CONSTITUTION AND BYE-LAWS

OF THE

AMERICAN ÆSCULAPIAN SOCIETY.

PREAMBLE.

THERE are few situations in life where men do not associate together to answer some one purpose. We find this propensity pervades all classes and dispositions. In the study of Medicine, so much to be learned, where not only every different disease exhibits new symptoms, but from the difference of temperaments, situation and circumstances, as well natural as contingent, the same disease in two persons can scarcely be recognised: where the field of experiment and discovery is so wide as to be far beyond the possession of individual exertion, association becomes not only a pleasure, but necessity. By this means we acquire others' ideas, reap the fruit of others labours, and in a short time range through a space of reading, rarely allotted to the perseverance of one.

In all bodies associated together for the purposes of improvement, it is necessary that there should be regularity, order, peace and concord among the members; that all business should be transacted with harmony and system. But when this is left to the volition of individuals, disorder and disorganization are apt to creep in, and destroy or counteract the beneficial intentions: To prevent which, it has been found necessary that they should be within themselves a regular organized body governed by a proper constitution and code of laws voluntarily enacted. To this system whoever subscribes his name becomes a member, and tacitly binds himself by the ties of honour to conduct in all respects as by them directed, as well as to defend them from violation and encroachment.

CONSTITUTION.
