nevertheless to his reappointment in case of any repetition of the neglect of the guardians or Visiting Committee. Also, it may be well to point out that Justices still have power to visit workhouses under the Workhouses Act (30 Geo. III. c. 49), and under Section 43 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, though it may be doubted whether the objects of the visit could now be practically attained in the manner authorised by the two enactments.

Repair alterat workh

172. Have you anything to say about repairs and alterations?—The provisions in Articles 150 and 152 of the General Consolidated Order, under the head "Repairs and Alterations of the Workhouse," are designed to ensure cleanliness and the remedy of defects tending to injure the health of the inmates.

Duties workh officers

173. Will you now state briefly the duties of the officers on the workhouse establishment?—Besides the rules to which attention has already been drawn, it seems to be desirable to mention a few matters arising out of the duties of some of the chief members of the workhouse staff and affecting the care and control of the inmates.

Medic officer.

Apart from medical attendance, the medical officer has duties of an important character in relation to the daily routine of the workhouse. The examination of paupers on admission, directions and suggestions as to diet, classification and treatment, vaccination, defects in workhouse arrangements or in those of the infirmary, and excess of inmates, may be instanced as some of the matters within the scope of the medical officer's functions.

Chapla

It is the duty of the chaplain to read prayers and preach on every Sunday, Good Friday, and Christmas Day, unless the guardians with the consent of the Local Government Board may otherwise direct. He examines children, and catechises such as belong to the Church of England, and reports on the general progress and condition of the children and on the moral and religious state of the inmates generally. He also visits the sick, and administers religious consolation to them.

Master

The discipline and domestic economy of the establishment specially concern the master and matron, and their duties are set out in much detail. It may suffice to mention a few of the duties of the master. These concern the admission of inmates, the enforcement of regulations, the employment of inmates, visitation of wards, meals, custody of the keys, clothing, registration of births and deaths, care of stores, etc. Among other duties, it may be mentioned that it belongs to the master to apprise the nearest relation in the workhouse of the sickness of any pauper, and in the case of dangerous sickness to send for the chaplain, and any relative or friend of the pauper resident within a reasonable distance, whom the pauper may desire to see. The master must take care that no pauper at the approach of death is left unattended either during the day or the night, and must give information of death to the nearest relations, and, if the body be not removed within a reasonable time, must provide for its interment. Also, under a recent order issued on the 1st of December, 1900, it devolves upon the master when the death of a person of unsound mind occurs in the workhouse to send notice to the coroner, with a statement of prescribed particulars under the signature of the medical officer. The Nursing in Workhouses Order, 1897, which abolishes pauper nursing, aims at securing practical experience as a qualification of persons appointed to the office of nurse. The rules in the General Consolidated Order made the nurse subject to the directions of the medical officer so far as regards attendance and the administration of medicine. The nurse is also made responsible for taking care that a light is kept at night in the sick ward. The porter keeps the gate, and a record of those who enter or leave, and prevents entry or exit without leave. He receives paupers, examines parcels and suspects, and assists in the preservation of order.

174. Is the General Consolidated Order periodically revised and issued by the Local Government Board?—No. The General Consolidated Order is a fixed code; various alterations have been made in relation to particular subjects, but the order as a whole is not subject to such periodical revision, as, for example, is applied to the Code of the Board of Education.

175. I suppose the Amending Orders relate mainly to fresh legislation?—Or to improvements affecting particular officers or their duties as, for example, in the case of nurses under the order of 1897. That is a graft upon the old General Consolidated Order.

176. That finishes the subject of in-door relief, and we now come to the subject of out-door relief; upon that have you anything to say to us about the Royal Commission of 1832?—The Royal Commission of 1832 reported that the great source of abuse in the Poor Law system of their day was the out-door relief afforded to the able-bodied on their own account, or on that of their families. Out-door relief to the impotent, the Commission reported to be subject to less abuse. Out-door relief to the able-bodied was given either in kind or in money. Relief of this description when given in kind consisted rarely of food, rather less infrequently of fuel, and still less infrequently of clothes, particularly shoes. Its most usual form was found to be that of relieving the applicants either wholly or partially from the expense of obtaining house-room. Exemption from payment of rates on the ground of poverty was, in the opinion of the Commissioners, one method of partial relief of this sort; in other cases there was an actual payment of house-rent. Out-door relief to the able-bodied in money was classified as (1) Relief without labour; (2) the allowance system; (3) the roundsman system; (4) parish employment; and (5) the labour rate system. The heads, relief without labour and parish employment, explain themselves; the other three systems, that is to say, the allowance system, the roundsman system, and the labour rate system have this feature in common, namely, that the pauper was employed by an individual occupier. It is unnecessary, I think, to enter upon a recapitulation of the evils which arose out of each of these systems. The Commissioners, however, condemned the practices as being in violation of the letter as well as of the spirit of the law then in force. I cannot but think that, in this respect, the Commissioners took too favourable a view of the law, for in principle at least, apologists of the systems described by the Commissioners were in a position to collect both from statutes and judicial commentary an array of arguments in defence.

177. Can you give us an example of the defects in the law to which the Royal Commission referred?—When Lord Chief Justice Hale propounded a scheme for the reform of the Poor Law, he described the statute of the 43rd Elizabeth as generally making two provisions. First, for the impotent poor unable to work; and, second, for those poor that are able to work. Under the first head the Lord Chief Justice said "The plaister is not so large as the sore." This was published in 1683. Before the end of the century, the Court of King's Bench had made an attempt at enlarging the plaister in Waltham v. Sparkes (Michaelmas term, 6 William and Mary, Skinner 566, Comberbach 321, 1 Bott. pl. 439); and in the text books in use in 1832, the decision of the court will be found reproduced in the form of this proposition, namely, "A man who has more children than he can maintain, or who cannot obtain work, is entitled to relief under the term 'impotent.'" It might have been added that one of the judges had explained that the man was impotent as much as if he had been so by lameness. It may, therefore, be said that the opinion of the time regarded as sound law a doctrine which went far indeed to cover much that the Commissioners classed as illegal. And it may be well to add that Waltham v. Sparkes was treated as an authority so recently as in 1862 in the case of The Overseers of St. Pancras v. The Guardians and Overseers of St. Mary Islington (3 Best and Smith, 46; 31 Law Journal, Magistrates' Cases, 233; 9 Jurist, New Series, 155). Again, the evils of the allowance system, or the system of relief in aid of wages, are exemplified by the so-called Speenhamland Act of Parliament. This was, in fact, a resolution of Berkshire Justices in 1795, and it embodied a table of allowances corresponding to the supposed necessities of each family of the industrious poor. But the justices who adopted and published the table seem merely to have aimed at uniformity in the exercise of powers which were conferred upon them by the 3 and 4 William and Mary, c. 11, and the 9 George I., c. 7, and which were amplified in favour of the industrious poor by the 36 George III., c. 23. Lastly, the arrangements made by parish officers with individual employers had in principle a show of statutory sanction in all places to which Gilbert's Act applied; for Section 32 of that Act empowered the guardian to agree for the labour of a poor person able and willing to work, but unable to obtain employment. It also authorised the guardian to receive the money earned, to apply it in the pauper's maintenance as far as it would go, and to make up the deficiency, if any. Elsewhere, too, there was some justification, in the language of the report of The King v. Anthony Collett (1823, 2 Barnewall and Cresswell, 324), for the view that if employment had to be found, there might be more than one way of finding it; for Chief Justice Abbott said, "It does not appear upon the case before us that the overseers of the poor considered themselves bound to provide work for the unemployed poor, if that were practicable; nor whether they in any way endeavoured to attain that object . . . .The case must go to the sessions again that we may be informed whether any, and if any, what endeavours were made to procure employment for them. All that the courts can now say is that undoubtedly it is the primary duty of the overseers to find employment for the poor if possible."

"Speenhamland Act of Parliament"

178. I should like to go back for a minute to an answer that you gave a short time ago. I think you said that one of the methods by which relief was given to individuals was exemption from rates?—Yes. The Commissioners of 1832 treated that as a form of relief to the able-bodied.

Exemption from rates.

179. Do you know if the person exempted from paying rates ipso facto became a pauper?—I do not think he did. It was under the 54 Geo. III. c. 170—a section of which enabled a man to apply to the justices to obtain excusal from his rates on the ground of poverty. They classed it as out-door relief and there I think they were wrong. It was almost what one may call an instance of economic rather than legal doctrine applied to the subject.

180. But it came under the head of out-door relief?—The Commission of Inquiry of 1832 classed it so.

181. Did not the receipt of out-door relief make the man who received it a pauper?—This was not necessarily the case of a man in receipt of relief, but it was the case of a man who was so poor that he applied under the 54 Geo. III. c. 170, s. 11, to the justices for exoneration from rates on the ground of his poverty, and the Commissioners treated it as ipso facto out-door relief.

182. Did not the receipt of out-door relief make a man a pauper?—That particular form of exemption had never been classed by the law itself as out-door relief; but the Commissioners appear to have treated it as out-door relief.

183. Therefore, it was a form of relief which did not carry with it the disability that other forms of out-door relief do?—Clearly that would be so—or at least it has been so held for the purposes of the franchise.

184. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Can you tell me whether it was the fact that not only did they relieve him of the rate but they also paid the rates for him?—I do not know that that was so.

185. (Sir Henry Robinson.) Was the rate marked "irrecoverable"?—I do not know. Of course, it is just conceivable that such a case as Mr. Patten-MacDougall refers to might arise where non-resident relief was given and relief for payment of the rate in such circumstances might be out-door relief. But the words of the Commissioners are very general, and they would extend to the case of a man with whom the overseers had an understanding, so that when he went before the justices, the overseers consented to his application and accordingly he was exonerated from his poor rate. I think you will find that the words are very general.

Defects of old law as to out-door relief.

186. (Chairman.) The conclusion you arrive at, therefore, is that the law was faulty in itself and that its practice was also faulty?—Yes; I think, therefore, in any review of the Poor Law, it would be unsafe to rely upon the Poor Relief Act, 1601, and the amending Statutes before 1834, as prohibitory of the methods which brought about the evils reported by the Royal Commission.

187. You have alluded to the 36 Geo. III., c. 23; is that the first Act in which wages were directly supplemented out of the rates?—No. That Act was really the statute under which out-door relief was given to people at their homes as a matter of right. I shall come to that Act almost immediately, I think.

Amendments of law in 1834.

188. Will you now state the Amendments made in the law after the report of the Royal Commission?—That material amendment of the law was thought to be essential is shown in the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834. The course adopted in that Act was, by Sec. 53, to repeal outright the enactment, 36 Geo. III. c. 23, which had authorised the parish officers with the approbation of the vestry or of a justice to relieve the industrious poor at their homes; to repeal so much of the 55 Geo. III. c. 137, as related to the powers of justices to order out-door relief, and so much of Sturges Bourne's Act (59 Geo. III. c. 12) as was contained in Secs. 2 and 5, and regulated the action of the justices in making orders on complaints of the want of adequate relief. Having thus destroyed much of the defective legislation of the past, the Act of 1834 proceeded to construct the new system.

Changes effected by Poor Law Amendment Act., 1834, Sec. 27.

189. Will you now describe what the new system of the Act was?—First by Section 27, Parliament dealt with the powers of justices. The Section is as follows:—"In any union which may be formed under this Act it shall be lawful for any two of His Majesty's justices of the peace usually acting for the district wherein such union may be situated, at their just and proper discretion, to direct by order under their hands and seals that relief shall be given to any adult person who shall, from old age or infirmity of body, be wholly unable to work, without requiring that such person shall reside in any workhouse; provided always that one of such justices shall certify in such order of his own knowledge that such person is wholly unable to work as aforesaid, and provided further that such person shall be lawfully entitled to relief in such union, and shall desire to receive the same out of a workhouse." The power given by this section was in appearance a wide one; but decisions of the Court of Queen's Bench curtailed its scope. Thus, in 1845, in the Queen v. the Totnes Union (7 Queen's Bench, 690; 14 Law Journal, Magistrates' Cases, 148), it was held that such an order could not be made without summoning the parties upon whom the burden would be imposed. Lord Chief Justice Denman pointed out that, though a justice might give a certificate of inability and with bona fides, "the guardians, if called upon to show cause, might convince the justices that there was no ground for granting an order." Mr. Justice Patteson said: "If it was right at the time of passing the Statute 9 Geo. I. c. 7, when all persons received out-door relief, that none should be granted till the overseers had been summoned to show cause, the power, now an extraordinary one, of directing such relief ought not to be exercised without first summoning those on whom the order is to be made." Mr. Justice Williams observed: "It is safest and most consistent with principle that there should be a summons before the order is made"; and Mr. Justice Coleridge, upholding the principle, remarked "The magistrate who certifies ought to have evidence before him. He may believe in the inability; but the applicant may be an impostor." In a later case, in 1851, a difficulty arose out of the use of the description of the justices as "usually acting for the district wherein such union may be situated." Two borough justices made an order directing the guardians of a union which comprised borough and county parishes to administer out-door relief to an aged and infirm pauper in a borough parish. To this, objection was taken on the ground that the order should have been made by justices for the county. Lord Chief Justice Campbell said, "It is clear that the justices were not justices usually acting for the district in which the union is situated, and the order is therefore bad."

Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, Sections 52 and 54.

190. What you have said relates to Sec. 27 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834; what are the next provisions to which you wish to call attention?—Secs. 52 and 54 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834. I will quote these sections on account of their great importance; they are as follows: "LII. And whereas a practice has obtained of giving relief to persons or their families who, at the time of applying for or receiving such relief, were wholly or partially in the employment of individuals, and the relief of the able-bodied and their families is in many places administered in modes productive of evil in other respects: And whereas difficulty may arise in case any immediate and universal remedy is attempted to be applied in the matters aforesaid; Be it further enacted that from and after the passing of this Act, it shall be lawful for the said Commissioners, by such rules, orders, or regulations, as they may think fit, to declare to what extent and for what period the relief to be given to able-bodied persons or to their families in any particular parish or union may be administered out of the workhouse of such parish or union, by payments in money, or with food or clothing in kind, or partly in kind and partly in money, and in what proportions, to what persons or class of persons, at what times and places, on what conditions, and in what manner such outdoor relief may be afforded: and all relief which shall be given by any overseer, guardian, or other person having the control or distribution of the funds of such parish or union, contrary to such orders or regulations, shall be, and the same is hereby declared to be unlawful, and shall be disallowed in the accounts of the person giving the same, subject to the exceptions hereinafter mentioned; Provided always, that in case the overseers or guardians of any parish or union to which such orders or regulations shall be addressed or directed shall, upon consideration of the special circumstances of such parish or union, or of any person or class of persons therein, be of opinion that the application and enforcing of such orders or regulations, or of any part thereof, at the time or in the manner prescribed by the said Commissioners, would be inexpedient, it shall be lawful for such overseers or guardians to delay the operation of such orders or regulations, or of any part thereof, for any period not exceeding the space of thirty days, to be reckoned from the day of the receipt of such orders or regulations; and such overseers or guardians shall, twenty days at the least before the expiration of such thirty days, make a statement and report of such special circumstances to the said Commissioners; and all relief which shall be given by such overseers or guardians, before an answer to such report shall have been returned by the said Commissioners, if otherwise lawful, shall not be deemed unlawful, although the same shall have been given contrary to such orders or regulations, or any of them; but in case the said Commissioners shall disapprove of such delay, or think that for the future such orders or regulations ought to come into operation, notwithstanding the special circumstances alleged by such overseer or guardian, it shall be lawful for the said Commissioners, by a peremptory order to direct that from and after a day to be fixed thereby such orders and regulations, or such parts or modifications thereof as they may think expedient and proper, shall be enforced and observed by such overseers and guardians; and if any allowance be made or relief given by such overseers or guardians after the said last-mentioned period, contrary to any such last-mentioned order, the amount of the relief or allowance so given shall be disallowed in the accounts of the party giving the same: Provided also that a quarterly report of all such cases as shall occur in any quarter shall, at the end of every such quarter, be laid by the said Commissioners before one of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State: Provided also, that in case the overseers or guardians of any parish or union in which such orders and regulations shall be in force shall depart from them or any of them in any particular instance or instances of emergency, and shall within fifteen days after every such departure report the same and the grounds thereof to the said Commissioners, and the said Commissioners shall approve of such departure, or if the relief so given shall have been given in food, temporary lodging, or medicine, and shall have been so reported as aforesaid, then and in either of such cases the relief granted by such overseers or guardians, if otherwise lawful, shall not be unlawful or subject to be disallowed." "LIV. From and after the passing of this Act the ordering, giving, and directing of all relief to the poor of any parish, which, according to the provisions of any of the said recited Acts, or of an Act passed in the first and second years of the reign of His present Majesty, intituled 'An Act for the better regulating of vestries, and for the Appointment of Auditors of Accounts in certain parishes in England and Wales,' or of this Act or of any local Acts, shall be under the government and control of any guardians of the poor, or of any select vestry, and whether forming part of any union or incorporation or not (but subject in all cases to, and saving and excepting the powers of the said Commissioners appointed under this Act), shall appertain and belong exclusively to such guardians of the poor or select vestry, according to the respective provisions of the Acts under which such guardians or select vestry may have been or shall be appointed; and it shall not be lawful for any overseer of the poor to give any further or other relief or allowance from the poor rate than such as shall be ordered by such guardians or select vestry, except in cases of sudden and urgent necessity, in which cases he is hereby required to give such temporary relief as each case shall require, in articles of absolute necessity, but not in money, and whether the applicant for relief be settled in the parish where he shall apply for relief or not; Provided always, that in case such overseer shall refuse or neglect to give such necessary relief in any such case of necessity to poor persons not settled nor usually residing in the parish to which such overseer belongs, it shall and may be lawful for any justice of the peace to order the said overseer, by writing under his hand and seal, to give such temporary relief in articles of absolute necessity as the case shall require, but not in money; and in case such overseer shall disobey such order, he shall, on conviction before two justices, forfeit any sum not exceeding five pounds which such justices shall order: Provided always, that any justice of the peace shall be empowered to give a similar order for medical relief (only) to any parishioner, as well as out-parishioner, where any case of sudden and dangerous illness may require it; and any overseer shall be liable to the same penalties as aforesaid for disobeying such order: But it shall not be lawful for any justice or justices to order relief to any person or persons from the poor rates of any such parish, except as hereinbefore provided."

191. Have you any explanations to make about those sections?—Of the two sections, Sec. 54 may be disposed of in few words. The section is one of undoubted importance. It was intended as the ultimate safeguard against the possible danger arising from the failure of the new machinery to reach a case of destitution. Circumstances might take the case out of the cognisance of the relieving officer; but, as a last resource, the assistance of a local officer could always be, invoked. So the legislature imposed upon the overseer the duty of giving temporary relief in kind in cases of sudden and urgent necessity; and in the case of casual poor the duty was made enforceable by a justice's order, which might also extend to medical relief to parishioners or out-parishioners in cases of sudden and dangerous illness.

ents on Law dment 834, 2.

192. What observations do you offer on the other section, that is, Sec. 52?—The 52nd section calls for fuller comment. The general subject-matter of the section is the regulation of outdoor relief to the able-bodied and their families. The first recital records the defects of previous administration. It enumerates (1) a particular defect, and (2) general defects. The particular defect was the practice of giving relief to persons or their families who, at the time, were wholly or partially in the employment of individuals. The general defects were indicated by the statement that the relief of the able-bodied and their families was, in many places, administered in modes productive of evil in other respects. The second recital is specially noteworthy. It is in effect an explanation of the form chosen for much of the substantive enactments of the section. The second recital is, that difficulty may arise in case any immediate and universal remedy is attempted to be applied to the mischiefs recorded in the first recital. Taking the second recital as the key-note to the subsequent part of the section, we find that the safeguards provided against too hasty and too sweeping changes were the following: (1) a check placed in the hands of the Central Authority; (2) a provisional and temporary check available to the local authority. The first check took the form of enabling the Central Authority by their rules, orders, or regulations to declare to what extent and for what period the relief to the able-bodied might be administered out of the workhouse. The second check which the local authority could apply was designed to secure deliberate consideration of special circumstances in particular cases. This check was permissible after the issue of regulations to a Poor Law Union. When these appeared to the guardians to be such as, upon consideration of the special circumstances of the Poor Law Union, or of any person or class therein, to make the application and enforcing of the regulations inexpedient, the guardians might delay the operation for a period not exceeding thirty days. The guardians were to report the special circumstances to the Central Authority. The Central Authority on such a report could make a peremptory order directing that, from and after a fixed day, the regulations or such parts or modifications as they might think expedient and proper should be enforced. The section further recognised that, when regulations were fully in force, it might be necessary to relax their requirements in individual cases. These cases were described as instances of emergency. Departure in such instances was to be reported to the Central Authority. Relief was exempt from disallowance in these circumstances, either if the Central Authority approved of the departure, or if the relief had taken the form of food, temporary lodging or medicine.

Observations of Poor Law Commissioners on Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, Sec. 52.

193. The Poor Law Commissioners, I understand, made some remarks upon Sec. 52; would you state what they were?—In the second report of the Poor Law Commissioners they point out (page 6) that "In the Poor Law Amendment Bill, as first submitted to the consideration of Parliament, a clause was inserted which directed that all relief to able-bodied paupers out of a workhouse should cease on the 1st of July, 1835. In the progress of the Bill through Parliament the clause was withdrawn, and the Commissioners were charged with the important duty of fixing the time when in each union that provision (which formed the first recommendation of the Commissioners of Poor Law Inquiry, and is in fact the main object of the Poor Law Amendment Act) should take effect. We have not ceased to bear in mind this very important part of our functions, and we have carefully watched the progress made in the districts first formed into unions, for the purpose of ascertaining at what time and to what extent the provision might be enforced in them." The Commissioners then, after recording the limited extent to which they had been able to apply the rule, reiterated the statement that no doubt could be entertained that it was the deliberate intention of Parliament in framing the Poor Law Amendment Act that all outdoor relief to the able-bodied should cease at the earliest period that it could safely and with propriety be put an end to.

Rules of Poor Law Commissioners under Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, Secs. 15 and 52.

194. Will you give an account of the proceedings of the Poor Law Commissioners in carrying into effect Sec. 52 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834?—Yes. A few words may be said about the early proceedings of the Poor Law Commissioners under Sec. 52 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, supplemented by the wider enactment as to relief in Sec. 15. In their first report, the Poor Law Commissioners (Appendix, pages 84–86) printed a specimen order. This was of the type first prescribed for the new unions then in process of formation. On it the Commissioners observe (p. 27) that these first regulations were confined to the gradual substitution of relief in kind for relief in money, and to a few simple rules for the regulation of outdoor relief which had been extensively tried and had operated beneficially, but which would not involve a sudden or violent transition from the usual practices in the parishes united. These were elsewhere called preparatory rules. The substance of these rules was as follows: (1) Except in cases of sickness or accident, relief in money was not to be given to able-bodied males in employment on other than parish work; (2) an applicant for parish work was to have one half of his relief in kind; (3) one half of the relief of able-bodied widows or single women was to be in kind; (4) relief by payment of rent was prohibited; and (5) except in cases of accident, sickness, or other urgent necessity, future non-resident relief was prohibited for paupers between sixteen and sixty. Another rule enabled the guardians to give relief to able-bodied males between twenty-one and sixty by way of loan. In their second report, the Poor Law Commissioners gave a form of order specially intended for the requirements of a town union. The chief point in this form of order was the simplification of the requirements in the case of the able-bodied as compared with the preparatory rules applicable to rural unions. The rule with regard to the able-bodied in a town union provided that "the guardians may, until accommodation can be obtained for the reception of such persons in the workhouse, give outdoor relief, one half of which at least shall be in kind: but such relief shall only be given in return for labour at task work."

History of Out-Door Relief Prohibitory Order.

By 1839 the Poor Law Commissioners had developed a form of order prohibiting outdoor relief to the able-bodied; and a specimen is given in the appendix to their report of that year on the continuance of the Poor Law Commission and further amendments of the law. In 1842 the Commissioners made a further advance. In that year, on the 2nd of August, they issued a general order based upon the rules which they had previously issued to rural unions with respect to outdoor relief; and in 1844, on the 21st of December, they substituted an amended version in the form of the general order which is now in force and which is generally known as the Outdoor Relief Prohibitory Order.

History of Out-Door Relief Regulation Order.

195. What is the history of the regulations applicable to town unions?—As regards town unions, the Poor Law Commissioners left to their successors, the Poor Law Board, the work of codifying for general use the rules from time to time issued for the regulation of outdoor relief. The Poor Law Board made an attempt in this direction on the 25th of August, 1852. The main features of this order were the requirement by Article 1, that one-third at least of the relief to the helpless, or widows with dependants and one-half at least of the relief to the able-bodied should be in kind; the absolute prohibition by Article 5 of relief to any able-bodied male while employed for wages or other hire or remuneration; and the provision that every able-bodied male should be set to work by the guardians. To these should be added Article 10, which was as follows: "Provided always that in case the guardians of any of the said parishes or unions depart in any particular instance from any of the regulations hereinbefore contained (except those contained in Article 3) and within fifteen days after such departure report the same and the grounds thereof to the Poor Law Board, and the Poor Law Board approve of such departure, then the relief granted in such particular instance shall, if otherwise lawful, not be deemed to be unlawful." These requirements and provisions aroused much opposition. In the result, the General Order was rescinded, and the General Order which is now in force and is usually known as the Outdoor Relief Regulation Order, was issued on the 14th of December, 1852. In this order the Poor Law Board retained the prohibition of relief to able-bodied males in employment, and the requirement that able-bodied males should be set to work while in receipt of relief; but they modified Article 1 by confining it to able-bodied male persons and substituted a less stringent provision for Article 10.

Description of Out-Door Relief Prohibitory Order.

196. Now I think you wish to give us an account of the chief provisions of the Outdoor Relief Prohibitory Order and of the Outdoor Relief Regulation Order?—Yes. I assume that I may hand in these Orders, and therefore my remarks on them will be practically confined to the enumeration of heads. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. I (c) and (d)). Taking first the General Prohibitory Order, I may point out that the three main divisions of the order are those which concern (1) The restriction of outdoor relief to the able-bodied; (2) the restriction of non-resident relief; and (3) the restriction of payment of rent. Under the first head Article 1 has to be noted. By this Article every able-bodied person, male or female, and the resident and unemployed members of the person's family must be relieved only in the workhouse. Exceptions to this rule are:—Sudden and urgent necessity; sickness, accident or infirmity; burials; widows in the first six months of widowhood; widows with legitimate children as dependants and with no illegitimate children since widowhood; imprisonment; family of soldiers, sailors or marines; and resident family of non-resident head. In the second division, Article 3 deals with non-resident relief. The prohibition is subject to the following exceptions:—casual poor; sickness, accident or infirmity; relief under justices' orders; widows in the first six months of widowhood; widow non-resident at husband's death, having legitimate children as dependants and no illegitimate children since widowhood; children under sixteen in outside workhouses or schools; and family of non-resident and not able-bodied head. Under the third heading, I note the prohibition in Article 5 of the payment of rent, with an exception for shelter procured in case of sudden and urgent necessity or mental imbecility. Provisions subordinate to the foregoing relate to the evidence required where out-door relief is given on account of sickness, accident or infirmity (Article 2), to constructive widowhood (Article 4) and to relief by way of loan (Article 7). Lastly, the order provides for the report and approval of departures.

197. What you have told us related to the Out-Door Relief Prohibitory Order; now we come to the Out-Door Relief Regulation Order. Are we to understand that the Regulation Order superseded the Prohibitory Order?—No, one is the rural order, or rather the order applicable to the less populous centres, and the other is the town order—the present representative of the old town order.

198. Which is the town order?—The Out-Door Relief Regulation Order, which is the descendant of the town order of the Poor Law Commissioners.

199. Is the other order applicable to rural districts?—Yes, and also to many towns. It is the descendant of the original preparatory rules of the Poor Law Commissioners.

Description of Out-Door Relief Regulation Order.

200. Will you now please summarise the Regulation Order?—The Out-Door Relief Regulation Order roughly analysed is as follows: Article 1 requires one-half of the out-door relief of able-bodied males to be given in kind. Article 2 requires relief for more than a week to be administered weekly or at more frequent periods. Article 3 prohibits the establishment of an applicant in business, the redemption of articles from pawn, the purchase of tools or other articles, except clothing, bedding, and articles of absolute necessity, the payment of conveyance expenses, except under lawful authority and except in certain specified cases, and the payment of rent, except where shelter is procured in case of sudden or urgent necessity, or mental imbecility. Article 4 prohibits non-resident relief with these exceptions:—casual poor, sickness, accident, or infirmity, widows non-resident at husband's death having legitimate children as dependants and no illegitimate children since widowhood, children under sixteen in outside workhouses or schools, and family of non-resident head. Article 5 prohibits relief to able-bodied males while in employment. Article 6 requires every able-bodied male to be set to work and to be kept employed so long as he receives relief. To these last two rules there are exceptions. The exceptions are enumerated in Article 7, and are:—sudden and urgent necessity; sickness, accident, or infirmity; burials; family of prisoner; and family of non-resident. Article 8 requires the guardians to report arrangements for employment of the able-bodied. Article 9 relates to relief by way of loan. Article 10 relates to departures, and is in these terms: If the guardians shall, upon consideration of the special circumstances of any particular case, deem it expedient to depart from any of the regulations hereinbefore contained (except those contained in Article 8), and within twenty-one days after such departure shall report the same and the grounds thereof to the Poor Law Board, the relief which may have been so given in such case by such guardians before an answer to such report shall have been returned by the said Board shall not be deemed to be contrary to the provisions of this order, and if the Poor Law Board shall approve of such departure and shall notify such approval to the guardians, all relief given in such case after such notification, so far as the same shall be in accordance with the terms and conditions of such approval, shall be lawful, anything in this order to the contrary notwithstanding.

201. Is there a substantial difference between the two orders?—The first is the much more strict of the two orders.

202. The first is applicable, as I understand, to rural districts?—It is applicable to the larger area of England and Wales. The other is applicable to London and the populous centres.

203. Now we come to deal with the out-door labour test; what have you to say on that?—In the 9th report of the Poor Law Commissioners (Appendix B, Nos. 2 and 3, pages 379–386) will be found an example of an Out-Door Labour Order followed by a minute explaining the views of the Commissioners on the means of enforcing an out-door labour test. At the same time, in the body of their report they expressed the opinion that an out-door labour test is valuable as a substitute for an efficient workhouse or as supplementary to such an establishment. At a later date, Parliament recognised the expediency of the out-door labour test by providing a remedy for one of the difficulties to which the Commissioners had alluded, namely, refusal to work. Sec. 15 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1867 (29 and 30 Vic. c. 113), is in these terms: "When the guardians of any union or parish shall prescribe a task of work to be performed by any poor person to whom or to whose wife (if he be liable to maintain such wife) or child, whether legitimate or illegitimate, under the age of sixteen, relief shall have been lawfully granted by such guardians out of the workhouse, such task being suited to the age, sex, strength, and capacity of such person and being of a nature and description of which the Poor Law Board shall have previously approved, and such person shall refuse or wilfully neglect to perform such task, or shall wilfully destroy or damage any of the tools, materials, or other property belonging to the said guardians, he shall be deemed to be an idle and disorderly person within the meaning of the eighty-third chapter of the statute of the fifth year of King George the Fourth and shall be liable to be prosecuted and punished in the manner therein provided in respect of idle and disorderly persons, and the fifty-ninth section of the one hundred and first chapter of the statute of the seventh and eighth years of her present Majesty shall apply to any such prosecution."

204. Can you give us an account of the object and form of the Out-Door Labour Test Orders?—The modern form of the Out-Door Labour Test Order is designed to operate in Poor Law unions to which the Out-Door Relief Prohibitory Order applies, and in effect authorises a relaxation of that order on the lines of the Out-door Relief Regulation Order. The Out-door Labour Test Order, in fact, deals with cases in which the Local Government Board approve of departure from the order of 1844, and annexes to such cases the following conditions, namely, (1) Half at least of the relief given to the pauper shall be given in food, clothing, and other articles of necessity; (2) no pauper shall receive relief while employed for remuneration; and (3) every pauper relieved shall be set to work by the guardians. The guardians are to report the arrangements for work. They are also to report departures from the Out-door Labour Test Order.

205. There was a leading case arising, I believe, recently out of the circumstances to which an Out-door Labour Test Order had been applied; have you anything to say about that case?—An order of this type was in force in the Merthyr Tydfil Union, when in 1898 a strike of colliers occurred, and as a consequence persons who were not colliers were thrown out of employment. Labour yards were established, and the necessitous workmen and their families were relieved. The guardians were aware that work was offered to the strikers in neighbouring collieries, and that they would not accept it. An action was brought by the Attorney-General at the relation of the Powell Dyffryn Steam Coal Co., Limited, against the Guardians of the Merthyr Tydfil Union (Law Reports, 1900, 1 Chancery 516; 69 Law Journal, Chancery, 299; 82 Law Times, New Series, 662); and at the trial the plaintiffs asked a declaration that the establishment and maintenance by the defendants of labour yards or relief works for the purpose of providing out-door relief for able-bodied persons, to the knowledge of the defendants otherwise able to maintain themselves and their families, and the expenditure by the defendants of parts of the common fund of the union for the purpose of relieving such able-bodied persons and their families, constituted a breach of the statutory duties of the defendants as guardians. The action was dismissed by the Chancery Division, but the Court of Appeal discharged the judgment of the court below, and declared that the payment by the defendants out of the poor rates of any money for setting to work or for the relief of able-bodied men, who were at the time able to obtain and perform work at wages sufficient to support themselves (and their wives and families, if any) was unlawful and ought to be disallowed by the auditor on auditing the defendants' accounts. The declaration, however, did not include relief given to or for the wives and children of these men.

206. I believe you have a copy of the Judgment of the Master of the Rolls with you; would you call our attention to the more important passages in it?—The Master of the Rolls, in giving judgment, said, "Under the Poor Law Statutes passed before 1834, the only persons entitled to relief out of the poor rates were those described in the 43 Elizabeth c. 2, under three heads, namely, (1) The children of parents unable to keep and maintain them; (2) such persons who, having no means to maintain themselves, used no ordinary and daily trade of life to get their living by; (3) the lame, impotent, old, blind and such others as were poor and not able to work. The first of these classes were to be relieved by being set to work. The third class were to be relieved without work. Omitting children and speaking only of adults, the older statutes drew a broad distinction between, first, the impotent poor, that is, the poor unable to work who were to be relieved without work, and, secondly, the able-bodied poor, that is the poor able to work but unable to maintain themselves. These were to be relieved, but only by being set to work . . . . I can find nothing in the statutes before 1834 which entitled an able-bodied person having the means of supporting himself, to obtain relief from the parish authorities by being set to work or otherwise. . . . The short effect of the poor laws before 1834 I understand to have been as follows: (1) No one who was starving could be lawfully refused relief, whether he was in that state by his own fault or not; (2) poor persons physically unable to work were entitled to relief out of the rates without being set to work; (3) poor persons physically able to work, but who could not obtain work, were entitled to relief by having work found for them at the expense of the ratepayers, if no other work could be found; (4) poor persons physically able to work were not entitled to relief in any other way; (5) but poor persons able to work and able to procure it might, by refusing to work, become so weak as to be no longer able to work, in which case they became entitled to relief out of the rates and, at the same time, liable to imprisonment. This was an anomaly, for it enabled a person to obtain a legal advantage by his own wrong-doing. The anomaly was justified on grounds of humanity. The penalty for refusing to work was imprisonment, not death by starvation. . . . I cannot find anything in the Act of 1834, or in any later Act which has enlarged the class of persons entitled to relief under the former statutes. I can find no section which entitles able-bodied persons to support out of the rates, if they can obtain work and can support themselves and their families if they choose to do so." The Master of the Rolls next considered whether the Poor Law Commissioners could authorise relief to be given to persons not entitled to demand it, and to what extent this power, if it exists, can be exercised by the Local Government Board. "I cannot," he said, "arrive at the conclusion that the Commissioners appointed under 4 and 5 William IV., c. 76, to carry out the improvements made by it are empowered to extend the scope of the Poor Law Statutes by their application to persons not entitled to relief under them." Further, the Master of the Rolls found nothing in the regulations which purported to authorise the granting of relief to persons not entitled to it. Then having examined the facts of the particular case, he went on, "I draw no distinction between strikers and other able-bodied men who can support themselves but who will not. There is no difference, so far as the poor law is concerned, either for better or for worse, between men on strike and other men who can but will not support themselves. To use the rates to support strikers or any other persons able to support themselves is, in my opinion, illegal, although, rather than let even such persons starve, relief may be given to them when physically unable to work."

Extracts from judgment in Attorney General v. Guardians of Merthyr Tydfil Union.

Points arising out of Attorney General v. Guardians of Merthyr Tydfil Union.

207. (Mr. Loch.) Does that judgment cover the question of the children and the wives?—The relief given to the children and the wives, although, as I think the Master of the Rolls said, there was an impropriety in relieving them indirectly through the strikers, was held to be legal.

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

9 Jan. 1906.

208. It was actually held to be legal?—Yes.

209. Was it under the Act of Queen Elizabeth?—The relief was given under one of the regulations. It was the validity of the regulations that was then under discussion. On the regulations, the Master of the Rolls made his remarks respecting the title to relief under the Poor Relief Act, 1601.

210. Then it was not decided under the section in Queen Elizabeth's Act, by which children can be maintained if their parents are unable to maintain them?—No, it was not decided only with reference to that Act. It was after upholding the regulations that the Master of the Rolls dealt with the case of the children.

211. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Did that case go to the House of Lords?—I ask that because in Scotland we may not give relief to the able-bodied at all, and that is due to a decision of the House of Lords given about 1850?—This case did not go to the House of Lords; it stopped at the Court of Appeal.

212. (Mr. Loch.) By the regulations do you mean the orders of the Local Government Board?—Yes. There were two orders in force at Merthyr Tydfil at the time. The main order was the Out-door Relief Prohibitory Order; the second was an Out-door Labour Test Order. The combined effect of the two orders was considered by the Master of the Rolls in that case.

213. And his judgment had to do with those orders, but not with the law behind those orders?—Except that he went into the law behind the orders for the purpose of the interpretation of the orders.

214. (Chairman.) To put it in another way, the legality of the regulations was not questioned?—It was not. The Master of the Rolls actually said that the regulations were quite sound, inasmuch as they did not purport to authorise allowances to any persons except those who are entitled to relief. So far, he upheld the orders.

215. (Mr. Loch.) Am I to conclude from that, that practically the regulations have superseded the section in Queen Elizabeth's Act which refers to children?—The judgment shows that the regulations did not and could not supersede the Statute by enlarging the class of persons entitled to relief. Are you thinking of the Statute of Elizabeth so far as it refers to the setting to work or apprenticeship of children?

216. I am referring to the children being relieved if their parents are unable to maintain them?—I think then that the regulations harmonised with the Statute of Elizabeth, because they contained nothing at all counter to the claim of the children to be relieved as being entitled under that Statute.

217. Would the stress now be laid entirely on the order and not on the Statute in any case that arose?—The order could not authorise a payment in respect of a child who could not be relieved under the Statute of Elizabeth.

218. (Chairman.) As I understand it, the regulations were issued under the general statutory powers given to the Local Government Board, and those regulations did not allow this particular form of relief to be given?—That is so; they did not recognise as proper recipients of relief these people who could obtain work and did not.

219. And the action of the Attorney-General was taken on the regulations?—The action involved the consideration of their validity.

220. (Mr. Loch.) This man being an able-bodied man with dependants?—Yes, but the relief to the dependants was upheld by the court.

221. On the basis of the order?—I think the Master of the Rolls said the source through which the relief was administered was an improper one, or something to that effect.

Refusal to work:—The Case of Poplar Guardians v. Martin.

222. (Chairman.) There has been a subsequent judgment, has there not, to which you would like to call our attention?—Yes; it may be well to draw attention to another judicial decision which bears upon the present state of the law with regard to the refusal of work. An able-bodied person of 39, after admission to a workhouse, was taken with other inmates to a farm colony of the Salvation Army. By the terms of the agreement with the guardians, the pauper could have started work at the colony on probation, receiving as remuneration his food and lodging and sixpence a week in the nature of pocket money. If, after two or three weeks, he had been employed upon brickwork, he could have earned 4½d. a yard for digging clay, and at this rate it was possible for some men to earn 30s. a week. The pauper was told to go to work in the brickfield. The terms were explained, and he was asked to sign an undertaking to conform to the rules of the colony; but he refused to work upon the terms as explained or to sign the undertaking, and left the colony and again became chargeable. The magistrate before whom the man was charged as an idle and disorderly person under Sec. 3 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, at a second hearing considered the conditions in the agreement which the pauper was required to sign. These would have bound the pauper to discourage entry on premises where intoxicating liquors were sold, to attend meetings in the form of a church parade, and some place of worship once on Sunday. The magistrate held that these were not reasonable conditions to be attached to the employment, and that the pauper was justified in refusing the work. The appeal against the magistrate's decision was dismissed by the High Court. The Lord Chief Justice said: "If a man goes to a colony of this kind, I do not think it unreasonable that he should be asked to report himself, or to attend meetings, or to put himself under certain restrictions as to intoxicating liquors, but when we are dealing with a criminal offence, that is not the test which we ought to apply. It being necessary to draw the line at some point, I think that the conditions imposed should be conditions which affect the man's work; and if the terms on which he is offered work are reasonable with reference to the work which he is called on to do, we ought to hesitate before holding that he was justified in refusing to do work offered him on such conditions. Instances of reasonable conditions are easy to suggest; for instance, to come to his work at certain hours, to obey orders relating to his work, to observe the hours for meals, to conduct himself properly during working hours and in connection with his work. But I doubt whether in considering a question arising under Sec. 3, we have a right to say that the Court may regard conditions which are imposed on a man and made obligatory on him, but which have no relation to his work at all." Mr. Justice Kennedy and Mr. Justice Ridley concurred. That was the case of the Poplar Guardians v. Martin (74 Law Journal, King's Bench, 306; Law Reports, 1905, 1 King's Bench, 728; 92 Law Times, New Series, 197; 53 Weekly Reporter, 398).

Minutes of Central Authority as to Out-Door Relief.

223. I understand it is the practice of the Central Authority to give expression to their views on out-door relief in published minutes; perhaps you can give us some references in connection with these?—The Central Authority have in some instances embodied their views in published minutes. The first to which I may draw attention is a minute of the Poor Law Board of the 20th of November, 1869. It relates to the metropolis and discusses the separate limits of the Poor Law and of charity, and how it is possible to secure joint action between the two. The principle of co-operation is advocated in the following suggestions:—"In all those cases where the Board of Guardians are granting relief—and in all such cases the relief must, by law, be adequate—the almoners of charities should abstain from giving food or money, or supplying any such articles as the guardians are themselves strictly bound to grant, and especially from giving their charity in such a manner as would constitute a regular increase of income. If the charitable agencies wish to interpose at all in such cases they should confine their assistance to donations of bedding or clothing or any similar articles which the guardians may not consider themselves bound to provide at a particular moment and which can be easily distinguished from other relief." On the 2nd of December, 1871, the Local Government Board addressed an instructional letter to their inspectors with a view to bringing about general improvement as well as greater uniformity in the administration of relief throughout the country. The Board considered the increase in the cost of out-door relief so great as to excite apprehension. The result of the inquiries of the Board led them to the conclusion. (1) That out-door relief was granted too readily; (2) that there was a great diversity of practice in its administration; and (3) that in numerous instances there was disregard of the advantages of the offer of in-door in preference to out-door relief. The inspectors were requested to bring a series of recommendations under the notice of the guardians. These recommendations were in brief as follows:—(1) That out-door relief should not be granted to single able-bodied men or women; (2) that out-door relief should not, except in special cases, be granted to a deserted wife during the first twelve months after desertion or to an able-bodied widow with one child; (3) that in the case of an able-bodied widow with more than one child it might be preferable to take one or more of the children into the workhouse; (4) that where the Prohibitory Order is in force, the Workhouse test should be strictly applied; (5) that out-door relief should be granted for a fixed period not exceeding in any case three months; (6) that orders for the labour yard should only be given from week to week; (7) that out-door relief should not be granted without a relieving officer's visit to the home; (8) that the relieving officer should be required to make visits (a) at least fortnightly in cases of temporary sickness and relief in the labour yard; and (b) once a quarter in old and infirm cases; (9) that the provisions for compulsory maintenance of paupers by relations should be more generally acted upon; (10) that the recommendations of medical officers for meat and stimulants should be accompanied by reports; and (11) that in the most populous unions the appointment of inspectors of out-relief might be expedient. The Local Government Board, in a memorandum dated February, 1878, stated that the consideration and application of these rules had not been without effect. The Board gave facts and figures in support of this statement.

224. (Mr. Loch). Would the minutes you are going to hand in include the minutes of the Local Government Board with regard to out-door relief?—I am thinking particularly of the approval of what are called the Manchester rules, and so on. As you are aware, certain approvals were given to methods of conducting out-door relief which appear in the reports of the Local Government Board, and I have thought that those were in the nature of minutes?—They are not included in my evidence.

225. They are important, because they give, at any rate, the rules which approved themselves at the time to the Board's advisers?—The Manchester Rules are set out in the Memorandum of February, 1878.

226. (Chairman). Perhaps you would hand those in as illustrations?—Yes, I will hand in an Extract from the Memorandum. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. I (c).)

227. Are there not a great many other documents to the same purpose?—Not formal pronouncements such as were those which I quoted. The first is, I might say, almost a famous circular.

228. Is that not what is known as Mr. Goschen's circular?—Yes.

229. Now I think you wish to give a brief account of a report of a Select Committee in a recent year on this subject?—In 1888 the House of Lords appointed a Select Committee to inquire as to the various powers now in possession of the Poor Law guardians, and their adequacy to cope with distress that may from time to time exist in the Metropolis and other populous places; and also as to the expediency of concerted action between the Poor Law authorities and voluntary agencies for the relief of distress. The substance of the report, which bears the date of the 30th of July, 1888, is as follows: The powers of the guardians were adequate; the restriction of out-door relief to operate without hardship to the poor depended on the organised active co-operation of charity with the Poor Law authorities; objection was taken to small weekly doles of insufficient amount in the case of the aged and infirm of respectable character; labour yards should only be opened in cases where, on account of exceptional distress, the ordinary workhouse accommodation is insufficient to meet an emergency; so-called relief works undertaken by public bodies or charitable associations were regarded by the Committee as open to most serious objections as part of a regular system of relief during the winter months; industrial villages or pauper farms, apart from practical difficulties, would lead to a widespread belief that it is the business of the Government to provide work at suitable wages for all who apply to it for employment; the powers of the guardians with respect to emigration appeared to be sufficient. The report also referred to casual wards and dealing with casual paupers; paupers frequently entering and leaving workhouses; Poor Law infirmaries; the education of children; transfer of parental rights to guardians; prosecutions for cruelty; the expediency of the concerted action mentioned in the reference; uniformity of procedure; and attachment of pensions from private sources.

230. Was any action taken on that report?—There has been legislation in the direction of some of the recommendations. An example will be found in the Poor Law Acts of 1889 and 1899 transferring parental rights to guardians.

Officers employed for Out-Door Relief.

231. Now will you give us some account of the duties of the officers employed for the purposes of out-door relief; take first the case of the district medical officer?—Taking first the case of the district medical officer, I note that the Poor Law Commissioners seem to have considered that medical relief was rather the outcome of practice than a creation of the law. But however this may have been; their earliest orders made provision on the subject, and those orders contain the germs of some of the regulations which apply at the present day to this matter. With regard to the duties of the district medical officer, it is to be noted that the General Consolidated Order contains regulations which are applicable to every medical officer appointed by the guardians, and supplements these by codes of duties specially appropriate to the distinctive classes, "district medical officer" and "workhouse medical officer." The common duties are prescribed by Article 205, and are in substance these: To give the guardians reasonable information respecting cases under his care; to make written reports on prevalent sickness; to attend meetings when requested; to give certificates as to proposed apprentices; to give certificates of the cause of attendance in individual cases; to use in his books the technology of the registrar general; and to distinguish visits paid by an assistant from his own. The duties of a district medical officer so far as they depend upon the General Consolidated Orders are defined by Article 206 and are as follows: (1) To attend duly and punctually upon all poor persons requiring medical attendance within the district of the union assigned to him, and, according to his agreement, to supply the requisite medicines to such persons whenever he may be lawfully required to furnish such attendance or medicines by a written or printed order of the guardians or of a relieving officer of the Union or of an overseer; (2) on the exhibition to him of a ticket according to Article 76 (that is, the ticket issued by the guardians in the cases of aged and infirm persons, and persons permanently sick or disabled) and on application made on behalf of the party to whom such ticket was given, to afford such medical attendance and medicines as he would be bound to supply if he had received in each case an order from the guardians to afford such attendance and medicines; (3) to inform the relieving officer of any poor person whom he may attend without an order; and (4) to make a return to the guardians at each ordinary meeting, and to insert therein the date of every attendance, and the other particulars required . . . Provided, however, that the medical officer may, with the consent of the guardians, but not otherwise, make the entries . . . on detached sheets of paper . . . and cause the same to be laid before the guardians at every ordinary meeting.

Duties of District Medical Officer.

Duties of Relieving Officer.

232. Now will you state the duties of the relieving officer?—The General Consolidated Order in Article 215 prescribes the duties of the relieving officer in the following terms: (1) To attend all ordinary meetings of the guardians, and to attend all other meetings when summoned by the clerk. (2) To receive all applications for relief made to him within his district, or relating to any parish situated within his district, and forthwith to examine into the circumstances of every case by visiting the house of the applicant (if situated within his district) and by making all necessary inquiries into the state of health, the ability to work, the condition and family, and the means of such applicant, and to report the result of such inquiries in the prescribed form to the guardians at their next ordinary meeting; and also to visit, from time to time, as requisite, all paupers receiving relief and to report concerning the same as the guardians may direct. (3) In any case of sickness or accident requiring relief by medical attendance, to procure such attendance by giving an order on the district medical officer. . . or by such other means as the urgency of the case may require. (4) To ascertain from time to time from the district medical officer, the names of any poor persons whom such medical officer may have attended or supplied with medicines without having received an order from himself to that effect. (5) In every case of a poor person receiving medical relief, as soon as may be, and from time to time afterwards, to visit the house of such person, and until the next ordinary meeting of the guardians to supply such relief (not being in money) as the case on his own view, or on the certificate of the district medical officer, may seem to require. (6) In every case of sudden or urgent necessity to afford such relief to the destitute person as may be requisite, either by giving such person an order of admission into the workhouse, and conveying him thereto if necessary, or by affording him relief out of the workhouse, provided that the same be not given in money, whether such destitute person be settled in any parish comprised in the Union or not. (7) To report to the guardians at their next ordinary meeting all cases reported to him by an overseer . . . and to obey the directions of the guardians with reference to the relief administered in such cases. (8) To perform the duties with respect to pauper apprentices prescribed by Articles 60, 61, and 62 of the General Consolidated Order; the duties being to examine into the fitness of a proposed binding, and to take the child for examination by the district medical officer. (9) To give all reasonable aid and assistance, at the request of any other relieving officer of the Union, by examining into the case of any applicant for relief, or administering relief to any pauper whose name has been entered on the books of such other relieving officer and who may be within his own district. (10) Duly and punctually to supply the weekly allowances of all paupers belonging to his district, or being within the same, and to pay or administer the relief of all paupers within his district to the amount, and in the manner in which he may have been lawfully ordered by the guardians to pay or administer the same. (11) To visit, relieve, and otherwise attend to non-settled poor being within his district, according to the directions of the guardians, whose officer he is, and in no other way, subject always to the obligation imposed on him in cases of sudden and urgent necessity. (12) To set apart one or more pages in his out-door relief list, in which he shall duly and punctually enter up the payments made by authority of his own board of guardians to non-settled poor, and to take credit for such payments in his receipt and expenditure book. (13) To present his weekly accounts to the clerk for his inspection and authentication before every ordinary meeting of the guardians and to the guardians at such meeting for their approval. (14) To submit to the auditor of the union all his books, accounts, and vouchers, at the place of audit, and at such time and in such manner as may be required by the regulations. (16) To observe and execute all lawful orders and directions of the guardians applicable to his office.

Duties of Superintendeat of Out-Door Labour.

233. Next we come to the superintendent of out-door labour; what are his functions?—A superintendent of out-door labour is to superintend any able-bodied paupers not inmates of the workhouse, who may be set to work by the guardians, to take care that they perform the work respectively assigned to them, and to report truly to the guardians respecting the performance of the work.

Duties of District Nurse.

234. Now we come to the district nurse; what are her duties?—A district nurse has under a general order of the 27th of January, 1892, the following duties, that is to say: (1) To attend duly and punctually as a nurse upon any poor person or persons in receipt of medical relief when directed by the guardians, or upon receipt of a written or printed order from any relieving officer in any case in which such officer may be authorised by regulations to be prescribed by the guardians to give such order. (2) To obey any directions of the district medical officer in attendance upon any poor person in regard to the nursing and treatment of such person. (3) To keep a record in such form and containing such particulars as may be prescribed by the guardians in regard to cases which she attends. (4) To perform such other duties in relation to her office as the guardians may from time to time direct. No district nurse is to undertake the duties of a mid-wife.

Duties of Overseers.

235. Now will you describe the duties of the overseers?—With regard to overseers, whose duties in the administration of relief are statutory, a General Order of the 22nd of April, 1842, contains the following provisions:—(Article 1.) If any overseer of the poor of any parish shall, in any case of sudden and urgent necessity, have given temporary relief to any poor person in articles of necessity; or in any case of sudden and dangerous illness, shall have given an order for medical relief, the said overseer shall forthwith report such case in writing to the relieving officer of the district or to the board of guardians of the union, and the amount of such relief or the fact of having made such order. (Article 2.) If any overseer of the poor of the parish receive an order under the hands and seal of two justices according to the provisions of the said Act (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, Sec. 27) directing relief to be given to any aged or infirm person, without such person being required to reside in any workhouse, he shall forthwith transmit the same to the relieving officer of the district to be laid before the guardians at their next meeting, that they may be enabled without delay to give to the relieving officer the necessary directions as to the nature and amount of relief to be given. (Article 3.) If any overseer receive an order for medical relief from any justice in case of sudden and dangerous illness, he shall, as soon as may be after complying with such order, report the fact of his having received the same, and the manner in which he has complied with it, in writing to the relieving officer of the district or to the board of guardians of the union.

236. That finishes, I think, all you have to say about the staff of officers connected with out-door relief; and now we come to the subject of the boarding-out of children. That, I understand, is a form of out-door relief; will you please describe it?—Under the head "Out-Door Relief" it may be desirable to advert to the system of relief in the form of placing pauper children in homes belonging to persons who undertake to act as foster-parents. This system is controlled by orders of the Local Government Board, and the orders are made under the general powers derived from Section 15 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834. The titles of the orders are the Boarding of Children in Unions Order, 1889, and in succession to another order of 1889, the recently issued Boarding-out Order, 1905. Each order contemplates the working of the scheme through the medium of a committee who will undertake to find and superintend homes for pauper children. Such account as it seems to be necessary to give of the details of the system may be most conveniently taken from the latest form of order, namely, that of 1905. The foster-parent who receives a child under the orders is required to give an undertaking that in consideration of a weekly sum he will bring up the child as one of his own children, provide the child with proper food, lodging, and washing, endeavour to train the child in habits of truthfulness, obedience, personal cleanliness, and industry, take care that the child attends church or chapel and school, provide for repair and renewal of the child's clothing, report the child's illness, and permit the child to be visited and the home to be inspected. The undertaking of the foster-parent must also contain an engagement on the part of the foster-parent that he will on the demand of a person duly authorised in writing by the Boarding-out Committee or by the guardians give up possession of the child. A system of which the main features have thus been very briefly indicated necessarily requires somewhat elaborate arrangements for working it.

237. (Mr. Loch.) What is the particular advance that has been made in the 1905 order?—I think it has been mainly in the correction of minor details, one might say. I do not recall any great departure in principle.

238. (Mr. Bentham.) Are not adopted children included under that?—The authority for adoption is derived not from the Order but from the two Poor Law Acts of 1889 and 1899.

239. But under the recent order is not power given to board out adopted children—a power which was not previously given?—I cannot say that I carry all the details in my memory; that very likely is so.

240. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) May I ask if you may not board out where the parents are morally bad but have not been convicted of crime?—The suggestion is that the case is included.

Powers of Guardian relation t Children.

241. (Chairman.) There are certain powers that boards of guardians have over these children; are there any legal points connected with these powers to which you would like to call our attention?—I would take the opportunity of drawing attention at this stage to a difficulty which arises out of the uncertainty of the guardians' powers over children whom they relieve. The matter may be mentioned now somewhat appropriately because the only judicial decision which throws any light at all on this subject arose out of proceedings before the High Court against a foster-parent. The Poor Law Commissioners at one time took the view that the guardians had over orphan children or children deserted by their parents the same control which a guardian has over his ward; but the only judicial authority which approximated to a recognition of this theory was perhaps the deduction to be drawn from what the Court of Queen's Bench said in The Queen v. Anon.) (15 Queen's Bench, 1060.) There a child of six was found wandering. The child appeared to be destitute and to have been assaulted and very ill-used. The child was received into the workhouse, and the guardians afterwards undertook the prosecution of the offender. Undoubtedly the Court said that in the circumstances the guardians were in loco parentis, and that as guardians they were bound to protect a destitute child. But something more than this was obviously necessary to supersede an opinion given to the Commissioners in 1840 by the Law Officers who advised that the guardians could not lawfully detain orphans or other children deprived of parental care, unless the children consented. It appeared at one time that as the result of procedure under the Boarding of Children in Unions Order, 1889, there was a likelihood of obtaining a definite exposition by the High Court of the scope of the guardians' authority.

242. Can you give any particulars of the case which came before the High Court, to which you are referring?—The case to which I refer is that of the Queen v. Dunhill or Durmill, re Tate. It has not been fully reported; but an account of it appears in the Times of the 24th of April and the 31st of May, 1899. According to that account, the question sought to be raised was whether the guardians have the rights of a testamentary guardian over a child under fourteen who had been placed in a home with a foster-parent. A female child, then seven and a-half years old, had been placed in a home belonging to the defendant. He was the uncle of the child's deceased mother, but the child was illegitimate. The defendant, by his agreement with the guardians, had undertaken to give up the child upon demand to any person duly authorised to receive her. The child remained with the defendant until she was thirteen. The guardians then procured a situation for her and required the defendant to deliver her up. The defendant refused to do so. The guardians obtained a writ of habeas corpus and moved to attach the defendant for disobedience. The official solicitor had reported to the Queen's Bench Division on the case, and when the case came before Mr. Justice Grantham and Mr. Justice Kennedy, they thought that the circumstances, including the age of the defendant (84) were such as to make it desirable that some arrangement should be arrived at. No arrangement, however, was made and the case came again before the Divisional Court, which consisted on that occasion of Mr. Justice Day and Mr. Justice Lawrence. The court then made the rule absolute for an attachment; but the want of a full report makes it unsafe to draw any definite conclusion from this result.

243. But what is your inference from that case?—So far as deduction is permissible, it would seem that the guardians are in a position to assert the right to custody against an unauthorised person. It may be questioned whether as against the child their rights extend further than the law officers of 1840 thought. At the same time it may be pointed out that under the Poor Law Act, 1899, the guardians may clothe themselves with parental rights in certain circumstances. Thus where a child is maintained by the guardians of a poor law union, and (i.) The child has been deserted by its parent; or (ii). The guardians are of opinion that by reason of mental deficiency or of vicious habits or mode of life, a parent of the child is unfit to have the control of it; or (iii.) A parent is unable to perform his or her parental duties by reason of being under sentence of penal servitude or of being detained under the Inebriates Act, 1898; or (iv.) a parent of the child has been sentenced to imprisonment in respect of any offence against any of his or her children; or (v.) a parent of the child is permanently bedridden or disabled and is the inmate of a workhouse, and consents to the resolution hereinafter mentioned; or (vi.) both the parents, or in the case of an illegitimate child the mother of the child are or is dead; the guardians may at any time resolve that until the child reaches the age of eighteen years all the rights and powers of such parent as aforesaid, or, if both parents are dead, of the parents in respect of the child shall, subject as in the Act mentioned, vest in the guardians, and thereupon those rights and powers shall so vest accordingly, and shall continue so vested whether the child does or does not continue to be maintained by the guardians. The measure of control to be obtained under this enactment is probably as great as the circumstances require; for Section 2 affords a fairly clear indication that the control is intended to be effective even against the will of the child. That section subjects, on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding £20 any person who (a) knowingly assists directly or indirectly a child who has been placed under the control of the guardians to leave, without the consent of the guardians, the place where the child is under that control; or (b) knowingly induces, directly or indirectly, any such child to leave that place; or (c) knowingly harbours or conceals a child who has so left that place or prevents him from returning to that place. A child is to be deemed to be maintained by the guardians if it is wholly or partly maintained by them in a workhouse, or in any district school, separate school, separate infirmary, sick asylum, hospital for infectious diseases, institutions for the deaf, dumb, blind or idiots, or any certified school, or is boarded out by the guardians whether within or without the limits of the union (Poor Law Act, 1889, Sec. 1, Sub-Sec. 3).

244. I gather that in your judgment you do not think the law requires strengthening or rather defining on these points?—Of course, after all, that is a somewhat special class of children. It would only include the children who would come within those two Acts, or what is left of Sec. 1 of the Poor Law Act of 1889 and the Poor Law Act of 1899; but there are other children over whom the guardians might have control and as to whom the law is, I think, in a state of uncertainty. We have had instances of the sort—instances for example where the guardians have endeavoured to find a place of service for children and they have been met point blank by a refusal on the part of the boys or the girls to go to the place. Then there are other cases where the children have run away from the workhouse or have taken an opportunity of getting away.

245. Then you would say that the law is not as clear as you think it should be?—I do not think the law is as clear as it might be.

246. Now we come to a recent Order which the Local Government Board has issued, namely, the Relief (School Children) Order, 1905; I think you have something to say to us upon that?—I may as well draw attention to this Order respecting relief which will include, and perhaps mainly consist of out-door relief to school children. The Order was issued on the 26th of April last and was intended to deal with the cases of children who, while attending public elementary schools, are without adequate nourishment. To meet such cases the Order contemplates that an application (called in the Order a "special application") may be made to the guardians or to a relieving officer by the managers, or by an authorised teacher of a public elementary school, or by an authorised officer of the local education authority; the object of the special application being relief to a child attending the school. Where a special application is made to the guardians, and the case is not one of sudden and urgent necessity, the guardians under Article 2 must take steps to ascertain whether relief to the child is or is not rendered necessary by the habitual neglect of the father to provide adequate food for the child. If the guardians are satisfied that the case is one of habitual neglect, the relief is to be given or considered as given by way of loan. If the guardians are not so satisfied it is left to them to determine whether the relief is to be given or to be considered as given by way of loan. Provision is made for a notification to the father of the fact that relief will be given or will be considered as given by way of loan. Relief may not be allowed for more than a month without a fresh application. Articles 3 and 4 relate to cases of sudden and urgent necessity. If relief is given by the guardians or by the relieving officer on his own responsibility in cases of this kind, the notification to the parent that the relief is on loan must be made when the guardians order the relief, or when the relieving officer gives it, or in either case as soon as possible after the relief is given. Article 5. provides that where the relief will be given, is given, or will be considered as given by way of loan, the able-bodied father is not to be required under the orders and regulations in force in the union to be relieved only in the workhouse or to be set to work by the guardians. But, under Article 6 the guardians are to take proceedings for the recovery of the relief, except where they report the circumstances and the Local Government Board approve of the guardians abstaining. Article 7 is framed so as to show that the Order is not intended to apply to a child who is blind or deaf and dumb or to any other relative than the father. Secs. 56 and 58 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, make these restrictions necessary. Also the child must reside with the father, and the father must not be in receipt of relief other than relief given in accordance with the Order. Article 8 gives the short title of the Order, namely, The Relief (School Children) Order, 1905.

Points arising out of Relief (School Children) Order, 1905.

247. Is not the general purport of this Order rather to relax the principle that relief given to a child is attached to the parent?—No, I do not think it relaxes any legal principle. The main feature in the Order is to put on a regular footing applications which might otherwise have been made without system. The Board and their predecessors have always held that an application for relief may be made practically by any one cognisant of the facts. The object of the Order rather was to say that persons of a certain class who might be cognisant of the circumstances necessitating relief to a child of this particular class, should be, as it were, under such regulations as the order contemplated; and that the procedure of the applicants should be followed by the consequences mentioned in the order.

248. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) I do not quite follow how it is that relief given to a child who is a dependant does not pauperise the parent?—I do not think we do anything there in violation of that principle. We rather recognise the principle in its full force, that is to say, we deal with the child only as to whom under the particular sections of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, it is said that relief to the child shall be relief to the parent; and that is why we except the case of the blind and so on.

249. (Miss Hill.) Is the father disfranchised for such relief?—That is a moot point. I do not think the Board have ever made a pronouncement on the subject, and I do not know that we have ever actually arrived at a conclusion. There is a great deal of law—law which perhaps might be called somewhat uncertain—arising out of those particular sections of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834.

250. (Mr. Loch.) But the general purport of the sections in the Act of 1834 would be to disfranchise or to affect the father if the child received relief?—Yes, it would undoubtedly affect the father.

251. (Chairman.) I understand your contention is that this Order only regularised certain spasmodic applications that were made, and that it is not intended to extend, and you do not believe that it does extend, outdoor relief, or to exempt a parent from the disqualification which he suffers if his child is relieved?—That would be the conclusion that I personally should maintain; but of course there are difficulties which arise out of the present state of the law, as well as those which arise out of decisions on these particular sections of the Poor Law Act.

252. This order has only recently come into operation, so that there has been no test case upon anything that has occurred yet in connection with it, I presume?—I am not aware of any.

253. (Mr. Loch.) It says that a parent who neglects may get relief on loan for his child; what is the definition of "neglect" there?—I think that the expression "habitual neglect," as used in the order, was intended to include such neglect as is within the contemplation of the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1904.

254. That is your interpretation of it?—Yes. I think that the expression would include neglect of that magnitude, if one might call it so.

Out-Door Relief to members of Friendly Societies.

255. (Chairman.) We have finished the subject of relief to school children; the next matter that you would like to give evidence upon is, I think, the relief to members of friendly societies?—Yes. Where paupers who are members of friendly societies are applicants for outdoor relief their cases will now be subject to the operation of the Out-door Relief Friendly Societies Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vic., c. 25), and the Out-door Relief (Friendly Societies) Act, 1904 (4 Edw. VII., c. 32). The effect of these enactments is that the guardians may grant relief out of the poor rates to any person otherwise entitled, notwithstanding that the person is, by reason of his membership of a friendly society, in receipt of any sum. In estimating the amount of the relief, it is discretionary with the guardians whether they will or will not take into consideration the amount received from the friendly society. But this exercise of discretion is subject to the limitation that the guardians are not to take into consideration any sum received from a friendly society as sick pay, except in so far as the sum exceeds 5s. a week.

256. I understand there are various forms of out-door relief which are the subject of express enactment; could you give us the references?—Assistance to be afforded out of the workhouse at the cost of the rates is the subject of many enactments of later date than the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834. An early example is afforded by the Poor Relief Act, 1849. That Act was designed to provide a more effectual regulation and control over the maintenance of poor persons in houses not being the workhouses of any union or parish. The establishments are those in which the poor are lodged and maintained under contracts. The Local Government Board by Sec. 1 are, from time to time, as they shall see occasion, to make and issue all such rules, orders and regulations for the management and government of any such establishment, or for the education of any poor children therein in like manner and to the same extent as they are empowered to do in the case of a workhouse. The rules, orders and regulations may be directed to any person being or acting as the proprietor, manager, or superintendent or as officer or assistant (Sec. 3). The Local Government Board may prohibit by order the reception or retention of any poor person or class of poor persons in any such establishment. They may by order remove any officer, servant or assistant. They may regulate contracts and may appoint an inspector (Secs. 4-7). Power is also given to justices to visit (Sec. 8). The Act does not apply to county lunatic asylums, registered hospitals, or licensed houses for lunatics, nor to hospitals, infirmaries, schools, or other institutions supported by public subscriptions and maintained for purposes of charity only (Sec. 2).

Enactment as to maintenance of defective paupers in special institutions.

257. There is power to send paupers to special institutions, is there not?—By Section 21 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1867, the guardians are empowered to provide for the reception, maintenance, and instruction of any adult pauper being blind, or deaf and dumb, in a hospital or institution established for the reception of persons suffering under such infirmities. They may pay the charges incurred in the conveyance of the pauper to and from the hospital, as well as those incurred in his maintenance, support and instruction. The Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868, by Section 13 enables the guardians, with the consent of the Local Government Board, to send an idiotic pauper to an asylum or establishment for the reception and relief of idiots maintained at the charge of the county rate or by public subscriptions.

Poor Law certified schools.

258. Can you now state the effect of the provisions with respect to certified schools?—It may be well to notice here somewhat briefly the powers which the guardians possess for educational purposes. Attention has already been drawn to the provisions applicable to district schools. Mention has here to be made of other facilities of which the guardians may avail themselves. Under the Poor Law (Certified Schools) Act, 1862, as enlarged by later enactments, the guardians may send any poor child, whether legitimate or illegitimate, to a school certified under the Act and supported wholly or partly by voluntary subscriptions, if the managers are willing to receive the child. Schools of this type are certified by the Local Government Board on the application of the managers and after an examination and report. The certificate may be withdrawn if the Local Government Board are dissatisfied with the condition or management of the school (Sec. 2). The school must be open to the visitation and inspection of any inspector of the Local Government Board and also of a member deputed by the guardians who have sent a child to the school (Sec. 4). A child who may be sent to a certified school must be an orphan or a deserted child or a child one of whose parents or surviving parent consents (Sec. 6). In the case of an illegitimate child the consent of the mother, if she has the care, custody or possession of the child, will be sufficient (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868, Sec. 23). In such cases, the guardians may pay the expenses incurred in the maintenance, clothing and education of the child (Sec. 1), and the outlay must not exceed such rate of payment as may be sanctioned by the Local Government Board (Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1882, Sec. 13). The guardians may also pay the cost of the conveyance of the child to and from the school and, in case of death, the expenses of burial (Poor Law (Certified Schools) Act, 1862, Sec. 1). If the parent, step-parent, nearest adult relative or, failing these, the god-parent of a child not belonging to the Established Church but relieved in a workhouse or a district school makes application to the Local Government Board, they may order the child to be sent to a certified school of the religion to which the child is proved to belong (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1866, Sec. 14). The Board may make the like order in the case of a deserted child or an orphan without any such application (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868, Sec. 23.) If the Local Government Board are of opinion that any person is aggrieved by any child being sent to or kept at a certified school, they may order the child to be removed (Poor Law (Certified Schools) Act, 1862, Sec. 3). "The guardians may at any time at their discretion and shall upon the requisition of the managers of the school or upon the withdrawal of the certificate . . . cause any such child to be removed from any such school and brought back to their parish or union" (Poor Law (Certified Schools) Act, 1862, Sec. 5). The guardians may not keep a child in a school against the will of the child if above fourteen, or against the will of the parents or surviving parent, whatever be the age of the child (Poor Law (Certified Schools) Act, 1862, Sec. 7). A child must not be sent to a school conducted on the principles of a religious denomination to which the child does not belong (Poor Law (Certified Schools) Act, 1862, Sec. 9). The expression "school" as used in the enactments summarised above extends to any institution established for the instruction of blind, deaf, dumb, lame, deformed or idiotic persons, but does not apply to a certified reformatory school (Poor Law (Certified Schools) Act, 1862, Sec. 10); and by Sec. 13 of the Elementary Education (Blind and Deaf Children) Act, 1893, the powers of the guardians for sending blind or deaf children to school are limited to the cases of children who are (a) idiots or imbeciles; (b) resident in a workhouse, or in an institution to which they have been sent by a board of guardians from a workhouse; or (c) boarded out by guardians. "Blind" for the purposes of the Act of 1893 means too blind to be able to read the ordinary school books used by children; and "Deaf" means too deaf to be taught in a class of hearing children in an elementary school. Other powers with regard to certain deaf or dumb, blind, defective or epileptic children, I do not describe in detail for the reasons given at the beginning of my evidence.

ints sing out of ctments ating to or Law tified ools.

259. What is the meaning of certified schools in this connection?—Schools which are certified by the Local Government Board.

260. For the reception of defective children?—For the reception of Poor Law children. They are schools which were originally founded for the care of particular classes who may be described as defective.

261. What is the special meaning of the term under this head?—"School" according to the definition extends to any institution established for the instruction of blind deaf, dumb, lame, deformed, or idiotic persons.

262. Assuming that the child is not defective, would any school which complies with the conditions laid down by the Board of Education and is part of the supply of the locality come under the head of a certified school?—No. These are schools specially certified by the Local Government Board. Those other schools would be public elementary schools or schools of a special class under Acts which I did not notice, because they are rather outside the scope of my evidence.

263. (Mr. Loch.) Are there conditions of certification which are set forth in any paper of the board?—Not in any paper, but they are in the Statute. The schools must be such as will satisfy the Board as to the management, that is, they must be well conducted and well managed.

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

9 Jan. 1906.

264. Those are the conditions, put in broad terms?—Yes. I think I have quoted the Act. They are schools supported wholly or partly by voluntary subscriptions. One can gather what the requirements that must be satisfied will be, because the certificate may be withdrawn if the Local Government Board are dissatisfied with the condition or management of the school.

265. It depends on the negative?—Sec. 2 reads, "The Poor Law Board," now the Local Government Board, "may, if they think fit, upon the application in writing of the managers of any such school as aforesaid appoint such person as they shall deem proper to examine into the condition of the school, and to report to the said Board thereon, and, if satisfied with such report, that board may, by writing under the hand of one of their secretaries, certify that such school is fitted for the reception of such children or persons as may be sent there by the guardians."

266. (Sir Henry Robinson.) Are they day schools?—No.

267. They are all boarding schools then?—Certainly, as far as I remember.

Subscriptions to hospitals.

268. (Chairman.) Now we come to the question of subscriptions; there is power to subscribe to hospitals, I understand?—Among powers which may be classified under the head of out-door relief are those given by the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1851, with regard to subscriptions to hospitals. Section 4 of that Act enables the guardians, with the consent of the Local Government Board, to pay out of the funds of the guardians an annual subscription towards the support and maintenance of a public hospital or infirmary for the reception of sick, diseased, disabled or wounded persons, or of persons suffering from any permanent or natural infirmity. The Metropolitan Poor Amendment Act, 1869, Sec. 16, enables the guardians, with the consent and sanction of the Local Government Board, to enter into arrangements with a public general hospital or dispensary within the Poor Law Union to receive and treat paupers on terms to be arranged between the guardians and the authorities of the hospital or dispensary.

Subscriptions to other institutions and associations.

269. The power of subscription has, I think, been extended of late; could you describe what is the present position?—Section 10 of the Poor Law Act, 1879, enlarges the guardians' powers of subscription, so that the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1851, Sec. 4, is to extend to authorise the guardians, with the consent of the Local Government Board, to subscribe towards an asylum or institution for blind persons, deaf and dumb persons, or for persons suffering from any permanent or natural infirmity, or towards any association or society for aiding those persons, or for providing nurses, or for aiding girls or boys in service, or towards any other asylum or institution which appears to the guardians, with such consent as aforesaid, to be calculated to render useful aid in the administration of the relief of the poor. But a subscription to an asylum or institution will not be authorised unless the Local Government Board are satisfied that the paupers under the guardians have or could have assistance therein, in case of necessity. The guardians may also, with the consent of the Local Government Board, subscribe to any association or society for the prevention of cruelty to children (Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1904, Sec. 26).

Enactments as to provision of dispensaries in London.

270. In London there are, I understand, special provisions with regard to the arrangements for out-door medical relief; could you state those?—Under the head of medical out-door relief, special arrangements are authorised for London by the Metropolitan Poor Acts. Section 38 of the Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867, empowers the Local Government Board by order to direct the guardians of a poor law union to provide a dispensary, and for that purpose to purchase or hire, or to build and to fit up and furnish, a building of such nature and size, and according to such plan and in such manner as the Board, think fit. As an alternative, the guardians may be directed to set apart, adapt, fit up and furnish a portion of the workhouse. Where the Local Government Board so direct, the guardians may borrow for the purpose (Sec. 38).

271. What other enactments do you wish to speak on with regard to dispensaries and their management ?—Where the guardians provide a dispensary, places at which the medical officers may see the sick poor are also to be provided by the guardians according to the direction of the Local Government Board (Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867, Secs. 39–42). If the guardians provide a dispensary under any other Act than the Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867, they shall, if required by the Local Government Board, provide a proper room at the dispensary so that the sick may be seen there by the district medical officer; and the district medical officer personally or by his authorised substitute must attend during the times fixed for the purpose by the guardians with the approval of the Local Government Board (Metropolitan Poor Amendment Act, 1869, Sec. 13). Originally by Sec. 39 of the Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867, the guardians were required to elect a Dispensary Committee. But by Sec. 12 of the Metropolitan Poor Amendment Act, 1869, it is enacted that where the guardians provide a dispensary it shall not be necessary that a Dispensary Committee shall be appointed for the dispensary unless, on the application of the guardians, the Local Government Board issue an order for that purpose. A proper place for meetings of the Dispensary Committee is to be provided by the guardians (Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867, Sec. 42). The Dispensary Committee are to appoint dispensers of medicine and other officers and servants, and the duties, qualifications, number, and salaries are to be such as the Local Government Board approve or direct. The guardians, on the requisition of the Dispensary Committee, are to provide proper medicines and appliances and requisites for the sick. These are to be dispensed on the prescription of the district medical officer, subject to the regulations of the Local Government Board (Sec. 44). The district medical officers were originally to be appointed by the Dispensary Committee. But there was a saving in the Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867, for persons who were in office when the Dispensary Committee entered on their duties, though the Central Authority might vary districts, salaries, and contracts (Secs. 45 and 46). Since the passing of the Metropolitan Poor Amendment Act, 1869, the arrangements with regard to metropolitan dispensaries have been regulated by an order of the 22nd of April, 1871, and subsequent orders on the same model. The order of 1871 provides for the appointment of Dispensary Visiting Committees by the guardians, who are also to appoint one or more of their district medical officers to the dispensary. The duties of the Committee, of the medical officers, of the relieving officers, and of the dispensers are defined by the order. Lastly, it may be pointed out that if the guardians, after being required by the Local Government Board to provide a dispensary, neglect or refuse to comply with the requisition, they will receive no repayment from the Metropolitan Common Fund in respect of medicine, medical or surgical appliances, or salaries of the medical officers until the guardians provide a dispensary (Metropolitan Poor Amendment Act, 1869, Sec. 14).

272. (Mr. Booth.) That applies only to the metropolis, I understand ?—Only to the metropolis.

Apprenticeship.

273. (Chairman.) Can you give an account of the guardians' powers as to apprenticeship ?—Formerly the statutory provisions which began with the 43 Elizabeth c. 2, Sec. 3, involved a system of compulsory assignment of children to inhabitant occupiers. But Sec. 13 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, repealed so much of the Poor Relief Act, 1601, of the 8 & 9 William III. c. 30, or of any other Act as compelled any person to receive any poor child as an apprentice. And by Sec. 12 of the Act of 1844 the power of the overseers to bind was taken away and was vested in the guardians upon whom the section conferred the needful authority to execute the indentures, with the addition that indentures so executed should not need to be allowed, assented to, or executed by a justice. Binding to the sea service was excepted from the operation of this enactment, and the Central Authority were empowered by order to prescribe the duties of the masters to whom poor children may be apprenticed and the terms and conditions to be inserted in the indentures; while every master wilfully refusing or neglecting to perform any such terms or conditions was made liable on conviction to a penalty not exceeding £20 (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, Sec. 12). The apprenticing of the children of poor persons is also a subject as to which the Central Authority are enabled to make rules, orders, and regulations under Sec. 15 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834. The regulations applicable to apprenticeship by the guardians are contained in the General Consolidated Order of the Poor Law Commissioners, dated the 24th of July, 1847, and amended in this particular by an order of the Local Government Board of the 15th of February, 1898. The Local Government Board may assent to departure from the regulations in particular cases but, subject to this condition, the regulations provide very fully for the varying circumstances of apprenticeship under the guardians. Some of the principal requirements may be enumerated. No child under nine, and no child (other than a deaf and dumb child) who cannot read and write his own name, can be bound (General Consolidated Order, Article 52). No child is to be bound to a person who is not a housekeeper, or assessed to the poor rate in his own name, or who is a journeyman, a minor, or a married woman (Article 53). No premium other than clothing is to be given on the binding of a person above sixteen, unless he be maimed, deformed, or suffering from some permanent bodily infirmity (Article 55). An apprentice is not to be bound for more than eight years (Article 56). A person above fourteen is not to be bound without his consent. A child under sixteen is not to be bound without the consent of the father, or if he be dead or disqualified or the child be a bastard, without the consent of the mother, unless she be disqualified (Article 57). Except where the Central Authority on application otherwise permit, the place of apprenticeship must not be more than thirty miles from the place of the child's residence (Article 58). Various requirements are prescribed as preliminaries to the binding. These include medical certificates, examination into the circumstances of the case, and in some instances communication with other guardians (Articles 59 to 66). Provision is then made with respect to the indentures (Articles 67–69), and the duties of the master are set out in much detail. Instruction, food, lodging, clothing, medical assistance, opportunities of attending places of worship and of religious instruction, wages after the age of seventeen, production of the apprentice, etc., are among the requisites which the master is bound to afford (Articles 70–74).

Effect of General Consolidated Order.

274. What have you to say about apprenticeship to the sea service and to sea fishing ?—Apprenticeship to the sea service, and to the sea fishing service, is the subject of regulation by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (Secs. 105–109; 392–398). Pauper apprenticeships to the sea service are to be made in the same manner and subject to the same laws as other apprenticeships made by guardians. There must, however, be an attestation of the indenture by two justices (Sec 107). Apprentice ships of pauper boys to the sea fishing service are to be made by guardians only in conformity with the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (Sec. 393). Indentures in the case of boys under sixteen are to be made before superintendents under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (Sec 395). On the 2nd of March, 1895, the Local Government Board addressed to the several boards of guardians a circular forwarding a revised form of apprenticeship indenture and endorsements which had been issued by the Board of Trade. The Local Government Board at the same time drew the attention of the guardians to certain points in the form of indentures and to various recommendations. These related to medical examination, the arrangements for the apprentice's reception, reports of grave misconduct, holidays, instruction in cookery, and other subjects.

Apprenticeship to sea service and sea fishing.

275. Will you now state the effect of some of the provisions for the protection of apprentices and servants ?—Guardians on a certificate of two justices under the Offences Against the Person Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vic. c. 100), may be required to conduct and pay the costs of the prosecution for offences by masters against apprentices or servants (Secs 26 and 76). The Poor Law (Apprentices, &c.) Act, 1851 (14 & 15 Vic. c. 11), requires the guardians to register every young person under sixteen who is hired or taken as a servant from the workhouse (Sec 3). Young persons so hired or taken as servants or bound as apprentices by the guardians are, while under six een and known to be in the service into which the young person went from the workhouse or on apprenticeship within the Poor Law union or within five miles of any part of the Poor Law union, to be visited twice a year by a relieving officer or other authorised officer, who is to report to the guardians whether he has found reason to believe that the young person is not supplied with necessary food, or is subjected to cruel or illegal treatment in any respect (Sec 4). Where the residence of the master or mistress is more than five miles from the Poor Law union, the guardians are to send a notice of the hiring or binding, with the name and age of the apprentice or servant and the name, description, and residence of the master and mistress to the guardians of the Poor Law union comprising the residence. The latter guardians are thereupon to cause the particulars to be registered and the young person to be visited as frequently, and in the same manner in all respects, as if the young person had been hired or taken or bound from their own workhouse (Sec. 5).

276. Have there been any prosecutions under these clauses by the Local Government Board against masters ?—The prosecutions would be by the board of guardians. I do not recall any specially. The legislation arose out of some serious cases of maltreatment of apprentices or of young servants.

277. (Mr. Loch.) In this case the guardians other than the board directly interested in the case can visit the apprentice, can they not ?—That is so, if the child is within the union.

278. It is rather an exceptional provision, is it not, by which another board of guardians can intervene ?—Although the apprentices may have been sent from the workhouse of one union, the guardians of another union in which the apprentice actually is shou'd visit where the residence of the master is more than five miles from the first union.

tance to dates oyal

279. (Chairman.) What are the guardians' powers to help candidates for the Royal Navy ?—By Sec. 28 of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876, it is provided that if any boy, not already an apprentice in the Merchant Service who or whose parent or parents shall be receiving relief in any union or parish, be desirous of serving in the Naval Service of His Majesty, and be forwarded for approval by competent authority for that service, the guardians may enable any such boy to be so forwarded, and may pay out of their funds the sum required by the regulations of the service for providing outfit or otherwise, and the necessary expenses of the conveyance of the boy in charge of a proper person to and from the port, or place in the United Kingdom at which he may be required to attend for examination, and, if accepted, for entry into the Naval Service.

280. Outfits may be provided by the guardians in certain cases, I understand ?—Provision is made by a General Order of the Local Government Board of the 10th of July, 1897, for the outfitsof children on going to service. The effect of the Order is to enable the guardians when they deem it expedient to incur a reasonable expenditure in providing an outfit for a child chargeable to the union when the child is sent to service after being boarded out or in other circumstances.

281. Have you anything to tell us about emigration ?—The guardians may, with the order of the Local Government Board, and in conformity with their regulations, procure or assist in procuring the emigration of an irremovable pauper, or of a person who, if relieved, would be chargeable upon the Common Fund of a union or be irremovable from a separate parish (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1848, Sec. 5). By Section 20 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1849, a limit of £10 a head was put upon the possible expenditure of the guardians upon each case of the settled poor. But it is at least questionable whether this limitation which was applicable specially to circumstances of parochial chargeability, extends to the exercise of the powers of the guardians under conditions of union chargeability. With regard to orphan or deserted children under the age of sixteen who are chargeable to a Poor Law union, the guardians are empowered by Section 4 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1850, to procure or assist in procuring emigration with the order and in conformitywith the regulations of the Local Government Board. But no emigration of an orphan or deserted child can take place until the child has consented before the justices and a certificate of their consent has been transmitted to the Local Government Board. Perhaps I should also add a reference to a provision in the Local Government Act 1888 which, though hitherto unused, is not to be regarded as useless. This is the provision in Section 69 of the Act 1888, which enables the county council to borrow on the security of the county fund and of any revenues of the council for a purpose connected with emigration. The purpose is described in the following terms : "For making advances (which they are hereby authorised to make) to any persons or bodies of persons, corporate, or unincorporate, in aid of the emigration or colonisation of inhabitants of the county, with a guarantee for repayment of such advances from any local authority in the county or the Government of any colony." Before quitting this particular subject, I may add a short statement to illustrate a difficulty which recently arose to prevent the adoption of a scheme for training children in a colony. The plan was to acquire agricultural land in the colony, to build farmhouses, and to maintain in them children emigrated from England, and destined, after instruction in farming, to become settlers in the colony. And a feature of the scheme was that the guardians should contribute towards the maintenance of the children in the colony. It was argued that Section 10 of the Poor Law Act 1879 was wide enough to enable the guardians, with the consent of the Board, to subscribe to such an institution. The Board, however, were unable to take this view. But they submitted a case to the law officers, who confirmed the opinion of the Board that the institution did not fall within the terms of Section 10 of the Poor Law Act 1879, and who also said that they were not aware of any other means by which the guardians could legally provide funds for the furtherance of the scheme.

Points arising out of enactments relating to Emigration.

282. (Mr. Loch.) Are there not under the Emigration Acts special rating powers by which a rate could be raised for emigration ?—Nowadays the expenses would be paid out of the common fund of the union.

283. Therefore the power of a special rate for emigration is altogether suspended ?—There was a power to borrow for emigr.tion purposes originally, but all payments nowadays would be made out of the common fund, because all emigration expenses are chargeable upon the common fund of the union.

284. So that the power under which you could in former days have a special rate for emigration purposes, the terms of which are all precisely set out, is a bygone thing ?—Yes, I think so.

285. Formerly there might be a parish meeting and a rate raised specially for emigration purposes ?—Yes.

286. I thought that was valid still ?—I never heard of that procedure being followed if it has any real existence, but I should hardly think it has.

287. One of the questions raised in connection with dealing with the unemployed by emigration was whether that power was still in force ?—I do not think so. It is practically dead.

288. (Mr. Nunn.) Is there any limitation of the amount of rates that may be raised for the purpose ?—There was a limitation of the amount per head. It is doubtful whether that is statutory now. It was originally clearly statutory. Anyhow, it is I think safe to say that, as a limitation, £10 per head would only have force because it might happen to be an administrative rule adopted by a board of guardians.

289. (Mr Loch.) So that the Act might be read without that limitation now ?—It is certainly arguable that there is now nothing to prevent the guardians from going further than £10 per head.

290. The point is of some importance, because that limitation has been quoted as one reason for inaction in regard to this matter ?—Quite so. I do not think that it is strictly applicable.

291. (Sir Henry Robinson.) Is there any statutory limitation under the Local Government Act, 1888, on the borrowing power for the purposes of emigration ?—The same limitation would apply there as to other borrowing powers. The total debt of a county council must not exceed a tenth of the rateable value of the county.

292. (Chairman.) Do I understand aright that a power by which formerly they were able to raise a rate without limitation for emigration purposes has lapsed now that they are combined for a Common Fund ?—I should say practically that it has lapsed and legally also, I think, though it has not been actually taken away by repeal.

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

9 Jan. 1906.

Early scheme of Migration.

293. There was an experiment made I understand by the Poor Law Commissioners to set on foot a scheme of migration; can you give us any account of the experiment?—On reference to the earliest reports of the Poor Law Commissioners, it will be seen that the experiment of migration was tried for a time with success. The Poor Law Commissioners were the medium of communication between manufacturers in the north and labourers in southern parishes which were exceptionally burdened. Two migration agents were employed by the Commissioners. One had charge of the experiment in Lancashire, Chester and Derby, and the other in the West Riding. In July, 1836, each agent reported what had been done in the six months ending on that date. The Lancashire agent stated that 2,673 persons had been provided with employment, and had arrived at their places. For 383 persons negotiations were in progress or journeys had begun. And in the case of 398 persons there had been a refusal to accept the offers of employment. Of the Lancashire agent's total some had been provided with employment in Yorkshire, Staffordshire, Somersetshire, Warwickshire and Westmorland. The other agent reported that employment had been found for 712 persons and that these were in their new locations 102 persons were on their way to places of employment or were the subject of pending negotiations; 344 had refused offers. Travelling arrangements for those who migrated through London were these: The migrants were met in London by a local agent of the Commissioners. This agent conveyed the migrants to the City Basin, Paddington, and saw them aboard a Canal boat for Manchester. The boats left in the evening of every weekday, and the passage to Manchester occupied from four to five days. The cost was 14s. for each person over fourteen years of age, and 7s. for each person under fourteen years of age. A hundredweight of luggage was allowed for each family, and the migrants had to supply their own provisions. Very shortly, however, the system of migration received a check owing to a change in the condition of the labour market. In 1839 the Poor Law Commissioners reported as follows: "The embarrassments in the manufacturing districts, and the extensive commercial depression occasioned by the temporary suspension of the trading intercourse with the United States placed the condition of the manufacturing population during the past year in too perilous a position to render an augmentation of their numbers by home migration expedient or desirable. The families who had previously migrated under our sanction have in a few instances only sustained any inconvenience from these causes. The number who have from any cause returned to their parishes form but an inconsiderable percentage (probably not 5 per cent.) of the whole of the migrants, the far greater proportion of whom have attained circumstances of comparative independence and comfort. Where sickness or other casualties may have rendered relief necessary it has been afforded, and usually at the cost of the parish from whence the migration was effected."

Points arising out of early scheme of Migration.

294. (Mr. Phelps.) What is the date of that?—1839. The depression was the depression in the United States of that year.

295. (Mr. Loch.) Was there any legal obstacle to continuing it?—I do not know precisely what the legal position may have been at that particular time. Nowadays there would be a difficulty in arranging for the relief; it was essentially non-resident relief.

296. (Chairman.) From what fund was the expense defrayed?—It was defrayed out of the poor rate. The Commissioners' expenses I suppose were not considerable; they only included the costs of the two local agents and of the subordinate agent in London, and I suppose they were defrayed out of the Imperial funds. The advances for the boat journey, for provisions and so on were made by the Union from which the migrants started.

297. Then unless the law has been altered it would be still possible I suppose to continue that?—Of course, it is non-resident relief, and non-resident relief it would be, almost of necessity, until these people were established in their employments in the distant location; and that might create a difficulty.

298. (Mr. Loch.) But the legal position as to non-resident relief is not what it was?—It is not what it was then. There are difficulties as regards non-resident relief which have been created since that date. They arise out of a judicial decision upon the General Consolidated Order.

299. (Chairman). This scheme was prior to the General Consolidated Order?—Yes, it was in 1839; it was in the early days.

FINANCE.

The Common Fund of a Poor Law Union.

300. Now I think we have reached the subject of finance; how would you propose to consider that?—The subject has to be considered in relation to (a) the guardians and (b) the various combinations authorised by the Poor Law Acts. The expression "Poor Law Union," as I have elsewhere pointed out, is now used to include a single parish under a separate board of guardians and also a collection of parishes formed into a union under the Poor Law Acts. The case of a Poor Law union constituted under a local Act does not arise for consideration in a statement of the general law. With regard to a parish under a separate board of guardians it is not necessary to say much. In this instance, beyond the fact that the whole outlay is borne by the single parish, there is little to call for special mention as distinguishing the case from that of the union. Practically the explanation which applies to the union will apply to the separate parish with the substitution of the parochial fund for the union fund. In the case of a union, the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, by Section 28 called into existence a common fund to which the several parishes were to contribute and be assessed for certain specified purposes. These purposes were at first limited to workhouse provision, alteration and maintenance, the provision of land, the payment of officers, the providing of utensils and materials for setting the poor on work and any other expense incurred for the common use or benefit. Successive enactments, however, widened the scope of the common fund, and by the Union Chargeabili y Act, 1865, that fund was made chargeable with "all the costs of the relief of the poor and the expenses of the burial of the dead body of any poor person under the direction of the guardians, or any of their officers duly authorised . . ."

Basis of and contribution to Common Fund.

301. Will you describe the basis of, and the method of contribution to the common fund of a union?—Originally the parishes contributed to the common fund on an average of the expenses of each parish for the preceding three years. The Poor Removal Act, 1861, by Section 9 substituted a system of contribution in proportion to the annual rateable value of the lands, tenements, and hereditaments assessable in each parish to the relief of the poor. Since the Union Assessment Committee Act, 1862 came into operation, Section 30 has required the guardians in computing the amount of contribution to the common fund to take the annual rateable value of the property in each parish from the last approved valuation list, with an estimated addition in the case of Government property. In London since the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, the lists formed under that Act are conclusive as to the value on which contributions may be levied (Sec. 45). The charges upon the common fund are distributed by the guardians during and at the close of every half year in the proportions according to which the orders for the contributions to the common fund were made upon the several parishes at the commencement of the half year, notwithstanding the change which may be made in the valuation list of any parish during the period (Union Chargeability Act, 1865, Sec. 12). The clerk to the guardians four weeks at least before the 29th of September and the 25th of March in each year is to estimate the probable amount of the expenditure in relief of the poor and other charges by the guardians on behalf of the union, as well as any separate expenditure chargeable against any parish during the then next ensuing half year, and to estimate the probable balance due to or from each parish at the end of the current half year, and to apportion the sums to be contributed by the several parishes according to the law for the time being in force, and to prepare the orders for contributions (Consolidated Order Amendment Order of the 26th of February, 1866, Article 1). By Article 2 of the same order it is provided that the guardians shall make orders on the overseers at the commencement of each half year, and from time to time as occasion may arise for the payments to the guardians of all such sums as may be required by them as the contribution of the parish to the common fund of the union, and for any other expenses separately chargeable to the guardians on the parish. In these orders the contributions are to be directed to be paid in one sum or by instalments on days to be specified in the orders. The Poor Law Commissioners by Article 5 of a General Order of the 22nd of April 1842, made it the duty of the overseers to pay out of the poor rates collected all such sums as by any order of the guardians in the prescribed form should be directed to be provided from the poor rates. The payments are to be made as directed and the overseers are to produce the order and receipt to the auditor.

302. (Mr. Loch). Might we understand what charges still remain on a parish in a union?—Practically none in respect of relief. I am not sure if there are any school fees still payable for non-paupers. There may be cases of that sort, in which the requirement to pay school fees for children under the Elementary Education Act, 1876, may still be in operation; but I do not know positively about that.

303. (Sir Samuel Provis). There would be the salaries of the collectors of the poor rate, would there not?—Yes, there would, and there would be certain valuation expenses. There would be miscellaneous charges, but not charges in connection with the relief of the poor; at least I do not remember any; the school fees are the nearest approach to relief that I can recall.

304. (Chairman.) What are the statutory provisions relating to the enforcement of the contribution orders of guardians?—The effect of Sec. 1 of the Poor Rate Act, 1839, is that where a contribution by overseers is in arrear any two justices, on application under the hand of the chairman or acting chairman of the board of guardians, may summon the overseer to show cause at a special sessions why the contribution has not been paid, and, after hearing the complaint, may, by warrant under the hands and seals of the justices, cause the contribution so in arrear together with the costs to be levied and recovered from the overseers as moneys assessed for the relief of the poor (Poor Rate Act, 1839, Sec. 1). Where the guardians make an order for contributions upon overseers, and a copy of the order is served upon any one of the overseers, the guardians may enforce the order against the person served as fully and effectually as if a copy had been also served upon every one of the overseers (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1849, Sec. 7). If the overseers wilfully neglect to make or collect sufficient rates for the relief of the poor, or to pay such moneys to the guardians as they may require, and if, by reason of the neglect, any relief directed by the guardians to be given to any poor person be delayed or withheld during a period of seven days, every such overseer shall, upon conviction, forfeit and pay for every such offence a sum not exceeding £20 (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, Sec. 63).

305. Under the system established by the Local Government Act, 1888, there is an appropriation of Imperial funds for local purposes; could you tell us to what extent the guardians are interested in this arrangement?—The proceeds of the duties collected on the licences referred to in the Local Government Act, 1888, as the local taxation licences and a portion of the probate and estate duty being made payable to the councils of counties and county boroughs and being carried to a separate account of the county fund known as the Exchequer Contribution Account, the council, by Secs. 24 and 26 of the Act, are required to make certain payments in substitution for local grants. The council, for instance, are required to pay to the guardians such sums as the Local Government Board from time to time certify to be due from the council towards the remuneration of teachers in Poor Law schools; also the school fees paid for pauper children sent from a workhouse to a public elementary school; likewise a sum equal to four shillings a week for each pauper lunatic maintained in an asylum etc., for whom the net charge upon the guardians, after deducting receipts from other sources than the rates, is equal to or exceeds 4s. a week (Sec. 24). Further, except in London, the council are to grant to the guardians an annual sum for the costs of the officers of the union and of district schools to which the union contributes. The annual sum, until Parliament otherwise determine, is to be the sum certified by the Local Government Board to have been expended by the guardians during the financial year ending on the 25th day of March, 1888, on the salaries, remuneration, and superannuation allowances of the officers (other than school teachers), and on drugs and medical appliances.

306. What provisions of the Local Government Act, 1888, with regard to payments by the county council, are specially applicable to London?—In London the county council, by Sec. 43 of the Act of 1888, are required to pay to the guardians of every Poor Law Union wholly in the county the sums certified by the Local Government Board to be due in substitution for the local grants towards the remuneration of Poor Law medical officers and towards the cost of drugs and medical appliances. The council are also to grant an amount equal to 4d. a day per head for every indoor pauper, the grant being reckoned according to the average number of indoor paupers maintained during the five financial years ending on 25th of March, 1888. The council were further required to pay to the guardians of every Poor Law Union partly situate in their county such proportion of the annual sum which is, under the other provisions of the Act, payable by the county council of a county to the guardians of that union, as the rateable value of the portion within the administrative county of London bears to the rest of the union. This last provision, however, has ceased to be of importance since there is now no union which is partly within and partly without the administrative county of London. The expression "Indoor pauper" in Sec. 43 of the Local Government Act, 1888, includes all paupers maintained in workhouses, district schools, separate schools, separate infirmaries, sick asylums, hospitals for infectious diseases, institutions for the deaf, dumb, blind or idiots, and certified schools, as well as children boarded out, within or without the limits of the union. Further, in the Metropolitan Asylum District the expression includes all inmates of any asylum for imbeciles provided by the managers, but excludes paupers in casual wards and such number of indoor paupers in a workhouse, school, infirmary or asylum as exceeded the number prescribed by the Local Government Board. It also excludes paupers maintained for part of a day only. As regards paupers maintained under contract, the section provides that these shall be included only in the number of indoor paupers of the union to which they are chargeable. The section likewise leaves it to the Local Government Board to direct the manner in which the average number of paupers is to be estimated.

Payments of London County Council for Poor Law purposes.

307. What have you to say about the general financial scheme applicable to Poor Law combinations? Take first the case of a school district?—As regards combinations, it may be noted that, in the case of a school district, the expenses incurred by the board of management are, with the exception of those relating to the relief of the children, and separately chargeable to the unions or parishes from which the children are sent to the district school, to be borne by the several constituent Poor Law Unions according to the annual rateable value of the property (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, Secs. 46 and 47; Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868, Sec. 11). The board of management are to call on the constituent Poor Law Unions for the requisite contributions; and fourteen days at least before a contribution becomes due notice in writing of the amount is to be forwarded to the clerk to the guardians and to two, at least, of the overseers from whom the contributions, or any part, will become due. If a contribution is not duly paid, the board of management, in addition to any other remedy available against a board of guardians, have the like remedy for recovery of the contribution from the overseers as is given to guardians for the recovery from overseers of the contributions of parishes (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, Sec. 46). Where the school district is in the metropolis all common charges are to be defrayed by contributions from the constituent Poor Law Unions in proportion to the annual rateable value of property in the Poor Law Union. If the contribution is not duly paid, the managers are to have their remedy against the overseers; and the overseers, if they pay to the managers any money on account of the contribution, are to be entitled to credit for the payment in the accounts of the union with their parish (Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867, Secs. 55–58).

Combinations: School Districts: Contribution of Constituent Poor Law Unions.

308. Now can you give us the case of a combination under the Poor Law Act, 1879?—In the case of a combination formed under Sec. 8 of the Poor Law Act, Voluntary Combinations: Contribution of Constituent Poor Law Unions.

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

9 Jan. 1906.

Metropolitan Combinations: Financial arrangements applicable to Asylum Districts.

1879, the modes of defraying the expenses of the joint committee for the combination will be determined by the order which forms it.

309. Will you describe the financial arrangements of a metropolitan asylum district?—The Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867, provides by Sec. 31 that the expenses incurred by managers in or about the purchasing, hiring, building, repairing, and fitting up of a building for an asylum, compensation paid to guardians, expenses of fixtures, furniture, conveniences, medicines, medical and surgical appliances, necessaries and salaries and maintenance of officers shall be defrayed by contributions from the constituent Poor Law unions (Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867, Sec. 31). Expenses of food, clothing, maintenance, care, treatment, relief, and burials of inmates are to be separately charged to the Poor Law Unions from which the inmates are sent (Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867, Sec. 32). Sums to be contributed by Poor Law Unions are to be assessed on and contributed by them in proportion to the annual rateable value of the property therein. The managers are from time to time to call upon the guardians for the contributions. Notice of the amount is, fourteen days at least before a contribution becomes due, to be delivered to the clerk to the guardians. If the contribution is not duly paid the managers, in addition to any remedy against the guardians, have the like remedy against the overseers as the guardians have for the recovery of their contributions (Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867, Secs. 55-58).

Metropolitan Common Poor Fund.

310. Would you now explain the working of the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund?—The fund was first established by Sec. 61 of the Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867, and is raised by contributions from the several Poor Law Unions. A receiver is appointed by the Local Government Board, and he keeps an account with the Bank of England (Secs. 62 and 63). The Local Government Board assess the contributions of the several Poor Law Unions in proportion to the annual rateable value of the property in the Poor Law Unions (Sec. 64). This procedure takes the form of the issue of precepts to the guardians who raise and pay their contributions into the bank to the credit of the receiver's account (Sec. 65). If the contribution is not duly paid, the receiver, for its recovery, has against the guardians the like remedy as guardians have against the overseers for recovery of contributions (Sec. 68). Expenses which, under the Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867, were first authorised to be repaid out of the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund are these: maintenance of lunatics in asylums, registered hospitals and licensed houses, and of insane poor in asylums under the Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867; maintenance of patients in asylums for fever or small pox; medicine and medical and surgical appliances; salaries of officers of guardians, school managers and asylum managers and salaries of dispensers where the appointments have been sanctioned by the Local Government Board; compensation; maintenance of pauper children in district, separate, certificated, and licensed schools; relief of destitute persons certified by the auditor and provision of temporary wards or other places of reception approved by the Local Government Board under the Metropolitan Houseless Poor Acts of 1864 and 1865; and other purposes not directly connected with relief (Sec. 69). The salaries of the receiver and his assistants, and all expenses incurred by him in the execution of the Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867, were also to be paid out of the fund (Sec. 71).

311. (Mr. Loch.) Was the receiver appointed by the Local Government Board?—Yes.

Metropolitan Common Poor Fund: Additional charges.

312. (Chairman.) Have these purposes been extended to other Poor Law objects by later Acts?—Additions to the list I have just given have been made by subsequent legislation. Thus the cost of the maintenance and instruction of orphan or deserted children placed out by the guardians with the consent of the Local Government Board is made repayable by the Metropolitan Poor Amendment Act 1869 Sec. 21. So by the Metropolitan Poor Amendment Act 1870, the repayment of the expenses of patients in asylums for fever and small pox was extended to the expenses of maintaining paupers in any other asylums under the Metropolitan Poor Act 1867 and of maintaining paupers above the age of sixteen years in any Metropolitan workhouse. But the repayment in these cases is subject to the following provisions:—The Local Government Board are to certify the maximum number of paupers to be maintained in a workhouse or asylum; no repayment is to be made in respect of a greater number of paupers in an asylum on any one day than will complete the certified maximum, nor in respect of a greater number of paupers in a workhouse on any one day than will, together with the children under sixteen, complete the certified maximum. The amount repaid is to be at the rate of 5d. a day. If the guardians or managers have refused or neglected to comply with an order of the Local Government Board as to the alteration or enlargement of the workhouse, the provision of proper drainage, sewers, ventilation, fixtures, furniture, surgical and medical appliances, appointment of an officer, the maximum number of paupers to be maintained or the classification of paupers, the guardians or managers are to be deemed in default; and the Local Government Board may omit from their precept the amount to which the guardians to whom the workhouse belongs, or the guardians of the Poor Law Unions in the district to which the asylum belongs would have been entitled to be repaid. If, however, the guardians or managers comply with the order before the end of the next half year the Local Government Board may include the omitted amount in their precept for that half year (Section 1).

Metropolitan Common Poor Fund Further charges.

313. How would the guardians make good that amount?—They would have to pay it out of their common fund. It would not be chargeable on the whole Metropolis. The same Act by Section 2 extends "the salaries of officers" for which repayment may be made so as to include the cost of the rations according to a fixed scale. Again the effect of Section 3 Sub-Section 4 of the Poor Law Act 1889 is that after the date of an order of the Local Government Board authorising the Metropolitan Asylum Board to receive diphtheria patients into their hospitals the cost of the maintenance of these patients is to be repayable. The Metropolitan Poor Act 1898, for the purpose of repayment from the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund of the cost of maintaining pauper children, provides that any institution which would otherwise come within Sub-Section 8 of Section 69 of the Metropolitan Poor Act 1867 is not to be excluded because the children are educated outside the institution (Section 1, Sub-Section 1). It is at the same time enacted that, if on any day the number of pauper children maintained in a district or separate school exceeds the certified maximum, no repayment is to be made in respect of the maintenance during that day of the children in excess (Section 1, Sub-Section 2).

Metropolitan Common Poor Fund: Repayment

314. Will you proceed to describe the mode of repayment out of the Common Poor Fund?—The method of repayment out of the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund is thus described by Section 70 of the Metropolitan Poor Act 1867:—After each half yearly audit the auditors within such time and in such manner as the Local Government Board from time to time direct are to certify to the Board the amount actually expended by each Poor Law Union in respect of expenses which are to be repaid out of the Common Poor Fund; and the Local Government Board are then by precept under their seal to direct the receiver to pay out of that fund to the guardians of the Poor Law Unions the several sums so expended. The amount repaid is to be applied by the guardians in aid of the fund chargeable with the relief of the poor (Metropolitan Poor Act 1867, Section 70).

315. (Mr. Loch.) Is the receiver practically part of the Local Government system; is he practically an officer of the Board here?—No; he has powers that are independent of the Board. He would be regarded for some purposes as an independent authority although appointed by the Board.

Borrowing powers.

316. (Chairman.) Have you anything to say about borrowing powers?—A comprehensive power of borrowing is conferred by the Poor Law Act, 1889. Section 2 of that Act enables the guardians, with the sanction of the Local Government Board, to borrow for the purpose of raising the expenses incurred or proposed to be incurred for any permanent work or object, or any other thing, the costs of which ought, in the opinion of the Board, to be spread over a term of years. A loan must not be of an amount which exceeds or will make the total debt of the guardians under the Poor Law Acts exceed one-fourth of the total annual rateable value of the union. The Local Government Board may by Provisional Order extend the maximum to double the amount. This enactment applies to the managers of a school district, or of any asylum district in the Metropolis, but in the case of a school district one-sixteenth, and in the case of an asylum district, one-tenth of the annual rateable value of the district is fixed as the maximum which the loan must not exceed without an express enlargement by a Provisional Order (Poor Law Act, 1897, Sec. 2). A loan raised after the passing of the Poor Law Act, 1897, under Section 2 of the Poor Law Act, 1889, must be repaid within such period not exceeding sixty years as the guardians or managers with the consent of the Local Government Board may determine. The repayment may be either by equal yearly or half yearly instalments of principal or principal and interest or by means of a sinking fund set apart invested and applied in accordance with the Local Loans Act, 1875; the prescribed rate for the purpose of the application being a rate not exceeding 3 per cent. per annum, and the guardians and managers being forbidden to invest in their own securities. A loan contracted to be repaid by annual instalments may with the consent of the lenders be repaid by half-yearly instalments. Guardians and managers may borrow under Section 2 of the Poor Law Act, 1889, without the consent of the Local Government Board, for the purpose of repaying any outstanding part of a loan which the guardians or managers have power to repay. "Outstanding" means not repaid by instalments or by means of a sinking fund, or out of capital monies other than borrowed money. Any money so borrowed is to be repaid in the manner directed by the Poor Law Act, 1897, and within the same period as that originally sanctioned for the repayment of the loan, unless the Local Government Board consent to an enlargement, but the period is not to exceed sixty years from the date of the original borrowing (Poor Law Act, 1897, Sec. 1).

317. Under the head "Payment of debts" what is the legal position?—It had been held in an early case that, if an overseer laid out money of his own for parish purposes, and did not repay himself before his term of office expired his successors could not make a rate to reimburse him (King v. Rotherhithe (8 Modern 338).) The Poor Relief Act 1743 (17 George II., c. 38) by Sec. 11, had provided that, where there were arrears of poor rate, those arrears might be levied by overseers succeeding those by whom the rate was made, and that the succeeding overseers might out of the arrears so levied re-imburse their predecessors. In 1795 the Court of Kings' Bench had before them the case of an overseer who had been in office for four successive years, and during that time had, without recoupment, expended a considerable amount for the use of the parish out of his own resources. Having been appointed overseer for part of the fifth year, the defendant had taken the opportunity to reimburse himself by means of rates made in his period of office. On an appeal against the defendant's accounts, it was pointed out by the Chief Justice, Lord Kenyon, that overseers ought not to include in their accounts charges for several years. Otherwise as the inhabitants of a parish were a fluctuating body, the present inhabitants would be burdened with the expenses of their predecessors. (King v. Goodcheap, 6 Term Reports, 159). Subsequently, in 1801, by the 41 George III., c. 23, Sec. 9, quarter sessions were authorised, on default of the parish officers, to make an order for re-imbursement in circumstances such as arose in Goodcheap's case. But the matter was not put upon a satisfactory footing until the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act 1876, by Sec. 29, provided that the payment of an overseer to his predecessor in respect of any money paid by him in excess of the amount recovered by him or his successors in the rate "if otherwise lawful, may be allowed by the auditor if it appear to him that the said payment in excess did not arise from the negligence or wilful action of the overseer so paying the sum out of his own funds."

318. What is now the general rule with regard to payment of debts by overseers?—The general rule with regard to the payment of overseers' debts has been laid down by the Poor Law Audit Act, 1848 (11 and 12 Victoria, c. 91). Section 1 of that Act is to the effect that: If the overseers lawfully by virtue of their office contract a debt within three months before the termination of their year of office, and it has not been discharged by them before their year of office has determined, it will be payable by and recoverable from their immediate successors. If the debt has been contracted during the year of office, but more than three months prior to its termination, it will be payable by and recoverable from the immediate successors if the vestry and Local Government Board consent, but not otherwise. In the case of law costs, Sec. 2 provides that the amount when duly taxed, if otherwise chargeable against the parish, shall be payable out of the poor rates within one year next following the termination of the proceedings, but not afterwards unless the Local Government Board authorise the payment by annual instalments not exceeding five.

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

9 Jan. 1906.

319. Will you explain the law applicable to the debts of other Poor Law authorities?—The Poor Law (Payment of Debts) Act, 1859, is concerned with the debts of Boards of Guardians and Boards of Management. Generally, these are to be paid within the half-year in which they have been incurred or become due, or within three months after the expiration of the half-year. But the Local Government Board may, if they see fit, extend the time within which a payment may be made for a period not exceeding twelve months after the date of a debt, claim or demand. Provision is made with regard to the beginning of the time of limitation in the case of loans (Sec. 3). If within the time limited by the Act, or within the time to which the Local Government Board grant extension, proceedings are begun in the High Court, or before a justice or other competent authority, and the claimant with due diligence prosecute the proceedings to judgment or a final settlement, the judgment is to be satisfied, notwithstanding that it may be recovered, or the settlement may be arrived at after the expiration of the limited or extended period. Proceedings by mandamus or otherwise for enforcing the judgment without delay are to be deemed to be within the operation of the provision (Sec. 4). A solicitor's bill of costs need not be paid until the final determination of a proceeding in any court or until the solicitor has ceased to be retained by or for the guardians or managers. But the bill of costs must be duly taxed and paid within a year next after the final determination of the proceedings or retainer, unless the Local Government Board authorise an extension of time not exceeding six months. If the solicitor take proceedings for the recovery of his bill within the year or the extended time, he will have the same right to be paid as a claimant prosecuting proceedings to a judgment or final settlement. Moreover, the guardians or managers may at any time pay money on account of the suit or proceeding (Sec. 5). Lastly, the Act contains a saving to validate calls or orders for contributions to provide for debts the payment of which is authorised by the Act (Sec. 6).

Payment of Debts: Guardians and other Authories.

320. Has the Act been the subject of judicial interpretation, and if so, can you give us the effect of the cases?—The first section of the Poor Law (Payment of Debts) Act, 1859, is not in the nature of a Statute of limitation. It is a fetter on the action of the guardians—a prohibition against payment after a certain date. This was said by Lord Herschell when Lord Chancellor, in the Midland Railway Company v. The Edmonton Union (Law Reports, 1895, Appeal Cases, 485; 64 Law Journal, Queen's Bench, 710): "It is not designed to prevent stale demands, though it may incidentally bar the remedy of creditors who delay asserting their rights. Both in form and purpose it is an injunction on the guardians to discharge their obligations promptly." This also was said by Lord Herschell in the Guardians of West Ham Union v. The Churchwardens, etc., of St. Matthew, Bethnal Green (Law Reports, 1896, Appeal Cases, 477; 65 Law Journal, Magistrates' Cases, 201). On an appeal to Quarter Sessions, there is no debt, claim or demand in respect of costs before taxation, and the period mentioned in the Act does not begin before the date of taxation. So an order of the House of Lords for payment of the costs of an appeal does not constitute a debt, claim or demand lawfully incurred, or become due within the meaning of the Act, until the amount has been certified by the clerk of the Parliaments. There cannot, in fact, be a debt, claim or demand which is neither an ascertained sum nor a sum capable of being ascertained by ordinary process of law (Guardians of West Ham Union v. Churchwardens, etc., of St. Matthew, Bethnal Green). So where a claim had been referred to arbitration, the sum owing in respect of the claim did not become due until the amount had been determined by the arbitration. (Sharpington v. Fulham Guardians, Law Reports, 1904, 2 Chancery, 449; 73 Law Journal, Chancery, 777).

PAUPER LUNATICS. Scope of summary of law.

321. That, I think, finishes your evidence on finance. The next branch is pauper lunatics; do you wish to offer any general remarks upon that subject?—The Lunacy Act, 1890, in Sec. 341, defines "pauper" as a person wholly or partly chargeable to a union, county or borough, and "lunatic" as an idiot or person of unsound mind. Primarily, for the purposes of the present inquiry, the case of the pauper lunatic has to be considered with reference to the prescribed methods of dealing with him as a proper subject for treatment in an institution for lunatics, or as one for whom other treatment is allowable. For the purposes of my summary of the statutory provisions, I leave out of consideration the case of a lunatic who is not a pauper and is not wandering at large, but is not under proper care and control, or is cruelly treated or neglected. The omission tends to simplification, although it must be borne in mind that a lunatic of this class may be technically classed as a pauper until it is ascertained that he is entitled to be classified as a private patient (Lunacy Act, 1891, Sec. 3). Dealing then only with the case of the pauper, I may point out that a resident pauper lunatic (Sec. 14) or a pauper lunatic wandering at large (Sec. 15) may be sent to an institution for lunatics on the authority of a summary reception order; and two or more Lunacy Commissioners may make a reception order with the like result in the case of a pauper lunatic not in an institution for lunatics or in a workhouse (Sec. 23). The chairman of a board of guardians may also be empowered by the Lord Chancellor to sign orders for the reception of pauper lunatics in institutions for lunatics (Lunacy Act, 1891, Sec. 25). A summary reception order may be made by any justice within whose jurisdiction a pauper lunatic is resident or is found wandering at large (Secs. 14 and 15).

Summary reception orders: How obtained.

322. Will you describe the mode in which a Summary Reception Order is obtained?—The procedure for obtaining a summary reception order is in the main as follows: A district medical officer who has knowledge that a pauper resident within his district is or is deemed to be a lunatic and a proper person to be sent to an asylum must, within three days after obtaining the knowledge, give notice to the relieving officer, or, if there is none, to the overseer. A relieving officer or an overseer who, by such a notice or otherwise, has knowledge that a resident pauper is deemed to be a lunatic, must, within three days after obtaining the knowledge, give notice to a justice having jurisdiction where the pauper resides (Sec. 14). The justice, on receiving the notice, must order the relieving officer or overseer giving the notice to bring the pauper before that justice, or some other justice having jurisdiction, at an appointed time and place within three days from the time of the notice (Sec. 14). A constable, a relieving officer, or an overseer who has knowledge that a pauper wandering at large within the relief district or parish is deemed to be a lunatic must immediately apprehend and take the alleged lunatic or cause him to be apprehended and taken before a justice. Also, a justice upon information on oath that a pauper wandering at large within his jurisdiction is deemed to be a lunatic, may order a constable, relieving officer or overseer of the district or parish where the alleged lunatic is, to apprehend and bring him before that justice or any other justice having jurisdiction (Sec. 15).

Reception in workhouses of pauper lunatics.

323. What are the circumstances in which pauper lunatics may be taken to the workhouse?—If a constable, relieving officer or overseer is satisfied that it is necessary for the public safety or the welfare of the pauper that, before proceedings are taken under the Lunacy Acts, he should be placed under care and control, the constable, relieving officer, or overseer may remove the pauper to the union workhouse. Unless there is no proper accommodation, the workhouse master must receive and relieve and detain the pauper. He must not, however, be detained for more than three days, and before the expiration of that time, the constable, relieving officer, or overseer must take the requisite proceedings (Sec. 20). Also in a case where a summary reception order might be made, a justice, if satisfied on the like grounds that the pauper lunatic should forthwith be placed under care and control and that there is proper accommodation at the Workhouse may make an order for taking the pauper lunatic to and receiving him in the workhouse. Where the summary reception order has been made, an order may be made to provide for the detention of the pauper lunatic until he can be removed. But the detention must not be for more than fourteen days (Sec. 21). At this stage it may be proper to note some exceptional provisions applicable to lunatic soldiers and sailors. As regards soldiers, the Army Act, 1881 (Sec. 91) as amended by the Army (Annual) Act, 1891 (Sec. 6), and the Army (Annual) Act, 1894 (Sec. 5), provides that a Secretary of State may, if he think proper, on account of a soldier's lunacy, cause any soldier of the regular forces on his discharge and his wife and child or any of them to be sent to the parish or union to which under the Statutes for the time being in force he appears from the statements made in his attestation paper and other available information to be chargeable. If the soldier or his wife or child after reasonable notice is delivered at the workhouse in which persons settled in the parish or union are received, he must be received by the master or other proper officer; but if it appears to the Secretary of State that the soldier is a dangerous lunatic and is in such a state of health as not to be liable to suffer bodily or mental injury by his removal, the Secretary of State may by order send the lunatic direct to an asylum, registered hospital, licensed house or other place of legal confinement. For the purposes of the order, the parish or union of chargeability according to the attestation paper or other available information is to be deemed to be the parish or union from which the lunatic is sent. And the order of the Secretary of State will have the same effect as a summary reception order. As regards sailors, the Naval Enlistment Act, 1884 (Sec. 3), applies the machinery above described. In these cases "the Admiralty" is substituted for "a Secretary of State," and the declaration made on entry into the Naval Service is substituted for the attestation paper.

Investig by Justi of cases pauper lunatics.

324. Will you describe the further investigation of the case of a pauper lunatic?—The justice before whom a pauper is brought must call in a medical practitioner, and examine the pauper, and make such inquiries as he thinks advisable, and if satisfied that the pauper is a lunatic and a proper person to be detained and the medical practitioner signs a medical certificate, the justice may by order direct the pauper lunatic to be received and detained in the institution for lunatics named in the order; and the relieving officer, overseer, or constable who brought the pauper lunatic before the justice, or in the case of a pauper lunatic wandering at large any constable required by the justice must forthwith convey the pauper lunatic to the institution, (Sec. 16). A constable relieving officer, or overseer, whose duty it is to convey a lunatic to or from an institution may make proper arrangements for the performance of the duty by some other person, (Lunacy Act, 1891, Sec. 2). The justice's examination may be made at the pauper's own house or elsewhere, (Lunacy Act, 1890, Sec. 17). The medical examination must be made by a practitioner who is duly registered under the Medical Acts, but who is not in any of the various prohibited relations to the institution into which the pauper lunatic will be received, (Sec. 32, Sec. 341). The medical practitioner too (if the pauper lunatic will be received into a hospital or licensed house) must not be a Lunacy Commissioner, nor a visitor of licensed houses, unless directed to visit the patient by competent authority (Sec. 33). The medical examination must be made not more than seven days before the date of the reception order, (Sec. 29). The certificate must state the facts on which the practitioner has formed his opinion. Facts observed by the practitioner must be distinguished from facts communicated by others, (Sec. 28). A reception order must not be made on a certificate founded only upon facts communicated by others, (Sec. 28).

Conditio affecting summary receptio orders.

325. Will you now state the conditions subject to which a summary reception order may be made and suspended or executed?—The justice must not sign an order for the reception of a person as a pauper lunatic unless satisfied that the alleged pauper is either in receipt of relief or in such circumstances as to require relief for his proper care. If it appears by the order that the justice is so satisfied, the lunatic is to be deemed to be a pauper chargeable to the union, county, or borough properly liable for his relief. A person who is visited by a medical officer, at the expense of the union, is to be deemed to be in receipt of relief, (Lunacy Act, 1890, Sec. 18). A justice making a summary reception order may suspend its execution for such period not exceeding fourteen days as he thinks fit, and, in the meantime, may give such directions or make such arrangements for the proper care and control of the pauper lunatic as he thinks proper, (Lunacy Act, 1890, Sec. 19, Sub-sec. 1). If the medical practitioner who examines a pauper lunatic as to whom a summary reception order is made certifies that the pauper lunatic is not in a fit state to be removed, the removal must be suspended until that, or some other practitioner certifies that the pauper lunatic is fit to be removed. Every medical practitioner who has certified that the pauper lunatic is not in a fit state to be removed must, as soon as in his judgment the lunatic is fit to be removed, certify accordingly. (Lunacy Act, 1890, Sec. 19, Sub-sec. 2.)

ption uper tics in ims.

326. Into what asylums may a pauper lunatic be admitted under a summary reception order?—A pauper lunatic cannot be received under a summary reception order into any asylum other than that belonging wholly or in part to the county or borough in which the place whence the pauper lunatic is sent, or the parish in which he is adjudged to be settled, is situate, "unless there is a subsisting contract for the reception of lunatics of such county or borough therein, or such borough otherwise contributes to the asylum into which the pauper is to be received, except the order is endorsed by a visitor of that asylum" (Lunacy Act, 1890, Sec. 27, Sub-sec. 3). Where, however, the pauper lunatic is in a workhouse and the workhouse is situate in a county which does not include the union to which the workhouse belongs, the summary reception order may order the pauper lunatic to be received in any asylum in which pauper lunatics chargeable to the union to which the workhouse belongs may legally be received (Lunacy Act, 1891, Sec. 6).

ody of per tics by ions and ids.

327. What other arrangements than asylum treatment can be made for the care of pauper lunatics?—A relation or friend of a pauper lunatic as to whom a summary reception order may be made, may retain or take the lunatic under his own care, if a justice having jurisdiction to make the order, or the visitors of the asylum are satisfied that proper care will be taken of the lunatic (Lunacy Act, 1890, Sec. 22). And provision is also made for boarding out with relatives or friends of pauper lunatics after reception in asylums. (Lunacy Act, 1890, Sec. 57.)

ention of per tics in khouses.

328. Will you now explain under what circumstances pauper lunatics may be kept in workhouses?—Attention has already been drawn to provisions under which pauper lunatics may be temporarily bestowed in workhouses. Other instances of the use of the workhouse for the accommodation of pauper lunatics may now be mentioned. These instances may be classified thus: (1) Pauper lunatics discharged from institutions; (2) pauper lunatics received by arrangement; and (3) pauper lunatics detained on certificate of medical officer and order of justices.

329. (Mr. Loch.) May I ask what "discharged from institution" means?—It means discharged from institutions for lunatics.

330. Asylums?—Asylums, hospitals, or licensed houses.

ention in khouses unatics harged n lums, etc.

331. (Chairman.) What are the characteristics of the first of these classes?—Under the first head, it may be pointed out that where a pauper lunatic is discharged from an institution for lunatics, and the medical officer of the institution is of opinion that the pauper lunatic has not recovered and is a proper person to be kept in a workhouse, the medical officer is to certify this opinion. The pauper lunatic may thereupon be received and detained against his will in a workhouse without further order, if the workhouse medical officer certifies in writing that the accommodation is sufficient for the pauper lunatic's proper care and treatment, separate from the inmates of the workhouse not lunatics, or that the lunatic's condition is such that it is not necessary for the convenience of the lunatic or of the other inmates that he should be kept separate (Lunacy Act, 1890, Sec. 25).

333. Now we will take the second class; will you state what that class comprises?—The second class of cases is the subject of provision in Sec. 26 of the Lunacy Act, 1890. That section is as follows: "(1) The visitors of any asylum may, with the consent of the Local Government Board and the Commissioners [namely, the Commissioners in Lunacy] and subject to such regulations as they respectively prescribe make arrangements with the guardians of any union for the reception into the workhouse of any chronic lunatics, not being dangerous, who are in the asylum and have been selected and certified by the manager of the asylum as proper to be removed to the workhouse. (2) Every lunatic received in a workhouse under this section shall, while he remains there, continue a patient on the books of the asylum for the purposes of this Act so far as it relates to lunatics removed to asylums."

Detention in workhouses of lunatics on certificates, etc.

334. What cases do you group in the third class?—The third class of cases embraces all those not included in the first and second. To the third class, Sec. 24 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, as amended by Secs. 4 and 5 of the Lunacy Act, 1891, specially applies. Sec. 24 of the Act of 1890 provides that:—(1) Except in the cases mentioned in that Act and already described, no person is to be allowed to remain in a workhouse as a lunatic unless the medical officer of the workhouse certifies in writing (a) that the person is a lunatic, with the grounds for the opinion; and (b) that he is a proper person to be allowed to remain in the workhouse as a lunatic; and (c) that the accommodation is sufficient for his proper care and treatment, separate from the inmates of the workhouse not lunatics, unless the medical officer certifies that the lunatic's condition is such that it is not necessary for the convenience of the lunatic, or of the other inmates that he should be kept separate. (2) A certificate under the section is sufficient authoriy for detaining the lunatic against his will in the workhouse for fourteen days from its date. (3) No lunatic may be detained against his will for more than fourteen days without a justice's order. (4) That order may be made upon the application of a relieving officer, supported by a medical certificate under the hand of a medical practitioner, not being an officer of the workhouse, and by the certificate of the workhouse medical officer. These medical certificates are by Sec. 5 of the Lunacy Act, 1891, required to be attached to the justice's order. (5) The guardians may pay reasonable remuneration to the medical practitioner. (6) If the workhouse medical officer does not give the necessary certificate for detention, or if at or before the expiration of fourteen days from the date of his certificate a justice's order for detention is not made, or if after such an order has been made the pauper lunatic ceases to be a proper person to be detained in a workhouse, the medical officer of the workhouse must forthwith give notice in writing to a relieving officer. Thereupon, proceedings, as provided by the Act, are to be taken for the removal of the lunatic to an asylum, and, pending those proceedings the lunatic may be detained in the workhouse.

Statutory exceptions as regards certain lunatics in Metropolitan Poor asylums and in workhouses.

335. Are there any exceptions from the provisions to which you have called our attention?—Special provision is made in the Act of 1890, and in the Act of 1891 as regards lunatics in asylums under the Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867. And the Act of 1890 excepts from the requirements of Sec. 24 paupers in workhouses at the commencement of the Act as to whom certificates had been signed under Sec. 20 of the Lunacy Acts Amendment Act, 1862, which the Act of 1890 repealed. The Act of 1891 also excepts from the requirement of an order under Sec. 24 of the Act of 1890 the case of every pauper suffering from mental disease in a workhouse at the commencement of the Act of 1890, as to whom a report had before that date been made under Sec. 22 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1867.

Period of Detention: Opinion of Law officers.

336. Has not the last enactment (Sec. 24 of the Lunacy Act, 1890) been the subject of an opinion of the Law officers?—Yes. With reference to the cases coming within Sub-sec. 6 of Sec. 24, the position according to the opinion of the law officers is that the lunatic, pending proceedings for his removal to the asylum, may be detained in the workhouse for the following further consecutive periods:—(a) for the three days within which the relieving officer must under Sec. 14, Sub-Sec. 2, give notice to a justice that a person resident in his district is deemed to be a lunatic; (b) For the further period of three days which may elapse before the alleged lunatic is brought before a justice (Sec. 14, Sub-Sec. 3); (c) After a summary reception order has been made, for a further period of fourteen days under Sec. 21, Sub-Sec. 2, pending the removal of the lunatic to the asylum. But an order could not be made by a justice for the further

Reception of discharged lunatics in workhouses.

337. Can you give instances of the use of the workhouse as a place for the reception of a discharged pauper lunatic?—Under this third head it seems convenient to group those instances in which there is express authority for the temporary use of the workhouse as a place of discharge; for the subsequent treatment of cases may quite conceivably involve consideration of the effect of Sec. 24 of the Lunacy Act, 1890. Thus, when the visitors of an asylum order a pauper lunatic confined therein to be discharged, except on the application of a relative or friend, they may, when they think fit, notify their intention to a relieving officer of the union to which the lunatic is chargeable or to the clerk of the local authority liable for his maintenance. Upon receipt of the notice the relieving officer or clerk is to cause the lunatic on discharge to be forthwith removed to the workhouse of the union to which he is chargeable, or to the workhouse of the union from which he was sent to the asylum (Lunacy Act, 1890, Sec. 80). Again, the authority liable for the maintenance of a pauper lunatic detained in a hospital or licensed house may make an order for the removal of the lunatic and may direct the mode of removal (Sec. 61, sub-Sec. 1 of the Lunacy Act, 1890). But the effect of Sec. 11 of the Lunacy Act, 1891 is that the removal must be to the workhouse of the union to which the lunatic is chargeable, or if the lunatic is chargeable to a county or borough to the workhouse of the union from which he was sent to the hospital or licensed house.

Miscellaneous enactments as to lunatics in workhouses.

338. Can you give an account of any miscellaneous provisions relating to pauper lunatics in workhouses?—The miscellaneous provisions of the Lunacy Acts, which relate to pauper lunatics in workhouses may be summarised thus:—Carnal intercourse with females by persons employed in workhouses is a misdemeanour punishable with imprisonment with hard labour for two years (Lunacy Act, 1890, Sec. 324). A pauper lunatic who escapes may, without a fresh order or certificate, be retaken within fourteen days by the master or a person authorised by the master in writing (Lunacy Act, 1890, Sec. 85). Regulations with respect to the visitation of lunatic inmates by guardians, the workhouse medical officer, the Lunacy Commissioners, and persons whom the Lunacy Commissioners direct in cases calling for immediate investigation are contained in Secs. 54, 202, Sub-Sec. 1, 203 and 204 of the Lunacy Act, 1890. Pauper lunatics may be discharged from workhouses by the guardians (Lunacy Act, 1890, Sec. 81). The visiting Lunacy Commissioners may direct the removal of lunatic inmates to institutions for lunatics. But the guardians may appeal against any such order to the Secretary of State, who may employ a person to make a special visitation and report and whose decision is to be conclusive (Lunacy Act, 1890, Sec. 60). Mechanical means of restraint can only be applied to lunatics in workhouses subject to medical certificates and records and subject to the Lunacy Commissioners' regulations determining the instruments and appliances (Lunacy Act, 1890, Sec. 40).

Expenses of pauper lunatics.

339. What other provisions of the Lunacy Acts have you now to consider?—I do not propose to enter upon those provisions of the Lunacy Acts which are concerned with the administration of lunatic asylums. But it may be well to say a few words about the financial provisions in Part X. of the Lunacy Act, 1890. That part is headed "Expenses of Pauper Lunatics." The part contains Section 283. The section provides that (1) every visiting committee shall fix a weekly sum, not exceeding 14s., for the expenses of maintenance and other expenses of each pauper lunatic in the asylum, and of such amount that the total of such weekly sums shall be sufficient to defray such expenses, and also the salaries of the officers and attendants of the asylum, and such weekly sum may, from time to time, be altered. (2) If 14s. a week is found insufficient for the payment aforesaid, the local authority to whom the asylum belongs may, by order, direct such addition to be made to the weekly sum as to the local authority seems necessary, and every such order shall be signed by the clerk of the local authority and forthwith published in a local newspaper. (3) A committee may fix a greater weekly sum, not exceeding 14s., to be charged in respect of pauper lunatics other than those sent from or settled in a parish or place within the county or borough to which the asylum belongs. These enactments have been the subject of recent discussion in the High Court. In the case of Fitch v. The Bermondsey Guardians (Law Reports, 1904, 2 King's Bench 709; Law Reports, 1905, 1 King's Bench 524; 73 Law Journal, King's Bench 985; 74 Law Journal, King's Bench, 250) the Visiting Committee of the City of London Lunatic Asylum had, under Sub-Section 1 of Section 283, fixed the weekly charge for pauper lunatics chargeable to the City of London Union at 12s. 3d. Under Subsection 3 the committee purported to fix the weekly charge for pauper lunatics chargeable to unions outside the City at 21s. The guardians of the Bermondsey Poor Law Union were charged at this rate. They paid at the rate of 14s. a week and declined to pay more. The viewof the guardians as to the limit of the charge to outside unions was upheld by the King's Bench Division and by the Court of Appeal. The greater weekly sum which may be fixed for outside unions must not exceed the maximum for home lunatics.

340. (Mr. Loch.) Are the lunatics in a workhouse inspected by the Lunacy Commissioners?—Yes.

341. That is wherever they are certified?—Yes; and they always would be certified in some way.

342. Are the guardians under statutory obligation to make special provision for lunatics in a workhouse?—No.

Orders of maintenance etc.

343. (Chairman.) I understand that orders of justices upon guardians may include payment for maintenance; is that so?—Payment of charges on the scale authorised by Section 283 will form one of the matters for which an order of a justice or justices may be made upon the guardians. Thus Section 287 provides that the justice by whom a pauper lunatic is sent to an institution for lunatics or any two justices of the county or borough in which the institution is situate or from any part of which the pauper lunatic has been sent, or any two justices being visitors of the institution may make an order upon the guardians of the union to which the lunatic is chargeable for payment to the treasurer or manager of the institution of the reasonable charges of the lodging, maintenance, medicine, clothing and care of the lunatic The order may be retrospective or prospective. It is not subject to appeal. It is, in fact, an order which will cease to operate when there has been a final adjudication of the settlement of the pauper lunatic.

Adjudication of settlement of lunatics.

344. What are the provisions of the Lunacy Acts with respect to the settlement of pauper lunatics?—For the adjudication of settlement any two justices for the county or borough in which an institution where a pauper lunatic is or has been confined is situate, or to which the institution being an asylum wholly or in part belongs, or from any part of which a pauper lunatic is or has been sent may at any time inquire into the settlement (Lunacy Act, 1890, Section 288.) Where the justices adjudge the settlement in a poor law union they are to order the guardians of the poor law union to pay to the guardians of any other union the expenses incurred in or about the examination of the pauper lunatic, the bringing him before a justice or justices, his removal and conveyance to and from any institution for lunatics, and the amount paid by the latter guardians for maintenance expenses within twelve months prior to the date of the order. If the lunatic is still in confinement the first mentioned guardians are to be ordered to pay to the treasurer or manager of the institution the reasonable expenses of future maintenance (Lunacy Act, 1890, Section 289). The Act further provides for cases in which a settlement cannot be ascertained. In such circumstances, the pauper lunatic may be made chargeable to a local authority (Section 290). But if the lunatic should afterwards be adjudged to be settled in a Poor Law Union the local authority may be reimbursed, under an order of justices, the expenses of maintenance incurred within twelve months previous to the order, and the future expenses will become chargeable to the guardians (Lunacy Act, 1890, Section 291).

Other provisions of Lunacy Acts.

345. Are there any other provisions of the Lunacy Acts to which our attention should be drawn?—Other provisions of the Lunacy Acts do not appear to call for detailed mention. It may suffice to notice that among the other matters with which Part X is concerned are Appeals, including abandonment of orders (Secs. 301-313); expenses of examination of paupers (Sec. 285); jurisdiction of justices, their orders and their extent (Secs. 292 and 293); irremovable pauper lunatics (Sec. 294); payments by guardians without orders (Sec.

295); the liability of relations for maintenance, and of guardians for the cost of removal, discharge or burial (Secs. 296 and 297); the application of the lunatic's property (Secs. 299 and 300), and the recovery of expenses (Sec. 314).

Act,

346. Now will you state the effect of the Idiots Act, 1886?—The Idiots Act, 1886, is entitled "An Act for giving Facilities for the Care, Education and Training of Idiots and Imbeciles." In this Act the expressions "idiots" and "imbeciles" do not include lunatics, the expressions "hospital" and "institution" mean any hospital or institution or part of a hospital or institution (not being an asylum for lunatics) wherein idiots and imbeciles are received and supported wholly or partly by voluntary contributions, or by any charitable bequest or gift, or by applying the excess of payments of some patients for or towards the support, provision or benefit of other patients, and the expression "licensed house" means any house licensed by the Commissioners in Lunacy or by the justices of any county or borough for the reception, care, education and training of idiots and imbeciles (Sec. 17). An idiot if under age may be received into and until full age detained in a hospital, institution or licensed house upon the certificate of a duly qualified medical practitioner accompanied by a statement signed by the parent or guardian or person undertaking the duty of parent or guardian. The hospital, institution or licensed house must be registered under the Act (Sec. 4). The registration is by the Commissioners in Lunacy (Sec. 7). The idiot may, with the consent in writing of the Commissioners in Lunacy, be retained in the hospital, institution or licensed house after he is of full age; and an idiot of full age may be received on a certificate and statement as in the case of an idiot under age (Sec. 5). On the first reception of an idiot, the superintendent or principal officer must within fourteen days certify the fact and time to the Commissioners in Lunacy (Sec. 9). Death or discharge is also to be notified to the Commissioners, who have power to discharge any idiot of full age, and have the duty of visiting and inspecting every registered establishment (Secs. 6, 10 and 12). Nothing in the Act is to deprive the guardians of the poor of any union of the power of sending pauper idiots to establishments registered under the Act or from receiving Parliamentary grants as if the idiots were pauper lunatics (Sec. 15).

347. (Mr. Loch.) Has the word "imbecile" any separate meaning in the Idiots Act?—Not by definition, beyond the statement that it does not include a lunatic.

348. Then practically it might be merged into the other?—Its meaning has to be discovered from expert opinion or judicial decisions; there is no Parliamentary definition.

349. (Sir Henry Robinson.) Are there any institutions supported entirely out of the rates for the maintenance of weakminded and idiot children under age?—I thought that there were asylums provided at the charge of the county rate, and I said so before the Commission on the Feeble-minded, but I was told there that there were none; that there were only wards at county asylums, but not actually separate asylums for idiots.

EMENT

VAL. W of AW.

350. (Chairman.) We now come to the question of settlement; perhaps you will tell us something about the early phases of the law?—The Royal Commission of Inquiry (p. 152) pointed out that the Statute of the 43rd of Elizabeth contained no definition of settlement, but that, in a long train of legislation, a person had been considered settled in the parish in which he was born or in which he had dwelt, or had been principally conversant, for the preceding three years, or, under the 39th of Elizabeth, c. 4, in the case of vagabonds, whose place of birth could not be ascertained, for one year. It is perfectly true that the Poor Relief Act, 1601, contains no definition of settlement. The earlier Statute of the 14th of Elizabeth, c. 5, contains apparently the first legislative reference to settlement. That Act in Sec. 16 recites that charity would that aged and impotent poor people should have convenient habitations and abiding places throughout this realm to settle themselves upon, to the end that they, nor any of them should hereafter beg or wander about. Accordingly, the Act requires the justices to inquire of all aged, poor, impotent, and decayed persons born within their divisions or which were there dwelling within three years which live or of necessity be compelled to live by alms of the charity of the people. The justices were then to devise and appoint meet and convenient places to settle the same poor people for their habitations and abidings, if the parish within which they should be found should not or would not provide for them. The poor who refused to be bestowed in any of the abiding places, but coveted still to hold on to their trade of begging, or, after being once bestowed, departed and begged were to be punished as rogues and vagabonds. This process of settlement, it will be observed, was concerned solely with beggars. In the resolutions ascribed by Lambard to the judges and already quoted there is a rule to the effect that no man was to be put out of the town where he dwelt nor to be sent to his place of birth or last habitation except a vagrant rogue. At a later date, the Judges formulated rules with regard to persons who were neither beggars nor rogues. This was in 1633. The resolutions of that year declare that "the law unsettleth none who are lawfully settled, nor permits it to be done by a practice or compulsion; and everyone who is settled as a native, householder, sojourner, an apprentice or servant for a month at least without a just complaint made to remove him or her shall be held to be settled." Possibly this view of the law may have been present to the mind of Mr. Justice Lee who said in 1735 in St. Maurice v. St. Mary Ka lender (2 Bott. pl. 237) "Settlements are given as a reward for labour, and the Poor Laws in favour of them have always been construed liberally because they are made in restraint of liberty; every man being anciently free to go wherever he had the best probability of maintaining himself."

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

9 Jan. 1906.

351. I think you wish to draw attention to other judicial decisions in the 18th century and afterwards?—The opinions of judges in the 18th century as to the origin of settlement afterwards became somewhat divergent. In 1736 Lord Hardwicke in the case of the King v. the Inhabitants of St. Nicholas in Ipswich (Burrow; Settlement Cases, 91) remarked that "The present notions of settlements have taken their rise from 13 and 14 Charles II., c. 12." In 1755 in the King v. St. Botolph Bishopsgate (Burrow; Settlement Cases, 367) Chief Justice Ryder said that the 13 and 14 Chas. II. c. 12 first created the right of settlement in parishes. In 1756 irremovability consequent upon the possession of an estate, however small, was carried back to Magna Charta in the King v. The Inhabitants of Aythrop Rooding (Burrow; Settlement Cases, 412). In 1788 in Steel v. Houghton-et-Uxor (1 H. Blackstone, 51) Lord Loughborough thought that the right to a maintenance by settlement was first introduced by the Statute of the 43rd of Elizabeth. But Mr. Justice Gould said, "I think ever since the settlement of parishes the poor inhabitants were esteemed as parishioners, and their necessities to be relieved by the parish to which they belonged." He also said that, before the Poor Relief Act, 1601, "it seems the settlement was by birth." Still later, in 1835, Lord Denman, Chief Justice, in the King v. The Inhabitants of St. George Exeter (3 Adolphus and Ellis, 373) said, "At the time of the passing of the Statute 43 Elizabeth there was no law of settlement." An old and simple definition of settlement was given by Lord Chief Justice Parker in 1713 in the case of Harrow v. Edgware (2 Bott, pl. 608) "A parochial settlement," said the Lord Chief Justice, "is nothing more than the privilege of living irremovable in the parish." Another old definition of settlement was as follows: "By the term 'settlement' is to be understood a permanent indestructible right to take the benefit of the poor laws in a particular parish or place which maintains its own poor." The definition was open to criticism, because the right once acquired ceases on the acquisition of a new right elsewhere. Judicially the definition of settlement took in general the form of eliminating possible qualities or attributes. Thus, in the King v. St. Botolph's 1755 (2 Burrow; Settlement Cases, 367) Lord Chief Justice Ryder said, "A man cannot give away or release or suspend his settlement for the public is concerned as well as himself." Again, in the King v. The Inhabitants of St. Mary Cardigan (1794, 6 Term Reports, 116) Lord Kenyon said "A settlement, is not the property of any man. It cannot escheat. Neither can it be called a franchise." And in the King v. The inhabitants of Haddenham (1812, 15 East, 463) Lord Ellenborough observed "A settlement is not at all analogous to an inheritance."

Judicial decisions as to origin, etc. of settlement.

352. Are there any passages which you would wish to note in the Report of the Royal Commission of 1832?—

Observations of Commission of Inquiry.

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

9 Jan. 1906.

The Commissioners of 1832 took the view that the 13 & 14 Charles II. c. 12, which gave power to remove any newcomer from a parish, though not applying for relief, but merely on suspicion of prospective chargeability, in effect created a settlement or right to remain in the parish in the words restricting the general power of removal. On this point the Commissioners said :—"It was required therefore that it [the power of removal] should be exercised within the first forty days after the arrival of the new settler, and persons settling in a tenement of the yearly value of £10, a sum equal, according to the present value of money, to more than £50 were directly excepted. Forty days' residence, without removal, or occupying a tenement of £10 annual value gave, therefore, a right to remain or, as it is now called, a settlement, and the direction that persons should be removed to the place where they were last legally settled as natives, householders, apprentices, servants, or even sojourners for forty days made also forty days' residence a means not only of acquiring a settlement, but also a means of losing any previous settlement and established birth as a settlement where no other had been acquired. To these the Common Law added estate, or property in land, because no person ought to be removed from his estate, and marriage in the case of a woman and parentage in the case of a legitimate child, on the ground that a wife must not be separated from her husband, or a child until emancipated from its parents; and the 3 & 4 William & Mary c. 11, Sec. 6, added serving an annual public office and contributing to the public taxes of a parish." But although the settlements created or recognised by the 13 & 14 Charles II. were originally qualifications upon the power of removing all new comers whom the overseers thought likely to become chargeable, the subsequent legislation the object of which was to limit the modes of acquiring a settlement, was left unchanged on the cessation of the primary power of removal under the statute of Charles II. This termination of the power to remove where chargeability was probable, though not actual, was brought about by the operation of the 35 George III. c. 101, which enacts that no poor person shall be removed, by virtue of any order of removal, from the parish or place where such poor person shall be inhabiting to the place of his or her last legal settlement, until such person shall have become actually chargeable to the parish, township or place in which such person shall then inhabit. And the words "actually chargeable" cover the case of a man who, though possessing property sufficient to maintain him, in fact receives relief (King v. Ampthill; 2 Barnewall & Cresswell, 847). Further, actual chargeability is assumed where the pauper has been convicted of larceny or other felony (35 George III. c. 101, Sec. 5), where he has been convicted of being an idle or disorderly person, rogue or vagabond (5 George IV. c. 85, Sec. 20), or where he appears to two or more justices on the oath of a credible witness or witnesses to be a person of evil fame or a reputed thief (35 George III. c. 101, Sec. 5).

Actual chargeability since 35 Geo. III., c. 101.

Former modes of acquiring a settlement.

353. What were the modes of acquiring a settlement in 1832 ?—At the time of the Commission of Enquiry the modes of obtaining a settlement were (1) Birth, (2) Parentage, (3) Marriage, (4) Estate, (5) Apprenticeship, (6) Renting a Tenement, (7) Payment of Parochial Rates, (8) Serving a Parochial Office, and (9) Hiring and Service.

Recommendations of Commission of Inquiry.

The Commissioners of 1832 recommended the abolition of the methods numbered 4 to 9, i.e. Estate, Apprenticeship, Renting a Tenement, Payment of Parochial Rates, Serving a Parochial Office, and Hiring and Service. There remained Birth, Parentage and Marriage. With regard to birth, the Commissioners' proposal had reference to facilities for proof. They thought that where a question arose as to the settlement by birth of a person, whether legitimate or illegitimate, "the place where such person shall have been first known, by the evidence of such person, by the register of his or her birth or baptism, or otherwise to have existed, shall be presumed to have been the place of his or her birth, until the contrary shall be proved." Next as to parentage, they recommended that (subject to the obvious exceptions of persons born in prisons, hospitals and workhouses) the settlement of every legitimate child born after the passing of the intended Act should follow that of the parents or surviving parent of such child, until such child should attain the age of sixteen years, or the death of its surviving parent; and that at the age of sixteen or on the death of its surviving parent such child should be considered settled in the place in which it was born. Further, with regard to parentage, the Commissioners recommended that every illegitimate child born after the passing of the Act should, until it attained the age of sixteen, follow its mother's settlement.

Amendment of law in 1834.

354. How far did Parliament act upon the recommendations of the Royal Commission of 1832 ?—Parliament, in the Act of 1834, adopted the suggestions of the Commissioners of Inquiry with regard to the settlement by hiring and service, and the settlement of an illegitimate child. The Act prohibited the acquisition of a settlement by hiring and service after the passing of the Act, or by residence under the same (Sec. 64). The Act also provided that every child born a bastard, after its passing, should have and follow the settlement of its mother until the child should attain the age of sixteen or should acquire a settlement in its own right (Sec. 71). The Act further abolished the future acquisition of a settlement by serving an office (Sec. 64), and by apprenticeship so far as regards the sea service (Sec. 67), and made the payment of rates a condition of the acquisition or completion of a settlement by occupying a tenement (Sec. 66); modifying at the same time the settlement by estate by limiting its retention to the period of inhabitancy within ten miles of the parish (Sec. 68).

Observations of Commission of Inquiry on settlement by residence.

355. Have you any special remarks to make at this stage with reference to settlement by residence ?—The Commissioners drew attention to the fact that they did not recommend settlement by residence (p. 343). They considered that it would tend to the separation of master and man, to the demolition of cottages, and to the deterioration of the unsettled labourers who were then superior in morals and industry to the settled. In circumstances very much changed from those which prevailed at the time of the Commission of Inquiry, settlement by residence has a place in the list of modern settlements.

Present forms of settlement.

356. Will you enumerate the existing forms of settlement ?—These are: (1) Birth; (2) Parentage; (3) Marriage; (4) Estate; (5) Apprenticeship; (6) Renting a Tenement; (7) Payment of Parochial Rates; and (8) Residence.

357. There were nine before, were there not ?—Yes.

358. Hiring and service and serving an office are omitted, and residence added ?—Yes.

Settlement by birth.

359. We will take those in order; first, settlement by birth ?—The first or birth settlement, may be described as the prima facie settlement of every person born in England, but liable to be superseded by the independent acquisition of a settlement, or by any parentage settlement. The rule thus stated is subject to exception by statute in the case of births in prisons or lying-in hospitals (54 George III. c. 170, Sec. 2) and in workhouses (Sec. 3).

Settlement by parents.

360. Now will you take the second, settlement by parentage ?—Settlement by parentage belongs to the class of derivative settlements. It is, therefore, a settlement to which the 35th section of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vic. c. 61), applies. The section is as follows: "No person shall be deemed to have derived a settlement from any other person, whether by parentage, estate or otherwise, except in the case of a wife from her husband, and in the case of a child under the age of sixteen, which child shall take the settlement of its father or of its widowed mother, as the case may be, up to that age, and shall retain the settlement so taken until it shall acquire another. An illegitimate child shall retain the settlement of its mother until such child acquires another settlement. If any child in this section mentioned shall not have acquired a settlement for itself, or being a female shall not have derived a settlement from her husband, and it cannot be shown what settlement such child or female derived from the parent without inquiring into the derivative settlement of such parent, such child or female shall be deemed to be settled in the parish in which he or she was born." Upon this enactment it was said in the House of Lords, in the Reigate Union v. the Croydon Union (Law Reports, 1889, 14 Appeal Cases, 465; 59 Law Journal, Magistrates' Cases, 29), that it put an end to all nice questions as to emancipation or non-emancipation by enacting that, on attaining the age of sixteen, every child shall, without regard to its physical or mental capacity cease to follow its parent's settlement and become capable of acquiring a settlement in its own right. The clause leaves the old law applicable to parentage settlements unchanged in all other respects. Without attempting an elaborate illustration of the possible cases to which this much discussed enactment will apply, it may suffice to say that: As regards a legitimate child, (1) the child up to the age of sixteen will take the settlement of his father, if alive, and (2) the child up to the age of sixteen will retain the father's settlement if the father die and the child have no mother; otherwise, the child will take the settlement of his widowed mother. As regards an illegitimate child, the child up to the age of sixteen retains the settlement of his mother. Both cases, however, are subject to the condition that if it cannot be shown what settlement the child derived from the parent without inquiring into the derivative settlement of the parent, the child is to be deemed to be settled in the parish in which he was born. But it would also appear from the case of West Ham Union v. Holbeach Union (74 Law Journal, King's Bench, 868) in the House of Lords that, at least in the case of an illegitimate child, a settlement by residence may be independently acquired by a child under sixteen.

361. Then we come to the third case, that of settlement by marriage; what do you wish to say about this?—With regard to settlement by marriage, the wife follows her husband's settlement, and it would seem that during the subsistence of the marriage she cannot acquire a settlement of her own. She will retain the husband's settlement during widowhood.

362. Now as to the fourth case, settlement by estate?—Settlement by estate may be acquired by a person who has a freehold or other estate in a parish and resides in the parish for forty days. But the effect of Sec. 5 of the Poor Relief Act, 1722 (9 George I. c. 7), is, that no person can acquire a settlement by virtue of the purchase of an estate unless the price is £30, or unless he inhabits or actually lives on the estate. And, as has already been pointed out, Sec. 68 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, allows the settlement to be retained only so long as the person who gained it inhabits within ten miles of the parish in which it was gained.

363. The fifth kind of settlement is by apprenticeship: have you anything to say on that?—It is only necessary to say very briefly and generally that, except in the case of sea service, to which section 67 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, applies (as has been already stated), or of the service of a turnpike toll collector, a person who is bound apprentice by indenture, deed writing or contract and who inhabits in a town or parish will thereby gain a settlement (3 William and Mary, c. 11, Sec. 7.)

lement enting nement.

364. On the sixth description of settlement, that by renting a tenement, what do you wish to say?—A settlement by renting a tenement may now be acquired by a person who for one whole year rents bona fide a tenement consisting of a separate and distinct dwelling-house or building, or of land or of both at £10 a year at the least, who actually occupies the tenement under the yearly hiring, who pays the rent or at least £10 of the rent, who is assessed to and for one year pays the poor rate on the tenement, and who resides in the parish for forty days (6 George IV. c. 57, Sec. 2; 1 William IV. c. 18, Secs. 1 & 2; 4 & 5 William IV. c. 76, Sec. 66; 13 & 14 Charles II. c. 12, Sec. 1).

365. The seventh kind of settlement is that by payment of parochial rates; how is that acquired?—A settlement by payment of parochial rates may be gained by a person, who is charged with and pays his share of the public taxes of a parish in respect of a tenement of the yearly value of £10 in his ownership, or in respect of a tenement not owned by him, but consisting of a separate and distinct dwelling house or building or of land or of both bona fide rented by him for one year at £10 a year at the least, and occupied under the hiring for the term of one whole year at the least for which term £10 at least of the rent shall be actually paid. Forty days' residence after payment of the rates is a condition in this settlement (3 William and Mary c. 11, Sec. 5; 35 George III. c. 101, Sec. 4; 6 George IV. c. 57, Sec. 2; 1 William IV. c. 13, Sec. 2; 3 William and Mary c. 11, Sec. 6).

366. We now come to the last case, that of settlement by residence; will you explain the law as to this variety of settlement?—As regards the case of a settlement by residence, attention has already been drawn to the observations of the Commission of 1832, on the objections to this kind of settlement. It is, however, to be noted that a long trial of the expedient of an irremovable status had been made before Parliament undertook the creation of this new form of settlement. The settlement was first authorised in 1876. By Section 34 of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876, it was enacted that where any person shall have resided for the term of three years in any parish, in such manner and under such circumstances in each of such years as would in accordance with the several statutes in that behalf render him irremovable, he shall be deemed to be settled therein until he shall acquire a settlement in some other parish by a like residence or otherwise. Provided that an order of removal in respect of a settlement acquired under this section shall not be made upon the evidence of the person to be removed without such corroboration as the justices or court think sufficient. Generally it may be said of this enactment that it requires: (1) The residence to be continuous and (2) The residence to be in one parish or place maintaining its own poor.

Points arising out of definition of residence.

367. (Mr. Phelps.) Is residence defined?—Only judicially, not by statute.

368. (Mr. Loch.) By continuity?—There are only deductions from decided cases.

369. (Mr. Phelps.) Are you going to quote any of those cases?—I have some here.

370. (Chairman.) What is the judicial definition, or is it only deductive?—The definitions are derived from cases which have been the subject of various judicial decisions, and of which there is a considerable number, involving the construction of this particular section.

371. Are the decisions tolerably consistent?—They have been in conflict until harmonised by the House of Lords.

372. Then is this the answer to Mr. Phelps' question—that there is no definition of the exact period of residence necessary to qualify?—The three years is the exact period of residence. That period of residence must be continuous, or ought to be continuous, in the statutory sense; that is, in the same sense as residence is required to be continuous for the purpose of acquiring a status of irremovability. In acquiring the status of irremovability there are certain gaps as, for instance, when a man might be in a workhouse—that is excluded from the period. So for the purpose of the acquisition of settlement by residence, that interval may be excluded too, but each of the three years must be complete without any such interval. The three years must also be consecutive. I have several cases before me. One is the case of a woman who resided continuously for upwards of three years with her mother in the union and then went to live out of the parish as a domestic servant for a month upon trial. She intended to return to her mother's house in the event of receiving notice to leave within the month. She received notice and returned to her mother's house. In that case it was held that the continuity was broken. Then a man left his wife and children in a cottage, he himself sleeping every night for four years in another parish, as he was bound to do under the terms of his engagement. He was dismissed, and on his return was held removable. In another case absence for the purpose of fulfilling a short contract was held to be no break of residence. A woman was employed for five years as a resident nurse at an infirmary under the authority of the lady superintendent. For five months in one year and three months in the following year she acted as nurse at a branch establishment in another parish, returning each time to the infirmary where she during the first period of absence left the greater part of her effects and to which she went for change of clothing. It was held in that case that neither period of absence constituted a break of residence. (Manchester v. Ormskirk, 1886, 16 Queen's Bench Division, 723; 50 Justice of the Peace, 518). Then an illegitimate child was elected a pupil at a school for indigent blind and was allowed to return to his mother for five or six weeks each summer. It was held in his case that while at the school he had an animus revertendi (which is, of course, a most important point in dealing with cases of this class), and that he had constructively resided with his mother and her husband. (Queen v. Abingdon, 1870, Law Reports, 5 Queen's Bench, 406; 39 Law Journal, Magistrates' Cases, 153; 22 Law Times, New Series, 603). I can supplement my evidence with a further list of cases on this point.

Settlement by residence as affecting children.

373. I should like to ask you now what is the effect on the position of children as regards this kind of settlement; that is, settlement by residence?—With regard to the position of children under this enactment, it may be well to advert to the question whether a child under the age of sixteen can acquire in its own right a settlement by residence. In a case which came before the House of Lords in 1889 (Highworth and Swindon Union v Westbury-on-Severn Union, Law Reports, 14 Appeal Cases, 465) the pauper was legitimate and born in the parish of Wanborough in the Highworth and Swindon Union on the 27th of October, 1861. The pauper's father was also born in the same parish. The pauper's father and mother left Wanborough in 1862 and went to reside in the parish of Rhydgwern in the Newport Union. The father died at Rhydgwern. After his death the widow and daughter (the pauper) continued to reside at Rhydgwern, and in 1871 the widow married again and resided at Rhydgwern until the second husband died there in 1884. In 1885 the widow married a third husband and went with her husband and the pauper to reside in the parish of Westbury-on-Severn in the Westbury-on-Severn Union. The pauper was sixteen on the 27th of October, 1877. She had received no relief during eighteen years' residence at Rhydgwern, and she had resided in Rhydgwern more than three whole years after the passing of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876. Of that time the period of a year and two months was while she was under sixteen and the period of two years eight months after sixteen. The pauper became chargeable to the Westbury-on-Severn Union, and the guardians of that union obtained an order for her removal to the Highworth and Swindon union on the ground that Wanborough was the last legal settlement of her father. The House of Lords affirmed the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division quashing the order of removal. It was pointed out by Lord Halsbury, Lord Chancellor, that the pauper had by more than the necessary period of residence acquired a status of irremovability and so was settled in the parish of Rhydgwern. "It is true," his Lordship continued, "that during a part of that period she was under sixteen years of age, and it is true that if it be assumed as it was by the Court of Appeal, that unemancipated residence will not suffice, then she had not accomplished the necessary period of emancipated residence. The statute knows no such distinction. It makes the emancipated and the unemancipated equally irremovable, and if so the periods of emancipated an unemancipated residence may be put together." It will have been noticed that in this case the pauper about whose settlement the question arose had become emancipated before the requisite period of residence had been completed. In a recent case (West Ham Union v. Holbeach Union, 74 Law Journal, King's Bench, 868) Lord Halsbury, as Lord Chancellor has on an appeal to the House of Lords advanced matters to an important result. The mother of the pauper, who was illegitimate, was herself an illegitimate child and had while under the age of sixteen resided for three years with her mother and her husband in the parish of West Ham. The man resided in circumstances such as to render him irremovable and to give him a settlement in the parish. The question was whether the pauper's mother by residence during the same period in the same place with her mother and her mother's husband had, since the residence was completed before the pauper's mother attained the age of sixteen, also acquired a settlement. It followed that if the settlement was so acquired by the pauper's mother it would be an independent settlement and therefore one which the pauper would retain. The Lord Chancellor is reported to have said that the case of the Queen v. Elvet, expounded as it was by the House of Lords in the Highworth and Swindon case, decided the question. "Rightly or wrongly," his Lordship observed, "this House has decided that unemancipated residence could found a settlement in the Highworth case. I see no answer to what the Master of the Rolls pointed out [when the case of West Ham Union v. Holbeach Union was before the Court of Appeal] that if a part of the residence while under sixteen may be made available to make up the settlement that the whole residence under sixteen cannot do so also. If that decision was wrong we must abide by it till it is altered by Act of Parliament." The report of West Ham Union v. Holbeach Union implies that Lord Macnaghten, although he agreed in the conclusion that the pauper was to be regarded as settled in West Ham, had some hesitation about holding that an unemancipated child can acquire a settlement by residence no part of which is after emancipation. His Lordship did not expressly disagree with the Lord Chancellor, but found another way of arriving at the same conclusion on the actual facts of the case then before the House of Lords.

374. (Chairman.) On the last occasion we had finished your evidence as regards settlement by residence, so far as it affects the position of children. Before we leave this subject, I should like to ask you a general question, namely, has there been litigation in the past on this subject to such an extent as to put any appreciable charge on the rates?—I think so, especially in olden times ; of course, when the chargeability was parochial, there was a very great deal. Union chargeability has reduced it somewhat, but even now, occasionally, in a well fought case there is a good deal of expense.

375. These recent decisions, I assume, would tend to diminish litigation?—Clearly.

376. I think there is a system in Scotland of arbitration?—So there is in England, and I propose to explain the procedure in the course of my evidence.

377. You propose to deal with that in your subsequent evidence?—Quite so.

378. Would you like to make some comments on the effect of parochial alterations upon settlements. Will you describe the difficulties which have arisen?—From time to time, questions have arisen as to the effect of alterations of parishes upon settlements. As the older cases have been reviewed of late years, it seems to be necessary only to state the effect of the more modern decisions. In 1898, the Court of Appeal had to consider the case of the Guardians of the Dorking Union v. the Guardians of St. Saviour's Union (Law Reports 1898, 1 Queen's Bench, 594). It appeared that the pauper whose settlement was in question had been born in the Hamlet of Westcott, which, at the time, formed part of the Parish of Dorking, in the Dorking Union, and that he had never acquired a settlement elsewhere. On his becoming chargeable to the St. Saviour's Union, an order had been obtained for his removal to the Dorking Union. The guardians of the Dorking Union appealed against the order. As a consequence of the Local Government Act, 1894, Sec. 1, Sub-sec. 3, the part of the Parish of Dorking which was within the Dorking Rural Sanitary District, and the part outside became separate parishes, and the old parish ceased to exist. The Surrey County Council, under the Act of 1894, named the new parishes "Dorking" and "Dorking Rural." The hamlet of Westcott is within the parish of Dorking Rural and the Dorking Union. The Queen's Bench Division held that they were bound by the principle of the older cases, and affirmed an order of Quarter Sessions which had been made on the view that, through the destruction of the old parish of Dorking, the pauper's birth settlement had been wholly lost. The Court of Appeal upheld the decision of the Queen's Bench Division. The Court followed a decision of 1842, in the Queen v. Tipton (3 Queen's Bench, 215) which they found to have been established law for fifty years.

379. What was the next case before the High Court?—In 1900 the case of the Calne Union v. St. Mary, Islington (69 Law Journal, Queen's Bench, 400 ; 82 Law Times, New Series, 121) also had reference to a divided parish. There the division was effected by an order of the County Council, afterwards confirmed by the Local Government Board, under the Local Government Act, 1888. By the order the parish of Calne was, from and after the 25th of March, 1890, divided into the parishes of Calne Within and Calne Without. The pauper whose settlement was in question had resided from May, 1887, to September, 1891, in that portion of the original parish of Calne which became the parish of Calne Within. His residence was in such manner and under such circumstances as to render him irremovable from the Calne Union. The order contained a provision to the effect that every person who, on or before the 25th of March, 1890, had acquired a settlement in the then existing parish of Calne, should be deemed to have acquired a settlement in Calne Within or in Calne Without, according to the circumstances. In September, 1891, the pauper ceased to reside in Calne Within, but, had the order not been made, he would have acquired a residential settlement in the parish of Calne by virtue of Sec. 34 of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876. The order of removal from Islington to Calne Union was quashed by the London Quarter Sessions. The decision of Quarter Sessions was upheld by the Queen's Bench Division. The Court pointed out that though the Local Government Board, by the terms of their order, had endeavoured, partially at all events, to meet the difficulty which arose out of the Dorking decision, the terms of the order did not cover the particular case. Those terms applied to persons who had acquired a settlement and not to persons who were in the process of acquiring a settlement. And the pauper on the day when the division took place had not acquired a settlement since the period of his residence fell short by about two months of the required time.

Union Mary ton.

380. Have you another case of parochial change?—In another case it appeared that a pauper had, by residence from 1886 to 1891, acquired a settlement in the parish of Broadwater. By virtue of the Local Government Act, 1894, the parish of Broadwater had been divided into two parishes, namely, Broadwater and Worthing. The residence had been in that part of the original parish of Broadwater which became the parish of Worthing. In 1902, by a Provisional Order under the Local Government Act, 1888, for the extension of the Borough of Worthing, a part of the then parish of Broadwater with parts of other parishes was formed into the new parish of Worthing. Certain other divisions and amalgamations of parishes were made by the same Provisional Order. The Provisional Order enacted that, for all purposes of settlement and removal, residence prior to its commencement in any part of the existing parishes of Broadwater and Worthing should be deemed to have been residence in the parish in which the part was included. It was held by the Queen's Bench Division that the Provisional Order did not operate to restore the settlement of the pauper in the old parish of Broadwater, which had been destroyed by the Local Government Act, 1894, and that the pauper was not settled in the parish of Worthing. (East Preston Union v. Lewisham Union ; 91 Law Times, New Series, 498 ; 68 Justice of the Peace, 404).

East Preston Union v. Lewisham Union.

381. Will you now give the particulars of the latest instance of this kind?—A pauper lunatic had been born in the parish of West Ham, and had resided there for seventeen years so as to render her irremovable. By an order of the Local Government Board in August, 1886, a certain part of the parish of Wanstead became, under the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876, and the Poor Law Act, 1879, amalgamated with West Ham Union v. London County Council.

* N.B.—It should be borne in mind that, since the dates at which this witness appeared before the Royal Commission, various Statutory enactments and judicial decisions have, in several respects, affected the legal position as described in his evidence.

the parish of West Ham. The pauper lunatic left the parish of West Ham and did not thereafter acquire a settlement in any parish, but in February, 1900, was adjudged chargeable to the County of London. A subsequent order of justices adjudged the settlement to be in the West Ham Union. The London Quarter Sessions quashed the order, holding that the reasoning of the Tipton case of 1842, and of the Dorking case applied "not only to a district where a parish is divided, but also to where a district is destroyed by reason of amalgamation." The case eventually came before the House of Lords. Some of their Lordships commented upon the Queen v. Tipton, and the Dorking case, in terms suggestive of doubt as to the soundness of the views taken in those cases. But the Lord Chancellor pointed out that the particular case then before the House presented none of the circumstances on which the other cases had been decided. His Lordship went on to remark that the argument was that something had been added to the parish of West Ham, and that the addition was to make the whole difference in the rights and liabilities of the parish. "I am wholly unable," said the Lord Chancellor, "to follow the reasoning which suggests that this parish has changed its identity. It is the same parish in all the things which constitute identity of an administrative body, and the fact that a small part has been added to it so as to bring it within the area of that which is the limit for administrative purposes, seems to me not in the smallest degree to interfere with the identity of that which is really the same parish which existed before. It would indeed be only an attempt at logic run mad to suggest that by reason of an addition to a parish it ceased to be the same parish and became a new creature created by the mere fact of that addition." Accordingly the House of Lords upheld the decision of the Court of Appeal restoring the order whereby the pauper lunatic was adjudged to be settled in the West Ham Union, (Guardians of West Ham Union v. The London County Council; Law Reports, 1904, Appeal Cases, 40; 73 Law Journal, King's Bench, 85; 89 Law Times Reports, New Series, 614.)

Remedial. Clauses in recent Orders as to Parochial changes.

382. Have the Local Government Board made attempts to meet the difficulties to which you have referred?—It has been seen that in some of the cases involving parochial alterations attention was drawn to provisions in orders of the Local Government Board respecting settlement and removal. Changes have from time to time been made by the Board with the object of bringing these clauses into line with the later decisions. The subject is confessedly most difficult. But in their later clauses the Board have endeavoured as fully as possible to cover the cases in which parochial alterations concern settlements and the status of irremovability in course of acquisition as well as actually acquired. I hand in specimens of these Clauses taken from recent Orders and Provisional Orders. (See Appendix, Vol. I. (A), No. I. (f)).

Points arising out of Dorking Union v. St. Saviour's Union.

383. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Does the Dorking case still stand notwithstanding the recent judgment of the House of Lords in the case you have just cited?—The Tipton decision, on which that case rested, has been shaken somewhat, but it has not been actually over-ruled.

384. It is the case, is not it, that it has been said in the Court of Appeal that the result of the Dorking case is a very unreasonable one?—I do not recall that.

385. Leading to this: that where there is an alteration in the boundary of the parish for the purpose of settlement, a pauper is practically held to be born nowhere?—I do not remember that; and, moreover, the Dorking case is one that is curable by order and provisional order. The vice of the Dorking case, if it had one, was, according to the suggestion of the House of Lords, that it followed too rigidly the decision in the Tipton case in 1842; but it is one of the cases that are curable without an alteration of the law.

386. Still the administration has proceeded upon the Dorking case in many individual instances. I suppose, if questions arise as between parishes, the Dorking case has resulted in this; that it has been difficult to fix a settlement, when the settlement, but for it, would have been clearly within the parish the boundary of which had not been altered?—Undoubtedly that may have been so in the past, but it need not be so, as regards the future, I take it.

Irremovability.

387. (Chairman.) You now wish to discuss the law respecting the status of irremovability?—It may be noted that in the older law there are some slight traces of judicial attempts to recognise irremovability as apart from settlement, in cases not expressly classed as casual poor. Thus in Cowred's case (1694 Comberbach, 287), a Dutch woman and her two children landed at Harwich from Holland, and, removing to another place, were sent back to Harwich by an order of two justices. "Landing makes no settlement," said one judge; and another observed: "You must keep them when you have them, for aught I know, for it seems to be casus omissus." In Berkhampstead v. St. Mary North Church (1735, 2 Bott, pl. 51), a deserted wife had been left two houses; she resided with her children in one; and, on her application for relief, two justices made an order for the removal of the children to the place of the father's settlement. On the case as stated for the opinion of the Court of King's Bench, Lord Hardwicke the Chief Justice, could only deal with the question of a derivative settlement from the mother. On that question he took the view that the mother could not gain a settlement for her children; but Mr. Justice Lee thought that, though the mother could not gain a settlement for the children, she could gain a right of residence for them. About the same time, in The King v. Barton Turfe (Burrow; Settlement Cases, 49), Mr. Justice Lee cited an earlier authority, namely, a case between the parishes of Edgware and Harrow, in Queen Anne's time, in which Chief Justice Parker had held that the settlement of children was gained, not by inheritance, but by their being "irremovable." The present state of the law, which exempts a poor person from removal from a union other than that which contains his parish of settlement, has been reached by a succession of stages, beginning in 1846, and ending in 1865. In 1846 Parliament passed the Poor Removal Act, 1846. By this Statute (9 and 10 Vic., c. 66), it was enacted that: "No person shall be removed, nor shall any warrant be granted for the removal of any person, from any parish in which such person shall have resided for five years next before the application for the warrant; provided always that the time during which such person shall be a prisoner in a prison or shall be serving Her Majesty as a soldier, marine, or sailor, or reside as an in-pensioner in Greenwich or Chelsea Hospitals, or shall be confined in a lunatic asylum or house duly licensed or hospital registered for the reception of lunatics, or as a patient in a hospital, or during which any such person shall receive relief from any parish or shall be wholly or in part maintained by any rate or subscription raised in a parish in which such person does not reside, not being a bona fide charitable gift, shall for all purposes be excluded in the computation of time hereinbefore mentioned." By the Poor Removal Act, 1861 (24 and 25, Vict., c. 55) it was enacted that after the 25th of March, 1862, three years should be substituted for five years, and that residence in any part of a union should have the same effect as residence in any parish; so that, with the further amendment effected by the Poor Removal Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict., c. 105, Sec. 1), the time required for the status of irremovability may be made up from periods of residence in any part of a union. The alteration made by the Act of 1861 was followed by the Union Chargeability Act, 1865, which, from and after Lady Day, 1866, reduced the statutory period to one year. Legislation subsequent to the Poor Removal Act, 1846, added, as periods to be excluded in the calculation required by that Act, the following: The time of detention in a lunatic asylum (12 & 13 Vic. c. 103, Sec. 4); the time of detention in an industrial school (29 & 30 Vic. c. 118, Sec. 31); the time of detention in a retreat for drunkards, or inebriate reformatory (42 & 43 Vic. c. 19, Sec. 31; 61 & 62 Vic. c. 60, Sec. 22). At this stage, it may be convenient to supplement what I said on a previous occasion with regard to the explanation of the law so far as it affects the question of residence for the purpose of acquiring a status of irremovability. At the same time, it must be borne in mind that the law, being dependent almost entirely on judicial decisions, is of such volume as to render it impracticable for me to attempt more than a very brief summary of the effect of the principal cases. The summary may be divided into two parts. The first part deals with the question: What constitutes residence? The second part is concerned with the question of continuity, and with illustrating the nature of the absence permissible without breach of continuity. Residence, then, for this purpose has the simplest characteristics. "Where the object is to ascertain the settlement of a pauper," said Mr. Justice Coleridge, in Blackwell v. England (1857, 8 Ellis & Blackburn, 541), "there he resides where his head lies at night." "The beginning of a settlement," said Mr. Justice Erle in the same case, "was when the inhabitants had notice that the party intended to abide with them as an inhabitant. For that purpose his sleeping in the parish was most important. In that branch of law, therefore, pernoctation is the test of residence. But that is a very narrow ground of construction confined to the Poor Law." In order to constitute residence within the meaning of the Poor Removal Act, 1866, "it need not necessarily be in a house," said Cockburn, the Lord Chief Justice, in The Queen v. St. Leonard's Shoreditch (Law Reports, 1865, 1 Queen's Bench, 21; 6 Best & Smith, 784; 35 Law Journal, Magistrates' Cases, 48). "There are unfortunate persons who constantly sleep in such temporary shelter as the dry arches of a bridge afford . . . " and the Lord Chief Justice thought that a person living in the open air is, as to residence, in the same position as one who has a house to live in. With regard to continuity, it is to be observed that there must be no breach of residence; but what amounts to a break in construction of law is a question which is often one of considerable difficulty. Removal under an order is a complete break. "We take it to be clear, as a general proposition," said Lord Denman, the Chief Justice, in The Queen v. The Inhabitants of Halifax, (12 Queen's Bench (848) 111) "that removal puts an end to residence. A review of the statutes . . . shews that the pauper was considered originally as an intruder upon the inhabitants and the power of removing was given to prevent his becoming an inhabitant. A removal, therefore, is in its nature a disruption of residence and inhabitancy." But as a general proposition it may also be laid down that an absence for a merely temporary purpose does not necessarily cause a break of residence. There must, however, in all such cases be an intention to return; there must also be a residence to which to return; and the absence must not be too prolonged. The cases are very numerous, and it is impossible to present them here in any complete form; but two may be selected as illustrative. In The Queen v. Glossop (Law Reports, 1866, 1 Queen's Bench, 227), Mr. Justice Blackburn remarked: "The cases on this subject turn on their particular circumstances, but the result of them is that where a person goes away from a parish for a temporary purpose, leaving a house or lodging behind him, he is still in effect residing in the parish. On the other hand, if he goes away, even leaving wife and children behind him, and establishes himself elsewhere, there is no residence. There must be both a place which he has a right to return to and an intention to return, to constitute a constructive residence; and where a man has gone away and left no residence, though he means to return at a future time, the animus revertendi is immaterial. In The Queen v. Stapleton (1 Ellis and Blackburn, 766), Lord Campbell, the Chief Justice, said, "I think when a man is absent for a temporary purpose with an intention to return when that temporary purpose is served, as, for instance, when he is absent for a week's work in another parish, meaning to come back at the end of the week, it is no break in his residence. The phrase 'temporary purpose' is not very definite; still I think it may, in each case, be known whether the purpose was temporary or not." And Mr. Justice Crompton added: "An absence for a mere temporary purpose with an intention to return, will be no break in the residence. But an intention to return at a remote period, after a permanent absence, is not sufficient to prevent the absence from being a break. When the animus revertendi merely means that, though the absent person has what amounts to a residence elsewhere, it is his intention to return when that residence is at an end, I think that the animus revertendi cannot be said to make his absence temporary and not permanent." Another feature which has to be borne in mind when the statutory provisions respecting the acquisition of a status of irremovability are under consideration is the deduction of time authorised by Statute in the computation of the period of residence. Attention has already been drawn to the language of the Acts on this subject. But in this instance also the cases are numerous, and the rules furnished by them can only be stated in very general terms. These rules are: that the time of absence, in the circumstances described by the Statute, is to be deducted from the total period of residence; that the period arrived at by this method of computation will be effective for the purposes of the Acts if the pauper immediately returns to the parish on the completion of the term of absence. It should be added that the foregoing explanation with regard to the residence required for the status of irremovability applies also to the acquisition of a settlement by residence, subject to the condition that there must not be in the qualifying period of three consecutive years any such interval as may be excluded for purposes of irremovability.

388. Have you any observations to make on the subject of casual poor?—Judicial decisions have established the status of irremovability in the case of casual poor; that is to say, a person who, being casually within a parish, without any intention of taking up a residence there, requires relief. Thus, in an early case (The King v. The Inhabitants of St. James in Bury St. Edmunds, 10 East, 25,) the Court of King's Bench confirmed an order of sessions quashing an order for the removal to his parish of settlement of a day labourer employed to drive a load of hay to another parish from which he was to return with a load of another description, and in which, as it happened, he broke his leg and required relief. Lord Ellenborough, referring to the words of the 13 & 14 Charles II. c. 12, which describes persons who may be removed as persons coming to settle, observed that this expression "denotes that the party comes animo morandi or manendi; it may be for a temporary purpose, but still it must be understood that he comes to settle there . . . but how can it be said that the pauper went into this parish animo morandi at all?"

Irremovability of Casual Poor.

King v. Inhabitants of St. James, Bury St. Edmunds.

389. What other instances of irremovability do you wish to give?—A man may not be casual poor. He may have come to settle, but before the expiration of the time needed for the acquisition of a status of irremovability, he may need temporary relief on account of sickness. To meet such a case, the Poor Removal Act, 1846 (Sec. 4) provided that no warrant should be granted for the removal of any person becoming chargeable in respect of relief made necessary by sickness or accident, unless the justices granting the warrant should state in such warrant that they are satisfied that the sickness or accident will produce permanent disability. The same Act further provided that no woman residing in any parish with her husband at the time of his death should be removed; and that no warrant should be granted for her removal from the parish for twelve calendar months next after his death, if she so long continue a widow. (Sec. 2.) With regard to children, the Act (Sec. 3) prohibits the removal of a child under the age of sixteen (whether legitimate or illegitimate) residing in a parish with his or her father or mother, stepfather or stepmother, or reputed father, in any case where the father, mother, stepfather, stepmother, or reputed father may not lawfully be removed from the parish. With respect to orphans, it is enacted by the Poor Removal Act, 1861, that "where a child under the age of sixteen, residing with its surviving parent shall be left an orphan, and such parent shall, at the time of death, have acquired an exemption from removal by reason of a continued residence, such orphan shall, if not otherwise irremovable, be exempt from removal in like manner and to the same extent as if it had then acquired for itself an exemption from removal by residence" (24 & 25, Vict. c. 55, Sec. 2). The Poor Removal Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 111) added as a proviso to Sec. 1 of the Poor Removal Act, 1846, the following: "Provided always that whenever any person should have a wife or children having no other settlement than his or her own, such wife and children should be removable from any parish or place from which he or she would be removable, notwithstanding any provisions of the said recited Act, and should not be removable from any parish or place from which he or she would not be removable by reason of any provision in the said recited Act. The case of a deserted wife is met by the Poor Removal Act, 1861, Sec. 3, and the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 113, Sec. 17). The combined effect is that where a married woman is deserted by her husband, and, after the desertion, resides for a year in such a manner as would, if she were a widow, render her exempt from removal, she is exempt from removal from the parish of her residence, unless her husband return to cohabit with her.

Irremovability in cases of Sickness, widows, children, deserted wives.

390. You now wish to advert to the cases of Scotch and Irish paupers, and paupers born in the Isle of Man the Isles of Scilly, Jersey and Guernsey?—A very brief mention may suffice for the law as it affects paupers in England who have been born in Scotland, Ireland, the Isles of Man, Scilly, Jersey or Guernsey. (8 and 9 Vic. c. 117; 10 and 11 Vic. c. 33; 25 and 26 Vic. c. 113; 26 and 27 Vic. c. 89). If any such person is not settled in England, and becomes chargeable, he may be removed to his native country. To this rule there are important exceptions in the case of Irish paupers. The Poor Removal Act, 1900 (63 and 64 Vic. c. 23), with regard to this class, enacts that a person who has resided continuously for five years in England shall not thereafter be removable to Ireland. The Act also allows agreements for non-resident relief in England at the cost of an Irish union in any case in which a pauper would be removable to Ireland.

391. The Irish pauper, I understand, becomes chargeable to England after five years' residence?—Practically so.

392. What you have told us as regards the previous questions would answer the question as to what place you would charge for the maintenance?—Quite so.

393. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) There is no appeal in England to the Local Government Board against the action of a board of guardians for removal to Ireland or Scotland, is there?—There is an appeal by the Irish Local Government Board to Quarter Sessions, as if they were a party. That authority has been exercised in some instances. I shall refer to one of those cases.

394. I am rather alluding to England. There is a power to appeal, by a board of guardians in England or in Ireland, against the removal from Scotland to England or Ireland, but I understand there is no parallel appeal in England to the Local Government Board here by a parish in Scotland to which a pauper is to be removed?—Not to the Local Government Board.

Removal of Scotch and Irish paupers. Procedure.

395. (Chairman). What is the procedure for the removal of Scotch and Irish paupers?—Provision is made as regards those paupers who are removable from England for the attendance of the pauper before two justices. The justices are to hear and examine into the complaint by the English board of guardians, and must be satisfied that the person is liable to be removed, and that he is in such a state of health as not to be liable to suffer bodily or mental injury by the removal. If they see fit, the justices may issue a warrant for the removal. Before execution, a copy of the warrant is to be sent by post to the Scotch or Irish Poor Law Authority. Women and children must not be removed to Scotland or Ireland as deck passengers during winter. No person employed in the execution of a warrant may wilfully desert a person mentioned in the warrant before that person has been conveyed to the place of destination. In the case of Irish paupers, the Irish Local Government Board may appeal against the order of removal. A brief reference may be made to decided cases which illustrate the working of this branch of the law. The person born in Ireland, and those other places mentioned, must be one of those to be removed. If he be dead, or have absconded, or be not removable, his children cannot be removed. So two legitimate children born in England of of a man born in Ireland who had deserted and whose wife, an Irishwoman, was dead, were held to be removable to their birth settlement in England, and not to Ireland (Queen v. All Saints, Derby; 14 Queen's Bench, 207; 19 Law Journal, Magistrates' Cases, 14.) A girl born in England of Irish parents, without settlement in England, lived with a man in an English parish, from which her father was not removable. It was held that she was properly removed to the place of her birth settlement. (Queen v. St. Giles' Without, Cripplegate; 17 Queen's Bench, 636; 21 Law Journal, Magistrates' Cases, 26; 15 Jurist, 1152.) An Irishwoman deserted by her husband cannot be removed to Ireland, because the procedure only applies where the head of the family is removable and the husband and wife are removed together. (Poor Law Commissioners of Ireland v. Vestry of Liverpool; Law Reports, 5 Queen's Bench, 79; 10 Best and Smith, 921; 39 Law Journal, Magistrates' Cases, 25). A woman with an English settlement married an Irishman who never had a settlement in England. The wife was deserted, and she and her children were held to be removable to the place of her maiden settlement in England (Much Hoole Overseers v. Preston Overseers; 17, Queen's Bench, 518; 21 Law Journal, Magistrates' Cases, 1; 15 Jurist, 1152).

Queen v. All Saints, Derby.

Queen v. St. Giles' Without, Cripplegate.

Poor Law Commissioners of Ireland v. Vestry of Liverpool.

Much Hoole Overseers v. Preston Overseers.

396. As I understand if an Irishwoman marries and is deserted by her husband, there is no power of removal?—There is no power of removal to Ireland.

397. Assuming she became in any way chargeable to the parish in which she resided, would they have power to recover against the husband?—They could proceed against him for desertion. They could proceed against him under the English law, assuming of course, that he was in England.

398. But assume he was not in England?—Then they could not.

399. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Is that because the wife follows her husband's settlement?—No; it is because under those Statutes the removal can only take place when the head of the family is one of the persons to be removed.

400. (Mr. Booth.) That solely concerns the Irish parts?—And the Isles of Man, Scilly, Jersey and Guernsey.

401. And Scotland?—Yes.

Order of removal: Procedure

402. (Chairman) Will you describe the procedure for obtaining an order of removal?—With regard to the procedure for obtaining an order of removal from one part of England to another, it is perhaps unnecessary to say any more than will suffice to indicate the broad outline of practice. Before proceeding to obtain an order, a notice of chargeability may be given to the Poor Law Union of settlement so as to obviate subsequent difficulty about the recovery of the cost of maintenance. No order is needed where the guardians of the Poor Law Union of settlement elect to receive the paupers. In other circumstances the proceedings begin by a complaint made to two or more justices in Petty Sessions, a stipendiary, or a Metropolitan Police Magistrate. An examination of the pauper usually follows, and if he is suffering from sickness or the effects of an accident, it will be necessary to ascertain his actual condition since Sec. 4 of the Poor Removal Act 1846 enacts that no warrant shall be granted for the removal of any person becoming chargeable in respect of relief made necessary by sickness or accident, unless the justices granting the warrant shall state in such warrant that they are satisfied that the sickness or accident will produce permanent disability. Where an order of removal is made, it must expressly adjudicate and aver that the place named as that to which the pauper is to be removed is the place of his last legal settlement (Trowbridge v. Weston, 2 Salkeld, 473; 2 Bott pl. 834; Bury v. Arundel, 2 Salkeld 479: 2 Bott pl. 835). The fact of chargeability should also be adjudged, and if members of the pauper's family are to be removed they should be named. When the order has been made, the guardians to whom the order is directed may agree to receive the pauper, and the removal may then take place without delay (4 & 5 William IV. c. 76, Sec. 79); otherwise the removal cannot be effected until 21 days after a notice in writing of the pauper's chargeability or relief and a copy of the order with a statement of the grounds of removal, including the particulars of the settlement, have been sent to the guardians to whom the order is directed (4 & 5 William IV. c. 76, Sec. 79; 11 & 12 Vic. c. 31 Sec. 2). If, within the period of 21 days, notice of appeal is given, the pauper cannot be removed until after the time for prosecuting the appeal has expired, or if the appeal is prosecuted, until after its final determination (4 & 5 William IV. c. 76, Sec. 79). Also within the same period of 21 days, the guardians to whom the order is directed may apply for a copy of the depositions upon which the order was made. In that case they will have an additional 14 days for giving notice of appeal (11 & 12 Vic. c. 31, Sec. 9).

Trowbridge v. Weston

Suspension of order.

403. Have you any observations concerning the suspension of orders of removal?—At the time of making an order, its execution may be suspended where the pauper is unable to travel by reason of sickness or other infirmity (35 Geo. III. c. 101, Sec. 2), and the suspension will continue until the order can safely be executed without danger to any person who is the subject of the order, unless meanwhile the person ordered to be removed dies.

Incidents, &c., of order of removal.

404. Will you advert to other incidents and consequences of an order of removal?—Where the order is executed and, within 12 months after the removal, and without the consent of the guardians, the pauper returns and becomes chargeable to the union from which he was removed, he is to be deemed an idle and disorderly person within the meaning of the Vagrancy Act 1824 (5 Geo. IV. c. 83). An order of removal may be abandoned. It may also be made the subject of an appeal. The procedure on appeal is the subject of detailed regulation in the Poor Law Acts. The order, however, may also be made the subject of a Special Case stated for the opinion of the High Court under the 12 & 13 Vic. c. 45, Sec. 11 (Baines's Act). The same Act (12 & 13 Vic. c. 45, Sec. 12) also authorises references to arbitration.

Determination of questions Central Authority

405. The Poor Law provides facilities for the official determination of questions of chargeability. Will you describe the procedure?—In their first annual Report the Poor Law Board drew attention to a legislative experiment designed to provide an inexpensive method of determining questions arising with regard to the chargeability of paupers between the parishes in a union or between the guardians and any parish. This experiment was authorised by the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 110, Sec. 4

(the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1848). The effect of the enactment was that, where a question arose with reference to the charging of the cost of the relief of a pauper or as to whether a pauper were exempted from removal, the parties might jointly submit the question to the Poor Law Board, who might thereupon, if they thought proper, entertain the question and by an order under seal determine it. Upon this enactment the Poor Law Board remarked: "We do not presume to claim great or undue weight for the judgments which we may form upon such questions, so far as they involve legal construction or the application of principles of law, but we are enabled to give immediate answers to questions which require to be promptly disposed of, as they relate to the charge of certain current expenses; and our jurisdiction in this matter is free from the legal technicalities which attend proceedings in courts of law, and no charge is entailed on the parties appealing to us." A further experiment of a more comprehensive character was made in 1851. The Poor Law Amendment Act of that year materially enlarged the scope of the references to the Poor Law Board. Sec. 12 of the 14 & 15 Vic. c. 105 is in these terms: "The guardians of any two unions or parishes, or the guardians of a union and the guardians of a parish, or the guardians of a union or parish and the overseers of any parish, or the overseers of any two parishes, between whom any question affecting the settlement, removal or chargeability of any poor person shall arise may, if they think fit so to do, by agreement in writing executed in respect of any guardians by sealing with their common seal, and in respect of overseers by the signatures of a majority of them, submit such question to the Poor Law Board for their decision, and the said Board may, if they see fit, entertain such question, and by an order under seal determine the same, and every such order shall be in all courts and for all purposes final and conclusive, between the parties submitting such question, as to the question therein determined." The Poor Law Board were able very soon after the passing of the Act to report as follows: "We have already reason to believe that this cheap and simple mode of determining such controversies will be adopted very extensively, and though it may increase our own labours materially, we have the satisfaction of believing that it will be productive of important public benefits, not only by effecting a large pecuniary saving to ratepayers, but by diminishing those animosities and heartburnings which costly litigation so naturally produces and exasperates."

406. Have there been many applications to the Local Government Board under the procedure you have described?—I have not the numbers with me. Of course, in the past there naturally would be more when parochial chargeability involved questions between parish and parish. The present number, I should say, is not very large.

407. You would like to refer to one or two instances of Parliamentary inquiry into the operation of the law of settlement and removal?—The object of my reference is merely, and in as brief a way as possible, to direct the attention of the Commission to a few reports which they may think it worth while to peruse. A Select Committee of the House of Commons, in 1847, inquired into the operation of the law of settlement and of the Poor Removal Act (9 and 10, Vic. c. 66.) The Committee reported that there were difficulties in the administration of the Act attributable to doubts entertained as to the construction of an important proviso in the first section, but that, whatever might be the extent of the evils attributable to these doubts, the Committee did not consider them urgent enough to require immediate legislation. On the general subject (the operation of the law of settlement) the Committee eventually reported on the 6th of July, 1847, that they had taken much evidence and had received suggestions, that from the evidence reported to the House it would be seen that almost every different plan suggested for the reform of the existing laws of settlement and removal had been distinctly brought before the Committee and discussed by them. The Committee, however, did not submit any specific plan for the amendment of the law. It is because these various plans are enumerated in their Report that mention is made of that Committee. In 1854 the House of Commons appointed a Select Committee to enquire into the operation of the Act 8 and 9 Vic., c. 117 relating to the removal from England of chargeable poor persons born in Scotland, Ireland, the Isles of Man, Scilly, Jersey or Guernsey, and also into the operation of the Act 8 and 9 Vic., c. 33 relating to the removal from Scotland of chargeable poor persons born in England, Ireland or the Isle of Man. The Committee merely reported evidence and recommended the resumption of their inquiry. The Committee by whom the inquiry was continued reported on the 13th of June, 1855, and their Report is exceedingly interesting. It is not necessary to set out the details of the recommendations.

408. Was any action taken on these recommendations?—Yes, small amendments were made. The Report is interesting as a whole.

Select Committees of 1860 and 1879.

409. (Mr. Nunn.) May I ask the year of that report?—1855. On the 6th August, 1860, another Select Committee was appointed by the House of Commons to inquire into the operation of the English Acts. The last investigation was that by a Select Committee of the House of Commons in 1879. The Select Committee reported on the 10th of July, 1879. The following passages deserve mention: "Three modifications of the law have been suggested which may be briefly stated as: first, one year's residence in a union or birth to be the only heads of settlement, certain derivative settlements being retained; second, chargeability orders to be substituted for removal orders, so that a pauper while relieved in the place where he applies for relief would be paid for by the place of his settlement; third, the county rate which is now in certain cases chargeable for lunatics and for the burial of bodies washed on shore to be made chargeable in other cases. . . . Your Committee having given due weight to the various arguments and opinions that have been placed before them, recommend that in England the law of removal should be abolished, and that for the purposes of poor relief settlement should be disregarded, with the following exception: That with respect to seaport towns, persons landing in a destitute condition, and immediately applying there for relief, be chargeable to the place of their settlement for non-resident indoor relief."

410. (Chairman.) No action has been taken on the Report of that Committee?—Unless the action of Parliament in passing the Irish Act of 1900 may be said to be a step in the direction of that part of the recommendation which related to non-resident relief.

411. That finishes your evidence with regard to the law of settlement, I think.—Quite so.

412. I wish to ask you a general question, if you can answer it. You have given very valuable evidence and your experience must be very great. Assuming there must be a law of settlement, are you fairly well satisfied with the operation of the law as it is, and as it is interpreted? Are there any obvious improvements to your mind that could be made in the law of settlement?—Possibly the procedure could be simplified.

413. In looking at the complexity of the subject, you are of opinion on the whole, that the law operates fairly well?—Because you start from the proposition as a basis that there must be a law of settlement. I think from that it does follow that a great deal of the existing law must be retained.

414. Have you ever considered whether it is possible to abolish the law of settlement?—I cannot say that. I am afraid that is much too thorny a subject. The nearest approach that I can indicate to what may be thought to be a line of possible amendment is the Irish Act of 1900.

415. (Mr. Patten MacDougall). Shall we be able to get approximately the cost of litigation on questions of settlement as between English parishes?—I could not give the evidence.

416. (Sir Samuel Provis). There was a Parliamentary Return some few years ago, I think?—I do not know of it

417. (Mr. Phelps). Do you find a growing tendency on the part of boards of guardians to appeal to the Local Government Board in cases of settlement rather than to litigation?—I can only say that there are a fair number of cases that come before the Local Government Board each year, but one hardly has the information necessary to enable one to say whether those references or the appeals to the Sessions are the more numerous.

BASTARDY.

418. (Chairman). With regard to the subject of bastardy, I understand that the Royal Commission of 1832 made various representations. Have you a summary of their views?—On the subject of bastardy, the Royal Commission of 1832 found the law in a very unsatisfactory state. Under the 49 Geo. III c. 68, any single woman might declare herself to be pregnant, and charge any person with being the father. Thereupon a justice, on the application of the overseers or of a substantial householder, might issue a warrant for the immediate apprehension of the putative father, who could be committed to gaol unless he gave security to indemnify the parish, or entered into a recognizance with sufficient surety to appear at the Quarter Sessions and to perform the order to be made at the Sessions. Under this Act, the proceedings might be altogether ex parte. There was no machinery for bringing the putative father before the justice. When brought up by warrant, the committing justice had no power to examine into the merits. Committal to gaol was inevitable, failing security or a recognizance. The practice under this law was regarded by the Commissioners as open to grave objection. On the birth of a child, an order was made on the woman and the man for a weekly contribution to the parish. Nothing was in fact paid by the woman. Whatever the man paid was handed over to the woman; but the woman was in any case guaranteed by the parish in respect of the amount of his contribution whether actually received by the parish or not. The sum exacted from the man was in most cases higher than what would be charged for putting the child out to nurse, or than the parish allowance if the child had been legitimate and the father dead. Several illegitimate children became a source of emolument to the mother, and marriage was often brought about by the desire of the man to escape imprisonment or by the attraction of the woman's income. The conclusion of the Commissioners was that the evidence had shown that, as a general rule, the Bastardy Laws increased the expense which they were intended to compensate and offered temptations to the crime which they were intended to punish, and that their working was frequently accompanied by perjury and extortion, disgrace to the innocent and reward to the shameless and unprincipled, and all the domestic misery and vice which are the necessary consequence of premature and ill-assorted marriage. The Commissioners accordingly recommended the entire abolition of the Bastardy Laws. They further recommended in substitution: 1. That every illegitimate child born after the passing of the intended Act for the amendment of the law should, until it attained the age of sixteen, follow its mother's settlement; 2. That the mother of an illegitimate child born after the passing of the Act should be required to support it, and that any relief occasioned by the wants of the child should be considered relief afforded to the parent; 3. That the same liability should be extended to her husband; 4. That there should be repealed that part of the 35 Geo. III. c. 101, Sec. 6 which made an unmarried pregnant woman removable, and the 50 Geo. III. c. 51, Sec. 2, which authorised the committal of the mother of a chargeable bastard to the House of Correction; and lastly, 5. That the second section of the 18 Elizabeth, c. 3, and all other Acts which punished or charged the putative father, should, as to all bastards born after the passing of the intended Act, be repealed.

Views and recommendations of Commission of Inquiry.

Alterations made by Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834.

419. What was done by the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, to give effect to these recommendations?—In Sections 57 and 69 to 76 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, effect was given to the main proposals of the Royal Commission and a new procedure against the putative father was set up. Of the sections referred to two only are nowadays of importance. These are Sections 57 and 71. Sec. 57 enacts that every man who, after the passing of the Act of 1834, marries a woman having a child or children, whether legitimate or illegitimate, shall be liable to maintain the child or children as part of his family, and shall be chargeable with all relief granted to or on account of the child or children until the child or children shall attain the age of sixteen, or until the death of the mother, and the child or children shall, for the purposes of the Act, be deemed a part of the husband's family. Sec. 71 provides as follows:—"Every child which shall be born a bastard after the passing of this Act shall have and follow the settlement of the mother of such child until such child shall attain the age of sixteen or shall acquire a settlement in its own right, and such mother so long as she shall be unmarried or a widow shall be bound to maintain such child as a part of her family until such child shall attain the age of sixteen, and all relief granted to such child while under the age of sixteen shall be considered as granted to the mother: Provided always that such liability of such mother as aforesaid shall cease on the marriage of such child, if a female."

Existing statute law as to bastardy.

420. Can you describe the more modern statute law?—The existing statute law on the subject of bastardy is contained in more recent enactments. These are to be found in the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844 (Secs. 4 to 10, and Sec. 70), in the Bastardy Act, 1845 (8 Vic. c. 10), in the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vic. c. 65), the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1873 (36 Vic. c. 9), and the Bastardy Orders Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vic. c. 32). The effect of the more material of these provisions is as follows:—Any single woman with child or delivered of a bastard may, either before the birth or at any time within 12 months from the birth of a child, or at any time thereafter on proof that the putative father has within the 12 months next after the birth paid money for the maintenance of the child, or at any time within 12 months next after the return to England of the putative father on proof that he ceased to reside in England within the 12 months next after the birth, make application to a justice for a summons against the putative father. If the application is made before the birth the woman must make a deposition on oath stating who is the father. The justice shall issue his summons requiring the putative father to appear at a Petty Session (35 & 36 Vic. c. 65, Sec. 3). Another form of application is permissible. This application is authorised by the 36 Vic. c. 9, Sec. 5. It is made by the guardians, and it can only be made after the birth of the child, and after the child becomes chargeable. Where the guardians apply, their application must be made to two justices, and thereupon the justices may summon the putative father to appear before any two justices to show cause why an order should not be made upon him to contribute towards the relief of the child.

Application for order by woman and by guardians.

421. Will you give some explanation of these kinds of procedure?—The application by the mother may be made by a widow or even by a married woman. Instances of the latter sort are those where the woman lives apart from her husband. A married woman living with her husband cannot apply (Jones v. Davies; Law Reports, 1901, 1 King's Bench, 118; 70 Law Journal, King's Bench, 38). But the cases do not extend to that of a woman who, being single when the child is born, marries before making the application, or who, having made an application while single, and having failed to serve the summons through the man having absconded, marries and then renews the application. With regard to the other kind of application, that of the guardians, it is to be observed that the foundation for this is the actual chargeability of the child. Hence there may be a difficulty in making the putative father contributory in the event of the cessation of chargeability, unless within the prescribed time the woman has also availed herself of her right to apply. The marriage of the woman to a man who has the means of maintaining the child is not a bar to proceedings against the putative father where the child is chargeable (Plymouth Guardians v. Gibbs; Law Reports, 1903, 1 King's Bench, 177; 72 Law Journal, King's Bench, 33; 87 Law Times, New Series, 683.) In that case the woman, after the birth of the bastard, married. Shortly afterwards her husband left her. She was unable to maintain the child, which was taken to the workhouse and there maintained by the guardians. Husband and wife came together again, but the husband refused to take the child out of the workhouse and maintain it. The guardians took proceedings against the putative father under Sec. 5 of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1873. The justices dismissed the application on the ground that the husband was primarily liable to maintain the child; but the Divisional Court took a different view. They considered that in the enactment referred to the word "chargeable" did not mean "ultimately chargeable" but "chargeable in fact." "It is not, I think," said the Lord Chief Justice, "an unfair way of stating the argument for the respondent to say that it does not give to the word 'chargeable' its proper or ordinary meaning, but makes it refer to the ultimate fact that the husband is not able to maintain the child. I, therefore, come to the conclusion that the justices may, upon the application of the guardians, make an order against the putative father, notwithstanding it be shewn that the husband of the illegitimate child's mother has means to maintain it, though the justices may take that fact into consideration."

Plymouth Guardians Gibbs.

Application by woman: its essentials.

422. Have you anything further to say upon the application of the mother?—It has been seen that the application of the mother may be made before or after birth. Where the application has been made after birth, it must be made within 12 months after birth, unless it can be proved that the putative father has paid money within the first 12 months, or that he ceased to reside in England within those 12 months. If the application be within the time, the summons may be issued after its expiration, provided that it be issued by the justice to whom the application was made. Corroboration of the payment of money is not needed to found the issue of the summons; and where proof has been omitted the irregularity may be waived. In strictness, however, the proof should be on oath. A second summons will not be issued after the expiration of the year, if the case has been heard and dismissed on the first summons. In cases where the putative father has left England, it is obvious that difficulty arises from possible inability to obtain evidence amounting to proof of his departure and return.

423. What is the procedure on the hearing of an application?—At the hearing, in cases where the application is made by the mother after the birth of the child, the justices, on the appearance of the person summoned, or on proof of due service of the summons, are to hear the evidence of the woman, and such other evidence as she may produce, and also any evidence on behalf of the putative father; and if the evidence of the mother be corroborated in some material particular by other evidence, to the satisfaction of the justices, they may adjudge the man to be the putative father of the bastard child. The proceeding at the hearing on the application of the guardians is, up to this point, essentially similar.

424. Will you give some illustrations of the difficulties or questions which arise under the present law?—In connection with the two varieties of procedure, there are many questions which, in practice, assume importance in relation to the facts of particular cases; but for present purposes it may suffice to draw attention to one matter about which difficulty has sometimes arisen. This concerns the nature of the corroborative evidence which the statute requires. The corroborative evidence must be to the satisfaction of the justices. It must also be corroborative in some material particular. A certain latitude is here allowed to the justices. Their decision as to the degree or value of corroboration is not subject to review; for the King's Bench Division will not interfere to say what should or should not have satisfied the justices. (Queen v. Pearcy; 17 Queen's Bench, 902; 16 Jurist, 193.) Presumably, however, the evidence must be something to show that the story told by the woman is a probable one. Perhaps an extreme example is furnished by Harvey v. Anning (87 Law Times, New Series, 687; 67 Justice of the Peace, 73). There, with the dissent of one judge, it was held that evidence that the pair were seen out together of evenings in the lanes, and that, after the birth of the child, the man asked a third person if the girl was going to swear the child, was corroboration in a material particular. The justices, however, are not restricted to circumstances of recent date. They may have regard to antecedent facts; so that where a child was born in October of one year, and evidence was adduced as to the behaviour of the parties in the summer of the previous year, the Queen's Bench Division thought that the magistrate was mistaken in rejecting the evidence because it had reference to conduct so long before. (Cole v. Manning, 46 Law Journal, Magistrates' Cases, 175). Silence may in certain circumstances, corroborate, as where a young man who admitted that he had walked out with the applicant was silent on being taken to the house of the girl's step-mother and asked whether he was the father. (Hill v. Denmark; 59 Justice of the Peace, 345). The payment of money for the maintenance of the child will be corroborative if someone other than the woman testify to the fact. (Queen v. Berry; 28 Law Journal, Magistrates' Cases, 86).

425. Have you any observations as to orders that may be made by the justices; we will take first, the case of the mother's application?—As to the judgment of the justices, it may be observed that an arrangement by the putative father to pay by agreement with the mother a certain sum for the support of the child, is no bar to the jurisdiction of the justices to make an order (Follitt v. Koetzow; 29 Law Journal, Magistrates' Cases, 128). The order on the application of a woman takes various forms according to the varying circumstances of cases The cases are these: (1) Where the application was made before the birth of the child and the child is alive. (2) Where the application was made before the birth of the child and the child has been born and is dead. (3) Where the application is made after the birth of the child and the child is alive; and (4) where the application is made after the birth of the child and the child is dead. If the justices adjudge the man to be the putative father of the child, they may also, if they see fit, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, proceed to make an order on the putative father according to the exigencies of the cases above enumerated. Thus the order may direct payment to the mother or to any person appointed to have the custody of the child (that is, where the mother is of unsound mind or a prisoner), of a weekly sum not exceeding five shillings for the maintenance and education of the child; also (a) the expenses incidental to the birth of the child; (b) the funeral expenses of the child, if it has died before the making of the order; (c) the costs incurred in obtaining the order; and where the application is made before the birth or within two months after the birth the weekly sum may, if the justices think fit, be calculated from the birth (35 & 36 Vic., c. 65, Sec. 4).

Order on application of woman: its enforcement.

426. What is the procedure for enforcing payments under orders made on the mother's application?—Provision is made for enforcing payment of arrears under such an order by empowering a justice by warrant to cause the putative father to be brought before any two justices, and, "in case such putative father neglect or refuse to make payment of the sums due from him under such order, or since any commitment for disobedience to such order as hereinafter provided, together with the costs attending such warrant, apprehension, and bringing up of such putative father, such two justices may, by warrant under their hands and seals, direct the sum so appearing to be due, together with such costs, to be recovered by distress . . . . and may order such putative father to be detained and kept in safe custody until return can be conveniently made to such warrant of distress, unless he give sufficient security by way of recognisance or otherwise to the satisfaction of such justices for his appearance before two justices on the day which may be appointed for the return of such warrant of distress." If no sufficient distress can be had, any two justices may commit the putative father to gaol for a term not exceeding three months unless the sum and costs be sooner paid (35 & 36 Vic. c. 65, Sec. 4). With regard to the amendments which the legislation of 1872 and 1873 effected in the law, it may be noted that any reasonable sum may be ordered to be paid as incidental to the birth of the child and of its funeral; and the recovery of the weekly sums is not limited to a particular arrear; payments may be directed to continue until the child reaches sixteen years of age. Where an order has been made on the application of the mother, and the child has become chargeable after the death of the mother, the guardians are empowered to make any such application for the enforcement of the order as the mother might have made if alive (7 & 8 Vic., c. 101, Sec. 7). Also during the lifetime of the mother in a case where an order has been made on her application, and where the child has become chargeable, two justices may appoint some relieving officer or other officer of the Poor Law Union to receive, on account of the Poor Law Union, such proportion of the payments then due or becoming due as may accrue during the period for which the child is chargeable (35 & 36 Vic., c. 65. Sec. 7).

Order on application of guardians.

427. Will you describe the procedure in the case of an order which is made on the application of the guardians?—Where the application is made by the guardians under Section 5 of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1873, the order may direct the putative father to pay to the guardians or one of their officers such sum weekly or otherwise towards the relief of the child during such time as the child shall continue or afterwards be chargeable as shall appear to them to be proper. Any payment will be recoverable by the officer appointed to receive it. Procedure in regard to and under the order is subject to the important conditions set out in the form of provisoes to Section 5 of the Act of 1873. The provisoes are as follows "(1) That no payments shall be recoverable under such order except in respect of the time during which the child is actually in receipt of relief; (2) That an order under this section shall not be made and if made shall cease except for the recovery of arrears when the mother of the child has obtained an order . . . ; (3) That nothing in this section shall be deemed to relieve the mother of a bastard child from her liability to maintain such child; (4) That any person upon whom an order is made under this section shall have the same right of appeal against such order as in the case of an order obtained on the application of the mother; (5) That if after an order has been made under this section the mother should apply for an order . . . . . the order made under this section shall be primâ facie evidence that the man upon whom the order is made is the father of the child" (36 Vic. c. 9, Sec. 5.) With reference to the second proviso it is to be observed that in the event of the child being no longer chargeable the order obtained by the guardians will not authorise the mother to obtain payment from the putative father. For this she will need a fresh order and this must be obtained on her own application. This apparently she may obtain during the currency of the order obtained by the guardians. But her application must be made within the time allowed to her apart from the proceedings of the guardians.

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

15 Jan. 1906.

Appeals.

428. These orders may be made the subject of appeals, may they not?—An order made either upon the application of a woman or of a board of guardians may be the subject of an appeal to the Court of Quarter Sessions. For present purposes it is unnecessary to discuss the details of the procedure in such circumstances since there is little to differentiate an appeal of this kind from other appeals. It may, however, be pointed out that a decision by Quarter Sessions upon the merits, with the result that the order in the mother's favour is quashed, is final (Queen v. Glynne and another; Law Reports, 7 Queen's Bench, 16; 41 Law Journal, Magistrates' Cases 58); and the matter cannot be re-opened by the woman on a fresh application for a summons. Such a re-opening is, however, permissible where the Court of Quarter Sessions have quashed the order otherwise than on the merits. (Queen v. May and others; Law Reports, 5 Queen's Bench Division, 382). Also it may be noted that the Court of Quarter Sessions may, if they think fit, reduce the amount directed to be paid for the maintenance and education or on account of the child (35 and 36 Vic., c. 65, Sec. 9). It may further be remarked that, while the remedy of an application to the High Court of Justice on a special case stated under the 20 and 21 Vic., c. 43, or under the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1879 is available in bastardy, as well as procedure by writ of certiorari, there is nothing in the special subject matter to distinguish these proceedings from others of the same class.

Queen v. Glynne and another.

Queen v. May and others.

Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, Sec. 8.

429. There are some miscellaneous provisions to which you wish to draw attention. Will you mention them?—Among provisions of a miscellaneous character under this head may be mentioned Sec. 8 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844. That section is as follows:—"If any officer of a union, parish or place endeavour to induce any person to contract a marriage by threat or promise respecting any application to be made, or any order to be enforced with reference to the maintenance of any bastard child, such officer shall be guilty of a misdemeanour; and every person having the custody of any bastard child under any order of justices as hereinbefore provided, who may misapply moneys paid by the putative father for the support of such child, or may withhold proper nourishment from such child, or otherwise abuse or maltreat such child, shall, on conviction before any two justices, forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding ten pounds." Lastly, it may be pointed out that by Sec. 6 of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1873, the Local Government Board are empowered to issue forms of proceedings in matters of bastardy, and that the Board in the exercise of this power issued sets of forms in their orders dated the 4th of August, 1873, and the 8th of January, 1874.

Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1873.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Deputation expenses.

430. I think you have something you desire to say as regards deputation expenses?—There are various miscellaneous matters which concern the working of the Poor Law, and which may deserve some mention. Among these matters are provisions for facilitating personal communication between boards of guardians and the Central Authority and the meetings of local representatives for consultation and conference. A general order of the Poor Law Board, dated the 27th of June, 1870, made provision for the expenses of deputations sent by boards of guardians to confer with the Central Authority. Where the Central Authority appoint a time for the reception of any such deputation, the district auditor may allow the reasonable costs, properly verified, of three members, together with the clerk, acting or assistant clerk. When the guardians send a deputation to any other body or authority than the Central Authority in respect of any matter affecting the union, which the guardians are empowered by law to inquire into, or to report upon, or to discuss, the same limitation as to the number of members to form the deputation must be observed, unless the guardians, by special resolution, setting forth the grounds of the exception, appoint a larger number of members to form the deputation.

Poor Law Conferences.

431. What is the exact position of the law with regard to Poor Law Conferences?—Sec. 2 of the Poor Law Conferences Act, 1883, enables the guardians, subject to any regulations made by the Local Government Board, to pay the reasonable expenses of any guardian or guardians, or clerk to the guardians, incurred in attending any conference of guardians held for the purpose of discussing any matter which is connected with the duties which devolve on them, and any reasonable expenses incurred in purchasing reports of the proceedings of any such conference. By a general order of the 26th of February, 1903, the Local Government Board provided, in relation to the expenses to be incurred by the guardians of any union, that the conference should be the central conference held in London, or a conference convened for a district including that union, and that the attendance of representatives at any conference should be expressly authorised by a resolution of the guardians, that where the attendance of more than one guardian was authorised, the number should be specified in the resolution; that the maximum number of guardians authorised to attend the central conference held in London should be two for each union, and that the maximum number of guardians authorised to attend any conference convened for a district should be three for each union included in the district. The same order left it to the guardians to determine how many copies of the report of the proceedings of the central conference or of any conference convened for a district should be purchased.

Poor Law Unions Association expenses.

432. Have you anything to say on the subject of the Poor Law Unions Association (Expenses) Act, 1898?—The Poor Law Unions Association (Expenses) Act, 1898, was passed in view of a proposal to form an Association of Poor Law Unions in England and Wales for the purposes of consultation as to their common interests and the discussion of matters relating to the Poor Law and other matters relating to their powers and duties. Sec. 1 of the Act enacted as follows:—"(1) The guardians of any Poor Law union may, when empowered by and subject to any regulations made by the Local Government Board, which regulations the said Board is hereby authorised from time to time to make, vary, or rescind, pay any sum not exceeding five pounds in any one year as an annual or other subscription to the funds of the Association as well as the reasonable expenses of the attendance of representatives, not exceeding in any case two, at meetings of the Association, and may charge such payments to their common fund, or if they have no common fund to the fund under their control. Provided that no payment shall be made by the guardians in respect of the attendance of any representative at a meeting of the Association unless the attendance of such representative at that meeting shall have been expressly authorised by a resolution passed at a meeting of the guardians held after not less than seven days' notice in writing that the proposal is to be considered at such meeting of the guardians has been sent to each guardian. Any such representative shall be either a guardian of the Poor Law union or (without power of voting) the clerk to the guardians of the union." Sec. 2 of the Act is in these terms:—"(2) No payment shall be made in pursuance of this Act until the Local Government Board have certified that the Association has been established." An Association called the Association of Poor Law Unions in England and Wales having been formed, the Local Government Board, by a general order of the 17th of February, 1899, certified that the Association of Poor Law Unions in England and Wales had been established and empowered the Guardians of any Poor Law Union in England and Wales to pay any sum not exceeding five pounds in any one year as an annual or other subscription to the funds of the Association, as well as the reasonable expenses of the attendance of representatives, not exceeding in any case two, at meetings of the Association.

Paupers' conveyance expenses.

433. What has been done under the Paupers' Conveyance (Expenses) Act, 1870?—The Paupers' Conveyance (Expenses) Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vic. c. 48), enables the Local Government Board to define and direct in what cases and under what regulations the guardians may pay the reasonable expenses incurred by them in conveying persons chargeable to their Poor Law Union from one place to another in England. By a general order of the 7th of February, 1898, the guardians are authorised to pay the reasonable expenses of conveying any person chargeable to their Poor Law Union from the Poor Law Union to any of the institutions mentioned in the order for the purpose of visiting an inmate who is the husband, wife, child, or other relative of the person, and of conveying the person back to the Poor Law Union. The husband, wife, child, or other relative must be an inmate of any one of the following institutions: workhouses, separate workhouse infirmaries, separate workhouse schools, district schools, certified schools, non-certified schools for the reception of poor deaf and dumb or blind children, asylums provided under the Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867, asylums for the reception and relief of idiots, hospitals, institutions or licensed houses under the Idiots Act, 1886, institutions for lunatics, hospitals or institutions for blind or deaf and dumb persons, and houses or establishments not being workhouses with respect to which the Local Government Board have issued rules, orders, and regulations under the Poor Relief Act, 1849. The expenses of conveyance will not be payable unless permission for the visit is given by the guardians and recorded in the minutes of the guardians. To meet cases of urgency, the Guardians may, if they think fit, authorise the master of the workhouse, as regards indoor paupers, and the relieving officer, as regards outdoor paupers, to pay the reasonable expenses in urgent cases.

434. There are some provisions which concern the guardians and the workhouse in the Infant Life Protection Act, 1897. Will you explain what they are?—Powers of another kind are those conferred upon guardians by the Infant Life Protection Act, 1897. Outside the County and City of London the guardians are the local authority for the purpose of that Act. The local authority are to provide for the execution of the Act which has for its main object the supervision of persons receiving for hire or reward more than one infant under the age of five years for nursing or maintenance apart from the parents. In certain circumstances infants are to be received under this Act into the workhouse. Thus, where a person retains or receives an infant under two years on consideration of a sum not exceeding £20 paid down and without any agreement for further payment, as value for the care and bringing up of the infant until it is reclaimed or of an age to provide for itself, the person must give notice of the fact to the local authority. If he does not give notice to the local authority, he will be liable to forfeit the amount of the sum received, or any less sum, and the court having cognizance of the case shall give directions as to the manner in which the sum forfeited shall be applied for the benefit of the infant, "and shall, if necessary, cause the infant to be removed to a workhouse or place of safety, and the master of such workhouse shall receive such infant which shall be maintained in the workhouse or place of safety until it can be otherwise lawfully disposed of." (Sec. 5.) So also should any infant in respect of which notice is required to be given under this Act, (a) be kept in any house or premises which are so unfit or so overcrowded as to endanger its health; or, (b), be retained or received by any person, who by reason of negligence, ignorance, or other cause is so unfit to have its care and maintenance as to endanger its health, an inspector under the Act may apply to the local authority for an order in writing directing him to remove the infant to a workhouse or place of safety, until it can be restored to its relations or guardians or be otherwise lawfully disposed of. A person refusing compliance with an order of the local authority will be guilty of an offence under the Act, and the inspector may apply to a justice for an order directing the removal of the child and the order may be enforced by any police constable. The master of a workhouse shall receive into the workhouse any child brought there under the justice's order, and the child is to be maintained in the workhouse until it can be otherwise disposed of. (Sec. 7.)

ense of aining rmation guardians.

435. Perhaps you will add a summary of the few remaining provisions to be noticed under the miscellaneous head of your evidence?—First, there are the powers of the guardians under Secs. 15 and 16, of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876. By these sections guardians are enabled to pay reasonable expenses incurred in the preparation and collection of information required of or by them respecting any matter submitted to their management, supervision or control. Also the guardians are empowered to authorise their clerk or other officer to make or resist any application, claim or complaint or to take and conduct proceedings before justices out of session, although the clerk or other officer be not a solicitor (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, Sec. 68). The guardians likewise have powers for giving certificates of chargeability. (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, Sec. 69.) And attention may at the same time be drawn to Sec. 86 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, which is to the effect that no mortgage, bond, instrument, or any assignment thereof, given by way of security in pursuance of the rules, orders, or regulations of the Local Government Board and conformable thereto, nor any contract or agreement or appointment of any officer made or entered into in pursuance of such rules, orders, or regulations and conformable thereto, nor any other instrument made in pursuance of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, nor the appointment of any paid officer engaged in the administration of the laws for the relief of the poor, or in the management or collection of the Poor Rate, shall be charged or chargeable with any stamp duty whatever. (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, Sec. 86).

436. Will you furnish the Commission with a copy of the Irish Act of 1900, to which you referred, as relating to the case of paupers who would otherwise be removable from England to Ireland?—Yes, I will do so. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A) No. I. (g).

Poor Removal Act, 1900.

437. (Mr. Booth.) In question 9 the regulations and the general rules of the Local Government Board are referred to. Are those published so as to be generally accessible?—They would only be published by private enterprise. They are officially published in the Gazette, but that could hardly be called generally accessible.

Accessibility of regulations of Local Government Board.

438. Are they in a form in which we can get access to them?—Possibly the Commissioners could be supplied with copies from the department.

439. In question 10 the chairman says: "I think you mention there is a Committee connected with the Local Government Board consisting of certain high officers of State." The answer to question 8 does not say they were a Committee. Were they at that time a Committee of the Lord President of the Council and the Principal Secretaries of State?—No, they are nominally ex-officio members of the Board.

Constitution of Local Government Board.

440. Has the board any existence apart from its president and these ex officio members?—Even the ex-officio members have no real functions for the purpose of the ordinary business of the Board. For that purpose the Board is the president.

441. Has the committee ever been summoned?—I have no recollection of a meeting of the ex-officio members within modern times.

442. Question 11 was put by the chairman—"I assume, however, any order issued by the Local Government Board, if it has the approval of the president"—that would seem to imply that the Local Government Board had an executive existence apart from its President. Has it?—No, the order is that of the President.

443. There is really no board consisting of a number of individuals?—Not for any practical purpose.

Laying of Board's orders before Parliament.

444. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) Under Sec. 1 of the Poor Law Amendment Act 1868, the Local Government Board are required to cause a copy of any general order or regulation to be laid before both Houses of Parliament. I want to know the purpose of that, and whether Parliament can take any action?—Originally the somewhat similar arrangement required by Section 17 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, may have been due to jealousy of the proceedings of the Commissioners, and what was probably intended was that as this was an entirely new departure, Parliament should have continuously under its eye the actual proceedings of the Commissioners. The arrangement becomes now almost a formality.

Scope of power of Local Government Board.

445. (Mr. Nunn.) I desire to ask you as to your opinion on the limitations as to the President of the Local Government Board. Where does his authority stop and where does the necessity for legislative enactment begin?—The legislative enactment defines the scope within which the minor legislation, if one may so call it, which the President may initiate, can take effect. For example, there was the case to which I referred and in which Lord Chief Justice Campbell said in effect that the President of the Local Government Board could not order a man to be beheaded. There must be legislative authority to define the range of subjects to which the orders are to apply.

446. To take a modern instance: Was there anything in the Infant Life Protection Act which the President of the Local Government Board could not have carried out by means of orders?—Yes; that was entirely outside the scope of orders.

447. I suppose, for instance, a provision dealing with children who were suffering from the cruelty of their parents, deciding what place they should be taken to—the workhouse—would not be a subject on which he could have founded an order?—No, that is to say, an order could not have been made requiring removal of children to the workhouse in certain circumstances. As to the reception in the workhouse, that might be another matter,

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

15 Jan. 1906.

448. (Mr. Bentham.) Would it be within the power of the Local Government Board to extend the operation of the Infant Life Protection Act with regard to one-child cases? The Act, as far as I understand it, does not apply to one-child cases: that is, where one child only is taken out to nurse. Could the Local Government Board include one-child cases under the operation of the Act?—No.

449. (Professor Smart.) Is there any connection or subordination between the three Local Government Boards, or are they entirely independent?—Entirely independent.

Guardians' powers as to medical relief.

450. (Dr. Downes.) With regard to medical relief, I think the guardians have very extensive powers under their general powers of relief?—Quite so.

451. They can send cases, on the recommendation of the medical officer, for treatment to various places?—Quite so.

452. Without the sanction of the Central Authority?—Certainly.

453. Is there any check on unreasonable expenditure in that direction?—The sanction of the Local Government Board would be required to the subscriptions to hospitals and places of that sort, and the expenses that the guardians incur would be subject to audit.

454. The auditor could review the reasonableness of the money expended?—Yes.

Limits to powers of Local Government Board.

455. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) The President of the Local Government Board can, by issuing his order, practically change the character of relief that is given by the Local Board of Guardians, but I suppose he can only do that within the limits of the law?—He can only do that within the limits of the law, and the law having been defined so recently by the Master of the Rolls, practically the case of the Attorney-General v. the Merthyr Tydfil Board of Guardians would be the leading case to which all questions of that sort would be referable. There the Master of the Rolls carried back the rule of procedure to the Statute of Elizabeth, so that, according to him, what was not relief under the Statute of Elizabeth could not be made relief by an order of the Local Government Board.

Effect of Board's Circulars.

456. And when the President issues a circular urging more generous out-relief to the aged poor, for instance, is that binding on the Guardians, or is it only a matter for their goodwill?—A circular would only be exhortation.

457. It has the effect, practically, of an order?—I do not know that.

458. (Chairman.) Would not it be taken as an indication of policy?—Yes, no doubt.

459. (Mr. Gardiner.) In that case he almost has the power of initiating a change in the law?—Hardly by a circular. The change (if any is suggested) would not be in the law, but in its administration.

460. In the policy?—Yes, that is it, really.

Statutory Authority for orders and regulations.

461. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) On what statutory enactment does the power of the Local Government Board to issue orders and regulations depend?—There are many enactments, but for the purposes of the enquiry by this Commission the Poor Law Amendment Act 1834 is in itself so comprehensive that it covers nearly everything in the way of authority for orders.

462. Upon that depends the power of the Board to issue all the orders and regulations to which we have been referred?—Practically it is so. Of course here and there an Act has given a special power which, where it exists, I have referred to. The Poor Law Amendment Act itself is most comprehensive.

463. I only ask that because in Scotland we have had difficulty, and we are anxious to get that power.—You have not, I suppose, anything corresponding to Section 15 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834.

Constitution of Local Government Board.

464. (Sir Samuel Provis.) I think with regard to the constitution of the Local Government Board the case is really this, is not it, the Board consists of the President and certain ex officio members?—Quite so.

465. And any act may be done by the President or by an ex officio member of the Board except the issue of an order, or by a Secretary or Assistant Secretary if authorised by a general order of the Board?—That is so.

466. An order must be a document under seal signed by the President, or an ex officio member of the Board, and countersigned by a Secretary or Assistant Secretary?—That is so.

467. As a matter of fact, I think you told us that the Board does not meet?—That is so.

468. So that it has been described, in fact, as a phantom Board which has really no existence?—Clearly so.

Bill to substitute Secretary of State for the Local Government Board.

469. There has been, has not there, some proposal to get rid of it altogether?—Yes, last session the Government introduced a Bill, providing that if His Majesty should appoint a Secretary of State with the superintendence of those subjects which are now the subjects of administration by the Local Government Board, certain powers should be transferred to that Secretary of State. The Bill was introduced towards the end of the session, but I have no doubt the question of the policy involved in it will come up again.

Powers of ex officio members of Board.

470. (Mr. Nunn.) Do I understand that, supposing the Chancellor of the Exchequer obtained the signature of the permanent Secretary of the Local Government Board to a regulation, it would have the same force as if the Local Government Board had issued it itself?—Practically the way it is done is this: when the President is absent from the country, an order taken to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and countersigned by the Secretary, would be as good as though it were signed by the President.

471. That would never happen when the President was present?—It has happened when the President has been abroad. It is practically only a vacation provision.

472. (Chairman.) That gives legality to it?—Yes.

Overseers: Appointment and duties etc.

473. (Sir Samuel Provis.) With regard to the appointment of overseers to which you referred in the answer to question 13, the state of things at present is practically this, is it not—that in rural parishes the overseers are appointed by the parish council, or, if there is no parish council, by the parish meeting?—Yes.

474. In urban parishes either they are appointed by the justices, or if the urban district council have the powers of a parish council, in that matter, they are appointed by the urban district council?—Yes.

475. In London—to finish the history—except in the City, the borough council are, in fact, the overseers?—Quite so. There are also cases in which there are provisions in local Acts dealing with the question of their appointment.

476. Then I think, as a matter of fact, a very large number of orders have been made transferring the power of appointment of overseers in urban parishes to the urban district council?—Quite so.

477. So that practically in urban parishes we may take it that, generally speaking, the urban district council do appoint the overseers?—I have no doubt that is so.

478. The primary main duty of the overseers is, I take it, to make and collect the poor rate?—Yes.

479. They have no doubt other powers and duties but perhaps that might be taken as their primary duty?—Quite so.

Urban district council as overseers.

480. Would you think that there would be any advantage in making it clear that in all cases in urban parishes, the overseers either should be appointed by the urban district council or that the urban district council themselves might be the overseers as in London?—The latter is a change which, I think, would need careful consideration. Possibly the advantages are greater than the disadvantages; I think on the whole that would be so.

481. You think that the advantages would predominate if I understand you rightly?—I think so.

482. If that were done, might it not be necessary to make some subsidiary alterations such as imposing upon some officer of the district council personal duties which devolve upon the overseers now?—Yes, or on some other officer. In saying that, I was thinking more particularly of the powers of the overseers under the Registration Acts. At the present time there is power to the guardians under the County Electors Act 1888 to appoint an official there called a Registration Officer. It might be a question whether the registration powers should not be given to a special officer appointed, perhaps not by the urban council but by some other authority.

483. That is to say, the overseers would cease to have anything to do with the preparation of the local lists?—Quite so.

484. And that that duty should devolve upon a separate officer?—Yes; but then the question of relief would also arise.

485. Overseers have certain powers of giving relief have they not?—Yes.

486. Would it be necessary to do something with regard to that if a change of the sort we are considering were made?—I should think it would be,—certainly in rural parishes.

487. In what direction?—Either in the way of retaining the powers in some local officer, or of keeping the overseers alive for that particular purpose.

pintment sistant seers.

488. I was rather considering for the moment the case of the urban parishes, following still on the lines of the case in London. Then we come to the case of the assistant overseers; if I remember rightly, you told us that the law now was practically this—that in rural parishes the parish council, or if there is no parish council, the parish meeting appoints the assistant overseer?—Yes, that is so.

489. In urban parishes he is appointed by the vestry or, where the powers of the vestry in this matter have been transferred to the urban district council, by the urban district council; and that, again, is subject to any provisions in any local Acts?—Quite so.

490. I think in a very large number of cases the power of appointing the assistant-overseer has been transferred to the urban district council?—That is so, no doubt.

491. In London, where the borough council are overseers, the borough council have power to appoint persons for the purpose of assisting them in the discharge of their duties as overseers, in other words, to collect the rate?—Yes.

ction of in n areas.

492. If some change of the kind we were mentioning just now were made, I suppose it would be necessary that there should be some provision to enable the urban district council to collect the rate?—No doubt.

493. Would you think that advisable in urban parishes?—I cannot say that I have thought the question out at all completely. Of course, such a change should apply to all the rates, and to that extent it is to be commended, because there would be only one collection I take it. I do not know that I have any strong view for or against.

494. I daresay you remember that the matter was, to some extent, considered by the Royal Commission on Local Taxation?—Yes, certainly.

495. And they made some recommendation, I think, on the subject?—Yes.

496. They thought, did they not, that in boroughs, the town council should collect the rate?—Quite so.

497. But they did not say anything about the urban district council's collecting them outside the boroughs, I think?—That was so.

ods of ing dians.

498. Just before question 28 you were dealing with the constitution of boards of guardians; I think, at the present time it is the case, is it not, that throughout the country, boards of guardians are all elected in one and the same manner—in England and Wales of course I mean—except, as regards Oxford?—That is so. Of course there is that exceptional community, the Isles of Scilly, in which no guardians are elected at all, and which is still under the 43rd of Elizabeth.

499. At question 24—28 something was said about the fines which are leviable on non-acceptance of office by a guardian; I think the guardians themselves, by regulations, have power to fix the amount of the fine?—That is to say the rules made by the Local Government Board apply certain provisions of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, with adaptations and the effect is that the guardians have the power to make regulations.

500. Then in the event of their failing to make regulations on the subject, what happens?—In that case, the rules themselves fix the amount.

501. The amount is £20 is it not?—I think so.

502. Can a guardian resign his office?—Yes. The provision in the Poor Law Act, 1842, still remains in force (5 and 6 Vic., c. 57, Sec. 11.)

503. That renders it necessary, does it not, that the Local Government Board should accept his resignation?—That is so.

504. So that he can only resign his office for a cause which the Board consider reasonable?—Yes, that is so.

505. At the same time, if he fails to attend for six months, his office would become vacant?—That is so.

506. So that practically by his simple abstention from attending, the same result would be attained as if he resigned?—Clearly.

507. Supposing that a board of guardians generally abstained from attending, what would be the result?—That is an extreme case of default.

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

15 Jan. 1906.

508. (Mr. Booth.) Does the fine apply if any guardian who is elected never attends, and, therefore, ceases to be a guardian at the end of six months?—No, that provision does not apply.

509. (Chairman.) He is fined if he refuses to act?—Yes.

510. But if he absented himself for six months, he would not be fined?—No; the provision does not apply to that case.

511. (Sir Samuel Provis.) The fine is not exactly for refusing to act, but it is for non-acceptance of office?—It is for non-acceptance of office; that is the legal position.

512. (Chairman.) If he accepted office and attended once and he then absented himself for six months, he would not be fined?—That is so.

513. But if he were to decline to act and then absented himself he could be fined?—If he did not accept the office, certainly. That follows from Section 34 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, which is applied in an adapted form.

514. So that anybody to avoid being fined has merely technically to accept office by attending once, and then to absent himself for six months; in that way he exempts himself from the fine?—That is so.

515. (Sir Samuel Provis.) In the case of an urban district council, if I remember rightly, there is a fine on resignation?—I should not like to speak as to that, for I have not the rules with me, and the matter is so exceedingly technical that one ought not to trust to memory.

Effect of general default of guardians.

516. Coming back to what I was saying just now, supposing a board of guardians generally failed to attend, and there was a general default in the discharge of their duties, what would happen?—The result would be that the relief of the poor would devolve upon the overseers, and also upon those officers charged with duties appropriate to the matter, if called upon by the Local Government Board to perform the duties.

517. Are you thinking of such officers as relieving officers?—Yes.

518. And, I suppose, masters of workhouses?—No doubt.

519. But there is no power, is there, to make provision in such a case to appoint any persons to discharge the duties of the defaulting authority?—No, there is no such power.

520. Do you remember any case in which a difficulty of this kind has arisen?—In olden times there were cases of the sort, though I can hardly say whether there were many such cases. In those days there was, of course, the ex officio element, and while the ex officio element was part of the board of guardians, the justices could always be relied upon to take the places of the absentee elected guardians.

521 (Mr. Nunn): Could they form a quorum?—Yes.

522. And did they form an actual quorum?—Yes; or they were ready to do so.

Powers as to alteration of areas.

523. (Sir Samuel Provis). I was proposing to pass on to Question 38 with regard to areas. I understand the position to be this—that the Local Government Board may dissolve any union, whether formed under the general law, or under a local Act?—That is so.

524. Also they may add parishes to any union formed under the general law, or take away parishes from any union formed under the general law?—That is so.

525. But except under exceptional circumstances they would have no power to alter the boundaries of parishes—not of unions, but of parishes?—As a rule they would not.

526. Alteration of parishes are commonly made now, are they not, by orders of the County Councils or of County Borough Councils under Sec. 57 of the Local Government Act, 1888?—Yes, or by provisional orders of the Local Government Board under Sec. 54.

527. Those provisional orders being orders altering boroughs usually, I think, and there being necessary alterations in parishes in consequence of the alterations in boroughs?—Yes, that would be so; those orders would be for altering counties or boroughs.

528. Suppose an order is made under Sec. 57 altering parishes if a parish in one union is added to a parish in another union the result is that the union is altered, is it not?—That is so.

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

15 Jan. 1906.

529. Consequently inferentially, or practically the union may be altered by the operation of an order under Section 57?—Yes.

530. There may be appeals, may there not, against orders under Section 57?—Yes.

531. Although an order under Section 57 requires the confirmation of the Local Government Board, unless there was an appeal the Board would have no power to refuse to confirm the order, would they?—Unless, as the law officers advised, the order itself was so bad that it could not possibly be justified.

532. That it was practically ultra vires?—Quite so.

533. So that taking an ordinary case, and supposing that an alteration of parishes was made which appeared to the Board to involve an undesirable alteration of the union they could do nothing?—That is so.

534. Do you think any alteration of the law upon that subject is required?—An alteration of the law would certainly be needed to give the Board full power in that direction; but, of course, such an alteration would involve a material departure from the scheme of devolution which was contemplated by the Local Government Act, 1888. I think the power would be useful myself, but the point is, for the reason already given, a debateable one.

535. That is to say, the principle of Section 57 of the Act of 1888 was to give county councils powers in these matters?—Clearly.

536. And what I was mentioning just now would be practically some departure from the principle of that section?—It would be so.

537. There are powers, are there not, to make consequential alterations where parishes are altered?—Yes.

538. Is there not such a power in Section 59?—Section 59, Sub sec. 4, is very wide, but I think it might be widened with some slight advantage. That would only mean the addition of a very few words to the section.

539. (Mr. Booth.) Does not the alteration of the boundary of one body necessarily affect the boundary of some other district which it touches?—It must necessarily do so.

540. So two or more districts must be involved in an alteration of boundary?—It must necessarily be so.

541. If the authority is to devolve upon the county council who is to judge between two county councils if they differ?—I am afraid I do not follow that.

542. You cannot alter the boundary of one county without affecting the boundary of the next, and in that case do not they not need to get the authority of the Local Government Board?—Alterations of county boundaries are not within the scope of the particular sections we have been considering. Alterations of county boundaries can only be effected, under the Local Government Act, 1888, by provisional orders of the Local Government Board. Therefore the Local Government Board retain very full power of determining as to whether the county boundary is, or is not, in accordance with their views.

543. The boundaries you are considering are those within a county area?—Especially parochial boundaries.

544. (Sir Samuel Provis.) And you are considering, I think, the case of boundaries within one county—Yes.

545. Supposing you were dealing with two parishes, one of which was in one county and the other of which was in another county, then one county council could not, I apprehend, make any alteration, and you must have a joint committee of the two county councils?—Yes, and you must include representatives of any county boroughs which may be affected, if there were any; that is, if any area such as a union area extended into two or more of these jurisdictions.

Combinations.

546. In the answer to Question 54 I think you enter into the subject of combinations. Combinations, I think, may be of three kinds, may they not?—you may either have a combination under Section 8 of the Act of 1879, or you may set up a school district under the Act of 1844, or in London you may set up asylum districts under the Metropolitan Poor Acts. Is not that practically what it comes to?—That is so.

547. The combination under Section 8 of the Act of 1879 is a good deal simpler; that merely means, does it not, the formation of a joint committee of the two or three boards of guardians who are content to carry out the object of the combination for a particular purpose for which they are combined?—Yes.

548. That section, I think, does not extend to London?—No.

549. Is there any particular reason in your opinion why it should not be made to extend to London?—I think not. I think it might fairly be extended to London; it would be useful.

550. I suppose that probably the reason why it was not was the existence of the powers for the formation of districts under the Metropolitan Poor Acts?—Yes, I think that was so.

School districts.

551. Coming now to the school districts which are formed under the Act of 1844, I believe those school districts are formed for pauper children, who presumably would be in the workhouses if they were not in the schools provided under that Act?—Yes.

Difference between qualificati of school managers of guardia

552. They are placed as you have told us under the superintendence of boards of management, but there is a difference, is there not, between the qualification of a manager of a school district and the qualification of a guardian?—That is so.

553. Would you mind telling us the difference?—The members of a board to be constituted for the management of a school district formed under the Poor Law Amendment Act of 1844 are to have a qualification to be fixed by the Local Government Board, and the qualification will "consist in being rated within the district to the relief of the poor, but not so as to require a qualification exceeding the net annual value of £40."

Scope of combinations unde Metropoli Poor Acts

554. With regard to the formation of districts under the Metropolitan Poor Act it is essential, I think you told us, that there should be an asylum?—That is so.

555. Meaning by an asylum not what is ordinarily understood by an asylum, namely, a building for persons of unsound mind, but a building in which the persons relieved are received and maintained?—Yes, and the building may include a tent or a ship.

556. It is under that provision of providing a ship that the "Exmouth" is provided, where pauper children are trained for sea service, is it not?—Yes.

557. Inasmuch as there must be an asylum, that is to say, there must be a building in which the people are relieved, you could not form a district, I presume, under the Metropolitan Poor Acts for the purposes of outdoor relief?—That is so.

Effect on franchise maintena in infectio hospitals under Metropoli Asylums Board.

558. There is one other point I wanted to mention in regard to the condition of persons who are received into buildings provided by the Metropolitan Asylums Board; they provide hospitals, I think, for cases of infectious disease?—Yes.

559. If anybody is received into one of those hospitals is he disfranchised?—In the case of infectious disease, the provision in Sec. 80 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, is to the effect that "the admission of a person suffering from an infectious disease into any hospital provided by the Metropolitan Asylum managers, or the maintenance of any such person therein shall not be considered to be parochial relief, alms, or charitable allowance to any person, or to the parent or husband of any person, nor shall any person or his or her parent or husband be by reason thereof deprived of any right or privilege, or be subjected to any disability or disqualification."

560. Consequently a man would not be disfranchised by being received into one of the hospitals of the Asylums Board; but if he were received into one of their other institutions such for instance as an institution for imbeciles he would be disfranchised?—Yes.

Resignati of guardia

561. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Do I understand that a member of a board of guardians may not resign his position as a member of the board as and when he so pleases?—That is so; his resignation is subject to acceptance by the Local Government Board.

562. That is an unusual provision, is it not?—It has been in existence for a great many years—since 1842.

Overseers' duties as t relief.

563. As regards the overseers—I am afraid that I may be asking something that is very elementary—who has the main duty of administering relief; is it the relieving officer or the overseer?—The guardians have the main duty of administering relief.

564. Through the relieving officer?—Yes, or through the master of the workhouse qua indoor relief.

565. Have the overseers any such duty?—Yes, in cases of sudden and urgent necessity.

566. That is exercised, I suppose, to a considerable extent, is it?—I should not have thought it was exercised to a considerable extent, because the relieving officer has almost identically the same duties.

567. The Local Taxation Commission as I understand it recommended that the collection of the rates should so far as possible be done by one authority?—Yes.

568. How far would that affect the duty of the overseers; who would collect the different rates?—That would depend upon the scheme that eventually is adopted with that end. If the overseers are abolished it is manifest that some other body or officer must take their place; if they are retained and are used as the medium of collection for all sorts of rates—then, again, the scheme would differ.

569. The object which was desired was that the areas should be assimilated and that the rates should all be collected by one collector upon one demand note, was it not?—Yes.

570. Which I suppose in your opinion would be a very desirable thing if it could be effected?—I should not like to be committed to the precise views of the Local Taxation Commission.

ect of l Acts.

571. In answer to Question 14 you say, "Many local Acts contain provisions which depart materially from the general law with respect to the appointment and functions of these officers"—that is, of the overseers. Does not the existence of so many local Acts lead to complication and difficulties of administration, and necessarily to expense?—Most undoubtedly. Those particular local Acts, which I had in mind, as a rule are not draughted on the most desirable lines, and have not infrequently led to an immense amount of difficulty.

572. And from your point of view I suppose they are very undesirable, if that be so?—Those particular provisions in local Acts I should be very glad to see amended.

573. It would be very much better that there should be a general law applying to the whole country and no local Acts?—Yes, but that is a consummation that it would be very difficult to reach.

tirement guardians.

574. At Question 29 you say, "Subject to the directions of the county council, guardians may retire by thirds on the 15th April in each year, or they may retire simultaneously on the same day in every third year; as a matter of fact do they in many cases retire by thirds, can you say?—I could not say—I have never seen statistics on the subject,

575. I dare say you cannot tell us whether in such cases the expense is very much greater than it would be if there were an election every three years?—No.

576. (Sir Samuel Provis.) In London, I think, they all retire together?—Yes.

ss of ldren sent District ools.

577. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) In regard to Question 56, where you deal with school districts, have the guardians power to deal with any children, except those who are orphans or who are deserted, when they send them to schools outside the union?—Guardians outside the Combination can only send, with the Managers' consent, children of the classes for which the Combination was established.

578. (Miss Hill.) But surely the children of widows are sent to the District Schools?—The provisions which relate to the admission of children from outside a Combination do not vary the powers of classification.

579. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) What you say is "The management of any class or classes of infant poor not above the age of 16 years, being chargeable to any such parish or union, who are orphans or are deserted by their parents, or whose parents or surviving parent or guardians are consenting to the placing of such children in the school of such district." That makes it clear that the children of the widow would be eligible, I fancy?—Yes, but the same cases would be taken in under the provisions relating to admission, whether from within or from without the Combination.

580. That is a separate organisation and a separate administration entirely. There is no provision by which the children who are in the workhouse are sent to the ordinary public schools in England, is there?—The children in a workhouse may be sent to ordinary public elementary schools, certainly.

581. As a matter of fact, is it a very small proportion of them that do go to the public schools?—I should think a large proportion do.

582. Referring now to the answer to Question 65 regarding the asylums which are under the charge of the Metropolitan Asylums Board, I believe these asylums are for cases of infectious and other diseases removed from workhouses?—Or from the actual homes of the people.

583. Cases of infectious disease from the workhouses are not taken charge of by the Public Health Authorities, are they?—Are you speaking of the Metropolis only, or are you speaking of the country generally?

Provision for treatment of workhouse immates suffering from infectious disease.

584. I am afraid I am not able to discriminate, but I should like to know whether, either in the Metropolis or in the country generally cases of infectious disease occurring in the workhouse are taken charge of and handed over to the Public Health Authorities or whether they are dealt with under a separate organisation?—Very frequently they are dealt with by the Public Health Authorities.

585. But not exclusively?—No, not exclusively. In London the position is different, that is to say, a case of infectious disease would be taken to the asylum of the Metropolitan Asylums Board.

586. But these asylums, as I understand it, are asylums maintained and supported by the poor rate and not by the public health rate?—Yes, that is to say, they are provided and maintained by a poor law authority.

587. Although they are asylums for the treatment of infectious disease?—Certainly.

588. (Mr. Gardiner.) In the case of a rural district where you have an isolation hospital you send your patients suffering from an infectious disease from the workhouse to the isolation hospital, do you not?—That is so, if you have an agreement between the two authorities.

589. But only where there is an agreement?—There must be an agreement either express or implied.

590. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Are the infectious diseases hospitals not sufficiently large or able to cope with the cases that come from the workhouses or why is it that there is a separate administration in London?—In London there are no infectious disease hospitals provided by the local authorities as distinct from the poor law authority.

591. (Mr. Phelps.) In the country it would be so, because there is a want of accommodation. and the sanitary authority would object very much to taking any paupers because of the want of accommodation for them?—A good many sanitary authorities, I think, take paupers by agreement. We generally provide for it in our Provisional Orders.

Conditions of overseers' office.

592. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) I am not quite sure whether the overseers are paid officials?—They are not, they are unpaid; the assistant-overseer is paid.

593. Is the position of overseer a voluntary position, or are overseers bound to serve?—They are bound to serve.

594. For a term of years?—For one year. There are exemptions; and the list is a long one.

Disqualifications of guardians.

595. Turning to the qualifications of guardians, does the receipt of relief by dependents of guardians disqualify them from continuing as guardians?—If the cases are within Sec. 56 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, which says that all relief given to or on account of the wife, or to or on account of any child or children under the age of sixteen, not being blind or deaf and dumb, shall be considered as given to the husband of such wife, or to the father of such child or children, as the case may be. That relief would disqualify; but relief given to a parent would not.

596. What I had in my mind were cases of guardians parents being relieved?—Those would not disqualify.

597. Then referring to question 17, does the indirect payment of rates through the landlord as in tenement houses qualify for a guardian?—Yes.

598. The same as the direct payment of rates would?—Yes.

599. I believe that there is a definition of alms in the section to the effect that a man must not within twelve months have received union or parochial relief or other alms?—The definition is rather through a series of cases and not from the statute.

600. Would the ordinary charitable relief disqualify?—There the cases come into play. I should not like to trust my memory for a statement of their general effect, but there have been instances in which the receipt of charity moneys has been held to disqualify. There is one case in especial. The case is Harrison v. Carter; it was referred to, I think, in my previous evidence. It was a Petersfield case. There the money was charity money given to poor agricultural labourers at the discretion of the trustees.

601. That would be a case of endowed charities?—Yes, I think it was.

Guardians' office compulsory.

602. Upon the question of the guardian's fine, can a man be nominated as guardian without his consent?—Yes; but he would not then be liable to the fine, if elected.

603. So that really it is a compulsory office?—Yes, it is in a sense.

604. (Mr. Gardiner.) Has he not powers of withdrawal before a certain date?—Yes, certainly.

Reason for tripartite retirement of guardians.

605. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) With regard to the election of guardians in three-yearly portions—that is retiring by thirds—I suppose the idea is to secure continuity of policy on the part of the Board?—Yes, I think I have seen that advanced as one special reason; and also the reason that ratepayers get irritated by too frequent elections, has been alleged as a ground for preferring triennial retirement of the entire body.

606. (Mr. Gardiner.) As regards the duties of overseers in reference to the assessment, are there frequent complaints as to the way in which committees of boards of guardians who sit to hear appeals discharge their duties?—I think that is outside the scope of my evidence—that is local taxation.

Out-relief Unions.

607. At Question 46 you told us that under Sec. 58 of the Local Government Act, 1888, the Local Government Board has power to divide a union comprised of parishes situate in two or more counties for the administration of out-door relief; is it compulsory that the union should be divided for the purposes of out-door relief in that case?—When the Board have exercised their power—where an order has been issued—then it is compulsory.

608. Take a union one parish of which is in Surrey and one parish of which is in Hampshire; may the Board sit as a Board to hear applications for out-relief from both Hampshire and Surrey?—Certainly; unless action is taken under that particular section that would be the normal course of things.

Difference between Metropolitan Asylums Board and London County Council Hospitals.

609. Then at Question 65, which deals with the provision of asylums under the Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867, and the Metropolitan Poor Amendment Act, 1869, would you kindly explain the difference between the asylums provided by the Metropolitan Asylums Board and those provided by the London County Council? Would it be expedient that the care of all mentally afflicted persons should be under the control of a single authority?—The asylums under the control of the Metropolitan Asylum Board are not concerned only with the particular class that would be sent to the asylums of the London County Council. The asylums of the London County Council are for lunatics, who are certified and subject to summary reception orders. The asylums of the Metropolitan Asylum Board are not only for imbeciles—those form only one class of the paupers whom they receive—but they are also for a variety of other classes of paupers. The imbeciles for whom the asylums of the Metropolitan Asylum Board would provide are imbeciles who ordinarily would be retained in workhouses and would not be sent to asylums. Therefore there is a distinct line of demarcation between the two sets of institutions.

610. Is it to the public advantage that they should remain under the control of two authorities?—I can hardly express opinions on questions of expediency.

Transfer of patients from County Asylums to Poor Law institutions.

611. (Dr. Downes.) Following the question last asked, I think there is power for the county council to transfer cases of a certain class from their asylums to the asylums of the Metropolitan Asylums Board?—There is that power, and the power arises in the country in relation to workhouses also.

612. It is a power which I think I may say is exercised in London?—I have no doubt.

Certificates for admission to Asylums.

613. Referring to the admission of cases to the County Council Asylums and to the Asylums Board Asylums, is there not some difference with regard to the certificates required; the Act of 1891 amends the Act of 1890 in that respect, I believe?—Yes. The certificate in the case of admission to an asylum of the London County Council is a certificate necessary to establish the issue of a summary reception order; but no such certificate is required in the other case, the certificate there being a certificate in part authorised by the regulations of the Local Government Board.

614. Would there be any difference as to the fees payable in regard to those two kinds of certificates?—I could not put the answer in figures.

615. It would follow the provision of the Lunacy Law, I take it?—In the one case, yes.

616. These are all pauper cases which are admitted in imbecile asylums, are they not?—Quite so.

Non paupers in Metropolitan Asylums Board hospitals.

617. With regard to the hospitals of the Metropolitan Asylums Board, which are, as a matter of fact, provided for small-pox, fever, and diphtheria, those cases need not be paupers?—No, they need not.

618. Do you know how the non-paupers are admitted?—We are not dealing with non-paupers, and I would rather not go outside the scope of my evidence.

619.—Still, dealing with the Metropolitan Asylum Board, the Act defines their purpose as for the "reception of the sick, insane, infirm, or other class or classes of the poor;" do "the other class or classes" include such a class as the casual poor or the able-bodied poor?—Certainly those words would include the able-bodied poor; but for the casual poor you have another machinery, and, therefore, that other machinery would presumably take the provision for them out of the range of possible Asylum Districts under the Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867.

620. They need not be ejusdem generis with the sick, insane, or infirm?—Certainly not, I think.

Disappearance of "Gilbert Act" Unions.

621. At Question 44, reference was made to the Gilbert Unions; and I think you have stated that it was not until 1868 that the power of dissolution was conferred on the central authority?—That is so.

622. Are there any Gilbert Unions still remaining?—No.

Power of fixing number of guardians.

623. According to your answer to Question 17 the county council have power to fix a number of guardians for the parish, and the Local Government Board have also power under the order constituting the union; have they any other power?—Practically no power that is now available.

624. So that there is no question of dual control as to the number after the order has once been fixed?—No. In some instances recourse has been had to powers that are generally obsolete in order to help county councils, and the matter is one sometimes dealt with in Provisional Orders; but I think it may be said that generally the Board's power is no longer exercisable.

Parliamentary proceedure for local Acts.

625. With reference to the local Acts which depart materially from the general law, and are so far inconvenient; is there any check in Parliamentary procedure on promotion by local authorities of such Acts?—The provisions to which reference was made are found in the local Acts relating only incidentally to such poor law matters as parochial changes and overseers and assistant-overseers. The Parliamentary procedure so far as the central department is concerned, consists chiefly in a report on the Bill.

626. Take such a Bill as that promoted by the London County Council for the reception of lunatics; would that be under any check in Parliamentary procedure as to its promotion?—I suppose it was introduced as a Private Bill—I am almost sure that it was—and would be subject to the procedure appropriate to that kind of legislation.

Varieties of local Acts.

627. (Mrs. Webb.) With regard to the local Acts I understand there are two classes of local Acts, namely, those which alter the constitution of the board of guardians—I mean the old local Acts prior to 1834—and those that apply to assistant-overseers?—Yes.

628. They are altogether different classes, are they not?—That is so.

Local Acts affecting constitution of Boards of Guardians.

629. With regard to the local Acts which alter the constitution of boards of guardians, I think that with the exception of Liverpool (whose local Act was re-enacted about 1839), those local boards were all formed prior to 1834?—Yes, but some of those that were in existence prior to 1834 had amending local Acts; for instance, Oxford had one in 1850, I think.

630. Would it be possible to have a list of those local Acts which affect the constitution and working of boards of guardians?—Yes, and I have brought a list with me to-day. I have no doubt it would be advantageous to put that list in. There are exactly twelve. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. I (h).)

631. I make out from Glen (the addition of 1896), thathere are about seventeen?—I merely guessed the number the other day at twelve, and I find there are exactly twelve.

632. I notice you say with regard to the election of guardians working under those Acts, that the disparity was done away in 1894?—Section 60 of the Local Government Act, 1894, practically deals with it.

633. Does any other peculiarity remain with regard to the constitution under those local Acts?—As regards Oxford, there is a special provision.

634. I know the Oxford case, but excluding Oxford, is there?—No.

635. With regard to the regulations—for instance, as to apprenticeship—they had diffierent regulations; do they still obtain?—I think not. The only case, so far as I am aware, in which there arose a difficulty requiring general legislation to remove it, was with regard to out door relief. In one or more of the older local Acts there was no power whatever to give out-door relief; a provision was introduced, into one of the Poor Law Acts—it was the Act of 1848, I think—to the effect that guardians under local Acts should have all the power and duties of guardians in that particular matter under the Act of 1834. (See 11 and 12 Vic. c. 91, sec. 12).

636. I gather that it is optional on the part of the Local Government Board to dissolve those unions?—They have power to do it.

637. Have they done it?—In some cases. Nowadays it is generally done at the express wish of the locality.

638. Why do they elect to have 12?—I do not know that there is any magic in the number.

639. In 1834, the unions which were excluded from the Act of 1834, under local Acts were, I think, about 60 or 70?—That would be because of the Gilbert Act places.

640. Excluding those there were a very considerable number?—There was a very considerable number in the Metropolis.

641. They came to about 40 or 50, I think?—Yes, possibly.

642. Then there were Bristol, Norwich and Coventry?—Yes, a very large diminution was effected when the Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867, was passed.

643. Can you tell us anything as regards Norwich, Bristol, Coventry and Gloucester?—I cannot tell you the history of those now; I am afraid I cannot venture upon the history of individual cases.

644. Would it be possible to find out when these local bodies were dissolved and replaced by the ordinary law?—I should think there would be no difficulty about it.

645. Could that information be obtained?—No doubt.

646 I asked for the reason that I have noticed that there is a spirit of prohibition in the administration, which has been inherited from the clauses of those local Acts in Norwich and in Bristol and in Plymouth; and I rather wanted to have the Acts with a view of finding out what those clauses were?—I can give you the Norwich Act; it was 26 & 27 Vic. c. xciii. Do you want the Plymouth Act?

647. I do not particularly want the Plymouth Act; I rather wanted to have a complete list of the local Acts in force in 1834 with the dates at which they were dissolved by the Local Government Board?—That would require a good deal of careful research. I should think that the Local Government Board might be able to supply the information.

648. If it could do so, I should be very much obliged, for I think it does affect the administration. Some of those local Act bodies, take Plymouth for example, had important charity funds; do you know what has happened to them?—No. That would be outside the scope of my knowledge.

649. What exactly is the procedure with regard to a provisional order dealing with those peculiar local bodies; is it laid before Parliament?—Yes, exactly the same machinery is used as in the case of other provisional orders.

650. Is there a public inquiry before?—Yes, after notice by advertisement and posters.

651. I suppose all the penal clauses which were in those local Acts have been practically abrogated by the Local Government Board?—And by the earlier statutes in many cases. Those provisions about putting people in chains and confining the refractory were all swept away.

652. With regard to the alteration of the areas of boards of guardians, how do you proceed? Do you hold a public enquiry when you are going to alter the areas of unions and when you are going to rearrange parishes and unions?—Yes.

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

15 Jan. 1906

Alterations of Union areas.

653. Could we have a list of the cases in which you have made these alterations or would it not be easy to get?—I am afraid the work involved would be formidable.

654. Is altering these areas then a very constant affair?—I take your question to apply to the whole of them since their constitution in 1834.

655. Is it a case of perpetual alteration?—The mass would be very considerable in the early days.

656. Not now?—No, I do not know that there are many now.

657. How many a year about?—Perhaps two or three a year now.

658. Has the policy with regard to areas changed? Chadwick's policy was always to unite a rural and urban district; has that been changed?—I am not speaking on policy.

Dissolution Gilbert Act Unions.

659. With regard to the Gilbert Act Unions, I see you say that it was in 1868 that you had power to dissolve?—Yes, that was the last—the death blow.

660. It was then you had the power to dissolve?—Yes.

661. Can you tell me whether they were all dissolved at once then?—No, they were dissolved gradually. Some were parishes, and others were unions formed by agreement, that is, they were united parishes. I should say that the dissolution extended over some years.

662. Was there any dissolution before 1868?—Yes, there was. In some instances, I believe, the agreement under which the combination had been brought about was found to be invalid and in those cases, I think, under a little pressure, the local authorities dissolved.

663. The Local Government Board had not power to dissolve them till 1868, had it?—Not to enforce dissolution.

664. Were there any enquiries before they dissolved a Gilbert Union, or did they do it wholesale on a general principle?—I do not think that there could be wholesale procedure, because almost necessarily the consequences of dissolution had to be considered, that is to say, if a Gilbert Union were broken up the question was whether the constituent parishes should be formed wholly into a new union, or whether they should be distributed amongst the adjoining unions, or other areas.

665. How many Gilbert Unions were there?—I really could not say, but I think there were 50 at least.

666. Is there any report in which we could get the exact particulars about the number of Gilbert Unions?—There is one report in which a list is given.

667. Does that give the dates of dissolution?—No.

668. Where could we get that?—I am afraid you would have to search the archives of the Local Government Board.

669. Could a list of the Gilbert Unions, and the dates of dissolution be put in?—I think so, if the Commission ask the Local Government Board for the information, but I am afraid it would not be absolutely exact. In some instances I do not think that the Local Government Board would know the exact date of dissolution, but they might be able to tell you approximately the date. I am speaking entirely from memory, but I should think that in some instances all that the Local Government Board would be able to say was that at a certain period a number of parishes appeared under the name of a Gilbert Union, and then on and after a certain date there was no such union.

670. Could they not give you the actual dates when the union was dissolved?—They could not give the actual date of legal dissolution in every instance, I think, but probably they could give you approximately some dates.

Difficulties as to Asylum districts for houseless poor.

671. I only wanted to know, because I have noticed that that has an effect on administration, at least I have thought I had noticed that. You mentioned at question 62 that under the Act of 1844 the power was once exercised of forming a district to relieve the houseless poor of certain towns, but difficulties ensued, and the district was dissolved, though the power still remained.

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

15 Jan. 1906.

Where could we get information about those difficulties?—I do not know that all the difficulties are actually mentioned in the Reports, but difficulties arose through the refusal of some Metropolitan Guardians to elect members of a board of management, and, in the case of another board, difficulties occurred after the purchase of some land; what precisely they were for the moment I do not recollect. There was litigation, and I think after the litigation which was started by the vendor of the land to compel specific performance, there was general unwillingness to go on with the experiment.

672. I suppose we could get the orders that were issued by the Poor Law Board with regard to that, could we not?—I dare say they could be discovered; I should think copies have been kept.

Preparations for voters' lists.

673. (Miss Hill.) In answer to question 17 you spoke about the qualifications for election as a guardian. As I gather the list is prepared by the overseers from the information supplied by the relieving officers for the purpose of striking out those that are disqualified by receipt of Poor Law relief?—Yes.

674. And then the only check upon that would be an objection before the Revising Barrister if any cases were missed and remained on the list, that is, if the lists were inaccurate, the only remedy would be by application before the Revising Barrister that those disqualified people should be struck off?—That was the effect of the decision in the case of Hayward v. Scott to which I drew attention.

675. Is it within your knowledge whether there has been really any efficient means of striking off disqualified people?—I have been told by members of Parliament that it is rather the other way, and that they always reckon upon seeing a number of paupers amongst their electors.

676. I should expect that you would have been told that?—Yes, I have been told that, but I do not know it of my own knowledge.

Ex-officio guardians.

677. In answer to Question 31 you speak about ex officio guardians, I think they were done away with in 1894?—That is so.

678. Have you any knowledge of the effect that has had on boards of guardians; in your opinion, has it been inadvisable to strike them off, or the reverse?—I ought not to answer that, I am afraid.

679. Do you know what the effect has been?—It has been productive of inconvenience in certain cases.

Franchise for guardians' elections.

680. (Mr. Phelps.) Is a freeman disqualified for voting at the election of guardians by the receipt of relief?—That would depend upon whether he is on the burgess roll.

681. For parliamentary purposes he is not disqualified?—No; if he is on the burgess roll he would be qualified.

682. (Professor Smart.) In the answer to question 17 you say that married women are entitled to be registered and to vote as parochial electors. I am not quite sure what is the franchise qualification of married women and in what relation they stand to their husbands?—The qualification would be the property qualification that the ordinary ratepayer would have.

683. The property must be independent of the husband, must it?—Yes, presumably so.

684. Presumably so, you say?—I do not know that the investigation would be very close. Supposing the married woman appeared in the rate book, for example, as the owner, and occupier, of a particular property, no one would go behind that.

685. Suppose the house were altogether in the name of the wife, where does the husband come in? Have such questions never been raised?—Yes, when the Board had to deal with election cases instances of the sort frequently arose. Then generally there was an agreement produced, especially after the last Married Women's Property Act, which showed that the house was the property of the wife.

686. Then there is some certainty?—I do not know that; perhaps if every case were investigated closely in its distinct legal aspects there might be uncertainty.

687. (Miss Hill.) Does it not practically turn very much on whose name stands in the rate book?—Really it does.

Superannuated officers as guardians.

688. (Mr. Bentham.) Referring to your answer to Question 21, are superannuated officers eligible for the position of guardian?—Yes, I think they are.

Retirement guardians.

689. Going on to Question 29, has a county council power at any time to alter the method of retirement of guardians without the consent of the board of guardians which it would affect?—Yes, in connection with orders under Sections 57 and 59 of the Local Government Act, 1888, the County Council probably have the power, but I should think that in no instance has such a thing been done; I do not remember any.

Provision for treatment of infectious paupers.

690. I do not recollect exactly the number of the question in which it is dealt with, but a point has been raised with regard to the infectious Poor Law cases being removed to infectious hospitals, which might be under a borough council; is it not the duty of borough councils to deal with all infectious cases apart from the Poor Laws?—That is a very doubtful point of law. There are two cases in which the high court has endeavoured to solve the difficulty, but I do not think, up to the present, one can say that the high court has solved it.

691. Even where the union is entirely within the council area?—Yes. The ordinary recommendation to boards of guardians is that they should invariably enter into an agreement with the local authority in order to avoid the question.

692. Without an agreement would it be within the right of the county council to refuse to take any infectious cases from a workhouse hospital?—Not of the county council. I take it you are speaking now either of a hospital committee or of a town council.

693. Either a town council or a county borough Council?—They say that; that is the position they take up very frequently.

694. I thought the question in dispute was where the union was in more than one county?—There have been two cases, I think. Rawtenstall was a case in which they fought over the question of the reception into a borough hospital of the paupers who were inhabitants of the borough. That case, it was hoped, would settle the difficulty, but it did not. Recently another case has involved the question of liability arising otherwise than on contract, but there again the question has not been settled—at least not in a way which would afford satisfactory guidance to local authorities.

695. In the event of a county council refusing to take the cases, would it devolve upon the board of guardians to provide its own infectious hospital for small-pox, scarlatina, and other infectious diseases?—Yes.

Powers of Local Government Board over Metropolitan Asylums Board.

696. (Mr. Nunn.) As to the relation between the Local Government Board and the Metropolitan Asylums Board, when a question arises as to the provision of a hospital or asylum for a fresh class of cases, has the Metropolitan Asylums Board power to decide upon that without any veto on the part of the Local Government Board?—No. It would be necessary, in order to authorise the establishment of asylums for a fresh class of cases, that a district should be formed for that particular purpose; and only the Local Government Board could form the district.

697. When the Ringworm Schools were opened by the Metropolitan Asylums Board was it necessary then?—Yes; an order was issued dealing with all those classes.

698. On the other hand, what powers of resistance has the Metropolitan Asylums Board. I presume it has no power of resistance to an order of the Local Government Board?—It would not have in that case. The formation of the district entails certain consequences.

699. If the Local Government Board ordered a fresh class of cases to be provided for, would they have to be provided for by the Metropolitan Asylums Board?—A fresh district could be formed for dealing with a fresh class of cases.

Detention of lunatics in London workhouses.

700. On the question of detaining lunatics in workhouses, would it be within the power of the Local Government Board to order that the class of persons suffering from senile dementia in London, should be provided for by the guardians and not sent to the Asylums of the London County Council, or of the Metropolitan Asylums Board?—No, not by the guardians.

701. Could that be made the subject of an order by the Local Government Board?—In the present state of the law, I should doubt whether the Board could make an order which would have the effect indicated. In the workhouse these persons would presumably be subject to the provisions of the Lunacy Laws as to imbeciles who can only be retained in a workhouse on certificates.

Revision of list of voters in Metropolitan boroughs.

702. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) Referring to question 14, you state there that "Sec. 30, Sub-sec. 1 of the London Government Act, 1899, provided for the transfer to the Metropolitan borough council of assistant overseers and other officers employed in the performance of the duties of overseers;" I want to know whether ipso facto any official of the borough council becomes assistant overseer, or whether the borough council would have to appoint specially?—Certain existing assistant overseers, under the Act of 1899, were taken over by the borough councils and became officers of the borough councils. Apart from that, the borough councils have power to appoint officers of the same class or with the same duties.

703. They had the power but not the necessity—that is they were not compelled; is that it?—They were not absolutely compelled, but almost of necessity they had to do it where they did not take over the old officer.

704. Would it then be the duty of such an officer, or of a Metropolitan borough council generally to expunge the names of those who have received parochial relief from the list of voters?—That would be the duty of the Town Clerk. He would have to do for the borough council the particular duty which elsewhere arises for performance by the overseer under the Registration Order of 1895.

705. Then the power of expunging rests now with the Town Clerk in a metropolitan borough?—That would be so.

706. I will go now to question 31, although I do not know whether you are the witness to whom I should put this: The guardians now have power to elect not more than two persons outside their own body, "from persons qualified to be guardians of the union"; have you ever heard anything showing whether that is done or whether any complaint has been made about it, or whether there has been any suggestion that it is an unwise thing?—I should have no definite knowledge of the subject.

707. In your replies to questions 62 and 63 I think what you have told us is that the difficulty in regard to combination for providing for the houseless poor arose through a vendor objecting to sell some land?—I think it was rather the other way about. I think that the vendor tried to enforce specific performance; anyhow the matter got into litigation, and after that I rather think everybody was unwilling to go on with it.

708. May I take it that the power to combine for that purpose is still a power though not exercised?—It is still a power.

709. Then, for instance, two or three Metropolitan boards of guardians may combine for the purpose of providing shelter for the houseless poor with work to be done after they had received their relief?—That is to say, they would become constituents of the district to be set up by the order of the Local Government Board; but the institution, whatever you might call it—whether an asylum or any other institution—would be under the control of the board of management.

710. There was never anything, I suppose, obliging any houseless person to go to any special institution?—I think not; the experiment never got beyond the mere formation of the district.

711. Then it has never had a fair trial?—Never.

712. (Mr. Booth.) Turning to Question 13 (although you deal with the subject under the particular head of administration later), I desire to ask you generally on a point which I think comes better here, but I am afraid my question is a very ignorant question. I wish to know. Do the powers of the overseer supplement or act as a check upon those exercised by the guardians?—In the matter of relief?

713. I am talking of their entire duties, whatever they are?—No.

714. It would be so in a matter of relief surely?—In the matter of relief the powers of the overseers are limited by statute to the simple case of sudden and urgent necessity.

715. So that they do in fact supplement those exercised by the guardians?—Yes, to that extent.

716. Do their duties apply to in-door as well as to out-door relief?—Not in the case of overseers.

717. In their case it is out door relief only?—Yes.

718. (Chairman.) I am not quite clear about the powers of the Local Government Board over guardians. If the guardians were in default the Local Government Board has no power to supersede them, I understand?—That is so.

719. Assuming a board of guardians to be contumacious and decline to obey an order of the Local Government Board, what powers have the Local Government Board to enforce the order?—Essentially the power would be that given by mandamus.

720. Is there no direct power at all of superseding a board of guardians, either for its default in refusing to obey an order, or because it was extravagantly performing its duties?—There is the power of dissolving the union and distributing the parishes amongst other unions.

721. Assuming that you keep the union in its entirety and continue it there is no such power.—That is so.

722. Now from your long experience can you tell us whether the Local Government Board have ever felt the absence of that power?—Of late years I should say it has.

723. Would you mind giving us an independent opinion? As legal adviser to the Local Government Board, would you like to have the power of declaring a board of guardians in default?—I take it that the power that would be needed would be the power of appointing substitutes for the existing guardians. There is such a power, I believe, under the Irish law; and in olden days as I have mentioned, ex-officio guardians supplied the element from which practically the vice-guardians or the substitutes for the elective guardians could be obtained.

724. Were there any cases in the old days of the ex-officio guardians where they superseded the elected guardians?—The supersession was in very small matters and on perhaps only single occasions, because I think that generally the knowledge that the ex-officio guardians were there and ready to act checked the default.

725. Would you say that the knowledge of the reverse, namely, that there is no such power now, encourages default?—I should not like to go so far as to say that.

Dissolution of unions under local Acts.

726. (Sir Samuel Provis). I want to ask you one question arising out of an answer that you gave about the local Acts. The Local Government Board have power, have they not, on their own motion, to dissolve a union whether formed under the general law or not?—Yes.

Repeal or amendment of local Acts.

727. They cannot, can they, repeal or alter a local Act except upon application?—That is so.

728. And the application must come, must it not, from the guardians or from other bodies having powers or duties to discharge under the Act?—Yes, there is one exception, and I mention it simply because there have been instances in which the power has been exercised. That one exception is in the case where the alteration of a local Act is possible in connection with an order under Sec. 54 of the Local Government Act, 1888—that is, an order altering the boundary of a borough or county.

729. (Mrs. Webb.) Do I understand that, as a matter of fact, the Local Government Board could not dissolve a local Act union if the persons objected?—They could dissolve the union, certainly.

730. I mean the Local Act Body?—They could dissolve the union altogether and then the Local Act Body would disappear, because, by virtue of a recent enactment, on the dissolution of the union, the Local Act Body disappears, that is, the corporation is dissolved with the union. It is the Local Act that cannot be altered, ordinarily, except upon the application of the Local Act Body.

731. If you can dissolve the union you can practically destroy the Local Act?—Not necessarily.

732. I do not quite understand?—The Local Act might conceivably contain provisions—and many of them do—that would be outside the mere range of Poor Law duties. That is sometimes a difficult position.

733. Then practically it comes to this—that you could destroy the local Act in so far as it affected the constitution of the body?—Certainly.

734. But not in so far as it affected the function of the body?—That is to say, the new body would not have the functions of the old body, but it would be difficult in concrete cases to decide where those powers or duties were left; it might be chaos.

735. They might be left in an obsolete body, hung up in the air without any other functions?—That is so.

736. Like some of the directors of the poor in London now—for there are directors of the poor?—Yes, but they are still charity trustees.

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

15 Jan. 1906.

Paupers in hospitals of Sanitary Authorities.

737. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) With reference to the removal of patients from workhouses to infectious diseases hospitals, when these patients are so removed, have the authorities of the infectious diseases hospital the right of recourse against the Poor Law authorities for the cost of their maintenance and upkeep in the infectious diseases hospital, or do they maintain the patients themselves at their own cost?—The arrangement that is generally recommended (because the law is in a somewhat uncertain condition) is that there should be a definite agreement between the two bodies; and under a definite agreement the town council, having the hospital, would be paid by the board of guardians so much per head.

Powers of guardians as to land purchase.

738. (Mr. Booth.) Will you, turn please, to question 151, which refers to the purchase of land being allowed or disallowed. Does the Act of 1867 disallow the purchase of land except for the enlargement of buildings, and does it allow the hiring of land for a five year's term?—The Act of 1867 does not prevent the hiring of land.

739. I read your answer as meaning that, but I must have misread it. The restrictions on the use of provisions relating to compulsory purchase are, I understand, that these provisions are only to be put in force for the enlargement of workhouses, that is, the buying of land for that purpose, is it not?—Yes, but the Act would not interfere with the hiring of land for that or any other purpose.

740. But you cannot buy land except for the purpose of enlarging the building?—You cannot buy land under the Lands Clause Acts—that is the point. The Lands Clauses Acts do not apply to the purchase of land for Poor Law purposes generally, but they do apply in this particular instance and they apply in this limited way.

741. Are there other provisions with regard to the purchase of land for other purposes?—There are other provisions. There are provisions in the general Poor Law Acts. The Act, 5 & 6 William IV. c. 69, is one.

742. In your reply to question 160, you say, "The workhouse is to be considered as situated in the parish or in the union where an inmate resided last previously to his removal to the workhouse"; how is the workhouse to be considered as situated in any union where it is not?—That is a matter of construction. It is for the purposes of burial.

Date of second report of Poor Law Commission.

743. Can you tell me the date of the second Report of the Poor Law Commissioners?—1836.

Definition of non-resident relief.

744. At page 196 the phrase "non-resident relief" is used; does that mean relief to non-residents?—That is relief to persons who are not resident in the union the guardians of which pay the relief ultimately.

Power to revise General Consolidated Order of 1847.

745. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) At Question 174 you are asked "Is the General Consolidated Order periodically revised and issued by the Local Government Board"? and you reply "No, the General Consolidated Order is a fixed code." Do I understand that the power of the President of the Local Government Board does not extend to an absolute alteration of that, but only to such changes as are necessitated by fresh legislation—in other words, is it a statutory power?—His power is absolute as regards alteration; it could be altered as often as he chose to alter it. As a matter of fact it is not treated like the code of the Board of Education, that is to say, there is not an annual revision of it; it is revised only when occasion requires.

746. The power of the President then, is the same over that order as over any other?—Entirely so.

"Neglect" under the Vagrancy and Prevention of Cruelty to Children Acts.

747. Then at Question 253 Mr. Loch asks you "It says that a parent who neglects may get relief on loan for his child; what is the definition of 'neglect' there;" and your answer is "I think that the expression 'habitual neglect' as used in the order, was intended to include such neglect as is within the contemplation of the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1904." May I take it that that is the usual definition of neglect with regard to Poor Law relief generally adopted here?—No. I think neglect within the meaning of the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act has a more limited signification than under the Vagrancy Act, 1824.

748. Neglect under the Vagrancy Act need not be such an extensive and in a sense cruel a thing as under the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act?—I think that is so.

749. Did the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act supersede the other?—No. The Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act superseded a provision which was in the Poor Law Amendment Act of 1868 and had reference to wilful neglect to provide adequate food, clothing, medical aid or lodging for a child. That was repealed and the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act was substituted; but the Vagrancy Act was not repealed, and that still remains.

Special rate for emigratio

750. Then at Question 286 Mr. Loch says, "I thought that was valid still?"—he is referring there to the power of the parish meeting to raise a rate specially for emigration purposes; and you seem to imply in your answer that it may be in existence, but it has hardly ever been made use of?—It has not been actually repealed; that is all I meant. The enactment relating to the owners and ratepayers raising emigration expenses has not been actually struck off the Statute Book; it remains there, but it is a dead letter; it is not workable nowadays.

Disposition of pauper property.

751. (Mr. Nunn.) I want to put one or two questions to you now about the reimbursement of relief. When money is or other valuables are found in the possession of the pauper on his entrance to the workhouse before it falls into the treasurer's hands, have the guardians the power of dealing with it according to their discretion, and either giving it back to the relatives or retaining it?—Yes.

752. Supposing it has passed into the hands of the treasurer, have they then lost that power?—In a sense they have: that is to say they could not hand over the actual cash, or whatever it might be, to the relatives. But in all those instances they could themselves by an order upon the treasurer make the repayment. It would be a question whether they were acting strictly within their powers if they did it.

753. It is a question?—Of course there would be the question whether they were right in doing it.

754. (Mr. Phelps.) Must you then not grant outdoor relief to that man?—Not necessarily: this is a case of repayment to relatives I understand.

Relief on loan.

755. (Mr. Nunn.) My next question refers to the declaration of relief by loan; is it necessary that the pauper should be in full possession of his senses when such a declaration is made?—He should be certainly.

756. Must he be?—He ought to be.

757. They cannot do it to a person who comes into the house drunk?—I do not think they should.

Relieving officers' d on refusal indoor rel

758.—With regard to discharge by the relieving officer, and the responsibility with regard to outdoor relief, supposing the guardians have offered to house the applicant, and the applicant refuses to avail himself of that offer, and applies to the relieving officer again, to what extent is it necessary that the relieving officer if he considers the applicant really destitute, should relieve him?—He should relieve him in necessaries, treating the case as one of sudden or urgent necessity.

759. Could he give him at least enough for one meal?—Yes.

760. I was wondering to what extent it was necessary for him to regard the applicant after he had furnished him with the immediate necessities?—He should treat it as a case of sudden or urgent necessity, and give such relief as would be necessary to relieve that sudden or urgent necessity.

761. Then has he discharged his responsibility until application is made to him again?—That should be so ordinarily.

Powers of overseers grant reli

762 (Mr. Bentham.) Will you go to Question 190, which gives the sections showing the powers of overseers to grant relief. This question has been asked several times, but I do not feel quite clear about it yet. In case of sudden and urgent necessity are the guardians bound to honour whatever the overseers have given?—The relief given by the overseers in the case of sudden and urgent necessity would be a subject of charge in the accounts of the overseers. It is a parochial charge.

763. Is it not part of the duty of a relieving officer to enter in his Application Report Book all applications for relief whether they might be made by the overseers or by the magistrates, or by any other person; and in that case would that relief be legal if it did not appear in the relieving officer's book?—I do not think that the question of the legality of the relief would be affected by its appearing only in the overseer's accounts. It would be a legal charge supposing that the case was one of sudden and urgent necessity, and it was given under circumstances that brought it within the powers of the overseers.

764. With regard to the powers of justices to grant relief, is their power somewhat narrower than the power which is given to overseers; is it limited to the casual poor, and to medical relief only in the case of sudden and dangerous illness?—Sec. 27 deals with the powers of the justices in other cases. Restriction was put upon the exercise of the justices' powers in those cases by the decisions of the Courts. It was held that the justices who dealt with the cases had to follow a regular procedure, including the summoning of the persons to be relieved.

765. Sec. 54 says: "Provided always that any justice of the peace shall be empowered to give a similar order for medical relief (only) to any parishioner, as well as out parishioners where any case of sudden and dangerous illness may require it." Am I to understand the word "only" to mean that they could not give relief to persons other than medical relief?—Sec. 27 is additional to that, and Sec. 27 is to this effect: "In any union which may be formed under this Act it shall be lawful for any two . . . . justices of the peace usually acting for the district wherein such union may be situated, at their just and proper discretion to direct by order under their hands and seals that relief shall be given to any adult person who shall from old age or infirmity of body be wholly unable to work without requiring that such person shall be received in the workhouse." That is additional to the power under Sec. 54.

766. According to your answer to Question 255 under the Friendly Societies Acts guardians have "not to take into consideration any sum received from a Friendly Society as sick pay, except in so far as the sum exceeds 5s. a week"; if the guardians ignore this in practice what redress has the applicant?—I do not know.

767. Then really it could become a dead letter?—I ought not to say that because, technically, the case might be one in which the pauper might be heard, if application were made for a mandamus to a board of guardians to give relief. As a matter of fact there is no authentic report of the actual end of the only case of application on behalf of a pauper for a mandumus (Queen v. Guardians of Newtown, 28 J.P. 725); but so far as the case is reported it showed a disposition on the part of the Court of Queen's Bench to entertain the application for the mandamus.

768. Referring now to question 273, as the system of apprenticeship described in your answer there is now considered to be out of date, and is seldom acted upon, is there anything in the orders or statutes to prevent a board of guardians with the sanction of the Local Government Board apprenticing a boy to be taught a trade, the guardians providing the difference between the wages paid and the cost of the boy's maintenance in lodgings, and the guardians exercising the necessary oversight until the boy has reached the age at which he is capable of looking after himself, that is, at the termination of the agreement?—I am afraid that is rather an elaborate case. I think all that I can say upon that subject is that, if there were any general desire to control apprenticeship on those lines, it might be within the powers of the Board; but certainly a special order would be needed to deal with the matter. It could not be dealt with under the existing provisions of the General Consolidated Order; if it could be done it would have to be done under amended provisions.

769. Apprenticeship of that kind is already done, but the difference is paid as outdoor relief?—Quite so, but your notion would be to put it on the footing of a legalised apprenticeship, would it not?

770. A legalised apprenticeship, but non-maintenance?—For that you would certainly need a special order even if it were within the powers of a special order.

771. Referring now to question 281 are the powers of emigration under the Unemployed Workmen Act intended to supersede the powers of guardians to emigrate persons who are not actually chargeable?—I do not think there is any such intention: certainly not. The act is not intended to supersede those powers; the two are to work side by side, I should rather say.

772. Then there are three authorities now with power to emigrate, namely, county councils, board of guardians, and distress committee?—Distress committees having the powers of central bodies, yes. But I think you must eliminate county councils for the present; technically there is that power of borrowing under the Local Government Act, 1888, but the power is one that has never yet been exercised.

773. There is nothing to prevent its being exercised, is there?—I am not at all sure. It is a peculiarly worded section. There are agreements contemplated. It is essential that there should be a guarantee for repayment from the local authority in the county, if it were a county scheme, that is if it were an internal scheme, or from the Government of any Colony, if it were an external scheme. You must have that ab initio, as it were.

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

15 Jan. 1906.

774. (Professor Smart.) I understand that when a person applies for relief he must give up everything?—Not necessarily. Destitution as the condition of relief.

775. He gives up money I suppose?—Yes.

776. And valuables?—Not necessarily; some valuables he would not, or he might not.

777. That is not the theory of the case, because that is that he becomes entirely destitute before he gets relief?—His destitution should, no doubt, be established; but you are not taking now the case of indoor relief—you are taking the case of relief in general. He would not absolutely strip his cottage of everything that could be classed as a valuable in order to entitle him to get relief.

778. But a person cannot come into the poor-house without breaking up his home for example?—No, perhaps not.

779. Then practically it comes so this, that as a theory a person is dispoiled of everything before he gets poor relief?—As to what constitutes destitution no doubt the theory goes very far.

780. Would you make a difference there between income and capital, and say that a man must have no income but still may have some capital—goods?—Yes; in certain circumstances.

781. If a pauper afterwards falls heir to a legacy there is a certain amount of claim on the part of the State—to a year's maintenance, is there not?—There is also a common-law power, which in some cases has been exercised, and which enables guardians to recover more than one year's maintenance. Reimbursement of relief.

782. It enables them to recover six years, does it not?—Yes.

783. Does that give any sort of countenance for the theory that all our relief is of the nature of a loan by the State?—No, I should think not.

784. Otherwise, how do you claim for a year's maintenance at all?—By Statute.

785. Simply by Statute?—That is all for the one year. The other kind of action is for money paid on behalf of, or expenses necessarily incurred for the benefit of the pauper. The body who have expended money on the pauper's maintenance during a certain period ask to be recouped, and, with that object, bring an ordinary action.

786. When a person applies for relief, the first thing the guardians do is to apply to the blood relations to see if they are able to support the claimant, is it not?—I ought not to speak as to the practice. There is no doubt they do look about for relatives, or they should do so.

787. To what extent—to the parents, grandparents, and children?—Yes.

788. And an order, in that case, may be passed upon those blood relations?—Yes.

789. To what amount—the full amount of the maintenance?—That is determined by the justices.

790. Is there any principle in the matter?—I do not think I can answer that question; so much would depend upon practice.

791. But they might claim for the full amount of the relief given?—Yes.

792. Is there any claim on brothers and sisters?—No.

793. Only on parents, grandparents, and children?—That is so; and in the case of the grandchild, it is not reciprocal.

794. Generally speaking, the non-payment of Poor Rates is a disqualification for the franchise?—Speaking very generally, yes. Disfranchisement.

795. You note that the excusal from payment is not poor relief?—It is not. That was decided by the High Court.

796. And does not disqualify?—It does not disqualify.

797. That means that a person must be formally excused?—Yes; under 54 George III., c. 170, Sec. 11.

798. But you cannot tell us anything positively about the position of the man who does not pay his poor rates and yet has not been excused?—Speaking generally, a man who does not pay his rates would be disqualified.

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

15 Jan. 1906.

799. Am I to understand that when any municipality establishes temporary relief work, such employment is poor relief and disqualification for the franchise?—No, certainly not.

800. I rather gathered that from answer to question 118 where you take the case of breaking stones?—The work was provided by the guardians in that case.

801. Could you give me the date of that case?—I am sorry I have not a note of it with me, but I will supply the date.

Disposal of unclaimed corpses of paupers.

802. You make a reference to the disposal of corpses to anatomical schools, and you say that payment cannot be given to an official for that; are there any special regulations as to the disposal of unclaimed corpses to schools of Anatomy and schools of that sort?—There are no Poor Law regulations.

803. What regulations are there?—That would come under the Anatomy Act.

804. And so would be beyond our scope altogether?—Quite so.

Revision of General Consolidated Order.

805. (Mr. Phelps.) In regard to the General Consolidated Order of 1847, are new orders attached to it; does it steadily grow?—I believe it does steadily grow on the whole, but the process would be ordinarily to rescind portions of it or vary portions and issue a fresh order dealing with the subject matter of that portion.

806. Is it within your knowledge that in many quarters it is thought that a new edition of the General Consolidated Order would be a great convenience to officials?—I have heard that said, certainly.

807. It has been brought under my notice a great many times lately in connection with this inquiry. Has the Local Government Board ever contemplated a revised edition?—Certainly.

808. Is it likely to be propounded?—That is rather outside my scope.

Powers of Justices to order relief.

809. With regard to Question 189 and the powers of the justices, am I to understand you to say that, as the law stands, if the justices of a borough or of a district thought that the board of guardians were acting very harshly in the matter of relief, they would have it in their power to reverse their decision practically in the case of applicants who have been offered the workhouse?—Provided they came within that particular section. That was in fact suggested by Lord Chief Justice Cockburn in the particular case in which I mentioned that an application for a mandamus had been made.

810. Do you know whether such cases often occur?—I should think they would be exceedingly rare.

811. I speak from knowledge, because in my own union there was such a case. An attempt was made to override the decision of the guardians by applying to the justices, and the justices ordered relief; through some informality it fell through in the end. Do you think it would be possible or legal for the justices, now deliberately and consistently to over-ride the action of the guardians?—Speaking from that one particular case which was before the High Court, I should say that the High Court would recognise the power of the justices to over-ride the decision of the guardians, provided of course, that the circumstances were favourable to their excercising their jurisdiction.

Topographical application of prohibitory order.

812. With regard to the prohibitory order, I did not quite understand from your answer to Question 197 whether there is any principle with regard to its application. You said in general terms that the prohibitory order and the regulation order were applied, the one to the rural districts and the other to more populous centres; is there any principle of distinction between the two, numerical or other?—Originally in the one case the Poor Law Commissioners adopted what they called preparatory rules, and those they issued to the rural areas, and to the less populous towns. Following those has come the outdoor relief prohibitory order, which they settled before they went out of office.

813. Is there any definition of "less populous"?—No.

814. Is there any numerical distinction?—The distinction arises from the selection of unions to which the order is addressed.

815. And that is almost arbitrary?—Certainly in that sense.

Discharge of pauper without dependant.

816. In regard to question 200 I am afraid I am not quite clear in my own mind yet, in spite of all that has been said, about the responsibility of parents; if I might give a case it would perhaps put the question best. I was at a board of guardians the other day and a proposal was made with regard to a man and his wife and four children who were in the workhouse. It was proposed to let the man and his wife and two children go out and to maintain the other two children in the workhouse at the cost of the ratepayers. Would that be legal?—What order was in force; was it the Outdoor Relief Prohibitory Order?

817. I could not say: it was at Lewes?—It might not be absolutely illegal, but it might be defective administration.

818. Would they have to report it to the Local Government Board?—If the Outdoor Relief Prohibitory Order were in force they would.

819. And has the Local Government Board power to allow it?—Yes.

820. It has been done under the Outdoor Relief Prohibitory Order. Would it be the duty of the auditor to surcharge them in a case of that sort?—No, I do not think he could surcharge in that case.

Payment of paupers' re by guardia

821. What is the position of the law with regard to the payment of rent?—The payment of rent is within the prohibitions of the two orders, except rent for a night's shelter or temporary lodgings. In article 5 of the Outdoor Relief Prohibitory Order the provision runs thus—"It shall not be lawful for the guardians or any of their officers, or for the overseer or overseers of any parish in the union to pay, wholly or in part, the rent of the house or lodging of any pauper, or to apply any portion of the relief ordered to be given to any pauper in payment of any such rent, or to retain any portion of such relief for the purpose of directly or indirectly discharging such rent, in full or in part, for any such pauper; provided always that nothing in this article contained shall apply to any shelter or temporary lodging procured in any case of sudden and urgent necessity or mental imbecility or shall be taken to prevent the said guardians in regulating the amount of relief to be afforded to any particular person from considering the expense to be incurred by such person in providing lodging."

822. (Mr. Nunn.) That is directed to payment of rent by the officer, and not by the pauper?—As regards the pauper, the guardians may take into account in the amount of relief which they give the possible demands upon him for rent.

Presentati of orders t Parliament

823 (Mrs. Webb.) With regard to the general orders, are they still presented to Parliament every year?—A certain number of orders are always presented to Parliament.

824. Are those general orders?—When an order is general it has to be presented, and there is a routine arrangement with regard to presentation. An order is general when it is issued to more than two unions.

General orders impugned Law Court

825. As regards the validity of the general orders, have they been questioned in the Law Courts; have you had a certiorari against a general order?—The applications by way of certiorari, I think, were as a rule against single orders—that is special orders—but it is just conceivable that one of those orders may have been issued to two unions, which would make it a general order. I do not, however, recall a case.

Difference between special and general orders.

826. I do not quite understand the distinction between special and general orders; is it simply the issue of the same order at different dates to different unions which constitutes it a special order as distinguished from a general order?—The old distinction was that if one order was issued to more than two unions it became a general order.

827. Supposing you issued the order at different dates to different unions would not that still be a special order?—That would certainly be a special order and not a general order.

828. So that you could make it not a general order if you chose?—Yes; but of course there were reasons for issuing general orders in the early days.

829. Do they still obtain?—Yes. General orders now are in a somewhat different position from what they were when the Poor Law Commissioners were acting. General orders now apply not merely to Poor Law matters, but to other powers that the Board possess; so that very frequently a general order is, one might say, almost the only way in which certain regulations can be applied.

830. On questions with regard to the relief of distress, like different forms of diet and outdoor relief—for instance the Whitechapel Order—is it now the practice of the Local Government Board to issue a new policy in the form of special orders which will be repeated to different unions?—As regards diet the last order was a general order.

831. Take the special order for the Chorlton Union which enabled the Chorlton Union not to weigh the bread; that was a most important order; if that was issued to a great many unions, one after the other, that would really be a change in the law under which the boards of guardians acted, would it not?—That would be so.

832. Is part of the difficulty of consolidating the general orders that you have been changing your policy by special orders?—I do not think that change of policy would be a practical difficulty in the way of consolidation.

833. You have a great many important special orders; there is for instance the special order with regard to Whitechapel, allowing outdoor relief to the family of a man if he himself comes into the workhouse; I do not know whether that has been issued to a good many unions?—It hardly deserves the name of an important order, I think; it is merely an explanatory order, showing what could practically be done under the Out-Door Relief Regulation Order.

834. Turning back to the Chorlton order with regard to bread, that enabled the Chorlton Board of Guardians not to weigh the bread to the paupers?—I am afraid I do not know anything of the genesis of the Chorlton order.

835. Where do we find these general orders since 1834; how could we obtain them so as to see what they consist of?—I am afraid that could only come from the records of the Local Government Board.

836. Would it be possible for us to obtain a set of those general orders?—I should hardly think it is possible.

837. I notice that up to the year 1859 or about that time, you had official circulars which gave all these documents?—The Poor Law Commissioners and Poor Law Board issued such circulars, but even they did not give all the general orders.

838. You do not think they did?—I am sure they did not.

839. Could we extract those general orders from your reports?—It would have to be done from the records; but the labour of compiling such a list would be so enormous that I do not know when it would finish.

840. How many general orders on a rough guess do you suppose there have been since 1834?—I could not hazard a guess. Within the definition every order issued to two unions would count. The orders were issued and then rescinded in the days of the Poor Law Commission. The trouble that I am thinking of would be in their time.

841. Would it not be possible to find them in the Poor Law Commission Reports?—No. It would be possible to find them in the registers of the Local Government Board and they could be traced with a considerable amount of labour.

842. Could anyone having access to those registers trace them?—I should think so, but I do not know whether the registers in the days of the Poor Law Commissioners were kept with sufficient nicety to answer this particular purpose.

Accessibility of general orders issued since 1874.

FOURTH DAY.

Tuesday, 16th January, 1906.

AT THE FOREIGN OFFICE, DOWNING STREET, S.W.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, G.C.S.I., etc., etc., etc. (Chairman).

The Right Hon. CHARLES BOOTH, F.R.S.
Sir SAMUEL B. PROVIS, K.C.B.
Mr. F. H. BENTHAM.
Dr. A. H. DOWNES.
The Rev. T. GAGE GARDINER.
Mr. C. S. LOCH.
Mr. J. PATTEN-MACDOUGALL.
Mr. T. HANCOCK NUNN.
The Rev. L. R. PHELPS.
Professor WILLIAM SMART.
The Rev. H. RUSSELL WAKEFIELD.
Mrs. BERNARD BOSANQUET.
Mrs. SIDNEY WEBB.
Miss OCTAVIA HILL.

Mr. R. H. A. G. DUFF (Secretary).
Mr. J. JEFFREY (Assistant Secretary).

Mr. ALFRED DOUGLAS ADRIAN,* C.B., K.C., recalled; and further Examined.

843. (Mrs. Webb.) I am sorry to be troublesome, but I want to come back to the question of the general orders. I understood from you that they are laid before Parliament from year to year; are they issued to members as Parliamentary papers?—I do not know what the procedure is with regard to particular orders which are in fact laid upon the table.

844. Should we find them in the proceedings of the House?—The department concerned with laying them before the House would be able to answer. I have no personal knowledge of the procedure.

845. Has the Local Government Board no complete set of these general orders?—There are volumes which may contain a complete collection.

846. I am told there is a row of volumes of general orders bound, numbered, and indexed; is that so?—Yes.

847. How far back do those go?—I could not tell you.

848. Would it be possible for us to have the loan of those volumes?—On that I think a question must be put to the department.

849. With regard to the special orders, have they the force of law equally with general orders?—Yes, so far as the particular locality is concerned.

850. Has their validity been questioned in the law courts? I gather from your evidence that there have been two cases?—I think there were more than two cases. In the past, especially in the Metropolis, the Poor Law Commissioners had, I should think, at least half-a-dozen of their orders questioned.

851. Those were generally, I think, in the case of unions under local Acts, were they not?—Almost, I think, without exception,—they were all under local Acts.

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

Special Orders impugned in Law Courts.

* N.B.—It should be borne in mind that, since the dates at which this witness appeared before the Royal Commission, various Statutory enactments and judicial decisions have, in several respects, affected the legal position as described in his evidence.

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

16 Jan. 1906.

Relief Committees.

852. Could we have a list of the cases in which the validity of special orders has been questioned ?—I daresay a list could be compiled in the department.

853. I notice that the policy of the central authority as regards relief committees is entirely dependent on special orders, that is to say, it is by a special order that a union is permitted to have a relief committee instead of sitting as a whole in the relief of cases ?—There are district relief committees, no doubt.

854. And only district relief committees ?—"District relief committee," I think, is the usual phrase adopted to describe the committee set up under special orders.

855. Could a board of guardians, without a special order, divide into committees for the relief of distress ?—For the relief of destitution, yes.

856. What is the distinction ?—In the one case the district committee is set up under an express statutory enactment giving the Board power to start such an organisation. In the other case, the power of the guardians is derived from the Local Government Act, 1894, which incorporates provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875, with respect to meetings and the transaction of business.

857. So that a meeting of a board of guardians could break up into committees and take cases separately without a special order ?—Provided that the regulations of the board of guardians were made to meet the particular case.

858. Would those regulations be given in a special order ?—No, the regulations would be made by the board of guardians.

859. I notice that there was a special order of the Local Government Board insisting that the district relief committees should be composed only of the guardians of the district ; is that still in force ?—There are so many of them that one would like the name of the particular committee.

860. Glen gives it, but of course he does not give the date ; he says it was issued to fourteen unions between 1843 and 1882 ?—I daresay that is right.

861. That is a very important point in policy, because the whole question of whether the guardians of a particular district give relief or not is mixed up with corruption. Can we ascertain whether those orders are still in force ?—No doubt.

Alcoholic Liquors, &c. : Wirral Order.

862. Then that information could be provided. Now with regard to the special order of the Wirral Union in Cheshire which is noticed in Glen, allowing guardians to supply food and alcoholic liquors to poor persons during harvest time ; is that still in force ?—I really do not know.

863. How can we judge of the policy of the central authority with regard to alcoholic liquor without knowing that ?—I am afraid I can hardly answer that question. I am not here to discuss policy.

864. We are now discussing law under which boards of guardians work ; that would be part of the law, would it not ?—A district relief committee order ?

865. No, the question of alcoholic liquor. You see there is a special order under which one union has work or is working, which enables them to give alcoholic drink to poor persons under certain circumstances ; that would be part of the law under which that union acted, would it not ?—Certainly.

866. Then we could not understand the law laid down by the Local Government Board without having that and similar orders ?—Quite so.

Meeting of Guardians at public-house.

867. There is also (in connection with the temperance question) an order which you yourself referred to—which was a special order, I understood—which prohibited guardians from meeting in a public-house ?—That is statutory. It was not an order.

868. I beg your pardon, but I understood it was an order. At question 35 you say, the Local Government Board were advised that they had power to make an order as to the place of meeting of a board of guardians so as to prevent their meeting at a public-house ?—That is the case.

869. Was that order issued ?—I think not.

870. That was merely an expression of opinion by the lawyers then ?—By the law officers of the Crown.

Accessibility of Special Orders.

871. In view of the importance of these special orders as embodying policy, how can we get at them ?—I am afraid that that question must be addressed to the Local Government Board.

872. Would it not be necessary for the auditor of a district to have a complete set of these special orders with a view to surcharges ?—Certainly.

873. Then the auditors could give us those ?—I should think that the application might well be made to head quarters rather than to auditors.

874. A sympathetic Local Government Board could give us those orders, or, at any rate, such of those orders as made new departures or experiments, whether they failed or succeeded. Then you referred to a famous circular issued by Mr. Goschen ; that was a very important document as a declaration of policy, was it not ?—Yes, it was the minute of the 20th of November, 1869.

Accessibility of Circulars of Local Government Board.

875. I suppose there are other important circulars by the Local Government Board determining the policy ?—On that particular question ?

876. No, on other questions ?—Yes.

877. There is, for instance, the Workhouse Infirmary Circular of 1897, and there are the Unemployed Circulars of 1886 and 1892. Would it be possible for us to have any opinion about the administration of relief in England without knowing about those circulars ?—I am afraid I can hardly answer that question. The circulars have, from time to time, been issued to accompany orders dealing with various questions relating to relief.

878. They have sometimes been issued without orders have they not ?—Occasionally.

879. Does the Local Government Board keep files of these circulars ?—Certainly.

880. I assume that these might be supplied if the Local Government Board desired to supply them ?—If they are still in print.

881. But you would have a copy and you could lend them ?—I daresay the copies are complete, but I have no personal knowledge as to that.

Destitution as a condition of relief.

882. About destitution, I did not quite understand whether, assuming that a widow asked for out-door relief and she happened to have a Chippendale chair value £5, that would disqualify her from getting relief ?—I think not.

883. If she had a bag of old gold coins value £20, in her possession, would that disqualify her—I mean old coins which could not be immediately used ; of course, she could not have £200 of current coin in her possession without being disqualified ?—I believe there is a decision (Moss v. Hancock ; Law Reports 1899, 2 Queen's Bench, 111 ; 68 Law Journal, Queen's Bench, 657) which might support an argument that the old coins would be equivalent to money for the purposes of Sec. 16 of the 12 and 13 Vic., c. 103.

884. Would personal ornament come under that ?—I think not.

885. The point is this that for indoor relief you would, more or less, have to part with those things, would you not, or would it hold the same with indoor as with outdoor relief ?—Some personal possession would certainly be retained by the pauper—the widow's wedding ring, for example ; I have never seen any suggestion that she should be made to part with that.

886. Would there be any distinction with regard to property between a person who went into the House and a person who accepted relief outside ?—In the case of the person who accepted relief outside, anything in the nature of money or valuable security for money might be taken by the guardians.

887. And that would be the same in the case of a person going indoors ?—The person going indoors could hardly take furniture and other possessions with him or her.

888. Therefore, they would have to be disposed of ?—In some sort of way.

889. (Dr. Downes.) On the general question of relief has there been any attempt to define what destitution means ?—There is no absolute statutory definition

Such definition as exists must be gathered rather from pronouncements on particular cases, I think.

890. Would the same answer apply to the words, "sudden and urgent necessity" which appear in various statutes and orders?—In a way, yes. But those words have had a development. I believe that the Poor Law Commissioners at one time—quite in the early days—treated them as applicable only to cases where a house had been burnt down or some calamity of that sort had befallen the man; but the meaning has been very much widened.

891. Taking the question of relief in the broad sense, I think the securities for the relief of the really destitute are very ample, setting aside the question of the overseers, and taking the case of the relieving officer or of the master of the workhouse?—Quite so.

892. If a really destitute person applies for relief to one of those two officers—there are, I think, very ample securities that that relief will be given?—Quite so.

893. There is, first of all, the authority of the guardians?—Yes.

894. Then, I think, there is the authority of the central body who have power to dismiss those officers?—Yes.

895. And behind all that lies an appeal to the law?—Yes.

896. Would an indictment lie against an officer who allowed a person to suffer or to perish from neglect?—An officer might be indicted for negligence of a serious kind.

897. Then, there is the more cumbrous machinery of a mandamus, I suppose?—Yes, as against the guardians. As regards the mandamus, we have only the solitary case which I referred to the other day and the final issue of which is in some uncertainty.

898. If we turn to the manner in which the relief is given, what would be the checks against illegal or extravagant expenditure?—Illegal expenditure would be a subject of disallowance or surcharge by the auditor. He also has a power of dealing with unreasonable expenditure; but the question of unreasonable expenditure in the matter of relief is often a difficult one. The distributors of the relief have a discretion which of course goes some way as an authority, where it is a question of amount.

899. I take it that it is easier for an auditor to deal with an illegal payment than it is for him to deal with an extravagant payment?—It is so where relief is in question.

900. Take for example, the case of medical relief on which I touched yesterday, as I was not aware then that your subjects were being taken in sections. What is the control over the very extensive powers of the guardians to send persons for curative treatment; would that power enable them to send a man out of England for treatment?—No, I think not.

901. I can understand that in most cases it would be clearly unreasonable; but let me put a concrete instance which is, at the same time, an actual instance. Guardians have under their charge a leper for whom they can find no accommodation in England, but may possibly find accommodation abroad; would their powers be sufficiently extensive to deal with a case of that sort?—No.

902. Behind the auditor comes the central authority as a check on extravagant expenditure?—Yes.

903. I think it may be realised that in dealing with a popularly elected body on a democratic franchise, the powers of the central authority are not so easy in practice as they may be on paper and in law?—Of course there are difficulties.

904. It is a fact, I think, that for the last half century or so, the original scheme of the Commissioners for keeping the central authority clear of politics, has been abandoned?—Since 1847, there has been a political head of the Local Government Board.

905. I suggest that the good sense of the guardians and their responsibility to their constituents, as matters stand now, should be securities for the proper expenditure of the money entrusted to them?—Quite so.

906. I think in the course of your evidence you have said that the question of medical relief has grown up rather by practice than by Statute?—That was the view of the Poor Law Commissioners.

907. You have mentioned to us the case of persons being sent to Bath and Buxton in the old days; that is an old illustration, is it not?—It is an old illustration of non-resident relief.

908. Now, with regard to the attendance on the sick poor; the ordinary course is by an order given by the relieving officer, is it not?—Yes.

909. But there are provisions, I think, for attendance without an order?—There are cases of permanently disabled paupers who are put on a permanent list; and the exhibition to the district medical officer of a ticket entitles them to his attendance.

Payment of Medical Officers.

910. The payment of medical officers under the present system, I think, is by a fixed salary supplemented by fees for certain surgical operations?—That is so.

911. The Commissioners, I believe, at one time favoured payment by salary on the permanent list of sick, with additional payments for extra cases; was that power given to the guardians by order?—I do not remember that the particular arrangement actually commended itself to the Commissioners, but it has been proposed from time to time.

912. I was under the impression there was something of that sort, and that the ground was that it would encourage independent poor to provide for themselves through sick clubs and friendly societies?—I think also that payment by a fee for each case has been proposed, in order to facilitate the recovery of relief by way of loan.

Recovery of loan relief.

913. How would relief by loan be recovered; would it be in the County Court?—Either in the County Court or, in certain cases, before the justices.

Medical relief by ordinary practitioner.

914. In addition to the cases on the permanent sick list, I think under an Act of 1828, some boards of guardians have made arrangements for attendance on a sick person, and in certain cases of emergency by any medical practitioner; I do not know whether you are acquainted with those?—They have that power under Sec. 2 of 11 and 12 Vic., c. 110.

915. Would that be available in midwifery cases, if the guardians chose to put it in force?—It is hardly intended to meet cases of that description. The Act was really devised to meet cases analogous to those of persons who, in the old law, were called the casual poor, that is, where accident befell a man away from home and he needed assistance.

916. Do you think it would be straining the original application of the Act?—I think so. The original intention certainly was not to meet such cases,—that is, as a matter of ordinary procedure.

Metropolitan dispensaries.

917. In the Metropolis there is an elaborate system of dispensaries under the Acts of 1867 and 1869, I think?—That is so.

918. Is there any equivalent provision in the provinces?—None.

919. In the Metropolis, in fact, the provision for medical relief is rather more extensive than it is in the provinces?—I think so.

Varying of appointments of officers.

920. Is there not a section for varying the appointments of officers in one of the old Metropolitan Acts where it is desirable for the purposes of classification or for certain improvements of administration?—Yes.

921. Is there anything equivalent to that in the provinces?—No. It may be pointed out that Section 41 of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876, extended the power to "the contract with or appointment of any officer appointed by a board of guardians."

922. And that does not apply to the provinces, then?—No, that only applies to the Metropolis.

923. May I take it that there has been no extension of that to the provinces?—On changes of area there might be a provision for compensation to officers whose emoluments would be affected by the changes. That is in force in the provinces.

924. Since the date of that Statute the superannuation Act has been passed, has it not?—Yes; but there was a Superannuation Act in force before that date.

925. But not of the same character?—No.

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

16 Jan. 1906.

926. Under the Superannuation Act is there any limitation as to compensation?—Two-thirds is the actual limit in the case of superannuation.

Limits of Superannuation allowance.

927. But in the event of the termination of an office is there any limitation?—It would be under the provisions of other Statutes that the question of compensation would arise—especially under the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1867.

Effect of Superannuation Act.

928. I suggest that it may occasionally happen that a change in the appointment of an officer may be desirable, but that officer may have contributed for a number of years to a superannuation fund which would render the change more difficult?—Section 8 of the Poor Law Officers' Superannuation Act 1896 is intended to provide for that case; whether it does actually provide for it satisfactorily in all instances I am not prepared to say, but it is intended to meet that case.

929. With regard to the question of the payment of medical officers, I should have asked you whether the orders were ever suspended as to fees?—Yes.

Paupers in non-poor law hospitals.

930. In the Metropolis I think the guardians can contract with the hospitals for reception of patients?—Yes.

931. Is there any equivalent provision in the provinces?—The power to subscribe extends to the provinces, and they would get presumably something for their subscription in the way of the reception of the paupers.

Subscriptions to hospitals.

932. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Is that power the power of subscription to infectious hospitals or to non-infectious hospitals?—To all hospitals.

Relief in cases of delirium tremens.

933. (Dr. Downes.) Take the case of relief given to persons suffering from delirium tremens; are you aware of any case in the courts where it has been endeavoured to bring them within the Vagrancy Act?—There is a case on the notes; I mentioned one and that is the only case I know.

934. I think the case failed, did it not?—Yes.

935. (Chairman.) May I ask what was the object of the case—was it to reimburse the guardians?—That was the object in another case, namely, the Guardians of the West Ham Union v. Pearson (62 Law Times, New Series, 638). There the object was attained, for it was held that at common law the Guardians could recover the expenses incurred.

Liability of Relieving Officer for neglect.

936. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) I should like to ask a question on the liability of the officers. Supposing an applicant for relief suffered through the neglect of a relieving officer to report his case or to attend to it, would the relieving officer be liable, and could the applicant sue him for neglect?—The officer might be subject to indictment according to two decisions, namely, Clark v. Joslin (15 Cox, Criminal Cases, 746) and Queen v. Curtis (27 Law Times, New Series, 762). Those cases show that an indictment will lie against a relieving officer for negligence in relieving the poor.

Position of Guardians and Relieving Officer when pauper refuses indoor relief.

937. Supposing there was what is known as a starvation case which ensued because the pauper had refused indoor relief, and had been refused outdoor relief, would he have any cause of action against the guardians or the officials?—A question of that sort would depend so very much upon the actual facts that I do not think I could give a general answer.

938. So that the mere fact that indoor relief had been offered and refused would not necessarily exonerate the guardians?—I think not.

939. (Mr. Loch.) Why should it not be so under the law? It is an offer of relief and the person is destitute, is it not in the discretion of the guardians to offer what they think desirable?—Certainly they may make the offer, but the man must not starve because he does not accept the offer. If they have cognisance of a case of destitution it would be their duty or the duty of their officer to watch that case.

940. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) So that he would have a right not only to relief, but to relief of the kind he preferred?—I do not know that one could go quite so far as that. He would be entitled to some relief—to relief sufficient to keep him from starvation.

941. And he might practically choose whether it should be in the house or out?—In that sense he might.

942. (Mr. Loch.) Might I ask a similar question in regard to an old woman who was offered to be moved into an infirmary, and she says, "No, I won't go in"; are the guardians not quit of their responsibility in any sense when they have offered exactly what their medical officer advised and what is best for the woman?—I think they are not quit of their responsibility in any sense—that is, of their whole responsibility.

943. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) These cases arise pretty often, and I was hearing of one only yesterday?—No doubt they do; and very difficult cases they are.

944. I understand that under the out-door relief orders it is illegal to give out-door relief to men who are in employment and who are earning wages?—If you are referring to the Out-Door Relief Regulation Order, yes.

Relief to women earning wages.

945. But it does not apply to women earning wages—I mean it is not illegal to give out-relief to women who are earning money?—I think it is illegal in certain circumstances.

946. I think according to the wording of the order it only applies to males?—It applies to the able-bodied.

947. The words are that relief is prohibited "to able-bodied males while in employment?—Yes, I see that in the case of the women also you are referring to a Poor Law Union in which the Out-Door Relief Regulation Order is in force.

948. So that in giving out-relief to women who are actually earning wages—as guardians do very largely—the guardians are within their rights, because, as I understand, it is legal?—Yes.

949. It could be made illegal, I suppose, by a change in the order?—Yes.

Relief to persons casually employed.

950. I believe that last winter there were men who were alternating between working for the borough council and receiving relief from the guardians, that is, they were earning wages from the council, say, on two days in the week, and then going to the guardians for relief; would that be legal?—It would depend upon their position at the time when they made the application. Presumably they had exhausted their resources when they made their application to the guardians, or professed that they had.

951. So that the occasional employment would not disqualify them for relief?—I think not in certain circumstances.

Relief in sudden or urgent necessity.

952. Is there any provision to prevent emergency relief being continually given to the same people?—That is to say, is there any provision which puts a limit on the time during which relief in a case of sudden or urgent necessity may be given?

953. If it is given say one week, can it be given again the next week, and so on?—It should not be given without special investigation of the circumstances of the case so as to establish the recurrence of the necessity.

954. Practically, I believe that is done very largely; it is repeatedly given and there appears to be nothing to prohibit it if the guardians choose to do it?—I have heard of it as a bad practice.

Duty of Relieving Officer in cases of sudden or urgent necessity.

955. (Mr. Nunn.) When I asked yesterday on the same point about the discharge by the relieving officer of his responsibility in regard to a case that had been rejected for out-door relief, but had had the House offered, I understood you to say that the relieving officer would deal with any further application on the part of the applicant as one of sudden or urgent necessity, and that when he had relieved it to the extent the sudden or urgent necessity demanded he would have discharged his responsibility; but I see in the notes in reply to Q. 761 you say "That should be so ordinarily." A very important point, I think, in connection with the administration of out-door relief is to what extent the relieving officer has discharged his responsibility when he has dealt with a case in that manner. Supposing he gives enough to satisfy the immediate wants of an applicant, can he legally await a further application from the applicant or must he watch the case?—He should watch the case.

956. Might I ask exactly what watching the case means in those circumstances; because it seems laying a very heavy responsibility upon the relieving officer and one which one is hardly justified in laying upon him?—The relieving officer with his local knowledge should, by visits and inquiries, ascertain the condition of the case from day to day.

957. (Mr. Loch.) Do the orders give definite instructions to the relieving officer to watch a case from day to day where the man has been offered one thing and asks for another ?—It is not laid down in those words, but it has been an official rule for a great many years.

958. It occurs in no order of the Board, does it ?—It hardly could.

959. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) Is the officer to go and give this relief in a case of urgent necessity ?—So long as the urgent necessity continues or recurs it would be his duty, subject to the exercise of his discretion, to give the relief.

960. In taking the case Mr. Loch mentioned just now of a woman refusing to go into an infirmary, she goes on being ill, that is, she is steadily ill ; is she to be watched and to be relieved, day by day, when she goes on refusing the infirmary ?—In such a case I should think she should be.

961. (Mr. Nunn.) May I ask if a relieving officer has ever been charged with manslaughter when a case such as we have been describing has died ?—I do not think that either of the cases which have been before the court involved precisely the same set of circumstances.

962. But a relieving officer has been charged with manslaughter, I believe ?—Yes.

963. In the case of someone whom he has failed to relieve in that manner, and who has died ?—I think it was in the case of the Queen v. Curtis that a death occurred. That was the case where the relieving officer declined to act upon an application because it was not that of the head of the family.

964. Do you regard the state of the law from that point with regard to the relieving officer's watching a family as unsatisfactory ?—In the sense, do you mean, that it is not sufficiently defined ?

965. In the sense that it does not enable the guardians to carry out their decision. The guardians, say, have arrived at a certain decision upon a case as to what is the best form of relief that a man should receive, but their decision is upset by the applicant who practically, in the case we have been describing, decides for himself ? —Then the relieving officer's responsibility comes in, because the case becomes presumably one of sudden or urgent necessity. You would, as I understand, require a stricter definition of what the duty of the relieving officer should be under the circumstances ?

966. I think it is only fair to him that it should be more strictly defined. ?—That of course could be done by regulation, but up to the present time I do not think that the necessity for it has been shown to arise.

967. Has there been no case where a person who refused indoor relief and applied for outdoor relief, and was relieved only as a case of sudden and urgent necessity, has afterwards died, having failed to make a second application ?—Not that I am aware of. I have certainly no note of any leading case.

968. (Mr. Loch.) Is the relieving officer responsible if a case is simply notified to him as being in want, and no application is made to him ?—I do not understand the question.

969. It may be notified to the relieving officer that Mr. or Mrs. So-and-So is in want ; is he bound to make an inquiry if it is said to be a case of urgent necessity, or, so far as the law and the orders are concerned, is he in a position to wait until they make their application ?—The answer would depend upon the sense in which you use the word "want."

970. I mean such want as would come under the Poor Law destitution ?—If by want you mean actual destitution, then, assuming that in his discretion he judged the notification to be one founded on a basis of fact, it would be his duty to look after that case. He has not to wait for an application from the head of the family. Any application that appears to him to be well authenticated and well founded should be considered, and followed by his inquiry into the case.

971. Would that be irrespective of any application being made to him ?—The notification would be the application, I take it.

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

16 Jan. 1906.

972. Notification by a third party ?—Yes, a third party's notification would be equivalent to an application for those purposes.

Definition of "destitution"

973. I want to ask you one or two questions about the definitions that come in the Act of Queen Elizabeth. I understand that the obligation of relief at the present time may be defined thus—that the guardians and their officers are concerned only with the relief of destitution ; now, how do you define destitution from the legal point of view ?—I suggest the following definition :—Destitution when used to describe the condition of a person as a subject for relief, implies that he is for the time being without material resources (i) directly available and (ii) appropriate for satisfying his physical needs, (a) whether actually existing or (b) likely to arise immediately. By physical needs in this definition are meant such needs as must be satisfied (i) in order to maintain life or (i) in order to obviate, mitigate, or remove causes endangering life or likely to endanger life or impair health or bodily fitness for self-support.

974. If you were asked what was the legal basis of that, to what Acts or Orders would you refer ?—I should refer to the 43rd of Elizabeth, and I should refer to the various pronouncements of the Central Authority, to various judicial decisions, and especially to the case which was under review the other day (The Attorney-General v. Merthyr Tydvil Guardians).

Present validity of Act of 1601.

975. Do you hold that the Act of Queen Elizabeth is in practice and intent valid at the present moment in regard to its definitions ?—So far as regards relief, I apprehend that we are to understand the Statute of Elizabeth according to the interpretation put upon it by the Master of the Rolls in that last case.

976. Suppose we take the Act of Elizabeth ; the first point is, "Setting to work the children ;" is that not practically out of date ?—That is not a definition.

977. Nay, I work up to that ; is that not out of date, practically ?—It is out of date in one sense, no doubt.

978. Is it of any practical validity in law ?—I hardly like to say that it is obsolete after the opinion of the law officers to which I have already drawn attention.

979. That is a point rather exceptional, is it not ?—Generally speaking one would say it was not of any special validity at present ?—I should have thought not.

980. The next point would be to employ people with a convenient stock to set the poor on work ; do you consider that is valid now, bearing in mind the conditions under which the modern organisation of the Poor Law has developed ?—There again, I must refer to the opinion of the law officers.

981. Would you say that that, for the moment, covers the ground ?—It is the opinion of a high authority, of course.

Relief by wages.

982. Apart from the Orders, is there anything to prevent persons working for a wage, we will say under these words, "Setting the poor on work" ?—According to the earlier cases there was nothing to prevent it.

983. It is only the Out-door Relief Regulation Order and its clauses as to employment, and the appended Order—the Prohibitory Relief Order—which prevents wages being given for work ?—And the practice of modern administration.

984. Putting aside practice and taking it simply as the law, it would be so, would it not ?—I think so.

985. Therefore so far as the Statute law goes you might have wages given for work ?—Certainly,—under the 43rd Elizabeth—that would be my contention.

Meaning of "impotent."

986. Then there is the relief of "the lame, impotent, old, blind, and such other among them being poor and not able to work ;" that "necessary relief" is really equivalent to what you may call relief to meet destitution, is it not, that is to say, that relief is necessary which removes destitution ?—Yes.

987. So that in that phrase one has something like a definition of destitution?—But, then, if one is considering only the Statute of Elizabeth, and the actual decisions on the Statute of Elizabeth, there are those cases to which

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

16 Jan. 1906.

I drew attention the other day in which the word "impotent" is enlarged to a degree that would hardly be limited to actual destitution in the sense as we now understand it. There was the case of a man with more than two children.

988. But those cases are, by modern interpretation of the trend of this clause, out of date and obsolete, are they not?—I am afraid I do not follow that question.

989. By the modern decisions, the later decisions, the cases to which you refer, and which give a very large meaning to the word "impotent" are practically obsolete, are they not?—I should hesitate to say that.

990. Would you actually hold that those cases which you submitted in your evidence on the first day might even be valid at the present moment, giving as they do to the word "impotent" a meaning by which a man with two children unable to work would come under the term "impotent"?—I know of no statutory alteration of the expression which would absolutely get rid of the effect of those cases.

Change in position of Churchwardens and Overseers.

991. That is a very important point. Perhaps I might ask you just one more question about the Act of Queen Elizabeth. With regard to the churchwardens and overseers, may we say that the whole position of the churchwardens and the overseers has been altered by recent legislation?—Yes. The overseer nowadays is in very many instances not at all the overseer of the Statute of Elizabeth.

992. So that it would not take much to repeal that part of the Statute of Elizabeth without much injury being done to our modern organisation for the overseers?—I drew attention to the Statute, because I thought it was one that possibly might need some very considerable review.

993. It was that point which I had before me. With regard to rating questions, too, it is superseded very largely by later legislation, is it not?—Rating is outside my province, I think.

Scope of Orders as to outdoor relief of able-bodied.

994. With regard to the Act of 1834, you mentioned two sections under which orders are made, I think?—Yes. If you are on the subject of outdoor relief, Section 52 is that which relates to relief of that kind.

995. Would it be consistent with that section for the Board to alter their present policy and propose an order by which able-bodied men should be capable of receiving outdoor relief?—Hardly, I think, without qualification.

996. Is there anything in the law to prevent such an order?—The Out-Door Relief Prohibitory Order allows an able-bodied man to have outdoor relief on account of sudden and urgent necessity. I do not think there is anything in the statute to prevent that.

997. But is there anything in the statute to prevent their accepting any principle with regard to the able-bodied?—I am afraid I do not follow that.

998. Is there anything in this section which binds the Local Government Board to adopt a certain policy with regard to the able-bodied?—There is the intention of the section.

999. I know there is the intention of the section, but is the intention valid so as to oblige orders to be always in accordance with that intention?—I should say in the case of a Public Department, with an enactment such as Section 52 before them, they would have to obtain fresh legislation before they could go entirely counter to what they gather from the section to be the intention.

1000. Apart from the intention the words are not laid down that such and such a policy should be adopted with regard to the able-bodied, are they?—By intention, I do not understand you necessarily to mean the intention as described by the Poor Law Commissioners, namely, that Parliament intended that the whole of the relief to the able-bodied should cease within a certain period.

1001. By intention I would refer you to this preamble—"And whereas a practice has obtained of giving relief to persons or their families who at the time of applying for or receiving such relief were wholly or partially in the employment of individuals and the relief of the able-bodied and their families is in many places administered in modes productive of evil in other respects; and whereas difficulty may arise in case any immediate and universal remedy is attempted," etc. Does that preamble not actually hold the whole question of the authority as to able-bodied relief?—I think that the preamble is entitled to much weight in the interpretation of the Section.

1002. Therefore, what lies outside those words is of no validity except so far as it is built upon the presumption that the policy of that phrase is in-door relief of the able-bodied?—I am afraid that is going rather too far; I could not go so far as that.

1003. Practically it is rather the suggestion of a possible policy that is at the basis of this, but I think there are no binding words to say that these orders shall be in a certain form?—That is so.

1004. Therefore it would be possible, would it not, if there were a belief that the intention here might be carried out in some different form, to substitute for our present order another type of order?—Yes.

Subscriptions by Guardians to Institutions.

1005. With regard to hospitals and alms-houses, you have noted that originally by the Act of Queen Elizabeth money could be given towards hospitals and alms-houses, and I should like to ask a question or two about the relation of the Poor Law to charities. The guardians can subscribe to institutions now, can they not?—Yes.

1006. Is that in the nature of an annual subscription?—Yes.

1007. If they believe that the institution is of service to them?—Yes.

1008. With regard to other payments they are payments on the case, are they not? That is to say, in cases of non-resident relief people are placed in certain institutions and paid for by the guardians?—They may be so.

Power of Guardians to act as agents for dispensing private charity.

1009. Apart from those two things, is it open to a board of guardians to receive money for the relief of a case from a charitable source; for instance, could I send 10s. to a Board of Guardians to help to pay for the assistance or the out-relief of so and so?—Earmarking the money so that it should be applied to that particular purpose?

1010. Certainly?—No, I think not. You would be using them as your agent for dispensing your own private charity, and I do not think that is any part of their function.

1011. They have already given a pension, we will say, or a sum as out-door relief to somebody, and I propose to send this money to the guardians in order that they may give it in addition?—I do not think it could be applied to the particular purpose. The money would have to go into the Common Fund.

1012. Is the relief money kept separate?—The money would be applied towards the expenses which are chargeable on the Common Fund.

Applicants for relief in possession of funds.

1013. Take another case: Suppose the relieving officer finds on his enquiry that the poor person is in receipt of money from charitable sources; is that reported to the board of guardians, and, if so, is it taken into account in the amount they give?—That is a matter of administration. I hardly like to go into what they actually do.

1014. Would the guardians be legally justified in taking it into account if the case arose?—Certainly.

1015. Supposing a case arose in regard to a woman, say, could they plead that to their knowledge certain moneys were coming to her from a charitable source?—Yes.

Guardians, power to receive gifts.

1016. (Mr. Nunn.) It was quite clear I think from what you said that it is legal for the guardians to accept money although they could not earmark it to a particular case?—I think it is legal.

1017. They would receive it in respect of a case, although they would not actually apply it to that case?—I think they would be open to receive subscriptions from any source.

Co-operation with charities.

1018. (Mr. Loch.) Would it be open to a Board of Guardians co-operating with an endowed charity to try and arrange that an applicant who comes to them for out-door relief might instead be dealt with by the charity?—I should think so; I know nothing to prevent it.

Auditor's report as to extravagant expenditure.

1019. With regard to the audit, I will just ask you one or two questions. Is the auditor in a position to report if he thinks that quite unnecessarily expensive furniture, for instance, is being provided by a board of guardians?—Yes.

1020. That would be within his functions?—Prima facie he may give a decision on the reasonableness of the expenditure.

1021. Do the instructions to the auditor refer to a point like that?—It would be under the statutory provisions describing his functions.

1022. Definitely?—"Furniture" is not mentioned, of course. The words are general words.

Auditor's statutory duties and powers.

1023. I meant is there any instructional order which would bring him to consider special points like that?—I think I had better refer to the statute, because the statute makes it clear what he has to do. He "shall have full powers to examine, audit, allow or disallow of accounts and of items therein relating to moneys assessed for and applicable to the relief of the poor of all parishes and unions within his district, and to all other moneys applicable to such relief; and such auditor shall charge in every account audited by him the amount of any deficiency or loss incurred by the negligence or misconduct of any person accounting or of any sum for which any such person is accountable, but not brought by him into account against such person and shall certify on the face of every account audited by him any money found by him to be due from any person."

1024. Of course that is very general. With regard to another point, are the data in regard to the cases submitted to the auditor; that is, does he see, for instance, the application and report book?—Yes.

1025. Suppose he sees on the face of the document that the inquiry is very insufficient, is he in a position to notify that to headquarters in order that the guardians may be surcharged relief which they have given without sufficient investigation?—Of course the facts might point either to the guardians or to the relieving officer as liable.

1026. Taking both cases, would he be in a position to notify it?—He might be in a position to surcharge or disallow.

1027. On the basis that the inquiry was insufficient?—Yes; but it would be a difficult case to investigate and also to support.

Local Government Board's powers of investigation.

1028. Granted; but the control which the Local Government Board has over the investigation and the work of the guardians from that point of view is only general; that is to say, the inspectors would define so-and-so, but when it comes to a particular case in which there is, so to speak, a wrong doing, if the auditor does not intervene nobody intervenes?—A case might be so bad that a formal investigation could be ordered.

1029. That would be a very bad case notified in some way specially to the board?—Yes.

1030. Suppose the whole tenor of the work of the board was below the standard of efficiency, still from the point of view of investigation it might pass muster, and the auditor would never in such a case say, "Here are twenty or thirty cases all of which have obviously been uninvestigated, and therefore the relief is not properly given?—If the auditor were of opinion that the relief was not properly given, it would be open to him to take action under the statute.

1031. The statute which you quoted?—Yes.

Auditor's functions.

1032. (Mr. Nunn.) Is it not the auditor's business to allow or disallow a sum upon a question of fact that an applicant is or is not destitute; and is it not the inpector's business to ascertain whether the Board of Guardians is conducting its inquiries in such a way as would lead to the ascertainment of the facts?—The auditor must make allowance for the exercise of a reasonable discretion either by the guardians or by the relieving officer, according as the case is one relieved by the order of the guardians or one relieved by the relieving officer on his own discretion.

1033. My point was that the auditor had not to do with the functions of the relieving officer, but with the actual facts which the relieving officer's inquiries disclosed. If he had not the facts at his hand could he make an allowance or disallowance?—He has to deal with the functions of the relieving officer to this extent—that he would have to judge in a particular case whether those functions had been properly exercised or whether there was negligence or misconduct.

1034. Could he do that except on a matter of fact which had come under his notice?—No; of course fact must be the basis of his action.

1035. That is my point,—that he must arrive at a fact with regard to the destitution of the applicant?—Yes, he must.

Ratepayer's objections to expenditure.

1036. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Has not any ratepayer the power to object?—A ratepayer can object at the audit, but then presumably what the ratepayer says would come into the domain of fact.

Notice of Audit.

1037. (Mr. Loch.) Is there a public notice of the audit?—Certainly.

1038. So that the ratepayer who thinks the inquiry insufficient with regard to these cases may attend?—Certainly.

Local Government Board's power to sanction expenses.

1039. Further, on the point of the audit the Local Government Board has a large power to pass over otherwise unauthorised expenditure, has it not, under a Special Act?—Yes.

1040. That Act, as is well known, was referred to in a circular of Mr. Long's with regard to the unemployed, it being there used, as it were, prospectively, that is to say, the guardians were there told that if they incurred certain expenditure it would be passed over by reason of that Act. Was that, if I may say so, a legitimate use of that Act?—It is an example of its contemplated use in exceptional cases, of which there are a fair number of instances.

1041. I have not the Act before me, but I know it. The tenor of the Act is rather retrospective than prospective, is it not?—Not necessarily.

1042. Then may it come to this, that the Local Government Board has a dispensing power in regard to a policy by which it may say to the guardians: If you spend money in this direction we will not take it into account though it would otherwise be illegal?—The extent of the power of the Local Government Board is limited to the saving of the particular item of expenditure from disallowance by the auditor; but it does not convert into legal that which is in itself illegal.

1043. But the saving is the important point, and by the use of that Act large and important expenditures were saved, as it were?—Yes, under the Local Authorities (Expenses) Act 1887 expenditure subject to disallowance is not infrequently exempted.

1044. So far as that went there was a distinct power of dispensation and that was used prospectively?—It has been used prospectively, certainly.

Power to place Relieving Officers at disposal of other bodies.

1045. What limitations are there upon the board to place their relieving officers at the disposal of other bodies, for instance, in making enquiries, we will say, for Borough Council Distress Committees, or any other bodies?—Is not this relating to unemployment?

1046. Nay, I wanted to put it as a thoroughly general question, whether or not the relieving officer could be placed at the disposal of other bodies?—The point is hardly general. The point is special, because the cases in which the services of the relieving officer might be placed at the disposal of a Distress Committee are cases which arise under the special provision in Article XX. of the Regulations (Organisation for Unemployed) 1905.

1047. I am thinking of a period before the Act came into existence. One winter prior to the Act the proposal was made, and what I wanted to know was whether there was any precedent for the relieving officers being employed on duties other than lying strictly within the compass of a Board of Guardians?—No; except under statutory provisions, such as, for example, the Lunacy Acts.

Officers' securities.

1048. Referring now to your answer to Question 94, is there a scale of security as to officers?—No.

1049. Who fixes the securities?—The guardians.

1050. And that as they think well?—Yes.

1051. Is it usual for every relieving officer to give security?—I should think so.

Qualifications and tenure of Relieving Officers.

1052. With regard to the qualifications of a relieving officer, is there any order or instruction or anything of that kind showing what the qualifications of a relieving officer should be?—There are only the orders which define qualifications and duties. There are, for example, Articles 162, 164 and 215 of the General Consolidated Order.

1053. Is there nothing beyond that?—Nothing.

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

16 Jan. 1906.

1054. Not any sort of instruction?—I do not know what may have been said in circulars from time to time. I could not trust my memory on that.

1055. So far as the orders go there is no statement that the relieving officer should be competent to fulfil this or that position and should bring certain evidence that he is competent to do that, before he is entitled to appear before a board of guardians to be elected relieving officer?—Not in so many words, certainly.

1056. The order itself only defines what a relieving officer should be by stating what his duties ought to be?—No doubt.

1057. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) What is his tenure?—Under the General Consolidated Order, his tenure would be until he dies or resigns or is removed from office.

1058. (Mr. Nunn.) Do you mean removed by the Local Government Board?—Yes.

Constructive pauperism: Effect of Relief to (School Children) Order, 1905.

1059. (Mr. Loch.) At Question 101 you refer to the Poor Law Amendment Act of 1834, by Section 56 of which it is enacted that all relief given to or on account of the wife or to or on account of any child or children under the age of sixteen not being blind or deaf and dumb shall be considered as given to the husband or to the father as the case may be. That is what we might call constructive pauperism. But in the Relief to Children Order, 1905, Article 6, it is said that the guardians "shall take proceedings for the recovery of any relief or the cost price of any relief which by virtue of any provision of this order or any determination in pursuance of this order is given or is considered as given by way of a loan except in any case in which the guardians report the circumstances to us and we approve of their abstaining from any such proceedings." In that case the Local Government Board take the position of dispensing practically with the effect of Section 56 of the Act of 1834, at least, so I conclude?—I do not think so. The relief there is given to the children.

1060. True, and the man has to pay for it by a loan?—Yes.

1061. He is responsible for that relief?—Possibly.

1062. And by the fact that a loan is required he is able to pay for it?—Primâ facie—quite so.

1063. Under those circumstances, however, the loan is not pressed?—That is so.

1064. Therefore he gets rid of his responsibility of paying for his children?—Undoubtedly.

1065. It stands therefore as a dispensing power?—Dispensing with the statute, do you mean?

1066. Dispensing with the responsibility of the parent for the relief given to his child?—That is a question of policy, not of law. I do not follow that.

1067. Does not that clause act as a limitation of the law?—It acts as a limitation of the operation of Section 56 and those other sections, but within strictly legal limits.

1068. What are the legal limits then if the law by itself as set down in that section is not absolute and complete?—This is a case of relief given to children; certain consequences attach to relief given to children under that order, and this is one of the consequences which the Board acting fully within their powers prescribe. It is within the legal limits of definition.

1069. Then, so far, the Board claims the position of modifying the statute, does it not?—That is policy; but it is not modifying the statute.

1070. Is it not modifying the normal effect of the statute?—I do not think so.

Relief to children of strikers.

1071. I suppose that in the case of the Merthyr Tydvil strikers it was held that the relief was suspended in the case of the children?—The relief to the children was upheld as good.

1072. That comes under the same clause, I take it, as this Act of 1834, that is to say, the parents were responsible otherwise for the relief of the children?—Yes.

1073. Is it now possible for strikers to throw the relief of their children on the rates even though they themselves cannot be helped by the rates?—Certainly. It was held so in the Merthyr Tydvil case.

1074. I only want to bring out it quite clearly?—That is so 1075. Therefore that Merthyr Tydvil case is clearly a departure from Section 56?—I do not think so. I am afraid I do not follow you at all.

1076. By this Act all relief given to the children is given to the head of the family; by the Merthyr Tydvil decision the relief given to the able-bodied head of the family was considered wrong, but relief given to the children of the able-bodied was considered right?—Quite so.

1077. It does not at all appear that the whole family went into the poorhouse?—No.

1078. Therefore the able-bodied law so far breaks down because the family does not go into the workhouse, and on a strike arising the children are taken care of, though the head of the family does not bear the brunt of it?—Yes.

1079. That seems to me at any rate against the tenor of that section?—I think not. That section was introduced for one special purpose. It was introduced in order to make the parent removable with his family and for that purpose to establish a constructive chargeability.

1080. Has that section to be considered only in relation to chargeability?—It has to be considered in relation to chargeability, and so considered it has a very wide scope.

1081. Has it not to be considered as a principle of the English Poor Law, that is to say, that all relief given to a child is given to the father?—It involves the constructive chargeability of the father, certainly.

Relief on loan

1082. (Mr. Booth.) May I ask a question as regards relief on loan: where it is done is it necessary that the person so relieved should accept the liability?—Under this particular order,—the Relief (School Children) Order, 1905—no express acceptance in the form of an engagement to repay is required; but there is a provision that the father should receive notice of what is intended in order that he may be in a position to repudiate the whole transaction by himself making the provision which otherwise the guardians would make.

1083. (Mr. Nunn.) In the case of a man suffering from delirium tremens it is quite impossible that he could make any other arrangements?—I cannot myself consider that any case of relief by way of loan could be established there. He might have a lucid interval—I do not know.

1084. (Mr. Loch.) Why should not the relief given under such circumstances be considered as operative after the man's inability to say anything, and from that moment be considered as relief given on loan because of his physical disqualification before the moment?—There are no orders authorising relief to be declared on loan in cases of that type, and it may perhaps be argued that matters may very well be left to the operation of the law as explained in the Guardians of West Ham Union v. Pearson (62 Law Times, New Series, 638.) Before relief can be treated as relief on loan under Section 58 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, it must be declared by a regulation of the Local Government Board to be relief on loan.

1085. The point is an important one, and it is not provided for is it?—I do not think it is provided for practically.

Recovery of loan relief.

1086. With regard to the recovery of these loans they are now civil debts, are they not?—There is a double mode of recovery—an application to the justices or a proceeding in the County Court.

1087. Would it not be better if the procedure under the Bastardy Act were adopted; is that not very much more quick and effective?—I do not know that either procedure is quite up to the most recent date.

1088. Then it would be open to improvement as a matter of procedure if loans are given largely?—I should think so.

1089. Have you any suggestions to make on that subject?—No.

1090. (Mr. Bentham.) Just now you said that recovery of amounts on loan might be brought before the justices; is that so under the Relief (School Children) Order?—Yes.

1091. I thought it was only the County Court you could go to in that case?—No—either.

1092. (Mr. Loch.) The phrase in the instruction under that Order is this: "Recovery of relief given on loan: relief given to a child in pursuance of special application will be relief to the father under Section 8 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1848. The relief for a child or the cost price of it can be recovered from the father in the County Court" ?—Yes, "can be," but it does not exclude the other mode of procedure, although that other mode of procedure, I should think, would be very rarely adopted.

1093. With regard to your answer to Question 145, which deals with the areas of fifty acres and so on, that I understand is operative law at the present time ?—That is so according to the opinion of the law officers to which I have previously referred.

1094. Is that not somewhat inconsistent with the policy of the Commissioners of 1834, and therefore more or less with that section of 4 & 5 Will. IV. which we have been discussing ?—It is not contrary to any provision that we have been discussing. It is contrary to the policy of the Poor Law Commissioners undoubtedly.

1095. Therefore Section 52 of 4 & 5 Will. IV. would at any rate not exclude that policy, and you could have a system of farms exactly like that which preceded the Act of 1834 ?—I am afraid I do not know what that system was.

1096. There is a reference made here to two farms in Kent, of which we have full particulars later on ?—The farm in Kent was a farm established by private individuals.

1097. There were others in the Isle of Wight, indeed there were several large farms. That policy was given up after 1834. Does not this decision really amount to a reversion to the older policy before 1834 ?—I think that if a policy was inaugurated on the lines of the opinion of the law officers, undoubtedly it would involve the reversal of a great deal of procedure.

rvices ndered by eBoard of uardians to other.

1098. Can you say how far one board of guardians may act as an agent for another board; for instance, is a board of guardians obliged to make an enquiry with regard to an applicant for another board ?—It is not obliged to do so.

1099. Is there any order about it ?—No.

1100. Therefore there is no instructional order or any other order by which a saving of time is made by a piece of business which has to be done in Liverpool about a case belonging to London being saved to the London Board and being entrusted to the Liverpool Board ?—No.

1101. There is no order in regard to making enquiries through boards of guardians about persons resident in other districts, is there ?—There is no order that I am aware of.

1102. And no instruction ?—I cannot say as to that, as instructions have been so numerous.

1103. (Mr. Bentham.) Is not the case of children who are out in service in another union a case in point ?—That is statutory, not under an order.

1104. But it is obligatory ?—Yes, but it is by statute.

1105. The guardians of one union are obliged to look after the paupers of another ?—If they are within that union.

1106. (Mr. Loch.) May we say that where it has been desired it has been specially required, but generally it is left entirely vague as to the mutual help of board and board ?—I think so.

1107. (Mr. Nunn.) The statutory provision relates to the relief and not to enquiries, does it not ?—I think the question had reference to the case where young persons placed out from a workhouse are within one union other than that from which they were sent into service. Under the 14 & 15 Vic., c. 11, and the 24 and 25 Vic., c. 100, the guardians of the union in which they are placed have a certain protective power over them.

1108. My point is that that is the administration of an actual decision of a board of guardians, and not anything in preparation for a decision which making enquiries would be ?—I do not know whether the Commission would wish me to read section 5 of 14 and 15 Vic., c.11: It is as follows: "Where any young person under the age of sixteen shall hereafter be hired or taken as a servant from the workhouse of any union or parish, or shall be bound out as apprentice by the guardians of any union or by the guardians or overseers of any parish, and the residence of the master or mistress shall be more than five miles from any part of such union or parish, then a written notice of such hiring, taking or binding specifyng the name and age of the apprentice or servant and the name and description and residence of such master or mistress shall be forthwith sent from such guardians or overseers to the guardians or overseers of the union or parish in which such master or mistress shall reside: and thereupon it shall become the duty of such last-mentioned guardians or overseers to cause the particulars contained in such notice to be registered in some book or books to be provided by them for the purpose, together with the name of the union or parish from which such notice shall have been received, and such last mentioned guardians or overseers shall cause such young person to be visited as frequently and in the same manner in all respects as if such young person had been hired or taken from their own workhouse or had been bound out as an apprentice by themselves."

Definition of "adequate relief."

1109. (Mr. Loch.) In a later circular headed "Poor Law Administration (Deserving Poor)," great stress is laid on "Adequate relief." Is "adequate relief" different from "necessary relief"? Necessary relief of course is defined to a certain extent at any rate by the Act of Queen Elizabeth and by your own statement now; but what is adequate relief from the point of view of the Poor Law ?—Adequate relief, I suggest, means such assistance from sources supplied by compulsory local taxation as may suffice to meet the requirements of any particular case of destitution. The assistance is subject to the condition that, as regards the necessaries of life, the recipient must not thereby be placed in a position of superiority to the average standard of living of the lowest class of independent labourers in the same locality. But in certain cases superiority to that standard is permissible as compensation for restrictions which are necessary incidents of collective management and discipline, and from which the independent labourer is free. That definition is collected from various pronouncements from time to time.

1110. Is there any status, so to speak, for a definition of "adequate relief" as against the definition of the law as to "necessary relief" ?—Only in pronouncements on the policy of administration. I think the expression "adequate relief" was once used in Sturges Bourne's Act (59 Geo. III., c. 12, s. 2), and the expression "proper relief" will be found in Gilbert's Act.

1111. Does it amount really to more than this—that the relief which is necessary has not been given, and that it should be enough under the existing law, and adequate therefore to the necessity ?—Adequate to the necessity, certainly.

1112. Therefore is it anything different from merely necessary relief ?—Perhaps not in that sense.

1113. (Mr. Booth.) Does not the question of time come in; might not "necessary" mean something shorter in the pressure of time than "adequate ?" The definition that you have given involves a considerable lapse of time I thought ?—It might extend over a considerable period.

1114. (Chairman.) Is "adequate" in any order of the Board ?—No.

1115. (Mr. Loch.) It is in a circular, is it not ?—Yes.

1116. And "necessary" occurs in the Act of Queen Elizabeth, in the phrase "the necessary relief of the lame, impotent," etc. ?—Yes. "Adequate" is also in a statute, but then that is a repealed statute.

1117. (Mr. Patten MacDougall.) May we take it that "adequate" is the term to be used from the point of view of the applicant for the relief and "necessary" is the term to be used from the point of view of the guardians who are giving the relief; I mention that because we have petitions for adequate relief ?—I think that is arguable at least.

Relief to members of Friendly Societies.

1118. (Mr. Loch.) I have one more point about Friendly Societies and the relief given by their members. Friendly Societies have certain rules to their benefit, have they not: that is to say a member of a Friendly Society if his wife becomes insane has not to pay for her keep ?—That is so.

1119. Therefore a principle has been adopted there, has it not, that in the case of thrifty people the obligation should not fall upon them which would fall upon an ordinary able-bodied person ?—It is open to that criticism no doubt.

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

16 Jan. 1906.

"Necessary relief" as affected by Outdoor Relief Friendly Societies Acts.

1120. With regard to the short Act of 1894 relating to members of Friendly Societies, it is there said: "Notwithstanding any orders or regulations of the Poor Law Commissioners (or of the Local Government Board) under and by virtue of the Poor Law Amendment Act 1834 or of any Act amending the said Act it shall be lawful for any board of guardians if they think fit to grant relief out of the poor rates to any person otherwise entitled to such relief notwithstanding the said person shall by reason of the membership of his Friendly Society be in receipt of any sum, and in estimating the amount of relief that shall be granted to such person being a member of a Friendly Society as aforesaid it shall be at the discretion of the board of guardians whether they will or will not take into consideration the amount which may be received by him from such Friendly Society." Does not that Act contemplate relief over and above what is necessary because by the law the guardians are bound to give necessary relief, and if this pension money of a member of a Friendly Society is not to be taken into account then it is in excess of the necessary relief?—It is open to that criticism of course.

1121. Is it not therefore contrary to the Act of Queen Elizabeth if the term "necessary relief" in that Act be construed strictly?—That is to say a statute passed in 1894 departs in particulars from the express limitations of the statute of Elizabeth. I think it would be open to that remark.

1122. In that case should not the Act of Queen Elizabeth be to that extent repealed?—I do not say that.

Local Government Board's Orders impugned in Law Courts.

1123. (Mr. Patten MacDougall.) I think you have told us that some of the orders of the Board under Sec. 15 have been questioned in the courts of law. Am I right in assuming that we have those cases on the notes, and that in none of those cases has any order been held to be invalid or ultra vires?—They are not on the notes because the orders were chiefly those of the Poor Law Commissioners and they had reference rather to the special circumstances of their day. In several instances, the orders were quashed on Certiorari, but they were experimental orders dealing with circumstances that do not arise at the present time. One or two were connected with attempts to force upon the Metropolitan parishes the general system of the constitution of a board of guardians, and those failed. The court held practically that the Commissioners must utilise the existing machinery for the purposes of relief.

1124. Is there any recent case then in which an order has been questioned and where it has been held to be ultra vires?—Yes, there is one recent case.

1125. Can you give us that?—I have given that in my answer to Question 50; that is the Willesden and Hendon case.

1126. In any of these cases has any question been raised as to the right to relieve the able-bodied? I mean does the question of the able-bodied come up in any shape or form?—In no case involving the validity of an order.

Able-bodied not entitled to relief in Scotland.

1127. I ask that question because the right to relieve the able-bodied with us in Scotland was the subject of litigation which ultimately went to the House of Lords, and it was in respect of a decision of the House of Lords, following upon the practice to a certain extent, that the right to relieve the able-bodied does not exist in Scotland?—Quite so.

Appeal when relief refused or inadequate.

1128. In your answer to Question 86 it is stated that "Sec. 15 concludes with a proviso that nothing in it shall be construed as enabling the Local Government Board to interfere in any individual case for the purpose of ordering relief." I understand from that that in England it is not possible for any applicant for relief who has been refused relief to appeal against such refusal?—That is so; he has no appeal to the Local Government Board.

1129. Nor is it possible for any applicant who has been offered only in-door relief to prefer to the Local Government Board a complaint of which is called inadequate relief?—He might make a complaint, but no action in the sense of a direction to any local body could ensue upon the complaint.

1130. As a matter of practice are there such complaints or appeals?—I really do not know to what extent the paupers write to complain of the amount or nature of their relief.

1131. There is no statutory provision for such appeals?—There is no statutory provision at all for them.

Relieving Officer's d on applica refusal of relief.

1132. You told Mr. Loch, I think, that as regards the duty of a relieving officer where an applicant refuses the relief offered,—that is to say, where the applicant refuses the particular kind of relief offered to him, he must provide sufficient sustenance for that applicant so as to prevent him from starving?—Quite so.

1133. That I imagine is a Common Law duty which lies upon him?—And it devolves upon him also by virtue of the particular provisions in the General Consolidated Order relating to his duties.

1134. Are there general instructions by the Board to all relieving officers that where an applicant refuses the relief offered, the relieving officer must take care that the applicant shall not starve?—That is the official description of the effect of the relieving officer's duties as defined by the General Consolidated Order.

Relieving Officer's tenure.

1135. But it is not in the order itself?—Not in so many words.

1136. The relieving officer is appointed by the board of guardians, is he not?—Yes.

1137. And his tenure is an ad vitam aut culpam tenure, and he cannot be dismissed except by the Local Government Board if he is unfit or incompetent, am I correct in assuming that?—That is essentially so as regards certain relieving officers, but I am not quite sure as to whether there is not a dispensing order as regards relieving officers appointed after a certain date.

1138. I mean by that that the board of guardians have no right of dismissal themselves?—That was so under the old regulations, but whether that has been slightly varied by an order of 1879 I could not say without referring to the order.

1139. (Miss Hill.) Is it not the fact that the assistant relieving officers may be dismissed by the board of guardians?—Yes.

1140. The chief relieving officers cannot, at any rate I think that is so in London?—I think it is very likely it is so, but I am not familiar with the later developments of those orders.

Relieving Officer's d towards non-settle poor.

1141. (Mr. Patten MacDougall.) I should like to ask you further as regards the duty of a relieving officer towards a pauper of another parish but residing in his. He has no duty towards that pauper, as I understand it, except in the cases to which you alluded in answer to Mr. Loch where you have servants or others out in service in a parish other than that to which they are chargeable?—Your question is rather a difficult one to answer, because there might be such urgency in the case of the non-resident or non-settled pauper as to require the relieving officer to act under the general provision defining his duty in cases of sudden or urgent necessity.

1142. In the case of boarded-out pauper children out of the parish to which they are chargeable, has the relieving officer of the parish in which they are resident and in which they are boarded-out no duty towards them—I am thinking of the duty of supervision?—It does not seem to me that the relieving officer would ordinarily come in there at all. It would be the Boarding-out Committee who would look after the child.

1143. (Mr. Bentham.) Touching that point, if a case of destitution is brought under the notice of the relieving officer and he knows the case is one belonging to another union, he is bound to act, is he not, as if it were a case belonging to his union?—I think so.

1144. (Mr. Patten MacDougall.) And then he must also look after paupers belonging to another parish who are receiving out-door relief, must he not, or has he no responsibilities as regards them?—Do you mean in cases where his Board of Guardians act as agent of another union for the administration of out-door relief—non-resident relief in fact?

1145. I am alluding to non-resident relief?—To that extent he would have that function.

1146. So that he would relieve the relieving officer of the parish to which they are chargeable of the duty of going to see whether the paupers in this parish where they are getting non-resident relief were being properly attended to?—If his Board of Guardians have undertaken the administration of non-resident relief to a particular pauper they would employ him in the matter.

pointment Relieving cer.

1147. (Miss Hill.) May I ask whether the appointment of a relieving officer requires the approval of the Local Government Board or not?—Technically the appointment does not, but the salary does, except in London, and there the appointment also requires approval in order to obtain repayment from the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund.

sponsi- ty for quacy of settled ef.

1148. (Mr. Nunn.) With regard to non-settled relief it is quite clear, is it not, that it is the Board of Guardians where the pauper resides, and not the Board of Guardians of origin which is responsible for the adequacy of the pauper's relief? Say a Board of Guardians writes to another Board of Guardians "Will you give 4s. a week to this case?" Then the Board of Guardians which actually dispenses the relief is responsible for seeing that it is adequate or not, and for applying if necessary to the Board of Guardians of origin for anything further; is that not so?—Only if, as regards the application to the latter board of guardians, you use the word responsible in the same way as you would if you were speaking of a voluntary agent.

1149. Are they not legally liable?—Their legal liability arises from the presence of the pauper actually in their union.

1150. (Mr. Bentham.) Are they responsible for the adequacy of the relief?—The condition of the pauper within their union is that which must first determine what the nature of their legal responsibility is. If they, by arrangement with another Board of Guardians say, "Here is—whatever the amount agreed upon may be—so much a week," and that is insufficient, I should imagine that in their voluntary capacity, they would apply for more.

1151. (Mr. Nunn.) Supposing the relief that is offered by the other Board of Guardians is inadequate, is it not their legal duty to recommend more?—It is not a legal duty.

1152. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) And they could not enforce that?—No. The position as regards non-resident relief is exceedingly awkward. A decision given a good many years ago has rather led to the view that non-resident relief, in order to put it absolutely on a strictly legal footing, would require special authorisation by orders that have never been issued, so that the arrangements as regards non-resident relief are, to a very considerable extent, voluntary arrangements, and not the subject of definition by order, and certainly not by Statute.

1153. (Mr. Nunn.) Their remedy would be to throw up the case altogether, would it not?—That would be the practical remedy so far as regards the relations of the two boards of guardians.

1154. (Mr. Bentham.) Might I give a case on this point? One union has a family requiring relief, and they grant a certain sum, which is 15s. per week, to relieve the family; the Board of Guardians to whom the case belongs refuses to pay 15s., and say they will only allow 11s., and the guardians who are dispensing the relief do not agree to 11s. per week and say it is not adequate?—Then the board of guardians who desire the 15s. a week in such a case as that would clearly have no remedy against the other board of guardians.

1155. They have no remedy, yet they are not responsible for the adequacy of the relief which is limited by the board to whom the paupers belong to 11s. per week?—I beg your pardon, but I understood you to say that they were allowing 15s. per week.

1156. One Board of Guardians were, but the Board of Guardians to whom the paupers belong refuse to pay that and limited it to 11s.?—Then the extra 4s. would fall upon the guardians who have made the allowance of 15s; clearly that would be so.

1157. They refuse to give the 15s. any longer and reduce the relief to 11s., and they are no longer responsible really for the adequacy of the relief of the family, are they?—I do not think that.

1158. You would not say that?—No, I would not go so far as to say that.

1159. The responsibility really might rest with the board that refuses to give the adequate amount?—I think where guardians have formed the opinion that paupers in their union require a weekly allowance of 15s., there is a responsibility attaching to them

1160. Even though they could not get it from the other union?—I think so.

1161. (Mr. Loch.) Is that anything more than a general conclusion; is it anywhere a written law or order?—Do you mean this non-resident relief that we are talking about?

1162. Yes?—It is in an old case to which I think there is a reference in the notes. The decision in the King v. the Inhabitants of Eastbourne (4 East 103) I think, discussed and reviewed all the older decisions. At one time the view taken, or said to be taken, was that the overseers of a parish in which a non-settled pauper had taken up his residence were not liable for his relief, but this view was afterwards repudiated by the Courts of law.

1163. (Mr. Patten MacDougall.) Where there is a difference between two Boards of Guardians such as was figured just now, as to whether the proper relief is 11s. or 15s., is there any means in England of settling what is the adequate relief?—By the Central Authority?— no, I do not think so.

1164. The relief which the Board of Guardians to whom the pauper is chargeable propose to give is the relief which is the legal relief?—In the case put by the Commissioner I should say that the Board of Guardians who formed the opinion that the adequate relief to the pauper residing within their union, although not settled on their union, must be 15s. per week, would be responsible for the difference between the amount that they receive and the amount that they thought to be adequate.

1165. So they could only recover the 11s.?—It is hardly recoverable in the circumstances by reason of that case to which I have referred. It is the case of Wycombe v. Eton (26 Law Journal, Magistrates Cases, 97: 21 Justice of the Peace, 70).

Appointment and payment of Auditors.

1166. I only want to ask one question about the audit; who appoints the auditors in England?—The Local Government Board.

1167. Are the auditors' fees defrayed locally or by imperial grant?—A contribution in the form of a stamp duty is made to the imperial exchequer from the local authorities.

Relieving Officer's tenure.

1168. (Sir Samuel Provis.) With regard to the appointment of the relieving officers, shall we clear up the exact tenure of their office? Is not the case this, that a relieving officer who was appointed before 28th February, 1879, can only be removed by the Local Government Board?—I have no doubt that you are referring to the order which I was trying to find.

1169. I think that relieving officers appointed after that date can be removed by the Board of Guardians with the consent of the Local Government Board or by the Local Government Board?—Quite so.

Duties of Auditors as to excessive expenditure.

1170. Taking another point that has been raised, namely with regard to the audit, there is no doubt, is there, that it is the duty of the auditor of the accounts of Boards of Guardians to disallow any excessive expenditure or exorbitant expenditure which may be incurred by the guardians? If I remember rightly the order for accounts expressly makes that his duty?—No doubt it is within his powers, and it should be his duty.

Regulations of Central Authority under Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834.

1171. Taking the subject of relief generally, is it right to say that one of the main objects of the Act of 1834 was the purpose of preventing the abuses that there were then existing, and to give large powers to the central authority with a view to their making such orders as would prevent those abuses?—Yes, certainly.

Enforcement of Regulations.

1172. Then there comes the question as to how those orders could be enforced; are there not two or three ways in which they might be enforced?—Yes.

1173. First of all, a penalty attaches, does it not, to disobedience to an order made under the Act of 1834?—Quite so. It is recoverable before the justices under Section 98 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834.

1174. What is the amount of the penalty?—Perhaps I had better read the section:—"In case any person shall wilfully neglect or disobey any of the rules, orders or regulations of the said Commissioners or assistant Commissioners, or be guilty of any contempt of the said Commissioners sitting as a board, such person shall upon conviction before any two justices forfeit and pay for the first offence any sum not exceeding five pounds; for the second offence any sum not exceeding twenty pounds, nor less than five pounds; and in the event of such person being convicted a third time, such third and every subsequent offence shall be deemed a misdemeanour and such offender shall be liable to be indicted for the same offence, and shall on conviction pay such fine, not being less than twenty pounds, and suffer such imprisonment with or without hard labour, as may be awarded against him by the Court by or before which he shall be tried and convicted."

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

16 Jan. 1906.

1175. The second remedy, I suppose, would be by a mandamus for disobedience of the order, would it not?—Yes.

1176. But that remedy, I presume, would only lie where there was a distinct and definite duty imposed upon the guardians by either the statute or the order?—Yes.

1177. And there is no other remedy applicable to the case which is equally available?—That would be so.

1178. Then there would be, I think, also the remedy which you referred to the other day, namely, that the union might be broken up?—Yes.

1179. That is, supposing it was found to be necessary, the union might be dissolved and the parishes might be allocated to other unions?—Yes.

1180. There would be, would there not, a good deal of practical difficulty in doing that in a great many cases?—Certainly, that would be so.

1181. For instance, you would have cases of a separate parish and a separate board of guardians which could not be conveniently added to any other union?—That is so.

1182. Another remedy is through the audit, is it not, namely, that the auditor may and should disallow expenditure which appears to him to be illegal?—That is so.

Force of Special and General Orders.

1183. With regard to the orders, there is no difference in the validity of an order is there, whether it is a special order or whether it is a general order?—No; they are equally liable to be questioned on an application for a writ of certiorari.

1184. And they have the same efficacy, except that a general order applies to more than one union and a special order applies to a particular union?—Yes, that is the distinction.

1185. Usually, the only reason for making a general order rather than a special one is that it is evidently more convenient to make an order which applies (if you have got the same state of facts before you) to a number of unions, than to make a number of separate orders?—Certainly.

Officers' Superannuation.

1186. You told us with regard to the Superannuation Act, 1896, that there was a provision subsisting before that Act under which Poor Law officers could be superannuated?—Yes; that was in the 27 and 28 Vic., c. 42. That Act was amended by subsequent statutes, and the Act of 1896 reserves the continued operation of the Act of 1864 in cases where particular officers did not care to come under the provisions of the Act of 1896; so in relation to those cases the Act of 1864, though repealed, may be said to be still in force.

1187. The great difference between the two is, that it is optional under the old Act, is it not?—It was optional on the part of the guardians, and also there was no contribution from the officer.

1188. But under the new Act it is compulsory, and there must be a contribution by the officer?—Yes.

Property of paupers.

1189. Then at question 110 you gave evidence with reference to the property of a pauper which could be made available for the repayment of relief. The Act refers to the money or valuable security for money which may be taken by the guardians in repayment of relief; can you assist us as to what is meant by "valuable security?"—There was a case in the High Court which decided that the words "valuable security for money" were wide enough to include a judgment obtained in favour of a pauper on his bringing an action for damages (West Ham Union v. Ovens; Law Reports, 8, Exchequer 37; 42, Law Journal, Magistrates' Cases, 29).

1190. Those words would not include chattels, I suppose, would they?—No.

1191. So that if a pauper was taken into the workhouse with a watch, for instance, the guardians would not take the watch?—The guardians ought not to do so—certainly not under this statutory provision (12 and 13, Vic., c. 103, s. 16).

Overseers' duties as to Voters' Lists.

1192. Passing now to Question 130, which related to the voters' lists and the duties of the overseers in relation to voters' lists, a precept, if I remember rightly, is issued by the clerk of the peace (or by the town clerk in the case of boroughs) to the overseers directing them what they are to do in the preparation of the lists?—Yes.

1193. I think that that precept directs the overseers to omit the names of persons who are disqualified by receipt of relief; is that not so?—That is so.

1194. Then supposing that an overseer wilfully neglected that duty, would he be liable to a penalty?—He would be liable to be fined by the revising barrister, if the proceeding were wilful.

1195. The penalty is not very large, if I remember rightly?—No, it is not.

1196. I have an impression that it must not be less than £1 or more than £5?—That is so.

Erection of New Workhouses.

1197. Then may we go on to Question 140, which relates to the erection of new workhouses. The Local Government Board have no power at their own initiative to require a new workhouse to be built unless certain consents are given; is that not so?—That is so.

1198. The consents would be, would they not, the consents of the owners and ratepayers, or of a majority of the board of guardians, or of the guardians by a resolution passed after certain notices?—That is so.

1199. That last provision, I think, is in sec. 12 of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1882, is it not?—Yes.

1200. Does not the law seem to you a little weak in that particular?—It does. The position is inherited from that of 1834, when, if one may judge from the Report of the Commission of Inquiry, it was rather feared that there would be almost too many workhouses.

1201. It was a fear of the expense, I imagine?—No doubt that was so.

Alteration of Workhouses.

1202. But the law is different, is it not, with regard to the alteration of workhouses?—Yes.

1203. There, the consents are not necessary, but the workhouse must be altered in accordance with a plan approved by the Local Government Board, if the Board so require?—Yes.

Incorporation of Boards of Guardians.

1204. With regard to the taking of land by a board of guardians, is a board of guardians incorporated?—A board of guardians is incorporated, but the incorporation is not perfect—it is an incomplete corporation.

1205. Would it be desirable that they should be made a complete corporation?—I think certainly so, and perhaps even more so, or equally so, the boards of management of school districts. The position of a board of management of a school district is that they have a common seal, but that they have never been expressly incorporated.

1206. So that there are legal difficulties in consequence of their somewhat imperfect incorporation?—Certainly, that would be so.

Acquisition of land by Guardians.

1207. Supposing the power were given to a board of guardians, might the Lands Clauses Acts be made applicable?—The Lands Clauses Acts could be made applicable, but only for limited purposes under the existing law.

1208. I am afraid I have not quite gathered the effect of your answer?—The Lands Clauses Acts could be made applicable under the Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867, but only in very exceptional circumstances.

1209. That Act only applies to the Metropolis, does it?—Certainly.

1210. The point would therefore be whether it would be desirable that the Lands Clauses Acts should be made applicable outside London?—Yes.

1211. In London there is a power of taking land compulsorily, is there not?—Yes, in special circumstances.

1212. For the extension of existing workhouses?—That is so.

1213. But there is no such power outside, is there?—No.

1214. Would it be desirable, in your view, that there should be a power of that kind?—I think it would be desirable, but probably some modification of a few provisions of the Lands Clauses Acts might be required in the application of the code to Poor Law authorities and purposes.

n rates.

1215. Following upon question 179, which related to exclusal from rates, I think the point was raised as to whether there would be any actual payment of the rate in a case of that kind. There would not be any payment of the rate in a case of that kind, would there, because sec. 11 of the 54 George III., c. 170, expressly says that in that case the rate shall not be collected?—There would be no payment of rate by the overseers in an ordinary case of exclusal on the ground of poverty. The only case of possible, though improbable, payment that I can suggest is that of non-resident relief to cover a rate.

lvil case.

1216. Question 205 related to the Merthyr Tydvil case. A point in the Merthyr Tydvil case that you described in your answer was, that the order provided, not who should be relieved, but as to the mode in which they should be relieved?—That is so.

1217. Consequently, the point in that case was whether able-bodied men, able to work and to get work, could be relieved at all?—Yes.

1218. And that question turned, not upon the words of the order, but upon the law as laid down in the statute?—The order was considered and found to contain nothing at variance with the Statute.

1219. The effect of the decision was, I think, that the Court said that able-bodied men would not be relieved if they were able to get work, unless they became so weak that they could not work, and then in that case they must be relieved?—Yes.

1220. But that any wife or child must be relieved if destitute?—That was so.

oor relief.

1221. (Chairman.) I understand from your answers that in case of urgent necessity a pauper has a legal right to demand out-door relief, and the relieving officer has no legal right to refuse it?—The effect of the pauper's attitude is to confer on him the privilege of choosing the form of relief, that is to say, if he refuses relief within the workhouse, it is the duty of the relieving officer to see that he has relief—and that would be outside the workhouse.

1222. If he refused, and any untoward consequence occurred, he would be responsible for being guilty of an illegal inaction, if I may call it so?—For having been guilty of negligence.

r Law
, 1834,

1223. You have stated very clearly to the Commission the powers which the President of the Local Government Board has to issue orders from time to time; he has a certain latitude as to what shall be in those orders, but they of course are controlled and regulated by the general statute, to which Mr. Loch called our attention, which is, perhaps, somewhat ambiguous in its terms. Assuming that it is our duty, when we have done our inquiry, to make certain proposals for the improvement of the administration of the existing Poor Law, would it be any use if there were some declaratory Act making clear any parts of the Act of 1834 the intention of which is not perfectly clear?—I should say that it would be almost a necessity that the Commission should consider that point, and either in their report, or in suggestions for statutory amendment, lay down what view is to be taken in the future about matters as to which they find ambiguity.

1224. There has been no statute passed since 1834 which is merely declaratory as regards interpretation, has there?—No statute which, in so many words, affects the declaratory recital of Sec. 52 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834.

intenance.

1225. (Mr. Loch). With regard to relations, is it under case law that the grandchild is not bound to support his grandfather?—Yes.

1226. Is that a matter now of settled policy requiring statutes expressly to alter it, if it were to be altered?—Clearly so, I think.

1227. With regard to the justices, is their position, from the point of view of valid law, more or less out of date, or do justices at the present moment use their powers for giving orders in the case of paupers that should have relief?—Orders on relations, do you mean?

Justices' powers to order relief.

1228. No; I was taking another point?—I could not say to what extent the power under Sec. 27 or the power under Sec. 54 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, is acted upon.

1129. In the main, has not the relation of the justices to the Poor Law been entirely altered in practice since the Act of 1834?—In practice, I should certainly think so.

1230. So that, again, is another point in which the law may fairly be re-considered?—I should think so, certainly.

1231. (Chairman.) It is a relic of old law which is in operation?—Yes, it is the case of a relic.

1232. (Sir Samuel Provis.) At Question 301 I think you dealt with the contribution made by a board of guardians to the common fund of the union?—Yes.

Contribution to Common Fund.

1233. That is based, is it not, on the rateable value of the parishes, as ascertained under the Union Assessment Committee Acts where those Acts are in force?—Yes.

1234. There are few places, are there not, where those Acts are still not in force?—I believe so.

1235. But I think they are very few now?—I do not know the exact number, but they are undoubtedly few.

1236. Going on to your answer to question 305, there you deal with the grants made to boards of guardians or the payments in substitution for grants made by the county councils?—Quite so.

Lunatic Grant.

1237. One of these is 4s. a week, which is paid, subject to certain conditions, in respect of any lunatic sent to an asylum?—Yes.

1238. That does not apply, I think, to a lunatic who is detained in the workhouse?—No.

1239. I do not know whether it has come before you, but I think some representations have been made by boards of guardians urging that it should be extended to cases where a chronic lunatic is detained in the workhouse?—That is so.

1240. Have you any opinion upon that?—What I should like to say about it is, that the subject must, I take it, to a certain extent, depend for its final consideration upon the Report of the Royal Commission on the Care of the Feeble-minded.

1241. Then there is an officers' grant, is there not; that is to say, a payment made by a county council under Sec. 26 of the Local Government Act, 1888, based upon the amount of the salaries and remuneration of the officers during the year ending the 25th March, 1888?—Yes, except in London.

Officers' Grant.

1242. There have been representations, I think, to the effect that that ought now to be revised and brought up to a later date?—Yes.

1243. The section, if I remember rightly, says that, until Parliament otherwise directs, this is to be the state of the case?—Quite so.

1244. Boards of guardians have urged, have they not, that this provision is somewhat out of date, because the numbers of officers are very much altered in different unions since that time?—Yes.

1245. Going on to the answer to Question 309, there you deal with the expenditure of the Metropolitan Asylums Board; that expenditure is defrayed in two ways, I think you told us?—Yes.

Method of paying Metropolitan Asylums Board expenditure.

1246. That is to say, that as regards a certain class of expenditure, it is charged to the various Boards of Guardians according to rateable value?—Yes.

1247. And that as regards the charge for the maintenance of cases in an asylum, it is charged to the particular Board of Guardians sending the cases?—That is so.

1248. But then, on the other hand, do not the guardians get back that sum which they have paid for maintenance, out of the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund?—Yes.

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

16 Jan. 1906.

1249. So that, in the end, the whole of the expenditure incurred by the Metropolitan Asylums Board is a Metropolitan charge?—That is so.

1250. Is not that second plan of the guardians—first of all being charged by the Asylums Board for the maintenance of the cases which they send and then in turn making a claim upon the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund for repayment—a little cumbrous?—It would seem so.

Salaries of London Officers.

1251. Going on to question 312, as you said just now, the officers' grant does not apply to London, and the reason for that is, I presume, that in London the salaries of the officers are a Metropolitan charge?—Yes.

1252. Therefore, the guardians are already repaid the salaries of the officers?—Yes.

1253. And could not properly receive an additional grant in respect of those salaries from the county council?—I think that is so.

London Indoor Relief Grant.

1254. But in lieu of that, they got a grant, did they not in respect of the in-door poor?—Yes, a special grant.

1255. Which is 4d. a day, is it not?—Yes, 4d. a day.

1256. The guardians in London, do, in effect, get 9d. a day repaid by the Metropolis in respect of every in-door pauper?—Yes, subject to certain conditions, of course.

1257. These conditions only apply, I think, in the case of the 5d. a day, which is repaid by the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund?—Yes; the other is an absolute payment.

1258. The object of the conditions was, I think, twofold—first of all, to prevent over-crowding; that is to say, you only repay from the Common Poor Fund in respect of the number for which the workhouse is certified, or rather, you do not repay 5d. a day in respect of a larger amount than the workhouse is certified for?—That is so.

1259. And secondly, you do not pay in respect of children under sixteen?—That is so.

1260. The object of that, I suppose, was to get the children out of the workhouses?—No doubt.

Guardians' borrowing power.

1261. Then going on to question 316, which deals with borrowing, I think the general power of a Board of Guardians to borrow is derived from the Poor Law Act 1889, now?—That is so.

1262. Does there not still remain a power to borrow for the purposes of the Assessment Committee Acts under those Acts?—Yes; but I have regarded the subject of Assessment Committees as rather outside the scope of my evidence 1263. I was only on the point that there is that power of borrowing?—There is that power, no doubt.

Payment of Guardians' debts.

1264. Then we come to Question 319; this is only a small matter, dealing with the payment of debts. A Board of Guardians can only pay their debts within the half year in which they are incurred, or within three months afterwards, unless the Local Government Board extends the time?—Yes.

1265. That time can only be extended for a period of one year from the date at which the debt was incurred, and there must be an order authorising the payment; is that not so?—Yes.

1266. Might the order be got rid of?—Certainly, I think.

Relieving Officer as collector of rates.

1267. (Mr. Patten MacDougall.) At Question 303 Sir Samuel Provis asked, "There would be the salaries of the collectors of the poor rate, would there not"; perhaps it is a matter of administration—I do not know—but can you say whether, in England, a relieving officer is ever a collector of the poor rate?—I do not think so. I do not recall any instances in which he is collector of the poor rate. There is, however, one case of a very small union in which at one time nearly every office was filled by one man. That was the Welwyn Union.

1268. Can you say what is the general salary of the relieving officer?—No, I could not tell you that.

1269. Nor of the collector of rates?—No, I could not.

Boarded-out children.

1270. In reply to Question 306, you refer to the definition of the term "indoor pauper"; I see that "in-door pauper," according to Sec. 43 of the Local Government Act, 1888, includes children boarded out within or without the limits of the union; I gather from that that boarded-out pauper children in England are regarded as paupers, and are upon the list of paupers?—Yes, they are upon the list of paupers.

1271. There is no separate list of boarded-out children, is there?—No.

1272. Then so far as regards the lists which are kept by the Board of Guardians, there is nothing in any way to remove from these boarded-out children the taint of pauperism which must attach to them if they are held to be in-door paupers?—They are subject to regulation only because they are paupers.

1273. If they were not on the list of in-door paupers, but were kept on a separate list, that would so far remove from them the taint of pauperism which must otherwise attach, must it not?—They are, of course, paupers.

Union a rateable

1274. (Mr. Loch.) Going back to Question 301, is there any reason now why the union rather than the parish should not for all purposes be treated as the rateable area? So much having left the parish and fallen on the union in the way of expenditure, would it not be desirable that the union should become the rateable area for all purposes instead of the parish?—I should have thought not. The tendency of the present day is, I suppose, in the direction of simplification, and simplification would involve one rating area or should involve one rating area for all local purposes. You could not possibly have such a rating area as a union for public health purposes. You must have your separate local division such as the parish as a place to be separately charged with expenses of various kinds.

1275. The decision of cases and all matters of business that affect that use of the money which is levied parish by parish is carried out by the Board of Guardians, is it not?—You are speaking now of the Poor Law only. When such an alteration as that of the substitution of the union for the parish as a rating area is in contemplation, you must think of other branches of local taxation.

1276. Which practically prevent the alteration, though on the ground of the Poor Law it might be more satisfactory?—I think so. I think it certainly would prevent it.

Period fo repayme of loans.

1277. With regard to loans which are dealt with at question 316, the phrase is "a loan raised after the passing of the Poor Law Act, 1897, must be repaid within such period not exceeding sixty years as the guardians or the managers with the consent of the Local Government Board may determine"; is sixty years the time usually allowed?—That I could not say; it is more or less a question of administration.

1278. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) Is it not the case that since the 4s. a week grant for lunatics was made, the statistics of lunacy have risen very greatly?—I would rather you put that question to some other witness who will come after me. I am not familiar with the statistical side of the question; it is only the legal side with which I have to deal.

1279. I simply wanted to suggest that the increase is only an apparent increase?—That may be so, but another witness, I think, will give you the figures.

Definitio of "ind pauper."

1280. (Dr. Downes.) With reference to the definition of "in-door pauper" in the Act of 1888, paupers in hospitals for infectious diseases are included, I take it, but the definition would not include persons who are admitted otherwise than as paupers?—That is so. It would only include paupers.

Repaym from Metropo Commor Poor Fu

1281. Is the whole expenditure of the Metropolitan Asylums Board charged to the relief of the poor?—I think that also is rather a question for those who will give evidence on the statistics.

1282. With regard to the application of the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund, amongst other things repayments are made on the salaries of officers, I think?—Yes.

1283. Is it necessary that each officer should be considered individually, and that the repayment must be made in the case of Tom Smith, say, by name?—Each officer, in respect of whom repayment is made from the fund must, in some form or other, be the subject of a sanction so far as regards his appointment, but the appointments may be sanctioned collectively as well as individually, that is to say, a group of officers may be the subject of a sanction as well as an individual officer.

1284. But in one form or another he has to come individually under the consideration of the central authority?—The appointment must.

1285. Taking again the repayment of the expenses on medical and surgical appliances, does that involve that schedules should be presented in which each item must be entered separately?—I have no very definite recollection of the actual practice. I should have thought the separate enumeration and description of particular instruments to be unnecessary.

1286. Is there any power to allocate the repayments from the Common Poor Fund en bloc according to any settled system of division between the several parishes and unions?—There is a provision in the section following Sec. 69 to carry out the method of repayment. Sec. 70 is in these terms: "After each half-yearly audit the auditors shall, within such time and in such manner as the Poor Law Board"—now the Local Government Board—"from time to time direct, certify to the Poor Law Board the amount actually expended by each union or parish in respect of expenses which are to be repaid out of the Common Poor Fund; and the Poor Law Board shall, by precept under the seal of the Board, direct the Receiver to repay out of that fund to the guardians of the unions and parishes the several sums so expended, and the amount repaid shall be applied by them in aid of the fund chargeable with the relief of the poor." The system of allocation would depend upon the procedure under that section.

1287. (Miss Hill.) With reference to your answer to Question 316, may I ask whether you think that the borrowing powers of the guardians are sufficiently held in check by the present provisions of the law, so that the money is really only spent on permanent work and is not extravagantly spent?—I should think that the existing check is about the utmost that would be conceded at the present time by Parliament.

1288. (Mr. Bentham.) With regard to the grants referred to at Question 305, am I to understand that the basis upon which these grants were made was the expenditure for the one year ending the 25th March, 1888?—Yes, one year was taken.

1289. Simply the expenditure in one year?—Certainly; that was the basis on which the allocation was to proceed.

1290. And it has remained at that figure ever since, I presume?—Yes, that was the Parliamentary bargain as it were.

1291. Would it require an Act of Parliament to alter that?—Yes.

1292. (Mr. Phelps.) On your answer to Question 316, I want to ask whether it is competent for Boards of Guardians to accumulate a balance. There may be works which require a loan, there may be works which fall obviously on annual expenditure, and there may be works which may be half way between the two; is it competent for the guardians to accumulate a balance for those?—They ought not to do so.

1293. Ought the auditor to note it, if he comes across it?—I think so.

1294. Is there any penalty?—No, except that the individual parishes which are affected by that proceeding might have their remedy.

1295. That is to say, you are not justified in raising more than you may reasonably expect the expenditure of the year will run to?—That is the principle.

1296. What is the legal position of a Board of Guardians with regard to an over-draft at a bank?—That is altogether irregular.

1297. Would the Local Government Board call attention to it if it was reported to them?—An over-draft at the bank, if by arrangement with the bank, interest were paid on it, would probably subject individual guardians to surcharge.

1298. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) Is there not a system by which you can have loans for a short period?—Certainly.

1299. Sometimes even for six years?—Yes.

1300. (Mr. Bentham.) In your reply to Question 321, you say, "for the purposes of my summary of the statutory provisions I leave out of consideration the case of a lunatic who is not a pauper and is not wandering at large, but is not under proper care and control or is cruelly treated or neglected." Does that mean that the relieving officer has no responsibility whatever with regard to a case of a lunatic which might be brought under his notice?—No. I left that case out only because I considered that my evidence should be limited to cases of lunatics who were actually paupers ab initio.

1301. Would he not become a pauper lunatic if the notice of the relieving officer was brought to the case?—In the answer to Question 321, I have already drawn attention to the circumstances under which he becomes a pauper lunatic. The simple intervention of the relieving officer under the Lunacy Acts does not make the man a pauper.

1302. Do you say that he is to be dealt with first, and then the question of whether he is a pauper or not should be decided afterwards?—Yes.

1303. I cannot reconcile the two statements, because the relieving officer must take charge in the first instance?—Not necessarily; a constable might take charge.

1304. I mean if a relieving officer's attention is drawn to the case and not a constable's, he must take charge of it; and the question must be decided afterwards whether the case is that of a pauper lunatic or not?—I do not think so—not necessarily.

1305. Can he refuse to take charge?—It would depend actually upon the circumstances as in the case of a man man wandering at large. If the lunatic in such a case were found by a police officer, the police officer would have a statutory duty in relation to him.

1306. But supposing it is a case of not wandering at large?—The position is similar in the case of a lunatic who is not under proper care and control, or who is cruelly treated or neglected.

1307. I want to know whether the relieving officer would have any responsibility if a case were brought to his notice of a lunatic who was not wandering at large but was cruelly treated?—Although the man is not a pauper?

1308. Although at that moment it is not known whether he is a pauper or not?—The relieving officer, no doubt, has the responsibility attaching to him under the Lunacy Acts in such a case; but the case I wanted to exclude was the case of the man who, at the time of his being not under proper care and control, was clearly not a pauper.

1309. It is not always known until the case is afterwards inquired into?—I excluded from my summary the case of the lunatic not under proper care and control mainly to avoid reference to decisions of the High Court which would be of little practical value in relation to cases of ordinary pauper lunatics.

Provision for lunatics in Workhouse.

1310. You are asked at Question 342, "Are the guardians under statutory obligation to make special provision for lunatics in a workhouse?" and your answer is "No;" are the guardians not under some legal obligation to provide a place of reception for those who are summarily declared to be certified as lunatics?—The statute does not in terms require that they should make structural alterations or structural provisions; and it was those which I had in my mind specially. I concluded that the reference was to special accommodation for these lunatics.

1311. For dealing permanently with lunatics, do you mean?—Yes, on a somewhat more elaborate scale than would be applicable to the case of the ordinary pauper in a case of emergency.

1312. Then Boards of Guardians have to make provision for cases under a magistrate's summary detention order?—Certain pauper lunatics may be taken to a workhouse pending their ultimate removal to an asylum; and for their reception an ordinary workhouse, I should think, would suffice in the majority of cases.

1313. It might require a padded room?—Yes, it might.

1314. That would be a special provision?—No doubt.

1315. Really, they are bound to make special provision for those cases, are they not?—I do not know that, and I would not go so far as to say that. The statute rather proceeds on the assumption that they are to go to the workhouse, if the workhouse has the requisite accommodation for their reception.

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

16 Jan. 1906.

1316. (Dr. Downes.) They are not to remain in the workhouse, I think, if the medical officer does not certify that there is proper accommodation for them, apart from the other inmates?—That relates to the imbeciles rather than to the particular lunatics to which I understood the question to apply.

1317. I thought that applied to cases brought in by a relieving officer under the ordinary procedure for a wandering lunatic?—The ordinary procedure for lunatics brought there in the first instance would hardly contemplate their remaining beyond the very limited period to which the statute applies—fourteen days, or whatever the additional time may be.

Special Asylums for weak minded children.

1318. At Question 349, Sir Henry Robinson asked you, "Are there any institutions supported entirely out of the rates for the maintenance of weak-minded and idiot children under age?" and your reply was that you thought there were, but the Commission on the Feeble-minded apparently thought there were not. I suggest that the Commission had forgotten the case of the Asylums Board's institutions—Darenth, for example—also the institutions for idiot children, and also the later institution set up under the order of the Local Government Board of 2nd April, 1897?—No, I am afraid that is not quite so. This particular question I understood to have reference to a statutory expression which referred to these establishments as supported out of the county rate; and therefore I think that to that extent what I was told before that other Commission was probably right.

1319. In London there are institutions supported out of the poor rates?—Yes, there are, certainly. The doubt I have still in my mind is whether I was rightly told in relation to some of the institutions of the London County Council—whether they have not a special asylum for idiots.

Separation of harmless lunatics from sane paupers.

1320. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) I understand that harmless lunatics may be permanently provided for in the workhouse?—Subject to certification by the medical officer of the workhouse, or to a justice's order for detention.

1321. Is there no provision by which they are to be kept apart from the sane paupers?—There is no statutory provision requiring separation, where the medical officer does not think it necessary.

Certification of lunatics.

1322. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) I suppose we may assume in the case of those who are suffering from temporary aberration, and who are paupers, that the object of the guardians, as representing the ratepayers, is that they shall not be certified until it is seen whether there is likely to be any permanent illness or not; is that not so?—I should think it would be fair to say that the scheme of the Lunacy Acts is on those lines.

1323. Because if they are certified and confined in an asylum or otherwise, of course in the event of recovery, there is less chance of their getting employment. I say that, because I want to ask whether there is any provision in the workhouses for the reception of such people temporarily before certification, for observation in observation wards or probationary wards?—That I think is hardly a subject that I should have any useful knowledge about. I think that the statutes contemplate that the workhouses will, as a rule, have some adequate accommodation for the purpose, but they do not lay down any requirements as to providing it.

1324. Where such people might remain for a certain specified short term, until it is seen whether there is any need or medical necessity for their being treated elsewhere?—Quite so. The Lunacy Acts contemplate that workhouses may provide that accommodation, but they do not make it absolutely compulsory.

1325. That is a matter of administration, and you are not aware whether de facto there is such accommodation?—It is a matter of administration, of which I should have no knowledge.

Separate Institutions for imbeciles.

1326. (Sir Samuel Provis.) You said just now that permanent imbeciles and chronic lunatics might be detained in a workhouse, subject to certain conditions; have there not been proposals that those lunatics should be taken out of the workhouses and be put into separate institutions provided by the county councils?—That has been one proposal; there have also been proposals that in some instances Sec. 8 of the Poor Law Act, 1879, should be used for dealing with them.

1327. In one or two cases there have been combinations under Sec. 8 for providing for certain classes of imbeciles, have there not?—Yes.

1328. Supposing that county councils were required to undertake the management and maintenance of chronic imbeciles, should there be some legislation on the subject?—I should think legislation would be absolutely essential.

1329. The arrangements under the existing laws do not contemplate cases of that kind, do they?—They are too costly, I think, for the provision that is needed; but there, again, the whole question is still before that other Commission.

Boarding of lunatics.

1330. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) Would it be legal to board them out, as in Scotland?—There is a provision in Section 57 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, for boarding out.

1331. Could we proceed to board them out in England, as they are boarded out in Scotland?—I do not know what the Scottish system is.

Loss of settlement alteration area.

1332. (Sir Samuel Provis.) In your answer to Question 378, you dealt with the Dorking case; that was a case, was it not, where the parish had been abolished under the Act of 1894?—Yes.

1333. The Act of 1894 provided, did it not, that where a parish was partly within and partly without a rural sanitary district, the two parts should be constituted separate parishes?—That is so.

1334. The consequence was that a very large number of such parishes disappeared, and separate parishes were formed out of them?—Yes.

1335. The point of the Dorking case was, was it not, that the parish having been got rid of, a man who had a settlement in the parish lost his settlement there, and did not acquire a settlement in either of the parishes formed out of the parish which had been abolished?—That was so.

1336. The evil arising from those cases of a number of people having thus lost their settlement must be very rapidly diminishing, must it not?—I should think so.

1337. Because the people would have acquired settlements elsewhere, in a great number of cases?—I should think so.

1338. The Dorking case did not touch the case where the boundaries of a parish had been altered, but the parish itself had been left, did it?—No.

1339. A man would not lose his settlement, I take it, if he had got a settlement in parish A, because the boundaries of parish A were altered?—No, he would not. That is the effect of the latest decision.

1340. With regard to cases like the Dorking case, suppose a parish was got rid of by means of alterations of parishes made by a county council (as could be done under Sec. 57 of the Local Government Act, or one of the other sections of that Act) might not the order of the County Council, or the confirming order, make provision which would prevent a man losing his settlement in the parish which was altered?—I think so. That would be an illustration of what might be done by the clauses which I propose to put in for consideration by the Commissioners.

Decision of settlement by Local Government Board.

1341. In your reply to Question 405, you dealt with the power there is for guardians to agree to submit to the Local Government Board questions of settlement. The actual number of cases, I think, has not been large, but I am under the impression that the board have, in their annual reports, sometimes recommended guardians to avail themselves of this permission, with a view of diminishing the expense which arises if questions of that sort are referred to courts of law?—That would be so.

1342. Would you be prepared to express any opinion on the point whether it might be desirable to make it compulsory that questions of that kind should be referred to the Board?—There is a very great deal to be said in favour of it, but the objection that occurs to me—it is only an administrative objection—is that the staff needed for the investigation of these cases properly is rather foreign to the usual staff of a Government department. You would require someone in the nature of a settlement officer—a sort of private inquiry officer.

1343. Would it be proper, in a case of that kind, that some charge should be made to the boards of guardians?—Clearly so, I think.

1344. And it should be optional with the Board whether they should entertain the reference to them, because they might consider the question raised was of so much importance that it ought to go to a court of law?—Yes, unless they themselves had power of their own motion to obtain the decision of a court of law on a case as put by them.

1345. You are aware, perhaps, that a number of representations were made a few years ago to the effect that something of that kind should be done?—Yes.

1346. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) As regards the Dorking case you are aware, I daresay, that that decision and its results have been the cause of a certain amount of dissatisfaction, not only in regard to cases from Scotland, but also in regard to English cases?—We have heard a great deal about it from boards of guardians.

1347. I am not quite sure, but I think those cases which have arisen from the chargeability or supposed chargeability to a parish have been cases of birth settlement as well as cases of settlement by residence; I mean, where, owing to the operation of the Act under which the boundaries of a parish were altered, it has been held that a pauper who was born in that parish, and who would otherwise have been removable had it not been for the alteration in boundaries, is not so removable?—Yes, that is so.

1348. Does that not appear to be a very considerable hardship on the parish which has to relieve this pauper, simply because of an alteration in boundaries which has practically resulted in this—that the pauper has been born, as I may say, nowhere, owing to that alteration of boundaries?—In those cases as to which the cry of hardship has been raised, the real answer is that time can supply the only remedy.

1349. I rather think, from the questions which Sir Samuel Provis has put to you, that if this alteration had taken place, not under the Divided Parishes Act, but under the County Council Act, 1888, this difficulty would not have arisen?—It should not have arisen. At that time, I do not know that the difficulty actually had occurred, either to the Board or to any local authority; but since attention has been drawn to the difficulty, it is seen that it is distinctly removable, either by clauses in the order of the county council or by the introduction of modifications in a confirming order.

1350. There being, I suppose, a provision in the Act of 1888 that any alteration of boundaries shall not affect settlement?—There is no such provision actually, but there is a very wide enactment in Section 59 of the Local Government Act, 1888, which enables county councils to introduce into their orders a number of provisions with regard to all necessary matters incidental to or consequential upon parochial changes.

1351. One question now about the powers of arbitration which the Local Government Board have. I understand that these powers of arbitration which you possess in regard to cases of settlement are not confined to cases where the two disputing unions or parishes—I do not know which is the proper term—are agreed upon the facts?—The powers of the Board apply only to such cases.

1352. I mean where they themselves present a petition or an application or a statement to you, in which they are agreed upon the facts as regards the settlement, and they come to you to ask you to decide the point of law?—That is the present position.

1353. That has not been largely taken advantage of, I think you told us?—Originally I think it was very freely used, but of late years, for various reasons, probably the annual crop of cases does not amount to twenty.

1354. What may be the reason for that, can you say?—Partly perhaps because the points of difficulty are gradually diminishing.

1355. It is not because they are being litigated outside then?—I really could not say as to that; it is just conceivable that it may be so.

1356. That there is sometimes a desire on the part of the people to litigate, if they possibly can?—Possibly there is that motive at work.

Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

16 Jan. 1906.

1357. I press this because just now there is a movement in favour not only on questions where they agree upon the facts, but on all questions where they are not agreed upon the facts, of the Local Government Board in Scotland being asked to undertake the whole thing?—Quite so; and suggestions to the like effect have been made to the English Local Government Board.

Relative importance of different kinds of settlement.

1358. (Mr. Loch.) With regard to your reply to Question 353 about the various sorts of settlement and removability, does it appear from your knowledge of the cases that occur that these various modes of obtaining a settlement are of equal importance at the present time, so that all should be retained?—No, I do not think they are of equal importance, but they are not absolutely defunct. The chief method now is by residence—I mean that that is the most frequent which comes under our notice.

1359. That being so, would not several of the others so far slip out of observation that practically they might be passed over and set aside by further legislation? Take for instance, apprenticeship; is it necessary to keep apprenticeship still on those lines as one of the modes of obtaining settlement?—Is this your point, That by legislation you would affect the people (they must be very few, I should imagine) who have already acquired a settlement in that way, and you would sweep away that existing mode of settlement, as well as prevent the acquisition of such a settlement in the future?

1360. That is my point?—I do not think there would be much harm in that; but a saving of existing settlements would be better.

1361. Now take the renting of the tenement; that is one year's settlement, is it not?—Yes.

1362. And that is inconsistent with the three years' residence?—It is a different settlement altogether.

1363. And so far as the time goes, at any rate, inconsistent; would there be any great objection to making the three years' residence suffice?—Curiously enough we had a case of settlement by renting a tenement before us within the last month or so. Of course, the suggestion is open to the observation that in that particular case considerable hardship might have been worked to individual paupers by the abolition of what was actually found to be a right.

1364. Presumably, that might apply to almost any of the modes?—Yes; hence saving of acquired settlements seems to be a necessity.

1365. Then with regard to estate, it is forty days' residence in the case of estate, is it not?—Yes.

1366. You have therefore a different time limit there; is it desirable to keep up such a mode as that?—I cannot say that it is clearly undesirable. Settlement by estate is supposed to be coeval with Magna Charta. I am not quite prepared to sweep away these old landmarks.

1367. There is one more mode called hire and service; is that not really obsolete?—That has gone.

1368. But it still remains on the Statute Book?—It has gone.

1369. Has it absolutely disappeared?—It has absolutely gone.

Relief of irremovable non-settled poor.

1370. If a man becomes chargeable, but has a settlement in a union other than that in which he resides, and nevertheless is not removable to it, and the board of guardians of the union in which he is resident relieve him, do they get paid from the common fund?—Irremovable paupers are chargeable to the common fund.

1371. That is to say, the common fund comes in to deal with a case which is betwixt and between, as it were?—All cases of relief are chargeable to the common fund.

Parish "Stock."

1372. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) At Question 351 you refer to the Act of Settlement under Charles II. The preamble of that speaks of the great discouragement of parishes in providing stocks "where it is liable to be devoured by strangers;" would that stock be the stock for providing employment for the poor? I have thought that these words probably referred to their obligation to set the poor to work?—The whole of this subject was investigated by Mr. Coode in 1851. There is a great deal of learning in his report. It is an official document, and it is known as Coode's Report on the Law of Settlement and Removal. The history of the Act is given there at great length. I am not sure whether there is a reference to the particular question of the stocks.

1373. I ask because it seems to me that the worst form of settlement has arisen out of the attempt to provide employment-relief, and I thought that these words had reference to that?—I think Coode's story of the matter is that the 13 and 14 Charles II., c. 12, was really an amalgamation of several Bills that were then before the House.

1374. (Chairman.) The word "stock" occurs constantly in the Poor Law Acts; is it capable of more than one interpretation, do you think?—The words which have been quoted are, I find, noticed in Coode's Report. His comment is rather by way of sarcasm—"as if any parish had ever encountered the discouragement by trying to provide a stock."

1375. Then the word is probably used in rather a different sense in that Act?—Apparently it is used in the sense suggested, namely, that of means by which the poor could be set to work.

1376. In other Acts it seems to me to mean property which could be rated for the relief of the poor?—That is to say, stock-in-trade. As an example of a Statutory reference to stock-in-trade, the Poor Rate Exemption Act, 1840, may be mentioned.

1377. (Mr. Loch.) A statement put forward by a recent historian is that the provision of stock was one form of attraction, and that people in the time under that Act removed from the north, which was ill-provided with stocks, to the south, which was well-provided with stocks?—Indeed.

1378. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) How did the poor people manage who were not restrained from going from one parish to another; where they had no claim on the ordinary capital of the parish, I take it they could only use up the stock that was specially provided for the poor?—According to the old common law doctrine they would have a claim where their necessities arose; and, according to some versions, alms and oblations provided part of the funds for meeting those necessities before the levy of the poor rate began.

The right to relief.

1379. One often hears it said (referring to settlement by payment of rates) by people who have paid rates for so many years, "I have a right to relief"; apparently that is literally true under the doctrine of settlement by rates?—Provided that the conditions by which this settlement is hedged round are satisfied.

1380. They must also be destitute, of course?—Yes.

1381. (Dr. Downes.) Take the case of a pauper of unknown settlement discharged from an institution; I will assume that the institution is in a parish on which there is no claim whatever, and no suspicion of a settlement; another parish declines to receive him; what would be the temporary remedy for that pauper—should he go to the workhouse of the parish in which the institution is?—Yes; he would seek relief there.

1382. Would he have a claim for temporary relief there?—Yes.

1383. That is to say, the settlement would have to be inquired into afterwards?—Yes.

1384. In the event of a reluctance on the part of that parish to receive him, is there any power on the part of the central authority to direct where he shall remain, pending the settlement?—No.

Appeals against removal of paupers.

1385. (Professor Smart). In your reply to Question 395 you say: "in the case of Irish paupers, the Irish Local Government Board may appeal against the order of removal"; is there any parallel appeal on the part of the Scottish Local Government Board?—No, it is peculiar to Ireland.

1386. I understand that the pauper often goes back as quickly as the warrant?—Perhaps so.

Procedure of removal.

1387. (Mr. Gardiner.) Under what law is it that the pauper removed, say, from England to Ireland must be accompanied by an officer—even supposing that he is an adult pauper?—I am not aware that there is any statutory provision identifying any particular officer. But I see that the person to whom a warrant of removal is delivered under the 8 & 9 Vic., c. 117, sec. 3, "shall detain and hold in safe custody every poor person mentioned therein, until such poor person have arrived at the place to which he is ordered to be removed."

1388. Practically that hampers removal very much, because it adds enormously to the expense?—That may be so.

1389. And therefore the guardians do not take advantage of this provision?—Perhaps not.

1390. In a case that I know of, an able-bodied pauper, whom I should think any board of guardians would have been very glad to lose, had to be taken over to Ireland lest he should be lost?—That was before the Act of 1900, I take it.

Penalty for removing persons not chargeable.

1391. (Mr. Bentham.) Is there not a penalty against any person sending to his place of settlement one who is likely to become pauper, but who is not at the time chargeable?—Yes.

1392. Does that penalty devolve upon both those guardians and officers alike who happen to incur any expense in the matter?—The penalty is imposed by the 9 & 10 Vict., c. 66, Sec. 6: "If any officer of any parish or union do, contrary to law, with intent to cause any poor person to become chargeable to any parish to which such person was not then chargeable, convey any poor person out of the parish for which such officer acts, or cause or procure any poor person to be so conveyed, or give directly or indirectly any money, relief, or assistance, or afford or procure to be afforded any facility for such conveyance, or make any offer or promise, or use any threat to induce any poor person to depart from such parish, and if, in consequence of such conveyance or departure, any poor person become chargeable to any parish to which he was not then chargeable, such officer, on conviction thereof before any two justices, shall forfeit and pay for every such offence any sum not exceeding five pounds nor less than forty shillings."

1393. Then clearly their duty is to relieve a person first, and to inquire into the settlement afterwards?—Yes.

Object of law of settlement.

1394. (Mr. Phelps.) Have you any view as to the object or intention of the legislature in its enactments with regard to settlement; in other words, what do you take to be the purpose of settlement, or of the legislation upon it?—The purpose of settlement, so far as the 13 and 14 Charles II. is concerned, I think was to restrain those who would otherwise have been vagrants to particular parishes.

1395. I have asked the question, because it was very strongly held by a Judge quite recently that the original object of settlement was to prevent the breaking up of the family; would you accept that at all?—I have never seen a definition of that sort. The judicial definitions of settlement, and of the objects of settlement, have varied from time to time in a remarkable manner.

Question of abolition of settlement.

1396. Accepting what you say with regard to the object of the laws on the subject of settlement, do you think that that object is better attained by making settlement difficult or by making it easy to obtain?—The question is rather complicated nowadays by what I take to be the economic aspect of the matter. I should say that nowadays there would be no great harm, from that point of view, in abolishing settlement altogether.

1397. Assuming that settlement is still maintained, do you think that it is to the interest of the public at large (that is, both of the paupers and of the parish), to see that it should be made more difficult or more easy?—That it should be made more easy, I think.

1398. More easy to acquire settlement?—I think so

Procedure of Local Government Board in deciding settlement.

1399. In the cases with regard to settlement which are brought before the Local Government Board instead of going before the Courts, what is the procedure of the Local Government Board: for instance, are the unions heard by counsel?—No. The preliminary instruction is that the guardians should prepare a joint statement which sets out all the facts, and also may contain, if they wish, a summary of their arguments for and against; that is submitted under their seals, and the Local Government Board examine it. If the Local Government Board find that there is another union that ought to be joined, or if the facts are not sufficiently stated, the statement is returned with a request for amendment or for the joining of the other union; and then, when completed, it is disposed of without hearing counsel.

1400. I can quite understand that the system would work admirably in the cases you describe, but I do not think the system capable of application to contested cases?—Those are contested cases.

1401. I mean cases where the two unions are not agreed as to the facts and decline to put in a joint statement?—Those cases as I have already said would involve an investigation by the Board on lines that are at present quite unfamiliar to them and therefore would be essentially experimental.

1402. At present that investigation would be conducted by the unions interested.—That is so. They agree upon their facts and then submit those facts to the Board and ask the Board to decide a point of law arising out of them.

1403. Your opinion would not be that the two boards should appear before the Local Government Board and state their case in the way that they do now before a court?—No.

ttlement idence.

1404. (Mr. Russell Wakefield). Referring to your answer to Question 387, which relates to the law respecting the status of irremovability, do I rightly understand that Lord Chief Justice Cockburn's judgment there, with regard to people who sleep under dry arches and any temporary shelter of that kind, means that they are gradually acquiring a settlement if they go on long enough?—Yes. That is still good law.

1405. Supposing, for instance, I slept in a park long enough, should I be acquiring a settlement?—I think so. It is an extreme case, of course.

1406. How would that fit in with what you quote from Mr. Justice Blackburn, namely, "There must be both a place which he has a right to return to and an intention to return, to constitute a constructive residence; and where a man has gone away and left no residence though he means to return at a future time, the animus revertendi is immaterial." How could he have a constructive residence with regard to an archway or anything of that sort?—The difficulty would consist in the application of the first decision. The first decision was the case of a pauper who slept on the steps after losing her house or being turned out of her lodgings.

1407. It is rather difficult to reconcile the two rulings, is it not?—Yes; but it is not inconceivable that a particular case might disclose circumstances in which Lord Chief Justice Cockburn's decision would supply an exception to the rule laid down by Mr. Justice Blackburn.

1408. Supposing a man were sent to a labour colony or a farm colony of any kind, his wife and children remaining behind, and at the end of a certain period which was sufficiently long to reasonably acquire settlement, he left, and his people became chargeable, would the parish in which the colony was situated be the one in which he would have his settlement?—Would he have a status of irremovability from that parish, you mean?—I think he would if he were there for a year.

1409. His wife and family would become chargeable to that place?—I suppose them to be so chargeable.

harges on ommon and.

1410. (Mr. Booth.) You have spoken of the common fund; does the common fund cover all the charges that are not specifically provided for?—That would be so in the case of the common fund of the union.

emoval to her than nions of ttlement.

1411. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall). I daresay you are familiar with the provisions of the Poor Removal Act, 1862, by which, under Sec. 2, it is provided that "where the justices or magistrate, or sheriff (as the case may be) shall not be able to ascertain, upon the evidence before them, the place of birth or of such continued residence as aforesaid, they shall order the pauper to be removed to the port or union or parish in England or Ireland (as the case may be), or port or parish in Scotland, which shall, in the judgment of the justices or magistrate, or sheriff (as the case may be), under the circumstances of the case be most expedient." Have you known of cases where that has operated a very considerable hardship, from the fact that paupers have been removed, I daresay to England, but certainly to Scotland and probably also to Ireland?—Yes.

1412. To places which are nowhere near the parish of settlement?—Yes; that complaint has been made. Mr. Alfred Douglas Adrian, C.B., K.C.

1413. It has been made, and accordingly would you suggest that the Commission should take that section into view in order to have it reconsidered?—I think so. The complaints have come chiefly from Ireland. 16 Jan. 1906.

1414 (Mr. Loch.) Is it your opinion that the Bastardy Acts, as they stand now, are working satisfactorily, as compared with the Bastardy Acts as they used to be, and which had been so largely reformed before 1832?—I have not any data on which to form an opinion. I have heard it stated that they are not. Bastardy Acts.

1415. That would be rather a question of administration, you think, than for an opinion from a legal point of view?—Yes. I do not know what actual representations have been made to the Local Government Board, but one has seen in the public press and elsewhere that an allegation of unsatisfactory results from the working of the Acts has been made.

1416. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) I should like to ask whether the object of the Bastardy Acts is this: that where the mother of an illegitimate child applies for relief, it is the duty of the guardians then to inquire as to who the father of the child may be?—There is a power to do it.

1417. A power only?—Yes.

1418. Would you say a power which is very often put into operation at the expense of the rates?—Yes, since 1873. That was an amendment of the law introduced by a private member.

1419. (Mr. Loch.) I should like, if possible, that you should submit to the Commission what was the franchise for the election of guardians before the present franchise?—It was very different in the past, and the change of franchise has, by common consent, made great difference in the whole administration of the law, so far as the people to administer it are concerned. It seems to me very desirable that we should have before us, if possible, the older law—that is the law previous to the Local Government Act, 1894—with its obligations and conditions?—The Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, by Sec. 40, provided that, "In all cases of the election of guardians under this Act, or wherever the consent of the owners of property or ratepayers in any parish or union shall be required for any of the purposes of this Act, except when otherwise expressly provided for in this Act, the votes of such owners and ratepayers shall be given or taken in writing, collected and returned in such a manner as the said Commissioners shall direct; and in every such case the owner, as well as the ratepayer, in respect of any property in such parish or union, shall be entitled to vote, and the owner shall have the same number and proportion of votes respectively as is provided for inhabitants and other persons in and by an Act made and passed in the fifty-eighth year of the reign of his said late Majesty King George III, intituled, "an Act for the Regulation of Parish Vestries," and in and by an Act to amend the same, made and passed in the fifty-ninth year of his said late Majesty, and the ratepayers under two hundred pounds shall each have a single vote, and the ratepayers rated at two hundred pounds or more, but under four hundred pounds shall each have two votes; and the ratepayers rated at four hundred pounds or more shall each have three votes; and the majority of the votes of such owners and ratepayers which shall be actually collected and returned shall in every such case be binding on such parish." That was modified in a certain sense by Sec. 14 of the 7 and 8 Vic., c. 101. That section is in these terms: "In all cases in which by the said Act," that is the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, "or by any act amending or extending the same, owners of property and ratepayers are entitled to vote, every owner of property and ratepayer shall have respectively the same number and proportion of votes, according to the scale following (that is to say), if the property in respect of which he is entitled to vote be rated upon a rateable value of less than fifty pounds, he shall have one vote; if such rateable value amount to fifty pounds and be less than one hundred pounds, he shall have two votes; if it amount to one hundred pounds and be less than one hundred and fifty pounds, he shall have three votes; if it Early franchise for election of Guardians.

amount to one hundred and fifty pounds and be less than two hundred pounds, he shall have four votes; if it amount to two hundred pounds and be less than two hundred and fifty pounds, he shall have five votes; and if it amount to or exceed two hundred and fifty pounds, he shall have six votes." In that same statute there were elaborate provisions as to the voting of the owners and their proxies.

1420. May one say practically that the parochial elector now takes the place of the ratepayer?—Yes.

1421. And the property qualifications have all been swept away, so that the owner no longer stands as a voter qua owner?—And plural voting also has gone.

Change in qualifications of Guardians.

1422. With regard to the candidate for the office of guardian, is his qualification altered from what it was before the Local Government Act, 1894?—Certainly.

1423. One further question, which is historical: was not a very careful inquiry made prior to this former arrangement as to how the vestries had acted, and was it not after experience of the method of election that preceded it that this proposal of giving a larger number of votes to the property owner was adopted? I thought Mr. Goode, for instance, had made an inquiry, and that his Report was published in the Report of 1834 or before that?—I do not remember that.

Medical Relief.

Kirkhouse v. Blakeway.

1424. (Mr. Bentham.) With regard to the Medical Relief Disqualification Removal Act, 1885, the judgment you have quoted of Kirkhouse v. Blakeway was decided upon a question of fact, was it not?—Yes.

1425. It did not cover, I think, medical relief which might be given in a workhouse hospital as distinct from a case where a patient might be admitted direct to the hospital and discharged from the hospital, having received nothing but attention to an acute ailment; would such a case come under the Medical Relief Disqualification Removal Act?—It would be left to the revising barrister in each case to decide whether the man did or did not come within it.

Relieving Officers' duty re Voters' Lists.

1426. I take it that it is the duty of the relieving officer to send to the overseers the names of all those who have been in receipt of relief?—Yes.

1427. If the relieving officer fails to do that is he under any penalty?—I think attention has already been drawn to that to-day.

1428. That was the case of the overseers, not the case of the relieving officer?—The relieving officer is also subject to a penalty in certain cases; but I do not think that the power to fine him extends to this particular matter.

1429. With regard to the personal effects of an applicant, I understood you to say, in answer to a question by Mrs. Webb, that the furniture and other effects of the person who is given an order for the workhouse would have to be disposed of in some way?—Yes.

Storing of paupers' property.

1430. I believe it is the practice in some unions to incur expense by storing such things until the pauper is discharged?—I have heard so.

1431. Is such a practice legal?—The question of legality would arise, I suppose, in the event of expense being incurred in consequence of the practice; otherwise if there were vacant store room and no one spent a penny over housing the furniture, and it incommoded no one, the question of the legality would not practically arise.

1432. If the guardians made special provision for storing, would that be legal?—No, that would be ultra vires, certainly.

Reimbursement of relief

1433. With regard to repayments by the relatives of persons who are in receipt of relief or who are inmates of a workhouse, such repayments cannot be enforced after the persons cease to be chargeable, can they?—No.

1434. Then it must be done during the time of the chargeability?—Yes.

Power of detention in Workhouse.

1435. (Mr. Loch.) In regard to the detention of paupers in a workhouse, Sec. 22 of the 30 and 31 Vic., cap. 106, is in these words:—"When there shall be in any workhouse a poor person suffering from mental disease, or from bodily disease of an infectious or contagious character, and the medical officer of such workhouse shall upon examination report in writing that such person is not in a proper state to leave the workhouse without danger to himself or others, the guardians may direct the master to detain such person therein." Does that phrase "mental disease" refer to the insane only? In other words, is mental disease construed to mean a certified lunatic only?—No, not necessarily; it certainly is not limited to a certified lunatic.

1436. Is there no limitation?—I think such limitation as there is arises from the amendment of the Section by the Lunacy Act of 1890. That Act, as I have already pointed out in my evidence, does affect the section in a certain way. That is, Sec. 22 is repealed by the Lunacy Act 1890 except as regards persons suffering from delirium tremens or from bodily disease of a contagious or infectious character. That appears from Section 342 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, and the fifth Schedule to that Act.

1437. Therefore that term "mental disease" goes out from here now?—Except that it refers to people suffering from delirium tremens.

Owners' franchise.

1438. (Sir Samuel Provis.) In reference to the voting of owners at an election of guardians, owners of course can vote now at such an election where they have got the Parliamentary franchise?—Yes, but not on the old scale of voting.

1439. They do vote, but they have only one vote?—The main point that was put to me just now as I understood was the scale of voting; that is the plural voting.

1440. The scale of course has gone entirely, but as regards the class they do still vote?—Yes.

Women as Voters.

1441. (Miss Hill.) Can women who own property vote?—The question, of course, is whether they are included in the separate list of parochial electors.

1442. I thought it was only when they resided within the area that they could vote?—I am not at all familiar with the details of recent decisions on this branch of law.

1443. (Mr. Loch.) The register under which the voting is taken now is called the Register of Parochial Electors, is it not?—Yes.

1444. And the Parliamentary register is considered first of all as part of that Register of Parochial Electors?—Yes.

1445. Under that Parliamentary register comes the owner if he is the owner of a freehold of 40s. and so on?—Yes.

1446. The next section would be the local government or county register, with its extended burgess franchise?—Yes.

1447. And thirdly, there would be the £10 occupation qualification?—Yes.

1448. The owner is on the register of parochial electors on the basis of the Parliamentary register, and not on the basis of the extended burgess franchise nor on the basis of the £10 occupation qualification: that being so, how is it that a woman who cannot vote for Parliament can be a voter under the Parliamentary register as included in the register of parochial electors?—I could not answer that question off-hand.

1449. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Is there not an analogous provision in the English Act to that contained in the similar Act for Scotland which was passed at the same time, namely, that a woman who otherwise possesses the qualification for being registered on any county council register of electors shall not be disqualified by marriage from being registered on the county council or parish council register provided that the husband and the wife shall not both be registered?—That is in the Local Government Act, 1894.

1450. (Chairman.) A note I have before me on page 2186 of Brook-Little's "Poor Law Statutes" confirms Miss Hill:—"A married woman is not qualified as a parochial elector to vote at an election by reason of her ownership of property, there being no ownership qualification for Local Government Electors" Perhaps you would like to look that up?—I now see that the Court of Appeal in the case of Drax v. Ffooks (Law Reports, 1896; 1, Queen's Bench Division, 238) held that a woman whether married or single is not qualified by reason of ownership of property to be a parochial elector.

1451. (Mr. Nunn.) Is it legal for guardians to pay for the conveyance of furniture to a stores in the workhouse if they have proper accommodation?—I should think not.

1452. The guardians have to publish an annual balance sheet, and a statement of accounts; is that compulsory?—I hardly think it is in the sense I suppose you to mean. The financial statement which is now required by statute would be such an account, and there is no obligation actually to publish that. I think the answer should be no.

1453. That they are not bound to do so?—That they are not bound.

1454. But they have a legal right to do so, of course?—They may do so if they wish, but I do not remember any obligation upon them to do so.

1455. With regard to the publication of any report, would it be their report, or would it be the report of the clerk to them; the guardians habitually do publish annual reports and pay for them, do they not?—Yes. I think they do that entirely under the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876. I think they base their authority on that Act.

Mr. R. H. A. G. DUFF (Secretary).
Mr. J. JEFFREY (Assistant Secretary).

Mr. T. PITTS, C.B., called; and Examined.

1456. (Chairman.) Will you state what your post at the Local Government Board has been?—At present, I am one of the assistant secretaries, and I have held that office since the latter part of the year 1897.

1457. One of the departments of the Board which has been under your supervision for a considerable period, I believe, performs, amongst other business, that of collecting and preparing for publication certain statistics as to the number of paupers and the expenditure on Poor Law Relief in England and Wales?—That is so. During the time that I have been an assistant secretary the work of that department has been partly under my supervision.

1458. I understand that you have prepared for the information of the Commission a memorandum respecting the statistics on these subjects?—A memorandum has been prepared in the department referred to; it is being printed and I believe that a rough unrevised proof has been circulated to members of the Commission. It is only the first part of the memorandum, I may say, that has been circulated; and there is much more to follow. The part that has been circulated deals with the statistics of pauperism only, and not with the statistics of expenditure. (For Memorandum, see Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. II.

1459. But to-day, as I understand, you propose to give evidence not only on that part of the memorandum which is in our hands but also on parts which are not in our hands?—Yes; I can give some figures as to the expenditure, although the memorandum has not been circulated in complete form.

1460. Perhaps you will very briefly state what the memorandum contains?—I think I need say very little about the first part, seeing that proofs are in the hands of members of the Commission; I will only say that it requires considerable revision and some correction. Perhaps I ought to say that the statistics referred to are based mainly upon two half-yearly returns as to the number of paupers on a certain day. There is very little information as to the number of paupers relieved during any period; and there is no information as to the number of permanent paupers, nor any information to show how long recipients of relief have remained chargeable. In view of possible questions, I may also say that these statistics do not extend to such matters as the death-rate or the birth-rate in workhouses or other poor law institutions. With regard to the expenditure part of the memorandum, I may say that the statistics that we have on that subject cover a longer period than those relating to the numbers of paupers; information will be found extending as far back as the middle of the eighteenth century. Since the year 1857 the expenditure on poor law relief has been sub-divided, being shown under six principal sub-heads. At the present time, rather fuller details are given as to the total expenditure, though not as to the expenditure of individual boards of guardians. I must also mention some of the limitations in these statistics. The cost of providing and administering particular institutions is not dealt with in the annual returns upon which the statements have been based. There is some information on this subject in half-yearly returns which distinguish between the cost of in maintenance in establishments provided by the guardians, and the cost of maintenance in certain other establishments in which indoor paupers are maintained. For the convenience of the Commission a complete list has been prepared of all returns bearing on the subject of the memorandum, which have been presented to Parliament since the year 1834 (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. II.; a few of these returns will be referred to in the memorandum.

Mr. T. Pitts, C.B.

22 Jan. 1906.

Mr. T. Pitts, C.B.
22 Jan. 1906.

1461. You have just stated that there is no calculation in your memorandum of the number of permanent paupers; is that information available?—I think not, and I think it would be very difficult to obtain it—at any rate, the Local Government Board have not got it.

1462. The cost of administering certain institutions is also omitted; is that information available?—No, it is not available, but we could get out information as to certain groups of institutions from the half-yearly returns. At present, the only information that has been published on this subject is that which I have mentioned.

Local Government Board's power to call for returns.

1463. Have the Local Government Board the power of asking for any returns that they may wish to demand from the local authorities?—They have practically power to call upon the clerks to the guardians to furnish any information relating to the business of the guardians that they may require.

1464. Their powers are not confined to obtaining certain specified returns, but they have, practically, the power of asking for any return they may wish, is that it?—I think so.

Variations in numbers of paupers since 1849.

1465. Can you give us some figures now, showing how the numbers of persons in receipt of Poor Law relief have varied during the period to which your tables relate?—Table No. 1 in Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. II. (B) gives for each year from 1849 (when the returns were first obtained) to 1905, the total number of paupers of all classes in England and Wales on the 1st January. It will be seen that the number on January 1, 1905, was 932,000. It had been as high as 1,142,000 in the year 1863; but that was an exceptional year on account of the distress in the cotton manufacturing districts; and I may say with regard to that year that the figures are not complete as they do not relate to the whole country. The returns then were not obtained from the whole country, as a certain part of the country had not been formed into unions under the Poor Law Amendment Act, and returns were not obtained from those places which were not unions formed under that Act.

1466. But was an estimate made for the districts which were not included on the average of the districts which were included?—Yes, but that estimate has not been used in the memorandum; the actual figures furnished in the returns received have been taken.

1467. So that it is less than the actual in that case?—Yes, it is.

1468. Do these figures include pauper lunatics?—Yes, they include paupers of all classes.

The lowest number in the table is that for the year 1877, when the number fell to 732,000. The actual lowest number that we have in any of the returns, is the number on the 1st July in the year 1876—that is six months earlier—when the number was 707,000. That figure is not given in the table; the table relates only to the numbers on the 1st January. There is also a half-yearly statement relating to the 1st July in each year, and according to that return the numbers are nearly always smaller than according to the return relating to the 1st January in each year.

Proportion of paupers to population.

I should not leave this subject perhaps without mentioning the proportion of paupers to population. In 1849 the number of paupers, which was 933,000, was in proportion to the population as 63 to 1,000, that is to say, 63 per 1,000 of the population were paupers according to the returns relating to the year 1849. In 1863, the year which I have already mentioned, and the year for which the figures were incomplete—a point which is not so important when one is taking the proportion to population because the population of the incomplete area is used—the proportion was 56·6 per 1,000 of population. The lowest proportion to population was reached in the year 1901 when it was 24·8 per 1,000. The number has not been above 30 per 1,000 since the year 1883, and on 1st January, 1905, it was 27·6 per 1,000. I have given the proportions based upon the numbers on the 1st January and the estimated population in each year. The tables in the annual reports of the Local Government Board containing similar figures, have been based upon what have been called mean numbers, that is to say, the average of the numbers on the two days in the year to which the returns relate, namely, the 1st January and the 1st July. We have not been able to have all those figures recalculated, but the difference is not very material in the case of those examples which I have given.

1469. (Mr. Lock.) Those figures for the 1st January and the 1st July which you published in your serial statements at the Local Government Board, are actual figures are they not?—Yes, they are; they give the numbers for each of those days, the 1st January and the 1st July. I was for the moment referring to the mean numbers in another table.

Explanation of "mean" number of paupers.

1470. (Professor Smart.) Would you explain what is the mean average number which you take?—The number on the 1st January and the number on the 1st July are added together and the total is divided by two. The mean number has been calculated in this way for many years.

Variation in figures during year 1904–5.

1471–2. (Chairman.) Can you show how the number of persons in receipt of relief varies in the course of a year?—That is shown by the Tables Nos. 4 to 7 in Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. II. (B), relating to the two years, 1904 and 1905. These figures, it will be observed, relate to the calendar year from January to December, and they exclude the insane in county and borough asylums and private asylums, and also the casual paupers. In 1904, taking the figures for England and Wales, the lowest number was 726,000 in July, and the highest 828,000 in December. The numbers varied by about 101,000 during the year, that is to say, the difference between the figures for July and December is about 101,000. Taking 1905 for England and Wales also, the lowest number was 749,000 in the middle of July, and the highest 823,000 at the end of January; the difference between the two numbers being 74,000. The numbers were above 800,000 in January, February, March and December, and they were between 749,000 and 800,000 during the remainder of the year. Averages might be worked out on these figures, but it has not been the practice to calculate such averages.

1473. (Chairman.) Are those fluctuations which you have brought to our notice abnormally large?—I think they were in the year 1904. I have not had the calculations made for previous years, but speaking without the figures, I should say that they were abnormally large in that year.

Paupers relieved in the course of a given period.

1474. Do you make any use of the returns as to the total number of persons relieved in the course of a year or half-year?—In answering that question I will first mention what returns of this nature have been obtained. There is some reference to the matter in the memorandum, but I will give the details now. There was a return relating to a whole year—the year ended Lady Day, 1892—a return obtained on the motion of the late Lord Ritchie, who was then President of the Local Government Board. That is the only one that I can find which related to a whole year. Then there was a return of the kind for the half-year ended Lady Day, 1881.

Mr. Ritchie's return.

Mr. Holland's return.

1475. (Mr. Lock.) Which return is that?—It was a returned obtained on the motion of Mr. Holland. There were also three or four returns for certain half-years from 1850 to 1857. There had been returns relating to quarters (the quarters in each case ending at Lady Day) for a period of eight or nine years preceding the year 1848. Practically, no use has been made of these returns in any recent statistics of the Local Government Board as to the number of paupers. The series relating to quarters of the year were only useful, if they were of any use at all, in showing how the rate of pauperism to population varied from year to year. They were the first returns obtained by the Poor Law Commissioners; they preceded the returns relating to two days in the year, to which I have already referred, and they were practically dropped in favour of those returns. The Commissioners said that these quarterly returns were of little value, except to the extent that I mentioned just now; for one reason they included vagrants, and consequently if a vagrant happened to walk from one workhouse to another every day, he would be counted perhaps 90 times in the quarter. Moreover, it was admitted that any person becoming chargeable more than once in the quarter was probably counted as many times as he or she became chargeable; no attempt seems to have been made to exclude people who were entered more than once in the books.

Unreliability of quarterly returns.

1476. (Mr. Bentham.) Was the quarterly return based on an average?—No, I think the actual numbers were given in it. I have here a table (see remarks in paragraph 21 of memorandum) which shows that there was a total number giving in 1840 a rate of 77 per 1,000 of population; and in 1848 a rate of 108 per 1,000 of population. We find that on January 1st, 1849, when the first return for that day of the year was obtained, the proportion to the population of the number of paupers was 63 per 1,000, and that the proportion fell in the next year and in succeeding years, so, although the quarterly returns showed that pauperism was increasing, directly the half-yearly day returns were obtained, it was shown that pauperism was decreasing. I am afraid that the figures in those quarterly returns are of very little use.

1477. (Mr. Loch.) But the figures in the day returns are of use?—Certainly Number of in-door paupers over series of years.

1478. (Chairman.) Will you give particulars with respect to the different classes of paupers; for instance, persons receiving in-door and persons receiving out-door relief, respectively?—Yes. The figures that I will now give are mean numbers, mean numbers being, as I explained just now, the average for two days in the year. In the year ended Lady Day, 1905, the mean number of in-door paupers (excluding lunatics in asylums) was 253,000; that is the highest number shown by the returns obtained since the year 1848–49.

In the year 1873–74, that is, the year ended Lady Day, 1874, that being a year in which the figures were complete, the number was 143,000. The number was about the same in the year 1875–76. These are the lowest figures that have been reached; since then, there has been an almost continuous rise. In 1871–72, the first year for which the figures are complete, the number was 149,000. In 1904–05 the mean number of out-door paupers, excluding casual paupers and the insane, was 542,000. In 1848–49, the first year for which these figures can be given, but for which, as I have before mentioned, the figures are incomplete, the number was 777,000. It was considerably higher in the year 1862–63 when, as I have already mentioned, there was distress in the cotton manufacturing districts of Lancashire and other counties. In 1900–01 the number of out-door paupers reached its lowest limit namely, 489,000. In the year 1871–72 the number was 791,000.

Number of out-door paupers over a series of years.

1480. (Mr. Phelps.) I do not think you gave the figure for 1862–63, what was it?—It was 871,000.

1481. (Miss Hill.) Is that the figure for the in-door poor or for the out-door poor?—It is for the out-door poor.

Proportion of in-door paupers to population.

Taking the proportion to population it appears that in 1904-05 the in-door paupers were 7·5 per 1,000 of population—about the same as the proportion of the same class in the year 1848–49 for which the figures are incomplete; but the proportion in that year is worked on the population of the area to which the figures related.

1482. (Chairman.) Then it is not an estimate?—I think it is not. The number given in the table is the actual number in the area to which the returns related; and that number, compared with the actual population of the same area, gives a proportion of 7·4 per 1,000, of population.

1483. (Miss Hill.) Then that last percentage does not relate to the whole of England and Wales?—Neither the total number nor the calculation on the population relates to the whole of England and Wales.

1484. (Mr. Loch.) Is it a very substantial part of England and Wales that was left out?—In 1849 it represented 16 per cent. of the population.

In 1858–59 the proportion of in-door paupers to population was 6·1 per 1,000.

Proportion of out-door paupers to population.

1485. (Miss Hill.) Does that figure relate to the whole of England and Wales?—No; the complete figures are not reached until 1872.

From 1882–83 to 1894–95 inclusive, the proportion varied from 6·4 to 6·9 per 1,000. In the case of the out-door paupers the proportion to population was highest in 1848–49, the first year, when it was 52·7 per 1,000.

1486. (Chairman.) That will be upon the same basis as the indoor figures for the year?—Yes, it is calculated on the mean number and the estimated population. In the four years from 1900–01 to 1903–04, the figures reached their lowest point, namely, 15·3 per 1,000 of population. The proportion to population of the out-door paupers has not been above 30 per 1,000 since 1872–73, and it has not been above 20 per 1,000 since 1886–87. I perhaps should mention that the figures which I have given include all members of the paupers' families; and that may possibly affect the comparisons slightly.

1487. Are you not sure whether the figures of earlier dates did include all the members of the family?—I think they did, but we do not know whether the proportion of children per family was the same in the earlier years as it is now.

1488. I do not think you gave us the figure of out-door relief for 1904–05?—The figure is 16·1 per 1,000: that is the proportion to the estimated population in England and Wales of the out-door paupers, excluding casual paupers and the insane.

1489. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) I do not think I quite understand your answer about the proportion of children in the earlier tables?—I meant that the average number of children in a family might not have been the same then as now.

Dependants included in figures of pauperism.

1490. (Mr. Booth.) But the figures you have been able to give us are actual and not imaginary?—They are actual, that is to say, if a man who has only one child depending upon him seeks relief the entry in the returns is of the man and his child, counting two; and if a man with a wife and six children seeks relief then the returns show eight persons as receiving relief, namely, the man, his wife, and the six children. One case in the one instance counts eight and in the other it counts two.

1491. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Apparently the returns do not discriminate between the pauper who is head of the family, that is the father, and his dependants, who would be his wife and children?—As I shall explain presently, they have not done so until within the last few years Able-bodied paupers.

1492. (Chairman.) The returns on which the tables are based distinguish the paupers classed as "able-bodied" from those who are not, I think?—That is so. The able-bodied as a class have been distinguished in the half-yearly returns since those returns were first started in the year 1848. On 1st January, 1905, the total number of able-bodied was 132,000, representing 3·9 per 1,000 of the population. This number was 20,000 larger than the number of the same class on the preceding 1st January. Taking the incomplete figures for 1st January, 1849 (that being the first year) the number was 199,000, representing 13·5 per 1,000 of population. This is the highest figure on record with the exception of that for the year 1863, when the number reached 253,000, representing a proportion of 12·4 per 1,000 of population, which it will be observed was lower than the proportion in the year 1849. The lowest number of this class of pauper on any 1st of January to which the returns relate was reached in 1877, when the proportion to population was 3·8 per 1,000. I have already mentioned when the proportion to population was highest, namely, in 1849; it was lowest in 1901 when it was 3·0 per 1,000 of the population. The proportion has not been above 4 per 1,000 on any 1st of January since the year 1882.

Meaning of able-bodied.

1493. (Mr. Loch.) By "able-bodied" do you mean able-bodied men with their wives and children?—No, the term "able-bodied" does not include children.

1494. Does it include the wife?—Yes. Some of the figures given in the returns include the wife, even when she is not herself "able-bodied."

1495. Then at present we are not dealing solely with males who are able-bodied?—No; I am about to tell you the number of men. On 1st January, 1905, the number which I have given included 51,000 men; on 1st January, 1849, the number of men was 65,000; in 1863 it was 82,000; and in 1877, when the lowest figure for any 1st of January was reached, it was 20,000. A table on page xix of the Return of Pauperism on 1st January, 1905,

Number of able-bodied men.

Mr. T. Pitts, C.B.

22 Jan. 1906.

shows how many of the able-bodied men relieved were relieved for causes other than their own sickness, accident or infirmity. It will be observed that the proportion of these on 1st January, 1905, was 9 per 1,000. According to the return to which I have just referred, the number of not able-bodied adults, exclusive of the insane, was 428,000 on 1st January, 1905. On that day the able-bodied adults, men and women, together formed 6 per 1,000 of the adult male and female population; and the not able-bodied adults, men and women, together formed 19·3 per 1,000 of the adult male and female population.

Proportion of able-bodied adults.

Definition of able-bodied.

1456. (Chairman.) Has the definition "able-bodied" during this period been the same, or has it been altered?—I think on that point I cannot do better than refer to what is said in the memorandum. In paragraph 43 it is stated that "The term 'able-bodied' has never, so far as can be ascertained, been officially defined in the Orders of the Poor Law Commissioners or the Poor Law Board or in the forms of the returns issued by them." Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. II. (A) contains an extract from the twenty-second annual report of the Poor Law Board; and it is understood that in the preparation of the returns the clerks to the guardians have had regard to the observations in that report. There is no further information on the subject.

1497. Then you would take the returns made by the clerks to the Poor Law Guardians?—Certainly.

1498. Have you anything to make you believe that there is much difference in the interpretation or the application of the interpretation of "able-bodied" in the different unions?—Dealing only with the returns, I am afraid I cannot say.

1499. Nothing has come to your knowledge that would make you think that there is any considerable discrepancy in the different unions?—Officially, in connection with the returns I know of nothing of the kind.

1500. Now, I think you wish to deal with the children?—Yes.

Number of children.

1501. Are these the children of the able-bodied?—No, they are all the children; and "children" according to the returns are all persons under sixteen. On 1st January, 1905, there were 247,000 of these; that number was higher than on the corresponding day in any other recent year since 1894, when it was about the same. The number includes 59,000 classed as in-door paupers, and 188,000 classed as out-door paupers. These numbers, I should say, exclude insane and casual paupers. On 1st January, 1849, the total number, according to the incomplete returns, was 378,000, of whom 328,000 were receiving out-door relief. On 1st January 1902, the number was as low as 212,000, including 159,000 in receipt of out-door relief.

1502. (Mr. Phelps.) Where do the boarded-out children come in?—They are included under the head of out-door relief. There is a table on page xvii of the Parliamentary Return relating to 1st January, 1905, which gives information that I think may be of value with regard to the proportion of children to other paupers on 1st January in certain years from 1877 to 1905. It will be observed that the proportion has been falling. The Commission may also like to have particulars as to the distribution of the children in different establishments, and as to the numbers boarded out, and I will hand in statements giving those particulars. (See Tables Nos. 15 and 16 in Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. II. (B).) I think there are some tables as to the education of the children showing the numbers in district schools and otherwise educated in earlier years, but they were not prepared in the department from which my figures have been supplied.

Proportion of children to other paupers

Fluctuations in number of children in the year.

1503. (Chairman.) You have pointed out to the Commission the fluctuations in the numbers of paupers in the year; are the fluctuations in the numbers of children similar?—We have no information on that. The weekly returns on which Tables Nos. 4–7 in Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. II. (B) have been prepared relate only to the two main classes of paupers—in-door and out-door paupers; and in them neither women nor children are distinguished.

1504. Assuming there were a considerable number of heads of families with children receiving out-door relief, then the children would form a proportion of the reduction shown in paupers?—Yes. I think that copies of the forms on which the weekly returns are obtained have been circulated to the members of the Commission. They do not provide for the number of children being shown except in the case of London.

Statistics to pau lunatics.

1505. Is any other principal class of paupers distinguished in the returns?—There are the insane in county and borough asylums and in private asylums; of these there were on 1st January, 1905, 83,000, which is the highest figure that has been reached. The numbers have continually grown from year to year. In the last twenty years this class has increased from 46,000 to the number that I just now gave. On 1st January, 1905, 18,000 insane were classed as in-door paupers, that is to say, they were either in workhouses or in the asylums of the Metropolitan Asylums Board. The number of lunatics so classed has only very slightly varied during the past thirty years, that is to say, the number in the county and borough asylums has continually grown, whilst the number retained in the institutions of the guardians has remained almost stationary. I should also mention the casual paupers, who are not a very numerous class. On 1st January, 1905, the number was 17,000 which was the highest number that has been reached. On 1st January, 1859, according to the incomplete returns, the number was 2,100; and on 1st July, 1853 (another incomplete return), the number was 1,300. This is the lowest number that we have on record.

Statistics to "casu paupers.

1506. (Mr. Loch.) Can the word "casual" be taken as equivalent to the word "vagrant"?—Yes.

1507. It is the modern equivalent for vagrant, is it?—I think it has always been the term used in the Regulations of the Department.

1508. In the earlier returns the word vagrant is used—Yes, but that did not agree with the official name.

1509. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) Have you the return for July, 1905?—I have not one with me, but the return has been issued.

1510. Would the figure be greater in the summer?—I think the numbers are nearly always smaller in the summer.

Statistics to ages paupers.

1511. (Chairman.) Now, I think we come to the ages; will you state briefly the general result of the returns which you have obtained showing the ages of the persons who are in receipt of relief?—Generally the returns have not distinguished paupers of different ages except to the extent that I have already mentioned, that is that the children under sixteen have been separately shown. In recent years some returns as to the numbers of paupers over sixty or over sixty-five years of age have been obtained; and particulars of these will be found in one of the tables prepared for the Commission. The last return of the kind was return No. 113 of session 1904; that was a return presented to the House of Commons on the motion of Mr. Burt. It showed the numbers on the 1st September, 1903. On that date, according to this return, out of the total number of paupers over sixteen years of age, exclusive of paupers only constructively relieved, 58 per cent. were sixty-five years of age or upwards, and 69 per cent. were sixty years of age or upwards.

Mr. Burt's return.

1512. Is that taking in-door and out-door relief together?—Yes. A table printed with the return to which I have referred shows that, taking the five years to which the returns on this subject related, or rather the five days—for the returns relate to a particular day in each year—from 18 per cent. to 19 per cent. of the population of sixty-five years of age and upwards were paupers.

1513. You have not any figures of the same kind for an earlier date, have you, because it would be interesting to see whether the proportion of old paupers has increased?—The earliest return was obtained in the year 1890, and we have no figures of this kind for any previous year. There was a Parliamentary return in the year 1892—the late Lord Ritchie's return, to which I have already referred—and that related to the numbers who were sixty-five years of age and upwards. The proportion of those paupers to the total number of paupers of sixteen years of age and upwards according to that return was 56·9 per cent. That return related to 1st January, 1892, and it excluded casual paupers. I have already given the number for 1st September, 1903, which was 58 per cent. It must be borne in mind that the two returns relate to different periods of the year.

Mr. Ritch return.

1514. Would the figure be a higher one in January than in September?—I am not quite sure that it would be so, because most of the old people may be permanent paupers: at any rate the number is actually lower according to the returns, being 56·9 as against 58·0 per cent. There will be a table in the appendix to the memorandum giving some further details on this subject. (See Table No. 17 in Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. II. (B).)

1515. Does that finish what you wish to say to us on that subject?—I think that is all I need say now, because there will be attached to the memorandum a table on the subject.

tribution pauperism ween ropolitan, an and al Unions

1516. You have now given us the figures relating to the whole country; I think you wish also to give us some separate statistics relating to London?—There will be tables relating to London separately. (See Tables Nos. 3, 5, 7, 8, and 10 in Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. II. (B).)

1517. You also propose, I think, to give particulars in a separate return as regards the urban unions outside London?—Yes, as regards a group of urban districts and a group of rural districts. (See Table No. 13 of Appendix Vol. I. (A). No. II. (B).)

1518. The urban unions outside London as to which you are going to give us particulars would be not merely those contiguous to London, but all outside London, I take it?—The grouping is this: We take all the London unions as one group; then as another group all the other unions in England and Wales that are wholly urban, that is to say, unions which have no part that forms a rural district, but consist entirely of urban districts; there are fifty-nine of those. Then there are 114 unions that are wholly rural, that is to say, no part of the union is included in an urban district. The figures that I have before me have been based upon those groups of unions.

1519. Is there not another group?—There is an intermediate one containing unions partly urban and partly rural.

1520. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) How many unions are there which are partly rural and partly urban?—There are 441. With regard to the particulars relating to London, I think I need hardly give the figures, as they will be set out in a table appended to the memorandum. (See Table No. 3 in Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. II. (B).) I will merely give the proportions. During the past twelve years the proportion of paupers to population in London has been higher than it has been in the rest of the country. Previously to that period the proportion had always been lower in London than it was in the rest of the country except in the years from 1867 to 1871. There will be tables showing how the proportions of in-door to out-door paupers have differed in London and in England and Wales, in a series of years. (See Tables Nos. 10 and 13 of Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. II. (B).)

centage of perism to ulation in ndon and of the ntry.

1521. (Chairman.) The figures that you propose to hand in are, I understand, averages of groups of Poor Law unions; can you tell us what is the highest and the lowest proportion of paupers to population in individual unions?—I have before me a statement which has been taken from the return relating to January 1st, 1902. (See Table No. 14 in Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. II. (B).) The proportions were worked out for that year because the return was the first one issued after the publication of the results of the census of 1901. The percentage of pauperism to population in England and Wales was 2·5 on January 1st, 1902, and in London it was 2·8. There were several unions in which the percentage was 5 and upwards, and there were some in which it was over 6; on the other hand there were several below 2·5 per cent. I think these figures may be sufficient to show that the proportion varies largely in different unions.

1522. (Mr. Bentham.) Will those figures be given in the returns separately?—Yes.

1523. (Chairman.) Do you propose to hand those returns in?—Yes. (See Table No. 14 in Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. II. (B).

1524 Are they classified according to the percentage?—Yes.

1525. Have you any general remarks to add with regard to the statistics respecting the number of paupers?—I think that for further details I had better refer to the return for January 1st, 1905, which contains figures on a number of matters that I have not mentioned. An index has been prepared to that return for the convenience of the Commission, and I believe it will be circulated with copies of the return. I hope to be able to let the Commission have a statement with regard to the number of paupers who have received medical relief; that will be prepared from some special returns that have been obtained from time to time. (See Table No. 19 in Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. II. (B).)

Mr. T. Pitts, C.B.

22 Jan. 1906

Numbers in receipt of medical relief.

1526. In paragraph 27 of your memorandum you say it is estimated that 2,000,000 persons have received relief in the course of the year 1905; are you there including medical relief?—That estimate is not put forward with any confidence, but I can tell you how the figure was arried at.

Estimated numbers receiving relief during 1905.

1527. It is such a very big figure that I think it would interest the Commission to know how you have arrived at it?—The total number of paupers relieved on January 1, 1905, according to the Parliamentary return, was 932,000; from that we deduct the casual paupers and the lunatics in county and borough asylums and private asylums, and thus get the number 830,900. On January 1, 1892, the number of paupers, exclusive of casual paupers and lunatics, was 700,700. According to the return relating to the year ended Lady Day, 1892, the total number of persons relieved in that year was 1,573,000; the number of the same class of paupers on January 1, 1892, being 700,700 and the number on January 1, 1905, being 830,900, it is calculated that during the year ended Lady Day, 1905, the number relieved was 1,865,000. It has been assumed that the proportion to the number on one day was the same in 1904–5 as it was in 1891–92; but whether it was so or not I am unable to say. Then we add to the 1,865,000 the number of lunatics and casual paupers on January 1, 1905, which has already been deducted from the 932,000, and the result is a total number of 1,966,000. That, in the memorandum, is referred to as "something not far short of 2,000,000 persons."

1528. A large proportion of those would be paupers only in the sense of receiving medical relief?—Quite so.

1529. And they would not therefore be subject to disqualifications, assuming their names were on the register as voters?—That is so.

Returns as to number of persons receiving relief in a given period.

1530. (Mr. Bentham.) Are we to take it that the return for 1892 was a special return?—Yes, it was.

1531. And it gave the number of distinct and separate persons actually relieved during the course of the year?—Yes, this is during the year ended Lady Day, 1892.

1532. Are there many returns of that kind for other years?—There was one, as I mentioned just now, in 1881, which related to the half year. There has been only one such return relating to a whole year.

1533. Are there no returns made of the actual number of persons who have received relief during the course of a year?—No return of the kind has been obtained since that of 1892.

1534. (Mr. Booth.) Were those relieved medically out-doors included in the return?—There was no direction that they should be excluded.

1535. (Mr. Loch.) Then the presumption is that they are included?—Yes, except that we found, as mentioned in the memorandum, that some of the clerks to the guardians had excluded these medical relief cases from the weekly returns. I think it is more likely that all such cases were included in the special return for the year ended Lady Day, 1892.

1536. Taking the medical relief by itself, I think the difference comes to an item of about 200,000 persons as the number relieved in the period?—I have not the figures before me.

1537. (Chairman.) Assuming that your calculation is correct, then the number of persons in receipt of relief during the year largely exceeds the total number of persons returned as out-door and in-door paupers?—Yes. There are no doubt a number who receive relief for a short period, perhaps for a week only. We cannot distinguish the number who were in receipt of relief throughout the whole year from those who received relief during parts of the year.

Estimated numbers receiving relief during 1905.

Mr. T. Pitts, C.B.

22 Jan. 1906.

1538. What strikes me is the very large figure of 2,000,000. We have here the total number of paupers, which in 1905 comes to 932,000; the difference between that and the 2,000,000 I assume may consist of persons who have received medical relief and no other form of relief?—I am not prepared to say that.

1539. (Mr. Bentham.) A person who has been in receipt of relief, say in January, and is off the books in February, and is on again in March and off again the following month, may be on half a dozen times during the year?—Quite so.

1540. That person of course ought to count once only?—Yes.

1541. But if he were put down separately each time he would be counted six times?—Yes, but the instructions given to the clerks to the guardians when this return was prepared were that in such a case the same person should be counted only once. Whether that instruction was fully carried out by the clerks to the guardians is another matter. That was the instruction given to them, but we have some reason to think that it was not fully carried out in all cases.

1542. (Chairman.) That, I think, finishes your evidence as regards the statistics relating to the number of paupers; and now therefore we come to the statistics relating to the expenditure on the relief of the poor. Would you state the total cost according to the latest returns, and show how it compares with the total cost in previous years?—The total expenditure in the year 1903-04 (being the latest year for which the figures can be given) was £13,369,000. That is the highest figure that has been reached. There has been a continuous rise each year since 1888-89, when the amount was £8,366,000. From 1879-80 to 1889-90 the expenditure varied from £8,000,000 to £8,500,000 per annum. It was £8,000,000 in the first of these years, 1879-80. In 1871-72 the amount was £8,000,000; and in all other years from 1867-68 to 1878-79 the amount varied from £7,300,000 to rather less than £7,900,000 a year. From 1842-43 to 1866-67 the annual expenditure ranged from £4,900,000 to £6,900,000, the highest figure being in the last mentioned year. The increase in the year 1903-4 as compared with the other years that I have mentioned was greater than the figures I have given would indicate, because the expenditure of the Metropolitan Asylums Board on fever and small-pox hospitals is included in the figures for the years from 1870-71 to 1899-1900 inclusive, while it has been excluded from the figures for later years. Besides, it is possible that the figures given for the years preceding 1882-83 include a certain amount of expenditure out of loans; all such expenditure has been expressly excluded since 1882-83 from the figures I have given you. I may say that the expenditure of the Metropolitan Asylums Board on the fever and small-pox hospitals in the year 1900-01 was estimated to be £570,600; the exclusion of these figures has made a material difference in the comparisons between that year 1900-01 and earlier years. (See Table No. 1 in Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. II. (C).

Variations in expenditure between 1842-3 and 1903-4.

1543. Since what year did you say the loans were excluded altogether?—Since 1882-83.

1544. The first date you gave us was, I think, 1888-89? The first you mentioned was 1903-04, 1888-89, was the next.—There have been other breaks in the continuity of these figures, and where those breaks have occurred spaces will be left in the printed tables so as to draw attention to the fact that the figures for the last year before the space are not strictly comparable with the figures for the first year after the space.

Expenditure classified.

1545. Now will you classify this expenditure?—Since the year 1856-57 the expenditure on the relief of the poor has been classified under six principal headings, and all the published returns since that period have so separated the expenditure. These headings are, firstly, in-maintenance, which I may say is not the same thing as in-door relief; in-maintenance represents only a small part of the cost of in-door relief. The second principal sub-heading is out-relief; the third, maintenance of lunatics in county and borough asylums, registered hospitals and licensed houses; the fourth, salaries and superannuation allowances of union officers; the fifth, principal of loans repaid and interest on loans; and the sixth, other expenses of, or immediately connected with, relief. In 1903-04, the last year for which we have received all the figures, the amount under the first head, in-maintenance, was £3,050,000; under the second head, out-relief £2,990,000; under the third head, maintenance of lunatics in county and borough asylums and private asylums £2,286,000; under the fourth head, salaries and pensions, £2,358,000; under the fifth head, loan charges, £1,098,000; and under the sixth and final head, other expenses £1,580,000. (See Tables Nos. 2 and 5 of Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. II. (C).)

Expenditure on in-door and out-door relief.

1546. Can you show the Commission how the expenditure on in-door relief has been ascertained?—I have just mentioned that the classification according to the returns has been between in-maintenance and out-relief, and not between in-door relief and out-relief. The cost of in-door relief cannot be given for years before 1899-1900; since then the clerks to the guardians, in furnishing the returns, have been required to give particulars from which the amount actually charged to in-door relief and out-relief, respectively, may as far as possible be obtained. We find that in 1903-4 the cost of in-door relief was £6,900,000, being 52 per cent. of the whole expenditure, on the relief of the poor and that the expenditure on out-relief was £3,500,000, being 26 per cent. of the whole expenditure. The relief of the insane in county and borough asylums and private asylums accounted for another 17 per cent. The remainder unaccounted for, which probably consists largely of establishment charges which cannot be apportioned between the in-door and out relief and cost of the insane, is under 5 per cent. (See Table No. 6 in Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. II. (C).)

1547. (Miss Hill.) Where do the loans come in?—The loan charges are distributed, those for in-door relief being apportioned to in-door relief. They are mostly for in-door relief, a very small proportion being for out relief.

1548. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Does the last item, the 5 per cent., include salaries?—The salaries are distributed as far as possible, but I think the salary of the clerk to the guardians would be in the last item, because he is not an out-relief officer nor an in-door relief officer exclusively. The salaries of the relieving officers would be out-relief expenditure and the salaries of the masters of workhouses in-door relief expenditure.

1549. (Mr. Loch.) The practical result of it is to distribute your columns 4, 5 and 6 in your statement, the statement referred to being that in the Annual Report of the Local Government Board of the principal items over columns 1 and 2?—That is so.

1550. (Chairman.) Does that finish what you have to say about classification?—That is all I think I need say as to in-door and out-relief expenditure. I proposed to say something as to the growth of expenditure on in-maintenance and other items.

Fluctuation in expenditure on out-relief.

1551. Perhaps you will give us some information as to that?—I will deal first with out-relief, because that is an item in which there has been a decrease in the expenditure. In the year 1841-42 the expenditure on this item was £3,090,000; in 1856-57, that being the first year in which the classification under six principal headings was adopted, the amount was £3,152,000. (See Table No. 2 in Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. II. (C).)

1552. (Sir Henry Robinson.) Does that include the cost of the children boarded out?—I do not think there were any such in those days.

1553. Does any figure of total out-door relief expenditure include the cost of the children boarded out?—The figures I gave just now for 1903-04 include the cost of the boarded-out children, but I do not know that there were any boarded-out children in 1841 or in 1856.

In 1868-69 the highest point was reached in the expenditure on out-relief. In that year it was £3,677,000. From 1856-57 until 1874-75 the expenditure on out-relief only fell below £3,000,000 (and then only slightly) in the years 1858-59 and 1859-60; in 1892-93 it fell to £2,370,000, but in 1903-04 (I have already given you the figure), the amount was £620,000 more than it was in 1892-93. (See Table No. 2 in Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. II. (C).)

Increased cost of in-maintenance.

1554. (Chairman.) What have you to tell us about the expenditure under the other sub-heads?—The expenditure under each of the other five sub-heads has increased largely in the period from 1856-57 to 1903-4, the item of in-maintenance showing the largest increase. The increase in that item during the whole period amounts to £1,962,000. At the beginning of the period it was £1,088,000, and up to 1890-91 the total did not reach £2,000,000; there was an increase of £863,000 in thirty-four years. In the last thirteen years the increase has amounted to £1,100,000, or an average of £84,000 a year. (See Table No. 2 in Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. II. (C).)

inition of nainten-e.

1555. Would you give as a definition of in-maintenance ?—I will quote the definition as given in the last annual report of the local government board :—" 'In-maintenance' comprises all the expenses incurred by boards of guardians, by the managers of the Metropolitan Asylum District and of other asylum and school districts, and by Poor Law joint committees, in and about the maintenance, treatment and relief of paupers in workhouses and other Poor Law institutions, exclusive of the cost of buildings and repairs thereto, and furniture, and the salaries or other remuneration, rations and superannuation allowances of officers and servants, but inclusive of charges for apprentice fees, outfits, burials, and the necessary expenses incurred in warming, cleansing and lighting the institutions, and otherwise keeping them fit for daily use. The cost of maintenance of the casual paupers in casual wards is also included under this head." That definition will be set out in the memorandum which is being printed. (See paragraph 92 of Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. II.)

1556. (Mr. Gardiner.) Would that include the cost of infirmaries ?—Certainly ; it includes the cost in all Poor Law institutions.

reased of main-ance of atics in lums.

1557. (Chairman.) And it is on this series of charges that there has been this annual increase of £84,000 during the last thirteen years ?—Yes. I will now go on to give some figures with regard to the maintenance of lunatics in county and borough asylums and private asylums. There has been a very large increase in this item also, but that has been accompanied by a large increase in the number of lunatics. Since 1856–57 the increase has been £1,900,000. In that year the total expenditure was only £377,000, the average increase during that period being over £40,000 a year. During the past thirteen years the total increase has been rather over a million pounds, being at the rate of £77,000 a year. That increase is not wholly accounted for by the increase in the number of lunatics. (See Table No. 2 in Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. II. (B).) The expenditure per lunatic in the year 1889–90 was £23 11s, and in the year 1904–5 it was £27 17s. Since 1860 the cost has increased 456 per cent. and the number has increased 383 per cent.

1558. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) May I ask whether the increase in lunatics is spread over the whole country or whether it is confined to certain districts ?—I should not like to answer that question without further investigation.

1559. (Mr. Booth.) Is not the increase partly a change from their having been treated in workhouses ? Are there not a certain number of lunatics who have always been taken care of, not in separate asylums, whereas this return, I take it, refers to separate asylums ?—The figures that I have given relate only to the cost of maintaining the lunatics in asylums.

1560. Therefore the increase in the numbers is not entirely due to increase of lunacy, but is partly due to their being dealt with in a different way ?—I think not. As I said in replying to a previous question, the number of lunatics in workhouses has scarcely varied during the period to which these figures relate.

natics in-ded in fig-s as to ss pauper-

1561. (Mr. Loch.) When we take the gross numbers of paupers do we not include really a very large number who are outside the workhouses and who very much affect our totals—this large increase of lunatics for instance ?—Yes, the total number of paupers on the 1st January, 1905, includes 83,800 lunatics in asylums.

1562. All those that you were mentioning just now ?—Quite so ; and in 1860 the number was 17,000.

1563. And that is an enormous factor in the gross total of pauperism ?—It is a considerable factor. We endeavour as far as possible to distinguish the number of these lunatics from all other classes of paupers. Formerly they were grouped with out-door paupers, but during the last few years the Local Government Board have discontinued that grouping, which was rather misleading. I have now to deal with the salaries. The increase in salaries since 1856-57 amounts to £1,721,000, the total being in the first year £637,000, and that having grown to the figure I gave before, namely, £2,358,000. (See Table No. 2 in Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. II. (C).) reased of aries.

ct of erannua-Act.

1564. That is largely due to the Superannuation Act, is it not, because the superannuation is under the salaries column ?—The salaries column includes superannuation, but I am not sure which Superannuation Act you mean.

1565. I mean the Act of 1896 ?—If you will put a question to me on that point afterwards I shall be better prepared for it ; I must have the figures analysed. The greater part of this increase has taken place since 1888–89. In the fifteen years since that period it has grown to just under £1,000,000, showing an average of £66,000 a year. The Loan Charges (item No. 5) have increased since the same date, 1856–57, by £881,000. They were £217,000 in the first year, and the average increase per year has been £19,000. During the last fifteen years the increase has been over half a million, and the average has been £34,000 per year. (See Table No. 2 in Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. II. (C).)

Increased cost of loan charges.

1566. (Chairman.) Now can you give us some information as to the average cost of relieving each pauper, taking the total expenditure first ?—Taking the year 1904, that is to say, the year ended at Lady Day in that year, the cost per pauper in England and Wales calculated on the mean number of paupers of all classes and the total expenditure on relief, was £15. 19s. 2d. I am quoting from a table on page xcix. of the last Annual Report of the Local Government Board which gives corresponding figures for 1870–71, 1880–81, and each year since the year 1890–91. The table shows that there has been practically a continuous rise in the cost per pauper. I can give figures for some earlier years. In 1849 the cost per pauper seems to have been £5 6s. 5d. ; in 1859 it was £6 8s. 6d. ; and in 1869 it was £7 10s. 9d. Taking England and Wales exclusive of London, the cost per pauper in the latest year was £13 11s 10d. Corresponding figures for 1870–71, 1880–81, and each year from 1890–91 are given on page 101 of the last Annual Report of the Local Government Board. I have also been furnished with figures showing the cost of the total expenditure on relief per head of population, and it may be convenient that I should add some information on this subject in answering the present question. In 1903–4 the cost was 8s. per head of population, and in 1833–34 the corresponding cost seems to have been 8s. 9d. In 1893–94 the amount was 6s. 6d. (See Table No. 4 in Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. III.) That is, perhaps, all I need say as to the total expenditure.

Average cost per pauper in London and in the country.

1567. Now can you give us the result if you apply a similar calculation to the expenditure on in-maintenance ?—In regard to in-maintenance the calculation is based on the number of in-door paupers. In 1903–04 the cost per head of in-door pauperism was £12 13s. 3d.

Average cost of in-maintenance per pauper.

1568. (Miss Hill.) Do those figures include salaries ?—No, they are for in-maintenance only. In 1848–49 the cost per head was £7 17s. 8d. and in 1878–79 it had risen to £10 6s. 3d. There was a fall in 1888–89 when the cost per head was £9 13s. 1d., but in 1898–99 the cost per head rose again, and was then £11 1s. 0d. I should have said that the figures which I have given as to in-maintenance relate to England and Wales as a whole. (See Table No. 8 in Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. II. (C).)

1569. (Mr. Booth.) Are these figures irrespective of the time that the paupers remained in the House, or are they per head per annum ?—It is merely the total expenditure of the year divided by the mean number of paupers in the year.

1570. (Mr. Patten-Dougall.) Irrespective of whether they may have been there more than once or not ?—Quite so. The mean number is arrived at by adding together the numbers on 1st January and the 1st July and dividing the total by two. It is a rough average of the number in receipt of relief on each day during the year.

1571. (Chairman.) Now will you apply the same test to out-door relief ?—Taking the figures for England and Wales in 1903–04, the cost per head of out-door pauperism was £5 16s. 0d. Between 1849 and 1899 the cost per head varied from £3 11s. 2d. to £5 1s. 10d., with an upward tendency, the £5 1s. 10d. being in the year 1898–99. (See Table No. 8 in Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. II. (C).)

Average cost per outdoor pauper.

1572. Is the average cost greater in London than in the rest of the country, and greater in urban unions outside London then in rural unions ?—Generally the cost is higher in both cases. In London in the year 1903-04 the cost per pauper calculated on the mean number of paupers of all classes, and the total expenditure on Average cost per pauper in London and elsewhere.

relief was £28 16s. 1d. (See Table No. 8 in Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. II. (C).)

1573. (Mr. Bentham.) Is that on in-door and out-relief both?—It is on all relief. It compares with £13 11s. 10d. in the rest of England and Wales. I will not give the figures for earlier years, as they will be found in the table which is to be circulated, but I may say that during the whole period from 1871 the cost in London has been greater than it has been in the rest of the country (See Table No. 8 in Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. II. (C).) Comparing the extra-metropolitan wholly urban unions, of which there are 59, with the wholly rural unions, of which there are 114, it appears that in the wholly urban unions the cost per head, taking all classes of paupers and the total expenditure on relief, was £15 14s. 7d.; and in the wholly rural unions the corresponding average was £12 10s. 2d. These figures relate to the year 1903–04. In connection with these figures it must be borne in mind that the ratio of paupers to population is not the same in the two sets of areas. In the wholly urban unions the proportion of paupers to estimated population in 1903–04 was 22·4 per 1,000, and in the wholly rural unions the corresponding proportion was 31·5. The table which is to be circulated will show the proportion of paupers to population in London (See Table No. 3 in Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. II. (B) to memorandum.)

Loan expenditure.

1574. (Chairman.) You have given particulars as to the amounts paid for interest on loans and the repayment of principal; will you now state briefly what has been the expenditure out of borrowed money?—In 1903–04 the total expenditure on the relief of the poor out of borrowed money in England and Wales was £1,281,447. There is a table in the last annual report of the Local Government Board giving the corresponding figure for each year since 1894–95. I have a table going back to the year 1884–5; in that year the total expenditure out of loans in England and Wales was £553,800. The figures for London and the rest of England are shown separately in the table which is now being printed. (See Table No. 4 in Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. II. (C) to memorandum.)

Increase in outstanding loans.

1575. Has the unpaid balance of loans increased largely in recent years?—The total outstanding balance at Lady Day, 1904, was £12,700,000. That is a large increase upon the outstanding balance on Lady Day, 1895, when the amount was £6,900,000. In 1885 the amount was £6,360,000 and in 1870 it was £1,780,000. I might add that this bears a very small proportion to the total debt of the local authorities in England and Wales. (See Table No. 4 in Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. II. (C) to memorandum.)

1576. The rate of repayment remains the same during the whole of the period with which we are dealing, does it not?—I think so.

1577. Therefore the outstanding balance is merely the result of increased borrowing?—Yes.

Extension of guardians' borrowing powers.

1578. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Was there not an extension of power given to boards of guardians to borrow?—Yes; I think some of the recent loans may have been sanctioned for longer periods than the older ones. There is that to be borne in mind.

1579. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) May I ask whether the bulk of that money was borrowed from the Public Works Loans Commissioners or from private lenders?—I have no information on that point.

1580. (Mr. Bentham.) I thought the tendency of the last few years was for shorter loans and not for longer loans?—I have nothing to do with that part of the work of the Local Government Board.

1581. I was referring to an answer which you have just given to a question by Sir Samuel Provis?—The law has been altered so as to enable money to be borrowed for longer periods, but how far the periods have been actually altered I cannot say.

1582. (Chairman.) Do you wish to make any general statement respecting the statistics as regards expenditure?—I may mention what no doubt will have been remarked, that nothing has been said about the funds from which the guardians defray this expenditure.

Cost of lunatic asylums.

1583. (Sir Samuel Provis.) You mean the receipts?—Yes, the receipts of the guardians and the sources from which they are derived. There will be a separate memorandum on that part of the subject. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. III.) I have also said nothing about the cost of lunatic asylums. These asylums are very largely used for the accommodation of pauper lunatics, but they are not provided by the Poor Law authorities, and consequently the cost of building the asylums does not appear in the returns of the expenditure of the Poor Law authorities. I have not the figures before me, but I hope that the memorandum when it is finally circulated will show how much the county and borough authorities spend on the asylums in which the pauper lunatics are maintained. I do not think I need add anything more; there will be a great deal more in the memorandum when it is finally circulated.

1584. (Chairman.) You will put in all those memoranda to which you have alluded to-day?—Yes, the tables will be added to the memorandum; many of them, I think, are being printed at the present time.

Proportion "permanent" paupers.

1585. (Sir Henry Robinson.) You say there is no information at the Local Government Board to enable you to form an opinion as to the proportion of paupers who are a permanent charge on the rates as compared with those who are not a permanent charge on the rates?—I am not aware of any; there certainly is not any in the department by which these statements have been prepared.

1586. It may be important for the purposes of our inquiry that we should get that information. Would it be very inaccurate if, as representing more or less the permanent or chronic pauperism, we took the aged and infirm classes and the imbecile and idiots in workhouses?—I think very likely the paupers over sixty-five years of age are mainly in the chronic class, and naturally the imbeciles and idiots would be; but I am afraid I have no figures upon which I can base any reliable estimate of the kind desired.

1587. Dealing with those classes which may be regarded as more or less permanent, do you think it would be possible for us to get through the clerks of the unions information, classified under certain heads, as to the previous occupations of those persons and as to the causes of their pauperism?—I should not like to undertake to promise that such a return should be obtained by the Department. I think the better course with regard to any proposed returns would be that the Commission should consider whether it is worth while to ask the Local Government Board to assist in obtaining statistics and then to address the Board on the matter.

Possibility of obtaining returns as to "permanent" paupers.

1588. I suppose that the officials of the local authorities would resent being asked to furnish voluminous returns?—I am sure they would.

1589. But still, as it is a very important point on a question of national importance, I presume they would strain a point to give what information we might ask for?—Yes, but my difficulty is that if I commence to promise returns I shall find that the department will have on its hands very much more than it can undertake. If the Commission will consider what further information it would like, after the tables that are being put in have been considered, and let the Local Government Board know, then I have no doubt that the question of obtaining further returns would be carefully gone into.

Basis of statistics as to children.

1590. (Mr. Phelps.) Referring to your statement with regard to the number of children relieved, do the figures include the children who are relieved under the head of their parents' relief and who are relieved with their parents? I presume the figures do not necessarily relate only to children such as orphans who are relieved independently of the parents?—The total figures that I gave you include all children. You will find the classification of them in the Parliamentary Return relating to the 1st January.

1591. That is to say, if a man is relieved who has a wife and five children, all the five children would come into the figures of children relieved?—Yes, but there is an exception which is explained in the memorandum. If one child in a family is taken ill and the parent receives relief on account of that child only, one child only is counted with the parent as a pauper and the rest of the children are not counted.

Orphan and deserted children.

1592. Then children are not necessarily a separate class in any sense?—No, except the orphan and deserted children.

1593. Are there any figures with regard to those?—You will find those mentioned separately, either in the ordinary returns or in the special tables that have been prepared.

Mr. JAMES STEWART DAVY, C.B., called; and Examined.

1594. (Chairman.) Will you kindly state to the Commission your present post at the Local Government Board, and your past experience?—I have been a general inspector of the Board for about thirty years; I am now an assistant secretary and the chief general inspector.

Scope of evidence.

1595. As you are aware, Mr. Adrian, on behalf of the Local Government Board, gave us exhaustive evidence as to the legal side of the question which we are appointed to investigate; you, I understand, are prepared to give evidence as to the administrative side, but the evidence that you will give, I believe, will necessarily be voluminous, so perhaps you will state to the Commission how you propose to divide your evidence?—I propose in the first instance to describe from the administrative point of view the position of the central authority and the constitution and position of the local authorities; then, to deal with the question of in-door relief and the question of out-door relief; then to make some general observations as to the growth of expenditure and the present position of the Poor Law administration of the country; then to say something about children and about London. Lunatics will be dealt with on the question of indoor relief.

Functions of Local Government Board.

1596. Going, then, to the central authority, will you describe briefly the Poor Law functions of the Local Government Board?—They consist in the general supervision of the proceedings of the local Poor Law authorities, as, for instance, the sanctioning of plans for workhouse buildings, the sanctioning of loans for buildings and other poor law purposes; the systematic inspection of workhouses and other Poor Law establishments; the issue of regulations and orders as to the administration of boards of guardians, and in some instances the sanctioning of departures from those regulations; the issuing of the circulars to guardians informing them of changes in the law and other matters, and occasionally embodying recommendations. Then there is the audit of poor law accounts; the decision of appeals against surcharges, and the administration of the Local Authorities Expenses Act; the protection of union and parish property; and many other matters which are set out in detail in the office circulars.

Number of Poor Law letters received by Local Government Board.

1597. The discharge of these duties necessitates a very large correspondence, I presume?—During the year 1905 the two departments of the Board for which I am more directly responsible received 30,700 communications; and besides that, there were a great many other communications on legal points, on points of audit appeal, and on statistical points which are not counted in that enumeration.

Duties of General Inspectors.

1598. The Local Government Board, as we know, are assisted by an outside staff; perhaps you would state shortly who are the chief of those officials?—The country is divided for the purposes of Local Government inspection into fourteen districts, and to each of those districts is assigned an officer who is called a general inspector. Their duties are, generally speaking, to attend a meeting of every board of guardians in their district at least once a year; to inspect and report upon workhouses and all other Poor Law institutions, such as certified homes, infirmaries and schools; to advise as to any communication bearing on the current Poor Law work which may be received from their district, that is to say, a paper bearing on a Poor Law point in any inspector's district is as a rule referred to him for his advice and opinion; to hold enquiries as to the conduct of officers, parish property, and so on; and generally to act as agents of the Board. Under the statute our inspectors have the power to hold enquiries on oath, to administer the oath, and to ensure the production of any documents relating to any Poor Law questions. Their duty also is to give information to guardians in their own districts by statistical and other annual returns. I have some specimens with me of the documents the inspectors sent round. They also have to write an annual report.

1599. May we assume that the inspectors have power to counsel and even to override a board of guardians if they find that they are doing something which, in their judgment, is contrary to their instructions or is contrary to law?—It is their duty to advise a board of guardians, and they are allowed to take part in any debates of a board of guardians, but they are not to vote and they have no actual executive power beyond that which follows from the fact that they can administer an oath. I mean to say, they cannot order relief to anybody or take any administrative action except through the board of guardians.

1600. I used perhaps the wrong word in saying "override;" I assume that they have no power to veto any proceedings of a board of guardians?—They have none.

1601. But they can report to the Local Government Board?—Yes.

The model inspector.

1602. And that I take it would be the outside of their powers. Do you wish to add anything more about it?—I should like to say that an efficient inspector should be looked upon by the guardians as their confidential adviser and friend. He should so direct his conduct that they should turn to him in case of any emergency, and if he does that he is able as a matter of fact to settle a great many questions on his own initiative without troubling the board. My view of the best inspector is that he is the man who represents the views of the local authorities at Whitehall as much as he does the views of the Whitehall authorities in his district.

Relations between inspectors and guardians.

1603. Speaking generally, are the relations of the inspectors with the boards of guardians friendly?—To myself personally they have always been most friendly. It is only recently that I have been in a position to see what the other inspectors actually were doing, and I may say, generally speaking, that all over the country the position of the general inspectors in regard to the boards of guardians is most satisfactory.

Assistant inspectors.

1604. If you have nothing more to say about the general inspectors, perhaps you will inform us whom they are assisted by; are there not officers called assistant inspectors?—There are two assistant inspectors in London and one in Lancashire. There is also a lady inspector for London for the inspection of certain Poor Law institutions.

Lady inspectors.

1605. (Mr. Booth.) Is she the only lady on the staff?—There are three lady inspectors who inspect children boarded-out outside the union.

Poor Law medical inspectors.

1606. (Chairman.) Are the lady inspectors' duties specific, that is are they confined to a particular purpose?—The duties of those three inspectors are confined to inspecting boarded-out children. There are also two medical inspectors for Poor Law purposes, one of whom, Dr. Downes, is attached to the metropolis; he also advises generally on Poor Law questions. The other medical inspector, Dr. Fuller, has to inspect workhouses and to attend meetings of boards of guardians on medical points when the board think it desirable; he also has to inspect six workhouses in each inspector's district every year. I should like to say that the medical inspectors are of the greatest assistance to the general inspectors, and that the arrangement which has now prevailed for some years works with perfect smoothness; I think my colleagues who may be called to give evidence before you will agree with me, at all events in that. I will hand in the instructions to the medical inspectors.*

Instructions to general inspectors.

1607. Are there any instructions to the general inspectors that you wish to hand in?—The general inspectors of recent years have had no general instructions. I should like to say that they have seldom met for conference, and that their communications, apart from their current work, with the central authority have been somewhat rare. There is a good deal to be said for that method of working the system, although I myself do not approve of it, and am doing something to bring the inspectors more into line with one another. What I should like to point out to the Commission is this: they have fourteen men all over the country in the closest touch with the current Poor Law administration, who have no common instructions, who are men of all sorts and conditions, varying in the age at which they join and their previous business in every possible way, and who have no common understanding as to what evidence they shall give. I submit that possibly the evidence of some of them at least will be useful to this Commission.

and that if they are in substantial agreement on any particular points there are fair grounds for believing that their evidence is correct.

Qualifications of inspectors.

1608. You state that the inspectors are taken from different classes of society and have had different experience; I understand there is no special qualification which they have to pass before they can be appointed and that they are appointed by the President of the Local Government Board?—That is so.

1609. I gather from what you say that a good many of them, previous to their appointment, had not necessarily been experienced in Poor Law administration, that is to say, they have occasionally been in rather a different branch of life?—Most of them have had different occupations not connected with the Poor Law Some of them have been chairmen of boards of guardians and some of them have known of Poor Law administration in other ways; but at all events there is no written qualification.

1610. Therefore, in your opinion, as they are taken from different classes of life, and their experience varies, their evidence on that account would be all the more valuable?—So it occurred to me.

Age limit for inspectors.

1611. (Sir Henry Robinson.) Is there an age limit in the appointment of inspectors?—No.

1612. (Chairman.) Neither as regards the period at which they can be appointed or at which they retire?—There is a limit as to the age at which they retire; there is the age limit which is common to the whole Civil Service.

1613. Then they are, I suppose, on the tenure of the ordinary Civil Servant?—Yes.

Auditors.

1614. If you have said all you have to say as regards inspectors, the next portion of the staff we come to is that of the auditors, is it not?—Yes. There are sixty auditors who are also local officers, that is to say, they each have their own district. Where my department comes across them is in the question of the remission of certain surcharges on Poor Law matters. They audit the accounts of all local authorities, such as county and district councils and so on.

Instructions to auditors.

1615. I suppose the auditors have a definite and uniform set of instructions as to what they shall pass or not?—They are much more under instruction than the general inspectors are, but they judge independently of the legality of items in the accounts.

1616. (Mr. Booth.) Have they separate instructions for Poor Law work other than what may be called work outside the Poor Law?—I think not. I think their duty is to inspect the accounts, and in the matter of surcharge to use their judgment as to what is legal and what is not legal, what is reasonable and what is not reasonable.

1617. (Mrs. Webb.) There is sometimes an instructional letter sent to them, is there not?—Yes, and sometimes an instructional letter is sent to the General Inspector, but not of recent years. Such a letter would refer mostly to one particular point.

Inspectors and auditors debarred from outside work.

1618. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Have they to give up their whole time to the work of the Local Government Board?—Yes, both inspectors and auditors.

1619. Are the auditors in the position of Civil Servants, too?—Yes.

1620 Have they to go at sixty-five?—Yes.

1621. (Sir Henry Robinson.) Between what ages are they appointed?—There is no definite instruction on that.

Efficiency of audit.

1622. (Chairman.) Is their work effectively done, do you think; can you speak from any experience?—Yes; I can fairly say it is. In some ways it is admirably done. But they are not exactly in my department, and I only see some of their work; all I see of the auditors' work is the remission of certain Poor Law surcharges.

Vagrant inspectors in London.

1623. Then there are certain inspectors appointed in connection with the vagrant wards, I think?—Yes.

1624. Can you describe what their duties are?—We have a small staff of officers who inspect the metropolitan vagrant wards mainly for the purpose of identifying the vagrants.

1625. Are they appointed by the Local Government Board?—Yes.

1626. (Mr. Loch.) That holds simply for the metropolitan area?—Yes.

1627. (Mr. Nunn.) How many are there of them?—I think there are four. All London is treated as one vagrant ward for the purposes of detention. The law as to vagrants says that if a vagrant presents himself more than once in a month at a ward for relief he is subject to greater detention, and as all London, which has twenty-eight vagrant wards, is one union for that purpose, these officers go round to identify the vagrants who apply more often than once a month for relief. It is a comparatively small matter.

Architect's Department

1628. (Chairman.) Then I understand there is an architect's department at the Local Government Board?—There is an architect's department attached to the Local Government Board whose poor law duties—they have other duties—are to pass plans which are submitted for Poor Law buildings.

Functions of architect.

1629. Have all buildings of any size in connection with the Poor Law to be submitted to the architect?—All plans have to be submitted to the architect which involve a structural alteration, and all plans for which a loan is asked.

1630. Do the architect's duties go beyond passing such structural alterations or enlargements as he considers necessary?—They have to advise my department as to the reasonableness of the cost and as to the length of the loan which should be allowed for buildings for which a loan is raised.

1631. By reasonableness of cost, I suppose you mean the amount of expenditure on a building per head of those whom it is proposed to accommodate?—Something like that.

1632. Is there any rule at the Local Government Board to guide the architect in coming to a decision on this point?—No, he must be guided by the facts in each case. The question of the cost of Poor Law buildings is one of great difficulty which, with the permission of the Commission, I should like to dwell on for a short time.

Cost of poor law buildings.

1633. Certainly?—First it is often alleged that the expenditure on workhouses is very extravagant. There are two points about that. It is rather an old question to begin with. In the year 1870, when Mr. Goschen was President of the Local Government Board, he wrote (this is in the Annual Report): "The extreme parsimony developed by some Boards of Guardians has given way to a desire to conduct all the duties which devolve upon guardians on somewhat more than a liberal scale. The Board are compelled to check expenditure in the more ornamental parts of workhouses, as for instance granite columns, terra-cotta mouldings, encaustic tile pavements, Portland stone decorations, and so on." That difficulty has been felt ever since, sometimes in a very acute form; and some years ago, when Mr. Chaplin was President of the Board, there was a memorandum as to the cost of Poor Law buildings, in which he says he has observed "with much concern the large and continuing increase in the cost of buildings erected in connection with Poor Law administration"; and exhorts the officers of the Board to check that excessive expenditure as far as they can. My experience in my present post has not been very long, but I can honestly say that we do make every effort to check the expenditure, though the results are, I think, a little startling. For instance I have here a list of workhouses, cottage homes and infirmaries, and their cost. The maximum cost given for a Poor Law infirmary here was a case at Hendon, where for a building with 331 beds an expenditure of £377 per bed was incurred. You will understand that that would not be altogether for the infirmary, but would include administrative blocks, receiving wards, and so on.

per bed. Then you have Willesden with a cost of £346 per bed, and Islington with a cost of £325 10s. per bed. You will notice that all those infirmaries are in the neighbourhood of London, but there are none that I have given in London itself except Islington, and I think there are none except Islington that are subject to the requirements of the Metropolitan Buildings Act, which our architect would tell you, if you called him, materially increases the cost. On the other hand if you go into the country you find a very much lower scale of expenditure. For instance at Dartford, which is some little distance from London, they built some pavilions for £45 per bed. At Great Ouseburn they built a small infirmary for £94 per bed; at Woodstock they built one for £84 per bed; and so on. This curious generalisation emerges from all these figures, that the larger the infirmary the greater the cost per bed. I think that is almost uniform, the reason being I suppose that in a large union the guardians are very anxious to have the best of everything; they feel that they can afford it, and indulge in, I might say, ornaments that the poor country unions do not wish to indulge in. In the return of cottage homes on which an enormous sum has been spent in recent years you will find the same sort of difference. You will find, for instance, that at Chorlton for 400 children in cottage homes the cost was £213 per bed, and at Liverpool for 288 children it is £202 10s. Going down the list to Barrow-in-Furness you will find that for eighty-five children the cost was £52, and at Haverfordwest for forty children it was £42 10s., showing much the same tendency to greater expenditure in urban unions, and showing much the same rule that the larger the building the greater the cost per bed. I put this to the Commission as rather suggesting a line for further investigation. I must say I am surprised at the figures myself. I have similar figures for workhouses for the past twenty years.

1635. Is the result the same?—Very much the same.

1636. (Miss Hill.) Do the London ones include the price of land?—None of them includes the cost of the site. I have excluded the cost of the site from the whole calculation.

1637. (Chairman.) I understand that you will put all these returns in?—I will do so with pleasure. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (2 to 5).) Taking the workhouses, roughly speaking, the average for a London or neighbouring union is about £250 per bed, and for a country union £150 per bed. That is a very rough sort of estimate.

ct of ropolitan lding Act.

1638. What are the particular provisions of the Metropolitan Building Act which in your judgment run up the cost?—That is rather a technical matter which would be better dealt with by our architect.

1639. Under the Metropolitan Building Act certain powers are given to local surveyors, I believe?—Yes. I am told the surveyor is autocratic.

1640. And the exercise of those powers, you think, runs up the cost?—I am informed that it makes a material difference. I have here a return of the Poor Law expenditure on buildings during the last twenty years. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (1).) We start in the year 1885–86 when the number of in-door paupers was 186,000. In that year we sanctioned (this is not expenditure within the year, but the amount sanctioned) the sum of £440,000, and that figure remains without any very rapid change until the year 1896–97 when the sum amounted to £998,000. There were then 214,000 paupers. In the next year the sum was £1,142,000; in the next year £1,768,000; in the next year £1,238,000; and in each of the next two years no less than £1,700,000 were spent on workhouse buildings, £1,776,000 in 1900–1 being the maximum, and that was when the in-door paupers of the country were 213,500. The gentleman who drew up this table has put a little note below in which he says, "The Architects' Fees in this year amounted to about £88,000." Since then, that is to say in the last three years, the sum spent has fallen again to £975,000, £1,184,000, and £941,000 respectively. I should add that in the two big years, that is to say in 1900 and 1901, the Forest Gate and South Metropolitan school districts were broken up and other buildings had to be provided to meet that emergency. That would reduce the amount by some £700,000, which would still leave it at a very heavy sum.

1641. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) The architect is paid by a percentage on the cost, is he not?—The local architect is paid by a percentage on the cost; our architect has to criticise and, if possible, keep the cost down. I have here a bird's-eye picture of the last sanctioned building, which is the one at Hammersmith.

Mr. J. S. Davy, C.B.

22 Jan. 1906.

1642. (Chairman.) Have you got sufficient powers at the Local Government Board, do you think, for checking or supervising this class of expenditure?—We have powers to refuse buildings, and we have powers to refuse loans, but it is quite evident that with the best will in the world we find it a matter of very great difficulty to bring down the cost of workhouse buildings. In the first place there is a tendency for experts always to try and get the best of everything. If you have got the best of everything, obviously you have less responsibility than if you agree to a small compromise and thus run a small amount of danger. Anyone who has had administrative work to do has been subjected to the same temptation. Here comes in a point that I shall, with your permission, dwell upon at some length later on in my evidence. There is a tendency to lessened financial responsibility in the urban Unions. I mean to say you have a man who pays very little rates and who lives probably in a house that would not cost £10 per head, and you hear him come with proposals to spend £300 per head, or we will say £200 per head, in actually housing a pauper child. Then there is another difficulty in checking this expenditure—it is not paid out of immediate revenue, but it is paid out of loans to a great extent. A board of guardians will find it very much against the grain to spend a big lump sum, but they do not in the least mind a loan. An inspector—I myself have done it scores of times—will want the guardians to improve their workhouse; the guardians will say, we cannot spend £10,000 on this, as there is not £10,000 in the union. Ah! says the inspector, you must not look at it from that point of view; what you have got to do is to borrow the money for thirty years; you are not asked to spend £10,000, you are only asked to spend the interest on the loan of £10,000, which is, at the rate of 3½ per cent., about £5 8s. per cent. for interest and sinking fund; all you are asked to do is to find the sum of £500 a year out of the rates. Then we go a step further, and we say £500 out of the rates is after all only a 2d. or 3d. rate—a mere trifle. The guardians naturally wish to do well for their poor people; and they naturally wish to have a handsome building. They are persuaded, and they come up with these plans. Once the local authority has set their minds on the plans, it is extremely difficult for my department to check them. The only way of checking them is by saying No, and No is not an easy thing to say. Then there is another point that tends to extravagance, and that is that as buildings are in progress the architect or the building committee of the guardians suggest that something better might be done, just one more pavilion or just one more building; then when it is done, they come to us and say this is excess expenditure. Then it goes to the architect's department and the architect says, this is very right and proper expenditure, and it is a great improvement; we suggest the guardians should have a loan for so many years. Then it comes to me and my department usually gives sanction.

Difficulties of Local Government Board in checking expenditure on buildings.

1643. Have you any power of stopping expenditure of this kind other than refusing the loan?—Only by exhortation. Then there is another point of view: Some people say that this expenditure is not excessive, and they point to the fact that the expenditure on lunatic asylums is very largely in excess of our most exalted efforts—right beyond us; also that the expenditure of district councils on isolation hospitals in some cases amounts to over £600 per bed. They say, after all this is not too much. But I venture to think that it is too much, and I hope that the Commission will be able to give us administratively some help in dealing with what I find a most troublesome problem, and one which has excited a good deal of attention all over the country.

1644. What suggestion do you make in that direction; what extra power or authority would you like in addition to that which you have already got in order to check this evil?—I think we have plenty of authority to check it by simply saying, no, you must be more reasonable. I think that what we have to do is to revise the requirements of the medical and architectural professions with regard to the housing of persons in workhouses, and I think we have to fight against the tendency which I have seen for so many years of requiring for the class that we will say is able-bodied exactly the same provisions as the requirements for the sick, that is to say, I think we want a better classification of demands. All that will be discussed, and must be discussed and considered by the Commission with regard to the whole question of the housing of the in-door poor. It is very largely a question of classification.

Practice and policy of Local Government Board as to cost of Poor Law buildings.

1645. Under the authority you have got, have the Local Government Board ever refused to pass plans, or have they been successful in inducing local authorities to put forward less expensive schemes?—I think we are very much better than we used to be, and I think the returns show it; I mean that I think we spend less. I should like to say that nothing can exceed the care that is now being exercised to check what we think is unnecessary expenditure; but the matter is so difficult that I thought it right to dwell upon it at some length before the Commission.

1646. You will subsequently, perhaps, come to what is germane to this, namely, the qualifications of the local authorities who administer this expenditure?—Yes.

1647. That you would rather postpone now, I suppose?—Yes. It is one indication of the sort of wave of excessive expenditure which seems to have swept over the country since, I will put it, the last fifteen or twenty years.

1648. (Mr. Gardiner.) You said that increased care is shown in revising plans; is that by the local people or by the central people?—By the central authority. I may say that only recently—it was no part of his duty—our architect has been to the trouble of drawing rough plans for himself in order to assist the local authority to get a cheaper scheme. Of course, that is taking great responsibility, and I do not say it is right, but so anxious are we to cut this expenditure down if we can, that that is the line we have taken.

1649. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Have you full statutory powers to deal with it?—We have full statutory powers to refuse any building or any loan. No board of guardians can make structural alterations without our consent.

1650. (Chairman.) Could they not, for instance, commence a building out of ordinary revenue?—They would be subject to surcharge if they did.

1651. (Mr. Gardiner.) If you reduce the period of a loan you really would reduce the cost of the building, would you not?—We should reduce the annual cost. But our inspector may think, and we may agree with him, that it is really very desirable that the building should be built. It becomes rather a matter of negotiation sometimes with the local authority, and there is a sort of pressure brought to bear upon us, and a suggestion that if we are too hard on the matter of loans, the local authority will not build at all. Perhaps undue notice is taken of that, but that is one of the difficulties.

1652. (Mr. Booth.) Can the Local Government Board alter the period for the repayment of a loan?—Yes.

1653. Can it shorten the term?—Yes. We are limited by statute as to the maximum that we may allow; but we may allow as little as from one year to nothing.

1654. So that you can push a larger portion forward year by year?—Yes.

1655. (Mr. Gardiner.) The present system which is commonly adopted, of equal instalments of capital and interest, extended over thirty years, tends, as I understand, to extravagance in building?—I think all loans tend to extravagance; but that is, of course, another question.

1656. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) You approve the plans of each building, I suppose; but then after you have approved the plans, do you see the design as proposed by the local architect?—We see practically all the plans.

1657. You see the original plans, but are you told what the estimate is, or how the architect proposes to carry out the design?—We have all the specifications.

1658. Then the plan comes in a second time?—Yes. It may be that this is in your mind—that, we do not visit the buildings when they are in the process of erection. You see, a good many changes might be made without our knowledge. I do not think, however, that they are made, and now we certainly have got a rule that if there is a large excess the place shall be visited by one of our architects, and we shall see what has actually been done so as to check the possibility of a local authority having followed plans other than those which we sanctioned.

Auditor's powers over expenditure on building.

1659. (Mrs. Webb.) Would an auditor surcharge anything extra which was spent over and above the specification that was given in to you?—He would, but then the local authority would write for sanction, and we can either give that sanction or we can refer the authority to the auditor; then if the auditor surcharges them there would be some correspondence, and there would probably be remission of the surcharge.

Details omitted from plans.

1660. (Dr. Downes.) With regard to the plans, I think I am right in saying that a great many expensive details of fittings and so on are not shown in the specifications and plans that come to the Local Government Board?—That is very much so.

Effect of cost of non-Poor Law buildings.

1661. (Mr. Loch.) Besides this expenditure on Poor Law institutions, is there not a large local expenditure on not very dissimilar institutions, the loans in regard to which are passed by other central authorities?—That would be so.

1662. So that the scale on which you are asked here to sanction expenditure is a scale rather settled by the general movement for expensive institutions?—I think now I am right in saying that we have to sanction the loans for all those buildings, although we do not sanction the plans.

1663. In those cases you sanction the loan, but the control over the plans is nil—is that it?—We always see the plans.

Tenure of guardians' officers.

1664. (Chairman.) I think now you wish to say something about the tenure of officers of a certain class?—That is another point of difficulty which I personally feel requires consideration. The Select Committee of 1864 is, I think, the convenient starting point. They gave conclusive reasons why the tenure of certain principal officers of a board of guardians should be permanent. I do not think anybody questions that to this day. It evidently is right that officers who are doing their duty should be protected against capricious dismissal. In practice, however, there is this point of difficulty that, an officer may from age or some physical change become inefficient,—to put it mildly; yet unless he commits some overt act on which a charge can be brought against him, you practically cannot get rid of him.

Superannuation of officers.

1665. (Miss Hill.) Are you speaking of officers of the guardians?—I am speaking of officers of the local authority, namely, the clerk, the workhouse master, the workhouse matron, the chaplain, and the relieving officers. Up to 1896, as I dare say Mr. Adrian has explained, superannuations of officers of the local authorities were at the option of the local authority employing them—the boards of guardians, we will say; but now, under the Act of 1896, there is a compulsory deduction from the salaries of all Poor Law officers and they get in return pensions on a fixed scale on their retirement—pensions which are in essentials similar to those which are given to members of the ordinary Civil Service. There are two things to be considered about that Act. The question is whether it does not make it more difficult to get rid of those incompetent officers. That has often been said. To my mind, it makes it rather easier, because you can make terms with a man to go. But the whole matter seems to me to be worth careful consideration.

Dismissal of officers.

1666. (Mr. Loch.) Are there any rules about the standard of competency; how would a board of guardians act if they wanted to get rid of a servant? Would they come to the Local Government Board?—Those officers cannot be dismissed or got rid of without the sanction of the board.

1667. (Chairman.) What do you suggest?—I merely put the case forward as a matter for consideration, because I have no doubt that you will get a great deal of evidence, perhaps from the officers themselves, with regard to the whole question of superannuation and their position.

Increasing cost of salaries.

1668. Will you say anything you wish in connection with those officers now?—The cost of the officers of the Poor Law is a steadily increasing proportion of the whole; for instance, out of the total cost of Poor Law relief in the years 1857 to 1860 the salaries were 11·2 per cent. of the whole; and in the five years before the Superannuation Act was passed, that is, from 1891 to 1895, they were 16·9 per cent. of the whole. That proportion has steadily risen till now 18·1 per cent. of the whole expenditure goes in the salaries of officers. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (16).) Apparently the rate of increase has been greater since the passing of the Superannuation Act, that is to say, salaries are better.

Type of officers.

1669. Has the type of officers improved?—That is a matter of opinion, but in my judgment the type of the officers has steadily improved, and I should say we have got a much better sort of officer now than we got at the time of my first connection with the Poor Law. Certainly fewer officers come under our censure than formerly; for instance, in the year 1869 out of 6,489 officers sixty were called upon to resign or were dismissed, whereas, in the year 1904 out of 7,893 officers only twelve were called upon to resign or were dismissed. I have a return (see Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (6).) of officers here, the officers to which it applies being clerks, medical officers, masters of workhouses, stewards or superintendents of infirmaries, and relieving officers. But in criticising boards of guardians, one should never forget that they are the only local authority that has not complete control over their officers.

Numbers dismissed.

Tenure of medical officer of health.

1670. (Mrs. Webb.) Is not the medical officer of health a case in point?—No, he has nothing to do with the board of guardians.

1671. Is he not under the control of the central authority, so that the local authority cannot dismiss him?—There is only permanency of tenure in London, I think.

Appointment of collector of poor rates.

1672. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Is the collector of the poor rate an officer of the board of guardians?—Some are.

1673. Do those fall within the category with which you have been dealing?—They are not in my return; but they get pensions, and we have in some cases to assent to their dismissal.

1674. As regards them, can you say what you have said as regards the others, they have very much improved from what they were?—I think I should say they are much the same.

Type of officer improving.

1675. (Chairman.) The general conclusion you arrive at is, I think, that the stamp of officer is improving?—He has very much improved, but he costs more; and when he does misbehave himself, he is perhaps a little more trouble now than he used to be.

Guardians complete control of officers.

1676. I take it that you have no particular suggestions to make as regards the officers, as you think their position is now fairly satisfactory?—That is so; I have no absolute suggestions to make. The real point is, that the Commission must remember all the way through that the guardians have not entire command over their officers, whether for good or for ill.

1677. That is an essential feature of the centralised system of administration which is concentrated in the Local Government Board, and that you would not alter?—That is so. I think the only alterations you could make would be, perhaps, alterations of departmental practice.

Tendency to apathy in officers.

1678. (Miss Hill.) I presume the difficulty which arises is not when there is any real breach of duty, but when there is a want of energy and because there is no stimulus to an officer to do better or to work up to any higher standard; I am afraid now that there is a good deal of possibility of going to sleep?—That is so.

Pluralists.

1679. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Do all these officers give up their whole time to the duties of their office?—All those that I have named do, except the medical officers and the chaplains.

1680. (Sir Samuel Provis.) What about the clerks?—Some clerks do and some clerks do not—I should say a great many clerks do not; most of the relieving officers do, and most of the medical officers do not.

Statutory powers of assistant inspectors.

1681. (Mr. Nunn.) Have the assistant inspectors the same right to be present at meetings of the boards of guardians, or are their rights curtailed in any degree as compared with the rights of the general inspectors?—The statutory powers of assistant inspectors are the same as the statutory powers of the general inspectors.

Architect's staff.

1682. You have spoken of the architect of the central authority; I suppose you have one architect and a staff?—That is so.

1683. There is no local organisation, such as a county council would have?—No.

1684. So far as Poor Law surcharges are concerned, do you find that the staff is adequate to all its duties?—I can only answer that the work of auditing is continually increasing.

Auditorial staff.

1685. I take it that the number of auditors, which you gave as sixty, is not a fixed number?—That is the present number.

Effect of Metropolitan Building Act in increasing expenditure.

1686. (Mrs. Webb.) With regard to buildings, you mentioned that the Chorlton cottage homes were very expensive; I happen to have seen them, so I agree with you. There would be no difficult building Act there because it is in the country; is that not so?—Perhaps there would not be even bye-laws there.

1687. I was reflecting on what you said as to the Metropolitan bye-laws with regard to other expensive buildings?—I should like to say about this point that it was put very strongly to the Vagrancy Committee by Mr. Kitchin, architect to the Board, that the Metropolitan Building Act did considerably increase the cost of building; but my return here shows that the suburban workhouses outside the Metropolitan Building Act are just as expensive as those in London.

Effect of environment of inmates.

1688. I wanted to bring out that point, because I am interested in the Metropolitan Building Act. As regards the cost of building, before we determine whether the cost is desirable, it would be well to find out the results; take, for instance, the cottage homes; Chorlton is very expensive, but supposing the result was that fewer children came back on the Poor Law, even that expense might be justified, might it not?—If the greater success was due to the greater expenditure of pounds, shillings and pence, no doubt it would be justified.

1689. Therefore, before we could back you up in any way in making the cost of these buildings less extravagant, we should have to get accurate statistics as to the effect which was produced on the inmates?—Yes.

1690. You would, therefore, advise us to get accurate statistics as to the results on the children, for instance, would you not?—I have no doubt whatever that that would be one of the duties of this Commission.

1691. Also with regard to the infirmaries, we could not judge whether the £450 per bed in the one case was justified as against the £40 per bed in the other case, unless we discover accurately how many cases were turned out cured?—That is so.

1692. Can we get that information from the unions, or should we ask the local inspectors for it, or how could we get at the results?—I think in the first instance I should ask the local inspectors, Do you think the people are more comfortable in union A, which cost £400 per bed, than in union B, which only cost £200 per bed? As to the number of cases being cured, that is a point that I should have brought out. You must remember that in a great many of these institutions there is no question of cure, as they are mainly places where the chronic old and infirm go to pass the remainder of their lives.

1693. The character of the cases would largely tell us whether the cost was justified or not, would it not?—It might.

1694. Therefore, the character of the cases would be a most important point to bring out?—That would have to be considered; for instance, to put it in a large sort of way, you might say that the difference in character of the urban cases from the rural cases is essentially a point for consideration on a large and broad scale.

London hospitals and workhouse infirmaries.

1695. I am told that at certain times of the year, about July, say, when the general hospitals in London clean their wards, they send the whole of the patients in their wards to the workhouse infirmaries; it would be rather important to find out whether that is so, would it not?—Certainly.

Sources of information as to cost of Poor Law buildings.

1696. Before we pass from that point, would it be possible to ask the inspectors who come up to give evidence before us, to bring the cost of the institutions of every union within their jurisdiction, and to give us some sort of notion as to the results which were achieved by that cost?—I do not think they could do it for all their unions, as I do not think they would have time, but they would do it for certain unions selected by you.

Mr. J.S. Davy, C.B.

1697. Is it not rather important for us to get a survey of all the unions before we select the ones which we want, because otherwise we might find a mere coincidence, that is we might find an instance where you had a very expensive building and perhaps very low-paid officers and a very bad result; and that would be a question to inquire into, would it not?—Yes.

1698. Therefore, would it not be desirable if we could, from your evidence, pick out certain points and tabulate them with the view of giving them to the inspectors to bring us up information on those points?—All I can say is, that if I can give you any possible help in that matter I shall be only too glad; but if you are to do anything of that sort, for instance, with regard to buildings, I think you might take certain selected unions—take those unions, say, that have made a name for themselves either by giving very heavy relief or by giving very light relief, and let us see what their workhouses are like. In that way I think you might do quite a useful thing.

1699. It will be very difficult to us to get out the sort of facts we want, unless we get the whole thing more or less before us?—It seems to me that you will have to investigate the question step by step.

1700. I understand that each inspector has only forty-five unions?—Forty-five or fifty—it is something like that.

1701. So it would be comparatively easy for him to bring us that information, if he was given notice to do so?—It will depend upon how much detail you will want. A good deal of it would be statistical information which would be inside the office, so that there would be no trouble about that.

1702. He could get it straight out of the office in that case?—Yes.

Procedure on default to erect proper buildings.

1703. You told us something about extravagant buildings, but is there not this other point that you may have a union which refuses to put up proper buildings?—We have had such cases.

1704. I understand that about six or seven years ago, there was a case of that sort at Stockport; I happened to be up there. That was a case in which you had unsuccessfully asked them to put up buildings, and your architect had said that the guardians ought to be indicted for manslaughter; but, nevertheless, Stockport went on resisting you. What could you do in such a case, where there is deficiency and not excess?—One of the points upon which I shall have to give evidence will be as to the limits of the control of the Local Government Board. We can close, but we cannot order to build.

Stockport case.

1705. What happens in a case where a board of guardians is recalcitrant about a workhouse, and refuses to make the necessary alterations; you cannot surcharge them, so what can you do?—What we do is this—we exhort, and we write, and we go on exhorting and writing, and we confer and receive deputations. We put pressure of that kind on for a considerable time, and then we have an ultima ratio, and that ultima ratio is breaking up the union.

1706. But you cannot in practice do that, can you?—No.

Newcastle case.

1707. I have another case—at Newcastle this time—where, about 1887, they dismissed the whole of their trained staff at the infirmary against their medical officer's advice, and there were deaths of paupers and there were coroner's inquests; after seven or eight years they backed down. Is it possible for you to take steps in a case of that sort of bad behaviour?—If that sort of behaviour came before me I should first of all find out whether it was bad behaviour. We should do as we have done once in the last week with a union and ask the local inspector to go down there at once and if it involved the case of nurses and so on, we should probably ask Dr. Fuller to go down with him and report to us as to the facts. If the Board thought the guardians were to blame they would, by preference, send an inspector down to talk to them; but if we did not do that an official letter would be written to them. Then, if nothing happened, and there was a dispute about the facts we might even order an inquiry, that is to say, we might send a man down, who would have power to summon anybody he liked from within ten miles to give evidence on oath, and in that way we would find out the facts. By that time probably some solution would be found.

1708. Supposing they still were recalcitrant, what then—you see at Newcastle they were seven years over this business?—That would be a dreadful thing to contemplate; but I admit the possibility of it. But then what must be remembered is this—I am now anticipating my evidence a good deal; this is one of the inconveniencies of taking it by sections—if the thing went on for seven years, there would be two or three, perhaps even seven, elections of guardians.

1709. But the ratepayers might back them up?—If the ratepayers back them up, then there you have a freely-elected board of guardians, backed up by the ratepayers, which would then be a very formidable body for the central authority to deal with.

1710. I believe one of the functions of the Local Government Board is to protect the pauper; supposing paupers died, for instance?—You will have plenty of chances later in my evidence of dealing with that point.

Insufficient expenditure on Poor Law buildings.

1711. I only want to bring out the point that, besides excessive and extravagant expenditure on buildings by boards of guardians, there might be a deficiency of expenditure?—There is a deficiency at times. Our inspectors, I do not say often, but occasionally, report that they cannot get guardians to do what they think is right and proper. In that case the procedure used to be that we sent that report to the guardians and we got their observations upon it and so on; but now if there is such a case, I should go down and see it myself.

1712. May we not have to ascertain the cases in which there has been a deficiency of building, as well as the cases in which there has perhaps been extravagance?—You could ultimately find that out, if you got a man to go round and see. What I can find out for you, and easily find out for you, is, in how many cases in the course of the year each inspector has reported that such and such a building was inadequate and required additions.

1713. We should get that really from the annual reports on workhouses by the inspectors, should we not?—Yes.

1714 Are those reports published?—No.

1715. We could look at them, presumably?—I should have to consult my official chiefs on that.

Effect of increased salaries on officers' efficiency.

1716. As regards the salaries of officers which you have referred to, I rather gathered that, on the whole, you think it is a good thing to increase the salaries?—An underpaid officer is a very bad thing.

1717. Would not the sort of salaries that they pay be another question which would concern us in classifying the unions for more special inquiry?—Yes.

1718. Take for instance, Manchester; Manchester had an excellent method of relief—which I happen to have witnessed—because it had a superintendent at about £400 a year?—How long ago was that?

1719. That was about six years ago?—It does not follow that a man is efficient because he gets £400 a year.

1720. But he happened to have a sort of judicial position; he sat with one guardian and distributed the relief, so he was in fact like a judicial officer. Would it not be possible that we could be supplied with that sort of information under the heads of the different unions?—Do you want information as to the salaries of every workhouse master in the country?

Cross visitors and their salaries.

1721. No; I am rather considering the sort of person who decides practically all relief that is given—the relieving officer or the cross visitors?—We could give you a return of the number of cross visitors and their salaries without difficulty They are not very many; and at all events in theory, the relief is not given by the relieving officer

Accessibility of minutes, &c., of Local Government Board.

1722. I know it is not in theory, but it is often in practice. You have mentioned the minutes and memoranda, some of which were important; would it be possible for us to see those minutes? Mr. Adrian, for instance, mentioned a minute defining the limits of the Poor Law authorities in 1869; then there was another minute disapproving of a distinguishing dress in workhouses as a mark of disgrace—of course that cut at the root of a very old Poor Law principle, and that is the sort of thing which really means a change of principle ?—I think all those minutes are published in the annual reports.

1723. Then there was a memorandum as to the duties of visiting committees at workhouses ?—That certainly is published.

rkhouse tary ler.

1724. Then there was Dr. Downes's Model Dietary of 1893, and another report of his on Nursing in Workhouses, 1892; are those published ?—I can see if they are.

1725. (Dr. Downes.) There has been an order on dietary published in recent years which supersedes anything published in 1893, has there not ?—Yes.

pectors as nesses.

1726. (Mrs. Webb.) I rather gathered from your suggestions that you would advise the Commission to call all the inspectors, because of their difference of opinions ?—That is entirely for the Commission to say.

1727. But you say they are men of different class, and with a different experience ?—They vary very much.

1728. Would they be able to give us what Mr. Adrian called the codes of regulations having the force of law, and often varying in effect in order to meet the circumstances of particular localities; in other words, would the individual inspectors be able to give us a review of the general and special orders which each union works under ?—Certainly.

1729. That information would be valuable as a matter of classification, would it not ?—Yes. But they all work under one order, practically; but that you would find in the books.

1730. There are other orders about dietary, are there not, and are there not different orders about relief committees ?—No, the orders are the same, but they are applied to some unions and not to others. The general inspectors would be able to tell you about that. That is a matter I shall deal with later on in my evidence.

1731. To keep to the point of the inspectors about which you have given us evidence so far, would they be able to tell us the practice with regard to relief committees ? I notice that in your evidence in 1888 you gave a very interesting account of Leeds, which you said was broken up into Committees, formed of the members of particular districts, who gave the relief for their own districts; and that you said was a very bad thing ?—I have no doubt the general inspectors would be able to tell you the methods of giving relief in all their unions.

1732. You would regard that as rather an important matter, would you not ?—Yes, certainly.

1733. And that is a thing that we ought to inquire into, is it not ?—That is for the Commission. My point is that the inspectors, if you warn them and give them a bit of time, will tell you anything relating to their own districts.

1734. Would you suggest that we should give them some heads about which they could bring us evidence ?—I will tell the Commission what I have done. There are six of the inspectors who, I believe, are going to give evidence, and who must be called, either because they are seniors, or because they are territorial. I met them the other day, and I told them the points I was going to suggest, and specially pointed out the subjects that I thought the Commission should investigate, and I advised them to make up their minds on what points they would specialise. That was all that we did, but that we did do.

1735. Would it not be important for us, as we are on the question of inspectors, to get more or less identical information, that is to say, information on the same points from each inspector; because if they tell us one thing about one district and another thing about another district we shall not get any kind of survey of the differences of administration between one district and another ?—That would be a method of examining them; but then, you see, some inspectors know some things which none of the others know; for instance, it is not every inspector who has had any experience as to the relief of able-bodied men in times of strike. I just mention that as the first thing that comes into my head. I think there are only two people in England who have had that experience.

1736. Therefore the evidence of the inspectors would resolve itself into two divisions—these points upon which we want evidence in regard to the whole country and his special knowledge ?—That is it.

1737. (Mr. Bentham.) You say there are fourteen inspectors' districts, I think ?—Yes.

1738. On what plan are they arranged—is it geographical ?—It is geographically, that is to say, they are planned for the purpose of the saving of travelling expenses and the saving of time. Then also, we like to get certain industries in one man's district as far as we can, that is to say, we like to have one man for Yorkshire and one man for Lancashire. Arrangement of inspectors' districts.

1739. Are some of the districts entirely rural ?—Practically so, with only one or two big towns in them—as for instance, Cornwall and Devon.

1740. In your opinion should the inspectors have more power over local administration than they have at present ?—I should have to consider that. Power in what direction ? I do not think without a complete reversal of the present system he could very well have more power. Inspectors' powers over local administration.

1741. I mean power in the direction that would ensure more uniformity of administration within his own districts ?—I think if there is any compulsory power to be enforced, the central authority is the authority to do it. I mean to say, if it was locally considered desirable that there should be no uniformity in a district, I do not think that the local inspector should be left to decide on that point himself, or to take measures. All that I think he could do would be to report to the Board, and then it would be for the Board (supposing it were considered desirable to get more uniformity by force, so to speak) to apply the force. I look upon the inspector's relations with the guardians as purely friendly, and that is what they ought to be.

1742. And you think they ought to continue only as such ?—I think so.

1743. If more power was given in order to ensure greater uniformity of administration do you think that ought to be vested in the central authority ?—Yes.

1744. And not in the inspectors ?—No.

1745. Have they any common uniform method of making returns to the Local Government Board other than what appears in the annual report ?—No; but in inspecting institutions they have to fill up certain forms. Inspectors' returns.

1746. The inspector makes a return of his own yearly, does he not ?—Yes, but that is purely voluntary.

1747. And those returns are not uniform ?—No. I have brought two of them with me which are the last ones issued.

1748. What is the object of their issuing a voluntary return ?—You need not issue a return at all, but if you do issue a return, you issue that form of it which you think is most suitable to your board of guardians.

1749. Or to show the discrepancies in the administration ?—Yes.

1750. If these be useful returns to make, why should not those returns be collected and published in the annual report of the Local Government Board ?—I think there is a great deal of information in the inspector's reports which might be very well published in the annual report; but then you must remember that the inspector also makes an annual report.

1751. Which appears in the published report ?—That appears in the book, but I take it that what you have in your mind is the inspectors' reports, like these sort of statistical reports of which there is an extremely good one from Yorkshire.

1752. When he has made that return, I suppose the central department will get a copy of it on every occasion ?—I think so, but I think that is rather as the inspector likes.

1753. Upon this return would it not be possible to see almost at a glance the discrepancies in administration, and to ascertain by some means or other why a certain union in an inspector's district is gradually increasing the amount of both in-door and of out-door relief, and a certain other union is gradually decreasing both ?—I am afraid that the differences in Poor Law administration and the increase or decrease in pauperism are dependent upon so many factors that you cannot very well sum them up in one return. For instance, the age of the people may be changing, the local industries may be altering and so on.

Procedure as to general inspectors' Reports.

1754. (Mr. Bentham.) When we adjourned yesterday I was asking you with regard to the reports of the inspectors, and in your last answer you said that the changes made in the districts, so far as industry and age were concerned, might materially alter the Poor Law conditions of the districts. What I am wanting more particularly to ask you about is with reference to the various unions within one inspector's district, and the difference in the administration of the various unions in one inspector's district. For instance, a report of this kind is sent in by one of the inspectors:—"In many instances the relief books are unsatisfactorily kept, and the full information required by them is not supplied in writing, and often the date of the last visit to the pauper does not appear. The quarterly revision of permanent cases is too generally slurred over, and is too often considered a tedious and uninteresting duty to which little attention is paid." Are matters of that kind reported to the central authority from time to time other than what appear in this annual report?—No, except that in the workhouse report there are columns showing the amount of in-door relief actually given.

1755. When these reports were received by the central authority what action would they take on a report of this kind—nothing?—They would leave it to the inspector.

1756. Then, outside the inspector's influence in the unions in his district, there is really no central control over the administration?—In exceptional cases we should write a letter of remonstrance or advice. I take it that your point is, what steps are taken to get uniform administration within each district? For that purpose the matter is generally left to the inspectors. The difficulty always is, as you know, that each union as a rule thinks it is a model union; and the only way that you can get unions more into line is by the publication of the figures, which is a duty that is undertaken by nearly all the inspectors within their own districts.

Area of general inspectors' districts.

1757. In order that the inspector may give efficient supervision over the various unions in his district, are the areas too large, do you think?—No, I think not. It is very essential that every public officer should be very fully employed, and I think, limiting the supervision to what it is now, the inspector's districts are very fairly arranged. There may be exceptional cases, but these are dealt with as they arise.

Frequency of general inspectors' visits.

1758. How often would they visit a union?—The inspector's duty is to visit each board of guardians once a year, and to inspect each workhouse once a year; but, of course, that is a very small part of his duties with regard to the guardians. He has to visit committees, to confer with the chairman, and to confer with the clerk, and in large unions I think you will find that the visiting is more often than once a year.

1759. Are records made of those visits?—Yes.

1760. And of the consultations with the guardians?—Yes. Every inspector has to send in every week a diary in which he states what he has been doing each day. Those diaries are examined in the office, and come before me.

General inspectors' weekly diaries.

1761. Are there any general instructions given to the inspectors in writing—are there any laid down, I mean to say?—No.

Instructions to general inspectors.

1762. None whatever?—None, beyond the instruction that he has to do all routine duty.

1763. Then very widely different policies might obtain in different unions, without any interference from the central authority?—Yes, certainly.

1764. With regard to the qualification of an inspector, I think you said there were no qualifications laid down?—The appointment is made on the president's own responsibility. But I must say this, that nearly all the inspectors have had some training as assistants before they are appointed to a district; nearly all the present men, for instance, had some training as assistant-inspector before they got their district.

Qualifications of general inspectors.

1765. Do you think it advisable that inspectors should have had considerable experience in Poor Law administration before appointment?—I think they should have had some.

1766. They are not consulted so much by boards of guardians as you would consider advisable, are they?—A great deal depends on the inspector, and a great deal on the board of guardians; I mean, you cannot lay down any general rule in that way.

Relations of general inspectors with Guardians.

1767. I was not asking for a rule, but what are the facts: are they consulted?—I will tell you one fact which is taken from my own experience: When I had a district, I never attended a routine meeting of a board of guardians at all unless under exceptional circumstances, and I waited till I was sent for. I found that by the end of the year I had been sent for by most of them; so that in my experience I was very widely consulted. I think most of my colleagues will tell you the same.

1768. In some districts the visits of the inspector are not particularly welcomed, I suppose?—I should think that is rare, but I know that some guardians do not welcome the inspectors in the same way that other guardians do.

1769. They look upon their visits as interference from the central authority, do they?—A great deal depends upon the tact of the inspector. We do not have much trouble—I do not say we have had no trouble—at any rate, we have had astonishingly little, considering how much the inspector has occasionally to criticise the action of individual boards of guardians.

1770. Then there are not many cases of that kind ?—There are very few.

1771. I think you said that it might be within the power of the inspectors to settle matters of detail between boards of guardians and themselves, instead of sending them on to the central authority ?—They do settle a great many matters of detail, and papers are frequently referred to the inspector, referred with the direction, "Settle this matter according to your own judgment."

1772. Would structural alterations come within the purview of the inspectors ?—Yes.

1773. But they must not involve borrowing powers, I suppose ?—The guardians have to get sanction under the law, but if the inspector says it is all right, and no loan is asked for, then the Board would in nearly every case consent.

1774. It would require sanction, then ?—It would require sanction legally.

1775. Did you find that that method had any effect upon the policy of the boards with regard to relief ?—I am talking now of workhouse inspections.

1776. But you would consult with them, or they would consult with you, on questions of policy occasionally, would they not ?—Yes.

1777. Was your advice acceptable, and did it have the effect that you desired of changing their policy or of directing their policy ?—If the advice was not well received I thought it was my own fault rather. I mean to say, it depends a great deal on the way it is put.

uence of eral ectors on rdians' cy.

1778. You did give them advice on policy, did you ?—Frequently.

1779. Is that the only method that the central authority has when dealing with boards of guardians and trying to get uniformity of treatment ?—When cases come before the central authority the central authority, as I have said, write letters—doctrinal or hortatory letters; but these matters of detail I think are better left to verbal communication with the board's agent.

1780. But this is not a matter of detail; I think this is rather an important point, or I would not pursue it so far Another inspector reports: "The contrasts of administration in various unions are very conspicuous, and it often happens that, of two communities living side by side in apparently identical circumstances, one administers the poor law as if the spread of pauperism were advantageous, while the other is careful to act on strict principles"—and then follow two instances. That is the kind of policy that I am thinking of; an inspector might be of great service to a board of guardians, and I want to know if you were often of service to them in directing their policy in the right direction ?—I hope I was, in calling their attention to the more excellent way of giving relief.

1781. You said there were three inspectors for boarded-out children; how often do they visit the children in their districts ?—As a rule once a year.

1782. Do they inspect children who are boarded out within the unions ?—No.

1783. Who inspects those ?—Those children are inspected by the relieving officer and the medical officer, who have to make written reports upon them. In a great many cases the guardians delegate their powers to a committee, mostly of ladies, to look after the children within the union.

1784. Is it not the duty of the general inspector to visit those ?—Not the individual children, though questions as to the efficiency of the inspection would come before him.

1785. Why are they not visited by the visitors for boarded-out children ?—I suppose for the same reason that other pauper children are not visited, namely, that the responsibility rests with the guardians. Where children are boarded outside the union, the guardians cannot inspect them conveniently; that is to say, it would be a great expense and trouble for a London board of guardians to go to Windermere or to any other place in the North of England to inspect their children boarded out there.

1786. But there are special boarding-out committees in both cases, both within the union and without the union, are there not; and it is the duty of those committees to visit and report, is it not ?—The committee inside the union would be under the direct control of the board of guardians.

1787. Not necessarily, I suppose ?—Yes. They appoint these committees, in the first instance; outside the union, the committees would be committees sanctioned by the Local Government Board. In the case of the children boarded out without the union that was paying for them, it would be difficult for the guardians to inspect these children; and I think historically I am right in saying that it was for that reason that the board found it convenient to appoint officers of their own to inspect those children who are boarded outside their union.

Poor Law Medical Inspectors.

1788. There are two medical inspectors, one for London I think you said, and one for the provinces; is that so ?—Yes.

Duties of Poor Law Medical Inspectors.

1789. What are the duties of these inspectors ?—I have handed in the minute of appointment showing their duties (See A. 1603)? Shall I say them again ?

1790. If you please ?—The London inspector is one of the general inspectors for London, and he deals specially with medical questions arising in London; he also advises the Board generally on medical questions. The duty of the other inspector is to inspect any workhouse as directed by the Board, or to attend any meeting of a board of guardians as directed by the Board. He has also as part of his routine duty, in every year to inspect six workhouses in each inspector's district, and at the beginning of the year the inspector has to send up a list of these workhouses for his inspection. He also has to advise on any general question arising in the provinces that specially concerns him.

1791. Can you tell us whether the control of the Local Government Board does upon the whole sufficiently retard or accelerate, as the case may require, the action of boards of guardians in dealing with the poor ?—That is a very large question; and I think, if you will allow me to say so, you will have the opportunities of referring to it again when I come to deal with the powers and duties of the local authorities and their functions.

Functions of Board's Architect.

1792. With regard to the Architect's Department, I think you stated that it was extremely difficult to check the local expenditure of the guardians after they once get their minds fixed ?—That is so.

1793. Does the question of the expenditure come before the architect ?—Yes. He advises us whether the expenditure is excessive, and he makes as minute an examination as he can of the specifications, to see whether the sum charged is excessive.

1794. When plans for a large scheme are sent in, at times at very great cost to boards of guardians, is it not rather difficult then to commence suggesting to the boards what alterations ought to be made; and, much expense having been incurred, if alterations are made, is not that expense partly wasted ?—I do not quite follow you.

1795. For instance, in one scheme that I have in mind where the plans cost something like £500, they were sent to the architect for his approval; he returned the plans, and the scheme was not sanctioned; then correspondence commenced with the Department with regard to those plans; the local architect stuck to his plans and the guardians backed their architect, and there was a considerable amount of friction and time wasted in getting the plans finally settled. What I wanted to get at was, whether you could suggest some better means of communicating with boards of guardians on any general scheme that is contemplated, prior to the plans having been decided upon by the guardians ?—We often suggest to boards of guardians that they should send a deputation to the board with their architect to confer with our architect. That is useful; but occasionally the two architects and the board of guardians cannot agree, and then the administrative part of the board is rather helpless.

1796. Does that arise in the first place through the inspector of the board; would he know of the schemes ?—He is always consulted.

Central Authority's printed instructions as to workhouse buildings.

1797. He does that work as a matter of general policy, does he ?—Yes. I ought to say what I have not said yet—that from time to time we have issued a memorandum of "Points to be attended to in the construction of workhouse buildings." I will hand in a copy of those, for the information of the Commission. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (28).) They are revised from time to time. You will find that one cause of any increase in expenditure has been, and is, that under these points the number of different classes to be provided for is greater than it used to be. In very early times the Poor Law Commissioners published their own plans, according to which nothing was allowed to stand in the way of simplicity of construction, except the separation of the sexes and of adults from children—that was all. As time goes on, you have to provide not only for the able-bodied, but for the old and infirm, the sick of various kinds, and so on; the gradual growth of that idea of classification can be seen in the several editions of these revised Points.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

23 Jan. 1906.

Effect of classification on cost of buildings.

Cause of increased loan expenditure.

1798. With regard to the very great increase in the borrowing powers of the boards of guardians in recent times for alterations and extensions, has that not been caused somewhat by the desire to treat the sick much better, and also to get children out of the workhouse, and by other things which are held to be desirable by the central authority?—The main cause of the borrowing is the desire of boards of guardians to provide better accommodation for the indoor poor.

1799. From what period does this policy date?—I shall come to that again later. You will see—not to anticipate my future evidence too much—that the real beginning of it was somewhere in the seventies, just after the scandal with regard to the condition of the London workhouses which led to the passing of Mr. Gathorne-Hardy's Act.

Relieving Officers' tenure.

1800. With regard to the tenure of office, I think you said the relieving officer had a permanent tenure?—Yes.

1801. I thought that those appointed since 1879 had not the same tenure as medical officers and clerks to the guardians?—I think that relieving officers, medical officers and masters of workhouses can be dismissed by the guardians in the first twelve months of their appointment without any cause being assigned; but after that they have permanent tenure.

Superintendent Nurse's tenure.

1802. You did not put the superintendent nurse into that category?—She too has a permanent tenure of office, with the additional advantage that she cannot be suspended by a board of guardians.

1803. You can suspend a master, but not a superintendent nurse?—That is so.

1804. Is there any reason for that?—None that I can see.

1805. Is it within the power of the board to alter that?—Yes.

Number and duties of lady inspectors of Local Government Board.

1806. (Professor Smart.) With regard to the lady inspectors, what is their status; do they rank with assistant inspectors?—Yes, they do.

1807. What are their duties?—The duty of Miss Stansfeld, who is the inspector in London, is to inspect certain buildings and certain parts of buildings, as, for instance, lying-in-wards, homes and so on.

1808. How many lady inspectors do you say there are?—We have one for poor law purposes and three for boarding-out purposes.

1809. One of them is confined to London?—Yes.

1810. And three are for the provinces?—Yes.

Effect of permanency of local officers' tenure.

1811. (Miss Hill.) Do you think that on the whole the permanent tenure of office has been beneficial? One can see that it has both advantages and disadvantages; can you say whether in your opinion the advantages of permanent tenure preponderate?—In my opinion they certainly preponderate.

Returns required from Local Authorities by Central Authority.

1812. (Mr. Phelps.) You spoke of the correspondence of the Local Government Board; could you put in a list of the returns which the officers in the country are compelled to make?—Do you mean those returns which the Local Government Board write to the clerks and ask them to prepare, for Parliamentary and other purposes?

1813. Those are the returns I am thinking of?—I am afraid this could not well be done.

1814. The object of my question is this: Is it within your knowledge that the officers complain very much of the immense amount of time which is taken up by preparing returns, and what not, for the central office?—They complain very much.

1815. Is it in the mind of the office to deal with that question?—We have dealt with it sometimes, I mean we have given the clerks payment for certain elaborate returns, but how far that principle can be extended, I am not in a position to say—that is a matter for my chief.

Multiplicity of accounts.

1816. Is the same true with regard to the number of accounts which have to be kept?—There is very great complaint as to the number of accounts which have to be kept.

1817. Do you think yourself, from your experience, that there is a waste of time in those two departments of the work?—So far as the accounts are concerned, I think there is certainly a waste of time.

Comparison of cost of Poor Law hospitals and Poor Law infirmaries.

1818. You gave us details as to the expense per bed of certain infirmaries; have you compared those figures with similar figures from other hospitals?—No, I have not. I throw out the suggestion that it would be well for the Commission to investigate that point further.

Extravagance on buildings.

1819. Do you in your experience find it more common to have to complain of extravagance, or to have to complain of cheese-paring?—The whole situation has changed since my early days. I used to have to complain of cheese-paring; I now have got the matter of extravagance very much in my mind—perhaps too much.

1820. Is it a question between more or less spending, or between spending wisely or unwisely?—It is certainly a question of the latter.

1821. The question with regard to extravagance is a question purely relative to the object?—Certainly.

Scale of comfort in Poor Law infirmaries.

1822. Do you think that the modern infirmaries are fitted up as a rule on a greater scale of comfort than is desirable?—A great deal depends on the union and a great deal depends on a point which I shall hope to put at greater length before the Commission later on, namely, whether the increased comforts in infirmaries are wholly altering the character of the in-door poor law administration, that is to say, whether they are not tapping a new stratum, which used to be far above the stratum which yielded pauperism, and if so, whether that is inevitable or whether it is not inevitable.

1823. You gave some figures comparing the outlay per bed in different unions; is the class of case in those unions different?—Naturally in urban unions, where the greater expense is, you have a larger proportion of what I may call curable cases; and therefore, I suppose, there would be a greater justification for getting absolutely first-rate medical wards there.

Officers' tenure: Age limit.

1824. Now with regard to the tenure of office; you think that the present system of irremoveability is good; but is an office terminable at any point in age? Take a master, for instance, or a chaplain?—At sixty the guardians may retire an officer if they like.

1825. (Sir Samuel Provis.) At sixty-five is it not?—Yes.

1826. (Mr. Phelps.) That is to say, it is terminable at a point in a man's life?—Yes.

Effect of Superannuation Act.

1827. Could you put in a statement which would show the Commission what the effect of the Superannuation Act has been? It would be interesting to know what is the position under that Act of a man when he retires at sixty-five, having enjoyed a salary, let us say, of £100 a year as master of a workhouse?—Do you mean as to the amount of pension he would get?

1828. How far the pension is really adequate to act as a temptation to a man to retire, or how far it would act as a deterrent?—Usually the officer stays as long as he can. But there is another complication which perhaps I should mention; and that is the matter of added years. Boards of guardians can under exceptional circumstances add a certain number of years to the service of an officer. That is under "special circumstances" and the board have to decide what "special circumstances" are. The board started by being very careful, but it is almost impossible to refuse a board of guardians permission to add years. The first difficulty came in by boards of guardians saying

"Unless we add these years to the officer the officer will not have enough to live upon, and we want to give him enough to live upon, so we must add these years," and that was held to be a "special circumstance."

Increased expenditure on salaries.

1829. We spoke just now of the difference between expenditure on buildings which was sometimes extravagant, and expenditure on buildings which was sometimes the reverse; do you find a similar change has taken place with regard to the salaries of officers?—The salaries of officers have very largely increased. As I pointed out yesterday, formerly the salaries of officers used to be 11·2 per cent. of the whole expenditure on relief by the guardians; but the salaries of officers now amount to a sum of 18·1 per cent. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (16).)

1830. Is that because there are more officers, or because their salaries have been raised?—It is due to both causes.

Effect of grants in aid.

1831. Do you think that the system of giving grants in aid of salaries has increased extravagance?—Personally I am against that system; whether it has increased expenditure or not is a matter of opinion.

Relation between guardians and their officers.

1832. On the whole, would you think, from your experience, that board of guardians deal fairly and justly with their officers?—I think they deal very fairly and justly with their officers; and I should like to say that I think that on the whole the officers deal very fairly and justly with them. I should like to say this now, lest I forget it—nothing strikes a man who is accustomed to inspect workhouses more than the goodness of the master and the matron. Of course, I know there are exceptions, and there must be exceptions, but the kindness and consideration which the ordinary matron shows to the children and the old women is remarkable. That is my impression.

Complaints against officers.

1833. You have told us that the complaints against officers have become very much smaller in number?—That is so, they are very much smaller.

1834. Has the quality of the offences altered?—That I do not know. The usual offence for which a man is dismissed is either fraud or drink.

1835. Not cruelty, for instance, or misconduct of that sort?—No, that is very rare.

1836. That is extinct almost now, is it not?—I think that is extinct; it is so very unpopular with boards of guardians.

1837. But you do sometimes find fraud?—Yes.

1838. On a large scale, would you say?—Not on a large scale, but there is fraud sometimes, and there is drunkenness—that is the usual cause.

Returns asked for from guardians.

1839. (Dr. Downes.) On the question of the returns that are obtained for the central authority, I think the guardians' officers are very often asked for returns not only by the board but by the inspectors also?—Yes.

1840. And also by other boards of guardians?—That is continually being done.

1841. So that altogether a great deal of useful information is accumulated by the returns asked for by one or another?—It is the only way in which you can get information of that description.

Central Authority as an "Intelligence Department"

1842. Do you think it would be advantageous if the central authority developed itself rather more into what I may call an intelligence department?—That is rather a matter of internal organization, but it is certainly receiving consideration.

1843. If such returns as have been referred to were collected and published from time to time they might prove of great utility, might they not, and be preserved?—I think so. Often a valuable return is got, but it is never summarised, and the results are never printed, so that it becomes practically inaccessible. I think a good deal might be done to remedy that.

Effect of comparative statistics on local administration.

1844. I think you said in your evidence this morning that the publication of figures was one effectual way of bringing local administration into line; if one board of guardians knows what the cost of an institution is elsewhere, that is a guide to them in regulating their own expenditure, is it not?—It is; and it is often a matter of very great surprise to a Board of Guardians when they find that other people are doing the work for less money than they are.

1845. Up to that time possibly they were not aware of anything of the kind?—That is so.

1846. On the question of inspection, inspection may have its disadvantages as well as its advantages; for instance, there may be a danger of over-inspection?—There is a very great danger of over-inspection.

Dangers of over-inspection.

1847. May not the responsibilities of the guardians and of the officers be possibly weakened by over-inspection?—They not only may be, but are in some instances.

1848. The case in fact is rather different now-a-days to what it was in the early days of the Poor Law, is it not?—The whole character of boards of guardians has changed; there is no doubt about that.

Effect of Local Government Act 1894.

1849. The Act of 1894 has brought about a considerable difference?—It has brought about an immense difference.

Lady guardians.

1850. We have lady guardians now?—And ladies' committees.

Increased powers of individual guardians.

1851. There is also, I think, Sir Henry Fowler's order, which gave very free access to institutions in the case of individual guardians?—Yes. Any individual guardian can now go into a workhouse and inspect it; he occasionally is a great nuisance, but on the whole he is a check.

Functions of Poor Law Medical Inspector for the provinces.

1852. With regard to the services of the medical inspector for the provinces, I think there is no difficulty in any inspector obtaining his services at any time?—Never; so far as I have found it, he seems to be ubiquitous.

1853. His services are by no means limited to the routine inspection of six workhouses?—They are not. Among other things, he has to sit as assessor with an inspector who holds an inquiry which involves any medical question.

1854. In the case of any emergency any inspector could I take it, wire for his services?—Twice in the last ten days we have had unfortunately to trouble Dr. Fuller.

Cost of Poor Law infirmaries.

1855. On the cost of modern Poor Law buildings, especially infirmaries, I am not sure whether the instances you gave us were in all cases separate infirmaries. The infirmary at Hendon I believe is a separate infirmary, and so are those at West Ham, Willesden and Islington; but is the infirmary at Dartford a separate infirmary?—It is not, if you mean by a separate infirmary what I may call a self-administered infirmary.

See Appendix No. III.

1856. I mean a self-administered, separate institution?—That of course makes a great difference in the cost, because you have to provide for the medical officer's house, for separate nurses' quarters, for separate stores, and so on.

1857. Very often a laundry and sometimes electric plant have been provided?—Yes, all of which to my mind are occasionally extravagances; I think they could do without them in many cases.

1858. In comparing the very wide differences of cost shown in the figures you put before us, those circumstances would have to be taken into account?—Certainly. You will find that, on the list I have handed in, the separately administered infirmaries are marked.

London Cubic Space Committee: Cubic space per bed as affecting cost.

1859. There is another possible cause of difference of cost between London and the districts outside London which I think you did not refer to, so perhaps I may remind you of it; namely, that in London the cubic space per bed is regulated by the report of a committee which sat in 1867?—Yes, there was the Cubic Space Committee. In London the space is 850 cubic feet, and in the provinces it is 600 cubic feet, is it not?

1860. Yes; so that a bed in the London infirmaries is not quite the same as a bed in the country infirmaries. There is a further difference, I think, in some infirmaries which will have to be taken into consideration, namely, that some provide more day room accommodation than others?—Yes.

Submission of pencil sketch plans to Central Authority.

1861. It is therefore to be noted that your figures are all per bed, which is not necessarily the same as per cubic space. One question that was put to you related to some plans that cost £500; I believe the board have frequently suggested that pencil plans should be sent up in the first instance, in order to save expense in the preparation of plans?—Yes; that is now almost a universal suggestion.

1862. So that there is no occasion for guardians to go to very great expense in the preparation of plans before receiving sanction?—That is so.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

23 Jan. 1906.

Appendix No. III (3). Differences in cost of Cottage Homes.

1863. Can you explain the great difference in the cost of the cottage homes that were mentioned? You gave us Chorlton, Liverpool, Barrow and Haverfordwest. Were the Chorlton homes separate institutions?—Yes, I think so.

1864. And Liverpool also?—Yes.

1865. What about Barrow?—That probably was not. This is a point that rather illustrates the building question. When cottage homes were introduced, which was a great many years ago, the idea was that cottage homes would be cheaper than block buildings. The original idea of a cottage home was a real cottage, but the cottage has now become a villa I often think that the real criterion between a cottage home as it was intended and a cottage home as it is now, is that in the old cottage home the children were tubbed in a bath in the kitchen, and now they have got a bath that probably cost a great many pounds, with hot and cold water laid on and all the rest of it. That change illustrates the process which is going on. I remember my original idea of a cottage home was just a cottage.

1866. You will find cottages now with forty children in them, I believe?—Yes, you will find cottage homes with forty children in them, costing £200 per bed.

Building requirements of Central Authority.

Appendix No. III., H.

1867. As to the general question of cost, you have referred to the Points that were drawn up by the Local Government Board, as laying down their requirements for the provision of poor law buildings; are you aware of any material alteration of late years in those Points which would increase expenditure?—None, I think, except the additional classifications. But then, of course, one must remember that the cost of building has very much gone up in the last few years; I have a return of the number of pence per hour paid to masons, plumbers and so on, which was given to me by our architect. Then there is the additional question whether the men do as much work as they used to do.

Clerks to guardians as "whole-timers."

1868. (Mr. Gardiner.) In some unions I understand the clerk to the boards of guardians gives the whole of his time to the duties of his office, and in some unions he gives part of his time; have you any experience which you could give us showing the relative advantage of the two systems?—It all depends on the size of the union. In a very large union the duties of the clerk would hardly allow him time to do anything else; but in unions of a moderate size there are some advantages in having a practising solicitor as clerk. He has a certain influence; for instance, he is very often clerk to the justices, and holds other offices which give him a position which is useful to the administration of the union. Of course, in some unions it would be impracticable for the clerk to do anything else but his own work.

1869. Is not the tendency among boards of guardians rather to appoint a man to give his whole time, seeing how much the clerk's work has increased, owing to the Act of 1894, and so forth?—I do not see much difference.

Appointment and qualifications of auditors.

1870. The auditors, I understand, are appointed by the President of the Local Government Board?—Yes.

1871. Have they to possess any special qualifications?—I would rather not answer that question, as it is not immediately in my department. I know that the auditors have to undergo a certain training, but exactly what it is I do not know. You had better get that from somebody who is more familiar with the subject than I am.

Qualifications of relieving officers.

1872. As to the qualifications of the relieving officer, have the Central authority laid down any rules on that subject?—No.

1873. None whatever?—No.

1874. So that the old system might obtain that a guardian who had failed in private business might be appointed relieving officer by his colleagues out of sympathy?—The appointment has to be sanctioned by us, and certain questions come up and have to be answered, such as the size of the district, and so on; and there, as in the case of the nurses, we can remonstrate. We could refuse to appoint an obviously unfit man, and I think we should; but between fitness and special qualifications there is a good deal of difference.

1875. I think you said just now that no general instructions are issued to your inspectors similar to those which have been issued for many years by the Board of Education to their inspectors?—No. There are instructions, but they date from very early times.

General instructions by Central Authority to Inspectors.

1876. I was going to ask whether, supposing those instructions exist, they would not be of great value in teaching the guardians their duties? What I have noticed very much myself—and I have suffered from it a great deal—is their ignorance. If we had some code of that kind which was called a Code of Instructions for inspectors, then a new guardian, if he cares for his work, could study it and so start knowing something, instead of having to buy all his experience and knowledge at the expense of the ratepayers?—Would the object of that be to keep the inspector up to his work?

1877. No, the object in my view would be to instruct a guardian as to his duties. I consider that a great many things which are criticised now in the administration of workhouses are the direct result of ignorance on the part of the guardians; and I want to know whether any code of instructions exists which might be put into the hands of a well-intentioned newly-elected guardian, which would give him some teaching other than what he would get out of Glen or Archbold or some enormous tome of that kind?—You mean something, for instance, showing the points on which the guardians are entirely responsible and the points on which they have not complete power?

Need for instructions to guardians.

1878. Also the general principles of out-door and in-door relief, and so on. It seems to me that all over the country every board of guardians is buying the same experience; at least, I have served on three boards of guardians and that has been my experience?—There is something to be said for your suggestion.

Position of general inspectors subsequent to 1894.

1879. Since 1894 should you say that the inspectors have been more or less generally consulted, and more, may I say, courteously consulted and generously consulted?—I think they have been more consulted.

1880. Their advice has been more generally followed, I think?—I think they are much more considered than they used to be.

Number of inspectors of boarded-out children.

1881. As regards the number of inspectors of boarded-out children, would it be wrong to say that one of the reasons which may have led to the failure of the boarding-out system in many parts of the country has been that there has not been a sufficient number of inspectors?—I should not say so.

1882. My point is that it is just likely that if the guardians saw more of your inspectors, and if your inspectors shewed guardians more what their duties as guardians were, you would get much better work done; but that is only my idea?—We shall have to talk about boarding-out later.

Departmental arrangements of Central Authority.

1883. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) You have spoken of the different departments of the central authority, can you tell us what those departments are?—There are the engineering departments, which have to deal with loans for public drainage, water-supply and so on; then there is the medical department, which deals with medical inspection, vaccination and so on; then there is the Poor Law department; then there is the audit department; and then there is the legal department.

1884. Within the Poor Law department are there various sub-departments?—There are two sub-departments within the Poor Law department; there is one which deals with general correspondence, workhouse inspection and the proceedings of boards of guardians generally, and there is another which deals more especially with the officers.

Indoor staff of Poor Law department.

1885. Is there a large staff in connection with the Poor Law department?—The Poor Law administration sub-department has a principal clerk, 3 upper division clerks, 4 staff officer and higher grade clerks, and eleven other clerks.

1886. How are these appointed; are they all appointed by the president?—No, those come in by public competition; they pass a competitive examination under different scales.

General inspectors' influence on guardians' policy.

1887. To pass to the question of the inspectors, I understand that it is part of their duty to influence the policy of their unions; would you say that the inspectors in general have a policy of their own?—I think so. I think you will find that the ones you will have before you will have a very definite policy.

1888. Would it on the whole be the same policy?—It would differ in details no doubt.

1889. Do you think that their districts would reflect their policy on the whole?—They would reflect their efficiency, I think. Of course they do influence policy to a certain extent.

olicy Central uthority.

1890. Would you say that the central authority itself has a policy?—I hope so, but that is a matter with which I hope to deal later on. I hope to show historically the difference in the point of view, as I take it, speaking entirely for myself, that has happened in my time.

1891. Should we find that policy reflected in recent circulars?—Yes.

1892. So that you will be able to tell us roughly what the policy of the central authority is?—I shall be able to point to the circulars, and I shall leave you to form your own judgment as to what is the policy behind them.

andard cost for ildings.

1893. I was wondering whether in reference to the cost of the buildings, it might be possible to have some standard plans and rules as to the maximum cost per bed, leaving the local authorities to show good reason for any deviation from those?—Or possibly to leave the deviation or excess out of any loan. That is a point for consideration.

1894. (Mr. Loch.) That is to say, to charge it to the year's accounts?—Yes.

1895. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) So that the burden of the change in the plans would rest on the local authorities and not on the central office?—Yes, or rather the board would be assisted in being somewhat stiffer in the matter of loans. Of course there are great objections to that, owing to the varying needs of the varying districts, and owing to the difference in the cost of building in the various districts.

1896. But then they could show good reason for any deviation?—Yes. We rather endeavour to work on those lines now.

dditional alifications r relying icers.

1897. You spoke about the type of officers; would it not be possible to insist upon some training for relieving officers? Nurses now must be trained, but, as I understand, there is no training for relieving officers?—That is so, and it is very difficult to see what the training should be.

1898. Do you think some form of examination would be possible?—Personally, I have a deep distrust of examinations; but that may be merely personal.

1899. Some form of probation under other experienced relieving officers in good districts might be possible?—That seems to me more practicable. I have often advised boards of guardians to ask a newly-appointed relieving officer to go and spend a week or two with an experienced officer in the neighbourhood.

parate blication general spectors' orts

1900. Would it not be well if the Local Government Board were to publish the Poor Law reports separately, and if the inspectors were asked to report a little more fully about their districts?—Yes; but sometimes we get complaints that inspectors report too fully. I am very much struck, reading up the inspectors' old reports, or looking through them as I have been doing lately, with the excellent stuff that some of them are. It is almost a pity that they should be entirely buried in a Blue-book.

1901. They really are buried, for it is very difficult to dig out anything from them?—They are, and that of course is a point; but still the different inspectors' reports are of very unequal value.

dditional alifications relying icers.

1902. (Mr. Loch.) With regard to what Mrs. Bosanquet has just asked as to the relieving officers, do not the relieving officers divide themselves into two groups—a good many of them being young men taking up the work professionally, and a certain number being older men appointed sometimes very casually?—That is so.

1903. With regard to the younger men, would it not be possible to lay down, at any rate for them, certain qualifications, seeing that the standard of work done by the relieving officers varies immensely even in the same union?—As far as I know that is the case, and we do get very unequal work in the same union. I am disposed to say that a relieving officer nascitur non fit.

1904. True, in a measure that is so, but the search for the exceptional man which your motto suggests is left without any kind of instructional order to the boards of guardians, so that if a man does not fulfil certain conditions he is not thereby put out of the running?—That is so. He must be able to keep his books; that is about the present qualification

1905. Take a point which is very important in the formation of a judgment upon the man; he ought to know something about the Poor Law, ought he not, and what the aims of the orders have been, why they are, what they are, and so on?—Yes, he should. A great many people ought to know more about the Poor Law than they do. But if a man is keen, he will learn; if he is not keen, you cannot make him learn.

1906. I think that in some quarters it is agreed that the changes in the last ten years have thrown more responsibility on the relieving officer, particularly when he has a new board, which naturally finds itself confronted with many difficulties; and therefore that knowledge, if he can use it, is doubly important to him and to them?—All that you say I agree with. I would add this, that of all the Poor Law officers, the relieving officer is the most difficult to supervise. He only has to attend the meeting of the guardians once a fortnight, say, and of his proceedings in the meantime you know nothing, except by that very imperfect book which is called the Application and Report Book. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (24).) He may be doing anything; he may be even engaging in another trade or profession without your knowing it.

Difficulty of supervising relieving officers.

1907. What I suggest is, that possibly the clauses in the order bearing on relieving officers might be revised in some measure, in view of the great change in poor law administration to which you yourself have referred?—That is a point for consideration, and I will look into the matter as carefully as I can.

1908. I will just refer to one point in relation to the architect: Could it not be made a rule that only sketch plans should be considered by the board, because in that way the very large initial expenditure on plans would be avoided as a matter of course?—I think we might do something in that direction; but I should think, speaking off-hand, that nearly always in the case of large building operations, the plans that come to us now are sketch plans.

Expediency of sketch plans being submitted to Central Authority.

1909. Going to the question of loan expenditure, is it possible to take the line that no more than a certain proportion of the assessment rate should be borrowed by a board, whatever its demands might be?—There is a limit already; they have no borrowing powers beyond a proportion of their rateable value. With regard to the loan expenditure, I may say this—I think this is what you want to get at: In the triennial period from 1857 to 1860, 3·5 per cent of the total expenditure on poor law matters is represented by loans repaid and interest. That mounted pretty evenly to the year 1900, when it was 7·8 per cent.; it has now got in the year 1904 to 9·3 per cent., so that 9·3 per cent. of the total expenditure on relief may be charged to the loan account. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (16).)

Loan expenditure: Limit to guardians' borrowing powers.

1910. Roughly, the percentage has trebled in the period you have taken?—It has grown, but it has not quite trebled.

1911. So far as there is a ratio of limitation, that is, a sum in relation to the assessment which they must not exceed, may it be said that the law as it at present stands restricts expenditure by way of loan?—It does restrict it to a certain extent. The growth of the loan account is a matter for serious consideration. I should like it to be understood that I express no opinion as to whether loans should be restricted to a great extent or not, nor do I express any strong opinion as to whether the expenditure on buildings can be restricted beyond a certain extent. My point is that the expenditure appears very large indeed, and the loan account appears to be growing ominously; and that those are questions which I think deserve consideration.

1912. Is there any official, apart from the general office, who is specially acquainted with the loan movement and has to specially report upon loans?—We have full information as to loans in the department, some of which I will put before you later on when I come to deal with expenditure.

1913. Would it be out of question for the Local Government to require boards of guardians to report annually on certain specific points; at least so that on those points

Powers of Central Authority to obtain reports from guardians.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

23 Jan. 1906.

there might be information in regard to every board in England, those points being of vital importance in regard to administration?—As, for instance?

1914. As, for instance, the amount of out-door relief and in-door relief, and the reasons for an increase; also, the amount of the medical out-door relief (which is not in the reports now), and other points, such as whether there is already in the place sufficient hospital and dispensary accommodation, we will say, for dealing with a certain amount of medical relief? A list of points might be suggested which would be all more or less important, at any rate in the urban communities?—You will observe that we have very full statistics from the boards of guardians. Whether those statistics are just what we want is a question, but that we have very full statistics is a fact. What you are asking for now is explanatory comments on the statistics of each union to be made by the boards of guardians themselves.

1915. My desire would be that a board of guardians should form a judgment on its own work annually in reference to certain specific points?—Some boards of guardians do, and they make very interesting reports. If all boards of guardians did it, I think it would be useful, provided the reports were summarised and made use of. There is no use in sending up a mass of reports which lie in a corner undigested; nor, I think, would it be of any use to ask boards of guardians to undertake such a duty, which would depend to a great extent on the competence of the clerk and the chairman. Some of the Yorkshire unions for instance, I might say, make most interesting reports.

1916. I myself have had great difficulty sometimes in obtaining informaton about one union on points of importance, through there being no report; whereas in another union, as you yourself say, the information is to be had at once. It seems to me that a local appendix to what we might call the Poor Law part of the Annual Report, if it were formed in such a manner as that, would be of very great service?—Yes, it would.

Publication of statistics by general inspectors.

1917. One other point in regard to the details of the administration to which Mr. Bentham referred. Would it be possible for the inspectors, instead of a general statement, such as has been made by Mr. Preston-Thomas in his report which Mr. Bentham quoted, to put down the facts in regard to each particular union in an official document, so that the whole of the unions in the county might know how they stand on points of importance?—Do you mean that they should have to fill up a form?

1918. I mean that the inspector should not merely say some unions are bad and some unions are good, but should state simply the facts with regard to each of them, and that that information should be put before the country?—That might be all very well for us who are living in London, but the inspector has got to live among his boards of guardians, and it may be an indiscreet thing for an inspector to be too frank.

1919. I admit that difficulty; but the point remains that the influence of one man in trying to change a multitude of details must very often be comparatively small, whereas the tendency to imitation as between board and board may be a very strong force; and if it is thought that a certain board is doing well and it is known as taking the lead, there may be a movement by way of copying that board?—You will find that a great many of the inspectors have anticipated your suggestion by making these returns; for instance, I put upon the table yesterday a return which I made for the guardians in my district. Mr. Fagenal, who is the Yorkshire inspector, and Mr. Bircham, who is the inspector for Wales, have each sent me a return which is practically an analysis of the pauperism in his district, written so plainly that almost any board of guardians could understand it. I have not seen such returns before, but they are obviously useful.

1920. It seemed to me that the method might be pushed further, and that they might form part of what I have called the local appendix to the Poor Law section of the Annual Report?—You mean to say that those reports might be printed?

1921. I think they would be of very great value to the general onlooker and promoter of good administration?—That point will be considered, I may say, when the question of the inspectors' reports generally is under consideration.

Friction between Local and Central Authorities.

1922. One point as to the cases of controversy to which Mrs. Webb referred. Are the cases where there is an actual opposition of opinion as between a board of guardians and the Department, which lasts for a long time, very numerous?—They are not very numerous. There are some old cases where the board says one thing and the guardians say another, and there is an interchange of letters that leads to nothing. I confess that in those cases it might be often possible and better for the board to give way.

1923. Does it form a very large part of the friction of the board?—I should say an infinitesimal part, because these questions, even when they are at their acutest, are very often settled by a single interview between a sensible man and the board of guardians, who probably have misunderstood the point a little.

Additional years under Superannuation Act.

1924. I should like to ask one more question, and that has to do with the subject of superannuation. Is there any kind of scale showing what number of years is added; say, for instance, that a man who is fifty wants to come in for superannuation, what years would be added in his case?—He cannot get superannuation then, unless he has got a medical certificate.

1925. But supposing he gets a medical certificate?—Then it would be within the option of the guardians. The board never suggest that years should be added.

1926. If there is no scale for the addition of years, is there any control over it, so that the guardians may not do what is merely equitable, but what is rather a matter of favouritism in regard to their servants?—As I think I pointed out just now, it is very difficult for the board to check boards of guardians in that matter.

1927. In that view should the Statute be reconsidered from the point of view of the added years. Is it acting really unjustly by leading to undue expenditure of the public money at the present moment?—I do not think the present administration is quite in accordance with the exact wording of the Statute; that is to say, the Statute said that these years should be added for special reasons, and I think there is a little straining in order to bring in "special reasons."

Effect of Superannuation Act on cost of salaries.

1928. May we take it that the Superannuation Act is the source of the largest increase in the item of salaries since 1896?—No, I should think not; I should think it is the increase in the number of officers. When we get to the nursing question, you will see how very large an increase there has been in the number of nurses, for instance. Then you must remember that the population of the country is growing very fast, and that what I may call the tendency to classify by different institutions entails the hiring of a great many more officers. Take a cottage home for instance. You have got to have a foster-mother for each cottage, and so on.

1929. Does the Act really lead to a man who has done comparatively small service becoming entitled to proportionately too high retiring pay?—I think not. The condition of superannuation is that you only receive one-sixtieth, I think it is, of your salary and emoluments per year's service. I think the pension is not excessively large; you have to serve a very long time before you get two-thirds of your salary.

1930. Have you ever considered whether there should be what you might call a public service in the matter of officials, so that you could treat this question of superannuation as if they were in the service, the relieving officers being placed here or there, as might be thought fit?—Speaking entirely for myself, I think the financial part of the Superannuation Act will have to be reconsidered. There is a general fund formed by compulsory deduction from the salaries of the officers in which each union shares, but the actual pension is paid out of the funds of the union in which the man last served; and there is a complaint, and an increasing complaint, of which no doubt the Commission will hear a good deal hereafter, that boards of guardians are too apt to appoint young officers, so that they may not be burdened with the cost of their superannuation later on. I do not say I have not known cases of that, because I have known some glaring cases; but whether it is a common practice I think is doubtful. I think that, cæteris paribus, a board of guardians will always choose a younger man, and sometimes do so having before their eyes the fear of having to pay a superannuation. That could only be remedied probably by forming a central fund out of which the superannuation shall be paid; but that would open large questions as to the possibility of making the whole poor law service a national service, against which there is a very great deal to be said.

icacy of eving ers' ies.

1931. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) The relieving officer's duties are very delicate and difficult, are they not, in the way of giving relief when applicants come, as they must come in some cases, very frequently?—Yes, they are very difficult. If the relieving officer is too strict, he may get a bad name; the parson may complain of him or the good lady of the village may complain of him. If, on the other hand, he is lax, he does an infinity of mischief. He is the most important officer you can imagine.

aries and spects elieving ers.

1932. Can you give us any indication generally of what is the salary of a relieving officer?—The salary of a relieving officer in London, I think, is limited to £160 a year; I think that is his maximum. In the country a man would get from £90 to £120 or £130. But there is this to be considered, that the relieving officer has very often other duties; he used to be school attendance officer; he very often is vaccination officer, and he has other small duties to perform, such as registrar of births and deaths, and so on, which increase his salary to a fair living wage.

1933. But it is not in a sense a service which a man enters with the intention of remaining in it and making it his life work, and getting promotion from one place to another?—It is an out-door occupation, and it does not take a man's whole time in a great many instances. A great many men have a fancy for it. Sometimes I have known a workhouse master give up a much better berth, in order to get the out-door life, in which I sincerely sympathised with him. There is some interest about it too. But it is not of course a position in which a man can make a fortune, or in which there is any great avenir—any great chance of promotion.

1934. I am endeavouring to compare it with the somewhat analogous position in Scotland of an inspector of poor; there the service is one which has a very considerable status, for an inspector of poor in a large parish is a person of position; but that, I understand, is scarcely what you would say of the relieving officer in England?—No. Does not the inspector of poor do the clerk's work as well?

1935. He may or he may not be clerk as well; that depends?—He never is in England.

culation elieving cers ween ons.

1936. In most cases with us there is a clerk in addition to the relieving officer. Are the English relieving officers promoted as a rule from one union to another?—No. A union in appointing another relieving officer would be well advised perhaps to take an experienced man; but as a rule they do not. The difference in salary between one union and another is not so large as to make it worth a man's while to move.

1937. Then there is no promotion from a union in one part of England to a union in another part, because of the better position and the increased salary?—No.

arate or Law rmaries.

1938. In the majority of your rural workhouses, the infirmary buildings, I suppose, are part of the workhouse?—Yes, that is so. The infirmary buildings form a separate block, but they are administered from the workhouse.

1939. I do not know whether it has ever been proposed that the infirmary buildings should be entirely separated, and that the workhouses should be used specially not for cases which are sick and infirm but for test cases, and that the sick and infirm cases should all be placed in the infirmary building?—That is very largely done in urban unions, and the process is going on, but in the country unions the reply is that in an English country workhouse there are no test cases practically—there are hardly any able-bodied of any sort.

le-bodied country rkhouses.

1940. You gave us an instance of a cottage home housing forty children and costing £200 per bed; that, I suppose, is a system that has grown up side by side with that of boarding-out pauper children?—Yes, it has grown up side by side with the various systems which are now all on their trial in England for the care and treatment of children.

1941. I rather gather from what has been said that the system of boarding-out is not altogether a success in England?—I would rather deal with that when we come to the question of the children.

1942. I was merely going to ask you, with reference to a question that has already been put—namely, whether the non-success, if it be non-success, was not due to the want of inspection—whether it has not been suggested that there is too much inspection, too much of an inquisitorial system, which has brought complaints from the people with whom the children are boarded?—That suggestion has been freely made.

Inspectors of boarded-out children.

1943. How are the rates collected; is there a separate officer in a union who collects the rates?—Yes.

Relieving officers as collectors of rates.

1944. Is he separate from all those of whom you have been speaking?—Yes.

1945. That work, then, is never done by the r lieving officer?—It is never done by the relieving officer. We object to his holding that office.

1946. (Sir Henry Robinson.) What are your powers where a board of guardians decline to carry out your suggestion? If, after the exhortations and blandishments of the inspectors, the guardians still hold out and refuse to carry out your recommendations, you have no power, I understand, to supersede the board of guardians?—There is no power of that kind at all.

Central Authority's powers when guardians contumacious

1947. Unless there is a statutory enactment or a regulation of the board which you can enforce by mandamus, you can do nothing if the guardians stand out against you?—That is so.

1948. Are there many cases of the kind where you have required additional powers, and where you think they would be of service to you?—Here and there there have been cases, but they occur very seldom. I know of no current cases now.

1949. Do you know of cases, such as we have had in Ireland, where the contractors have refused to supply any more food for the inmates, and we have been at a deadlock with the union on that point?—We have not got quite to that in any case yet.

Attendance of guardians at meetings.

1950. I think with you the attendance is very much better than with us; I suppose there are not in your recollection any cases where a board of guardians as a body have failed to attend the meetings?—No; they always attend.

Appointment and tenure of general inspectors and assistant inspectors.

1951. With regard to the appointment of inspectors, I understand you attach great importance to the efficiency of the inspectors?—I do.

1952. And to the influence which they exercise?—I do not think it would be practicable to work a centralised system like ours without local agents.

1953. That points to the necessity of getting efficient men; as I understand, you get assistant inspectors first and they are promoted to inspectorships?—That is now the usual procedure.

1954. Are the assistant inspectors permanent officers?—Yes.

1955. So if an assistant inspector was appointed, and if he was found not to be a man who took a very great interest in his work, still he would have a permanent tenure of office, and, short of any fault, you could not very well put him out?—What would happen to him would be that he would continue to be an assistant inspector; he would not get a district.

1956. So if an assistant inspector is not considered an energetic and very efficient officer, some other man, his junior, would be put over his head?—Yes.

1957. And he might remain an assistant inspector all his life?—He might.

1958. But you have no power absolutely of removing him, short of any fault on his part?—No, he is a permanent civil servant.

Central Authority's knowledge of proceedings of guardians.

1959. The central authority here does not receive copies of the minutes of proceedings of the boards of guardians, do they?—No.

1960. How do they know exactly what is going on?—The inspector receives every week a form, which is known as Form A, in which the statistics of the union as to indoor relief and out-door relief are set out; and on the outside of that the clerk has to notify any exceptional circumstance.

1961. But the information given is only in regard to relief?—Yes. I may say that some of the larger unions print their agenda papers, and as a matter of courtesy send them to the inspectors. I have found that extremely useful.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.P.

23 Jan. 1906.

Laboriousness of duties of guardians' officers.

1962. I think you said that a very good class of officer had been elected in recent years?—Yes, I think they are a very good class.

1963. A great many of them, I suppose, are hard-worked?—Most of them are, but that is just the difficulty. A half-employed officer, as you know perfectly well, is a great mischief. In the question of Poor Law administration, we always have that difficulty to face; for instance, an officer of a very small country workhouse has not very much to do, in fact he has too little to do.

1964. You stated that you considered there was rather a waste of time in regard to account-keeping?—Yes, I think there is.

Departmental Committee on Workhouse Accounts.

1965. Is that the opinion of the Local Government Board?—It was the opinion of a Departmental Committee that sat on the question a little time ago.

1966. Have they done anything now to rectify that?—The order is under consideration.

1967. So that that is only a temporary matter?—That, I hope, is only a temporary matter.

Frequency of inspectors' visits to boards of guardians.

1968. (Sir Samuel Provis.) With regard to the visits of an inspector to a particular union, you have told us that he is expected to attend a meeting of each board of guardians once a year and to inspect the workhouse?—That is so.

1969. Of course he would attend much more frequently in any particular case where there was some special reason for his so doing?—He does—that is the practice; and he attends committee meetings frequently.

1970. Supposing there were some special matter going on at the union that required his attendance, would he, as a matter of course, give special attention to that union, and visit it more frequently?—Yes, either on his own initiative or by the instructions of the board.

Separate publication of Central Authority's Annual Report on Poor Law.

1971. With regard to the annual report of the board, I do not know whether the point has come before you, but it has been suggested that the annual report should be divided into two parts, and that the poor law part should be separate from the rest; is it within your knowledge that that point is at the present time under some consideration?—Yes, I know it is. Further, the point is under consideration whether each inspector should not choose for himself a special subject to deal with in his report, which I think would be a considerable improvement.

Separate reprints of general inspectors' Reports.

1972. At the present time, with regard to the reports of the inspectors which are printed in the annual report, it is frequently the practice, is it not, to reprint separately the report of the inspector, so that he may circulate it in his district?—If the inspector thinks fit, the board reprint it for him without any trouble at all; and then he can send it round.

Nature of extravagance on workhouse buildings.

1973. Coming to the question of the buildings, would it be your view that, generally speaking, buildings which might be avoided are put up; or do you think the additional cost arises, not from unnecessary buildings, but from an expensive way of carrying out?—It arises almost entirely from an expensive way of carrying them out. Occasionally, you have an unnecessary building, but that is owing to a fault in judgment (which is quite pardonable) either by the board of guardians or by the Local Government Board; such cases will perhaps be brought before you.

1974. Would you not say that generally it is rather that the guardians are difficult to get to put up a new building at any time, say a new workhouse, than that they are anxious to put up a new workhouse, when one is not wanted?—Yes.

1975. And that sometimes the Local Government Board have a difficulty in persuading them, either by correspondence or by the action of the inspector, to provide a new workhouse or some additional building, such as an infirmary, where one is really needed?—There are many instances of that kind; and then when a board of guardians have once determined to put it up, they occasionally, according to my judgment, are prone to overspend.

Central Authority's check on extravagance

1976. Taking those latter cases, has not the action of the Local Government Board been in the way of advising them to avoid all unnecessary expense in the way of undue ornament, for instance?—We take a great deal of pains about that, and an increasing amount of pains. The Architect's Department are very anxious indeed to avoid expenditure. As I have pointed out, there are many other causes, and the question is an old one; I quoted Mr. Goschen's Minute in 1870 with reference to it.

1977. Within recent years I think that view has been re-affirmed?—It was re-affirmed by Mr. Chaplin.

Building requirements of Central Authority.

1978. Further than that, the architectural "Points" which you have put in, are drawn up with the view of showing what is really necessary for the proper accommodation of the poor, and in no way to encourage the guardians to do that which is unnecessarily expensive?—That is so. Of recent years, the board have not only drawn up "Points," but they have actually made scale plans* for cottage homes, with very careful calculations of the cost per cubic foot—a most useful work, and tending very much, as I think, in the direction of economy. I shall put those in too. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (29).)

Effect of classification on cost of buildings.

1979. It is the case, I think you told us, that a good deal of the increased expense in building has been caused by changes in the view which has been taken as to what is necessary for the accommodation of the poor, for getting the children out of workhouses, and for setting up separate infirmaries?—That is so.

Effect of abolition of barrack schools on cost.

1980. Take one instance, the abolition of barrack schools and the substitution for them of separate schools; that has necessarily involved considerable expense, has it not?—It involved an immense expenditure, amounting to hundreds of thousands of pounds.

Limit to guardians' borrowing powers.

1981. Coming to the borrowing powers of boards of guardians, is there not a distinct limit to the amount which they can borrow?—Yes.

1982. I think the limitation, which was altered by Sec. 2 of the Poor Law Act, 1889, is now one-quarter of the rateable value of the union, but may be extended by provisional order to one-half?—That is so.

Period for repayment of loans.

1983. With regard to the period for loans, the usual period which is allowed by statute to a local authority is a maximum term of sixty years I think?—It is a maximum of sixty years for land, is it not?

1984. I think it is the maximum allowed by statute, without saying for what purpose. The actual term to be granted depends, does it not, upon the circumstances of the particular case, and is to be fixed by the local authority and sanctioned by the Local Government Board?—That is so.

1985. I think in 1897, an Act was passed which made that law applicable to boards of guardians?—That was so.

1986. Consequently now, a board of guardians may borrow for sixty years as a maximum period, the actual term being settled by the board of guardians with the sanction of the board?—That is so? the Act fixed the maximum only.

1987. Then, as a matter of practice, sixty years are allowed, are they not, for land?—As a rule, I think only fifty.

1988. I think latterly it has been thought that the maximum term of sixty years might be granted for freehold land, has it not?—Yes.

1989. With regard to buildings, sixty years, I think, are never given?—I think never more than thirty years are given.

1990. The period also is less where alterations are proposed to existing buildings, is it not?—Yes, and also for such fittings as boilers and so on, where we only allow perhaps five, ten, or fifteen years.

1991. The term being made to depend upon the probable life of the work?—That is it.

Conferences as to proposed buildings between representatives of guardians and Central Authority.

1992. You told us that before new buildings are carried out, conferences frequently take place between the architect of the guardians and the architect of the Local Government Board; the inspector is usually present at those conferences, is he not?—I advise that he should always be present.

1993. And commonly he is?—Commonly he is. He is much more often present than he used to be; I may say now that he is always present.

* NOTE.—The blocks for the plans referred to have been destroyed. The Memorandum accompanying the plans is printed in the Appendix. (See App. Vol. I. (A), No. V. (29).)

1994. It is evidently desirable that he should be, so that questions of administration may be considered as well as mere building or architectural arrangements ?—Yes.

smissal of icers.

1995. With regard to the officers' tenure of their appointments, about which a good deal has been said, guardians can, in the case of the less important officers, remove them, can they not ? It is only with regard to the more important officers that the consent of the central authority is necessary ?—That is so.

1996. Since that order of the 12th February, 1879, to which you referred just now, the guardians can, even in the case of the more important officers, remove them with the consent of the Local Government Board ; and it is not the case, as it was formerly, that the board should, themselves, remove the officer ?—That is so. This has made a considerable change in practice.

1997. That is to say, the guardians have got more initiative in the matter of dealing with their officers than was the case prior to the issue of that order ?—Quite so.

smissal officers ring bation.

1998. Further than that, during the first twelve months of their employment—I am speaking now of the more important officers—the guardians may dismiss them, may they not, with the consent of the board, without fault shown, but simply because they do not consider such officers suitable for the post ?—I have already called attention to that point.

1999. That was done intentionally, was it not, with the view of preventing guardians being saddled with an officer who was unsuitable, but against whom no specific allegation could be made ?—That was evidently the intention ; and, so far as the Boards of Guardians go, it meets the difficulty to a considerable extent, and it puts the responsibility on them in a way that used not to be the case.

nure of itary cers and or Law icers npared.

2000. The question was raised as to the relative position of sanitary officers and Poor Law officers ; is there not some distinction between them in this way, that with regard to medical officers of health they have in London a permanent tenure of office, that is to say, they can only be removed with the consent of the Local Government Board ?—So I understand.

2001. And with regard to the sanitary inspectors in London, that is not so ?—I do not know ; I never had anything to do with them in London, but I believe it is as you say.

2002. I think the Act expressly enables borough councils to remove them themselves. Going outside London, is it not the case that the tenure of office of a sanitary officer depends on whether half the salary is re-paid or whether it is not ? Supposing half the salary is re-paid, then he can only be removed from office with the consent of the Local Government Board ?—That is so.

2003. It is, is it not, largely the practice amongst local authorities to appoint sanitary officers for temporary periods ?—Yes, for terms mostly not exceeding seven years.

2004. Consequently they can, if they please, at the expiration of the time for which a man is appointed, appoint somebody else ?—Yes.

2005. That would not apply of course to the case of a Poor Law officer who once appointed remains permanently in office until he is removed ?—The difference is essential.

ect of perannua- n Act on t of aries.

2006. Then coming to the question of the superannuation of the officers, that has no doubt largely added to the apparent cost of the officers ?—Yes.

2007. But when that cost is considered, there ought also to be taken into account, ought there not, the fact that the officers themselves contribute each year a sum towards their superannuation ?—Certainly.

2008. That sum, therefore, ought to be deducted ?—That was in my mind when I said that the main cause of the increase in the cost of officers was, probably, the increase in their number, and not the superannuation.

2009. With regard to grants in respect of Poor Law officers outside London, there is now, I believe, no grant in respect of the salary of a particular officer ?—There is none.

2010. The grant that is made in respect of officers under section 26 of the Local Government Act, 1888, is a grant which depends, not on the officers at the present time employed, but on the amount that was paid in respect of officers during the year ended March 25th, 1888 ?—That is so. The grant is fixed according to a criterion, and the criterion adopted was the cost of officers at that date. The grant has not varied since.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

23 Jan. 1906.

Basis of officers' grant under Sec. 26 of Local Government Act, 1888.

2011. Consequently, the guardians have no inducement one way or the other to appoint or not to appoint an officer at the present time in consequence of that grant ?—That has nothing whatever to do with it. That is the root of the misunderstanding which so many guardians have. They say, the cost of our officers has increased by so much, and, therefore, we ought to have more out of the Treasury grant. They do not understand that the grant was fixed then and there on a criterion of that year.

Reports on foreign Poor Law systems.

2012. I think you have made some reference to something that has been done abroad with regard to matters of this kind ; have you had occasion to consider foreign systems of Poor Law ?—For a great many years all the foreign papers came to me, and I made what use I thought fit of them. I have now handed them over to a very competent officer who, I hope, will make a great deal more use of them than I was able to make. As you are aware, the Board have at various times sent inspectors abroad to investigate foreign systems.

2013. Do you remember at all what they are ?—I remember Mr. Henley going to America ; last year Mr. Preston-Thomas went to Switzerland ; I went to Germany, and I have also been to Denmark for the Board. Perhaps there have been some others whom I forget. We have endeavoured to keep as far as we can in touch with what is going on abroad.

2014. You made some report on the Elberfeld system, I think ?—I did.

Basis of officers' grant under Local Government Act, 1888.

2015. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) With regard to the operation of the Act of 1888 to which Sir Samuel has referred, as I understand it, the stereotyping of the conditions of distribution of the grant, and its subsequent operation is a grievance to many boards of guardians and their officers ?—It is a grievance due to misunderstanding. They are under the impression that the State at that time undertook to pay a certain proportion of the cost of the officers, and they say, The cost of the officers has now increased, and we ought to get more ; whereas the cost of the officers was merely a chance criterion taken for the then division of the money which there was to divide.

2016. Is that not a grievance that it would be desirable to get rid of ?—The difficulty is to find some other criterion. I suppose the day will come when the matter will have to be re-considered.

2017. (Sir Samuel Provis.) The Local Taxation Commission recommended that it should be altered, did they not ?—I think they did.

2018. (Mr. Loch.) Perhaps the day is passed for making grants for specific offices, and the question might be re-considered entirely de novo ?—I think there is no doubt it will be re-considered de novo, and very soon.

Adequacy of information as to foreign Poor Law systems

2019. (Chairman.) You have stated that various officers connected with the Local Government Board, including yourself, have made reports on foreign systems of Poor Law ; it will be the duty of this Commission to examine into those systems ; is the information that you have at the Local Government Board tolerably complete as regards the particular systems which have been investigated ?—No, it is not up to date, but we can tell you generally what it is. For instance, only last night I had handed in to me an interesting report of the recent change in the French Poor Law ; I merely had time to glance at it, but I can see it is useful. It was made by a member of the department.

2020. Therefore, in your judgment, we shall have to supplement the information which is in the department ?—I think that is quite probable.

Salaries of relieving officers.

2021. (Mr. Booth.) With regard to the pay of relieving officers, is it usually progressive according to service increasing from year to year or from five years to five years ?—No. If the relieving officer applies for an increase, he may get a small increase. Relieving officers are not, as a rule, appointed, as a great many nurses are, with a salary rising progressively.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

23 Jan. 1906.

2022. Then when you speak of the various rates of pay, rising from £90 to £160, we are to understand that the salaries vary according to the nature of the duties, or the union?—Yes. I should say that some superintendent relieving officers get a great deal more than the £160; but those are exceptions.

Effect of Superannuation Act on cost of salaries.

2023. With regard to the deductions made from their pay towards superannuation, I understood you to say that the fact that they paid towards superannuation themselves must be taken into consideration when the total amount of the charge that falls in this way upon the unions or the rates is considered; but if it is deducted from their pay, surely what is deducted on the one hand is added on the other, so how does it make any alteration in the total?—My point is this; I was talking about the increase in the ratio of salaries to the total expenditure; the salaries are shown in the figures, but the superannuation deductions are not shown.

2024. Then it merely bears upon the method of keeping the accounts?—Yes.

Circulation of general inspectors.

2025. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) When an inspector is appointed to a district, does he remain for the whole of his life in that particular district?—No; from time to time he gets changed for one reason or another. When I was appointed first, I was in Wales, then I went to Lancashire, then I went to Yorkshire, and then I went to Sussex. The change comes about either through the man's own desire or for reasons of public convenience.

2026. But the shifting about does take place?—Yes.

Reasons for powers of Central Authority.

2027. (Chairman.) I think you would like now to explain why the central authority is very centralised?—Yes. The administration which I have endeavoured to describe, is evidently one of very great centralisation, and the question which occurs is, why it is more necessary to centralise the administration of the Poor Law than any other branch of local administration. I think myself the answer may be found in this—that the destitute man has, in this country, what is practically a right to relief, but his right is not a complete right, for the necessary sanctions are lacking, that is to say, he cannot sue for his relief or move the courts to compel the guardians to give him his relief; therefore, it is the duty of the State to see that he gets his rights. I should say that the position, so far as the Poor Law and the destitute person are concerned, is this—that the State may safely guarantee a maintenance to the destitute, provided the condition of the person so maintained shall be or shall appear to be inferior to that of the poorest independent labourer. Assuming that I am right in that statement of what I may call the political aspect of the case, you will observe that there is a guarantee on the part of the State. Now it seems to me that the department has to see that that guarantee is fulfilled.

2028. The only local authority who can fulfil that duty is the board of guardians?—Yes; and hence the Local Government Board have to interfere, apparently with great minuteness, in the local affairs which fall under the board of guardians.

2029. They have to do that in order to see that the destitute person's right is respected, and that the conditions under which he applies for it are not contravened or put on one side?—They have two things to do; they have to see that the machinery for carrying out what I believe to be the guarantee of the State is in working order, and they have to see, as far as they can, that the conditions of relief are not such as to be mischievous to the Commonwealth.

Effectiveness of audit.

2030. I think you have described the limits of the actual control of the Local Government Board over buildings and over the appointment of officers; and, I understand, you would like now to say something as regards audit surcharges?—I have already explained the limitations of the board. I should like to say now, that, so far as audit surcharges are concerned, the board are criticised very often, and perhaps a little unjustly, for remitting the surcharges. It has been held by some people, and pressed on us, that if the surcharges were more rigidly enforced we should have a better administration. There were last year over 1,600 surcharges; 800 items of those came before the Local Government Board, and in forty-four cases alone was the surcharge actually pressed to the repayment by the individual guardian or officer who was responsible. I would say that out of that 1,600 a great many were on purely technical points—perhaps merely money charged in a wrong account; and a great many were discharged without appeal. We hold that the very fact of surcharge in most cases fulfils its object in preventing a recurrence of the irregularity; and, except in cases of fraud or extreme negligence, we do not resort to the extreme step of making the individual who is responsible for the irregularity pay up out of his own pocket. That is, I think, what I have to say as to the audit surcharges.

2031. Are these charges ever of so great magnitude as to make it very difficult to enforce them?—I think that would be rarely the case in matters of Poor Law administration.

2032. Then really the only consideration that governs the Local Government Board is one of equity?—Yes, We have ample equity power.

Political influence Central Authority

2033. If the Local Government Board control boards of guardians, the Board in their turn are subject to constant control from Parliament?—Yes. A good many of the critics of the Local Government Board would seem to have it in their minds that the Local Government Board is an independent body carrying out a certain policy. Perhaps in the early days that might have been so. For fourteen years after the new Poor Law Act was passed, the Poor Law Commissioners were in a sense independent of Parliament, that is to say, they were not exactly independent of Parliament, but they were an independent Commission not directly represented in Parliament. Now the situation is changed, and the President of the Local Government Board is usually a member of the Cabinet. More and more, so I should judge (of course I give this entirely as a matter of opinion) the members of the House of Commons take an interest in the current administration of the Local Government Board. They continually ask questions with regard to points of Poor Law administration and they occasionally bring in and pass an Act of Parliament which is contrary to what would be generally considered the Poor Law principles as laid down by the original Commissioners. Of course I express absolutely no opinion—not a shade of opinion—as to whether those Acts are right or whether they are wrong. I merely call attention to the fact that Parliament does, from time to time, pass such Acts. I will instance the Medical Relief Disqualification Removal Act, by which it is enacted that the man who is in receipt of purely medical relief shall not be disqualified from voting. I make this further point with regard to that Act—I suppose the intention of the framers was what appears on the face of the Act, namely, that the relief should be merely relief by advice or medicine; I am told—and this is a point which I think the Commissioners would do well to further consider—that some revising barristers now hold that inmates of workhouses or Poor Law infirmaries do not lose their vote, provided the first cause of their entrance into the workhouse was their sickness and not their destitution. That is an extension of the Act which would seem to imply that the framers of it did not quite see what the ultimate result of their action would be.

Medical Relief Disqualificati Removal Act.

Interpretation of Ac by revising barristers.

2034. Do you mean that the revising barrister rules that they are not paupers, even although they are permanent inmates?—Even although they are inmates of a workhouse or infirmary.

2035. And have been for a lengthened period?—Yes.

Out-door Relief Friendly Societies Acts.

2036. Are there any other Acts of that kind that you would wish to mention?—Another instance was the Friendly Societies Exemption Act 1894, which laid down that boards of guardians need not take into consideration any sums up to a certain sum—5s. I think—which were received from friendly societies by applicants for relief. That Act was passed in reversal of the old policy of the Poor Law Commissioners and of the Local Government Board. You will find the matter dealt with in several of the old reports—I am not quite sure whether it is dealt with in the Report of 1834—and you will find it very amply discussed and argued out in a letter which was written in the year 1870 by the then Poor Law Board (Mr. Goschen being President) to Sir Richard Paget. Then this Act was passed by Parliament in 1894.

2037. (Mrs. Webb.) Was there not a second Act?—Yes. A second Act, which was passed in 1904, went a step further, and enacted that the guardians were not to take into consideration sums received up to 5s. from a Friendly Society. That Act may have been right, or it may have been wrong, but it certainly was not in accordance with the Poor Law principles that had been worked on by the department; for these reasons—It is giving relief to people who are not necessarily destitute; it is ear-marking a certain sort of property for special treatment; and it is restricting and curtailing the powers of boards of guardians in dealing with individual cases of relief—all of which is entirely contrary to the principles of the early Commissioners. Then there is a growing habit on the part of the House of Commons—I do not say it is not a useful thing to do—of referring Poor Law Bills to a Select Committee. The Select Committee makes a report, and you will find that in some of those reports there are obiter dicta, which are not, as I should think, in accordance with Poor Law principles. Then again, the fact that the President of the Local Government Board changes with the Cabinet is not conducive to continuity of administration. I do not give any instances of that, because I do not think there are any, but still, as a matter of theory, it serves to illustrate my point, which is briefly this, that critics of the Local Government Board are very apt to forget how close the influence of Parliament is and must be on the current administration and on the actions of the board as illustrated in circulars and orders.

Influence of Select Committees. President of Local Government Board a Politician.

2038. (Chairman.) You have spoken of Select Committees to which Bills are referred; has your attention ever been directed to the composition of those committees?—Not further than must strike everybody who has given evidence before them.

Composition of Select Committees.

2039. In what particular?—I think I may say that, as would be natural, anyone who takes an interest in the subject would like to get on a committee of that description, and very often the interest is that of a man who has views which are not very generally held and which he wishes to push.

2040. Then would you arrive rather at the conclusion that the composition of the committee had been regulated more by the interest which individuals took in the Bill which was referred to them, than that the committee itself was representative of the whole House of Commons or of the community at large?—I do not know enough about the way in which Select Committees are constituted to be able to say that, but I should think it extremely probable.

Central Authority's Relations with Local Authorities.

2041. Then the Board has to deal with self-governing authorities?—Yes. While on the one hand Parliament is above, influencing and inevitably influencing the Department, it is too often forgotten that on the other hand below we have not got an absolutely free hand, and that we are dealing, and have always been dealing, with local communities, who inherit traditions of local self-government. Quite early—I think in their fifth report—the Commissioners say this: "We have ever sought to exercise our powers in such a manner as to avoid all unnecessary interference with boards of guardians and other local authorities, and we have abstained carefully from doing anything which might extinguish the spirit of local independence and self-government which, when guided by an enlightened discretion, we consider the characteristic excellence of the English people." That, I think, applies pretty well to the policy of the board throughout. The Commissioners—you may call them doctrinaires, you may call them what you will—at all events were men who had a very clear conception of what they wanted, and were prepared to do a good deal to get what they wanted in a matter which seemed to them vital to the welfare of the people; and from the very first you find they had to consider these questions of local government. Mr. Twisleton, one of the assistant Commissioners, points this out in 1839.—"There is, I conceive, no slight jealousy on the part of some country gentlemen at the idea of their being in any way controlled by an external power in managing the affairs of their own parishes." That feeling is strong to this day, and that is an essential factor in the whole administration of the board. We have to consider, and I for one believe that we have rightly to consider, what the views and wishes of the local self-governing bodies are.

2042. Have you anything further to say as regards the relations of the Board to the local self-governing bodies?—The very constitution of the boards of guardians also makes the work of the control of the central body rather more difficult. There are 645 boards of guardians in the country, and besides those, there are twelve out-door relief unions. Those unions vary in size, from places like West Derby or West Ham, with 529,000 and 580,000 inhabitants, to places like Welwyn, and Reeth in Yorkshire, with under 3,000. You have other contrasts as, for instance (Liverpool), with a population of 150,000 on 1,800 acres of ground, and Reeth with a population of 2,500 on 74,000 acres of ground. You have every variety of local self-governing bodies to deal with, but you must have common regulations which are more or less applicable to the whole, and that is another check on the power of the Local Government Board to carry out what they might, from tradition or from conviction, believe to be a right policy.

Variety in size and population of unions.

2043. I understand that uniformity of regulation and administration under conditions so very widely different is very difficult?—That is my point. It is not only difficult, but it is a real check to the administrative proceedings of the board, and a check which is very often forgotten by the critics of the Department.

Difficulties of uniformity in administration.

2044. Have you anything to say about the guardians who are selected in the various districts?—Taking the rural districts first, I would call the attention of the Commissioners to the fact that the original unions were formed by the Poor Law Commissioners on the principle of uniting a market town with the parishes conveniently situated around it. That principle was not always carried out, and it was very much modified by local Acts, by the demands of large urban centres, and sometimes by the necessity of squaring an adjoining landowner—it was tempered by jobbery, no doubt. You can see that in the formation of the unions. But, subject to these conditions, that was the underlying principle which was more or less carried out, and those unions, except for the changes which have been introduced owing to the difficulties of county boundaries, have remained pretty well till now. So in rural unions you had, and you have to this day, a real feeling of local self-government and local patriotism. There is a definite financial reponsibility on most of the individuals. There is an admixture of classes on the governing body. The folk know one another, and can get their best men. Then you must remember that now guardians in country districts are not elected ad hoc; they are elected as district councillors, and the district council has duties of a very varied character and of a very important character which give interest to their proceedings. For instance, the rural district council has to manage the public health administration of the neighbourhood and it has to manage the roads and various other matters which Parliament is always putting upon it. So I think, and I am glad to think, that in rural districts, at all events with certain exceptions, you have the real conditions of local self-government.

Origin of union areas.

Character of local government areas.

2045. Perhaps the simplest way to get your evidence on that point would be to ask you what is your experience of the Act of 1894, so far as the administration of the Poor Law is concerned?—The Act of 1894, as you may remember, put an end to all qualifications for the office of guardian, and did away with ex officio guardians among other changes; so that now a Board of Guardians is elected in the most direct way by the parochial electors. The effect of that Act was to put the local Poor Law administration of this country through the most searching ordeal. I doubt if any commission, sitting for any time, examining any number of witnesses, visiting any number of workhouses, could put the Poor Law of this country to such a searching examination as it was put to then. I have endeavoured to find out what the exact change in the personnel of the boards of guardians was, but I do not think there was any return on the subject. It may be enough to take some unions, and I take them by chance, because they happen to be reported on in the Inspectors' reports at that time. I have a group of ninety-three unions in Mr. Jenner-Fust's and Mr. Bircham's districts; that is to say, in Lancashire and in Wales. Out of 3,669 guardians, after the election you had boards on which 1,680 had not previously served as guardians; that is to say, nearly half the guardians were changed. In some districts the proportion was more than that. Ex officio guardians were swept away, many ladies took their places on the boards, and many who were keen to put down what they supposed to be abuses in the working of the Poor Laws, came on as guardians. It was a complete revolution. In the result some boards of guardians, certainly for a time, made radical changes, and in some cases gave out-door relief in the most lavish way. I have one case in London which my colleague, Mr. Lockwood, reported on. In the first fortnight the stone-yards were opened, as the guardians had (as candidates) pledged themselves to dispense with what is known as the workhouse test. A deputation representing the unemployed came to the first meeting requiring the fulfilment of the pledges. At one time during that winter they had 3,000 able-bodied men out of work.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

2046. Where was that?—That was in St. Olave's Union, now the parish of Bermondsey, in London. But on the whole, throughout England in a very short time the new guardians had fallen into line with the old, and there was no extraordinary change in the way in which Poor Law administration was conducted You do not see any great rise in pauperism anywhere; you do see a rise in expenditure, but that rise is merely the continuation of the upward curve which dated long before. If the Commission will forgive me, I will state the case in my district exactly as it appeared to me at that time; I do not say I should write exactly the same now: "Out of the 1,000 guardians who administer the Poor Law in this district nearly half were elected for the first time . . . . Under the old system of election many guardians filled the office . . [only] . . . as being the only available men in the parish or for some other accidental reason. This class has been largely replaced by others who either hoped to gain some municipal or political advantage, or who felt a genuine interest in Poor Law or other local administration. . . . A large proportion of the new members were convinced that large and easy reforms of the Poor Law administration lay ready to their hands . . . . In the result, while many sound and beneficial reforms of a minor character have been introduced, the instances where there has been any abrupt departure from the principles [of the old] administration have been extremely rare. The new guardians have in nearly every case fallen into line with the old, while a cautious advance has been made towards the settlement of many questions of workhouse management. So far as out-relief is concerned the changes have been somewhat greater. A few unions are more strict than they used to be, while in some others there has been a considerable increase of expenditure. Shortly, this has been due to a reasoned conviction of the mischief which results from inadequate doles, while in some few cases it can be traced either to definite socialistic opinions or to inexperience. . . . The fears . . that the electorate would return guardians pledged to distribute the money of the ratepayers have in this district at all events proved entirely groundless . . . There are many grounds for believing that so far as the honesty and capacity of the administration is concerned the future is full of promise of good. . . . It is to be regretted that more men of the artisan class have not been elected, for in some unions they have done much good and will do more." That was my opinion of the change at the time. What I submit to the Commission is, as I said before, that the Poor Law was then submitted to such an investigation, such an ordeal, such an enquiry, as it will never have to undergo again, and so far as the current administration or the current principles were concerned, it emerged almost unscathed.

2047. May I ask the date of that report?—My report was written in 1896, two years after the passing of the Act.

2049. Would you apply that to the urban districts?—The urban districts are not so satisfactory, but I think there are other causes which may have led to results which in certain instances are, to say the least of it, disheartening. In dealing with the question of the new guardians you must remember that there was a considerable change made about that time in the amount of Exchequer grants made to local authorities. In the first place, there was a matter which concerned but few unions but which was of great importance to them; that was the Government grant in lieu of rates. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (20). I have here a list of unions, in which that grant is particularly high. The list is not a complete one, but I find, for instance, that at Devonport the percentage of Government property to the total valuation is 23 per cent., that is to say, 23 per cent. of the expenditure of the guardians is contributed by Government in respect of Government properties such as dockyards, arsenals, and so on. In the Alverstoke union the percentage of Government property is 20 per cent., and in the Sheppey union where the Sheerness dockyard is, 23 per cent. is the amount contributed. That amount is handed over to the boards of guardians to spend as they please, and the Government have no vote and no representation on the board of guardians. I say that if a locally elected body on that franchise can withstand that temptation they are fit to be trusted with almost anything.

Character of local government in urban districts.

Government property in unions; its effect on administration.

2050. In the particular cases to which you allude, the poor rate did not go up?—No. In one remarkable case which was then in my district—that is the Medway union, where they have the Chatham lines and the Arsenal, the Government contribution is 18 per cent, roughly speaking 4s. in the £; and there, so far from there being a more lax administration, the out-door relief went down in a most remarkable way. Out of the savings of about four years they have built new schools which cost £20,000. I think that is all to the credit of the boards of guardians. There is another point to be considered. The contributions of the Government since 1888 have come up to something like 5s. in the £ on the money locally raised, that is to say, the ordinary board of guardians now, when they spend a sovereign, are only spending 15s. of money raised by their own constituents. Then you have as another temptation to extravagance the heavy increase (which is a matter you will have further to investigate) of railway rating, and other contributions which are received by the guardians without any representation, that is to say, a railway company has to pay a large and ever increasing amount of rates without any voting power, and without the power of checking the extravagance of the boards of guardians. (Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (21). And then there is another contribution, which is a small matter, namely, that under the Agricultural Rates Act. Then you have what is outside Parliament altogether, and that is the gradual extension by an automatic process of the rateable value of property other than land, I mean that by the growth of population house property becomes greater, in proportion, than landed property. The point of my evidence on this part of the subject is this—that it may be that the increase of expenditure which I shall have to show you by-and-by is due, not so much to the changed character of the boards of guardians—I think it can be demonstrated that it is not due to that—as to the temptations to extravagance which in my opinion arise, and must arise, from the increased contributions to the expenditure of the union from sources which do not have any effect on the election of boards of guardians. Those considerations are adverse to all unions alike.

Amount of contribution to guardians from Imperial sources.

Growth of railway valuations

2051. Now take the Agricultural Rates Act, and tell us what its effect has been; does that operate in the direction you suggest?—Not much, except that those members of boards of guardians who were most adverse to expenditure were farmers. They are a body of men who think of their rates as a whole, and who do not consider what the rate is going to, but now they feel better off in the matter of rates.

Effect of Agricultural Rates Act.

2052. Would you put it broadly in this way, that neither an Exchequer contribution nor a reduction in the rates is looked upon by boards of guardians as something which should effect a saving, but is rather looked upon as something which should be spent?—I would put it in this way—that they feel rather better off, and that there is not the same check on their expenditure as there used to be. The question is, whether that is fair. I go so far as to say that to my mind the great danger to local government is the extension of grants which will destroy the financial responsibility of the local governing body. My main interest in that is because I look upon a free and strong local self-government as the best safeguard that we have against a demoralising Poor Law administration.

2053. Are you of opinion that the Exchequer contributions distinctly tend in that direction ?—I am.

2055. (Miss Hill.) Does that apply also to the large number of contributions which now come from railway companies, limited liability companies and so on, without any power of participation in local work, without any votes or anything of that sort ?—That is one of the main sources of contribution.

2056. You are not confining your criticisms to the Government grants ?—I am not specially ear-marking as mischievous, Government grants. I am pointing out that the whole financial conditions at present existing tend, in my view, towards the destruction of our best safeguard against a demoralising Poor Law.

2058. There is a difficulty arising out of the Act of 1894, that the Local Government Board has to face which I think you desire to bring before the Commission, is there not ?—Yes. I want to say that some boards of guardians are obviously too large. Some boards, I believe, are more than 100 in number ; the York Board I know is eighty. The Local Government Board used to have the power of dealing with those cases, and also the power of dealing with union areas. Under the Act of 1894, to put it very briefly, those powers have been shared by county councils, and the consequence is that the Board cannot find it expedient to carry out their own powers, because it might clash with the powers that are in the hands of county councils. I suggest whether it would not be well that the Local Government Board should have further and more direct powers for dealing with those boards of guardians where the conditions of local self-government are either not present, or else are under disadvantages owing to such details as the fact that the board of guardians is unwieldy or that the areas might be properly altered. We have powers—and I daresay that Mr. Adrian has explained to you exactly what they are—but they seem to me to be rather ineffective at the present moment ; and the matter is one of some importance from the point of view of local administration.

2060. Will you now give us your opinion as regards the conduct of the urban unions ?—I have given some illustrations of what I conceive to be adverse influences to the efficient administration of the rural boards. All those apply to urban boards as well, and there are others in addition. For instance, in large urban unions there is very little common interest in the locality. I am told by my friends who live in London that they have not the least idea, or had not unless they looked at their rate papers, in what borough they are ; and they do not know what union they are in. Therefore, there is no common interest in the locality. One of the results of that is that in urban unions there is very little voting at the elections. I would like to call attention to a short article which appeared in the Charity Organisation Review with respect to that. The writer points out that practically the people in a London election do not vote, and they do not know for whom to vote. I have been shown a number of election circulars by gentlemen who were seeking the office of guardian ; who they are, or where they come from or what you ought to do under the circumstances is very difficult to say. I do not think the ordinary elector takes the slightest notice of them, according to what is stated to me about London, and according to my experience in the large towns.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

23 Jan. 1906.

Apathy of electors.

2061. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) Does that apply to London only ?—I was going to say that my experience in the large towns also is that there is often no interest whatever taken in these elections unless there is some extraneous interest, as, for instance, politics. You get plenty of voting when the election agents want to see which way things are going at the next general election, and when they have a sort of dress rehearsal. Then you have lots of voting. But unless there is some such extraneous interest you very often in urban unions do not get the interest which you ought to have. You get the interest sometimes and the voting upon the question of vaccination, which has no more to do with the Poor Law than it has to do with anything else in the world, and should not, from the point of view of the Poor Law administrator be any part of the duty of the guardians, but should be part of the duty of the county council. But there, as I say, you do get an interest. Unless there is a very flaring question, say a question of building a new workhouse, or of some large expenditure, that catches people's eye, you do not get the slightest Poor Law interest in the election. All that is adverse to the constitution of urban guardians.

Type of urban guardians.

2062. (Chairman)—What is the position socially of the members of boards of guardians in the larger urban districts?—They are good enough men in themselves, but they are very apt to be all men of one class. My experience is that, to have really good Poor Law administration, you ought to have, as a rule, members of various classes. I know that about the best board of guardians I ever saw (it was the old Manchester Board) was composed of only thirteen men. No one cared enough about the election to vote, so that there was not an election for many years, and the members deliberately co-opted the best men they could get. For instance, when the Church of England minister on the board retired they elected another clergyman in his place, and when the Roman Catholic priest retired they elected another priest in his place, and so on. One of the dangers of urban administration is that you do not get an admixture of classes on the boards.

2063. What is the class they are all taken from now ?—They are very often people who have not much financial responsibility ; I mean, men who live in houses which have a low rateable value. You will find very often that some of the most extravagant boards are those that belong to unions where the bulk of the guardians live in £15 houses, £20 houses, and that sort of thing. That I have often seen.

2064. You mean the class just above the weekly payment class ?—I mean the small tradesman class. You get the most excellent administration in some of those unions, but these are adverse influences, to my mind. I am not complaining of the administration at all, but I do say that there are adverse influences which tell more against urban guardians than against rural guardians ; and these are the lessened financial responsibility, and the want of admixture of classes.

Influences affecting guardians' elections.

2065. I understand that the interest in Poor Law elections in urban districts is, under normal conditions, slight ; but that under certain circumstances a fictitious interest is given to these elections, and as a rule the interest so aroused is not for the purpose of improving the Poor Law, but rather for the purpose of breaking down some of the existing conditions ?—I should say that the interest is either very small, or else as a rule it is excited on subjects which have nothing to do with Poor Law administration at all, or occasionally by an outburst against some particular scheme, which is generally, I have found, based upon somebody's interest.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

23 Jan. 1906.

2066. Under these conditions could you say there is a steady pressure to make the administration of out-door relief more lax?—I should not think so. You see, the strict in-door man is never a very popular person. But I should not put it that way; I should say that the Poor Law part of the duties of urban guardians is not watched with sufficient interest by the electorate; and I do not see why it should be, because the rates are of very small consequence to the bulk of the electors, so far as they know—and they do not know.

Effect of guardians' vaccination functions.

2067. As vaccination from time to time excites a good deal of interest, though it has nothing to do with Poor Law would you propose to transfer the functions connected with it to the county councils?—I myself never could see what vaccination had to do with boards of guardians, and I think, speaking for myself, that a sound Poor Law is far more important than sound vaccination. I am not speaking in the least disrespectfully of vaccination; I have no wish to do that. But my main interest in local government is the Poor Law administration, and I am sure that the fact that vaccination is tacked on, so to speak, to the duties of the boards of guardians, is adverse to sound Poor Law. I have seen a very good board of guardians ripped out entirely on the vaccination question, and when once they have been turned out then the whole administration comes into disorder.

Transfer of vaccination administration.

2068. Could the transfer of these functions be effected without much difficulty?—I think there would be great difficulty, because I think there is a certain class of misguided people who think more of vaccination than they do of poor law. I am thinking of poor law, and they would be thinking of vaccination.

2069. There would be no administrative difficulty as regards the transfer, would there?—No.

2070. The Poor Law authority is not possessed of any particular machinery for carrying out the vaccination law which the other authority could not equally easily perfect, I suppose?—The only reason why vaccination was thrown on to the boards of guardians was that, in those days they were the only authority working over a sufficiently large area. There is absolutely no reason why vaccination should be joined with the administration of the Poor Law.

Effect of compounding for rates.

2071 Now I think you would like to say something as to the effect of compounding?—Yes. Having stated the adverse influences according to my judgment which affect boards of guardians, I cannot possibly leave the compound householder out, although I confess the matter is one of very great difficulty. It has been alleged, and apparently with a good deal of truth, that compounding ruins the electorate by concealing the fact that the labouring classes pay any rates, and that it gives them no interest whatever in the fluctuations in the rates. It is also alleged—and I think this is a matter which should be carefully considered—that compounding does not really pay, and that it is more for the benefit of the small property owner than for the benefit of the parish, and that that tends to a certain jobbery in assessments; that is to say, that it is a mischief to the general government of the locality and more especially to the Poor Law government. That is a matter which seems to me excessively important and also extremely difficult. I have here a table which is taken from the London County Council's statistics of certain unions in London where they compound and where they do not. Where the compounding is optional, there does not appear to be any information as to how far advantage is taken of the option. This table is not complete, but it seems to me to afford a basis for further inquiries. Taking the year of this report, which is the year before last, I find that in Bermondsey 74 per cent. of the total assessments were under the compounding limit. There compounding is optional and we do not know how much advantage was taken of it; but there the pauperism was 47 per thousand at that time. In Poplar, where the compounding is compulsory, 80 per cent. of the ratepayers of that union compound, and the present rate of pauperism in Poplar is, I think, 66 per thousand, which is two and a half times that of London as a whole. I am told that in Whitechapel and Lewisham there is no compounding. The rate of pauperism in Whitechapel at that date was about 20 per thousand and Lewisham about 22 per thousand. Those are figures on which I do not place very much reliance, but as far as they go I think they are worth the attention of the Commission. They would seem to show that there is some relation between the Poor Law administration and the number of compound householders.

Compounding in London.

2072. Will you put that statement in?—Yes. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (32).

Difficulties raising rate for local purposes in certain districts.

2073. Then I think you wish to tell us something about the localities where they have had difficulty in raising the rates for rational local purposes?—It is hardly too much to say that in certain urban unions the very conditions of a rational local self-government raising local rates for the benefit of the locality are wanting, and the want is supplied usually by the public spirit of a few individuals.

West Ham and Edmonton.

2074. Has your attention been called to the great difficulties existing in certain suburban districts immediately contiguous to London in meeting their local expenditure? I am referring to localities where, owing to cheap transit, an enormous number of people have come out from London, and the population has increased very much in excess of the increase in rateable value?—You mean, of course, such places as West Ham and Edmonton—places with an enormous population, and a population of one class, and places without the assistance of the Metropolitan Poor Fund. The problem is most difficult, and I suppose something will have to be done with it some day. As to what is to be done now, I am quite sure that any guidance which the Commission could give as to the true policy in dealing with those places would be very acceptable. I think you will have, more or less, to consider the question in relation to the London evidence.

2075. As far as you know, are there any conditions similar to those existing in West Ham and Edmonton near any of the other great crowded centres of England and Scotland?—I think I can say there are not, I think in the north country big towns such places are either absorbed by the union or start industries of their own.

2076. This is an entirely new phenomenon which has sprung up in recent years, is it not?—It is a phenomenon due to the enormous increase of population, and the facilities of transit. There I think you have a good illustration of the enormous difficulties under the existing system of getting an efficient body of local administrators. I dwell upon the point because, when I am defending local government as a principle and as a safeguard, people answer me, "Look at such and such a place, and such and such a place." Well, those are the exceptions, and I have perhaps wearied the Commission by trying to point out why they are exceptions and where they differ from the ordinary local government which is going on all over the country quietly, usefully, beneficially.

Non-resident guardians.

2077. Coming to London, a practice prevails here, perhaps to a larger extent than anywhere else, of having non-resident guardians. What have you to say about that?—I should like to say that I know very little about London. A great many London unions, it is notorious, are very much indebted to the presence of guardians who are really not much concerned either by residence or occupation with the locality. I could give many instances of benevolent persons or well-meaning persons who have taken an interest in a particular union, and have joined the board of guardians of that union with the best results. To that extent I think London Poor Law government has been very much assisted. But of course that is not local government business; the qualifications are, so to speak, only nominal ones and sometimes those qualifications have been attacked.

Honesty of local administration.

2078. I think you would like to say something now about the honesty of local administration?—Yes, I should like to have this put in evidence. As far as my experience goes the Poor Law administration is generally honest; that means to say that a guardian gets very little money by it. There may be jobbery here and there, but of robbery I think there is very little. I think it is only due to the local authorities to say that, because with our audit we should probably know the worst cases. That is not a fault of English local government.

2079. (Miss Hill.) Would you say that with regard to the contracts for the supplies for the workhouses and so on?—That I should put rather as jobbery. There are some disquieting instances, I am bound to say, but those are confined to comparatively few unions. I think, perhaps, the guardians are condemned by the audit to a "lean and plunderless integrity."

ntral thority as arantors of ht to ief.

2080. (Sir Samuel Provis.) I think the first matter you referred to under this head of your evidence was the duty of the State to see that relief was given to a person who was destitute?—Yes, as illustrating the necessity for a centralised administration.

2081. Of course that does not relate to individuals and there is no duty on the part of the State as regards individuals?—A destitute individual is entitled to relief.

2082. But not from the State—the central authority Your evidence related to the powers of the central authority, and the central authority are precluded from ordering any relief?—They are statute barred.

2083. Therefore there is no statutory or legal obligation upon them to order relief in any individual case?—That is so; we cannot do it.

umber of rcharges d of peals.

2084. Passing next to the subject of surcharges, the number of surcharges I think you told us made by the auditor is very much larger than the number of appeals made against his decision?—For the reason that many are purely technical points.

2085. Is it not further than that? In a great many cases are there not disallowances which, though not on technical points, are admitted by the person surcharged to be correctly made, and against which it is useless to appeal?—That is so; there is no defence, and they pay.

2086. I see from the last annual report of the Local Government Board that the number of cases in which the auditor made disallowances in the case of the Poor Law authorities and their officers in the particular year under report, was 1654, and that the number of appeals to the Local Government Board was 398?—Those would be the figures.

2087. The reasons for the large difference between the number of disallowances and the number of appeals were those which you have already mentioned, I think?—Yes.

rounds of mission of rcharge by entral uthority.

2088. With regard to the practice to remit in the exercise of an equitable jurisdiction, that is based, is it not, upon the ground, first of all, that the payment is made in good faith, and secondly, that the remission would not be continued if the illegal payment were persisted in after due warning and a due notice?—As I put it, in most cases the surcharge is sufficient to stop all irregularity.

2089. It has that effect?—That is the effect.

ffectiveness audit.

2090. Therefore you would say, would you not, that the system whereby the auditor is able to disallow and surcharge, is beneficial in its effect on poor law administration?—Poor law administration would be impossible without it, I think.

2091. In fact it is one of the chief safeguards?—It is the chief safeguard, although it is alleged against it that the surcharges are not enforced; and they are not enforced for the reasons I have stated.

d hoc and ropter hoc uardians.

2092. With regard to the election of guardians, members of a board of guardians, as you have told us, are largely not elected ad hoc?—In rural districts they are not.

2093. Because in rural parishes the person elected is elected as a rural district councillor, and by reason of his being a rural district councillor is ex officio a guardian?—Yes.

2094. Do you think there is any difference in quality between the rural district councillor who is elected as such and becomes a guardian, and the person who is elected as a guardian in an urban parish; or have you no opinion on that point?—I have none. The instances that occur to my mind are at once conflicting. I cannot generalise on the matter at all.

2095. The reason for making the rural district councillor a guardian was to prevent the multiplicity of elections, I presume?—A multiplicity of elections and a multiplicity of local governing authorities.

2096. And also perhaps the fact that in some small rural districts the rural district councillor has very little to do?—He has an increasing quantity to do; but that would be so in some districts.

Effect of Local Government Act, 1894, on onstitution of boards of uardians.

2097. Then you told us of the very large number of guardians who were elected for the first time after the passing of the Act of 1894; do you know if there is any information which shows generally what number of persons changed office at the election which at that time took place?—I have had the papers searched, but I cannot find that there was any return for all England. All I have been able to do is to take the unions which were specially reported on by the inspectors—they happen to be ninety-three, and I have given you the figures. I wish we had the total amount.

Contributions to rates in respect of Government property.

2098. Then you referred to the payment of contributions in respect of Government property; those payments, I think, are not made to the guardians, but to the overseers?—They are made to the overseers or to the treasurer, I forget which.

2099. They are made in respect of the property belonging to the Government in the particular parish, the occupier of which, if the Government were not the occupiers, would pay rates?—Yes.

2100. Would it be possible in your opinion that that property should go free from the payment of rates?—Absolutely impossible. Before these contributions were made it was a great injustice, because Government property contributed in some unions to a very large extent to the workhouse population.

2101. Therefore it is essential that a payment should be made by the Government in respect of their property in the particular parish, unless the property were rated in the ordinary way, as has sometimes been proposed?—It is inevitable.

2102. That system, I think, is older than the Act of 1894?—It is some ten years older, I think.

2103. You will, perhaps, remember that there was a Bill brought in in 1873 to rate Government property?—I remember there was one in Mr. Stansfeld's time.

2104. That Bill did not pass, but there was a Government contribution in lieu?—Yes. Government property was valued and there was an arrangement made as to the amount to be paid.

2105. The amount which the Government pays is the same amount as would be paid by an ordinary occupier, assuming that the property was properly valued?—That is the theory of the valuation.

Effect of Agricultural Rates Act on expenditure.

2106. Taking the Agricultural Rates Act, do you think that has had any material bearing upon the expenditure of boards of guardians?—It is so small a matter that I do not think it has. I merely mentioned it as an additional source of income, ab extra.

2107. Is there not also this point to be borne in mind, that there is no increased grant because the expenditure has increased?—That is so.

2108. The grant is based upon the expenditure in a fixed year, is it not?—It is absolutely fixed.

2109. Consequently there is no temptation to increase expenditure in the hope of getting increased grant, or I might rather put it, an increased grant is not an item which could be taken into consideration in determining whether the expense should be undertaken?—It is not, as some of the old grants were, a grant in aid of extravagance.

Reasons for system of compounding for rates.

2110. With regard to the compound householder, I do not know whether it is a matter that you have considered much, but do you think that it would be practicable to abolish him?—I have absolutely not been able to hit upon any scheme for abolishing him.

2111. The reason for the system is, is it not, that where the occupier of a property is constantly changing, unless you have a means of collecting the rate from some permanent person you would lose your rate altogether?—You would; and there is the additional reason of the extraordinary inconvenience of collecting an immense number of small assessments.

Temporary abolition of compound householder

2112. I daresay you remember that he was abolished at the time of the Reform Bill of 1867, and that it was found necessary to create him again, on account of the difficulty that arose?—So that he has a political origin?

2113. He has not a political origin, but his abolition was political.

Proposal to extend London area.

Then something was said about the difficulty with places immediately adjoining London; would not the more obvious remedy for that state of things be the inclusion of those places in London itself?—That is what would naturally occur, but then it is just possible that proposals may be made for a different form of administration within London, for instance, as to the government of the workhouses, and it might be that the addition of these large populations might make the working of any such scheme more difficult.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

23 Jan. 1906.

2114. Is there reason to think that some of the places, at all events, would object to coming into London ?—I do not know.

Transfer of vaccination administration to County Councils.

2115. I think the reason why boards of guardians were made the authority for vaccination purposes was no doubt the one you gave us, namely, that they were the only authority that extended all over the country for areas of a reasonable size ; would not the fact that they are that authority be a difficulty in the way of transferring these duties ?—It would not do to put vaccination under what would seem at first sight the proper authorities, namely, the district councils, because there are too many district councils ; the area would be too small, and unfortunately we apparently have no check on the multiplicity or multiplication of small urban authorities. It has always seemed to me that the right authority was the county council.

2116. Would there be any difficulty on account of the large area of some of the counties, do you think ?—I think the larger the area for vaccination purposes the better.

Proposed Imperial grant in aid of vaccination.

2117. How would you work it—by means of committees ?—I would leave that entirely to the county council. I would pay the county councils a definite grant on the ground that the vaccination was a benefit to their neighbours as well as to themselves. I should look upon vaccination as being more or less an Imperial matter carried out by the agency of the local authorities, namely, in that case the county councils.

Meaning of "compound-householder."

2118 (Sir Henry Robinson.) Will you pardon a very elementary question ; what is a compound householder—we have not got him in Ireland ?—A compound householder is a man who does not pay his rates directly. We will take an instance. A parish compounds all houses say under £20, and the compounding may be optional or compulsory. If the compounding is compulsory, then the occupiers of all houses under £20 are exempt from paying the rates, but the landlords have to pay the rates ; if it is optional, then, if the landlord chooses, he can pay the rates. In consideration of that he gets a rebate of 15 or 20 per cent. we will say. The consequence is that the tenant has nothing to do with the fluctuation in the rates. The man who lives in a flat under ordinary conditions is in a sense a compound householder.

2119. I understand once you establish this system you cannot abolish it ?—I think we most of us wish to do something in the matter, but the matter is one of very great difficulty owing to the convenience of it in a way. Whether it pays is a moot point on which I suppose you will get evidence ; but the allegation is that it does not pay the local authority, that it only pays the owner of small property, and further that it has a great tendency to drive down the assessments of small property to just below the compounding point. I am told—and I suppose you will discover whether my information is correct—that if the compounding limit is £20 you will find an abnormal number of houses rated at £19 10s.

Auditors' powers as to extravagant relief.

2120. Is the influence of the auditor effective in the case of a loose or extravagant system of out-door relief which is not absolutely illegal, but which is really extravagant in a way ?—The auditors have an increasing habit of either reporting on it or, I am glad to say, communicating with the general inspector about it ; but there is obviously a very great difficulty in checking out-door relief which is on the face of it bad, but is not also on the face of it illegal.

2121. In the face of extravagance where the amount that is given is a great deal more than will be necessary for the maintenance of the family, would the auditor do anything ?—If it is unreasonable he can disallow it, but he has to state his reasons ; and there are always plausible reasons which might satisfy a court of justice, though they might not satisfy us, for saying that, as a matter of fact, the case was destitute.

2122. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) That must be a very laborious task for the auditor, because I suppose in order to ascertain whether there is any extravagance in out-door relief he has to see the books and ascertain from them what relief is really being given ?—That would be his duty.

2123. Would it be his duty to revise the amount of aliment given by the board of guardians in each case ?—What he has to see is whether the amount of aliment is unreasonably extravagant.

2124. In order to do that he must revise the books, and look at individual cases ?—He would have to look through the books.

Inspectors' examination of relief books.

2125. Do the inspectors of whom you were speaking previously undertake that duty at all ?—Yes. I do not say that it is a very frequent course, but a course that is taken is this—You send for the relieving officer and the Application and Report Book, and say : "Go through your book with me."

2126. Supposing that the inspector found that more out-relief was being given than he thought was right, or that out-relief was being given in a case in which he thought that indoor-relief should be given, would he report that to the Local Government Board, or what steps would he take ?—He would tell the board of guardians about it ; he would call their attention to the case.

Relief to relations of guardians.

2127. You said that the Poor Law administration in urban districts was generally quite honest ; have you any cases in your experience where members of boards of guardians have been inclined to give relief to relations which ought not to have been given ?—I have often heard that alleged in those large urban unions, but the cases are rare. That it sometimes happens I think is undoubted.

2128. Would it be brought under your notice if there were a case of that sort ?—It would be talked about most probably, and the inspector would know it, and no doubt he would report it either formally or informally. That is a case of great difficulty, because if a board of guardians will do a thing of that sort they can only be approached with a good deal of tact—they must be pretty bad.

2129. Remonstrance can be made, but not much more can be done ?—That is it. Then all you have to hope for is the publication of the facts, and that the ratepayers will do their duty.

Democratic influence on Poor Law principles.

2130. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) I think you suggested that the same democratic influence which caused the passing of the Act of 1894 has tended to a general weakening of the Poor Law principles ?—I think historically that is obviously so.

2131. I should rather like to suggest that it is not perhaps so much the genuine democratic influence. I think you yourself said that the true artisan made a good guardian ?—He does.

2132. I think experience goes to show that where you get a high-class working man he is exceedingly sound and strong on questions of relief. I would suggest that it has been rather the socialistic influence that has tended to weaken the policy ?—When you spoke of the democratic influence I took that as including the socialistic influence.

2133. It might be well to distinguish ?—Yes, I quite agree. It seems to me that in that matter the really working-class electorate can be trusted.

2134. I think you agree with me that to get a genuine working-class man of a high class on a board of guardians is an excellent policy ?—I have always found it so.

2135. You say the Poor Law administration is generally honest ; would you say that in a sense guardians generally honestly try to carry out the Poor Law, and the spirit of the Poor Law ?—I was not thinking of that at all. I was thinking of the possibility of a board of guardians being bribed or getting money by defrauding the rates, in fact.

Attempts of guardians to override the law.

2136. May we take it in the other sense of the words ; are there instances where boards of guardians have definitely tried to break down the Poor Law by administering it badly ?—There are certainly such instances, and not in one case alone ; but only of recent years. The first men elected did not do that. Some of them committed all sorts of extravagances for a short time, but a definite desire to break down the Poor Law I do not think had occurred to any one at that date.

Powers of Central Authority.

2137. Have you any means of dealing with a board of guardians who are entering on a policy of that kind ?—We have none, and we shall have to consider it. They may try to do that, but long before they have got to th point of breaking it down their clients will have broken them down. I am not myself alarmed. It is annoying, but I always think they will be beaten by force of circumstances. I am perfectly confident that if left to themselves they will come to an end. But it is as you say a matter for consideration as to whether we should take further means, such as the Irish means, for dealing with cases of that sort, by supersession, say.

2138. By putting them out?—Yes. You might have cases where it was quite clear that the local government had broken down. But I have never known of such a case. I have known of cases where there was a definite policy of breaking down the Poor Law, but they have failed.

fect of partite irement of ardians.

2139. Would you say, in reference to guardians going out by thirds, that that conduces to continuity of policy?—That procedure is rather disappointing. Some years ago it was held to be a first principle of a reformed Poor Law that a guardian would take the three years to learn his work, but it cuts both ways, and I have seen a board of guardians which the ratepayers and everybody else were very anxious to get rid of, and there they were for three years.

ntinuity policy.

2140. Would you agree that frequent changes of policy would have a bad effect on the district in respect of pauperism?—They have absolutely the worst effect on the labouring class.

2141. By always raising their expectations?—By what I think Mr. Pell calls inducing speculative applications for relief.

2142. Are there any means that you could suggest in order to secure more continuity of policy?—I have a large number of proposals on minor points, such as Case Papers and so on which I will make later on.

nsfer of cination.

2143. (Mr. Gardiner.) Touching the transfer of vaccination to county councils, would you also recommend or suggest that the vaccination business should be transferred to the big borough councils?—I think it could be transferred to the county boroughs.

2144. Would you trust them to do it?—I do not think they could do it worse than some of the present folk do it, and I think they could be trusted.

ect of ities on ction of ardians.

2145. I think you mentioned the election of guardians by partisan political organisations among the adverse influences which have affected certain boards of guardians?—Yes.

2146. As far as your experience goes, is it true to say that in certain cases, although a particular organisation has been used, it does not at all follow that all the candidates belong to one political party?—I do not know that. I instanced it, not exactly as a mischief, but as showing that it required exceptional circumstances to excite interest in these elections in urban districts. I will add this—there is no reason why a board of guardians elected on political grounds should not be a very good board of guardians—I have seen that occur repeatedly; but then you are always open to the risk that that board of guardians, which was elected on political grounds, may also be discharged on political grounds, and that you may have the whole lot rejected in one election. I have seen a board of guardians in which there was only one man on the board who knew the ordinary procedure, and he would not tell the others. That was a great many years ago. Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B 23 Jan. 1906.

2147. Has any effort been made in recent years by the borough councils to abolish compounding in London?—I do not know. My knowledge of compounding in London is but small. I merely put the facts and figures before the Commission as a means of further investigation.

2148. (Dr. Downes.) I think it has been held to be a fundamental principle of Poor Law Relief that the condition of the person relieved should be less eligible than that of the poorest independent labourer?—Or, as Sir Francis Head put it, "That the hanger-on should be lower than him on whom he hangs." Deterrence of medical relief.

2149. Have you anything to say on the difficulty which guardians find in applying that principle to the case of the sick?—I should think they would have the greatest difficulty.

2150. It is a very difficult question, is it not?—It is a most difficult question.

2151. (Mr. Phelps.) When the central authority issues an order, from whom does it emanate?—From the Local Government Board, signed by the president, and countersigned by an assistant secretary. Signature of Orders of Central Authority.

2152. Are both those signatures legally necessary?—I should imagine they were, but I do not know.

2155. Is compounding as common in the country as in towns?—I think it is quite rare in the country. Compounding for rates in country.

SEVENTH DAY.

Monday, 29th January, 1906.

AT THE FOREIGN OFFICE, DOWNING STREET, S.W.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. Lord GEORGE HAMILTON, G.C.S.I., etc., etc., etc. (Chairman).

Mr. R. H. A. G. DUFF (Secretary).
Mr. J. JEFFREY (Assistant Secretary).

Mr. JAMES STEWART DAVY, C.B., recalled; and further Examined.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

29 Jan. 1906.

Inspectors' salaries, allowances, and clerks.

2156. (Chairman.) In your previous evidence, you have stated to us what the duties of the Poor Law inspectors are; now will you tell us what their emoluments are?—An inspector on appointment to a district gets £600 a year, and he serves for five years before he gets £900, which is his maximum. There are three districts which have an additional £100 for various reasons, the Lancashire inspector has £1,000, the Yorkshire inspector has £1,000 and the London inspector has £1,000.

2157. Are there any allowances besides?—He has his expenses of locomotion paid, and he has £1 for every night he sleeps away from home on necessary official business.

2158. Has he any staff?—He has a clerk found for him.

2159. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Is there not a day allowance also?—There is now a day allowance; if he is absent from home for ten hours in a day, he is allowed the sum of 6s. 8d.

Inspectors' holidays.

2160. (The O'Conor Don.) What vacation does he get?—He gets so many days in the year, which practically amount to six weeks.

2161. Does he get that vacation all at once or at different periods of the year?—The inspector has to ask leave before he takes it and he generally takes it all at once. But I am afraid a great many of the inspectors do not take the full leave which is granted to them.

Effect of compounding for rates.

2162. (Miss Hill.) I think you have referred to compounding as having a tendency to diminish that intelligent interest in local affairs which should characterise the electors of guardians?—Yes, I have.

2163. One difficulty in abolishing the system of compounding is held to be the expense which would be involved by the collection of small sums, is it not?—That is alleged.

2164. The statutory allowance made to guardians who compound is, I believe, 15 per cent., exclusive of any further allowance if they agree to pay whether the tenements are full or empty?—That is so, I believe.

2165. Is it within your knowledge that the amount paid to collectors for collecting weekly rents is 5 per cent.?—I will take it so from you.

2166. Then presumably the local authorities could engage their collectors at about the same amount, for even though the instalments would be smaller, there would be a greater number of tenants residing near together; so that it does not seem to me that the financial question is really a difficulty—it seems to my mind to be rather more a question of reorganisation than of finance; what is your opinion on that?—Your experience is so very much greater than mine in these matters that I will accept what you say. It has always seemed to me to be a point for further inquiry, because it is alleged that compounding does not pay the parish.

2167. Yet, so far from anything having been done by the law to abolish compounding, Sec. 4 of the Act for amending the law with respect to the rating of occupiers for short terms (32 and 33 Vic. c. 41), gives power to local authorities to compel owners to pay rates direct for tenements under £20 annual value?—Yes; that is compulsory compounding.

2168. If that section has been acted on in some cases, so diminishing the interest in economy and the sense of responsibility in some hundreds of that class of tenants who form the bulk of the electors, that would appear to you to be rather a serious question, would it not?—Yes; but, of course, I do not presume to criticise an Act of Parliament.

2169. The influence on the electors has certainly not been helpful if any kind of interest either in the subject or in economy is to be desired?—The whole system seems to me to be mischievous to sound local government.

Effect of compounding on assessment.

2170. Also, I think you have pointed out that the system of compounding does not work quite fairly with regard to assessments?—The allegation is that where you have compounding you have a tendency to lower the assessment on certain classes of property, and whether this is so could be ascertained.

Anomalies of compounding in London.

2171. I take it you know that the London County Council issues a list of assessments which it recommends for weekly tenements; these assessments have no compulsory power behind them, but they are very generally adopted in the case of compounding householders, though they are not adopted where tenants pay their rates. There is, therefore, a very distinct inequality caused, and whereas the idea of an assessment is that it shall be determined by the annual value of the house assessed, you have, in London certainly, a row of houses of precisely the same character, some of which are assessed at one rate and some at another; and that appears certainly to introduce a great anomaly. You say it is alleged that compounding does not pay the parish?—So it is alleged to me. Of course I am in no sense an expert on such a matter as this, but I have consulted certain of our auditors and other people who know, and I may say I have found a great deal of information as to compounding in the Statistical Returns of the London County Council.

Poor Law loans and their repayment.

2172. (Professor Smart.) I want to refer to the subject of loans; is thirty years invariably the period of loans for the erection of workhouses?—For the erection of new workhouses, yes.

2173. Are the loans always obtained from one source, namely, the Public Works Loans Commissioners?—No; they are obtained from any source convenient to the guardians.

2175. That is what is known as the annuity system, is it not?—Yes.

2176. That means that one similar sum is paid yearly throughout all the thirty years of the loan?—I believe so.

2177. In reply to Question 1642, you mention £5 8s. per cent. or 3½ per cent. I take it you mean that £5 8s. is the annuity containing both principal and interest for thirty years, which is equal to a loan of 3½ per cent. for thirty years with a sinking fund of £1 18s.?—Yes.

Policy of Public Works Loan Board as to repayment of loans.

2178. Is it the case that the Public Works Loans Commissioners encourage shorter loans by offering lower interest?—Yes.

2179. For loans below twenty years?—I understand that that was so some years ago; I do not know whether they do that now.

2180. Do you know whether these temptations to short loans are ever accepted, in other words, have they ever any effect?—That is a difficult question to answer. As a rule, you will find that a local authority likes the longest loan it can get.

2181. Do you find a general desire for longer loans?—It is often urged upon us that the loans ought to be longer. I never have to extend the term of a loan, but I very often have to suggest the curtailment of the term of a loan.

Effect of reducing period of loan.

2182. In Question 1651 Mr. Gardiner asked you, "If you reduce the period of a loan you really would reduce the cost of the building, would you not?"—and you answer, "Yes, we should." I suppose you mean that if the period were shorter than thirty years, the heavier annual sum for repayment of the principal would make Guardians more careful of what they spent?—That would be about it, I think.

2183. Whereas, when the period is longer, the annual payment is small and the ratepayers do not feel the burden?—Yes; although the real cost might be greater, as you know.

Guardians' discretion as to relief.

2184. (Mr. Bentham.) With regard to the right to relief, I think you said it was the duty of the Local Government Board to see that that right was fulfilled, and that the guardians did their duty in dealing with destitution; is it not also true that the guardians have it entirely in their own hands as to deciding who is really eligible for relief, and as to the amount of relief they consider to be adequate to meet the case; those two points are still left to the guardians' discretion, are they not?—Yes; subject only to the possibility of the auditor forming an opinion that the amount of relief is unreasonable.

Action of auditor and Central Authority in cases of excessive relief.

2185. Are there any instances on record where an auditor has drawn the attention of the guardians to any particular case of relief which he considered excessive?—There are a great many instances where the auditor has called the attention of the Board to the fact that in his opinion certain relief which was given was excessive in amount.

2186. Are there any surcharges on record for that?—Very few. It is very difficult to state reasons on the part of the auditor which will hold good before a court of law; and yet the auditor may be doing his duty in calling our attention to the fact that the relief given in a certain union is far beyond what would be necessary to relieve destitution, as, for instance, where you have a case of the total earnings coming into a family being at quite a high level, and yet the guardians order relief to some member of that family. The auditors have called attention to cases of the latter kind.

2187. In cases probably where they hold that there is no legal obligation?—That is the sort of case.

2188. Then the action of the auditor is really the only safeguard against excessive relief?—It is the only safeguard against excessive relief, except letters of remonstrance from my department, which would be generally based on the report of the auditor, or on the report of the inspector.

2189. Suppose a case where there is ample income in a household for the whole of the persons who are living in that household, but that one member of that household (who might be a distant relative) is in receipt of relief from the guardians; would the auditor consider that that case, which is clearly not a case of destitution, would be a case for surcharge; and, are cases of that kind being brought under the notice of the Local Government Board?—Yes. I have a whole group of cases of that nature under consideration now.

2190. What action do the Board take on such cases?—They would have to judge whether the reasons assigned by the auditor for making his surcharge were good and sufficient, so as to enable them to sustain the surcharge. The question of stating adequate reasons in that class of case to which you allude is one of very great difficulty.

2191. Do cases where there is no question of legal liability, but where the guardians give an excessive amount in relief ever come under the notice of the Board?—Yes; the auditor occasionally reports such cases.

2192. I believe there is the greatest possible divergence in practice between different unions as to the persons who are regarded as eligible for relief, and as to the amount of relief which is considered to be adequate to meet the case, is that not so?—That is so, and that difference is reflected in the statistics.

Effect of auditors' action in cases of excessive relief.

2193. (Chairman.) Assuming that the auditor cannot enforce a surcharge, because the Local Government Board on appeal do not uphold it, does the auditor's protest stop the practice in connection with which the surcharge was made?—In some cases it might, but as a rule it does not; I mean where the principle on which relief is given is so bad that the auditor calls attention to it, there is something wrong with the union, and the guardians are either giving this sort of relief on a bad principle, or else their attitude may conceivably at the time be rather hostile to the Board.

2194. Assuming there is a protest by the auditor which is not followed up by a surcharge, I understand you to say that that protest does not always stop the practice?—It does not do so in every case.

2195. (Mr. Bentham.) Are there any instances where it has?—There are instances where a protest has done considerable good. My practice is now, instead of writing to the guardians, to communicate with the inspector, and suggest to him that he should meet the guardians and go into the matter with them, face to face.

Publicity of action of auditors and Central Authority as to audit.

2196. (Dr. Downes.) Is there any machinery by which the protest of the auditor or the protest of the Local Government Board is made public to the ratepayers?—No.

2197. So, if the guardians choose to go into committee, the protest and the letter may be considered in private and shelved, and nothing known about the matter by the public?—The auditor's duty is to communicate his report to the Board, and our duty is to communicate the report to the guardians; but it is no part of our duty to communicate it to the public or to the Press.

Ratepayers' right to object to expenditure.

2198. (Mr. Lock.) On the other hand, the aggrieved ratepayer has a right, under the General Order on accounts, of complaining as to any point in the audit?—He can attend the audit, and the Board often state that they think complaining ratepayers had better attend the audit; but I doubt whether the aggrieved ratepayer would have any right to ask for a copy of the auditor's report.

2199. The phrase in the order is: "The auditor shall receive any objection made by a ratepayer or any person aggrieved against the accounts undergoing audit or any item or charge therein or any vouchers or authority for the same, and shall examine into the merits of such objection and make a decision respecting the same, stating the grounds thereof and offering to enter the same in the book of accounts then being examined, if required to do so, as in the case of disallowance or surcharge." I read that as meaning that the document, so to speak, would be for the moment available for the aggrieved ratepayer?—I can only say now that this matter is one of difficulty, and that it is receiving consideration.

Ad hoc guardians.

2200. (Mr. Bentham.) With regard to the form of election to boards of guardians, I would like to know whether you disapprove of the principle of electing members ad hoc?—I cannot say I disapprove of it. It occasionally has unfortunate results owing to causes which I have indicated; but I do not think that one can disapprove of a system which appears to be pretty well inevitable.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

29 Jan 1906.

2201. I thought from your previous evidence that you rather approved of a selected board?—No, I should not have said that my evidence is in that direction; I rather spoke of the advantages of having a board of guardians freely elected by the ratepayers, 2202. Still, you said there was the greatest possible difficulty in getting the ratepayers to vote upon the one hand, and upon the other hand the compounding householder was not directly interested; and all that militated against the selection of proper people for the administration of Poor Law unions?—In some large urban unions that is so.

2203. Have you a suggestion for the remedy of that?—No, I have not.

2204. Do you think, upon the whole, that the ad hoc principle still holds the field?—That is a matter for the Commission to inquire into.

2205. I would like to have your opinion, so far as you are concerned?—So far as I am concerned I am not prepared to suggest an alteration for the country generally. I have always thought the case of London ought to be dealt with separately, because there are reasons which affect London alone, such as the Metropolitan Poor Fund. On that matter, I suppose, I shall be asked a question when I come to the London part of my evidence.

Effect and need of Exchequer grants.

2206. I think you said also that the Exchequer grants lead to extravagance on the part of local bodies?—That was my suggestion though I think it would be better to say, not that they lead to extravagance, but that they diminish the financial responsibility of the guardians.

2207. Do you think then, that they are mischievous—generally?—I should say that they were mischievous as a whole to the principle of independent local government, that is, of collecting rates locally raised and expending them for the benefit of the locality.

2208. Granted that we have a highly centralised Poor Law administration, would there be the same excuse for that centralisation and central control if no grants were given to local authorities; is it not almost a sine qua non of centralisation that some national grant should be given?—No, I should not like to say that. I should say that if the State had given that guarantee of ensuring that the destitute pauper was relieved, whether the central Treasury paid a part of the cost or not, it would then be the duty of the State to enforce such regulations as would ensure its guarantee being carried out.

2209. Is it not the fact that under the old Poor Law when there were no exchequer grants, the extravagance in local relief was often greater than obtains anywhere at the present day?—That was so, but whether the absence of grants was the cause of that maladministration some think is a very debateable point; I should say certainly that the absence of grants was not the cause of the maladministration.

Publication of reports on union administration.

2210. (Mrs. Webb.) Would there be any practical objection to the inspector or the auditor issuing a report to every ratepayer on the character of the administration of any union?—I think that in some cases those reports might be useful, but in most cases I do not think they would have the slightest effect, because I do not think they would be read. In certain exceptional cases, for instance, we will take the present cases of Leicester, Poplar, West Ham, and unions of that sort which are undergoing a period of very high pauperism, I think a published report of the actual current administration might do good.

2211. In order to make it not invidious, and in order to show that the Local Government Board had no animus against a particular union, would it not be desirable that it should be a matter of common form to issue to the ratepayers a report on the administration of the whole of the boards?—Would you suggest that that should be published in the newspapers?

2212. I would suggest that it should be not only published in the newspapers but handed to every ratepayer?—I am afraid that would be rather a large order, but I quite see that some good might result from such reports being circulated.

Friendly Societies Exemption Act, 1894.

2213. Will you please turn to Question 2037, where you refer to the Friendly Societies Exemption Act of 1894; I understand that it was left to the Local Government Board to issue an order to permit the guardians to put that Act in force?—I do not think that was so.

2214. I thought it was left to the Local Government Board whether it was put in force or not?—No.

Out-relief unions.

2215. With regard to the out-door unions, what constitutes an outdoor union? Is it merely that an out-door union is one which has no workhouse, or is there any other definition of an out-door union?—The out-door unions were formed for two reasons: they were a suggestion of Mr. Andrew Doyle, if I remember aright. There was a Committee in 1873 on Boundaries; he then suggested the formation of out-door unions as a means of solving a good many boundary questions where a difficulty arose because a union was in two or three counties. He suggested that so much of the union as was in each county should be made a separate out-door relief union, and at the same time he said that in his judgment that would have a good effect on out-door relief, beause it would make the guardians in the smaller unions more directly responsible for the out-door relief they gave. There are twelve such unions in England.

2216. And they have no separate workhouse?—That is so, they use a common workhouse.

2217. Is the workhouse paid out of a common rate?—Yes. The out-door relief falls on each individual union.

Finance of out-relief unions.

2218. Then in those unions out-door relief falls on the local rate, and the cost of the workhouse falls on the general rate of the amalgamation?—That is so. York is a good instance of that sort. There is the city and county of York; there is the North Riding Out-relief Union, which is called Flaxton; there is the West Riding Out-relief Union, which is called Bishopthorpe; and there is the East Riding Out-relief Union, which is called Escrick. So that in the York Union there are four out-relief unions, and one union for the purpose of in-door relief.

Unions without workhouses.

2219. It has been suggested that a way of checking out-door relief in London would be to make each union pay for its out-door relief?—The exact effect of the out-door relief union is a point on which I suppose the Commission will take further evidence, but I should mention here, to save confusion hereafter, that there are a certain number of unions in England without a workhouse at all—not out-door relief unions, but unions using the workhouse of a neighbouring union. For instance, there is a union near Ipswich which has no workhouse because its workhouse was closed; and then there is Westhampnett union, which has no workhouse, but boards its paupers out, because its workhouse happens to have been burnt down.

2220. But they have to pay for the boarding out?—Yes. Those are not out-door relief unions, and should not be classified with them.

Accessibility of information as to Government and railway property in different unions.

2221. With regard to Government property and railway property, you made the very interesting statement that the contributions from those two sources diminished the financial responsibility of boards of guardians; I suppose it would be quite easy for us to obtain, from the Treasury, say, the exact distribution of Government property all over England?—I should think so.

2222. And we might also get the distribution of the railway property from the Railway Department?—Possibly. I have here a return of railway property which is taken from a Parliamentary Return made in 1899. You will see from this that there are twenty rural unions in England where the railway property bears the largest proportion to the rateable value; the return also gives the cost of relief in those unions and the rate per cent. of pauperism. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (21).)

Parliamentary return.

2223. Would not a return of all the railway property in the different unions be quite as easily obtainable as in the case of Government property?—I should think so.

Origin of "compounding."

2224. With regard to compounding, that arose, did it not, in the 18th century, because it was discovered that the guardians were always excusing poor people from their rates; that was the reason, was it not?—I will take that from you.

Effect on excusal from rates.

2225. I happen to know that it was the reason; it arose on clauses in local Acts. Would not an objection to it which was made on its origin still hold good, namely, would not magistrates still be likely to excuse poor people ?—They would, and I think, historically, you will find that that had a good deal to do with the modern system of compounding. I think Mr. Chamberlain took the question up with others. It was said what hard luck it was to be continually selling up these poor people for the poor rate.

2226. If you go to Petty Sessions and watch the magistrates excusing very poor people from sending their children to school, I think you will probably consider that they would do the same sort of thing with regard to the rates of very poor people ?—They might; but then you see compounding is not universal, so that there does exist material for further inquiry into the matter.

2227. I gather that compounding divides itself into two—compulsory and non-compulsory compounding ?—That is so.

2229. (Mr. Nunn.) May one take the opportunity of going over your points with regard to the fundamental principle of the poor law ? I think you said that the fundamental principle of the Poor Law was to relieve destitution, and that it aimed at doing so humanely to the individual pauper, while it safeguarded the community by making the lot of the pauper less eligible than that of the independent labourer. May I take it that that is the principle of the poor law as understood by the Local Government Board ?—Yes.

2230. I want you to tell us what you consider to be the elements of ineligibility, so far as the law is able to render relief ineligible. Does ineligibility consist of these three elements: firstly, of the loss of personal reputation (what is understood by the stigma of pauperism); secondly, the loss of personal freedom which is secured by detention in a workhouse; and thirdly, the loss of political freedom by suffering disfranchisement. Are those the main elements of ineligibility, or have I left any out ?—I think those would be the main elements.

2231. Those are almost absent in nearly every form of relief which is now being given by boards of guardians, are they not ?—I should not say so at all.

terrence of

2232. For instance, take medical relief in infirmaries; no one minds being detained in an infirmary so long as he is ill, and if he does not have to pass through the workhouse he suffers no stigma of pauperism, does he ?—I think only a small proportion of relief is given in infirmaries.

2233. A good deal of the disfranchisement which follows from ordinary forms of relief a man escapes by receiving medical relief, and that principle is largely extended to relief that is given in infirmaries; is that not so ?—Yes, there is a tendency in that direction.

2234. With regard to most of the out-door relief there is very little personal stigma, there is no detention, and there is, on the part of the women, at any rate, no loss of enfranchisement ?—That is so.

2235. If the law, therefore, is administering a large amount of poor law relief without this ineligibility attached to it, do you think that there is any other principle in the field which may be put forward in defence of such variations from strict administration of the poor law as an ineligible form of relief ?—No. I do not see on what other theory you can proceed.

2236. You think that that still holds the field ?—I think so, and I think it holds the field more or less efficiently in nine-tenths of the unions in England.

2238. The only means which the community can take is to try to render the lot of the pauper who is not sick more difficult than that of the independent labourer ?—As I shall show later on, the conditions of the standard of living of the independent labourer must have a direct bearing on the administration of poor law deterrents, that is to say, on the comforts of the infirmary.

2239. With regard to the co-operation of charities and boards of guardians, are there any directions or suggestions on that subject from the Local Government Board, apart from Mr. Goschen's circular of 1869 and the orders in certain London unions and the list of charities published in 1878 ?—I think not.

2240. There are no suggestions or instructions as to co-operation ?—No. It is understood that that is the policy of the board, but it has not been laid down in any circular.

2241. There is nothing for any particular guardian to lay his hand on in defence of the principle ?—No.

(2) Duties of guardians.

2242. Has the Local Government Board done what some other central bodies have done, namely, issued instructions or suggestions to guardians upon their election as to how they may carry out their duties ?—No.

(3) Management of sick-wards, and 2243. I think detailed instructions have been issued with regard to the management of sick wards in the infirmaries ?—Instructions to guardians are contained in the General Consolidated Order.

2244. But those instructions do not have much reference to principles, do they ?—No. The work has been done, and pretty efficiently done, by private publishers; but of course that is quite a different thing to a circular by the board.

(4) Qualifications of relieving officers.

2245. The board has not done anything yet, has it, in directing the training of any of the officers connected with out-door relief ?—No, we have not, except by doing our best to remonstrate if a man appears to be unfit.

2246. Has there been any suggestion that the social status and the general qualifications of a relieving officer, say a chief relieving officer, might be somewhat different to what they are at the present day ?—I have not heard of it with regard to relieving officers, but I have often heard of it with regard to masters of workhouses.

The name "relieving officer" infelicitous.

2247. The name of "relieving officer" is rather an unhappy one, because it assumes that he is going to give relief; has there been any consideration of the possibility of altering the name ?—I think not; but so many people are worrying about the English language in connection with the poor law now that I think that suggestion might be usefully considered in connection with some others.

Committees of guardians.

2248. There has been one point raised in connection with the form of the administration of relief by rural and urban district unions; when a rural district council or an urban district council appoint a committee for the administration of poor law relief, what, precisely, would be the form of that committee ?—They are all guardians.

2249. And they all act as such ?—Yes.

2250. Without any sub-committees ?—They may appoint committees or they may not, as they like; but they are all guardians.

Co-opted guardians.

2251. Are there any co-opted or nominated members ?—There are a few co-opted members; under the Act of 1894 there was a power to co-opt.

2252. Co-opt ad hoc for certain purposes ?—Only as guardians of the poor.

Distinction between urban and rural councils and boards of guardians.

2253. (Sir Samuel Provis.) An urban district council is an entirely separate body from a board of guardians, and has nothing whatever to do with it, I think ?—That is so.

2254. And in point of law, too, rural district councils are entirely separate bodies from boards of guardians ?—That is so.

2255. Only members of a rural district council are ex officio guardians, but there is no relation except in that way between those separate local authorities, is there ?—There is none whatever.

2256. (Mr. Nunn.) But they may be the same persons ?—Let me give you an instance; the ordinary country board of guardians would consist of district councillors who act as guardians, but as guardians they are a separate body from the district council; there would be, or might be for any urban districts within that union, guardians elected as guardians for those urban districts and sitting with the district councillors as guardians, but not themselves being district councillors; and then there might be a co-opted man or two.

Deterrence of relief.

2257. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) In the case of misfortune, is a necessary consequence of the reception of relief the loss of personal reputation ? I can understand that there would be the loss of the privilege of voting, but the loss of personal reputation does not follow of necessity, does it, strictly speaking?—Do you mean that a man need not be ashamed of it?

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

29 Jan. 1906.

2258. The loss of personal reputation is rather a different thing, but I will accept your phrase that he need not be ashamed of it?—That might be so. I think the reception of relief might be inevitable.

Rating of flats in London.

2259. On the matter of compounding there is something akin to compounding, is there not, in the large properties as well as in small properties; for instance, in the West End of London a great many people who live in large flats are people whose interest in the locality is very slight owing to the fact that they do not pay rates?—They have no interest in the fluctuation of the rate.

2260. Therefore that would account, to some extent, for their not voting at elections and not taking the slightest interest in anything going on in the locality?—I am afraid it would.

2261. I presume that when you come to deal with London that would be the time to ask you a question with regard to guardians becoming directly absorbed in the borough councils, so that the election for the one should be the election for the other; that would apply mainly to London, would it not?—I should think so.

2262. Perhaps, however, you might give your judgment on that point now, and let us know whether you think that would be a desirable thing to do?—As to whether the guardians should be a committee of the borough council do you mean?

2263. Yes, or treating them as the rural councillors are treated, so that you would have practically the same body, but meeting at different times for the different purposes?—That is a very large question. If you really want to know what I think about London you will have an opportunity of finding out by-and-bye. It is not exactly your suggestion that I should put forward; I should go further than that.

Effect on elections of guardians' non-Poor Law functions.

2264. In the same sense one gathers from your evidence that the interest in the election of guardians is, generally speaking, due to the fact that there is some extraneous thing which has no real reference to the guardians' work at all, such as vaccination, for instance, and which had better be omitted from consideration?—Yes.

2265. Therefore, in the same sense, when there is an interest in an election it is rather an unhealthy than a healthy sign in that particular?—I should say that it does not do the guardians as a body any good.

Effect of audit surcharges.

2266. And the result is not a satisfactory result from the point of view of the constitution of the board of guardians. Then with regard to the power of surcharge you said that a surcharge would prevent the recurrence of an irregularity; is that always the case? One sometimes finds in regard to other bodies that after a surcharge people say: "It does not very much matter; we are quite sure to be let off," and so the thing does occur again?—That is so.

2267. Would you say that it was quite a preventative of the recurrence?—No, it is not quite a preventative, but it very often has the effect of correcting an irregularity. I do not mind saying that if there is a recurrence I do not think the board ought to remit; I think then we ought to be a bit strict, and I think we should be in certain cases.

2268. Have those cases often occurred?—No; I have given you the exact figures. Actual recourse to the enforcement of a surcharge is rare.

2269. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) May I ask whether the auditors surcharge under general powers or under some specific enactment giving them power to investigate individual cases of relief?—I think they act under their general powers to judge of the reasonableness of the relief.

Effect of compounding on exemption from rates.

2270. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) In regard to compounding having been at any rate to some extent, the result of excusing the poor from paying their rates in olden days, and the possibility of that being the case to-day, supposing there were no compounding, is it not the fact that in the great majority of cases those who are very poor now are excused the payment of their rates when they are not compounded?—In the country the practice varies a good deal, but as a rule the very poor people are excused.

Distinction between medical and other relief.

2271. (Mr. Booth.) With regard again to the fundamental principles of the Poor Law, although both are forms of pauperism, might not a difference be rightly recognised, and is it not recognised, between the relief of the sick, and the relief of that destitution which is due simply to poverty?—The distinction is made in practice.

2272. But there is a theoretic basis for it, is there not?—I think not. Some sickness is inevitable and is such sickness as a man cannot provide for; but there are other forms of sickness which a man could have provided for by an exercise of thrift. Therefore, I should not put the whole class of the sick together.

2273. I am looking at it in this way—that the provisions for pauperism may cause people to become poor, but are unlikely to cause people to become sick—which is a different point from that from which you are looking at it, is it not?—Yes. No man would deliberately become sick on purpose, I think.

2274. Therefore, it does justify some difference in the theory of the treatment?—Yes, and that makes all the difference with regard to some classes of the sick.

2275. May we not say as to the question of the comparative eligibility of the two lots, that the chief difficulty concerns out-relief, in other words, institutional relief is much more capable of providing restraints which are objected to, and therefore the great difference arises in connection with out-relief?—That is so. I propose later on to give the Commission my view as to what is meant by the workhouse test, and as to what is meant by the deterrent conditions of the workhouse.

Return as to pauperism in unions containing large proportion of railway property.

2276. (Chairman.) In your previous examination, and again to-day, you have mentioned the large contributions which railways in certain specific districts make towards the rates, and consequently towards the Poor Rate; and I understand that the return you have handed in illustrates that?—Yes. It is taken from a return which was made in 1899 showing that railway property bears a proportion of 9 per cent. to the total rateable property of England and Wales. The return which I have put in shows country unions which derive most benefit from railways. I find that there are, say, twenty of them who have more than 20 per cent. of their rateable value railway property; one, Welwyn, goes up as high as 58 per cent., and there are a good many over 30 per cent. Whether it is a coincidence or not I do not know, but I suggest it is a matter which is well worth your examination. The rate per cent. of pauperism and of cost of relief in all those unions except about three is above the average. The great exception is at Bradfield Union, where with 30 per cent. of railway property the cost of the relief in the £ is only 7d., and the rate per cent. of pauperism is only 1·1. In most of these cases the pauperism is over 3 per cent., and in a good many it is over 4 per cent.

See Qs. 20 and 2222 and App. III.

Corporate and Local Government franchise.

2277. (Miss Hill.) I suppose none of the railway companies are at all represented on the boards of guardians because they have no votes?—They have no votes.

2278. Has any scheme ever been proposed by which they could have votes?—I have never seen one.

2279. (Sir Samuel Provis.) There have been representations, have there not, that corporations should be allowed to appoint someone or another to vote on behalf of them?—Yes.

2280. And corporations in that connection I presume would include railways?—Yes. There have been, of course, very great complaints. You will find the subject was investigated by the Local Taxation Commission, before whom some remarkable instances were given.

Procedure Select Committee

2281. (Mr. Loch.) With regard to the referring of questions to Select Committees of the House of Commons, you mentioned I think that questions that would otherwise be dealt with more or less on the principles of the administration of the Local Government Board would be referred to a kind of miscellaneous Committee who might bring out any kind of conclusions?—I did not quite put it in that way. I said that their conclusions perhaps did not take sufficient account of the possible effect of their recommendations, or something of that sort.

2282. These questions I think you point out are becoming in a manner more and more important; is there any suggestion that you could make by which as a matter of course evidence should come with a memorandum, we will say, from the Local Government Board on such questions to such Select Committee; or, is there any form of control which would allow of a revision or of a further report from the Local Government Board on such reports of Parliamentary Committees?—There is no such power now.

2283. (Mrs. Webb.) Is it usual for the Local Government Board official to attend Select Committees as he does the municipal Committees?—Sometimes he is called.

2284. Is he always there in attendance?—No, not on Select Committees of that character.

2285. (Mr. Loch.) Is there any suggestion at present made by which you can in any way bring the view of the Local Government Board before the Committee over and above simply giving evidence?—No.

2286. There is no reference of the report specially and officially to the Local Government Board with a view to their opinion being taken?—No; and there is no certainty that any of our people will be called as a witness.

ission of harges.

2287. With regard to remission, is it desirable to have such a broad power of remission? Would not the fact that surcharge by an auditor affected the local authority at once (as it would any business person or a local business authority) be a great safeguard if, when the auditor reports against them, they know they must pay?—It is not a question of their paying, but of the man surcharged being made to pay. You may have some unfortunate individual guardian who has signed a cheque being let in for a sum of money which perhaps it is beyond his competence to pay.

2288. But the board of guardians might very well be treated as a corporate body, and a surcharge might very well fall upon the whole body of members?—That is a possible solution; but I should like to call your attention again to the fact that a great many of the surcharges are purely technical, and purely formal, sometimes being made because the money is charged in the wrong account.

2289. Might there not be a division of what are called the technical surcharges from the others, so that with regard to the technical surcharges there should be remission, and not with regard to the others?—That might be done; and there might be a general screwing up of refusals to remit.

lifica- s of ers.

2290. With regard to the qualifications of officers, I notice that a great many of the points are negative—"No person shall hold office who cannot keep accounts"; and so on; would it not be possible to revise the General Consolidated Order and to put in more positive details of what is required?—It would be quite possible to insist on more specific qualifications.

ponsi- y of clerk o applica- s for f.

2291. With regard to the clerk, is he considered responsible for the way in which the investigation is made, and the way in which recommendations are submitted to boards of guardians in regard to cases of out-door relief?—No, he is not responsible.

2292. So that where a clerk—as we know, for instance, in the case of Mr. Vallance—has done a great deal in that direction, it has been rather done by the position he has taken up than by the actual requirements of his official position?—It is done by his personal influence. A great many boards of guardians resent the interference of their clerk in individual cases of relief.

2293. Are not many boards of guardians quite unwieldy from the point of view of the discussion of cases?—Some boards of guardians are very much too large for the proper conduct of any business.

2294. Then one point of reform would be the revision of these boards from the point of view of making them, if it were possible, more suitable business bodies?—I have already pointed out that, in my judgment, some of the provisions of the Act of 1894 regarding the numbers of guardians and areas need reconsideration; because the whole object of legislation is to get efficient local governing bodies and nothing ought to stand in the way of that.

edure as scusal rates.

2295. When an individual is exempted from paying his rates, is that done by order of a magistrate?—Yes.

2296. Would any less cumbrous method be feasible? It is evidently a method which it is very difficult to apply, because a magistrate can hardly know all the evidence and would be rather inclined, I should imagine, to be lenient than just?—That is so. I do not think, however, that there are many cases of remission, as I hear very little about them. I am talking of the country.

2297. And the same with urban districts?—I do not think there are many cases of remission; but I do not know.

2298. We have no return on that subject, have we?—I know of no return; I have asked for one, but I cannot find one. I think such a return might be useful.

2299. (Mr. Nunn.) Are there not some instances where the magistrate sits at the town hall and hears such cases, quite apart from the police arrangements?—Yes.

2300. (Mr. Loch.) Would any report from the board of guardians go before the magistrate in regard to particular cases in which remission is desired?—I do not think the board of guardians, as a board, would know very much about that unless they had an investigating officer. It is very much a matter for the overseers.

2301. (Sir Samuel Provis.) It would not be a union matter at all, would it?—No.

2302. And, therefore, the guardians would have nothing whatever to do with it?—That is so.

2303. It is a question as regards the parish. The overseers are very well aware of the fact that an application is to be made to the magistrates, and as they are cognisant of the circumstances, it therefore rests with the overseers and not with the guardians to take any action in the matter, is that not so?—The overseers are the persons responsible and they are the best body, I think, for determining a case of that sort. They probably know the people in country parishes. In town parishes I quite admit that the check on the remission may be extremely imperfect; and that a magistrate sitting to remit would naturally remit. It is a delightful thing to spend other people's money.

Workhouse plans: Report of 1834.

2304. (Chairman.) As regards in-door relief, the Commission of 1834 gave special attention to the plans for workhouses, did they not?—You will find in the first report of the Commission some model plans for workhouses which seem to me to have a somewhat more than historic interest. There are two kinds of plan; one is a plan of workhouses invented by Sir Francis Head, who describes them as being labourers' cottages turned into a hollow square, in which square the guardians can introduce any system of labour they think fit. That was practically the first idea of the Commissioners. They did not exactly accept Sir Francis' description, but still you will find in Kent all the old workhouses built on that plan; and if the Commissioners visit any workhouses they will be interested in seeing the gradual development of one of those workhouses built on that system into a modern workhouse. The other form was also curious; it was Bentham's Panopticon. Bentham's Panopticon was a sort of building like a star-fish with a tower in the middle. His idea was that it might be adopted both for prisons and for workhouses—you will remember that at one time he was a contractor for paupers. The master was apparently to sit in the middle of the tower and observe the operations of the paupers in the wings and in the yards between them. In England there are a good many panopticon workhouses still in existence.

Rate of disappearance of able-bodied paupers.

2305. I suppose the plans of the workhouses were a good deal regulated by the idea that there would be an abolition of able-bodied paupers?—So far as I read the early history, the abolition of able-bodied paupers almost at once began to affect the construction of workhouses. The able-bodied pauper disappeared very rapidly; for instance in 1842, 38 per cent. of the population of the workhouses were able-bodied; in 1860 the figure had fallen to 15 per cent., and in 1890 to 13 per cent., but unfortunately in 1905 there seems to be something like a recrudescence of the able-bodied paupers for the percentage went up to 18. What is meant by an able-bodied pauper we shall have to discuss later on.

2306. Has the definition varied during that time?—No

2307. Were these workhouse plans you have told us of intended for rural districts?—They were intended for all districts at that time.

Dr. Edward Smith's report on workhouses.

2308. There was a report of Dr. Smith that was made in 1867, which I think you want to refer to?—Yes. There was a very interesting report on forty provincial workhouses by Dr. Edward Smith in the year 1867. It is quite evident from the figures he gives that the workhouse had then become pretty much what the workhouse is now, that is to say, a refuge for persons who are mainly old and sick. Even then the workhouse was a good deal simpler in construction than it is now, for I find on my notes that in 1866 the Kensington ratepayers objected to a workhouse as being too costly,—and it was for 400 beds, the site to cost £4,000 and the building to cost £13,000.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

State of workhouses in 1867.

2309. Then the conditions of those inside the workhouse having so materially changed, I believe there was legislation in 1867 for the purpose of improving the conditions in London?—Attention was called to the state of the London workhouses, and various reports were made upon them which you will find summarised in the speech which Mr. Gathorne-Hardy made in 1867 when he introduced his Act. The condition of the London workhouses was intolerably bad; and I may say—though I cannot refer to the particular Blue-book at this moment—that the conditions of some of the north country workhouses were also very bad indeed. It is from about the seventies that the beginning of these very expensive workhouse buildings and workhouse infirmaries may be said to date, that is, the modern workhouse as it is now had its origin about that period.

Orders and circulars of Central Authority as to workhouse inmates since 1885.

2310. I believe the Local Government Board or the Poor Law Board took special precautions by issuing orders as regards the management of the workhouse?—Up to 1890 the rules for the government of workhouses were not much changed, but since that period there have been a succession of orders mainly with the intention of ameliorating the condition of the workhouse inmate. For instance, in 1885 there was a circular as to married couples in workhouses, pointing out to the guardians what the law was. I need not remind the Commission that the law is that if both husband and wife are above sixty years of age they have a right to live with one another, and that if one is above sixty they may live together with the permission of the guardians. In 1891 there was a circular addressed to the General Inspectors as to the supply of books in workhouses, and of toys for the children. In 1892 there was an order permitting the guardians to give the inmates of workhouses tobacco and snuff. In 1893 there was a very important order which authorised the appointment of Ladies' Visiting Committees and which gave the right of visiting the workhouses to every individual guardian. In 1894 there was an order which allowed the guardians to give dry tea, sugar and milk to the women, so that they might make their own tea. In 1896, there was a further circular as to the classification of inmates. In 1897 came perhaps the most important order of all, the nursing order. In 1900 there was a new dietary order; I do not know whether I should class that with the other orders as making a change for the better in the conditions of workhouse life. I rather prefer to look upon that order as one of decentralisation and simplification, but I may as well include it in my list. Then lastly came the circular of August, 1900, as to the treatment of the aged deserving poor, as they called them. You will notice how very rapidly all these orders have come one after the other since the year 1890; that year forms a sort of epoch in PoorLaw administration. The effect will have to be tested by statistics.

Result of recommendations of Select Committees.

2311. Were these orders which were issued by the Local Government Board the result of legislation?—They were the result of the recommendations of Select Committees.

2312. And of what I suppose I may call the pressure of public opinion, or at any rate of a certain class of public opinion?—Yes, I suppose they were.

Movements of indoor pauperism over a series of years.

2313. Having described to us the improvement which has taken place in the workhouses in recent years, will you now tell us the nature of the workhouse test?—It is often held that workhouses are ceasing to be deterrent, and that statement will be repeated to you, I have no doubt, by many of your witnesses. I have caused to be prepared a diagram (See Appendix Vol. I.(A),No.V. (10),) which shows, roughly, what the progress of in-door pauperism has been in relation to population and to able-bodied pauperism. You will find that in-door pauperism from 1860 up to 1895 has kept pretty constant, sometimes up, sometimes down, but still, so to speak, clinging to the line of population till the year 1900, and then you see how rapidly the curve goes straight up; it had kept pretty well at 7 per 1,000, and now it has gone up to something more.

2313A. Does that rise point to any change in workhouse conditions?—That is a very important question, and I should first like to make one point before we discuss that question. It has always appeared to me that there is an irreducible minimum of pauperism—whatever it may be; that is to say, that in any organised community there must be a certain number of impotent folk, who must be kept in an institution ultimately. I think it is quite clear that that must be so. What that irreducible minimum is, is a much more difficult question, because you have to consider that the minimum may be provided for in ways which are not known to the Poor Law, as, for instance, by the help of friends, or by charity, and thus it may be taken off the rates. A good many years ago I endeavoured, on my own account, to get some sort of rough idea of what the minimum was. I took a good deal of pains in a certain Lancashire union, and I made out then that it was something like 1·1 per cent. I then asked a French friend of mine to make the same sort of investigation in France, and he did it, I am perfectly certain, with a great deal of care, and arrived at much the same conclusion. I think now that I put the minimum much too high; but that is not certain. It certainly would appear too high looking to the fact that the indoor pauperism clings about the figure of 7 per 1000; but then you have to add to that the lunatics in asylums, and the charity folk, and a certain proportion of out-door paupers, who evidently ought to be receiving in-door relief. I have dealt somewhat at length with this point, but it is a mere theory of mine, and no person that I have been able to discover who has any expert knowledge as a statistician (which I certainly have not) has gone into the matter. But I do submit that it is a very important point in considering this question of in-door pauperism, because, the nearer you get to the irreducible minimum, the harder it is by any administrative means to decrease your indoor pauperism, because your margin is so much smaller.

"Irreducible minimum" of pauperism.

2314. 1·1 per cent. was the figure that you named as the irreducible minimum of pauperism in this country, and that is also, I think, the figure arrived at by a gentleman who investigated it in France; does that include only those who applied for public relief, or does it include all those who are unable to maintain themselves?—It was meant to include those members of the community that must ex necessitate rei be maintained by somebody or another in an institution—or should be.

2315. And their dependants?—They, most of them, would not have dependants. They would be lunatics, they would be cripples, they would be blind; they would be the ones with chronic ill health.

2316. I am afraid I interrupted you just now?—That is all I have to say on this point of the irreducible minimum, and I put it with a good deal of hesitation.

The workhouse test.

2317. Whatever might be the deterrent character of a workhouse there still will be a large number of persons who are compelled by their necessities to go to the workhouse, will there not?—Yes. That takes me to my next point, which is the question of the deterrency of a workhouse. That is an old point. Sir Francis Head in 1835 said, "It is no use building workhouses unless we have sense and firmness enough to regulate them justly. They are to be inhabited by the lowest and poorest class of society, and before bread and cheese, bread and butter, suet puddings, meat puddings, tea, milk and vegetables be pronounced insufficient for the paupers' diet we ought to raise the wages of the English labourer. For we have no moral right to break his spirit by elevating the poorest above the poor." There you evidently see, reading between the lines, that there was already a tendency to make the workhouses more comfortable than Sir Francis Head, at all events, held to be justifiable. Again a few years later, the Commissioners say, "With regard to the aged and infirm there is a strong disposition on the part of a portion of the public so to modify the arrangements of workhouses as to place them on the footing of almshouses."

Sir Francis Head's opinion.

Cause of rise in standard of workhouse comfort.

2318. The standard of comfort in workhouses has risen, and I understand your contention is that it has risen because the great bulk of those inside the workhouse are people who are aged or infirm, and it is not possible to make their conditions inside the workhouse worse than would be the conditions of people of the same class of life if they were outside the workhouse?—That is partly the reason. Another reason seems to me to be that the workhouse comforts must bear a relation to the standard of living of the lowest classes, and as the latter standard of living becomes better the workhouse comforts may safely be extended. I think that on a matter of this importance I can, without taking up too much of the time of the Commission, point out what the original idea of the workhouse test was. The best illustration that I have seen is in connection with the Irish Poor Law. I have here a report which was made in 1879 as to the amalgamation of certain Irish unions for Lunatic Asylum purposes; and in that report the Commissioners quote from the writings of Sir George Cornewall Lewis. It was alleged that if you introduced the workhouse system into Ireland it would break down, for you could not possibly make a workhouse of so low a standard of comfort that it would be deterrent to the Irish cottar "That view was very strongly pressed on the English Commissioners at the time, and Sir George Cornewall Lewis says, "Now the whole of this reasoning must, it is evident, fall to the ground, if it can be made evident that the lowering of the diet is not in fact the keystone of the workhouse system in England, and that the success of this system under the operation of the Poor Law Amendment Act has been owing to a highly different cause . . . .The true sanction of the workhouse system is to be looked for in a different quarter. A man struggling with poverty would be content to live in a public institution, on a worse fare than the most rigid parochial economists have ever ventured to introduce into a workhouse, if he was permitted to spend his time in idleness, to go in and out of the house at pleasure and to live in the house with his wife and family. It is the compulsory labour, the discipline, and the classification, which are the real objects of the pauper's dislike. The mere physical comforts of a public institution must always be in many respects superior to those attainable by a poor man in his own dwelling. The inmate of a workhouse is certain, whatever may be the quality of his food, to have enough of it; he will never, except for punishment, be reduced to short commons; this security alone is of considerable importance to a poor man." But he has to give up his personal liberty, and that is the true nature of the workhouse test as it was understood at that time. What the effect of the introduction of workhouses into Ireland was is a point which must be perfectly well known to this Commission, but it certainly never broke down owing to the rush of people to get into them. I should never be afraid of increased comforts in workhouses, provided there was a restraint on liberty, and that discipline was maintained. It seems to me that the real point was touched in quite early days by one of the Commissioners, Mr. Tufnell, who says that many inmates of the new workhouses have expressed their contentment, and that many people have altered their opinion of the harshness of the law after a visit to one of the new workhouses. He goes on: "This process, however, always is to me fraught with evil forebodings the realisation of which can only be prevented by carefully keeping up what seems to me our sole barrier against them, namely, a system of restraint "—all of which brings me to the point to which I wish specially to call the attention of the Commission. If it be the fact that workhouses in certain districts, notably in London, have to a certain extent ceased to be deterrent, I suggest that possibly the explanation is not to be found so much in these Orders and Circulars for amelioration, as I will call them, as to the fact that in a great many workhouses the inmates have an amount of leave of absence which, according to my view, is quite excessive. I have detained the Commission at some length on this subject, because I feel that it is an important matter on which the Local Government Board itself wants help. We want to know the fact as to whether workhouses are ceasing to be deterrent, and if they are, whether the change is not attributable to a very large extent to the amount of leave which is given to inmates.

2319. Could you describe to the Commission the sort of leave which is given and its duration?—In some London unions everybody over sixty perhaps would go out for the whole of Monday, and some other people would go out on Tuesday; then on Wednesday friends would visit, and so on. This matter was very much brought to my notice some years ago when I was chairman of a committee on workhouse accounts. We found that one of the difficulties was framing forms of account which would meet the fact that on certain days in the week hundreds of people were outside the workhouse, and therefore not eating their food. The whole accounts had to be re-arranged to meet that difficulty, as Dr. Downes knows.

2320. Did they get no allowance for going out?—No. I remember very well some years ago that in an urban workhouse in my district I found that practically the whole of the old people went out on one day in the week, and that a certain proportion of them who were industrious got a day's charing

2321. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) There is a system in Marylebone, at least so I was informed three years ago, that 300 males go out one week and 300 females the next week?—That shows a certain amount of selection

Leave of absence helpful to discipline.

2322. (Chairman.) What is urged on behalf of this leave of absence? Does it make it easier for the master of the workhouse to maintain order and discipline?—I think it is only part of the general desire to treat a destitute person in a workhouse in a very kindly way.

2323. (Mr. Nunn.) But it does give the guardians a means of light punishment which they otherwise would not possess, does it not?—It certainly is useful in that way.

Limits to deterrency of loss of liberty.

2324. May I make it quite clear? The argument in favour of the loss of personal liberty as the chief element in ineligibility does not apply to persons who are too sick even to desire to leave the houses, if in infirmary workhouses, does it?—No. The whole question of institutional relief to the sick is a very difficult one, and it is none the less difficult because the question is more or less acute in largely populated urban unions only, especially in London.

2325. (Chairman.) It would not apply in the same degree to people beyond a certain age, would it?—No.

2326. It would not apply, because they would not have the same power of locomotion?—There my theory of the irreducible minimum comes in. The conditions of workhouse life would only affect a certain proportion of the inmates, and would not affect the class you mention and the class of the sick.

2327. (Mr. Booth.) Is leave of absence confined to those who are over a certain age?—I think you will find great variation in different unions on that matter; but in all Poor Law matters the exception tends to become the rule.

Report as to "leave of absence" in London workhouses.

2328. (Chairman.) I suppose it makes things work smoothly inside a workhouse?—I think so.

"Leave" as an inducement to pauperism.

2329. (Mr. Nunn.) This leave makes it easier for children to persuade their parents to go into the workhouse instead of having to keep them at home themselves, does it not?—It does.

Paupers' right of discharge.

2330. (The O'Conor Don.) Speaking of leave of absence, cannot a pauper leave at any time he likes?—He can discharge himself when he likes.

2331. And he can come in the next day, can he not?—He can.

2332. You cannot therefore prevent his absence, whether you call it leave or not, because it is in the discretion of the pauper to take it or not?—It is within his discretion to discharge himself, but then if he discharges himself more than once within the month he is kept twenty-four hours, and if he discharges himself more frequently he is kept forty-eight hours, and so on, up to 168 hours.

Abandonment of distinctive workhouse dress.

2333. Do they get leave of absence without discharging themselves?—Yes, and they go out in the workhouse clothes. In a great many unions now the paupers are dressed in ordinary clothes; that is, the dress of the workhouse inmate is supposed to be assimilated to the dress of the people outside. That makes the leave of absence rather better perhaps.

Procedure for granting "leave of absence."

2334. (Sir Samuel Provis.) It is in the discretion of the guardians, is it not, to determine whether they will grant leave of absence from the workhouse to a pauper?—Quite so.

2335. The practice is, is it not, to give general directions to the master, and the master, acting on those general directions, exercises his own discretion?—Yes; he is supposed to be able to refuse inmates leave, but it is very unpopular to do so.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

29 Jan. 1906.

2336. (Mr. Nunn.) Does not the master bring up special cases for the guardians to decide?—I should think that would be very much a matter of the internal administration of the unions.

2337. (Miss Hill.) Is there not a tendency in certan unions to allow the men to go out for several days together and leave their families in the house?—I have seen that.

Effect of Nursing Order on number of trained nurses in workhouses.

2338. (Chairman). I think your next subject is the question ofthe Nursing Order issued by the Local Government Board; will you tell us something about that Order?—I think that the Order of the Board which has done most to improve the conditions of workhouses is the Nursing Order which was issued in August, 1897. The effect of that Order has been to increase the total number of nurses who are employed in workhouses in England from 3,658 to 5,895. In 1896 there were no superintendent nurses, but there were 1,651 nurses in town workhouses; in 1901 there were 164 superintendent nurses and 2,413 other nurses in town workhouses; and in 1905 the latter number had amounted to 2,646, with 163 superintendent nurses. In country workhouses the numbers were in 1896, 498; in 1901, 704, with 63 superintendents, and in 1905, 759, with 68 superintendents. The numbers in separate infirmaries showed a corresponding increase. Therefore, the Order may be considered to have been extremely effective in increasing the number of nurses.

Dr. Edward Smith's Report on Workhouse Nursing, 1867

2339. Side by side with this growth of nurses there was a separation of infirmaries from workhouses, was there not?—Yes. I should like, before I quit the subject of the nurses, to refer to a Report which was made by Dr. Edward Smith in 1867, in which he points out the difficulties of getting nurses in country workhouses. He says, "There are three grounds upon which the guardians base their hesitation to appoint paid nurses, namely, first, that in small workhouses containing, say, less than 100 inmates, the number of sick is very small and not too large to be under the direct care of the matron; second, that of the so-called sick five-sixths of these are aged and infirm and require no special skill to be bestowed upon them; and third, that there are in most workhouses one or more women who have acted as nurses for many years, and who are quite as competent to discharge the duties of nurses as those who usually apply for the paid offices." He goes on in this tentative sort of way, and says: "Upon the whole I am of opinion that in every workhouse there should be a responsible, and as far as possible, a trained nurse." The difference in the point of view is immense. Now the Order provides that in every workhouse there shall be no pauper nursing, and that pauper attendance shall only be allowed by the express direction of the medical officer. It provides for the appointment of a superintendent nurse in certain cases, and, more important than all, it makes the medical officer directly responsible in this way, that if he wants a nurse for a particular case, it is his duty to request the master of the workhouse to get him one; so that a medical officer cannot now complain that the nursing is insufficient; if it is, it is his own fault.

Abolition of pauper nursing.

Prevalence of trained nurses in workhouses.

2340. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Is there a trained nurse now in every workhouse?—There is in almost every workhouse. Of course there are some very small workhouses where there are no sick.

Separation of infirmaries from workhouses.

2341. (Chairman.) If that finishes what you have to say about nurses, perhaps you will now tell us something about the separation of infirmaries from workhouses generally?—There is a considerable movement in favour of the separation of the whole administration of infirmaries from that of workhouses, and a complete return will be handed in of the number of cases where infirmaries are self-administered and have very little to do with the workhouses at all. Sometimes the guardians make proposals for the entire separation of the infirmary from the workhouse, and sometimes they say openly that their object is to run the Poor Law Infirmary as a charitable hospital, and they point out—as a deputation a week or two ago pointed out to me—that in certain towns a man who goes into a separate infirmary is not disfranchised. As I have told the Commission before, some revising barristers take that view; and this deputation told me that their object was to build an infirmary so separated from the workhouse that it should not in any way deter a sick person from using it, and should not disfranchise him if he did use it. In connection with that point I may say that we have frequent proposals to use different terms for designating the various Poor Law establishments. We have proposals to call a pauper a poor person, we have proposals to call workhouses homes of rest, and we have proposals to call an asylum a mental hospital, all of which is not without its significance; I suppose from the point of view of the English language it has but a small significance, but it does show the sort of process which is going on in the minds of some local administrators. I think in certain orders we have allowed the paupers to be called poor persons in certain connections, and I think we have allowed the term poorhouse to be used for workhouse; but our principle is that the source of the aid which is given by the institution should not be concealed, so that one should be perfectly certain from the name by which the institution went whether it was a rate institution or not.

2342. Have you any evidence to show that a somewhat different class of person is making use of these infirmaries to those who were in the habit of going there formerly?—We have, I think, nothing but general evidence, and some statistical indications that that process is going on. We are, as I said in a former part of my evidence, tapping a social stratum which was not formerly accustomed to yield pauperism, and a great many people go into sick asylums now who would not have gone into them in the old days. This diagram (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (10)) will be further supplemented by another (Appendix Vol. I. (A), V. (11)) which I hope will be ready in a day or two, which will show the number of sick included in the able-bodied line. According to our somewhat extraordinary classification for statistical purposes, in the able-bodied is included a certain proportion of sick—called "able-bodied, temporarily sick"—and that will be the class of sick, namely, the comparatively young and curable sick, who would be tempted into Poor Law institutions by their complete separation from the workhouse. You will notice in the diagram that the able-bodied line showed an enormous drop, but that now there is a recrudescence of it, and it has come right up again. That is a point on which you will be able to form a much better opinion when you have before you the statistical memorandum which is being prepared, for there you will get the exact figures, and the diagram is merely a rough indication of what the figures mean.

2343. If that ends what you wish to say about the growth of infirmaries, we will now go to the question of the classification of workhouse inmates?—With regard to that classification, I may say that it is a point on which a very great deal has been heard in the last ten years, and it is a point which no doubt will be dwelt upon by a good many of the witnesses before this Commission. In the different circulars in regard to these matters, we have dwelt rather on the hardships which the deserving and decent inmate would have to suffer from association with the more disorderly ones, and we have suggested the provision of cubicles, separate apartments, and so on. I am bound to say that I do not think, taking the whole of England together, that those recommendations have had very much effect. In some unions they have been carried out, but my impression—and it must of necessity be only a general impression—is that more unions tried it and then dropped it. It is pointed out in some of the more recent reports, and it is my own experience, that the complaints by the paupers themselves as to want of classification are very rare. You may hear from time to time of a pauper who will complain of somebody who is noisy or of a lunatic; but a general complaint that they are mixed up with company that they are not accustomed to, or not familiar with, is very rare; and in my experience classification in that sense according to character or conduct has been more or less dropped. Experience has shewn that it is not a thing that the paupers themselves care very much about. A person who is a pauper in a workhouse is bound to be pretty well behaved; he is usually old, he is by force of circumstances sober, and really the only vice left to him is probably bad language, and the inmate comes from a class which has not the same dislike to bad language that another class would have. I think the fact is undoubted that the people are not very anxious to be classified by force, or by regulations of the guardians; and I think many reasons can be given in explanation. I should say myself that the real reason is that, an old man or an old woman may have all the virtues but they may be abominably disagreeable to live with, and they may have all the vices and yet be rather amusing persons. I think that the whole classification question has been made too much of.

2344. So that you would not advocate its further development?—If the people want to be classified and there is room in the workhouse, I do not think there is a decent visiting committee or a decent master that would not meet their wishes and let them be classified; but to classify them compulsorily in order to moralise them, I think is absurd.

ssification girls and men.

2345. (Mr. Nunn.) I think it is the case that girls over the age of fifteen and women are practically classified together, are they not, and is that not a case in which a further classification does seem absolutely necessary?——Yes, in a case of that sort; but that is not for the comfort either of the girl or of the woman—it is for the purpose of discipline.

2346. And to avoid the possible demoralisation of the girl's character?—Yes. The reason for that further classification would be the same as the reason for the classification of children generally.

ercrowd- of town rkhouses.

2347. But it could not be demanded under the present orders, could it?—It is not in the General Consolidated Order, but, as I say, if they have room the visiting committee will do it. I think one of the greatest evils is the over-crowding of town workhouses. That unfortunately goes on to a considerable extent at this moment, that is to say, the needs of the urban population have gone beyond the provisions of workhouses for them.

2348. (Chairman.) If that finishes what you have to say about classification, we will now go to the question of employment in workhouses?—The employment of people in workhouses is, I venture think, the most difficult and perhaps the most unsatisfactory part of the system. It is so very much easier in urban unions to allow the old people to sit about doing nothing than to give them some healthy occupation, that you will find that not nearly as many people have occupations as ought to have. I am talking now of the large urban unions. That is a point which is, I think, criticised by Dr. Aschrott who seems to me to be an exceptionally good witness both for and against our Poor Law system. He is an absolutely unprejudiced man and not, I think, very fond of the English or of English ways, and he is a man of very great ability. He says of our workhouses generally that they are models for imitation; he is very laudatory as to them generally, and he says, "the proper mean is preserved between humanitarian indulgence and the stringency demanded by the interests of the community." But he says the workhouse employment is unsatisfactory. Personally, I do not think that any rules or regulations of my Board can do much to improve that. It must be improved by the guardians and the masters themselves, but it will be greatly aided by the charitable ladies who visit the workhouses, and help us by carrying out what is known as the Brabazon scheme and other similar schemes. The Brabazon scheme, I may remark, is a revival of a practice which is alluded to by the Commissioners of 1834 as being in operation in the Gravesend workhouse. Probably the Commission are quite well aware what the Brabazon scheme is, but I do not like to give any evidence on any Poor Law matter without again expressing the great obligations we are under to the inventors of that scheme, and to the ladies who carry it out. It has really introduced a new element of comfort and decent living into numbers of workhouses.

tility of rther rules the bject.

he Brabazon heme.

2349. I am afraid I am one of the ignorant, so I must ask you very shortly to state what the Brabazon scheme is?—It is this, that ladies visit the old people and teach them to do something with their hands; they teach them to knit, sew, to do wool work, and all that sort of thing.

2350. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) I believe it is called the Brabazon scheme on account of its being introduced by the Countess of Meath when she was Lady Brabazon?—I think it was due to Lady Meath, but I know that Mrs. Egerton of Bat le was an active pioneer.

2351. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) They sell the proceeds, do they not?—They sell the proceeds for the general benefit of the workhouse inmates, and take care that the people who do the work know that they are working for the whole of the community, and not for themselves only.

2352. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) The proceeds are used to some extent to buy materials for the future working of the scheme, are they not?—Yes.

2353. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Is it in operation in many rural workhouses?—I believe it is in a good many, but sometimes in an imperfect form: still it is making its way.

2354. (Chairman) Who starts the fund?—Some charitable ladies, as a rule.

2355. (Mr. Bentham.) Lady Meath lends the money, I believe?—Yes, I think so, through an association.

2356. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) They borrow through Lady Meath to begin with; she makes a loan of some £20 or £30, whatever it may be, for the cost of the original material, I think?—I believe that is so. They not only teach people to knit and so on, but they make use of the old men at their former occupations; for instance, if they find an old poacher in a workhouse he probably can make a rabbit net, and so on Employment of aged inmates in rural and urban workhouses.

2357. (Chairman.) There are other schemes at work, of course, for inmates of workhouses; have you anything to say on those?—In country workhouses the matter solves itself, because if you have land you will have work in suitable weather, and if you have stock you have always got some old men in the workhouse who are only too glad to look after the pigs and cows and so on. I think when you visit the country workhouses you will find that, as a rule, the old people have enough to do, certainly in decently good weather, to keep themselves fully occupied; but that is not the case in large crowded urban unions, and I have always felt that that was a weak point which required special attention.

Sale of produce of pauper labour.

2358. Would you advocate some more general system of finding occupation for these poor people?—Yes. With regard to the whole question of the labour of workhouse inmates you have many difficulties. There is the difficulty which has arisen in the case of the sale of the proceeds of prison industry, that is to say, there are objections on the part of labour organisations and so on to selling in the open market anything which is made by pauper labour; and those objections led to Mr. Secretary Cross's order with regard to the proceeds of prison labour. There is a good deal to be said as to that, which I think is summed up pretty well in McCulloch's Literature of Political Economy, to which I refer the Commission. He argues that it is perfectly legitimate and proper that the proceeds of prison or workhouse labour should be sold in the open market, and he seems to me to make some sort of a case. The point was put in rather a new light to me the other day by the evidence of Mr. Torr, who is a gentleman who has taken a great deal of interest in labour colonies. He said, if your labour colony did not buy anything, perhaps it ought not to sell anything, but you must remember that it buys from the outside, and to that extent, at all events, it is perfectly justified in selling to the outside. So, I think, if you have organised labour in workhouses you have a perfect right to get rid of the produce. But I, myself, do not think that, unless we have a greater change in the workhouses towards the more able-bodied system than we have had for the last twenty or thirty years—and there are some indications of it—the question need trouble us much, because the present inmates of the workhouses are not people who are likely to produce to an extent which would interfere with the labour market.

2359. If any system is started for the purposes you indicate, disciplinary and otherwise, by which work is given to inmates of a workhouse, I assume it may be urged on behalf of the guardians that the proceeds of the work would not pay for the cost of the system?—Yes, it might.

2360. Has that ever been urged as an argument?—That, I think, is one of the points.

2361. It is an extra charge on the ratepayers, simply in order to effect some moral improvement amongst the inmates of the workhouse?—Yes. I am particularly anxious not to anticipate my evidence, but I may say in this connection that it has always seemed to me perfectly absurd that the body of men who will object to anything being sold out of a prison or a workhouse is exactly the same body of men who are very apt to allow a pauper who is receiving out-relief to compete with the independent labourer outside. This seems to be an absolute inconsistency.

Systematisation of inmates' work.

2362. Do you think that, on the whole, something might be done to systematise more the work for inmates in workhouses?—Yes.

2363. But are we to understand that you would advocate it as a deterrent to going into the workhouse?—No, I think not; I would advocate it as a means of rational occupation. Speaking of the old people's work, I do not think that that is a deterrent. I do not think that you can make old people do work of that nature, any more than you can enforce anything like hard labour on them in a convict prison. One of the most pathetic sights in the world is to see aged convicts doing what they call hard labour, which is simply knitting stockings and such things. You cannot in any institution enforce compulsory work on a man after he has attained a certain age. I am merely talking of work now as a means of occupying the old people, and I would call it occupation rather than work. The subject of a deterrent must be dealt with when I have to answer questions about test houses in urban unions.

Nature of work for aged inmates

Test workhouses for able-bodied.

2364. You mean test-houses for the able-bodied, do you not?—Yes.

2365. That is the subject to which I think we have now come; have you any suggestions to make on that head?—I think that in all large urban communities you must have a test house where you can have task work for the able-bodied loafer. You will find a model house of that description in Manchester, and it will be very interesting for the Commission to get the number of men that have been dealt with there. If you do not have a test house, you will have your workhouse crowded up with loafers, and you will have no means of keeping in check that class of the population who positively prefer an institutional life if it is given under anything like tolerable conditions. There seems to be a certain class of men who, as long as they are secure of to-morrow, do not in the least mind physical discomforts. In Germany, in their labour colonies, they have got a very good name for this class of men. If I may translate it roughly, they call them colony loafers. Unless you have a test workhouse, you will never be able to deal with those men. So far as the large communities are concerned, it is better to have one big test house than one for each union. I understand that there has been a great trouble in London in getting proper test houses (which I have no doubt the Commission will conclude are requisite) because of the difficulty of getting combination among the guardians for the purpose.

Manchester.

Nature of prescribed tasks of work.

2366. Are the tests which are imposed at these houses upon the able-bodied uniform tests?—They would be uniform in the same test house, and we should sanction the work, because, unless we sanction the work, there is always a difficulty in getting a conviction from a magistrate for refusing to do it. The work should be both irksome and unskilled; and it is a problem to fix upon work of that character. You have got to find work which anybody can do, and which nearly everybody dislikes doing. It is no use giving your man stone-breaking or oakum-picking, because that is highly skilled labour. You have got to give him something like corn-grinding or flint-crushing, cross-cut sawing, or some work of that sort, which is laborious and which is wholly unskilled. I need not dwell on the matter at any great length, because I hope in a week or two the Report of the Vagrancy Committee will be out; and in that report you will find the whole question of labour colonies, the work which can be done there, and the diet which should be given, dealt with at very considerable length. The evidence is of great value, and I hope that the report is of some value.

Report of Departmental Committee on Vagrancy.

Lunatics in workhouses.

2367. Your next subject, I think, is the complaints that are made as to the retention of imbeciles in workhouses?—Yes. The Cottage Homes Committee in 1899 strongly recommended the removal of all imbeciles from workhouses; and you will find in the inspectors' reports, notably in those of Mr. Preston-Thomas, instances of the hardships which sane poor persons in workhouses, especially in small workhouses, undergo from their compulsory association with people of unsound mind. To make myself clear, I may say that all persons of unsound mind are statistically lunatics—they are lunatics in workhouses and lunatics in asylums—but the theory has always been from early days that the asylum was for the violent, the dangerous, the curable lunatic; whereas the workhouse was for the chronic, the incurable, the harmless lunatic. Speaking very generally, the certificates for removal from workhouses used to be given not only by magistrates but by the chaplain of the workhouse and various other persons; and then the imbeciles were removed from the workhouses to the asylums. In those days the Commissioners in Lunacy, who visit paupers who happen to be lunatics in asylums as well as paupers who happen to be lunatics in workhouses, used to make the complaint that curable or violent lunatics were detained by boards of guardians in workhouses on the ground of economy. The cost in a workhouse was, say, less than half that in a lunatic asylum, and that was regarded as an inducement to guardians to retain these poor persons in the workhouses instead of sending them off to be cured in the asylums. That was an often reiterated complaint. It was one which I always resented, and which I never believed; but that was my mere personal feeling about it. However, as time went on, the grant of 4s. per week was made in 1874, partly as a grant in aid of local taxation, and partly to meet that objection. Now, lunatics are kept in workhouses, but in far less numbers then thay used to be. There has been, as I think everybody admits, a great transfer of lunatics from the cheaper institutions to the more expensive ones; and that process is still going on, but still there are many lunatics in workhouses. There are also some who are remanded there for fourteen days. But the proportion of lunatics now in workhouses is very much smaller than it used to be, and varies immensely as between union and union. You will find in some workhouses that they have no lunatics at all, as all their lunatics are in asylums; and you will find in some others that they have 30 per cent. or perhaps 40 per cent. of their lunatics in the workhouse. The possible explanation may be that if the guardians have room in the workhouse they will keep the lunatics there, but if they have no room in the workhouse, rather than build, they will make the county build for them, that is to say, they will send the lunatics to the county asylum by magistrate's certificates. The variation in the proportion of the number of lunatics in workhouses and in asylums chargeable to the several unions is so great as to suggest that it depends rather upon the fact whether the guardians want workhouse accommodation or do not want workhouse accommodation. You cannot suppose that the lunatics in one union are more curable or more violent than the lunatics in another, and yet you will find, as I say, in some cases, 100 per cent. in the asylums, and in others you will only find some 60 or 70 per cent. In the larger unions the imbeciles have separate wards, and the question of classification does not occur; but in the small workhouses the question of classification does occur, and is very largely influenced by the grant.

Variable proportion of lunatics in workhouses.

2368. Is the 4s. paid on behalf of all lunatics or only on behalf of lunatics in asylums?—It is only for those lunatics who are in the asylums.

The "Lunacy Grant."

2369. Then, putting all other considerations on one side, it is worth the while of a board of guardians to transfer as many of their lunatics as they possibly can into the asylums, is it not?—Yes, if they want accommodation.

2370. Does the 4s. cover the extra cost?—The 4s. was meant to exactly cover the difference between the workhouse cost and the asylum cost, so as to give no financial inducement in any way; but, as I shall show later on in my evidence, the cost of maintenance in asylums has increased very much indeed, and faster than the cost in the workhouses has increased; so that the grant does not in my judgment, act with the same force that it used to do.

2371. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Is the cost in asylums a charge upon the county, while in the workhouse it is a charge upon the union?—The guardians pay the maintenance charge out of the union funds, and the county pays the other charges. The maintenance, which varies from, say, 9s. to 14s. a week, is paid by the guardians in respect of each pauper sent from their union.

Apportionment of cost of pauper lunatics in asylums.

2372. (Chairman.) May we say, broadly speaking, that the effect of the grant of 4s. per week has been to secure better treatment?—It has been to transfer the lunatic from the cheaper workhouse building to the more expensive asylum building, and to raise the total cost of maintenance per lunatic to about Effect of "Lunacy Grant."

£28 a year. It has often been done within my own knowledge for the express purpose of providing this or that union with additional accommodation. Whether the man is better off in the asylum or in the workhouse, I do not know; personally I should prefer the country workhouse.

2373. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) If he goes to the asylum, he has much less chance of employment afterwards if he recovers, has he not?—Much less.

Lunatics in workhouses not necessarily objectionable.

2374. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) Would these imbeciles be kept in the infirmary part of the workhouse?—Some would be in the infirmary, and some would not be in the infirmary. I should like to say that I rather think that this question of the separation of lunatics has been just a little exaggerated. I know that you can easily instance cases where a noisy lunatic or a lunatic who is offensive to the eye may be a real grievance to other persons in the workhouse; but there are lots of lunatics who are not anything of the sort. I have some lunatics in workhouses who are very old acquaintances of mine, and I cannot help remembering a case where the life of an infant was absolutely saved by the care which an imbecile girl bestowed upon her. So that if there are exceptional instances one way, there are exceptional instances the other way, and I do not myself believe that in a very large number of cases there was very much grievance amongst the old people. I have often asked them about it, and they have said: "We don't mind poor Mrs. So-and-so, she does not do any harm." Still what my board have got to do—they have been instructed to do it, and their inspectors' reports in some instances point to the necessity of doing it—is to devise and recommend some means whereby lunatics shall be taken out of workhouses altogether; and if the Commission will permit me, I should like to say, speaking entirely for myself, my own view of what the procedure ought to be. I think the matter might be settled once for all if all lunatics were made a county charge. The county council would then be responsible for lunatics in workhouses, for lunatics in asylums, and, I should hope, for certain classes of the feeble-minded and epileptics who are not sufficiently provided for under the existing law. They would then be able to make, as they can under the existing law, bargains with certain of the unions (which have separate accommodation for them) to take in lunatics; or they might, with the consent of my board, pay for individual lunatics, or they might remove the lunatics to the asylum, or they might classify them; and if they had to build they would surely build not on the asylum scale, but on the workhouse scale for these people. It may be that an expenditure of £500 or £600 a bed is justifiable for lunatics who are either curable or dangerous; but it cannot be that such an expenditure is justifiable for people who are harmless and incurable. Lunatics in asylums must—and we know they must—contain a great number of persons who are perfectly harmless and quite incurable; what the exact proportion is we do not know, because you must remember that the pauper in the lunatic asylum is not under the same inspection as a pauper anywhere else. He is under the inspection of the Commissioners in Lunacy, and we have nothing to do with asylums. I venture to think that the true remedy is the centralisation of the administration, both in the county, and in the central administration. I think the bodies who look after the lunatics in workhouses and in asylums should be the same bodies both locally and centrally.

Proposal to make county councils responsible for all lunatics.

Access of Local Government Board inspectors to asylums.

2375. Then that would necessitate the inspectors of the county authorities having access to workhouses in which there were any lunatics?—Or the inspectors of workhouses having access to the lunatic asylums for the purpose of inspecting the pauper lunatics there, and bringing the classification into line.

2376. Have they not access now to the county asylums?—No.

Guardians' visits to asylums.

2377. Then when a lunatic is transferred to an asylum is the Poor Law authority no longer responsible?—That is so. Every board of guardians visit the asylum from time to time and look at their own patients, that is, the patients for whom they pay; but that is all that they do.

2378. (Mr. Loch.) Would not the bulk of the persons transferred be classed as harmless senile dements?—They are not altogether senile dements. They are imbeciles, and they vary from the senile dement to the half-baked youth.

2379. The larger clearance, as it were, from the workhouses, would be rather of the aged infirm, I take it?—I do not think so. As the 4s. removes most of the financial objections to the transfer, the moment the pauper becomes old and troublesome, the master or the medical officer find very good reasons for taking him before a magistrate. Since the Lunacy Act, 1890, the certificates for removal and for retention in workhouses have been given with a great deal more formality than was formerly the case, and now a man cannot be detained in a workhouse without a certificate of the justices; whereas, formerly he could be detained on the certificate of the medical officer. Here, I am anticipating my evidence again, but I should like to point out, as showing the importance of this question, that in the year 1894 the maintenance of lunatics in county and borough asylums and registered hospitals cost £1,466,185, and in the year 1904, that is, only ten years later, the cost of maintenance amounted to £2,286,652, which shows a most ominous increase. (See Appendix Vol. I (A), No. V. (18).)

Procedure for detention and removal of lunatics.

2380. (The O'Connor Don.) Is not the certificate of the magistrates rather a matter of form, once the medical certificate has been given?—I should not like to say it is a matter of form, because I have known many cases where a man has been remanded for a further period.

Increase in number of lunatics and their cost.

2381. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) Has the increase in the number of individual lunatics in asylums been in proportion to the increase in cost?—No, it has not been proportionate at all; the cost has gone up faster than the numbers.

Reports of Aged Poor Commission and Cottage Homes Committee as to lunatics in workhouses.

2382. (Chairman.) Have you anything to say with regard to the recommendations of the Aged Poor Commission, and the Cottage Homes Committee of 1899?—I cannot, at the moment, find my reference to the report of the Aged Poor Commission. I think I have already said that the Cottage Homes Committee in 1899 recommended the removal of all lunatics from workhouses; and the Commission did so, too, I think.

Combination of unions for workhouse classification.

2383. Will you now kindly tell us your views about workhouse classification?—It has often been suggested, with a view to the classification of inmates and the securing of better nursing for the sick, that rural unions should be grouped. That is a point that is very often discussed, and the suggestion that it should be done was definitely made in a speech by Mr. Walter Long. The matter was considered by the Cottage Homes Committee in 1899, who were rather opposed to it on the ground that such a classification of rural unions would separate poor folk from their friends. To my mind that is an objection which undoubtedly prevails to a certain extent; it may be, perhaps, that it is a little exaggerated, but still, it is a point against the proposal. What is more against the proposal, from my point of view, is the absolute want of local support which schemes of that sort get. There is nothing on which the average guardian is more sensitive than any change in his area. He looks upon it as his right, and he does not like to be mixed up with the neighbours at all. It is quite impossible, except by general legislation, to get over that prejudice. I have had a hand on several occasions in amalgamations of this sort. They are the most invidious and difficult things which a general inspector has to do. Quite old friends would make it a personal matter with you if they think you have been concerned in altering their landmarks—even in the strongest possible cases. I have one in my mind now, where the proposal was to amalgamate two unions, one of which had a workhouse with eleven inhabitants in it! There was absolutely no objection to the amalgamation that any reasonable man, as I thought, could see; but the opposition, the fighting, the influencing of Members of Parliament, was perfectly extraordinary. In another case where there were two unions, both with very bad workhouses, both with the same sort of population and in the same county, where it was suggested that they should be amalgamated and a joint workhouse built in a far more convenient spot than either of their present ones, there was absolutely no local support whatever for it. I held the inquiry, and I think there was one man only in the room who was in favour of the amalgamation. I was obliged to report to my board that the change was out of the question, because there was no local support. I am perfectly certain that there is not a Commissioner in this room who would go down and see these unions, and look into the circumstances, and would not at once say, obviously, the thing to do is to have an amalgamation; that will save money, and will improve everything else. But it was not to be. Although this Commission may, and the House of Commons may, my department cannot ignore the feeling which I say prevails in the country against any amalgamation scheme of this sort, which, as very many guardians suppose, would lead up to a transfer of their business to the county councils. I think there is more difficulty now in this matter than there used to be.

Powers of Central Authority and county councils to amalgamate areas.

2384. Has the Local Government Board the power of over-riding local objections ?—We have ample powers. We can amalgamate.

2385. Would the local friction that would be caused be such that in your department it is better not to exercise that power ?—I think it is one of those things, which, if it were left to the Local Government Board, would not be done ; I mean to say, even if we had a recommendation in favour of it, I do not think we could do it. There is another point, namely, that you could amalgamate the unions, but in practice it is for the county councils to amalgamate the sanitary districts. But if you are going to amalgamate two unions, you should certainly be able to amalgamate the sanitary authorities as well ; yet, if the county councils are not backing you, you will fail. There are two or three such cases that the Commission might very well investigate. We cannot pass by this recommendation as a mere recommendation made casually which can be neglected. It has been made very strongly ; and it is very strongly felt by some people that it is the true solution of certain difficulties as to the nursing, and so on in small country workhouses ; so we have got to consider it. I have asked my colleague, Mr. Jenner-Fust, to look into and specially report on the matter. There is the county of Westmorland, for instance. The county of Westmorland, I think, has two unions in it, and three if not four workhouses. You would have thought that with a real self-governing area that was about good enough reason for amalgamation ; but I am told there is no support whatever for the proposal to amalgamate.

Case of Westmorland.

Expediency of closing unnecessary workhouses.

2386. What might be done, do you think ?—I think the board might safely close some unnecessary workhouses. I think that, fortified with a strong recommendation by a Commission, we might do a good deal—not universally, by any means, but here and there—in regard to a case where a workhouse might be closed and a good deal of money saved thereby. A very good instance of that is where, owing to an accident (the occurrence of a fire) the workhouse at the Westhampnett Union was burnt down. They get on perfectly well without a workhouse, they board their paupers out, and they say it is more satisfactory, and it is cheaper. I know most of their paupers ; the sick ones, certainly, are very much better attended to than they ever could have been attended to in the old House. You will find, here and there, instances of that kind, and I think advantage might be taken of those.

Westhampnett workhouse.

Power of Central Authority to close workhouses.

2387. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Has the Board power to close without further legislation ?—We have power to close a workhouse.

2388. (Sir Samuel Provis.) But it is only exercised where the workhouse is considered to be unfit for occupation as a workhouse, is it not ?—We have got to say that it is unfit. I have here the particulars of a case which I think is worth your attention ; it is from a report which I got yesterday, and it refers to a workhouse in a very small union with a decaying population, the boundaries of the district not being satisfactory. There always appears to have been an idea that something would be done to obviate the necessity of building a workhouse, but our architect has been down, and he reports that the workhouse was built in 1836, at a cost of £4,000. He says of it : "Most of the floors on the ground are of stone or of bricks, and are much worn. The windows are of a bad shape, and the wards narrow, low, and poorly ventilated ; in fact, the whole place seems to have remained pretty much as it was when it was completed sixty-five years ago. Having regard to all the circumstances, it would not be, in my opinion, possible to put the buildings, drainage, and heating into anything like a satisfactory condition without involving an outlay of £3,000 to £4,000, and to spend this sum on a cheap and rough building such as this is would be a most injudicious expenditure." Then he says : "The only practical alternative would be to set to work on a scheme which would have for its object the ultimate reconstruction of the whole workhouse on modern lines." The reconstruction of the whole workhouse on modern lines would mean an expenditure of ever so many thousand pounds—ten or fifteen, perhaps. What in the world are we to do in a case like that ? I have now asked that the inspector should report as to whether it would be possible to pull that workhouse down and close it. It is a very exceptional case, but it illustrates these two points—the difficulty of providing adequate accommodation in very poor unions, and the tendency that there is to recommend the very best. No architect likes patching up the £4,000 building.

2389. (Chairman.) Now, I think we come to the subject of the relief of able-bodied men ; I think you have a number of suggestions and observations to make on that ?—Yes. I will begin with out-door relief, and I will endeavour to keep my evidence on that within the narrowest possible limits. With regard to the powers and duties of guardians, Sir Hugh Owen, when before the Select Committee on Want of Employment, put into the Appendix a memorandum,* which states concisely and very clearly the powers and duties of the guardians, the powers and duties of relieving officers, and the effect of existing orders. If I were asked to put in anything of the sort, I should put in the same memorandum ; I cannot add to it at all, or make it better.

Out-door relief of able bodied.

Memo. by Sir Hugh Owen.

2390. (Mr. Phelps.) Could that memorandum be reprinted, as I should think it would be a very good thing for us to have it ?—I should think it could ; it only fills about three pages of the Blue Book.

2391. (Chairman.) Would you now tell us what are the powers and duties of the guardians with regard to out-door relief ?—The first point which must be borne in mind throughout is that the powers of the guardians with reference to the granting of relief are as extensive as they well can be. There is no limit to the amount of relief which they can give, except reasonableness, of which the auditor is the judge. They have the rates to fall back upon, so that practically they can spend anything they please. They are the sole judges of who is to receive relief and who is not, subject only to the elastic provisions, or rather, I would say, the wide provisions of the Regulation Order or the Prohibitory Order. It is in their hands to decide whether a pauper is to have relief in an institution, or whether he is to have out-door relief.

Guardians' discretion as to out-door relief.

2392. Perhaps you would now refer a little more fully to these two orders ?—The orders in question (and I have no doubt Mr. Adrian has pointed out to you what they are) are the prohibitory order which is issued to country unions and a great many urban unions, and the regulation order which is issued to London and to certain other unions which are mostly in Lancashire. If you look down the list of the unions which are exempted from the prohibitory order, I think outside London and Lancashire, you will not be able to find at first sight the reason why they were omitted, because there were certainly until quite recently some very small country unions under the regulation order. At the time of the issue of the order, they probably had no workhouse, or for some reason of that kind they were put under the regulation order. It would appear to be of very great importance that the prohibitory order should be issued wherever it can be issued, instead of the regulation order. It will be suggested to the Commission that this will be a reform of very great value ; and it will be suggested that there is no conceivable reason why it should not be done. So far as statistics show, the actual administration is rather stricter under the regulation order than it is under the prohibitory order ; that is to say, a greater proportion of the relief is institutional in London (for which there are special reasons, owing to the operation of the Metropolitan Poor Fund), and in Lancashire (where there is no Metropolitan Poor Fund), than is the case in the bulk of the unions which are under the prohibitory order ; from which, perhaps, the inference might be drawn that the orders have had no effect at all, or only a very small effect on the way in which relief has been administered, the whole thing depending on the guardians. I do not think that inference would be quite justified by the facts. The Commission must remember that it is inevitable in growing urban unions with a large population that the Poor Law should be administered rather more on in-door lines than Prohibitory and Regulation Orders.

Comparison of administration under the two Orders.

on out-door lines. For instance, in urban unions the rents are very much higher, and although, as relief is often given, the pauper has, on the face of it, nothing to live on, still he must, as a matter of fact, pay his rent somehow; and if the rent is higher, the scale of relief must be higher, and so the guardians will be less tempted by the usual fallacy of cheapness to give out-door relief. Then, again, in towns the poor live much more in lodgings, which are taken for a short period, than they do in the country. The guardians hesitate before offering the workhouse to an agricultural labourer who has possession of a cottage of his own, and who has some furniture. They do not like doing it. They think that if the man once leaves that cottage, he will never get back again and will stay in the workhouse all his life. There is no such objection to offering the workhouse to a man who is living in a lodging in a town, and who practically has no furniture. I should say that it might be practicable, and certainly would be useful to prohibit the granting of out-door relief altogether to people who have no furniture; for one thing there is no object in it. There is another reason. In a town union where the population is large, matters are more left to the judgment of the chairman and of the relieving-officer than they are in a rural union. In a rural union, almost every pauper who has got anything to be said for him would have it said for him by the guardian of his parish, who is a neighbour. You can hardly judge in a dry light the case of the old woman that you meet every morning as you go out of your gate, and who probably has a tongue of her own; and so you have just a little feeling that it is better not to offend her. That is putting forward probably the best of the reasons which induce guardians to specially advocate a case from their own parish. All these reasons which I have enumerated working together, do make it very much easier to be strict in urban unions; in fact, as I have said, they make it inevitable that relief should be given in urban unions more strictly than in rural unions. That tendency is so strong as to over-ride altogether the difference of the check imposed on guardians by the prohibitory order, or by the regulation order. The reason why pauperism is less and administration stricter in the regulation unions than in the prohibitory unions is because they are urban unions, and so the conditions tend towards stricter relief.

2393. Can you illustrate that?—In Lancashire there are twenty unions with a pauperism of under 2 per cent., and in Lancashire they are all regulation unions. In Lincolnshire there is no union with a pauperism under 2 per cent., and there are five of them with a pauperism of more than 4 per cent. Contrasts of that sort you find everywhere. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (14).)

2394. In what you are now saying are you including London?—The London administration is not comparable, in that as in many other particulars, with the country administration, from the simple fact that the whole cost of in-door relief is, in London, by the operation of the Metropolitan Poor Fund, paid off a larger area than the union.

2395. But do not the same conditions hold good in London as those which you have described as prevailing in urban districts elsewhere?—Yes; the in-door relief of London is very much higher than the in-door relief of the country.

2396. You have something to say now, I think, as regards the position of members of friendly societies?—I suppose one of the most salient facts with regard to Poor Law relief is that practically no member of a sound friendly society is ever a pauper; when I say no member is ever a pauper I mean that the members who are are infinitesimally few in number. That point is well brought out in the evidence of Mr. B. Stead before the Aged Poor Commission, and it has been the subject of more than one Parliamentary Return which you will get. I do not propose to give any detailed evidence about friendly societies, but I have no doubt you will have that in plenty. I should like the Commission to ascertain for themselves the exact number of pence per week which will insure lifelong independence to a labourer.

2397. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) Do you mean in his old age?—I mean in his old age as well.

2398. (Chairman.) I assume there is a variation in the amount of contribution to these friendly societies?—Yes.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

29 Jan. 1906.

2399. Have you anything to say about total abstainers, and whether they at all contribute to swell pauperism?—You will find, I think, also that practically no total abstainer is ever a pauper. I was told last week that some had been discovered in the county of Cornwall, but I think you will find that practically a man who is a total abstainer is not a pauper. Stated like that, I think there is a certain amount of cant about it. The reason why a man who is an abstainer does not become a pauper is not because he is a teetotaller, but because he has got sufficient moral courage and strength to submit to a present deprivation for some future good. It is for the Commission to consider whether that amount of self-control is too great a task to ask of the ordinary English labourer; but if he can exercise it, he may rely upon it that he will end as an independent man and not be a hanger on the body politic.

Total abstinence and pauperism.

2400. You say that neither members of friendly societies nor total abstainers become paupers even in their old age?—That is so, I think.

2401. That, would you say, is as far as your experience goes?—That is as far as I wish to say now.

2402. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) Does that apply to the country districts as well as to the urban districts?—Yes.

2403. (Mr. Nunn.) Then is the Out-door Relief (Friendly Societies) Act, 1904, practically a dead letter?—No, it is not a dead letter.

2404. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Does a total abstainer mean a lifelong abstainer?—I think so.

Thrift and pauperism.

2405. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) I should like to know whether you consider that that belongs to a general thrift of character, in other words, that it is not due so much to total abstention as to the kind of character which the man possesses, which enables him to exercise self control?—It is the same mind behind the member of the friendly society and behind the total abstainer.

2406. (Mr. Phelps.) The fact that the total abstainer does not become a pauper is the effect (as in the case of a member of a friendly society) of a common cause, and does not stand in the relation of cause and effect to the fact that he is a total abstainer?—That is so.

Proposed returns as to pauperism among total abstainers.

2407. (Chairman.) That is a very important surmise of yours; can you give us any clue which we could follow up as regards total abstainers?—A return ad hoc from the general inspectors for a certain number of workhouses might help you. That is the best I can do for the Commission. I made exactly the same statement that I am making now in the year 1895, and I made it again in the year 1899, and I think if I had been wrong I should have heard that I was wrong.

2408. The brewers and the distillers have not upset you?—No. I should have heard very clearly that I was wrong if I had been wrong, but as a matter of fact I have heard nothing.

Effect of unsound Friendly Societies.

2409. (Mr. Phelps.) Are the returns with regard to friendly societies available?—Yes. One thing that really ought to be done is to absolutely crush out unsound friendly societies. They are abominable institutions, and most cruel. If you had sat, as I have done for so many hours, on boards of guardians, you would be able to recall case after case where some poor man had helped himself for years, and then the society had broken up, and he was obliged in his old age to become a pauper, feeling his pauperism infinitely more keenly than if he had done nothing to help himself.

2410. (Chairman.) Inasmuch as sound friendly societies from your practical experience, prevent their members becoming paupers, would you say that it is the business of the Government to prevent the starting of unsound friendly societies which, by breaking down, create pauperism?—They bring the whole principle of friendly societies into disrepute, and, what is more, unfairly compete with the solvent societies.

Administration as a cause of pauperism.

2411. I think you would allege that pauperism is a matter which is a good deal regulated by administration?—Yes. I am often asked what is the main cause of pauperism, and I am obliged to say that the main cause of pauperism is the guardians. It is the guardians whose administration makes pauperism. Pauperism to a certain extent follows trade. When I give you, as I hope to give you, the Board of Trade returns as to employment, you will see that there is a correspondence. (See Appendix

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

29 Jan. 1906.

Vol. I. (A), No. V. (8).) You will see at once that the pauperism in country unions where the age of the inhabitants is much greater, must of necessity be higher than the pauperism in unions where the age limit is low. You will find that, according to the census returns, in some unions they will have as many as 800 people over sixty years of age in every 10,000; you will find in other unions that the number of 800 falls to about 400. Circumstances like those must make a difference; but taking it over a large number of unions you will find, I think, that the rate of pauperism varies directly with the amount of out-door relief given. Sir William Chance's book on The Better Administration of the Poor Law is full of such illustrations. It may, I suppose, be your present purpose to ask why Bradford had only a pauperism of 1·1 per cent. in 1901, I think, whereas Leeds had a pauperism of 2·6, the population of the two towns being approximately the same. I suggest that the cause of that difference is found in the fact that, whereas Bradford has only 1,200 out-door paupers, Leeds has 4,200, and that, whereas Bradford has 1,500 in-door paupers, there are 1,700 at Leeds. I hesitate to multiply instances of this sort, because they are so common, and they meet you everywhere. I have prepared a table (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (14)) which, to a great extent, shews the matter, so far as the rate of pauperism goes. Take, for instance, two unions in Sussex which have practically no difference between them. One, Petworth, has a pauperism of 4·3, and the next union, which is Thakeham, has a pauperism of 2·3. The only conceivable difference is that in the one case the guardians give much out-door relief, and in the other case they do not. That is the most commonplace statement in Poor Law.

Effect of old-age on pauperism.

Comparison of pauperism in Leeds and Bradford.

Comparison of pauperism in Petworth and Thakeham Unions.

Return as to percentage of pauperism in various unions.

2412. What return is that from which you have just quoted?—This is a grouped return of every union in the country which has 6 per cent. of pauperism, 5 per cent., 4 per cent. and so on. But of far greater importance than even that point of comparing the unions one by one, is to take the history of a certain union and to see what happened to the number of paupers after certain changes of administration had been made. Sir William Chance's book is full of illustrations of that. In his book you can see what happened at Brixworth, what happened at Bradfield, what happened at St. George's-in-the-East, and so on—those are extreme unions, but what happens in an ordinary union is no less striking, for you will see that a very small change in the restriction of out-door relief will knock numbers off the pauper list quite astonishingly. I suppose the leading case is that one at Leeds, which has been so often quoted. It is quite an old story now. The Leeds Guardians, instead of each sitting on the Committee for his own ward, by a sort of self-denying ordinance, sat in other peoples' wards, and the result was that some thousands a year were saved. That was before my time. I should like to add that I am perfectly certain that what happened previously was a sort of unconscious action on the part of the guardians; I do not think they purposely gave relief to their own constituents, because they thought they would get some advantage from it. But there is a sort of unconscious fairness which comes to a man when he has got nothing to gain on either side.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

30 Jan. 1906.

2413. (Chairman.) At the close of your evidence yesterday, you advanced the proposition that pauperism was very largely regulated by administration; now I think we come to the point that in your judgment out-door relief in itself is insufficient, and must be supplemented by other means of subsistence; what have you to say on that?—All the experts are unanimous in thinking that all domiciliary relief is and must practically be supplemented by earnings and other sources of income. The fact is that where guardians are obliged by force of circumstances to undertake the whole cost of the relief, it is always in-door relief. With reference to out-door relief so supplemented, there is also a practical unanimity amongst administrators from the early Commissioners down to the last strong evidence that I have in my mind with reference to it—that of Sir Hugh Owen—that all relief so supplemented must affect adversely the wages, or, which is the better term, the earnings, of the independent labourer. That is a point of very great difficulty. It seems to me, if you will forgive me for giving my own view on the matter, that it would be rather difficult to show that in rural districts, where of recent years there has been a great demand for labour, the rate of wages or earnings has been diminished to any appreciable extent by the grant of out-door relief. In towns where there is occasionally a great demand on the part of the labourers for work, the case against out-door relief would be stronger. But I venture to put before the Commission this point, that whether earnings (and I prefer the word earnings to wages) are appreciably lowered or not, at all events when any piece of work is done by a man in receipt of relief, that piece of work is done once for all, and cannot be done by the independent labourer. If I hire a pauper in receipt of out-door relief, who by the fact of his out-door relief is enabled to remain on the labour market, to, say, sweep my carriage drive or cut my hedge, the drive is swept, the hedge is cut, and the work does not remain for the independent labourer I suggest that this is a matter of absolutely vital importance to the whole question, and needs all the consideration which persons interested in the subject can give it. It does not appear to me outside the line of possibility to advance the question a good deal further by specific inquiries in certain selected unions. I would point out that the early Commissioners laid great stress upon the matter and showed, what is indeed the fact, that friendly societies are most careful not to allow members who are in receipt of benefit to do any work outside. That may be, for one reason, because they are afraid that there would be imposition on the part of people receiving benefit if they are allowed to work; but I have no doubt a great deal is also due to the feeling that it is not fair that a man whose earnings are supplemented even by friendly societies' relief (and still more by Poor Law relief) should compete in the open labour market with independent people. I would like to read on this subject two quotations, one from a current newspaper which I found in my drawer by accident two or three days ago, and the other from a letter.

Inadequacy of out-relief per se.

Effect of out-relief on wages and labour market.

2414. Perhaps you would kindly read those?—The newspaper extract is headed, "Working for 6d. a day," and it says:—"A woman who appeared before the Stonehouse (Plymouth) Board of Guardians yesterday, for a continuance of relief, stated that she was engaged by a firm of Government contractors in making military trousers from khaki cloth. Her duty was to completely make trousers, including button-holes, as the firm possessed no button-hole machine. For completely making the trousers she received only 3d. per pair, and had to provide the cotton herself. It was only possible to make two pairs per day. Several of the guardians expressed astonishment at this statement, but the applicant emphatically reiterated her statements. The chairman said it was a bad case of sweating, and the continuance of the relief was granted." That, to a thinking man, seems simply astounding. The other quotation I should like to read is from a letter which came into my hands last week in the ordinary course of official business. It is in these words: "Honourable Sir, I beg to bring before your notice a Poor Law Act or system which I consider requires attention and more liberal treatment. I am in the habit of employing men who are discharged by employers on account of their age, to assist for two or three hours daily, for which they earn 3s. or 4s. per week. In two cases they are men who have been in receipt of Poor Law relief of 3s. 9d. per week. One, H. K., who is now doing this odd work, at the end of six weeks' grant of relief had to make a fresh application, when he was asked if he was earning anything, and how much. On his telling the guardians 3s. per week, he was told he was not entitled to relief, and they stopped the pay. Now I think you will agree with me that even if the earnings amounted to 4s. a week, 7s. 9d. including the pay is not too much for a man to provide decently for himself, and that the law should extend the earnings to at least 4s. a week." The writer may be quite correct in saying that 7s. 9d. is not too much, but I should like to know precisely by inquiry what the effect of that Poor Law relief was on his wages bill. I instance those two cases as showing that the matter is one really of current administration, and I say that in my judgment the point requires an absolutely careful investigation.

2415. You have stated your objection to these small doles of out-door relief; what is the contention of those boards of guardians who give them? I assume it is that it is cheaper to so support an out-door pauper than that he should become an inmate of a workhouse?—A great deal of the mal-administration of boards of guardians depends on a number of catchwords: "Mr. Chairman, it will be cheaper to give out-door relief;" "Let us help them who help themselves;" "She does a bit; give her some more." I suppose some guardians would consider those maxims to be crystallised wisdom, but whether they are crystallised wisdom or not, I contend that they have a permanently bad effect on the independent labourer in the particular matter of the competition of the pauper with the independent person.

2416. You have referred to the policy of friendly societies, and you have told us that they will not give relief to anyone who is in receipt of wages; would not the object of that rule be to act as a deterrent to members of friendly societies applying for sick relief?—Apparently. You will find in the very interesting early reports of Mr. Tidd-Pratt that he says that friendly society relief ought not to be more than, I think it is, a third of the ordinary wages, because, as he also says, a certain proportion of mankind are quite content with a very small competence provided they need not work.

2417. Assuming that there was more rigid supervision over out-door relief, and that the class you have indicated were refused out-door relief, what would become of them?—Experience shows that the bulk of them would disappear from the Application Book altogether somehow or other. I think that it is almost universal Poor Law experience that they would either be helped by their friends or they would get other work, or (to refer to the letter which I have just read to you) I think it is pretty obvious that the gentleman who employs them might spring a shilling or two in their wages and pay for his own labour himself. Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B. 30 Jan. 1906. Effect of restriction of out-relief.

2418. The contention of outsiders sometimes is that, if this relief were knocked off, there would be a considerable mortality from starvation; what is the experience where the system has become stricter? Are there any statistics to show that in the process of its becoming stricter there was an increased mortality?—There are most abundant statistics on the subject. I have not the quotation here, but I very well remember what Canon Bury of Brixworth said. He said: "This union has practically abolished out-door relief; it has done so in the face of hostile opposition, and you may be perfectly sure that if any real hardship had resulted to the independent poor from the restriction of relief you would have heard of it." On the other hand, you will find it alleged by people who have given special consideration to this subject, that those unions where there is a great restriction of out-door relief are very little affected by strikes or bad trade, much less indeed than the unions where the administration is lax; and it is alleged, you will also find, that the people are absolutely better off. I suggest this point: There are only a few unions (for reasons which I hope to deal with later by-and-by) where there is a conscious restriction of out-door relief in order to dispauperise; it will be quite easy to go to those unions, and to find out whether in them the rate of wages is higher or whether it is lower; whether the contributions to friendly societies are greater or whether they are less; whether there is more drunkenness or less drunkenness, whether the conditions of housing are better or worse; and whether there is more poverty or more charity than there is in unions where the Poor Law is laxly administered. Suggested inquiry into conditions of unions where out-relief is restricted.

2419. Could you give us a list of the unions between which such a contrast could be made?—I could. They are well known. The unions in this country with a pauperism of under 1 per cent., or of one per cent. or thereabouts, are, unfortunately, but few, and I will hand a list of them in. I will make special reference to unions like Bradfield, Brixworth, St. Georges-in-the East, Newhaven, and Blean, where for one reason or the other the guardians have had a definite policy for the restriction of out-door relief. You will find in the last issue of the "Charity Organization Review," a paper on the administration of out-door relief. Three unions are there taken as typifying three policies of relief. The first is the policy of making in-door relief the rule and out-door relief the exception. In that union £4,503 was spent, of which only £263 was for out-door relief. The second is the policy of making out-door relief the rule and in-door relief the exception; there £6,371 was spent, of which £2,632 was for out-door relief. I may say that these two unions are of much the same size. The third is the policy of limiting out-door relief to those only who are really deserving, whose character is above suspicion, and who have exhibited thrift; I cannot at the moment put my hand on the figures for that union, but you will find that they are somewhere between the two extremes. Instances of effect of restriction of out-relief.

2420. (Mr. Booth.) Have you the names of the unions?—Bradfield is the strict union, Cosford, in Suffolk, the lax union, and Abingdon the moderate union. Instances like these are quite common.

2420a. (Chairman.) There is another argument which it occurs to me might be put forward by those who advocate a large system of out-door relief. It might be contended that although strict administration might be beneficial to the union in which it was practised, it would be detrimental to the neighbouring unions by driving into them persons who previously had relief from the union which had altered its administration?—That is an allegation which has been very often made, but it is an allegation which can easily be proved or disproved by a very simple local inquiry in the unions affected. I know that the Effect of restriction of out-relief on neighbouring unions.

charge is especially brought just where you would have expected that it would be brought, that is, in the case of the Whitechapel union. But the clerk to that union has always said that he removes a good many more paupers under orders of removal than he receives from other unions. I should not take the clerk's opinion or any opinion ; I should like to find out the absolute facts, which in that particular case would not be difficult.

2421. Can you give us your impression on this point ?—My impression is that there is nothing in it.

General advantages of restriction of out-relief.

2422. Therefore you would say, I take it, that strict administration in a union is not only beneficial to the union itself, but even to the surrounding unions ?—I should almost go as far as that. I would like to couple up the three things I have said. I put it hypothetically—if it be that a man by a moderate exercise of self-restraint and foresight can prevent himself from becoming a pauper, if it be that practically no man can become a pauper, except with the concurrence of a board of guardians ; and if it be that by his own action and with the concurrence of the guardians he becomes a pauper, then his relief is an injury to his neighbours : then I submit that there is the very strongest ground for holding that any out-door relief which is given, must be given with the greatest care and discrimination, and must be reserved for those exceptional cases who are unfortunately bound to be dependent on their neighbours by their own misfortune, in other words, for the irreducible minimum.

2423. (Mr. Nunn.) I think those unions in which a strict administration of out-door relief is the rule, generally decline to give non-settled out-door relief, do they not ?—Yes ; non-settled out-door relief is seldom given by unions that are strict.

2424. In that case it would take a year before an applicant in the adjoining union could get any out-door relief by passing over from the strict union to the lax union, would it not ?—It would be a year before he was irremoveable.

2425. That is a degree of forethought which is not very usual in applicants for out-door relief, is it ?—I am afraid not. A year is a long time to a man of that class.

2426. (Chairman.) I think you consider that a system of unwise out-door relief inflicts injury on independent persons ?—Personally I think it does. But all I would suggest in my evidence is that by following the lines which I have indicated it can be made the subject of almost scientific inquiry.

Tendency of out-relief to lower wages.

2427. Would you say that this out-door relief in populous centres may tend, and sometimes does tend, to so far lower wages as to inflict injury upon those who are engaged in the trades or occupations in which the outdoor paupers may be temporarily employed ?—Yes.

Correlation between out-door and in door relief.

2428. It is contended that a strict policy of out-door relief tends to decrease the amount of in-door relief ; what have you to say on that point ?—That is a statement that is made by almost everybody who is advocating strict principles. I myself believe it, and I have actually used it in ordinary administration ; that is to say, I have said to a board of guardians "I think on the face of it you ought to extend your in-door accommodation ; I will write you a letter which will take the whole responsibility from you—at least as much of the responsibility as can be taken from you—and put it on myself, and I will advise you that you need not build, because your present system of restricting out-door relief will gradually tend to empty your workhouse." In that particular case I was right, and the workhouse emptied. The point is one that would not be readily conceded by a person who had not very much experience in Poor Law administration but it is one which might be ascertained as a fact, yes or no, by a very moderate amount of inquiry. It is of importance, because if it be the fact, then it follows as a necessary corollary that the poor who have been refused out-door relief, or who have been offered in-door relief and have refused it, somehow or another become self-supporting and do not come into the workhouse. As an old workhouse master said to me once "Since the guardians have not been giving so much out-door relief, when an old man in the workhouse dies no one comes in to take his place." Somehow or other a new force, a new factor, in the life of the people of that union has been brought to the surface—some hidden charity, some resources of self-reliance, some moral force : at least, that is my opinion. But again I say that the definite fact is one which could be ascertained with no great trouble.

2429. You believe that a strict enforcement of Poor Law relief calls into existence certain moral forces that were either in abeyance or non-existent before, and that those forces overcome to a very remarkable extent the material difficulties which seemed before to surround the applicants for Poor Law relief ?—That is exactly how I should put it.

Suggested inquiry in Unions h ing little relief.

2430. I think you have made the suggestion that the circumstances of the unions which refuse all out-door relief should be investigated by the Commission, but I think you also suggest that there are other factors which should be investigated, the circumstances of the population with regard to savings, etc., being one ?—Yes. What I have said briefly amounts to this : that the unions which restrict relief, not for economy, not for convenience, but with a definite intention of dispauperising the people, are but few, and that the actual effect of that policy, especially on the labouring folk, should be carefully investigated. I have been a witness many times before Commissions and committees investigating these subjects. These inquiries have always amounted to one man's opinion against another man's opinion. In a matter so complex as Poor Law, it seems to me that as one gets older one becomes a little less cock-sure, and it may be that some factors in the problem have been overlooked ; it appears to me time to move the investigation from matters of opinion to matters of fact, and what I submit is that the salient facts are not incapable of an investigation which would show their real bearings with reference to the life of the labouring classes.

Case of G gow pedl pauper.

2431. I have here a statement in connection with the parish of Glasgow, which, I think, rather illustrates what you are contending for. James Burns was a pauper in the Barnhill Poorhouse, and he was allowed to go out, and when he came in there were found, chiefly inside the lining of his jacket, two rolls of brown tobacco (two ounces each), seven one-ounce lengths of small black tobacco, two dozen boxes of matches, two sticks of black sugar, four pieces of shortbread, nine small Abernethy biscuits, half-pound of snaps, four 1-lb. bags of sugar, two ½ lbs. of cough lozenges, two 1d. packets of writing paper, one packet of white pepper, one packet of red pepper, four oranges, two ounces of tea, half-a-dozen old periodicals, two weekly papers, and one gill of rum. A book containing notes of several of these commissions for certain inmates (but not including the rum) and for whom intended, was also found in his possession ?—That is of course an illustration in point.

Reasons f lax out-re

2432. Is there a pressure in many localities upon the Guardians which tends rather to lax administration ?—There are many reasons for lax administration. It is emphatically one of those cases where it is so easy to go wrong and so very difficult to go right. In the first place, the very financial constitution of an English union tends towards outdoor relief, because outdoor relief is charged to the whole union and the representation is parochial. As I said yesterday, the ordinary guardian, when it costs his parish very little, is not going to offend, perhaps, the parson's wife, or the old pauper herself, by saying, "No ; on general grounds, for the good of the community, you ought to come into the workhouse." It is a difficult thing for a man, especially when it does not cost him very much, to apply a stringent remedy which affects an individual whom he knows, for the benefit of the generation that is coming thirty years hence. Then again, among, I was going to say the worst class of guardians, there is the perennial fallacy, as I believe it to be, that outdoor relief is cheaper. Quite away back in the thirties the attention of the Commissioners was called to this by the Assistant Commissioners. Sir Edmund Head writes, "It is most curious to see how the dread of expense in single cases, and insensibility to the fact that numerous and prolonged small outdoor allowances amount to more than the cost of the few and short cases which enter the house, has taken possession of particular boards of guardians." That sort of thing is always present. I should here like to read, if you will allow me, a quotation from a report which I made to the Local Government Board on this very point, in the year 1892.

of a strict administration of out-door relief, is due for the most part either to a confusion of thought or to a want of practical acquaintance with the procedure of an ordinary board of guardians. Strict administration as a settled policy implies a high standard of public duty on the part of the guardians, for it involves an amount of patient labour which can hardly be expected from an average board of unpaid administrators. In the first place, the principles which all experience shows are the only safe guide in the administration of public relief must be mastered, and, what is more difficult, must be constantly borne in mind. It is very easy to make things pleasant all round by the grant of public money; pleasant to the applicant, pleasant to the guardians who advocate the case, and pleasant to the guardians themselves, who, in granting the relief, feel the joy of a benevolence which, though it is vicarious, is none the less genuine after its kind. The hard task is that of the boards who administer relief as conscientious trustees of the public money; who insist that their officers shall give the fullest information with regard to each case; who form a painstaking judgment as to the amount and the kind of relief which is necessary; and, finally, who, in coming to their decision, hold the immediate interest of the individual applicant to be subordinate to the general well-being of the class from which the applicant comes. It is easy to get rid of an application by a small weekly dole; it is a work involving much vigilant care to make certain that in every case where relief is given the relief shall be sufficient for the necessities of the applicant, and shall be given in accordance with sound public policy. To insure this, in the first place, the arrangements of the workhouse, especially those for the sick and infirm, must be beyond reproach; and this implies a constant and kindly supervision by the visiting committee. Next, there must be no slackness on the part of the medical officers or relieving officers. It is a difficult and often an invidious task for a board of guardians to insist that medical officers shall give personal attention to the cases on their list, or that relieving officers shall devote their whole time to the duties of their office, shall personally distribute the weekly relief, and shall not only occasionally visit, but shall constantly watch the necessities of each out-door pauper. Members of a board of guardians might by experience and reflection become convinced that out-door relief tends to lower wages, to damage the position of the independent labourer; and to impede every impulse towards temperance and thrift; but for any board of guardians to adopt a policy of indiscriminately refusing out-door relief would be impossible. The current administration must be improved to the highest point before any general policy of restriction could have any chance of even a temporary success; and as such a policy would be unpopular among certain classes—not, probably, the labouring classes—the guardians must in self-defence take care that there is nothing to be said against their machinery of relief. Then, apart from all question of general policy, as the administration approaches the highest standard, the proportion of out-door relief will diminish, for the simple reason that, not only will the cases who are not destitute be discovered and struck off the lists, but the guardians, as their knowledge of the circumstances of each case increases, will come to realise how impossible it is to adequately relieve a large proportion of them by any grant of out-relief. The typical boards of guardians, who think that systematic in-door relief is a hardship to the poor, do not scruple to give small weekly grants out of the common purse to every applicant whose circumstances are said to be known to any member of the board, and against whose character the relieving officer has nothing very specific to allege. The applicant is, in fact, got rid of by a weekly dole, the amount of which is in most cases ludicrously out of proportion to the plea of absolute destitution which is the alleged cause of the application for relief. Often the value of the relief given would not do much more than pay the rent. In many cases, perhaps the majority, it is painfully evident that either the pauper must starve on the amount of relief given, or that the relieving officer has not sufficiently mastered the facts of the case to enable him to advise the guardians of the exact circumstances and sources of income of the applicant. If any relief at all is given to an applicant, it is the plain duty of the guardians to take precautions to insure that the relief is adequate, and that the pauper is sufficiently fed, clothed, and lodged. This responsibility is discharged in the case of inmates of workhouses, whereas in the case of out-door paupers too much is left to the chance that the relief given will be supplemented by other sources of income. The worst form of this supplementation is when the pauper earns money by his own work, for then it is obvious that he is kept on the labour market, and enabled to do work which would otherwise be done by independent labourers, by means of a subsidy paid out of the poor rates. The best form of it is when the pauper is helped by his relations. But even then the guardians should take the utmost care to ascertain whether he is properly looked after." I can add nothing to that.

Examples of effect of inadequate out-relief.

2434. Those being the influences at work, I assume that the motive power for an improvement or a reform of local poor law administration must come from one of two sets of circumstances—either the ratepayers are alarmed at the increased expenditure and take combined action, or there happen to be on the board one or two individuals of exceptionally strong character, who by resolute personal effort induce the guardians to adopt a stricter method of administration?—It is almost always the case that unions which have a definite policy of dispauperisation are influenced by some one man, or at most by two men. It is so rare to find a man with sufficient moral courage, sufficient knowledge of the subject, and sufficient leisure to undertake a duty of that kind, that as a rule you do not find more than one or two of them in a union.

Causes of restriction of out-relief.

2435. Assuming that there were one or two exceptionally strong people on a board which adopts improved administration, is there any tendency, when those persons cease to be guardians, for the board to go back to the older method and become lax?—Unfortunately there is a very great tendency to that. I have in my mind a union which, only six or seven years ago, used to give under £10 a week for out-door relief, and last week it gave £42. That was a case where the guardians got discouraged and politics intervened. The chairman, who was the strong man, left the board, and the result has been what I say. The Commission are aware that statistics relating to one day are of very little value; but that is a case where an investigation will be extraordinarily useful, as shewing what has been the effect on the labouring classes of this extra relief—whether they are better off, whether they are richer, whether they are more moral, than they were when out-door relief was restricted to almost nothing.

Tendency to relapse into lax out-relief.

2436. It seems to me from the statements you have made to us that if there is to be any general improvement in poor law administration, pressure must come from outside the locality?—That is so. I think something might be done in two ways. Possibly something might be done by some general changes, especially in regard to finance, in order to bring about a better system, at all events to allow the guardians to judge each case on its merits, without any financial arrière pensée or any fear that they were losing money by that system. Then I think a very great deal might be done by changes in what I may call the business aspect of giving the relief. After all, never mind what economic theories you have, you are giving some millions a year in out-door relief, and it seems to me essential that those millions should at all events be expended under the best business conditions available.

Methods of improving administration of out-relief.

2437. I think later on in your evidence you propose to indicate to us where you believe there could be considerable improvements made as regards the giving of out-door relief?—Yes. Of course in all these matters you have external waves of opinion to take into consideration; such a wave of opinion swept over England at the end of the 18th century and resulted in the crash of 1834, and it may be that there is such a wave going over the country now. Dicey, in his last book on law and opinion, speaking of the general socialistic movement, says, "Of a movement which has not yet reached its close, it is impossible to pronounce anything like a final judgment. It may be allowable to conjecture that, if the progress of socialistic legislation is arrested, the check will be due, not so much to the influence of any thinker, as to some patent fact which will command public attention, such as, for instance, that increase in the weight of taxation which is apparently the usual, if not the invariable, concomitant of a socialistic policy." I do not quote that as indicating in any respect an agreement with Mr. Dicey, but as showing the sort of line which a very considerable thinker is following.

Effect of public opinion on poor law policy.

2438. I am afraid the difficulty nowadays is to define what is a socialistic policy, and what is not?—I think we know what he means.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

31 Jan. 1906.

Infrequency of application of workhouse test.

2439. Now we come to the workhouse test, do we not?—Yes. If a man who had read all that has been written about workhouse tests and the hardships of them were to go round and attend the ordinary meetings of boards of guardians, I think he would be very much struck by the fact that he might attend meeting after meeting and never see a test order given. The administration runs on, and the relief is given—well given or badly given according to the general policy of the guardians; but actual test orders, to find out whether a person is destitute or not, are quite uncommon. I have here a return showing the number of workhouse orders which were given in the last quarter in Brighton, which is a large union. The guardians at their meetings gave 106 orders, of which eight were accepted; these were, I suppose, almost all of them test orders given with the express intention of discovering whether the applicant was destitute or not. During the same quarter, the relieving officers gave 902 orders, of which 798 were accepted. That means to say that when the relieving officer gave an order he probably gave it because the applicant wished to come into the workhouse, or because it was necessary that he should come into the workhouse, but when the guardians gave an order it was because they were in doubt whether the man was destitute or not. In the one case eight out of 106 were accepted, and in the other case 798 out of 902 were accepted.

Medical relief arrangements: In London and Country.

2440. Independent of the figures which I understand you have not before you, could you state anything to us as regards medical relief?—Yes. Medical relief was not much considered by the early Commissioners, and it does not bulk very largely either in the accounts or in the reports. There was some question as to whether the Irish dispensary system should be introduced into England some time in the "Seventies," but otherwise medical relief does not really seem to have been a very important part of the administration. Yet, of course, to the poor person it is. I should mention that in London the dispensary system is in force. The ordinary practice in the country is to divide a union into so many districts, and to have a medical officer for each. This medical officer is bound to attend on the permanent paupers, and he is bound to attend on any person for whom he gets an order from the relieving officer or the board of guardians. In London they have dispensaries at which the medical officer attends. That is an essential difference in the administration, which you will no doubt investigate.

2441. Does the medical officer at the dispensary attend anyone who applies?—The medical officer attends any one who applies with an order. Another point on which you will no doubt receive a great deal of evidence, has been the contention that medical relief should be given on loan. Strict poor law administrators have always held that medical relief was in a great many cases the first step to pauperism; and there is no doubt that guardians give orders for the medical officer with more laxity than they give orders for other necessaries, because the medical officer being paid by salary, whether they give an order or not does not affect them financially. With a view of checking that first step to outdoor relief, the Board have had a great many suggestions under consideration as to the questions whether the medical relief could or should be given on loan, and whether it was possible to make arrangements that it should be given on loan. The first difficulty is that, the medical officer being paid by salary, you cannot quite decide what the amount, put into terms of money, should be which ought to be repaid by the recipient of the medical relief. To meet that, we have had a number of suggestions, to which we have to some extent acceded, to the effect that medical officers might be paid in part, at all events, by fee, so that the fee would be a definite sum which could be recovered on loan.

Form of medical Officer's salary a bar to medical relief on loan.

Type of applicants for medical relief.

2442. Have you in your experience noticed whether the applicants for medical relief include any social stratum that would not apply for ordinary poor law relief?—I hardly think so, in the case of outdoor relief; but with regard to indoor relief, that is a different question, which I think we shall have to discuss later on. There is an allegation which probably is well-founded, that where outdoor relief is laxly given, provident benefit clubs, I mean medical clubs, are killed. It is very striking, as the Commission will no doubt hear, how those clubs vary in numbers in different parts of England. In some parts of the country almost all the poor people belong to medical clubs; in the union I was mentioning just now, I believe that practically the whole labouring population did. In some other parts of the country medical clubs are hardly existent. It would be interesting to trace as a matter of fact how far the existence or non-existence of medical clubs depends on the amount of relief given. In parts of Yorkshire, for instance, you never, or at any rate very seldom, have those cases which are so common in the south of England, where a man applies for a confinement order for his wife. Those are cases where very often the man has never received outdoor relief, and he is hardly of a class that does receive outdoor relief. He may be a labourer in regular employment, yet when it comes to paying for the expenses of the birth of his fourth, or fifth, or sixth child he is hard put to it, and he goes to the guardians for it and gets an order which is sometimes on loan, but frequently not on loan. In the North of England you have a great many medical clubs who take those cases at a fixed fee of, say, 10s., and then the guardians do not hear of them. All that is a matter that I am sure you will get a great deal of information upon from my colleagues, if you ask them.

Effect of out-relief on medical clubs.

2443. Now I think we come to the suggestions which you have to make in connection with the relief of able-bodied men; will you take those in whatever order is most convenient?—Outdoor relief to able-bodied men is in only a few unions chronic. Under the regulation order, or under the prohibitory order where the guardians have an outdoor labour test order attached, the guardians may give outdoor relief to able-bodied men under what is known as the stone yard system, that is to say, the men are given a certain number of days' work in the stone yard in lieu of being taken into the workhouse. Where the relief is given to those men as a constant part of the administration, I think you will find that there is something wrong with the administration of the union. I do not think it was contemplated by anybody that outdoor relief in a stone yard, which must of necessity be a very demoralising form of relief, should be chronic, that is to say, that it should be an ordinary part of the administration of the union. I think what was intended was that it should be a useful or, it may be, a necessary adjunct to the workhouse in times of distress, in times of strikes, or in times of lock-outs. The Board have done, and are doing, all they can to minimise the demoralising effects of the stone yard by endeavouring, to the best of their power, to insist on the regulations which seem in their judgment to be necessary. The first of those regulations (or principles, as I prefer to call them), is that where a man is relieved in a stone yard it shall be relief and not wages, that is to say, that a man shall be relieved up to the necessities of himself and his family, and his work shall not be treated as labour to be remunerated by wages, but shall be given as a test of his destitution. There are several points of difficulty with reference to these tests. In the first place, guardians try, as far as they can, to make money by the labour. That always appears to me to be a very fatal thing to do. If they try to make money, in the long run they will lose more money than if they had not tried to make it. In the next place, the work which is done when they try to make money is nearly always skilled labour, such as stone-breaking, or something of that kind. Another trouble is that boards of guardians continually try to get back to the payment of wages rather than to confine themselves to the giving of relief, with the result that a man who is a good stone-breaker, or a hard worker, sometimes earns in the labour yard money which is perhaps above what he would earn outside. I have no doubt alleged instances will be given to you where men have given up their ordinary labour and taken their place in the stone yard. I myself have known men who have been six or seven years in the stone yard. Then there is the last condition of difficulty. The order says that the man shall be kept on work during the time he is being relieved, which would mean he ought to be kept on work for six days a week. Now, do what we can—and we have written some very forcible letters on the subject recently—we have the utmost difficulty in preventing boards of guardians giving a man one, or two, or three days a week work in the yard. The guardians feel very strongly about that. They say it is very hard luck that a man should be kept on work for six days for the pittance they give him. They say that he ought to be able to go out and look for work himself. In my judgment the work that a man does in a stone yard is of very small importance in comparison with the number of days which he is kept off the streets and off the labour market. In times of distress there is no work outside except casual work, and if the man is receiving relief and allowed to loaf about the streets, he takes that casual work from the independent labourer. In times of real distress it is a very bad thing to allow under-paid men to loaf about the streets. They are certain to get into mischief, like they did in 1879 in the time of the cotton strike, and like they have done in South Wales several times in my experience. They begin to riot. So if you have a stone yard system at all—supposing the Commission should make any recommendations with respect to it—I would suggest that a man should always get five and preferably six days' labour as a test in return for his relief. That is a point which is, I think, of vital importance. If we have that, it is undoubted that a stone yard will be a very useful adjunct in certain times of distress; but if we have not got that, then a stone yard becomes wholly mischievous. I remember the case of a strike in the cotton trade a good many years ago; the guardians of the particular union that I was looking after then were at their wits' end to know what to do with the able-bodied men. There was a great difficulty in finding them work of any sort, and a great difficulty in administering the labour yard. It was suggested that, instead of the ordinary test, the men should come and sit in the dining hall of the workhouse for a certain number of hours a day. It was treated as a joke on the first day, but on the second day they began to drop off, and at the end of a week we had found out the most effective labour test that I have ever seen. That was in the town of Blackburn a good many years ago, but I forget the exact date. I should add this also from my experience, which used to be considerable, that if you give 100 men, even in times of distress, orders for the workhouse, not ten will take them, but if, in times of distress, you give 100 men orders for the stone yard you will find ninety will take them. The stone yard is not, and never can be, a test in the same way as the workhouse is a test.

Labour yards.

Regulations for labour yards and their evasion.

2444. Your next point I think refers to women in distress, especially in the textile trade districts?—That is a point of no very great importance, but still you must remember that in times of strike and distress in the textile industries you have a great number of able-bodied women on your hands. It is very difficult to find any work for them, and yet they too ought to be taken off the streets if possible. That only affects a very small part of England but I myself have found great practical difficulty in dealing with it on more than one occasion. I would refer you to a report I wrote so long ago as the year 1877 with regard to a strike at Bolton in Lancashire, which is quoted in Sir William Chance's book, and which was published in the Board's annual Report of that date. There the difficulty was rather acute. It was a strike where about 1,800 men struck, and by their strike 12,500 people, including 5,000 women, were thrown out of employment.

iculty of lying ur test ble- ied en.

ort on on strike, .

2445. I suppose a considerable proportion of those women were at work in the same trades as the strikers?—They were turned out of work because some of the mill hands who worked the machinery struck, and therefore there was no work for them. Of course they claimed everybody's sympathy, and as the strike went on they became really distressed, but there was a great difficulty in finding labour tests for them. We did not want a labour test, but what we wanted to do was to keep them from wandering about the streets. That is, I should think, a matter almost beyond remedy, but I just mention it.

2446. But I take it that it is a difficulty which may arise anywhere in England where a considerable number of women are employed in factories?—It is a difficulty, and it is a difficulty that ought to be considered as part of the whole question of this relief to able-bodied men and women by means of a labour test.

e relief.

2447. Now I think we come to your next sub-head, namely, strikes and lock-outs?—That is a point on which I understand you will get much more precise evidence than I can give you from my colleague, Mr. Bircham, who is the inspector for South Wales, and who will describe to you the legal effects of the famous Merthyr Tydvil Judgment. At the same time, it has been my lot to see a very great deal of strike relief. I have always been struck by the great danger which seemed to me to exist of the administration, that is, of boards of guardians, being captured by the trade unions who are on strike, or by the masters' associations perhaps, and then the relief being used as a weapon by one party against the other. Supposing, for instance, you have a board of guardians, as you have had, who are altogether labour men, and a strike comes along, then you have nothing between the relief of the strikers at the cost of the rates (in other words, fighting the masters with the masters' own money), but the good sense of the guardians, and their shrinking from doing an unfair thing, and the orders of the Local Government Board. I am not going to minimise the first check at all. I have seen cases where trade unions might very well have utilised the funds of the guardians to fight the masters, and have refrained from doing so, or have refrained from pushing their advantage home. I trust a good deal to the fair mindedness of my fellow-countrymen, but men's blood gets up, especially in an industrial fight—it is very difficult even for the bystander to avoid taking sides—and the point is one that well deserves consideration. The orders of the Board, which form the second line of defence, are no doubt invaluable. They are invaluable to the guardians themselves as keeping them up to the mark, and they are of great help to the guardians in resisting the pressure of the men and the little rioting that goes on. But if a board of guardians want to set those orders aside, they can do it. The audit is not coming along for some months, and it is very easy indeed to say, Let it appear that the applicant for relief has got a sick child, and he then can be relieved. It is very easy to relax the stone yard regulations, so that there are practically no stone yard regulations whatever. Therefore the problem is this: Under the existing law there are only between us and a possible great abuse these two things—the fair-mindedness of the guardians and the orders of the Local Government Board—one of which is a quality which I do not under-value, but which has its limits; and the other of which, as a means of repression of an unwilling board of guardians, is illusory.

Ineffectiveness of labour yard regulations.

2448. Disfranchisement would be a check on applications for relief in ordinary times; may we assume that it would not be much of a check during the excitement of a strike?—I think it would, and I would suggest to the Commission that that is just where the subject should receive their careful attention. The disfranchisement of the recipient of relief is a most important point. However, it does not follow that because a man is disfranchised for the receipt of relief he will lose his vote. The election may not come along very soon, and then there will be a new register. However, you have to consider the probabilities of those conditions being changed. That of course is politics and altogether above my head; but still my experience is that even under existing conditions the dislike of disfranchisement, which hardly affects the ordinary pauper—if it did, he would not care about it—in the case of the high-class working man who is on strike has a very great deterrent effect.

Disfranchisement as a deterrent to relief.

2449. Now we will pass on to your proposals for a stricter administration?—Among general proposals which would have the effect of promoting a stricter administration of Poor Law relief you have the question of areas. It has often been suggested that if the area for in-door relief were extended and the area for out-door relief remained what it is now, or were restricted, you would enable the guardians to consider whether they should give in-door relief or out-door relief without any financial bias, or perhaps with a financial bias in favour of what the proposers of such schemes would hold to be a better system of administration, namely, a more in-door relief system of administration. In the Bill of 1888 I think it was originally suggested that that grant which was afterwards given to the Local Authorities in the form of a fixed sum based on the cost of the officers, should be given by a payment of so many pence per head of in-door paupers. There was a great opposition to it, and it was withdrawn. I remember at that time in some West of England constituencies, which I knew, it was put about among the electors that "Unionist" meant a man who was in favour of forcing all the poor people into the union. Any way, that proposal was withdrawn. In London the proposal was carried out more or less, and in London for every in-door pauper the guardians get 5d. a day from the Metropolitan Poor Fund and 4d. from the Exchequer grant, so that practically the entire cost of the maintenance of the London in-door pauper is thrown upon the whole metropolis. The exact reverse of that happens in the country, where the pauper is a parish pauper, in the sense that his guardian sits for the parish in which he lives, but the relief is paid not from the parish, but from the union. The tendency in the country is rather on the part of the administrators to give out-door relief, because it is for the benefit of their own clients at the cost of the union. The tendency in London would be supposed to be to give in-door relief entirely, because it is paid for out of two funds raised by a large area, in the one case national and in the other case metropolitan. I do not know London, and therefore I cannot say with any certainty or with any force what the actual results have been in London; but I would call your attention to a statement by Sir Henry Longley, who was an authority on that and other matters of Poor Law administration of the very first rank, to the effect that when he attended London Boards of Guardians he was struck by the fact that he heard exactly the same arguments in London (that out-door relief was cheaper) as he had heard in the country. He also said—but, mark you, this was before the Act of 1888—that he did not believe that the extension of area for in-door relief had had any effect. Whether the present inspector for London would agree with that, I do not know; but it would appear to me that in all probability the additional grant of 1888, and the fact that the guardians now are more alive to where the money comes from than they probably were in Sir Henry Longley's time, have led to people getting in-door relief in London who have not got it elsewhere. The facts in London show that the proportion of in-door relief given in London is much larger than the proportion of in-door relief given in the country. In connection with that, I would refer again to the subject of the out-door relief unions. There was a definite proposal made for an alteration in the area, and one of the two reasons for that proposal was that it would tend to increase the proportion of in-door relief which is given by the guardians. The proposal was not made solely on that ground, nor indeed was the origin of the proposal other than a desire to find some solution of the difficulty in the case of unions which overlap in some areas. The change was supported by very experienced officials on the ground that it would tend to a stricter administration. It would be a very curious and not a very difficult investigation to find out what had been the precise effect of the change on the twelve or fourteen out-door relief unions which now exist. I do not know them very well, but not long ago I attended a meeting of some four or five of them, and I did not see that there was any difference between their procedure and the procedure of an ordinary board. Statistics would tell us whether there had been any marked change in the direction of giving more in-door relief than had been given before.

Incidence of cost of relief in London and in country.

2450. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Before you leave this part of the question, may I ask you to make this point clear. As to the incidence of the cost of in-door and out-door relief, I think you intend to convey that outside London both in-door and out-door relief are a union charge, and in no sense a parochial charge?—They are altogether a union charge.

2451. Whereas in London there is a different arrangement in consequence of the operation of the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund?—Yes. In the country there is a tendency towards out-door relief, because the individual guardian knows the relief is not paid for by the parish, but is paid for by the whole union.

2452. But that is not a financial reason, is it?—It is a sort of domestic reason.

2453. (Chairman.) And the domestic consideration outruns the financial consideration?—Yes.

2454. (Mr. Nunn.) Is there nothing analogous to the Metropolitan Poor Fund in the large provincial cities?—Nothing.

Mr. Pell's out-relief proposals.

2455. (Chairman.) Now, I think, we come to certain specific proposals made by Mr. Pell in 1876 for the practical improvement of the business part of out-door relief?—In 1876—which was a period in which interest in Poor Law questions had very much revived, when Mr. Goschen's circular was still affecting people's minds, and when the Poor Law conferences were beginning to make their influence felt—the Central Poor Law Conference sent a deputation to Mr. Sclater-Booth, who was then President of the Local Government Board, and made to him, through Mr. Pell, certain definite proposals for reforming the current administration of the poor law. The proposals made were answered by the Local Government Board. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A). No. V. (26).) Some of those reforms are still much in the minds of the Poor Law Conference and other persons interested; and I think it would be worth while, as they represent the only definite proposals in that direction which have been made to the Local Government Board by a body of the importance of the central Poor Law Conference, to go through them. The first was, "That, in order to give better effect to the principle of the poor law, boards of guardians be empowered to frame bye-laws, which, when duly approved by the Local Government Board, should have the force of orders until revoked by authority." That proposal was based rather on the experience of Manchester and some other unions which adopted a code of rules or regulations, such as, for instance, that no out-door relief should be given to the wives of convicted persons, or that no out-door relief should be given for a longer period than six weeks, and so on. What the conference had in their minds was that in order to give those regulations (which, as somebody put it in those days, stereotyped the better mind of the guardians) some permanence, they should be made permanent bye-laws, or standing orders which should affect the administration of boards of guardians precisely as the general orders of the Local Government Board do. The conference made a mistake in using the term "bye-laws" because a bye-law connotes—I remember the discussion at the time—a penalty. This was not a matter of bye-laws; it was a matter of regulation or standing orders. The board objected that if such powers were granted they would "inevitably tend to introduce variety and exceptional practices in the administration of relief, and in this manner would prevent the attainment of that uniformity which it was the object of the Poor Law Amendment Act to establish." I suppose I ought not to criticise these somewhat antiquated opinions of the board, but in my judgment that answer is rather weak. I think it would be a good thing to encourage certain experiments in relief. That would enable the board by-and-by to decide what was the better course. The effect of such standing orders would be, no doubt, that the better would be taken and the worse left; and the better would be given the form of an Order applying to the whole country. However, so it was, the board never assented to that proposal, and I do not think that proposal has been revived—certainly not in recent years.

Mr. Pell's suggested "bye-laws" as to out-relief.

2456. As I understand, the proposal was that where a board of guardians passed certain orders or certain recommendations, which were approved by the Local Government Board, the board of guardians should not have the power of rescinding them except with the assent of the Local Government Board?—That is so. I have here a great many rules of administration which have been adopted of recent years by a very large number of Guardians on their own initiative. They carry no real binding force, and the guardians are very apt to make exceptions to them; but where a board of guardians enforce them, they do a very great deal of good. I think in the Board's report of two years ago you will find yet another code which was drawn up by my colleagues, Mr. Preston-Thomas and Mr. Fleming, for the use of guardians in their districts. You will find a number of other codes in "Knight's Guardians' Guide," which is a most useful little book that was published in 1899, prefaced by this quotation from Carlyle, "The poor law is a protection of the thrifty labourer against the thriftless and dissolute."

2457. Before you leave this part of the subject, did any boards of guardians object to this proposal on the ground that it would rather tie their hands thereafter?—No, because it was not proposed that it should be forced on boards of guardians. It was only proposed that where a board of guardians passed a resolution that they would adopt rules, then those rules could be made an order compulsory on them.

2458. And they would not have the power of rescinding them?—Except by the direction of the Local Government Board.

2459. That point was not objected to by the boards of guardians, was it? — I think not. But the president refused to allow it to be done.

2460. (Sir Samuel Provis.) There was no general representation in favour of it, was there?—There was no general recommendation of it.

nchester -relief s.

2461. (Chairman.) Perhaps you would give us an instance where rules of administration were adopted, and tell us what those rules were?—I have here the Manchester rules. I choose those because they were more rigidly adhered to in Manchester than in any union within my knowledge. The first rule is "Out-door relief shall not be granted except in cases of sickness to (a) able-bodied men with families residing in furnished lodgings; (b) men of improvident, drunken, or immoral habits." The other rules are, "(2) All orders to able-bodied men for relief in the labour yard shall be given for periods not exceeding four weeks, and each application for renewal shall be treated as a new application. (3) Out-relief in the labour yard shall not be granted unless the relieving officer has, since the application, visited the home of the applicant, and has recorded the date of such visit in the relief application and report book; cases in which the relieving officer has not had time to visit shall be relieved by him in kind only, or by an order for the workhouse. (4) The relieving officer shall be required to make at least fortnightly visits to the homes of all the able-bodied men receiving relief in the labour yard. (5) The hours of labour in the labour yard shall be, during the winter months, from 8.30 o'clock a.m. to 4.30 o'clock p.m., with an interval of one hour for dinner, and from 8.30 a.m. to 12 noon on Saturday; and reasonable facilities shall be given, at the discretion of the guardians, to enable the men to seek for work, but the period of leave of absence shall not, except for special reasons, exceed half a day in any one week. (6) The scale of out-relief to able-bodied men and their families shall be as follows, namely: —for a man and his wife 4s. per week; for each child under sixteen, 1s. per week. (7) All able-bodied inmates of the workhouse, shall be kept at test work in their own wards during the whole of the hours of labour. In addition to personal inquiries made as to the circumstances of each applicant for relief, the relieving officer obtains, when practicable, a certificate from the medical officer as to the nature of the illness of every person applying for aid from the rates, on the ground of sickness, and a report as to whether the case is a proper one for admission into the workhouse infirmary. In cases of application for relief on the ground of want of work, an 'earnings' note is sent to the last employer of the applicant, and any of the children who are, or have been at work, inquiring whether the person named in such note is still employed there, the average wages; if left, the cause of leaving, and general character. All replies pass through the hands of the superintendent of the relief department, and are by him forwarded to the respective relieving officers. Where an application is made in consequence of sons refusing to support their parents, a notice is sent to each son, whose address is known, directing his attendance at the township offices, to afford him an opportunity of explaining the reason of his alleged neglect. A similar method is adopted in regard to husbands whose wives apply for relief in consequence of their alleged neglect. Those are very good illustrations of the nature of those proposals. You will notice that they nearly all deal with the case of able-bodied men, and that they will be wholly inapplicable to the ordinary country union. The ordinary country union, which made regulations for similar purposes, would require very different regulations; but for Manchester those rules were excellent, and had the most extraordinary effect on the administration of the union. I myself saw the out-door relief of Manchester fall from over 3,000 to just a little over 600, being accompanied at the same time with a rise in the in-door relief, which was absolutely inappreciable—being only 100 or 200. I was in Manchester at the time, and I should have heard of any case of hardship if there had been any; but I heard of none. Those rules were enforced in the most rigid way, and it is worth while explaining to the Commission how they were enforced. The Manchester Board of Guardians held a relief committee every day; the relief committee consisting of one guardian. Of course there was the usual academic and rather pedantic discussion as to whether a committee could be one man; however, there was one man.

les in- plicable to ntry ions.

ll in nchester t-relief.

e-man ief mmittees.

2462. Was it the same man each day?—No; the guardians took it in turns. One of them sat at 9 o clock, on his way down to business usually. The guardian sat here, the relieving officer there, and near the guardian was the relief clerk. The guardian made his order. If it contravened the regulations the relief clerk said "That is in contravention of standing order so and so." The guardian might say, "Well, I do not care if it is, circumstances justify me." Nothing more was said, and the order was made. When the order came up for confirmation at the full board, the relief clerk reported that Mr. So and So had made an order in the case of such and such a pauper in contravention of regulation so and so. The chairman asked for an explanation, and the guardian who had made the exceptional order had to defend his decision. Sometimes he was supported, sometimes he was over-ridden; but all the circumstances were gone through over again. That resulted, according to my judgment—and I can speak much more freely about matters of a great many years ago than I can of matters happening now—in absolutely the fairest administration of out-door relief that I ever saw. It was absolutely uniform. Every poor person in the city knew exactly what he was going to get in certain circumstances, and there was no speculative application for relief.

Procedure for out-relief in Manchester.

2463. (Mr. Nunn.) Was the guardian's decision often reversed?—Yes, pretty often.

2464. I suppose the applicant got to know of that?—I suppose he would.

2465. That did not have any bad effect, did it?—Not that I knew.

2466. (Chairman.) Was it not the other way about, not that it was brought to the knowledge of the applicant, but that the guardian was put on his defence before his brother guardians?—He was put on his defence before them, and so he got to know the feeling of the board of guardians.

2467. (Mr. Nunn.) Was the applicant present when the relief clerk told the guardian who made the decision that it was in contravention of the regulations?—I do not say the relief clerk told the guardian in the presence of the pauper. The pauper went out, and, so far as he was concerned, the order was over before the relief clerk spoke.

2468. (Mr. Booth.) Was the clerk a clerk of rather a special character with high pay?—He was a man of very special character. He was an extraordinarily good public servant.

2469. He seems to have been almost a legal assessor in the matter?—He was absolutely impartial.

2470. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Had the applicant an appeal to the justices at that time?—No. There is no appeal in England to the justices on matters of relief; we do not have that in this country.

Power of Justices as to relief.

2471. I thought it existed at one time?—I do not think so.

2472. (Mr. Bentham.) Is it not the fact that the system has practically broken down in Manchester?—I was told when I was there the other day that the number on out-door relief was now 1,625.

Reasons for failure of Manchester system.

2473. Although those regulations still stand, they are not adhered to?—I am told that those regulations still stand, and that they are not strictly adhered to—that is another very significant fact.

2474. (Mr. Lock.) What is the result?—The result is that the out-door pauperism has about trebled.

2475. (Mr. Nunn.) Are we to understand that the system has broken down and out-door pauperism has increased because these individual guardians, although they still sit, do not adhere to the regulations?—That is what is stated to me.

2476. (Mr. Booth.) When did the change occur; when did the adherence to the regulations cease?—If you will allow me, I will warn Mr. Jeaner-Fust, who is the inspector of that district and who is coming here to give evidence, to be prepared with the facts. I should like to add this one thing, that naturally, under the Manchester regulations, all the permanent cases came before each member of the board of guardians in turn. There was a different man sitting every day, and as a permanent case came up again and again in ordinary rotation each member of the board in the end had it under consideration. They each knew all the cases, and had each taken the responsibility for them. I have no doubt that the supporters of Mr. Pell's proposal will say to you that if you had only made those regulations standing orders, which were not revocable at the option of the guardians, they would have been in existence in many places, and would have rescued hundreds of people from the status of pauperism and put them into the free labour market again.

Grandson's liability to maintain grand-father.

2477. (Chairman.) Now will you deal with the next proposal urged by the deputation to Mr. Selater Booth ?—The second point was, "That the liability for the maintenance of a pauper be extended to the grandsons of the pauper." As to that, the President saw no objection to the proposal, and said that if a suitable opportunity occurred he would be willing to introduce a Bill to give effect to it.

Extension of Guardians' power to recover relief.

2478. What have you to say about the third proposal ?—The third proposal was, "That all relief be recoverable at the discretion of the guardians within a certain limit of time after the stopping of the relief," instead of the recovery being limited to relief expressly given on loan as it is generally supposed to be. That is a small point, but it has never been attended to. Of course, reasonably speaking, whenever a man gets money he ought to repay any relief he may have received.

Recovery of Medical relief on loan.

2479. I think the fourth point dealt with the money value of medical relief ?—Yes. The fourth proposal was, "That a money value should be put on all medical relief in order that it may be recoverable." That was to meet the difficulty about giving the medical relief on loan. That has not been done, but the board in certain cases have allowed guardians to pay their medical officers partly by fee.

Declaration that relief is on loan.

2480. (Mr. Nunn.) Is it not the case that, in order to be able to recover relief by loan, the applicant must understand that he is receiving the relief under those conditions ?—I believe that is a moot point. I myself have always been of opinion that you could recover all relief, but I believe I am wrong.

2481. (Sir Samuel Provis.) It must be declared to be given on loan at the time, must it not ?—Yes, so it is held.

Case of refusal of relief on loan

2482. (Mr. Nunn.) Supposing the man does not accept it, then he could set the law at defiance if he is really destitute, because, if destitute, he must be relieved and he need not accept the relief on loan ?—That is so, and of course that is the difficulty. A question which no doubt will be put to me by-and-by is, What is to be done with a pauper who will not accept an order for the workhouse, and who will not accept a loan of necessities in order to be relieved. It is the same difficulty in another form.

2483. (Mr. Booth.) If a board of guardians attempt to collect the loan, will they have to go before a magistrate ?—They will have to go before a county court judge, because it is a civil debt.

2484. Would not the county court judge insist upon proof that the loan was accepted by the pauper at the time ?—I believe that county court judges have different views on the matter.

Power to compulsorily remove paupers to workhouse.

2485. (Chairman.) Now will you go to the next recommendation ?—The next, the fifth recommendation, was, "That power should be given to the justices in petty sessions, on the certificate of the medical officer of the district, to order the removal of an applicant, who is without lodging or accommodation, to the workhouse of the union." The President thought that some such power as that contemplated might be beneficial in the case of 'sick and infirm paupers or applicants for relief, who are without proper lodging or accommodation, and who refuse to go into the workhouse,' but he was not prepared to go further than this."

2486. (Dr. Downes.) I think he also said that he would be prepared to give the proposal further attention, whenever an opportunity occurred for dealing with the amendment of the law ?—Yes, he said he would give the proposal further consideration. That is a proposal of which we are going to hear a great deal more. Cases occasionally come before every board of guardians where a person is living in conditions which are impossibly bad, and where the person himself is more or less crazy or suffering from senile decay, and yet obstinately refuses to go into the workhouse. The question is, how far you should be empowered to compel him to go into the workhouse. The question will come up—and it will probably come before the House of Commons—with regard to a certain number of vagrants who wander about to their own hurt. We have evidence from London police magistrates of the pitiable nature of the cases of old folk, who ought to be in an infirmary and properly looked after, but insist on wandering about. Nothing keeps them quiet; they are charged with some vagrant offence, and the magistrate says, "I will let you off if you will go into the workhouse." He sends an officer to the door of the workhouse with them, and then they refuse to enter, and wander off again, only to be brought back in a wretched condition two or three days later. The purely voluntary nature of the entry into an English workhouse is an important principle, and no doubt some questions will be put to me with reference to it when we come to deal with the subject of the ins-and-outs; but I am not sure that Sir Henry Longley has not hit the main point when he suggests that, as in the city of New York, the application for relief might be made a constructive self-commitment for a certain period; that the acceptance of in-door relief, or of relief of any sort in the cases that we are now referring to, should be on the condition that the guardians shall be empowered to get an order to remove the person to the workhouse; and that when that person has actually entered the workhouse the provisions of the Pauper Inmates' Discharge and Regulation Act, 1871, shall be extended so as to cover such a case. It is one of those difficult questions where the cases affected are not very many, but when you have seen one of those cases you have a very strong conviction that something ought to be done, and the danger is, lest, in desiring to do something for that one particular case, you should injure the whole administration. I cannot help thinking, however, that the point is one which might be solved on the lines indicated by Sir Henry Longley.

System of relief in New York : "Constructive self-commitment."

2487. (Mr. Nunn.) He does not say how we are going to get them into the workhouse though ?—That can be done by a magistrate's order.

2488. (The O'Conor Don.) How are you to keep them when you get them there ?—The suggestion is, that in those cases it would be held to be a self-commitment to the workhouse for three months, or for whatever time might be fixed.

2489. (Mr. Nunn.) That would require fresh legislation, would it not ?—Yes. The whole subject bristles with difficulty, and I think it will have to be considered first with respect to the case of the vagrants.

Detention in workhouse of infectious cases

2490. Has not a master of a workhouse the right to detain a person who is without any visible means of subsistence and has not got any home of his own ?—No. The only right he has to detain anyone is under the Act which says that you must not ask for your discharge to the danger of yourself or others. That is meant to cover the case of infectious disease.

2491. (Mr. Loch.) And the medical officer of health certifies there ?—Yes; but that does not cover other cases of disease which are also a source of danger to others.

2492. (Dr. Downes.) In fact, the power was restricted by the Lunacy Act, 1890, I think ?—That was so.

2493. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Some words were struck out in the old Act; that is how it was done, was it not ?—Yes.

Restriction of period of out-relief.

2494. (Chairman.) Now will you deal with the sixth suggestion ?—That was a proposal "That no out-relief should be given for a longer period than thirteen weeks without fresh application." The President entirely approved of the suggestion, but nothing has been done. I should certainly say that no out-door relief ought to be given for longer than a month; but that is a matter of opinion, and I will come to that again later.

Miscellaneous proposals by Mr. Pell.

2495. Was there not another suggestion ?—Yes, there was a suggestion that boards of guardians should be empowered to subscribe to the publication of the reports of the conferences, which, I think, was the one suggestion which was carried out. There were a certain number of other suggestions made with regard to more or less minute points in the provisions of the relief orders. I may say that I have here a printed copy of the letter which the Local Government Board wrote to Mr. Pell, giving the reasons for assenting to or dissenting from these proposals.

2496. (Sir Samuel Provis.) What was the date of that letter?—It is dated May 12th, 1877, and it is signed by Sir John Lambert. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (26).) I have also a memorandum by the then President, Mr. Sclater Booth, relating to the administration of out-door relief, which I will deal with later.

2497. (Chairman.) Was that memorandum issued at the same time?—It was issued afterwards. Among the other suggestions which the deputation made, the most important was that the regulation order should be withdrawn, and that the out-door relief prohibitory order should be made universal. There are several points that could be made about that, but the Board did not favour it, and the question is still to be answered whether those relief orders are really adequate to the present wants or whether there should not be some change in the form of a new order. The matter was dealt with by Sir Henry Longley, who suggested the issue of a new order which should practically combine the provisions of the three orders.

2498. What post did Sir Henry Longley hold then?—He was inspector in London, and I am referring to a report of his which was published in the third annual report of the Local Government Board.

2499. Was any action taken on Sir Henry Longley's suggestion?—No; the Board objected to making the prohibitory order universal, partly on the ground—and the very sound ground too—that if the prohibitory order were made universal, there would be continual applications to suspend it in times of distress. Sir John Lambert says in his letter, "The President has the less hesitation in adhering to the policy which the Board have hitherto pursued in this respect, as he finds that both in the Metropolis and in some of the unions in the manufacturing districts, such, for instance, as Manchester, the administration of relief is ordinarily conducted upon principles quite as stringent as those laid down in the order in question, and in a manner which would serve as an example for many of those unions in which the order has long been in force." That is a point which I dealt with in my evidence yesterday, when I gave reasons why, as a matter of fact, the prohibitory order unions were not as strictly administered on paper as the regulation order unions. With regard to Sir Henry Longley's suggestion, I think I should like to put in this very significant quotation from his report on Metropolitan Pauperism. "Inasmuch as at the instigation of the Board individual boards of guardians, aided by the expression of public opinion, have voluntarily made substantial progress, by the abandonment of the out-door labour test, towards a formal and decided advance in Poor Law administration, it is for the Board, in the exercise of its exclusive and most important function, not only to embody and to realise for general dissemination the scattered results of individual experience, and to constitute the successful efforts of one board of guardians the standard and measure of the practice of their neighbours, but, further, to register and to give permanence to the progress which has been already made, and to secure it, as a step towards a further advance against the fluctuations of opinion and of constitution incident to local bodies, by means of an Order which shall nevertheless have been suggested by their independent action. This no board of guardians, however firmly they may adhere to sound principles, can do for themselves; they are unable to impose a binding rule of practice upon themselves, much less upon their successors, and I cannot but think that the intervention of the Board in such a case is aptly characterised in the pregnant remark recently made in my hearing at a Poor Law conference by an active guardian, 'We look to the Local Government Board to save us from ourselves'." However, that point of view never has, up till now, commended itself to the Local Government Board, and the orders have not been changed. In the letter of Sir John Lambert's which I have handed in, will be found the explanation why the Board refused their assent to a change in the prohibitory order, which was that relief in sudden and urgent cases should not be granted for more than a month at a time, the reason being briefly the danger of interfering with sick relief. Then there was a small proposal that the Guardians should not be allowed to pay part of the cost of a funeral, but only the whole cost.

2500. As I understand, these proposals were not accepted by the Local Government Board, and, therefore, as they were not accepted, and the reasons for their non-acceptance are to be found in the document which you have handed in, we might perhaps leave this part of the subject?—I think so. I have dealt with the big questions; the rest of the proposals related to small matters of administration.

Limitation of number of cases dealt with by relieving officers.

2501. Having now concluded your evidence on the suggestions made by Mr. Pell, we will go to the next branch of the subject. I understand there are various ideas you have in connection with the improvement in the transaction of the business of relieving officers?—Perhaps the most important of the suggestions made for what I may call the introduction of better business principles into the administration of relief, are those which relate to the relieving officers. The fact is that you will find, as between one union and another, a great want of uniformity in the number of cases which are looked after by the various relieving officers. It is held to be of the first importance that the number of cases assigned to each relieving officer should not be too large to enable him to exercise an efficient supervision over them. This point of view has become more especially important since the better class of poor law administrators have adopted the view that, after the guardians have reduced a man from an independent labourer to the status of pauperism by a judgment which is quasi-judicial, they are bound to see that he is properly fed, properly lodged, and properly clothed, and they can only discharge that responsibility through the action of the relieving officers. The Board have adopted that view, and we do, as a matter of practice, put pressure upon boards of guardians to appoint additional relieving officers where they seem to us to be necessary. We have quite recently brought the full weight of our influence to bear on certain boards of guardians with this end, and quite successfully. Another way of increasing the efficiency of the relieving officers' work is one which is adopted in a good many large towns, which is, to appoint additional relieving officers under the name of cross visitors or superintendents, whose duty it is to discharge all those duties of a relieving officer which interfere with his current work (as, for instance, the removal of lunatics to asylums, which is a duty imposed by statute on the relieving officer) and also to assist the guardians by making special visits to the homes of paupers in all doubtful cases.

Cross visitors.

2502. Have you had any difficulty in inducing boards of guardians to take up these extra or special points?—We have had some difficulty, but in certain cases we have insisted, and the thing has been done. I am prepared to say that we should always insist in cases where there is no doubt about the facts.

2503. You may insist, but have you any legal power of enforcing your wish?—Yes. We can get a mandamus against a board of guardians and compel them to appoint a relieving officer; and, as we have the power, we have also the responsibility.

Salaries of relieving officers and cross visitors.

2504. (The O'Conor Don.) What is the usual salary of a relieving officer?—The salaries vary from £90 to £200, and perhaps a good deal more than that in the case of superintendent relieving officers in big towns.

2505. How are the cross visitors paid?—They are appointed as assistant relieving officers as a rule and they get from £150 to £250 or £300. Some of those officers are very skilful men.

2506. Then they are paid more than the relieving officers?—They should be.

2507. Is £90 about the lowest salary paid to a relieving officer?—I think it is. It must be remembered that the relieving officer very often has other small offices. I merely mentioned those sums roughly as showing you the class of man who is appointed.

Cross visitors as assistant relieving officers.

2508. (Mr. Booth.) The cross visitors are called assistants, are they not?—The cross visitors (or superintendent relieving officers) are usually appointed as assistant relieving officers, 2509. But they are superior to the relieving officer?—Yes, they are.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

30 Jan. 1906.

Assistant relieving officers.

2510. (The O'Conor Don.) Have the relieving officers anything to do with sanitary matters?—No, nothing. The days have long since gone by when the relieving officer was also sanitary inspector.

2511. (Mr. Nunn.) Does not an assistant relieving officer derive his authority from the relieving officer for any acts that he performs?—No, he would have direct instructions from the guardians.

2512. That is, the assistant relieving officer would?—Yes; and he would not have a district.

2513. I was thinking of his being governed by his denomination of "assistant relieving officer," which seems to imply that he has a superior officer?—His duties are to assist in the relief work.

2514. (Sir Samuel Provis.) He is appointed to discharge certain specified duties, is he not?—That is so. He would, for instance, be appointed assistant for the removal of lunatics, or to visit any cases as directed by the guardians in any of the relieving officer's districts. He would have no district, and he would be appointed generally to superintend the relief.

2515. (Mr. Bentham.) Now you are speaking of a superintendent relieving officer and not of a cross visitor, are you not?—Sometimes you have a cross visitor who is also a superintendent relieving officer, and sometimes you have a cross visitor who is not.

2516. It is as well to keep the position of the relieving officer and cross visitor separate, is it not?—Yes. There are various officers who all tend to relieve the current work of the relieving officer, and therefore give him more time to attend to his proper duties. There is, for instance, the pay clerk, whose duty it is to pay the outdoor paupers.

Recourse to mandamus by Local Government Board.

2517. (Chairman.) Have the Local Government Board ever been compelled to have recourse to mandamus, in order to enforce their views on the guardians and compel them to appoint a relieving officer?—I think not; but we have meant it.

Abolition of relief stations.

2518. The next suggestion, I think, that you have to make relates to the abolition, as far as practicable, of pay stations, does it not?—Yes. Pay stations, I should explain, are houses or rooms rather, which are taken at various points by the relieving officer, and at which the recipients of relief attend to receive their relief from the relieving officer. The system is one of very old standing, and the Board have always, until recently, without exception sanctioned any application for an additional relief station, provided that it was not in a public-house or in some unsuitable place of that sort. Before Committees and Commissions, various complaints have been made against the system, as, for instance, that children are sent to the relief stations to receive the parish pay from the relieving officer. Then it is notorious that occasionally one of the paupers will act as a sort of commission agent and collect the pay of other paupers for a small sum. A graver objection to relief stations is that if you have relief stations, you have no certainty that the relieving officer really visits the home of the pauper. If there were no relief stations, you would at all events know that in nearly every case the relieving officer had gone to the house of the pauper to pay his relief. In the Application and Report Book there is a column with the heading, "Date of Last Visit to the Home of the Pauper," but in cases where relief is ordered for a long period—in some instances, unfortunately, for six months—that book does not come before the guardians with respect to that particular pauper, except when the relief is renewed, and there is no certainty that the pauper will have been visited during all that time, for the relieving officer would pay the relief at the relief station and might never have seen the pauper. Therefore, the abolition of relief stations, or their restriction to the smallest possible limit, would be the best check that the relieving officer discharged what is one of his primary duties, namely, that of visiting the pauper. I will give you a graphic illustration in the shape of an experience which happened to me two or three years ago. I went into a workhouse, and there I saw an old man whom I knew. I said to him, "I thought you were gone away, and were getting non-resident relief in a neighbouring union?" "Well," he said, "I did; I went away to live with my son, but, you know, my daughter-in-law—she got the relief from the relieving officer, and I never saw any of it at all. She would sometimes give me a little tobacco, and sometimes a glass of beer. I got sick of it, so here I be." Then the nurse said, "We are very glad to see him; he is a very nice old man, and he is perfectly happy." I thought, "This is a very wicked world, and I had better make some further inquiry." I found out that the union, in the workhouse of which that man was resident, was still continuing to pay the non-resident relief to the next union. Then I thought, "What are they doing in the other union?" I went there, and there I found that the relieving officer was still continuing to pay to the daughter-in-law the 3s. a week with the utmost regularity. You will think that is an instance of very bad administration. Well, both those unions are very fairly administered; the guardians are men of fair business capacity, the clerks are good clerks, but the system is wrong. There are heaps of morals to be drawn from it, among others, that the pay station is an institution which should be abolished as far as you possibly can abolish it. I have made many suggestions in that direction, and not long ago all the relieving officers in Kent asked me to meet them and confer with them about it. That was officially impossible, because I could not confer with the relieving officers except through the guardians who appointed them. What they wanted to say to me was, "If you abolish relief stations, you will increase the work of relieving officers to a very great extent, and they will require extra assistance." I think the importance of ensuring that the relief shall be paid to the pauper himself in his own house is so great that I would not hesitate to recommend any increase of the relieving officer staff which was necessary to that end. I put the suggestion forward as one of the most important ones which I am able to make for improving what I have already termed the business side of the present relief administration.

Effect of relief stations on number of relieving officers employed.

Importance of direct payment to pauper of out-relief.

2519. And you would say that, although an addition to the staff of the relieving officers might run up expenditure, on the other hand it ought to compensate for that by the prevention of fraud, and of cases such as that you have just mentioned?—Yes, it would do that; and not only would it do that, but it would be a great step towards ensuring the proper and just treatment of out-door paupers.

2520. Assuming it was not possible to abolish all pay stations, in your judgment ought the money to be paid to any other person than the pauper himself?—I think not.

Objection to relief stations.

2521. (The O'Conor Don.) Are these relief stations universal?—No. They vary very much in different unions, and a return shows that with exactly similar unions there is the greatest diversity of practice. I have managed in the course of the last few years to induce guardians to do away with a good many of them, slightly increasing in some cases the pay of the relieving officer, and I have not heard that anyone was any the worse for it.

Arrangements as relief stations.

2522. Is it always fixed by the board where they are to be?—Yes; the guardians ask for sanction to hire a certain room.

2523. Then the relieving officer never selects them for himself?—The relieving officer would probably report to the board of guardians that he had got a relief station, and ask for their sanction.

2524. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Must there not be some official always in these relief stations?—No. It is arranged that the relieving officer shall visit there at certain fixed times, and that any messages for him would be conveyed to him from that building. In some respects it is a convenience to the pauper.

Duration of orders for relief.

2525. (Chairman.) I see that your next point relates to the duration of the orders; you have a strong opinion on that point, I think?—Yes. You will remember that Mr. Pell suggested that no order for relief should be valid for more than thirteen weeks; I would go further and say that a board of guardians should not order relief for a longer period than one month. The ordinary practice is to order relief for thirteen weeks, sometimes up to twenty-six weeks, and then to hold what they call a revision of the out-door relief cases. The revision of the out-door relief cases is very long and very laborious, and is naturally felt by the guardians to be a great bore; further, it does not really do much, as a rule, either to ensure uniformity in the way in which the different cases are treated, or to check improper relief. By far the best way is to give short orders and let the cases come up by themselves for revision. I have experience of several unions where no relief is given for a longer period than to the next meeting of the guardians, as for instance, Newhaven, where the pauperism is only 1 per cent.

2526. You advocate that the order should be in force for a shorter period, because you think that, by adopting that practice, each case would be decided on its merits as it comes up?—Each case would then be brought before the guardians at every meeting. Guardians might say, "That is a hardship, because we know that woman's circumstances, and they never change, so why should we not order relief for a longer time?" I say the reason why you should not order relief for a longer time is that you should not accept her as a permanent pauper without continual inquiry; her circumstances may vary from week to week; she may be ill, and require a little more relief; or she may have a son come home, and require a little less; she ought not to be removed from your constant supervision for a longer period than, say, a month.

2527. Under the present system there is a periodical revision of the list, is there not?—Yes.

2528. Does that entail any change in policy?—No; it is a revision which the guardians make, as they say, to secure that the relief given in various districts of the union and in various individual cases shall be uniform.

2529. Then you suggest what would practically amount to a more frequent revision?—Yes, that each case should come up for revision by itself once every month. That is ensured by giving short orders.

2530. (Mr. Nunn.) Do you mean that all the details, including the visit of the relieving officer to the home should appear in the application and report book from time to time?—Yes.

2531. That is a different thing to revising a list?—Yes, it is quite a different thing.

2532. (Chairman.) Your next point is, I think, that relief committee orders should not be issued except under certain conditions, that no guardian should sit for his own district permanently, and that more general rules of relief should be adopted?—The ordinary rule is that all cases of relief shall be heard by the board of guardians; The Local Government Board can, and do on application, issue what are called relief committee orders enabling the guardians to break themselves up into committees for the purpose of hearing applications for relief. The extreme case was the one of Manchester which I quoted this morning. (See Answer 2461). Where we give these orders, it seems to me a point worth consideration whether we should not insist on certain conditions. You will notice that if a board of guardians is broken up into committees for relief purposes, there is a danger that the guardians of one part of a union may perpetually sit to deal with the paupers coming from that same part of the union, that is to say, they may put themselves in the position of being administrators of relief to their own clients and their own neighbours. That is a system which I think must ultimately lead to extravagance in the giving of out-door relief. The suggestion is, whether it would not be practicable to insist, either that the committees shall change about from one district to another and deal with the cases from one district to another, or that the relieving officer should bring his books round first to one committee and then to another, which would mean practically the same thing. Then there seem to have been made at various times suggestions, at Poor Law conferences and elsewhere, that another condition of the granting of relief committees to any union should be that that union should administer its relief under those standing orders which we were mentioning this morning, that is to say, that there should be some further guarantee beyond the general orders of the Local Government Board that the relief was given in a uniform way. Whether, if the first condition, namely, that the relief committees should change from one district to another, were carried out, it would be in some degree unnecessary that the second suggestion should be carried out, namely, that the standing orders should also be imposed, is a question.

2533. Assuming that such conditions were to be laid down by the Local Government Board now, would they have any authority to enforce them upon boards of guardians?—I think a board of guardians having got its relief committee on certain conditions would, as a rule, observe those conditions.

2534. Why cannot it appoint its committee under other conditions?—It cannot appoint a relief committee without our consent.

2535. So that you can prescribe the conditions?—We can prescribe the conditions, and conditions have been prescribed in certain cases. I have mentioned the subject, because it is one that is frequently brought up at Poor Law conferences, and has indeed been talked of from quite early times.

2536. I think your next point is that of compulsory case papers?—Yes. The information which a board of guardians now requires under the orders as to out-door paupers is contained in the relief application and report book, which contains a list of the applicants for relief. In some unions they try to make a relieving officer put one case on each page, with the result that they do get something like a consecutive history of the case; but that is an imperfect means of recording the whole circumstances of the case, and the questions in the application and report book do not quite cover the information which some people believe should be recorded before the guardians can decide a case which is brought before them. For a good many years, some boards of guardians have adopted what are known as case papers, which constitute a much fuller record of the circumstances of the pauper than is possible under the relief application and report book. Paddington, I think, is the first one that started that. The system is gradually spreading. I myself think it is a good system for many reasons. You get practically a consecutive history of the case, and you get the information in a form which can be utilised in case the pauper from being an out-door pauper goes into the workhouse. At present, under the application and report book, there are no means of apprising the visiting committee of the workhouse of the facts which are recorded in that book, but under the case paper system the case paper with regard to each pauper would naturally be handed to the visiting committee.

2537. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) Might we have some of these papers and application books shown to us?—Certainly. I will hand in some case papers, and I will hand in a sheet from the relief application and report book, so that you can compare them. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. 24 and 31). Another advantage of the case paper system was pointed out to me only the other day. We are living now in what I may call a fissiparous period of Poor Law, and instead of having one institution we have many institutions—workhouses, infirmaries, cottage homes, and all the rest of it; and sometimes a family gets broken up amongst those various institutions. Unless you have a case paper which records when they go and where they are, there is no register of them. It has been put to me as quite a possible thing to happen, and as an actual thing that has happened, that the links are lost, and that there might be considerable trouble in piecing them together again. If you have case papers, properly kept and properly registered, you would have a history of any family that was broken up, and such a thing could not happen.

2538. I suppose the only objection to this is that it would put more work on the relieving officer?—One very great and very well-founded complaint against our system of both in-door and out-door work is the wholly unnecessary amount of book-keeping and writing and cross-writing which it entails. That is a matter which does really need reform. The moment the case paper system is introduced, it is my experience that the clerk, the relieving officer, and everybody else says, "One more book, more clerical work"; and they revolt. As a matter of practice, if the board can dispense with the application and report book and stick to the case papers, I am told by experienced clerks that the clerical labour involved in the case papers is actually less than the clerical labour involved under the present system. But I understand that there are difficulties as to the audit of the accounts; whether those difficulties are insuperable or not, I do not know.

2539. Reverting for a moment to the question of returns which local authorities make, are those returns statutory?—Some are statutory, but a great many are not.

2540. (Sir Samuel Provis.) The returns required under orders are are not statutory they ?—At all events they are compulsory on the clerks.

Powers of Local Government Board to reduce book-keeping requirements.

2541 (Chairman.) Could the Local Government Board by revising their list dispense with some of these returns—those obtained under statute may not all be absolutely required to be made by the statute itself ?—I was not so much alluding to the book-keeping necessitated by the returns, though that is an important matter, as to the account and other books which have to be kept under the regulations of the Board. They have not been revised for a great number of years. I merely illustrate that as one of the difficulties of getting the case paper system adopted.

2542. Assuming that the case paper system did give additional work, you think the local officers could get compensation by the reduction of the number of returns required in other directions ?—Yes.

Experiments on lines of Elberfeld system.

2543. I think the next point you wish to bring before us is your desire to encourage tentative experiments in the way of the German or Elberfeld system ?—I think it is of very great importance that when a board of guardians conscientiously wants a free hand in trying experiments of that sort, the Local Government Board should help them. I instance the Elberfeld system, because it is a matter of common knowledge that it is being tried in the Bradford union as an adjunct to the Poor Law administration. I am not discouraged by the fact that it has been tried in several other unions, and has come to an end. I think anything which will enliven the interests of the local administrators in Poor Law questions, and in principles of Poor Law generally, should be encouraged.

2544. What prevents them now adopting experiments of that kind ?—They do adopt them, and they can adopt them, if they see fit. I only wish to emphasise the fact that I think the Local Government Board should give them every encouragement to adopt them.

2545. Have they to get the approval of the Local Government Board first ?—In certain cases they have to do so; those are cases which involve varying the duties of their officers. In this particular case, probably they would not have to do so.

Objections to non-resident relief.

2546. Then I think you have a strong opinion about non-resident relief ?—I think non-resident relief should be put an end to. I believe it is bad business and often leads to abuses. I notice that many boards of guardians do not give it and do not receive it. I know that you have plausible cases where a woman says, "I want to leave the union and live elsewhere with my daughter." That may be all right, but I hardly think that it is the business of the ratepayers to maintain a system which is so open to abuse in order to meet exceptional cases of hardship of that description. Personally, I should be glad to see non-resident relief abolished. It can only be given in certain cases which are laid down in the regulations and I should like to see the regulations altered so as to prohibit it in nearly every case. You will notice that the case which I quoted just now (See Question 2518) was a case of non-resident relief, and it is rather typical, I think, of some of the mischiefs which may come from it.

Number of persons receiving non-resident relief.

2547. Have you any idea as to the number of persons who are in receipt of non-resident relief ?—I have not at the moment, but I will try to find out.

2548. Notwithstanding certain individual convenience which might result, you think that a system which so lends itself to fraud ought to be abolished ?—I do.

Removal of paupers over 60.

2549. Now I think you wish to speak about district removals ?—Yes. That brings me to the very wide question of settlement and removal, and I do not know whether that is a matter that the Commission will look into. I express no opinion as to it, but while conceivably it may be necessary to keep up what yet remains of the old law of settlement and removal, I think that in the case of people over sixty, it is a great hardship that they should be removed against their will, and I unhesitatingly recommend that no removals of persons over the age of sixty or sixty-five should be allowed. If that were done, we should, to a great extent, automatically put an end to non-resident relief.

No appeal by pauper against removal.

2550. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Is there no power of appeal to the Local Government Board by the pauper against an order of removal ?—No. The power of the Local Government Board with regard to appeals is this—that if the two unions that are in conflict as to the settlement of a pauper put in a case the Local Government Board can decide that case. If the power of removal is to remain, I think that that procedure should be made compulsory. I cannot see that any advantage to the public service can arise from the fighting out by two unions and two union clerks of some abstruse and difficult case of settlement right up to the House of Lords, and the expenditure of very large sums of money on it, when they could send the case over to the Local Government Board and get it decided for nothing. I will give you a good instance of the absurdity of the whole procedure. There was a fight as to the chargeability of a child between two unions, one a London union and one a country union. The country union won, and the child was removed to the London union. An uncle of the child then asked it to come and stay in the country union; the child stayed there a year, and then became chargeable to the country union after all. That was the sole result of a very expensive and troublesome litigation. That did not happen in the bad old days of removal of which we hear so much; that happened the year before last.

Decision of settlement by Local Government Board.

2551. (The O'Conor Don.) I suppose you are aware that the hardship of removal is very much felt in Ireland, where we have no law of settlement, because paupers are sent over to the Irish unions from the English, although they have spent all their lives in England ?—I know that; not only are they sent to parishes in Ireland, but they are sent to unions in Ireland.

Removal of paupers to Ireland.

2552. Are not the law costs in connection with these removals sometimes very considerable ?—I believe it is fortunately the case that removals are very much rarer than they used to be, but I know at times the costs are pretty heavy.

Cost of removals.

2553. As I understand, you would be for checking these removals as much as possible, and limiting the age to sixty-five at all events ?—I certainly would not compulsorily remove any old person. That would be on the ground of humanity. I am not proposing to go into the broad question of the necessity for keeping up the law of removal generally.

Removal of paupers over sixty.

2554. You have given us a good deal of evidence about out-door relief, but I do not think you have yet stated to the Commission whether that out-door relief is generally given in the form of money or in kind; have you anything to say on that point ?—The only restriction with regard to that point in the orders of the board is that in cases where relief is given to able-bodied people half at least shall be in kind; otherwise the matter is one for the discretion of the guardians, who usually in practice give the relief in money; and that practice is an increasing practice.

Out-relief given half in kind.

2555. When the relief is given in kind, how is it given ? Does the relieving officer give the provisions himself, or does he give an order to the pauper to get the provisions ?—There are several ways of giving it. The relieving officer is responsible for the giving of it in every case. Sometimes he gives it himself, but rarely—that would be in special cases; sometimes he gives it by orders on the tradesmen; and sometimes the guardians make a contract with a tradesman to supply the out-door paupers; but the relieving officer is still responsible for the weight and quality of the articles supplied. I mention that because it is a point which the Commission may hear of later on. I remember one case in particular where the relief in bread had been habitually given to the recipient short weight. That became known by an accident and—apart from any penal consequences to the contractor—the relieving officer was held responsible, because it was his business to see that the weight was proper. He was the person whom we blamed, because if relief is given he is responsible for the giving of it.

Procedure for giving out-relief in kind.

2556. In that case you say there was a contractor for the supply of the bread ?—Yes; he had a contract with the guardians for supplying the bread for the relief.

2557. Is that a usual system ?—That is a common system in large unions.

Out-relief given in k from guar dians' sto

2558. Could you tell us what is the general difference between giving the relief in the manner you have mentioned, that is directly or under contract, and giving it by an order to a tradesman ?—The giving of an order to a tradesman is obviously open to abuse; and the giving of an order to a contractor is not altogether free from abuse, as in the case which I have mentioned to you. In a large union, the only way to my mind, or the best way to my mind, in which out-door relief can be given, is for the guardians to have a store of their own.

2559. Is that practice of having a store much followed ?—Yes, it is in some large unions.

2560. Is it followed in London ?—I do not know about London, but it certainly is so in Manchester and some other unions. The guardians have a store, and the applicant for relief gets an order for relief which she takes to the store of the guardians; the storekeeper says, "In what form will you have it ?" and the woman says, "I will have a shilling's worth of bread, sixpennyworth of candles, so much sugar," and so on up to amount of the order. In that way, the pauper gets the relief at practically cost price.

ture and ount of ef in kind.

2561. Is the relief never given only in kind or only in money ?—It is very seldom given wholly in kind. Occasionally guardians have to give out-door relief to a woman and her children, and she or the husband is a drunkard. In cases like that it is given wholly in kind.

2562. Is it usual to give it half and half ?—It is usually given in England entirely in money, but in exceptional cases, as I have explained, it is occasionally given altogether in kind. In the case of the able-bodied men, it must be given half in money and half in kind, or not less than half in kind, 2563. Is there anything else you wish to say on that point ?—No.

2564. (Mr. Phelps.) Is flour given now at all ?—Flour is still given in some remote places, because the old women say they like it to make soft puddings instead of bread. There was a complaint at one time that flour was given, and that the out-door paupers had not the means of baking the flour now that the cottage oven is pretty well an extinct institution.

2565. (Mr. Bentham.) There are districts where it is not extinct ?—There are districts where flour is given, and I have satisfied myself that they are districts where flour is properly given.

2566. Where it is a common practice for people to bake their own bread at home ?—Yes; and occasionally where the woman has the means of making soft puddings, and wants to do so, either because she cannot bite bread, or because she has a lot of children.

2567. (The O'Conor Don.) Where relief in kind is given at a store belonging to the guardians, does the pauper in receipt of it call for it himself or herself ?—He should do so, but he occasionally gets a neighbour to go for it.

2568. The relieving officer does not issue it directly to the paupers ?—That is not the practice, so far as I am aware.

orkhouse tary: ews of or Law mmis- ners 1836.

2569. (Dr. Downes.) Perhaps, going back to your previous references to workhouse dietaries, you could tell us how the Commissioners proceeded in 1836 ?—What troubled the early Commissioners mainly was the fact that in the existing parish workhouses the dietary was extremely good, that is to say, people were more or less tempted, by means of the food, to stay in the workhouse and behave themselves. I have here a very characteristic comment by Sir Francis Head: "In Kent stall fed charity, in order to bait the workhouse trap, arranged, printed, and published a bribe which we consider one of the most astonishing documents in the pig-stye history of our poor laws. Contractors were to furnish, inter alia, warm, clean, sweet comfortable beds; servants to cook and serve the victuals and attend on the poor; good sweet wholesome fat meat, good sound small beer, best flour, good Gloucester cheese, good and clean butter.' Lastly, the contractors were to provide wigs for such as wear them or require them." The wigs have nothing to do with the diet, but that is the end of the quotation. The first thing which the Commissioners had in their mind was that the diet should be worse than that of the poorest agricultural labourer, and they set out a number of dietaries in a circular letter saying, that in making this selection especial reference must be had to the usual mode of living of the independent labourers of the district in which the unions are situate, and on no account must the dietary of the workhouse be superior or equal to the ordinary mode of subsistence of the labouring classes. That is what was mostly in their minds when they sent out these dietaries, which are very simple.

2570. There are six of them I think selected from samples which had been in use in different parts of the country for a number of years ?—Yes. I believe we have in this volume old workhouse dietaries dating back to the year 1768.

Early samples of dietaries.

2571. To those set specimens of dietaries, I think there is a foot-note which perhaps you would give us ?—These dietaries are very important from this point of view, that they are the first indication of the workhouse classification. In the dietaries for able-bodied men and women there is this footnote which has had a very wide-reaching effect on the whole in-door administration of our poor law: "Old people of sixty years and upwards may be allowed something extra." That fixes the age of sixty as the statutory time for the cessation of the able-bodied period of a man's life. Nowadays the term "able-bodied" means two or three things, and one is a man who is under sixty.

Early discrimination in favour of aged.

Origin of existing age-limit in classification of able-bodied.

2572. Did that not lead to stereotyping the division between the able-bodied and the not able-bodied ?—That is so.

2573. I think the practice was for a board of guardians at that time to select one of those six dietaries, and the Commissioners then issued an order giving it effect ?—Yes.

2574. I believe that went on until what is known as the Andover Inquiry, did it not ?—Yes, until about 1847.

2575. You are acquainted with that Inquiry, are you not ?—Yes, perfectly well. The famous Andover Inquiry was one of the real reasons why the Poor Law Commissioners were turned out and the Poor Law Board constituted in their stead. That arose from a scandal in the Andover workhouse, and one of the details of this scandal was that a certain number of the paupers had got at the pig tubs and gnawed the bones. There was a great fuss about it, and there was an inquiry which resulted in the transfer of the local government of the country from the old Commission to the new Board. That, by the way, is the reason why still to this day in the General Consolidated Order you have the proviso that no pauper must be employed in breaking up bones. However, what is more important was that the onus of the charge against the Commissioners with regard to the dietary was that they had not informed the Andover guardians that they had sanctioned better dietaries than the one which they had sanctioned for Andover. It appeared to be in the mind of the committee that investigated the case that the Commissioners should have told the Andover guardians that it was still open to them to make a choice of a better dietary.

Andover scandal

Origin of Poor Law Board.

2576. The Andover guardians had chosen the one marked No. 3, I believe ?—That is so. A more wicked accusation never was made than was made against the Commissioners then.

2577. I believe the Commissioners had rather improved No. 3 in other unions, but had not informed the Andover guardians that they had improved it ?—Yes.

2578. The Select Committee in the House of Commons consequently held, rightly or wrongly, the Commissioners responsible, on the ground that this action of theirs admitted that the first No. 3 was an insufficient dietary ?—Yes—obviously very wrongly held.

2579. I believe there was evidence also that the dietary had been further diminished by the dishonesty of the master ?—That is a detail.

2580. That led, I think, to important changes with regard to the Commission ?—Yes, and what more immediately concerns us is this, that the new Poor Law Board came in with their minds very full of pauper dietaries.

Dietary policy of Poor Law Board.

2581. I think Mr. Buller was the President of the new Poor Law Commission and Lord Ebrington was the Secretary ?—Yes.

2582. Do you know what was the first action of the new Poor Law Commission ?—They got Dr. Lyon Playfair, as he then was, to report on the nutritive values of various sorts of foods.

Dr. Playfair's report on nutritive values of different foods.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

30 Jan. 1906.

2583. I think Lord Ebrington found a difficulty in obtaining evidence as to what could be regarded as a standard of diet?—Yes 2584. And also as to the composition of the different kinds of foods that were given?—Yes. That was the first instance probably where there was any attention paid to dietary from a scientific point of view.

Analyses of nutritive value of dietaries.

2585. I think the records you have there include the analyses of some 529 known dietaries?—It may be so; there are a great many here.

2586. And I believe those show extraordinary divergencies at that date, in spite of the action of the Commissioners in endeavouring to get set dietaries adopted?—Yes. The ingenuity of the guardians in getting a dietary different from their neighbours was quite remarkable.

2587. Did the new Commission at that time take any action on those analyses?—I do not think so.

2588. I believe Mr. Buller died soon after, did he not?—Yes, and the interest in the matter was lost. I suppose the Andover case was beginning to be forgotten.

Procedure for adoption of workhouse dietaries by guardians.

2589. Then I think they adopted the practice of requiring the guardians to frame their own dietary, and to send it up to the central authority for approval with a certificate from the medical officer?—Yes, the certificate from the medical officer was to be to the effect that the dietary was sufficient.

2590. That appears on a dietary of 1851, I believe?—Yes, for the first time.

2591. And that in fact was the practice which went on down till quite recently?—That was the practice which went on till the whole dietary question came to the front some few years ago.

Model dietaries by Dr. Markham and Dr. Edward Smith.

2592. I believe there have been various attempts at obtaining uniformity, such as those made by Dr. Markham and Dr. Edward Smith, who framed model dietaries?—Yes.

Dr. Downes' suggestions as to dietary in 1893.

2593. Coming down to a later time, some reference has been made to a model dietary which was described as having been drawn up by myself; I think that possibly what Mrs. Webb had in mind were some suggestions which were drawn up in 1893?—Yes. I have a print of them here.

2594. They were merely suggestions, and there is no model dietary given in that Paper, I think?—That is so. I should like to say that of all the troublesome, wearisome work which ever fell to the lot of the Local Government Board, I thould think the revision of those workhouse dietaries was the worst. They were full of the most extraordinary details, put in in the most incomprehensible fashion, and the attempt to secure uniformity was quite hopeless. We used to send them back time after time to the guardians, and the guardians replied they were advised by their medical officer that the right thing to do was to have roast mutton instead of something else, and so on.

2595. And it led to interminable and trivial correspondence?—To absolutely futile correspondence.

2596. I think in the early nineties the Local Government Board took up the work where it was practically left by Lord Playfair?—Yes.

2597. And they caused a number of dietaries from different parts of the country to be carefully examined?—Yes. I have here the results of one of those examinations made in the year 1891, which is signed by me and by you.

Diversity of dietaries in 1891.

2598. I believe those examinations revealed a continuance, and perhaps even an increase, of the extraordinary diversity in different unions in regard to dietaries?—Yes.

2599. In fact there were no two dietaries which were strictly alike; they differed in rations, or they differed in the quantities of food given, or in the mode of preparation of the food?—Yes.

Waste of bread under ration system.

2600. Then I think complaints were made to the board on the various points which are referred to in that paper?—Yes. Then we got to what was quite an agitation. The agitation was on the great question of the waste of bread. We received complaints from all over the country that people had a fixed quantity of bread given to them, but appetites varied, and there were no means of giving A's bread to B in order to supply B's deficiency out of A's superfluity, the consequence being that the pig-tub was full of the workhouse bread, and the workhouses were models of mal-administraton. The fuss that was made about the waste of bread led to an agitation which was quite formidable. Then we took another step.

Departmental Committee on Workhouse Dietaries.

2601. I think that was, that a committee was appointed to consider the question?—Yes, that was Mr. T. W. Russell's Committee.

2602. I believe the committee made various recommendations?—Yes. Roughly speaking, that committee to a great extent met the complaints by yielding to them; that is to say, they reported that bread should be granted according to appetite instead of according to allowance; and there was a difference of dietary made so far as the children were concerned.

2603. The medical inspectors, I think, were instructed to frame dietaries that would be applicable to different boards of guardians?—Yes.

Dietaries Order, 1900.

2604. The outcome of the report which they made was, I believe, the dietaries order of 1900, which is now in force?—Yes.

2605. I think you have described that order as one of simplification?—I have described it as one of simplification and decentralisation.

2606. I think it was found that the variations in the existing dietaries were almost innumerable; the permutations of the varieties were so great?—Yes.

Ingredient tables.

2607. The first point of simplification was the adoption of a uniform ingredient table?—Yes. That was a sort of fixed cookery book, telling you how to make everything from dumplings to meat puddings.

2608. I think the accounts committee, over which you presided some time back, found that that lent itself to the simplification of meal accounts?—Yes; it is invaluable in the way of workhouse accounts.

Dietetically equivalent rations.

2609. The next point of simplification was the reduction of the rations to certain definite fixed rations, I believe?—Yes, the ration of each food was a known and fixed quantity.

2610. These rations being more or less equivalent?—Yes, if you mean equivalent dietetically.

2611. One great trouble with the old dietaries being that they varied enormously in point of nutriment?—Yes.

Discretion of guardians in selection of dietaries.

2612. Then, I think, the order leaves it free to the guardians to select their dietary from these rations?—Yes.

2613. And the rations themselves are representative of the rations that were previously in existence in different parts of the Kingdom?—Yes; so that sometimes a board of guardians could, without making any alteration in the amount of food given, reduce their old dietary to the terms of the new dietary.

Rations according to appetite.

2614. It was provided by the order that bread could be served according to appetite?—Yes.

2615. That the service of food to the children was to be to appetite?—Yes.

2616. And that, subject to the directions of the medical officer, the service of food to the sick should be to appetite?—Yes.

Revision of diets by medical officer.

2617. I think there were further provisions for the revision of diets by the medical officer, and for his examination of inmates on admission as to their fitness for employment?—Yes.

Restrictions on alcohol.

2618. There were also restrictions on the allowance of alcohol?—Yes.

Medical officer's control over sick diet.

2619. A further point that was introduced into that Order was, that the dietary of the sick was still to be prescribed by the doctor, but on a set form?—That was so.

2620. Was the effect of that to give a different diet to each day?—Yes.

Monotony of former dietaries.

2621. I think previously medical officers had simply directed in a great many cases that there should be one diet, to consist of so much meat, so much vegetables, and so much bread, and that had resulted in the same diet being given day after day?—Yes.

2622. But a form appended to the Order led to a variation from day to day?—Yes.

2623. Have you anything to say as regards the cost of the dietary?—The new dietary order was evidently a great administrative advantage. It has been alleged against it that it has led to an increase of cost. I do not think it did anything of the kind; however, that is a matter of opinion, and I do not know that the question of the cost has really ever been investigated. If it did lead to an increase of cost, I should think it is quite clear that it was because the guardians chose, under the freedom which was given to them by the Order, to increase the dietaries themselves.

2624. (Mr. Bentham.) Do you mean by that statement to select the most expensive diet?—Yes. Many of the boards of guardians had a quite inadequate diet, and instead of choosing some diet rather like their own, they chose the most expensive on the whole list; and they were the first to grumble.

2625. The set dietaries themselves varied in value, so that it was possible for boards to increase the cost of their dietary by selecting the most expensive dietary?—Yes, within certain limits they could increase the cost in that way.

2626. In those cases where they selected the most expensive dietary the cost was increased?—That would be so, I suspect, in some unions. There were some unions where they had four bread and cheese dinners a week; that was not possible under the new dietary, and in those cases therefore the cost was clearly increased and ought to have been increased.

2627. (Dr. Downes.) There has been a great difference in the care and the mode of issuing the bread, I believe?—On the question of bread, I should think there has been an actual saving. That is one point from the Poor Law point of view. Another point is whether we have not rather lost sight of the point of view of the old Commissioners too much, and whether this new dietary is not too attractive for the pauper and is not in excess of what is enjoyed by the labouring classes outside. It probably is rather in excess of what the labouring classes get outside. But I do not think that this is attractive to them. You see on these dietaries there are no things like red herrings and such-like luxuries which the people outside do get and which they wish to get, because if you give them any money to spend that is what they spend it on.

2628. I believe it is open to guardians to choose a very plain dietary indeed for the paupers?—Yes. Upon this question of diet I should like to say that I have lately been doing a course of prisons, and what has struck me most with regard to the feeding question is that what people of our class would appreciate most is well cooked food, and that in prisons, the cooking of the simplest fare is excellent. The prison diet is quite nice and quite attractive; but the same fare badly cooked would be rather horrible. Yet no one would suggest as a means of test or of deterrent that the food should be badly cooked. Naturally as workhouses become larger and better managed the food must be nicer because it is better cooked. As to the cost, I find that the cost in St. Pancras for the year ended Lady-day, 1905, was 2s. 2⅞d. per head a week.

Cost of food in St. Pancras Workhouse.

2629. In the report of the inspectors on which this Order was based there is a suggestion that the Order should be divided into two parts, one part consisting of schedules of rations and ingredient tables, the object of that as suggested in the reports being that it would lend itself to revision?—Yes.

2630. I believe that all these public dietaries must have regard to the recognised scientific standard of the time?—Yes.

2631. If they are to be defended in Parliament or to the public they must be based upon the accepted scientific views?—Evidently so.

2632. I believe that you have recently had evidence in another capacity of some observations that have been made in regard to dietary standards?—Yes.

Possible future revision of dietaries.

2633. Which may possibly lead at no distant date to altered views on the part of dietetic experts?—What appears to me as a purely unscientific individual is that recent medical investigations have shown that it is possible to live on quite a different scale both in quantity and quality of diet from what was held to be necessary some time ago. I think myself that there is a germ of a considerable alteration in the discipline of institutions in that fact. I do not know whether I shall be supported by men of science, but from the evidence given before the Vagrancy Committee it seems quite possible that by-and-bye, when more is known about these things, we shall get into the position that the State will be able to say to the inmates of an institution, "This amount of food is quite as much as is good for you and is probably better for you as freeing you from diseases, as for instance, gout, than the food that you would choose for yourself, and therefore that is what we will give you, and if you want to have anything more you must work for it or you must behave yourself for it, and thus you may get a certain amount of extra money which you can spend in luxuries that are to be had at the canteen." That is a question which does not immediately come before you in dealing with pauperism, which is mostly old age pauperism, but still by-and-bye you will get the question of test-houses, of labour colonies, and so on, brought before you either directly or indirectly, and I thought therefore that I might say that much on the subject, so as to draw your attention to that part of the Report of the Vagrancy Committee which deals somewhat in detail with the point.

Diet as method of discipline.

2634. You would say, therefore, that the question of dietary standards is rather in a state of transition at the present time?—I think there can be no doubt that we shall have to reconsider the whole question of dietaries.

NINTH DAY.

Monday, 5th February, 1906.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

5 Feb. 1906.

Irreducible minimum of pauperism.

2635. (Mr. Booth.) You have told us that you think there is a minimum amount of pauperism which is practically unavoidable, which at one time you said you put down at 1 per cent., but which you now think too high. Do you mean that we are to take that figure as an average or do you mean it to represent the minimum everywhere, in all unions and under all conditions?—Naturally the minimum would vary in different parts of England and in different unions. The state of public health, the death rate and other conditions would all affect it more or less. The 1 per cent. was merely a rough statement, which I got at by the examination of the circumstances of one particular Lancashire union.

2636. It is rather a national question as you put it, is it not?—Yes, it is.

Classification of paupers.

2637. With regard to the classification that comes a little later on, what you said rather resulted in minimising the difficulty; you thought that the difficulties of classification were largely imaginary on the part of others than referable to the feelings of the actual people who are to be classified?—Generally I agree with that, but without putting it quite so high as to use the word "imaginary."

2638. With regard to the younger women and the older women, I think you are ready to admit that there is some need for classification?—They should be classified.

2639. As a moral question?—Yes, and as a question of convenience also. The women who do one sort of work should be separated from the women who do another sort of work or have another sort of occupation.

Brabazon scheme.

2640. With regard to the Brabazon scheme, does it work equally successfully in urban unions as in rural unions?—I do not think the nature of the union makes any difference, but the nature of the Brabazon Committee makes a good deal of difference—I mean to say, one committee may be much more sensible than another committee.

2641. Is there the greater need for that form of interesting occupation for the workhouse inmate in the town, or for the workhouse inmate in the country?—For the inmate in the town, undoubtedly.

2642. And would you say to some extent a greater difficulty in applying the system in the towns?—I should not say exactly that: probably it is so, for there would be greater numbers to deal with.

2643. It has spread in a wonderful way, has it not?—It is spreading quite as fast as I should wish to see it spread. It is not a matter which one can press on a board of guardians, because the condition of success is that the committee should be ladies of sound common-sense, and you are not always able to put your hand on such people who are willing to undertake the duty.

2644. Are the things that they make, things which can be called useful things, or are they more of the nature of ornamental trifles?—Some of them fulfil both functions; for instance, a favourite article which is made is a very bright coloured mat.

Disposal of articles made under Brabazon scheme.

2645. The object of my question was this: Can a utility be found for the things that they produce, either in the workhouses themselves or in some public institution, so that the question of the sale and therefore of competition with other forms of labour would be avoided; or are they things from which you can only get a return by selling them as things are sold at a bazaar to the rich?—I never was at a fancy bazaar myself, but I should think they would hold a sort of fancy bazaar and sell those things.

2646. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) Or a sale of work, which is a different thing?—Yes, it would be.

2647. (Mr. Booth.) It is, of course, important to avoid not only the actual fact of competition, but any appearance of competition with unpauperised labour?—The articles that are sold under the Brabazon scheme are not sufficiently large in value or in bulk to attract any attention whatever.

2648. Then they need not be considered from that point of view?—They need not.

Test-house for able-bodied.

2649. With regard to test-houses for the able-bodied, a test-house must not be a small local institution, but needs rather a large area to work satisfactorily, does it not?—It is better to have rather a large area.

Technique of stone-breaking.

2650. With regard to your evidence as to the skilled character of stone-breaking, I do not doubt that the fact is as you state it; but it might surprise people to be told that stone-breaking was a skilled matter. Have you studied the subject, and have you seen the men doing it, and do you know that the men who are used to it can do a great deal more, owing to the skill that they have acquired, than others who are not used to it can do?—It most emphatically is a very skilled occupation indeed. An expert stone-breaker knows exactly where to hit the stone, and the beginner or the bungler, however strong he may be, cannot compete with him. The difference between the two is immense.

2651. Then in a certain sense the loafer is a skilled man, because he is a man who has been constantly at it?—He has served his apprenticeship in jails and in workhouses all the time, and he knows how to split the stone. Oakum-picking, also, is a skilled occupation.

2652. Therefore a man who had never been put to such a test before would be at a great disadvantage?—He would. I knew a man who not only could break stones that nobody else could break, but could break his hammer whenever he wanted to do so.

Incidence of out-relief.

2653. With regard to the circumstances of those unions which practically refuse all out-door relief, that result (of which I knew before, but which you have pointed out so clearly) has not involved an increase of inmates in the workhouse, at any rate, except very temporarily, if that. Do you consider that that proves that the class of people who can be relieved outside are quite distinct from those who are relieved inside; in fact, is out-relief a method of dealing with an entirely different class of poor person?—So it would appear.

ike-relief.

2654. With regard to the question of poverty or distress resulting from strikes and lock-outs, the kind of relief which is a danger under those circumstances is out-relief only, is it not?—Yes.

2655. If you were to offer the test of the workhouse they would not accept that at all, would they?—I should think they would never do so.

2656. So that the difficulty in those cases could be absolutely met by refusing out-door relief?—Some of the dependants might have to come into the workhouse, but the men themselves I should think would practically never do so.

tension of ing area indoor ef.

2657. With regard to the extension of the area of chargeability for indoor relief which you have treated in regard to London, does the same argument apply to other parts of the country, namely, that it would be desirable or might be desirable to extend the area of chargeability?—I did not, I think, express any opinion as to the advisability of extending the area; I brought it before the Commission rather as a historical fact for their consideration.

2658. I put it in this way: Do the same considerations, whatever their value, apply to other urban districts as well as to London?—I should think so.

asons for ing hibitory er or ulation er.

2659. (Mrs. Webb.) You have mentioned that the regulation order is issued to Lancashire, and that the prohibitory order is issued to the rural districts and certain towns; what determines the policy in that respect?—The policy was determined a good many years ago. So far as I remember, Lancashire had not sufficient workhouse accommodation in the opinion of the Commissioners to deal with the possible developments of the Poor Law; and therefore the regulation order was issued to them, and not the prohibitory order. Another reason was that, in some parts of Lancashire, the introduction of the new Poor Law was opposed with great vehemence, and the Commissioners had to temporise. In one union, Todmorden, a workhouse was not built at all until somewhere in the seventies.

2660. As regards a place like Coventry, for instance, what would determine you to issue a regulation order rather than a prohibitory order?—The question does not come up now, because the order is so very seldom altered.

2661. Do you never alter it?—I cannot recall a case myself, but there may have been cases.

2662. I notice you say that in spite of the fact that Lancashire has the regulation order—which I gather you do not think as good as the prohibitory order, on general principles—it has a low rate of pauperism?—The rate of pauperism in Lancashire is very low.

se of low perism in cashire.

2663. Do you attribute that to the character of the occupations of the people, or what do you attribute that result to?—I attribute it in a great measure to the fact that the Lancashire man is notoriously a hard-headed administrator. A great many of the guardians are accustomed to be at works, they know what a big business is, and so they would be apt to manage their affairs in a more business-like way than some other folk. That is one reason. Another reason is the one on which I dwelt at considerable length the last time I gave evidence, namely, that in the urban unions the tendency is to be rather stricter than in the rural unions, for many reasons, one of which is that the cost of lodging in a town is so much higher than the cost of lodging in the country; and consequently, if out-door relief were given, the absolute minimum of out-door relief must be much higher in such districts as Lancashire.

2664. You cannot have any special comparison in that respect as between Lancashire and other urban districts, so that there must be something peculiar to Lancashire?—You will find that the same holds good with Yorkshire. Some Yorkshire unions have a very low pauperism also.

2665. Burnley, I believe, gives a large out-door relief, does it not?—It used to do so. I may say this, which is perhaps what you want to get at—naturally where you have a highly organised work, as you have in the textile trades, people are more apt to provide for themselves; they are more educated, they are accustomed to combination, they have their trade unions, they have their benefit societies, they even have their large contributions, paid throughout the year, for their Going-Away Fund in the Whitsuntide holidays; and they are accustomed to think of rather more than to-day.

2666. Would you attribute that at all to the greater regulation of the hours in Lancashire?—That has never occurred to me as being a possible reason.

2667. If we wanted to test the causes why pauperism in Lancashire was low, it would be necessary, would it not, to investigate what are the circumstances of the pauper's life, or rather the life of the possible, potential pauper?—Yes.

Importance of ascertaining effect of out-relief on wages.

2668. I gather that you think that it is of enormous importance that we should investigate the effect of out-door relief on the rate of wages?—Yes.

2669. How would you suggest that should be done; would you suggest that we should follow up the life history of the paupers?—I think the investigation would have to be local, and in selected unions.

2670. We should have to take a certain number of cases, I assume, and see what the actual effect was?—Yes.

Separate classification of persons receiving medical relief.

2671. (Mr. Bentham.) In the answer to Question 2341 you point out the movement in the direction of the separation of workhouse hospitals or infirmaries from the workhouse itself, and I almost understand from what you say that you do not approve of this to the extent that it has been adopted at the present time; am I right in thinking so?—I did not mean to convey any such impression. If you ask me my opinion of it, as I suppose you will do, I say that I think the evidence goes to show that in some districts separation is almost inevitable.

2672. But provided it is not inevitable, do you think it an advisable thing to do so, as far as possible, or do you not agree with the separation of the two classes of pauper inmates for the sake of separation?—If there is no administrative advantage to be gained by it, I think it should be postponed as long as possible.

2673. Then the advantages, so far as you look upon it, should be administrative advantages?—Yes. The source of relief which a man is receiving should never be concealed; if it is relief obtained by the compulsory contributions of his neighbours that should be recognised.

2674. Whatever class of relief it might be?—Yes.

Increase in able-bodied paupers.

2675. I think you attribute the large increase in the number of able-bodied who are returned as inmates of workhouses to the fact that temporarily sick cases (all of which are classed as able-bodied) are being treated now more frequently than formerly?—To a great extent, I think the increase is due to that cause.

2676. That points to a new form of classification does it not?—The classification has always been the same. It points to a greater use of the workhouse infirmaries by the sick.

Need for revision of statistics as to able-bodied.

2677. It also points, does it not, to the need of a better classification, so that it could be seen by statistics what is the number of people who avail themselves purely of hospital treatment, and what is the number who are able-bodied and do not require any hospital treatment at all?—I certainly think that the whole of the statistics with regard to what are called the able-bodied need careful reconsideration.

"Destitution" and medical relief.

2678. It has been said previously, I think by you, that a great difficulty presents itself with regard to the class of sick persons, because there is not the same evidence of destitution in their case as there is in ordinary cases. How can it be said that any sum whatever, spent upon bringing back a sick person to a state of health, or, that any sum spent upon the chronic infirm in any way, makes them equal to the condition of the poorest independent labourer? They are destitute of the means of independence, and I think that Sir Francis Head's remark can only apply to those hangers-on, as he terms them, who are, on the average, physically and mentally equal to the independent labourer, and I do not think that really it could apply to the sick; do you?—I suppose the fact would be that, so far as material comforts are concerned, the sick in workhouse infirmaries are in a far better position than the corresponding class outside; but then the sick person in a workhouse infirmary has a disability of his own, namely, his sickness. No man would voluntarily become sick in order to get the extra comforts of a workhouse.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

5 Feb. 1906.

2679. Does not that, therefore, put him outside the phrase that the hanger-on should not be as well cared for as those on whom he hangs?—I do not think the term "well cared for" occurred; he must be better cared for.

2680. That is my meaning; he must be outside that designation altogether?—Yes. The maxim loses its force when you have a man who, from his circumstances, is in a worse position with regard to health, say, than the independent person.

2681. The sick, in their relation to the independent labourer outside, should be looked upon as in a different category altogether to the ordinary able-bodied person?—Undoubtedly so.

2682. Then I do not see that any difficulty presents itself in arriving at what is destitution in a sick case. Suppose a person has not sufficient money in the household to provide for his cure, then, whatever may happen to him, although he may have sufficient to live upon in the ordinary way, he is destitute in the eye of the law?—Yes; but there will be some difficulty in finding out that fact, because a person might very often conceal his means in order to get inside a workhouse infirmary.

2683. Providing his means were known, and say a special operation were required, or he was suffering from phthisis and required treatment in a sanatorium, although in the ordinary sense the man is not destitute, yet he cannot pay for his cure in a private sanatorium or for the special operation; therefore, from that point of view, he is destitute in the eye of the law, is he not?—You are putting to me an exception to the maxim which I quoted from Sir Francis Head as applied to an individual. If you take it as applying to a class the difficulty that I, at all events, am face to face with is this, that it may be necessary to take a sick person into a workhouse infirmary, but simply because of his sickness and in order to cure him. That, however, is not the ideally best way of doing it. Those cases should be treated by charitable hospitals. But then all poor law history shows this, that if the rates interfere charity is killed absolutely dead; a man will not pay heavy rates for an infirmary, and at the same time subscribe to a hospital. So that you see the poor law maxim is transferred rather from the individual to the community.

Effect of Poor Law hospitals on the provision of voluntary hospitals.

2684. In your experience, is it usually to be relied upon that charity will step in if the poor law refuses to take up the treatment of a special class of cases?—No. What appears to me to be coming about is this, that the great growth of population in the urban centres necessitates a further provision of hospitals and such like institutions, but charity has not provided those institutions. The old charitable institutions are insufficient, and then, perhaps of necessity, the poor rates step in and build what, to all intents and purposes, are rate hospitals. Those rate hospitals having once been built and continuing to be built, I do not think you will get the same charity that you did in the old days. I do not think, for instance, that there will be any more Bartholomew's Hospitals or Guy's Hospitals or St. Thomas's Hospitals for London. I regret the change. Whether it is an inevitable change or not, or what conditions should be imposed on the undertaking by the rates of this duty, is one of the most important questions which I think the Commission will have to deal with; and it is one of extraordinary difficulty and complexity, according to my view.

2685. Do you mean that the greater the extension of hospital accommodation under the poor law and its more efficient administration, the less there will be done by voluntary organisations for sick persons?—That is my fear—and not only that there will be less done by voluntary organisations, but by co-operation among the people themselves.

2686. Do you think that that is already being felt now?—I cannot say.

Classification of workhouse inmates.

2687. In your answer to Question 2343 you dealt with classification, and at the close you say, "I think that the whole classification question has been made too much of." There you are speaking of the classification of the various inmates of a workhouse. You say also, "In my experience classification in that sense according to character or conduct has been more or less dropped"; is not classification being more and more adopted according to character and conduct now than formerly?—Perhaps it is being adopted more now than formerly. I am talking now of classification inside the workhouse. My evidence went to show—and that is a point which you might well put to my colleagues—that I have received very few complaints from inmates to the effect that they are not classified. I think you will find that a great many unions which adopted classification schemes have more or less dropped them.

Method of allocating lunacy grant.

2688. On the question of the treatment of lunatics, county councils now pay to the guardians 4s. per week for each pauper lunatic chargeable; could you tell me whether it is the practice that that payment is only made for completed weeks?—I think it is only made for completed weeks, and that any contributions from the relatives must be considered.

2689. Then if the period were six weeks and six days six weeks only would be paid for?—I think you are right; you probably know.

2690. Have you had any complaints on that score?—No, at any rate not recently.

Question of future disposal of workhouse lunatics.

2691. In the answer to Question 2372 you say that the effect of this grant of 4s. per week "has been to transfer the lunatic from the cheaper workhouse building to the more expensive asylum building, and to raise the cost of maintenance per lunatic to a total cost of perhaps £28 a year. It has often been done within my own knowledge for the express purpose of providing this or that union with additional accommodation. Whether the man is better off in the asylum or in the workhouse, I do not know; personally I should prefer the country workhouse." You say a little further on that you would prefer that all lunatics should be transferred to the county councils?—That they should be made a county charge.

2692. And that all harmless lunatics should come under the same administration?—Yes.

2693. I think you will admit that they are as well cared for in workhouses as they would be in county asylums?—I think that no reasonable complaint can be made of the treatment of imbeciles in workhouses. It is a fact that the Commissioners in Lunacy very seldom raise any complaint whatever as to the treatment of imbeciles who are under the charge of the guardians. It would be open, even under the existing law, for the county councils to arrange with any board of guardians to keep the imbeciles in the workhouse subject to the consent of the Commissioners in Lunacy and of the Local Government Board.

2694. I think you say that the matter might be settled once for all, if all lunatics were made a county charge?—That is so.

2695. Would you advocate arrangements between county councils and boards of guardians for the retention of certain inmates if it were thought fit to retain them, because there were existing the buildings necessary for that class of case?—Yes.

2696. It is a fact, is it not, that there are a great many harmless lunatics already in the county asylums but chargeable to boards of guardians?—There must be.

2697. Yet they have allowed the increased cost to mount up considerably higher than the cost in a workhouse; but no classification has taken place hitherto in county asylums in order to provide cheaply for the harmless cases, has it?—I think there have been some steps in that direction, but as a rule in most counties there are no such arrangements.

2698. I only wanted to ascertain whether you thought it would be likely that the county authorities would be more economical if they had the whole of the harmless lunatics under their charge than they are at the present time when they only have part of them. After all the whole question is one of cost, because the question of treatment is considered satisfactory by you?—I suggest much greater pressure being put on county councils in the direction of cheapening asylums.

2699. Do you not think these cases might be met by boards of guardians having the grant for all harmless lunatics in their charge, if the accommodation is considered satisfactory by the board ?—You must remember that this question arose on the report of the Cottage Homes Committee which was made in 1899 in which they say definitely that in their opinion persons of unsound mind should be removed from the workhouse.

2700. To another institution ?—Yes.

2701. But they do not recommend that they should be transferred and become a county charge, do they ?—I rather think they do.

2702. This is the recommendation I have in mind, "Your Committee think that however preferable uniformity of administration may be it will be necessary to make exceptions to meet cases of this kind, and they suggest that it might be practicable in such a case to permit the guardians to retain the imbeciles and epileptics in their charge, receiving from the county council for each imbecile and epileptic so retained the payment which your Committee have recommended should be made to boards of guardians in respect of the maintenance of imbeciles in the county institution. Such a privilege should be dependent on a certificate to be granted by the Local Government Board that the separate accommodation for imbeciles and epileptics in the workhouse is adequate in every way, and that there is adequate accommodation in the rest of the workhouse for the proper classification of the inmates" ?—The point that the Cottage Homes Committee were dealing with was this: Here was a proposal to transfer imbeciles from workhouses altogether, not for the sake of the imbecile and not for the sake of economy, which is the basis of my proposals, but for the sake of the other inmates. They naturally had to consider the case of those unions which have imbecile wards absolutely and entirely distinct from the rest of the workhouse; and they make their proposals in order to meet that case. If, for instance, you go to the Brighton workhouse, as I trust you will, there you will find an entire block of buildings for the imbeciles separated from all the rest with a separate staff of attendants and practically arranged in such a way that the other inmates could not possibly be troubled with the imbeciles because they never see them.

2703. Their recommendations, I take it, meant that they ought to be moved from the workhouses for the sake of the inmates and not because they would be better either under the county authority or under any other authority. I think you will find that they say on that head, "your Committee are disposed to think that the central authority should be the Local Government Board rather than the Lunacy Commissioners and the Home Office. Such details as the mode of admission of inmates should be regulated by the Local Government Board, who should have powers, as regards those institutions, similar to those which they possess as regards the asylums for imbeciles provided by the Metropolitan Asylums Board." Therefore, that all points to a separate institution and to its not becoming a county charge. I take it you disagree with that ?—I should rather like to read that report again as my memory is not very clear about it. The question is solved if you put all the persons of unsound mind into the hands of one local administrative body. They will then be able to classify their asylums and when they want to build a new asylum, instead of building an expensive asylum, they will build a cheaper sort of asylum (rather on workhouse lines) for the imbeciles and retain their very expensive buildings for the dangerous and incurable. Then in cases where the workhouse accommodation is ample, they will make arrangements with the guardians to keep the imbeciles there, so as to avoid fresh building. An additional ground for that proposal is the financial ground. I will give you an illustration. There is in Sussex a union of a very large rateable value indeed—it has a rateable value of one-fourth of the entire county of East Sussex. The county of East Sussex is proceeding to build a new asylum which, we will say, cost £400,000 or something like £400 a bed—I trust it will not be more than that. The union I have in mind, having one-fourth of the rateable value of the county, is responsible for a fourth of that expenditure; that is, they are responsible for the service of the debt on say £100,000. But they have only ninety-two lunatics in that union, so that their responsibility for that building amounts to over £1,000 a bed for each of their lunatics. I think that is a financial consideration which has got to be borne in mind. It seems to me that it would be best to forget the union altogether and let the county take charge of these people.

2704. You believe, then, that all certified lunatics ought to be dealt with by one authority ?—Yes.

2705. And that should be the county ?—That should be the county as being the only one competent for the purpose.

2706. Do you not thereby create another anomaly, namely, that part of the paupers would be under the charge of the guardians and part of them would be under the charge of the county authority ?—Paupers now who happen to be lunatics are under the charge of two authorities locally and two authorities centrally, which is what I want to avoid. In this case I suppose they would be paupers in the sense that they are paid for out of the rates, but they are not paupers under the administration of the guardians, and they are not paupers to whom the granting of relief has to be considered from the point of view of whether it is a mischief to the independent people or not. Personally, I should not consider anybody certified under the Act of 1890 as a lunatic as a pauper at all; I would call him a man who from the necessity of the case has to be chargeable to the rates, and I would take him out of the administration of the guardians, and I would pay for him out of the State funds.

2707. I suppose you would mean that to apply to all chronic cases of lunacy ?—Yes. A man cannot make himself a lunatic; he becomes a lunatic by the act of God, and he is an unfortunate person who has got to be considered from quite a different point of view to the man who makes himself a pauper.

Supplements to outdoor relief.

2708. In your answer to Question 2413 you say, "All the experts are unanimous in thinking that all domiciliary relief is and must practically be supplemented by earnings and other sources of income. The fact is that where guardians are obliged by force of circumstances to undertake the whole cost of the relief, it is always indoor relief." Is not that rather too sweeping a statement ?—I have not the slightest doubt that you could produce to me an exception here and there in some unions; therefore it is perhaps rather too sweeping; but I adhere to it entirely as a general statement.

2709. Take the case of a union where there is a large number of aged people who are past work, and who are living with their relatives and friends; the relief they get would cover practically the whole of the cost of their maintenance under the conditions under which they are living, and I cannot see that that would have the slightest effect upon the labour market outside or upon the earnings of the rest of the family ?—I do not think that in the answer you have quoted I have said anything about the labour market outside. I have only said that the relief must be supplemented in some way or other. In the case that you put before me the relief is obviously supplemented, because the people live with their relations. All I say, so far as that is concerned, is that practically every case of outdoor relief must be supplemented in some way or other; where it is supplemented by earnings the point is raised whether that does not tend to decrease the earnings of independent people.

2710. Take the case where these aged people are living by themselves; they are living under conditions which are quite satisfactory to the guardians, and in many cases those people are provided with all necessaries by the guardians under those circumstances ?—They are living with their own folk, are they not ?

2711. In the case I am putting now they are living alone. You would deprecate any extension of that practice, I take it ?—I do not say so in the answer you have quoted; but I do not like any outdoor relief, because it is so open to abuse. If, however, you produce to me a case of a pauper who does not work so as to interfere with the labour market, who does not have children, and who is properly cared for, then I say that the main objections to his getting outdoor relief are done away with. It would be rather pedantic to say that such a person should not get outdoor relief; but he would have to fulfil those three conditions.

Conditions under which outdoor relief is unobjectionable.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

5 Feb. 1906.

The policy of classification.

2712. Then comes this question: If you do not grant outdoor relief in a case of that kind, ought you not to have a better classification inside, so as to a certain extent to prevent people of that class from being compelled to mix with the class of persons whom you have described in your evidence?—Yes. That was the theory of all those Committees and Commissions which sat in what I shall presently deal with as the political period of Poor Law administration, that is to say, onwards from 1895. These schemes were thrown out partly against pensions and partly against indiscriminate outdoor relief, and they were to a certain extent carried out; and when I come a little later on to the question of cost you will see what has happened in consequence.

2713. If that class of case is not to be given outdoor relief, has it not always seemed to those who are administering the law that they ought to provide institutional relief which would be more acceptable than the present form?—Yes.

2714. But I take it that you would deprecate all this form of classification which is the only means of getting the guardians to adopt institutional relief rather than outdoor relief?—I am not deprecating classification; I am merely stating the fact that I think classification has been made too much of, because the people do not appreciate it as we hoped they would. Another fact is that classification has been to some extent dropped. As I say, I do not deprecate it at all, but I do say that you ought to have some regard to the wishes of the people themselves in this matter of classification, and, as I pointed out, they may not prefer to live with certain people with whom you would classify them.

The proper subjects for out-relief.

2715. In the answer to Q. 2422 you defined the class of persons who you think might be dealt with by out-door relief, and you say, "I submit there is the very strongest ground for holding that any out-door relief which is given must be given with the greatest care and discrimination, and must be reserved for those exceptional cases who are unfortunately bound to be dependent on their neighbours by their own misfortune, in other words, for the irreducible minimum." What class of case had you in your mind as being an unfortunate case?—I do not know that I had any particular case in my mind, but I have plenty of cases, as, for instance, a man who has belonged to an unsound benefit society which has broken down, or the man who has in some way or another lost his savings, or the man who has had a long illness and has come to the end of his resources.

2716. He would be the most likely person to have exceptional treatment over other classes in the way of out-door relief, would he not?—Yes.

2717. Assuming that you would grant that, would you not also say that relief ought to be given sufficient to cover the whole cost of his living rather than that he should be compelled to go into an institution?—I do not think so. I think in nine cases out of ten he would really be better off in an institution.

2718. Then you would dispose of all this class entirely?—I should not mind giving him out-door relief if he were in other respects suitable and if he fulfilled my other conditions.

2719. Sufficient to meet all his requirements?—Yes.

Charity vice out-relief.

2720. In the answer to Q. 2430 I think you stated that the strict administration of out-door relief tends to a reduction in in-door relief; does your experience show that in those unions where it has been tried charity has been more or less equal to dealing with those cases that must be dealt with by charity?—I think you will find on investigation of the circumstances of these unions that a strict administration of out-door relief has stimulated charity.

2721. You think that is so in your experience?—In my experience it certainly has been so.

Effect of parochial representation on boards of guardians.

2722. In answer to Q. 2432 you dealt with the subject of the representation being parochial, while the charge was a union charge, and you said that that took away to a certain extent what I might term the judgment of the parochial representative in dealing with those cases strictly according to their needs?—I think it must have some influence.

2723. Have you thought out any means of getting over the difficulty, such as whether parochial representation should be abolished, or any other method adopted?—It has often been suggested that parochial representation should be abolished. As you are aware, in large towns there is the division into wards for electoral purposes. There is this against it, however, that a board of guardians should represent all parts of the union, and therefore I should not like to see the parish system abolished, difficult as it is to work and unequally as it does work. There are evident advantages in having representatives from all parts of the union, even for such a comparatively small matter as the visiting of the poor in the workhouse. It is a great check on maladministration that the inmate should occasionally see a guardian who comes from his own neighbourhood.

2724. Then I take it you believe that the parochial representation could scarcely be altered?—I think not.

2725. In what other way would you get over the difficulty in order to insure better administration on the part of the parochial representative; could it be compulsorily arranged that no man should deal with a case of relief arising in the parish he represented?—I have often suggested that to boards of guardians, but with very poor success.

2726. That would avoid any patronage being exercised by the parish representatives, would it not?—Yes; it would certainly be better.

2727. But it would be a most difficult thing to enforce, would it not?—Most difficult, because there is always this plausible excuse for it, that the person from the applicant's parish knows most about him.

2728. And for that reason the rest of the board are willing to fall in with the suggestions of the parish representative?—That is it.

2729. This mal-administration must continue then?—I do not say that it is a grave sort of mal-administration. I only say that I have put before the Commission all the reasons which will account for the very large proportion of out-door relief which is given; and that is one of them.

Cottage Homes Committee's recommendation as to imbeciles and epileptics.

2730. Probably we shall hear more on that point from other witnesses?—Yes. May I go back to your questions (See Q. 2699, etc.) in regard to the Report of the Select Committee on Cottage Homes? Here is the paragraph which I was thinking of. First of all they say "that all pauper imbeciles and epileptics should be provided for outside the workhouse."

2731. That is, in separate institutions?—Yes, in separate institutions. Then they say "Your Committee consider that these separate institutions should be provided by the councils of counties and county boroughs. These councils now are charged with the provision of asylums at which pauper lunatics are maintained, the guardians paying the cost of maintenance. Your Committee do not suggest that pauper imbeciles and epileptics should be admitted to the lunatic asylums, but that separate institutions should be provided expressly for their accommodation. Such institutions need not be so costly as lunatic asylums, as the inmates would not require the elaborate accommodation and attention which is essential for lunatics." The only point on which I go further than that is that I suggest that the whole cost should be charged upon the county; and I also suggest that it should be borne by the county as a charge from which the word "lunatic" might very well be expunged.

2732. You assume that the separate institution is under the county?—Yes.

2733. But the Committee further on say that is not what they mean?—They go on to state certain exceptions.

2734. They say that the institution should be under the Local Government Board rather than under the Lunacy Commissioners, and that points to a separate institution entirely, not to county asylums, I take it; it is a setting up of another authority and another class of institution, apart from county asylums and workhouses?—These would be separate institutions under the county authorities and under the inspection of the Local Government Board. I say the whole administration ought to be transferred absolutely.

Proposed restriction on out-door medical relief.

2735. With regard to the question of relief on loan which you deal with at Q. 2441, could not that difficulty be overcome by restricting the medical relief in out-door cases to those who are in such a state of destitution that their wages are not of a sufficient amount to enable you to recover by way of loan? Recovering an amount granted by way of loan for medical relief means repayment by small weekly sums, does it not, because you could not get it all at once from such a person?—That is so.

2736. Therefore it must be by small sums?—Yes.

2737. I believe the practice of a medical man generally working among the poor, is to send a collector weekly to his patients for instalments of the money due to him?—I believe that is so.

2738. If, therefore, medical relief was restricted to those cases where a man's weekly wages did not allow him to bear the burden of a weekly repayment, there would not be much point in giving relief on loan; it therefore seems to me that this giving of relief on loan, so far as medical aid is concerned, is rather over-rated; do you think so?—The comparative amount is small, but it involves the important principle that free medical relief will interfere with provident societies and efforts of that kind to induce the poor to provide for themselves.

Instance of abuse of pay stations.

2739. It is suggested that all medical relief should be given on loan; do you agree with that?—No; I think it would be rather absurd to give a man relief on loan when it is perfectly obvious that he cannot repay it; and I have always had a sort of misgiving about it, because I think if medical relief were given on loan guardians might be apt to give it more indiscriminately even than they do now.

2740. At. Q. 2501, dealing with relieving officers, you say "The fact is that you will find, as between one union and another, a great want of uniformity in the number of cases which are looked after by the various relieving officers." Do you find that that applies to urban unions as much as it does to rural unions?—Yes; I think that the inequality in the areas and the populations under the relieving officers applies everywhere.

2741. Have you at all thought out what should be the number of cases you think a relieving officer is competent to look after?—It depends very much upon the size of his district. The acreage is of even more importance than the numbers.

2742. Do you find it pretty general that there is an insufficient number of relieving officers for the work that they have to do?—It is so in a great many unions; but I should not say it is so generally.

2743. We shall get evidence upon that from the inspectors, I suppose?—I think you will have more detailed evidence from them. The Commission will bear in mind that one of the difficulties about the relieving officer has been that he has so often had to fill other appointments. He is the vaccination officer; and he used to be the school attendance officer, registrar of births, and so on.

2744. At Q. 2518 you deal with the question of what are sometimes called relief stations, but what are, I believe, properly termed pay stations?—Yes.

2745. You agree with the proposal to abolish pay stations?—I think practically they ought to be abolished, but in saying that I should add that occasionally you may have a need for one.

2746. In a great many unions there is a pay clerk who pays the relief instead of the relieving officer, is there not?—Yes.

2747. And the relieving officer never touches the money at all?—That is so.

2748. In that case, could you abolish these pay stations easily?—No. In very large unions where there is a pay clerk, a pay station is a very useful institution in a way. Still, where there is a pay clerk, it is obvious that the relieving officer has not got the same check that he has where there is not a pay clerk, and he has to pay at the paupers' own homes.

2749. I take it that the reason why you would abolish pay stations is because you think their abolition would compel the relieving officer to visit more frequently the homes of the people, because he would then have to take the pay to them?—Yes.

2750. All these visits have to be reported by the relieving officer in his Application and Report Book, have they not?—That is so.

2751. And that book comes before the guardians every time a case of relief is dealt with?—Yes.

2752. If short orders were granted instead of long ones—and I understand you recommend at most that they should be granted for one month at a time—then it would come to the notice of the guardians whether the relieving officer had visited a given house within a month?—Yes; and that would meet one of the main reasons why I think pay stations should be abolished. I should like to give the Commissioners an illustration of the sort of thing I am thinking of. It is a very striking instance of what may go on when you have pay stations. There is a parish, the squire of which happened to be a friend of mine, and I knew his servants. The relieving officer had a pay station at the gardener's house, and he used to leave all the money with the wife to be distributed among the paupers in the parish. She was a very sensible woman, and she did not always distribute the relief in the same proportion that the guardians had ordered it. She checked their orders by her own knowledge of the people, and her own good sense. Some of the good ones got 7s. 6d., and some of the worse ones got 6d., and were told they were very lucky to get anything I watched this for some time with a great deal of amusement; and then to my regret I had to stop it.

2753. (Chairman.) Was the result an economy to the parish?—I think the relief was better administered than when the guardians did it.

2754. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) What had the relieving officer to say for himself in that case?—I forget what he said.

2755. Was he continued in office?—Yes; the guardians did not seem to think very much of it.

2756. (Mr. Bentham.) You cannot say that pay stations ought to be abolished in their entirety; you admit that there must be exceptions?—I think you will probably find exceptions in large urban unions where you give heavy relief in kind, or where you have pay clerks.

2757. Generally speaking you think pay stations are mischievous?—Yes.

Woman as relieving officer.

2758. (Chairman.) Is the relieving officer ever a woman?—The board have always protested against it, but I think there is one case where a woman was appointed.

Case-paper system.

2759. (Mr. Bentham.) To go to another point, you have told us that for a good many years some boards of guardians have adopted what are known as case papers, as constituting a much fuller record of the circumstances of the pauper than is possible under the Application and Report Book; has this system always been successful where you have known it adopted?—It has always proved successful where I have known it adopted, but that has not been in very many cases.

2760. I take it that the case paper is the only record that is kept in the office and that there is no record in any other book or document, but that all the documents relating to the case are kept together in each case paper; is that not the practice?—Unless they have a register of cases, which, I think, is the practice.

2761. Do they keep a register where they adopt the case paper system?—I think so.

2762. Only for the sake of the number, I take it; the register gives no other particulars?—It just gives the number and the name.

2763. Has it ever come to your knowledge that these case papers sometimes get misplaced, and then all record is lost entirely?—I have not met with such a case.

2764. You would not usually lose a book; but you might lose a paper if that is the only record that is kept?—I have known an instance where it was thought desirable by the master to disinfect the workhouse books owing to a case of small-pox, and they all got burnt.

The irreducible minimum of pauperism.

2765. (Professor Smart.) You have spoken of the irreducible minimum of pauperism; you mean, I presume, the case of those for whom the State will always have to make provision?—The State or charity.

2766. (Chairman.) I put to you two questions upon that: I asked you, were the 1 per cent. all those who had to be supported by the State or the rates, or by their friends and you said, as I understood you, that the 1 per cent were those who were incapable of maintaining themselves?—Yes.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

5 Feb. 1906.

2767. My recollection of your evidence further is that you accounted for the difference between that 1 per cent., which is 10 per 1,000, and the actual number on the rates, by saying that a certain proportion were maintained by their friends?—Yes. Of course the Commission will understand that the 1 per cent. is a very tentative figure, to which I do not adhere. In arriving at that figure I included the people, like those in blind asylums and cripples' homes, who are maintained by charity and not by the State or by the rates.

2768. (Professor Smart.) You did not want to clearly separate off charity from the State at that time; but I understood you to mean that there was an irreducible minimum which would always require to be maintained by the State, irrespective of all other provisions?—What I meant was that there was a number of persons who would have to be maintained by somebody or other, and that that number I termed the irreducible minimum. I said that there must be a certain number of impotent folk who must be kept in an institution ultimately. That is what it came to.

Economists and abolition of poor law.

2769. Would you agree with Ricardo when he said that no scheme for the amendment of the Poor Laws merits the least attention which has not their abolition for its ultimate object?—I know that Malthus, Ricardo, Lord Brougham and a number of thinkers of that period were of the opinion that the Poor Law should be abolished, and that it was a pure mischief; and more people were of opinion that the only justification of a Poor Law was that it should be so administered that ultimately it would become unnecessary. The first Commissioners, I think, quite clearly did not agree with Ricardo. You may remember that in their report they say that under certain conditions relief might be given even beneficially. Their language throughout is not the language of people who thought that the Poor Law should be abolished at once.

The irreducible minimum of pauperism.

2770. Might we not say that the ultimate object of the Poor Law is the relief of a certain portion of this irreducible minimum?—Yes.

2771. Is it not our first duty as a Commission to find out what the irreducible minimum is?—I should think it would be a very useful and very onerous task.

2772. In theory, the proper object of the Poor Law is surely the very first thing we have to deal with; and that includes the question whether the Poor Law could be abolished altogether or whether relief plus charity should be a State provision?—In other words, that the object of the Poor Law would be to relieve such numbers of the irreducible minimum as are not relieved by charity, and so to administer the law that nobody else shall get any relief. That, I suppose, would be the statement of the stalwart economists.

2773. So far as I see, there are three ways of dealing with the destitute—through blood relations, through charity, and by the State, is that not so—I think you have said that somewhere?—I am only hesitating because I was rather taken by surprise and a quartum quid might occur to one afterwards—I mean another alternative might present itself.

2774. Perhaps you will tell us if an alternative crops up in your mind as we go along. I suppose you would say that the method of provision by means of blood relations is much the preferable way?—Yes.

2775. And that you would always exhaust this means first?—Yes.

Extension of duty of maintenance.

2776. Of course in the case of poor people that is a very limited means. Would you extend the duty beyond the blood relations you have mentioned, say to brothers and sisters?—I think not. The only suggestion for the extension with which I am acquainted is, that the chargeability should be extended to grandchildren for their grandparents. In England grandparents are responsible for their grandchildren, but the grandchildren are not responsible for their grandparents.

2777. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) I rather think it is different in Scotland?—It is certain to be, I think.

2778. (Professor Smart.) I understand you would always try to persuade even outside relations to recognise a moral claim?—Yes; and I should try and persuade masters in the case of servants to recognise the moral claim of an old servant on his old employer.

Respective spheres of charity and relief.

2779 Am I wrong in assuming that where there is a choice between charity and the State you would prefer the work to be done by charity?—I would.

2780. I suppose there are two reasons for that—one is the case of endowed charities where the money is there, at any rate, waiting to be used and cannot be used in any other way; and, therefore, where there is already a fund provided, there would be no sense in taxing the ratepayer as well as applying the endowed charity?—One of the difficulties of administering charities is, that in many cases where the administrator thinks he is relieving the individual, he is really relieving the rates.

2781. The second and more serious reason I think is, that charity is not a right of the poor; they cannot claim it, and, therefore, it does not enter into their calculations; whereas, if they knew that a State provision is waiting for them, they are tempted to unthrift?—That is a statement of the theory.

2782. Am I right, then, in saying that the superiority of charity to State relief is, from this point of view, that charity is necessarily limited and cannot be depended upon?—That is it. I should add that another reason for the preference of charity to Poor Law relief is, that a man who does an act of charity is doing himself good, whereas the guardian who gives relief and thinks he is doing an act of charity is doing himself harm.

2783. You extend the moral sphere?—You do.

2784. Then you would agree with Ricardo, I imagine, that if by law every human being who wants support could be sure to obtain it, and to obtain it in such a degree as to make life tolerably comfortable, theory would lead one to expect that all the other taxes put together would be light compared with the single one for the Poor Rate?—That is so. I have here an extract from the Politics of Aristotle which I turned up the other day. It runs in this way: "Where there are revenues the demagogues should not be allowed after their manner to distribute the surplus: The poor are always receiving and always wanting more and more, for such help is like pouring water into a jar with holes in it."

2785. (Mr. Lansbury.) Did not Aristotle include any other class but the poor?—I am only quoting what he says. Perhaps you would like me to finish the quotation—"Yet a true friend of the people should see that they be not too poor, for extreme poverty demoralises the democracy."

2786. (Professor Smart.) That, of course, is the reason why, if you have a Poor Law, you must make the position of the pauper less desirable than the position of the independent labourer?—Yes; or, as it is put more accurately, the condition of the pauper shall be, or shall appear to be, less desirable than that of the independent labourer. I think the words "shall appear to be" are important.

2787. That indicates another advantage as regards charity, namely, that if you can throw the poor man on to charity, you need have no scruple about making him fairly comfortable, for charity being uncertain and limited, it cannot be depended on and this uncertainty of getting the charity is a sufficient deterrent in itself?—Yes.

2788. Would you go the length, then, of saying that we should all like that every person who has fallen into destitution through no fault of his own should be as well provided for as the wealth of the community will allow, so long as this provision cannot be depended on and does not act as an inducement to unthrift?—I agree.

2789. In short, the inducement to unthrift is the dangerous thing?—Yes; but I should not like to say it was the most dangerous thing. The most dangerous thing is the interference with the labour market and with wages and with earnings.

Constituents of the irreducible minimum of pauperism.

2790. In the light of these principles I want to get your idea of the irreducible minimum. It contains first, I imagine, widows and children: their case is very clear?—It would not have occurred to me that theirs was a very clear case. I should not have included them, and I did not mean that class of case.

2791. Of course, I mean destitute widows and children. If a widow has a number of children, she must either neglect her children or practically earn no wage ?—I think I shall answer your question if I say that widows and children were certainly not in my contemplation when I talked about the irreducible minimum.

2792. Not destitute widows and children ?—I should not have said so. I said there would be cases where women might be able to support children.

2793. Say widows with large families ?—That again was not the class of case which I was contemplating. I was contemplating more those cases which rest on physical disability and which must be helped.

2794. I am afraid that we in Scotland do count the widow and her children as forming a very large portion of our work ?—Here, too, they are a very large and a most difficult portion of the work ; but they were not in my mind when I was talking about the irreducible minimum.

2795. Would you put deserted wives and their children in the same category as widows and children ?—Yes.

2796. With this difference perhaps, that the widows and their children could be thrown more freely on charity than the deserted wives and their children ?—Yes.

2797. Inasmuch as in the one case you would have to set the law in motion ?—Yes. Our Poor Law experience in England is wholly unfavourable to deserted wives.

2798. Another case, and, I think, a very clear case of the irreducible minimum, is that of the sick, the impotent, the feeble-minded and the lunatic ; I suppose there would be no doubt about those ?—Yes—and the crippled and the blind.

2799. Of course neither sickness nor lunacy in itself has a claim on the State ; I mean to say that if a man has a sick child or a feeble-minded child, he should support it just as he supports his other children ?—Yes, he should.

2800. But there are a great many instances, of course, where the case is quite clearly one for the State ?—Yes.

2801. The last class is, I think, the aged poor ; do you consider those part of the irreducible minimum ?—No ; but some of them would be.

2802. Would you exclude them on the ground that it might tend to improvidence ?—I did not use the phrase "irreducible minimum" with any idea of the consequences following from their relief. I only wanted to bring out what I believe to be a statistical fact, namely, that a certain proportion of the people must of necessity be kept in institutions, and this fact also, that, as you reduce your Poor Law relief, you get nearer and nearer to that irreducible minimum and reduction becomes increasingly difficult as you get nearer and nearer to that point.

2803. Of course the aged poor might be dealt with by an old age pension scheme ?—I have not prepared evidence about an old age pension scheme.

2804. They are not necessarily a part of the irreducible minimum ?—No. An old age pension scheme is a very good illustration. We are told that old people in workhouses could be provided for under such a scheme, but I think you will find that there are large numbers—perhaps 90 per cent. —who, owing to their infirmities, could not be provided for except in an institution.

2805. Even if you had an old age pension scheme, do you not think a good deal of the work would fall upon the State all the same ? I have in my mind just now a case of a soldier with a pension of 7s. a week. He lives in the poorhouse and they charge him 4s. 6d. for maintenance ; he gets his pension once in three months, when he discharges himself, drinks himself nearly dead in a couple of days, and returns a wreck ?—I hope the Commission will take the opportunity of going to Chatham or Portsmouth on a pension day.

ws and en.

2806. I wish to recur to the widows and their children ; have you any rough idea of what proportion of the expense of the poor relief is incurred on their account ?—The Commission, I think, will be able to get those questions answered either from the statistical memoranda which will be sent in, or from some evidence which I shall give a little later on when we come to the question of cost.

2807. Is it an important percentage at all ?—It is a very important percentage.

2808. I think you will agree that when this class does come upon society these people should be regarded not as persons who have sinned ; because a husband dies and leaves his wife and children in poverty that is no ground for penalising them, and therefore the state of these people should be made as comfortable as possible, should it not ?—The condition of every dependent person should be made as comfortable as is consistent with public policy.

2809. But there is no reason for penalising them in order to deter others from following their example ? There are such things as imprudent marriages.

2810. But there are not such things as husbands committing suicide for the sake of putting their wives upon a fund ?—No.

Relief of widows and children in Scotland.

2811. What would be your criticism of the Scottish system of invariably giving this class outdoor relief except where the mother is vicious ? I may be asking an ignorant question, but the reason for it is that I am a Scotsman, and I have heard nothing but denunciation of the outdoor relief system since I came here, and so I want to put before you some of our cases in order to see what your answer is. When a widow with her children applies to us for relief we first ascertain what blood relations she has and then we ascertain what she is getting from charities or from friendly societies. If these two sources are not enough we give her so much for herself and so much for each child, on the assumption that she is able to do some work, such as washing or charing or office-keeping. We look on the relief as an addition to her other revenue enabling her to do her duty by her children. Our first principle is to keep the home together ; we do not take the children from her, or divide her from the children, except where she is not to be trusted with the care of them. I want to know from you what your criticism of outdoor relief is in this special case ?—I am naturally nervous about criticising any system of Poor Law relief which is not my own.

2812. I am afraid we require criticism, because we do not often get it ?—The Scottish system is one of outdoor relief entirely, and differs so very materially from ours in the prohibition of relief to able-bodied men that it is very difficult to criticise individual cases from the English point of view. But I should say in that case that in the first place you are clearly and obviously giving out-door relief in aid of wages. You will find out by an investigation most likely that where you have many of those cases the wages of women are lower than they ought to be. As I have suggested, that is not a matter on which I am disposed to dogmatise, and I only put it forward as a matter, which, in my judgment, ought to be very carefully investigated. In the next place I should think that in most of those cases the widow lives in great poverty, that is to say, that even your relief and the amount of her wages are not sufficient for her to live and thrive upon ; that therefore her children probably will not be brought up quite as they ought to be, and that it would on the whole and in the long run be better for some of those children to receive institutional relief. That is the sort of criticism I should make on your case. When cases are put to one they are always the most difficult ones that are chosen, and the question of the relief of widows is an especially difficult one, because very often if when the woman comes before the board of guardians she looks nice and tidy, Poor Law principles are cast aside altogether and the guardians act on sympathy.

2813. Still we may, and we do, give large sums in this way in order to keep the widow in such a position as that she may do her duty by the children ; and it is quite possible to regard that as cheap if you thereby preserve the unity of the family ?—There are some families the unity of which is of inestimable value ; but as to some families the sooner they are broken up the better.

Relief of aged poor in Scotland.

2814. We do that, of course, where necessary. Then I want your criticism of our outdoor relief to the aged poor. In Scotland we hold that where an aged couple becomes destitute we should preserve their home, and by giving a small sum we find that in consideration of other sources (such as friends, charities, and so on, and perhaps a little work) such aged couples may be kept together and look after one another. Is there any very marked inducement to improvidence in that ? The breadwinner, you see, has always to count on the probability of one of the two not reaching old age, in which case the survivor would have to go into the House ?—It would seem to me that there the general principles of provision for old age would apply. I admit the great difficulty of a board of guardians doing an act which seems harsh to this or that old woman that they see before them on the ground that their action is for the ultimate benefit of the class from which the applicant comes. That is very hard; but still it seems to me that their duty is to restrict outdoor relief as far as possible, though, as I have said, where there is nothing else against it except what I may call the doctrinal effect of it, one is rather apt to think that outdoor relief may be given without much mischief.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

5 Feb. 1906.

English out-relief policy.

2815. On the other hand, do you not think that a good deal of the distrust and hatred of the poor law system in England is very much due to this frequent breaking up of the home of old couples?—I do not think it is. I demur to two things; I should not describe the feeling towards the poor law as being one of distrust and hatred; and in the next place I think on the whole that the right administration is one which is not adopted. There are very few unions indeed that are really strict; there are very few boards of guardians in all England that would not give outdoor relief to such a couple as you have described. It is given all over the country. The official statement as to outdoor relief is given in Mr. Chaplin's circular of 1900 as follows:—"The board consider that aged deserving persons should not be urged to enter the workhouse at all unless there is some cause which renders such a course necessary, such as infirmity of mind or body, the absence of house accommodation or of a suitable person to care for them, or some similar cause, but that they should be relieved by having adequate outdoor relief granted to them." That is the last circular which has been issued on the subject.

Effect of charity and of poor relief.

2816. (Mr. Booth.) I gather that Professor Smart has suggested that the uncertainty attaching to what may be received from charity makes it less demoralising and attractive; but I feel that there is another side to that; for instance, whatever may be the advantages which may come from betting, uncertainty does not make it less demoralising and attractive. I should have thought with regard to outdoor relief too that one of the great demoralising advantages is that very thing, that they may hope to get it but may after all not get it; I should not have thought therefore that uncertainty was any security from demoralisation; what do you say?—What are called speculative applications for outdoor relief no doubt are very demoralising; but still the certainty of relief being given if you are destitute and if you will only fulfil certain conditions so as to be put in the status of a pauper is, I think, much more demoralising to a man than the expectation that he may get charity.

Constituents of the irreducible minimum of pauperism.

2817. (Chairman.) To clear up the point as regards your estimate of the irreducible minimum of pauperism, which is an important one, do you include in your tentative figure of 1·1 per cent., those who from infirmity, from physical or mental defects, or from sickness are unable to maintain themselves?—Yes.

2818. But you do not include in that figure any proportion of paupers who are exempt from those ailments?—No.

Position of widow who refuses indoor relief.

2819. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) May I ask what would happen in England in the case of a widow and her children if she declined the indoor relief that was offered?—Do you mean if they were really necessitous persons?

2820. Yes; what would happen in the case which Professor Smart has taken in Scotland? The poorhouse there is regarded as a test for the sick and infirm. In the case of a respectable widow and her children who was offered only the poorhouse, if her parish council suggested that and it was referred to me whether the poorhouse only should be offered to them, I am afraid I should say no?—What would happen in England in practice would probably be that you would hear nothing more about her, because somebody would look after her.

2821. That is to say, she would be helped through charity?—Yes, that would probably be the case in practice. If the family were destitute and the mother still declined to go into the workhouse, that would soon become a sudden and urgent case, because they would be starving, and the relieving officer would then have to relieve them as a sudden and urgent case till the next meeting of the guardians.

2822. Following that up, do you not think it would be a good thing if in the event of the guardians saying, We offer you nothing but indoor relief, there was a power of appeal on the part of the applicant?—No; I do not think there should be a power of appeal. I think that would be cumbrous, and that it would be decided by a body which might be very much under political influences.

Appeal against inadequate relief.

2823. Not the Local Government Board?—I think it might be, and also conceivably it might be decided by a person who would have very small acquaintance with the reasons which induced the guardians to take that particular line in that case.

Relief of widows with children.

2824. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) Surely in few cases the alternative is between the workhouse and out-relief, it is between the schools for the children and out-relief?—I was coming to that. In England there is no union I know of which habitually says to a widow and her children, We will not relieve you. There are a few that you will hear of in the course of the evidence about which you can read at great length in the report of the Lords' Committee of 1888, where the guardians say to an able-bodied widow, You shall support two of the children, and we will take the rest of them into the workhouse as a means of relieving you. The object of that is partly as a test of destitution and partly to provide for the better education of the children. A widow with a large family of children is rather overburdened with their care, and she is not able to go out to work, therefore the children become neglected. There are, therefore, many reasons why boards of guardians should adopt that policy. On the other hand, I am bound to say—though it may not be an answer to the question—that I personally have misgivings rather about it because I think that it may very soon (and I think there are indications that it has happened already) cease to be a test at all, and that widows may come forward in order to get their children sent to schools where absolutely the best education which is given to anybody of that class in England is given; and that would be a very serious thing.

2825. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Then, as I understand you, the result is in any case that the household is broken up, and the widow and her children are separated?—The widow parts with some of her children for the sake of her children, as I presume we all have to do. The position is exactly the same—for the good of her children she parts with them exactly as for the good of our boys we send them to school.

2826. (Mr. Lansbury.) Are not the unions which say to the woman, "You must either send your children in or have no relief," looked upon as the best administered unions in the country?—Yes. They are very few in number, and I think they are nearly all in London.

2827. There is no choice given to the woman at all; if she wants relief either for herself or for the children it must be indoors?—I have often heard a board of guardians try to persuade a woman for her own good to let the children go into the school; but some unions simply say, No, that is our rule.

2828. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) In the case which Professor Smart figured, the children would go to the public schools?—Yes, and so would all children. The difficulty that is felt is that the children of very poor widows are not properly done by and cannot be properly done by at home; but as a matter of practice you will find that in ninety-nine unions out of a hundred in England out-door relief is given to every widow, in point of fact, who satisfies the guardians that she is destitute and has more than one child, or, at most, two children.

2829. (Mrs. Webb.) Even if she is earning something, if she has more than the one child she is regarded as destitute?—Yes.

2830. (Mr. Booth.) Are her children at all boarded out with her, and does she ever receive money for taking charge of her children in the same way as money would be paid if they were boarded out with some stranger?—The usual order is 2s. 6d. or 3s. to the mother, and so much for each child; then in order to see that the children shall not starve, a certain amount of relief is given in kind, that is, in the shape of bread.

2831. (Mrs. Webb.) But she never gets the boarding-out order?—No, she never gets the boarding-out terms; she never gets the 5s. a week for each child.

2832. (Mr. Booth.) Would she if she had her children on those terms, be subject to inspection as though they were boarded out?—I do not think that is ever contemplated.

2833. (Sir Samuel Provis.) They do not regard that relief as boarding-out at all, do they?—No.

2834. It is not boarding out at all, although the guardians may arrive at the amount in a particular way?—Yes. She is not paid for the children by such a scale as the boarding-out scale.

2835. (Mr. Booth.) Would there be any inspection, as if they were boarded out?—If the doctrine which I hold is true—that when the guardians have put a man by their semi-judicial decision into the status of a pauper, they are bound to look after him altogether, then I cannot help thinking that there should be some sort of visitation and inspection on a much more careful scale than is now done by relieving officers in the case of a widow with children in order to see that the children are properly looked after.

2836. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Is there no visitation nor inspection now?—The relieving officer visits as he does in every other case; but supposing the relieving officer gives the relief, as in laxly administered unions very often would be the case, at a pay station, then one of the children would be sent for the relief and taught, "That is the source that you are going to get help from."

2837. Does he not visit where she is living?—He is supposed to do so, and no doubt does, but the children may be at school, and it would be no part of the relieving officer's duty to make more than a very general inspection of the house.

2838. Does he not report to the board of guardians?—Yes. Sometimes he would report that the house is in a very dirty condition and he thinks the board ought to do something; then the woman is sent for and receives a talking to.

2839. That would be a reason, would it not, for giving her indoor relief in place of the out-door relief that she is drawing?—Certainly, because the children are not being properly looked after.

2840. (Mr. Bentham.) Is it not the fact that these homes are visited oftener by a relieving officer than they would be by an inspector, and even far oftener than they are visited by the inspectors of boarded-out children at the present time, who in fact visit once a year?—Yes, providing the relieving officer does visit.

2841. Is it not part of the guardians' duty to see that he does?—Yes, it is.

2842. (Mr. Lansbury.) Does he not have to enter into the application and Report Book the date of his last visit?—Yes, in such a case as that of a widow with children, but there we come to the old trouble that the relief may be given for three months, and then the case does not come under the purview of the guardians until the end of the three months.

2843. But, as a rule, would not the case of these widows be reviewed every three months?—I do not think that every three months is enough. It is only in the best unions, and the most strictly administered unions that short orders are given.

2844. Is it not also the fact that the education authority fills up cards as to the attendance of the children at school—at any rate they do so in the Metropolis?—These children have to attend school like all other children.

2845. The attendance of these children at school is shown quite automatically by the production of these cards to the relieving officer, is it not?—Yes, in fact all children are very much better looked after now than they were. The compulsory attendance at school is one thing, and the keen action of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children is another good thing; so that a child does not require the same looking after that it used to require. Still I think that the children of widows are a class that require the very special attention of boards of guardians.

2846. (Mr. Loch.) In regard to the stricter unions to which you refer, have you had any special complaints as to their treatment of widows?—No; however that is a matter which, as I have said, should be investigated to the very bottom. The condition of the population under very strictly administered unions is one of the points that does require investigation.

2847. In those strict unions the rule is always to give very short terms for relief, is it not?—Yes. I know some unions where they never give any order for a longer period than to the next meeting of the board of guardians, so that every case is continually under review.

2848. (Mr. Nunn.) I think it was suggested that the most natural person with whom to board out a pauper's child was its own mother; the payment which is made to a foster mother includes a certain payment for services rendered, does it not?—I think so.

2849. You would not naturally give that payment to a mother for the care of her own children?—No, one would not.

2850. (Miss Hill.) You have referred to the Brabazon scheme, which I think is usually managed by a committee of ladies, or a group of ladies at anyrate, is that not so?—Yes.

The M.A.B.Y.S. scheme.

2851. Then we know of the ladies that work the M.A.B.Y.S. scheme, which deals with children after they leave the workhouse school; I am very anxious to know whether there has been any systematised offer to bring additional groups of ladies, not being guardians, into communication with the people both in the schools and in the workhouses. The more I have seen of the work of the few lady guardians I know the more it strikes me that they really require a very great deal more help. I know it is very difficult to introduce odd visitors into institutions like those under the Poor Law, but it seems to me, especially with regard to the schools, that it is very important; and I should like to know whether any organised committee of ladies has been formed in any districts; do you know of any?—You are aware, of course that there are ladies' visiting committees which can be constituted by any board of guardians for any of the poor law institutions.

Ladies' visiting committees.

2852. They are not general, I think, are they?—There are a great number of them.

2853. In London?—I am not sure as to London. One effect of the election of lady guardians has been, I am afraid, to some extent to do away with those committees; the lady guardians do the work instead of the visiting ladies.

2854. They cannot do the sort of work I was thinking of, I am sure, because their number would not be sufficient?—It has been suggested in one or two cases that outside the Metropolis the Girls' Friendly Society might do the work of visiting the children sent out from the schools in the same way that the M.A.B.Y.S. Society does in London.

2855. I thought they did?—I do not know whether they have actually started doing it, but it was suggested. It would be a very useful thing if they did it. I may say at once that I absolutely welcome in the administration of the workhouse any outside body that will merely conform to the regulations and display a certain amount of common sense. Subject to those conditions, as I say, I welcome external light and aid.

2856. And the way to do it would be by means of some of these visiting committees authorised by the guardians, is it?—Yes.

Workhouse infirmaries and their effect.

2857. (Mr. Phelps.) I think from what I gathered, you said that workhouse infirmaries have very much improved of late years?—That is so.

2858. And that they are ceasing more and more to be a deterrent?—I think that is a deduction which may fairly be made from the figures.

2859. Have you any instances in your mind of people being taken direct to an infirmary without passing through the workhouse?—I think you will find in the London evidence that in some of the London infirmaries there are a good number of even what would be called in a hospital "casualty" cases, that is to say, people who, in default of a general hospital, are brought into the infirmary for instant medical aid.

2860. In the case of a person who requires institutional relief the alternative is to go into a hospital, or to go into a workhouse infirmary?—Yes.

2861. The treatment now would be very much the same in both, I take it?—Very much the same, I think.

2862. Do you think the moral effect, if one may use the term, on the recipient would be really different?—In the case of absolutely unavoidable sickness I should say it would not be very different. There is a shrinking on the part of the relations from allowing their relatives to go to any institution which is connected with the poor rates, but I do not know whether that shrinking in the case of unavoidable sickness is enough to make a great difference between the workhouse infirmary and the hospital.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

5 Feb. 1906.

Medical relief and disfranchisement.

2863. Do you think it is fair that in the one case the patient should lose his franchise, and in the other case he should not?—In absolutely unavoidable cases I admit that there is a difficulty in sustaining the disfranchisement except on grounds of general public policy.

State hospitals.

2864. Would you be prepared to welcome a scheme by which all institutional relief in cases of sickness should be made a government matter, and at the same time all out-door medical relief should be abolished?—I think we ought to take those points in two, ought we not?

2865. In cases requiring institutional relief would you be prepared to say that no civic consequences should follow on a man's accepting it?—That is to say that we should frankly accept a scheme of State hospitals?

2866. That we should make all the hospitals State hospitals and put them on the same footing as the workhouse infirmaries?—To be quite honest, I have done my very best to find reasons against it, because I do not like it. I am afraid there must be some mischief behind it which I do not see. But logically, I cannot avoid the conclusion that the time has come when the whole question of institutional relief for the sick at the cost of the rates must be reconsidered; and the point of disfranchisement would, of course, be an important question.

2867. Would you agree with General Booth when he says that when a horse is down the thing is to get him up, and that our natural interest as a community when we find a person who needs help is to put him on his legs as soon as possible?—Yes.

2868. With regard to out-door medical relief, there is no reason why a man should not make provision against the need of it, is there?—Apparently there is not.

Effect of medical relief on provident dispensaries.

2869. Have you any figures of your own, or could we get any figures with regard to the effect on provident dispensaries of variations in the administration of medical relief?—I do not think there are any actual figures in the possession of the Board, and I think that that point could only be cleared up by an enquiry in the localities. I have a very strong impression that there is a direct correspondence between the two subjects.

Alterations in quality of medical relief

2870. Have you noticed of late years an increase in medical relief in consequence of the free granting of what are called "medical comforts"?—I do not think that medical relief has increased owing to that. There is a continual struggle on the part of medical officers and others to give medical comforts, or what are called medical extras, as a part of relief. With respect to what was really the worst part of that system, namely, the giving of alcohol, I think you will find that that has very much decreased. In some cases the guardians have made up their minds quite definitely and clearly that if alcohol is to be given it must be given as a medicine; and in some instances they have gone so far as to say that it is a medicine which cannot be safely administered in a pauper's own home, and if the medical officer thinks that alcohol is necessary the pauper must come into the workhouse to receive it.

2871. Have you ever found that the range of medical relief and medical comforts has been extended because it has not carried disfranchisement with it, whereas the same amount of relief given as out-door relief would do so?—I have not the slightest doubt that that must be the effect, but I have got no figures to prove it.

Difficulties of classification.

2872. A good deal has been said with regard to classification, and as to its falling into disfavour; is that in part because of the difficulty which is found in the definition of "deserving"?—No. What I had rather in my mind was that the form of classification which we offer to what we are pleased to call the aged deserving poor man inside the workhouse is not what he wishes.

2873. Would you agree with the pauper who said, "Sir, we sorts ourselves"?—I should. Besides I think there is a great deal in the old Yorkshire proverb: "Heaven for climate, but t'other place for company."

2874. Is it not the case that boards of guardians find, and very properly find, a difficulty in summing-up at the age of seventy the whole of a man's life, his opportunities and the use he has made of them, and pronouncing upon them and saying he is deserving or undeserving?—It has always seemed to me positively absurd that any board of guardians should say they are going to investigate the whole circumstances of a man's life, his temptations, his bringing up, his character, his physical propensities, and then say whether he is to be a sheep or a goat. You cannot imagine a more unsuitable tribunal for pronouncing such a decision than a board of guardians.

2875. That is to say, the epithet "aged" is a question of fact, but the epithet "deserving" is a question of opinion, and they ought never to be put together as if they stood upon the same ground?—That is so. I must say this, that in spite of all the talk about desert and merit being a claim for relief which has gone on since, we will put it, the year 1884—which is the date, by the way, of the last Franchise Bill—I do not think that the arguments of John Stuart Mill have ever been answered. I have them here, and I will read them. You will remember the famous passage in which he says:—"What the State may and should abandon to private charity is the task of distinguishing between one case of real necessity and another. Private charity can give more to the more deserving. The State must act by general rules. It cannot undertake to discriminate between the deserving and the undeserving indigent. It owes no more than subsistence to the first, and can give no less to the last. The dispensers of public relief have no business to be inquisitors. Guardians and overseers are not fit to be trusted to give or withhold other people's money according to their verdict on the morality of the person soliciting it; and it would show much ignorance of the ways of mankind to suppose that such persons, in the almost impossible case of their being qualified, will take the trouble of ascertaining and sifting the past conduct of a person in distress so as to form a rational judgment on it. Private charity can make these distinctions; and in bestowing its own money is entitled to do so according to its own judgment. But the administrators of a public fund ought not to be required to do more for anybody than that minimum which is due even to the worst. If they are, indulgence very speedily becomes the rule and refusal the more or less capricious and tyrannical exception." I know that that is not a popular doctrine now, but personally I fail to see that there is any logical answer to it.

J. S. Mill the functi of charity and poor relief.

2876. In answer to Mr. Booth I think you said that in the case of women, classification might be desirable in a workhouse?—Classification is desirable.

2877. Do you think that the effect upon the women who are classified, not in class A or B, but in class X or Y, is not harmful?—Do you mean to say that there is a certain amount of harm in picking out a class for punishment or for distinction on the ground of good or bad conduct?

Difficulti classifica

2878. Stamping them in that way and giving it as the opinion of the world that that is their position?—If you classify for good conduct you are also classifying for bad conduct; and that brings you to the argument which you will find in the old commissioners' reports against marking unchaste women with a distinctive dress in workhouses—which is all very well worth reading. (See Appendix to Report of Poor Law Commissioners for 1840, p. 98.)

2879. Have you any experience of a place in which charity has co-operated closely with the Poor Law?—Very little. I have not had one of those unions where the thing was perfectly systematised, but I have had a good illustration in the Milton Union of North Kent where the relations between the guardians and the existing friendly societies in that union are very close indeed. The union clerk and the union chairman take a very prominent part in the organisation of the friendly societies of the district.

Co-opera between guardian and frie societies.

2880. (Dr. Downes.) There is a description in Sir William Chance's book of the arrangement in the Milton Union; do I understand that that continues down to the present time?—I think it does. There is the same chairman and the same clerk.

2881. Is it your experience that strictness in the administration of ordinary out-relief tends to providence against sickness?—Undoubtedly.

Effect o out-reli insuran against sickness

2882. Had you any experience of medical clubs in your district?—I do not know much about them as matters of detail, but I know of their existence, and I know perfectly well that if you give indiscriminate out-door relief you can crush out every medical club in the neighbourhood.

2883. Taking the various forms of provision against sickness, first of all, you have the provision which the man himself can make by his thrift and insurance, then you come to the provision which might be made by chari'y, and, finally, you come to the provision which should be made by the State if the others fail ?—Yes. I adopt that classification.

2884. Which would you consider the most desirable of those three methods ?—I think you have put them in their order of merit.

2885. If the last, that is, the provision by the State, comes first, is it your experience that it would tend to choke the growth of the others ?—It chokes the second and it absolutely kills the first.

2886. As a concrete example, are you aware that in London the number of beds in the general hospitals has shown very little increase for years past ?—I am told so.

2887. And, on the other hand, that the number of beds in the Poor Law infirmaries in London is greater than the number of beds in the general hospitals of England and Wales put together ?—That is so, but I would say occupied beds also.

2888. I do not know whether you are also aware that statistics show that 35 per cent. of the deaths annually in London are deaths occurring in public institutions ?—Yes, and I think it is a constantly increasing percentage.

2889. You will find that in the Annual Summary of the Registrar General, I think. Are you also aware that of that 35 per cent. the larger proportion (over 18 per cent.) are deaths in workhouses or workhouse institutions ?—Yes.

2890. Have you considered the case of the man who is just above the stage of pauperism, with regard to the provision of medical relief under our present system; is there anything open to him such as he would find in a Poor Law infirmary ?—It would cost a man hundreds a year to get for himself in some cases what a pauper gets for nothing. Consider what it is—it is a perfect ward with a carefully regulated temperature, night nursing and day nursing, and a resident medical officer.

2891. I do not know whether you have considered the possibility of remedying that state of affairs; it is clearly one for the Commission to consider, I think ?—It is a most important question; and it does seem to me that possibly the solution of it may be found in the abandonment of the whole problem as one which is outside the scope of ordinary pauper relief and pauper administration, namely, by frankly admitting that in a populous urban community there is a class for whom charity does not provide and cannot provide, and for whom perhaps the State should provide. But if you do that (and you may have to do it), you will, in my judgment, stop any provision of further charity hospitals all over the country, or of further beds.

2892. I take it, it would also stop the growth of thrift and of the provision by insurance against sickness ?—It would check it to a very great extent, that is to say, to do it with anything like safety, you would have to surround it with innumerable safeguards.

2893. Then, I take it, that our present position is, that we stand in danger of conferring a privilege on pauperism ?—That is so; and of generally weakening the natural feeling against Poor Law relief.

2894. And the spirit of independence ?—Yes.

2895. To return for a moment to out-door medical relief, has it been the practice in any of the unions in your late district to require the district medical officers to attend the meetings of the guardians ?—In some cases, but unfortunately only rarely.

2896. Should you not approve of their attending ?—I think they ought always to attend, when any considerable amount of medical relief is given.

2897. Very often a personal conference between guardians and a medical officer is distinctly advantageous to the mode in which relief is administered, is it not ?—Most advantageous.

2898. I think you would agree that the medical officer is the most important officer of the guardians, after the relieving officer, for out-door relief ?—Yes.

2899. And that it is highly desirable that those officers should work in unison with the guardians ?—Yes. Shall I give an illustration of that ? A good many medical officers think that the amount given in relief is not enough, so they proceed to recommend extras—so many pounds of mutton, we will say, not on medical grounds but because they think on general grounds that the pauper is not receiving enough. That is a practice which is extremely embarrassing to the guardians, and it should be put an end to. A personal conference between the medical officer and the guardians will often put that matter straight at once.

Statistics as to feeble-minded paupers.

2900. With reference to the question of persons of defective intellect in workhouses, I do not know whether you have alluded to the large number of persons who are classed as feeble-minded who have to be maintained in institutions ?—My former evidence only related to what are known as lunatics, that is to say, any person of unsound mind in a workhouse is considered a lunatic; but there is another class of feeble-minded of which we have a return in the half-yearly statement of pauperism, In that return for March, 1905, it is shown that in workhouses and other Poor Law establishments there were in the special wards or establishments for persons of the feeble-minded class 1,368, in other wards 6,529, in other institutions 360, and receiving out-door relief during the half year 1901. Inquiry was also made as to the number of feeble-minded women who had given birth to children in workhouses during the previous five years. The books referred to did not admit of this information being given with any degree of completeness, but I think 635 cases occurred in the period mentioned. You will remember that that question is now under investigation by another Commission. I mention it here because much the same arguments that apply in the case of lunatics would apply in the case of the feeble-minded—I do not say in all cases, but in most cases.

2901. That class forms a very large proportion, I think, of the whole indoor pauperism, does it not ?—Yes.

2902. A considerable number of those persons would very probably, in country workhouses, be found in the infirmary wards, would they not ?—Yes.

Old and infirm in sick wards.

2903. Also in such country workhouses, I think, if my recollection is right, you will find a great number of old people and infirm people who are not strictly sick in the ordinary sense of the word ?—That is so. The number of acute sick in country workhouses is very small.

2904. They are put there no doubt because it is a convenient and comfortable place for them. The figures, therefore, of any return of persons in a sick ward do not necessarily mean that those are sick people ?—Not sick in the ordinary acceptation of the term.

2905. I put those questions because, as you may be aware, the public are sometimes exercised in their minds as to the proportion of nurses to the number of people in so-called sick wards; but everything depends, does it not, in the particular instance on the class of case which happens to be in the sick ward ?—Yes.

Effect of strict out-relief on deaths from starvation in London.

2906. You were asked a question as to the mortality in places where there is strict relief; I dare say you are aware that in London there is a return of deaths from starvation which has been furnished to Parliament for many years past ?—Yes.

2907. Are you also aware that the number of deaths in those returns annually was considerably greater in the early seventies, when a good deal of out-door relief was given, than it has been in later years ?—I believe the deaths have steadily diminished; and I believe they include a large number of persons who are in receipt of out-door relief.

Labour tests for women.

2908. A small matter which you have mentioned in your evidence, was the difficulty of finding a labour test in the case of women; I do not know whether you have ever had it suggested that they might be engaged in preparing lint or bandages for surgical dressings ?—I have never had experience of that.

2909 But that would be a suggestion worth considering, perhaps ?—Yes.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

5 Feb. 1906.

Dietary for able-bodied men.

2910. In the case of able-bodied test houses for men, should you be in favour of a reconsideration of the present arrangements for dietary so that the diet might be more adapted to the actual work that the man does?—Certainly.

2911. Under present conditions, I think the loafer gets practically the same diet as a man who is working hard?—Yes.

2912. And that might be remedied?—I think the time has come when the whole dietary question will have to be reconsidered again—at least, I am afraid so.

Convalescent homes of friendly societies.

2913. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) In reference to friendly societies and medical relief, is it not the case that some friendly societies have their own convalescent homes?—I think so.

2914. So that, even in the case of institutional relief it is not always essential that they should become paupers in order to get what they need?—That is so. That sort of provision would be extended if there were a greater restriction on Poor Law relief.

2915. And, no doubt, they enjoy their own Homes very much more than they would enjoy the Poor Law Homes that are provided for them?—Yes.

Effect of Out-door Relief (Friendly Societies) Act.

2916. Does the Out-relief (Friendly Societies) Act tend to put a premium on those friendly societies which pay the smallest allowances?—Yes.

2917. That is practically the unsatisfactory societies, is it not?—That is practically the upshot of it and, according to my judgment, it prevents the friendly societies from really dealing with the question of provision for old age, that is to say, by separating the sick benefit from the age benefit.

2918. That has been recommended constantly, has it not?—Constantly.

Possibility of obtaining return.

2919. Would it be possible to get a return showing how far relief had been given in connection with this Act, and what friendly societies the men applying for it were in?—I suppose it would be possible to get such a return through Parliament.

2920. If we could show that those who applied for any help under this Act would be only those who belonged to unsound societies, that would be a strong case against them, I suppose?—Yes.

Utilisation of pauper labour for work in and about the workhouse.

2921. Going to workhouses, can you tell us to what extent the actual work of and in the house is carried on by pauper inmates?—The number of able-bodied in country unions is now so small that there is an increasing necessity of having to hire outside labour to do the work.

2922. In the urban unions is it mostly done by the inmates?—Yes; but at certain times of the year, for instance, in the hop-picking season in Kent, the workhouses are denuded of all the able-bodied inmates. Here I should like to mention that sometimes when that has been the case, I have suggested to boards of guardians that instead of giving widows out-door relief, they should hire the widows for half-a-crown a day to come and do charing in the workhouses. That is occasionally done, with the effect sometimes that the widows go off the out-door relief list and do not come to work. A curious thing is this—and it is very curious as showing how great is the sympathy for the widow—that a great many guardians object to that and say, "No, let the poor woman have her relief"—knowing perfectly well that she is working for somebody else.

2923. It used to be the custom in a union I knew very well, for the widows to be given 10s. a week and to be employed as scrubbers in the infirmary?—That is what ought to be done. But you should pay them an adequate wage; do not pay them a penny less than they are entitled to in the open labour market.

2924. (Dr. Downes.) That is very commonly done in the London infirmaries, I believe?—I think it is done in London; but when I have suggested it in the country, I have been met with the objection I have named.

Out-door relief as a subsidy to ow paid trades.

2925. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) I should like to ask you a few further questions about the relief of widows. I think you will agree with me that in London certain trades are very largely supported by the rates?—I am perfectly convinced that they are not only in London but elsewhere. That is a point which I ask the Commission to investigate.

2926. It has been calculated that many thousands a year go from the rates direct into the pockets of employers?—That is so; I believe.

2927. It is customary also, is it not, to give relief to quite young women in the slack season of their trades in London?—I know very little about London relief, but I do know that that is the sort of thing that is done.

2928. So that the London employer can turn off his girl and women hands every autumn or when he likes, and will be quite sure that they will be kept by out-relief and charity until he chooses to take them on again?—One of the most specious pleas for out-door relief is what you hear in towns with a specialised manufactory—it used to be so in the old days in Sheffield—"These are times of distress; give them out-door relief to keep the men together." That is absolute, sheer, cold-drawn protection.

2929. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Are you speaking of the able-bodied?—Some are able-bodied, some are not.

2930. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) The women I have in mind are women of from twenty-five to forty years of age?—I understood so. In further reference to Mr. Patten-MacDougall's question I might say that when guardians have got into that state of mind that they mean to give out-door relief, they can give out-door relief. If an able-bodied man comes up for relief it is very easy to invent a sick child, or a sick child is suggested.

2931. (Chairman.) You would say, I take it, that the guardians support trades in this sense, that they encourage the masters to ret rid of hands in the slack times?—What I mean is, that it is done to keep the men together. They say this, "Here are bad times, and unless we give the men relief, they will go away and seek for work elsewhere; so we will give them relief and then, when we want them, we shall be able to put our hands on them." Exactly the same considerations are involved in Mrs. Bosanquet's question as to giving the women relief in slack times.

2932. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) My point is that there are many trades in London where the women never gain a subsistence wage the whole year through because they are supported during slack times by out-relief or by charity, and also there are plenty of trades to which they can go, and would go, in which they could earn a living wage if they were not so supported here?—That is so; they are anchored to the place by the small dole.

2933. (Chairman.) Are they receiving outdoor relief at the same time as they are receiving wages?—Yes, that is, if they are sick, or if they are not able-bodied, they would be.

2934. I want to ge clearly in my mind how it is the rates help the trade or the masters. If these women could not get outdoor relief, would you contend that the master would not discharge certain of his employees in slack times?—He would be less apt to discharge them than he is now, because then he might lose them. He knows that after the slack time will come a good time, and he wants to keep the people together.

2935. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) I would push it further than that; I know to my knowledge that many women are actually earning a very much less than subsistence wage and are having it supplemented by what they are getting under the Poor Law?—That just illustrates what I say of all outdoor relief. You cannot go to a board of guardians in the country but you will find that one of the main reasons for giving out-door relief to a poor person is "because she does a little," "because she earns a little," "because she does the best she can for herself."

2936. (Mr. Patten-Macdougall.) Is she certified not to be able-bodied by the medical officer?—She may be able-bodied in London because, under the Regulation Order, you can give out-door relief to everybody.

2937. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) I am certain that many trades can exist in London only because of the out-door relief?—That, of course, is a question which I cannot answer, because I do not know London.

2938. (Chairman.) In consequence of giving out-door relief they accept a wage or a price which would not keep them alive, and which they could not otherwise accept?—That is a point which, in a former part of my evidence, I have entreated—I do not use any less word than that—this Commission to investigate. I am convinced myself that the greatest wrong that is done to poor people in England now is done by means of the out-door relief which is given to persons who are earning wages. That is my own personal conviction.

2939. (Mr. Lansbury.) I rather agree with you, but I want to put it in another way: Side by side with the people who are given out-relief, are there not other people working at exactly the same trade and for identically the same wages?—That is what I cannot tell you, because I do not know the trade or the place.

2940. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) With regard to out-relief in the slack season, is it true that in London it would be possible for these people to get any other work during their slack season?—As I have said, I do not know about the London conditions and I can only give you general opinions. I have never attended a meeting of a board of guardians in London in my life, except twice.

2941. Your experience then has all been in the country?—Yes.

2942. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) Would you then agree with me in this, that there is a congestion of under-paid labour in those districts where out-relief is freely given?—That is another most important point which also affects the labour market according to my view, and which it will be for the Commission to investigate. If you give out-door relief regularly—never mind in how small sums—you will find a tendency to make a local congestion of the worst paid labour and of the poorest people. For a very small sum these people will stay in London and will not attempt to go outside. One of my most interesting early recollections of the Poor Law was seeing in Cumberland and Westmorland several of the folk who had been hand-loom weavers. When the hand-loom weaving trade broke down they received small sums of out-door relief, and I found them there thirty or forty years afterwards still receiving out-door relief. It was perfectly clear that if they had not got out-door relief they would have been working in Bradford or in Leeds. I remember the case of a little country union where they had a local flax industry. It was a very strictly administered union indeed. The flax mills were suddenly shut up, rather cruelly as I then thought, and practically the only source of wage-earning was closed. The guardians had to consider whether they would give these people out-door relief, or whether they would refuse to give them any but indoor relief. They argued it out. If we give them out-door relief they will be here for ever; we shall anchor them to this place with a small dole and we shall be making permanent paupers of them; if, on the other hand, we offer them the workhouse, the owner of the mill will have for very shame to help them, their friends will help them, charity will help them, and they will go away to be self-respecting, self-supporting people elsewhere. The latter policy prevailed. I do not think I ever saw such a sight within the walls of a workhouse as I saw then. The hall was full, the dining-room was full, the corridors were full, as the people came in, for it was at first their only resource. In a month the place was empty, some of them had gone to America, some elsewhere—the whole countryside of them had gone. I think that that action of the guardians absolutely saved those people from a degraded and miserable life. I instance that as a good example establishing the evil of out-door relief as tending to congest labour. You will have to ascertain how far that congestion has gone on, and what has been its evil effect on the rate of wages of independent labour.

2943. You have suggested that there was a great difficulty in giving out-door relief to women in exceptionally bad times in the textile trades say; is it not the case that during the cotton famine, when this difficulty was very great, they adopted a plan of classes, such as sewing classes and domestic economy classes, which answered very well?—Yes. Given the friendly aid of charitable folk, you can get through times of emergency in that way. My point is, that in order to do the work well, you have to call in aids other than the Poor Law machinery.

2944. (Mr. Loch.) With regard to the inquiries which are made in the cases which are relieved in a Poor Law infirmary, does it not often happen that the man is admitted and that the inquiry is made or is not made afterwards?—Yes.

2945. That is one of the great difficulties of dealing with Poor Law infirmary relief, is it not?—Yes.

2946. With regard to the Application and Report Book and the inquiries made in consequence of the use of it, is there no system by which the guardians can have the statements of the applicants verified by reference to any other board of guardians?—Their statements are often verified by reference to employers. Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B. 5 Feb. 1906. Verification of statements of applicants for relief.

2947. Those would be local employers?—Yes.

2948. In an ordinary case there are many facts which require evidence from without the locality; is there no system of cross help as between board and board in verifying statements?—I think one relieving officer would usually give another relieving officer information.

2949. Would he, even if he belonged to another union? I think so. I have never found any difficulty about that.

2950. (Mr. Nunn.) But he is not bound to do so?—He is not bound to do it, but I think he always does it. I have sometimes had a complaint that a relieving officer was not quite so obliging as he ought to be in that matter, but it is very seldom.

2951. (Mr. Loch.) My question leads me on to this point—that the information is hardly systematically obtained, so far as I know in Poor Law inquiries?—That is so.

2952. And that until some system of cross reference is more or less accepted as a matter of course it is rather difficult for such information to be systematically obtained?—I do not think the number of cases where cross reference is necessary would be very great.

2953. (Mr. Nunn.) I think in one or two unions there is a special relieving officer who has to go outside the district to make inquiries in other unions, is that not so?—No large union ought to be content with merely its staff of relieving officers. That staff ought to be organised and classified. You ought to have your cross visitor and your superintending officer. Then you ought to have a special man to remove lunatics. A very fruitful source of bad relief is that the relieving officer has certain statutory duties to perform which over-ride his duties to the guardians, as, for instance, the removal of lunatics, and the looking after lunatics in various ways, and when he is asked what he was doing on a certain day he replies that he was removing a lunatic, or something of that kind. You have not got him altogether in your hand for his whole time, as you have an in-door officer. Therefore it is very essential that the various functions of the relieving officer should be specialised and divided among other officers so that one man should not be overloaded. Cross visitors and superintendent relieving officers.

2954. (Mr. Loch.) With regard to the Poor Law orders do you know, in the little report one gets from Elberfeld and other German towns, how very clearly the definition of relief and the principles of it are set out?—Yes. Characteristics of Poor Law Orders.

2955. That is an element which is lacking in our orders, is it not?—Yes.

2956. And the orders are not promulgated in the same way as those are?—What orders are you referring to now?

2957. I mean our Poor Law General Orders?—No; those are simply sent out as directions to be obeyed.

2958. But they are not available or stated in the simple manner in which one gets them in Germany?—In issuing an order the Board generally issues with it an instructional or circular letter, dealing with the subject under consideration, as indeed they do when a new Statute comes out which bears on Poor Law matters or on local government matters generally.

2959. True, but the local public of the place have not a collection of the methods and principles and definitions, such as they have in an ordinary German town?—I have often wondered how far those were useful in a German town. As you say, they vary very much from us. Elberfeld system of exposition of principles of relief.

2960. Taking the simple question of the definitions in the Elberfeld system, where you rely greatly upon outsiders knowing exactly the conditions under which relief is given, they define quite clearly what the Poor Law should or should not do, do they not?—Yes.

2961. Is it your opinion that if it were introduced in some form into our Poor Law literature and made local, that would be of service?—Anything which gives people a greater interest in it would be of service; but

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

5 Feb. 1906.

I am not quite sure whether we should, from one period to another, stick to the same explanatory or hortatory passages.

Criticism of Application and Report Book.

2962. With regard to the case papers, is it not a difficulty that it is very hard to find out all cases in the Application and Report Books as they now are, each report book having its own index?—I think the present Application and Report Book is in a very bad form.

Relief of widows in Scotland.

2963. With regard to the relief of widows and the amount that is given to them, I have here a little report of the methods of administering Poor Law relief in certain large town parishes in Scotland. In that report they say: "Where the dependents are very numerous, it indicates the presence on the roll of a large number of widows with young children. As we had not the number of such widows, and as they constitute a class that cannot well be 'tested' by the offer of poorhouse relief, we resolved to confine our comparison to the rates paid in 'single cases' (namely cases without dependents) to whom the 'test' of poorhouse relief can always be applied. If the aliment be adequate in such cases, it may, we think, be assumed that it will also be sufficient in respect of widows with children, and vice versa. To arrive at the number of 'single cases' we have made a somewhat rough classification by regarding them as cases in which the aliment is at the rate of 3s. per week and under. The following table shows for each parish (1) the percentage of cases on the outdoor roll at 3s. per week and under, excluding lunatics and children boarded-out, (2) the average weekly aliment for such cases, and the average rents of one and two-roomed houses." It follows from this statement that there are, for instance, at Leith 66 per cent. of cases at 3s. per week, and that the average weekly aliment is 2s. 7d.?—Would that be for the widow alone?

2964. That is for the single person. Would you not conclude from that, that with our out-door relief system in Scotland there is probably the same difficulty of insufficiency as there is here?—It looks like it.

2965. The problem, that is to say, is the same though the conditions in many ways may be slightly different?—Yes.

Relief in first six months of widowhood.

2966. To go to another point, I understand a widow by the order has a right to relief during the first six months of widowhood?—Yes.

2967. During that time do they refer the case to any charitable body and see if the widow can be so helped as to avoid her coming on the rates at all?—That is what is done at Bradfield, I think, and some other unions. You will find a description of what is done in the Bradfield union on page 145 of Sir William Chance's book.

2968. In that way a considerable number of widows are prevented from becoming chronic paupers, are they not?—Yes.

2969. With regard to the experimental methods you refer to, do the boards of guardians as a rule take into account outside charitable agencies or help?—Do you mean the larger charities, or do you mean the charities received by the individual pauper?

2970. I mean both the larger charities and the smaller charities such as may come into the income of the pauper?—Boards of guardians are very apt to neglect that source of income altogether. In strictness they ought to take into consideration every source of income, even if it were manna from heaven; but as a matter of fact they are very apt to pass over sums received from charities, and sometimes the private almsgiver will make it a condition that the guardians do not take any notice of what has been given.

Co-operation between charities and boards of guardians.

2971. Would it be a good thing to have a kind of representation of charitable agencies, by co-optation or otherwise, on the boards of guardians?—I am certain that in large towns, and especially in London that is one of the keys to the problem. You must have closer co-operation between charitable endowments and the boards of guardians, and what is more, you ought to have closer co-operation between the Charity Commissioners and the Local Government Board in that way. We ought to take much more notice of the condition of a union with regard to endowed charities than we do. You will get some quite remarkable instances, I think, from the other inspectors' of unions where the charities are quite sufficient to pay the whole shot of the out-door relief, instead of which they are misused and appear to have the result not of diminishing pauperism but of increasing it.

2972. As a suggestion, would a parallel voluntary committee be of service; doing all kinds of work as in connection with the Brabazon scheme and various other supplementary business connected with Poor Law relief?—In every union, I should say, that that would not be necessary, but in large unions or in unions with special difficulties or circumstances it would be a great help to the Poor Law administration, as it might provide the necessary personal care of people such as cannot be given by the paid officers of a Poor Law authority, to say nothing of the money question.

Rent and relief.

2973. With regard to the payment of rent, it is sometimes said, can guardians pay rent; what do you say upon that?—They are prohibited from paying rent in the Order. You may not set a man up in business or pay his rent. I think a man may use the relief if he likes for paying his rent, but you may not pay rent directly to the landlord of the pauper. As you are aware the rent question is a burning one, especially in London; and in some cases it is alleged that landlords who sit on boards of guardians practically get their rents paid out of the poor rates, that is to say, they favour their own tenants.

2974. (Chairman.) Would not the tenants then get relief in the shape of money in order to pay rent?—You may not pay rent directly to the landlord, but still if you give a man out-door relief he has a means whereby he may pay his rent. It has been suggested very strongly that one of the headings in the case paper or in the out-door relief application book should be the name of the applicant's landlord, so that the guardians might fully be aware of what they were doing.

2975. (Mr. Loch.) The puzzling part of it is the wording of the order. The prohibitory order, Article 5 says, "It shall not be lawful for the guardians, &c., to pay wholly or in part the rent of the house or lodging of any pauper, &c." And then it goes on, "provided always, that nothing in this article contained shall apply to any sudden or temporary lodging procured in any case of sudden and urgent necessity, or mental imbecility, or shall be taken to prevent the said guardians, in regulating the amount of relief to be afforded to any particular person, from considering the expense to be incurred by such person in providing lodging." The out-door regulation order is much simpler, but there is a qualifying clause which turns the edge of the first clause. One more question about the labour. This process has been going on sometimes in London, has it not, that the guardians refer the man, we will say, to the Church Army or the Salvation Army to do some work for them?—They pay the Salvation Army 6s. a week to employ the men, exactly as used to be done before 1834. It is a curious revival of an old custom.

Indirect provision by guardians of work for paupers.

2976. There is this further point. If the man comes back then he may be prosecuted or taken before a magistrate for not doing the work when he had a chance?—Are you referring to a special case?

2977. I want to take the general practice which has been prevalent, in the last five or six years particularly, of referring men to a place where work was more or less artificially provided for them which, if they did not do, the man was taken before the magistrates as a loafer. Does that seem at all a necessary thing in connection with our Poor Law?—If London were so properly organised that it had recourse to a proper test house run by the guardians themselves, or a labour colony in the true sense—I do not mean an agricultural colony; I am not talking about that—I should have thought that this sort of bargain would have been unnecessary, except of course that you may allege that there are certain religious influences that might be brought to bear upon a man by the Salvation Army or the Church Army, which must of necessity be absent in an institution run by boards of guardians.

2978. As a matter of fact it is hardly contemplated by the orders and the general method of the Poor Law system, I believe?—That is so. It seems to me that really it is a reversion to those systems condemned by the early Poor Law Commissioners of paying an employer to employ your pauper for you.

ılation of and in- f.

2979. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) I understand that the system of administering outdoor as compared with indoor relief is all regulated by orders of the Local Government Board, and that accordingly Boards of guardians have very little discretion in the matter?—You are quite right in supposing that they are regulated by the Local Government Board; but that the guardians have little discretion is not the fact. It is evident that they must have very great discretion, otherwise you would not have the enormous discrepancies which are disclosed by the statistics in the administration of the respective unions.

2980. Having that discretion there is, I understand, no appeal against it, and their determinations are final except when the Local Government Board choose to proceed, if they ever do proceed, by way of mandamus?—Their recommendations with regard to cases of relief to individual paupers are absolutely final, and the Local Government Board are statute-barred from interfering in the case of the relief of any pauper.

tion on icant's sal of in- relief.

2981. Accordingly if a pauper is offered merely indoor relief and does not care to take it, the applicant has no remedy?—He has no remedy.

2982. I think you told us before that you are not of opinion that it would be a wise thing to provide for a power of appeal against the decision of the guardians in a case where they had only given indoor relief?—I see many reasons against it.

ections to eal inst ant and n of relief.

2983. I should like you to mention some?—I should think it would be a general weakening of the authority of the guardians, and I think in that way it would diminish what is of even more importance than the administration of the Poor Law, namely, the general character of the local governing bodies of England. I think that the central body would be wholly incompetent to exercise a sound judgment on the conditions of the individual cases submitted to them. I think that the central authority would probably fall into a way of dealing with those cases in classes. They could not have the accurate local knowledge which a board of guardians could have in such matters.

2984. Assuming in the first instance that there was a very full inquiry into the case by the board of guardians or by their relieving officer, and that subsequently when the appeal was taken the Local Government Board might make full inquiry themselves by their own officials, would that not meet the last of the three reasons you gave?—If it were thought possible and practicable to have a very full inquiry in the case of every pauper who did not like the orders that the guardians have given to him, then a full inquiry would meet that point. I suppose the facts could be ascertained by the Local Government Board just as well as by the district authority; but there would have to be a local inquiry into the subject.

2985. Are you of opinion, too, that—assuming that were so—the cases would be too numerous for appeals of that sort to be practicable?—I think they would be much too numerous.

2986. That, of course, would be a very considerable factor in the consideration as leading you to be of opinion that it would not be advisable to have such an appeal?—Yes, but that is not the only reason. I have given two other reasons. Personally, I am afraid I should in almost every instance leave it to the guardians; I should say "I do not see any reason to interfere."

ieving er's re- nsibility payment on-settled ef.

2987. I understood you to say that a relieving officer has no duties towards the non-resident poor of another parish; is that so?—It is a lawful order for a board of guardians to instruct its relieving officer to pay relief for another union; but it is entirely in the option of any board whether they will assist in giving what is called non-settled relief or not.

2988. Non-settled relief, as I understand it, is relief in a parish or union other than that to which the pauper is chargeable?—That is non-settled relief.

2989. Where there are cases receiving non-settled relief I take it that the relieving officer of the parish paying such relief has no reciprocal duty towards the parish of chargeability?—Not unless he is so directed by the guardians.

Very many unions decline either to give non-resident relief or to pay non-settled relief.

2990. In the case of an applicant claiming relief from a different parish from that in which he is residing I suppose the probable result is that he would be given only indoor relief?—The probable result would be that he would have in-door relief given to him, and then that he would be removed, that is to say, if it is the practice of the particular board of guardians to remove.

2991. Apart altogether from the other conditions of the case, would not that lead to a breaking-up of the household and to removing him from his relations?—I do not think that. You must remember that many unions do not enforce removal; it is not their practice to remove; it is their practice to give the relief.

Leave of absence from workhouse.

2992. As regards leave of absence from workhouses, I think you told us of a good many instances where that tends to abuse, and where there is too much latitude allowed. What kind of restriction would you propose upon the present rule about leave of absence from workhouses; would you propose to limit it, so as to prevent there being any absence overnight?—There is no absence overnight, I think, now. Very rarely a man may get leave to go away and stay with his friends for a few days as being more convenient than allowing him to discharge himself and then get re-admitted. I am talking of the practice which has prevailed in so many London unions and other unions too, in recent years, of allowing the inmates to go out en masse during the day. I merely suggested that you might find that that was one of the causes of the overcrowding of the workhouses, and as supporting the allegation that they were less deterrent than they ought to be. I brought it up in that way.

2993. I understand the practice varies in different workhouses?—The practice varies very much.

2994. I take it that it varies to this extent—that leave of absence in many workhouses is not confined to the aged and well-conducted, but is permitted with much less discrimination?—I think that is so. When the question was asked me before I had not a copy of the last circular of the Local Government Board—I am referring to the one issued in 1900—in my hand. In that circular we did not deal with the question of leave of absence from the workhouses in detail; it is left entirely to the guardians.

"Officers' grant."

2995. As regards nursing in workhouses, that is, as I understand it, regulated by an order of 1897; is there any Government grant towards nurses in workhouses?—No. The grant, as I have explained, is based on the number of officers who were employed in the year 1888. It is an unvarying grant, and does not alter at all; so it may be said that we have no grant which affects boards of guardians according to the number of nurses they may appoint—I mean, they do not get more money if they appoint more nurses.

2996. Then you cannot enforce your order by means of giving the grant or withholding the grant in cases in which the order is not complied with?—No.

2997. I think no portion of your medical relief grant goes towards the nurses?—That is so; nurses are simply in-door officers.

Training of probationer nurses.

2998. Is any provision made under your order for the training of probationers for workhouse nursing?—I think there was an order issued as far back as 1873, allowing the managers of the Poplar and Stepney Sick Asylum to train probationer sick nurses, and I think we laid down in that order the conditions as to probationer sick nurses. Of course recent Orders prescribing Regulations for Infirmaries and Sick Asylums provide for the training of probationers.

2999. As regards cases which are treated in the workhouse infirmaries of which you have been speaking, I want to ask you now whether there is not a certain overflow always from the ordinary hospitals which must either lack medical attendance or be taken into the workhouse infirmaries; do you find that here in England?—Yes. The ordinary hospital—I am not talking about London, about which you will get other evidence—looks on the workhouse as a sort of adjunct to which it can remove cases which become incurable or very troublesome. That affects the number of deaths in workhouses very considerably.

3000. Perhaps I may read to you from a Scottish report*, and you will be able to say whether it accurately represents the case as it exists in England. "The poor-house hospitals, equipped under modern conditions, also attract other sick poor persons, who, although not destitute, and therefore not objects of parochial relief, are unable to gain admission to a general infirmary. This result may be due to different reasons, either, for example, because the infirmary has no vacant beds when application for admission is made, or because the illness from which the applicant is suffering is such that the infirmary does not treat it. Cases of chronic rheumatism, bronchitis, cardiac trouble, ulcerated legs, phthisis, etc., are not as a rule received into a general hospital or infirmary. Further, for similar reasons, the general infirmary authorities not infrequently hand over to the parish authorities cases they have had under treatment that have become chronic, or cases that, from pressure on the accommodation, or from other good cause, they are unable to receive or retain." Is that an accurate statement?—I think I would accept that statement as referring to England.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

5 Feb. 1906.

Reimbursement of relief.

3001. I want to ask you further whether your experience is that payment is received by the workhouse authorities in any way in regard to these cases, many of which are able, so far, to pay for such treatment?—Payment is to a large extent received, but it very much depends on the board of guardians. It is very difficult to enforce the payment, and some practically do not do it, but some are very anxious about it. As a rule although the case would not pay in the hospital he might be made to pay in the workhouse infirmary. You will find in all those matters that the guardians are much more keen to get relief repaid from out-door cases than they are from indoor cases. One of the advantages of the case paper system is that guardians would then have information about the means of the relatives of an indoor pauper in the case paper, if he has been an out-door pauper—information which they have not if merely the ordinary form is adopted. Many a man whose relations have paid as long as he is an out-door pauper escapes payment when he gets into the workhouse, because it does not occur to the authorities to ask for payment.

Provisions against overcrowded workhouses.

3002. You told us, I think, with regard to the overcrowding of urban workhouses that you do not have any provision when a workhouse is so overcrowded for removing and boarding any of the paupers who may be there in other workhouses?—There are ample means for that. One board of guardians may make a contract with any other board for the reception of their paupers. At the present moment there are many London paupers boarded-out in the country.

Lunatic grant.

3003. As regards the payment on behalf of lunatics, I understand the payment is at the rate of 4s. per head, is it?—Yes.

3004. It is not a fixed sum in this sense, is it, that there is a lump sum granted—but it is 4s.—per head for each lunatic?—It is an unvarying grant of 4s. per head for each lunatic.

3005. However much it may amount to in the course of the year?—Yes.

Cause of increase of lunatics.

3006. I think you have also told us that the number of lunatics who are so removed is largely increasing?—The number of lunatics altogether is increasing.

3007. Is that due, to some extent to the fact that the relations are not so anxious to keep them now and look after them and give them treatment at home as they were in the past?—I do not know. That is a subject which is discussed in the Reports of the Commissioners in Lunacy. I should say myself that that might be a factor in the increase, but it would only be a small one. There are other causes for the increase of lunacy.

3008. But it may contribute something?—It might contribute something towards it.

3009. May this also contribute—that the local medical officer prefers to get rid of such patients and have them put, either into the asylum or into the workhouse instead of having to treat them as outdoor paupers?—Yes, that may contribute; but then I am perfectly certain of this—without casting the slightest slur on workhouse medical officers and masters—that that has been a very strong reason for the removal of numbers of people from comparatively cheap workhouses to expensive asylums.

3010. Are there not many cases in the workhouse of perfectly harmless lunatics who might very much better be retained outside?—If they had friends who were willing to look after them, do you mean?

3011. I am assuming that?—I do not know whether there are many. A considerable number of the lunatics in this country are boarded out—I mean to say are outside, just as numbers of the feeble-minded are outside.

Position of applicant's refusal of indoor relief.

3012. (Sir Henry Robinson.) You were asked in the case of an actually destitute person who absolutely refuses to come into the workhouse, what would happen, and you said circumstances might arise, or very shortly would arise, which would warrant the relieving officer in regarding the case as one of sudden and urgent necessity, and he would then report that to the board of guardians at their next meeting; assuming the board of guardians still ordered the person to come into the workhouse, and he still refused, and no fresh circumstance had arisen would the relieving officer be able to continue the provisional relief?—Yes. The usual procedure would be that the Chairman would write in the Application and Report Book "Left to R.O.," and then the relieving officer would have to watch the case.

3013. Would he go round and give the provisional relief as long as he liked?—Yes.

Suggested powers of compulsory removal to workhouse.

3014. Is that power of continuing outdoor relief to such persons much abused?—There is no doubt there are a certain number of cases such as those which I have mentioned already and which are mentioned in Mr. Albert Pell's proposals to the Poor Law Board in 1877, who ought to come into the workhouse. They are perhaps half crazy and are living under conditions that no human being should be allowed to live under, and yet they will not come into the workhouse. The suggestion made then was that you should have a compulsory power of removal to the workhouse, but that has never been carried out. I am disposed to think both with regard to that class and with regard to tramps that there should be such a power, although one must attach a very great importance to maintaining what I call the purely voluntary nature of the English workhouse. At present you can leave the workhouse when you like and the guardians cannot compel you to go into it; it is purely voluntary.

3015. It practically comes to this, does it not, that anybody who is destitute can get out-door relief?—If he likes to undergo the suffering necessary to make himself absolutely an urgent case. The great importance of the matter is from the point of view of whether an offer for the workhouse can be considered as adequate relief. You will remember that in the old statute of 1723 it was expressly laid down that if a poor person refused to enter the workhouse he should be struck off the book or books of persons who are applying to the overseers for relief. That statute has a curious history. It was twice repealed and re-enacted, and finally was not got rid of till somewhere in the 80's, when it was swept off under a statute law revision. That was the old idea, but that is not the idea now. Still, logically, an order for the workhouse is adequate relief, for if it were not that it would be open to the pauper to choose his own method of getting relief. As a matter of actual administration the point is settled by the procedure which I have stated; that is to say, a man refuses the workhouse, and then, if he is destitute, he falls into such a condition that he becomes a case of sudden and urgent necessity, and the relieving officer has to relieve him under that clause; and so it can go on for quite a long time.

Ancient penalty for refusing to enter workhouse.

Conditions attendant on out-relief after refusal to enter workhouse.

3016. (Mr. Phelps.) But he must always make a fresh application, must he not?—Yes.

3017. (Sir Henry Robinson.) And must be visited by the relieving officer?—Yes.

3018. (Sir Samuel Provis.) And the relief must be given in kind, must it not?—Yes.

Relieving officer's responsibility where pauper refuses to enter workhouse.

3019. (Mr. Booth.) Must he make a fresh application himself?—Yes.

3020. I thought you said the relieving officer had to watch the case?—He must make a fresh application in strictness, but, as a matter of fact, when you have a case of that sort the relieving officer always watches it and hears about it, because he knows very well that if he does not watch it and the case dies and there is a coroner's inquest, he may get into trouble, although perhaps he ought not to get into trouble. It seems to me that the dilemma is this—if the applicant is crazy he ought to be removed into the workhouse; and if he is not crazy surely it is with him to decide, and the responsibility ought not to be put upon the relieving officer. It is a most onerous responsibility and, what is more, exposes the relieving officer to threats of being indicted for manslaughter, and so on, in case the man dies. The present position is not logical, and it is not very satisfactory; it is not so unsatisfactory as you might think, but it certainly is a point which ought to be dealt with in your recommendations.

*Report of the Departmental Committee on Poor Law Medical Relief, &c. (Scotland), 1904.

3021. (Sir Henry Robinson.) Are there many cases where relief given by the relieving officer provisionally week by week has been surcharged by the auditor?—No; I do not think we have any trouble in that way. Our troubles are altogether different.

3023. The relieving officer would consider it a part of his duties to enter the fact that the person was in receipt of wages elsewhere then?—Yes, he would enter that and also what the man was getting from various sources.

3024. Is there a column for that in the application and report book?—Yes.

3025. Would an auditor have power to deal with that; in other words would an auditor cut off a certain amount of relief if he considers it to be extravagant?—No; he must either do nothing or disallow the whole order.

3026. He cannot reduce the amount?—No.

3027. (Chairman.) Does he not report on it as a matter of fact?—He may report on it; but he would not report on it unless there was quite a group of cases of the sort.

ief.

3028. (Sir Henry Robinson.) In the event of abnormal distress arising from strikes or lock-outs or agricultural distress or any other difficulty of that sort, is there ever a rate imposed which is so large as to make it difficult of collection?—Such a case has never been known, not even in the time of the cotton famine, although there, as you may remember, they had a rate in aid towards the end of the time and other unions in Lancashire had to contribute. There has been no instance where the boards have had to stop giving relief because they had no further money. However, I should like to say this, that there are cases where the rates have been so high that they are extravagant to collect. If the rate is raised above a certain limit, especially in times of distress, you have more emptics and more people going away because they cannot pay, and more people getting excused and so on; so the higher the rate the greater the loss in collection.

3029. There is no power in England, is there, to spread one half the cost of any abnormal distress over the county at large?—No, there is not.

3030. In the case of the Lancashire cotton famine, which you have just referred to, they had a special Act I believe?—Yes. It was strongly opposed by those people who had the cause of sound poor law legislation and the cause of local government most at heart. You can read all about it in two books—Arnold's "History of the Cotton Famine" and a book called "The Need of a Settled Policy in Times of Distress," by McCullagh Torrens.

3031. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Beginning first of all with the case of imbeciles in workhouses, you told us that the number of lunatics has considerably increased, in consequence I think, you said, of the 4s. grant?—I did not say that it was in consequence of that grant; I said that the number had increased.

3032. Concurrently perhaps?—That may be, but I did not mean that they had increased in consequence of the 4s. grant. I do not think any grant could make a lunatic. The case of a lunatic is different from the case of any other pauper.

3033. They have increased in asylums, have they not?—Yes. The statistics show that the asylums are now practically taking the increment of lunatics.

3034. It is the case, is it not, that to send a lunatic from a workhouse to an asylum involves a certain cost to the guardians over and above that which they would pay in the workhouse?—Yes.

3035. The average cost in the asylum is somewhere about 10s. a week, is it not?—It is even more than that.

3036. In some cases it is more, but I think the average cost is somewhere thereabouts. Deducting the 4s. from the 10s. there is a charge of 6s. a week on the guardians, which I take it would be more than the cost of the lunatic in the workhouse?—It would be a little more. The grant of 4s. a week was arranged so as to exactly fill the difference between the two.

3037. I do not think it was intended quite exactly to do it?—It was intended, I think, very nearly to do it.

3038. I think the intention was probably to make it something less?—It may have been so, but it was very near it at the time, and as the increase in the maintenance rate goes up the grant becomes less and less effective.

Pauper lunatics maintained by relatives.

3039. May not one reason why the number of pauper lunatics in asylums is large be this: that in a great many cases relatives repay the cost of maintenance in an asylum, and that the guardians are aware of that fact, the reason being that the difference between the cost of a pauper lunatic in an asylum and the cost of a private patient in an asylum is very considerable?—Yes.

3040. Consequently there are, are there not, a good many cases of lunatics sent to asylums as paupers who would not ordinarily be paupers, but who are sent there in order that they may be treated as paupers in the asylum, and whose relatives are willing to repay the cost of their maintenance there?—I have never heard that alleged. It may be so, and very likely is so.

3041. It has not come before you?—No, it has not. As you are aware, we have had considerable correspondence with the Commissioners in Lunacy from time to time as to the recovery of sums from the relatives of lunatics.

3042. Of course where the amount is recovered from the relatives the guardians would not get the 4s.?—No, they would not.

Difficulties of special workhouses for special classes.

3043. In one part of your evidence you talked of the grouping of workhouses with a view to larger areas, and you spoke of the difficulties that there were in carrying out arrangements of that kind. Is not one of the difficulties this—that supposing you propose to alter a union area the natural way of looking at the matter by the guardians is whether they will lose rateable value or gain rateable value in proportion to the charge which the parish involves?—That is the first thing that occurs to them.

3044. Consequently would it be your experience that usually where a union will lose they object to the alteration and where they will gain they are in favour of it?—I should say that their tendency would be against it all the time even where they gained by it; that is to say we do not get such an active assistance in making a change from the people who gain as we get violent opposition from the people who lose.

3045. But the assistance, if it came from the local authority, would usually come from where the union would gain from the transfer?—Yes.

3046. It has sometimes been said that one difficulty which would arise I think from having very large areas for the purpose of indoor relief would be that persons would be sent to workhouses situate at a considerable distance from their relatives?—That was a consideration which had a great effect with the Cottage Homes Committee.

3047. Do you yourself share that view?—To some extent. It is a point against the proposal.

3048. Do you think that there is ground for supposing that the old people in workhouses would object to be placed very far off from their relatives?—Yes, they might; but a great deal more has been made of that objection than in my judgment it is entitled to. Of course it is, as I say, a point against the proposal.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

5 Feb. 1906.

3049. What I was rather trying to ascertain was whether the objection is well founded or not ?—The foundation is small, but there is a foundation for it. A great deal depends on the size of the area you are taking. If you have one workhouse near a market town which is used for two or three unions there is no force in the objection at all ; but if you are going to amalgamate the whole county of Surrey, say, or the whole county of Kent, for the purpose of workhouse classification, then the objection would take a very different form.

Objections to county as area for indoor relief.

3050. Therefore you would say that if there were a proposal to make the county the area for in-door relief it would be much too big an area to take ?—Yes. As I said in answer to another Commissioner, I attach great weight to the visiting of a workhouse inmate by somebody from his own neighbourhood. That is a great check on all sorts of abuses.

Unions without workhouses.

3051. You mentioned one or two cases where it would be practicable to have a union without a workhouse ; such cases must arise from the voluntary action of one board of guardians agreeing with another board of guardians to take their cases, must it not ?—Quite so.

3052. The boards could not be compelled to do it ?—No they could not.

3053. Where there is no workhouse do they make some provisions with regard to casuals ?—Yes, sometimes. Occasionally they have an arrangement whereby a casual coming from the east shall be charged to one union and a casual coming from the west shall be charged to another union.

Safeguards against abuses in workhouses.

3054. With regard to the avoidance of abuses, or the checking of abuses in workhouses, are there any arrangements in force which have that effect ?—I can say that the Local Government Board take every possible precaution that they can against abuses in workhouses. The safeguards they rely upon are these—A visiting Committee of the guardians ; the Ladies' Visiting Committee ; then the medical officer is usually a man in independent practice outside, and cannot afford to have a scandal ; then there is in the majority of unions in England a chaplain, who is also an independent man from the outside ; then there are visits and religious services held by ministers of various denominations ; then there are the visits of relations to paupers in the workhouse ; then you have the freely elected board of guardians who have to answer to the parochial electors at regular intervals ; and lastly—and I should put it least—there is the central inspection of the Local Government Board.

Visitation of workhouses.

Resident workhouse medical officers.

3055. (Mr. Patten MacDougall.) Is there a resident medical officer in some cases ?—In large workhouses there is, and, what is better, in large workhouses there are occasionally resident assistant medical officers with visiting medical officers from the outside, men in private practice. In recent years our whole policy seems to have been to get independent persons from the outside to visit the workhouses.

Existing compulsory classification in workhouses.

3056. (Sir Samuel Provis.) With regard to classification in workhouses, a certain classification is compulsory under the General Consolidated Order, is it not ?—Yes.

3057. But that is limited practically, is it not, to age, sex, infirm and able-bodied ?—Yes.

3058. A further classification is optional with the guardians, is it not ?—Yes.

3059. Although there is a sort of direction to them in the Order to consider the matter ?—Yes.

Attributes of Local Government Board's circulars, General and Special Orders.

3060. Then you have spoken about certain Orders and circulars which have been issued by the Local Government Board. I suppose it might be taken that where a circular is issued it is merely issued as a matter of exhortation to the guardians, or of advice or recommendation ?—That is all.

3061. But where an Order is issued it is thereupon compulsory upon them to give effect to it ?—An Order has the force of law.

3062. The more important Orders are usually General Orders addressed to a number of boards of guardians, are they not ?—Yes.

3063. But sometimes it happens, does it not, that a matter which would ordinarily be dealt with by a General Order is dealt with by a Special Order in the case of a particular union, because that union is freshly set up or some change has taken place in its circumstances ?—That is so.

3064. Has that Special Order the same attributes as a General Order ?—It is advertised differently.

Necessity publicatio of Special Orders amending General Orders.

3065. But it is published in the Gazette, is it not ? — Yes. There is this point which might give rise to some misconception—though a General Order is only an Order which is applicable to several unions, still an Order which varies or rescinds a General Order is also a General Order, and has to be published in the Gazette although it only affects one union. The reference to that is to be found in 10 and 11 Vic. c. 109, Sec. 15.

Number local Act affecting Poor Law administ tion.

3066. You told us that in a certain number of unions there were local Acts which affected the administration of the union ; they are not very numerous, I think, are they ?—I have the list* of them here ; there are fourteen of them.

3067. Would it be possible to put in some statement, or could something be got from the guardians showing generally what the effect of those local Acts is as affecting the administration of relief ?—I think it might be done. We cannot do it, I think, in the office of the Board itself, because so many of the sections have been repealed and it would be a rather complex piece of work. I think the Commission will find that as a matter of practice there are very few of them that affect Poor Law administration at all. We only get to hear of them, and they only become a trouble when we have to deal with questions of boundary. Then sometimes we find there is a local Act in existence which may impede our action.

Justices' powers as out-relief obsolete.

3068. Coming to the question of out-door relief, I think the Justices have certain powers which you have called to mind under the Act of 1834 ; among others they may order relief in cases of sudden and urgent necessity or if the guardians refuse. Do you know at all whether those powers are ever acted upon ?—They are acted upon very seldom.

3069. Might they go ?—They might certainly go. Practically you will occasionally find a Justice determined to act on the powers, but when it comes to the point you can always pick a hole in his action and so it is practically impossible for him to do it. Those powers, therefore might just as well go.

Principle allocation Prohibito and Regu tion Orde to unions

3070. You told us about the difference between the Prohibitory Order and the Regulation Order, and you dwelt on the fact that the Regulation Order is particularly in force in London and also in Lancashire, but I do not think you meant to say that the Regulation Order was limited to London and Lancashire ?—No, I did not.

3071. The object was, was it not, that it should apply to places with large populations where it was supposed that the able-bodied poor could not actually be relieved in the workhouses ?—It was supposed to apply to unions where the workhouse accommodation was considered to be insufficient to enable the Prohibitory Order to be acted upon.

3072. It was the case, was it not, that a somewhat more stringent order was issued previously to that, but in the same year, and had to be withdrawn because it was found to be too stringent ?—Yes ; that I believe was the history of the matter.

Prohibiti of rent-re

3073. With regard to the prohibition on the guardians to pay rent which is contained in the order, was not the real intention that they should not pay back rent, but that this was not to interfere with their paying for board and lodging required when the application was made, so that if the man was destitute and required board and lodging they were not precluded from paying ?—That is so. As I said, it obviously meant that the rent should not be paid direct to the landlord. The abuses of such a practice would be evident, especially if it were a case of back rent.

3074. The duty of the guardians is not to pay a man's debts ?—No, it is not.

3075. But to relieve his present destitution ?—That is so.

3076. Therefore, they would not pay any back rent that he might owe ?—That is so.

* For list of local Act Unions, see paper handed in by Mr. Adrian, C.B. Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. 1 (H).

ficulties as medical ief on loan.

3077. Then we come now to quite a different matter, namely, the question of medical relief on loan. Does it appear to you that the practical difficulty of making any satisfactory rule upon that subject is almost insuperable ?—I think so.

3078. On the one hand, if you pay the medical officer entirely by fee you will pay him too much for dealing with a particular case, and too little for dealing with another, or, which comes to the same thing, you do not fix a proper payment for the particular case which he attends ?—That is evidently so.

bour yards an ergency edient.

3079. Then you referred to the difficulty with regard to labour yards, and the giving of work in them; notwithstanding those difficulties, would it be your view that it would be beneficial that there should be some system according to which the poor are set to work if they are able-bodied, and are relieved out of the workhouse ?—If able-bodied men are to be relieved at all, I think you must have some out-door labour system in times of emergency.

posed ck on vision of our yards.

3080. Would you say that usually it would only be in times of emergency ?—Yes; and I am not sure that the consent of the Local Government Board ought not to be necessary before the Labour Test Order is acted upon.

3081. So that it would be advantageous to make some consent necessary before it is put in force, although the Order may be technically in force in unions ?—Yes, I have got a case here which is rather interesting, where a surcharge was made and enforced upon a board of guardians, because they only employed the men for two days a week in the labour yard.

3082. (Sir Henry Robinson.) And gave them a week's wages ?—They do not pay wages—they gave them a week's relief.

3083. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Is that a current case ?—No; it is a case of some two or three years ago.

tention of and outs.

3084. You referred also I think to the fact that there is a certain amount of compulsory detention in the workhouse at the present time in the case of people who go in and out frequently ?—Yes; up to seven days.

3085. The time was increased, was it not, under the Act of 1899, so as to provide that if a man had, in the opinion of the guardians, discharged himself frequently without sufficient reason the detention might be extended to 168 hours ?—Yes.

Central Authority's power to require appointment of additional relieving officers.

3086. With regard to the relieving officers, it is in the power of the Local Government Board, is it not, to require a board of guardians to appoint an additional relieving officer if they think fit to do so ?—Yes.

3087. Have they, in some instances, exercised that power ?—In several instances recently they have done so.

Books required with case paper system.

3088. With regard to the case paper system, where that is in force, I assume that the relief order book ought to be kept as well as the case paper, in order that the actual direction of the guardians may be preserved in a book which can be produced at any time ?—The relief order book would take the place of a register and would be kept separate from the case papers as a record. The application and report book I do not think would be necessary.

3089. And I think that has been dispensed with in some instances ?—Yes, although I believe there is an objection to doing so.

Proposed extension of Central Authority's powers to decide settlement.

3090. Then you told us about the settlement; there has been a suggestion that appeals to the Local Government Board might be made compulsory; do you think it would be difficult for them to determine in that case not only the question of law, but the question of fact as to where a man had resided or where he had acquired a settlement ?—My suggestion was that if they failed to state a case they should have no remedy.

3091. That is if they did not agree ?—Yes; and then they have got to agree on a case before they could take the removal.

3092. The alternative would be, would it not, to have an enquiry for the purpose of determining the question of fact ?—Yes.

3093. And that might be possible, might it not ?—That might be quite possible, though I hesitate to suggest any such addition to the work of the board.

Riots against guardians.

3094. (Chairman.) After the Commission of 1834 reported, a great change was made in the administration of the Poor Law, and there were certain disturbances and riots; in your recollection have boards of guardians ever been subject to any proceedings of that kind in consequence of an alteration in the administration of the Poor Law?—Not as against the central authority, but I have several times in my experience seen local riots partly directed against the guardians. For instance, in 1879 there was a strike in the Lancashire cotton trade which ended in very considerable riots; mills were burned and, for the only time in my recollection, the Hundred Rate was levied to pay compensation to the mill owners. During that time on several occasions when I was going to meetings of the board of guardians I was escorted there by policemen and escaped from the back door in a cab. That was because of the actual pressure of the numbers to be relieved by the guardians, and because it was felt that probably the guardians might have been more liberal than they were. My duty was simply to explain the law. Again, rather later, there was the case of Middlesbrough, where the men paraded about the town with loaves of bread held up on sticks and clamoured for food or work. When men are in distress they will put this kind of pressure on the guardians, and it is on those occasions that the orders and audit of the Local Government Board are such a support to the guardians.

Local Government Board orders and audit a bulwark for guardians.

3095. I think the first case you mentioned was at Blackburn?—It was all over North Lancashire.

3096. Those are the only two cases you can recollect?—That was the only case of actual riot, but I have known many cases of disturbances. In South Wales I remember, somewhere in the seventies, they had soldiers down. When there is a strike and the men are poor, their blood gets up and you have to be prepared for them.

3097. The disturbance is more due to the strike than to the administration of the Poor Law?—It would be in consequence of the local administration. The men were not organised, and they were not clamouring for a change in the law. They were clamouring for perhaps a laxer administration by the board of guardians.

3098. Taking ordinary times, that is not so?—We hear of nothing of the kind.

Nursing of infirm in sick wards.

3099. (Mr. Lansbury.) Yesterday you were discussing the sick wards and the infirm wards. I understood you to say that in the sick wards now it was a mistake to suppose that nurses were needed in the same proportion as they would be in a hospital, because many of the people were not really sick. Were not you rather confusing sick wards when you said that?—I do not think I said that.

3100. I took it down at the time. It was in answer to a question by Dr. Downes, and it seemed to me there was a little confusion between infirm wards and sick wards. In most workhouses you have infirm wards and sick wards. The infirm wards are where the people are who do not require nursing, but it is the sick ward against which very often the criticism is levelled, because there are not enough nurses and because in quite recent times you had pauper nurses?—I do not think you were present when I dealt with that question at rather more length. What I said was that in the old days, or even up to the time of Dr. Edward Smith's report, there was a feeling that trained nurses were not necessary in workhouses because the sick were chronic. That was the time when for eight thousand sick in London you had 111 paid nurses, and when in the whole of London there were but three night nurses. Then I pointed out that the whole character of the administration has changed; the nurses have gone from tens to hundreds, and a class of sick come into the Poor Law infirmaries now that never did come before.

Former number of poor law nurses in London.

3101. I am rather thinking of a workhouse where you have infirm wards, and where the infirm wards are wards for only infirm people, and on the other hand you have a sick asylum or another place where really sick people go to. What I understood yesterday was that you said that most of the people in these sick wards were not sick at all, they were only infirm—chronic cases?—My answer yesterday referred to country workhouses and not to urban workhouses.

3102. Do you know any district that you can put your finger on where the provision of a decent infirmary has, within your knowledge or within the knowledge of anyone you are acquainted with, stopped thrift on the part of the people living there?—No, you cannot trace such an effect as that over so small an area. You have to deal with this economic cause and effect over a much larger area than one isolated instance.

Effect of medical relief on providence against sickness.

3103. Do you know of a group of districts or a large area, because I understood you to speak definitely yesterday?—What I meant was that it was a matter for special investigation in certain districts; that I personally was convinced that the lax administration of relief certainly did discourage medical clubs and thrift clubs of that sort.

3104. That, of course, presupposes that you are aware of the wages and housing conditions, and all the rest of it connected with the social life of the people so treated?—It would follow to some extent. It can only be an opinion.

3105. You are only giving it as an opinion?—Yes, but I suggest it as a matter for special investigation.

3106. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) I gathered you thought the State hospital under any circumstances would rather lead to the discouragement of thrift ?—In the long run.

3107. France would be rather a case against that, would not it ?—Yes, France would.

3108. (Mr. Lansbury.) My point, of course, is this, that it is purely a matter of opinion on your part. You have not any facts or figures as to the social conditions of any particular district which you can put your finger on to say : Here thrift has been discouraged and medical clubs have gone under ?—If you ask me whether I have a complete account of the social and economic conditions of any part of England by which I can definitely prove that the lax administration of relief has led to a lack of thrift, I have not, but I have seen numberless individual instances which have led me to suppose that such is the case.

3109. Take a district like West Ham, for instance; that has grown up in my lifetime, and has certainly grown up in yours; are there any rich people there ? Take Canning Town, for instance; have any rich people lived there to look after, or in any way attend to, the poor who we know are there ?—Your point all the way through is that charity would be so much better ; I suggest to you that in the districts where you have what is called lax administration because of good infirmaries and that sort of thing, you have not the charitable people living there, or at any rate you have not people with sufficient means to provide it ?—Your point would be that there are certain districts where the people are so poor that a somewhat lavish administration of relief is necessary.

3110. Not exactly lavish; that is not the point. My point is that there is no one there to do what you say you want done instead of Poor Law relief—that is charity ?—Therefore the rates must do it ?

3111. I want to get the fact from you ?—As to the fact that they do not live there I agree. I do not suppose such people live in Canning Town, though some rich railway companies and dock companies are there.

3112. There is no one to provide the charity, that is my point, so there is no alternative but to go to the Poor Rate ?—All my life I have heard of East End distress, and of attempts to get money in aid of it. I should think there was more charity going in those poor parts of the East End of London than there would be in many poor country parishes. I have not had the East End in my district.

3113. Have you any accurate statistics, or is not a good deal of what you have said opinion which you have formed, and one has, therefore, only to treat it as opinion ? —I may say that I have a number of tables and curves, and so on, which deal with that point; they show the increase and decrease of rateable value, pauperism, population, and various other points of that sort, but whether I have anything which would exactly show what you ask, I could not say, because what you ask is not exactly statistical.

3114. But what I want to get at is this : In the examination yesterday there was a good deal made of the point that charity was so much better than the rates ; and that it would be better if people were relieved by charitable effort. At any rate that is what I gathered, and my point is that in very many urban districts there are not rich people living, and there are not endowed charities ; as a matter of fact there is not anything to do what you think ought to be done for the relief of sick people by providing hospitals, therefore they are compelled to go to the rates ?—I think it would be very much better to get evidence of this description from what I call first-hand sources. I am not a first-hand source. I know nothing from actual experience of these districts, but I have heard and have read of places like St. George's-in-the-East, Whitechapel, and some other unions in the East End of London, where the relief keeps pretty constant, and where the rates are not oppressive. I have always been under the impression that that was to a great extent due to the fact that the resources of charity and the resources of self-help (which I suppose are individually in the men in Canning Town as they are in other places) were drawn out by a more careful and more rigid administration of public relief.

3115. I was coming to that. In your evidence you compared unions such as Brixworth, St. George's-in-the-East, and others, to show the difference in administration. What I want to get from you is, have you any evidence as to the social conditions prevailing in Whitechapel thirty years ago, when the policy which you have just mentioned was first started, and have you any evidence to show the Gentile population at that particular time, the rateable value of Whitechapel at that particular time, and the alien population and the rateable value of Whitechapel now, because they are essential things in forming a judgment as to the value of the comparison in your evidence ?—I have no accurate figures. I suppose there would be some evidence on the point, but evidence would be impossible, as to the number of Jews in Whitechapel in those days. It is said the reason why Whitechapel manages to retain its strict administration is because of the Jews ; that is to say, it is apparently saved by the Jews.

3116. What is it you form your conclusions from ?—It is a matter of opinion, but it is an opinion based upon thirty years' actual practical experience of the administration of the Poor Law. Over 250 unions in England have been in my district. Every week I attend meetings of boards of guardians, and I see the administration; and naturally one is acquainted with the current literature on the subject, so I submit to the Commission that at all events I have a right to form an opinion upon the point.

3117. I am not questioning your right ; I hope you will not think that I have not enough respect for you to value your opinion ; I really have, and I am not saying that at all complimentarily. The whole point that I want to get at (because I consider this is vital to the whole discussion of the Poor Law) is that when we get an opinion stated by a gentleman like yourself, we are entitled to have it in evidence what it is you base that opinion upon, because some of us have other opinions which experience has also led us to form. What I really want to get at is whether, in judging St. George's-in-the-East, which is on all fours with Whitechapel, you have taken into account the enormous growth of the alien population, and, in forming a judgment as to the ratio of pauperism in St. George's, you have taken the Gentile population and found out what proportion of paupers there are in it as compared with the entire population ?—That is a point which I have not considered.

Difficulties in comparing St. George's-in-the-East and Whitechapel.

3118. I think that is an essential point in judging St. George's-in-the-East and Canning Town, for instance, where there are no aliens. Do you really think that most of the people who are in the infirmaries of London, or anywhere, are people who were able to exercise thrift and therefore could have kept outside ?—Yes, I do. I will state later on the reasons which have in my judgment led to the enormous increase of expenditure in London. I believe that there is no part of England where a strict administration of the Poor Law would not save a certain number of those who at present are paupers and restore them to the ranks of independence.

Effect of administration on pauperism.

3119. There, again, you must have some evidence. If you are going to submit that later, I will not pursue it. You must have some evidence as to wages and conditions because, again, they govern it ?—I think you will find, even in the poorest districts, you may have an administration which will check the growth of pauperism. I look upon pauperism as an actual evil—as a social disease.

3120. That is all right, I know that, but what I want to get from you is, how it is you come to the conclusion ; what are the figures and facts which have made you come to the conclusion that the bulk of people in infirmaries ought not to be there ; that they ought to be maintaining themselves at home ?—I do not think I said that. I think I said a certain proportion of them, under a stricter administration, would not be there.

3121. What do you think is the proportion ?—That I do not know. That would vary a great deal with the social conditions. What is quite obvious is that, all over England, you will find unions with apparently the same social conditions, the same rateable conditions, the same rate of wages, and in one you will find pauperism is 30 per cent. higher than in the other, and in every one of those cases you will find the proportion of outdoor relief given is much greater. The greater the proportion of out-door relief, the greater the proportion of pauperism ; you will find that in London unions. There is one London union with a rate of 67 per thousand, the average rate in London being 27 per thousand.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

6 Feb. 1906.

3122. But, even so, are we going to have evidence from you, or from anyone else, as to the social conditions in these unions you are comparing now ?—That is a matter entirely for the Commission. I should think the Commission would find that evidence very important and very vital.

3123. You are not putting it forward ?—I am not putting it forward ; I am merely putting forward the Poor Law side.

Returns of deaths from starvation in London.

3124. It is now the custom, is not it, to give returns of the deaths from starvation in the Metropolis ?—Yes.

3125. Would there be any objection to our having copies of all those returns for, say, the last seven or eight years ?—If the Commission desires it, I think there will be no difficulty, and there certainly will be no unwillingness, to supply every reference to deaths by starvation which occurred from the very earliest times which are in these reports.

3126. I had in my mind your answer to a question yesterday : that since 1870 these deaths have decreased, and that previously they took place to a very great extent in unions where out-door relief was given ?—I do not think I said that ; I said a large proportion of the deaths from starvation were those of persons in receipt of out-door relief.

3127. You put it that way, I daresay. What I want to ask you is : since 1870, would you say that—since the time when Mr. Chaplin was President of the Board and the return was first issued ? This is a return which comes round to the Boards in London regularly every year ?—A return (Parliamentary Paper No. 289, Session 1904) was made to an address of the House of Commons of the number of deaths in the administrative county of London in the year 1903, upon which a coroner's jury had returned a verdict of death from starvation, or death accelerated by privation, together with any observations furnished to us by boards of guardians with reference to cases included in the return. The number of such deaths returned by the coroners was thirty-nine. We requested the guardians of the union or parish in which the death occurred to furnish us with such facts in regard to the deceased as were known or could be ascertained by the guardians or their officers. The purport of the information received in reply is included in the return. In only three cases was death ascribed solely to want of sufficient food. For the most part the deaths appear to have been due to disease consequent upon or accelerated by want or exposure, or both, and to self-neglect. In most of the cases either no application had been made for poor relief, or application was only made when the deceased was in a dying condition. In connection with one of the cases it appeared that the arrangements for dealing promptly with urgent applications were capable of improvement, and the guardians consequently initiated a better system. The cause of death does not appear to have been attributable in any case to neglect on the part of the guardians or their officers.

Effect of increase of "Shelters" in decreasing deaths from privation.

3128. I would like to have those returns put in, but is not it a fact that since 1870 General Booth's and the Church Army's and a whole crowd of voluntary doss-houses have been put up in London, and that, therefore, you would not expect, even apart from the Poor Law, so many people to die of starvation and privation in London as previously ?—I am afraid I cannot agree with you as to the utility of doss-houses and shelters.

3129. Is not it the fact that since 1870 you have had all these Institutions to which what are termed the wastrels of the Metropolis can go, whereas, previous to that date, you only had the Poor Law to which they could apply ?—My impression is that there was a considerable number of shelters long before 1870.

3130. There were some ?—I remember a report of a Committee of the House of Commons which was made in 1846, I think, in which the question of shelters is dealt with ; but I quite agree that the number of shelters has increased. Medland Hall is a place of old standing.

Mr. Chaplin's circular as to adequate relief to aged deserving poor.

3131. Mr. Chaplin issued the circular to Boards of Guardians urging them to give adequate out-relief to aged people, I think, in 1900 ?—That was so.

3132. Do you consider that out-relief to aged people leads to sweating ?—If they do any work, it has that tendency.

3133. Then, of course, the department is responsible, because they advised the boards of guardians to give out-relief to aged people ?—What the department says is : the board consider that aged deserving persons should not be urged into the workhouse at all unless there is some cause which renders such a course necessary, but they should be relieved by having adequate out-door relief granted to them. On many occasions I have been asked what that means, and I have answered that the relief ought to be adequate in every sense : it ought to be so adequate that there would be no necessity for the pauper working, because the adequacy has to be considered not only in relation to the individual pauper, but with regard to the welfare of the body politic. I may say that I am coming to that circular by another door, and you will have ample opportunity of dealing with it.

3134. May you give out-relief to able-bodied women ?—Do you mean in London ?

Out-relief to able-bodied women in London.

3135. Yes ?—Under the Regulation Order you can.

3136. To unmarried women ?—Yes, under the Regulation Order, but under the Prohibitory Order you cannot.

3137. Which order is in vogue in London ?—The Regulation Order.

3138. That we may give it to unmarried women ?—The word in the one order is "males," and the word in the other order is "persons."

Number of single women receiving out-door relief.

3139. Do you know whether it is the rule to give relief to unmarried women in London ?—In London, in 1905, there were 203 single women who received out-door relief.

3140. In the whole of the Metropolis ?—Yes, and in the whole of England there were 2,336, including 287 mothers of illegitimate children. The numbers of mothers of illegitimate children who got out-door relief in London is not distinguished.

3141. Would they be in good health, or sick ?—I do not know.

3142. It is rather important, is it not ?—I suppose the guardians had their reasons. We are precluded from interfering in any individual case, as you are aware.

3143. What I wish to get at is, whether boards of guardians are allowed to give out door relief to an unmarried woman in good health who is at work ?—In London I suppose so.

3144. There are only 203, so it is very easy to get the details of those ?—If they consider her to be destitute.

3145. That would only be sudden and urgent necessity. Perhaps I ought to postpone these questions, and ask them of the Inspector for London ?—He would know naturally more about the practice of his boards of guardians. We do not do it in the country, because we cannot.

3146. I suggest to you that they do not do it in London either, as a rule ?—You have the exact number, 203.

3147. Which is a very small number, of course. Whether these women were in good health or not you cannot say ?—I think no one would have that information, generally speaking.

3148. I can take it, for practical purposes, out-relief is not given to unmarried women in good health, because you say you do not do it in the country, and there are only 203 in London ?—There are a certain number of cases in the other Regulation unions. I fancy you would have more cases of that sort in some of the Lancashire unions than you would have in London, because there are a number of wage-earning women there in excess of the number elsewhere.

Out-relief to unmarried mothers.

3149. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Do the mothers of illegitimate children get out door relief without remonstrance being made ?—It is forbidden under the Prohibitory Order. We have some cases where we are asked to dispense with that regulation by country boards of guardians. I am sorry to say those cases are getting much more frequent, and we do not deal with them with quite the severity we should do. As a matter of fact, you will find that will not be very much allowed in future.

Effect on wages of out-relief to widows.

3150. (Mr. Lansbury.) Generally speaking, it is the out relief of widows, so far as women are concerned, that you consider sends wages down ?—So far as women are concerned, they would be the main people who would interfere with the labour market—they and the old women who do charing and similar work.

3151. After all, there is a very large number of widows who get outdoor relief, is not there ?—Yes. Shall I give you the number of widows who get out door relief ? They are as follows :—able-bodied women, other than wives of paupers, widows, 2,931 in London, and 31,000 outside London, making 34,000 in all ; wives relieved on account of husband being in gaol, and wives of sailors, soldiers, and other non-resident males, 640 in London, 4,700 elsewhere ; making a total of 5,300. Those figures are taken from the half-yearly statement of pauperism.

3152. Your point is that giving these widows relief enables them to go to work for less wages than they otherwise would be obliged to ?—Yes.

3153. The alternative to out-door relief is to take the children to an Institution, is it not ?—Yes ; or, in many cases stricter investigation, or an order for the workhouse to the woman, would show whether she was able to maintain herself or that she had friends.

3154. Still, there would be the sweating done ?—No, she then would be much more inclined to make a good bargain with her employer, and say : "I am not going to work unless I get full wages." She could not afford to.

3155. Again, that is only a matter of opinion ?—My view is that in these matters you must be guided by general tendencies, and my view is that the general tendency of out-door relief to able-bodied women is to lower wages.

3156. That is, of course, your opinion on the subject ?—I wish to introduce the word "tendency."

3157. What I want now to ask you is, if a woman is left with five children, and you take three of them into the workhouse or into the school you relieve her of the burden of maintaining these three children, and she still can go to work at a low rate of wages, because she has not got to keep those three children. You have relieved her of those in exactly the same way as if you gave her out-relief, by relieving her of a portion of her burden. Where does the difference come in ? Why does the one lead to sweating and the other not lead to sweating ?—The woman who has the normal number of children to support is a free woman just the same as any other woman ; she can make her own bargain. The woman who is extremely poor and has out-door relief is not in that position ; but you must remember this, that is not the only reason why some boards of guardians take children into workhouses ; they do it for the sake of the children and for the sake of the test. When it comes to the actual point of whether the woman is helped in that way and kept on the labour market, the answer can only be, yes, she is helped.

3158. My point to you is that you help the woman in either case ?—Yes, you do.

3159. And if in the one case you are entitled to say it tends to sweating by helping her in a particular form, I want to find out how logically you can say it does not lead to sweating when you help her in another way ?—You cannot, but the reasons why are different.

3160. Of course the same thing applies, does not it, if people help her by charity, or if her relations help her ?—That again is a different thing.

3161. The effect must be the same ; you have relieved the woman of a certain amount of strain and stress ?—Yes, and you are right to do it out of your own money.

3162. You and I will not discuss that, because I hold quite another view as to what is our own money. Now as to Scattered Homes : In Sheffield, for instance, you have Scattered Homes in the town, and a child is not taken to the workhouse, but it is taken from its mother to a particular home ; given the mother is a respectable person, why should not you give her the money to keep the child ; where is the moral hurt to anybody in giving the woman the money, rather than giving it to another woman in the same street, to mind her children ?—I do not know the Sheffield practice, but I should say if it be as you state, the reason was, first because they desired to impose a test of some sort upon the mother, next because they are not satisfied that the children could be as well brought up by a woman who has to go out to work to make up her inadequate income, and therefore must more or less leave the children neglected ; they think probably it would be better to take those children and bring them up properly. That, I should think, was in their minds. I do not say whether I agree with it or not.

3163. You have a mother who is fairly respectable, and you have a board that believes in what is called strict administration, that is no outdoor relief, and yet they give indirectly outdoor relief, by putting the woman's children two or three doors away from her in practically the same street ?—Do you mean the result is the same as if they gave the outdoor relief to the woman ?

3164. Yes, just the same. That is always providing, of course, that the woman is a respectable woman. I quite agree you have to take children away from some mothers, but they are not all like that. What I want to get at is, where the moral hurt is in giving the mother the money rather than another woman, and whether you would not be preserving the home life better ?—I have stated the administrative reasons for doing it, which seem to me conclusive, although, as I have said before in the previous part of my evidence, I am no great believer in the system of taking children away from their mothers for other reasons which are not exactly economical. I think the extraordinary proportion of child paupers to the total rate of pauperism which exists in London might perhaps, be traceable to some practice of that kind. That is a matter for your consideration. In 1860 child pauperism accounted for 18 per cent. of the total pauperism of England ; at present it accounts for no less than 33 per cent.

Growth of child pauperism.

3165. The other point I want to put to you on that answer is that of course it may be that men die earlier, and therefore you have a bigger proportion of widows ?—Men die earlier ? I know the death rate of London has fallen in a most remarkable way.

3166. You are dealing with a set of years, are you not ?—Yes.

3167. On that we require to know whether there is a bigger proportion of widows now than previously ?—That, I should think, was a fact ascertainable without difficulty.

3168. You need that to form a correct judgment as to how that increase arises ?—Of child pauperism, yes.

3169. That is an essential fact in it ?—That sort of increase has not occurred outside London ; this is a London increase of child pauperism.

3170. As I understand this matter is coming up again, I will leave it there. For able bodied paupers you advocate a Test House for London in the Metropolis ?—Yes, I most strongly advocate a Test House.

Test-house for London able-bodied paupers.

3171. You advocate that for groups of unions, rather than to have one for individual unions ?—I should think, from my knowledge of London pauperism, that very few unions would have enough really able-bodied men for a Test House, so that it would be better to have a group of unions, and a Test House in the country.

3172. Is not it the fact with regard to the men called able-bodied under sixty, that the great bulk of them are not able-bodied ?—I should say emphatically so. There are three sorts of able-bodied in London and the country generally. There is the able-bodied, as we call them able-bodied ; there is the able-bodied because they happen to be under sixty ; and the able-bodied because the doctor puts them on No. 1 diet ; but as to any real definition of what is meant by able-bodied I do not know what it is.

Practical meaning of term "able-bodied."

3173. Will this all come up later ? It will come up in this way : I have here two diagrams (see Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (10 and 11)) with a curve showing the indoor pauperism clinging to the population curve all the way through. The able-bodied line is very much down, and then from a certain date it goes up. The red line on the second of these diagrams is the actual sick among the able-bodied. The number of sick able-bodied is increasing very fast.

3174. The point is that besides a Test House, a place where you would have really laborious work, you must have a place where only work that needs less physical exertion is carried on ?—Workhouse work.

3175. Would you advocate that in towns, or away from towns ?—It is very much cheaper, and much more convenient, to have your Test House in the country, with a certain amount of land attached to it; I mean for a big town like London.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

6 Feb. 1906.

Mr. Chamberlain's circular as to municipal employment.

3176. With regard to periods of great distress, have you anything to do with the circular which has been issued by the President of the Board? Is that in your Department?—The circular as to municipal occupation issued by Mr. Chamberlain in 1886 came through my Department.

3177. Can you tell me what the effect of that has been?—I think I have not got the figures out actually statistically, but almost every year there has been a certain amount of municipal employment. We get returns about it from time to time, which the Commission can have.

Disfranchisement by relief.

3178. As I understand you are still in favour of disfranchising a man who in any way is assisted by the Poor Law?—Yes.

3179. What is the difference between assisting a man through the Poor Law and assisting him through another public authority?—In principle none, and in my view they ought all to be disfranchised, and more especially ought they to be disfranchised from municipal elections. When boards of guardians are elected by their own paupers, we may see a real break-down in the Poor Law, which has not happened yet.

Effect and value of Modified Workhouse Test Order.

3180. Have you had any experience of the Modified Workhouse Test Order?—I have not in my own district, because we have always done it without an Order, whether legally or not I do not know.

3181. Would it be better, instead of taking a man into the ordinary workhouse, to take him out of the town on to a labour colony, or as you would call it, a country workhouse, rather than the ordinary workhouse in a town?—There is a great deal of difference between what I mean by a labour colony and a country workhouse or a test house, and what is known as a farm colony.

3182. Do you think it is good that under the Modified Workhouse Test Order a man who has never been inside a workhouse should be taken into an ordinary London or urban workhouse?—I see no objection to it, if he is properly done by there. I see considerable objections to the making of another sort of institution which is not a workhouse, and putting that under the control of the boards of guardians.

3183. Do you think, with regard to a comparatively young man who has never been inside a workhouse, that it is conducive to the moral health of that man to go there at all? You know what a workhouse is, and you know the sort of life, and the sort of people who gravitate there?—These questions are always put to one in a question-begging way. The widow is always respectable, and she always has a very large number of children; the man is always a really hard-working, respectable man. I should say about the really hard-working, respectable man who is not a loafer and not hopeless (because, unfortunately, there are some morally good people who are hopeless from physical and mental defects) that he was not a case for the Poor Law at all. He ought not to be on the Poor Law. That man ought to be emigrated, or looked after by some charitable association, and I venture to think that in most cases he is, except in times of very great distress and depression.

3184. At any rate you do not think that it is good that an able-bodied man who, through misfortune, is out of employment should be dealt with under the Modified Workhouse Test Order?—No. To be brought into such a position by poverty must be a melancholy situation, and certainly I am sorry that any decent man should have to go into the workhouse.

3185. Your Department has just issued the Modified Workhouse Test Order?—It has been in force for a good number of years in Whitechapel.

3186. I understand that it has just gone round to all boards of guardians?—No, it has not.

3187. We have had it in London?—I think I should explain that that order is an alternative to the outdoor labour test, and it is only issued to meet special circumstances when the workhouses are full.

3188. Is not it also issued to deal with the best classes of people who go before the guardians?—I cannot say. I do not think historically that is the reason it was issued.

Modified Workhouse Test Order Whitechapel.

3189. I do not want to know historically. I want you to take the Whitechapel case, if you do not mind. Is not it true that that was adopted in Whitechapel specifically to deal with the best class of applicants for relief? This is a matter that is really well known; it is not a matter of opinion at all; this is a question of facts?—Facts are history. I do not know how it was introduced into Whitechapel, or why it was introduced, or on whose motion.

3190. (Mr. Loch.) Have you yourself had the question of Whitechapel before you?—No. I should have thought the sole reason for issuing the Whitechapel order was as an alternative to the outdoor labour test, which is open to grave objection. I know that in the country we have done it in many unions without an order for a number of years.

3191. (Sir Samuel Provis.) In point of fact the order was issued twenty years ago, and you had nothing to do with it, I think?—That is so.

3192. (Mr. Lansbury.) It is true it was only issued to Whitechapel in the first instance. It is only quite lately that the others have had it?—I should like to know whether Whitechapel made any use of it. I think you asked me the number of males and females who are indoor paupers in London who are in health; I can give it to you now.

Numbers and classification of able-bodied indoor paupers in London.

3193. I should be pleased if you would?—These are the figures of able-bodied in London: males in health 3,700; temporarily disabled, 2,900; females in health, 2,300; temporarily disabled, 2,500. The number of what I may call the sick able-bodied has steadily gone up. They were not divided in our statistics before 1891 or 1892, but they have been divided since. What is an able-bodied pauper is still in doubt. We first of all exclude those who are sick, but of the remnant how many are men who actually are able to do a day's work and earn their own living we do not know. That is a matter of opinion.

3194. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) What does "in health" mean exactly?—Not on the medical relief book, I should think.

Meaning of "able-bodied."

3195. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) What do your medical officers understand by "able-bodied?"—The men who are on No. 1 diet, I think.

3196. You do not understand that an able-bodied man is a man "able to earn his living"?—No.

3197. Would not that be a better interpretation of the term?—The whole subject needs careful consideration. I gave you the other day the origin of it. It was in consequence of the first dietary table, when the Commissioners said anyone over sixty might have certain extras. That fixed the datum sixty. Then came the able-bodied temporarily sick, and in our statistics we made that another point, and then came the new dietary order under which the medical officer is to inspect each man as he comes into the workhouse, and state the diet on which he is to go, so that a man may be on able-bodied diet and not able to earn his living.

3198. Assuming that "able-bodied" meant something like "able to earn a living," would not that cover the case of widows with children who are, according to what I understand, not able-bodied; they are not able-bodied because they are not able to earn their living as they would be if they were not in a sense disabled by having to look after their children?—That is not the practice in this country.

3199. The widow is pauperised in a sense, when she ceases to be able-bodied: not being able to earn her living because she has to look after the children?—Your definition is "able to earn a living," but everybody who is able to earn a living is turned out of the workhouse in Scotland. He has got to go and do it.

3200. (Dr. Downes.) I think there has never been any actual definition of the meaning of "able-bodied" in the statistics of the Local Government Board?—No.

3201. With regard to the Dietary Order of 1900, I think the provision is: Any male inmate certified by the medical officer of the workhouse as a healthy able-bodied person should be placed either on Class 1 or Class 1a for the purpose of diet?—Yes, that is the provision.

3202. Subject to that, the guardians have a free discretion as to which diet they will put the man on?—Yes.

3203. I do not know whether you are aware that a return has been obtained by the office lately of the number of men who, in the opinion of the masters of the workhouses in London, were able to do a full day's hard work on January 1st, 1906?—Yes, I remember that.

Number of "able-bodied" London paupers capable of earning their living.

3204. The replies are as follows: The total number of men who are on No. 1 diet is 3,720, and the total number of men on house diet other than No. 1 is 17,690. That first number I think you will find given as the total which is returned by the masters in answer to that question?—That return shows there are 1,597 who, in the opinion of the masters, were capable of earning their own living.

3205. (Mr. Lansbury.) Out of how many?—Out of 3,720 nominally able-bodied. I have another return which was made in quite a large district, and they had 220 men who were supposed to be able to do a day's work; they were nearly all in three unions, and that was a district which included the potteries.

3206. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) Not half on the No. 1 dietary are capable of doing a day's work?—Forty-three per cent.

Salvation and Church Army colonies.

3207. (Mr. Lansbury.) You said yesterday that boards of guardians sent men to General Booth?—Yes.

3208. And they pay General Booth for looking after them?—Yes.

3209. Is not that only done with the approval of the Department?—Yes.

3210. No board of guardians can send men either to the Salvation Army or the Church Army without the sanction of the Board?—We have to sanction and approve.

3211. So that any evil effects the Department shares the responsibility of?—Yes.

Pauper lunatics.

3212. Of course, the unhappy lunatic ought not to come under the guardians at all?—On the whole, I would rather see him treated as a class by himself.

3213. That is because it is not his own fault, as a rule, that he becomes a lunatic?—There is no economical or administrative consideration involved; the man is a lunatic by the act of God.

3214. Sometimes from his own acts too?—You mean in the case of a drinker?

3215. And for other reasons?—Perhaps so. I often wonder, in the case of a man who goes mad because he drinks, which came first; his drunkenness or his insanity.

3216. Why should you not apply that to the man who loses his job by getting drunk?—That is a different thing. He does not become a lunatic; that is one of the necessary consequences or punishments.

3217. He becomes a burden to society?—He does, and he should be made a burden to himself.

Poor relief to unemployed and consequent disfranchisement.

3218. If a man, through no fault of his own, gets out of employment, because of a change in the methods of production, or for any other reason that he is not really responsible for, why should he be disfranchised?—I think the worst service you could be doing that man would be to do anything which might lead him to come on to the Poor rates, except in the case of the very last necessity.

3219. I am taking it for granted that it is the last necessity?—Then he must stand by his accidents; he must suffer for the general good of the body politic. According to my view, what you have to consider is, not this or that pauper, but the general good of the whole community, and the general good of the whole community is, I submit, that every obstacle should be put in the way of a man settling down into the status of a pauper—for pauper he is, whether he is disfranchised or whether he is not.

3220. Of course, a lunatic is, too?—I do not think I need answer that objection.

The right to relief.

3221. You may draw the distinction, but it does not seem to me that it holds. The only other thing I should like to ask in regard to that is: is not the spirit of the English Poor Law that every person, since the time of Elizabeth, who is destitute or sick has an absolute right or claim upon society for relief?—You may take it so, though I should not put it so myself, as I have indicated in the earlier part of my evidence.

3222. Is not that the basis of the whole thing?—Yes, the State is not going to allow people to starve if they make application for relief.

3223. And you compel the people who are not starving to support those who are?—You take their money from them by force of law.

Reasons for disfranchisement by relief.

3224. If that custom has grown up in England, why should a man who has paid his money and who reaches the age of sixty be disfranchised because, after forty or fifty years, he has to come on the rates?—For two reasons as I take it: because every available deterrent should be made use of to keep men from appealing to the Poor Law and for making them take thought so that they should not be obliged to appeal to the Poor Law; and secondly, I suppose, because the ultimate end of all election would be to get a decent body elected. I do not think that a board of guardians elected by its own paupers, or a municipal authority elected by the people who get municipal work from them every winter, is at all a body which would be likely to administer public affairs either honestly or justly.

3225. You would be in favour of the disfranchisement of all Civil servants?—I should.

3226. The whole body?—Yes.

The county as the poor-law area.

3227. (Mr. Booth.) I wish now to deal with the question of the size of the areas for Poor relief. The question of size is the question of the possibility of accessibility and the possibility of locomotion. It depends on the means of communication within the area. You said a county was far too large. It struck me that I would like to clear that up. A union to-day may be almost as accessible as a parish of a long time ago, and a county, under the conditions of motors of various kinds, is shrinking in its size as regards the possibility of accessibility?—Certainly, but the main condition is that every part should be accessible.

3228. You still think at present, with things as they are, with railways and tramcars, and so on, that a county is far too large an area?—I think some counties are too large.

3229. Assuming that the difference in the size is overcome or could be ignored, so that you got your area for administrative purposes as large as was convenient for administration, how many distinct institutions would be needed for classifying paupers?—It should be understood that my remarks about a county being too large were made with reference to a proposal that the country workhouses within one county should be amalgamated. It was merely with regard to the indoor relief.

Scheme of classification by institutions.

3230. My question is with regard to all institutions; how many different kinds of institution would be needed, if you had the area not restricted by accessibility, but merely considered with that object? How many different institutions would be needed to deal institutionally with indoor pauperism?—I think in country places that would be enough to have workhouses and sick wards and separate schools. In urban places I think the administrative convenience of division might make it necessary or expedient to have not only those two, but a special Test House for able-bodied paupers who require severe treatment as an alternative to locking them up in a labour colony, as they do in Belgium; and a separate infirmary or infirmaries for the acute and curable sick.

3231. You have not covered the case of lunatics?—Lunatics I proposed, and still would propose, should be a matter for another administration altogether—a county administration.

3232. Do you include imbeciles with lunatics?—As I said, I would put the whole of them under county administration, and subject them to the same inspection that other paupers are subjected to so as to ensure a proper classification of the different classes of lunatics among the various institutions available for their reception.

3233. There would be several institutions connected with the kinds of mental imbecility?—I should think several. I do not say the different institutions ought to be separate by being put on different sites, but a great deal of classification among that class is necessary for efficient administration. I do not think workhouses are proper places for the feeble-minded. I think any arguments which apply to the separation of a lunatic from a workhouse should also apply to the feeble-minded. That is a matter which is under the consideration of another Commission.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

6 Feb. 1906.

3234. Do you mean that the feeble-minded would remain, under the Poor Law, in a separate institution?—I do not think it matters much, if they are all under the same inspection so as to ensure classification.

Out-relief inevitable.

3235. I was only really regarding the different varieties of institution. If you perfected institutional relief, would it come within the range of possibliity to abolish out-relief altogether?—I should like to say yes, but I think that, administratively speaking, you must have some out-door relief. No union has quite succeeded in abolishing it, and no country union has got even very near to abolishing it. There will be urgent cases, and there will be very exceptional cases. I think any board of guardians would fail to deal with it in that way.

3236. (Mr. Phelps.) Are you thinking of sudden and urgent distress as opposed to chronic distress or chronic relief?—Yes. I also had in my mind a certain number of cases that it would be difficult to move to the workhouse.

3237. (Mr. Nunn.) Would not there be a distinction drawn between the allowance system and out-door relief; it is the allowance system that has such a bad effect on the poor generally?—Yes.

3238. But sudden urgent necessity, I think, is recognised in all unions, even where out-door relief is practically non-existent?—I do not know that I am justified in saying it, but I have said, in the case of people who do earn no wages and do not have children and are properly cared for, the case against giving out-door relief resolves itself into what one may call the discouragement of thrift argument. The discouragement of thrift argument is a very important one, and with certain classes of the poor it is vital; but you cannot expect an average board of guardians, or indeed any average assembly of men, to take a step which appears to be harsh to the individual, because some possible good will result to the community from it, or even some evident good will result to the community from it, some thirty years hence. That is the difficulty of it.

Guardians permit the law to over-ride sentiment.

3239. Has it been your experience that a Board of Guardians may have been extremely unwilling to do something which they considered harsh when they thought it was within their power to do something less harsh, but when it was pointed out to them by their clerk, or someone in authority, that the law did not allow it, they have generally acquiesced; they have seen the importance of the principle which is embodied in the law, and have bowed to it?—That is about what happens.

3240. A question was asked whether there was any actual evidence with regard to the relation between the promotion of the development and encouragement of thrift, and the restriction of out-door relief and medical relief. I think this question occurred to Mr. Bland Garland, did it not, in connection with his union at Bradfield?—Yes.

Mr. Goschen's circular as to assisting persons not actually destitute.

3241. (Mr. Lansbury.) We dealt with Mr. Goschen's circular of 1868 on the last occasion. Towards the end of that circular there is a suggestion that when relieving officers are dealing with persons who, in their opinion, are not actually destitute at the time, it would be wise for them, if they still consider that some help is needed, that they should refer such cases to any charitable association which they think is fitted to deal with them?—Yes.

3242. That circular, like a great many other circulars, has not the force of a regulation at all?—No.

3243. It was a very important circular?—And had most important effects.

3244. It derives considerable authority from the facts that followed it. May I ask whether that suggestion in that circular has been embodied in any regulations since then?—No.

3245. I suppose that it is quite sufficient to justify a relieving officer, in the case of persons who are not absolutely destitute but are in need, referring them to some charitable association for assistance?—That is a very common practice, though not so common as it ought to be, and not one that is in any way enforced by any order or regulation of the board.

3246. My point was whether a relieving officer, having read that circular, would be justified in doing so?—He certainly would be justified in doing so, just as in a country parish he would be justified in going and telling anyone who acts charitably, if he knew of anyone who required that charity, or, what is more common, referring the case to the parish nurse, who is a charitable institution.

Objections out-relief.

3247. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) I want to get your three objections to outdoor relief generally: Firstly, it is the discouragement of thrift; secondly, the interference with the labour market; and, thirdly, the general good of the community is thereby injured?—Yes.

3248. I want to put a case in order to get my mind clear as to the kind of outdoor relief you would not object to. It is the custom in a place I am connected with a good deal, with regard to old people who are past their time of work, who are invalided from work to some extent, to try and get something, firstly from the employer and secondly something from the charitable funds of the Church. Would you object to that being supplemented, if insufficient, by outdoor relief so as to make a complete means of livelihood?—In this or in that case one would find it difficult to raise an objection. If it were known to be the general practice, then you have the almost certainty that the employer would give a little less, and the other sources a little less, and the relief would be relied upon. When you ask questions of that sort I think it would be better if you were not to put a hard case, but to put the question more generally: To what class would you refuse outdoor relief? It is always easy to state a hard case, and of course you know the Poor Law maxim that one hard case lets in a flood of others, and so on. In London you can instance scores of cases which come on the ordinary relief list which, in my judgment, do not admit of any question: take a person living in lodgings with no furniture of his own; what is the good of giving that case outdoor relief? When you have got rid of those cases you find out that the cases such as you have cited are comparatively small. Then, perhaps, after having gone through the labour of clearing out the others, the board of guardians might afford themselves the luxury of giving relief to the exception.

Elected guardians incapable of properly administering out relief.

3249. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Am I wrong in the assumption which I made from your evidence that really the main objection which you have to out-door relief is that the guardians are not as efficient as they ought to be in administering the system of outdoor relief? That is what I gathered from your answer to question 2433?—Yes. I would go further and say, that men being as they are, you cannot expect any body of elected guardians to administer relief in the way which all experience, as I submit, shows to be the one which is in accordance with public policy. The difficulties are too great, as I think I showed in the quotation from myself which I read.

3250. Would that objection be removed if you found that the boards of guardians were subjected to certain appropriate and proper checks upon extravagant giving or inadequate giving?—There you have the whole difficulty which I put in my first day's evidence as to the relation between the local administration of the Poor Law and local government generally.

3251. (Mr. Phelps.) I quite follow you when you say that the great difficulty arises from the guardians, but is not the real difficulty the public opinion which is behind the guardians?—As I put it in another case, popularly elected guardians, elected by direct franchise, do reflect the common conscience of the community.

3252. Is it not dangerous to go too far ahead of public opinion?—It certainly is, especially in matters of Poor Law, because there is a profound ignorance of Poor Law principle among the bulk of educated men, and because it is so very easy to get popular sympathy for an individual case.

Unpopularity of the Poor Law.

3253. You will remember a passage in which Sir Henry Maine said the English people have never become reconciled to the Poor Law. Is it your experience, going about the country, that that is true?—I think there is something in it. I think, as a rule, that people are satisfied with it, but there is a very critical attitude of mind all the time with relation to it, and from two sides: both from the economical side, who say, Why in the world does not my board of guardians do what I read they have done in Bradfield or Brixworth; and from the sentimental side, who say, A workhouse (most of them have never been inside a workhouse in their lives) is a most abominable place, and it is a cruelty to force—they always say force—people into it.

Increased public interest in the poor.

3254. Do you think that the interest taken in these matters by guardians has much extended to their constituents?—Of course, if you put your mind back for thirty years you will see that certain things have happened which do make it certain that there is a greater interest in these economic matters amongst people generally. For instance, Poor Law Conferences, meetings of the Charity Organisation Society, and articles that one reads in magazines—sometimes very poor ones—but all the same they would not be bought by the magazines, unless there was a sort of interest in the subject. All these things indicate a very considerable change during the period of the last generation. Places like Toynbee Hall, Trinity House and the Eton Mission are all matters of the last forty years.

Classification in institutions as a specific for out-relief.

3255. (Mr. Bentham.) What institutions do you think are necessary if outdoor relief is to be abolished? I think you only gave two institutions for urban unions?—Two for rural.

3256. Was it not three for rural. You said workhouses sick wards, and schools?—I said that in rural unions I thought the classification might stop at two institutions—the workhouse and the school.

3257. That is, a workhouse with sick wards and a school, those are the two?—I did not put in sick wards in the rural unions. I thought the workhouse and schools might be enough for rural districts, the workhouses with sick rooms.

3258. With regard to the urban unions, I think you missed out the children entirely?—I did not mean to. I thought I said, in addition, I would add a test house and separate infirmary.

3259. It seemed to me that was rather limited; it simply means a workhouse, test house, infirmary, and schools in urban unions. If outdoor relief is to be restricted to the narrowest possible limits, it seems to me advisable to specialise, as far as possible, with regard to the different classes of people who are given indoor relief. For instance, there are ways of dealing with the aged poor other than putting them into workhouses. Then there are special diseases, such as consumption, which might properly be treated in a separate institution; in other directions, it seems to me that institutions for special classes could be provided with advantage?—I can only say in answer to that, that in very large unions separate establishments may be extended for administrative reasons, but they are extremely expensive, and, after all, you must remember that it is open to any board of guardians to subscribe to various institutions which would relieve them of certain special classes of their paupers. For instance, there is quite a number of cases in blind and deaf and dumb homes, epileptic hospitals, convalescent homes for the sick, training and industrial schools and other institutions; I think I am right in saying that last year we had 7,000 children in those sort of institutions paid for by the guardians.

Provision for certain classes of paupers in voluntary institutions.

3260. And your objection is one of cost, is it?—It is not necessary, I think, where you have access to a charitable institution by payment, for the board of guardians to have similar institutions of their own, unless they are very large.

3261. Unless they find it necessary, of course?—Yes.

3262. Between adopting institutions of that kind and granting outdoor relief, you can form no comparison which is the cheaper, can you? You agree with institutional treatment of all paupers practically, on broad lines, do you not?—Yes.

3263. If it became an alternative as to whether outdoor relief became popular simply because proper institutions were not provided for certain classes, you would be in favour of providing those institutions?—I should.

3264. (Mr. Loch.) There would be this alternative, possibly, to the guardians providing a large series of institutions which I take it is contemplated, namely, that public opinion should, as far as possible, be pressed, by charitable means, to increase the accommodation? The Local Government Board has authorised the guardians to pay for a particular case in that way, which creates something of an income, as I know in particular cases, in institutions which they want?—Nothing has been said about this particular point, I think, in the evidence, but the growth of the subscriptions by boards of guardians to various institutions has been quite remarkable, and that growth has been considerably fostered by the Local Government Board. I think the Local Government Board feels that the charitable nstitutions are a necessary complement of the workhouse institutions, and the growth, say, of certified homes for children has been quite remarkable. With regard to the other things I would only call your attention for a moment to the history of the provision for cases of phthisis. The problem now before us is whether the guardians should do that or the sanitary authority, or whether we should look to such institutions as the King's Sanatorium at Midhurst to do it. The whole matter is still unsettled. It is under the consideration of the Local Government Board, who will be able soon to give very full information with respect to it.

Charitable institutions as a supplement to the Poor Law.

3265. (Mr. Bentham.) That depends on local conditions?—Partly on local conditions and partly on public policy.

3266. You could not lay down one line that would go all over the Poor Law?—No, it depends on various matters.

3267. (Mr. Loch.) If it is possible to create voluntary institutions, the cases in which are supported by boards of guardians, that is well for the board of guardians administration and well for the public?—Certainly.

3268. (Mr. Bentham.) Do not you find it is often the case that boards of guardians will hesitate to pay for a particular case in an institution because of its cost, knowing at the same time, there is really no other means to care for that person, whereas, if they had an institution of their own, the cost would not enter into it very largely?—I think it would follow from that that the cost of the institution of the guardians would be much greater.

3269. I quite agree with that, but still, at the same time, you have effected the object?—Yes.

3270. And the other way you have not?—As I have explained to the Commission, I think there are many reasons now why all local governing bodies, especially boards of guardians, should take much more interest in the question of expenditure than they have appeared to do lately. That is part of my evidence which is coming very soon, and I have that in my mind when I rather press the advantage of the sending of patients by boards of guardians to charitable institutions rather than for them to build them themselves.

3271. My point is that you cannot now treat every case in a deterrent way, sick or otherwise, as you did at one time, that is, that it is not advisable now to treat every case in a deterrent manner?—No, we had that out about the question of infirmaries.

Cause of unpopularity of the Poor Law.

3272. (Mr. Nunn.) With regard to Mr. Phelps' quotation from Maine, that English people would never settle down to the English Poor Law, is not it possible to draw a distinction, and say in regard to that portion of the Poor Law as to which the Commission of 1834 gave a definite answer—that is, the question of the able-bodied—the principle settled by their test, which has been followed for a couple of generations, the English people have been satisfied with; and with regard to many questions which they left undetermined and on which they gave no guidance, the nation has been non-content ever since?—I think myself that why the English people have not quite adopted the English Poor Law is, to a great extent, because of the extraordinary vitality of the parish idea. I believe that at the back of our heads we country folk think much more of our parish than we do of our union, and we rather resent the power of the union as against the parish. That was so in the early days, and I believe it is so still; even men who have had no actual experience of parish administration, who would not stir to attend a parish council, or even to vote for it, have still a sort of feeling that the parish is an area that should not be interfered with, and that it should be more or less free. Of course, administratively speaking, they may be considered hopelessly wrong, but I think that is one of the reasons why the Poor Law has never been really welcomed by the English people.

Convalescent Homes.

3273. (Mr. Lansbury.) There have been some scandals, have there not, in reference to private convalescent homes?—I have heard of one.

3274. It has been pretty bad, has not it?—I am not going to say that.

3275. You have heard of one, at any rate. There is one Convalescent Home at Margate, does that come under you at all?—Where they are certified by us to receive pauper children they are under our direction.

3276. But only pauper children?—There is no sanction required with regard to convalescent homes which receive adults.

3277. You can only send people there as you send them to General Booth?—That is to say, with consent.

3278. Some of them are not satisfactory, at any rate?—I am not going to admit that. That is for the boards of guardians and their medical officers.

3279. I understand that the practice of giving subscriptions out of the rates to hospitals so that they shall take patients, instead of sending them to institutions belonging to the guardians, you approve of?—Yes.

Effect of guardians' subscriptions to hospitals.

3280. Is not that likely also to choke off subscriptions from the public? Is not it likely to lead to the result that people will feel they are paying for a certain number out of the rates and they might just as well pay for the whole?—I do not think so.

3281. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Do not boards of guardians contribute to these institutions?—Yes, they contribute in respect of the use that they make of the institution.

3282. (Mr. Loch.) In most of these cases the money that is received from the guardians is a very small amount compared with the money received by the institution itself?—In some cases it is not, but in most cases it is.

3283. (Sir Samuel Provis.) It has relation to the numbers the guardians are proposing to send?—The Board's letter is usually to ask the guardians to state specifically what advantage they hope to get from the subscriptions.

3284. (Mr. Lansbury.) Do they have to state the number of the people that they send?—Not to us.

Principles underlying Act of 1834.

3285. (Sir Samuel Provis.) I think you wish now to say something or other with regard to Poor Law principles?—Yes. Why I wish to mention the question of Poor Law principles here is because I propose to go very shortly through the Poor Law history for the last generation, and to consider each step with relation to the question how far it infringed on what is known as Poor Law principles, which I take to mean the maxims which were laid down by, or which guided the early Commissioners, in introduciug the Poor Law Reform Bill of 1834. That Bill was so successful in its immediate operation, that it brought to the side of the Commissioners a considerable body of expert opinion which has been very much in the habit of quoting these principles up to the present day.

3286. Do you propose to tell us what those principles are?—I think they are well understood by the Commission. They are principles which are dependent on, and corollaries of, the original maxim, which was that the condition of the pauper should not be, or should not appear to be, more eligible than that of the independent labourer.

3287. I think you wish next to refer to some of the enquiries, Parliamentary and other, that have been made on matters connected with poor relief?—Yes.

Recommendations of Select Committee on Poor Relief, 1864.

3288. You take, as the first, the Committee on Poor Relief of 1864, I think?—Yes. The Select Committee on the Poor Law which sat in the year 1864 discussed the whole subject of Poor Law administration. It was they who finally decided in favour of the continuance of a central authority, and of the power of that central authority to issue general orders. They recommended that certain paid officers should be permanent, that the auditors should be appointed, not by the chairmen of boards of guardians, as they had hitherto been, but by the Poor Law Board. They made certain recommendations as to the religious rights of inmates of workhouses, as to the education of pauper children, as to classification in workhouses, and also as to casual and homeless poor in the Metropolis. A good deal of legislation followed from the Report of that Commission, but there is nothing in it whatever to show that at that time there was the slightest tendency to reverse or modify the policy of the original Commissioners.

3289. But the Report of that Committee deals rather with the details of administration than with the actual principles of administration themselves?—Yes. I should like to say that the whole of the evidence and the Report are of the most important character.

Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867.

3290. I think you wish now to make some observations with regard to the Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867?—That was the beginning of a change in the administration of the Poor Law in the Metropolis which has not yet come to an end. The most convenient point of reference is the speech of Mr. Gathorne-Hardy in introducing the Bill. There had been various Reports as to the administration of relief in the Metropolis, the point which most concerns this Commission being that the workhouses were hopelessly inadequate to the needs of the population. The Bill, I think for the first time, introduced the principle of the Metropolitan Poor Fund or the equalisation of the rates over London for certain Poor Law purposes—a point that no doubt will be dealt with later on.

Mr. Goschen's circular, 1869. Co-operation between charity and poor law.

3291. Then, in 1869, a Minute was issued by Mr. Goschen, was there not, with regard to the co-operation between charity and the Poor Law?—The first of Mr. Goschen's most important Minutes was that one which called attention to the expediency of some organised co-operation between Poor Law and charity in the Metropolis. I think that the Charity Organisation Society was founded at the same date.

3292. Do you propose to say anything generally as to what the object of that Minute was?—The object of that Minute was to enable the guardians to deal with hard cases by means of charitable contributions, and to prevent overlapping by the exchange of information between charitable societies and the officers of the guardians.

3293. That is to say, the guardians, if they had hard cases, might refer them to the charity?—That is the object of the circular. It is quite evident that Mr. Goschen, who was a first-rate administrator, a first-rate statistician, and a first-rate economist, was very strongly in favour of a more rigid administration of the Poor Law. That was the first of the circulars which he issued when he was at the Board.

3294. (Mr. Nunn.) Is there anything in the circular as to a reference by the guardians as a board to charitable bodies?—I think there is. You will find a copy of the circular in Sir William Chance's book.

3295. (Sir Samuel Provis.) The point is, is it not, that cases which would be referred to charitable organisations would be cases which the guardians could not deal with themselves, for instance, cases for the payment of rent and such matters?—Yes; they are all set out in the circular.

3296. Perhaps you would kindly refer to them?—Mr. Goschen says: "It may be well to add that boards of guardians cannot legally give relief (1) in redeeming tools or clothes from pawn; (2) in purchasing tools; (3) in purchasing clothes (except in cases of urgent necessity); (4) in paying the cost of conveyance to any part of the United Kingdom; (5) in paying rent or lodging, so that assistance rendered for any of these purposes will not interfere with the action of the guardians." That is to say, those purposes shall be paid for, or might safely be paid for, by charity, because they cannot be paid for by the guardians. The Minute continues: "The general principle to be borne in mind seems to be that the obligations of the guardians should not be curtailed, and that where the charitable associations consider it within their province to deal at all with persons on the parish lists, they should do so, not by affording additional means of income, but by supplying once for all such articles as do not clash with or overlap the relief administered by the guardians." That is in accordance with the Poor Law principle of all or none. The point of it is this: "A cordial understanding between the Poor Law authorities and the charitable organisations based upon arrangements of the kind suggested, does not appear to be hopeless. It remains to consider by what means such an understanding can be brought about"—and then that point is discussed. "The first point is that there should be every opportunity for every agency, official or private, engaged in relieving the poor, to know fully and accurately the details of the work performed by all similarly engaged." Then, Mr. Goschen suggests means of communication between the two, the charitable authorities and the Poor Law authorities. He says: The Poor Law Board would be prepared "(1) To authorise the guardians to print weekly lists, containing the names and addresses of out door paupers, and the sums given in relief in each case; (2) to authorise any reasonable remuneration for extra work to officers whom the guardians may employ to carry out this arrangement; (3) to instruct their inspectors to facilitate the communication between the official and private agencies, where such interposition may be of any service, and to assist in systematising as far as possible relief operations in various parts of the Metropolis." What Mr. Goschen contemplated was that all the relief agencies should be systematised. He did not deal with the co-ordination of the whole Poor Law funds with the charitable relief funds of the country. That will be left, I have no doubt, to a future Mr. Goschen. And so it goes on. Throughout, the whole of it is what I might call strict Poor Law. For instance, he says: "One of the most recognised principles in our Poor Law is that relief should be given only to the actually destitute, and not in aid of wages." "The fundamental doctrine of the English Poor Laws, in which they differ from those of most other countries, is that relief is given, not as a matter of charity, but of legal obligation, and to extend this legal obligation beyond the class to which it now applies, namely, the actually destitute, to a further and much larger class, namely those in receipt of insufficient wages, would be not only to increase to an unlimited extent the present enormous expenditure, but to allow the belief in a legal claim to public money in every emergency to supplant, in a further portion of the population, the full recognition of the necessity for self-reliance and thrift." As for that, I think I will merely call your attention to the fact of the present enormous expenditure. I will come by and by to see what the expenditure was then and what it is now.

pectors,
1.

3297. That Minute was followed, was it not, by some circular to the inspectors?—At that time two things happened. There was a report on the country unions of England by Mr. Wodehouse, which is an extremely able report, that should be read by everybody who is interested in Poor Law, and there was a still more remarkable report upon London by Mr. Longley, which is the most uncompromising defence of the workhouse system that ever was penned. In 1871 a circular was issued to the inspectors; I do not think it was printed in a Blue-book, but I will hand it in (see Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (25)). It starts: "The large increase which has within the last few years taken place in the amount of outdoor relief has been regarded by the Local Government Board with much anxiety." I have a diagram here on which you will see a sharp line like a cone; that represents the rise in outdoor relief during the cotton famine. When the cotton famine was at an end, there was another sharp rise in outdoor relief, due probably, to a more lavish administration. Then Mr. Stansfeld caused this circular to be issued to the inspectors—as he says, in consequence of being alarmed by that rise in expenditure—instructing them to take the earliest opportunity of bringing the whole matter under the supervision of the guardians in their districts. He says: "The cost of outdoor relief in England and Wales in the year 1860 amounted to £2,862,753, whilst the outdoor relief for the year 1870 amounted to £3,633,061, being an increase of £770,308. The ratio of outdoor paupers to the population was, in 1860, 1 in every 27, and, in 1870, 1 in every 25." He then shows the great inequality of this increase in the various unions of the country. Where the administration was strict the increase was small, and where the administration was lax the increase was large. "Instances might be multiplied almost indefinitely of like variations in adjoining unions where the surrounding circumstances are similar and where the variations can be attributable, in the main, to no other cause than the different system of administration adopted by the guardians, both in respect to the objects of relief and the amount and nature of the relief afforded." The circular then goes on to make rather more specific recommendations as to the general rules which should guide the guardians, that being really the beginning of the rules which were subsequently submitted to the Board in 1877 by Mr. Pell and which used to be known as the Manchester Rules. Here is a further quotation from the circular: "The great object which you will have in view will be to induce the guardians in your district to adopt sound principles of administration in dealing with individual cases; and the Board believe that the more frequently those principles are discussed, and the application of them illustrated by the experience of other boards of guardians, the more conclusively will the advantages be recognised which always result from vigilant supervision and a strict adherence to the law. It is difficult to over-estimate the importance to an union of having the guardians well affected to the law which they administer, and nothing will tend more completely to create such a feeling than the conviction that the law, when well-administered, is calculated to diminish pauperism, whilst it benefits the ratepayers and the poor." That circular to the inspectors was issued in 1871, and it is presumed the inspectors acted upon it. You will see from the diagram (see Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (7)) the way in which the curve of outdoor pauperism fell between 1871 and 1877. Between January 1st, 1871, and January 1st, 1877, the number of outdoor paupers fell from 917,000 to 571,000. You will observe on this diagram that at the same time and throughout the whole history that we are dealing with, the curve of indoor pauperism clings till quite recently closely to the population curve, and that as the population goes up the in-door pauperism goes up, until, say, the year 1890, when there is a marked tendency to increase. In spite of that enormous drop in outdoor pauperism, the indoor pauperism did not increase between 1871 and 1877.

Effect of circular of 1871 on pauperism.

3298. In 1878 I believe a memorandum was issued by Mr. Sclater-Booth with regard to the administration of out-door relief, was there not?—The memorandum which was issued by Mr. Sclater-Booth called attention to the effect of the circular of 1871. It recapitulated the rules which were recommended in the circular, and claimed, rightly or wrongly, that the abnormal decrease in relief was due to the efforts of the inspectors and the change that those efforts had made in the administration of the guardians. Mr. Sclater-Booth says: The consideration and the application of these rules has not been without effect. In the year 1870–71, the expenditure on out-door relief was £3,663,970; in the year 1876–77 it had fallen to £2,616,465; thus showing a decrease in six years of £1,047,505, or 28·6 per cent. The number of out-door paupers on the 1st January, 1871, was 917,890; the number on 1st January, 1877, was 571,982; therefore, in the same six years, the out-door paupers decreased by 345,908 or 37·7 per cent." The circular then goes on to contrast the statistics of various groups of unions throughout the country and gives quotations from the inspectors reports. Even at the end of that time, as the circular points out, great differences existed in the various unions as to the proportion which pauperism bore to population. Thus, at the Atcham Union of Shropshire, the proportion stood as low as 0·9 per cent., while in the Wilton Union of Wiltshire it was as high as 6·8 per cent., or, taking larger areas, in the Metropolis it was 2·6 per cent.; in North Wales 4·8 per cent. in South Wales 4·1 per cent.; in a district of the midland counties 2·3 per cent.; and in the county of Lancaster 1·8 per cent. The circular goes on; "These remarkable figures are doubtless attributable in no small degree to differences in the administration of relief—some boards of guardians being vigilant and others lax." There, again, you have a circular issued in the year 1878, in which there is no trace of any departure from the original doctrines, as we may call them, of the Commissioners.

Mr. Sclater-Booth's memorandum, 1878.

3299. That is a memorandum made by Mr. Sclater-Booth and sent round to the various boards of guardians, I presume?—Yes; and possibly I might hand in that also. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (27).) The circular to the inspectors and Mr. Sclater-Booth's memorandum are very closely connected

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

6 Feb. 1906.

3300. In 1884 the Representation of the People Act was passed; have you anything to say with regard to that Act in this connection?—I do not propose to do anything more than mention the fact; and then leave it to the Commissioners, if they see fit, to trace some connection between the passing of that Act and what happens to the Poor Law afterwards. It was followed by the Medical Relief Disqualification Removal Act.

Reform Act, 1884 and Medical Relief Disqualification Removal Act.

3301. Have you something to say to us with regard to the Medical Relief Disqualification Removal Act?—I have already pointed out that in my judgment that Act was not at all in accordance with what I call, for the purpose of this part of my evidence, Poor Law principles.

3302. Then you do not wish to add anything?—No, beyond calling attention to the fact that that is the first time since 1834 where, so far as I have been able to discover, there has been a marked departure either in legislation or in administration from Poor Law principles.

3303. (Mr. Phelps.) Do you remember at what period in the Session that was passed; was it not just at the end and just before the dissolution?—I forget.

3304. (Mr. Nunn.) Might I ask if you imply that one of these Acts was caused by the other?—I purposely said that I do not propose to make any statement on the subject.

3305. (Sir Samuel Provis.) The Medical Relief Disqualification Removal Act was in fact I think passed at the end of the Session, the date on which it received the Royal Assent being the 6th August; and there was a dissolution that same year, was there not?—I believe so.

3306. It followed, of course, from the passing of the Representation of the People Act that there should be a dissolution?—Yes.

Mr. Chamberlain's circular of 1886 as to municipal employment.

3307. The next thing which I think you wish to refer to is the circular which was issued by Mr. Chamberlain in 1886?—That again is merely an historical point.

3308. Perhaps you will say what the general effect of that circular was?—The general effect of the circular was that municipalities should undertake public works, and, as far as possible, employ on those public works needy men so as to prevent their becoming destitute. It is rather interesting to trace the history of that movement. So far as I know in England—we all know about France—this matter became of great prominence during the cotton famine, when the numbers who were thrown on the poor rates were enormous. In the report in 1865–66 of the Local Government Board it is stated, "It appeared highly desirable that the large bodies of able-bodied men who had been so long deprived of their usual employment should not continue to be relieved either in idleness or on the performance of a task of unremunerative labour, but should rather if possible have work at adequate wages placed within their reach which would enable them to obtain an independent livelihood." Sir Robert Rawlinson was sent down to Lancashire at that time to investigate the matter, and he reported that there was an actual necessity for a large amount of public work in the way of sewerage, road making, and so on. An Act was passed (the 26 and 27 Vic., c. 70) which authorised borrowing for public works for that purpose. The board at the time said, "We trust that in addition to the direct benefits of the measure, incidental advantages have been conferred on the district and that many sanitary and social improvements may have their origin in the crisis through which it has passed. The public works are popular with those who are employed and the moral effect of the work, in prospect as well as in action, has been very valuable in its influences upon the unemployed population." It may be worth while remarking there that what was evidently in the mind of the board at that time was the difference in the moral effect of the work between what I may call penal work (which has no result and is enforced by punishment) and useful work. They dwell on the fact that this was useful work. I have no doubt that that was the precedent on which Mr. Chamberlain's circular was based.

Essence of penal labour.

3309. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) There was a dissolution immediately after that circular, too, was there not?—Yes. I may say that in recent investigations in which I have been concerned as to labour colonies and so on, this point has arisen: We may hold that it is useful work, not penal work, as long as the work improves the land; but a time comes when the land has been dug once or twice, and there is no necessity for digging the land any more; then, in point of principle, the other digging, the unnecessary digging, though it is precisely the same labour as the first digging, becomes, in the economic theory, penal work, while the first was non-penal work. The first digging was not demoralising but elevating, whereas the last digging was pauper, penal labour and most demoralising.

3310. (Mr Lansbury.) That of course only means that all useless work is demoralising?—Yes.

Local Government Act, 1888; Effect on administration.

3311. (Sir Samuel Provis.) That was in 1886; then in 1888 the Local Government Act was passed, was it not?—In 1888 the Local Government Act was passed and that is an important epoch, I think, for Poor Law administration; although it does not directly concern Poor Law administration, because it is from that date that the extraordinary increase in the cost of public relief begins.

3312. What year precisely are you taking now?—I am taking 1888, and if you look at the diagram you will see that rather interesting curve. The curve representing the rateable value crosses the curve of expenditure and we become gradually richer, that is to say, the means of meeting the expenditure become gradually greater than the expenditure; but after 1888 the curve of expenditure takes a marked turn upwards, which has been going up ever since (Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (15).) That is a matter which I will deal with further in the next part of my evidence but, I call attention to it here because it is in some ways the most important point, as I think, of modern Poor Law development.

3313. Do you wish to make any observations on the Act itself?—No.

3314. It did not, of course, directly deal with the Poor Law?—It had nothing to do with the Poor Law at all.

3315. Except so far as it dealt with grants?—Yes.

3316. It had no very direct bearing on the Poor Law?—It had no direct bearing except this, which is a mere matter of opinion and a mere matter of impression. It did stimulate local government all over the country. I think there was more interest taken in boards of guardians after the passing of that Act than there was before. It woke people up, so to speak. I should say that these diagrams and the tables I am using, have been prepared by me and not by the statistical department, and, therefore, must not be taken in any way as the production of that department. I only intend to use them as illustrations which may enable the Commission better to understand my evidence.

3317. (Mr. Booth.) That is to say, we are to have the use of them as a Commission, but we are not to consider them as a formal part of the Report?—That, I think, would be the best way to treat them.

Select Committee on Poor Law Relief, 188

3318. (Sir Samuel Provis.) In the year 1888 there was a report, was there not, of a Committee of the House of Lords?—In the year 1888 there was a good deal of distress in London, and there was a Committee of the House of Lords, of which Lord Kimberley acted as Chairman. It was a strong Committee and took some very good evidence, that of Sir Hugh Owen among the rest. I have extracted from their report some of the sentences which bear most closely on the Poor Law. They say, "It is not the duty of guardians to administer charity in the sense of alleviating the lot of those who are poor but not actually destitute." That is an important passage, because it shows that up to then the aged deserving poor were not in their minds. Another passage is, "But we cannot too strongly insist on the disastrous results which are certain to follow from out-door relief, if not very carefully administered, and kept within narrow limits, not only in bringing heavy burdens on the ratepayers, but, what is far more important, in demoralising the working class by the discouragement of thrift and honest industry; and we draw attention to the evidence of the results of the policy of giving outdoor relief pursued in the City of London Union as compared with the opposite policy in St. George's-in-the-East."

3319. Did they make any important recommendation?—They made a considerable number of recommendations.

3320. Did they make any that were of importance for the purposes of this Commission?—With regard to destitution they did, and they also made recommendations which are comparatively insignificant in regard to smaller matters of outdoor relief. For instance, as to the small doles of inadequate relief—and this is important because it is no doubt one of the matters that led to the consideration of the question of adequate relief by the next Commission that sat, namely, the Aged Poor Commission—they say, "Such doles are eked out by slender earnings, in which latter case, as is pointed out by Sir Hugh Owen, to the extent to which the person, who is assisted in that way, obtains employment, there is no doubt there is a tendency to reduce the rate of wages for services of that particular character." Then they give certain recommendations as to stone yards, and they also recommend that boards of guardians should have powers to make bye-laws; but there is nothing in that report at all which introduces a new element into the Poor Law principle.

lect Committee on etropolitan spitals, 92.

3321. In 1892 there was a Committee of the House of Lords on Metropolitan hospitals, was there not?—Yes.

3322. Do you wish to say anything about that?—No; it is not directly a Poor Law matter. I have merely mentioned it in my notes of evidence, because it is a very important document when you come to consider the question of the expediency of making some modification in the existing Poor Law with reference to infirmaries. On the whole, the recommendations of the Committee and the report of the Committee are what the original Poor Law experts would have deemed to be sound.

Henry wler's cular as to uperism d distress, 92.

3323. In the same year I think Sir Henry Fowler, or Mr. Fowler as he was then, issued a circular with regard to pauperism and distress?—That, I think, was merely reiterating Mr. Chamberlain's circular.

3324. To all intents and purposes it was the same thing, was it?—Yes.

ect of al Government Act, 94.

3325. Then in 1894 the Local Government Act was passed, was it not?—The Local Government Act was passed, which revolutionised the method of election to boards of guardians and on which I have already given evidence, that evidence being to the effect that the Act had surprisingly little effect on the administration of the Poor Law.

ed Poor mmission, 95.

3326. Then we come to 1895, in which year there was the Commission on the Aged Poor?—Yes. There for the first time, as I read the history, you have the new element brought in; you have got the deserving poor. Up to then I suppose that sound administration was guided by the policy which was put in the most forcible way by John Stuart Mill, a passage from whose "Political Economy" I read yesterday. The report itself is almost what would be called in accordance with Poor Law doctrine, and there is a good deal of it which might have been written by the first Commissioners themselves. But there are sentences which do show a new point of view, as for instance this:—"We think, therefore, that boards of guardians should be recommended to make careful inquiries into the antecedents of destitute persons applying for relief whose physical faculties have failed by reason of age and infirmity, and that where it is found that such persons bear a good character, have made reasonable efforts, in accordance with their opportunities, to provide for their own old age, and have not been assisted from the rates (excepting temporarily and under special circumstances of illness or misfortune), outdoor relief should be offered unless the infirmity of the applicant, the nature of his surroundings, the need of personal care, or other substantial considerations, should make it evident that the relief given should be indoor relief." Then again, there is a recommendation that the aged deserving poor should, inside the workhouses, be classified and given certain other privileges. Finally, there is a strong recommendation that "The Local Government Board should call special attention, either directly or through their inspectors, to the evils of inadequate relief, and the necessity for careful and thorough investigation of each case with a view to the suitable grant of relief in accordance with clear general principles. Such action on the part of the Board would be of great value, and would be free from the objections attaching both to formal regulations on the subject, and to the intervention of the central department in individual cases." The Commission will note the change in the point of view.

3327. Then about 1896 there were, were there not, Parliamentary Committees with regard to want of employment?—Yes. I think there was a very heavy amount of evidence and two reports, and if I remember rightly—I have not the exact quotation here with me—there was a recommendation that persons who receive relief in exceptional circumstances of distress should not be disfranchised.

3328. There were two Committees, I think, were there not, one in 1895 and one in 1896?—There were two Committees and two reports, and very different reports they were, being from different points of view. But they were both interesting. They dealt with the question of labour colonies and such like questions.

3329. Then in 1899, there was a Cottage Homes Committee; do you wish to say something about it?—There was a Committee on the Bill for the introduction of Cottage Homes.

Cottage Homes Committee, 1899.

3330. That was a private Bill, was it not?—It was a Private Bill, which was referred to a Committee of which Mr. T. W. Russell was Chairman.

3331. What did that Committee recommend generally?—They go one better than the Aged Poor Commission. I think they dealt with the question of pensions, which, during all this epoch, which I may call the political epoch of modern Poor Law administration, was very much in evidence, one pension scheme following after another and one Bill after another. This is the point in their Report to which I desire specially to call attention: "Your Committee do not, however, contemplate that the aged and deserving poor, to whom Poor Law relief is a necessity, should as a matter of course receive such relief in the workhouse. The evidence would seem to show that, as a general rule, boards of guardians are in the habit of granting outdoor relief to the aged and deserving poor, and that it is the exception to relieve them in the workhouse. The exceptional cases are those where the infirmity of the applicant for relief, or other circumstances, render it practically impossible for him to live elsewhere than in an institution. Your Committee have no desire to discourage the granting of outdoor relief to the aged and deserving poor, though they trust that the alterations they advocate may have the effect of rendering the workhouse a place to which a poor person of deserving character, to whom the care that can only be supplied in an institution is a necessity, need not hesitate to resort." That is, you are to give outdoor relief to every aged and deserving poor person you can, but you are to improve the workhouse to such a point as to do away with the disinclination to enter the workhouse. Then they go on in another passage to say: "But while your Committee approve of outdoor relief being granted to the deserving aged poor who can properly live outside the workhouse, they cannot approve of the scale of payment which they fear is too commonly considered sufficient by boards of guardians." The report says a great deal more as to classification in workhouses, which is an expansion of what was said, and rather better said, by the Royal Commission on the Aged Poor. In this Report you have got right away from the original principles. I should like to say—the Report was made some time ago, and so perhaps I may say it—that I have carefully read the evidence given before that committee, and I cannot see what justification there is for the Report itself. The matter is one to which I call the attention of the Commission.

3332. The actual matter referred to them was the Cottage Homes Bill, was it not?—Yes. That was a Bill I think to enable parishes to provide what are practically almshouses for their poor. There was a great deal of evidence given against it, as there naturally would be. There are very obvious administrative objections to the proposal. The Report rejects the actual proposals of the Bill, but proposes a number of workhouse ameliorations, and inserts the passage which I have read to you, as to the giving outdoor relief—apparently by way of yielding something to the original proposal in the Bill.

3333. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Is there any official or other scale of outdoor relief?—No.

3334. (Mr. Loch.) In that particular case was the Local Government Board called upon to give evidence through its Inspectors?—Some of the Inspectors gave evidence; I gave evidence for one.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

6 Feb. 1906.

Old Age Pensions Committee.

3335. (Mr. Booth.) Did I understand you aright to say that in your view the evidence did not justify the Report ?—Yes ; I suggest that it does not.

3336. (Miss Hill.) Has it been acted upon ?—Yes.

3337. (Sir Samuel Provis.) In the same year there was a Report, was there not, about Old Age Pensions ?—Yes.

3338. Do you want to say anything about that ?—That was on one of the Pension Bills. That is merely an indication of the sort of interest which was taken in the Poor Law matters in that decade, which I may call the political decade of Poor Law administration.

3339. Your point here is that you wish to call attention to the fact that about this time Bills were introduced for the purpose of establishing old age pensions ?—Yes.

3340. There were several Bills with that object, in fact, were there not ?—Several Bills and several proposals.

3341. Not Government Bills, of course, but Bills introduced by private members ?—Yes. There were Parliamentary Committees ; for instance, the one for which I went to Denmark and made a Report, which you will find in the Blue Book of that time, as to the Pension system there.

3342. But there was no Government Bill, I think ?—There was no Government Bill.

3343. Was there not a Select Committee with regard to the Aged Deserving Poor and Old Age Pensions in 1899 ?—Yes, that was in 1899 also.

Mr. Chaplin's circular as to aged deserving poor, 1900

3344. Then in 1900 there was Mr. Chaplin's Circular, which has been referred to several times ?—That Circular seems to follow as the almost necessary corollary to the Reports of the Royal Commission on the Aged Poor and the Committee on the Cottage Homes Bill. As I have pointed out in the early part of my evidence, the Local Government Board is in very close connection with the House of Commons and must of necessity pay great regard to the opinions of Members of Parliament. The Circular itself begins by adverting to a reply "which was given by the President to a question put to him in the House of Commons with regard to legislation on the subject of the recommendations made by the Select Committee on the Cottage Homes Bill last year." That does not tell quite the whole story, because if you read the Report of the Select Committee on the Cottage Homes Bill, you will see that it reiterates some of the recommendations which were made by the Royal Commission on the Aged Poor. The question which was asked of the President of the Local Government Board was, "Why the Government have not brought in a Bill to carry out the recommendations in regard to the Poor Law unanimously made by the Select Committee appointed last year to consider the Cottage Homes Bill, and whether the Government would now introduce such a Bill if an assurance were given that the Bill would be considered in an uncontroversial spirit." The President said that he had been anxious to deal with this question and had been unable to do so, but that he had prepared a series of regulations affecting the classification of inmates in workhouses with a view of securing separate accommodation for the aged and deserving poor." The Circular goes on :—"Although, as was pointed out, the moment is not propitious for legislation of the kind referred to, the Board think that it would be useful that guardians should be informed of their views, so that the hands of the guardians may be strengthened in dealing with these matters so far as existing circumstances will permit. The removal of imbeciles from workhouses was strongly recommended by the Select Committee, and its advisability has been repeatedly brought before the Board by guardians and others. But this question is one which must at any rate be deferred. The removal of children from workhouses, which was also recommended by the Committee, has been still more strongly urged upon the Board. It is a question on which public opinion is undoubtedly in accord with the recommendation of the Committee, and I am directed to urge upon boards of guardians to let no opportunity pass of carrying such an arrangement into effect. The opportunity will frequently arise when there is a question of enlarging the infirmary wards of the workhouse, or of increasing the accommodation in some other respect, and when it may be felt that the wisest course would be to provide the extra accommodation needed by removing the children altogether from the workhouse. In connection with this point the Board may observe that by the provision of cottage homes, by the hire of scattered homes, by boarding out and emigration, ample means are afforded by which children may be entirely removed from association with the workhouse and workhouse surroundings. With regard to the treatment of the aged deserving poor, it has been felt that persons who have habitually led decent and deserving lives should, if they require relief in their old age, receive different treatment from those whose previous habits and character have been unsatisfactory and who have failed to exercise thrift in the bringing up of their families or otherwise. The Board consider that aged deserving persons should not be urged to enter the workhouse at all unless there is some cause which renders such a course necessary, such as infirmity of mind or body, the absence of house accommodation or of a suitable person to care for them, or some similar cause, but that they should be relieved by having adequate outdoor relief granted to them. The Board are happy to think that it is commonly the practice of boards of guardians to grant outdoor relief in such cases, but they are afraid that too frequently such relief is not adequate in amount. They are desirous of pressing upon the guardians that such relief should, when granted, be always adequate." The Circular then concludes by making certain recommendations as to classification within the workhouse, including this one, "That considerably increased liberty should be granted to them, and greater facilities for being visited by their friends." That is a circular which I submit to the Commission is a necessary corollary to the reports which have been made to the House of Commons and to the Government by the Commission of 1895 and by the Committee of 1899.

3345. That finishes what you have to say as to the historical aspect of the matter, does it ?—Yes.

Local Governme Board Ci lar as to classificat in Work houses, 1

3346. (Mr. Bentham.) Was there not a circular issued in 1896 ?—I regret that I have omitted that. That was as to the classification in workhouses. It was immediately following on the Aged Poor Commission.

3347. Would you say that all boards of guardians who have honestly tried to follow the policy of the Local Government Board have, through these circulars, been led astray ?—No, I should not say anything of the kind ; but I admit to you at once that that circular has been very much misunderstood by various boards of guardians.

3348. They were led off the path of really orthodox Poor Law, as you understand it ?—It was a departure from the original Poor Law principles.

Statistics population rateable value and cost of po relief.

3349. (Sir Samuel Provis.) I think you now propose to give some evidence with regard to expenditure generally, and that, first, you have some observations to make to us on the changes in the aggregate cost since 1850 ?—Yes. The salient point in the figures as to the cost of Poor Relief which I have here from the year 1850 to the year 1894 is that between 1850 and 1894 the cost increased but little in proportion to the increase in the population. In 1850 the cost of poor relief was £5,300,000, the population being 17,500,000. In 1892-93 the cost had risen to £9,000,000 but the population had risen to 29,000,000.

3350. Have you anything to put before us with regard to rateable value ?—The rateable value was £67,700,000 in 1850, and had risen to £157,700,000 in 1893. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (15).)

3351. So that the increase in expenditure fairly corresponded with the increase in rateable value ?—Yes, but rather to the advantage of the rateable value.

3352. What do you say as to the expenditure of the last three decades ?—The figures for the last three decades are remarkable. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (18).) In 1873-74 the expenditure was £7,660,000 ; in 1883-84 the expenditure had risen but slightly, namely, to £8,400,000 ; in 1893-94 it had risen again but slightly, namely, to £9,670,000 ; but in 1903-04 that £9,670,000 became £14,000,000.

Sanitary expenditu of Metro tan Asyl Board.

3353. Do those figures include anything which is not strictly Poor Law expenditure ?—They include a considerable sum which is not strictly Poor Law expenditure. I deduct both from the sum expended in 1873-74 and from the sum expended in 1903-04 the approximate amount of the expenditures of the managers of the Metropolitan Asylums Board on hospitals and ambulances for persons suffering from infectious diseases. In 1873-4 that figure was £33,000, reducing the cost of Poor Law relief that I have given to £7,630,000; and in 1903–04 that £33,000 had risen to £646,000, showing an enormous increase in the expenditure of the Metropolitan Asylums Board, and reducing the true total of Poor Law expenditure in the latter year to £13,369,000. You remember that I gave it as £14,000,000 just now, but, deducting the expenditure of the Metropolitan Asylums Board, you get the sum £13,369,000. The expenditure of the Metropolitan Asylums Board was mixed up with the Poor Law expenditure for some years; it has now been taken out, and we find the sum which I have last given you is the official return of the expenditure on Poor Law relief in the year 1903–04.

3354. Is that figure arrived at by leaving out all the expenditure of the Metropolitan Asylums Board, or only certain expenditure?—That only takes out the expenditure so far as infectious diseases are concerned.

3355. So that it leaves their asylum expenditure for imbeciles and also for defective children?—It leaves the expenditure for those two matters and their expenditure on the training ship and other homes for children. I may say that the whole of these deductions are more or less approximate. There are a certain number of fever cases which, in an ordinary union, would be provided for by the guardians, so perhaps it is not fair to take the whole of the expenses of fever out from the Poor Law expenditure; but on the other hand there are a great many imbeciles in the Metropolitan Asylums Board establishments who, outside London, would naturally be in the asylums. That brings me to the second deduction which I have to make.

Cost of maintenance of pauper lunatics in asylums.

3356. And that relates to the cost of lunatics in asylums, I think?—Yes. Included in what I might call the official sum, which we have now reduced from £14,000,000 down to £13,369,000, is the cost of maintenance of pauper lunatics in county and borough asylums, registered hospitals and licensed houses. That may be the cost which may properly be included in Poor Law relief, but it is not a cost the amount of which in any degree depends on the administration of the Poor Law authorities. The cost is incurred by the county authorities on behalf of the pauper lunatics, but that sum cannot fairly be included in any account of the true cost of the Poor Law relief as administered by boards of guardians.

3357. Except so far as they may send cases to the asylums, lavishly or otherwise?—Yes; but that of course would not be the case in London, because in London they have got the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund paying for the imbeciles under the Metropolitan Asylums Board. That expenditure which has been included in the Poor Law expenditure for lunatics shows a very remarkable increase indeed. In the year 1873–74 it was £830,000; in 1883–84, it had mounted to £1,143,000; in 1893–94 it had increased to £1,466,000, and in 1903–04 the increase was to the sum of £2,286,000. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (18 and 19).)

3358. Are buildings included in that cost, or in what way have you arrived at it?—Buildings are not included; this is simply the cost of the maintenance of pauper lunatics, which, to recapitulate, went up from the beginning of the period from £830,000 to £2,286,000 at the end of the period. Those sums, as I have pointed out, are spent not at the discretion or under the administration of the Poor Law authorities. In order to arrive at a fair estimate or a fair statement of what the actual amount of expenditure by Poor Law authorities is, it is necessary to deduct those sums from the gross total. Deducting the £2,286,000 from the total of £13,369,000, we get a total of £11,082,000 spent for the administration of the Poor Law.

3359. You have knocked off about £3,000,000 then?—Yes. I should like to say that the expenditure on the insane in asylums in the last three decennial periods was as follows: In the first decade there was an increase of £312,000; in the next decade there was an increase of £323,000 and in the last decade there was an increase of no less than £820,000.

Proportion of cost of lunatics to cost of poor-law expenditure.

3360. Do you wish to say anything about the percentage of the cost of lunatics as compared with the rest of the expenditure?—I have here a return (Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (16)) which shows the percentage proportions of each class of expenditure to the total, for quinquennial periods. Going back to the averages between 1857 and 1860, I find that the maintenance of lunatics then amounted to 7·1 per cent. of the total Poor Law expenditure. That percentage rapidly increased throughout the whole period, and is now, in 1904, no less than 16·3 per cent. That is to say, the proportion of the total cost of Poor Law expenditure—taking the gross Poor Law expenditure as given in the returns—which is attributable to lunatics, has increased during forty-five years from 7·1 to 16·3. (See also Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (19).)

3361. Are you taking here lunatics in asylums?—I mean here the maintenance cost of lunatics in asylums. I suppose that if you were to add to that the cost of buildings, you would get an even more startling result.

3362. (Mr. Booth.) Do you say the cost of the buildings is not introduced in any form—neither as interest, nor as rent, nor in any other way?—That is so; these figures are simply for what we call maintenance.

3363. (Mr. Loch.) Further information is forthcoming I presume?—Yes. I can give you the amount sanctioned in each year on lunatic asylums, but that no doubt will appear in the statistical memorandum. I am now simply directing my attention to making such explanation as may be made of the reason of the very large increase of expenditure for Poor Law matters. I have reduced it from the apparent sum of £14,000,000 to what is a fair sum of £11,082,000, that is to say, I have now reduced the total increase in the true cost of Poor Law expenditure to an increase of £4,282,181, which is the sum arrived at by deducting the cost of lunatics and the non-poor relief expenditure of the Metropolitan Asylums Board from both the figures of 1873–74 and the figures of 1893–94.

Actual increase in poor law expenditure since 1873–4.

3364. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Can you tell us what is the proportion of the increase which has occurred in London, and in urban unions, and in rural unions, respectively?—We now have to deal with what I claim is the true increase, namely, £4,282,181. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (18).) Out of that no less than £1,800,000, or 42·12 per cent. of the whole, is an increase which concerns London alone. The increase in the counties of Surrey, Middlesex and Essex, which include what I may call the suburban unions of London, is £446,000, or 10·42 per cent. of the whole; that is to say, London and the suburbs are responsible for 52 per cent. of the increase. Then there is another group of populous urban communities which is responsible for another 38 per cent. of this increase. Yorkshire, for instance, and Durham are responsible for £528,000, or 12·33 of the increase; Lancashire and Cheshire for £626,000, or 14·63 per cent. of the increase; and Stafford, Worcester, Warwick, Nottingham and Derby for £476,000, or 11 per cent. of the increase. That is to say, London and the suburbs are responsible for 52 per cent. of the increase; what we may call the populous urban districts are responsible for 38 per cent of the increase, and the rest of the country is responsible for, say, only 10 per cent. of the increase. Therefore, the startling increase in Poor Law expenditure is primarily a London matter, and it is secondarily a matter which concerns the large urban populous authorities; and so far as the country districts are concerned, there has been no appreciable increase except in the last decade. To avoid questions hereafter, I would like to give you the population of these communities per acre. In London it is 61·65, in Lancashire and Cheshire 2·8, in Yorkshire 1·1, in Stafford, Worcester, Warwick, Nottingham and Derby 1·28, in Surrey, Middlesex and Essex 1·76, and in the rest of the country 0·45. (See also Appendix Vol. I. (A), V. (9).)

Distribution of the increase between London, Urban, and Rural Unions.

Population per acre in London and elsewhere.

3365. Are you taking the whole of a county for this purpose, or only the urban parts of it?—I am taking the whole of the county. It might have been possible to get the urban parts, but it would have been too much trouble, I think. In London 4,613,000 people live; in Surrey Middlesex and Essex, including the metropolitan suburbs, 2,772,000 people live; and in London and the urban districts generally, which as I have stated are mainly concerned with this increase of expenditure, 21,498,000 people live. In the rest of England and Wales, which has not appreciably increased its expenditure, there are 11,879,000 people. Therefore, as I say, this increase in Poor Law expenditure primarily concerns London, and generally concerns only about two-thirds of the population of the country, which points to the fact, as I venture to anticipate, that such difficulties as may arise in connection with the increase in expense are London difficulties, and in a lesser degree urban difficulties, and therefore that the Poor Law administration and local government in the rest of the country have nothing to answer for with regard to this question of the increase in expenditure.

Accelerating increase of expenditure in London.

3366. Could you split up that increase into periods?—I have here a table which splits this expenditure into decades for each of the union counties which I have enumerated. Roughly it shows, what I think is a most serious point, that the increase of expenditure in London goes on at an accelerating ratio. During the last decade, the increase in London alone was £1,000,000, that is to say, the expenditure in London in 1893–94 was £2,228,000, and it is now £3,240,000, which is a much faster rate of increase than is observable in any other decade you like to name.

Rate of increase in Urban and Rural Unions

3367. Can you give similar figures with regard to the urban districts and the rural districts?—I have them here on rather a long table. The salient point in it is that a good many of the country districts show an absolute decrease in the thirty years.

3368. (Mr. Lansbury.) Do the figures relating to London include the Metropolitan Asylum Board's figures?—These do not include the expenditure of the Board on fever hospitals.

3369. Then they are the figures for paupers only, apart from the lunatics?—Yes.

3370. (Dr. Downes.) They do include part of the Metropolitan Asylums Board's figures?—They include the imbeciles in the asylums.

Expenditure of Metropolitan Asylums Board.

3371. And the children, and the training ship also, do they not?—Yes. It may be convenient here to give the Metropolitan Asylums Board's expenditure for 1890, 1900, and 1904. The figures for imbecile asylums and other Poor Law services are £195,000 for the first decade and £265,000 for the next decade, and the increase between 1900 and 1904 brings the figure up to £383,000 then. If you take the fever hospitals the figures are, for 1890 £161,000, for 1900 £551,000, and for 1904 £646,000.

Rate of increase of expenditure and of population in London.

3372. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Is there anything exceptional in regard to the population of London in the last decade?—The population then increased at a lesser rate. On this diagram I have a curve which I should like to show to the Commission. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (17).) The curve is computed according to the percentage variations on the year 1900. The curve which represents expenditure since 1850, begins at 20 and ends at 120, which means that the gross expenditure of London has gone up six-fold while the population has only doubled. That by itself would be a figure requiring investigation, but as I have shown you, the expenditure goes up with an accelerating velocity.

3373. (Mr. Bentham.) Have you the rateable value on that diagram?—No, I have the rateable value of England and Wales (see Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. 15) on another. This expenditure curve is perfectly startling; you see how it goes up in the political period.

3374. (Sir Samuel Provis.) You are not including anything in this for buildings, are you?—No, except debt charges.

Proportion of increase in various classes of expenditure.

3375. With regard to the proportion of increase in each class of expenditure, can you give us any information?—Yes. In 1857–60 (cf. Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (16)) the percentage (of the total cost) of expenditure on in-maintenance was 17·6, and in 1904 it was 22·5, that is to say there was proportionately an increase of the cost of in-maintenance. Of course it will occur to everybody that one factor in the cost of in-maintenance is the price of provisions, so that what has to be considered in connection with the tables is the price of provisions (which we can get from the fiscal Blue Book). The out-door relief, which in 1857–60 was no less than 52·9 of the expenditure, has dropped in 1904 to 21·4, showing, as I shall further point out by-and-by, that the change has been from the cheaper form of relief to the more expensive form. Debt charges (which is the technical term for loans repaid and interest), which in 1857 were 3·5, rose rather irregularly and apparently in periods till in 1903–04 they were 9·3 of the total, that is to say, the percentage of the debt charge is nearly three times what it was at the beginning of the period. In the same manner, the salaries rose from 11·2 at the beginning of the period to 18·1 per cent. at the end of it. Those salaries are mainly in-door salaries, that is to say, they are accounted for probably by the extra number of nurses, medical officers and other attendants employed in workhouses. The in-door officers nearly doubled in 25 years, that is to say, they went from 5,000 to 9,000, the out-door officers in the same period showing a very much smaller increase—I think 1,000.

Increase in number of officers.

3376. Would you say as regards the officers, that it was rather an increase of their number than an increase in their rate of payment which has led to the increased expenditure under that head?—I do not know that; I should think it was both, especially in London. I think one of the reasons alleged by Mr. Gathorne-Hardy for the introduction of the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund was that the officers were not sufficiently paid. I have no doubt this increase has been due to both causes, but it is mainly due to the actual increase in the number of officers, especially nurses. The main sources of the increase are the maintenance of lunatics in asylums, which mounted from 7 per cent. to 16 per cent., the debt charges, which mounted from 3 per cent. to 9 per cent., and the salary charges, which mounted from 11 per cent. to 18 per cent.

3377. (Mr. Nunn.) Does any increase in the cost of buildings come under the debt charges?—Certainly. Mr. Kitchin will give you evidence as to that. I think it is notorious that all buildings cost more than they used to do; it is also notorious that buildings in London cost more than they do, generally speaking, elsewhere.

Increase in debt charges.

3378. (Sir Samuel Provis.) With regard to debt charges, do they increase in recurring periods?—It would seem so; for instance, after the troubles with regard to London in 1866, there is a sort of epoch where the increase is very rapid; and from 1866, which I should think is the period you have in your mind, the debt charges increased from £180,000 to £291,000 in 1871, which is a very sharp increase.

3379. Are those the figures for London only?—No; these are the figures for the whole country.

3380. As regards the year 1904 the figures were very heavy, were they not?—The year 1904 showed an immense increase. They amounted to £1,308,000 in 1904.

3381. Could anything be suggested as the ground for that; what did it relate to particularly?—There was some Metropolitan Asylums Board building which had been going on in London. In connection with that, you must remember that there are assets, that is to say, if the Metropolitan Asylums Boards or if a London Board of Guardians buys a farm, they have got land which is an asset, and in some cases a convertible asset; it is not like a workhouse specially built ad hoc. There is no doubt that the growth of the separate infirmaries has been largely the cause of this increase.

Cost of abolition of "barrack" schools.

3382. Also the alterations in schools, and such things as that?—Yes. I think I have already told you that the cost of providing buildings for taking the children who were formerly in the large metropolitan schools where the districts have been broken up, was more than £700,000—all of which has been incurred in the last few years.

3383. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Is that in London?—Yes.

Increased cost of sites and construction

3384. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Then there would be an increased cost in construction, would there not?—Yes.

3385. And also in the cost of the sites?—Yes, and that would apply through all urban districts, which, as I pointed out, are responsible for most of the cost. There is no doubt that they have to pay much more for their sites—considerably more for their land—than they used to do; but what we are dealing with now is not capital expenditure.

3386. Of course, if capital expenditure increases, the debt charge increases?—That is so. There is not the slightest doubt that this excessive rise in expenditure dates from all those schemes and ideas which were in men's minds some few years back, and now I suggest to the Commission that the bill is beginning to come in. "The oysters are eaten, and set down in the bill," as they say in the "Dolly Dialogues."

Comparative cost of London's indoor and outdoor paupers in 1873–4 and 1903–4.

3387. Has there been any change in the cost of London pauperism?—The change has been from the cheap out-door pauper to the expensive indoor pauper, and not only so, but that it has been from the less expensive indoor pauper to the more expensive indoor pauper. Summing up the situation, in 1873 there were 39,165 indoor paupers in the Metropolis, and it is estimated that the cost of their relief at £27 0s. 11½d. per head was £1,059,345. I may say that that is only an estimate based on what we judge was the cost per head multiplied by the number. They had also at that time 70,293 outdoor paupers, the average cost of whose relief was £5 7s. 3¾d. per head, or, £377,063, making a total for 109,458 paupers of £1,436,408. That was in 1873–74. This estimated cost includes, I may say, the cost of maintenance, the debt charges, rent, officers and everything. In 1903–4, instead of having 39,165 indoor paupers we had 71,474, with an average cost of relief of £39 12s. 4½d. per head, making a total of £2,831,711 for indoor paupers as against £1,059,345 in the first period; and we had 42,194 outdoor paupers at an average cost of £9 13s. 7¾d. per head, or £408,545, as against the 70,293 outdoor paupers at a cost of £377,063. This makes a total London expenditure of £3,240,000 for the last period, as against £1,436,000 for the first period, the number of paupers having remained very much the same. The outdoor pauper I am not so much concerned with, but you see that his average cost went up from £5 7s. 3¾d. to £9 13s. 7¾d. That is an approximate estimate of the amount of money given to him, and it also includes the proportion of salaries, debt charges, and so on. The approximate estimates, I may say, are based on the same principle for both periods. That rise in the rate of relief probably was to some extent due to the Board's circular as to adequate relief; I think there is no doubt that more relief was given. The cost of maintenance for indoor paupers is significant; the cost of the relief for outdoor paupers is based on a mean number and is not, I think, very dependable.

iations ost per d of don's or pers.

3388. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Have you got the cost of the maintenance for out-door paupers as compared with the cost for in-door paupers?—Taking the maintenance alone, that is, food and clothing, the figures for the in-door paupers, which are, I think, dependable, are these: In 1859 the mean number of indoor paupers in London was 19,450, and the cost per head was about £10; in 1869 the cost had risen to £11 17s. with an increase in the mean number to 36,000. It then remains pretty constant, although the mean number increased up to 1899, when it was 66,900, the cost per head being £13. In the last five years, while the mean number has increased to 71,000, the cost per head has risen to £14 11s.

lysis of eased cost oor relief London.

3389. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Can you say what is the burden of the increased cost in London?—The burden of the increased cost in London is the fact that whereas in the first period there were but 39,000 in-door paupers, in the second period there were 71,000 in-door paupers—which is not a very great increase, if any, on the population, but which is still a substantial increase in the figures for which the decrease of the out-door pauper from 70,000 to 42,000 did not at all compensate—more especially as it is the fact that the out-door pauper was better done by in the last period, when he cost £9 13s. 7¾d. per head instead of £5 7s. 3¾d. which was his cost in the first period. The in-door paupers within their own ranks show a sort of corresponding change, that is to say, the proportion of the more expensive sort of indoor paupers to the others is far greater now than it was thirty years ago.

3390. Can you compare it with rateable value and with population; have you any figures that illustrate that?—I have a table (cf. Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (18)) which sets out in some detail the change. Calculated per £ of the rateable value, the cost of relief, exclusive of the cost of maintenance of insane in asylums and of the expenditure on fever hospitals in London, which I have referred to before as being properly deducted in order to get at the true cost of relief, works out at 1s. 5d. in 1874; the cost then falls to 1s. 3d. in 1894, and rises again to 1s. 7d. in 1904. Calculated on population, the same cost appears to have been 8s. 6d. the in 1874, 10s. 4d. in 1894, and 14s. in 1904. The great proportionate increase in London is in the non-able-bodied adults and children. The non-able-bodied adults in 1874 were only 19,000; in 1904 they were 37,000, showing an increase of 18,000. The children have increased from 11,000 to 19,000, an increase of 8,000, (Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (13)) so that I put it before you that not only have you a change from a great increase in the most expensive part of pauperism, namely, in-door pauperism, but that inside of that in-door pauperism you have a further change towards the more expensive classes—the non-able-bodied classes and children who require special attention.

3391. Would you state to us any other causes that occur to you as the grounds for the increase?—As I have said, in-door pauperism has increased, but it has not increased much more than you would expect from the growth of the population, until just recently, and I must say that the increase just recently is rather ominous. The sharp increase dates from the period of 1901, which is just about the time that increased comforts would be brought into the workhouses. Of course the decrease of the out-door paupers does not compensate for this increase, so far as cost is concerned.

Effect of decrease in London birth and death rate.

3392. Do you make any suggestions as to what may be deemed to be other causes for it?—Yes, I make one suggestion, which is this—that the London death rate and birth rate have both decreased very sharply. I suppose that would mean that in London the proportion of aged persons is steadily increasing; and, if so, I think my doctrine of the irreducible minimum would again have an effect, and a larger proportion of persons would be obliged to use the workhouse. I may say that between 1890 and 1903 the death rate fell from 21 to 15 per 1,000.

Increase of deaths in hospitals and Poor Law institutions.

3393. Then there is the great increase in infirmaries, is there not?—Yes, and that increase has the heaviest bearing on the question of expense. There seems to be in London an increasing tendency on the part of all the population to resort to institutions; and that is specially marked in the last few years. In 1895, 24 per cent. of the total deaths in London occurred in hospitals and Poor Law institutions; in 1900 that percentage had mounted to 28·5; and in 1903, to no less a figure than 32·8 in workhouses and hospitals—pointing, as I say, to a greater disposition on the part of the inhabitants of London to use institutions. The proportion of that percentage of deaths occurring in workhouses and Poor Law institutions mounted in the same time from 15·3 per cent. to 18·5 per cent.

Variations in child pauperism in London and elsewhere.

3394. Then, too, there is a greater increase in child pauperism, is there not?—The increase in child pauperism is quite remarkable. The in-door pauper children supported by the guardians in London are about a third of the total number of children receiving in-door relief all over the country, though the aggregate in-door relief of London is only about a fourth of that of the whole country, showing that the child pauperism of London is very markedly higher than the child pauperism of the rest of England.

3395. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) Are you counting them apart from their parents?—I am only alluding to the in-door pauper children.

3396. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Those are deserted children, I suppose, mainly?—They would be mainly deserted children or orphans. I do not know the proportion of children of widows who receive relief in London workhouses; I think that might very well be ascertained.

3397. (Mr. Booth.) In the comparison between London and the country, are you omitting the out-door in London and the out-door in the country too?—Yes.

3398. The proportion of the out-door relief is greater in the country than it is in London; and, therefore, a comparison between the in-door children in London and the in-door children in the country is not a fair one, is it?—What I suggest is that there are relatively more pauper children in London.

3399. Unless you compare both the in-door and the out-door at the same time, that will throw your comparison out, will it not?—No doubt that would be so, if based on the in-door relief alone. What I say is that in London the proportion of children receiving in-door relief is one-third of the whole of the indoor child pauperism in England and Wales. In London in 1860 the in-door child pauperism was 30 per cent. of all the in-door paupers; it is now 25 per cent.; whereas in the rest of the country the in-door children are a fifth of the whole in-door relief, and the proportion of the indoor child pauperism of London to the child pauperism of the whole country has risen in the same period from 18 per cent. to 33 per cent.

3400. (Chairman.) It is only in-door pauperism you are now speaking of?—Yes. The object of this table is to show that there are indications that child pauperism in London, which is an expensive form of pauperism, bears a larger proportion to the total than it does in the country, and not only so, but that the proportion of child pauperism to other pauperism shows a marked tendency to increase.

3401. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Do you wish to say anything about the increase in the cost of maintenance during the last fifty years in London?—I have given the figures for the in-door paupers in answer to a question put to me by Mr. Patten-McDougall. I should like to call attention to one more thing in London. Statistics are difficult enough anywhere, but the London statistics—comparative statistics especially—are made yet more difficult by the fact that so many of the wealthier classes and the better-class workmen sleep outside London, and are there enumerated.

Cost of indoor relief per pauper in London and elsewhere.

3402. Coming now to the expenditure on in-door relief in London and the rest of the country, is there anything further you wish to say on that point?—The cost of in-door relief in London averages, on the mean number of in-door paupers, £37 18s. 11d. per head; that includes not only in-maintenance, but salaries, superannuation, debt charges, miscellaneous expenses and everything. The total of all those, divided by the mean number of in-door paupers in London, gives you that sum of £37 18s. 11d., whereas outside London the equivalent sum is only £25 2s. 1d. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (18).)

Need for space accommodation in Urban workhouses.

3403. Then, of course, in all workhouses there ought to be a certain amount of surplus accommodation; is that particularly wanted in Urban districts?—In urban districts you have a much greater risk of rapid fluctuations of pauperism, and therefore you should have a greater margin of unoccupied workhouse accommodation, which is expensive. You must not only have, or should have, a spare amount of accommodation in the gross, but you must have it for each class. Therefore, it is not prudent to fill up your workhouse to anything like the same extent in an urban district that it would be in a rural district; in other words, the margin of accommodation should be much larger and is much more important, I maintain, in urban districts than it is in the country. I will take three urban counties, excluding London, and three rural counties. The urban counties, Lancashire, Staffordshire and Warwickshire, in 1899 had 84 per cent. of their accommodation in the workhouses occupied, but in 1905 they had 92 per cent. occupied, which is too much; whereas in the three rural counties, they had 60 per cent. occupied at the beginning of the period, and but 70 per cent. occupied at the end. That is an illustration of the reason why the charges for pauperism must be greater in urban districts with a growing population.

Comparison of occupied accommodation in Urban and Rural workhouses.

3404. Can you give any instances of the subdivision of workhouse establishments in urban unions?—Yes. In the three urban counties I referred to I find that the establishments provided by Guardians in 1897 numbered 84, including 70 workhouses and workhouse infirmaries. In 1905 the number of establishments had increased to 106, including an addition of 17 infirmaries under separate administration, and 14 cottage homes.

Increased cost of voluntary hospitals.

3405. You told us of the increased cost of providing in-door accommodation: is it also the case that the increased cost of providing hospitals, which are not Poor Law institutions at all, is greater?—As far as maintenance is concerned, judging from Sir Henry Burdett's book, the cost of each hospital bed has gone up in a faster proportion than the cost of the workhouse in-door maintenance. I may say that everything has increased in price. Take the cost of schools: there is an enormous increase there. Then the cost of lunatics in asylums I have already shown is immensely greater than it was; even the national expenditure seems to go up.

3406. (Mr. Phelps.) Are there any figures to show whether that is the case with regard to gaols and prisoners?—I have no figures on that subject.

3407. Is there a difference between London and the country in that matter, do you think?—Probably not. You see the gaols are worked by the Home Office, and the administration is perfectly centralised.

3408. I think it would be very interesting to know whether a prisoner costs more in London than he costs in Stafford, for instance?—I am sure he does not.

3409. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Have you the figures before you as regards hospitals. Were they in 1868 £57 per bed, in 1887-89 £84 per bed, and in 1901 £104 per bed?—That return shows a much greater ratio of increase than anything we have in the poor law.

Increased cost of in-maintenance per pauper.

3410. (Professor Smart.) You have not given the figures for the maintenance per head of the in-door relief of the country; have you got those?—In 1849 it was £7. 17s. per head of the mean number of paupers relieved, it rose slightly till 1899, when it was £11 1s. per head, and in 1904 it amounted to £12 13s. per head, the last five years showing a very marked increase. I have here also a table which shows the effect of the true increase in the cost of relief, that is exclusive of the cost of maintenance of insane in asylums and inmates of the fever hospitals in London, first of all on the cost per head of population, and then per £ of the rateable value. The very heavy increase in London has resulted in a rise per head of population of from 8s. to 14s.; but as I have already pointed out, that figure is not very trustworthy. You must remember that a great number of the inhabitants of London sleep outside. So far as rateable value is concerned, the increase of the value in London has been so great that it has more than doubled in thirty years, and the increase of expenditure in the £. of rateable value has only been 2d., so that London is paying 2d. in the £ more for its Poor Law expenditure than it used to do. In England and Wales, the increase per head, excluding London, has been about one penny in the thirty years, and the decrease on the rateable value has been 2d. This table goes to show that the cost of the poor rate per head in the country is practically no greater than it was thirty years ago, and that in London the increase per head is very large—from 8s. to 14s.; but that is subject to the explanation that a good many of the inhabitants of London sleep outside. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (18).)

tropolitan mmon r Fund.

3411. (Chairman.) Now I think we have reached the evidence that you wish to give about the Metropolis; first of all, I understand that you would like to say something about the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund and its origin?—I think it important to remember that the Metropolitan Poor Fund was not started merely as a measure for the equalisation of rates, but that it was started so as to enable the poorer districts of London to provide the workhouse accommodation which was then obviously necessary. In the late sixties great complaints were made of the condition of the London workhouses and infirmaries; and to obtain the necessary funds for remedying the defect was, I think, the main reason for the introduction of the Bill by Mr. Gathorne-Hardy. This point is important, because it is an indication of one of the causes of the rise in London expenditure in the seventies; it led to the new workhouses and infirmaries which were then built.

gin.

rease in enditure n.

3412. Has there been a great increase in expenditure since then?—The amount which is chargeable among the various unions under the Metropolitan Poor Fund has increased from a comparatively trifling sum of £300,000 to an amount which is now nearly £1,600,000. In addition to that, the expenditure of the Metropolitan Asylums Board, most of which is raised by an equal rate from all London, has been very largely increased for poor law purposes. Only within the last few years a large number of cases of poor law sick children were put under the Metropolitan Asylums Board, and that board now have quite a number of homes for those children. I would like to hand in the half-yearly statement of the Metropolitan Poor Fund, as I think it will be of some interest to the Commission. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (23).)

tsh rges upon.

3413. You state that the rise has been from £300,000 to £1,600,000 during a certain period; I assume that during that period fresh charges in addition to the original charges have been imposed upon this fund?—Yes, and a great number of charges, involving in themselves comparatively small expenditure, have also been put on the Fund in recent years; for instance, the ambulance service of the Metropolitan Asylums Board, which was, I think, the last item to be put on. If you like, I will give you exactly the repayments which are received by the guardians from that fund. In workhouses and infirmaries 5d. per day is paid for every inmate over sixteen years of age out of the Metropolitan Poor Fund. Then the guardians get from the Metropolitan Poor Fund the salaries and rations of those officers who are sanctioned by the Local Government Board. Then the schools receive from the Metropolitan Poor Fund the full cost of maintenance—you will observe that it is only 5d. per day for inmates other than children. The casual wards are entirely paid for out of the Metropolitan Poor Fund; also the cost of all medicines and medical and surgical appliances; and in addition there are certain payments with regard to the insane and indoor-poor.

3414. Would you describe those payments or charges as being outside the original object or purpose of the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund?—I think they are charges in extension of the principle. When Mr. Gathorne-Hardy brought in his Bill, he said that he was not prepared to equalise the poor rates all over the Metropolis, as he foresaw that if he did that, a central management would be necessary, and that, in his opinion, would ultimately result in a great increase in the rate of expenditure. He therefore limited the charges which were to be cast on the Metropolis at large to certain fixed items of expenditure which he said could not be jobbed or made for the purpose. He considered that each union should still be responsible and chargeable with precisely those expenses of their administration in regard to which indiscreet or corrupt expenditure could occur; consequently, as a sort of check on the local authorities he chose practically to confine the payments to in-maintenance and to the salaries of those officers who were approved by the Local Government Board. It is within that principle up to now, that the charges on the Metropolitan Poor Fund have been extended.

3415. If you have said all you wish to say with regard to the charges of the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund, perhaps you would now tell us what, in your opinion, has been the effect as regards economy of administration?—In my judgment, the whole financial relations of London are not such as tend to economy in the administration of the guardians. During the year ending March 31st, 1903, which is the last year the figures of which I have been able to get access to, the expenditure of the guardians of London amounted to £4,435,000; of this the amount levied on the Metropolis as a whole was no less than £3,037,000, leaving to be borne by the several unions without equalization the sum of £1,397,000. Therefore, the guardians' expenditure, other than that levied on the rateable value of the whole of London, either through the Metropolitan Asylums Board, or the Common Poor Fund, or the County Council grants, was only about a fourth of the total. That fourth is borne by the different unions in very different proportions, but it is a question whether the local administration is not responsible for the difference in most of the most heavily rated unions.

Proportion of guardians' expenditure borne by Metropolitan Common Poor Fund.

3416. Has the tendency been for the unions to try to shift on to the Common Poor Fund the charges which perhaps are on the line between the Common Poor Fund and the union rate?—The bulk of the Common Poor Fund is administered, so to speak, automatically—there is a payment of 5d. per head on each indoor pauper within the certified accommodation, for instance; but there is a charge where there is always a doubt, that is the charge with relation to the salaries. The salaries are paid out of the Fund only for those officers who are sanctioned by the Local Government Board ; and there is a perpetual struggle on the part of boards of guardians to see how many officers they can have sanctioned, and consequently how much they can get from the Fund. That is a source of perpetual trouble to the Board, it is very expensive, and a good deal of friction arises from it.

3417. Have the officers so appointed to give their whole time to the duties connected with the Common Poor Fund ?—Not necessarily. We sanction any officer we like to sanction. We have to sanction all officers down to scrubbers and laundry maids, before the guardians can get the salary or the wages of the scrubber or the laundry maid put upon the Fund.

3418. I assume this leads to unnecessary correspondence and to a good deal of administrative friction ?—It does lead to administrative friction, although I cannot speak directly to that myself, but other witnesses will no doubt give you a great deal of information on the subject. I only know this about it, that we have a great deal of work thrown upon the department for which I am more immediately responsible. It is most unpleasant work, and most tedious. I have of course rather to discount what is told me by the fact that it is very tedious and troublesome work ; but, speaking generally, I have no doubt you will find that that part of our business does not work very well for the public good, nor do I think it works for economy. I had a case the other day where a Board wished to appoint a new laundry maid on the ground that its washing machinery was not up to date. That is a curious result of the existence of this Fund. The Board are quite alive to this question, but we are advised practically that very little, if anything, can be done without legislation. A very few years ago the Board tried to legislate with a view to getting these claims settled in a more simple manner, but the clause was thrown out by the House on the motion of a London Member.

3419. The sanction of the Local Government Board was, I assume, made statutory, in the belief that it would be a protection to the common poor fund ?—Yes, it was. In 1905, when some unions approached the Local Government Board and asked for a Departmental Committee to consider this matter, the complaining unions were only the receiving unions, and the unions who pay were quite contented with the present system.

3420. I assume that the real difficulty the Local Government Board have is that while they have authority given to them, they have not the necessary local knowledge to be able to adequately discharge their duties ?—That is a difficulty. As other witnesses will, no doubt, tell you, it is very hard for us to know what are the real wages of a scrubber in Poplar or Islington. They must vary. We do our very best with this fund, and I am sure that my colleagues do most conscientiously work it ; but as these sanctions cannot be given ex necessitate rei upon any settled principle, the result does not come out very satisfactorily. It is rather disheartening to receive a perfectly valid complaint that one union is getting a good deal more than it ought to have on any conceivable ratio ; and what is more, the difficulty becomes greater as the guardians build more and more institutions. I think Mr. Lockwood will confirm that.

3421. Is this the only case now under the Poor Law administration of Great Britain where the Local Government Board have these peculiar cases to deal with ?—Yes ; and London is the only place where such an immense proportion of the expenditure of the guardians is found from sources outside their own union.

Proposals to extend scope of Metropolitan Common Poor Fund.

3422. I understand that proposals are being constantly made to extend this common poor fund ; what is your opinion on that point ?—Proposals were formulated in 1905, and suggestions were made for the extension of the Fund ; some of which are quite trivial as, for instance, suggestions that infants under three should come on to the Poor Fund, and so on. There have been three proposals made which have a good deal of importance. The first one, and the most daring one, was that all charges paid for by the guardians should become chargeable to the fund, which meant that there should be local administration, but payment from all over the Metropolis. That had, of course, very little to be said for it, from the economic point of view. Then there was a proposal that all buildings should be paid for out of the poor fund ; it appears to me that the objection to that proposal is that it would certainly raise the cost of buildings, which, as I think, is already much too high, and it would be another inducement to the guardians to give in-door relief instead of out-door relief. A certain amount of encouragement to take the latter course is no doubt beneficial, but I do not think it would be wise to go much further than we have gone in London in that direction. In London out of every 1,000 of population on January 1st, 1904, there were 16·4 in-door poor and 9·6 out-door poor. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (13).) In England and Wales the average for in-door poor per 1,000 of population was 7·8, and for out-door poor 15·9 ; the highest average of in-door poor in any county other than London being 9·1 ; so you see there is a very much larger ratio of in-door pauperism in London than there is anywhere else in the country. There are indications that in-door relief may be subject to abuse, as out-door relief undoubtedly is.

3423. (Mrs. Webb.) Do the in-door figures you have just given us include the figures for lunatic asylums and fever hospitals ?—No, they do not.

3424. (Chairman.) Has there been any proposal to put out-door relief on this fund ?—There was a proposal to put out-door relief on this fund. That is a proposal which would lead to results that would be, perhaps, a little startling. I have prepared a table which shall be in the hands of the Commission in a day or two, showing what the effect would be on the payments made by the several unions if out-door relief were made a Metropolitan poor fund charge. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (22).) From that table it appears that Poplar, which now has to raise out of its own fund £34,000 a year for out-door relief would, if the charge were equalised, only have to raise £5,200 ; or, to put it in another way, out of every £500 that Poplar spent in out-door relief, £490 would be found by the Metropolis at large. The table deserves careful consideration, because it is full of surprises—at least to me. For instance, the arrangement suggested would, on the figures for the year taken, have resulted in a loss of £1,000 in St.-George's-in-the-East, and £2,700 in Whitechapel, which are two strictly administered unions ; and would secure in the same year a gain of £11,600 to Bermondsey and £29,000 to Poplar, two districts in which out-door relief is freely given. The comment on that is that guardians may by unwise administration increase their out-door relief to any extent, and it appears to me that the extension of the Metropolitan Poor Fund to out-door relief would give them the most direct inducement possible for doing it.

Financial effect of charging out relief to Metropolitan Common Poor Fund.

3425. Is there anything further that you would like to say as regards the especial characteristics of London ?—Perhaps I might just say this that, coming fresh to the study of London, the points that strike me most are these : Here you have this enormous aggregation of human beings without any means of what I should call real local self-government—the people do not vote, for instance ; and of that you will get evidence (I think strong evidence) from various persons, notably perhaps from Mr. Bailward. Then the people do not know their neighbours, and when they are elected guardians, as they may be by an accident, no less than three-fourths of their expenditure is found by an area wider than the area that elects them. You have none of these conditions existing anywhere else. Statistics are difficult enough in themselves, but a point that must always be borne in mind when you are looking at London statistics is that when you have a large part of the population working in London, but living outside and not enumerated in the London census, you get surprising results. The non-resident population makes London statistics more difficult than any other statistics, because it has to be taken into account as affecting the rateable value and pauperism. You will find unions like the Strand and the City of London, producing statistical results which are quite remarkable. In the City of London you will find that the cost of the Poor Law relief per head of population is 60s., which is much larger than anywhere else in England. I give that as a sort of caveat, when you are considering London statistics. Another thing that strikes me, on looking through the Census returns, is that there is no town in the United Kingdom where the proportion of casual labourers is anything like as high as it is in London. You will also find the most curious results if you take the figures which show the number of electors in proportion to the rateable value. In the East End you will find an enormous number of electors for a comparatively small rateable value; in other parts of London you will find the direct opposite. I venture, not knowing London at all, to put those facts before you, as being just the points that have struck me most in my investigations as far as they have gone.

Special points in considering Poor Law in London.

blems of ndon urban ions.

3426. Have you paid any attention to unions just outside London, such as East Ham, Edmonton, and Tottenham?—Personally I have no direct knowledge of them, and for your evidence about all those you must therefore go to others; but I do know enough about them to know that they present a problem of very great difficulty. The first thing I had to do when I came to the Local Government Board was to deal with a proposal to break up the Edmonton union, which is a union of 570,000 inhabitants. What are you going to do with that mass of population, many of whom work in London, although forming a separate Poor Law entity just outside London? It is the same with West Ham. Then take a place like Croydon, which has a large rateable value, with a large and increasing population, and with a very strong corporate existence. Croydon is very unlikely to wish to be absorbed into London, and come under the Metropolitan Poor Fund. However, those are questions on which I can give the Commission very little information of any value.

or Law ildren.

3427. That, I think, concludes your evidence so far as the Metropolis is concerned, and I think you would like now to say something about the history of the administration in connection with children under the Poor Law?—I should say that this part of my evidence is fortunately very much shortened by the fact that I am able to refer the Commission to another book of Sir William Chance's, called "Children Under the Poor Law," in which you will find a complete historical account of child-pauperism in England, together with much other information very conveniently set out. As to the history of the administration, it starts practically from the year 1848, which was the first year in which guardians received a Parliamentary grant for the teachers. From the very first, the subject attracted a good deal of attention, and you will find many references to it in the early Reports of the Commissioners. Perhaps to me the most interesting allusion is to the Atcham union, where, as they were not able to get a schoolmaster, they appointed a practical agriculturist of good moral character to look after the children—and apparently he did so with great success.

3428. Can you tell us something about the present practice as regards Poor Law schools?—Workhouse schools, that is to say, schools inside workhouses, are practically at an end. I may say that the county councils pay a proportion of the salaries and emoluments of industrial trainers on the certificate of our general inspectors.

unty uncil grant industrial iners.

3429. What is the proportion which the county councils pay?—They pay two-thirds. It is one of the few remaining old-fashioned grants.

3430. And the remainder falls on the unions, does it?—Yes.

3431. Did the county do it before county councils came into existence?—No. It was paid directly by the Treasury before county councils came into existence. The money still comes from the same source, that is, it is paid out of the Local Taxation Grant.

yal mmission Education l orkhouse ools.

3432. I believe a Royal Commission on Education made some suggestions on the subject?—Yes. There was a Royal Commission on Education which attacked the whole system of the then workhouse schools which had been in existence say, ten years, since the grant was paid. Their assistant commissioners were of opinion that workhouse schools were the direct cause of pauperism, and so far as I have been able to discover the only defender among the assistant commissioners which the workhouse schools had was Mr. Fraser, who was afterwards Bishop of Manchester.

3433. (Mrs. Webb.) What date was the Commisson to which you are referring?—The report of the Commission came out just before 1860. Then, as now, there was a most heated controversy about schools, and people formed themselves into factions, and one faction could see no good in the plan of education advocated by the other faction. I read in the reports of the Commissioners that no less a man than Nassau Senior was charged with purposely leaving out evidence from letters so as to make his side good. That sort of thing went on. I will say this for my Department; I look upon the education of pauper children as the most difficult, the most interesting, and the most successful part of our work. From even those early days, the Poor Law Board as it then was, exercised what I conceive to be the wisest policy, that is to say, they allowed all systems to grow up alongside each other and have a fair trial. They were the only people who appeared to believe what you hear stated always—it is a common tag at Poor Law conferences—that "Whate'er is best administered is best." The Poor Law Board of that date and the Local Government Board of to-day are apparently the only persons who manage to preserve calmness enough to adopt that maxim.

Policy of Central Authority as to Poor Law children.

3434. (Chairman.) Subsequent to this Commisson on Education there was a Select Committee of the House of Commons which dealt with the subject, was there not?—A Select Committee of the House of Commons investigated the whole subject at great length, and their report was ordered to be printed in 1864. I might say that a return as to pauper children was granted in 1862, and that there was another return issued containing the reports of the Poor Law inspectors on the subject.

Select Committee of 1864.

3435. What was the system which the Select Committee reported on?—The proposal of the Education Department was that the whole country should be covered with district schools, and Mr. Tufnell, who was the protagonist of that party, thought that the schools should be built to accommodate about 1,000, and that country unions should be forced to combine in order to build them. The inspectors of the Local Government Board and guardians generally said that there was very little fault to be found with the existing system, which was that of having schools actually inside the workhouses, because they had abundant evidence to show that the children educated in those schools turned out well. The Select Committee on Poor Relief (which was the title of the Committee of 1864) took, on the whole, the view that the existing system was sufficiently good. They say "Making reasonable allowance for the low condition, physical, moral, and mental, of a large proportion of the children when they first enter workhouses, and for the necessarily frequent changes in their admission and discharge, the state of workhouse education is upon the whole satisfactory in its character and result. The Committee think that it would be inexpedient, and in many cases impracticable, to enforce the general establishment of district or separate schools; but they are of opinion that schools entirely distinct from the workhouse should continue to be encouraged as being attended with beneficial results to the children, and affording the most effectual means of separating them from the other classes of paupers."

Education Poor Law children.

Select Committee of 1864.

3436. I believe that while boards of guardians opposed the establishment of district schools in the country, advantage was taken of the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund to start some in London?—Yes; somewhat later five or six of these district schools were started in London, whereas in the whole country not more than two or three were started. That appears to me a very good illustration of what I said on the first day when I gave evidence here, which was that sound local administration is a check on the extravagances of the Local Government Board or on the extravagances of Parliament. If the central authority, and what we may call the educated opinion of that day, had had its way the whole country would have been studded with schools of about a thousand each, at a huge cost, and with results probably no better than we can show to-day.

Metropolitan district schools.

3437. Was there not a Boarding-out Order about 1871?—About the seventies there was a general misgiving as to the sanitary condition of these large schools, and Mrs. Nassau Senior made a report to the Local Government Board of that day as to them. She reported strongly against the aggregation of children in large schools, and in favour of boarding-out. I should say that no one should consider her report without also considering the rather violent reply which Mr. Tufnell made to her at the time; the two should be read together.

Report by Mrs. Nassau Senior, and Mr. Tufnell's reply.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

13 Feb. 1906.

3438. You have alluded to Mr. Nassau Senior's views; which system was he in favour of ?—Mr. Nassau Senior was in favour of district schools. He was the eminent economist who wrote a great part of the report of 1834; he was, I think, the father-in-law of Mrs. Nassau Senior.

Mr. Nettleship's report as to ophthalmia.

3439. Now we come to the introduction of the boarding-out system. There was some difficulty, was there not, in connection with the children's eyes; did they not suffer from ophthalmia ?—Yes. Mr. Nettleship, who was an eminent oculist, made a report as to ophthalmia in the London district schools, in 1874. Just about that period people were very much alive to the whole question of the treatment of children. It was very shortly before that—I think about the year 1866 or 1867—that the cottage home plan of building in small blocks was introduced.

Origin of cottage homes.

3440. (Mrs. Webb.) Who initiated the cottage home system ?—Mr. Andrew Doyle was the man who took a great interest in cottage homes. He went to Mettray and saw Count de Metz's buildings there; they were buildings broken up into small homes. I think that was the origin of our cottage homes. The first ones built were built in South Wales, at Neath.

Children sent to public elementary schools.

3441. (Chairman.) I think after the introduction of cottage homes the Education Act was passed ?—Yes, the Education Act made a very great difference to our Poor Law workhouse schools. The system of sending the children out to the public elementary schools spread with great rapidity, and now at the present time, there are about 17,000 children, living in Poor Law establishments who go to the public elementary schools—that is, half the total number of our children who go to school at all attend the public elementary schools.

3442. Has that system answered ?—I think it answers admirably. It is cheap, it is efficient, and the children are distinctly happier than they used to be.

3443. (Mr. Gardiner.) Do they live in the workhouses or in separate homes ?—Sometimes they live in workhouses and sometimes they live in separate institutions. I will give you the exact allocation of the children by-and-by.

Subsequent careers of pauper children.

3444. (Chairman.) I suppose that, previous to the Education Act, pauper children were the only children who were compelled to go to school ?—That was so, and perhaps the great success of our children was, to some extent, due to that. The earliest return that we have showing what became of pauper children was one which was made on the motion of Mr. Henley, whom your Lordship will remember as Member for Oxford. That return showed very satisfactory results.

Mr. Henley's return.

Boarding-out Orders.

3445. In 1877 was there not a Boarding-out Within Unions Order ?—In the early seventies there were Boarding-out Orders first outside the union and then inside the union.

Departmental Committee on Workhouse Schools.

3446. Then I think there was a Committee in 1894, was there not ?—There was a Committee in 1894 which reported in 1897.

3447. That was a Departmental Committee for inquiring into the metropolitan schools, was it not ?—Yes.

3448. Was it purely an educational committee ?—It dealt with the whole system.

3449. Then it was departmental in the Local Government Board sense, you mean ?—Yes. Mr. Mundella was the chairman. That committee was appointed by the then President of the Local Government Board, mainly, I think, because there had been attacks or statements made as to the prevalence of ophthalmia in these schools. I believe that the ophthalmia was the real reason why the committee was granted.

3450. What was the purport of its report ?—The purport of the report was to condemn the schools altogether, to make recommendations for the breaking up of the school districts, and for the establishment of a body other than the guardians for governing the pauper children of the metropolis.

3451. Are we to understand that the Committee attacked not only the schools in workhouses, but also the district schools ?—They attacked the district schools in London. It was a metropolitan committee; we must not forget that.

3452. Was it an inquiry confined to the children in the metropolis and not generally applying to the country at large ?—That is so.

3453. Was any reply made to the objections which that committee raised against district schools ?—The report was received with a storm of indignation. The metropolitan managers and the metropolitan guardians and many other people objected to the whole report. You will find a complete history of the agitation against the report of the committee in Sir William Chance's book, "Children under the Poor Law."

Sir William Chance's "Children under the Poor Law."

3454. About that time was there not a report by Dr. Stephenson on the ophthalmic condition of the children ?—Yes. That was a very remarkable report indeed. Dr Stephenson was, I believe, called before Mr. Mundella's Committee, but he had not then the complete knowledge of the ophthalmic condition of the London school children which he had afterwards. The report as to the breaking up of the district schools was based to a very large extent on the assumption that the worst form of ophthalmia was extremely prevalent, and that it was a necessary consequence of what they called the aggregation of the children. Dr. Stephenson's report is extraordinarily clear and well worth reading. He found out that, so far from trachoma having increased in the schools, it had decreased, since the date of Mr. Nettleship's report in 1874, from about 40 per cent. to something under 5 per cent. He also found that in his opinion the spread of this disease was due to the admission of children suffering from it. He also showed that the number of cases of ophthalmia varied directly with the poverty of the unions from which the children came; and that ophthalmia was not a necessary consequence of what the Committee called "aggregation." He said, "So far as I am able to form an opinion, the aggregation of reasonable numbers in a well kept and properly arranged school is likely to do no harm."

Dr. Stephenson's report on ophthalmia.

3455. To which body was that report made ?—The inquiry was undertaken at the request of the Local Government Board, and the report was published in 1897.

3456. That is nearly ten years ago; has time confirmed Dr. Stephenson's opinion ?—I think so; but as to that you will receive further evidence.

3457. Would you like to give your opinion on the controversy which arose out of the report of the Committee ?—I have read that report and I have read the evidence carefully, and I am bound to say that the way in which everything that tells in favour of the large schools is ignored is most remarkable. There is not a word in that report of the very weighty testimony which was given to the effect that practically all the children educated in those schools were dispauperised and did well in after life. Witness after witness is quoted in part, and the material or qualifying part of his evidence is left out. Thinking it over, it appears to me that at the back of the report there was some sardonic humorist who wished perhaps to test the credulity of the people or to expound his view as to the value of a Departmental Committee for getting at facts.

Criticism of Report of Departmental Committee on Workhouse Schools.

3458. I believe the report of the Committee, whether it was based on sound evidence or not, was supported largely by public opinion, was it not ?—The report of the Committee was in many respects valuable—I think everybody will agree to that—and in a great many respects was simply carrying out movements which had been already begun; but as to that Mr. Lockwood will give you better evidence than I can. It was very strongly supported by an influential body called the State Children's Association, and was, I think I may say, in parts very willingly accepted by my board. The appointment of the Central Metropolitan Authority was, however, dropped. The other most important change recommended was the breaking up of these large schools. The Committee having reported in that sense, and it being quite evident that the opinion of the House of Commons and current opinion just outside the actual managers was in favour of the breaking up of these schools, I suppose the Local Government Board had no choice but to decree their extinction. But we cannot forget that that breaking up cost the metropolis three-quarters of a million in solid money; and there must be I think, to anyone who looks at the evidence as to the dispauperisation of the children educated in the old schools, some little misgiving as to whether the children educated in the new schools are going to do quite as well as the old ones. There is just a doubt whether there may not be in small cottage homes where the children are mixed and not classified according to age, certain moral mischiefs which might well be guarded against in the larger schools and there may be a doubt—and a strong doubt too—whether the industrial training, which is to my mind the main consideration, will be as good in these small homes as it was in the large ones. On that point I would refer you to the most interesting report* which was made by our London inspector, Miss Stansfeld. It is a short report, but it is very much to the point.

3459. What is the present distribution of the children, first in London and then in the provinces?—Generally the distribution of the children is continuously in the direction of smaller homes instead of in large schools, and continuously in the direction of the extinction of the old workhouse school. This information had better be handed in in the form of table (see Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (12),) perhaps; but I may say that in London on January 1st, 1905, there were 13,334 children, of whom 2,495 attended public elementary schools, being housed in Poor Law establishments, thirty-two attended workhouse schools (those would be exceptional cases where there were sick children, and so on), 5,213 attended separate schools, that is to say, schools for one union, and 3,273 attended the district schools, while 1,630 were under the care of the Metropolitan Asylums Board; these figures showing that practically all the London children of school age are out of the workhouses. In the country workhouses and infirmaries there are 18,707 children; in district and separate schools there were 4,300; in cottage, scattered and separate homes there were 10,000, and then there were some in other establishments under the guardians' control, making, altogether, a total of 33,000. Of these children there were 24,000 who were of school age, 14,957 of them attending public elementary schools, 817 attending workhouse schools, 5,750 attending separate schools, and 785 attending district schools, including the "Exmouth." Then there were, besides those, over 7,700 children in homes, not directly under the control of the guardians but paid for by the guardians. The whole process is in the direction of the individual treatment of each child, and in the direction of splitting up large institutions.

3460. Next, you wish to deal with certified schools and uncertified institutions, I think?—Yes. There has been a very large growth of those, and very useful they are. They are to my mind perhaps the best illustration of charity working in co-operation with the Poor Law. Good people start these homes, we certify them, the guardians pay for the children going there and we inspect them. There were no less than 262 of those institutions in England last year with accommodation varying from six children up to 900—I am thinking of one of Dr. Barnardo's.

3461. (Mr. Bentham.) You have just mentioned 7,700 children as being in other homes; were they in these institutions you are now speaking of?—Yes, they were in the certified institutions. There were also another 3,000 in uncertified institutions, sent by consent of the Board or by direction of the medical officer. There are also nine training ships, and the Local Government Board encourage the sending of the boys to the training ships very much.

3462. (Chairman.) Do they work well?—They work very well.

3463. I suppose a considerable proportion of those boys go into the Mercantile Marine service?—Yes, they do.

3464. I think you have noticed that there is a tendency to aggregation?—Yes, though the houses may be smaller the institutions are larger. That is a very natural tendency. If you have a great number of children together you can do them better, you can give them better swimming baths and a better gymnasium and a better industrial training. I would like to point out that the Local Government Board are blamed from time to time for permitting this aggregation. The State Children's Association protest against it, but it is, under the circumstances, almost inevitable. We are not the only ones who have that difficulty to face. Canon Barnett when he came before the Vagrancy Committee gave most striking evidence on the point, which I should like to put before this Commission. He said, in answer to a question that was put to him, that in his experience "no one does quite so well as a boarded-out child, considering the class he comes from and the difficulties he has to start with. Dr. Barnardo, who speaks with unique experience, says the same. Dr. Barnardo has broken up some of his institutions and now boards the children out. . . . . Dr. Barnardo, speaking to me the other day, said, 'If I were starting again I would not start an industrial school of any sort,'" which was a very strong opinion in favour of boarding out. Canon Barnett was asked "With regard to Dr. Barnardo's preference for boarding out over institutional treatment, are you aware that he is extending his accommodation at Ilford"—that is a cottage home school for girls—"to 2,000?" to which Canon Barnett replied:—"Yes, he is bound to; but I will tell you why. He has got to raise his money and he is obliged to appeal to people through their eyes."

3465. What is the ultimate object in view for these children who are thus aggregated?—They should be going out to service by the time they are fourteen.

3466. At what age do they go to school?—They begin at the ordinary school age, which is three years—which I think should be raised to seven years, but three is the school age now in England. School age for children.

3467. In those homes they would be over three years of age before they are sent to school, would they not?—Yes. They become a new class at three; they then become "children of school age."

3468. Are children boarded out at the same age as they are sent to school?—Yes. Boarding-out age.

3469. What have you to say about the apprenticeship of pauper children, which I think is your next subject?—Apprenticeship has practically died out, and there are very few of the children who are apprenticed now. The regulations of the Local Government Board on the subject are antiquated, and not suitable to the present conditions. They would have been revised long ago but for the fact that cases of apprenticeship have now become rare, except in certain instances where a child is a cripple or something of the kind. What is important about it is the fact that we now recognise that the premium paid for apprenticeship may in certain cases be paid as a sort of allowance to the child when he is learning his work to enable him to get his own living; and that we sanction in certain cases. There have been proposals to extend that system considerably, as, for instance, that children shall be allowed to live in workhouses or in schools and go out as half-timers at the mills to learn a trade. That proposal has been made especially in the north of England in connection with the textile industries. It is a very interesting point, and it was quite lately considered. We managed to get the opinion of trade unions on the point. They were dead against it. One said they viewed it with detestation; another one said they scouted the idea; another one said it would be most distasteful on the grounds that it would be a way, as he thought, of lowering the rate of wages, and that in times of strike the children would still go on working—in effect, that they would not work with the rest of the trade union. All those objections are quite sound, it seems to me, as far as they go; anyway, the system has not been brought into practice, though it has been very much advocated. Apprenticeship of pauper children and proposed extensions of system.

3470. (Mr. Bentham.) Do you remember how many boards of guardians have got sanction for that system?—I do not, but I believe there was a case at Keighley.

3471. (Chairman.) To whom would the half-timers' wages go?—The half-timers' wages would go to the guardians for the maintenance of the children. As you know there is a statutory prohibition against employing paupers for hire.

3472. Now I think you wish to speak to us about the fishing trade?—Yes. A good many boys are apprenticed to the fishing trade at Grimsby and other places. Mr. Berrington, who was one of the assistant secretaries of the Board of Trade, and myself held an investigation into the whole subject at Grimsby a few years ago. The facts were these: There was great loss of life at that time, and there was a great deal of justification for the criticisms that were passed on the then system of apprenticeship to the fishing trade; but I was always of opinion that those objections could be met, and that it was an impossible thing to stop the fishing trade altogether as a means of apprenticing pauper children. It is exactly suited for a certain type of boy. The rough boy who is Apprenticeship of pauper children to fishing trade.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

no scholar, and has plenty of pluck, and does not mind hardship, has his exact metier there, and if his life is a little dangerous, his rewards are very great. Only the other day I saw a letter from a boy who was in one of the workhouse schools in my district in which he apologised to the master of the workhouse for his early marriage, and enclosed a cheque for £10 to be expended as a treat for the school children of that workhouse. It was a very interesting letter to me. Before that boy was twenty-two he had made over £600.

3473. I think the general impression is rather that putting young boys to an occupation of this kind renders them specially liable to ill-usage?—That is so, but you see they have got a Board of Trade agent there who is a great protector; and then, when you have got a lot of boys together, they make a public opinion; and if a skipper is cruel to an apprentice that skipper has a rough time of it.

3474. On the whole, then, do you think that that is not a serious objection?—Carefully watched I think that apprenticing him to the fishing trade is a most valuable means of disposing of a certain type of boy.

3475. Who makes the selection; does the boy have anything to say as to his trade, or does that rest entirely with the guardians?—If he is apprenticed he always has to consent.

3476. (Mr. Gardiner.) In practice the boy consents to anything, does he not?—No, not with regard to the fishing; boys very often refuse to go to that. With regard to ordinary businesses the boy has a choice.

3477. (Chairman.) Do you think the consent of the boy is any real check?—Yes, because he is brought back again before the indentures are completed and finally signed; he has a trial trip.

3478. (Mr. Gardiner.) Are the boys only sent on that trip in the summer?—I cannot say exactly how it is done now. If you will read our report, you will find that we went into the matter pretty fully; but there have been considerable changes since, and the Board of Trade will tell you all about those.

Emigration of pauper children.

3479. (Chairman.) Your next subject is emigration; there are certain rules made by the Local Government Board in connection with emigration, are there not?—Yes, a very important branch of the Board's work in connection with children is that of emigration, which is nearly always to Canada. Last year I think 450 children were so emigrated, and the year before 374 children, at a cost of some £5,000. You will see a complete and very excellent account of the Local Government Board's relation to emigration in the evidence of Mr. Lawrance (who is in the Local Government Board) which will appear in the report of the Agricultural Colonies and British Settlements Committee, which will be issued in two or three months I think. Very briefly, the system is this: The Guardians write and say they wish to emigrate such and such a child through an agent—the Waifs and Strays Society, Dr. Barnardo's, or any of the various well-known agencies in Canada. We then make certain inquiries about the child, and the matter is referred in case of any difficulty to the Agent-General for Canada. We then get a cheque from the Guardians for the inspection of the child while it is in Canada. That is a new arrangement and a most beneficial one; the Guardians pay as much as £10 for the inspection of a very young child, paying less and less as the child gets older. The consent is then given and the order is issued and the society takes the child out. The children are regularly inspected by officers of the Canadian government, and I will bring with me when I next come here, the books showing the exact information which we get from Canada with regard to each child. That information is carefully sifted and where necessary it is forwarded to the Guardians for their observations where anything requires to be done. Complaints have been made that it is many months before those reports reach the Guardians. That is so, and it is a matter of great difficulty to avoid it; but you must remember that long before the report reaches the Guardians, as a rule, everything that has been necessary has been done for the child by the Canadian Government agent on the other side. I think I may safely say that the child is amply protected, and that the system now works very well indeed. The Guardians do not take full advantage of it, and they do not send as many children as one would suppose they would; there is a sort of feeling that the best children are wanted in England.

Procedure in regard to Canada.

3480. How long has that system been in force?—I think it has only been perfected since 1898. I have written myself to our general inspectors calling their attention to the details of this Canadian inspection, and I think you will find that probably more children will be emigrated. Emigration is very suitable for a certain class of children.

3481. Is Canada the only Colonial Government with which this arrangement has so far been made?—We do emigrate children to other places. For instance we have sent three to New Zealand and some to South Africa; but Canada is so much more suitable—the fares there are so much cheaper and the arrangements are so much the more perfect that practically Canada has monopolised the whole.

Variation in numbers boarded-out children.

3482. Now I think you have something to tell us about the number of children boarded within and without the unions?—I have merely to call the attention of the Commission to certain facts and I will put a Table in if it seems good to you. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (12).) I have a list of the numbers boarded out in every year from 1894 to 1904, from which it appears that the numbers boarded out outside the union were in the first year of the decade 1802, and in the last year of the decade 1792, showing a slight fall. A more considerable fall would have been shown if we took the years before 1894. The children boarded-out within the Union were, in 1894, 3,613, and in 1904 6,780. Therefore the boarded-out children beyond the Union is a stationary or declining number, and the boarded-out children within the Union are increasing somewhat rapidly.

Extension of boarding-out order.

3483. Has there been any recent change in the orders on the subject?—We have issued a new order for boarding out outside the union, raising the rate of maintenance and also empowering Guardians to board out children who are adopted under the Poor Law Acts 1889 and 1899. An order of the same sort is under consideration for boarding out within the union.

Adoption of children by guardians under Poor Law Acts 1889 and 1899.

3484. What were the Poor Law Acts of 1889 and 1899?—Those were Acts which enabled Boards of Guardians to adopt children, that is to say, to put themselves in loco parentis in the case of any child who appeared to be neglected, and to assume all the responsibilities of the parent, subject to an appeal by the parent to the magistrates. The Act has made a very considerable difference in the administration of the Guardians with regard to children, and has tended, I think, to bring a certain number of children into institutions. In 1902 we had a Return of the number of children adopted under these Acts; I have the Return here, and it shows that more than 350 unions had taken action under the law, and that the number of children so adopted was more than 7000.

Subsequent careers of pauper children.

3485. You have had a very long experience, so perhaps you can tell us what is the result of the training and education of pauper children; does any considerable portion of them in after life come back under the Poor Law?—There is a consensus of testimony from the very earliest times that whatever may be the defects of our Poor Law schools they have at least this one merit that they have dispauperised the children. If they had not done so the result would have been that in our workhouses we should have had a large number of able-bodied paupers, because, if the children brought up under the Poor Law came back into the workhouses, they would do so in the able-bodied period of life. If workhouse schools had failed, as they were said to have failed, is it not obvious that we should not have had the remarkable decline in able-bodied pauperism which we have had? In spite of that general consideration, and in spite of the special investigations to which I will allude later on you have it continually repeated that there is a pauper taint which never can be got rid of, that once a pauper always a pauper and that the Poor Law Education is a feeder of pauperism. Only the other day I saw a statement by a gentleman who was, until the last election, a member of the House of Commons, and this is what he says: "For many generations the Poor Law schools have been nothing but forcing houses for paupers. Paupers have been turned out machine made to one pattern." You may imagine the enthusiasm with which some of us who have devoted much of our lives to improving and perfecting the system of pauper education receive statements like that.

3486. (Mrs. Webb.) May I ask whom that statement was made by?—Mr. Louis Sinclair, the late member for Romford.

Henley's rn 1860.

3487. (Chairman.) I think there are some returns now that you want to refer to, are there not?—Yes. The first one is Mr. Henley's Return of 1860.* That was very favourable to the schools generally, as it made out that about five per cent. of the children came back. That is a creditable enough Return when you consider what some of those early Poor Law schools must have been.

3488. Do you think that Return is reliable?—Yes, subject to investigation. I am going to put before you a suggestion later on for making a Return of that sort more conclusive and less open to criticism.

kworth's rn, 1896.

3489. There is another Return on the subject to which you wish to call our attention, is there not?—There is a later Return† which was made in 1896 on the motion of Lord Warkworth. That Return was for the Metropolis alone. It showed the number of male or female inmates of metropolitan workhouses or infirmaries who had been educated in workhouse schools and district or Poor Law schools. According to this Return, taking boys and girls together the daily average number of children attending metropolitan separate or district Poor Law schools was in 1875, 8383; in 1885, 11,004; and in 1895, 11,747. The number of inmates of metropolitan workhouses and infirmaries in June 1896 who had been educated at Poor Law schools was 435. The number out of the 435 inmates so educated who had become chargeable through sickness or permanent mental or bodily infirmity was 232; therefore the number who had not become chargeable through sickness or permanent mental or bodily infirmity was 203, which represented about five in every thousand of the actual number of adult inmates of the workhouses and infirmaries dealt with in the Return. These, I think, are the only two general Returns on this branch of the subject which I can put before you.

3490. (Miss Hill.) The first Return showed that about five per cent. of them came back, and the second Return five per thousand; therefore the second Return was more favourable?—Yes.

3491. (Mr. Gardiner.) The first Return, Mr. Henley's, however, was for the whole country, and the second, Lord Warkworth's, for London alone?—Yes.

3492. I should think that the country schools would not always compare very favourably with the London schools?—I will come to that later on.

ort by Davy

Mozley 77.

3493. (Chairman.) Now I think you wish to refer to a joint Report which was made by you and Mr. Mozley in 1876?—Yes. That Report was published in the Local Government Board's Report of 1877. Mr. Mozley, who was an inspector of workhouse schools, and myself, took, as I think you will believe when you read the Report, a great amount of pains to find out what became of the children who were educated at the separate schools for Manchester at Swinton. That Report is wholly satisfactory, and I should like to quote you a sentence from it:—"If a boy in the upper or middle classes fails in an examination or leaves his first employer, he is not usually at once considered to have utterly failed in life. But if a pauper child leaves his first place for a cause which may after all be the fault of his employer, who is alone left to tell the tale, and is then lost sight of under a stupid and mechanical system of visiting, he is promptly written down as a discredit to his school, and is perhaps printed in a blue book as a striking instance of the evil results of pauper school training." I adhere to that exactly now as I did when we wrote it.

Law ren and ty cil arships.

3494. (Mrs. Webb.) Would it be possible to get any information as to the number of county scholarships taken by pauper children; I believe none are taken in London?—You will find in Sir William Chance's book on "Children under the Poor Law" instances given of many children who have won prizes for technical education.

3495. There is now about £4,000 a year given in London in these scholarships, but no pauper children at present have taken them I believe?—I cannot speak as to that.

3496. (Mr. Lansbury.) Was there not one case last year?—If the Commission pleases I will arrange that some one or other of the inspectors shall look up these modern points.

Procedure on dismissal of Poor Law child by first employer.

3497. (Chairman.) Supposing a boy after leaving school is put out to employment and loses his first employment, is there any machinery attached to the Poor Law which would find him other employment?—If the visiting of the children is properly done the persons who have to keep their eye on that child would find another place for him. In some cases the guardians have made actual arrangements with working boys' homes, and so on, to take in children who have lost their first berth and to look after them till they find another situation.

3498. (Mr. Booth.) Is the employer bound to communicate the fact to the guardians if he wishes to dismiss a boy?—In every decently administered union that is one of the conditions of taking the child.

M.A.B.Y.S. Society.

3499. (Miss Hill.) And in the case of a girl you have the M.A.B.Y.S. Society, have you not?—Yes, in London.

Mr. Murray Browne's report.

3500. (Chairman.) You now wish to mention a Report on the country unions by Mr. Murray Browne, I think?—Yes. Mr. Murray Browne made a Report on the country unions, and two years before that one of the schools inspectors had done the same thing. He took a certain number of selected unions and traced the children. Mr. Murray Browne kept the old Eton School Lists, and he was very fond of saying that he was quite sure that the ordinary pauper school did not turn out as many failures as a big English public school, and he was ready to demonstrate that with numberless instances.

Evidence of general inspectors as to subsequent careers of Poor Law children.

3501. I think you have found other evidence to the same effect which has been given by other inspectors?—There are three instances that I have been able to extract from the Blue Books. Mr. Lockwood says, in the 22nd Report of the Local Government Board, speaking of the number of people in fifty-four workhouses who had been educated at pauper schools:—"It will be seen from this return that on a given day there were, in fifty-four workhouses with a total of 5,550 adult inmates, sixty-seven men who in childhood received a workhouse education, but of these twenty-four only can be set down as responsible failures, the destitution of the remaining forty-three being caused by mental or physical infirmities which would in any case prevent their being self-supporting." In the 25th Report of the Local Government Board Mr. Baldwyn Fleming speaks to the same effect—"Out of 784 workhouse inmates there are, according to the above returns, about thirty children who may be fairly counted as failures. Then in the 24th Report of the Local Government Board I say this:—"It is frequently alleged with much assurance, and in spite of clouds of witnesses to the contrary, that children who are educated at a workhouse school generally return to the workhouse and make it their home; and past experience makes it probable that the allegation will continue to be made and to be believed. . . . Misrepresentations of this kind must be endured, however mischievous they may be." That return is pretty much to the same effect.

Visitation of boys and girls in service.

3502. Now we come to the question raised by Miss Hill, namely, what is done in the case of the girls?—There is the Association for Befriending Young Servants, the secretary of which, Miss Poole, undertakes the visiting of the girls for, I think, most of the unions, and her Report is published in the Board's Annual Report. I might say that there is another institution of the same sort which has been started lately for the visiting of Poor Law boys.

3503. (Miss Hill.) Do you know whether that institution confines itself to London?—I do not: I only heard of it the other day.

3504. (Mr. Booth.) Does that visitation take the place of inspection by the guardians?—I think they undertake the charge from the guardians, but you will no doubt hear Miss Poole, and by this time she may be able to give you some valuable and much needed assistance in comparing the future of girls educated in different institutions, whether, for instance, the scattered home girls do better than the other girls. I may say that about the best system of inspection of children sent out from workhouses I ever knew was that at the Warren Farm schools at Brighton—an institution which I do earnestly hope some of the Commission will visit. The work was undertaken by two lady guardians, who did it most extraordinarily well and kept every single return. There are 300 children in the school and the buildings are inferior, but we have never had for years to send a child to a certified home or to board one out or to send one to a training-ship. We have got the name of every boy who has been there for many years. Seven out of ten of the boys can play a musical instrument; they all have a chance of learning to draw; and for the ones that can play we have a continual demand from the colonels of regiments, who value those boys as recruits. The last boy we sent out before I left the district earned 12s. 6d. his very first week as a finisher, I think they called him, that is making boots on piece-work. We have quite a farm there and a good many cows, and a boy I knew very well, who was a sort of half-baked lad, but who knew cows well, in a very short time was getting 18s. a week as a boy in a milkman's place.

Visitation of scattered homes.

3505. (Chairman.) Do you wish to make any statement on the visiting of Poor Law girls and boys in scattered homes?—I should like to mention one more of the schools that I have been interested in. That was at Chatham, in the middle of an urban population. Everybody knows what sort of folk the Chatham people are. The boys as they played in the yards were right under the infirmary windows, and right under the windows of the lunatic wards. They did not go out to school, but they had a master and a matron who knew their business. I investigated pretty carefully the circumstances of those children who had been sent out to service, and I can say that practically they all did well. What struck me most was that year after year those boys used to win the Association Football Challenge Cup of the Boys' League at Chatham, and they used to come pretty near to winning the cricket cup. I have seen those boys, pauper boys of inferior parents and suffering under every disability, beat at football the sons of the Royal Engineers. Draw your own conclusion as to the training those boys must have had to make up for heredity.

Chatham school.

Appointment duties, and salaries of district medical officers.

3506. (The O'Conor Don.) I think you mentioned the other day that you have not in England, as we have in Ireland, dispensary districts?—We only have them in London.

3507. What do you do in substitution for them in the country?—We have Poor Law medical officers, to each of whom is assigned a district of suitable size. They attend upon the poor people who are either upon the permanent poor list or who have an order from the relieving officer or the guardians which entitles them to medical attendance.

3508. Do they attend the poor at their homes?—Yes.

3509. Is there any particular place where the poor can go and meet the medical officer?—No, not generally speaking.

3510. What is the usual size of these districts?—We have to sanction them, and we take great care that they are not too large. We have some regulations on the subject. However, in sparsely populated districts, it would be impracticable to insist upon the same sort of size for each district. The size contemplated by the regulations in ordinary circumstances is an area not exceeding 15,000 acres in extent, nor with a population of more than 15,000.

3511. What do you call these doctors—parish doctors?—District medical officers.

3512. Are they appointed by the guardians?—Yes.

3513. What is about their usual salary?—The salary varies with the district. We always try to get an adequate salary.

3514. What would be the range?—It would be from £10 to £150, generally speaking. In a few urban districts the medical officers devote their whole time to their duties, and then the salaries are larger.

3515. Have you any under £100 a year?—There would be some.

3516. How do they manage with regard to the drugs if there is no dispensary; how is the medicine got?—The medical officer makes his arrangements just as he would for his private patients.

3517. Does the doctor give the medicine, or does he give a prescription which is taken to an apothecary?—A doctor who is a district medical officer would, I take it, in nearly all cases do his own dispensing.

3518. Have these medical officers the right to superannuation?—Yes, under the new Act.

3519. Is any portion of the salary paid out of the Imperial Exchequer?—No, not now.

3520. Then it is all on the rates?—Yes, but then you see the rates are assisted by the Exchequer grant.

3521. Was it at any time a special charge upon the Imperial Exchequer?—No, I think not.

3522. (Sir Samuel Provis.) There was a grant, was there not?—There was a special grant ad hoc, but we never controlled these salaries through the grant, as we controlled the salaries of medical officers of health.

Grant towards salaries district medical officers Ireland.

3523. (The O'Conor Don.) In Ireland half the salaries are paid out of the Imperial Exchequer; have you nothing of that sort in England?—Not for the Poor Law service.

3524. Do you think it is a good system to have a portion of the payment made out of the Imperial Exchequer?—There are many objections to it, among others the objection to the constant supervision necessary, and the objection that there is a tendency to extravagance. You may remember that the system was very much attacked by Lord Randolph Churchill some years ago. I might add that the district medical officers must be resident in their districts, and that the Board take a great deal of pains to ensure, as far as they can, that these officers shall be accessible to the poor.

Merits of relief in and relief money.

3525. Turning to another point in your previous examination, you mentioned to us that out-door relief was sometimes given in kind and sometimes in money; which do you think is the best system?—I am not quite orthodox about that. The doctrine is that relief in kind is a self-acting test of destitution, as it has been called, and that it is less likely to be abused than relief in money. Speaking for myself, I think on the whole that if a man can be trusted to receive out-door relief at all he can be trusted to have it in money, and if he cannot be trusted to have it in money he had better get an order for the workhouse. It is only in exceptional cases that I should advocate the giving of relief in kind, as, for instance, when there is sickness in the house which requires some particular form of food. It always presents this other difficulty to my mind: under the orders of the Board half the relief must be given in kind in the case of out-door relief given to an able-bodied man. When that half was fixed the price of bread was very much higher than it is now. Those men do not want all that relief in kind; what they want is some money to pay their lodgings.

3526. (Mrs. Webb.) Would you be in favour of giving milk?—I think so, in the case of children. That would be an exceptional thing. I am more in favour of leaving that matter entirely to the discretion of the guardians, than of taking the old line.

3527. (The O'Conor Don.) You do not think it leads to economy to have it in kind rather than in money?—I do not. The difficulties of distribution are very considerable, as I have pointed out.

Proporti Poor La children workho schools.

3528. Turning now to your evidence of to-day, are the children in country workhouse ever sent out to the ordinary day schools of the neighbourhood?—Nearly all of them are. Out of the whole 59,000 children who are on the books I think there are only 800 children now who are in schools inside the workhouse.

3529. Then nearly all of them join with the other children in the ordinary schools?—Over 17,000 do.

3530. Do you think that is a good system?—It is an admirable system, and one which the Board has advocated for many years. It has enabled us to go on with existing workhouse schools in many a case where we should have had to shut those up and go to the expense of building separate schools.

Clothes by work house children

3531. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) In regard to the clothes worn by those children, is there not some distinction made; is it not the case that in some districts the children go to school in ordinary clothes, and in some they go to school in special clothes?—More than ever the intelligent matrons are dressing the children like other children. I should like to add this, that I think when the Commission go to see for themselves some country workhouses they will be struck, as I am, with the goodness of the matrons to the children and to the old people.

3532. (Mr. Lansbury.) I think you said there were only 800 children who were not going to the ordinary schools?—Who are at schools inside the workhouse.

3533. There would be a larger number than that who are going to schools belonging to the guardians—schools that are under the Poor Law?—About 16,000.

Provision of drugs.

3534. (Dr. Downes.) Following up The O'Conor Don's questions as to drugs, there are one or two points which might perhaps be cleared up. I believe that in many unions the guardians find the expensive drugs?—They do in the workhouses, and I think they find cod-liver oil and some other things for the out-door poor.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

13 Feb. 1906.

3535. That is for the district medical officers?—Yes.

3536. In some cases they have arrangements, have they not, with a chemist to make up the medicines prescribed by the district medical officer?—That is probable, but I cannot recall a case of the kind.

3537. I think you may take it from me that it is so. In some of the larger unions they find all the drugs and have a dispenser, do they not?—They do in London. That would only be done in the very large unions.

3538. It is also done in a few unions in the country, is it not?—Yes.

Mr. Brook Kitchin, called; and Examined.

Mr. Brook Kitchin.

13 Feb. 1906.

3539. (Chairman.) You are the architect of the Local Government Board?—I am.

3540. How long have you held that post?—I have been architect to the Local Government Board for four years, previously to which I was assistant architect for eight years. I have been at the Board for twelve years.

Functions of Architect of Local Government Board.

3541. You have handed in a memorandum epitomising the nature of your work. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. VI. (A).) This Commission are very much interested in ascertaining what checks on expenditure the Local Government Board have over the local authorities. It seems to me that your ordinary work would not in any sense be of a contentious character, but where it was contentious it would arise from one of two sets of circumstances, either where the proposals put forward to you were not up to date, or, on the other hand, where they would be in your judgment extravagant?—That is so.

Relations between Architect's Department and boards of guardians.

3542. Would that roughly epitomise the two classes of special work that you have to do?—Yes, I think that would very roughly. The relationship is a very amiable one between the architect's department and the boards of guardians with whom we come into contact, and we are very desirous that it should always be so. We rather hold ourselves open to be a kind of department to give as much assistance as we can to boards of guardians, and not to interfere unnecessarily with their work. Where we do come into contact with them, is generally when they want to spend too much money and we feel it is our duty and it is desirable that there should be a check placed upon their expenditure. That is, I think, the main cause of contention that arises between us and boards of guardians. There are also minor questions: questions of the suitability of buildings and the type of buildings to be put up, and the number of buildings and similar kindred questions. There are sometimes contentious matters arising in connection with loan periods, but none of great importance. On the whole, I think I may say our relationship with boards of guardians is a very amiable one.

Cases of inadequate schemes submitted to architect.

3543. I suppose the number of cases in which the proposals made did not seem adequate, are few?—Yes. Of course, that does not concern us so very closely as it concerns the inspectors of the board. The question of adequacy of accommodation is a question that is generally in the hands of the general inspectors of the board or the medical inspectors of the board. If it appeared to us that any scheme was inadequate in its accommodation, we should at once point it out.

3544. In dealing with proposals which are inadequate you have the advantage of the advice, experience and opinion of the inspectors?—Yes.

Cases of extravagant schemes submitted to architect.

3545. Turning to the question of cost, which seems more difficult, you have I suppose, to rely more on your own opinion and the opinion of your department?—We would rely entirely on our opinion in the matter of cost.

3546. Assuming that the plans of a building came forward, the cost of which you thought was disproportionate to the object, you would object to them or point out your reasons for thinking them extravagant?—Yes. If it appeared to us to be unusually expensive, we should report to the board that the plans were expensive.

3547. Do cases often occur where you have to make that class of report?—They are very frequent. In fact, I may say that almost every case that comes before us is criticised and dealt with from the point of view of reducing the scope of the scheme in order to reduce the expenditure, not always because it appears to us to be an extravagant plan, but because it appears to us very often that there might be a reduction.

Increase in cost of buildings.

3548. I suppose that the cost per pauper of housing accommodation is steadily rising?—Yes, it is rising very steadily indeed, and it has risen ever since poor law buildings were constructed. I have a statement * here which I shall be pleased to hand in, if it is of any value, which would show the price per bed in various poor law institutions from a quite early period.

3549. I think that would interest the Commission very much?—I have it in different schedules of subjects, that is to say, I have one for infirmaries, I have one for workhouses, and I have one for cottage homes. I handed one in at the Vagrancy Committee on the costs of vagrant wards. I have also the cost of some outside institutions for the purposes of comparison with poor law institutions, which I think might perhaps be of interest to this Commission, and I should be pleased to hand those in. I have also the cost of some few, I have only been able to get four, reformatory schools which have been erected in late years under the Home Office, and for the purpose of comparison it is rather an interesting statement, although it is on a very small scale. I may perhaps mention that the cost per head of the voluntary schools at Exeter built under the Home Office was £106 per bed; an industrial school built at Birmingham was also £106 per bed for 150 children; a school under the local authority, that is the school board, in South Wales, for 100 children, cost £155 per bed; and a small school under the local authority at Brighton cost £220 per bed.

Cost per bed of various non-poor law institutions.

3550. (Mr. Gardiner.) Does that mean the local education authority?—Yes. That is rather an interesting statement because though, as I said, the instances are very few, it shows that there is rather a large increase in the cost under the local authority compared with the cost under a voluntary management. The first two cases which were £106 per bed were voluntary management; the last two cases, which were £155 and £220 per bed, are local management.

3551. (Chairman.) In making your comparison you have only taken the cost per bed; have you any data for estimating the class of accommodation provided at that cost in each case?—No, these voluntary schools do not come under us at all. This is a statement taken out from the Home Office inspector's report for 1902 and 1903, and that is all I have got. It is simply taken out of that, and those are all the particulars I have. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. VI. (B).)

Special reasons for increased cost of buildings in London.

3552. I assume in London certain special considerations may affect the cost of buildings. For example, if a building has a very fine frontage in a big central street, I suppose some allowance would be made for that fact if the elevation was of a somewhat more expensive character than buildings of that kind usually are?—Yes, some slight allowance is made for that. It sometimes happens that the land owner has put certain clauses into the agreement of purchase or in the lease of the land which necessitates a building of a certain amount of pretention—perhaps I ought not to say pretention.

* See papers handed in by Mr. Davy, C.B. (Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (2 to 5).)

Mr. Brook Kitchin.

13 Feb. 1906.

Architect's practice with regard to elevation, ornamentation, &c., of buildings.

3553. The building must be devoid of ugliness?—Yes, that is the way I should like to put it. That, of course, has a slight effect upon the cost, but I think I may say that the elevations of buildings are not a very material matter in the cost of buildings either in London or in the provinces. We are very careful to see that the elevation is kept very plain, and we at once strike out any superfluous ornament or any superfluous materials or any materials as to which a change might render the building rather less expensive.

Enforcement of architect's objections to guardians' schemes.

3554. Have you had any cases where a local authority has been recalcitrant as regards the suggestions or views of the architect's department?—Yes, generally they are rather recalcitrant.

3555. I meant by recalcitrant, where you have failed to enforce the wishes of the department?—There are cases where we have compromised. As a rule, they fall in with and meet us in any reasonable recommendations that we make, and I think as a rule, although there are exceptions, they are quite willing to take reasonable steps to reduce buildings if we say they are too expensive. If we point out they are too expensive, they will consider it and they will bring it down wherever they can. On the other hand, we do have cases where boards are very obstinate, and once they have made up their mind to carry out a building in a certain manner, it is very difficult to get them to alter that opinion.

3556. The only power you have, if ultimately you cannot come to an agreement, is to advise the Board not to grant the loan?—Yes, I think that is the extreme power that we have; to withhold the sanction of a loan, and that is a course that has been taken in extreme cases.

Proposal to inspect buildings in course of erection.

3557. You have had a long experience, four years as head of your department and eight years in a subordinate capacity; assuming that you had power to alter the regulations, have you any suggestions to make by which to give yourself and your department more control over local authorities?—Yes. We have not very much control over local authorities on the whole, and I think if we had power to examine buildings during the course of construction we should perhaps have rather a greater control over the excess expenditure which so often arises in connection with poor law buildings. At the present time, directly the scheme has passed from the architect's department, it has passed out of it altogether, in a great majority of cases; we very often never hear of it again. We do not even know whether the building has actually been built or not, unless it happens that I go down into the district and see it, and we have no information as to the progress of the building or as to the actual completion, or as to whether the money spent has been properly spent upon it. Those are matters that are left entirely in the hands of the local authorities.

Procedure when cost of buildings exceeds sum sanctioned.

3558. Assuming that you give your assent to a building and that the cost of construction very largely exceeds the estimate, what power have you then?—They would apply to the Local Government Board for sanction for the additional expenditure.

3559. I assume that constantly occurs?—Yes, that occurs very frequently.

3560. I presume it is as a rule very difficult for the Local Government Board to do anything else than assent to the additional cost?—Yes, it is very difficult indeed, the money has been spent, the work has been done, so what can the Board do?—They can only surcharge. I fancy that is the only step they can take, and then we know, I think, pretty well what happens when there is a surcharge; it is eventually sanctioned unless there is fraud or something of that kind.

3561. Your suggestion is that you should have more power during construction or after the plans have been sanctioned?—I think if we had more power after the plans were sanctioned we should be in a better position to deal with these excess expenditure cases. The Board, too, would be in a better position.

Existing checks on expenditure.

3562. Otherwise do you think, looking to the difficulty there is in controlling local authorities, the system of check works fairly well?—I do not think it does work very well. I do not think there is enough check upon local expenditure upon buildings. We can only check the expenditure after it has been spent. That is what it amounts to, we cannot check the actual expenditure. Of course there are cases where we are able to check expenditure, where boards of guardians come to us properly to obtain sanction to the expenditure before the money is spent, but in a very large number of cases the money is spent before the Board knows anything about it, and then it cannot be checked.

3563. You have no suggestions to make as regards the procedure preliminary to the sanction of a building, but your suggestions relate to what may occur afterwards?—Yes.

3564. To put it in another way, you think the system works fairly well as regards the sanction and checking of the original expenditure?—Yes.

Proposal to inspect buildings in course of erection.

3565. But not with regard to the dealing with any excess which may afterwards arise?—Yes, that is so. There is practically nothing to prevent an excess arising. As I say, if an officer were to go down and examine the building during its construction and examine the accounts, and have statements put before him as to the money that had been spent on the building, there would be some check.

Extra staff needed.

3566. Would that necessitate a large increase of staff?—Yes, it would necessitate a travelling inspector of some sort.

3567. Not more than that?—That would depend a good deal upon whether every building that was erected had to be inspected, or whether certain buildings only. Of course there are a great many small cases which really might be left entirely in the hands of the guardians and their advisers to deal with.

3568. A comparatively small increase of staff would give you this additional check, assuming you had the power of stopping the excess?—Yes. It is difficult to say exactly what staff would be required, but some increase of the staff would be necessary in order to deal with it.

3569. You cannot anticipate what amount of building would be in progress at a certain time?—That is so.

Non-Poor Law work of architect.

3570. (Sir Samuel Provis). This Commission is only concerned with Poor Law work, but you have other duties besides those connected with the Poor Law, I apprehend?—Yes, we have a considerable amount of work in connection with bye-laws and local Acts, in connection with Public Health matters, such as the erection of isolation hospitals, mortuaries and kindred subjects; also a certain amount of work in connection with the housing of the working classes and general questions that arise on sanitary matters in connection with buildings come before us.

Local Government Board's check on Poor Law and other buildings.

3571. The statutory requirements with regard to the works to be carried out, say, under the Sanitary Acts and the Poor Law Acts are different, are they not? There is a good deal more need for supervision in the case of plans for a workhouse than there would be for a work which is carried out by a sanitary authority?—Certainly. The architect's department is much more closely in touch with the Poor Law administration of the country than with the sanitary administration of the country (under the Public Health Acts).

3572. It is the case, is it not, that, speaking generally, the consent of the Local Government Board would only be necessary to a building put up by a sanitary authority, if a loan was required?—Yes, that is so.

3573. But in the case of a Poor Law building their sanction would be necessary, although no loan was required?—Yes.

3574. Have you any opinion as to whether it is necessary that quite as much distinction should be made in the two cases? For instance, supposing that the sanction of the Local Government Board were required for all plans for Poor Law buildings, is it your view that their sanction need be also given to the actual expenditure, although it may not be for the purpose of a loan?—In the case of Poor Law buildings I think it is necessary that it should be. Our inspectors and the Board generally are so closely in touch with Boards of Guardians that it seems to me that it would be absolutely essential that all expenditure should be sanctioned whether by loan, or whether by order or letter of the Board.

Cause of increased expenditure on buildings.

3575. The attention of the Commission has been a good deal drawn to the increase of expenditure in connection with Poor Law buildings. Is it your view that unnecessary buildings are proposed by boards of guardians, or that the increase of cost is to be attributed to the greater expenditure proposed on particular buildings?—I think it is due chiefly to the expenditure on particular buildings. Of course the number of buildings that comprise an institution such as a workhouse has very largely increased in the last fifty or sixty years. Formerly, in 1836 or 1837, when the Poor Law Commissioners were first encouraging local authorities to build workhouses, their idea was to build simply one building, and that is what was done; one building was built, and in it all classes were put. Now in 1906 if a new workhouse has to be built, it comprises anything from twenty to forty detached buildings, and we find, I think, that the tendency is to increase the number of buildings more than to increase the class of buildings that is put up.

3576. These separate buildings are for separate classes, are they not?—Yes.

ect of sification expendi- e.

3577. What occasions there being so large a number of separate buildings?—The tendency has been ever since Poor Law buildings began to be erected to divide up the accommodation, to divide up the indoor paupers. First of all, the sick were divided up, and then the able-bodied became divided into different classes. Then the sick became divided again into such classes as maternity classes and special cases; foul cases, itch cases, venereal cases. All this was tending to divide and segregate the indoor pauperism, and it was all tending very much to increase the cost. Then, again, of course there were further developments in divisions: the children were taken away: people were received in separate buildings: nurses were taken out of the main building and housed in nurses homes, and so on and so on. With each dissection, or whatever you may call it, the cost went up, and the larger the number of buildings that were put up the greater the cost; and that tendency has been increasing ever since Poor Law buildings began to be put up.

scussion of posal to empt rkhouse ildings m local e-laws.

3578. You tell us in paragraph 11 of your Memorandum that workhouse buildings are not exempt from local bye-laws. Would it, in your opinion, be desirable that they should be?—No, I do not think under the present system it is desirable that they should be exempt. We depend very largely on the local authorities to check matters of detail in Poor Law buildings under their powers under the Public Health Act by which they get their bye-laws. I think if they did not come within the scope of the bye-laws, it would throw a very great deal of responsibility on the Board in the matter of a lot of details.

3579. Such matters as the thickness of walls?—The thickness of walls, and the sizes of timbers, the height of floors, the construction of roofs, and such matters as that, as well as sanitary details.

3580. Supposing there were the supervision or inspection during the actual construction of the building which you were referring to just now, would that at all affect your view?—In that case, we should have a better opportunity of judging of details, and it might be possible then, I think, to allow buildings of this kind to be exempt. Of course they very nearly are exempt. If we were a Department of State, they would be exempt, because they would be sanctioned by a Department of State, but as it is, they are not. If they were under the Home Office, I take it they would be exempt from local bye-laws, but that, as I say, increases the responsibility.

ifficulties central thority pervising tual rection of ildings.

3581. Practically, would you think there would be a good deal of difficulty in supervision by the central authority of the erection of local buildings?—It would have to be a general supervision. Of course it could not be a very detailed supervision; that would have to be left still to the local architect. It would not dispense with the local architect; he would have to be responsible for all details, and we should inspect with a view of seeing whether they were carrying out the plans in accordance with the Board's approval.

3582. It would be an inspection rather than supervision?—Yes.

dvantage inspection building couse of ection.

3583. What were you contemplating as precisely the result of the inspection? Was it that you thought the Board would be in a stronger position to refuse an application for a further loan for the excess cost?—Yes. I think it would have the tendency of making boards of guardians more careful in the matter of excess cost, and of avoiding extras.

3584. So that the excess cost would be reduced?—Yes, I think it would have the effect of checking the excess cost.

Mr. Brook Kitchin.

13 Feb. 1906.

3585. You tell us in paragraph 19 of your Memorandum that fifty years are allowed for the purchase of land; if the guardians asked for sixty years, would they get it?—Yes, I think the policy of the Board is to allow sixty years where boards of guardians ask for it or press for it. Period of loans for purchase of land.

3586. Sixty years being the maximum period allowed by the Statute?—Yes, that is so.

3587. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) Do you think it might tend to economy if you had model plans in your Department which were sent to the guardians to use?—We have had some experience of model plans. We have issued model plans for isolation hospitals, and I take it on the whole it has had the effect of reducing the expenditure. We have also issued model plans for cottage homes,* but we find that it is rather difficult to get local authorities always to agree with a stereotyped plan from a central authority. I think sometimes they take it as perhaps a little bit of offence to have plans sent to them when they have their own local experts to advise them. We have had one or two cases where there has been a little friction over model plans. Possibility of "model plans" for workhouse buildings.

3588. Supposing it were the universal practice, and they had to show reasons for departing from the model plans, it might work smoothly perhaps?—Yes, but it would not be possible to do it, I think, in the case of workhouses, because there is such an enormous variation in the size of workhouses. A workhouse for a small number is such a very different thing to a workhouse for a large number that there would have to be a very large number of plans in order to cover the whole ground. There would always be the difficulty of selecting the right plan, and whatever stereotyped plan was made, it would be certain not to meet all the requirements of each particular union.

3589. You think it could not be easily modified?—It could be done in detail, and we are doing it in detail. A memorandum has been prepared which I think perhaps the Board will issue giving plans of infirmaries of different sizes and for different purposes. There are seven or eight different plans, and the idea is that any board of guardians who want assistance or intend to build an infirmary shall have a copy of this sent to them, and they shall build up their infirmary on these model plans if one particular plan does not suit them. That is not done at the present time, but I hope it will be done in the case of infirmaries. In the case of workhouses, I think it is rather more difficult. Official memorandum with model plans for infirmaries.

3590. Would you say with regard to such institutions as infirmaries and consumptive sanatoria, that the scale of expense is very much set by what has been done by voluntary institutions? Does it follow them pretty closely?—The rise in the cost of hospitals of that kind follows the rise in the cost of general hospitals, but it is very much lower all through. Comparison of cost of Poor Law and voluntary hospitals.

3591. It is much lower?—Yes, the cost of Poor Law infirmaries is much lower than the cost of general hospitals.

3592. Would that be in the construction or in the appliances and furnishing?—General construction, and largely in the amount of cubic space per bed and the amount of floor space per bed; that is all on a much larger scale in the general hospitals; also in the style of the buildings. The style in the general hospitals is very much better than the style of the workhouse infirmaries.

3593. It is the case, is it not, that in workhouse infirmaries there is better accommodation for nurses, and so on, than there is sometimes in the hospitals?—Yes, that is so. There has been a great improvement and development in the housing of nurses in workhouse infirmaries of late years, and that, I may say, is tending very much to increase the general cost of Poor Law infirmaries.

3594. (Mr. Gardiner.) How far is this increase in cost due to the increase in wages? Do you state that in the Return you are going to give us?—I have a diagram here which shows the fluctuation of building materials and the fluctuation of wages. This one of wages has been very roughly drawn out, but I could have it drawn out more carefully; it gives the rise from 1887 to the present day, and from 1887 it went up step by step without any diminution till it reached its present rate. The increase on the percentage is from 84 to 100 in less than twenty years. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No VI. (C and D).) Effect of cost of wages and materials on increased cost of buildings.

* See paper handed in by Mr. Davy, C.B. (Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (2).)

Mr. Brook Kitchin.

13 Feb. 1906.

3595. (Dr. Downes.) That is wages ?—Yes.

3596. Have you got materials ?—The fluctuation in materials is shown by this diagram. It gives six different building materials, wood, slates, iron, lead, bricks, and Portland cement. It shows the rise for the ten years 1895 to the present day, and you will see from this table that there was an enormous rise in 1900, and that it subsequently fell in nearly all these materials.

3597. (Mr. Bentham.) What locality are those prices for ?—These are London prices.

Effect of public inquiry into proposed loans.

3598. (Mr. Gardiner.) In your opinion would a public inquiry as regards these loans be of any influence in restraining extravagance ?—It might have this effect that it would bring the matter more closely before the persons who had to pay for it, but whether they are sufficiently keen on the point to take any notice is a question that I am not able to answer.

3599. It might lead, might it not, to their supporting your view, or that of whoever held the inquiry, as against that of the local authority ?—Yes, it might in that case. It would make it very much more difficult to deal with Poor Law buildings, or the sanctioning of Poor Law buildings, if every expenditure had to be the subject of an inquiry.

Consultation of central authority as to choice of local architect.

3600. Every big expenditure ?—Yes.

3601. Are you ever asked to advise as to the choice of architects ?—Yes, occasionally.

3602. Would it be a good thing, in your opinion, if your Department were more frequently consulted ? The difficulty that occurs to me is this ; supposing a board of guardians find themselves faced by the necessity of building a new infirmary and no member of the board had had any experience of building infirmaries at all and they all felt they must have a really good architect to do it, they do not know whom to go to, and very often it might be that some local person is given the job and he has never built an infirmary in his life ?—That is what very often happens. It would be difficult for us to settle who was to be the architect, because whoever was appointed architect the guardians would not be satisfied unless he was a local man, or a great many of the guardians might not like the particular local man.

Attitude of central authority as to competitive plans.

3603. Are you ever asked to decide as between competitive plans supposing the guardians advertised a premium and so on ?—Yes, but we never do.

3604. You decline that ?—Yes, we decline to have anything at all to do with competitions, because we do not consider any advantage is gained by a competition. It usually ends in a waste of money.

Proposed appointment of clerk of works by central authority.

3605. As regards what you told us about the check on local expenditure, would not it be a good thing in the interest of the ratepayers that you should appoint a clerk of the works in order to keep a strict and watchful eye over the materials and so forth ?—If it were possible to do so it would effect a check, but there are probably thirty or forty, or even more, Poor Law buildings being constructed at one time, and it would mean a very large staff of clerks of the works in order to check them all.

3606. (Dr. Downes). Might not the appointment of a clerk of the works by the central authority very greatly diminish the responsibility of the local authority ?—Yes, it would. Anything that went wrong would at once be thrown upon the hands of the central clerk of the works. Of course that is always the way with local government; if anything goes wrong it is the central authority that is to blame and the guardians get all the credit for success.

Scope of proposed inspection of buildings while being erected.

3607. In the case of any inspection of the works during the progress of the works, should you regard it as important that that inspection should be limited to questions of cost, or to deviation from the plans, for the reason that if it is not so limited it might also diminish local responsibility ?—Yes, I should certainly limit it to such subjects as would not limit the local responsibility.

Public inquiries into proposed loans.

3608. With reference to the question which has been asked as to a public inquiry, could you tell me if it is the practice of the Board in the case of other departments, such as those dealing with health or municipal expenditure, to hold such inquiries in the case of large expenditure out of loan ?—Yes, I think it is invariably the case in the other departments.

3609. With regard to the plans which come before you, is it your experience that the cost in the first instance is very commonly under-estimated ?—Yes, it is very commonly under-estimated, particularly if there is a competition; then it is more under-estimated than ever.

Under-estimation cost of buildings

3610. So that the guardians in the first instance are, as far at the estimates before them go, not fully aware of what the thing is going to lead to ?—No, not as a body.

3611. (Mr. Gardiner.) Do I understand from that that certain members of the board are, and some are not ?—Some of them are sufficiently knowing, I think, to know that the cost is under-estimated, and cases have come before the Local Government Board where guardians have kept the estimate as low as possible in order not to frighten the ratepayers.

3612. (Dr. Downes.) Eventually those guardians come for an additional loan ?—Then they come for an additional expenditure loan; the building has been built, as they get money enough in hand in many cases to carry out the building (for the contractor is not paid his last instalment until the building has been finished some months); by that time the money has been spent and they have been to the Board and got their additional loan.

3613. It becomes very difficult for the Board to deal with such a case ?—Very difficult.

3614. Does not all that tend to keep the ratepayers very much in the dark as to what the actual cost of the buildings is ?—Yes. The ratepayers seem to me to be entirely in the dark with regard to the cost of buildings. I do not know whether they mind that.

Nature of plans asked for by central authority first instance

3615. With regard to the plans themselves, is it the practice of your Department, in the case of all large schemes, to get pencil plans or sketch plans in the first instance, if possible ?—Yes, one of our objects is as soon as possible to see the scheme, or to get an idea of the scheme, before the guardians have elaborated it to any extent, so that we can express our opinions at an early period ; and it is very much easier we find to get a scheme modified or reduced when it is in a pencil or initial stage than when it has been produced after laborious meetings of the board of guardians and when, after a number of resolutions, they have come to regard the thing as their adopted child. It is difficult then for the Board to come in and cut the scheme up.

3616. So that it is not necessary for boards of guardians to draw up expensive plans in the first instance ?—No, we should certainly discourage that as far as possible.

3617. Do the plans give you the details of such things as costly fittings ?—No, the plans show the details, but not the actual character of the details.

3618. So that large expense might be incurred in details of which you have no intimation whatever ?—Yes. That is so, particularly in infirmary work, where details are very expensive.

Nature of estimates furnished to central authority.

3619. (Sir Samuel Provis.) You would have an estimate of the cost of these things ?—We have an estimate, of which I propose to put in a copy, which divides up the cost into various sections, but the general cost of the building, which is in one item, would cover a great deal of detail which would not be shown, such as sanitary work. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. VI. (E).)

3620. (Dr. Downes.) We have already had your opinion of the value of the estimates which you receive ?—Yes. I think I might say that there has been a tendency to improve the estimates in late years. There has certainly been some improvement and greater correctness in estimates.

Proposal to restrict loan to amount of original estimate.

3621. Do you think it would tend to more accurate estimating if the loan were as far as possible restricted to the original estimate ?—Yes, I think it would make architects, or boards of guardians through their architects, careful to get to the actual cost more precisely.

3622. They would in that case be compelled to pay their excess expenditure out of the local current rates ?—Yes.

3623. In so doing the ratepayers would be made aware possibly of how much the cost had come to ?—It would bring it home to the ratepayers.

3624. The power of the Local Government Board to absolutely refuse sanction to a loan is rather a difficult one to exercise, is it not, where the buildings are urgently required ?—Yes. That is an element of great difficulty with the Board, where the Board have, through their inspectors, been rather pressing a board of guardians to undertake certain building operations. It is a very difficult or a delicate matter, at any rate, for the Board to cut up a scheme, or to interfere to any large extent with a scheme which has been introduced under such conditions.

3625. Have you found much increase in late years in such matters as laundry fittings ?—Yes, there have been great improvements and a large number of patent fittings of all sorts for laundry and kitchen work and hot water apparatus—new patent systems which have been adopted. All that, of course, is tending to raise the cost of Poor Law buildings.

3626. Do you think that expenditure is becoming excessive ?—I think the expenditure on hot water systems is becoming very heavy, but it is always put forward in those cases that there is going to be an appreciable saving on coal and stoking and things of that sort.

3627. (Mr. Bentham.) It is on appara us matters principally now ?—Yes.

3628. (Dr. Downes.) Have you any facts to show whether that anticipation is well-founded or otherwise ? —No, we are quite in the dark at present as to that; it is quite theoretical.

3629. You have told us that the increased demand for classification has been one principal cause of the increase of cost of Poor Law buildings; has there been any material alteration in the requirements of the Local Government Board as to the points to be attended to in the construction of the individual buildings themselves ? —No, there has been very little modification in the Board's memorandum.* There have been certain things withdrawn from it. All the matters relating to children have been taken out of it and certain matters relating to the construction of dormitories for four rows of beds were taken out of it. Beyond that the memorandum is practically the same as it was when it was issued in 1868. The cubic space per bed for all classes of workhouse inmates remains now practically as it was in 1868. That was settled after the sitting of the Cubic Space Committee.

3630. (Mr. Bentham.) The cost of buildings would be increased by withdrawing the four row provision ?—Yes, the cost of building has been increased by the withdrawal of that paragraph allowing four rows of beds.

3631. (Dr. Downes.) I do not know whether you are aware of the reason for the withdrawal of that paragraph. Was there not a report of the Cubic Space Committee of 1868 condemning more than two rows of beds in a dormitory ?—Yes. I think one of their recommendations was that no ward should be erected in workhouses (that was London workhouses) with more than two rows of beds and, though workhouses continued to be erected on that principle for some years, it was not till about 1897 that the Board definitely put a stop to the construction of wards that had four rows of beds. In my evidence before the Vagrancy Committee I was asked the question about the relative cost of two rows and four rows of beds. I was asked if it was a material difference and I said I did not think it was. I have investigated the subject a little more fully since that Committee sat, and I am rather inclined to think that it is rather greater than I thought at the time, and there is an appreciable difference between the cost of buildings built with four rows of beds and buildings built with two rows of beds. That has been brought home to me rather clearly by a comparison between the last workhouse in 1892 that was built on the four row principle (that was the workhouse at Camberwell) and the following workhouses which were built on the two row principle, which were Bermondsey, Greenwich and Brentford. The cost of the Camberwell workhouse, which, as I say, was the last of the four row workhouses, was about £119 per bed, and the cost of these later workhouses, which came on about 1898, were from £276 to £287 per bed. Of course the difference is not due entirely to the change in the system. There was much stricter classification and division of the buildings, and the cost of building had increased a good deal, and the cost of sanitary requirements and that sort of thing had increased; but I think the difference must be accounted for to some extent by the fact that the four rows of beds were forbidden at that time.

3632. Could you give an estimate of the percentage of increased cost in a given block of buildings between the two rows and the four ?—I have not it with me, but I could hand in a statement showing that if you wish.

3633. I think it would be a more sound comparison, would it not, than a comparison between the workhouses you have named ?—There are a good many points of difference in those workhouses ?—Yes, the later ones were a good deal more elaborate in many ways.

3634. Have you taken into account the difficulty of ventilating a broad ward as compared with a narrow ward ?—The ventilation used to be much the same. I do not think they formerly took any different steps to ventilate the four rows of beds workhouses than they do now to ventilate the two rows. In fact, the ventilation of two rows of beds wards now is a good deal more elaborare and scientific than the ventilation of the four rows of beds was in the days when they were building on that principle.

Ventilation of wards.

3635. You are probably acquainted with Mr. Napier Shaw's report ?—Yes, I have seen that report.

Mr. Napier Shaw's report.

3636. He deals with that question ?—Yes. This only applies to workhouses and inmates in health; it does not apply to sick inmates.

3637. Precisely. Should you consider it advantageous if detailed information as to plans and the complete cost of new buildings were published from time to time, so as not only to afford information to the various boards of guardians who may wish to put up such buildings, but also to bring public criticism to bear ?—Yes, I think it would be of considerable advantage, though it would be rather a laborious undertaking. The architect's department brought out a volume of that kind on the construction of laundry buildings a short time ago. That was one class of buildings that we happened to be rather in want of information about, and I thought it would be advisable to have some particulars, so we brought out a report on laundry buildings. It is not a public report, but it is there for anybody to have who is interested in the subject, or who wants information on that kind of work; and that has been a great help to us in many ways. To undertake it on a very large scale, of course, would mean a very great deal of work. It would have to be very correct; it would not do to have any mistakes in it at all.

Publication of information as to plans and cost of new buildings for guidance of guardians.

Official report on laundry buildings.

3638. You would not be able to undertake it with your present staff, I imagine ?—No, I would not undertake it with the present staff.

3639. What would it mean in the way of additional staff ?—It would mean an additional architect. I do not think it would mean more than that. It would mean one more added to the staff.

3640. With reference to a suggestion that such plans might be exempt from local by-laws, not only would that tend to diminish the local responsibility, but would it not also lead to much greater complication in the plans themselves; for example, you would have to have the footings of all the walls shown, the thickness of all the walls very carefully determined, matters which are now regulated by the by-laws themselves ?—Yes, unless we left that in the hands of the local authority. We want the local authority to be the local governing body, and those are matters which might very well be left in their hands whether they were the subject of by-law operations or not.

Proposed exemption of workhouse buildings from local bye-laws.

3641. (Miss Hill.) It seems as if the surcharge was a very difficult way of dealing with any excess of expenditure, because it is so very difficult to enforce ?—Yes, I do not think it has ever been enforced.

Possible checks on excess expenditure.

3642. Has any alternative to it ever been proposed except the one which Dr. Downes mentioned just now that the amount of excess should not be contributed as a loan ?—No, I think that the only penalty the Board have ever inflicted is to curtail some portion of the loan, or not to allow a loan at all.

3643. With regard to the excess over the estimate there is no different way of dealing with it; no other penalty has ever been suggested except that of making it payable out of the current rates ?—That is the only penalty that has been suggested.

* For memorandum, see paper handed in by Mr. Davy, C.B. (Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (28).)

Mr. Brook Kitchin.

13 Feb. 1906.

3644. It is now in the power of the Board to do it, if they choose, by simply refusing a loan?—Yes, that has been done, and it is being done in cases now much more frequently than it was.

3645. (Professor Smart.) You mentioned infirmary and hospital plans as being under the Local Government Board; are those workhouses only?—Infectious hospitals are under the Local Government Board.

3646. But not infirmaries and hospitals generally?—No, they are not.

Responsibility of central authority as to costly infirmaries.

3647. (Mr. Bentham.) We are told that the cost of infirmary buildings ranges from £100 to £400 per bed; I take it that all those plans have been sanctioned by the Department, and those costs are based upon the estimates?—Those plans have all been sanctioned by the Department, but the cost has not entirely. The actual cost cannot be said to have been sanctioned by the Board in the first instance; that is to say, a great deal of the actual cost of these infirmaries has been due to excess expenditure, sometimes it is as much as 30, 40 or even 50 per cent. on the original estimate.

Extent of excess expenditure over estimate.

3648. I thought the figures we had given us were the estimated cost and not the actual?—No, these are the actual cost. I am not quite sure which figures you refer to, but all the figures which I propose to hand in are, except in the case of hospitals under construction at the present time, the actual cost including excess expenditure.

3649. You do not always get the actual cost, do you?—Yes. We issue an order; an order is issued by the Board for the excess expenditure, and for the original expenditure.

3650. Even if a loan is not asked for for the excess?—Yes.

3651. (Miss Hill.) You sometimes have as much as 50 per cent. excess?—There has been as much as 50 per cent. in certain cases; it is rather exceptional.

Responsibility of central authority for costly buildings.

3652. (Mr. Bentham.) There is a great difference in the cost of similar buildings which have received sanction by the Department?—Yes, there is.

3653. On what ground is that excessive cost, that disparity in cost, sanctioned? Is that purely a matter of compromise?—Do you refer to the Poor Law buildings.

3654. Yes, Poor Law buildings entirely?—That is due mainly to local circumstances such as the rate of labour, cost of material, and the style in which guardians do things. Of course we find that in the urban districts the style is generally rather better than the style in the rural districts. Influences such as the effect of bye-laws sometimes make a difference in the cost.

3655. You have power to refuse to sanction these buildings, but in some cases probably they are sanctioned when you think the cost is excessive?—Yes, they are sometimes sanctioned in spite of our having pointed out that the cost is, in the opinion of the Board, excessive.

Return of plans to guardians for amendment.

3656. When a scheme is laid before the Department, are the plans sometimes returned entirely to the board?—Yes 3657. That means new plans have to be prepared?—In some cases it means new plans, and in some cases it means a modification of the existing plans.

Effect on remuneration of local architect.

3658. The architect would be able to charge on the rejected plans a certain percentage, and also charge on the revised or new plans?—Yes.

3659. Does that often occur?—Yes, it has occurred in several cases, and very notably in a case that came before me quite recently in London, in which a board of guardians proposed to spend, I think it was, £52,000, and the ratepayers in that case objected through a municipal association, and after some correspondence I was sent down to see whether a cheaper scheme could not be devised; I went down and found that the scheme they proposed was a very first-rate scheme, a west-end scheme I might call it, and I thought they might get a cheaper scheme that would carry out all that was wanted, and we drew them out a cheaper scheme. I think Mr. Davy referred to this case. The effect was that a reduction of something like £15,000 was made. The scheme was adopted in some kind of form by the guardians, and the reduction was effected. In that case, of course, the architect is paid upon the original scheme, and he is also paid for the new scheme.

3660. Does that not point to, not necessarily more power over boards of guardians, but more inspection in the way of assistance that might be given to boards of guardians, at a particular stage of the proposed expenditure?—Yes, I think it points very strongly to it.

Collaboration between central authority and guardians on inception of building scheme.

3661. Inspectors are very usually, though not always aware of proposed expenditure on the part of a board of guardians, are they not?—They are not always aware of it.

3662. They are not always asked by boards of guardians to give any advice?—No, not on the scheme generally I think, but very often they are consulted. In a very large number of cases it is initiated entirely by boards of guardians amongst themselves.

3663. You think your Department might be of very great assistance to boards of guardians on the inception of a scheme if you had assistance in order to do it?—Yes, if they would be willing to consult us. Of course there is a certain amount of jealousy between boards of guardians and the central authority. I think there are instances where they would rather dislike to come to the central authority for assistance on the assumption that they can do it just as well themselves with their own advisers.

3664. Have you any suggestion to make that would remedy this feeling between the boards of guardians and the Department?—No, it is, I think, only a feeling that can be swept aside by encouraging, as much as possible, interviews, conferences and intercourse between the central authority and boards of guardians and local authorities. I find that by meeting boards of guardians here in London or in the provinces we get a great deal more business done, and we get on to very much better terms than by any quantity of letter writing or correspondence. I think that by contact we can brush away to a great extent that feeling of envy or enmity, or whatever it may be that sometimes exists between boards of guardians and the central authority.

Effect of informal conference with guardians.

3665. If orders were issued to boards of guardians insisting on their acquainting the Architect's Department with any proposed extension of their buildings, and then a special inspector were to be sent down from the Architect's Department to consult with the Board, do you think that would be of any assistance?—The Board's local general inspector is generally cognisant of anything that is going on in the matter of building, and it is always competent for him to suggest that the Board's architect shall come down and advise at an initial stage; and that sometimes happens.

Collaboration between central authority and guardians on inception of building scheme.

3666. I think it is very seldom, is it not?—I do not know that I should say very seldom—perhaps not very frequently.

3667. Then you do not give assistance in detail in drawing a scheme for the guardians before they employ the local architects?—They might come to me before they employed the local architect; and there are cases where they have come, and we have given them a great deal of help I may say; we have sometimes gone so far as to draw out sketch plans for them to work on; and wherever that has been done, it has always ended most satisfactorily. We have come into contact with the board of guardians and we have improved the relationship immensely.

3668. Is it your opinion that all is done now in that direction that can be done?—No, I think a great deal more can be done in that direction; and I should like more to be done.

Cases of insufficient expenditure on building.

3669. (Mr. Phelps.) You have spoken almost solely of the influence you have to exert to save expenditure; have you any instance in your mind where you have had to urge boards of guardians to greater expenditure?—Do you refer to the architect's department, or to the Board generally?

3670. I was thinking of your department—where buildings were being put up on too small a scale, for instance?—There are cases where buildings have not appeared to be sufficient, or not to be of the right kind, where we have had to interfere, and where the cost has, as a result, been increased, and of course there are a great many cases where we have rejected plans because they are not sufficient or adequate, where the guardians have rather taken advantage of that to cover up a defective estimate. We have found that happen in several cases.

3671. On the whole, in the building department, it is extravagance rather than economy that you have to complain of?—It is extravagance we aim at checking more than economy.

3672. Is that extravagance, should you say, more seen in the infirmary department than in other departments?—Yes.

ndard of t for rmaries.

3673. What is your standard of judging with regard to infirmaries?—We can only judge by the cost per bed, for the purposes of comparison.

3674. Do you compare that with hospitals of which you are cognisant?—Infirmaries and hospitals are the same thing.

3675. I mean hospitals outside the Poor Law?—No, we do not consider those.

3676. Is yours a moveable standard, do you think, with regard to hospital accommodation in cost?—It is a rising standard.

3677. That is to say you now acquiesce in a large number of things which ten years ago you would have regarded as luxurious?—I think I must say yes to that. We allow the authorities to put in things now, which, as you say, ten or twenty years ago were not invented, very likely.

3678. Does not that point rather to diminishing the interference of your Board than increasing it?—Not necessarily to the desirability of it.

3679. Is it not the fact the guardians are rather ahead of the Board in providing what is necessary, or was thought at a later stage to be necessary, for the accommodation of the sick?—I think they are.

dvan- s of eased ral rol over l build- schemes.

3680. Is it not also in your knowledge that with the possible exception of the kind of relief given, the putting up of new buildings interests guardians more than any other part of their work?—I think it is.

3681. Of all the indoor management, that is the part which interests them most perhaps?—Yes.

3682. Do you think if your interference were much increased it would diminish a great deal of that interest?—Yes, I think it would; I think there would be less local keenness about the construction of buildings.

3683. Supposing the scheme which Mrs. Bosanquet mentioned was adopted of sending out model plans, would you not very often lose suggestions which come from local architects which would not come to the department, perhaps, except from outside?—Yes, we should. There might not be such a ready development as there is now, owing to the large number of experienced persons who are advising and drawing out plans, and that kind of thing for these buildings.

3684. That is to say, practically progress in these things involves a considerable field for experiment on the part of the guardians?—Oh, yes, enormous; there has been enormous progress.

3685. Take for instance, laundries; something was said about the increased cost of them. Is it within your knowledge that the decrease of able-bodied labour in workhouses has made that essential?—Yes, that has been a very important element, of course, in the use of machinery.

ular em of al wards.

3686. Take again casual wards. The variety of schemes adopted with regard to casual wards leads to constant expenditure, does it not?—There is only one system, the cellular system, that is adopted at the present time.

3687. That is being gradually substituted, you mean, for other systems?—No, that is the system in force at the present time, the system of cells.

3688. It is not universally adopted?—Yes, I think so.

3689. Surely not?—So far as the Board is concerned, it always has been pressed upon boards of guardians. There are cases where they have built on the ward principle, but only in very small cases where there is quite a small number of vagrants.

ection of ting lings.

3690. Have you any authority with regard to existing buildings?—Are you ever called in to inspect those?—Yes, I am called in occasionally, if the general inspector of the district wants any architectural advice, I might be called in to help him or to report upon the buildings.

3691. And to urge boards of guardians to make improvements, alterations, and what not?—If that was the object of my visit, and if I saw that it was desirable, that would be the line that I should take very likely.

3692. You do not find such advice resented?—Oh, yes, sometimes it is not taken very pleasantly.

Nature of extravagance in Poor Law buildings.

3693. (Mr. Lansbury.) What are the things that guardians are most extravagant in?—That is difficult to say. It is the whole standard of Poor Law buildings that is so very expensive: the infirmaries, for instance.

3694. Judged from an ornamental point of view?—No, from a hygienic point of view, a medical point of view, and a sanitary point of view; everything is at a very high standard. It is the result of slow progress and evolution. It has gone up and up by steps.

3695. Do you think they are better than the ordinary modern hospitals?—No, I think in very many cases they are every bit as good as ordinary modern hospitals, but the cubic space is always a good deal less in the poor law buildings.

3696. What I really want to get at, take whatever infirmary you like that you have in your mind, is this: what is the particular thing that the guardians have, in your judgment, been extravagant in? It cannot be in cubic space?—No, it is not.

3697. What I want to get at is, whether it is in ornamentation?—I did not intend to say that guardians always were extravagant, but there are cases where guardians are extravagant. It is sometimes in the style and finish of wards that there is unnecessary expenditure; sometimes we find that a larger amount of cubic space is proposed to be given than is wanted, or a larger number of detached buildings are being erected than we consider necessary, or that rooms, for instance, for nurses, are larger than are necessary, or rooms are higher, or that the machinery is of too expensive a character.

3698. Would not all that be settled by the medical people rather, the size of the rooms, and so forth?—No, there is practically a standard size for rooms, and unless there were some peculiar circumstances the medical adviser would probably not have anything to say upon that point.

3699. What you have said is rather general, is not it? I want to get hold of something definite. Have you any case in your mind? I do not care whether you give us the name of the place at all. The point is just where you think any considerable amount of money was wasted?—The case that I referred to just now where there was a saving of £15,000 on the cost in the re-construction or the extension of an infirmary. The guardians proposed amongst other things to build an entirely new nurses' home. They had already got one, and in the scheme which I prepared for them we made merely an addition to the existing home, and that saved a large sum of money. They also proposed to provide, I think I am right in saying, an entirely new operating theatre with anæsthetic rooms and recovering rooms, while they had already got a little operating room in the infirmary which was admitted by the medical officer to be quite sufficient for his purposes. Then, again, they proposed to build a new committee room: that we thought was unnecessary because there were rooms which might be used for that purpose in the infirmary. We considered that the boiler house and the laundry were too large. They proposed a separate residence for the steward, a separate residence for the engineer, and a separate residence for the porter, and we saw that by a certain amount of modification of the existing arrangements a great deal of this expenditure could be saved. It was all rather tending to extravagance.

3700. Of course the architect would be responsible for the building part of it, but would not the medical officer be the gentleman who would be the adviser to the guardians as to the nurses' home, and the operating theatre, and so on?—Yes. In that case, I went down in company with one of our medical inspectors before I reported to the Board, and we conferred together on the subject, and also with the medical officer of the institution.

Dependence of guardians on their architect.

3701. Are not boards of guardians very much in the hands of the architect whom they call in, and of their own officers who are advising them, as to the alterations?—Yes, I think they are very largely.

3702. You think it would be advisable, whenever there is a new institution required, that the guardians should send to the Local Government Board and ask for an architect to be sent down, and then let him draw the plans; or rather, I will put this question first. What is the percentage that is paid to an architect ?—Five per cent. is the ordinary commission.

Mr. Brook Kitchin.

13 Feb. 1906.

3703. Therefore, the bigger the outlay, the better for him ?—That is so.

Proposal that central authority should supply architect for all buildings.

3704. Do you think it could be worked so that your Department should be called in for all new buildings, or add tions to buildings, to supply the necessary plans for the approval of the board of guardians, just the same as any other architect ?—It could be done, but it would be very difficult, and it might be very unpleasant for the Central Board to draw out a set of plans (of course they would have to be in a very rough sketch form) for the approval of the board of guardians. It is rather reversing the order of things.

3705. It is only supplying an architect ?—Yes, but in cases where the feeling between the Local Government Board and the local authority was not of the best, where the terms were not of the best, it would be a great opportunity for the local authority to be very disagreeable to the Board and say nasty things of their architect.

3706. I know, but after all it is true that with all the disagreeable things you have to say of boards of guardians, on the whole they are fairly reasonable with you ?—Yes, I think on the whole they are perfectly reasonable.

3707. It is only in a minority of cases that you really get cross with each other ?—Yes, but it would be extremely difficult if the board of guardians rejected the plans of the Local Government Board.

3708. It would not be rejecting the plans of the Local Government Board. I am suggesting that you supply the architect who should not be paid a 5 per cent. commission, but who should go down really to consult with them like an ordinary architect does now, and between them hammer out the plans ?—That is a position that of course would be more possible ; for the central authority to supply a kind of expert architect merely to advise the boards of guardians.

3709. And to draw plans ?—And to work in conjunction, perhaps, to a certain extent, with the local architect.

3710. (Mr. Booth.) Would not it rather do away with all forms of criticism if the Local Government Board itself supplied the architect as to whose work it was afterwards to certify ; then it appears to me there would be no criticism ? (Mr. Lansbury.) The point I want to get out is that architects are human beings, and when there is 5 per cent. on a big job going, the bigger the job is made (that is the trend of the evidence this afternoon) the better for him. I only want to suggest that if the Local Government Board sent down an architect who did not depend on the 5 per cent. commission, the unhappy guardians, who are not all architects or builders, would not be swindled as they very often are, now they are in the hands of architects. An architect comes along and says : this is the way a certain thing ought to be done, and then as a rule, as you know, it is you against the other architect, and the unhappy board of guardians are between the devil and the deep sea, as it were ?—If any system of that sort were adopted, the central authority's architect could only carry the matter to a certain point. He could only act in the capacity of an advising architect. I do not think he coul l go further than that. Directly he began to draw out plans it would immediately throw the whole of the responsibility on to the central authority, and you would at once do away with a large element of local government.

3711. I am suggesting to you that it is in the drawing out of plans where the waste comes in, if there is any waste ?—It is in the early stages, as I said before, that we like to see the plans in order to check in the initial stage the likelihood of large expenditure where we can. We cannot always do it.

3712. You would not be in favour of taking the whole thing over ?—No, I do not think so. It would be centralisation on too large a scale, I think.

Nature of excess expenditure over estimate.

3713. Now about extras. Can you tell us what the extras generally consist of ?—Such things as fittings very often lead to extras—special classes of fittings. A sum is put down in the architect's estimate for fittings, and then boards of guardians very often go round and see fittings in various institutions, and they pick out all the best, and, of course, fittings are very expensive. They are mostly patents which have to be paid for, or special forms of construction which are also expensive. Fittings are the items which lead very largely to excessive expenditure. Foundations are another item which are frequently put forward as an excuse for extra expenditure.

3714. Of course with regard to foundations you would be able to test whether it was a legitimate thing or not, would you not ?—You cannot ; after the building has been built, it is very difficult.

3715. I suppose the architect would have to give you particulars ?—Yes, in the case of excess expenditure he would have to give particulars of all the items which made up the excess. Of course we have no means of checking that.

3716. Would it always be true that the best would be the cheapest even in fittings ?—The best is sometimes the cheapest.

3717. (Mr. Bentham.) Do you find that expensive wood and artistic tiling enters into it ?—Yes, that enters into it ; glazed tiling in laundries and boiler houses, and places of that sort, and sanitary conveniences, is a large item in the cost of new workhouses and infirmaries ; and paving is an expensive item, and sometimes leads to excess.

3718. (Mr. Lansbury.) You would not say that infirmaries and workhouses are built too ornamentally, would you ?—No, not at all.

Limitatio number o children a commodat on one sit 3719. I do not know if this is in your Department, but is it the fact that the Board, in the case of children, has laid it down that only a certain number of children should be accommodated on a certain site, that is to say, they made the unit of children in one instance 300 ?—Yes, that is so.

3720. That will have led to a good deal of extra expense in building ?—That would have tended to raise the cost of buildings for children.

3721. You have to duplicate very many things. Officers' quarters, and that sort of thing ?—Yes.

Analysis "cost per bed" per child.

3722. In the case of the cost of institutions for children, is not it true that when you work it out per bed that cost includes the provision very often of an elementary school, a technical shop, and a whole lot of things, besides the mere board and lodging of the children ?—Yes, in the case of the schools that were erected in consequence of the dissolution of the school districts the cost includes an enormous amount for administrative buildings, such as boiler house, laundry, gymnasium, school building, infirmary, perhaps an isolation hospital, officers' quarters, a house for the master, and a house for the resident matron.

Return as cost of dis lution of school districts.

3723. Mr. Davy told us that the breaking up of the school districts cost three-quarters of a million. Would it be possible to have a Return put in to show how that is made up, how much was for the provision of board and lodging for the children, and how much for these other things you have just named ?—As far as I am concerned we can give the costs of the buildings which were erected subsequent to the dissolution of the school districts. This is a table which gives the expenditure on cottage homes, receiving homes, and homes of that kind, subsequent to the disolution of the school districts. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. VI. (F).)

Availabili of central authority architect advise guardians locally.

3724. Would your Department go down, or send down, to examine buildings under construction if they were asked by boards of guardians ?—Yes, if the Local Government Board sent an architect, he would go down and examine.

3725. My point is if a board of guardians asked you to go down and see the work in progress, would you do that ?—Yes, if there was some reason for it.

3726. Without any reason would you ?—No, I think not.

3727. Here again I would point out that the board of guardians are in the hands of their architect ?—Yes.

3728. Whereas if they had y u to call in, they would have an outside authority equal with the man who was bossing them ?—Yes. Of course I would do it if there was sufficient time to do it, but if all boards of guardians suddenly sent for me to go and look at some buildings in the course of construction, I should have rather a bad time of it.

3729. If you had in the office a staff of sufficient strength to do it you would not object ?—No, I should not object.

Proposed exemption of workhouse buildings from local bye-laws.

3730. Did I understand you to say that you thought guardians' hospital and workhouse buildings, and that sort of thing, ought to be exempt from bye-laws ?—Under the present system by which the Local Government Board deals with Poor Law buildings, I do not think it would be possible to exempt them from bye-laws because so much is left, on the strength of the local bye-laws, to the local authorities to deal with.

3731. Is there anything really to be gained by exemption, supposing you had it ?—There might be some cases where the bye-laws would require something which was rather more substantial than the Board would consider necessary.

3732. Do you think that what would apply to a private building would not apply to a workhouse ?—No, a private building would be a domestic building, and a workhouse would be a public building, and the requirements would be more stringent in the case of a public building, especially in London.

Interest of public in local inquiries as to loans.

3733. Does anybody ever attend a public inquiry as to financial loans ?—It varies very much. I do not hold many public inquiries, so I have not had very much experience in the amount of interest taken, but I think in many cases where there has been some kind of agitation there is a good deal of interest taken. I think if it were known more than it is that a public inquiry was going to take place there very often would be a keener interest taken.

Publication of plans and cost of new buildings.

3734. You said that you would be in favour of detailed plans and costs being published, and you thought the ratepayers would take more interest in them if they were ; is not it the fact that every board of guardians publishes a report as to their work, and in most of the public libraries, at any rate in towns, you can always see what guardians are spending, or any one who is interested enough to go and read it ?—Yes ; I think if they are anxious to find out there would be no difficulty in finding out what the guardians were doing or spending.

3735. Do you think if your department published it in a book it would be any more likely to be read than these other things are ?—A great deal is published in the Local Government Board's Annual Report, but I do not know that the public reads that at all.

Comparison of excess cost on public and private buildings.

3736. Is not it true that private people too have extras on the buildings they put up ?—Yes, it is ; but there is a good deal of difference between the methods a private person adopts and the methods a public body adopts. In the case of an undertaking by a private person the cost is the reigning factor, in fact the cost governs the undertaking ; in the case of a public body very often I think the undertaking entirely governs the cost.

3737. It is true, is not it, that, whoever they are, the people who are on the board of guardians have to pay their share of the rates, and that in a small way they are spending their own money too ?—If they are paying rates ; but they are not always paying rates.

Guardians' interest in building schemes.

3738. That is a matter perhaps that we had better not argue. You said that you thought that the work the guardians were most interested in was the building. Is that really true ?—I see them more from the building point of view than any other, and it always appears to me that once a board of guardians has undertaken building operations it is very keen and very interested in the work ; but whether they are most interested in out relief, or subjects of that sort, I am really not in a position to say.

3739. You only see a few of them in any case, do not you ?—I see the building section of boards of guardian as a rule.

3740. You see those who are in favour of the building, do not you ?—Yes, and sometimes I see those not in favour of building.

3741. You do not go down and see the whole board ?—Occasionally I do.

3742. I took it down at the moment, and I thought it rather a severe criticism on boards of guardians, that the only thing they were interested in was building.?—Not the only thing, by any means ; but building work is extremely interesting work.

3743. I know a board that is interested in a very big building scheme just now, but I do not think there are three men on the board who take a real interest in it ?—That may be so.

Authority for sanction by central authority to new buildings costing over £50.

3744. (Mr. Nunn.) Can you tell us by what statute or order your relations with boards of guardians are regulated?—They are regulated mainly I believe by the statutes and the consolidated orders. I think that is really what the Board act under.

3745. They lay down that any building that will cost over £50 must be submitted for the sanction of the Local Government Board ?—Yes.

3746. Whether it involves a loan or not, simply as an expenditure ?—As an expenditure, not as a loan.

3747. Simply as an expenditure ?—As an expenditure upon improvements or repairs, or works of that kind. A new building, I take it, would be submitted.

Cost of Poor Law and prison infirmaries.

3748. Mr. Lansbury asked you to compare the relative accommodation of hospitals and Poor Law infirmaries. Have you ever compared the relative accommodation between Poor Law infirmaries and prison infirmaries ?—No, I have not been able to do so.

3749. You do not know about that ?—No, I do not know what the actual cost of prison infirmaries is.

Analysis of increased cost of buildings.

3750. Have you any tables showing what is the increase of cost, not owing to the differentiation and classification of the paupers, but owing to the actual increase in the cost of building materials, during the last thirty or forty years ?—Yes, I have a table which I propose to hand in on that subject, and I have also a table on the other subject to which you referred which gives a rough estimate of the amount which is spent on sick accommodation as compared with other classes of accommodation. That is rather interesting, as it shows the very large amount that is spent in proportion upon the sick in workhouses. Thus, in 1904 there was an expenditure of £752,000, and of that amount some £329,500 was spent upon the sick and £73,000 was spent upon the able-bodied and aged and infirm ; the rest was spent on children, lunatics and workhouse administration, so you see nearly one half the expenditure of that amount was in respect of the sick. This is only a rough statement. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. VI. (G).)

3751. Would it be possible to circulate the memoranda and forms mentioned in section 20 of your memorandum. You mentioned (F) as being one which you would circulate ; I think all of them would be useful ?—I think all of them could be.

3752. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Except C. That is not settled yet, is it ?—No, that is not issued.

Return as to cost of dissolution of London school districts.

3753. (Mr. Lansbury.) I have just seen this return. I understand that the return, as I have it, gives various unions. You start with Whitechapel, and there you give a total cost. So far as I remember they have not an elementary school attached to the Home at Grays belonging to Whitechapel. Could you amplify this, so that it would be a comparison between the unions in which you would show the accommodation of each, and what each particular place cost ?—That is included in a separate form that is going to be put in. That will be carefully looked into. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. VI. (F).)

3754. For instance, in that Home you have at Poplar you have got it as twenty-nine children at a cost of £14,210, but as a matter of fact it is 100 children that are accommodated in consequence of that improvement. If this Return is printed as it is, it would look rather bad for Poplar ?—That was not intended to be handed in as it is ; it is going to be verified.

Ornament as an element of cost of buildings.

3755. (Mr. Booth.) A great deal has been said about the cutting out of unnecessary ornament in order to save cost. I rather gather from what you said that that would not be a very large percentage or part of the cost of any of these things ?—No, it is rather the exception that we have to cut down the character of the design.

3756. In addition to that, do you consider that successful architectural effect depends much on what is called ornament ?—No, it depends, in my opinion, mainly on proportion.

3757. Therefore, without increase of cost, by good proportions you may get an effective building ?—Certainly.

TWELFTH DAY.

Monday, 19th February, 1906.

AT THE FOREIGN OFFICE, DOWNING STREET, S.W.

Mr. J. JEFFREY (Assistant Secretary).

Mr. JAMES STEWART DAVY, C.B., recalled; and further Examined.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.
19 Feb. 1906.

3758. (Mr. Lansbury.) You have not mentioned either Mr. Balfour's Underfed Children Order or Mr. Long's scheme for the unemployed in your set of papers?—I did not propose to volunteer any evidence with regard to those two points.

3759. We came down very close to that, it seemed to me?—The reason I omitted to deal with this in my evidence in chief was that both the Act of Parliament and the Order are very recent, and I personally have had very little experience in dealing with the question administratively. I therefore thought that possibly the Commission would much prefer to hear other witnesses who have a greater knowledge of the matter than myself, or would possibly wait until both the Act and the Order had been running some time longer.

3760. I thought that as most of the things you were telling us about were historical, these might have come in to finish it?—I stopped my history at the year 1900.

3761. I suppose some one else will tell us about the Underfed Order, and the reason which led up to its being issued, which is really what I want?—I have not prepared evidence on the point, and probably I am not the person, although I may be later on.

Details of return as to cost of abolition of "barrack schools" in London.

3762. The only other point I wish to ask you about is with reference to children. You were telling us the amount of money that was spent, and you handed in a return showing a total of £723,911. I want to call your attention to the figures ascribed to Poplar there with regard to the cost of cottage homes built as a result of the dissolution of school districts: the figure that you have put down there for the Receiving Home at Poplar is to accommodate 29 children at a cost of £14,210. That should be 100?—Instead of 29?

3763. Yes. You may take it from me that that is correct?—I will have that corrected.

3764. As to the receiving home and scattered homes for Camberwell, you say there are 559 children: do you mean there that that is children for the receiving home and the scattered homes?—This return was handed to me by the architect's department, and I have not gone into the details.

3765. I should like to ask that both these returns be taken back and gone into, because I think that at any rate they are rather misleading in the form they are put before the Commission?—You want the number of children revised?

3766. Yes: for instance you have there receiving home and scattered homes; as a matter of fact there are a number of scattered homes at Camberwell, and what I rather think you have got here is only the figure so far as it refers to the receiving home, that is the £20,000?—Would there be any capital cost with regard to the scattered homes?

3767. Yes, but it is doubtful whether you have got it there. The receiving home would be a different thing altogether from the scattered homes, and would probably accommodate 100 children, and the scattered homes would probably accommodate 20 each?—There is evidently a mistake somewhere in the return. I will go into this personally with the architect and take care that the statement is revised.*

3768. I want now to refer to statement No. 3: I asked Mr. Kitchin to make a return, I am not quite certain whether he will be able to do it, but if this return is to be of any value at all it ought to be a comparative one?—Which one do you refer to?

3769. The one showing the cost per bed exclusive of site, also of cottage homes. You have not given us any particulars there for Whitechapel at all. What I would like to get is the actual cost of the particular things set out there; the elementary school, the isolation block, and those sort of things?—I will note on the table what you want.

3770. I do not know whether the advice that was given to boards of guardians on the dissolution of school districts, as to the kind of buildings that were to be put up, would come in your department at all?—There was a letter, I think.

Letter of central authority as to class of buildings for children.

3771. Will that letter be put in?—I can have it put in. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (30).) I think what is in your mind is this, that the question of the circular should be introduced with reference to the cost.

3772. Yes, because one of these returns deals with receiving houses; has not the Board rather pressed on the Metropolitan boards of guardians to erect receiving houses rather than take children into the workhouses?—They have.

3773. Therefore, of course, that has entailed considerable outlay on the part of boards of guardians?—If you ask me generally whether a good deal of this outlay is not due to the specific recommendations of the Local Government Board, I will say yes.

3774. I would like to put it in that way. You do not deal with the Metropolitan Asylums Board at all, do you?—No, except financially.

3775. Except as to the Act of Parliament constituting the Metropolitan Asylums Board and your Board's order calling it into being?—I have not dealt with that in detail.

Classification by "desert."

3776. (Mrs. Webb.) With reference to your answer to Question 3326 with regard to the deserving poor, I see you say that the 1895 Commission on the Aged Poor first introduced the idea of deserving as an element in giving relief?—It first brought it into prominence.

3777. That principle of graduating relief according to the deserving nature of the persons relieved has been extensively acted upon with regard to the aged poor, has not it ?—Yes.

3778. I notice that in Woolwich, for instance, there were three classes of aged persons, some who were lodged in an agreeable villa, then there was a second set who were lodged in a drawing-room in a workhouse, and a third set who were lodged in the indiscriminate wards ?—What date was that ?

3779. At the present time. Is that principle encouraged by the Local Government Board ?—Under Mr. Chaplin's circular it was distinctly encouraged.

3780. Is it now encouraged ?—Yes, we still advise classification.

3781. According to deservedness ?—Yes.

3782. Is that exclusively confined to aged people ?—Yes.

3783. You would not recommend it with regard to adult women, for instance. Would you recommend classification with regard to deserving character ?—Do you mean character or conduct ?

3784. I meant rather deservedness from personal history ?—I do not think that that has ever been recommended.

3785. It would not be recommended ?—In point of fact it seems to me that that question of classification by conduct or character has never been really brought to a head ; it has been left vague.

3786. It has only been recommended definitely as regards the aged poor ?—In Mr. Chaplin's circular.

3787. With regard to able-bodied men who are given employment, has it been recognised at all by the Local Government Board that they should be dealt with according to past character in different farm colonies, one more or less penal than the other ?—No, that is to say we have had no circular or specific recommendation to that effect.

3788. But there is a tendency, is not there, now to do that ?—There is a considerable tendency to do that.

3789. Do you think that, on the whole, is a good tendency ?—Administratively there are advantages in it, of course.

Financial effect of policy of central authority as regards children and sick.

3790. As regards your suggestion that the first real departure from the 1834 principles of Poor Law relief was the Medical Relief Disqualification Removal Act, surely the legislation with regard to children in the sixties was also a departure from the strictly Poor Law principle ?—You will find that discussed in the 1860 Committee, I think, but I should say myself that that was a sort of exception which tested the rule.

3791. You have the fact that the increase in the cost of pauperism in London at the present time is due mainly to the increased cost of child pauperism, and the increased cost of sick pauperism ?—Yes, the two taken together.

3792. The increased cost of pauperism, which is one of the reasons for this inquiry, is more due to the legislation and orders between 1860 and 1870 with regard to children and sick than it is to the Medical Relief Disqualification Removal Act ?—Yes. How far the Medical Relief Disqualification Removal Act has really affected the number of paupers is uncertain. That is a point which would need special investigation.

3793. But with regard to the sick and children, it is quite certain that that has enormously affected the cost ?—Very largely.

Distinction between "certified" and "uncertified" institutions.

3794. With regard to the certified and uncertified institutions which are mentioned in Question 3460, I am sorry to say I do not quite understand what is the distinction between a certified and uncertified institution to which you can send paupers ?—If the institution has been certified by the Local Government Board, guardians can send paupers there without sanction in each case, whereas if the institution has not been certified they have to get sanction in each case.

3795. The sanction of the Local Government Board ?—Yes.

3796. That sanction would not be given unless you had inspected the place ?—Yes, it might be given on the general facts of the case. For instance, we sometimes get letters from guardians to say there is such and such a child who is rather difficult and they know a good institution for it, and they send to the Board the annual report of the Institution, and if we are satisfied that the guardians are exercising a wise judgment, we sanction. There are over 1,000, I think, in uncertified institutions, and I think that number includes those sent there by the medical officer. On the medical officer's recommendation guardians can send to convalescent homes and special hospitals.

3797. Without the Local Government Board's sanction ?—Yes.

3798. There are some homes which the guardians can use without the permission of the Local Government Board ?—Yes.

3799. Who inspects the certified homes for you ; one of the general inspectors ?—Yes, the general inspectors inspect them.

3800. The general inspector of the district ?—Yes.

Sandgate homes.

3801. There are some homes which I dare say you know of ; they are rather notorious, Mr. Jones' homes at Sandgate, for instance ; who certified those ?—Those were never certified.

3802. Those are uncertified ?—Yes.

3803. There are a large number of paupers there now ?—The people who go there go on the recommendation of the medical officer as being sick.

3804. So that you can have two or three homes with a considerable number of paupers, not certified or inspected by the Local Government Board ?—Yes.

3805. The Sandgate homes are used exclusively by paupers ; it is not a question of an exceptional instance ?—I am not sure of that. I have had the Sandgate homes under consideration several times.

Return as to paupers in certified and uncertified institutions.

3806. Can you send any class of pauper ?—There is a special return* with reference to those homes.

3807. I should like it. I was down at Sandgate and was struck with those homes. With regard to persons sent to certified institutions, are all paupers eligible ; children and old people are ?—They are nearly all children's homes ; training homes, as they are called.

3808. And convalescent homes ?—I do not know any certified convalescent home ; I cannot recall one at this moment.

3809. Are there any places for able-bodied certified, are farm colonies certified ?—Yes ; we give a certificate and inspect them from time to time.

3810. Is it possible to have a return of those certified homes ?—Yes, I think they are in the Blue-book, Roughly speaking, you will find that about 90 per cent. of the people in certified homes are children who are sent there for special training. There are a great number, and an increasing number, who take children from the guardians. For instance, there are two places which I think some members of the Commission might very well visit ; Mrs. Campion's Home at Hurstpierpoint and the Duchess of Richmond's Home at Lavant ; between them they practically take all the bigger girls out of the Sussex workhouses and train them and find places for them.

3811. Is there any available list of uncertified places like Jones' to which paupers are sent ?—One could be made if the Commission required it.

3812. It would be rather important to find that out as to uncertified homes ?—Yes, I should think we have it in the office. I will find out.

Half-time apprentices.

Keighley

3813. With regard to your description of the apprenticeship scheme, and what you said as to the North of England, that some of the half-timers live in the workhouses and work in the mills, you mentioned Keighley as one which had got that system ?—Yes, some years ago the Keighley people, if I remember rightly, did get a sanction to allow that.

3814. When that sanction was given, was that by a special order ?—No, it would be simply by a letter ; we raised no objection.

* H.C. 323—1904.

3815. That would be the sort of thing that would be dealt with simply by a letter?—Yes.

Apprenticeship to fishing smacks.

3816. With regard to apprenticeship to fishing smacks, is that done by a general order?—No, that would be done under the apprenticeship order, subject to the regulations of the Board of Trade, who manage the details.

Paupers in labour colonies.

3817. (Mr. Lansbury.) Did I understand you rightly that you certify labour colonies?—There are only two; Lingfield and Hadley; we do not inspect them or certify them, but we allow guardians to send there, which is rather different. We do not give a formal certificate.

3818. (Mr. Bentham.) Does that apply to Starnthwaite, too?—Yes, that would apply to Starnthwaite.

3819. That is an epileptic colony, and they have able-bodied there too?—Yes, like Lingfield. We have never given a certificate to Lingfield. It would be a place to which medical officers could send. I have always inspected Lingfield myself, and I considered it would be better not to give them a certificate. Lingfield now has a certificate from the Education Department.

Effect of Metropolitan Common Poor Fund on number of officers in London.

3820. With regard to the salaries of the officers in London workhouses, I think you said that the present system led to the appointment of unnecessary officers?—I do not think I went so far as that. I said it had a tendency to increase the number of officers.

3821. You think that it has really increased the number of officers that the Local Government Board has been asked to appoint?—That is a matter for investigation. I think you will find in London the number of officers bears a higher ratio to the number of paupers than anywhere else?

3822. If the salaries had not been paid out of the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund, fewer officers would have been appointed?—That is probable, but I do not say the officers are unnecessary.

Apprenticeship Order of 1898.

3823. That is what I gathered from your evidence. With regard to apprenticeship there was an order issued, was there not, on February 15th, 1898, which rescinded all previous orders on apprenticeship questions?—No, I do not think so.

3824. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Is not the case this, that originally regulations with regard to apprenticeship were in the Consolidated Order?—Yes.

3825. But there was no power under that order to assent to departures in particular cases?—That made the difficulty.

3826. Then the order of 1898, to which attention has been called, provided that departures might be made in particular cases?—Yes.

3827. It did not rescind the old order?—It did not rescind the old order, but it freed the hands of the Local Government Board.

3828. It provided that in any case in which it seemed desirable, a departure might be made from those regulations?—Yes, that was it.

3829. (Mr. Bentham.) As I understand it that really rescinded all previous orders, did it not?—No.

3830. It says in the last paragraph: "We do hereby rescind the orders secondly above referred to except so far as such orders may have been acted upon"?—The "orders secondly above referred to" were not the general apprenticeship regulations, but orders enabling in special Unions the Board to assent to departures from the general regulations. These now became superfluous.

3831. Now that the position is made clear with regard to all previous orders, it is within the power of the Local Government Board to assent to any departure from the Apprenticeship Order that is laid down in the Consolidated order?—That is it.

3832. Does that mean that the Local Government Board have power to make a new order with regard to apprenticeship, abolishing the in-maintenance of apprentices?—I should think that could only be done by general order.

3833. The Local Government Board have power to issue a general order now with regard to apprenticeship?—Yes.

Constitution and tenure of office of boarding-out committees.

3834. Do you attach any importance to industrial training?—I do, a good deal.

3835. With regard to boarding-out children within the union, I take it the boarding-out committees are formed usually from members of the boards of guardians, but not exclusively so?—Yes.

3836. And should the members of the committee cease to be members of the board they would still continue members of the boarding-out committee?—They might.

3837. There is nothing to prevent them, is there?—No.

3838. Can the board of guardians strike them off?—No, the committee once constituted is independent.

3839. That gives rise to this possibility: That the boarding-out committee within the union may become a body entirely independent of the board?—Yes.

3840. Do you think that is desirable?—No, I do not think it is desirable.

3841. (Mr. Booth.) How long does their appointment last?—Apparently a committee once appointed can co-opt their own members, and continue to administer.

3842. Interminably?—Yes; the guardians might withdraw all children, and bring the committee to an end, but short of that they can do little.

3843. (Mr. Bentham.) That then defeats the object of boarding-out within the union?—Yes; I have never known such a case, although I have known cases where there has been slight friction.

Control o certified institutio

3844. I think you rather approve of the idea of sending children to certified institutions?—Yes, but I do not mean children in the gross, I mean that certified institutions are most useful for individual children, children who want special treatment or care of some kind.

3845. I think you said there were 7,700 at the present time in such institutions?—That is about it.

3846. Considering that the guardians are actually responsible for paupers of all classes, and they have no control of the institutions mentioned in your report, do you consider the Local Government Board has itself a sufficient control over these institutions to justify an extension of their use?—We have complete control in so far as we can withdraw the certificate at any time.

3847. That is the only control you have?—The only direct control.

3848. They are not bound to send reports to you from time to time?—They are bound to send periodical reports of the sickness, signed by the medical officer.

3849. Sickness only?—Yes; so that the Board gets from every one of those institutions a periodical return showing the exact number of children suffering from specified diseases.

3850. There have been scandals with regard to such institutions, have there not?—There may have been. I cannot recall one at this moment.

3851. Was not there one in the north of England, in Lancashire?—Yes, I remember that, now you mention it.

3852. Were reports sent of the condition there?—I suppose they were, but I was not then inside the Board. I only know of that case. You are alluding to the case of a certain Roman Catholic orphanage?

3853. Yes. That was discovered accidentally, was it not?—I do not know. The Lancashire inspector will be called, and I expect he can tell you about it.

3854. Is it not a fact that the bulk of the income of some of these institutions is derived from payments by guardians?—Yes, I should think some of them were very largely dependent upon the payments of guardians.

3855. This is a case in which an extension of the system of placing special classes of paupers in such institutions would result in irresponsible persons administering public funds, would it not?—They perform certain services for the guardians, and the guardians pay for those services. The guardians can inspect their children there, they can withdraw their children; we inspect the certified homes once a year, and can withdraw our certificate.

3856. You think that is quite sufficient supervision?—I think so. The troubles with certified homes are of rather a different character. Some of them are very small, and they entail a great deal of troublesome inspection, which is perhaps rather excessive, considering the number of children that are lodged in the institution.

3857. Have you any particulars with regard to the cost of scattered homes versus cottage homes, that is grouped homes?—No, I have not.

3858. Are comparative figures published?—I do not think there are any published.

3859. Taking the Camberwell system versus Poplar, they are two separate and distinct systems, are they not?—I understand so, but I have never been to Camberwell, and I have never been to Poplar. The London inspector will, no doubt, give you all the information you wish for. I might just say this, because this applies to all England; if you build a cottage home there is a heavy debt-charge, if you hire a scattered home there is no debt-charge.

3860. But that charge really only represents a rent?—The debt-charge represents a rent, but that is precisely the reason I mention it, because the accounts would have to be adjusted accordingly.

3861. But rent is paid for premises that are hired?—Yes.

3862. If the buildings are economically put up, the annual cost of those buildings should not be more than the sum paid for the hire of premises?—The point I was rather indicating to you was this, that if you build your cottage home the debt-charge would probably be greater than the rent you would pay for an existing building.

3863. Probably to the extent of the repayment of the loan, but a comparison could be got at by deducting the repayment of the loan?—Yes.

3864. But no such comparison has been made?—All I was indicating was that you would have to consider the rent and debt-charge, and not just lump them.

3865. Has not the new Dietary Order put more power into the hands of the medical officer?—Yes, for classification purposes.

3866. Has that, in your opinion, led to extravagance in dietary?—I do not think so. I have not seen indications of it.

3867. I will not say extravagance, but more expensive dietary has been ordered?—I do not think we have any figures showing what the increased cost, if any, of the new dietary was. We may get it in individual unions, but as a whole (I am only speaking as a whole) I do not think we could give it to you.

3868. The medical officer deals with children under three, and all sick persons, does he not?—Yes, and I think he always has done.

3869. The guardians really had a power with regard to the diets prior to the Dietary Order?—Not for sick and children under three, I think.

3870. There was nothing to prevent them, was there?—If I remember rightly it was always within the discretion of the medical officer, he could always recommend extras.

3871. Does the question of workhouse accounts come within your department?—The workhouse accounts go before the auditor.

3872. Do you see any objections to the accounts being made up yearly, ending at the same day of the year as the parish accounts and other accounts?—You will find the whole subject very fully discussed in the Report of a Departmental Committee on Workhouse Accounts of which I was chairman. I will hand you a copy of that Report,* and you will see that that question as to the date of closing accounts is dealt with, and specific recommendations are made.

3873. Do all auditor's surcharges come before your department?—No, they go to the audit department, they only come to me in special cases.

3874. (Professor Smart.) You have told us a good deal of the use made of the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund; would you kindly tell us what that fund is?—I think Mr. Adrian told you what the fund was.

3875. Perhaps you could tell us in a word or two?—You will have another witness who can tell you all about it.

r Fund.

3876. I should like a word or two of explanation now?—The Metropolitan Common Poor Fund was established in 1867; one of the chief objects of it was to relieve the poorer unions of the metropolis from a portion of their heavy rates, and to enable them to provide proper workhouses, which were then very much wanted.

3877. I suppose it is a uniform rate on all occupiers in the metropolitan area, is it not?—After each half-yearly audit the district auditor certifies the amount actually expended by each union in respect of the expenses which are to be repaid out of the fund. I have told you what those expenses are.

3878. How is the fund raised?—The auditor's certificate is given on the statement prepared by each union of the several payments made during the half year, and the repayment expected; that is known as the claim. The claim is sent to the Local Government Board, and is strictly examined by the receiver. All questions are settled, and a certificate is given as to the amount. The provision in the Act is this, "The Poor Law Board shall from time to time assess on the several unions and parishes in the metropolis the amounts of their respective contributions to the Common Poor Fund, in proportion to the annual rateable value of the property therein comprised."

3879. The rate differs for each union, it is not a general rate all over London?—It is a general rate. I think you will understand it better if I give you an illustration. The unions are on the basis of rateable value. Some unions would receive from the Fund, and some unions would have to pay into the Fund, because the charges as certified by us, or by the receiver, as being repayable from the Fund would, in some cases, exceed, and in some cases be less than, the contribution on the total rateable value; and the difference is paid to the receiving unions.

3880. It is only paid in the form of a difference, it is not first raised and then distributed?—No.

3881. That is quite separate altogether from the ordinary Poor Rate?—Yes, it is Poor Rate, but it is allocated differently.

3882. What are the separate Poor Rates in London; are they levied on unions or on boroughs?—They are levied on unions.

3883. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Who administers the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund?—There is a receiver, Sir Hugh Owen, and he finally decides the claims.

3884. (Professor Smart.) Do you think it would be too much for us to ask for a return of all the Poor Rates levied in London by the different boroughs?—I think we have got them. It is given in the Poor Rate returns. Amount of poor rates levied in London.

3885. Are those handed in—I mean the actual rates per head?—Those will be handed in by another witness, I think. There is no difficulty about it whatever.

3886. (Miss Hill.) I suppose those individual children who are removed to certified schools have, to a certain extent, come under the influence of volunteers as well as the official representatives of the guardians?—The certified homes are run entirely by charitable volunteers Good effect of certified schools.

3887. Is it your experience that that is a considerable gain to the children?—A very great gain to a certain class of children.

3888. That would be a great reason for continuing that organisation for separating certain children, at any rate, from the regular Poor Law Schools?—Yes. I will give you an illustration of the sort of work which these homes do; a home with which I am acquainted takes in children who have been boarded out to give them some special industrial training before they go out to service. That is supplying what may be a defect in the boarding-out system.

3889. That should be a very valuable complement of the Poor Law?—Most valuable.

3890. (Mr. Phelps.) Taking the two divisions of our work, do you think that the administration of poor relief has had much effect upon employment in England? Take, for instance, the Act of 1834, do you think that that did much to relieve congested districts and distribute labour?—Yes. I am glad you have asked me that question, because it occurs to me that one of the most interesting effects of the Act of 1834 was its effect on emigration. If you read Hansard from 1820 onwards you will see that every year, I think without exception, there was a debate in the House of Commons with regard Effect of Act of 1834 on employment and emigration.

* Cd. 1440—1903.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.
19 Feb. 1906.

to emigration; there was a continual talk of the congested state of England, that England was not able to carry its own population, and it is curious to observe how public opinion at that time was divided in much the same sort of way that public opinion is now. You had the Malthusians who said: it is no good emigrating people, because the gaps you make will be filled up instantly by a growth of population; you had men like Mr. Wilmot Horton, who was afterwards Governor of Ceylon, who advocated emigration for the benefit of the Colonies; you had men like Sir Robert Peel, who took a calm view of it, and said that emigration should be carefully regulated and confined to British Colonies; then you had the view which was expressed by Mr. Sadler, to the effect—what was the use of emigrating Englishmen when you had so many millions of acres of land uncultivated in this country? So it went on, occasionally the Government gave a grant, sometimes it did not. After 1834, after the operation of the new Poor Law, you hardly find emigration mentioned. You find in the Commissioners' Report a great deal about migrating, say from Sussex to the North. There was an interesting account of the migration of some people from Sussex to Derbyshire, but of the general congestion of the country you hear nothing, and even the local congestion which the Committee admitted, and which they provided for in the Act of 1834, disappears.

3891. (Mrs. Webb.) Was not there a very large emigration after 1834 apart from the talk about it?—There was large emigration no doubt, and schemes like Wakefield's and Godley's schemes, but they were for the benefit of the Colony. My point is that emigration to relieve congestion was the burning question, and either local congestion, which was admitted by the members, or general congestion, which they never did admit, is gone.

3892. Would not that be explained to some extent by the fact that a very large premium was put upon emigration afterwards by private enterprise, and the Colonies encouraged it enormously by bounties? They may have solved the question themselves by bounties?—They may have done, and I agree that that probably had a considerable effect, but the pauper emigration was probably not emigration of the same class, it was emigration of people with small capital who were ready and willing to go, and were helped to go.

3893. The fact that prior to 1834 all the Australian Colonies were penal settlements, or mostly so, or at any rate they had that stigma, and that afterwards when they had responsible Governments they went into a very large bounty scheme of emigration, would account for the decay of the talk about emigration?—It may have affected it to some extent, that I quite admit, but the emigration paid for by the guardians as a means of relieving the Poor Rate had practically come to an end.

3894. (Mr. Phelps.) Do you think that the migration from one part of England to another was caused by the modification of the law of settlement mainly?—No doubt it had an effect.

Effect of law of settlement on mobility of labour.

3895. Do you think at the present day the law of settlement operates at all against the mobility of labour?—I do not think it does. I think as we have got rid of the able-bodied class we have got rid of that great evil.

Effect of Poor Law on wages.

3896. Do you think the greater attractiveness which Poor Law relief has now is exercising an influence on wages?—Yes, that is my own opinion—on earnings.

3897. Do you think that wages would rise were it not that the necessity of providing for their old age is taken off people's shoulders?—I am sure that would be the tendency. As you are aware, I put that forward tentatively as a subject for the investigation of this Commission.

After-careers of pauper children.

3898. Do boards of guardians make any addition to the classes of skilled labour in the country, do you think?—I do not follow you.

3899. I mean as opposed to unskilled labour. Do the children who leave workhouse schools compete in the skilled labour classes?—Yes, I should think that the good technical education which is given to workhouse children has a tendency to raise them into the ranks of skilled labour.

3900. You would not be surprised to find cases of people who had become artisans and skilled labourers in the best sense?—I know many such cases.

3901. The great majority would fall into the ranks of unskilled labour, I suppose?—I hesitate to say that, because you see so many of them are disposed of by going into the army, and we do not trace them afterwards.

After career of migrants in England.

3902. Do you know if one can find on record anywhere an attempt to trace the future of the people who have migrated from one part of England to another? Mr. Girdlestone took a great interest in that movement at one time?—I do not think so. We have not heard of that movement for a long time.

3903. You do not know whether there is any statement or history on record?—I am not aware of it.

Indoor relief to widows' children.

3904. Is the taking of children on the part of guardians a growing habit?—Do you mean under the Act of 1899: the Guardianship of Children Act?

3905. No, I am not thinking of that. I want to know is it common for boards of guardians to say to a widow, "We will relieve you by taking a certain number of your children into our school"?—It is very uncommon outside London. It is very seldom done, I think. It is never in rural districts.

3906. Not in the districts that you know?—No.

3907. Do you think that is a good system?—It has its advantages, but I have misgivings about it Effect of Poor Law on parental responsibility.

3908. Do you think you could express any opinion upon the effect on people's minds: how far it relieves them of what ought to be a burden upon them of which they wish to get rid, and how far it acts as an attraction?—I should say myself that what is in its favour is this, that it is nearly always beneficial to the children. I should think the main danger of it is, especially when you have very well organised and well equipped schools, that so far from being a test, that form of relief may gradually come to be sought for by the mothers.

3909. That is just the question I want to ask; have you any experience of that?—I have no specific experience, but I am very much impressed, I must say, with the growth of child pauperism in London.

3910. Do you think that the agencies there are now, for relieving parents of the care of their children, operate in that direction?—Yes, there must be that tendency.

3911. What safeguards would you suggest in the cases under the Poor Law?—The safeguard which probably would be the most effective is one which I do not think any one can suggest, and that would be that the quality of the schools should be lowered: that is, of course, out of the question. I think the only other safeguard I can suggest, which seems to be more practicable, is very careful supervision by the boards of guardians. I should like on that question to show you a chart which I lay on the table, which shows the indoor pauper children, the growth of the pauper child class, and their separation from other classes of indoor paupers. You will see the most extraordinary rise in the separation after 1890. Those are the children that are separated in separate institutions. You see the curve goes straight up. (Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (12).)

3912. (Miss Hill.) Surely up to now there has been no sign, I should have said, that the widows were at all anxious for the children to get into the schools. It has acted much more like the offer of the House to the able-bodied labourer, I should have said. I do not know what is coming, but at present in London certainly I do not think it is at all an attraction?—There is just this, one has to look at all the possible causes; it may be one of the causes of the growth of indoor child pauperism, especially in the Metropolis. I should like to say this: it is often alleged that if you relieve parents of their children (I am now thinking of the vagrant class) you will have all the vagrants coming and giving you their children to take. My experience is not that at all. My experience is that these people, even in the direst poverty, cling to their children; I do not say it is always from good motives, but my impression is that that is the fact.

Effect of personal influence on education of children.

3913. (Mr. Phelps.) With regard to the three systems which have been discussed so very much with regard to the treatment of children; the large school, the cottage home and the boarding-out, I suppose we might assume that the two important things in training of this kind are method and personal influence?—Yes.

3914. The importance of personal influence would vary enormously with the size of the home or school, would it not?—That would not be the first consideration which would strike me. I think what would strike me would be that it would vary so much with the character of the superintendent.

3915. What I mean is this rather, that if you take boarding-out, the personal equation is far more important there than it is in a sense in a large district school, where the inequalities would cancel one another out more?—If you have small institutions, you always run greater risk in the officers than if you have large ones.

3916. That is what I want to put to you. Do you think that is an evil which is sufficiently probable to be a factor in deciding between the systems?—To my mind it would be one of the most important factors.

3917. Have you any experience of widespread mischief arising from that source?—No, but I have often observed indications of it, and there the point which I put before you as to the permanency of tenure of officers becomes very important. You may wish to get rid of an officer because you feel that he is not quite good enough for his post, but he may be too good to be summarily dismissed; then the children suffer.

3918. On the other hand in a large establishment, the standard which is set throughout by a good superintendent will raise and lift all the subordinates, will it not?—That has been my experience.

3919. The same individual left to himself in a smaller establishment might be very much less efficient?—Certainly.

Boarding out failures.

3920. In boarding-out, where the personal influence comes in most strongly, do you think the number of failures is tangible?—I should certainly say it was tangible. Time alone will show whether there is a marked difference in the results from boarding-out, and the other means for educating pauper children.

Functions and control of certified schools.

3921. (Dr. Downes.) Do not certified schools furnish a means of dealing with special cases which an ordinary board of guardians would find a difficulty in dealing with?—Yes, that is their main advantage.

3922. They can deal with cases which are not numerous enough in an ordinary union?—Perhaps that question might well be answered by quoting from the classes of cases that do go to these certified schools; blind, deaf and dumb, epileptics, idiots, and, I may add, children who require special care because they are refractory or naughty children.

3923. The schools are, I think, for children, but the word "school" is extended by a subsequent Act of Parliament to any institution established for the instruction of deaf, dumb, blind, lame, deformed or idiotic persons?—Yes.

3924. Have not the guardians powers of inspection of certified schools?—Yes.

3925. I believe that there have been occasions when the Local Government Board has ordered a public official inquiry into circumstances connected with the schools?—Certainly.

Growth of old-age pauperism in London.

3926. Turning to London, have you considered the age of paupers in receipt of relief in London; whether the proportion of old people is exceptional?—I have here a statement of the number of paupers of sixty-five years and upwards, in which it shows that on the winter count in 1892 the percentage of the total indoors above sixty-five was 31·9; in 1900 on the same count, that number had grown in the eight years, to 36 per cent. Rather remarkably in the summer count the numbers for the corresponding years only go from 31·7 to 32·4 showing that the workhouse is largely used by old persons in the winter. There is a somewhat similar growth in the outdoor paupers, though not to the same extent, showing that pauperism is getting older and consequently more expensive.

Effect of imbeciles and child pauperism on cost of buildings in London.

3927. With reference to the rise of child pauperism in London after 1890, to which you have drawn our attention, are you aware that that led in about 1893, to a very considerable deficiency of accommodation in schools for children in London?—I was not aware of it.

3928. I do not know whether you considered that as one of the causes which led to expenditure in building, a little later on in that decade?—I have no doubt it was.

3929. There was also, I think, a deficiency in accommodation for imbeciles, which also led to some of that building?—There was evidently a great increase of expenditure.

3930. I do not know whether you have drawn our attention, or referred in any way, to the Report of the Committee in 1892, on Metropolitan Hospitals?—Yes, I have referred to that report.

3931. They referred in that report to the want of co-operation between hospitals, dispensaries, and Poor Law infirmaries?—Yes, they did.

Co-operation between Poor Law and other hospitals.

3932. They do not make any definite recommendation, I believe?—They put the point with a good deal of force and then make absolutely no special recommendation with respect to it, a fact which probably gives some indication of the difficulty of the subject.

3933. Do you consider that that is a matter which should engage the attention of this Commission?—Certainly.

Ins and outs.

3934. You are aware there is a class known to all Poor Law administrators as the Ins-and-outs?—Yes.

Danish restrictions on paupers' right of discharge.

3935. Have you anything to say to us on that subject, or can you make any suggestions as to any way of dealing with them?—The Commission is quite certain, I think, to get a good deal of evidence on this point, but it may be convenient to them to have put before them a solution of the difficulty, which I do not suggest should be adopted in England, but which I am quite sure is worth their consideration. I got it from Denmark. By one of the specific provisions of the Danish Poor Law Reform of 1892 it is enacted that no inmate of a rate-aided institution shall be allowed to discharge himself without the consent of the governing body; but that provision is supplemented by the fact that everybody who is an inmate of an institution earns, or is paid, a certain small sum in the week. Part of that sum is considered as deferred pay, and as time goes on each inmate will have in his possession a sum which in Copenhagen, when I looked into the matter there, was about 5s. He could then present himself to the governing body, and the custom was that he should be discharged, so that you see there was an alleviation of any hardship that might arise under the main provision.

Earnings of Danish paupers.

3936. (Mr. Booth.) What was the total sum he had to have?—If I remember rightly, he had 3d. a week, if he behaved himself, and 2d. of that was deferred pay; when that 2d. amounted to 5s. he could go. That was the most complete method of dealing with the difficulty that I have ever come across, but it involves a very large interference with the principles of the English Poor Law, where, as you know, workhouses are purely voluntary institutions. I think the matter is one which the Commission might well consider. With regard to the question as it is now, as to Ins-and-outs, I think you will find there is a remarkable difference between unions and unions, as to the extent to which they are troubled with this class. I can only attribute that difference to the characters of the masters of the workhouses and the guardians. I think if a master really is a man of some firmness of character, and some tact, he meets the trouble to a very considerable extent, but the trouble exists, and may, I think, be very well considered in connection with the larger scheme which I have put before you.

Effect of local administration on "ins and outs."

Vagrant "ins and outs" and suggested remedies.

3937. (Dr. Downes.) I believe this class of Ins-and-outs tend very much towards the vagrant classes?—They go in and out until they go out as vagrants.

3938. I believe we have had evidence before another Committee, that some of them actually do, at one period of the year, lead a vagrant life, and at another period of the year use a particular workhouse as a convenient resort?—At certain periods of the year there is an exodus from the workhouses for fruit picking, hopping, and other purposes which are not quite so legitimate.

3939. Should you be in favour of bringing this class to some extent within whatever provisions may be made for the vagrant classes on the lines of the Report, which will shortly be issued; that is to say, that assuming that places of detention are provided for the vagrant classes, would it be possible to bring this kind of pauper within that definition?—If you have compulsory detention of habitual vagrants after the plan which is followed in some continental countries, even under the existing law, I think a good many of the Ins-and-outs might be brought within the definition of the incorrigible rogue, as defined in the Vagrancy Act of 1824. That would be another solution of the Ins-and-outs difficulty.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

19 Feb. 1906.

Proportion of able-bodied "ins and outs."

3940. (Mr. Lansbury.) What proportion do you think there are of the Ins-and-outs which could be called able-bodied?—Not many.

3941. Is it a big number, do you think, or very small?—Speaking for outside the Metropolis I should say a very small number would be able-bodied.

3942. But in the Metropolis?—That I do not know; you had better ask Mr. Lockwood.

Guardians' adoption of children of "ins and outs."

3943. (Mr. Gardiner.) Have you any policy to recommend as regards the children of confirmed ins-and-outs, as to whether the guardians ought not to adopt them?—I think the guardians ought to adopt them, and they do adopt them to a very great extent. I think the extent to which the guardians have made use of the Guardianship of Children Act is very remarkable and very satisfactory.

Technical education of pauper children.

3944. You have spoken once or twice as to the excellence of the technical education given in certain schools connected with boards of guardians; would you kindly tell me which school strikes you as being particularly good—technical education is the term used?—I think the best technical education I have ever seen given is at the Warren Farm School at Brighton. It is a barrack school of about 300; but let me say that by technical education I mean education in any art, even if it is agriculture.

Warren Farm School, Brighton.

3945. But is that what is ordinarily understood by technical education?—What I mean by technical education is education in an art which will enable the boy to earn his own living, or, what is more important, will make him not afraid to sweat.

"Ins and outs" and effect of suggested remedies.

3946. (Mrs. Webb.) The Ins-and-outs problem would be quite as serious if they were all able-bodied?—It would be more serious.

3947. It is not their being able-bodied that makes it serious, but their being Ins-and-outs?—Yes.

3948. (Miss Hill.) If the children were adopted by the guardians, that would leave the parents entirely irresponsible and free, would not it? It would not be coupled with any disability to the parents?—Unless the existing law were supplemented in the way that Dr. Downes intimates may be possible.

3949. Did I gather that those Danish people who had been detained could claim to go out when they had accumulated their 5s.?—Not under the Statute, but it was the practice.

Homes for boys leaving the workhouse.

3950. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) I believe that in certain unions in London there is considerable difficulty in finding work for the boys when they leave the schools, other than the Army and Navy, owing to the fact that they have nowhere where the lads can live when they leave the workhouses?—That is a difficulty which is not confined to the Metropolis, and we have, to a certain extent, as I pointed out the last time I gave evidence, allowed the premium which is paid for apprenticeship, to be paid in the shape of some allowance, where the child was in the light of an apprentice.

3951. Even then you would have a difficulty in finding a suitable home for him unless he was actually living in his master's family?—That is always a difficulty.

The Working Boys' Homes.

3952. Do you think it could be met at all by an extension of the Working Boys' Homes in London?—Yes, the Local Government Board encourage that. As to that, Mr. Lockwood will give you better evidence than I can.

3953. Do these Working Boys' Homes exist anywhere except in London?—Yes, I think in Lancashire they are found useful.

3954. They are always voluntary institutions?—Yes.

3955. They may be quite self-supporting?—Yes, I think they are; I think the object is that they should be.

Type of "ins and outs."

3956. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) I should like to ask whether a number of the ins-and-outs, whom you have in the workhouses, in England, are not, just as they are in Scotland, people who are temporarily incapacitated from alcoholism, and come in for two or three days and leave, and are not able-bodied, in the sense that they are not fit to earn their living, when they come to the workhouse?—I should think practically all the ins-and-outs were of that character.

3957. (Mr. Booth.) Is it solely because of that character that they become Ins-and-outs: that is the point, I believe?—I should not think so. I think your point rather was that they used the workhouse as a sort of place where they could recover their thirst.

3958. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Recover from their temporary debauch. A large section are of that character?—I think so.

3959. (Mr. Lansbury.) Do you say that of London?—I do not say anything with regard to London workhouses, but the sort of waster who goes as an in-and-out in the country is practically always like that.

Return as to amount and cost of non-settled relief.

3960. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) You told us at Question 2547 that you would try to find out the number of persons in receipt of non-settled relief. Could you also give us, say for each union, the amount which is paid in respect of non-resident relief. I ask that because I understand that those who favour the abolition of the law of Settlement found it upon the cost of non-settled relief and non-resident relief, the result being that the one is a set-off to the other. I ask that, in giving the return which you will give us of those in receipt of non-settled relief, you will supplement it by giving the number in receipt of non-resident relief?—I am afraid I spoke under a misapprehension. There do not appear to be any figures in the office on which to base such a return.

The pros and cons of relief stations.

3961. Further on, in answer to the Question 2748, you said that you objected to relief stations?—Yes.

3962. Would your objection to these relief stations be removed if a relieving officer were always present when aliment was paid?—Only in part. The existence of a relief station enables the relieving officer to shirk his duty, which is to visit at the houses of the paupers themselves.

3963. On the other hand, is it not a convenience to the pauper himself to come to a relieving station which may be nearer his home, than the single place at which the relieving officer is to be found?—Yes, it sometimes is a convenience to know where to find the relieving officer, but I think that could be got over in other ways.

3964. Is not the main consideration that the person should be relieved as simply and as easily, and with as little trouble as possible to himself, if he has to come for his aliment?—I think the main consideration is that the relief should be sufficient for his wants, and I do not think that it is safe to leave an outdoor pauper unvisited, because he may want additional relief, or relief in a different form from the mere money payment.

3965. Your view is, and the practice is, that the relieving officer goes to the house of the pauper and hands over the aliment there?—That is what I think he should do.

3965. Does he do it?—He does not where they have relief stations. The point is this, that if the relieving officer has to pay at the pauper's own home the guardians are certain that he has visited that place, whereas if you have relief stations, you cannot be certain that he has the pauper really under supervision.

3967. May not that put an undue burden on relieving officers; if they are supposed to give the aliment once a month, or once a fortnight, and they have to visit the pauper on each occasion, when they give aliment? That would make a very great deal of work?—In some cases I have no doubt additional relieving officers would have to be appointed. I have also pointed out there are exceptional cases where we must have relief stations.

Cost of education of Poor Law children in special and ordinary schools.

3968. In regard to the boarding-out of children, and the other systems of relieving them, of which you have spoken, can you give us a return of the relative cost of the boarding-out where the children go to the ordinary schools, and the cost of the Poor Law schools which have been established in each union?—You mean the whole cost, not the mere cost of administration.

3969. The whole cost?—There is a good deal of information about the cost of maintenance in the half-yearly return. I think you will probably find many more figures which may be useful in the statistical memorandum.

3970. I want to contrast the cost of the system, as pursued in England, with the system which is adopted in Scotland. It is not easy to do so, because in Scotland the system is to board all pauper children outside of the workhouse, and they have their education in the ordinary schools of the parish. Accordingly, the system there is a very different one, and it is very difficult to contrast the one with the other; but if it were possible I should like to know what the actual cost of the education of pauper children is as between the different systems of which you have spoken?—I think a return could be prepared, and it would be a useful one.

3971. I have a report here made in 1870 by Mr. Henley, who was deputed to go to Scotland to enquire into the boarding-out of pauper children in Scotland, and I want to ask you a question on this. He concludes his report by saying: "Those who are not well acquainted with the different habits and modes of life of the working classes of both countries must be careful not to draw a too hasty conclusion that what is good in one country must necessarily be so in the other. The nations, though happily united, retain their distinctive characteristics. Scotland, as I have before mentioned, possesses a class of crofters, or small occupiers; they are undoubtedly the best foster parents, but they are almost unknown in England, except, perhaps, in Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Durham. The food of the people in the two countries is very different, oatmeal being commonly kept in the house in Scotland and used with milk; baker's bread, purchased weekly or oftener, is the staple food in many parts of England." Does the distinction still stand which Mr. Henley draws there between conditions in Scotland and England, and the fact, as he puts it, that you find very much better foster parents and guardians in Scotland drawn from the class of small farmer?—I should say it did. I should say that is as true to-day as when it was written. You have more people in Scotland proportionately who would make good foster parents, but whether those people would take the children of course I give no opinion upon.

3972. You say so not speaking from experience, I suppose?—No. I mean the best end, as they say in the North, of our English peasantry do not like to take boarded-out children.

3973. Why?—I do not know; there are many reasons.

3974. May not that be due to this, that there is too much inspection, and that the foster parents are not trusted to do their best by the children without constant and repeated investigation and inspection?—That has been repeatedly alleged. I have no doubt you will get evidence as to that.

3975. You think that may be to some extent an explanation?—It may be.

3976. In the case of foster parents being selected, they are selected, I understand, by a committee of the board of Guardians?—No. You mean boarding-out outside the union?

3977. I am afraid I am not able to discriminate between the two. Take boarding-out outside the union?—Then what happens is that a voluntary committee is formed, and the Local Government Board sanctions that committee, and they make an agreement with the guardians to find homes for the children and look after them, subject to inspection by one of our Lady Inspectors. That is the procedure outside the union.

3978. There is a Lady Inspector of the Local Government Board whose duty it is to inspect the boarded-out children outside the union?—There are three of them.

3979. Can you tell us what the proportion of these boarded-out children is to the child pauperism of the country?—There are 1,700 so boarded-out outside the union and about 6,200 boarded-out inside the union. The total child pauperism of the country is 59,000.

3980. Can you say what the percentage is of the whole. In Scotland there are boarded-out 90 per cent. of the children who are in our poorhouses, but I suppose in England the proportion is nothing like that, is it?—No, the proportion would not be more than about 16 per cent., I think.

3981. (Mr. Bentham.) Would it be possible to have a return put in of the exact proportion of children boarded-out, and in other ways?—I think I have already put that in.

3982. (Mr. Lansbury.) Is not the boarding-out within the union rather different to boarding-out outside the union?—There are quite different regulations. If a child is boarded-out inside the union, it is inspected by the Relieving Officer and the Medical Officer. Different regulations as to boarding-out within and without the union.

3983. One other point is, that only orphans or deserted children can be boarded-out outside the union, is not it?—Either within or without the union there is the same prohibition.

3984. Until quite recently there was only one kind of boarding-out so far as the metropolis was concerned, and that was outside the union?—That would be so far as the metropolis is concerned, but the orders were issued about the same times; two orders were issued in 1889.

3985. In London it is rather scattered homes than boarding-out, is it not?—I do not suppose that there is boarding-out within the union in London, only in country districts. Scattered homes in London.

3986. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) It is only orphans and deserted children who are boarded-out, not children separated from their parents?—Or, under the last order for boarding out without the unions, children adopted by boards of guardians. Scope and objects of boarding-out system.

3987. Is not one main object which ought to be aimed at, when you are boarding-out children, to relieve them as far as possible from all taint or stigma of pauperism?—That, I believe, is one of the reasons alleged by the advocates of boarding out.

3988. Do you think that is achieved by a very drastic system of inspection?—I should say that a drastic system of inspection must affect it; but then I would recall to your recollection the evidence that Mr. Crooks, who is the Member for Woolwich, gave with regard to boarding-out children in certain villages, where, as he put it, boarding-out became the main industry of the village. That, I have no doubt, you will hear of later. Pros and cons of inspection.

3989. It is the case, I believe, that a great deal of the boarding-out is done in villages, and not in country districts. Places which are mere small towns or villages are mainly selected for boarding-out?—I do not think so. I think the boarding-out committees take foster parents wherever they can get them.

3990. With regard to Question 3,479, where you are speaking of the emigration of children to Canada and elsewhere, that, of course, involves the removal of these children out of the jurisdiction of the board of guardians?—Yes. Procedure and incidents of child-emigration to Canada.

3991. At the same time, I think you say they retain certain powers of inspection over them?—They arrange with the Canadian Government to do the inspection. I should like to lay on the table a most interesting document which is the last return of the inspectors of the Canadian or Provincial Governments, with a summary of the results.

3992. The legal hold of the board of guardians must cease directly these children are removed from England, must it not?—Yes, it is transferred to the other side.

3993. Has that not been considered an objection to their being so removed?—No, the guardians part with their responsibility on conditions, to which conditions the Canadian Government and the Provincial Governments are parties.

3994. That has been done by arrangement with the Canadian Government?—Yes. The Local Government Board are in communication, in any doubtful case, with the Agent General of the Canadian Government. Last year I think the number emigrated was something over 550, but we do know what becomes of the children, as I think you will agree, if you look at the reports which I have put on the table.

3995. May I ask whether boards of guardians publish from time to time any account or history of pauper children, and what becomes of them? I ask that because it is sometimes done in Scotland. I hold in my hand a list of children and lunatics boarded by the Parish council of Glasgow, which is very complete, giving a full history of each of the children and what becomes of Proposed inquiry into number of adult paupers who have been educated in Poor Law schools.

Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B.

19 Feb. 1906.

them?—That is not generally done; it is only done by certain boards of guardians. What becomes of each child is the main question, and that is the question which is so often forgotten by people who are wrangling about the relative merits of barrack schools, district schools, and cottage homes. They never stop to really ask what becomes of pauper children. I suggest to this Commission that they should have a census of every workhouse, every gaol, and every lock ward in the country, and find out how many of those persons allege that they are, or can reasonably be supposed to have been, educated in the Poor Law establishments. They will find, if that census gives them much the same result as former censuses, perhaps 400, 500, or 600 persons who allege that they have been so brought up; the life history of every one of those persons should be traced. Here is an opportunity once for all of ascertaining whether or not pauper schools are manufactories of pauperism. I throw that out as a counsel of perfection.

Published records of Poor Law children.

3996. I gathered from you, I do not know whether I am right, that some boards of guardians do publish statistics regarding their children?—Occasionally. I think they do in Bradford.

3997. I have here a full record which gives the name of the child, the date when it is supplied with clothing, the date of its birth, its religion, the date when boarded-out, the name of the guardian, the address of the guardian, remarks, and its future history?—By "guardian" there you mean what we should call foster-parent?

3998. Exactly. If you could procure for us a similar return it would be useful?—I could get you any return that is published by boards of guardians, but it would be impossible to get returns from all boards of guardians. I will find out where there are such returns published and let you have them.

3999. Are you aware what the percentage of failure is amongst these children? Have you any statistics about those who do not succeed in life?—I gave those in my evidence on Tuesday.

Certified schools and institutions.

4000. (Sir Samuel Provis.) I think we are not quite clear as to the exact position of certified schools. It would be well if we brought out the facts a little more clearly. The schools are certified, are they not, under the Poor Law Certified Schools Act of 1862?—Under 11 and 12 Victoria.

4001. That only enables the Local Government Board to certify schools for children?—Yes.

4002. It does not enable them to certify institutions for adults?—No.

4003. Before any place of the kind is certified, it is necessary that it should be inspected and a report made to the board, who thereupon certifies it?—Yes.

4004. With regard to the children that may be sent there, they are not necessarily limited to blind, or deaf and dumb, or children suffering from some disability. There are, are there not, a considerable number of children sent for other reasons—to Roman Catholic Schools, for instance?—Yes.

Power to send children to certified schools on religious grounds.

4005. There is a power, is there not, to direct that a child shall be sent to a certified school on religious grounds?—Yes, and that power has been exercised.

Non-certified schools.

4006. There is a power, is there not, for the guardians, with the consent of the Board, to send a child to a non-certified school if it is blind or deaf and dumb?—We are always consenting to children going to non-certified places.

4007. That is to meet particular cases?—Yes, special cases.

4008. Under another Statute the guardians may subscribe, with the consent of the Board, although the children sent are not blind or deaf and dumb?—Yes.

Limit to class of institutions which may be certified.

4009. The power which the Board have of certifying the school does not in any way apply to any other institution intended for adults, such, for instance, as a labour colony?—No.

Sick adults in uncertified institutions.

4010. In the case of the sick, the guardians may, may they not, on the advice of the medical officer, if they consider it necessary for the treatment of the case, send a pauper to a place which is not certified, and which is not under regulation in any way?—Without our consent; we have nothing to do with it.

4011. That is not infrequently done?—That is quite common.

4012. (Mr. Booth.) I understand from the answer which you made to a question of Dr. Downes that an adult blind or dumb person could be dealt with in the same way as a child?—They proceed under a different Statute.

Difference procedure sending children adults to uncertifie institutio

4013. (Sir Samuel Provis.) In the case of children of this class there is an express statutory provision that the guardians may send them to uncertified schools with the consent of the Board, but in the case of adults, of this class, they may be sent without the sanction of the Board. As regards other classes I think what happens is this, that the guardians enter into an agreement to subscribe, and the Board assent to that subscription?—That is what we do. The guardians make a contract, as they can do on the recommendation of their medical officer, with the keeper of a convalescent home, or whatever it is, to take in their paupers.

4014. (Mr. Bentham.) They may not previously have subscribed to that institution.?—Not necessarily.

Power of central authority veto send of adults uncertifie institutio 4015. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) The Local Government Board have no power of interference?—We might prohibit the admission of paupers, I think.

4016. I have in my mind the institution at Sandgate, which I used to know a good deal of. I understand that boards of guardians have sent people down to one of those institutions at Sandgate, and the Local Government Board has no power of interfering at all?—It is entirely a matter between the guardians and the keeper of the home.

4017. Those homes might have been conducted so badly before that there had been a scandal in the district?—Yes.

4018. Is that indoor or outdoor relief?—That is indoor relief.

4019. (Mr. Bentham.) In each of those cases sent to Sandgate would a medical officer's certificate be required that those people should be sent to an institution?—I think the auditor would require one before he passed the expenditure.

4020. (Mr. Lansbury.) It is a fact that some medical officers in London have reported very favourably on the condition of those homes?—Yes; I do not go into matters of that sort.

4021. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Just now we were speaking of the power of the Local Government Board to certify certain institutions; there is also a power, is there not, in the case of any institution in which paupers are received, for the Board to prohibit the reception of paupers into such institutions?—There is.

4022. That, I think, is under the Poor Law Relief Act, 1849?—Yes.

Operati Metrope Commo Poor Fu

4023. Perhaps we might make a little clearer what is precisely the operation of the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund. The fund is constituted in this way, is it not—contributions are raised from the whole of the Metropolis in accordance with the rateable value?—Yes, that is so.

4024. Every Metropolitan Board of Guardians is entitled to make a claim upon the fund in respect of certain classes of expenditure?—Yes.

4025. A statement is presented to the auditor at the half-yearly audit, showing in detail what is the claim of any board of guardians on the fund, and he certifies the amount, does he not?—He certifies the amount actually expended by each union in respect of expenses which are payable out of the fund.

4026. Then those claims are sent in to the Local Government Board, who, in that way, ascertain what is the amount of the total claim upon the fund in respect of that particular half-year to which the claims relate?—Yes.

4027. Having ascertained that, they determine what will be the amount of contribution required from the several unions to meet the total claim?—Yes.

4028. They do not actually receive the one sum and pay back the other; but should they find that in respect to one union there is a balance in favour of the union, then that sum is paid to the union ?—The balance over is paid.

4029. In the same way, in any case in which there is a balance due from the union, after deducting the amount to which that union is entitled, the union pays over that balance ?—Yes; and so the unions are divided into receiving unions and contributing unions.

4030. The expenditure which may be charged upon the fund is prescribed by Statute, is it not ?—Yes.

4031. And the Local Government Board have no power to add to, or in any way to determine what classes of expenditure shall be charged on the fund ?—That I have already pointed out.

ctions of al ernment rd as to ropolitan mon r Fund.

4032. The expenditure which is chargeable on the fund may be divided into two classes, may it not, namely, expenditure which is automatic, such, for instance, as the payment of 5d. per day in respect of every adult pauper in the workhouse; and expenditure which is determined according to the number of officers, or whatever it may be, which is peculiar to the particular union ?—Yes. The first sum is automatic, but the second is subject to a check.

4033. In the second class of cases, which is not automatic, the sanction of the Local Government Board is required to prevent undue charges being made on the fund, I think ?—That is, undue charges in respect of the salaries of officers.

4034. And some other things too—for instance, vaccination expenses ?—Yes.

4035. The Local Government Board exercise, do they not, a great deal of care with regard to the scale of salaries ?—The most minute care.

4036. And—I am speaking now of the more important officers—have a maximum beyond which they do not allow a charge to be made on the fund ?—That is so.

4037. That is with the view of preventing there being an undue charge made on the fund, is it not ?—Yes.

ervision eaching Poor Law ools.

4038. You have told us that the inspectors inspect the industrial training in workhouses where industrial trainers are employed; there is also, is there not, the case of teachers in Poor Law schools who were formerly inspected by the school inspectors of the Local Government Board ?—Yes; those schools are now inspected by the Board of Education.

nt for hers' aries in r Law ools.

4039. There is a grant, is there not, payable by the county council in respect of the remuneration of those teachers, and that is dependent upon the reports of the inspectors of the Board of Education ?—That is so; formerly it was dependent upon the reports of our education inspectors, but now it is dependent on the reports of the inspectors of the Board of Education.

inistra- of rding-out hin and hout the on.

4040. With regard to boarding-out without the union, the boarding-out committee is not a committee of the board of guardians, but is an independent committee consisting of persons approved by the Local Government Board, is it not ?—That is so.

4041. The names are submitted to the Board, who approve of the particular committee ?—Yes. Mr. James Stewart Davy, C.B. 19 Feb. 1906.

4042. If any alterations are made in the committee, the Board's assent is necessary ?—Yes.

4043. That committee enters into relations with the board of guardians—it agrees with it, for instance, for certain things—but it is quite independent of the board of guardians ?—It can make an agreement with the board of guardians, but it is independent of the board of guardians altogether.

4044. When you come to boarding-out within the union, you have two systems, have you not; first of all, you need not have a boarding-out committee at all, need you ?—That is so.

4045. The Boarding within Unions order contemplates that as an ordinary state of things when there would be no boarding-out committee ?—That is so.

4046. In that case the agreement with the foster parents is entered into by the guardians ?—The agreement is entered into directly by the guardians, and the inspection would be done by the officers of the guardians.

4047. But there may be a committee set up in the union, and the committee would then be in the same position with regard to boarding-out within the union as is the boarding-out committee outside the union ?—Yes. Where there is a committee there are powers in the Boarding-Out Within the Unions Order to dispense with the inspection by the relieving officer and the medical officer—a provision to which I for one object.

4048. (Professor Smart.) I suppose an increase of expenditure in itself is no evidence of an increase of burden, because if the population is not increasing, the wealth may be increasing, or if the wealth per head is not increasing, the population may be increasing ?—Yes.

4049. If the population be increasing and the wealth be increasing, it is the ratio between the one increase and the other which alone can determine whether the burden is increasing or not ?—That is evidently so.

Relative growth of Poor Law expenditure, rateable value, and population in London and elsewhere.

4050. I think you have prepared a chart bearing on this point ?—I have prepared a chart which I should like to hand in which shows the cost of poor relief, the rateable value, and the estimated population. From that you will see that up to about 1890 the rateable value was increasing faster than the expenditure, that is to say, the burden on the property of the country was decreasing, but since that date the expenditure takes a sudden turn upwards, and it is now increasing apparently at a greater ratio than the rateable value. For instance, the cost of relief (excepting the insane in asylums) in 1874 was 5s. 9·7d. per head. It decreased till 1894, when it was 5s. 3·3d. per head; and then in 1904 it had increased to 6s. 7·7d. per head—a distinct increase in cost as regards population. With regard to the rateable value, it was 1s. 2·5d. in the £ in 1874; it fell to 11·7d. in 1884 and 11·8d. in 1894; and then it rose to 1s. 1·7d. in 1904, showing a slight increase in the rate per £ of rateable value.

4051. Will you put that chart in ?—Yes. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. V. (15).)

Mr. Henry Lockwood, called; and Examined.

4052. (Chairman.) You are a general inspector of the Local Government Board, your district being the Metropolitan district, I believe ?—Yes. Mr. Henry Lockwood. 19 Feb. 1906.

4053. You have occupied that post for some time, have you not ?—Since February, 1894.

4054. Previous to that were you also engaged in Poor Law inspection ?—Yes. I began as assistant inspector to Mr. Fleming in the northern district; I was subsequently assistant to Mr. Longley, and after that to Mr. Hedley in the Metropolitan district; then from 1879 to 1881 I held Mr. Peel's district which was a district comprising five Midland counties; from 1881 till 1894 I was in the eastern counties district; and since then I have been in charge of the Metropolitan district.

istance nspection ondon rict.

4055. The Metropolitan district being a very large and populous district, you have certain assistance given to you; will you describe to the Commission what that is ?—I have one medical colleague, Dr. Downes, and three assistants, one of whom is a lady. The duties of the assistants are to inspect and report on the several institutions in and connected with the district. Their reports are given to the inspectors—myself and my medical colleague—who advise what action should be taken respecting them, whether they should be reserved, or what extracts should be sent to the guardians or the managers concerned for their consideration, or for their observations, as the case may be.

Assistant inspectors and their duties.

4056. Is the work of the assistant inspectors confined to visiting and reporting on institutions ?—Mainly so; but they may occasionally have some special work which either myself or my colleague may think it desirable that they should do.

4057. The demands on your time must be considerable, so would you please tell us to what portion of your duties you specially devote yourself; is it to attending the meetings of the boards of guardians ?—I devote myself more to attending the meetings of their committees than the meetings of the whole boards of guardians, because the greater part of the work in which I am particularly concerned and interested is done by committees.

Mr. Henry Lockwood.

19 Feb. 1906.

4058. Therefore, do you delegate to the assistants the actual inspection of the institutions?—Yes.

4059. Do you ever inspect any institutions yourself?—Yes, occasionally.

Duties of lady inspector.

4060. The duties of the lady inspector, I understand, relate to the children's department, is that so?—They are mainly to inspect and report on the girls, and infants, departments in the separate and district schools, on the female side of the workhouse, and more particularly with regard to nursing and maternity wards and the nursing arrangements in the separate infirmaries.

4061. I suppose the institutions which have to be inspected are numerous?—Yes, they are.

Number of institutions to be inspected.

4062. Can you give us any figures relating to those?—Yes. The institutions which we inspect comprise fifty-four workhouses, thirty infirmaries, two sick asylums, fourteen separate schools, four district schools, twenty-seven receiving homes for children, six groups of scattered homes (namely, twenty-six houses in connection with Mile End, five in connection with Whitechapel, forty-two in connection with Camberwell, six in connection with Croydon, four in connection with Richmond, and five in connection with Lewisham), forty-three certified homes (of which twenty-one are for Roman Catholic children), and twenty-two Metropolitan Asylums Board institutions, including the training ship.

Institutions of Metropolitan Asylums Board.

4063. Are the institutions connected with the Metropolitan Asylums Board under you for the purposes of inspection?—A certain number of them are. I do not myself—and, as a routine business the assistant inspectors do not inspect and report upon the fever hospitals; but the training and the remand homes, the homes for certain other classes of children, and the training ship, are visited and reported on by them.

Committees of guardians.

4064. There are, I understand, including the three districts of Croydon, Richmond, and West Ham (which are outside the Metropolitan area), thirty-four boards of guardians in your district?—That is so. As I have already said, the Poor Law work of the guardians is, for the most part, done by committees, such as relief committees, work house and infirmary visiting committees, school committees, finance committees, settlement committees, and general purposes committees; and occasionally other special committees which are appointed for particular purposes.

4065. Is it your object to try to establish uniformity in practice amongst all these boards of guardians?—I do not know that I have ever gone so far as to say that that could be done: but my desire might be so stated.

Difference in administration of boards of guardians.

4066. Then there is a great difference, I take it, between the practice of these boards?—Yes, there is a very considerable difference.

4067. How would you describe these differences; could you, for instance, give us one particular union whose work you thought was rather a model?—Comparisons are admitted to be somewhat odious sometimes. I have necessarily to keep on reasonably good terms with all boards of guardians, and I am afraid if I were to enter into comparisons I should find myself getting disliked.

4068. Is the difference geographical—I mean to say, does one system prevail in certain parts of London, and another system in certain other parts of London?—I think the difference could not be said to be geographical, because, assuming that a limited out-door relief is an end to be desired, you will find that limitation in certain western unions or parishes, and also in one or two eastern unions or parishes.

Increase of indoor accommodation and relief in London.

4069. The tendency of modern times has been to largely increase the size of these institutions, has it not?—Yes. It may be said that the in-door accommodation for the Metropolis is very appreciably greater now than it was, say, fifteen years ago.

4070. Mr. Davy gave us some figures in which he showed I think, that while the amount of pauperism in the Metropolis was about 26 per 1,000 of population, 16·6 of that pauperism was in institutions and 9·4 received out-door relief; and then he gave figures for the rest of England, where the proportions were reversed; have you anything to put before us on that point?—I have called attention to the relative increase of in-door and out-door relief within the last few years in one of my reports; for instance, in the report for 1898-99 I say: "A comparison of the returns of Metropolitan pauperism in the first week of January for 1889 and 1899 and certain intermediate years is interesting as indicating a more or less steady increase in the numbers of in-door poor, with a concurrent diminution in the recipients of out-relief."

Age of indoor paupers.

4071. Would the bulk of those receiving in-door relief be over sixty years of age and under sixteen?—I do not know that I could say the bulk would be over sixty, but I think I may say that probably the bulk would be over fifty. Perhaps I did not quite understand the question. If it means that a large proportion of the inmates of workhouses are over sixty, I think you will find that, as compared with the total number of inmates of workhouses, the proportion over sixty will not be very considerable. What I am trying to say is that of the inmates of workhouses the larger percentage would be over fifty.

4072. My object in putting the question was to obtain from you indirectly what were the ages and the positions of those who made up this increase of pauperism in institutions. If there has been a check on out-door relief, would it not follow that the greater proportion of the increase of paupers in institutions would be persons who, from their age (being too young or too old), were supposed to be unable to support themselves?—I think that would be so; but I also think that of late years the age at which persons, I will not say are unable, but find it difficult to support themselves, has fallen lower. Therefore, as I say, I should put the age of what one would call aged and infirm paupers (although they may not be classed as such in the returns) as somewhat lower than sixty or sixty-five.

4073. Do you think, then, that of recent years the tendency has been to lower the age at which people are able to support themselves?—Yes. Here again, perhaps, I may quote from my report for 1898-99. I said then, referring to the possible operation of what is occasionally alleged about trade unionism and employers' liability, "To what extent the two latter are responsible for the increase is a question as to which it would be rash to offer a decided opinion, but it is generally admitted that of late years there has been observed an increasing number of workhouse inmates who, though perhaps incapable of earning a full wage, could not reasonably be classed as "infirm through old age or other cause," and it is possible that the comforts and indulgences now generally afforded to the in-door poor may, in some cases, at least, offer inducements to remain chargeable rather than to renewed effort to earn an independent living."

4074. It would appear that a larger proportion of children and old people are entirely maintained by the poor law in London than in other parts of England?—That is so, I think. I should perhaps, add as regards the children that at school age they are not in workhouses, but are for the most part in schools or receiving homes; they are kept now separate from the workhouse.

4075. Still, they are maintained at the cost of the rates?—Yes.

Contribution by relatives towards cost of indoor poor.

4076. And no contribution towards their maintenance is made by their friends or relatives?—In the case of the children, no; but in the case of a good many of the inmates of infirmaries there is a contribution made.

4077. In addition to this general increase of institutional pauperism in London, there has been a certain increase of out-door pauperism of recent years, has there not?—Yes.

Increase in out-relief and its causes.

4078. Have you any remarks to make upon that?—It is an admitted fact, I think, that there has been a remarkable increase in the course of the last three or four years. There are, no doubt, more than one contributory cause to that. Possibly administration has had something to do with it. Then, I think, one may consider that during the past three years things have happened which have had their effect upon the labour market generally; for instance, what has been aptly called the backwash of the South African War, and then, coming on the top of that, the disturbance to our sea-carrying trade by the Japanese War; the latter has, I think, particularly affected the East End of London, where a considerable proportion of the population are employed in and about the docks.

4079. Would you say that, during the last three or four years, the pressure on a certain class of the population has increased ?—I think so.

4080. That is one contributing cause; side by side with that, has there been any change in administration ? For instance, has it become more lax than before as regards giving relief ?—Possibly, there has been a certain, we will call it, laxity, in giving relief in certain districts.

ntrifugal ect on uperism of rict ad- inistration a par- ular area.

4081. In your experience, when a union is strict in the administration of out-door relief, is the effect to drive the paupers into other unions ? Have you any evidence, or has anything come to your notice sufficiently substantial, to enable you to express any opinion on that point ?—I certainly have no conclusive evidence that strictness within one area will result in the persons who consider themselves to be suffering from the strict administration migrating. I do not doubt for a moment that it occurs to a certain extent, but I do not think it occurs to any considerable extent.

4082. Sometimes relief is given in a district, and then for various reasons it comes to an end; have you ever been able to trace what becomes of the people from whom that relief has been suddenly taken away ?—I do not know that I have. I do not know whether you are referring to the case of St. Olave's ?

4083. Perhaps you would just state what occurred in St. Olave's, because that is, I think, rather a peculiar parish, both as regards its rating and its methods of relief ?—It is an old story now, for it relates to the last real winter that we had, which was in 1895. In my report for that year I reported at length on what happened in St. Olave's Union. Here are the figures relating to the stoneyard, which was opened on January 5th, 1895. On that day there were thirty-one men employed in the stoneyard; on January 12th, there were 671; on January 19th, there were 858; on January 26th, there were 1,279; on February 2nd, there were 1,740; on February 9th, there were 2,548; on February 16th, there were 2,702; on February 23rd, there were 3,239; on March 2nd, there were 2,940; on March 9th, there were 3,703; on March 16th, there were 3,179; on March 23rd, there were 3,140; and on March 30th, there were 2,814. After March 30th they gave notice that the stoneyard was to be closed, and on April 6th there were only 74 men in the yard. As I subsequently commented, it appears inconceivable when the number was reduced from 2,814 to 74 in one week that the balance could "suddenly cease to need relief had their circumstances while receiving it been those of real destitution."

bour yard St. Olave's.

4084. The period at which there was this great contraction of relief was at the end of March and the beginning of April ?—Yes. The frost had broken then; it is only right to say that.

4085. All these men were, I assume, resident in the union ?—They were assumed to be. It is only right to say that the stoneyard was opened in a great hurry, and that when it was first started there was no possibility of making proper investigation and inquiry, and that the provision for overlooking the men and seeing that they did their work was insufficient. My experience of that year, I confess, prejudiced me very greatly against labour yards, doubting as I do their deterrent effect.

jections outdoor our yards.

4086. Would you amplify your objection a little ?—I think they are objectionable in this way. If a stoneyard is opened, as in this case, you almost immediately get a considerable number of what one may call the undesirable class, who are quite content to earn just enough to keep them going for the week and no more; and you cause to be associated with them a more respectable class to whom, I think, association of that kind may be regarded as a hardship; in other words, it is not deterrent to the class of person whom you really wish to deter from receiving relief.

4087. And it is an easy means of subsistence to those who are accustomed to the particular work given to them ? —Yes.

4088. May we take the administration of St. Olave's union as described in your report of 1895-96 as an example of the lax administration of which you disapprove ? —Yes.

4089. Are there any other cases of the same kind ?—In the same year and in the same report, there is a reference to the stoneyard which was opened at West Ham, in which I ascertained that "Of 1,200 men so relieved during the first three months of 1895, 244 had resorted to the stoneyard for a consecutive number of years as follows:—For ten years, four; for nine years, fifty-three; for eight years, twenty-one; for seven years, twenty-five; for six years, fifteen; for five years, thirty-seven; for four years, forty-five; for three years' twenty-seven; and for two years, seven. In more than one instance, three generations, father, son, and grandson were simultaneously receiving relief in this form." My point is that it is not deterrent to the person whom, as I say, you wish to deal with severely, and on the other hand, the decent man with a family and a home hesitates to take advantage of it.

Labour yard at West Ham.

4090. The parishes of Edmonton, Tottenham, and West Ham present some very peculiar features, owing to the rapid growth of population, I believe ?—Yes, the growth of population there is enormous. I cannot speak of Edmonton and Tottenham from personal knowledge, but I know a good deal about West Ham.

4091. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Edmonton and Tottenham are not in your district, I think ?—No, they are not.

4092. (Chairman.) In West Ham there is a vast and continuous increase of population, and I understand the great majority of them are practically of the same class ?—Yes. I should imagine that the average income in the West Ham union is lower, probably, than in any other union or parish in my district, with the exception of Poplar, perhaps.

Special difficulties of West Ham.

4093. And the increase of population outruns the increase in the rateable value, does it not ?—I think it does.

4094. Have there been any special difficulties in West Ham in the administration of relief ?—Yes. They have had considerable difficulties for many years, owing mainly to the fact that they have had a rapidly increasing population, of which a considerable percentage, at all events, were of the poorer class—that is, the class who are likely to be more rate-consumers than ratepayers, so to say. They have consequently had a more or less continuously overcrowded workhouse and over-crowded schools. They have now been obliged to resort to a labour yard. Their labour yard is, I think, as well-conducted as a labour yard can be; but even so, as the weeks go by, one sees the numbers so employed increasing. They began, I think, with 500, and the last return showed 940. I have no doubt that, so long as it continues open, the numbers will increase week by week. The difficulty is that their circumstances are such that they find it almost impossible to offer in-door relief to any considerable number.

4095. Being a new district, has it any endowed charities or any large organised charities ?—So far as I am aware, it has comparatively few, but I cannot speak from personal knowledge to that.

4096. If the district is exceptionally poor and that is one contributing cause to its increase in pauperism, is the administration such as you would approve of, or is it in your judgment unduly lax or too rigid ?—It certainly has not been too rigid, and I think it has on occasions been—I will use a tender word, and say over-indulgent; but things are improving there now.

4097. In a very poor district like West Ham, where there is possibly at all times a considerable amount of indigence, I assume that the tendency of the average elector would be, on account of his condition, to elect guardians who would be favourable to rather a generous policy ?—Naturally that is so.

4098. So that you have there two contributing causes—in the first place, you have the natural poverty of the neighbourhood, and in the second place, as a consequence, the tendency of the electorate to return guardians who would be liberal in dealing with the district ?—That is so.

4099. Have you any difficulties in getting boards of guardians like West Ham to accept your advice or to be guided by your suggestions ?—I may say that they listen to my advice and promise consideration; but they do not necessarily follow it. I frequently find, not only in West Ham, but in other districts, that individuals will agree with me in what I think, but collectively they prefer their own methods to mine.

Mr. Henry Lockwood.

19 Feb. 1906

4100. Is the public opinion of the locality in favour now of rather a lax administration?—Speaking of West Ham, I think it is a not uncommon story that, when the cost of pauper relief has risen to a very considerable extent, then those who have to pay for it are aroused to a sense of the desirability of some reform; and I think that is beginning to make itself apparent in West Ham.

4101. Let us assume some change is necessary; are there the elements in West Ham which would be strong enough to carry out that change if the district were left to itself?—I should almost think there would be. I think already they have a leavening on the board of people who desire to restrict out-relief and to be more generally discriminating in its administration; but of course at the present moment it is a very difficult thing for anyone to inaugurate reforms there, because there is no doubt a considerable amount of genuine distress owing to the lack of employment.

Other places similarly situated to West Ham.

4102. I take it that the difficulties which have to be faced in West Ham would also be found in places like Tottenham and Edmonton?—I think so.

4103. I suppose we may assume that they are largely due to the fact that they are, so to say, limbs of the metropolis in which a very small proportion of the population are well-to-do people of independent means?—That is so. Both in Poplar and in West Ham it is almost impossible to get accurate statistics, but I imagine there is a larger proportion in both those unions of people whose work is in its very nature casual and intermittent, than probably in any other two areas in my district. The work at the docks is, I believe, in its very essence casual. It depends on the ships that may be there, and so on, and as far as I know the dock companies cannot take on a certain number of men and say, we will give you settled employment for three months, or whatever it may be; it all depends on what work there is to be done.

Casual labour in London.

4104. We hear much of the great amount of casual labour in the metropolis; what forms of work would you classify as casual labour, other than that connected with the docks?—I should say that a great deal of the labour that is employed by borough councils is casual labour. No doubt they have a certain staff permanently employed, but they probably call in to assist their regular staff men who take on jobs when they can get them, and who are not permanently employed.

4105. Is there a large amount of casual labour floating about London in consequence of London having a very great residential well-to-do population?—I think there is no doubt whatever of that.

4106. This sort of labour would, I assume, tend to congregate near to London, where houses were comparatively cheap and where there was a rapid communication between the locality and London?—That would be so. The very fact that London continues to increase in every direction continues to attract a certain number of the class who are known as bricklayers' labourers and so on; and I imagine that very few of those who come to work in London, having once got there, do otherwise than remain.

Difficulties of aggregation round London of large impoverished communities.

4107. Would you say that the creation and development of these large and somewhat exceptionally poor communities outside London is one of the special difficulties in the administration of the Poor Law?—Yes. You may take it that what may be called the marginal unions and parishes in London have an increasing population of greater or less poverty, as the case may be, whereas in the unions and parishes in the centre of London the population, if it does not actually diminish, is stationary, and consequently they have less difficulty in administering the Poor Law. That circumstance shows that figures do not necessarily accurately represent the facts, because in a return which I think Mr. Davy handed in, you will see that the proportion of pauperism to population in the City of London is higher than in any other area in the metropolis; that is because of the small number of the sleeping population. I think the Strand comes next in that respect. They both happen to be unions in the inner circle of the metropolis, with an increasing rateable value, and a population which is either stationary or diminishing.

4108. There are certain parts of London where out-door relief has gone up very much of late, are there not?—Yes. There has been a very considerable increase of relief, for instance, in Poplar.

Increase of out-relief in various part of London

4109. And in other parts of London, too?—Yes. I have a return here for the week ending 3rd February. The total number of persons relieved in the parish of Paddington, both in-door and out-door, was for that week 2,432, as compared with 1,808 in the corresponding period of last year. I expect you will find that the whole of the increase is accounted for by the opening of the labour yard; they have stone-breaking, wood-chopping, and so on there. Assuming there are 200 men in the labour yard, you have generally to multiply that by five for their wives and families, and I think you will find that that will probably account for the increase in Paddington, which we may hope will be temporary.

4110. Are there any other illustrations you would like to give us?—Fulham may be regarded as exemplary, inasmuch as it is one of the few parishes showing a diminution, their total for the week ending 3rd February being 1,820 as compared with 2,122 last year. It is the same with St. George's, the figures being 3,648 this year as compared with 4,012 last year. My own parish, St. Pancras, I see shows a slight increase, namely, 5,924 as against 5,873.

4111. (Mr. Booth.) What exactly are the periods compared in those figures?—I am quoting from a return of the number of paupers in London, excluding lunatics in county and borough asylums, registered hospitals, and licensed houses, and patients in the fever and smallpox hospitals under the management of the Metropolitan Asylums Board, on Saturday, 3rd February, 1906, as compared with the total number of paupers of the same class on the corresponding day in 1905. The return says these figures are for the Saturday, but as a matter of fact they are made up on the Friday night. Going down the districts, in the western district you will see there is an increase, while in the northern district there happens to be a slight decrease; then in the central district there is an increase, and also in the eastern district (but not so large as it has been); and for the southern district there is a slight decrease. Poplar, I am sorry to see, has begun to go up again; for three weeks there was a diminution, not only in the numbers week by week, but as compared with the corresponding period last year; this return shows that there are now 400 more of them.

Ratio of in-door to out-door paupers in Poplar and elsewhere.

4112 (Chairman.) Just taking Poplar as an instance, what is the number of out-door paupers there as compared with the number of in-door paupers?—There were 3,800 in-door paupers and 7,000 out-door paupers on 3rd February.

4113. That reverses the condition which generally prevails throughout London, where the in-door paupers are double in number those receiving out-door relief, does it not?—Yes. In the great majority of cases in London the in-door numbers exceed the out-door numbers. I do not know whether this would be an opportune time for mentioning it, but it has been suggested, I know, that the practice prevailing in Poplar is calculated to induce people to flock into the district in order to participate in the relief. I have here a return on that point which is not, so to say, up-to-date, as it relates to as long ago as September. The guardians required a return to be got out of those whose families were chargeable to the union on out-door relief during the week ending 30th September, and it works out as follows:—Under one year's residence in the parish, 27 families; under two years' residence, 80 families; under three years' residence, 112 families; under four years' residence, 77 families; under five years' residence, 188 families; under ten years' residence, 511 families: under twenty years' residence, 774 families; under thirty years' residence, 550 families; under forty years' residence, 355 families; under fifty years' residence, 127 families; fifty years' residence and over, 229 families.

Return as to alleged attraction of poor population by la administration in Poplar 4114. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) How was this return tested; was it just made out from these people's own statements?—I do not know; the clerk of the guardians gave it to me.

4115. (Mr. Lansbury.) May I say that the information was very carefully tested?—Of course I will take that from you.

4116. (Chairman.) The return shows the number of families who were in receipt of relief and the duration of their stay in the borough?—Yes. The point of the return is this—and I am assuming of course that it fairly represents the facts—that out of the total of 3,028 families there were only twenty-seven who had been under one year in the union.

4117. (Mr. Nunn.) What would be the general conclusion that you draw from that table?—That though possibly the system may induce persons to remain in the union, so far as it goes it does not indicate any general rush into the union to participate in the relief given, as I think.

4118. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Do they remove from Poplar under the Poor Law Removal Act?—Yes; they have now a special Settlement Committee, which meets every week I think.

4119. (Dr. Downes.) Taking that figure which you have just given us of 774 families who had resided you said under twenty years in the union, do you mean that they had resided over ten and under twenty years?—I am afraid I cannot tell you. I read the document as I received it, and in the document it is stated simply as "under twenty." I presume that would include in some cases a residence of eleven years, say. I think you may take it all the way through that it is between the two periods, really.

History of Poplar labour colony at Laindon.

4120. (Chairman.) You can give us some information concerning the Poplar farm colony, can you not?—As regards the Laindon colony, for many years past each recurring winter, as most of us know, we have heard the cry of distress through want of employment, and concurrently with that, there have been a number of remedies suggested, but the one more persistently suggested perhaps than any other is summed up under the sentence "Back to the land." Finding that Mr. Fels had offered the Poplar Guardians the use of a farm on what appeared to me to be advantageous terms, that is to say, they did not require any immediate outlay for the site—I thought this was a good opportunity to see whether anything could be done in the direction of getting paupers, or, as we call them, "poor persons," back to the land. On one day in November, 1903, I think it was the 12th, I, Mr. Fels, Mr. Lansbury and one or two other guardians went down to see the farm. The farm is of about 105 acres, and it was then about one-third grass, the rest having been arable, but it was practically derelict. The soil varies from a lightish loam to the very stiffest clay you can conceive. Having seen the farm, and having ascertained what the guardians proposed to do, I thought it was desirable to advise my Board to approve of the experiment. I may say that one thing we found, which is common to many farms in Essex, was that there was a very inadequate water supply. On the farm were certain substantial buildings, such as a very good barn, cow-houses, stables, and the house in which the farmer then lived, which was partly of brick and partly of wood. His wife, who naturally, as far as I could understand, was not very keen about leaving the place, was disposed to give us not the most encouraging account of things generally, and particularly of the water supply. As a matter of fact, there was only a shallow well, and of course what would suit a small family on a farm would not be sufficient for 100 men, we will say. There was the question, how the water should be provided. I said, somewhat rashly perhaps, "We will at all events try and get this farm into the possession of the guardians." I really forget whether I suggested it, or whether it occurred to somebody else at the time, but any way it was decided that by way of supplying themselves with water they should build a dam at the part of the farm which adjoins the railway under which a culvert ran from I think, two or three converging ditches. The erection of this dam provided a good deal of work for the 100 men who were first sent down. I forget exactly when, but in the spring time of 1904, 100 men were sent down to Laindon and were employed in various ways—as I say, a good many of them in making up this dam and a good many others in digging over that part of the land which was suitable for the purpose, but which at the time was over-run with squitch and so on. When exactly it took place I am not sure, but later on they sent down an additional 50 men. The men were housed in iron buildings, which it happened the guardians were able to procure at a reasonable price; one, I think, was on the site of the Poplar and Stepney Asylum, and another happened to be at the time in one of the Government Offices' yards here. By the assistance of Humphreys & Co. we were able to erect buildings sufficient to accommodate 100 men and provide them with day-room accommodation and cooking accommodation also. So they started. Later on, as I say, they sent down fifty men who were being relieved under what is known as the Modified Workhouse Test Order. These men were for the most part housed in the original barn, which was made, in my opinion, quite suitable for that purpose. In May, 1905, twenty of the men left England for Canada. Of course they may come back, but up to the present time as far as I know none has returned. I want to make it clear that the 100 men who were sent down originally were gravitating for the most part into the condition of what is called, "Ins-and-outs." I am prepared to contend that in my opinion, having disposed so far as we know up to date satisfactorily of 20 per cent. of a group of workhouse Ins-and-outs, that is quite sufficient in itself to justify the enterprise as an experiment. It has been suggested to me that they might just as well have walked into Poplar Workhouse and taken the men to Canada out of that, instead of going to the expense of having a farm. I cannot agree to that. My own conviction is that the work they had to do, the air and other things combined, did put into them a certain amount of physical and moral backbone which I feel perfectly satisfied they never could have acquired had they remained in the Poplar Workhouse. So far is good. When we get further I shall have to relate what to me was a most painful experience, and it was disheartening to my mind to the last degree. The guardians were in communication with a man at Evesham—I do not know whether he would object to my using his name, but we will call him Mr. I——who has considerable market gardens in the neighbourhood. He said he would be willing to take half-a-dozen men, selected by the guardians, whom he would be prepared to put to work, and, if they turned out satisfactorily, to permanently employ. They sent six men down, and I confess when I heard that this was going to take place I was very much interested in it and I thought it was, perhaps, the most hopeful thing of the whole scheme. I regret to say that within three or four months all the six men had returned to Poplar. Since they have returned to Poplar, the guardians have dealt with them in a very drastic fashion—I do not know whether it is strictly legal, but I am bound to say that I have considerable sympathy with them; they have absolutely refused them relief of any sort or kind. However, unfortunate as this is it has this advantage, that it teaches us something; that is, that if you are to endeavour to get that class of men back into settled employment on the land, it is necessary to deal with them individually. I say this, because I have read a very interesting Report by one of the guardians on the history of these six men. I am open to correction, but I gathered from that Report that they purposely sent six men down together, because they thought they would feel less strange in a strange village and that companionship might be helpful. It seems that this association, to some degree at all events, led to their general dissatisfaction and ultimate return. I believe their employer said that while they were at work he had nothing to find fault with them as to their capacity for work and so on; but, unfortunately, they no sooner had money in their pockets than they spent it in a way which resulted in their not being as punctual at their work as they ought to have been, and in other ways behaving in an unsatisfactory manner. So as I say, unsatisfactory and disheartening as the experience is, we may learn something from it, as indicating, as has been said more than once, how necessary it is to deal with men of this class individually as far as possible. It further justifies what the Superintendent of the farm said to me when they were first deciding what should be done with the men. He said: "If you are to deal with these men at all it is absolutely necessary to so arrange that they shall be sent somewhere entirely away from their old surroundings; if you do not do that, they will never be able to resist the temptation of reverting to their old habits." One other lesson we have learned and a useful one, as I think, from the farm colony, is that it is quite possible to adequately provide accommodation for healthy, able-bodied men at a cost that works out, I think, to under £14 per bed, instead of spending £140, which is the very least that you can provide a bed at for able-bodied men in workhouses in London. So we have two useful lessons from the Poplar experiment. It is true that they have now down there a certain number of men who have been in receipt of relief in some way or other for some considerable time, and it is difficult to say what can best be done for those men. All that can be said is that at all events they have a better chance, as I think, of reclamation by working at Laindon than they would have had if they had remained in the workhouse at Poplar.

4121. Is the farm colony still going?—Yes.

4122. How long were the men there before they went to Canada?—I think they were there about a year. I believe the majority of them went down in the Spring of 1904 or a little later, and I think they started for Canada under the auspices of the Salvation Army in May, 1905.

4123. Is Laindon the only farm colony connected with the unions of London?—It is the only farm colony that has been attempted so far. Perhaps I ought to say with regard to the dam that it resulted most satisfactorily. They have got a very large tank—I forget how many thousands of gallons it holds—but as a matter of fact they have had a quite adequate supply of water the whole time for 150 men. I should like to emphasise that point about the possibility, as demonstrated by the Laindon farm experiment, of providing quite sufficiently for able-bodied men at a tenth the cost which has ordinarily been found necessary.

Question of dietary at Laindon.

4124. I think your next point is that there is no simple method of checking an extravagant dietary?—Yes. I am quite prepared to take all my share of the responsibility for the dietary at Laindon when it was first started. It has been said that men were bribed to go down to Laindon, because they were going to get such excellent and luxurious food. I was aware of the fact that this dietary was in existence, but the last thing I wished to do at the time was anything which would in any way interfere with the experiment as such, and so it started. As an illustration of how difficult it is when a board of guardians have made up their minds in a certain direction to bring about any alteration, I may mention that there has been a correspondence with regard to this dietary which is not completed now; since February, 1905, there have been letters passing between the Local Government Board and the board of guardians, and when in April the guardians wrote defending their dietary, they were supported, we were told, by the medical officer, who attended the colony, who said that he thought this excessive dietary, as it was considered, was no more than was necessary or reasonable for men working hard, as these men were, in the keen air of Essex. In the meantime I had on two occasions discussed the question with the guardians and the Farm Committee, and, as I think I said just now, I found that individuals agreed with me that they might alter the dietary without doing any particular harm to the men, but that collectively they thought it best to hold to the dietary as it was. I may say, as regards the dietary, that there were certain things that particularly took the public eye. In articles that have been written on the subject in the Press, they have talked about jam and eggs, and have wanted to know what men like those wanted with jam and eggs. It is not for me to say what the nutritive quality of jam as compared with butter or margarine may be, but certainly it is a great deal cheaper. I discovered that only the other day when travelling up from Limehouse with a boy who had been selling newspapers. He told me his mother, his sister, and himself lived together on about 18s. a week. I was returning, as it happens, from the Poplar Workhouse Committee, and I thought I would ascertain something from him about butter. So I asked him: What butter do you eat, or do you eat margarine?—He says, "We don't have no butter at all. We have jam; jam is much cheaper and there is more goodness in it than ever is in butter." I find as a matter of fact, that you can buy very good jam at a price which works out at 4½d. per lb., whereas I believe the cheapest margarine is 6d. To return to the dietary, I have had three discussions on the subject with the Guardians, and I am free to confess to failure to convince them as to the desirability of an alteration. My colleague, Dr. Downes, has recently had an interview with them, and I am inclined to think that probably he will prove successful where I have failed, because he was able to produce a very cogent argument in his own person, as one who for a month had subsisted on food costing him 2½d. a day, without any appreciable harm.

4125. Is the dietary still in force?—Yes, but it has been modified somewhat from its original luxury, as I will call it.

Excess cost of Laindon dietary.

4126. Does it cost the ratepayer much more than the ordinary fare?—It does. The auditor reported that £300 worth of material had been supplied to the inmates or the colonists more than was provided for in the order.

4127. Did the auditor surcharge that?—No, he did not; he reported it. The Board wrote to tell them that under the circumstances, in order to avoid a disallowance they would sanction this excess, but on the understanding that the board of guardians would, with the least possible delay, provide a dietary which should be within the four corners of the order. But I confess, assuming that the auditor later on find it necessary to disallow and surcharge, that I do not know precisely whom he will surcharge. I can only suppose that he will surcharge the superintendent of the branch workhouse for having supplied these goods which were outside the order; but supposing that is the only way, I think it is rather unfair on the superintendent, who cannot very well do otherwise than carry out the instructions he receives from his board. I believe the guardians might be got at, if a resolution were passed determining to continue the dietary which they have been told is not provided for in the order, and that possibly the persons who voted for that resolution might be surcharged with the amount.

General success of Dietaries Order, 1900.

4128. Is this the only case of the kind that you know of?—With regard to the dietary, yes; this is the only case in my experience that we have had any trouble with. The fact is that the new dietary order contains such an enormous number of alternative meals that guardians as a rule, have found no difficulty in providing a dietary suitable for the inmates of their workhouse or other institutions, as the case may be.

4129. And at a moderate cost?—Yes.

Pros and cons of compounding for rates.

4130. I think you wish to say something to us about compounding for rates?—I am afraid I cannot say very much about that. It is a matter that does not ordinarily come within my purview, but I have made inquiries on the subject, and the conclusion that I have arrived at so far, is that the rating authority has to determine by which system it will be likely to recover the larger percentage of its rates. I am speaking here of a subject that I do not pretend to have mastered, and it is only what I have gathered from two or three members of borough councils who know something about the rating in their various areas. It comes to this, that they have to calculate whether it is better to collect from the owner, and pay him or give him a rebate in consideration of the trouble he saves them in making himself responsible for the rates of his property, whether occupied or not; or whether they will increase their staff to an extent which will enable them to collect directly from the tenants themselves. In the latter case, I have no doubt that they will probably miss a good many, because, where you have weekly tenants, it would be almost impossible for collectors to find a large percentage of them at home, say, on the day when they went to collect the rates.

4131. They have only looked at the matter from the point of convenience, and in order to see what the financial effects would be?—Yes.

4132. Have they considered it from the other point, of its effects on the ratepayer?—I think not. I think everybody admits that it would be exceedingly desirable that all persons who have to pay rates, should so pay them that they would have some knowledge of how the rates were going. I have heard two views expressed with regard to compounding. A person who perhaps may be himself an owner of property of this sort will say that in making himself responsible for his property, whether occupied or not, 25 per cent. is not at all an unreasonable rebate, and, as a matter of fact, the tenants, if he raises their rents, know from him that the reason is that the rates have gone up. On the other hand, we hear it said that if the rates go up 2d., the landlord puts his tenants' rents up 6d. in order to cover that rise.

Proposed extension of scope of Metropolitan Common Poor Fund.

4133. We have had a good deal of evidence about the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund; are you in favour of extending its operations?—I may say at once that a return which was made out at the instance of the keeper of the Common Poor Fund (a copy of which was, I think, furnished to you by Mr. Davy) seems to me to be conclusive against its being extended to cover out-door relief.

Effect of administration on on pauperism.

4134. Have you anything to add to what you have already said with regard to the effect of administration on pauperism?—No, except that certainly administration has a very considerable deal to do with the amount of the cost of relief—out-door relief particularly.

4135. Putting it the other way, where there has been strict administration in giving relief, have you noticed any untoward consequences?—No, I cannot say I have.

Co-relation between out-door and in-door relief.

4136. Now we come to your next point; an increase of out-door relief in your judgment, I believe, leads to an increase of in-door relief?—Yes, and I have referred to that in one of my reports. It is certainly a mistake to suppose that you will diminish the numbers or the cost of in-door relief by embarking on what one may call a determined out-relief policy; in my experience the tendency is rather the other way.

4137. In close connection with out-door relief is the question of medical relief; on that have you any opinions to express to us?—I am rather sorry now that I mentioned that in my précis, because it is really a fait accompli. I see that there are proposals now likely to be brought forward to increase the numbers of persons who will be entitled to relief without disfranchisement.

Medical relief as an inducement to pauperism.

4138. In what quarters are those proposals brought forward?—I see from to-day's papers it is intended that legislation, if necessary, is to be proposed, whereby all children attending school are to have medical assistance free of charge. On the question of putting medical relief into a different category to that of ordinary relief, I think everybody who has watched the administration of the Poor Law—and I am thinking more particularly of the country now than of London—knows that the application for medical relief is very often the first step which familiarises the applicant with that sort of dependence which everybody desires should be avoided as far as possible.

4139. May I assume that the thread by which people are drawn into becoming in-door paupers is, first, medical relief, and then out-door relief, and that the increase of the first leads to an increase of the second, and, in your judgment, to an increase of the third?—I accept that. I think you may put it in that way.

Fittings of Poor Law infirmaries.

4140. Have you anything to say as regards the fittings and establishment of Poor Law infirmaries?—Yes. In my reports I have said that the arrangements for the medical attendance and the nursing and the surroundings generally of a Poor Law infirmary are as good as in many, if not most, of the public hospitals. There has no doubt been a tendency of late years, particularly where, as in many cases, the infirmary is entirely separate from the workhouse, to dissociate relief in the infirmary from all connection with Poor Law relief. Although strictly speaking, in-door medical relief disfranchises—or I thought it did—equally with relief in the workhouse, it seems, from information I have had recently, that whether or no relief in an infirmary should disfranchise, depends a good deal upon the view taken by the revising barrister for the time being. No doubt there are instances in which the revising barrister has allowed the vote of a person who was actually receiving medical relief in the infirmary.

Revising barristers' divergent views as to disfranchisement by medical relief.

4141. I understand you are in favour of classification, but that your idea is that classification should be by institutions and not within the institutions themselves?—I think in reply to that, it would be sufficient for me to refer you to what I have said in my reports, extracts from which I put in (see Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. VII. (A).)

Proposed classification of institutions in London.

4142. Assuming that your idea of classification by institutions were to be adopted, would it not be necessary in London to increase the unit of area?—Not necessarily, I think. My idea would be that in any new scheme for classification you should provide, what certainly does not exist now, suitably equipped institutions, to which you would send the so-called able-bodied, and that in those institutions means should be provided for what I may call graduated tasks of work.

4143. Assuming the unions were to remain of the same size as they are now, would that not necessitate in certain unions the erection of fresh buildings?—Yes.

Instances in London of workhouses for more than one union.

4144. Whereas if you combine two or three unions, they would in the aggregate have enough buildings?—Certainly; and that would be my idea. There is a scheme on foot now promoted by the St. Olave's guardians for accommodation of that sort. My idea originally was that there might be, we will say, three workhouses of that sort, providing two for the south of London and one for the east and north-east, and that they would be jointly managed by the guardians who would be sending paupers to them. I am bound to say that my experience of combinations of that sort has not been a very happy one, that a single board will, as a rule, manage their affairs better than a joint board. I may say that I had almost achieved what I desired as an experiment some years ago, when the Hackney Guardians were about to build their new workhouse. I got them to promise that they would provide something rather more than they would want for their own particular needs, with a view to their receiving from the other unions paupers of that class, just as the Kensington test workhouse, as it was called, used to receive cases. But unfortunately it fell through. They found that it would cost them a good deal too much money, and so it has never taken place. I think that probably the only way in which provision for the able-bodied of that sort could be made would be by a combination or grouping of unions and parishes together.

Proportion of genuinely "able-bodied" paupers.

4145. I think you do not quite agree with the existing definition of "able-bodied"?—I do not object to it, because I think perhaps it is desirable that it should be retained, but I think that to the ordinary public it is misleading. I have not had occasion to get particulars recently, but it is conceivable that at present we might here and there find in workhouses a larger percentage than usual of really able-bodied men, because of the fact that there is a good deal of genuine difficulty in getting employment in London. On all ordinary occasions I believe that my estimated percentage of the actually able-bodied amongst those classed as able-bodied is not too low.

4146. And that percentage is what?—That is about 5 per cent.

4147. That is to say, only 5 per cent. of those returned as able-bodied are in your judgment really able-bodied?—Yes. I am basing this view on my experience of what number of the able-bodied class the medical officers of workhouses in London would agree to certify, as men to go to the Kensington test workhouse where they had only one task, breaking stones, for instance. I take it that a man to break stones must be able-bodied.

Children comprised in statistics as to "able-bodied."

4148. Is it not the case that in the statistics of out-door relief an able-bodied man's children count as able-bodied?—Yes.

4149. But in the statistics of in-door relief they would be classified separately?—Yes.

4150. So that your 5 per cent. is the actual number of able-bodied individuals in the class?—Yes. With regard to the nature of the task, my own conviction is that you do not require a very severe task for dealing with the class of person whom you wish to protect against himself. All you want is something which will keep him continually employed.

Return as to ins-and-outs in certain London unions.

4151. I think now you have a return of the in-and-out paupers that you wish to hand in?—Yes. I have here three lists relating to Poplar, the City of London, and Kensington, of persons who may be fairly called In-and-out paupers, because they are persons who the guardians have by resolution declared shall give 168 hours' notice before they are allowed to leave the workhouse. The return which I have for the City of London is a comparatively old return, inasmuch as it relates to 1901. To show that Ins-and-outs are not all necessarily young and able-bodied people, I might mention that this list for the City of London contains the names of persons aged respectively 68, 38, 66, 66, 69, 55, 71, 66, 57, 66, 66, 54, 72, 72, 41, 81, 64, 66, 58, 77, 74, 69, 33, 53, 67 and 28. The poor person who was 81 was Julia Blumsun; she is since deceased, but in that one year she had been in-and-out 163 times. Out of the number on this return I think only five were under 50 years of age. The Poplar returns show a somewhat younger set of people. The following are the ages of the men in the Poplar Workhouse this month, who are required to give 168 hours' notice prior to discharge: 40, 49, 58, 41, 39, 46, 58, 54, 55, 56, 34, 24, 48, 38, 53, 58, 23, 55, 34, 49, 24 and 43. The one who was aged 40 has been in the house since 1884, and in the course of that time he has been in-and-out 593 times. The third return that I have is from Kensington, and on that list the youngest is 47 years of age and the oldest is 79, and she is a woman who has been in-and-out twelve times during the year ended Midsummer, 1905.

Case of chronic "in-and-out" pensioner pauper at Kensington.

4152. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) Have you got any other In-and-out return?—Those are the only ones I have, but if you give me time I could get returns from every one of the workhouses and will put in a Summary.* Might I before leaving this subject mention a case which is certainly not singular, though I do not say it is typical. It is the case of a man whose initials are C. D. He is a pensioner in receipt of 12s. 10d. a week. He is a Roman Catholic and has two children, and he or his children have been in-and-out of the Kensington workhouse eight times since the 5th August. As his children are Catholics they have to be sent to the Roman Catholic schools, and the cost of sending them and fetching them to and from the schools on the several occasions has amounted to £4 8s. 1½d. There are not a few cases of that sort where men trade upon the condition of things in this way—they come in-and-out practically as they like, and give an immense deal of trouble, and cause a great deal of expense to the particular union or parish in which they happen to be settled.

4153. (Chairman.) That man you say is in receipt of a pension?—He is in receipt of a pension of 12s. 10d. I may say that I suggested to the clerk that, inasmuch as in other cases they have attached the pension—and they do attach a portion of this man's pension—the question was whether they ought not in the interests of the children to adopt them under the recent Act; but I gathered from him that they had at present not sufficient evidence before them, in their opinion, to justify them in doing it.

4154. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Is he able-bodied?—Yes.

4155. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) Is he a widower?—No, he is not a widower. His wife is living, but apart.

4156. (Mr. Bentham.) Did she leave the children in his care?—I do not know the particulars, but she left him, and the children have been with him since.

4157. (Chairman.) If you could find us three or four more such cases it would be very instructive?—I will endeavour to do so.†

Departments of Local Government Board dealing with audit questions.

4158. (Chairman.) We are anxious to have some evidence as regards the supervision of the audit of Poor Law accounts; I understand that you have the general superintendence of the departments which deal with matters arising out of the audit of those accounts?—Yes. This business forms part of the work of two separate departments of the Local Government Board. I say it is part of their work, because the business is not confined to the accounts of Poor Law authorities, but extends to the accounts of all other authorities under audit by the district auditors appointed by the Local Government Board.

4159. I suppose in certain cases that that includes municipal accounts?—It includes the accounts of boroughs under the Education Acts in all cases, and in a few cases it includes all the accounts of a municipal corporation.

4160. Perhaps you will explain shortly what is the nature of the business of each of these two departments?—Generally speaking, one of them deals with the auditors' reports as to the manner in which the accounts are kept and as to irregularities on the part of the accounting officers. It also deals with all questions as to the form in which the acounts are or should be kept, and further, it checks the work of the auditors, so as to secure that all accounts are duly audited at the proper time. The other department conducts the correspondence as to the appeals to the Board against disallowances or surcharges and allowances by the auditors in the accounts audited; it also deals with applications under the Local Authorities (Expenses) Act, 1887, for the sanction of the Board to expenditure, so that it may not be disallowed by the auditor at the audit. That, briefly, is a statement of the respective duties of the two departments I have referred to.

Return of number of disallowances and surcharges made by auditors.

4161. Do the auditors make many disallowances or surcharges in the accounts of Poor Law officers?—I have had a statement prepared on that subject, relating to three years. It gives the number of disallowances and surcharges in the accounts of the Boards of Guardians and their officers. I find that last year the auditors disallowed or surcharged 432 items in these accounts, 230 of them being in the accounts of officers; in the year 1904, there were 555 such items, of which 296 were in the accounts of officers; and, going back ten years, to 1894, in that year the number of items disallowed or surcharged

* Summary subsequently sent. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. VII. (C).)

† Mr. Lockwood in a subsequent communication stated that "further inquiry, I am glad to say, has not furnished any other cases of pensioner 'Ins-and-Outs' with families."

was 427, and 256 of those were in the accounts of officers. The number does not seem very large when one considers that there are upwards of 650 unions, and that the number of accounting officers is probably over 4,000.

ifference tween dis- owance d - charge.

4162. What is the technical difference between a disallowance and a surcharge?—A disallowance is the striking out of an illegal item, or of expenditure that has been incurred without proper authority. A surcharge is the charging of a certain person with an amount that has been disallowed, or an amount that has been lost through his negligence or misconduct, such as failure to collect a sum that was due.

4163. If a sum is disallowed, somebody has to pay it?—Usually, that is so. The disallowance would be followed by a surcharge in the case of an illegal payment having been authorised by a member or members of a local authority.

e sequelæ a disallow- ce.

4164. But a disallowance is not always followed by a surcharge is it?—Not always. I may give one instance. It is not followed by a surcharge in the case of an officer's account, as the effect of disallowing a payment is to increase the balance against the officer; in other words, the effect of striking out an item of payment entered in the account increases the balance which is due from the officer. The term "surcharge" is not applied to a case like that.

4165. (Miss Hill.) It is practically the same thing, though done under another name?—In effect that is so; but I was asked for a definition of the technical terms, and the technical term "surcharge" does not apply in the case mentioned.

4166. (Chairman.) In the case where a disallowance takes place, and there is no surcharge, I gather that they could settle amongst themselves as to who is to pay?—There might be an appeal against such a disallowance.

4167. I am assuming that there is no appeal?—If there is no appeal, the amount has to be paid as required by statute. There are many cases in which the amount is paid—in fact it is paid in the majority of cases.

4168. (Mr. Bentham.) May not the officer continue to owe the amount until he either dies or leaves the service?—No. I will read you the statutory provision on the subject: "The person from whom any money is certified to be due shall, within seven days, pay or cause to be paid such money to the treasurer of the guardians of the union or parish."

4169. (Mr. Lansbury.) But supposing he does not pay?—Then the auditor takes proceedings to enforce payment.

4170. Against whom?—Against the person from whom the money is due.

4171. Supposing the guardians write it off?—This would be illegal. They would probably put themselves in the position of being surcharged for doing so.

4172. What would happen then?—In that case proceedings could be taken by the auditor against the guardians to enforce the surcharge.

mber and eral result ppeals to al vernment rd against litors' isions.

4173. (Chairman.) Are there many appeals against the auditor's decision?—I have taken out the figures for the same years that I mentioned just now. In respect of the disallowances or surcharges made in 1905, fifty-six appeals have been received from guardians, and a few more may come in; in 1904 there were sixty-nine appeals from guardians, and in 1894 there were fifty-eight such appeals. It will be seen from these figures that rather more than a fourth of the total number of disallowances and surcharges in the guardians' accounts were appealed against.

4174. And the appeal is to whom?—To the Local Government Board.

4175. Or to a Court, I presume?—The appeal may be to the High Court, but I am dealing now with the number of the appeals that have been made to the Local Government Board. In regard to the disallowances in the accounts of officers of the guardians, there were fifty-six appeals against last year's disallowances, and there may be a few more to come; in 1904 there were fifty-five such appeals, and in 1894, fifty-seven. These numbers amount to rather more than a fifth of the total number of these disallowances and surcharges.

4176. What was the result of those appeals?—In the great majority of cases the auditor's decision was found to be correct in point of law, but usually the Board considered that it was fair that the disallowance or surcharge should be remitted. I will read the enactment under which the Board exercise the power of remission. Sec. 4 of the Poor Law Audit Act, 1848, provides as follows:—If the Board "shall find that any disallowance or surcharge shall have been or shall be lawfully made, but that the subject matter thereof was incurred under such circumstances as make it fair and equitable that the disallowance or surcharge should be remitted, they may, direct that the same shall be remitted, upon payment of the costs, if any, which may have been incurred by the auditor or other competent authority in the enforcing of such disallowance or surcharge."

Statutory authority for Board's power to remit disallowance or surcharge on appeal.

4177. (Mr. Booth.) Are the appeals made always in the first place to the Board and only afterwards to the Court, or are they made in the first place to the Court?—It is an alternative appeal; there is not an appeal first to the Local Government Board and afterwards to the Court on the same disallowance.

Alternative appeal to High Court or Local Government Board.

4178. (Chairman.) It is not a duplicate appeal, then?—No, it is not.

4179. (Mr. Booth.) Were there many appeals to the Courts, alongside of these appeals to the Local Government Board which you have mentioned?—Speaking from memory, I should say there has not been an appeal to the Court in a case of a disallowance or surcharge in the accounts of guardians for twenty years or more. Quite recently there was an appeal raising a question with regard to the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund, but the decision of the auditor appealed against in that case was rather different in character from the decisions that I have been referring to just now.

Infrequency of appeals to High Court.

4180. (Chairman.) There is another gentleman at the Local Government Board who has to do with audits, and who, I understand, is Inspector of Audits, namely, Mr. Burd?—Yes.

Functions of Inspector of Audits.

4181. Where do his duties end and yours begin? Can you draw a line between the two?—He superintends the actual work of the auditors in examining the accounts. One of his duties is to visit the auditors at their work; he goes to all parts of the country and sees the actual work of audit in progress.

4182. He is therefore responsible, I suppose, for the decisions that are made?—No.

4183. Is it only the auditor who is responsible for the decisions at the audit?—Yes.

4184. Does the appeal come up through the Inspector of Audits?—No

4185. Does it come to you?—It is addressed to the Local Government Board, and is dealt with, as I have said, in one of the departments which are under my supervision.

4186. I take it that the inspector is really what I may call the chief executive officer of the Audit Staff and you are the officer of the Local Government Board to whom the appeals come?—The reports of the auditors also come to me through one of the departments referred to. Mr. Burd superintends the staff of auditors, but not the work of these departments.

4187. Therefore, as regards the actual working of the audit, Mr. Burd will be able to give us more direct evidence than you can?—As to the actual working of the audit on the spot, certainly.

4188. You have told us that in certain cases the surcharges and disallowances are remitted; do the sums that are surcharged or disallowed vary very much?—Yes; they range from very small sums to rather large sums.

Variations in amount of items disallowed or surcharged.

4189. It is very difficult, I suppose, to enforce a surcharge if the sum involved is of great amount?—The Board have declined to remit in some cases where large sums have been in question. I might mention a recent case; I think one example will be sufficient to illustrate what I mean. The guardians of the Oldham union incurred law expenses amounting to over £500 in resisting actions brought against them by collectors of poor rates for their salaries as approved by the Local Government Board, which the guardians had refused to pay. The auditor surcharged the amount of those costs to the guardians on the ground that the actions were improperly defended ; the Board upheld the surcharge and refused to remit it. The guardians, therefore, in that case had to find the money, amounting to something over £500.

Refusal to remit disallowance in Oldham case.

Source from which surcharge paid.

4190. Did they have to find it individually among themselves ?—How they found it I do not know, but they had to pay it.

4191. Was it paid out of the rates ?—No. They would have no right to do that.

Persons against whom surcharge can be made and questions arising from practice followed.

4192. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Whom do they surcharge ; is it the whole of the guardians, or only those who sign the cheque for the improper payment ?—I have not a note of the course that the auditor took in that particular case, but I have an impression that he surcharged all the guardians who were responsible for the payment that was made.

4193. Would that be the case in the event of payment having been made by a cheque signed by two of the guardians and the clerk ?—Usually in a case like that the auditor surcharges those members of the authority who signed the cheque. But he is not limited to that procedure ; he may select any members of the authority who have been responsible for the payment—who either have directed the payment or authorised it—and surcharge them.

4194. Then in the case I put, the two who signed the cheque and the clerk would be liable in the first instance ? —Not the clerk.

4195. Is he, being an officer, specially exempt ?—Yes.

4196. Could the two who signed the cheque in that event have recourse against the whole of the guardians, or how is it worked out ?—That is a point that does not come before the Local Government Board. I am not prepared to express an opinion on the question whether there is a legal remedy against the rest of the guardians 4197. Has there been any complaint by those guardians who have signed cheques merely as a matter of machinery to carry out the resolution of the board of guardians to make a certain payment ? Has there been no protest, if they were the people who were found liable ? —I have heard of complaints of that kind being made.

4198. But you do not know with what result ?—We do not know how they adjust matters in a case of that sort. An intimation has been given to the auditors that so far as practicable, they are to avoid any cause of complaint of that kind by selecting as large a number of guardians to surcharge as they can.

4199. Has the question of the liability of the whole board of guardians for the action of the two who formally signed the cheque never been settled ?—It has not come before the Local Government Board to be settled, so far as I am aware.

4200. (Mr. Nunn.) Does not a greater responsibility rest on those who vote in favour of such a resolution, than on those who may have voted against it ? Supposing one member had voted against the illegal expenditure, would he not be less responsible than those who had voted in favour of it ?—Before making a surcharge the auditor gives notice to the persons whom he proposes to surcharge, and those persons can attend the audit and show cause against being surcharged.

Notice of surcharge to persons concerned.

4201. Would that be a valid cause ?—I should say that an auditor who had before him a guardian who showed that he had objected to the payment being made, would probably not surcharge that person.

4202. (Sir Samuel Provis.) He would not be responsible because he would not have authorised the payment ; would that not be so ?—Yes, but there have been cases where a guardian has said that he signed the cheque by inadvertence, and that he had been opposed to the expenditure. I understood the question to relate to such a case.

Liability of guardian who had not voted for the payment disallowed.

4203. Mr. Nunn's point is that, where a payment is proposed to be made and a guardian votes against it, therefore, he did not authorise that payment, because he voted against its being made ; in that case he would not be surcharged, would he ?—Not if he had not signed the cheque.

4204. (Mr. Nunn.) I would put it, even although as a matter of routine he had been one of the guardians who signed the cheque ?—I thought that was the point in your mind. I answered the question on that assumption.

Auditor's procedure hearing cause against disallowance or surcharge.

4205. (Mr. Lansbury.) Is it not the fact that on these appeals to the auditor, the auditor simply does not hear anything, that is to say, it is only a matter of form to appeal to the auditor ? The auditor sends out a notice, and says, if you want to appeal against it, you can appear before me on such and such a day ; but is it not the fact that he simply does not hear what the people say ? He tells them, I think, so and so, and there is an end of it. He has surcharged, and no matter what they say, that is his decision ?—I should be surprised to hear that that was so ; but as I have already intimated, I do not attend the audits, and therefore, I do not exactly know what takes place at them.

4206. (Chairman.) Mr. Burd could explain to us the actual working of the audit, and what is done at the audit ?—Yes ; he could tell you what the auditor does during the course of the audit.

Auditor's duty as to contracts.

4207. Perhaps you could answer this one question : Do the auditors look into contracts ?—It is part of their duty to do so.

Limited powers of High Court on appeal against auditor's decisions.

4208. If an appeal is made to a court of law, I suppose the question simply is whether or not the action taken by the auditor is legal ?—Yes ; the court has power to determine the question of legality.

4209. Has it no power of remission ?—It has no power of remission.

Auditor's practice as regards contracts.

4210. (Mr. Gardiner.) You say that it is part of the auditor's duty to look into contracts ; would you kindly tell us a little more in detail what that means ?—I think you had better put that question to Mr. Burd when he comes to give evidence. He is in a better position than I am to inform the Commission about what takes place at the audits. I may say that it is the duty of the auditor to see that the amount that the guardians have paid is not excessive.

4211. Assuming that he discovered that an excessive price had been paid for a commodity needed for the workhouse, would he be justified in surcharging the board with having made an extravagant contract ?—If he was satisfied that the price was an excessive price, I think he would be justified in doing so.

4212. This is a most serious point. Is that often or seldom the cause of surcharge, or have you never known it done ?—Judging from the appeals I have seen, I should say that it is an objection that is not often taken.

Objections to yearly audit of guardians' accounts.

4213. (Mr. Bentham.) With regard to the keeping of accounts, the union accounts are now made up half-yearly, to March 25 and September 29 ; is there any reason why those accounts should not be brought into line with the other accounts of other local bodies which are made up to the end of March each year ?—This could not be done under the existing law. The making up of the accounts annually would increase the difficulties of the auditors in finishing their audits within a reasonable time after the end of the period for which the accounts are made up. I think that is the chief administrative objection to the suggested change from a system of half-yearly accounts to a system of yearly accounts made up to March 31.

4214. Is that purely on the ground that it would take them longer to audit the books ?—No ; it is on the ground that the auditor's whole time is taken up with the auditing of the accounts of the authorities in his district. If he has to do the work within the year and all the accounts are annual accounts, nearly a year may elapse before some of the accounts will be audited.

4215. Does that not always apply to the last half-year ? —The interval does not exceed eight or nine months at the outside, I think.

4216. If it does not take any longer to audit the accounts for a year, then they would not be longer in going round from one union to another ; so that it would not delay matters if the accounts were audited for the twelve months ending March any longer than they are delayed now when the accounts are audited for the half-year ending March?—But under the existing arrangement one half-year's accounts would have been audited in the meantime.

4217. Unless it takes longer to do the whole year, that would not make any difference; and I take it that it would not occupy much more time to audit a year's accounts than a half-year's accounts?—My point is that if you have the accounts audited for a half-year, the auditor will audit the accounts from March to September, before the end of the year, and the next audit will be of the accounts for the half-year from September to March. As you suggest, I think that there may be a delay of perhaps eight months in auditing those accounts; it may be so, but meanwhile the accounts for the first half-year will have been audited.

4218. I do not suggest that there would be any delay; I suggest that they might be made up to the end of March each year, and then there would be no more delay than there is at the present time in finally making up the books for the year?—We will assume that the accounts are all made up for a year to March 31, say, in the year 1905; the auditor has to complete the audit of those accounts before March 31, 1906. That being so, some of those accounts will remain unaudited until the latter part of March, 1906, and there will be just upon twelve months' interval between the date to which the accounts have been made up and the date on which they will be audited.

4219. Does that not apply to other local bodies—the education authorities, for instance?—It does apply to some of those whose accounts are made up annually; but it would apply, still more so, I think, if the auditor were not enabled to get on with the audit of some of the authorities' accounts in the first half-year and do half of the work then.

Probability of action being taken on report of Committee on Workhouse Accounts.

4220. (Mr. Gardiner.) I think there was a Departmental Committee on Workhouse Accounts, was there not, some three years ago?—Yes.

4221. They presented a report, did they not?—Yes.

4222. Is there any probability of that report being acted upon in any way, as regards the simplification of workhouse accounts, for example?—I think many of the officers thought the system recommended in the report would not be a simplification, and there has certainly been considerable objection to the carrying out of the recommendations of the report. At the same time, the matter has not been lost sight of, and I hope that before long, something may be done in the way of reducing the amount of book-keeping.

4223. There are a good many boards of guardians and inspectors, are there not, who recommend a simplification of some of the workhouse accounts if possible?—I think there has been reason for simplification since the issue of the Workhouse Regulation Dietaries and Accounts Order, 1900, which required the keeping of some additional books. It was intended, when that order was issued, that it should be followed by another dealing more comprehensively with the question of book-keeping.

4224. Do you anticipate that some action in that direction may be taken shortly?—I hope so.

4225. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) In England it is the auditor who has the power to surcharge, I gather?—Yes.

Power of Scottish Local Government Board to surcharge.

4226. In Scotland it is the Local Government Board who have the power to surcharge. I should like to ask you whether you know of cases where boards of guardians have resented this power which the auditor has, or whether you have found it work, in your experience, quite smoothly so far as boards of guardians are concerned?—The Local Government Board have received representations that irritation has been caused by some of the disallowances and surcharges made by the auditors.

Results and working of English system.

4227. But, on the whole, would you say that the system works well, so far as you are aware?—I should like to see the number of disallowances and surcharges reduced. I think that sometimes the auditors make disallowances and surcharges that we should be glad to see not made. One way of avoiding such cases is by resort to the Local Authorities (Expenses) Act, 1887. The number of disallowances has no doubt been considerably reduced since that Act was passed.

The Local Authorities (Expenses) Act.

4228. That is an Act which I think empowers the Local Government Board to sanction certain expenditure?—Yes.

4229. Where it has been disallowed?—No, but in order to prevent its being disallowed. If the Local Government Board have sanctioned expenditure, the auditor cannot disallow it. I think in England that rather takes the place of the Scottish procedure; I should say it is probably the better plan in the case of England.

4230. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) Does that Act apply, unless the guardians ask specially for the sanction of the Local Government Board?—It has been considered that there must be an application from the guardians or their officer.

4231. (Mr. Bentham.) That is, for a sanction to the expenditure?—Yes. If the auditor takes objection to an item of expenditure on the ground that it was illegally incurred, then, if application is made to the Local Government Board before the audit closes and the Board sanction the expenditure, the auditor passes it as a matter of course.

Number of disallowances and surcharges reversed on appeal.

4232. (Mrs. Webb.) Are there any figures showing what proportion of those disallowances and surcharges are reversed by the Local Government Board, as distinguished from remitting them?—I find that in 1904 there were seventeen decisions of the Auditors reversed on appeal, fifteen in the accounts of guardians and two in the accounts of officers of the guardians.

4233. Could you say whether a considerable proportion is remitted?—I do not find that I have the number of the cases in which remission was refused, but as I think I have already stated, remission is granted in the great majority of cases.

Practice as to remission.

Number and nature of sanctions given under the Local Authorities (Expenses) Act.

4234. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) As regards the power which the Local Government Board have to sanction expenditure, can you tell us generally in what circumstances that sanction is given?—It is difficult to describe the cases generally: the number of cases is large, and they vary much in character. Naturally, they are cases in which remission would be granted, if a disallowance were made.

4235. Could you give us the number?—I can give you the number, but the circumstances vary so much that it would be difficult to tell you the kind of case in a brief answer to a question.

4236. What is the number of cases in which sanction has been granted in the terms of the Local Authorities (Expenses) Act?—The number of items in the Poor Law accounts of guardians and their officers which were sanctioned last year was 653; in the previous year, 655, and in 1894, 499.

4237. Were those cases where the expenditure probably would have been held to be illegal, but for this sanction which was given by the Local Government Board?—Yes. It may be assumed that in most of them the auditors would have disallowed the expense as illegal. The sanction is often given after the expense has been incurred—after the payment has been made, in fact.

4238. Does that not go to show that the fact of the Local Government Board having that power must tend to make a local authority less careful as to its expenditure?—I cannot say that it does. The Local Government Board are not bound to give these sanctions any more than they are to remit disallowances.

Continuing expenditure not sanctioned under Local Authorities (Expenses) Act.

4239. (Sir Samuel Provis.) It is the practice, is it not, of the Local Government Board to refuse to continue to sanction expenditure under the Local Authorities (Expenses) Act, supposing the expenditure itself is continued?—Yes.

4240. Therefore that acts as a deterrent to the local authority not to renew it?—Certainly.

Refusal of guardians to sign cheques as a result of surcharge.

4241. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) With reference to the surcharging, has any difficulty been experienced in getting members of a Board to sign cheques, because of the liability that they may incur in that way?—I remember one case in which a local authority was at first rather irritated at the auditor's action, and passed a resolution that they would not sign cheques, but I think that resolution was soon withdrawn, and the Local Government Board heard no more of the matter.

Mr. Thomas Pitts, C.B.

20 Feb. 1906.

4242. Is that the only instance within your knowledge?—I only remember one instance of the kind.

Nature of regulations for auditors.

4243. (Chairman.) Are the regulations under which the auditors carry out their duties embodied in Acts of Parliament?—In the case of the accounts of guardians, they are partly contained in the regulations of the Local Government Board and partly prescribed by statute.

4244. Of course the Local Government Board have no power of revising that part of the regulations which is contained in the statutes?—No; they can supplement the statutory provisions, but they cannot revise them.

Question of over-technical nature of audit.

4245. Do you think that the provisions under which the auditors have to work are too technical? I put that question because you stated that you would like to see less surcharges. In your judgment, do the auditors make too technical a use of their power?—There has been a tendency in that direction, I think, in some cases. It is difficult, however, to leave a discretion with the auditors, because if that were done, one auditor would probably act on one view and others on another.

4246. Put it in another way; assuming that the audit is a check on extravagant and improper expenditure, do you think the audit could still be made effective if some of the more technical parts of the regulations were relaxed?—Yes; I think that perhaps an extension of the principle of the Local Authorities (Expenses) Act might be found workable and might be desirable.

Proposed differentiation between technical and other surcharges.

4247. (Mr. Bentham.) Could there not be a simple division made between the purely technical surcharges and those of other kinds, so that the technical surcharges might be remitted almost as a matter of course without going through all the formalities that would be necessary in the case of the other surcharges?—I am in favour of something of that kind being done, but it is the fact that most of the cases of the kind that you have indicated are met by the sanctions given under the Local Authorities (Expenses) Act. If an auditor comes across an item the objection to which is purely technical, he probably makes arrangements for an application to be made to the Local Government Board for their sanction before he concludes the audit.

4248. Have you any particulars as to the number of technical surcharges that have gone through the whole range of surcharge, remission, etc.?—There is no record kept in which the cases are distinguished in that way, so I am afraid I cannot give you the number.

4249. (Chairman.) A surcharge or a disallowance ought to be a rather serious matter, ought it not?—Yes.

4250. Would you think that the gravity of a surcharge or a disallowance is somewhat diminished by its being occasionally made on purely technical grounds?—That is my own opinion.

4251. Therefore I assume that you would be in favour, if it were practicable, of some revision of the regulations?—Yes.

4252. (Sir Samuel Provis.) But it does not depend entirely on the regulations of the Board, does it?—No. I am assuming that the Chairman in referring to the regulations meant to include those contained in the statute as already mentioned.

4253. (Chairman.) Inasmuch as a portion of the regulations are statutory, it would not be in the power of the Local Government Board at present to make any such revision?—There must be an amendment of the law in order to enable the statutory provisions to be relaxed.

Object and scope of Local Authorities (Expenses) Act.

4254. (Sir Samuel Provis.) The Local Authorities (Expenses) Act was really intended, was it not, to meet that sort of difficulty Mr Bentham refers to, namely, where there was a technical objection and not a substantial objection to the payment, that then the auditor might report to the Board that there was this technical defect—we will suppose that some formality had not been observed—and then that on the application for the Board's sanction the sanction might be given, and all the expenditure following on a disallowance might be avoided. That was the very object of the Act, was it not?—That is my impression, and certainly the Act has been administered as if that had been its object.

4255. (Mrs. Webb.) The Local Authorities (Expenses) Act, as I understand, does not apply at all to continued new expenditure which has become obviously necessary, but which is not sanctioned by law; or has there been such a case of continued new expenditure which has been sanctioned under the Act?—The Local Government Board have considered that the Act was not intended to authorise them to give repeated sanctions, so as to enable illegal expenditure to be continued. They would sanction the expenditure on the first occasion in order that there might not be a disallowance or surcharge, but after that they would not continue to sanction similar expenditure.

4256. (Chairman.) Are there special regulations as regards Poor Law administration which are not applicable to other local authorities?—Yes. I think Mr. Burd has included them in a memorandum which has been printed.

4257. Does he as Inspector of Audits deal with local authorities other than Poor Law authorities?—Yes. Nearly all of the auditors who audit the accounts of the guardians audit the accounts of other local authorities also.

4258. Then we shall get that information direct from him?—Yes.

4259. (Mr. Lansbury.) Could you tell us how long it takes for an average audit in a big London union?—I think that is a question you had better put to Mr. Burd, who is responsible for seeing how the auditors occupy their time.

4260. That would show whether the audit was a real audit?—Do you mean whether the auditors spend enough time on their work?

4261. Whether they have enough time to go through all the out-relief books, the house books, and the expenditure generally?—I think you must ask Mr. Burd all such questions, please.

Auditor's discretion to surcharge whole board of guardians.

4262. (Mr. Phelps.) In cases in which fraud is discovered on the part of officials, is the board ever surcharged?—That would depend upon whether the board of guardians had been so lax as to facilitate the fraud.

4263. It would be within the judgment of the auditor then?—If he thought that the misappropriation of money had been due to laxity on the part of the officers' employers, I think he might consider the question of surcharging them.

4264. Is that frequent?—No, I should say not.

4265. You do not go beyond the officer?—Generally speaking, in the case of a guardians' officer the auditor does not go beyond him.

Return as to result of disallowance and surcharges in Poor Law accounts.

4266. (Mr. Bentham.) According to the report of the Local Government Board for 1904-05, there were last year 1,654 disallowances and surcharges made in the accounts of the boards of guardians and assistant overseers; could we have any return as to how those 1,654 items were actually dealt with, showing what proportion of them were technical?—Do you mean a return showing the course taken in individual cases?

Cases of payment of disallowance without appeal.

4267. (Sir Samuel Provis.) You could not give the subjects unless there was an appeal made?—I can give the number of cases in which the disallowance or surcharge was satisfied by payment without appeal, but the Department may not have details as to the subjects in those cases. Taking the 202 cases in which disallowances and surcharges in the accounts of the guardians were reported as made during last year, the items were paid in 146 cases without an appeal to the Local Government Board, and so the matter never came before the Board in 146 cases. It was admitted apparently in those cases that the auditor's objection could not be appealed against, and the amount that he certified to be due was accounted for.

4268. (Mr. Lansbury.) Can you give the amounts in the 146 cases you have mentioned where the people have paid up without any trouble?—The total amount was £1,278.

4269. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Could you tell us what is the nature of the payments that have been held to be illegal, so far as they have come before the Board?—Yes, in the 56 cases in which there were appeals.

4270. (Mr. Lansbury.) What would be the total amount that was remitted?—The fifty-six appeals related to a sum of £919, but I cannot say at this moment what the disallowances and surcharges remitted amounted to.

4271. (Mrs. Webb.) Is there not a book published called "Casson's Local Government Board Appeals," which gives all the appeals and the circumstances?—I think that the firm of Knight & Co. did start a publication of that kind, but I do not know whether it has been kept up. The publication is, of course, not an official one.

turn as to ult of peals to cal vernment ard.

4272. (Chairman.) Would you try to give us the best return you can. There will be no difficulty, I understand, at all about the cases on which there was an appeal?—There will be no difficulty in regard to those cases, because the Local Government Board have a record of every case in which an appeal is received.

4273. You might put the information in two or three columns showing the amount, the nature of the appeal, and the decision; and if you could supplement that by a short statement showing the total amount of the disallowances and surcharges against which there was no appeal, and noting anything remarkable about any of them, I think that would add to the value of the return?—I think I could give you the figures for the year 1904; some of the appeals against decisions in 1905 may not have come in yet.

4274. One year would be as good as another for our purpose, I suppose?—Yes. I will try to get you the information desired. (Subsequently sent. See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. IV.)

tepayers' ht to end audit l inspect oks.

4275. (Dr. Downes.) I believe a ratepayer has a right to attend an audit?—Yes.

4276. And has access to certain books at reasonable times?—Yes, for a few days before the audit; and the auditor may allow a ratepayer to inspect the books during the audit.

tus of e-paying ited pany as audit.

4277. Would that right extend to a limited liability company in any way?—If the company were paying rates, they could send a representative to attend the audit. I believe that some railway companies do, as a matter of fact, send their representatives to the audits.

Mr. Thomas Pitts, C.B.

20 Feb. 1906.

4278. And have they a legal locus standi?—I think so, if the company are ratepayers.

Ratepayers' right to inspect contracts.

4279. Could a ratepayer demand to see a contract?—The provisions on the subject in the general order of 14th January, 1867, are in these terms: Art. 32. "The clerk [to the guardians] shall three clear days before the day appointed for auditing the union accounts deposit the half-yearly statement of the accounts of the union, together with the relief order book and ledger, in the board room of the guardians union, or such other place as the board of guardians may appoint, and shall permit the said statement, book, and ledger to be inspected, examined, and copied by any ratepayer or owner of property in the union in the presence of the clerk or some other person approved of by the board of guardians, at any reasonable hour in the daytime when the board of guardians shall not be sitting, after the said statement, book, and ledger shall have been so deposited, and previous to the day appointed for the auditing of the accounts of the union." There is no reference to contracts in that article. Art. 40 of the order provides that "the officers of the union * * * who by law are bound to account to [the] auditor, shall attend at the time and place appointed by him for the audit of their accounts, and shall submit to the auditor all books, documents, appointments in writing, contracts, bills, orders for payment, receipts, and other vouchers containing or relating to their accounts * * * and the same shall at the time of the audit be open to the inspection of any owner of property or ratepayer interested in such accounts, but to such extent and in such manner only as will not, in the judgment of the said auditor interfere with the audit."

4280. The form of tender is prescribed by the Order of 1877 I think—but I am not quite sure of the year?—There is an order that prescribes the form of tender, but this is a matter that does not come before me in connection with the subject of audit.

FOURTEENTH DAY.

Tuesday, 27th February, 1906.

AT THE FOREIGN OFFICE, DOWNING STREET, S.W.

Miss OCTAVIA HILL.

Mr. R. H. A. G. DUFF (Secretary)
Mr. J. JEFFREY (Assistant Secretary).

Mr. HERBERT PRESTON-THOMAS, called; and Examined.

4281. (Mr. Booth.) We are much obliged to you for the valuable memorandum you have prepared, which we have decided to put in as your evidence, without thinking it necessary to bring out all you have said in it by any series of questions. We are much obliged to you, also, for the statistics which you have prepared, which will be of considerable use and guidance to us. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. VIII. (A) and (B).) There are a few general questions I will ask you now, which are more or less in amplification of the evidence put in. With regard to paragraph 5, has Devonshire suffered much from agricultural depression?—Not nearly so much as some other counties. For instance, in Suffolk in 1879, which was the palmy time of agriculture, the gross rateable value of land, excluding houses and so on, was, £1,508,569, but it had gone down in 1903 to £743,772. On the other hand, while in Devon in 1879, it was £2,028,808, in 1903 it had only gone down to £1,597,058. In point of fact, in one the depression had meant a fall of 50 per cent., and in the other it meant a fall of not much more than 20 per cent.

Mr. Herbert Preston-Thomas.

27 Feb. 1906.

crease in eable ue of land Devon and folk.

4282. Is that due to the different character of the agriculture or the grazing?—Largely. It is very much more pastoral in Devon, and more arable in Suffolk; and there are other reasons.

4283. I shall not pursue those questions further now,

Mr. Herbert Preston-Thomas.

27 Feb. 1906.

because I propose to ask you some detailed questions about various portions of the county. On Clause 13, has there been any effect on the membership of friendly societies, that, is as I understand it, as to the effect of tightening up the relief under the Poor Law?—That has been so. I have made inquiries in various parts on the subject, and I am told that friendly societies are making progress. I may mention that in the one district of Exeter, where the diminution of pauperism has been larger in the last eight years than anywhere else, friendly societies are now particularly flourishing. There are no less than 6,000 members of the recognised friendly societies, besides a large number of members of quite small associations for more or less the same purposes; and it is believed that the stricter administration of relief has had an excellent effect on those societies.

Success of Friendly Societies in Exeter and elsewhere.

4284. On the whole, those societies are extending in their work and prospering throughout the district?—Very much so. Of course it is difficult to say what enables people to belong to friendly societies, and what makes them flourish in one district and the other. My point at present is that improvement in poor-law administration has had a beneficial effect on such societies in Exeter.

Parsimony of guardians' administration in West of England.

4285. Speaking in a general way, are the guardians, or are they not, generally inclined to extravagance?—They are not; and a difficulty is, that in London, for instance, and in some other districts, one important function of the Local Government Board may be to cut down proposals for spending, whereas in the west it is all the other way. We have to try exceedingly hard to get most of the guardians to spend money for the most necessary purposes, so that we have to push them to spend, and not to curb their extravagance. I can give you numbers of instances as to the difficulties I have had in getting an infirmary built for the sick, or something of that sort. It is generally done in the end, but the reluctance of the farmers has to be combated. They always look at every penny they pay in rates very keenly, and they come in and oppose expenditure of all kinds.

Inspection of lunatics in workhouses.

4286. We shall, no doubt, be glad to have instances; and you will have an opportunity of mentioning them as I go through the more detailed investigation which I propose to follow after these general questions. With regard to imbeciles in the workhouse, what inspections are made on behalf of the Lunacy Commissioners?—A periodical inspection is made by an assistant commissioner; I do not think it is quite regular from year to year in every workhouse. The Lunacy Commissioners have not made recommendations relating to the effect of the presence of imbeciles on other people, except to a very small extent. Once or twice I have found reports where they have specified a violent or mischievous imbecile as one that ought to be removed to the lunatic asylum, but other reports have been confined very much to one matter, a very important matter no doubt, the possibility of fire, and means of escape in case of fire. Sometimes they have pushed their recommendations in that respect to a very high point indeed. Probably the best way for you to get information on the subject would be to ask for a copy of their reports for a particular period.

Reports of Lunacy Commissioners.

4287. The reports are not very exhaustive in their character, are they?—They are not very personal in their character, and not very detailed.

Objections to lunatics and imbeciles in workhouses.

4288. Would you imply from that that the inspection is not all that it should be, or that the report does not cover it?—I am not prepared to criticise the inspection; but what has come very painfully before me in various cases is the enormous harm that may be done to the comfort of various people in the workhouse by mischievous imbeciles, by imbeciles with offensive characteristics, and so on, and I am quite sure that a large part of the comfort that modern improvements have procured for inmates of workhouses, especially old people, has been neutralised to a large extent by the constant association with mischievous, offensive, and nasty imbeciles. It is not a nice thing in your old age to have to live with idiots. It is all very well where the imbeciles are kept quite apart, but in most of the small country workhouses they are not, and cannot be kept apart. If you have half-a-dozen imbeciles of each sex, you cannot ask the guardians to have a separate male officer for the half-dozen male imbeciles, and a separate female officer for the half-dozen women. Even in the larger workhouses where they are in special wards, there is nothing improving about their treatment. They are kept there as long as they live, I suppose; but there is no chance in a workhouse of those who are improvable receiving the treatment which they would receive in a proper institution of the kind. Of course the great difficulty has been one of expense. Lunatic asylums have been built at such enormous cost that everyone is afraid of spending more money for institutions of that sort under the county councils. Then there is another point, that a good many of the imbeciles are useful in the workhouses: they pump, and they scrub, and do this, that, and the other, but this consideration ought not to be allowed to outweigh that of the comforts of other inmates. Under section 24 of the Lunacy Act of 1890, it is necessary, in order to legalise imbeciles being sent to the workhouse, that there should be a certificate that it is not necessary, either for his own convenience or for the convenience of others, that he should be kept separate. That is disregarded in scores of cases. I have known people's lives made miserable because there are imbeciles who really ought never to have been sent there, who ought to have been sent to lunatic asylums, or to some institution specially for them. What I should like, without the extraordinary expense of building new asylums, is this: there are constantly places, like a disused prison or a disused county school of some sort, which could be got cheaply, and run cheaply without a very extensive staff, and without an expensive outlay on bricks and mortar. I am quite sure that if we require that county councils shall build big places for them, or add departments to the lunatic asylums (unless they are cheaply built to satisfy only moderate requirements) eight or ten years hence we shall still be having these idiots worrying people in workhouses.

Disregard of Sec. 24 of Lunacy Act, 1890.

Proposed segregation of workhouse imbeciles.

4289. You would like to see the workhouses relieved entirely of them?—Absolutely; since the statutory attempt to differentiate between "convenient" and "inconvenient" imbeciles has broken down in practice.

4290. And you would like to see them treated in institutions suitable for them?—Yes, and have it made a county charge entirely.

Conditions in Clutton Union.

4291. I would now like to take you to the map, of which you have a copy, and ask you a few questions with regard to each union. I will commence with the western end of Somerset. I notice that Clutton has reduced its pauperism considerably, but still it is rather high?—Clutton is the most unnecessarily pauperised union in my district. It is composed partly of farms where the wages are, according to Mr. Wilson Fox's return, higher than in most other unions; and it is composed largely of collieries where the wages are high, where employment has been pretty constant, and yet its pauperism is enormous. It has very little old age, which is a most important point.

4292. I see it is only 64 per 1,000. I notice that the pauperism, although high, is a great deal lower than it was in 1885?—It is lower than it was in 1885. The Local Government Board did something. We had been remonstrating constantly as to their administration; they had quite an insufficient staff of relieving officers; and at last the Board took the unusual step (a step which, until a few years ago, had not been taken) of requiring them to appoint an additional relieving officer.

Appointment of additional relieving officer on order of Local Government Board.

4293. Do you remember in what year that was?—That was three or four years ago. The composition of the board of guardians is exceedingly unsatisfactory. There have been various guardians who have had relations in receipt of relief. In some cases fathers have been in receipt of outdoor relief while the sons have been sitting on the board. Various guardians there, more than in most other places, I believe, are sent there to distribute outdoor relief; and that is their platform.

Relief given to relatives of guardians.

4294. The industry there, apart from agriculture, is mining?—Yes, coal mining.

4295. Are the earnings irregular?—No, the earnings have been generally steady. There have been certain interruptions, and certain amounts of short work, but I should say the earnings are habitually pretty good. They have a Conciliation Board, by which they prevent interruptions by strikes. Some time ago they wanted more wages, and at first it looked like a question of a strike; but the matter was adjusted, and they got, if I remember rightly, a rise of 5 or 10 per cent.

lure to over loan ef.

4296. So the industrial conditions are satisfactory, leading to prosperity?—Quite excellent. Now and then relief is given on loan, but the amount recovered is comparatively trivial. So, too, as regards contributions by relatives. Occasionally a son is ordered to pay perhaps a shilling a week towards the out-relief of his father, he pays for a little time, and then he falls into arrear, the debt accumulates and accumulates, and finally it is often wiped off. But it is fair to say that there has recently been improvement in this respect.

4297. The decrease in pauperism in the last ten years has been due, at any rate in part, to the increase of the number of relieving officers forced upon them by the Local Government Board?—In part, but I would not lay very great stress on that, because that has been comparatively recent.

4298. Has there been any material change in the constitution of the board in the last twenty years?—Not of late years, except that a few guardians have been impressed very much with the fact that they were quite unnecessarily pauperised, and have taken the line that their administration ought to be stricter; that has been I think, the chief reason of the change. Until the year 1897, as I have said in my statement, no comparative statistics and no circulars were sent round to the different unions, so that they did not know much what was being done elsewhere, and when, from the regular statistics that I sent them, union A began to see that union B had only, perhaps, three-quarters of the number of paupers that union A had, they began to ask themselves why; and they began to reform their ways a little. They had nothing to go on before, and I think that that has been exceedingly useful. I send them round an annual circular, and an annual table of statistics with particulars of the pauperism of all the unions in the district.

et of ulation of parative istics.

4299. That was your action?—That was not done before I went there in 1897.

4300. You called their attention to the comparatively good and bad results of the administration of their unions?—Quite so. I have done that annually, sometimes contrasting two neighbouring unions and their pauperism, asking why it was that such and such a union had a large amount of pauperism, whereas its next door neighbour had a comparatively small amount. I have insisted on that in my annual report, which I have found great advantage in circulating.

4301. I suppose it is only a comparison with other unions in your district, not with other parts of England?—No, except that, broadly I have contrasted the smaller pauperism of England generally with that of the Western Counties. I never compare individual unions inside with individual unions outside.

4302. When did you commence this plan of furnishing statistics to guide them?—Directly I took the district. I had done the same thing in my previous district.

4303. In what year was this?—The beginning of 1897. I went to Devon in December, 1896, and in the middle of my first year I sent round a table of statistics, the local papers took the matter up, and the guardians began to know, for the first time really, that they were an extraordinarily pauperised district, and they were much surprised to hear it.

4304. One cannot but notice the remarkable change which occurs in your period; there was little or no change in the previous decade?—It had been very constant before; I think the change was principally due to their receiving statistics, and so on, which they had not previously received.

4305. I have the figures before me for twenty years, would you say that industrially the first ten years of that twenty were just as satisfactory as the second ten years?—Very much, with some exceptions in the town unions, of course, I am speaking now of the agricultural unions. There have been some differences in Plymouth and one or two other towns. I do not think there has been a change of any importance anywhere else.

litions in ne on.

4306. I pass to Frome. There the industries are more manufacturing. There is a certain amount of manufacturing industry at Frome, is there not?—They have one or two collieries, and a few factories.

4307. What is the nature of the factory business?—A good deal of woollen cloth is made, and there is a card manufactory. The factories do not occupy a large part of the population. With that exception, I do not think very much goes on there except agriculture. Frome is the centre of a good agricultural district, and the collieries.

4308. So there is a considerable variety of industry. The character is various, because there is agriculture, mining and manufacture?—Yes, but the manufacture is what, in a manufacturing district, would scarcely be called manufacture; it is on a small scale.

4309. It would all conduce to general prosperity?—Certainly.

4310. And here again the pauperism is still high?—It is high.

4311. It is not so high as it is in Clutton, but still it is high?—It is high.

4312. Can you offer any explanation of that?—No, in Frome they have a very shrewd chairman who has done a good deal to check unnecessary relief. The old-age figure is rather high.

4313. It is seventy-six?—Directly you get at all above the seventies it seems to make an enormous difference. I did not realise, till I made a table for my report four or five years ago, all the effect of there being an exceptionally large proportion of the very oldest people who cannot fend for themselves, and therefore have to be provided for at the cost of the rates.

4314. Curiously enough, the proportion of out-door to in-door relief is much greater in Clutton than it is in Frome?—That is so.

4315. In spite of the larger number of old people, there seems to be less out-door relief given; however, you do not recognise anything very particular in that. Have they a sufficient number of relieving officers there?—They have a very fair number at Frome.

4316. You have nothing more to say particularly about Frome?—No.

Conditions in Shepton Mallet Union.

4317. Then Shepton Mallet, which is just to the west of Frome. Is there anything particular there? I find there that there is agriculture, but there is a town; what is the town?—A small town, a centre of the cheese industry, with one or two large breweries. It is pastoral, and I think why pauperism is so high there is a question of administration very largely.

4318. Pauperism is quite high there; it is as high as it is at Clutton?—Pauperism is high; but I think that the guardians will do better, probably, in the future than they have done in the past. There have been certain personal and other reasons.

4319. There is not the quantity of out-relief, for instance that there is at Clutton?—No, but there is too much.

4320. These three, throughout, show a very great improvement during your period of inspection, and we may hope that experience will be carried further?—I hope so. Sometimes I rather despair about Clutton; but in the others it will certainly.

Old age statistics for Wincanton and Axminster.

4321. The next one I have here is Wincanton. That is particularly agricultural and rural, is not it?—Yes. Quite lately they have taken the thing in hand and have made a considerable advance, just in the last two or three years. They are still very high indeed; they have a very large proportion of old age. The old age figure there is eighty-one.

4322. Almost the maximum?—Almost. I think Axminster is absolutely the maximum; it is ninety-four, which is extraordinary.

Pauperism and administration in Wincanton.

4323. The remarkable thing about Wincanton is that the pauperism was rising and reached its maximum about 1895, before you came. It was higher in 1895 than 1885, and since your period it has been reduced very materially?—It will go down in future. They have a very active chairman—a blind chairman, who is exceedingly able and is keen on out-door relief not being given indiscriminately.

4324. The administration is good?—The administration is fair.

Mr. Herbert Preston-Thomas.

27 Feb. 1906.

Term of office of chairman of board of guardians: its effect on administration.

4325. Do the chairmen remain for a long period in charge?—Yes. There are two plans in vogue in my district. One plan, which I think is a very bad plan indeed, is that the chairman only serves for one year. The effect of that is that, just as he begins to know his work, off he goes; and, if you have a succession of chairmen, you do not have any continuity of administration, and it works badly. Of course you have the precedent of mayors. A mayor is only mayor for a year, as a rule, but then a mayor has much less control over the action of his municipality than the chairman has over that of the guardians. There are difficulties the other way. Sometimes a chairman goes on year after year; he may be a capital chairman at first, but he gets old. He becomes incompetent, and no one likes to wound him by suggesting that he should retire. Now and then when an election comes he says: "I have served long enough, so I had better give place." They say to themselves "No, this will pain him;" and for personal reasons he stays on, even if he is quite incompetent. I have known various cases of that sort, in which great harm has been done to administration by people being kept on through kindliness. Of course, where they only serve for a year they consider it a sort of honour to do so, and if a man is not made chairman it is a snub on him, so it goes right round, and in some cases you have incompetent men as chairmen, because it becomes their turn. What I should prefer is a sort of middle course. I should like to see the chairman appointed for, say, five years, and incapable of being re-appointed at the end of the fifth year until after an interval. Then when you elect a chairman that year, if your last chairman is an excellent one and you want to re-appoint him, let some one be put in who will fill the gap and who will resign after the first of his five years, and you can put your old chairman in again. I think much harm has been done by chairmen who really know nothing about the work. It takes a very long time to learn all the principles and the details of poor law administration, even with a very competent clerk, and I should be very glad to see chairmen have, on the one hand, a longer tenure of office, but, on the other hand, not an indefinite term of office, so that you cannot get rid of the old ones.

4326. Does it rest with each board to decide what term they will elect their chairman for?—Every chairman is appointed for one year, but there is no restriction whatever upon the appointment of the same man again and again. You may do that, or appoint somebody else. Those are the two practices.

4327. (Mrs. Webb.) Does the fact that a chairman of a district council is an ex officio justice of the peace make the ordinary guardian more anxious to serve as chairman, and has it, therefore, influenced this particular mode of appointing them by rotation?—In a very large number of cases the chairman of the district council and the chairman of the board of guardians are not the same person. In many cases they are, and that has an influence; but it does not apply to the guardians as guardians, because the chairman of the board of guardians is not a justice of the peace by virtue of his office.

4328. Is the chairman of the district council usually made one of the board of guardians?—Very often, but by no means invariably.

Conditions in Yeovil Union.

4329. (Mr. Booth.) The next union on my list is Yeovil. There are manufacturing industries there of some kind, are there not?—There is a great deal of gloving there, and an enormous lot of money goes into the houses at Yeovil. The head of the family may be a labourer on the land, but his wife and his daughters, do some gloving; sometimes at the factory; sometimes at home.
