4330. There is work for all?—There is plenty of work—any amount of work there—and the pauperism ought to be very low. I have frequently told them they ought to be one of the lowest pauperised unions in the whole district. I have my own suspicion why it is, but I should not like to put it forward definitely. I may make this suggestion to the Commission; that, where you find a particular union having a very large rate of pauperism without anything to account for it you should take measures to ascertain what particular influences are at work there. For example there is a great amount of drinking connected with some trades, and I have heard it asserted that this is so in the gloving trade. I do not know of my own knowledge whether that is true or not.

Suggested inquiry into drink statistics in particular unions.

4331. The leather trade has a bad reputation generally, I believe?—I believe it has; I have heard that assigned as a reason for the high pauperism of Yeovil; but I cannot say. I have also heard it contradicted. That is a thing that deserves inquiry. If it is not that, all I can say is that I do not know what it is.

Conditions in Yeovil Union.

4332. Does the industry there include the tanning and dressing of the leather?—I think not, or only to a small extent. It is glove making proper.

4333. Is that industry concentrated in the town of Yeovil?—Mostly, but it extends a good deal to the villages outside as well.

4334. So that the pauperism there is very unsatisfactorily high, although it has been reduced a little?—It has been reduced somewhat, but it is much too high.

4335. While we are passing through these unions, I shall be very glad of any particulars on the following points; are any board of guardians too unwieldy; how are they composed; are there any lady guardians; and any information you can give us as to how they transact their business. I do not want to burden you with attempting to give information on all those subjects for every union, but if we come to a union with regard to which you would like to make a remark on one of those points, if you would yourself call attention to it, it would come in very appropriately as we pass the union. Other questions, which are your own suggestion, I think, are: how do they choose their officers, especially the master, the matron, the nurses, the relieving officers, and so on; what is the effect of the Superannuation Act; and are relief stations necessary? Does the Brabazon Society conduct operations in any of the workhouses; and does the boarding-out answer well? Some of those questions might be best dealt with last of all, but others you might deal with most satisfactorily as you pass a union which is representative?—I will do that if you please.

4336. Yeovil is unsatisfactory and somewhat unexpected, unless you have something to say about the administration which would point to this rather high pauperism?—I have nothing special to say about the administration. I think there is some extraneous influence that has to be found out; that I can only speculate on.

4337. Which might be drink?—Yes, it might be.

Conditions in Langport Union.

4338. Langport is an agricultural district, but there is a town in it. Is Langport itself a town?—It is a very little town indeed; it is scarcely more than a large village. It is all agriculture there, and not very flourishing agriculture, because it is subject to floods very much. It is a very low-lying district. It is a small concern altogether.

4339. But they have a high rate of pauperism?—They have very high pauperism.

Conditions in Wells Union.

4340. We come now to Wells. There is another point I should like you to refer to if it arises, and that is whether there are endowed charities which may have an effect one way or other upon pauperism. I was thinking that Wells, being a Cathedral town, might be subject to that kind of influence. I do not want to trouble you with endless questions, but if you come to a place where you find that endowed charities affect the question, we should be glad to hear it?—I am afraid I have no actual particulars. I have from time to time looked at the return of endowed charities, in relation to particular cases, but I could not generally answer as to them. It is a matter of figures, which would require an amount of preparation which I have not gone through. I know, however, that the endowed charities of Wells are unusally large.

4341. As a matter of fact, the pauperism of Wells is not only reduced, but it is comparatively low?—Wells has one or two capital lady guardians who have been most useful, and it has an excellent chairman; altogether it is very well administered, and probably will improve in that respect.

4343. Is there much resident wealth?—There are a pretty good number of large country houses.

4344. Do the people of that class—retired people—take part in the local administration ?—No, not much. In that particular board of guardians there are not many people of high education, about half a dozen; a large number are farmers and tradesmen; but they are a sensible lot, they are businesslike, and they do their work well. They have turned a very old workhouse into a quite tolerable modern workhouse, and they have made various improvements. They have put their children in scattered homes, and carried out various things. They are a good board, decidedly.

4345. As a general thing, in your district, do the boards consist of people of various classes acting together ?—Various classes, and now and then we have considerable contrasts. In the country the bulk are farmers, with a squire or two, some clergymen, and perhaps one or two retired officers, and a few persons of small education, who are small tradesmen, and so on. There are all sorts of classes.

4346. Do they work well together ?—Yes, very well together.

4347. There is no cleavage according to class in the principle that they would wish to adopt ?—I am not sure that I can generalise as to that. It is not always the highest board of guardians socially that is the best board of guardians for administrative purposes. For instance, I think one of the best of my boards of guardians now is in Exeter itself, but it has by no means a large proportion of what you would call the upper class socially. It includes a colonel, a prebendary, a Catholic priest, and one or two ladies of some cultivation; mostly the members are tradesmen, but tradesmen of a very good class, and they have done wonders in improving both their relief administration and their workhouse; whereas in one or two other districts which I have in my mind, where the position of the guardians, from a social point of view, is very much better, they do not manage their business nearly so well as Exeter.

4348. Are they all elected, or are some co-opted ?—None are co-opted at Exeter. Now and then one or two are co-opted elsewhere. Sometimes a man is beaten at the polls, and if he is a very useful man they co-opt him, and perhaps there is some man who has taken considerable interest in the matter but does not care to stand for election, who is also co-opted. In my district there are few co-opted guardians.

4349. Are they valuable ?—Generally, because unless they are people who take a strong personal interest in the Poor Law, they do not take the trouble to let themselves be co-opted, nor would the guardians care to co-opt them.

4350. Does persistency in the policy of administration depend upon the position or class of the guardians ?—Yes, largely.

4351. I gather, from what you have said about the chairmen, that you would regard a persistently administered policy as a good feature ?—As very important indeed.

ditions Axbridge on.

4352. We will now take Axbridge. As far as I understand it, that is mainly a residential district ?—Yes, it has Weston-super-Mare in it, which is a sort of Brighton for Bristol. It is a popular watering place. It is year after year increasing rapidly, and the Axbridge board of guardians is a good one.

4353. Is Axbridge a town ?—A very small town, little more than a village.

4354. So that Weston-super-Mare has the principal population ?—Yes, and it pays the greater part of the rates.

uence of rman on inistra-

4355. Is there anything particular to say about the board of guardians there, their administration, or their methods ?—Not much. They have a most excellent chairman, one of the best in my district, in the person of Colonel Long. This place shows the importance of the chairman. They had a chairman some time ago who though a most worthy man had not quite the special qualities required, and they used to take hours over their proceedings. Colonel Long, going into every case thoroughly, and doing the whole business much better, gets through it in less than half the time. The more I see of Poor Law meetings, the more I am convinced that it is of the greatest importance to have a methodical and able chairman with knowledge, tact, and decision.

4356. You consider the administration of Axbridge fairly satisfactory ?—Fairly satisfactory.

4357. But the proportion of out-relief is very great ?—I have been worrying them for some time to appoint another relieving officer for Weston, and they have had a division on it once or twice, but they will not do it yet. It is not quite a case in which I think there are grounds for asking my board to compel them. It very often happens, if you compel people to do things they do not like, they do not do them very well after all; and I hope to be able to persuade them in time. But they have not quite enough relieving officers, and, therefore, their cases are not quite enough inquired into. With that exception, which, of course, is important, they do their business well.

Paucity of relieving officers in Axbridge Union.

4358. In spite of the large numbers of out-relief, the total percentage of pauperism is fairly low ?—It is fairly low.

4360. There is probably a good deal of irregular charitable giving there ?—A good deal, as there is at all watering places.

Conditions in Bridgwater Union.

4361. Will you now turn to Bridgwater, please. That is a port, is it not ?—It is upon the little river Parret, and small vessels do get up there; but its shipping trade is not on a large scale.

4362. Is there fishing there ?—Not much. It is a town which serves as the centre for a considerable agricultural district, and no doubt some coal and some fish and various things come in there.

4363. There is a considerable population ?—Yes.

4364. And the rest of the place is agricultural, is it ?—All agricultural, except the small town of Bridgwater itself.

4365. Have you anything to say about the administration of relief there ?—I think not.

Conditions in Taunton Union.

4366. The next place is Taunton. At Taunton there is a certain amount of manufacture. What is the character of the industry there ?—They have a few collar factories; I am afraid I cannot say what else, but it is a tolerably flourishing town. About half the population of the whole union is in the town, and it is much the most strictly administered of all my unions.

4367. It has much the lowest rate ?—Much the lowest rate. They had carried out most of their reforms before I came there. When I went to the West that was almost the only union where there was any rigidity of administration at all, and there they had taken the thing in hand very thoroughly.

4368. The great change happened between 1885 and 1895 ?—Yes. The clerk to the Taunton guardians at one of our Poor Law conferences read an excellent paper, giving particulars of what they had done there, and how their relief had been reduced.

Effect of strict administration in reducing pauperism.

4369. The figures of the paupers were reduced from 1,140 to 513—rather more than by half ?—Yes. The figures are striking. The amount spent in out door relief in Taunton in 1868 was nearly £10,000—£9,955. In 1871 it was over £9,000. In 1881 it was close on £6,000. In 1891 it had dropped to £3,400; and in 1902 it had dropped to £1,957. Therefore, between 1871 and 1902, it had dropped from £9,000 to less than £2,000.

4370. Has the policy of administration been persistent throughout the whole of that long period ?—It has been increasingly rigid. They were pretty careful at first so as not to create hardships to the old paupers on the list—not to strike them off roughly, but to conduct the reforms gradually, and they really do apply the House test; when applicants come they offer them the House in various cases. In the frequent cases of women with illegitimate children, who are inclined to apply freely for orders for the doctor, or orders for the House, the late chairman used to appeal to the parents of the girls, and not to give these orders as a matter of course; altogether he reformed the procedure in a great many ways, and I think the result has been very beneficial.

4371. Do they act according to rules laid down amongst themselves?—Yes; they have a certain code of rules, and it is in their absolute discretion as to any case whether they will or will not give relief, or what kind of relief it shall be. In the last resort they must give to each case an order for the house generally, but they can appeal to the parents that their daughters ought not to be sent to the workhouse.

Code of rules as to giving relief in Taunton.

4372. Was there any change in the policy connected with the change in the mode of election of the guardians when it came in 1895?—I think not.

4373. So that that is extremely satisfactory and an example of good administration?—That is a very good example of rigid administration and good administration. I have taken the trouble, as I have in various other cases where there has been strictness, to ask clergymen and different people likely to know: "Is any hardship caused by this system"? I have been told of one or two particular cases, and I have asked as to them. For instance, one clergyman at Taunton said, "I had two cases where the guardians refused relief, where I thought the people ought to have had it; in one case I was convinced afterwards I was mistaken, and in the other I got further information, which I put before the guardians, which they had not had in the first instance, and relief was given." He was the rector, or vicar, of one of the largest parishes in Taunton, and he said that, with those two exceptions, he had had no experience of any hardship arising from the guardians' policy.

4374. Is there any special organisation of charity to cover that?—I do not know. There are a good many endowed charities; I do not know exactly what philanthropic societies there are, but I have no doubt there is something of that sort there.

4375. To revert to what you told us about Friendly Societies flourishing, would Taunton be a place which illustrates that?—It is particularly flourishing. I have some particulars about it here. In the Taunton Union there are 5,700 members of Friendly Societies, while there are 40,000 industrial insurances.

Flourishing Friendly Societies in Taunton.

4376. (Mr. Lansbury.) Would that be for death?—I am not sure. I am quoting the clerk's words in the paper which he read before the Poor Law Conference.

4377. Have you any figures previous to that?—No, I have not.

4378. (Mr. Booth.) We come now to Chard. Chard again has some manufacturing?—There is one large collar factory, and some lace manufacture, but, speaking generally, it is agriculture and nothing else, I think.

Conditions in Chard Union.

4379. The rate of pauperism is very high there?—The rate of pauperism is high.

4380. Have you any explanation to give? It has been reduced, I see, especially during the last ten years, enormously reduced; is it on the way to being still further reduced?—I am not sure that it is. I am afraid I cannot explain why. I cannot bring any charge against the administration.

4381. You do not even say it is unsatisfactory?—No, I will not say distinctly that it is unsatisfactory.

4382. We will now pass to Wellington. There seems to be some manufacture there?—Yes; it is the great centre for making serge for the Navy; there are Fox's factories, which are very large concerns indeed, and there is some other serge maker there.

Conditions in Wellington Union.

4383. They give regular employment?—They give very regular employment.

4384. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) Might we ask whether these factories are for men or for women when they are mentioned. (Mr. Booth.) You said there was a collar factory in Chard?—That gives employment for women.

4385. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) And in the serge factories?—I know both are employed, but I cannot say the relative proportions of men and women.

4386. (Mr. Booth.) The result may be that the women are more regularly employed than the men?—I think there are more women. I have not been over those factories, so I hesitate to say definitely.

4387. You do not know whether irregularity of employment is one of the troubles there?—I think not; I understand it is very steady employment there.

4388. I meant with regard to the men employed in the factories, whether they were irregularly employed?—No, I understand employment is very regular there. Sometimes there are difficulties in get ing workmen. I have one instance here and it is worth mentioning. I brought it before the Vagrancy Committee recently. A man found great difficulty in getting hands; he wanted half-a-dozen unskilled labourers. He was a man in the town dealing with wood. It was perfectly unskilled labour, a little sawing, perhaps, but mainly moving wood, and he could not get labourers. He offered 18s. a week, which in that part of Somerset, an exceedingly cheap place, is a very fair wage, and he offered permanency of employment. He could not get men; so he went to the workhouse master, and he said: "Have you got any tramps here that will do some work?" The answer was "Lots of tramps, to-night, sir; about twenty of them." "Very well, do you think any of them will do some work?" He said "We might try." They went to the tramps' ward and said "Why are you people on the road?" "Cannot get any work, sir," the regular thing. "Do you want some work?" "Yes, we should like some work very much, we have been looking everywhere for it, and could not get it." He said, "Well, here is a job for you, 18s. a week and steady employment." An actual job, and not a job in the air, made all the difference in the world, and they began to hesitate as to whether it would suit them. Finally six of them said: Oh, yes, they would be very glad, it would suit them, and they would go. It was all arranged, they were to go next morning, and six of them left the workhouse at seven o'clock to start on the job, which was only about 600 yards off. Only one got as far, the other five slunk off. Here were men professing to be looking for work all over the place, but only one would take it. I inquired about him the next time I went to Wellington, six months afterwards, and he was working there still. I mention that as showing that labour was in demand there; the employer found great difficulty in getting it, and that is a fair rate of wages.

Instance of tramps' reluctance to work.

4389. (The O'Conor Don.) What kind of work was it?—Removing wood and a little wood sawing.

4390. (Professor Smart.) 18s. a week, you say?—18s. a week, it being a particularly cheap place.

4391. (Mr. Booth.) We now come to Williton, where there seems to be a small port?—There are one or two little watering places, nothing else.

4392. Is Williton itself a town?—No, it is really a village.

4393. There is no shipping industry that you know of?—Watchet has a fair harbour and some coasting trade; elsewhere I know of no industry of any kind; there are two or three little watering places; it is a favourite place for tourists.

4394. It is really residential?—Residential mainly, and pastoral.

4395. Have you anything to say about the Poor Law administration there?—No, the Poor Law is relieved to some extent, I think, because there is a large proprietor there, Sir Thomas Acland, who has a system of pensions for all his old labourers, and he has, no doubt, taken some off the Poor Law.

Private scheme of pensions for labourers.

4396. There seems to be rather a large amount of out-relief?—Yes, there is.

4397. And there is a very large number of old people, I see—eighty-four per 1,000?—It is very large.

4398. I believe that Dulverton completes Somerset. That is entirely agricultural, is not it?—Dulverton is not small in extent, because it contains nearly all Exmoor, but it is thinly populated and there is a small number of guardians.

Conditions in Dulverton Union.

4399. The population is quite small?—A very small population indeed. I do not think there is anything to be said about that in particular.

4400. The pauperism, although still rather high, has been steadily reduced?—Yes, it has gone down lately.

4401. Are there difficulties in administration consequent upon the large area in proportion to the number of people?—I do not think so.

4402. It does not get out of the reach of the guardians ?—No, there are so few people really to deal with, that I do not think there is any trouble of that sort.

ditions Barnstaple ion.

4403. Now we come to Devonshire, and I propose to begin with Barnstaple on the north coast; that is chiefly agricultural ?—Yes. Barnstaple is a union that is much more pauperised than it ought to be. It includes those thriving watering places, Ilfracombe and Lynton. It is tolerably high in old age; it is seventy-eight per 1,000. In one of my Reports, I draw a comparison between Barnstaple and Taunton, which may explain something. It is not very long, so perhaps I may read it. This is what I said—"It may be interesting to compare the circumstances of two unions not far from each other, of which one has the lowest rate of pauperism in the West of England, while the other, though it does not stand last on the list, has an inordinate proportion, which until its relief organisation is reformed is not the least likely to be reduced. Taunton contains a population of 38,643, of which 21,078 is urban, being contained in the borough. The proportion of inhabitants above the age of sixty-five is seventy-four per 1,000. It has four relieving officers, and on the 1st January, 1902, there were 392 outdoor paupers. Its rate of pauperism is eighteen per 1,000." This was written in 1902. "The Barnstaple union has a population of 43,078, of which 14,137 is in the borough of Barnstaple; and 10,198 in the watering places of Ilfracombe and Lynton. So here, also, rather more than half the population is of an urban character. The proportion of inhabitants above the age of sixty-five is seventy-eight per 1,000, being thus only fractionally larger than in Taunton. But for 1,479 outdoor paupers it has only three relieving officers, much of whose time is taken up with other duties two of them being also inspectors of nuisances, while the third is so much occupied with his functions as registrar that he has frankly stated his inability properly to investigate the circumstances of the paupers to whom he administers relief; and of whom he has over 700 on his books. It is not wonderful that in these circumstances, this flourishing union has a rate of pauperism of no less than forty-two per 1,000 or considerably more than twice that of Taunton. Twice the guardians have at my instigation resolved to increase their staff of relieving officers, and twice they have subsequently repealed their resolution to that effect." They carry resolutions when I am there, and, about a couple of months afterwards, when I am not there, they rescind them. At last I represented to the Local Government Board that really this was a case in which they ought to say that the guardians must appoint another officer. When this was intimated to them they were furious. They made all sorts of representations, they went to their Member of Parliament and expostulated as to the tyranny of the Board, and so on, and so on. However, the Board stuck to its guns, and said the case was so flagrant that a compulsory order would be issued unless they proceeded to make the appointment. So they did. Then I went down again, I think some eight or nine months after the officer had been appointed, and I was able to show them, as I had told them before would be the case, that they had saved the salary of the officer several times over, and they were now in a position to judge whether their people wanted relief or did not want relief, which was the great thing. Though they had been furious with me for worrying them over this, and for getting them forced to appoint him, they proceeded to pass a vote of thanks to me, which was carried unanimously, for having done it. The result was that for some time the outdoor relief was continually being cut down, and cut down apparently without any hardship, as I had indicated to them; after a time they got lax again, and now I have no doubt they will fitfully make efforts to reduce their relief, but it has been a little creeping up lately. That is an instance. The relieving officers themselves told me that if they were properly backed up they had no doubt there were lots of people receiving relief there who might be struck off the lists. Of course the difficulty with a board like that is that the relieving officer is not properly backed up; but still the first function of the Local Government Board is to see that boards of guardians have machinery enough to supply them with the information; it is their responsibility to deal with the information when they get it; and without a proper staff of relieving officers they cannot get the information.

city of ving ers at nstaple its effect.

Mr. Herbert Preston-Thomas.

Cause of paucity of relieving officers in Barnstaple.

4404. It is in the supposed interests of economy that relieving officers are not appointed ?—Yes. The farmers come up and they see that a salary of £100 or of £120 a year, or something of that sort, would be necessary, and they say, "More salaries of officers," and they do not reflect, and you cannot get it into their heads that proper inquiries will save them two or three times that £100 a year, as it was beginning to do in that case. I need not say that I rubbed that into them.

4405. Yet you say it is creeping up again ?—Now it is increasing again, and pauperism in many unions has been rising just lately. I have not got the figures finally, but from the weekly returns sent to me, I see a large number of places where they are giving more relief—not always because they have any unemployed; but merely because the newspapers are talking about the unemployed; they think there must be unemployed, and therefore they ought to give more relief.

Special difficulties in connection with seaside resorts.

4406. There are certain disadvantages in connection with all popular resorts—there is a certain amount of casual seasonal employment; a good deal of money is spent by visitors in various ways which do not tend to stability or regularity of employment. Do they suffer from that in comparison with a town like Taunton ?—They may to a certain extent, but, on the other hand, money is poured into the union year after year by visitors. I have no doubt there is, as you say, some instability of employment, now and then, as happened when we had a very wet year about three years ago; it was quite curious how one or two of the watering places were very nearly ruined—all the lodging-house keepers and everyone else. I remember there was a question of a system of sewerage which was urgently wanted for one rather important watering place in Cornwall, but it had to be put aside—they said, "We have no money; we cannot pay our debts; it is all a question of this season, when no one has come near the place." That particular year watering places were unfortunate; they are dependent on various fluctuations.

4407. And such fluctuations tend rather to demoralise the people who are so irregularly employed ?—No doubt that may be so.

Conditions in South Molton.

4408. Now we come to South Molton; is that a town ?—It is a little town; quite a small town on the top of a hill.

4409. Have you anything to say about that ?—No, it is purely agricultural; nothing else.

Instances of unwieldy boards of guardians.

4410. To revert to Barnstaple, is that an unwieldy board of guardians ?—It is rather large, but is not one of those I have noted as specially unwieldy, like one or two we shall come to directly, such as Newton Abbot, St. Thomas, Penzance, Liskeard and Truro. I have nothing to say about it in that respect.

Conditions in Tiverton Union.

4411. Then we will go on to Tiverton, which is a very highly pauperised place, in which the reduction has been very small. It has improved, but very slightly improved. Can you tell us about that ?—They have a large number of old people; they have seventy-six per 1,000. With regard to their pauperism, although the reduction has not been large, I think it started somewhat higher than some.

Effect of administration on pauperism

4412. That is true, but it remains very high. I have it forty per 1,000 for 1905 ?—Yes, it is very high. Its administration is not carried out according to fixed rules; it is rather haphazard, and it is susceptible of improvement. The excessive pauperism is not due to the character of the population.

4413. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) Tiverton is the centre of a decaying women's industry, is it not—lace-making ?—You are not thinking of Honiton, are you ?

4414. No, I was thinking of Tiverton also ?—I am afraid I do not know that.

4415. (Mr. Booth.) You do not know what the industries are ?—There are very few industries.

4416. It is a very old town ?—Yes; Lord Palmerston was Member for it.

4417. Do you know whether there are any endowed charities there ?—There are some charities there; I cannot give particulars, but I know as a fact that there are certain endowed charities.

4418. We have the curious fact that its pauperism is high and persistently high—nothing whatever seems to alter it. It would be very desirable to know if that is caused by the decay of the industry?—Not to my knowledge.

Mr. Herbert Preston-Thomas.

27 Feb. 1906.

4419. (Mr. Gardiner.) The population has decreased too?—Yes.

Conditions in Honiton Union.

4420. (Mr. Booth.) Then we come to Honiton. Honiton contrasts very well with Tiverton, because the pauperism was much higher at Honiton twenty years ago, and it has now reached a point a little lower than Tiverton—Tiverton having remained practically the same over the whole twenty years, but Honiton has fallen from sixty-four to fifty-eight and then to thirty-nine. Something is going on there apparently?—Honiton has been improving its administration considerably. It has, a very large number of old people: eighty-eight per 1,000.

4421. Nevertheless the pauperism is much lower?—Yes, it has been improving lately.

4422. Is that a satisfactorily administered union?—Very fairly so. I have nothing to say against it.

4423. (Professor Smart.) Do not they employ women labour too?—They have tried to revive the lace industry with not very great effect.

4424. At home or in factories?—At home.

4425 (Mr. Booth.) Are there charities there?—I am afraid I cannot say offhand.

4426. You say they are seeking to revive the lace industry; did it cease altogether or merely get to a low ebb?—It never quite ceased, indeed there are now old women in the workhouse, who have always been making lace. But for a good many years it has not been popular with the younger generation; partly, perhaps because machine-made lace has reduced the demand. Of late there has been some attempt to get it taken up by the young women, and that is doing something.

4427. Is that an economic development or a patronised development?—Mainly a patronised development.

Conditions in Axminster Union.

4428. Axminster, I suppose, is an old town?—It is old and small.

The maximum proportion of aged people in the district.

4429. The pauperism was very much higher when you came than it is now? Perhaps you can say something about that administration?—The union has the largest proportion of old folk in the district: the enormous proportion of ninety-four per 1,000 of persons above 65. I have nothing to say in favour of its administration.

4430. Nevertheless there has been a considerable reduction in the rate of paupersim?—There has been a reduction, but I have over and over again represented to the guardians that they are much too indiscriminate in their relief, and last year they passed a vote of censure on themselves in the following resolution: "That more out-relief is given in the Axminster Union than is necessary; and more careful and strict inquiries should be made into new cases that are brought before the board." That is what I have been telling them for the last seven or eight years, and at last they have become convinced of it. I hope something may result.

4431. (Mrs. Webb.) I notice there are seventeen parishes, a population of 15,000 and thirty-three guardians?—It has two watering places in it.

4432. It has very small electoral units to elect the guardians?—Yes.

4433. Has that anything to do with it?—I could not say.

4434. Each guardian must represent a very few heads of families?—No doubt that is so.

4435. (Mr. Booth.) Are there a sufficient number of relieving officers?—Yes, the number of relieving officers there is not too small.

4436. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) Are Axminster carpets made there?—No, none at all I believe now.

Conditions in Exeter and St. Thomas.

4437. (Mr. Booth) We now come to Exeter. St. Thomas is a portion of Exeter; would you wish to treat it separately or would you take St. Thomas and Exeter together?—St. Thomas should be treated separately. It is not part of the Poor Law district, although it is part of the city under the recent Act. St. Thomas is a very wide agricultural union—Exeter is exclusively an urban union. In the ancient city of Exeter itself, which is co-extensive with the Poor Law administrative area, the population does not increase at all, and no changes take place. It is exceedingly flourishing in many ways, because it is the centre for the whole of Devon, except the parts immediately by Plymouth—it is the best shopping centre for all sorts of things; it is the best market and it is altogether prosperous and yet, when I came there I found it had forty-two per 1,000 of the population who were paupers.

4438. Are you speaking now of Exeter proper or St. Thomas?—Exeter proper exclusively. It is a case quite apart; the other is an agricultural Union. I found the administration was very unsatisfactory in many respects; in the first place its workhouse was bad, its accommodation for the sick was adversely criticised by Sir William Chance in an address which he published—I think the epithet he used was "abominable," and altogether it was as bad as it could be. Forty-two per 1,000 for a town of that sort abounding in charities, everybody only wanting to find somebody to bestow charity upon, and poor-law relief given broadcast! They had not grasped until it was represented to them, how much pauperised they were in comparison with other places, and when they came to know that, and came to know that fixed rules were desirable, and that giving relief indiscriminately was not good for anybody, they reformed their ways—one or two very influential guardians took up the matter thoroughly, and instead of having 1,127 outdoor paupers they have at the present time under 500. I think the last return sent to me was 450 something.

Effect of strict administration in reducing pauperism.

4439. It was 510 on January 1st?—Yes, and it has gone down in this last year. That saved them £2,700 a year, so I was then able to go to them and say: Well, now you have been saved this, do not you think you can provide properly for your sick inside the workhouse and build a decent infirmary? They said: That is a fair way of putting it, we will; what do you want us to spend? They have now built a very excellent infirmary, and their poor law relief is going down still. I took the trouble to go round only a week or two ago for the purpose—knowing I should have the honour of being examined before this Commission—of finding out whether there was any hardship from this at all. I went to the clergymen of the different parishes, to the chief constable, to the secretary of the Charity Organisation Society and to the secretary of the Church Army. I had talks with all those people, and the universal opinion was that the result had been wholly beneficial. One of the clergymen, who has a parish of, I think, about 4,000 or 5,000 people—a man who knows the condition of every man, woman, and child in his parish—was able to turn to a book as to all the smaller houses, in which he kept the names of people living in the houses; he could tell you about Mary Smith and William Jones, and every individual, and what they were doing. He was a man who knew all about it, and I went over the old lists of paupers with him. The Exeter guardians do a very useful thing; they print the names of their paupers in their half yearly book, half-year after half-year. Then they circulate these books a great deal, and sometimes people come and say: This man or this woman does not want this relief; he or she has a flourishing son who lives at so and so, and could perfectly well afford to keep her or him; and, on the other hand, someone may come and say: This woman is only getting 3s. a week; it is very hard on her; she ought to have more. It is a very useful thing to do that. I went through some of the names with the present clerk of the guardians; he was once a relieving officer and therefore has a very large knowledge of the whole thing; he was able to indicate this person and that person and say of her, that person is doing very well; she sells apples in the market, or she peddles—she is making herself very comfortable indeed, and her son lives with her. Then someone else now lives with a married daughter—someone else lives with a married son, and so on. Lots of these people who had had relief seven years before, were living on, and had got merged in the general population, and were earning their living, or being supported by people whose proper duty it was to support them, without any harm to anyone, but with great benefit to the ratepayers.

Effect of publication of lists of paupers and amounts of relief given.

4440. Was this beneficial change connected with a change in the personnel of the guardians?—Not of the guardians, but in their methods more particularly; to some extent it was a change in the personnel.

4441. Was it connected with a change in the chairmanship?—No. There they have the plan I very much object to; the Chairman changes every year. It was not connected with that change, but there were one or two exceedingly influential guardians who came round to take my view of it after a short time, and they influenced the others. A good deal is done there by politics, which I hate in poor law, but they went so far as to combine against one guardian who was very obstructive, who was always in favour of relief to everybody, making speeches full of irrelevancies; he was an absolute nuisance in the board of guardians. The two parties combined and said: "We will not have this man any more, we will run an independent man and turn him out. They turned him out, and it has been the greatest blessing possible. It is quite curious the amount of mischief one man can do who is ignorant and who is energetic.

4442. Was it an instigation on your part which brought about the change?—I did not instigate their doing that.

4443. (Mrs. Webb.) Has not there been a great change in the composition of the Exeter board of guardians, in respect of the number of guardians and the elective area?—Yes, that has been a very great advantage. The number has been reduced; it is now only twenty-four, it was, I think, thirty-six.

4444. It was under a local Act, was not it?—Yes.

4445. There were a great many little parishes?—Yes.

4446. Then it was made into one parish?—Yes. Now there are only twenty-four guardians. That one parish is divided into wards. That has had a very beneficial effect. I was talking the other day to the guardian whom I was referring to as being most instrumental in bringing about improvement, and he said: "You must not forget that factor; it has been an uncommonly good thing that we have not had the unwieldy board that we had before.

4447. Are the guardians elected for a ward or for the whole parish?—They are elected for wards, though there may be two for a ward or something of that sort.

4448. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Had not the town council some representation on the board of guardians under that Act?—I know they were very much mixed up with the guardians; the guardians still are called the incorporation of guardians.

4449. (Mrs. Webb.) It is still under the local Act?—Yes.

4450. (Mr. Booth.) I notice that the improvement in St. Thomas is quite as great proportionately as in the Exeter portion. Has there been a similar change in the methods there?—There have been various personal influences which have been at work which have produced improvement. I do not think it is quite so much in proportion, is it?

4451. I think the change is about equal. I have it from forty-four to twenty-seven in the one case and from thirty-seven to twenty-one in the other. At any rate it is very satisfactory?—There has been a very satisfactory change there too.

4452. Due to more or less the same cause; you could not instigate the one without the other knowing of it, naturally?—I think generally it is a very enlightened board of guardians now at St. Thomas, and its composition is excellent; of late years they have addressed themselves to looking into things thoroughly.

4453. Are there endowed charities in either portion?—There are very considerable endowed charities in Exeter, and some certainly in St. Thomas.

4454. Now we will pass to Crediton. There is still a high pauperism there, but a decrease in it?—Yes. There again they have a very large number of old people, eighty-two per 1,000.

4455. Is there any manufacture there that you can mention in particular?—No, none; it is a district rather of large owners. Sir Redvers Buller has considerable property there, and various other people as well.

4456. Have you anything to say about the administration there?—No, I do not think I need comment on it.

4457. Now we come to Torrington. There seems to be some manufacture there?—It is of no importance. Torrington may be spoken of as a purely agricultural place.

4459. And there is a high old age?—Very high old age; an old age figure of eighty-two per thousand. 27 Feb. 1906.

4460. Is the administration there satisfactory?—No, I do not think so. At any rate they do not go on any strict rules at all, and I think that there is not sufficient inquiry as to the cases. I have nothing that I can say particularly as to that. It is not possible to apply any appropriate adjective to it. Aged people in Torrington.

4461. The rate of pauperism has remained practically unchanged during the whole period?—Yes.

4462. Bideford of course is a little port, and there is some fishing I suppose?—A little fishing, and people come to Westward Ho, golfers especially. A large number of visitors stay all about that neighbourhood in the summer. Conditions in Bideford Union.

4463. Have you anything to say about that union?—No; the proportion is not extraordinarily high, though it is higher than it ought to be, considering all things. For some reason that I do not understand the old age is very much less than that of other agricultural unions. The figure is only sixty-seven, whereas other agricultural unions get to seventy-five, eighty, and even ninety.

4464. The bulk of the population you would call agricultural?—It is agricultural mainly, with a few fishermen, but not many.

4465. Not enough to affect the death rate?—No.

4466. Then Holsworthy?—Holsworthy is a very little union on the borders of Devon and Cornwall. Conditions in Holsworthy Union.

4467. (Mrs. Webb.) I notice that Holsworthy has twenty-two parishes and thirty-eight guardians. Each guardian has only seventy-eight families and it is increasing its pauperism?—Yes. Effect of large number of guardians for small union.

4468. (Mr. Booth.) It is one of the few unions that has increased its pauperism since 1895?—Yes; but on the other hand, though it has got more pauperism than it had, its pauperism is not high in comparison with other agricultural unions.

4469. It was lower in 1885 than it is now?—Yes. When the unions are as small as that you really cannot say very much about statistics and averages. It is so small that a very little affects them. Deceptiveness of statistics where small numbers are concerned.

4470. You have this peculiarity which Mrs. Webb has referred to, that it contains very small units of election?—Very small indeed.

4471. (Mrs. Webb.) Does the guardian ever give relief himself in a case like this?—No, I think not. I think it is always given by the relieving officer; but too often the guardian advocates the granting of relief to the people of his parish, and so he rather confuses the functions of witness and judge.

4472. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) The smaller the parish the more likely he is to do that, is he not?—Yes.

4474. The rate of pauperism was reduced, but is still very high?—It is still very high—much higher than it ought to be.

4475. Have you anything definite to say about the administration?—No. It has a rather high rate of old people; viz., seventy-nine per 1,000 but I have no special criticism to make. They look into their cases better than a good many of the agricultural unions, and I do not quite understand what are the circumstances which make its pauperism so high.

4476. We come then to Newton Abbot. There you have a large residential population?—Yes. There are several towns here. There is the town of Newton Abbot itself which is increasing very rapidly. It is said to be the cheapest place in the West of England. Then there are two or three watering places, notably Torquay, Dawlish and Teignmouth. It has an enormous board of guardians; I think there are about eighty of them; and when all those eighty people come, it is very difficult to get business transacted with any amount of efficiency—and they do Conditions in Newton Abbot Union. Low cost of living.

attend very well. It seems to me, from an extensive experience of boards of guardians, that meetings of large numbers are a drawback.

4477. Nevertheless, the administration has been fairly successful there; at least, the rate of pauperism is not great?—The rate of pauperism is not very high.

Effect of unwieldy board of guardians.

4478. But it might be lower?—It might be much lower.

Conditions in Totnes Union.

4479. Now we will take Totnes. I do not know whether there is any port there for shipping which amounts to anything?—There is Dartmouth, which, of course, has the Naval Training College (the "Britannia" that was), and it has a certain amount of shipping, but it has lost some of its regular lines, and now I think there is only one line, from South America, that runs there. It has not any shipping of importance, except such as is connected with the Royal Navy.

4480. The administration there is persistent?—It is pretty fair there. Their rate of pauperism is not very high for a country union; it is rather below the average, I think.

Conditions in Kingsbridge Union.

4481. Now we go to Kingsbridge, which is something similar, is not it?—Kingsbridge has no port. Salcombe cannot be called a port; it is a watering place and a popular yachting resort.

4482. There has been a considerable reduction in the pauperism there in the last ten years?—Yes. It is still high, although the figure has been reduced.

4483. Has there been a change in administration during those ten years?—Yes, they have gone according to rules a good deal more. That was one of the unions which, being extraordinarily high, was particularly attacked, and I think the result has been useful.

4484. It had increased enormously in the previous ten years, I see?—Yes.

Conditions in Plympton St. Mary Union

4485. Then Plympton St. Mary?—In the case of Plympton St. Mary, it is rather difficult to compare the present condition with the past condition, because a good deal of it has been absorbed within the last ten years into Plymouth and Devonport, and it is largely a sort of residential neighbourhood for people who go into one of these towns every day.

Effect of alteration of area on statistics.

4486. Is that the explanation of the increase of pauperism in the last ten years?—I think so.

Conditions in Plymouth Union.

4487. Now we come to Plymouth itself. There the rate of pauperism has been considerably reduced, I see?—Yes, but it is enormously high for a place like Plymouth. With all its advantages, with the amount of money that goes into it from all sources, with the work that is provided in the Dockyards (because although the Dockyards themselves are mainly in Devonport Union, the people very largely live in Plymouth), Plymouth ought to be and is flourishing. I suppose it is the biggest fishing port in the district; there is an enormous number of fishing boats (both trawlers and drifters) which go out constantly, and a great deal of money is poured into Plymouth from various sources. Although for the West of England the pauperism does not seem extraordinary, yet, compared with other places outside, it is very high indeed. While the rate of pauperism has gone down, the absolute number of paupers is rising. The earlier rate was not based on an estimated population, but on a previous census which was not recent. Therefore I rather doubt the value of those earlier figures. Of course, when a place increases very rapidly it ought not to add to its pauperism much, because the people that come into it, for the most part, are attracted by the large amount of employment, and they are of the able-bodied class. It is your old decaying unions that must have more pauperism. Pauperism ought to be very low indeed in Plymouth, but anyone present at one of the meetings of the guardians for half-an-hour would understand quite easily why it does not decrease there.

Effect of a rapidly increasing population on pauperism.

4488. What are the relations between Plymouth and Devonport?—Hostile generally.

4489. Devonport is the naval part, is it not?—I thought for the moment you had in your mind the question of amalgamation, which would be the natural thing, but is quite prevented by local feeling.

4490. I see the rate for Devonport is not only very low, but has been enormously decreased in the last ten years?—I will say something about that when we come to Devonport.

Effect of electoral unit on administration.

4491. (Mrs. Webb.) I was at Plymouth about six years ago, and I understood that a great deterioration in the guardians had taken place when the Plymouth Union was divided up into small wards: that they had become political, and there had been a great deal more out-door relief in consequence?—They are suffused with politics, and there seems to be a race very often as to who shall appeal to what they suppose to be popular opinion, by giving relief to everybody.

4492. Do you think an alteration in the electoral unit for electing guardians from two districts to ten, which was made about 1880, had any effect in making the constitution worse, from the point of view of administering relief?—I cannot compare it with the earlier time. That was before I knew anything of this district. I should say, judged from its results, the present arrangement is not a satisfactory one. Out-door relief has sometimes been given to persons whom I have heard described as a nuisance to the whole neighbourhood—always getting drunk—and they have been having it constantly and for long periods. The relieving officer has stated the facts quite frankly about these people, but the guardians have given the relief.

4493. When I attended the board of guardians, the relief was always recommended by the individual guardian of the ward?—Yes.

4494. The relieving officer was hardly considered at all?—The relieving officers now make their recommendations, but they are constantly over-ridden in the sense of "Let us give relief to everybody."

4495. Each guardian really directs the relief in his own ward?—I should not put it quite so high as that at present.

Merits of different relief committee systems.

4496. (Mr. Lansbury.) Is the relief given in wards or by the whole board?—They have three committees now, I think. They used to take all the cases, until three or four years ago, before the whole board. I found nothing could be more unsatisfactory than that, and I suggested Committees, but they did not arrange the Committees properly. The best way for a relief committee is that each man on the committee should not deal with the paupers from his own ward, but, if necessary, the guardian should be called in to supplement the information given by the relieving officer. That is common sense, otherwise he acts both as judge and as witness. They had nothing of that sort. I have mentioned that to them once or twice. They have kept on their committee system, but they are not satisfied with it. Perhaps at present they are placed in rather a difficulty, because their workhouse is absolutely full—overcrowded. Years ago I pressed them very much to build an infirmary; this was coming on, their workhouse was getting more and more full, and they had more and more difficulty in offering the house as an alternative. Then they passed a resolution in favour of building an infirmary. They wrangled over that for some time, but they eventually sent plans to the Local Government Board for a new infirmary. The Local Government Board accepted those plans. As soon as they got them approved, they passed another resolution saying they would do nothing at all. Then matters went from worse to worse; there has been more and more pauperism, and last year again I persuaded them—and this time I really think I have succeeded in converting the chief opponents of the infirmary scheme. They have submitted plans to the Local Government Board for a new infirmary to hold 300 people. We had a conference; the plans were approved; and they are now, I hope, going to build, but I shall not be quite satisfied until I see that the tenders are accepted.

Conditions Devonport Union.

4497. (Mr. Booth.) Will you now tell us about Devonport?—Devonport is a residential place. It is a place full of people, mostly employed at Keyham. I have mentioned it specially in my statement, and I need not add much. Devonport has a pauperism of only nineteen per thousand—it may be credited with good administration, but it owes its position in part to very favourable circumstances, as its proportion of old persons is the smallest in the district, and the bulk of the population consists of skilled artizans in Government employ, of pensioners, and generally of the well-to-do classes, while over 8,000 men of the Navy and Army swell the number. When you take that 8,000 off, that would raise their rate a little, but still they do their work well and look into things.

4498. The rate of pauperism has been very greatly decreased in the last ten years—has there been any material alteration in the social conditions of the place? Were there not the soldiers and sailors and these advantages as much ten years ago as now?—Yes, except that lately there have been very extensive additions to the dockyard. Sir John Jackson has had huge contracts, amounting to millions of money, and that has been spent mainly in Devonport.

4499. (Mrs. Webb.) May I call attention to the fact that the guardians have been reduced from 116 to 45? (Sir Samuel Provis.) Has the union been altered?—Not that I remember in my time.

4500. There was an alteration in the borough, but I do not know about the union?—Yes, I now find there was a bit taken from Plympton Union in 1898.

4501. (Chairman.) I do not think it would be fair to compare that with the other districts?—It is rather exceptional.

Local Act at Devonport.

4502. (Sir Samuel Provis.) There was an old local Act there, was not there?—Which, as you are aware, was repealed some few years ago.

4503. (Mrs. Webb.) There were 116 Commissioners under that local Act, but now there are only 45 guardians?—It is quite a fairly workable number now.

4504. (Mr. Booth.) That may have had a great influence?—It may have had, but it is a very flourishing and prosperous place.

4505. (Mr. Bentham.) At the same time the area has been increased?—Yes, somewhat.

Conditions in East Stonehouse Union.

4506. (Mr. Booth.) East Stonehouse is also part of Plymouth, is not it?—Yes; it is a very small place between Devonport and Plymouth, but they are extraordinarily careful. They have only one relieving officer, but he is a particularly active man, and he is backed up by quite a small Board. I think there are only a dozen guardians or so.

Conditions in Tavistock Union.

4509. The last union in Devonshire is Tavistock, which is a mining district?—It has almost ceased to be mining now.

4510. Is that tin mining?—It used to have tin and arsenic, and the arsenic works kept on a long time after the tin had disappeared; but even the arsenic manufacture has almost stopped, if not entirely. The extraordinary increase in the price of tin, is resulting in the opening of mines which have been disused for half a century or more, and Tavistock is one of the unions where possibly that may go on. One mine has been opened, which, I think, is within the limits of the Tavistock union, and several are being re-started in Cornwall and on Dartmoor.

4511. The rate of pauperism has been reduced considerably there lately?—Yes.

4512. (Mr. Bentham.) Is it not partly manufacturing now?—I do not think there is any manufacture there.

4513. There is a worsted manufactory there, is there not?—Not that I know of. There may be, but I do not remember any.

4514. (Mr. Booth.) Is there anything you want to say particularly about the administration there?—I do not think so.

Conditions in Stratton Union.

4516. On the other hand, it has a high rate of pauperism, I see?—Yes; but the figures are so small that you cannot infer much from that.

Deceptiveness of statistics where small numbers are concerned.

4517. Are the guardians elected for very small electoral districts?—Generally, I should say so; but that is a matter of fact that I will not answer from memory, because it is not a point that was suggested to me to inquire into.

4518. That is a suggestion which has been made by Mrs. Webb, who finds that a high rate of pauperism coincides in very many cases with small electoral districts for a board of guardians?—That may be so. The fact can be discovered from actual figures, and I would not attempt to give a general opinion on it.

4519. You do not explain in any particular way the high rate of pauperism at Stratton?—No, I do not.

Conditions in Camelford Union.

4520. Then I will take Camelford, which goes along the side of the coast; is that similar to Stratton? It is pretty similar. It has the watering place of Boscastle. It is almost on all fours with Stratton in most respects.

4521. Except that there is some mining there, I think?—Not now, I believe.

4522. Has the mining gone, then? I do not think there is any mining in either of those two unions now.

4523. It would be tin mining if anything, would it not?—Tin mining or china clay, but I do not think there is either.

4524. Are there old mines there?—There may have been in the very remote past, but not for the last half century, I think. There is a big quarry there.

Conditions Launceston Union.

4525. Then take Launceston, what do you say as to that?—Launceston is a very well and very carefully administered union indeed. They have reformed their method of late years, and now, considering all things, Launceston ranks in my estimation almost next to Taunton in goodness of results. You must have a certain number of paupers, you must get a certain irreducible minimum, what with very old people, what with lunatics and so on; but Launceston is quite excellently administered, they are very careful, and they have got good relieving officers, although they have got a great proportion of old people—80 per 1,000.

The irreducible minimum of pauperism.

Aged people in Launceston.

Conditions St. German Union.

4526. Then St. Germans?—St. Germans now is a sort of overflow suburb of Devonport really, as regards a considerable portion of its population. You will see that the old age figure is remarkably low, which means that they have got a very large number of able-bodied people living there. It is a flourishing community, with very few extremely poor people, and they look after their pauperism carefully.

4527. There has been a considerable improvement there in the last ten years, I think?—There has.

Conditions in Liskeard Union:

4528. Now Liskeard?—Liskeard has a high rate of pauperism, but then it has a very high rate of old age—it has 88 per 1,000 of people over 65, and stands next to Axminster in that respect. It has one difficulty which adds to its pauperism, that is to say, a certain number of years ago—perhaps about fifteen or twenty years ago—tin mining there stopped and the tin miners went away, leaving their wives and families behind to a certain extent; at any rate, people clung to the soil after there was nothing for them to make money out of. The result is that a good many of those have gone on the rates. Some of the guardians have been making efforts to reduce the high rate of pauperism there, and I have some hope that in the next few years there will be considerable improvement. At present the relieving officers are not sufficiently backed up, and there is much laxity in the grant of out-relief.

Effect of failure of an industry on pauperism.

4529. Is the tin mining beginning again now at all?—It has not actually begun, but when I was down there about a month ago, they told me there was a mine which they were almost certain to start there, and which might be the beginning of a number of mines starting.

Mr. Herbert Preston-Thomas.

4530. I think it is about twenty years ago since the mining was abandoned; that is about the date you mentioned?—I think it was about that, but I could not speak to that with accuracy.

4531. At that time I see the pauperism was extremely high?—Yes, it was.

4532. Have you anything specific to say about the boards of guardians in Stratton, Camelford, Launceston, St. Germans and Liskeard?—I do not think so.

Conditions in Bodmin Union.

4533. Now take Bodmin; there the pauperism has increased in the last ten years, has it not?—There has been a recent increase up to January 1st, 1905, but surely Bodmin has gone down in the last seven or eight years. That is my impression, but, unfortunately, I have not a print of the return before me.

4534. My figures—and I think they are probably correct—are 29 per 1,000 in 1895, 31 per 1,000 in 1905, and a great reduction upon 1885?—The total figure is low, but, as you say, there was a considerable reduction between 1885 and 1895, and there is a fractional increase between 1895 and 1905.

4535. You have nothing particular to say about that union, I gather?—Nothing.

Conditions in St. Columb Major Union.

4536. St. Columb Major?—That union contains the very flourishing watering place of Newquay, which is accountable for a large part of its rateable value. Its pauperism has somewhat decreased.

4537. Very slightly?—Yes. It has 75 per 1,000 of old people. Dividing the unions into the highest third, the middle third, and the lowest third, St. Columb stands amongst the lowest third; and that, for a mainly agricultural union, is very creditable.

4538. Of course it is residential as far as that watering place is concerned?—Yes, as far as Newquay is concerned, but not otherwise.

4539. Is the administration of the poor law satisfactory?—I have nothing to say against it.

Conditions in St. Austell Union.

4540. Now, what have you to say about St. Austell?—St. Austell is the centre of the china clay industry, which is exceedingly flourishing, as there are great demands for china clay. Formerly, it was only used for making china, but now it is used for paper making, also in Lancashire for adding weight to calico—at least, so I am assured—and for various other purposes.

4541. Is the labour connected with it mere digging?—It is quarried out, and thousands and thousands of tons are sent out to all parts of the world from Fowey. People make a great amount of money out of it, and it always affords plenty of employment.

4542. Is it used at all now for the potteries?—It is used for making china to some extent, but I am told that less than a tenth of the whole amount is used in that way. Some is, I believe, still sent to the celebrated Sèvres manufactory in France, and to some of the other great china manufacturers. It is mainly used for the other purposes I have mentioned.

4543. For adding weight to calico, you say?—Yes, but its chief use is in paper-making. Paper is now mainly made of china clay and wood fibre.

Conditions in Truro Union.

4544. Now we come to Truro?—Truro is an agricultural union with a little cathedral town in the middle of it. I do not think that it has any special features. It has a high old-age figure—83 per 1,000—and it stands about in the middle of the unions as regards pauperism.

4545. But its pauperism shows a considerable reduction in the last ten years, I think?—It has been going down.

4546. Has that been due to better administration?—To some extent.

Conditions in Falmouth Union.

4547. Now take Falmouth?—Falmouth is in a very unfortunate position, inasmuch as it has lost all its trade. It used to be the great port of call, but now it does nothing in that way. Then it used to be a great port for repairing ships when they got into storms in the Channel, but now that the ships are all under steam they are taken into Plymouth. The result is there is a rather high rate of pauperism in Falmouth, and from there, more than from anywhere else in my district, the Local Government Board get applications for making exceptions from the Prohibitory Order as to relieving able-bodied people. Those applications in the aggregate do not relate to large numbers, but they do come more from Falmouth than from elsewhere.

4548. I suppose there is a reducing population?—Yes, there is. At the present time it is becoming a winter watering-place, and probably, having ceased to be a trading place, it will be a watering-place in the future. It has a perfectly delightful climate in the winter, and people are finding that out.

Conditions in Redruth Union.

4549. What have you to say about the Redruth union?—It has a mining population. The two great tin mines of Cornwall are in the union. It has, as you see, a very small old-age figure, which means a very large able-bodied figure.

4550. The number of old has not been high in Redruth, has it?—No, the number is much smaller than in other places. One thing which makes the pauperism greater is that a large number of miners have gone from Redruth to South Africa. They go away, and they send remittances to their wives and children for some time; but many of them, after a while, cease sending remittances, and then the families are thrown on the rates.

4551. Do not the families ever follow them?—Very rarely. A man makes his money there, and then comes back; sometimes, of course, he settles down there. Most of these people have gone to the Transvaal, to the Rand, and so on, where living is so enormously expensive that they cannot afford to take their families with them.

4552. I think Redruth is one of the few unions where the rate of pauperism has steadily increased during the last few years?—It is, and what I have just stated is perhaps mainly the reason. Then, the tin mines have been steadily diminishing in yield.

4553. Would you say that what is left is the residue of the mining?—Yes. They have now to raise a great deal more stuff in order to get the same amount of tin, and it costs much more to raise, because they have to go so much deeper for it. That is the great difficulty. Then they have a good many cases of miners' phthisis, and that has thrown people on the rates. They have to labour under special difficulties there.

4554. Are the mines deep?—Some, such as Carnbrea and Dolcoath are very deep. Apparently there is a revival just coming on, and if it is not stopped by a fall in the price of tin, more mines will be opened about there, and Redruth may flourish again.

4555. Have you anything to say about the administration there?—Nothing occurs to me.

Conditions in Helston Union.

4556. Then we come to Helston; is there any mining at Helston?—I do not think there is a single mine in Helston now.

Effect of a strong administrator on a board of guardians.

4557. I think that there is a pretty considerable reduction in the rate of pauperism in that union?—Yes. It so often comes to the personal equation in the case of these unions. One strong man will do an enormous amount of good, as has been shown, especially in Launceston and Taunton and some other places; but if you have not a strong man there, it is so very much easier to give out-door relief freely than to refuse it. You want your strong man to refuse it; but if you have not got your strong man, then they yield.

4558. I see the proportion of out-relief given in Redruth is more than double what it is in Helston?—It is very large indeed at Redruth, I know.

Conditions in Penzance Union.

4559. The last of these unions in Cornwall is Penzance, and that appears to be extremely satisfactory as regards its pauperism?—Yes. Penzance has always been a puzzle to me, because it has no habit of adhering to rules very strictly. The circumstances of its population are exceptional.

Instance of low rate of pauperism concurrent with lax administration and with large board of guardians.

4560. I notice that its rate of pauperism has been very low, even at a time when on the whole the rate was so much higher; even twenty years ago it was very much the lowest?—Yes, it was.

4561. I have it that it was twenty per 1,000 in 1885, twenty-two per 1,000 in 1895, and eighteen per 1,000 in 1905; so that on the average its rate of pauperism is very much the lowest?—Yes. As to Penzance, I think I can only refer you to what I have said in my printed memorandum: "Penzance comes third with twenty-one per 1,000, its position being partly due to the fact that there seems to be more disclination than elsewhere to apply for Poor Law relief; arrangements exist among some of the fishing population under which the widows and orphans of deceased fishermen are specially provided for; while in parts of the union the market gardens furnish a good deal of light labour for the old and infirm." Then people can live for almost nothing in Penzance. Their staple food is fish, and they can get three or four pilchards for a penny. It is an extraordinarily cheap place, and various circumstances combine to make the pauperism low without any special effort on the part of the guardians.

Low cost of living in Penzance.

4562. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) I see there are sixty-nine guardians on the Penzance Board?—Yes, there are a great number of them.

Large number of guardians.

4563. (Mr. Booth.) So you would say that, in spite of everything the general good conditions keep the rate of pauperism down?—Yes. I have remonstrated with them over and over again, for giving too small allowances to the people they do relieve, and they have raised the allowances from time to time. They tell me when I go next time that they have raised them somewhat, and you can see from the comparative return I have given that some increase has taken place. I went round with the relieving officers of the Penzance union to the different pay stations, spending day after day, and talking with the paupers; but I could not find, after seeing them and hearing what they said, that there was any exceptional distress that ought to be relieved, although I am bound to say that the allowances are extraordinarily low there.

4564. In fact, there, would you say, the usual canons of perfect administration are all lacking, and yet the results are good?—Everything is wrong, except the result. But the relieving officers are particularly efficient.

Possible effect of racial conditions on pauperism.

4565. Let us look for a cause outside the Boards. Have you considered the question of race? In England you do often find, even in counties, almost a different race of people; in contrasting these three counties, Somerset, Devon and Cornwall, do you recognise any difference of that kind? I suppose there are no counties more definitely, separately proud of their individuality than Cornwall and Devon—and I think Somerset shows the same feeling. A Devon man or a Cornishman is proud of his county. That may or not may be a question of race; but it shows at any rate a different spirit in the two counties. Do you trace in this simple Poor Law question a difference between the counties which may be attributable to a difference of race?—There is a very considerable difference as between Devon and Cornwall. The Cornish people are Celts, and one characteristic of them is that they do not drink. The difference between Devon and Cornwall is very curious. The Tamar, in its upper parts, is a wretched little stream that you can walk across without the water getting much above your ankles; and yet I have heard it asserted—perhaps with some little exaggeration—that the people on the two sides of that stream will not have anything to say to each other in the way of marriage. The two counties keep more apart than one would have considered possible. The whole appearance of the people is quite different, and their way of treating things.

4566. Does that difference show itself in the language; does the dialect differ?—Yes, strongly. Then you have the perfect trustworthiness combined with the stolidity of the Devonian, and the greater briskness—I will not say whether it is combined with anything—of the Cornishman.

Effect of good administration in reducing pauperism.

4567. (Chairman.) You have given us some very interesting evidence, and I think the purport of it is that the governing consideration which reduces pauperism in these counties has been good administration?—Certainly.

System adopted by central authority for securing good administration.

4568. Let us clearly understand what are the obstacles to good administration. The Local Government Board wish to inculcate sound principles of administration upon the local boards, but the Local Government Board has, I think, very little authority through its inspectors?—It has very little compulsory authority, but it has great influence through the inspectors. The Local Government Board does not tie its inspectors down by any special instructions. I have never had any instructions as to what is the policy as to this or that matter, with the exception of one or two special circulars. I have been left to apply the general principles, so far as I have been able to collect them from reports, and economic books. As I have said, boards of guardians have shown themselves generally willing, when they have known that they are not doing well, to do better; and I think that has been largely the result of constantly bringing before them comparative statistics, addressing circulars to them as to the differences between this and that union, and preaching proper principles to them.

4569. Then there is no definite code of instructions?—No, none.

4570. And there is no model scheme of what Poor Law administration should be?—Not officially.

4571. I assume that with these rural boards of guardians the disposition is to go on very much as their forefathers did?—Very much.

Tendency of guardians to regard relief as a charity.

4572. Is there not a tendency rather to regard the poor rate as a sort of charitable fund which they have to administer?—One consideration which I have had to press upon them in many places has been that they are not administering a charity, but are discharging a trust with the money of often needy ratepayers.

4573. The result of bringing to their attention comparative statistics and showing them what other boards of guardians do, has, I understand, had a very salutary effect?—It has had a considerable effect in reducing pauperism.

4574. Would you think that your position would be strengthened if you had a more definite code of instructions or some model scheme of administration sanctioned by the Local Government Board, which could be produced as a standard or as a model for any board of guardians to follow?—I do not feel personally that I want anything of the sort. I rather prefer to take my own way of stating what seems to me to be the principle upon which they ought to act. I should be sorry for the details or methods to be stereotyped by the Local Government Board. I should find probably that what would be applicable to one union might not very well be applicable to another, and I might have something thrown in my teeth. If you ask me whether I have felt the want of any definite instructions, I say—No, personally I have not.

Objections to stereotyped instructions from Local Government Board to inspectors.

4575. The legal powers of the Local Government Board are very small, and a wide discretion is left to guardians within broad legal limits; is that not so?—Their discretion is very wide indeed—so wide that till recently in many places the number of relieving officers has been quite insufficient, yet the Board have alway hesitated to exercise their powers of compelling guardians to appoint relieving officers. In my district, a few years ago, I brought forward a very flagrant case at Redruth, where it seemed to me to be absolutely necessary that the Board should for the first time take the course of saying, You shall appoint a relieving officer, and if you do not we shall issue a compulsory order which will be enforceable by mandamus. That has been done in a few instances since, and one or two orders have been actually issued. That precedent has been exceedingly useful, because till the Redruth case the fact was not recognised that the Board could compel them to appoint; and though the power need not be exercised, it is convenient to have it in the background.

Wide discretion of guardians.

4576. Assuming the law in other respects remains much the same, I gather that you would not advocate increased powers being given to the Local Government Board, or to their inspectors?—I have not felt the want of such powers.

Sufficiency of existing powers of Local Government Board and inspectors.

4577. I suppose the real difficulty is that frequently the guardian is a person who is hardly adequate to discharge the very delicate duties that he is called upon to perform Can you suggest anything that would encourage people of force of character and of station in the neighbourhood to take a greater interest in the Poor Law; for instance, assuming that the areas were increased, would that have any effect as regards the character of the guardians who would go upon the boards?—It does not occur to me that that would have any effect. I must say that I dread any considerable alteration of areas; first, on the ground of expense. If there were any change of the sort, what with the officers to be compensated, and what with the new buildings that are generally inevitable, the expense would be very great indeed. You always think, of course, that if you bring the paupers of two unions into one, that will be a saving; but in the long run you do not find it so. I have had some experience in this direction. There were two unions in my late district, and the workhouse of one of them was abolished years ago. But it acted very badly, and those two unions collectively were among the highest in pauperism of that district, if they were not quite the highest. I consider that the present areas of unions—speaking quite generally, and confining myself to my own district—are excellently arranged, generally about the market towns, and they are quite big enough.

Objections to increasing size of Poor Law areas.

Difficulties of classification by workhouses.

Sometimes we have had meetings on the question whether unions could not be amalgamated. We had one in my late district, and we have had one in Devon, the object being to avoid expense by having one workhouse for two unions. But we found immediately that nobody would give up his own workhouse, although willing to have paupers from elsewhere. The universal feeling at the two or three meetings we had was —"No, it would not be fair to take the sick so far from their friends;" and "If you classify by workhouses instead of by people you will split up families and you will have great difficulties." Altogether I am very well satisfied, generally speaking, with the areas; and I do not myself think that any change of areas would give you much better administrators. Of course, the county councils are excellent in many ways, but then the county councils have plenty to do, and some of them are complaining that they have too much to do. If county councils had to deal with pauperism through their committees, I do not think you would gain in the long run.

Objections to county council as Poor Law authority.

Scheme for transferring imbeciles to care of county councils.

4578. (Mr. Booth.) You have told the Commission that you wish to take the imbeciles out of the workhouses and to put them into institutions; those institutions would not be institutions belonging to each union, would they?—No.

4579. So you do contemplate larger areas for certain specific purposes?—I would make the imbeciles a county charge, and let the county councils deal with them as a special class, just as they deal with the lunatics as a special class now; but I would not in any other respect alter it.

4580. You mean that you would not deal with any other classes on that basis?—Yes.

Convenience of existing Poor Law areas.

4581. (Chairman.) As regards the administration of the Poor Law, I take it that you think the present areas are satisfactory?—That is my opinion. There are some cases like the unions which I mentioned earlier to-day, which are popularly called the Three Towns, namely, Devonport, Plymouth, and East Stonehouse, which are all in a ring fence, and which obviously ought to be one town, but the local jealousies are so great that if you tried to amalgamate them by a local Act you would be fighting for years, and thousands and thousands of pounds would be spent in opposing the Bill, and I am not sure whether it would not break down in the end, simply because of those local jealousies.

4582. You became inspector in this district in 1897, did you not?—Yes.

4583. The Local Government Act of 1894 must have been in operation then; did it materially affect the character of the guardians?—I have heard it said that it did; but I cannot compare the present boards with anything before, because I knew nothing of the district in those days.

4584. You have said that in 1897 you were not satisfied with the system of Poor Law administration that prevailed in many unions, and then you were speaking of a state of things prior to any change that has been effected since 1894, were you not?—I was rather speaking of the state of things which I found when I took charge of the district.

Miscellaneous types of guardians.

4585. Do you think that the general intelligence and intentions of the present boards of guardians are satisfactory?—I am afraid that is rather a difficult question to generalise upon. I know boards of guardians which contain many very intelligent men. On the other hand, there are some which contain members who apparently have other motives than the actual administration of the Poor Law in the best possible way.

4586. Would you suggest any other method of election than that which now prevails?—I have none to suggest. Perhaps I might give an example of the motives which influence boards of guardians. On one occasion I was pressing very much that a particular board should inquire into the out-relief system, and a very prominent member got up and said, "We are sent here to give outdoor relief to our relations—our fathers and our mothers and our sisters and our brothers and our cousins and our uncles and our aunts; and if we did not do it, we should very soon be sent about our business." That statement was received without dissent from any of them.

Lax views of guardians as to out-relief.

4587. But you did not find that feeling generally, did you?—Not generally; but there are one or two unions in which there is too much of that.

4588. You have told that us at Exeter they publish a list of those receiving poor relief; what effect has that publication had on the community, and on the pople receiving the relief?—That has been done for a great number of years, and it has had a very useful effect. It is done by a great many unions. They publish a list of the paupers, the amount given to each, and the cause of destitution; sometimes the age of the pauper is given. In some unions the list is published half-yearly, and in some it is published yearly. Exeter publishes the list half-yearly. I think it has had an excellent effect. It is sent round to clergymen and others likely to be acquainted with the condition of the poor, in order that they may state any case in which they think that the person to whom the allowance is made ought not to be on the list or that the amount given is wrong.

Effect of publication of names of paupers.

4589. Would you see any objection to making that practice uniform?—No; I think, however, that some of the small unions would grumble a little at having the list printed. They can publish the list now if they like, and I often find that if you compel people to do things which they might do, and do not care to do, not much good arises from it.

4590. I think you would like to say something as to the method of choosing officers?—Yes. Perhaps I might read a short extract from one of my reports on this subject. "I have more than once had occasion to wish that particular boards of guardians would take a more enlightened view as to their responsibility in the matter of choice of officers. Local considerations and personal acquaintance have often an undue weight, and sometimes the question seems not to be whether the candidate is fitted for the office, but whether the salary is needed by the candidate. I am certainly not inclined to attach excessive importance to testimonials alone; indeed, I have now and then had reason to believe that the amount of eulogy in a particular testimonial has reflected the strong desire on the body giving it that the services of the person recommended should no longer be devoted to themselves. But I have seen local candidates, with little or no experience in the Poor Law, preferred, in the case of such appointments as those of workhouse masters and matrons, to apparently much more eligible applicants, the evidence of whose superior qualifications ought not, as it seemed to me, to have been put aside without much more consideration than it has received." I have come across flagrant instances of the kind. There was one case in a rather important workhouse, where a man was appointed master who had been at sea all his life. He was appointed straight away because he was a local man. He had got tired of the sea, but when he was appointed to the workhouse he was more at sea than ever. He did not make a good workhouse master, and he is no longer in office. Then, broken-down farmers not infrequently are appointed. The Local Government Board have no power in the matter. No qualifications are prescribed for masterships of workhouses, and it would be difficult to prescribe any. The actual choice must rest with the guardians, but it now and then happens that people are jobbed in for their own sake instead of for the sake of the office. I wish some means could be found of bettering this. On the whole, I think we have wonderfully good masters and matrons, notwithstanding the defect which I have pointed out as to their appointment. I have had all sorts of evidence of the kindness of masters and matrons —especially to the old paupers—and of the fondness of the inmates for them. People talk about workhouses being Objections to existing method of choosing officers of guardians.

Question of prescribing qualifications for guardians' officers.

Bastilles and about the barbarous treatment in workhouses; all I can say is that, talking to paupers constantly alone and away from any officers, and talking freely with them, in 99 cases out of 100 I have heard nothing but gratitude for the treatment they have received. In numberless instances people who have refused to go to the workhouse, and who have had to be almost forced to go there—you cannot quite force them, unfortunately—after they have been there a couple of months have said, "If I had known this was so comfortable I should have been here long ago."

4591. Would you suggest that the Local Government Board should have a veto on the appointment of any officer?—To a certain extent they have a veto now; that is to say, their approval is required, but as long as no qualifications are prescribed for any particular office, practically the choice is left to the guardians. Now and then the guardians can be asked to reconsider it in the case of particular appointments, but if they stick to their guns and appoint the original person whom they want to job in, the Local Government Board have to give way.

4592. Would you suggest that the qualifications should be defined?—There would be very considerable difficulty in defining them, but I have had some doubt as to whether in the larger workhouses you should not require some evidence of experience or knowledge of the poor law before appointing. I think that is a matter which deserves some consideration, let us say, in regard to workhouses where there are over 100 or over 150 inmates.

4593. What have you to say to us on the subject of superannuation?—I should like to call special attention to a point in regard to nurses. The Superannuation Act has improved very much the class of men who have become Poor Law officers. People feel that it is a provision for life. For instance, the office of relieving officer is an office that is very much coveted. There are always numerous candidates, even when the salary is very small. The Superannuation Act has given us an excellent class of officers. On the other hand, it may have added a little to the difficulty of getting rid of them. I have known an instance of a relieving officer who was not quite bad enough to be dismissed, but he was an incompetent man and would probably have been sent about his business, but the Guardians said, "Well, he has paid towards his superannuation for so many years, and he will get his pension in six years more, so we must keep him." There are isolated instances of that kind. The one direction in which the Superannuation Act seems to me to want some amendment is some special provision for nurses. In my Memorandum I say, "The one point in which the Poor Law service might have been expected to afford an attraction to the number of fairly educated women in need of a life's employment, viz., the provision of a pension for old age, has proved a signal failure. Nearly all nurses contract themselves out of the Superannuation Act, probably because it does not allow them to retire until they have devoted almost a life-time to the service. If it were possible to introduce a system under which any trained nurse could, after twenty or twenty-five years' service, claim a pension of £25 or £30 per annum, payable by the State, the difficulty experienced by so many women of providing for themselves after middle age would be to some extent surmounted, and it is conceivable that the service might attract candidates—especially if means for training them locally were organised." It seems to me that when the question of Exchequer grants to local authorities comes to be considered—and I believe the Local Taxation Commission were pretty well agreed that they ought to be made to a larger extent than at present—the question of establishing a special pension fund for nurses will deserve consideration. Nurses now are extraordinarily hard to get. Women do not like to take to workhouse nursing, which is very disagreeable in many ways and consists to a great extent in feeding and keeping clean a large number of people who are only slowly dying. There are very few interesting cases in a workhouse—very few cases that a nurse really cares to have—and you want rather a special class of nurse for them. I should therefore like to offer such attractions as some scheme of superannuation would give them. After all, I think the total number of workhouse nurses in the country, is only about 6,000; even supposing—which it is absurd to suppose—that you had at once to pension all those with twenty years' service, and taking the highest figure I have mentioned, £30, the amount required would be inconsiderable; and I believe that you would get a great return for your money by attracting a larger number of people to become workhouse nurses—and workhouse nurses are a very great want at the present time.

Mr. Herbert Preston-Thomas.

4594. Then I think you would like to say something about boarding-out; has that answered very well, do you think?—I think we want to know more about it. Speaking of boarding-out within the unions, I have been made aware of various cases in which it has not answered well. I think it was Miss Clifford who said that, thoroughly well supervised and arranged, it was the best system for blending the pauper with the general population; but while in theory you may multiply your inspections and you may multiply all sorts of checks; in practice you do not get adequate supervision. Then your superior class of artisan does not want to be bothered with strange children. Our inspector of boarding-out, Miss Mason—she has only got to do with boarding-out outside the unions—is constantly saying, "We cannot get the homes." Then, again, people do not take these children for charitable purposes; they are not philanthropists; they take them in to make money, and the worse they treat them, and the worse they feed them, and the worse they clothe them, the more money they will make. You have always got that bed-rock, as it seems to me, and it is very hard to get over it by any amount of supervision. Perhaps everything practicable has been done as regards visits from relieving officers, medical officers, and so on; but I should like to know a good deal more, and to have some investigation into 200 or 300 cases of boarding-out within different unions by some entirely unprejudiced person who would look into the system and report whether it is acting well. My impression is that a good many bad cases would be found.

Difficulties of boarding-out system for children.

Suggested inquiry into boarding-out system.

4595. Have any bad cases come before you?—Several, within my district.

4596. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Within the union cases?—Yes.

4597. (Chairman.) Would that objection apply to boarding-out outside the union?—To a certain extent. I believe there are more committees in that case—I only know from Miss Mason's reports—but there seem to be committees who recognise their responsibility. Very often within the unions there are committees whose duty it is to look after the children, but it is only a paper duty, and some of them do not do much.

4598. I observe that in nearly all the unions the children who are not boarded-out are lodged in the workhouse and attend a public elementary school?—That is so.

Pauper children lodged in workhouse and sent to public elementary schools.

4599. I think that you have reported that that system has worked very well?—For myself I would sooner have all the children removed from the workhouse, but I think that system does work fairly well and produces good results. You have this great difficulty though, that the children are in the workhouse for the greater part of two days every week, namely, every Saturday, when they do not go to school, and every Sunday, when only a few of them may go to Sunday school. Therefore, two days out of the seven, they are more or less in the workhouse, besides being there every morning and every evening. What happens? Either they are strictly under discipline, strictly kept apart under an officer—which it is very hard to do in a small country workhouse—and therefore, they cannot call their souls their own; or else you go to the other extremity, and they walk about the workhouse and mix with the others as they like, and so come into constant contact with adult paupers whose influence is depraving.

4600. Of the paupers now receiving relief in your district is there a considerable proportion who had, as children, been brought up in the workhouse?—That I cannot say. It would want enquiry and a detailed return to show. Probably there would not be many. There is one union I know of in which quite recently three young girls, all sisters, came back one after the other. They had all been brought up in the workhouse and had been said to be very nice girls when they were there, but they all three came back with illegitimate children. That was, however, an exceptional case. I should say, generally, that workhouse children, even under the present arrangement (which seems to me to be to a certain extent faulty) do, for the reasons I have said, exceedingly well. In the first place they are brought up with great cleanliness, then they are well looked after, and they are uncommonly well-fed.

Advantages of scattered homes.

4601. Are you in favour of building children's homes?—I think the scattered homes are excellent. I have had no experience of grouped homes in my district. I have seen some in other districts, as the Board allowed me to go round to various parts of England for my own information and see grouped homes and scattered homes, when I was thinking of getting some introduced into my district. I did not like the grouped homes so well, because it seemed that there was an unmixed atmosphere of pauperism about them. I have scattered homes in five of my unions, and the more I see of them the more I like them, when guardians take the trouble, as they have done in my unions, to get the right sort of women to look after them. I think the number of fifteen, which was originally suggested by the Board as the maximum number, is a little too big; fifteen children is a greater number than one woman can very comfortably look after, especially if most of them are small and therefore cannot help much in the work of the house.

Comparative cost of children in scattered homes and in workhouse.

4602. Is the system costly?—No; but it is rather more costly than keeping them in the workhouse. I have given particulars in my memorandum. In Plymouth the cost is 6s. 11d. per child. I dissuaded them very much from any idea of building houses. I said, "If you rush into bricks and mortar, there may come something or other to change the whole system, and then you will have had this expenditure and you will lose the benefit of it after a few years; but if you take a house, at any rate you will not lose any more than the rent, and then if the system is changed, and you have to put the children elsewhere, you will not do any harm. There is the old proverb, "Fools build houses and wise men live in them;" you will have to pay a great deal more for building a house than you will have to pay for buying a house, or renting a house." They followed my advice, and did not build at all. Including everything, cost of administration, salaries necessaries, coals and rates, it works out at Plymouth to 3s. 8d. for maintenance, clothing and necessaries, and 3s. 3d. for salaries, rent, interest on loans and repairs, giving a total for each child of 6s. 11d. At Newton Abbot it is rather more, 8s. 1d.; at Barnstaple it is 7s. 1d.; at Wells it is 6s. 11d., and at St. Austell it is only 5s. 4d. They get their houses very cheap and they run the thing very economically at St. Austell.

4603. (Mr. Phelps). Why is the maintenance so high at Barnstaple; the average is 3s. 8d. or 3s. 10d., but it suddenly goes up to 4s. 10d. at Barnstaple?—I am afraid I cannot explain that. It happens that I only had these particulars three or four days ago, so I have not had time to go into the figures.

4604. (Chairman). What would a child cost if he was in the workhouse; have you any idea?—The cost in the workhouse varies very much indeed, but I should think it would be about 2s. 10d. for food and 1s. 4d. or 1s. 6d. more for establishment charges. Perhaps it would be about 5s. taking it altogether, but there are great variations in different workhouses, and it is scarcely practicable to strike an average.

4605. (Mr. Nunn). What sort of things would "necessaries" include?—"Necessaries" would be coals, gas, and various small things of that sort; I think it would be mainly those things.

4606. (Mr. Bentham). I suppose "necessaries" would include everything except rent, interest on loans, food, and salaries?—I have separated salaries, rent, interest and repairs in those figures which I have given in my memorandum.

4607. (Mr. Nunn). "Necessaries" do not include food?—They come in the one item of "maintenance, clothing and necessaries."

Table showing connection between pauperism, old age and wages.

4608. (Chairman). I think you wish to hand in a table showing the connection between pauperism and (1) old age and (2) wages?—Yes. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. VIII. (C).)

4609. (Mr. Booth). Are the wages in this table taken from the Board of Trade returns?—I have taken them from Mr. Wilson Fox's return of 1902. I have taken the pauperism from the figures of 1902, and the number of people over sixty-five years of age from the Census of 1901. As the Commission will notice, this table deals with counties. I have hitherto been dealing entirely with my own district, and I have ventured to put in this table for the whole of England simply by way of emphasising the fact how extraordinarily pauperism does depend on old age. The counties are arranged in order of pauperism, and in the six most pauperised unions the proportion of persons over sixty-five years of age ranges from sixty-five to seventy-seven per 1,000, and the agricultural wages range from 14s. 6d. to 16s. 4d. Then going to the other end, and taking the six least pauperised unions, the old age figure in four of them is below forty and in no case reaches fifty, while in five the wages range from 19s. 10d. to 21s. 7d., and in one only are the wages below 17s. That is in Warwickshire where, for reasons explained by Mr. Wilson Fox, there is much difficulty in striking an average. My table gives the agricultural wages, and of course agricultural wages do not indicate the wages of working men in a county like Warwickshire, which is mainly a manufacturing county. As to the old age figure, it is very striking to notice that all the most pauperised counties have the greatest old age, and all the least pauperised counties have the least old age. Devonshire, for instance, has an old age figure of sixty-nine per 1,000, but the corresponding figure in Lancashire is thirty-three per 1,000. That is an extrardinary difference as between a manufacturing and an agricultural county, which is perhaps worth your attention.

Large proportion of aged at Axminster.

4610. (Dr. Downes.) Is there anything special in the circumstances of Axminster to attract such a proportion of old people as you show in your Table, namely 94 per 1,000?—No; I have not been able to understand why there should be so many, unless there has been an enormous amount of migration from it of the young and vigorous, who have left the old and feeble behind them. That is the only explanation I can give. Between the two censuses there was a reduction of nearly 10 per cent. in the population of the Axminster Union.

4611. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) Would that be due mainly to the rural question?—The union is mostly in a rural district.

Question of transfer of vaccination administration from guardians to statutory authorities.

4612. (Chairman.) Would you like to say anything on the subject of vaccination, and the functions of Poor Law Boards in connection with it?—Yes. Vaccination was originally given to boards of guardians in the time when arm-to-arm vaccination was in vogue, and when therefore you had to collect a lot of children together in order to give adequate choice of lymph. It was necessary then that you should have tolerably big areas, and the work was placed in the hands of the guardians as the only authorities available. Then sanitary authorities were constituted, but the vaccination was not transferred to them. At the present time, when calf lymph has been substituted for arm-to arm vaccination, it really does not matter whether your district is big or little, and therefore the reason which used to operate against giving it to the sanitary authorities all over the country, some of which were very small, has ceased to exist. It is the one quasi public health function that the guardians possess; it complicates their business, it is a burning question in many places, and it has no relation whatever to any of their other work. I really do not see why it should not be transferred from them at the first opportunity.

Status of Superintendent-Registrar.

4613. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Is the Registrar the servant of the board of guardians at present?—Generally, but not always, he is, as a matter of fact, the clerk to the guardians. As Registrar he is the servant, not of the guardians but of the Registrar-General in London.

4614. (Sir Samuel Provis.) You are speaking now of the Superintendent Registrar are you not—not of the Registrar of Births and Deaths?—I am speaking of the Superintendent Registrar.

Poor Law system in Switzerland.

4615. (Chairman.) I think now you would like to say something about the workhouse system in Switzerland, to which I understand you have paid special attention?—I have only a few words to say in answer to your Lordship's question as to Switzerland. I happened to be in

Mr. Herbert Preston-Thomas.

27 Feb. 1906.

Italy some time ago, and the Local Government Board allowed me on my way home to make inquiry as to vagrancy in Switzerland, and as to the various methods of dealing with it. In the course of that inquiry I visited a great many institutions, among them forced labour farms, workhouses, poor-houses, orphanages, and so on. I need not say much about the Swiss workhouses, because they are rather the English workhouses of forty or fifty years ago, with a considerable absence of classification The sanitary arrangements are such as do not exist in any English workhouses; the management is of a very economical character. The people are fed very largely on a vegetable diet—vegetable soups, and so on; I tasted some, and it seemed to me excellent and appetising, but still not nearly so costly as the diet in our workhouses. We have not much to learn from Swiss workhouses, but it is noticeable that some inmates are compulsorily detained there. There was one feature which I thought very good. Many have a considerable amount of land, and a good deal of farm labour is done on it. Owing to the Swiss capacity for extracting everything that is good from the land, they work their farms very well and very economically. Another part of the Swiss method struck me as admirable; that is their system of forced labour farms. In England, if a man drinks heavily, and if he will not maintain his wife and children, and they apply to the rates for help, we take some futile proceedings against him, and sometimes he is sent to prison for a fortnight or some short period of that sort. In a very large proportion of the cases, he goes on with his drink and he goes on with his neglect, sometimes with a little imprisonment, now and then a period of prison. The Swiss way of dealing with that sort of man is not, like ours, to commit him for a fortnight or a month to a prison where he is better fed and has less work than he would have in a workhouse, but to send him for a year or a couple of years to a forced labour farm. I went to one between the Lake of Bienne and the Lake of Neuchatel. It covered about 2,000 acres. It was land which had been originally marsh land. By admirable management they had reclaimed it. They had added something like £17,000 to its value, and they had erected the buildings—all by the labour of the people sent there. It was worked with extraordinary economy, so that practically it was almost paying its own expenses. Between 150 and 200 people were kept there, and the only grant from anyone was an allowance of about £1,200 a year from the Cantonal authorities. They were constantly reclaiming more land, and consequently making this farm more valuable. The system struck me as an admirable way of dealing with wastrels. They have no hesitation in sending a man there for a year or two years, and then he is occupied from early morn to dewy eve, and has to work hard the whole time. Sometimes, if he has been a drinker, as he is cut off from drink, he gets out of the habit of drinking; and if he has been a loafer, as he is cut off from all chance of loafing, he gets to be a worker. It has certainly done wonders in Switzerland. I should like to see some of our people who leave their families on the rates, instead of being treated in our mild way and being left to go on drinking and neglecting their families, committed for a period of years to a place where you could utilise their labour and where you would have a chance of effecting some reformation. There is one other thing that I should like to mention; in various Swiss Cantons there is a strict prohibition against innkeepers supplying alcoholic drink to anybody in receipt of Poor Law relief. I am quite sure that would be a good thing, if it could possibly be enforceable in this country. One of the most pitiable things I know is that when inmates of workhouses here get leave for a day, a number of them come back either absolutely drunk or else under the influence of liquor. If we could do anything to prevent that, and to make it a penal offence to serve paupers with liquor, just as we make it a penal offence to serve anyone who is on the Black List, I think it would have an uncommonly good effect. It would also prevent the money of the ratepayers which is given for out-door relief being spent in drink. I think it is worth seeing what Switzerland has done in this way.

Prohibition of sale of drink to paupers.

4616. How do they know who are the persons who are in receipt of Poor Law Relief?—I suppose, following the same analogy, just as we know the people who are on the Black List under our system. I speak with some ignorance, but I believe that a certain list is sent round to the publicans, and a publican is fined if he supplies liquor to anybody on the Black List under the Licensing Act. I suppose something of the same sort might conceivably be done in regard to people in receipt of Poor Law relief.

4617. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Do they print the roll of paupers in Switzerland?—I am afraid I cannot say.

4618. (Chairman.) Going back to the forced labour farms, are these persons compulsorily detained there?—Yes.

Compulsory detention in Swiss Labour Colonies and punishment for attempts to escape.

4619. What punishment is inflicted on them if they escape or try to escape?—They are only brought back, but sometimes there is a slight punishment in connection with the diet. They have to wear a distinctive, although not a very conspicuous dress. The police in Switzerland are very active. Then there is the additional security for recapture that each man must have a dossier, and if he sleeps two nights at a place, he is sure to have a policeman coming to see his papers.

Mr. Edmund Pearse Burd.

5 Mar. 1906.

4620. (Chairman.) You are now Inspector of Audits under the Local Government Board, I believe?—I am.

4621. You have previously had considerable experience as auditor, have you not?—Yes, in Lancashire.

Duties of Inspector of Audits, &c.

4622. Do you yourself audit now?—No.

4623. Your inspection of the work of your auditors is a local inspection, is it not?—Yes.

Ratepayers' right to inspect books and object to expenditure.

4624. You have given us a clear statement, I think, of your duties (see Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. IX. (A)). Among other things, you state the fact that the books have to be for seven clear days open to inspection by any person liable to be rated to the poor rate; do ratepayers avail themselves of that?—Occasionally they do, but very rarely.

4625. Did you ever get a complaint before the audit has begun from a ratepayer in connection with any expenditure?—I never did.

4626. Or have the auditors, so far as you know?—Not as far as I know, directly, but I believe occasionally the Board have received objections which have been sent to the Auditors.

4627. So that the interest taken by the ratepayers in the audit is small?—It is very small. Occasionally, interest is aroused, and you get a Ratepayers' Association attending before the auditor and objecting to certain items in the accounts. As a rule, though, I do not suppose it would be one audit in a hundred that any person attends for the purpose of making any actual objection; of course, when I am speaking of a hundred audits, I am taking the big and the little authorities together.

Extent of Auditors' discretion.

4628. Are your duties very strictly defined, or have you any discretionary power of interpreting what is extravagance?—In determining what is extravagance, the auditors have discretionary power; in determining what is legal and what is illegal, they have no discretionary power; if expenditure is illegal they are bound to disallow it.

4629. Of course under their instructions, however venial may be the error, if technically it is an error, it has to be reported?—If it is an illegal error it has to be reported, and it has to be disallowed; if it is merely a thing that the auditor thinks he can deal with himself he would not disallow it.

Auditor's position when consulted by Guardians as to legality of proposed expenditure.

4630. Do the board of guardians ever, in advance of an expenditure, consult the Local Government Board or the Audit Department of the Board as to whether the expenditure they propose is legal or not?—I think they very often ask the district auditor to say whether he considers certain expenditure legal; but a district auditor would go out of his way if he told them whether it was legal or whether it was not. He is not their consulting legal adviser.

4631. Do you consider that his duty is not to give that advice, but simply to concentrate his attention on the accounts when presented?—I should look at it in this way: I should think if he could trust the man who asked him he would give the advice, but would say, "It is my personal opinion." It makes a great deal of difference when you know whom you are dealing with. To one man you can say one thing, but to another man you dare not say it.

4632. For fear that the opinion which is given as a personal opinion, might afterwards be held to be binding on the Department of which the auditor was the representative?—On the auditor certainly, but not on the Department.

Procedure of auditor as regards unnecessary relief.

4633. Now, in regard to the discretionary power which the auditor has; what is the form of the expenditure in connection with which that has most to be exercised—would it be out-door relief?—It would be almost entirely in connection with the out-door relief.

4634. Would the question whether the amount was excessive be a point that he could take into consideration?—He would take into consideration the conditions of each particular case that he had to deal with. Cases are constantly cropping up where relief is given where the incomings of the family show there is no destitution. Those are cases that a district auditor has power to deal with.

4635. Are there any rules, or is there any standard laid down, by which he would be able to decide without exercising his own discretion whether the relief was uncalled-for?—No. He has to take every case on its merits. It depends entirely on the conditions of the particular case.

Difficulty of a uniform standard for "necessary" relief.

4636. Is there any difficulty in enforcing uniformity in the decisions of the auditors in the different districts?—I do not think it would be possible to have uniform decisions—the cases differ so very much. You could not lay down a rule that in one district if 10s. a week came in the family should be considered to be destitute, and in another district if there were 10s. a week coming in it should not be considered to be destitute. The districts vary so much that there is quite that much distinction between them, and in one district you might say 10s. a week for the family should not be considered to be destitution. Not only that, but it depends on the number of the family too; so I do not see that it would be possible to lay down any hard and fast line.

4637. I assume that inspecting as you do all the auditors, at their work, you are endeavouring to establish something like uniformity?—Certainly.

4638. Do you find that some district auditors are very much stricter than others in their interpretation of their instructions?—It is rather difficult to say; I have not noticed it Mode of exercise by auditors of their discretionary powers.

4639. Do you think that the discretion which they have got is, on the whole, used wisely and works well?—I think so, quite. An auditor, as a rule, has to remember that the local authority have presumably considered the matter before him, and that they have a discretion to a very great extent, and unless he sees they abuse that discretion he would not interfere with it.

4640. I notice that you say you have never in practice made an audit of out-door relief given under an order of the justices?—I never have.

4641. That refers, I suppose, not only to your own experience, but to the experience practically of the auditors who have been under you?—I was making inquiries the other day, and I believe there has not been a case reported for fifteen years.

Auditors' powers as regards contracts.

4642. What are the powers of the auditor as regards contracts? Has he merely to see that the terms and prices of the contracts are adhered to, or can he go behind the contracts?—He could certainly go behind a contract. Those contracts are all based on tenders, and if the tenders show that the amounts tendered are improper, the auditor certainly would have power to go behind them. It would not be often that he would know that they were improper, but occasionally it would occur.

4643. Have any cases occurred within your knowledge where there has been an investigation into the contracts?—I always used to see the contracts and I believe auditors now do so and check them with the expenditure so as to see that the amounts are correct. But I have heard of cases where tenders were made in respect of large quantities at unreasonably low prices, and small quantities at unreasonably high prices, and it is almost an impossibility for the district auditor who does not know the actual circumstances, to go behind that. That is a way in which it is possible to get round the question of the tender.

4644. Have any contracts been upset by the Board within your knowledge?—No.

4645. Is it, therefore, your general experience that the contracts are, on the whole, fairly made?—I think so.

Procedure for stock-taking.

4646. Do the auditors do any stock-taking work?—No, that is the duty of the guardians. In certain cases, there are stock-takers appointed, that is, the Local Government Board issue Orders, and in certain unions stock-takers are appointed to check the stock.

Procedure on discovery of fraud by an officer.

4647. If your investigations show that any fraud has been committed by any official, I assume the Local Government Board brings pressure to bear upon the guardians in connection with that official?—If it is required; occasionally the guardians act immediately and refer the matter to the Local Government Board.

4648. I think you also audit the accounts of other branches of local expenditure?—The audit staff do.

4649. The municipalities are under a special clause of their own, are they not?—Except as to education, and the accounts of eight boroughs subject to Government audit under the provisions of Local Acts.

4650. But the system of control, and I suppose of audit, in connection with other branches of administration is much the same as that applied to the Poor Law?—It is based on the Poor Law system.

Observations on existing form of union accounts.

4651. On the whole, do you think the system works well?—I think I have seen almost every form of account that it is possible for a local authority to produce. When I was in Lancashire I had to change urban district councils accounts from their old form into the form that was required by the Local Government Board under an Order of 1880. In my own mind I am quite satisfied that the system of account for unions is as simple as it is possible for an authority to use. I have never seen a better. This does not apply to the workhouse masters' accounts.

Enforcement of certificate of surcharge by auditor.

4652. There are a considerable number of surcharges made every year; I believe the auditors' functions cease when he disallows or surcharges?—Unless he has to enforce his certificate.

4653. The option of whether the surcharge should be enforced or not does not rest with you; it rests with another branch of the Local Government Board, does it not?—Yes; it rests with the Audit Appeals and Sanctions Department of the Local Government Board, if there is an appeal to the Board.

Mr. Edmund Pearse Burd.

5 Mar. 1906.

4654. (Sir Samuel Provis.) But in the absence of an appeal it is the duty of the auditor to enforce his certificate, is it not?—Yes, or after an appeal, if the Board decides not to remit, and does not reverse the auditor's decision.

Insufficient check on balances in hands of officers continuing in office.

4655. (Chairman.) Could you suggest any improvement in the system of audit, or make any recommendation which would strengthen or simplify the check that is now in force?—I do not think there is any improvement required as regards the union accounts qua union; but in the overseers' accounts there are several things that might be beneficially altered. One of those touches the union accounts, that is, as to certifying the balance due from officers who continue in office. The auditors find a very great difficulty on that point now. One of the statutes provides that they shall not certify a balance due from an officer continuing in office. There are a great many officers who continue in office from year to year, and they have balances in hand at the end of the year, but the district auditor is powerless to deal with those.

4656. These balances are, I suppose, public funds?—They are generally balances of rate moneys. If district auditors could require that any balances in collecting officers' hands at the date the accounts are closed should be paid over to the authority, it would considerably strengthen the audit.

4657. That is a recommendation which you would make?—I certainly should make it.

Insufficiency of ratepayers' right to inspect poor law books.

4658. Have you any other suggestions to make?—There is a question, which I believe, interests the Commission a great deal, and that is as to the position of the ratepayers and so on, as to the inspection of accounts by ratepayers prior to the audit. The law in connection with the inspection of documents prior to the union audit is not as good as it is under the Public Health Act in connection with the urban district audit; Sub-section 4 of Section 247 of the Public Health Act gives a better power than the Poor Law does.

4659. And that power under the Public Health Act you think might with advantage be applied to the Poor Law?—Yes.

Question of insufficient definition of poor law terms.

4660. If the General Consolidated Order were revised, and there was a simpler definition given to "able-bodied" and other terms which now are undefined, I assume that would help your audit?—Anything that would tend to complete definition would help the audit.

4661. Do you find any inconvenience from lack of accurate definition?—Personally I do not.

4662. It is not a subject of complaint at all, is it?—No, I never heard a complaint.

4663. I assume that the guardians give every assistance to your department?—In nearly every case.

4664. Have there been exceptions?—I have known exceptions.

4665. But not sufficient, I suppose, to necessitate any special notice from the Commission?—No. As a rule, certainly, the clerks to the guardians and everybody connected with the guardians are quite ready to assist the auditor in every way.

Persons present at Audits.

4666. Who is present when the accounts are audited; may anybody be present, and are the officers of the guardians, for instance, present?—Occasionally some of the guardians attend, and very often the chairman of the Finance Committee or the chairman of the board. The clerk is practically certain to be there during part of the audit.

4667. Do the officers connected with the disbursements attend too?—I do not think any auditor would pass the account of an accounting officer unless he were present, except for some very good reason.

4668. He would have to produce all the vouchers?—Certainly.

Duties of Inspector of Audits.

4669. (The O'Conor Don.) I see the statement you have handed in is chiefly taken up with the duties of the auditors, but I do not find in it any statement of what your own duties are; would you kindly say what are your special duties as inspector of audit?—I am afraid I am not prepared to put a limit to them. My duties as inspector are not confined simply to the inspection of audits, and that is not the largest part of my duty, I think. I go down and attend the audits where the auditors are at work, and I see how they work, and my endeavour is to get them all to work on the same lines. I have not been able, however, to succeed in doing that in the twelve months since I have been appointed.

Mr. Edmund Pearse Burd.

4670. You go to the auditors in the different districts in England and see how they are working?—Yes.

4671. Do you make any reports to the Local Government Board?—Yes, I report after each visit.

Duties of Auditors' clerks.

4672. I see that most of the auditors have clerks to assist them: what is the duty of those clerks?—The clerks will do the ordinary routine work—the casting of columns of figures, and things of that sort.

4673. Do not the auditors do that themselves?—They have to do a certain amount of it; they cannot help it. There is so much work for them to do that if they did not do some of the casting they would never get through their work.

4674. Is much of the casting of accounts, the totting-up and the verifying of accounts, done by the clerks and not by the auditors?—It is mostly done by the clerks.

4675. Then the clerks are really responsible for that?—Certainly.

Appointment and salary of auditors' clerks.

4676. And the auditors cannot be responsible when the duty is not thrown upon them?—The auditor is responsible for all his clerks do, I always should say. He should look after them, and if they are not satisfactory he has the power of dismissing them, as they are his clerks and are not civil servants.

4677. Are they appointed by the auditors themselves, then?—Yes.

4678. Are they paid in the same way as the auditor?—They are paid by the Government.

4679. What is the pay given to the clerk for this clerical work?—It starts at £70 for a junior clerk, but I am afraid I cannot tell you what the maximum is. There is an annual increment.

4680. Does it vary at different places, or is there a uniform salary?—The minimum is uniform and the maximum is uniform; but between those two it would vary in different districts.

4681. (Sir Samuel Provis.) It goes up to £250, does it not?—It may be so, but I am not quite certain.

Non-poor law work of auditors.

4682. (The O'Conor Don.) I see there is only one auditor exclusively employed upon Poor Law work; what are the others chiefly employed on besides Poor Law work?—They have the urban district councils; there are eight boroughs now come under audit entirely; there is the education work of the whole of the boroughs; there are all the counties and the education work of all the counties; and there are the rural district councils.

4683. Those are all under the Local Government Board auditors, are they?—Yes. Then there are various joint boards, such as joint sewerage boards, joint hospital boards, and joint water boards, and certain water boards under private Acts, which come under them.

Qualifications for Auditors.

4684. In regard to appointment to the office of auditor, I see you stated that one qualification is that they must have undergone a course of training with a district auditor; in what does that course of training consist?—Very often they go as clerks; in certain other cases they go as volunteers. As volunteers they go with the district auditors, staying with them for a period, getting no salary and paying their own expenses.

4685. Are these clerks to the auditor sometimes promoted to be auditors themselves?—Yes, certainly.

4686. (Mr. Nunn.) Can you tell us to what extent expert stock-takers are used, and in the absence of an expert stock-taker whether the auditor has any other means of checking the commodities and stores in hand except his own knowledge?—I cannot give you the number of stock-takers, but you can find from those books in front of you the number of stocktaking orders.

4687. Are they Local Government Board officials?—No. Where a stock taker is appointed an order is issued by the Local Government Board, and the names of the unions where such orders are in force would be given in the orders.

4688. What determines whether a union shall have a stock-taker ordered by the Local Government Board or not?—That I cannot answer. There was no stock-taker in my old district. I think if the guardians consider that a stock-taker should be appointed, and they apply to the Local Government Board, the Local Government Board would be perfectly willing to issue an Order. But that is outside my province, and I could not answer you definitely. I might say that the stock-taking by the guardians is not at all satisfactory.

4689. I have come across cases in which I understood that expert stock-takers had been appointed through employers who were anxious to preserve the "purity" of their commodities?—I have never heard of such a thing, and I do not know of any such case.

4690. (The O'Conor Don.) Is not stock-taking obligatory on the guardians?—The guardians have to take stock as to provisions at the end of every quarter, and as to clothing at the end of every half year. Where no stock-taker is appointed, the guardians themselves have to certify to the quantities.

4691. But they practically have to take it from somebody they appoint; they could not do it themselves, could they?—They are supposed to do it themselves; the books are signed by them, anyhow.

4692. (Mr. Gardiner.) Has the auditor any power to insist that the stock be taken after the last meal of the old quarter and before the first meal of the new quarter?—No, I do not think he could. He would see the amounts of food and of necessaries and other things that had been issued between the time of the last meal and the time when the stock was taken; it could always be arranged for in that way. If the guardians did their duty there should be no difficulty up to within a week or so in seeing that the stock taken agrees with what ought to be in store.

4693. My point is that very often the guardians are careless about the stock-taking, and that that results in the workhouse-master or the clerk working backwards all through the quarter?—That, I am afraid, is very often the case.

Proposed reform of stock-taking.

4694. Would it not be rather important that a stricter rule should be enforced?—I quite agree that it would be a great advantage if in every union in the Kingdom a stock-taker was appointed, and if he was bound to take the stock directly at the end of every quarter.

4695. But the Local Government Board have no power to insist on that, have they?—No.

4696. Do you think that ought to be done?—I certainly should be very pleased to see it. I have had trouble myself with guardians because they did not take the stock; and in one case I refused to hold the audit until the stock was taken and certified by them, because I said it was the basis of the whole audit, and so it is. Eventually they did it.

4697. This carelessness in stock-taking very often leads, does it not, to the practical demoralisation of some of the officers, who get into lax ways owing to the guardians' slackness?—I do not think it is necessary for the guardians to be slack.

Audit staff for London.

4698. (Mr. Lansbury.) How many clerks has the auditor for London?—The audit staff consists of an auditor, one assistant-auditor, and two clerks; and sanction is usually given for the aid, during the year, of two clerks for two weeks, in order to help in the examination of the claims relating to the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund.

4699. You audit the accounts of each union twice a a year, do you not?—Yes.

4700. How many men would there be engaged in the audit of one of the unions of London?—Four, I should take it.

Statement as to duration of audits in London.

4701. How long would it take them, as a rule?—That varies very much with the different unions, and, of course, depends very much on the expenditure, though not entirely on the expenditure. I have a statement made out here of the different times that have been taken in the different unions.

4702. Will that be put in?—I can put it in. It is rather misleading, I am sorry to say, because during part of the time the district auditor was very ill (see Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. IX. B)).

4703. From your experience, do you think that the audit itself is worth very much?—I certainly do.

Ins'ances of effectiveness of audit.

4704. From the point of view of proving embezzlement or illegal payments ?—Certainly.

4705. Have you any cases where the auditors have proved embezzlement ?—I do not think there is a single union in the Kingdom where embezzlement has taken place where the district auditors have not found it out; I do not mean to say they have found out each particular case, but they have certainly found out cases in almost every union in the Kingdom.

4706. Could you give us the number of cases in the Metropolis in which the auditors, without any previous information from other people, have of themselves discovered discrepancies ?—I have no knowledge of that at all; but I daresay I might be able to get that information if you give me time.

4707. Has the Audit Department ever brought out through their examination of accounts any dishonest discrepancy in an officer's accounts ?—Certainly, it is being constantly done.

4708. Could we have some instances ?—I certainly have no objection; I could give you instances of my own, if you would like to have them.

4709. I would like to have them for the Metropolis ?—There, I cannot help you, but I can get them for you, as the Local Government Board would not have the faintest objection to let you have them.

Duration and sufficiency of audit for Paddington Union.

4710. Can you tell me how long it takes, for instance, to do a union like Paddington ?—The assistant auditor in the half-year ending September, 1904, was fifteen hours, and in the half-year ending March, 1905, the district auditor and the assistant auditor were each fifteen hours.

4711. How much money would there be involved in those two audits ?—The expenditure in Paddington amounted to £71,011 in the half-year ending September, 1904, and £69,707 in the half-year ending March, 1905.

4712. A good deal of that would be for out-door relief, would it not ?—I should say so.

4714. Supposing there are fifteen relieving officers in a union, can you tell us what the method of the present auditors would be ?—They do the same as I used to do; I have seen them do that. But I have not seen Mr. Gordon at work, so I cannot answer the question as regards him.

4715. He is the auditor for London, is he ?—Yes.

Sufficiency of audit staff for London.

4716. What I want to get at is whether you think that one auditor and these other gentlemen, four altogether, is enough staff to audit the London accounts ?—I asked Mr. Gordon that question the other day, and he said that he had an exceptionally good staff, and the work was quite well done.

4717. Have you ever seen a London audit ?—Never. I have no doubt that the audit is a good one. I think that the auditor, when I spoke to him the other day, if he had not considered it a good one would have told me so at once. He is a man who is a very good judge; he has been in several districts.

4718. But that is only your opinion on the evidence of the gentleman who is concerned in doing the audit ?—Certainly, and a man that I know.

Type of persons appointed as auditors.

4719. Has a clerk ever been raised to the position of auditor ?—Yes.

4720. I mean a paid clerk; I do not mean one of the voluntary gentlemen ?—I am thinking of paid clerks.

4721. Can you tell us how many within the last twenty-five years ?—If I had a list of the auditors I could pick them out. One of the senior auditors at the present moment was a paid clerk.

4722. What I wanted to find out was whether the appointment was due to patronage, or whether it was due to a man's ability ? I should say it was due to patronage tempered by ability, or ability tempered by patronage.

4723. How many auditors are chartered accountants ?—I do not know that there is one. I should not like to say there is none, but I do not fancy there is.

4724. In regard to out-door relief, it is in the discretion, is it not, of the auditor whether he allows the expenditure on cases of sudden and urgent necessity ?—He would have a discretion there; but he would inquire distinctly from the relieving officer what caused him to give the relief.

Auditor's procedure in cases of relief on "sudden and urgent necessity."

4725. Would that not rather imply that if it is to be a proper audit, the auditor ought to go behind all those cases and form his judgment on them ?—I think so.

4726. Where there are hundreds of cases of sudden and urgent necessity, do you really think the auditor is able to exercise any discretion at all ?—I should certainly go into every case myself if I held the audit. I would not allow a single case of sudden and urgent necessity to pass without the reasons being given to me.

4727. Do you think that they do that in the Metropolis ?—That I cannot tell you. As I told you just now, it is an impossibility for me to say, because I have not been present at one of their audits; I am sorry I have not.

Instances of relief surcharged where applicant not destitute.

4728. Has there been a surcharge made in a case such as you describe where the income of a family was in the judgment of the auditor such that they could not be considered destitute ?—Yes, certainly.

4729. Were any of those cases in London, do you know ?—I do not know of a case in London.

4730. You have not got any particular case in your mind just now ?—No. There is a case of Mr. Chamberlin's I have in my mind, but that is a midland counties case.

4731. How long ago would that be ?—That is about six months ago now.

The hearing by auditors of reasons against surcharge.

4732. Now with regard to the appeals against the decisions of the auditors; the auditor is supposed to give the person surcharged notice and also he is expected to tell him that if he or she has anything to say why they should not be surcharged, they can go and say it to him ?—Certainly.

4733. Do the auditors allow people to do that ?—Yes.

4734. Do you know that of your own knowledge ?—Certainly I do.

4735. Do you say that the real rule that ought to be observed is that the auditor has got to hear those whom he proposes to surcharge ?—Yes, certainly, and I have never heard of such a thing occurring as a refusal to hear them.

Extent of auditor's inquiry into guardians procedure as to contracts.

4736. (Mrs. Webb.) With regard to contracts, is it the auditor's business to see that the provision about advertising them has been fulfilled ?—It might become his duty to see to that. I do not know that I can say that so much in connection with the Poor Law as in connection with the public health.

4737. Under the Poor Law, is it not so ?—Under the Poor Law I do not know that he would be bound to look into that in the same way.

4738. (Mr. Lansbury.) Is it not the fact that the guardians cannot spend more than £50 without advertising or without the sanction of the Local Government Board ?—That is provided for by the general consolidated order, 1847.

4739. (Mrs. Webb.) Would you not think it was the business of the auditor to see that the advertisement had been issued ?—He would do this if his suspicions were aroused, but I cannot say that I did it. I never had reason to believe that guardians in my old district neglected to advertise, but I had reason to know that certain other bodies did.

4740. Is it the business of the auditor to see or to inquire whether the guardians have taken the lowest tender ?—He should see that.

4741. Does he ?—I should think in many cases he does, but in certain cases he would not. That depends very much upon the auditor.

4742. Supposing they had not taken the lowest tender in such a case, would he ask for their reasons ?—Certainly; he would ask for their reasons and get them out thoroughly.

4743. But you do not think that that is necessarily done by the auditor ?—I do not think it is done in every case.

4744. Might I ask you whether it comes at all under the purview of the auditor to inquire incidentally into what is the practice with regard to the acceptance of one contract rather than another; for instance, would you know whether the clerk usually did it by samples and disguised the thing or withheld the name or withheld other particulars in order to prevent collusion?—Do you mean so that the guardians themselves should not know the name of the person that makes the tender?

Mr. Edmund Pearse Bird.

4745. Yes: is that usual?—I think so, quite.

4746. Would the auditor see that that was done?—He could not see that that was done, because he would not be there.

4747. Would he inquire?—I do not think so.

4748. Then he would have no knowledge of whether the guardians had the sort of information that would enable them to have collusion with an outside trader?—No. Unless something turned up to make him very suspicious, I do not think the auditor would go into that at all. That is a question that he would leave to the guardians, and they would deal with it entirely.

4749. I suppose occasionally he would have suspicions would he not?—Very likely.

4750. Would he report them to the Local Government Board?—If he got anything of that sort he would certainly report it to the Local Government Board, and then the Local Government Board would write to the guardians and ask for their observations.

Auditor's reports referred to general inspector.

4751. Would his report go to the inspector?—The inspector would be sure to see it at some stage, but I cannot say it would go to him first.

Extent of auditor's check over contracts.

4752. Then practically an audit does not prevent corrupt contracts, which it is supposed to do?—It is supposed to do that certainly, but the difficulty is for the auditor to get hold of those.

4753. That is rather what I wanted to get out?—If an auditor had any knowledge of it there would be an end of it at once, as he would put a stop to it; but the difficulty is for him to get that knowledge.

4754. Would he be considered to be going beyond his functions if he were to inquire whether that sort of caution had been exerted to prevent corrupt contracts?—I do not think he would do it unless he had his suspicions aroused, as I have mentioned just now.

4755. Is it not his business to test the quality as compared with the price of the contracts?—No, not at all. Auditors have a great many qualifications, but I do not think they are equal to do that.

4756. Would it not come before them at all?—No, not in any way, unless the auditor happened to be in the board room, as I happened to be very often, when all the samples are there in front of him. He could have a look at them then, but I do not think he could say which was the best even then.

4757. Does it in any way occur that a discontented ratepayer comes up and makes objections to the way in which the contracts are given?—I do not recollect ever having had a ratepayer before me or seeing one at any of these audits on that particular point. I have often seen ratepayers there, but not in connection with contracts.

4758. Of course under the Poor Law you have got nothing like you have in the municipal world, where you have a ratepayers' auditor, a people's auditor?—That is so.

Documents placed before auditor.

4759. Does the auditor to a board of guardians call for all the particular Orders or permits under which that that board is working?—Yes. That is part of the knowledge that he is required to attain; he must know all the Orders affecting the particular area with which he has to deal.

4760. How does he get to know them; does he call for them?—When he is appointed, he is supplied with a full list of all the Orders, and then he has to find out for himself which of the Orders apply to which of the unions.

4761. Then with regard to the permits, the letters permitting the Boards to do certain things, how does he know of those?—Those would all be sent to him and he would know them; and if there were any sanctions for various things that had not been sent to him, he would never pass anything without seeing the sanction, and initialling the sanction so that it would not come before him again as a sanction for some other payment.

4762. Would the clerk of an individual union bring up a book containing all the special Orders or Permits?—Yes. I will not say always, but very often they keep the sanctions of the Local Government Board in connection with each half year and the letters of the Board separately and in a case, and those are produced to the auditor and there is never any trouble in finding them.

Number and efficiency of audit staff.

4763. (Mr. Bentham.) In paragraph 15 of your memorandum you state that there are fifty audit districts in England and Wales; has the number of audit districts been increased since the Act of 1879, when they were formed?—Yes. Seven county audit districts were formed after the Local Government 1888; and the audit arrangements of all the districts were altered about four years ago.

4764. How many auditors do you think were appointed at that time?—I was not in the office, and not very much interested; but there were I believe thirteen auditors appointed then.

4765. Do you consider there is a sufficient number of auditors and assistant auditors to make a thoroughly efficient audit of all the accounts they have to deal with?—I do not. The question of re-arranging the districts and getting an increase of staff is under the consideration of the Board at the present moment.

Auditor's procedure for testing legality of out-relief.

4766. In auditing the accounts of the union under the Outdoor Relief Prohibitory Order, is it the practice to check the cases that are granted out-door relief in order to ascertain whether any has been granted illegally?—Yes, certainly. I do not mean to say that a district auditor goes through each case, taking the outdoor relief cases and going through them from beginning to end. He would never do that, unless he found there were a lot of cases where the relief was improperly given; but he would take a certain number of cases and test them.

4767. The object being to ascertain if any are being granted relief outdoor who do not come under the exceptions which are mentioned in the Order?—Yes.

Prevalence of out-relief in unions under "the Prohibitory Order."

4768. How do you account for it that some of the unions that give most out-door relief are under the Prohibitory Order?—That is rather difficult to account for off-hand.

4769. Have you any theory?—I should fancy that there is a certain amount of laxity on the part of the guardians; but of course it depends entirely what the population is and what are the different classes of individuals to whom relief is given.

4770. As a matter of fact, in Wales most of these unions are under the Out-door Relief Prohibitory Order?—Yes.

4771. I find that in one district the two highest unions in regard to out-door relief are twice as high as the average of the United Kingdom; still they are under the Out-door Relief Prohibitory Order?—That is quite possible.

4772. You do not assume that all those people come under the exceptions of the Order, do you?—I cannot say, but in South Wales and in the west of England, and in the south-west of England too, I have noticed (this has not been in connection with my audit work), that the out-relief is very high. In Wales, when I have been holding inquiries on altogether different subjects, I have constantly called attention to the huge amount of the poor rate, because it was one of the things I have had to report upon.

4773. Would it be easy to find out the cases that have been relieved contrary to the Order?—Certainly. I have no reason to believe the district auditors do not do their duty. They would check them at once. The amount of relief in that way runs up very easily; if they give 5s. a week in one union and 3s. in another, even to people who are absolutely entitled to it, it makes a lot of difference.

4774. I am not speaking of the amount, but of the proportion of in-door to out-door in numbers?—In certain unions the guardians insist on the workhouse test, or did. I do not know of any case now, speaking off-hand, where that is insisted on entirely; but in certain unions where they do not insist on the workhouse test being applied as they should, of course the out-relief would go up.

Proposed simplification of procedure as to surcharges made on purely technical grounds.

4775. Could there be a simple division made between the purely technical surcharges and those of other kinds, so that the technical surcharges might be remitted almost as a matter of course without going through all the formalities that would be necessary in the case of other surcharges?—I take it you mean whether we could distinguish between an absolutely illegal payment and one where a district auditor has simply dealt with a matter which was within his discretion. I do not know how we are to distinguish them. If it is the auditor's duty to disallow any item contrary to law, it is likewise his duty to disallow any extravagant or exorbitant payment. I am not quite clear as to your object in asking the question, but if I could help you in any way I would be very glad.

Operation of Local Authorities Expenses Act 1887.

4776. The object is to prevent those irritating surcharges that are of no moment, and are of a purely technical character in some cases, and might be dealt with by the Local Government Board without any difficulty?—The Local Authorities (Expenses) Act, 1887, enables that to be done now. There are scores of cases in the course of a year that come before the Board, and the Board obviate the necessity of the surcharge by giving their sanction.

4777. Do you think that meets the case really?—I think it meets it to a very great extent. There are certain small things that irritate people quite as much as large ones, where they could not get the sanction of the Board.

Objections to yearly instead of half-yearly audit of union accounts.

4778. With regard to the keeping of the union accounts, do you see any reason why they should not be made up yearly instead of half-yearly?—Yes.

4779. What is the reason?—I do not think it is a question for me to go into really, but, broadly speaking, I should say at once that the yearly audit is not so good for checking fraud as the half-yearly one. I think Mr. Pitts is going to give evidence upon this, and perhaps I had better not say anything about it.

4780. Mr. Pitts has been here, and given us evidence upon this point?—From an audit point of view the more frequent the audit is the less probability there is of fraud remaining undetected. That is the strongest reason against it in my view. Another reason is that with a yearly audit some of the audits must be late—you cannot help that—and the local authorities object very much to having their audits as late as they are already.

4781. Is it not a matter of fact now that they are nearly always late, and in many cases nine months late, year after year?—It is possible that they are so, but it would be very unusual for an audit to be always nine months late, because if an auditor took it at one time one year he would usually take it an earlier time another year.

4782. I was thinking that if all the audits were yearly it would make no more difference in finding out mistakes in union accounts than it does in the accounts of other local authorities?—If I had my way, everything should be audited half-yearly. Unless you have had experience in it, you do not know how difficult it is to get at the facts of the case a long time afterwards, and what a difference there is after twelve months' interval as compared with six months.

4783. If the union accounts were made up like those of other local bodies, to the end of March in each year, would it be practicable for the audit to be made twice during the year, part of the books to be audited up to a certain point and then completed at the end of the year?—That is not a good system. Of course it is possible, but it means a great waste of time. Preliminary audits are never satisfactory unless the books are absolutely balanced.

4784. Do you think it would interfere with the efficiency of the audit?—I do.

Divergence of auditors' practice as to surcharges.

4785. Do the auditors in your experience differ rather widely with respect to some matters of surcharge?—I do not think they do as regards the surcharges. I have never noticed any great difference.

4786. You do not know that matters are allowed to pass in some unions that are surcharged in others?—No. Of course one district auditor may take more upon himself than another would, but the rule is laid down very hard and fast that he shall do certain things.

4787. When a surcharge is made by an auditor, I suppose it is reported to the Local Government Board?—Yes.

4788. Is it a matter of general practice on the part of the Board to give instructions to all the auditors to surcharge similar items in the accounts of other unions?—No; there is no necessity for it.

4789. Does the Board rely upon the instructions that are already given?—There is the law of the land that says what they shall do.

4790. But new things are constantly arising and new points are constantly arising that are not always seen beforehand?—The auditors meet together and they talk these matters over, and they try as far as possible to work on the same lines. I am trying, as I said just now, to get them to work on the same lines as far as possible.

4791. As far as you are concerned, you try to get uniformity in all the unions in the country?—Yes.

4792. You aim at that?—That is what I am trying for.

Auditors' qualifications: by whom prescribed.

4793. (Professor Smart.) In Paragraph 22 of your statement you give the qualifications of the auditors; where are those qualifications laid down?—They were laid down originally by the Treasury, and the Local Government Board now mention them in every case in connection with the auditor. No auditor is appointed who has not some one or other of these qualifications.

4794. Is that the only statement of it?—This is taken from one of the Board's forms—I forget which one now, but it is copied absolutely word for word from it. That does not set out what the qualifications of an auditor really are.

Type of persons appointed as auditors.

4795. (Chairman.) We know that the auditors are not chartered accountants, but what are they? Are they barristers and solicitors, or are they persons who have undergone a course of training with a district auditor or have served in the Department of the Local Government Board?—There are some of each. There are auditors who are barristers, there are auditors who are solicitors, there are auditors who have undergone a course of training with a district auditor, and there are auditors who have served in the department of the Local Government Board.

4796. I suppose the majority really come under the last mentioned category, do they not?—I think there are only three who have served with the Local Government Board; I do not remember any more.

4797. (Professor Smart.) I suppose a good deal of the auditor's work is to audit the workhouse accounts?—That is not a large portion of it 4798. But it is a part of their work?—It is a part of it certainly.

Extent and difficulty of auditors' work.

4799. How many workhouses would there be on an average under each auditor, roughly speaking?—That depends entirely on the districts, and I could not answer the question off-hand. The districts are arranged so that there should be a certain number, or rather an uncertain number of unions and an uncertain number of urban districts and other authorities whose accounts the auditor has to audit; and those districts have been arranged in accordance with the actual facts as to the time those audits would take, as ascertained at the date when the arrangement was made. I think it is four years ago they were re-arranged and now they are out of date.

4800. Each auditor would have a considerable number of workhouses in his district, would he not?—They may vary from eight up to twenty perhaps.

4801. Are the workhouse accounts at all complicated?—No.

4802. Nothing comparable, for example, to the accounts of a large hotel?—I have never gone into an hotel account, so I could not say; but I have seen almost all the local authorities' accounts, and the union form of accounts is the simplest of all.

4803. The auditor must check all the buying of stuff as well as all the selling of stuff, must he not?—Yes, he has to see the contracts and everything in that way.

4804. Besides being an auditor of the workhouse accounts, he must be an expert in the Poor Law, I suppose?—Certainly.

4805. The books of all commercial and industrial undertakings are audited by accountants almost without exception, are they not?—An ordinary commercial undertaking would be, I suppose.

Mr. Edmund Pearse Burd.

4806. Is it not the case that accountancy considers itself a profession?—Certainly.

4807. I think it exacts a four or five years' apprenticeship and the passing of certain examinations for C.A. and so on?—Yes.

Capability of persons appointed as Auditors.

4808. What qualifications has a barrister, qua barrister, for acting as auditor?—The reason for taking a barrister and a solicitor—and it is a great one too—I understand is that these people have constantly questions of law raised before them which never come before an auditor for a commercial undertaking—he would have nothing whatever to do with them.

4809. It seems to me that there are two parts then in a Poor Law audit—there is the legal part and there is the commercial part?—Certainly.

4810. I cannot conceive that any industrial firm would ever think of asking a barrister to audit their accounts?—That depends on the barrister.

4811. Certainly not unless the barrister had an accountant's training?—There are barristers who are district auditors who are quite as capable of auditing the accounts of an industrial undertaking as any accountant in Christendom, according to my view.

4812. If they had had an accountant's training?—Yes.

4813. But that of course applies to everyone?—Yes.

4814. You could take any man and say he was qualified for it if you added that he had had an accountant's training?—Yes.

Auditor's action as regards balances and overdrafts.

4815. (Mr. Phelps.) In auditing the accounts of a union, the auditors would have to deal with the balances at the end of the year, I suppose?—Certainly.

4816. Do they call attention to the amount of balances?—Yes; that is a thing that is very constantly being done. In certain unions the guardians are very fond of keeping a balance. I have a case in my mind now where the guardians had over £10,000 of one township's money in their hands, and the rural townships were all of them, except one, indebted to the guardians. Attention was called to that, and it was altered within two years. It takes a certain time to do it, because otherwise the rates would have to be put up suddenly.

4817. Speaking roughly, in dealing with the balances they would reckon the income and expenditure and what they considered to be an average balance they would pass, and anything above that they would call attention to, I suppose?—Yes. A district auditor did that in my presence the other day.

4818. What is the action of the auditors if they find that a Board of guardians have a large overdraft?—They would surcharge the interest.

Auditor's discretion as to persons to be surcharged.

4819. That is to say, you might have a case in which the guardians had been refused the power to raise a loan, and had made a large overdraft with their banker; the auditor would discover that, and on whom would he make a surcharge?—That depends on the circumstances. He could take the minutes and he could surcharge anybody who was present at the meeting when the overdraft was ordered, or he could take the people who actually signed the cheque creating the overdraft, or the cheques, as the case might happen to be.

4820. He would use his discretion with regard to that, would he?—Yes.

4821. Would there be a different principle with different auditors?—As a rule the auditors take the persons who sign the cheques, but I personally am not in favour of that.

The strictness of the audit.

4822. On the subject of disallowing payments which are illegal, do the auditors take what I may call a stern view with regard to that; are they very prompt to mark down an illegal expenditure and disallow it?—No, I do not think they are.

4823. As an instance, take this case which came under my notice the other day: A board of guardians discussed the question whether they should allow an able-bodied man and his wife to leave the workhouse and leave two children in the workhouse; would the auditor have surcharged or disallowed the relief to the children?—I consider he should do so under those circumstances. It would be very easy for the guardians to have obtained the authority of the Local Government Board to keep the children there.

4824. Supposing they have not got the authority, you think he ought to surcharge?—I do, certainly. I think it is their own fault, that they have not applied for the authority, and if they do not choose to do it, they must be made to do it; otherwise the orders become useless.

Right of a company qua ratepayer to be represented at audit, &c.

4825. (Dr. Downes). Would a railway company in its corporate capacity have a right to have a representative at the audit?—Yes—I have had a railway company represented before me objecting to charges arising out of a riot rate.

4826. Has any person interested a right to examine a contract at an audit, if the auditor allows it?—Yes, certainly.

Variations in prices for goods paid by guardians.

4827. Is it within your knowledge that very great variations in prices are paid by guardians for commodities?—Yes, the variations are very great.

4828. For commodities of ostensibly the same description?—Yes.

4829. Would you say the variations are very extreme?—They are very extraordinary.

4830. Can you offer any suggestions as to the possible reasons for that?—Locality has a great deal to do with it, and also what I mentioned just now where a certain quantity is known to be required—some very small quantity of one thing, and a large quantity of another thing; the variation in price there might enable a certain amount of dishonesty to occur. That might be done by the collusion of a workhouse master, who would know that only a small quantity of one thing was required, but that a large quantity of another thing would be required, and would let the man who makes the tender know which was which.

4831. If the person who was tendering had a private knowledge of the stocks in hand of the different commodities, that would guide him in fixing his price, would it not?—Very much.

4832. Can you suggest any means of meeting that or defeating it?—No. As long as human nature is human nature, I am afraid you cannot stop it.

The deferrence of the audit.

4833. Speaking of cases having been brought to the knowledge of the Local Government Board by the action of the auditors, I think within the last week there was a case from West Ham in the public Press; I do not know whether you saw it?—I did not see it, but I know the case. It is not the amount that the district auditors disallow that is the great advantage of the audit; it is the amount that they prevent being spent. The amount they disallow is nothing compared with the amount of expenditure that they prevent.

4834. Have you any experience of the different modes of contracting for drugs?—No; I have never gone into that question at all. The amount of drugs that was used in my old unions was not very great: in most cases the medical officers provided them themselves.

The safe keeping of "contract samples."

4835. Have you had within your experience any case where samples have been tampered with during the running of the contract?—No, not that I know of.

4836. How are sealed samples generally secured from interference?—I do not know that they are secured from interference. It is rather going outside my province as an auditor to say how those things are managed: but I know that the samples go to the clerk, and I have over and over again seen them open in the board-room standing round in bottles and things of that sort.

4837. You have no knowledge in whose custody they are kept in the interval?—No.

4838. Do you think that the statements of the union accounts are in their present form intelligible to the ordinary ratepayer?—To what statements are you referring? There was the old statutory financial statement, which was a very good one indeed.

4839. Take the ordinary ratepayer who wishes to know whether the expenditure of his union is going up or is not going up, or who wishes to compare the expenditure on coal in one-half-year with that in the same half-year of the year preceding; does he get the accounts in such a form ordinarily as would enable him to do that?—If he goes to the audit he can always see it, and there would be no difficulty at all in it. What the guardians publish is another matter altogether.

Necessity for publication of Union accounts.

4840. There is no obligation, I believe, on the guardians to publish such accounts?—No, except that the non-statutory financial statement might be printed and circulated among the ratepayers, or advertised in some newspaper circulating in the Union. That is the only publication I remember, and I should not like to be absolutely certain about that, but I think I am right.

4841. Does that appear in the public Press?—No.

4842. Do you think it desirable that they should be required to publish their accounts?—It certainly would be desirable if anybody looked at them, but I am not at all sure that anybody would now. It is advisable that these accounts should be published not only in the case of unions, but every local authority that has anything to do with spending public money ought to publish such an account as everybody can understand.

4843. In the accounts of the Metropolitan Asylums Board is the definition of "in-maintenance" quite the same as in other poor law establishments?—I am afraid you must give me notice of such a question, or ask some other witness.

Departmental Committee on Accounts.

4844. (Mr. Gardiner.) I suppose you could not tell us how soon there is likely to be any action taken by the Departmental Committee on Accounts?—The Committee has already met.

4845. It has been appointed, I understand, with a view to making some changes?—With a view to devising some system of accounts which shall be perfect.

4846. And perhaps simpler?—Let us hope so.

Length of previous training of auditors.

4847. How long does the course of training with a district auditor usually take?—It varies very much. I have known men to be with district auditors for close on twenty years before they have got an appointment as district auditor.

4848. Have they been all that time acting as volunteers?—No, not as volunteers necessarily, but as volunteers, paid clerks, and so on. I could not follow the whole of the man's career that I am speaking about now, but I should think for nearly the whole of that time he was a clerk. Parts of the time he was assistant auditor and now he is an assistant auditor, and if he lives long enough he will be appointed district auditor I dare say. Others are in the same position; they have been clerks and have been assistant auditors, and eventually they have become auditors.

4849. Comparatively few people from outside other than clerks go in for this course of training, I think?—Very few go in for the course. There are just a few volunteers, I think I know of two at the present moment.

Incidence of cost of audit.

4850. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) I should like to ask whether it is the case, as I think we have been told, that the cost of the audit in England is paid in the first place out of sums voted by Parliament and is then repaid by the local authorities?—It is partially repaid by the local authorities.

4851. Through the sale of stamps under the District Auditors Act and other Acts?—Under the District Auditors Act, 1879, almost entirely.

4852. The cost is repaid in that way?—Only a portion of it, not the whole.

4853. Can you say how much is defrayed out of public money?—I think it is about five-sixths of it. I am sorry I have not these figures with me; if I had known I was going to be asked questions on this point I would have brought them.

4854. I have the figures in the Estimates here, from which it appears that the cost of the audit for 1905–6 was £74,918, and the amount realised in 1905–4 was £56,830?—That leaves a bigger balance than I thought there was.

4855. That leaves a balance of something like £18,000?—Yes, it does.

4856. Does that include all the expenses, or are there other costs paid by the local authorities themselves?—There are no other costs in connection with the audit that I know of paid by the local authority.

4857. There is the publication of the audit?—The publication, that is advertisements, and so on, would be defrayed by the local authorities, except in the case of unions where the cost of advertising the notice of audit is an imperial charge.

4858. As regards the audit itself, I understand that it is a half-yearly audit?—For unions.

Frequency of audit.

4859. There is no more frequent audit than that—there is no continuous monthly audit, is there?—No.

Procedure for stock taking and auditor's check thereon.

4860. I think you have told us that there is no audit in England of the stock in the workhouses except what is undertaken by the guardians themselves; there is no supervision by the public auditor, is there?—Not by the public auditor, unless in very exceptional cases. I have known a district auditor send his clerk to try and find a two gallon jar of rum which was in the list of balances and which had been there a long while. It could not be found immediately, but it turned up the next morning, at least a jar turned up the next morning.

4861. Do you think it is right that the audit of the stock of a workhouse should be conducted by the board of guardians?—I quite agree that it is not, and I said so just now, if I remember rightly. In every case the stock ought to be taken by some professional stock-taker, or somebody appointed outside the guardians altogether. That is the basis of the audit of union accounts, and now that basis is bad.

Recommendations of Municipal Trading Committee as to qualifications for auditors.

4862. With regard to the qualification of an auditor, I do not know whether I am correct in thinking that there was a suggestion made by the Municipal Trading Committee (which was a Committee, I think, of both Houses), that in future none but chartered accountants should be appointed to the post of auditor; was that not so?—Yes, that was so, but that was limited to municipal corporations and urban district councils. I do not think it applied to unions.

4863. Would that recommendation, assuming it to be a sound one, apply equally to the accounts of unions as to municipal accounts?—Certainly. If they thought that the accountant auditor was the best and the unions wished to have the best, and they were satisfied that the accountant auditor was the man, of course it would be better to have him. Personally, I am not satisfied that he is the best man. The ideal district auditor is not born yet. He must be a good accountant, he must have a very fair knowledge of the law relating to the poor, public health, highways, tramways, electric lighting, water, and contracts; in addition to that he must know the Board's orders; he must be able to state clearly his reasons for any disallowance or allowance; he ought to be able to write a very good report, he must be extremely courteous, have an angelic temper, be tactful, be a thoroughly business-like man (it is no good if he is not; it is no good his being a quibbler in any way), he must be firm, he ought to be dignified, he must be accurate and quick if he is to get through his work, able to hold his own with anybody who comes and makes any objection—and very often that is a very difficult thing for a man to do—he must be thoroughly interested in the work, a hard worker, have a very extreme sense of duty, be thoroughly healthy and energetic, and a sort of man that the officers can look up to and respect. I have not since my appointment found that man; I am looking for him.

4864. (Chairman.) And in addition would you say that he ought discourteously to disbelieve everything that is not supported by documents?—I do not think so. I think one of the district auditor's duties is to believe an old officer as far as he possibly can. It is a very difficult thing sometimes, and very often district auditors are blamed because they have believed an old officer, but I think it is a matter that they may very easily be excused for doing.

Desirability of separate auditors for Poor Law accounts.

4865. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) It certainly looks to one as if an auditor who might have acquired a knowledge of auditing the accounts of a board of guardians might not have been able to acquire the knowledge necessary to audit municipal or public health accounts, and accordingly there may be some reason for separating the duties?—I do not think so at all, because the district auditor (except the auditor for the Metropolitan Poor Law area) sees all those accounts. Of course some auditors are better than others and learn more quickly.

Auditors' practice as to persons to be surcharged.

4866. In reference to Paragraph 53 of your statement, where you are dealing with disallowances and surcharges, when a payment has been made by cheque, that cheque being signed by certain members of the board of guardians, whom do you surcharge?—As I said just now, the common system is for the district auditor to surcharge the members signing the cheque or one of them; but there is no necessity for that, and he is not limited to that.

4867. Is there a right of recourse against those who passed the payment, or against the board of guardians as a whole, or against all those who were parties to the resolution?—The auditors can surcharge any member of the board of guardians present at the meeting when the cheque was authorised, except those who distinctly got up and objected to the payment.

4868. Has that been done; is it a matter of ordinary practice?—It is constantly done. It is not necessarily the members who sign the cheque who are surcharged. Take the case of the Chairman who is attending the audit; the district auditor mentions the fact that he is obliged to surcharge certain sums, and he finds out that the Chairman was present at the board meeting when they were authorised, and he says: "I will surcharge you in order to save trouble."

Position of Clerk to Guardians who countersigns a cheque for an illegal payment.

4869. I think according to your practice the clerk who has to sign the cheque is specially exempted from surcharge?—I do not think he is exempted specially, but it would be no good surcharging him because he is not the man who is actually responsible.

Auditors usually selected from assistant auditors.

4870. (Sir Samuel Provis.) With regard to the appointment of auditors, is it the practice now that the auditors should be appointed from the assistant auditors?—Yes, that is the intention; as I understand, the whole scheme is based on the idea that they should pass through the mill.

4871. Consequently, before a man becomes an auditor he has had experience as an assistant auditor?—Yes, and very often as a clerk.

Qualifications of assistant auditors.

4872. Further than that, the assistant auditors themselves are only appointed from the class which you have described, namely barristers, solicitors, and so forth?—Certainly—including the chartered accountants, who have got the same opportunity of coming in as the others.

Difference between district and commercial auditor.

4873. Is there not this difference between the position of the district auditor and the auditor of a commercial undertaking, namely, that in the case of the district auditor he has to judge of the legality of the payments, which would be a matter that the auditor of a commercial undertaking would have nothing whatever to do with?—Certainly; I mentioned that just now.

Purport of Municipal Trading Committees' recommendations as to auditors' qualifications.

4874. Is it not also the fact that in the Report of the Municipal Trading Committee they appear to have been rather thinking of cases where local authorities had got large commercial undertakings, such as electric lighting undertakings, gas undertakings, and so forth?—That is really what they were originally intended to deal with.

4875. They seem to have had those things in their mind?—I expect so.

4876. At least, we may presume that they had?—Yes.

4877. They were not thinking of the legality of the charges?—Not in any way, I should say.

Deterrent effect of the audit.

4878. Is it not the fact that the indirect effect of the disallowance made by an auditor is more important than the disallowance actually itself?—I consider that it is immeasurably more important.

4879. According to your experience, would the fact that payments were disallowed have a deterrent effect upon a board of guardians in the future, assuming, as I am doing, that the payment in itself was improper as well as technically illegal?—Yes, there is no question about that. It prevents that class of payment recurring, and it even prevents their ever being made to begin with. Over and over again you hear the clerk say, The board would have done this, that and the other, if you had not been coming.

Auditors' practice for testing accounts.

4880. I suppose that where a number of items come before an auditor, for instance, the charges for the provisions actually consumed by the inmates of workhouses, the audit must be in the nature of a test audit?—Yes; you do not go into every item.

4881. That would be impossible?—That is practically impossible.

4882. And with the relieving officer the auditor would, I suppose, test his accounts in the same way, would he not?—Certainly.

4883. If he found there were errors, then he would go more minutely into the accounts?—He would go more and more closely into them.

4884. (Chairman.) I understand that in the case of outdoor relief you would not go through the accounts case by case, but you would take test cases?—You would begin close at the beginning of the book and give the name of a pauper; the relieving officer would state what the relief ordered by the guardians was in that particular case; then the district auditor would ask why it was given, and would get particulars in connection with the case, and he would know whether it was to be repaid or whether there were any children or other persons liable to repay the guardians the amount of the relief given. Then he would take another case, perhaps on that page. It would go on in that way. If any thing were found out he would gradually get closer and closer.

4885. I assume that if he had reason to believe that anything was wrong he would probably go more carefully through the book, and take case by case?—Certainly.

Mr. FRANCIS THOMAS BIRCHAM, called; and Examined.

Mr. Francis Thomas Bircham.

4886. (Chairman.) You are poor law inspector for the district of Wales?—Yes; and Monmouthshire.

4887. How long have you held that post?—In Wales, since January, 1874. I was appointed in 1872, but I was not in Wales the first eighteen months.

4888. So that you have had a continuous experience of Wales for over thirty years?—Yes.

Industrial division of Wales.

4889. We have in our hands your written statement. I will take you very briefly through it. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. X. (A).) Your district divides itself naturally, so far as occupations are concerned, into north and south, the north being mainly agricultural, and in the south there are considerable mining and shipping industries?—That is so. There is a great deal of slate industry quite in the north.

4890. There are considerable slate mines in the north?—Yes.

4891. Are they in one or more districts?—In four. They are in the same district geologically, but in four different unions. Snowdonia would be generally its area.

4892. What would the districts be?—Bangor, Carnarvon, Festiniog and Dolgelly. Llanrwst and Corwen have also secondary slate industries, but the chief ones are in Bangor, Festiniog and Carnarvon.

Effect of Local Government Act, 1894, in Wales.

4893. The Act of 1894 made a very considerable change in the personnel of the guardians of North Wales?—Certainly.

English and Welsh-speaking Guardians.

4894. It got rid of the old element of guardians who were non-elective; and, to a very large extent, I believe, those who were elective did not understand English?—That is so. They could not express themselves to their satisfaction in English, but they could understand what you said.

4895. Previous to 1894 was the business of these districts carried on in English?—I should say that in the early days I had not North Wales in my district. I had North Wales in 1892, but I had a year in North Wales in 1874, and then I do not remember nearly so much Welsh, but in South Wales, in the district which I have always had, there are a good many unions where guardians speak Welsh now, whereas they all spoke English when I joined the district. I think I have explained that.

4896. In the old days, with Welsh-speaking members who did not understand English, how was the business transacted?—Very well; by those who understood English, and they did all the work. The others said nothing. They understood enough about it, because there were plenty of guardians to translate what an old man or woman wanted with regard to relief.

4897. What about the relieving officers?—The relieving officers speak English perfectly well, and many of the guardians speak English as well as Welsh, and they could always translate for the benefit of the few. Then there were ex-officio guardians who could speak Welsh too.

Relieving officers' knowledge of English.

4898. The result of that Act was, not only that there was a large influx of Welsh-speaking guardians, but they came in with little knowledge of the law, or of the regulations which they had to administer?—None whatever.

4899. None whatever?—Absolutely, I should say.

Qualifications of Welsh-speaking Guardians.

4900. The result was that, in your judgment, there was too much outdoor relief in certain of these unions?—Yes.

Large amount of out-relief.

4901. I understand, according to your statement, that the guardians were rather apt to do the work of the relieving officer?—I say that, and I think I explained that the relieving officer lives in a district perhaps twelve or thirteen miles across, very often across valleys in which very few people live, and it is impossible for him to go and do the visiting which is expected of a relieving officer in other districts; consequently, no doubt, a good deal of it is left primarily to the guardians.

Welsh guardians as semi-official relieving officers.

4902. I assume that in these Welsh-speaking agricultural unions the workhouse is hardly up to modern ideas?—No, it is not intended to be.

4903. And, therefore, anything like a classification of its inmates is very difficult?—Of course it is. In some workhouses the number of inmates is so few that you cannot sub-divide them.

Reduction in rate of pauperism in Wales.

4904. Although in your judgment there is too much outdoor relief. I see, looking at the return which you have put in of the number of paupers in receipt of relief on the 25th March, 1905, as compared with 1895 there has been a considerable reduction in the percentage of relief?—Are you taking the typical Welsh unions, or the whole of the district?

4905. I am taking the last two columns, which show a reduction from 3·2 per cent. to 2·8 per cent.?—If you were taking the typical Welsh unions, about which you have been asking me hitherto, the reduction would be a great deal more, and the outdoor pauperism considerably less.

4906. I notice, in running down the unions one by one, there is, with very few exceptions, a general reduction during that period?—Yes, in the ten years' retrospect, certainly; almost universal, I should say.

4907. I think there are only six out of the whole of the unions in which there has been a rise during that period? In those unions probably the population has very much increased. Are you taking the percentage of paupers to the population, or the actual number of paupers?

Mr. Francis Thomas Bircham.

6 Mar. 1906.

4908. The percentage of paupers to the population?—I have taken the figures for 1901, in all my papers, because I have no official means of getting at any other census, so it is now still less than what I show.

4909. The population is 1891?—Yes, and 1901.

4910. And the pauperism is for different years?—Yes, and it has decreased again since then, particularly in North Wales.

Process of administrative education of the guardians of 1894.

4911. Therefore, even though these guardians were not acquainted with the theory of the law, the upshot has not been unsatisfactory from the point of view of administration?—No, though I think they have required a good deal of waking up. When I took over that district I was perfectly conversant with South Wales; that was in 1892. I had had many years' experience in South Wales, and then the Local Government Board gave me North Wales also. During the first three or four years of my tenure of North Wales, I spent a great deal more time in that part of my district than would have been justifiable, other things being equal; so I was enabled to bring matters before the guardians and go round and visit, with the relieving officers, the paupers actually in their homes—district after district, and I saw the boarded-out children as well, in order to get myself conversant with the habits of the people; consequently I was able to put it before the guardians of the unions which were remarkable for a high rate of pauperism, like Carnarvon, Bangor, Holywell, Anglesea, Holyhead; and a lot of them were reduced from their 5 per cent. to less than 3 per cent. in a few years. That was entirely in outdoor relief. When you say "I say there is too much outdoor relief," I wish to qualify that, because there must always be more outdoor relief compared with indoor relief in a country like Wales. They have made a reduction, and if they go on, in another ten years (I do not suppose they could make another such reduction) I think they will restore their position to the normal position of unions in the rest of the country, even if it has not arrived at that now.

4912. You found that these guardians responded to the pressure and advice which you gave them?—Yes, and they gradually learned by themselves to a great extent. It has not nearly come to an end yet, but there is no doubt they did do so.

Need for Welsh-speaking inspector.

4913. You would recommend, if practicable, that your successor should be Welsh-speaking?—It is absolutely necessary for the Welsh-speaking unions. It is not so necessary for South Wales, with the exception of one or two unions.

Effect on pauperism of depression in slate industry.

4914. Looking at these lists of unions, I observe that in 1895, Holyhead, Carnarvon, and Holywell had the highest rate of pauperism. Is the reduction in their pauperism entirely due to more strict administration, or did the strike and troubles in connection with the slate quarries affect them?—No, the slate quarry depression has not affected pauperism one single bit, except so far as perhaps an old woman who used to be kept by her sons, and that kind of thing; but you may say it has not affected it. This winter was about the first winter that the depression in the slate industry has had any effect whatever, because, although the price of slate has been very low lately, the employment has been the same. There have been no quarries of any consequence closed on account of the depression.

4915. We may take it there has been no great disturbing element?—No, you may take it as a constant force all through.

4916. This shows the commencement of an improvement which you think, with a continuance of kindly pressure and advice, will develop itself still further?—I hope so, and I think a knowledge of Welsh will drive it home still further on the part of an inspector who takes a proper line otherwise.

Over-large boards of guardians in Wales.

4917. Certain of the boards of guardians are too large, in your judgment?—That is my humble opinion, but I cannot go against it. I think they are. Take Cardiff, Swansea, Newport, and Bridgend, with their sixty or eighty guardians, each with his own notion; it is a very difficult number to manage, and as the tendency of public opinion goes in favour of increasing outdoor relief, it renders the work of the relieving officers extremely difficult, if the paupers go to the guardians behind the backs of these officers, which they may do in some instances.

4918. What would be your ideal number for boards of guardians? I suppose sufficient to transact the business and to form the necessary committees?—Yes, not one more than that. Except you must remember that Wales is a country where what was agricultural in the old times has now become industrial in parts, and the consequence is that there are large agricultural portions in those unions which have a very large industrial portion as well. Those areas must be represented so long as they are represented by a parish, and the consequence is the board of guardians cannot be reduced unless you roll all those agricultural parishes like a snowball into one mass.

Increase of number of guardians by county council.

4919. Are the parishes very small?—Some of them. Take Bridgend. A certain number of them were amalgamated in times gone by when we had power to do it and hold inquiries. Unfortunately that has been taken out of our hands and put in the hands of the county council; and, instead of decreasing the number of guardians, they have increased them in most instances.

Suitability existing union areas

4920. As regards the unions, would you wish them at all to be consolidated, or do you think that they are, as at present constituted, a good and efficient unit of administration?—I do not think you can improve on them very much. I have tried it in many instances. There is one instance I have been all my time trying to divide, that is the great big union of Haverfordwest, but they will not have it. You cannot consolidate a union twenty-five miles long with another union twenty-five miles long; you would get a diameter of fifty miles, with only perhaps 15,000 people in each union, or less than that.

Advisability of publishing half-yearly totals of pauperism.

4921. In Paragraph 28 of your statement you say that if unions would only publish a half-year's history of outrelief, as is still done in Wales, the unions would, in many instances, tumble down from the prominence gained by their pauperism being calculated upon one day only?—I say probably they would. I know nothing personally about them. I do not know whether you have a copy of that Return, and Sir Samuel Provis will be able to tell you why they discontinued publishing it in the Blue-book; I have kept it on ever since it was discontinued. That gives an analysis for six months of the different classes of outdoor paupers. That shows how many have been through the pauper mill during the six months; not only how many you catch merely on one day; and I say this, that if some of these industrial centres would publish that kind of thing, you would find hundreds or thousands more cases in bad times, which would raise their percentage of pauperism very high, but they only publish it on one day, the same as I do in this other Return, but you must lose a lot of fish out of the net.

Unreliability of returns giving one-day's count of paupers.

4922. Is there much discrepancy between the result of the Return that you have handed to me, and the half-yearly Return taken on one day?—Yes, there is a difference between 50,000 and 63,000 there—13,000 difference. That is to say, 13,000 more men, women, and children had outdoor relief during the six months than appeared on the one day, the 25th March, in that six months; but that is a very small difference compared to what other districts would be.

4923. It is a small difference to what sometimes occurs?—No, as compared with what it would be in other districts. In my district it is sometimes more, and it is getting more. There is more outdoor relief given than used to be given in the populous unions.

4924. Assuming there was an accurate record of every one who received relief during the six months, it would, in your judgment, put up the percentage of pauperism?—Yes, in those districts for which those Returns are not published. I sent Mr. Bagenal one of those Returns when he was appointed, and I believe he does publish those for his district.

4925. You take all the people who have received relief during the six months?—Yes, out-relief.

Half-yearly returns: Amount of error from duplicate entries.

4926. But the same person may have received relief more than once during that time?—Yes. I have had that under consideration, but the figures would not be worth the trouble that would be entailed in a clerk working them out.

4927. You think that number is quite small?—Yes, the same person occurring in the same six months would not make any appreciable difference at all in my district.

4928. The number who had received relief in two different unions would be very small?—Yes, practically none. Of course, there would be the person who was removed, who was relieved for a few weeks in one union and then his settlement was found out to be in another and he was transferred; but most of those get non-resident relief in Wales, not a very satisfactory mode of relief, but they do it. They find that the paupers live in a union and they let them live there, and the other union pays, so that would not come in.

4929. Are the figures we have on Paper "A" taken from Return "B"?—No, "B" is a six months' total of pauperism "A" is taken from the Returns of indoor and out-door pauperism, given me by the clerks to the guardians for the week ending the 25th March of each year, on what is called Form "A."

4930. Form B would give a higher percentage than you find on Form A?—Much, in my district, because there are very few indoor poor.

4931. Form B, in your judgment, is the more accurate Return?—Yes, it gives a return of all the people who have received relief during the six months instead of only those whom you may catch on one single day. So far it is more accurate.

4932. In Clause 33 of your Memorandum you state that the Board's Circular impressing the need for adequate relief to deserving poor has been very freely translated. Previous to that circular was the out-door relief inadequate in many cases?—I think out-door relief is always inadequate. It is very hard to define. Two of the hardest things in the whole of the English language to define are destitution and what is adequate relief. Adequate relief in the view of a pauper is as much as he can get, adequate relief in the view of many boards of guardians and economists is as little as you can possibly give; and as for destitution it is quite as difficult to define, at least that is my experience. I will say this, that I think the Circular had some use, in that it has raised the scale of individual relief in most unions by 6d. or 1s. where I think it was very much wanted. Widows with children generally get 6d. more now than they did say, ten years ago, and that accounts a great deal for the increase in the expenditure; you observe now with a decreased pauperism an additional expenditure, and that is so all over the country.

4934. (Chairman.) The amount expended has considerably risen during that period, although the percentage of pauperism to population has diminished?—May I give the figures on that point, because I think they will help you? Taking a ten years' comparison, between 1905 and 1895, the population of England and Wales has increased 12 per cent., but the rate of pauperism is about the same. The expenditure has increased 33 per cent. Wales and Monmouthshire has increased in population 13 per cent., it has decreased in rate of pauperism 13 per cent., it has increased in expenditure 22 per cent. North Wales has a 4 per cent. population increase, it has a decreased rate of pauperism of 20 per cent., and its expenditure has increased 1 per cent., that is with the out-door relief system, so there is something to be learned from this. In South Wales the population has increased 16 per cent., the rate of pauperism has decreased 7 per cent. (that is the industrial part of my district, we will say), and the increase in expenditure is 32 per cent. I attribute that largely to these large towns where you have had to build up-to-date in-door accommodation, and to the fact that with regard to out-relief, the relief given to individuals has increased at least 20 per cent., I will say, broadly speaking, since Mr. Chaplin's Circular, but it might have occurred a year or two before that.

4935. You think that that Circular gave an impetus to out-door relief?—I am sure it did.

4936. Not only as regards amount; did it also increase the number?—I do not know so much about that; it is the expenditure chiefly. I have no proof of that.

4937. Now we come to the paragraph in your report which deals with the Workmen's Compensation Act. Your impression is that the tendency of that Act has been to make the age at which men fall out of employment much lower than it was before?—Most decidedly. When a man now gets a few grey hairs, or loses the tip of his little finger, or does not see or hear quite so well as he did, out he goes, particularly in those industries which are not under their own friendly societies. Take the colliery industry, which employs 150,000 colliers, or something like that. They had a Miners' Permanent Provident Society. That Miners' Provident Society before the split in 1898 had 79,000 members. When, first of all the Employers' Liability Act, and then the Workmen's Compensation Act and its amendment, came into force, the numbers working together in this Miners' Provident Society fell to 17,000, which is the present number. They could get better relief from their societies than the Compensation Act gives, yet the men join the Federation which they did not belong to at the time of the great strike, and will not contract out of the Act. With regard to the 17,000 men that belong to those pits where the old men do not get turned out, they find work for their old men who are a little deficient in this, that, and the other, and do not turn them out the same as the other men, who go under the Compensation Act, are turned out, and also they have an old age pension society, by which they are enabled to relieve a number of them, and keep them off the rates within their own friendly society, yet the great majority of men belong to their own society, the Federation, and do not subscribe to the friendly society, because they say: "Oh, the employers will keep us"; but they will not keep them, because liability only arises in case of accident; and the young men now, who are careless in youth with high wages, and rollicking and thinking of nothing, will become the men presently with the few grey hairs and the little finger gone and the bad eyes. Where will they be? They are not subscribing to clubs; the clubs are all going down. I intended to make this more interesting, so I went the other day to the Registrar of Friendly Societies, who was without any reports for the last five years, and had nothing to show me as to the state of things at the time that the Workmen's Compensation Act began to take effect. He had no figures to give me. He is, however, going to make a census in April, and if you can get the figure for Glamorganshire to compare the number of members of good friendly societies now (I would not trouble about what may be termed the rotten clubs; they do more harm than good), with what they were before this Act passed, you might get some very interesting evidence to show how they have been affected, and there is no doubt that the pauperism is affected most directly. If, for example, you go round Bedwellty or Merthyr, you will find crowds of men who can get little or nothing to do. You are manufacturing paupers for whose old age you will have to provide.

4938. Do not the men realise that the Workmen's Compensation Act only gives compensation in case of accident?—I do not think the young man with high wages realises anything. He ought to be made to realise.

4940. Your experience is that the Miners' Provident Society not only gives better compensation for accidents, but also increases continuity of work?—Yes, and continuity of work combined with the old age pensions; an old man getting his 5s. a week from them will still be kept on at work, i.e. a reduced amount of work which he can do. I will hand you a very interesting account given by the Secretary of the Society before the Committee* which was appointed, if you will remember, on the working of the Compensation Act. That will tell you much better than I can tell you the effect that it has had. It is Mr Evan Owen's evidence, and he would be a very useful witness for the Commission.

Mr. Francis Thomas Bircham.

Effect of Workmen's Compensation Act on Friendly societies and pauperism.

* Cd. 2331-1904. Evidence, questions 9063-9175.

Mr. Francis Thomas Bircham.

6 Mar. 1906.

4941. You made use of the expression just now that when an oldish man gets a certain allowance for old age he still works on at a lower wage?—At such work as he is able to do; and as it is generally piecework, he can do much less and gets less pay. The men who get the 5s. extra pension are men of a good age and men of good character to whom the employers owe a good deal. There is a loyal feeling between employers and employees in those pits where they are, but not where a hard and fast Act of Parliament comes in to do everything, or is supposed to do.

Reduction in number of members of Miners' Provident Association.

4942. The reduction of the members of the Miners' Provident Society during the last three years you say is from 70,000 to 17,000?—I believe that 79,000 was the highest number. I was a member of it and subscribed for years. In 1879 it came to 79,600, and, according to Mr. Owen, it has gone down to 19,000. That was in 1904, but since then Mr. Owen's clerk tells me it has gone down to 17,000.

Objections to cost of drugs being defrayed out of medical officer's salary.

4943. You make various suggestions in your Memorandum which, I think, are more or less self-evident?—There is a small point I should like to refer to, and it is a most important point to bear in mind when you take medical evidence; it is this. I am strongly of opinion, with regard to provincial workhouses, that the system of the workhouse medical officer finding his own medicines and drugs out of the salary which is given to him should not be allowed. It should be made absolutely illegal, because we cannot get anything like up-to-date and useful drugs when the men get the miserable salary they do get in our provincial workhouses. I am not talking now of the big hospitals, where it is well done, but it is the rule in small and middle-sized provincial workhouses that the workhouse medical officer finds the drugs out of his salary, and human nature will not allow him to use anything which is very expensive. He cannot try the up-to-date drugs which may save a person's life. I am sure Dr. Downes will think over that matter. It is a very important point, and I believe the present system may cost the life of an inmate of a workhouse.

4944. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) You suggest they should be paid for the drugs separately?—Certainly. Perhaps in small workhouses the doctor could find those drugs, and he should put in a bill for them; but I think the preferable way would be for a committee of the guardians to provide a stock of what is necessary for the little surgery, and get the doctor to use them and account for them, as the master accounts for the things under his care. I feel it my duty to bring that point before you, because I feel very strongly upon it.

Effect of Merthyr Tydvil decision as to strike relief.

4945. (Chairman.) We now come to the concluding paragraphs of your evidence, which relate to strike relief. You have stated, I think, very clearly, what is the up-shot of the last legal decision?—I should like to know what it was.

4946. It results, does it not, in this: that where there is a strike and those who struck could get work if they had not struck, they are not qualified for relief, but their children and their wives must be fed?—Yes.

4947. Whereas in the other cases of men who cannot get employment in consequence of belonging to some industry which is dependent upon coal, before they can get any relief for their children or wives they have to submit to the labour test?—That is so.

4948. Have you any ideas on this subject? What would you suggest?—When I read the late Master of the Rolls' decision, I said to myself as I went on reading (it is a column and a half), "Why, he is going to let the people starve; now our way is easy enough," and I read on till within the very last two lines, and I said, "He is bound to ride off somehow," and so he did. He said, "You must not give relief to a single soul of the kind; assumably no in-door or out-door relief," but when he came to the last line, he said, "But the wives and children must be fed." Who would have fed these great big hulking fellows if it had not been for their wives and children? I advised the guardians to exact the test from these people, which they did to a certain extent; it was a great failure, for reasons which I think I have explained pretty clearly here. It was partly owing to the non-existence of any harmonious action between the guardians representing the employers and the guardians representing the employed, and the whole thing got into the hands of the men's guardians. There was, no doubt, a great waste of money, and officers were appointed to look after relieving and paying the men who were not officers at all, who were really strikers themselves; so there was a good deal of loss; still there was a test. According to this decision of the Master of the Rolls, as it is read down there, you must absolutely relieve all these women and children under the urgent necessity clause. That means that a relieving officers have to watch the wives and children of 100,000 people, and let them get into that state on a Wednesday or a Thursday that they would die if they were not relieved on the Friday, and then give them enough relief to last them until after the next board day. After the next board day that position comes up again. I said it loses its status of urgent necessity and becomes one of chronic necessity, and, therefore, it comes under the Prohibitory Order, plus the Out-door Labour Test Order. The Master of the Rolls said that was all wrong. He gave his decision, and he emphasised the duty of feeding the wives and children. So we are confronted with the difficulty that the guardians may not give any test of work to men who refuse employment, which would, if they took it, be sufficient to maintain themselves and their families, but men who are out of employment for no fault of their own must go through a test before they can get relief. I want it made legal for boards of guardians to exact the test when they think proper, with the sanction of the Local Government Board, and make their relief dependent on that kind of man going through a test in the same way as other able-bodied paupers who are not on strike but who are destitute.

4949. The man on strike is disqualified from getting relief. The relief that is given is for his wife and children alone?—Certainly, and not sufficient for him, but he eats it, and probably the major part of it, and he stands by with his hands in his pockets whilst you are feeding his wife and children.

4950. The other man who is relieved comes under the labour test?—He has to work eight hours a day and gets considerably less than half-pay for doing that work.

4951. He gets food for himself as well as for his wife and children?—Certainly, and so would this man if he was in the labour yard. So he did under my illegal system. I will not bring in the Board, but the Board were of the same opinion as I was, that you must exact a test. I have Minutes from Sir Hugh Owen, who was Secretary at that time, and he also saw the clerk to the guardians of Merthyr and impressed upon him the necessity of having a test. Sir Hugh wrote to me with regard to other unions, where I did not want this test at all in labour yards. I was successful in preventing labour yards being opened in other unions during the strike by taking a little latitude. There was sickness of a very slight kind and they got relief in the case of sickness, in order to prevent labour yards; it was not very much, but he urged on me to have a test. It is illegal now, according to the only decision which has been given on it, by the Master of the Rolls, on appeal. I should like to see the decision altered.

4952. It is illegal to feed the man, and it is illegal to subject him to a test by which he can feed his wife and children?—Yes, but you must feed the wife and children, and you are not supposed to do that unless something will happen if you do not. That is a very invidious task to put upon a relieving officer.

4953. That refers to the cases you mentioned as requiring relief in the case of sudden and urgent necessity?—My view is that that provision does not apply to them, but it is not, of course, in conformity with the decision.

4954. It is not practical to apply it?—It is not. You cannot run a man in under the George IV. Act for not maintaining his wife and children, when you have 100,00 of them. You would have to fill the prisons, at great expense, and the irony of it would be that you would have to feed the wives and children while the men were in prison.

Effect o pauperis strike o 1898.

4955. Has the effect of that great strike been to increase the permanent amount of pauperism in the district where it occurred?—No, I do not think it has. I think the Workmen's Compensation Act has done much more to increase pauperism than that. Although the relief has increased, however, I do not think it has increased more than the population. There are some cases of old people who, on account of the strike, were permanently left on the rates because their sons could not support them.

When once people get on the books in that kind of way it is difficult to get them off again. The sons marry, and they are not pressed, and people remain on who would not have been on at all if the strike had not taken place. On the whole, however, I do not think the number of such cases is very appreciable. The strike was eight years ago; it was in 1898.

4956. You have had a period of prosperity since?—Yes. That is what has been done. There has been peace in the land, and coal has been paying fairly well.

oposed ification of itdoor lief and ohibitory ders.

4957. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Would you mind looking at Paragraph 41 of your Memorandum. You suggest whether it might be practicable to have one Order in lieu of the Regulation Order and the Prohibitory Order. Would it be practicable, do you think, to have one code of Regulations which should apply both to urban unions and to rural unions?—I think so. What I should suggest would be to have a Prohibitory Order and an out-door labour test Order to replace the Regulation Order. The Regulation Order is practically the same as the Out-door Prohibitory Order plus the labour test.

4958. The object of having the Regulation Order was, was it not, that you could deal with cases where you could not make the whole of the able-bodied come into the workhouse because the workhouse was not big enough?—Yes.

4959. How would you get over that difficulty?—I would draft something of that kind out of the Regulation Order into the Prohibitory Order and make one Order that would satisfy all those points. I am not a very good judge of how to do it; I think you would be a better judge as to whether there is anything in the Regulation Order that would be better put in the Prohibitory Order, so as to have one Order. There are two or three unions still in my district that have the Regulation Order, and some have a combination of the two.

4960. The unions you have with the Regulation Order, I suppose, are the more populous unions?—No, they are not.

4961. Do you remember what they are?—I think there is some doubt about that in the office, because they sent me two old forms for Tregaron and the very small union of Machynlleth, in which there was an order which they described as a combination of the two. When I looked at it, it seemed to me to be the Prohibitory Order pure and simple; but that could be ascertained at the office.

4962. Your plan would be to get rid of the Regulation Order, practically, and have a Prohibitory Order with certain exceptions to meet particular cases?—Yes, plus an out-door labour test.

4963. Turning to another matter, your view rather is that overseers might, with advantage, be got rid of?—I should like to see the assistant overseers and the people who collect the rates appointed by a larger body than the parish. I should like to see overseers abolished.

tent of by over- rs of wer to e relief.

4964. Overseers may give relief in cases of sudden and urgent necessity. Do they, as a matter of fact, in your district, give relief in cases of sudden and urgent necessity?—I do not think I have had three cases in the last twenty years. I have now and then attended the board and heard a rare instance where an overseer has got a rap over the knuckles for giving relief when he ought not to have given it, but as I have said, such a case is very rare. I know of only one instance where an assistant overseer has given relief.

4965. You do not think there would be any practical difficulty with regard to that matter?—No, I do not.

4966. Even in rural places? The rural places would be the difficulty if there was one; but even in rural places you do not think there would be a difficulty if the overseers were got rid of?—No, because, I say, if it occurred anywhere, it would occur in a district like mine. There is no doubt about it, in town districts, the fewer people who have power to give relief the better—at least I think so.

4967. (Mr. Patten-Macdougall.) How often do you attend meetings of boards of guardians? I think we have been told before that it is generally a more or less surprise visit and not a visit by invitation. Is that the custom that prevails?—No, not always with regard to visiting boards of guardians. Very often, to ensure what I want, I say that I am coming, so that they may give me more time than I otherwise would get. I am obliged to do that. Some of these boards only meet monthly, or once in five weeks; some of them meet fortnightly. It is a most difficult thing to travel about Wales, therefore I have to go when I can, but I never leave a board of guardians without one visit in the year. I may have to pay three or four visits to another board of guardians if I have to get something done.

4968. If you want some special information?—Yes.

Effect on administration of infrequent meetings of guardians.

4969. In the case of those boards which do not meet except once a month, or occasionally, I think you said once in five weeks, what happens with regard to relief in the meantime?—The relieving officer comes with a bundle of cases for confirmation at the end of the four weeks, and the actual granting of relief passes out of the hands of the guardians altogether.

Power of relieving officer to give relief between meetings of guardians.

4970. Into the hands of the relieving officer?—It puts it into the hands of the relieving officer. The only way of telling whether the officer gives proper relief is by paying a personal visit. He acts simply on the doctor's orders, because he is afraid something would happen if he did not give relief, and sometimes the person gets three or four weeks relief when, if the case was strictly enquired into, he would not get that amount. In some cases they have relief committees which meet once a fortnight, whereas the meetings of the guardians are only held once a month.

4971. Is it in your view a satisfactory thing that the relieving officers should have power to give relief in these cases themselves?—I think it is necessary someone should have a statutory power to give relief, because otherwise someone might die, and there being no available officer with the statutory power to give relief a scandal might arise.

Type and number of relieving officers in Wales.

4972. Are relieving officers generally of a class such as you can trust to deal properly and efficiently with cases of applications for relief?—Certainly, I think my officers, although they are not immaculate, are very good all round.

4973. Taking a typical or ordinary union in Wales, how many relieving officers are there as compared with the number of parishes in the union?—The population and not the number of parishes is the criterion, because there are very numerous small parishes. If you refer to the towns, I think Cardiff, with a population of 220,000, has eight relieving officers. I wanted them to appoint a superintending relieving officer to save the guardians from themselves, but they would not do it; they were afraid of it. They perhaps prefer their little popularity and they will not employ a superintending relieving officer.

4974. Are these eight relieving officers independent of one another; is there no head?—No, there is no head. The relieving officer attend the relief committees and the chairman of the committee is the only one who has the power of finding fault with them.

Relief given by relieving officer on medical certificate.

4975. Is the practice this, the relieving officer gives relief in the first instance and then what he has done comes before the relief committee of the board of guardians?—If it is an urgent case. He is not supposed to give relief prior to the board day unless in an urgent case. He has got to back it up by a medical certificate unless it is some old and very urgent case. If there is a medical certificate, I find that practically no relieving officer refuses, because he is afraid. In even a doubtful case he gives it if there is a medical order, and medical orders are very easily given in many cases. He is not supposed to give relief prior to the meeting of the board, but he often does in country districts.

Causes tending to increase size of boards of guardians.

4976. I think you said that in your opinion the boards of guardians are much too large for efficient administration?—I think some of them are.

4977. What do you suggest as a remedy?—I have nothing to suggest unless you alter the whole plan of the unions—of having agricultural unions tacked on to urban unions, and I will tell you why. We will take a union of 50,000 inhabitants; three-quarters of its area is represented by agricultural parishes with 10,000 people; a quarter of the area is represented by a couple of parishes, very small ones perhaps, with 40,000 people. That population is modern. A few years ago these two parishes had only two or three guardians, and the others had, we will say, twenty or thirty according to the number of parishes. Now they apply for more guardians. They say that on the basis of valuation and population they are entitled to more guardians than the other parishes. That is how all these large number of guardians spring up; they do not reduce the agricultural parish guardians, they increase the urban parish guardians; the consequence being an unwieldy number, but you see how difficult it is. I do not advocate taking the agricultural parishes and making them maintain themselves; they could not do it. They depend upon the prosperity of the big towns for selling their produce, and they ought to pay a contribution towards the urban part as well. I have practically no suggestion to offer, but in the old times I used to hold the inquiries and a good many small parishes were amalgamated. When, however, the new Act came in, instead of wiping out the old guardians they increased the guardians for the populous parishes.

4978. Your idea would be to have the small parishes combined?—Yes, and we did it in many instances.

The Welsh guardians as semi-official relieving officers.

4979. I also gathered that in these cases the guardian generally is the person who really gives relief, because the applicant for relief gets at the guardian, and induces him to do what he desires?—There is a danger of that. In the typical Welsh union the guardian acts with the relieving officer very often, he is a sort of deputy relieving officer. I do not say the guardian does the duty of the relieving officer, certainly not in the populous unions. I think the paupers do go to the guardians in many instances behind the relieving officer's back, but they do not get relief until the board day; then the guardian, as an advocate for the relief, brings the case before the rest of his committee, and generally the relief is granted.

Poor Law administration in Cardiff.

4980. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) Cardiff, I think, is a town where there is an increase of pauperism and large out-relief?—Yes, both.

4981. In a communication we have from the chairman of the board there he asks that the Local Government Board should do more to lay down principles for the guidance of the guardians. Do you think, if that were done, it would be any help to them?—Mr. Jones would be very strict if he could, much stricter than he is. There are hanging up in the Cardiff Board of Guardians' room rules that I drew up with the guardians thirty years ago, and you might as well print a page out of the Proverbs and put them there; they look very nice. They are bye-laws which, if adopted in connection with the Poor Law, would give a very wholesome rule to go by, but the guardians always find plenty of exceptions to them. I do not see what the Board could do unless it had compulsory power to compel them. But the Board is prohibited from interfering in individual cases of relief.

4982. I notice that he also asked that out-door relief should be either restricted or abolished altogether. Does not he represent the feeling of his board at all in that?—No; he cannot represent the feeling of the board that out-door relief be abolished altogether, when there are something like 4,373 persons in receipt of out-relief in the Cardiff union in one day.

4983. Do you think the guardians themselves, the board as a whole, would be glad to be, as you say, saved from themselves, if they could excuse themselves from being hard-hearted by referring to strict regulations?—I think what shows they do not want to be saved from themselves is that they refused to appoint an officer who they rather suspected would be their master instead of their being his.

4984. Then nothing but the conversion of the board would do any good?—The Cardiff guardians do a lot of good, it is not all harm. They are too easy, I think, with the out-door relief, but their relieving officers are very good men; but many good relieving officers have told me, "It is no good saying anything, they will not take advice in these cases." When I have pointed out to a relieving officer cases which I do not think ought to have relief, he has said, "I have said so many times"; no doubt guardians do give outdoor relief in many cases where the relieving officer would not recommend it.

4985. I should like to pass to the question of nursing the outdoor sick. I see you mention that. From Swansea we are asked for greater nursing facilities for the outdoor sick. Are the guardians not at liberty to appoint nurses?—Yes, but they never have done so. I do not think the appointment of a nurse is half so desirable as subscribing to a good nursing association, where they are more particular about trained nursing. I do not know who they would not appoint if it got into the hands of the guardians. They might appoint any young girl. I do not think it is good to put the appointment of outdoor nurses under the guardians.

4986. Are there sufficient of these associations to cover the ground?—You would be surprised at the increase made in the last few years. You must have a Welsh-speaking nurse in most places, and trained Welsh-speaking nurses are now becoming much more numerous than they used to be. I refer to places like Merionethshire, where a nurse sometimes has to go miles on a bicycle. I mention Merionethshire to show what can be done, because that is the most difficult county to get about in that I have in my district, on account of the bad means of communication. There is in those unions a network of district nurses who have been a great benefit in visiting paupers, and who also take the serious cases in the little workhouses. One of these nurses is always at the call of the medical officer to attend when you cannot afford to have a trained nurse in a little place where there are only twenty, thirty, or forty inmates. The Cardiff guardians give considerably more than £100 a year towards the outdoor nurses—I should think it was nearer £200. Swansea has got a good many association nurses, and they are being added to. If you help them it is surely much better than appointing some second-rate nurse yourself and not subscribing any longer to a thoroughly good institution. I would rather back up that than I would advocate the appointment by guardians of outdoor nurses.

4987. Could you tell me what type of pauper cases these nurses are attending? Are they serious cases, or are they the infirm paupers you would like to see brought into workhouses?—They are people who cannot be looked after—cases of infirmity, and paralysed cases sometimes, which from the absence of neighbours are out of the way of nursing, and sometimes cannot properly be looked after, and are left to the tender mercies of a casual "neighbour" and people living in houses not fit for habitation. There are many of those cases, I am sorry to say. The number of houses unfit for habitation occupied by paupers is very large in my district. I think a main cause of pauperism is the disgraceful state of the houses in which many of the paupers live.

4988. Are these nurses engaged largely in looking after the class of people you have just mentioned?—I do not think they are. The kind of people who want to be relieved in the workhouse would be the people not looked after by these nurses, and who cannot be, and whom no nurses that you may appoint would look after either, they are too out of the way. I dare say there are many cases in some parts of the country which urgently require removal to the workhouse, but the guardians will not do it because they have no power. Those people would rather live in filth and misery than come into the workhouse.

4989. These association nurses are engaged in temporary cases, not chronic cases?—Temporary cases, as a rule; but they would take up a chronic case that wanted bandaging—bad legs, and that type of disease.

Nursing in workhouses

4990. How far are they a substitute for an infirmary? How far would the cases, if you had a good infirmary, be brought into the infirmary if it were not for these nurses?—That is a very hard question to answer, because it varies so much in the different unions. Where I find the workhouse being more used I always devote my attention to getting the accommodation for the sick improved, and I have done it. But there are small workhouses, such as Llanrwst and Corwen—little places with thirty or forty people,—where there are only two or three sick. I do not know that they would be any more used if there were no outdoor nurses. What happened a few years ago when there were no nurses was that such cases were left to their neighbours. I do not think it would have much effect. You do not have a trained nurse in a provincial workhouse where you have less than ten, twelve, or fifteen sick. A trained nurse would not stay there; she would not come there to begin with.

4991. In these small districts the nurses are really a necessity?—I think so; and we find them, as I say, very useful in helping a surgical case, or dressing a case, and helping the doctor in the workhouse.

4992. It is not compulsory for the guardians to have them?—It is not compulsory, but they are only too glad to subscribe; they were not a few years ago.

edical ficer's wer to crease mber of rses.

4993. (Dr. Downes.) The medical officer has power to requisition more nurses, has he not?—Yes, in the workhouse, and the master is obliged to get one, but put yourselves in a place like Corwen or Llanrwst. You cannot very well get a nurse unless you send to Liverpool, or some other distant place.

cessity for lief stations Wales.

4994. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) Are pay stations very largely used?—Yes, very largely, but there are no shops or public-houses. It is almost impossible to prevent them because of the distance.

4995. Do you find that it works well, or are there abuses attaching to it?—I do not see the objection that many people have. Of course, the ideal thing would be for the relieving officer to take the relief to the paupers' own homes, but it is utterly impossible; it could not be done. Put yourselves in the position. You could not do it. You must have some stations. There is no doubt they give rise to little abuses. You find some old woman gets a penny from five other old women for taking their relief back. It is considered a crime almost worthy of hanging, I believe, but I think the world will still go on although the old woman gets the penny. I do not approve of it, but I think it is a lesser evil than trying to do the impossible, which making the officers go round to the homes would be.

4996. The hardship I have heard is that it is very difficult for these old people to get their relief; it is sometimes almost impossible?—I have never heard of it. I have heard of guardians complain that they have got a bad relieving officer, that he has not paid the pauper, and those cases have been looked into, but it is very rarely that the pauper is not paid every week.

4997. If the paupers are unable to come, it is taken to them?—He ought to go and take it himself in that case, if the pauper does not come. There is Mrs. Jones and Mrs. Roberts, they live together; one week Mrs. Jones comes and hobbles up and another week Mrs. Roberts; it is awfully wicked I know that Mrs. Jones should take back Mrs. Roberts' relief, and Mrs. Roberts should do it the next week, but it is done, and I do not think there is very much in it. Now-a-days the guardians look after the relieving officer very sharply about that. If there is any case of neglect, I find it very quickly looked after.

4998. How often, as a rule, are orders revised?—My advice to guardians is to give no relief for longer than three months, and to make an automatic revision of cases. I advise them to divide what they call their permanent cases into as many times as the Board meet in the quarter, so that an equal number of them come due in three months' time, so that no board day is particularly overweighted with the number of cases, because I find that these general periodical three monthly or six monthly revisions are absolutely and entirely useless. They are done in a hurry if they are done at all. The relieving officer wants to go and the guardians want to go, and one case after another being of the same nature the chairman initials them; and so on, even if it is done every three months, but generally permanent cases are put every six months. I cannot get it done universally; some unions have done it and some do do it; those who have done it have found it a great benefit. Then each guardian of each parish gets the list of those cases which are coming for revision at the next board day sent him by post by the relieving officer, so that if he has anything to say he can come in, but that is not carried out so strictly as it ought to be.

4999. Are there any unions in Wales where the Case Paper system is in use?—No, my opinion is this, if the Application and Report Book is properly kept, and if you read the columns and see the information there, it is quite enough. I do deprecate having more books than are necessary. I dare say the Case Paper system may be a very good system, but I do not see the necessity for it if your book is properly kept. That Application and Report Book is an admirable book, and for the needs of my district, if the information required by the printed headings to the columns is properly entered therein, I do not see, except as regards having a record of the cases and having an alphabetical index, what is the use of the Case Paper system.

Mr. Francis Thomas Bircham.

6 Mar. 1906.

5000. Do you consider the inquiries are generally adequate?—No, certainly not, not in all cases. That depends greatly on the guardians and their relieving officers, but I do not see that the Case Paper system would make it any more so. Besides, in the typical Welsh unions they have known these people, and know more about them than any Case Paper would supply they have made up their minds what to give them, they know exactly what they have in their pot in the kitchen, and every sixpence they have got. They do not require any more information; the thing is, have they strength of mind to say "no" when they ought to?

Relief to wage-earning women.

5001. Are there any districts in Wales where out-relief is given to women who are at work?—Yes, a great many.

5002. What sort of districts would they be?—I have always brought the guardians to task about it in seaside places like Aberystwyth, Llandudno, Colwyn Bay, and Rhyl; a widow gets the same amount for herself and her children all the year round, summer and winter. Those widows often are getting very good earnings in the summer when the visitors are there, at all events very much more than they get in the winter, when they practically get nothing, but they still get the same relief. In a Welsh district an old woman of fifty or sixty will still be working in the fields getting an odd job; the relieving officer puts it down as "charing," but in the agricultural districts it is generally agricultural work; she gets 2s. 6d. from the guardians and she can live; you could not live in many parts of the country on that, but you can in Wales. The guardians prefer that kind of relief to building pauper palaces at great expense for them, where they would be doing nothing.

5003. Are there any factories or mills in the towns where the women work?—Yes, particularly in the woollen mills and the tin works where the wages the girls get are considerable, and they are taken into account, but they do not get more than 7s. or 8s. a week as a rule—that is the girls in the tin works. The girls on the pits are lessening, I am glad to say. I remember the time when you used to see the tips at Dowlais covered with girls; now they are not employed so much. The girls in factories are fewer in number also. At Llanidloes and Newtown there are a good many girls employed in factories. I do not think we have any case of any employment where girls are supposed to support their mothers out of the wages they get.

5004. In some cases would the mothers themselves be working?—No, not married women.

5005. They would not be getting relief if they were earning wages?—No, not if they were earning sufficient wages, but partial relief in aid of wages is no doubt given. I do not think it affects the prices as it used to do.

5006. Still, if they were getting insufficient wages, they would get outdoor relief?—Yes, they would, but only in a very few cases.

5007. But still it happens?—Yes, it does, and evils happen all over the world, but the question is, are not they of so small an extent that to combat them would bring worse evils.

Boarding out of children.

5008. (Mr. Gardiner.) In paragraph 25 you deal with boarding out. I notice that the children are boarded out within the union for the most part?—Within the union.

5009. With the inspection of the relieving officer?—And the doctor. The doctors are paid 2s. 6d. a case for quarterly reports, and the relieving officers are paid nothing, but they have also to report. I must say, with regard to that, I visited several unions myself, and went round to every boarded-out child with the relieving officer. I cannot go, particularly in the case of girl children, and inspect them with the minutiæ that a lady inspector could do, but I could form a very good general idea of how they were being treated, compared with children of their own condition who were not paupers, and I must say that now and then I found cases where I insisted upon the guardians removing them at once, and they were removed; but the large majority of cases are very fairly done by. That is all I can say. I do not know any other inspector that has been round, but I thought it part of my duty, because the lady inspectors' duties are limited to boarding out under the Boarding-out Order, and these really were out-relief cases, orphans and deserted children getting out-relief within the union. The union where I live was so badly managed that I got the Board, with some difficulty, to abolish the boarding-out committee, because the management was so bad; but I think every union has some twenty or thirty children; roughly speaking there are over 1,000 now getting relief in that way, and I certainly should not alter it. You cannot build cottage homes in a little union for a small handful of children like that. I think they are very fairly done by, but there are exceptions, no doubt.

Mr. Francis Thomas Bircham.

Disadvantages of Cottage Homes system.

5010. Would it not be better to group the small unions, say, into counties for this purpose, and make cottage homes?—No, I think not, because the distances are so great in Wales. Directly you begin to group unions there will be dislike on the part of the guardians to take the children from their relations. There is a good deal of relationship between the people you put these children with; many a married sister takes a child and gets 2s. 6d. from the guardians, and no more, because they think she ought to do the clothing and the rest—or it may be an aunt or a grandmother. You would do away with that at once if you took them away from those surroundings.

After-careers of boarded-out children.

5011. On the whole, you think these children turn out satisfactorily in life?—I think so.

5012. I suppose there are no figures to be had with regard to that?—No.

5013. They are lost in the population?—They are, except so far as the children, who are very few, sent out from workhouses.

Workhouse Schools in Wales.

5014. You have a few in the workhouses?—Very few, and only those temporarily, now; they go out to school. Conway is an exception. I am trying to get them to build cottage homes or to board out in hired homes, but they do not see it at present. I have a lady guardian on that union who is going to move in the matter, but she cannot see her way yet. Wrexham has a workhouse school, but that, I think, may be only a question of time. I should like to see cottage homes built for that union. I may say that the first cottage homes ever built under the Poor Law were in South Wales.

5015. The Wrexham indoor workhouse school keeps no return of the career of the children?—It is a separate building, and would have returns of what had become of the children, and they are very satisfactory ones; but it is a school where a large number of boys, girls, and infants are collected together under one roof and not placed in separate cottages, etc. It is wanted for other purposes. I should very much like to see it done away with and the children put in cottage homes.

Need for greater powers to detain paupers.

5016. Sometimes we are told that the guardians ought to have more power to detain persons?—Certainly.

5017. Do you think that is necessary?—Absolutely. I should like to see them have power to retain any single woman with an illegitimate child who has no visible means of providing for herself and family. That is one class. Then there are those half imbeciles—the feeble-minded. The difficulty with them is to know where to draw the line between who is feeble-minded and who is not. If you get that difficulty over, then I should like to see that class—certainly the half imbecile class, who cannot look after themselves, who fall into trouble very often—kept in workhouses until such time, at all events, as they showed some prospect of being able to maintain themselves. I should like to see a power to detain all unsatisfactory cases of that kind, and a power to enforce the people to come in who cannot be looked after outside at a reasonable cost to the rates.

Inoffensiveness of imbeciles in small country workhouses.

5018. We have heard a good deal about the hardship upon the poor people in small country workhouses where there are a good many feeble-minded and imbecile people in the workhouses. Have you any suggestion to make on that?—I have none. I hear these dreadful accusations, but when I go round my workhouses I only find two or three imbeciles who are generally capable kind of people. If they make a noise or are offensive, they are generally removed to the asylum. The inmates of the provincial workhouses are generally made up of two or three incapable people, and two or three old and infirm, and perhaps a girl with a child. With regard to the few imbeciles in such places you can remove them to an asylum, but they really do the useful work of the place, and they are happy. That is my experience. If we have cases which are offensive, they are taken to the asylum, because we have no special wards. If they had room in the workhouses for them, and had some pretended classification, with their small staff they would not be able to look after them, and it is better that they should be sent off to other institutions. I should like to see those institutions put on a better footing; places where we could send imbecile children to: places where we could send epileptics to; and places where we could send ordinary cases to. Three or four years ago I brought that point up. I wanted two things: an idiots' school, as it was called in those days, and also an epileptic colony. I took Glamorganshire first of all, because of its large population; but, unfortunately, there were two county boroughs, Swansea and Cardiff, created and they did not help us, but the county of Glamorganshire did. I wanted, not a pauper place, but a non-pauper place, so that the guardians could contribute and send their pauper cases, because you could compel non-pauper cases to go in, which you could not if it was a pauper place. We got all the information for Glamorganshire county; and very useful information it was. It is in a pigeon-hole in Cardiff, and the clerk to the guardians could send it to you any day. If we got similar information for Swansea and Cardiff, we should have got, I believe, material to start in Central Wales, somewhere where you could get 100 acres, say, of land, a very good place for them all to go to. I should like to have seen it done. Perhaps my successor will, but we are a long way off. Cardiff and Swansea, in being made counties, must have their own lunatic asylums to begin with, and Cardiff has spent an enormous sum on a new lunatic asylum; therefore, they would not listen to this business. I hope to see it, and I want to see it. I deprecate making provision for such cases in provincial workhouses.

Scheme for separate treatment of idiot children and epileptics.

5019. (Dr. Downes.) In the suggestions we have had from chairmen of guardians I see five chairmen make a point of the segregation of the feeble-minded and imbeciles, the particular unions are Aberayron, Conway, Pontardawe, Wrexham, and Monmouth. Are you aware of any difficulties at those places which you have found yourself?—No, at Pontardawe and Conway certainly not. At Monmouth, yes. At Monmouth they are considering the matter, and then we may have a better room for imbeciles. I do not think Monmouth is a very important case. At Wrexham we are building a new infirmary, and we shall have special rooms for harmless imbeciles there, but we are only beginning to build it now. Mr. Simon Jones, who is now chairman, and succeeded the gentleman who signed that suggestion to which you have alluded was at this meeting which I have referred to for dealing with the imbeciles of his workhouse. I think we shall be able to deal with them when we get the new infirmary.

5020. Such difficulties as may exist are being dealt with?—Yes, but what I am saying does not refer to idiot children. Did your question refer to them?

5021. I have only a précis of the answer. I cannot tell what the wording of the actual answer was?—I think it only refers to adult idiots and imbeciles. I want a school of instruction to take away the idiot children altogether. I do not think that refers to them. Anyhow that is a want.

Nature of complaints by workhouse inmates.

5022. In going round the workhouses, do you receive complaints from time to time?—Very seldom.

5023. Do you get complaints as to classification?—No, none.

5024. What is the nature of the complaints that you do get generally?—I get but very few. Now and then there is a complaint, but certainly not of any importance. Complaints are generally matters of this nature: some discontented fellow has had his tobacco stopped, or cannot get leave, and when I go into the matter, I generally find there is some reason for it. Now and then there is a little failing, and, of course, that I have to pull up, but it is nothing of any importance. I think the inmates are very fairly well treated. I certainly get nothing about classification or married couples living together. The other day, for the first time in all these years, a man came to me and asked to be allowed to live with his old wife. I enquired into the matter; they were a very decent couple. There was no room in the workhouse that could be fixed up for them. I asked the guardians to see to it, and I believe they are going to do so, but it is very seldom married couples wish to live together. The truth is, in Wales they never send decent couples into the workhouse unless they are hopelessly ill or done for. Then they go into the infirmaries, where, of course, they cannot live together.

Infrequency of demand by married couples for separate quarters.

5025. It often happens that the one old person has to act as nurse to the other when they get into the married quarters?—When they get so bad they have to go to the infirmary.

5026. In paragraph 24 of your statement you say the workhouses are only used for a few imbeciles or infirm old men?—I ought to have left out that word "men," it ought to have been "people."

5027. You say "with no one to look after them"?—That means outside; it should be "or infirm old people with no one to look after them outside."

Compulsory removal to workhouse of helpless aged.

5028. On that question of the compulsory removal to the workhouse of all people who are living under bad conditions outside, I think every one will admit it is desirable, but may not there be hardship in some cases?—No, I would say that that should be done under the certificate of the medical officer and done by magistrates and not by the guardians at all. The guardians should take the case before the magistrates, and let them mention the time for which the person should be detained in the workhouse, upon the evidence of the doctor, and the relieving officer, or the guardians, if you like—I would not give the guardians the responsibility.

5029. You recognise there should be some stringent safeguard?—Yes, I presuppose all that. I only put this in to call the attention of the Commissioners to it.

5030. It might happen that the old person was occupying a cottage which somebody wanted, might it not?—It is possible, of course, but as a rule the cottages they have are not very desirable. In towns that might be so, certainly.

5031. That is the sort of thing that might have to be guarded against?—I should suggest that you have to bring it before the magistrate by the relieving officer and the doctor; as against that you have only some ill-conditioned person who wants the house, or who is, perhaps, the owner. I do not think there is the slightest danger in my district in Wales from that side of the question.

Lack of necessity for case paper system in rural unions.

5032. In dealing with the Case Paper system, you spoke of the special knowledge which Welsh guardians have of their cases?—In typical Welsh unions, not in the big towns.

5033. Would it follow that the one guardian would communicate all that special knowledge to his fellow guardians?—No, not at all; they keep a little behind very often.

5034. But very possibly that special knowledge might come out on the Case Paper?—What if it did? It does not make any difference to the manner in which the case would be dealt with in a typical union. I do not question that in the town unions you would require this Case Paper much more, if it is required. Where you have the guardians having special knowledge and withholding it is only in the farming country districts.

Nursing of outdoor sick at Swansea.

5035. You were asked by Mrs. Bosanquet as to the suggestion which came from Swansea as to the necessity for greater nursing facilities for outdoor sick. Do you know of any special difficulties in Swansea having regard to their present facilities?—I think as time goes on we shall get better still. I think the number of nurses will increase. We have built large hospitals at Swansea.

5036. It is for the outdoor sick they ask it?—If they are not properly nursed, they ought to be brought into the workhouse hospital, therefore it raises the question of whether you are going to build or whether you are going to rely on outdoor nursing. I am not in a position to say that the outdoor nursing is as satisfactory as it should be; it never is in any place. I have been round with relieving officers and found people living in rooms where they cannot be properly nursed, and in which they certainly ought not to lie in sickness even, but you cannot go building big new infirmaries to take them all in. Where you are going to stop I do not know. We have room for about 1,000 in Swansea now, but it is generally full.

5037. Do you find that agencies for the relief of sickness outside the poor law are extending or otherwise in your district?—Not in Wales. You do not mean nursing associations?

Effect of medical relief on medical clubs, &c.

5038. I refer not only to nursing associations, but to provident medical clubs and cottage hospitals?—How can you have medical clubs when you tell a fellow that he can come and get it from the board of guardians for nothing and not be made a pauper. They go down at once, and no wonder. I should like some evidence on that, and I wrote to Cardiff about it, and to several other places, but they would not tell me a word about these medical clubs. I have some answers, but they are worth nothing. Medical relief alone was going up by leaps and bounds in Cardiff and Swansea till I had to call the attention of the guardians to it, because it is perfectly wicked the amount that is now spent on people who have dropped their subscriptions to anything like a sick club.

5039. I gather that your experience is that lavish medical poor relief kills provident medical relief?—How do you mean, lavish? I never knew too much attention given to this by poor law medical doctors, if that is what you mean.

5040. I rather gathered from what you said that where there is this provision for medical attendance made by the guardians with medical extras and all the appurtenances of medical relief, when given freely, the men do not join the medical clubs?—I have no evidence to prove that they do not, but I am perfectly sure that you cannot expect medical clubs to thrive where the relief is got and does not pauperise. There is no disqualification attaching to it; but whether they can give medical extras is a legal question which is not settled yet, I think. Is it settled whether you can give medical extras?

5041. I do not know. If you could suggest evidence to us on this point, I think it would be desirable?—The best evidence I could give you would be the increase in medical relief only in the unions I mentioned, during the last three years, which must show that those people who now get relief from the guardians used to get it from other quarters. The medical relief clubs will not give you any list of members, and the benefit clubs do not all give doctors, the Hearts of Oak do not give a doctor at all. Other clubs do. I have no information at all on that, and I do not see how I can give it. I have tried to get it.

Voluntary Cottage Hospitals in Wales.

5042. Are cottage hospitals general in Wales?—No. There is one at Llanelly and one at Merthyr. They call them cottage hospitals, but they are getting beyond mere cottage hospitals. What do you exactly mean by a cottage hospital?

5043. A small voluntary hospital serving the needs of the district?—There is one at Llanelly. I cannot call Merthyr a cottage hospital now. There is one at Aberystwith, a small one; and one at Bangor, but that is gradually getting much bigger. They have been growing out of the category of cottage hospitals.

Utilisation by Welsh unions of distant voluntary hospitals.

5044. Are there county infirmaries in most of the Welsh counties?—Yes; I was trying to think where there was not one. I do not think there is one in Merionethshire. I do not think there is one in Montgomeryshire; they go to Shrewsbury; they get better attention, and it is almost as convenient.

5045. The railway system serves those places well?—Yes, for serious cases. Boards of guardians in North Wales frequently send their cases to Liverpool, even over to Dublin, to Manchester, to Birmingham, and to Shrewsbury, whenever they have a difficult case.

5046. Do the guardians subscribe to all those hospitals?—They do a great deal in North Wales, because they feel their workhouses are not sufficient to treat an acute case of any difficulty.

Mr. Francis Thomas Bircham.

6 Mar. 1906.

5047. Do you find that the medical officers of workhouses avail themselves of this power to requisition more nurses in their workhouses?—Several times they have, but that is chiefly in the case of infectious diseases.

Use by medical officer of power to requisition nurses.

5048. As to the question of drugs to which you referred, do any of the guardians make arrangements with chemists in small places?—No, some of the unions find the drugs not out of the salary of the medical officer; then, of course, they deal with some good chemist and get their drugs from him, but that is generally done on the order of the medical officer.

Methods of providing drugs for paupers.

5049. Do you think an arrangement of that sort would be serviceable in small places?—With the medical officer?

5050. Where the chemist makes up the prescription, and the guardians pay?—Are you talking about outdoor relief?—

5051. Either?—Only drugs for the indoor poor would be included in the salary of the medical officer.

5052. Let us take the indoor poor?—I think the best way is to let the medical officer order what drugs he wants, and account for them, and let them be kept in a small surgery in the workhouse, and be made up from time to time when it is convenient.

5053. Even in the small places would you do that?—I would. I think it is easy. In the very small places the doctors might be allowed to send in their bills for medicine. I think it is much better that they should have a little drug store of their own in the workhouse, and that they should order drugs when required.

Method of feeding wives and children of strikers.

5054. Turning to the feeding of women and children in times of strike, as a matter of fact in the great strike to which you refer in Paragraph 62, how were those women and children in thousands fed? Was it by relief in kind given to them at home?—On paper entirely. They were given tickets for food and a little money. I tried to prevent money being given at all, and wanted all the relief to be given in kind to these strikers, but the guardians would not have it.

5055. You said, I think, that there was some suspicion that the men benefited by that food or that relief?—Not in those cases. I said that would be the result of the Master of the Rolls' view. We fed our men through the labour yard, and we gave to the men up to a certain point until we were stopped. Just at the end of the strike (it did not very much matter then) it was the case that we had to relieve the wives and children, and the men looked on while we were doing it, and did nothing for it, but, of course, they consumed the food.

5056. Assuming that the men did benefit from the food given to the wives and children under the Master of the Rolls' decision, do you think that that evil could be minimised if the women and children were fed by meals provided by the guardians either at the workhouses or at certain places?—In a strike like that you could not have done it. Look at the distances the women and children would have to come, and where you would have to take these meals to. I had to get round the district, and I did not get half round the union in a whole day, working from sunrise to sunset. For miles and miles a place could not be provided for the children. They are not all in one town.

5057. I am not suggesting the meals should be taken to the children, but that the meals should be provided in convenient places to which the people could come?—I do not think that is reasonable in such a strike as we had in Wales; and in the district under consideration I do not think that would be practically possible.

5058. On account of the distances?—Yes.

5059. What would be the greatest distance they would have to go?—It is not only the distance, it is the inconvenience. There are mountains to go over; and look at the weather, sickly children could not be dragged over in that; you would have to build houses for them to feed in. I think that is impossible.

5060. You assume they would have to build houses to feed them in?—I assume that the whole idea is impracticable, knowing what I do of the district.

Type of rural guardian.

5061. (Mr. Phelps.) The unions in your district fall into two classes, rural and urban, I think you said necessarily; from what sort of class do the guardians in the rural unions come?—Principally from the farmer class.

5062. Farmers on a small scale or on a large scale?—In the typical Welsh unions there are practically no farmers on a large scale. In Glamorganshire and some other places there are large farms, but a farm of 200 or 300 acres is a very great rarity, except in certain parts of South Wales. Generally, the small farmer who would be a guardian would not have more than 60 to 70 acres to farm, except in Anglesey.

5063. Does the country gentleman play much part in the administration of the poor law?—No, he is not elected.

5064. Is that a recent change?—He was not elected before, but where he was a magistrate he was an ex officio guardian.

5065. I gather from the statement you have sent in, that his influence is much less on the administration of the poor law than it was?—Practically he has none. The magistrate qua magistrate is not on the board, only sometimes he gets elected for his parish, together with a clergyman or two.

Effect on Poor Law administration of Local Government Act, 1894.

5066. Do you date a great change from 1894?—Yes, but not so much a change in the personnel as in the powers of speaking, the loquacity as I say in my statement. When the proceedings were conducted in English, the ex officio guardians did it pretty nearly all; the other people could not express themselves well in English and consequently, said nothing, but they were there.

5067. Do you think, once that change took place, the education of the guardians has proceeded in a sense more rapidly?—I have not a high opinion of the knowledge of the poor law possessed by the present guardians in these typical Welsh districts. I think that they have to take more interest in their work, and that they are thrown more in contact with the poor than they were perhaps formerly. It is, however, very much the same there, only they have found their voice which they had not before.

5068. Then you do not think the area of interest in poor law questions is very much enlarged by the absence of the one or two people who really worked the whole board?—No. From my point of view, it was better perhaps in the old time, because Welsh is a language which allows a great deal of talking on very small subjects.

Clergymen and ministers as guardians.

5069. Do you find many ministers of religion on the boards?—Not many what I call licensed ministers, but there are some. Even in the most typically Welsh part of my district, there are nearly always a clergyman or two on the board that have been elected by the parish, and they are generally rather exceptional men—men who respite their being clergymen have been elected because they are really good men.

5070. Do you find ministers of other denominations on the boards?—Yes. It is hard to know sometimes when a man is a minister, and when he is not. They do not appear always as ministers, but I find out afterwards what they are when I ask. I should think there is a good sprinkling of them, but in the country districts the members are mostly farmers

5071. Do politics play much part in the elections in the country?—I do not know that I can give you evidence about that. If you ask me my private opinion, I should say that politics in Wales is simply church and chapel.

Type of town guardians.

5072. What class do the guardians come from in the large towns?—They vary. There is still a good sprinkling of men connected with the industries of the localities, shopkeepers, now and then innkeepers, and ministers of religion and clergymen. They are very varied in the towns; now and then there is a gentleman on the board who takes an interest in the work. On the whole, I should think they are very varied, and very intelligent—quite fit to learn more about poor law than they know; and they are teaching themselves—there is no doubt about that.

5073. On the whole, you think the state of things there is encouraging, I take it?—I think so. I think the town guardians in Wales (except as I have said there are too many of them) are on the way to learn; I think they are improving and anxious to do their duty.

Pauperism in Glamorgan, Monmouth, and Carmarthen.

5074. In the 32nd paragraph of your statement you say, with regard to the unions in Glamorganshire, part of Monmouthshire and Llanelly in Carmarthenshire,

"they are most of them increasing in pauperism of late years;" but I do not think the figures quite bear that out, do they? I find on looking at the figures that pauperism is falling at Bridgend and Pontardawe, according to Mr. Booth's analysis, and that Bridgend is one of the lowest of the whole?—Yes; but in these last two years Bridgend has largely increased in pauperism.

5075. According to the figures, it has gone down from 2·5 in 1885 to 1·5 in 1905?—But the population has increased enormously.

5076. The proportion of paupers has gone down very much, apparently?—Certainly as between those years, but it has increased in this last year considerably.

5077. Since these figures were made up?—Yes.

5078. The same is true of Pontardawe; there has been a considerable falling since 1895?—It is only from 3 per cent. to 2·7 per cent.?

5079. But that is an improvement. If you take Merthyr Tydfil, if you take Neath, and if you take Pontypridd, they are all stationary; there is no sign of increase there, I think?—Since the last 25th March Bedwellty and Merthyr Tydfil have increased very considerably; there is no doubt about that.

Increase of pauperism in Cardiff and Swansea.

5080. The two towns which have increased largely are both Cardiff and Swansea?—Cardiff and Swansea have increased not only in actual numbers but in percentage of pauperism.

5081. Are there any particular circumstances which account for that increase in pauperism?—No, except that the guardians will have it so; they love to have it so. What will be the end thereof, I do not know.

Conditions in Monmouth Union and Forest of Dean.

5082. Take, for instance, Monmouth; Monmouth has an English speaking board entirely I take it, and I know something of Monmouth?—Yes, it has.

5083. And it is an entirely country district; that is one of the most pauperised unions of the district?—If you know the Monmouth district, you know the Forest of Dean portion, where there are a lot of very poor squatters in their own freehold cottages, living from hand to mouth on a very fluctuating trade. The quarry industries, charcoal industries, and what tin plate industries there were in the Forest, have been for years in a very depressed state. The collieries are a little better now. Still the fact is that these people live in their own houses, a great many of them without any sanitary convenience at all; and, as I said this morning, I attribute the increase in pauperism as much to bringing up people in filthy insanitary houses as to any other one condition that I know of. If you could go round the Forest of Dean with me as I have been round with a relieving officer, you would wonder they were not all paupers sometimes, if you looked at the houses they dwell in. But business is improving in the Forest, and they are not so bad as they were.

5084. Do I understand—I only ask this by the way—that many of these people live in freehold cottages?—Yes, under certain conditions. I am not in a position to tell you how, but they are practically freehold.

5085. Do they hold under the Crown, or something of that sort?—Yes; it is a very peculiar tenure.

Interest of Guardians in workhouse administration.

5086. With regard to the outdoor relief, you say there is a considerable increase; do you find in the management of institutions such as workhouses and the like, that the boards of guardians in these large towns are efficient?—Take Cardiff; I consider that Cardiff Guardians are quite, I was going to say, first-rate in the interest they have taken in three points of their workhouse administration—one being the treatment of the sick; another being the provision of an almost unique place for the old and infirm, where they are separated entirely from the other part of the workhouse—three miles off in an ideal place; and the third being the scattered homes which take nearly 300 children. I go round there with the greatest possible care; I find that the individual guardians who are entrusted with the different homes in their localities take great pains. They have imitated and improved upon Sheffield, which the guardians went to see. I consider that that board of guardians takes the greatest possible interest in all their in-door work. They will be proud to show any of their institutions to any board. Swansea is not perhaps entitled to that amount of praise. They have cottage homes of a rougher and more primitive kind. They have just now built an up-to-date infirmary, and they have got very fair accommodation. There is a new infirmary at Bridgend just being built; at Merthyr the new infirmary is quite good; at Pontypridd they have cottage homes, but they have an insufficient workhouse. I understand, however, that they are intending to build there. Altogether, I must say that in the industrial and the large centres—not in the small unions—the workhouse administration has vastly improved during these last three years, and is, to my mind, very fairly satisfactory without their building unnecessary barracks and palaces.

5087. It has not gone back since 1894?—No. It has gone ahead by leaps and bounds, I should say.

Effect of Local Government Act, 1894, on workhouse administration. Willingness of guardians to erect buildings.

5088. Have you had much difficulty in persuading guardians to put up new buildings and to improve their accommodation?—I am not a very exacting inspector. I hate every brick that is put into a poor law building. It is only when it is absolutely necessary that I bring it before them. I think that by the time I bring it before them they have pretty well made up their own minds that it is necessary, and, therefore, I have little or no difficulty. I do not mean to say that I get exactly all I want—none of us do; but I wait till I can see that they are ripe for it, and then I take them along and make them finish it. I have no real difficulty about it. Even in my own workhouse at Chepstow, which is a purely agricultural union, we are now putting up a new infirmary. A lot of farmers form the majority of that board.

Increase of medical relief at Cardiff.

5089. I think earlier in the day you were going to quote some figures to show the increase in medical relief?—Yes. I have here the Cardiff figures of out-door paupers in receipt of medical relief only from 1872 to 1878. There appears to be a gap in all the eighties; but, before the Medical Relief Disqualification Removal Act, the numbers in receipt of medical relief only were very few. On 1st July there were 71 out-door paupers in receipt of medical relief only; next year they increased to 170; the number was 156 the year after that; then 106, 134, 278, and 197. I then began to wake the guardians up about it, and it is now going down a little again. On the 1st January, which is taking a winter month, the number in 1900 were 212, 238 the next year, and then in succeeding years 207, 131, 224, 336 and 248. If you were to take the numbers relieved during six months, they would be ten times as many. Those figures are only for one day.

Infrequency of loan relief.

5090. Is medical relief ever given on loan?—I have brought that before them, but hardly anything is given on loan in my district. At Swansea they have tried to do it of late; I do not know with what success, but practically it has not been done hitherto.

5091. Do you find that in most of your unions they have a scale of relief?—Yes, I think so.

Scale of relief in Wales.

5092. Could you put in one or two typical scales of relief for country and town unions—I do not mean at this moment, but could you send them to the Secretary?—They do not confess that they have a scale. "We treat them on their own merits," is a very favourite expression with a board of guardians; whether it is always acted up to is another thing, but that is their expression and they will not confess to a scale. Widows have a scale, but that varies; in one or two country unions it is still a rate of 1s. for each child, but it is generally 1s. 6d.; and in one or two of the urban town districts it is 2s. a child, with nothing for the widow if she is able-bodied, unless her circumstances warrant it. The treatment of the old people varies very much in urban districts. Take a union like Cardiff; there you cannot get a house under double what you pay in a typical Welsh district, where a cottage is to be had for £5 a year or £4—such cottages as they do have; whereas a person in Cardiff for one room has to pay 4s. 6d. per week. You cannot make a scale to fit that; you are obliged to give higher relief on these occasions.

5093. Would the Cardiff guardians have a printed scale before them when they meet?—No, nothing of that kind. They do not pretend to have any scale. But the relieving officers no doubt have a kind of scale, because directly one old woman hears of another old woman getting 6d. more than she does, the second old woman's relief goes up also; so it is very infectious.

Mr. Francis Thomas Bircham.

6 Mar. 1906.

Extent and effect of compounding for rates in Wales.

5094. Going now to paragraph 46 of your printed statement, am I to understand by that that you want to see compounding for rates abolished ?—I am not lawyer enough to do that, but the Assessed Rates Act has been the cause of great extravagance, I think. In these industrial centres, by far the majority of the electors of guardians are the very men from whose classes applications for relief come, and they, in thousands to instances, pay no rates, but they pay rent. Of course a political economist will come to me at once and say, but then they have to pay, if their rates are so high, more rent. It is not so. You cannot alter the rent. There is a fixed rent of 4s. 6d. for a collier, and it does not go up and down with the rates at all. It is no barometer of that kind. It is always the same, and it does not matter to them, as I say in the statement, whether the rate is 5s. or 4s.—they pay just the same. Therefore there is no incentive to economy, and they do not feel where the shoe pinches if there is what you call extravagance.

5095. Compounding for your rates is almost universal in this district, is it not ?—Wherever you get large collieries the proprietors build the cottages and rent them out and pay all the rates. That is the rule.

5096. Do you know whether compounding is common in the country districts ?—I do not think so, but every house under £8 can compound. It is where you get rows of houses, with men changing their residence, that it is manifestly convenient to be able to collect the rates from the proprietor, and it saves the assistant overseer a lot of trouble to get it out of one pocket, besides being much better paid in that way. I foresee all the difficulty, but you will get no check on extravagance until you make the people who spend the money feel that it comes out of their pocket, and not, by pulling a string, out of heaven or somewhere else.

Settlement litigation in Wales.

5097. Have you found that in Wales settlement questions are much contested ?—Yes, a good deal. I think in the districts of cosmopolitan unions like Cardiff and Swansea, they agree to take a pauper and do not worry about his Irish settlement or his Scottish settlement very much, but if he belongs to a neighbouring union they enforce it. The clerk at Cardiff—and that is the most important union in my district, from its varying circumstances—is strongly in favour of doing away with the law of settlement altogether, or, at all events, of reducing it to the one year as I have said in my statement; but he says his guardians would probably not agree with it, because when they get an expensive pauper they like to send him off to another union.

Effect of abolition of settlement.

5098. Do you think it would make much difference in Wales if settlement was abolished ?—I think there is a good deal of very unnecessary expenditure about it, even in Wales.

5099. Do you think any particular type of union would gain very much, and any particular type of union would lose very much, if settlement was abolished ?—In port towns like Cardiff and Newport, where sailors come in who are very often permanently disabled, and are thus thrown on the hands of the unions, there might be some hardship; but even then I would make it a rule to a great extent that where the tree falls there it should lie.

5100. Do you think the town unions would suffer at the expense of the country unions, if settlement were abolished —No, I do not think so.

5101. (Miss Hill.) You were mentioning nursing associations; are those voluntary bodies ?—Yes, all.

Extent of charities in Wales.

5102. Have you many charities in Wales ?—I am sorry to say very few. May I be allowed to amplify that remark ? You should understand that old Wales is a very small part of the population of present Wales. There are no charities in any of the towns where the populations are of recent growth, nor in the industrial centres round the coal pits of Glamorganshire and the iron-works. There are no better class residents there, and there are no endowed charities of any kind, and the consequence is there is no Charity Organisation Society—I wish there were, but I do not see how they can thrive upon nothing. There is a Charity Organisation Society in Cardiff, and there is one in Swansea, but they do little or no work, because they have no money to go upon. The chief charities are what one might call church charities and chapel charities, but they are not endowed in any way, and there is no old form of charities that you could organise, in order to help boards of guardians by transferring from one to the other; I wish there were.

Type and characteristics of Welsh guardians.

5103. (Professor Smart.) You say that the guardians in the industrial districts consist very much of managers of works and pits, clergymen, grocers and small shopkeepers, and that the membership of the boards is very varied and very intelligent ?—Yes; but I was talking of the towns. The coal districts vary considerably from that. If you take the Merthyr board of guardians, you will find they are like the present House of Commons; they largely consist of what I call labour members—in fact I found that out in the strike of eight years ago, but now they are larger still in numbers. The other day Merthyr became a borough with a Mayor and a Charter and everything else, and by far the larger part of the councillors are purely working men, the Mayor himself being a working man. That will show you how they differ from a place like Cardiff or Swansea. They differ everywhere in that way. I was talking rather of Swansea, Newport, Cardiff and that kind of place, when I used the words you have just quoted, and not so much of the coal district.

5105. Is this due to the more clannish feelings of the Welsh, or is the social life of all classes in Wales more on an equality ?—I think the latter is the case in the towns, but in the mountainous and thinly populated districts there is a clannishness amongst the people, and each valley almost is different from the next valley, and they have their own individuality—there is a long Welsh word for that, but I will not trouble you with it. But the people know each other, and help each other to a certain extent. When they get so poor that they cannot help each other, then the guardian comes and says, "I will get you a half-a-crown at the Board." Mind you, that half-a-crown is worth 5s. or 6s. here; you must always bear that in mind. There is a tendency to subsidise what little these old people have, which springs from an intimate knowledge of their family concerns; that is in the typical Welsh unions.

5106. In the rural districts you say farmers form a large proportion of the guardians ?—Yes, they do, in the rural districts certainly.

5107. And they are likely to be intimately acquainted with the people of the district ?—Certainly.

5108. Am I right in saying that it is this intimate knowledge that makes outdoor relief better guarded in Wales than it could be anywhere else ?—Yes; that is always barring the cosmopolitan parts of Wales. You mean the Welsh parts of Wales, I take it ?

5109. May I ask if you are a Welshman ?—No, I am not; I am an East Anglian.

5110. How many inspectors have you under you ?—None.

5111. Are any of your assistants Welsh ?—No.

Disadvantages of Inspector's ignorance of Welsh.

5112. Do you feel your inability to speak Welsh yourself to be a hindrance ?—I do certainly—not so much speaking as understanding all that is going on when they do not want me to understand. I know a little about Welsh and I can speak to an old woman in a workhouse but I cannot make a speech; and if they do not want me to understand it is like a person using a foreign language before you—you may be able to speak French pretty well, but a couple of Frenchmen can talk so that you cannot understand a word that they say. There is where I should like to come in, but I cannot.

Sentiment against entering the workhouse.

5113. I suppose the prejudice against going to the workhouse is very great ?—It is, still they get in there, and then they wonder that it is so comfortable.

5114. Is that as great in the industrial districts as in the rural districts ?—They say so, but then that is to get the outdoor relief. I do not think there is the same disinclination on the part of guardians to make use of the workhouse in the unions which have large workhouses. They say they could not possibly maintain these people outside under 7s. a week at the very least; and there are hundreds of these men with little or nothing to do.

5115. Is that the reason why a strict workhouse test could not be applied in Wales ?—Yes, and I hope it never will be.

Features of agricultural Wales.

5116. Is there a large number of small farmers in Wales ? —Yes.

5117. Very small farmers ?—Yes; and some of them get relief when they become so old that they cannot look after their little holdings. They pass the holding on to a son who may have a young wife, and make it over to him; then it becomes the son's, and he and his wife begin again, and these old people get relief sometimes. I do not mean to say there are many such cases, but you must remember they have been living worse than a labouring man all their lives, and bringing up families too. They would be a lesson to some of the unemployed.

5118. I suppose these are mostly grazing and sheep farmers ?—Yes. They all have a field which has a bit of potatoes and a bit of turnips and a bit of green-stuff on it, and then the rest is grass for cows and there is a little sheep run; they generally have a mountain for that, which is the most paying thing of the lot.

5120. I hear that in Wales agricultural wages are high ?—That depends on the nearness to the industrial centres. They are high in counties like Glamorganshire, Breconshire, and Carmarthenshire, where they are near what they call the "works." That is a large question. In typical Wales there are very few labourers. There is the "hwsmon" who is engaged by the six months of the year for so much and his food. If he is a bachelor, that is all very well, but if he is a married man the food goes into him and not into his wife and children, and he has only 10s. a week to send his wife and children who may be living somewhere else.

5121. Is "hwsmon" a Welsh word ?—The "hwsmon" is the house-man, or head man. He looks after all the other men on the place. A most interesting description of Wales was given by Mr. L. Thomas before the Agricultural Commission. His description will tell you all about it. It is as good as a novel to read.

Outdoor relief Friendly Societies Acts and their effect on unstable Benefit Clubs, etc.

5122. May I refer you to paragraph 33 in your Statement, and ask you what you mean by saying that the Friendly Societies Act is but a premium on rotten clubs ? —That is open to comment, I admit. Rotten clubs are not clubs like the Manchester Unity, but break-up clubs and small village clubs. Directly they get a few old men on them, they break up and send the old men adrift and start again. Those are rotten clubs which only give their people 2s. 6d. a week, or something like that, and those clubs get more benefit out of this Act than a good sound club which gives more than 5s. a week that is put in the Act. The section is read by the guardians in this way—that if the poor person gets 5s. you have got to consider that in the relief. What the Act really says—only I do not press it at all, because I never approved of it—is that after 5s. you shall begin to take account, but that the 5s. of club relief shall not be taken into consideration. I say that if the Manchester Unity, of the Hearts of Oak, or the Foresters, or that kind of club, want to do well in a place they will do better where the boards of guardians are strict than where they are slack, and that it would be well if boards of guardians would recognise good clubs by ordering the workhouse in bad cases instead of giving them out-relief. That is the difference that should be made—the workhouse for the fellows who have not got a club or who have a bad club, and the out-relief for the person who belongs to a good club if his relief from the club is not sufficient. That is where I say the boards of guardians could back up the good clubs. I speak of "rotten" clubs, and they are rotten—there is no other word for these small break-up clubs.

Unstable Benefit Clubs.

5123. I understand that it is rather usual for well-off people to subscribe to these clubs as a kind of charity and without any intention of coming on them ?—Certainly; I do myself, and so do lots of people.

5124. That is why the rotten clubs subsist, is it not ? —I do it as an example to the place I live in, so that other people may belong to them; but I am specially exempted from the benefits. I have subscribed to the Miners' Provident Society though I am not a miner. I subscribe to the club in my district, and there are a good many of my neighbours who do subscribe also, and I think it is very legitimate to help the good clubs in that way. The club I subscribe to is the Manchester Unity.

5125. I thought you were denouncing rotten clubs ?— The Manchester Unity is not a rotten club. I do not think these people subscribe to the rotten clubs.

5126. I thought you were speaking of rotten clubs entirely, and that you meant clubs that could not pay what they undertake to pay unless they are assisted by subscriptions from people who never intend to come on the club, so that you, for example, in subscribing to them would be fostering a very bad system ?—No. I think the clubs I have in my mind are rotten in any way you look at them, whether or not you include what they get from chance local help and from people who do not intend to participate in the benefits (but I do not think they do get such help). I think the people who want to help clubs by voluntary subscriptions help the good clubs as a rule and not the rotten clubs. By a rotten club I mean a club that will only give 2s. 6d. a week, and will break up directly it is getting a little low in its funds and begin again.

Assurance in Wales and effect thereon of Workmen's Compensation Act.

5127. Do you find that insurance is increasing in Wales with good offices like the Prudential for example ?—No, I do not believe it is, but it is impossible to get figures to give evidence upon. As I have told you, I went to the Registrar of Friendly Societies but could get no figures.

5128. Cannot you get any figures about the Prudential for example; I thought they were well known ?—I could get them with regard to Cardiff, because one of the leading guardians there is the head manager of the Prudential in that district.

5129. I rather understand, but I am not sure, that the subscriptions to the Prudential are increasing, and I cannot quite make out how that is reconcilable with your suggestion that the Workmen's Compensation Act has had a deleterious effect on Friendly Societies ?—Do you call the Prudential a strict Friendly Society ?

5130. No, but it is part of the same movement; a Friendly Society insurance and a Prudential insurance is very much the same thing—in both cases it is an insurance ?—I cannot give evidence upon that, but I am told wherever I enquire, by relieving officers and by responsible guardians, that the clubs are not kept up by the young men in the same way that their fathers used to keep them up. I wish I could give you some information on that; I tried my best to get it and failed. As to what effect the Workmen's Compensation Act has had upon Friendly Societies in Glamorganshire, that could be got before the end of the year from the registrar.

Position and influence of Rhymney Iron and Steel Company.

5131. I suppose that in many districts the bulk of the rates is paid by property owners and companies ?— Yes.

5132. Do you know anything of Rhymney ?—Not financially.

5133. But you have a general knowledge of Rhymney. I take it ?—Yes.

Mr. Francis Thomas Bircham

6 Mar. 1906.

5134. I suppose the Iron and Steel Company there employs most of the labour?—Yes; they are colliers.

5135. It practically has the monopoly of employment there?—Yes.

5136. Does it own, do you know, any property besides its own works and pits?—I think the only business that it does is coal raising now; they have shut up the tin works and the steel works.

5137. You do not know if it owns the brewery?—Are you thinking of the truck business?

5138. No; you do not know if it owns the brewery?—I do not know; it may still do so.

5139. You do not know if it owns the public-houses?—No.

5140. You do not know if it owns all the public-houses?—I would rather not give evidence on that, because I could not swear to it.

5141. Do you not know that it owns some hundreds of the colliers' houses?—Yes, I do know that. They all do that.

5142. Then that property obviously would pay a very large portion of the rates?—Yes.

5143. Do you know if any of the officials at these works are on the board of guardians?—Not so many as there used to be. I remember for years when the chairman of the Rhymney Company was also chairman of the board of guardians at Tredegar. The cashier used to be a member, and the very man in charge of the brewery and of the truck business was a member for years. But I do not think there are very many Rhymney officials on the board now, in fact there are very few officials compared with what there used to be.

Influence of employers and property-owners on Poor Law administration.

5144. Of course these companies either directly or indirectly would have a great influence on the whole matter of poor relief?—But these men do not form the majority.

5145. I am thinking of the owners of property and employers generally?—They have not so much influence as they used to have. There is a labour majority on all these boards now, and the employers are not represented to the same extent.

5146. Do you ever hear of any complaint being made of influence being brought to bear on the assessments?—No, not that I could give evidence upon. The persons who could give evidence upon that would be the clerks of the assessment committees and the clerks of the guardians.

5147. Might one say that where there is a great monopolist power, it is probable that it is not without influence if it likes to exert it?—I do not think there are any monopolies now; there used to be, no doubt. I remember the Bedwellty board of guardians, when the board almost entirely consisted of the chairmen and officials of different companies; and I do not think they administered their poor relief arbitrarily or narrowly; I think they administered it as straightforwardly as it is done now, if anything, more so. I never detected any sort of unpopularity, and they were elected year after year. But we have grown different since. I do not think they used their monopolies unfairly with regard to Poor Law relief; I must say that.

5148. One would not suggest that, but one merely thinks that if there is a great monopolist power, it can be exerted if people like to exert it?—Yes; but these monopolies do not exist now.

Alternatives to stone-breaking as labour test.

5149. You do not think very highly of stone-breaking as a financial success?—Certainly not in the case of large numbers, because there results such a large accumulation of stone that it is very hard to get rid of it. Then it is difficult to bring it there in the first place; it is only brought at a great cost, and the quarrymen drive up the prices when they know who is to have it. So, financially, it is very expensive. The returns of the Merthyr board of guardians would show a very great loss.

5150. I think we should all agree in that. Then you say that in 1874 a great deal of useful work was done by strikers in road making and repairing?—Yes.

5151. Is road making and repairing a possible alternative now to the stoneyard?—It has to be done out of the rates, but it is done now by rural district councils and urban district councils, and they would not employ the rates to keep men who are on strike. Their duty is not to relieve the destitute, or to find work out of the rates of their particular parish in order to relieve men who could go to work if they chose. That is why there was nothing of the kind done. Besides, you know, in those old times of 1874 the roads wanted making. There were no roads over the mountains—that is thirty years ago—but since then they have been made, and there is not the same work wanting to be done elsewhere. The reservoirs have all been made, and so we could not employ the strikers to make them. I do not know what to suggest instead of a stone-yard.

Welsh Guardians unofficial relieving officers.

5152. (Mr. Bentham.) In paragraph 21 of your statement you refer to the Welsh guardian as being practically the relieving officer of his parish?—Yes; to a certain extent that is quite true in the Welsh parishes.

5153. In all of these parishes I suppose there will be a guardian, and then probably the relieving officer will cover the area of three or four parishes; would that be so?—A good many more than that.

5154. Therefore the guardian is more easily reached by the applicants than the relieving officer?—Yes; but, you should understand, there is very little urgent relief wanted in these districts.

5155. I take it that in the first place the applicant will apply to the guardian, he being more accessible than the relieving officer?—Yes, very often, unless the relieving officer happens to live near.

5156. I take it from what you say that you consider that to be rather an evil, and that it leads to an increased amount of relief being given?—That is very small. That is not quite regular, and it is not a principle to be approved of, but after all is said and done, the relieving officers and the guardians work very much hand-in-hand. We will take the case of an old woman who is getting relief, and who suddenly becomes sick and wants a little more help. The guardian would send to the doctor direct, without going to the relieving officer, and she or the guardian—the guardian himself most likely—would go off to the doctor and get him, rather than waste a whole day in getting hold of the relieving officer.

5157. When you speak of the doctor, do you mean the district medical officer under the guardians?—Yes.

5158. Would the doctor go to the old woman without hearing from the relieving officer?—I think he could hardly refuse.

5160. The question I want to ask you particularly is whether you see any way of getting over this difficulty of the guardian acting as a relieving officer in these areas?—No, I do not, and all things considered I think it is not without its advantages to have the guardian in such districts as a sort of fifth wheel or second wheel to fall back upon, when the relieving officer is not available.

5161. Taken upon the whole, it is a system that works fairly well; is that what you mean?—Yes, considering the circumstances of the country. I must draw your attention to some of these unions; I have sixteen of them with over 100,000 acres, and six of them with over 150,000 acres, and that area not consisting of level ground where you can have railways or where you can drive, but of mountains and valleys. In those cases, you must depend upon a little help, unless you are going to an absurd expense in having a large staff which shall have practically nothing to do.

Compulsory removal of infirm to the workhouse.

5162. I see there are several chairmen of boards of guardians in your district who recommend compulsory powers being obtained for removing infirm people to workhouses; and you also recommend the same?—Yes, in certain cases.

5163. Has there been some difficulty with regard to this class of case that makes these chairmen recommend this course being adopted—I mean a difficulty in the way of removal by means of an ambulance ?—No, I wonder they have not all recommended it. I have been in communication with them about it and have talked with them, and I think all the chairmen of my boards of guardians, if they were here to-day, would be in favour of compulsory removal under certain safeguards.

5164. You mean that if all the chairmen of all the boards of guardians in your district had all met together they would have all recommended the same thing ?—I think so, on that point.

5165. And on that point only ?—That is the only point at present under discussion.

5166. If that were so, it shows that it is a want in your district ?—Yes. It is to get over the difficulties that exist in Wales arising out of the disinclination to go into the workhouse and its unpopularity. Although the guardians themselves—Welsh guardians as they are—say: here is a case that ought to be in the workhouse, they will not incur the unpopularity of withdrawing outdoor relief and they cannot compel the people to come into the workhouse.

5167. What is the method adopted of removing infirm people to the workhouse ?—You send over a carriage, a cab, or a fly, the same as you would in removing people to the asylum. We have to drive them twenty miles in a fly very often to the asylum.

5168. They do hire a decent conveyance ?—Yes, They have a carriage and pair sometimes.

5169. Then there is no objection on that score ?—There is no difficulty on that score.

5170. (Mr. Nunn.) I suppose the difficulty is more felt in a very sparsely-populated country of leaving persons who are unable to look after themselves practically without any assistance, than it is in a populous centre like London or Cardiff ?—I would rather trust to to the kindness of a Welsh neighbour, although he was a quarter of a mile off, than I would to that of the next-door neighbour in Soho, or some place like that.

Publication of relief lists.

5171. (Mr. Bentham.) Would you recommend that boards of guardians should publish the names of recipients of relief ?—They do not do it; they left off that years ago. They used to put up a list at the church door and many other places, but I never see it done now.

Procedure of Welsh Guardians in granting relief.

5172. Do you often sit with the boards when they are granting relief ?—Yes.

5173. Do they examine the application and report book with the object of ascertaining if all the circumstances are taken into consideration ?—Yes.

5174. And if the relieving officer visits the case frequently ?—Yes, but they do not always.

5175. Do they make a practice of that ?—They do not always do it, but I always call their attention to it. I have seen a great improvement of late years in the way relieving officers keep their books. I can only go to a board of guardians once or twice a year, and when my back is turned the guardians may cease to take notice of what I have said. It is a very difficult matter to know what to do, particularly when you get an old relieving officer who may be otherwise very good, but who is a bit slack in his book-keeping. I wish these books were kept better, because as I said this morning I think all the information you want will be found in them.

Need for index to Application and Report Book.

5176. Do you find that the relieving officers in the urban areas keep a proper index of all the cases ?—I do not think they do; that is where the case paper system would come in, no doubt. If they kept a proper alphabetical index to the application and report book, I think it would be a great help.

Question of attendance before Guardians of applicants for relief.

5177. Do the guardians insist upon the applicants who are able to appear coming before the board on every occasion of renewal of relief ?—Not in every case in every union by any means, but they do in the town unions. In many unions the old cases on the list come up for renewal, but the pauper is never required to attend.

5178. Then the guardians in many instances will never have seen the applicants at all ?—No; they rely upon the guardians who put them on the list first. But that is not the case with unions like Cardiff or Merthyr, etc; that is the case in the Welsh unions.

5179. My question applies to the urban areas; I know the difficulty in the country areas ?—If you apply your question to the urban areas, they do require it. In Merthyr every applicant for renewal of relief who can go appears before the board on the renewal of relief every three months, and in a good many other unions too; but at Pontypridd they do not, and that is one of the highly pauperised unions in my district—and it is the richest too.

Revision of relief lists.

5180. Is there any system for the revision of cases in these larger unions ?—They are all revised every half year, but, as I said, I do not believe in that revision; I believe it is much better to make it come automatically in the way that I mentioned this morning.

5181. What kind of revision is it ?—All the cases are put off till the end of the half-year. Then they come up for renewal and have to be signed in the application and report book by the chairman. Questions are asked, and the guardians can be present if they like, but unless there is any alteration, the cases are initialled as a matter of course. There is very little interest taken in going into the cases, because the guardians say they know them so well already; but that is not right.

5182. That is not what I mean by revision; that is simply renewing the cases again ?—That is all.

Cross-visitation of paupers.

5183. Is there no system of revising cases in between the period for which relief is granted, on possibly a cross-visitor's report, or something of that sort ?—No. Cross visiting is what I would like to see in a populous union, and that is what I have recommended. We shall have a cross-visitor in Newport, but I have failed to get one in Cardiff. I should like to have this interim visiting very much.

5184. Does it not exist in any of these unions ?—No, it does not exist in a single union in my district. I wish it did in the populous unions.

Rules adopted by guardians as to relief.

5185. You say there are no scales of relief in existence that you know of; but do any of the unions have regulations to guide their own relief committees in dealing with the cases of relief ?—Yes, I think it is understood that if so-and-so wants more than 3s. there would have to be some special reason for it. In some unions when they get to seventy years of age they go up 6d., and when they get to eighty they go up a shilling, and if they get to near a hundred, why they get anything they like; but they do go up by decades. Of course if they are delicate or ill, they get more relief according to their necessities. There is, however, no fixed scale, further than what they recognise amongst themselves in each union as enough for that class of person.

5186. I do not mean particularly a scale, but I meant regulations to guide the guardians as regards the class of case they could give relief to ?—Every board of guardians has printed by-laws which say that no person is to be relieved who lives in a house unfit for health, or who has relatives able to maintain him, whether morally or legally liable. All these good intentions have gone to pave the board-rooms of boards of guardians, and there they are still, but, as I say, they are not strictly adhered to.

5187. Do you say that you have drafted a set of regulations ?—I did not myself draft them, but with the consent of the guardians they were drawn up. No doubt I was present originally, and I find that they are practically the same as are being adopted in many unions in other districts.

5188. Do you draw the attention of the guardians to the fact that they are not adhering to these regulations ?—Yes, often. I point to the rule, but it is no good. I draw their attention to the rule about the houses, but they say, "Where are they to go to?"

Relief in Wales and its effect on charity.

5189. Do you find that the charitable agencies are increasing in their usefulness in any of these large areas?—I am sorry to say there are very few in Wales, even in the big towns. I never heard of much co-operation between the boards of guardians and the charitable agents in my district. There is no charitable organisation whatever worth speaking of, and there is no sort of intercommunication that I know of between the guardians and their relieving officers on the one hand and the charitable societies on the other, further than that it may come to a relieving officer's notice that a person gets something out of some local charity and he goes and makes inquiries.

5190. Then really Poor Law relief is expected to meet the whole of the needs of the poverty of the area?—It does, except at Christmas time and in the winter, when each of the churches and chapels subscribes a little, and they generally would have enough to meet the winter difficulty if it were not for this scare about unemployment.

5191. Do you think administration on the part of the guardians has had any effect upon the charitable instincts of the people?—I am not sure that a very strict board of guardians, absolutely refusing relief to people who require it, might not have driven these people into the arms of the public and then the public might have started charity to maintain them. But I do not see much proof of it in Wales at all. People want everything out of the rates now; they want the poor relief, and everything else. That is the tendency—to draw upon the rates. However strict the guardians may wish to be, it is the opinion of the public that the rates should maintain such and such a person, and that it is the proper fund to look to. I am afraid that damps charity.

5192. Then you think the tendency is towards more dependence on the rates for everything?—Yes. I think be who runs may read.

Cause of decline of Miners' Provident Society.

5193. There is one point in paragraph 37 that I do not quite understand. With regard to the Miners' Provident Society, I think you said that the society gave better advantages than even the men get under the Workmen's Compensation Act?—Yes, certainly. That is obvious from the authorised scheme of the Society, which I now hand in. (See App. Vol. I. (A), No. X (C).)

5194. Still the society is decreasing; how do you account for its decreasing?—It is a party thing altogether. Before 1898 the colliers did not belong to the Federation; now, nine-tenths of them, I was going to say, belong to the Federation. They joined together and with the employer formed a sliding scale committee, and, in connection with that, there was the Miners' Provident Society; then in 1898 that broke up. An agitation was got up, and the men joined the Federation, and ever since then by far the greater majority belong to the Federation, and the Federation only recognise the Acts of Parliament that are in force and will not allow their men to contract out of the Workmen's Compensation Act. Therefore, the men, in case of an accident, are dealt with entirely under the Workmen's Compensation Act, and they must abide by it. If they choose to belong to the Miners' Provident Society they could get better terms than they get under the Act itself.

5195. (Professor Smart.) But they would have to leave the Federation?—No. There are 17,000 still who have clung to the Society. These workmen are very strong, and although they belong to the Federation for all other purposes, they will not give up that. They are quite right, and their leaders ought to stick to that kind of thing too.

5196. (Mr. Bentham.) I rather gather from what you state that you do not approve of an out-door labour test; is that so?—No, but I think it ought to be worked in combination with the Out-Door Relief Prohibitory Order. Financially, the labour test was a failure, because so many had to break the stone, and it was so badly managed.

5197. Of course you cannot expect a labour yard to be a financial success, can you?—No, but still I thought there was a good deal more waste than might have been if it had been better managed. A financial success it will never be, but if you get rid of the pauperism, that is your success—not in making money, of course.

5198. Then the effectiveness of a labour yard is shown by the decrease in the number who avail themselves of it?—So far as the test goes; but I think you ought to put the men themselves who are responsible for all this misery to some sort of work, instead of their looking on with their hands in their pockets while you feed their women and children.

5199. Do you prefer the labour test rather than the urgent necessity plea?—Yes, certainly; the latter is no test. As I say, the poor people who are thrown out of employment owing to the strike, but through no fault of their own, you are obliged to put through a test.

5200. When there are no labour yards in existence in the unions in your area, are there any able-bodied people who are being relieved under the urgent necessity plea who you think ought not to be relieved?—In a case of sickness only, do you mean?

Relief to able-bodied men under the guise of "sudden an urgent necessity."

5201. Are any able-bodied people getting out-door relief on the plea of urgent necessity on behalf of some member of their family?—Now and then they may get relief just for one week, and then it is tided over.

5202. Are not cases renewed week by week?—No, they are not renewed week by week. In the six months of which I have the figures before me the total number of people in all Wales relieved for want of work was 237—that is in fifty-three unions.

5203. That might be so on paper, but as these unions are all under the Prohibitory Order, I want to know whether you find that out-door relief is really granted to people who are able-bodied, on the plea of urgent necessity in the case of some members of the family?—Not to any appreciable extent, except in cases of sickness. Of course if there is sickness, then relief can be given to an able-bodied person.

5204. Even if the sickness might be the sickness of a member of the family and not of the head of the family?—Yes, that is perfectly legal. I can give you the numbers and you may take these numbers as being quite accurate. The adult males relieved on account of their own sickness were over 2,000, the adult males relieved on account of the sickness of a member of the family or in the case of a funeral were 200, and the adult males relieved on account of want of work were 237.

5205. In those cases where it is given because of the sickness of a member of the family, do you ever check the amount of relief that is given to that household for that purpose?—No.

5206. Then you really do not know whether relief is given to a whole family on the pretext that is being given for a sick member of the family?—Of course I check it if I see sons who are living at home and who are working and earning wages. I often draw the attention of the guardians to that, and say: Have you taken that into full consideration? Very often they go into it then, and find that they have not; or when I draw their attention to it they might say: Yes, but there is this reason or that reason, and so on. All the members of the family who are living at home and earning wages are down in the application and report book. They would not go to the relatives living away, for temporary cases of sickness.

5207. What I want to get at by these questions is whether they get behind the Out-door Relief Prohibitory Order on the plea of urgent necessity, and grant relief to exactly the same class of cases that it would be granted to in a union which is under the Out-door Relief Regulation Order, and do it in those cases minus an employment test?—They cannot do it for more than one week, that is till the next board day.

5208. According to law, cannot they do it?—That is so, and they do not do it. I have often had to check a relieving officer for doing it for that one week. That led to a lot of relief at Llanelly during the bad times, because the relieving officer was under the impression that he could, without visiting a case, give relief for one week pending the board day to pretty well any man who asked him. I found he was doing a lot of harm, and I was gibbeted in "Truth" for the advice that I gave him. It is perfectly true that that led to a great deal of harm, and I checked it at the time and eventually it was stopped. I do not think it is done now at all, except that there may be cases of sickness in which it is done under the rose, that is, where there is not very much sickness and there is a want of work; but I do not know about that.

5209. In your district the rate of pauperism seems to be decreasing, and yet the average is higher than in other parts of the country which are under the Out-door Relief Regulation Order. I have wondered whether you would say that there ought to be a less rate of pauperism in the unions which are under the Out-door Relief Prohibitory Order than in the unions which are under the Out-door Relief Regulation Order?—I think there ought. Do I gather from you that you think the Out-door Relief Prohibitory Order is, by being a little stricter, likely to be abused and not carried out in its entirety?

5210. Yes, in order to get exactly the same advantages that are gained under the Out-Door Relief Regulation Order?—It is for that reason that I made the suggestion in my statement. I want one order for all unions, combining the good points of the Regulation Order, of the Prohibitory Order, and of the Out-door Labour Test Order, in one.

5211. For the simple reason that you think that the Out-Door Relief Prohibitory Order is not prohibitory; is that it?—No. There are differences in the two, but they might be made the same. If you have the Out-Door Relief Prohibitory Order, that prohibits you from doing anything until you have got the Out-door Labour Test Order given you. When you have got that, then it reduces you pretty well to the same position as if you had the Out-Door Regulation Order. I prefer the Out-Door Regulation Order myself, but still I think you might have a combination of the merits of both, adding the Out-Door Labour Test Order to them.

fect of 'orkmen's mpensa- n Act on ployment d uperism.

5212. (Mrs. Webb.) In reference to paragraph 34 you say the Workmen's Compensation Act has resulted in throwing elderly men out of work, as I gather?—Yes, certainly.

5213. Have you ascertained whether the average age of persons in employment under the Act has actually been lowered?—No, I have not ascertained that.

5214. You have no knowledge of it?—Not actual knowledge.

5215. Have you any reason to suppose that the average age of persons actually in employment in mines under that Act has been lowered?—Yes, decidedly. You have nothing to do but to go round the workhouses and see the increase in the number of inmates, and what class they belong to. If you question the men, they will tell you, "I cannot get employment because I am this, that, and the other." It is a common by-word in the whole district. In a report published by the Miners' Provident Society the evidence given before the Departmental Committee on the Workmen's Compensation Act* by Mr. Owen and the different labour leaders of the society will tell you how they got turned out of these pits that are under the Workmen's Compensation Act.

5216. But you have not got actual statistical information on the subject?—No, I should not believe it if I had.

5217. You would not believe it?—I should not believe statistics. It is almost impossible to get accurate statistics.

5218. If you found that in those mines the average age had not been actually lowered, would you not consider that fact of any account in expressing an opinion as to whether the Act had resulted in lowering the age?—I do not want to be told about that. I know it has resulted in people being turned out of the pits. Whether the average age has been affected I really cannot tell.

5219. Statistics would not count, and they would have no effect on your opinion?—Not so much as on some people perhaps. I may state that my remarks do not refer only to men working underground, but outside labour as well.

5220. I notice that in two unions you say that "the Workmen's Compensation Act has resulted in a considerable increase to the permanent list of paupers." I turn to the figures, and I find that taking the two unions you specially stigmatise, one has actually decreased in pauperism since the Act came into operation, and the other is stationary. That would not affect your opinion?—That is in total numbers, not in men, is it not?

5221. No; in men between forty-five and sixty?—I do not go so low as that; over fifty I should say. There are a large number at Merthyr and Bedwellty, and the workhouses are so full that they are obliged to relieve the people out-door just now, but they are building a new workhouse. They are now going to send a lot of men to Pontypool. That has all occurred since Ladyday, 1905.

5222. Would you be prepared to say that since the coming in of the Act in 1897 the number of men, say, over 40——?—I did not say over forty.

5223. What do you say then, over fifty?—I would say over fifty.

5224. Had actually increased?—Certainly.

5225. But you have no statistics to prove that?—No, I have no statistics here.

5226. Is it not rather odd that the total amount of pauperism has actually gone down in spite of the fact that this particular class of pauper has increased?—Gone down where?

5227. It has gone down in the whole district?—You must not take the whole district. That is where statistics mislead you.

5228. It has gone down in one of the unions which you specially mention, Bedwellty?—Are you referring to in-door paupers?

5229. In Bedwellty it has gone down from 3·1 to 2·8 in exactly the decade in which the Workmen's Compensation Act has been operative?—Ten years ago they were very bad.

5230. Still there are the statistics?—Go and look at the pauperism in Bedwellty at the present moment. It is considerably above what it was even on the 25th March last.

5231. Then we have not got the latest statistics?—No. The statistics on this table are for 1905 compared with 1895.

5232. And in 1897 the Workmen's Compensation Act came in force?—Yes, but then it was amended in 1900, I think you will find.

5233. Still for five years it has been operative, and in spite of that fact in one of the unions which you specially signalise the pauperism has gone down?—It is in bad times when you find the bad effect of it, and we have not had bad times till now.

5234. Then, as a matter of fact, it has not increased pauperism?—What has not?

5235. The Workmen's Compensation Act, because the pauperism has not increased?—You think so.

5236. (Mr. Bentham.) Has not the population increased rather largely?—Here are the figures; the population was 64,000, and it is 85,000 now, I daresay.

5237. (Mrs. Webb.) But still the rate per thousand has actually gone down; I want to get the facts?—You cannot expect me to give the facts; they can only be supplied by colliery proprietors and owners.

5238. We have this fact, which is writ very large, that the pauperism has fallen from 3·1 to 2·8, yet you say that pauperism has been increased by the Workmen's Compensation Act?—Yes, and if you will go to the

Mr. Francis Thomas Bircham.

Bedwellty workhouse and the Merthyr workhouse you will agree with me.

5239. Then we ought to have a loose impression rather than a statistic ?—Very well ; you can call it a loose impression if you like.

5240. May I call your attention also to the statistics of your mining unions. I notice that out of fifty of your unions, twenty-four are classified as principally mining : during this decade between 1897 and 1906, which is the exact decade in which the Workmen's Compensation Act has been in operation, fourteen of those unions have actually decreased in pauperism, seven are stationary, and only three have increased. Does that bear out your contention that the Workmen's Compensation Act has, as a matter of fact, increased pauperism ?—I can only say what I see, and what I hear when I ask questions. I go round the Merthyr workhouse, and I go round the Bedwellty workhouse, and I see the large increase in the number of men who can do something, but not much, and they all tell me the same thing. I am perfectly convinced of what I say, and everyone in the district will tell you the same thing—working men, all the relieving officers, and everyone else. I am not prepared with figures to show how many men have been dismissed because they have got a few grey hairs and all that kind of thing ; but it is the case. They are not all miners.

5241. Do you think it likely that the official of the Miners Federation would say the same thing ?—I do not know what it is likely that the Miners' Federation would say. How can I know ? I very much approve of the men belonging to the Federation. I do not say that the Workmen's Compensation Act was not an absolute necessity ; I only say one of the effects of it—and they cannot all be good—is the increase in pauperism amongst that class of men who could do some work, and who are even now kept on in the pits which are under the Miners' Provident Society.

5242. But you still assert that there has been an actual and positive increase in the amount of male pauperism over fifty since the Workmen's Compensation Act came into force ?—I should say there was no doubt about that.

5243. (Dr. Downes.) I should like to ask whether it is not possible that an increase in a particular class of paupers may be co-incident with a decrease in the total number of paupers ?—Quite so ; cela va sans dire.

5244. (Mrs. Webb.) That would be a statistic for us to find out ?—A statistic is a dreadful thing to go by.

"Destitution" as the qualification for relief

5245. (Mr. Nunn.) With regard to guardians dealing with the poverty of their district, you said there were no charitable agencies in your area, but did I understand you to say that the guardians dealt with cases of poverty as distinguished from cases of pure destitution ?—I do not think destitution is in it now ; it never was much. As I said before, it is a very hard word to define. Destitution is no longer the first necessity for relief ; poverty is really the thing. I do not see how you are to describe destitution literally. There is no doubt about it that in Wales relief is given in aid of small wages, as, for instance, where a poor woman living alone can earn only a few shillings a week ; it is all taken into account, and a little relief is given her in addition. There is no doubt about that. You might call that poverty, but it would be destitution if it were not for that half-a-crown a week.

5246. But the guardians are unwilling on the whole to exercise the test of destitution by offering the house ?—I should not offer the house to those cases at all. I think the system works very well in the typical parts of Wales. It is capable of being riddled to holes from any political economist's point of view, but it works very well, and I think it is better than any substitute you could put for it. It utilises the intimate knowledge of the local guardian, and there is very little jobbery with it, I really think.

Proportion of women and children paupers in Wales.

5247. In the country parts I understand it is very largely a matter of relieving a widow or an old person ?—And so it is throughout all my district. If you will take the return of my poor, you will see that the proportion of women and children to the total who are relieved is more than three-fourths. It is a very interesting return from that point of view, I can assure you. Out of 63,700 people relieved, there were not 11,000 who were males.

5248. May I ask what was the point of deploring the collapse of the medical provident movement in its relation to the poor law ?—I really do not think there were ever any medical funds—certainly there were no registered ones for I enquired about that in Cardiff and Swansea. There are no registered medical relief societies in Wales that I know of.

Scope and constitution of Miners' Provident Society.

5249. Does not the Miners' Provident Society give sick benefit ?—That is not a medical relief society. It is only intended to deal with accidents.

5250. But surely it gives sick benefits ?—No. There is an old age pension fund attached to it, but they have not got money enough to deal with more than 100. That book of the Miners' Provident Society is very interesting. It puts you au courant with all the questions that Mrs. Webb asked so much about, and it gives the figures.

5251. I notice that that is considerably subsidised not only by employers' associations, but by private individuals on rather a large scale ?—Yes, but it is a drop in the ocean when you have an explosion or anything like that. The members are connected with coal works and people feel their conscience smiting them when they live up in London. They may remember that they have got little works down in Wales which they get a little income from, and it is perhaps as a sort of conscience money that they subscribe to that society ; but they do not do it nearly so much as they ought.

5252. (Mrs. Webb.) Might I ask whether the Miners' Provident Fund is not practically a branch of the Liberty and Property Defence League ?—I cannot say.

5253. (Mr. Nunn.) I see that the proprietors subscribed £8,900, life members between £4,000 and £5,000, and honorary members about £6,600 a year ?—Yes. The honorary members include a lot of people who, as I say, feel they ought to give something, but are not called upon legally to do it.

5254. That is a very different proportion to the honorary members of such a society as the Manchester Unity of Oddfellows or the Foresters ?—Yes, but you could not expect anyone but those connected with the coal trade in South Wales to subscribe to that society.

Insanitary surroundings and drink as causes of pauperism.

5255. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) You put down as one of the great causes of pauperism in your own district in Wales insanitary surroundings of various kinds, do you not ?—Yes, but I think that is not confined to Wales at all.

5256. Would you add drink as one of the other contributing causes ?—There is no doubt about that, to a certain excent, but drink does not account for everything.

5257. A good many workhouses in your district are very small ones, are they not ?—A great many.

5258. Are they old buildings, principally ?—Yes, but they have all been modernised to a great extent, except those hopeless little ones which it is no good doing anything to, they are so very small.

Type of workhouse master in Wales.

5259. The quality of master that you would get in a workhouse of that kind would be, I suppose, not of a very high class ?—No, but still they are of a class that the guardians come from themselves in those typical districts. For instance, Llanrwst has lost its old master and matron, who have been there for longer than I have been. They were an old couple, who knew nothing very much and were not able to learn very much, but they were very kind to the poor. The guardians have a very long list of candidates for the post, and I notice that all sorts of people are applying ; I do not know who they are, as I have not read it through.

Cause of prejudice against entering workhouse.

5260. Now as to the prejudice against going into the workhouse, which, of course, is existing everywhere ; has it any special force in the Welsh district of Wales, owing to the fact that removal from home surroundings there means going into another valley and to an absolutely different sort of place altogether ?—I think there is a great deal more of that feeling than there is in most parts of England. I should think that probably Cumberland and Westmorland would be a very similar kind of district; I do not know them, but I should think they very likely would be.

Question of substituting almshouses for smaller workhouses.

5261. Would it be possible, in your judgment, to substitute anything in the shape of an average accommodation almshouse or anything of that sort for these smaller workhouses?—No. I think they are practically the same thing. If you had almshouses under the guardians they would still be workhouses from the legal point of view. I do not know how you would substitute almshouses. In the big towns where we have no charities, I have often thought that almshouses might be a very good way of dealing with the old people, instead of driving them into the workhouse. There are no charities or endowments of almshouses in Wales whatever. I should not be at all sorry to see some of the boards of guardians build places for their old people, so as to take them out of the workhouse where they cannot be properly classified and where they feel more confined; but in the country I do not think you can substitute almshouses. The people would not use almshouses; they would rather stick to their old cottages, and as to the people who must come into the workhouse—well, it is an almshouse now and nothing more.

Welsh sheep runs.

5262. In regard to the sheep runs in these mountain districts, have you any idea on what tenure those sheep runs are held?—I know that they are taken with the farm. I wish I had brought with me a book I was reading last night about the tenure of those Welsh farms. The sheep runs have gone with the farms for hundreds of years.

5263. Are they not counted in the acreage of the farm?—Not in the thirty acres.

5264. Then a man would hold thirty acres and a sheep run?—Yes.

5265. The sheep run might mean a great deal?—It depends. If he has a big sheep run he would be charged more rent for the holding.

5266. (Dr. Downes.) Most of these farms have the right of turning so many sheep on to the hill, is that not so?—Yes, but still some runs are much better than others.

5267. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) I put the question simply in order to account for the enormous acreage, and the number of small farms; you cannot account for that?—These sheep runs go to a great height, and there is no agriculture there at all. The tops of these mountains are 2,000 and 3,000 feet high.

Probable effect on pauperism of higher standard of relief.

5268. (Mr. Booth.) In paragraph 31 of your statement you say, "There are unions like those of Glamorganshire, part of Monmouthshire and Llanelly in Carmarthenshire which present a far different aspect"; and in paragraph 32 you say, "I need not trouble the Commission with these unions further than to say that many of them have a difficult time before them." As a matter of fact that is very interesting to us, because, as Mr. Phelps has mentioned, the figures we have do not I think show an increasing pauperism in any but one of those unions in recent years?—That is quite recent.

5269. Therefore I may regard what you say here, "that many of them have a difficult time before them," as the main point?—Yes. It is more difficult now than it has been hitherto.

5270. You foresee difficulties?—I foresee them, I think, unless they are very careful.

5271. And the reason you foresee difficulties is that they are apt to bring in a new system which at first, at any rate, will possibly increase pauperism?—At first, I think. Public opinion demands better treatment of the in-door poor, better sick accommodation and better nursing than they have had up to now, because their population has grown so quickly upon them, and there is a higher scale of individual out-door relief compared with what they had a few years ago.

Pauperism in Cardiff Union.

5272. On several occasions in your evidence there has been a sort of penalising of Cardiff I think. Although its pauperism has increased in the last decade, Cardiff still remains a not highly pauperised place if you test it by percentage. The population has nearly doubled; it was 133,000 in 1885 and it was 258,000 in 1905, which is an enormous increase of population that may easily bring in circumstances which account for the slight upward movement in the percentage of pauperism. It is a little hard on Cardiff I think, considering that on the whole the pauperism is a very light percentage, that that little turn upward should be rubbed in against it?—Would you not consider that a town whose prosperity was marked by an increase of population of from 117,000 to 228,000 in ten years, ought to show if anything a considerable decrease in pauperism?

5273. That raises a most interesting question which we can hardly go into now, as to whether these rapid increases of urban population do or do not tend to lessen pauperism; they may bring prosperity to some and poverty to others, and I think they do. But I do not mean to ask a question on that; I merely wish to point out that, tested simply by the figures we have here, Cardiff does not come out very badly?—I want the percentage to be less, because I am perfectly certain that there might be some improvement there.

5274. That it might be better?—Yes.

Characteristics of Monmouthshire Unions.

5275. Taking you, as I hope to do rather rapidly, through the counties, in Monmouthshire you point out that the eastern portion is agricultural; that consists, I take it, of the unions of Abergavenny, Chepstow, and Monmouth?—Yes, Abergavenny has now Blaenavon in it, which has great iron works and collieries, otherwise it is rural.

5276. Then the three north-western and western unions, which are mainly or largely industrial, are Bedwellty, Newport, and Pontypool?—Bedwellty is entirely mining, Newport has a good deal of agriculture but it is mostly industrial, and of course it is a sea-port; and Pontypool too.

5277. Then it is rather singular that the three more or less agricultural unions have a much higher rate of pauperism than the three which are industrial?—They suffer from the old traditions. They ought not to be so high as they are, but still they are getting better I think; are they not?

5278. Not all of them?—No; Chepstow is not.

5279. Abergavenny is steadily getting worse?—The Abergavenny increase is entirely due to the Blaenavon works.

5280. The same thing is true to even a greater extent of Chepstow, is it not?—Yes.

5281. Chepstow has very markedly increased?—The guardians there are not quite so strict with regard to their administration as they were; there is no doubt about that.

5282. Is there any reason you can give for it?—No. I go and tell them about it every year, and they are very pleased to see me, but they go on the same.

5284. In regard to Monmouth, where there has been a slight decrease in population, there has been a very marked decrease in the pauperism percentage, so that there you seem to have had success in your methods?—Monmouth has not decreased very much.

5285. It was 4·7 per cent. in 1885, 3·9 per cent. in 1895, and 3·7 per cent. in 1905; the reduction all took place in the first decade?—Yes, it did.

5286. At that time you were inspector there, were you not?—Yes, and I lived in the county.

Mr. Francis Thomas Bircham.

6 Mar. 1906.

5287. Was there an improvement ?—There was, but not in the last few years.

5288. During the ten years from 1885 to 1895 ?—Yes. They had a very good chairman ; there is a good deal in that.

Characteristics of Breconshire Unions.

5289. Then to pass to Breconshire ; this is all purely agricultural and "Welsh," you say ; by "Welsh," do you mean that the Welsh language is mainly used there ?—No, not in Breconshire.

5290. But you say that, do you not ?—In Brecon and Builth the habits are Welsh with regard both to pauperism and to living, but they are not Welsh-speaking people there.

5291. Then when you use the word "Welsh" in that instance, it does not refer to the language ?—No, not in Breconshire.

5292. So when you say "there are four unions all purely agricultural and Welsh," you mean Welsh in their characteristics ?—Yes ; the same kind of farms and the same kind of living and hiring of labour.

5293. Crickhowell shows a very marked decrease in pauperism ?—Yes ; but that is because of the works. They have got large works up there. They are not purely rural. They had very bad times about 1895, and thus relief was very high then. That was not owing to strikes ; it was owing to bad times and depression in trade.

5294. The decrease looks persistent, because in 1885 it was 3·8 per cent., in 1895 3·2 per cent., and in 1905 2·1 per cent. ?—There is what I call having over-much faith in statistics. These statistics are perfectiy accurate, but there was an exceptional reason why in 1895 their relief was very high, as I happen to know. Therefore that reduction from 3·2 to 2·1 per cent. was not a fair reduction. It was less than that the year before.

5295. But ten years before it was higher ?—Yes, but that is an interval again.

5296. Naturally one looks at that reduction ?—Certainly ; but that is why I say you must find the explanation from what you know happened. I could give you the reason for every one of these figures if you went through them.

5297. Comparing that with Hay, the conditions are similar, are they not ?—Yes ; that is purely rural.

5298. There the rate of pauperism has not decreased materially ?—No ; but it is a wonder it has not. It has gone down from 4 to 3·2 and that for a very thinly populated district of 9,000 people is not a bad reduction. It is a wretched little union as far as poverty goes.

5299. Then you, on the whole, expect a higher percentage of pauperism with a small population ?—I do, because everything costs more if you have a few people to employ ; in every phase of society I think that is the case. You cannot run 9,000 in the same way that you can run 90,000 ; you do not get the help.

5300. It is not a question of the cost of administering relief, but of the number of people who demand it, and I do not see why the number of people who demand it should be greater in proportion in a little than in a big district ?—What does that mean ? Why does the population decrease slowly ? It is because all the able-bodied people go away to the works instead of doing the agricultural work at home, and only these poor old people are left to be looked after.

5301. Then we should find a proportionate increase in the old people ?—Yes ; it is the able-bodied population that have disappeared.

Conditions in Cardiganshire Unions.

5302. Passing to Cardiganshire, Cardigan itself is a marked instance of reduction ; there has been a very great fall in its population and a fall in the percentage of pauperism from nearly 6 per cent. to a little over 3 per cent. Can you account for that ; is it due to improved administration ?—The circumstances of the unions are entirely the same, and if you knew how much I have urged them to improve their administration you might find some reason for it. I have been a great number of years at them.

5303. Where an improvement has occurred we want to know what are the causes, in order to see how those causes have been brought about ?—I think the guardians have been brought to understand that the stricter they are with the undeserving, the more freely they should give to the deserving. I think they look at it pretty well in that way. They are getting stricter in these Cardiganshire unions, though Aberystwith is not nearly so strict as it used to be.

5304. In Aberystwith also the population is falling ?—Yes. The lead works have been shut down, but they used to employ between 4,000 and 5,000 people. Then the agricultural people are going off. Otherwise, Aberystwith itself has largely increased.

Conditions in Carmarthenshire Unions.

5305. Then with regard to Carmarthen, there has been an extraordinarily great improvement in the degree of pauperism there, has there not ?—Yes.

5306. Have you anything at all to say about that ?—Nothing can be done, but ding-dong preaching at them and getting them to see things from a better point of view. All these unions have done great credit to the Board, I consider. Of course they are very poor.

5307. Carmarthen and Llandilo Fawr in the same way, would you say ?—Llandilo Fawr has a great deal of tin plate industries now, and I should say its population has increased considerably.

5308. Then Llanelly has an increased population, and all of these Carmarthenshire unions appear to be extremely satisfactory, so far as the figures before us go ?—Yes ; I am not otherwise than very pleased with them.

Conditions in Glamorganshire Unions.

5309. What I said about Cardiff applies to Glamorganshire, namely, that the rate of pauperism seems to be rather moderate, except at Neath ?—But it is going up every week.

5310. What is the matter with Neath ?—I do not know. I wish you would come and cure it.

5311. The population has increased enormously ; is that due to coal ?—Coal, tin plates, iron, copper—in fact they are in a very thriving condition now.

5312. Neath is a port too, is it not ?—It is a kind of port. It is about the worst port along that coast. Port Talbot is a better port.

5313. Is that one of the large Boards of Guardians ?—No. Bridgend, Cardiff, Newport, Pontypridd and Swansea are the largest boards.

5314 And not so much Neath ?—No, not so much Neath.

5315. So that a very large Board of Guardians in that instance does not cause the mischief, because Pontypridd on the contrary has a remarkably low rate of pauperism ?—It is galloping in prosperity. Pontypridd is almost the largest union I have in Wales and it ought to have the least pauperism—it ought to be much less than Cardiff.

5316. There the population has doubled in twenty years ?—Yes, and the latest figures you have are not nearly what it is now. The 204,000 is more like 220,000 now I think.

5317. I have it as 235,998 up to 1905, but that of course is an estimate ?—You have estimated it very correctly, I should think.

Conditions in Pembrokeshire Unions.

5318. With regard to Pembrokeshire, there seems to be a very depressed condition there, but it is improving ?—I want another union there.

5319. Haverfordwest seems to have improved, but it was very bad ?—It has greatly improved. Look what a place it was ten years ago—nearly five per cent. I consider that Wales during the last ten or twenty years has shown a very marked improvement.

onditions in hayader nion.

5320. The most remarkable instance comes at the end of South Wales, in Radnorshire, at the place called Rhayader?—There are statistics that you must avoid, and that is an instance. Rhayader includes the Birmingham water works, and in 1891 there were over 3,000 Birmingham people working there. Now, they are all gone, except 800, and they will go soon. Where will Rhayader be then? I have had to put Rhayader upon the top of my list as being the least pauperised. When the waterworks were started Birmingham said to them, "Now please make us vagrant wards, make us a hospital, make us an infectious place and provide all you must do, together with a workhouse to put our people in." I told the Rhayader Guardians that they had displayed a masterly inactivity under my regime for many years, and if they would continue that same system, the Birmingham people would soon get sick of it and would do it all for themselves—which they did. They subsequently built receiving wards, vagrant wards, and a small-pox hospital, &c., and the Rhayader people have had nothing to do with it. Presently the Birmingham people will go, and will take away their rateable value with them except the waterworks, which will not be much, and you will see Rhayader topple down the list to nearly the bottom.

ffect on atistics of mporary flux of pulation to a union.

5321. I suppose the people are still there?—The 3,000 Birmingham workers have left with the exception of about 700 or 800.

5322. On January 1, 1905, I estimated the population as though it were continuing to increase at 11,000, and of course not allowing for that reduction of 3,500. Now, I will pass to North Wales. One of the most remarkable instances in this list is Holyhead, which had 7 per cent. of pauperism in 1885, 4·9 per cent. in 1895, and 3·3 per cent. in 1905. What is that great improvement due to?—As I have often told the Holyhead people, "it is less due to you than to the iniquities of your forbears." There was so much leeway to be made up that they could have done as much again. The relief was most excessive, and even now it is too high.

5323. Do you expect this improvement to go on?—I say this decrease ought to go on at the same rate for another ten years; but it will not, I am afraid.

nditions in rnarvon ire Unions.

5324. There is something the same to be said about Carnarvonshire, is there not? The rate of pauperism there was very high?—Yes; compared with what they were ten years ago it shows a very satisfactory decrease. They are still at the bottom of my ladder, although they have made such a reduction.

5325. Altogether, you treat these changes as due to rather general causes, the pressure you have put on them being one of those general causes?—I will not say the pressure that I have put upon them. The guardians have advanced in their intelligence and in the improvement of their administration.

5326. And South Wales has, on the whole, in spite of strikes and so on, enjoyed very considerable prosperity?—Yes.

5327. (The O'Conor Don.) Do you think that the constitution of boards of guardians has improved under the new system as compared with the old?—I must say of the big towns in South Wales that I have no reason to suppose that they are not just as good, if not better. I think they take more trouble to put themselves into communication with the poor that they have to deal with than they used to do.

5328. Does that apply to the whole country?—The typical Welsh part of the country, as I said, is pretty nearly the same as it was, minus the ex officio element. I am very sorry to lose the ex officio element but it was bound to go, and it has gone, and we have done better without it than I expected. These gentlemen who never spoke a word before have found their tongues and they are ready to speak in their Welsh, and they do. But then they pay their own rates, and they feel that out of every half-crown that old Mrs. Evans gets they are paying 1s. 5d., and they are very careful.

5329. On the whole, you think there is an improvement?—Yes, I do. I am not able to say it is an improvement everywhere; certainly there are still a good many of the guardians who take no interest except in their own parish, and who leave, as they did before, all the work to be done by a few working members.

Mr. Francis Thomas Bircham.

6 Mar. 1906.

5330. You have no reason to suppose, have you, that any of these boards are open to the taint of corruption?—No, not beyond very small things. As I told you this morning, the practice of old Mrs. Jones bringing Mrs. Robinson's relief and getting a penny for it is a great Poor Law crime, but after all I think Wales will still go on.

Absence of corruption in Poor Law administration.

5331. There is no corruption in the disposal of their patronage in any way?—No, I think that is fairly satisfactory. I think the Poor Law is very good. It is not the Poor Law that wants altering. It is the other laws that manufacture the article that they give us expecting us to turn them into angels and this, that, and the other. I think we do very fairly well with the stuff we get given us to deal with.

5332. With regard to out-door relief, is that given uniformly in money or partly in kind and partly in money?—Not at all in kind now, except to undeserving cases or cases where the money would be misapplied.

Comparison of relief in money and in kind.

5333. With these exceptions it is all given in money then?—Yes. I think the last union that gave bread and money was Chepstow, but now they give all money.

5334. Which method do you think is the best?—Money in Wales—it must be; money goes farther. Besides, it would cost a fortune to take bread to half-a-dozen people in some of the unions in Wales. It would take all day to get there. Then they often bake their own bread. What is the use of giving a fellow a great 4-lb. loaf when he bakes his own bread? The habits are so different.

5335. (Mr. Lansbury.) What do the guardians generally do with the children in Wales?—With the exception of two workhouses, there are hardly any children in the workhouses at all. They give them out-relief within the union—generally with relatives at a small price, because they consider it is the relatives' duty to do the rest. The populous unions have cottage homes and different ways of treating the children away from the workhouse.

Methods of relief to Welsh Poor Law children.

5336. Have the Welsh guardians adopted the ideas contained in the circulars of the Local Government Board which were issued in 1899 and 1900, and do they take care of the old people outside the workhouse rather than inside?—They always did that. They did not want Mr. Chaplin for that; they did that before his circular. But since that circular, they have increased the relief to individuals to a higher scale than they used to adopt.

Effect of Mr. Chaplin's circular of 1900.

5337. Do you think that has worked any mischief morally? I mean, has it hurt the moral fibre of the Welsh people at all?—I am not going to be responsible for the moral fibre of the Welsh people; that is like the Nonconformist conscience. I think the Welsh are like many other people; they take all they can get.

5338. I will put it in another way, if you do not mind: Do you think giving relief to aged people in that sort of way has done any mischief in Wales?—They always did it; they never drove them into the workhouses.

5339. They have done it for a long time; I suppose that is what you really mean?—Always; I do not suppose there ever was a time when any person who was at all what you would call decent was given other than out-relief.

5340. What I want to get from you, if you do not mind, is whether you think that that has done any mischief in Wales; that is to say, whether it has prevented people doing the best they could for themselves?—I think you know that Wales has always been a country where they have very little shame in asking for outdoor relief. Some people will consider there is as much shame in getting outdoor relief as there is in getting indoor relief. There is great discredit in being an indoor pauper in Wales, but there is none in getting outdoor relief; so I do not think any circular or any change in treatment has had any effect in Wales of recent years. Wales has gone on the tradition of past years, and that has been to give outdoor relief to poor people, rather than to build great palaces and barracks to stuff them in against their will. That they never will do. Of course, a large amount of out-relief always must have a tendency to destroy people's sense of independence, but I do not think that any recent circulars or change of administration in my time has had any deleterious effect with regard to the poor outside or to the people who administer the Poor Law.

"Labour" men as Guardians.

5341. It is a fact that you have got labour people on the boards of guardians?—Yes, and I like to see them. They know more about the people.

5342. It has worked for good and not for evil, having them there?—I think so, but I do not want them all to be labour people.

Scope and constitution of Miners' Provident Society.

5343. No, you want a mixture. Then about the Miners' Provident Society; would not the people who belong to that have to leave the Trade Union?—No. I understand that any person belonging to the Federation may subscribe to that.

5344. Is not the object of that society to get compensation for accidents in another way than under the Act?—Yes. But the Miners' Provident Society does not turn the men out of the pits under it when they get a certain age and a little infirm; and then the men have got something to go back upon. The men are kept in the pits very often, and even, as I said this morning, they get a pension of 5s. a week as old members of the society. They get better terms under that fund than they will do under the bare Act of Parliament, when both employers and employed simply go by what the Act of Parliament tells them.

5345. But that would not apply to an accident, would it?—Yes, it applies only to accidents; neither of them relieve in cases of sickness.

5346. But the members do in old age get a pension?—In the Miners' Provident Society they do. Since the men joined the Federation its membership has gone down from 79,000 to 17,000, and so I am afraid it cannot last.

5347. Is that because the Miners' Provident Society is really run by the people who are known in Wales as the opponents of Trade Unionism?—I do not think so. They know who they are, of course. The Miners' Provident Society was got up by the same people, men and masters, who got up the Sliding Scale, and therefore it so far may be connected; but I could not give evidence about that.

Interaction of rents and rates.

5348. In paragraph 46 of your statement, you say "every endeavour should be made, if possible, to secure that the ratepayers who elect guardians and the guardians whom they elect should pay their portion of the rates they are spending?"—Yes. I want them to feel the difference between a rate being 2s. or 4s. or 6s. or 7s. Now they do not, because they compound for their rates.

5349. I suppose you are aware that in some of the lightest-rated districts rents are highest?—I know what rent they pay—4s. 6d.—and they have done it for years for half a house, that is to say, for half a double house which is built for two families. There are hundreds and thousands of them all through the Rhondda Valley, and good houses too. They do not pay any more or less, whether the rates are twice as much or not.

5350. That is exactly what I wanted to suggest to you. —that it is not that which settles the question of rent at all; it is the number of people who live in the houses, is it not?—Yes; because they get lodgers and so on.

5351. The rent that is paid for the house by the person taking it depends upon the number of people who want that particular house, does it not?—No; the rents are all the same.

5352. How is it that in the districts that are lightly rated, the rents are high?—Where do you say that is the the case? Not in Glamorganshire.?

5353. I should say it of any urban district?—That may be so in regard to towns; but they are not towns here. I wish you could come down to Wales and see the kind of district you are talking about. They are aggregations of dwellings round a pit, and they are not towns in the sense in which you speak of towns here. Those houses are built by the colliery proprietors, and they are let at the same rent that they always have been let at—just enough to pay 4 per cent. or something to include repairs, and the owners do not make any profits at all out of them.

Compounding for rates at Cardiff.

5354. Is that true of Cardiff?—Not of Cardiff. A man paying £50 a year for rent compounds for his rates there; you would not believe it, but he does. Therefore the alteration I propose would not affect a man like that.

5355. (Professor Smart.) Do you mean that they do not compound in the country districts?—They do not in the purely country districts.

5356. (Miss Hill.) I suppose the mine owners pay the rates in the case of the houses that you have just been speaking of?—Yes. That saves a lot of trouble, of course, but it does not make the people who vote feel whether they are paying a big rate or a small one.

12 Mar. 1906.

5357. (Chairman.) I understand you are now general inspector under the Local Government Board of the poor law district comprising the county of Gloucester and parts of Hereford, Somerset, Stafford, Wiltshire, and Worcester?—Yes.

5358. Have long have you been in charge of your present district?—It will be ten years next November.

tandard of orkhouses Glouces- ershire and lereford- hire.

5359. You have sent in to the Commission a comprehensive memorandum concerning your district, and I only propose to review those particular parts of it which seem to require a further investigation (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XI. (A-B)). I will run very rapidly over the earlier part of your memorandum. As regards Gloucestershire, I think there is nothing very noticeable there, except that the workhouses are, in your judgment, hardly up to modern conditions?—That is so.

5360. And in Herefordshire the same criticism applies, I understand?—Yes. I might say with regard to their not being up-to-date, that that chiefly has reference to the infirmary accommodation. Most of the workhouses were built for the accommodation of able-bodied paupers, and when they were built there was little regard had for the sick; but now the condition of things has entirely changed, and the able-bodied pauper does not appear in the workhouses to any great extent, whereas the sick and infirm have very considerably increased. When the workhouses were built, there were no proper infirmaries built at the same time; that is the difficulty.

5361. Are the existing workhouses not capable of adaptation to modern requirements?—Some might be, but others would not; in any case, it would involve considerable expense.

istory of fficulty as workhouse commoda- on at ristol.

5362. I will take, as an illustration of what you say, the town of Bristol: You have had there considerable communications with the guardians as regards the indoor accommodation for the poor, I understand?—Yes, that is so.

5363. Your functions as inspector, as the law now stands, are mainly limited to giving advice, are they not?—Yes.

5364. In a case like Bristol, where, in your judgment, as as I understand, the workhouse is not up-to-date or to standard, you have no power of overcoming the objections or the obstruction of those who are opposed to providing better accommodation, have you?—That is so. Perhaps it would be just as well if I were to explain the circumstances at Bristol to the Commission. Briefly, the position stands thus: In 1898 the Bristol Corporation Bill for extending the city boundaries was carried; that altered the boundaries of Bristol very largely. Up to that date, the union consisted of what was then known as the Incorporation of the Poor, which was the oldest form of workhouse and board of guardians in the whole kingdom at that time. There were two surrounding unions, one, Barton Regis, which was a very large one, and the other, Bedminster, which was also a large one. Prior to the passing of the Bristol Corporation Bill of 1898, nothing had been done practically to the workhouses of these unions for something like fourteen or fifteen years in anticipation of some extension of the boundaries and of a readjustment of the unions. The consequence was that when this Bill passed Parliament, nothing had been done practically to the Bristol workhouse, known as the Stapleton workhouse, and the Barton Regis workhouse, except in a temporary way, for a great many years. The Bill passed, and the Bristol Board of Guardians was then formed, and took over the greater part of the Barton Regis union, their large workhouse included. As I have said, the Barton Regis Guardians had done nothing to the workhouse for a great number of years, and the Local Government Board had sanctioned temporary accommodation by means of corrugated iron pavilions for the sick and also wooden pavilions, which were likewise being used for the sick and infirm. These had been put up pending this alteration of the union areas. When the present union was formed in 1898, the Bristol Guardians very wisely sent round a committee to visit other large unions in England and to see what they had done. As the result of the investigation they recommended the building of a large infirmary to take the sick, and, if they could arrange it, the selling of what was then the old Barton Regis workhouse, now known at Eastville. They spent a large sum of money in plans, and the plans were approved by the Board. Then some elections of guardians took place, and it was found that the Bristol rates were going up from one cause and another. Then it was said that this new infirmary was too expensive. The consequence is that ever since then up to the present time, the guardians have been trying to find out some other scheme. Other schemes have been sent up to the Local Government Board, and the Local Government Board has been unable to sanction them. Where the difficulty comes in is this—though the Local Government Board has power to say, We cannot sanction this scheme or that scheme, they have no power to say, You must carry out some scheme. This is very often extremely irritating to guardians. The position at Bristol at the present moment is that there is absolutely a deadlock. There are two schemes before them—one is the original infirmary scheme, the other is a scheme to adapt the Eastville Workhouse for an infirmary. They are about equally divided, and the position is entirely controlled by those guardians who say, We will do nothing at all; and the Board has no power to come in to say, You must do something definitely. They have only power to say, We refuse this or that. The spread of Bristol has been unprecedented, and in 1903 another Bristol Extension Bill was passed by Parliament, and the union has been further extended in consequence, and Bristol has taken over the new Barton Regis workhouse, which is modern.

Workhouse accommodation in Somersetshire and Staffordshire.

5365. Passing on with your memorandum, similar conditions seem to prevail a good deal in the other counties, for instance, in both Somersetshire and Staffordshire, namely, that the workhouses which were built under different conditions are not quite up-to-date for their present work?—In Somersetshire the unions are Bath, Long Ashton (which was the original Bedminster) and Keynsham. In Bath they have done their best to improve the workhouse, and they have improved it. So far as Long Ashton is concerned, they have a large workhouse that was suitable for the larger union before the half of it was taken into Bristol, but it is a very old building and far too large for the guardians now. The guardians at the time were advised to get rid of that workhouse, and to build a smaller one, but they did not take the advice, and, therefore, are in their present difficulty. I wish to make it clear that so far as the infirmary accommodation at Long Ashton is concerned, that is the best part of the workhouse, and I do not complain of that in any way.

Wolverhampton:—Excessive out-relief a result of inadequate Workhouse accommodation.

5366. Now I come to paragraph 31; a new workhouse has been opened at Wolverhampton, you say?—Yes.

5367. But until that was opened, I gather that the accommodation at the old workhouse was such that it was impossible for the guardians to apply the workhouse test as rigorously as they should have done?—Yes.

5368. The result was that out-relief assumed high proportions?—It did.

5369. But you think that the establishment of this workhouse will result in a reduction of the out-relief?—Yes; it is going down. There is a reduction now as compared with last year. I can give you the exact figures, if you think proper to have them.

5370. I think they would be interesting?—Taking the expenditure in out-door relief according to the last return which I have received, which is for the ninth week of the Lady Day quarter, I find that it then amounted to £282 2s. 3d., and in the corresponding week of last year it was £319 0s. 9d.; therefore, there is a saving there of £37 per week, roundly.

5371. Now I pass on to paragraph 42, which relates to Kidderminster. There are a considerable number of children in the workhouse there, I see; and looking further on, to paragraph 57, I see there are also a considerable number of children in the workhouse at Swindon?—That is so.

Advantages of removing children from workhouse.

5372. Do I rightly gather that you condemn that system?—I do not know whether "condemn" is the right term to use. The children are much better out of the workhouse. The alteration in the children that have been removed from the workhouse is generally most striking. I should like to lay emphasis upon that. Bristol is a case in point. When I first took over the district, the whole of the children, some 500 in number, were treated in the workhouse, and I was very much struck on first going there with the listlessness of the children and their want of power; they did not seem to care to play or to do anything of that sort like other children. I was struck with the dulness of the children generally. It was not that the children were not properly looked after; they were very well fed and very kindly treated, but there was this dulness and listlessness about them which was most marked. Now that has entirely disappeared; they are now in scattered homes and cottage homes, and it is quite a pleasure to see the children. When the Bristol Guardians first proposed to take scattered homes for the children, there was considerable reluctance in Bristol to let houses for that purpose. The people said they were not going to let houses for what they called poor law children. Then the schools were not particularly anxious—I will put it in that way—to take the children. Now opinion has entirely changed. There is no difficulty in getting houses there, and the local schools are only too glad to get the children, who are well behaved and who attend regularly. Many of the children attend Bands of Hope as far as can be, here and there, and some of the children sing in the choirs both of the churches and of the chapels in Bristol, which is very satisfactory. This is proceeding in the other unions in the same degree, where the children are away from the workhouse. Where they remain in the workhouse but go to the local schools, there is also a change in the children for the better, which will assist them better to face the struggle for life afterwards.

Bristol.

Tendency to remove children from workhouse.

5373. Therefore, I take it, the practice of keeping children in the workhouse is steadily diminishing in your district?—It is not rapidly diminishing, but it is diminishing. Generally speaking, where more workhouse accommodation has to be found, the children's quarters are adapted for that purpose, if it possibly can be so, and the children are taken out.

5374. Do you think the guardians generally recognise the advantage of removing the children away from the workhouse?—I think the guardians generally recognise that fact, but some guardians do not like the cost of it. I think that is the way they look at it.

Able-bodied paupers in district.

5375. Now I come to a very interesting statement which you make at paragraph 63, as regards the number of able-bodied paupers in the various workhouses in your district?—I obtained a special report with regard to the number of able-bodied men in the workhouses, because there seemed to be an impression abroad that there were a considerable number, and that workhouses were the resort of able-bodied paupers. I think that the misunderstanding perhaps partly arose owing to the form of the Local Government Return which is called Form A, which I have here before me. In the form you will see that the adults are reported upon as Men in Health and Temporarily Disabled. Those men under 60 years of age who are in health are generally supposed to be the able-bodied but it does not always naturally follow that they are able-bodied, because they may have lost a leg or they may have lost an arm, or something of that sort. A good deal depends upon the interpretation which the Master puts upon the term "health" in regard to a particular man or woman. Generally speaking, I think it may be taken that the rule is that if the pauper is not actually under the care of the doctor, he is returned as able-bodied; but of course there are a good many who are not strictly able-bodied who are not under the care of the doctor. I think that is where a good deal of misunderstanding with regard to the number of able-bodied men and women in the workhouse has arisen.

Meaning of term "able bodied."

Paucity of really able-bodied paupers.

5376. I see that your examination brought down to very small proportions the number which you thought could be accurately described as able-bodied?—Yes. The proportions are given in my memorandum. The return shows that there were in fact 6,079 male inmates, and only 216 of them were able-bodied as defined in the previous paragraph, namely, male inmates "who were mentally and physically able to earn their living out of the workhouse."

5377. Then there is a further deduction that you make, is there not?—Yes. Of those 216, fifty-four were in the Wolverhampton workhouse, twenty-five at Bristol, twenty-two at Bath, and twenty-one at Worcester. It thus appears that 112 out of the 216 were confined to four workhouses. In thirteen workhouses in my district there were no able-bodied men at all.

5378. Then, when you examined, as you apparently did, according to paragraphs 65 and 66, the proportion of able-bodied that were in the Wolverhampton and Bath workhouses, a very considerable further deduction had to be made?—Yes. In paragraph 65 I say, "When I inspected the Wolverhampton workhouse in November last, there were thirty-one able-bodied men included among the inmates. Of these fourteen were described as regular ins-and-outs. The average age of the thirty-one was forty-four years, and ranged between twenty-six and fifty-nine. As to occupation, nineteen were labourers, and the others various. There were twenty-five single men among the number, two were widowers with children, the others were married." Going on to the Bath workhouse, I say, "Of the twenty-two able-bodied men reported at Bath, five were married, sixteen single, and one widower. As to character, nineteen out of the twenty-two were stated to be either undesirables or confirmed drunkards, three were deserving cases but intellectually weak." My object is to show that, even taking the few able-bodied men that you find in workhouses they are not usually what you would call the most desirables. I do not mean to say but what exceptions do occur sometimes, and you do find a deserving case come into the workhouse from no fault of his own in any way or form. But I would say this for the masters of workhouses, that if a man does come into the workhouse who really is deserving of sympathy and is there through no fault of his own, they generally do their best to find that man some occupation. It is quite a mistake to suppose that respectable men are forced into the workhouse by guardians. In my district the guardians do not force a case into the workhouse if that case can be properly looked after outside and is deserving; but of course there are many cases of people who cannot be looked after outside, such as the old and infirm without friends. The men who go to the workhouse are the less deserving. Though there are so many men in the Wolverhampton workhouse, I do not think there are so many as there were in the old place. I remember going to this workhouse shortly after it was opened, and having numerous complaints from the able-bodied inmates as to the amount of work that they had to do there; and when I inquired, I think I may say that many of the more capable inmates preferred the old place. I can describe what the old place was like by quoting the words of the Member for Wolverhampton—I cannot, perhaps, quote his exact words, but they were to the effect that the old Wolverhampton workhouse was as bad as a Siberian prison. You can form an opinion of what it is like by that. I say definitely that many of the able-bodied men and women rather than go into the new place (where the regulations were better carried out, and where there were more provisions for working), would have preferred the old place to the new one.

5379. Out of the twenty-two reported to be able-bodied men at Bath according to your return, there was not a single one who could be recommended to an employer as either a capable or a reliable workman?—Three were deserving cases, but they were weak intellectually and they were not men whom a man would employ if he could employ anyone else. I do not say it was their own fault; of course if they were intellectually weak it was an infirmity, and they were deserving as far as that goes. They were respectable men in a way.

Number of bastard children born in workhouse.

5380. Now we will pass on to the question of illegitimate children. There seem to have been 411 illegitimate children born during last year in the forty-three workhouses in your district; and in paragraph 71 you say that the mothers of these children seemed to be below the average in intelligence, and many of them bordered on imbecility. Would that remark about the mothers of last year apply to other years?—Yes, certainly; it applies at the present time.

5381. Should you say that these girls got into this trouble from a lack of intelligence?—Yes, to a very great extent, and chiefly, I would add, to that lack of mental intelligence "and their surroundings": the two things go together. A person with greater intellectual capacity would have resisted probably.

Power to detain in workhouse unmarried mothers.

5382. Have you any suggestions to make as to how you would deal with this particular class of girl; would you suggest, for instance, that there should be greater powers of detaining them?—There is a strong opinion among guardians that they should have power to retain some of these girls for a longer period; and I am disposed to agree. You have not only to consider the girl herself, but you have to consider the infant as well. The tendency of these girls very often is to go out of the house as quickly as they possibly can, and what becomes of the child afterwards is very problematical indeed. I had a case in one of the workhouses where the matron said, "Here is a young woman with an illegitimate child; she has been here before, and the previous child died under rather suspicious circumstances—and she wants to take this child out." I said to the woman, "You ought not to take that child out; there is the child to be considered, and the child is not fit to go out." She made reply to me, "If it pleases the Lord to take the child, I cannot help it." No doubt she was going to take the child out, and it was impossible to say what would become of it.

5383. Are you able to ascertain if these women have more than one illegitimate child?—Certainly, some of them do. I think I should be within bounds when say that if they once come in with an illegitimate child, they very often return with another one later on.

5384. The tendency would be, if they got into trouble again, to return to the workhouse?—Yes.

5385. I suppose it is over those cases that the guardians would like to have some powers in addition to what they now possess?—Yes.

Question of attractiveness of Medical Relief.

5386. You give us some interesting statistics as regards the number of sick and the nurses, and in paragraph 80 you consider the question whether improved nursing attracts people and adds to the burden of pauperism. Do you look at it from the point of view of whether it increases the actual expenditure, or from the point of view of whether it tends to encourage people to become paupers?—It does both. It undoubtedly adds to the expenditure, and it must do so. The question I wanted to bring out in paragraph 80 is the question whether a better infirmary administration does have the effect of inducing people to go into the workhouse. That is a point I have tried to get definite evidence upon, and I am bound to say that generally I do not think it does actually attract. People are much better cared for, and sometimes when they get to the workhouse they may not be so keen to go out; but generally speaking, they like to get out as soon as they possibly can. I did find the mother of one of the guardians in one workhouse—a person who was paid for, and who ought not to have been there at all—but that was quite an exception.

5387. I gather that the result of your experience is that the improved quality of the nursing has not been detrimental by specially encouraging people to have recourse to infirmaries and thus adding to the general expenditure?—I have no evidence of it. I have tried to get evidence on the matter, and I cannot find anything to confirm any such idea. No doubt there is a tendency on the part of public hospitals to send cases into the workhouse infirmaries which they did not send years ago; and I believe that is mainly due to the fact that the public hospitals generally are rather crowded, and perhaps many of these cases are not sufficiently interesting cases.

Effect on Pauperism of Employers' Liability and Workmen's Compensation Acts.

5388. Now we come to a very important matter dealt with in paragraph 81, that is, the number of fairly capable men over sixty years of age who are classed as "old and infirm." I understand from your memorandum that certain of these paupers allege that the Employers' Liability Act has acted detrimentally to them; is that impression general, do you think?—It is, more especially in Staffordshire.

5389. I suppose you have no figures or statistics by which you can test that assertion either one way or the other?—No. I have tried in every way I possibly can to get those statistics, but I do not see how I can possibly get them. I have no power as an inspector to ask for those statistics to be returned, and it would be extremely difficult to get them otherwise. A return could be obtained of the number of men in any particular workhouse who allege that they are there because of the Employers' Liability Acts; but every case would have to be tested and gone into. When these men have made these assertions to me, I have generally questioned them about it, and I am bound to say that in the majority of cases the men I have come across cannot be regarded as altogether satisfactory workmen. If a man over fifty years of age in South Staffordshire happens to have lost a situation by reason of incompetency or drink, or anything of that sort, it is exceedingly difficult for that man to get employed again; but I believe myself that employers of labour, if they have in their employ a man over fifty years of age who is an industrious, respectable and capable man, do keep that man on as long as they possibly can. The largest carpet manufacturer at Kidderminster, who is the Chairman of the board of guardians, speaking to me about this very matter, said, "In our trade of carpet-making, so much is done by machinery that we prefer an elderly man, if he is a respectable and sober man, rather than a young man, simply because he has had more experience of machinery than a younger man would have." Therefore I am disposed to think that these men make the most of it, when they say they are thrown out of employment because of the Employers' Liability Acts. If you come to investigate their general character, you will find, that, taken as a rule—there are exceptions no doubt—they are not the most desirable class of workmen.

5390. What is your experience as regards the impression of the people themselves ? I understand that in Staffordshire this idea is prevalent in the workhouses ?—Yes, very much so ; and you will find it also at the Relief Committees. I have had interviews with relieving officers with especial reference to this matter, and the relieving officers confirm it.

5391. It is their impression too ?—Yes, very strongly. You will find the same thing at West Bromwich, but perhaps less than at Wolverhampton. You will find it generally in South Staffordshire.

5392. Have you heard of anybody who has made an investigation from which they can produce any statistics on the subject ?—Not at the present time ; but that might be done by taking a particular workhouse and requesting the relieving officers to investigate the cases. It is quite impossible for me going round to the workhouses there and then to select John Smith as an instance ; I must go and make inquiries from his employer as to his statements and as to his circumstances generally.

Proportion of paupers in West Bromwich workhouse who would benefit by old-age pension.

5393. Now we come to paragraphs 87 and 88, in which you deal with the character and condition of the persons over sixty-five years of age who are in the workhouse. In paragraph 88 you say that a Committee of Investigation appointed to make inquiries with respect to the inmates of the West Bromwich workhouse arrived at the conclusion that out of 325 persons over sixty-five years of age, who were inmates of the workhouse, 203 were unable to take care of themselves and were also either mentally or physically infirm ; so that there would be only a margin of 122 left to deal with ?—There were no cases, I believe, found in that workhouse who could be relieved outside the workhouse on a pension of 5s. or 7s. per week.

5394. Then I see there was a further analysis of the 122, and the conclusion was that there was not one case which could be made the subject of out-relief ?—That is so. I selected this workhouse myself because—and it is only due to the guardians to say it—it is an exceedingly well-administered workhouse, and these statistics may be absolutely relied upon, I believe.

5395. Would there be anything very special in this workhouse as compared with other workhouses, or would your experience make you think that much the same sort of conclusion would be arrived at in other workhouses ?—You would come to much the same sort of conclusion elsewhere, I think.

5396. That particular form of investigation has not been adopted as far as you know by any other committee, I understand?—There was at Cirencester, but I have not got the figures. I think I can answer the question definitely in this way: this may be taken as fairly typical of workhouses generally, that is to say, the guardians do not force a deserving case into the workhouse if they can possibly avoid it. That applies to the whole of my district. I always advise guardians, where they do give out-relief in deserving cases, that they should only give it after very careful investigation, and when it is given, that relief should be adequate.

General increase of pauperism in district.

5397. Going on to paragraph 89, which refers to the general trend of Poor Law administration and methods, there has, I believe, been a considerable increase in pauperism during the last five years in your district ?—Yes. It is a very large district, but considering the depression of trade, I do not think the increase is anything very considerable.

Pauperism in Walsall.

5398. I understand that that increase, or at any rate a very large proportion of it, was in the union of Walsall ? —That is so ; and chiefly in the out-door relief.

5399. Walsall got exceptional employment during the South African War, which on the close of the war fell off, did it not ?—Yes.

5400. It is a town which always contains a considerable amount of pauperism, I understand ?—Yes, the rate of pauperism is high there as compared with other districts ; there is no doubt about that. The guardians in the past have given too much out-relief there altogether, and they have not had a sufficient number of relieving officers to investigate the cases.

5401. And that, with the conditions which exist in Walsall, combined to cause this large increase of 2491 ?—Yes. That figure is arrived at by comparing the figures for the last week ending December, 1905, with those for the corresponding week of 1900.

5402. That is an increase of over 2,400 out of a total increase for the other Staffordshire unions of only 2,790?—Yes.

Effect of Mr. Chaplin's Circular on out-relief.

5403. In your judgment did the circular issued by the Local Government Board in 1900 increase the cost of out-relief ?—It undoubtedly did.

5404. It increased it by augmenting the amount that was given to individual cases, but did it actually increase, in your judgment, the number of recipients ?—It is very difficult to say whether it did so or not. Of course the more out-relief that is given the more temptation there is to people to apply for it.

Out-relief to aged and "deserving" at Bath.

5405. The more temptation to individuals you mean ?—Yes. There is a very good instance in the case of Bath, which shows the effect of that circular. The guardians decided after that circular was issued that more out-door relief should be afforded to people over sixty-five years of age ; and the clerk to the guardians prepared a special report, in which he said that the effect has been that this out-relief has not only been given to the aged and deserving but to others as well, They have lost sight of the word "deserving," and he says, "The danger appears to be lest the term 'deserving' should be overlooked and this 'more adequate' relief be given to other cases."

Number of Friendly Society members in workhouses.

5406. Now coming to the question of thrift, in paragraph 115 you examine the statement that there were inmates of workhouses who had belonged to friendly societies. The result of your examination is to show that the so-called benefit societies were in nearly every case merely public-house clubs, I think ?—Yes ; that was so.

5407. Did you come across anybody in receipt of relief who belonged to a benefit society ?—Yes ; if you mean who belonged to the Oddfellows, or the Sons of Temperance or the Foresters. There are a few you find occasionally, but the majority of those are men who ceased to subscribe some time back.

Reluctance of relatives to maintain paupers.

5408. You seem to think that there is rather an increased tendency on the part of relatives to shirk their responsibilities ?—There is no doubt about that at all.

5409. Have you noticed that during the ten years that you have been in the district ?—Yes, and I think I am right in saying it is a growing tendency amongst a certain class. The thriftless class, if they can possibly put the cost of looking after their parents or other relatives on to the poor law, do not hesitate to do it. In days gone by, there used to be a certain amount of reluctance on the part of people to become paupers at all, even to receive outdoor relief ; but with a certain class of people at the present time, if the occupiers of No. 1 in a street get out-relief, neighbours think they ought to have it as well, and they deem themselves fortunate if they do.

5410. In the next paragraph (116) you call attention to the increase in the number of aged poor, and, as I gather, you attribute that to some extent to this diminishing sense of responsibility ?—To some extent certainly, But I would also say this—that we have just passed through a period of bad and dull trade, and naturally when that is so a man who has a family to support is not able perhaps to contribute towards the support of his other relatives to the extent that he might wish. That, no doubt would account for it in some degree.

Number of teetotalers in workhouses.

5411. As regards pauperism itself, you produce some strong evidence to show how largely intemperance contributes to it ?—That appears when you investigate the cases of the people in the workhouse. Of course it does not do to put too inquisitorial questions to them, and one does not like to do that ; but if you go into the matter it is astonishing and sad to find the number of cases in which drink has been a very material factor in reducing them to the position in which they are. That not only applies to those in the body of the workhouse, but it also applies to those in the infirmaries and sick wards as well. Up to quite recently I had found only one total abstainer in the workhouse in my district, and that man had been a total abstainer for only seven years before he came into the workhouse. I say "up to quite recently," because when I was at the Stourbridge workhouse, about three months ago, certain cases were reported to me as being total abstainers. I have had a further report since on those, but before I can say anything definite about that, I would like to have a little further investigation. One of them, a man, said he was a teetotaler. I enquired, "How long have you been a teetotaler?" He did not quite know. I asked, "When did you have your last glass?" He replied, "I went out with the pigs a fortnight ago, and I had a glass then." So he had been a teetotaler for a rather limited period. I only mention that to show that one has to be very careful in investigating the statements of these people. Though I have had these people reported to me as being total abstainers, I would like to investigate their cases more definitely before making any statements about them. But I am quite safe in saying that you very seldom find in the workhouse a total abstainer who has been so for a length of time. The same thing applies to the persons who are relieved outside. Of course some teetotalers are like other people, and are brought to want from various causes, still you very seldom find a person who has been a teetotaler for a length of time even applying for outside relief.

5412. Have you any reason to think that these two workhouses, which give some very unpleasant figures as regards the proportion of persons who owe their downfall to drink, are exceptional workhouses?—No. I selected those workhouses because they are both of them well-administered workhouses and have very good masters and matrons. I thought they would be fairly typical workhouses, and the information, I am sure, is reliable.

5413. The master of the West Bromwich workhouse stated apparently that out of 416 inmates 205 could not be allowed out for a day's leave "without fear of their returning the worse for drink"?—Yes, that is so.

Control of intemperate paupers.

5414. Here again you think there should be an increased power given either to the guardians or to the Local Government Board to deal with these habitual hard-drinkers?—Yes, I do, because they simply make a convenience of the workhouse. They go into the workhouse and then they take their discharge; of course they can be detained longer now than they could be a few years ago, but some of them give notice to go out again directly they come back—that is perhaps not generally the case, but still it is done in some cases. I shall be within bounds when I say that this class of pauper simply makes the workhouse a convenience, and the effect upon other paupers is not a desirable one. I wish to add this: I am not an advocate for multiplying establishments, and I think that any relief that is given should be through the guardians; if you have several other different sorts of establishments dealing independently with certain classes, you will find that they will overlap and that that will bring about confusion.

Success of "Homes" for Children.

5415. Now we come to the question of the children: you consider that the Home system has been a success?—Very much so, as far as the children are concerned; it has benefited them greatly. It is costly, no doubt.

Defects of boarding-out system.

5416. But as regards boarding-out poor law children, you are of opinion, I think, that this system requires very careful supervision?—Undoubtedly.

5417. Under this system have any cases of maltreatment of children in your district come under your notice?—There was one case, which was not a case of maltreatment, that was not satisfactory. I do not as a rule visit the boarded-out children, as that duty does not come under the inspectors, and we could not possibly do it; but I have done so sometimes as a matter of interest and when I have thought that things are possibly not going quite right. It is always my practice when I go to a board of guardians or workhouses to inquire about the boarded-out children. I cannot say that I can produce any definite case of maltreatment. There was one union where I found that some of the foster parents were paid 1s. 6d. per week. My suspicions were awakened in one union by the number of people I saw going to the workhouse on a particular day. I said to the master: "What are these people coming about?" He said, "They are all coming to try and adopt children." I said, "I must make some investigation into this"; and I made a point to go round that union to see how these children were treated. I must say that the foster-parents were being paid a very low rate for them in some cases—sometimes they were relatives, no doubt; but I cannot say that I came across any absolute case of maltreatment. There was one case which I recommended some consideration should be given to, but not because the children were not properly looked after. I think the system requires more supervision than it gets.

Prospects of pauperism.

5418. From paragraph 143 I see that you do not take a very hopeful view as regards pauperism in the future?—I am afraid I do not. I think the diminution, or, if I may use the term, the reform of pauperism must come from the outside rather than from the Poor Law. I think it is an outside matter; that is to say, a social matter. If you get social reform, more thrift amongst the people, and less money spent in drink, and so forth—for one thing re-acts on the other—that would necessarily reform the people, and there would be less resort to the Poor Law. So far as the actual administration of the workhouse is concerned, I think consideration is generally shown to the people there. The point which I think requires most attention and most consideration with regard to the Poor Law, is the outdoor relief system, on which a large number of people, as I said just now, depend.

5419. A good deal of your district is agricultural, is it not?—Yes.

5420. Would you apply your remarks as regards the future of pauperism to the agricultural districts, as well as to the industrial districts?—They apply to a certain extent to those, but not to the same extent. I think they apply more especially to the towns.

5421. Pauperism in the industrial districts is, in your judgment, apparently, increasing?—It is increasing undoubtedly.

5422. More than in the rural districts?—Yes. Some of the rural districts show a decrease in pauperism: that is no doubt partly owing to the exodus of people from the country districts, but not entirely.

Rural areas favourable to system of out-relief.

5423. In these rural districts is there an expensive system of outdoor relief?—No. They follow the ordinary course. That is to say, the guardians meet, and relief is always given on the same day that the guardians meet, the relief committees meet generally before the guardians. In the agricultural districts it is much more easy to investigate the cases, because they are fewer, and as a rule the guardian coming from a particular district knows most of the people in his district; therefore the investigation is much easier in the country districts than it is in the town districts.

5424. I think it has been asserted, or at any rate implied, by some of the preceding witnesses, that it is possible to work a not unsatisfactory system of out-door relief in the country districts?—I quite agree that that is so. I think it is better done there, because, as I say, there are fewer people, and everybody is known, if I may use the expression, by their respective guardians.

5425. The conditions which make a system of out-door relief controllable and effective in a rural district do no exist to the same extent in the industrial or crowded districts?—Not to the same extent.

Inspection of boarded-out children.

5426. (The O'Conor Don.) Going back to one of the last points you spoke upon—the boarded-out children—I should like to ask you whether there is any inspection whatever of boarded-out children now?—Not within the unions, except by the guardians themselves and their relieving officer. There is no inspection by the Local Government Board Inspectors, except of such cases as we think proper to go to.

5427. Have you no lady inspectors under the Local Government Board?—Not in the same way as we have for the children outside the unions. For the children boarded-out without the union there are lady inspectors, but not for the children boarded-out within the union.

Out relief to undeserving.

5428. As a general rule, do you think the out-door relief is confined to the deserving cases?—I am afraid it is not. I think a great many people who are undeserving get it.

5429. I understood from an answer you gave before that you thought that it was as a rule only given to deserving cases?—I think I said that the guardians do not force into the workhouses deserving cases. That is quite another matter from giving out-relief; in fact, it is very often the other way about. You will find some boards of guardians, where the workhouse wants extension, rather than go to the expense of making the workhouse adequate, will give out-door relief to prevent people going in.

Mr. Edward Bestbridge Wethered.

12 Mar. 1906.

5430. I suppose the out-door relief depends a good deal upon the reports of the relieving officers ?—It does to a certain extent ; sometimes not to the extent it ought to.

Type of relieving officers.

5431. Do you consider the relieving officers as a rule are a reliable and good class of men ?—I do.

Relieving officers as collectors.

5432. Do the relieving officers give their whole time to this work ?—Not always. They Act as collectors for the guardians sometimes.

Regulation of number and salaries of relieving officers.

5433. I suppose the board of guardians decide absolutely the number of relieving officers that they will have ?—Yes.

5434. The Local Government Board having no power to dictate the number that there should be ?—The Local Government Board has not exercised any such powers in my district so far.

5435. Have they the power to dictate that ?—They have the power to do so.

5436. Upon what principle is the number of relieving officers regulated ; is it according to the area, or population, or the number of persons in receipt of relief ?—I am afraid that the number of relieving officers is not regulated by any principle at all except the will of the guardians. Generally speaking, in the populous districts the relieving officers have too many cases to look after.

5437. What are the average salaries of the relieving officers ?—I should require to look into that before answering ; I could not say off-hand.

5438. Does the salary vary ?—Yes, it does somewhat.

Out relief in money and kind.

5439. Do they give relief in kind as well as in money ?—The relieving officers have the power to give relief in kind to a destitute case. Supposing I am a relieving officer and a case is brought to me or my attention is brought to a case as being a case of destitution, I have the power, if I think proper, to give the relief in kind up to the time of the next board meeting, when I must report the case.

5440. As a rule, it is not given in money—or is it ?—The relieving officer has no power to give money without an order of the guardians, but he may give relief in kind.

5441. The guardians can give relief in money or in kind, can they not ?—Yes.

5442. Which do they do ?—Generally speaking, part in money and so many loaves as well. But if they have a drunken case brought before them, or a case that cannot be trusted, sometimes they say to the relieving officer, give relief at your discretion in kind.

5443. Have you any union in which the relief is altogether given in kind ?—Not to everybody—certainly not.

5444. When it is given in kind, does the relieving officer carry the relief to the recipient, or has the recipient to come to fetch it somehow ?—The relieving officer gives him a note generally by which he can get it at a certain shop.

5445. Is the relief in money given at any particular centres, or is it only given at the homes of the people ?—It is given at the various centres if the people have the power to come for it. On the other hand, if the recipients have not the power to come for it, it is the relieving officer's duty to take it.

5446. Have you ever considered whether relief in kind would be better than relief in money ?—I certainly should not advise giving relief in kind only, as an absolute rule. It is a matter for discretion entirely.

5447. Do you think it might be done sometimes with advantage as a test of the reality of the distress ?—It is done now sometimes in that way with advantage.

Disadvantages of out-relief unions.

5448. To any great extent ?—Not to any great extent, but it is done. If I were to go to a board of guardians, say to-morrow, I should probably find some cases of that description.

5449. In paragraph 32 you refer to the union of Keynsham, where you say there are a number of clerks ; how does that work ?—It does not work altogether satisfactorily in my opinion.

5450. Are these clerks acting independently of each other ?—To a certain extent they are. Perhaps I might explain the position. Part of the union is in Gloucestershire and part in Somersetshire—about half and half. The workhouse is in Somersetshire, at Keynsham. The board issued an order by which they formed two out-relief unions, the Warmsley out-relief district and the Keynsham out-relief district ; and the position now is that there is one clerk to the guardians as a whole, and one to each of the out-relief unions.

5451. Are those clerks under the chief clerk of the union so far as finance goes ?—No ; the out-relief districts do their own finances, but they make returns to the clerk to the guardians as a whole.

5452. Then the finance as a whole is under him ?—Only so far as it relates to the workhouse.

5453. Is there any other union in your district where this system prevails ?—No, that is the only one.

5454. That is quite an exception, then ?—It is quite exceptional.

5455. Have you any experience of boards of guardians under the old system of ex officio magistrates ?—Not officially in any way.

5456. You own official experience is confined to the new system then ?—Yes.

Drunkenness of paupers on leave of absence from workhouse.

5457. (Mr. Booth.) With regard to the number of inmates who cannot be allowed out without fear of their returning the worse for drink, do they frequently go out with money in their pockets which they can spend on drink ?—I think not. When a person comes to a workhouse he is searched, and any money he has got is taken from him.

5458. Therefore, what drink they get is the result of treating ?—Or begging, and what friends may give them, possibly—I do not know how that may be.

5459. Do you think it would be more largely a case of treating, or of what friends give them ?—It is difficult to say that. I should say it is more the result of begging than of anything else. But that is only my opinion, and it is very difficult to get definite evidence of anything of that sort.

5460. It might be extremely difficult for them to refuse that sort of mistaken kindness on the part of people who were old acquaintances ?—That is so to some extent, no doubt.

5461. But otherwise they might beg for money and spend that ?—Yes. Certain cases have been reported to me, as for instance, a certain man who goes out and begs for a time and then comes back again. I do not mean to say this is so in every case, please understand.

Effect of local industries and trade fluctuations on pauperism.

5462. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) I rather gathered from you that where there were local industries there was not so much pauperism ; take, for instance, the Vale of Evesham and the Pershore plum district ?—That is not an industrial centre, if I might say so ; it is an agricultural district.

5463. But there is a special form of agriculture carried on there ?—Yes, fruit growing.

5464. There is not so much pauperism there, is there ?—No ; and there is not the extent of migration from the country into the towns which has been going on in other country districts.

5465. As a kind of reverse case, in Walsall when there was a special amount of work everything went well, but directly that work is taken away there is poverty ?—Yes.

5467. Do some of these people so drawn into the district become afterwards chargeable to the Poor rate?—I cannot say definitely about that. The increased trade did certainly attract people, and I have no doubt some of those who were attracted came upon the Poor rate. I wish it to be clearly understood that these people were earning very high wages at the time, and that some of them made very good use of their savings. On the other hand, a very large portion of the population spent their money as fast as they got it, and when the depression came, they had no reserves, and so they had to come upon the Poor Law.

5468. Would it not be more likely that those who were originally residents there would be the people to save, and the people who travel about seeking trade in different districts would be the ones to spend ?—I am afraid not.

5469. Would you put it the other way on ?—I should be disposed to say six to one and half-a-dozen to the other as far as my information goes.

Definition of "deserving" and "adequate relief."

5470. With regard to the circular of 1900 in reference to the aged and deserving poor and out-relief, have you ever been able to advise guardians perfectly as to the definition of the word "deserving" ?—I think you must judge each case on its merits. I do not think you can lay down a hard and fast rule which cannot be departed from.

5471. So it is just in the same way as "adequate relief" ?—Yes.

Living wage in West Bromwich.

5472. I notice that in paragraph 88 you quote from the report of the West Bromwich Committee to the effect that 5s. or 7s. a week would be adequate as a pension on which people could keep themselves; would that be the case in that district ?—Certainly; a single person could keep herself or himself on 7s. a week, supposing he or she was fairly capable of being able to attend to himself or herself.

Proposed penalty for drunkenness of workhouse inmates.

5473. With regard to those who are allowed out for the day, an I who cannot come back without being intoxicated, or something very nearly approaching it, would it not be desirable that some kind of penalty should apply to a person who comes back in that state; for instance, that he should not be allowed out say for another three months ?—That might be done, and it would be a very good thing to do. Of course, there is not that power at the present time, although the period of detention has been extended by the Local Government Board in the last few years.

Roll-call of "able-bodied."

5474. (Mr. Nunn). With regard to the able-bodied in your workhouses, is it the custom of your boards of guardians to have a call-over of their able-bodied every half-year or every quarter ?—Yes.

5475. It is on such occasions as those that such figures as you give in paragraph 65 come out, is it ?—No. Those figures were made as a special return to me.

Punishment of workhouse inmates on refusal to work.

5476. But they do make such inquiries themselves periodically, do they not ?—Yes, they do. Just lately they have prosecuted certain men in Wolverhampton for not doing work.

5477. Not men in their own workhouse ?—Yes, they have.

5478. Because they were refractory ?—For neglecting to work and becoming chargeable to the union. They were men who would not try to get work and who were everlastingly in and out of the workhouse.

5479. They did it, then, when the men made re-application ?—I do not know; I only saw it in the newspaper.

5480. In the workhouse, if a man did not perform his allotted task, they could charge him for that; but if he did not decline to perform the task of work they could not charge him with being a vagabond, could they ?—They can bring these men up, but I forget the exact statute under which they can do it.

Work of Salvation and Church Armies.

5481. Are there any institutions like the Church Army working in connection with the workhouse to try and obtain employment for the men ?—There is the Church Army, and, of course, the Salvation Army 5482. Do they both extend their operations into your workhouses ?—Only to a limited extent, though I have been myself in communication with them on certain occasions.

5483. They do not do it systematically ?—No. It would be a very good thing if they did.

Difficulty of identifying fathers of bastard paupers.

5484. In regard to illegitimacy, you say that only in a few instances were steps taken to find the putative father; I suppose the difficulty arises from the fact that the mother leaves the workhouse, and then she is no longer chargeable ?—No; very often you do not know who the father is; the father does not come in.

5485. And you cannot find him ?—No. You must get corroborative evidence, and to get corroborative evidence in a case of that sort is a most difficult thing

5486. And the guardians must proceed against him whilst the child is with them, must they not ?—I do not think the guardians can proceed direct; I think the woman herself must proceed.

5487. The guardians can proceed against the father surely for the maintenance of his child ?—Before answering I should want to look up the law on the matter. The guardians can support the woman in it, but I think the woman has to take the initiative. The guardians can do it indirectly by telling the woman she must do it.

5488. (Mr. Lansbury.) I think that is how it is done—they get the woman to do it and find the means for the woman to do it ?—I think that is how it is done.

Relief to members of Friendly Societies.

5489. (Mr. Nunn.) I notice that in the report of the West Bromwich Committee which is quoted in paragraph 88, they say, "It is to be regretted that only one case was found in which a man had been for any considerable time a member of a friendly society"—why is it to be regretted ?—I quoted that from the Guardians' Committee; I am not responsible for what they say.

5490. Turning now to paragraph 115, I suppose that the Outdoor Benefit Societies Act hardly comes into operation at all, and is practically a dead letter ?—Do you mean to say that the guardians should not take notice of these friendly societies ?

5491. When giving out-relief the guardians are not allowed to take into consideration any amounts that a man is receiving from a friendly society up to 5s. ?—You must bear in mind that the people I am speaking of in that paragraph are people actually in the workhouse, and not people getting outdoor relief. You must bear in mind, too, that at the time I saw these people in the workhouses they were not members of any friendly Society at all. The general explanation, to quote their own expression, was that the society "broke up." In giving outdoor relief, the guardians are careful to take into consideration whether the people belong to benefit societies or not, and those who do always get preferential treatment.

Bad trade as a cause of failure to maintain relatives.

5492. In paragraph 116, I think, to a certain extent you attribute the failure of the sons and daughters and other relatives to contribute liable to bad trade ?—To a certain extent, yes.

5493. Do you remember any other period of bad trade in which the same phenomenon showed itself ?—No. I am here simply speaking of the present.

5494. Could you rake up any other instances in which it has occurred in the past ? We should be very pleased to think it could be attributed to that, and not be obliged to feel that it was due to a general slackening of responsibility ?—As I said before, there is undoubtedly a general slackening of responsibility, but that is not the case in every instance. There are some people most desirous to do all they can for their parents and relatives, I know; but if a man is out of work he naturally cannot do it. Not many of the mechanics in my district during the late depression in trade have been out of work, for the most part the mechanics have been working short time; the class of persons who are mostly out of work are the unskilled workmen, of whom there are such a tremendous number in this country. There is not sufficient work for them to do.

System of out-relief unions as a check on out-relief.

5495. (Mrs. Webb.) I see, according to paragraph 22, that you have one out-relief union in your district; the principle of those unions is that the out-relief falls on the local rates, and the workhouse relief falls on the combined rates, I think ?—Yes.

5496. Has that at all diminished out-door relief ?—No, I do not think it has.

5497. It was designed for that purpose, was it not ? No; I fancy it was none simply as a matter of general convenience.

5498. I thought it was designed for the same sort of purpose that the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund was ?—This out-relief union was formed before I took over the district, but my impression is that it was formed as a matter of general convenience.

5499. You say it has not resulted in checking the desire to give outdoor relief ?—I think the guardians administer the relief pretty fairly on both sides.

5500. One would have thought that if the guardians had to pay for the out-relief, whereas the workhouse relief was thrown on a common fund, they would have been desirous of giving more workhouse relief than outdoor relief ?—That is a very fair contention, I think, but I have no evidence that it has been so.

5501. That is rather what I want to get; there is no evidence at all of that ?—I have none

Mr. Edward Bestbridge Wethered.

12 Mar. 1906.

Local Government Board's powers to control provision of new workhouse and proposed exercise thereof.

5502. You have not noticed in this union a disclination to give outdoor relief ?—I think not.

5503. With regard to the question of the Bristol workhouse, I gather that you think it rather serious that the Local Government Board has not power to insist on the building of a separate infirmary ?—I do think so I think that the Local Government Board ought to have increased powers in that direction, and in other directions as well ; but at the same time I wish to make it quite clear that those powers should not be used except as the very last resort. I always try to assist guardians. My idea of an inspectorship is to be loyal to the Local Government Board and to assist the guardians. I tell the guardians I do not go there to find fault with them, that I go to assist them ; and, generally speaking, I get on very well in consequence. But it is a weakness sometimes, when matters require attention like the Bristol workhouse, not to have the power behind to say, This must be done ; and the best class of guardians very much regret that it is so.

5504. How could you get that power—by what method ? —It would have to be by Act of Parliament.

5505. It would be very awkward to issue a mandamus ; by what method would you suggest the Local Government Board should proceed ?—That is a matter that would require thinking out. It is a matter of detail, I admit, but it is a matter of important detail.

5506. Would the method which is used with regard to the police grants appeal to you ? Supposing you had the grants-in-aid to Poor Law authorities organised so that the Local Government Board could withhold some of those grants unless the service was efficient, would that appeal to you ?—It would. I hardly like to make the suggestion myself, but with regard to the education authorities, if a school is not up to what is thought to be the standard, then there is the grant——

5507. And it may be withheld ?—Yes. If you gave guardians a grant and said to them, Unless you carry out these alterations this grant will be stopped, I daresay that would have the desired effect, and no doubt it would assist the local rates as well.

5508. You think it would be wise to use the grants from the Central Authority to promote efficient administration ?—I think it is a matter well worthy of consideration.

5509. Instead of giving it mechanically on the basis of so many officers, as it is given now ?—I have very little doubt myself that if you gave the grant per head of paupers in the workhouse, the same as you do with regard to paupers in asylums, it would have an effect, because it would be cheaper then to offer the workhouse instead of giving outdoor relief.

5510. It would act like the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund ?—I do not know ; I have not gone into the details on that point.

Effect on pauperism and employment of Workmen's Compensation Acts.

5511. With regard to your paragraphs 80, 81 and 82, in which you deal with the Workmen's Compensation Act, I gather that you do not think that there are any statistics which prove that the Workmen's Compensation Act has actually increased pauperism ?—I know of none at all. What I have stated there is simply the result of my own observation. It is a matter, I would like to say, to which I have given a great deal of attention, and therefore I do not make my statements at random ; they are based upon actual and careful observation.

5512. I gather that you rather suggest that we must not take too seriously the assertion of the inmate of a workhouse that he has been thrown out of work because of the Workmen's Compensation Act ?—Not entirely. No doubt he has lost his situation by reason of the Employers' Liability Acts, but he has become what you may call an undesirable from some cause or other, and it is the undesirable who goes first.

5513. That is to say, any attempt to make the employer responsible for the conditions of employment tends to make him employ a person of good conduct rather than a person of bad conduct ?—Naturally.

5514. That would be the real effect of it, would it ?—I think so.

5515. In that way it would tend to the greater employment of people of good conduct ?—Certainly.

5516. And to the less employment of people of bad conduct ?—Certainly. I think that is just the way it does act.

5517. You would not consider that wholly undesirable, would you ?—It is quite natural and quite right.

5518. On the whole, the effect would be to stimulate good conduct ?—One would think so.

5520. It is very curious that Mr. Booth's figures do not agree with yours ?—I am very sorry. I think I must adhere to my own.

Labour yard

5521. I notice that in your memorandum you do not mention the question of the stone-yards ; have you any stone-yards in your district ?—There was a stone-yard at Walsall last year, and there was a stone-yard also at Dudley for a short period. At the former place it was not only a stone-yard but was used for other work, that is to say, they did have stone-breaking and they also did the removal of pit heaps and that sort of thing. The working of the stone-yard was exceedingly unsatisfactory.

5522. Then you do not believe in stone-yards ?—I cannot exactly say I do not believe, but I should be very glad to find some alternative for them. There was a disposition to evade the work as much as possible, and do as little as possible of it in every way. Stone-breaking is very hard work for people not accustomed to it ; I quite readily admit that.

Question of attractiveness of medical relief.

5523. (Mr. Bentham.) In paragraph 80 you refer to the question of nursing in workhouses, and you say it has not attracted an additional number of paupers ?—So far as I have been able to ascertain it has not.

5524. You do not hold the opinion then that the better treatment inside workhouse hospitals or infirmaries has tapped a new stratum of pauperism, as it were ?—Except as regards local hospitals perhaps ; they send cases in now which in days gone by they did not send in.

5525. Would that be a small amount ?—It depends on what you call small. You will come across a good many cases of that sort, especially in the larger unions, but I cannot give you the actual figures. When I go to a workhouse infirmary I see every patient, and I want to know why they have come into the house, where they have come from, and all about them.

5526. In your district there is apparently no cause of complaint, speaking generally, as regards the infirmaries ? —Except that in some of the older workhouses the sick wards are not adapted for infirmary wards.

5527. I do not mean on that score ; I mean because of their being used for a different class of persons to what they were intended for ?—I have no evidence of that sort at all. I do not mean to say that people who have been in a much better position do not come in ; but then they are reduced to destitution generally from causes for which they are themselves responsible.

5528. Would you say then that the workhouse hospital really is not abused ?—In my district you may find an exceptional case here and there, but as a general thing certainly not.

5529. In paragraph 81 you refer to the number of fairly capable men over sixty years of age who are classed as "old and infirm" ; do you mention those because you think they are wrongly classed ?—Not at all. What I mean to say is that if they could get employment they are capable of doing a certain amount of work.

Effect of Employers' Liability Act.

5530. Are they capable of earning a living ?—They are capable of working and of earning a living if they could get it ; but, as I said just now, that is where the Employers' Liability Act comes in to a large extent—they are over sixty years of age.

5531. Do you think they should be classed as "old and infirm"?—We generally put down all those over sixty years of age as old and infirm; but do not think that they are idle, for they are put to work nevertheless. The regulation is that people should be put to such work as they are capable of, and therefore these old people are put to work as a rule.

Number of possible old-age pensioners in workhouse.

5532. In paragraph 87 you mention that the West Bromwich guardians made an inquiry into a number of cases with the object of giving them out-door relief to the extent of 5s. or 7s. a week?—It was giving them a pension really.

5533. Was that investigation made in any other union in your district?—It was made in Cirencester as well, but I have not got the figures for Cirencester here.

5534. Was it not made by Bristol?—Not to my knowledge.

5535. Only in two unions to your knowledge?—Yes.

5536. Was the result pretty much the same in the other union?—My experience going round is that it would be pretty much the same. I will explain why this occurred. There has been a Commission sitting on the question of Old Age Pensions, as probably you know, and the General Inspector was asked to recommend two unions which would give statistics, and I selected one rural and one urban union. The reason I did not get the figures for the rural union was that they were much longer about it; I simply did not get them, that was all.

5537. Had you any special object in selecting that one union—West Bromwich?—I simply selected it because I thought it was a very typical union; I had no other reason for selecting it. I knew very well that the work would be carefully carried out there.

Mr. Chaplin's Circular and its effect.

5538. In paragraph 105 you refer to the Circular of August 4, 1900; is it your experience that that circular was a mistake, or that its object was misunderstood?—I think its object was misunderstood.

5539. Do you agree with the object of that circular?—I always go on the principle that if out-door relief is given at all it should be given adequately after careful investigation, and especially to deserving people.

5540. I think you said just now in answer to a question put by Mr. Russell Wakefield, that it was very difficult to decide who were deserving, and that guardians usually placed all practically or too many under that category?—I do not think I said that; I said it was difficult to define the term "deserving."

5541. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) I wanted to know whether you could guide the guardians to a rule as to who were to be included amongst the deserving and who were not?—If you put it in that way, I can answer it a little more definitely perhaps.

5542. That was the object of my question?—Supposing a man comes before an out-relief committee and that man has been subscribing to a benefit society for a considerable time, I consider that is a sign of thrift and that the man is entitled to consideration; if a man has been a sober man and has done his best to get on, that must be taken into consideration. If he has simply come to the guardians because of illness or infirmity or incapacity which is no fault of his own, I think such a man is deserving, and should not be forced into the workhouse. But where you see a man who has earned good wages, and who has never taken the trouble to put money into a benefit society, but has spent the money in drink or in some other way, I do not think that man is entitled to as much sympathy as the man who has not done that kind of thing.

5543. (Mr. Bentham.) The Circular says "With regard to the treatment of the Aged Deserving Poor, it has been felt that persons who have habitually led decent and deserving lives should, if they require relief in their old age, receive different treatment from those whose previous habits and character have been unsatisfactory, and who have failed to exercise thrift in the bringing up of their families or otherwise?—I quite agree with that.

5544. Do you see any real difficulty in practice in selecting the persons who come under this definition?—No, I do not.

5545. Then you believe the guardians have really misunderstood the object of the circular, and that they have not discriminated as well as they might have done?—That is so.

5546. As instanced by the number of cases they have selected as "decent and deserving?"—Speaking to the guardians on this point recently I have said, "Your out-door relief has gone up considerably," and they have said "You told us to put it up" or something to that effect. I said "Oh dear, no; nothing of the sort.'. "You came here and advocated it" they said; I said "No; I simply referred to this Circular issued by the board as to the deserving cases, but you have missed out the word 'deserving' and given it all round." There is no doubt that in certain quarters there is rather a desire to do that.

5547. Is there any union in your district that has drawn up any particular regulations with regard to this Circular, for the guidance of the guardians in deciding who should come under it?—Yes, at Bristol they have done that. I think I have referred to that in my memorandum. They have made a special class called Class A. which come under it.

5549. Would you explain the large number of persons who come under that category, on the ground that all people who were eligible for out-door relief ought to be deserving?—I think the explanation is what I said before, namely, that the guardians do not force the deserving into the workhouses.

5550. Then there really ought to be none in receipt of out-door relief except those who are deserving?—I rather incline in that direction.

5551. If that really were so, all the aged people would come under this heading, would they not?—No, I do not think so; all the aged people are not deserving.

5552. If all those aged people who are in receipt of out-door relief are deserving— ?—If they are!

5553. If they were not, they would be put inside, would they not?—That is not always the case.

5554. They naturally would be if they confined their out-door relief to those who are deserving of out-door relief?—If they did, yes.

5555. Therefore, if they confined it strictly within that definition, there would be none outside receiving relief except those who would come in this category?—If they carried out that principle absolutely.

5556. Do you think that is an advisable thing to do; would you carry it to that length?—I certainly would not force deserving people into the workhouse if they could be looked after outside—and I never have done.

5557. With regard to the children, in parargaph 123 you say there are twelve unions out of forty-three who are dealing with their children outside the workhouse; could you tell us what proportion of children there are represented by those twelve unions out of the total of forty-three in your district?—I could not; I should have to work that out.

5558. It really is the bigger unions who have adopted this principle, is it not?—The bigger unions are gradually coming round to it, undoubtedly.

Motives of foster-parents in accepting boarded-out children.

5559. In parargaph 129 you speak of the boarding-out system, and you say that people are not inclined to take children from affection towards them, but do it "with a view of making something out of them"?—I do not mean to say that some of the foster-parents do not get very fond of the children. The general principle is that the foster-parents do not, as a matter of principle, take the children because they are fond of them; but it is to make something out of them. I do not wish to be misunderstood; I have come across cases myself where the foster-parents have become exceedingly fond of the children.

5560. Do you think that if people take the children for a small payment, a certain amount of affection enters into the transaction, seeing that they do not take the children entirely for the money?—It does not necessarily follow that there is an amount of affection; it may be that the children are useful to them.

Mr. Edward Bestbridge Wethered.

12 Mar. 1906.

5561. But if they are young children under ten they cannot be so very useful?—I do not know that they are always under ten years of age.

5562. It is limited to ten except in the case of a brother or a sister who might be older?—Of course they get older after a while.

5563. The object would be an ulterior one?—Yes; it might be to make use of the children.

5564. When a larger amount is paid for boarding-out, do you not think that is an inducement held out to people to take children because it would pay them to take them?—Yes, I do.

5565. The larger the amount paid, the greater the mistake in that direction?—I do not know that that naturally follows. There is less excuse for neglecting them if they receive more money. Naturally, if you pay more money for taking the children, you will have more people after them.

5566. That would mean that the additional number that go after them would do it for that increased payment?—I go on the general principle that the motive which actuates the foster-parents in taking children is to get something out of them. I cannot go further than that.

5567. Then you would say the smaller the amount they are willing to take for them the better?—No, I do not agree with that.

5568. Do you think with regard to boarding-out there is already too much supervision or too little?—I think with regard to boarding-out without the union they are properly inspected.

Inspection of boarded-out children.

5569. But with regard to boarding out within the union, do you think they are not properly inspected?—I think it would be very much better if they were to have an inspection in the same way as outside the union.

5570. Does not that duty devolve upon the general inspector of the district?—No. We could not possibly do it—the work is too much.

5571. But it is part of your duty, is it not?—No. We have the right to go if we think proper to do so, but it is not part of our duty.

5572. What is the objection to transferring the inspection of these children boarded out within the union to the inspector of boarded-out children without the union?—None, as far as I can follow.

5573. You see no objection to it?—I do not see any objection to it.

5575. You would approve of it?—Yes, and I have said so in my memorandum. I think myself there is very much more attention being paid to the children now who are under the care of the guardians, and I think, generally speaking, the children are better under the care of the guardians. If you find a relative of a child, an uncle or an aunt or a grandmother, who is capable of taking charge of it, I think the proper thing to do is to put the child there, and very often there is a great advantage in doing so. You may also find people without any children at all who are anxious to take a child; and that is another matter altogether. There was one workhouse where some time ago a woman came with a child in her arms—a very well-dressed child and very well cared for; she said this was a boarded-out child, her husband was going to be removed out of that union into another place to work, and she wanted to know whether they would let her keep the child and pay her the same amount. The guardians demurred to that, and then she walked out of the room, saying, you are not going to have the child back; I am going to keep the child. So you do get satisfactory cases.

Deterrence of relief.

5576. Speaking generally, on the principle of the poor law, I take it that you agree that the position of the pauper should be less eligible than that of the independent labourer of the same class?—Yes.

5577. Do you think that that principle is departed from to any extent in your district?—No. I do not think that there are any inducements to men to come into the workhouse.

5578. Would that apply to out-door relief also?—I think the matter of out-door relief is quite different. I think if one man gets out-door relief, the other man thinks, why should I not have as much as so-and-so. There is very little repugnance among a certain class to take out-door relief. Of course to a certain class of mechanics and other men who are a superior class of men, it is very repugnant, and they would do it only in the very last resort; but one cannot deny that in the population generally there are a very large class of thriftless people who are only too glad to get out-door relief.

5579. I suppose you are familiar with what is known as the Goschen Minute with regard to pauperism in the Metropolis?—I have nothing at all to do with the Metropolis, so I cannot say that I am.

5580. Are you not familiar with that Minute which was issued by Mr. Goschen?—I am afraid not.

Co-operation with charity.

5581. It is a Minute advising co-operation between the poor law and charitable agencies?—I am not familiar with it, but, as a matter of fact, the local Charity Organisation Societies in my district, where they exist, work with the relieving officers.

5582. There is a tendency to co-operation, then?—Yes, the one gives information to the other.

5583. Has it a tendency to reduce the number of people who apply to the guardians for out-relief?—I think I may say that where a Charity Organisation Society exists, they very often give relief to cases that would come on the guardians otherwise. I had a great deal of experience of a local Charity Organisation Society at one time.

Influence of inspectors of Poor Law administration.

5584. With regard to the influence of the Local Government Board through the inspectors over the policy of the guardians in their districts, do you consider that satisfactory?—What do you mean by the "policy;" I do not quite gather.

5585. Does the inspector influence the policy of the boards in their dealing with either out-door relief or in-door relief?—I am happy to say that I am, I think, on very good terms with my boards of guardians, and that they very often consult me. They often consult me in cases of difficulty.

5586. From that point of view, do you think your influence is useful and successful?—It is not for me to say that, perhaps. I can only say I hope it is. It is always a pleasure to me to meet the guardians, and I think they are generally pleased to see me. They say so, at any rate.

5587. You meet with sufficient approval of your recommendations from the boards of guardians?—Yes. We get on extremely well for the most part.

Need for greater powers for Local Government Board.

5588. Do you think you have sufficient power for dealing with the boards?—No. I think the Local Government Board ought to have more power than it has.

5589. In what direction?—With regard to any question. If there is not sufficient nursing, if there are not sufficient relieving officers, if the accommodation is not sufficient, the board should have more power, I think, but only to be used in the very last resort. I quite believe in the principle, and I act upon it, of the inspector trying to convince the guardians; I do not believe in coercing the guardians if you can possibly help it.

5590. On the other hand, do you think any additional powers ought to be given to the boards of guardians for dealing with various classes of paupers?—As far as actual administration is concerned, it is practically vested in them, and there are certain matters such as giving gratuities and little matters of that sort which might be left to the guardians.

5591. Do you believe in their being more restricted by the central authority, or in more liberty being given to local administration?—I think it works very well as it is 5592. Do you think it is as well as it might be?—We do not profess to get perfection in this world in anything I do not think the poor law is any exception to that.

Adequacy of existing Poor Law system.

5593. Taking the poor law as a whole, do you think it is meeting the circumstances of the case?—I think it is meeting the circumstances of the case pretty fairly. I think out-relief is the question that requires the most investigation.

5594. Is there any class of recipients of relief that you think ought to be transferred to any other authority; you mentioned imbeciles and lunatics, I think ?—I said that I regret to see sane epileptics mixed up with imbeciles in the workhouses, but I do not advocate forming a number of institutions for giving relief. I think what relief is given, should as far as possible be given by one authority: otherwise you will get conflicting influences, and general confusion will come in.

5595. Do you mean that all paupers, whether lunatic or sane, ought to come under the poor law ?—No, I did not say all paupers; I said, as a general principle. I do not like multiplying institutions. At the present moment the actual asylums are not under the poor law.

5596. But the pauper lunatics in the asylums are ? They are in a way. We do not inspect them; the guardians send them to the asylum, but the asylum is under the county council.

5597. Are there any classes which you would say might be transferred to the county council ?—I do not think so. The only classes I have referred to in my memorandum are the habitual drunkards; it is a question whether they should not be sent to inebriate homes. I think that the sane epileptics might be dealt with by combinations of board of guardians, but that they should be under the boards of guardians.

Size of Boards of Guardians.

5598. Now I want to ask you a few questions with regard to the constitution of the boards in your district. What is your opinion with regard to the size of the boards; do you consider that a large board is less efficient than a small board ?—I think I must answer that in this way—that a large union naturally taxes its members much more than a smaller one does. Take Bristol, which is one of the largest unions in England; the tax upon the members there is very great indeed.

5599. I was not thinking of the size of the union, but of the number of the members of the board ?—Do you mean to say you think they are too large in proportion to the population ?—

5600. No; what is your experience with regard to the number of members forming a board of guardians—is a board less efficient with a large number than it is with a small number ?—I think you want a reasonable number.

Small interest in Guardians' elections.

5601. Then you have really no evidence to give on that point ?—I do not know that I have particularly. It depends entirely upon the Guardians themselves. What I do complain about very much is that the amount of interest taken in Guardians' elections is very small indeed. If you take the number of votes cast for a Guardian's election, you will find it is exceedingly small compared with the total number of votes that might be cast.

Effect on Poor Law administration of size of electoral area.

5602. Is it your experience that where the electoral area is small, and there are a large number of parishes each represented, the pauperism is usually high ?—That certainly applies in the case of Bristol; on January 1st, 1905, there were 30·4 per 1,000 of the population.

5603. You have not looked through all your unions to see whether that does or does not apply all the way through ?—I do not think it applies as a general principle. Of course if you get a very large Board of Guardians it generally means populous places.

5604. Not necessarily ?—It does in my district.

5605. There are some large unions which have one township only, and their representation can be what they make it; but if a union consisted of forty parishes each parish would want its representative. Both cases may be cases of populous districts, and still those differences would obtain ?—I think you may say that as a general principle pauperism is most in populous districts.

5606. Is that so ?—I think so, taking the large towns.

5607. Is it not a fact that in some of the large towns the number of paupers per thousand of population is actually less than in an agricultural district ?—That may be so, if you take it in that sense. I did not quite see what you meant.

5608. You have no opinion with regard to the electoral area ?—I think I may say I have not.

Classification of workhouse inmates.

5609. Do you approve of the classification of the in-door poor on a character basis ?—To a certain extent yes, so far as it can be carried out.

5610. Do you think it is advisable ?—I do most certainly.

5611. You would separate these better class cases who must be inside the workhouse from the noisy ones ?—Certainly. That is done in my district so far as it possibly can be done.

Value of relieving officer as guide to Guardians.

5612. I think you said in answer to a question that if out-door relief was left more to the relieving officers it would be better administered ?—I do not think I said if it were left more to them; I think I said that the relieving officer's advice was not always taken.

5613. Do you think it should always be taken ?—What I meant to imply was simply this: that sometimes a relieving officer makes a recommendation and that recommendation is not accepted. I do not mean to say that the relieving officer's recommendation cannot be wrong, and that the relieving officer is infallible; but a relieving officer very often has complained to me that relief is given where it should not be.

5614. That is practically the same thing ?—If you like. That does come in. I do not mean to say that the relieving officer may not be wrong sometimes—he may. It is in the discretion of the Guardians. Sometimes the people have friends at court, and the relieving officer may be over-ruled.

5615. Do you think that due importance is given to the position of the relieving officer generally ?—Yes, I think so.

5616. Do you think he is sufficiently well-paid ?—I never heard him grumble.

5617. Does the appointment attract the class of men that you think ought to be employed on this work ?—I think I may say this definitely—that the relieving officers in my district are, as a rule, a very intelligent class of men, though they may be underpaid.

5618. Is it your opinion that in large districts their duty should be confined entirely to dealing with applications for relief ?—Yes, I should like to see that, but then, of course, you must increase their salary, because they probably take other duties besides now.

5619. Do you think the work would be more efficiently done if it were so ?—Yes, because then they would have more time for the work. The relieving officer for Walsall at one time had 700 cases to deal with in two districts.

Attendance of inspector at relief committees.

5620. (Mr. Bentham.) Do you take a very great interest in the administration of out-relief in the various unions in your district, in so far as you sit with the guardians in their relief committees, and ascertain exactly the methods they adopt in dealing with their cases?—I take a very great deal of interest. I always make it a practice to attend the relief committees when I attend the meetings of boards of guardians, and I attend relief committees in cases where the relief committee does not sit on the same day as the guardians. I make it a practice, as far as I possibly can, to attend each relief committee separately.

Regulations adopted by guardians for giving relief.

5621. Have any of the boards of guardians in your district regulations or bye-laws for the guidance of the guardians?—Yes; in Bristol they have rather extensive ones, and I shall be pleased to hand you a copy. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XI. (C).)

5622. Is it only Bristol?—Certain boards of guardians have a regular scale that they go by, others, again, judge each case on its merits. My own view would be this, that I think it is well for guardians to have a scale for their guidance, but at the same time exceptional cases do occur. I do not believe in guardians having cast-iron rules which they cannot, in any circumstances at all, go beyond, because cases do occur sometimes which ought to be treated strictly on their merits; they are exceptional cases, but I do believe in guardians having a scale to go on as a general rule. I can give you instances or hand the papers to you, if you like, showing typical scales which are used.

5623. Do you find where they have no such regulations or by-laws that there is a great deal of difference between the districts in one union in the amount of relief given and the class of person to whom it is given?—I do not think, taking it all round, there is a great deal of difference; some are more liberal than others, no doubt.

Medical relief as the highway to pauperism.

5624. It has been said that medical relief is the stepping stone, as it were, to pauperism; that is, out-door medical relief?—Yes.

5625. Do you find that to be so in any part of you district?—I think, perhaps, there is no part of the out-door administration which is more abused than that of applying for medical relief. One so frequently finds that men who have been in good work when in health have made no provision whatever in case of sickness, and they rely on getting the parish doctor in cases of illness.

5626. Do you find that people who have begun with medical relief have followed on with a request for other forms of relief?—It very often follows, but I cannot say I have any definite instance.

5627. You do not look upon it really as a stepping stone to pauperism?—I think that if a man who is earning fairly good wages makes no provision when he is in good work, and relies on the Poor Law authorities when he gets ill, it is a stepping stone in that direction; he has a tendency to rely upon out-door relief when in distress.

5628. Supposing an extension of outdoor medical relief were contemplated, do you think it would be a danger?—I think it would.

5629. It would have a tendency to increase pauperism generally?—Yes; I think it would be an incentive against thrift, decidedly.

Effect of lax policy of out relief.

5630. Is it your experience that in consequence of the policy of out-relief, which is principally based upon the cry of "cheaper out than in," the in-door relief has been increased and not reduced? Is the policy of outdoor relief usually accompanied by an increase in in-door pauperism?—I think my answer must be thus: that when you give people the idea that guardians give out-relief in preference to offering the workhouse test, it has a demoralising effect upon the people generally, and they rely upon getting outdoor relief rather than being offered the house, and they take advantage of it. If you take the statistics I have given in my evidence in chief, you will see that in the case of Wolverhampton and the case of Stourbridge it works out in that direction, where they have not had sufficient accommodation to offer the workhouse test when necessary.

Number of visits by inspector to each union.

5631. How often do you visit the unions in your district?—I visit every workhouse at least once a year, and more often if required; I visit the boards of guardians also once a year, and all the guardians in my district know that if they want to consult me I am always willing to to come, if I can possibly do so.

5632. Do you find a visit once a year to the union is sufficient?—Yes, I think so. If anything special occurs I go again. One could not do more, or I should find considerable difficulty in getting my work done in the course of the year.

5633. Do you think the unions which you have to visit, and the institutions which you have to inspect, are too many to afford them your thorough supervision?—I can do mine. I think I have quite as much as I can do thoroughly, I do my best anyway. I may say the guardians very often write and ask me to come because they want to consult me about a certain matter.

Small holdings at Evesham.

5634. (Professor Smart.) In paragraph 39 of your memorandum there is a very interesting statement about fruit growing in the Vale of Evesham. Is there really much fruit growing of this kind?—Yes, there is a great deal of it.

5635. How is the land acquired; from the municipalities or private owners?—They rent it generally from landowners.

5636. Under any special Act?—No, I think not.

5637. Do you know anything about the rents ?—No, I cannot say that I do.

5638. These small holdings are in the nature of allotments, I suppose ?—They are rather larger than allotments ; I give the dimensions of them in my memorandum.

5639. Are they near the houses or the villages ?—They are right out in the country. There are the houses where the people live themselves ; some have their houses near the ground they are cultivating ; they are scattered about in various places.

5640. What kind of fruit do they grow ?—They grow a good deal of strawberries, tree fruit, and vegetables such as asparagus ; in fact, all fruits, really, that are capable of being cultivated.

5641. You find that district has not suffered from the migration of men to the towns ?—No, some of the villages have increased in population.

Mental deficiency of pauper mothers of illegitimate children.

5642. In paragraph 71 there is a terrible statement : "These girls are generally below the average in mental intelligence" ?—That is true, I am sorry to say, absolutely.

5645. If your experience were at all general, do you not think this Commission might make a valuable inquiry as to how many of the single women confined of illegitimate children in the workhouses of the kingdom are feeble-minded ?—If I might be allowed, I would suggest that the inquiry should be as to who are below the average intelligence, or, if you like, you could put it in both ways.

5646. Does it not strike you that it would be useful ?—I think it is a subject of much importance, and that is why I have called attention to it.

5647. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) Is not that subject being inquired into by the Commission on the Feeble-minded which is now sitting ?—I think they are only inquiring as to the strictly feeble-minded.

Relative cost of dealing with pauper children in and outside the workhouse.

5648. (Professor Smart.) In paragraph 128 you say : "I fear that this tendency is chiefly prompted by considerations of cheapness rather than the welfare of the children." Have you any grounds for that statement ?—You see I hear the matter discussed frequently and, of course, there are many exceptions, but I say simply what does occur sometimes, that I am told the boarding-out is cheaper.

5649. You are aware, I suppose, that a great many guardians have a positive enthusiasm for boarding-out —Some have, no doubt.

5650. And that would be quite independently of this ?—I am simply speaking of a certain tendency which I very often come across, with which I have often to argue.

5651. (Miss Hill.) Is the difference of cost very considerable between having children in scattered homes and supporting them in the workhouse ?—Yes, it certainly is. I have some particulars about it here. For instance, if you take Worcester, where there are three cottage homes, the weekly cost is 6s. 5d.

5652. That includes all the charges ?—Yes. The average number of children is seventy-two ; average weekly cost per head for food, clothing, necessaries, firing, repairs, etc., 3s. 9d. ; average weekly cost per head for salaries, rations of officers, etc., 1s. 1d. ; average weekly cost per head for interest on loan, rates, etc., 1s. 7d. ; total 6s. 5d. In Gloucester, for the year ending, Lady Day, 1905, the cost of the children in the homes, apparently, comes to 7s. 8¼d. The details are all stated. At Wolverhampton the annual cost in the cottage homes comes to £23 7s. 6d. per head. I think if you divide that it will come to about 9s. per week. Then I will take you to Bristol, and there the average cost per child for food and necessaries, including gas, water, coal, etc., in 1905, was 3s. 5½d., and for the year ending Lady Day, 1904, it was 3s. 4¾d. ; for clothing it was 11¼d., and 9¼d. for the two respective years. The officers' salaries were 2s. for each year. Rent, rates, and all other expenses come to 1s. 9¼d. each. Therefore, taking it for the year ending Lady Day, 1905, it came to 8s. 2¼d. per child ; and in the year ending Lady Day, 1904, it came to 7s. 11¾d. per child. If we come to the question of cottage homes at Downend, to which I referred in my evidence-in-chief, the clerk tells me the cost of the cottage homes at Downend has not been ascertained for an entire year yet, but for the half-year to Lady Day, 1905, it was as follows : food and necessaries, including gas, water, coal, etc., 3s. 7¼d. ; clothing 1s., officers' sa aries 2s. 6d. ; rents, rates and all other expenses, 3s. 4d. ; making 10s. 5½d. There is a considerable difference in the cottage homes as compared with the others.

Effect of the Poor Law on thrift.

5653. In paragraph 143 you say you see little prospect of any substantial decrease of pauperism till the masses of the population exercise more thrift, spend less money on drink, and rely less on the Poor Law. Of course we must all feel that, but the question is, I suppose, what administration of the Poor Law tends to promote that thrift ?—Quite so.

5654. I wonder whether you see any influences brought to bear now which are tending to promote thrift. All the recent alterations have been rather in the other direction, have not they ?—May I ask what alterations you refer to ?

5655. I was thinking, for instance, of the abolition of the inability to vote by people who receive out-door relief ?—I entirely agree with you there.

5656. I do not know whether it has been done yet, but there is an idea of not disqualifying voters whose children receive free meals in schools ?—I think that is in the same direction, I must confess.

5657. For one thing, surely the introduction of the word "deserving" makes a difference. The old definition of the Poor Law was that it meant destitution, and left the question of deserts to other people to consider. We now seem to be attempting a legal difference in the treatment of those whom we ourselves consider deserving, which is a very difficult thing to do ?—For the actual deserving poor who are brought into a state of destitution from no fault of their own, I think the greatest sympathy should be shown, and, if relief is given at all, I hold that that relief should be adequate. I do not hold with people living on the verge of starvation and otherwise. I do think this (and one cannot attend Relief Committees without being very much struck by it) that a very large proportion of the population of the country exercises no thrift or thought, and depend on charity and the Poor Law in time of need. I cannot go further than that.

Conditions in Dore Union.

5659. (Mr. Phelps.) In the tables which are given with regard to your district, I see that the Union of Dore has the highest percentage of pauperism ?—That is so.

5660. Are there any circumstances which explain that ?—The only thing I can say about the Union of Dore is that it is an entirely agricultural district in the middle of Hereford.

5661. Is it in what was called the "Golden Valley" ?—I think not, I never heard it called by that name. It is near Pontrilas.

5662. There are no other special circumstances ?—I noticed that fact the other day in going over the figures, and I was particularly struck with it. I intend to make some inquiries about it. It is entirely an agricultural district, and the wages, of course, are not high.

5663. Take again the case of Bristol : in Bristol the decline of pauperism has been enormous. Has that been due to a rearrangement of the areas, do you think?—If you look at Bristol from another point of view, you will find that, whereas the number of the various classes relieved on the 1st January, 1905, in the whole of England came to 27·6 per 1,000, if you take Bristol for the same period, it is 30·4 per 1,000; that is above the average.

Mr. Edward Bestbridge Wethered.

13 Mar. 1906.

Causes of decreased pauperism at Bristol.

5664. In the figures which Mr. Booth has drawn out, it has gone down from 5·6 per 100 (that is 56 per 1,000) in 1895, to 2·6 per 100 in 1905, that is to say, it has dropped 3 per cent.?—I do not quite understand how that works out. Bristol, taking it per 1,000 is certainly above the average in England.

5665. Do you think there has been a difference from 1895 to 1905?——

5666. (Mr. Booth.) It was the absorption of Barton Regis and a part of Long Ashton that altered the entire structure of the figures; so there is no comparison possible. (Mr. Phelps.) I am directing my question to whether the administration or the character of the population was so different as to explain the difference?—You must understand that the increase of population in Bristol is unprecedented in any city. As I explained yesterday, there have been two extensions of the city within six years.

5667. Have those extensions brought in a class of the population which does not swell the pauper average much, although it swells the population?—It has brought in a large class of people who do not swell the pauperism. My reason for making that observation is that a very large number of small houses have been built out in the direction of Horfield and other parts of Bristol, and also a large number of residental houses over the Downs and that part, which may possibly have some effect upon it.

Children's scattered homes at Bristol.

5668. Would you mind giving a short account of the history of the Bristol scattered homes?—When the Bristol union was formed in 1898, all the children were in the workhouses, and though the guardians did the best for them, the children were confined within the walls, and there was a listlessness about them, they did not enjoy their play like others; there was a dulness about them which was characteristic, though the guardians did their best—I wish to make that perfectly clear. When the union was formed, the guardians at once realised the necessity for getting the children out of the workhouse, and they decided, first of all, upon the scattered home principle. They endeavoured to get houses about Bristol for the children.

5669. They hired houses?—Yes. At first there was a considerable prejudice against them, and the guardians had the greatest difficulty to get landlords to let their houses for the purpose of taking in Poor Law children. They engaged something like fourteen houses as scattered homes for children.

5670. In what positions are those houses?—Not the middle of the city, but in the suburbs.

5671. Have you visited them?—Yes, all of them.

5672. What principles would guide the guardians in choosing a house or a scattered home?—The house has to be sanctioned; I have to report to the Local Government Board upon it.

5673. Are they semi-detached houses?—Not all of them, some of them are semi-detached. The houses originally taken (they are mostly given up now) were not of the best class for the purpose, but they were the only houses the guardians could get. They laboured most diligently, but they could not get them, because of the prejudice that existed. That prejudice has now entirely disappeared.

5674. Do they insist upon a certain area for each child?—So far as the sleeping rooms are concerned, I measured them up, and they take a certain number of children, according to the number of cubic feet.

5675. You insist upon a certain amount?—Yes, it is about 300 cubic feet per child as a minimum.

5676. Do they insist on the street in which the building is situated being of a certain width?—No, but one has to be careful in the selection of the site, that it is a healthy situation.

5677. Who selects the situation?—The guardians first, and then I go and report upon it 5678. You say on the whole there is a great deal of out-door relief given in your district?—The out-door relief in Bristol is £41,000 a year.

Amount of out-relief a Bristol.

5679. You are not in favour of forcing deserving cases into the house?—Certainly not.

5680. Have you any instance in your district of a union in which a determined effort has been made to reduce outdoor relief to very small proportions?—Yes, in the Wheatenhurst Union, but it has not been very successful.

Effect of reduction out-relief.

5681. Have you found that the effect of that is to drive deserving people into the workhouse?—No, I may say that decidedly.

5682. You do not think that what is sometimes called a strict policy has that effect?—No, I am sure it has not had that effect. Wheatenhurst is not the only place In the last few years there has been an improvement in very many of the unions. There is more attention given to the question of outdoor relief than there was, and I say, to the credit of the guardians in my district, that I know of no single case where deserving people have been forced into the workhouse who could have been looked after outside. There may be the case of a deserving person in the workhouse, but that person has not had a friend to look after him or her; then the guardians have exercised their power and said: "You must come into the workhouse infirmary."

5683. Do you think a stricter administration develops other means of support?—I think the people help themselves or their friends help them.

5684. Either they make provision for themselves or their friends help them?—Yes.

5685. Do you think there is any limit to the application of that?—It is very difficult to state a limit to a thing like that.

5686. The outdoor relief might be abolished entirely, and the deserving cases would support themselves or their friends would support them?—If you ask me if I would abolish outdoor relief, I say certainly not.

5687. I would ask if in the future there is any limit to the extent to which strict administration will grant protection to deserving cases? You say that when the administration is strict, people are not brought into the workhouse but other forms of support are developed?—That is so to a great extent.

5688. Do you think there is any limit to that?—Do you mean to say detrimentally?

5689. Supposing that outdoor relief was practically entirely abolished in time, do you think that the deserving cases would be provided for outside the workhouse?—No, I do not think they would. I think that outdoor relief should be given in certain cases to the really deserving.

5690. You think that is permanent?—I think that is permanent.

5691. Have you any experience with regard to non-settled relief?—Yes; of course, I have numbers of cases in my district.

Non-settl relief.

5692. Have you found abuses arising in connection with it?—No, I do not think I have.

5693. Do you find abuses in connection with pay stations?—No, I cannot say that I have.

Pros and cons of re stations.

5694. You would not be prepared to insist that relieving officers should relieve every case at the applicant's home?—I do not think it is absolutely necessary, and it would involve an enormous amount of extra work.

5695. Would it be practicable, do you think, in your district?—Not with the present number of relieving officers. I may say this: I had a very good instance at Bristol the other day, where, as I say, they have divided the better class into what they call Class A; the guardians thought the Class A people would not care to associate with other people less deserving, but the guardians now find that the old people in Class A prefer to go with the others so that they may have a chat, so I am credibly informed.

5696. You have pay stations in the towns?—Yes.

5697. But take a very scattered district?—The relieving officers pay certainly at the pay stations.

5698. Not at a place like Bristol?—Yes.

5699. They do not visit the cases in their homes every week?—Not all of them; they do periodically from time to time. If the case cannot come to the pay station it is the duty of the relieving officer to go to the house of the recipient.

5700. (Mr. Nunn.) Do you think that pay stations might be abolished in town areas?—I think in large towns it would be very difficult. I think there would be a hardship on some of the old people, unless you are prepared to increase the number of relieving officers, and the guardians would very much resent that on account of the cost.

5701. (Mr. Phelps.) Surely it is better that the relieving officer should see the conditions under which the recipient is living constantly?—That is what I am constantly pressing upon the guardians—constant visitation. If the guardians would be prepared for the relieving officers to take the relief to each case it would be better, but they would very much resent that on account of the greater cost. I think I said it would involve a very considerable increase of the staff.

Small holdings at Evesham.

5702. (Mr. Lansbury.) Do you know anything of the process by which the land is transferred from one tenant to another in those small holdings as Evesham?—I am afraid I do not.

5703. Do you know how long the system of small holdings has been in force in that valley?—For a long time; I cannot say exactly how long, but it is some long time anyway.

5704. Can you say whether pauperism has decreased there during the whole of that period?—It was long before I came into the neighbourhood.

5705. How long have you been there?—Ten years.

5706. As a matter of fact it is twenty-five years since it started?—I was going to say I thought it was somewhere about that.

5707. You do not know the acreage, do you?—I have given the acreage.

5708. I mean of the small holdings?—From one to three acres.

5709. Can you give the total?—I could not give that.

Comparison between pauperism at Evesham and Walsall.

5710. Have you compared Mr. Booth's figures at all? Take Evesham, for instance; there you have 19 per cent. under sixteen years of age, and at Walsall, which is singled out as a union which does not look so well as the others, you have 37 per cent. of children. How do you account for the large number of children chargeable at Walsall?—You can hardly compare the two unions, if I might make the suggestion, because one is rural, although it is true it has the town of Evesham, while almost all the other part of the union is urban.

5711. If you take the figures for over sixty years, you will see that Evesham has 60 per cent. and Walsall has only 40 per cent.?—Yes.

5713. What proportion?—That is a matter I should have to get out.

5714. It is rather a serious reflection on Walsall if there is any very large number?—I do not want to make that out. I prefer to say, perhaps, that some of them are illegitimate, if I might correct it to that extent. I do not think that applies to Walsall more than to any other large place. I do not think that Walsall is worse than any other large place.

5715. It has a very large proportion of children; there are only a few others that come anywhere near it. In an industrial place like Walsall you have a large number of children chargeable, and I suggest that these are, in all probability, children of widows, and they become chargeable through the inability of the mother to get work to keep them?—I should like to get definite information before answering that question, but my impression is that the children in Walsall are not the children of widows in a greater proportion than in most other places.

5716. I do not say so either; I want to know whether they are the children of widows?—I am afraid that is a matter I could not answer correctly without getting the actual facts.

Mr. Edward Bestbridge Wethered.

13 Mar. 1906.

Effect of Evesham small holdings on inhabitants.

5717. Has the small holding system in Evesham had a steadying effect upon the incomes of the people who live there?—Certainly with regard to the people who live by the fruit growing it has done so, undoubtedly.

5718. It has generally improved the whole system of living in that district?—I have only known it for ten years, but the standard of living in the Evesham Valley is above that of rural districts generally.

5719. You attribute that to the small holdings system in vogue there?—Certainly.

Adequacy of wages in the district.

5720. You said something about thrift just now. Do you think generally over your district wages are such that people really can provide for themselves?—Over the whole of the district?

5721. Yes; we have been talking quite generally about thrift, and saving, and the rest of it. Quite generally, do you think that wages are such and employment such that the people really can provide for sickness and old age?—I think my answer to that question must be that we have before our eyes the fact that the bulk of the people do.

5722. That is hardly an answer to my question?—Shall I take it more definite? No doubt you must divide the district into the country and into the towns. We know that the wages of the agricultural labourer are not great. At the same time it is very wonderful how those people do manage to keep out of the workhouse, and live with their friends, and not become chargeable. If you come to investigate the cases actually in the workhouse there is generally something wrong about them, the man has been intemperate, or something of that sort, but this is not so in every case.

5723. You are speaking of the people in the workhouse, but in your district the bulk of the relief is outside?—No doubt. As I said before, in really deserving cases when they have come to distress through no fault of their own, the guardians do give out-relief to them.

5724. I take it your criticism is really as to people inside the workhouses, and not so much those who receive relief outside?—I think that the people in the country districts are more thrifty than the people in the towns. I wish to make it very clear that one of our very great sources of pauperism at the present time is the reliance people place upon the out-door relief, rather than applying themselves to thrift.

5725. Is that the same with regard to the rural districts?—Not so much as in the towns; I think they are more thrifty in the rural districts.

Absence of genuinely able-bodied male paupers.

5726. On page 3 of your memorandum, in paragraphs 64, 65, and 66, which deal with able-bodied men, you practically agree that there are no able-bodied men chargeable in the workhouses?—I have given the actual figures here.

5727. There is generally something wrong, the term "able-bodied" means, really, people under 60, does not it?—The term "able-bodied" we get in the official return does mean people under sixty years of age. I think there has been a misunderstanding, so far as the returns are concerned, as to the number in the workhouses. The term "able-bodied" wants a little better definition in the return, I think.

Power of guardians to proceed against fathers of illegitimate children.

5728. Is the point cleared up as to whether the fathers of illegitimate children can be prosecuted?—I am a magistrate myself, and my impression is that the woman is the only person who can actually prosecute. There is not the least doubt about that, I think. The guardians take the initiative in a way, but they cannot do it unless the the woman is perfectly willing. The woman must make the application herself, but the guardians can support her.

5729. (Mr. Nunn.) For that to be so, the children must be under the maintenance of the guardians at the time, and that means that the woman must have made an application to the guardians?—That is so; then the guardians can proceed.

5730. That is what is meant in the Act by the children being chargeable?—Quite so.

5731. (Mr. Lansbury.) Then I may take it that the guardians can prosecute?—Only with the consent of the woman herself, on the application of the woman. The guardians do frequently try, but the woman must take the initiative. The clerk of the guardians frequently works the case up, no doubt, and gets up all the evidence.

Mr. Edward Bestbridge Wethered.

13 Mar. 1906.

Improved nursing in workhouse infirmaries.

5732. You tell us at the bottom of that page that you do not now find cases of bedsores and neglected cases in charge of pauper inmates?—That is so.

5734. Then it is a good thing that Mr. Chaplin issued his circular calling attention to all these things?—Which circular?

5736. It has been improved?—That does not apply to thrifty persons more than to others.

5737. Workhouse infirmaries did need improvement, and they have been considerably improved?—There have been great improvements in the workhouse infirmaries since the Nursing Order of 1897.

5738. That was necessary?—Yes, it was necessary. When I took over this district I found pauper nursing prevailing right through the district, to a very large extent in some cases. I remember seeing a man in a most wretched condition, suffering from terrible bedsores. The nurse knew nothing about it, and she excused herself by saying that she was sixty years of age and had eighty patients to look after.

5739. That is all done away with now?—Absolutely. You do not find cases of that sort now.

Number of paupers who could maintain themselves on old-age pensions.

5740. In regard to the inquiry of the Committee so far as the West Bromwich Workhouse was concerned, was not the result that there were very few people indeed who could go out and live on 5s. or 7s. a week?—There was not one, according to this report.

5741. At West Bromwich they have a large number of people living outside?—Yes.

5742. There is no reason why those should not receive old-age pensions?—If people in the workhouse did get old-age pensions, they are not sufficiently capable for their friends to look after them, or they have no friends.

5743. There are a large number of people in receipt of relief outside the workhouses who would be fit subjects for an old age pension?—They are practically getting it now.

5744. I know, but they are getting it at the cost of disfranchisement and loss of citizenship?—That is not so with regard to the women; they have not a vote yet. So far as the men are concerned, I suppose it does do that, but I do not think they mind it much.

5745. There are a large number of people now who are getting pensions, if you like, through the Poor Law, and they would be eligible under any scheme of old age pensions?—That may be so. I think that would be so.

5746. So the cost of the out-relief might be set against the cost of the pensions?—To some extent that would be so, no doubt.

Type of aged persons receiving out-relief.

5747. Do you think the aged people who are getting out-relief are a decent class generally?—A great many of them are, no doubt. I should not like to say that every case is, by any means.

5748. I mean the average; you could not tell me about every one, of course, but you see a number of these cases, do not you?—I see a great many that come to the relief committees.

Attitude of poor towards out-relief.

5749. Do you think it is so much want of thrift, and so much lowering of the morale of the men and women, that makes them take this out-relief, or is it that they look on it as a right, and as an old-age pension?—There is no doubt there has been a growing tendency to look upon it as a right, and not to exercise thrift because of that right.

5750. And to look upon it as an old-age pension?—They look upon it as a right to get outdoor relief.

5751. Do members of the boards of guardians look upon it in the light of an old-age pension they are giving people as a matter of right?—Not as a matter of right; certainly not. I do not think they do. I never heard them express anything about an old-age pension, but it is tantamount to that. I do not want to split straws. If you have a deserving case coming before you, and you do not order the workhouse, and are giving out-relief continually, it is a pension, no doubt. If you ask me that question, I think giving it through the poor law is a great protection against abuse.

Increased out-relief at Bristol with reduced pauperism.

5752. You call attention to the great increase in the number of out-relief paupers in the union of Walsall, but Mr. Phelps called your attention to the figures for Bristol. The rule has not held at Bristol, has it, that out-relief puts the other figures up? You have had a decrease of 3 per cent. there, and yet out-relief is 6,594 as against 2,777 indoor?—Yes. When you say it has not held, the Bristol guardians are in a very unsatisfactory position, as I explained yesterday; they have not sufficient workhouse accommodation to meet the requirements of the union.

Disciplinary checks on abuse of leave of absence from workhouses.

5754. With regard to the people who go out and get drunk, is it not possible under the present arrangements to deal with those?—In what direction do you mean?

5755. Has not the master power to stop leave and tobacco?—He stops tobacco, and he can stop leave; but a pauper can take his discharge. The master can refuse to give leave, but he cannot prevent the man taking his discharge after giving due notice.

5756. Do many of these old people when they go out take their discharge?—They do; if they cannot get leave they take their discharge, and go out for the day and come back at night.

5757. Would that be so in a considerable number of cases?—In a good many cases. It is a thing which masters of workhouses frequently complain to me about.

5758. From the bulk of the people he has power to withhold leave?—He has power to withhold leave, of course; if I am a pauper, and make application to you, as a master, you can give me leave to go outside, but if you refuse I can apply to the guardians.

5759. Do they give them tobacco in your district?—Very frequently.

5760. They can stop the tobacco?—They do, very often.

5761. There are other means of pulling people up?—Where you have a man addicted to drunkenness, as these people frequently are, the stopping of tobacco will not prevent it.

5762. We know that applies with regard to a number of people?—Yes; it does not apply to paupers only, but to a great many others, I am sorry to say.

Service Boys' Home at Bristol: Relief in aid of wages of boys learning trades.

5763. Could you tell us what the Service Boys' Home at Bristol really is?—The guardians felt that a good many of the boys going outside the workhouse would simply add to the number of the unskilled labourer type; therefore their idea was that, for the boys whom they adopted, the orphan boys, they should find a home for them for the first few years of their going out to work, so that they might be brought up in a trade. The wages they get in the first few years are not sufficient to keep them; therefore the guardians started a home which these boys might come to; and they contribute out of their earnings as they are able to do, according to the scale laid down in my memorandum. When they earn sufficient wages to live on their own earnings, they go out from the home and make room for others. I think it is a most admirable thing.

5764. You think that has worked well?—It is working extremely well.

5765. You would like to see it extended?—I should like to see it extended. I was there a fortnight ago, and I was extremely pleased with the general tone of the boys.

5766. To what age would you keep the oversight of the lads?—It depends pretty much on the age the boy comes into the home. The oldest boy they had the other day was between seventeen and eighteen, I think.

5767. Is there any fixed time?—I should have to look that up to give an answer.

5768. It would be eighteen, I suppose?—A boy, if he likes, can take his discharge after the age of eighteen.

5769. Not if he is adopted?—I think eighteen is the age. That is the maximum age for detention.

Relief to children, sick, and aged not deterrent.

5770. We heard something yesterday about the condition of the paupers being less eligible than that of the independent labourer outside. With reference to the children, we are not able to carry that out, are we?—No.

5771. Neither are we with regard to the sick?—No.

5772. Nor with the old people?—In what way do you mean, less eligible?

5773. I mean in their surroundings, the food they have, the beds they sleep in, the clothes they wear, and their general conditions?—You mean able-bodied people?

5774. The able-bodied people I am leaving out altogether. I am thinking of children, sick people, and aged and infirm people. What I am asking you is, are the conditions under the Poor Law in your district less eligible than those of the independent labourer outside?—You mean, more consideration and better treatment?

5775. I mean they have a better time?—I think very many who come into the workhouse certainly do have a better time. It is much cleaner, and many of them get better clothing and less crowding.

5776. And that is so with regard to children especially?—It entirely depends on where the children have come from. The children of some widows may have had very comfortable homes before they came into the workhouse, but, on the other hand, you have children who have been absolutely neglected, and things are very much better for them. As I said in my evidence, I do not think the Dictary Order of 1900 has encouraged people into the workhouse by reason of the better dietary. May I turn to the table where I give the nursing returns, on page 4 of my Memorandum, because there is one matter which has escaped notice, which I would like to call attention to with regard to that. The Dietary Order was dated 1900, therefore the first experience of it was during 1901. If you will look at those figures you will see that for 1900 the number of pauper attendants in the infirmaries came to 315; from that time it gradually decreased until now it has come down to 175. There has been a gradual diminution ever since. It may be a matter of accident that it occurred immediately after the introduction of the Dietary Order, but I do not think it is. I think it should be ascribed very much to the fact that there is very much less beer given now than there used to be.

Effect of Dietary Order in reducing number of pauper attendants.

5777. You do not think these improvements have merely set up amongst the people a great desire to throw themselves upon the Poor Law?—No, I may say that if you get the cleanly, well-administered workhouse (people may call it a palace or whatever they like), where the bathing can be carried out properly, where the people can be put to work, where you have general cleanliness, which is a great point with this class of people, the workhouse does not attract. I have been much struck in regard to the new infirmaries that some of the people say they prefer the old to the new because of the general order and cleanliness of the thing generally in the new ones.

Unattractiveness of modern Poor Law institutions to certain classes of poor.

5778. (Dr. Downes.) In paragraph 140 of your Memorandum you favour the extension of the power to detain phthisical patients as a condition of their treatment by the guardians. Should you favour extended powers of detention to other classes of the indoor poor?—Yes. I think I should, decidedly—to those who go out for a day's leave or take their discharge and come back the worse for drink in the manner I have mentioned.

Need or increased power to detain various classes of paupers.

5779. Those of the inebriate class?—Yes.

5780. What do you say to the case of those who are often inebriate, the so-called in-and-out class?—I think that there might be power for longer detention than they have; at the present time that causes an immense amount of inconvenience. The in-and-out class is very much associated with the class you have just referred to.

5781. Taking the case of old people who cannot be looked after outside, or are living under bad conditions, have you any views with regard to extending the power to remove those people to the workhouse?—I quite agree it would be a very good thing if guardians had the power in cases of that sort, or if the magistrate, or some other authority, had the power to order cases of that sort into the workhouse; because the guardians do find cases of sick people, who refuse to come into the workhouse, living under the most horrible conditions. The only thing the guardians can do is to drop the out-relief altogether, which is a very hard thing to do, and they do not like to take the responsibility. There are many cases where the guardians would much prefer to have the cases removed to the infirmary rather than let the cases stay in their own surroundings.

Out-relief to phthisical patients

5782. Is much out-relief given to phthisical patients in your district?—There is a good deal given to phthisical patients. The general position is that the patient very often does not apply for out-door relief until the disease has got a considerable hold upon the person, and the disease keeps on increasing until the patient comes into the workhouse infirmary to die.

5783. And the patient may be living under conditions prejudicial to others?—It is very often the case. One is constantly struck with cases of phthisical people living in small rooms with children; and the guardians begin to realise the importance of it, they do their best to obviate it, and they sometimes say, "We can only give out-relief on condition that you sleep in a separate room, away from the rest of your family."

Co-operation of Guardians with nursing societies.

5784. What arrangements do the guardians generally make in your district with regard to nursing the outdoor sick?—In some cases they have arranged with local nursing societies, but not in many cases.

5785. That would perhaps be rather in the towns?—Yes, it is in the towns more especially.

Medical loan relief at Cirencester.

5786. Turning to Cirencester, I take it that their method of granting medical relief is quite a new one?—Quite; it has just come into operation.

5787. Do they propose to give it on loan in every case?—On loan in most cases, in the first instance.

5788. Have they any permanent list at Cirencester?—They have their regular call over; many of them are permanent.

5789. There is a class of case that the medical officer attends for a considerable period of time, without a new order being given?—Yes.

5790. That is provided for in the Consolidated Order and is known as the permanent class?—It is not the intention of the Guardians to grant medical relief on loan to these permanent cases.

Attendance of district medical officers at relief committees.

5791. Do any of your boards of guardians require the district medical officer to attend their meetings when they are revising their cases?—No, that is not the practice generally. Sometimes the medical officer attends, but I think I may say it is not the practice generally. If any case arises which raises doubts in the minds of the guardians, they very often ask the medical officer to report upon it.

Provision of drugs.

5792. Do the guardians find drugs in any of your unions?—In some two or three they do.

5793. Do they find all the drugs?—All the drugs in two or three unions.

Working of Relief to School Children Order at Bristol, &c.

5794. I suppose certain expensive drugs they find universally?—Yes.

5795. Have you had any experience under the Feeding of Children Order?—Yes, I have got facts up to the end of last year with regard to it, and the facts are these, as far as I can remember, speaking from memory. Up to the end of the year only fourteen cases of necessitous children were treated under the Order throughout the whole of my district, and, of the fourteen, twelve were at Bristol. I do not mean to say that at Bristol there was not a number of applications made. There was a considerable number of applications. I think there were seventy-four cases in the first instance and fifty-five cases came afterwards; up to the week before last no case has been received since January; but of the whole cases investigated in Bristol, referred to the guardians from the education authority, after investigation only twelve were found to be necessitous. I do not want to cast any reflection whatever on the education authority, because they have not the power of investigating the cases. I very well remember the first instance that occurred. I happened to be present at the meeting of the guardians when the first application under the Order came up, and, although I cannot perhaps give the actual words, the conversation was to this effect. The man advanced to the table and said, "I do not know why I am called before you, gentlemen; I have always been a very respectable man, and I call it a great insult to send the relieving officer to my house and say that my child is not properly fed; it is always properly fed." I said, "How is it, then, that your child came to be reported as a necessitous child under the Order?" He said, "My child went to school, and the schoolmistress said, 'All you children who want more food hold up your hands,' and that is how my child came to be reported." It is only fair to say that I have not heard the schoolmistress's version. Out of the seventy-four applications made, only one was found to be necessitous. Of course the school authorities have not power to investigate. I do not know whether I am going out of my province in giving my own ideas about it, but I think if the school authorities are to give the food to the children it should be by payment, and if there are any cases in which, in the opinion of the school authorities, the parents cannot afford to pay, I think that payment should be made through the guardians, because one cannot help feeling that the feeding of children, however necessary it may be, without any payment from the parents themselves, is a form of out-door relief, and I consider that all outdoor relief should come from one authority. If you have more than one authority, you will have various influences at work, and it will be very detrimental.

Mr. Edward Bestbridge Wethered.

13 Mar. 1906.

5796. (Mr. Nunn.) You said that the proportion was 1 in 74 at one board of guardians?—I speak from memory, but I believe the number was seventy-four on the first application.

5797. Have you the total number corresponding to the figure of twelve?—Yes, 129.

5798. Did the guardians prosecute the parents in those twelve cases?—I have no information on that point. It is very difficult to prosecute them in the County Court and recover the money; it is a costly business.

5799. I am anxious to hear how such prosecutions turned out?—I hope to get information on the point.

5800. (Mr. Bentham.) There are some prosecutions on record, are there not?—I have not heard of any, but there may be.

Cases sent by Hospitals to Poor Law nfirmaries.

5801. (Dr. Downes.) In paragraph 80 of your memorandum you refer to the fact that the public hospitals now send cases to the workhouse infirmaries, which, in former days, would have been retained?—That is so.

5802. Have you any separate infirmaries in your district?—No.

5803. Do those hospitals send the cases to the infirmaries of the unions in which the hospitals are situated?—Yes.

5804. Although the cases may have come from some other part of the district?—No; I think most of the cases I have come across are cases which would come within the union.

5805. They are chargeable to the union?—Yes, I think so.

5806. In what way are they admitted?—An application is made to the relieving officer.

Burial insurance of paupers.

5807. Have you any experience of the practice of insuring paupers for burial?—Yes; a great deal of that goes on in some parts of Staffordshire.

5808. Is Stoke in your district?—No.

5809. It is in Mr. Dansey's district, is it not?—I think so.

5810. Have you any facts that you could give us with regard to that?—No; I have only my own observation of the cases. You will find a good many cases at Wolverhampton, for instance. The Wolverhampton medical officer called my attention to it there.

5811. (Mr. Bentham.) Do you mean they are insured by the relatives or by the guardians?—By the relatives.

5812. (Dr. Downes.) Have you any information as to whether the practice of burial by friends in the case of a person dying in a Poor Law institution is increasing? I have no information on the point. I have no reason to suppose it is increasing.

5813. Nor as to the reverse?—No, I have not.

Suitability of Evesham for small holdings.

5814. With reference to the condition of things at Evesham, the Evesham valley, I think, is exceptionally favourable for small holdings of that description?—Yes; it is protected; the climate is suitable for the growth entirely.

5815. (Mr. Lansbury.) For fruit-growing small holdings?—Yes.

5816. It is not more suitable for other kinds of culture; the special thing at Evesham is fruit, is not it?—That is so, and vegetables.

5817. (Dr. Downes.) I will put it in that form if you like. I take it you mean it is specially suitable for the kind of culture which is carried on at Evesham?—Yes.

5818. It is market gardening and fruit growing?—Yes. If you take the Cotswold Hills, you could not have the same sort of thing going on up there because the soil is not suitable, nor would the climate be suitable for it.

5819. (Mr. Lansbury.) It means you could not grow the same kind of crop there, does it not?—It does.

5820. (Dr. Downes.) Have you any experience that you could give us as to the relation of wages to the manner of the administration of relief in any of the unions in your district?—In what way do you mean?

Out-relief in aid of wages.

5821. Could you tell us whether you find that a strict administration of outdoor relief, as compared with a lax administration of outdoor relief, has had any effect, in your experience, upon the wages of that district?—No, I cannot say that. I have come across and called attention to cases where out-door relief has been given and the recipient has been in employment outside, which I think has operated in lesser wages being given than otherwise would be the case. I have had to call attention to that in some cases.

Complaints of workhouse inmates to inspectors.

5822. In going round the workhouses, do you from time to time have complaints made to you by the inmates?—Very frequently.

5823. What do they chiefly relate to?—They are so very various. Sometimes it is that some of the inmates quarrel with some of the rest of the inmates; sometimes they are complaints against the officials. Sometimes they are complaints that they are overworked. In the case of the new workhouse at Wolverhampton, I found, when they removed from the old workhouse to the new, that they complained bitterly. One fellow over six feet high said he would sooner go to gaol than stop there and work. Sometimes it is with regard to their feeding; sometimes about the general arrangements of the house, and so forth; sometimes quarrels amongst themselves, and sometimes against the alleged treatment by officials. I am bound to say, in the cases I have investigated (and I investigate every case where there are any bona fides about it) with regard to the officials, I have very seldom found the complaints at all substantiated. I may say this: that my principle is that, when I inspect a workhouse and am going round, I require all the officials to leave the dormitories or the room I am in when I ask the question whether there are any complaints to be made, so that every inmate has an absolute opportunity of making a complaint. It is only right, when a complaint is made against an official, that the official should know that a complaint has been made. It requires great discretion, and one must exercise discretion accordingly with regard to it.

5824. Do you get many complaints with regard to classification ?—I do get complaints, but not to the extent that one would expect. I find that the inmates have a knack of classifying themselves very much. In some of the smaller workhouses I have complaints where the day rooms are very crowded. One or two may complain about the associations, but not to the extent that one would expect.

Charities at Bristol and elsewhere.

5825. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) I believe there are very large endowed charities in Bristol, are there not ?—I believe there are.

5826. Do they co-operate at all with the guardians ?—I am not aware of any actual co-operation.

5827. The guardians would not send any especially good case up to them ?—I can hardly answer the question, because I do not attend the meetings very frequently. I have no personal knowledge of it.

5828. Are there other places in your district with very large charities ?—There are charities, of course, in Gloucester and Cheltenham. I am a churchwarden of the Parish Church at Cheltenham, and I have to dispense charities there once a year.

5829. The charities in Bristol would be quite enough to meet all the aged deserving cases, if they applied to them ?—I cannot say that. I could not say what the amount would be.

5830. It may be worth inquiring into ?—There is a Charity Organisation Society which works very diligently in Bristol.

Women wage earners and relief to them at Bristol and elsewhere.

5831. Is there chain making in your district ?—Yes; very much so in Wolverhampton and Dudley.

5832. That employs a great number of women ?—I am not conversant with the actual details of it.

5833. You cannot tell me whether they work there for very low wages, or whether they are in receipt of out-relief ?—A person working at the chain works would not be in the receipt of out-relief. A person would be strictly able-bodied if they did that kind of work.

5834. But very often able-bodied women are in receipt of relief. Is the straw-plaiting industry in your district?—I think not to any great extent.

5835. Can you tell me of any other women's industry ?—If you take Bristol, there are the large tobacco works there, and Fry's chocolate works, and then there is a great deal of dressmaking and millinery, bootmaking. There the paper-bag making, and so on. There are also women's industries in other parts of the district.

5836. You do not know whether the guardians are in the habit, in your district, of supplementing women's earnings ?—They do in certain cases. I have known cases of that sort; as I said just now, I have had to call attention sometimes to the fact that the guardians are sometimes really supplementing wages, but I cannot say that this is to any great extent.

5837. In the slack season, if women are out of work, would they give them relief ?—If the guardians had the case of a young woman come before them, and they were very satisfied with her case, they would do the best they could for her in the way of giving relief in kind, perhaps they would not desire to force a respectable person into the workhouse. You may take it generally that the guardians do not desire to force them into workhouses to make them paupers.

5838. They do not think that the employer ought to pay her enough to keep her all the year round ?—No, they could not do that. Do you mean when there is no work going on ?

5839. That they should pay her sufficient wages during the busy season to keep her in the slack season ?—That would be a case of supply and demand; I am afraid the guardians have no voice in the matter.

5840. I am afraid it is a question of Poor Law relief, myself ?—I have no definite information on that point 5841. Do any of your unions use Case Papers ?—No, they have not adopted that system.

Causes of unemployment of men over 50.

5842. (Mr. Chandler). In paragraph 82, as a result of your inquiries from guardians and employers of labour and relieving officers, you are able to state some very definite reasons which, in your opinion, account for the older men being more frequently cast upon the rates through want of employment ?—Yes. I think I said yesterday, with regard to that, that I had ascertained from the relieving officers that if a man over fifty years of age once lost his situation by reason of incapacity for work or intemperance, it was exceedingly difficult for him to find work again. When I go to the workhouses (and this is especially so in Staffordshire) I hear complaints from the inmates, and when I ask them as to the reason why they are there, they do say they are there because of the Employers' Liability Act; but it is fair to say that when one comes to question them, it is generally through some fault of their own.

5843. In paragraph 83 you state a very different cause as to why men over fifty years of age are out of employment, namely, that some will not work under a certain wage ?—Yes.

5844. Is that opinion also the result of inquiries on your part from employers of labour ?—It is from statements to me by the men themselves.

5845. Would they be agricultural labourers ?—No. For instance, the particular case I have mentioned there was a miner; another case that I came across was that of a vermin-trap maker; and so on.

5846. It is an opinion you have formed from casual remarks and statements made to you by men who come under your eye ?—Yes. I do not say it is the case, to any great extent; but it is a thing one has to meet occasionally.

5847. The amount in this case, £1 a week, would probably be less than miners receive ?—Probably. In certain mines a cutter or hewer of coal would get more than that; but a young man driving on the roads, horses, and so on, would get less than that. It would be below the average, generally.

Effect of Workmen's Compensation Act.

5848. (Mrs. Webb.) With regard to the Workmen's Compensation Act I notice the discrepancy between your figures and Mr. Booth's arises from the question of cost and numbers; you, under the increase of pauperism, consider the cost of pauperism ?—Yes.

5849. And Mr. Booth considers the number of paupers ?—Yes.

5850. What I meant when I asked you whether the Workmen's Compensation Act had actually increased the number of paupers was, that I see by consulting Mr. Booth's figures, which deal with numbers and not with cost, that those unions in which pauperism has most increased happen to be the unions outside the Workmen's Compensation Act; that five out of seven are agricultural and shipping, and only two are manufacturing and mining; and that even in Walsall, which is one of those which have increased, I think a good deal of the employment is outside the Workmen's Compensation Act, because it is in workshops and not in factories ?—Very likely, it may be so; I am not prepared to say it is not so. I simply mention the fact, which is a very important fact, that these statements have been made to me, and no doubt it is true, as I find from the relieving officers and employers of labour as well, that if a man loses the capacity for work or loses his character when he is over fifty years of age, it is difficult to get on again; but if the man is a diligent and reliable man, it is only right to say that the employers, whoever they are, keep him on as long as they can.

Reluctance of Guardians to provide new buildings.

5851. (Sir Samuel Provis.) You have had a good deal of experience in your district with regard to buildings ?—A certain amount.

5852. Have you found the guardians at all inclined to excessive expenditure in relation to buildings ?—No, I have found quite the contrary, I find the guardians are exceedingly reluctant to go into expense with regard to buildings.

5853. Consequently, when you yourself thought an additional building was required, you have had to exercise a good deal of persuasion with the guardians to secure its being provided ?—That is so.

Out-relief unions, their formation and effect.

5854. I do not think it is quite clear to the Commission what is the precise position of out-relief unions. They have been formed, have they not, by county councils under Section 58 of the Local Government Act, 1888, and Section 36 (b) of the Local Government Act, 1894 ?—They are.

Mr. Edward Bestbridge Wethered.

13 Mar. 1906.

5855. Taking your particular case, the Keynsham Union was divided into two out-relief unions, was it not, by a joint committee of the county councils of Gloucester and Somerset?—I believe that was so.

5856. The object being to get each portion of the union which was in the particular county made a separate union for out-door relief purposes?—It was before my time; I think that very likely was the case, but I cannot say definitely.

5857. If you look at Section 58 of the Act of 1888, you will see it contemplates that the part of the union in a particular county shall be formed into a separate union?—That is so.

5858. The two out-relief unions being, as it were, combined to form a joint union for the purposes of management of the workhouse and any other matters for which it is essential they should be one; such, for instance, as assessment?—That is so. That was confirmed by an order afterwards, I think.

5859. It required confirmation by the Local Government Board, but they were bound to confirm it unless there was objection raised to it?—Quite so.

5860. You are not very favourable, I gather, from what you said yesterday, to out-relief unions?—I am not.

5861. Would you a little expand your objection to them?—My criticism on that point is chiefly that in this case there are three clerks engaged to this one union, and it is difficult to get returns and information from it, not because they are unwilling, but because of the complication of having to go through the clerk of the guardians, as well as to get the information from the out-relief unions. I do not think the administration has suffered in any way: there is no evidence that it has.

5862. Does it make any difference in the administration?—I have no evidence that it does. The county interests are not always identical in the two counties.

5863. For the purpose of outdoor relief it would not make much difference?—I do not think so.

Separate provision for sane epileptics.

5864. In paragraph 30 of your memorandum you deal with sane epileptics. You say it is unfortunate that they are often mixed up with other inmates. Have you any proposal as to what you would do with those cases? Would you take them out of the workhouse altogether, or what would you do with them?—I should not remove them from the care of the guardians; but I think the proper thing to do is to have a combination of unions to treat them separately, similar to what is proposed at Aston and Birmingham. That is not in my own district, but during my colleague's illness I had to do with that matter, as you will remember.

5865. So that your plan would be to have a voluntary combination between the guardians?—Yes.

5866. And put up one colony for these cases?—Yes. I am sure association with the other imbeciles has a very bad effect upon them.

Retention of imbeciles in workhouse.

5867. Would your theory with regard to imbeciles be that it is better they should be taken out of the workhouse, or are you, on the whole, in favour of their remaining?—I think there is this to be said about it: no doubt there are a certain class of imbeciles, of the very worst type, that perhaps might be better out; but, taking the capable imbeciles in the workhouses, my impression is that they are very happy: they are the happiest class of inmates of the workhouses, and they are extremely useful in doing the work. I do not know what some of the smaller workhouses would do if it were not for the capable weak-minded inmates. They are very happy; they work; and they do not seem to me to interfere with the comfort of the other inmates.

Suitability of existing Poor Law areas.

5868. Are the unions generally, in your own district, of the proper size, or do you think they are too small and their area might with advantage be extended?—I have one case in my mind where I think the union might be done away with; but it is hardly fair to mention it, perhaps. I would say this: that there is an idea about, I know, that people would be better in bigger workhouses and fewer of them; but I would like to say decidedly that my impression is that in country districts the people are very much happier in smaller workhouses than in larger ones. They are not accustomed to being with a large number of people, and they are more happy and contented in smaller workhouses than they would be in going a long distance away, and being with a larger number of people.

5869. The chairman of one of the boards of guardians in your district has suggested to the Commission that there should be larger areas, and one has proposed that the county council should administer the Poor Law?—I think a county council has quite enough to attend to at the present time.

5870. Even apart from that, would you think it desirable, in the interests of the poor themselves, that there should be so large an area as a county as the unit of administration for Poor Law purposes?—If you were going to begin de novo that point would be worth consideration, but considering you have the workhouses built and the unions laid out, I question whether it would be desirable to so revolutionise matters as to begin on that principle. If you began de novo, as I say, that would be a different thing altogether.

Infrequency of medical loan relief.

5871. You have told us about the medical relief in the Cirencester Union; have you any other case in your district where medical relief is given by loan?—No, that is the only one.

Detention of bibulous inmates.

5872. In paragraph 122 you state some difficulty about the inmates going out and getting intoxicated. Do you think guardians require generally greater powers of detention in workhouses than they have now?—Yes, I think so, with that class of inmate.

5873. Would you give a powers of detention which would depend on behaviour; is that your view?—Yes, I think I would leave it to the discretion of the guardians.

5874. Within certain limits?—Yes. The habitually drunken class, no doubt, would be much better in inebriate homes, away from other inmates; but it is better not to multiply institutions if it can be avoided.

Visitation of children boarded out within and without the Union.

5875. In paragraph 130 you deal with cases boarded out within the union. Where the guardians have children boarded out in the union, is there any committee that visits them; a committee of the guardians, not a boarding-out committee?—Sometimes. Sometimes it is only done by the relieving officers.

5876. The relieving officer visits once a quarter?—Yes.

5877. And the medical officer visits how often?—He must go once a quarter, and oftener if necessary. He reports once a quarter.

5878. So that these children are visited at the present time?—Yes, they are.

5879. They are in a different position, are they not, from children boarded out outside the union, because when they are boarded out outside the union, the guardians themselves or their officers cannot visit them?—That is quite right.

5880. Therefore it is, is it not, that they have been placed under Government inspection, or rather that the committees have been placed under Government inspection?—Yes.

5881. So that it shall be ascertained that the work is properly done?—That is so.

5882. In paragraph 137 you refer to the Bath case, where there is special provision made for cases of tuberculosis?—Yes.

Special provision for phthisical cases.

5883. Has the fact that such provision has been made proved at all attractive in the way of cases of tuberculosis being admitted which otherwise would not have been the subject of application for relief?—I think there has been less reluctance to go there, as far as I can judge.

5884. You would not carry it further than that?—I cannot carry it further than that. I have spoken to the people who are being treated, and, no doubt, if some of those people had not been there, they would have been in their homes in Bath, or in the union, and spreading the disease; and they expressed themselves as quite content there. As soon as the disease is arrested, there is a tendency to discharge themselves; they think when it is arrested it is cured; but it is a totally different thing altogether.

Exercise of Overseers' power to give relief.

5885. Have there been any cases within your knowledge in your district where overseers have given relief?—Very few.

5886. Is it the case that it is very rarely done nowadays?—It is very rarely done.

5887. Even in rural districts, if the overseer ceased to have power to give relief, would any ill results arise?—I do not think they would.

5888. You think the relieving officer is sufficiently near at hand to prevent danger arising in cases of sudden and urgent necessity?—What I go on is the fact that it is so seldom exercised. It is exercised occasionally, and I do not think their having the power does any harm.

Number of unmarried inmates in workhouses and reasons therefor.

I think it is sometimes useful, undoubtedly, but it is so seldom exercised that I do not know that any very great amount of suffering would arise from its ceasing. There is one point which has not been mentioned in my examination I should like to refer to. I have statistics here which I think are important as bearing on the question of pauperism, and that is the number of unmarried people in workhouses. I have given the figures in my memorandum, and they are very striking. If you come to take inmates of the workhouses, you find a large proportion of the men are single. A considerable number are widowers, but a still larger proportion have never married at all. This is a fact which is I think worthy of being taken into consideration.

5889. (Chairman). And the women?—Yes, but not to such an extent as the men.

5890. I think you rather infer, do not you, that a union of two tends to keep each longer out of the workhouse than if they were alone?—I do not say that marriage is an antidote to pauperism; I do not suggest that for a moment, but I simply mention the fact, which is the fact I have stated here, and I think it is a fact which ought to be considered.

5891. (Mrs. Bosanquet). Is this information based on the statements of the men alone?—The statements are known to be correct.

5892. How were they known to be correct?—The relieving officers know most about the cases, and the masters as well.

5893. I know in common lodging-houses and shelters the men are always single, according to their own statement, but it simply means they have deserted their wives?—I do not think I am mistaken about this, because I have gone into it so very carefully.

5894. (Mr. Nunn). Are these figures exhaustive of the adults in the workhouses in question?—The figures I have given here are typical.

5895. For each workhouse are they exhaustive?—For the ones mentioned they give all.

5896. There are no deserted wives in any of these workhouses?—I do not say that.

5897. You have not brought out that figure?—No, I wish I had; I will bear that in mind.

5899. To a certain extent he gets more companionship inside than outside?—He does not go into the workhouse willingly; he goes in because the guardians will not give him outdoor relief.

5900. He would feel it less; he would go in, I fancy, more readily?—I do not know; he does not like going in.

5901. These single men?—They are not as a rule deserving men. They are men whose characters will not generally bear investigation; if they are, they are persons who have no friends outside, no grown up family who can look after them, and they are not able to look after themselves.

5902. (Mr. Booth). Do the figures for married men and women refer to couples?—They are not all couples.

5903. They are men and women taken together?—Yes.

Paupers' burial insurance by relatives.

5904. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) Some of those would be the deserted wives?—Yes, some of those would be.

5905. (Chairman.) What is the object of a family insuring the life of a pauper in the workhouse?—The alleged object is to find means of burial. Whether there is another motive I do not know, and I am not prepared to say.

5906. Do you know if the insurance exceeds the cost of burial?—It entirely depends on the cost of burial. What one so often finds in cases of this sort is, that the widow whose husband is insured spends the greater portion of what she receives over the funeral and black clothes. I know many cases of it.

5907. The relative pays the premiums?—The man may have insured his own life.

5908. How can a pauper pay?—He may have been insured before he came in.

5909. And the family pays afterwards?—Yes, they keep it up.

5910. There are no cases of relatives taking out a policy on the life of a man after he has gone into the workhouse?—I have heard of cases of that sort; my attention has been drawn to them. A medical officer once called my attention to cases, where the relatives came to him and asked him to fill up the paper.

5911. The inference would be that if the relatives could pay the premiums on the pauper's life they could assist the pauper?—That is quite a proper deduction to draw from it.

5912. (Mr. Nunn). The premium would be a very small sum weekly?—Yes.

Mr. Richard Ingram Dansey, called; and Examined.

Extent and character of district.

5913. (Chairman.) You are a general inspector under the Local Government Board, and I believe your district, which comprises forty-one unions, embraces the counties of Salop and Chester, North Staffordshire, the unions of Leominster, Weobley, and Kington in Herefordshire, Tenbury in Worcestershire, and Ashbourne in Derbyshire?—Yes.

5914. I have your memorandum, which we will take as your evidence-in-chief; but I propose to direct your attention to one or two points in it. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XII.) Your district is, in the main, agricultural, but it contains also, does it not, semi-urban and some industrial districts?—It is nearly all rural, except in the Staffordshire pottery district and one or two towns like Birkenhead.

Pauperism in Atcham union.

5915. I see there is a very great difference in the proportions of pauperism in the different unions. You yourself in your memorandum call attention to the administration of Atcham; I believe Sir Baldwyn Leighton a great many years ago applied very strict rules of administration to that union?—He did.

5916. And that policy has been continued, I understand?—Not quite so strictly, I think, in later years.

5917. But the result, tested by the amount of relief given, is satisfactory, is it not?—I think, as regards the pauperism in the district, it is fairly satisfactory, and also as regards the cost per head of population.

Comparison of conditions in unions with highest and lowest rate of pauperism in the district.

5918. Mr. Booth has kindly supplied the Commission with an analysis of the proportions of pauperism to population in every one of the unions in your district. If you will look at his list you will see that the three highest unions, namely, Kington, Stafford and Madeley, have a ratio of pauperism of 3·7, 3·4 and 3·3 respectively. Then, if you go to the bottom of the list, you will see that the three lowest unions are Oleobury Mortimer which is 1·4, Atcham which is also 1·4, and Bucklow which is 1·2. Looking at these three unions at the top and these three unions at the bottom of Mr. Booth's list, I find there is in each class one apparently urban district, namely, Madeley and Bucklow: you would call them urban districts, would you not?—Bucklow is partly urban and partly rural; there is a good deal of rural in Bucklow.

5919. Stafford and Atcham are semi-rural, are they not?—Except for the town of Stafford and the town of Shrewsbury, they are entirely rural.

5920. So they would counterbalance one another for the purpose of comparison?—Yes.

Mr. Richard Ingram Dansey.

13 Mar. 1906.

5921. Then Kington is a rural union as against Cleobury Mortimer?—Yes.

5922. You, therefore, have six unions, two typical of rural districts, two typical of semi-rural districts, and two typical of urban districts, and yet the pauperism in one group of three is twice, if not three times, as great as it is in the other group of three. Could you suggest any industrial conditions which exist in either group which would explain this enormous difference or do you attribute it to administration?—The Kington union comprises a great many parishes in Radnorshire, and a large area of those parishes consists of moorland and very poor land; so that a relieving officer's district there has to be very wide, and the relief has not been administered in that union on very strict rules till lately. In the Kington union the guardians have now adopted a set of by-laws for their guidance, and the relief has been going down.

5923. Taking the two rural unions, and contrasting Kington and Cleobury Mortimer, I gather from your answer that the difference is due mainly to administration?—Yes. The Cleobury union was always administered on strict principles. They had an excellent chairman there for a good many years—Mr. Baldwyn Childe, who was vicar of Cleobury. Under his guidance the pauperism was very greatly reduced. The guardians have always acted very much upon the same lines since.

5924. Is there anything, so far as you know, from an industrial point of view or an agricultural point of view, to justify the remarkable difference between the amount of pauperism in these two unions?—Nothing, except in the administration. The area of Kington is a great deal larger than the area of Cleobury Mortimer. The area of Cleobury Mortimer is 52,729 acres, and there is one relieving officer for the union, while the area of one relieving officer's district in Kington is 65,533 acres, mostly hill land, and it would be more difficult for him to visit the paupers and see how they are going on, and to judge of the varying circumstances of each case.

5925. I understood you to say that part of the Kington union was in Radnorshire; in the rural districts of Wales, outdoor relief prevails to a considerable extent, does it not?—I believe it does.

5926. Coming back to my question, there is nothing that you can suggest to explain away this remarkable difference, except administration, is there?—I am not aware of anything.

5927. Then we will next take the semi-rural unions of Atcham and Stafford; Atcham includes Shrewsbury, and Stafford includes the town of Stafford, I think?—Yes.

5928. The conditions in each would rather resemble one another, would they not?—Shoemaking is the principal trade in Stafford, and that has been certainly not good; I may say it has been bad, for a considerable number of years. In the town of Shrewsbury there is no staple trade; it is purely an agricultural town. You will find also as regards relief districts, that in Stafford there is only one relieving officer for the whole of the union, and he has somewhere near 400 cases on his books; while in Atcham the districts are small and the relieving officers, instead of having hundreds of cases, only have somewhere under thirty.

5929. You mean each relieving officer in that case?—Yes, I think you will find it so. I have got the particulars of the relief districts here, and I see that in Stafford the relieving officer had, at the end of the year, 385 cases on his books.

5930. (Mr. Phelps.) By cases do you mean families, not individuals?—He had 653 individuals on his books and 385 cases; the area of his district was 52,634 acres and the population 31,302. There is only one relieving officer for that union. In Atcham there are three relieving officers, and the highest number of cases in any district there was twenty-nine; two officers had twenty-nine cases each and the third had twenty-six cases. The areas were large. One relieving officer had an area of 64,900 acres, another 53,194 acres, and the third, whose district comprised Shrewsbury town, had 8,366 acres; the population was in one case 10,321, in another case 8,722, and in the district of Shrewsbury town 30,397, but even in that district with a population of 30,000 odd the relieving officer had only twenty-nine cases on his books.

5931. (Chairman.) Are the boards of guardians in these two unions comprised of about the same number of guardians, or is there a larger board in the one as compared with the other?—The number of guardians is somewhere near the same in Stafford and Shrewsbury, as far as I can remember. Of course, it is very seldom that they all attend, and I am speaking of the average number of guardians one meets at the board. For Atcham there are 52 elected guardians and for Stafford 46.

5932. Should you say that in both cases the number of guardians was not in excess of business necessities?—They were not at all in excess.

5933. Now let us come to the two urban districts, Madeley, and Bucklow (which is outside Stockport). Are there any industrial conditions there which would explain the remarkable difference in the amount of relief given?—Bucklow is a good deal more of a rural character than Madeley, and it has a large area.

5934. It adjoins the Stockport union, I think?—It adjoins Stockport on one side.

5935. You would not call it an urban union then?—I do not think we could fairly call it an urban union. It comprises several small towns, Knutsford, Wilmslow, Altringham, Sale, and so on. Madeley is distinctly a mining district; the Colebrook Dale works are there, and there are coal and iron works there. As regards Madeley, the trade was very bad a year ago, and two or three works had to close altogether, which threw a great number of men out of employment; some of them came on to the books of the guardians, and some were relieved by private subscriptions outside.

5936. I see there has been a great increase there; in the last ten years the pauperism has nearly doubled?—Yes, but it is going down again now. Madeley used to be administered on very strict lines. Colonel Anstice was chairman in those times, and Mr. Layton Lowndes before him. Since Colonel Anstice has left, things have not been managed so strictly as they were before. There has been a good deal of distress in Madeley—much more distress than there ever has been in Bucklow; and what there was, was much more keenly felt than it would be in Bucklow, which is, I think, a richer union.

5937. Taking these six unions, would you say that the remarkable difference in the percentage of pauperism, to population was largely due to administration?—Yes. I may safely say it is largely due to it, especially in the rural unions; but when, speaking of Madeley, I would always have regard to the exceptional distress it has undergone of late years.

5938. Is it a mining and iron district?—It has mining and iron and pottery works.

Effect of strict policy as to out-relief.

5939. It is alleged sometimes that in those districts which are strictly administered there is temporary distress and hardship inflicted on those to whom outdoor relief is refused, and they possibly migrate to other unions. As you have in your district a certain number of unions which are, in the technical term, strictly administered, and others which are more laxly administered, have you been able in any way to ascertain whether strict administration does inflict hardship or drive the paupers out of one union into another?—It has been alleged several times, and I have examined into one or two cases, but I have never been able to substantiate it at all.

5940. Therefore, strict administration does not produce the hardship which is suggested, and which at first sight might seem to some minds to be probable?—I have never found it so.

5941. But it calls into existence moral forces which enable the district to support its own poor without outside help?—I think there is no doubt that where the workhouse test is offered, it often calls out people who are friends of the applicant for relief but who are not strictly liable in law; they come to help him, as they will not have the applicant sent to the workhouse.

5942. Is being sent to the workhouse generally considered in your district to be a stigma?—Yes. It is the reverse with out-relief.

Attitude of poor toward out-relief.

5943. Do they look upon out-relief as something that they are entitled to?—Yes. I am afraid a good many poor people look at it as a matter of right. They say,

"We have paid rates for so many years; therefore, we ought to have out-relief."

5944. Apparently the general tendency in your district has been to keep the pauperism somewhat level?—There has not been any large fluctuation.

Objections to over large districts for relieving officers and to pay stations.

5945. You have a strong opinion, I gather, as to the necessity of appointing an adequate number of relieving officers?—I think it is most important. I have very little confidence myself in pay stations. I do not see how we can do away with pay stations altogether; but where a relieving officer has such a large district that he cannot visit the paupers in their own homes, he is obliged to pay the greater part of his relief at the pay stations. At those pay stations it very frequently happens that the applicants for relief do not themselves appear, but they often appear through a messenger who takes the relief for a neighbourhood or a district, receiving I have no doubt (though I have no facts enabling me to say so positively) a penny in the shilling, or something like that, for doing it. Therefore, the relieving officer often does not see the applicant at all. I had a case which came before me not long ago, where the relieving officer had been paying relief at the pay station to a person for a considerable time, but it was found out that during the last eight months that man was not living in the union at all; the relief had been entirely received by relatives at the pay station, and the relieving officer had not seen the man.

5946. That would be an extreme case, I presume, and one not likely to occur often?—I happened to be at a meeting at a country union, and I asked the relieving officer when he had seen a certain case. He hesitated. I said, "Have you seen it in the last fortnight?" "No, sir." "The last month?" He could not quite say. "Are you sure you have seen it within the last year?" "I could not say so." In the application and report book he had put down that he had visited the case in the last week; but he had been paying relief the whole year and he had never seen that pauper.

Efficiency of relieving officers.

5947. Are you satisfied as a rule with the status and capacity of the relieving officer?—As a rule I am. We have had one or two who were not quite honest, but they were exceptions. We have got some excellent officers.

Adoption by Guardians of regulations for granting relief.

5948. In paragraph 24 of your memorandum you make a suggestion as regards the by-laws relating to outdoor administration; would you suggest that model by-laws should be issued to every board of guardians, or would you suggest that some by-laws that have proved to be effective in other unions should be made the general standard?—What I have always advised boards of guardians to do who have not got by-laws is to get by-laws from unions where they have proved to be effective, and pick out those which they think might be suitable to their own union. There are plenty of by-laws now which the guardians are able to adopt if they think proper. I do not think I would go so far as to say that the Local Government Board should issue a set of model by-laws.

5949. You would prefer to have something that has proved effective?—I think so—some that they know of in their own immediate district.

5950. Have the guardians responded to your suggestion by looking up the by-laws of neighbouring unions?—Yes, I think they have a good deal. We have not got many unions who go upon by-laws. I think I have only got fourteen unions who have written by-laws. There are several unions who originally adopted by-laws, but I am afraid they have been disused.

5951. Would it be advisable that every board of guardians should have by-laws?—I think so.

5952. Take the three highest unions in Mr. Booth's list—have Kington, Stafford, and Madeley by-laws?—Kington are acting now upon by-laws. Madeley in their returns have not sent me any by-laws, and I think they are acting more upon precedents than upon by-laws. Stafford have got by-laws.

5953. Then there are the three unions at the bottom of that list—Cleobury Mortimer, Actham and Bucklow; have they by-laws?—Atcham have got by-laws. Cleobury have not got any written by-laws, and they act more upon precedents than upon by-laws. I do not think they have any written by-laws at Bucklow.

5954. Turning to the children, there is only one workhouse school in your district now, I think?—Only one.

5955. Do you approve of the system of the guardians boarding-out children—we will take within the unions first?—Yes, to a certain extent. I do not think it answers where a Board of Guardians pass a resolution to board-out all the children that they legally can; but if they only board-out the children for whom they can get suitable homes, then I think it does answer. But if they all at once ask for thirty or forty homes, I think they are very apt to get homes of an inferior class. In almost every union there are a certain number of suitable homes and foster-parents with whom children could with great advantage be boarded-out—I mean within the limits of the union; but even then I would strongly advocate the formation of voluntary committees to look after those children.

Boarding-out of children within the union.

5956. Then effective inspection is in your judgment essential for the proper carrying out of the scheme?—Yes, it is essential. Now, without committees, the inspection is entrusted to the relieving officer once a quarter, and to the medical officer once a quarter, and to any individual guardian in the parish and neighbourhood.

5957. So the work may be very perfunctorily performed?—It is anybody's business and nobody's. In the case of a girl, I am afraid it is nobody's unless the guardian happens to be a lady, and that is rarely the case; I mean to say, a relieving officer cannot properly go and inspect a girl who is boarded-out and examine her clothing, bedding, and so on.

5958. Have there been any cases of ill usage which have come under your notice?—Not of late years. There was a case in the Nantwich union where two or three children were badly used by the foster-parents, but that was a good many years ago.

5959. Of course if there is anything like an advertisement from the guardians asking for anybody to come and take those children, the inducement in a good many cases would be to make some profit out of it?—Yes. A case came under my notice some years ago where a poor woman dropped her child at the door of the workhouse and ran away and left it there. She was arrested, and asked why she left this poor child there. She said "Nobody loves her children more than I do, but I feel I should not be doing justice to my child if I did not give it the same advantages as my neighbours have, and I left it to the guardians to board-out, like my neighbours are doing; I cannot go to the same expense and give it the same what you may call luxuries that these children have, and so I left it."

5960. That would imply that the class to which she belonged thought special care was taken of the children that were deposited at the workhouse?—Yes, no doubt that would be so, and it might imply that the boarded-out children were better treated than the children of poor cottagers, who paid rates. Most of the abuses that have come under my notice came before the orders of the Local Government Board; in fact I think some of the orders were framed because of those abuses. Several years ago we had to inspect all the children boarded-out within the unions; I inspected some 400 of them. In several cases we found they were very badly done by. But that is not so much the case since the orders have been issued. I am referring to the boarding-out within the unions orders. I remember before that time one case particularly. A child had been boarded-out at about six years old, and she was then thirteen, and she had never been to a school or to a place of worship since she had been boarded-out.

5961. What was the date of the orders?—1889, I think.

5962. Therefore the orders will have applied during the whole period of the boarding-out of any children that are now boarded-out?—Yes. These abuses were before the issue of the orders.

5963. (Sir Samuel Provis.) In the case of children boarded within the unions, do the guardians have voluntary committees of their own, or when you spoke of committees were you thinking of boarding-out committees formed under the order ?—They generally form a committee consisting of a few guardians and ladies resident in the district.

Mr. Richard Ingram Dansey.

13 Mar. 1906.

5964. That is to say, a committee appointed merely by the guardians themselves ?—Yes.

5965. A voluntary arrangement ?—Entirely voluntary ; and they report to the guardians as to the conditions of the children.

5966. Does that work pretty well ?—Yes, very well. They take an interest also in finding the children situations afterwards.

5967. So that they would perform pretty much the same sort of duties that a regularly constituted boarding-out committee would perform ?—Just the same. Of course the committees are only formed compulsorily when the children are boarded-out without the limits of the union, but those voluntary committees perform the same duties.

Suitability of existing Poor Law areas.

5968. With regard to the size of the unions in your district, do you consider that, generally speaking, they are of a proper size, or would you advocate larger areas than the existing unions ?—I think there are one or two cases where a union might possibly be merged into another, but they are very few.

5969. Apart from that, you would not think it desirable to have a larger area of administration than what we may call the average union ?—No ; I should not go so far as the county area. I think there are very strong objections to that on the part of the poor themselves and the guardians.

5970. Taking the poor themselves, would their ground of objection be the separation from their relatives ?—Yes, and their not being able to see them as often as they could wish.

5972. And they would consider it a hardship if they were taken into an institution fifty miles off, even although that institution might in some respects be more comfortable than the original workhouse ?—I think they certainly would, because they are accustomed in most of the workhouses to visit their friends once a week or once a fortnight, and they could not afford the expense of going, say, fourteen or fifteen miles by rail and back.

5973. The workhouse is very often in the market town, is it not, and the people come into the town naturally ?—It is almost invariably in the market town. I gather that was the principle of forming areas, rather than following the boundaries of the counties.

Union areas extending into several counties.

5974. You have no case of an out-relief union in your district, have you ?—No.

5975. Do the boundaries overlap much with the counties ?—Yes. I have several unions in two counties, and one in three ; Tenbury is in three counties—Worcestershire, Herefordshire and Shropshire.

Segregation of sane epileptics.

5976. You referred to the hardship that sane epileptics sometimes have in workhouses ; have you ever considered what should be the remedy for that ?—I should like them removed to some other institutions where they can get more cheerful surroundings—a group of cottages, or something of that sort. But I am not prepared to say what combination should provide these cottages, whether a combination of unions or a combination of county councils.

5977. Supposing you had a county authority who provided these institutions, or even a combination of unions, would the objection that you were speaking of just now apply—that the people would be removed a good way from their relatives ?—I do not think so. These poor sane epileptics hardly get anybody to visit them ; they are treated as a sort of outcasts by their relatives.

Imbeciles in workhouses.

5978. Would the same sort of thing apply to imbeciles ?—That is a bigger question, and it seems to me a much more difficult question. In nearly all my workhouses the greater part of the work is done now by the imbeciles or the feeble-minded.

5979. In the rural unions you would have a difficulty, would you not, in the administration of the workhouse if these persons were all taken out ?—It would no doubt be more costly.

5980. You would have to get paid officers ?—You would have to get paid outside people in by the day, anyhow.

5981. As officers or assistants or whatever you may call them ?—Yes. I am not clear that the feeble-minded are not as happy in those workhouses as they would be anywhere else. At the same time, I do not think the means of classification in any of our small workhouses are sufficient for, may I say, the protection of the feeble-minded women.

5982. Is it possible in a small workhouse to have a better classification, or is the number so small that it is practically impossible ?—In a great many cases the number would be too small.

Infrequency of exercise by overseers of power to give relief.

5983. Going to quite a different matter, have you come across cases where overseers have given relief ?—I have come across such cases, but they are very few. I do not come across half-a-dozen cases in a year.

5984. You point out that in some of your unions the number of relieving officers is less than you wish, I think ?—Yes.

5985. Where that is the case, do the overseers give relief ?—Yes. They have done so in Stafford. It is very hard to educate people to the fact that the overseers have any power. The poor people as a rule fly to the guardian of the parish.

Relief by individual Guardians.

5986. What does he do ?—Does he refer them to the relieving officer, or to the overseer ?—He very often does not know what his powers are, and he gives an order. Really, the relief by the overseers is very small.

5987. (Mr. Nunn.) On whom does he give an order ?—He gives an order to the relieving officer, that is, he writes to the relieving officer ; or perhaps he will go and give an order for a trap to take the patient to the workhouse—I mean he would give an order at the nearest place where he can get a conveyance.

5988. (Sir Samuel Provis.) He would not give him an order actually, or would he, for relief, say, in kind ?—No, he would not go so far as that.

5989. He would not pay anything ?—No.

5990. (Mr. Nunn.) Only in a case of emergency, he would take upon himself to pay for a conveyance ?—Yes.

The ideal number of cases for a relieving officer.

5991. (Mr. Chandler.) You speak of the relieving officer in one instance having 400 cases and 600 individuals on his books, and in others twenty-six and twenty-nine cases only ; can you suggest any happy medium that you would consider a sufficient number of cases to be competently dealt with by a relieving officer ?—That is a very difficult question to answer. One has to take into consideration the area and the population and very much the character of the population. I could not lay down a hard-and-fast line about it. You might take it off-hand that I do not think myself that any relieving officer, whatever his area is, ought to have more than, at the very outside, 400 on his books, if he is to do his duty by visiting these cases at their homes frequently.

5992. In regard to the last subject you deal with in your memorandum, namely, the unemployed, are the cases you refer to cases in which the guardians have found employment for the men ?—No.

5993. Then it has been done by local committees ?—Yes, by distress committees.

Effect of Workmen's Compensation Acts.

5994. Is it generally believed throughout your district that the Employers' Liability Act has had any effect in causing old men to come upon the rates, or have you found any case yourself ?—I cannot say that I have investigated any case with that result, but I have constantly heard complaints of that nature.

5995. Simply rumour ?—I think it is more than that, especially in the Staffordshire potteries at Newcastle-under-Lyne, Stoke-on-Trent and Wolstanton and Burslem. I have been frequently told by the chairmen and clerks to guardians of men who are in the workhouse because they will not be received by employers of labour as they are getting on for sixty years of age or have perhaps some defect in their eyesight, or something of that sort.

5996. That would occur in almost all times of depression, would it not ?—Yes.

5997. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) Are there many charities in your district ?—I do not think so; I think there are very few.

Relief in aid of wages.

5998. There is no centre of endowed charities in it, is there ?—Not that I know of.

5999. Can you tell me whether the guardians are in the habit of giving relief in aid of wages in any of your unions ?—No. I think they give relief in aid of what you may call earnings, if you can distinguish earnings from wages. By earnings I mean what they get from casual jobs. Supposing a woman goes out for a couple or three days' washing and earns perhaps 9d. or 1s. a day, they might give her something.

6000. Would you say that they would not pay the men, only the women ?—There are several weakly men who cannot earn an ordinary labourer's wages and who go out by the job; perhaps they are paid 1s. for a day's work, and they do that three days in the week, or two days in the week. The guardians will give such men something.

6001. Would that be at agricultural labour ?—Yes.

6002. So the farmers really get them at a very low rate of wages ?—They are not worth much, you see.

6003. In the Potteries I assume there are a good many women employed ?—Yes.

6004. Would they have their earnings subsidised ?—To a certain extent they would if they are very small, but the women who work for the whole week in the Potteries of course earn sufficient to keep themselves.

6005. In the slack times would they have their earnings subsidised ?—I have not heard of it.

Difficulty of providing for weak-minded female paupers.

6006. (Mr. Gardiner.) I think I understood you to say that the classification in some workhouses was insufficient for the protection of feeble-minded women ?—Yes.

6007. Supposing there were any enlargement of area, as was suggested by Sir Samuel Provis, that difficulty would be overcome, would it not, because then the feeble-minded would probably be gathered together in a suitable place, with female officers and so on ?—Yes; but then you would not get over the difficulty of the work of the workhouse having to be performed by outside people.

6008. But it is much better surely to pay officials to take care of the aged and infirm poor ?—If you could get a bigger rateable value, you could of course get a better workhouse and better means of classification.

6009. Just as in the infirmaries you have put trained nurses in place of pauper attendants, so you ought to have paid attendants for the feeble-minded for the same reason, ought you not?—I do not know whether the feeble-minded as a rule want paid attendants—they seem very happy and go about their work and so on; but they want to be protected from themselves. It is not safe to keep them in a small workhouse, nor is it safe to let them go out.

6010. That is what I mean, that a large number would be essential to these girls' safety ?—I have had several cases brought under my notice lately where a woman has taken her discharge and the guardians could not by persuasion keep her in. In one case the woman had an illegitimate child four years running.

Mr. Richard Ingram Dansey.

13 Mar. 1906.

6011. (Chairman.) Was she what you would call defective mentally ?—Yes; she would not be classed as a lunatic, but as weak-minded.

6012. (Mr. Gardiner.) You practically find some such cases in almost every workhouse, do you not ?—In nearly every workhouse, in fact, a good many workhouses would not get on at all without them under the present system, as they do most of the work in the workhouse.

The average relieving officer's capacity for visiting cases.

6013. I do not know whether this is an impossible question to answer: Taking an urban district, how many visits should you say a relieving officer ought to be able to pay in a week, taking one week with another; in other words, how many visits would you consider a good week's work ? Have you any standard in your mind ?—I do not think I could answer that question. The relieving officer has such a variety of cases to attend to; he has his sick cases and he has his ordinary cases. I should like him to visit each sick case certainly not more seldom than once a fortnight. In my district there are no rules about that, and the guardians have given the relieving officer no rules. In one union the relieving officer would visit once a fortnight, in another once a month, and in another once in six months. I have not answered your question, I know; I cannot.

Medical relief in Atcham union.

6014. (Dr. Downes.) Is medical out-relief strictly administered in Atcham ?—As strictly as they could do it.

6015. Do they have any permanent list ?—Yes, they have some on the permanent list.

6016. How long does the order run in Atcham for ordinary medical relief ?—It only runs from board day to board day, except it is a chronic case, and then it would go on for six months.

Cottage hospitals in district.

6017. Have you any cottage hospitals or infirmaries in your district ?—We have some cottage hospitals, but not many. There are cottage hospitals at Tenbury, Kington, Ludlow, Leominster and several country towns.

6018. Then you have a county infirmary as well, have you not ?—Yes.

6019. Do the guardians subscribe to these cottage hospitals ?—They do not generally subscribe to the cottage hospitals; in some cases they do.

6020. Do they subscribe to the infirmary ?—They subscribe, as a rule, to the infirmary.

6021. Have you any experience as to the effect of strict administration on what I may call provident medical clubs or friendly societies and sick relief societies ?—No, I have not.

Effect of strict Poor Law administration on wages.

6022. Could you tell us whether there is any difference in the wages of the strictly administered places, as compared with the wages in the other places that are more laxly administered ?—As Sir Baldwyn Leighton said, when they carried out strict rules as to the widows and children at Atcham, and instead of giving out-relief to widows and children, took a certain number of the children into the workhouse and left the widow to support herself with one or more children if she could, the wages at once went up. The widows, when they had all their children with them, were only able to earn about 9d. a day with food working from 6 a.m. to 7 p.m. and their children were consequently neglected; whereas, when a certain number of the children were taken from them, they were able to get out every day and earn regular wages, and their wages instead of being 9d. a day went up to 1s. 9d. and 2s. per day with food and the hours of labour were from 8 a.m. to 5.30 p.m.

Atcham.

6023. That was the experience of Sir Baldwyn Leighton at Atcham ?—Yes.

6024. (Mr. Nunn.) Might I ask whether any definite figures have been preserved as to the rate of wages going up ?—No. I can only quote this report, which is a report about the Atcham union under the late Sir Baldwyn Leighton. It has been issued comparatively lately; it was compiled by Mr. Bowen-Jones, who was chairman after Sir Baldwyn.

6025. (Dr. Downes.) Does that report give the statistics of the Atcham union ?—Yes.

Mr. Richard Ingram Dansey.

13 Mar. 1906.

6026. Should you consider Stafford a fair union to compare with Atcham in its various conditions?—No, not quite. I think, as I said, that Stafford town itself relies a great deal upon the boot trade, whereas in Shrewsbury there is no staple trade at all, although there used to be.

Comparison of Stafford and Atcham unions.

6027. It has gone away, has it?—Yes, it has gone away to America.

6028. They are both railway centres, I think?—Yes. Otherwise I should think they would compare, apart from that question of the boot trade.

6029. (Chairman.) If in the one case the trade has gone and in the other case the trade remains, would not Stafford be better situated than Shrewsbury?—Yes, except that trade has been very bad, and I do not know whether bad trade is not worse than none at all.

6030. Is the trade confined to Stafford, or does it extend to the villages all round?—It is only in the town. In the neighbouring union of Stone they also have it.

6031. (Mr. Gardiner.) Is not Shrewsbury very full of charities?—I do not know that it is.

6032. (Dr. Downes.) Kington and Clun adjoin, do they not?—No, there is a wide interval between them; you have got Knighton between them.

6033. (Mr. Phelps.) Knighton is not one of your unions, is it?—No, it is not in my district, but it intervenes.

Comparison of Kington and Clun unions.

6034. (Dr. Downes.) Taking those two unions, Kington and Clun, are they fairly comparable, do you think?—Yes, I should think so, fairly. Kington is a bigger town than Bishop's Castle, which is the main town of Clun union.

6035. I notice that according to the figures pauperism has been going up in Kington steadily, but going down in Clun?—That I ascribe almost entirely to administration, and stricter administration is now decreasing the pauperism in Kington.

6036. What is the character of trade depression in Madeley; is it coal and iron they have there?—Yes. Two years ago I think two or three large works had to stop altogether and were closed, and the men were thrown out.

6037. Was there a similar depression in Wellington and Shifnal?—Not to the same extent. Wellington suffered somewhat, but not in the same way.

Conditions in Shropshire unions.

6038. (Mr. Phelps.) I see that in the unions in Shropshire in almost every case the population has been falling; is that owing to agricultural depression?—I find it all through the agricultural districts. I think the population is falling.

6039. Has Shropshire suffered much from agricultural depression?—Yes, I should think it has, very considerably; I think Shropshire has probably suffered more than Cheshire, and Herefordshire more than either.

6040. Do you think that the fall in population affects the pauperism?—It may; but I have not gone into that question.

Effect of strict administration on wages. Atcham.

6041. I did not quite catch what you said about the effect on the wages of women of taking widows' children into the workhouse?—What was said by Sir Baldwyn Leighton was that the effect of relieving widows of a certain number of their children was that the wages of charwomen in Shrewsbury went up, and the widows were able to support themselves and the one or two children left pretty well on the enhanced wages.

6042. That it raised the wages, not that it lowered the wages?—It raised the wages.

Medical loan relief.

6043. With regard to medical relief, have you any unions in which it is given on loan?—There are several unions which give midwifery orders on loan, but there are hardly any cases where the other medical relief is given on loan.

6044. Are midwifery orders often applied for in your district?—Yes, pretty often; they are given in several unions on loan.

Functions of medical officers as to relief.

6045. Is it the custom to insist upon the attendance of the medical officer at the meetings of the board generally?—No.

6046. He does not report on the cases in person?—Not generally.

6047. Where do they get their information with regard to them from?—He makes a report.

6048. A written report?—Yes, a written report as to his patients, which he sends in fortnightly.

6049. Does he often give advice to the board as to the method of treating a case?—I never heard him.

6050. Have you never heard him say "It would be better if this case were brought into the infirmary"?—He often puts that remark on his list, but he is not in attendance to say so personally.

6051. You have both urban and rural unions; what class of men do the guardians in the urban unions come from, should you say, as a rule, taking places like Stafford and Stockport?—All classes.

6052. Do you think that the Local Government Act, 1894, has increased the area in which an interest is felt in administration and in the Poor Law generally?—Yes, I should say off-hand it has.

6053. Do you think that the gain in that way compensates at all for any loss of good administration?—That is a very difficult question to answer, and I am hardly prepared to do it. I think any damage has been rapidly repaired; I would not undo it.

Frequency of Inspectors' attendance at Guardians' meetings.

6054. How often do you visit each board of guardians in the course of a year?—I could not tell you. I am bound to go once a year, and some unions I go to five or six times a year.

6055. Should you, for instance, prefer an arrangement by which the area was much smaller and you could visit them more frequently?—No, I should not.

6056. You do not think that would be a good change?—I do not. I think we can go too frequently to a board of guardians.

6057. (Mr. Gardiner.) Might we ask why you think too frequent visits bad?—I think the board of guardians would say: "You have come for no purpose; you have nothing to do; why do you come here?" I should prefer to go on as we are. I think I may say that all these boards of guardians look upon the inspector as a friend; and not as a man who is going to pick holes; they rather look upon him as one who is going to help them in a difficulty.

6058. Do you not find that the more you visit a board of guardians the more work there is that you would like to do if you had the time for it?—I do not think so.

6059. (Dr. Downes.) If an inspector did the work, would there not be a tendency for the guardians to leave it to him to a great extent?—I could not answer that; the inspector does not do the work.

6060. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Would there not be a tendency to throw the responsibility on the inspector?—I am afraid there would, and to my mind this is one of the greatest objections to visiting too often.

6061. (Mr. Bentham.) Leaving the feelings of the guardians out of the question altogether, do you think you could be of considerable use to a board of guardians by a frequent attendance; and not only of use, but that you would be able to ascertain more accurately the lines upon which the guardians administer relief?—I do not think I could do it by more frequent visiting than I do now. I know the district very thoroughly; I have been there for thirty-four years.

6062. (The O'Conor Don.) Does not your inspection serve as a check upon the officers of the unions to see that they do their duty?—Yes, it is a check in that way.

6063. I suppose you do not give notice when you are going down to a union?—I never give notice when I am going to a workhouse. I must distinguish between that and a board of guardians. In the case of a board of guardians I very often write to say I am coming, or they write to me and ask me to come.

Frequency of inspection of workhouses.

6064. You do not inspect the workhouse at the same time that you go to the board of guardians, then ?—Not to make an official inspection. I sometimes go and run over it, if I want to see a particular thing, or for my own satisfaction.

6065. How often do you inspect a workhouse, as distinct from attending a board of guardians ?—Once a year at least; but in several cases one goes four or five times over, when one suspects anything is not quite right, or wants to see how some alteration has been done.

6066. Do you not think that more frequent visits to a workhouse would be better than once a year ?—It might be.

6067. There would be more check upon the officials in the discharge of their duties, would there not ?—Yes, there might be, but I think guardians and visiting committees would be more inclined to throw responsibility upon the inspector.

6068. You would come down upon them without any notice whatever ?—They never have any notice at all. I have been in a workhouse at twelve o'clock at night before now.

6069. (Mr. Phelps.) The officials of the workhouse are being constantly overhauled by committees of the guardians, are they not ?—Yes.

6070. The house is being constantly visited in one form or another ?—Yes, but as a rule most workhouse masters know when the committees are coming.

6071. (Sir. Samuel Provis.) Do the visiting committees always go upon the same day ?—The visiting committees too often go on board days, and in country workhouses in unions where the markets are held on board days it is very difficult to get them to do otherwise.

6072. (Mr. Phelps.) Have you any experience of voluntary committees working together with guardians in relieving poverty ?—Not a great deal.

6073. Not in your district ?—No.

6074. (Miss Hill.) With regard to the visitation of workhouses, is there no general practice of guardians having a rota for the visit of individual guardians on certain days, so that it practically comes to be a surprise visit ?—Yes, they have that in the urban districts; that is, where the guardians reside within a convenient distance of the workhouse.

6075. In London they even do it with the schools, when the schools are a little distance out, and I think they trust a good deal to that; that is not common in your district ?—It is in the urban districts, if you take Stoke-on-Trent and districts like that, where the area is small; but if you take a district like Leominster or Kington, or some of those agricultural districts, it would be almost impossible to do it, because the guardians do not come near the town, except perhaps on a market day, and they would have to come many miles to get to the workhouse.

Effect of Relief to School Children Order.

6076. I want to ask about the underfed children. Were the twenty-seven children you mention in paragraph 34 all in one centre, or were they scattered over the whole district ?—There were some in Birkenhead, some in Stoke-on-Trent, some in Congleton, and some at Wolstanton and Burslem. Those are the only unions.

6077. Were a larger number of children proposed and did investigation bring them down to twenty-seven ?—At Stoke-on-Trent the school attendance officers reported over seventy children as being underfed. The relieving officer had to investigate those cases, and he found out that a great many were beyond the provisions of the Act, and eventually only six had to be investigated by the board of guardians. At Wolstanton and Burslem they had six cases; they were only on for six weeks, and then they were taken off by voluntary effort. They had a conference there between the guardians and the school authorities, and at that conference it was decided that any distress of this kind should be met by voluntary effort outside. That has been the case in a great many unions. It was the case in Cannock, and it has been the case a good deal in Birkenhead and Wirral.

Advantages of rota Committees.

6078. (Professor Smart.) What do you consider the precise advantage of the rotating method of committees which you describe in paragraph 19 ?—Formerly, under the old system, each guardian sat for the relief cases of his own district, and the committee were entirely formed, as a matter of fact, from those guardians sitting for the districts for which they gave relief.

6079. It was a sort of ward system, then ?—Three or four committees sat in the same room. Guardians have complained to me more than once that they were blamed by their constituents, if I may call them so, for not giving them a fair share out of the common fund.

Boarding-out of children within and without the union.

6080. Do you approve of boarding-out within the unions ?—I do to a limited extent. I think in every union you could get a certain number of homes and a certain number of foster parents where the children can be very well treated within the union; but, as I said before, where a board of guardians pass a resolution to board out within the union, all the children who are legally capable of being boarded out, they are apt to get a lower class of home. Supposing in a union you knew of some twenty homes only, but you had to provide for forty children, you must lower the standard for the homes in order to get forty; and then I do not think it answers. I do not think it is ever quite satisfactory, except with the supervision of a committee, or, anyhow, some ladies, because I cannot believe in the proper inspection of girls except by ladies. I have had to inspect the boarded-out children, and I am perfectly powerless where I have to inspect a girl's surroundings.

6081. Then I take it you rather approve of boarding-out beyond the union ?—There are very few unions in my district that board out beyond the union, and I do not think the number boarded out beyond the union is on the increase.

6082. In Scotland we send the children as far off as we possibly can from the union ?—I should much prefer it to boarding out within the unions, particularly on the ground that relatives cannot then interfere with the foster parents—that is the great objection.

Adoption by Guardians of regulations for the granting of relief.

6083. (Mr. Bentham.) You said there were fourteen unions that had by-laws; could we have the names of the whole fourteen ?—I wrote to the boards of guardians in my district, and among other things I asked them to let me know whether they had any by-laws. The only unions who have sent me copies of the by-laws are these: Birkenhead, Ellesmere, Kington, Leek, Leominster, Macclesfield, Nantwich, Northwich, Runcorn, Stafford, Stockport, Stoke-on-Trent, Whitchurch, Wolstanton and Burslem, and Atcham.

6084. That means that Kington and Stafford, two of the highest in pauperism in proportion to population, have by-laws; how long have they had them in operation ?—Kington very recently has adopted by-laws.

6085. Then they have formed these by-laws with the object of reducing pauperism; is that so ?—Yes, it was very much with that object.

6086. Would you say that the pauperism has not grown during the time the by-laws were in operation ?—The Kington by-laws have been very recently put into operation.

6087. What about Stafford ?—Stafford have always professed to have by-laws, but I think they were unwritten rules at one time.

6088. Have you got a copy of the Stafford rules ?—Yes.

6089. Then they are written ?—They are written at the present time. The Stafford guardians took these questions of relief into consideration last year at a special meeting.

6090. Then they have been printed only since last year ?—I cannot answer for the date they were printed.

Mr. Richard Ingram Dansey.

13 Mar. 1906.

I had to call their attention to the enormous increase in the relief, and one thing I had to suggest to them was that they should have two relieving officers instead of one, but that was not acceptable to them.

6091. (Mr. Booth.) Does it follow that the fourteen or fifteen unions who responded are the only unions who have by-laws, or are they the only ones who thought fit to forward them to you?—I think they are probably the only ones who have written rules in existence. The others have had rules at some time or other, but they have not got them written now, and now are acting upon precedent. One often hears the chairman say, This is against our rules.

6092. And yet he may not have written rules?—Yet he may not have any written rule.

6093. (Mr. Gardiner.) Did Stoke-on-Trent ever have written rules?—I do not think so. I had to meet them on this question of relief, as their relief was going up by leaps and bounds year after year till they got to a tremendous expense. I met the guardians, and they agreed to call a special meeting to consider the whole subject, and that one subject only; and they spent a lot of time over it.

6094. (Mr. Bentham.) I see the Stafford rules were adopted in 1902, according to the printed copy which you have shown me; those you would consider to be quite recent, would you not?—Yes, comparatively recent.

6095. Then really in that case they were formed because the rate of pauperism was high?—Yes.

6096. In the case of Atcham that is not so?—Yes; they have had rules pretty nearly ever since the union was formed in 1836, when the pauperism of the union was as high as 7·3 per cent. of the population.

6097. (Mr. Gardiner.) Has any union to your knowledge abandoned rules since, say, the year 1895?—No, I do not think they have ever abandoned rules, but I am sorry to say the observance of the rules gets very lax. They are constantly making exceptions to the rules.

Plural'st relieving officer.

6098. (Mr. Bentham.) You mentioned one instance of a relieving officer who had only twenty-nine cases on his book; that was in Shrewsbury; has that relieving officer any other duties?—He is registrar of births, collector to the guardians, and assistant settlement officer.

6099. Does he hold any other appointment under the guardians?—He holds no other offices except those I have mentioned.

Type of person elected as District Councillor and Guardian.

6100. (Mrs. Webb.) With regard to rural unions and urban unions, do you find any difference between the class of man who gets elected as a rural district councillor and a guardian, and the class of man who gets elected as a guardian only in an urban district, comparing the two men as administrators of the Poor Law?—I do not know that I could answer that question without giving offence.

6101. Mr. Davy drew our attention to the fact that the guardian who is also a district councillor was a better administrator than the guardian who was an ad hoc guardian; I only want to know whether that has come into your experience?—I think the man who is elected a district councillor and a guardian is, as a rule, a man in a better position than the other; but I do not say that he is a sharper man or a better man of business.

6102. Does he tend to be a country gentleman, or what does he tend to be?—He is not that, but he has a certain amount of influence in his own rural parish. He is very likely a churchwarden, and perhaps rents a good sized farm.

Tenure of office of Chairman of Board of Guardians.

6103. Do the chairmen of boards of guardians usually serve for one year only?—That differs in different places. In some unions they go on year after year till they have to retire, the same man being elected every year. In other unions it is the rule that they are only annual.

6104. Does that coincide at all with urban and rural, mean does the district councillor guardian tend to be a more permanent chairman than the urban ad hoc guardian, or less so, or do you not know?—I have not followed that at all. In the union of Bucklow the chairman retires every year.

6105. Is that man a district councillor?—No, he is not a district councillor as a rule.

6106. Then he is an ad hoc guardian?—Yes. In my own union of Ludlow the chairman goes on being elected every year.

6107. Is he a district councillor or an ad hoc guardian?—He is not a district councillor, I think.

6108. You have not noticed any difference between these classes of men?—No, I have not.

Pauperism through unhealthy trades.

6109. Is the white-lead industry in your district?—Yes, at Stoke.

6110. Have you noticed any cases of pauper sickness arising from white-lead poisoning?—We frequently have cases in the Stoke infirmary and hospital suffering from the poisoning.

6111. That does come under your notice?—Yes.

6112. Is there any other unhealthy trade that affects medical relief or infirmary accommodation?—No, not specially that I know of.

6113. But white-lead immediately arises to your mind?—Yes. The nurses always tell me what they are suffering from. That is confined to the Staffordshire Potteries.

Conditions in Atcham union.

6114. (Mr. Nunn.) I have been glancing at the Atcham report which you have shown us, and I see that in 1836, the year when Sir Baldwyn Leighton began his work in the Atcham union, there was a considerable number of benefit societies there; he names nineteen, from twelve of which he received figures; are those societies still in existence there?—I am afraid I cannot answer the question.

6115. You have no returns to date?—I have no returns at all.

6116. In considering the reduction of out-door relief in Atcham, do you think that the people's relatives have stepped in and given a certain amount of relief which was formerly given out of the rates?—I have no doubt they have in a great many cases.

6117. Do you think they do that now?—Yes, they do it now—and very often they are relatives who are not legally compellable to do so.

6118. But you do not know about any endowed charities?—No, I have no statistics on that point.

6119. Or any other voluntary charities?—No.

6120. You do not think they have entered largely into the problem there?—I do not think so. There was a Charity Organisation Society in Shrewsbury, but that I was told became defunct from want of applicants.

Rota relief committees.

6121. Can you tell us what you consider to be the ideal constitution of a relief committee in a rural union? Do you think this rota for going round the different districts which you mention in paragraph 19 is a good one?—I think it has answered exceedingly well at Stoke.

6122. Does that include the presence of local guardians?—They can come and give information.

6123. But they have no vote?—They do not vote.

6124. But they are selected?—They are selected, and they give information as to any particular cases.

6125. That does seem to anyone like myself with a little experience quite an ideal system: is that what you would recommend in a rural union?—I recommended it as an experiment, but I had no experience of it before, although I had heard of it in operation, I think at Bradford.

6126. And it has worked well?—Certainly.

Medical relief as the highway to pauperism.

6127. With reference to paragraph 23, have you any definite figures about medical relief being the starting point for rather greater pauperisation in other directions? —No, I do not think I could give you any figures about it.

6128. It has not been traced at all; this is a sort of general impression?—It is a general complaint.

6129. Is it?—Yes. All chairman of boards of guardians who have been in office any time tell me that that is the most difficult relief they have to deal with, and they cannot check it.

6131. That is the beginning of it?—Yes. You see the relieving officer dare not refuse this kind of relief. I have never known a case where a relieving officer has refused to give an order for medical relief.

6132. Have you known any cases in which the guardians have reversed that decision and offered the house?— I have never seen one.

ccommoda-on for orkhouse irses.

6133. Are your nurses usually accommodated in a separate home from the workhouse infirmary?—No, not usually, but we have several now; I think there are thirteen or fourteen unions who have built these separate homes for them.

6134. Wherever it is tried, has it been considered an improvement?—The guardians are all very pleased with them and pleased with the results; and so are the nurses.

umber, laries, and cupations relieving ficers.

6135. (The O'Conor Don.) As a rule, in your district do you consider that there are a sufficient number of relieving officers appointed by the guardians?—I do not think there are enough now.

6136. Could you say what is the average salary of the relieving officer?—I should think they start generally at about £80.

6137. And they go up to how much; what would be the maximum?—They generally take on other duties —vaccination officer probably, and collector too. As relieving officer, pure and simple, they go from £70 or £80 to £120 or £130.

6138. As a rule, have they any other employment besides that of relieving officer, or have they to give their full time to the guardians?—In some cases they have a little land—not arable land. The Local Government Board do not allow them to have arable land, but I do not think they object to their having an acre or two to keep a cow.

6139. How do they distribute the outdoor relief generally; is it at the homes of the people, or are there certain centres where they meet and give the relief?—They have their pay stations.

Relief stations.

6140. Are those pay stations appointed by the guardians?—The pay stations are rented by the guardians.

6141. Is there much relief given in your district in the form of kind?—Very little. They do it in suspicious cases. Supposing they are suspicious that the applicant is addicted to drink, then the relief is invariably given in kind, if out relief is given at all.

Relief in kind.

6142. Have you formed any opinion as to which system is the best—giving relief in kind or in money?—It seems to be very difficult to give relief in kind in all cases.

6143. But in the large towns, would be there much difficulty in giving it in kind?—I do not suppose there would; but as a matter of practice very little is given, except that probably a loaf or two is given with the money.

6144. Have you formed any opinion whether it would be an advantage to give more of it in kind in the large cities?—I think the pauper is probably able to spend his money to the best advantage, if he is a good character.

6145. Do you think it would be a check upon persons who are really not deserving of relief? If they were to get it in kind rather than in money, they would not go in for it so much, would they?—No, perhaps not; but you must then take precautions against their selling their orders. When tickets for bread are given to vagrants we have found that the tickets were constantly being sold.

6146. That was the form in which the relief was given was it—by an order upon a shop?—Yes; I think those orders might go to a second person.

6147. But a system of distributing the relief actually in the form of bread, or whatever it is, has not been tried in your district?—No. There are so many difficulties about conveying the bread to the homes of the paupers.

6148. If the paupers go to a certain place to get the money, would they not equally go there to get the bread?—Yes, and they do convey a certain quantity of bread to the pay stations; but there are very few cases, except those of bad characters, who receive the bread or the relief in kind entirely, without any money.

Mr. Edward Darlington Court.
20 Mar. 1906.

Extent and character of district.

6149. (Chairman.) You are a General Inspector of the Local Government Board, your district, I understand, including the greater part of the South Midlands, consisting of Cambridge (except the Wisbech Union), Huntingdon, Northampton, Bedford, Hertford, and Middlesex?—Yes.

6150. How long have you been an inspector in your present district?—Not quite three years.

6151. We have received your memorandum, and will take that as your evidence in chief. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XIII. (A–H).) I propose to ask you a few questions in connection with it to obtain rather fuller information on certain points. The population of your district is mainly rural, excepting around Northampton and London?—Yes; and of course in one or two isolated places like the borough of Cambridge, which is a separate parish.

Conditions in Northampton union.

6153. In Northampton, on the other hand, the rate of pauperism in proportion to population is exceptionally high?—Yes, one in twenty-two or twenty-three.

6154. Has there been a large increase in the population of Northampton from adjacent districts being added to it?—Not recently. The total area of the union is a little over 20,000 acres, but nearly all the population—I should think, all but about 5,000 or 6,000—are in the borough. I could not speak exactly, but I think that would be more than the numbers outside. The whole of the borough is included in the union. The union population in 1901 was 89,355; the borough population, 87,021; the 1905 estimate for the union was 93,819.

6155. The industry there is shoe making?—Yes.

6156. That industry is not confined merely to Northampton, but extends to the villages around?—Yes.

6157. That industry has recently undergone considerable changes, owing to the introduction of machinery?—Yes.

6158. Is the board of guardians in Northampton a large board in point of number?—About forty-eight I think. I have not the exact figure.

Size of Northampton Board of Guardians.

6159. Is that divided into committees for the purpose of superintending outdoor relief?—Yes, there have been three committees till recently. I believe that two committees only are sitting now. A resolution was passed a few months ago that the relief should be taken by two committees, and as there are four relieving officers, that two should go to each.

System of relief committees.

6160. Do they always take the same districts, or do they rotate?—I cannot say what they have done since the change, I have not been there since; it was about three months ago.

6161. Previous to that did each committee adhere to the same district?—I believe so.

6162. That was the district with which they were acquainted?—Yes, I think that might be said.

6163. From your experience, is it not advisable where you have a town like Northampton which can be sub-divided into districts, that the committees should take alternatively the different districts?—Yes, I certainly think that should be done.

Advantages of "Rota" committees.

6164. It checks any tendency there might be for the representatives of a particular locality to favour that locality at the expense of the rates?—I think so, but it is very difficult to get the guardians to see it in that way. They take the most interest in their own cases, and are not very willing to sit on the other committees and go away from their own cases.

6165. On the ground that they know their own locality better than the other locality?—Yes, and that they take more interest in it. I think they would chiefly give the ground that you give.

6166. Has the number of relieving officers in Northampton been insufficient in your judgment?—Certainly. I still think so.

6167. Can you tell us what proportion the relieving officers bear to the number of cases receiving outdoor relief?—It is at the present time about 1 in 800. On the 1st January 1905, there were 3,540 cases receiving out relief, and there were three relieving officers: that gave 1,180 cases per officer. About 1,000 of the 3,540 were persons employed in the labour yard or their dependents, but still the giving of tickets and so on, and investigating those cases took up a great deal of the relieving officers' time, so that I think they might fairly be counted in the number, which makes it almost 1,200 cases per officer. Last year the guardians appointed an additional relieving officer, and the numbers also have somewhat gone down; there were 3,228 at the end of 1905; that gives 807 per relieving officer. It is very much the largest number in my district.

6168. What do you say is the right proportion of relieving officers to persons receiving outdoor relief?—I think you must take into consideration the area as well.

6169. Take a town or district like Northampton, where the population is not scattered; what would satisfy you now?—So far as I am qualified to give an opinion, I should think about 180 or so separate cases, which would probably mean about 330 or so, including children and other dependents. That would be about an average number I should think.

6170. Between 300 and 400?—Yes, up to that, including children.

6171. In your experience has the increased employment of relieving officers compensated the rates, so that the reduction in outdoor relief more than counterbalances the increase in salary?—I am afraid my experience is not long enough to give any useful information on that point. I have only succeeded in getting two or three increases in my district, and there has not really been time to see what the effect has been.

Lack of workhouse accommodation.

6172. In Northampton there would be some improvement, but the poor rate, in your judgment, will always remain heavy so long as the principles under which the guardians now give outdoor relief prevail?—That is so. The matter has been complicated (I have just referred to it briefly in my memorandum), by the want of accommodation in the workhouse, and even if the guardians wanted to offer the house as a test, they have not been able to do so. That is being to some extent remedied now.

6173. By increased accommodation?—They got rid of the children some time ago, and the children's block, which was a very satisfactory block, has been made into a female infirmary: the previous infirmary, which had been for both sexes, now being devoted to men only. With a certain number of additional dormitories which have been built in the last year, there will be room for about seventy or eighty more men, and that will allow a little more discrimination to be exercised.

Enforcement of "maintenance" of relatives an alleged cause of rural exodus.

6174. Coming to the rural districts, you state in paragraph 14 that it has been alleged that one of the reasons that induces the rural population to come up to town is to avoid the obligation of contributing to the support of relatives?—Yes.

6175. That is the impression of certain guardians, is it?—Certain boards of guardians; it was given at a meeting and received by the other guardians as correct according to their views.

6176. I suppose you have not been long enough in your district to express an opinion upon it?—I have been long enough to see that the guardians might test it a little more with advantage. I do not quite believe in it. I think it is partly because it is easier to let them go, that they do not follow these cases up thoroughly. There are guardians who do manage to get the money and do not drive the people away, but it is very hard to persuade some of the country guardians that stricter insistence upon the obligations of relatives would not drive them away.

Disinclination to maintain relatives.

6177. When they attempt to enforce the obligation on those who remove, is it resented, or is it responded to by those to whom application is made?—There is a good deal of struggling against paying, of course. I think in almost every case the man writes and says that though he is getting 25s. a week, his wife is always ill, that he has to put money by, that his rent is very high, that he is worse off than if he were at home getting 14s. and so on; and it generally ends up by his offering to pay half.

6178. You mean to pay half what is asked?—Yes. That is what I hear.

6179. Do you think the sense of obligation to maintain old relatives is diminishing?—I can only go as regards the past by what I have read and heard, but from what I do see there certainly is not any very strong sense of obligation either to contribute to or to nurse the parents in sickness, and so on. I should say it is very weak indeed in very many places.

6180. Do those observations apply to rural districts?—Rural and urban, or semi-urban, quite as much.

Effect on pauperism of sudden increase or decrease of population.

6181. There has been a certain movement of population, and when there is a movement of population, and the population diminishes, it means that the percentage of pauperism rises?—That you would expect, I think. It is not the old people or the infants who go away.

6182. The old people are left and the more enterprising go away?—And the old people return. If there is any moving back, it is the old people coming back to finish their lives. I have had that mentioned to me at Ampthill, and other places of the sort, as a reason for the high pauperism.

6183. Referring to those districts where the population is very rapidly increasing, the figures show an abnormally low rate of pauperism in proportion to the population?—I am afraid that does not quite follow so much; it does for a short time, I think. It certainly did at Edmonton, where the pauperism was 1 in 113, I think, shortly before I went to the district, but now it has got to about 1 in 70. As the families grow up and have children, and so on, a very short time after the district is first built on, the pauperism begins to increase. It is only just for the first rush that it goes down, I think.

Conditions in Middlesex unions.

6185. Turning to the returns prepared by you which include Middlesex, the three populous districts of Brentford, Edmonton and Willesden have very rapidly increased in population within recent years?—Yes, they have. I do not show the present population in these returns; I simply take the Census of 1901. They have increased very rapidly, of course.

6186. The proportion, therefore, now would be lower, would it not?—You are taking the pauperism of 1905 and applying it to the population of 1901?—I do show a greater increase than there really is, probably, in pauperism.

6187. Taking Middlesex, you have these three big urban unions with a very rapidly increasing population; and you have two more or less rural unions—Staines and Uxbridge?—Yes.

6188. And the amount of pauperism in proportion to the population is much greater in these rural districts, where the population has not been so augmented, than it is in the urban districts?—Yes, it is greater, certainly. I might say that Staines is considerably more rural than Uxbridge, and its pauperism is the lower of the two.

Conditions in London suburban unions.

6189. Uxbridge is very high?—Very high. It is not so high all the year round: the July returns would not give such relatively high figures. Each of the last two winters there has been a labour yard open, mainly because the brickmakers were out of work.

6190. Do these very populous districts, such as Edmonton and Brentford, present any special problems as regards Poor Law administration and Poor Law rating? At present the rate is not high, but it will rise?—Yes, there is a very large margin at present as far as the rate for out-relief and in-maintenance goes. If you look at page 3 of my 1906 Return, in Brentford the expenditure for in-maintenance and out-relief came to a rate of 4½d. in each of the two last years. That is on the rateable value; the actual rate in the pound would be higher, of course. Edmonton is rather lower, 4¼d. for 1904, and 4½d. for 1905, and Willesden 4¼d. for the first year, and 4¾d. for the second; 4½d. for 1904 and 4¾d. for 1905 are the average rates for Middlesex. Of course the other Middlesex districts are too small, really, to affect the averages very much, but, taking the whole of my district, they were 6½d. for the former year and 6¾d. for 1905, so that there is a very considerable margin still in favour of these populous unions before the question becomes serious.

Mr. Edward Darlington Court.

6191. The peculiarity of the immigration to Edmonton is that they are nearly all of the same class, are they not?—Yes, mostly houses I should say let at 10s. a week and rated at £13, or 5s. a week.

6192. There is no exceptional burden placed on these districts so far as the poor rate is concerned?—Not so far as the poor rate goes.

6193. I only put this question generally, because it is outside your personal purview, but the rates are very heavy?—It is the education rate chiefly that is doing the harm there. I do not know whether you will consider I am going beyond my business in mentioning this, but at Tottenham a reason given about 15 months ago for the proposed purchase of a public park for £24,000 was to stop the place being built upon, with the result that the district would be saddled with the additional education rate for the children who would live in those houses. I think that is a pretty extreme case, if it pays people to buy up land to stop it being built on in order to avoid the education rate.

6194. The contention of a good many people who live there is that the population is increasing relatively much faster than the rateable value, and consequently the rates are exceptionally heavy, but from your evidence that would not apply to the poor rate?—Not to the poor rate by itself, but I should say that the rateable value is not increasing as rapidly as the population or the pauperism. The rate has gone up a little even in the last year. The rateable value of Brentford went up from £1,430,000 to £1,510,000, in the year. Edmonton went up only £40,000, from £2,090,000 to £2,130,000, in the year. That is not a very big increase, and the increase in population was considerably more than that in Brentford. Edmonton did not have a bad year, as a matter of fact, last year, partly through special circumstances. This winter a number of people were provided for by distress committees and so on, who probably would otherwise have come on the rates, and it made the number relieved rather lower than the year before.

6195. Are there in these districts outside London any local industries springing up, or are the overwhelming mass of the people who go to them persons who make their daily livelihood in London?—The usual statement of people who live in Edmonton and Tottenham, and I think it is more or less the same at Brentford, certainly at Willesden, is that most of the people do earn their living in London. In Willesden nearly all the better-class people work in London in different offices and so on, and, as I say, sleep in Willesden. There is a considerable number of factories in the Edmonton Union, powder and cartridge factories and so on; quite a number. Fifteen months ago I got statements from various people, and it was certified that 14,000 working men went up regularly by the Great Eastern Railway. I do not know how many would be going from other parts of the Union by the Great Northern Railway. Then there are the trams, that one could not get information about. I never was able to get any really reliable statement, because it was everybody's interest at that time, when money was wanted from the Central London Fund, to make the number of London workers seem as large as possible. It certainly is very large. There is a large number also who do not work at all.

6196. I think you speak of these portions of your district as the "dormitories of London"?—That is the local term for them, with a view, of course, of proving the point that they should have a share of any good thing going for London. There is a good deal, I think, to be said for their point of view.

6197. Was there exceptional distress in Edmonton last winter?—Not in the winter just over, but in the winter before there was a great deal of distress. In Edmonton it was coped with; there was never any great pressure on the guardians. A few people, I think a couple of hundred, of the more respectable were found work at the guardians' schools, trenching and so on, for wages, about 400 or so more—I cannot give the exact numbers now—were employed in the labour yard. That included doing work in the workhouse of various sorts, but the total number did not increase very much over the previous year. The total number relieved on the 1st January, 1905, was, outrelief, 3,297, and the previous year 3,198. There was very little difference in that way. In the indoor relief there was about 100 increase, but there were large numbers assisted by private charity. In Tottenham the matter was specially taken up by a London morning newspaper. I think the amount that they collected was £7,000; in addition to gifts of food to the value of nearly £3,000; and a good deal more was distributed towards the end of the winter, people have told me, than was required. People gave fifty sheep and so on at a time, and there was rather a difficulty in getting rid of them. This year there has not been anything of the sort.

6198. Did people flock into the district in consequence of that?—I never heard of that. I think it was pretty strictly kept to residents.

6199. This union of Edmonton, I think, includes Tottenham?—Yes. Edmonton is a smaller parish than Tottenham; very much.

6200. The distress in that union was, I suppose, largely caused by the reduction in the employment at the Government factories?—That would only apply, I think, to Enfield, another parish farther up. That was a cause, but the two most distressed parishes by far were Edmonton and Tottenham. I do not think they were affected at all, certainly not Tottenham, by Government work.

6201. It would be more the curtailment of employment in London?—Yes. I think a great many of these people are only casual workers at any time. They do a day or a day and a half in the week. In the summer they can manage more or less with that. They can manage with much less in the summer; they do not want coal and so on. They live in a hand-to-mouth sort of way in the summer, but in the winter, when the weather is worse, and there probably is rather less work, they have nothing.

6202. The source of employment of those people would be London, I suppose?—I should say many of them are van-drivers, outside porters, and so on. The Distress Committees' lists give bricklayers, bricklayers' labourers, general labourers, painters and carmen as specially numerous.

6203. Are there many connected with the building trade?—Yes, builders' labourers; and that trade has been bad for the last two winters—very bad.

6204. Are there many of the sort of casual occupations that surround society, waiters and that class of person?—I have not seen many old dress suits or shirts down there when I have been walking about; so I should not like to say that. One does not notice very many foreigners there. I do not say they are not there, but I have not seen them; Edmonton is not like St. George's-in-the-East at all.

6205. I think the Great Eastern Railway runs trains during the whole twenty-four hours?—I believe so.

6206. Every half hour?—I do not think every half hour all through the night.

6208. Looking at it from your point of view, do you think these out-districts ought to be considered for certain administrative purposes as part of London?—I should be very pleased to see them included in any advantages there are, but I do not know that they are very anxious to come in if they have to take their fair share of everything. At present their pauperism is better than in London; they would lose by coming in, because the London average is about one in forty, or something of that sort. It is by no means as bad as that yet in any of these places, Brentford, Willesden or Edmonton. I believe in Tottenham there has been some talk lately of applying to be included in London. The parish of Tottenham is on the fringe of London already, it touches London.

6209. It touches Finsbury?—Yes, Finsbury Park adjoins Hornsey, which is another part of the Edmonton Union, but Islington is on the south side of the Edmonton Union—Hampstead, Islington and Hackney, in a line.

Immigrants into London suburban unions.

6210. This immigration is almost exclusively of working class people. Take this as a test; should you say there was any considerable proportion of the increased population which kept servants?—No, I should think very few, except doctors and professional men, possibly a few solicitors. I think there are very few indeed of the new people. There are some houses being built farther out in the Edmonton Union, about Southgate, and so on, of a better class, and in Enfield there are very many good houses indeed—£120, or £150 houses; quite good houses; and then, of course, in Brentford there are some better properties. In Willesden there are many houses where I should say one servant is kept—quite half of them.

6211. The tendency, I presume, as facilities for locomotion increase, is to make districts immediately near London more and more inhabited by the poor as the well-to-do in those districts go farther away?—Yes.

6212. That has been the case at Tottenham?—Yes, I think that is so. Of course it is handy for them to be near, because of their work in London. That probably stops the emigration to a certain extent. Some fairly well-to-do people find it useful to be near their work, and not to go too far out. Of course there are local circumstances in all these cases. Near Finsbury Park, for instance, in the Hornsey District, there are some very good houses close to the New River which will probably continue to be inhabited by the same people.

6214. It is the poorer and lower districts of Edmonton, which are nearer the river, that are so rapidly covered with a cheap class of building?—Yes.

Effect on pauperism of Workmen's Compensation Act.

6215. In the evidence of other inspectors who have come before us there have been allusions made to the effect of the Workmen's Compensation Act. It is alleged in certain quarters that the tendency of that Act has been to reduce the age at which workmen and others are discharged, because the masters do not want to incur an increased liability from retaining oldish men in their employ. Have those remarks been made to you at all?—I have heard cases of it, but not sufficiently numerous for it to be worth making a point of it. In the boot trade the men fall out not, I think, on account of the risk of injury, but because they cannot keep up in the team work with the younger men; and then, of course, the agricultural labourer does not lose his work through it. That is not my experience.

6216. The agricultural labourer is now under the Compensation Act?—He is, in certain circumstances, under it.

6217. In the agricultural districts you do not think the Act has that effect?—No.

6218. In the others you have not seen enough to justify you in coming to any conclusion?—No, I have not.

Difficulty of recovering maintenance from relatives at a distance.

6219. (Sir Samuel Provis.) With regard to paragraph 14, as to the desire of persons to move away so that they may not have to support their aged relatives, of course their liability to maintain does not cease because they go away from the district?—No, not at all.

6220. Is it a practical difficulty to get hold of them after they have gone; is that the point?—The first difficulty is, that they do not apply to some of the people while they are still in the district for fear of driving them away. That is what I had in my mind chiefly here.

6221. When they have gone away, what is it exactly that prevents their recovering the cost of the relief given to the old people?—I believe it is simply a matter of not taking the trouble, that they think they will not get it, and that it will be a lot of difficulty for nothing. They think the magistrates will not grant an order, and so on; but the main point there is that they are afraid of driving away the people who are actually in their district by asking for it. What advantage it is to them to keep the people who will not contribute I do not know, except, possibly, as individual employers of labour..

6222. In paragraph 20 you refer to the continued conversion of workhouses into infirmaries; do you mean that quite literally?—Not the whole of the buildings.

Conversion of workhouses into infirmaries.

6223. Or do you mean that the people who go into workhouses are more and more people who go in there because they require sick relief?—I meant it rather more literally than that. I meant the conversion of a considerable part of the building, or the addition of new blocks, almost entirely in the nature of infirmary blocks.

6224. Does that happen much in your district?—Yes.

6225. Conversion of other wards into infirmary wards is what you have in your mind?—Yes, and the addition of new infirmary blocks. There is the Northampton case which I have just mentioned for one, there is Willesden for another. At Edmonton a great deal is going on now, and at Kettering, and so on—there is a great deal being done.

6226. Have you much building going on since you have been in the district?—Yes, I am sorry to say so, and a good deal more will have to come in the next twelve months.

Guardians' attitude as to erection of workhouse buildings.

6227. Have you found the guardians willing to incur expenses in building, or have they been reluctant to do so, and have you had to do your best to persuade them?—They do not generally do a thing straight off, which is very proper, I think. As a rule they look very carefully indeed into a scheme. There are just a few Boards that I am rather afraid of suggesting anything to, they meet one almost too readily; but, as a rule, I think the guardians are very reasonable in carrying out a scheme when they have satisfied themselves that it is necessary.

6228. Have you, or have you not, found any tendency to excessive expenditure in relation to building?—Yes, I am afraid that that is the case sometimes.

6229. Have you had much in that kind of way, or only one or two particular instances?—I think I have only one instance really much in point where I consider the expenditure a good deal more than it need have been.

Variations in cost of building in London suburban unions.

6230. The cost of building is considerable, I suppose, in those unions which immediately adjoin London, is it not?—Yes; of course it varies with the rents, and the Trade Union rates of wages in the place chiefly. The effect is that there is at least 25 per cent. difference between one town and another within fifteen miles or so. I should say that in Watford and Barnet, for instance, the rents that the labourers have to pay are very heavy. In Barnet a very ordinary working man's flat costs 12s. a week. In a place like Luton work can be done for certainly as little as 75 per cent. of what it would cost in one of these places near London.

6231. The very considerable increase in the population of those unions near London has made additional building absolutely essential, I take it?—Yes.

Pros and Cons of enlargement of Poor Law areas.

6232. You have experience with regard to the variations in sizes of unions? You have one of the largest unions, or most populous unions, in the country, and I think you have also the very smallest?—Yes; Welwyn has only 2,265 people, so I should think it is that.

6233. Have you formed any opinion as to what is the best, or should be considered as the average, size of a union? Let me put it in another way; Have you any opinion as to the advantage of large areas for Poor Law purposes as compared with small ones?—I should say large ones are certainly more economical if they are properly managed, and certainly it should be easy to manage them properly, with a first class clerk and officers. I should say it is a very great advantage to have a large area, but there must be some limit in the area, of course.

6234. What do you say with regard to very large areas?—I cannot say that I have heard of, or that I have learnt of, any difficulty in the Newmarket Union, where the area is 100,000 acres.

6235. Suppose a very much larger area were taken, such as a county?—I think it would be only doing things by committees again. I do not think it would make much difference.

Mr. Edward Darlington Court.

6236. Management by committees you would not favour?—I should not think it would be any better.

6237. It is sometimes suggested that, supposing you had very large areas like that, and therefore classification of workhouses, the result would be that the poor would be separated in many cases from their friends, that is to say, placed at a distance from them?—Yes.

6238. Have you heard objections on that ground?—No, I have only seen them stated in print. I have never heard them.

6239. That does not come much your way?—No. I have heard of numerous objections to the sending of Londoners to country workhouses as "boarders."

Value of combinations of unions.

6240. Have you any combinations in your district?—No, none. For some purposes it would be very desirable to have some combinations, for the treatment of weak-minded people, and so on.

6241. Voluntary combinations under the Act of 1879?—Yes.

Inclusion in London of suburban unions and effect.

6242. A question has been raised, has not it, once or twice, as to how far these unions which immediately adjoin London ought to be brought into London?—I believe so.

6243. You said just now, in answer to the Chairman, they were not very willing to come in?—It is a financial matter, I think, largely with them. I believe that Tottenham now is rather desirous of coming in.

6244. Do they realise that if they came in they would have to come in for all purposes?—They would have to realise that, I suppose; nothing has been said to me about it.

6245. That it would be entirely contrary to all modern principles that there should be an overlapping of areas, that places should be brought into the County of London for one purpose, and left out for another?—I think they must know it, or they probably would have applied before.

6246. (Chairman.) They would like to be in London for the School Rate, and out of it for the Poor Rate?—Yes, I daresay, but I think they know better, they would have applied if they did not.

6247. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Is it quite certain that they would not benefit for Poor Law purposes if they came into London and got a contribution from the Metropolitan Poor Fund?—No, I think they would not.

6248. The Metropolitan Poor Fund is raised according to rateable value; would not they benefit under that?—I do not think so. The Brentford rateable value is pretty high, and Edmonton is not very low yet—not for the whole union.

6249. If you take the rateable value as compared with the charge, would not a place like Tottenham benefit in that way?—Tottenham itself might, but not the whole Union, because, taking the whole of Edmonton Union, parts of it are wealthy and the average pauperism is low. Tottenham very likely would benefit.

Administrative effect of large Boards of Guardians.

6250. The number of guardians in the unions in your district varies a good deal, does not it?—Yes, it does.

6251. I have been looking down the list, and I see, for instance, that at Peterborough you have sixty-five guardians?—I think Peterborough is the largest.

6252. Would you say that the number of guardians was excessive in a case like that; I am not speaking of that particular union, but of a case like that?—I do not know of any harm that it really does in that particular union, or in any other in my district. I know the objection that they may, like some other people, come up on a special occasion and out-vote the regular members, but I have not heard of any complaints about that. I have, in that particular instance, seen allegations, but as a matter of fact, the numbers do not justify it; there are almost always at Peterborough, I think, thirty or forty guardians who attend. I have never seen any report of more than forty-eight voting on any one point.

6253. You would not be disposed to say that the administration was better where the numbers were smaller, or would you say that?—I take one practical instance; I could not say that the guardians of Edmonton, where there are only forty, manage their meetings any better than the Peterborough Guardians with their sixty-five. Peterborough is a large union, but has not many divergent interests and a place like that tends to be very much in the hands of, say, a dozen men; the other people understand that these dozen men amongst them represent them well, and they follow them largely. I do not think there is any more friction or waste of time through the excessive numbers.

Difficulty in obtaining quorum of rural guardians.

6254. Supposing it was desired to reduce the number of guardians some legislation would be necessary so as to combine parishes?—Yes. There is one point, as to the necessary quorum. I do not know if you are going to say anything about that. I have heard of trouble in one or two places. There is very great difficulty in some rural districts in getting the full quorum of one-third or seven, which is, I think, the alternative minimum. In the particular case I have in my mind there are twenty guardians and they are spread over a wide area, and they have very great difficulty sometimes in getting more than six. Then they have to send a relieving officer round on a bicycle collecting people. If any alteration were to be made in that way, it would be beneficial.

Loan medical relief.

6255. Is medical relief given on loan at all in your district?—In practically only two unions. In St. Neots it is given always on loan, I think.

6256. Do they recover the amount?—Yes, about 10 per cent. It is as much as that.

6257. Do they take proceedings, or are payments made without?—They take proceedings once or twice if necessary; after that they give up a case as hopeless, but they make a real effort first.

Casual work given by distress committees.

6258. In paragraph 32 of your memorandum you are referring to the Distress Committees, and you say, I think that in some instances only casual work has been given by the Distress Committees, not continuous work?—That is so.

6259. Is the payment made for that intermittent work sufficient to keep the people till they are employed again by the Committee?—I do not see how it can possibly be.

6260. If it is not, how do they live in the meanwhile?—I suppose they live on charity, the same as they would if there had been no Distress Committee. If you look at the figures on the next page for Edmonton, the average employment given was only three days, that is in a period of a month or more.

Regulations adopted by Guardians as to granting relief.

6261. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) We have been told, I think, by some inspectors who have already given evidence, that relief is administered in their unions sometimes by by-laws, or in accordance with certain by-laws which have been laid down with a view to regulating the administration of relief. Is there any such system in operation in your district?—Many of the guardians have what they call regulations—that would be the term I suppose; regulations largely following the Board's Orders, with just a few additional points.

6262. They are formed and prepared under the Board's orders?—They add a little more as instructions to the committees who are taking the cases.

6263. With a view to their guidance?—Yes, stating that certain cases must be referred to the full board, and so on.

6264. They are called by-laws?—No. All that I know of are called regulations. I hand in two specimen sets (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XIII. (I. and J.).) I have no by-laws in my district that I know of.

6265. "By-laws" seems to imply a power to enforce them. Is there any instance which you know of where the by-law regulating the form of relief to be given in a certain case has been put into force?—I do not know of any. The guardians could give any instructions that were within the terms of the Board's orders to the committees, and call them what they like; but I have never heard of any by-laws.

Relief stations.

6266. In your district, is the system of pay-stations in operation?—It is practically universal. Of course, many people are paid in their own homes; but there are pay-stations almost throughout all the unions.

6267. As I understand, the object of paying them in their own homes is that, on the occasion upon which the payment is made, the relieving officer shall see the condition of things in the homes ?—Yes, and see the state of the person's health, and all the rest of it, and see the person as well.

Value of surprise visits to paupers' homes.

6268. In your opinion, would that be as well done by a surprise visit, or surprise visits, on the part of the relieving officer on other occasions as at the time he is making payment of relief ?—I think it would be much better done if he could pay enough surprise visits, but he could not. His surprise visits are mostly once a quarter instead of once a week.

6269. A surprise visit once a quarter might be almost better than the ordinary visit once a week which is anticipated ?—That is what the guardians say; still, if the officer goes once a week—that is the point on the other side—they have to clean up once a week, as far as he does go, and that is a big point.

Methods of dealing with Poor Law children.

6270. As regards children in your district, what system is in operation there ? Is it a boarding-out system, or what is it ?—There is not much boarding-out outside the union. There are a certain number; I think I have given some particulars in this return—they are not very full. There are 550 children boarded-out either in or outside the union, out of a total of 2,750; 700 in the workhouse, and 1,500 in schools, and homes. Those in the schools are mainly in the big Middlesex establishments—Brentford, Edmonton, and Willesden. In Willesden, as a matter of fact, they are scattered homes.

6271. In Middlesex the boarding-out system is less in operation than in other counties ?—As to boarding-out, you might say so, certainly. Edmonton have succeeded in boarding-out a few recently. Northampton boards out a good many; they try every system.

6272. What is your opinion as to the relative merits of the treatment of children, as to boarding-out or placing them in scattered homes ?—As to the boarding-out outside the union, I think I can only take the opinion of the lady inspectors of boarding-out, and I cannot see much in favour of it from Miss Mason's, Miss Pell's, and Miss Evan's reports. There are so many cases where they do not seem to be properly looked after. It is very useful to have the power, of course, for a few cases now and then 6273. I suppose, in your opinion, it must depend really on the individual foster-parents who are selected ?—And the boarding-out committee who look after them. It is so difficult to get them satisfactorily looked after.

6274. The main thing to be kept in view by the guardians who decide upon boarding-out children would be to ascertain where suitable foster-parents are to be got ?—Yes.

6275. I think, in certain cases, that a resolution is arrived at by the boards of guardians, that a certain number of children who are found in the workhouse shall be boarded-out—say thirty or forty ?—Yes.

6276. Which leads one rather to think that the main object there is to get these children boarded-out, without keeping in view what should be the chief consideration that the foster-parents with whom they are boarded-out should be thoroughly suitable and reliable people. In your opinion, that is the main thing to be looked to; to see that the foster-parents are suitable ?—Are you referring to the practice of boarding-out in the union or outside ?

6277. I am talking of it generally ?—It would apply to both. The position is different, as far as the inspection goes. There is no official inspection at all of children boarded-out in the union, unless the inspector of the district has time to go, and that is practically impossible.

Separate provision for phthisical paupers.

6278. I notice that in the statement of suggestions received from chairman of boards of guardians, one suggestion is made that consumptives should be dealt with outside the Poor Law ?—Yes.

6279. Do you agree with that suggestion ?—I certainly do, myself. I have not seen the suggestion before, but I think it is a matter of national health. I am sorry to say in one place in my district, Kettering, they have just gone the other way. A couple of years ago they built very elaborate wards for ten phthisical men and ten phthisical women; and the tendency is for people outside, with a certain amount of money, to ask to come in, and it is very reasonable they should, because it is very difficult for people to find a place where they can be taken in for less than 35s. a week, and people with only that amount of money naturally want to come into a place of this sort.

6280. In your view, all paupers suffering from consumption or tuberculosis should be treated by the public health authorities and not by the Poor Law ?—Curable cases, I think—not the cases that ordinarily come to the Poor Law.

6281. Where do you put the incurable cases—people who are in the last stages and whose recovery is hopeless ?—If they are destitute, I think they should have an isolation department in the workhouse.

Objections to Guardians administering relief in cases from their own parish.

6282. (Mr. Chandler.) I believe you disagree with the principle of guardians administering relief in cases within their own parish ?—I disagree with that, certainly.

6283. You believe that the increase of pauperism shown in your return is largely due to that—in some cases, at any rate ?—I do not think I have ascribed any effect to it yet.

Causes of increased pauperism in Northampton.

6284. In answer to the Chairman you said it was due largely to that practice; I am speaking in connection with Northampton ?—I put it down to lax administration generally, not entirely to their taking their own cases. I do not go so far as that. I do not say there is any unfairness in it; I think it is the local feeling there, and so on.

6285. You would put it on lax administration generally ?—I should.

6286. Speaking of Northampton, the chief industry is boot and shoe making ?—Yes

6287. Has not this great depression in trade in the last five or six years reduced the demand for shoes from the factories considerably ?—No, it has not. The actual sale of boots has been considerably greater; but they have made much less profit on them, through the machinery and competition. The price has been less, but the output of boots has been greater.

Conditions in London suburban unions.

6288. Coming to those suburbs of London which you call the dormitories of London, Edmonton and Tottenham ?—I am only quoting.

6289. I take it there must be an immense amount of building going on in those districts ?—There has been a great deal, but it was checked about a year ago. The London County Council were opening up a large estate in Tottenham, but they stopped that altogether for a time.

6290. That would attract an immense number of workmen connected with the building trade industry ?—Yes.

6291. And that may account in a large measure for the increase of pauperism in those districts ?—I have not heard of a large deposit of stranded workmen like that—not of anything excessive.

6292. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) Still going on with Edmonton and Brentford, who is there finds time to do the work of the guardians, say, at Edmonton ?—Would you like the conditions of the actual Edmonton Guardians ?

Appointment of ex-vice-chairman as relieving officer.

6293. I only want to know in general, whether they are shop-keeping or working classes ?—There are only four guardians for the parish of Edmonton itself; one is a clergyman, recently elected; the late vice-chairman of the guardians, who has been recently appointed relieving officer, was a news-stationer—he was a very well-known man; another of the guardians is a clergyman, Mr. Tom Collins; there is a socialist organiser, Mr. Mercer, and the last is a working man—he seems to find ample time to attend all the meetings; I have never known him not to be there—that is Mr. Barnes. In Tottenham there are eight guardians; several are either tradesmen or working men, of one sort or another, mostly retired or half-retired, I should think—men who do not have to attend to their business regularly.

Class of guardians in London suburban unions.

6294. Are there any outside people come in from London ?—Not from London. There are one or two residents of Hornsey who, I think, represent Tottenham. In Hornsey, of course, there are many people who work in London—barristers, and so on, I think—living in Hornsey and acting as guardians. Then, of course, there are lady guardians. I think there are six in the union, out of forty.

6295. From the conditions of pauperism, one would judge these are very well administered boards ?—Edmonton, Brentford and Willesden, I think I may say, have been so far. Brentford is certainly very well administered. As to Edmonton, I had to sit at an enquiry for five days in October, hearing about the union and nothing came out against the administration at all—at least, nothing worth reckoning. In Willesden, if you are asking about that too, the constitution of the board has rather changed lately. At the last election I think five labour representatives were returned. I cannot say really what effect it will have. At present it has stopped the building of some blocks for the able-bodied which had been decided on, and the number of paupers has increased there very much this winter.

Mr. Edward Darlington Court.

6296. In the other unions you would say there were very good instances of good democratic management on the board?—Would you say that I went so far as to make them out to be particularly democratic in those places? If you like, I can give it to you more in detail. At Brentford I should certainly say there were not more than two or three working men on the Board. There might be five, perhaps, out of forty or so. I think they are a very good mixture at all those boards.

6297. Very representative?—Representative of all classes, I should say, very fairly.

6298. You said, I think, that at Edmonton there were a large number of people who do not work at all. Did you refer to leisured people or unemployed?—They are both, I think. Some of them might be willing to be employed; I do not say they would not be. There are very few people who walk about, just to walk about and talk.

6299. They are not the rich unemployed?—No, certainly not—the poor unemployed.

Employment of women in district.

6300. Now I want to turn to women's work in your district. The straw plaiting industry is in your district?—Yes, at Luton, St. Albans, and Dunstable.

6301. Is that a self-supporting industry as carried on, or do you think it is subsidised by the rates?—No, I think it supports itself very well.

6302. The women do not get out-relief?—I do not think so. I have never heard of any cases of such people being relieved. There may have been relief to a family where some of the daughters may have been working and so on, or the mother may have been helped, possibly, but no actual worker has had help for herself.

6303. The work goes on pretty well all the year round? There are slack times, of course. In Luton they really do make provision, and that is the main centre, I think.

6304. In these districts near London, is there very much laundry work?—There is a good deal at Acton, in the Brentford Union. I understand the result of that is that in the winter there is a good deal of application for the labour yards from the husbands of the laundry workers.

6305. They really keep the men?—They keep them in the summer, when it does not want much to keep them, and in the winter they come up for two or three days' work in the yard.

6306. Do you think that industry is at all subsidised by out-relief?—I do not think so.

6307. In Northampton there are women employed in the boot-making?—Yes; I think relatively more, probably, in Wellingborough and Kettering than in Northampton itself.

6308. Do you think they earn enough wages to keep clear of the Poor Law?—I have always understood that the women do better. They drink less, of course, They keep themselves off the rates better than the men. I think.

Attractiveness of labour yards

6309. I notice in the Local Government Board Report you say some very interesting things about the labour yards that have been opened at different times in your district. You say cases are known of men who have actually thrown up regular work in order to be taken on there?—Yes, that was in Northampton, fifteen months ago.

6310. Do you think any actual evidence could be got of men having done that?—I do not know whether I could get the names of the particular men now, but I did have them told me at the time. I knew the employer's name, at any rate.

6311. Whose men had thrown up his work to get work in the labour yards?—Yes. I had the particulars given me by the relieving officer at the time.

6312. (Mr. Nunn.) Was that officially reported to the board of guardians by the relieving officer?—I am not sure whether it was; but I told them. I think they knew pretty well.

6313. He had made inquiries of the employer and reported them to the Board, I suppose?—I believe that was so.

6314. And the Board still put them on?—It is a very difficult position for them. The man cannot get his work then. They might prosecute him for not having maintained himself when he could.

6315. Or they might have offered him the House?—They had no room there at all—and the man may have had five or six children. Of course, they could have offered the man himself the house, and applied to the Local Government Board for leave to relieve his family outside; but then the guardians' feelings about the matter are not quite so strong as some of ours.

Effect of workmen Guardians on administration.

6316. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) You told us in one case the working men coming on to the Board stopped a building for the able-bodied. Do you mean by that that they did not wish the workhouse to be applied as a test?—I do not say that. I do not want to do them any injustice at all. If there is any effect they have had, it is in the want of continuity. This matter was passed last year, and the plans were decided on and actually sent up to the Local Government Board, then they held the matter over for the new Board to see what they would do, and they decided not to go on. A little more pressure was brought to bear upon them; it was pointed out to them that the existing able-bodied people were living in infirm wards, which was a very extravagant way, there were no workshops for them, and so on; and the new members recognised this after a time, and decided to proceed, and sent their plans up again. Then about a month ago they resolved not to go on. That is my point. There is a want of continuity in their proceedings.

6317. (Chairman.) If plans are once sanctioned by the Local Government Board, and the loan is sanctioned, is it in the power of the board of guardians to stop it?—The plans had been approved, but the actual sanction to the loan had not been given; the Order had not been issued. We had not got quite so far as that.

6318. It was in a preliminary stage?—Yes.

Charities at Peterborough and Ely and their effect.

6319. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) I want to ask one question about the charities in your district. I suppose in some of the towns, Peterborough, for instance, and Ely, there would be large endowed charities?—In Peterborough there is a good deal. There are about seventy almshouses, some of them endowed, some of them not; mostly simply the rooms themselves. The Charity Commissioners are making a new scheme for Peterborough this year, taking up all the doles and applying them to the use of residents in the almshouses, and so on. Ely I do not know about.

6320. Do you think that these charities have a tendency to attract people to these particular places and keep a poor population there?—I have always heard so, but I have no information. I should think not in Peterborough. I think they are local people. There are outside the City of Peterborough in the rural part of the union several sets of almshouses of the same sort. I am told they really are occupied by Peterborough people of long standing. Of course, as regards the town, the scheme of the Charity Commissioners will ensure this system in future.

6321. Have you any instance where the guardians co-operate much with private charities and are able to refer their cases to private charities?—Do you mean through the Charity Organisation Society, or something of that sort?

Co-operation of Guardians with charities.

6322. Yes, that Society, or anything of that sort?—In Barnet the new cases are looked after by the Charity Organisation Society in the first instance.

6323. All the cases?—I am told all the cases.

6324. They really do the work of the relieving officer?—In conjunction with him. Where he has any doubt about a case, any thought that it may be respectable, he will refer it to them, and they will consider whether they will take it on. I think the relieving officers do their work very well in Barnet; it is not shirking on their part; it is simply that they co-operate. In Cambridge there is a good deal of that, and Bedford. In Northampton they started a branch of the Society last year. I cannot say it has had any result yet, but a good many ladies are taking an interest in it here, and it may do some good.

6325. Do you think where it has been at work in Cambridge and Barnet, it has been of use in reducing the cases of pauperism more effectively?—The result certainly has been very satisfactory. Pauperism, in Cambridge till this year, has been exceedingly low—something like one in sixty-nine, which is about fourteen per 1,000. In Barnet it has been high lately, but rather lower on that account than it would otherwise have been. It is a place where, by its natural circumstances, you would expect a very high rate of pauperism, because of the high rents.

6326. I suppose in those cases the guardians feel that they can be strict without being harsh, because the charities will take up the cases that are good cases?—I do not think they go quite so far in that way as the Whitechapel Guardians used to do, or the Brixworth Guardians.

6327. But still, it does give them confidence?—Yes.

Infrequency of case-paper system.

6328. Do the guardians, in any of your unions, use case papers?—Brentford has been considering it for months and months, and I believe the Committee were going to make a recommendation to the Board this week in favour of it. I heard yesterday that at Bedford they were proposing to do it. No unions have actually adopted it yet.

6329. Not even Cambridge?—No.

Effect on pauperism of return of old people from towns.

6330. You spoke of the old people returning to the country very often after they are past work. Does it not often happen they return with a small pension or means of subsistence. I have known that happen in some districts?—Of course, they would not tell me about those. I complained to the guardians in places like Ampthill and Biggleswade of the very high pauperism, and they have given me this as a reason; they have pointed to the excessive number over sixty-five, and they say partly the young people go away and partly the old people come back; and if they do come back with a pension it is very seldom enough to keep them, I think.

6331. I have in mind a certain district very largely inhabited by old commissionaires and policemen, and people of that type, who have gone back. That would raise the average age very much, but they are all self-supporting?—Is that a country district?

6332. Yes, that is a country district?—I do not know any like that.

Conditions in Brixworth union.

6333. (Mr. Gardiner.) I notice the percentage of pauperism in Brixworth, which is a very famous union, is rising now. Can you tell us what that is due to?—I do not think it is too high now, it is about 1 in 47.

6334. It has risen suddenly?—It has been very much higher than that. At Brixworth the pendulum has moved backwards and forwards a good deal. After Mr. Pell's and Canon Bury's régime there came a very different one. It was very high then. It is pretty reasonable now. They have a good many old people there.

6335. Did the district rebel under the strict régime?—No; it was under a new chairman. It was largely due to the influence of a particular man.

6336. I did not know whether the district had rebelled against the strict policy?—I do not think so. If it did it found out that it was mistaken, and it went back pretty well to Mr. Pell's system afterwards.

Size of Inspectors' districts and effect on inspections, &c.

6337. Would you find it more easy to get a more uniform system of administration if your district were not so large?—No, I do not think so.

6338. You would not find it desirable to get round more often to some of these boards?—I beg your pardon; I thought you meant the unions. I think the guardians instead of welcoming one as they do at present, might, if one went round about once a quarter, think they were being unduly interfered with. I do not think it would do to go too often to the meetings. I do not think that the institutions really require inspecting more than once in eight or nine months. That is enough for most of them; if there is anything special, one goes round more frequently.

6339. You do not think it necessary to see more of the relieving officers or men of that kind, in order perhaps to instruct them? You told us of one person who was vice-chairman and was soon afterwards appointed relieving officer?—And he is a very excellent relieving officer too.

Ex-vice-chairman as relieving officer.

6340. You would not think it necessary to train a new relieving officer?—I think the man knows probably more about the district than anybody else in it.

Training and examination of relieving officer.

6341. As a district officer you would not think it desirable to train the relieving officer when newly appointed; otherwise new relieving officers have to buy their experience at the cost of the rates?—The question is whether someone else should not train the relieving officer, and whether he should not pass a test before he comes in.

Attitude of paupers towards "classification."

6342. (Dr. Downes.)—In going round the workhouses do you get many complaints as to classification?—If you mean from inmates, very rarely; I cannot call to mind any at all in the country.

Provision for imbeciles and infectious sick in London suburban unions.

6343. Taking what I may call the London fringe, do the guardians experience much difficulty in dealing with certain classes which are provided for in London by the Asylums Board?—Imbeciles and the weak-minded chiefly.

6344. For instance, there would be the infectious sick, fever cases, or cases for which there is no isolation accommodation?—I do not think they do. Joint hospital districts have recently been formed in Middlesex to provide for scarlet fever and small pox.

6345. The guardians send their cases to the public health authorities' hospitals?—Yes.

6346. Have they any difficulty in doing that?—I have not heard of any.

6347. Take the case of imbeciles, is there any difficulty with regard to them?—At Willesden they certainly have a number of imbeciles, epileptics, and weak-minded grouped together. There it is inconvenient.

6348. How do they provide for them at Willesden?—They are in one of the infirmary wards. I think I have seen five female imbeciles, and about the same number of sane epileptics there.

6349. I gather you think they are a class for which there should be provision apart?—I think so. I have noticed it more in the country than in the suburban districts really.

6350. Do not the imbeciles rather divide themselves into those who are objectionable to the people round them, and those who are really useful in the house and not very objectionable?—Yes. Many of the weak-minded, if I may say so, are much worse than the certifiable cases. They give rise to much trouble; they are cases which the doctor cannot certify, but which are still obviously troublesome.

6351. Now take the case of ophthalmic children or children suffering from ringworm. Do you find difficulty in providing for them in your district?—With ringworm children, yes, there has been a good deal lately. Willesden had cases, but they managed it. They have separate homes, scattered homes, and they put the children in one of them there until they were all cured. It took about a year. At Watford there are many cases now, and there are some at Edmonton.

6352. Is there any place they could send them to on payment?—I do not know of any, except the Leatherhead home, and that only takes girls and small boys.

6353. That is Miss Rendell's?—Yes. The Metropolitan Asylums Board are at present taking Edmonton cases.

Out-relief to phthisical paupers.

6354. You have mentioned the case of the phthisical. Do phthisical patients get out-relief to any considerable extent in your district?—Yes, in a good many cases they do. I always ask the guardians when I hear of cases if the surroundings are satisfactory, and the relieving officers say they are; one feels doubtful nevertheless.

6355. Attention is perhaps being drawn more particularly to them now to a greater extent than it was before. I gather that you consider it desirable that their surroundings should be looked into rather carefully?—Quite so, but it is difficult to get the guardians to bring them into the workhouse infirmaries till they have provision for them, or, on the other hand, to make provision for them, Some of them are making provision now, I may say.

6356. You have told us there is a lack of cheap provision for that class of case ?—Yes, I know of very few places.

6357. Are there any special points in connection with medical relief to which you desire to call attention ? Let us take the case of the outdoor relief. Have you any district medical officers who give their whole time ?—I think none.

"Whole-time" district medical officer.

6358. In Leighton Buzzard there was formerly an arrangement of that sort ?—He gives his time to the workhouse and the out-relief. That is the only one.

6359. That is still the case ?—Yes.

6360. I believe that is a very old-standing arrangement, is it not ?—Yes, he used to live at the workhouse, and have quarters there. It is quite exceptional.

6361. Does he hold other appointments besides the Poor Law appointments ?—No, he is not medical officer of health.

Attendance of district medical officer at relief committees.

6362. Does he attend the meetings of the guardians when they are considering relief ?—Yes, he sits there during the meeting.

6363. Do you consider that there is advantage in that arrangement ?—I am not sure that there is, because it means that he has in the past made up his books during the meeting. We have advised him not to do that now. I think it will be all right in future. It is certainly convenient he should be there, because cases do arise every now and then.

6364. Cases in which the guardians wish to have information as to the condition of the particular case ?—Sometimes they only want to know the merits of Bovril or something of that sort, which he has recommended. He is able to explain for them.

6365. Does the arrangement work economically in the Leighton Buzzard district ?—His total salaries, I suppose, come to rather more than they would if the work was divided among outside men, but there must be economy in it in some way. They are certainly not a lavish board of guardians, and they have never suggested departing from the arrangement It is a difficult district to get over, and that is probably the reason.

6366. Are the medical extras high in that district ?—I should say not.

Arrangements for supply of drugs.

6367. With regard to the supply of drugs, how is that generally arranged in your district ?—As a rule the doctor still supplies them, except just the two old exceptions, cod liver oil and quinine. In a good many cases one or two additions have been made lately, and in three or four unions the guardians have appointed a dispenser, and arranged for drugs. Kettering is one of them. The practice is certainly extending, but very slowly, of finding drugs for the doctors.

Revision of list of chronic paupers.

6368. How do your guardians revise the permanent lists ? Do they take the whole list en bloc, or do they take a few at one meeting and a few at another ?—As a rule they do the whole list; some of the District Auditors have asked them to do it for convenience in checking the books.

6369. To take the whole list ?—Yes. I have suggested myself once or twice it would be better, so as to go through the list carefully, to take a few parishes at a time, but that reason has been given me for not doing it They vary very much. Quite a rural board that I attended the other day I find have a revision quarterly, and they have it at seven different places in the Union. As a rule, the revisions are made half-yearly, and in one or two places only yearly for practical purposes.

6370. I suppose the disadvantage of taking a long list at one meeting is that it is very difficult to get through ?—It is purely formal in many cases. In some of those cases it is alleged that the guardians of the parish have gone through the list beforehand, that the relieving officer has given them a list of their own cases, they have had time to look at them, and when the name is called over, if they have anything to say, they say it. That is what is said.

6371. Is that an effectual check ?—It would be if they went through them, I think.

6372. If they did it ?—Yes.

Conversion of workhouses into infirmaries.

6373. Speaking of the conversion of workhouses into infirmaries, have you met with much structural difficulty in that regard ?—I have one very difficult case on now, a difficulty in converting the building.

6374. Converting wards which are not intended for the sick into infirmary wards ?—Yes, there is a specially bad case now at Luton. The guardians have been to houses a hundred miles off honestly looking to find a good way of converting.

6575. As against that one bad case, have you any successful case of conversion ?—I think that is rather a point for the architect to answer. There are many things that I am satisfied with, because they have been done cheaply and provide the accommodation, which he, as architect, is not altogether pleased with.

6376. You mean the Local Government Board architect? —Yes. I think a good many places have been satisfactorily converted from the point of view merely of economy and utility.

6377. Are the medical officers satisfied in those cases ? —Yes, I think I might say so. Of course, there are difficulties in many of them; they are not so economical, to work, and they want a larger staff than a new building would, and so on.

Proportion of nurses to patients.

6378. In your return of the nursing, on page 7 of your Memorandum, there is a considerable difference in the proportion of nurses and attendants in different unions. May I ask if the sick include any considerable proportion of the infirm who are not bedridden ?—Yes, a very large proportion do in some cases. It is very hard to get a uniform description.

6379. I notice in the case of Edmonton you say there are 189 chronic convalescent cases ?—Yes.

6380. You have no return of the deaths here have you ? —No. I have not shown it there.

6381. That would afford perhaps some check on the class of sickness ?—Yes, I might include that in another return.

6382. Have you much difficulty in inducing guardians to appoint nurses and paid attendants ?—Not as a rule, I think. In some cases there is more obstinacy than in others. Where the salaries of the staff come out rather high it is hard to induce them to appoint more.

6383. What do you do in a case of that sort ?—After I have talked to the guardians, if they will not do anything, I generally ask the board's medical inspector to come and visit, and he makes a report. I have one case on now; I hope to be successful.

6384. Do the guardians' medical officers also draw attention to the want of nursing in the case of deficiency ?— In this particular case the medical officer does not want any more.

6385. He is satisfied ?—Yes.

Nursing of out-door sick paupers.

6386. How do the guardians arrange for nursing outdoor cases of sickness in your district ?—It is generally left in an ordinary case for the relieving officer to find the nurse, unless in cases where it is simply an infirm person and there is a district nurse, then the guardians, as a rule, having subscribed to the district nursing association expect the nurse to look in. If the sick person wants someone to be with her, it is left to the relieving officer to find the nurse.

6387. What class of person would that be ?—It depends altogether on the class of the district. It is very rarely a woman of any training.

6388. In the urban districts do they get nurses ?—Yes. Pretty largely now; the guardians are subscribing more and more every year to the funds of the nursing associations. I think Cambridge subscribes £100 a year, which is about the largest I have in my district.

Requisition of extra nurses by medical officer.

6389. Do the medical officers make use of their power under the Nursing Order to requisition a nurse in the case of emergency ?—I think so. I have seen several cases of that lately.

Non-Poor-Law provision for sickness.

6390. I do not know whether you have any information as to agencies in your district, other than the poor law, for providing for sickness. How are the classes off who are just above the level of pauperism ? Have they provision such as the poor law provides for the paupers ?—

There are only the general hospitals like Addenbroke's Hospital at Cambridge, the General Infirmaries at Northampton, Peterborough, and Huntingdon, the County Hospital at Bedford, and so on.

6391. They would not take chronic cases, would they; —No; those cases, I suppose, all over England, are in an unfortunate position.

Cottage Hospitals.

6392. Have you any cottage hospitals in your districts, small voluntary hospitals?—Yes; I could not give the number, but they are in most towns. Watford, I remember, has one, and Barnet, and so on; in all the urban places I should say there is one. In the Brentford Union there are half a dozen conveniently separated.

6393. Do you know anything of any provision by way of medical clubs and provident societies against sickness? —Not very much. In Brentford there are at least 3 dispensaries, members of which pay a penny weekly; there are also numerous slate clubs by which provision is made against sickness in Brentford, Wellingborough and other unions.

6394. Whether that sort of provision is extending or whether it is not extending?—I should say from what I have read, and heard, insurance apart from share-out clubs is diminishing in most towns certainly, and in the country districts I should say it is very little indeed.

Inspectors' knowledge of Guardians proceedings.

6395. Do any of your guardians print their agenda?—Yes.

6396. Do they send you copies?—No.

6397. Would it be of assistance to you if they did? —No, I do not think it would. Do you mean with a view to my attending?

6398. With a view to your knowing what is going on? —I would sooner have the minutes.

6399. You do not get those, I suppose?—No; if there is anything special, on the agenda, most of the clerks take the opportunity of giving me the information on the weekly A form, just before.

6400. There is a space for that purpose?—Yes; I should have gone to a board meeting to-day on a hint of this kind, if I had not been called here.

Interaction of ill lax Poor Law administration and inadequate housing accommodation.

6401. (Mr. Phelps.) In your last two reports to the Local Government Board you dwell a good deal on the state of the housing in your district. Do you think that stands in any relation to poor-law administration?—I think it does in the country districts very much.

6402. In what way?—I think the rural exodus is largely due to the difficulty in finding accommodation by young people. That is the first thing. Then the state in which they live is another very big question.

6403. In what way does the state in which they live affect the poor law, do you think?—I think you get immorality for one thing; you get disease, you get actual imbecility and all kinds of deterioration.

6404. Do you think that a bad type of cottage in the country is often kept alive by liberal outdoor relief?—Yes, of course it would be to some extent. If the people had not any money to live there, they would have to go out, you might say.

6405. And come into the House?—Yes.

6406. Have you ever had reason to think in the towns that guardians were interested in a poor class of cottage? —I have known cottages without decent sanitation and so on, some of which were occupied by persons in receipt of out-relief, and which belonged to guardians, but I should not like to say one way or the other.

6407. You have never had grounds to think that outdoor relief was given to tenants of persons interested?—No, I could not say one way or the other.

6408. Have you any remedy to suggest with regard to the housing of the poor in the country districts, from your experience?—No, I have not. I have seen many suggestions, but all that I have seen seem to me to be quite impracticable. I should like to put in extracts from recently issued reports by Medical Officers of Health for two of the poorest rural districts, Buntingford and Linton (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XIII. (K).)

Peterborough charities and their effect.

6409. In the town you instanced with regard to charities, the town of Peterborough, I gathered you said that people were not attracted into Peterborough much by the existing charities?—Not so far as I know.

6410. Do you think people are attracted from one parish to another within Peterborough by the existence of charities?—I do not know; I have not heard of that.

6411. You would not say you find very often a bad class of houses tenanted in consequence of the charities?—I do not think so.

6412. You have no experience of that?—No. I rather think in Peterborough the town charities are all in one.

Conditions in Cambridge union.

6413. Take for a moment the case of Cambridge. You know the conditions of Cambridge; it is of course a university town?—Yes.

6414. The year is therefore divided into terms and vacations?—Yes.

6415. Does that make an appreciable difference in the industrial conditions?—I have never noticed any. I am in there pretty often, but I do not see more people loafing about.

6416. Do you find that the board of guardians have a greater number of applications in the summer than in the winter?—Certainly not.

6417. You do not find a tendency on the part of the guardians to help people tide over the long vacation?—No, I do not think so. They have been a very good board of guardians hitherto.

6418. Is the university represented on the board?—Not to any very great extent; the wife of one of the professors is a guardian, and one of the other guardians, Dr. Dalton, is always spoken of as a connecting link with the University, and that is all.

6419. Do you think that the casual character of employment in university towns is a factor in Cambridge?—I am told that a great many of the men there live on the women's earnings as bed-makers, and that does account for a number who come up in the winter.

6420. Is the proportion of able-bodied large in Cambridge?—No; very small indeed.

6421. You said at Cambridge the Charity Organisation Society worked with the guardians?—Yes.

Co-operation between charities and Poor Law.

6422. Do you know on what lines they work; is it by inquiry or relief?—I should say that it was more in the way of inquiry.

6423. Do you think, for instance, they take off the hands of the guardians aged and deserving cases?—I cannot give any figures.

6424. Have they a pension scheme?—That I ought to know, because I heard a paper read two years ago by a member, but I cannot give any particulars now.

6425. Have you any opinion as to how far that system could be carried, whether you could draw a clear line between the work of charity and the poor law?—If you had sufficient means from the charitable you could take all the deserving cases, I suppose, from the poor law altogether.

6426. You could make the poor law relief purely institutional?—Yes.

6427. Do you think that would be a good thing?—I doubt whether it would be practicable.

6428. Do you suppose that charitable funds administered in that way can do the work of the poor law as well as outdoor relief does it now?—Yes; I do not see why not at all.

Out relief and maintenance by relatives.

6429. You think that the system of outdoor relief checks assistance from relatives?—Yes; I am sure it does.

6430. You think a great deal more might be done in the way of making relatives support one another?—Yes; both those relatives who are legally liable and those who are morally.

6431. You were not in this district, were you, when Brixworth was under Mr. Pell?—No.

Cause of variation in numbers of sick paupers at Bedford and Luton.

6432. Could you explain from your figures why Luton has such a very high figure in its infirmary: if you compare the population of Luton with the population of Bedford the sick in the infirmary is abnormally large?—I am afraid for real comparison these figures are not thoroughly reliable. The master who furnishes the figures in some cases gives all the occupants of the sick wards and convalescent wards: sometimes he will only give the ones that either in his opinion or the medical officer's are really sick. Luton I have got down this year, I think, as 149. That would be the total number in the infirmary wards on that date.

Mr. Edward Darlington Court.

20 Mar. 1906.

6433. Now take Bedford; Bedford is eighty-five?—I have got the previous year's return here, and Luton is eighty-five there. I believe there is actually an increase of ten or fifteen, or something like that, in the numbers in the infirmary wards.

6434. It is largely a matter of classification?—Yes, it is. I think you might take the numbers at Bedford and Luton as really not very different.

Nursing staff at Kettering.

6435. You know the infirmary at Kettering?—Yes.

6436. They employ probationers a good deal there, do they not?—Yes, but they have a number of other nurses. They have a considerable staff of trained nurses as well.

6437. Do you know the proportion between the nurses and probationers there?—I have in this return one superintendent nurse, and last year there was another certified nurse, she has gone, unfortunately, and they have not replaced her. I think that does rather bring out your point. There are seven nurses with more than a year's training.

6438. Have you much experience of the probationer system?—I should not like to pose as an authority at all.

Difficulties re settlement.

6439. Do you find any difficulties still arising from settlement in your district?—One often hears grumbles, and so on, but I have never heard of any really strong desire for the abrogation of the law of settlement; only just ordinary grumbles about cases.

Operation of Relief to school children order.

6440. (Miss Hill.) You refer in paragraph 34 to the Underfeeding of School Children Order, and you say it was used in one union specially. What was the process? The information was sent from the school, was it?—Yes.

6441. And then the guardians inquired into it?—Yes, the guardians inquired.

6442. Which union was that?—Kettering.

6443. I gather that very few of the applicants sent in were found really in need?—No, all that were sent in in Kettering were relieved except, I think, one family. Up to the 8th February application had been made on behalf of 42 children in 14 families; 10 children were added by the 20th February, and they were all found sufficiently in need to satisfy the guardians.

6444. That was not the case in another union?—No.

6445. Which union was that?—That was Northampton, the neighbouring union.

6446. There were very few found?—I think their applications were something like 200, but none at all were found to require it.

Operation of distress committees and results.

6448. With regard to the Distress Committees, I see you say a certain number in each place were willing to be emigrated. Would a good many of those be emigrated?—No. The one man in Northampton willing to be emigrated was emigrated. He was sent out to his friends in Canada. No others have been sent by Distress Committees at all. In the Edmonton Union in the Tottenham district a number of men were emigrated under Mr. David's scheme; about 50 families have been sent out. The scheme has been financed by Lord Rothschild, and they propose to send out 200 families.

6449. Will any of the others be dealt with?—I am afraid not.

6450. With regard to those put to the relief works, was there any necessary term of residence in the district before they were employed?—Yes.

6451. A year?—I believe they were strict on that.

6452. So that there is no evidence of people coming into the district for it?—No.

6453. In the summer is there any evidence of what has become of those men?—No, I think that really those men are knocking about in the summer, too.

6454. So that it will be much the same thing again in successive winters?—I see no reason to expect any improvement whatever in any of these districts. It is simply a matter of the building trade being better next year, perhaps. If the building trade is no better, nothing has been done this year to lift these people.

6456. They will be looking for the same thing year after year. Is the work such that it really cultivates their energy and powers, do you think, or is it like so very much made work, not the same sort of discipline?—I do not think it has been made work that they have done as a rule; it has been mostly digging and wheeling, and so on. It is better than carrying a dumb-bell up and down a room, I think. They have had something to show at the end of the time; they have filled in culverts, and made banks up, and so on.

6457. Still I suppose the man who works hard and the man who does not work hard are all treated very much alike?—There is nothing like the stimulus of ordinary labour; the other workmen perhaps encourage them to do their share. I think public opinion represented by the other workmen is the only influence.

6458. Do you think that would come to very much where the work was paid for out of the Common Fund, and there was no chance of dismissal?—No, I do not think it is much good. I regard it as rather worse than a labour yard myself.

6459. So I gathered. That is the fruit, perhaps, of its being work without being work?—Yes, it is less regular and less compulsory.

6460. And there is less stimulus to do your best?—I think so; but it is a little better sort of work as far as it goes than you can give in the ordinary labour yard. I think it is a little better than stone-breaking.

6461. It is, perhaps, fairer on the men who have not been accustomed to stone-breaking. It is more work a man can do who has only a certain amount of muscular strength?—I do not think stone-breaking is difficult work. I have done a little of it. It is only because it is unprofitable and dangerous that I object to it; it is dangerous to the eyes.

6462. The man who is accustomed to do it can do it with great ease?—That is so.

6463. It tells very much more severely on those who have not done any before?—That is so.

Nursing st at Ketteri

6464. (Mr. Phelps.) I think there is some modification that you wish to make in an answer you gave to me earlier in the day about the nurses at Kettering?—Yes. You suggested that there were a number of probationers. I want to point out that while there are ninety-four sick cases, there is at the moment one superintendent nurse and no other certified nurses, but there are seven nurses with more than one year's training and one other with less; so that really there is only one probationer in her first year at Kettering. It is not the ordinary probation system that they have there, as they do not qualify for the post of superintendent nurse; but it is found very useful in practice to have these people instead of just the plain workhouse nurse. The total at Kettering is nine nurses by day and three by night. It really is exceedingly well nursed as a rule.

Permanent labour-yar at Northan ton.

6465. (Professor Smart.) Do I understand that there is a permanent stone-yard opened at Northampton now?—It has been open since May, 1904, but I hope it is not permanent. The numbers employed for the last week for which I have the returns—I think the returns are for ten days ago—were 160 or so.

6466. Is that going up or going down?—It is going down, but very slowly.

6467. Why was this stone yard opened at all?—Because of the depression in the boot trade.

6468. Was there not sufficient workhouse accommodation?—No, there was nothing like enough workhouse accommodation; the workhouse was very full indeed at the time.

6469. The guardians adhere to the orthodox principle, I suppose, that when there is workhouse accommodation a stone yard should not be opened?—I hope so, but at present the surplus will not be more than about seventy or eighty beds when the infirmary is finished, which it should be in another fortnight or so, and there are at this present moment 160 men in the stone yard.

6470. (Miss Hill.) Would they all come into the workhouse?—They have been doing the work, and it has been a fair test, as labour yards go; it has been better than most—it is five days a week and ten cwt. of stone a day. They have been sticking to that for some time, and I am afraid a good many of them by this time will be willing to come into the House rather than go away and look for work—I am afraid so; but still I shall do all I can to bring pressure on the guardians.

Effect of new machinery at Northampton

6471. (Professor Smart.) Has there been anything in the nature of a crisis in Northampton?—Yes, through the introduction of improved machinery. At any time within the last three years, different firms have been forced by competition to introduce machinery of the latest type, and as they do that, the output is increased, but the number of hands has been reduced.

6472. That is likely to go on, is it not?—I think it cannot go on much further now, because practically all the firms have got up-to-date machinery. The machinery will not produce more, and I think the numbers of men will not go down further; I think they have got to the bottom at last. Of course this has mainly affected the older men—those who cannot keep pace with the rest of the teams.

Finance of Northampton labour-yard.

6473. Have you heard anything as to the financial results of the stone yard?—I have some figures here of the actual expenditure on relief. The yard was opened in the seventh week of the midsummer quarter of 1904, that is about the second week of May, and up to midsummer of 1904 £66 11s. 1d. had been spent—call it £66 for the first seven weeks, and the numbers of men relieved varied between twenty-four and forty. Then for the fourteen weeks ended at Michaelmas, 1904, the expenditure was £481.

6474. Was that in relief entirely?—Yes. The numbers of men then varied between forty-one and 186, the 186 being for the last week. For the year from Michaelmas 1904 to Michaelmas 1905, taking the full twelve months, the largest number at work in any week was 299, and the total expenditure on these able-bodied people in the yard was £3,205.

6475. That does not include the material, I take it?—There is a little profit made on the material, because they get a little more for the broken stone in Northampton than they pay for the big stone.

6476. Is that all one can say—"a little more"?—There is a little profit—I think it is about 1s. 6d. a ton.

6477. There is a little margin, you mean?—Yes, but out of that they have to pay the rent of the yard, which they hire from the London and North Western Railway Company, the superintendent's wages, the cost of building shedding all round to work in, barrows and so on. I think you must strike off any profit on the stone-breaking as against this cost of material and so on, and put down the £3,205 as the increase in relief. I think there was an increase in out-relief altogether of £4,000 in 1905 over 1904, and £2,700 of that was on the labour yard, the rest being spent on other cases. Since then, for the quarter ending Christmas last, the amount spent in relief of the able-bodied and their families was £1,050; that is rather less than for the quarter ending with the Christmas of 1904 when it was £1,216, so that it has improved by that much. That may be through the opening of the Distress Committee's work, but I do not think so.

6478. I notice that the Corporation Distress Committee are doing work at the same time?—Yes, they are doing work, but their work is laying out paths and so on.

6479. It is not stone-breaking?—No, it is not; it is supposed to be useful work. Then £720 has been given to the men at work in the stone yard since Christmas—in nine weeks.

6480. Can you tell me if the machinery that is employed in boot-making is machinery that requires fineness of hand?—I believe it does,

Effect of stone-breaking on skilled artificers.

6481. Then stone-breaking will certainly not do any good to the men?—If you mean, does it require fineness of hand in the sense that watch-making does, I do not think it is like that; but it does require quickness and so on.

6482. I meant what would be the effect of a long period of stone-breaking on the skill of these men?—I have not heard it alleged that it would prevent them from working in Northampton. It certainly has improved their physique. That is the only good thing I can say for it—that the men have really improved in strength. They are out in the open air instead of being in very badly ventilated factories. The latter is entirely through their own fault, as they will not have any windows open in the boot factories as a rule.

6483. You are afraid that there is some tendency towards pauperisation, I think?—I think it is becoming very permanent.

6484. (Mr. Bentham.) I find that the principal unions in your district are what might be termed out-door relief unions?—Yes.

Large proportion of out-door paupers in district.

6485. There is not a single union in your district, I believe, where there are more relieved in-door than out-door?—There are some country unions which come very near it. St. Neots is very near, though not quite; it is about 90 against 100. Edmonton is about one-third in-door I think. But it is as you say.

6487. Still you would deprecate a large number being in receipt of out-door relief, I take it?—Yes.

6488. You do not believe that out-door relief is really better than in-door relief and less likely to pauperise?—No, certainly not; but if you had relief limited to, say, 3,000 people, I would sooner have 2,000 out and 1,000 in than the other way about, because I believe that it would be cheaper. But then you could not of course do that; that is the whole point; you would get a great many more by having them relieved out.

Effect of out-relief policy in increasing pauperism.

6489. You believe in the theory that the policy of liberal out-door relief tends to increase pauperism?—Yes; I am afraid there is no question of that.

6490. If that be so, your attention would naturally be drawn to assisting the guardians as far as possible to reduce the stream of pauperism, as it were?—Yes.

6491. And in order to advise guardians, you would naturally look for the deficiencies either in administration or in the particular conditions of the neighbourhood where out-door relief is very prevalent?—Yes. I have consistently done that when I have had an opportunity

Conditions at Peterborough.

6493. You find that at Peterborough there is a very large number receiving out-door relief?—Yes, it is very large indeed—I think it is about ten out of eleven on the books.

6494. And the pauperism is 32 per thousand?—It is very high for a semi-urban union like that.

6495. Peterborough has a very large area, has it not?—One hundred and one thousand acres.

6496. And there are only three relieving officers for the whole of that area?—Quite so.

Insufficient relieving officers.

6497. There being only three relieving officers, would the practice of administration be that a great deal of discretion falls to the guardians of the parish in which the cases arise, for I take it that each parish in the area is represented on the Board?—The division is very uneven in this particular union. There are two officers for the rural districts; instead of their each having, as I have got it down here, 34,000 acres, probably those two men have about 45,000 acres each, with 400 cases each, including the children on their relief lists; it is not quite 400 each—one has 400, and the other about 370, I think. The numbers of paupers are not so very unreasonable, but they have a very large area. The town officer has over 800 cases on his list, including children, and he has an area of about 11,000 acres; he has the town and some district outside. In Peterborough these relieving officers say what they have to say about the case, and then a guardian jumps up almost at once generally to support the application.

System of administering relief at Peterborough.

6498. Do all the relief committees sit together?—It is taken by one committee.

6499. Are the relieving officers present when the cases are dealt with?—Yes.

6500. For the whole area?—Yes.

6501. Does the relieving officer obtain all particulars concerning each case before it is dealt with by the Board?—Yes; and as a matter of fact he goes through the new cases with the Chairman, before the Board meeting.

6502. In the case of the two large rural portions of the union, is it possible that within his area the relieving officer can have visited all the new cases prior to their being dealt with by the Board?—I should think that those two districts being thinly populated, and the cases not very numerous, the relieving officers ought to be able to visit the new ones. I do not think there is as much difficulty for the two outside men with the big area as there is for the town man with the 800 cases. For two years I have persistently urged the guardians—and my predecessor, I think, did so too—to re-divide especially in the interest of the town. The numbers were going up steadily till this year by 100 every year, and an old relieving officer—a man who was past his work, I think—retired a year ago. The new man has kept the numbers down. I have been to see him at the pay station, and I have been round to some of his cases with him, and he tells me he thinks he can manage, and that he would rather keep on the whole district, so far as he is concerned.

6503. It seems to be very seldom that the house is offered, or there would not be so many people in receipt of outdoor relief?—The house is very full; they have not the accommodation.

Inadequate workhouse accommodation at Peterborough.

6504. Is that known?—Yes. The house is absolutely full; and I cannot yet see really any satisfactory way out of it, unfortunately. Peterborough is in a very difficult position, but he new relieving officer has had some effect, and if the guardians will back him they may keep the number down.

6505. Have they proposed adding to their accommodation?—They have done a good deal in the last two years, but unfortunately it has reduced the accommodation. They have put up a new dining-hall and a new kitchen and laundry and so on, and that has actually made the sleeping accommodation less.

System of administering relief at Peterborough.

6506. Could you tell us whether the Local Government Board upon your advice have made any representations to them to increase the accommodation?—Not at present. I reported the insufficient accommodation three times last year after inspecting the workhouse, but recommended that no official action be taken at present; partly because the new buildings and drains were not completely finished; partly pending the issue of the Vagrancy Committee's report. I have repeatedly warned the guardians that the accommodation, especially for the sick, must be increased, in fact I urge it every time I see them, and I am going to do it again next month.

6507. There are sixty-five guardians, so you have pointed out; do all these sixty-five guardians sit, or the majority of them, to hear applications for relief, or do they leave when the relief cases start?—They are better in Peterborough than in most rural places, certainly—much better. I do not think I have ever seen fifty guardians there, but I have seen forty-five or so; and I should say that the bulk of them—at least thirty—are there to the end. That is my recollection.

6508. I take it you think that the size of the workhouse rather than the size of the board accounts for the disproportion in the number of persons receiving indoor and outdoor relief?—I do not think it is due to the size of the board; but I believe that if they took the relief in smaller committees—that is quite against all proper theory—or if it were taken by the Chairman, the relief would be much less. Local feeling there is in favour of lavish out-relief I think, and if the guardians get up and say anything it is to say "Make it another 1s."! or "Put them on."!

Regulations as to granting relief at Peterborough.

6509–11. Have they any rules or by-laws?—The Peterborough guardians have no printed regulations.

6512. Have they a scale, or do they decide every case on its merits, as it is termed?—They have no printed, scale but practically they work to a scale, and it is a better scale than is adopted in most cases. It is not lavish even there; they give 3s. 6d. and 4s. as a rule to the old people and some of them get extra for a nurse.

Comparison of unions of lowest and highest pauperism.

6513. In paragraph 9 of your memorandum you say "Of the seven unions with the lowest proportion of pauperism only two, Oundle and St. Neots, are rural; while of the nine with the highest proportion all are rural unions except Northampton;" and you add, "I do not know of any reason for the comparatively low ratio of pauperism in Oundle, St. Neots and Brixworth except the strict discrimination exercised in dealing with applications for relief."! You appear to think, according to this paragraph, that the whole difference between these rural unions is due to administration?—I think so. I cannot think of anything else that would cause it, having regard to the circumstances of the places; I know of nothing else.

6514. The two highest are double the two lowest in pauperism, and still they are all four rural unions; are there any other conditions that would cause that?—There may not be so many old people in Oundle and St. Neots as there are in Linton, Ampthill and so on; I think there are not.

6515. Do you think those unions would form typical rural unions for a special inquiry as to the cause of the difference?—Yes, I think so. At St. Neots there is really nothing to take it out of the category of a rural union that I know of. There is a small town in the union, but not a town of any great size.

6516. Has the size of the Board anything to do with it?—No.

6517. Or the acreage?—No. If you will look at the last pages of my memorandum you will see that Oundle has a very large acreage, something over 60,000 acres, for a single relieving officer, but he manages to keep down the relief. St. Neots has 62,000 acres, and has at the present time a single relieving officer. There were two till this year, but there are only 152 cases there and the man can do it quite well. The other places are rather smaller. Linton has only 48,000 acres with two relieving officers, and Buntingford has only 27,000 acres.

6518. Which unions would you say of those that are amongst the highest in pauperism would be strictly comparable with Oundle and Brixworth? Could you give us two unions which are comparable as far as conditions are concerned? I think you do mention by name the highest rural unions?—I think I do. I have given the nine unions—Linton, Buntingford, Caxton and Arrington, Northampton, Welwyn, Royston, Wittlesey Ampthill and Biggleswade.

6519. Taking the unions with the highest proportions which are all rural except Northampton, you do not name the rural unions amongst those nine?—Those are all rural I have named, except Northampton.

6520. And amongst the highest on the list?—Yes, the highest in pauperism.

6521. Which two of those nine would be strictly comparable with Oundle and Brixworth, so far as concerns all conditions which tend to create pauperism?—I should say that Linton would compare best with Oundle, and Biggleswade with St. Neots. There is the school at Oundle, but I do not think that makes very much difference to the prosperity of the place.

Supply of Matrons and Superintendent Nurses.

6522. With regard to your nursing statistics, I find that there are eight workhouse matrons altogether who are appointed as superintendent nurses; are any of those matrons qualified?—Yes. The matron at Luton is, the matron at Newmarket is not, but on account of her experience she was allowed to act as superintendent nurse before she was matron; she was allowed to do that as an exception to the Nursing Order, so I think you can reckon her as qualified. The Barnet matron I believe is fully qualified, though I am not quite positive. At the Brentford, Infirmary the matron is a highly trained nurse.

6523. Are most of them unqualified nurses?—No, not of these matron superintendents; I should say that they are mostly qualified. The Thrapston matron is qualified as a superintendent nurse.

6524. Having had three years training?—Yes. At Barnet and Hemel Hempstead I believe both have had three years training, and as I say I think you must regard the Newmarket case as the same, because the Local Government Board were willing to sanction her acting as superintendent nurse on account of her experience, though she had not got the three years training.

6525. I think the Local Government Board made many exceptions at the commencement of the Order?—But this case was a recent one.

6526. Those exceptions were made in order not to increase the number of the staff?—That may have been so.

6527. There are seven unions I see without a superintendent nurse which have three or more nurses; is that not contrary to the Order?—Are they described as nurses or as attendants? Of course it is contrary to the Order if they are nurses, but if they call them attendants it is not. I do not know whether it makes it much better to have three or four nurse-attendants and to get over the Order in that way rather than to have three proper nurses.

6528. I have taken a cross column, so that it includes that column which is headed "Other nurses and attendants," and still there are seven that have more than three nurses, but not a superintendent nurse?—Would you mind mentioning any of them?

6529. Biggleswade is one?—At Biggleswade technically there are only two nurses and a male attendant and a female attendant.

6530. Then Royston?—At Royston there are two nurses and an attendant. She really is an attendant there; it is not dodging the Order.

6531. Ware?—Ware is the same; there are only two nurses there.

6532. St. Ives?—St. Ives is the same. At St. Ives there are two nurses and one attendant.

6533. St. Neots?—There is one nurse there—that was really done I believe to evade the Order—and three attendants. There used to be two nurses and they were going to appoint a third, but they said, If we do that she will be no good to us as we shall have to let her off nursing to superintend; we shall have to make her superintendent.

6534. I suppose you have called the attention of the Board to the fact that in these cases they ought to appoint a superintendent?—The Board know all about these cases and they have considered this.

6535. I notice in one case at Edmonton you have still a large number of pauper attendants?—Would you say that it is a large number compared with the number of inmates?

Pauper nurse attendants at Edmonton.

6536. There are ten pauper attendants by night, is that not so?—I daresay it is.

6537. Is that not really exceptional?—I have pointed it out to the Edmonton Guardians, and have argued with their medical officer that they should have more night nurses, as a matter of fact.

6538. There are only three probationer-nurses on night duty and ten pauper assistants, which means that really all the attention that is given to patients will practically be given by the ten pauper assistants, does it not?—The medical officer says that they only call the nurses—that they do not attend the patients but only sit up. It is the medical officer of the Edmonton workhouse who is entirely responsible for this. I have urged it on the guardians, and Dr. Fuller talked to the medical officer with me one day about it, but he considers that three are quite enough. He says "We have few acute cases, and three are found to be quite enough." I have pointed out to him the difference between the proportion of night nurses at Edmonton and at Brentford, which comes next to it in the return; at Brentford one-third are night-nurses. But he was satisfied that three was all that was necessary. As a matter of fact, there were only two night nurses a short time ago, and the medical officer was not at all anxious to have the third put on; he was quite obstinate about any further increase.

Nursing of in-door paupers in district.

6539. Would you consider in a place like St. Neots, where you have fifty beds for sick persons and no certified nurse whatever, that proper attention is insured to those sick cases?—I think that the present nurse, though she has not a certificate is quite as good in her nursing as the woman who was there last year and who had a certificate.

6540. Take Royston and Ware, they are both in the same position, their nurses have no training whatever; is there the same explanation there?—They have only had a workhouse training.

6541. They have no certificates?—They have had no three years training, but they are fairly capable people at both places.

6542. Do you think that is satisfactory?—No, I will not go as far as that. I do not think that Royston is altogether satisfactory, but I would like to say in justice to the Guardians that there is very great difficulty in these small houses in getting a fully qualified nurse to come and live there. The life is dull and the cases are not interesting. At Royston there are only two or three bedridden people, and there has not been a single acute case at all of late. About Christmas there were some acute cases, and the doctor, I saw from his book, was then coming every day. Since that there have been no cases requiring much attention, and his visits have been much less frequent.

6543. Northampton is pretty much in the same position as Edmonton, with three night nurses and pauper attendants?—Two years ago there were three nurses for 114 people, one for night work, one for 44 women by day, and on the male side there was a nurse for seventy cases by day. You will see that the present proportion is fairly reasonable.

6544. Would you say all this tends to show that the indoor treatment is neglected, and that the attention of the guardians is more directed towards relieving people outside rather than in?—No, I do not think I could say that. Take that Northampton case; they have more than doubled their staff in eighteen months. Newmarket had one nurse two years ago and they have now got three, under the superintendence of the matron. I think that a great deal has been done in improvement. But I do not say that more should not be done.

Frequency of Inspectors' attendance at meetings of Guardians.

6545. (Mrs. Webb.) How often do you sit with the guardians? Take for instance Peterborough; would you sit more than once a year?—About once in eight months I have been getting round so far.

6546. Do you ever sit with them when they give their contracts?—Yes. They do not tell me as a rule when they are going to do that, but in the autumn and spring especially it very frequently happens that I am there on those occasions, and sometimes I am inclined to be rather sorry for it.

Procedure of Guardians as to contracts.

6547. Why?—Because so much time is wasted. There is often much desultory conversation and the consideration of relief applications and other work is rushed. Sometimes, of course, it is useful. At the last few meetings I have attended, contracts have either been settled or in some way considered, and I have taken the opportunity of giving advice.

6548. What is the usual procedure with regard to contracts? Do they ask a committee to report on them?—Yes: they generally ask a committee to go out into another room and look through things.

6549. On the spot?—Yes, on the spot.

6550. They do not have the tenders submitted to a committee for a written report?—No, not as a rule. That is done sometimes, but not generally in the country places.

6551. At Peterborough, for instance, where the contracts would be large, would it be done?—I do not think so, at Peterborough. The contracts are not so very large there you see, unless for the out-relief, and that is only for bread and a few things like that. They do not give much away in the shape of boots and so on; the numbers in the house are not large. At Brentford,

Mr. Edward Darlington Court.

20 Mar. 1906.

Willesden, Edmonton and Hendon they go into things very carefully, and there they do have a written report.

6552. And the officers are asked their opinion?—Yes. The clerk is always present with the Committee at Brentford. There was some little trouble about it on a recent occasion. He was not given information and he insisted on his right to represent the whole board. As a matter of fact in that case the guardians went through the contracts themselves as they were so dissatisfied.

9553. Dissatisfied with what?—With the action of the committee.

6554. Is there any attempt made to disguise the name of the person tendering, or do they always know the name of the person who tenders?—I think in country places they know. There are generally about three only for the popular things, and for some articles such as coffins you very often find there is only one. I think they do know, but as a rule they give it to the lowest man, unless they have some cause of complaint. Supposing he has supplied bad meat—it is generally a butcher that the trouble is with—they will not give it to him again even if he is the lowest. Otherwise I think they are not actuated unreasonably by local patriotism—at least not altogether. Of course they would lean a bit to the ratepayer, at least I am afraid so.

6555. Do you think that there is any considerable amount of collusion between members of the Board and the contractors?—I do not think in the country unions there is much, if any, of that done. If it is done at all it would simply be to oblige so-and-so—"He is a good fellow, and he supplies good things." I do not think any money would pass hands, or any presents or things of that sort.

Inter-change of information between Inspectors and auditors.

6556. Does the auditor who audits the accounts of the guardians communicate to you anything that he thinks desirable?—He might do sometimes, just in the same way that I should tell him.

6557. Is there much inter-communication between the inspector and the auditor on the character of the administration?—I should not like to go quite so far as that. There are three auditors in my district, and I have heard from all the auditors, and I have communicated with them about things.

6558. But you do not meet them regularly to discuss matters, do you?—Not regularly. One of them comes to see me occasionally when he is auditing in the part of the district in which I live—and then he tells me a good deal.

Type of ad hoc and rural district council Guardians.

6559. Have you noticed any superiority or otherwise in boards of guardians composed mainly of district councillors, as against board of guardians elected ad hoc for urban districts?—No, I do not think I have. Willesden is the only solely urban district that I have in mind as presenting peculiarities. As I have said before, I have suffered a little bit from want of continuity in their practice this year, but I do not think I could give an opinion until it has gone on longer.

6560. In the case of mixed boards, do you notice that the district councillors take less interest in Poor Law relief than those elected for the Poor Law alone?—No, I do not think so.

6561. You have noticed no difference?—No. I should not know one class of men from another if I was not acquainted with them.

Bad housing as conducive to pauperism.

6562. With regard to the conditions productive of pauperism, you lay great stress upon bad housing accommodation, do you not?—I did in my report last year. It struck me as a very important factor really.

6563. In the boot and shoe districts there is a good deal of home-work, is there not?—Yes.

6564. Do you consider that in any way indirectly or directly productive of pauperism?—I should not think so. As a rule the places I have seen are separate little flats built for it in the Northamptonshire villages. I do not think they would have that effect at all; I do not think they are over-crowded.

6565. You do not think they are specially unhealthy conditions?—I do not think it is unhealthier than it is in the workshops where they will not have the windows open. I am told that that is the reason why so many more men than women at Kettering come in with phthisis. The men will not have the windows open in the factories, but the women who work in the shoe, fustian, and corset factories have the windows open much more than the men, and so they fall ill less readily.

6566. Would you say that bad ventilation was the cause of exceptional debility?—I should certainly think so.

Type of recipients of medical relief.

6567. With regard to the medical relief, do you find that the persons in receipt of medical relief are often persons who do not otherwise come on to the Poor Law and are of a different class?—Yes, in the way of maternity orders, certainly, and things of that sort. In the outlying districts chiefly, quite an independent man in a way, but getting small wages, such as 15s., who has a large family, will consider it more or less reasonable to apply for relief for the children if they are ill, when he would not think of it otherwise.

Effect on administration of large railway rateable value

6568. With regard to Peterborough, I think there is a great deal of railway property there, is there not?—Yes, a great deal of their assessment is on railway property.

6569. Do you attribute some of the extravagance of the Peterborough guardians to the fact that they are dispensing rates which they do not themselves pay?—I am sure that the whole board have not that idea, because the country guardians try very hard indeed to keep the rates down. That shows that they feel they are paying their share. The farmers certainly are on the very parsimonious side, and I do not think that they feel that they are getting it all out of the railway company. Welwyn is a case where I think you might press the point perhaps. They get, I believe, over half their rateable value from railway property. I do not suppose that they consciously act on that view, but still I was thinking of putting it to them shortly that they are being a little more generous with other people's money than they need be—for instance there they pay 9d. per lb. for meat, which is a very unusual price in my district.

6570. It is very unusual, as you say?—Then I think there are seventeen inmates in the workhouse, which is a very small place, like an alms-house, and there are seventeen pints and seventeen half pints of beer, as far as I remember—every person having it, under the doctor's orders of course.

Excessive relief in kind

6571. Is there any kind of check on the amount given per person in kind to out-door paupers; is there any kind of maximum or minimum?—No; you can give as much as you like.

6572. Can you give as much in kind as you like?—Yes; I never saw any limit whatever—except the auditors' surcharge, of course.

6573. But he never does surcharge, does he?—This would really be on a medical officer's order or recommendation, would it not?

6574. I was not thinking of medical relief; I was thinking of the ordinary out-door relief given in kind?—Such as milk?

6575. Take milk and bread?—They do sometimes give more bread than they ought to, and it does not keep. I continually hear guardians say, "It is no good giving so much bread; it will only go stale." I think they are quite alive to that.

6576. Is there any attempt made to keep them right about the requisite amount of nourishment that should be given to out-door paupers? It seems to me very excessive sometimes; has the same thing occurred to you?—I think there is too much bread, and occasionally too much groceries given.

6577. A quarter of a pound of tea per person seems rather too much?—I never see tea given; that is a thing I have never come on at all. Of course the relieving officer may have done part of the groceries in that way. The only things I have seen given are sugar, milk, meat and bread.

6578. Have you seen butter given?—I have never seen that given.

6580. Has the amount given struck you as a sort of evil?—Not in kind, except that too much bread will be given, so that the bread will go stale.

Conditions in London suburban unions.

6581. (Mr. Nunn). I should like to ask you just two or three questions about the general character of your district as it comes in contact with London. Practically you take from the Thames to the Lea, do you not?—Yes.

6582. And the bordering unions will be Willesden, Hendon and Edmonton?—Yes.

6583. Willesden is a very small union, and it is entirely urban, is it not?—Yes, it is in a corner up by Hendon.

6584. Hendon is rather larger and contains a considerable rural district, I believe?—Hendon is about half-and-half urban and rural.

6586. So that when one hears these districts described as the dormitories of London, really looked at as rateable areas, they consist of very mixed classes?—Yes, if you take them by area, but I was taking them by population when I called them the dormitories of London. The parishes with the largest populations are urban ones, and from the population point of view you might almost disregard Cheshunt and Waltham.

6587. Willesden has a very fair population, consisting of professional people and retired shopkeepers?—Yes, but not very wealthy, I should imagine, as a rule. I know that they raised a fund this winter for feeding the school children, and having done that, I was told by the clerk to the council and by various members of the Distress Committee that it was quite useless for them to think of asking locally for contributions to the Queen's Fund, because all the money the people had to give was subscribed to the Children's Fund, and there was really very little margin for other charity.

6588. Hendon would contain a very fair proportion of rich people, would it not?—Yes.

6589. Quite rich people, would you say?—Yes, I should.

6590. Is Edmonton the same?—Yes, taking a little bit of Edmonton. Taking it on the whole it is a poor union.

6592. Willesden differs from the others I suppose in being able to tap London charity and London hospitals and London dispensaries?—Yes, I suppose that is so.

Class of Guardians in London suburban unions.

6593. In the other cases are the better-off classes fairly well represented on the boards of guardians?—In Brentford they are certainly; indeed I think they are fairly represented in both Brentford and Edmonton.

6594. Taking Willesden, I think the Willesden board of guardians a couple of years ago were themselves instrumental in starting a branch of the Charity Organisation Society, were they not? They kept it under themselves for a time?—Yes.

6595. And then it started on its own account in connection with the London Society?—I believe that is so.

6596. There they are fairly well provided with other institutions, are they not? They have dispensaries and a cottage hospital?—I believe that is so.

6597. Is the same true of Hendon?—I could not say

6598. Hendon includes Cricklewood, does it not?—Yes, except so much as is in Willesden.

6599. Cricklewood has a growing urban population, has it not?—Cricklewood is practically all built over now; it is all railways or houses.

6600. That is likely to be a sort of Tottenham in the future possibly?—It will be a continuation, I suppose, of Willesden, and possibly it will come into Willesden. The Hendon guardians have an idea of a further segregation before them all the time. Their workhouse is rather crowded—it is on the border line, and the infirmary is quite full; and when I ask them to increase, they say we must wait a bit longer.

6601. So that will become purely rural?—Yes, that is their idea.

6602. And Cricklewood will go to Willesden?—Or form a new parish.

6603. Tottenham is the lower part of Edmonton, is it not?—Yes, the south part.

Type of case admitted to workhouse infirmary.

6604. Is that fairly well provided with institutions for the classes that are a little above the poor law?—They have an excellent hospital, but many fairly well-to-do people go to the Edmonton infirmary. I think people go to whichever is the handiest for them. Some people from a distance will pass the Edmonton infirmary and go to the hospital. It just depends on their views, really.

6605. There are a fair number of industries at work in all three of the unions, are there not, so that they are not purely dormitories?—Yes.

6606. I think you mentioned that there is a certain amount of market-gardening at Edmonton?—In Enfield and Waltham and Cheshunt there are very large market gardening and glass house industriesf and then there are laundries and so on in the Acton part of Brentford. In Willesden, there are electric light works, I do not know of very much else; I have no doubt there are other industries, but I have not seen anything much.

6607. Do the market gardens in the northern part of Edmonton absorb any of the population of Tottenham?—Do the Tottenham people go and work there, do you mean?

6608. That is my question?—I have heard no statement that the men have been out of employment through being turned off from those places. I should think that they more likely draw people from Ware and other places in the country.

6609. So that they do not help Tottenham?—I do not think they do very much.

6610. Do you think the majority of the working classes in Tottenham come to work in town—it follows, I suppose, that they must?—Yes, if they do work; but I have some doubts whether the majority of the working classes in Tottenham do very much work.

6611. Are they very casual?—I think they are very casual.

6613. Their wives work, I suppose?—Yes, they work a bit; but unless they take in each other's washing I do not know what they do besides charing. It is very hard to find out what they do.

6614. Apparently you feel that the population of Tottenham is quite at the bottom of the social ladder?—It is very near it, but yet the rateable value is not so low as it is in Edmonton—the next-door parish. The rateable value per head and the rents are a bit more, right through Tottenham.

6615. I suppose in a place like Tottenham you come across very little provident movement on the part of the workmen?—There are very few except the upper working class who come into London, who belong to any provident club?—Very few, I believe. There have been great charities there for giving free breakfasts to children and so on.

Effect of charities on pauperism.

6616. Are they "Express" charities, or are they local?—There are a good many local ones.

6617. Who gets them up?—Clergymen, and so on. Mr. Davids has done a great deal in South Tottenham.

6618. Are they clergymen who advertise largely and get their support from London?—They do a good deal of actual collecting; they even collect broken victuals from the houses. They get something, of course, from friends. Last year Mr. Davids got an "Express" fund of £7,000.

Mr. Edward Darlington Court.

20 Mar. 1906.

6619. Do you think that is both a cause and a result of the pauperism of the district, or do you think it is more largely a cause ?—I should think it is both. It certainly did harm as well as good last year. I heard of many people who did not want the food at all, but who were walking past and thought they might as well have it. Somebody told me only this week of people who had rather a difficulty in getting rid of the food that had been given to them. In the end they had to ask the "Express"! to stop the fund; it is not often that that is done, I think. This year they have managed to get along quite comfortably, and there has been no fund, although the numbers on out-relief have been distinctly less than last year; so that the demoralisation has not done very much harm. In Edmonton I believe that one reason why the pauperism has not increased is the action of the Social Democrats. They will not allow their men to apply for relief, because of losing their votes. That has had quite a good effect there. In one case, however, it culminated in a prosecution; that was the case of a man whose child died. I think the assistance they got from London has been more got by the people of Edmonton and Tottenham themselves, by walking in processions and holding out boxes with bad remarks about charity—but still asking for contributions to be put in. They collected a good deal.

6620. Do you consider Cricklewood is in such a bad state as Tottenham ?—I should not think so at all.

6621. Nor Willesden ?—No. Willesden in actual numbers is getting rather high now; I think it is about one in sixty. But in Cricklewood they are mostly very good houses. The Willesden guardians have a number of scattered homes there for which they pay a rent of about £35; they are not bad houses at all.

6622. You have spoken of the co-operation that exists between the guardians and charitable organisations at Willesden and at Barnet; is there anything of the same kind at Edmonton ?—I have not heard of it except as regards individual districts; but there may be, of course.

6623. Do you think there is the same disposition there on the part of the guardians to co-operate with outside bodies, or are they more concerned with their own powers ?—I think Edmonton is very much broken up. The guardians of the different parishes are willing to co-operate with any local people, but the component parts are really quite different, and they have three distress committees in the union now.

Maintenance by relatives and modes of enforcing it.

6624. I think you spoke of relatives who were morally liable ?—Yes, I meant brothers and so on.

6625. Do the guardians get much out of them ?—Very seldom, I think.

6626. Do they try ?—Not often, but some guardians do.

6627. From what you said I gathered that they made a systematic attempt in some unions to get contributions from them ?—No, and I do not recommend that they should do that. I do not think it would be any use their doing that. You want to influence public opinion, so as to make these people feel that they ought to contribute. The only way the guardians can get at it is by offering the workhouse only, where the person is living with a relative, and there is plenty of money coming into the house. That is as far as I should go.

6628. Would you be in favour of any alteration of the law, so as to make grandchildren responsible for grandparents, in the same way as grandparents are responsible for grandchildren ?—I do not think you could do any harm by making that alteration and it might be very useful.

6629. Would you be in favour of any alteration in the direction of making brothers and sisters responsible ?—I think not.

Erection of workmen's cottages by London County Council.

6630. (Chairman.) You stated, I think, that the London County Council had commenced building a very large series of workmen's houses, but that they had stopped ?—Yes. They were big blocks of cottages. I believe they have commenced again lately. They took something over 200 acres of ground, and after building 140 houses they stopped altogether. There was not a demand for them and the rents were too high, though they were hardly high enough to give any profit. They have reduced the rents and have got the houses occupied, and now I believe they have begun to build some fresh blocks of larger houses on the same site.

6631. Did they finish the blocks which they actually commenced ?—They built four little streets really, but they laid out new roads for the whole of those 200 odd acres.

6632. You assume that the cause of the cessation of the work was that the houses which had been built did not pay or did not meet the want of the particular class for whom they were intended ?—They could not find tenants at all until they reduced the rents for them, although they had been put at as low a price as they could be so as to give a profit.

6633. Do you remember what the rents asked were ?—I think they averaged 9s. 6d. originally—they may have been 10s. 6d.—and that they were reduced to 8s. 6d. They are houses of six rooms as a rule. People describe them as wardrobes and so on. They do not look bad, they are not so very small to look at, and they are solidly built. According to a published letter from the clerk to the Tottenham Urban District Council, dated 27th January, 1905, the rents range from 6s. 3d. to 9s. 9d. a week.

6634. (Mr. Patten MacDougall.) What was the cost per house, do you know ?—I could not say, but it was very high indeed. They will probably last as long—well, as long as—the county council, at any rate.

Need for power to compulsorily remove old and infirm cases to workhouse.

6635. (Mr. Phelps.) Have you come across in your experience any cases in which you thought that the guardians ought to have powers of compulsory removal ?—I am much obliged to you for asking that question. I have come across numbers of cases, and, of course, they are continually cropping up at meetings of the guardians. A person is offered the House who will not take it, then the case is left to the relieving officer for a time, and if the board of guardians is a very strong one they may win; but in the cases that I have seen as a rule it has been the other way. It has sometimes been a woman with illegitimate children; she has declined to come in, and she has been relieved for a time by the officer in kind; they then put her on for a fortnight at a time in kind; and ultimately they say, "What is the use of going on like this week after week and meeting after meeting ?"—and then they put her on regularly. Then there are other cases which I think are much more important. Those are the cases of people who ought, for their own sakes, to be moved into the House, under restrictions. I had some cases mentioned to me in a letter which I received only this morning, which I should like to read, if I am not occupying too much time.

Instances.

6636. (Chairman.) It would be important if you could give us one or two typical cases ?—These are cases in the Bedford Union, and they are all cases of persons who were living in circumstances of dirt and neglect, who certainly ought on their own account to have come in, but who would not do it till they were in such a feeble state that they could not refuse to come in any longer. The worst of them perhaps was an old woman who died in the Bedford Workhouse two or three months ago. I was looking round the house with Dr. Fuller, the medical inspector, and in examining the books we came on a report from the medical officer of the workhouse that this person had been admitted in an indescribable condition; she had been in a fearful state of neglect before coming in, and died about two days afterwards. I asked the relieving officer to give me a report about it. He told me it was a case I had been to myself with him about two years ago, and he had pointed it out to me as a specially bad case. Then he gave me the report. This was Sarah Sergeant, a widow of seventy-seven. It runs: "This old woman was put on the out-door relief list in 1902, when I reported:—'Grand-daughter lives with her, and house has a questionable reputation,—grand-daughter being a married woman not cohabiting with her husband, by whom she had two children. At the March revision, 1904, my note is 'Shares house with grand-daughter, who has two children and lives apart from her husband. She (old woman) has also an illegitimate child there, for whom she gets 4s. House filthy.'" That child was not her own; it was a boarder. "Again, June, 1904: "The two children are away, but house is filthy. She ought to be in the workhouse. One illegitimate child, for whom she receives 4s., remains.' July, 1904, 'No change.' She was then at 89, Pilcroft

Street, and moved towards the end of July, 1904, when I reported 'no change.' During the whole of this time I had been trying to get the old woman to go into the house, without success. At the March revision, 1905, I report: "Is dirty as usual,' and still tried persuasion. In December, 1905, she became ill and I tried again. Early in January, 1906, I met the medical officer there, and he agreed that it was imperative that she should go to the workhouse infirmary. The house was then filthy beyond description and very stinking. The district nurse whom I met at the house a few days later said that the place was so dirty and the old woman in such a state that she really could not continue to attend it. After a great deal of persuasion the old woman consented to go to the house. I arranged with the lady superintendent of the St. John's Ambulance Brigade for her removal on an ambulance, and sent my usual woman to get her ready for removal as well as she could. In doing so the woman slipped through the boards of the floor and badly bruised her leg. She is used to this kind of work, but said she had never had to deal with anything so filthy. It turned her sick. In the evening, the removal having been carried out in the afternoon, the lady superintendent of the Brigade came to me and said that she had been made quite sick and ill over the case, and that even the children who had gathered round the house either went off or held their noses. I should state that the old woman had a very bad leg. The lady superintendent at once reported the case of the house to the medical officer of health." There are two other short cases:—"Eliza Ruth Harlow, widow, sixty-six: Receiving out-door relief, has been so ill for the past seven or eight weeks that she is quite unable to do for herself. She has been living alone, but her state is such that for nearly three weeks I have paid a woman to sleep with her. The old woman is quite helpless, and I have been trying for weeks to get her to the workhouse infirmary, but she absolutely refuses. She is now confined to bed and there is no prospect of improvement. I also begged her months ago to go to the house." The last case is that of John Potter, fifty-nine, and Louisa Potter, of the same age: "The man, afflicted with paralysis, woman weakly and filthy, had out-door relief for some years and could not be persuaded to go to house. At last out-door relief was stopped and woman got their living by begging. On July 25th, 1903, I reported—referring to funeral order for the man: 'Formerly had relief, but I got it stopped on account of filthy state of house, her begging and drinking. House was in such a state that undertaker's men refused to fetch the corpse down from upstairs. Place was verminous and filthy.' I paid two men 1s. 6d. to fetch the coffin downstairs and to put it in the yard; the undertaker refused to do further parish work." "In August, 1903, the widow applied for out-door relief, when my observation was: 'This is the woman whose house was in such a filthy condition when the undertaker went in. If she has relief it should be in the house.' The Relief Committee took my advice. She refused to go in, and on September 5th, 1903, I was fetched to the house (which was said to have been cleaned after man's death) the woman being very ill. Her personal condition was verminous and dirty beyond description and her bedroom stinking and loathsome. She was removed to the workhouse on the advice of the district medical officer and died within a few hours." That is the kind of case in which, for the sake of the persons themselves, it is very essential that there should be a power, properly safeguarded, to remove say, on the advice of the relieving officer, approved by the district medical officer and the medical officer of health, under a magistrate's order, a person who has no visible means of subsistence and is in a filthy state like this.

6637. Are those cases all from one union?—Yes, these are quite recent cases from the Bedford union. I have seen some of these cases. I can trust this relieving officer absolutely for truthfulness.

6638. Do you think that in these other unions, if you investigated them, you could find cases almost as bad as those?—I should think so. I have seen some myself in one or two other towns—not so bad as the worst of those Bedford ones, but still very bad. I should think there probably are worse ones. Taking the average cottages, those in Bedford are better than those I have seen in another town near.

6639. (Mr. Patten MacDougall.) May I ask why the sanitary authorities do not take action when cases like those are intimated to them?—I cannot say. Mr. Edward Darlington Court. 20 Mar. 1906.

6640. Is there no power to make them take action?—There might be a great deal of vermin and so on without the house being absolutely in a state of danger to health, I think.

6641. (Mrs. Webb.) They have no power to deal with a person's dirtiness; it is only the house that they can deal with?—It is only the house. They could close the house, but that is not quite enough. You have got to find somewhere else to put them in; and then you have not altered their habits.

6642. (Chairman.) They would go to another house?—Quite so. It is a very cumbrous thing, I think.

6643. (Mr. Loch.) With regard to Peterborough, have you ever made inquiry as to the charities at Peterborough?—I could not say I have made enquiries, but I met one of the Charity Commissioners several times in the winter who is drawing up a scheme to amalgamate all the Peterborough charities. Charities at Peterborough.

6644. Did he, so far as you know, propose that there should be on that scheme some method of co-operatino with the board of guardians?—I think the idea was to separate the cases rather from the guardians.

6645. So that the charities should deal with one group of cases and the poor law should deal with another?—Yes.

6646. But there should be some sort of co-operation, in the sense of each knowing what the other did?—Quite so.

6647. With regard to Edmonton, the increase in the population masks the increase in the pauperism when we come to your percentages, does it not?—Quite so. Conditions at Edmonton.

6648. Having regard to the class of population which you described to Mr. Nunn, do you look forward to the place growing in the manner it is now growing?—I am afraid there must be an enormous increase in pauperism. My returns show that the increase is bigger than it really is, because I allow nothing for the increase in population. I take the population of 1901, and then I give the result in the last two or three years as being about one in eighty to one in sixty-nine.

6649. Compared with what it may be in the future, there is a chance at present of stopping an evil development, is there not?—Yes, but it will require a great improvement in administration to stop it, I think. The natural tendency would be to increase as the place gets poorer.

6650. What are the guardians proposing with a view to prevent this happening?—They are continually increasing their indoor accommodation, and they have got about 60 of their people now boarded out at Maldon They give the house test as far as they can.

6651. It does not appear, does it, from the figures that they are holding the tide, as it were?—It has been a very difficult thing for them with the population increasing quicker than they could increase their buildings.

6652. Do you rely chiefly upon the buildings as the dyke, so to speak, to stop the pauperism?—It is the ultimate thing, is it not? If you have not got your house to offer, what can you do?—I think the relieving officers there look into the cases fairly well.

6653. To take first that point of investigation, what is the number of cases to a relieving officer in Edmonton now?—About 400. They appointed a new man, only the other day. Methods of investigating applications at Edmonton.

6654. 400 cases per man is surely very high even with the new man thrown in?—It is high, but the area is only 6,000 acres to a man.

6655. Are references taken up in these cases; is there verification?—They had a superintendent relieving officer who attended to that. They have not one at this moment, as the appointment is in abeyance. They appointed a man about a year ago, but he obtained another post and resigned The Guardians did not altogether like him, and they are rather hanging back from appointing another man, but I believe they will do it.

6656. Was the man who was appointed skilled in inquiry?—The last man was very satisfactory, I believe, but he did not quite please them.

Mr. Edward Darlington Court.

20 Mar. 1906.

6657. Was he too satisfactory from the point of view of suppression?—They are all strong on one point, namely, getting hold of deserters; they really are quite strong on that, and some of them wanted the superintendent relieving officer to occupy his time in doing nothing but that.

6658. Did he raise the standard of inquiry in the union by supervising what the other relieving officers did?—From what the clerk tells me, I think I might say that he did.

Conditions at Edmonton.

6660. In the appointment of this superintendent relieving officer was there any large external selection?—No, I am afraid not; there was too much from the inside.

Value of superintendent relieving officer.

6661. Would it not follow with a combination of difficulties such as these, where there is an incoming poor population, that the evil tends to create itself by reason of the fact that such things as good inquiry by trained officers chosen out of the largest field become less possible?—Yes. I have every hope that the new superintendent relieving officer when they appoint him will be an outsider.

Suggested supervision of relief by county council.

6662. Have you ever thought whether there might be any county control over the whole of the unions in an area, so as to prevent what you might call the degradation of administration?—That would be coupled with county contribution, I suppose?

6663. Yes or no—put that point aside for the moment?—I should certainly think if the two went together, it might be a very good thing indeed. I have thought of it in that way.

6664. If that were so, would you think it compatible with county control that there should be some person who should specially investigate into these cases?—Yes—a cross-visitor.

6665. A moveable person?—Yes, I should think so, if he had not too big an area.

6666. Supposing that were one element of reformation in a place like Edmonton is there any other element of reformation that you might suggest?—I think ultimately the union will have to be broken up.

Labour yards.

6667. Granting that, let us take, for instance, last winter or the winter before, when there were the labour yards to which you referred; did you inspect those labour yards while they were full?—Yes, I saw them on one or two occasions at work.

6668. When they opened a labour yard, did they add anything to their staff with a view to controlling the labour yard?—Yes, they had a superintendent.

6669. Was he a competent man?—I think so.

6670. Was there any laziness or insubordination in the yard?—I did not hear of any insubordination there, but at Chase Farm where the people were employed for wages at 3s. 6d. a day there was some friction.

6671. Suppose a large unskilled population increases in this place, and at times there is the pressure which we know too well, then what would you propose as an alternative to a labour yard?—I should offer the house.

6672. Have they accommodation now for such a purpose?—They are going to provide infirmary accommodation for 800, and this will set free a good deal of room in the house. I am expecting to go down on Friday with the architect to finally settle some plans for recommendation to the board.

6673. Will the guardians offer the house?—I think so. I think they are quite sound on that.

6674. Have they ever adopted the plan of sending a man who is somewhat lazy, or anything of that kind, in the labour yard to the house or offering him the house so that the house is behind the labour yard?—I think they did have some able-bodied men in last year, but they used not to have any able-bodied men technically in the house at all. That was when I first came into the district; then nobody was shown in the weekly return as able-bodied. This year they arranged to put any able-bodied labour yard men who gave trouble, to break stones instead of gardening at Alexandra Park, but it has been unnecessary. There have been very few applicants.

Pauper children at Edmonton.

6675. Are there a large number of children amongst the paupers at Edmonton?—There are about 600 in the school at Chase Farm.

6676. Is the number increasing?—It is increasing rapidly. That is one thing that the guardians are very strict about; they will not give out-relief to improper people for their children. They have taken a very strong line about that, and that is how these numbers in the schools continually increase. They had to take two extra cottages at Enfield for them last year, and they are proposing some increases now in building for children.

6677. Are these children the children of people who are receiving outdoor relief?—No. There might be a widow or two from whom they have taken two children and left her with others; but I do not think they give that relief in any other way.

6678. (Mr. Phelps.) Do they take the children as a form of out-relief?—Yes.

6679. They would take a widow's children off the widow's hands?—Yes.

Poor Law outlook at Edmonton.

6680. (Mr. Loch.) With regard to the persons in receipt of relief, can you compare past and present? Is there a larger number of shiftless but more or less able-bodied people coming on to the rates in Edmonton?—I do not think there is. I have been astonished in the last two years to find how few applications are made to the guardians by these people of the able-bodied class. The only thing I can think of that has kept them off in the parish of Edmonton is the influence of the Social Democrats who will not let them lose their votes. In Tottenham I think they manage to get it out of charity. The numbers have been distinctly less this year than last year, and last year they were hardly any more than the year before—not so much as I think the increase in population would be expected to account for. I am talking of the numbers at Christmas.

6681. Then on the whole you would look hopefully towards the clearance of the pauperism of the place by decrease if a strict policy is adopted?—I think it must become poorer if London does not improve. I think the circumstances of the place will go down. The value of the houses is continually going down in the greater part of the union, and unless the administration is extraordinarily improved, I do not see how pauperism can go down.

6682. Some of these workhouses have a very small number of inmates in the country unions of your district, I see?—Yes.

Possibility compulsory amalgamation of some unions for special purposes.

6683. Is it in your view desirable that there should be any county arrangement for these unions, so that the unions might be utilised for other purposes; or anything of that kind?—I should like very much to see some unions that could be used for imbeciles and so on for a whole county; but there are no empty workhouses in my district like there are in some districts, and you would have to convert one workhouse entirely from its purpose in order to use it as a joint house.

6684. Under existing legislation, with all the consents that have to be obtained, do you despair of doing that?—I think that it would be simpler to put up another place somewhere for a number of unions. I was thinking especially of Northamptonshire, where there are quite a number of weak-minded people, imbeciles and so on in workhouses.

6685. You would not be in favour of the county authority having something like compulsory power with a view to re-adjustment?—Compulsory power over what cases?

6686. Over unions where there are small numbers within the workhouse and a complete staff; so that the workhouse might be used for some other purpose?—I do not know; I think there would be a great deal of outcry, and I do not think the county would carry it.

6687. Then you look forward to having to build extra institutions always for all new needs?—I think as regards this district that there is very little room to spare, so that there would not be much extragavance in doing it. There are only about four or five workhouses in my district who are taking boarders from London, and practically all that have room are so using it at present. I used to think that Welwyn, for instance, or some rather larger house, would do for that kind of thing.

6688. Welwyn was the sort of place I had in my mind ?—But the local people would not be pleased.

nonton.

6689. (Mr. Bentham). You have told us that the able-bodied did not appear in the half-yearly return at one time; I should like to ask how they were classed at Edmonton ?—They told me that there were not any in the workhouse. But that was before my time, and I cannot say from the classification that there was nobody put down by the medical officer as able-bodied. My statement referred not to the half-yearly, but to the weekly return.

6690. Did they appear in some other classes ?—One simply got "Adults not able-bodied" and "Children" in the house. That was all that was shown.

Mr. GERHARD STOLTZ, called; and Examined.

Poor
gen.

6691. (Chairman.) As we are inquiring into the system of Poor Law administration in this country, and as we heard that you had a somewhat exceptional experience of the Poor Law administration of Bergen in Norway, we thought we would ask you to be kind enough to give us the results of your experience, particularly as your office and the work you have been doing are somewhat dissimilar or at least not quite analagous to anything that we have in this country. As I understand, you are an overseer of the poor in Bergen ?—Yes.

6692. Is that an unpaid office ?—Yes.

6693. Is any citizen in Bergen who is qualified compelled to take that office ?—As a rule we are not compelled, because it has been found by experience that a man who is compelled to attend to it is not very successful; so now we are appointed, generally speaking, only if we declare ourselves beforehand willing to do the work. But we may be compelled.

6694. Is there any great difficulty in getting gentlemen ready to undertake this work ?—It has proved very difficult indeed.

6695. Would you please explain what is the system of Poor Law administration which is followed in Bergen? As I understand there is a municipality and part of the duties of the municipal authorities is to relieve the poor ?—Yes.

6696. They have a special committee for the purpose, have they not ?—Yes, appointed by the municipal council.

6697. Are you an officer of that committee ?—No.

6698. You are independent of the committee, then ?—Yes. No overseer is on that committee. That consists of one of the clergymen of the town, a schoolmaster and some business men generally.

6699. Your profession, I think, is that of a teacher ?—Yes.

6700. You would work, I suppose, in co-operation with that committee of the municipal council who deal with Poor Law questions ?—I am responsible to that committee in every respect, but they do not generally interfere They meet twice a month, when I may bring any subject that I like before them and explain matters if I do not feel quite sure myself what to do and how to do it; but years may pass without the overseer coming in contact with the committee.

6701. In the meantime, between the meetings you administer relief according to your discretion ?—Yes, absolutely, within certain limits.

titutions indoor-
r.

6702. Have you any in-door institutions, such as there are in this country ?—The municipal council has not many, but private trades unions and charitable societies have, where we may send our infirm or destitute.

6703. Are these institutions supported entirely by the charity or the union ?—Yes.

6704. Does not the State contribute ?—No, not at all.

6705. If a case came up before you, would you have to get the leave of the union or charity to whom the hospital or the house belonged, before you could send it there ?—Yes.

6706. Is that leave given as a rule ?—It depends upon how many belonging to the trades union are applying for admission to the house.

aining and ninisterrelief.

6707. Would you please describe what would be the nature of your duties as an overseer ? It would be known that you are an overseer, I take it ?—Yes.

6708. Would anybody who wanted help or relief have to come to you ?—Anybody in my district. The town is divided into a certain number of districts, and the overseer has absolute control in his district. Everybody within its limits will go to him if they want relief, or if there is anything coming on suddenly between the meetings which we have every fortnight.

6709. These fortnightly meetings are held by whom ?—By the overseer and his assistants. Those are quite separate from the committee meetings of the Poor Law Guardians.

6710. I suppose you have an office, and there is an address known ?—Yes; the house where I live.

6711. Anybody wanting relief would come to that office ?—They would come to me, or they might go to my assistants. They generally come to the overseer.

6712. When a case comes to you, you would, I assume, investigate it ?—Yes.

6713. Assuming you thought it was a deserving case, would you have the power to give relief ?—Yes, at once.

6714. Is there any limit on the relief which you can give ?—Yes; we have our regulations.

Nature and period of relief.

6715. Do you give it in money ?—Either in money or in kind. It depends on what the family wants, or what sort of person it is who comes to me.

6716. How long would you give the relief for ?—Till the next meeting.

6717. Would that be the next meeting of the overseers ?—The next fortnightly meeting with my assistants.

6718. Do not the overseers meet together ?—Only now and then, when there is a question of particular interest which we wish to discuss. But that is quite at our discretion, and takes place when we want it.

6719. Having discussed the case at the meeting, you would either continue or discontinue the relief ?—Yes.

6720. If you continued the relief when the council met a fortnight hence, would you come up and state what you had done ?—No, I would not; but my book, in which everything is reported, is taken into the office, and the secretary makes his remarks, and if he thinks it worth while he reports the case to the guardians. Generally they do not hear anything about it; they will, as a rule, hear nothing, unless I write specially to them to ask them their opinion in some way or other.

6721. Do they ever disallow the relief that you have given ?—They may do.

Finance of relief.

6722. Does the relief come out of sums levied on the town, or who finds the fund ?—The municipal council votes every year a certain amount of money for poor relief, and it is doled out to the overseers from the office.

6723. Do you get so much a month ?—We get so much every fortnight.

6724. Can you distribute that very much as you like according to certain rules ?—Yes.

6725. Is the amount sufficient, or do you often find more applicants than you can relieve ?—I can ask for any money that I want. If there are more applicants I ask for more money. I can go to the office and get money any day I want it.

Assistant to overseer.

6726. Who appoints your assistants ?—The municipal council, on a recommendation from the guardians.

6727. What sort of persons are they ? Are they of all classes of life ?—Yes. Everybody, man or woman, above twenty-five years of age may be elected.

Mr. Gerhard Stoltz.

20 Mar. 1906.

6728. Have you many women among your assistants?—I have three.

6729. How many assistants have you?—Twelve.

6730. Do you work at all in co-operation with charitable institutions?—Only when I find it necessary. My district is so well known to me and my assistants that we generally know if any of the poor get relief in other ways. We visit them very often.

6731. Are your assistants paid?—No.

6732. How many hours a week have they to give up to this work?—It differs. It depends upon the families they have got to look after.

6733. And it would depend very much upon the state of distress and the general condition of the town, I suppose?—Yes, of course.

Size of overseer's district.

6734. What size would your district be; how many people would it contain?—It is considered that on an average every assistant ought to have four families to look after. Some districts have fifteen assistants and some have less, but fifteen is considered the most, because a larger number would give so much trouble to the overseer who has to look after them all.

6735. As you have twelve assistants who each look after four families, that means that you have about fifty families under your supervision?—I have about sixty families; some of them are single persons, bachelors, widows and so on. But they live among other people who are not relieved, so that the district contains many more.

6736. The population under you would be about 300, I suppose?—No; about 180 is the number that I have had on the average to look after.

6737. Bergen is a big place, and it must have a good many overseers of the poor?—There are about forty overseers, and they have twelve or fifteen assistants each.

6738. Then the system is one of what we should call minute subdivision?—Yes.

6739. I think you told me there was a difficulty in getting so many to do this work?—Yes, it has been very difficult.

6740. Is that difficulty increasing?—Yes. In most cases they will not be re-elected. They have to serve four years and then they may be re-elected, and if they are willing they always are, but it is proving very difficult to keep them for more than the four years.

6741. If a person is not willing and has no aptitude for the work, it is work which he would not do well?—Yes; and then we will not have them if we can possibly do without them.

6742. Does the Bergen system generally prevail through Norway?—No. It has been carried out only in Bergen and one or two small towns. It has been tried in some other places, but it has been given up because it was found too difficult to get overseers and assistants.

6743. Have the overseers any compulsory powers? If a man comes to you and wants relief, can you make him work?—Yes.

Public farms for the "able-bodied."

6744. What sort of work would you put him to?—If he is an able-bodied man, I can send him to a farm where he will have to dig and cultivate the farm. It is a farm supported by the guardians or by the poor relief committee. If he is not able-bodied, if he is a weak man, we can send him to a workshop where they sew flour-bags.

6745. Are there places where an able-bodied woman can be sent?—Yes, she can go to that workshop for sewing bags.

6746. Have you a farm, or part of a farm, at your disposal to which you can send these men?—Yes. It is at the disposal of the municipal council.

Result of Bergen Poor relief system.

6747. What has been the result of the system in Bergen? Has it been satisfactory; has it reduced the number of paupers?—It has not reduced the number, but morally I think it is much better than the previous system we had. As to the amount of money spent, that is much larger under this system. It has been very difficult to keep the amount of money spent on the poor at a fairly average level with the amount of money that was spent before.

6748. I understand there was no subdivision under the previous system, and that the council voted a certain sum?—Yes. The secretary, or the chief inspector and the secretary distributed everything. They were paid officers. We have kept the secretary, but the inspector has been given up.

6749. Socially, this scheme must have worked well, for it makes many more people interested in the Poor Law does it not?—Yes.

6750. And they have got to know those who are in want better than they did before?—Yes. They never saw anything of them before.

6751. It has not kept down the expense, however?—No, it has increased the expenditure.

6752. Nor has it kept down the number of paupers?—No.

6753. Nor the number of applicants?—No.

Punishment of paupers refusing to work.

6754. If an able-bodied man will not work, can you punish him?—Yes. I cannot do it myself, but I write to the secretary at the office, and he sends my letter to the police with his recommendation that the police must take the man and punish him. He is compelled to work in a sort of workhouse kept by the police.

6755. I suppose the work that he would do there would be harder than the work that he would do on your farm?—Yes, it would be much harder.

6756. And the food would be less attractive I suppose?—When he works on the farm he has to provide his own food, or rather he would get it from us.

6757. But the conditions of work under the police would be harder?—Much harder.

6758. That is known, I suppose?—Yes.

6759. And acts as a deterrent?—Yes. They hate very much to go to the workhouse.

Number of applicants for relief in Bergen.

6760. What are the numbers of applicants for assistance and relief, as compared with the population of Bergen?—The population of Bergen is 75,000, and on an average 10,000 men, women and children will be relieved in the year.

6761. 10,000 separate people; or would some be counted twice?—They would not be counted twice.

6762. So that 10,000 people out of 75,000 would be relieved annually?—Yes.

6763. In winter I suppose employment is scarce in Bergen?—Yes.

6764. The place is frozen over then, is it not?—No, the harbour is not frozen. Most of the unskilled labour is dependent on the herring and other fisheries.

6765. I suppose the demand for labour in Norway contracts during the winter?—Yes.

6766. And there is less of it then?—Much less.

6767. So that assistance is always required, unless people have put by some little savings during the summer?—Assistance is not always required. A man who finds permanent employment during six or seven months generally will do without help at all.

6768. He will have saved enough for the winter?—Yes.

Absence of benefit societies.

6769. Are there many societies—we call them "Benefit Societies"—by which working people are able to insure against illness or lack of employment?—No.

6770. You have no assistance of that sort?—We have nothing of that kind. They may go to the ordinary insurance companies, but they do not do it generally.

6771. Do the insurance companies insure against non-employment?—No, you cannot insure against that.

6772. Do they insure against sickness?—Yes.

6773. But those schemes, I rather gather, are not very largely in operation?—No; it is the exception to find a man who is insured against sickness. Those who belong to trades unions sometimes are.

Age of paupers.

6774. Are any large proportion of the people that you help old people?—Most of them are.

6775. What would you call old—over sixty?—Yes.

6776. Do you help the children of those who come to you?—Of course, if they need it. If the husband dies and his wife is left with more than one child, they will generally have to be relieved. I have known instances where the mother has been able to provide for two or three children under fifteen, but that is an exception.

6777. How do they help the children; do they pay their schooling?—No, that is free; and they even get their meals at school four days a week, if they want them.

6778. In Norway every man over twenty-one has a vote, has he not?—No; over twenty-five.

6779. If a man gets help in this way, does he lose his vote?—Yes.

6780. For a year, or for how long?—For as long as he has relief I think, but I confess I am not quite sure.*

6781. If he was relieved for one month in a year, say in the month of February, he would then be disqualified, but supposing the relief stopped in March, would he then be qualified?—I should think he would become qualified again, if he ascertained himself that his name was struck off the list in time for the next election.

6782. He is not struck off for a year and then has to be put on again, as is the practice here?—No, I do not think so.

6783. Is the list of those who get relief posted publicly?—No. It is kept quite privately.

6784. Whose business is it to make a list of those who get relief?—It is done in the office by the secretary.

6785. He sends that to whom?—He sends it to the bureau where they keep the list of the voters in the town.

6786.—And then he is struck off at once?—Yes, as far as I know.

6787. (Mrs. Webb.) What is the population of your district?—I should say about 3,000, but I am not quite sure.

6788. And you have got about fifty families out of those 3,000?—Yes, I should think that would be the number.

6789. (Mr. Booth.) I should like to ask whether your assistants look for the cases of distress or whether they wait till they have applications made to them?—Generally the paupers themselves apply; when they feel that they cannot go on any longer without being relieved they apply. We may look into the case ourselves, if we find it necessary.

6790. Would the neighbours come and tell you if there were some cases of distress?—Yes, they often do.

6791. How are the sick and the old dealt with; is it always in their own homes or is it at institutions?—The sick ones are taken to infirmaries.

6792. Public infirmaries?—Yes.

6793. (Chairman.) Are those infirmaries under the town?—Yes.

6794. And supported by the town?—One of the infirmaries belongs to the municipality, but there are others.

6795. Are they paying infirmaries or are they free?—They have to pay.

6796. (Mr. Loch.) When you send a patient to the hospital, do you not pay for him out of the poor money that is assigned for that purpose?—Yes, but I do not pay it; the secretary at the office pays it. As soon as a person leaves my district, I have nothing to do with him.

6797. Therefore in that way all the persons sent to the town's hospital would be paid for out of the poor relief money of the year?—Yes.

6798. In regard to the man you described as sent to the workhouse, would he be brought before a magistrate by the police, or would the police deal with him on the reference from the secretary?—The police would deal with him according to the letter they have got from the secretary. He is summoned before the chief of the police and asked some questions and reprimanded for his behaviour.

6799. Then he goes before the chief of the police?—Yes, he has to do that.

6800. He has not to go before a magistrate with a view to committal beyond the police committal?—No, not beyond the police committal. I do not know how long the time is, but I think six months is the most that they have dealt with a man.

6801. Is your law about that like the German law, that is to say, that you can continue the sentence if necessary over and above the six months?—Yes, we can do that.

6802. Is that done as a police affair solely?—I do not know of any case where it has been done, unless there has been a week or two's interval between the sentences. A man who has been sentenced to six months' labour in a workhouse, and then comes out and gets drunk the day after, may be taken in once more, but then it is under a new sentence which has been passed upon him after he has completed the old sentence and has left the workhouse.

6803. With regard to the workshop you have referred to, who runs it? Is it a town affair, a council affair, or is it in private hands?—It belongs to the poor relief. Workshop for paupers.

6804. It is part of the poor relief machinery?—Yes.

6805. What is the poor relief machinery in the way of institutions? First, it has this workshop?—And the farm.

6806. And a hospital?—Yes; for sick people and for aged people it has infirmaries and hospitals. Institutions available for paupers.

6807. Has it any other institutions?—I do not think there are any other institutions, so far as I can remember.

6808. Practically this out-door relief system which you have described has behind it a whole group of institutions which you utilise?—Yes; you must have them. They are not all run by the municipality or poor relief system, and then the paupers must pay the same as others.

6809. Amongst those is there a poorhouse?—Not a poor house in the same way that you have it here. It is only for the aged who cannot look after themselves any longer.

6810. That is the sort of poorhouse I meant?—For them there is a room called a sick room that they are sent to—or two rooms rather.

6811. Are they compelled to go there, or is it simply an offer made to them?—It is an offer made to them which they may refuse; but generally they are not offered it till they are so weak that they cannot provide for themselves any longer. If they have no children that will look after them, they must go there, but they object to it very often till they get there, and then they feel very pleased and will not leave it any more.

6812. What number is there in the poorhouse?—About a hundred.

6813. Then it is quite a small place?—Yes, it is very small.

6814. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) If they refuse to go there, do you give them any other kind of relief?—I may, and I may not.

6815. (Mrs. Webb.) Supposing they die after they have refused, what happens; are you responsible?—I could not tell, because that has never happened as far as I know.

6816. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Has a man a legal right to relief?—No, he has only a moral right. The nature of the "right" to relief.

6817. Then he cannot legally require you as overseer to give him relief in kind if he is destitute?—No, he cannot.

6818. (Mrs. Webb.) You would not be tried for manslaughter like our overseers are if they died after refusing to go to the poorhouse?—No.

6819. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) You would not allow a man to be absolutely destitute even although he refused to go to the workhouse; you would give him some kind of relief, would you not?—Personally I would.

6820. You would relieve him from starvation at any rate?—I would personally, but I cannot answer for anybody else, because we are only morally responsible.

6821. (Mr. Loch.) Has Bergen many endowed charities dating from previous centuries?—No, not many.

6822. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Is all this that you have been telling us a matter of regulation by the county council under what we should call statutory power?—Yes. Regulations of relief by the local authorities.

*In a letter dated 28th June, 1906, Mr. Stoltz stated, with reference to the question of disfranchisement, "I have now ascertained that the relieved person is struck off during the whole year in which he has got public relief except for municipal votings."

Mr. Gerhard Stoltz.

20 Mar. 1906.

6823. It is not regulated by the State generally, nor by the Norwegian Parliament?—No, that has nothing to do with it.

6824. It is simply done by the local authorities themselves?—Yes. The rules have to be sanctioned by the Minister for Instruction and Worship. They are only sanctioned by him.

6825. (Mr. Booth.) What happens in other towns where the system that you have adopted at Bergen does not exist?—In the other towns they have an inspector and a secretary paid to look after the poor, but in the country they have a body of guardians who are not paid and who meet every fortnight or every month, and the chairman of that body has the real power of giving relief.

Disfranchisement by medical relief in institutions.

6826. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) You told us the sick and infirm go to the infirmaries; does that disqualify them from voting?—Yes.

6827. Medical relief then disqualifies?—Not medical relief given in their homes.

6828. Do you give medical relief in their homes?—Yes, sometimes. We can give any kind of relief, and there are in Bergen five or six doctors who look after the poor when the overseer or his assistant asks him to do it.

Out-door medical relief.

6829. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Do you pay those doctors?—Yes, out of the poor relief money.

6830. Do you pay them a salary, or do you pay them by the day?—They are paid an annual salary.

6831. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) It comes to this, that medical relief or assistance given in their own homes does not disqualify them from voting?—That is so, if they get no other relief at the same time.

6832. But if it is given in the infirmaries it does?—Yes.

Treatment of infectious diseases.

6833. I suppose you do not send to the infirmaries cases of infectious disease; they would be treated by the public health authorities, would they not?—We have a special infirmary for infectious diseases, to which such cases are sent; but that is a sort of relief, and, therefore, in those cases they are disqualified from voting.

Period of disfranchisement by relief.

6834. (Mr. Bentham.) Did I understand you to say that a person was not disqualified from voting except at an election that occurred during the time he was receiving relief?—Yes. As soon as he proves that he is working for himself and is supporting himself and his family, he may go and vote again. I must confess, however, that I am not quite sure of this, as there has been some uncertainty.*

6835. (Chairman.) Has he to prove that, or would the fact that he is no longer on the overseer's list be sufficient?—That would be sufficient, but it would take some time before it was brought in order.

6836. Would the overseer or would the man himself take action in order to get his name put back, or who would report?—The secretary would report.

Finance of relief.

6837. (Mr. Bentham.) Do you make an estimate each year of the amount of money that you will want from the council?—No; I do that every fortnight.

6838. Then there is really no estimate for the year, and you can get what you want each fortnight?—Yes.

6839. Are the regulations that you work under printed?—Yes; there are printed rules for the use of the overseer and his assistants. I shall translate them and send you a copy. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XIV.)

6840. (Mr. Loch.) Your council makes an estimate every year, does it not, of the amount that it will give for poor relief?—Yes; it makes an estimate of the total sum.

6841. And then it comes specially before them, does it not, if there is any change, and an amount is asked for over and above the estimate?—If in the course of the year more is asked for than has been voted, they will have to give an extra vote for more, and they will do that on the application of the board of guardians.

6842. So that the council really has the purse strings in its hands?—Yes.

6843. (Mrs. Webb.) But as I understand it the council cannot limit the amount of poor relief given in the year?—It has never done so, and I do not think it would.

6844. (Mr. Loch.) It has not done so, but it would be within its power to do so?—Yes, it would be; but I do not think that case would ever occur.

6845. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) What is the average amount which you give; can you give us any indication of that?—The total number of persons, men, women and children, under my care in my district varies from 150 to 200, and every fortnight I give 300 kroner or £15 in cash, and £2 or £3 in kind (which means coals in the winter, food and medicine now and then).

Sphere of operations of assistants to overseers.

6846. (Chairman.) Earlier in your examination you told me that each of your assistants had four families under his care; are those selected families of poor people, or are they families living next one another in the street?—Generally they are living in the same house or in neighbouring houses.

6847. Would each assistant overseer have a little block of buildings to attend to?—Yes.

6848. And out of that there might be four families that he would have to look after?—Yes.

6849. But those four families would not be the only people in that block of building?—No; of course not.

6850. So that in your district you will be looking after from fifty to sixty families out of a population of how much?—I should think about 3,000.

Scale of relief.

6851. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) About how much per week do you think that a man with a wife and two children can live on in Bergen?—About 10 kroner a week.

6852. Do you ever give as much as that?—Not if the man is able-bodied, but if the man is unable to work or dead, and his wife is left with three or four children, I should give the full amount.

6853. Would you give her enough to keep her?—I should give her as much as I am legally authorised to give, if she cannot earn anything herself.

6854. Is there a limit then to the amount that you can give?—There is a limit laid down by the guardians.

6855. What is the highest that you can give?—That would be the highest.

6856. 10 kroner a week?—Yes, for a man, his wife and two children.

6857. (Mr. Loch.) If they have less than 10 kroner is it your rule to give them up to something like 10 kroner?—Yes.

6858. That is the ordinary lines of the scheme you follow?—Yes.

6859. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) Do you think prices are higher or lower there than here?—The money goes twice as far there as it does here.

6860. Then that would represent 20s. a week?—I should think it would represent nearly a sovereign. House rent is very cheap there, and so are meat and bread: very cheap.

Finance of relief.

6861. (Dr. Downes.) How does the county council raise its fund for the money that it supplies you with?—From the rates.

6862. Does it possess any property?—No, nothing worth mentioning.

6863. Or any income from old endowments?—It has some few, but they do not count really as income.

6864. You send your patients to the public hospitals, I understand?—Yes.

Classification in public hospitals.

6865. Are the wards in those hospitals graded according to the class of person who is in them?—There are two different wards for two classes, the better and the simple. They pay in both wards, but there is a difference in the amount of the payment.

Boarding out of children and adult paupers.

6866. Do you board out any of your paupers?—We board out children very often, but not in the town, always in the country.

6867. Do they in any parts of Norway still board out the adult paupers with families?—They do it in the country at some places, but they do not like it. There are some places where the population is so thinly scattered about that they still have to do it, because they have no workhouses and no unions and no other places to take them in.

26 Mar. 1906.

6868. (Chairman.) You are the Local Government Board Inspector for the Yorkshire District?—I am.

6869. According to the practice of the Commission, the written memoranda of the inspectors are taken as their evidence in chief: you have furnished us with a very full and interesting statement. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XV. (A–I).) I will only call your attention to those points in it which seem to us most worthy of attention, or which may require rather further explanation. I see by paragraph 6 you attach great importance to publicity. The fact that the papers report and comment upon Poor Law administration is, in your judgment, a healthy stimulus and assistance?—Yes.

Publicity of Poor Law proceedings: results a stimulus to good administration.

6870. As a rule, are the Poor Law proceedings sufficiently published?—They are generally fully published in small local newspapers, but in a place like Leeds, for instance, where the guardians have to deal with a very large budget, you very seldom have an extended notice of the proceedings of the guardians: in fact, there is very little in the Press about the proceedings of the guardians.

6871. Therefore, if some method could be suggested by which the proceedings and discussions of Poor Law Guardians were more widely known and distributed, it would be advantageous, in your judgment?—Yes; and I think that every union ought to be made to publish statistics and abstracts of their dealings with the different departments of Poor Law administration. In Yorkshire they do to a very great extent publish very good reports; I can put in specimens, but some unions do not publish anything at all.

6872. Would you like to make it an obligation on all boards of guardians to publish in certain specified or well-known newspapers their periodical proceedings?—It has not occurred to me to publish them in that way, because they would have to be paid for, and that would be a very heavy expense. I think that the proper way would be to make it incumbent upon them to publish in pamphlet form, available to the ratepayers, the main details of their expenditure, and the statistical reviews of pauperism.

6873. How would they be circulated? To whom would they send those reports?—They could hang them on the church doors. A great many guardians publish the name of every pauper in receipt of relief. I can put in one of the Wakefield annual reports, where they publish the name of every pauper and the amount that he or she gets. That is available to every ratepayer.

6874. I will now pass to the various tables you have put in. The figures relating to relief show a continual increase since 1881, but the rate per £ of assessment of the West Riding is practically the same as it was twenty-one years ago?—That is so: it is a point lower.

6875. So that the increased assessable value has just met and counterbalanced the increased expenditure in the West Riding?—Yes.

6876. In the East Riding there has also been an increase in pauperism, but there the rate in the pound has considerably risen?—The assessable rate has.

6877. From 6¾d. to 8·7d.?—Yes.

6878. Going back to the West Riding, I see from paragraph 17 the indoor relief has increased in a higher ratio than the outdoor during that period?—Yes.

6879. Coming to paragraph 26, you point out that the rural paupers on the average are considerably older than the urban paupers, and that there is apparently a larger percentage of old people. That, no doubt, would account for pauperism being higher in the rural districts than the urban districts?—Yes.

Old age of rural paupers.

6880. The movement of population affects the ratio of pauperism in this way, that a decrease of population as a rule tends to raise the rate, and an increase of population tends to diminish the rate of pauperism?—I think so. My observation has always been that in the rural districts, where the population has decreased owing to migration to towns, the result has been to leave the most pauperised classes of the community in that rural district, therefore there is bound to be a heavier rate of pauperism.

Effect of variation of population on pauperism.

6881. And reversing it, it is the more intelligent or the more progressive who have moved, to another district, and they, as a rule, may not have carried their old people with them?—I should say they certainly do not carry their old people with them. They very often send contributions for their maintenance, but they do not take the old people with them.

6882. Therefore the variation of the population has to be taken very much into consideration in comparing the ratio of pauperism in one district with another?—Yes, I think so.

6883. In paragraph 39 you draw a contrast between two districts, Barnsley and Pontefract, and you think one contributing element to the better position of Barnsley is the number and influence of its friendly societies?—Yes: and I have confirmed that by a further study of the friendly societies' blue-books, in which they give the name of every registered friendly society in these two unions, and in fact you can get them in every union in every county. I find that Barnsley has considerably more friendly societies than Pontefract. That can be verified of course by the Commission by a special inquiry into the friendly society movement.

Friendly and co-operative societies in Yorkshire.

6884. The beneficial effect of friendly societies and cognate societies is alluded to, I think, further on in your evidence, and you attribute to the large number of successful friendly societies which are in existence in Yorkshire the low general rate of pauperism?—I do. It is a very strong factor. The co-operative movement is a very strong movement in Leeds, Huddersfield, and Halifax; and in all the West Riding industrial centres the various forms of providence, thrift, and co-operation are very strong indeed. I attribute the low rate of pauperism very largely to that. There is a point I want to mention later on as to a very curious movement in pressing out-relief by the friendly societies in Huddersfield. I do not know whether this is a good time to take it?

Mr. Philip Henry Bagenal.

26 Mar. 1906.

Policy of friendly societies to increase out-relief in Huddersfield and results.

6885. I think it would be, because the friendly societies in Barnsley tend to diminish the poor rate, and it would be interesting if you could give an illustration of where friendly societies had operated in the other direction?—That is exactly the point I wanted to show. In 1901 there was a movement in Huddersfield on the part of a certain number of the friendly societies to bring forward candidates specially representing the friendly societies at the board of guardians' elections; they held a public meeting in the Friendly and Trade Societies' Hall in Northumberland Street, and they made a very strong appeal to the electors to return friendly society men, because, they said, that the policy of the board of guardians had been based on narrow and niggardly lines as far as outdoor relief was concerned; and they said that they did not administer the law as intended by Parliament. They asked them to send the friendly society people to office in order to materially increase the amount of relief given to deserving people. I wish to call attention to the terms of the resolution which was passed: "That this meeting is of opinion"—this is a big public meeting of friendly societies—"that there should be a more liberal distribution of outdoor relief"—as if it was a fund which you simply distributed all round—"and pledges itself to support the friendly societies' federation's programme and its candidates." Then the gentleman who proposed it, Mr. Pontefract, went on to say that in 1871 he found that a sum of £16,000, was expended by the Huddersfield board of guardians in outdoor relief, while in 1894 it had dropped to £8,500, and last year, that is 1900, there was distributed in the union the princely sum of £7,350 in outdoor relief, an amount which was less, by more than 55 per cent., than the expenditure in such relief in 1871, while the total revenue had jumped from £29,000 to £31,000; and it was made a grievance that the poor had been deprived of the balance between the £16,000 a year in 1871 and the £7,000 odd which was then being, as they called it, "distributed." I put in a handbill issued on behalf of the Friendly Societies' Federation of Huddersfield and District in connexion with this election. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XV (J).)

6886. What was the effect of that appeal to the electorate?—They immediately returned all these friendly society candidates, and they immediately set to work to distribute outdoor relief, and it jumped up at once £1,000 to £2,000 a year more. I have the figures here. I think that is one of the most extraordinary things, having regard to the fact that the friendly society movement was supposed to be the child of poor law reform, and by it the people were thrown on their own resources. Here you have a body of men who have sent up the outdoor relief: in 1900 it was £7,385; in 1902 it was £8,469; I know it is much higher now, although I have not the figures at this present moment. It has gone up certainly by over £1,000 a year. What is more, administration has gone back very much. They give relief to people who live in lodging-houses. It is quite a common occurrence. I went down there and investigated the whole question, and the relieving officers gave me a list of the people. I have here a copy of the application and report book, with certain cases which I think are quite unfit and undesirable cases to relieve. The whole administration has become exceedingly lax. One of the relieving officers says: "In my district, No. 2 Huddersfield, I have eight males and two females who are receiving outdoor relief and living in the Corporation model lodging-houses, and two cases in common lodging-houses." The workhouse as a test for destitution is very rarely offered in Huddersfield, as the majority of the guardians are not in favour of it. I have specimen cases here where wages earned by members of the family are supplemented by outdoor relief, and there has been a distinct deterioration of administration in that union ever since the friendly societies came into power. (Papers handed in, see Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XV. (K) and (L).)

6889. What was the date of this meeting?—This was 1901, and there has been another election since. This placard was put out in March, 1904. Perhaps I might read it: "Election of Guardians: March, 1904. To the Electors of the Huddersfield Poor Law Union. Ladies and Gentlemen, In connection with the above, the friendly societies are bringing forward candidates, whose names will be submitted very shortly, in opposition to the usual policy of the present Board with regard to outdoor relief, which in most cases is very inadequate"—that is the idea, that it was inadequate—"the friendly societies advocate that the minimum relief given to a destitute deserving person should not be less than 5s. per week. They further advocate that a working man with a small wage and a family dependent on his earnings shall not be compelled to impoverish his family by being called upon to contribute to the maintenance of parents who may be applicants chargeable to the union. On behalf of the friendly societies we earnestly ask for your support for their candidates, all of whom have definitely pledged themselves to support the above policy." Then that is signed by ten gentlemen. I think you can gather from the initials what the societies are: A.O.F.; that is, I suppose, the Foresters: N.U.O.F.G., B.U.O.O.F. M.U., that is Manchester Unity; G.U.O.O.F., A.O.F.; N.I.O.F.; and R.A.O.B. Those are the societies. That, as an electioneering placard, I look upon as a very extraordinary one: a minimum of relief at 5s. a week to a destitute deserving person is a statement which can be enlarged very conveniently on the platform.

6890. (Mr. Lansbury.) Do you think the moral effect of that is any worse than: "Vote for so and so old-age pensions"?—I think it is a pity that the friendly societies go in for this form of propaganda, considering that the friendly societies are supposed to be advocates of self-help, independency and thrift; and the more you give in out-relief the more unlikely people will be to join these societies. Why should they? It seems to me that these friendly societies must be cutting their own throats in the end.

6891. (Chairman.) Has the number of outdoor paupers increased in Huddersfield?—My comparative figures might perhaps show that in my classification of unions.

6892. I do not know if you have seen Mr. Booth's figures: according to those the total number of paupers has fallen in the last ten years in Huddersfield?—I can give you the figures of the number relieved in Huddersfield for the last five years, which covers the point. On the 1st January, 1901, there were 1,441 persons in receipt of out-door relief: in 1902 it rose to 1,559; in 1903 it was 1,565; in 1904 it was 1,720, and in 1905 it was 1,911. That is a continuous and progressive rise.

6893. (Mr. Bentham.) Have you the figures for January 1st, 1906?—The figure is 1,934.

6894. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) At the same time the population has been decreasing?—Huddersfield is the only place in Yorkshire where the population has been stationary. I do not know that it has been decreasing.

6895. According to your figures here, in 1891 there was a population of 168,000, and in 1901 it was 166,000. That is a decrease of 2,000 in ten years?—The Mayor is trying to increase the number of the population there by a system of feeding babies.

6896. (Chairman.) Do you look upon the action of the friendly societies at Huddersfield as a demand not merely for adequate out-relief, but for an extension of the system?—In practice it has been an indefinite laxening of the whole policy of the administration. I want to add that that is a very large board. It is an enormous board. You will see from my figures of the numbers of guardians it is a very large and unwieldy board, which I always maintain is one of the worst features in Poor Law administration.

Method of electing guardians.

6897. How are they elected at Huddersfield: one-third each year?—No, they are elected all at one time. I do not think there is a single union in my district that does not elect its members all at once.

6898. We may leave Huddersfield with this observation, that the action of the friendly societies there, so far as you know, is contrary to that which they have been taking elsewhere?—I cannot say that, because I do not know anything about what the friendly societies do elsewhere. I have never found anywhere else in my district a friendly society movement of that character: I will not go further than that, and I deprecate it very much.

Beneficent effect of friendly societies.

6899. You have laid stress on the beneficent work the friendly societies have done in other parts of Yorkshire?—Certainly, because I believe that their action is to decrease the dependence on Poor Law relief, and I attribute the lowness of the pauperism to that fact, and when I see a crusade of this sort accompanied by results of increased pauperism, I fear very much for the results everywhere else?

6900. (Mr. Gardiner.) Might we before we pass from Huddersfield, have the indoor relief figures for the same five years?—I will give you the 1st January figures: 1901, 491; 1902, 516; 1903, 512; 1904, 499; 1905, 529. I keep all these statistics in books for every union for five years, so that when I go to the guardians I can deal with the statistical period.

6901. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) I have here for 1905, 447 indoor?—I am not responsible for these, they come to me from the clerks of the guardians. There are very often small discrepancies between these and the Parliamentary returns.

Conditions in Sheffield, York, and Bradford.

6902. (Chairman.) You draw a contrast between three great towns in your district, Sheffield, York and Bradford. Sheffield, you point out, does not afford much opportunity for female labour; Bradford does, and Hull, on the other hand, is not only a great seaport town, but is the centre for a large agricultural district. Contrasting the three together, the pauperism in Bradford, I think, is the lowest, then comes Sheffield and then Hull. You speak of there being no regular female labour in the East Riding. The amount of relief given in Hull is higher than in the other two districts, and, turning over to page 12, you give a list of the statistics obtained from unions which have conditions common to those existing in Hull. I assume that the expenditure on pauperism in these unions is a good deal higher than it would be in unions which were situated inland on account of their being, as there always is in seaport towns, a large amount of casual labour. Would not that be so?—I do not say anything here about the conditions being the same; I simply say they are seaports, and seaports have different characteristics; for instance, you could not possibly compare Liverpool with Hull. I do not go into anything; I have simply got these statistics as seaports. There are always certain conditions in seaports the same. I was anxious to see what other seaports did: that is all; but Hull being backed with a hinterland with a purely agricultural population, no doubt it does attract a very great deal of casual labour from the agricultural population of the district.

6903. Now we come to the combination of unions. You have only one combination for common purposes, and that is York?—Yes.

Question of transfer of Poor Law to county and town councils.

6904. You deal with that separately. It has been suggested to us from various quarters that the administration unit might be largely increased, and that the larger the area the more effective will be the administration of the Poor Law. Have you any views upon that point?—I am not in favour of transferring the Poor Law administration to county councils.

6905. Or to anybody elected on the same principle?—I have not considered that, but I am quite clear that county councils and urban town councils are not the people to manage the Poor Law. In the first place, they are already very much overworked, and in the second place I think that it would be a very dangerous principle indeed to entrust to them the material relief of a very large number of people who have nothing to give in return, and it would have, I think, a very corrupting influence upon local politics.

Need for larger electoral units.

6906. You are not prepared to make any recommendations as regards any general change of area?—I feel very strongly upon this particular point, which I am going to state; that the areas which elect guardians are much too small. You ought to have larger areas with less representatives and more manageable bodies. You would then remove the parochial influence to a certain extent. You might get a better class of men, if there was a larger district to represent. You will see, in my lists of unions, the enormous bodies which exist. They are quite unnecessary. Vast numbers of them do not attend except when there is something to vote for in the shape of an officer or probationer nurse they want elected, or something of that sort, and if you would reform the areas in that direction, I am exceedingly with you on that point; but I think the Poor Law ought to be an ad hoc body; the administration of the Poor Law ought to be done by people elected for the purpose.

Ad hoc guardians.

Difficulties in enlarging Poor Law areas.

6907. The larger the area the easier becomes the classification of paupers?—Yes, but then you may classify a person out of his home surroundings; you would put him somewhere where he could not have a visit from anybody. That is the local objection.

6908. That local feeling prevails strongly?—I think so. It is certainly a very strong one on paper.

6909. It would prevail, I suppose, more in the rural districts than it would in the urban?—Yes.

6910. Any very drastic change of boundaries or areas would meet, in your judgment, with a good deal of local opposition?—You cannot alter any area in England without the most extraordinary hostility on the part of the people. I have held local inquiries, and it is as much as your life is worth sometimes to suggest any alteration. If one union wants to get a parish there is always a public inquiry, witnesses and speeches, and they blow off steam until really you do not understand the English love of parochialism until you hold an inquiry of that sort. There was nearly a free fight in Suffolk when I held an inquiry once, owing to the local feeling.

6911. Now we pass on to friendly societies. I think we have had your opinion upon the generally beneficent effect they exercise. You make a suggestion here that the establishment of sick and benefit societies for women might be encouraged and extended. Are there any societies now that are engaged in the work of helping or insuring women?—Yes, I believe there are. It is a slowly growing movement, but it does exist. My attention was called to it first by the extraordinary excess of female pauperism as compared with male. You will find in every classification of sex that the female paupers are very much in excess of the male paupers.

Friendly societies for women.

6912. In agricultural as well as in urban districts?—I think as a rule you will find it. That is my experience. It has always struck me that that must be one of the reasons; that the friendly society movement has really not touched women, except during the last decade, I believe. The domestic servant ought, above all classes, to put by something out of her wages; but you very seldom hear of a domestic servant who puts by anything in a friendly society; yet they are the class who ought to do it, because they very often come on the rates afterwards.

Comparison of pauperism and number of friendly societies in each union county.

6913. Coming to page 14 of your Memorandum, you show the proportion of pauperism to the estimated population in union counties, and the number of industrial and provident societies and friendly societies in each union county. Yorkshire, with the single exception of Middlesex, comes out, upon that basis, at the top of the list?—Lancashire, I think, must be given the palm.

6914. (Mr. Lansbury.) Does this include trade unions and co-operative societies?—No, not trade unions. I must say that this is really a very amateur statistical attempt; I do not want to put it as anything more than a private examination of my own. I got the figures out of our own Blue Book for the ratios, and the others I have got out of the County Returns of the Friendly Societies and Provident Societies which are published by the Registrar. They ought to be revised and corrected, but I put them in really only as a suggestion.

Mr. Philip Henry Bagenal.

26 Mar. 1906.

6915. (Chairman.) In this table, Yorkshire, taking the ratio per thousand of all paupers, comes out best of any county, except Middlesex?—Yes, according to pauperism. I was thinking of friendly societies. As to pauperism, I quite agree we are the lowest, except Middlesex.

6916. Middlesex,—the county which stands ahead of Yorkshire in this respect, is we know a county in which there has been an enormous influx of population in recent years?—Yes.

6917. And that influx of population has very materially altered and diminished the ratio of pauperism to population. Assuming that your premises are sound, it would follow that these industrial, provident and friendly societies have, according to this table, generally a very beneficent effect in checking pauperism?—I think so, and you will find them nearly always existing in great industrial centres.

Rota relief committees.

6918. Now we come to the administration of out-door relief. I think you advocate the system of Rotation Committees?—Yes.

6919. Is the out-door relief, in most of your large unions, administered on that system?—You will find in the large sheet I give at the end exactly the numbers that there are, and the relief in practice. Under the head of Query 2, if you run your eye down there, you will see how very few of them do rotate. There are only six.

Need for assistants to general inspector.

6920. The suggestions you make for the improvement of the administration of this branch of the poor law are, that you should have an assistant inspector under you?—Generally speaking. I want an assistant inspector now, because I have 144 institutions to inspect every year, besides attending boards of guardians. My time at the present moment is very largely taken up with inspecting children's homes, rate-supported homes, of the guardians with from eight to fifteen children in them. I have fifty or sixty of those. With all submission, without desiring to be egotistical, I think that I could be better employed in higher work than in going and investigating small homes of that description. I should like to devote my time a great deal more to the supervision of out-door relief, which is a great national problem. An assistant inspector, or a lady inspector, could do these homes just as well, or better, than I could, and I should be liberated for more pressing or important work. That is as regards myself. It is a very long job, going round twenty homes in one town. You have to take two or three days to do it, because you have to do it in two particular hours, if you want to see the children; in the dinner hour, or at tea-time. Therefore, I say it is economic waste to have me doing that sort of work.

Functions of inspector in regard to out-relief.

6921. Have you found that you have been able, by your presence at the meetings where outdoor relief is being discussed or cases considered, to influence the guardians?—We are not supposed to influence actual cases, and I never do intervene until the case is over. The inspector is not supposed to interfere, and really it is the guardians' duty and responsibility to decide cases of relief and to give what ought to be given. But very often, when a case is done, I say: "Well, I do not think that was right, and I will tell you why," and I state the other point of view, and I have found sometimes that that is a useful intervention.

Contrast of out-relief systems in York and Pocklington.

6922. In this report you give two illustrations further on as to different methods of giving outdoor relief. One was in the rural district of Pocklington, and the other was in the combined union of York. There seems, from reading these two different methods of distribution, to be little in common, either as regards the idea on which relief was given, or in the result obtained. In Pocklington the relief seemed to be given more in the shape of an old-age pension?—That is the way it worked out.

6923. And the houses that you visited did not show signs of destitution?—They were exactly the same as ordinary labourers' dwellings.

6924. Were most of the occupants of those houses labourers?—Nearly all agricultural labourers.

6925. The relief there was adequate, because the people were in a condition of comfort?—Certainly. There were several houses which were exceedingly well furnished, and with more room than they wanted. They said they had their son or daughter come and stay with them.

6926. In York, at any rate, you visited a number of houses where the inmates were in considerable if not great destitution?—Dire poverty.

6927. And the amount of relief administered, as I understand from your account, was hardly sufficient to enable those to whom it was given to make adequate provision for themselves?—I give the details, and it is obvious. Those were cases I absolutely visited myself.

6928. Therefore, the inspector has to deal with practically every form of relief nominally given under the same head, but prompted by different motives, and resulting in establishing quite different conditions?—Certainly; but it is very seldom that the inspector does these sort of things. We have not time to go and inspect the homes of the poor.

6929. I am not criticising that?—But I should like to say that, if we had time to do it, we could do a great more good and should know more than we do about the condition of the people.

Adoption of rules for administering out-relief.

6930. Would not there be some advantage if more uniform rules were drawn up for the administration of out-door relief?—You can very easily draw up a set of rules, but you cannot get the guardians to keep them, as a rule. That is the trouble. There are numbers of them have drawn up rules, but I do not think there is one in 100 that keep them. They hate keeping rules. I quite admit it is a good thing to have rules, because they give a chance to a man who has fixed views upon the principle of poor law administration, and he can perhaps allude to them, but I am afraid, as a rule, you want to educate boards, of guardians before you give them rules and regulations to go by. That is a very invidious thing to have to say, but it is true of many guardians. When they come on the board they are not acquainted either with the history of poor law or the principles of Poor Law administration or the methods of relieving. They do learn, and very often become excellent administrators.

6931. (Mr. Gardiner.) They learn it at the expense of the ratepayers, do not they?—Naturally. We do not mind their doing that, because they are volunteers, and that is part of the way we pay their salaries, I suppose.

Beneficial results of appointment of additional relieving officers.

6932. (Chairman.) The appointment of additional relieving officers seems generally to bear satisfactory results?—Yes, I have never known a case where it did not have a satisfactory result.

6933. And the relief to the rates fully compensates, in most cases, for the increased charge of the salary?—That is my experience. The suggestion I want to make is about an absolutely new officer. I think there ought to be in every union an inspector of out-relief, whose simple business would be to cross-visit in every union in my district, or in any inspector's district, and to report to me upon the books of the officer and the character of the officer, upon the practice of the officer, and upon the methods of relief and the administration of relief, pay-stations, and all the rest of it. Upon that information I could go to the boards of guardians and advise them in a way which it is absolutely impossible for me to do now without that detailed knowledge, which I have not time to get, and the getting of which ought not to be put upon the inspector, because it would take up the whole of his time. This officer I say is urgently needed at the present day, in order to bring some kind of supervision, close and personal supervision, upon the relieving staffs of the country. As a rule, a rural relieving officer is absolutely under no supervision whatever. The guardians may have supervision to a certain extent, general supervision, but they do not supervise, and we are absolutely out of touch with the details of out-relief in the country. That is the point I want to make strongly before this Commission; and until you get in close touch with the details of out-door relief, it will always be in the air; we do not know what is going on. Proposed inspectors of out-relief.

6934. This assistant would be your eyes and ears as regards out-door relief?—Yes.

6935. Now we come to old-age statistics. The figures you give are interesting, and they show, as I think has before been stated, that the number of aged persons is very much larger in the rural than in the purely urban districts?—That is so.

Compulsory removal to workhouse of old and infirm paupers.

6936. I pass on now to paragraph 78. It has been urged upon us by other inspectors that the guardians should have power to compulsorily remove to the workhouse aged persons who are unable to take care of themselves or live in filthy and insanitary conditions. Do you agree with that?—Yes, I do. They no doubt are exceptional cases, but they are nearly always cases which give a great deal of trouble and anxiety to the guardians.

Merits of various methods of dealing with Poor Law children.

6937. I think the various other suggestions you have made carry their reasoning with them. Have you anything to say in addition to what is contained in your memorandum with regard to the working of the children's homes? It seems to me the various systems, the cottage, scattered, and grouped, all give satisfactory results?—I do not think you can say of any system that one is very much better than the other, except upon this particular point, capital expenditure. I think that the scattered homes system has the advantage over all the others that there is less capital expenditure. If we are going to have any progressive and continuous decrease of childhood pauperism, and if all the philanthropic and educational agencies of this country are going to work any good at all, it will be in the direction of improving the conditions of child-life and lessening the chance of their becoming paupers. If that is so, in process of time, this vast capital expenditure on children's homes and grouped cottage homes will be, to a certain extent, thrown away. If we want to depauperise all the children of the country, and can do so to a large extent, to that extent these homes will be wasted money, unless you can use them for other purposes. That was the argument I used a few years ago in the Ecclesall Bierlow Union, near Sheffield, when they decided to go in for grouped cottage homes. I warned them it would be a very costly thing. It has been, because, when you go into the grouped cottage home system, you are always going to have a large and increasing expenditure; the staff is very big, and it becomes institutional, and it is very difficult to curb the institutionalism of grouped children's homes. All the officers seem to think that some other person has got to do some other part of the business, and the staff increases, and the wages and salaries increase; therefore, I say that the scattered home system is manifestly the most economical. I am in favour of it also because I think the home life is, on the whole, better, although they perhaps do not get the same good industrial training. Those are my views on the children's homes question.

Out-relief and its distribution by one relieving officer at Pocklington.

6938. I think we have dealt with the Pocklington outdoor relief?—I have a map of Pocklington which shows you exactly the journeys that are taken, if you like to have it for reference. I have shown the journeys of the relieving officer, which can be traced from my evidence, to show that it is possible for a man to go to the home of every one of his people and pay the money. It is possible; it is a great trouble, but it can be done. There is the workhouse exactly in the middle of the union. It is a very large acreage, and these lines are the journeys he takes in and out. He does it all in a week.

6939. (Sir Henry Robinson.) How many relieving officers are there there?—One.

6940. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) What is the extent in miles across?—There is no across; he always starts from the middle.

6941. (Mr. Lansbury.) How many cases are there?—I cannot tell you. I took this union because it was well administered and the relieving officer was a good one, and the whole thing lent itself to a description. I thought if you followed the way in which this rural union was done you would know really exactly how a typical union was worked, and with what officers.

6942. (Chairman.) Is the principle which governs the distribution of outdoor relief in Pocklington also in force in other unions?—I think so. That is very typical of a purely rural constituency. Most of the men are old agricultural labourers, and the farmers are getting old-age pensions for their employés at the expense of the ratepayers. That is what it comes to.

Conditions in York Union.

6944. Though the system of Poor Law administration in York seems to be faulty, the result, if we test it by pauperism to population, is not very unsatisfactory. I see that York is half way down your list of unions?—Yes.

6945. Would you call York a very poor place?—I call it a very pauperised place. There is a market there, the largest cattle market in England, and that means a great deal of casual labour about the market. There is a considerable population that practically lives upon what they can earn at the market, just looking after the cattle and driving cattle backwards and forwards in the districts or from the station, and so on. There is a vast amount of casual labour of that sort, and it is the lowest class, and very badly paid.

6946. What other occupations are there that absorb any amount of casual labour in York?—I do not think there is much other casual labour absorbed. There is agricultural labour; there are women who go out and work in the districts, and men too. There is agricultural female labour of that kind all through the East Riding. They get from 1s. 6d. to 2s. a day.

6947. They work in the fields?—Yes. There is a great deal of female labour in the fields in the East Riding, but the majority of the labour in York is in Rowntree's Chocolate Works, the North Eastern Railway Engineering Works (which are now being moved away, I believe), and there is laundry work; but there is not very much industrial life in York. It is the concentration of the poor. I brought this map to give the Commission exactly my idea of what the fault in the York Union is. There are forty constituencies in that, and each of them has a member. I have marked on the map the amount of relief going into each district for a quarter, and the number of electors for each district. It might interest the Commission to study that. It is really a compendium of my views about the unsatisfactory state of the areas of the boards. (Handed in. For table showing chief particulars contained in the map see Appendix Vol I. (A), No. XV (M).)

Disadvantages of small electorate for a guardian.

6948. What do those figures show: that the representative of each district has made a struggle to get what they thought was their fair proportion?—No, what I mean is: there are too many guardians. There is a guardian elected by 200 or 250 people. He becomes the almoner of a small district. It is a personal matter. He is the man to go to, and they do go to him and have always gone to him, as you know by my account of it.

Guardians as semi-official relieving officers.

6949. (Mr. Loch.) He also makes the inquiries, does he not?—Yes, in many cases.

6950. So that you have that double position of the guardian so elected being also quasi relieving officer?—Certainly, and they prided themselves on it. They used to say it is the best possible system; no other system like it. There is one particular district marked there which has an enormous amount; it is the worst slum in York: Hungate. Vast sums of money pour into that place, with the worst class of recipients. I say, break York up into wards, and let four wards elect four or five people, and you would reform the administration of the Poor Law right away.

Charities at York.

6951. (Chairman.) Have you anything to say with regard to how the charities of Hull and Beverley are administered?—That was hardly on charities. I think the charities of York have intensified the whole pauperism of the place: each parish has got its own charities.

6952. It is a combination of the two?—The two are interlocked in such a way that you could not rescue that population from pauperism unless you got the Charity Commission to work to recast the whole of the charities, pool them, and make old-age pensions; then you would do something.

Effect of Mr. Chap'in's circular

6953. Coming to paragraph 176, in which you say, "Amongst other contributing causes to the increase of outdoor relief was the circular of 1900"; that circular, you think, has been a good deal misunderstood?—Yes.

Mr. Philip Henry Bagenal.

26 Mar. 1906.

6954. The object, I understand, was to call the attention of guardians to the necessity, in certain cases, of giving adequate relief in outdoor cases. It has been interpreted as advocating a general extension of outdoor relief?—Certainly. I think it has altered the general standard of everything and everybody. That has been the result.

6955. The standard of outdoor relief has gone up?—I think so, and in some cases I think rightly. For instance, children were given a very poor pittance, so much a child. I think that has been improved, but certainly the argument has been over and over again: "Well, the Local Government Board have told us to do this." That is the sort of generalisation. Then you have got to get up and explain to them it was no such thing. You have the circular in your pocket always, and you quote the classes for which it was formed; but it has no effect.

6956. Did the system of outdoor relief in Pocklington prevail there before 1900?—I do not think there has been very much difference. They may have raised the amount by 1s., probably they have.

Effect on pauperism of workmen's Compensation Acts.

6957. From the various inspectors who have come before us we have obtained opinions as regards what is the impression concerning the Workmen's Compensation Act. There seems to be an impression in certain quarters that that Act has resulted in workmen being discharged at an earlier period than before. Have you heard anything on that point?—It is a very common remark that the Employers' Liability Act is responsible for a considerable amount of the middle-age pauperism. There are men who have something the matter with them, who are not really efficient, who have a screw loose, or are lazy, perhaps, or bad workmen; and then they say: "Oh, well, the master has got rid of him for fear he might come under the Employers' Liability Act." I have heard that over and over again, but I have no specific evidence to prove it.

6958. Does that idea at all prevail in the minds of guardians?—Yes, in the minds of guardians and relieving officers, and I would take their evidence as more important. I should recommend you to get relieving officers as witnesses upon that point, because they must know better than we can.

6959. You think it is not merely the allegation of the men, but you think there may be some substance in it?—I think it stands to reason. I think it is a probable thing. On the doctrine of probabilities, if an employer has some men who are not satisfactory, who may become a possible expense to him by accident or injury in some way or other, if he is a hard man, with nothing but the cash idea in his head, is not it likely that he would say, "Well, I shall replace this man with a more efficient person, and I will minimise my risks to that extent"? I should say it would be a natural thing for the modern employer to do, who did not care anything about his work people, but his profit, and had no social bond between himself and his workmen.

6960. The Act now applies to agricultural labourers, but only recently; have you heard the same sort of allegation with regard to them?—Nothing at present.

Attitude of the poor towards in- and out-relief.

6961. What is the result of your general experience?—Do you think that there is less reluctance now to apply for poor relief amongst the wage-earning classes than there was before, and that the tendency, under pressure of public opinion, to make the institutional buildings more comfortable, and more up to what are supposed to be modern requirements, has increased the wish to be inside them?—Taking outdoor relief first, as far as I can judge there is not any very great objection to asking for outdoor relief amongst certain classes; there will always be the aristocracy of the poor who will not do it, but I think there is an increasing number of people who consider that what with the old-age pension cry, and all that has been written, they have a right to some assistance from the rates. It is a very common thing to hear: "I have paid rates for so many years and I have a right to relief"; there is not the smallest doubt about that. Then comes the question of the indoor relief and the comfort of it; I think that the loss of liberty as a rule is the thing which is most feared, and the hours which they have to keep; the regularity of everything is contrary to an Englishman's idea of freedom. They do not like that, and I do not think that mere comfort makes up for the fact that they are at home in their own homes and surrounded by the people they know, and have liberty to do practically what they like in most things. It is the small things of life which constitute real comfort, and as far as my experience goes, in the provinces at all events, I do not believe that the enhanced comfort has to a very great extent increased the indoor poor. There is only one union where the indoor poor has increased by leaps and bounds, and that is Ecclesall. I do not know why, but actually they do not know what to do there: the people want to come in, and there is no doubt it is a very comfortable place. That is the only place I can lay my finger on. The vast majority of the comfort, of course, is in the sick wards, in the hospitals; and people go in now more than they used to, to be medically treated. No doubt there is that increase, but, generally speaking, I do not think that the class of people who go into the workhouse is very much attracted there.

Deterrence of medical relief.

6962. Having regard to medical relief in the infirmaries, is there a rather higher class of person applying for those benefits under the poor law?—I cannot very well judge about that; but I think what would keep the better class out is the disfranchisement that is attached, and if you suspended the disfranchisement for going into the hospitals you would have them absolutely crowded up with everybody; they would become State hospitals, as they really are, to a certain extent, now. I want to add too, that the Sheffield guardians, who have recently separated the administration of the sick wards from the main institution, have been very anxious indeed to try and get in the thin end of the wedge, and to abolish all disfranchisement for hospital treatment; and at Birmingham the revising barrister, I understand, has knocked it on the head, and they go in there and do not lose their votes. It is a legal question, and it is quite a controversial question; and the Sheffield guardians very much want the Local Government Board to enable them to call their hospital by a name like "St. Luke's Hospital," or something of that sort. I was told this by one of the guardians; they said if they did that they would get more people to come in and be treated. That is the reason why I say that if the disfranchisement were suspended I think you would have the medical wards and the surgical wards of all your poor-law hospitals crowded with people, and that you would then practically have established State hospitals.

Returns of pauperism received by inspector.

6963. (Mr. Booth.) In paragraphs 24, 25 and 26 of your memorandum you refer to the returns of outdoor paupers for the six months. You refer to the six months' count as differing from the single day's count, and you say there is no difficulty in getting the figures. Would you kindly say how they are got?—They are kept by the relieving officer in his out-relief list. Every relieving officer is bound to keep it.

6964. The information comes to you probably on the Form A that you refer to?—No.

6965. In what way does it come to you?—It comes to me on a circular which I prepare from the form to which I allude, the form in the Order. I compile the form giving these classes, and he fills them up.

6966. You are fairly satisfied of its correctness?—It must be correct; it is exactly what is in the relieving officer's books.

6967. The reason I ask is that we are told there is a great deal of difficulty in getting it. It is a piece of information we should like to have for the whole country, but we are told it is difficult to get it correctly?—There is absolutely no difficulty, it is there, the relieving officers have it all in their books. It is one of the things which every inspector ought to have; it is a mirror. This sheet which I give you is an absolute mirror of the pauperism of every district.

6968. It is precisely what we want. The table of statistics (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XV (B)) mentioned in paragraph 22, and the table of figures (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XV. C-D) mentioned in paragraph 24, I think you have prepared copies of, and will hand to the Commissioners?—Yes.

6969. What is the Form A that you refer to?—Form A is the form which is sent by the clerk of the guardians to the inspector every week.

6970. You say "Every morning I receive by post a certain number of weekly returns (Form A)"?—Yes,

I have brought a few of them to show the Commission. They give the figures for the week of the indoor poor, classifying them according to adults, able-bodied, health, disabled, and so on, youths, boys, girls, infants, and vagrants; then the outdoor poor they classify as to male and female, and whether they are able-bodied; and there is a comparison with the same week of the former year, so that at a glance every week I can see exactly how the pauperism has moved for a year.

6971. This is a return that is made by the guardians' clerk to you?—Yes; and also, I think, it is sent up to the Local Government Board. Sir Samuel Provis will probably be able to correct me.

6972. The return you refer to in paragraph 24 is the number of outdoor paupers, exclusive of pauper lunatics, relieved during the half year, is it not?—Yes.

6973. The table of statistics referred to in paragraph 22 you say contains the area in statute acres; present assessable value, population at the two last censuses, etc.?—That is so.

6974. Referring to the same subject, paragraph 58, you speak of the 60,331 inmates of the forty-six workhouses in your district: "This does not represent anything like the admissions into these workhouses for a half year, much less for a whole year." Then you say, admissions would be of different individuals?—Yes, each individual.

Inadequacy of a one-day count of paupers.

6975. That is to say the total number of individuals returned in six months, or still more in a year, greatly exceeds the one day's count?—Yes.

6976. And your statistics referred to in paragraph 24 would show to some extent what that is?—Certainly, it would give the number of people who received outdoor relief in the West Riding for six months, which is a totally different thing from the count of one day.

6977. But you have not the same figure for a whole year?—No, because I only want to take this one half-year as a specimen.

6978. Over the next six months' count there would be a further increase to some extent?—To some extent; the vast body of these outdoor paupers are permanent, therefore you only have the new cases which are coming on.

6979. And the new cases would naturally be fewer in the second half year?—Yes.

6980. With regard to the greater number of women than men among the paupers, this is mainly in outdoor relief, is it not?—Yes.

Conditions affecting method of relieving paupers of different sexes.

6981. Is there not to a certain extent the opposite found in indoor relief?—That depends on the district; curiously enough, the occupation of the people to a great extent governs the sex of the inmates of the workhouses.

Preponderance of women among outdoor paupers.

6982. Are the women more naturally relieved outside the workhouse because they are more able to take care of themselves?—I could not say that.

6983. Can you account for the fact that the sex makes a difference in the mode of treatment, indoor or out?—People are very unwilling to break up homes, you know, and they very often have children with them who help to support them. I cannot give you any reason at present why women should be paupers, except that they are not self-supporting so much as men.

State of pauperism in East and West Ridings of Yorkshire.

6984. As to the general results for these two Ridings of Yorkshire, we cannot help seeing that on the whole they come out very well, compared with other districts in England?—Certainly they do.

6985. The figures you give at page 14 show that?—Yes.

6986. Therefore, when you find fault here and there, you are testing them all on a higher standard, the standard of your own neighbourhood, rather than on the standard of all England?—The standard is higher because the standard of the habits of the people is higher.

Comparison of Yorkshire and East Anglia.

6987. The table at page 14 shows that the counties in which you were doing work of this sort before, Norfolk, Suffolk and Essex, are as distinctly at the top of the table, having the highest degree of pauperism, as the West Riding of Yorkshire is at the bottom?—Yes, I have had experience of both kinds of district.

6988. Therefore, you can very well compare a generally pauperised district, such as Norfolk, Suffolk, and Essex, with a generally very less pauperised district, such as Yorkshire?—Yes, I think I can.

6989. The proportion of out-relief to in-relief is no higher in Norfolk, Suffolk, and Essex than it is in the West Riding of Yorkshire. Very much less relief is needed or given in the West Riding of Yorkshire than in these other counties you have been connected with, but the proportion between the two methods of treatment remains the same? It is the same all through the country, in my opinion.

6990. Not altogether?—It is very much in that direction, is it not?

6991. The ratio of outdoor paupers for the West Riding of Yorkshire is 12·3 per 1,000, and in-door 6·7; roughly speaking, there are double the number of out-door that there are in-door. In Norfolk, Suffolk, and Essex certainly the ratio is greater, but not so very much greater. Then if we take your other district, the East Riding of Yorkshire, there you have a still greater preponderance of out-door paupers, and yet even there, on the whole, the district is not highly pauperised?—That is so.

Influence of race on the tendency to pauperism.

6992. I would like to ask you with regard to the general race characteristics, quite apart from industrial causes or the administration of the Poor Law, is there not some connection between pauper habits and the race, that is to say, the North-countrymen are more independent-minded than the East or the South?—I suppose they are by habit. I was told in Pocklington on that point, by the relieving officer, that there was a very distinct difference between the people who live on the Wolds and the people who live in the lower part; that the Wold men would die rather than ask for relief; they are a much more independent and hardier race.

6993. The Wold is in the North?—It is the range of hills nearest the East Coast.

6994. If you take the whole of the East Riding, the tendency is to greater pauperism?—That is so. That is because there are more old people.

6995. Solely?—I think so. The old-age test is the same in all these; I do not think there is so very much difference in the race characteristics. The East Anglian is very much like the Yorkshireman to a certain extent; he has not got the same education, and he is not so quick.

6996. Apart from administration, you would attribute the difference to the larger proportion of old people, or to some indefinite question?—I think it is an indefinite thing which is at the bottom of it, and the policy.

6997. And the policy of administration?—Certainly, it is guided by better brains, and also the knowledge of their own people. They know their own people pretty well.

Density of population a factor of pauperism.

6998. Does not the greater difficulty of dealing with the problem, that is to say, the greater mass of poverty and the greater number of people in need, itself affect the administration of the poor law? You say that better brains prevent it. Would not the same brains find that the policy needed was different where they had to deal with greater difficulties?—I think the difficulties of poor law administration are identical all over the country, and it takes experience of the habits and customs of the people to deal properly with each case. I think that the better educated and more intelligent a board of guardians is the better the administration will be. The more dense the population is, the greater the pauperism; that is nearly always the case. Density of population brings pauperism.

6999. That is not the case in comparing the East and West Ridings of Yorkshire?—There is a greater number.

7000. The dense population has the lower pauperism?—If you take any particularly dense part: in York, the denser the population, the more pauperism. You may take a very large area and reduce your average, but if you can get particular parts, you find the more thickly they are on the ground the more pauperism there is.

7001. (Chairman.) You were thinking of urban districts when you said "densely populated"?—I am now thinking of urban districts.

7002. (Mr. Booth.) Comparing urban with rural, that would not be true?—No, because it is not the same.

Mr. Philip Henry Bagenal.

26 Mar. 1906.

Then the old age question would come in; when you get into the towns there is not the same old age.

7003. There is one curious little point in paragraph 53. Is the comma put in the place it was intended to be: "The guardians as a rule meet once a fortnight at the workhouse of the union in rural districts and in towns, sometimes in offices away from the workhouse"? Should not the comma be after "districts" instead of after "towns"?—It applies to both, as a matter of fact.

7004. It is correct as it is?—They do meet at the workhouse of the union in rural districts and in towns.

7005. I thought it was a misprint?—"Sometimes in offices away from the workhouse" does apply to towns altogether, not to rural districts.

Proposed assistants to inspector.

7006. (Mr. Nunn.) Your plans for increasing your own power in your district are three or four, as I understand them; first of all you propose two sub-officers, one an inspector of outdoor relief, either a lady inspector of institutions or——?—I did not mean necessarily a lady inspector.

7007. But an assistant inspector?—I mentioned that a lady might perform the duty. There is an assistant inspector in Lancashire.

7008. We have one in London who is a lady. With regard to the certificated schools, would you leave them rather in the hands of the assistant inspector?—These certified homes as a rule are very small places with about twenty or twenty-five children in them. There are a few big homes, such as the blind school at York and the deaf and dumb school in Sheffield. Those are large certified schools. I have only three or four of them, the others are the ones you mention.

7009. An inspector of outdoor relief would not be like a superintendent of relieving officers to a union; he would be a much higher official appointed by the Local Government Board?—I have not thought of the sort of man he would be, but he would be a sort of higher cross visitor.

7010. He would be a more cultivated man than that, and take a wider view of things, I suppose?—I should think so.

7011. Did you also suggest smaller districts in addition to that, or do you think those would meet the pressure of work you have on hand?—I do not want to say I am absolutely pressed with my work. I can do my work, but I think the greater part of it is not done adequately. That is what I mean. I do not wish to say I am overworked, but I think it is badly distributed.

Difficulties inherent in voluntary nature of guardians' office.

7012. You spoke of the education of guardians; have you thought of any scheme by which that might be effected besides their doing practical work?—They are voluntary workers, and you cannot find fault with them and tell them they want this, that, and the other. I do not think there is anything that could be done. I think they are very anxious to do what is right.

7013. Do you think they do it rather in the spirit of voluntary charity than in the spirit of magistrates who are administering the law?—They certainly do not do it in the spirit of magistrates administering the law. That is the only thing I will say as to that.

Possibility of administering out-relief magisterially.

7014. Do you think a possible reform of the Poor Law might lie in the direction of administration; that outdoor relief ought to be administered by one or two persons in a magisterial capacity, leaving persons who want to distribute alms to do it in connection with charitable societies?—It is not practicable, I think.

7015. You do not think it would be practicable?—No.

7016. Why not?—Because people would not have it; public opinion would be up in arms. All the boards would hold their fortnightly meetings, and they would be principally occupied in discussing this encroachment upon their liberties, and then all the daily papers would report the proceedings of the guardians for that occasion.

Efficacy of rules as to out-relief if drawn up by Local Government Board.

7017. You spoke of rules made by boards of guardians being rules only, and they were not carried into practice very often. They make the rules, and in actual practice they tend to drop them. Supposing those were orders of the Local Government Board from which the relieving officer could not depart without coming across his auditor, then the rules would be in a totally different position, would not they?—Certainly they would.

7018. Whenever the guardians inclined to drop a rule, the relieving officer would come up against him, and say he could not do it?—Yes.

7019. If a moderate set of rules were drawn up by the Local Government Board in that way, and became orders for the relieving officer, they would have a very much better chance of being carried out?—Certainly.

7020. It has been said that as soon as guardians discover that a thing is actually sanctioned or imposed by the law, they fall in with it with quite surprising readiness. Has that been your experience amongst guardians?—Yes; the clerk rules that they must do it.

Effect of charities on pauperism.

7021. With regard to the endowed charities, you spoke of the recoordination of the endowed charities by the Charity Commissioners. You said, I think, that the endowed charities in certain parts of your district were practically producing pauperism?—That is my opinion. I do not give it as more than my opinion.

7022. You have not traced the actual applications of persons in receipt of endowed charity to the guardians?—No, I could not do that.

7023. You think it comes of a slackening of the personal character of the recipients?—Yes; I think the asking there is a habit of asking.

Co-operation between charities and the Poor Law

7024. I do not find in your report any account of any methods of co-operation between charities and the guardians?—I am a very strong advocate of that if it can be properly done, and there has been a movement in Bradford to that effect, which I think it would be worth the while of the Commission to investigate. That is the Guild of Help. It is an attempt to graft the Elberfeld system on the existing Poor Law by communication with the Poor Law.

7025. Do they inter-communicate by means of lists of relief?—I do not know exactly what the method is. You have a member of the Bradford Board of Guardians here who could tell you all about it.

7026. Have they marked any lines of demarcation between the Poor Law and the charities?—I think so.

7027. And they tend to observe them?—They are trying in that direction. That is the object of the formation of the society.

7028. You are not acquainted with any union in your district where the guardians employ voluntary helpers to carry their outdoor relief?—No; there is no such system.

7029. Do any charity organisation societies in any part of your district take up cases from the board?—Charity organisation in the provinces is not as efficient, I think, as it is in London. I do not wish to say anything more.

Benefit societies.

7030. With regard to the benefit societies, you have not given us any tables in which the time element is an important factor. You have not given us any tables by which we could get the mutual influence of the benefit societies' formation, and the administration of the Poor Law in successive years?—I had only a short time in which to prepare my evidence. I have had no opportunity of going into a question which would really require a very long investigation, and a great deal more attention and ability than I have been able to give to it.

7031. I suppose those figures might be traced if time were available to do it?—I should think they might. I think there is a great deal that might be traced.

7032. May I ask whether there are very few women's benefit societies in Yorkshire. I understand that there are?—There are a few.

7033. I think you said that women made far more application to the Poor Law than men?—Yes.

Causes of preponderance of women paupers

7034. I suppose that is due partly to the fact that there are more women than men?—Partly, and partly owing to the fact that the head of the house dies, or is injured or disabled, and so on, so that they are bound to apply. That is perhaps an answer I ought to have made to Mr. Booth.

7035. Amongst the causes which have led to a very much smaller development of the friendly society movement amongst women, have you been able to trace any in particular such as that sick benefit is not so valuable to women as to men?—No, of course the physical question comes in, and the actuarial calculations with regard to women's illness are much more complicated than they are in the male sex. That has been a great drawback up to the present time, but they are now working out the actuarial principle.

7036. Do you find women are more against insuring and more given to saving than men ?—I have not had any actual experience.

ublication Annual eport by uardians.

7037. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) You laid considerable stress upon the importance of publicity in Poor Law administration and said you would like all guardians to publish something in the shape of an annual report?—Yes.

7038. You do not suggest any means by which you can get that to the ratepayers you want to instruct. You said it might be put on the church door, but nobody ever reads what is put on the church door ?—You could send it to the newspapers, and they would make a feature of it. If the clerk were worth anything he would go to the editor and say—"Here is something you must make a feature of."

ublication names of aupers.

7039. You approve of the principle adopted by the Wakefield Union of publishing the name of every pauper ?—I think it is a very good thing. It is done in a good many unions, I think.

ffect of eap lodging uses on auperism.

7040. With regard to paragraph 41, might I ask whether one may gather from your remarks on the lodging-houses, that the setting up of these places does increase pauperism in the neighbourhood; a Rowton House, or anything of that kind ?—I should be sorry to give any opinion upon that, because I have not really the necessary experience. The probabilities seem to me very much in that direction, because I show the extraordinary cheapness of the living. The shelter and living attracts a destitute and houseless and homeless class who do not want a house and do not want a home, who can get a larger margin for their personal indulgence by living in a lodging-house than in any other place. It seems to me that it stands to reason that it would be so. That is all.

7041. With regard to the action of the friendly societies at Huddersfield, have you been able to discover in any way whether it was rather for ensuring adequate relief to existing cases than to extending the number of cases to which out relief was granted which caused them to act ?—I am not dealing with motives at all; I am dealing with the actual facts. I find that the number of persons has enormously increased, and the number of unsatisfactory cases has increased. That is all I have dealt with.

frequency tripartite tirement of ardians.

7042. I believe in all your unions there is not one single case where one-third of the guardians retire every year ?—I do not know of any case; there is a general election.

7043. That being left to the guardians, naturally enough, as a rule, they would desire to be all in for three years ?—Yes.

7044. It is not a natural thing that they should generally adopt the other plan ?—They would probably say it spoiled the game if they did it the other way.

7045. You say you would not like the duties of guardians transferred to either county or borough councils ?—Certainly not.

ffect of ansfer to unty uncil of oor Law ministra-on.

7046. But at the same time you feel strongly that you do not now get as high a class of guardians as you would like ?—One always likes to get the best people to do this work.

7047. Would not you be more likely to get a better class of administrator of Poor Law relief if it were in the hands of the county council ?—No, I do not think you would a bit. I do not meet very many county councillors, but some of the guardians I meet are county councillors, and I do not think there is very much difference, perhaps.

7048. In paragraph 176, you quote from a speech by Lord Beauchamp in 1897 at a Poor Law Conference for the West Midland District. That which you quote from him is in perfect agreement, is it not, with Mr. Chaplin's circular. "Maintaining not only the bare existence, but the respectability of the aged, infirm and orphaned poor rather than the repression of the rogue and vagabond." There is nothing inconsistent with Mr. Chaplin's circular in that statement, is there ?—I suppose you might say so.

7049. In regard to your duties, I rather gathered that one might sum up what you think about it in this way; that you are obliged now to give a larger amount of time to mere routine and less important duties ?—Yes, that is what it is. I know every part of the workhouse, and all the institutions, and it is very largely travelling about from one to another of them.

Mr. Philip Henry Bagenal.

26 Mar. 1906.

Conditions in Driffield and Wharfedale Unions.

7050. (Mr. Lansbury.) On Mr. Booth's table showing the percentage of pauperism to population, Driffield stands at the top and Wharfedale at the bottom; if you compare the number of people over sixty-five years of age in the two unions, will that give any reason why the pauperism in the one place is higher than in the other ?—Wharfedale is in the West Riding, with a large industrial population as well as some rural population, and with a lot of wage-earners; but Driffield has a diminishing population and is purely a rural district, with a large number of aged people in it.

7051. So that you would not attribute the large amount of pauperism in Driffield to bad administration ?—No. I think on the whole that the Driffield people administer very much on the lines of the Pocklington people. They have recently built practically a new infirmary, which was badly wanted. I have no fault to find with the Driffield people. Driffield is on all fours really with Pocklington.

7052. Then it is not a question of bad administration there as against Wharfedale's better administration ?—You cannot compare the two districts; Wharfedale and Driffield have nothing in common, I think.

Conditions in Pontefract and Barnsley Unions.

7053. You are also comparing Pontefract and Barnsley, but are they comparable ?—Yes; and they are comparable in a very remarkable way, because they are both districts with a great deal of mining, in fact, mining you may say is one of the greatest industries in both.

7054. Even there I think you will find there is a larger number of old people in the one place than in the other; it is not a large number in itself, but it works out to 9 per 1,000 more in a smaller population ?—Barnsley is 1·6 in pauperism.

7055. And 49 per 1,000 over sixty years of age, whereas Pontefract is 3·1 and 58 per 1,000 respectively ?—I think the two unions are very comparable.

7056. But in the one place there is bad administration ?—I think that the Barnsley administration is more definite; I think they stick to their policy more strictly. Undoubtedly in Pontefract until quite recently when they reformed their administration—they now work in committees which rotate—they have in my view been rather lax.

7057. Do you think they are getting better now ?—I do.

7058. Do you agree with committees ?—I do agree with committees, properly guarded by rotation.

Analysis of Bradford pauperism.

7059. Then take Bradford: Bradford has a pauper population of 65 per 1,000 over sixty years of age, and the number of people who are in receipt of relief there under sixty years of age is rather large, is it not, namely, 56 per 1,000 ? I see 28 per cent. of the paupers are children who are under sixteen, and 28 per cent. are paupers from sixteen to sixty. Would that not mean that the large number there under sixty would be made up in the main of widows and their children ?—I have got my own analysis, which gives the exact details, and I prefer to deal with what I know. I can give you exactly what Bradford is. There were on the books 117 widows and 275 children dependent on them in the half year ended Lady Day, 1905. If you keep your left hand on this section of the table and follow it up, you will see all the classes which are dealt with. There is first the old age section and the permanent disability section, then the section for destitution caused by death and absence or desertion of husband or father. You will see there are 117 widows and 275 children dependent upon them, and nine unmarried mothers.

7060. That is another point I wanted to get out, namely, that out of that number of women and children there are only nine mothers of illegitimate children ?—If you look all along the line, you will see that on the whole there are very few.

7061. You say that in your memorandum, do you not ?—Yes.

Mr. Philip Henry Bagenal.

26 Mar. 1906.

7062. 106 is the total for the district apparently?—Yes, for the whole district there are 106 unmarried mothers. Of course there are unmarried mothers who do not come under the Poor Law; this only gives those who do come under the Poor Law.

7063. And that is what we are concerned with just now. Turning to the next section, adult males relieved on account of their own sickness, that number is swelled up, is it not, by their wives and dependents, lower down?—Yes.

Absence of able-bodied paupers.

7064. So that the bulk of all that relief is formed purely of aged people, widows, children, and sick persons, and there are practically no able-bodied men there at all?—That is so.

The scientific theory of relief and its practicability

7065. You say in another part of your memorandum that guardians do not pay much attention to scientific methods of relief; would you mind telling us what you consider scientific methods of relief?—I have here the model rules for the administration of out-relief which were drafted by the Yorkshire Poor Law Officers' Association. That is a body of men containing experts—relieving officers largely, and clerks. They ought to know what exact scientific principles are with regard to the administration of relief. I do not mean to say that this is a perfect thing, but it is an effort to bring together the results of the experience of men who are practically engaged in Poor Law administration. That is what I should call scientific methods of administration—science with practice.

7066. Only we have not seen how that which is put down on paper can be acted upon?—I quite agree that theory and practice are very different.

7067. You agree, I suppose, that you can discriminate between cases?—Yes, I think you can.

7068. And you can test the deserving and the undeserving?—I think so.

7069. How would you test a deserving case?—You cannot test anything without knowledge. The essence of scientific administration is knowledge—the knowledge of each case, and the knowledge of each person connected with the case, and the knowledge of his life. A biological study of the family or the person in question is really what it comes to—the knowledge of his life and his habits and his point of view. Information ought to be forthcoming on all those heads, I think, in the case of a man who claims to be supported by the State.

7070. I am not querying whether it ought or ought not; I am only asking you whether you think that any board of guardians, not the present, but any other board that could be set up, is capable of doing all that?—That is another question. You asked me my definition of scientific administration, and I have given it to you. Whether the people who are set in authority have sufficient ability or will to carry it out is another question.

7071. It may be my density, but you have only told us that it is science in practice, and I have not seen how that is reduced to any sort of rules in practice?—That is so.

7072. You have not told the Commission how you propose to carry out scientific methods, or what are scientific methods; that is really what I want to get at?—I suggest you should read these rules for granting outdoor relief, or the rules used in any of the well-administered unions where they use regulations. The Manchester rules were I think the first drafted; Ipswich has another excellent set of rules. You will get that information from those. I can put these model rules in, as an interesting contribution to the solution of the great problems of relief. (Handed in. See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XV (N).)

7073. You do think that it is possible to discriminate in cases?—Yes.

The criteria of good and bad administration.

7074. Then what do you consider the test of good administration?—The test of good adminstration I should think was the percentage of pauperism to population.

7075. But you have already told us that that varies because of the conditions?—Yes, and you know what those conditions are; or a well informed person can find them out.

7076. Your idea is, that a board is not necessarily a badly administered one, because it gives a large quantity of outdoor relief?—I should want to know a great deal more about it than that before I gave an answer.

7077. You know about your own two districts, do you not?—Yes, I do.

7078. They both give a good deal of outdoor relief, I think?—Yes, they do. I think there is hardly a union that could not improve its methods.

7079. On the average would you consider them well-administered?—I think that the Yorkshire boards are very much better administered, as a rule, than the boards I was acquainted with in the eastern district. There is more care and attention to details given, which is of the essence of good administration.

7080. Only that does not mean, does it, if it is merely abolishing out-door relief? That is the point I want to get at, whether a board can administer the Poor Law properly and efficiently, and also give outdoor relief?—The answer to that is that between 60 and 70 per cent. of the relief of the country is at present given in outdoor relief.

7081. That is not the answer to it at all; because I might answer, as is answered, that they are not administering it properly, and that that is the reason we have so much pauperism?—It might be reduced by 25 per cent., I have no doubt, by a proper staff of relieving officers.

Deductions to be drawn from decreased out-relief accompanied by increase in in-relief.

7082. You will excuse me, but the only point I want to get out from you is whether there are any of the Boards in the Yorkshire district who are giving outdoor relief, but are in your judgment administering the poor law in an efficient manner?—Of course there are.

7083. In a table on page 3 of your memorandum you show the percentages of outdoor relief; I see that in 1881 it was 82·3, and in 1905 it was 72·8, showing a decrease of about 10 per cent., and yet the persons relieved indoor had increased from 7,000 to 13,000?—Yes, that is so.

7084. Then I take it you will not agree with the argument that the lessening of outdoor relief also lessens indoor relief?—I have found that the case very frequently.

7085. I am putting that to you on these figures?—If you take these figures as conclusive, perhaps you could argue that; but I do not think that it would hold water.

7086. What are we to gather from these figures?—You are to gather exactly what they show—that there has been a certain large increase in indoor relief, which is mainly, I have no doubt, in the sick, owing to the increased and improved hospital accommodation. The sick are better looked after and better treated now. That is one conclusion I should come to as explaining the indoor increase. Then you get an increase also in the outdoor from 33,000 to 35,000; I fancy that is mainly owing to the distress arising from want of employment in the last few years. There is not a very great difference between the 1905 and the 1881 figures.

7087. I am taking the percentages rather?—Percentages are misleading, sometimes.

7088. But do you say that they are all right; because they, of course, tell us just the same as any set of figures that comes before us where we get percentages given us?—I see your point. You want to controvert the general theory that if you reduce out-relief you will, side by side, reduce the recipients of indoor relief?

7089. I want to know what your figures here (which I do not want to use one way or the other) really mean; it struck me that they tell against that well-accepted theory?—You are taking the bulk of a whole district, and not individual cases.

7090. Still, after all, the average is what you should judge a district by, I should think. Turning to the cost of indoor pauperism in these two districts, I see that has gone up pretty considerably?—Yes, it has.

7091. And the increase has been in the main on the indoor?—Yes.

7092. Do you put that to the improvement in the accommodation for the sick?—Partly to that, but there has been improvement all round. There have been great building extensions, as you will see by the list at the end of my memorandum. That list shows, I think, on the face of it, that there have been very great expansions of the buildings, and many general structural alterations in workhouses in Yorkshire during the last twenty years.

'ause and stification f increased ost of relief.

7093. You might look to the table on page 4 of your memorandum; you will see a little clearer there what I mean about percentages. The West Riding percentages are rather extraordinary as shown there. You show there that the increase in the population is 25·9 per cent., in the out-door relief 6 per cent., and in the indoor relief 83·9 per cent, with a total increase, in and out, of 19·8 per cent. You put the expenditure down to the better class of buildings that are now put up, I think?—Yes, certainly; and as I said in another part of my evidence, it is also owing to the increased cost of necessaries, such as coal and all the great articles of consumption.

7094. The prices of the articles consumed have distinctly increased?—Yes, they have.

7095. Do you think that the guardians who have been spending those large sums of money have spent them wisely on the whole?—Yes, I think so. The Yorkshireman always thinks before he spends,and he thinks a good deal, and he takes uncommonly good care that he gets value for his money. As you may have seen lately, they have been building because prices were low and labour was cheap. They have got their buildings put up at 25 per cent. less than they could have done otherwise.

7096. So that this tremendous increase is one that could be justified?—I think every item almost could be justified, except the few cases where the standard of comfort in setting up receiving wards or something of that sort has been, I think, higher than it ought to have been.

7097. But, on the whole, you think that the guardians have spent the money wisely?—Yes, I do.

7098. They have not recklessly thrown it away?—As regards Yorkshiremen, I do not think they spend money recklessly. The difficulty is to get them to spend any money at first, and then, when they begin spending, to stop them spending.

rien lly cieties in arnsley and ontefract.

7099. About friendly societies, you contrasted Pontefract and Barnsley in this respect; according to the figures of the Manchester Unity of Oddfellows, Pontefract had at least as many relatively to population as Barnsley had?—But, on the other hand,there are a great many friendly societies, 7100. Only two, I think, according to your list, and I am only taking your list?—I do not wish that list to be considered as exhaustive at all.

7101. Then I will not pursue that, except to point out that at Pontefract the Manchester Unity of Oddfellows has more members in proportion to population than the other people?—I should be very glad indeed to have the whole details of that question thoroughly elicited.

7102. Are you not rather hard on Pontefract in that respect, if you have not got the actual figures before you?—I have verified the figures as far as I can; they show that there are more in one place than in the other.

7103. Turn to page 16 of your memorandum where you give the figures. You will see that Pontefract in this respect is just a shade better than other unions which you are comparing it with?—Yes.

7104. Then there are the Rechabites, of which Pontefract has none, and the Sons of Temperance. The Sons of Temperance from what I remember do not provide for old age at all, and neither do the Rechabites, do they?—No, I do not think they do.

7105. So that it really comes back from that point of view to the Manchester Unity, and in membership of that body I think you will find that Pontefract is a little higher than Barnsley, at any rate I have worked it out that it is so?—I do not want to be hard upon one union as against another; I do not want to be invidious at all.

7106. I think in that respect that you are rather hard upon Pontefract; I think the facts as given by yourself do not bear out your statement?—Perhaps I shall be able to supplement them.

7107. Turning now to the women, your view is that more women should come into friendly societies, yet you have already said this morning that there are a variety of reasons why they do not. Is it not the fact that the large bulk of those women who become chargeable in any way are widows or aged people?—Yes, no doubt a very large proportion of them would be.

Benefit societies for women.

7108. I think, therefore, a friendly society would not come in quite with a woman at home; there are a variety of reasons such as children and that sort of thing?—That may be so; but I do not know why women should not join friendly societies when they are young, and keep up the payments in spite of the change in their position.

7109. And in spite of the wages the husband might earn?—That, of course, is an additional tax, but they get additional benefits. It is not a very great tax when you come to work it out. Sir Edward Brabrook says 32s. a year is enough to cover all the necessary outgoings for friendly societies.

7110. For the man and the woman?—No, for one person.

7111. Then it would be 32s. for a man to pay in addition to his own friendly society contribution. Take the case of the East Riding where you have a large number of agricultural labourers—how could they do that with the money they will be earning?—Of course I was not thinking so much about the rural districts where the population is small; I was thinking of the working population of the towns. There are large numbers of domestic servants who earn excellent wages for a great portion of their lives and yet put by absolutely nothing.

Domestic servants becoming paupers.

7112. Do you think what you said this morning is true, that a large number of domestic servants become chargeable?—Yes, I do.

7113. That is your experience in Yorkshire?—I think a great many of them have been in service.

7114. Those would be the aged people?—Yes, I think so; of course that is only an opinion, and I have no means of testing or proving it.

7115. It comes back, does it not, that you are thinking of single women when you are talking about friendly societies?—There are a great number of single women on the rates; and if there are a great number of single women on the rates, that would only prove my case.

7116. But are there a great number on the rates?—I think there are.

7118. Mr. Bentham points out to me that Bradford is the lowest for aged people generally; and if you take the next table you will see there are comparatively very few women without husbands?—Look at the line "Destitution caused by Old Age." There are in the East Riding 3,061, aged sixty-five years and upwards, and 1,196 under sixty-five. I cannot tell you how many of those are single, I have no doubt a great many of them would be.

Difficulties of wives contributing to friendly societies.

7119. The whole point I think, in the case of married women, is that the question of whether they can belong to friendly societies depends upon two things: one is what the friendly society can afford to take the married women at, and the second what wages the husband is earning—whether they are such wages that he can afford to pay another 32s. a year out of them?—I quite agree with you. In the case of married women the additional charge upon the budget is no doubt a point.

Attractiveness of medical relief.

7120. Do you think that the increased comforts in infirmaries—hospitals as you call them—have really induced people to tumble on to the rates?—I think they have to this extent, that in order to get people, very often, to take the benefit of the good treatment and sick nursing that there is there, the guardians and relieving officers are always impressing upon the applicants for relief that it is not like the workhouse

Mr. Philip Henry Bagenal.

26 Mar. 1906.

7121. And there is a general sort of feeling that they have paid for it in their rent and the rest of it, and they have the right to use it?—There is that general feeling of right which does not exist of course in law, but which is a sentiment that does exist.

7122. There is a sentiment that they have helped pay for it, and they might just as well have the benefit of it?—Yes.

7123. There is not anything very bad in the idea, I mean people are not morally bad who go to an infirmary of that kind?—I do not suppose they are, if you put it that way. It is a difficult question to bring it within the sphere of morality.

Rota committees and guardians as advocates for relief in individual cases.

7124. Referring to relieving officers and the administration of out-relief, I notice you are very strongly in favour of committees rotating so that they do not take their own cases always?—So as to remove the personal element.

7125. There are not relief committees anywhere, are there, for each ward?—Do you mean committees that would always take the same number of people?

7126. I am referring to a union which is split up into wards?—We have not got that except in Bradford. Elsewhere they are practically all parochial representatives. There is very little else in poor law in my district but the parish representative. They divide these committees so that a certain committee takes certain parishes and the representatives of those parishes sit on the section and deal with all the cases in their parishes. Unless they rotated, that would be really making it worse than the original practice of the whole board itself dealing with the relief, because you would be removing from the consideration of those cases the people who would be most impartial, that is, the people who had no personal connection with them.

7127. Do you think that the guardians in a town like Leeds or Bradford or Sheffield do know all the cases that come up before them?—It is wonderful, but they certainly do know a great many, and they can make it their business to know them if they want to do so.

7128. Yes, if they want to do it?—If they want to have a personal influence they will go and do it.

7129. Do they do it?—I think so; in many cases they do.

7130. To a very large extent?—I cannot say to a very large extent, but they certainly do it. They will tell you that they know their cases in their different parishes; they certainly do in the country—that is obvious.

7131. I know that is so in the country, but I am rather thinking of the towns just now; take a town like Leeds?—It is a common thing for a man to go to the guardian himself first.

7132. Where there are thousands of cases?—There are not so many as thousands in each section.

7133. All right, then, take hundreds if that would be nearer. What I want to point out to you is that in the worst of these places where you have not wards, but where you have parishes you have more than the guardians of one parish sitting together?—Yes, you have.

7134. And they all have to take part in administering the relief?—That is the point. In committees it does not work out that way; it works out that a few people come and do the work—about three only.

7135. How long have you been in this district?—Five years.

7136. How often do you go to a relief committee—frequently?—Very frequently, nearly every time I can. When I go to meet a board of guardians I always attend the relief cases whether they are taken by the board or whether they are taken in committee.

7137. How often would that be in a year at any particular union?—Not often in a particular union, because one is not supposed to go; in fact; I would not have the time to go more than once a year to each.

7138. Remember, I am not thinking about country guardians, because their population is more sparse and scattered. I am thinking of guardians in towns. Is it not rather a sweeping assertion to say that deliberately the committees are set up, and then just as deliberately the guardians look out for cases and there is a kind of patronage about giving the relief?—That is the danger.

7139. I know it is a danger; but what I want to get from you is what evidence based on your experience you have to give us to show that this sort of thing does go on, and whether there is any district that we might go and see where it is going on?—I should recommend you to go to Huddersfield and attend the relief committees there. It would be most instructive and interesting too.

7140. Do you think that at Huddersfield the guardians deliberately know the cases, and just as deliberately go and give the relief to them?—I do not think I could say that.

7141. Is that not rather the point of it all?—My generalisation is that the possibility of it ought to be prevented.

7142. Why generalise about something which we are not sure exists? You could generalise that the bulk of the guardians are thieves, and that you ought to take measures to prevent them thieving?—Laxity of administration is a thing which you can get to know and understand by experience at boards of guardians. You can know the weak points of a system, and if you do know the weak points of a system it is only common-sense and sagacity to take precautions to prevent those weak points becoming emphasized or increased.

7143. Still the weak point here is a weak point which is in your mind; and what I am anxious to do is to get some evidence as to how it works, that is, that there is a danger of guardians looking after their friends as a matter of fact and looking after people whom they want to put on to the rates?—That is human nature.

7144. I know; still, Huddersfield is the only case you can give?—There is the York case, which I have described in detail. Until quite recently the York system has been in full vogue. You could not have a better illustration of the dangers of the personal intervention of guardians in relief, because there each guardian appeared as the advocate of the case.

7145. I have read your account of that, which is a very extraordinary one, I admit; but you are not recommending us now to go to York?—No; because I think they are just on the eve of changing that system.

The principle of relief.

7146. That has been knocked on the head?—Yes; but one cannot see that sort of thing in existence without feeling that one ought to take uncommonly good care that it shall not occur anywhere else if one can help it. That is what I am for. My appointment is to supervise the administration of the Poor Law. The Local Government Board have acted for many generations on certain principles which are thoroughly understood, and it is my duty to try and see that those principles are carried out and to make such representations as will ensure their being carried out.

7147. What are the principles that the Local Government Board want carried out?—Sir Samuel Provis is perhaps the more direct authority for that.

7148. But he is not the witness?—I can refer you to all the circulars which I have here pinned together, which contain all the directions.

7149. They are rather varied, are they not?—They are.

7150. If a board of guardians set to work to carry out all those various principles?—They would learn a great deal.

7151. And they would end by what? Which system of administration would they carry out—the strict one of offering the house as a test of destitution, or would they give outdoor relief to deserving cases, and so prevent such cases coming into the workhouse?—That is a conundrum which would be answered in a different way in different unions.

7152. But still you are a gentleman who has got to answer that to the boards of guardians, and I should like to know how you answer it to them?—I should have to send you a volume of my speeches.

7153. Of course this is all very funny, but just in a rough sort of way you could tell me exactly what is the policy you recommend to a board of guardians. For instance, you are laying down here that relief is now given to poor people and not to destitute people, and that it is given to aid poverty; I should like to know whether that is according to the principles of the Local Government Board?—The practical working of the Poor Law is in the hands of the guardians themselves, and I am no party to intervene in any specific case of poverty or destitution. I have to lay down certain principles of outdoor relief—the dangers of laxity in outdoor relief, the necessity of testing cases which come up which are suspicious cases and in which it is desirable to offer complete relief in an institution, and generally to see that the staff is complete, and every information that can be got about every case is before the guardians. After all, those are important principles.

Relief in aid of poverty.

7154. If a board of guardians gives relief in aid of poverty and not to relieve destitution will they be acting in accordance with the principles laid down by the Local Government Board?—That is a matter in which every case would have to be sifted. I do not think you will find in my memorandum any absolute statement about that poverty question.

7155. I think there is, towards the end—and I read over your memorandum twice pretty thoroughly?—Can you refer me to anything that has struck you?—I think in reference to Pocklington I said that it would seem that relief was given in aid of poverty rather than in aid of destitution?

7156. Do you agree that that is done—because that will get us to it easily enough—that relief in your district is given in aid of poverty rather than in cases of destitution?—You are asking me to put a construction upon the action of the guardians.

7157. It is Pocklington, I think, where you give a series of cases in which you point out that there was no evidence of destitution?—By that I meant that there was furniture and food and everything that the ordinary necessities of life required, and that the people looked to be living comfortably and home-like. That is what my evidence came to.

7158. You considered that they were all right?—I had no fault to find with the conditions.

7159. And that they were quite good cases to give the relief to?—They were old and deserving cases—that of course is a condition—and had been there for something like twenty years probably.

7160. I am sorry to press this, but I really want to get from you whether the outdoor relief in your district as a whole to aged people is given to really destitute cases, or whether it is given to cases which are in a condition of poverty?—They must have been absolutely destitute before they made the application. When persons had some belongings, as these old people evidently had, furniture and so on, the guardians did not compel them to sell all their furniture before they applied for the relief. If you like to construe that into relief in aid of poverty instead of destitution of course you may be justified in doing so. I am only citing those cases as an illustration of how they deal with individual poverty.

7161. I quite understood that. You do not disapprove of that method of dealing with old-age poverty do you?—Certainly not. If I had disapproved of it I should have criticised it severely.

7162. If you were a guardian there or a member of the board you would have administered it in the same way?—I should not object to it.

7163. So that really you do not object to outdoor relief to aged people of that description?—No.

Wages paid to paupers at York.

7164. Then take the York cases in Paragraph 143. I do not quite understand the third case there, which is that of the man who had task work at the workhouse at 2s. 6d. a day?—That is a system which I look upon as a very bad system—indeed, it is a scandalous system. It was practically the system of paying a pauper good wages, because these men who went up and did a very easy day's sawing—it was not a test of work at all—got 2s. 6d. a day, and they would not have been able to have earned as much as that.

7165. I wanted to ask you whether the man got 2s. 6d. in actual money?—Yes, it was paid to him at the end of the week by the master of the workhouse until I stopped it. They had the system there that the workhouse master paid it out and was reimbursed. That was one of the instances of extraordinary administration at York which we found out by degrees; but they stopped that. That was the way he got his half-crown per day.

7166. Was that not in defiance of the Orders of the Local Government Board?—Yes, that was in defiance of the Orders.

7167. Was anyone surcharged?—Yes; there was a surcharge of £300 or £400.

7168. Did you collect it?—It was remitted.

7169. Did that get into the newspapers of York?—It may have.

Specimen out-relief cases at York.

7170. It was not that point that I wanted to ask you about. You go on to say, "Wife, and a boy working at Messrs. Rowntree's, and earning 5s. 6d. a week." Does that mean that the wife was earning 5s. 6d. and the boy 5s. 6d., or that the two were earning 5s. 6d. between them?—I think it was the boy only, and that it simply means that there was a wife in the case.

7171. And there were three other children dependent, is that so?—Yes. These I may say were all in the very worst slums in the city.

7172. The next case also I do not understand: "M.L. earns 2s. a day for four days a week at a laundry. Relief 2s. 6d. Lives with her mother. House fairly clean." Who is M.L.? Is she a single person, and does she get the relief of 2s. 6d. because she only earns 8s. a week?—I I think the relief was to the mother. She lives with her mother, and I think the relief must have been given to the mother.

Deterioration in dominant factors at guardians' elections.

7173. You told us that at Huddersfield some friendly society people had been doing some mischief from your point of view?—I did not say mischief.

7174. They had been inviting people to elect them?—I said they adopted an extraordinary policy—I think I used words to that effect.

7175. And also you read out a leaflet which you considered was not a very good one?—Yes.

7177. I only want to point out that the morality of elections is about equal all over, whether they are Parliamentary, municipal or otherwise?—Yes; but then the Poor Law guardian elections used to be rather clear of that. The introduction of this sort of appeal to the material side is a very unfortunate innovation in Poor Law guardians' elections. It is an absolute direct appeal for more money to distribute.

7178. How long have you been connected with the Poor Law?—Ten years come November.

7179. Ever since you have had anything to do with it there has been this sort of feeling in it, has there not?—What feeling?

7180. The feeling that at election times it was out-relief or non-out-relief that the elections were fought out on?—I do not think that is absolutely true of a great number of places. I think it has been coming up very recently.

7181. In the last ten years?—I should date it more from five years back; that is my experience.

7182. I only want you to give us your experience of course?—The interest in Poor Law elections has not been very great, in fact, I think it has been rather unduly small.

7183. I think so too, only I should have gathered from what you said this morning that it was much larger?—Of course the interest in these elections will be larger if you advocate the distribution of money.

7184. Are you really aware what percentage of people vote even in that kind of district—can you tell us how many went to the poll out of the electorate even with that inflammatory poster that you have there?—No, I could not tell you that.

7185. It is a question whether that sort of thing really had any effect?—They returned twenty men.

7186. They may have returned twenty men, but the thing is whether it aroused very much interest to return those and whether the bulk of the people did not stop at home?—That may be.

Relief to occupants of cheap lodging houses.

7187. You went on to say they actually gave out-door relief to people living in lodging-houses—is that so?—Yes.

Mr. Philip Henry Bagenal.

26 Mar. 1906.

7188. You said the Corporation lodging-houses ; would those be lodging-houses run by the Corporation ?—I think I said model lodging-houses.

7189. I thought you discriminated and said so many in the Corporation lodging-houses and so many in the common lodging-houses ?—Perhaps I did.

7190. And I noticed that the figure for the common lodging-houses was much smaller ; can you tell us what kind of relief that would be and whether it would be because of sickness or what it was ?—I do not know ; I should think it would be money to get necessaries of life.

7191. It is rather important to know what form that relief really took, is it not ?—Yes.

7192. Would those be aged people ?—No, I should not think so.

7193. Would they be able-bodied people ?—I think probably corner boys or people of that sort—hawkers.

7194. To whom they were giving money ?—Yes.

7195. And they would be under sixty years of age ?—I should think so, but that we can easily ascertain for you. This is the only extract I have relating to those cases. " In my district I have eight males and two females who are receiving out-door relief and living in the Corporation model lodging houses and two cases in common lodging houses." Of course I could get the particulars of those ; I have not got them, as they are not within the list of unsatisfactory cases which I had sent.

7196. Is Huddersfield a union where you can give out-door relief to able-bodied men ?—Do you mean under a Test Order or under the Outdoor Relief Regulation Order.

7197. There were two orders—I forget the names of these orders—under one of which you can prohibit and under the other of which you cannot prohibit ; which is Huddersfield under ?—It is under the Regulation Order.

7198. What I should like to ask you to do if you would is to get us particulars of these cases, whether they are aged people, whether they are getting relief in money or in kind, or whether they are sick, so that we might just see what is being done with them ?—I will obtain that information for you.*

7199. Then you refer to deterioration in administration ; what does that really mean at Huddersfield ?—I think they are lax in giving relief to certain classes of people. They do not test the cases sufficiently by offering the house in order to test the genuineness of the application. They hardly ever apply the workhouse test. The object of the existence of the workhouse is largely as a sort of insurance against imposition.

Effectiveness of workhouse as a test.

7200. Is it not the fact that the workhouse nowadays is much more looked upon as a place for old people, sick people, children, and that sort of thing ?—Yes, to a certain extent, but it also is the barrier across the path of the impostor.

Conditions in Huddersfield Union.

7201. What is the percentage of people in Huddersfield who are getting relief now but who ought not to be getting it ?—I could not tell you that without going through each individual case and forming an opinion upon it.

7202. I know, but you are very determined in your strictures on Huddersfield ; you must have some information on which you base your criticism ?—I speak to the relieving officers and I ask them their opinion, but of course I do not want to give away the relieving officers to the guardians, who might call them up.

7203. I do not want to do so either ?—I have information from officers of the Local Government Board, and I base my opinions largely upon that, because I know that they know the facts.

7204. Do you think that the guardians wilfully blind their eyes to the facts at Huddersfield ?—They are filled with the milk of human kindness and they are giving relief in a way which requires supervision. That is my opinion.

* Subsequently sent. (See App. Vol. I. (A), No. XV. (L).)

7205. How is the board composed ?—Do you mean of what classes ?

Size of Huddersfield Board of Guardians.

7206. How many are there on the board, in the first place ?—It is a very large board, consisting of seventy-one guardians.

7207. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) It is much the largest of all your boards, is it not ?—It is the largest except York.

7208. (Mr. Lansbury.) They have co-opted one member, have they not ?—They seem to have done so.

Qualities of an ideal guardian.

7210. This morning you told us we would have to have a higher class of guardians, and I rather wanted to find out from you what you considered a higher class of guardians ?—To have read and thought something about social problems, and to understand the history of the Poor Law and the reasons for its passing, would be a sine qua non in my opinion of a good guardian.

7211. That would not mean, would it, that it would have anything whatever to do with his social standing ?—No, because some of the best informed guardians on those points that I have met are working men.

Conditions in Huddersfield Union.

7212. What I wanted to get at was who were these dreadful people at Huddersfield who were throwing the money away in this sort of fashion ?—The twenty-two members of the friendly societies.

7213. In answer to Mr. Russell Wakefield you said something which rather modified that, which was that it may have been that they wanted adequate relief ?—I have no doubt the motive was excellent.

7214. No one will disagree about that, only now it is a question of paying out money to undeserving people. What I cannot understand is that, if there are seventy-one people there and a considerable number of them are small farmers who will directly be having to pay that out of their own pockets—that is the theory—why they should want to do it ; that is the thing that is rather puzzling me ?—It is always easier to give than to refuse.

7215. I do not think so ?—That is my experience of boards of guardians.

7216. It is not so when you give your own money, is it ?—But you are giving your neighbours' money in these cases.

7217. Certainly, but you are giving your own too ?—Some of them are.

7218. You say that this union is made up of a set of villages, and that there are a number of farmers there ?—And manufacturers.

7219. It seems to me that it is just the kind of board that would be careful ; but still we are going to get, are we not, some more particulars about this board ?—I think you ought to visit Huddersfield and attend the committees there, and really investigate the whole thing. It would be most interesting.

7220. Of course your district industrially is better than the southern part of the country ?—Yes.

7221. It is not because the people are so much better that they are able to make as much provision as they do for themselves, is it ?—Better in what way ? Do you mean better morally ?

The Yorkshire character as a deterrent to pauperism.

7222. I do not know how to put it. I once talked about moral fibre here to someone, and I was sat on. I hardly dare to put it to you that the people in Yorkshire have a stronger moral fibre than the southerners have, and therefore, have more independence of character and the rest of it ?—They are a very hard-headed race, and they know what they want, and they try to get it. Then they work very hard; they are very laborious people, and the men who make the people are always working. I think that laboriousness is one of the great characteristics of the Yorkshire people. But as to moral fibre, I do not quite agree with you. That moral fibre is a very difficult thing to define.

7223. I am glad you do not; it is rather cheerful to find someone who does not. In districts other than Yorkshire, where pauperism is higher, are the people there less self-reliant and less independent than the people in Yorkshire?—I can only repeat that I think the people in Yorkshire have attained to a habit of mind which tends to thrift and providence; and that if they have arrived at that by some means in Yorkshire which has not been attained elsewhere, I cannot explain it, but I think that they have. They seem to me to be able to provide for themselves better.

7224. But you see that even in Yorkshire that does not work out?—I am not a Yorkshire man.

7225. Neither am I. In the East Riding, pauperism is higher than in the West Riding, is it not?—It is, the reason being largely, I think, the old age factor.

7226. Might that not operate in these other districts where pauperism is higher than in the West Riding of Yorkshire?—Old age is a very great factor in the eastern counties—in East Anglia where I was—particularly in Norfolk.

7227. Is that not rather the answer to it all?—If you like to make that answer, of course.

7228. I do not want to make it; I am putting the question?—I will not make that answer.

7229. Then please tell us why, in Yorkshire, you have the variation in the two sides of the county?—The variation may be accounted for by the fact that the industrial life of the West Riding has produced that habit of accumulation and providence and thrift which operates in the way we have described, whereas the absence of the industrial element in the East Riding may have had the opposite effect.

7230. It means that in the East Riding they do not earn as much money, and they have not the means of earning as much money as in the West?—They go west.

7231. Certainly—in order to earn it?—Yes.

Effect on pauperism of opportunity to earn high wages.

7232. Is not the difference between Yorkshire and other counties in England this—that there are better means of earning more stable and regular incomes there than in the eastern and southern parts of England?—I do not know. I should have to study all the other industrial centres before I could answer such a question as that.

Comparison of East Riding and East Anglia.

7233. But you have been in the eastern counties?—Yes, but East Anglia is not an industrial centre. My point is that the West Riding is an industrial centre, and we should have to compare all the industrial centres in England and see how it works out, in order to answer your question.

7234. Taking the East Riding, there your pauperism is lower than the pauperism of Suffolk, Essex, and Norfolk; what is the reason?—I suppose we must fall back upon the superiority of the Yorkshire moral fibre. There that is against you, you see.

7235. The average wages are higher, and the opportunities for people to earn money and to develop self-reliance and all the rest of it are greater in Yorkshire than they are in other parts of England?—I could not answer that, because I am not acquainted with many other parts of England.

7236. People never do answer my questions when I put straight questions?—It is not a straight question.

7237. It is perfectly straight?—I should have to know all the other industrial conditions of all the industrial parts of England, and I do not.

7238. There is a district which you went from?—Yes.

7239. Compare that with the East Riding?—The rural conditions of East Anglia are very like the rural conditions of East Yorkshire.

Mr. Philip Henry Bagenal.

26 Mar. 1906.

7240. Has agriculture decayed in the East Riding as much as in those other counties you went from?—Certainly; the farmers are just as complaining.

7241. They complain everywhere; I did not ask you about the farmers complaining?—Yorkshire is not as near to the London Market as East Anglia. There is the biggest market in the world at the doors of East Anglia. But I do not think there is any difference in that respect, because all the great towns in the West Riding are very good markets for the agriculture of Yorkshire.

7242. I should think they were, too, and I should think that agriculture is not in so parlous a condition in the East Riding of Yorkshire as it is in East Anglia?—It may not be.

7243. I should think you knew that?—I do not; I am not a specialist on agriculture.

Model rules for and scales of relief.

7244. (Chairman.) Will you put those model rules in?—Yes. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XV. (N).) I have a number of scales of relief which have been adopted by different boards of guardians, which I can also put in; indeed, I have a large quantity of those sort of documents, but I am afraid to overwhelm the Commission with them.

7245. (Mr. Gardiner.) Might we have two or three specimen scales of relief typical of the different kinds of administration?—Yes. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XV. (O).)

Figures as to increase of pauperism.

7246. (Mr. Bentham.) Referring to page 3 of your memorandum, and taking the number of in-door paupers, from January 1, 1881, to January 1, 1905, I see a very large indoor increase is shown, but the outdoor pauperism has shown a much less percentage of increase. Just now you were asked a few questions with regard to this point with the object of showing that the policy of in-door relief did not necessarily decrease outdoor relief. I notice that the population has increased 25·9 per cent. and that pauperism during that period has increased 19·8 per cent, which shows that the increase in pauperism is much less than the increase in population?—That is so.

7247. The natural increase in pauperism has been in in-door relief and not in out-door relief?—The figures show that.

7248. You do not give us the number of lunatics in asylums, do you?—No.

Increase in number of lunatic paupers.

7249. Do you not think that the increase in lunatics alone from 1881 to 1905 would make up the whole difference?—It would certainly account for a very considerable proportion of the increase.

7250. Although these figures are exclusive of the lunatics in asylums, there are many lunatics included which affect these figures very largely I think?—Yes, there are.

7251. They are kept in the Yorkshire workhouses and they are included in those figures?—Yes.

7252. Could you give us any idea as to the number?—I could not, but I have them on record. Every inspection that I make I put down the number of certified lunatics in the workhouse. The information is accessible, but it would have to be made up.

Position of Yorkshire as to pauperism: the irreducible minimum.

7253. My point is to show that the natural increase in pauperism in Yorkshire has practically been indoor and not outdoor, and that the pauperism being low is almost at its irreducible minimum?—Do you mean that we are not likely to get any lower percentage of pauperism?

7254. That we are not likely to get any lower practically?—I have not seen very much difference I must say, and except that there may be a more careful examination of cases in the matter of out-door relief, I do not think that you can get very much lower.

7255. It appears that the cases which make up the increase are principally those that need to be dealt with in-door rather than out-door?—I have referred to the sick.

7256. Then the children have made a great difference, have they not?—The children have increased. I have not touched upon the reason of the increase in the number of children, but I should like to make a few observations upon that Bradford staff for out-relief.

7257. I have a question to put to you a little later on that point. At paragraph 148 you begin to deal with the case of Bradford, and in paragraph 149 there is a description of the staff which is not quite accurate in a sense. The number of officers is down here, but still they are not specified properly. You say, "In 1881 the Bradford Union employed for the work of outdoor relief a staff of three relieving officers and a pay clerk. In 1882 it was increased to four relieving officers. In 1896 one cross-visitor was added and a second cross-visitor in 1897, while in 1901 a superintendent relieving officer was appointed." That appears as though there were two cross-visitors, but really there is only one, because one is a collector?—But is he not sometimes used as a cross-visitor?

Mr. Philip Henry Bagenal.

26 Mar. 1906.

7258. Sometimes; it looks as though there was not a collector of repayments?—Ought it to be "A second cross-visitor who acts as collector?"

Revision of relief lists.

7259. It is the first cross-visitor who acts as collector. In paragraph 53 you say there are twenty-two unions who revise their cases every six months, three every twelve months, and eight every three months. Does that mean a revision that is made during the running of a period of relief, or is it what is termed a roll-call when they go through all the cases in the house, and ascertain why they are there, how long they have been there, etc.?—The practice differs. I do not think all the unions adopt the practice of taking a roll-call. What I meant to say in that paragraph was, that as a rule at the end of those periods they revise the cases in point, and they go into the circumstances of the cases.

7260. Does that mean that the whole board revises them, or the committee that granted the relief in the first instance?—It does not take the form as a rule of a revision by the whole board of the whole circumstances of each case. The relieving officer says, "This is a case which comes up again; there is no change in the conditions, and we recommend a renewal of the relief." That is about all it amounts to.

7261. It is not a revision of the case with an independent report of another investigator?—No.

7262. Is there any such case in your district?—I should think that Bradford would probably have a more extended method.

7263. Administering relief in accordance with fixed regulations and the periodical revision of cases is comparatively new, is it not?—It has been growing during the last five years, I think. In my advice to the boards I have laid a good deal of stress on the necessity of investigation and that knowledge of the cases which you cannot get without a periodical revision of the cases and the facts.

Trade, pauperism, and administration at Huddersfield

7264. With regard to Huddersfield, is it not a fact that the state of trade has been very good during the last three or four years?—The whole of the heavy woollen trade in the West Riding has been extraordinarily good ever since the beginning of the war, because they had to make blankets and uniforms for the Japanese. There was a great deal of activity in the dyeing works resulting from that, too. The trade in the heavy woollen districts has been remarkable, and has never had any depression in the worst times.

7265. I have received the figures this morning, and I find that the outdoor relief cases in 1901 were 1,411, and in 1906, 2,312?—That shows that the upward movement is continuing.

7266. Out door relief has nearly doubled, that is to say, there has been an increase of about 80 per cent. in out-door relief alone as from 1901, and that during a period of growing and improving trade?—Of course I do not want to make an absolute statement about Huddersfield trade, because I do not pretend to be a trade expert having a knowledge of each trade; but if the heavy woollen trade has been improving, and I believe it has, then Huddersfield has shared in the heavy woollen prosperity.

7267. I think I know that to be the fact?—You would know more about that than I do.

7268. Side by side with these growing out-door figures the in-door figures have not gone down, but are much larger than they were in 1901, being now 532. Do you attribute this increase to administration or to any other theory? You have given us a good deal of evidence on administration as causing these increases; but, seeing now that we have the new figures, I would like you to say definitely whether you think this is due to administration entirely?—I do not see what else I can put it down to.

7269. Is it not a fact also that the guardians themselves have become alarmed recently and are considering the advisability of having regulations?—I am not quite certain whether they are, but I think they were. They had an inquiry two years ago into the whole thing, I think; so they were alarmed two years ago.

7270. Have you any knowledge that the nominal leader of the friendly society movement on the board is now advocating a rotation of members on the Relief Committees in order to reduce the numbers on the out-door list?—No, I do not know that as a fact.

Effect of few determined men on boa of guardian

7271. Is it your experience that a few determined men can either wreck or make a policy on a board of guardians?—I think a few determined men can go on until they tire the majority out. I have seen that over and over again, especially with regard to the administration of out-door relief. Determined men who want to give relief nearly always succeed in giving it, because they use arguments which react upon the other more strict people, and it gets known outside and has an effect on public opinion in that way—for people become more and more unwilling to appear as denying relief if it is really wanted.

Effect of M Chaplin's circular.

7272. With regard to the circular of 1900, which is known as Mr. Chaplin's Circular, I think you said that that circular had been entirely misunderstood and that there were very rare cases, if any, where it had been acted upon in the proper spirit. Are there any exceptions to that in your district?—No. I think the general impression left upon the minds of the guardians by the circular was that it gave them a dispensing power, as it were, in the matter of out-relief—that they were more or less dispensed from the strict administration of out-relief which it was believed had hitherto been the policy of the Local Government Board.

7273. Do you think on the whole that it has been mischievous rather than helpful?—I think to a great extent it has resulted in a certain laxity, yet on the other hand I think it has done good in relieving certain forms of pauperism which I think were stinted before, and particularly I have mentioned the allowance for each child. I have always felt that the children of the out-door poor had never been properly done by or looked after.

7274. Has it been the means of increasing the amount per head of out-door relief in any of the unions? I think you have only mentioned one union where you give the amounts per head in certain years. Has it generally increased the amount per head?—If you mean to each person receiving relief, yes, it certainly has—as much as 1s. per head in some cases. In Hull they used to give the old people 2s. 6d., and now 3s. 6d. is the common amount.

Effect of hig scale of out- relief.

7275. In the table of expenditure in out-relief in Bradford union during the ten years 1895-96 to 1904-05 you mention 2s. 10½d. per head as the average cost per person relieved in the first week in January, 1904-05; are there other unions in your district where the amount is so high or higher?—I do not think I ought to make any statement on that, because I really do not think I have the data for making the comparison.

7276. You have not the information?—No, I really have not. As a general rule when I have made the comparison I have found that this is generally supposed to be the highest. The Bradford scale is looked upon as a very high scale to certain classes, because you classify your out-door poor, which they do not do anywhere else except in Sheffield.

7277. You would consider, would you not, that the higher the scale the more danger there is in an out-door relief policy?—It might become so heavy that the burden would be intolerable.

7278. But does it not lead to a better discrimination of cases?—You reduce the number of persons, but you increase the amount given, and of course it is the more deserving people who get better treated.

7279. When the scale is high has not that also a tendency to influence guardians in granting relief to cases that really ought to be dealt with inside rather than out?—Yes, because it would become an intolerable burden if they did not.

7280. Therefore the tendency is towards more adequate relief, where it is needed, and no outdoor relief given to persons who would be better dealt with inside than out?—Yes.

7281. You approve of that policy, I take it?—Yes, I do. Frequently in talking about principles to the Guardians I have over and over again said that it is far better to give more to the few deserving and to cut off the wastrels either with nothing at all or with offers of the house—throw them on their own resources, as was done immediately after the reform of the Poor Law.

7282. Do you take this large amount as being evidence of the fact that the circular of 1900 has been misunderstood?—You may say so, I think. It is an undoubted fact that it was misrepresented and used in a sense which it was not meant to have by the framers of it.

7283. Have you ever seen the Bradford regulations with regard to that circular?—Yes, I am familiar with those.

7284. Do you think a policy of the kind indicated would be likely to lead to abuse in attempting to grant a sufficient amount of outdoor relief to the more deserving class?—No. I should say that it ought to indicate the more desirable thing for the guardians to do.

7285. That is to discriminate very carefully between the applications?—Yes, though of course it is contrary to the old hard and fast Poor Law principle, that you have nothing to say to character and that you have got to relieve destitution. That is the old Poor Law principle.

7286. Is there not a tendency as we are going now to give out-door relief only to those who are in themselves deserving and proper recipients of out-door relief, leaving the rest practically to be dealt with by other means?—That is I think a very growing policy with all guardians.

7287. If the policy adopted has that effect, would you consider it a right policy?—Certainly.

7288. That clearly shows that it is not an evidence in itself that the circular has been misunderstood, so that your assertion is rather sweeping that you did not think there was an exception?—I have been met on such frequent occasions by men saying, "Well, it is your own circular," and interjections of that sort, that it is impossible to get out of my mind the fact that it has been either misrepresented or interpreted wrongly.

7289. But that could only apply to cases where out-door relief ought not to be granted at all?—I do not quite follow that.

7290. There is no mischief in granting a sufficient amount of out-door relief to a case of a deserving character?—No; that is all right.

7291. If the numbers are reduced to those that come under that category it will then be a healthy sign of better discrimination in the administration of out-door relief?—Yes, I agree with that.

The right to relief.

7292. You said in answer to a question that there was a common idea that there was a right to relief. I would like to ask you if it is your opinion that that feeling is growing or diminishing?—I could not give any opinion as to that. It is a common opinion, and I believe it is a revival from the old Poor Law handed down from father to son, that there are rights on the Poor Law which they cannot define, but which they believe exist.

7293. Do you not think it was really dying out until the recent revival of the idea?—I have not been sufficiently long in actual Poor Law work to be able to say that.

7294. Does not the revival of that idea date from recent times?—I do not know, and I have no means of saying. I have heard it ever since I have been in the Poor Law.

High percentage of child paupers at Sheffield.

7295. With regard to the children, there are all forms or methods of dealing with children adopted in your district. We find that in Sheffield the number of children is far larger than in other unions with a similar population, how do you account for that?—I cannot account for it, but I have a feeling that the one weak point in the growing disposition of dealing with pauper children by more improved and better methods, giving them, in fact, a very much better chance in life, has to a certain extent weakened the sense of parental responsibility. People are probably more willing now to throw their children on the rates in the hope of getting them better looked after. That is a warning note I always strike when speaking to guardians on their methods of dealing with children. I agree that you do get better value for your money than is the case with any other Poor Law entity, but at the same time I think that the Sheffield figures are a warning that unless this is very carefully guarded you might be inducing people to throw their children on to the community for their ultimate good, in order that they might get better fed, clothed, and educated.

High standard of relief to children an incentive to desertion.

7296. Do you mean there will be a larger number of desertions of children?—There will be more desertions and more intentional desertions with that object.

7297. Have you any particulars of the numbers of children deserted in the different unions?—No, but if you will look at my figures with regard to the Sheffield Children Homes I think you will find them very interesting. I particularly asked that those figures should be furnished to me.

7298. I find that the number of children deserted in the Sheffield union in 1905 was eighty-one. Do you think that the method of dealing with children in scattered homes or in village communities has a tendency to encourage desertion, owing to the fact that the parents of the children know where those children will be and know where to find them when they want them?—That is an inference you might take, but I have no means of knowing it.

7299. Are you aware whether in the unions where deserted children are invariably adopted and boarded-out, the number of desertions are fewer?—I have no comparative statistics of that sort. If I had had a year to prepare my evidence I could have got all these details, but really I have not had time to go into them all.

7300. I think this is rather an interesting point?—I think this part of the question is worth the Commission's attention, especially having regard to the weakening of parental responsibility, which I think it undoubtedly growing.

7301. Could you give us a return of the number of deserted children in typical unions in a given period within the last ten years, separating them into those who were sent to scattered homes and those who were adopted and boarded-out?—Each inspector could get that for you, I think.

7302. (Chairman.) Would there by any difficulty in getting it for your district?—I think I could get it for my district.

Cause of increased expenditure on child relief.

7303. (Mr. Bentham.) Is it not the fact that the large increase in expenditure has been due to the large capital outlay for homes, and in obtaining better provision for the children?—Part of it no doubt has been due to that. I include that in the general building expenditure.

7304. Practically every one of the schemes for dealing with the children in your district, with the exception of Dewsbury and Sheffield, have been undertaken since 1894?—I do not exactly know the date, but a great many of them have taken place since I have come into the district.

Misleading effect of expenditure from Poor Rate on non-Poor Law purposes.

7305. Do you find a very great discrepancy between what is levied as the poor rate, and the amount that is actually handed over for Poor Law purposes; and is that not often misunderstood by the people, who think the whole poor rate is for the relief of the poor?—Yes, that is a very common mistake indeed, and it is a mistake I am continually being confronted with. People say what a scandalous thing it is that such an amount is spent upon the Poor Law. It is very difficult to refer them to Blue Books, but I have worked out that principle in a table which shows in several typical unions the amounts raised as poor rate and how the moneys so raised are applied in a certain year. In this table (handed in, see Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XV. (P).) I show the amount spent in relief of the poor, the amount spent for county council purposes and the amount spent for town council purposes, also for rural and parish councils and for school and burial boards. All these charges come under what is called the poor rate, although it is obvious they have nothing whatever to do with the maintenance of the poor. Besides those there are the expenses of the overseers. Take Bradford, for instance. The total payments by the overseers there in the year 1904 was £317,699, and the amount paid to the board of guardians for relief of the poor was only £54,000, yet the guardians are credited with the spending of the £317,699.

Mr. Philip Henry Bagenal.

26 Mar. 1906.

7306. (Chairman.) Where did all that money go to? Could you give us one or two of the big heads?—There was £54,000 for the relief of the poor, and £258,000 for the Town Council.

7307. (Sir Samuel Provis.) The demand note would always show that, would it not?—Yes, but it is called the Poor Rate.

7308. Merely because it is the one rate which is levied in the parish to meet the expenses of the local authorities in that area?—Quite true, but then it is a thing which is called the Poor Rate, and so it will always be put down in the mind of the ordinary citizen as being spent on the poor.

7309. Not if he looked at his demand note?—But they do not look at their demand notes.

7310. (Chairman.) Is it not officially headed "Demand Note for the Poor Rate"?—Yes.

7311. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Would not the Rate be headed "An Assessment for the Relief of the Poor and other purposes chargeable thereon"?—That may be, but I have heard this complaint raised over and over again by different people.

7312. You might get over it as they do in London, by naming the rate a General Rate?—Yes, that would meet the point. I think the present terminology is an unfair handicap on the Poor Rate of the country.

7313. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) Is it your experience that people do look at their demand notes?—I do not think they do.

7314. (Mr. Bentham.) Does it not also occur, in cases where there is an additional rate, that that makes the difficulty all the more; for instance, there is a rate in Bradford besides the Poor Rate called the "General District Rate," is there not?—That is not shown on the Table that I have here. I think that would be the Town Council rate; that absorbs the bulk of the money.

7315. Where there is both a General District Rate and a Poor Rate, are not the people rather more likely to think that the Poor Rate is actually made in relief of the poor?—That is what I think.

Relief granted to enforce maintenance by relatives.

7316. Do you find in dealing with cases of out-door relief that there is a practice of granting out-door relief in order to settle family affairs, that is, not because such relief is actually needed, but because the sons who are married and away from home do not contribute as the people think they ought to contribute; therefore relief is granted where it is not needed, with the sole object of getting it repaid from the sons and daughters?—That is a common occurrence.

7317. Would you say it is a very common occurrence?—I have noticed that there is a growing disinclination on the part of sons and daughters to help in contributing to the maintenance of their parents. I have over and over again heard family disputes of that sort settled. I think Yorkshire is almost the worst place there is in that respect; they are growing exceedingly lax in that way.

Relieving Officers: their qualifications, duties, etc.

7318. I take it you agree that the relieving officer's work is most important—almost the most important of any officer's under the board?—Yes.

7319. Do you think that the status of that officer is what it ought to be, and that the remuneration is as good as it ought to be?—The answer to that question is that the thing is governed by the higgling of the market. The guardians find that they can get any amount of applications—from 150 to 300 applications—if they put an advertisement into the paper for a relieving officer at such-and-such a sum; and the result is that they will not give more. It is the financial view that governs the whole thing.

7320. That will only obtain when the guardians do not specify that they require a person with experience; and that is not often done, I believe, is it?—Advertisements are framed widely sometimes, and they are not sufficiently precise. Then there is no method of testing a man's experience. It is a most difficult thing. I should like to see some certificate issued by some new educational authority, which would stamp a man as having gone through a certain curriculum, at all events, of social work—some work connected with the relief of the poor.

7321. Do you find that most of the new appointments of relieving officers are given to men who have had no experience whatever in poor law?—A great many are given to men who have had no experience whatever. That is most common in country districts.

Objections to pluralist relieving officers.

7322. Do you find that the relieving officer in many cases has other duties besides those strictly defined by the Orders?—Yes, and I think that is one of the great objections to the multiplication of these offices. A relieving officer ought to have nothing whatever to do, if possible, except the business connected with the relief of the poor. When you add to that—which is a very important business—the collection of the contributions from relatives, which takes up an enormous amount of time, and when you give him the vaccination officer's work and the registry of births and deaths, you can easily see that it is impossible for a man to do all these things and keep all the books that are required, and at the same time to carry on the work of relief. The clerical work thrown upon relieving officers is enormous, and ought to be reduced. I think a very great drawback to their services is the amount of clerical work they have to do in connection with all these offices. I gave some little idea of the books that the man at Pocklington had to keep; the number was astonishing—he had to keep twelve or thirteen great books besides sending out circulars. That is one of the reasons why relieving officers do not do their duties—because they have not time to do them. I am very strong upon that point.

7323. What books are you referring to?—The statistical books of the relieving officers and the entering of all the money they pay. Then they have certain books to keep for vaccination, and the collection entails a great deal of correspondence. Then they have to do all these wages notes. There is really a vast amount of clerical work which relieving officers have to do, and it ought always to be considered how they are handicapped in that way.

Adequacy of existing discretion of guardians.

7324. You agree, I think, that the guardians have a very large discretion left to them now as to the persons who are really eligible for relief and as to the amount of relief they may grant and the method of doing it; do you also agree that any limitations are necessary to restrict the guardians in that discretion in dealing with administration generally?—First of all in what direction?

7325. In any direction lessening the amount of discretion which they have at the present time? They are the sole judges of a person's eligibility for relief, and the sole judges of the kind of relief they may grant to a particular case?—I do not see how you are going to draw any line; it is very difficult to draw a line.

7326. Would you extend the discretion they have already; do you think it would be safe to do so?—I do not see how you can extend it very much. They have full discretion now, have they not? They can deal with all cases.

Type of persons becoming nurses and probationers.

7327. In selecting nurses or probationers to come to the training schools to be trained, do you find that they are getting the class of nurses that you think is desirable?—I do not think they get that class of young person which is the sort who makes a good nurse. They are selected very often because they are the friends or acquaintances of the guardians. The result is they have no idea of discipline, and they kick up their heels and go off at a moment's notice. I have had to hold two inquiries during the last year with regard to nurses, and so I have learnt a great deal. In both these cases—certainly in one—the whole trouble arose, I think, from laxity of discipline which was caused by the probationer—nurses feeling that they had a home close by, and that practically they could go off at once if they wanted to; and so they did not care about staying if it was not exactly to their taste. The best way of doing it is to get the superintendent nurse in all cases to choose likely candidates, and to have them on trial for a month or two months and then report to the guardians as to their capabalities. There is no body in the world that is so badly equipped for judging of what a probationer ought to be as a board of guardians.

7328. Do you think when it is left to the discretion of the superintendent nurse that they get a proper amount of applicants for the position ?—I think so. I think that the people who go there then feel that they are going to be tested at all events on their merits.

Out-relief and other provision for phthisical paupers.

7329. Is anything done inside any of the larger hospitals or infirmaries for the treatment of phthisis, I mean in cases where they have not a sanatorium of their own ?—Yes. In Wakefield they have got a few shelters outside on the grounds of the premises, and they have a very good shelter at Keighley where they treat all the phthisis cases, and they are talking of the same thing in other places. It is very easy to put up a hut or shelter and treat a few cases.

7330. Is there anything at Rotherham in that direction ?—No.

7331. Have they a large number of phthisis cases there ?—There is a great deal of phthisis amongst the outdoor paupers in Rotherham, and I had an interesting communication from the relieving officer on that point. He called my attention particularly to the fact that there was a vast amount of phthisis among the outdoor poor, and that it was impossible to deal with them, as they were bulking more and more in the sickness returns.

7332. Then they give them outdoor relief ?—Yes, they are given outdoor relief.

7333. In a known case of phthisis, would they not order the house ?—The fact is, that they are so crowded in the house at the present moment that they do not know what to do.

7334. Then they really grant outdoor relief in a case of that kind, because they have not proper accommodation for dealing with it ?—That is so.

7335. Does that not apply to other places besides Rotherham ?—I think it does; but you see the hospital accommodation every year is becoming more crowded. The crux in all these unions is the phthisis.

7336. Do you not find there is a great disinclination also on account of the expense ?—Yes, the expense is very high.

7337. Had you an instance brought to your notice where a board of guardians delayed a case for a year for consideration ?—Yes. That came before the board quite recently. The clerk advised them, I think, to begin with, that it was not a legal case, and the guardians would not relieve this man by sending him to a sanatorium. It was proposed to send him to a phthisis sanatorium, and the guardians refused to have anything to say to it. Then they were called in question by, I think, a lady guardian, and they wrote up to the Local Government Board, who gave them the law on the subject. The real reason, I am sure, why they refused it was that it would be a precedent involving a very heavy expenditure, and that if they relieved one man who was suffering from phthisis, at a cost of about £1 or 24s. a week, there was no logical reason why they should not relieve fifty others who were also suffering from phthisis. The whole question of phthisis in Poor Law is a very growing and a very serious one, because of the expense.

Mr. Philip Henry Bagenal.

26 Mar. 1906.

7338. (Chairman.) Is the number of cases increasing ?—No, because all over England the phthisis statistics are on the downward grade happily; but there is a great quantity of phthisis cases in all the industrial parts of my district. That is a most important factor on the medical side.

7339. (Mr. Bentham). There is only a limited number who are suffering from phthisis who are eligible for treatment under the Poor Laws; would that number be large enough, do you think, to frighten off guardians from dealing with the problem ?—It might not, if they came to examine it. There is an absence of accurate knowledge on the subject.

7340. Is it not the fact that the Board you mention have deferred further consideration of the case for a year ?—Yes, they have deferred it for twelve months.

7341. What may happen to the man in the meantime ?—He may get worse and he may die, of course.

Class of persons receiving medical relief.

7342. Just one other question with regard to the hospitals. Do you think that the better treatment inside the workhouse infirmaries and hospitals has tapped a new stratum of pauperism which is likely to tend to a large increase in numbers ?—I think it has to a certain extent tapped a new stratum which may increase.

Mr. PHILIP HENRY BAGENAL, recalled; and further Examined.

Adequacy of existing discretion of guardians.

7343. (Mr. Bentham.) In answer to a question which I put to you yesterday, I think you said that you did not see any necessity for further limitations being put upon the discretionary powers which boards of guardians now possess for dealing with applicants for relief ?—Yes, I did.

7344. Neither do you think it necessary to relax the restrictions which are now placed upon local administrators by the central authority ?—No, I do not.

Mr. Philip Henry Bagenal

27 Mar. 1906.

Scope of the Poor Law.

7346. Do you adhere to the principle that the relief of indigence in any form from the public funds should be done by the Poor Law authorities and not by several authorities ?—As against relief in aid of wages, do you mean, or in aid of poverty and not destitution ?

Mr. Philip Henry Bagenal.

27 Mar. 1906.

7347. I mean relieving destitution due to poverty of any kind through the public funds; do you believe that that should always be done through the Poor Law?—The Poor Law is there ad hoc, and it ought to do the work.

7348. It ought to cover the whole field?—Yes, as far as destitution is concerned.

7349. Do you consider any relief of indigence from the public funds is pauperism, whatever name it might be known by, and that the more its real significance is obscured the greater the danger of an extension of pauperism?—I think there is a great danger of the extension of pauperism by the demands upon the public funds of all kinds and conditions, which are increasing. I think that anything in that direction is bound to increase pauperism, familiarising the people with the idea that they can get what they want by asking for it without working.

7350. And by obscuring the fact that it is after all Poor relief?—Yes.

7351. And pauperisation?—I agree.

7352. At all times do you think it possible with good administration to relieve promptly and adequately all cases of destitution, without at the same time manufacturing the cases which it is intended to relieve?—The last part of your question touches the whole difficulty—whether you can extend the area of relief without increasing the demands for relief. It all depends upon the policy of the board, whether you do it or whether you do not.

7353. Then you would put adequacy of relief, particularly if it is out-door relief, in the same category, as being dangerous?—I would, because the question of adequacy is one which people differ upon, and a board may be elected which will consider 7s. 6d. adequate instead of 5s. or 3s. 6d.

The test of "good" administration.

7354. Do you think the nearer that object can be approached, that is, to relieve adequately and promptly without at the same time increasing the number who rely upon it, is the test of good administration?—Yes, and it can easily be done by an efficient staff; that is the point.

Effect of Act of 1894 on administration.

7355. (Professor Smart.) You said that 1894 may be looked on as a starting point of a new policy and new views of administration; I suppose you mean, not that the law was changed, but that new readings were taken of the law?—Yes, I do.

Elasticity of the Poor Law.

7356. Do you mean that the Poor Law is of such a nature that its provisions may be carried out in different ways and with different expenditures?—Yes; I think that the Poor Law is one of the most elastic laws that was ever put upon the statute book.

7357. Do you mean that changes in the Orders from headquarters in 1894 necessitated larger expenditure, if the provisions were to be carried out?—Certainly. How can you advocate better treatment to the sick, without at the same time increasing the accommodation for the sick and providing adequate nursing?

7358. Then the large expenditure was a necessary result of the change in 1894?—Undoubtedly.

7359. And that change came from headquarters?—I was not a member of the Board at the time, but I think the change in the position of the guardians in 1894 was due to the passing of the Parish Councils Act, which changed the constitution of the personnel of the boards of guardians very considerably.

7360. But it did not change the law?—Certainly not.

7361. I am trying, as a stranger in this country, to find out what is meant nowadays by good administration. Do you consider that the administration before 1894 was good or bad, or merely different from now?—I am not able to give you any information from personal knowledge of what the administration was before 1896, because I only became inspector in 1896.

7362. Before 1896 was willingness to enter the workhouse the sole test of destitution?—That was the ordinary acceptation of the term.

Desuetude of workhouse test.

7363. Is that so now?—I think that the use of the workhouse test in all my district has largely fallen into disuse. Of course the ultimate test of a man's absolute destitution is the fact that he will enter an institution which gives him food, shelter and clothes; if he is absolutely destitute and cannot get those necessities of life anywhere else, he will undoubtedly come into the house. That was the object of the original workhouse test. If he found that he could make shift without coming in the workhouse, the argument was that he was able to maintain himself. The result of the Poor Law Amendment Act was that vast numbers of the working classes who were paupers were absorbed into the working population of the country.

7364. Do you think that now the word "destitution" has been changed into the word "poverty"?—No, I do not think so. The law stands exactly as it was, but it is interpreted in a different way. You see there is a discretion in the guardians whether they give out-door relief or indoor relief, and they can do just as they please in the matter; but they will not offer the workhouse in as many cases as I think they ought to, in order to test the bonâ fides of the application.

Indoor-relief to part only of a family.

7365. You spoke of the elasticity of the law, and I was led into asking that question by a fact of this sort: In very early discussions on the Poor Law a regulation was made, or seemed to be made, that if any children of a poor man with a large family were taken into the house, the whole family must go; but the relaxation was made afterwards by a special letter to certain unions allowing them to take, in, say, the surplus children. I find that in some boards that liberty is allowed, and in others it is disallowed; that is surely a very elastic reading of one law?—It is elastic. The reason why I say it is an elastic law is, that there is discretion allowed to the guardians as to the way in which they give relief; that is the elasticity.

The essentials of "good" Poor Law administration.

7366. Is there not a common idea abroad that stern administration is good administration; is that not what we very often mean by the term "good administration"?—Yes; and for this reason, that the ideal condition of citizenship is an independent man living in his own home and supporting himself without help from his neighbours. That is what we want to perpetuate. We want to enlarge that idea of citizenship. Therefore, any help that is given to people who are in want should be so given as not to make that ideal difficult or less common than it ought to be. Consequently, your relief system ought to be such as to make it to the advantage of the applicant not to avail himself of the Poor Law, because he can get on better without it.

7367. That is one side of it. Take what are sometimes called progressive unions, where a good many experiments seem to be making. Do you consider that a good many of these experiments, even when accompanied by a large expenditure and by increase in the number of people seeking relief, may yet be good administration?—That is the experiment which is now in action, and it is very difficult to say how it will end. We know exactly where we were under the old idea of the Poor Law; but there is a new school of Poor Law reformers now, who seem to think that there is a permanent state of pauperism inherent in the human race. They under-rate the capacity for self-help in the British working men; I do not under-estimate that capacity myself, because I think they have an extraordinary capacity for accommodating themselves to circumstances. This new school say that help must be given on all occasions to everybody who asks for it who has done anything towards paying rates. That is the idea—that they have paid into a public insurance fund; they look upon the rates apparently as an insurance fund. I do not agree with that; and I think that these experiments, unless they are very carefully guarded by a large staff and by very strigent superintendence, will turn out to be a very great burden upon the ratepayers.

Tests for the more attractive forms of relief at Bradford and Sheffield.

7368. But then would you say it is quite possible to call this good administration?—I think it is. For instance, Sheffield and Bradford, I think, have good administration, because they do all they can to assist the people who have assisted themselves. In their classification they exact a test in the shape of twenty years' residence. The man must have done something to help himself. All the conditions which have been attached to old-age pensions in theory are attached to the relief which is given in these well-administered unions.

Administrative latitude possessed by guardians.

7369. Then evidently you do not think that when a man becomes a guardian he becomes an officer of the law, and has to put aside his own feelings of what he thinks should be done with the poor; there is a large latitude of interpretation given to him?—I think so. I do not think you can give people the alternative of out-relief and indoor relief without connoting that.

7370. Then a guardian is very much in the position of a Member of Parliament; he is not sent there with a definite mandate, but is told to do his best?—He is there to conduct a policy of relief, which ought to be conducted for the benefit of the community as well as for the benefit of the person who applies. You ought not to assist a man on his own conditions. The worst of outdoor relief is that there is an idea abroad that when a man applies for outdoor relief he ought to get it because he asks for it, instead of saying: Is this man going to be an evil to the State by getting out-relief?—if he is, he ought not to have it, but he ought to be offered the house. That is my view.

The essentials of "good" Poor Law administration.

7371. Do you not think there is another tendency—to judge administration, and to decide whether it is good or bad, by the rates; that is, to say it is good administration if the rates are kept down, and bad administration if the rates go up. That is a popular view, is it not?—Yes, it is; but you must raise the rates to a certain extent in order to improve your equipment. I think myself that we are coming now to the end of the demands for equipment. I think the requirements of equipment in my district, for instance, are nearly satisfied, and that our capital expenditure will probably be very small in the coming years, because most of the workhouses are now properly equipped. That will all be paid off as the loans are paid off, and I look forward to the time when, if there is good administration, the rates ought to go down.

7373. I rather gather from you that a good practical test of the administration is, where the outdoor relief comes down and at the same time the indoor relief comes down?—Where the number of persons comes down—that is the point. If you could reduce the number of people who are dependent you must then obviously be increasing the number of independent people in the community. You may give those persons whom you relieved a better scale of relief, because they deserve it or ought to have it. The criterion ought to be the number of persons who are on the rates; then you are getting some idea of the independence of the population.

7374. Might this not be driving destitution underground and making destitute people rather suffer than approach the poor authorities?—No; because you are giving their neighbours a chance to help them.

7375. Then it may be forcing these people on the support of other people on whom they have no claim?—That support will do the giver and the receiver good. That is what Chalmers said.

7376. Then you would not call an increase of outdoor relief in itself a sign of bad administration, would you?—That all depends upon the factors of which it is made up. It depends upon the class to whom it is given.

7377. You would not call an increase of in-relief a sign of bad administration, would you?—No; because that in-relief may be largely to the sick.

Effect on indoor relief of increase in out-relief.

7378. Do you think that the proportion between the two is an important question?—You know that great controversy as to whether increased out-relief results in increasing the indoor relief. I have certainly seen that happen. Wherever there is laxity of administration—and what I mean by that is when there is not sufficient distinction made between the wasteful and the deserving poor, and when everyone gets relief—you will find that the area of pauperism has increased, and that then they naturally come into the house when they cannot keep them outside any longer. In that way it re-acts on indoor pauperism. You get a larger nidus for the indoor than you would if you had a smaller number of people on out-relief; and the tendency, therefore, is to fill the workhouse if you fill your out-relief lists too.

7379. But you would have no hesitation in saying that anything that manufactures paupers is bad administration?—No.

7380. The law itself which you administer may be bad, and it may be defective?—Do you ask me whether I think the Poor Law defective?

7381. No: I say it may be?—Of course, any law may be defective.

7382. If the law is bad, a lax administration of it may have better results than a stern administration of it?—I do not know that I should assent to that.

Scope of general inspector's functions.

7383. As an inspector, do you consider that you have simply to carry out the letter of the law in its widest interpretation?—I have not to carry out the letter of the law at all. I have no right to interfere in any individual case.

7384. You have to criticise?—I criticise ex post facto; but you know what that means.

7385. I want to see what your criterion of criticism is in such a very wide latitude?—My criterion of criticism is the general atmosphere of a board of guardians, and the general way in which a relieving officer does his work. I look at his books, I question him, I sometimes go with him. There is a certain indefinable knowledge that one gets which I cannot describe to you. I may have means of drawing inferences from people: one gets a great deal of experience with men after ten years' dealing with a large number of men and officers: one gets to know things. I tell you I know them, and I know that some things require criticism, and I criticise.

Elasticity of Poor Law

7386. The general reason why I ask these questions is because I hear the expression used amongst guardians very commonly that they stretch the law just as much as they think necessary?—That is because of the elasticity I have mentioned: they have that stretching power. The Poor Law is such a very difficult subject, and the whole question of relief involves such tremendous problems that I do not see how you could do it by hard-and-fast regulations, because there would always be some hard case, which would be seized upon and made capital out of, and there would be a wide-spread indignation because of that exceptional case.

Effect on cost of relief of rise in price of commodities.

7387. I was a little surprised by your statement that one of the causes of increased expenditure in workhouse was the rise in the price of commodities consumed in the workhouse?—And of necessaries.

7388. Do you think that is quite borne out by the figures that you give from Rotherham and Bradford?—I think you will find that is the case in regard to many of the articles, coal particularly.

7389. I think if you compare 1896 with 1905, you will find it is the case that commodities have risen: but if you compare 1900 with 1905, you will find that this can scarcely be said. I find, for example, that between 1900 and 1905 there has been a fall in cheese, butter, meat, split peas, coke, coal and soap. You are aware, of course, of what is called the price level as determined by index numbers?—Yes, I am.

7390. Will you take this from me—that we usually start from a price level determined by the average of the years between 1866 and 1877 and call it 100?—Yes.

7391. That works out as making 1871 the starting year, where the level is 100. In 1873 the prices went up to 111, in 1874 they came back to 102, in 1875 they were down to 96, and from that time there was a rush down to 68 in 1887, the lowest level being touched in 1896. Of course, that is all familiar to you. From 1896 there was a rise till 1900, then a fall again till 1903. For example, in the decade 1888–97 the level was 67, and in the decade 1893–1902 it was 66. The rise in these last five years has been very little; in fact, the level for 1905 was 72, while for 1900 it was 75. I would, therefore, suggest that any rise in expenditure within the last five years cannot be accounted for by a rise in the price of commodities?—I am quite prepared to take that from you.

Mr. Philip Henry Bagenal.

27 Mar. 1906.

7392. I should like you to think that over, and I should be glad to hear if you see anything in it that I have omitted. It seems to me that it is rather important that a rise in expenditure, if it has occurred within the last five years, should not be credited to a rise in price ?—I will think that over.

Effect of Poor Law administration on character of people.

7393. (Miss Hill.) I suppose you would say that character, conditions and administration are all factors which bear on pauperism ?—Yes.

7394. And that one may argue for a long time in what proportion they affect pauperism in a given union ?—Yes.

7395. I suppose that the conditions and the administration would affect character ?—I do think so.

7396. Then, as administration is the factor most within the control of the Poor Law authorities, therefore it is the one they are particularly bound to fix their attention upon ?—It ought to be.

7397. I should think it would have struck you that some people manage so far to rise above their conditions that they will often be better off in bad conditions than other people in good conditions ?—Yes, that is so.

7398. I suppose you would hold that people can really, if they put out their strength, as a rule, provide far better for themselves by thrift than they can ever be provided for by the Poor Law ?—I should hope so. I should like to think that of the population.

7399. Of course there must be exceptions ?—Yes.

7400. But at the same time it is a more satisfactory way of meeting their wants, as far as it will go ?—Yes.

7401. Therefore it is very important not to discourage it ?—That is my point all through.

7402. So that it is by no means only for the sake of saving money, but because it is believed to be in the best interests of working people that a stricter administration is advocated by most Poor Law reformers ?—I think so. It is in the interests of the community and of the people themselves.

7403. Of the people themselves ?—Certainly; and not merely for the saving of the rates.

7404. It is not merely a question of money only ?—No.

Instructions to assistant commissioners in 1840.

7405. (Dr. Downes.) The paragraph in your statement as to the work of an inspector struck me as of interest in connection with the instructions that were given to the assistant commissioners in the early days of the new Poor Law; therefore, I would rather like to direct your attention in that relation to a circular which the commissioners issued in 1840, in which they say this: "An additional field of usefulness is open to the assistant commissioner," the assistant commissioner being, as you are aware, the same in those days that the inspector is now ?—Yes.

7406. "If he avails himself of the means at his disposal to investigate the causes of pauperism." They then go on to point out that in the application and report book, and in the admission and discharge book, columns are appropriated for the entry of the causes of the pauperism of the applicants; I think that is so to this day, and that those columns remain ?—Yes; I have specimens here.

Scope of general inspectors' functions.

7407. They continue: "This information was required not merely in order to enable the guardians to verify the truth of the applicants' statement, and to prevent fraud, but with the hope that the pauperism would thus be traced in many instances to causes which might be diminished, if not entirely removed, by precautionary regulation, or by the suggestion of practical measures, which admit of being effective through the influence of the guardians." Do you agree in the advisability of such instructions being given to inspectors at the present time ?—I think an inspector labours under a certain disadvantage when entering upon his work, by not having his functions mapped out. It is very difficult sometimes to know at what end to begin. I think the social conditions of the people, and the questions of labour and everything else connected with the people, have such a great bearing upon poverty and pauperism that they would naturally—they ought to do so, certainly—pay a great deal of attention to them. I do not think that the mere business of inspecting institutions ought to be the end-all and the be-all of an inspector's life.

7408. It may only be a very small part of the problem which is presented to him ?—I hope it is a very small part. The longer I am in the business, the less I think of the institutional side of it, because it is defined, and it is there, and you know exactly what it is. But you have got this enormous mass of pauperism outside, and the inspector really does not know anything about it. He has not the time to devote to the examination of the causes—and we are not asked to report upon the causes—of pauperism; we have to deal with the result of pauperism, which is destitution.

7409. In dealing with destitution, which would you consider came first—the study of the causes, or the study of the treatment ?—You can always be studying causes. You may never arrive at any very final conclusion on it, but I think that there are certain causes, such as intemperance, for instance, feeble-mindedness, and a great many others, which I think every man ought to take an interest in and try to make some generalisations from. We are not set to do that work, but we do that on our own motion at present. I have taken an interest in these questions for a long time, and it has been a part of my work which I like to do. It interests me, but I do not know whether it would interest every inspector.

7410. I gather from your statement that you feel that you are rather hampered by want of time in following up studies of that sort ?—Of course we have to get about the country. I have got two Ridings, which form a very large district, and if one is travelling three days a week and inspecting also and writing reports, one wants a day off at home, and then there is a good deal of correspondence to be got through, and so you have not the time to investigate these things, and the result may be very small after you have been investigating them for a long time. That is, I think, the result of a good deal of sociological labours.

7411. Assuming he had the time, should you consider an inspector was in rather an exceptional position for the study of problems of this sort ?—I think he occupies a very remarkable position for doing that, because he has access to people. One has only to say he is an inspector of the Local Government Board, and the people, I am bound to say are, very glad to give you every information possible.

7412. I think that was the view of the Commissioners. I will continue what I was reading. They say: "In conclusion, the commissioners desire to impress upon you that the peculiar nature of your office gives you opportunities which fall to the lot of few other public functionaries, of acquainting yourself with the condition of the working classes in your district ?"—That is perfectly true.

7413. These instructions were issued in 1840, and I believe they were rescinded in 1846 by instructions which did not take so wide a scope. I suggest that that may be one reason why the earlier broad view that was taken by the Commissioners does not, perhaps, hold to the same extent at the present time. May I ask you whether it is not a fact that of more recent years the conditions of the local administration have extended: for example, public health statutes have been passed, and public health authorities have come into existence ?—That is so.

Workhouse buildings subject to restriction and inspection under Public Health Acts.

7414. Workhouses are not exempted, I believe, from the operation of the Public Health Acts ?—I have never known a sanitary inspector go into a workhouse and find fault with the guardians.

Effect of local by-laws on cost of buildings.

7415. If you are building a new workhouse in your district, is it not subject to the by-laws ?—Yes, it is. In Leeds they are now making buildings, and one of the explanations of the architect for the price of the buildings, which we thought rather big, was that the by-laws were of such a character as to necessitate the class of building which was put up.

7416. I do not know how it may be in your district, but certainly in London if questions of drainage arise the authorities who have the last voice in the matter are the local sanitary authorities ?—Yes; but you see in the country the local sanitary authorities are the guardians, and they are not likely to interfere with their own work in another capacity.

7417. At the same time, my point is that there is a local machinery for dealing with certain points, which formerly were specially dealt with by the inspectors in their inspections ?—To that extent that is so ; but, as I say, the two authorities are the same. I remember on one occasion they kept pigs quite close to the workhouse ; I addressed the guardians, and told them that as a sanitary body they had no right to have pigs so close to the workhouse. They took the pigs farther away, but as a sanitary authority they never interfered with their own pigs.

7418. What does the medical officer of health do ?—The medical officer of health does not go inside the workhouse.

7419. Is there anything to debar him from going inside the workhouse ?—No ; but he never does.

7420. Not in your district ?—Certainly not ; I have never heard of it.

7421. Is there any reason why he should not ?—I suppose not, except that he takes it for granted that the medical officer of the workhouse is doing his duty. You know medical officers do not like interfering with each other ; and if a medical officer of health were confronted with the medical officer of the workhouse, there would be wigs on the green.

7422. I have been a medical officer of health in my time, and what I have always found is this, that the medical officer of health in dealing with a case usually does so with a certain amount of tact and discretion. Is there any distinction between the medical officer of a workhouse and the medical officer in attendance on a private case in relation to the medical officer of health ?—I candidly confess nothing of the sort has come under my personal observation. In all my experience I have never heard a word about a medical officer of health, except as regards his sanitary business. He comes and attends to the sanitary work after the meeting of the board of guardians is over, but I do not think he takes the workhouse into his consideration at all, as far as I know—at least not in practice.

7423. The gist of the argument which I have tried to embody in my questions is that there is nowadays a local machinery for dealing with that branch of workhouse inspection—whether it is used or not is perhaps another matter ?—That is so. My opinion is that it is not so used.

Inspection of workhouses by lady guardians under Sir H. Fowler's circular.

7424. Then you have now, I think since 1894, lady guardians, have you not ?—Yes ; in my district since 1887 or 1888.

7425. Do you find that the lady guardians exercise a useful supervision in the course of their duties as guardians ?—What I have to say about lady guardians is this—that when they are good they are very, very good.

7426. I think the powers of the guardians' own inspection of workhouses have been extended by Sir Henry Fowler's circular giving the right of entry ?—Yes. Personally I think that has been of great use.

7427. Does not all that tend to relieve the inspector to some extent of the burden of inspection which formerly rested on him alone ?—I think it ought to do so, and I think to a great extent it does. We really can take it almost for granted now that in well-administered unions the workhouses are thoroughly well looked after and inspected. I felt myself very often out of place in going round a well-managed workhouse, where my inspection visit is largely a matter of form ; I feel that everything that I see is uncommonly well done. That is a very common experience with me.

Expert assistants for general inspectors.

7428. Should you be in favour of a system by which if an inspector required expert assistance in any point of inspection he might obtain the same from the central department ? To some extent, I think, that is already the case, is it not ?—I was going to say that that is the case with my colleague, Dr. Fuller, who is the medical officer for Poor Law purposes. I think, in common with all my colleagues, I have had the greatest possible assistance from him. He comes six times a year to my district and inspects six workhouses. I have learnt a great deal from him, and he has been of the greatest possible assistance in finding out defects in medical matters and equipment business, which I natura'ly would not know. I think an expert of that sort, working in company with the inspectors, is of very great value.

7429. Do you find that occasionally guardians are glad to have the advice of an expert who is working with you ?—I do not know whether they are as much as I am. I do not think they care about experts, because experts mean expense. I may, perhaps, on that point, say, what I have not had an opportunity of saying before, that I think the architectural department of the Local Government Board would be greatly strengthened by a member of the architectural staff who could do more personal visiting when building is afoot in any union. We find great difficulty in keeping down expenses, and I think if there was a travelling architect who acted on the instructions of the Board's architect and attended the meetings of the committees who have charge of plans, and who would inspect the building after it was put up to see that it had been carried out on the lines that were sanctioned, that would be a very great advantage indeed. As it is at present we have no guarantee in the least that any building is built according to the specifications or estimates. It seems to me that there is a weak point there. We do not get sufficient control of the details of the building. I think, whenever I have had an architect down on the spot and got him in touch with the guardians, or had them up here to speak with the architect, we have had a great deal less correspondence and very much more satisfactory results.

7430. (Chairman.) Would you recommend that the architect should visit after the plans have been sanctioned and while the buildings are in course of construction ?—Certainly.

Inspection of outdoor cases by general inspectors.

7431. (Dr. Downes.) With regard to medical relief in your district, you give us in Paragraph 143 a few examples of the cases, that you went round to ; will you turn to No. 13 ?—Yes, that is a very bad case.

7432. There a man was dying of senile decay. You say : "He was upstairs in bed and was nearly falling out of bed when we came up. Mr. Mann lifted him into the middle of the bed. He groaned dreadfully, and Mrs. H. said he had a bad bed sore," Do the York guardians require their district medical officer to make any report to them on the condition of the cases under his care ?—I think in the original application there is always the medical officer's report on the case. The medical officer that I allude to there has since resigned. I found a great deal of fault with the whole of his work, and that was one of the reasons why I went round. This is a case where I made special investigation myself, and I was confirmed in my belief that he was not doing his duty by several cases that I saw, which ought most certainly to have been sent into the workhouse for treatment. This was a shocking case.

7433. Does not this indicate that the inspection of outdoor cases might be extended a little more than it is if the inspectors had time ?—That entirely confirms my own statements that I have made before. There are lots of cases where the sick have been neglected and great sufferings have ensued.

7434. Do any of the guardians in your district systematically require medical officers to report all cases of that sort, or to bring them to their attention ?—As a rule, I think the medical officers do their work well. It is just a case where sometimes you get a bad one, and you have got to find it out. You cannot do that without having information.

7435. (Mr. Lansbury.) In this case just quoted there were two paid officials—the relieving officer and the doctor ?—Yes.

7436. Both of whom were the people who should have given the guardians information ?—Yes. There was an excuse for that in the case of the relieving officer—he was tremendously over-worked at that time, and my visit with him proved that he was over-worked.

7437. Still, there were two people who should have given the information in any case, namely, the relieving officer and the medical officer ?—Yes.

7438. Both paid people, and servants of the guardians ?—Yes. They appointed a third relieving officer after my report.

7439. Is it not rather unfair to generalise on a particular case in this sort of way ? The whole point of the examination of Dr. Downes is that there should be an inspector appointed who should overhaul out-relief cases, I understand?—That was my original suggestion.

Mr. Philip Henry Bagenal.

27 Mar. 1906.

7440. I only want to interject that there were two paid people already who ought to be doing their duty?—I quite agree that the two officers were responsible.

Power to compulsorily remove cases to workhouse.

7441. (Dr. Downes.) I think some questions were put to you in your examination-in-chief as to the desirability of guardians being empowered to obtain the compulsory removal to a workhouse or infirmary of cases living under unsatisfactory conditions, such, for example, perhaps, as the one we have just been speaking of?—Yes.

7442. Are you in favour of some such power, properly safeguarded, being accorded to them?—I think it would be a good thing—in the interests of the people themselves as much as anything.

7443. If such power is given to guardians, would it not imply an obligation on the guardians to provide properly for such cases if they had obtained their removal?—I think they have that obligation now, to provide adequately for all sick.

7444. It does not follow that they always discharge that obligation?—No, but they are increasingly doing so.

7445. You give us, for example, the case of the Pocklington union?—Yes. That is a case where they will not treat the women as well as they treat the men. That is a pure question of expense, they say.

7446. I can understand that there might be hesitation on the part of a magistrate, or whoever it may be who signs an order for compulsory removal, if he was not quite satisfied that the condition of the provision for the sick in that particular union was what it should be?—He would have to exercise a discretion then, I suppose.

Return of number of visits to cases made by district medical officer.

7447. Still, that is a point that would have to be kept in mind. In a return of the number of visits paid by the medical officers, which you append at the end of your memorandum, I see there is a considerable difference in the numbers in the different unions?—I do not think that return can be taken as anything but tentative. I do not think they understood exactly the query, and some of them made mistakes. When I came to think it over afterwards, I saw it was a difficult thing to get. To answer your question: they no doubt do differ, but still this shows that there is on the whole a great deal of visiting.

Dispensaries.

7448. Have you any dispensaries in your district?—Yes. In Leeds and in Sheffield there are dispensaries at the central relief station where the doctors attend to see patients, and there is at the dispensary a qualified chemist who makes up all the medicines for the outdoor poor. In Sheffield they have another dispensary in the workhouse.

7449. In your opinion is that system working satisfactorily where it exists?—Yes, very satisfactorily indeed. I wish it was extended.

7450. Referring to paragraph 130 of your memorandum, you say, "There are certain points connected with the nursing question which I can develop in my oral evidence." Is there anything that you now wish to add on that point of nursing?—I said something, I think, yesterday with regard to the practice of obtaining the services of probationer nurses, which I need not repeat.

Nursing for outdoor paupers.

7451. How do the guardians provide for the nursing of the outdoor sick generally in your district?—In the large districts of Sheffield, Bradford, and Leeds, they subscribe very largely to nursing associations. They find that a very satisfactory way of getting the poor nursed, because they get qualified nurses, who cover a great deal of ground. They pay, I think, very large subscriptions, amounting to £100 or £200 a year in some cases, and then they get the services of the nurses of these associations, and the outdoor poor get great benefit from that. There is an Order of the Local Government Board empowering boards of guardians to employ district nurses for the outdoor poor, but it is a curious thing that that Order has never been used to any extent, though they avail themselves of the same system by subscribing to these associations.

7452. Are you aware of any reason why they should be?—No, I do not see any reason for it, except that it is a new thing, and there are conservative views, and it is very difficult to get a brand new system started.

7453. Taking the more rural portions of your district, how do they manage there?—The nursing of the rural poor, I am afraid, is done entirely by the people in the village; at any rate, a great deal of the nursing is done by neighbours who are brought in, but that is not skilled nursing, of course.

Difficulties attending workhouse nursing system.

7454. Are voluntary agencies for providing village nurses extending in your district?—There are some, I believe, but that is a point which I have never had time really to investigate. I may say, with regard to the nursing, that the great difficulty is to make the superintendent nurse and the master and the matron work in harmony together. That is really a great difficulty. I have one or two cases at present which are giving me a great deal of anxiety and trouble, and it is very difficult to know what to do in regard to them.

7455. (Mr. Gardiner.) Are those in the smaller workhouses?—No.

7456. Are they in the big ones then?—Yes; it is the big ones where there is very great importance attached by the master to his functions, and by the superintendent to hers.

7457. And by the matron, too, to hers?—Yes.

Return as to workhouse nursing in district.

7458. (Dr. Downes.) Those are administrative difficulties?—Yes. I have put in a nursing return (see App. Vol. I. (A), No. XV. (G),) which shows that the nursing in Yorkshire is very good, I think something like twelve patients per nurse, which is an extraordinarily good percentage. I may say that I do not think there is any district except Lancashire which is as well nursed as my district; and that is entirely a growth of eight or nine years.

Cost of administration of separate infirmaries.

7459. Have you any information as to the cost of administration of the separate infirmaries in your district?—No; except as to one, which is exceedingly high; that is Halifax.

7460. Are there any special reasons why Halifax should be so costly?—No, except the very large extra staff. When you set up an absolutely brand new establishment and have a very large staff, it means running up the expense. That is what has happened there. Then, of course, there is the payment every year of the loans and the sinking fund. Then Sheffield will be very expensive. They have separated the administration, and that will put on, I should think, £1,000 a year, or something like that, extra at once. You must pay for these things.

7461. What steps do the guardians at Halifax take to secure that their infirmary is not used by classes who could afford to pay for their medical relief otherwise?—I am not aware that they have taken any steps.

7462. Is there a tendency of a hospital of that sort to be, I will not say abused, but to be used by a class for which it was not originally intended?—That I cannot tell you.

7463. You have no evidence on that point?—I have no evidence whatever on that point.

Methods of dealing with particular classes of sick paupers.

7464. Do the guardians in your district co-operate in any cases systematically with voluntary hospitals or other agencies for sick relief?—Do you mean by sending patients and so on?

7465. They may do so perhaps in several cases, and they may subscribe?—They subscribe for the right to send a patient, the use of one bed, and so on. To some extent they do that.

Phthisis.

7466. Taking special cases such as phthisis, do they do so in those cases?—The cost of that is prohibitive, in the view of the guardians, and I think there is very little done. The weak point in the treatment of phthisis is that the people return to exactly the same conditions as they were in when they contracted or developed the disease, and unless you can get a phthisis patient to put on a new life with a different environment, he is as likely as not to come back again with a repetition of the same thing.

Infectious diseases.

7467. Have you any difficulty with regard to other classes of sick? Take the infectious sick; what do the guardians generally do with cases of fever or infectious disease? Do they send them to the sanitary authority's hospitals?—Very often, and I am always urging them to do that. I do not think that the infectious wards of hospitals and workhouses now are used, except for measles and the minor diseases of children. I think anything like scarlatina or any of the other infectious diseases they try to send to the sanitary authority.

Tuberculous children.

7468. Have you any difficulty in dealing with such classes as tuberculous children? Have you any seaside homes or places of that sort to which the guardians can send such cases?—There is a seaside home, I think, at one or two places in Yorkshire, and they do send a child occasionally; they can, at all events, whenever there is room, but there is not sufficient of those establishments to meet the demand, I think.

Ringworm.

7469. Then you have that troublesome class of children suffering from ringworm or ailments of that description; how do the guardians in your district deal with them?—I do not think there is any special treatment for them. They try and isolate them always.

7470. Do they educate them while they are isolating them?—No, I do not think they do. There were some cases at Halifax that you remind me of now. There were children there for months and months running about the grounds without any instruction; and I suggested to the guardians that they should try and get them taught something—they were simply running wild.

7471. The loss of education, I think you will agree with me, is a serious matter?—Very much so.

Need for inspection of out-relief.

7472. (Mr. Gardiner.) Did your experience in East Anglia lead you to think that an increase in the inspectorate with a special view of out-relief was desirable?—I certainly think so. I think there are lots of places there where inspection would have been very desirable indeed.

7473. That is to say, in those unions where perhaps the level of administration is lower than it is in Yorkshire, you felt more strongly the need of assistance, especially with reference to out-relief?—Certainly. My remarks apply quite as much to my former district as to where I am now.

Advantages of "whole-time" clerks to guardians.

7474. As regards the clerks in the East Anglian unions, they, I suppose, only gave part of their time to the duties of their office?—I cannot tell you exactly how many did, but there were certain clerks who were solicitors and did not give their whole time to the office.

7475. I suppose in your present district they generally give their whole time, do they?—The very large majority do, I think; but that I could verify easily. My own opinion about it is that a clerk ad hoc is the best clerk

7476. And that when you have a clerk ad hoc who really cares for his work the level of administration inevitably rises?—Yes.

7477. The clerk does not necessarily dictate the policy, but he constantly and continuously improves the manner of administration?—Yes, and takes an interest in the work of all the committees and everything connected with it—that is my experience. Such men may not be perhaps as good advisers on the general law, but they get to know the particular law very soon, and I think they display a very much greater interest in the social side of the question.

7478. And the guardians really get very much more help from them?—They do.

Proper number of cases for a relieving officer.

7479. In paragraph 131 you tell us that a good relieving officer can look after 300 cases, assuming that he has no other duties. I am afraid I am very stupid, but will you kindly tell me what you mean by looking after 300 cases?—I think you will see that is quoted from "A very experienced superintendent."

7480. I do not want to press you as to a particular number, but I should like to know what you would mean by looking after 200 or 300 or 500 cases?—Cases mean the applications in the report book—not the number of persons, but the number of houses. I call a house a case.

7481. Would it be the average number, the mean number, from the 1st January to 1st July?—No, not at all. Here is an application and report sheet; that is a case, there are three people there; this is another case, and there are six people there. A case therefore may mean three people, or more, or of course it may only mean one.

7482. At what period of the year do you say that 300 is the number he ought to be able to look after? Is it the average number between July and January?—I never thought of it from that point of view, but I should say 300 on his books at any time.

7483. At any one time?—Yes.

7484. Including applications?—They would be included, I suppose.

7486. Of course in a rural area he would have a much smaller number of cases?—Yes. Look at the distances in Pocklington that the man there has got to walk.

7487. I think you have told us that in your judgment you recommend that the relieving officers should be relieved of their duties as registrars and assistant registrars?—You cannot give a general rule for that, because all these unions have special characteristics; but I think wherever a man has a large amount of relief work it is inconsistent and incompatible for him to have these other duties.

7488. And that the whole tendency should be to get these duties undertaken by other people; for instance, the vaccination work might be transferred to the county council?—That I do not know; that goes into another question.

7489. But it does bear, does it not, on the duties of the relieving officer?—Of course you must find somebody else to do it.

Question of transfer of administration of vaccination.

7490. All I was going to ask you was whether in your opinion it was desirable that questions like vaccination policy should be mixed up with guardians' elections?—I do not think they should myself. I think that the Poor Law ought to be divested of all other entangling issues, and vaccination is a very entangling issue in some districts.

7491. It becomes a test question at elections, does it not?—Yes.

Inspection of children boarded-out within the union.

7492. As regards inspection of children boarded-out within the union or in scattered homes, I think the same remark applies, does it not, as applies to the general increase of the inspectorate; is it possible for you to inspect as much as you would wish the children who are boarded-out within the unions?—I do not know that it is my duty to inspect them more than any other outdoor relief cases. These boarded-out children are practically all outdoor relief cases.

7493. At the present time the only persons whose duty it is to inspect the children boarded-out within the union are the relieving officers?—Yes.

7494. And the guardians?—The committees of the guardians.

7495. It is their duty to visit?—Yes; and then there is the district medical officer.

7496. When you are visiting a union, is it possible for you to test how far this work is done?—I have only, I think, on one occasion made a tour to see the boarded-out children, and I certainly found two out of eight or ten in homes which I should not have advised putting them into. That is all I can say. The rest were very well and satisfactorily done.

Record of after-careers of Poor Law children.

7497. Are any records kept, as far as you are aware, of the subsequent careers of the children who have been brought up in these kinds of institutions or scattered homes?—Yes, I always make a very great point of that. The necessity of after care in the case of these children is almost as important as the bringing of them up.

7498. Is there any special form of record which is used?—There is a register which is published by the law stationers called the Register of Young Persons, which they can buy and enter up, showing where the children have gone to and what has become of them. A good superintendent or matron or other official very often does keep in touch with these children. I know one case at Hessle in Hull where they have a reunion once a year of old boys who come back and see the superintendent; and so they keep in touch with them.

Mr. Philip Henry Bagenal.

27 Mar. 1906.

7499. May I say that in the majority of your unions, supposing you call for this record book five years hence, you could find practically what had happened to all the children who were in the school say five years ago?—Yes. I think there are a great many of these Yorkshire unions where they do make the children a special thing, and I fancy they would be able to tell you pretty clearly what had become of nearly all the children. The most hopeful side of the Poor Law is the children's side.

7500. What I have learnt from one or two other inspectors is that they do not seem to think that the subsequent records of the children are very carefully kept?—Perhaps they are not in a great many cases; in some of the rural workhouses where they keep them in, I should not think they were.

7501. Or even in some district schools, which are on a much larger scale? The inspectors think records exist there, but I am not sure they do?—I do not know as to that.

Female labour and wages in East and West Ridings, and their effect on pauperism.

7502. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) It was suggested yesterday that there was a large superfluity of female pauperism over male pauperism in Yorkshire, and I see there are twice as many women as men in the West Riding and three times as many in the East Riding?—Yes, that is so.

7503. You have handed me a very interesting document giving the particulars of female labour in the East and West Ridings of Yorkshire, which I have not had time to study. (See Appendix Vol I. (A), No. XV (Q).) I see from it, however, that the highest wage earned by women is given as 22s. per week, and the average, as far as I can make out, has been about 12s. per week. Do you think the lowness of the wage would be one reason why the women are not so self-supporting to the end of their lives as the men?—I have no means of testing that supposition.

7505. Would that be in cases where the men were earning as well?—Possibly; but sometimes they have their family earning a lot of money—father, mother, and children are all earning sometimes, and they have a very large sum going into the house when they are all working. The case where the relief comes in is generally where there is only one child earning and the rest are dependent. Those are the cases that I have mentioned, and if that wage earner is stricken down by illness or anything unfortunate, then they come on the rates.

7506. What I want to suggest is that the reason why women do not hold out to the end is that they are not expected to be self-supporting. That is to say, their money goes very largely while they are earning to the support of their families, and as you pointed out yesterday it does not go into benefit societies for themselves?—That is so.

Former female benefit societies.

7507. At the end of the 18th century there were a very much larger number of female benefit societies than there are now, and a great many women in them, but the wages were very much lower then. Would you agree with me that that rather points to the fact that it is more a question of what a woman is expected to do in the way of making provision for herself, than of what she is able to do?—I do not suppose she ever was expected to do it until very recently.

7508. My point is that at the end of the 18th century she was expected to do it and did do it?—How long did it last for?

7509. It had been going on for a very long time. You mentioned to us three towns where you consider the administration is lax, especially in relation to relief, those towns being Huddersfield, York, and Pontefract. Looking through your list of women's wages I find that the lowest point touched is in those three unions. For instance, in Huddersfield, jam factors earn from 6s. to 8s., and bookbinders from 5s. to 9s. a week?—Those may be girls. You must take those figures as including girls and women, and I fancy that the lower wages are always earned by girls of fifteen and sixteen.

7510. The highest in the jam factory is 8s., and the highest in the bookbinding is 9s. The jam factory is also a season trade, is it not?—Yes.

7511. Is bookbinding a season trade?—I should not think so.

7512. Then if we turn to Pontefract we find that the agricultural wages, which in other rural unions are 2s. a day, fall as low as 1s. 3d. That is the union in which I think you pointed out that there was lax administration?—There has been in the past. I think it is improving.

7513. Then wages may possibly rise. If we turn to York we find the lowest point touched in private laundries, where the women work sixty hours for 5s. a week?—I was told that by a relieving officer. He said they worked very terrible hours for very low pay.

7514. Of course it is impossible for them to live upon that?—Yes.

7515. Do you think that would be subsidised by Poor Law relief?—I have no doubt that the way they have got those facts is that they have come before the relieving officers. All these figures that I have got have come from the wage-earning notes of relieving officers, so that they really are correct, I think.

7516. The labour in the fields around the York out-relief union also falls as low as 1s. 6d. a day?—1s. 6d. to 2s.

7517. The confectionery works in York, I believe, are a great feature of the city?—Yes. Messrs. Rowntree have developed very large works there.

7518. I see the girls there earn 5s. to 8s. a week?—Yes. Rowntrees are the best wage payers in York.

7519. I suppose 5s. to 8s. a week is not a living wage, even in York?—No, but it probably helps to keep the house going. There are probably sisters working together in the factories.

7520. I see in the three districts of Halifax, Bradford, and Hunslet, widows with children may work in the mills, but are mostly employed as charwomen earning from 7s. to 8s. a week?—That is in Hunslet.

7521. Those would be receiving out-relief, I take it?—Those figures, no doubt, were founded on out-relief cases.

7522. Where the women do largely work in mills, could you tell us what the effect is on the homes?—I do not think I can say that, because I have no personal knowledge, as I have not investigated the conditions of the homes. I have frequently heard from the matron of workhouses that girls who have been in mills never know how to sew, and that they really are quite devoid of the domestic requirements for keeping the house going. When the mill life begins very early, it has a deteriorating effect to that extent.

7523. Can you tell us to what extent generally married women work in the mill?—They very often work in mills.

7524. Is there any system by which they provide for the care of the children in their homes?—That I do not know.

York and Sheffield as fields for investigation.

7525. Should you suggest that one of these districts, say York, would be a good one for investigating the relations between wages and Poor Law and charitable relief?—I do not think you can get a more interesting place to investigate than York. It has already been done, as you know, on a very detailed scale by Mr. Rowntree. Any of the West Riding towns would give scope for an interesting special inquiry, I think, with regard to the Poor Law. Sheffield perhaps would be the best of all, because there are so many different kinds of administration there, particularly as regards the children. One union adopts the case paper system, which I could give the Commission full particulars about.

Case-papers.

7526. I was going to ask you whether you use those papers?—There is one place where they are used, and I have got a full description of it from the man who put it into effect, showing the cost of it. I think that would be very valuable.

7527. Will you put in those case papers?—Certainly. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XV (R).)

Low cost of food.

7528. On p. 52 of your Memorandum you tell us a great deal about the dietaries of the people, which is very interesting, and you point out the cheapness of the food which can be got by those who know how to buy?—I do not think there was ever a time when you could buy so much for so little.

Workhouse dietaries misleading as scale for minimum cost of food.

7529. Do you consider that by taking the workhouse dietaries and prices you can get a real test of what the poor can live on by themselves?—No, not at all. I am afraid that would be a very misleading standard.

7530. That is the standard which has been used in the inquiries in York, is it not?—Yes, I think it is to a certain extent.

7531. I think it was the basis of all Mr. Rowntree's calculations?—Yes. I think, in the light of the latest medical knowledge—and of course the latest medical knowledge may always be altered by new medical men—there really is no settled theory of nutrition. I think Professor Chittenden's experiments have proved that.

7532. Moreover, the workhouse authorities cannot buy as the people themselves can buy?—Quite so. They would not be allowed to.

7533. Then you would not necessarily draw the conclusion which has been drawn that the amount of pauperism in York is due to under-feeding?—I do not think it is a bit more underfed than any other town. In fact, I should think that with all the charities it has there is always something going. That is my view.

7534. (Mr. Chandler.) I think that with one or two exceptions your opinion is that the administration of the Poor Law in your district is satisfactory?—I think it is on the whole very satisfactory.

The irreducible minimum of pauperism.

7535. Mr. Bentham yesterday referred to one or two unions in which pauperism had reached the irreducible minimum, and you confirmed his view upon that?—I think so.

Effect on pauperism of thrift and membership of friendly societies.

7536. That you attributed largely to the industrious and thrifty habits of the people in your district?—Yes, I think those are factors.

Operation of Outdoor Relief Friendly Societies Acts

7539. I mean the Act of 1894, which left it optional for the guardians to take these amounts into consideration, which was amended in 1904?—It did not alter the practice as far as I know. Ever since I have been in Poor Law, whenever a man has shown that he has belonged to a friendly society or has done something towards his own advancement, they have given him the best terms, so to speak, and they have disregarded perhaps half of the club allowance.

7540. There has been no rigid rule?—No; that was the general custom and practice, and therefore they felt that it was a slight upon them. There was, in fact, a new class of persons invented by Act of Parliament who were beyond their ken, and they were not allowed to deal with them upon their merits.

7541. Taking that as the practice of boards of guardians in your district, at the same time you will be aware that a majority of the guardians' representatives at Poor Law Conferences voted against the amendment of that Act?—Yes, I know.

7542. Might that not have accounted for the agitation, and election incident at Huddersfield in 1900, which you deprecated so much; might they not then have been trying to force public opinion in support of the amendment of that Act?—I do not know that, but it may have been so. I quite admit that it might have had something to say to it.

7543. As a very old member of a friendly society I was rather impressed with the incident, and I came to the conclusion that really the object of it was to focus and force public opinion in support of the amendment of that Act which was then before the country?—That does not account for the continued laxity of administration after it.

7544. Are you aware of any institutions which deal with distress arising from want of employment?—There are the trade unions.

Value of membership of trade unions.

7545. You recognise the trade unions are doing their work?—I think so. I think everybody ought to recognise that if men will join a trade union they are providing for the term of disemployment; and if they do not join a trade union they ought to have a similar duty imposed upon themselves of trying to provide for the term of disemployment.

Sentiment against applying for relief.

7546. I am very glad to get that admission from you. I agree with you thoroughly. In reply to a question by Mr. Booth in reference to the independent characteristics of people in Yorkshire, you said you had heard of instances where men stated that they would rather die than apply to the guardians for relief; was that entirely due, do you think, to the independent character of the people, or was it due to the manner in which some relieving officers and some boards of guardians deal with applicants?—Perhaps I may go so far as this with you—that the manners of relieving officers during the time when the deterrent system was in vogue were perhaps harder than they are at present, and that the reputation of that has descended, and that it may have operated in that way to prevent a man asking for relief. But I do not think that applies at all now.

7547. But the sentiment is there?—The sentiment may be there, and also the natural sentiment of not wanting to go to the parish.

7548. It is not a sacrifice of human life that is necessary, or that we should advise any individual to make however much we may admire the independence or the heroism of the man?—Quite so.

Pros and cons of cottage homes for children.

7549. As far as the grouped cottage homes are concerned, I gather from your remarks that you are not in favour of that system—largely on the score of expense I think?—Yes, and also because of the aggregation of children.

7550. I think you admitted they have better training in homes?—They have. The great argument on paper in favour of it I think is that they are better industrially trained.

7551. Better fitted for becoming useful citizens in after life?—For trades, yes; because they do not get into the casual labour market, which is the great thing to be avoided. The great curse and source of pauperism largely is casual labour; it spoils a man when he is about eighteen or nineteen, and he is no good afterwards.

Possibility of accurate count of total number of separate paupers in a given period.

7552. (Mr. Loch.) You gave us a chart showing the pauperism in the East Riding and the West Riding on the 1st January, 1904 and 1905, from which I see that the West Riding total out-door relief figure on the 1st January, 1905, was 35,116?—That is so.

7553. Then you have also given us a six months' return of out-door relief, from which I see that the six months' total out door relief figure for the West Riding for the half year ended Lady Day, 1905, was 54,158?—That is so.

7554. Can you say whether the figures exclude all duplication of cases; that is to say, whether the first it clearly a day account, and whether the second is clearly a six months' account, without any duplication of cases?—That is a statistical point which it is rather difficult for me to elucidate, because I have not got the means of testing it. It could be tested no doubt by an examination of the relieving officers' books, and by getting from him the facts of duplication, if they exist.

7555. Should we treat that comparison of the day account and the six months' account with some reserve, then?—I think so, having regard to the case that you put of the possibility and probability of duplication.

7556. Do you think you have at present in the Poor Law system an enumeration of the paupers at hand, by which a six months' account or a year's account of paupers could be made by the use of the present books?—I do not know that I could give you a satisfactory answer to that. I have not considered it. I am depending upon the clerks of the unions for those figures, and unless I went to the clerks and put these points before them and asked their views upon them, I do not think I could give you a satisfactory answer. Of course I can go to them.

Mr. Philip Henry Bagenal.

27 Mar. 1906.

7557. (Mr. Booth.) I think the statement which the clerk makes here is that he does not pretend to discriminate between the cases that have come before him during the half year, and those that have not?—I think that is so.

7558. Therefore the total that he gives is the total number of cases, entirely irrespective of duplication?—That is, irrespective of whether they have been on the books a long time or a short time; but they are there, and they are the people that he had to deal with.

7560. (Mr. Loch.) May we say the presumption is that if this half-yearly return is kept accurately, and if there is only a single entry in regard to each person, there are no duplications?—If it is the fact, as has been stated, that there is only a single entry for each application, then this return would give the proper number of persons dealt with in the half year. But of course it is possible that a man might get relief within the half year three different times, and therefore you might duplicate that man to a certain extent.

7561. (Sir Samuel Provis.) And he might be relieved in a different union possibly, if he went from one union to another?—Yes, if he were getting non-settled relief.

Relation between low rate of pauperism and low percentage of out-relief.

7562. (Mr. Loch.) With regard to the figures you handed in (see Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XV. (E)) respecting groups of unions, the first group you form is "rural or mostly rural"; look at the last two columns giving the percentage of cost of out-relief to total cost of in-and-out-relief; if you take those two columns, and if you also take the percentage of pauperism to population, does it not appear that the four lowest in percentage of pauperism to population, namely, Settle, Sedbergh, Ripon, and Selby, give the lowest amounts of outdoor relief?—Yes.

7563. Taking that as a test, and taking your next group, you have the same phenomenon; where the percentage of outdoor relief is low the total relief is low, as in Rotherham (West R.) and Tadcaster (West R.)?—They do show that movement.

7564. If you take the fifth group the same thing is shown, is it not—you have Knaresborough (West R.), with the percentage of out-relief the lowest and the percentage of pauperism the lowest?—Yes.

7565. If you take your sixth group you find an exception in the case of Barnsley; there you have a lower pauperism to population with a higher percentage of out-relief to total relief?—That is so.

7566. But if you take your next group, the urban and semi-urban group, there you find Ecclesall Bierlow with a low out-relief as compared with its in-and-out-relief standing low in regard to its pauperism, and you have the same in the case of Halifax (West R.)—though you have exceptions in Wharfedale and in Keighley?—That is so.

7567. Then if we take your urban groups, we have the same phenomenon shown. Take Leeds (West R.); there you have a low out-relief to the total relief with, again, a low pauperism; Sheffield (West R.) shows the same result, and so does Bradford (West R.); and Halifax (West R.) is nearly on the line. Not to push the argument too far, it is a coincidence, is it not, that in all these cases where the amount of out-relief has been low compared with the total relief the pauperism has been less?—That would appear to be so.

7568. I want you now to turn to Table A (West Riding), which is on page 3 of your memorandum. The last column of that table gives the percentage of outdoor relief; I take it that those figures, and the other figures which, so far, may represent some result, are blended figures; that is to say, they stand, not for one union, but for a group of unions with different policies?—Yes, it is a bulk percentage.

7569. Therefore the figures could not show the tendency of any policy, because the figures represent not one policy but a mingled policy?—Yes. This table does not bear on policy, it bears on the bulk of pauperism.

Relation between pauperism and thrift.

7570. On page 14 you give a table showing the proportion of pauperism to the estimated population in union counties. May we not say that if we take the mean in that table, which is marked by a line about London, there is a very much larger number of provident societies in the least pauperised districts which are below the mean than in those which are above the mean?—Yes.

7571. So that, as a general rule, this table itself shows in its bearings that there is a relation, or a presumed relation, between the existence of opportunities for thrift and a decreased pauperism?—That is the object of my putting the table in. I got the rest of these figures because I got out Yorkshire first, and I was struck with the result; then I said, Now I will see what information I can get elsewhere, and I will see how the Yorkshire figures are borne out by the figures of other unions. The result of that inquiry was this table. But I do not put it in, as I have said, as a complete table; I simply put it in as a contribution to the inquiry.

Treatment of ins and outs.

7572. I only want to give point, so to speak, to that. Then in paragraph 79 you refer to the ins-and-outs; I take it for granted from your statement there that you think that the period of detention is a real difficulty in Poor Law administration which has to be faced. You say that the period might be extended?—I want to correct a misprint or mis-statement there. The period of detention has been increased, I think, up to 168 hours.

7573. Granted that it is 168 hours now, do you think a yet further extension of the period of detention under present conditions in workhouses would meet the difficulty?—I think that the moral effect of it would be very considerable. It would indicate a policy, and a policy has a deterrent effect.

7574. I put an alternative suggestion to you: Why should not these ins-and-outs be dealt with, after a certain repetition of their incomings, under the Vagrancy Act as vagrants?—I agree there—or under any legislation that may be foreshadowed by the report of the Vagrancy Committee. They really come under exactly the same denomination of human being.

Tendency in public opinion towards increased power of detention of certain classes of paupers.

7575. Then with regard to the group referred to in paragraph 80, you would include, I presume, persons of feeble mind who could not provide for themselves as being possibly liable to detention?—Yes. I gave evidence before the Royal Commission on the Feeble-Minded—and rather extended evidence—upon the whole of this question. I think I was the first inspector who ever wrote upon the question of the feeble-minded pauper.

7576. Does not this suggest that there is a certain quantity of pauperism which is of an irretrievable type, and that some of that pauperism in self-defence the community tends to be inclined to shut up in some form, or to punish, to a degree that at any rate has not been done in the past?—I think public opinion is ripening in that direction very fast.

7577. That of itself would alter the problem of the Poor Law on one of its most difficult sides, would it not?—I think it would relieve it enormously and clear the way a great deal for the satisfactory treatment of other classes.

Conditions in York Union.

7578. Now, turning to the case of York, do you think that the peculiar conditions of York are due in part to its being a great cattle market and to its charities, these having brought together a considerable amount of unskilled labour dependent on casual earnings or gifts?—Yes. After three years' residence in York the strong impression left on my mind was that that was a very great reason. Then it is a cathedral city, with all the inherited traditions of getting things for the asking, which is very probably as old a thing as there is in the world.

Inter-action of charities and pauperism.

7579. Had you noticed in your previous district the effect of charities, in Norwich, we will say?—Norwich is a place that would repay investigation, I think. I made a long investigation of the out-relief at Norwich, and I certainly thought it was a town with something like the same characteristics as York.

7580. Then may I conclude that you cannot in these districts deal with the Poor Law problem unless you deal with the charitable problem, that is to say, the endowments of the district are acting more or less as a provocative towards pauperism?—I quite think so.

7581. If that is so, what would be your proposal for, as it were, stopping this source of social irritation that leads to pauperism?—You must knock the parochial system of administration of charities on the head.

Question of co-ordinating charity and Poor Law.

7582. Then in York, for instance, or we will say in Norwich, you would have to bring the moneys that are now available for charities more or less into one control?—You would have to pool them and administer them.

7583. You referred quite rightly to the charity organisation societies in many of these towns: but I would draw your attention to the fact that they have no responsible duty in the sense that the guardians have, and that one of the difficulties in regard to all charitable relief is that while the Poor Law has a status, charity has none. Do you think, therefore, that you could get out of the present dilemma by organising the York charities in such a way as to give them a public responsibility in relation to the administration of Poor Law relief, or in some other way?—That could be done, I suppose, by the Legislature or by the Local Government Board, by increasing the power of co-opting members of guardians—that, is instead of making it voluntary to make it mandatory to co-opt certain members as guardians: and amongst those you might ear-mark the trustees of a charitable fund administered as you say.

7584. This line might be adopted—that the guardians should deal, as they do necessarily and mainly, with destitution, and that the preventative work and other work of that type might fall on charity, and in that way the burden of the guardians would be more or less reduced?—Yes, I think so.

Reform of practice as to relief of widows with children.

7585. In one of the cases which have been mentioned—it was not a York case—there was a widow of twenty-four who was having relief immediately on widowhood. In the case of widows, is it not a common practice for the widow to make her application immediately on widowhood, and then for the Board to say, "We will give immediate interim relief pending the settlement of what we will do for you and your children"?—Yes.

7586. In those cases, if the woman is young, is it not possible to do better than to give her an allowance practically for a very long period?—Do you mean by dealing with her in some other way?

7587. By dealing with her in some way which would lead to her self-maintenance?—By trying to get some work for her, and putting her on the road of self-support?

7588. Yes?—That would be eminently the work of such a body as you have foreshadowed—a charitable board, or something of that sort.

7589. One great burthen of the guardians is the widow, I think?—Yes.

7590. If by the co-operation of the authorities that class could be dealt with in some such way, there again there would be a great relief?—Yes. If you will look at my analysis you will see the number of widows.

7591. With regard to these York cases, which have suggested a great many of these questions, would you not say that several of those cases suggest what one might call bad work?—Yes.

7592. All I want to make clear is that the Poor Law authorities in York—I am thinking of the relieving officers at the present moment—really have had a very poor chance to do their best in these cases?—They have not had half-a-man's chance.

Sufficiency of Application and Report Book.

7593. Now I want to ask you one or two general questions with regard to the forms we are using, particularly the Application and Report book form. Do you think that that as it now stands is in its best form?—If you take the Application and Report book and only use one page for each case, you can put all you want into it. But they will not do that: they keep putting three or four cases on a page. That is the difficulty I have with relieving officers—they will not give themselves room.

7594. One point which is immensely important in Poor Law work is verification, as indeed it is in all inquiry: do you find, as a matter of fact, that, partly owing to the form of book, the entries do not show verification?—I think a good relieving officer is able to get a great deal in. I have seen some excellent work done on Application and Report books. But that is not always the case. The case paper system no doubt does give a great deal more information, and information which is more readily accessible afterwards. A point, and a most important point, is the accessibility of information with regard to individuals.

7595. Take such a very important question as the verification of the wages of children; very often that verification is not down, is it?—That is so. They could not put the wages notes in.

Supervision of relieving officers.

7596. Take the case of the supervision of inquiry; does the clerk of a board by any means necessarily as a part of his duties undertake the supervision of investigation?—No. Special clerks will, because they are interested in it, but it really does not fall under them.

7597. Should not someone be made absolutely responsible locally and in connection with the board of guardians, for that being properly done?—That is so, sometimes. There are a certain number of unions in my district who have superintendents of out-relief.

7598. Should not the clerk or somebody as head officer of the whole administration be responsible?—Yes, I think so.

Disregard by guardians of relieving officers' advice.

7599. With regard to the relieving officers, have you found this happen at all at your boards—that the relieving officer is rather put aside and the applicant cross-questioned, with the result that what the applicant says at the moment is taken rather as a counterweight to anything that the relieving officer has found out?—Yes, and I think it goes further than that—I think that they will over-ride the plain facts of a relieving officer's statement, and deal with a case contrary to his advice.

7600. Does that not, from the point of view of the development of the ability of a man, deter him from doing his best?—Yes, very often they are greatly put back in their work, I think.

Qualifications of relieving officer.

7601. With regard to the selection of these men, is there any recognised Local Government Board standard of what a man to be a relieving officer should be?—I do not think so. I think that the Local Government Board would hesitate to refuse any respectable man who applies and who was thought by the people on the spot who know, or who are supposed to know, to be competent. After all, it is to be local government, and they ought to know if a man is a fit man for their job.

7602. Apart from a particular man, there are certain conditions which the duties of the office will require him to fulfil?—You and I think so.

7603. Could we not go further and say, as in other professions, that there are conditions which should be fulfilled and which the guardians should be persuaded as far as possible, to put it mildly, to adopt, because, as I understand, there are no such conditions at present in vogue?—As a matter of fact there are not, but I think some guardians, at least in my district, do certainly take pains to get a good man. However, there is no standard, as you say; there is no college of out-relief, there is no faculty.

7604. It is the ones which are tempted to do the wrong thing that one would influence on this line I am suggesting to you rather than those who are doing the right thing?—Yes.

Sufficiency of relieving officers' salaries.

7605. With regard to the emoluments and so forth, is the position of relieving officer good enough to get the best men?—I answered that before by saying that the salary gets so many applicants for it that the guardians naturally say that the salary is enough.

7606. The salary that is now offered is the salary in the open market for more or less unqualified talent?—That is so. I say that a good relieving is worth anything from £200 to £500 a year if he does his duty, because he saves the money to the ratepayers.

7607. If you insist on getting qualified men, they would ask for and get a better salary, would they not?—I think so.

Mr. Philip Henry Bagenal.

27 Mar. 1906.

Operation of Relief to School Children Order.

7608. With regard to the Underfed Children Order of 1905, do you think that Order is necessary under our present law? It is an order by which, as you know, the child can be treated, not exactly apart from the parent, but under it the tendency is to consider the destitution of the child, and then, to come down on the parent—if you will, to make him a loan, or to prosecute him. Do you think that we want this Underfed Children Circular, if boards of guardians do their part properly in their districts?—That opens up a very controversial question, and I do not know whether I ought to give my opinion as a private person on an Order which I, in my official position, ought to help to administer.

7609. Then I would put it in this way; the question of the neglect of the parent arises at once on this Order, does it not?—Yes, I think that the laws of the land are perfectly adequate for bringing every man who neglects his children by starving them, to the police court or to the bar of public opinion. If the law was stringently administered, I believe you would stop the starving of children to a great extent.

7610. The guardians already have power, have they not, if they hear of a man who is starving or neglecting his children, to bring an action?—They can certainly bring an action, or they can get the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children to do so.

7611. Therefore, to that extent, the Order is only emphasising in a new direction a power which the guardians have already, that is to say, a power of prosecuting when to their knowledge there was this neglect?—Yes, and they had a power of relieving.

Effect of "Employment Relief" by non-Poor Law authorities.

7612. Take another question in which you have a concurrent method if I may so call it—concurrent to our ordinary Poor Law methods. In the case of another movement, the case of the unemployed workmen, you are creating, are you not, a concurrent authority for the relief of presumably destitute people—or at least an authority which is in great measure concurrent to the Poor Law authority?—Yes.

7613. If this policy of concurrent administration is carried out, will you not, by that very method weaken or break your central and local Poor Law administration, by reason of the fact that you are creating outside the circle of pauperism which you can definitely count, new circles of dependants, as you may call them, which you cannot definitely count, so that you may never know, as you do now, the actual limits of pauperism?—Practically one of the sections of my analysis, that is, Destitution owing to Want of Employment, has to a certain extent been taken out of our hands and handed over to the corporations.

7614. Destitution owing to the want of employment as you say has gone over to the corporations, and the question is how far is that affecting the statistics that we are now using?—For instance, would the statistics of able-bodied pauperism in your towns have been much higher if it was not for that?—No. They have not applied to us, but they have applied to the corporations, and so it is only relieving them by another hand, and that a hand which does not disfranchise.

7615. Do you conclude from that that we are really creating a pauperism which does not appear on our books, as it were, in addition to the pauperism which does appear?—I thought so last year. I attended the Bureau of Labour at Bradford, and the Bureau of Labour at Leeds, and I heard cases come up, and saw them dealt with in both those bureaus. They were absolutely the same class of cases as those which come before the boards of guardians; for instance, a woman with a child in her arms came and said she had had nothing to eat all day, and the man could not find work, and they were set to work by the corporation. They were really Poor Law cases.

7616. I take it you would approve of the policy of concentration on Poor Law lines, that is, of co-operation with institutions, rather than of the policy, if I may so call it, of dispersion which I think these measures suggest?—I think so. I think it is a mistake to break up your problem like that.

Qualifications for "aged and deserving" relief.

7617. With regard to the Aged and Deserving Poor Order, can you say what have been the tests of deserving or the definitions of "deserving" with your boards?—I do not think anyone can say that. It all depends on what you think.

7618. Take one definite matter—that there is provision for a family when members of it can help; would that be taken as a test?—How do you mean, provision for a family?

7619. In the case of aged persons, when the members of the family can assist, that whether they do or do not assist should be taken as a test of whether it is a deserving case?—I think as a rule guardians are quite willing to help in those cases where they get the relatives to contribute. A great many boards are getting a great deal more money than they ever did from relatives—it is an increasing figure.

7620. Would thrift be a test?—Yes; a man who helped himself by belonging to a friendly society would be taken to be exercising thrift.

7621. Would the converse be held, namely, that persons who had not done these things should not be treated as if they were deserving poor?—To a certain extent, yes—in Yorkshire certainly.

Question of applicability to England of Danish system of old age relief.

7622. Then with regard to the aged poor, are you in favour of a system like the Danish system, giving a statutory claim at sixty, conditional on inability to provide what is necessary for maintaining oneself and one's dependants?—I do not think I should be inclined to give my assent to any of those propositions, or to any of those large sweeping measures. I do not think you can argue from Denmark to London or England.

7623. The whole of the poor law system is based on its being discretionary in regard to outdoor relief, is it not?—Yes.

7624. This, in the main, is an outdoor method of relief to the aged poor in Denmark—not necessarily so, but in the main; therefore if this were adopted it would be adopted, as it were, quite in a contrary spirit to the discretionary nature of our Poor Law, would it not?—Certainly.

7625. Therefore, so far as the aged poor were concerned, when they had reached a certain age, all that would fall out of our poor law administration, ipso facto?—By its statutory character.

7626. The only thing that would be left to do would be to make the arrangements. Do you think that any such scheme as that would be desirable from the point of view of the thrift and well-being of the people?—It is a matter of pure speculation, but I do not think so.

7627. One other point as to the financial side of the question: I think you said that you were opposed to there being a county council authority in charge of the Poor Law?—Yes.

Larger areas for special Poor Law purposes.

7628. Do you think that a county authority representing the Guardians would be of assistance in Poor Law administration for such purposes as those institutions which are better provided by groups of unions, rather by single unions for themselves; such institutions, for instance, as might deal with the feeble-minded or with phthisis or with with ringworm cases, or whatever it might be; for that purpose, do you think that a county guardians authority—not a county council, but a representation of guardians on a common county body—would be of service?—Do you mean elected from the guardians of the county?

7629. Yes?—I should have to consider the pros and cons of that. I do not think I could give any opinion on that until I have considered it.

7630. And you have no suggestion to make for a central county organisation of these institutions other than that which you have already in your mind?—No. The local animosities and jealousies and antipathies are very great, and the love of their own union and the authority of their own union is the strongest thing in local government. You break that down when you propose to elect a new county authority for anything. I do not think it would be considered—that is my first impression—I think it would be opposed right and left.

7631. Do you think, taking the whole of the afflicted cases, which are also an important factor, that an authority like that might be formed for them?—That is a different thing, because there is an accepted feeling about those. They have to be dealt with. There are no two questions about that. In regard to those cases I think that suggestion might be adopted.

Control of pauper lunatics.

7632. Including lunacy?—All pauper lunatics, I think ought to be under our own control.

7633. Under the poor law control?—Yes; we pay for them.

7634. In accordance with this county suggestion, if I may so call it, would it fall in with your views if lunacy and all other forms of affliction, such as the epileptics and feeble-minded, were dealt with by one authority?—Yes.

Exchequer grants for Poor Law purposes.

7635. And that a county authority?—That, I think, is decidedly a matter to be considered.

7636. With regard to grants from the central Government towards Poor Law purposes, what grants do you get?—We get the officers' salaries as they were in 1888.

7637. And besides that?—The Agricultural Rates Act.

7638. And then there is a Lunacy grant?—Then there is the Lunacy grant from the county council of 4s. per head for those who are kept in asylums. Those are the main grants.

7639. You do not get a grant per inmate of the workhouse as we do in London, do you?—Nothing of the sort 7640. Do you think that these special grants for particular purposes are advisable—I am especially referring to the first you mentioned, the officers'?—I do not think that the Guardians, as a rule, appreciate the fact that that grant is paid. They look upon the officers as being paid by themselves, and they are always complaining of the salaries as if they paid them. They do pay the difference between the salaries now and those of 1888, but I really do not think that a large number of the Guardians at all appreciate this fact, and to that extent they act really as if the salaries all came out of the rates.

7641. Would it matter very much if the salaries did come out of the rates, and that grant were withdrawn?—I do not think it would.

The lunatic grant.

7642. Take the 4s. grant for lunatics. Do you think that principle is good of paying for the individual in that way, or do you think that it tends to filling lunatic asylums rather unduly with cases somewhat unsuitable for lunatic asylums?—Of course getting that 4s. in aid is an inducement to a certain extent to the guardians to send those patients; at the same time a great number of harmless lunatics are kept in the workhouse, and they are maintained at very much less in the workhouse than they are in those institutions.

7643. Suppose we dealt with the question a little more broadly from the point of view of the afflicted classes generally; what would you say to a suggestion of this kind—that a grant might be made from the Exchequer in the nature of an open grant, subject to report, instead of on the basis of the 4s. payment, on the understanding that the grant were made in accordance with the number of the afflicted class in the county?—Do you mean on an average.

7644. Yes?—I have not considered that.

7645. I am assuming that the 4s. grant is open to considerable criticism, and that possibly some alternative to it should be suggested with a view to two purposes, namely, with a view to meeting the want as it arises for the different classes of the afflicted—not merely for lunatics but for other classes—and to provide the special type of institution that the special sort of infirmity might require; and also possibly with a view to this happening, that the county may from voluntary sources raise money for some special purposes, such as, for instance, for the epileptic, and that the grant available from the Exchequer should be used somewhat as an addition to that, with a view to provoking voluntary effort?—I have not considered that suggestion. Would this suggestion be in connection with the body that you foreshadowed to deal with the afflicted classes generally?

County authority for dealing with "afflicted" paupers.

7646. There might be a county committee or a county council committee, but I take your evidence to be directly opposed to a county council committee?—Yes.

7647. It would be some county organisation that would supply these institutions which a union might not or could not well supply for itself?—I have no objection to the suggestion that you make to the erection of a county board, as it were, for dealing with the afflicted classes, because I think that would be a very useful form of co-ordination; but I am not prepared to say how financial aid should be given by the Exchequer at present—I should like to consider it.

7648. One effect of this would be that probably the lunatics who are even now retained in the local workhouses might be removed from them, thus in some measure, at any rate in many unions where there is no special provision for lunatics, leaving a large amount of space for the workhouse proper?—There is no doubt that all the space we have in our workhouses is badly wanted, and that we should be very glad to get more room without spending more money. At the same time I think that to a great many of these lunatics and harmless imbeciles who are in the workhouse, it has been their home for many years, and they use it and look upon it as their home, and I think it would be rather a hardship for some of them to go away.

Increase of rateable values.

7649. Those that are there now, certainly. With regards to grants generally from the Exchequer, is it not true that local rateable values are increasing very much?—They certainly have been increasing, as you will see by my figures, in Yorkshire.

7650. To a great extent might not the policy of central grants be limited, because one criticism of the policy generally is that they tend to extravagance?—That is the great objection to a national rate for the poor, of course.

Question of limitation of Exchequer grants.

7651. Therefore, might not the policy be rather pushed of throwing the maintenance of the poor still further than it is at present on the local bodies—purely on the rates?—You might try and see what they say about it.

7652. I understand that ultimately the question that you yourself brought up is a question of economy. The question of Poor Law expense is a very important one, because it is increasing largely, year by year; therefore, if one is to tackle that problem, does not this seem to be almost on the threshold of the question?—Limiting the sum that is to be spent?

7653. Limiting the sum that is to be granted from Exchequer sources?—That is all on the assumption that the present guardians have been looking upon this as an extra aid from outside which they can rely on, and that they do not mind spending it. But I do not altogether agree that they look upon the grant in aid as anything but part of the ordinary income. I do not think half of them know where it does come from.

7654. Then I should infer that there would be the less trouble in withdrawing it?—If you could say nothing about it, it would be all right.

Possibility of economy in connection with Poor Law buildings and staffs.

7655. Again, is there any other way in which economy of Poor Law relief could be adhered to?—I have suggested a closer knowledge and inspection of all architectural work, and insisting upon sketch plans being always submitted before anything detailed is done. I have known of very highly prepared plans being sent which were not at all desirable, and all that money was wasted; that could have been obviated by consultation with a travelling architect.

7656. I have noticed in your own Memorandum, in regard, I think, to grouped cottage homes, how very large the staff is?—It is enormous; that is, because of the foster-mother system in the grouped home system. You will find that each family has a foster-mother, which makes it a sort of cross between the scattered home system and the grouped home system. You get the home life and you get the mother, the individual, looking after the family; but when they go out of doors, they are in another class and are a sort of community with other officers common to all.

7657. In the table that you give on page 33 of your Memorandum, you say, "It will be seen that there were twenty-three officers with salaries amounting to £600 to look after 101 children?"—That is at Ecclesall. I think the guardians are now beginning to see that.

7658. Is there any kind of method of preventing what is after all a permanent expenditure to that extent?—The Local Government Board have always gone on the principle that they do not favour any particular system of dealing with children. They say the systems are all good, and you may choose such as you think best for your locality. This locality said, "We think, after a long examination, that the industrial side of this system is the best and most improving for the children, and we will adopt it." I spent a long time trying to show them that there were other and more economical ways of doing it, but they would not listen to me. The idea had taken hold of them, and they carried it out.

Mr. Philip Henry Bagenal.

27 Mar. 1906.

Publication of particulars of cost of various methods of dealing with Poor Law children.

7659. Is it possible to do more in this way, namely, to have the various methods and the expense of them set out in some very simple form for circulation to guardians?—There would be no difficulty in doing that. Anybody could draft a Memorandum of that character who had the proper information.

7660. Would that not be of some assistance?—It would certainly be a form of intelligence which would be very easily got out and circulated.

7661. And the Press might have it too, possibly?—Yes, certainly.

Labour yards.

7662. With regard to those times of difficulty when there are unemployed and so on, so far as the paupers are concerned, are you in favour of the labour yard?—A labour yard is a thing that has to be very carefully guarded and watched, because there are certain classes of the community who are perfectly willing, for some curious reason, to live on the most ridiculously small wage, so long as it is regular. They can get a regular subsistence out of a labour yard as long as it is there and they can go to it. Those sort of people become stereotyped, and unless you deal with them in varied ways, they will be on top of you all the time.

7663. If you found the same man coming again and again, could you not offer him the house?—I was going to say that the only method of dealing with such a man is to say, "Well, I am afraid you must go up to the house." They do that in Sheffield, and the relieving officers there say that is the only way they can deal with it.

7664. Would you retain the labour yard as a method?—I think it is most important to have the labour yard. I think if they have the machinery ready to put it in work at certain periods, it would be a valuable aid, because then you will have something enabling you to say, "Here you can come and do something."

7665. Do you find that the guardians, when they open a labour yard, increase their staff in order to supervise it properly?—They always have a superintendent of some sort, because that is one of the conditions which the Local Government Board will insist upon.

7666. Will that be irrespective of the number admitted into the yard?—I think so. They must be superintended.

7667. You may want a group of three, four or five superintendents if it is a very large yard?—I think as a rule, experience shows that the numbers do not go on increasing.

Danger of too lavish "employment-relief" in labour yards and elsewhere.

7668. Is the borough relief for the unemployed that you have referred to in any degree—apart from the question of the political franchise—more attractive than the labour yard relief?—I am afraid it is. I am sorry the Chairman of the Bradford Board is not here. I sat at a Relief Committee in Bradford the other day—quite by accident I went there—and two cases came up, of men with wives and families. These were Poor Law cases, but the same principle holds good. They were earning nearly as much at the test labour as they could earn outside when they were in full work. They appeared two very bad cases, so much so that I wrote to the Chairman, Mr. Bentham, and asked him to bring it before the Revision Committee, because I thought if this was going on to any very great extent, it was a very bad business. [The facts I have since ascertained to be as follows:—Both men when in full work earned 24s. per week. When on test A got 20s. 10d. for nine persons, of which 5s. was in school meals for children, and 10d. consumed as soup at noon by himself daily. The balance was represented by 7s. 6d. in money and 7s. 6d. in kind. B got 17s. 10d. for eight persons, of which 3s. was for school meals, 10d. soup. The balance was 7s. in money and 7s. in kind. These figures no doubt alter the complexion of the cases. The point of importance seems to be what the average wage of these men would be in Bradford in winter. What I understood at the Committee when I attended it was that they would not be able at that time to earn as much if they were in work as they were getting on test.]

7669. That was a Poor Law Committee?—Yes. I do not know what sort of work the men do for the borough, but I should imagine that very much the same remark would apply to that; at any rate they are getting wages paid out of the public funds.

7670. The labour yard system, which is payment half in kind and half in money, is a juster system, is it not, than the wage system applied to relief works?—I do not know. Those cases worked out most unjustly to the independent labourer, because they were in a much better position than the independent labourer, or than they would have been themselves if they had been engaged on wages.

7671. That is to say, the guardians had fixed too high a remuneration?—They gave too much. Each child was getting 1s. every week for breakfast. Under the Poor Law Underfed Children Order each child on the relief book was getting 1s. for breakfast, so that the more children there were, the more the man got. It was quite like the old pre-Poor Law days.

7672. It was not the labour yard, so to speak, but it was the labour yard crossed by the School Feeding Order that made the difficulty?—Yes.

Effect of Dietaries Order, 1900

7673. What has been the effect of the new dietary on your unions: has it raised in any way unnecessarily the scale of expenditure?—I think it has certainly raised it to some extent: in some unions I think it must have done so: but then, on the other hand, there has been some economy effected by the better methods that were introduced. There is very little waste now in the dietary owing to the regulations. They can get just as good a dietary now, and they can get a cheap dietary under the wonderful variety which is afforded to them, if they will only take the trouble to go into it.

7674. Do they?—I do not know. I think they have gone on very much as they began: there has not been very much alteration, I think.

7675. Is it desirable that anything should be done, as you have suggested in regard to investigation, by someone under the inspector being prepared to go and explain that kind of thing, so that it might be brought before, not merely the guardians, but also the officials?—I do not think I suggested anything of that sort.

7676. You made the suggestion in regard to the investigation for the purposes of relief: I am suggesting it with regard to other matters?—Of course you might get an expert who would report upon dietaries, but I doubt very much whether it would be advisable. I think inspectors, if they were fortified by a Memorandum from the medical side of the Local Government Board, would be able to work that sufficiently.

Effect of out relief on friendly societies.

7677. You were asked a question about the Outdoor Relief (Friendly Societies) Act and you put before us a policy of outdoor relief to the "deserving poor": do you not think that the members of friendly societies would be tempted more and more to become paupers in the strict official sense of the word, if the system of outdoor relief is based on the lines of "the deserving poor"?—I do no know that they would: the amount of people who would get the increased relief would be so very small that I do not think it would have that effect.

7678. You are not afraid of creating practically a class of "deserving poor"?—No, I do not think so. My experience in Pocklington is that it is not a very large class, and I think on the whole it seemed to be a very humane way of dealing with those old people, who after all had spent their lives on the land.

Proposed re-apportionment of lunatic grant.

7679. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) With regard to the point with which Mr. Loch was dealing a little while ago, am I right in assuming that you acquiesce in the view that it would tend to better administration if the grant of 4s. per head for lunatics were to be done away with, and instead a lump sum were given which was distributed all over the country proportionately?—He did not put it exactly in that form. That does, I suppose, put shortly what he did mean. I really have not considered that question. I do not think I can say that I have any preference either one way or the other. The 4s. grant is a very convenient way of estimating it.

7680. I am sure we should gratefully accept such a grant in Scotland, because the footing upon which we stand now is that we have a lump sum, and I am sorry to say that owing to the large increase in lunacy the amount per head is of course very considerably reduced as the years go on?—So you are in the same position as the guardians are with regard to the officers' salaries; they are only getting what was given in 1888.

Question of prescription of further rules by the central authority for administering relief.

7681. As regards the administration of different boards of guardians, I understand you to say that at present there is a great deal of licence and elasticity in the discrimination meted out to and the treatment received by those indoor and outdoor cases?—Yes, I think there is a great deal of elasticity there.

7682. I think you are of opinion that it would be well if general rules and regulations were made, according to which a distinction or line were drawn between cases which were appropriate to outdoor relief and those which ought to receive the house only?—Yes; I am in favour of classification and treatment under regulation if possible.

7683. I think you would suggest that they should be uniformly applicable to all unions, would you not?—I think I qualified that by saying that it was very difficult to lay down any stereotyped set of rules for unions varying so much in character as you must see my district does; but I think each union ought to be able to frame a set of regulations suitable for that union. I do not think you could issue from the central authority any regulations which would do anything but excite very great criticism; I think you must allow the guardians to make those regulations, they having full knowledge of their own conditions and circumstances.

7684. Do you not think that the central body could lay down certain general lines upon which relief could be administered?—They could make suggestions perhaps, and they could frame scales, and so on; but then you know the conditions vary.

7685. Assuming that they did so, would it be a proper power to give to the inspectors—if they do not have it already, perhaps they have—to report to the central body when relief was administered otherwise than upon those general lines?—It would be rather difficult for an inspector to ascertain that, because they might keep straight when he was there.

Assistance to inspector.

7686. But he would know generally whether those lines were being departed from?—He might examine all the books, but it would take a very long time. That brings me to the point again that I want some man to do that sort of thing.

7687. But do you think it would be a proper thing to do?—I think we ought to get more information as to the way in which relief is administered in the unions.

Question of further power to Local Government Board to compel right administration of relief.

7688. If those general lines were transgressed, do you think it would be a right thing that the inspector for the district should so report to the Local Government Board with a view to their taking steps?—He should, I think, first bring the matter before the board locally, and talk to them about it, and give them counsels of perfection. That is all we can do at present.

7689. I am leading up to this—whether, supposing a board of guardians did continue to give relief otherwise than upon these lines, the central authority should not have certain powers given to them with a view to having the relief put upon a better system in that union?—They have of course certain powers in that direction, but they are only powers of expostulation.

7690. Do you think that further powers should be given?—No, I do not think you can give them. This is local government, and local government means that the people on the spot have got to do the job, as they presumably know more about it than do the people up here. That is the theory of local government, is it not? The more you trench upon that, the more unpopular the central body becomes and the more difficult it is to keep and carry on the business. Our business is to smooth things and get things done without trouble. Directly you have a manifesto from the board or a letter, or correspondence or circulars, you immediately rouse all the antagonism of the English local feeling, which is the strongest thing in the country—the jealousy of external interference.

7691. I rather understood you to say, in the previous part of your evidence, that where the boards of guardians were told that they must proceed according to the law, they were always very pleased to know that there was a law affecting the matter?—Yes, a law that they can understand.

7692. And that they at once acquiesced?—If it is a law which is absolutely mandatory and allows no shifting or alternative, yes. But it is very difficult to do that when you are dealing with a case where different views are taken of the case.

Power of central authority in Scotland to enforce execution of Poor Law.

7693. Then you are not in favour of a provision such as that which exists in Scotland to the effect that "where a parish council refuses or neglects to do what is herein or otherwise by law required of them, or in case any obstruction shall arise in the execution of the Act, it shall be lawful for the Local Government Board to apply to the Court?" You do not thinkthat a provision of that sort would be advisable in England, do vou?—What court do you apply to, may I ask?

7694. By the Statute to the Supreme Court?—I am afraid that would be considered a very drastic thing in this country.

Duties and qualifications of relieving officers and clerks to guardians.

7695. As regards the relieving officers, I understand that there is no profession, so to speak, of relieving officers in England—I mean that there are no essential requisites for qualification for such a post, nor is it recognised as a profession with certain duties and with promotion from one union to another union where the pay is better; there is nothing of that sort here?—No.

7696. The relieving officer in the union in which he is relieving officer is not so important an official as the clerk, is he?—No, nothing approaching to the clerk.

7697. Although I suppose the relieving officer, as being the officer who has to do with relief, has extremely delicate and difficult duties to perform?—His duties are very difficult and very delicate.

7698. The clerk's duties, I suppose, are to attend at the meetings of the board of guardians, to keep their minutes, and generally to do the clerical work which is appropriate to such a post?—Yes, and the legal work; he is their legal adviser in everything, so that he must have a knowledge of the Poor Law.

7699. It would occur to one—I do not know whether you would agree in that—that the relieving officer's duties are really the more important of the two?—I have always held that the relieving officer's duties are of the very greatest importance, and require a very high class of man indeed. One of the reasons of our failures, I think, is that that class is not as good a man or as well paid a man as he ought to be. I was told when I was in Scotland—it might interest you to know this—that there are very few Scotsmen in the Poor Law service in England, and a workhouse master in Edinburgh told me that the reason was that the salaries here were so low that the Scotsmen would not look at them. They pay much better in Scotland than they do in England.

Status of inspectors of poor in Scotland.

7700. The inspectors of the poor, I may say, are very much better paid, and they very often do the work of the clerk also; the clerk's duties are not so important as those of the inspector of the poor, who in many instances holds a very considerable position in the parish in which he is inspector. You have given us, I think, a list of the number of relieving officers in certain unions in your districts of the East Riding and the West Riding?—I have.

Staff of relieving officers and their functions.

7701. I think that in Leeds there are five or six relieving officers?—There are six certainly, and a cross-visitor and pay clerk besides.

7702. Do these relieving officers attend the meetings of the boards of guardians, or the committees of the boards of guardians, when they are dealing with relief cases?—Always; they are, in fact, the main sources of information on each case.

Mr. Philip Henry Bagenal.

27 Mar. 1906.

7703. Are they all present at each meeting?—No; they only deal with a section. They have a district, and the poor of that district come before the district committee, and the relieving officer attends all cases from that district.

Offices of superintendent of outdoor relief.

7704. Is there no principal relieving officer, no head forthe five or six?—Not there. I was very much disappointed that they did not appoint what we call a superintendent of outdoor relief. They appointed a cross-visitor, and the clerk is supposed to be a superintendent of outdoor relief there. We have in Sheffield and Bradford an officer called the superintendent of outdoor relief. He drives the out-relief coach, and all the relieving officers are responsible to him and report to him. I have a specimen here of a report of the year's outdoor relief, with all the statistics of the districts and everything connected with it. That is a most valuable post, and a most necessary post. The appointment has to be by a special order of the board, and in my opinion in large urban unions there ought always to be a superintendent of outdoor relief.

7705. To whom the other relieving officers are not responsible, but to whom they would report?—They are under him. He may order them to be cross-visited by a cross-visitor. He goes into their books, and if he does not think certain cases are satisfactory, he calls them up and says: What is the reason of this case? You get then a close supervision.

7706. Do you approve of that system being introduced into all the unions in your district?—No; because there is not the work for it in all of them.

7707. Would you approve of it where there are more than two or three relieving officers?—Yes; in that case I think one of them ought to be superintendent.

Method of reducing size of boards of guardians.

7708. You have also told us, I think, that you are of opinion that for good management and for effective and business-like administration the numbers of the boards of guardians are much too large at present?—That is my opinion.

7709. But at the same time you have said, I think, as I understand it, that as each parish is at present represented on the board of guardians, you would have very great difficulty in inducing those parishes to give up the right they have to nominate a member?—I think that would have to be done by the board. Unfortunately, I think, the county council has the power to reduce these parishes, and to reduce the areas of these parishes, and the Local Government Board has not got the power.

7710. Is that the way in which you would proceed to reduce the numbers on the boards of guardians?—Yes; I should proceed to make three or four parishes into one electoral unit.

7711. Do you think that could be done without much friction or dissatisfaction?—I think that is a case in which, if you said you are going to do it and did it, it could be done and there would be no more heard about it, because the public would not take very much interest in it.

7712. I do not think you have said in your evidence anything about the boarding-out of pauper children, although you have told us a good deal about scattered homes and cottage homes?—I have given you the numbers, that is all.

Comparative merits of various methods of dealing with Poor Law children.

7713. The scattered homes and the cottage homes seem to be conducted on very extravagant lines. You have told us, I think, that eight out of ten of the boarded-out children whom you visited were, you thought, very comfortably housed and looked after?—Yes.

7714. Have you had any experience outside the union of boarded-out children?—No, I have never had any experience of boarded-out children outside the union.

7715. Have you ever heard it said, or do you know whether the system is successful or not?—Miss Evans, one of my colleagues, who is boarding-out inspector, very often comes to see me when she is in my district, as I like to get all the information I can from everywhere. I see all the cases that she reports upon. They all come to me and I read them, so that I am fully acquainted with the conditions, but I cannot say I have been personally to see the homes. I think that, on the whole, the boarding-out system has been worked all right. There are always bad cases every now and again, of course.

7716. And of course it is a very much less expensive system than any of the others?—Much less.

7717. It also has this merit, has it not, that the children are removed from the district where they have been brought up, and are free from the taint of pauperism and the stigma of pauperism, which must attach to them at their own homes or near their old surroundings?—Yes, that is so.

7718. That is a very important matter as regards the future of these children, is it not?—Yes. I should like to say, with regard to boarding-out within the union, that the guardians do not, in all cases, have committees, and then the supervision is rather lax. In a good many unions that is so; the children are left entirely, or very much to the relieving officer and the medical officer.

7719. In the cases where they are boarded out outside the union, can you say whether it is the view of the guardians that the boarding-out should be as near the union as possible, or do they sometimes go a long way?—They go long distances, I think. The difficulty is really to get homes. There are not enough homes and not enough committees. If I were to give an opinion on the facts as stated to me, I would say there seems to have been a sort of pause in the enthusiasm for the boarding-out system. You do not find the number of people coming forward and saying: We are interested in this thing, and we will form a committee. There is a difficulty in getting committees formed.

7720. Have you ever heard that that may be due to some extent to over-inspection?—I have not heard that stated, but I heard a great deal said as to that in a debate in Edinburgh at a Poor Law conference where the subject was discussed.

Detention for necessary period of paupers after surgical operation.

7721. You have spoken I think about the detention of the ins-and-outs in the workhouse; has this matter come under your notice: in the event of cases requiring very prolonged medical or surgical attention going into the infirmaries, do you find that sometimes these cases are apt to remove themselves—of course they may discharge themselves when they please—before the medical officer would certify them fit for removal?—No, I have not.

7722. That has not been brought under your notice?—No.

7723. It may be, may it not, and possibly you may have had cases—one knows of them—where a pauper requiring a surgical operation is removed for that purpose and taken into the infirmary and treated, and then he occasionally desires to leave before the medical officer will certify him fit for removal?—I do not think he can discharge himself; the master would not allow him to go out unless he has got a doctor's certificate.

7724. Has he any power to prevent his going out?—In the sick wards I think he has.

Apportionment of time of general inspector.

7725. (Sir Henry Robinson.) I think you said you had to give a great deal of time to the inspection of workhouses, and that you could give but very little time to your more important duties, such as attending meetings of boards of guardians?—More particularly the superintendence of the great bulk of the out-relief.

7726. Might it not be said that the inspector has a very great deal of responsibility with respect to the management of the workhouse, and perhaps not quite so much responsibility in regard to the manner in which the guardians exercise their discretion?—That may be said, but I should like to know why that should be. The rate pays for all.

7727. Has the inspector any responsibility in regard to the exercise of their discretion by the board of guardians?—No, not as to their discretion in giving either outdoor relief or indoor relief. We do not interfere at all as to how the relief is given or in what method it is given.

7728. So that you have no responsibility as regards that?—That is so.

7729. But with regard to the management of the workhouse, you have a certain responsibility?—Yes, we are bound to inspect the workhouse by order.

7730. Might that not be the reason why you have to spend so much more time in visiting the workhouse than in attending the board of guardians: I only want to know whether that is not one of the reasons?—I do not know. I am not sure that the question of the responsibility that the inspector has over outdoor relief has ever been raised, but it has occurred to me personally. I have always felt it, and I thought it right to put in on my record.

7731. With regard to the inspection of workhouses do you not attach much importance to that?—I attach very much importance to it, according to the condition and state of the workhouse and the officers: but one gets to know one's officers as a rule pretty well.

7732. Your duty with regard to inspection is to see that all the regulations of the Local Government Board are carried out, and that there is a proper system of inspection, and that the officers discharge their duties efficiently?—Yes.

7733. Do you not think that if the inspection is made less frequently, or if the inspector was taken away and less time had to be devoted to them, that these workhouses would not be in the good state in which they are at present?—I think it would be impossible to reduce the number of inspections, which is only supposed to be one in the year.

Proposal to depute inspection of workhouses to assistant inspector.

7734. You would be in favour of deputing the work of inspecting the workhouses to some assistant inspector, I believe?—I think one ought to have a chance of deputing work of that sort.

7735. Might it not be taken then by the officials that the Local Government Board did not perhaps attach the same importance to the inspection of the workhouses and the management of the workhouses as they did to other duties?—I think not. I think so long as the workhouse was inspected regularly once a year, it would be all right.

7736. There is another important thing with regard to workhouse inspections. I suppose one might say that the paupers themselves look upon the visit of the inspector as a sort of link between them and the outside world?—Not so much I fancy as in the past, because so many visitors now go in. The personal visiting by guardians has done a great deal. In this country an individual guardian can go at any time into any part of the workhouse by himself or herself.

7737. Is that done to a great extent?—That is done, and that of course is a great opportunity for any inmate to make a complaint.

7738. Then you would not be in favour of having any less inspection of workhouses than there is at the present time?—No.

Advisability of more frequent attendance of inspectors at meetings of guardians.

7739. If your district was made smaller, or if in any way it was arranged that you could pay greater attention to the meetings of guardians and watch their administration of out-relief, might it not be thought that the Local Government Board was interfering too much in the administration?—I observe you state that there is a good deal of jealousy of external interference?—Yes, there is.

7740. Would it be wise then on the part of the central authority to send their inspectors down very frequently to take part in the administration?—Our inspectors all live in the district, and there is not that same feeling that there would be if they were coming ad hoc. I think that they welcome the inspector very much indeed, especially at these relief meetings, because the minority may sometimes appeal to him.

7741. If their attendances at the meetings were doubled or made much more frequent, would they still welcome the inspector?—I think so.

7742. There would be no jealousy of external interference?—I do not think so—not to the extent that I should put it in practice.

Proposed abolition of very small Workhouses.

7743. I observe you state that there were four workhouses in your district with less than fifty inmates; is it necessary to retain workhouses with such a very small number of inmates; could they not be amalgamated with the adjoining unions?—That is one of the questions that has been discussed. Those four are all rather curiously situated. Pateley Bridge and Sedbergh are situate in a large mountainous district with a very few inmates and a very small number of people on out-relief. I do not see that you could very well do without a workhouse there, owing to the acreage. Then Skirlaugh is a purely agricultural district; that is the only one which I would say might be thrown into another union, say Sculcoates. It is a small workhouse with only twenty-four or twenty-five people in it. It is absurd to have a workhouse for that number.

7744. What staff have they for that workhouse with twenty-four inmates?—There is a master, a matron, a general servant and a general handy man. In that case they have the whole house warmed by a boiler, and the man looks after that.

7745. Is there a nurse?—There is no nurse; the matron acts as nurse.

7745. Is there a porter?—No. Perhaps there is an assistant. I think there are four people there altogether.

7747. In your eastern district had you many small unions like that with just a handful of people?—I have shut up two workhouses altogether in my record. One of them was an isolated rural workhouse in Norfolk with about forty or fifty people in it, and of course it created civil war for three years.

7748. Why?—Because they were so anxious to retain it.

7749. The contractors or who?—Everybody wanted it. There was a tremendous row, and we had two public inquiries, I think. But I shut the workhouse up, and we distributed the inmates to the surrounding people. Everyone was delighted when it was done, and no harm happened to the poor.

7750. What was the financial result, do you know, generally on that particular union whose workhouse was shut up?—They first of all lost the staff, which was something; then the clerk was pensioned. The master had died, and it was that which enabled me to do it really.

7751. What became of the house?—The house is shut up; it is to let.

7752. Do you say that you think one of the existing unions might be shut up?—The only union in my present district that I should say might be shut up would be Skirlaugh, which might be thrown into the adjoining union of Beverley or the adjoining union of Sculcoates.

7753. Without hardship to the poor, do you mean?—I do not think there would be very much hardship. They would have to go a greater distance, but they would probably manage somehow.

Nature of workhouse inmates' complaints to inspector.

7754. (Sir Samuel Provis.) You say in paragraph 3 of your memorandum that from time to time when you visit a workhouse you get complaints from the inmates; do you find anything in these complaints?—Very seldom. They generally come from the class who have studied the Poor Law regulations and think they have got the master. They trot them out and say, Now we are going to have the master. There really is nothing in it as a rule. I listen to them most patiently; I always make a note in pencil of everything they say, and they go away perfectly satisfied.

Proposal to depute inspection of workhouses to assistant inspectors.

7755. You do, I suppose, get a good deal of information from the inspection of your workhouses from time to time, do you not? You get to know what the officers are, for instance, and you get a good deal of general information with regard to the administration of the union which you will hardly get from a paper?—Yes, you could not get it in any other way. You get to know all the chief officers, and the board and the officers both look upon the inspector really as a friend and adviser, and they do take one's advice.

7756. Is that not rather an argument against sending an assistant to do it for you?—No. I think they look upon all inspectors as fair men who will listen to their point of view and will do justice between them and the inmates. That is the general rule, I think.

7757. That is to say they would look on the assistant in the same way that they look upon you now?—I think so.

Mr. Philip Henry Bagenal.

27 Mar. 1906.

7758. Taking it from your own point of view, would you not lose an advantage which you gain now?—I should certainly make a visit. You can go and spend an hour in the workhouse without going into every ward, and still you can learn a great deal about it.

7759. Would you contemplate that you would visit the workhouse, but not make an inspection of the workhouse?—Certainly. You could easily keep touch with a place without going into every corner of it.

7760. You are contemplating two sorts of assistants, as I understand; one sort that would relieve you practically from the inspection of the certified schools of the smaller kind and the scattered homes, and somebody else who would inspect workhouses and have some relation to outdoor relief; have I put it rightly?—That is right.

Proposed inspection of out-relief.

7761. What do you precisely contemplate that he should do with regard to outdoor relief?—I contemplate that I should give him instructions to go and investigate the outdoor relief of a certain union. First of all he would go and interview all the relieving officers, and he would make himself thoroughly acquainted with their rounds of work. He would inspect their books and make notes of the unsatisfactory cases, or what would appear on the face to be unsatisfactory, and would put questions to the relieving officers, and if necessary would visit the homes with them in a friendly way. I think he ought to go with them on their rounds, and visit all their pay stations, and in fact spend a considerabe time, it might be a couple of days or three days, in thoroughly overhauling and superintending the work of that relieving staff. When he had done that, he would either write a report or see me, and I should then be thoroughly acquainted with the character of the relieving officers and with the way they do their business. He would attend the relief committees, and I should be informed fully. Then I could go into any matter before them as the inspector of the district.

7762. Would you contemplate that he should generally supervise the way in which the relieving officers did their work?—He should supervise for the purpose of reporting.

7763. I was rather using the word "supervise" in contra-distinction to an inspection which occurs occasionally with a view to seeing how things are done?—I should leave the routine supervision to whoever was the chief relieving officer—the superintendent.

7764. You would not at all contemplate that the central authority, or the inspector on behalf of the central authority, should undertake in any way the supervision of relief by the guardians or their officers?—No; I do not think that would be practicable.

Appointment of superintendent relieving officers.

7765. With regard to the relieving officers, would you encourage the appointment of superintendent relieving officers when that is practicable?—When that is practicable, and when there is a sufficient number to warrant it.

7766. You have pointed out that sometimes a relieving officer has too much to do and holds too many offices; the reason the guardians are anxious to appoint a man who holds more than one office is, is it not, that they thereby avoid more than one man going over the same ground?—It is to fill up his time, and for the sake of economy.

Reasons for additional duties of relieving officers.

7767. Supposing the man is not fully occupied, you must do something of the kind, must you not?—In that I quite agree; that would give an excuse for it.

7768. So that in the rural parishes where the man's time would not otherwise be fully occupied, something of that sort is essential?—I think it is, and you cannot fairly criticise it there.

7769. In the more urban unions is there not something to be said for having more relieving officers and at the same time allowing them to hold some offices such as that of Registrar; what objection would there be to that?—The appointment of more officers would do away with the objection that they have not the time, but then you would have to put two relieving officers into one district.

7770. Is that not better from some points of view than having a number of officers going over the same ground for different purposes?—I do not know. If they have got to go over the ground in all their businesses, it does not matter whether it is the same ground, does it?

7771. It takes up the man's time. Do they not say this: That if a man has occasion to go over a particular area he may as well go for two purposes as for one?—That is so, and he may get information too—there is that to be said. My main object in making the suggestion about these other offices is because they take away a man's time and energy from the work which he ought to be doing.

7772. Therefore your point is met if the arrangement is such that the man has got time for his relief duties, no matter how it is secured?—That would remove a great deal of my objection.

7773. You have told us that in one or two cases you have got rid of the workhouses?—In two cases.

Unions without workhouses.

7774. You know that in one or two cases in the Eastern district there are unions which have got no workhouses at all; Hoxne and Hartismere, I think is one?—I mention that.

7775. How does that plan work?—I say in my memorandum that I was never satisfied with the administration of that combination.

7776. Do you think that the plan of having a union without a workhouse and boarding-out the paupers, as it were, in another union, is an undesirable one?—I cannot say that that is my view because I recommended them to do that at Woodbridge. I pulled down the workhouse there too.

7777. You have had experience since then?—I wanted to pull down the workhouse, because I knew they would have to build a workhouse afterwards. It was merely to get an alternative policy. Now they have been forced to board-out somewhere else, and they will no doubt build a workhouse themselves, and my object will be accomplished. Boarding-out all depends upon how distant it is; the question of distance comes in there.

Difficulties to enlarging Poor Law areas.

7778. I was going to ask you about that point. It is some times suggested that there should be larger areas for workhouse administration, for instance, that you should take a county. One objection that is made is that the distance at which the indoor paupers would thus be placed from their relatives might be too great; does that not apply to some extent, at all events, to that boarding-out?—Yes, it does. It encourages out-relief to cases which really ought not to be dealt with by out-relief.

7779. In order to avoid that difficulty?—In order to avoid bringing them long distances.

7780. I think that the York case is the only one in which you have got out-relief unions in your district?—That is all.

Objections out-relief unions.

7781. There are certain peculiarities of course with regard to York; but do you feel able to express an opinion as to the principle of out-relief unions?—I must say that the out-relief union system is not one that I desire to see extended.

7782. The object, I take it, of all out-relief unions is not really a poor law one, but is rather a local government one—it is to get unions within county boundaries?—That was the moving argument, I think.

7783. In the case where a union is in two or three counties, as in the case of York, you could not have that portion of it which contained the workhouse as a separate union, because the workhouse would be too large for it, and therefore the areas were combined for indoor administration; that is the principle that was adopted, was it not?—Yes.

7784. But you think it does not work well?—It does not work well in York, because the two bodies are totally antagonistic to each other, or think they are, in interests.

7785. Do you find any disposition to send cases into the workhouse because the indoor relief will be charged upon the whole union, whereas the outdoor relief will only be charged on the out-relief union?—I cannot say that of York, because York has been always an out-relief parish.

Proposal to make out-relief parochial and indoor relief union charge.

7786. Sometimes it is suggested that outdoor relief should be made a parochial charge and indoor relief a union charge; would your experience in relation to York lead you to think that that suggestion would not have the result which is anticipated from it, namely, the diminution of outdoor relief?—It would be very hard to say what the result would be there. If you look at the map I put in, you will see that the great proportion of money goes into the poorest parish.

7787. That is, the greatest amount of the out-door relief goes into the poorest parish?—Yes; so that the result would be that the property owners in that union would be mulcted in a most enormous proportion.

7788. Do you think that another result of a plan of that kind would be to encourage what you look upon as an evil, namely, that the guardians of particular parishes would look after their particular poor; would that practice be increased, do you think, supposing the charge is a parochial charge?—No, I should think the contrary, because if they have got to pay for it out of their own parish, they would very soon look into the case. It becomes a pocket question then.

7789. Owing to the pressure upon them from the people in their parish to look after their own cases, is that not what happens now?—Yes, but if the payment of that came out of the parish, they would consider whether it was worth while to listen to them.

7790. That is exactly what happens at York: the outdoor relief is a charge on the parish, because York itself is only one parish?—If it is only one parish—I had forgotten it—it would be so. I was thinking of a number of parishes where each has its own representative, and where the parish itself would be charged.

Size of various boards of guardians in Yorkshire.

7791. I think your table H. (East Riding) says that there is only one parish in York out-relief union: they were combined, I believe some years ago. Just look at the number of guardians for the York out-relief union: although it is only one parish they have got forty guardians That, I suppose, arises from the fact that there were a great number of parishes in the city of York, and that when they were combined, they took the total number of guardians in the parishes which were combined, and assigned them to the new parish?—Yes, and made forty wards.

7792. Electing one guardian in each ward?—Yes.

7794. I do not know whether this has come under your notice: Is there not practically a good deal of difficulty in reducing the number of guardians?—There is a case now where I live, in the Knaresborough union. They are always wanting to get more guardians for the urban district, and in Harrogate, which has grown enormously they have had an addition of two or three, and now they want an addition of quite a large number.

7795. Is that in order to balance the rural members?—Yes. There is the antagonism of town and country. Harrogate is a place where they have spent a great deal of money upon various kinds of work, and the rural district councillors are kicking, and then in order to meet that, the guardians of Harrogate want to get more representatives.

Proposal to enlarge electoral unit for guardians.

7796. Therefore, it would be a good thing, would it not, if there were some power of enlarging the area for the election of guardians, although you perhaps would not be in favour of any great extension of the area of administration?—Yes. That is a distinction that I make in my memorandum.

Record of attendance at relief committees.

7797. That must be done, I take it, by a combination of parishes for the purposes of election only?—Yes, thereby reducing the number of the elected.

7798. In paragraph 54 you have told us about relief committees. You say that sometimes the quorum is not maintained. There ought to be three to constitute a quorum, ought there not?—Yes.

7799. Is there any record kept which shows what the attendance is?—Yes.

7800. So that it would be possible to ascertain at the time the particular relief was given whether there was less than the quorum present?—In Sheffield they certainly do keep a record. Speaking generally, my experience is frequent that the attendance is confined to only two or three guardians. On one occasion one man went through a whole list.

Proposed restriction by Local Government Board of period of relief.

7801. Would you see any difficulty in guardians in giving relief being restricted to quite short periods, say a month?—Do you mean by a Local Government Board Regulation?

7802. Yes.—You can generally understand a case in one month, though it very often takes more than one month to do so.

7803. Would you think that too short?—Say either a month or six weeks.

7804. Have you got cases where boards of guardians meet at comparatively long intervals, or do they always meet every fortnight?—They meet every fortnight, sometimes every week. I think that an Order of that sort would automatically cause a great deal of investigation and revision.

7805. It would get rid practically, of cases being treated as permanent would it not?—It would give a great deal more trouble, and would necessitate probably a larger staff.

7806. A larger staff of what?—Of relieving officers and clerks, I think.

Relief stations.

7807. You have got a good many pay stations in your district, have you not?—Yes, there are a great number.

7808. Do you find that they work satisfactorily or otherwise?—That is a question which I have not had the opportunity of testing personally. I have from time to time been at a pay station and seen the pay given. There are reasons in favour of pay stations. They were originally started in obedience to a suggestion of the Local Government Board in 1871, so that the suggestion came originally from the board. Then we found out that abuses crept in.

7809. I was rather wanting to know how they had worked: of course in a good deal of your district you must have very large areas where the people are very much separated?—Yes, and there must be some point of contact and meeting for those people. The only abuse is that they sometimes pay a little trifle to the person who comes for the relief, and sometimes send children. On the other hand, the convenience is very great.

7810. Perhaps you are not in a position to answer this question: do you think they could be abolished in your district?—I think there would be very great opposition to abolishing them. In the Pocklington union, as a matter of fact, I think there are only one or two pay stations, and the relieving officer goes and gives the money at each house. I have been with him and seen him do it. That could be done more, no doubt, but it is a matter which the relieving officers would resist very much where they have not been in the habit of doing it. It is a thing that ought to be introduced as occasion serves, and not by a sweeping regulation.

7811. I take it that your district is one of those in which the difficulty would be greatest on account of the large moorland areas in it?—Yes.

Method of retirement of boards of guardians.

7812. I think you told us that the guardians in your district are all of them elected for a period of three years?—Yes.

7813. That is, they go out all together?—Yes.

7814. Do you find that works well, or do you think it is better to have them retire a third at a time?—I have never had any experience of the other way.

7815. Was it the same when you were in the East Anglian district?—Yes. Except in Ipswich.

7816. Did they not go out one-third annually?—I do not remember any other case; there may have been, but I cannot tax my memory with it.

7817. The argument that is used is that if you have an annual election of a third, you keep up a continuity of policy and of experience among the members of the board of guardians, whereas if they are elected altogether

Mr. Philip Henry Bagenal.

27 Mar. 1906.

there may be an entire change?—As a matter of fact you do get a certain number of experienced men always on the board.

7818. Do you find that practically you secure that result at present—that a certain number of old guardians get returned after the election, so that you do get experienced men?—I think that nearly always some of the old hands stop.

7819. Therefore that difficulty does not appear to you to have much in it?—I should like to see the change made, but I think it is a thing that does not suit the genius of the people in Yorkshire certainly; there they want a general election.

7820. Of course it is rather more expensive, too?—It is more expensive.

Cause of high cost of Sheffield homes for children.

7821. In paragraph 103 you deal with the cost of the Sheffield Homes for Children, which appears to have gone up from 7s. 9d. in 1897 to 9s. 4¾d in 1905; is that on account of reducing the number which they took into each home?—They did reduce the number to a certain extent in each home, and they are reducing them. They originally started with fifteen, and they are now aiming at eleven or ten.

7822. Is fifteen found to be too large?—I think it is.

7823. That number was taken, I presume, in order to diminish expense; was that the reason?—It was to enable the experiment to be floated; that is really what I think it was.

7824. That number has been adopted elsewhere, I think?—I believe it has been laid down generally that there shall be not more than fifteen.

Medical loan relief.

7825. With regard to medical relief, do you find medical relief given on loan in your district?—There is very little relief given on loan; that is my experience.

7826. Whether medical or otherwise?—Yes. They may give it sometimes as a form of test.

7827. When they do give it, do they recover the cost?—I think very seldom.

Out-relief by master of workhouse and consequence.

7828. You told us of a case, I think, where the master of the workhouse had been giving out-door relief?—It was technically outdoor relief.

7829. Because the man was not in the workhouse?—He worked in the workhouse precincts, and I suppose as a matter of convenience he was paid by the workhouse master as the end of each week.

7830. Not paid as wages, but paid as relief?—It was so much a day. It was a system they had in York. I went there one day and found this money being paid by the workhouse master; I asked the meaning of it and he then explained. I said: This is entirely wrong; you have no business to be paying money which is out-relief practically. He said, It has always been done here; I said, it must be stopped, and, what is more, I shall have to call the auditor's attention to it.

7831. What happened when you called the auditor's attention to it?—The auditor surcharged the workhouse master, and as it worked out to about £300 or £400 the master of course wrote to me about it.

7832. Did he appeal against the disallowance?—He appealed against the disallowance.

7833. It was a case in which he could not equitably, I presume, be called upon to pay the money?—No. It was quite obvious that it was one of those cases in which the equitable jurisdiction of the board would be naturally exercised. But it stopped the practice.

7834. That is, the effect of the disallowance was to stop the practice for the future?—Yes.

7835. So that the purpose was really answered by means of the disallowance?—Yes.

7836. With regard to your statistical statement as to the number of outdoor paupers relieved during the half year, you are aware, I presume, that the officers are relieved from the necessity of keeping that statement now?—I was not aware of that. I asked them for the information, and they gave it to me.

Desuetude of half-yearly statement as to number of paupers.

7837. Do they keep that statistical statement now, in fact, do you think?—The relieving officers have shown me in their relief lists a column from which they take these facts.

7838. The statistical part of the relief list no doubt has to be kept still, but there was a statistical statement made up at the end of each half-year under the Order for Accounts, and that was dispensed with some years ago?—That may have been. I have seen these figures on the left-hand side of the relief list, and in another place all the sums for each week.

7839. That was not what I meant; that undoubtedly has to be done, and that would be the foundation for the statistical statement which was formerly kept. The Order for Accounts provided that a half-yearly statistical statement should be made out of all the persons who were relieved, but that was dispensed with some years ago, because it was found that no use was made of it?—I may say that all my clerks and officers in Yorkshire are particularly kind and good in getting me statistics, but they are overdone with statistics, and they are often complaining to me of the enormous amount of returns that they have to make.

Number of returns required of Poor Law officials.

7840. They are called upon to make them for Parliamentary and other purposes, are they not?—Yes; they say they have never done making returns.

7841. (Chairman.) Not for their own guardians, but for Parliament?—For Parliament and for the clerk. The clerk has to send a number up to the Local Government Board in order to fill up Parliamentary returns. All the Parliamentary returns practically are prepared by the clerks of unions, and the clerks are fed by the relieving officers and the other officers. Their whole life is passed in getting these things out. Then an inspector, at times of stress like this when he is called upon to give evidence, gets information too. I got the information for these analyses from them. So really they are never done getting information. I pity them sometimes.

7842. (Sir Samuel Provis.) The duty of making that statistical statement that I referred to was imposed on the clerk, and the clerk, I suppose, got it from the relieving officer and the master?—No doubt. I think the basis of it all you will find in the relief list.

Status of clerk and relieving officer.

7843. Something was said about a comparison between the kind of man that a relieving officer is and the kind of man that the clerk is; it would be necessary, would it not, that the clerk should be a man of a good deal higher social status than a relieving officer?—He certainly generally is.

7844. He conducts the correspondence of the guardians?—Yes.

7845. He acts as their legal adviser?—Yes.

7846. And practically does a good deal in the way of administering the general affairs of the guardians, apart from actual relief?—Certainly. He is their adviser generally on many points.

7847. He acts as adviser, and must be a man of good education and some social status if he is to discharge his duties properly?—And I think he generally is.

7848. Would that kind of qualification be necessary in a relieving officer?—That would not be necessary; but I think the higher the standard of education and intelligence and adaptability to circumstances in the relieving officer, the better work he does and the more economically and satisfactorily the work of the union will be done.

7849. You would not contemplate, would you, that a relieving officer should be a man of the same social position that would be necessary for a clerk?—No, I do not think so. He could be a very well informed man without that.

Mr. JAMES LOWRY, called; and Examined.

Mr. James Lowry.
2 April, 1906.

Extent of district.

7850. (Chairman.) You are the Local Government Board Inspector for the district known as the North Eastern District, which comprises the union counties of Northumberland, Durham and the North Riding of Yorkshire, with parts of Cumberland?—I am.

7851. How long have you been inspector in your present district?—Since 1901.

General conditions in the district.

7852. During that period there has been a general increase of pauperism?—That is so.

7853. Both in the rural and urban parts?—It is not so pronounced in the rural as in the industrial centres.

7854. Has the increase been in indoor as well as outdoor relief?—I think on the whole indoor relief has gone down in many of the unions.

7855. Will you give us the figures of the number of persons receiving relief in your district at the present moment?—I cannot.

7856. Have you any idea what percentage of the population the pauperism forms?—I have not.

7857. Has there been any trade disturbance since you have been in your present post?—Nothing very serious. There have been small affairs, but nothing of any considerable moment.

7858. Is there much difference in the methods of administration adopted by the unions as regards poor law outdoor relief?—There is not. There is a very pleasant amount of similarity in all the unions, both large and small 7859. Does the amount of outdoor relief form much the same percentage as indoor relief?—It does.

7860. You state in your memorandum (see Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XVI), that is has varied from 76·6 to 77·6?—That is all.

Methods of dealing with children.

7861. Are there many children in the workhouses?—There are not in my district. There are a few; they have a good number, but a large number are now arranging for cottages and getting them out, but I have no large number of children in a number of unions. At Newcastle, Gateshead, and two or three other places, there are a considerable number, but there is no large number.

7862. The system of cottage homes and scattered homes has worked well?—It is growing very rapidly, I am happy to say.

7863. Is it being generally adopted by boards of guardians in your district?—It is now.

7864. What is the financial result?—On the whole my own experience is that those who opposed it most bitterly are now reconciled to it and in favour of it, and the increase in the expense is very trifling. I have heard of it being lower, but I take that with a grain of salt.

Type of Guardians in colliery districts.

7865. In the colliery districts of what class are the boards of guardians composed?—Some of them are just so-so.

7866. What do you mean by that?—I say in some of them the members forming the boards are more of a so-so position; they are not always the men one would like to see 7867. Are the majority of the members of the boards working colliers?—Oh no, not working colliers, but connected with collieries.

7868. Men employed in the collieries?—In other capacities, not as working miners; they are officials, or call themselves so.

7869. There is no union in which there is, as far as you are aware, a majority of guardians who are working men?—No, not one that I know of.

7870. How does the amount of pauperism in the purely colliery districts contrast with that of the agricultural districts?—They are almost similar one with the other. The only point where we find it is where there is a strike, or where there are slack times; then, of course, the proportion goes up.

7871. Has there been any considerable movement or migration of population in your district?—No, not that I can speak of definitely.

Infrequency of Scattered Homes for children.

7872. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Have you any scattered homes at all in your district?—Yes.

7873. More scattered homes than cottage homes?—If you will excuse me, do you make a difference between scattered homes and cottage homes? If you mean by cottage homes those in groups, they are growing, I am glad to say. Some of the older unions still have the scattered homes.

7874. I mean by scattered homes where a number of cottages are taken by the guardians. It is a scattered arrangement, and not one institution?—Of scattered homes we have not many; cottage homes are growing, I am happy to say.

Poor Law Children educated in Public Elementary Schools.

7875. Are practically all the children in your district sent out to elementary schools where the guardians have not a separate institution for them?—They are sent out to the public elementary schools.

7876. So that they are not educated in the workhouse itself?—That is a point. There are the little ones between three and five. It is a very important matter, I do not pretend to understand it legally, but, as you know, five is the lowest age for the school boards.

7877. They do not send them out before five?—I do not think they do, as far as I know. I have heard of isolated cases, but when I have inquired into them, there have been other explanations.

7878. (Mr. Lock.) A question was asked by the chairman about the number of paupers in your district. You have the returns for the counties, have you not, showing what the pauperism is?—Yes.

Mr. James Lowry.

2 April, 1906.

7879. The North Riding is in your district, is not it?—All the North Riding is my district. It is about one-third of Yorkshire.

7880. That stands in the last return of the Local Government Board at 29·8?—At what date is that?

North Riding, high pauperism.

7881. That is on the 1st January, 1905. Cumberland was 24·5, Durham, 24·4. Do you think that the state of things is satisfactory in your district, judging from the rise of pauperism, say, in the last twenty years?—The industrial side is so contingent and dependent on trade disputes. The agricultural side I do consider satisfactory.

Conditions in Middlesbrough.

7882. Take a town like Middlesbrough, for instance. There you have an increase of population, I think I am right in saying, of about 45 per cent. in the last twenty years?—Yes; on account of the steel works.

7883. You have a rise in pauperism much in excess of that percentage. Is there anything to account of that in the character of the incoming population?—They are the working classes to a very large extent, owing to the industry. The steel works have been rapidly developed there, and have employed a much larger amount of labour.

7884. It is a serious state of things there, because as the population is increasing, pauperism is going up, and going up probably at a greater rate?—I have a note of that; it is so.

7885. What is the constitution of the Board at Middlesbrough; is it a strong board?—I consider it such: they are very considerate and deserving, and all that sort of thing, and most careful in administration. It is a comparatively new town, and the industries being founded are not old industries.

Conditions in Newcastle-on-Tyne and elsewhere.

7886. If we take another place in Northumberland, say Newcastle-on-Tyne, which is also a large urban centre, there you have again an increase of pauperism out of proportion to the increase of population. What would specially account for that?—The docks and the shipping are the main complaint in Newcastle.

7887. Latterly the ship-building has been good, has not it?—No; not good as far as the employment of labour is concerned.

7888. Are you, or is anybody, considering what should be done in view of that state of things at an important centre like Newcastle?—I am not aware of any absolute consideration. The Corporation itself has held meetings.

7889. Have they come to any conclusion?—No, they have not. They adjourned last time and said they would wait a bit longer and get some further evidence. I have seen no distinct decision taken of any sort or kind.

7890. With regard to another point which the chairman also referred to, the increase of outdoor relief, is it not the fact that, taking Michaelmas, 1904, and Michaelmas, 1903, there is practically an increase all along the line in both outdoor and indoor relief? For instance, with regard to in-maintenance, at page 467 of the last Local Government Report, the North Riding shows no increase in in-maintenance, but a decrease of 2·7, but it shows an increase of 2·2 in outdoor relief; Durham shows an increase of 2·2 in in-maintenance and 9·3 in outdoor relief, which is marked; and Northumberland, which is, of course, to a certain extent controlled by a few large towns, shows an increase of 7·3 in in-maintenance and 6·4 in out-maintenance, showing, apparently, that in both in and out there has been an increase in relief?—That is so as far as Northumberland is concerned.

7891. Durham stands very much in the same boat?—That would be much more agricultural than industrial.

7892. The increase in indoor relief is 2·2 and the outdoor relief 9·3, so that it would seem on the face of the figures that the larger towns are certainly in a worse position from the point of view of pauperism than they were 20 years ago?—That is so. That has been my own experience for years past.

7893. Have the local authorities in Poor Law Conference considered these faults?—They have considered them by name, but I am not aware of any practical results as the result of their consideration. In Newcastle quite recently they held meetings and appealed for funds, apart altogether from parochial matters, and they obtained considerable sums, but they were gone in two or three weeks.

7894. There is no question of policy arising from those meetings as to the way of administering the Poor Law itself?—No; no question of policy at all.

Infrequency of Cross Visitors.

7895. In Newcastle have they a cross visitor for outdoor relief?—They have not that I am aware of. I am very glad you have mentioned that point; that is a thing I have thought of for a considerable time. Whenever I have mentioned it to boards of guardians I have only been met with a laugh, and I have been told that it would increase the cost. When I was at Liverpool we went into the matter, and I think that the administration there is about as good as it could possibly be. They have not cross visitors in the vast majority of places.

7896. Is it a large board at Newcastle? What is the number of members?—I should think it would be nearly thirty. I do not know the exact number.

7897. Do they act through relief committees?—Yes; the machinery is right enough.

7898. In Middlesbrough have they a cross visitor?—No, not that I know of.

Economical results of Cross Visitors.

7899. Generally speaking, in these towns that are in your district have they cross visitors?—They have no. That is the reason I named it. I have been accustomed to it; we did things in Liverpool differently to what they do them elsewhere, for we had not only a cross visitor, but a superintendent registrar in addition, and we found that they more than saved their salaries. I only wish that principle was extended in large places.

Unimportance of Special Act and Orders in District.

7900. When you refer to the special Acts or Orders in Section 12 of your memorandum, do those special Orders refer to anything of great importance?—No nothing at all of any particular leading character.

7901. There is one mentioned, for instance, with regard to Middlesbrough, 1875. What is that? You say that district was under a special Order. I ask the question because Middlesbrough does not come out very well from the point of view of pauperism?—There is a little mistake in that; there are four unions under special Orders, but there are five printed in the list.

Trades employing women.

7902. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) Can you tell me whether there is much women's work in your district? Are there any special trades?—No, there is not a great deal in connection with women. At some of the places there is rope and string making, but there is no large industry for women.

7903. Do the women work in the mines at all?—No.

7904. At the pit-mouth?—No; very few. Some work at screening, I think it is termed. I do not pretend to understand it practically, but it is only a comparatively few. They are on the bank at the top, screening.

7905. Is that paid for pretty well?—I do not think it is. It is hard work and dirty work, and I do not think it is as well paid as it might be.

Out-relief to women.

7906. Do you think there is much out-relief given to women?—Yes, in a number of unions there is a good amount of out-relief given to women.

7907. Would that be only to old women?—Principally old women and widows.

7908. Do they give relief to widows in preference to taking their children into the schools?—It has been done, but I would not for a moment say that there is any general likelihood or disposition to do so. They try to deal with each case on its merits.

7909. On the whole you think they generally take hildren in preference to giving relief?—I would not like o express an opinion on that; I would say the reverse.

7910. Is there any scale of relief in any of your unions?—Yes.

Scale of relief for children.

7911. What would be the scale of relief?—1s. 6d., 2s., and 2s. 6d.

7912. For each child?—Yes. 1s. 6d. usually. There is 2s. and 2s. 6d. occasionally when there are any special circumstances.

7913. I suppose there are very few textile industries in your district ?—Very few, if any at all.

Mine officials as Guardians.

7914. I should like to press the question a little about the guardians in connection with the mines. You say that many of them call themselves connected with the mines. Would they be superintendents ?—They are officers and different officials, superintendents and gangers who have certain numbers of men under them in different capacities. They are officers, they are not miners, and they would resent it at once if you thought so or said so.

7915. They sit on the boards of guardians ?—Some do on some of the boards. They are practical men who understand mining, so that when a question arises they can discuss it and debate it.

7916. They would be useful members ?—Very useful. In fact, when we want particular information on a particular matter we ask them specially. They are not miners in the ordinary sense of working for so much a shift or so much per hour.

7917. Do the mine owners take any interest in the Poor Law administration ?—Not by any means, I am sorry to say; I wish it was the reverse.

Voluntary cottage-homes for the aged at Durham, and their effect on out-relief.

7918. I believe that round Durham the miners have established a system of cottage homes for their own aged poor. Can you tell us anything about that ?—I am aware of the fact that they do so, but my experience is that for some reason or other it is difficult to get information as to what they are doing. They do not like us; I admit that, though they give us left-handed compliments. They have those homes, I am glad to say, and I see them frequently. Those homes are let, on some conditions, to miners. They seem to be well kept and paid for and to be in good condition; but get particulars from them of absolute prices and so on you cannot.

7919. Do you think that provision for their own old people is likely to grow ?—I sincerely hope it will grow; I see no reason why it should not grow. The wages are good while the men are at work, and they ought to grow most certainly. The miners have taken this up, perhaps most fully, and there ought to be many homes of that nature.

7920. Do you think where these homes exist that the out-relief is less considerable ?—In some places it is. When the good man is taken away, the sooner the house is empty the better; that is the pleasantest way of putting it. I am sorry to say that, but it is so, it is no use disguising it; they want the homes for the used up miners.

7921. You mean that his widow, for instance, would come on the Poor Law ?—That is the end of it; she gets to know sooner or later. It is uncomfortable, and a removal, either temporary or permanent, would be acceptable, and the plain English of it is that she is got out by some means or other and the house is given to a man who is still living and who may have his wife and perhaps one or two children with him, but the families by that time are generally grown up and doing for themselves and are away.

Absence of case-paper system.

7922. Are there any unions in your district where case papers are used ?—I do not think there is a single union.

Relief Stations and payment of relief to deputies.

7923. In the country districts do you work by pay-stations ?—They do in some, but there is no regular work. I have asked that very question several times over, and the relieving officers represent that they march the whole place, which I doubt sometimes very much.

7924. Some of these country districts would be very large ?—Very large and very extended. I would rather see them go to the house myself, or see them come out to pay-stations; then I could believe it; but there is one most objectionable practice, and I do wish some means could be taken to stop it; that is, where a relieving officer will pay a number. It is a great mistake, in my judgment. No. 1 lives so and so, No. 2 lives so and so, and rather than walk three or four miles up a mountain or up a hill or out of his way from his next work, he will give one person several reliefs, which is a very great mistake.

7925. You think it does not always get to the right people ?—I am perfectly certain it does not always and, when it does get to the right people, I have frequently heard of a commission being charged.

7926. Have you sufficient provision for outdoor nursing for outdoor paupers ?—Are we talking about the same thing ? Do you mean compulsory or voluntary ?

Nursing of out-door poor

7927. Have you your own nurses, or do you use voluntary agencies to supply them ?—The large houses, I am happy to say, have their own nurses, and are having them in increasing numbers, but the small houses have not. They engage a nurse sometimes, one that resides in the district, and send her out to different places.

7928. Does that not work well, do you think ?—I have no great objection to it; I would rather see that the smallest houses should have one nurse. The difficulty is, if you send that nurse out.

7929. You mean that the large houses have their resident nurses ?—They have.

7930. Do they send them to the outdoor cases ?—They do sometimes.

7931. In country districts, is there any means of nursing the outdoor poor ?—Very, very little. Very frequently, if they can manage it, they have a matron who has been a nurse in her earlier days, which is an excellent plan, because she knows exactly what to do, and how to go about it.

7932. She would go into the district ?—I have known them do that; or she would let the nurse go, and take the nurse's place, a most thoughtful and kindly act; but, of course, they know that is not their duty, and they do not care for it.

Subscriptions by Guardians to nursing associations.

7933. (Dr. Downes.) Do not the guardians subscribe to nursing associations ?—They do extensively.

7934. Do the country guardians do so ?—It is not so pronounced as in the case of the town guardians.

7935. Are there district nurses in the country villages ?—There is a district nurse in almost every village, and the question is: who is she kept up by; is she kept up by the guardians, or is she kept up by the church or the religious bodies ? The best I can answer is that she is kept up by both.

7936. The guardians subscribe ?—They do.

Subscriptions to, and use of, voluntary hospitals by Guardians.

7937. Do they subscribe to the hospitals in your district ?—Yes, extensively.

7938. How are cases of operative surgery dealt with ?—They are dealt with on much the same lines; they will subscribe to hospitals that deal with both medical and surgical cases. I wish there was a hard and fast proportion. Some will have many more applicants than another, and then they will write and say they propose paying £10; £5 may have been the previous amount, and they will increase it to £10. Why ? Because there have been two or three surgical cases, which is just the point you are at. As a means of guiding the guardians I would very much like to see a fixed sum voted as a subscription, either according to the number of inmates or the different kinds of treatment.

7939. Has there been difficulty in removing cases for operative treatment ?—Very, very seldom. We are very fortunate; there are no great distances in the whole of my district, and we are particularly fortunate, because there are trains everywhere.

7940. You spoke of the homes for aged that the miners had provided. Have they done anything in the direction of providing for their sick ?—They have not; neither for the sick, nor children. Children, of course, are out of the question altogether.

Separation of children and adults in workhouse.

7941. Are children of school age sufficiently separated from the adults in your workhouses ?—Do you mean children under five or from five onwards ?

7942. I mean of school age, over five ?—That is just the very point. School age is three from the workhouse point of view, but school age is five outside.

7943. We will say children over three ?—As far as I could find, they are separated and put in smaller rooms now, but there are no proper teachers, that is what I object to.

7944. Have you many complaints made to you by the people as you go round the workhouses ?—I am happy to say I have not. Being from Liverpool, I made it my business on that very point to try over and over again.

7945. You were Chairman of the Liverpool guardians ?—I was, till I had the honour of being appointed inspector.

Mr. James Lowry.

2 April, 1906.

Classification in Workhouses.

7946. Do you get any complaints as to classification ?—No, they would be more inclined to ask you the meaning of the word than anything else. Classification means a lot, and a lot that will never be carried out until half the workhouses in the country are re-built and re-arranged. I am perfectly certain of it. It could not be done, that is if you were to take to classification as you put it here, plain and distinct.

7947. Have you any difficulty in the classification of imbeciles ?—That is a semi-medical question. There are some they keep in workhouses for months and months and others they scarcely keep for hours before they get them out.

7948. You draw a distinction between one imbecile and another ?—Yes.

7949. Some would not be objectionable to the people ?—Sometimes I have got to ask, when they say : " that is so-and-so," but others I have not to ask, because they soon let you know.

Treatment of lunatics.

7950. Is there any difficulty with regard to lunatics waiting for certification in your workhouses ?—I do not know of any real difficulty. You come across cases, of course, and I do ask the question whether he is waiting but I do not know of any particular harm arising from that at all.

7951. Do you know of cases where they have been unduly retained in the workhouses ?—Not a solitary case. I have known others where the masters have been begging and praying for the hour to come to get them out, when they have no proper accommodation for them.

The problem of diminutive Unions.

7952. (Miss Hill.) Am I right in saying there is one workhouse in your district where there are only seven in-door paupers, and two were there are only nine ?—I hope that is so.

7953. What is done in those cases ? Is there a master and matron and a whole establishment ?—There is a master and matron and an entire parochial staff.

7954. Has any attempt been made to diminish the cost by boarding those paupers in other unions, or amalgamating them ?—I do not know of any. It is a question of average, whether they are large or small. You have got the house, and whether you have ten inmates or twenty is a pure question of average.

7955. It cannot be necessary to have a separate institution for them ?—No, certainly not ; I would have grouped them years ago, if I had had my way, but then there is the question of walking and getting to them.

7956. Attempts have been made and failed ?—I would not like to say attempts have been made, but with regard to my own part of the matter, I saw that very clearly, and in the largest place I ever had to do with I would have altered it years ago, but the alteration of the one creates a grievance in the other that they could not visit and see each other.

Type of Guardians.

7957. (Professor Smart.) You spoke of some boards of guardians being so-so. Might I ask : do you mean that they were interested parties, or merely inefficient ?—They are not interested parties—I would not say that for a moment ; but they do not all take the same view of the Poor Law that a trained mind does.

7958. I was afraid you meant they were interested parties ?—No, I do not make that suggestion for a moment.

7959. You find practical uniformity of policy amongst your various unions ?—I have in my own district very great uniformity.

7960. We are told that the Poor Law is very elastic, that it gives the guardians great latitude of administration ?—I would not like to say it is very elastic. There is a little stretch about it, but you have to try it very hard before you see much of it.

Uniformity of practice produced by scales of relief.

7961. If it is elastic, how do you account for the uniformity of administration in your district ? Is there any means of communication between the districts ?—There is the means of communication of letters between the different clerks ; that is the principal way. The scales, as you know, are fixed. They are followed by routine. That applies in my own district, I am happy to say, very particularly. A departure from that would be a very serious matter, without reason given as regards the rates of relief. That always has been, in my own knowledge, and I presume will be to the end of the chapter, a thing on which you will get no two boards of guardians to agree.

7962. Then a certain amount of uniformity would be due to your own influence as inspector ?—To a large extent.

Sufficiency existing discretion of Guardians.

7963. I see from the list of suggestions received from boards in your district that some boards consider that they have not power enough. I see Sunderland asks that the discretion of the guardians may be increased. Scarborough asks that relief should be not given to persons refusing the offer of the workhouse. Carlisle suggests that relief should be given to other than the destitute. South Shields says that out-relief should be further extended. Hartlepool suggests that it should be further restricted or altogether abolished. Stokesley seeks power to offer work for wages to the unemployed. In view of such recommendations, do you think it would be wise to give guardians more discretionary power ?—I do not think it would. You have raised a lot of important questions that have agitated us for years and years, and it would be, I am afraid, on the whole, dangerous to give an isolated body of guardians power to do as they liked without proper and sufficient and absolute control.

Treatment aged couple at South Shields.

7964. You mentioned one interesting thing, that in South Shields an experiment has been made in lodging aged couples together in cottages in the workhouse grounds. Has that been a success ?—I should think it was a success, but it is very plain, as plain as it can be, and the old people live together ; but beyond that I see no advantage.

Disinclination of aged couples to live together.

7965. We are very often told that the majority of such aged couples do not wish to live together ?—I am sorry to say I have heard that myself. I could not reconcile it for a moment.

7966. You could not reconcile it ?—I could not. I argued it with them and talked it over many times.

7967. You find them rather irreconcilable ?—Yes, I am sorry to say, notwithstanding they are man and wife.

7968. Is it incompatibility of temper ?—I presume that it is a good deal, but another matter is : the men, from social habits and instincts, and all the rest of it, would be rather associated with their own class and their own numbers, and they leave their good ladies to do the same thing, I presume. There is no use in attempting to hide or disguise it. I have asked the question time out of memory, for the matter of that, and the answer is ' No," is it practically one and universal, that they would rather be with them all.

7969. You know that the separation of old couples is made a grievance outside ?—Yes.

7970. As if it were a cruel thing ?—It is a grievance, but that ceases the moment they get accustomed to the size and arrangement of a ward. That is my experience of them.

Conditions Alston, Belford, Brampton, and Rothbury Union.

7971. (Mr. Bentham.) I notice that of the three unions in your district which are highest in pauperism, two are rural ; one is Brampton and the other is Alston ; while two of the lowest, Belford and Rothbury, are rural. How do you account for that very great difference between the rates of pauperism in unions which are similar ?—That raises several other questions. For instance, Brampton is called a rural union, but it is the centre of a very large industry, and has quite a number of small towns in it. The people there are not farmers at all ; and to the Brampton centre they find their way ultimately. That is as far as Brampton is concerned. Alston, the northern one, is a purely agricultural place. It is miles and miles away in the country, and there is no crowd or number of people live near there. I should think it is purely agricultural. And then there is the season. I have talked to the labourers many times to see if I could get an intelligent answer of any kind to the question you are putting to me, and the first thing they go for is the machinery ; they denounce that up-hill and down-dale. Modern agricultural machinery does the work in a third of the time and takes two-thirds out of their hands. That is the only thing like an intelligent answer I have got.

7972. Do you think the large number of aged people has anything to do with it ?—If you went into minute particulars, it has to do with it; it is a growing factor, a constantly growing factor; they will not die to please the authorities, and they have to be kept and maintained in the meantime.

7973. All the four are very nearly alike in that respect. Rothbury, the lowest, has 103 per thousand over sixty years of age?—That is so.

7974. Brampton has 108?—Yes, that is so.

7975. Apparently old-age does not account for the difference in pauperism, they are really alike in that respect?—Rothbury will be worth studying for a while, because they have just moved from the old tumble-down hole into a brand new workhouse.

Conditions in Middlesbrough.

7976. Middlesbrough has the highest number, I think?—It has, unfortunately.

7977. Is there anything peculiar in Middlesbrough with regard to the climate? Is not it built on a swamp, or something of that kind?—It is said to have been, at some time or other. As regards the population of Middlesbrough, there are no very well-to-do people there. I asked that very question myself. I am astounded with the number of paupers and the cost of them. I have gone into the question of the population, and there are none of the so-called aristocracy who live in Middlesbrough. Their money is there, their business and influence is there, so far as the work of the day is concerned, but they do not live there, they live outside the boundary.

7978. Is there not a large amount of sickness in Middlesborough?—That may come from the building of the town on the swamp, as you say.

7979. What is the prevailing illness there?—I do not know that there is any one prevailing illness, but throat and chest complaints—they will be more liable to them.

7980. Is not disease of the chest very prevalent at Middlesbrough?—I believe it is, but I am not a medical man. I have noticed it, and I hear enough of it, and I ask the ordinary questions; but, of course, I offer no opinion.

7981. I wondered if that had anything to do with it, if that is not an explanation, have you any?—No, except the ordinary vicissitudes of trade. There are two or three very large places yonder, and when they are in good employ they will keep the population, but when there is a large number of people who are in receipt of relief. If change takes place—there is one just now, but I hope it is over—it is bound to have an effect. When you throw 1,000 or 2,000 people idle, unfortunately those people have nothing to fall back on. If they saved when work was good, they would have something to fall back on, but they do not, and at the end of the first week they are on their beam-ends.

7982. Is the trade union or friendly society movement very strong in Middlesbrough?—It is said to be, and I quite believe it.

7983. Is there any more disturbance in trade between employer and employed in Middlesbrough than there is in Morpeth or Sunderland?—Not that I know of. If I may diverge for a moment, these are questions I have argued with these people till I am tired. In the very place where most of them are, they say there is not a pound to the good, but if they want any trade or business they can find it in hundreds, and more than that at times; but when you come to discussing what we are talking of now, the keeping of these poor people, they say: "No, they must go to the workhouse." I have told them pretty plainly what I thought of it, many a time.

Disinclination of relatives to maintain relatives.

7984. Do you think the family ties are very weak?—I should not like to say that, but they are not so strong as in some other departments.

7985. You are giving that really as a reason, are you not, that people very readily allow their relations to accept relief, rather than maintain them themselves?—If you take it in that light, they do not provide the funds which they ought to do and could well afford to do if they were properly managed. They do not do that—no; it is the Poor Law. The Poor Law is too ready.

7986. They rely on the Poor Law to help them out of their difficulties?—In my own time I have noticed that. Many years ago it would have been taken as an insult, but to-day the insult has gone.

7987. (Mrs. Webb.) What is the nature of the provisions of these special orders? I see you refer to five unions which are under special orders; how do the provisions of those special orders differ from the ordinary?—If you notice, the dates of those unions are all fairly recent, I think 1847 or 1850 is the oldest.

Nature and origin of Special Orders in the District.

7988. That is the date of the order?—Yes.

7989. That is not the date of the union?—That is the date when the order came into force in the union.

7990. What sort of orders are they? Take the first, what does it relate to?—There are orders for different things, but the meaning of them I have never yet been able to understand, and I cannot grasp what they were granted for. If you have a special order for a special place you would naturally think there were special circumstances, but when I have gone into them to get to know what the circumstances were I have failed up to date.

7991. It is not because there was some local Act?—There has been some local bother and one or two things have got confused, and the different authorities would insist on their own way of working, so an order was given apparently.

7992. That was to permit it?—Yes, that is the only intelligent reason I can find.

7993. It was to permit some divergence?—Yes, from the strict lines.

7994. How did you find out there were special orders?—I have been Chairman of the Liverpool Select Vestry, which I suppose has the largest workhouse in existence, and one ought to know these things now and again.

7995. Middlesbrough is a union which could not have had a local Act, because it is a recently formed union, more or less?—Yes, comparatively recent.

7996. Do you happen to know the provisions of that special order of 1875?—No, I do not; I know the order, and I know that is the proper date, but I do not know what the provisions of the particular order were for.

7997. How do you know there are not special orders in other unions in your district; have you enquired?—Yes, I have asked the question.

7998. You say you were Chairman of the Select Vestry?—I have had that honour, and resigned the chairmanship to take the inspectorship.

7999. For how long were you chairman?—Only for twelve months; that is our rule.

8000. Were you a member of the Liverpool Board of Guardians?—For some years.

8001. How many years?—Either four or five, and I was chairman the last one.

8002. Did you give up the whole of your time to the work of the Select Vestry?—No.

8003. You were in business?—I was a member of the board of guardians and as such I was elected to be chairman.

8004. The rest of your time was engaged in your own private business?—Yes.

8005. Could you tell me anything about the administration of relief in Newcastle. When I was there about six years ago it was asserted that there was a considerable amount of outdoor relief given before elections for political purposes, does that still obtain?—I do not think anything of that sort exists in fact.

Administration of relief in Newcastle.

8006. Not there?—No.

8007. Have you heard it did exist?—I have heard talk, but talk and facts are different things, especially in connection with politics.

8008. You do not think as a matter of fact that is so?—I do not. I never heard of a case. I have never known of one. If I knew of a case I would take steps to know the meaning of it.

8009. Can you tell me what is the procedure with regard to giving contracts in the various unions? Do they, for instance, open the tenders in full board and decide straight away as to whether a contract should be given to one person or another?—Different unions differ. Sometimes we elected three or four men whom we could trust, and when all the contracts were given to them they made the selections, and re-submitted them to the board;

Diversity of Guardians' practice in dealing with contracts.

Mr. James Lowry.

2 April, 1906.

but it was open to any member of the board to ask for any particular contract and to ask the reason why that was not included—absolute freedom, but do not mistake me, the procedure of the different unions differed. Some do that, some open them in full meeting and there you know on the spot; others do not. In large unions my experience has been that they do as I told you.

8010. They refer them?—Either to a committee or to four or five well-known members in whom they have absolute confidence.

8011. Have you come across the system which is practised in some unions of not giving the names or any particulars of the different tenders which would enable the members of the board of guardians to know who was tendering?—Yes, where they did that on purpose, giving them a letter or a number, certainly; a very wise provision it is sometimes.

8012. Is that usual?—It is not usual, but if you have one or two smart business men who know what they are about on the board they will suggest that and it will be adopted. We did it for years.

8013. You did it at Liverpool?—Yes, many times.

8014. Do you on the whole think that is a good procedure?—I am perfectly certain, I have no doubt whatever.

8015. You are quite sure?—Yes, every tenderer is bound to have one or more friends on the board; they may tell you they do not know this, that, or the other, but they do. As a matter of fact the amount is called out, and unless a person is sitting there and has a note of the amount or knows it and says: "That is so-and-so's amount," they cannot know who is tendering. That is one of the best matters about it, I have seen it done many times and thoroughly agree with it. When there are ten or twelve contracts being submitted that way it is only right and fair they should not know.

8016. You think, human nature being as it is, that there is collusion?—I do.

8017. Unless you take some means of preventing the guardians knowing who actually is tendering?—Yes; you get them all out, and then the chairman will announce which is the lowest; that is a different matter altogether.

8018. Have you known a case in which even the price is withheld so that they should not be able to recognise the tender?—I have, I have frequently taken part in it, and would do it to-morrow if the necessity arose for it.

8019. The name and the price is withheld?—Yes, both withheld, and only the total comprising so many items read out; a very wise and sensible provision where you have business men who are dealing with them; but I do not say that would do in every union, because in some of the smaller places in the country they would not understand it—there would be a row in no time.

8020. It is in the small places in the country where you are more likely to have jobbery?—Yes, but unfortunately my experience has been as I say, and the larger the union the more open and honourable the dealings. That is my undivided opinion.

8021. In order to keep the thing honourable and straight you must disguise the name of the tenderer, you must withhold the particulars?—I believe they either have the name, or the chairman and the clerk together number them, if they like, but it would not be wise to divulge the name of the person when you are reading out the amount.

8022. The long and the short of it is that you do not quite trust the guardians to be quite honest in giving contracts if they actually know who are tendering?—In all these boards, I am sorry to say I must agree with you, they all have their friends, and the friend reports by telegraph or something quicker outisde where the contracts are, and where they have gone, and we do not think it always wise.

8023. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) Is it not likely to be the case in the smaller unions that there is a friend at court?—I have heard that argument, and I must say it is not my experience; I have seen the biggest sets, on the very ground that we are talking of, in the largest unions.

8024. (Mr. Webb.) On the whole, as you suggested just now, the smaller unions are fairer in this respect?—There is more talking together amongst themselves outside; for that reason we withhold the names altogether and put numbers or signs, and we found that to be by far the best rule in the largest unions, in my experience, and we have had some very big things to deal with.

8025. In your experience has an auditor of the Local Government Board ever reported to you that in his opinion there is something suspicious about contracts for you to look into?—I cannot recall a case where such has occurred. Infrequency of communication between Auditors and Inspectors.

8026. You do not have much communication with the auditors?—We have not—we have very little; we should have to go and say who we are, and who they are before there would be any communication.

8027. (Mr. Lansbury.) When you were installed as inspector, did you have any instructions as to your duties?—No. I was chairman of the largest union in the world, and I suppose the friends in London thought I would know the ordinary routine, but I received no definite instructions of any sort or kind. Inspectors' instructions and qualification 8028. You had five years' experience as a guardian, I understand?—I think it is five years.

8029. You were appointed to do just what you thought best in the way of inspecting?—I had the experience of the men who came yonder in the first place. I saw them at Brownlow Hill. If you read up what you are going to do, you can get plenty of instruction from the published books, and there is your general knowledge of the Poor Law as a guardian—you are supposed to know what you are to ask, and to get the information that you require; but there is no examination that I know of—at least, I went through none.

8030. And there were no instructions given you as to what your duties were?—No written or printed instructions.

8031. What is the type of guardian in your district? You told us they were so-so. Are they manufacturers?—I do not know that the word "so-so" would apply in the case of numbers of guardians; there are some so-so guardians amongst them, I admit readily. Type of Guardians.

8032. Do you mind telling us what is the composition of the boards? What are they made up of—workmen?—Retired farmers; here and there a retired tradesman—there is such a thing even yet—and the majority of them are business men.

8033. The majority are business men?—Yes, business men and men who were engaged in business, as far as I know.

8034. It is these business men and retired people that you would not trust to go through the contracts?—No, I do not say that; those are the men who ought to be trusted more, who have no interest in the matter, good, bad, or indifferent. Guardians' procedure as to contracts.

8035. Nobody has any interest in it which is a corrupt interest. I understood just now the boards of guardians ought not to be trusted with opening the tenders, because some would be doing something they ought not to do with regard to them?—If you took that impression from what I said, that is wrong. We take the tenders as tenders, and we hand them all over to a sub-committee of three or four practical, experienced men. Then I purposely stated that any individual member of the guardians has a perfect right to ask any question bearing on them.

8036. In the case of the committee that you would hand these tenders to, would they know who the people were who were tendering?—Certainly they would, and that is the reason why they are careful to appoint men who they think not only know their business, but know how to handle it in every particular.

8037. The answer you gave just now to Mrs. Webb conveyed to me, at any rate, the impression that, in your judgment, boards of guardians were not to be trusted to open tenders and accept them or reject them if they knew the names of the people tendering?—I did not mean to convey any element of suspicion of any sort or kind. In a large board of guardians you may have four or five men—one is a grocer, another is a provision dealer, and so forth—practical men, who are going to deal with these particular contracts, and you take and hand those matters over to those men, and they go through them with business eyes, and a knowledge of what they are dealing in, and the articles they want, and they recommend so and so. All the tenders are there, and any member of the vestry or board of guardians can ask any question he likes and see any person's tender.

8038. That is simply to ensure efficiency ?—Yes.

8039. Not to prevent jobbery ?—We think we have secured efficiency by getting both the right men and the right stuff.

8040. The things you have been recommending here with reference to tenders, you only recommend because you think by those means you get better stuff ? —More reliable goods.

8041. Do you advocate it to prevent jobbery on the part of the guardians ?—I do not think it will prevent jobbery on the part of the guardians.

8042. Do you think there is jobbery amongst the guardians ?—No, my experience with reference to that is practically nil ; the orders were straightforward and right in every particular.

8043. It is because they are such a fine body of men, tradespeople and retired tradespeople, that they are above suspicion: they were selected from trade ?—The electors had the good sense to return them, and they represent the particular trade they belong to.

Absence of corruption among Guardians.

8044. You are speaking of the general body of guardians in your district. I am not bothering my head about Liverpool. What I want to get from you is, whether, in your judgment, those guardians are guardians who, if they have got something to give away, would be liable to look after their pals ?—The general body of guardians in the district I have the honour to be inspector over are, I believe, upright, honourable men, the vast majority of them, undoubtedly.

8045. Are there any public charities in Newcastle or Middlesbrough, that you know of ?—Yes, there are a number of public charities in Newcastle, of course. I presume there are in Middlesbrough as well.

8046. You could not tell us anything about them, I suppose ?—There are the hospitals in Newcastle, apart from the parochial one. There are some other excellent institutions which bear a more general name which are not attached to any one particular thing.

The pauperism of Middlesbrough.

8047. Middlesbrough stands at the head of your list as having the highest percentage of pauperism, does not it ?—It does ; it is 3·4, I see here.

8048. It is true that part of it is built on a swamp ?—Yes.

8049. Have you seen the medical officer's figures with regard to the death-rate amongst children there ?—I cannot say that I have. Mr. James Lowry. 2 April, 1906.

8050. Have you looked at these figures as all—that there are only forty-nine persons per 1000 of the population who are over sixty years of age ; it is very low on the table indeed ; and also that only 33 per cent. of the people who are getting relief are over sixty years of age. Have you noticed that ?—I had not until you drew my attention to it.

8051. That means that 67 per cent. of the relief must go to people who are able-bodied or children. I want to ask you whether the reason for the high percentage is the fact that a good lot of that would be for illness and for widows and their children, and also for accidents ?—Yes.

8052. Have you any return of accidents in that district ? —None.

8053. Have you made inquiries about it at all ?—No, only general conversation. You referred just now to widows ; they are widows of those who unfortunately have suffered from local fatalities, whether it is weather, climate, or what not ; they are left, while the relief had been given for a longer or shorter period to their late husbands.

8054. Have you been through Middlesbrough workhouse lately ?—Many times.

8055. Were you struck with the number of cripples there are there ?—I cannot say I have been.

8056. You have not taken any special notice of it ?—No.

Nature of Special Orders in the district.

8057. (Sir Samuel Provis.) With regard to the special orders in force in Middlesbrough, have you had occasion to look at them ?—No.

8058. Are you aware that they are, in fact, the ordinary orders, and they only happen to be issued at different dates to those particular places ?—I have thought that several times, but I could not get an intelligent answer like you have given me this moment.

8059. Do you remember when the Middlesbrough Union was formed ?—I think so.

8060. Can you remember the date ?—I do not remember the date.

8061. Was not it a modern union ?—I look upon it as the most modern union I have got in point of time.

8062. Consequently the orders which were issued generally were not in force there, and had to be put in force from the formation of the union ?—By special order.

8063. There is no peculiarity about them except that ? —I have never been able to find out that there is.

Mr. Nicholas Herbert, called ; and Examined.

8064. (Chairman.) You are now Local Government Board Inspector for the No. 3 district ?—I am. Mr. Nicholas Herbert. 2 April, 1903.

Extent of district.

8065. Which is No. 3 district ?—It comprises the union counties of Warwickshire, Berkshire, Oxfordshire, Buckinghamshire, part of Surrey, and part of Worcestershire.

8066. Previous to your appointment to that district, you were inspector of district No, 10, the North Midland district ?—Yes.

8067. You had five years experience there ?—Yes.

Effect of Mr. Chaplin's Circular.

8068. We will accept your memorandum as your evidence in chief. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XVII. (A).) There are one or two questions I should like to put to you upon it. In paragraph 7 you refer to the circular letter of August 4th, 1900, and you think that that letter had some effect as regards an increase of outdoor relief. Did the number of recipients of outdoor relief increase, or was it merely that the amount was increased ?—I think the number increased.

8069. The guardians interpreted the order as regards numbers as well as adequacy ?—Yes, they mistook the order. They did not read it carefully. I have heard several guardians say the Local Government Board have now come to the conclusion that outdoor relief should be given more freely.

Increased death-rate in Workhouses and causes.

8070. In paragraph 10 you refer to the percentages of deaths in the workhouses which show a considerable increase, and in paragraph 87 there is a similar table which also shows a considerable increase in the percentage of deaths. To what do you attribute this ? Is it that a larger number of persons who are seriously ill now go to infirmaries ; if so, do they include a class that previously had not recourse to infirmaries ?—I think so ; they are now looking upon Poor Law infirmaries as State hospitals rather than workhouses; therefore they are now more ready to come into the infirmaries than formerly, and that practice is growing, I think.

Increased numbers of aged and sick paupers in Workhouses.

8071. The proportion of old people in the workhouses has increased, I think, of recent years ?—Yes, but it is principally amongst the aged sick and the sick that require skilled nursing, the bedridden, that the numbers coming into the workhouse are increasing.

8072. The inducement of better treatment and better accommodation has increased the number of occupants ?—That is so.

Pauperism in Lincolnshire and Leicester.

8073. In paragraph 70 you point out that in Lincolnshire there has been a slight decrease in pauperism, but I see in paragraph 25, notwithstanding the decrease, it is still the highest with the exception of Leicester ?—That is so.

8074. The improvement is really rather a reduction in an abnormally high rate ?—That is so.

Nottingham system of relief and its results.

8075. I will come to some very interesting facts which you record in connection with the administration of relief in Nottingham. In paragraph 46 you say that in October 1901 the Poor Law guardians eventually adopted the new system which is contained in the resolutions you there enumerate. The operation of the scheme under those resolutions seems to have been very satisfactory?—I think it has been very satisfactory.

Mr. Nicholas Herbert.

2 April, 1906.

8076. It has succeeded in its objects; it has obtained more uniformity of treatment, it has secured to the deserving poor the consideration and relief that their interests require, and it has detected impostors?—That is so.

8077. I notice that the guardians work in co-operation with the Town Council and the Charity Organisation Society?—That was when there was some distress during the winter of 1904 and 1905 caused by the lack of employment in the town through no special works being carried out.

8078. Is the accord which exists in Nottingham among these three bodies exceptional, or does it exist in every town?—It is exceptional.

8079. It has been very satisfactory?—Very satisfactory indeed.

Effect of Workhouse test.

8080. Coming to paragraph 56, you there give the figures of those who were refused outdoor relief and were given workhouse orders. Out of 557 only sixteen accepted indoor relief?—That is so.

8081. And then it appears further on that, of the seven men who accepted, two remained in the workhouse only two days, two remained a week, one remained twelve days and one a month?—That is so.

8082. Was the result of this analysis a great surprise to you?—No. I had always been under that impression, and I was very pleased to see that the superintendent relieving officer, who takes an extreme interest in his work, was able to give such figures as to prove what is generally considered to be the case by most of those who have studied poor law questions.

8083. Simultaneously with the adoption of these rules, did the guardians increase the number of relieving officers?—No, but they appointed a superintendent relieving officer.

8084. On the other side, according to paragraph 61, the guardians were enabled to increase the amount of outdoor relief in certain deserving cases?—That is so; they took off a great number of those who were receiving 2s. a week, which had been given more as pocket money than as relief, and increased the amount of relief in other cases.

8085. There then follows a number of interesting cases reported upon by the relieving officer where persons in possession of means, or making an improper use of their means, were detected?—That is so.

8086. The change has been satisfactory, and is continuing to bear good fruit?—I think so.

Out-relief policy at Leicester.

8087. We will now come to Leicester. In Leicester there was an election in 1901, and a good many new members were appointed who were in favour of giving outdoor relief more generously than before. Has there been a subsequent election?—There was one in 1904.

8088. Did the same idea prevail at that election?—I think so.

8089. There has been a considerable increase in the amount of relief, both indoor and outdoor?—That is so, but I may say that Mr. Walsh has promised to give all evidence with regard to Leicester, so I have not looked up the papers before coming here.

8090. In paragraph 19 you will observe that you state: "As a large proportion of the inhabitants are employed in these trades in this county, it would be expected that pauperism would be less than in counties where the heads of the families are, as a rule, the only wage earners." There have been considerable alterations and changes, have there not, in the boot-making trade?—That is so; quicker moving machinery has been introduced; but that was several years ago.

8091. You do not think this rise in pauperism was due to any particular movement in the boot trade?—A certain amount of it was, but not the whole of the great rise which has taken place since 1901.

8092. It is rather outside your province; but could you tell us whether the introduction of machinery has increased or diminished the amount of employment in Leicester?—That I cannot give, but probably Mr. Kemp, the late chairman of the board of guardians, would be able to give you more definite information with regard to those points than I could.

8093. How long has the movement been going on?—It was there before I was appointed as Inspector to the district.

8094. I suppose it has continued during the whole of your period of office?—It has.

Alleged causes of pauperism.

8095. Going back for a moment to paragraph 53, you state there the alleged causes of applications. I rather want to know what some of the items mean. "Immorality:" does that mean a woman who was about to be confined?—No, those cases should be under the heading "effects of immorality," but these are taken from the superintendent relieving officers' report. These cases ought to be really put up under the first heading.

8096. Of "sickness"?—Yes.

8097. Then "criminality" is the next one?—With regard to criminality, I was speaking to the superintendent relieving officer and asked him what he meant by this term. It is principally the wives who apply for relief for themselves and their children while their husbands are in prison, or men who have just come out of prison, and require relief for a fortnight or so before they get work.

8098. It is rather misleading apparently, or at least it is not very intelligible?—I have put down the figures from the superintendent relieving officer's report.

8099. "Illegitimacy," I assume, means illegitimate children who have no parents to whom they can legally appeal for support?—That is so.

8100. In paragraph 84 you show the percentage of increase of population, and in the next column the increase or decrease of pauperism. There is a very remarkable increase of pauperism in Grimsby?—That is so.

Conditions in Grimsby Union.

8101. How do you account for that?—Grimsby is practically a new union. Formerly it was part of the Caistor Union, and we have a new set of guardians there, who have given relief rather generously; certainly more generously than the old Caistor Board of Guardians did.

8102. What is the character of the district which has been added to Grimsby. Is it agricultural?—Grimsby has been taken out of the Caistor Union. Formerly the Caistor Union included Grimsby, and they have taken out the urban part, and a small part of the rural and made it into a separate union.

8103. There is a large increase in population, you see?—Yes, there is a very large increase in population.

8104. There is also a large increase in the population of Mansfield. The evidence we have had before us goes to show that where there is a large increase of population it is generally attended by a temporary reduction in the percentage of pauperism, but these figures go in the other direction?—Only in the case of Grimsby.

8105. Grimsby is, I suppose, a one trade place; it is only fish?—It is also a holiday resort, because Cleethorpes is part of Grimsby.

8106. What is Cleethorpes?—It is a seaside town adjoining Grimsby. No doubt part of the increase at Grimsby was caused by the dock strike which took place some four years back, when great sympathy was shown for the poor and they have not made the reduction again. The increase is also due to relieving officers having some 700 cases on their lists and therefore they cannot go into them thoroughly, and are unable to give the care and attention which is necessary.

Results of appointment of Superintendent Relieving Officer and rota Relief Committees at Nottingham.

8107. I see you revert to Nottingham as a union which might be taken as a specimen of Poor Law administration?—They practically carry out my ideal of what the administration of a Poor Law union should be.

8108. You attribute a very large amount of the success of the new administration to the appointment of the superintendent relieving officer?—That is the first thing; there is also the difference in the administration by relief committees.

8109. Which are rotatory?—Yes.

Increase of male paupers and causes.

8110. In your 102nd paragraph you notice the change during the last thirty years in the various proportions of the men, women and children who are receiving Poor Law relief. The number of men has considerably increased, the number of children has decreased, and the percentage of women has remained almost stationary. To what do you attribute the large increase in the number of men. You state they cannot obtain employment. Are mne turned adrift now at an earlier age than they were a few years back?—I think so. They come upon the Poor Law at a much earlier age than formerly.

8111. Are you satisfied they do come on earlier?—I am fully satisfied there is a much younger class of men getting into the workhouses than formerly.

8112. Have you any figures to show that?—I have no figures to show that.

8113. That is the result of your personal observation?—Yes.

Effect of Workmen's Compensation Act.

8114. Following that up a little, it has been alleged that the Workmen's Compensation Act has acted in that direction. Have you ever heard that allegation?—I have frequently heard it, but I have not come across cases to prove it.

8115. Individual cases?—No individual cases to prove such was the case. I have only heard it stated that such is the case.

8116. When you have asked men who are in the workhouse, they have not alleged that as a reason of their inability to get work?—No, I know of no case, but the men have frequently told me that it is useless for men over 50 to apply for work. With regard to the condition of those men in the workhouse, the superintendent relieving officer got out some figures showing the condition of 100 unselected cases, and he found that 63 per cent. of those men were single, only four were married and living with their wives, thirty-three were widowers or separated, so that a very large proportion of them are single—about two-thirds.

Condition as to marriage of workhouse inmates in Nottingham.

8117. What union was this?—In Nottingham workhouse. Two-thirds of them were single and only four were living with their wives. It appears to me that if these men had had some encouragement to seek work, someone to encourage them to go on, probably they would not have come upon the Poor Law, but having only themselves to look after, they simply drift down into the workhouse and make no effort to get out of it, and in a loosely administered workhouse, or a workhouse where the work is not sufficient, or not so irksome or tedious as it is outside, there is a tendency for such cases to remain in the workhouses.

Former occupations of paupers at Nottingham.

8118. What were these men: mostly unskilled labourers?—The occupation of those were not noted, but I can give you the occupations of the 2493 new applications during 1903 in Nottingham. 600 were labourers, 214 called themselves hawkers, 152 building trades, 117 lace, 108 hosiery, 59 were miners, 37 porters, 37 engineering trades, 22 metal workers, 21 clerks, 18 clothing workers, 18 wood workers, 17 carters and cabmen, 14 leather trades, 9 dyeing trade, beer 8, warehousemen 8, cycle 2, miscellaneous 76, professionals: singers, musicians, etc., 19. That is the men. Of the women 318 were lace workers, 181 charwomen, 264 domestic servants, 46 hosiery workers, 36 clothing, 43 hawkers, 11 were laundry workers, no trade 6, tobacco workers 5, cycle 1, French polishers 3, miscellaneous 14, singers, musicians, etc., 9. So that more than one-third of the men were general labourers at Nottingham.

8119. These were the men who applied for outdoor relief?—The men who applied for relief. The total number of applications was 2,493: there were 1,556 men and 937 women.

8120. (Mr. Booth.) Where do the wives come in?—These are the applications, and I have only the applications. If a man applied for himself only, or if he applied for his wife as well, in both cases it would count as one application.

8121. If he applied for the wife as well, would she be counted in the number?—No.

8122. (Mr. Lansbury.) If she got relief she would?—These are only applications. If I go into the number of persons, then I get different figures altogether.

8123. (Chairman.) How many of those applications were acceded to? How many were granted outdoor relief, and how many were given the option of coming into the workhouse?—557 I think it was. I have given those figures.

8124. The total number was 2,493?—That was the number of applicants.

8125. Were only 557 granted relief?—557 were refused out-relief and workhouse orders given instead.

8126. And the remainder got relief?—Yes.

8127. So that practically three-fourths of the applications after careful investigation were acceded to?—Yes, some of those would be medical orders.

Qualifications and experience of Inspector.

8128. (Mr. Lansbury.) How long have you been appointed?—I was appointed assistant inspector in 1888.

8129. Had you any previous experience?—None, except in the Local Government Board.

8130. What were you in the Local Government Board?—I was private secretary to Mr. Ritchie.

8131. For how many years?—I was his private secretary for two years.

8132. So that you have been connected with the Poor Law now about twenty years, is that it?—Yes.

8133. Did you have any instructions when you were appointed?—As far as I can remember, no; but then I was appointed an assistant inspector.

8134. So that you worked with another inspector; whom did you work with?—Mr. Hedley was then metropolitan inspector, and Dr. Bridges was the inspector for medical purposes.

8135. Did you work with Mr. Lockwood at all?—Yes.

Poor Law administration at Nottingham.

8136. About Nottingham, it seems to me that you look on that as a well-administered union, do you not?—I look upon it as a well-administered union, but the guardians are somewhat generous.

8137. In what way are they generous?—They are ready to grant relief rather freely.

8138. Do you think they grant it to undeserving cases?—No.

8139. Do you think that they make sufficient inquiries into the cases?—Yes, they make full inquiries.

8140. Do they give relief in aid of destitution, or in aid of poverty?—Take the case of a widow with one child and three lodgers, with 27s. a week coming into the house; the guardians would probably give 1s. 6d. or 2s., as they say, to save the woman from any temptation to go wrong.

8141. They have a large proportion of outdoor relief there, have they not?—It is not large, is it?

8142. It is 3,551 against 1,828 is it not?—Those are the figures.

8143. Do you think the guardians there are able to discriminate between deserving and undeserving?—I think so.

8144. Do you think that the work is carried out fairly well there?—Very well indeed.

8145. Does the fact that outdoor relief is given to that extent, increase the total pauperism in the place? What I mean is, do you think it would be possible to abolish all that outdoor relief?—Not all.

Value of strengthening idea of maintenance of parents by children.

8146. You know there are some people who say you ought not to give outdoor relief at all; now, this is a board of guardians which you consider administers the poor law properly, and yet it gives a good deal of outdoor relief; would you consider that that union would be properly administered if the out-relief was abolished, and do you think that it would be to the good of Nottingham if, instead of giving any outdoor relief, they gave it all indoor?—That raises the whole question with regard to outdoor relief. My view with regard to outdoor relief is, that the State should do all it can to make the children support their aged parents. It is good for the old people and it is good for the young people. Take the case of the young people. If a father knows that he can look to his children in his old age to support him, that is an encouragement for a father to do his best for the child. To do his best for the child may cost him money; and I do not see why he should not look upon that as an asset for his old age, as, for instance, if he spent money upon an apprenticeship for his child or upon a few extra years' schooling, so that the child might become a teacher and thus have a very much better chance of getting on in the world. Surely it must be some encouragement to the father, if he knows that the boy is not only morally but legally bound to support him in his old age. Therefore I think you would get more children apprenticed or given extra education.

Mr. Nicholas Herbert.

2 April, 1906.

If the father wishes to turn the boy out and make him into a self-supporting person as quickly as possible, he can do it by making the boy an errand-boy and afterwards becoming a general labourer—which I believe many of them do; but that is the class from which we get pauperism. Again, with the old people, it is very much better, rather than give them 3s. or 4s. a week and letting them live their lonely lives to encourage a daughter or daughter-in-law to take charge of the old people and for the sons to assist. In a well-administered union, cases frequently come before the Poor Law which, upon investigation, prove that the families can support them, that is, they have got sufficient means to support their parents. The old people living with a daughter or a daughter-in-law have a very much better life than if they lived the lonely life which they would do upon this 3s. or 4s. a week. Not only that, but the 3s. or 4s. a week is very often supplemented by contributions in the shape of charity from strangers—not from their own children. Therefore, I think that the State should encourage the children to do the best for their parents. But there are some hard cases—and they say hard cases make bad laws—such cases as old people who have not got any sons to support them, but where such cases apply they want very thorough investigation by the guardians, and the guardians should ascertain what is the best means of relieving them.

8147. You rather put Nottingham, out as a sample?—Only in the forms and method of administration.

8148. Do you think that at Nottingham the guardians do make all these inquiries as to the ability of the children to maintain their parents?—The relieving officers and the superintendent relieving officer do.

8149. If that is carried out, you still have a large number outside?—You have a large number at Nottingham.

Analysis of out-relief at Nottingham.

8150. I want to point out that only 52 per cent. of the relief was given to old people there, and all the remaining 48 per cent. went to people under sixty, according to Mr. Booth's table. You must remember that a considerable number of children and widows would be getting relief at Nottingham?—Yes, a good deal of out-relief is given there to widows and children.

8151. And then there is the relief given in cases of sickness?—Yes.

8152. Do you consider that giving outdoor relief in that union is a good or a bad thing? Does it tend to increase pauperism or to decrease it, or does it tend to keep it normal?—In Nottingham they go medium; they are neither very lavish nor very strict.

8153. It is your type of what a good union ought to be, is it not?—The method of administration is.

8154. That is, they are as careful as they can be?—The method is as good as it can be.

8155. And yet you have this amount of pauperism?—Yes. You have a very large number on that board who are very fond of giving outdoor relief.

Necessity of out-relief owing to absence of charities.

8156. But if it is only given to deserving people, then that is, of course, what they are there for, granting that you should give outdoor relief. According to your experience, would you advocate no outdoor relief?—As I have mentioned, there are some hard cases which are relieved by charity in St. George's-in-the-East, where they have such charities, it need not be necessary to give outdoor relief; but in other unions where you have not got charities to help hard cases, I am afraid the Poor Law must come in.

8157. Take Nottingham. Do you think it is all right there?—There the guardians themselves are rather generous.

8158. Then they are not good administrators, are they?—The method of administration is good.

8159. (Mrs. Webb.) The machinery, you mean, is good?—Yes.

8160. But the policy may be bad, although the machinery is good?—Yes.

8161. (Chairman.) You would not admit that the policy is bad, would you?—No, I should not say the policy is bad—I say they are rather generous.

8162. You say that the machinery is good, but, as I understand you, there is in your judgment a tendency on the part of the individuals that form the machinery occasionally to be somewhat lax; is that it?—Yes.

8163. (Mr. Lansbury.) To which classes do you think that refers at Nottingham; do you think they are too generous to the widows, for instance?—To the widows and the children, I should say. I have attended their relief committees, and I have noticed that particularly with regard to the widows. I have given you an example—there are many such examples—and in that respect I thought they were rather lax.

Effect of abolition of out-relief.

8164. Still you believe that if you were to abolish outdoor relief all over your district pauperism would come down?—Pauperism would certainly come down.

8165. And it would be possible to do it, would it?—I think public opinion would be against it.

8166. I want to ask you whether you think we ought to give all indoor relief and no outdoor relief?—I have said that in some few cases it would be a hardship not to give outdoor relief.

8167. You do not know what percentage that would be?—If you wish me to give the union which I should say was a model union with regard to the guardians, I would take Stamford or Bingham or Spilsby.

8168. You have a good lot of outdoor relief there, have you not?—Yes.

Out-relief to aged in rural districts.

8169. That is accounted for, is it not, by the fact that you have got 130 per 1,000 over sixty years of age?—That is so. It is a rural union.

8170. That would mean that there would be more old people getting outdoor relief?—Yes. In rural unions you will find the people live to a much older age than they do in urban districts.

Attitude of poor towards out-relief.

8171. They get the outdoor relief in the shape of a pension, really, do they not?—That is it.

8172. Do you find that guardians and the people generally are coming to look upon outdoor relief as a pension?—No, I cannot say that.

8173. I mean, it is thought that they have a right to it?—No, not in most unions.

8174. Do you think they still look on it as something a little disgraceful to be getting outdoor relief?—In some unions, yes, in other unions, no.

Effectiveness of the stigma of out-relief.

8175. In which unions would you say no?—Nottingham, for instance, is an urban district where the population is lost, and where nobody knows that a person is getting relief: in Nottingham I should say no, but in a country place like Spilsby I should say yes.

8176. You do believe that people are ashamed of having to get outdoor relief?—I think so.

8177. Do you think that applies generally to the country districts?—It applies to many country districts, but not to all, for instance, it does not apply in Caistor or in Horncastle.

Increased attractiveness of Workhouse Infirmaries.

8178. You say in your memorandum that the increase in the number of indoor poor is partly due to the improvements that have taken place in workhouses, etc., and that many who formerly would not have applied for relief have now no hesitation in asking for an order for admission to the infirmary; is that merely because the infirmary is better conducted?—Yes; the infirmaries are better conducted and the inmates are better nursed and better fed; then the wards are brighter and are not so over-crowded.

Aged persuaded into Workhouse Infirmaries by relatives.

8179. Do you think that the people there have any notion that they have a right to provide hospitals and that sort of thing out of the rates, and that the people who go in go in because they feel that they have a right to provide these places, and therefore they have a right to go and use them?—The inmates of the infirmaries are mostly very sick and very old people, and they want rest and quietness, which they cannot get at home, and they also want attention. I do not think that it is they themselves that care to go in; it is generally their relations who tell them how comfortable it is there, and that the nurses can do more for them there and that kind of thing, and so they become willing to go inside.

8180. It is, of course, the infirm, as apart from the sick, that you are speaking of now?—I am speaking of both the sick and the infirm.

8181. Surely a large number of people who are not old but who are temporarily disabled go in ?—The temporarily disabled do not form such a very large number.

8182. So that the inmates of these infirmaries would be mainly old people ?—Yes. They will be the class which requires skilled nursing which, if you do not have a trained nurse to attend to, would soon get bed sores.

8183. What about the cases in a town like Nottingham ; would you not have a considerable number of people under sixty there who get relief in infirmaries ?—Yes, you would have more in a town.

Centripetal effect on pauperism of Poor Law Infirmaries, e.g., Birmingham.

8184. Would not one of the reasons why there are more of this kind of people of that age going in now because they think they have a right to do it ?—No, I do not think so. I think a very large number of those which you get, say, in Nottingham, come from the country districts and do not belong to Nottingham ; these cases go to the large towns where the infirmaries are looked upon with favour by the poor. They come into the town and go to a common lodging-house, and apply for an order for the workhouse, in order to get the benefit of the very high nursing and medical skill which they can get in a large infirmary. For instance, take Birmingham, which is a favourite infirmary. The proportion of deaths which take place in the Birmingham infirmary is 15·7 of the total number of deaths that take place in that town, that is, one out of every seven who dies in Birmingham dies in the workhouse, and I fear that a very large number of those do not belong to the town.

8185. They are tramps, really, then ?—No, they are people who come from the neighbouring unions and go into common lodging-houses or into lodgings in order to take advantage of the Poor Law in that way.

8186. They are people who do not belong to Birmingham ? —That is so. In Birmingham there are 2,012 beds in the registered common lodging houses. In No. 2 Relief District two-thirds of the applications come from the common lodging houses and from lodgings.

8187. In paragraph 63 of your memorandum you refer to people whom the superintendent relieving officer speaks of as being very drunk ?—That is an extract from the superintendent relieving officer's report.

8188. Could you tell us what percentage of the people are very drunk ?—No ; but the superintendent relieving officer, if you have him in front of you, would probably be able to give you a lot of information on such points.

8189. I want to know whether a case like that would be struck off at once ; I suppose it would at Nottingham ?—Yes, it would there.

Maintenance of aged by relatives as a remedy for out-relief.

8190. (Mr. Nunn.) With regard to the question which Mr. Lansbury raised about outdoor relief, it would be impossible at a stroke to abolish outdoor relief in a series of unions, whereas it would be possible to do it gradually if one were at the same time promoting habits of providence amongst people, and stimulating people who were prepared to help them to give them charitable assistance ?—I think that relations should be encouraged to look after their old people. I think, in the first instance, we should get that reform thoroughly considered and carried out, so that the old people should look to their families rather than to the State. There is a tendency I think, to look to the State too much, now.

8191. That is quite obvious in the case of the old men and old women who have children who ought to look after them, but Mr. Lansbury was instancing the case where you have an old person who has not anyone to look after her ; that is a case, I take it, in which you would consider charitable intervention would be most suitably employed ?—I consider charitable intervention would be most suitable there, and then, if you cannot get it, the Poor Law must step in.

8192. The special case which I would like to ask your opinion upon is that of the old persons whose children are quite capable of looking after them but who decline to do so when approached by charitable bodies. When the guardians are prepared to force an allowance from them by taking legal measures, do you think they should leave them alone to support their parents, or do you think they ought to use the machinery of their union to collect the money ?—What is sometimes done is that, rather than give 2s. or 3s. per week as outdoor relief, they ask the old woman to come in, and then charge the 7s. to the relatives.

8193. Supposing that it was a case of real hardship for a person to enter the house—such a case as one often comes across where, for instance, an old lady had brought up several sons and done it well, and they had refused to assist her—would you think it justifiable to use the collecting machinery of the union in order to collect the relief which the sons ought to give the old lady ?—If it cannot be done otherwise, yes ; but very often, if you have got a good superintendent relieving officer, he will point out to the sons that it will become very much more expensive to them if they cannot arrange it. Under such a superintendent relieving officer as Mr. Johnstone, say—unfortunately he is no longer Superintendent Relieving Officer at Nottingham—very many of those cases came to a satisfactory arrangement without the old people having to be classed as paupers under the Poor Law.

8194. With regard to the table in paragraph 102, I think you have said that the proportion of single men in the workhouse is about two-thirds of the total number of men ?—Yes.

Condition as to marriage and previous careers of paupers at Nottingham.

8195. Was the inquiry pushed in order to ascertain whether those men really were single, that is to say, were any individual instances taken up and their statements checked ?—I will read you what the superintendent relieving officer says : "From inquiries made in 100 unselected cases as to the cause leading to loss of work by men who became chargeable in the workhouse, it appeared that 62 left or were dismissed owing to drink ; 27 were dismissed because of laziness ; 5 for insubordination, and 6 for general unfitness for their work. It also appeared that the wages and the conditions of these 100 men were as follows : At 15s. to £1 a week, 13 single ; 1 married, and 8 widowed or separated ; at 21s. to 25s. a week, 11 single, 1 married, and 5 widowed or separated ; at 26s. to 30s. a week, 7 single, 1 married, and 7 widowed or separated ; at 31s. to 35s. a week, 5 single, 1 married, and two widowed or separated ; at 36s. to 40s. a week, 1 single and 1 widowed or separated ; for those at from 41s. to 45s. a week there are no figures ; and for those of uncertain wages 26 single and 10 widowed or separated." There were therefore 63 men single, 4 married, and 33 widowed or separated.

8196. Were those applications originally coming from outside which had been investigated by the relieving officer ?—Those were 100 men who were in the workhouse.

8197. So that their statements were accepted, and there was not an investigation made by the relieving officer at the place of origin ?—This is the result of investigations made by the superintendent relieving officer, not only at the workhouse but he also made very close inquiries as to their mode of living previous to coming upon the Poor Law.

8198. Did he push the investigation back to their present and previous addresses ; that is what I want to know ?—He made further inquiries. This information depends not only on the ex parte statements of the paupers themselves, but also upon the inquiries which he would get the relieving officer to make.

8199. May I ask whether, in the course of those inquiries, he ascertained whether any men who said they were single were really married ?—I cannot say. You must get Mr. Johnstone to tell you that.

8200. In paragraph 62 you cite several cases of deception ; those were all obtained from the superintendent relieving officer, I think ?—From the report of the superintendent relieving officer.

Functions of Superintendent Relieving Officer.

8201. Can you describe now what the functions of a superintendent relieving officer are ? Does he undertake cases himself or does he merely look after the cases dont by the relieving officers under him ?—There are special orders issued by the Local Government Board as to his duties. He is a most important officer. When you get four or five relieving officers there is practically no supervision unless you have a superintendent relieving officer. Again, a superintendent relieving officer helps towards uniformity of administration. A guardian may go up to a single relieving officer, and say, "You will have to give relief to such a case. And you need not mention such and such facts." What is the relieving officer to do ? If there is a check put upon him by the superintendent relieving officer, he says, "I cannot do so," and then you get the full facts of the case stated when it is brought before the board of guardians.

Mr. Nicholas Herbert.

2 April, 1906.

Explanation of certain tables in statement of evidence.

8202. Does he inspect the relieving officer's work in the office and cross-visit the cases also; is that what he does?—Not only that, but he takes the relieving officer's books when the relieving officer goes on leave, which is a very good check.

8203. Then in paragraph 58 you give a table setting out a certain number of cases in which out-door relief was refused; I see that there is a division made between those who have entered the workhouse and those whose allowances were stopped on various grounds. Did none of those whose allowances were stopped on various grounds enter the workhouse?—They did not apply for relief, and they did not come into the workhouse.

8204. "Entered workhouse" would include a good number of those other categories, I take it?—Yes, it would.

8205. Then there is a table in paragraph 55; does "Not deserted" in that table mean that a statement had been made that they had been deserted and it was afterwards discovered that they had not?—These cases ought to come under the heading "Deception;" they are cases where the husband goes into the next street until his wife goes into the workhouse, and then go back again.

8206. She said she had been deserted, and it was not so?—That is it.

8207. In paragraph 54 you give a table showing the residences of applicants for relief, and one line is "Applications from Institutions;" that would be from charitable institutions chiefly, I suppose?—From hospitals, private asylums, etc.

8208. Did shelters figure largely amongst those?—No. The people from those would apply direct to the relieving officer; they would be able-bodied. "From institutions" would really mean the sick.

8209. I think you have said the classification in the table in paragraph 53 was a classification made by a superintendent relieving officer?—Yes.

8210. There is a good deal of cross-classification in it, is there not?—Yes. If I had done it myself, I do not think I should have used exactly the same terms.

8211. The antecedent conditions are so very complex that it suggests a certain crudity to put down causes in that way, does it not?—Yes. I have only given you the figures because I thought they might be useful to the Commission; the officer went into it very thoroughly himself.

8212. But he has got his theory behind him, which does not appear?—Yes.

Favourable discrimination for thrifty applicants for relief.

8213. Of course guardians inquire into the question of whether a man has belonged to a provident club of any kind, but is that ever made a condition in deciding whether he shall receive outdoor or indoor relief?—That information is always given in the application and report book.

8214. Would different treatment be given to a man according to whether he belonged to a club or not?—Yes, and also as to whether he was thrifty or not.

8215. If he had not been thrifty, would an attempt be made to recover by loan, or would they give him indoor instead of outdoor relief?—In very few cases do they attempt to recover by loan.

8216. What are the attempts that are made to discriminate between the man who has tried to provide for himself and the man who has not?—The guardians are much more generous towards the first man. But really each case has to be judged upon its merits; cases cannot be treated wholesale.

Co-operation between Guardians, Municipality, and Charity at Nottingham.

8217. Turning to Nottingham, there you say there is a good deal of co-operation between the guardians, the municipal authorities and the Charity Organisation Society; what specific form does that co-operation take?—When the guardians found that there was a certain amount of distress likely to be caused through want of employment during the winter of 1904-05, the guardians approached the town council in order to see if they could give extra work, or what they were prepared to do. It was decided between the town council and the board of guardians to work with the Charity Organisation Society. It was arranged that all those who had not been in Nottingham for twelve months, or who were well-known bad characters, or who had received relief before, should be referred to the Poor Law; and that all the other cases should be taken by the Charity Organisation Society, who relieved them, and I believe with very satisfactory results indeed.

8218. Where did the municipality come in—did it provide work?—I forgot to mention that they gave £400 out of their funds to the Charity Organisation Society, on condition that the Charity Organisation Society took over these cases; and more was to be given if necessary. They also started certain sewage works in the winter. The three authorities worked in conjunction, and whilst pauperism in other towns increased largely, in Nottingham it only increased 10 per cent. in that year.

8219. What sort of division was made amongst the various classes of applicants? I suppose some received work at the hands of the municipality?—Some did.

8220. And some received an allowance from the Charity Organisation Society?—Yes.

8221. And others were referred to the Poor Law?—Yes.

8222. What classes of men received the allowance from the Charity Organisation Society?—The deserving cases, for whom work could not be found.

8223. That is, the most provident?—Yes.

8224. And those which were unsuitable for the work which the municipality offered?—Yes. There was only a certain number of places vacant, and therefore they could only employ a certain number.

Report of Charity Organisation Society on work at Nottingham.

8225. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) The Charity Organisation Society of Nottingham have issued a report on this work; might that be put in evidence?—If you can get that report, which is an excellent report, it will give you the whole facts of the case. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XVII. (B).)

8226. (Mr. Nunn.) Has that led to any further co-operation between the board of guardians and the Charity Organisation Society?—I have left Nottingham now, and I do not know what has taken place since.

8227. But you do not know of any other form of co-operation between them?—No; but I may mention that the clerk to the guardians, who is a very able officer, is also the clerk to the Distress Committee.

8228. There they are only dealing with the unemployed?—That is so.

8229. Does the co-operation between the board of guardians and the Charity Organisation Society subsist with regard to any other class of cases except the unemployed?—Not that I am aware of.

System of Rota Relief Committees at Nottingham and its advantages.

8230. (Mrs. Webb.) With regard to the Nottingham committees, do I understand that the same guardians always deal with the same cases, or is the arrangement that you mention in your memorandum devised for the express purpose of making different guardians deal with the same cases?—There are forty-eight members of the Nottingham Board of Guardians, and they are formed into four committees of twelve each, the first twelve names on the list alphabetically forming the first committee, and so on.

8231. So that they become permanent committees?—Yes. The first committee will take relief district A for three months, then relief district B for three months, then relief district C for three months, and relief district D for three months; and then they will go back again to A.

8232. Then they take different districts for three months?—Yes.

8233. So that you do have a different set of guardians dealing with the same cases?—That is so.

8234. Is that the object of the system?—That is the object of the system. At the same time the system permits of any guardian belonging to other districts attending any relief committee. No two committees are allowed to sit at the same time, so if there is a case which a guardian is interested in, he can go and make his statement with regard to that case to the committee that is dealing with it.

8235. Then practically, bearing in mind that qualification, the object is that the same guardians shall not deal with the same cases for more than three months?—The object is to attain uniformity of treatment.

8236. Surely that does not attain uniformity of treatment, because if different guardians deal with the same cases that would presumably mean different treatment? —You may get different treatment in each district every three months, but you get uniform treatment throughout the union.

8237. But still if you have a different set of guardians dealing with the same case every three months, you may have a difference of opinion as regards policy?—Yes, but then you have got the superintendent relieving officer to fall back upon.

8238. I was coming to him later on?—I would point out that having a superintendent relieving officer, he is able to tell them all that took place at the other committee.

8239. We will leave the superintendent for the moment. The whole object of this system is really, as I understand it, to prevent favouritism?—That is so.

8240. That is to say, if you do not have this system there is favouritism?—There is a likelihood of favouritism.

8241. And such a strong likelihood that you must manufacture this rather artificial system in order to prevent it? —That is so.

Position of Superintendent Relieving Officer.

8242. As regards the superintendent, he becomes practically the dispenser of the uniformity, that is, he is responsible for the uniformity?—He is not responsible at all. He makes his statement, and he answers any question put to him.

8243. But you rely on him to keep the relief uniform? —I rely upon him to give the information as to what takes place in the other committees, or as to the general policy which has been pursued by the board.

8244. And therefore he more or less directs the policy of the board?—I do not think so.

8245. But if he does not direct the policy how do you secure uniformity?—He is only able to give information as to what has been done in a particular case; for instance, you have a case which has been before one committee, and then he is able, when the next committee comes on, to tell them what the other committee have said, and he can also put in his case paper with all the remarks of the previous chairman on it.

8246. I understand that legally the guardians are supreme, but as a matter of fact this man, having all the expert knowledge, must actually direct their policy, must he not?—They rely upon him to a certain extent for information, but the Nottingham guardians intend to have their own way always as a committee.

8247. Of course they may intend it, but surely as a matter of fact the superintendent does to a very large extent determine the policy?—I would not go so far as that.

Amount of "sickness" pauperism and causes thereof.

8248. I notice that in the returns of "Alleged cause," sickness comes out at 41 per cent.?—Yes.

8249. Do you think that is at all typical of other unions?—I think that is so in unions with a large urban population.

8250. That is to say, that nearly half the pauperism is caused by sickness?—Yes, that is true in the case of half the applications. A good many of those are for medical relief only.

8251. Then any conditions which produce sickness must be potent causes of pauperism?—That is so.

8252. You would therefore say, would you not, that bad housing would be a large cause?—Yes.

8253. And bad conditions of employment, long hours or insanitary workshops also, would be a cause of sickness?—They would.

8254. And therefore a cause of poverty?—Yes.

Centrifugal effect on pauperism of Poor Law Infirmaries.

8255. So if we were inquiring into the causes of pauperism, the causes of sickness would in that case be one of the principal causes of pauperism?—Yes; but you must remember, as I pointed out before, that in Nottingham a very large number of these applications do not come from persons who belong to Nottingham, but come from persons who come into Nottingham in order to get the extra special care which they know they will get in the Nottingham workhouse.

8256. Do they come and lodge with Nottingham friends?—Yes, or they get into some lodging-house. They are able to understand what kind of inquiries will be made, and if they do not tell the truth, they probably can get into the infirmary that they wish to get into.

8257. Is this closely inquired into?—Very closely, but how are you going to inquire into the circumstances of a person in a common lodging-house? If they say they have lived in Nottingham for fifteen years, it is difficult to find out that they have not.

Difficulty of applying law of settlement to inmates of common lodging-houses and to sick people.

8258. Do you suggest that in the case of people who live in common lodging-houses, their settlements cannot really be ascertained?—That is my idea. I have given a table showing that 51 per cent. of the applicants come from their own homes or are living with relatives. You can easily find out everything about them; but when they come from lodgings, or from common lodging-houses, you have to take their ex parte statement; and if they will not give you any information, or give you any hint as to their settlement, how are you to find out?

8259. I suppose you could inquire of the head of the common lodging-house how long that man had stayed there, and he would be obliged to report it to the police? —And even suppose he does so, you cannot find out where the man's settlement is.

8260. (Mr. Lansbury.) If the person is ill you must attend to him, must you not?—Yes, certainly.

8261. And you have to inquire into his settlement afterwards?—Certainly.

Effect on character of people of hospital provision for infectious diseases.

8262. (Mrs. Webb.) With regard to the use of the infirmaries, which you say is becoming more frequent, do you think that it all arises from the fact that people have become accustomed to use the fever hospitals?—I cannot think so. No doubt if they accept relief, so to speak, from the town council (the sanitary authority) rather than from the Poor Law, probably that would have an effect; but I should not think it would have a very large effect upon them. If I got ill, I should probably have a nurse and the doctor would see me now and then, but if a poor person gets ill he goes into the infirmary and then he gets a nurse by day and a nurse by night and a resident medical officer to come and look at him whenever the nurse considers it necessary, for instance, if his temperature goes up the medical officer would be sent for. I think that is probably what causes the increasing number in the infirmaries.

8263. The whole plan of notifying diseases, with a view to their removal from their homes, must surely make the man feel that he is doing the State a service by going to the hospital, rather than remaining at home and contaminating his friends and relations?—That must be so.

8264. To a large extent the State is engaged now in persuading the ordinary citizen that he ought not to remain in his home if he is ill?—If he is suffering from a disease from which other people will be likely to suffer.

8265. And practically all diseases are now considered contaminating to some extent, are they not?—Not old age.

8266. But almost everything else?—Yes, many diseases are.

Procedure and difficulties in connection with Poor Law contracts.

8267. Would you kindly tell us your experience with regard to boards of guardians giving contracts; where are the weak points in the procedure?—I think the weak point is not with regard to the contracts themselves, but as to whether the class of goods which are delivered is in accordance with the contract. Take for instance the meat contract. If the contract says "prime English wether mutton" you generally find it is Deptford killed that is delivered; if the contract says "Deptford killed," you will find it is New Zealand mutton, and if the contract says "New Zealand mutton," described as Canterbury brand—but there is no such brand—Australian mutton is delivered. I found out this when I was making inquiries into the matter in London a few years back. The price in the contract which they get for prime English mutton was in most cases such that the contractors could not possibly have it delivered except at a loss, although there must have been a pretty good profit if the Deptford killed mutton was delivered—not an extravagant profit, but a large profit. After I had made many inquiries, I decided to attack this question so as to get real contracts, as I found that the same contractors always got the contracts. I went for the biggest authority in

Mr. Nicholas Herbert.

2 April, 1906.

London, the Metropolitan Asylums Board, and there was a correspondence with the Local Government Board which might be of use to the Commission, respecting the contracts for meat. With regard to the boards of guardians, as a rule I think you can trust them—indeed, I am sure you can—and that you have only got to give them a hint that something is wrong, and then they will soon put it right. Take the case of Baxter v. Musto at Mile End. I gave the Mile End Guardians a hint that the contract for drapery required looking into; it cost me three days in the court of King's Bench, but at any rate I think it was fully proved right up to the hilt that there was collusion between the contractor and somebody on the Board of guardians. Everything there I fancy has been put right. Taking boards of guardians as a whole, I am sure there are only a few black sheep, and as a rule they are entirely governed by the desire to do the best they can for the poor.

8268. Would you say that about the London unions ?—I know so very little about the guardians in London; I have very seldom met them, although I was in London for twelve years.

8269. Did you come across the Lambeth union, for instance ?—I met a committee once, but only once.

Inspector's functions as to contracts.

8270. Do you consider it is the duty of an inspector to attend meetings of boards of guardians when they are giving out the contracts ?—I attend meetings of boards of guardians, but not on any special day. You cannot attend every board of guardians when it is giving out contracts; they all come on about one time, i.e., at the end of the half-year.

8271. Do you think it is part of the functions of an inspector to find out what is the exact procedure with regard to the giving of contracts ?—I think that might be one of the special points which he should look into.

8272. But it is not at present, is it; he would not consider himself specially responsible for that, would he ?—If I saw that the procedure was wrong, I should point it out.

8273. But you can hardly see it unless you find it out. Do you consider it would be the duty of an inspector to find out what the procedure is on every board of guardians in his district ?—Yes; but in taking up the appointment I should not make that one of the special points to be dealt with at once, though after an inspector has been in the district a certain number of years, it should be. There are many other points which are more important.

8274. According to your experience, is it usual to withhold the names of tenderers or not ?—I should think it goes half and half.

8275. You do not know what is the practice in London particularly, do you ?—No; I know nothing about the procedure as regards London contracts.

8276. Do you know at all what the procedure is in Nottingham ?—I could not trust to my memory.

The rationale of out-relief to widows with children.

8277. I did not quite understand your answers to Mr. Lansbury with regard to out poor relief, and I am not certain whether you approve of giving out door relief, say, to a widow with children ?—It all depends upon the case. I think every case wants deciding upon its merits, and wants to be gone into very thoroughly by the relief committees of the boards of guardians.

8278. Then you do not quite believe in poor law principles ?—Are you referring to the very strict ones ?

8279. I mean such a poor law principle as it is undesirable to give out-door relief to a woman with children ?—Speaking generally, it is very undesirable, but I think there are probably some hard cases which might with advantage be inquired into by the guardians.

Inspectors' methods of influencing Guardians

8280. In dealing with boards of guardians, do you ever instruct them as to poor law principles, or would they consider that an impertinence ?—I do not think they would consider it an impertinence. I think it is our duty to place before the boards of guardians the general principles, but not to go into too many matters at one time.

8281. You may have read some of the letters and circulars which the first assistant-commissioners under the Poor Law Commissioners wrote in 1835, 1836 and 1837 to their boards of guardians, in which they lay down definitely the principles of the new Poor Law; you would not do that with your board of guardians ?—No, I do not think so.

8282. That you would take to be outside the duty of an inspector now ?—I think that an inspector should try to get the confidence of his boards of guardians; and then he can begin to preach.

8283. But you would not lay down theoretically what they ought to do at all ?—No.

8284. When you have to send them a circular, for instance, like the one advocating better and more luxurious treatment in the workhouse for old people, would you take it upon you to make any remarks on that circular and to advise them not to extend the same sort of treatment to the able-bodied; and would you try to prevent the ill-effects of what you would consider an ill-advised circular ?—At the present time I am just introduced into my new district, and I am trying my best to get the dietary put right; that is, I am suggesting that a distinction should be made between those who are in the workhouse and should be there, and those who are in the workhouse and should not be there—the able-bodied who ought to be outside. The late inspector was, as you know, very ill for a year or so, and he had not evidently gone into the matter. I found, for instance, at Wantage that the able-bodied, the sick, the infirm—all classes in fact—were getting six plain meat dinners a week. The Order says not fewer than two plain meat dinners a week should be given to the able-bodied, so that the guardians might not be too harsh upon them, and with regard to the other classes the guardians are bound to give three; but in this case they were giving the able-bodied six plain meat dinners a week, the same as for the infirm. That is what those fellows rather like; they do not care for soups or for bread and cheese; they would sooner have a plain meat dinner. In this respect I am going round trying to instruct my boards of guardians as to the principles laid down in the dietary order.

Irregularities of workhouse dietary.

8285. Would you look into the question of the amount of food given to the out door cases ?—As to the amount of out-relief in kind, do you mean ?

Lavish out-relief in kind.

8286. In watching the relieving committees of certain boards of guardians it has occurred to me that they give far too much food per person to their out door cases—they give an excessive amount of bread, for instance; have you found that ?—I cannot say that that is so. Very few boards of guardians in my late district gave relief in kind, except the temporary relief which is given by the relieving officers.

8287. Sometimes they will give it to widows and deserted wives, will they not ?—I do not think you get much of that in the Midlands. They do not care to relieve in bread; it is nearly all in money.

8288. Then this has not occurred to you as an evil ?—No; I have not seen an undue amount of bread issued.

Respective effect on administration of Outdoor Relief Regulation and Prohibitory Orders.

8289. (Mr. Bentham.) May I ask if all the unions in your district are under the Outdoor Relief Regulation Order ?—I think so.

8290. Do you find any difference in your experience, either in this district or the other, between the administration so far as outdoor relief is concerned in a union under the Outdoor Relief Regulation Order and in a union which is under the Outdoor Relief Prohibitory Order ?—I really can give you very little information as to that, as I have not gone into it.

8291. There are unions of both kinds, I suppose, in your present district and in the other one ?—Yes.

8292. And you have not noticed any difference whatever ?—I have not noticed any.

8293. I take it from your memorandum that you think the excessive amount of pauperism in Leicestershire is due rather to bad administration than to any other cause ?—Yes, and also to the relief being given by the guardian of the parish. That is not done in Leicester itself, but at Barrow-on-Soar it was left entirely to the guardians of the parish to decide.

Method of administering out-relief at Barrow-on-Soar.

8294. Is that relief given there by the guardians themselves then ?—It used to be, but an improvement has now taken place there. I believe there has been some correspondence between the Local Government Board and the guardians, or, at any rate, between the auditor and the guardians, as to the relief that has been given in certain cases.

8295. Will you describe the method that obtained there?—The method that obtained at Barrow-upon-Soar was that both relieving committees sat in the same room, the chairman would read out the case—just the name and the age, etc.—and then call for the guardian of the parish, and the guardian of the parish would say, "A most deserving case; 3s. 6d., gentlemen."

8296. Would he name the sum?—He would name the sum.

8297. Would the relieving officer have anything to say?—Very little.

8298. He would not be asked, would he?—No; it would be left to the guardian of the parish. For instance, the relieving officer would put on his book: "Three sons, each earning 17s. a week, living with their mother and father; mother and father looking after the house." Yet the 3s. 6d. a week would be given as relief.

8299. Do you say that has been remedied now?—I think so. There has been correspondence between the Local Government Board and the guardians about it.

Guardians' disregard of women and children's earnings in Leicestershire.

8300. I understand there is a large amount of labour for women and children in Leicestershire in connection with the boot-making and hosiery trades?—Yes, there is.

8301. That ought to reduce the amount of relief granted by the Poor Law, ought it not?—Yes. A great many of the cases that are relieved in some of the Leicestershire unions do not require relief.

8302. Are they relieving cases where there are earnings from other members of the family, but the head of the family is not earning anything?—In many cases where the amount of money coming into the house is quite sufficient to support the entire family, the guardians give relief because the head of the family is not earning any money.

8303. They do not take the income of the family, and if it is sufficient to maintain all its members, hold that they are not eligible for relief?—No.

Number of Guardians at Lincoln and Louth.

8304. In paragraph 27 you give us a list of unions and the number of elected guardians, from which I see that Lincoln has 104 elected guardians?—That is so.

8305. How many parishes are there in Lincoln?—104, I suppose.

8306. So that it is one guardian for each parish?—Yes.

8307. Does that apply in the same way to Louth, which has 101 guardians?—Yes.

Objections to parish as electoral unit for Guardians.

8308. Do you think any improvement will be made by amalgamating some of those parishes and so reducing the number of guardians?—I should get rid of the parish system altogether in connection with the elections.

8309. Would you adopt that principle everywhere of getting rid of the parish system of elections?—I would adopt the principle everywhere of getting rid of the guardians being appointed for a particular parish. When a guardian is appointed for a particular parish he really becomes patronage secretary for that parish, and is considered a good guardian or otherwise, according to the amount of money that he can get out of the board for that parish, because the money does not come out of the parish, but out of the union. If you could get statistics showing where guardians are appointed by parishes and where they are appointed by wards, I think you will find that in the latter case there is generally less pauperism.

8310. Have you any instance in your area where there are few guardians and they are elected by wards and not by parishes?—Yes, Nottingham.

8311. Do they follow the municipal wards at Nottingham?—I cannot say.

8312. Are the Poor Law wards there not rather larger than the municipal wards?—I cannot say.

System of election of Guardians by wards and its effects.

8313. (Mrs. Webb.) What is the difference between being elected by a ward and being elected by a parish? In both cases the man represents the locality and the locality only, does he not?—No; in the case of ward elections there may be twelve elected for one ward.

8314. There is one unit of representation, and all the people are elected for that unit?—Yes.

8315. That is not the case with most ward elections, is it?—Even with regard to wards generally, each ward in the South of England is represented by one person, I think?—Yes.

8316. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Nottingham is all one parish, is it not?—Yes.

8317. But it has been divided into wards for the purpose of the election of guardians?—Yes.

8318. Therefore a number of guardians are elected for each ward?—Yes, twelve, I think, for each ward.

8319. (Chairman.) Then has each voter twelve votes?—Yes, he votes for twelve persons.

8320. (Mr. Lansbury.) It seems to me that in this case you only get the evil enlarged, for you have got twelve patronage secretaries in each ward instead of one?—But you cannot get twelve men to agree on such a point.

8321. (Mr. Loch.) In the one case a man gets a definite sum of money paid in the parish out of the union funds?—Yes.

8322. And that tends to keep the parish element strong, whilst, as it does not operate to the same extent in the wards, the ward element is weak?—Yes. In the case of a parish election you generally get a man from the parish elected, and he is probably regarded as a friend or a neighbour, and the old people look to him to get them relief, and he generally obtains it for them.

8323. (Mr. Bentham.) I take it that Nottingham arranged its wards according to its own ideas, both as to the size of the ward and the number of representatives?—I forget the mode of procedure that was adopted; Sir Samuel Provis could tell you more about that.

Advantages of few Guardians and large areas of representation.

8324. Do you agree in principle that the larger the area of representation the less likely is there to be any parochial ideas in the mind of the representative?—Yes.

8325. And do you believe that the fewer guardians there are the more efficient usually they will be in doing their work?—I am sure of that.

Effect of appointment of Superintendent Relieving Officer and other reforms at Nottingham 8326. With regard to Nottingham, you have given us a description of the methods adopted there, which commenced, I think, by the appointment of a superintendent relieving officer?—Yes.

8327. Then resolutions were passed in October, 1901, regulating the procedure of relief committees?—Yes.

8328. Has there been any marked change in the figures from, say, 1st January, 1902, to 1st January, 1906, in consequence of this policy?—In paragraph 48 I give the statistics for 1901, 1902, 1903, 1904 and 1905.

8329. Are those the figures for 1st January?—Yes.

8330. Apparently there has been a steady increase in the total numbers?—No. I say in my memorandum, "From the above it will be seen that out-door pauperism decreased after the appointment of a superintendent relieving officer, and the reforms that took place in the administration, until 1903, but has since increased," and then I give the reasons. That is, that there were no public works being carried out in Nottingham during the winter of 1904–5, and that there was a certain amount of distress caused thereby and money was tight.

8331. Do you think the statistics would have been more favourable but for these local circumstances?—I am sure they would.

System adopted by Guardians for granting relief at Nottingham and its operation.

8332. In regard to the system that they have adopted, have they passed any by-laws or regulations for the guidance of the guardians?—No.

8333. Then they have none?—They have none.

8334. Therefore they are in the hands of the superintendent relieving officer, more or less, at each of the relief committee meetings?—How?

8335. With regard to the way in which they may deal with a particular case and the amount of relief that they would give in a particular case?—No; that is left entirely to the discretion of the committee. The guardians meet and sit for two or three hours a day, and sometimes longer, hearing these applications, and they rather treat a case as they would a chess problem.

8336. One set of guardians keep together all the time and then move on to the next section when the three months is up?—Yes.

8337. That set of guardians is all along getting accustomed to a certain scale of relief which is in their minds for a certain class of case, and that scale might differ somewhat from the scale that is in the minds of another set of guardians who are on another committee?—That is so.

Mr. Nicholas Herbert.

2 April, 1906.

8338. When the one set of guardians is moved on to the next section, they will carry their ideas with them, and consequently will deal with the cases in that section in the same way as they dealt with the cases in their previous section?—There is no scale at Nottingham; I mean to say, no hard and fast scale, but each case is decided upon its merits. There is no such scale as 3s., 4s., or 5s. for such-and-such a case.

8339. As you know, a number of men sitting together usually get a common idea of what amount they would give under a certain set of circumstances?—Yes.

8340. Each of these separate committees might get its own ideas, and they then would be at variance with each other?—They might.

8341. Therefore you would not get uniformity in each committee, but you would get uniformity over the whole area by changing the amount that would be given in each district?—That is so. I have noticed that one committee is somewhat more generous than another.

8342. And it carries its generosity with it when it goes to the next section?—Yes.

8343. (Mr. Gardiner.) When a more parsimonious committee succeeds a more generous committee, is the relief cut down?—No; for that they have to wait till the next revision.

System of revision of chronic cases at Nottingham.

8344. (Mr. Bentham.) How is the revision done? Does a committee revise its own cases at the end of three months?—Whichever particular section they would be on, they would revise those cases. I think it is done every six months, is it not?

8345. Every quarter, I think. But what does the revision mean?—Every case is read out and gone into.

8346. In the presence of the applicant?—If there is any change in the circumstances the applicant is asked by the relieving officer to attend the revision; but even otherwise a case is read out and gone into just in the same manner as it would be if it were a new application.

8347. Then really the cases are heard?—That is so.

8348. By the same committee which has granted the relief?—That might not be the case; it might be another committee.

8349. I thought that each committee revised its own cases prior to changing?—The revision might come on the very first sitting after they had changed, and then it would be another committee which would revise their cases.

8350. I thought the system was that each committee revised its own cases prior to moving on to the next district?—No. They have a special date when the revisions all come forward. That is fixed as near the quarter day as possible.

8351. Is there any cross visitor's report made in these cases, except that which is made by the superintendent relieving officer?—No.

8352. Have they no cross visiting?—No, except that made by the superintendent relieving officer.

8353. (Mr. Loch.) Is there any real investigation into these cases?—Yes. The superintendent relieving officer visits most of these cases.

8354. You mean the revised cases, do you?—Yes, the revised cases as well.

8355. (Mr. Booth.) I thought you said that not all cases were revised in this way, but only those in which change was contemplated?—All are gone through, but where a change is contemplated, or where the relieving officer has thought any change has taken place, the superintendent relieving officer would make further inquiries, and so you would get the results of the double inquiry—that by the relieving officer and that by the superintendent relieving officer.

8356. So that unless the superintendent relieving officer has, so to say, marked the cases as being really in need of revision, they are not revised at all?—They are gone through in a more or less perfunctory manner; but the superintendent relieving officer would know every case where the circumstances had altered.

8357. And that does tend to throw, I will not say responsibility, but influence into his hands?—It would.

8358. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Would he go through the cases before the committee met and select such as he thought required revision?—When the case comes before the committee the case is read out just the same as it would be if it were a new application, and the relieving officer—not the superintendent relieving officer—would say, "The same," and the case would then be finished with. But if there is any alteration, you will hear the superintendent relieving officer and the relieving officer giving their tale, and it is gone into as a new case entirely.

8359. That is to say, if the relieving officer recommends an alteration?—If the relieving officer states that there is any change in the circumstances.

8360. Supposing he thinks there is a change in the circumstances?—He reports the change.

8361. Would he have the applicant there?—If he thought necessary he would have the applicant there.

8362. (Mr. Booth.) I thought we were discussing, not cases in which there was a change in the circumstances, but cases which might be looked at differently by the next committee, which is quite a different point. Does that revision which comes from another committee, with perhaps other views, depend upon the word of either the relieving officer or the superintendent relieving officer?—They would accept the decision of the previous committee, I should imagine.

8363. (Mr. Lansbury.) Would one committee upset the decision of another committee?—No, I do not think so.

8364. The tendency would be, would it not, if they had any doubt, to refer it to the committee that had decided the case, and ask them to reconsider it, as one committee would not revise the work of another?—I do not think they would interfere with the work of another committee, unless some alteration had taken place.

8365. Assuming that a case might have been in receipt of relief for a considerable time, and that that case might have been considered, say, by the four committees, would there be at any time a variation in the treatment according to the individual views of the separate committees?—No, the treatment would remain the same as though it had been decided upon by the committee who put the case on the books. Of course, we are dealing now with permanent cases; when you get the temporary cases lasting a fortnight or a month only, there you would probably get a certain amount of difference of treatment.

Extent of Superintendent Relieving Officer's work at Nottingham

8366. (Mr. Bentham.) I see there were 3,551 persons on the books on January 1st, 1905, as being in receipt of outdoor relief in Nottingham?—Yes.

8367. It would be impossible, would it not, for the superintendent relieving officer to superintend or supervise the work of the relieving officers under him, and also to make many cross visits in the course of the year when the numbers run so high as that?—Mr. Johnstone, speaking of his year's work, says: "During the period I have visited 643 applicants for, and recipients of, out-relief and reported the results to the various committees. I have also inquired separately and specially noted 709 other cases." That makes altogether 1,352; that would be practically the whole of the cases in Nottingham, as you will see if you multiply that by three or two and a half. There would be on an average two and a half persons per case.

8368. Then the cases are really revised during the running of an order for relief?—Yes.

8369. When one committee is revising its cases, will it go through all the cases, both the permanent cases and the new cases?—Yes, and the temporary ones.

Period of relief orders at Nottingham.

8370. What length of order do they give as a rule in Nottingham?—I think in Nottingham the order runs for thirteen weeks, but in some unions they give twenty-six weeks.

8371. Would they give thirteen weeks in all cases in Nottingham?—No, not in the temporary cases. There are some cases which are always described as temporary and which are put on for a fortnight. For instance, a man has had an accident to his finger; they will probably give 15s. out-relief to that man whilst he is getting his finger well, and whilst he cannot work; but directly he can handle his tools and get back to work the relief is stopped.

8372. What length of order will they give in the case of a widow with children?—Thirteen weeks.

8373. Would that be the usual thing?—Yes.

8374. (Mr. Loch.) What would be the length of order in the case of the aged?—For the aged it would be thirteen weeks also.

8375. (Mr. Bentham.) Do you not think a better system would be for the whole board to revise all the cases of its committees on the report of an independent investigator?—That is a pretty tall order—1,300 cases to be gone through by a whole board.

8376. They would not remain 1,300 or 1,400 long if the whole board did go through them, would they?—Probably not.

estion of fficiency of pplication d Report ok as a ord.

8377. In the table in paragraph 53 you give a classification of the alleged causes in the case of 2,493 new applications for relief; how was that information obtained; are all these particulars to be found in the application and report book?—No. At Nottingham they have the case paper system, and Mr. Johnstone, the superintendent relieving officer, has got this table out from the case papers.

8378. It would not be possible to get out such a table where they had not the case paper system, would it?—I should think not, unless the relieving officers did their work properly and filled in the column "Observations" properly, and gave the names of the relatives liable to maintain, distinguishing those who were capable of doing so from those who were not.

8379. And stating the causes of pauperism?—Or the causes of pauperism. If the relieving officers did their work well the application and report book should give this information.

8380. Do you find in your experience that the column "Cause of Application" is not filled in?—They fill it in, but the cause of application is generally put down as "Destitution" merely.

8381. "Or "poverty"?—Yes. I cannot get many of the relieving officers to fill these columns up properly.

plicants for lief residing common dging-uses.

8382. In paragraph 54 you state where the applications come from, and I notice there are 620 applications from persons who reside in common lodging-houses. Have they any fixed rule as to dealing with cases from common lodging-houses; do they ever give out-door relief to such cases?—No.

8383. Do they always give an order for the house, then?—Mostly, or they are refused altogether.

fusal of re- f at Nott- gham in es where rnings are fficient to aintain mily.

8384. In Nottingham do they give relief to persons who are living with relatives in cases where the united income is sufficient for all, as you state they do in Leicester?—No, I do not think so.

8385. Not to the same extent, at any rate?—No; it is gone into very much more carefully. They certainly would not give it at Nottingham.

8386. In paragraph 71 you described the task work that was given to able-bodied men at Leicester, and I should like to ask you some questions upon that?—Would you kindly ask Mr. Walsh when he comes? You will find that he has got everything with regard to Leicester, and I should have to trust to my memory entirely with regard to it.

nnection tween uperism d local ans.

8387. (Professor Smart.) You suggest a very interesting connection between local borrowing and pauperism; you say that out-door relief in the North Midland district has increased since 1901, and one of the reasons you give for that is that the local authorities have had to call a halt in the carrying out of public works by means of loans?—That is so.

8388. I suppose you mean there has been a rise in the rate of interest since 1901, and that the local authorities could not face the higher rate?—I should say so; money got tight and a general spirit of economy came over people, and they were rather afraid of going in for loans. It was the same with railway companies as with local authorities.

8389. Then you do not mean so much a rise in the rates as a fit of economy?—I think it was a fit of economy mostly; and of course a rise in the rates leads to this. Money was also tight.

8390. It might not mean the same motive exactly though. Then you say many people have become dependent on the continued activity of these local bodies?—I am sure that is so as regards local authorities, railway companies and other bodies, but principally as regards local authorities.

Medical relief an inducement to pauperism.

8391. Then you suggest that one cause of the increase in the number of indoor poor is the better sick-relief that is afforded in the workhouse?—That is so.

8392. I gather you would say that an increase in poor law expense, and even an increase in the number of paupers, may not be a sign of growing distress?—Certainly not.

Fallibility of statistics.

8393. Therefore statistics of pauperism when they are quoted simpliciter as proving a decline in national prosperity, are quite untrustworthy?—I should imagine that is so.

Attractiveness of Poor Law Infirmaries.

8394. I understand you to say that there is now less reluctance to accept poor relief, especially when it takes the shape of medical relief?—There is less reluctance.

8395. You used a very striking expression; you spoke of workhouse infirmaries as state hospitals; is that your own, may I ask, or is that a common phrase?—I think it is my own. I have not heard anyone else use the expression.

8396. You do not know if the idea has become common among the poor that they have a right to it as a sort of State institution?—I do not think it has.

Number of deaths in Birmingham voluntary hospitals.

8397. Do you think it is a good thing or a bad thing, on the whole?—I think it is a very good thing that the old people and the sick people are well looked after, and that there is a better tendency to good administration in the Poor Law. Public opinion is in favour of giving to the sick. Look at your hospitals; one out of every five who die in Birmingham dies in a hospital or asylum which is supported by voluntary subscriptions or is provided by the Town Council. That shows that public opinion is rather in favour of giving this treatment to the sick.

8398. There is a distinct loss of independence apparently connected with that, is there not?—Yes, there is.

8399. And, as has been suggested here several times, it may be a stepping-stone to taking Poor Law relief in other forms than medical?—It is, probably.

Connection between pauperism and employment of women.

8400. You make another interesting suggestion that I have not seen before, and that is that in Leicestershire, where there is abundant employment for women and children as well as for men, the pauperism is high in comparison with districts where the head of the family is the only bread winner?—That is so.

8401. May that not have some connection with the reflex effect of factory work on the family, namely, that the father keeps his independence and self-respect better where the burden is thrown altogether upon him, and that the home is better looked after and there is more thrift where the wife does not go out to work?—That is probably so, but I have not looked at it in that way.

8402. It is rather a striking statement of yours that where there is employment for women and children pauperism is high?—I think in Leicestershire pauperism used to be very low.

8403. Indeed—under similar conditions?—Yes.

Fluctuation in poor law policy at Leicester.

8404. With women and children employed?—Yes. If I remember rightly, in reading over the Appendix to the Report of the Poor Law Commissioners, you will see that Leicester was always going first very strict and then very lax; it is still the same.

8405. Do you mean long ago?—That was in 1834. If you compare what was reported in 1834 with the present time you will frequently find that those unions which were very strict then are very strict now, and vice versa.

8406. (Mr. Booth.) There is the Southwell case?—Southwell is keeping moderately good. Then there is Bingham, where Sir George Nicholls learnt his experience.

Removal of factories from London and its causes.

8407. (Professor Smart.) Then you say that two large engineering firms have removed their factories from the South of London to Newark; did you ever hear any reason alleged for the removal?—Yes, high rates and the high rateable value; for instance at Newark they are probably paying on a much less rateable value than when the works were in London. Then there is the cost of labour; labour is very much less expensive there than it is in London. Then, also, being close to the coalfields, coal is cheaper. Competition is now so great in regard to manufacturers that they have to be content with smaller profits, and in order to get rid of higher rates and to lessen their cost for labour and coal they have been obliged to go into the country.

Mr. Nicholas Herbert.

2 April, 1906.

8408. You have heard high rates given as one of the reasons, have you?—Yes.

8409. I think you do not give the proportion between outdoor relief and in-door relief over your district as a whole?—I have not done so. I have only given the cost on in-maintenance and out-relief per head of population.

Proportion of out-relief to in-relief and its causes.

8410. Have you any rough idea what it may amount to; would it be 75 per cent. or anything like that?—I have not gone into it except with regard to the cost.

8411. At any rate, it would be very much above the half?—It would.

8412. I am going to ask you a general question; I am afraid you will think it a very ignorant question, but I want to get the answer put on record. I come from a country where the system is different; but the traditional system of England is of course the workhouse system, namely, that only the destitute should be relieved and that they should be relieved only in the workhouse, and yet I find that the large proportion of poor relief with you is outdoor?—That is so.

8413. In fact you come very close to the proportion we have in Scotland, where our system is avowedly an outdoor system?—But then you must remember that in Scotland not only do the families keep one another and help one another, but the members of the clans also help one another. Then you have thrift in Scotland, and often the reverse down in the south of England.

8414. Has it anything to do with expense; that is to say, would you put more into the poor house if you were willing to spend more money on workhouse buildings?—If you ask me whether any one of these in the sick wards or infirmaries or in the infirm part of workhouses could be removed therefrom, I say I do not think so. You have got the experience of Poplar and you have got the experience of Nottingham, where the guardians made enquiries whether there were any old people in the workhouses who could be relieved by means of out-relief, but they found that there was nobody to take charge of them or to give them a home, and that these people, if they went out, would become neglected, and would probably cause a great deal of sympathy because they would get into a neglected state; so that more harm than good would be done by giving them outdoor relief. I forget the exact number. I think there were only about eight or ten cases which they could send out from the Nottingham workhouse.

Result of offering out-relief to Workhouse inmates at Nottingham.

8415. It is sometimes given as an excuse for outdoor relief that there is not enough accommodation in the workhouse, and that a new workhouse would cost too much to build?—I have never seen that argument used.

8416. You have not any experience of that at all?—No.

Adaptability of Workhouses as Infirmaries.

8417. (Dr. Downes.) Have you found any difficulty in respect of the adaptation of the wards of workhouses that were originally built for other classes to the purposes of the infirm or of the sick?—Of course the wards which were built for other classes would be narrow wards, but then one could have one row of beds in them, though that would mean that it would be very expensive because you would then require more nursing in proportion.

8418. So that you have to look at it from more points of view than the mere building point of view?—That is so.

8419. Have you had any special cases where they have been able to adapt an old workhouse to the modern requirements of the sick?—There is the case of Lincoln, where the old workhouse wards were made into an infirmary; but then the building rather lent itself to it, as it was sufficiently large to enable them to get a sufficient unit for nursing purposes.

Various forms of administration for Poor Law Infirmaries.

8420. You have had experience of various forms of infirmaries in London and your other districts; can you tell us what are the different forms of administration in the case of Poor Law infirmaries?—You have the administration that holds in London, where the medical superintendent is the head; then you have an infirmary such as the Leicester one (which is an experiment), where the matron is the head of the establishment.

8421. Is there a special order for Leicester?—Yes; all the separate infirmaries have special orders. Then you have the administration which is in force at Birmingham, where there is a house governor, a matron, and a staff of visiting surgeons.

8422. There are three very different systems which you have mentioned to us?—Yes.

8423. At Leicester are the medical staff resident or are they visitors?—There is one resident and one non-resident.

8424. I think at Birmingham the assistant medical officers are resident?—Yes; there are four assistant medical officers resident and four medical officers.

8425. How many separate infirmaries had you in your last district?—Newark, Worksop, and Leicester.

8426. Some of those are comparatively small, I take it?—Yes. The Newark Infirmary is going to be converted into a workhouse. I mean to say, the workhouse is going there. The Worksop Infirmary is a small one with ninety beds, the only male officer on the premises being the porter.

8427. Who is in charge of Worksop?—The matron.

8428. Is that an entirely separate institution?—Yes.

8429. Is there any resident medical officer?—No, they have only ninety beds.

8430. I do not know whether you have any information as to the relative cost of any of these infirmaries?—No, I have not.

8431. Nor of the maintenance cost?—No, I have not taken those details out.

Provision for special classes of sickness.

8432. In your present district and in your last district have you had any special difficulty with regard to providing for special forms of sickness?—Take first the infectious sick; how do the guardians generally deal with those cases?—As a rule they enter into a contract with the sanitary authority with regard to typhoid, small-pox, scarlet fever and diphtheria; and with regard to measles and other such complaints either a separate building is put aside for them or they have separate wards. Nottingham has a little isolated hospital for about three or four cases, and if the number of the cases of measles gets too large they can set aside a large ward in the main building for the purpose.

(Infectious cases).

8433. In the early days of the administration of infectious hospitals by the sanitary authorities, used there to be occasional difficulty and friction?—Yes.

8434. I do not know whether you find so much of that now?—There is, especially at Holbeach, great friction.

8435. In what regard would it be—as to payment or as to the reception of the patients?—As to who should provide the accommodation for such cases.

8436. Have you any other cases of difficulty of that class?—No.

(Phthisis).

8437. I notice that your guardians are in some cases paying special attention to phthisis; you mention that in your last Report?—There is no doubt that the question of phthisis and the isolation of phthisis is receiving a great deal of attention from guardians, and they wish something to be done. At Nottingham they have a sanatorium. The doctor at Nottingham says that he gets very good results, but it is very difficult to maintain discipline amongst these phthisical cases.

8438. Are any of your guardians considering whether it is well to give out-relief in phthisical cases?—No, I do not think so.

8439. Do you wish out-relief given to that class?—I think they should give out-relief to that class if they would go into a sanatorium and the relatives pay part of the cost.

8440. The point which I had in view in my question is that it may be undesirable for advanced cases of phthisis to be living with other people in the same house?—That is so.

(Tuberculous children).

8441. Then with regard to tuberculous children, is any provision made for them?—Both at Nottingham and at Mansfield they have separate wards for them.

8442. Do you think the guardians use voluntary convalescent homes to any extent?—Where possible, but the cost is rather heavy.

ingworm).

8443. What do they do for children suffering from ringworm and diseases of that sort?—Unfortunately we have no special provision for those. In my new district at Kingston Union we have got twenty cases, and I have suggested that they should apply to the Metropolitan Asylums Board and see if they can get that board to take them.

8444. What are they doing for those twenty cases now?—They are giving them no schooling.

8445. That, of course, is a serious thing?—It is very serious. I have called the medical officer's attention to it in order to see if schooling can be given to them.

umber of rials of orkhouse mates paid r at expense relatives.

8446. I think some time back, when you were in London, and possibly since you may have continued it, you prepared some statistics as to the proportion of people dying in Poor Law infirmaries who were buried by their friends; have you any recollection what the result of those statistics was?—Thirty years ago very few (if any) paupers were buried except at the expense of the State, but at the present time I think in most places about two-thirds of the people who die in the workhouses are buried at the expense of their friends.

8447. What do you deduce from that?—That a great many of those who die in our infirmaries are not entirely destitute. There are a certain number who insure themselves so that they can have a burial of their own, but a good many of them are buried by friends. I have seen a hearse and four come out of Paddington Workhouse.

8448. Have you any evidence on that point of insurance that you can give us?—I am sorry to say no.

8449. (Mr. Gardiner.) Is it not common for the friends outside to keep up the insurance payments for those who go into the infirmary, for the sake of avoiding a pauper funeral?—Yes, that is so in a certain number of cases. As I have said, I have seen very good funerals come out of these infirmaries.

8450. Provided by friends?—Provided by relatives.

8451. (Dr. Downes.) Are you aware that it is also alleged that the friends occasionally take the money and do not bury the person?—I have never heard of that.

fect of ngevity on mbers plying for lief.

8452. One cause, perhaps, of the greater number who come into infirmaries now may be that there is a greater proportion of aged people in the population, the lower death-rate having led to an accumulation of old people?—That may be so.

uality of Contract" ovisions.

8453. On the question of contracts, do you find the quality of provisions generally is good in the workhouses that you visit?—In the country districts the general quality is very good.

8454. Can you say the same of the London districts?—There was an improvement before I left.

ifficulties in nnection th Poor w Contracts.

8455. Could you suggest any alteration in the form of tender which may tend to prevent the contractors from obtaining an unfair advantage by a knowledge of the stocks in hand?—The form of tender appears to me to be all right, and I do not see how you could alter the form of tender. In contracting for meat, if you contract, say, for thick and thin flanks, one being worth 7d. a lb. and the other 5d. a lb., then you give an opportunity for the master to say to the contractor, "If I am going to have thin flanks I must count for something in this, and if you do not do it, I shall have all thick flanks," in which case the contractor would lose his profit.

8456. That is the case where the quality of the article is not sufficiently clearly set out in the form of tender, is it not?—Yes.

8457. That is not quite what I had in my mind; in fact, I was going away from provisions then. Supposing, we will say, a board of guardians are contracting for the supply of boots, and the tenderer tenders for boots of different sizes and different kinds; if by any means he has got knowledge that the guardians are overstocked with a particular kind of boot he may put down a very nominal price for that boot and a higher price for those that he would think would be required?—Yes, he may do that.

8458. Such things have been done, have they not?—That is so, but as a matter of fact I think in the case you are referring to, when he had got the contract, he had got it with a very high price for one class of boot, and that class of boot only was delivered, a much larger quantity than the estimated quantity being ordered. But the guardians can easily protect themselves if, following the Whitechapel or Reading procedure, they make the estimated quantity the order for the goods; then no harm can be done.

8459. That is to say, the estimated quantity on the tender becomes the actual order?—That is so.

8460. Have you gone at all into the question of the drug contracts?—No.

8461. Or of the different methods of contracting for drugs in your district?—No; it is such a very technical business.

8462. In fact, the whole of this contracting question and the delivery of the goods is extremely technical, is it not?—It is very technical. You want to take up one branch at a time in order to learn it.

Mansfield soup-kitchen experiment.

8463. In your report you speak of the failure of the soup kitchen at Mansfield; speaking of the relief of distress at Mansfield, you say the soup kitchen was opened, but it is considered an unsatisfactory method of relieving the distress and was therefore soon closed; can you give us any details of it?—It was found that the casual labourer not settled in Mansfield and that class of people were getting the soup, and not the people for whom it was intended. As far as I could ascertain there was really no distress at Mansfield. The population of this Union increases at the rate of nearly 5 per cent. per annum.

8464. Was that soup kitchen opened by a voluntary agency?—Yes.

Removal of factories from London,

8465. In your memorandum, paragraph 30, you speak of the removal of two firms from the south of London; do you know in what unions in London their factories originally were?—Messrs. Ransome & Sons came from Battersea.

8466. And Simpson & Co.?—They came from the south of the Thames.

Effect of trade depression on pauperism.

8467. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) About women's work—I think Professor Smart has already referred to it—you say in paragraph 19 that the total pauperism is greater although the women are also working as well as the men. I know that in your report, published in the 34th Annual Report of the board, you say: "It must be remembered that as there is much female labour employed in the factories of the large towns in this district, depression in trade is not so serious a fact as in those towns where men only are employed." That is what we have heard also about Yorkshire, and it is interesting to find that your experience now rather goes the other way?—I rather wanted to point out in my memorandum that in Leicestershire there is a lax administration, that there ought to be less pauperism in Leicestershire than in other districts, but that owing to this lax administration, especially in Leicester and Barrow there is more pauperism.

8468. It is even worse than it looks, because it ought to be better with the women at work?—Yes.

8469. Do you not think that where the men and women are working together at the same trade, you might say that if that trade is bad it strikes the whole family?—Yes; but then what does bad trade mean? Take, for instance, a cotton factory; supposing you are usually manufacturing 100,000 lbs., then it is bad trade if you are only manufacturing 95,000 lbs.; and good trade means 105,000 lbs. If you are only selling 95,000 lbs. instead of 100,000 lbs. you will go on at that for a month or two and increase your stock, and then afterwards you will go on working five days a week or four days a week until the stock in hand has diminished. There is really not very much difference between bad trade and good trade, and I do not think the state of trade affects pauperism to the extent it is generally supposed to do.

8470. Then the depression has not been such as to throw whole families out of work?—No.

Lavish relief at Leicester.

8471. Would the laxity of administration take the form of giving out-relief possibly in supplementation of the woman's earnings?—This is in Leicester, and is a point which Mr. Walsh will be examined upon. In Leicester, although the women and children are probably earning 30s. or more a week, the guardians have relieved men on the outdoor labour test, that is, the man can get on a test and receive relief at the rate of 10s. to 14s. a week; he takes home to his wife the half which is given him in kind, and he has got the other half to spend on himself. He is probably quite content with that, and therefore you cannot get him to seek for work.

Mr. Nicholas Herbert.

2 April, 1906.

8472. Do you think there is any tendency, by cheapening the women's labour, to decrease the men's earnings, or are they all paid at the same rates?—You must get a manufacturer to give you an answer to that.

Abundance of employment for women.

8473. In paragraph 103 you say, "It appears to me that whilst there is no lack of employment for women, there are, especially during the winter months, many men who cannot obtain employment"; does that refer to your district especially?—I think you will find that, generally speaking—I might say that even at Market Bosworth, and other rural unions—they are obliged to get charwomen to do the necessary household work in the workhouses, and they find a difficulty in getting them at 2s. a day.

8475. In paragraph 97 you give us an interesting case of a man staying in the house and being paid to do the work of the house in Boston union?—Yes; I put that paragraph in to show that a lax indoor administration is almost as bad as a lax outdoor administration.

8476. Would that be quite an exceptional case, or could it be paralleled?—In many unions in London it used to be the same, but I think most of that lax indoor administration has gone now.

8477. In paragraph 101 you say, "Owing to there being so few able-bodied women in the workhouses at the present time most of the necessary household work has to be done by paid labour"; if there is a large number of men in the house, is there any reason why they should not do the household work?—On the male side I have tried my best to get the masters to make them to do it, and in nearly all the unions they do the work; but you cannot have the men going on the female side to do the household work.

8478. But they do it on the male side?—Yes.

Cause of preponderance of women on out-relief.

8479. (Mr. Bentham.) With regard to the explanation you gave of the fact of there being more women receiving outdoor than indoor relief, I think you attribute that to female employment being more easily obtained now than it was at one time?—That is it.

8481. A man, when sick, is more helpless than a woman?—Yes, but it is not that class of very infirm men who are getting into the workhouse; there are a good many who are far from being past work.

8482. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) Would it not be the case that the guardians grant out-relief much more easily to women than to men?—I do not think the out-relief makes much difference in this respect.

8483. Would it be true to say that there would be a very much larger female pauperism on out-relief than there would be of male pauperism?—Generally there is much more out-relief given to females.

Methods of dealing with Poor Law children.

8484. Passing on now to the children, what is done for them in your district; are they sent to schools or are they kept in the workhouse, or are they boarded out?—Ten unions have got homes or separate schools away from the workhouse, and the other unions keep them in the workhouse.

8485. So the majority keep them in the workhouse?—Yes, but a very large number are boarded out, and a very large number are sent to certified schools. As many as possible go to the certified schools, but the certified schools are now overcrowded and it is very difficult to get children in them.

8486. (Mr. Gardiner.) Do they keep any record of the comparative results in their future careers as between the children who are sent to the certified homes and the others?—I am afraid not.

8487. Practically they are not kept in any union, are they?—No.

After employment of Poor Law children.

8488. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) Is there any difficulty in placing the children from the schools when they go out to work?—None whatever; at least I have not heard of any difficulty. In the case of the girls there are more applications for them than there are girls.

8489. Is it always a very satisfactory service that they go to, or is it not very often a rough place where there are no prospects?—I think that the guardians, and especially the lady guardians, take a great interest in those girls, and I think you will find that a good many who are sent from the certified homes get very good situations. For instance, the certified home at Lincoln will not place out a girl unless there are two servants.

8490. Do the boys mostly go into the army or the navy, or do they go into the local trades?—They go into the local trades. I am trying to get the guardians to send as many as are fit for sea service to the "Exmouth" but there is the difficulty that the farmers want them in the rural unions.

8491. And they go to the farmers, do they?—Yes.

8492. How do they manage in the towns when they go out to trades there, but when they are too young to earn enough for themselves to live upon; are there working boys' homes to which they send them?—They really board them out and give them relief, with the sanction of the Local Government Board. That has been done for the first year of their apprenticeship, when they are unable to earn sufficient to maintain themselves.

8493. Have you ever considered whether the children in the schools do more of the housework than is desirable for them?—Where that is so, I should call attention to it.

8494. Do you think that it is not so as a rule, and that they are not overdone with that work?—Yes. They have plenty of time for play.

Pauperism and administration at Bingham, Stamford and Spilsby.

8495. (Mr. Loch.) You have referred to Bingham, which of course is a historically notable union; there the outdoor relief compared with the indoor relief is really considerable—39 in the house and 227 out, according to the 1st July return. Do they check it by the carefulness of their scrutiny?—Yes; but you see they have only got 2 per cent. of pauperism.

8496. Would you say that the scrutiny is extremely careful?—Very.

8497. Would you say the same of Stamford, which is different, in so far as there is much more in-relief?—The Marquis of Exeter takes a great deal of interest there.

8498. There again intelligence is brought into the work?—Yes.

8499. With regard to Spilsby, there is a small indoor and a large outdoor pauperism; what does that really show?—Spilsby has gone down from 111 indoor poor on 1st January, 1895, to 83 on 1st January, 1905. When you come to Stamford it has got exactly the same number, 135 or 134, and their out-relief has gone down from 258 to 146. Stamford is following a new policy rather, but the policy at Spilsby is older and at Bingham it is older still, and therefore the number of indoor poor remains down very low.

Reduction in pauperism without use of workhouse test.

8500. What is clear is this, is it not, that granted those distinctions that you refer to, if there is a real scrutiny into the cases you can get your pauperism down?—That is so.

8501. And that to a certain extent without the workhouse test being continuously used?—That is so.

Suitability of Application and report book.

8502. Then I would ask you whether the form that we now have for the Application and Report Book is really suitable for investigation?—Very few Application and Report Books are properly kept. The form itself is a very good form. The case-paper system of course supplements it and makes it larger, but the column headed "Observations" covers a lot, and if they would put the information in properly and keep the Application and Report Book as Mr. Dicken, the relieving officer at Belper does, you would have very good administration.

8503. But then the word "Cause" and the word "Observations" are so very general, and so far as I know, the form itself is really not properly used?—Very few relieving officers properly fill in the form.

Conditions in Chesterfield Union.

8504. Going to Chesterfield, the pauperism there is very high, and you have a very large number of not able-bodied adults and wives receiving relief; is there anything special about Chesterfield?—I have spoken to the guardians several times and urged them to look into the cases themselves instead of leaving the cases to the guardian of the parish, but they will not. In most instances it is left to the guardian of the parish to decide as to the relief.

8505. That is the radical change next to investigation?—That is so.

Effect of scales of relief.

8506. You have referred to the question of scales, and I think you said that at Nottingham they had none?—They had no regular scale there.

8507. Do you not think that the scale system leads to always adopting an allowance system?—I do not think so.

8508. When you get a case which, at any rate in co-operation with charity, might be dealt with thoroughly, an allowance is given and the thoroughness of the relief is forgotten; do you think anything can be done to promote a real examination of cases from that point of view rather than adopting a scale system with out-door relief and a policy of allowances?—I do not know how you would get the Derby guardians to do that. They have their scale, and directly a person has to be relieved they look at the scale and say he is entitled to this.

8509. Supposing you could abolish scales?—If you could abolish them, I think it would do a great deal of good.

8510. Then you would have to use intelligence more?—Yes, that is, every case should be treated upon its merits.

Meaning of "deserving."

8511. You have used the word "deserving," in evidence, and I suppose that is the word that is commonly used in making some distinction as to the mode of relief given, or something of that kind, that is to say, it really implies rather a favouritism than a useful distinction?—Yes.

8512. So if we could get rid of it in the "aged deserving poor" and such phrases it would be all to the good?—That is so.

8513. In any of your towns is there any suggestion that you should follow the example of Bradford or some other towns that have a system of visiting, or any kind of supplementary organisation by way of charitable relief?—No, I do not think they have gone into that yet.

Charity and pauperism at Boston and Louth.

8514. In Boston is there a good deal of endowed charitable relief?—I cannot remember, but I think there is.

8515. Is there at Louth?—At Louth there is.

8516. Does not the pauperism of Louth stand rather close to the question of charity; the pauperism of Louth is very remarkable, is it not, for a town of that kind?—It is; but then, it has got 101 guardians, and each guardian acts for his parish.

Effect of size of Boards of Guardians in Lincolnshire.

8517. Is not the pauperism of Lincolnshire rather remarkably large?—It is, and so is the number of guardians.

8518. Is that cause and effect?—I think so. If the number of guardians were reduced, and they were not appointed for special parishes, I think you would get Lincolnshire down to the other counties.

8519. Do the guardians adopt any standard in the appointment of their relieving officers, or is it a question of their being known to members of the board?—I think in most cases they are known to members of the board, and are not appointed specially for their fitness.

Possibility of prescribing qualifications for Relieving Officer.

8520. Would you be of opinion that a standard might be adopted, and that an instruction might be given that relieving officers should fulfil certain qualifications as a preliminary?—Yes, if you put down a good standard for those qualifications.

8521. Have you found that the relieving officers are set aside by the guardians, who cross-question the applicant and then come to their own decision independently of his evidence?—In some unions—yes, and in some—no.

8522. In several important unions is it done so?—In such a union, for instance, as Leicester, the guardians will not always look at his evidence; but in Nottingham everything the relieving officer says is thoroughly weighed and gone into.

The prestige of Relieving Officers with their Guardians.

8523. That is, where the administration is bad, the relieving officer is set aside?—That is so.

Effect of Out-door Relief School Children Order at Birmingham.

8524. With regard to the Underfed Children Order, are you in favour of having an order like that in force side by side with the normal administration of the Poor Law, by which the child is dealt with and then the father, if possible, is dealt with by way of loan or prosecution?—That question of the Feeding of School Children Order is rather an important one in my new district. At Birmingham they had 6,000 children who were fed daily during the winter months, but since the Feeding of School Children Order the number has dropped to about 2,000.

8525. To what is that due?—The Birmingham Free Dinner Society, which had been feeding children daily for the past 30 years, ceased to exist after the Order came into force. The other voluntary source for feeding children (which was instituted by Mr. Hookham) is now confined by him to orphan and deserted children. Mr. Hookham is still feeding 1,600 daily and the Birmingham Guardians 400, so that the number is reduced to about 2,000.

8526. Then the process was this, that the charitable agencies were relieving, and when the order came in they referred their cases to the Poor Law, and when the Poor Law came in they made investigation, and the result was an enormous reduction in the number of children?—Yes. One of the parents of those children was getting nearly £4 a week, and many of them were receiving between £2 and 30s. a week.

8527. Would you say that the charities will again start their feeding, and so the evil circle will again be performed?—I cannot say.

8528. Taking the principle of the Act, which is to punish a neglecting parent, have not boards of guardians ample authority to punish parents if the children are neglected?—Yes, through the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children.

8529. You could do it yourselves direct, could you not through the guardians?—Yes, but the 400 who are at present on the books of Birmingham are the children of casual labourers; sometimes their parents can give them a good breakfast and sometimes they cannot. In regard to that 400, I think the Birmingham Guardians have asked in most instances for the board's sanction, so as not to have to prosecute in these cases, because they could not recover the money, seeing that they are nearly all casual labourers.

8530. They could prosecute and so bring justice, as it were, into the field?—Yes.

8531. But they prefer not to do so?—They think it is not advisable to do so.

8533. Still this would be a standing supplement to the wage of the casual worker, equivalent to the number of his children?—Yes, it would.

Child pauperism at Chesterfield and elsewhere.

8534. One is rather struck with the number of children who are being relieved by, for instance, the Chesterfield Board. I see there are 906 children of able-bodied parents, and then there are 204 of the not able-bodied, besides the children, which is a smaller number, who are in the workhouse. Do you find that there is an increase in child pauperism?—I have only gone into the question of in-door child pauperism. That has gone down, as you know, and was going down for some years until the Act of 1899.

Mr. Nicholas Herbert.

2 April, 1906.

8535. To which Act do you refer?—There are two really—the Local Government Acts of 1889 and 1894.

8536. Are the guardians using their power of guardianship to a larger extent than before?—Much.

8537. Has that had any effect?—I think so.

8538. Do you attribute the increase of child pauperism to the bad conditions of the last few years?—No. I think much more interest has been taken in the matter, owing to so much being spoken about the children in the newspapers.

8539. That is to say, the sentiment of the moment is creating the pauperism of the time?—It is doing a certain amount in that direction. For instance, there was a case at Guildford where a foster-father and foster-mother took a child out of the lying-in ward and had it till it was about three or four. Then the woman, whilst the husband was away, took it to the workhouse, hoping to be able to find the parents thereby. The foster-father was greatly incensed and he tried to get that child back, but the guardians will not give it up.

8540. Do you find that the Bastardy Acts are enforced strictly?—I do not know; I have not followed that.

8541. Are you in favour of a policy of creating concurrent institutions for relief, such as the distress committees of the unemployed fund?—That is rather a matter of politics is it not?

Type of applicants for work under the Unemployed Workmen Act.

8542. It is a matter that depends very closely on poor relief, because you have in any of those places where there is a Distress Committee two authorities: one, the Poor Law authority, for dealing with distress under the title of destitution, and the other the authority for dealing with it under Distress Committee conditions. Have you made any investigations in those places where this method is going on?—Yes. A very large number of those who have applied to get work get their applications acceded to, but some do not accept it when offered.

8543. Are they the same type of applicants as would come to the guardians in other years?—I am trying to obtain statistics showing how many have been paupers before, and as to the class applying. Some—probably many of those who apply to the distress committees are known to the relieving officers as belonging to the casual or pauper class.

8544. Might those statistics be put in?—Yes, I will send them on. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XV. (C).)

Possibility of co-operation between Guardians and Charities at Louth.

8545. With regard to Louth, where there is a good deal of charity, do you think that a policy would be of service by which the charities of the district might be brought into some sort of cohesion and recognised as a body parallel to the poor law, and enabled to deal with cases which, under normal conditions and orders, the Poor Law cannot deal with?—Do you mean to set up a separate authority?

8546. To set up a kind of assistant authority?—If you could let a committee of the board of guardians deal with those cases from the charitable funds—that is, if there were any charitable funds—I think that would be very handy.

8547. The cases which have struck me most at times are cases of widows; of course a considerable expenditure of money relatively might enable them to provide for themselves, but as a rule these cases, as you know, hang on the board of guardians, they get an allowance and they go on keeping it. Taking Louth again, where there is a good deal of charitable money, could not those cases be dealt with and kept altogether away from the poor law?—It would be a very good thing, and it would save expense, if you could keep those cases away from the Poor Law but the authority investigating should be careful to give to only proper persons and after full inquiry.

8548. Suppose there was one competent inquiry agency in the place, and there being no scale, the cases were discriminated, so that those that could be dealt with only by a continuation of an allowance were set apart from the others, then could we not, wherever there are funds, bring a new force to the aid of the Poor Law, by which we could keep down the pauperism by the force of charitable interest?—If that could be done, if charity could work in conjunction with the Poor Law, it is no doubt that it would be good for the poor and that it would relieve the rates.

8549. Do you see any way of giving charity that united feeling of action which the Poor Law has got, unless it be in some way organised and officially recognised?—If you get the Charity Organisation Society officially recognised, do you mean? As you probably know, the Charity Organisation Society in some districts is thought to be too strict in its measures, and I do not think therefore, that it would have a good effect, so to speak, in those districts.

8550. Suppose the Charity Organisation Society were altogether put aside for the moment, the problem taken in hand de novo, and all the charities of the place were organised, for that purpose a subsidiary organisation to these ends being created, would that not lead to the old feeling being more or less set aside and a responsible body being created?—You would have to get an authority that is in accord with public opinion. Who is to put up that authority? If there was an authority which could be put up in accordance with public opinion, I think it would be very handy indeed; but how to make it in accordance with public opinion without election I do not see.

8551. Would you be in favour of a statutory arrangement like that in Denmark, by which the aged have a right to outdoor relief or other relief?—There you come to the question of Old Age Pensions.

8552. I do?—That is a point which I have hardly gone into thoroughly. I think I should have to give many month's study to it before replying.

8553. With regard to the ins-and-outs, do you find that in large towns like Nottingham and Leicester there are a good many ins-and-outs?—There is no doubt about that.

Adequacy of existing treatment of "ins and outs."

8554. Are you satisfied with the method of dealing with them by way of the present detention in the workhouse?—Where there is a well administered workhouse they will not go to it; but at a place like Leicester, where there is easy administration, they will.

8555. That is to say, the more stringent or careful the administration in the workhouse, the fewer will be the ins-and-outs?—That is so.

8557. They practically do belong to a class that might be so dealt with as a class, do they not?—Yes.

Non-Poor Law expenditure paid out of poor-rate.

8558. With regard to the poor rate, would you be of opinion that it would be well to separate the poor rate absolutely from the rates which are usually now collected under the term "poor rate?"—I think it would be as well to have it separately stated.

8559. When you deal with large areas like London, do you think that a system of the local relief authority estimating the expenditure of the year and receiving a grant for the purpose from a superior authority could ever be enforced as a good method of holding expenditure in check?—I do not quite follow.

8560. Suppose in London, for instance, for any particular purpose, as we now have the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund we had a central authority, not making grants out of a common fund, but requiring an estimate from the local authority and making grants according to that estimate—which is the system adopted in many cases abroad—do you think that would lead to a greater economy of administration?—I cannot exactly see the working of it. I have not gone into it.

Adequacy of existing Poor Law areas.

8561. With regard to poor relief institutions, do you think it would be as well to have a county centre for certain groups of institutions?—Certainly not. I sincerely hope that the present Poor Law area will be allowed to remain. It has on the whole worked well.

8562. Suppose we take the afflicted classes?—Suppose we take the sick. You cannot treat the sick wholesale. Go into a country workhouse, and see the guardians there when they go amongst the sick whom everybody sympathises with. One guardian will go up to one man and another guardian to another, and you will find a penny packet of sweets coming out to an old man who is a really good character and who has had to be relieved owing to sickness. By keeping the union as it is, you have got an area from which everybody who is elected can easily come. You have your fortnightly meeting or your weekly meetings—many of them have weekly meetings; but if you have a county authority you would have probably less than twelve meetings a year.

8563. You yourself have mentioned one group of cases—ringworm cases; why should there not be a local provision by the county for all such cases?—With regard to cases of ringworm, you have only got them in large towns, and the number of cases is very few.

8564. Even so, there is no provision for them?—That is so, but Kingston I think is the only place where they have got ringworm as an epidemic.

Need for larger area for dealing with epileptics and defective children.

8565. With regard to defectives, is it not desirable to have a common place reserved for defective people?—I should like to see the epileptics and defective children removed from the workhouses. I think I have said that in my Report.

8566. For those purposes you may use the county?—You want in some instances a larger area for such cases.

8567. And that would be the group of counties?—Yes.

8568. How would you support those groups; would you have a rate for them?—I suppose it would have to come from the rates.

8569. The local rates, do you mean?—Yes.

Effect of "Officers'" Grant.

8570. With regard to the salaries and other sums which are not so very large, which are paid for by the Exchequer in the case of workhouses, do you think it desirable to go on with that system?—It is giving some dissatisfaction at the present time. In 1888 it was given according to the salaries then paid, and in unions where the population is increasing the salaries have greatly gone up and they are getting nothing extra; but in other unions where the population has gone down, they have probably fewer officers and yet they are getting the same amount of money. However, it has had one good effect; where you have a small rural union, and there is a question of reducing the staff of nurses, the argument that the salaries of the nurses are paid out of the contribution has some effect.

8571. That system might be revised, you think?—I think it requires revision.

8572. Also, is it not true that the rateable value of these places has gone up immensely?—It has.

8573. Could not we therefore throw the whole of this administration on to the local rates?—I have not seen how it would work, so I cannot say. I have not thought about it.

8574. It is all part and parcel of normal administration?—Yes.

8575. So that under a common principle it would lie upon them?—Yes.

Means of dealing with unemployment at Nottingham, Leicester and elsewhere.

8576. With regard to Nottingham and the other towns, in the bad years which we must all expect, are you satisfied with the appliances which we now use, if I may so call them, for dealing with the unemployed?—Are you referring to the Unemployed Workmen's Act?

8577. Not merely to that, but you have got the labour yard and the workhouse, you have got the borough council relief, and you have got the distress committees dealing practically with the destitute, be they considered unemployed or be it a Poor Law matter. Would you propose to adopt the Poor Law as the central system for dealing with Nottingham, or what would you say—because the returns of pauperism in some of these towns are not satisfactory, are they?—No; they are not.

8578. They suggest that the thing requires consideration so far as it is connected with the unemployed?—Which towns are you talking of now?

8579. I was thinking of Nottingham and of Leicester, particularly of Leicester?—Nottingham has got 2 per cent. of pauperism, against 2·67 for the rest of England; therefore it has got less pauperism than the average.

8580. They keep down the Poor Law relief by dealing with charitable people and by dealing with the unemployed through a connection which was used for relief purposes and not necessarily for work in connection with the municipality?—Yes; and then you have also got to remember that Nottingham is the centre to which all those people from the outside come in order to get the medical relief and in order to get into the Nottingham workhouse.

Mr. Nicholas Herbert. 2 April, 1906.

8581. My point is that in Nottingham the system is adopted of co-operating with charitable people, and the result has been that the pauperism did not rise there as it rose, for instance, in Leicestershire?—That is so.

8582. Does that not suggest means of getting out of our difficulty? The Whitechapel Order, as you know, dealt with the able-bodied by admitting the head of the family into the house, and letting the charitable keep the family while the man went into the house. Could not that system be adopted, it being clearly thrown upon the charitable people to keep the family if the house is accepted?—Yes.

8583. Otherwise, do you not fear that these last twenty years, which give a very bad result in some places, will create a permanent pauperism?—Has it given very bad results in many large towns?

8584. A good many of these towns show a distinct rise. If you take the last twenty years Nottingham is just keeping abreast with its increasing population; Leicester shows very badly up; the pauperism and the population of Mansfield seem to run almost side by side; and then you know what has happened in Chesterfield. This problem therefore seems a very serious one, unless the crisis is temporary?—You cannot compare the winter of 1904–5 with other winters. There is no doubt that then very little was spent on public works. In former years millions were being spent by local authorities and by railway companies upon works which employed a very large number of men, but during the winter 1904–5 there was very little work being carried out in my district out of loans, except the Derwent Valley water scheme.

Lack of employment in winter of 1904–5.

8585. That argument of course carries us to a certain extent, but it leaves us in this position, that unless great public works are undertaken, and that out of public money, you have as an alternative public pauperism?—That is it.

8586. Which is a very serious alternative to leave us in?—Yes.

Working of Out-Relief Unions.

8587. (Sir Samuel Provis.) You have, I think, in your district one case of out-relief unions, have you not?—Yes.

8588. Only one?—Yes.

8589. How has it worked?—It is such a small out-relief union that it works quite smoothly.

8590. Is it Grantham?—Yes, Belvoir in the Grantham Union.

8591. Do you find that there is any difficulty in working the system; is there friction between the boards of guardians?—No; and I do not see how there should be any friction.

8592. You do not find any, in fact?—No; there is the same relieving officer.

8593. Is there the same clerk?—No.

8594. Is there any tendency to send the paupers to the workhouse, because the indoor relief will be charged on the whole of the union, whereas the outdoor relief is only charged on the out-relief union?—I do not think so.

Necessity for indicating the proportion of the poor rate spent on Poor Law purposes.

8595. I am not sure that I quite understood an answer you gave just now with regard to the poor rate: do you say that you would have a separate rate for Poor Law purposes?—I would have the rate shown. The statistics of the Local Taxation Returns show us the amount which was raised for Poor Law purposes only; that is a very handy thing to show the guardians, and I think it would be just as handy if the ratepayers knew of it.

8596. But you do not contemplate a separate rate, do you?—No, not a separate rate.

Origin of "Officers'" Grant.

8597. With regard to salaries, there is a certain amount paid to boards of guardians by county councils calculated on the amount which they paid for salaries in a particular year?—Yes; in the year, 1888.

Mr. Nicholas Herbert.

2 April, 1906.

8598. Is that not misunderstood? Do not the guardians think that the intention of that was that the salaries should be paid out of the separate fund contributed in that way?—I think so.

8599. Whereas it was only a means, was it not, of making a contribution from a larger area towards the cost of Poor Law administration?—That was the intention of Parliament, I believe.

8600. But that is not fully realised, is it?—No, it is not.

8601. It would not be possible now to abolish that grant unless you substitute something else for it, would it?—You must substitute something else, otherwise there would be great discontent.

Effect of Out-door Relief School Children Order.

8602. With regard to the Underfed Children Order, is it realised that that Order did not make it the duty of the guardians to give relief to anybody whom it was not their duty to relieve before?—They considered they could not give outdoor relief to able-bodied men, and most of those children are the children of able-bodied men.

8604. Therefore, the point was not that they issued relief to a new class, but that the mode of relief might be different?—Yes.

Scales of relief: their operation and effect.

8605. (Mr. Bentham.) With regard to the point that was raised by Mr. Loch as to the scale, it seemed as though you meant to say that the adoption of a scale of relief for outdoor able-bodied men was equivalent to an allowance system?—Mr. Loch was referring to a scale of outdoor relief not for men only, but generally. Most boards of guardians have a scale of relief something like 1s. 6d. for a child, and 3s. for a widow, and 4s. for over seventy, etc.

8606. You stated that you thought it would be a good thing if it could be abolished?—I think so.

8607. If it were abolished, would it not result in giving an amount that would cover all the members of the family, and so the relief then would vary according to the relief given to the members of the family?—I do not think so.

8608. Would you give the same amount of relief to a family of two or three that you would give to a family of nine?—No; certainly not.

8609. Then on what basis would you vary it?—The guardians would have to consider what was necessary in each case. They would naturally come to some conclusion.

8610. Would it be necessary to count heads in order to ascertain what amount could be given?—They must count heads.

8611. Therefore, in whatever form you give relief, it would come to the same?—They would have first of all to take into account what was going into the house.

8612. So they do when they adopt the scale; they take off the earnings, in order to bring the total income of the family to the scale?—That is not the usual plan.

8613. Surely any board of guardians would never give the full scale where there might be a reasonable amount of earnings, and yet give the same scale where there are none?—They only take off a shilling when there is a lodger in the house, or something of that kind.

8614. That is if the lodger pays a shilling?—No, the lodger would probably pay 9s. a week for his board and lodging.

TWENTY-THIRD DAY.

The Rev. T. GAGE GARDINER.
Mr. C. S. LOCH.

Miss OCTAVIA HILL.

Mr. R. H. A. G. DUFF (Secretary).
Mr. J. JEFFREY (Assistant Secretary).

The Hon. GERALD WALSH, called; and Examined

The Hon. Gerald Walsh.

3 April, 1906.

8615. (Chairman.) I understand you have only recently been appointed Local Government Board Inspector for the North-Midland District?—That is so.

8616. You felt that your experience was hardly sufficient to enable you to give a general description of your district; and therefore you have, for the last few months, been concentrating your attention, so far as this Commission is concerned, upon the administration of the poor law in Leicester?—Yes.

Figures as to pauperism and expenditure at Leicester.

8617. According to the memorandum you have handed in (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XVIII. (A—E.)) there has been a very remarkable rise in the amount of poor relief given in Leicester, both indoor and outdoor. Let us first deal with the facts, taking the decennial period; the number of indoor poor has risen from 1,169 to 1,730?—Yes.

8618. And the outdoor from 2,830 to 6,179?—Yes.

8619. And there has been a very large increase in the number of vagrants?—Yes.

8620. A rise from 6,674 to 17,173?—Yes, that is in five years.

8621. In a table* which you have put in (see Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XVIII. (E.)) you give the increase in the amount of the Precept, which has risen, taking the Michaelmas periods, from £26,470 at Michaelmas 1895 to £52,380 at Michaelmas 1906?—Yes.

8622. I think you wish to make an explanation on the table. I understand that the guardian's financial year ends at Lady-day, and that the precept that is issued at Lady-day is for the Michaelmas half-year following?—Yes.

8623. Therefore these figures would have to be corrected in this way, that the year in each instance beginning with 1895 would have to commence with Michaelmas and not with Lady-day?—That is so.

8624. With that slight alteration this table hold good?—Yes.*

8625. Therefore for the present year, that is the year 1906, the expenditure for the half year would be £52,380?—Yes, that is the amount required up to September 29th next.

* Table subsequently amended.

8626. If the amount of the precept is the same for the remaining half of the year the expenditure for that year will be heavy—it will be £104,000, will it not ?—Yes.

Effect of Machinery on unemployment.

8627. There being, therefore, no dispute as regards the facts of the rise in pauperism in Leicester Union, which are further illustrated by your chart (see Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XVIII.(B)) let us investigate for a moment or two what are the alleged causes. It is stated that there was a considerable contraction of work in the shoe factories; have you been able to look into that matter at all ?—Not very much, but I have met two or three of the guardians who know the shoe trade, and they are agreed that there has been a considerable dislocation of trade owing to the introduction of machinery.

8628. Will this be a permanent contraction in their judgment, or will the introduction of machinery in a short time increase the amount of employment ?—They think that a great number of these men who have been displaced will not find work in the factories again.

8629. That is to say, that the younger men will be taken on ?—Yes.

8630. Has there been a contraction in any other great branch of labour in Leicester ?—The same sort of thing is taking place in the hosiery trade.

8631. There has been the introduction of new machinery ?—Yes.

8632. So that practically there is a certain displacement of the old labour conditions ?—Yes. Framework knitters have been displaced.

Instances and causes of lax administration of relief at Leicester.

8633. That would be one of the causes contributing to this increase of pauperism ?—Yes, I think certainly it would.

8634. It is alleged that almost simultaneously with this contraction of work there was a change in the administration, and that relief was then given upon easier conditions than before ?—Yes.

8635. According to paragraph 15 of your memorandum the rule as regards outdoor relief that previously was in existence was altered; do you consider that alteration was a very material one ?—I certainly think it was.

8636. It struck out the words, "whether such relatives are liable by law," I understand ?—Yes.

8637. And it substituted the words, "where the united income of those liable ?"—Yes.

8638. Can you explain what is the difference between the two ?—If a man was living with his sister-in-law she would not be liable by law to maintain him, but under rule 2, as it stood in 1893, it was taken into consideration that he was living with his sister-in-law, who might have been in good circumstances; as amended in 1902, her income would not have been taken into consideration.

8639. It limited the liability to support to those only who were legally liable ?—Yes.

8640. The task of work was also modified ?—Yes.

8641. And the amount that was required as a task was diminished ?—Yes.

8642. At the same time the scale of pay was revised and increased ?—That is so.

8643. These alterations were the result, I understand, of two elections in which the question of outdoor relief was given a prominent place ?—Yes.

8644. Coincident with these alterations there was a great increase in outdoor relief, was there not ?—Yes.

8645. And there was an increase in the indoor relief too ?—Yes.

8646. And the workhouse premises were insufficient to enable the guardians to apply the workhouse test ?—That is so.

8647. Side by side with this great increase in outdoor relief, there was no corresponding increase in the number of relieving officers ?—No.

8648. The result, apparently, was that there was a good deal of deception, and certain persons, according to the statements in your memorandum who ought not to have had relief obtained it ?—Yes, in 1901.

8649. Did the auditor call attention to the great increase of expenditure in outdoor relief ?—Yes.

8650. Do you know if that has had any effect on the guardians ?—No, not at present.

8651. Is there any inclination on the part of the guardians to revert to the older methods ?—Within the last ten days they have re-introduced tasks of work at the workhouse, namely, oakum picking and wood-chopping, which had been completely in disuse for some time.

8652. There are signs then that they are screwing the standard up ?—There are signs that they think the thing has gone far enough now, and they will try and pull it together again, I think. They are revising the dietary for the able-bodied.

Centripetal effect on pauperism of lax administration.

8653. 1902 is the date at which these changes were made. In paragraph 34 you give an analysis of the Leicester Distress Committee's statistics, showing the length of residence in Leicester of the various applicants; that shows that 42 per cent. of these applicants had been in the borough less than five years, does it not ?—Yes.

8654. So that notwithstanding the assumed bad conditions of trade, and the lack of employment, there was apparently an influx into Leicester of people seeking employment, or seeking relief, after 1902 ?—Yes.

8655. Are these figures endorsed by public opinion or private investigation in Leicester ?—They are the official figures of the Leicester Distress Committee.

8656. It is considered that this system of relief has attracted to Leicester undesirable persons ?—Yes.

8657. Who have come there not to get work, but to obtain relief under the conditions which now exists ?—That is so.

Rules adopted by Leicester Guardians for granting relief.

8658. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Have you regular rules for the administration of relief at Leicester ?—They have for certain classes.

8659. You refer to a rule in one of the paragraphs of your memorandum. Is that one of a series of rules they have got ?—Yes, one of a series of rules.

8660. Was there any alteration except in the one to which you have drawn attention ? Perhaps you have not had occasion to look into that to see whether they differ in other respects from the old rules ?—I think they did in some respects.

8661. Perhaps you would put in the two sets of rules showing the extent of the alterations ?—I will do so. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XVIII. (F).)

8662. Do you know generally what was the nature of the changes; was it in the direction of laxity ?—Yes, it was in that direction.

System of Relief Committees at Leicester.

8663. Have they relief committees at Leicester ?—Yes, Six Relief Committees.

8664. How do they work them; is there a fixed committee dealing with a specific district ?—They deal with them according to wards, a committee to each relief district.

8665. Do the same guardians always act on a particular committee ?—Always.

8666. Do the relieving officers' districts correspond with the wards ?—They do, but a relieving officer may take more than one ward.

8667. There are forty-eight guardians, I think ?—Yes.

8668. It is all one parish ?—Yes.

8669. The parish is sub-divided into wards ?—Yes.

8670. Do you happen to remember whether there are many wards ?—I am afraid I could not tell you.

8671. (Chairman.) Do you know how they are elected; does a ward elect more than one member ?—I am afraid I could not tell you.

System of election of Guardians at Leicester.

8672. The reason I ask is that in Nottingham apparently there are four wards, and each ward elects twelve guardians ?—I find there are sixteen wards in Leicester.

8673. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Therefore there would be three guardians to a ward ?—Three guardians to a ward.

8674. Do they all retire together ?—They do.

8675. Do you know how the relief committees are composed; are the guardians who represent particular wards selected by the board to sit on the relief committee which sits for that ward ?—Yes, principally.

8676-7. (Chairman.) To put the point bluntly: assuming that four wards were to elect twelve guardians, would those twelve guardians administer out-relief to the people who had elected them ?—Yes, to a great degree they would.

The Hon. Gerald Walsh.

3 April, 1906.

8678. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Have you had occasion to attend any relief committees since you have been inspector in that district ?—I have not attended a relief committee.

8679. I think I understood you to say they were now proposing to re-open the stone yard ?—To re-impose the tasks of work in the workhouse.

8680. Do you mean as a labour test ?—No, for the able-bodied men in the workhouse.

8681. (Mr. Gardiner.) Is that because the spring is coming on ?—I do not think so.

8682. (Sir Samuel Provis.) They have always had a task of work for the outdoor able-bodied men, have not they ?—Yes.

Out-relief to single able-bodied men.

8683. Did they ever give outdoor relief to able-bodied single men ?—A resolution was passed on 3rd October, 1905, permitting out relief on the labour test to be given to single able-bodied men under certain conditions. Many applied but failed to carry out the conditions.

8684. I see the scale of pay does not mention the class of a single man ?—In the altered rules which I shall hand in you will find that the scale of pay for able-bodied men is at the rate of 1s. 3d. per day, half in pay and half in kind.

8685. With regard to the task outside the workhouse for the able-bodied outdoor paupers, have they got a stone yard now ?—There is no stone yard at all.

Workhouse Farm at Leicester and its administration.

8686. What is the work they put them upon now ?—Wood-chopping and wood-bundling, or farm work on the land.

8687. What do they do exactly on the land, is it digging ?—It is digging, etc.

8688. It is only used for the purpose of a labour test, I suppose ? There is no building on it, is there ?—On the Gilroes Estate there is no building for housing the men ; on the North Evington Estate there is the infirmary building.

8689. (Mr. Loch.) How do they settle the tasks to put to the men who are on the farm ? How do they fix what their extent is to be ?—There is a superintendent and he tells the men off for what they are to do, and it rests with him as to whether he is satisfied with the amount of work they have done at the end of the day or not.

8690. How many men are there to that superintendent ?—They would average about 120 to 140 on the North Evington Estate and about the same on the Gilroes Estate. There is a superintendent and his assistant at North Evington and two men at Gilroes too.

8691. Are these men employed in squads ?—No, they are not employed in squads.

8692. They are all employed together ?—They are dotted about the place.

8693. Is it possible to supervise them ?—Not properly.

8694. Is there any instruction which is available for you officially to prevent an insufficient number of supervisers of the men being used in such a way that it is very difficult to see how much they do ?—As an inspector there is none ; you can only advise the guardians to appoint more people.

8695. That is to say, they are really breaking new ground by taking this new farm, and at the same time they are not utilising the experience which there is available on the question ?—No, so far as I know.

8696. Have you yourself seen other farms attached to workhouses in other parts of your district ?—I have whilst I was in London seen Laindon, but no other.

8697. Practically the attraction to a man, wife and five children, to take that as a test, is that they get 13s. a week now as against 10s. in the old days ?—It would be 14s.

8698. What was that based on ; was it based on an idea of a minimum wage, or what was the idea that led to this change ?—I think that in paragraph 33, which sets out the guardians' reply to the auditor's report, you will see it is stated the average set by the Board is 3s. per week per person. Under the head of E. M. it goes on to say, "In this case it was 18s. received from three of the children, and on this basis in no single week did the income plus the relief given exceed the average set by the board, viz., 3s. per week." That is 3s. per head.

8699. They practically were fixing a minimum income ?—Yes.

8700. And if a man dropped work he could apply and be pretty certain of getting up to a minimum income ?—Yes, that is so.

8701. Was not that one of the great attractions ?—I think it was, undoubtedly.

8702. I should like to ask you about this sentence in italics which immediately follows :—"In the absence of any official ruling on the report of the Local Government Board as to the basis upon which relief should be granted, whether gross earning or net income of the parents, the Committee will act upon the assumption that the latter is the best basis upon which to work." It says net income or gross earning. How do they find their net income ? Was the enquiry of the relieving officers sufficiently exact to get at the net income ?—The idea was that, whatever the child was earning, part of it had to go towards its food and towards its clothing and maintenance, and that that should not be taken into account.

Meaning of "net income" as standard for amount of relief.

8703. That is to say they made deductions for each member of the family ?—Yes.

8704. They treated each member of the family as a separate entity providing for itself ?—Yes.

8705. Then they said after providing for itself on their scale the balance might be carried to the common account of the family ?—Yes.

8706. Their scale was, of course, whatever scale they chose ?—Yes.

8707. So you had no real standard at all in the settlement of relief, because the scale of the expenditure which the guardians might expect the child to have to incur would very likely be different to the actual expenditure which the child did incur in maintenance, clothing, etc. ?—Yes, that would be so.

8708. Do you think that it would be possible by any official ruling of any kind to prevent a recurrence of such a method which, on the face of it, has been provocative of applications ?—I think the Board has never particularly suggested to the guardians what scale of relief they should adopt.

8709. Would the Poor Law Orders for, instance, cover an issue like this ?—I think not.

8710. Are you of opinion that it is desirable that the local board of guardians should work on a scale, or, to put the alternative, that they might take the case as it stands and see what should be done for it, instead of relying at once on that scale that is put forward as soon as the inquiring officer has made his investigation ?—I am not in favour of a scale.

Appointment of Cross Visitors.

8711. Your paragraph 36 refers to the appointment of a relieving officer to supervise and cross visit. Would you be in favour of making it compulsory for a board to have a cross visitor if the number of cases amounted to a certain total, or some other similar condition ?—I think it is most necessary they should cross visit.

8712. Then you would be in favour of compulsion ?—Yes.

Functions of Auditor and Inspector as regards case relief.

8713. In paragraph 32 you refer to the auditor ; the auditor there has clearly taken into account the investigation, as I understand, from the statements made. Do you think a system could be adopted by which the books could be audited from the point of view not only of finance, but from the point of view of the case work, if I may so call it, and a report be submitted as to whether or not the relieving officers' application and report books are properly filled up ?—I do not quite follow you.

8714. I am referring to the case you mention of H. A., No. 2 District. The district auditor points out first of all that the out-relief is extremely large. Then he says, here is a case in point, "In this case the wife earned 2s. 6d. to 6s. per week. The man is a bricklayer, and has been on the labour test for about eighteen months. He is a good workman, but cannot obtain employment owing to his drunken habits. Some years ago he assaulted his wife, and was sentenced to three months' hard labour. He appears to consider the labour test a permanent situation. I suggest that in this case the man should have been sent into the workhouse and the wife and children relieved outside." The auditor there is auditing not merely the accounts but the work of the board ?—That is so.

8715. That being so, it suggests that if every auditor audited both the accounts and the work in other places than in Leicester, cases of this kind might be brought to light ?—That is so.

8716. Would that be desirable ?—I think it would be for the inspector to bring those cases to the notice of the guardians as a body, seeing that relief is administered by separate courts.

8717. As a matter of fact, do these cases come before the inspector ?—Yes; he ought to look at the application and report books and see these cases. It is on these cases he would advise the guardians with regard to the administration of their out-relief.

8718. When the auditor brings it forward, there is a possible question of surcharge, is there not ?—Yes, there is a possible question.

8719. When the inspector brings it forward there is no such question ?—No.

Need for more supervision of cases on relief lists.

8720. I am simply dealing with the question from the point of view of better administration; is it not desirable that there should be some continuous survey of the application and report books of the relieving officers, with a view to bringing to light work like this, wherever it may occur ?—I think there should be.

8721. Has an inspector really time to do such a thing as that, judging even from your short experience in your present district. You have many unions under you: is it a possibility for you to do that ?—I do not think you could go through them all.

8722. Therefore, unless you have special help for it or someone does it and brings the matter before the board, or in some way gives publicity to it, this work may go on and not come to light in its detail ?—It might not.

Difficulty of imposing adequate "test" of work.

8723. With regard to the problem of Leicester and its pauperism, can you make any suggestions ? The problem I presume is not unlike the problem of other towns, where there has been a re-action in favour of the rather relaxed method of relief. Suppose we stand at the parting of the ways between a lax system and a stricter system, have you any suggestions to make about it ?—I think the tasks of work certainly ought to be imposed, and I think the proper supervision of the work whilst the men are at work should be enforced.

8724. Take this question of the tasks of work, the tasks of work are tasks which are actually asked of all men that apply, but the strength and ability of the men is different, so that what is a task for one is not a task for another, as you find in these cases ?—That is so.

8725. Does it not follow, if you are to use the task system, you must apply it personally, or it fails ?—That is so.

8726. Do we do that at all ?—It is not done in Leicester.

8727. Again, if you have a labour yard, what is the number that you would allow in a labour yard under one superintendent ?—That is rather a difficult question.

8728. Are not those questions really, from the point of view of the deterrent effect of poor relief, almost essential to the problem ?—Yes.

Futility of "farm" at Leicester.

8729. Would you say the utilising of this land for digging has been of real service in preventing pauperism in Leicester ?—No.

Possible co-operation between Guardians and Charities.

8730. With regard to the charities of Leicester, have you ever thought whether the Whitechapel Order for giving relief to the family outside if the head of the family comes into the workhouse, might be applied, and in suitable cases that the Charitable Societies of Leicester should help those who were left outside, namely, the rest of the family ?—I am afraid I have not thought of that yet.

8731. Do you think the charities of Leicester could assist in any other way; I would suggest one way, that they should assist in cases which are unsuitable for poor relief, where the rent has to be paid, or persons have to be set up, and so on, those cases might be relieved by the Charitable Societies ?—I think so certainly.

8732. Is there any inclination on the Board to do that ?—I think not so far as I know.

8733. Is it a question which could be brought before the board of guardians, or would it be outside the province of your work as Inspector ?—I certainly think I could bring it before them.

8734. That might be of some assistance possibly ?—Yes; and emigration might be of assistance.

8735. There was an Emigration Society started last autumn in Leicester ?—Yes.

8736. Do you know whether it has been taken up actively ?—I was making inquiries about it, but I was called here earlier than I anticipated.

8737. Have you found that the Distress Committee is emigrating people ?—I wrote also about that, but I have not had the return which I asked for.

Possibility of Borough Councils checking Guardians' expenditure.

8738. Can you suggest any way of checking this large expenditure. The guardians make their own precepts practically ?—Yes.

8739. There is no control over them as to the amount of money they may spend, except the public opinion of the district when it is thoroughly roused ?—That is all.

8740. Supposing they had to send in an estimate to a borough council, and the borough council, we will say, had the control over the expenditure in the sense that they pass a grant by a special poor rate, do you think that that would mend matters at all, or would the borough council be as much in favour of expenditure as the Board of guardians ?—I really do not know.

8741. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Would not there be great friction between the two bodies ?—I think so.

8742. Do you think it would be practicable to avoid that ?—I do not.

8743. (Mr. Loch.) It comes to this almost, that in the fulness of the reaction almost any amount of money can be spent by the board of guardians and that without any control whatever ?—Yes.

Effect of introduction of machinery on unemployment.

8744. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) Could you tell me this with reference to the effects of the introduction of machinery on trade: It sometimes happens where the quick-going machinery is introduced, it turns out so much more work that more people are employed in the subsidiary parts of the work than are really turned off. Do you know if there is any tendency of that sort in the boot trade ?—I think there is a tendency towards it now.

8745. So that it might recover in that way. I do not know if it is so, but possibly more finishers might be needed, because of the greater amount of work that is turned out by the machinery ?—There might be, but it is not anticipated.

8746. Do you know what part the women take in the boot trade more especially ?—Fitting of uppers and flowering and embroidery work.

8747. You do not know whether they are also thrown out by this machinery ?—The rivetters were the first to suffer.

8748. So the finishers and lasters have not suffered so much ?—Machinery has now been introduced into every department, including the finishing and lasting.

8749. It would make more work for them if they are turning out more ?—It might do so. There are, I think, an increasing proportion of women employed in consequence of the machinery.

8750. That is what I want to get at. Do you know if the number of women has actually increased, or is it only that the number of men has decreased ?—I could not say.

8751. At any rate the proportion of women is greater ?—I think so. In one of the largest factories which I visited one-third of the hands employed are women.

Earnings of women.

8752. Do you know if they are fairly well paid ? Do you know at all what their earnings are ?—It is very difficult to get it. I asked for that. It would vary from 16s. to 20s. a week for women in the boot trade.

8753. That is very good, of course ?—Yes.

8754. You said the frame knitting had also suffered in the same way. Would that be women or men who were thrown out ?—Women and men. There are men and women frame knitters.

The Hon. Gerald Walsh.

3 April, 1906.

8755. Do you think there is any chance that the women who are thrown out of the frame knitting will be absorbed in the shoe trade, or probably they could not adapt themselves?—No.

High rates a cause of migration of industries.

8756. You tell us that the high rates have emptied houses in Leicester to some extent. Have they driven any of the industries out into the country?—Some industries have, I understand, moved to Melton and other places, but it is difficult really to find out whether it is the high rates or whether it is the union rate of wages which has driven them out.

8757. Do they take their hands with them when they go, do you know, or do they leave them behind?—I have not been able to ascertain that.

8758. If it was a question of union rates, I am afraid they would leave them behind?—That is so.

Partial adoption of case-paper system at Leicester.

8759. Do the Leicester Board of Guardians use case papers?—They use case papers with regard to inmates coming into the house; not with regard to applicants for outdoor relief.

8760. They have two systems. Case papers for the inmates, but not for the outdoor applicants?—That is so.

Policy of different parties in Leicester Board of Guardians.

8761. (Mr. Gardiner.) Have you been able to get any information as to the policy which was advocated at the election—was it a purely out door relief policy, or relief for the unemployed, or what? What platform did they stand on? As I understand, the present guardians swept the board, did they not?—No.

8762. They got a preponderant majority; is it that out of the forty-eight, forty are in favour of the out-relief, or relief for the unemployed, or something of that kind?—I think there are about one-fourth of the new guardians who came on with this liberal programme of relief, and the other three-quarters are old guardians who have been there for some time, but they have been swayed by the one-fourth.

8763. Then thirty-six of them could not stand up against twelve; they did not really realise the principle underlying Poor Law administration?—That is so.

"Destitution" as the condition of relief.

8764. The Poor Law, as framed in 1834, was framed for the relief of destitution, was not it?—Yes.

8765. Does the average guardian remember that, or does he think the Poor Law exists for the sake of assisting poverty?—I think he expects it to assist poverty.

8766. That is to say he cares solely for the individual and not for the community?—That is so.

8767. Would you say that is a kind of cleavage, I cannot say between the old guardians and the new, because they all apparently row in the same boat, but as far as theory goes, have the old guardians, the thirty-six, any idea of the welfare of the community?—I think perhaps they have now.

8768. Any little alterations that have been made lately, thanks to you, have been due to the thirty-six recovering their bearings a little?—Yes.

8769. And the approach of the spring weather?—No, I think the last high precept had something to do with it.

8770. You do not mean to say that in next October you will get the same sort of thing beginning again?—It may, but I hope not.

Borough Council work for the unemployed.

8771. Does the borough council deal at all with the question of providing work for the unemployed, or does the borough council leave the poor relief to the guardians solely. They have taken on some of the unemployed men.

8772. At the request of the guardians?—Yes, and some through private requests of individual guardians have been taken on.

8773. That is to say, the guardian would know the borough surveyor and he would know a deserving man of good character was coming up, so that he would say, Give this poor chap the employment?—Yes.

8774. That little favouritism is exercised in his behalf?—One of the guardians, Mr. Kemp, to whom I have alluded here, has lately got the borough council to take twelve men on for some of their drainage work.

8775. The guardians are now beginning to differentiate into classes these able-bodied men; to put the best, say, on to borough council work, and those of an inferior grade on to stone breaking?—I do not think they have got so far as that. An individual guardian has, but not the board as a whole.

8776. I understand the bulk of these unemployed men are boot rivetters, except the vagrants who have drifted into the town. You told us they put a good many on to digging work; and I wondered how far boot rivetters were qualified to dig. On your last page you have 516 of the boot trades. That means 516 of these men, I understand?—These are not employed by the guardians.

8777. I suppose the same kind of figures apply to both the Distress Committee and the guardians, do they not? If the distress committee could not give them work, then they must go to the Poor Law, if they are destitute or approaching destitution?—Yes.

8778. Therefore, some of these 516 men did find their way eventually to the Poor Law guardians for digging or stone breaking?—They have not all, I think, yet.

8779. You do not think that any of these men on this list of the total register of 1837 have come to the guardians at present? (Mr. Booth.) Your previous statistics say 284 have been or are now on labour test?—That is so, 284 have come to the guardians.

8780. (Mr. Gardiner.) Some of them must have been men who, as a matter of fact, were quite unused to digging?—Yes.

8781. If I understand what a boot rivetter has to do, he is not likely, under any circumstances, to be a digger or a stone breaker?—A great many of those have been out of work some time and have done it.

8782. What has happened to the Boot Trade Society in Leicester? Has that practically ceased to be powerful, owing to the introduction of this machinery? It used to be a very strong Society years ago?—Yes, I have heard so.

8783. Now practically it has lost all its power because of the machinery, and the employment of female labour has practically destroyed the Society?—I really could not tell you that.

8784. I do not know whether it is a fair question, but have you happened to come across in your late investigation any figures about the progress of that Leicester Branch of the Boot & Shoe Makers' Society for the period mentioned here?—I think you would probably get that better from the Society itself.

Revision of "able-bodied" dietary at Leicester.

8785. (Dr. Downes.) You mentioned that the able-bodied dietary was being revised; do you know the reason of its revision?—It was said that it was so good a dietary that the workhouse was in consequence no deterrent to men.

8786. Have you a copy of the dietary?—It is here.

8787. Did they give many of them lunch?—Yes, they gave some of them lunch.

8788. Were they doing any very extraordinarily hard work?—There was no work in the workhouse at all, with the exception of some six men who would be employed on corn grinding: the others did nothing but cleaning in the workhouse.

Nature of paupers' work at Leicester.

8789. There was no very heavy work. You are aware, no doubt, that lunch was introduced into the dietary order for the purpose of men who were really on exceptionally heavy work?—I have the list of 13th February, and out of 90 able-bodied men there were 24 employed in scrubbing, 12 as wardsmen, 9 on the land, 8 painting, 6 in the corn mills, 6 [window-cleaning, 4 in the bakehouse, 2 in the kitchen, 2 in the laundry, 2 stoking, 2 in the carpenters' shop, 2 in [the engineers' shop, 2 in the wood shop: there was no work at all of a heavy nature.

8790. Even work on the land, according to your statement, amounts only to 42½ hours a week: 7½ hours daily and Saturday 5 hours, I think makes a total of 42½?—That is so.

8791. You do not call that very hard, I take it?—No.

8792. What do they do on the land?—They cultivate the vegetables for the house and the infirmary, and attend to the stock.

8793. Are the workhouse inmates sent up to work at North Evington?—Some twenty go up to North Evington from the workhouse, and the others are labour test men.

8794. The infirmary is on that site, is it not ?—Yes.

8795. Are they working in the infirmary premises ?—Yes.

Leave of absence from Workhouse at Leicester.

8796. What leave to go out do the able-bodied men get in Leicester Workhouse ? Is leave freely given to the inmates of the workhouse ?—Yes, it is freely given.

8797. Do they wear a distinctive dress ?—The able-bodied do in the workhouse ?

8798. (Mr. Gardiner.) Indoor and out, or only indoor ? When they go out on leave, do they have ordinary clothes ? —They can wear their own clothes if they wish.

Inadequacy of Workhouse accommodation at Leicester.

8799. (Dr. Downes.) You say the workhouse is very overcrowded. Have the guardians considered the possibility of taking any temporary premises, any disused factory or other building ?—I did suggest it to one of them the other day.

8800. Had not they considered it before ?—No. North Evington Infirmary was opened only in September last and that provides 512 beds. Previous to that they had 360 sick inmates in the workhouse and they were in hope, when this new infirmary was opened, that would relieve the pressure on the workhouse.

8801. Has that hope been realised ?—No, it has not.

8802. How did they take your suggestion that some premises should be hired ?—At the present moment they are asking the Local Government Board to sanction the removal of their imbeciles and epileptics to North Evington to further reduce the numbers in the House, and the numbers in the house at the present moment are going down, owing to the time of the year.

8803. Where do they put the imbeciles at North Evington : in the infirmary ?—In the infirmary.

8804. Has the outdoor medical relief gone up at all ? —Yes.

Increase in out-door medical relief at Leicester.

8805. Have you any figures on the point ?—In one district, No. 5, I found that the relieving officer in five months had issued 1,052 medical orders, in addition to 931 cases for outdoor relief and labour test cases, and 423 cases for the House.

8806. That number of medical relief orders I gather from you was a large increase on the previous practice ?—Yes.

8807. Do they get medical comforts freely ? Perhaps you would not have had time to go into that ?—They do get medical comforts freely.

8808. Was alcohol given at all in the workhouse to any of these people employed on work ?—Alcohol is not given.

8809. Have you any sick in the workhouse now, or have they cleared them all out ?—They have all gone to North Evington.

8810. Do you find the infirmary filling up from the outside at all ; that is to say, are cases which did not previously seek workhouse relief beginning to come into the infirmary ?—I do not know that that has been very noticeable at present.

8811. Can you account for the very large increase in vagrants at all ?—No, I do not know that I can account for it, except that they are attracted to the places where out-relief is given very liberally.

Increase of vagrants and its cause.

8812. But these are vagrants : they would not be relieved by the guardians with out-relief, would they ?—In addition to laxity of administration probably another reason which may account for it is that the Derwent Water scheme passes close to Leicester, and vagrants always follow those works.

8813. Following what they call the pipe track ?—Yes.

8814. When did that scheme commence ?—I could not tell exactly when it commenced, but it is going on in full swim now.

8815. Are there any shelters or soup kitchens or agencies of that sort which have been started lately ?—Not that I know of.

8816. It strikes one as somewhat remarkable that in a town which is presumably in such distress through want of employment there should be an influx of this particular class ?—It does.

8817. Is it the fact that the vaccination question is a prominent question in the election of these guardians ? —It is.

Attitude of ratepayers at Leicester.

8818. (Miss Hill.) Do you see any organised movement on the part of the ratepayers to resist this state of things ? Is there any strong ratepayers' association, or are meetings held in the town at all ?—There was a meeting of the overseers with regard to the last precept to see whether the amount could not be curtailed, and there have been several letters in the newspapers lately with regard to the enormous expenditure.

8819. What is this Derwent Water scheme on which you say these men work ?—It is a water supply for a town which I forget : it is bringing water from the River Derwent.

8820. You say few of the men that were sent were satisfactory, and they returned. What was the action of the guardians with regard to these men who returned ? Did they put them immediately on these relief works or on this outdoor relief, did that make any impression on them ? —One man applied for relief and had an order for the House.

8821. You said you thought that there seemed, within the last ten days, some slight desire to pull the reins a little bit tighter. Did that come from outside pressure, i.e., pressure from the ratepayers, or do you think the guardians themselves are beginning to see what they are doing ?—I think it is a little of both.

8822. You are not aware of any widely spread or any very pronounced movement on the part of the people to resist this thing ?—There is nothing organised at present that I know of.

8823. (Mr. Nunn.) I have only one question, but it is rather comprehensive ; I do not know whether you will care to answer it. Supposing you had a board of guardians prepared to put themselves under your direction, who would recognise that the rates were very high and pauperism was very great, what kind of suggestions would you make to them for dealing with the present pauperism ? How do you think they might get out of the present mess that they have got into ? I think the way out suggests the way in rather. Do you think they might classify their able-bodied paupers and deal with them in a different manner. I suppose that would be the beginning really, to enter into a very careful inquiry as to the able-bodied poor and attempt to classify them and deal with them in different ways ?—Yes.

8824. Do you think emigration would be a possible solution in some directions for some of them ?—I think emigration would certainly be a good thing.

8825. Then a very much stricter administration, I suppose, and offering the House to a considerable number of them ?—Yes.

8826. Do you think that any of the able-bodied poor that have been assisted belong to friendly societies ?—I do not think so.

8827. Supposing you had an opportunity of advising on the subject, would you advise them to abolish the outdoor test work either gradually or immediately ?—Yes.

8828. And to offer the House only ?—Yes.

Effect of strict administration.

8829. What do you think would happen to the present population that depends upon it ?—I do not think the majority would go into the House.

8830. How do you think they would deal with themselves ? Do you think they would leave Leicester and find more suitable openings elsewhere ? There is no possible opening for them, I suppose, in Leicester, or do you think that there is ?—I cannot say.

8831. Do you think as pauperism increases there, the work that has to be done for Leicester and in Leicester is supplied by workmen who come in for it from the outside ?—No.

8832 You think there is a continuous demand for labour there, but these are men who are so inveterately lazy they will not take it up, and their places are really taken by men from the outside ?—I think certainly they are lazy and the labour test affords them permanent employment.

The Hon. Gerald Walsh.
3 April, 1906.

8833. You think there is work going which they might take up, but which other men come into the town and get instead of them. Do you think that is the case?—No, I do not think that I would go so far as that.

8834. You have not any facts to go upon with regard to that?—No.

8835. Have your guardians taken up the question of under-fed children under Mr. Balfour's circular?—Do you mean throughout the district?

8836. No, I am speaking of Leicester?—They have inquired into about 300 cases, but have not given relief to a single case under the Order.

Respective merits of "Boarding-out" and "Scattered Homes."

8837. I think before you went to this district you did a good deal of inspecting institutions for children and Poor Law schools, did you not?—Yes.

8838. Have you any preference for scattered homes or boarding-out?—No, I have not preference for either.

8839. You think they both serve their purpose?—I think it very much depends on the Committees who look after them.

8840. A scattered home is just as good as a boarding-out cottage provided that the Committee that administers is a good one?—Yes.

8841. (Chairman.) Can you give us any information as regards the age of the people who were thrown out of employment in the boot trade? Have you any information as to whether they are old men?—The men who would be on the labour test?

8842. Owing to the changes in the boot trade, a certain number of people have been thrown out of employment. That is admitted. I assume that they would probably be the old men. Do you know?—I have not got that information absolutely, but what I was told would lead one to suppose that they were mostly men of middle age.

8843. If they were men over middle age there would be greater difficulty in getting other employment. Perhaps you did not go into that particular point?—I did not.

Effect of introduction machinery employmer

8844. (Dr. Downes.) On that point, on page 1 of your memorandum you say it was found that the rapidly moving machinery was detrimental to those who were past middle age. In what way was it detrimental? Do you mean to their health or from an industrial point of view?—The men were too old to take up the machinery. They could not watch machinery as if they had been accustomed to it from childhood. It was really in that way that I meant it.

8845. That industrially it was detrimental to them?—Yes.

TWENTY-FOURTH DAY.

Monday, 9th April, 1906.

AT THE FOREIGN OFFICE, DOWNING STREET, S.W.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. Lord GEORGE HAMILTON, G.C.S.I., etc., etc., etc. (Chairman).

The Right Hon. CHARLES BOOTH, F.R.S.
Sir SAMUEL B. PROVIS, K.C.B.
Mr. F. H. BENTHAM.

Mr. BALDWYN FLEMING, called; and Examined.

Mr. Baldwyn Fleming.
9 April, 1906.

8846. (Chairman.) You are the General Inspector of the Local Government Board for the District comprising Dorset, Hampshire, most of Wiltshire and the Farnham Union in Surrey?—I am.

Extent of District.

8847. You have been connected, as an Inspector, with the Poor Law since 1868?—I have.

8848. You were transferred to your present district in 1876?—Yes.

8849. Therefore you have had thirty years' experience of that district?—Yes.

8850. We will take your written memorandum as your evidence in chief. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XIX (A-E).) In the earlier paragraphs of that memorandum you call attention to satisfactory features in the results of the administration in the rural unions, and two of the most satisfactory features are, a decrease in the number of able-bodied paupers, and in child pauperism?—That is so.

Decrease in in able-bodied and child paupers.

Old age pauperism and prospect of its diminution.

8851. Therefore the proportion of old paupers in the rural unions must be steadily increasing?—It is; but then there are very special reasons for that, and I doubt whether they are really appreciated as they should be. From my point of view old age pauperism ought not to continue. We are living through a stratum of pauperism now which was a necessity of former years, but which ought not to continue in the future for this reason, that the people who are now the old paupers never had the opportunity of providing for themselves. Those who survived their wage earning period, and the relations and others who were able to help them, had no alternative but to come upon the rates, because in the days when they were younger friendly societies were not sound, they had not the opportunities of thrift which the present generation have; and, from my point of view, I believe that old-age pauperism, unless it is perpetuated by unwise legislation, should become a thing of the past. I do not think that the present generation will have any excuse for being paupers in their old age, unless they have special inducements to rely on public support instead of their own independent exertions.

8852. Do you apply that general observation to the urban districts as well as to the rural districts?—Yes.

8853. The large towns in your constituency are Southampton and Portsmouth?—They are the only two really large towns. I have besides the cities of Salisbury and Winchester, and some towns of moderate size; but the only two really large towns in my district are Southampton and Portsmouth. They are both extremely important towns, because Portsmouth is the great Naval Dockyard, practically the key to the heart of England, and Southampton is the great commercial port of the South of England.

Effect on pauperism of the Workmen's Compensation Act and the Trades Unions.

8854. As regards your observation that old-age pauperism should become a thing of the past, we have had a good deal of evidence from the North of England and elsewhere; and certain of the witnesses have expressed their opinion that they think a certain class of employee loses his employment from various causes earlier now than he did some time back, and that one of the causes contributing to this reduction in the age at which people cease to be independent is the Workmen's Compensation Act. Has the working of that Act come at all within your experience?—I have no doubt the effect of that Act is to drive people out of employment at a younger age than before the Act was in operation, and the trades unions bear in the same direction. The trades unions, so far as my experience goes, do not care to have anybody who is not thoroughly able to do a full day's work for the standard wage which they decide ought to be paid, and the result is that the workers who are somewhat past their best get elbowed out.

Potentiality of thrift among the working classes.

8855. Although the workmen of the present day may, through friendly societies and other kindred agencies, have a better chance of making provision for themselves in their old age, still have they, in your judgment, so availed themselves of those chances as to make it likely that there will in the future be fewer old paupers than in the past?—I think the competition of outdoor relief, and the various unsettling influences which have been at work during the last ten years, the promise of old-age pensions and the various political promises, if one may so describe them, which have been made prior to general elections, have so unsettled the working classes that they are waiting to see what happens rather than provide for themselves, as they really ought to do if these other influences had not been at work. The marvel to me is how the friendly societies have held their own in face of the competition of outdoor relief. I think that the fact that the friendly societies go on increasing in their membership and in their funds, and the enormous efforts that are being made in the direction of thrift by the working classes, are the strongest possible evidence that they are sound at heart, and unless their sense of independence is artificially discouraged by Parliament, or by other means, it will exert itself, and the people will provide for themselves. In the very early days of the Poor Law Commissioners it was noted that the working classes always rise to the necessities of the situation; if they do not find what they wanted provided for them, they manage to provide it for themselves. I think that will be so with regard to old-age pensions. I have no doubt myself that the old-age pension difficulty ought to be solved through the agency of the friendly societies. If other and more undesirable agencies, from my point of view, are not brought into operation it will be so solved. But outdoor relief as it is given now, and inducements held out to apply for outdoor relief by such legislation as the 5s. Friendly Society Bill, appear to me to be entirely mischievous, and to work against what should be the great object of legislation; that is, to make the people independent instead of dependent.

Value of "unsound" or "dividing out" societies.

8856. You have something to say as regards the village clubs, the sharing-out clubs and similar institutions which are very often described as unsound, or even rotten. I understand you to contend that there is a certain class of life that would not be taken by the great societies?—That is so. For bad lives which cannot get into sound permanent societies, I know of no other chance that they have than by going into these dividing-out societies. By that means they have some opportunity of doing, at all events, that much for themselves. If you look back into the past history of friendly societies, and their effect upon pauperism, you will find that friendly societies have been working out their own security. It is only now that they have ascertained a sound basis on which to found their tables, and their practice; and many of the friendly societies which have failed in the past have failed not through vice but ignorance. Many people have paid into friendly societies for years, I have known cases of twenty, thirty and forty years even, and the friendly society has failed just before the man ought to have had the benefit of it. Then there is a further great difficulty which friendly societies have found themselves in; that is, that they are paying off liabilities they never undertook and never intended to undertake. They are practically paying for old-age pensions for senile decay, whereas they only undertook to pay for sickness. Senile decay is not really sickness, and consequently a very heavy expense has been put on friendly societies which, in their inception, they never intended to take.

Difficulties of pioneer Friendly Societies.

8857. Has any attempt been made to rectify that by raising the annual contribution or premium?—I can hardly answer that. I know that in some of the smaller societies, some of the county societies, the attempt has been made; and I think there are some of the societies now which will not admit members unless they pay in for old-age benefits as well as for sick benefits. Many of the great societies have a separate branch for old age, but the original payment was merely for sickness. Where people have lived to extreme old age, and are incapacitated from permanent senile decay, the societies are undoubtedly paying old-age pensions in the guise of sick pay, which was never intended when the original tables were drawn up.

Suitability of existing Poor Law areas and difficulty of amalgamating Unions.

8858. Passing on to the question of boundaries, have you any suggestions to make as regards boundaries. Would you increase the unit of administration and make it larger than the existing unions?—No, not when the union is of a sufficient size. There are a good many small unions which, from my point of view, might with great advantage be amalgamated with the surrounding unions, but the question is one of extreme difficulty, because directly you try to dissolve a union, you practically have the whole neighbourhood up in arms against you. I had a most striking case in my own district. Th Fordingbridge Union had a shockingly bad workhouse The union was about half in Hampshire and half in Wiltshire. I was anxious to dissolve it, and to put the Wiltshire parishes to the Alderbury Union, which is now the Salisbury Union, and the Hampshire Parishes into the Ringwood Union. By that means the Ringwood Union would have had to build a new workhouse which was very much wanted: the Ringwood Workhouse is the worst remaining in my district. The Fordingbridge Union refused to accede, and the Local Government Board directed me to hold an inquiry with a view to the dissolution of the union. When the guardians at Fordingbridge found that the Local Government Board had power to dissolve the union, and would exercise that power, rather than be dissolved they decided to build a new workhouse. I was very unwilling that the board should accept that decision, because I thought, and I still think, it would have been much better that the union should be dissolved and apportioned between the Wiltshire and the Hampshire unions adjoining. However, the influence brought to bear upon the Board was so strong, and the local feeling was so strong, that the Board could not resist it, and had to consent to the continuance of the Fordingbridge Union: the Fordingbridge Union built a new workhouse. The boundaries, I am happy to say, have since been adjusted, because, after the Boundary Commission and the passing of the Local Government Act, Wiltshire gave up the Wiltshire parishes and they were put into Hampshire. The Wiltshire parishes were attached to the Hampshire portion of the Fordingbridge Union, so it is now a Hampshire union. The boundaries were made coterminous by the transfer of the Wiltshire parishes to Hampshire, but the Ringwood bad workhouse still remains.

Difficulties in country districts of classifying paupers by Workhouses.

8859. Speaking generally, are not the areas now too small to permit of the development of, or a thorough, classification?—Then you get to the question of distance, which is a question upon which I hesitate very much indeed. I think it is extremely cruel to remove the old people a long way away from their surroundings and from their own homes. The unions were formed from 1836 downwards with very little regard to considerations which we should take into account now-a-days, but they were, to a very great extent, formed to be convenient for the people comprised within the unions. It is astonishing how much communication does now go on between the workhouses and the homes and relations of the people who are in the workhouses. The suggestion of increasing areas very largely, and having separate workhouses for classification within one large area, to my mind would be very cruel in its working, because it would practically remove all the inmates of these institutions from their own surroundings. It would, I think, raise a very legitimate grievance against the application of what is popularly known as the workhouse test.

8860. It would make the workhouse test in your judgment more difficult of imposition?—Certainly; it would cut the people entirely off from their own surroundings and associations. If you look at the present position, you have a workhouse more or less in the centre of the district it serves: you have the guardians of each parish coming constantly to the workhouse: you have the chaplain of the workhouse, who is probably a clergyman, serving one of the parishes in the district, coming to the workhouse: you have the medical officers from the different districts brought from time to time to the workhouse; you have the carriers from all the parishes coming to the centre; you have the clergy from the different parishes coming to the centre upon various occasions; you have the farmers coming into market; you have all sorts of communication from almost every area within the union constantly brought into the immediate proximity of the workhouse, and by that means the inmates are kept intimately acquainted with everything that is going on in their own homes and their own surroundings, and they are constantly visited by the people they know. That is possible by the present ordinary arrangement of the unions. If you make your area a very large one and remove the people so many miles from their own homes all that is put an end to at once; and you cut the people off from their own associations, their own friends, and their own homes, and from all that they have been accustomed to and which makes life dear to them. I think that would be a real hardship.

8861. Have any of your rural unions combined for one particular purpose, such, for instance, as an institution for imbeciles?—No.

Imbeciles in Workhouses.

8862. You would not have the same objection to a combination of that kind?—That again is not an easy question to answer off-hand. There are a great many imbeciles who are classed as imbeciles, who are not epileptics, who are perfectly harmless and extremely useful in the workhouse. When Mr. Long was President of the Local Government Board, I drew up a memorandum of the imbeciles in the Warminster Union which showed that the imbeciles in the workhouse were almost all of them perfectly harmless, extremely useful, and very happy. I went into the history of each one, and it seemed to me that to remove them from their surroundings there would have been very undesirable. One of them was very keen about hunting, and was allowed out whenever the hounds were near. It was astonishing how he could keep up with them across country. One of the others used to run messages and errands. They were quite trustworthy and perfectly harmless, but as they were defective in intellect they were counted as imbeciles and could be detained in the workhouse. I think it very hard on those people to take them out of their surroundings and put them in an institution where they would have no companions but people who were similarly afflicted with themselves. With reference to the question of boundaries, I am anxious that they should be made coterminous where various authorities have the exercise of powers. I think it is most important that unions and counties should be made coterminous, and indeed in my own district it has very nearly been accomplished. Farnham Union is an exception. It has one parish, Aldershot, in Hampshire. There is now a proposal before the Local Government for the removal of Aldershot from the Farnham Union. In Dorsetshire, where Lyme Regis is situated, I was very anxious to get the county boundaries altered, because it would be difficult to bring Lyme Regis into a Dorsetshire Union. However, the Lyme Regis people wished to remain in the County of Dorset and in the Axminster Union in Devonshire. It did not interfere with my unions, because my chief object was that none of my unions should overlap county boundaries. I should have been glad to have got the union and county boundaries coterminous there, but I was not able to do it. The Lyme Regis Union was not in my district. On the Wiltshire and Berkshire side there is the Hungerford Union, which also is not in my district, it ranks as a Berkshire union—that has some parishes in Wiltshire that we were not able to deal with as regards Poor Law, although they were dealt with as regards the rural district council. The Wiltshire parishes were made one council and the Berkshire parishes another. The only other union where I was unable to do it was the Malmesbury Union; and when I say I, I am only saying it in order to describe what was being done, the credit is not due to me, it was really due to the Wiltshire authorities and to the way in which the Local Government Board worked the powers which were given to them. I happened to be the agent who carried the matter out, or rather, held the inquiries on which it was carried out. In that part of Wiltshire there are one or two parishes which are not in the Malmesbury Union; if I could have got those into the Malmesbury Union as I was anxious to do last year the union and the county boundaries there would have been coterminous. Except those places, the only real difficulty I have is with the borough of Southampton and the Poor Law Incorporation of Southampton. Southampton is under a local Act, and therefore the Local Government Board have not a free hand to deal with it as they could if it were under the ordinary Poor Law. The borough of Southampton and the Southampton Incorporation used to be very nearly coterminous, and indeed when I first had to do with Southampton the Mayor was ex officio Chairman of the Incorporation as well as of the Corporation of Southampton. The Corporation area was afterwards extended, but the Incorporation area, that is the Poor Law area, was not extended at the time the Borough area was extended, and there being a local Act in force, the Local Government Board have not power to deal with it satisfactorily until the local Act is repealed. In the last session of Parliament the Local Government Board issued a Provisional Order for the repeal of the local Act. It was opposed in Parliament, and the House of Commons Committee, to which it was referred, put in a clause which the Local Government Board was unable to accept, therefore it was not carried through, but at the present moment the state of affairs in Southampton is, I think, most detrimental to the Poor Law service and indeed to the public interests altogether, because Southampton has by far the highest poor rate in my district. The poor rate is 3s. in the £ in Southampton. Under present conditions Southampton, as far as Poor Law matters are concerned, has no possibility of relief, because, for the present, there can be no increase of rateable value. The whole area is already built over, and the tendency will be rather to decrease than to increase in value, because the higher class of inhabitants is gradually leaving Southampton for the suburbs, and their houses are being divided into small tenements. Unless there be power to deal with that and the adjoining area by the extension of the Poor Law area of Southampton to that of the borough, it is extremely difficult to see how anything like an equitable result can be arrived at. That matter is now before the Local Government Board and how it will be settled, of course I am not prepared, at this moment, to say. It is a very striking instance of the inconvenience of having authorities without coterminous boundaries. If those boundaries were coterminous you could consolidate the collection of the poor rate immediately. Now you cannot. It was done at Portsmouth where all the authorities worked in harmony. The borough was extended, the Poor Law area was extended with the borough, and the consolidation of the rates has been effected. The whole has been put into one civil parish and all the rates are collected at the same time. That is a great convenience and saving.

Advisability of a Union being entirely in one county or borough.

Boundary difficulties of Southampton.

8863. The position at Southampton has been that the poor population are moving into the old town and the better-to-do are moving outside?—Yes, and the outside, although it is in the Borough, is not within the Poor Law area. There is the additional hardship that the guardians have built a most excellent infirmary in what is called the added area, which is in the Borough, but not in their own Poor Law area, and they have to pay rates to another union for their own building, and although their building is there, it cannot serve the population which surrounds it and which has to go to the South Stoneham workhouse five or six miles off. Then there is the further difficulty, that whilst this matter is pending both the Southampton and South Stoneham workhouse accommodation is quite inadequate, and, until it is decided in what jurisdiction the area is to be, of course the question of building must remain over.

Conditions in Southampton.

Encouragement of able-bodied pauperism under present administration.

8864. Paragraphs 9, 10, 11, 12 and 13 of your memorandum refer to the changes which have taken place in pauperism since 1834, and to the trend of more recent legislation. You point out that the Report of 1834 had to deal with the aggressive able-bodied pauper, and now the normal problem is how best to provide for the helpless sick and the aged. Further on, you point out that destitution has now ceased to be the only ground of claim. From these paragraphs I rather infer that you are afraid, unless care is taken, that the able-bodied pauper may be reinstated. Am I right in that?—Yes; to a certain extent I am certainly afraid of it.

Possibility of reducing pauperism by expert administration.

8865. The trend of recent legislation and the pressure brought on the Local Government Board has encouraged or induced boards of guardians to depart from the stricter methods of administration which in the earlier part of your experience prevailed?—Certainly. I have no doubt whatever in my own mind that an enormous amount of the pauperism and the expenditure is absolutely unnecessary, and ought not to be. I would say without hesitation that if the Local Government Board and a staff of its experts could administer the Poor Law, within three years you would have the pauperism reduced by one half, and in twenty years you would have it almost wiped out of the country. It has been done in many unions in almost every conceivable variety of position. When I was first attached to the Poor Law Board, Atcham was in my district. I was in Shropshire at that time and at Atcham Sir Baldwyn Leighton practically reduced pauperism to nil, and that was put to the terrible test of having Shrewsbury attached to it. Shrewsbury was one of the worst administered unions in that part of the country, and they said Shrewsbury would drag down Atcham to the Shrewsbury level. Not a bit. Atcham dragged up Shrewsbury, and the result of the union, after a few years, was that the Atcham policy prevailed. Then take other unions. Take what Mr. Pell did at Brixworth and what Mr. Bland Garland did at Bradfield. Take Bradford, take Manchester, take Whitechapel, take Fulham, and you see practically the same results everywhere. If that policy were universally applied, you would gradually get the same result universally. I am confident, myself, after a very careful and a very long study of the subject that an enormous amount of the pauperism which now exists is absolutely unnecessary and thoroughly mischievous, and if you could only get a uniform administration on sound lines, the majority of the pauperism of the country would disappear. See what foreign writers say. You will find much the same idea if you read Aschrott's book. Monsieur Thiers, I remember, described pauperism as "la plaie la plus dévorante de l'Angleterre," the eating ulcer of England. Monsieur Chevalier in his book shows how the Poor Law practically leaves matters as it finds them; simply keeps things going and does not apply a remedy, because the good theory of the Poor Law is defeated by the bad administration. If you could get an even and steady administration over the country, there is no reason whatever why England should be as largely pauperised as it is. It is only fair to say that the pauperism and the expenditure are enormously exaggerated in the public mind. The average pauperism for my district is under 3 per cent., and the average cost of the poor for the whole of the district is only 1s. 5d. in the £ for the year. Nobody can say that less than 3 per cent. on the population is a terrible percentage of pauperism, or that an expenditure of 1s. 5d. in the £ on the rateable value (and that includes lunatics in asylums and every item of Poor Law expenditure) is a very onerous burden; but the fact is that all sorts of rates are called poor rates which are not poor rates at all. All the other items are levied as poor rates so there is a popular fallacy that the burden of the Poor Law is very excessive. In my district that is not so. At the same time it is terrible that you should have such a heavy item as the aggregate comes to, but the largest item of all is the item of outdoor relief. The out relief in my district during the year ended Lady Day, 1905, cost more than £150,000.

Examples of Atcham, Brixworth, Bradfield, &c.

Average pauperism and its cost in the district.

Disadvantages of other than Poor Law expenditure being defrayed out of Poor Rate.

Difficulty of ascertaining the irreducible minimum of pauperism.

8866. Do you hold the theory that there is an irreducible minimum of helpless population entirely impotent to maintain themselves. If you hold that view, have you ever made a calculation of what percentage of the population is the irreducible minimum?—It is extremely difficult, because you have no data to go upon. My point of view assumes that a large proportion of the paupers who are now paupers ought not to be paupers, and would not be paupers if the law was properly administered.

Inadequate relief and methods of supplementing it.

8867. Although unable to maintain themselves, their friends or relatives would come forward and assist them?—Yes, but many would maintain themselves, and there are endless means which we know nothing about which the people have. As the law is at present administered, the guardians are on the horns of a dilemma, either the relief is not wanted, or it is utterly inadequate. They give 2s. 6d., and I contend that nobody can live on 2s. 6d. in anything like ordinary comfort, yet you see these people come in dozens, get 2s. 6d., and take it gladly: very often it is 1s. 6d., and sometimes as low as 1s. a week. Either it is not wanted, or it is utterly inadequate. If it is not wanted, they ought not to have it, if it is wanted they ought to have a great deal more, and the fact that they come and take it gladly, shows that they have means which people know nothing about. You there come to the great difference between wages and income. The popular idea is that the income of the working man is his wage. As a matter of fact it is not. There are endless means by which the wages are added to, and which form sources of income quite independent of wages. I dare say some of you may remember Richard Jeffries' famous letter to The Times, in November, 1872. He wrote about the agricultural labourer, and he quoted a case there in which the rent of the cottage was paid by one fruit tree. There are endless means by which a thrifty housewife can help to provide for herself and her family, or by which members of the family, and the children, can add to the income, such as keeping poultry, bee-keeping, goat-keeping, fruit, vegetables, salads; there are endless things. It all depends on the place and the particular cottage. All the cottagers round a place like Bournemouth can make money in that sort of way. Merely hot water for tea will bring in a considerable income in a neighbourhood like Margate and Pegwell Bay. Those are things that people do not think of. They are too apt to take wages as income, and they unfortunately often take the standard wage for that instead of the average wage. I do not want to mention names in this case; but when Joseph Arch went into Dorsetshire and told the labourers they were down-trodden hinds, and that they were working for 8s. a week, two employers of labour, within my own knowledge, offered the men 14s. a week if they would give up their perquisites. In Dorsetshire a great deal is given in perquisites, in addition to part payment in money. The cottage is given, and almost every employer of labour has his own particular perquisites. In those cases 14s. was offered. In one case they took it and in a month they applied to go back to the old system; in the other case it was refused.

Wages no true criterion of affluence.

8868. (Mr. Booth.) Do you mean 14s. instead of the wage?—Instead of the 8s., which was stated to be the wage, they were offered 14s. a week. In one case they took it and within a month they asked to go back to the old system, and in the other case they refused. That was a great many years ago now, I suppose it is twenty years ago. I only mention that to show the difference between the nominal standing wage and the income.

Low scales of relief in District.

8869. (Chairman.) Where boards of guardians give small sums of weekly relief, such as 2s. 6d. which you mentioned, have they not generally some scale of what they consider a minimum on which people can live, and do they not give them 2s. 6d. to bring the income, from every available source, of the person so helped up to this minimum?—I constantly ask the question of the relieving officers, "What income has this man got?" when he has had the 2s. 6d., and the answer frequently is, "Nothing that I know of," and yet they give the 2s. 6d. Some few years ago I got out the scale of relief for every union in my district; they all had scales more or less; some were written scales; some were a sort of agreed upon scale; but I do not think in any case a single man under ordinary conditions was higher than 2s. 6d.

Dangers of inadequate out-relief.

8870. Are you in favour of scales?—No, certainly not. Every case ought to be treated on its own merits; the whole of the facts in the case ought to be thoroughly ascertained. Then, if relief be given, it should be adequate;

Mr. Baldwyn Fleming.

9 April, 1906.

if it is not needed it should be refused. As a matter of fact, these half-crowns, eighteenpences and shillings are given because the facts are not ascertained. They make orders, in some cases, for as much as thirteen weeks at a time. If I had my way, no order should go for more than a fortnight, and at the end of the fortnight it should be thoroughly re-investigated. If you had a staff of relieving officers who would do it, and a board of guardians who would do it, you would get the relief in hand, and you would know what the necessities were, and those necessities would be adequately relieved.

Relief given to prevent the dispersal of labour.

8871. Under the system you describe, these small payments are mere doles ?—That is so, and you never know what is the motive of them. I remember very well, when I was in Lancashire, in some time of difficulty, I had no doubt, although I could not prove it, that a great deal of relief was given simply to keep the hands together so that they should not be dispersed—hands belonging to certain factories.

8872. Do you mean to say they were supplementing the wages ?—No, it was when they were on strike or not working, or there was a lock-out, as the case might be. They did not wish them to be dispersed, because, when the strike or lock-out was over, they wanted to have them there ready to start work again, but in the meantime they were on the rates.

8873. (Mrs. Webb.) That was through the employers' influence ?—Yes.

Out-relief a form of old-age pension.

8874. (Chairman.) The guardians were the employers, as I understand ? — Yes. They did not want these people to be dispersed, and they gave them relief to keep them together. You will find in the agricultural districts that every old servant of everybody in the neighbourhood is practically on out-door relief at anything from 1s. 6d. to 2s. 6d. Of course, they ought to be pensioned as old servants, not as paupers. You cannot get at the motive ; you never know why the out-door relief is given. You see a most improper case come up, and you suggest that there is something wrong in the family, either there is drink or immorality, or something or another, and it is very undesirable that out-door relief should be given ; nevertheless it is given.

8875. In the case of old people, this payment is given, and, I suppose, almost admitted to be given, as a sort of old-age pension ?—Yes, outdoor relief has become a habit of the country in the rural districts, and if you could only get the administrators and the recipients out of that habit, you would do a very great deal to restore proper administration. I have heard cases where the Chairman will say : " Oh, what have you come for ? " and the man will say : " I have come for my allowance." It is a matter of course.

Scale of relief stationary.

8876. Under this system in the rural districts, has the tendency been for the amount of outdoor relief to rise of recent years ?—I do not think so. I think it stands at very much the same level as it did when I first had to do with attending boards of guardians. I do not think any of them have increased their scale, except perhaps in the large towns.

8877. The evidence you have given is specially important, because you have had a very long experience. The witnesses who have come before us have been examined on this question of the rise and fall of pauperism, and there are two contending theories ; one is that it is very largely regulated by administration, and the other is that it is the conditions existing, the changed conditions in a neighbourhood which cause this change in the amount of necessity and the change in the amount of relief given. I wish to put a concrete case before you. Take Southampton. At page 6 of your figures you deal with Southampton, and there are some further figures relating to Southampton in the detailed statement which is attached to your memorandum. I see, by the second table on page 6, the population of Southampton has increased from 48,000 to 61,000 ; the rate of pauperism is now, notwithstanding the increase of population, higher than it was in 1876, and it is almost the highest, with the exception of one union, in the whole of your district. I assume that the increase in the shipping facilities and the development of the docks has brought a large population into Southampton and a population which has an aptitude for the casual work that dockyards give. I want to test your theory about strict administration. Assuming you had strict administration, what would be the effect in Southampton ?—If the Southampton workhouse accommodation had been equal to the requirements of the Poor Law area, the pauperism would be very much lower than it is now. The pauperism stands at its present figure simply because the workhouse is full, and they are obliged to give outdoor relief.

Conditions in Southampton Union.

8878. They cannot apply the test ?—They cannot apply the test at all, and the South Stoneham union is in the same position, for the reason I have already stated.

8879. Then the administration, according to your idea, is good in Southampton ?—I should be very sorry that my Southampton friends should think that I did not speak well of their administration, but, from my point of view, their administration leaves a great deal to be desired. It is only fair to say that they are so handicapped by their position that they cannot administer strictly. They cannot put people in the workhouse, because they have no room.

8880. Would the knowledge of that draw people from outside, so that people would come to Southampton because they knew that out-door relief was more easily obtained ?—I doubt that, because they could be removed if they had been there under a year. Southampton stands in an extremely peculiar position. There is an enormous amount of casual labour at Southampton, and the people who form that section of labour are most improvident. Nobody can tell at Southampton what labour will be required. Three or four ships may come into the docks, some of them huge ships, and for a few hours' work will be at fever heat ; every hand that they can get will be employed in discharging the cargo and in putting in the goods that are to be taken on. If a good many ships are in docks at the same time, every hand will have work, and they will be well paid. The work may go on not only during the day but also during the night. Then those ships go out, and you may have a lull ; you may have a day or two when there is hardly anything to do. The people who have earned this money during the time of pressure do not keep that money for the time when they will have nothing to do, they go and enjoy it at once, and then during the slack time they have nothing, and very likely they will have to go to the vagrant ward for their night's lodging.

8881. I do not want to put to you any matter outside your personal knowledge ; but do you know if, when Southampton is working at full swing, it can employ all the people who apply at the docks, or is there some surplus of casual labour ?—They would not employ an incompetent man. Lots of people might go to the dock to apply for labour who are unfit for it, but when it is in full swing I think it would employ all the men who are fit to be employed.

Comparison of Southampton and Portsmouth.

8882. Contrasting Southampton with Portsmouth, which is your other big town, the population there has very largely increased in the last twenty years, and the percentage of pauperism has diminished by more than half. I assume that the great difference between the two areas is that at Portsmouth the dockyard are the main employers, and the employment there is continuous ?—Yes. Of course, the Admiralty will not permit Portsmouth to become a commercial port except on a very limited scale. Portsmouth Harbour is, practically speaking, entirely in the hands of the naval authorities. But then at Portsmouth they have got their union and their municipal and other boundaries in thoroughly satisfactory order, and the guardians at Portsmouth are able to administer upon proper lines. They have got workhouse accommodation which is generally sufficient. There has been pressure this last winter, and the guardians are now considering what they ought to do to increase their accommodation. They have not had to give up applying the labour test at Portsmouth at any time, as they have practically had to do at Southampton. In Portsmouth the good classes of society are also resident in the union ; they are not like Southampton, where many of the better class have gone outside the poor law area.

8883. If Southampton had the same administrative advantages that Portsmouth has, by the extension of the area, you think there would be a decrease of the pauperism ?—Certainly.

8884. Going on with your Memorandum, there are two suggestions you make, one in paragraph 17, and one in paragraph 18. Let us take the first. You suggest that boards of guardians are rather unnecessarily hampered as regards small details?—I think so.

Suggestion that Guardians should have greater freedom as to details.

8885. Have they to apply through you, or do they apply direct to the Local Government Board?—Direct to the Local Government Board.

8886. That entails some correspondence, I suppose?—A considerable amount of correspondence. For instance, if an anæsthetic has to be administered in the workhouse, they have to apply to the Local Government Board for permission to pay the fee of the anæsthetist. It is given as an extra gratuity to the medical officer. That seems a very roundabout way and is very unnecessary

8887. Has an application to be made every time?—Yes, every time an anæsthetic is administered.

8888. (Sir Samuel Provis.) It does not often happen?—I think there are a good many applications in the course of a year for gratuities to the medical officers.

8889. In a particular union?—It is in the towns that it would happen, not in the country.

8890. (Chairman.) You would be disposed rather to relax the restrictions?—Yes, on all those small points, subscriptions to hospitals, and matters of that kind. There is a little difficulty, perhaps, about subscriptions. I am quite in favour of subscriptions to County Hospitals. There are, however, some philanthropic societies, no doubt doing admirable work, which are endeavouring, all over the country, to get subscriptions from boards of guardians, and I do not think it is advisable that any philanthropic society should be subsidised at the expense of the rates, so possibly the Local Government Board ought to contain a controlling influence upon that point.

8891. I see amongst other items there is: "Addresses to distinguished persons"?—There have been two or three very irritating instances of that. I have known one or two in my own experience in which Royal people have paid visits to localities, and illuminated addresses have been presented to them, and then it has gone before the auditor, and the auditor has surcharged. It takes all the grace out of a thing, when an incident of that sort happens. It is a very small matter, and is really a very unimportant detail, but it is a very irritating one.

Insufficient power of Local Government Board, e.g., Dental attendance on Poor Law children.

8892. Going to the next paragraph, you would like the Board to have more power in enforcing work which in their opinion is indispensable?—Yes, there are two points have been very present to my mind within the last two or three years. One is as to children's teeth, and the other is escape in case of fire. It is astonishing how difficult it is, in country districts, to get guardians to realise how important it is to have children's teeth attended to. I was at a meeting of a board of guardians a few months ago, in which there was a very animated debate which lasted half an hour, whether one poor boy, who had a swollen face, whom the doctor recommended should be sent to the dentist, should be allowed to go, and after this long debate it was decided, on the casting vote of the Chairman, that he should not be allowed to go to the dentist.

8893. And he had toothache all the time?—The poor boy was there with a swollen face. A thing of that kind is, to my mind, monstrous. But the teeth question is a very large question, and the future of the children depends very largely upon both their first teeth and their second teeth. People do not realise how important it is that the teeth should be properly attended to. I have over and over again asked guardians to let a dentist come and examine the children's teeth and see what required doing, and they have declined to do it. Farmer Giles will get up and say: "Lor, I have never been to a dentist in my life; why should pauper children go to a dentist?" In the little matter of tooth brushes they say they do not want petting up with tooth brushes.

8894. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Is it your idea that there should be a dentist appointed to each workhouse; that he should be one of the members of the staff?—I should like to see that. I do not say in every rural district you ought to appoint a dentist, but there ought to be provision for children who require a dentist's attention being sent to the dentist. If the guardians would do it, the thing could be done, but some guardians will not do it. Another question is as to escape in case of fire. In one of the workhouses of my district there are four wards at least which, from my point of view, are in considerable danger. They are the end wards, on the first and second floors, of the two opposite wings of the workhouse. Those wards are approached by staircases with no alternative exists at the other end. If those staircases get blocked by smoke, which would be inevitable if the house caught fire, the inmates of the end wards could have no escape. I wanted the guardians to put up an external staircase, and the Local Government Board sent down the architect with me to see whether my suggestion was a proper one, and our report went to the guardians afterwards, saying that it could be done at a very moderate cost—I think £60 was all the cost—but still the guardians declined to do it. Those wards remain unprotected. It would be absurd for the Local Government Board to apply to the Court for a mandamus to compel the guardians to open a window and put up a staircase.

Provision of fire escapes in workhouses.

8895. (Chairman.) You think if the Local Government Board had power to order such things to be done, such a power would not be unpopular, because the fact that it existed would induce the guardians to do what was necessary without compulsion?—I think so.

Multiplicity of Workhouse books and returns.

8896. Then you come to a matter of some little importance, and that is the workhouse book-keeping. Are there great complaints about the number of figures and details?—Yes, there are. To my mind it is extremely involved, and a great deal of it is unnecessary. I object to it strongly, because it really does not produce the result which you desire. It is impossible, in administering a House, to work down your results to a quarter of an ounce. Nobody could do it in his own establishment. These books do it, but it is mere paper work.

8897. Are the accounts obliged to be kept in the same form always?—They are obliged to be kept in the same form. The order of accounts states the different books that are to be kept by the officers in charge of them. In a large workhouse I admit it would be very difficult not to have a comparatively close system of book-keeping, but in the smaller country workhouses I think that it would be comparatively easy to work them more as a private establishment is worked, just with sufficient vouchers to show what was brought in and what was consumed, but without requiring the endless repetitions and entries which the officers now have to make in the different books which they are obliged to keep and present to the auditor.

8898. There are a great many returns they have to make in order to comply with Acts of Parliament?—Yes, but those chiefly come upon the clerks. I do not think those are so onerous. It is the day by day work which the workhouse master has to perform which takes him off from work which he might be much more usefully doing. As a matter of fact, the medical officers do not keep their books. It is a standing grievance that you cannot get the medical men to do it. They have not time to do it, and they do not do it.

Possibility of repealing Law of Settlement.

8899. Now we come to the question of settlement and removal. Your opinion inclines to the repeal of settlement, but it would be impossible to attempt to repeal settlement unless you had something like a uniform system of administration all over, would it not?—I think that the repeal of settlement would, to a very great extent, bring about uniformity of administration. If a house were too good, and they all flocked there, it might have to lower its standard.

8900. It seems to me there would be a difficulty in a big place if you once lowered the standard?—It would not have the effect of lowering the standard. But what do you do now? A person has only to remain one year in a place and settlement is at an end for all practical purposes. You have reduced it to one year, and then irremovability. What is the good of keeping that? It gives all the trouble and all the annoyance and all the expense of working the law of settlement and removal, without any corresponding advantage.

8901. Take a seaport town, like Southampton. Would you not have a considerable number of people belonging to other parishes chargeable on the parish if you abolished the law of settlement?—If the principle of a thing is right, I do not think it ought to be questioned because it may be worked inconveniently in one place. The great question with regard to the abolition of the law of settlement or removal—or it used to be the great difficulty when I was in the North—was what was known as the Irish question. It was said that in times of difficulty you would have Irish paupers shipped over in thousands to Liverpool and Glasgow. I know when I had Liverpool in my district it was not an uncommon thing that people applied for relief the very day after they had been there a year ; but I would unhesitatingly abolish the whole law of settlement and removal. It is quite an anomaly and quite out of date. It is a very small residum of feudal times, which is not wanted now. I do not see what harm would be done ; it would save a great deal of expense and a great deal of friction and a great deal of trouble. I think where persons fall destitute, there they ought to be relieved.

Mr. Baldwyn Fleming.

8902. Let me put a case which I was going to suggest where the administration, for various reasons (I need not go into them) becomes lax in a populous district, and people flock there and the place becomes pauperised, or at any rate the proportion of pauperism largely increases ; you say it would remedy itself, but it is not very easy, if the place has once become pauperised ?—I do not think the effect will be to pauperise them. They have only to stay there a year now, and they cannot be removed.

8903. You think that the check of a year does not compensate for all the disadvantages which ensues ?—No, I do not see any advantage in it. I see great disadvantages, and I do not see any advantage. They say it may be the right of a person to be sent back to his own parish. If he wants to go back to his own parish, he can go back, and when he gets there he will have the right to relief there.

8904. I pass on now to paragraph 23. You are inclined to suggest that there should be greater power given of compulsory removal to the workhouse ?—Yes.

8905. That applies to more than one class of case, does it not ?—Yes, there are very few cases, I think, in which it would be necessary to exercise it, but you do nowadays come across old sick cases, bed-ridden cases, which cannot possibly be properly looked after in their own homes. Even if you had put an expensive nurse in charge of them and given them all the appliances, owing to the construction of the cottage, the family living in the cottage, and other details, a case that really requires constant skilled nursing cannot have it under the conditions existing ; and it would be much better for everybody that there should be power to remove that case to the workhouse infirmary, where it can be properly attended to, than that it should run on in misery on outdoor relief.

Proposed power to compulsorily remove certain classes to Workhouse.

8906. There is also the case of old people living under most insanitary conditions ?—Certainly.

8907. There is no power to remove them ?—No, there is no power to remove anybody against their will now, unless they are certified imbeciles or insane. There is a further difficulty with regard to those old bed-ridden cases : that you never know that the relief ordered for them reaches them. You see a medical order for 2 lbs. of beef, which is supposed to make beef tea for a week. I have known cases in which those tickets have been collected and presented to a butcher when they come 7 or 8 lbs., in order that a joint may be obtained. I remember a butcher sending to a board of guardians to know whether he was bound to receive three or four 2 lbs. tickets as an order for a leg of mutton. And even when you put the 2 lbs. of beef into the house, what is the result ? If they make beef tea of it, which not one cottager in a thousand knows how to do—it is most difficult to get good beef tea, and after all it is only a stimulant and not a food when you do make it—but supposing you do make it, or get it made, it will not last for a week ; it is bad long before the end of the week. It means, with regard to many of those 2 lbs. of meat, that the family have one meat dinner.

Proposed power to detain certain classes in Workhouse.

8908. You would also wish to increase the power of detention in workhouses ?—Yes, with regard to certain classes of cases—young girls who are sure to come to grief if they go outside. I think it is a pity there is no power to detain them without classing them as insane.

8909. Your opinion rather corroborates the evidence which has been given by some other inspectors, that a considerable portion of the illegitimate children are children of girls who are feeble-minded ?—Even without being feeble-minded, there are certain girls who are deficient, and also those who have instincts which it is not desirable they should be allowed to indulge. It is very much better, if the doctor or the guardians think they should be kept there, that there should be power of detention. I do not say I would give it absolutely ; I would give power to appeal to the magistrate, so as to protect the liberty of the subject, but I think the guardians ought to have power of compulsory detention in cases which clearly ought not to go outside. Venereal cases is another instance. I believe it was always intended that the guardians should have the power with regard to venereal cases, but the law officer advised the Poor Law board many years ago that it did not apply to those cases. My own belief is that when Lord Devon's clause was passed, that was one of the very cases it was intended to apply to.

Attitude of Midwives Board towards Poor Law Infirmary training schools.

8910. With regard to nursing and midwifery, you note the great improvement that has taken place in the training and in the class of nurse now at work in the infirmaries and workhouses ; but they are not, I see, recognised as midwives by the Central Midwives Board ?—Since I wrote that paragraph the position has been somewhat modified, because a deputation from the Central Midwives Board has been received at Whitehall, and they say that where the medical officer is one of their approved teachers. candidates can be presented. I did not know that, and I do not think the Local Government Board knew it, at the time I wrote that paragraph ; but the position is practically as stated in that paragraph. Before the Midwives Act was passed, any Poor Law nurse who had attended the requisite number of cases, and could pass the examination, could obtain her qualification in midwifery from the London Obstetrical Society, but the Midwives Board has passed a resolution, which was not approved by the Privy Council—it did not go before the Privy Council ; it is a resolution of their own—that they will not accept candidates from Poor Law institutions unless they have seventy-five cases a year, and then not unless they are recognised by them as training schools. The result of that is that it prevents a large proportion of the Poor Law nurses from being able to go up and present themselves for examination. I am quite unable to see what the advantage of the resolution can be. I may say I have been in correspondence about it with Miss Wilson, who is a member of the Midwives Board, and I can see no reason whatever for such a resolution. If the nurse has attended the number of cases which they prescribe, and has a certificate to that effect from a qualified authority, and if she be able to pass the examination, one does not see how it can matter whether the cases she attended happened in a house which had seventy-five cases in the course of the year or twenty-five cases in the course of the year. She only has to be present at twenty. If she has been present at twenty, what can it matter that there were fifty others in the establishment during the year ? If she has had the experience which is required, and can pass the examination, so far as she is concerned, one cannot see why any difficulty should be created. There is the further reason why Poor Law nurses should be admitted, that they are generally better trained than a candidate who has only gone through a midwifery course. The Central Midwives Board admit candidates who only go through a three months' midwifery course. The Poor Law nurses have generally gone through three years full training as nurses, so that they are very much more valuable as midwives than a midwife who has merely gone through a three months' midwifery course. I mention that matter in my précis as an instance in which a great detriment has been done to the Poor Law service without the Poor Law authorities having any opportunity of objecting before-hand. Many of the probationers have undertaken to remain three years for their training with the idea that they would be able to go up for their midwifery course ; but, by the resolution of the Central Midwives Board, they are prevented from doing so. It is a very serious hardship looking at the fact that they say, on one hand, there will be a very great dearth of midwives, and that they are sending lecturers about the country endeavouring to persuade everyone they can to get midwives into good training, and on the other hand they refuse a supply of admirable midwives and will not allow them to present themselves for examination.

8911. Is the board entirely composed of medical men ?—I cannot remember off-hand what the composition of the board is. There are two ladies, and there are some representatives of the College of Physicians. I think Dr. Downes would be able to give you that information.

8912. The Local Government Board is not medically or administratively represented?—No.

Effect of improved nursing in increasing Poor Law expenditure.

8913. Coming to the concluding paragraphs of your memorandum, in paragraphs 28, 29 and 30 you point out that the cost of in-relief must necessarily rise as the provision for the sick and the aged is more costly than the maintenance of the class of people who previously were in workhouses. Does not that rather point to the fact that more of the sick and aged come to the workhouse now, when ill, or when becoming decrepit from old-age, than before?—I think it shows very much the great improvement in the nursing. Now that the nursing is really efficient, the doctors can do things in the Poor Law institutions which they could not do before, and, therefore, they try to get the cases in so that they can be properly looked to. When there were not the means of properly attending to them in the Poor Law establishments, there was no use getting them there, but now that they have skilled nurses and all the necessary appliances, they do get them there.

8914. Therefore, that is a cost the growth of which one must contemplate?—To some extent. That has the further influence that the poor people themselves learn how well they are done by in the infirmaries, and, therefore, they have much less reluctance to go there.

8915. They perhaps draw in a class which previously did not go to the workhouse?—The class who previously received outdoor relief and who were miserable. But there is no doubt that in the old days, the days of pauper nurses, there was a thing which was most extremely difficult to catch hold of or prove—there used to be a great deal of bribery. If a patient wanted to be well looked after by pauper nurses, if he or she had a friend who could go in and just slip 1s. or 6d. into the pauper nurse's hand, the case received attention. If there was nobody to do any good office of that kind for a case, the case was not looked after as it should have been looked after. No doubt there was a good deal of that done. Now that we have got skilled trained nurses, the thing is out of the question. There is nothing of the sort, and the very poorest and the most desolate of the patients are just as well looked after as the ones who have relatives or people interested in them.

Efficiency of Workhouse officers.

8916. You have a good opinion of the workhouse officers. In your judgment, they do their work well?—I think admirably.

8917. The part of the Poor Law administration which you think wants strengthening is the relieving officer?—Yes.

Extra duties of Relieving Officers and objections thereto.

8918. Do relieving officers, as a rule, discharge other work besides that of relieving officers?—Not to the same extent that they used to do. At one time a great many of the relieving officers were holding the post of inspector of nuisances. That has, almost everywhere, I think, been stopped. I do not think at the present moment there is a single case in my district. There were many of those cases, and that interfered very much with their doing their duties. They have a great many duties now which I should be very glad to see taken away from them. For instance, with regard to lunatics, relieving officers are constantly called upon to remove lunatics to asylums, perhaps a considerable distance from their own districts. It is quite open to guardians to make other arrangements, but the duty is, under the Lunacy Acts, upon the relieving officer to see that the thing is done. Another matter on which relieving officers are constantly sent out of their district is to look after settlement and removal cases.

8919. They also have to deal with vaccination?—Some of them are vaccination officers. That again I object to. I should like to see vaccination taken away from the guardians altogether. It is not a relief business, it ought to be put under the sanitary work and not under the guardians' work.

Relieving Officers' salaries and their adequacy.

8920. Is the remuneration that relieving officers get sufficient to attract desirable and efficient men?—That is a difficult question to answer. In some cases it is fairly good; in some cases I think it is very inadequate. With regard to relieving officers, as with regard to medical officers, the difficulty is that, whenever there is a vacancy you get any amount of qualified candidates who come forward, and when I tell guardians that their relieving officers and medical officers are not adequately paid, they say: "Well, at all events, we have only to advertise it, and we shall get any amount of candidates who are perfectly ready to come forward and do the work on the terms we offer. In the face of that, can we, in the proper performance of our duty to the ratepayers, offer more than what we can get what we want for?" I think a great many of the medical officers are very much underpaid, and a great many of the relieving officers are too.

Return as to size, etc., of Relieving Officers' districts.

I have got a Return here of the relieving officers' districts in my union, which I shall be very happy to put in if you care to have it. It gives the acreage, the population, the number of relieving officers, the number of acres to each of the population. Some of them are very scattered indeed. In Beaminster there is only one inhabitant to every six acres—the acreage of each relieving officer's district, and the population of each relieving officer's district.

8921. Have you put in the salaries?—I have not the salaries here, but they could be very easily added, if you would care to have them.

8922. We shall be obliged if you will do that?—I certainly will. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XIX (F).)

Need for more Relieving Officers and more frequent visitation of cases.

8923. I see you attach very great importance to sufficient and efficient relieving officers. You look upon it as the keystone of effectual outdoor administration?—Certainly. It stands to reason that a relieving officer cannot do the work, under present conditions, as I should like it done. The relieving officer, as a rule, goes round his district once a week. It is known exactly where he will be at every hour; he goes at such an hour to such a place and at another hour to such another place. And then they have what I think is a most objectionable system of pay-stations; that is, they have not time to go to the homes of all the paupers and see them in their own surroundings, and the paupers have to come to the pay-stations, and at the pay-stations they pay them. A pauper may not go to the pay-station, he may send a child to get his relief, and the relieving officer does not see him at all. More unexpected visitation, which, to my mind, is absolutely necessary to ascertain the real conditions of paupers, the relieving officers have no time to do. When you look to the areas they have to cover and the number of cases they go to, they simply cannot do it. It takes them just their days in the week to get round to the various villages they have to go to. I am confident myself it would be a most economical thing to appoint many more relieving officers, at good salaries, and to keep them constantly at work paying unexpected visits. It is the only way in which you can ascertain the real necessities of the patients, on the one hand, and adequately relieve them, and, on the other hand, in which you can protect the ratepayers from fraud.

Pros and cons of Relief Stations.

8924. It has been represented to us that pay stations under certain conditions are almost a necessity where the population is very sparse?—I do not agree there at all. I think the relieving officer ought to be made, especially where there are sparse populations, to go to the homes of the recipients of relief and administer the relief in person. The only pay stations which appear to me to be at all excusable are in the very large towns, where the people live very close to the pay station, and it is no hardship for them to go. In the sparse districts it is often a very grave hardship that the recipients should be required to go to the pay stations. They either have to do it at very great personal inconvenience, if not personal suffering, or if they are personally unable they have to send someone else, and then the relieving officer knows still less about the case.

8925. You would assume, I gather, that even if pay stations were abolished, even if it entailed generally all over the country an increase of relieving officers, pecuniarily it would ultimately benefit the ratepayers?—I think so certainly, not only the ratepayers, but the poor people themselves, because they would be adequately relieved. Of course the relieving officers, as I admit, and as I said in my evidence, are in a very difficult position. The ideal relieving officer would be a man who had not a pauper in his district. If a man did his work thoroughly well, he would prevent anybody from becoming a pauper. A Proper function of Poor Law officers to prevent or reduce pauperism.

Mr. Baldwyn Fleming.

9 April, 1906.

relieving officer's work is much more, in my opinion, in prevention than in the relief of destitution. Directly his number diminishes very largely, the guardians say, this man has nothing to do, he is getting too much pay.

8926. They look upon it as a matter to be decided not by results, not by the reduction, but by the actual number he has to deal with ?—Yes, just as in the case of workhouses, I constantly hear guardians say, "There is nobody in this workhouse ; what has this great staff of officers got to do ? " As a matter of fact when there are no able-bodied people in the workhouse, the work on the officers is very much greater than when there are able-bodied people, because the able-bodied people can do it ; but when you have nothing but aged and infirm and decrepit people in the house, the officers have to do all the work.

Superintendent Relieving Officers and their effect.

8927. In your district are there any superintendent relieving officers now ?—At Portsmouth, and to a certain extent at Southampton, but not anywhere else.

8928. Does the system work well in those two districts ? —At Southampton I think each relieving officer keeps to his own district, but at Portsmouth they have a superintendent relieving officer. I do not know that he is called by that name, but he is an extra relieving officer who goes about the other districts and sees that the work is properly done, and of course it works admirably.

Deterrence of workhouse test.

8929. (Mr. Booth.) We have been told that the test of offering the house does not necessarily or permanently increase the number of people who require to be relieved in that way. Do you agree with that view ?—Entirely, it diminishes it, because the people then learn that they must provide for themselves, and they do it.

8930. Yet it is impossible to offer it unless there is room in the house ?—Quite so.

Necessary margin of surplus Workhouse accommodation.

8931. What margin of workhouse accommodation is needed in order to make the offer of the house successful ? —I am sorry to say I cannot answer that question, because the workhouse is divided into so many departments. I got out a return a short time ago of the spare accommodation in the different departments in Wiltshire and Dorsetshire, and although the aggregate number of beds was very large, when you came to divide them among the different departments it was very small. For instance, in every workhouse you must have a considerable number of beds that you hope never will be occupied. The receiving ward must have a certain number of beds ; you must have separation wards for cases of skin diseases, and other ailments, which you hope will never be occupied ; you must have a certain amount of maternity accommodation, which you hope will very seldom be occupied ; and in other departments, you must have means for classification, which also you hope will never want to be occupied, for cancer and offensive or septic cases ; so you must have a very considerable reserve in every workhouse in the different departments, but as to saying what the average percentage would be, I could not venture to express an opinion.

8932. In the aggregate it would be considerable ?—It must be considerable.

8933. Could that necessary margin possibly be arranged by a combination of unions. Would the difficulty that you put forward as to distance apply equally, where it was really that all that was required was a marginal matter. Would it not be possible by a combination amongst a number of unions to supply that margin more economically than if each union supplied it ?—I think not. I think you must have your margin available in the place where the accommodation is required for the union itself.

8934. It would not do to offer the house, knowing you might have to transplant to a neighbouring union some of those who accepted the house, rather than relief ?—To begin with, under the present law you cannot do that without their consent.

8935. I am not thinking of the present law, but what may be possible with regard to a form of extension of area ?—I really doubt whether it could be done in that way. I think it would prove inconvenient in practice. It is a curious thing, that there is a fallacy among the people who receive relief that out-door relief is less disgraceful than in-door relief. Of course that is completely wrong, and it is very advisable, if possible, that the people should be taught that. To my mind in-door relief is more honourable than outdoor relief, because the indoor relief man says, "I accept your relief, but in return for it I give you the best work I can. You put me to work in return for the relief I get, and I give you the best work I am capable of giving in return for what you give me." The outdoor relief man does nothing of the kind, but takes all he can get and does nothing whatever in return. Looking at it as a matter of disgrace, the outdoor man is in a more disgraceful position than the indoor man.

Comparative stigma of out-door relief and indoor relief.

8936. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) You said just now that when there were vacancies for relieving officers or medical officers there were plenty of qualified applicants ? —That referred mainly to medical officers.

Qualifications of Relieving Officers and possibility of prescribing the same.

8937 I thought it must do. I want to gather from you what you consider the qualifications of a relieving officer . -That is an extremely difficult question to answer, but as a matter of fact men are appointed relieving officers very often who know absolutely nothing about it. A relieving officer, as a rule, has to learn his work after he is appointed. It is very difficult to get at the motives which move individuals to appoint other individuals to certain Poor Law offices, but you will sometimes see a man appointed as a relieving officer simply because he has failed in everything else—I will not say very often—but not infrequently. He may have failed as a farmer ; he may have failed as a contractor ; he may have failed as a road surveyor ; he may have failed in any sort of line of business to which he has devoted himself, but if he be well known and have a quantity of friends, they will find something for him.

8938. He might even have failed as a guardian ? —Or he may have succeeded as a guardian. I know one relieving officer who was a very successful guardian and has made an admirable relieving officer.

8939. It does occur to you it is almost impossible to expect to get, under present conditions, the kind of relieving officer that you think is a necessity for that position ?—It is very difficult.

8940. Have you any suggestion to make as to how that could be got over ?—The Poor Law Officers Union have an idea that examinations should be held for the purpose.

8941. What is your view of that ?—I know of one union in which the officers themselves, I will not say as a pastime, but for their own improvement and information, do answer examination papers from time to time, which are put to them by people who are interested in their work, and they learn a good deal thereby, but whether it would be possible to impose an examination for the relieving officership is, I should think, a very open question indeed. It is difficult to test a man's capacity for the work by any examination you could put him to ; certainly a paper examination would not do it. A man might be an admirable paper administrator, but he might be lazy and self-indulgent, and not get over the ground to do his work at all.

8942. Would you suggest anything like having a central station where you might have a certain number of probationers ?—I have no doubt if the Local Government Board had the administration of the relief for the whole of the country and the appointment of the officers who were to administer it, that very excellent results would be obtained, but that is not a practical solution of the difficulty.

8943. Could there be any system devised by means of which certain people who are not qualified, and who understood that they were not qualified, could be qualified. At present there is no qualification at all ?— You might impose an age limit, you might do some good by that ; you might impose a certain amount of reading, writing and general information as a qualification, but I do not know that that would help you very much. It is very difficult to suggest a qualification which would ensure your having the men you want for the Poor Law work.

Difficulty in removing unsatisfactory Poor Law Officers.

8944. Yet it is a necessity of the position to have the right man ?—Yes, I should be very glad if there were an easier mode of removing people from office, who are not satisfactory. It is very difficult now. If you get a man not doing his work well, it is practically impossible to remove him.

8945. (Mr. Gardiner.) Is that from the point of view of the guardians or the Local government Board ?—From the point of view of the Local Government Board and from the point of view of the guardians also.

8946. There is no duty on the Local Government Board or the local guardians to get rid of an incompetent officer ?—The Local Government Board find it very difficult at present to get rid of an officer, unless charges can be brought against him which can be proved. General incompetence is a thing for which it is most difficult to get rid of anybody. I should be glad if there were power to do it; I do not say the power does not exist, but in practice it cannot be exercised. If a board of guardians passed a resolution that they had lost confidence in an officer, I should think it a very good thing that that officer should be removable by the Local Government Board without an official inquiry. Up to the present time it is almost invariably held that the Local Government Board will not remove an officer without an official inquiry. There is nothing so difficult of proof at the official inquiry as general incompetence.

Inadequacy of Law of Settlement as a check on migration of paupers.

8947. (Mr. Russell Wakefield.) With regard to the matter of settlement which you rather wished to see dealt with, you say: here is no check except for one year, because there is no removability after a year ?—I do not say it is no check, but it is a very slight one.

8948. One's experience rather shows the same thing. Is not it the fact that people come in generally to urban districts when work is plentiful, or something special is going on, and they get into work, sometimes for six months or a year, then they become irremovable, then the work slackens off for some reason or another and they become practically paupers very soon ?—Yes, they cannot be removed if they have been there a year.

8949. As a rule they do move in where there is work, when they are told there is work in a particular locality ?—Probably that would be so.

8950. Then they just carry on for a year, and after the year they are irremovable ?—Yes.

8951. You lay a good deal of stress on the subject of teeth with regard to children and the dentists. As to the subject of eyes we have found in London that that is a very grave matter ?—In the country districts we do not get very much of that. There has been a certain amount of trouble in years gone by at Portsmouth and Southampton, but in the Poor Laws Children's Homes both at Southampton and Portsmouth they have most excellent medical superintendents who are very keen about their work and do it very well, and practically there is very little eye trouble there. It is a thing that wants constantly watching, and if it were not constantly watched no doubt there would be eye trouble, but those two are the only two large centres that I have now. At the Hartley Wintney School, which is the only district school I have, at which I suppose there are about 200 children, of recent years they have had very little trouble with the eyes.

Eye troubles among Poor Law children.

Labour conditions at Southampton

8952. Do you know the wages paid at the Southampton Dock in these times of pressure ?—They are paid by the hour. I am afraid I cannot tell you that because it depends on the men; some classes are paid more than others.

8953. There is a great deal of overtime ?—Yes, as I say, in times of pressure they work day and night.

8954. That kind of spasmodic casual labour is invariably improvident, is not it ?—Yes, that is so. At Southampton now they have nothing to induce them to be provident; they are improvident. If they find they have nothing in their pockets, they apply for an Order for the workhouse. They cannot take them into the the workhouse, so they give them an Order for the casual wards. They get shelter of a kind, and food and drink of a kind, which enables them to keep on until more ships come in and they can go out and get more work.

8955. I suppose in your district if you got rid of that improvidence on the part of the casual spasmodic labourer you would have got rid of most of your difficulties ?—I think you would have got rid of a good deal of it if you treated it properly, but where the workhouse accommodation is insufficient, and where the administration allows it to be used simply for the convenience of that class of person, of course the present condition of affairs goes on.

8956. (Mr. Nunn.) I think you said that the experience of certain unions in various parts of England, even rural unions, showed that pauperism might be stamped out if sufficiently energetic measures were taken to secure that ?—In the course of fifteen or twenty years, I should think it might be very nearly stamped out. You have a residuum of the absolutely helpless and of the incompetent, who never could provide for themselves owing to their physical incapacity, and who may not have relations who are able to provide for them. That would be a sort of remanet which, I suppose, would always exist to a certain extent, but so far as people who could provide for themselves and fail to do so are concerned, I think within twenty years time if you had a uniform and sound administration you would have no paupers left, they would all have provided for themselves by means of friendly societies, or by other means which are open to them. Of course friendly societies are only one form of thrift.

Mr. Baldwyn Fleming.

9 April, 1906.

Extent to which pauperism could be eradicated by good administration.

8957. During the past seventy years the Local Government Board has had very large powers, has not it, in regard to what the guardians shall do, and its definite policy has been on the whole to abolish outdoor relief or to minimise it ?—No doubt the aim of the Commissioners in 1834 was gradually to abolish outdoor relief altogether. The special problem they had to deal with at the moment was outdoor relief of the able-bodied, but if the principles which they laid down had been steadily adhered to, the abolition of the outdoor relief to the able-bodied would have long ago brought about the practical abolition of all outdoor relief, and much of the indoor relief.

Difficult position of Local Government Board in relation to the Poor Law.

8958. Do you think the Local Government Board has failed in not having a sufficient staff to propagate its views ?—No, I do not think the Local Government Board (perhaps I ought not to say so) have failed in any way. I look upon the work of the Local Government Board rather as an outsider, because my work to a great extent is away from Whitehall, and to me it is perfectly wonderful how the Local Government Board do their work. I think the administration of the Local Government Board has been admirably successful considering the way in which it is handicapped by the division of authority between the board and the local authorities, and by the action of Parliament.

8959. At the end of seventy years it leaves us with a great mass of outdoor relief, which we all feel is still demoralising to the poor ?—That is because the Local Government Board are not the administrators. The Local Government Board do not administer. I have the instructions here which were given to me when I was appointed as an assistant inspector to the Poor Law Commissioners.

Instructions to Assistant Commissioners.

8960. Will that be put in ?—I have not the least objection. When I was appointed an assistant inspector in 1868, the instructions to the assistant commissioners were given to me and here they are. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XIX (G).)

8961. (Mrs. Webb.) Those relate to the assistant commissioners appointed under the Poor Law Commissioners of 1836 ?—Yes, they are published in the official circular.

8962. Have you had any further instructions ?—Only verbally. There have been a great many instructions sent to the inspectors from time to time on different points, and the circulars sent to boards of guardians go also to the general inspectors, but in these instructions to the assistant commissioners, I do not know whether I am at liberty to put them in ?

8963. (Sir Samuel Provis.) I think there can be no objection ?—These are what were given me when I was appointed, and in them it says the assistant commissioners are not the administrators.

8964. (Dr. Downes.) What is the date of those instructions ?—These are the 13th January, 1847.

8965. There were instructions prior to those ?—Yes. Those are in the official circular.

8966. (Chairman.) Will you read the particular clause ?—These are the instructions to the Assistant Commissioners in 1841. They were modified afterwards, because at that time the Assistant Commissioners had to take what were known as the averages. They were practically keeping the accounts and giving the averages of expenditure and pauperism in the different unions. That was afterwards done by other means. I do not know when the earliest instructions were issued to Assistant Commissioners. I remember when I was first appointed I received very definite instructions, partly printed and partly by word of mouth. The passage I want to refer to was this: "Before they close these instructions, the Commissioners will remark, that the ordinary and detailed management of the workhouse, and the superintendence of the union officers, is vested in the guardians, and, therefore, that the guardians are primarily responsible for any abuse or irregularities in the administration of the law which may occur within their union, with respect either to the state or management of the workhouse, the administration of outdoor relief, the keeping of the union books or the conduct of paid officers, which ought not to escape the observation of the assistant, commissioner, who will not fail to report it, without delay to the Commissioner." That states clearly that assistant commissioners were not administrators: they were only, if one may so describe it, supervisors. The Local Government Board inspectors are not administrators, they simply supervise, at least that is my view of their duty.

Mr. Baldwyn Fleming.

The political element in the Local Government Board.

8967. (Mr. Nunn.) My point was that the Local Government Board, and the Poor Law Board before it, had a definite policy in view, and had a great many means in their hands to produce a certain impression on the minds of the public and the guardians, yet the impression has not been produced?—Because it has been constantly hampered by the interference of Parliament.

8968. I suppose that is some times an assistance. I suppose the President of the Local Government Board, having a seat in the Cabinet, is able to initiate legislation where interference is necessary?—On the other hand the interference may take the form of the political side which he happens to represent in the House. I think the great advantage in the supervision by the Commissioners was that there were very little politics indeed about it. In those days they had a free hand; in the very early days of the Commission.

8969. Do you think the policy of the Local Government Board would be freer if the president did not have a seat in the Cabinet?—No, I think it is necessary that he should have a seat in the Cabinet; at least I do not say absolutely necessary, because several Presidents in my time have not been in the Cabinet, but they have been able to put their views before their colleagues in the Government; they have all been in the Government if not in the Cabinet.

8970. You would not be in favour of removing the sphere of the Local Government Board outside party legislation by placing a permanent head at the Local Government Board?—I am afraid it would be practically impossible.

Control of Local Government Board over Boards of Guardians.

8971. Apart from legislation, the Local Government Board has power to pull up a board of guardians, partly by way of a mandamus, partly by way of its auditors, and partly by issuing orders which come under the various Poor Law Acts, I suppose?—That is so.

8972. Is there any other conclusive way in which the Local Government Board can give expression to its wishes besides those I have mentioned?—I think there should be; for instance in such details as I have mentioned, the fire escape, and the dentists, it would be a very good thing if the Local Government Board could say, "We will do it and charge you with the cost."

8973. Is this within their power now?—Not practically. The Local Government Board have not power to do it and charge it to the guardians. They may in theory have power to require the guardians to do it, but they could only enforce that by mandamus.

8974. Those are the only four means by which they could enforce their opinion?—That is a legal question, but I think you are right.

8975. They could do it by breaking up a union, of course?—As a matter of fact how many unions have been broken up since the Poor Law Board and the Local Government Board have been in existence? I think you could tell them on the fingers of one hand. It is a theoretical power, but as a matter of fact it is not a practical one.

Duties of Inspectors in relation to the Local Government Board.

8976. I suppose inspectors are not only supposed to supervise the work of the board of guardians, but they are supposed to give a certain voice to the policy of the Local Government Board in regard to any matters that come before them?—I think it is the duty of the inspectors to inform their boards of guardians what the wishes of the Local Government Board are upon all matters which are within the control of the Local Government Board.

8977. When a board of guardians quite fails to respond to that, does his duty cease, or does he report it to the Local Government Board again?—He would report it to the Local Government Board undoubtedly, and his duty would not cease. He would go on trying. I have gone on trying for very many years and have succeeded.

Local Government Board's procedure by mandamus.

8978. I think you used the expression that it would be absurd to move by way of a mandamus in order to produce a £60 structural alteration which might involve the loss of a number of lives. Is it a very difficult process?—I suppose it would be a difficult process, but it is not only in that one way, but the whole process of having to proceed by mandamus when you want a slight alteration like that made; and after all the responsibility is on the guardians. The guardians say they have sufficient means of escape. I think they have not.

8979. Yet, on the other hand, if a means like that were used on a few occasions, it would have a great moral effect in asserting the power of the Local Government Board, I suppose?—I do not know. I think it is absurd that there should be any necessity to have recourse to such a means.

8980. I was thinking of what power the Local Government Board had now?—I think it would be absurd to apply to the Court for a mandamus to compel guardians to erect an external staircase

8981. (Mr. Loch.) You would suggest a more summary process?—Yes. It is bringing the law into ridicule to go through a process like that; you have to instruct counsel and there is a great deal of delay and expense.

8982. (Mr. Nunn.) At present there are no other means?—Not for practical purposes.

8983. A certain exercise by the Local Government Board of even such means as that would have a moral effect on boards of guardians by increasing the power which the Local Government Board would be able to exercise?—I can quite imagine a case big enough to warrant the exercise of the power, but in everyday occurrences of the character I have referred to, I think it would be rather absurd to have to go to the Court for a mandamus to compel it.

8984. It might have a cumulative effect?—It would have an effect that way no doubt.

Necessity for and methods of, elevating the status of Guardians.

8985. Another way by which the policy of the Local Government Board can be secured is by what you call levelling the status of the guardians?—That is a point on which I feel very strongly, as I venture to state in my précis.

8986. You regret that the ratepayers' qualification has been so lowered?—I do very much. I regret also that the ex officio guardians have been eliminated. I regret very much that the district councillor is made the guardian, and not the guardian the district councillor. I regret very much the chairman of the district council is the magistrate, and not the chairman of the board of guardians. I would rather neither were magistrates, because I do not approve of ex officio magistrates, but that is not the question. If there were to be an ex officio magistrate I am for the magistrate being the guardian instead of the district councillor.

8987. Another of your suggestions, which I suppose would give extra power to the guardians, would be the extension of their powers in the direction you suggest later on in your memorandum; the power of acting without applying to the Local Government Board?—Yes, those are small matters which now cause unnecessary irritation, correspondence and delay.

8988. Do you think it would level the status of the guardians if their electorates were enlarged? In some cases at present they are drawn from very small wards, with very little public opinion in them?—In the rural parishes there is very little interest taken in it, and you generally find that the largest farmer in the parish, or something of that kind, is put in almost as a matter of course. You do not often get contests. You really seldom get contests in the purely rural unions.

8989. I suppose you would get better men to come forward if you used the larger areas, in towns at any rate?—That may be.

8990. Would it assist to level the status of guardians if it were more generally recognised that the guardians could do a great deal in the way of prevention of pauperism by co-operating with provident societies and charitable agencies and philanthropic agencies, do you think?—I think so, very much indeed. But of course you know how difficult it is to organise charities especially in country districts, and especially with church and chapel charities. That is where the crux comes in in the country parishes. It is very much the case, in a smaller degree, of the instance given by Louis Paulian in "Paris qui mendie," where a woman succeeded in getting her child baptised twenty-six times in one winter. The child was baptised fourteen times by the Catholics and twelve times by the Protestants, and she got a franc and a christening robe each time. She was twitted with doing it, and the answer she gave was "L'hiver a été si rude, Monsieur."

8991. It would come quite within the sphere of an inspector's work within the district to encourage the guardians to take that wider view of their work?—Quite so, but an inspector would have unfortunately very little opportunity of working that vein, I am afraid.

8992. It was the way it was worked in those unions you have mentioned very largely?—Yes; and when the Charity Organisation branch was founded in Portsmouth about three years ago, I had the honour of doing what little I could to encourage it. That has worked very satisfactorily in Portsmouth. They were good enough to ask me to go to their first meeting and some of their subsequent meetings, and I was very happy to attend.

8993. Inspectors can do a great deal in persuading guardians that their work does lie outside in that way, in preventing pauperism?—Yes, I think more in towns than in the country districts now.

Subscriptions by Guardians to Institutions and proposed extension of powers.

8994. Turning to some special points which you have raised: first with regard to the principle of charitable subscriptions, I think you said it was undesirable that the guardians should subscribe generally to the charities. What principle would you take as to subscribing?—If you have such institutions as a county hospital the subscription is a very legitimate one, because their area is the area of the unions contained in the county, and they undoubtedly take a good many cases the guardians of the rural districts, at all events, are not able to deal with, and which would have to be dealt with at the cost of the rates, if the hospitals did not take them. The county hospitals are doing a very great work from that point of view. They are extremely hampered for want of funds, but they do relieve the rates to a very considerable extent. Therefore I think it is right the guardians should subscribe towards them, and I think it is fair to the ratepayers that they should do so, because the ratepayers gain a very distinct advantage; and the same with cottage hospitals, although in a lesser degree. But when you come to subscriptions to philanthropic institutions, such as private homes for poor children, it appears to me that it is very difficult to justify the subsidising of private efforts at the cost of the rates. There have been a good many applications made to the Local Government Board at one time or another by private philanthropic efforts to get subscriptions of a general character, so much a year, towards their funds, and I do not think, so far as my knowledge goes, that the board have ever encouraged that; but where they have had schools which were sufficiently good to warrant the Local Government Board in certifying them, the board have certified those schools, and then guardians can pay for the children they send to those schools.

8995. You think that in revising their list of subscriptions the guardians ought to consider whether the ratepayers have had a quid pro quo?—I do certainly.

8996. I think at present the law only allows the guardians to subscribe to institutions and not to societies?—Yes, I think that clause might with great advantage be modified. There is a very excellent institution at Southampton, and I was very anxious that the guardians should subscribe to it. That is the Society for Distressed Sailors and Mariners; they do a very good work at Southampton indeed, and it can hardly be said they come within the terms of the section which authorises guardians to subscribe to institutions and hospitals, but the difficulty has been got over at Southampton by the guardians making a donation, not in the form of a subscription but in the form of a gift, which the board sanctioned under the power they have, I think under the Local Authorities Expenses Act. The board sanctioned it once, but very properly they will not sanction a recurring expenditure under the Local Authorities Expenses Act, so a subscription would not come under that.

8997. You think that an alteration might very well be made with regard to that?—I think so, when it is clear that the ratepayers get value for their money.

Possibility of training for Relieving Officers.

8998. Would it not be better, if there were a certain number of selected unions, really good unions where good work was being done in outdoor administration, where all relieving officers might be regularly trained?—I should hail something of that kind with the greatest satisfaction. I think it is quite possible, in the large towns, where relieving officers of standing and knowledge are doing their work well, that they should have assistant relieving officers in their districts, who, as assistant relieving officers, might be trained in the work and might be rendering them very valuable assistance, and they might eventually come on as full relieving officers in other places and be well qualified for the post. Anything of that kind would be practicable and, I think, very desirable.

The supervision of outrelief.

8999. Under the present system, are you in favour of a cross-visitor or a superintendent relieving officer?—I would rather that he did both; I think the cross-visitor is extremely important, but a superintendent relieving officer, as a rule, really does do the cross-visiting, I think.

9000. I think it has been suggested that, better than either of those, there might be the appointment of an inspector of relieving officers for a district. Do you think that would be really better than having a superintendent relieving officer for the union?—Whose officer would he be?

9001. Apparently he would be the officer of the inspector of the district?—Then he would be appointed by the Local Government Board.

Need for assistants to Inspectors.

9002. Appointed by the Local Government Board, and a man of somewhat higher social status?—That is quite a new point to me. I would rather think that over before giving a definite answer. I should think it has possibilities in it which might work very well. I think it would be a very good thing if the general inspectors in the districts had assistance in their work. I very often regret extremely that I am obliged to, I will not say waste, but devote two or three days to going to outlying parts of my district to one little union, when my time might be much more advantageously spent in other work which is pressing me.

9003. Have you no assistant at all?—No.

9004. You have a clerk, I suppose?—I have my clerk, but he only does the clerical work.

Question of detention of consumptive paupers.

9005. With regard to the powers of admission and detention, especially with regard to very poor and ignorant persons, diseased persons who are suffering from such a disease as consumption, which is communicable, you spoke of extending it to one or two other diseases to which it does not apply now Would you extend so as to cover consumptive persons who are quite ignorant of the means of spreading the disease, and are practically destitute, the power of detaining them in the workhouse when you have them there, or compelling them to come in when they are outside?—That would depend on whether you had the requisite accommodation for the purpose.

9006. I am assuming that?—In most of the county workhouses they do not have the accommodation. Of course, to a great extent, it is a medical question which I am quite incompetent to answer, but my own idea of the treatment of consumption, speaking merely as a layman, is that it is extremely unwise to aggregate cases. Personally, I do not at all approve of the sanatorium as the best means of dealing with consumption. I think that directly you aggregate them you may get an aggravation of the mischief. It is better, as far as possible, that they should be dealt with as isolated cases, and collected together. That is a medical question on which I dare say my opinion is worth very little.

Mr. Baldwyn Fleming.

9 April, 1906.

Comparison of ad hoc and ex officio Guardians.

9007. (Mrs. Webb.) Have you noticed any difference in the character of the men who are rural guardians and, therefore, rural district councillors, and the character of those who are ad hoc guardians and not rural district councillors ?—I do not know that one can draw much distinction between the classes. The only thing is, that among the guardians who represent the towns you more often find lady guardians—for whom I am always grateful. There seems to be an idea, which may have some grounds for it, that, although a lady makes a most excellent guardian, she does not know much about road-making and that kind of business, and, therefore, is not an equally good district councillor. Consequently, as the person who is elected a district councillor is ex officio guardian, ladies get ousted in favour of men, because men know more of district council work than ladies do. In the towns they are elected merely for the guardianship, and then ladies get in more frequently than in the country districts.

9008. Apart from the women, would you say that amongst the men on the whole those guardians who are also district councillors are better administrators than those who are elected ad hoc ?—I do not think so.

Comparison of Rural and Urban Poor Law administration.

9009. Do you think that on the whole the rural boards of guardians are better administered than the town boards ?—No.

9010. Would you say they are worse administered ? —No. I do not think you can answer the question generally ; some towns administer admirably, and some towns administer very badly.

9011. Then you do not see really any practical difference between the two ?—I do not think so. When I was up in the north, Bradford was administered excellently and Leeds was administered very badly ; and they are two towns within ten miles of each other.

Value of ex officio Guardians.

9012. Are there any conditions which you could suggest to us which tend to produce a good type of guardian or a bad type of guardian ?—I do not think so, as guardians are at present elected or brought into office. Of course I should like to see the ex officio guardians brought back.

9013. You think they were a good influence on the whole ?—Certainly they were. They were an educated influence, they were a class with a certain amount of leisure ; they were people with a position in the county ; and they knew a great deal, because many of them were landlords and knew intimately the people on their own estates.

9014. Do you remember that in the first years of the Poor Law Commission, 1835, 1836, 1837 and 1838, the assistant commissioners were dead against the ex officio element—the justice of the peace ? For instance Sir Francis Head always said it was a curse to a board of guardians if they had ex officio guardians sitting with them ? —That was before I had anything to do with the Poor Law, and, perhaps the position had somewhat modified before I had the honour of receiving my appointment under the board. I agree with most things that Sir Francis Head said, but I should not agree on that point.

9015. You think the justices were a very valuable element, you do ?—I do certainly, but not because they were justices. They were appointed because they were justices as it was a convenient way of getting the country gentlemen in. I think the country gentlemen formed a most valuable element in the boards of guardians. I know that it was said that they never came unless a bit of jobbery was to be done or an appointment was to be made to some place into which they wanted to put somebody or other. In some places that was so, but in many others it was not true, for they attended regularly and well.

Effect of Local Government Act, 1894, on character of Boards of Guardians.

9016. As regards he character of boards of guardians, you are distinctly under the impression that it has deteriorated since 1894 ?—I think so, clearly ; but I should not like my boards of guardians perhaps to know that my opinion is that they are not so good as the boards of guardians used to be who preceded them. Still I think most certainly that the removal of all qualification was a very great pity.

9017. It was suggested to us by Mr. Davy that though the guardians after the Act of 1894 began by being rather reckless and extravagant, yet with experience they have turned out to be as good guardians as the guardians were before them ; is that not your view ?—That may be so as regards the elected guardians, nevertheless, I regret the non-elected element, and I do not think the power of co-option, which exists to a very limited extent—only two or three guardians in each union—by any means makes up for the removal of the ex officio guardian.

9018. Is that power of co-option exercised ?—In a great many unions it is. It is especially exercised with regard to lady guardians, I think.

Lady Guardians.

9019. With regard to lady guardians, do you think that on the whole you get a better stamp of women co-opted than elected ?—I have very few elected lady guardians, indeed I have very few lady guardians in my district at all, I am sorry to say. That is a difficult question to answer, and I am afraid I hardly know who were elected and who were co-opted. I know one or two very good ones who were co-opted.

Possibility prescribing qualificati and trainir for Relievi Officers.

9020. Now with regard to the relieving officers, I gather that, on the whole, you would be in favour of some sort of qualification ?—Certainly, if it would be practicable to get it.

9021. As you know, within recent years there has been a qualification for sanitary inspectors ?—Yes, but that is a very different type of work. That is definite work, and a relieving officer's work is not definite. For a relieving officer you want not only a man of good personal character, but you want a man of great sympathy and at the same time great firmness, you want a man who can be very gentle and at the same time very strong, you want a man who has the fullest sympathy with distress and at the same time who is determined to protect the ratepayers from fraud—a man who will find out imposition on the one hand and be very stern with it, and who, on the other hand, will be most sympathetic with real suffering.

9022. Could not you have a system, somewhat similar to that for pupil teachers say, by which a person would have to be an assistant to a relieving officer plus obtaining knowledge of a certain amount of theory and facts ?—I think it is quite possible that you might train your relieving officers by making them first of all assistants of relieving officers ; but then you would have to find your good relieving officers to make them assistants too.

9023. In many professions nowadays you have what is practicaly an apprenticeship insisted on ; as regards solicitors or nurses, for instance. Would it not be possible to apply that system of apprenticeship to the relieving officers ?—I am not prepared to say whether it would be possible or not, but I am afraid it would be very difficult, because I do not think there are the means available now. You might find a few very good relieving officers in the big towns who would be fitted to train assistants to take independent positions afterwards ; but the large majority of the country relieving officers, although they do their work with most admirable devotion and with great self-sacrifice in many instances, are not, I am afraid, the class of men who are well qualified to train assistants to be what I should like relieving officers to be.

9024. Would it not be worth while, at any rate in order to prevent jobbery, to have either an age limit or a certain modicum of knowledge to be tested by examination ?—That would be most desirable, if it could be done. The age limit could be obtained.

9025. You could have a certain modicum of knowledge tested by examination ; that is to say, it would not be necessary to make the examination very high. At present there is an absence of any kind of examination ? —I do not know that I should attach much weight to such an examination as appears to be in your mind.

9026. I am thinking of the sort of examination that you have for a sanitary inspector or a factory inspector ? —I do not think the two things are to be compared. You want the sanitary inspector to do certain definite work, but the relieving officer has not definite work. You cannot define a relieving officer's work. True, the regulations in the Consolidated Order lay down the duties of relieving officers, but then you may have a man who will carry out these regulations to the letter, and yet he may be absolutely incompetent.

9027. But you are less likely to get a hopelessly incompetent man if you have some sort of examination test, are you not?—Certainly, any test has a certain advantage.

9028. The factory inspectors pass through a certain examination as to the factory law, do they not?—Yes; but that again is a different class of work. An inspector of factories and an inspector of nuisances, and other work of that kind—take, say, the sanitary inspectors generally—have certain definite duties to perform, for the performance of which you can ascertain their competency to a great extent by examination; but with regard to relieving officers, you cannot do that.

9029. A relieving officer ought to know a certain amount of Poor Law, at any rate?—He ought to know what he can do, and what he cannot do; but further than that, I think it depends very much more upon the personal character and competency of the man than upon any knowledge of the law.

Question of putting Workhouse fire-escapes under jurisdiction of County Councils.

9030. With regard to the fire escapes at workhouses would it not be possible to put them under the county council, as are the fire escapes in factories and workshops and other buildings?—I would much rather not bring the county authority into the workhouses at all.

9031. Why?—Because I want the guardians to do everything. I think the guardians are by far the most important local authority there is in existence. I regard the guardians as infinitely more important than the county council in the effect of their work upon the people.

9032. But they cannot inspect their own work? You could not leave it to the guardians to inspect the fire escapes at their own workhouses, could you?—No; but I think the inspection of the Local Government Board would be quite sufficient, if the board only had practical power to compel these things to be done. If I could go to a workhouse and say to the guardians, "If you do not do this, the Local Government Board will do it and make you pay"; that would be quite sufficient power to get the thing done. It would be just the same as regards the appointment of dentists, and other details of that kind.

Power of Local Government Board to deal with insufficient expenditure on Poor Relief byGuardians.

9033. As regards the provision of adequate workhouse accommodation, so far as we have had evidence, it seems to be a very serious drawback to the powers of the Local Government Board that whereas you can surcharge expenditure in excess, you can do nothing to prevent an absence of expenditure?—That is so.

9034. An absence of expenditure may lead, as it does, to the absence of provision in a workhouse, and, therefore, to positive extravagance?—Very likely.

9035. What do you suggest as an analogue to the power of surcharge which you have as regards too much expenditure, so that you could deal with the absence of expenditure?—I should like the Local Government Board to have the power to direct a thing to be done, and then if it were not done, to have power to do it and to charge it to the locality. Supposing I found that there are not nurses enough, I should like very much to have simply to recommend it to the board, and then for the board to write down to the guardians saying, "We think there ought to be another nurse appointed, and you must appoint one." It is perfectly true, I suppose, to say that the board could do it now by Order; but supposing the guardians did not comply with the Order, then their only means of enforcing the Order is by mandamus.

9036. And that is practically impossible, you say?—Yes, for ordinary purposes.

Circulation to ratepayers of reports on local Poor Law administration.

9037. Do you think there would be any advantage if, in a case of bad administration, it were the custom for the auditor or for the inspector to prepare a careful report on the administration of the guardians and to circulate that to every ratepayer?—I think it would be a very difficult position to put an inspector into. I think you would do more harm than good by that, for probably if he said of a board of guardians that he found fault with them, that would go against him with them, and thereby would injure his influence. We cannot drive—we have not the power to drive; and so we must persuade.

9038. You might give it to an inspector who was not the inspector for the district; I mean to say, it would not be necessary to involve the inspector of the district in it? Then that would be bringing in somebody else over the head of the inspector of the district, and nothing would impair his influence more than that would.

9039. You have occasionally made special inquiries, but generally I assume the reports of those inquiries are not circulated to the ratepayers?—No; and I think it is very undesirable that they should be.

9040. You think it would be undesirable?—Yes, I do. I think if you knew that your reports on inquiries were going to be published, you would have to leave out very much. You would practically have to edit them for publication.

9041. But you could write two reports: one confidential for the office, and one for the ratepayers?—Yes, you could; and the one for the ratepayers would be very valueless, I think. It would have all the heart taken out of it.

Effect of casual employment and failure to use Workhouse Test.

9042. As regards the pauperism of Southampton, I gather that you attribute it largely to the irregular employment there?—I attribute the excessive pauperism in Southampton to the fact that they cannot apply the workhouse test.

9043. But there are other places where they cannot apply the workhouse test, are there not?—Southampton and South Stoneham are the only two in my district, at the present moment.

9044. You have mentioned the fact that owing to the irregular employment, you get a thriftlessness on the part of the people?—Yes; I am afraid you do find that in all casual dock labour.

9045. If persons are kept working night and day, as you suggest, and then have a time of complete unemployment, that develops the kind of character which is thriftless, does it not?—Yes; and then, you see, at Southampton things actually accommodate themselves to that style of character. If the guardians had ample workhouse accommodation, and these people applied, they could then say, "Very well, we will give you an order for the workhouse." These people would then have to go in through the receiving ward, they would have to be bathed, they would have their clothes taken from them, and they would be passed into their proper classification in the workhouse, where they would have to remain until they gave their notice to discharge themselves; then they would have to remain twelve hours, and if it happened two or three times in the month, they might have to remain up to seventy-two hours after they gave their notice of discharge. That would be a very different style of thing to simply going, as they now do, into the vagrant ward for a night, whenever they feel inclined for it, and getting enough bread and cheese and water to keep them going. Of course Southampton is immensely handicapped in its administration, and it is not fair to blame Southampton for these bad statistical results, simply for that reason.

Position of Southampton Guardians under their Local Act and its connection with the rate of pauperism.

9046. Because it has not got workhouse accommodation?—Yes. We cannot control the situation. You see, we were beaten by a Parliamentary Committee last year, when the Local Government Board actually issued a Provisional Order to repeal the local Act.

9047. It is the effect of a local Act then, is it?—Yes.

9048. Would you explain that, as I did not know of it?—The Southampton Incorporation, as it is called—it is not a union, it is an incorporation—is under a local Act. That local Act was passed in the time of George III., something over 100 years ago. It has been modified to a very great extent since, but still under that local Act the property is in the hands of the guardians under the Act. The Local Government Board could, no doubt, dissolve the board of guardians under the local Act, and they could create a new board of guardians and could annex parishes to the union they thus formed; but they could not repeal the local Act, and consequently the property would remain in the hands of the authorities under the local Act, and, although the Local Government Board could constitute a new board of guardians, they could not transfer to them the property of the present board of guardians.

9049. But the new board of guardians could build a new workhouse out of the rates?—Yes; but it is all there, and it would be absurd for you to put upon the locality a new expenditure when you have got it all there. It is complicated further by the fact that a charity is also in question under the Local Act and would have to be dealt with. It would be rather a long story if I were to go into the whole history of it, and I do not know that I can tell you more than I have done. There are certain areas within the added area under the corporation which are not in the Poor Law area, and when the Local Government Board endeavoured last year to get the local Act repealed, these outside parishes had a locus standi to oppose it in Parliament. They did oppose it, and the Parliamentary Committee refused to confirm the Provisional Order of the Local Government Board, without putting in a clause which the board were unable to accept. The Parliamentary Committee wished to insert a clause which would have practically overridden the statutory powers of the Local Government Board; the Local Government Board could not accept that, and so it fell through, and the matter remains in statu quo.

9050. What did the Parliamentary Committee want to do ?—They wanted to put in a clause that the board should not act without giving these outside parishes the opportunity of being heard before Parliament.

9051. Then practically the Southampton Guardians cannot improve their workhouse ?—They will have to provide further accommodation. The poor rate is 3s. in the £. and it is very much higher than in any other union in my district. They endeavoured to increase their rating power by raising the rate on the docks. That was appealed against, and the Southampton Board were defeated, and had to pay very heavy expenses in addition to losing their increase of rateable value. They are practically at the end of their tether; there can be no further building as the whole area is built over, and the better class is going outside that area to live, and is leaving the poor behind.

9052. What would you suggest ? Would you suggest an equalisation of the rates ?—No. Later on, no doubt the areas will have to be dealt with, but for the moment there is a deadlock, and that is the reason of the excessive rate of pauperism and cost in Southampton. The excessive rate really does not depend on the casual labour question, so much as on the inability to apply the proper tests.

The deterrence of Medical Relief.

9053. I see you attach great importance to the old poor law theory that the position of dependents on the rates should be less advantageous than the position of the independent labourer ?—Certainly.

9054. But you do not apply that to the sick, do you ?—Yes.

9056. Therefore you do not apply that principle of the Poor Law Commissioners of 1834 that the condition of the pauper should be worse than that of the outside independent labourer ?—Pardon me, I do; because the sick only get properly cared for in the institution.

9057. Then you do not apply the principle to anyone in the workhouse ?—Certainly I do; the mere fact of giving up their liberty is in itself a restriction.

9058. Then is it only with regard to outdoor relief that you apply it ?—I apply it as regards outdoor relief and as regards indoor relief. I think a sick person in a workhouse, however good it may be, is in an inferior position to a sick person who can get what he wants outside the workhouse and who remains his own master.

9059. Surely that is not so, because the sick person comes in on his own volition to a state of things which is better ? —But they do not come in on their own volition; they only come in when the guardians given them an order, that is, when they cannot provide what they want outside.

9060. The guardians give them an order, whenever it is to their advantage to come into the house ?—Only when they are destitute.

9061. But they do get first-rate nursing, then ?—Certainly, but only as destitute people.

9062. Still a destitute person coming into an infirmary gets better provision made for him than the ordinary independent labourer outside the infirmary can provide for himself ?—That is a necessity of the situation.

9063. I quite agree ?—But then he has to sacrifice his liberty, and he has to sacrifice his control over his own movements and his own actions. He is in a totally different position from the independent person who can do what he likes outside.

9064. Surely the question of liberty—apart from mere words—does not apply to sick people, because sick people cannot get out of their beds ?—The large majority of sick people are not bed-ridden; it is a small proportion of the sick who are bed-ridden, and even they in their own homes can have friends and see them whenver they like; they can send for what they want and get what they want, they can gossip, they can be amused, they can have all sorts of home love and home attentions and home attractions, which it is impossible to give in a public institution.

9065. Do you not think that the mere fact that people are making more and more use of these infirmaries rather shows that they do not consider this absence of liberty of much importance when they are sick ?—No, I do not think so at all.

9066. You still think they feel the restriction ?—Yes, I do certainly. They know that they are paupers, and I think the fact that they are paupers is in itself, I may say, a great disgrace and a great disgrace which is very much felt.

9067. Then you do not think there is any practical danger in our improving the accommodation for the sick every year, and making it more and more superior; you do not think that by that means we may not all come to use the infirmaries more or less ?—Not the least danger in the world, if it is kept within reasonable limits. Of course it may be overdone.

9068. If the accommodation is always to be such that you are cured in the shortest possible time what else can you desire ?—You might have all sorts of extravagant appliances and extravagant feeding and extravagant odds and ends, which I should deprecate very much.

9069. Surely when you are sick the only feeding that is of any good for you is the best conceivable diet for the complaint, and that you would advocate ?—Certainly; but that is very different from extravagance.

9070. Extravagance might be bad for you ?—For instance, you might get a most excellent nutritive jelly which answers all sorts of purposes as regards the patients, but which is totally different from the jelly which would be sent up to you in your own house and made by your own skilled cook.

9071. If it were made by your own skilled cook it would probably not be so good ?—It ought to be; at any rate it may be perfectly good, and yet a very different thing from a jelly which is turned out in a workhouse infirmary, but the matter is one of principle rather than of such details as this.

9072. To go from the question of the sick to that of the children, would you also say that the pauper child should be less well-off than the child of the independent labourer ? —That is a more difficult question to answer. The child stands per se. Where he has parents the question is how the position affects them. I do not think that you can apply the principle that the child in a poor law establishment shall be less well-off than the child of the lowest type of independent labourer. A child in any poor law establishment is from many points of view worse off than a child in his own home. To begin with, he is not at home, and nothing can make up to a child for the absence of home. With all that you can do, you can never give a child anything like the home which God gives him in his own family.

The deterrence of rel to children

9073. Of course God may give him a horribly bad home ?—Yes, and then we get him and do the best we can for him; but it is not like a good home, anyhow.

9074. Sometimes you do not get him ?—That is true.

9075. On the whole, then, you would advocate that the child in a poor law establishment should have conditions which would result in better health and better capacity than the child of the lowest independent labourer. Certainly better than the child of the lowest class of labourer. Notwithstanding all that may be said to the contrary about unwholesome conditions of life your ordinary country child is an extremely healthy child and has a good time. He is harassed by school, and every child has to be harassed by school and has to bear the inconvenience of having to go to school. Still, I think your country village child as a rule has a very good time. You get exceptions, no doubt; you get drunken parents and you get immoral parents who behave badly to their child; still I think the average country village child in England is a very happy child and has a very happy childhood.

9076. Do you think that the guardian who objected to your refinement about having a dentist to look after the children, had nothing to say for himself from the point of view of the theory that the child's position should be worse than that of an independent labourer's child?—Absolutely nothing; because if you have got a child in your care you are bound to do what is reasonably right for him, and it is only of late years that the value of attention to the teeth has been recognised. You know now that if a child has got bad teeth and he gets diphtheria or scarlet fever, he has not the same chance as a child who has got sound teeth. You know if he is a boy and you want to get him into the Service that if he has bad teeth you cannot get him into the Service. You know that he ought to grow up with a wholesome digestion, but that if he has bad teeth he cannot do it, although with sound teeth he will do it.

Dental attendance for Poor Law children.

9077. Therefore a child with sound teeth, who has had all this dentistry, is more likely to get on in the world?—Yes, and I think that parents outside are learning that their children must have their teeth attended to and are doing it.

9078. You would not suggest that the mass of working class parents do really see that their children's teeth are attended to, would you?—I really think they are doing it.

9079. (Miss Hill.) I think they are doing so, too?—I think they are attending to their children's teeth very much since it has been brought home to them—that is since school life has been better organised, and since school teachers themselves are more interested in the condition of each individual child. I think a great deal is being done in the way of dentistry among the poorer classes now. If they think their children's teeth ought to be attended to, the poor people see to it, and I cannot understand why the guardians should not do it.

9080. (Mrs. Webb.) I quite agree. Do you suggest that the school has increased the responsibility of the parent by drawing his attention to such things as teeth?—Yes; but I do not know for certain who has done it 9081. You spoke of the teachers?—I think it is the teachers. In the village schools now the teachers take a great deal more individual interest in the particular children than they did twenty years ago or twenty-five years ago.

9082. Then you have got the responsibility of the parent positively increased by the child going to school?—I think that the parents are very much taught what they ought to do now by what the children go home and tell them the teacher has told them, and by means of that kind, which they used not to know in days gone by.

The deterrence of child-relief.

9083. (Mr. Nunn.) I think the principle which Mrs. Webb was alluding to was intended to apply to the independent labourer, and not to the independent labourer's involuntary dependants, such as his children. You cannot be said to be giving a more eligible lot to the dependent labourer when that lot is given to his involuntary child, can you? (Mrs. Webb.) I should be glad to hear what you think of this?—I am afraid I hardly followed the point?

9084. (Mr. Nunn). It is said that the lot of the dependent labourer must be more ineligible than that of the independent labourer?—Yes.

9085. That principle does not apply to a child involuntarily born into the world and rendered an orphan?—No; I think you are right. I think you must draw a distinction always as to the children. You cannot compare a child who is sent into the workhouse for treatment with a child in his own home outside. You cannot take an average of the outside homes. Some homes are very good, and the children are very happy, with all the love that their parents can give them, and all the self-sacrifice of a lifetime in order to provide for them afterwards. But then some homes are hopelessly bad. You cannot draw an average between the bad home and the very good home, and say that shall be our standard for the workhouse. You have got your children, and you have to do the very best you possibly can by them.

9086. (Mrs. Webb.) As a matter of fact, you would altogether neglect to consider, would you not, what was the standard of the outside home, and you would do your very best?—You must, with regard to the children; but at the same time I do not think you thereby abandon the principle that the condition of the dependent child is to be less eligible than the condition of the independent child. I think that with the very best you can do for the children you may have in an institution, no matter how you deal with them, whether you board them out or send them to scattered homes or to school or anywhere you like, they still are not in the same position as a child in his natural home, if that home is a good one—and nothing can put them in that position, in fact nothing can give a child home love except the love he gets at home; you cannot provide that artificially.

Effect of new machinery upon employment.

9087. With regard to the ousting of old men from employment, do you think the general speeding-up of industry, the use of more complicated machinery, and the running of all that machinery at a greater rate ousts old men?—Undoubtedly.

9088. In exactly the same way as factory legislation?—Quite so.

9089. Would you be against the speeding-up of machinery because it ousts old men?—Certainly not.

Relief of Lancashire Cotton Famine.

9090. Then you would not be against factory legislation?—No, certainly not, so far as I understand it. I happened to be in Lancashire shortly after the cotton famine—I was in Lancashire in 1868 or 1869. Arnold's "History of the Cotton Famine" does not come down to that time; I think it ceased in 1864; but it tells the story very well so far as it goes. When I was first in Lancashire as an assistant Poor Law inspector, the results of the cotton famine had practically asserted themselves. I was very much struck, young and inexperienced as I was in administration in those days, with the great demoralisation which the relief of the cotton famine had brought about. The artisan then learnt, for the first time on a large scale, that he could live without work. I believed that the relief could have been conducted on much wiser lines and that if it had been left to the Poor Law, instead of extraneous influences having been brought in, that in the long run the result would have been better for the people. But at all events the funds for the relief of the cotton famine, like the great funds that have been in much more recent times raised in London, did produce an enormous amount of demoralisation, although they may have done a good deal to relieve the necessities of the moment.

Effect of machinery, factory legislation, etc., on employment and pauperism.

9091. With regard to Lancashire, you think that with the speeding-up of the machinery, with factory legislation, and with trade unionism—which I gathered you thought had the same tendency—the old men are being ousted?—Yes.

9092. One would have thought if that were so, that pauperism would have risen, but as a matter of fact pauperism is lower in Lancashire than anywhere else, is it not?—That is so.

9093. So that all those influences which are supposed to oust the old men from employment, including the Workmen's Compensation Act, have, as a matter of fact, not led to an increase of pauperism in Lancashire?—No; probably because they have led to such a considerable increase of income that a man's relations are enabled to prevent his becoming a pauper.

9094. It might be very short-sighted to stop the process of increased efficiency in industry?—It would be absolutely fatal ; besides, nothing can do it. If you were to try to do it, you could not do it in the long run.

Trades Unions and the employment of old men.

9095. Therefore if trade unionism can be proved in Lancashire to increase the efficiency of the machinery, you would not object to the partial ousting of the old men ?—I do not say that at all. I do not object to trade unionism. Trade unionism has done most marvellous work, as we all know who have studied the question at all, but I do not approve of some of its methods.

9096. What in trade union rules leads you to suppose that they discourage the membership of old men ?—I am not a sufficient expert in trade unionism to answer. I have never been able to give sufficient study to pretend to be an expert in matters of trade unionism. But my impression at all events is that the trade unions do not care to have a man who has passed his best. I think it stands to reason that it must be so, because they insist upon every man who works under their rules getting the full standard rate of wages ; and when a man has passed his best, he is not worth that. Employers who have to pay the full standard rate of wages refuse to employ a man who is not thoroughly competent, because the man must not work at less than the standard rate.

9097. Probably you know that in all trade unions in which the operatives are paid by time they do make special allowances for old men and permit them to work at lower rates ?—Yes ; to a certain extent that might affect the question, but I think that what I have said holds good generally, that is, that unless a man is at his best, he is not much good in a trade union.

9098. The trade unions never oust their old members, do they ?—Not nominally.

9099. Never practically, either ?—They may not oust them. Perhaps the word "oust" does not best convey my meaning when I say that an old man who is in a trade union does not at all events hold as good a position as an able-bodied man who is in a trade union.

9100. You say you have not studied the question ?—Not sufficiently to be able to speak as an expert.

9101. Are you aware that the majority of the skilled trades which are organised insist on piece-work rates, and therefore the old man gets what he makes—cotton operatives, for instance, would strike against a time-work rate ?—I am afraid I cannot follow you into these details ; I do not know them well enough.

Out-relief prejudicial to Friendly Societies.

9102. (Mr. Bentham.) In paragraph 6 of your memorandum you point out that the facilities which obtain to-day are far more likely to enable a person to provide for his old age than has been the case in the past, and you say that we are living now through a stratum, as it were, of old age which you hope when it dies out will materially diminish the amount of pauperism ?—Yes.

9103. A little lower down you say, "that the proper solution of the old-age pensions question is by means, or adaptation, of the friendly societies, would appear to be certain, and the societies are themselves making provision to that end ; but here the competition of outdoor relief comes in with a most mischievous influence." Are we to gather from that, that outdoor relief is really preventing people from exercising those facilities which they have power to do to-day ?—Undoubtedly, it is wonderful to me is that friendly societies hold their own at all. I think nothing is a greater proof of the independence of the character of the English people than that friendly societies are able to hold their own in face of the competition of outdoor relief.

9104. Do you refer to an unwise administration of outdoor relief ?—Certainly. I think all outdoor relief is unwise, if it is possible to avoid it.

9105. Then you are not of opinion that it is possible to avoid it all ?—It is possible to avoid very nearly all. There are certain cases which you cannot move into the workhouse. When I knew the Bradford union many years ago, they gave very little out-relief, and it was a most striking contrast to Leeds. When I was in that district, I used to wonder how in two towns within ten miles of each other you had such a contrast.

9106. You do not know it to-day, do you ?—No.

9107. I think you would find the contrast is greater than ever ?—I am speaking of thirty years ago. If the Commission will allow me for a minute, I would like to refer to one incident that happened at Leeds, as rather bearing out what I say. At that time in Bradford the children never thought of endeavouring not to support their parents ; they did it as a matter of course, because they knew if they did not, that the guardians would insist upon its being done, and I very seldom at the Bradford Board of Guardians in those days saw the question raised. The children who could support their parents did so as a matter of course, and the parents did not apply to the guardians ; and vice versa the parents supported their children when they could. In Leeds it was the exact opposite. No child supported his pauper parents in Leeds unless the guardians made him ; and they all shirked it if they could. When I first went to Leeds, I could not understand the administration of relief. The guardians administered relief in their own wards, and I thought there was very great abuse. I attended the board of guardians several times in order to see and satisfy myself what was going on, and at last I made this suggestion to the board of guardians—I said, "Your relief appears to me to be administered in a very unsatisfactory manner ; I wish you would make a rule that no guardian should sit to administer relief in his own ward." The guardians were furious. They said they had never heard such an insinuation, and "the idea of public officials coming down to talk to them in that fashion," and all the rest of it. I attended several more meetings and at last I said, "Well, you may be right or I may be right, but if I am wrong, why are you afraid of testing it ? Make it a rule that no guardian shall sit in his own ward for three months and see what that leads you to." They consented that they would make the experiment for three months. The very first week there was a saving of £70—they began to save at the rate of over £3,000 a year. At the end of the three months' experiment, I went to the board again and attended their meeting. I showed them the facts, and they said, "Yes, we admit it, but it has been at the cost of extreme hardship to the poor ; this money has been saved, but it is the savings from intense suffering." I said, "Very well, if that be true that completely upsets my argument, but that ought to be tested, that ought not to be accepted merely as a statement. Now will you make inquiries ?" "Yes," they said, "we will make inquiries." Inquiries were made in Leeds from everybody who was in a position to give information. The clergy were sent to, the magistrates were sent to, the district visitors were sent to, employers of labour were sent to—everybody that they could think of who really was in a position to give information. The answers were almost unanimous that not only had there been no suffering, but that the people had never been so well off—that they were much better off under the diminished amount of outdoor relief than when the outdoor relief was given in the lavish manner in which it had been given, and that many who had depended on the rates, so long as they could get the out-door relief, had gone to work when they found they could not get the outdoor relief. That was a most striking instance. I do not say these committees did not give the relief honestly when it was given in their own wards, but they certainly did not give it impartially. When they had to deal with people they did not know personally the relief was given impartially and that was the result.

Parental responsibility at Leeds and Bradford.

Reduction of out-relief by improved administration at Leeds and result to poor.

9108. (Mr. Nunn.) That is a most interesting experience ; is it embodied in any document that could be put in ?—There were some references made to the fact in one of the reports of the Local Government Board, but I do not think it ever came out in the annual reports of the Local Government Board.

9109. Is it not in one of your annual reports ?—No, because at that time the inspectors did not make annual reports. That was about 1873 or 1874.

9110. (Mrs. Webb.) I think Mr. Davy mentioned it to us ?—I daresay several of my colleagues have mentioned it. It was a well known incident at the time, and it was referred to in more than one printed report, but I do not think it was ever mentioned in the official reports of the Local Government Board.

9111. (Mr. Bentham.) Do you think the tendency, in consequence of the manner in which the Poor Law is administered, is towards people not exercising such thrift as they have power to do at the present time?—Just contrast two men: A man becomes a member of a friendly society and he has to pay so much a week; when he comes upon his society, he gets his medical attendance and he gets an allowance of so much a week, and everything else he has to provide for himself. Another man who goes to the board of guardians pays nothing, but he says, "I am destitute," or, "I am sick and I want you to provide for me." The guardians say, "This is a sick person who comes here, and we will not be very liberal with him, but we will give him perhaps 5s. or 6s. a week, and the doctor." For that, he has got to pay nothing, and in addition he gets, through the doctor's recommendation all the extras he wants: wine and beef, no matter what it may be. The marvel is to me that people do join the friendly societies. But when you go back to that question of the independence of the people, it is a most important fact; it is the keystone of the whole structure really. The independence of the people is there, and if it is not discouraged, it will come to the front. I know of many instances, and striking instances too, in my own district. At Warminster in 1898 a gentleman called upon the Chairman and said, "I have come to tell you my name is so-and-so (I do not know the name, the name was kept from me)—when I was a boy I and my family were in the Warminster workhouse; I emigrated to Australia, where I have been very successful; I estimate that we cost the ratepayers £136, and I have brought you the money.' The Chairman said, "We cannot have any possible claim against you, the claim has lapsed long since, and even if it had happened recently we could only claim for twelve months." He said, "It is not that which is influencing me in the least; my family and I were brought up by you in the workhouse; we are most grateful for what was done for us and I should never die happy if I felt we had not, now that we are able, repaid the guardians every farthing that we had cost the union"—and he produced this large sum of £136 which he left with the Chairman, simply asking that his name should not be mentioned. He told the Chairman who he was, but he begged that his name should not be mentioned. A poor old washer-woman went into the Winchester workhouse sick, and she was there for some weeks. Then she went out and resumed her washing, and several months afterwards she sent the guardians a letter enclosing the repayment of what she estimated she had cost, £9. The guardians sent to her and said, "We do not want to take this from you; you are a very poor woman, you were worked hard all your life, you were fully entitled to what we have done for you, and we do not want to take it." She said, "I shall not be happy if you do not take it; I do not want to feel that I have been any charge whatever on the rates. The guardians had her letter framed and hung it up in the entrance hall of the workhouse, where you can see now the letter in which she originally sent back the money. I have know many other such cases. Quite recently a man anonymously sent the Ringwood Guardians 2s. in postage stamps, which he asserted he had cost them. You have that feeling among the people still, and it is that feeling which makes them take less advantage of the Poor Law than they could. There can be no question that outdoor relief is the most bitter opponent of thrift and independence.

Lavish out-relief prejudicial to thrift.

Instances of ex-paupers voluntarily repaying cost of their relief.

Effect of the elective principle on Boards of Guardians.

9112. In order to administer the Poor Law in a manner which would not have the effect of diminishing the thrift of the people, what kind of boards of guardians do you think is necessary? Can it be got through a popularly elected body?—Yes, you have had many boards of guardians in England who have done it. You have had the ones I have quoted—you have had Atcham, you have had Bradfield, you have Whitechapel, which is doing it to-day, you have got Fulham which is doing it to-day, and you have many boards of guardians in different parts of the country. They have all done it; every board of guardians that has interested itself in it, if it has only stuck to its principles, has done it.

9113. Are there many boards of guardians who are doing exactly the reverse?—Yes.

9114. And all formed by the same process of election?—Yes.

9115. What safeguard could you suggest that would give you a more uniform selection of members of boards of guardians?—I am afraid that no suggestion that I should be able to make would be likely to be adopted by Parliament.

9116. You really had faith in the ex officio guardians as being a steadying element on a board?—Yes. I have no doubt whatever, as I have said already, that if the Poor Law unions can be administered by a central department, you would have uniform administration, and within a comparatively few years you would get rid of pauperism in the country, or of all the pauperism that it is possible to get rid of, for you will always have a certain amount of incompetent people who will have to be provided for by the public.

Possible extent of eradication of pauperism by sound administration.

9117. And you think a board of experts would do that far better than an elective board?—I have no doubt they would.

9118. If county councils had the powers and duties which guardians have to-day, and if they could appoint small district committees for the present Poor Law areas, with powers to deal with all applications for relief, do you think they would be more likely to deal with it uniformly and in the interests of the community than is the case at present?—No. I would not put the Poor Law administration under the county councils so far as I am concerned upon any consideration. I think a board of guardians ad hoc is the only authority than can do it, and they ought to be made as important as possible.

County Councils as Poor Law Authorities.

9119. Are there many boards in your district which you consider come up to your ideal of what a Board ought to be?—No.

9120. Is there one?—I think I should say yes, but I would rather not name it. I should not like to compare one board of guardians against another. There are one or two of my boards that are very good indeed.

9121. As your ideas evidently point in the direction of the abolition of out-door relief altogether, do you think that indoor relief would become in that event quite as non-deterrent as outdoor relief is to-day?—Indoor relief would gradually cease to exist. If you once get rid of outdoor relief altogether, indoor relief will follow as a matter of course.

The irreducible minimum of pauperism.

9122. There are always a certain number of persons who are unfortunate or affected, and who must have recourse to the Poor Law unless they are dealt with by charity; these would always be in-door cases?—If you could get rid of the habit of pauperism, the large majority of sick cases would provide for their own necessities and would not require public relief at all. But you would always have a residuum of the incompetent who are naturally, congenitally, physically, or mentally weak, and they would have to be kept at the public expense, unless they had got friends and relatives who were able to maintain them; but except that very small residuum, my belief is that pauperism would gradually disappear altogether.

Deterrence of indoor-relief.

9123. It is said by two chairmen of boards in your district, I think, that in-door relief is no longer deterrent. If in-door relief is no longer deterrent, is it not possible that people might rely upon having a comfortable existence inside an institution, and consequently their ordinary walks of life would continue as they do at present?—You are taking an assumption with which I should not concur. I do not at all concur with the assumption that in-door relief is not deterrent, because I think in-door relief is deterrent.

9125. He probably would get much better food inside the workhouse than he would out?—I do not know about that. The workhouse dietary is a sufficient dietary, but the workhouse dietary for able-bodied men is not an excessive dietary.

9126. Is it not better than he could provide for himself if he were in receipt of out-door relief?—If he were in receipt of out-door relief, yes, certainly; but then I would not put him in receipt of out-door relief. The in-door dietary for the able-bodied man I take it is not as pleasant a dietary as the independent working man would provide for himself outside.

9127. Do you think that indoor relief naturally is more deterrent than out-door relief in any form?—Undoubtedly. The great advantage of in-door relief is that you know where you are. In the great majority of cases people do not accept in-door relief unless they are destitute. With regard to out-door relief, a large majority of them do not need it, and those that do need it, do not get enough to meet their necessities.

Local interpretation of Mr. Chaplin's Circular of 1900.

9128–30. In paragraph 13 you refer to the Circular of August 4th, 1900, and you give us the impression that it is "widely interpreted as applying to relief generally"; I suppose you took every opportunity of advising boards of guardians in what way you looked upon this Circular at the time it was issued?—Certainly I have spoken to guardians about that. Many boards of guardians took it as a change of policy on the part of the Local Government Board with regard to outdoor relief. They looked upon it as a general recommendation of outdoor relief as against indoor relief.

9131. How long would it take you to get round the whole of your boards by your method of advising them?—A year, I should think.

9132. Then a good deal of mischief could have happened in the course of that year?—I think a good deal of mischief did happen in the course of that year—mischief which no advice of mine would have prevented, I am sorry to say. At all events my advice would have had but a very limited effect upon them.

9133. You did not issue any circular of your own to the boards of guardians?—No, and I should have gone entirely outside my province if I had taken upon myself to do such a thing. The circular was from the Local Government Board.

9134. If you considered it was being wrongly interpreted and the boards of guardians were acting upon it in a spirit in which it was never intended to be acted upon, would you not look upon it as your duty to draw the attention of the guardians to that fact?—If I happened to be at a board when the question came up, certainly; and I did draw their attention to it on several occasions.

9135. That means that your influence was practically lost over the boards that were interpreting this in a wrong sense?—I would rather put it that my influence had not the opportunity of exercising itself?

9136. And I would rather put it that way, if you do not mind: that is the way in which I intended to put it. Do you think it possible under that circular to so classify the people that it would be a benefit to the Boards if they had taken it in the spirit in which it was intended?—So far as its application to the indoor poor went, the effect of it was rather to give a fillip to what I, and I suppose all my colleagues, had advised over and over again, that is, that the aged poor in the workhouses should be withdrawn from all surrounding circumstances which were unpleasant to them or caused them unhappiness. Classification was one means to the end. You do sometimes find, though not nearly so often as the public believe, that in the workhouses some of the old people are extremely unpleasant to the other old people, and make life a burden to them. Every now and then one comes across a case in which you have a very cranky, ill-conducted, foul-tongued old man or old woman who is unpleasant to the other people in the ward; but it does not often happen. Still there ought no doubt in every workhouse to be means of classifying the aged, so that if they want to be quiet they can have a nice, comfortable room to go to. That has been done in a great many of the workhouses to a certain extent, so far as the accommodation permits.

Classification in the Workhouse.

Adequate out-relief to aged and deserving Poor.

9137. With regard to the outdoor people, to whom I was referring more particularly, and the granting to the aged deserving poor who had led deserving lives, as the circular says, of an additional amount of relief (which you say is always small), you do not think that any harm came of that regulation where it was properly understood, do you?—No. But then, of course, if you are to do it for the aged and deserving poor, you have to arrive at what the aged and deserving poor are. I should be extremely sorry myself to have to classify the poor into the aged and deserving and the aged and undeserving. I do not know what your standard is to be. Personally, I was exceedingly glad that the old folk who had outdoor relief should have more liberal outdoor relief than had previously been given to them, so that I owed the circular no grudge upon that score. I have always been maintaining that the relief given to the aged in the large majority of cases is completely inadequate, and I only wish that guardians would render it adequate; I should be delighted if they would give the poor old people 8s., 9s., or 10s., and in some cases 11s. or 12s. per week. Nothing would so quickly bring home to them the advantage of indoor relief as against outdoor relief.

Effect of Mr. Chaplin Circular as regards adequate out-relief.

9138. The rise in the amount of relief to these aged deserving poor would naturally make the guardians more careful as to the persons to whom they would grant out-door relief, would it not?—I am afraid that has not been the effect. In fact, I think now that that circular as regards the out-door poor has ceased to produce any effect. I do not think to-day that the aged and deserving poor in the immense majority of cases receive 6d. more than they did before the circular was issued. For a time it did have a certain amount of effect; in the case of guardians who wished to give outdoor relief it has enabled them to turn to that circular as a recommendation in favour of outdoor relief; it has had some effect in that direction, an effect which I consider mischievous. With regard to the indoor relief, it has given a certain fillip to the improved classification of the aged indoor poor, and to that extent I am grateful for it.

9139. But you admit at first it had the effect of raising the amount that was given in outdoor relief all round?—I do not think it is so now; it has gone down again. For a time there was a little extra given, but I think you will find that the scale upon which guardians give relief to-day is practically the same as it was fifteen years ago.

Necessity for caution in abolition of out-relief.

9140. Then its effect is lost?—I think so. I should like to say one word more upon out-relief, if you will permit me. Although I should be extremely glad to see outdoor relief brought to the lowest possible proportions, I am sure it could not be done with a stroke of the pen or a wave of the wand; it must be done very gradually. I should be the last to abolish outdoor relief in any fashion which would cause hardship to the poor. It can be done gradually and should be done gradually, and with the fullest sympathy for the cases you have to deal with. I should be extremely sorry to let it go forth that I would issue any mandate that at a certain time all outdoor relief should be abolished. It can only be done by careful administration, which would bring it about really as the result of good work.

9141. I think you advocate the abolition of the Settlement laws altogether?—Yes.

Abolition of Settlement.

9142. I think you consider that all the Settlement laws should practically be swept away, but you do not refer to Scotland and Ireland, do you?—Personally I should, certainly.

9143. Would you abolish settlement with regard to both those countries?—Yes. That would get over the constantly contentious question of non-resident relief. non-resident relief is a most objectionable form of relief from my point of view.

Recoupment of Guardians travelling expenses within the Union.

9144. In paragraph 17 you mention several small matters which might be left to the discretion of boards of guardians; I notice you do not mention amongst those the payment of expenses for visiting institutions within the union; have you had any cause of complaint on that score?—Yes, constantly, and I should be very glad if those expenses were paid. The principle underlying it is this—that guardians should do their work within the union without payment; if they have to go outside the union, that introduces an argument for payment of their expenses, but within the union they ought to do their work free. As a matter of fact, I think the work does involve a considerable amount of hardship, and I should personally be very glad if guardians could be repaid their reasonable travelling expenses. I would not give them expenses for refreshment, but I would give them their travelling expenses; and I would not allow them to have refreshments at the workhouse on board days and that kind of thing at the cost of the rates; I think that would be opening a very wide door. Their actual out-of-pocket expenses for the performance of their duties I should be very glad to see paid, and as they would always be subject to the audit, if the auditor saw that it was being abused he would be able to put the check on it.

9145. Then you draw the line at reasonable refreshment?—I would not give them refreshments, because a man must have his refreshment; if he has it at home he has to pay for it, and if he has it whilst he is out, he has to pay for it. I would not pay for his refreshments; but I do think it is reasonable that he should have moderate travelling expenses.

Proposed discretion to Guardians to undertake small structural alteration.

9146. You have also left out of the paragraph that boards of guardians might be left to do small structural alterations under a certain amount in value; would you include that?—No, because there you bring in elements of danger. If once you allow that to be done, except under skilled supervision you may have drains interfered with, and then you may get into danger at once. I remember it being said to me once, It is a very hard thing that we cannot alter this bath without going to the Local Government Board for permission. That was perfectly true, but in altering the bath they would have to alter the communications by which the bath water was conveyed from the premises, and I am not sure if they had been allowed to do it in that particular case that they would not have sent the waste pipe straight into the drain.

9147. Do you think that matters of that kind should be left to inspectors rather than there having to be a correspondence with the Local Government Board?—I think the inspectors do save a great deal of correspondence. I think they possibly sometimes exceed their own authority a little bit when they see a thing being done which is evidently the right thing to be done.

9148. Would they allow a board to make a structural alteration without reporting it to the Local Government Board?—I would rather not answer that question. Strictly speaking, they ought not to.

Power of Guardians to subscribe to Institutions and its possible extension.

9149. With regard to subscriptions to hospitals or other institutions and associations which might render service to boards of guardians, can you apply a principle to those, so that one would be able to distinguish between those institutions which do really render a service to the boards of guardians and those which are merely doing work which indirectly might prevent pauperism?—I think the principle is that where you can show that the ratepayers get actual value for the contributions as in the case of county hospitals or local institutions in the district which grant benefits for the subscription conferred, then the subscription is quite justifiable; but when you come to subscriptions to a general establishment which covers the whole country, then different considerations apply.

9150. Take the case of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children; subscription to that society has been recently permitted by the Local Government Board I think?—Yes. I should certainly pay for that, because they do a direct good work, and in many instances they do it in immediate connection with boards of guardians. In many unions now, when children come into the vagrant ward, as a matter of practice the inspector of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children is communicated with, and he sees the children either when they leave the house, or he comes to the house and sees the children whilst they are there, and if he sees anything wrong he puts the society into operation.

9151. But the law can be put into operation without the society, can it not?—No doubt, but there you have an actual agent of the society to do the work, and so I think it is quite fair that the society should have the subscriptions.

9152. But it actually renders no assistance to the board, does it?—I think it renders a great assistance to the board. It is able to watch these children in a way in which the Guardians cannot do it. Directly a vagrant takes his discharge from the workhouse he is free from all supervision as far as the board of guardians is concerned, but the society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children can follow him up.

9153. As far as the board of guardians are concerned, they may never see either the vagrant or those children any more?—Nevertheless, if the children are in a bad state and require looking after, the society looks after them and prosecutes the parents if it is necessary.

9154. I take it that it is in the interests of the public, but that the service rendered to the board is very small and indirect?—I do not agree with you; I think it is doing a direct service to the ratepayers and to the guardians.

9155. Take the Charity Organisation Society, for instance; do you think that renders a service to the Poor Law by, to a certain extent by relieving people who might otherwise come upon the rates?—I think the Charity Organisation Society worked in connection with the boards of guardians renders inestimable service to the ratepayers.

9156. Do you think that would be a suitable agency to subscribe to?—I should certainly think so, so far as I am personally concerned.

9157. But it would be a very wide interpretation of the principle if Guardians were allowed to subscribe to any organisation that might have a tendency to induce the person it assisted not to become a pauper?—Yes; I should think then it would be indefensible, but the Charity Organisation Society does not induce persons to become paupers.

9158. (Mr. Nunn.) Might not Charity Organisation Committees point not only to individual cases which might be of that nature, but to some considerable number of such cases?—Possibly, but only as the appropriate relief to destitute persons. On the other hand, they prevent many from becoming destitute.

9159. (Mr. Bentham.) Would you agree to subscribe to any organisation of that kind?—I do not know what the practice of the board has been—whether they have sanctioned subscriptions to the Charity Organisation Society or not. I do not remember a case in my district in which the subscription has been sanctioned or asked for.

9160. (Sir Samuel Provis.) It does not come within the section, does it?—It could not be sanctioned under the section, certainly.

9161. (Mr. Bentham.) The point of my question is to see if we can draw a line between those organisations that you say do render a service to the community or to boards of guardians, and those that do not?—I am quite with you as to the need for drawing such a line.

9162. But it is very difficult to draw the line, is it not?—Yes, very. I think the test would be whether they really do give the ratepayers value for the subscription given. The power of granting a subscription is very strictly limited, but I forget the Act in which the section is.

9163. (Sir Samuel Provis.) I think it is the Poor Law Act of 1879, is it not?—Yes, I think it is. The subscriptions are only to be given to institutions or establishments which would come within the wording of the section, and I think the Charity Organisation Society would not, so far as I understand it (42 and 43 Vict. c. 54, § 10).

Nursing of out-door sick.

9164. (Mr. Bentham.) In your last annual report I think you advocate a system of nursing outdoor patients by nurses in the institution; do you hold to that view now?—I should be very glad it it could be done, but I do not know of any union in which it has been done. I have been preparing a return from all my unions as to the means by which they do the outdoor nursing. The return to me is a very painful one. There are a great many unions in which there is practically very little done, not because the guardians are not willing to do it, but because they have not the means of doing it. There are no nurses to do the out-nursing. I should be very glad if, where the circumstances are convenient, it were possible that the workhouse staff of nurses should be sufficient to enable some of them to do outdoor work. I think the influence would be good in many directions. It would relieve the monotony of the workhouse work, it would increase the experience of the nurses, it would give the outdoor sick poor the nursing which they require, it would bring the nurses in contact with other doctors than the workhouse doctor, and altogether both as regards the poor and as regards the nursing service I think the results might be very valuable. But there are not many places where it could be done; it could only be done where the cases lie within a comparatively limited area. You could not do it in a small country workhouse, placed, say, in an area where you have a sparse population, as is the case in some of my unions where there is only an average of one inhabitant to 5 or 6 acres of land. No nurse could cover the distances there.

Mr. Baldwyn Fleming.

9165. Still I suppose you would advocate it more particularly with regard to those districts where there is no nursing association that you might subscribe to?—I do not think that was my intention, but I have not got the passage here and I do not quite remember how it reads. Where there are nursing associations, I think it is an excellent arrangement that guardians should subscribe, and I am happy to say that in some places they do, but there are a great many places in the district where there are nursing associations where the guardians do not subscribe.

Attitude of Central Midwives Board towards Poor Law Infirmaries as training schools and its effects on supply of Poor Law Nurses.

9166. In paragraph 27 you refer to the Central Midwives Board, and you mention a resolution that was passed. You say, "The Midwives Act has, in truth, inflicted a very serious wrong upon workhouse nurses, inasmuch as, until the passing of the Act and the consequent issue of regulations by the Central Midwives Board, Poor Law nurses had no difficulty in presenting themselves for the certificate of the London Obstetrical Society." What is the resolution you there refer to?—The rules of the Central Midwives Board have to be approved by the Privy Council, and the rules of the Central Midwives Board were approved by the Privy Council. Before those rules were approved, there was a clause inserted saying that they should not have effect in hospitals and Poor Law nursing institutions: but after that, the Central Midwives Board passed a resolution that they would not recognise as training schools any Poor Law institution which had less than seventy-five cases a year nor accept as candidates any nurse coming from such institutions.

9167. Would that resolution have to be approved by the Privy Council?—It did not go to the Privy Council, and it was never approved by the Privy Council, and yet they are acting upon it. They do not consider it a rule; they consider it a resolution.

9168. Is there not some misapprehension with regard to that resolution?—I have already corrected myself to the effect that where there is an approved teacher they will receive candidates. That has been explained since I wrote that paragraph. We did not know that at Whitehall when I wrote that paragraph, or at all events I did not know it.

9169. I have a letter here from the Secretary of the Central Midwives Board, in which he says no such resolution was ever passed against Poor Law institutions being recognised as training schools and that each case is dealt with on its merits. I wondered whether you had any information to the contrary, of any Poor Law institution that has received any communication to the effect that the line is drawn at seventy-five patients?—The facts are as I have stated them. After the rules had been approved by the Privy Council, the Central Midwives Board passed a resolution, which, in the first instance, was limited to Poor Law institutions, to the effect that they would not recognise any Poor Law institution which had less than seventy-five cases in the course of the year. About a fortnight, I think it was, after they had passed that resolution, they passed another resolution, applying the same rule to all institutions; and now they will not accept candidates from any Poor Law institution unless they, as they term it, recognise it. They have recognised I think now twelve Poor Law institutions; four in London and eight in the provinces. All the other institutions are not recognised by them, and therefore unless they happen to have medical officers who are accepted by them as approved teachers these other institutions cannot send up candidates to qualify. Those are the facts.

9170. In Portsmouth and Southampton the medical officers have now been recognised, I think?—It so happens that they have approved teachers, and therefore, according to the statement made by the deputation form the Central Midwives Board, candidates could be sent up from those two institutions; but, on the other hand, neither of those institutions has seventy-five cases a year on the average, and therefore if they still adhere to the resolution that they will only accept candidates where there are seventy-five cases a year, neither of those institutions could send up any candidates although the teachers are approved teachers.

9171. Have they sent up any yet for examination?—Not since the Central Midwives Board have taken over the examination. When the London Obstetrical Society examined, they did send and they sent considerable numbers, who almost invariably passed, and passed well. It is a fact that of the candidates who were passed by the London Obstetrical Society, a very considerable proportion were candidates from poor law institutions. It is only natural that it should be so, because those candidates, as I have already explained, were nearly always three years' trained nurses in addition to having their midwifery knowledge. By the action of the Central Midwives Board, the nurses who up to that time could go up to qualify are prevented from going up to qualify. Then they made an additional requirement, which it is not for me to question. The London Obstetrical Society were satisfied with the candidate having personally attended five cases, having been present at fifteen more, and then being able to pass the examination; but the Central Midwives Board have raised the number of personal attendances to twenty, that is fifteen more than the London Obstetrical Society required, besides the examination, and in addition they will only accept candidates from institutions which they recognise as training institutions.

9172. Do you not think this will have the effect of interfering with the quality of the persons who apply for training as nurses in Poor Law institutions?—Certainly, I think it will. Some way, I hope, will be found out of the difficulty, but if it be persisted in, it will certainly have a most detrimental effect upon the candidates in our Poor Law institutions, and, as I think, a most uncalled-for effect. When the London Obstetrical Society gave up their work the Workhouse Nursing Association, which included one member of the Central Midwives Board, wrote to the London Obstetrical Society expressing their appreciation of the admirable work which had been done by the London Obstetrical Society; and although the Central Midwives Board have very largely raised the number of cases which they consider necessary for qualification—that I do not question at all; that is entirely within their own competence, and it is not for me to say whether they are right or whether they are wrong—there is no question that some members at all events of the Central Midwives Board are well aware that the London Obstetrical Society's examination was a thorough one, and that the Society did its work very well.

Appointment of Superintendent Relieving Officers.

9173. Then I think you express approval of the appointment of superintendent relieving officers where they can be usefully employed?—Yes.

9174. Do you not agree that a superintendent relieving Officer ought not to be appointed everywhere, but that where there might be only two relieving officers say in a district that the clerk to the guardians ought to have more power over the relieving officer than he has, and might act in the capacity of a superintendent relieving officer?—It would be a very difficult question to answer generally. I do not think you would find many clerks to the Guardians who would be willing to undertake that work; I should think the large majority of the clerks to the Guardians would be very unwilling to undertake it. Besides, I do not know that you would find many clerks to the guardians who are specially qualified to undertake it. You will find a few clerks of course who are very keen about Poor Law work and take a great interest in relief work.

Possible supervision of out-relief by Clerks to Guardians.

9175. But they are generally better qualified than the relieving officers that are employed, are they not?—In the large majority of unions the clerk is not required to devote his whole time to the work, and he only does it as part of his ordinary daily work. Very often the details of the clerk's work are to a great extent done by somebody in his office.

9176. In those cases is it not more necessary that someone should be in closer touch with the relieving officers than is the case at present?—I think it would be an excellent thing that you should have a much larger staff of relieving officers in every union, and that where you have your larger staff you should have either a superintendent relieving officer or an inspecting relieving officer who should see that they do their work thoroughly. But then comes in the element of expense. That would of course make it a very much more expensive process. I believe in the long run it would be a saving, because I think you would practically exterminate pauperism thereby, and that it would be one of the great means of getting rid of pauperism in the course of a few years' time; but meanwhile it would be very expensive. You very often find with guardians now that you cannot get them to understand what the relieving officer's work really is. You find now that some guardians say a relieving officer has not half enough work to do, and the fewer the number of cases he has the more strongly they say it, although the fewness of his cases may be a proof of the goodness of his work, as I have already tried to explain.

9177. The clerk at the present time has practically no authority over the relieving officer, so long as he attends to his duties according to the orders, has he?—The clerk has no administrative authority of any kind over anybody, outside his own department.

9178. Do you think it inadvisable for him to be appointed superintendent, as it were?—I do not see how you would find that it would work, unless you entirely alter the status of the clerk to the guardians. This is quite a new suggestion to me, and I am speaking on the spur of the moment, but it would not occur to me that that would be a likely solution of the problem at all. It might serve in those unions where the clerk devotes the whole of his time to the work, that is, in the large town unions; but even there I think you would find that the majority of the clerks would not care to have the duty put upon them, and are already fully occupied.

9179. You could not expect that a superintendent relieving officer should be appointed in every union, even in some cases where there are only two relieving officers, and indeed it would not be advisable in cases of that kind, would it?—I do not think the employment of the clerk would work. I am quite with you in regard to your object, but I do not think that would bring it about.

Provision for Poor Law children at Portsmouth and South Stoneham.

9180. The children in connection with the Portsmouth union are all in one home, as I understand it?—Yes.

9181. And there are some 300 to 350 children, I think?—The Portsmouth guardians take the children from Gosport, Fareham, Winchester and Petersfield, and they also take the boys from Steyning.

9182. It is really a district school then, is it not?—No, it is not a school at all it is only a home. They do not get any schooling there, except the infants. The infants under six or seven are taught there in an infant school, but all who are old enough to go out to school go to the public elementary schools. It is only a children's home, but it is an excellent one. I do not know any place where the children are better done by at Portsmouth; to my mind, it is a model of the best means of treating pauper children.

9183. At South Stoneham the children are all inside the workhouse and are educated there, I understand?—South Stoneham is one of the three workhouse schools which still remain in my district—to my regret.

9184. Is it intended to abolish that?—I cannot tell you. That hangs to some extent upon the rectification of the boundaries between South Stoneham and Southampton, which I have already alluded to. If I had my way it would be altered undoubtedly.

9185. How many children are there there?—On the 13th week of the Lady Day quarter this year there were thirty-seven boys and thirty-eight girls.

9186. All belonging to the South Stoneham union?—Yes, I do not think that they take any children from outside.

9187. You have advocated the abolition of this entirely, have you not?—Yes, I have, on principle; but it is only fair to say that those children, especially the boys, are happy and well cared for. There are separate schools and separate teachers and attendants for the boys and for the girls, and they mix a good deal with the outside world. The boys have their cricket team and play out matches. Some of them sing in the village choir at Westend, and they are constantly associating with the outside children—much more than is usually the case with workhouse children. They have had particularly good officers there, and a very good board of guardians, who take great interest in the children; and although I do not approve myself of bringing up children in the workhouse, I think those children have been uncommonly well done by and are happy.

Scales of out-relief and their dangers.

9188. There is another point with regard to out-door relief which I omitted to put to you just now; I noticed from what you said that you are not in favour of a scale of relief?—Certainly not.

9189. Do you mean that you are not in favour of any stipulated scale being drawn up by the guardians for the guidance of the guardians in giving outdoor relief?—I think it mischievous.

9190. How would you distinguish between a family that was to be relieved outside consisting of nine persons, and a family also to be relieved outside consisting of three persons?—I would have the full circumstances of the family of nine investigated and the full circumstances of the family of three investigated, down to their most complete ramifications. I would then make an order if it had to be an order for outdoor relief, for what was necessary to relieve the destitution in the family of nine and for what was necessary to relieve the destitution in the family of three. I would limit that order to one fortnight, and at the end of the fortnight I would have that thorough investigation repeated.

9191. It is merely an arithmetical calculation then?—Not the least in the world. The circumstances may be absolutely different.

9192. That is my point; the circumstances are different?—The family of nine probably would have three or four of the children who are bringing in something.

9193. You say that in one case there might be an income?—I say that the income might be quite different in the two cases.

9195. Usually the scale is fixed as a minimum, and is for guidance only?—It is generally used in practice as a maximum scale.

9196. In that case it is an injustice to the recipient and not to the ratepayer?—It is an injustice to the ratepayer or to the recipient; it is either not wanted or it is inadequate, as I have already explained.

Advantages of administration of relief by whole Board of Guardians.

9197. Would you leave it to the individual opinion, as it were, of each committee on the board?—If I had my way I would abolish every relief committee to-morrow. The most important of all the duties of boards of guardians is the relief of destitution, and it is a duty which ought to be performed by the full board and after the fullest deliberation and consideration.

9198. Do you mean that the full board should deal with all the details of every case?—Certainly. You say they cannot afford to give the time; if they do the work, the time must be given, and the work cannot be done unless the time is given. It is because they will not afford to give the time that the work is glossed over and done imperfectly.

9199. Is it not in those cases where the relief is given by the whole board that you have the most lax administration?—Yes; simply because the work is not thoroughly done. But that is no argument against its being done by the whole board. If you have it done by committees, it generally means that the guardian of the parish and the relieving officer decide what the amount is to be, that is, the guardian of the parish is not only the judge but the advocate in the case.

9200. Does that not depend upon whether the guardian who represents the parish is sitting to give the relief in that parish; that need not necessarily be so, need it?—Not necessarily, but as a matter of practice I think

Mr. Baldwyn Fleming.

9 April, 1906.

every guardian who represents a parish feels very much inclined to think that his parish ought to get something, and he always "sticks up," as it is called, for the cases from his own parish.

9201. Do you find that is exactly the case in a large board of guardians, where all the guardians sit to give relief—that the one who represents the parish advocates a particular applicant from his parish, and the others fall in with his suggestion, in order that they may get his support for their cases meanwhile; and they do not expect each other to interfere in the cases belonging to their own parish?—Yes.

9202. It becomes an understood thing?—Yes, but it is an unfortunate exercise of their discretion What I want boards of guardians to do is to sit and to act impartially. If you have a small committee of which a guardian and the relieving officer are two, you will find that their influence is almost necessarily—as a matter of practice it is—paramount; and they get the relief they ask for. But it you have a full board who are doing their work honestly, they will not decide according to the inclination of the guardian for a particular parish; they will look into the whole merits of the case, and they will decide what the necessities of the applicant may be. There are no two cases which are alike. The exigencies of life vary in a thousand ways between any two cases you like to bring up; you cannot bring up two cases which are exactly alike, and to which a similar scale can apply—in equity, any how.

Adoption by Guardians of regulations as to relief.

9203. Precisely for the same reason that you object to a scale, I take it you would object to regulations for the guidance of the guardians?—No, not at all; I thoroughly approve of regulations if they are sound, and if they will stick to them. I object to regulations being passed and hung up as a dummy on the board-room wall, which is frequently the case, I am sorry to say. I think the Manchester rules, for instance, did excellent work.

9204. The Manchester rules alone, without committee work, would probably be hung upon the wall, would they not?—I do not think so; I do not at all see why.

9205. Have you heard of cases which would be considered among the worst administered practically in the country, yet where they have very strict regulations?—No. A good many of the guardians in my district have at one time or another attended Poor Law Conferences, and have had the advantages of these regulations pressed upon them. When they came home they have adopted and sent round to the members, and one copy has been regulations which have been printed framed and hung up on the wall. I have appealed many a time to the regulations on the wall; but without much result.

Apathy of Boards of Guardians as to administration of relief.

9207. But where you get disinterested committees, who are moving round from one district to another, you will get your regulations adhered to?—No; I would much rather have that work done by the full board. I think it is the most important duty of the whole board, and would much rather it were done by the whole board. I know I do not get it done, but I feel most strongly that of all the duties the guardians have to perform the administration of relief is far and away the most important. As a matter of fact, in practice there is comparatively little attention paid to it. Over and over again, you see most of the guardians present during the public business; they discuss any points which may come up on points of public business such as resolutions sent up by other guardians, and any burning questions; but directly the public business ceases and the relieving officer is called in, a proportion of the guardians walk out. You often see that.

Unreliability of statistics as to "able-bodied" paupers.

9208. (Professor Smart.) In paragraph 4 you say "The official statistics as to able-bodied pauperism are misleading, inasmuch as, owing to the imperfect mode of classification, large numbers are returned as able-bodied who are not able-bodied"; could you mention some of these cases?—Yes. In a great many unions, if a man is under sixty and is not on any special diet, he is returned as able-bodied, although he may not be able-bodied at all. It is extremely difficult to alter the manner in which the statistics have been kept, because if you do, you alter their value for comparative purposes. That is the great difficulty of the subject. Taking my own unions, you would find a number of people returned as able-bodied, whereas if you were to overhaul those people, you would find that most of them were not. Take, for instance, Wimborne union in Dorsetshire; there you have ninety-five inmates, and of those, ten are returned as able-bodied; if you were to examine those ten, you would probably not find one that could go outside and earn his livelihood; he is simply returned as able-bodied because he happens to be not on any special diet and is under sixty.

9209. Have you any other class of cases?—Yes, I think you might find this: Supposing a man applies for relief, and he himself is temporarily ailing, he and his wife and family are all returned as able-bodied, although he obtains relief on the ground of temporary sickness. Then supposing, on the other hand, a man applies for relief on the ground of the sickness of his wife, he and she would both be returned as sick, although he might be quite able-bodied. There you have what appears on the face of it almost an absurdity—that the man who is really sick is returned as able-bodied because he is only temporarily sick, and the man who is able-bodied is returned as sick because his wife is sick. In many places I think you will find they are so classified.

Paucity of genuinely able-bodied paupers.

9210. These are the ones that occur to you at the moment?—Yes. Going through the whole of the rural unions now—and indeed through many of the town unions—it is safe to say that you will not find an able-bodied man in the house, not a man who can go out and get sufficient employment to earn his daily bread.

9211. But the point is that these people have been returned to the public as able-bodied?—That is what I say: they are returned as able-bodied, although as a matter of fact they are not able-bodied. You will find able-bodied women, no doubt, because you will find women with children, who are in the house because they cannot maintain themselves and the children outside. With regard to in-door relief, there is a very important point which is very much overlooked, and that is that the cost of indoor relief is represented to the public as being much higher than it actually is. I refer to that in my memorandum.

The value of workhouse products as a factor in the cost of indoor relief.

9212. You do, and that is what I was going to question you upon more fully?—Everything that is produced in the workhouse is not taken into account at the cost of its production, but at just under what the market price would be if it had to be bought. Take Portsmouth, for example. I went into the question there with some minuteness three or four years ago. They produce a great deal of pork, and they grow all their vegetables. That pork does not cost them 1d. per lb. and their vegetables do not cost them ½d. per dozen, I suppose; and yet the pork is estimated as costing 6d. or 7d. per lb., just under the market value whatever it is, and their vegetables are estimated also at something under the market value. So you get a return of the cost which really is what the cost would be if it all had to be paid for, though, as matter of fact, it is produced for almost nothing, and the real cost is what the actual cost of production is.

9213. I want to know what accounts you are speaking of; are they accounts that come before the public, and would these appear as goods purchased at the market price?—They are taken into account in the workhouse books, not as being purchased, but at the market price. The pork, instead of being taken at 8d., which might be the market price, would be taken at 7d. or whatever it is, and so entered as the cost of workhouse maintenance. I have given up trying to get at the cost of indoor maintenance for this reason, that the actual cost of indoor maintenance is what the items consumed amount to, minus all repayments towards the in-maintenance of some of the inmates and minus the value of what is produced by the inmates. There, again, I think the public suffer very much, because there is a great prejudice against workhouse inmates doing work. If you start wood-chopping, some outside person objects that it is interfering with the wood-chopping trade. I do not see why it should not be done. I think that any remunerative work that can be done in the workhouse ought to be allowed to be done. The workhouses ought not to under-sell the outside market, but they ought to be allowed to make everything they want for their own consumption, and to produce and to sell everything that they are able to produce. It is for the benefit of the ratepayers that they should. The other argument is simply for the benefit of the individual who would otherwise supply the article which is required. I think the benefit of the ratepayers ought to prevail against the interest of any individual.

9214. You are speaking here of a calculation of the cost per head ?—Yes.

9215. (Mr. Booth.) If the cost of the article is increased by the work done in the workhouse, to what account does the credit go of the money which has been earnt?——It is purely mythical.

9216. It would not be mythical in the accounts. If you increase the debit side of the account by the value of the labour, the value of that labour must, if the accounts are to balance, be put in somewhere on the other side of the account ?—I do not think it is put in at all.

9217. Then in that case it could not be charged on the other side ?—The pork which is produced at 1d. is charged at the rate of 6d. or whatever it is.

9218. The 5d. must appear on the credit side of the account if the 6d. appears on the debit side of the account, or else the account will not balance ?—The account, to my mind, is an incorrect account. It represents what the cost would be if everything had to be paid for.

9219. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Would they not keep a farm account, or whatever they call it, and enter the receipt in that account ?—They keep a farm account, and it is from the farm account that they get the real cost. They were able to give me, when I went into that, what the actual cost of the pork was. The actual cost of the pork really only amounted to the cost of the pigs from which the other pigs were bred, and of some of the food.

9220. But in estimating the cost of in-maintenance as it is given in the published figures, is not the profit that comes from the farm account set off against that account —From my point of view there ought to be no profit from the farm account.

9221. You ought not to exaggerate the cost of the pauper unless you charge that exaggeration to some other account ?—They do. They represent the pork which is given to the pauper in the cost of in-maintenance at 6d. per lb, or whatever the amount may be.

9222. To what account is that increase and aggravation of the expense credited ?—It goes to the cost of indoor maintenance.

9223. In that case the cost of indoor maintenance should be the nett amount, not the gross ?—In that case the cost of indoor maintenance is represented as 5d. or 6d. per lb. higher than the actual cost. The actual cost they have in their farm account, but they do not have it in their indoor maintenance account.

9224. (Chairman.) Is this not the case, that the farm sells at a nominal profit certain articles to the workhouse, that is to say, the article which it can produce at 1d. it sells at 6d. but there is no transaction which takes place between the two ?—None.

9225. What is the reason of putting the price up—is it in order to prevent it being said that they were under-selling the outside market ?—No. The guardians have a practice in the case of everything that is consumed on the premises of taking it into account at just under the market price. That is almost invariably the case in workhouses, so instead of showing what the actual cost of indoor maintenance is, the account shows what the cost would be if all those things were bought at the price which they are represented to have cost.

9226. The workhouse account shows cost of maintenance—so much ?—Yes.

9227. Then it shows that there have been certain disbursements in cash, and those disbursements in cash would be less than the cost which is shown ?—No disbursements in cash come into the question here.

9228. There are certain things which are bought outside, are there not ?—But not these things which are produced.

9229. The things which are bought outside are bought at a certain price ?—Yes.

9230. And the price at which they are bought is the price entered in that case, but in the case of those things which are produced inside they are put down at a fictitious price ?—Yes.

The value of workhouse products as a factor in the cost of indoor relief.

9231. Therefore the only transaction in which money passes is as regards the things that are bought outside ?—Yes.

9232. And the amount that would be charged on the rates would only be the actual disbursements ?—The amount that is actually charged on the rates would be as you say ; but the amount which is shown to the public as the cost of indoor maintenance is a fictitious amount, which represents the cost of in-maintenance to be considerably higher than it actually is.

9233. That of course does not affect the amount of the rate, because the rate is only levied to cover the amount actually expended ?—It does not affect the amount of the rate, but it gives the outside public the idea that the indoor expenditure is very much higher than it really is.

9234. (Mr. Loch.) There is no correlation between the farm accounts and the indoor relief account, is there ?—No.

9235. (Sir Samuel Provis.) But the amount would be credited to the farm account in the ledger, would it not ?—Yes. You will find it is a constant thing for the workhouse masters to show the guardians what they are pleased to call their profit on the farm account.

9236. That is their reason for this, is it not ?—Exactly. The farm account shows the actual expenditure, and then when they take the produce into account, they charge it just under the market value to the items which are taken into account, and the difference between the actual expenditure and the price at which they enter it in the account is what they consider their profit.

9237. (Chairman.) Therefore the profit on the farm is in reduction of the total expense of maintenance and the difference supplied by the rates ?—Quite so.

9238. (Mr. Booth.) But the amount which is given us in our statistics must be the actual amount after allowing for the profit on the farm, surely ?—No.

9239. Then it is incorrect ?—The amount that is levied as poor rate is the actual amount of the expenditure, but the amount which is represented as the cost of in-maintenance is very considerably greater than the actual amount of expenditure.

9240. Then why should the figure in the Blue-book be incorrect ? According to you it is absolutely incorrect ?—Because the guardians and their officers like to show what they are pleased to call their profit on the farm.

9241. They might like to do that, but they ought not to return their statement of what it has cost without allowing credit for this ?—You and I are perfectly at one on that.

9242. (Chairman.) I suppose the contention would be this—if we did not sell this to the workhouse we should sell it to the public at a profit ?—Yes.

9243. And that would be an actual profit ?—Yes.

9244. Assuming that they were to deal directly with it, they would sell at a profit, and the workhouse would have to buy other articles in their stead at the price which is charged ?—That is the way they put it.

9245. (Mr. Booth.) What is their object, or anybody's object, in exaggerating the statistical statement of the cost of in-maintenance ?—Their object is exactly what the Chairman has stated it to be ; that is, they might say, "We will not use this at all, but we will sell it all outside."

9246. If they did that, what would they do with the profit—they cannot put it into their own pockets ?—They would get the profit, which they would then spend upon buying the things for the workhouse.

9247. And in that way they would reduce to the public the cost of in-maintenance ?—Quite so. To me it is not convincing at all, and that is why I have mentioned the fact. From my point of view the cost is represented as being very much higher than it actually is. In most workhouses there are some inmates for whom payment is made towards the cost of their maintenance, they being either pensioners or people who have relations who pay for them. Those payments I believe are not usually credited to the cost of in-maintenance, but are paid into the common fund. They do not go to reduce the cost of in-maintenance, but they go into the common fund and reduce the general cost.

Mr. Baldwyn Fleming.

9 April, 1906.

9248. Possibly it is the same with the profit on the farm, and that goes to the common fund?—The profit on the farm certainly goes to the common fund. There are a great many workhouses where they can produce a great deal, or could produce a great deal, and the inmates are prevented from producing because it is said that it would interfere with outside work. Now that is perfectly wrong. It appears to me that every workhouse ought to be allowed to produce all that it can. It ought not to under-sell other labour, but so long as it keeps up its price, I cannot see any reason whatever why it should not produce, nor can I see any argument in favour of saying that the workhouse should not be a producing establishment and should not sell all that it can produce, for the benefit of the ratepayers. As a matter of practice it is not usually done, and if guardians do it there is almost always opposition excited. One knows what it is with the wood-cutting, and how difficult it is even to get wood-cutting done without opposition from outside. I cannot see in justice why the outside wood-chopper should be bolstered up by refusing to allow the inmates of the workhouse to cut up firewood to be sold from the workhouse. The same with all other industries. I can remember when there was a good deal of mat-making in workhouses, but that is almost entirely given up now, because it was complained that it competed with outside labour.

9249. (Professor Smart.) But you agree that they should not under-sell?—They should not under-sell, but everything they want for themselves they ought to be able to provide, whereas they are not allowed to do that, because it is said if they do it prevents outside people from getting the sale of their goods. In many workhouses guardians will not allow mat-making, because they say the ratepayers who sell mats ought to have the advantage of their custom.

9250. Is that so?—It is a common thing. If you want, say, bedsteads for the sick poor, there are certain bedsteads which are specially adapted for the sick poor, made upon Dr. Lawson Tait's pattern. If guardians buy those they almost invariably buy them through some local contractor, so that the ratepayer may get a profit, instead of buying them direct from the particular manufacturer.

9251. Of course the same argument would apply to washing?—Quite so. My argument is that the cost of indoor relief is now represented as being very much higher than it really is, and that it might be reduced very much more if the labour available in the workhouse could be utilised to its fullest extent in producing.

The relief of the incompetent.

9252. In reference to paragraphs 9 and 10, I think we should all agree with you as to the difference between the problem of the Poor Law in 1834 and the problem now. The question then was, how to get rid of the aggressive able-bodied pauper, and now it is, how to provide best for the helpless, the sick and the aged. Do you not think that under modern circumstances there is a class which comes between the two—namely, those who cannot keep up with the demands of modern industry either for want of skilled training or for want of full health, and those who have come to the age of fifty and are thrown out by younger men? Where would you place them in the modern organism?—If they were destitute, I should leave them to the Poor Law. If they were not destitute, I should not relieve them at all.

9253. You say the problem is "How best to provide for the helpless, the sick and the aged;" would you put those under the helpless, the sick, or the aged?—They would come under the helpless, so far as they would require to be dealt with under the Poor Law at all.

9254. Would you hand them over to charity?—If charity can deal with them, certainly. If you can organise charity so as to deal with that class of case, it ought to be done by that means. If I were an autocrat, I would never let anybody come under the Poor Law who might by any possibility be provided for by any other means; I would take the Poor Law absolutely as the last resource.

The relief of the temporarily unemployed.

9255. You must admit the possibility now of men being temporarily unemployed through no fault of their own at all; yet it does not seem to me that you provide any place of relief for them by the problem you put before us?—If I were an autocratic administrator I should take them all into the workhouse whilst they were out of work, and provide for them everything they want under conditions which would force them to resume work as soon as they were able to do so. They would then have a constant inducement not to be destitute when temporarily unemployed.

Legislation tending to laxity of relief.

9256. In paragraph 11 you say, "legislation during recent years has certainly appeared to run counter to the principles laid down by the Commission of 1834"; from what year would you date the new trend of things?—I am afraid I can hardly state that definitely, but there have been a good many Acts of Parliament passed which certainly seem to run counter to the principles which were laid down by the Poor Law Commissioners.

9257. You do not mean the Act of 1894 or of 1900, do you?—At this moment I can hardly go back in detail, but I can work up that point for you. It is quite certain that the principle that destitution should be the sole claim for relief has not been insisted upon.

9258. In paragraph 13 you say, "It is quite conceivable that relief might successfully be claimed by a family with a very considerable income"; have you ever known any case like that in reality?—No, and I think it would be difficult to get hold of an actual case, but it is evident that there may be cases in which there are several members of the family who are temporarily disabled and who are receiving 5s., which might amount between them to a considerable income which the guardians are prohibited from taking into account.

Proportion of out and in-door relief.

9259. Do you give us anywhere in your memorandum figures showing the proportion of outdoor relief and in-door relief in your district as a whole?—In the Table at the end I have given the fullest figures, and there you will find that proportion set out.

9260. Do you give the average for the whole district?—Yes.

9261. Do you remember what it is?—The percentage on outdoor relief for the whole district at Lady Day last year was 76·7, and the percentage of indoor relief 23·93.

9262. With a percentage of 76·7 on outdoor relief, do you not think you are a little sanguine in your hopes of getting rid of the outdoor problem?—Not the least in the world.

9263. Even with 76·7 on outdoor relief just now?—No. I wonder sometimes that it is not higher than it is.

Relieving Officers' method of filling up their Application and Report Books.

9264. (Dr. Downes.) Do you find that the relieving officers are as careful as you would wish in keeping their application and report books?—Some keep them very well, but some keep them carelessly. The application and report book, as a rule, does not contain by any means the close particulars which one would wish to see recorded there; and in consequence of that, the Case Paper system seems to me to be very superior to mere reliance on the application and report book.

9265. In the earlier instructions of the Commissioners, published in their Seventh Report, to which reference was made yesterday, the Commissioners lay a great deal of stress on the importance of ascertaining the causes of pauperism, and they state that they have specially appropriated columns in the relieving officer's books and in the admission and discharge book to show the cause of the application for relief. Do you think it possible that the relieving officers, if they had more time and were better instructed, could inquire more carefully than perhaps some of them do into the causes of the applications?—Certainly they could.

9266. I believe it is a customary thing for them to fill up that column with simply the word "poverty"?—Very often the column is not filled up at all.

9267. Whereas the Commissioners apparently wanted to know what was the cause of that poverty?—Quite so.

9268. For example, was it sickness or was it intemperance?—Yes. When the cause is sickness or the application is for a midwifery order it very often is entered; but when the cause is somewhat indefinite, or has not been thoroughly ascertained by the relieving officer, often it is not entered at all, or only in a vague and unsatisfactory manner At all events, that information is not usually as closely given as it is very important that it should be.

Extent of Relieving Officers' duty to investigate causes of pauperism.

9269. Would you agree that an intelligent investigation of the causes of pauperism might enable administrators to deal with those causes?—Certainly; but when I have put that to officers and to guardians, I have had the answer that that is rather in excess of the duties of the relieving officer as laid down in the Consolidated Order. The duties of the relieving officer as laid down in the Consolidated Order are by no means very definite. By Article 215 of the Consolidated Order of July, 1847, among his duties it is stated that he has "to receive all applications for relief made to him within his district, or relating to any parish situated within his district, and forthwith to examine into the circumstances of every case by visiting the house of the applicant (if situated within his district), and by making all necessary inquiries into the state of health, the ability to work, the condition and family, and the means of such applicant, and to report the result of such inquiries in the prescribed form to the guardians at their next ordinary meeting, and also to visit from time to time as requisite all paupers receiving relief, and to report concerning the same as the guardians may direct." If that is thoroughly worked out, it would give everything that I should like to see done; but, as a matter of fact, the only column in the application and report book which really gives the opportunity of complying with the instruction I have just read, is the column headed "If partially or wholly disabled, and the description of disability." There is really no sufficient column for recording the reasons of the application. You have columns for the name of the applicant, the residence, how long resident, calling or occupation, whether single or married, widow or widower, etc. Among the other columns, you have one headed, "Present cause of seeking relief or nature of application"; but that is only a very narrow column, with no room, or, at all events, no invitation to fill up the particulars which one would like to see. Relieving officers generally complement this by their own note book. In their own note book they have much fuller information than appears on the application and report book. At the same time, the ordinary relieving officer's information is by no means as close as one would wish it to be.

9270. Should you be in favour of greater importance and prominence being given to that portion of the application and report book?—Certainly. I think the most important part of the whole of a relieving officer's work is thorough investigation on the original application and on its subsequent renewal.

Duty of Workhouse Chaplain to report as to children.

9271. In those same instructions to which I have referred, the Assistant-Commissioner is directed to inquire into the results of the training and education of the chidren; I see from your last annual report that you havle been making some inquiry into these results?—I have endeavoured to go into that subject with considerable care. The position is very much altered since the instructions were issued to the Assistant-Commissioners in 1841, or earlier. In those days there were practically few schools available, and the workhouse school was the place where the workhouse children, I take it, almost universally received their education; whereas, now, they almost universally do not receive their education there, but go outside. It used to be made a specific duty of the chaplain that once a month he was to report upon the general condition and progress of the children. Since the children have been sent out to school, this obligation on the chaplain has been, to a great extent, allowed to lapse, and I believe it is held that the chaplain is not bound to make this report where the children do not receive their schooling in the workhouse. I ask very often for the reports made by the chaplain, but I seldom find them. It is an unusual thing now in the chaplain's book to see the monthly report upon the condition and progress of the children, although in earlier days it was a regular thing that those reports should be made

Information as to after-careers of Poor Law children.

9272. What sources of information exist for tracing the future of these children? I take it that for the metropolitan district we have what is known as the M.A.B.Y.S.?—Yes.

9273. What have you for the girls and boys in the country?—I am afraid there is very little information which is regularly obtained upon the future doings of the children who are sent out into situations from the workhouses. Some years ago Mr. Murray Brown and myself—and I am not sure that one or two of our colleagues did not take the same line of investigation—endeavoured to ascertain what had become of a number of children who had been sent out from the workhouse schools, or, at all events, some of the larger of them, during a certain number of years. I got a careful return from the Farnham and Hartley Wintney district school, and as near a return as I could from some of the larger workhouses. I gave some of the results in my annual report of the time.

9274. Would that be printed in the annual report of the Local Government Board?—Yes. The results were very satisfactory, and the percentage of failures was small.

9275. In that case, you got your information, to a great extent, from the superintendents of the schools, did you not?—In the case of the district school, the information was obtained chiefly by the then superintendent of the school and the matron, with the very cordial co-operation of the managers. There was a good deal of trouble taken over it, and they worked out a very fairly complete result. Some of the indications were vaguer than I liked; but still, on the whole, the return was a fairly good one and as I say the results were very satisfactory.

9277. Then you had another way of testing it?—I tested it further by getting information—I forget whether it was through the board or how it was obtained,—as to the proportion of prisoners who had been brought up in workhouse establishments. There again, the proportion was exceedingly small. There had been a statement made by one of the prison chaplains which drew my attention to the subject; I think it was to the effect that some of the worst prisoners he had ever had were people who had been brought up in workhouses; there were some rather alarming and wide statements of that kind which I endeavoured afterwards to verify. The result was that a very small proportion of prisoners had been brought up as pauper children. That, coupled with the fact that very few indeed found there way back to the workhouse, proved two things namely, that they were not sent into the criminal classes and that they were not sent into the pauper class by the education they received at the hands of the guardians.

9278. (Chairman.) May I ask what was the date of that inquiry of yours?—I can hardly answer; it was some years ago.

9279. My object in asking was to ascertain what system of education these children were the product of?—That was very varied. Some had been entirely brought up in the workhouse, some had been living in the workhouse and going outside to the public elementary schools, some had been in district schools, and some, no doubt, had been boarded-out.

9280. Was the district school system in full force then?—I have only one district school, and that is a comparatively small one.

9281. Was it in your own district that you made these inquiries?—Yes, the return was confined to my own district. I was anxious to test it for my own district. Mr. Murray Brown did the same and his results confirmed mine.

9282. What was his district?—I think he had the Welsh district at that time.

9283. (Dr. Downes.) There is an interesting reference to the results as regards workhouse children in your last report, which perhaps you might like to mention?—Yes. There I have given a very striking instance, which was one of several that came under my observation. Perhaps I may read it: "It must not be supposed for a moment that children brought up in workhouses are failures afterwards. Such is far from being the case. The failures are comparatively few, and some of the children turn out surprisingly well. A boy who was for seven years in the workhouse"—I will not mention the workhouse—"displayed the most conspicuous gallantry in the efforts to save the guns at Colenso. He received the distinguished conduct medal for his splendid courage and was afterwards presented with the freedom of the borough. General S——, who was similarly honoured, referred to him in these terms: 'I should like to add my own congratulations to an old soldier of yours upon the splendid work achieved. I do not think that our Mayor can have known that he had so distinguished a person in front of him as Driver, now Bombardier, H. G., who showed himself one of the bravest soldiers in the field. It was he who, among others, did so much towards the saving of disaster and the retrieving of our guns at Colenso.'" That boy went forward after poor Lieutenant Roberts had been shot down; he and some others volunteered to try to get the guns in, and displayed such distinguished bravery that that was the result. There were, I think, from Portsmouth no less than thirty boys who served in South Africa, some of them with considerable distinction. Some of them lost their lives there.

Training-ships for Poor Law boys: their finance and results.

9284. Do you think the guardians make sufficient use of training ships?—No. I wish they used them more. There is an excellent training ship in my own district, the "Mercury," where there are about forty or fifty vacant berths, but the boards of guardians will not send their children there because they shy at the expense. Captain Hoare, whose private enterprise the "Mercury" is, charges £21 a year for them; they cost him over £30. He will take the guardians' children at £21 a year, but the guardians think that excessive, and are reluctant to send them. As a matter of fact, it is short-sighted policy because his children do astonishingly well. I saw a letter from some of the Admiralty authorities lately to Captain Hoare saying that the boys from the "Mercury," were about the most successful boys that they ever received; that they all did uncommonly well, and that the percentage of the boys who had obtained desirable posts was higher from the "Mercury" than from any other training ship from which they received boys. In the workhouse the boys cost, I suppose, 5s. per week on an average, that is, £13 per year, and Captain Hoare charges £21 per year, which is a difference of £8. He keeps them for two or three years as the case may be, and that makes a difference of £16 on the two years, or £24 on the three years as compared with what they cost in the workhouse. At the end of the second or third year he gets the large majority of them out either into the navy or into the military bands or the naval bands. He has an admirable band of boys there. The boys have everything that they can possibly require; they are most carefully looked after and trained; and to get all that for £21 a year appears to me to be extremely moderate.

9285. Do you know if any capitation grant is given by the Admiralty or the War Office?—Yes; the Admiralty give a grant for each boy that is passed into their service. I cannot tell you what the grant is, but there is a grant for the boys that pass into the service. Captain Hoare manages to pass many of his boys in as first-class boys.

9286. But apart from the capitation grant, the cost is what you have told us?—Yes, £21.

9287. Have you ever heard it suggested by boards of guardians that the Admiralty or the War Office or, at any rate, the Government should bear a larger share of the cost of such boys?—I have often heard guardians say so, but I do not know myself that it would be easy to do it or indeed desirable that it should be done. They do not know until the boy passes whether he will be fit to go into the Navy or in what rank he will go into the Navy. I suppose if the Government were to give a further grant, it would only be given to boys who went into the Navy, and would be according to the value of the boy when he went into the Navy, that is, according to the class into which he went. I think if such an inducement as that could further one's object in getting boys into the training ships, that it would be very well spent money. It is the best thing you can do with the boys, especially with a certain class of boy who has been brought up perhaps a little bit roughly and whom it is difficult to bring into the discipline of an in-door establishment, but who shapes admirably on a training ship. You can do with a big burly boy on a ship, and he very soon gets knocked into shape and probably turns out an admirable sailor, although if he has been kept in a workhouse school there might have been a failure.

Provision for special classes of sick children.

9288. Have you any difficulty in your district in dealing with special classes of sick children or ailing children: take the tuberculous children for instance?—I do not know any place where that class of children can be properly treated in the country workhouses. Where you have big infirmaries like Southampton and Portsmouth, and in a lesser degree at Farnham, Basingstoke, Salisbury and some others, you may have a sufficient classification, medical attendance, and nursing.

9289. Then cases of ringworm would be troublesome, I take it, in some places?—They are very troublesome Ophthalmia I am little troubled with now, although it used to be very troublesome. I am happy to say it has nearly disappeared: probably the improved dietary has had a good deal to say to that, by raising the general tone and condition of the children. Then I have few children in the district now, except in the big towns and at the district school, as you will see if you will look through the list appended to my memorandum.

9290. Can you suggest any remedy for dealing with the difficulty that there is in connection with these classes of children?—I should like very much indeed to have, one house in a county to which ringworm and skin diseases of different kinds should be sent for treatment. If that could be done, it would be very beneficial. But, on the other hand, the numbers are small, and I doubt whether they would be sufficient to warrant an establishment in each county. Counties might perhaps be grouped for the purpose. That would only cause a temporary separation from the usual surroundings.

9291. Under what authority could you have such a grouping?—It would have to be jointly provided by the Guardians who required it, and it would have to be chiefly administered under medical supervision.

9292. You would contemplate a combination of boards of guardians then?—I think so. If there were any institutions to which guardians could send the cases by paying for so much the better and simpler. There might, for instance, be a branch at a county hospital or some plan of that kind. Combinations, as you know, are not very easy to work, and they are always liable to give rise to friction.

Dental attendance for Poor Law children.

9293. You referred to dental treatment in your evidence-in-chief: I suppose you are aware that the Local Government Board have always favoured the provision of dental attendance on children, and that they have issued a statement of the conditions which they recommend for adoption by guardians, in which prominence is given to what I may call conservative dentistry?—Yes.

9294. Ordinary medical practice is rather given to the extraction of teeth?—The ordinary medical officer is not a dentist, and it is difficult to persuade guardians that a medical officer is not a dentist. Medical officers, as a rule, rather than cause trouble to guardians, or rather than spend the necessary time and effort to obtain the services of a dentist, if a child has got the toothache and a bad tooth, extract the tooth. Most general medical practitioners have a certain amount of dental work among their clients, but they cannot as a rule pretend to dental knowledge, further than the power of extraction. I do not know whether they ever attempt to stop a tooth: I have never heard of one. I have been trying for years past to get guardians to have the children examined systematically, say, once every three months, and then to send such of them as require dental attendance to the dentist, in order that that attendance may be given to them. I may say that some guardians have responded extremely well to the invitation. For instance, at the Cottage Homes at Christchurch, they have a regular appointed dentist, and they have a proper dental chair with the necessary appliances. The dentist comes every month, he examines every child, and does what is necessary. He keeps a proper record with notes of the different operations which he does for the children. At Portsmouth, also the guardians are careful about it. One of the dentists in Portsmouth is good enough to do the work for them: I think he does it as an honorary dentist, but at Christchurch they pay, and they ought to pay.

9295. The guardians at Portsmouth would realise the importance to the boys who are going into the services?—Yes.

9295. I believe they will pass a boy into the service with stopped teeth when they will not pass a boy who has had permanent teeth extracted?—That is so.

Operation of Local Goverment Board's Circular as to administration of anaesthetics.

9297. With regard to the administration of anaesthetics, I think the Local Government Board issued a circular on that point some years back, drawing attention to the fact that they were always ready to sanction payment for anaesthetics?—Yes.

9298. But that still leaves the medical officer in a somewhat awkward position, does it not, occasionally; the payment depends, I think, on the option of the guardians?—Quite so. The medical officer cannot claim the payment, and the guardians have to apply to the Local Government Board to sanction the payment. That is a point which seems to me unnecessary. Where the medical officer considers that an anaesthetic ought to be administered, I think the guardians ought to be able to pay as a matter of course, without having to apply for a gratuity to the medical officer in order that the medical officer may pay the anaesthetist.

9299. But the sanction of the Local Government Board in my experience is never withheld?—Never; I have never known a case in which it has even been questioned.

9300. Is not the point this: that the medical officer may have to perform an operation requiring the administration of an anaesthetic as a matter of urgency, and he is not sure of obtaining payment from the guardians?—Quite so.

9301. So that he has to take the chance of obtaining payment which may not be accorded to him?—Certainly. The guardians might refuse him, and then it would not go before the Local Government Board at all. I think that where, in the medical officer's judgment, he considers it necessary that an anaesthetic should be administered, he ought to be allowed to claim it in the ordinary course amongst his extra fees.

9302. It should be included amongst the prescribed fees?—Yes.

Fees to Medical Officers for operations in Workhouses.

9303. Is it not general knowledge that there has been a great development of operative surgery within this last generation?—Clearly.

9304. And the same might apply to operations which at present do not appear on the scale of fees?—Certainly.

9305. And are not therefore provided for by the existing scale?—Yes. Whilst we are on that point I should like to say that I think it is extremely hard that a medical officer does not get a fee for an operation performed in the workhouse, except for midwifery cases, the specified fees being for outdoor operations, and not for operations in the workhouse. I know that the Board have a revised Order under consideration. In the days when those fees were laid down, the resources of the workhouse were so different from what they are now, that operations were discouraged. I presume that that was the reason why no fee was attached to them. The Poor Law Commissioners and the Poor Law Board, and the early years of the Local Government Board, covered a time in which it was very undesirable that operations should be performed in the workhouses, simply because they had not the appliances and the means of nursing which were available in the general hospitals. Therefore, the policy was to get the cases sent to the general hospitals, and that there should not be any operative surgery in the workhouses because the conditions were not favourable. Hence fees were allowed for the district medical officers, but not for the workhouse medical officers. It may have been judicious—I presume it was then—but of late years it has worked, as I think, very hardly both in the interests of the patients and in the interests of the doctors. Supposing a district medical officer finds a man with a broken leg in a very unhealthy cottage, if he sets the leg and treats the leg there, he will get his fee; if he sends the man into the hospital and is in charge of the case there, he will probably get his fee; but if he sends him to the workhouse he will not get any fee. I have taken a fracture, but a fracture is a bad illustration, because probably a fracture would have to be set immediately. But take an operation for hernia. If he sends the man into the workhouse, where he would have probably every advantage and would be likely to recover under favourable conditions, the doctor will not get the fee; but if he treats him in his own cottage, where every condition is unfavourable, he will get a fee. That is bad for the patient and bad for the doctor. If the doctor consults his own interests he will operate under unfavourable conditions; if he consults his patient's interests he will not get a fee. Of course I am speaking of a case where the doctor happens to be the district medical officer and workhouse medical officer as well. If he were only district medical officer, and he sent the patient into the workhouse, he would not be entitled to a fee.

Mr. Baldwyn Fleming.

10 April, 1906.

9306. Speaking of the improvement in workhouse nursing and so on, I think in a number of workhouses now it is possible to perform a certain amount of operative surgery where it was not possible to do so with safety, years ago?—Yes.

Development of Voluntary Hospitals.

9307. Do you find that the voluntary hospitals have extended pari passu with the development of the Poor Law?—I am hardly in a position to answer that question.

9308. I mean as regards their accommodation?—I should say probably not, but my information upon that point is not definite. Some of the voluntary hospitals are crowded on their sites, and it is difficult for them to develop satisfactorily. Probably where they have had ground and have had means to extend, they have extended in much the same manner, I should think. But I can only answer that question tentatively, as I have not precise information on the point.

9309. It would also be an affair of funds, would it not?—Quite so. With regard to the workhouse sick wards, there is no doubt now that a great deal can be done which years ago could not be thought of. To begin with, the accommodation in the wards themselves has been much improved.

Supply of dressings, drugs, &c., by Medical Officers out of salary.

9310. Do you find cases where the increased cost of dressings and appliances presses hardly on the doctors who have to supply them under their contract?—Certainly, it presses very hardly on them. I think no doctor ought to be required to supply anything; the guardians ought to supply everything that is required, or at all events ought to pay for it. I know there is a difficulty, because a great proportion of the drugs are perishable, and if the guardians had a store of drugs at the workhouse, the contents might go bad before being wanted; then there are many drugs which are seldom wanted, and which therefore might not be found just when they were wanted. It appears to me that the best solution of the case in the country workhouses is that the guardians should allow the doctor to provide what he considers necessary if he dispenses himself; if not, to obtain what is necessary from whoever does dispense his medicines, and let him send in his bill quarterly to the guardians for what is consumed or for what the doctor uses. Guardians look a little shyly on that, because, they say, he may charge for things which he does not use for us, and we have no means of testing it. I think the only answer to that is that if you have a man in office you must trust him to be honest.

Underpayment of Medical Officers.

9311. It is very important that there should be no excuse on the ground of underpayment for slackness in the performance of his duty, is it not?—Certainly, and that is why I regret so much that in many cases the medical officers are, as I consider, underpaid.

9312. Some of your guardians do provide drugs and appliances, I think?—Yes; that is done in the larger unions; but in the smaller unions, for the reason I have stated, it is really impracticable.

Cost of Medical Appliances.

9313. Have you any cases where the cost of these things has been unreasonably increased of recent years?—I do not think so. It has never been brought to my knowledge that there has been any undue cost charged to the guardians for medical appliances. There is no doubt that the cost ought to be very much higher than it has been in years gone by, and the better you make your nursing and your medical attendance, the higher the cost will be. Take merely the item of cotton-wool. The ignorant nurse might use cotton-wool over and over again, but the nurse who knows what she is doing, when it has once been used would almost necessarily throw it away. It would be the same with bandages.

Waste of Dressings, &c.

9314. I do not know whether it is within your experience that there is a distinction between some hospital-trained nurses at any rate and Poor Law trained nurses with regard to economy in the use of these articles?—Yes. Some Poor Law nurses are extremely extravagant. They may look into that point of economy more closely in the general hospitals than they do in the Poor Law hospitals, but that is a matter of administration pure and simple. In a case not long ago there seemed to me to be an undue amount of cotton wool used. The nurse wanted a little bit to put into somebody's ear, and she would take a big piece out of the package and throw away what she did not use. I mentioned it to the medical officer; he said it was quite contrary to the instructions, and that special care should be given to that point in future.

9315. A medical officer who bestowed a proper amount of time on his work would look into those things, would he not?—Certainly he should attend to these things.

Amount of time devoted by Workhouse Medical Officers to their duties.

9316. Do you have reason sometimes to be dissatisfied with the amount of time that some of the medical officers give to their work?—I will ask the Commission not to ask me to give the names, but I have in several unions within the last three or four years taken from the porter's book the length of time that the medical officer has been in the workhouse. I have found that frequently he has only been in the workhouse for a few minutes, and that he has rarely been in the workhouse for half-an-hour. When you consider that the entry in the porter's book of the time of admission to the workhouse is when the medical officer first goes into the house, that he then has to find his way to the sick wards—very likely saying "How do you do?" to the master and matron, on his way up—and may have other things besides the sick wards to look after—perhaps a child or two, and that his exit from the workhouse is only taken when he is actually leaving the workhouse; then if he has only been in the house for ten minutes or a quarter of an hour time after time, and week after week, it is very evident that he cannot examine the bodily condition of the patients and their surroundings in the way in which I should think it ought to be done.

9317. Do you find that the improvement in nursing tends to stimulate and encourage the medical officer in his work?—Very much indeed. There is no doubt that where a medical officer has got a thoroughly keen and competent nurse, he does the work a great deal more carefully than he was where he only had an ignorant pauper attendant.

Reports of Medical Officers to Guardians.

9318. Do the medical officers in your district as a rule report to the guardians anything that may be required in the sick wards, and any defects?—The medical officers are by regulation ordered to report to the guardians every half-year upon almost every detail of the sick ward administration which it is desirable that they should have special regard to. I can give you the particulars if you care to have them.

9319. They are set out in the Order, I believe?—Yes. I find that in some unions these reports are regularly made; and in some of them they are very valuable, because they are very carefully made. In others it is difficult to get them made at all; and when they are made they are so vague that they give extremely little information. I have spoken to more than one medical officer about those reports, and asked him personally to be good enough to make them. It has seemed to me that the medical officer who does not want to offend the members of his board of guardians will avoid making those reports if he thinks that the real facts would be distasteful. Besides that, the medical officer has a book which is called the medical officer's report book, and in that book he is supposed to make a report upon any detail which he wishes to bring to the attention of the guardians between the times of his half-yearly reports. So that if the medical officer really availed himself of the facilities which are not only offered to him but which it is ordered that he shall use, he has no excuse whatever for anything in the sick wards of an unsatisfactory character not having been reported to the board of guardians. If he reported the matter to the board of guardians and the guardians refused to alter it, I take it that the responsibility would be to a great extent upon them, and off his shoulders; but clearly, if there is anything unsatisfactory, he has the opportunity of reporting it, and he ought to do so.

Medical Officers' tenure of office, and motives for applying for appointment.

9320. And he is also strengthened in his position, is he not, by the fact that he is not removable except with the consent of the Local Government Board?—Quite so. But then one knows that in the country districts the medical officers are general practitioners, and probably some of their most valuable patients may be either members of the board of guardians or people who have direct connections and interests with members of the board of guardians. It is perfectly natural that a medical officer does not wish to quarrel with his bread and butter. I think this should be taken into consideration. When I have objected to the salaries paid to the medical officers, the guardians give the answer which I mentioned yesterday, "Whenever we have a vacancy we advertise, and we get any amount of fully qualified candidates, who all, until they are in office, profess to be perfectly willing to do the work to our entire satisfaction, and to do everything that is required and desirable for their patients; and it is only when they are actually in office that they suggest that they are not being properly paid. When we get applications in response to our advertisement, is it fair to the ratepayer that we should offer more than we can get the work done for?" Of course to me that answer is not conclusive. One knows that the medical men in a great many instances do not take office for the emolument which they will get from the office, but for various other considerations. Probably one of the chief considerations is to keep somebody else out. There are a certain number of men who have the medical work in a certain area between themselves, and they naturally want to keep another practitioner from coming in. That is one motive. Another motive is that holding Poor Law offices does indirectly bring them practice. The fact that they hold office gives them a certain status, a certain position; it brings them in contact with a large number of people, both poor people and well-to-do people, and indirectly therefore it may be of considerable advantage to them. Even taking all that into consideration I do not think that there is any justification for not paying a man a fair value for his work. I think it is very undesirable that medical officers should be able to say, "Well, if they find fault with me, at all events I feel this—that I am giving them more than their money's worth."

Insufficiency of Medical Officers' salaries, and proposed new method of estimating salaries.

9321. Can you suggest a remedy?—Yes. I think that it would be quite possible to fairly estimate the amount of work done by putting a fair value upon each visit, upon each bottle of medicine, and upon the ordinary items of medical practice, and so arriving at a salary which ought to be paid on an average of such considerations. I did try once or twice to work out what the actual remuneration to a medical officer was for the work that he did and if I remember aright in the one or two cases in which I tried to test it, although very imperfectly—it worked out to something under 2d. a visit and 2d. a bottle of medicine.

9322. That is for the indoor work?—Yes; the outdoor work, of course, I had no means of checking at all. But I should not like to give that as a positive statement which would be of general application.

9323. You do not know of any instance where your suggestion has been tried, do you?—No.

Infectious cases in Workhouses.

9324. In the earlier days I think there was a tendency to send infectious cases into the workhouses; I do not know whether you find that continuing in any place?—No. I am happy to say that in the counties under my observation there has been a great deal done in the provision of isolation hospitals by the sanitary authorities, and the guardians have for the most part an arrangement with the sanitary authorities that infectious fevers shall be sent to the isolation hospitals. That does not cover the whole ground. I have had within the last two or three years one or two very unfortunate instances in which smallpox cases were sent to workhouses with fatal results; at all events in one instance to a workhouse inmate—which I think is extremely unsatisfactory. It is utterly indefensible to me that because an inmate happens to be in a workhouse he should be subjected to the risk of anything so terrible as either catching smallpox or dying of it.

9325. So that the practice has entirely ceased?—Not entirely, but it has been reduced to within very narrow limits.

9326. In proportion as the sanitary authorities have made proper provision, I take it?—Yes. In some cases the guardians, before the sanitary authorities were created, built separate isolation blocks as part of the workhouse premises. Most of those, I am happy to say, have now been devoted to other purposes, because it was extremely dangerous to treat infectious fevers on the workhouse premises where the so-called infectious block was fed and worked from the workhouse stores and the workhouse kitchen, and was treated by the workhouse nursing.

Sanitary Authorities and the provision of Isolation Hospitals.

9327. Do you find the guardians and the sanitary authorities work harmoniously?—I think so. In many places the guardians themselves are the sanitary authority. But there has been a considerable difficulty in getting the sanitary authorities in some parts to provide isolation hospitals, and that difficulty has been very much increased within the last few years by the question which is now being agitated as to whether isolation hospitals are satisfactory in their results or not. That is a medical matter; but looking at it as a matter of mere convenience, there is no question of the inestimable benefit of an isolation hospital to a district. A poor man falls sick of scarlet fever or diphtheria or erysipelas or whatever it may be, in his own house, and it means misery during the whole course of his treatment and extreme anxiety as to the fate of his family, if he has to remain there: but if there be a properly equipped isolation hospital to which he can be removed, he will probably recover, and the family will be saved from the danger of taking the disease.

9328. I gathered from your evidence yesterday that you are in favour of utilising the material that the poor law authorities have for teaching nursing?—Certainly.

Poor Law Infirmaries as training schools for Nurses.

9329. Do you find in your experience that that is beneficial in the first place to the poor law; for example, that it attracts a better class of women to the service?—Yes. Where they have favourable conditions such as exist at Portsmouth and at Southampton, and on a smaller scale at Farnham, I do not think they have the smallest difficulty in getting candidates—well-educated girls who are in every way desirable—for training as nurses. They will generally take them for the first month on trial; many a girl thinks she will make an admirable nurse and is well qualified for it, but after a short time in the sick ward finds that she is quite unfit and under this arrangement she can be withdrawn. Before they get them to enter for the three years' training, they satisfy themselves that they are proper candidates and likely to be successful. The results both at Portsmouth and at Southampton, and also at Farnham, have been excellent and their nurses have turned out extremely well. Both at Portsmouth and at Southampton they have annually an independent examination with some recognised, well-known medical man as an examiner. The examination is very thorough, both on paper and by word of mouth. The results have been far beyond any expectation that I could have hoped for when they first started.

Facilities for training Nurses at Farnham.

9330. You have mentioned Farnham as a place which has done well; that is a small workhouse, I think?—Yes, Farnham is a small workhouse, but it is a workhouse where they get more than an average of operative work and acute sickness, because the union contains the greater part of Aldershot.

9331. How many beds have they in the sick wards at Farnham, roughly speaking?—I think they have from 150 to 200 beds.

Mr. Baldwyn Fleming.

10 April, 1906.

9332. So that it is quite possible for the small places to do good work in the way of training nurses?—Yes. The midwifery training at Farnham has been exceptionally good as there is a very keen medical officer who has a very keen assistant (his deputy); and these two between them regularly lecture and demonstrate, and train the nurses. They have also a good superintendent nurse there. I think up to the time when the Central Midwives Board took up the examination, they had sent up ten or eleven for the London Obstetrical Society's qualification, and they had all passed but one.

9333. How many are they able to send up under the new regulations?—They cannot send up any under the new regulations, because they have not seventy-five cases a year. Dr. Tanner is an approved trainer, I believe, but under the new regulations I do not see, notwithstanding what the deputation said at Whitehall the other day, how they can send up their candidates if that resolution as to the seventy-five cases has any force.

Decision of Midwives Board to recognise teachers as apart from training schools.

9334. Have they applied to the Central Midwives Board for recognition?—I do not think so, but I am not sure.

9335. Do you know whether that intimation that the teacher was recognised apart from the training school, was conveyed to the Boards of Guardians who had applied?—I have myself informed the medical superintendents at Portsmouth and Southampton, and I think I have told Dr. Tanner at Farnham. There has been no official intimation that I am aware of to the Poor Law authorities that the fact of the medical officer being an approved teacher will warrant their sending up candidates; and indeed that appears a little inconsistent with the resolution that they will only accept candidates from institutions with seventy-five cases a year. I do not know which is to prevail.

Nursing of out-door paupers.

9336. I think you mentioned in your report that you are not quite satisfied with the nursing of the outdoor poor?—Yes. The nursing of the outdoor poor in many places is most unsatisfactory. It is an extremely difficult problem how nursing can be satisfactorily supplied when you get into the outlying districts. Take, for instance, an outlying cottage in Dorsetshire. I happened to be at the Beaminster Board of Guardians last week, and a case came up of a poor man suffering from cancer, who was living in a cottage by himself—and who declined to come into the workhouse. The guardians had no power to require him to come into the workhouse; there was no district nurse anywhere near, and so all that the guardians could do was to authorise the relieving officer to get two women who were his nearest neighbours and who lived in cottages some little way off to go in from time to time and help the poor man as best they might. I suggested that they could perhaps get a trained nurse from some nursing institution to look after him; but the answer to that was that there was no accommodation for the nurse, as it was only a little cottage in which you could hardly expect a nurse to stay.

Dorset Health Society and Cottage Nurses.

9337. In some parts of your district I think the cottage nurse system is in operation, is it not?—In Dorsetshire the Dorset Health Society have a system of nursing, which it was intended should cover the county, and which, if it is not already doing so, I hope in course of time will do so. Their headquarters are at Dorchester, and they are, I believe, more or less in connection with the county hospital They have certain centres, one at Blandford, and I think in some other portion of the county. At those centres they keep one or two trained nurses who have some knowledge of midwifery. One of them certainly had a midwifery qualification, but I do not know whether she is still in office. Then under them they have what they call cottage nurses, and they are what you want so much in the country districts. They are not trained nurses, but they work under the supervision of a trained nurse. They do not do the trained nursing work, but they do the general work of getting the patient in a condition to benefit by trained nursing,—that is, they clean the cottage, they are willing to live in the cottage, they will do the cooking, they will keep the windows open, they will take the sack of straw out of the chimney and clear out the accumulation from under the bed, they will wash the people, and see that the beds are properly made and properly sheeted, and that the patients are properly dressed, properly washed and kept clean. All these details they are able to do just as well as a trained nurse would do it, and they relieve the trained nurse from that work. They are willing to stay and live in the cottage as long as their presence there is required.

9338. That is to say, they cover ground which really the trained nurse very often cannot cover?—Yes, and do things on which she would be wasting her energy and her knowledge if she had to do them.

9339. You think these cottage nurses render very useful aid?—They are most valuable. I only wish the system could be generally adopted.

Possibility of using Workhouse Nurses for out-door poor.

9340. Do you think the small country workhouses, if they had trained head nurses, might do something in the way of teaching that sort of woman in their locality?—Yes. I think there might be a great deal done in that direction. I feel very strongly myself that a good deal of out-door nursing might be supplied from the workhouse. I do not know whether under the Board's present regulations such an arrangement would be permissible, but it appears to me to be very desirable that in any workhouse which is large enough to carry it out, there should be one or two extra nurses appointed, and those nurses should take a rota of out-door work. I think that would be very good for the nurses as well as very good for the out-door sick.

Subscriptions to Nursing Associations.

9341. Do your guardians require the relieving officers to report to them cases which have not been properly nursed, or where the surroundings are such that the case could not be properly cared for?—As a rule I think those matters are reported. The relieving officer, if he finds that he has a case which cannot be properly attended to, informs the guardians to that effect, and then they do the best they can. In a great many of the unions now, I am happy to say they subscribe to district nursing associations. Take the Salisbury union for instance. There are district nurses in a great many of the parishes, although not quite in all, and in every parish in which there is a district nurse the guardians subscribe towards that district nurse. In return for that subscription, the district nurse attends any pauper receiving out-door relief who requires nursing. In the Warminster union they have recently gone one better. There there are one or two district nursing associations and the guardians subscribe to the nursing association and in addition to that they consent to pay the nurses for their attendance, and there is also a system by which a nurse if required may reside in the cottage, and the guardians also have the advantage of that, if they require it.

Nursing arrangements for out-door sick in Warminster Union.

Treatment of sick paupers in special institutions.

9342. Do the district medical officers report to the guardians on cases that they think should be taken into an institution? To some extent they do. One very often sees it, but that is chiefly for special affections. They suggest that the case should be sent to an eye hospital, or to Bath, or one of the other watering places for special courses of treatment.

Attendance of Medical Officers at Relief Committees.

9343. Do the district medical officers ever attend the relief committees?—Sometimes, if they have any case which they wish to bring before the guardians, they will attend and tell the guardians what they think ought to be done. At a board of guardians I have often seen the medical officer come in with regard to a case, or to ask the guardians if they want to see him, or the guardians may send to him and ask him if there is anything he wants to say to them, if he happens to be in the house at the time they are meeting.

Loan relief Portsmouth

9345. Is much relief given on loan in your district?—Very little, I am afraid. You will see in the statement at the end of my memorandum the amount recovered.

9346. I was going to draw attention to that. Portsmouth appears to stand out rather remarkably?—Yes, Portsmouth administer carefully from that point of view.

9347. They apparently recover a great deal from the paupers' relatives?—Yes. With regard to that column, which comes to a very considerable total, most of it is repayment towards the cost of lunatics in asylums. Under our system of management of lunacy in the country, there is no intermediate establishment between the costly private lunatic asylum and the county asylum. If there were, a great many of these people would not be paupers, and they would be paid for by their own relations. But you cannot get a case into a private asylum under somewhere about £100 or £150 a year, and they cannot afford that; therefore they have to send them to the pauper lunatic asylum. So they pay in some instances the full cost of their maintenance, and in other instances only part of the cost.

Conditions in Portsmouth Union: Government and railway property.

9348. Is a large proportion of the rateable value of Portsmouth represented by Government property?—A considerable proportion is, but I cannot tell you off hand what is the proportion, although I can get you the information, if you care for it.

9349. It is to be had, is it?—Yes, no doubt.

9350. Is the Government in any way represented on the board of guardians?—No, nor are the railways. They are not directly represented on boards of guardians, although they are the largest ratepayers of any, probably.

Effect of administration on pauperism.

9351. Do you find that retired service men come on to the board of guardians at Portsmouth?—To a certain extent, yes.

9352. (Miss Hill.) Am I right in thinking that Farnham has a much greater equality between its indoor and outdoor poor than the other districts?—Yes.

9353. Why is that?—Because it is the best administered union in the district.

9354. You spoke yesterday about certain unions, such as Atcham, Bradfield, Whitechapel, and so on, as being specially well administered. I am afraid there are not a very great many of those altogether in the country, and we have been going on for seventy years nearly since the old Poor Law Commissioners. I suppose the great difference in the amount of pauperism is, in your opinion, due to the different administration in the different unions?—Certainly.

Abuses in granting "sudden and urgent necessity" relief, and difficulties in checking same.

9355. I suppose there is a certain amount of elasticity in the law, because the guardians have had very responsible work to do, and it has been felt that they could not be tied down by very hard and fast rules legally with regard to relief, but certainly there is very wide latitude now. Do you yourself see any way in which either the moral courage or the wisdom of the guardians could be strengthened by the law? For instance, take such a thing as the sudden and urgent relief—a good deal is done under that head I imagine, in a great many unions, when the cases are not really those which require sudden and urgent relief. What really touches that—does it come under the auditor?—It does come under the auditor, but unfortunately sudden and urgent relief is very often dealt with in a way which is not legal. Sudden and urgent relief is not infrequently given by the overseer, and then instead of charging it to his parish accounts as he should do—because all relief given by overseers, except orders upon the doctor and to the workhouse is a parish and not a union charge, or should be—he hands it over to the relieving officer, who enters it in his application and report book, and thereby brings it in as a union charge instead of a parish charge. The Local Government Board are expressly prohibited by statute from interfering with any individual case, so that although the rules of the Local Government Board prohibit outdoor relief, there are that series of exceptions with which you are no doubt acquainted which practically oust the rule, and as the Local Government Board are prohibited from interfering in any individual case, their control is practically nil. The auditor can surcharge if he sees a case which is flagrantly either extravagant or dishonest, but short of that, there is practically no check.

9356. I daresay you will have come across cases, for instance, where sudden and urgent relief has been given for weeks?—Yes, for many weeks.

9357. Is there no possibility of dealing with that? It is, as you say, a distinct breach certainly of the spirit of the law?—Yes, it is.

Mr. Baldwyn Fleming.

10 April, 1906.

9358. Do you see any hope of dealing with that?—One has been looking to the general education and wisdom of the people to teach them that such relief does not do the poor any good, but that view is not growing in favour as rapidly as one could wish. Do you see any machinery that could be brought to bear?—I think that there is a certain amount of education going on still.

9359. So do I?—The influence of the Poor Law conferences has undoubtedly been wholesome, and has produced good. The pauperism in my own district is very much lower now than it was thirty years ago. The average pauperism for the district is under 3 per cent.; and the average pauperism for the whole country is under 3 per cent.

9360. I suppose the problem is most acute in the towns?—Yes.

Suggestion to give Local Government Board power to deal with individual cases of relief.

9361. Do you see anything that can deal with that, except the gradual education of the world in general, both inside and outside boards of guardians?—Unless further power were given to the Local Government Board, I think it is very difficult to see how by regulation you can interfere with local administration. Whether such a power could be with advantage given to the Board is extremely open to question, I think. It would create a large amount of ill-feeling among guardians to be over-ridden by the central authority in the actual dealing with individual cases.

9362. Do you think the cure would be worse than the evil?—I think it would. What one really wants is to get a board of guardians who are thoroughly alive to the responsibilities of their position, and who understand the problem which they have to solve. As I ventured to express it yesterday, pauperism has become so much a habit with a certain class that it is accepted almost as a matter of course. But it is by no means as prevalent as it is supposed to be. I have heard it said, and said recently, that the working classes have nothing to look to but either out-door relief or the workhouse when their working days are over. That is a contention which is far too broad. The mere fact that the percentage of pauperism to population in my counties is only 2·8, shows conclusively that the enormous majority of the population do not become paupers. But so far as the influence of the Local Government Board goes, I say with all deference, but I feel it very strongly, that the Board themselves have consistently and loyally acted upon a certain policy, and that if they have failed to succeed, it has not been from any want of effort or principle on their part, but simply because the conditions which they cannot control have over-ridden the view which they would have wished taken of the line which guardians ought to have adopted.

Importance of ad hoc guardians.

9363. I gathered from something you said yesterday that you are distinctly of opinion that it is better to have a board of guardians elected for this particular object?—I regard the work of boards of guardians as so extremely important that anything which can be done to enhance and enlarge the position and responsibility of the guardians appears to me to be clearly the right line of action to take. I think the more important and the higher the position which you can assign to boards of guardians the better your results are likely to be.

9364. And you also would feel that they are to a very great extent the body that is dealing with people rather than with things?—Certainly.

9365. Whereas you have one class of men to see to your roads or drains; you would choose another sort of persons to attend to your people; there is, of course, a great deal of business connected with boards of guardians, but after all they deal with a particular locality and with people and families?—Boards of guardians have to deal with the population itself, and in their administration they will create either good or bad principles in guiding the actions of the people. Other experts have to deal with drains, they have to deal with water supplies, they have to deal with gas, they have to deal with this, that, and the other. Those are all items connected with the welfare and the lives of the people. But the great thing to me is to inculcate proper principles as to the action which should guide the life itself; and that is what boards of guardians have to do, and therefore I regard their function as much more important than any other.

9366. And you would be sorry to see it transferred to any body covering a larger area and dealing with a vast number of other things of a very different character; I mean, you would not wish to see it passed to the county councils, for instance?—No, I should be extremely sorry to see what I consider the most important of all public duties transferred to a committee or sub-committee of some body which has endless other things to deal with.

Mr. Baldwyn Fleming.

10 April, 1906.

Administrative effect of "expert" board of guardians.

9367. (Mr. Bentham.) I understood you to say yesterday that if a Board of experts had to deal with the Poor Law, in course of time pauperism could be abolished?—I think it would gradually get very near to extinction. You would never absolutely abolish it, because there are those who by nature are physically and mentally incompetent, and who have not people able to maintain them; those you would have to deal with. The problem of the unemployed, of course, you might still have with you in every congested area.

9368. If your contention was correct, then a Board of Guardians as you have just described them, elected ad hoc, is not the proper body to deal with it, if the object is dispauperisation?—But how so? The very object of having a Board of Guardians ad hoc to deal with it would be dispauperisation.

9369. Is that the way you would get a body of experts? Do you ever hope to get a body of experts by the present system of election to Boards of Guardians?—It is to be hoped so. What you want is a body of experts for your Board of Guardians, who really are able to work with knowledge and with discretion and upon proper principles.

9370. You really expect to get that?—I think you are much more likely to get it by a Board of Guardians who are appointed for that special purpose, than by a Committee of another body who have got a large number of other duties thrown upon them.

Nursing of out door sick paupers.

9371. (Miss Hill.) With regard to out-door nursing, I suppose that when people require elaborate nursing, you would work rather in the direction of bringing them into the house to that end, than in the direction of establishing a whole Poor Law system of nursing outside in the out of the way parts?—Yes. But I do not suggest the establishment of any Poor Law system; I simply suggest an adaptation of the present system which would cover the need. There is no power now to bring people into the workhouse against their will. As to those who will come in, there is no difficulty in dealing with them; the difficulty is in dealing with those who are not willing to come in.

Power to compulsorily bring infirm into workhouse.

9372. Or who are too ill to be moved?—Yes.

9373. Would you be in favour of some compulsory power of bringing people in, who could not be properly nursed in their own outlying places?—Yes, certainly; but that is a power that would have to be exercised very seldom.

9374. But it is a very important power when it has to be exercised?—I think so. I should be glad to see that power given.

Increasing opportunities for thrift among women and others.

9375. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) I think you said yesterday that though the past generation had no opportunity of providing for its old age, the present generation would have no excuse in its old age if it came on the rates?—Yes.

9376. Would you apply that to the women as well as to the men?—To a certain extent women are now obtaining opportunities of getting into friendly societies which did not exist in the past, and I hope that those facilities will be very largely extended. A good many societies already have women's lodges as well as children's lodges, and the children's lodges take both boys and girls I believe.

Savings of agricultural labourers at Exeter in 1834, and of women now.

9377. Dealing with the question of women's earnings, not with the better class, but with the lowest class of women's earnings, do you think they at present admit of savings?—I know it is an unpopular thing to say, but I do think so. You may remember the passage in the report of the Poor Law Commissioners in 1834, in which they said they asked the question, not specially with regard to women, whether it was possible to save out of ordinary wages, and they almost invariably got the answer No. They then looked to the returns from the Savings Banks, and if I remember aright, in Exeter alone they found that £70,000 had been saved almost entirely by agricultural labourers, although everybody to whom they had applied, had told them that it was impossible for the agricultural labourer to save anything.

9378. But where you get women earning, as many thousands of them do, about 5s. a week only, do you think you would still apply that same remark?—That depends entirely upon whether the woman is self-dependent, or whether she is working simply as a member of a family. I do not know that you will find many single women who are living by themselves and are only earning 5s. a week.

Relief in aid of women's wages.

9379. I am afraid there are very many living in that way, but who have their earnings supplemented from some other sources?—Quite so.

9380. Have you any opinion about the question of supplementing women's wages by means of out-relief?—Certainly. It is as bad as anything possibly can be. It is that to a great extent which keeps down the rate of wages.

9381. I see you say there are many more old men than old women in the workhouses?—It is a curious fact, but it is so.

Proportion of male and female in-and out-door paupers.

9382. I have been looking through the returns of female and male pauperism, and I find there are about twice as many female paupers over sixty as there are male paupers over sixty?—I do not know whether that may be attributable to what happens in the towns, but I have got here the last returns from every union in my district, and if you will allow me I will just read two or three. In the little Dorsetshire union of Beaminster there are thirty-six men and seventeen women (not able-bodied) in the workhouse, at Blandford there are forty-four men and twenty-three women, at Bridport there are fifty men and twenty women, at Cerne there are twelve men and seven women; and at Dorchester there are forty-one men and twenty-seven women; and so it goes on, all through the list.

9383. If you take that in connection with the fact that there are about twice as many female paupers, taking it roughly, that means that the guardians give out-relief much more freely to women than to men, does it not?—I think it is so. Women are able to do what men are not. When the ordinary agricultural labourer is past his work, there is very little he can turn to, but a woman can generally get an opportunity of looking after children or helping in a household in one way or another. She knows a little cooking, she knows how to look after children, she knows how to clean a room, she knows how to sew; and she can help her neighbours much more, and can get a certain amount of income from charing and in other ways which men cannot do, or at all events do not do.

9384. Still, is there not a general feeling that the women ought to have out-relief more easily than the men?—No, I do not think there is. Again, when women do get ill, they do not give up in the way that men do. They are accustomed to nursing, and they know what to do. Now a man does not; a man gets ill and he goes off to the workhouse at once, if he has not got a wife to look after him.

Relief in aid of women's wages.

9385. But you will agree with me, will you not, that probably the fact that out-relief is given very freely to women is keeping their wages down?—Undoubtedly.

9386. Is it mostly agricultural work that the women do in your district?—I suppose it would be. I have very little manufacturing in my district. Except just in the towns, there is practically no manufacturing work open to women. There is a certain amount of gloving in the neighbourhood of Sherborne, and the women do that.

9387. Would the guardians actually supplement the women's earnings either in agricultural work or in this gloving work?—Yes, undoubtedly; if they do not earn enough to keep themselves, the guardians would give outdoor relief.

9388. You say that quite as a matter of course?—Yes, and they do it as a matter of course. I think that it is a very great mistake. If I had the administration, I should take those cases into the workhouse. The result would be that the wages would go up until they were sufficient to keep them. Anybody who is in receipt of half-a-crown a week outdoor relief can take work at so much less than a person who has got nothing but the work to depend upon.

Proportion of male and female in-and out-door paupers.

9389. Can you tell us what is the general proportion between men and women as regards indoor and outdoor relief?—I am sorry I have no information on the point.

Loan relief and recovery of maintenance.

9390. In Section 20 of your memorandum you say "Two other important points are relief on loan and maintenance of relatives. Upon both of these much more might be done than is done." Do you mean that much more might be done by local guardians or that much more might be done from the central office?—I mean much more might be done by the guardians. The guardians I think have as much power as under the present condition of the law can be given them under both heads. The law as regards the maintenance by relatives is in an unsatisfactory condition, because the maintenance by relatives cannot be enforced without their first becoming paupers. Under the old law, the 43rd of Elizabeth, it was different. Anybody then who was destitute and had relations capable of maintaining him, could apply to the Justices, and the Justices could make such order as might seem to them good. But the law has now been so altered that, before the maintenance can be enforced, the person must become chargeable to the Union, and the guardians must then apply to the Justices for an order unless the person consents to an order, so that nobody now can enforce maintenance by relatives without first becoming a pauper, and the machinery of the law being put into operation by the guardians.

9391. So that so far you would like to see the law altered?—Certainly I should. I referred to that in one of my annual reports to the Local Government Board some years ago, and I believe a Bill was actually drafted and introduced into Parliament, but it went no further. It was not drafted by the Local Government Board; it was privately introduced.

After-careers of Poor Law children.

9392. You told us a good deal about the children going into the Army and Navy: what about the children who are put out to trades by the guardians; do you find any difficulties there?—No, but that is not nearly so much done as it used to be. Very few children in the country districts are now apprenticed, although that used to be common. I am sorry that has been given up so much as it has.

9393. Do they go into domestic service, or else on to the farms?—Yes.

9394. Is one of the difficulties about putting them out to trades that there is nowhere for the children to live while they are learning a trade?—That is a very old difficulty.

9395. It is met in some places by working boys' Homes, is it not?—Yes.

Relief to Poor Law children earning wages.

9396. Have you anything of that kind?—No, not in my district. The Local Government Board in years gone by have been very much pressed to sanction their living in the workhouse whilst they are working outside, and also to sanction the grant of a certain amount of outdoor relief to pay for their lodging whilst they are not earning sufficient outside to maintain themselves. In some instances I believe the Board have consented, but reluctantly, and it is clearly fraught with considerable danger.

Number of children in Poor Law institutions.

9397. In one of the appendices to your memorandum you give a Table which is headed, "Number of children in the workhouses"; but I take it that is not quite accurate?—It ought to be "In the workhouses and other Poor Law institutions." That table includes children in the district schools, and also the children in the Christchurch Cottage Homes, indeed any children who are in Poor Law institutions. It does not include boarded-out children I think, or at all events not those who are boarded-out outside the union.

9398. (Dr. Downes.) Would it include the sick children in the infirmaries or sick wards?—Probably it would.

The question of deterrence of relief to children and of relief in general.

9399. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) I think it was suggested yesterday with respect to the children that you were unable to carry out the policy of deterrent conditions, but I suppose you would agree with me that the deterrent conditions should apply to the parents and not to the children?—Certainly.

9400. So that what we do for the children may still be quite consistent with that policy?—Yes; and I do not think I agreed that we were not unable to carry out the deterrent conditions even there, because the very fact of their being in Poor Law institutions is in itself a deterrent condition, from my point of view.

9401. Supposing the good condition of the children did tempt parents to desert their children, you would at once be able to punish the parents? The law provides for it.

Possibility of eradicating pauperism.

9402. Something was said yesterday about stamping out pauperism within a certain number of years, which does not sound a very pleasant process. Do you think it would be as well described, perhaps, as "the encouragement or independence?" I am not afraid of the term "stamping out pauperism." Pauperism is a terrible evil, and it would be an immense benefit to stamp it out. I do not know that I used the term "stamp it out."

9403. I do not think it was used by you?—If I had used it, I should not reproach myself for having used an improper term, I think.

9404. As a matter of fact, a wise board of guardians is very largely constructive in its policy, is it not, and it does not practice any stamping out process? I mean such work as we do with children, and even such work as making careful inquiries and giving adequate relief is a constructive work, is it not?—Certainly. I am quite at one with you.

9405. Even the refusal of outdoor relief is not meant in any way to penalise the people who apply for it?—Not the least in the world.

9406. It is simply carrying out a definite policy for the encouragement of independence?—Yes, and for the good of the people.

Value of consistent policy as to relief and means of ensuring the same.

9407. Do you agree with me that the importance of a definite and consistent policy in a district is so very great that it would be almost better to have a medium sort of policy, consistently carried out, than to be changing about, so that many people would not understand what you were doing?—Clearly that is most important; but I should be very sorry to see any drastic alteration introduced which would create even present hardship. The great thing is that you should teach the proper principles which ought to be followed, and then let them be gradually worked up to.

9408. How is this affected by the constitution of the boards and the fact that the guardians change every three years; does that bring much uncertainty into the policy?—No. In the country districts there are very few changes: there are elections, but the same persons go in time after time in the large majority of cases.

9409. How would it work as between a whole board giving relief and different committees giving relief, from the point of view of a consistent policy?—If the relief were given by the whole board, who have a definite policy and who are working up to it, I think the whole board would do it very much better than if you divided them into three or four sections, each of which might take its own line. The whole board will keep the policy in its hands, and will hold the reins very much tighter than if you allow three or four smaller bodies to do the same work.

9410. But if you get a very large board, does that not mean that sometimes one set of people and sometimes another set of people really influence and control its decisions?—Then your definite policy goes. If you keep to your policy, I think your board will do it very much better than the committees will. You will have the same changes on the committees and the same difference in tendencies as you will have on the board, I think.

9411. Do you think that the whole board is more likely to follow a consistent policy?—Yes. I think the whole board depends very much on the chairman. If you have a chairman who exercises the authority which he ought to exercise, and has a definite policy himself, you will find that he will keep things much more on the line, than will be the case if you divide the responsibility among committees.

Size of boards of guardians.

9412. Have you any boards in your district which are unduly large, do you think?—I do not think so.

9413. How do they run—about forty members?—No. There are a few biggish boards. I have never taken the numbers out, but I should think the average attendance would be somewhere about a dozen or fifteen, taking the whole district.

9414. You suggested yesterday that the ideal relieving officer would have no pauper in his district; could you suggest what would be the lines upon which the ideal relieving officer would carry on his work, and what would be the main difference between his work and that of the un-ideal relieving officer ?—Take the ordinary relieving officer. Somebody goes to him and says, " I am destitute and I want relief ; " he says, " All right, give me your name and address and I will come and see you." He takes the name and address, and he goes and sees him, and he gets the particulars for the application and report book. He makes very perfunctory inquiries in too many cases. He puts down just sufficient in the application and report book to fill up the columns with the particulars there required, and then he presents the case to the guardians, and they say, " Very well, this is a case which must have its 2s. 6d. or 1s. 6d.," whatever it may be. Your ideal relieving officer, when he goes to the home, will find out every possible incident connected with the families—what other resources may be available, whether the applicant can be got into an institution, whether work can be found for any of the children, and a thousand and one incidents by which the inquiry may lead to the solution of the case without its becoming a pauper. He may find that there is a charity applicable. He may find that some of the children may be got into an institution. He may find that the applicant himself may be got into a hospital where he may be cured quickly.

Mr. Baldwyn Fleming.

10 April, 1906.

Functions of relieving officer as to inquiry into applications for relief.

9415. So that you would throw a great deal of the constructive work upon a good relieving officer as well ?—Certainly ; and some of them do it.

9416. Do some of them actually do this work ?—Yes, a very few do, so far as time permits.

9417. Do guardians themselves ever do any of this constructive work ?—A great deal : Take Farnham, for instance, which has been referred to by Miss Hill. They have an admirable institution by the side of the board of guardians' work. They call it a benevolent fund. This benevolent fund is subscribed to by people who live within the district, and if any case goes before the board of guardians which they think the application of the Poor Law works hardly upon, and which is evidently a deserving case, but only of temporary distress, and if they want to save the person becoming a pauper—if, for instance, it is the case of a man who can be got to work by purchasing tools for him—they apply to the benevolent fund, and the benevolent fund gives what is necessary, possibly on loan. The man having got his tools and to work, would gradually repay them back. Colonel Fitzroy, who is the treasurer of the Benevolent Fund, told me recently that in no year had they spent more than £20.

Operation of "Benevolent Fund" at Farnham and elsewhere.

9418. If the expenditure is so small, is there any reason why other boards of guardians should not have annexed to them some small fund of that kind ?—It is a question whether it ought to be done at the cost of the rates. That is purely voluntary.

9419. And I mean that the fund should be entirely voluntary ?—It would be a most excellent thing. Mr. Bland Garland told me that when he started the reformed administration in the Bradfield Union he put aside £100 to meet cases of that kind, and that he had only used a small amount of it.

9420. As a matter of fact, it is mostly a little advice and sympathy that is helpful to the people ?—Quite so.

9421. Then there is really no reason why, even in the poorest districts, there should not be some kind of organisation of a voluntary character working side by side with the Poor Law system ?—There is every reason why there should be, if you could only get the people to do it.

9422. There is no reason in the shape of want of funds that need stand in the way, because the funds that would be required are so small that they could always be forthcoming ?—I should think so. There is an enormous amount of charity given away, and if that charity were utilised instead of being wasted, it would much more than do what is required in the direction that we are now considering.

9423. (Sir Samuel Provis.) With regard to the giving of relief by the overseers, does that prevail to much extent in your district ?—No.

Relief by overseers, and its proposed abolition.

9424. Supposing the power of the overseers to give relief were abolished, do you think any practical hardship would result ?—I do not think it would. The guardian of the parish, I think, should then have the power given to him.

9425. So that any case of very immediate urgency might be dealt with without having recourse to the relieving officer ?—Quite so.

9426. Would you see a risk in a particular guardian having any power of that kind ?—I should still guard it by what is now the law, namely, that relief so given in sudden and urgent necessity and without the intervention of the relieving officer should be a parish charge and not a union charge. I think that would be sufficient.

9427. Turning to another question, you have suggested that the Local Government Board, if the guardians did not carry out certain minor work, might send down somebody or other to do it ?—Yes.

Proposed increased powers to Local Government Board to deal with guardians' default.

9428. Would that not lead to some friction ?—No doubt it would, but I think the fact of the power being in existence would prevent the necessity for its exercise, except in the rarest of cases.

9430. You have considerable Government property and railway property in your district, you say ?—Yes.

Effect on administration of Government or railway property in a district.

9431. Do you think that the fact that in the case of Government property the Government practically pays the rates, in any way tends to extravagance on the part of the guardians ?—No. I have never found anything to suggest that to me.

9432. Or that the fact that a railway company may be very largely contributors to the rates makes any difference ?—That has not come under my observation. I do think it is a hardship that the railway companies have no direct representation on the boards of guardians where they are very large ratepayers, but that is another question.

Franchise for corporations.

9433. Would you say in a case of that sort they ought to be able to appoint somebody to vote on their behalf at the election of members, or something of that kind ? —Yes.

Provision for old age by friendly societies.

9434. (Mr. Chandler.) In paragraph 7 of your memorandum, dealing with the aged poor, you mention the fact that the friendly societies are seeking a solution of this question and are making provisions to that end ; do you know of any definite instance where any friendly society has already done that ?—Yes. The Hampshire Friendly Society makes special provision for an old age pension as well as for sickness. There is a friendly society I know in Suffolk, which has to a considerable extent been influenced by Mr. John Martineau, and which also makes provision for old age pensions as well as for sickness. I think you will find, though I am speaking rather off my book now, that some of the great societies, such as the Hearts of Oak, the Foresters, and that class of society, have lodges which make special provision for old age pensions. The Hampshire Friendly Society certainly do that, and so does the society in Suffolk ; I think the Wiltshire Society also.

9435. That would necessitate, I assume, rather a heavy contribution per week ?—No ; it is something small.

9436. Is that so ?—Yes, if the payment begins early in life, because the number that survive to come upon the fund is comparatively small.

9437. (Mrs Bosanquet.) Is it 2½ per week, or something like that ?—I do not think that the separate payment for old age is as much as that. The Hampshire Friendly Society have a very careful arrangement, and you can pay for the pension to begin at the age you choose, according to their tables.

9438. (Mr. Chandler.) You say " It is, however, fairly evident that any person of ordinary mental and physical capacity can now provide for his necessities arising from sickness or accident without coming upon the rates." I assume that you have taken into consideration that that would mean that you must join at the earliest possible age in life in order to insure that?—Yes; everybody ought to join as a child, and then as he gets older he could go into the adult lodges. If one begins as a child, the contribution is very small.

9439. But if he leaves it too late in life, he cannot get into these societies?—No, not over 40. When a man gets to 40, of course the payment is very onerous, and it is much more difficult to get in then, because it is more difficult to prove that you are sound. But for the ordinary population, within a few years, if not now, I take it that the friendly societies will cover the ground. The real difficulty is with those who are physically and mentally afflicted.

9440. Without some system of compulsory insurance there would still be a very large number outside and unprovided for, would there not?—I should be very glad indeed to see a system of compulsory insurance, if it could be introduced into England.

9441. You would favour such a system?—Certainly, but I see the difficulties of it.

9442. In paragraph 12 you speak of the Local Government Act of 1894, and of the changes that were affected under that Act, which in your opinion have not been anything like an improvement in regard to the constitution of boards of guardians. Can you tell me in what way the Act has proved detrimental; has it been in regard to the personnel of the boards?—I think so.

9443. Do you think that the boards are not now as good administrators as they were formerly?—Yes.

9444. Yet the opportunity of re-election is still open to those who originally served?—Clearly it is, but at the same time it is not open in the way in which they will take it. A gentleman of high position in a county does not care to go canvassing to his own dependents, his own servants and his own tradespeople and begging them to vote for him. Practically it prevents many gentlemen from coming forward for election where a contest is probable. There are a good many gentlemen on the boards of guardians in my district, but they stand and are elected and have been elected for years to represent their own parishes. But under the ordinary incidents of a contested election a gentleman does not care to stand. Besides, even if he does get in, he probably keeps out somebody who is valuable.

9445. Prior to the passing of that act, of course there were fewer changes, and there was continuity of service?—Yes, you had one section of the board of guardians who could keep the policy going, no matter what changes there might be in the elective element.

9446. Had that not also its disadvantages, inasmuch as there is a danger in security of tenure of office causing people to be disinclined to adapt themselves to a given policy?—Yes, but the ex officio members were never in a majority. I do not suppose there was a board amongst the boards I ever had the honour of attending, in which the ex officios formed the majority, although I never took out the statistics on that particular point.

9447. I have in my mind that Lancashire incident of which you spoke, of a board of guardians who were constituted largely of employers giving out-door relief in order to keep their hands together pending the settlement of a strike or lock-out; that was purely a wrong act on their part, I take it?—From my point of view clearly so, but I think it was not infrequently done in those times.

9448. (Chairman.) That is an important point; you think it was not infrequently done?—Yes. When I was up in the North 30 years ago I suspected—of course it was a thing you could never prove—that relief was given very freely in cases of strike or lock-out, in order to keep the hands together; and I know my then chief, Mr. Cane, who was the inspector for the district, held the same view. He and I talked it over many times.

9449. (Mr. Booth.) Would it not also keep the strikers together?—Perhaps, but it kept the hands together.

9450. (Mr. Chandler.) In paragraphs 14 and 15 you speak of the diminution of the rural population and of the diminution of labour through the development of machinery which is constantly being brought to greater perfection, and was doing the work that was formerly done by the hand of man; might not that displacement of labour be one of the chief causes towards increasing pauperism?—No doubt. There is an influence in that direction which has not yet found its level, and I suppose will not do for some time. You must remember what happened after the introduction of machinery in the textile manufactures, and in agricultural work even. For instance, the riots in Wiltshire when agricultural machinery was introduced.

9451. Men have been displaced, and I do not think the resources of other employment have kept pace with their displacement, so there is still a very large surplus of unemployed men?—Yes, but there are new industries being created almost every day. It is impossible to put back the hand of time. You can never prevent machinery developing and doing work which was formerly done by the hands of man. Those men have to find other work to do or they have to remain idle.

9452. I do not say this displacement is the cause, only I thought it might perhaps have an influence?—No doubt it has an influence, which certainly accounts for some of the difficulty of to-day.

9453. Respecting the Employers' Liability Act, in answer to the Chairman you expressed an opinion that the operation of that Act had a tendency to increase pauperism by throwing different workmen upon the streets, if I may use that term?—Yes.

9454. Have you any definite instance of that, or is it simply a general opinion which you have formed?—I have seen several instances in which men have asserted that they could not get employment because they were now getting on for fifty. It stands to reason, because a man getting on for fifty is not active enough to avoid danger which a man of twenty-five or thirty would be able to avoid.

9455. Might not there be other causes? You mentioned that at Southampton Docks they refuse to employ men who are unfit; would that not apply to all classes of employers of labour?—I was speaking of men who were otherwise physically fit and who were willing and eager for work, but whose age alone stood as a bar to their employment. I will tell you of a case which was stated to me not long ago. A man's employer died, and the result was that the hands were all thrown out of work, and one of the men who was very nearly fifty tried to get other work, but could not. So long as his old employer lived and he was able to work he could be at work, but because he was fifty he could not get into a new employment.

9456. That would apply throughout the country, irrespective of the Employers' Liability Act, would it not?—The suggestion was the Employers' Liability Act, rightly or wrongly.

9457. In connection with that subject you also mentioned trade unions as being responsible for the increase of pauperism; that was somewhat explained in further replies to Mrs. Webb, but I suppose you have no definite idea how or by what means these increase pauperism?—I answered that as well as I could to Mrs. Webb. There is no doubt that if anybody who is not absolutely able-bodied does get out of employment, he finds it very difficult to get back into employment.

9458. Apart from fixing a minimum wage for competent men, are you aware that all the principal unions have provisions for old men accepting such wages as their earning capabilities will admit?—So I was told yesterday, but I am bound to say that I have not found it in practice. I should like very much to have further information upon that. The practical result of what I have seen has not led me to believe that that is so; it may be so in theory, but in practice I have not seen that apply.

9459. Do you speak generally of the country of your own particular district only?—Of my own particular district.

9460. Your particular district is largely rural, and as you know there is no such thing now as trade unionism among agricultural labourers?—There are two big towns in my district, and it is in those towns that the cases that have come under my observation have occurred. I cannot profess to speak with anything like accuracy, or to state a positive opinion upon the point;

Effect on pauperism of Workmen's Compensation Acts, &c.

Effect of trade unions on pauperism.

Mr. Baldwyn Fleming.

10 April, 1906.

the result of my observation in watching the cases that come for relief made me include that with the other influences referred to in that paragraph.

9461. I assume also that you are aware that trade unions provide for old age in the shape of superannuation, at least that is so with the principal unions which have to do with the towns of Southampton and Portsmouth ?—Some do.

9462. The engineers, the joiners, the shipwrights, and the boiler-makers all provide it, do they not ?—Yes, but the conditions are somewhat strict. I do not want to enter into details, because I am not master of them. So far as my experience goes, every man does not as a matter of course come upon the superannuation fund ; he has to fulfil very close conditions in order to entitle him to come upon it.

9463. My only desire is, as a set-off to the statement which you have made in your evidence, to put on the other side of the ledger the fact that they are doing a very great deal to prevent people from becoming paupers ?—All that I know ; and nobody appreciates more highly than I do the work which is done by trade unions. So far as, from my point of view, it is legitimate.

Removal from office of officers by Local Government Board.

9464. (Mr. Loch.) You have referred to the question of the dismissal of officers in connection with the Local Government Board. The dismissal question, I suppose, is settled by Article 187 of the Consolidated Order of 1847. I notice that the note of comment on the Order in Macmorran and Lushington's " Poor Law General Orders " is, " It has been held that under this enactment " that is, the Act of 1834, " the Poor Law Commissioners had a discretion to remove a relieving officer, though no charge had been made against, nor any notice given to him, nor any opportunity afforded him for making any defence " ; and then cases are quoted in support of that. Would it not be possible to resume that position so far as the Local Government Board are concerned ?—I think it would be very difficult with the officers now in office, because although that may have been a power which was exercised in those days, it certainly has not been exercised for a great many years past.

9465. I understand that the point of your remark is that unsuitable men stay on ?—That is so.

9466. And are undismissable ?—Yes, unsuitable men are appointed in the first instance, and they are kept on afterwards and they are practically undismissable, unless they do something sufficiently contrary to the regulations or to their own good character to show that they are unfit to hold office.

9467. Could you try to meet the difficulty in some other way ? The phrase in the Order is, " Every officer appointed to or holding any office under this Order, other than a medical officer, shall continue to hold the same until he die or resign, or be removed by the Commissioners, or be proved to be insane, to the satisfaction of the Commissioners." Could we require that he shall perform his service to the satisfaction of the Commissioners ?—There is no doubt that the Local Government Board have power to remove any Poor Law officer, if they chose to do it, by Order, at any time and without assigning any reason. They have the legal power, but as a matter of practice they would not enforce it, and never have enforced it, simply because a man does not do his work to the satisfaction of the inspector of the district.

Question of increasing powers of inspectors.

9468. Could we not take the inspector, or some other authority, as the test, and say that if a man did not do his work satisfactorily, according to the standard of good work, then the Local Government Board would intervene ? —It would be very difficult, because, as a rule, he is acting under the instructions and according to the wishes of his own guardians. He is the officer of the guardians, and not of the Board.

9469. But I would urge that, in view of a possible reform, it might be desirable to give the inspectors a somewhat different position. Would it not be possible to increase the powers of the inspectors in regard to various things, so that they had authority, we will say, first of all, as to inquiries and the conditions under which they were made, so that their word should be almost final as to what was required in the way of investigation ?—So far as I am concerned I should be delighted ; whether the Board would think it right to do that is another question.

9470. Take another point with regard to the question of the officers : would it not be desirable that, whatever staff you might want, the inspector himself should be responsible more or less for his district, and should have a concurrent power in regard to the dismissal with the board of guardians ?—I should feel very much disposed to agree with you, but that would be making a most serious alteration, because hitherto the administration has been entirely in the hands of the guardians. That would be transferring the balance of administrative responsibility to the Local Government Board and their officials.

9471. That is what I am suggesting, for this reason—that this and some of the other evils which are mentioned to us seem at the present moment to be beyond the reach of cure, because the inspector is especially enjoined not to take part in the administration, and we have had evidence, for instance, that he discusses the cases after they are settled, not as it were influencing the settlement of the cases ; and so with regard to the books that are kept. It is therefore difficult to see where the new power will come in that would carry out such a policy as you have before you. Another matter which I would suggest might be submitted as part of the duties of an inspector would be the enforcement as far as possible, of a definite policy, which policy the Local Government Board itself might set forth ?—I should be quite with you if the suggestion could be put into a shape in which it might be acted upon. But with regard to what you have said about the inspector in cases of relief, when I am at a Board of Guardians I constantly advise upon cases which are before the Board, and I do that before they are settled. If my advice is disregarded, I do not feel that I have done any good ; if my advice is regarded, I feel that the poor man has been harshly treated by being refused when I was there, when he probably would have got it if I had not been there.

Local Govern Board to inte individ cases o relief.

9472. But of course if you had in your hands a definite policy on which to work, and a policy recognised by the authorities, then your line would be clear ?—I have a perfectly definite policy. To a certain extent that has always been the policy of the Local Government Board, the Poor Law Board, and the Poor Law Commissioners. I have endeavoured so far as I can to carry out their views and their policy. But at the same time one is defeated by the statutory enactment that the Local Government Board shall not interfere in any individual case. If ever I want a thing done, or I tell the guardians that they ought not to do what they want to do, they may say, " You have no business to interfere ; here is a direct statutory enactment that you are not to interfere with us in the administration of relief."

9473. Can you tell me at all whether " interfering with any individual case " implies any kind of interference by an inspector by advice ; has it been so adjudged ?—No. I constantly advise them, and, as I say, my advice is sometimes taken and sometimes it is not taken.

9474. Therefore the interference would be the practical interference with an order for relief given by a Board of Guardians ?—Not quite so. I should often be glad to have the power to say " You shall not give the relief in this case." Take a drunkard ; it is absolutely useless to give out-relief to a drunkard, and I do not understand why guardians ever do that, but it is constantly done, although you might as well pour water into a sieve.

Questi sufficie and me of out-r relief : Prohib and Regula Orders.

9475. The other Orders, the Prohibitory Order and the Regulation Order, practically do not cover those difficulties, I think ?—No. You must remember that the exceptions under the Out-Relief Regulation Order and the Prohibitory Order were put in with a view to prevent the possibility of any case of hardship. If you will look back to the earlier reports of the Poor Law Commissioners, and to the many debates in Parliament at that time, you will find how it was attempted to show that the regulations of the Commissioners induced great hardship. These regulations were quoted to show that the hardship was not the result of the regulations.

9476. That is to say, they have not been so much a direction of Boards of Guardians from the point of view of the best administration possible, but a direction of the Boards of Guardians to prevent clamour and misjudgment?—I think so, to some extent. In the early days of the Poor Law you know how bitter the opposition to the Poor Law was, and how every little handle that could be got hold of was worked for all it was worth to excite further opposition against it and to endeavour to upset it. I am referring to the early days when the Commissioners practically had to fight for its existence not only in Parliament, but outside Parliament.

9477. And all these Orders, the Consolidated Order and the others, date from the early days, the "forties"? —Certainly. By 1847, when the Consolidated Order was issued in its present form, the Commissioners had practically asserted themselves and held their own. But you must remember that in the early days of the Poor Law Commissioners their powers were only given to them for limited periods, I think in the first instance for three years, if I remember right, and then they were extended from three years to five years. Until many years after the Poor Law Board was constituted, it was not made a permanent establishment. It is most interesting to look back to the records and to the debates in Parliament at that time.

sufficient laries of edical icers, and il results.

9478. With regard to the medical officers about whom Dr. Downes asked you, what would be the average salary which they would receive at present?—I am afraid I can hardly tell you that.

9479. Would it be a very small amount—under £50 a year may we say?—The average for the medical officers would be more than £50 a year; but you must consider the ground they have to cover in the rural districts, and that they are at the beck and call of everybody for whom they get Orders, at all hours of the day and night, and that they may be held to account if they do not at once comply with an Order. The Poor Law Commissioners apprehended the difficulty of making the medical attendance upon paupers better than the medical attendance upon the independent labourer, and you will find in the early reports of the Poor Law Commission that it was hoped that that difficulty and that preference, if one might so call it, for the pauper over the independent labourer in regard to medical relief would be met by the furtherance and establishment of medical clubs.

9480. Your evidence would point to a re-organisation of the whole department of medical relief from the point of view of the remuneration of the medical officer, I take it?—I think it is most desirable that the medical officers should be much better remunerated than they are. They should be so remunerated that they could fairly be called upon to do the work as it ought to be done. There is a difficulty now if you say to a medical officer, "I find that you have been very little in the workhouse," and he says, "I do all that I consider necessary; that is my business, not yours. I do sufficient and you cannot show any complaint against me." I have come across striking instances in which I have been able to show a complaint. I remember going into one workhouse when the medical officer was not there. I said to the nurse, "Have you any bed sores?" She said "There is not a bed sore in the place." I went into some of the wards, and I saw one man looking very miserable. I said to the nurse, "Is that man all right?" She said, "Yes." I said, "Let me see his back." She turned him over. He had a bad bed sore. I looked at several other cases, and I found many bed sores. I sent for the doctor. I said, "I am very sorry to see the state of bed sore that these patients are in." The medical officer said, "There is not a bed sore in the place." I said, "Please come and look." I showed him bed sore after bed sore. "I am horrified," he said. I reported the facts to the Local Government Board, and my report was sent down to the guardians. The medical officer had died in the meanwhile, and the guardians referred my repert to his son who had succeeded him in office. He denied that there had been any bed sore, said that I was not a medical man, and I did not know what a bed sore was. By that time it was about six weeks or two months after I had found the bed sores. Dr. Downes was then Poor Law medical inspector for the provinces, and as soon as possible afterwards he was good enough to come down with me. Most of the cases had died, but those that remained showed evidence of the bed sores which I had seen, but they had meanwhile been cared for and healed. That medical officer to this day maintains that there were no bed sores, and that I calumniated his father by saying that there were bed sores. If the father had been properly paid to do his work thoroughly, he would probably have examined those patients. But he took the nurse's statement, because he was receiving an inadequate salary, and did as much work as he thought the money was worth.

9481. Is there not a certain grant made towards the salaries of medical officers?—Yes.

System of "Exchequer grants and proposed reforms.

9482. Do you think it is at all advisable to continue that grant from the central exchequer?—I do not care for those repayments myself. That particular repayment acts unfairly now. The establishment charges are repaid under the Local Government Act of 1888, as they stood at Ladyday, 1888, and they have never been revised by Parliament since.

9483. Suppose we dropped them all, should we do any real harm?—I doubt very much whether you would. If those payments are to be kept up, I think they ought to be brought up to date. In some cases they inflict considerable hardship. In those days there was very little nursing, but many of the unions since that time have practically established their nursing on a good footing, and they get no repayment towards it. Any salaries that have been added since 1888 are not repaid.

9484. (Dr. Downes.) As at present administered, that grant has no relation to efficiency, I believe?—None.

9485. (Mr. Bentham.) And it was never intended to have any, was it?—The history of that grant is curious. The proposal was that the cost of outdoor relief should remain a local charge and the cost of indoor relief should be repaid by the Government. When the Bill came before Parliament, Parliament would not accept that, and there was a compromise effected which was not that the cost of indoor relief should be repaid, but that the cost of the establishment charges should be repaid as they stood at Lady Day, 1888; except with regard to London, and for London there is a different arrangement made.

9486. (Mr. Loch.) To come to the question of these Exchequer charges, do you think that the Exchequer charges or grants should take any other form? Would it be desirable that a grant be made, for instance, for general in-door purposes, subject to report I would say by the inspector?—I should agree with that suggestion, and think it the best thing to do. I would not repay the whole cost of in-door relief, because if you do that, you have no check upon the extravagance which guardians may choose to indulge in. If they get everything repaid to them which they spend, they would have no inducement towards economy.

9487. If you are to use the grant as a means of producing good administration you must hold the grant in your hands subject to a report that is favourable, must you not?—Quite so; if the grant were to be given subject to the sanction of the Local Government Board that would be quite sufficient guarantee to prevent its misapplication or abuse. I should prefer that to the present arrangement, which stands, as the payment was settled, upon, as I think, very unsatisfactory grounds, at the amount paid in the year ended Lady Day, 1888.

9488. Would you make your grant turn partly upon the establishments of the Boards of Guardians, their amount, and so on?—Yes, to a certain extent; but I would make it dependent entirely upon the efficiency of the establishment, whatever the size of it might be. For instance, I would not grant it if the nursing was not efficient and if proper provision was not made for day and night nursing, and I would not grant it if the babies were not properly looked after. I would make it depend upon details of that kind.

9489. That is to say, it would be subject to report?—Certainly.

Lunatic grant and its proposed readjustment

9490. With regard to another branch, the lunatics, are you in favour of the continuance of the 4s. grant?—I can remember the time before the 4s. grant. I was so horrified at the terrible lot of those who used to be kept in the workhouse, that I hailed the 4s. grant with delight, because it transferred those cases from the workhouses to the asylums. Most of the people who are practically administering now cannot remember the days before the 4s. grant, and they do not remember

Mr. Baldwyn Fleming.

10 April, 1906.

the horrors of keeping everybody in the workhouse that it would be possible to keep there, no matter what suffering and misery and discomfort they inflicted upon others, because the guardians did not like to pay the 12s. or 14s. which it was necessary to pay for them in an asylum.

9491. Granted that it has had that very good result, is it good at the present time, do you think ?—No, I do not.

9492. Have you any suggestion for a modification or an alteration of it ?—I do not know in what form the best suggestion might be made, but I should be very glad if that 4s. ceased, so far as it concerns the guardians.

9493. Suppose this suggestion were put forward, that, instead of a 4s. grant, there might be a grant for the afflicted (including the lunatics) and that some county authority or some local authority, subject again to report, was allowed to use this grant for any particular purpose to which at that moment it is desirable to apply the money; do you think that that would be too broad a basis ?—It is a new suggestion to me, but I should think that the difficulty might be met in that way. One knows how the county asylums are congested now, and how the fact of that congestion prevents their serving their proper purpose. The county asylum ought to be curative, and for those who are incurable and cannot otherwise be properly dealt with. Instead of which, the asylums are congested with cases which are sent there because there is nowhere else to send them. Those cases may keep out others whose cure depends on their being placed under immediate treatment, and may either prevent their cure or delay it almost indefinitely, and at the same time, give much trouble to the asylum authorities without any corresponding advantage whatever. It is of the first importance in mental cases to get them under control immediately, but they may be kept waiting before they can be admitted into the asylum, because there is no room for them. I do not say that it often happens.

9494. Do you think there is any objection to the authority, whoever it might be—say the local authority for the county—receiving a grant, as was done in the case of the Polytechnics in London, on the understanding that a certain amount of money were raised, possibly from voluntary sources entirely, so that in that way a rather more economical method of founding establishments of this kind might be supplied ?—I think that anything which would provide establishments for cases of mental disease intermediate between the workhouse and the county asylum, would be an advantage; and if any financial arrangement could be arrived at which would further that without putting an excessive expenditure on the county, it would be extremely desirable that it should be done. Very possibly your suggestion might lead to that result.

Need for new class of establishments for the insane

9495. Do you think that there might be a county authority which represented the guardians, and practically the guardians only, to manage these affairs, as against the county council ?—I do not see why the county council should not manage them. The county council have to manage lunacy, and this is a branch of lunacy; and they have the lunatic asylums. What I should be glad to see would be a subsidiary lunatic asylum, in which the arrangements for treatment would be sufficient for the class of case to be dealt with, but would be much less costly than is necessary for those who go in for curative purposes and those who are acutely ill and can never be recovered.

County council as authority for dealing with defectives.

9496. Would you transfer to the county council also the cure of the afflicted generally, including epileptics and imbeciles ?—I do not know about the sane epileptics, but I would transfer all the mentally afflicted to them. The sane epileptics are worse off than any class I know, because there is practically no accommodation in England for the sane epileptics except at Chalfont St. Giles and the Meath Home at Godalming, the institutions of Lancashire and a few others scattered over different parts of the country. It is a constant grief to me when I come across cases of sane epileptics in workhouses, and they have to remain there because there is nowhere else to send them. They are very nervous about themselves, and if they are put in lunatic wards and imbecile wards, they are put there for their own protection; probably they are happier there than they would be among the general inmates, because they are protected to some extent. But at the same time it is a wretched solution of the question. The sane epileptics should be treated quite differently from the insane.

9497. With regard to loans, the Out-door Relief Regulation Order says that relief may be given by way of loan to or on account of any person over twenty-one, or to his wife, or to any of his family under the age of sixteen; and then the Poor Law Amendment Act of 1834 says that the master or employer of the recipient can, in all cases in which relief has been given as a loan, be required by a justice, on application from the guardians, to show cause why wages due, or from time to time due to the recipient, should not be paid over in whole or in part to the guardians; and the justice can, if he think fit, taking into consideration the circumstances of such poor person and his family, require the employer from such wages to pay the debt to the guardians direct by instalments, or in a lump sum as may be arranged. Is that law at all effectual, is it ever done ?—I do not think it is acted upon. I do not remember an instance.

Recovery of loan relief of wages.

9498. Then practically it is obsolete ?—For practical purposes I regard it as obsolete, at least in the country.

9499. With regard to medical relief, the dilemma, so I understand, is that "as the exact cost of it in any individual case cannot in general be severed from the total cost of medical relief in the union, it does not seem to be such relief as can be given by way of loan. "But in some unions"—so the old note runs—"it is nevertheless so given"? ?—In the Bradfield Union they give all their medical relief on loan in the first instance, and decide afterwards whether they shall recover. But they had an exceptional bit of good fortune; they took one or two of their first cases who refused to pay into the county court, and the county court decided in their favour, and that decision was never appealed against and, consequently, never upset.

Difficulty of recovering medical loan relief.

9500. Why should not that county court decision be considered to apply generally ?—I am afraid you cannot give on loan when you cannot state what the amount of the loan will be.

9501. Is the dilemma insoluble ? Why should you not require by statute or by order that medical relief be given on loan if the guardians so desire ?—Because you cannot fix the amount of the loan, that is, the amount which will be due in any particular case. Where it carries a fee with it, such as a midwifery fee or an operation fee, it can be given on loan and it can be recovered. Ordinarily, a medical officer is paid by salary; he has to attend every case for which he receives a competent order, and you cannot distinguish the value of his attendances in that particular case from any other case. At Bradfield they have got over it by paying him partly by salary and partly by fee, and there they recover the amount which is determined as his fee in the particular case. I forget what the fee is fixed at, but it is about 6s., I think. That, although it answers their purpose, is unsatisfactory, because if he has only to pay one visit to a man, 6s. is excessive, and if he has to attend a man for six weeks 6s. is inadequate.

9502. Could not the dilemma be more or less adjusted on some basis, if, as I understand, you consider the loan system on the whole is desirable ?—I consider the loan system is most desirable, and that if it were applied more widely it would tend to encourage medical clubs and provident societies and would do a great deal to discourage pauperism. But with regard to medical relief on loan, unless you have a system of payment of medical officers by fee, it is difficult to arrive at the amount which you could legally claim. The system of payment by fee was tried in the earlier days of the Poor Law, and the amount of some of the doctor's bills was so large that the local authorities raised strong objection. If the medical officer can charge by fee, he may visit his case twice a day or three times a day, and he may run up any bill he likes. That was supposed to have been done in some of the old cases.

9503. If there was a reorganisation of the payment of medical officers, do you think this point might be taken into account, so as to make relief by loan possible ?—I think it might be done. It would no doubt have a very beneficial influence. I was most anxious to encourage medical relief on loan, and one or two unions in my district were willing to do it; but I am sorry to say that it failed, except where there was a fixed fee.

Recovery of loan relief and of maintenance.

9504. With regard to the recovery of money on loan or the recovery from relations, it is a county court process to which you have to turn, is it not?—Yes.

9505. Would it be feasible to apply the system adopted under the Bastardy Acts? Under those Acts, the father can be brought before two justices, and in case the father neglects or refuses to make payment of the sum due under the order (and since any commitment or disobedience of the order) as well as the costs attending the warrant of apprehension and bringing him up, then the two justices may by warrant direct the amount with such costs to be recovered by distress and sale, and the father to be detained in custody until return is made of the warrant of distress, unless he can by way of recognisance or otherwise satisfy the justices of his appearance before them on the day appointed for the return of the warrant. I remember an experienced magistrate in London, referring to the way in which parents did not pay in the case of reformatory and industrial schools, saying that he believed that the adoption of this system would greatly facilitate the payment of moneys by relatives and others; what would be your opinion?—I think it would be an excellent enactment.

Possibility of administering relief through stipendiary official of central authority.

9506. With regard to out-door relief, would you suggest that if one wanted to strengthen the policy of what you yourself have put before us, that such rules as the Manchester rules should be pushed forward and supported much more strongly by the board; or would your policy be rather to recognise the system of relying on the orders and bringing them in various ways up to date?—The whole question is surrounded with very grave difficulties, but if it were possible that there should be someone in a position analagous to that of a stipendiary magistrate, who had power to control the administration of relief, you might bring about a uniform administration, which under the present powers is practically impossible. To go back to what I said yesterday, if you could have a central authority and parcel out the country into areas and into each of those areas send a representative of the central authority with power to administer and control the relief, you would get a uniform administration, and I have no doubt that you would produce eminently satisfactory results. On the face of it, and having regard to this particular object only, that would seem to be the right thing to do; but if you do that you take away from the local authorities the power of education in self-government. Boards of guardians, however badly they may administer, are most valuable as bodies of self-governors, and the fact of their carrying on the local administration has great advantages which must not be lost sight of in the regret that from a Poor Law point of view they do not administer better than they do.

Advantages of case-papers over application and report book.

9507. If we could look at the matter from another standpoint, and instead of falling back upon modifications of the present orders, if we took the application and report book?—May I say that I should be very glad to get rid of that book. I want to have the case-paper system instead. If you had the case-paper system thoroughly well done, you would get a very much better result, and you would then only want such columns of the application and report book as are necessary for statistical and report purposes, apart from the history of the case. I should like to have the history of the case on the case-paper system. That is perhaps hardly an answer to your question, but it has reference to the importance of the application and report book.

9508. At present the application and report book lays great stress on the relief ordered by the guardians in kind, in money, quantity and description, what time allowed, and nature of the order made. That is a system which lends itself rather to allowances than to a careful treatment of the individual case from any point of view that might occur, does it not?—Quite so.

9509. If, therefore, the latter plan were adopted as the true method, then it seems that the orders would have to be reorganised and re-co-ordinated from that point of view; would it not be so?—I should like that to be done. With regard to the application and report book, you do not get a continuous history of the case. A case may apply this year and may obtain relief; it may have relief for a month and then go off again. Next year that case may apply again; there is a fresh entry in the application and report book which makes no reference to the past history of the case. If you had the case-paper system, and had that thoroughly well done, you would have the history of the case from the beginning to the very end of it. I will take the Whitchurch union in Hampshire, where Sir Wyndham Portal was chairman for many years. He and his colleagues there introduced the case-paper system, only in the form of a record book, that is there is an alphabetical list of every pauper who has applied for relief since that book was started, now a great many years ago. By reference to the book you can see the history and the whole record of a family from the time of the first application. They may have been for years without relief, but if they come back again, there is their past history. It is annotated up to date. If a child gets employment, that is entered; an alteration of wages is entered. All those details are regularly entered, so that the record of the case is kept constantly running; and when a fresh application is made the guardians can refer back to the past history, not only of the case, but of every member of the family—those who are able to contribute, those who are not able to contribute, those who are married and those who are unmarried; those who have got children, and those who have not got children. The whole thing is recorded as the events occurred. At Tisbury, where Mrs. Downes was a guardian, she was instrumental in introducing the case-paper system. That gives the same results, only instead of being kept in a book, the records are placed in pigeon-holes in the board-room. They are constantly referred to, and if there is any detail wanted they give it. The application and report book does not give you that, and cannot give it to you.

Record book at Whitchurch.

9510. (Dr. Downes.) Who keeps the record book at Whitchurch?—The clerk or his clerk posts it up, but the relieving officer constantly gives the information.

9511. The clerk there does not give his whole time to the guardians, does he?—No.

9512. What is he, a solicitor?—He is a solicitor and the coroner. At Whitchurch all the guardians and their officers have worked most loyally together. It is only fair to say that it is a small union, but still the principle could be adopted in any union. If it were necessary to have a special officer to keep the record book or the case-papers, it would be well worth while to appoint him for the purpose.

Attractiveness of urban relief.

9513. (Mr. Lock.) The old principle of Poor Law administration would be that the condition of the recipient should be less eligible than that of the independent labourer?—Clearly.

9514. Do you think that that is at the present practically applicable in our urban administration?—I am afraid not. The condition of the pauper is often allowed to be better than that of the independent labourer. A great many independent labourers go through a very hard time in order to maintain their independence, and many paupers have a very easy time, because it pleases them to sacrifice their independence.

Character of rural indoor paupers.

9515. Could we revert to the real meaning of that statement if we ordered our workhouses better, or do the modern requirements ask so much of us that we cannot really put in force that definition?—I was referring in my last answer chiefly to the towns. In the country districts you have practically no one in the workhouse but just the residuum, that is, the people who if they are young are incompetent physically or mentally, if they are old are past their work, and the women who have illegitimate children and cannot maintain themselves and their children outside. I do not know that in the country workhouses there is any necessity for bringing the administration into stricter lines than it is now.

Abuse by inmates of privilege of leave of absence from workhouse.

9516. I am thinking of the urban districts?—In the urban districts a good deal more might be done. Of course it is very unpopular to try and bring about reforms, but there is one practice specially, that I think is a most mischievous practice, and that is constantly allowing inmates out on leave. Take the big workhouses. There, if the inmates do not misbehave themselves, they are allowed ont on leave regularly once a week. A very considerable proportion of them come back drunk. I have known cases in which the men and the women were allowed out on the same day; I hope that has generally been stopped, but I am not sure that it does not prevail to some extent even now. They make assignations outside, meet outside, and spend the day together in anything but satisfactory conditions, and very likely both come back drunk. In some of the big town workhouses drunken returns are a frequent occurrence; it is well known that a proportion of those who go out on leave come back drunk, and so long as they are not noisy and disorderly and do not hit a porter or go for the master, they are put into some room where they can get sober quietly, and are left there to do the best they can for themselves.

Mr. Baldwyn Fleming

9517. Would you therefore say that it is a question of administration whether we carry out the old principle or not?—Those are all questions of administration. They are questions which are now in the hands of the guardians. The guardians all know these things, but for some reason or another they do not choose to prevent them.

9518. Would it be within the scope of an Order to give instructions to prevent that?—I think it would be extremely difficult, unless you had some officer on the spot. These matters are not reported. Strictly speaking, it is very difficult to say whom you can blame. The guardians give the man leave to go out, the master may report that he comes in drunk, and they may stop his leave perhaps for a month or two months; but practically in a good many of the big towns it is taken as so common an occurrence that no notice is taken of it, so long as the man does not do some overt act of mischief.

Possibility of increased supervision of poor relief by inspector.

9519. Might not the inspector be made the pivot of the supervision, and if he found this was going on and it was contrary to the Order might it not then be suppressed?—That would be exceedingly difficult. What can an inspector do? I have got fifty-four unions in my district, and I cannot go round to them all more than about once a year. I go to the workhouse perhaps once a year, if I can manage it twice a year, to the bigger ones I go perhaps oftener. It does not do for me to interfere with the administration, because if I interfere I must take some responsibility for it, and besides I have no power to do it. I go to the boards of guardians once or twice in the course of a year. As I endeavoured to express yesterday, one has a certain amount of supervision, but the administration is not in the smallest sense in my hands. Unless you increase your staff enormously and cut down the areas in which they are to take part, in the administration, I do not see how you are to improve matters so far as the inspector is concerned.

9520. Is there really no way out of it but to increase their powers and increase the staff; how would it otherwise be possible to carry out even your own programme?—By educating the guardians.

9521. The process of education without a very close supervision is a very ineffective process; it is the supervision to a very large extent that makes the education real, is it not?—Yes. I thought that very likely your suggestion as to the grant depending upon a satisfactory report upon points of that kind might help very much. Guardians often say, "It does not matter; and if the inspector has not found it out it is all right." I have always repudiated altogether that description of the position, because how can an inspector find things out? I go to a workhouse, say, once a year, and how can I possibly know, how can I pretend to know, what is going on in a workhouse except on the one day that I happen to be there? I never willingly go to workhouses in the same neighbourhood on following days, simply because it is known when I am in a neighbourhood, and so I zig-zag and go to workhouses distant from each other. But even doing that whilst I am on one side of the workhouse I know that the other side of the workhouse may be being put into order. It is not seldom found that in the first sleeping ward there are dirty sheets on, but before the other end of the house is reached the beds have clean sheets. One is up to those tricks as one sees them going on, but it is impossible to stop them.

Possibility of systematic co-operation between guardians and charities.

9522. To take another point, you mentioned the benevolent fund at Farnham and other similar arrangements that have been made; do you think that that could be elaborated rather further? Would it not be possible, in view of a better line of inquiry and better results from the point of view of investigation, to promote, somewhat on the lines of Mr. Goschen's circular, a system of charitable or voluntary assistance side by side with the Poor Law and taking all cases that do not come under the stricter or special conditions of the Poor Law?—I think it might be done, and done with the greatest advantage, but whether you can make it compulsory is the point. Unless you can make it compulsory, can you get it done? And then comes the point, can you make it compulsory? When you go into the remote country unions where the population is scattered, where the workhouse establishment is very small, and where the guardians have got into a routine manner of doing business, I am afraid it might be very difficult to get such a body as you have in mind together to do active work. If it could be done it would be excellent, but the question to my mind is whether it could be rendered compulsory and could be practically carried out if it were nominally compulsory.

Maladministration of endowed charities.

9523. Might it be that the inspector properly backed might adopt and put forward such a policy, and that the endowed charities by statutory arrangement might be made the nucleus, wherever they are, of a fund for this purpose?—I think it would be admirable if it could be worked out. The charities are the old difficulty; they are the crux of the situation. There is nothing so difficult as to get charities fairly administered. I quoted some instances yesterday, and one knows that church and chapel charities are the old, old difficulties. Everybody who has got the distribution or management of a charity uses it for his own purpose, and is most unwilling that anybody else should get anything or should use it for any other purpose. It is a constant thing to find that people are obtaining relief from several charities at the same time. The over-lapping of charities is miserable, and it is only when it happens to be found out that anybody knows that there has been the over-lapping.

9524. The crux of the position is this, is it not? Suppose the board of guardians do their work very well, then will arise the necessity for the treatment of the case otherwise than by allowance or in-door relief?—Yes.

Operation of Farnham "Benevolent Fund."

9525. And then there would be nobody to refer to, unless there is somebody outside the board to do what is wanted; therefore the very adoption of a reformed system will create the necessity of an ancillary charitable system, will it not?—Yes, I thoroughly agree with you. At Farnham they have done that through the instrumentality of the board of guardians. The guardians work the benevolent fund, and one of them is appointed treasurer to the fund. He receives the money which is collected, and he has to account for it all. The guardians themselves make the order upon the benevolent fund, and the treasurer alone cannot give anything out of the benevolent fund, nor can any individual guardian do so. When the case is before the guardians, and they think it is not a Poor Law case but a case that ought to be helped by the benevolent fund, and can be prevented from becoming a pauper by means of the benevolent fund, the guardians themselves refer it to the benevolent fund. They decide how much should be given and make the order, and then the treasurer acts upon the order.

9526. (Miss Hill.) Can you tell us what amount is administered by that fund in the year?—I asked Colonel Fitzroy, who is one of the Farnham guardians, and a most excellent guardian too; he is the treasurer of the benevolent fund, and I think he told me recently that in no year had it amounted to more than about £20.

9527. (Mr. Loch.) Would the inquiry in these cases have been made by the board of guardians?—The inquiry is made by the relieving officer, and it is subsequently most carefully gone into by the guardians who distribute the benevolent fund. It does not follow that because a man is referred to the benevolent fund committee that he will be dealt with by the benevolent fund. It is quite possible that the benevolent fund might throw the case back to the board of guardians. If there were unsatisfactory features, it would be referred back to the guardians.

Proposed "pooling" of endowed charities, which are sometimes very important, funds.

9528. Do you think the charities might have some recognised status as co-operators with the Poor Law if there were by statute opportunity given for an organisation of charitable in conjunction with voluntary relief?—I think it would be most valuable, and I would go further than that: I should like to pool all the available charities into one central fund which might be distributed to the different unions for the purpose you speak of. Some places have got very large endowed charities—very much more than they require for their own necessities; and in other places they have little or nothing of the kind. If they could all be pooled into the hands of one central authority for the county and distributed to the different unions according to their rateable value, or upon any other basis you might arrange as the most satisfactory and the most likely to be useful for the purpose, that would be a most valuable thing to do.

9529. That is to say, ideally at any rate one might deal with the charities of Salisbury, possibly, on some such basis?—Certainly.

Operation of Relief to School Children Order.

9530. With regard to the Underfed Children Order, 1905, do you think that the principle of that Order is right, by which the child is dealt with primarily apart from the parent, and then the parent either receives the relief (for virtually it is an allowance made to him) or else he is prosecuted for negligence?—It is very difficult for me to speak about that Order. It is an Order which has been determined by Parliament, and on which my chiefs have issued a circular. I have no difficulty in saying personally that I think the whole thing is a very great mistake; but it is not for me to set my opinion against the opinion of those who are above me, and who are very much wiser than I am.

Adoption of children by guardians.

9531. With regard to the powers of guardianship which the guardians have recently had imposed on them, are those powers working satisfactorily?—They are working satisfactorily so far as the children are concerned; but they have the very grave danger that they do enable any parent who wants to get rid of his child to do it: and as for getting the money from the parents afterwards, the powers might very nearly as well not exist.

9532. You said that child pauperism was going down?—Yes.

9533. But are not the guardianship cases increasing rather rapidly in urban centres?—Not sufficiently to affect the total, I think. At any rate not in my district.

Operation of Unemployed Workmen's Act at Southampton and elsewhere

9534. Take another burning question: the Unemployed Workmen's Act; are you in favour of having a concurrent authority for the relief of the unemployed?—Clearly not. Here again, I ought to speak with very great reserve; but I cannot help thinking that that Act has created a monster which may eat us up.

9535. In Southampton have you had that Act in force?—Yes.

9536. Have you seen the men relieved by the distress committee?—Some of them I have, but I have not attended any meetings of the distress committee.

9537. Have those men who have been relieved been on the relieving officer's books in any past year?—I cannot tell you, but I should think some of them probably have. The Southampton people have done their best to work that Act very loyally, and so have the Portsmouth people. They have dealt with a very considerable number of people. It is a strange fact that the outdoor pauperism in Portsmouth now is lower than it was this time last year. There were various influences which I believe have brought about that result, but the Portsmouth people themselves say that one of the influences is the work of the distress committee, which has prevented many from coming upon the poor rate who otherwise would have had to be dealt with as paupers. So far, no doubt, the effect has been good. At Southampton, the guardians and the corporation had a joint meeting, at which they arranged what they would do. The corporation had the control of a considerable plot of land where they were able to put people to spade labour, and the guardians themselves tried to employ some of the men who were said to be out of work on an estate which they have about three miles from Southampton. They arranged to send a good many of the men there by tramway—a tram went I think within about half-a-mile of the site. I forget what they were to pay them, but it was 2s. a day or about that sum. They gave a good many orders for this work. One thing they had to do was to provide against these men selling their tram tickets. Some of the men to whom they offered the work would not go to it. Some went, but others would not take the trouble to go that distance to get the 2s. a day. Altogether, I was very far from being impressed with the necessity for the work at all. The guardians, I think, acted rightly. They said "We want this work done; we are told there is very great distress, and we are perfectly willing, so long as it lies with us, to relieve that distress without pauperising the people. This is wages for work; this is not Poor Law relief." But the necessity was not keen enough to induce them all to take advantage of even that very easy work.

9538. That is to say, had the new organisation not been created, the pauperism would not necessarily have risen very much?—No. The guardians would have been able to do exactly the same as they have done now, except that it would not have been paid under the name of wages.

9539. It is a difficult process to apply wages to the relief of unemployment of that description, is it not?—Most difficult. Of course, from my point of view, the guardians ought to be the sole authority to deal with destitution. I would not allow destitution to be dealt with by anybody but the Board of Guardians, and I am confident that the past history of every attempt to deal with destitution outside the Board of Guardians, if it is only fairly recorded, has shown mischievous instead of good results.

9540. (Mr. Booth.) Do you mean distress or destitution?—Distress approaching or amounting to destitution; or distress relieved by public funds I think would probably be a better definition of what is in my mind.

Applicability of Danish relief systems to England.

9541. (Mr. Loch.) You would not be in favour of an alternative quasi-Danish system for the relief of the unemployed and for the relief of the aged, by which they would have a statutory right to relief through Poor Law agency?—No, certainly not. I do not think you can compare any of the countries which are dealing with pauperism and old age in that manner or form with England. Most of them have very small populations. Denmark, I think, only has about 4,000,000 in the whole country, and you cannot compare a system in a country with 4,000,000 inhabitants with a system for a country with 40,000,000 inhabitants.

Increased detention for "ins and outs."

9542. To take another point—the ins-and-outs; would you be in favour of a modification of the present system by which they are detained for a certain period, but after that can go out? Would you be in favour of dealing with them, for instance, under the Vagrancy Act, or in some other similar way?—Yes. For that class of hopeless ins-and-outs I should favour a much longer period of detention, and I should put them to very hard work indeed—I mean if they were physically capable.

9543. Would you put them under the Vagrancy law and have a committal by a magistrate?—I think I should. I am very reluctant to make any more criminal offences than is absolutely necessary, but I think a man who behaves like that really deserves to be treated as a criminal.

Advice by Local Government Board on legislative proposals.

9544. In paragraph 11 of your Memorandum you refer to the fact that the Local Government Board was not represented in regard to certain legislation, and you say: "So far as the Local Government Board are concerned, their discretion has been largely interfered with by the direct action of Parliament, and they have not had the free hand which was used in the early days of the new Poor Law by the Poor Law Commissioners and the Poor Law Board." Would it be feasible, do you think, to arrange that on all matters connected with the relief of the poor that come before the country the Local Government Board should be one of the advisers? Questions are now coming up before the country in regard to the feeding of children and similar matters, and it is quite possible that the view of the Local Government Board may be set aside or ignored?—I think it would be most desirable, if it be possible, that the Local Government Board should have an opportunity of stating their views upon all questions of that character. Everything that has to do with the relief of the poor should come before the board, but you see Parliament steps in, and it is, of course, impossible to say that the Government and Parliament should be in any way interfered with.

9545. (Chairman.) What Mr. Loch means is this, I think—that where a proposal is laid before Parliament by the Government, it should be accompanied by a Report from the Local Government Board from the Poor Law point of view. (Mr. Loch) Yes, that is it—that there should be a statutory obligation on the Local Government Board to make such a Report to Parliament on any question arising relating to relief?—Personally, I think that would be an admirable enactment, but it would, of course, be putting a heavy duty on the Local Government Board, and the Local Government Board already have more to do almost than they can do. I should like rather to refer to that. The Local Government Board is constantly blamed for not getting through their work as they should get through it. As a matter of fact I think one's marvel is that the Local Government Board keep anywhere near so well up to time as they do in their work. Take the matter of correspondence. You constantly find guardians say, We can get no answer from the Local Government Board. Very often the blame is the guardians' own. Suppose the guardians write to the Local Government Board. They write perhaps a day or two before the meeting and ask for an answer by return of post. The Local Government Board cannot do it. They may have to refer the papers to the inspector of the district, they may have to refer to the engineering department, or to the medical department, or to one of their expert departments in other directions. That must take a day or two. Then they answer the board of guardians, and their letter reaches the board of guardians: and then what do the board of guardians do? They say, We must consider this; we will appoint a Committee to consider it. That Committee is appointed. They may or may not meet before the next board day. Very likely their report is referred back to them. By that time, six weeks or two months have elapsed; and so it is not until about three months have elapsed that they can get an answer to their original question. Then they say at once, We asked the Local Government Board this question three months ago, and here, only to-day, have we got the answer, whereas, as a matter of fact, two months or more of the delay has been on their side and not on the part of the Local Government Board at all.

Allegations of delay on part of Local Government Board.

9546. I understand that in your Memorandum you suggest that a certain amount of the correspondence might be decentralised?—Certainly.

9547. Do you think you could decentralise still further by again making the inspector the pivot of the administration, and requiring a great many things that now come here to go to him first?—I should be perfectly satisfied to do it, so far as I am personally concerned.

Proposal to transfer to inspectors some of the Local Government Board's functions.

9548. That is, if the staff were provided?—Yes. Whether the Department itself would think it wise to allow a considerable amount of what might be very important business to be decided by the inspector without reference to the Board themselves, is another question.

9549. But there would be limits, would there not, in accordance with which such an arrangement might be managed?—If it could be properly limited, I think probably it might save a great deal of trouble. A great deal of work is done in that way now. I am constantly getting letters from boards of guardians, and from individual guardians, upon points which they have under consideration, asking what I think ought to be done. In the large majority of these cases I answer the letters myself, because I know what the board would wish done. That might be carried very much further I have no doubt.

9550. Do you think that a general policy of decentralisation on to the inspectors in the various ways which I have suggested to you might be feasible?—I think it might.

Poor Law infirmaries as medical training schools.

9551. I have only one more point to put to you, and that has to do with the infirmaries. Do you think the infirmaries could be turned to account for teaching purposes, and laid open to the medical profession from that point of view?—No.

9552. Would you kindly give your reasons?—Yes. I do not think that Poor Law infirmaries are at all to be compared with general hospitals. A person goes to a general hospital voluntarily, and by voluntarily accepting the treatment at the general hospital, he submits to the conditions which are there imposed. A person goes to a workhouse infirmary because he is sent there by the order of the guardians and it is the only form of relief open to him. Then, again, in the large majority of the cases people go to the general hospitals almost entirely for temporary purposes, and do not go there permanently. They go for treatment for a certain disease, and when it is over they go home again; if the treatment does not terminate in a cure they are not kept in the hospital, but they have to leave. In the Poor Law hospitals the large majority of the cases are permanent cases, or at all events a very large proportion of them are people who go there and have to remain there until the end.

9553. Is not the process now going on one by which the Poor Law infirmary is becoming an institution of two departments; is there one department for chronic and one for acute cases? To a certain extent that is so, but they are not separate departments, and even if they were, I doubt whether it would be advisable to treat them in any degree as you do the general hospitals. They are for relief purposes, and there are comparatively few of those infirmaries to which your suggestion could apply. It is only in the big town infirmaries where there is much surgical work to be done, I take it.

9554. I had those infirmaries in my mind more particularly?—If your proposal were carried into effect, I think you would find that the inmates would resent it very much indeed.

Present procedure for medical relief and desirability of its continuance.

9555. In Southampton, for instance, if a man applies for medical relief and it is an urgent case, and he goes into the infirmary, does the relieving officer make the ordinary inquiry as to the whole circumstances of the case, while he is in the infirmary?—Yes—or he should do so.

9556. That is a point, is it not, which is often omitted?—Both at Southamption and at Portsmouth, which are the two large infirmaries in my district, the Order in the first instance is given to the workhouse. At Portsmouth, where the infirmary adjoins the workhouse, everybody has to go in through the workhouse gate. The guardians have found it necessary to insist upon the infirmary Order being regarded as a workhouse Order.

9557. Would you adhere to that policy?—Certainly.

9558. And not to the policy of the medical institutions under the Poor Law becoming merged, as it were, in a general medical system?—No. I should certainly adhere to the policy of its being relief, and of its only being dealt with as the relief of actual desititution, and necessarily under the same conditions as any other form of relief, that is, under an Order for the workhouse.

9559. That is on the principle that medical relief may be the first step to pauperism?—Certainly.

Possibility and effect of increasing powers of inspectors.

9560. (Chairman.) It is clear from your evidence that you would not object to the present system of supervision as exercised by inspectors, being tightened up and more power given being to them. The present system, as I understand it, is really one of local administration and central supervision?—Quite so.

9561. Assuming that you tightened up the powers and gave a good deal more authority to the inspector, and he was to take a position at all analogous to that which you describe as the position of a stipendiary magistrate, would there be any difficulty in getting local co-operation?—I do not think so. I think that the local authorities, are as a rule, extremely willing to work with the inspectors. In the whole course of my long service, I have only come across one or two instances in which there has been anything like discourtesy on the part of the guardians or local authorities, or unwillingness to listen sympathetically to what the inspector has to say. Of course they know that the inspector has now no power, and that he cannot interfere with them if they do not want to be interfered with, except through the central board.

9562. Your functions now are advisory, are they not?—Purely so.

9563. Under the system which has been rather shadowed out in the course of your evidence they would become, to a certain extent, preventive?—Yes.

9564. And in certain instances, they would be punitive, because you could stop payments?—Yes.

9565. Would that not rather alter the position of the inspector?—Yes; but I doubt whether it would affect injuriously the position of the inspector with the local authorities.

9566. And you do not think it would prevent efficient and capable persons in the locality from co-operating?—I do not think so at all. I think they would know that, if they kept up to the standard—and it would after all be only a very moderate and reasonable standard—which the inspector desired, they would get their grant, and that if they did not do so, they would not get it. I do not think they would make it a personal matter with the inspector. They would very soon get to learn what the standard was, and the reasons why that standard was asked for; and I do not think that they would resent it in any personal manner as against the inspector, or that it need produce any friction or difficulty in the relations of the inspector to the local authorities.

9567. Then the Poor Law inspector would be more like a school inspector?—Yes, to the extent that he would practically control the grant that would be given.

9568. You would be quite prepared to risk any little inconveniences that there might be, I take it?—Personally, I should be quite prepared to risk that. The point is rather a new one to me, and previously it had hardly been put before me in the way in which it has been put before me to-day, so that I must be taken as answering it with a certain amount of reserve. So far as I can see the effect of it at the present moment, I do not see that it need in the smallest degree prejudice my position with regard to the local authorities; on the contrary, I think it would probably very much improve it. I should have some practical power of getting what I want done, and, at the same time, I would show the local authorities that I did not want anything unreasonable. If they got the grant from imperial sources instead of locally, provided they helped to get done what was wanted to bring matters up to the standard which I had set up, I do not think that they would in the smallest degree object.

9569. You have had such a great experience that your opinion is valuable; I gather that you would be prepared to risk this contingency?—Personally, I should be quite prepared to do so.

Possibility of curtailing existing pauperism.

9570. And you would prefer that the experiment should be made, rather than that we should go on drifting, as it were, as we are now?—Certainly. I am confident that that an enormous amount of the present pauperism and xpendi ture is really not only unnecessary but mischievous. Whether my dream, as it has been described, that we may ever come to a time when there may be no pauperism in the country, is a possibility, is, of course, very problematical, and it is quite as problematical to me as it is to you; but if I can see a means by which we can strive effectively, at all events in that direction, I should be glad to adopt it. Now, nothing is being done. We are at a standstill. Pauperism goes on being the trouble that it is, and auxiliary means of dealing with it are being instituted which appear to me to be exceedingly dangerous, and in the long run, are not at all likely to diminish but rather to increase pauperism. Therefore, I would hail with the greatest satisfaction anything which may be likely to tend in the direction in which I think the administration ought to lead.

Mr. Baldwyn Fleming.

Operation of Out-door Relief (Friendly Societies) Act.

9571. (Mr. Loch.) With regard to the out-door Relief (Friendly Societies) Act, do you think that that Act is tending towards thrift in your district?—It is certainly not tending towards thrift, because its whole influence would be in the other direction. I am bound to say, however, that it has had very little influence.

9572. That is to say, it has hardly come into force yet?—Yes. I have watched very carefully, and I have hardly seen a case in which anybody has applied for relief, who has got 5s. a week from a friendly society and has said, Because I have got 5s. a week from a friendly society, I insist upon having relief.

9573. The guardians, of course, are really quite free to act as they will practically in giving this or that amount to the person who is the applicant?—Yes. I look upon the Act as a mischievous one, because I think it contravenes the most important principle and the only sound principle of Poor Law administration. Destitution is to be relieved at the cost of the public funds, and I do not see how anybody can have any claim to money compulsorily taken from other people, so long as he is able to support himself by his own exertions or the exertions of those whom he can control in any way. But as I have said, I do not think, as a matter of fact, that the Act has had any practical effect. I have hardly seen a case in which it has been alleged that a man should be relieved regardless of the 5s. a week. For practical purposes, I do not think that the Act is doing anything, at all events in the country districts; I do not know what it may be doing in the towns.

Miss M. H. MASON, called; and Examined.

Miss M. H. Mason.

23 April 1906.

9574. (Chairman.) You are one of the lady inspectors under the Local Government Board?—I am.

9575. According to our practice we will take your written memorandum as your examination-in-chief. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XX. (A to M).) After a long experience in work connected with Poor Law administration and the relief of distress, you were appointed in 1885, as I understand, Inspector of Boarding-out?—I was.

Staff of lady inspectors of boarded-out children.

9576. In 1900-01 the work was so hard that you obtained sick leave, and Miss Pell was temporarily appointed, and she has since been permanently appointed, and Miss Evans also, so that there are now three lady inspectors?—Yes.

9577. I understand that there is no boarding-out of children beyond the Union in Wales?—No.

Extent and machinery of boarding-out beyond the Union.

9578. Certain counties in England do not practice that system?—I should rather say that certain counties do not contain persons who have volunteered to undertake to form themselves into committees to receive children from other unions.

9579. The system necessitates voluntary co-operation?—Yes.

Miss M. H. Mason.

23 April 1906.

9580. How is the boarding-out committee started?—There is no agency for starting one, it is when people start of their own accord; perhaps they have heard that children are to be had in London.

9581. The Local Government Board do not take any initiative in that way?—No, any initiative by the inspectors is purely voluntary.

9582. A committee being started, the Local Government Board satisfy themselves that they are fit and proper persons?—As far as they can.

9583. Although a committee may start and be adequate in its composition, there is no power, if the members of the committee either give up their work or die, to replace them, is there?—They generally replace themselves, or we write down to them and say that, as they have only two members now, they ought to have three, and ask them to appoint someone else: or the inspector goes down and looks them up.

9584. Would the Local Government Board refuse to recognise a committee unless it was of the adequate number?—Yes.

9585. So that you have that compulsion over them?—Always.

9586. How are the children selected that are boarded-out? Is there some special mode of selection?—The guardians select them.

Conditions under which children may be boarded out.

9587. As far as you know, have they any rules or principles upon which they select them?—They select them between the limits of age laid down by the Local Government Board; that is, between two and ten, except in the case of brothers and sisters, when they may send them out over ten if they are placed in the same house as their brothers and sisters; and also that they must be technically orphans or deserted, or they may have been adopted by the guardians, so that they should be permanent.

9588. They are sent out sometimes as young as three?—Yes, sometimes at two.

Cases of boarding-out of unsuitable children.

9589. In your experience have any children been sent out at that early age who afterwards developed signs of feebleness, or were, in your judgment, unfitted to be boarded-out?—Some have had to be returned, some have been so feeble they have been returned to the Union; then others have grown up strong and well; they vary individually, like any other children only.

9590. It has not happened in your experience that any appreciable proportion of these children who were sent out young subsequently turned out unfit to be boarded-out?—Not more at one age than another. I have supplemented my evidence by a statement as to the number of children who have been sent back, returned by the Boarding-out Committees for one reason or another since the Poor Law Schools Committee of 1895; the number is not yet complete, but I hand it in so that you may see it. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XX. (L).) It contains the number of those children that have been returned if they are not suitable for boarding-out. If they are found to be diseased, or too troublesome, or disagreeable in any way, the committee return them to the guardians.

9591. What is the proportion?—Out of the whole number I have got at present (several large unions have not replied yet), of 872 who have been boarded-out since 1895, ninety-one boys and fifty-five girls have been returned to the guardians as unsuitable for boarding-out.

9592. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) They are medically examined before they go, are they not?—Yes, and the medical certificate sent with them.

9593. That is by the board of guardians?—Yes, but the medical certificates do not always agree with the opinion of the committee or foster parents. Those who send do not always agree with those who receive. That is to say, that the guardians sometimes send the children with a full medical certificate that they are all right, and disputes have subsequently arisen as to the value of the certificate, and the children have been returned.

Attitude of foster-parents towards boarded-out children.

9594. (Chairman.) Your experience leads you to believe that the main inducement to the foster-parents is the profit which they make out of the allowance?—Yes, undoubtedly.

9595. If that is so, of course the smaller the income of the foster-parents the greater would be the inducement to take children?—No, I do not think the poorest people are at all the most avaricious; I find, in fact, that some of the worst homes are those where the people are the best off, and who take them rather as servants than as children—of rather a higher class than the children are themselves, perhaps.

9596. The kindness of the poorer foster-parents is, in your experience, greater, if anything, than the kindness of those who are better off?—Yes.

9597. The allowance was 4s. a week until recently, and it has been raised, I believe, to 5s.?—It has been raised permissively.

Adequacy of the boarding-out allowances.

9598. Is that calculated as the weekly sum which a labouring man, who was in receipt of good wages, would be able to spend on each of his children?—No, it is calculated, at least according to my idea, at a sum which gives a sufficient margin of profit to pay them for their trouble.

9599. What sort of margin?—That it is impossible to say. I always take it this way: take an average (I am always afraid to mention averages of working men's wages), but take a labourer with 15s. a week and a wife and three children; he has 3s. a person for everyone in the house, that is to say including their food, their clothes, and their rent, the man's boots and the man's working clothes; now if he gets one child even at 4s. a week the child does not eat that 4s., because the child shares with the family, and it is a distinct profit to have a fourth child which is paid 4s. a week for, and for whom they receive 10s. a quarter for clothes, besides doctor and school expenses and everything else; and no responsibility as far as further expense goes; extra nourishment, if it is ill.

9600. The benefit in that case to the foster-parent would be about 1s. a week?—It would be difficult to say that; it depends on how they feed and live themselves.

9601. You think the system of giving the foster-parents a sum out of which they can recoup themselves is better than directly paying the foster-parents for this trouble?—I do consider that direct payment.

9602. It might be done in another way: so much might be put on one side to be spent on the child?—I do not think you could see that it was spent. It is better to make it as far as possible, a member of the family and not a lodger. So long as they treat it like the rest of the family, as you have reason to believe if you thoroughly inspect it, that is far better. The object of the boarding-out system should be to incorporate it as far as possible in the family.

9603. Do the foster-parents put these children on the same level as regards feeding as their own children?—Food is the most difficult thing to ascertain, because unless you come in at dinner time you do not see what they are eating, and even then, if they are not feeding the child properly, they put the food on the plate while you are standing at the door. Most of them, I think, do feed the children like their own. I examine their dinner when they bring it to school, and I find it is very much the same as that of their foster brothers and sisters if they have any. I have found some instances where it has not been so.

9604. I suppose it is difficult in the case of the £2 a year to prevent misappropriation?—No, that should be comparatively easy, because the Committee ought to examine the stock of clothing every quarter and see whether it is kept up to the outfit with which the child is sent out in the first instance. There is a definite standard of what it should have, and a definite sum to replace it and keep it in order.

9605. Do the committees do that work?—Some do it very well indeed; some do not. Some give the 10s. a quarter to the mothers and say, "Here is your money;" then afterwards they say, "Where are the clothes"? Their power is gone when they have parted with the 10s.

Responsibilities for boarded-out children sent to service.

9606. When does the parentage or the connection between the foster-parents and the children end?—When they are sent to service, then the control ceases, but as a rule the relationship, such as it is, lasts through life. They return to the foster-parents between their situations or when they are on a holiday just as if it was to a real home, and sometimes they pay the foster-parents, as they should do, I think, when they can, for their lodging and board when they come back in those cases; sometimes they do not, very often they come back for a visit in a friendly manner.

9607. Supposing the child cannot get employment, or fails to get employment, what happens?—The very last letter I received from a committee says: "I am writing to you as usual to help me. Annie has returned on our hands; can your sister find a situation for her?" That is part of what the inspectors do. The ladies of the committees find situations for them, and the foster-parents receive them back as a rule when they are out of a place; then someone pays; in this case I do not know who is going to pay; the lady is very kindly paying for this girl at present.

9608. On whom rests the liability?—Nobody; it is only a moral responsibility of the committee. Nobody is bound to take care of that girl; if it were not for the goodness of this lady that girl would be in the workhouse, but owing to her kindness and that of her foster-parents she is not.

9609. Do the guardians get rid of their liability by boarding these children out?—They get rid of all the trouble of them unless it is impossible to deal with them, and then the committee send the child back to the union.

9610. They do send him back?—Yes, and I have the number they have returned here; it is on the paper I mentioned before.

ter careers boarded- t children.

9611. They send them back when they get to the age when they should find employment and when they fail to find it?—Yes; if they cannot deal with them themselves. Here is the proportion: out of this 872 who have been boarded out since 1895, of course, most of them are still there, most of them are still young, four boys have been returned and eleven girls; but eighty-two boys have been sent to training-ships or training-homes, and seventy girls have been sent to the Metropolitan Association for Befriending Young Servants, or "M.A.B.Y.S." The M.A.B.Y.S. really undertake those cases of girls which the committees find it impossible to deal with when they have gone, or should go, to service.

9612. The boys that go to the training-ships are in the habit of spending their holidays with their foster parents?—Yes.

9613. When these children are boarded-out in this way, is there any distinction drawn by the locality between them and the actual children of the foster-parents?—No, none at all.

arded-out ildren and stigma of uperism.

9614. The taint, so to speak, of pauperism is removed?—I have never found out where the taint of pauperism is; it is a catch-word I have never been able to follow.

9615. The stigma?—I have never found any stigma either; I do not know where it is. When the children are boarded out nobody cares where they come from; you may talk of the workhouse, nobody cares or regards it as a stigma; as a matter of fact nobody thinks about it, least of all the inspector; the people know perfectly well where the children come from, but nobody regards it as a stigma or taint.

ed for pervision boarded- t system.

9616. They go to school just the same as the others?—Just the same.

9617. It is clear that this system that you so fully describe may be open to very gross abuses unless it is very closely supervised?—Yes.

9618. It requires not only the supervision of the local committee, but it also requires some superior official supervision, not only to look after the children, but to see that the committee do their duty?—Exactly.

9619. You are not altogether satisfied with the system of inspection of children boarded-out within the union?—No, not at all.

chinery of arding-out hin the ion; and d for ther pection.

9620. Perhaps you would shortly summarise what the system is, and what the objection is to boarding-out within the union as regards the lack of supervision?—Since the Order of 1889, which is the last one, within the union the guardians are authorised permissively, not compulsorily, to employ the services of a within-the-union committee of ladies and gentlemen, volunteers, in the same manner as those which are constituted beyond the union. Wherever there is such a committee the children are boarded-out on very much the same lines, there is very little difference between their rules and those for children boarded-out beyond the union. The committee of ladies (there may be gentlemen among them) receive the money from the guardians and they administer the payments; they choose the homes and supervise them, but they are not inspected by the Local Government Board. Where there is no such committee the children are still under the relieving and medical officers. The relieving officer, who is a man, and cannot really inspect, is supposed to pay the money to the foster parents at their residence, and weekly, unless otherwise directed by the guardians; he has to visit and to report on each child once a quarter; and the medical officer reports every quarter at the remuneration of 2s. 6d. a quarter for it, and that is all.

9621. Do they report in each of those cases?—Yes, they are supposed to report on them always.

9622. They are assumed to do so?—Yes.

9623. Is it possible?—They do so, I think, but I do not think the inspections on which those reports are founded are of very much value. Then, again, there is another sort of system I spoke of as having instituted myself, which is that I started voluntary committees of ladies supplemental to the relieving officers. In that case, the ladies have no real official authority, they do not pay the money, and there is no real control, and my experience was that if they did find out anything which the relieving officer did not know of, the relieving officer did not like it and perhaps denied it; so that it is not much use. It is better perhaps than nothing, but it is not much use.

9624. Do the guardians, for in-boarding, make use of any associations for the purpose of putting their children out?—Do you mean the workhouse children, or the boarded-out children?

9625. I will put my question in another way. Do they board out their children by utilising institutions or associations?—No, not that I know of.

9626. They do it all directly themselves?—Yes, they must do it all directly themselves: even if they employ any of those institutions or associations indirectly, the associations are not responsible for the children.

9627. Are there any associations that take Poor Law children from a workhouse and board them out?—No, they are not allowed to do so.

Cases of Poor Law children boarded-out by certified institutions.

9628. There are certain institutions or certified homes that receive Poor Law children: do they ever board out?—I have known them to do so, quite illegally.

9629. It is contrary to the contract made between them and the Local Government Board?—Quite.

9630. But they do it?—I have known them to do it.

9631. Where you have ascertained that they have done this, I assume you have reported to the Local Government Board?—Yes.

9632. Do you know what the action taken has been?—Yes, action was taken in two cases by the Local Government Board: they had a long correspondence with the Association, and told them it was quite illegal, and that they were not to do it again. What subsequently took place in those two cases was that as the children were not in bad homes, instead of asking the Local Government Board to order their removal, I formed boarding-out committees myself in those places of the very people, the managers of the Homes. I turned them into boarding-out committees and I kept the children there, and tried to place them under proper rules.

9633. Are there any considerable number of children in these certified homes?—Yes. I should say a large number. I can give you a list of the homes, but they do not come under my inspection.

9634. Do they not?—No: the certified homes do not come under my inspection at all. I have only referred to them to say that I often recommend that a boarded-out child, especially an elder one, be sent to one of these Homes to receive some training; but at present I have no guarantee if the child is sent to a certified home, that it will be there. I have known children (not any of my own children) who have been sent to these certified homes and have been paid for by the guardians as if they were in the home, and they have been instead boarded-out in the neighbourhood. I hand in a list of the certified homes.* There is one point, perhaps, that I might mention that I have not referred to, and that is you will see by the 4th column of that list that the cost of a child in a certified Home varies, roughly speaking, from £7 16s. to £26 a year, whereas the cost of a child boarded out is, roughly speaking, altogether £13 or £14 a year; so if the Association receives a child for which it is paid £15 a year and boards it out at £14, the association makes a little money on each.

Comparative cost of children boarded-out, and in certified institutions.

9635. As well as the foster-parent?—Yes. But the cost of boarding-out and certified Homes is about the same, generally, and in some cases, that of the certified Home is the lesser.

9636. I have here the list of the certified homes; some of them have very considerable accommodation. They are on pages 6 and 7; the Roman Catholic Female Orphanage, 350; the Jew's hospital for the education and employment of children of the Jewish religion; Dr. Barnardo's Home for Working and Destitute Lads, 378. Are those institutions at all used by the guardians for placing their children?—Yes, they are a good deal used by the guardians, but they do not come under my inspection. I have nothing to do with them. All I have to do with is the sending of the child to the institution. I recommend that it should be sent to the institution. All I am concerned with is that I should know it is in the institution to which I suppose I have been the means of sending it.

Inspection of certified schools.

9637. (Sir Samuel Provis.) The certified schools are inspected by the general inspectors?—Yes. My only point is that when I recommend that a boarded-out child should be sent to such a Home, I ought to know that the child is sent to the place to which it is supposed to be sent.

9638. (Chairman.) All the Poor Law children who are sent to any of these institutions, ought to remain in the institutions and ought not to be boarded out?—Certainly.

9639. Is the practice at all general, do you think, of boarding them out?—I cannot tell you that; it is not my business to make an inquiry. I have only told you what has come incidentally under my notice. But there is no safeguard.

9640. In Scotland, there are no committees of supervision?—No.

9641. You therefore are not very well satisfied with the system that there prevails?—Scotland only concerns me because they are always holding themselves up to us as a pattern for our imitation.

9642. You make these remarks rather to put Scotland on the proper level?—Yes, I think Scotland distinctly wants sitting on.

Adoption of Poor Law children by foster-parents and others.

9643. Out of this system of boarding-out children, there comes the practice of adopting children?—Yes, there is that practice, but we discourage it—at least I and my colleagues do, as far as possible.

9644. I think you state here your opinion that the children are very often adopted from purely mercenary motives and in order to get the benefit of their work?—Yes, that is my experience; certainly when they take children at a wage-earning age, I think they take them for the same reason that their own relatives and parents suddenly become so fond of them—when they become wage-earning.

9645. Assuming a child is adopted, have the Poor Law authorities the same control over it as they would have over a child who was boarded-out and not adopted?—No, they have no real control. Under the Act of 1899, they now have the power of appointing some competent person to visit the child and report upon it, at least twice in each year, and if they were dissatisfied, they could take it away; if they themselves adopted the child under the Poor Law Acts, they could do so in any case. There may be different opinions as to the competency of the persons whom they appoint to visit. I think that even if the person were competent the protection would be scarcely sufficient. I have given you two or three instances here: one instance where the "competent person" appointed to visit these unfortunate boys was the person who resisted their removal from a man who was picked up drunk on the high road.

9646. Assuming that whoever is inspecting reports that the adopted child is ill-used, is there power to terminate the adoption?—I think you must ask Sir Samuel Provis that. When once the child is adopted, I have no more to do with it.

Guardians' power to terminate adoption of a child.

9647. (Sir Samuel Provis.) There is a provision in the section, is not there? "The guardians may, if they think fit, at any time during such period, revoke their consent to the adoption, and thereupon the child shall be forthwith returned to them by the person having the custody of the same." I think that really answers the chairman's question?—It does. I have nothing to do with them after they are adopted, so I could not tell you whether in practice it has ever been done.

Increase in number of children boarded-out within the union.

9648. (Chairman.) In one part of your evidence I think you point out that there has been a great increase in the number of children boarded-out within the Union and I think you imply that this has in certain parts of the country become a sort of system of out-door relief?—It has so in great measure.

Dangers of boarding-ou children wi relatives within the union.

9649. The effect has been to increase the repugnance of those who were previously liable to support relatives to continue to do so?—I think distinctly so. For instance, I once attended the Gainsborough Board of Guardians to explain the boarding-out system to them. I went officially by direction of the Local Government Board. They were about to place out a family of four children with relatives within the union. I said "I should advise you to send them to persons beyond the union and persons who are not related, because if you board them out with relatives within the Union you will find other people will be reluctant to support their own nephews and nieces," and one of the guardians there and then got up and said, "It is perfectly true; because since it has appeared in the newspapers that these people are possibly going to be paid for having their nephews and nieces to board-out with them, I have had several applications from families to say that they will not keep theirs any longer for nothing."

Difficulties attending boarding-ou within the union.

9650. Assuming that the boarding-out outside the union is a good system, is there any reason why boarding-out within the union should not be made an equally good system?—It could be made an almost equally good system, but I do not think it could ever be quite so good; for these reasons, that there is a very great difficulty in not boarding them out with their relations; they apply for them, and it is a very difficult thing to get the guardians to refuse; and also the area within which they are boarded, unless the area is divided into several parts, as it is in the Mansfield Union in Nottinghamshire, and the Newbury Union in Berkshire, for instance, with several committees, is too large for the proper working of a single committee, and there is not that proper inter-visitation and joint responsibility on the part of the committee that we require from the beyond-the-union committees.

Numbers of children boarded-out within and without the union.

9651. In the Appendix that you have put in, (Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XX. (G)), I see that the number of children boarded-out in 1898 was 2,000, and in 1905 it had fallen to 1,800, whereas the in-boarded children during the same period had grown from 4,700 to 6,800, showing a very considerable increase?—Yes.

Causes and dangers of increase in numbers of children boarded-out within the union.

9652. Do you think that is the cause of the diminution in the numbers boarded out without the Union?—I think that is one of the chief causes, and you see also in my Appendix that I have dealt with the reason for the increase of boarding-out within the union. I say (in Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XX. (J)) with regard to the increase, "This increase is, however, to some extent more apparent than real, as many of the children formerly classed as on out-relief with relatives have now been brought under the boarding-out regulations and classed accordingly. But boarding-out within the Union is, in a great measure, only a form of outdoor relief, and it appears to have increased with the recent general increase of pauperism. It is a system which extends automatically, for many persons who might maintain children related to them, but for whom they are not legally responsible, will not do so if they see that their neighbours receive parish pay for children under similar circumstances. Also, though there are now about 107 committees":

* Not printed in Appendix.

(there are now 111) "within the unions for which they act, there is no official inspection to report on and help their work; while the rest of the children are only under the supervision of the relieving and medical officers, who cannot make that thorough inspection of the homes and bodily condition of the children which a woman can. It is therefore probable that many of the homes are accepted in ignorance of what the treatment of the children really is, and that many of the foster-parents would decline to receive them at the low rates of payment often given if official investigation were made into the nature of that treatment and their expenditure of those payments." Some of them receive quite small sums, such as 1s. 6d. a week.

9653. The system of boarding-out has on the whole worked satisfactorily, in your judgment it is essential that it should be associated with a very thorough system of supervision ?—Yes.

9654. But even then it has its limitations ?—Yes.

Unsuitable boarding-out of children by charitable agencies.

9655. In your experience, have you come across cases where agencies other than the Poor Law have been putting children out to board and have sent children to the same homes and places where your Poor Law children were ?—Yes, I have found some.

9656. And those children, I suppose, would be much of the same class as the Poor Law children ?—Yes, I should say quite. In fact, I do not know that they may not be Poor Law children sent to the certified homes.

9657. Have you any cases, or do you recall any instances, where those children have been sent to homes from which you have removed your children ?—There were two boys chargeable to Southwark who were boarded-out in Sussex with an old woman who was deaf, and had next to nothing to live upon but their payments and those of country holiday children, who were sent to her also. She could not control the Southwark boys in the very least, and one of them she beat when she could catch him. I have pursued, or waited for him for an hour at a time, before I could find him myself, while he was running over the forest. I had those children removed, but it was too late to do anything with them, they were quite out of control. One, after being returned to Southwark, they could do nothing with, so he was sent back to this old woman to find employment for him. He lost one place after another. I finally found him in the garden of a friend of my own in Sussex. She had employed him there as a charity, but she could do nothing with him. She sent him first to the cottage hospital, and then to the workhouse, and finding nobody would have him (they could do nothing with him, he was so dishonest and insubordinate) she gave a sum of money to a certain voluntary agency to take him, and he was shipped off to Canada. The lady who placed the boys there with the old woman who was deaf, has sent boys from the voluntary association there since.

9658. The fault may have been as much with the boy as with the deaf old woman ?—The deaf old woman could not control two high-spirited boys like that.

9659. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Was the woman in receipt of relief herself ?—No; they cannot be in receipt of relief. They sometimes prefer taking the children. I have known cases where they have given up relief to take children.

9660. (Chairman.) Is this an isolated case, or are there other cases ?—I can collect them, if you like. I do not like to speak off-hand. There are other cases where persons without means live on the children.

9661. (Miss Hill). How long had that boy been with the old deaf woman ?—Two or three years. I inspected him at least for two or three years, I should say. He was with the old woman about five years altogether.

9662. (Professor Smart.) You consider she was quite unsuitable to take charge of any children ?—Absolutely. I thought she meant very well. She was a very respectable old woman, but quite unfit for the management of boys especially, and very dirty.

9663. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) What did she get for that boy ?—She got 8s. a week for the two, and £4 a year for their clothing, and all the other extra expenses.

9664. You said some only pay 1s. 6d.?—That is within the union, not beyond the union.

9665. (Chairman.) The scale of the various institutions for boarding-out is the same as the Poor Law ?—No, it is not. The scale of the voluntary associations that I know most about gives 5s. a week, and that comprises clothes, which is a very bad plan. I mean to say speaking from my own experience that you cannot see what money has been spent on the clothing if it is given all together in a round sum.

9666. (Mr. Loch.) In out unions this 5s. is now also paid by the Poor Law ?—It may be. It is permitted; it is a new scale.

9667. (Mr. Bentham.) And clothing in addition ?—Yes.

Checks on proper expenditure of clothing allowance for boarded-out children.

9668. (Mr. Booth.) Is it not rather difficult to know about the clothes ?—They are not all new clothes. I suppose where one child is with a lot of other children, the clothes are made by some one from those of a bigger person ?—Yes, and that is all right.

9669. How can you test the expenditure of a certain sum per annum on the clothes of one child living with a number of others ?—I do not think you need go into exact details, if they have sufficient. I think it is only right to cut down the clothes of a bigger child to make clothes for a smaller one.

9670. If you limit your examination to the appearance of a child, it can equally be applied if they get 5s. a week or 4s. plus £2 a year ?—It is not the appearance of the child; we look through their boxes and see what they have besides what they have got on.

9671. It is a question of the new things that are bought ?—A question either of the new things that are bought or the old ones which are cut up instead. I mean to say, we have a distinct outfit sent out with each child. The girls usually have three pairs of stockings, two pairs of boots, three linen under garments, and three chemises, two top petticoats, two flannel petticoats, two summer frocks, and two winter frocks, a school cloak and a Sunday cloak and two hats. It is very easy to see if they have that number of garments still, and if they are in good condition.

9672. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) That is when they are sent out by the board of guardians ?—Yes, they are sent out with that. If the outfit is not sufficient, and they have not had a sufficient outfit, the committee complains, and I always support them in that complaint. I have found here one home which I came across yesterday. It is not a bad home; those are the marks of the bruises on a boy. (Producing a book.) The boys were removed afterwards, and the home has been filled up by others from a voluntary association. It is not one of the worst homes at all. That is one of my rough note-books which I take about with me. I did not really recommend the removal of those boys, because I did not think it bad enough, but the people gave them up themselves because they did not like them.

Cases of unsatisfactory boarding-out committees.

9673. (Chairman.) In part of your evidence you allude to some of the committees having done their work unsatisfactorily and misappropriated funds. I assume that those cases are very few and far between ?—Yes, they are very few and far between, but still they do now and then occur, and therefore it shows that such things are possible.

9674. It shows you do not always get the right people on the committee ?—We do not get them; they suggest themselves. If they are of sufficient social standing and they are respectable people, we could not very well refuse to authorise them—we must see afterwards how they turn out, and whether they do the duties which they have undertaken properly.

9675. A danger of this kind is clearly an inseparable factor, is it not, of the system ?—It is not a large factor. I have only given that as one of the extra reasons why there should be sufficient inspection.

Advantages of boarding-out over other methods of dealing with Poor Law children.

9676. You have given a great deal of attention to the education of Poor Law children generally. Each system seems to me to have its merits and demerits. To start with, there is the big school system, then there is the cottage or the scattered-home system, and then there is the boarding-out system. Have you been able at all to compare the results in after life of the children from the different systems ?—Yes, I have; but I think it is rather for you to compare them from the evidence you receive from the general inspectors. I should say this, that the boarding-out system has one advantage that no other system can offer. As a rule, whether the home has been good or bad, the child has always a place to go back to, whereas no institution can receive them back again; when they go out into the world from an institution they can have no friends of their own, or their friends are not such as can help them; they have no place to come back to between situations. That is really why the M.A.B.Y.S. was founded, and what it is useful for—to look after girls in such circumstances; and now I am thankful to say there is a similar association for looking after and befriending the boys. It is rather those associations who should tell you how the children turn out. On the whole, I think under whatever system they are brought up, they turn out wonderfully well; so much trouble is spent on them under every system that I think, on the whole, considering what their inheritance is, what their natural disposition and circumstances have been, it shows that they must have been well looked after to turn out as well as they do.

9677. Two of the systems have obvious demerits. Under the barrack system the children are trained together and everything is done for them; they are well fed and well looked after; in the boarding-out system they are not so well fed and not so well looked after, but they gain a certain knowledge of the world, and they perhaps have a home to go to. Does not the cottage or detached, system combine those two advantages; they are better fed and better clothed and do get a certain knowledge of the world, and have, to a certain extent, a home?—They have not a home to come back to between their places. They have not a real and permanent home. They cannot be received back into any institution, however small and home-like, at any rate over a certain age. It is not a place to come back to. It is not a foothold in the world. Many of the children that I first inspected twenty years ago are themselves married now and have children of their own. A good many I visit, and one or two of them have taken boarded-out children since.

9678. Under what system were those children trained?—I am speaking of boarded-out children, children who were boarded-out, and who are now married and settled in or near the places that I visit.

9679. I think you have a fear that in this scattered home system the control and supervision are not as great as in the school system, and one child, coming in may therefore corrupt the others?—I am not speaking of the homes as a whole—I would rather not speak about them, because they do not come under my inspection. What I mean is this, no scattered home is a real home; it cannot compare with either the boarding-out home, that is to say, a real labourer's family, nor can it compare with a certified home, a voluntary certified home, because they have to take children of all kinds mixed. I was speaking there with reference to the dormitory arrangements and not with regard to their management in the day time. They are not looked after at night in a cottage home or a small home in the same way that they are looked after in a large place which has dormitories, when an attendant or officer sleeps in a cubicle or something of the sort, and can look after them at night.

Possibility of extending boarding-out system.

9680. The boarding-out system can never be developed more than to be a useful adjunct to the school system?—I think it might be developed a great deal more, because there are a large number of boards of guardians who do not board-out at all. They might board-out a good many. There are a great many places in both England and Wales where boarding-out committees might well be formed if there were some agency to start them. As it is, they only start haphazard, and I think it is rather surprising that there are as many started as there are. You cannot do without the other systems. You can only board out a certain number of children, and each committee can only find homes for a certain number. More could be boarded out than there are at present, and I wish every board of guardians boarded out a certain number of children.

9681. You state that the result of your examination of the Exmouth boys is that those who have been boarded out in families where they have not been well treated or well looked after showed the most anxiety to return to those families?—Yes, that is so.

9682. Was it the lack of regulation or the licence that prevailed there that was the attraction?—I think in some cases that it was; but in most cases it is rather that the foster-parents keep writing to tell them how they wish to have them back again, and offering them all kinds of delights.

Unsuitable boarding-out homes and their attractiveness for children.

9683. They will go back, even if they have been maltreated?—Yes, even maltreatment, they do not mind; when they have had their thrashing they forget it. One boy, I remember especially, last year said he wished he could go back. I took him from a home where he was thoroughly over-worked and his hands were as hard and as horny as any old labourer's. I said to him, "You know that you had very hard work to do there." "I like that," he said. They want to get him back; and he does go back for his holidays.

Distinction class of cas boarded-ou within and without the union.

9684. (Sir Samuel Provis.) With regard to the children who are boarded out, outside the union, they would usually be children, would they not, who would otherwise be in the workhouse?—Or the schools.

9685. I mean, in an institution maintained by the guardians?—Yes.

9686. That would not be so, would it, with the children who are boarded out within the union?—No, not always, because they are with their own relations very often.

9687. The two classes are not quite the same, are they: the children who are dealt with under the two Orders, the boarded-out within the union and the boarded without the union?—I should say they would be about the same class.

9688. I do not mean social class, but I mean the circumstances are somewhat different, are they not, in relation to the children generally who are boarded within the union and those who are boarded outside?—They are the out-relief cases, that is what you mean, as a rule.

9689. In point of fact the cases boarded-out within the union are cases with regard to which the guardians would ordinarily give outdoor relief, and in fact did give ordinary outdoor relief prior to the first Order being sent out?—Quite so.

9690. The object of the Order with regard to boarding within the union was that there should be proper regulations where out-relief was given to orphan and deserted children?—Partly that, and partly with regard to those that were truly boarded out.

History and purport of regulations f boarding-o within the Union.

9691. I am only talking for the moment about those that are within the union?—It was not solely for that purpose; the Boarding-Out Order of 1889 was not issued solely for the purpose of regulating out-relief; it was issued for the purpose of dealing with those children who were regularly boarded-out within the union, taken with the out-relief cases.

9692. Does not that account for there being a much larger number of cases of children boarded within the union than children boarded outside?—Yes, that is what I have said; that the increase is more apparent than real; because so many of those out-relief cases were placed under the Boarding-Out Order.

9693. If I remember rightly, the first Order that dealt with children within the union did not provide for their being put under a committee at all; it merely made regulations?—There were then no committees.

9694. That was an Order of 1877, I think?—Yes, it was.

9695. It provided that there should be certain regulations which should be observed, such as there not being more than a certain number of children within the house, and it being within a certain distance of the school, and for the visits of the relieving officer, and so forth?—Yes.

9696. Then there came the next step, that a boarding-out committee might be formed that would look after the children in the same way practically as the boarding-out committee does outside?—Yes.

9697. I think that was the history of the matter?—Yes, only that is permissive.

9698. Quite so?—It is permissive, and not half the unions, roughly speaking, have taken advantage of that Order. I might say also that some beyond union committees such as Clifton and Nottingham, have taken the supervision of the committee of the within union children, out-relief cases and all, at the request of the guardians.

bjections increasing e classes children o may be arded-out.

9699. There is one other point, and that is, it is somewhere suggested that the class of children who should be boarded out should be largely extended, so as to comprise all children who would otherwise be relieved by the guardians ?—Yes.

9700. Would you be in favour of that ?—Most certainly not. It would put a stop to the boarding-out system, because, under the Order of last year, all permanent children may be boarded out, and if the temporary children were boarded out, the committee and the foster-parents would not put up with the trouble of changing them.

9701. Is not there also the danger of the interference of the real parent when the child is neither orphan nor deserted, or has not been adopted, in the way you have referred to before, by the guardians ?—Yes: the foster-parents constantly ask me if I know whether the child has parents, because they say: I will not have her if she has, because I will not be interfered with.

ocedure of arding-out.

9702. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) I want to see whether I really understand the procedure which takes place when the board of guardians desire to board-out a child. Do they do it by committee of the board of guardians, or does the whole board decide who are to be boarded out ?—As a rule the guardians have a committee of guardians to decide what children are to be boarded out, and where.

9703. Then, having decided who are to be boarded out, they call in the medical officer, and he certifies that the child is free from debility or sickness, and is physically fit to be boarded out. That is so, is it not ?—Yes, he has a form which he fills in and says that the child is in good health, with certain exceptions, which he enters in a space for the purpose, if there are exceptions.

9704. Then the child is sent to the committee ?—Yes, to the country committee.

9705. Now, as regards the kind of committees: I think we gathered from your evidence that, to begin with, when the system was started in 1870 and for some fifteen years afterwards these committees were very unsatisfactory ?—I could not say whether they were unsatisfactory, because they were not inspected, and I never saw them, except such that I happened to know privately.

9706. I think it appears from what you say that this system had a very bad start, because it frequently happened that children were sent to these committees, and it appears they were lost sight of altogether, and the foster-parents practically were not paid the money which ought to have been sent to these committees, which did not really exist. I want to reach this: that the system had a very bad start ?—The system began gradually. It was not possible to make an organisation when there were only one or two committees, nor was it desirable to appoint an inspector until there was a sufficient number of committees to justify the appointment of an inspector. I do not remember saying the foster-parents were not paid the money, except in the special cases I have given.

9707. Does not that follow, because the payments were made by the guardians to the boarding-out committees, and if the boarding-out committees did not exist then the parents were not paid ?—I think the money somehow percolated through.

sponsi-lity of ardians for arded-out ildren and ssibility of creasing it.

9708. What I want to arrive at is this, that apparently in England whenever the board of guardians part with the child and the child is handed over to the committee, their whole responsibility seems to cease; they are no longer in the position of parent of the child. They are no longer in loco parentis to the child which is boarded-out. Is not that so ?—No, that is not so.

9709. What is the tie between the board of guardians and the boarded-out child ?—The tie is, the guardians still have control and can deal with the child as they please. If the guardians order the child to be removed it will be removed whether the committee like it or not.

9710. They do not inspect ?—No they do not inspect and they could not.

9712. Does not it occur to you that possibly the intervention of the committee might be saved if the board of guardians themselves retained their powers over the children, and themselves undertook the duty of inspection ?—They could not.

9713. Either by themselves or their officers ?—No, they could not. They have complete control now as it is.

9715. But if there is a lady inspector, as there is in some cases ?—You mean, supposing the guardians appoint a lady officer to go down ?

9716. Yes ?—In that case she would not be resident on the spot. Suppose the child broke its arm or leg, a child brought there and chargeable to a London Union (there are a great many still in Devonshire, and there used to be a great many in Windermere) there must be someone on the spot to look after it—a committee.

9717. Might not that be obviated by putting the duty on the guardians or the relieving, or other officer of the union or parish where the child is boarded-out ?—No; the ladies do it far better. That is put on the guardians and their relieving officers in the case of non-resident relief. They do not care a bit what happens to the pauper children; in my experience they pay the money and do not inquire. I have known children boarded-out in that manner, non-resident relief, and, nobody has inquired about them. The people have gone to the pay stations to fetch the money and nobody has supervised the child.

9718. You do not think it would answer the purpose at all to put any duty on the Poor Law administration or parish officials in the union in which the boarded-out child is boarded ?—It would not be any use; I know they would not take it, they would not like it, they would say, "Why should we have your paupers thrust on us ?" they would not do it. It would be very unsatisfactory if they did. They would not take the same interest. These ladies, whatever the shortcomings of some of them, take an immense interest in the children, and great pains in looking after them, and after the children have gone to service too.

9719. You think that the committees which now exist do their duties better ?—Those that exist now, most of them; it is quite impossible to speak too highly of the care they take for these children; some of them spend their lives in doing nothing else but looking after them. It is quite impossible to speak too highly of them. You could never replace those; you would lose that voluntary help and voluntary personal care which is the essence of all charity.

9720. At the same time I think your opinion of the committees is not uniformly good, because I notice in your statement you say: "Children are not infrequently placed out, not for their own benefit, but that of the coachman, gardener, old cooks or housemaids or other dependents of the committees, as well as with widows disabled, or other poor persons whom they wish to help to support" ?—You will see I have said the danger within the union is still greater because they are placed with the constituents of the guardians; if you throw on the guardians of the country unions the onus of finding the homes for the London children, you would find they would be used for the purpose of placing them with the constituents of the country guardians; there would be that additional danger.

9721. My point is, I think it might avoid any such result if the duty were put upon the board of guardians to find the foster-parents ?—You think it would be better for the guardians to do so ?

Miss M. H. Mason.

23 April 1906.

9722. It would avoid, would it not, the possibility of such a thing taking place as you refer to in Paragraphs 47 and 86?—No, I think it would increase the risk.

9723. Increase the risk?—Yes, ten-fold.

9724. In what way?—There would be the same local favouritism added to that of the chance of placing them with the constituents of the local guardians, and there would be the absolute impossibility of inspection, because the guardians neither could inspect, nor would they. I think, as I have shown, boarding-out within the union is bad enough already without wanting to place the without committees under the same authority.

Need for high class of persons on boarding-out Committees

9725. There is another criticism I think you make upon the committees in Paragraph 21, where you say: "These committees should consist of ladies of a class above that of the foster-parents whose homes they visit," otherwise the foster-parents resent interference by the committees. Has that happened very often in your experience?—Yes, it has happened when the committee ladies were of the same class as the foster-parents.

9726. The foster-parents resist and resent the interference of the committee?—They do.

9727. Must not that very often happen?—No, because in England, which is thickly populated, we can generally find ladies of some sort.

9728. You have to find ladies of social standing superior to that of the foster-parents where the children are boarded?—Yes.

9729. That is essential to the success of such a committee?—Yes; and the committee is also essential, I should say, to the safety of the boarded-out child.

9730. Why essential to the safety of the boarded-out child?—To have someone on the spot who can inspect and look after it.

9731. It does not require superior social standing to do that?—Yes, it does; because the foster-parent does not care for neighbours of her own class to come into her house and look all over her rooms and examine the child's clothing and see how much she has spent.

9732. If it was a duty of a committee, would not that be sufficient?—No, they would be very much afraid to do it. Neither the committee woman nor the foster-mother would like it. For instance, one committee I inspected was made up of engine drivers' wives entirely, it was in a suburb of a railway district: it all came to grief; they did not want to get into difficulties with their neighbours for inspecting.

9733. The foster-parents resent the interference of such a committee?—Yes.

9734. Have you often found that?—Wherever that was so, always.

9735. Can you give me an approximation of the number of cases of that kind?—I am always afraid of giving figures at a moment's notice for fear I should not be correct.

9736. Will you say generally?—I can recall another case where there was a Committee which has also come to an end, where there was a wheelwright's wife and someone else of the same class, and it was impossible for them to inspect; that was in Buckinghamshire.

9737. Quite good people for that purpose except for their social standing?—Quite so, and people I should have consulted. I should always consult working women to know what should be done with working people's children, they know what is right and best; only it is not for them to be the executive to carry it out; they are the best to give the advice, but not to carry it out with authority.

Duties of lady inspectors of boarding-out.

9738. Take now your own workers, the lady inspectors of the board. I think the lady inspectors, you tell us, are not appointed for the purpose of inspecting the children so much as for the purpose of inspecting the committees. Is not that so?—Yes.

9739. You have no official duties as regards the children and the homes?—Oh, yes, we inspect the children and the homes, and we report upon each child and each home. First of all, we do so for the purpose of ascertaining whether the Committees are putting them in proper homes and looking properly after them. We are not responsible for putting them in those homes, and not responsible for their care there.

9740. Do you desire to modify what you say in Paragraph 39 then? It was that which attracted my notice?—You have a very rough proof. I may say I wrote that in Nottinghamshire away from my references in London

9741. You say "the inspectors are not responsible for the children and homes." I deduced from that that you had no duty to inspect the children in their homes, no official inspection, "but they inspect them as the only real means of ascertaining whether the committees are inspecting and supervising properly. . . . The inspection of homes and children by the inspector also tends to keep the committees up to the mark in their inspection, gives them an example of how to inspect, and otherwise trains, helps, encourages and supports them in good work." Then you have a duty?—Yes, that is our principal duty. We inspect as many homes and as many children as we have time for under each committee, and we report on every individual child and every individual home in detail. That is why, you see, I have these books. This is my note-book. I take these notes on every single case that I visit, full details and full notes on every case.

9742. And those notes on each individual case that you inspect are communicated to the boards of guardians?—The report that is founded on those notes.

9743. You communicate it to the board of guardians and also to the Local Government Board?—Yes. We report to the Local Government Board on each child and home. Copies of those reports are sent by the Local Government Board to the board of guardians and to the committee of ladies.

9744. (Professor Smart.) Do you go alone or with members of the committee when inspecting?—I go alone as a rule, unless I take any member of a committee with me for her instruction. I always take members of a new committee with me, in order to show them how to inspect for themselves. I do not take them with me to show me the home; I take them to show them the home and how to inspect it and the child.

Amount nature, and results of inspection boarded-ou children by lady inspector.

9745. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) I think you say, at the outside you get through 500 cases in the year; is not that so?—That is all that can be done to do them really thoroughly and well.

9746. And that in such case your inspection is so minute that you generally spend a quarter of an hour over each child?—Yes; it depends on whether it has all its buttons and boot-laces right, and so on.

9747. Do you find in these inspections that there is any resentment on the part of the foster parents?—Never, if they are doing right. I could not call to memory one. They always say: "Quite right; it is what I should like you to do if I had to leave my own child an orphan."

9748. I suppose such inspection really results in this that these children are probably put on a higher pedestal than the children of the foster parents themselves, are they not?—I do not think so at all. I think it is just the same; we only want to ascertain that they are treated as the foster-parents' own.

9749. You think it is necessary to go through the minute examination you give us in detail here, in order to ascertain that?—Certainly, you could not do it without. The best outsides are very often the worst underneath, and a rough looking outside may mean nothing more than a little carelessness, and the child is perfectly well treated.

9750. You do not think that this minute inspection interferes in any way with the class of foster parents that you get, because one could quite understand that some foster parents, who might be thoroughly willing to take children, might object to such a thoroughly minute inspection as you suggest. It really seems to impute that they are not doing their best to the children, but that they are doing their worst, and there is a sense of suspicion; does not that occur to you?—No, I would always refuse to inspect on suspicion. If you treat everybody alike there is no complaint. You should go round to the women and hear what they say. If you treat everybody alike everybody is satisfied. They know perfectly well that your inspection is not for the sole purpose of discovering what is wrong, but for the purpose of certifying that everything is right. If ever I were instructed, as I do not anticipate, not to inspect properly, I should report simply on the outside of a case, and say: My impression, is that it is all right, but I will not be sure.

9751. Are you aware that that criticism has been made on the system?—Yes.

9752. As far as your experience goes it is without foundation?—I think it is. My ways are the ways of the working people themselves, not the ways of the theorist.

Reasons for decrease of numbers of children boarded-out without the Union.

9753. And you do not think that that system may, to some extent, account for the falling off in the number of boarded-out children outside the union?—I am sure it is not that.

9754. The difficulty of finding foster-parents?—No, I say it is not. That is why I give the reasons why some boards of guardians have given it up. I have given them with more detail than I otherwise should in the Appendix, the reasons why St. Pancras, Lambeth, and Wandsworth have given up the boarding-out system. I have given that in full detail, anticipating your objection; and Nottingham I may say I have given for that reason too; they board out within the union apparently because I cannot take their children in my own district.

Perfection of existing system of boarding-out.

9755. I see you have a very high opinion of the merits of your system, because you say that you could not offer further suggestions for its perfection?—No, I could not.

9756. Do not you think, having regard to the character you have given some committees and some foster-parents that that statement should be subject to some modification?—I said the system is the best that can possibly be. I have not said that the human beings of whom it is composed are, because I do not undertake to reform human beings generally, we are dealing with human beings, we have human beings on our committees and we are all fallible, our foster-parents are fallible too. We cannot in this world, I am afraid, form boarding-out committees of angels.'

9757. I quite assent to your view that the boarding-out system is the best for the children?—That is all I have said.

9758. You put it, I thought, rather higher than that, because you said you could not offer any further suggestion for its perfection. If it is the system you take, as compared with other systems, I assent?—If I had any further suggestions for its perfection, I should have made them before the issue of the Boarding-Out Order of last autumn.

Criticism of system of inspection of boarded-out children in Scotland.

9759. You have offered some criticisms upon the system which prevails in Scotland; I wish to ask you one or two questions regarding it. I think what you say is hearsay, is it not? You say you have never heard of this thorough inspection being made in Scotland, by which alone in your opinion the real treatment of the children can be ascertained. Are you aware that in Scotland there is an inspection not only by the parish council, who are the board of guardians, and by the inspector of the parish which boards out the children, but that there is also a duty upon the officials and others in the parish where the children are boarded out to communicate, if they see fit to do so, or the necessity arises for their doing so, with the parish which is boarding these children out and which has the responsibility for them?—Yes, I am quite aware of that.

9760. And that there are very anxious rules and regulations of the Local Government Board putting those duties on the people I have named?—Yes.

9761. There is also in some of the larger parishes, take Glasgow for instance, a lady inspector, and she is, of course, the person whose duty it is to inspect all the boarded-out children?—She was appointed after I had had some communication with some of the Glasgow ladies and we agreed how bad the system was without. I did not think it necessary to mention that.

9762. I was not aware of that. The schoolmasters of the parishes where the children are boarded-out (who are often the inspectors) also report any failure to attend school or anything calling for remark in the condition or conduct of the children?—Yes, that is so. But I should not consider that anything like sufficient; it is not inspection, it is only a mere cursory examination that does not take the place of inspection.

9763. You think so?—Quite so; I mean for this reason: the schoolmaster has no right to undress a child and cannot inspect its home and find out about its food and clothing and sleeping arrangements. He can only see how it comes to school. Our schoolmasters are all bound to report. We cannot board a child out where the schoolmaster is not willing to fill in a report, but we do not depend upon that.

9764. You appear to suggest, I do not know whether I take it up rightly, that there is an objection to boarding out children far from their own union, and you say that you believe some of those chargeable to Glasgow and Edinburgh are boarded out in Skye and even north of that. I rather gathered that some of the London children are boarded out as far as Westmoreland?—Quite so, but they are boarded out under committees in Westmoreland and Devonshire.

9765. There is no committee in Scotland, and you think to board them out so far away without a committee is bad?—Yes. I think Skye is a delightful place to board them out, but I would have a committee there.

9766. I only want further to draw your attention to this. You speak of a paper which you read, on the English system of boarding-out, in 1904.—Yes

9767. I do not know whether you propose to put that in?—I am quite willing to take that out, if you like. I will do it with pleasure.

9768. I do not think it really matters?—I only put it in to show I was not interfering with you: that I went there by request to speak.

9769. There was a description of the kind of inspection which prevails in Scotland given on the same occasion by Miss Aikman herself, a lady member of the Glasgow Parish Council?—I remember Miss Aikman quite well.

9770. Glasgow children are visited twice a year by two members of the council accompanied by an official, and they are all surprise visits, and a further description is given as to how that inspection is carried through?—Yes.

9771. You do not think that is sufficient without a further inspection by ladies and an examination of each individual child and a complete and minute enquiry as to whether that child has been well treated or no?—That you think is essential?—Yes, I think that is essential. I think that such an inspection as three people at a time going to a house, two members of the Council and an official with them, is very undesirable, I am always quite willing to take a guardian or anyone with me, but I always say I would rather have only one at a time. Three makes such a commotion, it fills the house, worries the women, and, as a rule, it is very much easier to find things out when there is one than when there is a whole party.

9772. Is it on that ground that you think that the system which prevails in Scotland (you say Ireland is an example to Scotland and I suppose Ireland is behind England on that matter of inspection) is so far behind?—Yes, I think so.

The re-action against boarding-out, the reasons and remedies for it.

9773. (Mr. Loch.) Do you think there has been anything in the nature of a reaction against boarding-out? I ask this in reference to what you say on page 6 of your Appendix, namely, that in Cornwall, Durham and Leicester there were committees in the old days but they are all now ended; and then on page 11 you refer to the various difficulties in creating committees, and you say one of the main reasons why boarding-out committees do not multiply more rapidly is the absence of any agency to find, start, or enlist them. Then, again, there are the figures themselves of out-union boarding-out which, at any rate, show a very slight increase from year to year. Therefore, I ask whether you think there is a reaction against the whole system?—I think there is a certain amount of it, because the extreme advocates of the system have claimed for it more than it can give. They have claimed that the foster-parents take the children from love. Then guardians sometimes, when they found it was for money said, "Well, here is your boarding-out system, and it is done for nothing but profit!" That is unjust, in fact both sides are unjust. The people

Miss M. H. Mason.

23 April 1906.

doubtedly take the children for money; but they may do that all the same, and having begun by taking them for money, may become fond of them subsequently. The extreme advocates have claimed for the system what it cannot possibly give, and, naturally, being disappointed, guardians have given it up; but I do not think that is the only reason for the diminution in the boarding-out system.

9774. Taking your first reason (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XX. (J.)) do you think that there should be started some kind of agency to find, start or enlist committees? Can anything positive be done in that direction?—I think if the inspectors of the Local Government Board had the time for doing it, that that would be desirable, but I should rather deprecate having any voluntary and outside association for the purpose, because I think voluntary associations sometimes have a tendency to step beyond the limits of the purpose for which they are founded.

9775. To take your first suggestion, would you be prepared to think that what might be called explanatory work with regard to boarding-out is work that might be efficiently undertaken to a greater degree than it is at present, with a view to acting as an agency to stimulate the movement?—Yes, I quite think so; I think it might be done, only the inspectors have not the time. I have at length given you the number of meetings, as far as I can remember them, which I have addressed this year, in order to give you some idea of how I have tried to start further committees; but that is all in addition to my own proper duties, and I have not the time to do more. It would require additions to the staff to be able to undertake such work on any considerable scale.

Limitation of number of proper cottages for boarding-out.

9776. Then another question arises, namely, the insufficiency of cottage accommodation. I was struck by this statement in the Report of the Departmental Committee on Poor Law Schools. "The number of children boarded-out beyond the union is 1,802, of whom 968 are chargeable to the boards of guardians in the Metropolis. This number represents a very small proportion of the children eligible for boarding-out, and we believe that good homes could be found for many times this number. The secretary of the Clifton Committee says:—'I have homes now; I am waiting for children to fill them.' Miss Jane Walker, M.D., who inspects the children boarded-out by Dr. Barnardo, says:—'I think the number is practically limitless of good country homes. I am always surprised when I go to a new centre; I am always expecting to find a set of bad homes when I start a new centre, but I never do.'" Does your information confirm that?—No. My experience is quite the opposite—I have given a sample of one of Dr. Barnardo's homes. As a matter of fact, you can write to every committee and you can ask them, and nearly all will say they cannot place more than a certain number of children in proper homes, owing to the want of cottage accommodation and owing to many other reasons—perhaps there is too large a family, perhaps the man drinks—there may be many reasons. Nor it is not every cottager who wants to take a child.

9777. If that is so, then there is a kind of natural limit to the extent to which this system can be pushed?—There must be.

Effect of country holiday funds on boarding-out.

9778. Do you think that the action of the country holidays fund, which of course deals with a large number of cases in connection with London, tends to make a limitation on another side, namely, that these people are quite content to receive those country holiday cases, and do not want anything more?—Yes, I think that has made a very great difference. I think I have seen somewhere that one association alone sends out 26,000 children a year. That naturally fills the homes. The people prefer to have the country holidays children, because they only have them in the summer for a short period, they are paid 5s. a week for them, they do not have to provide clothes, and really the children are no trouble, because they are sent there for the purpose of running about in the open air. There is an enormous number sent out in this way; the large towns send the children out in the summer as well as London.

9779. So that practically we get a new form of summer boarding-out, which is materially affecting the ability to deal with the permanent boarding-out?—Quite so; that really does affect it.

9780. Then we notice at the same time that the indoor boarding-out is increasing rapidly, that is to say, in 1890 the number of children was 2,899 and in 1905 the number was 6,814; that follows upon the Order of 1889 apparently, at any rate, that order presumably affects all these 6,814 children, does it not?—Yes.

Necessity for boarding-out committees for children boarded-out within the union.

9781. That order as it stands throws the whole responsibility upon the local boarding-out committee within the union, does it not?—Upon the guardians within the union, because it is only a certain proportion of boards of guardians who avail themselves of the services of a boarding-out committee of ladies within the union.

9782. Can you say to what extent that holds? Are there a great many boards who have no boarding-out committee?—I think there are about 650 unions, and out of that number there are a little under 111 which have boarding-out committees. There are 111 within union boarding-out committees. There is more than one within the union in a few instances.

9783. The greater number of these 6,814 children who were boarded out within the union of chargeability, would be looked after by no committee?—No; they would be looked after by the relieving officer and the medical officer only.

9784. Do you think that is at all satisfactory?—No, not at all.

9785. Would your conclusion be that the boarding-out order should make it compulsory that there should be a committee wherever there are children boarded out, whether inside the union or outside?—I think it would be desirable, but I doubt as to the possibility of making it compulsory. I think something might perhaps be done to promote it by issuing a circular? I should myself be more in favour of that than of compelling them to do it all at once.

9786. But if your argument holds that the relieving officer plus boards of guardians are not able to see to this matter thoroughly, does it not follow that there should be either a boarding-out committee or some other organisation?—I think there should be a boarding-out committee. My only doubt about the question is as to the practicability of forcing it all at once upon the guardians. It is only a matter of expediency, and not of what it is desirable to do.

9787. Might I make a suggestion—that there might be some intermediate step? Would it be possible to arrange that a lady or two ladies should be as it were recognised as voluntary assistants in this matter; in that way creating, not a formal committee, but something like a special agency for this purpose?—That is what I have described that I did myself in Nottinghamshire, before the Order of 1889, and found quite insufficient. The ladies had no real authority and did not consider themselves really responsible. If it were not possible to force it upon the guardians, I think, with all deference to Sir Samuel Provis, that what would be much better would be for the Local Government Board to send round a circular pointing out that it would be advisable. Whether it should be forced upon them, or whether such a circular should be written, would be a matter for the Board.

Sufficiency of boarding-out allowance

9788. I gather you are of opinion that the payment now advocated of 5s. is sufficient?—Yes. I think it is more than sufficient in cases where the children are small, and in districts where the wages are low. Where the wages are low, the present scale is quite enough, but where the wages are higher and the rents are higher, the people will not take the children for 4s.

9789. Accepting 5s. for out-union boarding-out, should you not logically accept it for in-union boarding-out?—I think it might be made permissive, but I should be sorry to encourage it, because I think it would make a great rise in out-relief.

9790. At present, according to the evidence before us, it would seem that what is inadequate outdoor relief is being given on the plea of its being money expended in boarding-out, that is to say, eighteenpence or so is given in that way; and the consequence is that if the standard adopted in out-union practice is right the in-union must be wrong?—I think there is altogether a great deal that is wrong in the system of out-relief, but it would be very difficult to lay down a fixed and unvarying rate of payments for in-union boarding-out. A great many of the children are with relatives, and it would be very difficult to apply to those cases the same universal scale of payments which is given in the case of children who are sent right away from their own district and where there is no question of out-relief.

Lack of official information as to boarding-out within the union.

9791. Has any inquiry been made about in-union boarding-out in recent years, in the form of a report by a Commission or any other body?—Not that I am aware of.

9792. Then the whole subject has not been re-examined?—No, it has not been re-examined into since 1889, when that Order was issued.

9792. Then the whole subject has not been re-examined into?—No, it has not been re-examined into since 1889, when that Order was issued.

9793. Was there an inquiry as to in-union boarding-out in all its branches before that Order was issued?—There was no investigation beyond what I told you I made myself.

Value of certified institutions as a supplement to boarding-out.

9794. In the paragraphs beginning at 95 you have dealt with the question of voluntary homes, and, speaking first of all, of Voluntary Homes and Certified Schools you say "Generally speaking, I have found these homes invaluable both for the reception of children not suitable for boarding-out, or for training older girls or boys who have been either unmanageable or incapable when boarded out, or who have had to be removed from unsatisfactory homes." Do you consider that the boarding-out system should be supplemented by a kind of special home system?—No, I do not think it is necessary that it should be specially supplemented by such a system, but I think that these homes, existing as they are, are already an excellent supplement.

9795. Would it depend upon the inspector to consider this point, or upon the committee?—The committee and the inspectors, when they find a case of a child who would be better dealt with in a certified home, take steps to send it there.

9796. But in the case of in-union boarding-out there would be nobody to send the children on to a certified home if they were unsuitably boarded out?—No, not unless there is a certified committee or unless the guardians think of it for themselves.

Cases of Poor Law children boarded-out by certified institutions.

9797. With regard to the "three cases of homes where children ostensibly sent by the guardians to be trained in there, were illegally boarded-out instead, and it was admitted by the secretary of one society that they boarded-out all children under six sent to their certified homes;" how would the secretary of such a society receive the money? He would receive it, would he not, under conditions which the very receipt showed would necessitate his boarding-out the children that he received the money for?—I am not an inspector of certified homes, and I could not say what form he would send his receipt in. I cannot speak about these cases, because they were not cases that I came across myself. That was his own statement. In the cases where I found it out myself, the guardians sent the payment to the secretary or the managers of the certified home, supposing that the child was in the home, whereas, apparently without saying anything about it, they had boarded them out in the neighbourhood. The guardians paid for the child as in the home, and so the secretary of the home received the money, but the child really was placed outside, where it ought not to have been.

9798. Do you suppose that in a rather large voluntary institution, there are a great many payments made by guardians on the understanding that the children should be in certified homes?—Yes. The guardians pay straight to the secretary or managers of the certified homes. There are a large number of children in such homes, but I cannot tell you how many. Understand me, they are not all Poor Law children; they are mixed; some are voluntary, and some are Poor Law. I could not tell you how many are Poor Law, because they do not come within my inspection.

9799. Therefore, for these cases, there is really no supervision to enable a board of guardians to see whether the certified homes keep the children for which they pay?—No. They know that the child is sent there, but they have not always known where it really is, and I do not see that there is any means of knowing where a particular child is.

9800. We follow the children into the certified homes, and we inspect the homes, do we not?—The home is inspected.

9801. But we do not follow the children into the voluntary boarding-out institutions, and inspect those homes?—That is not supposed to be done. I only found it out by some accident.

Need for further inspection of boarding-out within the union.

9802. Do you think that the in-union cases should be inspected by inspectors appointed by the Local Government Board, as the out-union cases are, and on some similar plan?—Yes, I do.

Question of inspection of children under care of charitable associations.

9803. Do you think that the voluntary cases should be inspected on some similar plan?—I do not think myself that the voluntary cases could be; I do not think that we could undertake the voluntary cases.

9804. Granted that it is not a question of staff, but that it is a question of principle, do you think that it would be desirable to inspect the voluntary cases?—That would mean the inspection of the whole of charity. I do not see how the Local Government Board could undertake the inspection of charitable institutions and agencies; I scarcely see how they could.

9806. Do you think that the number boarded-out in voluntary homes is very large?—I do not think the number is so very large.

9808. My suggestion is that the principle adopted of certification, where you send a child to a voluntary home certified to be good to receive a child, might possibly be pushed further in the case of voluntary associations?—I would on no account certify those societies and their boardings-out.

9809. In regard to these cases as they stand, if the in-union cases were inspected, you would have to have a considerable addition to the inspectorate here, would you not?—No doubt.

Increase of staff necessary for inspection of children boarded-out within the union.

9810. You think that about 500 cases (it is your own figure) is a year's work?—I think that is the outside that anybody can do, to do it thoroughly, and in addition to do the amount of writing and other duties which are required of the inspectors. Therefore I have said that I think to take all the within-union children would require at least six more inspectors in order to inspect them every two years.

Motives of guardians in boarding-out e.g., Islington.

9811. Do you think this boarding-out system is used by guardians at all to clear the schools? I notice that Islington has 127 boarded-out cases; is that owing to local politics, or is it owing to a special desire to board out?—At present I think Islington are pressed for room. At the same time Islington, I must say, are very careful where they board out. They always write for information as to what committees to send them to. They do not board the children out wholesale in any way.

9812. To whom do they write—to you?—Generally.

9813. Then you act as a kind of centre of information?—As a kind of register.

Question of a central authority for London for boarded-out children.

9814. Turning again to the Report of the Departmental Committee, I see they refer to the dual control as a bad thing, and suggest a central authority with regard to London; are you at all in favour of a change in that direction?—I do not quite remember what they said; and I should not much regard what they did say.

Miss M. H. Mason.

23 April 1906.

9815. This is what they say: "The whole evidence reveals to us the fact that in the present dual system of control by which the guardians board out, and the Local Government Board inspect the children, there is an element of danger which must be faced and dealt with. When comparing Dr. Barnardo's methods with those of the Poor Law, in respect of his plan of receiving back his boarded-out boys for a period of training, Miss Mason commends the doctor's plan and says, 'But, you see, the difference is, Dr. Barnardo boards out his boys, and he can have them back when he pleases. The Local Government Board do not board out these children, and there is no central place at which to have them back for training.'" And then they conclude, "It seems evident to us that the authority boarding-out the children should possess the power to deal with them under all circumstances, including their inspection, and after full consideration of the whole subject we recommend that the duty of carrying out and supervising the arrangements for boarding-out the Poor Law children of the metropolis be intrusted to the suggested central authority." Are you in favour of any great change in that direction?—In the first place, let me say that you quote my own words to me, but I will not at all undertake that I said them. After that committee published its Report, I printed a very simple paper with what they said I said in one column and what I did say, according to their own report of my evidence, in the other, and there was a very great discrepancy between the two. I could not say, therefore, whether I said that; but I certainly do not remember commending Dr. Barnardo's plan of having his children back. It is simply this, that he sent them out and he had them back, and the guardians do much the same when necessary. The guardians send their boys out, and if they want to have them back for training or to send them anywhere for training they can do so. According to a return which I have here, and which I am going to hand in presently (see Appendix Vol. I.(A), No. XX. (L),) out of 872 children boarded-out since 1895, eighty-two boys have been sent to training ships or training homes, and seventy girls have been sent to the M.A.B.Y.S. or to training homes. I do not see what more you want; certainly you do not want a central body. The Local Government Board are the central body, to deal with central matters.

The after-care of boarded-out children.

9816. Therefore, what is called here the after-care required, you say is practically a thing that is dealt with as it arises in the cases?—Quite so. The boarded-out children are admirably looked after for the London unions by their committees when in the country, and by the M.A.B.Y.S. when they come up to London. With regard to the country unions, the Girls' Friendly Society does a great deal, but not in a very systematic way.

9817. As I understand your position from your memorandum, you would desire to develop associative work on the lines of the M.A.B.Y.S.?—Yes.

9818. And to take the cases up where the guardians leave them?—Yes. The Metropolitan Association does that for London, and I should like to have it extended to the country unions. It is very desirable that it should be.

9819. That is a form of co-operation with charities that you would wish to advocate?—Quite so.

Functions of the guardians under the Infant Life Protection Act.

9820. You know, I think, the Infant Life Protection Act of 1897, which requires that there should be a notification to the local authority in regard to any person retaining or receiving for hire or reward more than one infant under the age of five years, and so forth; and so throws the responsibility, if I remember right, in London on the County Council, and elsewhere on the guardians; have you come across children who are being dealt with under that Act?—Yes.

9821. In London?—No. I do not visit any homes in London. There are no children boarded-out in London 9822. Have you ever come across them outside London?—Yes, I have.

9823. Are you inclined to think the Infant Life Protection Act could be in any way dealt with in connection with the general system of inspection of boarded-out children?—That again, you see, is voluntary; they are paid for from voluntary funds. I think it would be difficult.

9824. Yet here we have, if I remember right, the guardians acting as the authority for inspection outside London?—Yes, that is so.

9825. So that you have in this case two forms of inspection already going on—the supervision of in-union boarded-out cases and the inspection of "infant life" cases under this Act?—Yes.

9826. So that the guardians already in this matter have extended their functions so as to include voluntary children?—Yes.

9827. But you think on the whole that it would be better not to go on that line?—I am not at all sure that if there was some other authority, that would not be better than the guardians undertaking the inspection of infant life because it is not a Poor Law matter. If there were any other authority who could undertake the inspection under the Infant Life Protection Acts, I think that would be desirable rather than letting the guardians do it.

9828. (Mr. Chandler.) I gather from your remarks in paragraph 52 that, providing the same system of Government inspection were compulsory in regard to boarding-out within the union, you would consider the system perfectly satisfactory?—If you mean to say if that the system existed within the union that there is beyond the union, my reply is, Yes, I should think this as satisfactory as it could be, taking human nature as it is.

9829. And you do not wish to see it disturbed in any way?—No, I do not.

Adequacy of boarding-out allowance.

9830. Do you think that the amount of the payment that is made for the children has any relation whatever to the treatment of those children?—No. I do not think a child is a bit better treated for 5s. than it is for 2s. If a woman is kind, or if she is conscientious, she will do her duty for whatever sum she has consented to receive the child at.

9831. I think you have said that the basis of payment was fixed with a view to giving a slight profit for the trouble that is necessarily entailed in looking after a child?—Yes.

9832. You quoted the instance of a man earning 15s. per week with five in family, which averages 3s. per head per week; there the payment of 4s. gives a profit of 1s.?—Yes.

9833. Then you also told us that in your experience the worst treated children were by no means in the families of those who were low paid?—Yes, that is so.

9834. Do you not think that that may have something to do with the standard of living in those houses? The standard of living in the case of a mechanic who will earn 30s. per week, would be generally higher all round than the standard of living in the case of a man who is earning 15s. per week, would it not?—Yes.

9836. That is, you have raised the limit so that you make it a permissive 5s.?—Yes. We do not wish to have only the poorest class of people taking these children. Wherever the committees find that 4s. is not enough, they are now empowered to ask for 5s. from the guardians.

9837. And that, you think, quite ample?—Yes, I think it is.

Attitude of foster-parents towards boarded-out children.

9838. In regard to the advantages of the boarding-out system, you say that it furnishes a home to return to between situations or on a holiday when in service; but, of course, the payments towards the child cease when the child goes out to service?—Yes.

The putting out of boarded-out children to service or to trades and its effect on the labour market.

9839. Do you think that the desire to recognise them as one of the family, and to take them in between situations is prevalent after the payments cease?—Yes.

9840. Is that really so?—It is almost universal.

9841. (Mrs. Bosanquet.) Is it habitual for the guardians to pay anything for apprenticing boarded-out children after they have ceased to be chargeable?—It is not habitual, but it is occasional; it is not infrequent.

9842. That would be apprenticing them to some trade, a local trade probably ?—Yes, it is generally a local trade at some place in the neighbourhood.

9843. I have heard it said by people living in the country where there are boarded-out children, that the boarded-out children for whom the guardians pay generally get all the country places round about, and that the real village children have to turn out and look for work elsewhere; do you think there is much in that ?—It may be so now and then, because the ladies naturally take trouble to find places for their boarded-out children, and those have got powerful friends in the neighbourhood who will find places for them. Naturally, these children must after a time cease to be paid for, and so the ladies who have looked after them until that time try to get them places.

9844. Might we, therefore, have a sort of circulation of town boys getting country work and country boys having to go up to the town ?—I have never heard of its driving the country boys to the town. I have heard sometimes that boarded-out children get the best places in the neighbourhood, but I have never heard that they have driven the other children away.

9846. Do you think it would be difficult to institute a system of records, showing what became of the children after they ceased to become chargeable, so that we might have a systematic record of them ? It struck me on looking through your evidence before the Departmental Committee on Poor Law Schools, that there might be a considerable number who returned to the workhouse after they had ceased to be chargeable as children—not a large number, but still a considerable number ?—I got returns from every clerk to the guardians of every union that has boarded out, but I found it quite impossible to tabulate them accurately. I have done it as best I can, and I will hand in the results to the Chairman presently. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XX. (K).) But I think you will find the summary of the history of every union which I gave much more useful than a mere tabulation, because I have given the circumstances and the reasons why the children returned. Then again, I have brought with me another table which shows what has happened to the children since the Poor Law Schools Committee reported. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XX. (L).) I am not quite sure whether that return is accurate, because I am not quite sure whether all the clerks to the guardians understood that I referred to the return to the union of children who have been boarded-out before and after 1895. I have got those who have been returned to the union as unfit for boarding-out or for some other reason, while they were still young, and also those who have been returned to the union after they have entered service because they failed in service or something else happened.

9847. But we have not at present, have we, either for the school children or for the boarded-out children, a record for, say, three years, until one might say they were fairly started in life ?—A great many committees keep such a record, and I have got a great many from the different committees. There is, for instance, a committee at Sidmouth which keeps a perfect and complete register of the history of all the children who have gone out. Then, again, Mr. Trevelyan, of Calverton, who died last Christmas, had a correct list of about 200 boarded-out children; but Mr. Trevelyan was exceptional in his work and influence, and I do not think his case should count; but Sidmouth can count.

9848. Could it be made universal, do you think, so that there would be some definite information to go upon and to judge the results by ?—Yes; I could collect it.

9849. If it was kept as it went along, it would be very much easier than collecting it at a particular time ?—A good many committees do keep a register, and I could get a ready-made register from a large number at once. One thing to be considered is that the statistics which you have to rely upon are often very inaccurate and are carelessly compiled. Mr. Mundella was not satisfied with my account, and I think he did not care much about it. He asked the Local Government Board for another, and Sir Samuel Provis will remember that the Local Government Board themselves sent out officially and collected statistics from every union, showing what had become of the children. Those statistics will be quite available to you. It is "Board of Guardians (Boarded-out Children)" Return to an Order of the House of Commons dated 22nd March, 1897. (Mr. Mundella.)

9850. Have the guardians themselves any system by which they know for three years what is happening to all the children who were boarded-out, so that they may be quite able to tell you ?—That would not be the case with quite all boards of guardians, but most of them. For instance Paddington and St. Pancras have such a system; they keep very accurate registers, and they could tell you, always. I think you will see something of the difficulties of ascertaining accurately, if you will look at the supplement to my evidence before the Poor Law Schools Committee.

9851. I have looked at it, and that is what made me think that if this system should be made universal, those difficulties would disappear ?—I think it could be, and I should think it would be a very good thing. Long before my official appointment I tried to make such a record through the Girls' Friendly Society, but I found the society itself very impracticable about it. Also, they only look after girls of good character, whereas we want to know about all kinds of girls.

9852. When we talk about children turning out well through all these systems, we are talking a little in the air sometimes, because we do not know what has become of them; therefore any accurate knowledge would be a help ?—I quite agree with you; I have always wished it myself, and if I had time I would do it for the boarded-out children.

9853. About the Country Holidays Fund, that only lasts, does it not, for about a month, and in the summer ?—It lasts a little more than that; it lasts, I should say, quite six or eight weeks.

Effect of country holiday funds on boarding-out.

9854. Do you think that for a payment from the Country Holidays Fund for six weeks these foster-parents would find it worth their while to forego having boarded-out children ?—It would really mean more than that, because I think they begin sending the children out about June, and they go on until nearly October, at any rate they go on all through September sometimes, and they often have several at a time. They do find it quite worth their while.

Adequacy of boarding-out allowances.

9855. (Mr. Gardiner.) Could you give us any reason why the children who are boarded out within the union should only be paid for at the rate of 4s. a week, whereas those who are boarded out without the union may be paid for at the rate of 5s. a week ?—As a matter of fact they are not always paid for at the rate of even 4s. a week within the union; it is about 3s. to 3s. 6d. within the union.

9856. What reason is there for that ?—Because country guardians do not like parting with the money.

9857. Is that the only reason ?—Chiefly that, and also because a good many of the children are boarded out with relations who sometimes take them for 1s. 6d.

9858. If a board of guardians wants to pay 5s. they have to get the leave of the Local Government Board to pay it. We only asked last week at my board of guardians for permission to pay 5s. for two children boarded out within the union ?—I do not see any reason why you should not pay 5s. if there is any special cause for it. I do not see why the limit should not be raised within the union. At the same time, I do not think you would find the guardians would be so very anxious to give it.

9859. That is not the question. The point is that the Order for boarding out within the union at present only allows a maximum of 4s., and I am asking you whether you can tell us what reason there is for the rule that 4s. should be paid for boarding out within the union, whilst it is 5s. for boarding out without the union ?—As a matter of fact, the reason simply is that the Order for boarding out beyond the union was issued late in last autumn, and that there has been no fresh boarding-out Order for within the union since.

Reasons for decrease of boarding-out without the union.

9860. Can you give us any reason why boarding out without the union increases so slowly ?—I have given you the reasons in the appendix to my memorandum.

Miss M. H. Mason.

23 April 1906.

9861. They do not seem to me very clear?—First of all, there is no agency to start them; that is the principal reason. These committees are started voluntarily by ladies and gentlemen who have heard of the boarding-out system accidentally. A great many ladies and gentlemen living in the country have never heard of it, and do not know anything about it, although they might be interested in it if they heard of it. Then another reason, as I have said, is that boarding-out within the union has taken away numbers of the homes in which other guardians could board out without their union, as naturally the local guardians fill the homes which are available in any particular village. Then, thirdly, I think the number of country holiday children has most distinctly limited the field.

9862. Do you think those three reasons cover the ground, practically?—I do. I think there are a large number of places where boarding-out commitees might still be formed if there was anyone to start them. I have given other quite clear reasons in the extract from my report (Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XX. (J).) The financial obstacles are now removed.

Attitude of foster-parents towards inspection.

9863. You told us just now that you thought that the very best foster-parents appreciated a very minute inspection?—They do, most distinctly.

9864. And in any case where you find the parents do not like that very minute inspection, you imagine there is something wrong if you could only find it out?—I never imagine.

9865. You would be led to think, then?—I am not led to think, I know it by finding it out. I could give you a reason in any particular case why a particular foster-parent has objected to my minute inspection.

9866. Wherever you find a particular foster-parent objecting, you are convinced then and you do not imagine?—No, I have found it out.

9867. You are convinced by your experience that there is something wrong?—I have actually found that there has been something wrong.

9868. In every case?—In every case. I do not say anything as to what a foster-parent may have said afterwards to a committee behind my back; that is quite a different matter. But in every case where I have met with any objection to my inspection at the time, I am not "convinced," as you put it, but I have found facts which certainly gave me sufficient reason for the objection to inspection.

Boarding-out at Farnham.

9869. Referring now to your statement (Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XX. (F)), where you deal with the Farnham boarding-out committee, do you think what you say there exactly represents the facts that took place, from the point of view of the committee as well as from your point of view?—Perfectly, except this: that in my revised proof I have altered a little what I have said. I wrote this very quickly whilst I was away from London. I would like to say this, if I may, first. I have given the names of places and the names of people, only that you may be able to follow them up later if you wish to do so, but I intend to take them all out. These names are only for your own information, because I think anonymous information is not so valuable.

9870. You refer to what the secretary did on the occasion of her visit with you, and you say, "Afterwards she went back upon it"; that is, I presume, she went back upon her word or agreement that the three boys concerned should be removed?—Her agreement with me or her opinion that the boys should be removed.

9871. The reason why she went back upon what she had stated to you was, was it not, that other information had come to her knowledge?—She did not tell me so. I do not undertake to say what her reason was. I know that she did so.

9872. Supposing that that was so, then this particular secretary, it seems to me, was guilty of very unbecoming conduct, in that she practically broke her word?—She did not promise, make an actual promise, as far as I remember, and she did not explain to me the reason why she changed except the one that I told you, that those particular foster parents would not put up with my inspection. That was the only one that she gave me; and I am not surprised that they did not like my inspection.

9873. I think you tell us that in consequence of this case, the Wandsworth Guardians ceased to board out anywhere, but I notice on page 6 that they still do board out?—They did not withdraw all the children they had boarded out, but they resolved to board out no more; and they have not boarded out a single case since.

9874. I understand that there are fresh children boarded out with that committee, since the date of this Farnham case?—I do not think there are any fresh ones, but at any rate if there are the guardians must have rescinded their resolution, and I am not aware that they have. They did pass that resolution at the time, and I tried my best to prevent them.

9875. Certain members of the committee I know only continued to act until these present children had ceased to be boarded out?—The whole committee has changed.

9876. Then when that resolution was altered, some of the members resigned?—I am glad to say they did. There are fresh members on now.

9877. And Wandsworth is now boarding-out?—No—only the few children who were allowed to remain.

9878. Since that improvement in the committee consequent on certain resignations the Wandsworth Board of Guardians has resumed boarding-out with that committee?—I think not. That was almost the very last committee that I have inspected, and I do not remember any fresh child boarded out.

9879. I was told it was so?—I have got the information actually with me now, and I can give you the dates of every child there. I find on reference that there has not been a single child boarded out since.

9880. Do you say then that the re-organisation of the committee has not resulted in fresh boarding-out in the district?—I am sorry to say it has not, as far as the Wandsworth Guardians are concerned: I wish it had.

9881. Practically, boarding-out as far as the Local Government Board is concerned, in its present form or its late form, has ceased to exist?—If you want to know what I think about it, I think the guardians have been very unreasonable. Of course, the former state of things was unsatisfactory, but there is no reason why they should stop the boarding-out for all time. But that is what guardians do; if you discontent them about one committee, they say, "We will not board out any more."

9882. And you think that the Wandsworth Guardians and the Farnham Committee are the only people to blame for the discontinuance of the boarding-out?—Yes, I do.

9883. The only people?—That is the reason why they gave it up; that is what they told me at the time, and they have boarded out none since.

Duties of, and instructions to, lady inspectors.

9884. (Dr. Downes.) In the first instance, I think you had no definite instructions from the Local Government Board as to your duties?—No, none at all; as long as I was the sole inspector I had none.

9885. But when it became necessary to appoint a second inspector, the Local Government Board issued a memorandum of instructions, I think?—Yes.

9886. That was issued in March 1898, was it not?—Yes.

9887. I do not know whether you have put a copy of that in?—No, I have not; I did not think it worth while. I resumed it as well as I could in my rough draft from memory when I was in Nottinghamshire, and had not the paper with me.

9888. By a letter dated May 6th, 1898, the Local Government Board applied their memorandum of instructions to yourself, and asked you also to inspect the district of each boarding-out committee once at least in each year, I think?—I was only instructed, as far as circumstances would permit, to proceed on the lines laid down in the Minute. I was only definitely instructed to visit every committee in my district once a year.

9889. I have asked those questions, because I want you to explain the word "impossible" in paragraph 10. You say there, "In trying to carry out in a thorough manner this impossible task I broke down." Would you kindly explain what it was you found impossible in the new duties?—What I found impossible was to inspect the whole of the committees in the half of England every year, and as many children in those places as I myself deemed necessary. It was impossible for me to do that in the year.

9890. It was impossible you mean to get through that work in a fixed time ?—Yes, and that has been proved by my breakdown; and so the Board have appointed a third inspector, because two were too few.

9891. On the retirement of the second inspector on her marriage they appointed two inspectors who now act with you ?—Yes.

Inadequacy of medical officer's certificate as to health of boarded-out children.

9892. You have told us in your evidence that the medical certificate that was sent down with the child was not always acceptable to the recipients of the child. Form 5 of the Order requires the medical officer of the Poor Law union sending the child to give a certificate which is to this effect—"I, the undersigned, having this day personally examined aged residing at hereby certify that he (or she) is not suffering from any contagious or infectious disease and that his (or her) bodily health is good with the exception that ." Then he is to state the particulars of the exceptions. Then it is dated and signed by the medical officer. That is the form of certificate, is it not ?—Yes.

9893. And that you say is not always satisfactory to the people who receive the child ?—What I meant to say was that the people who have received the child have sometimes said that it had got complaints which were not entered in the form, which the medical officer had not mentioned. They have done so sometimes—not very often, and there have been disputes between the committee and the guardians as to the condition in which the child arrived.

9894. Has there been any serious difficulty on that head ?—There have only been a few local disputes, that is all.

9895. I notice that there is no limitation as to the time within which the certificate is to be used; does it ever happen that the certificate is an old one at the time that the child comes down ?—I could not say that. I have never had it mentioned to me. I do not see the certificates myself when they come; I only hear what the committee and the foster-parents tell me afterwards. I have had several cases of ringworm and itch, when there has been a dispute as to whether the child brought the complaint with it or not when it was first boarded out.

Cases of boarding-out of unsuitable children.

9896. Do you find any cases in which children who are morally depraved or are mentally unsuitable to be boarded out are sent out ?—Yes, I do find some cases that sort.

9897. Do you consider that this certificate as it is worded would be a sufficient safeguard against the sending down of those children ?—No, I do not think it speaks about anything but their bodily health.

9898. Do you think there should be some safeguard provided against sending children who are mentally or morally unsuitable ?—I do not see how you can frame a rule to insure that. I do not think the guardians have any right to send such a child down, and if it is found out it ought to be sent back again. But I do not see how you can draw up any rule, unless you were to add to that form that the child is not morally or mentally unsuitable.

9899. Do you find that many cases are sent down that are unsuitable for boarding-out ?—There are not many depraved cases, but there are a great many that are sent down and are found to be unsuitable after they have arrived, and I have given you their number in the Appendix. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XX. (K and L).)

9900. Is there any danger, in your opinion, of children who are troublesome from infirmities or otherwise in the schools being sent away and boarded out ?—Yes; a great many of the children who are very troublesome from their habits are sent out. I hear that almost every day of my life.

9901. So that the boarded-out children may in that respect not be what I should call a very suitable pick of the children ?—I think they are the pick of the children, and I think the rest the guardians get are perhaps worse. They all come into the workhouse from poverty or misfortune of some kind, and therefore they come in with every kind of defect both bodily and mental.

9902. Do I understand that you think that the children with infirmities are retained in the schools or that they are sent away to be boarded out ?—I could not say, because I do not see the schools; but I can say that they do send out a great number of children with certain infirmities, and that some of them get cured after they have been boarded out, and some do not; some have to return as incurable and the foster-parents cannot put up with them; on the other hand, a great many are retained, and the foster-parents have shown the utmost patience with them.

9903. Do you think that any evil that there may be in this direction is of sufficient extent to necessitate any alteration of the Order ?—No. I do not see what you can do.

Medical and dental attendance on boarded-out children.

9904. With regard to the medical attendance, is it compulsory on the committees to provide for medical attendance ?—Yes. It is part of their formal agreement with the board of guardians that they must provide medical attendance. They have to enter into an arrangement with a duly qualified medical man for attendance on the children, and for the supply of the necessary medicines.

9905. Is that provided for in the form of an agreement ?—Yes, there is a regularly scheduled form.

9906. And similarly for the dental treatment ?—Yes, since the new Order.

9907. How do they usually make the arrangements for the medical attendance ?—That altogether depends upon the neighbourhood. In most places they make an arrangement with a doctor that he will see the children whenever he is sent for, at the rate of 10s. per year, which is the sum that is given.

9908. I see that in your last report you mention a case where the committee provided for the children to be attended on the club system ?—Yes. Many of them are attended on the club system; that costs rather less, as a rule.

9909. So far as you are aware is that system satisfactory ?—Yes.

9910. Have they any difficulties in making those arrangements with regard to the medical club ?—No, none at all. The doctors, in fact, are most generous. As to the dentists, there is one dentist who I know attends something like fifty children for 2s. per head for the year; examines them every half year to see whether anything is the matter with them, and does the stoppings and extractions, besides, whenever wanted.

9911. In your last report to the Local Government Board—the same report I have just referred to—you have given an account of a rather unsatisfactory case where a woman professed to take a child up to London to see an oculist, and the guardians apparently knew nothing about these visits to the oculist, although they had to pay for them, but eventually they sent the child to an independent oculist who said there was nothing the matter with its eyes ?—I remember it. The guardians knew that they paid for an oculist, and they knew that the child went up to London; but they only knew through the committee what the oculist was reported to have said.

9912. Ought not the committee to have reported to the guardians what was going on, in that case ?—Of course they ought. That is an unsatisfactory committee, and that committee is one which I have not recommended to any more boards of guardians. It therefore has now dwindled down to one child, allowed to remain because it is in a good home, and I visit it once a year. But I do not want that committee to have any more.

9913. That is an exceptional case ?—That is quite an exceptional case. The reason I put that case in was only as an illustration of why foster-parents want to adopt children, and what sort of people they are. It was not illustrative of the neglect of committees.

9914. Have you had any case where the guardians, have refused to pay such expenses as that; for example when they think the committees have not used reasonable care ?—Yes. The guardians do refuse to pay the expenses sometimes, and they are not always reasonable in their refusal. Reason is not always on the same side.

9915. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Do they contract with the doctor to pay him 10s. a year for the visits that he may be called on to make?—Yes, they contract to pay him 10s. per head, and sometimes less. The contract with the doctor is not the same in every case. Sometimes they do not contract at all, but pay the doctor simply for the services that he renders. The sum for which the doctor can do it depends upon the district—whether, for instance, there is a doctor near at hand or whether it is a scattered country district.

Miss M. H. Mason.

23 April 1906

Insurance of boarded-out children by foster-parents.

9916. (Dr. Downes.) The Boarding-out Order has a provision that the foster-parents are not to insure the children; have you had any cases where that has been going on?—Not many, but I have had some.

9917. Do they appear anywhere in your returns?—One of them was at Farnham.

9918. (Mr. Gardiner.) In that case it was done through inadvertence, was it not?—Quite so, and I should like to say so.

9919. I think it ought to be said, too?—I say it gladly. It was done by inadvertence; but it was done through the neglect of the committee to enter into proper arrangements with a doctor.

9920. I think Dr. Downes's question really had burial clubs in view?—Yes. Most of the Farnham children were insured in burial clubs, because the secretary of the committee had not entered into a proper arrangement with a doctor to attend them. It was left to the foster-parents to do what they pleased, and the foster-parents, quite inadvertently, and not with any bad motive, did insure the children in different medical and burial clubs. They had no bad intention, I think, whatever; it was simply because the sick club payments included burial expenses. I have found a few more cases, but at this moment I cannot recall, speaking from memory, which they are. I think Miss Evans has found a few more in the north.

The boarding-out of epileptics.

9921. (Dr. Downes.) You mention the case of epileptics in your appendix; do you get many of those in your inspection?—No, not many. There are very few of them boarded out, and where they are, they are generally removed. I have always recommended their removal where an epileptic home could be found for them; but, as you know, until quite lately there have been no special homes for epileptics.

9922. Your view would be that the epileptics should rather go to a suitable institutional home than be boarded out?—Certainly; it is most unsafe to board them out.

9923. You refer to your visit to the "Exmouth," and you speak of a boy who wanted to go back to rather unsatisfactory foster-parents; in your report you go on to say, "The effect was that the unsatisfactory foster-parents were 'nibbling' at these boys in order to get them back now that they were at a wage-earning age, and their labour profitable;" is that so?—Yes.

9924. I merely asked you that, because it might have appeared that the boys were not happy on the "Exmouth"?—I think they were quite happy as far as the "Exmouth" went, except those who did not like the discipline.

Records of after-careers of boarded-out children.

9925. I think you told us that some of the committees follow up their children and keep records, and Miss Evans in her last report mentions some committees who also keep records of their children. She says: "The Windermere, Southport and Ruyton-Eleven-Towns boarding-out committees are, amongst others, particularly good in following up their former boarded-out boys and girls and looking after them." I ask you that, because it may be useful if we had information where we can obtain evidence as to the results of boarding-out, and I do not know whether you are able to supplement that list of committees?—If the Local Government Board will allow me a little extra time, a little extra law, that is to say, I will write to every committee and I will ask them to send me their records. I could send you a few now. Most of the committees do keep such a record, only many of them keep their books in a very unbusiness-like manner. I think nearly all of them could tell you where the children are.

9926. Do you think that the existing information would be worth collection?—I should say that, on the whole, it would, although one of those very committees mentioned by Miss Evans showed me a list of children when I inspected them, and it was very incorrect; they really did not know where the children were, for I found some of them at quite different places to where they said.

9927. Setting aside cases that are doubtful, do you think there exist a sufficient number who have kept careful record as to give results that would be useful to the Commission?—Quite so.

9928. If that is so, it would not be so great a matter then to collect the information from those selected committees, would it?—No. I would collect them from all of them, if you like.

9929. (Chairman.) If you could give us any information which would show reliable results, I think it would be very useful to us?—I will do so with pleasure. In the appendix to my statement you will see the results of all those who have gone back to the union, and I take it for granted that those who have not gone back to the union are doing well. There is also the return which Mr. Mundella got, which tells you how many have gone to service; but I can assure you it is very inaccurate, for I saw the proof, or the substance of the returns in each case the forms came in.

Cases of P Law childr boarded-ou by certified institutions

9930. (Dr. Downes.) You have mentioned cases where apparently children were being boarded-out illegally from certified homes; I suppose you are aware that certified homes are inspected by the general inspectors?—Of course.

9931. The general inspector usually gives a list of the children actually in the home and the unions sending them?—I think he gives the numbers of the children, but he does not give their names, and he has not any means of knowing whether they are the same children in the homes or not.

9932. He usually gives the number of the children and the union sending them?—Yes, but, as I say, not the names. So you see a board of guardians might send Mary to that home, and then they might afterwards send Jane to that home, and Mary might be boarded-out in order to make room for Jane, and the inspector would not find that out, because he has not got either girl's name.

9933. The boarding-out within the Union Order I think does not apply to any London union?—I suppose not, but I have really never considered the question.

Insurance o boarded-ou children.

9934. (Mr. Phelps.) You said it was forbidden to foster-parents to insure the children; why is that?—Because it would be such a temptation to get a sum of money at their death.

9935. Do you really think that is necessary?—Yes, I think it is necessary to forbid it. It is not necessary that they should insure them for a sum of money at death, because the board of guardians in their agreement have a special provision that the board will pay for the burials, so what is the use of the foster-parents insuring for that?

9936. It may be a very good thing to begin early to insure a child, but what I wanted to put to you is this: It is surely taking a rather low estimate of the average foster-parents to hold that they should be restrained by regulation from proceedings which would be practically murder?—We hope that it will not come to murder, but we would rather stop it before it comes to murder. They should be made to understand that it is not at all a right thing to do, and as a matter of fact I do not think many do it.

Boarding-ou without the union con- fined to urban unions

9937. As a rule boarding-out is confined to urban Unions is it not?—As a rule it is.

9938. You do not find any country unions boarding out, do you?—Very few except within the union.

After em- ployment of boarded-out children.

9939. When children in that way go down into the country from an urban union and they are boarded out, their future in life is mainly settled by the committee, is it not?—Yes.

9940. Would the committee as a rule, do you think, plant out those children in the district in which they were boarded out?—Yes, as a rule; some of them send them further afield.

9941. If a child is started in life by the urban union itself, he would generally be apprenticed, but if he is planted in life by a boarding-out committee he would become an agricultural labourer I suppose, generally speaking ?—Not always, because some of the committees are situated in places where there is not very much agriculture.

9942. But the majority of them are in country districts, are they not ?—Yes, most of them are.

9943. Are there any boarding-out committees in the towns ?—Yes, there is one in Hull, and there used to be one which reached into Nottingham, and there also used to be some in Birmingham, but these two latter do not exist any more.

9944. Do you think that if a boy's future is put in the hands of a boarding-out committee his prospects are as good as if it were in the hands of the board of guardians which was responsible for him ?—I think that the prospects of the girls are distinctly better, because the ladies find better places for them. The prospects of the boys are about equal, because if the ladies can find situations other than agricultural situations they do so in suitable cases. The guardians as a rule are quite willing to pay to help them on, if they can get into such places.

9945. Is there much chance of a boy who has been boarded-out being apprenticed and becoming an artisan ?—Yes.

9946. Do you find boys doing that ?—Yes, a great many of them.

9947. Have you any instructions as to the conditions under which a child may be boarded-out; for instance, as to cubic space ?—No, not as to cubic space. I take a measuring tape with me, but I only measure in the most extreme cases. I do not use it once in two years.

9948. Have you instructions in that respect, or do you act only on your own judgment ?—On my own judgment, or our own judgment.

9949. You have in your own mind a kind of standard, have you ?—No, I have no standard at all as to the cubic space, and it is impossible to require it in cottages, because they are all different. If there is overcrowding, and if there is really an unwholesome number of people sleeping in the same room or house, or if the sexes are not properly separated, then in those cases I say so in my report on the case.

9950. Could you formulate those cases ?—Do you mean tabulate them ?

9951. Could you put them into the form of general rules ?—No, that is not possible.

9952. Then you could not draw up anything which would be the basis of a certificate ?—No, because we do not build these houses for the purpose; we have to take what houses we can find.

9953. Still there are certain classes of houses that you would exclude by the nature of the case, are there not ?—Certainly.

9954. Do you think anything like that could be applied to the certified homes to which children could be sent by the voluntary associations Mr. Loch spoke of ?—I think the voluntary associations might do it themselves—and some of them do, more or less.

9955. But you do not think that the local authority would certify homes or refuse to certify ?—No. In a rather recent case of overcrowding under a Country Holidays Fund, the sanitary authority stepped in. The clergyman of the place wrote privately to the sanitary authority, and he came and said that there was a window to be put in and that there were not to be more than a certain number of people in the place. He secured the window, but I do not feel sure that he secured the number.

9956. That would be under the general Act, which would apply whether they were the people's own children or children that were taken in ?—That is so.

9957. You do not think that the taking in of children is so exceptional a thing that the local authority should be charged with seeing that a certain standard should be maintained, do you ?—I do not think the local authority should have anything to do with the regulations for the official boarding-out.

9958. Not even to insist on a minimum of conditions ?—Certainly not. I do not even think that the Local Government Board could do so, because each house is different.

9959. You do not think it would be a good thing for the local authority to inform you in the first instance as to the number such and such a house was suitable for ?—No. The guardians have a form of questions which they send down, such as how many rooms and how many people there are, and that is quite sufficient for them. They judge upon the merits of each case, and upon the number of people in the house and the number of rooms. If they are not satisfied they do not send the child to that house. And if the accommodation is not sufficient, then the inspector is sure to find it out on her next visit and to report it.

9960. There are boarding-out committees in various parts of England, but in some parts of England there are none; does the existence of a boarding-out committee at all depend, do you think, on the rate of wages in the district ?—Its cessation does. They are glad to have the children in the poorer districts, but where they are too well off they do not want them.

Connection between rate of wages and facility in boarding-out children.

9961. You do not find that there are some districts in which the rate of wages is so low that it would be inexpedient to board out children in them ?—No; I do not think that is a reason for not boarding out children in a particular district.

9962. It is rather where the wages are high that the people do not care to be at the trouble of taking the children ?—That is so. There was one committee at Esher, for instance, which was started by the late Duke of Albany. They could not get the people to take the children under 6s. a week, and the committee themselves privately paid the extra 2s. a week. The people were so well off and rents were so high that they would not take the children for less. But it was a mistake; the committee could not afford to go on paying the 2s., and so they have taken no more children; that committee has come to an end for that reason.

The M. A. B. Y. S. and kindred societies.

9963. (Miss Hill.) The M.A.B.Y.S. to a great extent watches over the girls in the Metropolitan area, I suppose, after they are started in life ?—Yes.

9964. Where there is a boarding-out committee in the country I suppose there is not the same need for such an association; they fulfil the functions of the M.A.B.Y.S., do they not ?—Yes.

9965. In other large towns are there any similar institutions, do you know, dealing with girls who have started out ?—Do you mean for those who come into the town, or for those who go out of the town ?

9966. I mean for Poor Law girls who are started in service ?—There are some local societies; for instance, there is one in Liverpool and I think there is one in Manchester, and I have one of my own at Nottingham.

9967. With regard to the boys, the London association for looking after them has not been started very many years ?—No, it was started quite recently.

9968. Does it cover the whole of London ?—I think so.

9969. You do not see any particular necessity with regard to the boarded out children to extend the M.A.B.Y.S., or do you, because the committees fill the place ?—I see no cause to extend it, for that reason. When the boarded-out girls come into London, then the M.A.B.Y.S. take them in hand.

Inspection of children by boarding out Committees; its reception and results.

9970. (Professor Smart.) In paragraph 48 (b) you say that "the visits of the guardians tend to keep up and accentuate the connection of children with pauperism, which it is one of the chief objects of the boarding-out system to remove;" do you not think very much the same might be said of the visits of ladies ?—No, I do not think so at all. The ladies are friends of the local people.

9971. I suppose everyone knows that these children are boarded-out children ?—Yes, but it is not so marked when they are visited by ladies. It is thought rather a distinction to be visited by ladies from the neighbourhood and by the lady from London; but it is not a distinction to have a number of guardians going round in a van.

9972. I am not speaking of the lady from London, but only of the local ladies ? I am afraid I come from a country where it would not be at all appreciated ?—Very likely; you have not tried it. Certainly they like the visits of their ladies, and it certainly does not tend to bring any stigma upon them.

Miss M. H. Mason.

23 April 1906.

9973. I do not think you say very much about the duties of the ladies, particularly their inspection duties; what duties of inspection have the ladies?—The ladies have to see that the children are kindly treated, and, as far as they can judge, that they are properly fed, that they are given a periodic or occasional bath, that they are kept clean, that the money which is given for their clothing is properly expended, that they are sent to church or to chapel as the case may be, and that they are sent to a day school and to a Sunday school. These are their duties.

9974. How are their duties distinguished from your own?—Those are their duties. I ascertain whether the ladies have been inspecting in these respects when I go down.

9975. Do they inspect the children's clothing and all that sort of thing, just as you do?—Yes, that is their business.

9976. Do they do that constantly?—Yes.

9977. How often are these ladies' visits made?—That depends. Sometimes they make a thorough inspection on one or other of those points at one time, and on another point at another time. They are bound to visit each child and its home at least once in every six weeks, but most of them do so much oftener. And those who live near see the children casually, constantly.

9978. There are always ladies in the place, I presume?—In the place, or near it. There is a limitation that no child may be boarded out more than three miles from some member of the committee, so that there should be always someone at hand to look after them and watch over them.

9979. Do they go singly or in couples, as a rule?—Where they are brave they go singly, where they are frightened they go in couples.

9980. Do you find as a rule that the ladies on these committees as well as being persons of social standing are persons of tact?—Ladies differ in tact like other people.

9981. Do you find that the ladies who offer themselves for that purpose are as a rule persons who can be trusted with these delicate duties?—Yes, I quite think so; as a rule they are very good indeed.

The constitution of, and responsibility for, boarding-out committees.

9982. The committees are self-elected, I notice?—Yes, they are.

9983. Did you ever hear of a board of guardians rejecting any trio who offered themselves as a committee?—The boards of guardians have nothing to do with their selection; they are not under the boards of guardians in any way. The boards of guardians do not choose them, and do not appoint them. Perhaps if a guardian has a friend in any particular neighbourhood, he will suggest to her that she should form a boarding-out committee, and she may do so, but boards of guardians as such have nothing whatever to do with the initiatory steps; the ladies suggest themselves to the Local Government Board, and the Local Government Board authorise them. The guardians have nothing to do with the appointment or regulation of the committees.

9984. I suppose in this case the Local Government Board is yourself practically?—There are two other inspectors, and there is the office behind us.

9985. What steps, for example, do you take to find out the qualifications of these women who offer themselves?—We have a form which you will find in the Boarding-Out Order, in which they say they are the wife or the daughter of somebody, if they have not got a profession of their own; and then, if we see they are of respectable standing and know nothing against them, we authorise them. We cannot do more than that. Here is the form—"We will truly and faithfully observe the regulations which are prescribed in the said Order or which may from time to time be prescribed by the Local Government Board with respect to the boarding out of pauper children, and we do also hereby undertake to furnish to the Local Government Board or to any inspectors of the Board all such reasonable information respecting pauper children who may be boarded out under the superintendence of the Committee as the said Board or inspectors may from time to time require, and we do also undertake that meetings of the Committee shall be held not less than at on days to be fixed by the members of the Committee at their first meeting in each year"—and then there are to be minutes.

9986. You have no power over individual members of that committee, only over the whole committee, as I understand?—Yes.

9987. For example, if you found any of these ladies making a mess of things, what would you do?—For myself, I should, in the first instance, speak to her committee about it, and the committee would probably either try to see that she did better, or ask her to resign. If the committee could not manage her, then we should have to deal with them officially. The committee are responsible for all their members.

9988. How do you see that these ladies are trained—by their going round with you?—Yes; and then I ask them to train each other; that is, when one knows how to do it, to take the new ones with her and show them.

9989. Once the committee is formed, the child is out of the hands of the guardians altogether, is it?—The guardians are still responsible for the children, and they still pay for them, and they may recall them any time they please.

9990. I think you said they have no power of inspection?—They are not allowed to inspect generally.

9991. I see you count always on the fact of the pauperism being known, and you cannot conceive of any system of boarding-out that would avoid this publishing of the fact of pauperism, and would at the same time be consistent with adequate supervision?—It is not published, but it is known. I think it is a very objectionable thing to draw attention to it in any way.

Objection of foster-parents to visits of the relieving officer.

9992. It is known, you say?—It is known, but nobody regards it. I may say, however, that there is a difference in that respect between town and country. In Hull, for instance, the reason why the guardians specially asked the Local Government Board that I might inspect there was because the foster-parents objected to the visits of the relieving officer; they did not want it to be known that there was anyone in their house paid for from the rates. If the local ladies or the inspector go to the house, that does not convey that knowledge to the neighbours. But in the country everybody knows all their neighbour's affairs, and it does not matter and they do not care.

9993. If I were to say that a person might be living in a village in Scotland, say, where there was a number of pauper children, and yet might be utterly unaware that the children were paupers, you would say I had not had my eyes open, I suppose?—I should say that they were not inspected, naturally; but I think it would be better that they should be inspected.

Limit to number of boarded-out children in one home.

9994. What is the limit of the number of children that may be taken by any one foster parent?—They may only take two, except in the case of brothers and sisters, and then they may take four—always, if there is sufficient room in each case, and there are no more other children than allowed by the Boarding-out Order.

Motives of foster-parents for taking boarded-out children.

9995. I gather that you think that in the vast majority of cases almost the sole motive for taking the children is profit, and that the children in after life rarely can regard the place as a real home?—The children are taken for the sake of their payments, but they do always regard the place as a home. The foster-parents receive them back in after life as if it was a real home. They very often grow attached to the children, and certainly the children grow attached to the place, which is the only place they know.

Employment of boarded-out children by their foster-parents.

9996. Do I gather that the foster-parents have any right to employ these children for domestic service, such as their own children would render?—Certainly, so long as they do not overwork them.

9997. So long as the children are treated as well as the other children are, that is all you ask?—Quite so.

9998. Among the agricultural classes, for example, a child will very often work alongside his parent in the fields; would that be allowed in the case of a pauper child?—You see they have to be at school, and there are only the holidays when they can work, or before school, or in the dinner hour, or after school, or on Saturdays. Sometimes I think they work their own children too much at those times, and we do not wish them to overwork the boarded-out children. If they work at the foster-parents' homes, of course we say nothing about that, but if they send them out to work for hire, it is open to great abuse, and we do not allow it, except in special cases which must be reported.

9999. If a labourer had an allotment of his own, for example, I take it you would not object to the child being set to dig ?—Not in the least, and most of them do. I think they always send the boys to dig where they have an allotment.

ptives of ster-parents r taking arded-out ildren.

10000. I think you do not believe that there is a sufficient number, say, of childless couples, or couples with a small family, who would be glad to have boarded-out children, partly for company and partly for giving the same domestic help as other children do ?—There is not a sufficient number to take them only for that reason ; those who take them for company are the best homes as a rule.

10001. But you seem to think there are very few of them ?—Not a sufficient number, but I am always surprised to find how many people there are who have no children.

10002. I am glad to hear you say that, because my impression was rather that you considered it has come to be regarded too much as a business ?—I do not think it is regarded too much as a business. I think it is only human nature ; I think the foster-parents take in these children just as many ladies who are wanting means take in Indian children, and many of them become very fond of the children. Many foster-parents certainly grow attached to them. I do not call it baby-farming, and I do not think there is any blame at all attaching to them for taking the children for money. How can they love a child they have never yet seen ? They may want companionship, and they do in some cases, but not in the large majority of cases. Afterwards they become used to the child. One excellent woman whom I know always appeals to me for protection, because the lady who chiefly works the committee is always wanting her to take another child, and she says, "I do not want another child, I love my Lottie and I do not want any other." I say she should not have one, as she does not not want one.

10003. The profit, according to your calculations, is so extremely small, that I can scarcely understand why so many children should be taken unless for motives of company—I do not say of affection, but of company ? —People who have children of their own do not, and cannot want them for company. You may take it this way : As I have said, there are many labourers who have 15s. a week, and I think the wonder is not that they should take these children for profit, but how they manage to live on the 15s. a week. If they have only 15s. a week for the whole family to live upon, surely it must be an advantage to have one child endowed with 4s. for its eating and trouble alone, besides £2 a year for its clothes. You must take them according to their means ; it would not be a profit to you or to me to take in a child for 4s. a week, but to them it is.

ntiguity of ea of each arding-out mmittee.

10004. In paragraph 67 you say, "The Local Government Board have now strictly limited the area of each boarding-out committee to certain parishes adjoining and grouped together" ; what do you mean by the word "adjoining" may I ask ?—Where the parishes touch.

10005. You mean a group of parishes touching each other then ?—Yes.

10006. Not adjoining places where the child comes from ?—No.

10007. That is why London children can be boarded out in Cumberland ?—Yes, that is so.

dvisability boarding-t at a stance from ild's old rroundings.

10008. Do you agree with the view that children should be boarded out as far away as possible from their own old surroundings, and, particularly where the children have bad parents, that they should get as far separate from the parents as possible ?—Yes, I entirely agree. That is one reason why boarding out beyond the union will always be better than within the union.

10009. I do not propose to cross-examine you upon what you say about Scotland, but may I ask, do you know that the report of the Poor Law School Committee in 1896 said that the system had been an unqualified success in Scotland ?—Yes, I do.

10010. You do not agree with that ?—No, indeed. I know of many funny things that that committee said.

Report of Poor Law School Committee on Scottish system of boarding-out.

10011. (Mr. Bentham.) With regard to the general methods of dealing with the Poor Law children, there are, first of all, the workhouses, then the scattered homes and cottage homes, institutions, schools, and boarding-out ; I take it that you distinguish as to what class of children should be dealt with by each of these methods, and that you do not hold the opinion that one method all round is the best for dealing with all Poor Law children ? —That is so.

Utility of boarding-out limited to a special class of children.

10012. Those children who are more suitable for boarding out are a special class of children ?—Yes.

10013. Therefore, there is no necessity for a large extensive system, whereby all poor law children might be boarded out ?—No, certainly not.

10014. And the class which boarding-out is most useful to, is the class just mentioned by Professor Smart, namely, those whom it is advisable to move from undesirable surroundings ?—Yes.

10015. Or from relatives who will always be nibbling at them, as you term it ?—Yes.

10016. And keeping their eye upon them until the time when they become of working age ?—Yes.

Dangers and difficulties in regard to boarding-out within the union.

10017. Boarding-out within the union offers rather a temptation, does it not, to undesirable people to keep in close touch with their children ?—That is so.

10018. Therefore, boarding-out without the union is applicable to a different class of child from the child which is suitable for boarding-out within the union ?—It applies to the same class, and to others besides.

10019. You would not think it advisable to board-out children within the union whose parents or relatives were undesirable and lived in the immediate neighbourhood, would you ?—Certainly not.

10020. Those who are boarded out within the union are usually those whose relatives are desirable relatives, that is, those who might keep in contact with the children without doing them any harm ; is that not so ?—Not in all cases.

10021. I am speaking of the ideal boarding-out within the union ?—Yes, it is true of the ideal.

10022. If boarding-out within the union is carried on to a large extent, do you not think another difficulty enters in, that is, the amount that it is necessary to give ? In answer to a question put to you by Mr. Gardiner, you said you did not see why the amount should not be the same for boarding-out within as it is for boarding-out without ?—I said I did not see why the permissive maximum might not be the same. I did not say I thought it was possible always within the union to give exactly the same sum as beyond the union.

10023. Is there not a difficulty involved in paying an amount for boarding-out children within the union which is far in excess of that given in the way of ordinary relief ? Take a widow with children ; the average per head for the children would be something like 1s. 6d., and possibly close by there would be another person who is a distant relative of the child who is boarded out with her and she is being paid 4s. or 5s. or 6s. per week. Does that not create a difficulty in the minds of the people who do not see these niceties of distinction between what is boarded-out and what is out-door relief ?—Yes, it does.

10024. It creates a very great difficulty, does it not ?— It does, and I think that is one of the objections to boarding-out within the unions.

10025. Therefore, boarding-out within the union is not to be encouraged from that point of view ?—No, I think not.

Effect of boarding-out and of Poor Law care of children on desertion.

10026. Another class of child is the child that is deserted ; has the boarding-out in your experience, or the better treatment of children in various ways, had a tendency to increase the number of children who are deserted ?— Not that I know of.

Miss M. H. Mason.

23 April 1906.

10027. Have you any particulars of the number of deserted children who are boarded out?—No, but roughly speaking I should say about one-third. It does not very much affect them, because they are beyond the union, and their deserting parents and acquaintances within their own unions do not know anything about them.

10028. Have you any comparative figures, say of twenty years ago and the present time, as to the number of deserted children who are boarded out?—I have no comparative figures.

10029. Do you think that boarding-out within the union, where people can keep in touch with the children, has a tendency to encourage desertion?—No, I do not think that boarding-out has ever had as far as I know a tendency to encourage desertion for the sake of having the children well looked after. I think sending the children away by boarding them out beyond the union checks desertion, just as emigration does, because then they cannot get at them when they want them; but I do not think that boarding them out within the union makes much difference.

10031. Dealing with all children within the union either by means of cottage homes or by means of schools has the effect of encouraging people to desert their children, because they know where they can find them when they want them?—I am not speaking officially here, because neither schools nor cottage homes nor any institutions come under my inspection. Before my appointment, when I used to visit the Nottingham Poor Law School, called the Training Institute, at Radford, I was told at that time that the school had a great tendency to encourage desertion, because the people knew that their children would be looked after there till they should want them and that they could get at them again. I have never heard of that in reference to boarding-out. That is the only school I have had to do with personally, and I have heard nothing about this matter since I ceased to visit it twenty-one years ago.

10032. I think you said in answer to a question by Mr. Loch that a re-action against boarding-out had taken place, and that it was caused on the one hand by its advocates saying that the foster-parents take the children for love, and on the other hand by those who condemn it saying that they took them only for gain?—Yes; there is more or less a re-action.

Motives of foster-parents in taking boarded-out children.

10033. Does not most of your memorandum go to show that you think that the children are all taken for gain?—Most of them are, but I do not think that is any reason against the system. People are so unjust on either the one side or the other; they claim for it what the system cannot give, and they condemn it for reasons which are not just or valid.

10034. Then you think very little affection enters into it at all?—In the first instance very little affection enters into it at all, but a good deal grows up later.

10035. The homes where there is a desire for a child for other than pecuniary interests are very few, I suppose?—I do not say they are extremely few, but they are a minority.

10036. And so far in a minority that you could not hope to get a sufficient number of homes to meet requirements for boarding-out without increasing the price?—That is so.

10037. That is the reason the increase has taken place, is it not?—I should say so.

Reasons for elasticity in scale of boarding-out allowances.

10038. If 5s. is considered to be the maximum amount, do you think it advisable that there should be a lesser amount paid in the same district—in point of fact, should any boarding-out committee take 5s. in some cases and 4s. in others?—It depends, I think, on the circumstances and on the age of the child. I do not think that a child of two or three ought to be paid for at the full rate unless exceptionally delicate or troublesome. If you will read the circulars issued with the Order, you will see that the Local Government Board has pointed out that a child of three or four does not cost as much as a child of nine or ten. But when the child comes to be about nine or ten, the foster-parents often complain that it eats as much as a man or a woman, and that it costs a great deal. Then I think they might have rather more given to them; but if you have given them the 5s. when the child is quite young, you have played away your trump card, and you cannot give any more when it has grown bigger.

10039. You suggested another reason just now, and that was that in some homes the standard of comfort was higher, and they naturally would not take the child at the same price as another home would where the standard of living might be lower?—That is so.

10040. That means that you would have two standards as it were in the same district?—No, I would not give a different rate in the same district. But I would give more to the people who had the bigger child that ate more. I would not give more to one house because they were better off and refuse it to the poorer one—no.

10041. That would apply to anywhere, then?—Anywhere in the same district. In the earlier years some boards of guardians used only to pay 3s. a week and others used to pay 4s., and as different unions boarded out under the same committee and in the same place that gave rise to endless discontent. I only mean that some districts are more expensive than others; Esher, for instance, is a more expensive district than Dorsetshire is, and people will take them in Dorsetshire for what they will not take them for in Esher. But I should not in the same place give one parent more than another for a child of the same age, or it would cause endless jealousies.

Responsibility for choice of homes for boarded-out children.

10042. When homes are offered by a boarding-out committee to a board of guardians, do you think it advisable for them to send the children without having first ascertained the character of the district or the class of homes that the boarding-out committee offer?—No.

10043. Do you think that it should remain entirely in the hands of the inspector who recommended the formation of the committee?—I think at Bradford you write beforehand and inquire about the home.

10044. We visit every home that is offered to us before we send a child?—Many boards of guardians have forms with a list of questions which they require to be filled up and answered. They do not think it necessary to visit, because even by visiting they would not find out so much as by the answers to this form of questions.

10045. Why not?—Because they then get it down in black and white.

10046. They can get it down in black and white on the spot, and see it for themselves, can they not?—I do not think they always find out everything when they go to the place.

10047. There is no reason why they should not, is there?—Yes; I think a man cannot find out, because he cannot inspect the house.

10048. It need not necessarily be a man, it may be a lady guardian?—If a lady guardian goes, I think that might be a very good thing.

10049. That would satisfy you?—It might satisfy me about the choice of the home in the first instance, but not about the inspection subsequently.

10050. It is the choice of the home I am referring to entirely?—For the choice of the home I think it might be a very good thing that a lady should go in the first instance; but not afterwards, I think.

10051. There is another point in deciding on a district where you would send children, and that is, as to the prospects of absorption into the ordinary population, particularly of the boys, as affected by the occupations of the district; would a lady be the best person to decide upon that?—Yes, I think so; she knows about that as well as a man.

Suggested re organisation of inspection of Poor Law children.

10052. Do you advocate generally the inspection of all Poor Law children—whether they be in cottage homes or boarded out within or without the union, or in certified institutions—by the same inspectors of the Local Government Board?—By the same inspectors? No.

10053. By the same system of inspection as yours?—I think the general inspectors do so inspect them.

10054. I am thinking of the inspectors of boarded-out children. Do you think it would be advisable to put all those children who are in certified homes and in cottage homes, boarded out within and without the union, under your inspection?—No.

10055. Why ?—In the first place, I should have rather too much to do.

10056. I do not mean you, personally, but lady inspectors for the purpose, instead of its being a duty of the general inspectors ?—No ; I think the general inspectors can do it very well, because they inspect the institution more than the individual child and you can sample the institution. In London, as a matter of fact, they are inspected by a lady.

10057. The children want inspecting in the certified homes, do they not, just as well as those who are boarded out ?—Yes.

10058. And a man cannot do that, you say ?—Not in the case of girls boarded out.

10059. Would you put the girls' homes under this inspection ?—I do not think it comes within my department to say.

10060. I was really on the question more of the general principle whether, it being necessary to inspect these children that are boarded out without the union at the present time in the way in which they are inspected, it is not equally necessary to inspect those in the certified homes and those that are boarded-out within the union ? —I think it is necessary to inspect those who are boarded-out within the union. With regard to the certified homes, they really do not come within my province. At the same time, you must consider that what you have to look at in inspecting an institution is the way it is managed. An institution is more under control than the boarding-out homes are. It is under management, and you can inspect the management ; whereas every child is in a different home when it is boarded-out. They are all different homes, and you cannot sample them, and you cannot judge one by the other, although you can sample an institution.

10061. You cannot sample the children in an institution surely ?—You can, by seeing that a certain number of the children are healthy ; you can go in and see their food, you can see that they go to school regularly, and you can notice them, and look at their clothes, and see that they are kept clean.

10062. In a certified home, as in a cottage home, some of the children might be almost unmanageable, or they might be tiresome children ; those are the ones that would get the ill-treatment if there is any, are they not ? —Yes.

10063. How can you discover them, unless you examine every child ?—I do not think that you can ; but then you could not have dual inspection, and so you must either have the general inspector or else you must have a lady as assistant to the general inspector to inspect the children's homes. You cannot have the two inspectors ; it would be conflicting.

Inspection of Poor Law children in institutions.

10064. I do not mind whom it is done by ; I only want to get your opinion as to whether it is necessary that all these children who are in institutions—there are 7,700 of them, we are told, almost as many as the total number boarded out within and without the unions—should be individually inspected, as the boarded-out children are ? It might be better, but it is not so necessary. The children in the institutions are in different circumstances. The matrons and other officers of the institutions are paid regular salaries, and they cannot make a profit out of the children ; that is one reason why they are safer, because there is not the temptation to make a profit out of the children.

10065. I want now to ask your opinion, which you may prefer not to give me, with regard to the establishment of cottage homes without the union, for the purpose of taking the place of boarding-out where it is impossible to get suitable homes ?—Those do not come under my inspection.

10066. Possibly they might at some time ?—When the time comes it will be soon enough to ask me, I think.

10067. You are not prepared to express an opinon on that ?—No, I do not wish to express an opinon on anything which does not come within my province or touch my province ; and that really does not.

10068. It does not come within anyone's province just now. Why should not there be a scattered home in Westmorland, for instance, belonging to either one board of guardians or another in the South of England ?—Of course it would be beyond their reach to inspect it.

10069. Then the inspection should come under some department ?—No ; I should say it would be too far off.

10070. (Mr. Lansbury.) How many ladies form a committee, as a rule ?—There must be three people on a committee, and many committees have more. There must be at least one lady on it.

Number of members of a boarding-out committee and their zeal.

10071. How many of these people really take an interest in the work and do the inspecting ?—All but a very few. They used not, you must remember ; there used to be great abuses, but those abuses are done away with, and they all now at the present moment, with a very few exceptions, take a great deal of interest in the work.

10072. So that the old days when really the secretary did all the work have passed away ?—Almost entirely.

10073. And these ladies do really give up their time and look after the children thoroughly ?—They do indeed.

10074. That has grown up lately, has it not ?—No ; I think they differed in the past, but of course they are more looked after lately.

10075. You mean a good many of them differed, did they not ?—Yes ; and they differ still. There were some very bad ones.

Paupers or quasi-paupers as foster-parents to boarded-out children.

10076. Is it true that these committees are very often formed by people who find homes where the persons occupying them are people in the receipt of out-door relief, or who are likely to want out-door relief, and who get children sent to them instead of out-door relief, and so the rate of pauperism for the particular village comes down ?—That is not the fact to any appreciable extent. There is such a case here and there, but they are very few.

Ages of foster-parents

10077. Will it be true to say that a large number of the people who take boarded-out children are over fifty years of age ?—I think they are quite young over fifty years of age. That is not at all too old to look after a child.

10078. I am not thinking about that for the moment ; how many of them would there be between fifty and sixty ? —I could not tell you. Some of those are the best homes, because they are people whose own children have grown up and gone. The middle-aged people who act as grandparents to them are amongst the very best homes ; the young people with babies are not the best.

10079. I rather want to find out the average of people who take charge of children under the boarding-out system ?—I could not tell you the average at the moment. They are of all ages. I do not like them to be too old to be able to look after the children, nor so old that they will become too old by the time the child grows up and goes out into the world.

Motive of foster-parents in taking boarded-out children.

10080. Is it not true that a large number of them would have to get relief if they were not taking those children ?—No, it is not true of a large number of them ; a small proportion would, but it would be quite a small proportion.

10081. Are there any children now boarded out at Aspley Guise ?—None. That came to an end.

10082. Most of those were ladies of a very uncertain age, I think ?—You must not judge the whole boarding-out system, because that may not have been satisfactory.

10083. The rate of pay may now be 5s., may it not ?—Yes, it may be.

10084. In the home where the head of the family is only earning 15s. a week, if they take four children at the maximum they will really get more for those four children than the income of the breadwinner ?—Yes.

10085. That would be a considerable advantage to the breadwinner and his wife who happened to be the lucky pair ?—Yes, but there are very few homes where there are four boarded out.

10086. Still, there are some, are there not ?—I should say that in my present district there are certainly not twelve—I should not think there are six.

10087. How many are there altogether ?—I cannot tell you, but I will ask the other inspectors, if you like. I should not think there are many. It is very difficult to find a home which has the space for four children.

10088. When they have four children in one of these cottages, how do they sleep them ?—It depends upon the cottage, and as I say every cottage is different. I have one case where there are five brothers and sisters boarded out with an unmarried woman who has got very comfortable means of her own. She has got money. That is the only case I know.

10089. It is a very comfortable piece of business for her, is it not?—Yes, and it is very comfortable for them too. They are thoroughly well cared for. They have in that house three bedrooms, besides a spare room; the boys sleep in one room in two beds, and the girls sleep in another room in a very good bed.

10090. Then where there are only two children it is also rather good business for the man and his wife?—I am glad that you see that it does pay them, anyhow; I think it pays them.

10091. Personally I have no feeling about whether it pays them or not; I am quite certain that they will see that it does. I am like you, I am not under any delusions about it; I think people take them because they want to make something, however small it is?—Most of them take them for that in the first instance, undoubtedly.

After careers of boarded-out children.

10092. How many children really are assimilated into the population?—I do not quite know what you mean.

10093. How many of them when they get 15 or 16 get work in the neighbourhood and become part and parcel of that community?—They nearly all do; I have given you the proportion in the statement which I have drawn up for the Appendix. You may take it for granted that all those that have not returned to the union are assimilated in that way, and have had employment found for them on the spot.

10094. Is there any evidence that they have become part of the population there?—I find them there myself, very often, living there.

10095. It is a considerable number of children, is it not?—Yes. They are all in employment in the neighbourhood, or if not, that is because everybody shifts and moves nowadays and people do not stop in the same place. You may take it that all these who have not returned to the union are doing well, and that employment has been found for them by the local people.

10096. If the same kind of evidence is forthcoming about the barrack schools, and the ordinary institutional schools, can we say exactly the same for them? I mean, if we get a return as to how many children have come back to the workhouse, and if we say that those who have not come back are doing well, then we can say, can we not, that the overwhelming majority are doing well?—I think you can, in default of evidence to the contrary, and that is all one can say, that one does not know anything to the contrary. But with regard to the boarded-out children, as I tell you, I see a great many of them personally, and I know that they are doing well.

10097. As for the girls, in the main they go to domestic service, do they not?—Yes.

10098. What do the boys do, generally?—They do all sorts of things. In agricultural neighbourhoods they go on to the land; a great many of them come up to the "Exmouth" training ship, some are apprenticed as carpenters, some as plumbers, and some go into shops.

10099. Have you any idea what percentage of boys go to the "Exmouth" and what percentage go into the Army?—I have given you in a table all the boys that have gone to the "Exmouth"; I cannot tell you what boys have gone into the Army.

10100. Exactly the same thing happens to the girls as happens to them in an institution, that is, they go to domestic service?—Yes.

Functions of M.A.B.Y.S.

10101. In the case of children in the country, they are looked after by the Girls' Friendly Society, and the girls belonging to the London Guardians come under the M.A.B.Y.S., do they not?—The Girls Friendly Society look after some of the girls who have been boarded out in the country; but have no organised system for the purpose

10102. So that in the case of a Metropolitan child who has once got into service, even if she falls out of her first place, the M.A.B.Y.S. looks after her and will take care of her and see to her?—Yes.

10103. So she is no more trouble to the local committee, is she?—Yes. The committee usually keep up with her. And the boarded-out children do not come under the M.A.B.Y.S. unless they come up to London; the boarded-out girls have places found for them in the country.

10104. Is this not true, that most of the Metropolitan Boards hand the whole of the placing of their girls over to the M.A.B.Y.S.?—I believe so.

10105. Both the boarded-out children and the children in institutions?—Not the boarded-out children.

10106. We did it at Poplar, and I thought probably it was a general thing?—No, it is not. With regard to the boys who have gone to the "Exmouth" or to the training home, there appear to have been eighty-two according to my list here; but it is not yet complete.

Difficulties of finding employment for boys.

10107. Have you found that there is a difficulty in placing boys?—There is more difficulty in some districts than in others. There is more difficulty in placing boys than in placing girls.

10108. Poplar has given up boarding out; they must have had rather rough kinds of centres, because they found a difficulty in placing out boys over and over again?—Some of them do find a difficulty in placing out the boys; others again are glad to have them.

Boarded-out children the stigma of pauperism.

10109. Is not one of the reasons why certain unions have given the system up this—that they have found that instead of the children getting absorbed in the ordinary population, and therefore being benefited by the people not knowing they were paupers and all the rest of it, that really does not work out under boarding out?—That may have contributed, but I think that no union has given it up for that reason alone. It may have been one of the contributory reasons why they have, but I have not had it given to me as the sole reason by any board.

10110. Of course a child does not become less a pauper in the eyes of the people through being boarded-out, does it?—I never hear the word "pauper" in the country, and I doubt whether they would know what you meant if they heard it. I do not believe they think about it.

10111. That is true, but you do think that they think about it when they see a child come out of an institution?—No.

10112. Do you think there is any difference?—Not much.

10113. One of the reasons for boarding-out children is that it does remove all the stigma of pauperism; but is it not true that in the villages where these children are, they are known as "Poplar children" or "Bradford children," or whatever district they come from?—They are known generally as "orphans," and I do not think that people know or care what district they come from. They call them sometimes "London children" and sometimes "orphans," and they seldom know the particular union from which they come.

10114. Would you say that that was true of Aspley Guise?—I dare say they did know there, but then you must remember that at Aspley Guise there were a great number of children—at least forty. When you import as many as forty children, that is a very patent fact.

10115. Well, take Corsham?—At Corsham they had also about forty. You are speaking of places where many are sent, but in many places they have half a dozen children, sometimes even only three or four, and then nobody takes any notice of them.

10116. If you do not have them in big groups, you will only be able to deal with very few, will you not?—The majority are not in large groups. I think it is a mistake to send as many as forty to one place.

10117. That, too, is an improvement of late, is it not?—The reason is that we are rather more careful not to let a committee enter into an agreement with too many boards of guardians; and generally also that the guardians, before they send out a large number of children, privately consult the inspector as to how many children are there already, and whether they should send others.

Type of child suitable for boarding-out.

10118. It is only the best children really that are boarded out, is it not?—Yes.

10119. There are so many things that bar a child that the really troublesome child has to stay at the school, has it not?—That is quite true.

10120. Is it not also true that the child who ought to be boarded-out is the troublesome child who needs attention and care?—I do not think that follows. The kind of attention and care which they get as boarded-out children is not the kind which suits the troublesome child. The troublesome child wants more discipline than is given by foster parents. They lose patience with it.

10121. Does it need personal attention to find out just the kind of treatment it ought to receive?—Yes, but the kind of personal attention which they would get in an ordinary cottage is not the kind to suit it.

10122. Still, the village child whose parents are alive, and who does not become chargeable, has to get that sort of treatment, has it not?—Yes, but then we are not concerned with those. Many of them would be very much better off if we could alter their parents.

10123. Is another reason for boarding-out that you get personal attention for the child?—Yes, that is true; only the kind of personal attention is one which will suit one disposition or class of child but not another.

10124. Still, if that also breaks down, is that not another reason why the guardians will not bother about it; if they are only to send their best children, and if it is unsuitable for children who need special care and attention, why should they bother about boarding-out?—That is one reason why they do not board out—because they do not want to send away their best children and keep the worst.

doption of arded-out ildren by ster-rents.

10125. Why should they? There does not seem any reason for it, to me, at any rate. Could you tell us how many children have been adopted by the foster-parents?—I do not approve of adoption, and I always do everything I can to check it. I could not tell you how many.

10126. Not a large number?—No, not a large number.

10127. Is it not an unusual thing for a foster-parent to take a child, and say I will take over the whole responsibility of it?—Some of them would like to do it when the child gets to a wage-earning age..

10128. I mean before the child becomes of a wage-earning age?—Not very many then, but some do.

10129. It is only a very few, is it not?—A very few.

10130. Is it not true that what you said just now operates pretty well all round, namely, that as a child gets older, the foster-parents, especially when they are poor, get a bit sick of it, and find out a good many faults with it, which necessitates its removal very often?—Some do, but not very many.

ler arded-out' ldren urned by ter-parents guardians.

10131. That must be an improvement too, or else Poplar was very unfortunate in the three or four districts in which they boarded children out?—That is just what you were. And several other unions have been unfortunate in their particular district, and therefore they have condemned the whole system—which is a great pity.

10132. We found as the child got to ten or eleven years of age it developed no end of faults, and it got really vicious and bad, and we had to shift it?—But then, as I say, you should not judge the whole boarding-out system by one committee.

10133. I think it was four committees we judged it by, but I am not sure?—If you had found four others, perhaps you would have found four good ones.

terrence of arding-out a form of ef.

10134. That may be so; but the point is, why bother if they only want our most excellent children? As to the standard of living of these children, they get a doctor found them and they get a dentist; does it not place them rather in a superior position to all the other children in the village to have a dentist looking after their teeth, and all the rest of it?—It would be a very good thing if all the other children could have it too.

10135. I think so too; but are they not being placed in a more eligible position than the children of the independent labourer?—I do not see that that matters. I think all your children, wherever you bring them up, whether they are in the schools or boarded-out, or wherever they are, are in a more eligible position, and I do not see that that is an argument against boarding-out any more than against any other system.

tinction ween rding-out hildren l out-relief children

10136. I do not either. About boarding-out within the union—I do not know whether I ought to ask you this—if it is good to board children out within the union, where the mother is living and she is a decent woman, why should not the children be boarded out with her?—They are, under the name of out-relief.

10137. I am afraid not in such an eligible manner as when she happens to be dead and they go with another woman; then there is 4s. a week paid for them; but there are very few boards of guardians who would give 4s. a week to the mother for one child. Would you see any objection to giving her 4s.?—I do not think she should have as much as that.

10138. Why should another woman?—I think she should have a better allowance than she very often does have.

10139. If you want to keep up home life—because there is no other reason at all for boarding-out; that is the bottom reason, that you want to maintain home life for the child and to give it the supposed advantages of home life—surely the proper person is the mother, and why should she be expected to be able to do with less money than another one?—Because natural affection and natural duty oblige her to look after her own children; but nobody is obliged to take other people's children and look after them, and you must offer them some payment and remuneration for it.

10140. Take a mother with a young baby?—It is not what the child costs, but what the people will take it for, you see.

10141. That is another thing; for the moment we are taking that 4s. a week is a proper sum to pay to a woman to keep a child within the union. In the case of a mother who is a widow, and who has one or two young children under three years of age, and two or three over that age, what reason is there for not paying her the same amount?—In the first place, I think that out-relief should be discouraged as much as possible. I am not in favour of out-relief at all, where it can be helped. The reason why you should not give a mother so much as you would give to a woman who is no relation, is that the money is not given for the food of the child only, but for the trouble as well; and you do not pay a mother for taking trouble for her own child, whereas if you give it to some other woman you must pay her, or she will not take it; you must give her something for her trouble.

10142. I understand you do give it to the relatives when you board-out within the union?—That is a very different thing; but I have said that I think that form of out-relief with relatives is a very bad thing.

10143. Do you not think that you keep the family life better that way?—Perhaps in a particular case you may, but you encourage other people to ask for relief. I think out-relief is most short-sighted. It may be cheaper in the individual case; but it entails a much larger expenditure in others. That is the chief reason why pauperism has increased, and the rates have risen as they have.

10144. What is the difference in principle between it and taking a person's children from her and boarding them out, and relieving her altogether of the whole responsibility and paying some one else to do it and leaving her free?—But I would not take a woman's child from her and board it out. If the woman cannot support her child and she does not have out-relief, I should take the children into the institution—that is the best plan—and bring them up properly there. I would certainly not board them out with somebody else, or take them from the real mother, and give them to someone else; there is no sense in it.

10145. I agree with you about that, and I am glad you said that, because really I was going to ask you to say that or something else about it which is in your mind. But my point is just here: I understand your argument to me just now is that one of the reasons for the increase of pauperism is that we have given outdoor relief, etc., etc., and I put it to you that if you take the children of a woman and relieve her of every scrap of responsibility in regard to them, and put them into an institution, what is the difference in principle between doing that and giving her out-relief to look after the children herself? If you put them into an institution you are paying somebody to look after them for her?—If you have the children in an institution, you have the control of the children.

10146. I know, but what I want to get at is where the magic is that makes the one thing vicious, when it is not vicious the other way?—You are discussing the whole question of out-relief, not of boarding-out. I think myself that out-relief is a bad example, because it tends to make people not self-dependent; they rely upon it to have money given to them to keep their children with them. If you are going to take the child from the woman, she will try to keep it with her; that is the incentive to her to keep her child and support it if she can. If you say, if we are to pay for your child, we must take it from you and put it into an institution, she is more likely to try to support it herself.

10147. My last question was a general question, to which you answered that to board-out a child within the union when its own mother is there, is foolish, I agree you with, but that is what is being done now in London?—I did not know it was being done.

10148. It is not actually boarding-out, but we have homes set up where we are supposed to be keeping up the home life, and the mother of the children may be living next door to them. But then the other question I want to get at is, what is the difference in principle between giving the mother the relief in the workhouse or in the school and giving it in money? I may be very dense, but I do not see the difference. You are relieving her anyhow; that is my contention against you. I know it has not anything to do with boarding-out, but it all came up because of this boarding-out within the union. About desertion, is it true that the bulk of the children are deserted children? —Not the bulk. I do not ask whether they are orphans or deserted when I visit them; but as far as I hear, I should say that one-half or one-third were deserted.

14149. I should not have thought that held, because I should say that the number of deserted children in a union like Poplar was very tiny?—I have no statistics and I have no means of speaking accurately, and so I may be wrong, but as I go about I hear they have been deserted.

10150. I do not want to pin you to figures, of course; the point about is that if you remove them right away their relatives cannot get at them?—That is so.

10151. Then, again, it is not true that Poplar had a very bad experience in that way?—We found that undesirable relations got at them just as easily away, especially when the children got old enough to work?—That was your fault or your clerks' fault, for letting them have the addresses.

Refusal of addresses to undesirable relatives of boarded-out children.

10152. They never let them have the addresses, I may say?—Some people do let them have the addresses.

10153. You can only refuse the address of a child if you have taken it under control, and I am not speaking at all of children who are under control. I am speaking of children against whose relatives there was not anything to justify you in not allowing them to know where the children lived?—I think that you would be justified if these relations who applied to you were not maintaining the children and were not responsible for them.

10154. If there is no other reason then poverty?—If there is no other reason than that you do not think it desirable.

10155. After all, a person may not be undesirable, even though he may be very poor?—That is so.

10156. I am dealing here with what with all due respect to you is not true—with the statement in the table on page 10 that Poplar ceased to board-out, because of the experiences of Mr. Crooks, and because of the dispute with the school authorities who refused to admit boarded-out children free?—I am quite willing to correct that, and I intended to do so, in fact.* You will see I have headed it "Reasons as far as I am able to give them." I have not written to inquire, and not all the unions have given me their reasons definitely. They are as far as I know them, and as far as I can give them; but there may be many other reasons besides what I put down.

Competence of schoolmaster as inspector of boarded-out children.

10157. In defence of mere man and the schoolmaster, surely the appearance of a child, without stripping it, has some relation to how it is being cared for or not cared for? No, I am afraid not.

10158. I have ten children, and I should always judge by the look of a child's face what was happening to it?—You know your ten children.

10159. And I know a lot of others?—But when you have got to visit other people's children you could not at all find out in that way, certainly; besides which none of your ten children require that inspection if they are all right. You cannot possibly judge by your ten comfortably cared-for and well brought-up children.

10160. I am one of the people who did not go in a van, but who as a guardian visited these places, and I sorted out straight off the children at Aspley Guise who ought to come away?—But then you know you are unusually clever, and I should not find another like you.

10161. The chances are that you have not bothered to try. Surely it is rather a sweeping sort of thing to say that the schoolmaster cannot judge of what is happening? —I just happen to have in my book here, which I brought for another reason, the marks of the size of the bruises on one of the very cleanest and tidiest girls I ever saw. I brought in the schoolmistress, who had not the slightest notion of it, in order to corroborate the bruises and to write her report on them. You shall see the size of the bruises on that well-dressed, well cared for and clean child who was supposed to be all right.

10162. Did the child look happy?—Yes, quite happy; she was used to it.

10163. Perhaps she deserved what she got?—Whether she did or not, your question is, Had she been whacked?—and you said you could find it out by her face.

10164. No, my question is whether the child was unhappy?—I used to be whacked but I never was unhappy? I do not think you were whacked to this extent that I am going to show you.

10165. I don't know about that. I put this to you, that there is a value in the reports of the schoolmaster on the appearance—not the dress, but the appearance—of the child, the look on its face, and the general demeanour of the child? When a child is cowed and bullied, it shows it in its face, does it not?—Some children cannot be any more cowed or bullied than you were.

10166. That shows it does not hurt them, then?—It hardens them; that is even worse. In the case of some, if it does not cow them, it hardens them. Those are the marks on the child that the schoolmistress saw; I think those marks are too big—it was done with too big an instrument (producing notebook.)

10167. Is it not true that the schoolmasters in their reports very often have called attention to the children not being physically fit, and looking very miserable and tired, and as if they were not properly treated?—I entirely agree with you that the schoolmasters' reports are most valuable, but they are not all-sufficient. That is all that I would say.

10168. There we all agree; nothing is all-sufficient no inspection can be all-sufficient?—You want the inspection of ladies as the foundation, and that of the schoolmaster in addition.

Objection to visitation of boarded-out children by lady guardians.

10169. Would you object to lady guardians having power to visit these children?—Yes.

10170. If they did not go in a van?—Yes.

10171. If they went one at a time?—Yes. The expense would be too great, for one thing. You see, many of the committees receive children from several unions—one I have given you in my Memorandum, the Thorndon Hall committee, had children from nine unions. If nine boards of guardians are free to send an inspector down to that committee, the people will be worried out of their wits, and will give up the system. Moreover, even lady guardians, admirable as they are—I think lady guardians are the cream of the earth—are not expert inspectors, and very often they do not in the least know how to find things out. They can do things that men cannot, but they do not always do them, because they do not always know how. The point of my evidence is that inspection is a thing which has to be learnt, which does not come by nature, and which requires training; and it is not everybody, simply because she is a woman, who can do it.

Communications between boarded-out children and relatives.

10172. (Mr. Booth.) With regard to the communications that take place between children and undesirable relatives, are they initiated to some extent by the children themselves, do you think? Do they seek out their uncle or their aunt, or whoever it may be, whom it is desired they should not communicate with?—Now and then they do, but very seldom. It is much more often the uncle or aunt who tries to find out where the children are.

10173. The children would almost always know from what union they came, because the foster-parents know it, and therefore the probability is the children would know it too; so that if a child wished to find its relations, it would at least know where to go to find them?—Very often the children are very anxious when they grow older to find their relations, and they often ask me to help them, but I cannot—I can only refer them, through their committees, to the clerk to the guardians.

After care of Poor Law children.

10174. Then it does happen sometimes that they seek their relatives?—Yes, they do sometimes. But chiefly their brothers or sisters—not uncles or aunts. It is the natural instinct of children to find someone belonging to themselves. I should like to hand in now for the Appendix (see Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XX. (K)) the Summaries of the returns from the clerks to the guardians given in my evidence to the Poor Law Schools' Committeee, of the numbers of children who have returned to the union. Next, I have brought you the results of boarding-out, a table showing what has happened to the children since. See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XX. (L).)

Epidemics in Poor Law and other Elementary Public Schools.

The third document deals with epidemics. One thing aid by the Poor Law Schools Committee and other people is that the children in Poor Law schools are subject to epidemics. I thought you ought to know the sanitary conditions of the country; therefore I have here tabulated the number of elementary country schools which have been closed for epidemics in my district, Miss Pell's and Miss Evans. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XX. (M).)

Dr. ANDREW FULLER, called; and Examined.

10175. (Chairman.) You are one of the poor law inspectors for medical purposes?—I am the inspector for the provinces of England and Wales. Dr. Downes is the senior medical inspector for poor law purposes, and his duties lie within the Metropolitan area.

10176. What medical colleagues or assistants have you?—None, except Dr. Downes.

Duties of General and Medical Inspectors.

10177. According to our practice, we will take your written memorandum as your evidence-in-chief. (See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XXI (A-C). In that you state that your primary duty is to make six routine inspections in each of the thirteen districts. Would you define a little more what a "routine inspection" means?—An inspection, in the company of a general inspector, of poor law infirmaries, or sick wards, of nurseries and workhouses; and occasionally schools, or the children in cottage homes.

10178. How long does an inspection take—a day?—It depends on the size of the workhouse, or the size of the institution.

10179. It would mean, I suppose, six inspections of separate institutions?—Yes.

10180. You do not report on the parts of the workhouses other than the infirmaries, or those appropriated to younger children unless there is something special?—Not unless the general inspector requests me to do so.

10181. So that the special province, if I may say so, of the two officials is naturally defined. The inspector takes the workhouse other than the infirmary and the nursery?—The general inspector as a rule takes the whole. It is only when I am associated with him that I take the inspection of the infirmaries in his company.

10182. Do inspectors report upon infirmaries, so to say, off their own bat, and without the cognizance or assistance of medical officers?—Yes; every year, every institution.

10183. They could, or they might, report on an infirmary without referring the matter to you?—Yes; I am put in the position of an assessor, so to speak.

10184. A scientific assessor?—Yes.

Prospects, personnel, and conditions of Poor Law Medical Service.

10185. Medical officers are appointed by guardians; is there anything like a special poor law medical service? For instance, do men who are appointed to the poor law medical service as a rule remain in it?—Those who have life appointments do, as a rule; but the assistant medical officers, or the resident medical officers, of large infirmaries do not, as a rule, stay longer than just a few years, sometimes one year or two, or it may be, five or six years.

10186. I suppose there are a large number of medical men appointed locally for poor law purposes who practise besides?—Yes; it is the general case that they are in practice outside.

10187. Assuming a man was to devote all his time and his attention to medical poor law work, is there a higher sphere of promotion open to him?—No.

10188. Have you ever thought whether any special service of the kind would be advisable?—I cannot quite see how it would work practically, because the appointment depends upon the local guardians in almost every case.

10189. I suppose there are so many nominating authorities who would probably have different ideas?—Just so.

10190. As a matter of practice, assuming that a medical officer in a comparatively small infirmary does his work well, is he likely to be appointed by another board of guardians to a larger infirmary?—If he should apply for the position, other things being equal, the guardians might appoint him in preference to anyone else who applied.

10191. The Local Government Board do not recommend, do they?—Never.

10192. They leave it entirely to the local authorities?—Yes.

10193. All they can control, or have a voice in, is the remuneration?—Practically that is what it amounts to.

Disadvantages of provision of drugs by Medical Officers at their own expense.

10194. Whilst we are on the subject of medical officers, you have a strong opinion as to the unwisdom or impropriety of medical officers having to provide their drugs at their own expense?—Decidedly, for workhouse use.

10195. I see you here quote a sentence that dispensary medical relief is given largely, and one guardian said because it cost them nothing?—That is the answer I gave to the particular guardian who made a statement in answer to a question of mine.

10196. If they paid for drugs, it would cost something to those who gave it, though not very much?—Yes, but I was speaking or thinking more particularly of the medical relief being included in the actual attendance of the medical officer who is appointed at a stated salary.

10197. And the increased amount of medical relief given costs the guardians nothing?—Comparatively speaking, very little in the individual case.

10198. It merely puts additional labour on the medical officer?—Yes.

10199. I think it has been alleged by one witness that making medical officers provide their drugs in the poorer agricultural districts sometimes results in their ordering alcohol, instead of giving drugs to patients?—I should certainly endorse that statement.

10200. It does?—It does, without a doubt.

Dr. Andrew Fuller.

24 April 1906.

10201. That is one of the direct evils of the system ?—I think so, as applying to workhouses. Of course, as regards the district medical officer he has no power to order and to see that alcohol is given. The district medical officer only has the power of recommendation.

10202. I suppose the medical officers of all the larger or better organised infirmaries do not pay for their drugs ?—That is so.

Effect of medical administration on Consumption of Alcohol in Workhouses.

10203. Is it a practice now that generally prevails in the agricultural districts ?—I think one might say not only in the agricultural districts, but other unions, urban unions as well. I should like to add, in respect to the question of alcohol and workhouses, that in the best medically administered workhouses one finds very little alcohol given. For instance, at the Leeds Union Infirmary the average amount of alcohol given per annum does not amount to £1 in value.

10204. That is a large infirmary ?—It is.

Infirmaries under quasi-separate administration.

10205. Would you look at paragraphs 17, 18, and 19 of your memorandum, which relate to the separation of infirmary administration from the workhouse ? You say in paragraph 18 that many large workhouse infirmaries, mentioning some, though not legally, or theoretically, separately administered, are so practically with the happiest results ; then you go on to say : "Should the Board insist upon the General Consolidated Order being carried out in such cases, which, of course, would be a physical impossibility, it is probable a separate order would be asked for, a large expenditure result, and possibly no improvement result in the administration." What would be the result of insisting upon the General Consolidated Order being carried out ?—The master and matron would have to make a round of the whole establishment twice a day.

10206. I am afraid I have not made myself very familiar recently with the General Consolidated Order ?—It is part of the regulations that they must make a round of the whole establishment twice a day, morning and evening, at certain hours. Of course, in a large establishment where there are 1,100 or 1,200 inmates, it would be naturally quite impossible for them to do it.

10207. What you wish to point out is that the General Consolidated Order, on this particular point, is obsolete ?—Exactly.

10208. Whilst we are on the subject of separation of infirmary administration, you would like to go further, and classify infirmaries, if possible ?—Yes.

Separate control of Infirmaries under the Basingstoke Order.

10209. That, of course, could only be done in a very large union, or where a number of unions combined ?—I do not think so. I think that an extension of what we call the Basingstoke Order would meet the difficulty in certainly a majority of the unions.

10210. I am afraid I did not make my question clear. I gathered from your evidence that you would like to divide up infirmaries, and have one infirmary dealing with a particular class of case, and other infirmaries dealing with other classes ; am I wrong in that ?—I am sorry, I am afraid I have not been as clear as I wanted to be in that way. I merely meant the separation should be as regards the control of the medical officer and superintendent nurse as opposed to the control of the master and matron.

10211. The Basingstoke Order modified the General Consolidated Order, and enables that to be done ?—It does.

Classification of Pauper Patients.

10212. With reference to paragraph 33, does not that rather indicate a further division of infirmary cases ? —A classification by the medical officer of the local union ; for instance, for what we might term incurable cases, the same expensive accommodation and equipment is not necessary.

10213. Would it be possible, say in London, to have one infirmary dealing with a case in Class 1, and another infirmary dealing with Class 2 ? Would that simplify it ? —I do not think you would want that. What I had in my mind was the fact that there are a great number of "chronics" among the infirmary cases who do not require the skilled care and attention of a nurse by night and day, and those might very well be accommodated in what we term "infirm wards," as distinct from hospital wards.

10214. It was merely a more distinct classification inside the infirmary itself ?—Yes.

10215. Not the classification of infirmaries ?—No.

Poor Law phthisical cases : Question of their transference to Public Health Authorities

10216. You have a strong opinion as to phthisis cases ? You think those are not fit cases for ordinary poor law treatment ?—Not so much that, as that the cases in the first stage do not as a rule come under the poor law medical officers.

10217. They do not come before the poor law medical officers in certain cases until the disease has developed ?—Until they become actually destitute.

10218. And the patient is probably almost incurable ? —Yes, incurable as far as being returned to work fit as an able-bodied man.

10219. It was in connection with the outdoor relief more particularly that you were speaking ?—Yes, more particularly.

10220. As regards these cases would you suggest that sanatoria should be provided ?—Not for poor law cases. I think that it should be a public health charge and a public health matter altogether.

10221. In fact, take it quite from the poor law ?—Yes ; I do not think that a man who suffers from phthisis pulmonalis ought to become practically disfranchised.

Rate-aided and other kinds of public hospitals and their proper spheres of operations.

10222. A separate provision, of course, would have to be made independent of the poor law for those cases ?—Yes.

10223. In paragraph 85 you say : "It has been apparent that public opinion, at least in some large urban unions, has been steadily drifting in the direction of rate-aided infirmaries taking the place of poor law infirmaries." What is the distinction between a rate-aided infirmary and a poor law infirmary ?—An infirmary for all classes of cases, not necessarily the destitute cases.

10224. In fact a hospital ?—Yes. I think that one of the earliest books that was published which led public opinion in that direction was "State-aided hospitals" by Dr. Dolan of Halifax.

10225. The inevitable tendency under pressure of public opinion is to make each finished workhouse infirmary more and more a competitor with the hospitals ?—I think so ; for instance at Sheffield and at Halifax, and other large union infirmaries that might be named, there are always a large number of cases, that are not strictly speaking poor law cases, under treatment ; and the reason for that is to a great extent that the local general hospitals have not sufficient accommodation to take those cases in, they may go for two or three days and then they are transferred to the local union infirmary, either because they are incurable, or deemed to be incurable, or else they are not quite the class of case they would keep in a general hospital

10226. Following out that idea, what would be the result ; would there be a rate-aided hospital in addition to the existing hospitals ? To what class of case would you limit the poor law infirmaries ?—Strictly speaking to the destitute cases ; cases that really are in receipt of relief and have no other means of obtaining the medical and nursing attention that is necessary.

10227. Most of the hospitals are free ?—I believe so.

10228. Would not it result merely in those who could not get orders going to the poor law infirmaries ?—I should think that that is already the result in a great many of the larger areas.

10229. Is it possible in any way to combine the two sets of institutions ?—I do not know that I have ever thought it out to that extent, so as to form any definite opinion as to what should be. I think in the initial stage the principle of competition with a voluntary hospital or a charity-aided hospital comes in, and I think that is wrong.

10230. Are there any rate-aided hospitals now ?—What practically amount to rate-aided hospitals, but not officially recognised as such.

10231. Rate-aided in the sense that the Corporation vote them lump sums ?—No, rate-aided as being supported by the poor law.

10232. Are there any rate-aided hospitals in England outside the poor law infirmaries ?—Isolation hospitals and public health hospitals.

10233. (Sir Samuel Provis.) When you say "rate-aided" hospitals do you mean hospitals to which the guardians subscribe?—No.

10234. What do you mean by a "rate-aided" hospital, do you mean one provided by a local authority?—Provided by the poor law authority taking all classes of cases irrespective of poor law.

10235. Are there any such hospitals?—No, I merely say that that is what it appears to be coming to.

10236. (Chairman.) In contradistinction to poor law infirmaries, you use the word "rate-aided" infirmary as one that would take all classes of cases, not merely poor law?—Yes.

Increased percentage of deaths in workhouse infirmaries.

10237. Statistical evidence has been submitted to us which shows, I think, that a larger proportion of the population die in workhouse infirmaries now than died before, which looks as if there was a greater tendency than before for people who are seriously ill to come in to be nursed and possibly to die, in the infirmaries. Has your attention at all been called to those figures?—Not particularly to those figures, but some three or four years ago I was struck with the increase in the number of deaths in different institutions that I visited from time to time; so I asked one or two of my colleagues whether they could furnish me with any tables relating to the increase in the number of deaths in workhouses in contradistinction to the normal increase of deaths in the localities, and in the only return that I received the increase of deaths in the district was ·4 per cent., while the increase of deaths in the workhouses of that district was 35 per cent.

10238. We have had figures from some of the inspectors which confirm that. (Mr. Loch.) Will you give the totals upon which that percentage is taken?—I can put in this sheet, which is the only sheet that I have.*

10239. (Chairman.) What area was that?—This was the Nottinghamshire district, and comprised the period from 1896 to 1902.

Inspections of Medical Inspector.

10240. (Mr. Booth.) I am still not quite clear about the meaning of paragraph 2; you say that your primary duty, until recently, was to make six routine inspections per annum in each of the thirteen districts. Does that mean that you make per annum six times thirteen inspections?—Yes.

10241. Six annual inspections in each district?—Yes.

10242. Then when you say "until recently," does one of these paragraphs afterwards qualify that with an alteration up to the present time?—I merely meant that under the late chief general inspector that was considered to be my duty, but since Mr. Davy's accession to office my duty has been somewhat enlarged on the lines of Mr. Ritchie's Minute.

10243. It is entirely a question of enlargement. You still have to make six routine inspections in thirteen districts?—Yes. I do not think Mr. Davy looks upon that quite as a primary duty. He looks upon my primary duty now as being at the beck and call, so to speak, of the general inspectors for any particular inspection which they may require to be made.

10244. Even if it should prevent your carrying out the six routine inspections?—Yes.

10245. So "until recently" applies to the word "primary"?—Yes.

10246. So that although that is your duty, that may be over-ridden by the special calls upon you to deal with the difficulties raised by the general inspectors?—Exactly.

Proposed extension of principle of rate-provided hospitals.

10247. With regard to this question of rate-aided institutions, hospitals of whatever kind, would it be correct to replace the word "rate-aided" by a word we are now all familiar with: "provided"? Is that the same idea that we have with regard to the schools? Do you mean an institution paid for entirely out of the public purse for certain special purposes? Is that the meaning of the word "rate-aided" as you use it?—No; that the guardians, in addition to their own union workhouse infirmary, should also be large subscribers, if not wholly providing, as regards the building accommodation, for ordinary sick cases arising in any part of the union among any class who could not provide the necessary accommodation for themselves.

10248. In a similar way to the treatment of infectious cases?—Exactly.

10249. The suggestion is to extend that idea, and especially you speak of the extension for phthisis cases, they being so dangerous to the public health?—Yes, and I had in my mind too the idea that if we conceded the principle that the Poor Law were to provide for the treatment of phthisis cases in the first stage, we were conceding the principle that the Poor Law should provide for all cases of acute illness among a certain class; by that I mean among the working classes.

10250. Is there not a distinction in the object in dealing with infectious diseases or disorders that are likely to spread to others. In those cases you insist on people who can afford it being in isolation in their own homes or in some institution?—Yes.

10251. Where they are poor you insist on their coming into a publicly provided place where they can be not only treated but safely isolated?—I do not think that is so altogether in the provinces.

10252. What I mean to ask is whether you wish to go beyond the consideration of the public interest in the prevention of the spread of infectious diseases to a more socialistic and wider dealing with illness, irrespective of its effect upon the neighbours?—That is what I think we are drifting towards. I do not agree with the principle of it.

10253. You do not agree with the principle of it: that is what I want to make clear?—No.

Medical Officers for Poor Law Schools and their functions.

10254. (Mr. Lansbury.) With regard to the inspection of Poor Law schools, there is always a medical officer attached to the Poor Law schools, is not there?—Yes.

10255. Should not it be his duty to see that the proper standard is kept up for nursing and medical attendance and things of that sort?—It should be his duty, but I think you can understand that the discharge of such duties by a local medical officer sometimes is inclined to be apathetic.

Importance of outside practice for Poor Law Medical Officers.

10256. Is not that rather because he has also a private practice?—It may be to a certain extent. I do not think it ought to be. I think a man who is in touch with the outside world ought to be very much more keen in the discharge of his duties in an institution such as a Poor Law school.

10257. You agree that the medical officer should not be appointed simply to do the one particular work, but that he should have a general practice outside?—I agree with that general principle.

10258. That, of course, would apply to paragraph 15 too, the indoor medical relief?—Yes.

Appointment of visiting as well as resident Medical Officers of Workhouses.

10259. Do not you think it is liable to a good deal of abuse, to pay an outside doctor a salary to do something which certainly in large urban districts he never has time to do himself, because of the very large practice he has outside?—No, I think that we ought to have our large Poor Law infirmaries put upon the same principle as the general hospitals, the visiting medical men and the resident medical men.

10260. Your experience is that that always works out all right?—I think it works better than having one man to devote his whole time to the duties and not to be really in touch with the outside professional world. In London it may work very well, because I believe there is an association of medical superintendents, but in the provinces you have one man resident who is not in touch altogether with his medical colleagues.

10261. I am thinking of large infirmaries just now with 600 or 700 inmates. Do not you think in those cases it ought to be the rule that the chief simply devotes his whole time to the business?—No, I think it is a mistake; that the man in such a position gets into a groove.

10262. Of course, I am not a medical man; I was only going to say that, with 600 or 700 cases, it seems to me he could hardly get into a groove, because there are so many different cases he has to deal with; it is almost the same as an ordinary general hospital, from the point

* The figures referred to by Dr. Fuller also form part of the statement of evidence handed in by Mr. Herbert. (Vide Appendix Vol I. (A), No. XVII. (A), paragraph 10.)

Dr. Andrew Fuller.

24 April 1906.

Appointment of visiting as well as resident Medical Officers of Workhouses. (e.g. Crumpsall, West Derby, Bradford, and Stoke-on-Trent.)

of view of experience ?—From that point of view, but I believe in a man keeping a liberal mind, and I am afraid my experience is that after a man has been resident in such an institution for some years, you find that he is far from having a liberal mind on all points, medical and general administration.

10263. The other point is that if he has so much work to do outside, some part of his work must suffer. He cannot pay attention to everything ?—I do not think you will find that. My experience is not so. We will take Crumpsall, for instance. The visiting medical officers there are men of the highest professional and social standing in the locality, and the work there is admirably done. To take another instance, it is the same in the West Derby Union Mill Road Infirmary.

10264. It is only because I so thoroughly agree with your paragraph 15 that I am putting these questions. The medical officers do not do this sort of thing; at any rate, my experience of them is that they do not ?—My experience is that when you get a man who is resident, who devotes his whole time, he is much more apathetic after a period of years than he would be if he were in touch with the outside world by visiting.

10265. Do you think that applies to the Metropolis ?—I know nothing about the Metropolis; I have no duties specially there.

10266. The largest are in London ?—I believe so.

10267. Take Bradford, for instance; I do not know what you say about that ?—I have a very high appreciation of what has been done at Bradford during the last ten years. Mr. Bentham knows what I thought of Bradford twelve years ago.

10268. Is it the custom, outside London, to have an outside doctor ?—As a rule it is.

10270. I am thinking of workhouses with 1,000 inmates ?—Do you mean 1,000 excluding the sick ?

10271. Yes, but including the infirm, the infirm which you would call chronics, people who want day and night attendance but not night and day nursing ?—I should say you would require a resident assistant medical officer and a visiting medical officer in a case like that.

10272. You think even there we want the visiting officer ?—Certainly.

10273. What sort of man should this visiting doctor be, a local man ?—A local man, and naturally if opportunity offer, a man of the best professional standing in the locality.

10274. You are not advocating physicians coming down in the fashion that they have at the hospitals, are you ? It is a purely local man you have in your mind as the visiting medical officer ?—Yes.

10275. You think they are necessary ?—I do.

10276. And a resident assistant man too ?—In a very large institution such as you speak of.

10277. What would be the salary of the visiting medical officer ?—That would vary according to the locality. For instance, at Stoke-on-Trent the visiting medical officer has an honorarium of £50 a year: the resident medical officer's salary is £150, rising by instalments; I forget now the exact amount.

10278. I suppose you will tell me you do not know anything about London, if I ask you what applies to London ?—No; but at Stoke-on-Trent that particular method answers very well. You go to another union, perhaps, of the same size as Stoke-on-Trent, and you find the visiting medical officer with a salary of £250, and the resident assistant with a salary of £200 a year, and that works equally well.

10279. You will not say anything about London ?—am not in a position to say anything.

Insufficient salaries of Medical Officers.

10280. In paragraph 25 you say the majority of medical officers, in or outdoor, are paid salaries miserably inadequate. Is the Stoke-on-Trent salary a miserably inadequate one ?—Do you mean the visiting medical officer's salary ?

10281. Either; I do not mind which ?—No.

10282. You think they are both paid fairly ?—I think so, for the duties that are required of them according to the agreement.

10283. There must be other unions where they are very badly paid. Is that so ?—A very great many, I am sorry to say.

Functions Local Governme Board in regard to scale of salaries.

10284. Does not the Local Government Board fix a maximum for outdoor ?—No, there is no Regulation under which the Local Government Board can fix it.

10285. Is not there one in London ?—I am not conversant with the London policy at all.

10286. Does not the Local Government Board draw up scales for other officers, relieving officers, for instance ?—There, again, I am out of my province; I could not tell you.

10287. As the Local Government Board has a good deal to do with regard to the fixing of scales of salaries, as to how much a board may or may not pay, do not you think it would be a duty of the Local Government Board to draw up such a scale?—I think we might have an amendment of the Poor Law, as I suggest in paragraph 87 of my memorandum.

10288. I suppose you do know that the Local Government Board does fix maximum salaries for certain officers; I am under the impression that for dispensers in London they have fixed a scale; is there any reason why the Local Government Board should not do a similar thing in the country ?—The Local Government Board in the case of nurses asks for a statement from the guardians as to the maximum salaries to be given, and then they sanction a certain staff, and that is the only case that I know of where the Local Government Board have asked for a maximum scale of salaries to be furnished to them before assenting to the appointments.

10289. Do not you think in a case like this the Local Government Board ought to have a scale and send it out to the various boards of guardians and tell them if they want proper medical attention they ought to pay a certain sum for it ?—There, of course, you hit at once at the question of local government and local administration; if there is to be any alteration in that, of course the question of central authority as to the salaries to be given arises, and then comes the central responsibility.

10290. But the central authority does control now; it will not allow a board to pay just what it pleases in the matter of salaries. If a board said it would give its doctor £1,000 a year you would interfere ?—That is what I should call a very unreasonable suggestion.

10291. You could prevent them paying that; all I want to ask is whether you do not think the Local Government Board ought to prevent boards of guardians paying miserable and inadequate salaries ?—I think if the Local Government Board had power to do that they would do so.

10292. Have they ever issued any standard, any order or memorandum explaining what they think would be a proper rate to pay for a medical officer to do certain duties ?—I am not in a position to answer that question.

10293. You have not issued one as medical inspector, have you ?—I have no power to issue any memorandum of any kind; it is not within my province to do so.

10294. Not on anything ?—Not on anything.

10295. As to out-door medical officers, again, I am afraid I shall not be able to ask you anything very relevant, because I have London in my mind. I was going to ask you whether you thought it was good to give those appointments to very busy local practitioners ?—In London ?

Allegatio that out-patients needlessly sent into Infirmari by Distri Medical Officers.

10296. Perhaps this does not apply to the country; have you ever heard complaints that the out-door relief man bundles people into the sick asylums or infirmaries because he does not want the trouble of them, and they very often fill up the beds in the infirmaries ?—I can only speak as to the provinces, and there it is a matter of personal persuasion; there is no hurrying into any workhouse infirmary or any other institution on the part of any medical officer; no one has the right to compel anybody to go into the workhouse infirmary.

10297. But there are various means by which you can compel people to do things; if the medical officer recommends to the guardians that the case is better treated inside, the case has to go in, has it not?—I should not like to say that. The guardians as a rule make a very careful consideration of each case before they take any action as to cutting off out-relief; and they never allow a medical officer to cease attending on a case because the case refuses to go into the workhouse infirmary.

10298. After all, it is only a minority that would refuse to go in after the doctor had ordered that they should go in?—Now-a-days I think that is so, but in times gone by a very large majority used to refuse to go in.

10299. We are dealing with them now, are not we, rather?—I mean within the last ten years.

10300. Have you come across the statement that outside medical officers simply treat cases that do not need much attention outside, and that the others are sent in on purpose to get rid of them?—No, I should not like to subscribe to that statement.

10301. I only asked whether you had heard the same sort of complaint?—No, not in the provinces.

cility with hich out- or Medical elief is tained.

10302. Then you say that there is a great deal of abuse in regard to out-door relief. I should like to know what you mean by that?—In some unions an order for out-door medical relief is given without any inquiry, simply on the application of the person, or the relieving officer, without any due inquiry as to the condition of that person.

edical elief the ghway to uperism.

10303. Is not that because the relieving officer has no knowledge of whether the person is very sick or not? I mean, a son or a daughter goes up, or a wife goes up for a medical order for the husband; the relieving officer does not know whether he is dangerously ill or not, does he?—Not necessarily; but what I meant was the giving of an out-door medical relief order was the commencement of permanent out-door relief without sufficient reason.

10304. They would not be put on permanently, would they, without sufficient inquiry?—In some unions they are.

10305. You think they would in some unions?—Yes.

ovision for thisical upers.

10306. In the provinces is phthisis very prevalent in urban districts?—Judging by the returns that have been available for the last four years, it is, more or less.

10307. In the meantime, before the public health authorities or private charities do what you suggest, do you think it is good to be treating these people in the ordinary sick asylums and infirmaries?—Not in the ordinary sick wards; they ought to be treated in wards where they are entirely separated from the ordinary sick.

10308. In places where they have not got those wards what are they to do?—I often find cases treated in ordinary sick wards.

10309. They have to treat them there because they have not any other place?—That is so, usually.

10310. In this matter of phthisis, your board has had before it for some time now particulars in regard to the ravages made by consumption, especially in London; and no steps have been taken by anyone to provide what you say is necessary to be provided. Do not you think it would be better to let the poor law authorities do it rather than that it should not be done at all?—Giving my personal opinion, as distinct from an official opinion, I should say yes.

10311. Your real reason for not wanting the poor law to do it is because you do not want a man suffering from such a complaint to be treated as a pauper?—Exactly.

10312. You think he is no more a pauper than a person who suffers from small-pox?—Exactly.

sfranchise- nt in tain cases Medical lief.

10313. I want to put it to you, and I do not want to press you too hard on this, because, perhaps, there are other reasons to be stated: If a man breaks his leg and becomes chargeable, and has to go into an infirmary, is there any real reason why he should be treated as a pauper any more than the man who gets phthisis by following a particular trade or calling?—There is no particular reason; but then, in certain localities there are no general hospitals to which a case like that could be taken, and in very large urban unions, such as those I have mentioned, the general hospitals, as a rule are not infrequently full and cannot take the case in.

10314. I have that in my mind, too. In principle there is no difference, is there?—No. We will take the case of the Hatfield Union, where all railway accidents have to go into the workhouse infirmary. That I consider to be a wrong state of affairs altogether.

10315. Those men ought not to be disfranchised any more than the man with phthisis. That is the point I want to put to you?—I quite agree.

10316. (Sir Samuel Provis.) They would not be disfranchised, would they?—If treated inside they would.

Waste food in Workhouses.

10317. (Mr. Lansbury.) With regard to the cost of food in workhouses, do not you think there is a good deal of waste through serving out to everybody a certain amount. You are bound to put down so much bread, so much meat, so much potatoes, and the rest of it, whether the person wants it or not?—Are you referring now to the workhouse infirmaries or to the workhouse dietary?

10318. The workhouse dietary generally, not the infirmaries so much?—No, not under the present system.

10319. You do not think there is?—No.

10320. I do not know what happens in the provinces, but do not they nearly always keep pigs?—Not so many as they used to have under the old system.

10321. Do they keep any now?—They do, and masters have frequently said to me: "It is not so cheap now to keep pigs as it used to be, we have so very little waste." I have numbers of times inspected what is called the waste tub, and found very little waste. It is a matter I have gone into very carefully, both as regards the waste, and the general workhouse diet, as well as the infirmary diet.

10322. Is the dietary for aged people the same outside London as inside London?—It depends; the local authorities choose the rations altogether.

10323. I think you call it No. 1 dietary in London for the aged people?—No, No. 1 dietary is for able-bodied men.

10324. Then it is No. 2?—There is a very large list of rations to choose from.

10325. I know; but there is so much bread for almost each meal?—You will find in almost all provincial workhouses there is a regulation that either a half, two-thirds, or three-quarters of the bread should be served in the first place.

10326. Do not you think that is open to abuse? Nobody knows really how much is used?—There comes in the personal equation of the accounting officer.

10327. The master?—Yes.

10328. Under the present arrangements, where you leave it free, it is open to the abuse of the people not getting what it is said they do get, is it not?—I must say that I am very agreeably surprised, taking the country as a whole, at the very few complaints one does get as regards the service of food.

10329. What I would like to put to you is, whether it would not be better to serve out to the people, and let them get what they need, and serve it up in a more varied style; instead of fixing certain things leave more to the discretion of the people who are preparing it and serving it?—No, I think it would be open to much more abuse than the present system.

10330. The present system is open to abuse, is not it?—Any system must be open to abuse, not necessarily in a Poor Law institution.

10331. My point is, that being so, you might just as well face it, and use up scraps and things as you would in a private house. It seems to me that there ought not to be any waste at all in a workhouse?—There is always an irreducible minimum of waste.

10332. Do you think we have got to the irreducible minimum?—In some, in what I call well-administered houses.

10333. As to rate-aided infirmaries, you do not agree with the tendency that is going on just now?—No.

Expensive Infirmary equipment. Sheffie d.

10334. What is your particular complaint about the buildings? You say that they outvie the latest in the equipment, especially in regard to the operating room. Is it that they spend too much on the buildings?—Not necessarily upon the actual building, but upon the equipment. For instance, at Sheffield, I believe the equipment of the operating room alone cost £500.

Dr. Andrew Fuller.

24 April 1906.

10335. Would that expenditure be sanctioned by your board?—Sanctioned among other items, not necessarily sanctioned as the equipment of the operating room.

10336. Who would advise the guardians as to what was necessary for the operating room?—In that particular case the guardians formed a committee, and they visited various other Poor Law infirmaries and general hospitals throughout the country, and then advised their Board.

10337. Would not they be guided by their local medical man?—To a certain extent, but not entirely.

10338. They would not themselves know much about the implements necessary for cutting people up, and the table, and all the rest of it, would they?—In that particular instance they would; they had some members of the committee who knew what ought to be provided.

10339. Who were medical men?—One was a medical man, and another was the President of the Pharmaceutical Society.

10340. So that they really had good advice in what they were doing?—Yes.

10341. And they followed that advice, so as, if they treated people at all, to treat them in the best possible manner, and get them well as quickly as possible?—I do not know that I should subscribe to that statement.

10342. Why did they spend the money?—This is putting it in my own words: because they wanted their operating room to be one of the best.

High percentage of recoveries from operations in certain moderately equipped infirmaries. Liverpool.

10343. What does "one of the best" mean, except that it is to carry the operations through in the best manner possible to get your patients well quickly?—I do not think it is necessary to have such a very elaborately fitted operating room to get your patients well quickly. I know other workhouse infirmaries where the percentage of recoveries from operations is higher than in the local general hospitals, and I should like to name the Mill Road Infirmary of Liverpool, as the first that occurs to me, where the percentage of recoveries is higher than in any one of the Liverpool general hospitals, I believe.

10344. Is that a well equipped operating room?—If you were to ask the superintendent medical officer of that institution he would tell you that he was not at all satisfied with it, it was a very poor place.

10345. Very likely his percentage would be higher if he had the means that he really wants, he ought to be the best judge?—What I mean is this: that the recovery in great measure depends upon the personal equation as regards the medical officers concerned and the nursing.

10346. You mean it depends on the doctor and the nurses rather than anything else?—Rather than upon the equipment of the operating room.

10347. You do not subscribe to the doctrine that guardians just throw this money away because they have someone's else money to spend, and therefore they will spend it willy-nilly, somehow?—No, not altogether, I do in some cases.

Responsibility for expensive infirmary buildings, &c.

10348. Do you in the case of building infirmaries and that sort of thing? Who puts it into the heads of Boards of Guardians that they want a new operating room; do they think that themselves?—As a rule I should say the suggestion comes from the medical officer.

10349. That is the point I want to get at, as a rule these extravagant things are suggested by the gentleman who is the adviser of the guardians on such matters?—Not always.

10350. In the case you have just mentioned of Liverpool I expect that gentleman will agitate his Board, if he is like most gentlemen in that position, and will keep on agitating individual members that it is a very miserably equipped place that he has to do these successful operations in, and he could do them much better in a nicer place, and eventually the guardians will bear the obliquity of having had it done?—I do not think the medical superintendent would do that in that case.

10351. In the last resort the medical officer does advise as to whether he wants certain equipment or not, does he not?—No, I should say not, there again, not always. I have known guardians make alterations without referring to their medical officer at all.

10352. Have you ever known them make alterations when the medical officer has asked them to make them?—I have known them refuse to make alterations when the medical officer has asked them to do so.

10353. Have you ever known them agree to make alterations which medical officers have asked them to make?—I think the reply to that is a very obvious one, that it is so in some cases.

10354. That the guardians do carry out the wishes of their officers and therefore have to incur the kind of odium that comes here, that they only do it for the purpose of spending money?—No, not at all.

Profession status of provincial District Medical Officers.

10355. (Mr. Nunn.) Did I understand you to say about the status of medical officers in the provinces, that they belong to the upper ranks of the medical profession?—No, I think I said that the visiting medical officers should belong.

10356. As a matter of fact, they do not?—In a number of instances they do not.

10357. The majority do not, do you think?—I should not like to say the majority.

10358. Is it more in the rural districts than the urban districts in the provinces that they belong to the lower ranks of the profession?—It applies more particularly in the rural districts.

Scope of Medical Inspector's power to report to Local Government Board.

10359. I suppose with regard to salaries, it would be within the province of the medical inspector to make a recommendation to the Local Government Board on the subject?—No, that does not come within my province at all.

10360. He could draw attention to it in his annual report?—We are not called on to make annual reports.

10361. You could make one if you liked?—Not unless requested to do so.

10362. Are you not permitted to make a report to the Local Government Board?—I should not like to say I am not permitted, but I should like to say I am not asked to do so.

10363. May I ask what the natural channel of communication between you and the Local Government Board is?—In what respect?

10364. Any remarks that you have to make about the institution that you are inspecting?—I rather hoped I had made that clear in my memorandum.

10365. I thought I was clear on that point?—I deal with it in paragraph 5.

10366. Do I understand that you do not feel at liberty to make a report to the Local Government Board, except on those points?—It would have to be in some very special emergency that I should depart from the routine practice.

10367. The only opportunity the Local Government Board has of learning your mind on the subject of your work is in connection with structural and sanitary irregularities and defects?—And as regards the personal condition of the inmates of sick wards of infirmaries and nurseries and schools.

10368. There is no regular channel for any observations you may have to make on the general trend of medical relief?—No, my report entirely depends on myself, there are no questions to answer at all.

10369. What I want to know is whether you feel at liberty to make such a report to the Local Government Board outside these matters mentioned in Section 5?—I should, if I considered any special case required it.

10370. Would not the matter of salaries of medical officers be a case requiring it?—I have no voice whatever in the question of salaries of medical officers.

10371. Upon the salaries, I suppose, depends, to a certain extent, the efficiency of the medical relief that is given? Surely that would come under your purview?—I think I am right in saying that that does not come within my province.

10372. (Mr. Booth.) Would what you said in paragraph 7 with reference to the past five years, refer to that: "During the past five years, however, the practice resolved itself into writing a report whenever my colleague and myself considered it desirable." What I want to ask is whether what you say in parargaph 7 is limited by what you put in paragraph 5, that no medical report is made, unless with regard to grave administrative, structural, or sanitary irregularities or defects, or does paragraph 7 widen the issue ?—Paragraph 7 is really the growth of feeling between the general inspectors and myself, that reports must be made on occasions, not special occasions.

10373. It does widen to some extent the limitations which are put in paragraph 5 ?—Yes. Paragraph 5 was really founded upon Mr. Ritchie's Minute.

10374. Are you dissatisfied with the present arrangements ? Do you think you are still too limited in your action as to reports ?—I think we are gradually growing, as it were, and becoming more liberal in what one has to do.

10375. The growth might go further with advantage ?—I think so.

ombination f office of Vorkhouse nd District ledical fficer.

10376. (Mr. Nunn.) Coming back to the District Medical Officers, is it a common thing at all for a man to hold the office of indoor medical officer combined with that of outdoor medical officer ?—That is very infrequently the case. The workhouse medical officer holds, as a rule, one of the district appointments. At Chichester, for instance, there is only one district, and the medical officer of the workhouse is also district medical officer.

ursing of utdoor aupers by Vorkhouse urses at hichester.

10377. Does that work well ?—I think in that particular area that works exceedingly well, for this reason, amongst others, that the nursing staff in the workhouse is what I call a very sufficient and a very efficient one, and that staff is also available for district nursing. The result is that at Chichester we get a vastly better nursing staff than we have in other workhouses of the same size.

10378. It is not at all common, is it, for the nurses to go out ?—That is really the only good example in the country.

10379. Is it unique ?—Other unions have tried it, but they have not carried it out to the same extent.

lethods and esults of ranting ledical elief.

10380. With regard to the recommendations of district medical officers, you say that is very often the beginning of a course of outdoor relief. Do you regard the recommendation of the outside medical officer to give medical comforts as a purely medical recommedation, and (if I may combine this question) do you find that the guardians take it as such, or that they act upon it as a semi-administrative recommendation ?—I think that the guardians, as a rule, are very careful before allowing an outdoor recommendation of that kind in reference to alcohol.

10381. I was not thinking only of alcohol, but of any other nourishment that might be considered necessary, quite apart from alcohol ?—I think they are very liberal.

10382. Do the guardians feel bound to give medical comforts outside upon the medical officers' recommendation, or do they regard it merely as a medical opinion upon which they have to form their own decision in accordance with the other circumstances of the case ?—My personal experience as an outdoor medical officer was that the guardians never refused medical relief "in kind," but they frequently refused medical relief in the shape of alcohol.

10383. So that practically it has the force of an administrative recommendation ?—Yes.

10384. That would be a strong ground for the discovery that it leads frequently to inadmissible outdoor relief, that the medical opinion of a district medical officer is taken as a binding recommendation that outdoor relief has to be given in the particular case ?—Yes. The guardians do not look upon the medical officer as being a suitable officer to say whether medical relief ought to be given or not. If a medical man protests against the fact that he has to attend a certain case, they do not regard that medical officer as being a fit person to judge whether he should attend or not, on account of destitution or otherwise.

10385. But suppose the medical officer says that certain things are necessary, do the guardians ever come to the opinion that the medical officers recommendation for certain comforts is to be refused and that indoor relief would be preferable ?—Yes, they do.

10386. That is frequently the case ?—Yes.

10387. They regard it, therefore, merely as a medical opinion ?—A medical recommendation ; but in many cases it does carry the force of an administrative recommendation.

10388–91. And that is where the danger lies ?—Yes.

Return as to phthisis in Workhouses.

10392. With regard to phthisis, you spoke of certain returns which are available as to phthisis throughout the provinces. Are they confined to Poor Law statistics, or were you referring to general statistics ?—They were confined to returns relating to cases treated in workhouses, the number of cases under treatment, and whether there was any special treatment as regards treatment in outdoor shelters or in wards specially set aside for the treatment of phthisis. (Returns handed in. See Appendix Vol. I. (A), No. XXI. (D–E)).

10393. That does not occur in the Annual Report of the Local Government Board, does it ?—No, it has not been referred to at all. The returns are based upon the General Inspectors' Reports made from time to time. You quite understand that the General Inspector does not report at periodical intervals upon particular workhouses. He may report on a workhouse in January, and probably the next report he may make would be in the June of the following year,so that those returns are not comparable, though they do furnish some criterion of the number of cases that there are under treatment at the workhouses.

10394. There is no periodical return ?—No.

Compulsory notification of phthisis.

10395. There is one—I do not know whether there are two now—but certainly one corporation which has succeeded in getting compulsory notification ; I think it is Sheffield. Have you remarked the returns there to see whether any of the improvement which you expect has actually come about ? Perhaps you do not know the case of Sheffield ?—I know Sheffield is one, but I think there are other places where notification is compulsory.

10396. I think there is one other corporation in the South of England which has a Bill, but it has not become law yet. I wondered whether you had been able to make any investigation in Sheffield on the operation of that ?—It is some years now since I inspected Sheffield workhouse infirmary.

10397. Are you acquainted with Dr. Newsholme's work at Brighton ?—I read his Annual Reports.

10398. He has been allowed to make use of a portion of the Fever Hospital for consumption patients ?—I do not know anything about the actual working of it. That is a Public Health matter which does not concern the Poor Law.

Open-air treatment and isolation of phthisis cases in Workhouse Infirmaries.

10399. I suppose the return will show us, at any rate, whether the open-air treatment is being attempted at workhouse infirmaries ?—Yes, it does.

10400. Do you regard it practically as a disinfecting process in favour of the other patients ?—I think that all cases of phthisis, more or less, according to the particular stage they may be in, are infective to other people, unless the proper precautions are taken, and those you cannot expect to be taken among the lower classes.

(Effect of Plenum system of heating on chest cases at Wakefield).

10401. It is more important to save other people from infection than to afford treatment to the individual. That is the primary object of having an open-air ward in the infirmary. It is quite possible to supply an infirmary with pure air, and, of course, it is comparatively easy that the patients shall have sufficient sunshine ?—No, I do not think so. From what I know of the Wakefield Union Infirmary, which is heated and ventilated on the Plenum system, the medical officer there is unable to treat his pneumonia cases in the ordinary sick wards.

10402. Why ?—He finds that they go under ; they die more frequently than they should do.

Dr. Andrew Fuller.

24 April 1906.

10403. To what does he ascribe that?—To the want of what we call fresh air.

10404. He considers that fresh air heated is not as good as fresh air cold?—It does not seem to have the right effect upon such chest cases.

10405. You are aware there are very great authorities against that opinion, I suppose?—Yes. I was only speaking of an institution which came within my knowledge. The medical officer of Wakefield Infirmary finds that he has greater success with cases of pneumonia where he can have the windows open than in wards where the Plenum system is in full use.

10406. In infirmary wards where an opportunity has been afforded of comparing the open-air with the other treatment, have you found the superintendents and the nurses generally are inclined to extend the open-air treatment to the other classes of patients?—Yes.

10407. It is better for the patients from a medical point of view?—Yes, and better for themselves, too. The nurses are in better health.

10408. Of course. Then with regard to compulsion, would you advocate the compulsory isolation of these cases in all cases where the relatives and friends are unable to give them sufficient isolation and care?—Most certainly.

Compulsory isolation and detention of phthisis cases

10409. Under the ordinary conditions that are carried out by municipal bodies in such as fever cases?—Yes, I think so.

10410. Would you extend the action of the Poor Law Amendment Act of 1867 by which certain classes suffering from infectious diseases could be detained in the workhouse, to phthisis?—I believe the Local Government Board hold that such cases can be detained.

10411. Really?—I believe the Bath case was the last one that came up for decision.

Proposed compulsory removal to Workhouse of certain classes.

10412. With regard to other persons in whose cases it seems distinctly insanitary or dangerous to other persons, or to themselves, that they should be left alone, infirm-old people, under what conditions would you suggest that the law might be altered to enable guardians compulsorily to admit them? Would you be in favour of such compulsory admittance?—I should. I will quote a very recent case which occurred at Bedford. The workhouse medical officer there made an entry in his Report Book to the effect that an old woman recently admitted was in the most filthily dirty condition he had ever seen any person in, and that she had large bed-sores, and he attributed the whole condition of the woman to the want of attention outside, and that he thought that under similar conditions the guardians ought to have power to remove such cases for treatment to the workhouse As a matter of fact, that case came in, and died within three days of admission.

10413. I did not mean under what regulation of the people, but under what administration regulations do you think it would be safe to entrust guardians with that power?—On the certificate of a medical man.

10414. On that alone, or would you have an Order of a Justice in addition to that?—No, I do not think I should go to that expense.

10415. Purely on the certificate of a medical man?—Yes, because a case can always take its discharge from a workhouse infirmary if it wishes.

10416. That was just such a case, I suppose, in which you would like to have an extension of the Act of 1867 for compulsory detention?—Yes.

10417. Under those circumstances, do not you think it is desirable that there should be an Order of a Justice?—If it is for compulsory detention in a workhouse after admission; but in the first place, I do not think an Order of a Justice is necessary.

10418. (Sir Samuel Provis.) Compulsory removal has no effect without compulsory detention, has it?—Yes, I think so, because, as soon as the case becomes well enough, if it ever becomes well enough, it might want to discharge itself.

10419. The same motive that induces a patient to remain outside would induce him or her to leave the infirmary the first moment he or she could get out of bed?—No, I do not think so at all. My experience is that when these people are brought in or persuaded to come into the workhouse, their only regret is that they did not come in before.

Nationalization of indoor-relief.

14020. (Mr. Nunn.) At the end of your Memorandum you just touch upon the most interesting question of the nationalisation of infirmaries and hospitals. I do not know whether you intend us to go further into that. Is it part of your suggestion or apprehension that hospitals and workhouse infirmaries should all be treated on the same lines by some central body?—No; a personal impression in the first place which has never been officially enunciated, is, that indoor relief should be a national charge with a central control as regards expenditure.

10421. But with the intention that Poor Law relief in an infirmary should not be any less eligible than relief in a hospital?—I do not know that I carried it quite as far as that.

10422. You do not mean that?—I do not carry it so far as that. I have not done so yet.

Question of deterrence Medical Relief.

10423. Have you considered in what ways medical relief within the walls of an infirmary can be made less eligible than in a hospital. Loss of liberty hardly counts, does it, to people who are deprived of their freedom?—I think it would be more from an administrative point of view, and, of course, the disabilities, as regards a person who was in good health, of disenfranchisement.

10424. I was thinking now of the sick in infirmaries. It is difficult to see that their lot is any less eligible than the person who simply goes into a hospital. At present it is becoming less and less so?—From the strictly medical point of view, I do not think it should be any less eligible, and all reasonable expenditure for such cases is welcome in Poor Law.

10425. From the medical point of view, still, do you see any ways in which the condition of the pauper may be hedged in so as to make it less eligible?—I do not think you can make any restriction from a medical point of view. Our point of view is that you must do your best for the individual, no matter in what class they may live or what class they may come from.

10426. You think we shall have to accept the position that the workhouse infirmary is to be made just as eligible as an ordinary hospital?—As regards the medical and nursing attention.

10427. That is practically all, is not it? That means practically everything to the patient?—No, the cost of the equipment is very different, or may be made different without any hardship on the individual patient.

10428. You mean the comfort of the surroundings?—Yes.

10429. All that has an effect upon health, I suppose?—Yes, but I agree with my colleague, Dr. Downes, who has stated very fairly that the composition of the nursing staff has a very material effect upon the patient.

10430. Could you tell me any details or particulars in which a thoroughly good workhouse infirmary is less eligible than an ordinary hospital ward?—No, I do not think I could.

10431. You do not think it is?—No, not from a medical point of view.

10432. From any point of view. I do not see how you can have any other point of view when you have a patient in an infirmary ward?—I had not thought it out quite to the extreme that you put it, so that I cannot really say.

10433. The problem is an important one, of course, as bearing on the relation of pauperism and thrift?—Yes.

10434. If one gives working men no incentive to provide against sickness, in the form of these disabilities one is injuring a very great many, and it has a very important bearing on the character of the people at present. That is what I mean?—I quite agree, and that is one of my objections to making the Poor Law infirmaries take the place of the voluntary hospitals.

10435. You perceive that that is coming; you describe it as an evolution?—I believe that it is on the way, from what I have seen and heard in different parts of the country.

10436. You think that is coming, and you think there is no real method by which we can draw a distinction between the two?—Not from the medical point of view.

10437. (Mr. Bentham.) When a communication is sent to the Local Government Board from any Board of Guardians which involves a medical opinion, is that usually referred to you for your observation?—Usually.

10438. Not always?—Not always. What I mean by that is that sometimes I never see the plans for a workhouse infirmary till they are completed.

10439. Does no other medical man see the correspondence on behalf of the Board?—Not as far as I know.

10440. If it is with regard to a medical appointment, is that referred to you?—Not unless there is some special point in it that requires advice.

10441. Would the question of salary be considered a special point?—No.

10442. Many medical questions might be dealt with by the Board, then, without ever coming under your notice, or under the notice of any other medical man connected with the Local Government Board?—Certainly if they were considered to be questions of administration pure and simple.

10443. In paragraph 22 of your Memorandum, you refer to the Basingstoke Order as removing a difficulty in administration, where a superintendent nurse has control of the hospital. As I understand it, the Order limits the master and matron's duties with regard to visiting the hospital wards, and places that duty upon the superintendent nurse. Is not that very often acted upon in the absence of an Order?—Yes. The guardians have often to my knowledge given instructions to their master and matron not to visit, except some special occasion called for it, and in the majority of cases that works very well, and does not require any report being made to the Local Government Board.

10444. And no friction takes place in consequence?—No.

10445. Are there many workhouses of that kind?—I should not say that there are many; there are a fair number.

10446. (Mr. Gardiner.) Did I rightly understand you to say the Board of Guardians are empowered to instruct their master and matron to that effect?—No, but they do do so, and where the thing is working harmoniously you can quite understand it would be inadvisable for the General Inspector to take any action.

10447. (Mr. Bentham.) It is really inadvisable on the part of the master and matron to object to it when they know the Local Government Board would probably issue such an Order?—That has become an understood thing.

10448. So it is acted on now in the absence of an Order generally?—Yes.

10449. Would not the separation in administration of the infirmaries and the workhouses generally be more easily effected if the workhouse accounts were simpler?—I should like to see workhouse accounts made very much simpler. I think there is a great waste of book-keeping, particularly in relation to the medical administration.

10450. I suppose you know that many boards of guardians are anxiously awaiting an Order of the Local Government Board on that point, are they not?—One has heard that for some years past.

10451. At the present time it is almost impossible for guardians to keep separate books and to know exactly what their sick inmates cost as apart from the ordinary inmates of the workhouse, where there is no absolute and complete separation of administration?—It practically amounts to that.

10452. With an Order simplifying the methods of keeping accounts, that difficulty could be removed somewhat, could it not?—I think so. I think you would be able to see at a glance then the costs of the respective departments.

10453. With regard to paragraph 25 of your memorandum and the supply of drugs, you recommend that there should be a compulsory Regulation that guardians should supply all the drugs. Have you come to that conclusion because of any complaints on the part of guardians that the medical officers do not supply proper drugs?—No. I have come to that conclusion from my own observation in different workhouses where I have seen cases that I have thought ought to be under drug treatment of one kind or another, and those drugs happen to be expensive drugs, and they are not included in the agreement made with the medical officer to supply expensive drugs, and he has never taken sufficient interest to ask his guardians to supply those drugs.

10454. Is there not also a danger on the other hand of the medical officer experimenting with new and expensive drugs that he would not use on his own private patients, in the first place because of the expense, and in the second place because of the effect it might have?—No, I have sufficient faith in my colleagues that they would not do so.

10455. Is it not true that the most expensive drugs known are used in workhouse infirmaries at the present time?—In some of the larger infirmaries it is so, I think, without a doubt.

16456. That is, of course, entirely in the hands of the medical officer, is it not?—Yes.

10457. (Mr. Patten-MacDougall.) Does the medical officer's salary include the drugs in many cases?—Yes, in the majority of cases in England and Wales.

10458. (Mr. Bentham.) I ought to have made it clear in my question that I meant that when the drugs are found and paid for by the guardians the most expensive drugs are used?—I know several instances where that is so.

Insufficient salaries of District Medical Officers and proposed standard scale of salaries 10459. In paragraph 25, speaking on the salaries of medical officers, you attribute the miserable and inadequate salaries to their own want of cohesion as a working body of men?—Yes.

10460. What do you mean by that?—As an example, perhaps I had better state my own experience. I was a candidate for an outdoor medical officership, and a colleague of mine offered to do the work for nothing for one year if he was appointed, and afterwards at a much less salary than I asked for.

10461. That is not usual amongst medical men, is it, it is very rare?—I am afraid it is not so much so now as it used to be in days gone by.

10462. In paragraph 30 you speak of the standardisation of salaries of medical officers. What basis had you in your mind upon which they could be standardised?—The number of patients, calculated on a report for the past five or ten years, that a man would have to attend.

10463. That is outdoor medical officers?—Yes.

10464. Would the basis be founded on the number of patients they deal with, or the number of visits they pay?—On the number of patients they deal with, the same as a club salary is computed.

10465. Would not that be likely to lead in the direction of paying so much per head for them, if the salary were calculated upon that basis?—It might lead that way but I do not think that it would; because you would, of course, find at once there would be abuses of the payment per case.

10466. You think it would be a mistake if that were so?—I do.

10467. With regard to outdoor relief, would you also agree to the principle that the guardians ought to provide the drugs, or do you think the medical officer should provide them?—In large urban unions, I think the guardians should supply the drugs; in the rural unions, of course, that would be an impossibility.

10468. You do that purely in the interests of the patient?—I do.

Inadvisability of Out-Relief for phthisis cases

10469. In paragraph 38 you say no case of phthisis pulmonalis should be treated by outdoor medical relief. Do you think the guardians ought only to order indoor treatment in those cases?—No, I think that as the matter stands at present you cannot compel them to go in. It would all depend upon whether phthisis pulmonalis is to be a compulsory notification. What I meant by my paragraph 38 was that from the medical point of view it is impossible to treat properly, with out-door medical relief, a case of phthisis pulmonalis. The reasons are very obvious why you cannot.

Dr. Andrew Fuller.

24 April 1906.

10470. You would advise guardians to take all such cases inside ?—I should.

Separate wards for phthisis cases

10471. Following that, you would also advise guardians that it was their duty to provide special wards for those patients ?—Yes.

10472. In order to protect the other inmates of the establishment ?—Yes ; I think that the guardians, generally speaking, throughout the country are beginning to realise that there must be separate accommodation for the treatment of the indoor cases.

10473. And for hopeless cases you think that could be done practically in every workhouse infirmary by setting a ward apart for the purpose ?—It is already done in a great many cases.

10474. So that that difficulty is already met ?—It is. We have some plans now under consideration for an addition to a workhouse infirmary, a new block, where they are making special provision for such cases.

Question of disfranchisement upon Medical Relief.

10475. Has not your admission that cases of that kind should not be disfranchised led you into the position that all Poor Law sick cases should be under the same category. Have you thought that out ?—Personally, that always has been in my mind, but I have never thought it out to the extreme that the Poor Law ought to provide for those cases without disfranchisement.

10476. I mean the fact that you say that a case of that kind ought not to be disfranchised has led you into the position of thinking that no person who is treated inside through sickness ought to be disfranchised. You cannot draw the line really, can you ?—I would rather answer that question in this way, that it is a question which bristles with difficulties, and there are various sides from which to look at it.

10477. But in answering Mr. Lansbury's questions you have already committed yourself ?—Purely from a medical point of view, I said.

10478. It was not from a medical point of view the questions were put ?—I rather hoped I made it clear that my answers were to that effect.

10479. The question involved is whether we should any longer expect people to provide against their own sickness of any kind rather than depend upon the public to be provided for in all respects ?—I think that the case of phthisis and the case of a broken leg, if you look at it from an administrative point of view, are two different questions altogether. The case of phthisis is not going to be cured in six or eight weeks, and you can cure a broken leg, or a similar case, in that time.

10480. Now you are drawing a line which you did not draw before ?—That is from an administrative point of view.

10481. You have already admitted that you cannot draw the line between one case of sickness treated in a workhouse infirmary and another ?—From a medical point of view.

10482. The medical point of view is not in question at this moment, it is the social point of view as to whether a person should be deprived of his franchise if treated for one class of illness and not deprived of it if treated for another class of illness. I want you to show me where you would draw the line, if you can draw one ?—When I wrote these paragraphs in relation to phthisis cases, what was in my mind was that hitherto we have had very rarely what are called curable cases, or cases in the first stages of phthisis pulmonalis, under treatment by Poor Law medical officers, or in Poor Law medical institutions.

10483. (Mr. Nunn.) Did I not understand the distinction to be, as you stated it just now, that in phthisis you simply have to maintain a man under certain conditions for a year, or years, perhaps, and in the case of a man with a broken leg you simply have to cure him as quickly as possible, which may be done in a few weeks ?—That is a medical point of difference.

10484. (Mr. Bentham.) You think that a person who is treated in the interests of public health for a certain disease ought to have no disabilities any more than if he were suffering from any other infectious disease ? Is that the whole of your point ?—As I said before, the answer bristles with difficulties, and you have to approach it from so many different points of view that I do not see that I can give you a definite answer.

10485. You do not limit it to the line as I have just stated it ?—I should like to answer the question by a statement that because a person is suffering from scarlet fever, and he is treated in a public hospital, he should not necessarily be disfranchised for it.

10486. Therefore you think that a person suffering from phthisis, which is also an infectious disease, ought not to suffer any disability from it either. Is that what you mean ?—I have made that statement.

10487. For the same reason as a person suffering from fever ?—I have made that statement, that it is a question of public health and not Poor Law.

10488. You do not go beyond that ?—Certainly not.

10489. Cases which are treated under Poor Law and not in the interests of public health, but in the interests of the individual, should be as at present ?—I think that only the incurable cases of phthisis pulmonalis should be treated under the Poor Law, because they would never again be restored to the community at large.

Report of Department Committee on Workhouse Nursing : Minor Training Schools for Nurses.

10490. With regard to workhouse nursing in paragraph 63, you refer to the Nursing Committee's Report of 1902.* In that Report minor training schools are recommended. Do you approve of minor training schools ?—I approve of minor training schools in so far as by their establishment we should have a class of nurses provided who would stay a reasonable time as nurses in the smaller workhouses where now it is impossible to give any inducement whatever for a trained nurse, or a nurse who has had any training, to stay for any reasonable time.

10491. She would not be really a fully-trained nurse, only having been trained in a minor training school, not having the same facilities for training as in a higher or major training school, as it might be termed ; therefore it is a creation, is it not, of an inferior class of nurse ?—Not a creation ; I think it is simply an adoption from another country. That class of nurse has been found, from what Sir Henry Robinson said before the Departmental Committee, to work very well in Ireland, and, if you notice, the nurses I mentioned are called nurse attendants in my evidence-in-chief.

10492. That would mean that if country nurses are to start in workhouses of that grade, people who are sick in those workhouses would not get the same skilled treatment as those who are sick elsewhere ?—They would get very much better nursing treatment and skilled treatment under the conditions which are suggested in this Report of the Departmental Committee than they do at present.

10493. Then you agree with the Report of the Departmental Committee in that respect ?—I do absolutely.

Cottage Homes for Children.

10494. On page 4 you speak of the housing of Poor Law children over the age of three years. Really that does not come within your Department, does it ?—I have to inspect these cottage homes and such like grouped homes and scattered homes, occasionally from time to time.

10495. You express an opinion in these paragraphs with regard to the treatment of Poor Law children over three, which is clearly not a medical question ?—I think the treatment of children under three years of age is essentially a medical question.

10496. This is over three ?—It happens to be a question to which I have devoted a certain amount of attention, quite apart from my official position.

10497. In paragraph 64 you refer to some children who were boarded-out at a cottage home in another union within a short distance of a thickly populated area : these children were removed from a workhouse where you considered they were properly cared for, and that they could not be so well cared for at the cottage homes in the other union they were removed to ?—That is so.

10498. What were the cottage homes like ?—They were grouped homes.

* Cd. 1366-1902.

10499. Are we to understand in this particular case the grouped home treatment is not so good as the workhouse treatment was?—Not in that particular case.

10500. Does not the board recommend the removal of all children from workhouses, however small in number?—As a general recommendation and a general matter of policy.

10501. Was the fault here because of the cottage homes not being so well managed as they ought to be?—It was the fault of the person who was appointed; there, again, comes in the personal question.

10502. The personal appointment?—Yes, the man appointed.

10503. The management of the homes?—Exactly.

10504. We should not infer, I think, that that was the explanation from this paragraph just as it stands. In paragraph 66 you refer to large villa residences or boarding-houses, or so-called cottage homes; that is the only class of homes you are referring to again, the grouped cottage home, is it not?—Not always now, because some of the grouped cottage homes are much smaller than they used to be.

10505. It is with reference to cottage homes, grouped or scattered, generally, you are speaking? Do I take it you do not approve of that system of dealing with children?—No, except in individual cases. I agree with the general principle of the scattered or the grouped homes, either. To use a hackneyed expression: "What'ere is best administered is best."

10506. In paragraph 73 you refer to the Dietary Order with respect to children under three years of age. Where the workhouse medical officer has not fixed any diet for these children under three, which you give us to understand in this paragraph happens sometimes, how are they dieted?—Sometimes at the discretion of matron.
