PREFACE TO THE NEW EDITION.

IN assuming, with pardonable pride, the labor of revision of a work which has, for forty years, so signally enjoyed the confidence and favor of the profession, the Editor has endeavored to bring it thoroughly up to the requirements of the day, for — in the words of the Author, in his preface to the last edition — “it has been his ardent wish to make the work a satisfactory and desirable, if not indispensable, lexicon, in which the inquirer may search, without disappointment, for every term that has been legitimated in the nomenclature of the science.” The Author had already commenced the revision of the dictionary when prostrated by the prolonged illness which terminated his useful and valuable life, and the results of his labors will be found everywhere throughout the work.

The progress of medical science during the few years past has been so remarkable, and the amplification of the nomenclature so extensive, that another revision of the Medical Lexicon had become a work of absolute necessity. Probably during no previous interval has there been such an enrichment of the vocabulary by the introduction of new words, while many of the older ones have recently received new acceptations. Certainly in no former revision have the alterations and additions been so great as in this. The present edition includes more than six thousand subjects and terms not embraced in the last, and, although the capacity of the page has been enlarged, the volume has been increased by one hundred pages, so that it contains, in fact, additional matter equivalent to at least one hundred and sixty pages of the last edition. Particular care has been devoted to the derivation and accentuation of terms. With regard to the latter, indeed, the present edition may be considered a complete pronouncing dictionary of medical science. The typographical arrangement has also been modified in a manner which, it is hoped, will render reference more easy.

It was the privilege of the Editor on previous occasions to participate in the labors of the Author, and it has been his aim to carry out the plan on which the volume was based. He may, therefore, perhaps be allowed to express the hope that the work, which possesses for him a filial as well as an individual interest, will be found worthy a continuance of the position so long accorded to it as a standard authority.

RICHARD J. DUNGLISON.

PHILADELPHIA, December, 1873.

PREFACE TO THE SECOND EDITION.

THE present undertaking was suggested by the frequent complaints made by the Author's pupils, that they were unable to meet with information on numerous topics of professional inquiry, — especially of recent introduction, — in the medical dictionaries accessible to them.

It may, indeed, be correctly affirmed, that we have no dictionary of medical subjects and terms which can be looked upon as adapted to the state of the science. In proof of this, the Author need but remark that he has found occasion to add several thousand medical terms, which are not to be met with in the only medical lexicon at this time in circulation in the country.

The present edition will be found to contain many hundred more terms than the first, and to have experienced numerous additions and modifications.

The Author's object has not been to make the work a mere lexicon or dictionary of terms, but to afford, under each, a condensed view of its various medical relations, and thus to render the work an epitome of the existing condition of medical science. In its preparation he has freely availed himself of the English, French, and German works of the same nature, and has endeavored to add every subject and term of recent introduction which has fallen under his notice; yet, with all his care, it will doubtless be found that subjects have been omitted. The numerous additions, however, which he has made, and his strong desire to be useful, "by removing rubbish and clearing obstructions from the paths through which learning and genius press forward to conquest and glory," will, he trusts, extenuate these and other objections that might be urged against the work; especially when the toil which every compiler of a dictionary must endure is taken into consideration, — a toil which has been so forcibly depicted by the great English Lexicographer, as well as by the distinguished SCALIGER, in an epigram written after he had made an index to the "Inscriptions" of GRUTER:

"Si quem dura manet sententia Judicis olim,
Damnatum ærumnis suppliciisque caput;
Hunc neque fabрили lassent ergastula massæ
Nec rigidas vexent fossa metalla manus,
Lexica contexit; nam cætera quid moror? Omnes Pœnarum facies hic labor unus habet:"

thus freely rendered in French:

"Si quelqu'un a commis quelque crime odieux,
S'il a tué son père, ou blasphémé les Dieux,
Qu'il fasse un Lexicon: s'il est supplice au monde
Qui le punisse mieux, je veux que l'on me tonde."

EXPLANATION.

IF the simple synonymy of any term be desired, a mere reference to the term may be sufficient; but if further information, as to meaning or accentuation, be needed, it may be obtained under the term referred to. For instance, under Cimicifuga, reference is made to Actæa racemosa, as a synonym. This may be sufficient for the inquirer; but should he desire to know the accentuation and properties of the plant, he must turn to Actæa racemosa. In the same manner, the French word Tronc is defined Trunk. This may be sufficient: should it not, the requisite information may be found under Trunk. In terms of more words than one, the definition is generally given under the more significant word; but, if not, it will be found under the other. Respiratory Murmur, for example, is defined under Murmur; Shaking palsy, under Palsy; Musculus succingens, under Musculus; Ocular spectrum, under Spectrum.

When the orthography of the French term is the same as that of the English, or with the mere difference of an accented vowel in the former, the term is not always repeated.

To facilitate reference, a heavy type has been employed for all terms, except for synonyms and subordinate words, which are printed in small capitals, and French synonyms, which are distinguished by a bold-faced italic.

The double accent (''), as in Electric''ity, Transit''ion, &c., implies that the letter thus accented has a soft sound.

Under the subject of "Weights and Measures" will be found an explanation of the relative values of the quantities employed in the officinal formulæ of the United States and British Pharmacopœias. The Dublin, Edinburgh, and London Pharmacopœias, formulæ from which are frequently given, have no longer a separate existence, being blended with the British.

None of these regions has its limits well defined. Aberra'tion, Aberra'tio, (from ab and errare, 'to stray,' 'to wander from,') This word has several meanings. 1. The passage of a fluid of the living body into an order of vessels not destined for it. In this sense it is synonymous with the Error Loci of Boerhaave. 2. The flow of a fluid towards an organ different from that to which it is ordinarily directed; as in cases of vicarious hemorrhage. Aberrations of sense or judgment are certain errors in the perceptions, or certain derangements of the intellectual faculties. In optics it designates the dispersion of the rays of light in passing through a lens.

ABERRA'TION OF REFRANGIBIL'ITY, Chromat'ic aberration, Error of disper'sion, (F.) Aberration de Réfrangibilité, Chromatisme, exists, when, as in a common lens, the rays that pass near the circumference of the lens are decomposed, so that a colored image is observed. This aberration in the human eye is corrected by the iris, which does not permit the rays to fall near the circumference of the lens, and also by the crystalline lens itself, which, owing to its structure, serves the purposes of an achromatic glass.

ABERRA'TION OF SPHERIC'ITY, or Spherical Aberra'tion, takes place when the rays, as in a common lens, which pass through the centre of the lens, and those which pass near the circumference, are unequally refracted, so that they do not meet at a common focus. This aberration of sphericity in the human eye is corrected by the iris and lens. The defect arising from imperfect adjustment of the focus is known as distan'tial aberration.

The causes are referable either to the mother, and particularly to the uterus; or to the fœtus and its dependencies. The causes, in the mother, may be:—extreme nervous susceptibility, great debility, plethora, faulty conformation, &c.; and it is frequently induced immediately by intense mental emotion, violent exercise, &c. The causes seated in the fœtus are its death, rupture of the membranes, &c. It most frequently occurs between the 8th and 12th weeks of gestation. The symptoms of abortion are:—uterine hemorrhage with or without flakes of decidua, with intermitting pain. When abortion has once taken place, it is extremely apt to recur in subsequent pregnancies about the same period. Some writers have called abortion, when it occurs prior to three months, Effluxion. Absorp'tio, gen. Absorp'tio'nis, Absorption—a. Sanguinis, Hæmorrhophesis.

Absorp'tion, (same etymon as Absorbent), Ab'sorp'tio, Resorp'tio, Inhala'tio, Imbibit'io, Anar'rhophē, Anarroph'e'sis, Catapino'sis, Rhabde'sis, Catarrhophe'sis, Catar'rhophē. The function of absorbent vessels, by virtue of which they take up substances from without or within the body. Two great divisions have been made of this function.

1. External absorption, or the absorption of composition, which obtains, from without the organs, the materials intended for their composition; and, 2. Internal or decomposing absorption, or the absorption of decomposition, which takes up from the organs the materials that have to be replaced.

By external absorption is meant not only that which takes place at the external surface of the body, but also that of the mucous membranes of the digestive and respiratory passages. Hence, again, the division of external absorption into cutaneous—resorp'tio cutanea seu cutis, inhala'tio cutis,—intes'tinal or diges'tive, and pulmonary or respiratory.

Internal absorption is also subdivided into, 1. Molec'ular or interstit'ial, nu'tritive, organ'ic, or decompo'sing, which takes up from each organ the materials that constitute it, so that the decomposition is always in equilibrio with the deposition. 2. The absorption of recrementit'ial secreted fluids, such as the fluid of serous membranes, synovia, &c. As these are constantly exhaled on surfaces which have no external outlet, they would augment indefinitely if absorption did not remove them in the same proportion as that in which they are deposited. 3. The absorption of a part of the excrementit'ial secreted fluids, as they pass over the excretory passages.

The great agents of external absorption are the veins and chyloferous vessels; of internal absorption, probably the lymphatics. In the chyloferous vessels and lymphatics the fluid is always found to possess the same general properties. In them, therefore, an action of elaboration or selection must have taken place. The veins, on the other hand, seem to exert no selection. Any fluid, possessing the necessary tenuity, passes through the coats of the vessel readily by imbibition, and proceeds along with the torrent of the circulation. Watery fluids in this manner enter the blood when they are taken into the stomach. Substances that require digestion, on the other hand, may pass through the chyloferous vessels and thoracic duct.

Its s. g. is 1.065, and it is very volatile. It is rubefacient and escharotic, and is used to destroy warts, &c.

ACIDUM ACETICUM, Acetic Acid,—sp. gr. 1.047 (Ph. U. S., 1873), and 1.044 (Ph. B., 1867),—results from the purification of the crude acetic acid, pyroligneous acid, obtained by the destructive distillation of wood. It is a colorless volatile liquid of a pungent smell and sharp taste. Its vapor is stimulating in syncope, headache, &c., and when the acid is diluted sufficiently, it is refrigerant and diaphoretic. It has been employed also as a local remedy in cancer.

By some, the terms are applied to Pyroxyl'ic Spirit. A limpid, colorless liquid, having a peculiarly penetrating and slightly empyreumatic odor. Its density in the liquid state is almost the same as that of alcohol, 0.7921. Its taste is disagreeable, and analogous to that of peppermint. It is miscible in all proportions with water, alcohol, and ether. It may be prepared by distilling a mixture of two parts of crystallized acetate of lead and one part of quicklime in a salt-glaze jar (gray-beard), the lower part of the jar being coated with fire-clay; and a bent glass tube, half an inch in diameter, adapted to the mouth by a cork, so as to form a distillatory apparatus. The jar is supported on the mouth of a small furnace, by which the lower part only is heated to redness, and the vapors are conducted into a Liebig's condenser. The product is repeatedly redistilled from quicklime, until its boiling point is constant at 132°. The term Acetone'mia has been applied to a morbid condition arising from the spontaneous development of acetone in the system.

It was brought forward as a remedy in phthisis, but evidently with unfounded pretensions. It is an excitant, and may be serviceable in chronic bronchitis. The dose is ten to forty drops three times a day, diluted with water.

ACID, GAL'LIC, Ac'idum Gall'icum, (F.) Acide Gallique. This acid, prepared from galls, is found in most of the astringent plants that contain tannic acid of the kind obtained from galls. It is in delicate, silky needles, usually somewhat yellowish, inodorous, and of a harsh, somewhat astringent taste. It dissolves in one hundred parts of cold and three parts of boiling water. It is very soluble in alcohol, and but slightly so in ether.

It has been highly extolled in internal hemorrhage, especially from the urinary organs and uterus. Dose, from ten to twenty grains.

The Pharmacopœia of the United States (1873) directs it to be made by exposing a thin paste of powdered galls and distilled water for a month, adding the water from time to time to preserve the consistence; expressing the paste; boiling the residue in distilled water; filtering through animal charcoal, and crystallizing.

The leaves are narcotic, sudorific, and 'deobstruent.' (?) They have been used in chronic rheumatism, scrofula, scirrhus, paralysis, amaurosis, &c. The active principle is called Aconit'ia, Aconit'na, Aconit'a, Aconit'ium, Aconitine, or Aconitin. It is made (Ph. U. S., 1873,) by exhausting powdered aconite root with alcohol by percolation, distilling off most of the alcohol, and treating the residue with diluted sulphuric acid. The solution of the sulphate thus formed is concentrated and washed with stronger ether, which removes all oily and resinous matters not already separated; the addition of stronger water of ammonia separating the alkaloid, which is dissolved out by repeated agitation with ether. The process is completed by mixing the ethereal solutions, and allowing them to evaporate spontaneously. It requires 150 parts of cold and 50 of boiling water to dissolve it, but is readily dissolved by alcohol and ether. It neutralizes the acids, and forms with them uncrystallizable salts. It has been used internally, and especially applied externally, in neuralgic cases, iatroleptically and endermically.

Another alkaloid has been found in the root, which so closely resembles narcotin as to lead to the belief that they are identical. It has been called Aconel'la and Aconell'ine.

The dose of aconite in powder is gr. i. to gr. ij., but it is generally given in extract or tincture.

Air, (αἶρ,) Ær, (aer, 'I breathe.') Pneu'ma, Com'mon Air, Atmospher'ic air, (F.) Air atmosphé-rique, is an invisible, transparent, inodorous, in-sipid, ponderable, compressible, and elastic fluid, which, under the form of the atmosphere, sur-rounds the earth to the height of 15 or 16 leagues.

Air is essentially composed of two gases, oxy-gen and nitrogen, in the proportion of about 20 of the former to 80 of the latter. Oxygen is the vital portion, but the nitrogen is necessary to dilute it. Air also contains a small portion of carbonic acid gas, and has always floating in it aqueous vapor, different terrestrial emanations, &c. Its effects upon the human body vary ac-cording to its greater or less density, temperature, moisture, &c. Change of air is found extremely serviceable in the prevention and cure of certain morbid conditions. See Climate, and Respiration.

Alchymy has also been called Scien'tia vel Philosoph'ia Hermet'ica, from an idea that Hermes or Mercury was its inventor. Harris has well defined this chimerical art: 'Ars sine arte, cujus principium est mentiri, medium laborare, et finis mendicare.'

An Arabic word, formerly used for an impalpable powder, and signifying 'very subtle, much divided.' A peculiar liquid, generated for the most part in vegetable juices and infusions by the vinous or alcoholic fermentation. At the present day it is applied to highly rectified spirit of wine—Spiritus rectificatus, or rectified spirit. In the Ph. U. S., Alcohol is rectified spirit of the specific gravity 0.835, corresponding with Spiritus Rectificatus, (Ph. B., 1867,) sp. gr. 838. The Dublin college had a spiritus fortior, used in the preparation of certain essences, whose specific gravity was 0.818, and the Pharmacopœia of the United States (1873) has an Alcohol fortius, stronger al'cohol, sp. gr. 0.817. Alcohol absolute of the British Pharmacopœia (1867), is of specific gravity 0.795. The French Codex (1866) has an Alcool, A. Rectifié, and A. a. 95° Centésimaux.

Diluted Alcohol, Alcohol dilutum, (Ph. U. S., 1873,) sp. gr. 941, corresponds with Spiritus Tenuior, (Ph. B., 1867,) sp. gr. 920.

Ethylic alcohol is a type of a series, the principal of which are methylic, amyllic, propylic, and butylic alcohols, only the two first-named being of any therapeutic interest.

Alcohol is an inflammable liquid, lighter than water, of a warm, acrid taste, colorless, transparent, and of a pungent, aromatic smell. It is the product of the distillation of vinous liquors; is miscible with water in all proportions, and is the direct solvent of resins, balsams, &c. Various other vegetable principles are soluble in it, and hence it is used, in different states of concentration, in the preparation of elixirs, tinctures, essences, &c.

Alcohol acts on the animal body as a powerful stimulus: as such, in a dilute form, it is used in the prevention and cure of disease. Its habitual and inordinate use is the cause of many serious affections, of a chronic character especially, as visceral obstructions, dropsy, &c. See Spiritus Rectificatus, *S. Any substance which, if introduced into the system, is capable of nourishing it and repairing its losses.

The study of aliments forms one of the most important branches of hygiene. Properly, all substances, organic or inorganic, that enter into the composition of organized beings, are aliments.

As regards the immediate principles which predominate in their composition, they have been classed, but imperfectly, as follows:

TABLE OF ALIMENTS.

1. Peculaceous .	{ Wheat, barley, oats, rye, rice, Indian corn, potato, sago, peas, beans, &c.
2. Mucilaginous .	{ Carrot, salsify, beet, turnip, asparagus, cabbage, lettuce, artichoke, melon, &c.
3. Saccharine .	{ Sugar, fig, date, raisin, apricot, &c.
4. Acidulous .	{ Orange, currant, gooseberry, cherry, peach, strawberry, raspberry, mulberry, prune, pear, apple, sorrel, &c.
5. Oleaginous and Fatty .	{ Cocoa, olive, sweet almond, nut, walnut, animal fat, oil, butter, &c.
6. Caseous .	{ Different kinds of milk, cheese.
7. Gelatinous .	{ Tendon, aponeurosis, true skin, cellular texture; very young animals.
8. Albuminous .	{ Brain, nerve, eggs, &c.
9. Fibrinous .	{ Flesh and blood.

Dr. Prout has four great classes—the aqueous, saccharine, oleaginous, and albuminous. Dr. Pereira, twelve—aqueous, mucilaginous or gummy, saccharine, amylaceous, lignous, pectinaceous, acidulous, alcoholic, oily or fatty, proteinaceous, gelatinous, and saline. Liebig divides them into two classes—the NITROGENIZED or PLASTIC ELEMENTS OF NUTRITION, flesh formers, in which he comprises vegetable fibrin, vegetable albumen, vegetable casein, flesh and blood; and the NON-NITROGENIZED or ELEMENTS OF RESPIRATION, or of CALORIFICATION, heat givers, in which he comprises fat, starch, gum, cane sugar, grape sugar, sugar of milk, pectin, bassorin, wine, beer, and spirits. The former alone, in his view, are inservient to the nutrition of organized tissue: the latter are burnt in respiration, and furnish heat.

The following simple arrangement is, perhaps, as little objectionable as any:

- | | |
|-------------------------------|---|
| 1. Nitrogenized Aliments, | { Fibrinous (Glutinous?)
Albuminous.
Caseinous, Gelatinous. |
| 2. Non-nitrogenized Aliments, | { Amylaceous.
Saccharine.
Oleaginous. |
| 3. Inorganic. | |

The second division might be still further simplified, inasmuch as amylaceous aliments are convertible into sugar during the digestive process; and from both oleaginous matter may be formed.

Aliments are at times divided into the substantive, and the adjective or accessory; the former comprising all the nutritive substances, which are used as food; the latter condiments. See Condiment.

A white, striated, crystalline mass; odor and taste pungent and ammoniacal; soluble in two parts of water; insoluble in alcohol; effloresces in the air. It is stimulant, antacid, diaphoretic, expectorant, and antispasmodic. Dose, gr. v. to xv.

Carbonate of ammonia is at times used to form effervescing draughts. One scruple saturates six fluidrachms of lemon juice, twenty-six grains of crystallized tartaric acid, and twenty-six grains of crystallized citric acid.

Carbonate of ammonia is the usual smell'ing salts. When a few drops of Aqua ammoniæ fortior are added to it coarsely powdered, and some volatile oil, it forms Pres'ton Salts.

A saline concrete, formed by the combination of muriatic acid with ammonia. In Egypt it is manufactured in large quantities by subliming the soot formed by burning camel's dung—26 pounds of the soot yielding 6 pounds. It is also prepared, in great quantities, by adding sulphuric acid to the volatile alkali obtained from soot, bones, &c., mixing this with common salt, and subliming.

Muriate of ammonia is inodorous, but has an acrid, pungent, bitterish, and urinous taste. Three parts of cold water dissolve one. Soluble also in 4.5 parts of alcohol. It is aperient, diuretic, tonic, and resolvent. Dose, gr. v. to xxx. Externally, it is employed, producing cold during its solution, in inflammations, &c. It is also inhaled in chronic catarrh.

While by some it is considered most powerfully excitant of vascular action, producing its characteristic effects directly upon the walls of the small arteries; by others it is said to be sedative, lessening reflex excitability and arterial blood-pressure, and arresting oxidation. It does not appear to be anæsthetic, consciousness being never destroyed by it. It must be inhaled in very small doses, only four or five drops at a time. Anæsthet'ic, Anæsthet'ic, Anæsthet'icus, Anæsthe'tus, (F.) Anesthésique. Relating to privation of feeling, as an "anæsthetic agent;" one that prevents feeling. The term is, now, almost restricted to agents which produce such effect by being received into the lungs in the form of vapors or gases, and passing with the blood to the nervous centres on which their action is exerted. Perhaps, as a general rule, the intellectual faculties first feel their influence,—a sort of intoxication supervening, with imperfect power of regulating the movements; the sensory ganglia become afterwards or simultaneously affected, sensation and motion are suspended, and ultimately, if the quantity inhaled be sufficient, the medulla oblongata has its actions suspended or destroyed, respiration ceases, and death is the consequence. Different agents have been used as anæsthetics by way of inhalation—sulphuric ether, acetic ether, chloroform, chloric ether, nitrous oxide, compound ether, chlorohydric and nitric ethers, bisulphuret of carbon, bichloride of methylen, chloride of olefiant gas, benzin, aldehyde, light coal-tar naphtha, amylen, &c. Anæsthetics are greatly used in serious surgical operations, and during parturition; and in such cases, as well as in many diseases, especially of a painful nature, produce the most beneficial results. The ethers, rhigolene and other agents, when applied to a part in the form of spray, by their evaporation benumb it; and thus act as local anæsthetics.

Anat'omy, (ανατομή,) Anat'omë, Anatom'ia, Anathom'ia, Prosec'tio, (from ana, and τμήναι, 'to cut,') (F.) Anatomic. The word Anatomy properly signifies dissection; but it has been appropriated to the study and knowledge of the number, shape, situation, structure, and connection—in a word, of all the apparent properties—of organized bodies. Anatomy is the science of organization. Some have given the term a still more extended acceptance, applying it to every mechanical decomposition, even of inorganic bodies. Thus Crystallography has been termed the Anatomy of crystallized minerals. Anatomy has also been called Morphology, Somatology, Somatot'omy, Organology, &c. It assumes different names, according as the study is confined to one organized being, or to a species or class of beings. Thus, Androt'omy, or Anthropot'omy, or Anthro- pog'raphy, or Anthroposomatology, is the Anatomy of Man; Zoö'tomy, that of the other species of the animal kingdom; and Vet'inary Anat'omy, is the anatomy of domestic animals; but when the word is used abstractly, it means Human Anatomy, and particularly the study of the organs in a physiological or healthy state. The anatomy of fetal development has been called by the French Anatomie du Fœtus, A. d'Évolution, A. des Ages. Physiolog'ical Anatomy is occasionally used to signify the kind of anatomy which investigates structure with a special view to function. The Anatomy of the diseased human body is called Patholog'ical or Morbid Anatomy, and when applied to Medical Jurisprudence, Forensic Anatomy. Several of the organs possessing a similarity of structure, and being formed of the same tissues, they have been grouped into Systems or Genera of Organs; and the study of, or acquaintance with, such systems, has been called Gen'eral Anat'omy, Histol'ogy, or Morphol'ogy, whilst the study of each organ in particular has been termed Descriptive or Spec'ial Anatomy, Anthropomorphol'ogy. Histol'ogy is, however, more frequently applied to the Anatomy of the Tissues, which is called, also, Textural and Microscop'ic Anatomy, Micranatom'ia. See Histology. Descriptive Anatomy has been divided into Skel-etol'ogy, which comprises Osteol'ogy and Syndes-mol'ogy; and Sarc'ology, which is subdivided into Myol'ogy, Neurol'ogy, Angiol'ogy, Adenol'ogy, Splanchnol'ogy, and Dermol'ogy. Surg'ical Anat'omy, Medico-chirurgical Anat'omy, Topo-graph'ical Anat'omy, Re'gional Anat'omy, (F.) Anatomie Chirurgicale, A. des Régions, A. Topo-graphique, is the particular and relative study of the bones, muscles, nerves, vessels, &c., with which it is indispensable to be acquainted before performing operations. Compar'ative or Analog'ical Anatomy is the comparative study of each organ, with a view to an acquaintance with the modifications of its structure in different animals, or in the different classes of animals; whilst Homolog'ical Anatomy examines the relations to each other of the different parts of the same individual. Transcendent'al or Philosoph'ical Anat-omy inquires into the mode, plan, or model upon which the animal frame or organs are formed; Artific'ial Anat'omy is the art of modelling and representing, in wax or other substance, the different organs or different parts of the human body in the sound or diseased state; and Elast'ic Anat'omy, (F.) Anatomie Elastique, (κλω, 'I break,') in the language of Auzous, is the formation of models in such sort that they can be broken or separated into pieces. Phytol'ogy and Phytanatomy is the anatomy of vegetables, and Pictorial Anatomy, anatomy artistically illustrated.

I. When the blood, which forms the tumor, is enclosed within the dilated coats of the artery. This is the true Aneurism, Aneurysma verum, Hernia Arterialis, (F.) Anévrysme vrai.

II. When the blood has escaped from the opened artery, it is called spurious or false Aneurism, Aneurysma spurium, Ruptura Arterialis, Arteriorrhæxis, Arteriodialysis, Ecchymoma arteriosum, (F.) Anévrysme faux. The latter is divided into three varieties:—1. Diffused False Aneurism, (F.) Anévrysme faux primitif, diffus, noncirconscrit ou par infiltration, which occurs immediately after the division or rupture of an artery, and consists of an extravasation of blood into the areolar texture of the part. 2. Circumscribed False Aneurism, (F.) Anévrysme faux consécutif, circonscrit ou par épanchement, enkysté ou sacculaire, Tumeur hémorrhagiale circonscrite, in which the blood issues from the vessel some time after the receipt of the wound, and forms itself a sac in the neighboring areolar tissue. 3. Aneurism by Anastomosis, Varicose, Racemose or Cirroid Aneurism, Arterio-venous Aneurism, Phlebarteriodialysis, Aneurysma veno-arteriosum, A. varicosum seu racemosum seu cirroides, Angioma arteriale racemosum, (F.) Anévrysme par anastomose ou variqueux, A. par érosion, A. de Pott, A. des plus petites artères, which may arise from the simultaneous wounding of an artery and a vein;—the arterial blood passing into the vein, and producing a varicose state of it, or by an increase of arterial tissue and a dilatation and elongation of arteries. The term Cirroid is employed when the trunks of the larger vessels are involved, and Aneurism by Anastomosis when the smaller vessels and capillaries are affected.

III. Mixed Aneurism, (F.) Anévrysme mixte, is that which arises from the dilatation of one or two of the coats, with division or rupture of the other. Some authors have made two varieties of this:—1. Mixed external Aneurism, where the internal and middle coats are ruptured, and the areolar is dilated. 2. Mixed internal Aneurism, in which the internal coat is dilated, and protrudes, like a hernial sac, through the ruptured middle and outer coats. This variety has been called Aneurysma herniam arterie sistens.

A sacciform or sacculated aneurism, aneurysma sacculatum, consists of a distinct sac or bag, having a comparatively narrow channel of communication with the artery. A fusiform, cylindroid, or tubular aneurism, aneurysma fusiforme, is one formed by a dilatation of all the coats of the vessel and an elongation of the affected part of the artery.

Aneurisms have been termed traumatic, aneurysma ex vulnere, or exogenous, and spontaneous, according as they may have been caused by a wound, or have originated spontaneously. The latter, when originating from lesions of the inner coats of arteries, have been termed endogenous.

Aneurisms have also been divided into internal and external. The internal aneurisms are situated in the great splanchnic cavities, and occur in the heart and great vessels of the chest, abdomen, &c. Their diagnosis is difficult, and they are often inaccessible to surgical treatment. The external aneurisms are situated at the exterior of the head, neck, and limbs, and are distinctly pulsatory.

Aneurisms may be caused by earthy and atheromatous degenerations of the artery, embolism, external injury, &c., a predisposition being established by age, occupation, &c. Sometimes quite a number of arteries are affected, constituting an aneurismal diathesis.

Aneurisms, especially the internal, may be combated by rest, and a debilitating treatment, on the plan of Valsalva, which consists in repeated blood-letting, with food enough merely to support life. The local treatment of aneurism consists in the use of digital or mechanical compression, ligation of the artery, manipulation, injection of the sac, &c.

AN'EURISM BY ANASTOMO'SIS, see Aneurism—a. of Bone, Osteoaneurism—a. Brador's operation for, see Brador—a. Cirroid, see Aneurism—a. Cylindroid, see Aneurism.

AN'EURISM, DISSECT'ING, Aneurysma dissecans, is one in which, owing to rupture of the inner and middle coats of an artery, the blood makes itself a channel between these coats and the outer coat.

In many cases, the lesion appears to consist in a separation of the laminae of the middle coat, between which the blood forms itself a channel. It occurs in old persons, more particularly in women.

AN'EURISM OF THE HEART, Cardionchus, Cardiourysma, Cardianeurysma, (F.) Anévrysme du cœur, has been divided into active and passive. The former can scarcely be esteemed aneurisms, as they most commonly consist of increased thickness of the parietes of the heart, which diminishes its cavity instead of increasing it. The term Hypertrophy of the heart better indicates their character. Passive aneurism, Cardiectasis, on the contrary, is attended with extenuation of the parietes of the organ, and enlargement of the cavities. The physical signs of dilatation of the heart are the following:—The action of the heart is not visible, and no impulse is conveyed to the hand. On percussion, there is a loss of resonance over a larger surface than usual, but the dulness is much less intense than that which accompanies hypertrophy. On auscultation, the action of the heart is only slightly felt, and communicates at once the impression of its diminished power. The impulse is feebler than usual. Both sounds are widely transmitted over the thorax, and are not much fainter at a distance from their point of origin.

Partial or true aneurism of the heart—Cardiectasis partialis, Aneurysma consecutivum cordis—is sometimes seen; rarely, however.

The name Aneurism of the Valves of the Heart has been given to pouch-like projections of the valves into the auricles.

It is an affection of great danger, and is often connected with ossification, or other morbid condition of the heart. It appears to be neuropathic, and has been termed Neural'gia of the Heart. Some, however, employ this last term for an acutely painful intermittent affection of the heart, which seems to differ from angina pectoris more in regard to the small number of parts which are drawn into morbid consent with the affected cardiac nerves, than in regard either to its nature or appropriate treatment. The most powerful stimulating and narcotic antispasmodics are required during the paroxysm.

Angiot'omy, Angiotomy.

Angle, Angulus, (αγκυλος, 'a hook,') The space between two lines which meet in a point.

AN'GLE, FA'CIAL, pointed out by Camper, is formed by the union of two lines, one of which is drawn from the most prominent part of the forehead to the alveolar edge of the upper jaw, opposite the incisor teeth — the facial line — and the other from the meatus auditorius externus to the same point of the jaw. According to the size of the angle it has been attempted to appreciate the respective proportions of the cranium and face, and, to a certain extent, the degree of intelligence of individuals and of animals. In the white varieties of the species, this angle is generally 80°; in the negro not more than 70°, and sometimes only 65°. As we descend the scale of animals, the angle becomes less and less; until, in fishes, it nearly or entirely disappears. Animals which have the snout long, and facial angle small, such as the snipe, crane, stork, &c., are proverbially foolish, at least they are so esteemed; while intelligence is ascribed to those in which the angle is more largely developed, as in the elephant and the owl. In these last animals, however, the large facial angle is caused by the size of the frontal sinuses: — so that this mode of appreciating the size of the brain is very inexact, and cannot be depended upon.

The following is a table of the angle in man and certain animals:

Man.....	from 68° to 88° and more.
Sapajou.....	65
Orang-Outang.....	56 to 58
Guenon.....	57

Coati.....	28
Pole-Cat.....	31
Pug-Dog.....	35
Mastiff.....	41
Hare.....	30
Ram.....	30
Horse.....	23

AN'GLE, OCCIP'ITAL, OF DAUBENTON, is formed by a line drawn from the posterior margin of the foramen magnum to the inferior margin of the orbit, and another drawn from the top of the head to the space between the occipital condyles. In man, these condyles, as well as the foramen magnum, are so situate, that a line drawn perpendicular to them would be a continuation of the spine; but in animals they are placed more or less obliquely; and the perpendicular is necessarily thrown farther forward, and the angle rendered more acute.

AN'GLE, OP'TIC, Angulus Opti'cus seu Visorius, (F.) Angle optique ou visuel, is the angle formed by two lines, which shave the extremities of an object, and meet at the centre of the pupil.

This formation seems to take place over the whole body, in the production of carbonic acid, and in other oxidizing processes, and to be connected with the changes in nutrition.

Externally, they are often used in fomentations.

The O'leum Anthem'idis possesses the aromatic, but not the bitter and tonic properties of the plant. Consequently, the 'Chamomile Drops,' as sold by the druggists, must be devoid of the latter qualities. They are made by adding Ol. anthem. f 3j. to Sp. vini rectif. Oj.

The Pellitory of the shops in Germany is said to be derived from Anacy'clus officina'rum; a plant cultivated in Thuringia for medicinal purposes.

The flowers of Pyr'ethrum carneum and P. roseum, which grow on the Caucasian mountain, form the Caucasian or Persian Insect powder, Gudrila, which is fatal to insects that infest the body of man and animals, bedding and sleeping apartments, first stupefying and then killing them.

An inflammation, essentially gangrenous, of the cellular membrane and skin, which may arise from an internal or external cause. The definition by Dr. Good is sufficiently distinctive. Tumor, common to the surface; flat; firm; burning; penetrant; livid and vesicular; or crusty above, with a sordid and gangrenous core below; imperfectly suppurative. It sometimes prevails epidemically; is often owing to a peculiar cachectic condition, and may be induced by the reception of an animal infection into the organism; when it has received the names Anthrax malignus, Cacanthrax, Anthraxion, Vesicula gangrenescens, Anthraxophlyctis, Pustula maligna, Malignant Vesicle, (F.) Pustule maligne, Bouton malin, Sang-de-rate, and is characterized at the outset by a vesication or bleb filled with a sero-sanguinolent fluid, under which a small induration is formed, surrounded by an areolar inflammation, which becomes gangrenous. It has been thought by some to be induced altogether by contact with the matter of the carbuncle of animals, or of the exuviae of the bodies of such as had died of the disease, but is now known to arise primarily in the human subject. This form of carbuncle has received different names, many of them from the places where it has prevailed: — Carbunculus contagiosus seu Gallicus seu Hungaricus seu Polonicus seu Septentrionalis, Persicus ignis, Morbis pustulosus Finnicus, Pustula gangrenosa seu livida Esthonica, Pemphigus Hungaricus, Puce de Bourgogne ou maligne, Feu Persique, Maléat de Languedoc. It arises from the left ventricle of the heart, about opposite to the fifth dorsal vertebra, passes upwards (ascending Aorta), forms the great arch or cross of the Aorta, and descends along the left of the spine (descending Aorta), until it reaches the middle of the fourth or fifth lumbar vertebra, where it bifurcates, to give origin to the common iliacs. Ap'oplexy, Apoplex'ia, (Sc.) Poplexy, (ἀποπληξία, from ἀποπληττειν, 'to strike with violence,') At the present day, the term apoplexy is employed by many writers to signify interstit'ial hæmorrhage, (F.) Hémorrhagie interstitielle, or every effusion of blood which occurs suddenly into the substance of an organ or tissue. Hence, we speak of cerebral apoplexy, pulmonary apoplexy, &c., &c. Formerly it was always—and still is by many—used in a restricted sense, to signify, in other words, the train of phenomena which characterize cerebral apoplexy.

Apoplexy and cerebral hemorrhage were formerly described as synonymous conditions, under the names, Cerebral Hæmorrhage, Sanguineous Apoplexy, Hæmorrhag'ia Cerebri, Aphro'nia, Cæ'rus Apoplex'ia, Co'ma Apoplex'ia, Apoplex'ia cerebri sanguinea seu cerebralis seu hæmorrhagica, Encephalorrhag'ia, Sanguinis ic'tus, Hæmatenceph'alum, Pulpez'ia, Sulera'tio, Apileps'ia, Mor'bus atton'itus, Gut'ta, Theoplegia, Theoplex'ia, (F.) Apoplexie, A. cérébrale, Hématœncephalie, Coup de sang, characterized by diminution, or loss of sensation and mental manifestation; by the cessation, more or less complete, of motion; and by a comatose state,—circulation and respiration continuing. It generally consisted in pressure upon the brain; either from turgescence of vessels, or from extravasation of blood: hence the terms Hæmatenceph'alus, Hémorrhagie cérébrale, and Hématœncephalorrhagie, applied to it by some. Cerebral apoplexy may occur, however, without any intracranial extravasation of blood, although there is usually some disease of the cerebral bloodvessels, and cerebral hemorrhage may not be attended with apoplecticiform phenomena. Apoplexy rather denotes a comatose condition resulting from pressure on the brain, from any cause within the cranium, which tends to produce cerebral congestion, such as the immoderate use of stimulants, degeneration of the nervous and vascular structures, valvular disease of the heart, &c. The term Congestive Apoplexy has been applied to those cases in which hyperæmia of the brain or its membranes is found after death.

The general prognosis is unfavorable, especially when it occurs after the age of 35. When Apoplexy is accompanied with a hard, full pulse, and flushed countenance, it is called Apoplex'ia sanguinea, Cataph'ora Co'ma; when with a feeble pulse and pale countenance, and evidences of serous effusion, Apoplex'ia serosa, A. pituitosa, Serous Ap'oplexy, Cataph'ora hydrocephal'ica, Encephaloch'ysis sen'ilis, Hydroceph'alus acut'us se'rum, Profusio Se'ri in Cerebro, (F.) Hydroœncephalorrhée of Piorry, Hydropisie cérébrale enraignée, Hydrorrhagie. Embolie Apoplexy, Apoplecticiform cerebral embolism, results from the plugging up of the cerebral vessels with embolia, an anemic condition of the brain thus resulting from insufficient blood supply.

In Nervous Apoplexy, Apoplex'ia nervosa seu spasmod'ica, A. simplex, Simple ap'oplexy, no lesion whatever may be perceptible on dissection; although the patient may have died under all the phenomena that are characteristic of apoplexy.

If the desire for food, occasioned by a real want, be carried to a certain extent, it is called hunger, when solid food is concerned; thirst, when

The chief additions made by them to medical science were in the departments of pharmacy and in the description of diseases. Celsus and Galen called thus the membrane of the vitreous humor,—the tu'nica hyaloïdea. The moderns use it now for one of the membranes of the brain, situate between the dura mater and pia mater. It is a serous membrane, and composed of two layers; the external being confounded, in the greater part of its extent, with the dura mater, and, like it, lining the interior of the cranium and spinal canal; the internal being extended over the brain, from which it is separated by the pia mater, without passing into the sinuosities between the convolutions, and penetrating into the interior of the brain by an opening at its posterior part under the corpus callosum. It forms a part of the investing sheath of the nerves, as they pass from the encephalic cavities. Its chief uses seem to be:—to envelop, and, in some measure, protect the brain, and to secrete a fluid for the purpose of keeping it in a state best adapted for the proper performance of its functions.

There are various areometers, as those of the Dutch, of Fahrenheit, Nicholson, &c. The Areometer is also called Hydrom'eter, (F.) Hydromètre, Aréomètre, Pèseli-queur.

ARGEN'TI NI'TRAS, A. azo'tas, Argentum Nitra-tum seu Nitricum, Sal argenti, Nitrate of Silver, (F.) Nitrate ou Azotate d'Argent. This prepa-ration is sometimes kept in crystals, the Nitras Argenti in crystal'los concre'tus, Nitrate d'Argent cristallisé of the Codex of Paris, Lu'na potab'ilis, Crystal'li Lu'næ, Argentum nitricum cristallisa-tum, Nitras argen'ti crystal'linus, Nitrum luna'rè, Hydrago'gum BOYLEI; generally, however, it is in the fused state, and it is this which is admitted into most Pharmacopœias, and which, besides the name Argenti Nitras, is called Argenti nitras fu'sus seu fusa (Ph. U. S., 1873) seu fusum, Caus'ticum luna'rè, Lapis inferna'lis, Argen'tum nitricum fu-sum, and Lunar caustic, (F.) Nitrate d'argent fondu, Pierre infernale. It may be prepared as follows: Take of silver, in small pieces, 3*ij*.; nitric acid, 3*iss*.; distilled water, q. s. Mix the acid with water f3*i*., and dissolve the silver in the mixture with a gentle heat; then increase the heat, and evaporate to dryness. Melt the dry mass, con-tinue the heat, stirring constantly with a glass rod until free nitric acid is entirely dissipated. Dissolve the salt, when cold, in distilled water, f3*vj*., let the insoluble matter subside, and decant the clear solution. Mix the residue with dis-tilled water, f3*i*., filter, add the filtrate to the decanted solution, evaporate, and set aside to crystallize. Drain the crystals until dry. The fused nitrate is made by melting the nitrate in a porcelain capsule, with heat cautiously continued, and pouring into moulds.

The virtues of nitrate of silver are tonic and escharotic. It is given in chorea, epilepsy, &c.; locally, it is used in various cases as an escharotic. Dose, gr. 1/4 to gr. 1/2 in pill, three times a day.

When silver is combined with iodine, it is said to have the same effect as the nitrate, and not to produce the slate color of the surface, macula ar-gentea, which is apt to follow the protracted use of the latter.

ARGEN'TI OX'IDUM, see Argentum.

Argen'tum, Ar'gyrus, (αργός, 'white,') Sil'ver, Lu'na, Di'a'na, (F.) Argent. A solid metal of a shining white appearance; insipid; inodorous; highly sonorous; malleable and ductile; somewhat hard; crystallizable in triangular pyramids; fusible a little above a red heat, and volatilizable; s. g. 10.4. Not used in medicine, unless in some places for silvering pills. Silver leaf, Argentum foliatum, is the state in which it is used for this purpose. Refined silver, Argentum repurgatum, is official in the Ph. Br., 1867, under the name Argentum Purificatum, (F.) Argent purifié.

The CHLO'RIDE, Argenti chlo'ridum, Argentum muriaticum seu chlora'tum seu sali'tum, Chlorure'tum Argenti, Chlor'uret or Mu'riate of Silver, (F.) Chlorure d'Argent; the CYAN'URET; the IODIDE, Argenti Iod'idum, Argentum Ioda'tum, Iodure'tum Argenti, Iod'uret of Silver, (F.) Iodure d'Argent; the OX'IDE, Argenti ox'idum, Argentum oxyda'tum, (F.) Oxide d'Argent, and the CHLO'RIDE of AMMO'NIA and SIL'VER, Argenti et Ammo'niæ chlo'ridum, Argentum muriaticum ammonia'tum, Chlorure'tum Argenti et Ammo'niæ, Chlo'ruet of Silver and Ammonia, Ammonio-chloride of Silver, (F.) Chlorure d'Argent et d'Ammoniaque, have been used in syphilis. At first these different preparations were administered intraleptically on the gums; the chloride, the cyanide, and the iodide in the dose of 1-12th of a grain; the chloride of silver and ammonia in the dose of 1-14th of a grain, and the oxide of silver, and divided silver, in the dose of 1-8th and 1-4th of a grain. M. Serre, of Montpellier, who made many trials with them, soon found that these doses were too small; he therefore raised that of the chloride to 1-10th, and of the iodide to 1-8th of a grain, without any inconvenience resulting. The dose of the other preparations was likewise increased in a similar ratio. M. Serre extols the preparations of silver — used internally as well as iatroleptically — as antisypilitics, but they are not to be depended upon.

The CYANIDE or CYAN'URET, Argenti Cyanure'tum seu Cyan'idum, Argentum cyanogena'tum, (F.) Cyanure d'argent, is thus directed to be prepared in the Pharmacopœia of the United States: Nitrate of Silver, dissolved in distilled water, is put into a tubulated glass receiver; Ferrocyanide of Potassium, dissolved in distilled water, is put into a tubulated retort, previously adapted to the receiver. Dilute Sulphuric Acid is added to the solution in the retort, and by means of a sand-bath and a moderate heat, distillation is carried on until the liquid that passes over no longer produces a precipitate in the receiver. The precipitate is then washed with distilled water, and dried.

Ox'ide of Sil'ver, Argenti Ox'idum, is made by precipitating a solution of the Nitrate of Silver by solution of Potassa, drying the precipitate. (Ph. U. S.)

AR'SENIC AND MER'cury, I'ODIDE OF, Hydri'odas Arsen'ici Io'didum, Double Iodide of Mercury and Ar'senic, Iodo-ar'senite of Mercury. A compound, which has been proposed as more efficacious than either the iodide of arsenic or the iodide of mercury. It is made by triturating 6.08 grains of arsenic; 14.82 grains of mercury, and 49 of iodine, with a fluidrachm of alcohol, until the mass has become dry, and from being deep brown has become pale red. Eight ounces of distilled water are poured on, and, after trituration for a few moments, the whole is transferred to a flask; half a drachm of hydriodic acid, prepared by the acidification of two grains of iodine, is added, and the mixture is boiled for a few moments. When the solution is cold, make the mixture up to f3viii. with distilled water. This is called by Mr. Donovan, the proposer, Liquor Arsen'ici et Hydri'odas Io'didi, each drachm of which, by measure, consists of water, 3j.; arsenious acid, gr. 1-8th; peroxide of mercury, gr. 1-4th; iodine, converted into hydriodic acid, gr. 3-4ths. It is this that is meant by the name arsenic, as commonly used.

Ar'tery, Arte'ria, (F.) Artère, (from ἀήρ, 'air,' and ῥημι, 'to preserve,' quasi, 'receptacle of air,' because the ancients believed that it contained air. They at first gave the name Artery to the trachea, ἀρτηρία τραχεία, because it is filled with air; and afterwards they used the same term and ἀγγεῖα πνευμα'tica, ἀγγεῖα πνευμα'tικα, for the arteries, properly so called, probably because they commonly found them empty in the dead body. We find, also, ἀλβες, to designate the arteries, called by the Latins Venæ mican'tes pulsat'iles.) Arteries, with the moderns, are the order of vessels, which arise from the two ventricles of the heart, and have valves only at their origin. They are cylindrical, firm, and elastic canals; of a yellowish-white color; little dilatable; easily lacerable. They have usually been described as formed of three coats: 1. An external laminated, or areolar membrane, Tu'nica exter'na seu adventi'tia seu cellula'ris, Vagi'na cellula'ris, of a dense and close character. 2. A middle coat, Tu'nica me'dia seu elas'tica, composed of fibres, which do not, however, contract on the application of the galvanic stimulus, formed chiefly of elastic tissue and also of smooth muscular fibres, and eminently elastic. 3. An inner coat, Tu'nica in'tima seu gla'bra, which is thin, diaphanous, reddish, and polished. More recent researches enumerate, from within outward, as many as six layers in the larger arteries: 1. An internal layer of pavement epithelium; 2. A layer of fibres forming a kind of basement or basiliary membrane, called the Fen'estrated or perforated mem'brane, (F.) Membrane fenêtrée, and Stri'ated coat, (F.) Tunique striée; 3. A layer of longitudinal lines, which, with 4. A layer of short transverse lines, alternating with each other, constitutes the middle coat; 5. A layer of yellow elastic tissue; and 6. A layer of white areolar tissue, with nuclei scattered among longitudinal fibres.

The use of the arteries is to carry the blood from the heart to the various parts of the system. It will be obvious, however, that they cannot all convey arterial blood. The pulmonary artery, for example, is destined to convey the venous blood to the lungs, there to be converted into arterial; whilst the pulmonary veins convey arterial blood back to the heart.

TABLE OF THE PRINCIPAL ARTERIES OF THE BODY.

All the arteries take their rise from the Pulmonary Artery, or the Aorta, and the names generally indicate the parts to which they are distributed.

I. ARTE'RIA PULMONA'LIS.

The Pulmonary Artery arises from the right ventricle, and soon divides into a right and left branch, one of which is distributed to each lung.

II. ARTE'RIA AOR'TA.

The Aorta arises from the left ventricle. It is the common trunk of the arteries of the body, and may be divided into five portions.

a. Arteries furnished by the Aorta at its origin.

1. A. Cardiaca or coronaria anterior.
2. A. Cardiaca or coronaria posterior.

b. Arteries furnished by the Aorta at its arch.

The arch of the Aorta gives off, to the left, two considerable trunks—the Arteria carotidea primitiva, and A. subclavia; and, to the right, a single trunk, which is larger—the A. innominata or brachiocephalica, which divides into the primitive carotid and subclavian.

I. ARTERIA CARO-TIDEA PRIMITIVA. (Divides into A. Carotidea externa, and A. Carotidea interna.)

ARTICULAR ARTERIES OF THE ARM, Circumflex arteries of the arm.

ARTICULAR ARTERIES OF THE KNEE arise from the popliteal artery, and surround the tibio-femoral articulation. Although of a small size, they are important, as they furnish blood to the lower extremity after the operation for popliteal aneurism. They are distinguished into superior and inferior. The superior articular arteries, popliteal articular arteries, are commonly three in number; one of which is internal, another external, and another middle, the az'ygous articular. The first, Ramus anastomot'icus magnus, anastomoses by one branch with the external circumflex, and by another with the external superior articular. The second anastomoses with the external circumflex, the superior internal articular, and the inferior external articular; and the third is distributed within the joint. The inferior articular arteries are two in number: an internal and an external. The former anastomoses with the internal superior articular and the external inferior articular. The latter anastomoses with the recurrent branch of the anterior tibial, and the external superior articular. To each articular artery there is an articular nerve.

Articulations are generally divided into Diarthroses or movable articulations, and Synarthroses or immovable.

The articulations are subject to a number of diseases, which are generally somewhat severe. These may be physical, as wounds, sprains, luxations, &c.; or they may be organic, as ankylosis, extraneous bodies, caries, rheumatism, gout, hyarthroses, arthropyosis, &c.

Asphaltum is now restricted chiefly to the BITU'MEN OF JUDÆ'A, B. Juda'icum, A. sol'idum, Jews' Pitch, Ca'rabè, Ka'rabè of Sodom, (F.) Asphalte, Bitume de Judée, Poix minérale scorifiée, Baume de momie ou des funérailles. It is solid, friable, vitreous, black, shining, inflammable, and of a fetid smell. An oil is obtained from it by distillation. It enters into the composition of certain ointments and plasters.

It is collected on the surface of the water of the Dead Sea or Lake Asphaltites, in Judæa.

Asphod'elus, (ασφodelος,) A. Ramo'sus seu Al'bua seu Ma'ris, Has'tula Re'gis, (F.) Lis asphodèle. The bulbs of this southern European plant have an acrimony which they lose in boiling water. They contain a fecula with which bread has been made, and have been considered diuretic. They have been used as a succedaneum for the squill.

Asphyc'tic, Asphyc'ticus, Asphyc'tus, (same etymon as Asphyxia.) Appertaining or relating to asphyxia.

Asphyc'tus, (ασφυκτος,) Asphyctic, Pulseless.

Asphyx'ia, (ασφύξια, from a, and σφύξις, 'pulse,') Defec'tus Pul'sūs, Acrotis'mus, Sidera'tio, Syder-a'tio, (F.) Anhématosie. For a long time, Asphyxia was confined to the sense of 'suspension of circulation or syncope;' Pulselessness. It now generally means suspend'ed anima'tion, produced by the nonconversion of the venous blood of the lungs into arterial, — Apnœ'a, Apnœu'tia, Apnœasphyx'ia, Anhémato'sia, Ec'lysis pneumocar-di'aca, (F.) Apnée, Anoxémie, Hypoxémie. Owing to the supply of air being cut off, the unchanged venous blood of the pulmonary artery passes into the minute radicles of the pulmonary veins, but their peculiar excitability requiring arterial blood to excite them, more or less stagnation takes place in the pulmonary capillaries, and death occurs chiefly from this cause, and from the want of arterial blood, and not owing to venous blood being distributed through the system, and 'poisoning' it, as was the idea of Bichat. Car'us asphyx'ia, Mors appa'rens, Mors putati'va, Pseudothan'atus, Appa'rent death, Death trance, (F.) Mort appa'rente, is characterized by suspension or diminution of respiration and circulation, to such a degree as to be scarcely, or not at all, perceptible.

Several varieties of Asphyxia have been designated.

1. ASPHYX'IA OF THE NEW-BORN, Asphyxia seu Apnœ'a neonato'rum, (F.) Asphyxie des nouveau-nés. This is often dependent upon the feeble condition of the infant, or on torpor of the medulla oblongata, not permitting respiration to be established.

2. ASPHYX'IA BY INHALA'TION OF GASES, some of which cause death by producing a spasmodic closure of the glottis; others by the want of oxygen.

3. ASPHYX'IA FROM MECHAN'ICAL CAUSES, as by Strangulation, or Hanging, or Suffocation.

4. ASPHYX'IA BY SUBMER'SION, A. by drown'ing, A. Immerso'rum, Angiairhydrie of Piorry, as occurs in the drowned, who perish in consequence of the medium in which they are plunged being unfit for respiration. See Submersion, and Suffocation.

5. ASPHYX'IA FROM TOR'POR OF THE MEDULL'A OBLONGA'TA.

6. ASPHYX'IA, CUTANE'OUS. A condition resulting when an animal, as a rabbit, is shaved, and the body coated over with varnish, impenetrable to water and gases, death occurring from asphyxia a few hours afterwards.

For modes of resuscitation, see Ready method of Marshall Hall, and Sylvester's method.

M. Chevalier has used the term Asphyx'ia Idiopath'ica, for fatal syncope owing to relaxation of the heart. See Suffocation.

Great difficulty of breathing, recurring at intervals, accompanied with a wheezing sound and sense of constriction in the chest; cough and expectoration. It is a chronic disease, and not curable with facility. There are no pathognomonic physical signs of it. In some cases the respiration is universally puerile during the attack. In the spasmodic form the respiratory murmur is very feeble or absent during the fit; and in all forms percussion elicits a clear pulmonary sound. The disease generally consists in some source of irritation, and occasionally, perhaps, in paralysis of the pneumogastric nerves, Bronchoparal'ysis, Paral'ysis ner'vi va'gi in par'te thorac'i'ca, more frequently of the former — all the phenomena indicating constriction of the smaller bronchial ramifications. The treatment is one that relieves spasmodic action — anæsthetics, narcotics, counter-irritants, change of air, &c.

A disease of infants, characterized by suspension of respiration at intervals; great difficulty of breathing, with crowing inspiration, especially on waking, swallowing, or crying; ending often in a fit of suffocation, with convulsions. These symptoms are often accompanied by rigidity of the fingers and toes; the thumb being frequently drawn forcibly into the palm of the clenched hand, whence the name Car'po-pe'dal spasm, applied to the disease.

The pathology of the disease has been supposed to consist in an enlargement of the thymus gland, or of the glands of the neck pressing on the pneumogastric nerves [?]. The ear, by auscultation, at a distance from the chest, detects an incomplete, acute, hissing inspiration, or rather cry; whilst the expiration and voice are croupal, both at the accession and termination of the paroxysm. The heart's action has been observed to be distinct and feeble. Dr. Marshall Hall attributed the affection to reflex spasm, resulting from some source of irritation, as teething, constipation, &c.

It is much used in chronic rheumatism, herpes, scrofulous diseases, &c. Season, from the first of June to the first of September.

Auditif, Auditory.

Audit'ion, (audire, audium, 'to hear,') Audit'io, Audit'us, A'coë, Acoë'sis, Acu'sis, Hearing, (F.) Ouïe. The act of hearing. The sensation arising from an impression made on the auditory nerves by the vibrations of the air, produced by a sonorous body. The physiology of Audition is obscure. It probably takes place:—1. By the vibrations being communicated from the membrana tympani along the chain of small bones to the membrane of the foramen ovale. 2. By means of the air in the cavity of the tympanum, the membrane of the foramen rotundum is agitated. 3. The transmission may be made by means of the bony parietes. In these three ways the vibrations produced by a sonorous body may reach the auditory nerve. Audition may be active or passive: hence the difference between listening and simply hearing.

Aud'itory, Audito'rius, Audit'vus, Acus'ticus, (F.) Auditif. That which relates to audition.

AUDITORY ARTERIES AND VEINS are vessels which enter the auditory canals, and are, like them, distinguished into internal and external. The external auditory artery, A. Tympanique—(Ch.), is given off by the styloid, a branch of the external carotid: the internal is a branch of the basilar artery, which accompanies the auditory nerve, and is distributed to it. The Auditory Veins empty into the internal and external jugulars.

AUDITORY CANAL', EXTER'NAL, Meatus auditorius externus, Porus acusticus externus, Alvearium, Sca'pha, Sca'phus, (F.) Conduit auditif externe, Conduit auriculaire, commences at the bottom of the concha, at the Fora'men auditivum externum, passes inwards, forwards, and a little downwards, and terminates at the membrana tympani. It is partly cartilaginous, partly osseous, and partly fibrous.

AUDITORY CANAL', INTER'NAL, Meatus auditorius internus, Porus seu Si'nus acusticus, Cy'ar, (F.) Conduit auditif interne, C. labyrinthique, is situated on the posterior surface of the pars petrosa of the temporal bone. From the Fora'men auditivum internum, where it commences, it passes forwards and outwards, and terminates by a kind of cul-de-sac, perforated by many holes, maculae cribro'sae, one of which is the orifice of the Aqueductus Fallopii; and the others communicate with the labyrinth.

AUDITORY NERVE, Nervus auditorius seu acusticus, Nerv. labyrinthique, (Ch.), is the Portio Mollis of the seventh pair. It arises from the corpus restiforme, from the floor of the fourth ventricle, and by means of white striae from the sides of the calamus scriptorius. As it leaves the encephalon, it forms a flattened cord, and proceeds with the facial nerve through the foramen auditivum internum, and as far as the bottom of the meatus, where it separates from the facial, and divides into two branches, one going to the cochlea, the coch'lear; the other to the vestibule and semicircular canals, the vestib'ular.

In Pathology, Aura means the sensation of a light vapor, which, in some diseases, appears to set out from the trunk or limbs, and to rise towards the head. This feeling has been found to precede attacks of epilepsy and hysteria, and hence it has been called Aur'a epileptica, and A. hysterica.

AURICLES OF THE HEART, Auric'ulae, A'tria, Cavita'tes innomina'tae, (F.) Oreillettes, are two cavities, one right the other left, each communicating with the ventricle of its side. These two cavities receive the blood from every part of the body. Into the right auricle the two venae cavæ and coronary vein open; into the left the four pulmonary veins. Chaussier calls the former the Si'nus of the Ve'næ Ca'væ, Si'nus dexter cor'dis; the latter the Si'nus of the Pul'monary Veins, Si'nus sinister cor'dis. AURICULAR ARTERIES AND VEINS, Otic'ulæ (Ch.), are divided into anterior and posterior. The anterior are of indeterminate number. They arise from the temporal artery, and are distributed to the meatus auditorius externus, and to the pavilion of the ear. The posterior auricular is given off by the external carotid, from which it separates in the substance of the parotid gland. When it reaches the inferior part of the pavilion of the ear, it bifurcates; one of its branches being distributed to the inner surface of the pavilion, the other passing over the mastoid process, and being distributed to the temporal and posterior auris muscles, &c. Before its bifurcation it gives off the stylo-mastoid artery. The Anterior and Posterior Auricular Veins open into the temporal and external jugular.

AURICULAR FIN'GER, (F.) Doigt auriculaire, is the little finger, so called because, owing to its size, it can be more readily introduced into the meatus auditorius.

AURICULAR NERVES are several. 1. The auricular branch, Zygomatico-auricular, is one of the ascending branches of the cervical plexus. It ramifies and spreads over the two surfaces of the pavilion. 2. The auricular or superficial temporal, Temporal-cutaneous (Ch.), is given off from the inferior maxillary. It ascends between the condyle of the jaw and the meatus auditorius externus, sends numerous filaments to the meatus and pavilion, and divides into two twigs, which accompany the branches of the temporal artery, and are distributed to the integuments of the head. There is also a posterior auricular furnished by the facial.

Bal'sam, (βάλσαμον.) Bal'samum, Bal'samus, Boleson, Bel'eson, (F.) Baume. This name is given to natural vegetable substances,—concrete or liquid, but very odorous, bitter, and piquant; composed of resin, benzoic acid, and sometimes of an essential oil,—which allow benzoic acid to be disengaged by the action of heat; readily dissolved in volatile oil, alcohol, and ether; and, when treated with alkalies, afford a soluble benzoate, and throw down resin. We know of five balsams—those of Peru, and Tolu, Benzoin, solid Styrax or Storax, and liquid Styrax. (See those different words.) There are, however, many pharmaceutical preparations and resinous substances, possessed of a balsamic smell, to which the name balsam has been given; but they differ essentially in composition and properties: hence the distinction of balsams into natural and artificial. The natural balsams include the five before mentioned: the artificial the remainder.

Band'age, Des'ma, Syndes'mus, Hypodes'mis, Hypodes'ma, Hypodes'mus, Hypod'esis, and Hypod'esis, (the last five signify properly "an under bandage"); A binder, (Sax. bindan, 'to bind.') This word, with the French, is generally used to express the methodical application of rollers, compresses, &c., Ban'daging, Syn'desis, to fix an apparatus upon any part,—corresponding to the words deliga'tio, fascia'tio, fascia'rum applica'tio, epid'esis. With us the noun is usually applied to the result of the application, or to the bandage itself;—a sense in which the French employ the word Bande. Bandages are simple or compound. The simple bandage is equal, if the turns are applied circularly above each other; unequal, if the turns are not accurately applied upon each other. If each turn of the bandage be only covered one-third, it forms the doloire of the French; if the edges touch only slightly, it is the moussé; if the turns are very oblique and separated, it is the spiral or creeping, (F.) rampant; if folded upon each other, it is termed the reversed, (F.) renversé. By uniting various kinds of bandaging, we have the compound; and these compound bandages have received various names expressive of their figure, or of the parts to which they are applied, as capistrum, spica, &c. Bandages are divided, also, as regards their uses, into uniting, dividing, retaining, expelling, compressing, &c.

BANDAGE OR ROLL'ER, Fas'cia, Tæ'nia, Epi-des'mus, Vin'culum, the Bande of the French. It may be made of linen, flannel, or other stuff capable of offering a certain resistance. The two extremities of a bandage are called tails, (F.) chefs, the rolled part is termed its head, (F.) globe, and the rest of the bandage is the body, (F.) plein. The outer or free end or tail is termed the initial extremity, (F.) chef initial. The inner, in the centre of the roller, is the terminal extremity, (F.) chef terminal. If rolled at both extremities, it is called a double-headed roller or bandage, (F.) Bande à deux globes, and the part between the globes is the body.

This is again fixed by means of the scapular bandage, which is nothing more than an ordinary bandage, stitched to the anterior and middle part of the napkin, passing over the clavicles and behind the head, to be attached to the back part of the napkin.

The regular use of the bath is extremely conducive to health; but if too much indulged in, it is apt to produce injurious effects.

Bath, Min'eral Wa'ters of, A'qua Batho'niae vel Bad'ize, A'que Sol'is, A'que Bad'iguse. Celebrated thermal springs at Bath, in England. They contain but little impregnation, and are chiefly indebted to their temperature, from 112° to 117° Fahrenheit, for their utility. The main ingredients are sulphate of lime, chloride of sodium, sulphate of soda, carbonate of lime, protoxide of iron, free carbonic acid and azote.

These waters are employed in the most heterogeneous cases, and are serviceable where the simple thermal springs are indicated, as in rheumatism, gout, neuralgia, certain cutaneous affections, paralysis, &c.

Bed'ford, Min'eral Wa'ters of. Bedford is a village, situate on the great Western Turnpike road from Philadelphia to Pittsburg, a few miles east of the chief elevation of the Alleghany Mountains. The "Springs" are about a mile and a half from the village. They are saline and sulphureous. The most celebrated — the "Min'eral Spring" or "An'derson's Spring" — contains carbonic acid, sulphate of magnesia, chlorides of sodium and calcium, and carbonate of iron, but none of these articles in great quantity; hence, the main action of the water is diuretic. At some distance from the Springs, there is a chalybeate water; and about 10 miles S.W. of Bedford, at Milliken's Cove, a strong sulphureous spring. The climate of Bedford Springs is agreeable. During the heat of summer, the nights are generally cool. In the morning of July 14, 1853, the author marked the thermometer, at five o'clock, A. M., at 45°. Three days before, however, it was 70° at the same hour.

It may be made as follows: Take two pounds and a half of lean beef: cut it, in small pieces, into three parts of water in an earthen pipkin: let this simmer, but never boil, until the liquor is consumed to a pint and a half: then strain carefully. It ought to be entirely free from fat or grease.

Es'sence of Beef, or Beef Juice — as it has been called — may be made by putting a pound of good beef, freed from fat, and cut into small pieces, into a porter bottle, corking lightly. The bottle must be put into boiling water, and kept there until the water has been boiling at least half an hour. As the boiling goes on, the cork may be inserted a little more tightly, to retain the contents of the bottle. The juices of the beef are thus separated, and constitute the 'essence,' which may be seasoned to the taste. It contains much nutriment.

This word is also said to be Hindustanee, and to mean a sheep.) Beriberi is an Indian disease, little known in Europe, Bad sick'ness of Ceylon. It has occurred of late years, however, in other countries, such as Brazil. It consists in debility and tremors of the limbs,—sometimes, indeed, of the whole body,—with painful numbness of the affected parts, &c.—the patient walking doubled, and imitating the movements of sheep (?). Some authors have esteemed it rheumatic; others, paralytic; others, to be a kind of chorea. It is a form of cachexia, in which there is great muscular debility and feebleness of the reparatory powers. It is, almost always, incurable; is frequently fatal; and is treated by exercise, stimulant friction, sudorifics, &c. It is sometimes called Bar'biers, although this is by many considered to be a different disease. See Barbiers.

The Aden or Ye'men Ul'cer is said to occur in conditions of the system like that in Beriberi. It affects the leg, assuming a disagreeable appearance, and frequently sloughing. The Cochin Chi'na Ul'cer closely resembles the Yemen.

It was believed that no poison, and no eruptive, pestilential, or putrid disease, could resist its influence. As so many virtues were ascribed to it, other animal concretions were substituted for it; and factitious Bezoards were made of crab's eyes and claws, bruised and mixed with musk, ambergris, &c.

It is distinguished into hepatic and cystic, according as it flows immediately into the duodenum from the liver or from the gall-bladder. It is estimated that 3½ lbs. of bile are ordinarily secreted in the 24 hours. It consists of water holding salts in solution, with coloring matters, fat, and mucus, the salts being especially those of soda, ammonia, and potash, in combination with glychoch'olic acid and tauroch'olic acid. Five different pigments have been described in the bile, Biliphæ'in, Cholophæ'in, Bilipyr'rhin or Cholepyr'rhin, (F.) Matière Jaune de la Bile; Bilirubin, Biliverdin, Bilifus'cin, and Biliprasin. (See Cholochrome.) The fatty matter chiefly consists of cholesterin or cholestrin, combined with fatty acids and various products of disintegration of tissue, as xanthin, leucin, tyrosin, and hypoanthin.

One use of the bile is to remove from the body superfluous hydrocarbon; and it is also inservient to useful purposes in digestion. Several tests for the presence of bile in the urine and other fluids have been proposed. See Urine, examination of.

B., 1867), is made by mixing one pint of fresh ox bile with two pints of rectified spirit in a bottle, setting aside for twelve hours until the sediment subsides; then decanting the clear solution and evaporating in a water-bath until it has the consistence of a vegetable extract. His Bistoury has an edge of not more than eight lines in length, situate about five lines from the point. 6. Blood, (Sax. blod, from bledan, 'to bleed,') Sanguis, Cru'or, La'pis animalis, Hæ'ma, (Old Eng.) Blede, (F.) Sang. An animal fluid formed chiefly from the chyle; acquiring important properties during respiration; entering every organ through the circulation; distributing the nutritive principles to every texture, and the source of every secretion. The blood is white in the molluscous and inferior animals, which have been, hence, called white-blooded, to distinguish them from the red-blooded, which class includes the mammalia, birds, reptiles, and fishes. Human blood is composed of water, albumen, fibrin, corpuscles, an animal coloring substance, fatty matters, serolin, and cholesterin—and different salts, as chlorides of potassium and sodium, phosphate of lime, subcarbonate of soda, lime, magnesia, oxide of iron, lactate of soda, &c., with extractive matter. Arterial blood is of a florid red color, strong smell; s. g. 1.049. Venous blood is of a brownish red; s. g. 1.051. The difference in color has given occasion to the first being called red blood; the latter, black. The former, which is distributed from the heart, is nearly the same through its whole extent: the latter is the remains of the arterial blood after the different elements have been taken from it in nutrition, with the addition of the products of absorption. Blood, taken from a vessel and left to itself, becomes solid, and separates into two distinct parts,—the serum or watery supernatant fluid; and the cru'or, coagulum, crassamentum, he'par seu placenta sanguinis, placenta cru'oris, insula, thrombus, or clot. The serum is chiefly water holding albumen in solution and the salts of the blood. The clot contains the fibrin, coloring matter—hematin, a little serum, and a small quantity of salts. M. Le Canu found the blood to be composed—in 1000 parts—of water, 785.590; albumen, 69.415; fibrin, 3.565; coloring matter, 119.626; crystallizable fatty matter, 4.300; oily matter, 2.270; extractive matter soluble in alcohol and water, 1.920; albumen combined with soda, 2.010; chlorides of sodium and potassium; alkaline phosphates, sulphates, and subcarbonates, 7.304; subcarbonate of lime and magnesia, phosphate of lime, magnesia and iron, peroxide of iron, 1.414; loss, 2.586. The four principal components of the blood are fibrin, albumen, corpuscles, and saline matter. In the circulating blood they are thus combined—

Fibrin, }
Albumen, } In solution forming Liquor Sanguinis; Salts, }

red and white Corpuscles, suspended in the Liquor Sanguinis.

In coagulated blood they are thus combined:

Fibrin, }
Red and white Corpuscles, } Forming the crassamentum or clot.
Albumen, } Remaining in solution, forming Salts, } serum.

The following table exhibits the computations of different physiologists regarding the weight of the circulating fluid—arterial and venous.

The estimates of Günther, Bock, and Blake are probably approximations to the truth.

The proportion of arterial blood to venous is about 4 to 9.

Much attention has been paid to the varying condition of the blood in disease. The average proportion of each of the organic elements in 1000 parts of healthy blood is as follows, according to Le Canu, and MM. Andral and Gavarret:—fibrin, 3; red corpuscles, 127; solid matter of the serum, 80; water, 790; but in inflammation the amount of fibrin may be increased to 10, and the albumen diminished, as it is in Bright's disease, &c.; and in fevers, &c., the fibrin diminished in quantity. Blood clots may become softened, and by breaking up become causes of obstruction in the vessels. (See Embolism, and Thrombosis.)

Dried human blood was, at one time, considered to be anti-epileptic; that of the goat, dried, San'guis hir'ci siccat'us, sudorific and antileptic. The dried blood of the ox—Extractum San'guinis Bovi'ni—and the dried red corpuscles have been given as analeptics, especially where there was a deficiency of red corpuscles.

Blood'letting, Mis'sio seu Detractio San'guinis, Hæmax'is, Cataschas'mus, Blood'ing, Bleed'ing, Let'ting blood, (F.) Saignée, Emission sanguine. A discharge of a certain quantity of blood produced by art: an operation which consists in making an opening into a vessel to draw or let blood from it. When practised on an artery, it is called Arteri'otomy; on a vein, Phlebot'omy, Venæsec'tio, Venæsec'tion, Breath'ing a vein, and on the capillary vessels, lo'cal or cap'illary, in contradistinction to the former, which is termed gen'eral. Bloodletting is used both during the existence of a disease, as in inflammation, and in the way of prophylaxis. It is employed to fulfil various indications. 1. To diminish the actual mass of blood;—when it is termed, by the French pathologists, Saignée évacuative. In such case, fluids ought not to be allowed too freely afterwards. 2. To diminish the turgescence in any particular organ — (F.) Saignée révulsive, Revul'sive bloodletting or bleeding, Venæsec'tio revulso'ria, when performed far from the part affected; and Saignée dérivative, when near. 3. To diminish the corpuscles of the blood, (F.) Saignée spoliative, Spo'liative Phlebot'omy. The immediate effects of bloodletting are: diminution of the mass of blood and of heat; retardation of the pulse, and sometimes syncope. Bloodletting from the veins — phlebotomy — is practised on the subcutaneous veins of the neck, the face, the forearm, and the leg; sometimes on those of the hand or foot. The necessary apparatus consists of a bandage or riband, a compress of rag, and a lancet or fleam.

The veins selected for the operation, are, 1. In the fold of the arm, five;—the cephalic, basilic, the two median, and the anterior cubital. 2. In the hand, the cephalic and salvatella. 3. In the foot, the great and little saphena. 4. In the neck, the external jugular. 5. In the forehead, the frontal. 6. In the mouth, the ranine. The operation of phlebotomy in the limbs is performed by tying a circular bandage round the limb, in order that the subcutaneous veins may become turgid by the course of the blood being obstructed; the bandage not being so tight, however, as to compress the arteries of the limb. A puncture is made into the vein, and the desired quantity allowed to flow. The ligature is now removed, and a compress and retaining bandage applied. Cap'illary or lo'cal bloodletting, arteriophlebot'omy, is practised on the skin or mucous membranes, by means of leeches, the lancet, or cupping.

Bodysearch'er, Search'er. One who formerly examined the bodies of the dead to report as to the cause of death. In the time of the plague this was done by "the surgeons," who were allowed "twelve pence," to be paid out of the goods of the party searched, if able; otherwise, by the parish. Until of late, this office was executed in England by two old women — called 'searchers'; and hence the imperfections of the Bills of Mortality. In plague times, the office was an important one; and, it is stated, that a noted searcher, named Snacks, finding his business increase so much that he could not transact it alone, offered to any one who would join him in its hazards, half the profits; and they who joined him were said to "go with Snacks." Hence the saying "to go Snacks," or to divide the spoils.

In Paris, each of the arrondissements has three or four vérificateurs de décès, who receive a fixed sum for each certificate of death. These certificates are laid before a committee of inspection. The coroner makes such inquiries in Great Britain and the United States.

The bones are the solid and hard parts, which form the basis of the bodies of animals of the superior classes; and the union of which constitutes the skeleton. The human body has, at the adult age, 240 bones, including the 32 teeth, the ossa Wormiana, and excluding sesamoid bones. Anatomists divide them, from their shape, into—1. Long bones, which form part of the limbs, and represent columns for supporting the weight of the body, or levers of different kinds for the muscles to act upon. 2. Flat bones, which form the parietes of splanchnic cavities; and, 3. Short bones, met with in parts of the body where solidity and some mobility are necessary. Bones are formed of two different textures; spong'y, Substan'tia spongio'sa; and compact, Substan'tia compac'ta. They afford, on analysis, much phosphate and carbonate of lime, a little phosphate of magnesia, phosphate of ammonia, oxide of iron and manganese, some traces of alumina and silica, gelatin, fat, and water. The uses of the bones are mentioned under each bone. They give shape to the body, contain and defend the viscera, and act as levers to the muscles.

The bones of the ox, Bos Tau'rus, are employed in pharmacy.

Bron'chia, pl. of bronchion, (βρογχια), Bron'chie, Bron'chi. The Latins used the term Bronchus for the whole of the trachea; whilst they called its ramifications Bronchia. Bronchia, Bronchie, and Bronchi, (F.) Bronches, now mean the two tubes, with their ramifications, which arise from the bifurcation of the trachea, and carry air into the lungs — Can'nula pulmo'num, Syrin'ges seu Can'a'les aëri'feri.

BRON'CHIA, DILATA'TION OF THE, Dilata'ted Bron'chia, Bronchee'tasis, Bronchie'tasis, Dilata'tio bronchio'rum. The physical signs of this condition are the following: Percussion usually clear, but not unfrequently less so than natural, although very seldom quite dull. Auscultation detects coarse mucous or gurgling rhonchi, increased by the cough, combined with, or replaced by, bronchial or cavernous respiration, which is often effected as if by a sudden puff or whiff. The resonance of the voice is increased, but it seldom amounts to perfect pectoriloquy. The most common situations for dilated bronchia are the scapular, mammary, and lateral regions. They are almost always confined to one side.

BRON'CHIA, OBLITERA'TION OR COMPRES'SION OF THE. The inspiratory murmur on auscultation is weaker or wholly suppressed over a limited portion of the chest; the expiration is generally more distinct and prolonged: all the other conditions are natural.

Their functions are unknown. The bronchial glands may be presumed to be affected by scrofulosis, when, in addition to the existence of tumors in the neck, percussion gives a dull sound under the upper and central part of the sternum, while there is no appreciable lesion of the lungs.

Inflammation of the lining membrane of the bronchial tubes. This is always more or less present in cases of pulmonary catarrh; and is accompanied by cough, mucous expectoration, dyspnoea, and more or less uneasiness in breathing. The acute form is accompanied with all the signs of internal inflammation, and requires the employment of antiphlogistics followed by revulsives. The chronic form, Tus'sis senil'is, Catar'rhus senil'is, Rheu'ma catarrha'lē, Peripneumo'nia no'tha, Bronchorrhœ'a acu'ta, Win'ter Cough, Chronic Catarrh', may be confounded with phthisis; from which it must be distinguished mainly by the absence of hectic fever and of the physical signs that are characteristic of the latter, as well as by the nature of the expectoration, which is generally mucous, although at times muco-purulent. When the expectoration is little or none, the bronchitis is said to be dry,—dry catarrh, (F.) Catarrhe sec; when fetid, the disease is termed fet'id bronchitis. Bronchitis is said also to be rheumatic, gouty, syphilitic, typhoid, &c., when occurring secondarily in such constitutional affections. Plastic bronchitis is characterized by the formation of solid or tubular concretions of exudation-matter within the bronchial tubes. See Polypus bronchialis.

This is no rupture, but consists of an enlargement of the thyroid gland. It is common at the base of lofty mountains in every part of the world; and has been supposed to be owing to the drinking of snow-water, but it occurs where there is no snow. The tumor is sometimes very extensive. Iodine has great power over it, and will generally occasion its absorption, when the case has not been of such duration as to have ended in a cartilaginous condition. Shakspeare describes the tumors as 'wallets of flesh.'—Gonzalo, in Tempest, Act III. Scene 3.

Several varieties of bronchocele have been described—the follicular, fi'brous, am'yloid, vascular, &c.

Cysts in the thyroid gland are globular, tense, fluctuating tumors, containing the glairy fluid of the gland, or serous or sanguineous fluid, or old grumous blood, constituting Cystic bronchocele.

A high degree of Bruit de soufflet, heard on auscultating the arteries or veins — probably the latter — of the neck, in chlorosis. It denotes an impoverished state of the blood.

Sounds produced by the rubbing of the lung against the parietes of the chest, as it rises and falls during inspiration and expiration. They are distinctly heard in pleuritis, when the pleura has become roughened by the disease. Friction sounds, Rubbing sounds, To-and-fro sounds, are also heard in pericarditis and peritonitis. They may also be produced in the situation of any of the organs contained in the abdominal cavity, or of any morbid growth developed there, independent of acute inflammation.

The bellows' sound heard on auscultating over the site of the placenta in a pregnant female. It does not appear to be owing to the placental vessels, but to the uterine tumor pressing upon the large vessels of the mother.

Bruit de Pot Fêlé, ('sound of a cracked vessel,') Cracked pot sound. A sound heard on percussion when a cavern in the lungs is filled with air, and has a narrow outlet. It is not diagnostic, however.

Bruit de Râpe, ('sound of a rasp.') A sound heard during the contraction of either the auricles or ventricles. It is constant; and the contraction of the cavity is more prolonged than natural, and emits a hard, rough, and—as it were—stifled sound.

It indicates contraction of the valvular orifices by cartilaginous deposits, or ossification, and is better heard near the apex of the heart, if the auriculo-ventricular valves are concerned — near the base, if the semilunar valves are the seat of the disease.

Bruit Respiratoire, Murmur, respiratory.

sound,') 'blowing sound,') Physeche'ma. A sound like that of a bellows, heard occasionally by the ear applied to the chest during the contraction of the ventricles, auricles, or large arteries. It coexists with affections of the heart, but is heard, also, without any disease of that organ — whenever, indeed, an artery is compressed. An Encephalic bellows' sound, (F.) Bruit de souffle céphalique, has been described by Drs. Fisher and Whitney. It is heard on applying the ear to the occiput or to the top of the head, and is considered to indicate turgescence of vessels, or inflammation. When such turgescence exists, the vessels are compressed, and the compression gives rise to the sound in question.

Bruit de Soupape, ('valvular or flapping sound,') A sound heard in respiration, when a foreign body is in the air passages. It somewhat resembles the flapping of a valve; hence its French name.

Bruit de Taffetas, ('sound of taffeta, sarcenet sound,') A respiratory sound, so named by M. Grisolle, from its resembling the sound caused by the tearing of a piece of taffeta; and which he considers to indicate hepatization of the lung, limited to the surface, in pneumonia.

Compound muciparous follicles, seated between the mucous and muscular coats of the stomach, along the two curvatures of that organ, and in the duodenum; so called from their discovery having been generally attributed to Brunner or Brunner. The solitary intestinal follicles are often known, at the present day, as the glands of Brunner, although Brunner restricted the latter term to the glands of the duodenum.

In the works of Hippocrates and Galen, βουβων sometimes signifies the groin — In'guen; at others, the inguinal glands; and at others, again, swelling or inflammation of these parts, Bubonadeni'tis. Ord. Umbelliferae. The plant which affords the Galbanum can scarcely, however, be considered to be determined. By the Dublin College, it was referred to Opoi'dia Galbanifera, Ord. Umbelliferae. Galbanum, Chal'banê, is a gummi-resinous juice. Its odor is fetid, and taste bitter and acrid: the agglutinated tears are of a white color, on a ground of reddish-brown. It forms an emulsion when triturated with water, and is soluble in proof spirits of wine, and vinegar: sp. gr. 1.212. It has been given as an antispasmodic and expectorant, in pill or emulsion. Dose, from gr. 10 to 60. Externally, it is applied as a cataplasm.

Bubon galbanum is a South African plant; and is reputed to be an excellent diuretic, under the name of Wild Cel'ery. A decoction of the leaves is given in dropsy and gravel. According to Pappe, the resinous matter, which exudes from the stem, differs in appearance, smell, and in every respect, from Gummi Galbanum.

The hypophosphites were highly recommended as a "specific" by Dr. J. F. Churchill, by furnishing phosphorus to the tissues. Dose, one to five grains in syrup. The Hypophosphites of soda, potassa, and ammonia, and of iron, quinia, and manganese, have likewise been used, and several of these are officinal, (Ph. U. S., 1873.) The hyposulphites closely resemble the sulphites in medical properties.

Towards the close of the effervescence apply a gentle heat, and, when the action has ceased, pour off the clear liquor and evaporate to dryness. Dissolve the residue in its weight and a half of distilled water, and filter. Dose, from gtt. xxx . to $\mathfrak{f}\mathfrak{z}\text{j}$, in a cupful of water.

Calcul, Calculus—c. Chatonné, see Calcul.

Calculeux, Calculous.

Cal'culi, pl. of Calculus, (dim. of calx, 'a stone') Lithi, Lap'ides, (F.) Calculs, Pierres. Calculi are concretions which may form in every part of the animal body, but are most frequently found in the organs that act as reservoirs, and in the excretory canals. They are met with in the tonsils, joints, biliary ducts, digestive passages, lachrymal ducts, mammae, pancreas, pineal gland, prostate, lungs, salivary, spermatic and urinary passages, and in the uterus. The causes which give rise to them are obscure.

Those that occur in reservoirs or ducts are supposed to be owing to the deposition of the substances which compose them from the fluid as it passes along the duct; and those which occur in the substance of an organ are regarded as the product of some nutritive irritation. Their general effect is to irritate, as extraneous bodies, the parts with which they are in contact; and to produce retention of the fluid, whence they have been formed. The symptoms differ, according to the sensibility of the organ and the importance of the particular secretion whose discharge they impede. Their solution is generally impracticable; spontaneous expulsion or extraction is the only way of getting rid of them.

CAL'CULI, AL'TERNATING, see Calculi, urinary—c. Alvine, Calculi of the stomach and intestines—c. Articular, see Calculi, arthritic, and Concretions, articular.

CAL'CULI, ARTHRIT'IC, To'phi, Tuber'cula arthrit'ica, Calculiarthrit'ici seu podag'rici, Chalk-stones, Gout-stones, Nodes, (F.) Pierres crayeuses, Calculs arthritiques, Nœuds. Concretions, which form in the ligaments, and within the capsules of the joints, in persons affected with gout. They are composed of uric acid, soda, and a little animal matter; very rarely, urate of lime and chloride of sodium are met with. Similar calculi are found in other parts besides the joints.

CAL'CULI, BIL'IARY, Calculi bilio'si seu fel'lei seu bilia'rii, Cholol'ithus, Cholel'ithus, Bil'iary

Concre'tions, Gall-stones, (F.) Calculs biliaires, Pierres au fiel, Angichololithe of Piorry. Some of these contain all the materials of the bile, and seem to be nothing more than that secretion thickened. The greater part are composed of from 88 to 94 parts of Cholesterin, and of from 6 to 12 of the yellow matter of the bile. Biliary calculi are most frequently found in the gall-bladder: at other times, in the substance of the liver, in the branches of the Ductus hepaticus, or in the Ductus Communis Choled'ochus. The first are called Cyst'ic; the second Hepatic; and the last, sometimes, Hepato'cystic. The causes which give rise to them are very obscure. When quiescent they often occasion no uneasiness. At times, they are rejected by the mouth, or by the bowels, along with a considerable quantity of bile, which had accumulated behind them; at other times they occasion violent abdominal inflammation, abscesses, and biliary fistulae, rupture of the gall-bladder, and fatal effusion into the peritoneum. The passage of a gall-stone is extremely painful; yet the pulse is not at first affected. Antiphlogistics, when there is inflammatory action, and anaesthetics, and strong doses of opium, to allay the pain and spasm, with the warm bath, are the chief remedies. Solvents are not to be depended upon; they cannot reach the calculi.

CAL'CULI, BLOOD, see Pseudocalculi—c. Bone-earth, see Calculi, urinary—c. Compound, see Calculi, urinary—c. Cystic, see Calculi, urinary.

CAL'CULI OF THE EARS, (F.) Calculs de l'Oreille. Hard, light, and inflammable concretions, which occur in the meatus auditorius externus, and are merely indurated cerumen. They are a frequent cause of deafness. They can be easily seen, and may be extracted by appropriate forceps, after having been softened by injections of soap and water.

CAL'CULI FEL'LEI, Calculi, biliary—c. Fusible, see Calculi, urinary—c. of the Intestines, Calculi of the stomach and intestines.

CAL'CULI, LACH'RYMAL, (F.) Calculs lacrymaux. Concretions sometimes, but rarely, form in the lachrymal passages, where they may occasion abscess and fistulae.

CAL'CULI, LAC'TEAL, Calculi of the mammae.

CAL'CULI, LITH'IC, see Calculi, urinary—c. Lung, Lung-stones.

CAL'CULI OF THE MAM'MÆ, (F.) Calculs des Mamelles. Haller gives a case of a concretion, of a yellowish white color, which had the shape of one of the excretory ducts of the mammary gland, having been extracted from an abscess seated in that organ.

CAL'CULI, MUL'BERRY, see Calculi, urinary—c. Nasal, see Dacryolite.

CAL'CULI OF THE PAN'CREAS, Cal'culi Pancrea'tis, (F.) Calculs du Pancréas. These are but little known. Analogy has induced a belief that they resemble the salivary. Some have supposed that certain transparent calculi, rejected by vomiting, or passed in the evacuations, have proceeded from the pancreas, but there seems to be no sufficient reason for this belief.

CAL'CULI OF THE PIN'EAL GLAND, (F.) Calculs de la Glande Pinéale. Sabulous concretions are usual in the gland. No phenomena announce their presence during life. They are composed of phosphate of lime.

CAL'CULI PODAG'RICI, Calculi, arthritic.

CAL'CULI, PRÆPU'TIAL, Acrobystio'lithi. Spherical or ovoidal concretions, usually composed of uric acid, formed from the urine, when the prepuce is very long and narrow.

CAL'CULI OF THE PROS'TATE, Prostat'ic cal'culi. These are not very rare. They have generally the same composition as the preceding. They usually present the symptoms common to every tumefaction of the prostate, and sometimes those of calculi in the bladder.

CAL'CULI, PUL'MONARY, Lung-stones, Lung cal'culi, Calculi Pulmonales, (F.) Calculs pulmonaires. These concretions are very frequently met with in the dead body, without seeming to have produced unpleasant symptoms during life. At other times, they are accompanied with all the symptoms of phthisis, Lithophthi'sis, Phthisis calculeuse, of Bayle. See Lithiasis pulmonum. At times they are expectorated without the super-vention of any unpleasant symptom. They are usually formed mainly of carbonate of lime and animal matter.

CAL'CULI, SAL'IVARY, Calculi Saliva'les sen Salivo'si, Sialol'ithi, (F.) Calculs salivaires. Concretions, usually formed of phosphate and carbonate of lime and animal matter, which are developed in the substance of the salivary glands or in their excretory ducts. In the first case, they may be mistaken for a simple swelling of the gland; in the second, they may generally be detected by the touch. They may be extracted by incision in the interior of the mouth. The calculus developed in the sublingual ducts has been called Cal'culus sublingualis and Ran'ula lapide'a.

CAL'CULI, SPERMAT'IC, (F.) Calculs spermaticques. These have sometimes been found in the vesiculæ seminales after death. They cannot be detected during life.

CAL'CULI OF THE STOM'ACH AND INTES'TINES, Enterol'ithus, E. Calculus, Coprol'ithus, Concretio'nes alvine, Alvine calculi, (F.) Calculs de l'estomac, C. intestinaux ou stercoraux, Pierres stercorales, Concrétions intestinales. Calculi of the stomach are rare, and have almost always been carried thither by the antiperistaltic action of the intestines. The symptoms occasioned by them are those of chronic gastritis. It has been imagined that the continued use of absorbent powders, as magnesia, will give occasion to them.

Intestinal concretions, (F.) Calculs intestinaux, are not uncommon in animals (see BEZOARD); but they are rare in man. The causes which give rise to them are little known: sometimes a biliary calculus affords them a nucleus. Their composition varies. They are light, hard, very fetid, and are formed, ordinarily, between the valvulæ of the small intestines, or in the cells of large, and sometimes in old herniæ. Whilst they do not obstruct the passage of the alimentary mass, they produce no unpleasant symptoms. At times, the movable tumor which they form may be felt through the parietes of the abdomen. They are generally evacuated per anum.

CAL'CULI OF THE TONSILS. Calculous concretions, which sometimes form in the tonsils, (F.) Calculs des Amygdales. They are easily recognized by the sight and touch: sometimes they are discharged by spitting, either alone or with the pus of an abscess occasioned by their presence.

CAL'CULI, TRIP'LE, see Calculi, urinary — c. Uric, see Calculi, urinary.

CAL'CULI, U'RINARY, Urol'ithi, (F.) Calculs urinaires, Pierres urinaires. Concretions which form from the crystallizable substances in the urine, and are met with not only in the whole course of the urinary passages, but in fistulous openings wherever the urine stagnates naturally or accidentally. Their causes are but little known. They are more common at the two extremities of life than at the middle, and more so in some countries and districts than in others. At times, a clot of blood, a portion of mucus, &c., form the nucleus. Of 100 observed cases, the nucleus was: of Uric acid, urates, 33; Oxalate of lime, 43; Phosphates, Carbonates, 11; foreign bodies, 13. The symptoms and treatment vary according to the seat of the calculus. There is no such thing, probably, as a medical solvent. See Urinary Calculi.

The varieties of calculi, produced by the combination or intermixture of different ingredients, were thus represented by Dr. Paris.

A TABULAR VIEW OF DIFFERENT SPECIES OF URINARY CALCULI.

SPECIES OF CALCULI.	EXTERNAL CHARACTERS.	CHEMICAL COMPOSITION.	REMARKS.
1. LITHIC OR URIC.	FORM, a flattened oval. S. G. generally exceeds 1500. Color, brownish or fawn-like. Surface, smooth. Texture, laminated.	It consists principally of Lithic Acid . When treated with nitric acid, a beautiful pink substance results. This calculus is slightly soluble in water, abundantly so in the pure alkalies.	It is the prevailing species; but the surface sometimes occurs finely tuberculated. It frequently constitutes the nuclei of the other species.
2. MULBERRY.	Color, dark brown. Texture, harder than that of the other species. S. G. from 1.428 to 1.976. Surface, studded with tubercles.	It is oxalate of lime , and is decomposed in the flame of a spirit lamp, swelling out into a white efflorescence, which is quicklime .	This species includes some varieties, which are remarkably smooth and pale-colored, resembling hempseed .
3. BONE EARTH.	Color, pale brown or gray; surface, smooth and polished; structure, regularly laminated; the laminae easily separating into concrete crusts.	Principally phosphate of lime . It is soluble in muriatic acid.
4. TRIPLE.	Color, generally brilliant white. Surface, uneven, studded with shining crystals, less compact than the preceding species. Between its laminae small cells occur, filled with sparkling particles.	It is an ammoniac-magnesian phosphate , generally mixed with phosphate of lime. Pure alkalies decompose it, extracting its ammonia.	This species attains a larger size than any of the others.
5. FUSIBLE.	Color, grayish white.	A compound of the two foregoing species.	It is very fusible, melting into a vitreous globe.
6. CYSTIC.	Very like the triple calculus, but it is unstratified and more compact and homogeneous.	It consists of cystic oxide . Under the blowpipe it yields a peculiarly fetid odor. It is soluble in acids, and in alkalies, even if they are fully saturated with carbonic acid.	It is a rare species.
7. ALTERNATING.	Its section exhibits different concentric laminae.	Compounded of several species, alternating with each other.
8. COMPOUND.	No characteristic form.	The ingredients are separable only by chemical analysis.

Chemists have demonstrated the existence of several components of urinary calculi, viz., Uric acid, Urates of ammonia, soda, potassa, lime, and magnesia, Xanthic oxide, Cystine, Oxalate of lime, Carbonates of lime and magnesia, Amniacomagnesian phosphate, Phosphates of lime, magnesia, and iron; mucus, nitrogenized matters, modified blood; coloring matters; silica, mica, oxide of iron, and different foreign bodies; Urea, Benzonate of ammonia, Oxalate of ammonia, Hydrochlorate of ammonia, and other immediate principles of the urine.

1. Renal Calculi, Cal'culi Renis, (F.) Calculi renaux. These have almost always a very irregular shape: at times, there is no indication of their presence: at others, they occasion attacks of pain in the kidneys, sometimes accompanied by bloody or turbid urine. Often, they cause inflammation of the kidneys, with all its unpleasant results. They are generally formed of uric acid, or oxalate of lime, and, at times, phosphates with animal matter. The treatment will have to vary, according to the presumed constituents and to the absence or presence of inflammatory signs,—relieving the irritation by opiates. A surgical operation can rarely be applicable.

2. Calculi of the Ureters, (F.) Calculi des Urètres. These come from the kidneys, and do not produce unpleasant effects, unless they are so large as to obstruct the course of the urine, and to occasion distension of the whole of the ureters above them; or unless their surface is so rough as to irritate the mucous membrane, and occasion pain, hemorrhage, abscesses, &c. The pain, during the passage, is very violent, extending, at times, to the testicles of the same side in the male; and occasioning a numbness of the thigh in both sexes. The treatment consists in general or local bloodletting, warm bath, and opiates.

3. Vesical Calculi, Stone in the Bladder, Lith'ia vesicalis, Lith'iasis cystica seu vesicalis, Cystolith'iasis, Dysuria calculosa seu irritata, Cal'culus vesicæ, (F.) Calculs vésicaux. These are the most common. Sometimes, they proceed from the kidneys: most commonly, they are formed in the bladder itself. Sense of weight in the perinæum, and sometimes of a body rolling when the patient changes his position; pain or itching at the extremity of the glans in men; frequent desire to pass the urine; sudden stoppage to its flow; and bloody urine, are the chief phenomena, that induce a suspicion of their existence. We cannot, however, be certain of this without sounding the patient. Sometimes, when of a small size, they are expelled: most commonly, they remain in the bladder, the disorganization of which they occasion, unless removed by a surgical operation.

4. Urethral Calculi. These almost always proceed from the bladder. The obstruction which they cause to the passage of the urine, the hard tumor, and the noise occasioned when struck by a sound, indicate their presence. They are removed by incision. They form, at times, in the prostate gland, Prostatolithi. A prostatic calculus may project into the urethra, and thus assist to form a prostatovesical calculus.

5. Cal'culi of Fistulous Passages. These arise when there is some fistulous opening into the urethra. They can be readily recognized, and may generally be extracted with facility. (F.) Calculs placés hors des voies urinaires. See Urinary Calculi.

CALCULI OF THE UTERUS, (F.) Calculi de l'Utérus. These are very rare. The signs which indicate them during life are those of chronic engorgement of the uterus. Their existence, consequently, cannot be proved till after death.

CAL'LUS, PROVIS'IONAL OR TEN'PORARY. It was formerly maintained that when the shaft of a long bone has been broken through, and the extremities have been brought in exact juxtaposition, the new matter, first ossified, is that which occupies the central portion of the deposit, and thus connects the medullary cavities of the broken ends, forming a kind of plug, which enters each. This was termed by M. Dupuytren the provisional Callus, but a more modern view is that direct union between fragments may take place, as in the soft parts, the provisional callus—ensheath'ing callus of Paget—not being thrown out unless there has been some degree of movement of the fragments.

Cam'phor, (from Arab. Ca'phur or Kam'phur), Camphora: according to Kraus, more correctly Campho'ra, from its East Indian origin, Caph'ura, Caff'a, Caf, Caf'ur, Caph'ora, Al'tafor, Cam'phire, (F.) Camphre. A concrete substance, prepared, by distillation, from Laurus Cam'phora, Per'sea Cam'fora, Camphora officina'rum, an indigenous tree of the East Indies. Order, Laurineae. Two kinds of crude camphor occur in commerce—the one called tub camphor, from being imported in tubs. It comes from Batavia, but is, chiefly, the produce of Japan. It is, also, called Dutch Camphor, and Japan Camphor. The other, common crude camphor, China camphor, Formosa camphor, comes from India, in square chests. It is refined by sublimation. Camphor is, also, obtained in Borneo and Sumatra—Bor'neo or Suma'tra camphor, from Dryobalanops camphora. It is very dear, and not used in this country or in Europe. Camphor has a strong and fragrant odor; it is volatile, not easily pulverizable; texture crystalline. Soluble in alcohol, ether, oils, vinegar, and slightly so in water. Its properties are narcotic, diaphoretic, and sedative. Dose, gr. v. to ℥j. Dissolved in oil or alcohol, it is applied externally in rheumatic pains, bruises, sprains, &c.

Camphor Oil or Liquid camphor, Camphol, of India, is obtained by piercing the young camphor tree, Dryobalanops camphora. The O'leum camphoræ, Oil of camphor, of the United States Pharmacopœia, is the volatile oil obtained from Camphora officina'rum.

The bibromide is itself made by dissolving camphor in cold bromine. Bromized camphor is given in pill or mixture, in doses of gr. ij.-v., in delirium tremens and analogous nervous diseases.

Can'cellated, Cancellatus, Cancell'ous, (F.) Cancellé, (cancelli, 'lattice-work.') Formed of cancelli,—as the 'cancellated structure of bone.'

Cancel'li, (pl. of Cancellus, dim. of cancer, 'a bar,') 'Lattice-work.' The Cellular or Spongy Texture of Bones, (F.) Tissu celluleux; consisting of numerous cells, communicating with each other. They contain a fatty matter, analogous to marrow. This texture is met with, principally, at the extremities of long bones; and some of the short bones consist almost wholly of it. It allows of the expansion of the extremities of bones, without adding to their weight, and deadens concussions.

Cancel'lous, Cancellated.

Cancel'lus, (dim. of cancer, 'a crab.') A species of crayfish, called the Wrong Heir, and Ber'nard the Her'mit; which is said to cure rheumatism, if rubbed on the part.

Can'cer, gen. Can'cri, 'a crab.' Car'cinus, Lu'pus Cancro'sus. A disease, so called either on account of the hideous appearance which the ulcerated cancer presents, or on account of the great veins which surround it, and which the ancients compared to the claws of the crab; called also Carcino'ma. It generally consists of a scirrhus, livid tumor, intersected by firm, whitish, divergent bands, and occurs chiefly in the secretory glands. The pains are acute and lancinating, and often extend to other parts. The tumor ultimately terminates in a fetid and ichorous ulcer—Ul'cus cancro'sum. It is distinguished, according to its stages, into occult, Can'cer occultus, and open, C. aper'tus; the former being the scirrhus, the latter the ulcer-ated condition. At times there is a simple destruction or erosion of the organ, at others an encephaloid or cer'ebri-form, and at others, again, a colloid degeneration.

For its production, it requires a peculiar diathesis, or cachexia. The following table, from Dr. Walshe, exhibits the characters of the three great species of cancer:

ENCEPHALOID.	SCIRRHUS.	COLLOID.
Resembles lobulated cerebral matter. Is commonly opaque from its earliest formation. Is of a dead white color.	Resembles rind of bacon traversed by cellulo-fibrous septa. Has a semi-transparent glossiness. Has a clear whitish or bluish yellow tint. Is comparatively ill supplied with vessels. Is exceedingly firm and dense.	Has the appearance of particles of jelly inlaid in a regular alveolar bed. The contained matter is strikingly transparent. Greenish yellow is its predominant hue. Its vessels have not been sufficiently examined as yet. The jelly-like matter is exceedingly soft; a colloid mass is, however, firm and resisting. The pultaceous variety has been detected in the veins. Is composed of shells in a state of emboîtement.
Contains a multitude of minute vessels. Is less hard and dense than scirrhus.	Has not been distinctly detected in this situation. The main microscopical constituents are juxtaposed nuclear cells; caudate corpuscula do not exist in it.	Observes a mean in this respect.
Is frequently found in the veins issuing from the diseased mass. The predominant microscopical elements are globular, not always distinctly cellular, and caudate corpuscula. Occasionally attains an enormous bulk. Has been observed in almost every tissue of the body. Very commonly co-exists in several parts or organs of the same subject.	Rarely acquires larger dimensions than an orange. Its seat, as ascertained by observation, is somewhat more limited. Is not usually solitary.	Has so far been seen in a limited number of parts only. Has rarely been met with in more than one organ.
Is remarkable for its occasional vast rapidity of growth. Is frequently the seat of interstitial hemorrhage and deposition of black or bistre-colored matter. When softened into a pulp, appears as a dead white or pink opaque matter of creamy consistence. Subcutaneous tumors are slow to contract adhesion with the skin. Ulcerated encephaloid is frequently the seat of hemorrhage, followed by rapid fungous development.	Ordinarily grows slowly.	Grows with a medium degree of rapidity.
The progress of the disease after ulceration is commonly very rapid.	Is comparatively rarely the seat of these changes.	Undergoes no visible change of the kind.
It is the most common form under which secondary cancer exhibits itself.	Resembles, when softened, a yellowish brown semitransparent gelatinous matter. Scirrhus thus situate usually becomes adherent. Scirrhous ulcers much less frequently give rise to hemorrhage; and fungous growths (provided they retain the scirrhous character) are now more slowly and less abundantly developed. There is not such a remarkable change in the rate of progress of the disease after ulceration has set in.	Has so far been observed in adults only.
Is the species of cancer most frequently observed in young subjects.	Is much less common before puberty.

The use of irritants in cancerous affections is strongly to be deprecated. When the disease is so situated that excision can be practised, and the constitution does not exhibit great contamination, the sooner it is removed the better. See Carcinoma, and Thnéoblaste.

CAN'CER CELL. The cell which, according to some, characterizes cancer. This as well as the nucleus, (F.) Cellule et noyau cancéreux, although most diversified in its appearance—polygonal, caudate, fusiform, concentric, compound—is considered pathognomonic by some, but not to be relied upon by others. Mr. Collis describes it as a large, soft, weak, and delicate cell; but it does not appear that, with reference to other isolated cells, it presents anything anatomically characteristic. The average dimension of the cancer-cell is about $\frac{1}{1200}$ to $\frac{1}{1000}$ of an inch in diameter, and the nucleus is always large and well-defined. The liquid in which the cancer-cells float is called the can'cer se'rum.

Canthar'idism. A term applied to the various symptoms resulting from the employment of blisters.

Can'tharis, gen. Canthar'idis, pl. Canthar'ides; (κανθαρίς, gen. κανθαρίδος,) C. vesicato'ria, Mus'ca Hispan'ica, Mel'oë vesicato'rius, Lyt'ta vesicato'ria, Tege'nera medicina'lis, Blis'tering Fly, Blis'ter-fly, Blis'terbeetle, Span'ish Fly, Fly, (F.) Cantharides, Mouches, M. d'Espagne. This fly—Order, Coleoptera—originally, perhaps, a native of Italy and Spain, is now found in France, Germany, Hungary, Russia, Siberia, and England. It is, however, rare in the last-named country. It is found on a species of Oleaceæ—as the ash, privet, and lilac; and of Caprifoliaceæ—as the elder and lonicera. It is much employed in medicine, and is the most common vesicatory. Given internally, and even when absorbed from the skin, it affects the urinary organs, exciting strangury. This may be prevented, in cases of blisters, by interposing between the blistering plaster and skin a piece of tissue paper. Diluents relieve the strangury. Dose, half a grain to one grain. If kept dry, the flies will retain their activity for many years. Their active principle—Canthar'idin, Cantharidi'na—has been separated from them.

Can'tharis vesicato'ria is the ordinary blistering insect used in Europe.

CAR'BO ANIMA'LIS, C. car'nis, Antimal char'coal,

(F.) Charbon animal, is usually prepared by subjecting bones to a red heat in close vessels. The result is Bone black, commonly called Ivory black, (F.) Noir animal ou d'Os. It is given in the same cases as Carbo ligni, and has been extolled in cancer. Dose, gr. ss. to gr. iij.

The Ph. U. S. contains a formula for the preparation of CARBO ANIMALIS PURIFICATUS, Purified animal charcoal, (Carbon. animal Acid muriat., aa \mathfrak{z} xij., Aquæ \mathfrak{z} xij.). The muriatic acid, previously mixed with the water, is digested with a gentle heat for two days. The undissolved portion is allowed to subside, the supernatant liquor is poured off, and the charcoal, frequently washed with water until it is entirely free from acid, is dried.

A solid substance obtained from the products of the distillation of coal-tar, between the temperatures of 300° and 400°. It is more closely identified in its composition with the alcohols than the acids. It is white or colorless, when pure, of an odor and taste like creasote, fusible at from 93° to 106°, forming an oily liquid, soluble in from 20 to 33 parts of water, and in alcohol, ether, glycerin, and the essential oils. In its manufacture, it is accompanied by cresylic acid, which is closely analogous to it, interfering with its crystallization, but, in the view of some, having hygienic and remedial effects equal to it. (See Carbolic acid, impure.) Carbolic acid is generally employed externally; it prevents or corrects putrefaction in animal substances, and has therefore been used in cases of purulent infection, dissecting wounds, hospital gangrene, &c. It has also been extensively employed as a disinfectant, and, from its parasitocidal influence, in diseases connected with the presence of microscopic plants or animals, as in scabies, porrigo, thrush, &c. In all such cases, it is applied in weak solution or ointment. It has also been used as a dressing for wounds, and as a gentle irritant or alterative, or, concentrated, as a mild escharotic, in chronic ulcers, in cutaneous affections, &c. Internally, it may be given in doses of one or two grains, or in its concentrated liquid form, (obtained by placing the bottle containing it in hot water,) of one or two drops, in a tablespoonful or two of sweetened water, in cases of vomiting or diarrhœa or gastric and intestinal affections of zymotic origin, as yeasty vomiting, flatulence dependent on fermentation in undigested food, &c. Its salts, as the carbolates or phenates of soda, potassa, &c., have also been used externally in solution.

Carbolic acid has been largely prescribed externally in various aqueous, alcoholic, and æthereal solutions, solution in glycerin — Glyceritum Ac'idum Carbol'ici, (Ph. U. S., 1873,) — lard, &c., in the form of carbolized or antiseptic liniments, ointments, plasters, &c.; and the last edition of the U. S. Pharmacopœia (1873) contains an Aqua Ac'idum Carbol'ici, Carbol'ic Ac'id Water, prepared by adding Glycerit. Acidum Carbol'ici \mathfrak{z} x. to Aquæ Destillat. Oj.

It is colorless or of a brownish shade, becoming reddish-brown on exposure. It consists of carbolic and cresylic acids, in variable proportions, with impurities derived from coal-tar. It is only used externally or for disinfecting purposes.

This gas, which neither supports respiration nor combustion, is not often used in medicine. It is the main agent in effervescent draughts, fermenting poultices, &c. It is often found occupying the lower parts of mines — when it is called the choke damp — caverns, tombs, wells, brewers' vats, &c., and not unfrequently has been the cause of death. Lime thrown into such places soon absorbs the carbonic acid.

It is positively deleterious, and is often the cause of injurious phenomena, which have been ascribed to the inhalation of carbonic acid. When directed on a denuded surface, it produces anæsthetic effects, similar to those of chloroform, but it is not used.

Carboniferous, Carbo'nifer, (F.) Carboniferè,

(carbon, and fero, 'I bear,') Carbonaceus. Containing carbon, as "carboniferous or carbonaceous food,"—the carbohydrates, for example.

It is a transparent, very volatile, oily fluid, smelling something like chloroform. S. g. 1.59. When inhaled it acts like chloroform, but more slowly and depressingly on the heart. This transparent, colorless fluid, which has a very penetrating, disagreeable odor, and a taste which is cooling at first, but afterwards acrid and somewhat aromatic, is a diffusible excitant. It is diaphoretic, diuretic, and is said to have proved emmenagogue. It is also used in nervous diseases as an antispasmodic. Dose, one drop to four, repeated frequently.

It is used externally, where a cooling influence has to be rapidly exerted, and as a local anæsthetic, and has also been inhaled as an anæsthetic.

CARDIAC ARTERIES, Coronary arteries, (F.) Artères cardiaques ou coronaires, are two in number. They arise from the aorta, a little above the free edge of the sigmoid valves, and are distributed on both surfaces of the heart.

CARDIAC GANGLION, G. of Wrisberg, Ganglion cardiaceum, situate beneath the arch of the aorta, to the right side of the ligament of the ductus arteriosus. It receives the superior cardiac nerves of opposite sides of the neck, and a branch from the pneumogastric, and gives off numerous branches to the cardiac plexuses.

CARDIAC NERVES, (F.) Nerfs cardiaques. These are commonly three on each side; a superior, middle, and inferior, which are furnished by corresponding cervical ganglia. Commonly, there are but two on the left side; the upper and middle, which draw their origin from the last two cervical ganglia. Scarpa calls the superior—Cardiacus superficialis; the middle—C. profundus seu magis; and the inferior—C. parvus seu minor. There are, besides, Cardiac filaments, (F.) Filets cardiaques, furnished by the par vagum or pneumogastric nerve, which become confounded with the above.

CARDIAC PLEXUS, Plexus cardiaceus. There are three cardiac plexuses. 1. The great cardiac plexus is situate upon the bifurcation of the trachea. It is formed by the convergence of the middle and inferior cardiac nerves; and by branches from the pneumogastric, descendens noni, and first thoracic ganglion. 2. The anterior cardiac plexus is situate in front of the ascending aorta near its origin. It is formed by filaments from the superior cardiac nerves; from the cardiac ganglion; and from the great cardiac plexus. Filaments from this plexus accompany the left coronary artery, and form the anterior coronary plexus. 3. The posterior cardiac plexus is seated upon the posterior part of the ascending aorta near its origin. It is formed by numerous branches from the great cardiac plexus. It divides into two sets of branches, which together constitute the posterior coronary plexus.

The most common causes of caries are blows, the action of some virus, and morbid diathesis. When dependent on any virus in the system, this must be combated by appropriate remedies. When entirely local, it must be converted, where practicable, into a state of necrosis or death of the affected part. For this end, stimulants, the actual cautery, &c., are applied.

The disease commonly occurs between the third and ninth month, and is characterized by excessive dyspnoea, accompanied by a loud croupy noise on inspiration; the thumbs being locked, and the hands and feet rigidly bent for a longer or shorter period. The seat of the disease is evidently in the cerebrospinal axis, primarily or secondarily; generally, perhaps, it is owing to erethism seated elsewhere, but communicated to the cerebrospinal centre, and reflected to the respiratory and other muscles concerned. It seems to be connected with dental irritation; and, consequently, in the treatment, where such is the case, the gums should be freely divided; after which, cathartics and revulsives, with the use of narcotics and appropriate diet, will generally remove the affection; for, although extremely alarming, it is often not attended with great danger. A deprivation of sight, which comes on as if a veil fell before the eyes. Cataract consists in opacity of the crystalline lens or its capsule, which prevents the passage of the rays of light, and precludes vision. The causes are obscure. Diagnosis. — The patient is blind, the pupil seems closed by an opaque body, of variable color, but commonly whitish: — the pupil contracting and dilating. Cataracts have been divided, by some, into spu'rious and gen'uine. The former, Pseudocataract'a, where the obstacle to vision is between the capsule of the lens and the uvea: the latter, where it is in the lens or capsule.

A lenticular cataract is where the affection is seated in the lens:—a capsular or membranous, in the capsule. The capsular is divided again, by Beer, into the anterior, posterior or polar, and complete capsular cataract. When the anterior form is elevated above the surface of the capsule, it has been termed pyramidal cataract. Lamellar or Zonular Cataract consists of a layer of opaque lens substance lying between the nucleus and a transparent portion of the cortical substance. It is generally congenital or developed in infancy. Cortical Cataract generally commences at the margin, grayish-white stripes being observed running towards the centre of the lens, the cloudiness soon involving, however, the whole lens. Nuclear or hard Senile Cataract is the form usually met with in old people. When the capsule is rendered opaque, in consequence of an injury, Traumatic Cataract, Suffusio ex Vulnere, which cuts or ruptures any part of it, it thickens, becomes leathery, and has been called Cataracta arida siliquosa. Cataracta Morgagniana lactea seu puriformis is the milk'y variety, in which the crystalline is transformed into a liquid similar to milk, (F.) Cataracte lacteuse; or, as generally defined, in which there is opacity of the fluid situate between the lens and its capsule. The capsulo-lenticular affects both lens and capsule, (AchrySTALLDIAPHANIE, ADIAPHANIE PÉRI-CRYSTALLIQUE of Piorry), and Beer conceives the liquor Morgagni, in an altered state, may contribute to it. Cataracts are also called hard, Sclerocataracta, Suffusio dura; soft, Phacomalacia, Suffusio mollis; stony, (F. pietreuse); milky or cheesy ([F.] lacteuse ou caséuse). Galactocataracta, Cataracta lacticolor, according to their density:—white, pearly, yellow, brown, gray, green, black, (F.) Cataracte blanche, perlée, jaune, brune, grise, verte, noire, according to their color:—fixed or vacillating—cataracta capsulolenticularis fixa vel tremula, (F.) fixe ou branlante, according as they are fixed or movable behind the pupil. They are likewise called Cataracta marmoracea, fenestrata, stellata, punctata, dimidiata, &c., according to the appearances they present. In Diabetic Cataract the opacity is probably dependent on an impaired nutrition connected with diabetes.

They may be simple or complicated with adhesion, amaurosis, specks, &c.; and primary or primitive, when opaque before the operation;—secondary, when the opacity is the result of the operation.

Cataract is commonly a disease of elderly individuals, although, not unfrequently, congenital, Suffusio congenita. It forms slowly; objects are at first seen as through a mist; light bodies appear to fly before the eyes, and it may not be until after months or years that the sight is wholly lost. No means will obviate the evil except an operation, which consists in removing the obstacle to the passage of the light to the retina. Four chief methods are employed for this purpose. The selection of the most appropriate operation must depend upon the peculiar nature of the case. 1. Couching or Depression, Hyalonixis, Hyalonyxis, Crystallocatapiësis, Crystallocatathësis, (F.) Abaissement ou Déplacement de la Cataracte. This consists in passing a cataract needle through the sclerótica and subjacent membranes, a little above the transverse diameter of the eye; and at about two lines' distance from the circumference of the transparent cornea, until the point arrives in the posterior chamber of the eye. With this the crystalline is depressed to the outer and lower part of the globe of the eye, where it is left. This operation is, however, mainly of historical interest, being now almost abandoned. 2. By Absorption,—by the French termed broiement or bruising. This is performed in the same manner as the former; except that, instead of turning the crystalline from the axis of the visual rays, it is divided by the cutting edge of the needle, and its fragments are scattered in the humors of the eye, where they are absorbed. 3. By Extraction,—either by the flap or linear methods or the suction operation,—which consists in opening, with a particular kind of knife, the transparent cornea and the anterior portion of the capsule of the crystalline; and causing the lens to issue through the aperture. Each of the processes has its advantages and disadvantages, and all are used by surgeons. 4. Some, again, pass a cataract needle through the transparent cornea and pupil to the crystalline, and depress or cause its absorption. This is called Ceratonyxis. See, also, Reclination.

A discharge of fluid from a mucous membrane. The ancients considered catarrh as a simple flux, and not as an inflammation. Generally it partakes of this character, however. Catarrh is, with us, usually restricted to inflammation of the mucous membrane of the air-passages: the French extend it to that of all mucous membranes; (F.) Flux muqueux, Fluxion catarrhale.

It is commonly an affection of but little consequence, but apt to relapse and become chronic. It is characterized by cough, thirst, lassitude, fever, watery eyes, with increased secretion of mucus from the air-passages. The antiphlogistic regimen and time usually remove it. Sometimes the inflammation of the bronchial tubes is so great as to prove fatal.

A substance, used for 'firing,' burning, or disorganizing the parts to which it is applied. Cauteries were divided by the ancients into actual and potent'ial. The word is now restricted to the red-hot iron; or to positive burning. It was, formerly, much used for preventing hemorrhage from divided arteries; and also with the same views as a blister.

The button cautery, recommended by Sir Dominic Corrigan for 'firing' or producing speedy rubefaction, consists of a thick iron wire shank, about two inches long, inserted into a small wooden handle, having on its extremity, which is slightly curved, a disk or button of iron a quarter of an inch thick and half an inch in diameter.

Nélaton has also attempted to destroy certain tumors, as of the uterus, by making an actual cautery with the flames of hydrogen or of an ordinary gaslight. See Cautery, gas.

The French, among whom cauterization is much used, distinguish five kinds: 1. Cautérisation Inhérente, which consists in applying the actual cautery freely, and with a certain degree of force, so as to disorganize deeply. 2. Cautérisation transcurrente, which consists in passing the edge of the Cautère cutellaire, or the point of the Cautère conique, lightly, so as not to disorganize deeply. 3. Cautérisation par pointes, which consists in applying on the skin, here and there, the hot point of the conical cautery, with sufficient force to cauterize the whole thickness of the skin. 4. Cautérisation lente, slow cauterization, by means of the moxa. 5. Cautérisation objective, which consists in holding the cautery at some distance from the part to be acted upon by it.

CAV'ERNOUS, Caverno'sus, (F.) Caverneux. Filled with small cavities or caverns, — as a sponge.

CAV'ERNOUS BOD'IES, Cor'pora Caverno'sa of the penis, Cor'pora Nervo'sa seu Ner'veospongiosa seu Spongiosa seu Tendin'ea seu Lateralia seu Fibrospongiosa Pe'nis, (F.) Corps Caverneux. The corpus cavernosum is a kind of cylindrical sac, composed of cells; separated, through its whole extent, by a vertical, incomplete septum, Sep'tum pectinifor'me, Trabec'ulae corporum cavernoso'rum, and forming nearly two-thirds of the penis. The corpus cavernosum, on each side, arises from the ascending portion of the ischium, Radi'ces seu Crura seu Cap'ita seu Thal'ami corporum cavernoso'rum pe'nis, (F.) Racines de la verge, and terminates obtusely behind the glans, Ap'ices corporum cavernosorum penis. The arteries of the corpora cavernosa come from the internal pudic. See Helicine arteries. Nerves are found on the surface of the outer membrane, but they do not appear to penetrate the substance, and the smooth muscular fibre has been traced into the fibrous parietes of the cells, as in the case of all erectile tissues.

J. Müller's researches have led him to infer, that both in man and the horse, the nerves of the corpora cavernosa are made up of branches proceeding from the organic as well as the animal system, whilst the nerves of animal life alone provide the nerves of sensation of the penis.

CAV'ERNOUS BOD'IES (Cor'pora Caverno'sa) of the Clit'oris, are two hollow crura, forming the clitoris.

CAV'ERNOUS BOD'Y OF THE VAG'INA, Corpus Cavernosum Vagi'næ, Plex'us retiform'is, Si'nus of Santori'ni, is a substance composed of blood-vessels and cells, similar to those of the penis and clitoris, which covers the outer extremity of the vagina, on each side. It serves to contract the entrance to the vagina during coition. See Bulbus vestibuli.

CAV'ERNOUS GAN'GLION, see Carotid or Carotic nerve.

CAV'ERNOUS RESPIRA'TION. When a cavity exists in the lungs, and one or more ramifications of the bronchia terminate in it, a loud tubal noise is emitted, provided the cavity be not filled with fluid, which is called cavernous respiration. In this condition, the cough likewise is cavernous, (F.) Toux Caverneuse. When the capacity of the cavern is very great, the sound of the respiration is like that produced by blowing into a decanter, with the mouth at a little distance from the neck. This kind of cavernous respiration has been called amphor'ic, from am'phora, 'a flask;' (F.) Respiration amphorique, Souffle amphorique, S. métallique.

The Veiled Puff, (F.) Souffle voilé, is a modification of the cavernous respiration, in which, according to Laënnec, "a sort of movable veil interposed between the excavation and the ear" seems to be agitated to and fro. It is a sign which is not much attended to.

CAV'ERNOUS RHON'CHUS, see Cavernous respiration, and Gurgling.

CAV'ERNOUS SI'NUS, Si'nus Caverno'sus seu polymor'phus seu sphenoida'lis, Receptaculum sellæ equinæ lateribus appositum, (F.) Sinus caverneux. The Cav'ernous Si'nuses are venous cavities of the dura mater, filled with a multitude of reddish, soft filaments, intersecting each other; and, as it were, reticulated. They commence behind the inner part of the sphenoid fissure, pass backwards on the sides of the fossa pituitaria, and terminate by opening into a cavity, common to the superior and inferior petrosal sinuses. They receive some meningeal veins, the ophthalmic veins, &c. The anterior extremity of each cavernous sinus has been named the ophthal'mic sinus.

CAVERNOUS TEXTURE or TIS'SUE, Te'la cavernosa, (F.) Tissu Caverneux. The spongy substance which forms the greater part of the penis and clitoris. It seems to consist of a very complicated lacework of arteries and veins; and, probably, of nervous filaments, with small fibrous plates, from the Tuni'ca fibro'sa seu albugin'ea, which form by their decussation numerous cells communicating with each other. This spongy texture produces erection, by dilating and swelling on the influx of blood.

Of the fibres, some are of the yellow elastic kind; but the greater part are of the white fibrous tissue, and they frequently present the form of broad flat bands, in which no distinct fibrous arrangement is perceptible. See Fibrous.

The cellular tissue or texture unites every part of the body, determines its shape, and by its elasticity and contractility, and by the fluid which it contains in its areolæ, facilitates the motion of parts on each other.

Cellular tissue has been divided by anatomists into the external, general, or common cellular tissue — tex'tus cellula'ris interme'dius seu lax'us, which does not penetrate the organs; the cellular texture which forms the envelopes of organs — tex'tus cellula'ris stric'tus; and that which penetrates into the organs, accompanying and enveloping all their parts — the tex'tus cellula'ris stipa'tus, constituting the basis of all the organs. These are three in number, two of which are inferior: the larger, infe'rior cerebell'i, which arises from the posterior cerebral or vertebral; and the smaller, whose existence is not constant, from the mesocephalic or basilar:—the third, called super'ior cerebell'i, (F.) A. cérébelleuse supérieure, is also a branch of the basilar.

A portion of the medullary mass, contained in the cavity of the cranium. It fills the lower occipital fossæ below the tentorium, and embraces the tuber annulare and medulla. It is composed, like the brain, of vesicular and tubular substance, arranged in laminæ, as it were; so that, when a section is made of it, it has an arborescent appearance, called Ar'bor vi'tæ. The cerebellum is divided into two lobes or hemispheres or lateral masses, Lo'bus supe'rior ante'rior seu quadrangula'ris, and Lo'bus supe'rior poste'rior seu semiluna'ris; and each lobe is again subdivided into Monticuli or Lobules. The hemispheres are separated, in front, by a deep notch, the Incisura cerebel'li ante'rior, and behind by the Incisura cerebelli poste'rior. In the cerebellum are to be observed the cru'ra cerebelli, the fourth ven'tricle, the val'vula magna cer'e'br'i, the proces'sus vermicula'res, supe'rior and inferior, &c. Its precise functions are not determined. It has been regarded as, but not proved to be, the organ of the instinct of reproduction; and by others as the coördinator and regulator of the movements.

Chaussier calls these arteries lobaires, because they correspond with the anterior, middle, and posterior lobes, while he calls the trunks, whence they originate, cérebral.

CEREBRAL NERVES are those which arise within the cranium, (F.) Nervi craniens, all of which, perhaps, not excepting the olfactory, originate from the medulla oblongata. See Nerves.

Cere'brum or Cere'brum, (καρά, 'the head,') (F.) Cerveau, Cervele. The brain. This term is sometimes applied to the whole of the contents of the cranium: at others, to the upper portion; the posterior and inferior being called cerebellum. The brain, properly so called, extends from the os frontis to the superior occipital fossæ. Anteriorly, it rests on the orbital vault: behind this, on the middle fossæ of the base of the cranium; and, posteriorly, on the tentorium cerebello super-extensum. The upper surface is divided by a deep median cleft (Scissure interlobaire, Ch.) into two halves, called hemispheres, which are united at the base by the corpus callosum. At its surface are numerous convolutions. The inferior surface exhibits, from before to behind, three lobes, distinguished into anterior, middle, and posterior. The middle is separated from the anterior by the fissure of SYLVIVS; and from the posterior, by a shallow furrow which corresponds to the upper portion of the pars petrosa. Internally, the brain has, on the median line, the corpus callosum, septum lucidum, fornix, pineal gland, and third ventricle:—and, laterally, the lateral ventricles, in which are the corpora striata, optic thalami, &c. It is contained in a triple envelope, (see Meninges.) Its texture is pulpy, and varies according to age. Two substances may be distinguished in it—the white, med'ullary, tubular or fibrous—medul'la cer'e'br'i, (F.) Pulpe cérébral, Substance blanche, and the cortical, cinerit'ious, vesic'ular, or gray, (F.) Substance grise. The former is white; and occupies all the interior and base of the brain. The latter is grayish and softer. It is situate particularly at the surface of the organ.

The brain receives several arterial vessels, furnished by the internal carotid and vertebral. Its veins end in the sinuses. It is the material organ of the mental and moral manifestations. According to Gall, each part is the special seat of one of those faculties, and the brain and cerebellum, inclusive, are called by him, 'the nervous system of the mental faculties.' See Craniology.

The substance of the nervous system—Neurine—was analyzed by Vauquelin, and found to contain water, 80.00; white fatty matter, 4.53; red fatty matter, called cerebrine, 0.70; osmazome, 1.12; albumen, 7.00; phosphorus, 1.50; sulphur, acid phosphates of potassa, lime, and magnesia, 5.15.

The patches do not generally rise above the surface. There is usually some degree of itching.

A cryptogamous growth has been found in it, to which M. Robin gives the name Microspor'um fur'fur; also called Epidermoph'yton.

The causes are not very evident. Sulphur externally—in any and every form—generally removes it speedily. Should there be difficulty, the external use of the remedy in baths or fumigations may succeed. A form of chloasma or of pityriasis versicolor called Mal de los Pintos, Pinta, Quiricua, and Tinna, is described by McClellan as existing in Mexico.

CHLOAS'MA AL'BUM, Achroma.

Chlo'ra, Chlorine.

Chlorace'tic Acid. A caustic somewhat similar in its action to nitric acid, producing a rapid and deep cauterization; formed by the action of chlorine on acetic acid, the latter losing one equivalent of hydrogen, and taking chlorine in its place.

Chlo'ral, (Ph. U. S., 1873.) A substance formed by the prolonged action of chlorine on pure anhydrous alcohol; hence its name (chlorine and alcohol.) The impure oily liquid thus obtained is distilled and purified, and anhydrous chlo'ral, an oily, colorless fluid, is the result. This undergoes decomposition by standing, and is converted into a solid. It combines with water to form acicular crystals of the Hy'drate of Chlo'ral, Chlo'ral Hy'drate, a soluble substance, decomposed by alkalis, producing chloroform in a pure state. Some of its effects have, indeed, been ascribed to the partial decomposition of chlo'ral into chloroform in the circulation. It has been prescribed as an anodyne and soporific, causing extreme muscular relaxation, &c., in the dose of ten to twenty grains, or even more, in solution, in insomnia, delirium tremens, neuralgia, colic, &c.

CHLO'RAL, CRO'TON, Cro'tonate of Chlo'ral. Formed by the action of chlorine on allyl. It is an anæsthetic, producing profound cerebral insensibility, and, if continued, loss of function of the spinal cord, and paralysis of the medulla oblongata.

So far as we know, this is an elementary substance. It is a greenish, yellow gas, of a strong suffocating smell, and disagreeable taste; incapable of maintaining combustion and respiration, and very soluble in water. One of its characteristics is that of destroying, almost immediately, all vegetable and animal colors. It is employed in fumigations as a powerful disinfecting agent. A dilute solution, Aqua seu Li'quor Chlo'rini, Chlorin'ii Li'quor, Chlorin'ei Aqua, Aqua Chlorin'ii (Ph. U. S., 1873), Liquor Chlo'ri (Ph. B., 1867), Chlo'rine water, Solu'tion of Chlo'rine, (F.) Chlore liquide, Chlore Dissous, has been administered, internally, in certain cases of diarrhœa and chronic dysentery. A formula for its preparation, by adding muriatic acid to black oxide of manganese, and causing the chlorine thus disengaged to pass into water, may be found in the United States Pharmacopœia.

Immersion of the hands and arms in chlorine has often removed itch and other cutaneous affections. It has also been inhaled in a dilute state in the early stage of phthisis, but it is of doubtful efficacy, and is better adapted for chronic bronchitis.

Chlorocar'bon, Carbon, bichloride of.

Chlorodyne. A secret preparation, proposed, in 1848, by a Dr. Browne of India, and said, by him, to consist of "perchloric acid with a new alkaloid." Later analyses prove it to consist of a variety of substances, and it has been imitated by combining morphia, dilute muriatic and hydrocyanic acids, capsicum, chloroform, ether, treacle, oil of peppermint, &c., in formulæ varying with different chemists. It has been given as an anodyne chiefly; but being a nostrum, is mainly worthy of mention for its notoriety.

Chloroéthérine, Chloroform.

Chloroform, Chloroformum, Chloroformium, (from chlorine, and formyl.) Carbo'neum seu Formylum chloratum, Superchloridum formylicum, Perchloride and Terchloride of Formyl, Chloroformyl, called also, but not correctly, Terchloride of Carbon, and Chloric ether, Æther chloricus, (F.) Chloroforme, Chloréthérine, is a colorless, oleaginous liquid, of a sweetish ethereal odor, hot, aromatic, and peculiar taste. The specific gravity of that of the Ph. U. S., Chloroformum venale, is 1.45 to 1.49. It may be obtained by distilling from a mixture of chlorinated lime and alcohol—rectifying the product by redistillation, first from a great excess of chlorinated lime, and afterwards from strong sulphuric acid. It has been used with advantage in asthma, and in diseases in which a grateful soothing agent is required. Dose, gtt. x. to f3ss. or more, diluted with water. It is largely prescribed, and with great success, as an anæsthetic agent in painful diseases, and to obtund sensibility in surgical operations and in parturition—especially in the way of inhalation; but its use requires caution. The usual quantity with this view is from f3ss. to f3ij. See Anæsthetic.

The Pharmacopœia of the United States (1873) has a Chloroformum purificatum, which is made by adding sulphuric acid to commercial chloroform; decanting the lighter liquid, and adding to it carbonate of sodium dissolved in water, the chloroform being separated from the supernatant liquor, and mixed with the alcohol. The chloroform is then transferred to a dry retort, lime added, and distilled, by means of a water-bath, into a well-cooled receiver, at a temperature not above 153°, until one troyounce of residue is left. Its s. g. is 1.48.

Chloroformiza'tion, Chloroformisa'tio. The aggregate of anæsthetic phenomena occasioned by the inhalation of chloroform. To chloroformize a patient is to induce such phenomena.

A disease which affects young females, more particularly those who have not menstruated. It is characterized by a pale, lurid complexion, languor, listlessness, depraved appetite and digestion, palpitation, &c. The disease generally goes off on the occurrence of the menstrual flux; but sometimes it is long before this is established, and, at times, the catamenia are in much larger quantity than usual. To this last form M. Trousseau has given the name Chlorose hémorrhagique ou ménorrhagique.

The blood of chlorosis is generally thin, light-colored, and deficient in red corpuscles, and in iron,—achalybhémie of Piorry, and the clot is in less proportion to the serum than in health. On auscultation, a bellows' sound has been almost invariably detected over the heart, and a continuous blowing sound in the larger arteries, (especially the carotids and subclavians,) reinforced by each systole of the ventricle, and resembling the buzzing of a humming-top, the cooing of doves, the whistling of air through a key-hole, &c. (See Bruit.) Very similar sounds are heard in the arteries after copious hemorrhage: they seem, therefore, to coincide with enfeebled circulation.

Tonics, as iron, are usually required in the treatment—the disease most commonly occurring in those in whom there is considerable torpor of the system. Trousseau refers also to a false chloro'sis, Tuber'cular anæ'mia, in which iron is injurious.

Succola'ta, Succocolla'ta, (F.) Chocolat. (Dr. Alston says that this word is compounded from two East Indian words:—choco, 'sound,' and atte, 'water,' because of the noise made in its preparation [?]. Another derivation is from Choco, a province in Mexico, where the tree abounds, and whence it was imported into Europe about 1520.) An alimentary paste prepared from the kernels of Theobroma cacao or Cacao, with sugar, and often aromatics. (See Cacao.) The chocolate thus simply prepared—as it is met with, indeed, in commerce—is called, in France, Chocolat de santé, Chocola'ta simplex seu salu'tis. It is not very easy of digestion.

The chocolat à la vanille contains three ounces of vanilla and two of cinnamon to twenty pounds of common chocolate. The addition of the aromatic renders it somewhat more digestible. Chocolates may likewise be medicated. The French Codex (1866) contains Chocolat au lichen d'Islande, C. au Salep, C. Ferrugineux, &c.

In a typical case there are three stages:—first, of diarrhœa; second, of rice-water evacuations, vomiting, cramps, coldness and lividity of the skin, &c., with a peculiar pinched expression of the face—the facies choleric'a—and collapse; and a third stage, in favorable cases, of reaction or consecutive fever. In temperate climates, common cholera is not usually a disease of much consequence. It requires that the stomach and bowels should be cleared, and afterwards the irritation be allayed by full doses of opium. In malignant cholera, large doses of calomel, with opiates, form the great reliance of some practitioners, but have been condemned by others. The treatment must vary with the stage of the disease, the efforts of the physician during that of collapse being directed to the restoration of animal heat by external applications, &c. In the worst forms, however, it runs its course, unmodified by treatment. (More detailed methods of treatment may be found in systematic treatises on Practice of Medicine.)

CHOL'ERA INFAN'TUM, Chol'eric Fe'ver of In-fants, Cholera of Infants, (F.) Choléra Infantile. A disease so termed by American physicians. It occurs, generally, in the Middle States of the Union, in June or July, and continues during the hot weather; hence called the 'summer complaint.' The chief symptoms are vomiting, purging of green or yellow matter, slime, or blood, attended with pain or uneasiness, and swelling of the abdomen, with some pyrexia, generally. The heat of the weather seems to be the predisposing, if not the exciting, cause. It is a fatal disease in towns, differing little, if at all, from what is vulgarly called the Watery Gripes in England. Clearing, gently, the alimentary canal, so as to remove the offending matter, and then exhibiting chalk mixture and laudanum, with counter-irritants, as spice cataplasms to the abdomen, is the most satisfactory plan of treatment.

The characteristics are: — irregular and involuntary motions of one or more limbs, and of the face and trunk. It is a disease which usually occurs before puberty; and is generally connected with torpor of the system, and of the digestive organs in particular. Its duration is long, but it is usually devoid of danger; although frequently but little under the control of medicine. The spasms do not continue during sleep. The indications of treatment are: to strengthen the general system, and stimulate the intestinal canal. Purgatives, once or twice a week, and chalybeates, with appropriate regimen, will fulfil these.

The epithets given above to chorea, indicate prominent forms of the disease. Chore'a Saltato'ria, for example — method'ical or rhythmic chorea — is a form of the disease characterized by involuntary jumps, often taking place methodically or rhythmically.

Cho'ri'on, (χορίον, 'skin,' from χορεύω, 'to contain,' (include); [?]) Camis'ia Pa'tūs. A thin, transparent membrane, formerly confounded with the decidua, which surrounds the foetus in utero on every side, and appears to be developed from nucleated cells formed in the Fallopian tube. Some histologists, however, consider that it exists in the ovary. The general opinion is, that it is formed as above described; and perhaps, also, from the zona pellucida, which disappears in the tube. In the uterus, villous prolongations are formed on its surface, which have given it, with more recent writers, the name 'shaggy chorion.' These villi are probably the agents of the absorption of nutritive matter furnished from the lining membrane of the uterus. By many anatomists, the chorion is considered to be formed of two layers; the outer, called by Burdach Exocho'ri'on; the inner, Endocho'ri'on. By others, the distinction of laminae is denied. It is exterior to the amnion.

CHORION also means the true skin. See CUTIS. By some, the Zona pellucida is so called.

stretched above the third ventricle, and covers the posterior commissure and corpora quadrigemina. Anteriorly, the tela choroidea is continuous with the plexus choroides.

CHOROÏDEA seu CHOROÏDEA TU'NICA, C. Membrana, or simply the Choroid, Tunica vasculosa seu aciniiformis seu rhagoïdes Oculi, Vascular membrana, (F.) Membrane choroïde, Choroïde. A thin membrane of a very dark color, which lines the sclerótica internally. The part behind the iris is called Uvea. It is situate between the sclerótica and retina, has an opening, posteriorly, for the passage of the optic nerve; and terminates, anteriorly, at the great circumference of the iris, where it is continuous with the ciliary processes. Its outer surface is pretty intimately attached to the sclerótica by bloodvessels and nerves, as well as by a delicate brown tissue, which has been called Lamina fusca.

According to Ruysch, the choroid consists of two layers, to the innermost of which his son gave the name Tunica seu Membrana Ruyschiana, M. choriocapillaris, (F.) Membrane Ruyschienne. The internal surface of the membrane is covered with a dark pigment, consisting of several layers of pigment cells, called Pigmentum nigrum, Stratum pigmenti, Ophthalmochroïtes, Æthiops animal, (F.) Mélaïne, Mélanine, Matière ou Principe de la Mélanose, Enduit choroïdien. Chyle, Chyl'us, Succus nutrit'ius, (χυλος, 'juice,' from χυω, 'I pour,') The word, in Hippocrates, means Tisane or Decoc'tion of Bar'ley, Chyla'rion. Galen first used it in its present sense—i. e., for a nutritive fluid, extracted by intestinal absorption from food which has been subjected to the action of the digestive organs. It is of a whitish appearance, and is formed from the chyme in the duodenum, and the rest of the small intestines, by the chyloferous vessels, which arise at the mucous surface of the intestine. Along these it passes through the mesenteric glands to the thoracic duct, and is finally poured into the left subclavian. It is composed, like the blood, of a fluid—li'quor chy'li—and of chyle cor'puscles or glob'ules, the average size of which is about 1-4600th of an inch. They who regard the chyle to be nothing more than fatty matter of the food apply the term to the emulsified oil in the intestinal canal even before it is taken up by the chyloferous vessels. See Chyme.

Chyme, Chymus, (χυμος, 'juice,' from χρω, 'I pour,') The pulp, formed by the food, mixed with the supradiaphragmatic and gastric secretions, after it has been for some time in the stomach. In this state it continues until it reaches the biliary and pancreatic ducts, which open into the duodenum, where the conversion into chyle occurs, which is absorbed by the chyloferous vessels—the excrementitious portion of the food traversing the large intestine to be evacuated per anum. Castelli asserts that Chyme and Chyle were used in an inverse sense by the ancients to that accepted at present.

A branch of the natural sciences, whose object is to investigate the nature and properties of bodies, simple and compound, inorganic and organized; and to study the force or power by virtue of which every combination is effected. It investigates the action between the integrant molecules or atoms of bodies.

Organ'ic Chymistry, Chymi'a organ'ica, Organochemi'a, is the chymistry of organized substances,—animal and vegetable. Animal Chym'istry, Zoëch'emy or Zoëch'ymy, Zoëchemi'a, is the chymistry of substances afforded by the dead or living animal body. This branch of chymistry has been further subdivided into physiolog'ical, when it considers the changes produced in organized bodies in health,—patholog'ical, when it regards those produced by organic or other diseases. Anthropoch'ymy, Anthropochemi'a, is the chymistry of the human body. Chymistry is called Therapeutical or Pharmaceutical, Pharmacochemi'a, Chymi'a pharmaceutica, when it is engaged in the analysis of simple medicines; in improving the prescribing and preparing of chemical and Galenical medicines; in the means of preparing them, and detecting adulterations, &c. Hygien'ic Chym'istry is that which is applied to the means of rendering habitations healthy, of analyzing the air we breathe, preventing the occurrence of disease, pointing out healthy aliments, and appreciating the influence of professions, &c., on the health of man. All these different subdivisions, with vegetable chymistry, Phytochymistry, are, at times, included under the head of Med'ical Chym'istry; at others, the term comprehends only the Animal, Veg'etable, and Pharmaceutical subdivisions. Vital Chemistry, Biochymi'a, is that which is exerted under the influence of vitality. Histochem'y, Histochemi'a, Histochem'istry, is the chemistry of the tissues, and Phlegmatoch'emy, that of the animal humors.

A knowledge of chemistry is of great importance to the physician. Many of the functions are of a chemical nature: many diseases require a chemical mode of treatment; and, without an acquaintance with it, two or more substances might be given in combination which, by forming a chemical union, might give rise to other compounds, possessing very different virtues from the components taken singly, and thus the prescriber be disappointed in the results.

Likewise, a peculiar sort of moving organs, resembling small hairs, vi'bratory or vi'bratile cil'ia, Cil'ia vibrato'ria, (F.) Cils vibratils, Tromyles, which are attached to special anatomical elements, epithe'liat, vi'bratile, or cil'iary cell'ules, and are visible with the microscope in many animals. These organs are found on parts of the body which are habitually in contact with water, or other more or less fluid matters, and produce motion in these fluids, impelling them along the surface of the parts. Cilia have been found to exist in all vertebrate animals except fishes, having been discovered on the respiratory, uterine, and other membranes of mammalia, birds, and reptiles.

The terms 'vi'bratory motion' and 'cil'iary motion,' (F.) mouvement vibratile ou ciliaire, have been used to express the phenomena exhibited by the moving cilia; and it is probable that this motion is concerned in the progression of fluids along the membranes. As yet, the motion has only been observed in the direction of the outlets of canals.

Ciliaire, Ciliary.

Cil'iaris Riola'ni, (after Riolan, the French anatomist.) Transversely striated muscular fasciculi, in the eyelid, running parallel and close to the margin of the lid.

Cil'iary, Cilia'ris, (F.) Ciliaire. Relating to the eyelashes, or to cilia. This epithet has, also, been applied to different parts, which enter into the structure of the eye; from the resemblance between some of them (ciliary processes) and the eyelashes.

CIL'IARY AR'TERIES, Arte'rie cilia'res, (F.) Ar'tères ciliaires. These are furnished by the ophthalmic artery. They are distinguished into, 1. Short or posterior (Art. uvéales — Chauss.), 30 or 40 in number, which are distributed to the ciliary processes. 2. Long (Art. Iriennes of Chauss.), two in number, which, by the anastomosis of their branches, form two arterial circles at the anterior surface of the iris. 3. The anterior, Arte'rie cilia'ris anterior of Haller, the number of which is variable. These pierce the sclerotic a few lines from its union with the cornea; and are principally distributed to the iris.

CIL'IARY BO'DY, Cor'pus Cil'iarē, Nex'us Stam'in'eus Oculi, Coro'na Cil'iaris, Cil'iary Disc, (F.) Corps ciliaire. A ring of the choroid surrounding the crystalline in the manner of a crown, placed behind the iris and the ciliary circle. It resembles the disk of a radiated flower, and is formed by the union of the ciliary processes. See Ciliary Muscle.

CIL'IARY CANAL, Canal' of Fonta'na. A small, extremely narrow circular space, formed between the ciliary circle, the cornea, and the sclerotic. It can be filled with injection, and it is not certain that it is not the cavity of a blood-vessel, and hence has been called Cir'culus veno'sus i'ridis.

CIL'IARY CIR'CLE, Ciliary ligament — c. Disc, Ciliary body — c. Epithelium, see Epithelium — c. Ganglion, Ophthalmic ganglion.

CIL'IARY LIG'AMENT, C. Cir'cle or Ring, Ligamentum seu Intertit'ium cil'iarē seu I'ridis, Plex'us cil'iaris, An'nulus seu Cir'culus seu Orbic'ulus cil'iaris, A. cellulo'sus, Com'missure of the U'væa, (F.) Commissure de la Choroïde (Ch.), Ligament ou Cercle ciliaire, Cercle de la Choroïde, Ceinture blanche de la Choroïde. A species of grayish ring, of a pulpy consistence, situate between the choroid, iris, and sclerotic. The internal surface of the choroid is uniform, until it approaches within ten lines and a half of the edge of the cornea; here a dentated line is observed, termed o'ra serrat'a. The outer surface presents the an'nulus al'bidus seu gangliiform'is, the anterior edge of which unites to the inner surface of the sclerotic and constitutes the ciliary ligament.

CIL'IARY or TAR'SAL MAR'GIN of the eyelids; (F.) Bord ciliaire. The edge in which the cilia or eyelashes are situate.

CIL'IARY MO'TION, see Ciliary.

CIL'IARY MUS'CLE, Mus'culus cil'iaris. The part of the orbicularis palpebrarum in the vicinity of the ciliary margin. Also, the grayish, semi-transparent structure behind the ciliary ligament, and covering the outside of the ciliary body. By its contraction the ciliary processes, and with them the lens, must be drawn towards the cornea. It appears to be the same muscle as the Ten'sor choroïdæ, Pro'trahens len'tis, Mus'culus Brueckia'nus, Cho'roid mus'cle of some anatomists. Its circular fibres constitute the Compres'sor len'tis of H. Müller.

CIL'IARY NERVES, (F.) Nerfs ciliaires, Nerfs Iriens. These are 12 to 16 in number. They arise from the nasal nerve, and particularly from the anterior part of the ophthalmic ganglion; and unite in two fasciculi, which pass around the optic nerve, and pierce the sclerotic near the entrance of that nerve into the eye. They are lost in the ciliary ligament.

CIL'IARY PLEX'US, C. Ligament.

CIL'IARY PROC'ESSES, Proces'sus seu Ra'dii seu Striæ cil'iaris, (F.) Proces ciliaires, Rayons sous-iriens (Ch.). Triangular folds, sixty or eighty in number, placed at the side of each other, and radiating so as to resemble the disk of a radiated flower. They are lodged in depressions at the anterior part of the vitreous humor. The uses of these processes are not known.

CIL'IARY RING, Ciliary ligament.

CIL'IARY STRIÆ are numerous pale, radiated striæ in the posterior portion of the Cor'pus cil'iaris, but so covered by the Pigmen'tum ni'grum as not to be distinctly seen till the paint is removed. The ciliary processes are formed by these striæ.

CIL'IARY VEINS, (F.) Veines ciliaires, follow nearly the same course as the arteries. In the choroid they are so tortuous, that they have received the name Va'sa vortico'sa. They open into the ophthalmic vein.

CIL'IARY ZONE, Zo'na seu Zo'nula seu Lam'ina Cil'iaris, Membra'na seu Membran'ula Coro'næ Cil'iaris. Under the corpus ciliare, the capsule of the vitreous humor sends off an external lamina, which accompanies the retina, and is inserted, with it, into the fore part of the capsule of the lens, a little before its anterior edge. This is the Zo'nula cil'iaris, Zo'nula Zinnii, Zo'nula or Zone of Zinn, Zone of Haller, Coro'na Cil'iaris, Orbic'ulus Cil'iaris, Pars cil'iaris hyaloï'dea, Ligamen't- tum suspensorium lentis. It is of a striated appearance and circular form, and assists in fixing the lens to the vitreous humor.

Ciliated, Ciliatus, (F.) Cilié. Provided with cilia—as ‘ciliated epithelium,’ the epithelium to which vibratory cilia are attached.

Cimex, gen. Cimicis, C. lectularius, Acan’tia lectularia, Co’ris, Ko’ris. The Bug; Wall, House, or Bed Bug or Chince, (F.) Punaise. Six or seven of these, given internally, are said to have prevented ague! There is scarcely anything which is sufficiently disgusting, that has not been exhibited for this purpose, and with more or less success. The bug has also been esteemed emmenagogue.

Cimicifuga, (cimex, and fugare, ‘to drive away.’) See Actæa racemosa.

Cincho’na or Chinch’na. (So called from the Spanish Viceroy’s lady, the Countess de Chinchon, who was cured of fever by it at Lima, about 1638.) Called also Cor’tex seu Pul’vis Jesu’iticus, Jesu’it’s Bark or Powder, Cor’tex Patrum, because it was introduced into Europe by the Jesuits; also Pul’vis Comitissæ or the Countess’s Powder, and Cardinal del Lu’go’s Powder, Cor’tex Cardina’lis de Lu’go, because he introduced it at Rome; and in France, Tal’bor’s Powder and English remedy, because successfully used there by Sir Robert Talbor, who kept it a secret. It is the pharmacopœial name of several kinds of bark from the various species of Cinchona, from the western coast of South America, containing at least two per cent. of the proper cinchona alkaloids, which yield crystallizable salts. Order, Cinchonaceæ. Sex. Syst. Pentandria Monogynia. The richest in the antiperiodic alkaloids is said to be the bark of Cinchona succirubra of Ecuador, which, with other species, has been transplanted to India, Java, Jamaica, and other countries. The productiveness in alkaloids seems to have been increased by such transplantation. Called, also, Cor’tex, Bark, Peruvian Bark, Cor’tex Chi’næ seu Chi’na, Chinch’na, Pa’lo de Calent’ras, Ki’na Ki’na or Qui’na Qui’na, (Bark of Barks,) Kinki’na, Ci’na Ci’na, Quinquina, Mag’num De’i do’num, (F.) Quinquina; and in Peru Cascara and Cascarilla.

A number of substances of therapeutic interest have been extracted from the barks, the chief of which, quinia, cinchonia, and other alkaloids, exist in combination with Kinic, Cinchonic, or Quinic acid, as Kinates. Quinia is derived largely from the yellow, cinchonia from the pale bark. Quinidia or quinidine is another alkaloid, isomeric with quinia; cinchonidia or cinchonidine with cinchonia; and quinicia or quinicine and cinchonicia or cinchonidine are isomeric with cinchonine and cinchonidia, from which they are derived by heat. (See Quinia, Cinchonia, &c.) Another very bitter substance has also been found in many of the barks, called Kinovic acid. (See Acid, Kinovic.)

CINCHO’NÆ CARIBÆÆ COR’TEx, from Exostem’ma Caribæum, Caribæ’an or Saint Lucia Bark, (F.) Écorce de Saint Lucie, Quinquina Piton, from Exostem’ma or Exostem’ma floribundum; and the Pitaya Bark, Quinquina bi’color, from an exostema [?] or from strychnos pseudoquina [?], are useful substitutes for the cinchona of Peru. These are the most important spurious barks. They contain neither quinia nor cinchonia.

CINCHO’NÆ CORDIFO’LIÆ COR’TEx, Cor’tex flavus, Cincho’næ officina’lis cor’tex flavus, Chi’na re’gia seu Calisay’a, Cincho’na Calisaya, C. Flava (U. S. Phar.), Cor’tex Chi’næ re’gius seu flavus seu lu’teus, Yellow, Royal or Calisay’a cinchona Bark, (F.) Quinquina jaune ou jaune royal, Calasaya. Odor aromatic; taste strong, bitter, astringent. Not rolled; often without the epidermis, which is very thick and inert; light, friable; fracture fibrous. Active principle Qui’nia. The false or spurious Calisaya barks are those of Cinchona Calisaya, variety Josephia’na; C. Bolivi’ana, C. ova’ta, variety rufiner’vis, called, in Peru, Cascaril’la Carabay’a—the Carabay’a bark of commerce;—of C. scrobiculata, two varieties, Cusco bark and Bark of St. Ann; or of C. pubescens, which furnishes the Cusco or Ari’ca bark, and of C. amygdalifo’lia.

CINCHO’NA EXCEL’Sa, of India, Hymenodie’tyon Excelsum, was supposed to possess the antiperiodic virtues of the true cinchona; but it does not contain any quinia or cinchonia. The bitter principle rather resembles that of the horsechestnut.

CINCHO’NÆ LANCIFO’LIÆ COR’TEx, Cor’tex Peruvia’nus seu pallidus, Cincho’næ officina’lis cor’tex communis, Cincho’na pallida (U. S. Phar.), Pale Cincho’na Bark, Pale, Lox’a, or Crown Bark, (F.) Quinquina gris de Loza, Quinquina Orange. The bark of Cincho’na Condamine’a and C. mierantha. Its odor is aromatic; taste pleasant, bitter, and astringent. The pieces are rolled in double or single quills. Epidermis brown, cracked; fracture resinous. Internally of a cinnamon color. Its active principle is Cincho’nia.

CINCHO’NÆ OBLONGIFO’LIÆ COR’TEx, Cor’tex ru’ber, Cincho’næ officina’lis cor’tex ru’ber, Cincho’na Ru’bra (U. S. Phar.), Red Cinchona Bark, Red Bark, (F.) Quinquina rouge, (S.) Cascarilla roxa and C. colorada, of S. America. Odor and taste the same as the pale, but more intense; in large flat pieces, solid, heavy, dry; fracture short and smooth; of a deep brownish-red color. This variety of bark is assigned to the Cincho'na oblongifolia and C. Succirubra; but in the Ph. U.S., 1873, to the latter alone. Active principles, Cincho'nia and Qui'nia.

The last three are the only official varieties in the Pharmacopœia of the United States. There are many other varieties, however, which are genuine cinchona barks, and yet have not been considered worthy of an official position. The Edinburgh Pharmacopœia admitted, indeed, Cincho'na cine'rea, Gray bark, Silver bark or Huanuco or Li'ma bark, which is obtained around Huanuco in Peru, and, with the Jaen or Ash bark and the Huamili's bark, belongs to the class of pale or Loxa barks. Among the genuine but inferior barks are those brought from the northern Atlantic ports of South America, which in commerce are variously called Pitay'a, Bogota', Cartagena, Maracay'bo, and San'ta Mar'tha barks. The Bogota is also called Fusagasuga and Coquetta bark.

All these barks are bitter, astringent, tonic, and eminently febrifuge. The yellow bark has been thought equal to any of the others, but the red contains more active principle. The discovery of their alkaloids is one of the most important gifts of modern chemistry. Still in pernicious intermittents the bark in substance is often demanded. It is employed in every disease in which there is deficient tone; but in cases where the stomach is much debilitated, the powder had better be avoided, in consequence of the woody fibre, which might disagree. Externally it is used in enemata, gargles, &c., and in gangrenous ulcerations. When it excites nausea, an aromatic may be added to it; if purging, opium; if costiveness, rhubarb, &c. Dose, ʒss. to ʒj. or more. Bark jackets were formerly employed, especially in the agues of children, consisting of waistcoats with powdered cinchona quilted between the layers.

Cinchonidine and its sulphate possess the same medical properties as cinchona and its salts. Dose, gr. v. to gr. xv.

Cinch'onine, Cinchoni'na, Cinch'onin, Cincho'nia. The active principle of Cincho'na lancifolia. An organic, crystalline alkali; of a white color, and bitter, slightly astringent taste; very soluble in alcohol and ether, but almost insoluble in water.

Cincho'niæ Sul'phas, Sul'phate of Cincho'nia, (F.) Sulfate de Cinchonine, which is formed directly from cinchona, by dissolving cinchona, obtained from the mother-water remaining after the crystallization of sulphate of quinia by precipitation by means of solution of soda; treating it frequently with alcohol to remove other alkaloids; adding sulphuric acid to saturation, boiling with animal charcoal, and crystallizing—is soluble in water and alcohol. The action of the sulphate of cinchona is similar to that of the sulphate of quinia; but it is less energetic, and consequently requires to be given in larger dose.

The Flowers of the Orange, Auran'tii flores, Flo'res na'phæ, are highly odoriferous, and used as a perfume. On distillation, they yield a small quantity of essential oil—O'leum Auran'tii, O'leum seu Essen'tia Nero'li, Nero'li—with spirit and water, the A'qua Auran'tii Flo'rum (Ph. U. S., 1873), Auran'tii flo'ris a'qua, A'qua auran'tii, Or'ange-flow'er wa'ter, (F.) Eau distillée de Fleur d'Orange. They were once used in convulsive and epileptic cases. The leaves, Fo'lia Auran'tii, have a bitterish taste, and furnish an essential oil. They have been used for the same purposes as the flowers. The yellow rind of the fruit, Auran'tii Cor'tex (Ph. U. S., 1842), Ci'trus Bigara'dia (Ph. B., 1867), Bigarade, or Bitter Or'ange, Or'ange Peel, is an aromatic bitter, and is used in dyspepsia, and where that class of remedies is required. The Juice, Suc'cus Auran'tii, Or'ange juice, is a grateful acid, and used as a beverage in febrile and scorbutic affections.

Limonia Ac'ida*, Ci'trea Ma'lus, Ci'trus, (F.) Citron, Cédrat, has a fragrant odor, depending upon the essential oil, O'leum Limonis, of the rind. The outer rind, Cor'tex Limonum, Limonis Cor'tex (Ph. U. S.), Lem'on Peel, Zest, Flave'do Cor'ticum Ci'tri, is used in the same cases as the Cor'tex Auran'tii.

The Juice, Ci'trion, Limonis Suc'cus (Ph. U. S.), Limo'num Suc'cus, (F.) Suc du Limon, Suc de Ci'tron, is sharp, but gratefully acid, the acidity depending upon the citric acid it contains, and is given as a refrigerant beverage in febrile affections. In doses of half an ounce to an ounce, three times a day, it has appeared to some to exert a sedative influence on the circulation, and has been given, apparently with benefit, in acute rheumatism and rheumatic gout. Alone, or combined with wine, it is prescribed in scurvy, putrid sore throat, &c. Its general properties are refrigerant and antiseptic. Sweetened and diluted, it forms Lemonade. Artific'ial lem'onjuice is made by dissolving an ounce of citric acid in fourteen fluidounces of water; adding a few drops of essence of lemon.

Lemon'peel tea or wa'ter is made by paring the rind of one lemon, previously rubbed with half an ounce of sugar: the peelings and sugar are then put into a jar, and a quart of boiling water is poured over them. When cold, the fluid must be poured off, and a tablespoonful of lemon juice be added. It is an agreeable drink in fevers.

Ci'tron Tree is likewise considered to belong to the same species—Ci'trus Med'ica. Its fruit is called cedrome'la. It is larger and less succulent than the lemon. Ci'tron juice, when sweetened with sugar, is called by the Italians Agro di Cedro.

The vicinity of Clifton and of Bristol, England, appears to be the mildest and driest climate in the west of England; and, consequently, the best winter residence in that part of the country for invalids. Cli'ma, gen. Cli'matis, (κlima,) Climate.

Climac'teric or Climacter'ic, Climacter'icus,

Climacteric, Climactericus, (κλιμακτηρ, 'a step,') (F.) Climactérique or Climatérique. A word which properly signifies 'by degrees.' It has been applied to certain times of life, regarded to be critical; but is now chiefly applied to certain periods of life, at which great changes occur, independently of any numerical estimate of years. Such are the period of puberty in both sexes; that of the cessation of the menses in women, &c.

CLIMACTERIC YEARS, An'ni Climacterici, are, according to some, all those in the life of man which are multiples of the number 7, Septenniads. Others have applied the term to years, resulting from the multiplication of 7 by an odd number. Some have admitted only three climacterics; others, again, have extended them to multiples of 9. Most, however, have considered the 63d year to be the Grand Climacteric;—63 being the product of the multiplication of 7 by 9, and all have thought that the period of three, seven, or nine, which they respectively adopted, was necessary to the entire renewal of the body; so that there was, at these times, in the economy, none of the parts of which it had previously consisted. The climacteric years have also been called, Anni hebdomad'ici, scala'res, grada'rii, scan'siles, genethli'aci, natalit'ii, fata'les, crit'ici, decreto'rii, hero'ici, &c. All the notions on the subject are essentially allied to the doctrine of numbers of Pythagoras.

Climatal, Climatic.

Climate, Cl'ima, Inclima'tio cœ'li, (F.) Climat, (κλίμα, 'a region,') In a hygienic point of view, climate means, since Hippocrates, a country or region which may differ from another in respect to season, qualities of the soil, heat of atmosphere, &c. It embraces, in a general manner, all the physical circumstances belonging to each region—circumstances which exert considerable influence on living beings. The dark complexion of the inhabitants of the torrid zone is easily distinguishable from the paleness of those of the frigid,—so are the diseases. They are all modified, more or less, by climate or locality. Hot climates predispose to abdominal complications in febrile affections; cold climates to thoracic, &c.

One of the most important considerations with regard to climates is their comparative fitness for the residence of invalids, and especially of those who are liable to, or suffering under, bronchitis or consumptive affections. The great object, in such cases, is to select a climate which will admit of regular and daily exercise in the open air, so that the invalid may derive every advantage which this form of revulsion is capable of effecting. To an inhabitant of the northern and middle portions of the United States—and the same applies to Great Britain, France, and the northern parts of the old world—a more southern climate alone has generally been considered to afford these advantages in an eminent degree. During the summer months there are few, if any, diseases, which require a milder climate than that of the United States, or of the milder districts of Europe. The temperature of the winter months is, consequently, the most important object of attention. Equability of temperature is essential, inasmuch as all sudden changes interfere with the great desideratum—exercise in the open air. In North America the changes are very sudden and extensive. So far, therefore, as this applies, the American climate is not well adapted to the invalid. In the southern portions, however, of the Union, this objection is counterbalanced by many advantages; and in the North there are many situations which afford a favorable residence to the valetudinarian during the winter. Observation has, indeed, shown, that in Minnesota, at Mackinac, and in Canada, where the air, although very cold, is dry, a sojourn there has proved at least as efficacious as in the warmer climate of the southern portion of the United States, or of Cuba; and hence, many invalids, instead of subjecting themselves to the inconveniences of temporary expatriation, pass the winter in Minnesota, for example. From the Army Reports, it would seem that the dry air of New Mexico is especially favorable to those who are threatened with consumption.

The following tables exhibit the mean temperature of the year, and of the different seasons—with the mean temperature of the warmest and coldest months at different places in America, Europe, Africa, &c., as deduced from the excellent paper of Von Humboldt on Isothermal Lines, the Meteorological Registers kept by the surgeons of the United States army, under the direction of Surgeon Generals Lovell and Lawson, 1822 to 1860, the work of Sir James Clark on Climate, &c., &c. Full and, doubtless, accurate details, as regards the climate of different portions of the United States, are contained in the "Army Meteorological Register for Five Years, from January, 1855, to January, 1860"—an appendix to the "Statistical Report on the Sickness and Mortality in the Army of the U. S. from January, 1855, to January, 1860: prepared under the direction of Surgeon-general Lawson, by Dr. R. H. Coolidge."

Certain of the following tables show the mean monthly temperature, maximum, minimum, and range, as well as the greatest daily, and mean daily range during the corresponding months—but of different years—at some of the prominent retreats for the valetudinarian in Great Britain, on the continent of Europe, and in the African islands. It is proper, however, to remark, that in no situations, except in those to which an asterisk is affixed, was the register thermometer used. In the others, the observations were made during the day only, and consequently the numbers given are far below the real range throughout the twenty-four hours. The places are ranged in the order of their mean temperature.

In the United States, one of the most favorable regions for the phthisical invalid was considered to be Florida. St. Augustine was frequently chosen, but it is liable to north-east storms, which interfere with the outdoor movements of the valetudinarian, and are the source of much discomfort. Still, great benefit has often been derived from it as a winter residence. Of the Atlantic Isles, Madeira appears to be best adapted for the consumptive, and those affected with chronic bronchitis. In Italy, Rome and Pisa, — and in England, Torquay and Undercliff, are to be preferred. Chronic rheumatism and gout are benefited by a warm climate, which, again, is unfavorable to those who are predisposed to cerebral diseases, especially to such as are characterized by debility and mobility of the nervous system — as paralysis, epilepsy, mania, &c. Hypochondriasis and dyspepsia require rather change of climate and travelling exercise than a sojourn in any one. (See the Author's Human Health, Philada., 1844).

Coffea Arab'ica, Caff'e'a (Ph. U. S., 1873), C. vulga'ris, Jas'minum Arab'icum, (F.) Cafier, Caféier, and Cafeyer. Order, Rubiaceæ. Sez. Syst. Pentandria Monogynia. The plant which affords coffee, Choava, Bon, Buno, (F.) Café. Originally from Yemen.

The infusion of coffee is an agreeable and wholesome article of diet. It is, to a certain extent, a tonic, and is employed as such in convalescence, especially from fevers, &c. In cases of poisoning by opium, and in old asthmas, its use has been extolled. For this purpose the Moka is the best. It ought to be newly torrefied, but not too much burnt; should be strong, and drunk soon after grinding.

A highly nitrogenized alkaloid was first found in coffee, and called Caff'cin, Caff'cin, or Caff'e'a. It was afterwards discovered in the leaves of the tea plant, and called The'in, and in the Guarana of Brazil, and called Guaran'in. In doses of from 2 to 10 grains, it induces violent nervous and vascular excitement. Caff'cin—as well as its various salts—the citrate, lactate, malate, and muriate—has been given as an antiperiodic in grain doses.

Facit'ious Coffees have been, from time to time, recommended, but they are infinitely inferior to the genuine. Various substitutes have been proposed;—wheat, barley, hollyberries, acorus, sunflower seeds, beech-mast, peas, beans, succory-root, seeds of gooseberries and currants left in making wine, and washed, sliced turnips, &c.

These have been roasted, with the addition of a little butter or oil; but they have not the aroma of coffee. The best substitute is said to be the seeds of the Yellow water flag, Gladiolus luteus or Iris pseudacorus.

Hunt's Economical Breakfast Powder consisted of rye, roasted with a little butter.

The taste is acrid, excoriating the mouth, but the acrimony is lost by drying. It is narcotic, diuretic, and cathartic; and has been given in dropsy, gout, and rheumatism. Dose, gr. j. to vj. of the fresh bulb. It is supposed to be the active ingredient of the Eau Médicinale d'Husson. The active principle is called Colchic'ia or Col'chicine. Colchic'eine or Colchic'cin, has also been obtained from it. Colchicum, in an overdose, is an acro-narcotic poison.

Dr. Wilson's Tincture for the Gout is said to be merely a tincture of the seeds, or of Colchic'ia.

Cold, (Sax. cold,) Fri'gus, Psy'chus, (F.) Froid. The sensation produced by the abstraction of caloric from our organs,—Cheim'a, Chi'mon. See Heat.

Three degrees of cold are generally distinguished in disease. 1. The simple feeling of cold (Al'gor), 2. Chil'iness (Horror), and 3. Shiv'ering (Ri'gor). Cold is employed in medicine, chiefly, as a refrigerant and sedative.

Cold is, also, vaguely and indefinitely used for a morbid affection supposed to be induced by cold. 'To take cold,' (F.) s'enrhumer, is to be affected by a disease presumed to be caused by cold. Nosologically, it has no definite meaning. See Catarrh and Coryza.

COL'IC ARTERIES, Arte'rie col'icæ, (F.) Artères Coliques, are six in number, three of which, given off by the superior mesenteric, are called Col'icæ dex'træ; and three, proceeding from the inferior mesenteric, Col'icæ sinis'træ. All proceed towards the colon, passing between the two laminae of the peritoneum, which form the mesocolon, where they ramify and anastomose with each other. The first, Col'ica dex'tra, Ramus col'icus dex'ter, is called C. dex'tra supe'rior, (Mésocolique, Ch.) The second, C. dex'tra me'dia, Col'ica me'dia, Ramus col'icus me'dius, Arte'ria me'dia anastomot'ica, (C. droite, Ch.) and the third, C. dex'tra infe'rior or Ileocol'ica, (A. écalle, Ch.) Of the three Col'icæ sinis'træ, the first or supe'rior is called, by Chaussier, Col'ica mag'na sinis'tra; the second or me'dia is not distinguished from the preceding, as they often arise from a common trunk; and the third is called by Chaussier Col'ica par'va sinis'tra. To these arteries as many veins correspond, which open into the great and little mesenteric.

COL'IC, (κωλικη νόσος,) Col'ica, *C. In its etymological accep-tation, Colic signifies an affection or pain in the colon. But it is employed in a more extensive signification. It includes every acute pain of the abdomen, aggravated at intervals. The word has often, however, epithets affixed to it which render it more or less precise. See Tormina.

COL'ICA BILIO'SA, Bil'ious Col'ic, (F.) Colique Biliense. Colic, occasioned by an accumulation of bile in the intestines or in its own passages. The treatment required resembles that proper for Colica convulsiva.

COL'ICA CALLO'SA. Colic attended with sense of stricture in some parts of the intestinal canal; often with flatulency and pain; the flatus gradually passing off by the stricture; the bowels tardy; and at length discharging small liquid stools.

It is characterized by griping pain in the bowels, chiefly about the navel, with vomiting and costiveness — the pain increasing at intervals. The indications are to clear the intestines, and allay spasm. Calomel and opium — castor oil and opium — emollient and cathartic enemata, with fomentations, wet or dry, to the abdomen, usually succeed.

Colic, arising from an accumu-lation of air in the intestines. It is very common in infants, and may be relieved by aromatics, especially when combined with antacids, — for ex-ample, oil of aniseed with magnesia.

COL'ICA HÆMORRHOÏDA' LIS, Hemorrhoid'al Col'ic, (F.) Colique hémorrhôdale. A kind of colic supposed to precede hemorrhoids or to supervene on their suppression.

Under this head is generally described the colic produced by lead, as well as the other colics mentioned in the synonymy; and they certainly resemble each other greatly, although some of them are more like bilious colic. There is not much to distinguish this variety of colic from others. The same violent pain about the navel is present, with retraction of the abdomen towards the spine. It is apt also to occasion palsy. The only difference of treatment is in the necessity for employing more opium along with the purgative. The paralytic sequelæ must be met by change of air, rubbing the spine, exercise, &c. Treating the disease upon general principles is infinitely more philosophical, and more successful than the former empirical management at La Charité, Paris, which it is unnecessary to detail.

The Col'ic of Madrid, of Poi'tou, Dev'onshire, Nor'mandy, &c., has been called veg'etable col'ic, (F.) Colique végétale, because ascribed to the use of new wine or cider, unripe fruit, &c., although really, perhaps, owing to the adulteration of wines and cider by litharge. All the symptoms, indeed, are those of Colica metallica.

CO'LICA NEPHRET'ICA seu Nephrit'ica, Nephro-col'ica, Col'ica rena'lis, Nephret'ic or Nephrit'ic or Renal Col'ic, (F.) Colique Néphrétique. Acute pains, which accompany nephritis, and especially calculous nephritis, or the passage of a calculus into the ureter.

U. S., 1873), (F.) Fulmicoton, Coton-poudre, Poudre-coton, Coton fulminant, Coton azotique, in a mixture of rectified ether and alcohol, in the proportion of about 16 parts of the former to 1 of the latter. Pyroxylon (Ph. U. S., 1873) is formed by mixing nitric acid, $\frac{3}{4}$ liiss., and sulphuric acid, $\frac{3}{4}$ iv., gradually, and when the temperature falls to 90° adding cotton (freed from impurities). With a glass rod, imbue it thoroughly with the acid, macerate, wash with cold and then with boiling water, drain and dry. The Ph. B., 1867, has a different formula for gun-cotton under the name of Pyrox'ylin. The last edition of the U. S. Pharmacopœia (1873) contains a new formula for the preparation of Colloidion (Pyrox'yl, gr. cc., Æther. Fortior., $\frac{3}{4}$ xiiss., Alcohol. Fortior., $\frac{3}{4}$ liiss.) When applied to a part, the ether evaporates, and the solid adhesive material is left, which contracts. Hence it is used in cases of wounds, to keep their edges together. It forms, also, a coating, and has been applied in abrasions, and in cases of burns. In various chronic cutaneous diseases, it has been applied with advantage; and has been employed to give a coating to pills, which it deprives of their taste, without interfering with their action.

Various non-official preparations of Colloidion have been employed, formulæ for several of which are herewith given.

COLLO'DION, CANTHAR'IDAL, Collo'dion with Canthar'ides, Collo'dium cum Cantharide (Ph. U. S., 1873), Vesic'ans seu cantharida'lē seu cantharida'tum, Li'quor vesic'ans. The last edition of the U. S. Pharmacopœia (1873) contains a new formula for its preparation. (Cantharidis pulv., $\frac{3}{4}$ vij., Pyrox'yl., gr. c., Terebinth. Canadensis, gr. cccxx., Ol. Ricini, gr. clx., Æther. Fortior., Oiss., Alcohol. Fortior., q. s. The flies are exhausted successively by ether and alcohol, by percolation, the ethereal solution set aside, the alcoholic allowed to evaporate until reduced from eight ounces to one, the two liquids then mixed, and the other ingredients added.)

By painting the surface with a little of this solution, vesication is produced, as with the plaster of cantharides.

COLLO'DION, CAUS'TIC, is prepared by dissolving 4 parts of corrosive sublimate in 30 of colloidion, and has been used for destroying nævi materni.

COLLO'DION, FLEX'IBLE, Collo'dium Flex'ile (Ph. U. S., 1873), is a mixture of colloidion, Canada turpentine, and castor oil. The other ingredients give to the colloidion softness and elasticity.

COLLO'DION, GLYC'ERIZED. A mixture of glycerine and colloidion, which accommodates itself to the motions of the part, and does not crack when applied.

COLLO'DION, I'ODIZED. A mixture of iodine, gr. x.—xx., in colloidion, $\frac{3}{4}$ j., proposed to obtain rapidly the effects of iodine, especially on tumors.

COLLO'DION, MERCU'RIAL, Caus'tic Colloidion. This is prepared by dissolving corrosive sublimate in colloidion—say in the proportion of one part of the former to six of the latter. It has been used in cases of nævi; and, more diluted, in different cutaneous affections, syphilitic discolorations, for example; also, to prevent pitting in small-pox.

COLLO'DION, RIC'INATED, see Colloidion, terebinthinated.

COLLO'DION, TEREBINTH'INATED, or RIC'INATED, Collo'dium terebinthina'tum seu ricina'tum, (F.) Colloidion terebinthiné ou riciné. An epithet applied to a product of morbid secretion, resembling glue, or particles of jelly inlaid in a regular alveolar bed. The three species of cancer or carcinoma, are,—Encephaloid, Scirrhus, and Colloid; see Cancer. The term Colloid has, also, been given by Professor Graham to a substance, as gum, gelatin, or albumen, which, in solution, passes with difficulty, or not at all, through minutely porous septa.

COL'LOID DEGEN'ERATION, Colloid Softening. A metamorphosis of the albuminous constituents of cells into a colloid or jelly-like substance.

COL'LOID, STYP'TIC, Xylostyp'tic ether. A name given by Dr. B. W. Richardson, of London, to a compound fluid for instant and ready use in the dressing of wounded surfaces, which is at the same time styptic, antiseptic, and a complete means of excluding wounded, abraded, or ulcerated parts from air.

It consists in saturating ether with tannin and gun cotton, and may be applied with a brush, or mixed with an equal quantity of ether, in the form of spray. It may also be made by adding together collodion, carbolic acid, tannin, and benzoic acid.

The ancients designated, by this term, a solid medicine, of a long, cylindrical shape, proper to be introduced into the vagina, anus, or nostril. They are said to have given it this name because it was shaped like a Rat's Tail, and because there entered into its composition powders and glutinous matters. At the present day, Collyrium means an application to the eye. Some are pulverulent and dry, Ophthalmempas'mata, Collyr'ia sic'ca, but the greatest part are liquid, Hygrocollyr'ia; and receive different epithets, as astringent, emollient, &c. Col'ors, Accident'al, Op'posite col'ors, Com-plemen'tary or Harmon'ic col'ors, (F.) Couleurs Complémentaires. If the eye has been for some time regarding a particular color, the retina becomes insensible to this color; and if, afterwards, it is turned to a sheet of white paper, the paper will not seem to be white, but will be of the color that arises from the union of all the rays of the solar spectrum, except the one to which the retina has become insensible. Thus, if the eye be directed for some time to a red wafer, the sheet of paper will seem to be of a bluish-green, in a circular spot of the same dimensions as the wafer.

This bluish-green image is called an oc'ular spec'trum, because it is impressed upon the eye and may be retained for a short time; and the color bluish-green, is said to be the accidental color of the red. If this experiment be made with wafers of different colors, other accidental colors will be observed, varying with the color of the wafer employed, as in the following table:

Color of the Wafer.	Accidental color, or color of the ocular spectrum.
Red	Bluish-green.
Orange	Blue.
Yellow	Indigo.
Green	Violet with a little red.
Blue	Orange-red.
Indigo	Orange-yellow.
Violet	Yellow-green.
Black	White.
White	Black.

If all the colors of the spectrum be ranged in a circle, in the proportions they hold in the spectrum itself, the accidental color of any particular color will be found directly opposite. Hence, the two colors have been termed op'posite col'ors. It will follow from what has been said, that if the primary color, or that to which the eye has been first directed, be added to the accidental color, the result must be the same impression as that produced by the union of all the rays of the spectrum — white light. The accidental color, in other words, is what the primitive color requires to make it white light. The primitive and accidental colors are, therefore, com'plements of each other; and hence accidental colors have also been called complemen'tary col'ors. They have likewise been termed harmon'ic, because the primitive and its accidental color harmonize with each other in painting.

The first milk after accouchement. It contains more serum and butter, and less casein than common milk, and seems to possess a laxative property, which renders it fit to aid in the expulsion of the meconium.

Chemical analysis of the colostrum and the normal milk of woman, according to Simon, gives the following results:

	Colostrum.	Normal Milk

It is said to have occurred in the aged, and in those that were fat and hard drinkers. In such, Dr. Traill has found a considerable quantity of oil in the serum of the blood. Vieq d'Azyr, Lair, and Dupuytren think it necessary that the body should be placed in contact with an ignited substance. Le Cat, Kopp, and Marc are of opinion that this is not necessary. The former appears to be the more probable view.

Complex'ion, Complex'io. Often employed, in English, for the color of the face, as 'a good complexion,' — a 'sallow complexion,' &c. It formerly had a more extensive signification, and still has in France. It signifies the aggregate of physical characters presented by any individual, considered with respect to his external arrangement or condition. It means more than constitution, for which it is used synonymously in many cases; and differs from temperament, which is less the external condition of the body than the state or disposition of the organs in health.

Compresseur de Dupuytren, Compressor of Dupuytren — c. du Nez, Compressor nasi — c. de la Prostate, Compressor prostatæ.

Compressif, Compressive.

Compres'sio, (same etymon as Compress), Compression, Thlipsis.

Compres'sion, Compres'sio, (same etymon.) Pressure; methodical compression. An agent frequently had recourse to in surgery. We com-press a limb, affected with œdema, varices, hydrops articuli, callous ulcer, &c. The abdomen is com-pressed after delivery, after paracentesis abdomi-nis, &c. The compression is produced by means of the roller, laced stocking, &c., according to the part, and to the particular case. Moderate pres-sure aids the contractility of parts, and modifies their nutritive action; so that large tumors at times disappear after it has been used for some time. A greater degree of pressure occasions, still more, the emaciation of the part, but it is apt to impede the circulation. Pressure is often used to stop or moderate the flow of blood in cases of aneurism or wounds of arteries and veins. In such cases, the compression may be immediate, when applied upon the artery itself, or it may be mediate, when applied through the integuments and soft parts. The French use the term Compression immédiate latérale for that which is exerted perpendicularly to the axis of a vessel, so as to flatten its sides. It is practised with the finger, forceps, tourniquet, &c.

Methodical Compression is pressure applied secundum artem. Digital Compression is pressure made by the fingers.

COMPRES'SION OF THE BRAIN. This may arise either from coagula of blood, a soft tumor, a bony excrescence, a depressed portion of the skull, or the presence of some foreign body. The effects vary, according as the compression takes place suddenly or gradually. When suddenly, the symptoms are of the comatose or apoplectic character. When gradually, mania, convulsions, &c., are more likely to occur. Compression, arising from a depressed portion of skull, requires the use of the trephine, but surgical interference is not always practical or judicious. In local suppuration, however, when the matter is collected between the bone and dura mater, or in the cavity of the arachnoid, good results may follow from puncturing.

Compres'sive, Compressivus, (F.) Compressif. That which compresses. A compressive bandage is one that compresses the parts to which it is applied.

Compres'sor Bul'bi, Accelerator urinæ.

COMPRES'SOR OR COMPRESSORIUM OF DUPUYTREN, (F.) Compresseur de Dupuytren. An instrument for compressing the femoral artery, invented by Dupuytren. It is constructed on the same principles as the tourniquet of J. L. Petit, from which it only differs in this respect;—that, instead of being maintained in its place by a strap, which always compresses more or less the circumference of the limb, the two pads are placed at the extremities of a semicircle of steel, which, by passing from one to the other without touching the parts, limits the pressure to two opposite points of the thigh, and permits the collateral circulation to go on.

(Other forms of compressors have been devised for application to arteries, descriptions of which may be found in systematic works on Surgery.)

COMPRES'SOR LEN'TIS, see Ciliary muscle.

COMPRES'SOR NA'RIS, Rinæ'us, Nasa'lis, Transversalis Na'ri, Myrtiformis, Dilatores alarum na'ri, Constrictor Na'ri seu Na'rrium seu Na'ris, Triangula'ris Na'ri, (F.) COMPRES'SOR SAC'culi LARYNGIS, see Sacculus Laryngis.

COMPRES'SOR URE'THRAE. A muscle consisting of two portions—one of which is transverse in its direction, and, in consequence of its having been particularly described by Mr. Guthrie, has been called Guthrie's muscle. It arises from the ramus of the ischium, and passes inwards to embrace the membranous urethra. The other portion is perpendicular, descending from the pubis and passing down to be inserted into the transverse portion of the muscle;—Pu'bio-urethra'lis. This portion has been considered by many to be only the anterior fibres of the levator ani; and having been described by Mr. Wilson, it has been called Wilson's muscle.

COMPRES'SOR VE'NÆ DORSALIS PE'NIS. A small muscle distinctly seen in animals, less distinctly in man, which arises from the ramus of the pubis, and ascending in a direction forwards is inserted above the vena dorsalis, joining with its fellow of the opposite side on the mesial line. Its use is supposed to compress the vein in erection. It is sometimes called the muscle of Hous'ton, after Dr. Houston of Dublin.

It is applied, also, to the pulsation of arteries, when not easily felt under the finger. Pouls Concentré is a term applied by the French to a pulse of the above character.

The impregnation of the ovum by the positive contact of the male sperm, whence results a new being. The whole subject of conception is most mysterious. It seems to occur as follows:—During the sexual union, the male sperm passes along the uterus and Fallopian tubes: the fimbriated extremities of the latter seize hold of the ovarium: and the sperm in this manner comes in contact with a matured ovum, and impregnates it. The fecundated ovum remains some time in the ovarium, but at length bursts its covering, is laid hold of by the fimbriated extremity of the Fallopian tubes, and passes along the tube into the cavity of the uterus, where it remains for the full period of utero-gestation. Some are of opinion that the ovum is not impregnated until it has entered the Fallopian tube, or uterus.

Con'cha, Conchus, (κογχη, κογχος, 'a concave shell.') A liquid measure, among the Athenians, equal to half an ounce. Concre'tion, Concre'tio, Concremen'tum, (concrecere, concretum, 'con, and crescere, 'to condense, thicken, become solid,') Pex'is, Symplex'is, (F.) Concretion. The act of becoming thick or solid. It was once used synonymously with adhesion or growing together—as 'concretion of the toes.' Most commonly, it is applied to extraneous and inorganic bodies, of a solid character, met with in different textures, after certain chronic inflammations; or which make their appearance in the joints or in the reservoirs for excrementitious fluids. Concretion is, therefore, frequently synonymous with Calculus, and is then rendered, in Latin, by the word Concrementum. But Concretion has a more extensive signification than Calculus; thus, accidental ossifications or deposits of phosphates of lime in certain organs, and especially in the liver and lungs, are properly called osseous concretions. They could not well be called osseous calculi.

CONCRE'TION, FI'BRINOUS, SANGUINE'OUS, POL'YPIFORM, or POL'YPOUS, OF THE HEART, see Poly-pus—c. Intestinalis, Calculus of the Stomach and Intestines—c. Ossiforme, see Osteoid.

Commotion.* In Surgery, it is used for the agitation often communicated to one organ by a fall upon another; as to the brain from a fall on the breech, &c.

In all severe injuries, in sudden encephalic hemorrhage, and in overwhelming emotions, a concussion or shock is felt to a greater or less extent in the nervous system, which requires the careful attention of the physician.

CONCUS'SION OF THE BRAIN, Commo'tio Cer'e'brî, Apoplex'ia nervo'sa traumati'ca, Encephalosis'mus, (F.) Commotion du Cerveau, sometimes gives rise to alarming symptoms, even to abolition of the functions of the brain, yet without any sensible organic disease. Slight concussion of the brain, called stunning, consists in vertigo; tinnitus aurium, loss of memory, and stupefaction; all these being temporary. When more severe, there is instant loss of sensation and volition, vomiting, the patient being as if in a sound sleep, but there is no stertorous breathing; pulse variable, generally more rapid and feeble than in compression; extremities cold. Little can be done here till reaction has occurred: after this, the case must be treated according to general principles,—by bleeding, blisters, cold applied to the head, &c. After severe concussion, a patient, although apparently well, is not safe till some time after the accident.

The violent concussion of the spine, often produced by railway accidents, and the disabling effects thereof, have been collectively termed the Railway Spine.

Con'diment, Condimentum, Ar'tyma, Hedys'ma, Conditu'ra, (condire, conditum, 'to season,') (F.) Assaisonnement. Some substances are called, at times, aliments, and at others, condiments, according as they constitute the basis or the accessory to any dish: such are cream, butter, mushrooms, olives, &c. Others are always condiments, as they are only used to improve the savor of food, and contain little or no nutritive matter. Such are pepper, salt, cinnamon, &c. Almost all condiments are possessed of stimulant properties.

The intestinum cæcum of a sheep, soaked for some hours in water, turned inside out, macerated again in weak, alkaline ley, changed every twelve hours, and scraped carefully to abstract the mucous membrane, leaving the peritoneal and muscular coats exposed to the vapor of burning brimstone, and afterwards washed with soap and water. It is then blown up, dried, cut to the length of seven or eight inches, and bordered at the open end with a riband. It is drawn over the penis prior to coition, to prevent venereal infection and pregnancy.

Condylarthro'sis, (κονδύλος, 'a condyle,' and arthron, 'a joint,') Articulation by condyles. An elongated head or condyle, received into an elliptical cavity.

Con'dyle, Con'dylē, Con'dylus, Capit'ulum, (κονδύλος, 'a knot, eminence,') An articular eminence, round in one direction, flat in the other. A kind of process, met with more particularly in the ginglymoid joints; such as the condyles of the occipital, inferior maxillary bone, &c. Some anatomists have applied the term, however, to eminences that are not articular — as to the lateral tuberosities at the inferior extremity of the os humeri, and even to certain depressions — as to the concave articular surfaces at the upper extremity of the tibia. Chaussier calls the transverse root of the zygomatic process Condyle of the temporal bone. See Humerus.

They are four in number, seated in the occipital bone; two anterior and two posterior to the condyles or condyl'oid processes of the same bone, and to depressions, which are called Fossæ Condyl'oides.

As the word Condyl'oidien means 'that which has the shape of a condyle,' it has been judiciously proposed by some French anatomists that condylien should be used in preference, in the cases of the foramina and fossæ.

Condyl'oidien, see Condyl'oid foramina.

A good constitution is one in which every organ is well developed, and endowed with due energy, so that all perform their functions with equal facility. Any want of equilibrium in their development and energy forms a difference in the constitution. We say that a man is of a good or robust, a delicate or weak constitution, when he is commonly healthy, or commonly laboring under, or unusually susceptible of disease.

A sporadic disease is said to be 'constitutional,' when it arises from some tendency to morbid development impressed on the cells of nutrition, but independently of any communication from without. See Cachectic. By some, this epithet has been given to diseases produced by the constitution of the atmosphere; but this acceptance is not common.

The constrictors of the pharynx contract it. They can likewise approximate the ends to each other. Chaussier considers those and the stylo-pharyngeus as but one muscle, and includes all under this last name.

This condition precedes death in the greater part of chronic diseases, and particularly in phthisis pulmonalis: on this account it is, that phthisis has received the name consumption. See Phthisis.—Fidère de Consumption, Consumptive fever, is the same as Hectic fever.

Con'tact, Contactus, (con, and tangere, tactum, 'to touch,') The state of two bodies that touch each other. In the theory of contagious diseases, we distinguish immediate or direct contact, as when we touch a patient laboring under one of those diseases; and mediate or indirect contact, when we touch, not the patient himself, but objects that have touched or emanated from him. The air is, most commonly, the medium by which this last kind of contact is effected. See Contagion.

CON'tACT THE'ORY, see Contact, and Contagion.

Conta'gion, Contagio, Contages. The transmission of a disease from one person to another by direct or indirect contact. The term has, also, been applied by some to the action of miasmata arising from dead animal or vegetable matter, bogs, fens, &c., but in this sense it is now abandoned. Contagious diseases are produced either by a virus, contagium, capable of causing them by inoculation, as in small-pox, cow-pox, hydrophobia, syphilis, &c., or by miasmata, proceeding from a sick individual, as in plague, typhus gravior, and in measles and scarlatina [?]. Scrofula, phthisis pulmonalis, and cancer have, by some, been esteemed contagious, but apparently without foundation. Physicians are, indeed, by no means unanimous in deciding what diseases are contagious, and what not. The contagion of plague and typhus, especially of the latter, is denied by many. It seems probable, that a disease may be contagious under certain circumstances and not under others. A case of common fever, arising from common causes, as from cold, if the patient be kept in a close, foul situation, may be converted into a disease, capable of producing emanations, which may excite a similar disease in those exposed to them. Contagion and infection are generally esteemed synonymous. Frequently, however, the former is applied to diseases not produced by contact, as measles, scarlet fever [?], &c.; while infection, (Prov.) Smit, is used for those that require positive contact; as itch, syphilis, &c., and conversely. Diseases which cannot be produced in any other way than by contagion, are said to have their origin in specific contagion; as small-pox, cow-pox, measles, hydrophobia, syphilis, &c. Those which are produced by contagion, and yet are supposed to be sometimes owing to other causes, are said to arise from common contagion; as typhus, cynanche parotidæa, &c.

Conta'gionist, (F.) Contagioniste. One who believes in the contagious character of a particular disease,—as of yellow fever.

Contagious, Contagio'sus, (F.) Contagieux. Capable of being transmitted by mediate or immediate contact, Commun'icable,—as a contagious disease, contagious fever, contagious effluvia, &c. Commonly, the epithet infectious, (F.) Infectieux, (Prov.) Ta'king, Smitt'le, Catch'ing, is applied to those that are communicated by immediate contact, as itch, syphilis, &c.

Contagium, Contagion, Miasm. Also, contagious matter.

Continen's, gen. Continen'tis, Continent.

Continent, Contine'ns. Restrained. This word is synonymous, also, with Continued, (F.) Continu.

CONTINENT CAUSE, Caus'a conjunc'ta, is a cause, real or presumed, which, having given rise to a disease, continues to act during the whole of its duration. It may be considered synonymous with proximate cause. A continent fe'ver, Fe'bris continens, is one which preserves, during its whole course, the same degree of intensity, without any remission or sensible exacerbation. A disease which continues uninterruptedly, has been also called Æipathe'i'a, Æipathi'a or Äipathi'a.

Continen'tia, Continence.

Contin'ued Fe'ver, Fe'bris contin'ua seu continens seu anabat'ica seu assid'ua. A fever which presents no interruption in its course. Continued fevers form a division in the class Pyrexia of Cullen, and include three genera,—Syn'ocha, Syn'ochus, and Ty'phus. It is proper to remark, that some of the older writers make a distinction between the continued fever, συνεχης, fe'bris contin'ua, and the syn'ochus or fe'bris continens. Thus, Rhases states that the synochus or continens is a fever, which consists of one paroxysm from beginning to end; while the continua is allied to intermittents.

Continu'ity, Continu'itas. An adhesion of two things between each other, so that they cannot be separated without fracture or laceration.

CONTINU'ITY, DIARTHRO'SES OF, (F.) Diarthro'ses de Continuité, are movable joints, in which the bones are continuous, but do not touch immediately, there being between them a ligamentous substance, whose flexibility permits motion. The vertebral articulations are examples of this. DIARTHROSES OF CONTIGU'ITY, Diarthro'ses de Contiguité, on the other hand, are movable articulations, in which the bones are not continuous, but touch by surfaces covered with a cartilaginous layer, which is always moistened by synovia.

CONTINU'ITY, LE'SION OF, see Continuity, solution of.

CONTINU'ITY, SOLU'TION OF, Solu'tio contin'ui, is any division of parts, previously continuous. Wounds and fractures are solutions of continuity. The word Continuity is opposed to Contiguity: the latter meaning the condition of two things which are near each other, or touch without uniting. There is contiguity between the head of the humerus and the glenoid cavity of the scapula, but not continuity.

A le'sion of continuity, Læ'sio contin'ui, is a destruction of continuity caused by disease.

CONTINU'ITY, SYM'PATHY OF, see Sympathy.

Contractil'ity, Contractil'itas, (F.) Contractilité. That vital property which gives, to certain parts, the power of contracting. The muscles of locomotion are endowed with a power of voluntary contractility, or one dependent immediately on the action of the brain:—the muscles of the viscera of digestion, and other internal organs, enjoy an involuntary contractility. Contractility and irritability are frequently used synonymously to signify the property possessed by any tissue of contracting on the application of an appropriate stimulus.

On dissection, they are found converted into tendinous fibres, the fleshy fibres having almost disappeared, when the disease has been of any duration. It frequently succeeds other diseases, particularly rheumatism, neuralgia, convulsions, syphilis, colica piconum, &c. The warm bath, vapor bath, or thermal waters, oleaginous embrocations, mechanical extension of the limbs, &c., are the chief means of treatment.

internal table yields and fractures. 2. When the bone breaks in any other part than the one struck. 3. When a bone, which has been struck, remains uninjured, and its neighbor is fractured. 4. When the bone is fractured in a place diametrically opposite to that struck, as in fractures at the base of the cranium, from a fall on the vertex; and lastly, when the violence of the blow produces a separation of the neighboring or distant sutures. These fractures of the skull are also called Fractures par résonnance.

Controstim'ulant, Contrastim'ulans, Hyposthen'ic, (F.) Hyposthénique, (contra, and stimulus, 'that which excites,') A substance that possesses a particular, debilitating property, acting upon the excitability in a manner opposite to stimulus. A name given to therapeutical agents, which, according to the Italian theory of conrostimulus, are endowed with the property of diminishing excitement by a specific action. These agents are by no means clearly defined.

Controstim'ulus or Contrastim'ulus, Doc'trine of, (F.) Contrestimulisme. Same etymon. The name given by Rasori, half a century ago, to a new medical doctrine, of which he was the originator—La nuova Dottrina Medica Italiana. It is founded on the conrostimulant—Raso'rian—property attributed to a certain number of medicines. In this doctrine, as in that of Brown, under the name excitability, a fundamental principle of physiology is admitted, by virtue of which living beings are endowed with an aptitude for feeling the action of external agents or exciting influences, and of reacting on these influences. When this excitability is too great, there is excess of stimulus or Hypersthen'ia: when too little, there is deficiency or Hyposthen'ia. Diseases, general and local, are divided into three great classes, or into, 1. Hypersthen'ic; 2. Hyposthen'ic; 3. Ir'ritative. The conrostimulant physicians admit only two classes of medicines—stimulants and conrostimulants.

(Same etymon as Contunding.) An injury or lesion—arising from the impulse of a body with a blunt surface—which presents no loss of substance, and no apparent wound. If the skin be divided, the injury takes the name of contused wound. The differences of contusions, as to extent, are of course infinite. When slight, the blood stagnates in the capillaries of the skin, or is effused into the subcutaneous areolar tissue. Time and cold applications remove it. When the texture has been lacerated, there is effusion of blood, with more or less torpor in the part affected. Cooling applications, general or topical bleeding, emollients, poultices, &c., are here necessary, according to circumstances. In the severest kinds of contusion, all the soft and solid parts, except the skin, are bruised, and, at times, reduced to a kind of pap. When the disorganization is to this extent, there is no hope except in amputation. A deep contusion of the soft parts has been called Sarcoth'lasis, and Sarcothlas'ma.

One of the most beautiful productions of the deep. It is fixed to submarine rocks, in the form of a shrub, and is of a bright red color. It is the habitation of a multitude of animals, of the Zoophyta order, and is formed of a calcareous substance, secreted by the animals themselves. It is in very hard, concentric layers; covered, externally, by a species of porous bark full of cellules, each of which contains one of these animals. Linnæus calls the red coral Psis nobilis, and M. de Lamarck, Corallium rubrum. It is much fished for on the coasts of Barbary and Sicily. The grayish crust or buff, varying in thickness, observed on blood drawn from a vein during the existence of violent inflammation, pregnancy, &c. It is particularly manifest in pleurisy, and hence one of its names. For its production, it appears to be requisite that there should be an increase in the proportion of the fibrinous element of the blood over that of the red corpuscles, with augmented aggregation of those corpuscles. The blood is then longer in coagulating, and the red corpuscles have time to subside. In highly inflammatory conditions, the buffy coat assumes a concave appearance on its upper surface, and the blood is, therefore, said to be cupped. Polli gave to the coagulative substance the name bradyfibrin. It is the ordinary fibrin of the blood—the only self-coagulable ingredient in it.

When the blood presents the above appearance, it is said to be buffy or sizy.

Corn, (Saxon copn.) In Great Britain this word means the Cerealia, or those seeds which grow in ears, not in pods. In the United States Corn always means Indian Corn. Its English sense corresponds to the French Blé or Bled.

CORN, (from cornu, 'a horn,') Gla'vus, Ola'vus, Pe'dis, Ecphy'ma Gla'vus, Gemmur'sa, (F.) Cor, Ognon, Oignon. A small, hard, corneous tumor, which forms upon the foot, generally on the toes; and is commonly produced on the most projecting parts by the pressure of too tight shoes. A part of the corn is raised above the skin, and forms a round tumor, like the head of a nail: the other portion, which serves as its base, is buried more or less deeply in the integuments, and occasionally extends as far as the tendons and periosteum. Corns may, sometimes, be removed by immersing the feet in warm water, but commonly they return. They can, likewise, be destroyed by the knife or caustic, or by paring them down and pulling them out by the roots; but these operations are not always as simple as they seem. In the way of palliation, they must be constantly pared; and for the purpose of preventing pressure, any soft plaster, spread upon linen or leather, may be applied, with a hole in the centre to receive the corn; and layer after layer of plaster be added, until they attain the level of the corn. When very irritable, lunar caustic, rubbed over the surface, will generally diminish irritability surprisingly, and in a mode not easy of explanation.

The transpa'rent or lamellated cor'nea. One of the coats of the eye, so called because it has some resemblance to horn. It is termed transparent to distinguish it from the opaque — Cornea opa'ca or Sclerot'ic. It is convex, anteriorly; concave, posteriorly; forming nearly one-fifth of the anterior part of the eye, and representing a segment of a sphere, about seven lines and a half, or in. 0.625 in diameter. It seems to be constituted of laminae or lamellæ, in superposition, but of the precise number anatomists are not agreed. Henle assigns it four; the third, a very solid cartilaginous lamella, being called Membrane de Demours or M. de Descemet. See Aqueous humor. Messrs. Todd and Bowman assign it five layers. Between these layers are areolae or spaces — interlamell'ar spa'ces — assuming a tubular arrangement; and, hence, called by Todd and Bowman, Cor'neal tubes — Lim'bus cor'neæ, Cor'neal groove, is the margin of the cornea where it joins the sclerotica.

COR'NU CER'VI, Cornu, C. Cervinum, Cer'vi El'aphi Cornu, Harts'horn, (F.) Corne de cerf, Bois de cerf, Cornichon de cerf. The horns of various species of the stag. They contain about 27 per cent. of gelatin. The Shavings, Raspatura seu Rasura Cornu Cer'vi, C. C. raspa'tum, boiled in water, have, consequently, been esteemed emollient and nutritive.

Harts'horn Jelly may be made as follows:—Hartshorn shavings, 3vj., boil in water, Oiv. to Oij., strain, and add, whilst hot, of lemon-juice, two tablespoonfuls, white sugar, 3vj., and Sherry wine, two glasses. A good nutriment for the sick, where wine is not improper.

When burnt, the shavings constitute the Cornu cer'vi calcinata'tum, Cornu ustum, Phos'phas Cal'cis, Calca'ria phosphor'ica, Cal'cii seu Cal'cis Phos'phas Precipita'ta, (F.) Corne de cerf calcinée, Phosphate de chaux, which consists of 57.5 per cent. of phosphate of lime. It has been used as an antacid, but is wholly inert, as its composition would indicate. It contains only 1 per cent. of carbonate of lime.

Phosphate of lime has also been given in osteomalacia, from a presumption that the disease is owing to a deficiency of earthy matter in the blood, which is doubtless an error—the fault being in the agents of assimilation or the cells of nutrition. With as little propriety, it has been proposed as an excitant to the healthy action of the cells in tuberculosis.

Bone earth is usually sold in the shops for burnt hartshorn.

The British Pharmacopœia (1867) has a Calcis Phosphas, and the Ph. U. S. a Calcis Phosphas Precipita'ta, Calcii Phosphas Precipitata (Ph. U. S., 1873), Precipitated Phosphate of Lime, Precipitated Phosphate of Calcium, prepared by dissolving burnt bone in muriatic acid, and precipitating it by solution of ammonia. The dried precipitate, called bone phosphate of lime, has no virtues not possessed by the cornu ustum.

Hartshorn was once supposed to possess a bezoardic power.

At a very early period of foetal formation, bodies are perceptible, which were first described by Wolff as existing in the fowl, and in the mammalia by Oken. According to Müller, they disappear in man very early, so that but slight remains of them are perceptible after the ninth or tenth week of pregnancy. They cover the region of the kidneys and renal capsules, which are formed afterwards; and they are presumed to be the organs of urinary secretion during the first periods of foetal existence. The remains of the tubules of the Wolffian body sometimes become the seat of the formation of large cysts, Wolffian cysts, Cysts of the broad ligament.

Corpuscles, Pacinian, (F.) Corpuscles de Pacini, so called from Filippo Pacini, an Italian physician, who, it is generally conceived, first noticed them in 1830. They appear, however, to have been depicted in 1741 by Lehmann, from a preparation by A. Vater, who called them Papillæ and P. nervæ. Hence it was proposed by J. C. Strahl (1848) to call them Vaterian corpuscles or Corpuscles of Vater (Vater'sche Körperchen). Small bodies connected with the cutaneous nerves of the palm and sole. They have also been found sparingly and inconstantly in nerves at the wrist and elbow, the upper arm, forearm, and thigh, and in the intercostal nerve, the sacral plexus, solar plexus, and the plexuses adjacent to it. In each corpuscle there is the termination of a nervous filament. Their uses are not known.

Gall considers that this substance forms the nerves; and therefore calls it Substance matrice des Nerfs.

The name cortical is likewise given to the external substance of the kidneys, because it is of a deeper color than the inner part of the organ, and forms a kind of envelope to it.

COR'TEX O'VI, Cor'tical mem'brane. This membrane, so called by Boer and Granville, is usually regarded as a uterine production, and designated Decid'ua reflex'a. They consider it to surround the ovule, when it descends into the uterus, and to enclose the shaggy chorion. It is absorbed during the first months of utero-gestation, so as to expose the next membrane to the contact of the decidua, with which a connection takes place at the part where the placenta is to be formed. In that part, Boer and Granville consider that the Cortex ovi is never altogether obliterated, but only made thinner, and in process of time is converted into a mere pellicle or envelope, which not only serves to divide the filiform vessels of the chorion into groups or cotyledons, in order to form the placenta, but also covers those cotyledons. This, Dr. Granville calls membrana pro'pria. See Decidua membrana.

COR'TI, OR'GAN OF, (after the Italian anatomist.) A peculiar and complicated arrangement in the cochlea, including various cellular and rod-like structures, covered by the membrana tecto'ria or mem'brane of Corti, resting on the membrana basilaris or basilar mem'brane, — lam'ina spira'lis membrana'cea, — and arranged like piano-forte keys. The fibres or rods or ar'ches (arcades) of Corti are attached to the margins of the inner zone of the basilar membrane. They meet like the beams of a roof, and from their junction a very delicate network extends, the lam'ina seu membrana reticula'ris seu velamento'sa. Resting on the articulating ends of the inner rods is a row of ciliated cells, while three rows are placed external to the outer rods, attached by their pointed extremities to the membrana basilaris (cells of Corti). Alternating with the latter are the cells of Dieter's, while epithelium cells cover the upper surface of the remaining portion of the basilar membrane. The rods and cells of Corti probably admit of movement on one another, and from their intimate connection with the ganglionic nervous structure, doubtless play an important part in the perfection of audition.

They are irregular, long, bony curves; slightly flattened, and situate obliquely at the sides of the chest. The intervals between them are called Intercostal spaces, (F.) Espaces intercostaux, and they are numbered first, second, third, &c., reckoning from above to below. They have been distinguished into—1. Costæ ve'ræ, Pleurapophyses of Owen, True ribs, (F.) Vraies Côtes, Côtes sternales, Côtes vertébro-sternales (Ch.), and 2. Costæ spu'riæ, Mendo'sæ seu No'thæ Costæ, False ribs, Côtes asternales (Ch.), Faus-ses Côtes. The true or sternal ribs, as they have also been called, are the first 7; which are articulated at one extremity to the spine, and at the other, by means of their cartilages, hæmapophyses of Owen, to the sternum. The false or short ribs are the remaining 5; the uppermost three being united, by means of their cartilages, to the cartilage of the last true rib. The others are free at their sternal extremity, and, hence, have been called Float'ing ribs, Costæ fluctuan'tes, (F.) Côtes flottantes. The vertebral extremity of each rib is slightly expanded. Words introduced, since Gall, into medical language. (The first two terms are respectively derived from cranio, λογος, 'a discourse,' and σκοπειν, 'to examine,') They signify a description, or simply an examination, of the different parts of the external surface of the cranium, in order to deduce from it a knowledge of the different intellectual and moral dispositions. Strictly speaking, it is by Cra'nioscopy or Or'ganoscopy that we acquire a knowledge of Cranio'logy, Organol'ogy, or Cranol'ogy, as it has been variously termed. These words are generally, however, used in the same sense. The cranium being moulded to the brain, there are as many prominences on the bone as there are projections at the surface of the brain. According to Gall, each projection, which he calls an organ, is the seat of a particular intellectual or moral faculty, and all persons endowed with the same faculty, have, at the same part of the brain, a prominence, which is indicated, externally, by a bump or projection in the bony case. The System of Gall is made to comprise 27 prominences, which answer to 27 primary faculties.

A fundamental principle with the Craniologists or Phrenologists is, — that the brain does not act as a single organ, but that it consists of a plurality of organs; but, were we able to admit this, the assignment of the seat of different faculties could not but be considered premature.

Craniomancy, (cranio, and μαντεία, 'divination.') Craniology.

Besides these, there might be considered, as belonging to the cranium, the cornua sphenoidalia, the bones of the ear, and the ossa Wormiana. Râle Crépitant Sec à Grosses Bulles, 'dry crackling noise, with formation of large bubbles,' is heard in pulmonary emphysema, when the distension becomes greater and greater, and is followed by rupture of the vesicles. The air forcing itself a passage in the interlobular areolar tissue gives rise to this Râle during inspiration.

Râle Crépitant Sec of Laënnec, R. vésiculaire. The crep'itant rattle, Crepita'tio vesicula'ris, Rhon'chus crep'itans, heard during respiration, in severe pneumonia and in œdema of the lung; so termed on account of the analogy between the sound and that occasioned by pressing a healthy lung between the fingers. It resembles the sound produced by rubbing slowly and firmly between the finger and thumb a lock of hair near the ear, and is probably produced by the air of inspiration passing into the air-cells, obstructed by the viscid secretion from their interior. The Rhon'chus crep'itans re'dux, (F.) Râle crépitant rédux, is the sound heard in respiration coexistent with the resolution of pneumonia. It indicates the return of the cells to the previous condition.

When it cannot be heard at a distance, it may be detected by the immediate application of the ear, or by the use of the stethoscope. Crepi'tus or crackling is, likewise, met with in cases of gangrene, when air is effused into the areolar membrane—provided the part be carefully examined with the fingers. Others, again, have given this name only to a rapid and favorable change, joined to some copious evacuation or eruption; while others have applied the term to the symptoms that accompany such change, and not to the change itself; — thus including, under the same denomination, the critical phenomena and the crisis.

Crispa'tion, Crispatu'ra, (crispare, crispatum, 'to wrinkle.') A contraction or spasmodic constriction, which supervenes in certain parts, either spontaneously or by the influence of some morbid cause or therapeutical agent. The capillary vessels of a wound are, by the French, termed crispés, when, immediately after an operation, the blood does not flow from them. The skin is said to be crispée, when contracted, and the bulbs of the hair become more prominent. Crispation of the nerves is a slight convulsive motion of external or internal parts, much less than that which occurs in convulsion.

Cris'ta, Am'bē, Am'bon. A crest. (F.) Crête. A name given to several bony projections; also, to the clitoris.

The word Crêtes (F.), Cristæ, is also used, in France, for fimbriated excrecences, which form at the anus, and near the genital organs; and are commonly owing to the syphilitic virus. Crêtes de Coq are syphilitic excrecences, resembling, in form, the crest of the cock.

CRIS'TA ACUS'TICA, Sep'tum Ner'veum seu Transver'sum, Papill'a Semilunaris. A yellowish-white semicircular spot on the ampullæ of the semicircular canal, near the mouth of the utriculus, at the termination of the twig of the nervus acusticus.

CRIS'TA OR CREST OF THE IL'IUM is the superior margin of the ilium: — the Oris'ta or Crest of the Tib'ia, the anterior edge, the shin; and the Oris'ta or Crest of the Pu'bis, the posterior sharp edge on the upper surface of the bone. Winslow calls the nymphæ Oris'ta of the clitoris; and Chaussier, the verumontanum, Oris'ta Urethra'lis, Crest of the Ure'thra.

CRIT'ICAL DAYS, Di'es Crit'ici seu Judicato'rii seu Decreto'rii seu Prin'cipes seu Radica'les seu Contemplab'iles seu Internun'cii, (F.) Jours cri-tiques, are those on which a crisis, it is imagined, is most likely to happen. According to Hippocrates and Galen, the greatest number of fevers terminate favorably on the 7th day, and many on the 14th—these two days being the most propi-tious. Next to these come, in order of efficiency, the 9th, 11th, 20th or 21st, 17th, 5th, 4th, 3d, 18th, 27th, and 28th. The sixth day was called, by Galen, the Tyrant, τυραννος, because the crises that happened then were generally un-favorable. After this, the most unfavorable were the 8th, 10th, 12th, 16th, and 19th. The 13th was a sort of neutral day; the crises which happened on it being neither favorable nor un-favorable. Days were, also, divided into Inter'-calary, on which the crises happened less fre-quently, and were less complete than on the critical or in'dicatory;—and into vacant and non-dec'retory, on which a crisis hardly ever occurred. According to this division, they were enumerated as follows:

Critical days.....7th, 14th, 20th, 27th, 34th,
40th, 60th, &c.
Indicatory days.....4th, 11th, 17th, 24th, &c.
Intercalary days.....3d, 5th, 6th, 9th, &c.
Non-decretory days.....2d, 8th, 10th, 12th, 13th, &c.

Fortunate crises were considered to be indi-cated by favorable signs appearing three days before.

Cru'ral, Crura'lis, (crus, gen. cruris, 'the thigh, and lower limb,') What belongs to the thigh or lower limb.

Crural, Triceps cruris.

CRU'RAL ARCH, Inguinal or Fem'oral Arch, Ar'cus crura'lis, Ligamentum Fallo'pii seu Pou'part'ii seu Vesa'lii, L. Iliopu'bicum, (F.) Ar'cade crurale ou inguinale (Ch.), Pou'part's Ligament, L. of Fallo'pius. This arch is formed by the internal portion of the inferior edge of the aponeurosis of the obliquus externus muscle, which is attached, at one end, to the pubis; at the other, to the anterior and superior spinous process of the ilium. At its posterior and inner part, the aponeurosis, forming the arch, sends off a falciform reflection, which is attached along the crest of the pubis, and is known under the name of GIMBERNAT'S Ligament. Beneath this arch, the vessels, nerves, and muscles make their exit from the pelvis to the thigh.

CRU'RAL AR'TERY, Ar'teria Crura'lis, Fem'oral Ar'tery, (F.) Artère crurale, is the continuation of the external iliac. It extends from the crural arch to the aperture in the triceps, or to the ham. Chaussier applies the name Artère crurale to the trunk, which extends from the primitive or common iliac to the tibial arteries — embracing, of course, the external iliac, femoral, and popliteal.

CRU'RAL CANAL, Crural Ring, Fem'oral canal or ring. M. Jules Cloquet has described this canal with minuteness, and given it the name Anneau crural, Anneau fémoral. It is nearly an inch long, triangular, more spacious above than below, and shorter and broader in the female than in the male. Its upper orifice is bounded, anteriorly, by the crural arch; posteriorly, by the crista of the pubis; on the outer side by the psoas and iliacus muscles, covered by the iliac aponeurosis, and, at the inner, by Gimbernat's ligament. This orifice is covered by the peritoneum, and, according to M. Cloquet, is closed by a more or less resisting septum, which he named Sep'tum crura'le, Crural Sep'tum. In its course, the crural canal has its anterior parietes formed by the superficial expansion of the fascia lata; the posterior by the pectineus, covered by the deep-seated expansion of the fascia; and more externally by the psoas and iliacus muscles, covered by an expansion of the fascia ili'aca. Its inferior orifice is formed by the foramen of the fascia lata, which gives passage to the vena saphæna. It is at the upper orifice of this canal that Fem'oral or Crural Hernia, Hernie inguinale of Chaussier, occurs; which would be more common, were it not for the fibrous cellular septum there situate.

CRURAL HER'NIA, see Crural Canal and Hernia.

CRURAL NERVE proceeds from the lumbar plexus, and is situate at the outer side of the psoas muscle and crural artery. After it has passed under the crural arch, it divides into cutaneous and muscular branches. One of the branches, which is larger than the rest, is called the Saphæna nerve. It gives off filaments to the integuments of the knee, to the inner part of the leg, and to the dorsal surface of the foot. The remainder of the branches of the crural are distributed to the anterior and inner part of the thigh. The Accessory of the Crural Nerve is a term given to the 4th and 5th pairs of lumbar nerves.

CRURAL PLEX'US of Chaussier is the union of the anterior branches of the last four pairs of lumbar nerves and the first four sacral; forming the lumbar and sacral plexuses of most anatomists.

CRURAL RING, Crural canal — c. Septum, see Crural canal.

CRURAL VEIN, Fem'oral vein, has the same arrangement as the artery. It receives only one great branch, the saphæna.

CU'BITAL AR'TERY, Arte'ria cubitalis, A. ulna'ris, arises from the humeral a little below the bend of the elbow, proceeds along the anterior and inner part of the forearm, passes anterior to the ligamentum annulare of the carpus, and goes to form, in the palm of the hand, the superficial palmar arch. Besides the numerous muscular branches which it gives off in its course, it sends posteriorly the common trunk of the interosseous arteries, and internally the two cubital recurrents, anterior and posterior — articular branches, which anastomose on the inside of the elbow with the divisions of the humeral artery.

CU'BITAL MUS'LES are two in number. 1. The Cubitalis ante'rior seu inter'nus, Flex'or car'pi ulna'ris, Ulna'ris inter'nus, Epitrochlo-cubito-carpien, Cubito-carpien (Ch.), is a long muscle, situate at the anterior and inner part of the forearm. Its use is to bend the hand on the forearm, by directing it slightly inwards. 2. The Cubitalis poste'rior seu exte'rius, Exten'sor car'pi ulna'ris, Ulna'ris exte'rius, Cubito-us exte'rius, Cubito-us-metacarpien (Ch.), is situate at the posterior part of the forearm. It arises from the external condyle of the os humeri, and is inserted into the superior extremity of the fifth bone of the metacarpus. Its use is to extend the hand, inclining it a little inwards.

CU'BITAL NERVE, Ulnar nerve, Cubito-digital (Ch.), is furnished by the last two or three nerves of the brachial plexus, and is distributed to the inner and anterior side of the forearm; to the inner part of the palm and of the back of the hand, and to the last two or three fingers.

Cu'neiform, Cuneiform'is, Sphenoi'des, (cuneus, 'a wedge,' and forma, 'shape,') Wedge-shaped. This name has been given to several bones. 1. To the sphenoid. 2. To a bone of the carpus, situate between the os lunare and os orbiculare. It is, also, called Os Pyramida'lē, Os Triq'uetrum, and Os Cubita'lē. 3. To the basilar process of the occipital bone; and, 4. To three of the bones of the tarsus, which are distinguished according to situation, reckoning from within outwards, into first, second, and third, — or internal, middle, and external; and according to size, reckoning in the same order, into great, small, and middle-sized. The posterior surface of these bones is united to the anterior face of the scaphoides; the anterior surface with the corresponding metatarsal bones; and, in addition, the external surface of the third is articulated, behind, with the cuboides. They are also called Chalcoi'dea ossa seu ossicula.

Cu'NEIFORM CARTILAGES OF THE LAR'YNX, Cartilag'ines cuneiform'es, Cartilag'ines seu Corpuscula Wrisberg'ii, Cart'ilages of Wris'berg, are two small cylinders of fibro-cartilage, about seven lines in length, and enlarged at each extremity. By the base, the cartilage is attached to the middle of the external surface of the arytenoid; and its upper extremity forms a prominence on the border of the aryteno-epiglottidean fold of membrane. They are sometimes wanting.

Cu'neo. In composition, the cuneiform bones.

Cu'neocu'boid, Cuneocuboi'deus. Belonging to the cuneiform bones and cuboides.

Cu'NEOCU'BOID ARTICULA'TION is formed by the third cuneiform bone and cuboides. It is furnished with a synovial capsule, and two cuneocuboid ligaments — a dorsal and a plantar.

Cu'neosca'phoid, Cuneoscapoi'des. Belonging to the cuneiform bones and scaphoid.

Cu'NEOSCA'PHOID ARTICULA'TION is formed by the posterior surfaces of the three ossa cuneiformia, and the anterior surface of the scaphoid. It is furnished with a synovial capsule and ligaments, some of which are dorsal, others plantar.

A small indigenous herb, Order Labiatae, growing on dry, shady hills, from New England to Georgia, and flowering in June and July. Its medical properties are dependent upon essential oils, like the mints.

CUNI'LA, MA'RYLAND, Cunila mariana — c. Mint'leaved, C. mariana — c. Muscula, Inula dysenterica — c. Pulegioides, Hedeoma pulegioides — c. Sativa, Satureia hortensis.

A species of bloodletting, performed by a scarificator and glass, called a cup'pingglass, Cucurbit'ula, Cucurb'ita, Sic'ua, (Old Engl.) Bleeding-boist, (F.) Ventouse. The lancets are placed in such a manner in the scarificator that, when it is applied upon the affected part, the whole are, by means of a spring, forced suddenly into it. After scarification, the cuppingglass, which has been previously exhausted by heat, or by an exhausting syringe, is applied. The pressure of the air within the glass being thus diminished, the necessary quantity of blood may be drawn. See Bdellometer. Dry cupping, Cucurbit'ula sic'ca, is the application of the glasses, dry cups, (F.) Ventouses sèches, without previous scarification. It is used to prevent the activity of absorption from any wounded part; occasionally, to excite suppuration in indolent abscesses; and to remove the pus when an abscess is opened. Cupping, without any epithet, means the abstraction of blood by means of the scarificator and cups:—(F.) Ventouses scarifiées, (L.) Cucurbit'ulae cruen'tæ, C. cum Fer'ro, Wet cup'ping, or Wet Cups, Cut Cups. It is tonic, emetic, escharotic, and detergent; but scarcely ever employed internally. Chiefly used in detergent ointments. Dose, as a tonic, under $\frac{1}{2}$ gr.: emetic, from gr. j. to gr. ij. Powdered verdigris appears to be the active ingredient in Smellome's Eye-salve, which may be imitated by rubbing half a drachm of finely-powdered verdigris with a little oil, and then mixing it with an ounce of yellow basilicon.

An ointment composed of one drachm of finely-powdered verdigris, with an ounce of lard or spermaceti ointment, is used in psoriasis, tetter, &c.

Cu'PRI SUL'PHAS, Vitri'olum Cu'pri seu Ven'e'ris seu Cyp'rium seu Cyp'rinum seu Cæru'leum seu Roma'num, Cu'prum Vitriola'tum, La'pis Cæru'leus, Sul'phate of Cop'per, Cu'pric Sul'phate, Blue Stone, Blue Vit'riol, Blue Cop'peras, Ro'man Vit'riol, Mor'tooth, (F.) Sulfate de Cuivre, Couperose bleu, is in rhomboidal, rich, blue, semi-transparent, efflorescing crystals. Its odor is peculiar and sensible when rubbed; taste disagreeable and metallic; color red yellow. S. g. 7.87; ductile; very malleable; less hard than iron; easily oxidized. In its metallic state, it exerts no action on the system. When swallowed, it undergoes no deleterious change. Copper cannot be dissolved while tin is in the mixture, and hence the utility of tinning copper vessels. Copper culinary vessels are harmless under ordinary cleanliness, provided the substances be not suffered to remain in them till cold. The salts of copper are very deleterious. Copper wire is officinal under the name of Cuprum, (Ph. U. S., 1873.)

Keep in a well-stopped glass bottle. — Ph. U. S., 1873.) A crystalline powder of a rich violet color, and hot, styptic taste. By exposure to air, it becomes partly converted into carbonate of copper. It is tonic and astringent, and has been chiefly employed in epilepsy, and other obstinate spasmodic diseases. Dose, gr. ½ increased to gr. iv., in pill.

said to be obtained from the bark of a species of convolvulus, called Vejuco de Mavacure, but is referred by Martius to Strychnos Guianensis, and by Dr. Schomburg to S. toxica'ria seu toxicifera. The juice of Echites suberecta, another apocynaceous plant, is said to enter into its composition. Dr. Brainard thinks it contains the venom of serpents as its main ingredient. Two new varieties of Curare were investigated by Dr. W. A. Hammond and Dr. S. W. Mitchell, — carroval and vao, — the latter of which is less energetic, but both appear to contain the same active alkaloid — carrovalia. They seem to be of vegetable origin, and to contain no trace of the venom of serpents. They inferred that the poison acts directly on the heart, probably through the ganglia in its tissue. Curare has not been much employed therapeutically, is a sedative narcotic, and must be prescribed endermically or hypodermically on account of its tardy absorption, or perhaps non-absorption, by the stomach.

From experiments made by Dr. Hermann Beagel, of London, partly with Indian and partly with African arrowpoison, he is satisfied that they differ in their composition and action. The Indian is the one referred to above. The American does not seem to have been experimented with. Dr. Beagel is of opinion that the danger of the African poison far exceeds that of the Indian, and that it affects, in the first place, the nervous centres, and also destroys muscular irritability.

CURARIN, Cura'ria, U'rarin. An alkaloid, which has been obtained from one species of Curare, and which, according to M. Bernard, is at least twenty times as strong as Curare. It is supposed that several plants may furnish the alkaloid.

CUTA'NEOUS EXHALA'TION AND ABSORP'TION are those which take place from the skin.

CUTA'NEOUS MED'ICINE. Medicine that appertains to the knowledge and treatment of diseases of the skin.

CUTA'NEOUS, MID'DLE POSTE'RIOR, see Sciatic nerve, lesser.

CUTA'NEOUS NERVES, Cuta'neal Nerves so called, of the upper extremity, are two in number. They are given off from the brachial plexus. The internal cutaneous, Cubito-cutane (Ch.), descends along the inner part of the arm, and divides above the elbow into two branches; the outermost of which follows the outer edge of the biceps, and spreads over the anterior and inner part of the forearm; and the innermost accompanies the basilic vein, passing to the corresponding side of the hand and little finger. The external cutaneous, Radio-cutane (Ch.), Mus'culo-cutaneus, Per'forans CASSE'RII, passes outwards, perforates the coraco-brachialis, descends along the anterior and outer part of the arm, passes as far as the middle fold of the elbow under the median cephalic, and descends along the anterior and outer edge of the forearm. At some distance above the wrist, it divides into two branches; an outer, which is distributed on the back of the hand, the thumb and index finger; and an inner, which descends on the muscles of the thumb into the palm of the hand, and divides into fine filaments, which may be traced to the fingers.

Cuta'neous nerves, Mid'dle cutaneus, two in number, are branches of the crural or femoral nerve. They are distributed to the integument of the middle and lower part of the thigh and of the knee.

Nervus Cuta'neus Mi'nor, Les'ser inter'nal cutaneus nerve, Nerve of Wris'berg, takes its origin from the axillary plexus, but is more particularly connected with the ulnar nerve. It soon separates from the ulnar, running afterwards between it and the inner side of the arm. A little below the axilla it divides into two branches, which are distributed to the arm.

Chaussier calls the cephalic and basilic veins the Ra'dial and Cu'bital Cuta'neous.

Cutch, Catechu.

Cute, Malleolus.

Cuti, Catechu.

Cu'ticle, (dim. of cutis.) Cuticula—c. of the Enamel, see Enamel.

Cu'tic'ula, Cuticle, Epidermis.

Cu'tic'ULA DEN'TIS, Na'smyth's Mem'brane. A thin membrane which peels off the surface of the enamel of an unworn tooth, said by Tomes to be coronal cement, the homologue of a similar thick cement of herbivorous animals.

Cu'tio, Oniscus.

Cu'tis, Pel'lis, Pel'la, Co'rium, Der'ma, De'ris, Do'ra, Anthro'pē, Anthro'pen, Skin, Derm, (F.) Peau, Derme. A dense, resisting membrane, of a flexible and extensible nature, which forms the general envelope of the body, and is continuous with the mucous membranes, through the different natural apertures. It is generally considered to be formed of three distinct layers—the epider'mis, rete muco'sum, or more properly cor'pus muco- sum, and co'rium (cu'tis ve'ra, der'ma). Some anatomists, however, separate it into several others. Its outer surface is covered by a number of small eminences, called papillæ, Papill'æ cu'tis seu tac'tūs, which are generally regarded as essentially nervous and vascular. The skin is a medium of communication with external bodies. It protects the subjacent parts; is the seat of touch; and through it are exhaled the watery parts of the blood, which are not needed in the nutrition of the body. The state of the skin, as regards heat and dryness, affords useful information in pathological investigations. Its color, too, requires attention: the paleness of disease is as characteristic as the rosy complexion of health. The color of the skin varies according to the age, sex, &c. As a general rule, it is finer in the female and child than in the male and adult. In old age it becomes light-colored, thin, and dry. It likewise varies according to races, &c.

this state of parts; or without some obstacle to the circulation in the right side of the heart. The blueness does not seem to be owing to the admixture of black and red blood. A child affected with blueness is said to be cyano'sed, (F.) Cyanosé.

It comprises the following chief varieties:

It is characterized by crimson redness of the mucous membrane of the fauces and tonsils; ulcerations, covered with mucus; and spreading sloughs, of an ash or whitish hue; the accompanying fever typhus. It is often epidemic, and fancied to be contagious [?]; and is frequently found accompanying scarlet fever, — giving rise to the variety, Scarlatina malig'na, Canker rash. Cynanche maligna has been made to include both diphtheritic and gangrenous pharyngitis. See Pharyngitis, diphtheritic.

The general treatment is the same as in typhus; and stimulant antiseptic gargles must be used, consisting, for example, of the decoction of bark and muriatic acid, a solution of chlorate of potassa, &c.

CYNAN'CHĒ MAXILLA'RIS, C. parotidæa — c. Œsophagea, Œsophagitis.

The characteristic symptoms are: — a painful tumor of the parotid gland, or of the areolar tissue surrounding it, or of both, not of the suppurative kind; frequently extending to the maxillary gland. It is very conspicuous externally, and is often accompanied with swelling of the testis in the male, and of the mammae in the female; the testes being sometimes absorbed afterwards. It is generally epidemic, and apparently contagious [?]. The treatment is very simple; the adoption merely of the antiphlogistic plan, under which it usually soon disappears. When inflammation of the mammae or testes supervenes, it must be treated as if idiopathic.

Epidem'ic Parotitis or Mumps is also termed Parotitis polymor'pha seu epidem'ica seu specific.

CYNAN'CHĒ PHARYNGE'A seu PHARYNGÆA, Empres'ma Paristhmī'tis Pharyngæ'a, Isthmī'tis, Pharyngitis, Inflamma'tio Pharyng'is, Parasy-nan'chē, Angi'næ inflammato'ria, Sp. iv. of Boerhaave, (F.) Angine Pharyngée, Catarrhe pharyngis. Inflammation of the pharynx.

This disease can hardly be said to differ, in pathology or treatment, from Cynanche tonsillaris. The same may be remarked of Cynan'chē Œsophage'a, Œsophagitis.

CYNAN'CHĒ PRUNEL'LA, C. tonsillaris — c. Purpuro-parotidæa, Cynanche maligna — c. Simplex, Isthmitis — c. Stridula, C. trachealis.

The characteristic symptoms of this affection are, swelling and florid redness of the mucous membrane of the fauces, and especially of the tonsils; painful and impeded deglutition, accompanied with inflammatory fever. It is generally ascribed to cold, and is one of the most common affections of cold and temperate climates. It usually goes off by resolution, but frequently ends in suppuration.

Common sore throat is an affection of no consequence. It requires merely rest, and the observance of the antiphlogistic regimen. When more violent, — in addition to this, — bleeding, local or general, or both, — purgatives, inhalation of the steam of warm water; acid, or emollient gargles; rubefacients externally, or sinapisms or blisters. When suppuration must inevitably occur, the continued use of the inhaler must be advised, and an opening be made into the abscess as soon as pus shall have formed. If the patient be likely to be suffocated by the tumefaction, bronchotomy may be necessary.

CYNAN'CHĒ TRACHEA'LIS, Cynan'chē laryngæ'a of some, C. strid'ula, Suffoca'tio strid'ula, Asth'ma infan'tum, Catar'rhus suffocativus Barbaden'sis, Angi'na polypo'sa seu membrana'cea seu pulpo'sa seu perniciosa seu inflammato'ria seu suffocato'ria seu strepito'sa seu cani'na seu exsudato'ria seu trachea'lis, Empres'ma bronchitis seu bronchlemmitis, Laryngitis et Tracheitis infanti'lis, Laryngitis exsudativa seu membrana'cea seu crouposa membranacea seu polypo'sa, Laryngos-

A disease characterized by sonorous and suffocative breathing; harsh voice; cough, ringing, or like the barking of a dog; fever, highly inflammatory. It is apt to be speedily attended with the formation of a false membrane, which lines the trachea beneath the glottis, and occasions violent dyspnoea and suffocation, but is sometimes expectorated. The dyspnoea, as in all other affections of the air-passages, has evident exacerbations. It differs in its character in different situations; being infinitely more inflammatory in some than in others, and hence the success obtained from different modes of treatment. It chiefly affects children, and is apt to recur, but the subsequent attacks are usually less and less severe.

As a general rule, it requires the most active treatment; bleeding from the arm or neck, so as to induce paleness; leeches applied to the neck, &c., according to the age,—the warm bath, blisters to the neck or chest, and purgatives. Formidable as the disease may be, if this plan be followed early it will generally be successful. Many specifics have been recommended, but the search has been idle and fruitless. The majority of cases of what are called croup are not of this inflammatory cast; but are more of a spasmodic character, and have been termed by the French faux croups, false croups, laryngitis spasmodica, and with us are occasionally termed spasmodic or catarrhal croup. They generally yield to an emetic and the warm bath. Diphtheritic pharyngitis, extending to the throat, gives occasion to secondary croup.

This term is generally applied to a pouch or sac, — Cysto'ma — without opening, and commonly of a membranous nature, which is accidentally developed in one of the natural cavities, or in the substance of organs. Many theories have been successfully emitted to explain the formation of cysts, but none are entirely satisfactory. Some cysts are formed by a thin, translucent membrane, having scarcely the thickness of the arachnoid; others of a whitish, fibrocellular membrane, more or less thick. Some contain cartilaginous or bony flakes. The greater part have but one cavity; others, on the contrary, have several, separated by incomplete or imperfect septa, as is frequently seen in those developed in the ovaries. The matter contained in cysts is sometimes limpid, serous, yellowish-white, reddish, and, at others, more or less thick, albuminous, adipous, or caseous. The tumor formed by them is called Encysted.

Cysts are either simple (or barren) or compound (or proliferous), the former containing fluid or an organized matter, the latter various organized bodies. According to the nature of their contents they are called serous, synovial, mucous, sebaceous, sanguineous, colloid, salivary, sem'inal, der'moid.

When the nucleus or cytoblast forms a cell, and is attached to its walls, the germinal cell thus formed is called a nucleated cell, (F.) Cellule à noyau. When the nucleus contains a simple granule, the latter is termed a nucleolus, (F.) Nucléole, Nucléolule. Dr. L. S. Beale considers that the simplest or most elementary form with which we are acquainted, consists of a portion of soft, transparent, colorless matter, surrounded by a layer of matter formed from it, which may be so thin as hardly to be visible. The surface matter is formed; while that within is in a formless but living state, and is termed by him germinal matter. In the cell nomenclature of Professor Agassiz, the cell-wall is termed ectoblast; the nucleus, mesoblast; the nucleolus, entoblast; and when a smaller body exists in this, entos'thoblast.
