Olynthus (Ὀλύνθος: Ὀλύνθιος: Aio Mamas), a town of Macedonia in Chalcidice, at the head of the Toronaic gulf, and a little distance from the coast, between the peninsulas of Pallene and Sithonia (Strab. p. 330; Mel. ii. 2, 9). It was the most important of the Greek cities on the coast of Macedonia, though we have no record of its foundation. It afterwards fell into the hands of the Thracian Bottiaei, when they were expelled from their own country by the Macedonians (Hdt. vii. 122; Strab. p. 447). It was taken by Artabazus, one of the generals of Xerxes, who peopled it with Chalcidians from Torone; but it owed its greatness to Perdiccas, who persuaded the inhabitants of many of the smaller towns in Chalcidice to abandon their own abodes and settle in Olynthus (Thuc. i. 58, 65, ii. 79). This happened about the commencement of the Peloponnesian war; and from this time Olynthus appears as a prosperous and flourishing town, with a population of 5000 inhabitants capable of bearing arms. It became the head of a confederacy of all the Greek towns in this part of Macedonia, and it long maintained its independence against the attacks of the Athenians, Spartans and Macedonians; but in B.C. 379 it was compelled to submit to Sparta, after carrying on war with this state for four years. When the supremacy of Sparta was destroyed by the Thebans, Olynthus recovered its independence, and even received an accession of power from Philip, who was anxious to make Olynthus a counterpoise to the influence of Athens in the N. of the Aegean. With this view Philip gave Olynthus the territory of Potidaea, after he had wrested this town from the Athenians in 356. But when he had sufficiently consolidated his power to be able to set at defiance both Olynthus and Athens, he threw off the mask, and laid siege to the former city. The Olynthians earnestly besought Athens for assistance, and were warmly supported by Demosthenes in his Olynthiac orations; but as the Athenians did not render the city any effectual assistance, it was taken and destroyed by Philip, and all its inhabitants sold as slaves (347). [PHILIPPUS.] Olynthus was never restored, and the remnants of its inhabitants were at a later time transferred by Cassander to Cassandrea. At the time of its prosperity Olynthus used the town of MECYBERNA as its seaport.

Omāna or Omānum (Ὀμᾶνα, Ὀμᾶνον). 1. A celebrated port on the NE. coast of Arabia Felix, a little above the easternmost point of the peninsula, Pr. Syagros (Ras el Had), on a large gulf of the same name. The people of this part of Arabia were called Omanitae (Ὀμανῖται), or Omani, and the name is still preserved in that of the district, Oman. (Ptol. vi. 15.)—2. (Prob. Schaina), a seaport town in the E. of Carmania; the chief emporium for the trade between India, Persia, and Arabia (Plin. vi. 149).

Omanitae and Omānum. [OMANA.]

Ombi (Ὀμβοί: Ὀμβῖται: Koum Ombou, i.e. Hill of Ombon, Ru.), the last great city of Upper Egypt, except Syene, from which it was distant about thirty miles, stood on the E.

bank of the Nile, in the Ombites Nomos, and was celebrated as one of the chief seats of the worship of the crocodile (the crocodile-headed god Sebek). Juvenal's 15th Satire mentions a religious fight between the people of Ombi and those of Tentyra, during a festival at Ombi (Juv. xv. 35; Ptol. iv. 5, 73; Ael. H. A. x. 21).

Omphālē (Ὀμφάλη), daughter of the Lydian king Iardanus, and wife of Tmolus, after whose death she undertook the government herself. When Heracles, in consequence of the murder of Iphitus, was afflicted with a serious disease, and was informed by the oracle that he could only be cured by serving some one for wages for the space of three years, Hermes sold Heracles to Omphale. The hero became enamoured of his mistress, and, to please her, he is said to have spun wool and put on the garments of a woman, while Omphale wore his lion's skin. She bore Heracles several children. (Diod. iv. 31; Apollod. ii. 6, 3; Ov. Fast. ii. 305, Her. ix. 53.) For possible explanations of this myth, see p. 400, b.

Omphaliūm (Ὀμφάλιον: Ὀμφαλίτης), a town in Crete in the neighbourhood of Cnossus (Diod. v. 70).

On. [HELIOPOLIS.]

Onātas (Ὀνάτας), of Aegina, a famous sculptor of the later and best period of Aeginetan art, which still preserved somewhat of the archaic stiffness or rigidity as compared with the Attic style of Phidias which succeeded it. The work of Onatas was in the earlier part of the fifth century B.C. His great statues were the 'Black Demeter' at Phigalia in bronze, a female figure in black drapery with a horse's head (Paus. viii. 42, 1), a bronze Apollo at Pergamum (Paus. viii. 42, 7), and two groups of statues, described by Pausanias, at Olympia, which are held by modern critics to resemble in subject and arrangement the pediments of Aegina now at Munich: viz. the group of heroes at Troy casting lots for the fight with Hector, and the group of Tarentine warriors round the body of Opis the Peucetian king (Paus. v. 27, 8).

Oncae (Ὀγκαί), a village in Boeotia near Thebes, from which one of the gates of Thebes derived its name (Ὀγκαῖαι), and which contained a sanctuary of Athene.

Oncēum (Ὀγκειον) a town in Arcadia on the river Ladon with a temple of Demeter Erinnyes (Paus. viii. 25, 4).

Onchesmus or Onchismus (Ὀγχησμος, Ὀγχισμος: Orchido), a seaport town of Epirus in Chaonia, opposite the W. extremity of Corcyra. The ancients derived its name from Anchises, whence it is named by Dionysius the 'Harbour of Anchises' (Ἀγχίσου λιμὴν). From this place Cicero calls the wind blowing from Epirus towards Italy Onchesmites. (Strab. p. 324; Cic. ad Att. vii. 2.)

Onchestus (Ὀγχηστός: Ὀγχήστιος). 1. An ancient town of Boeotia, said to have been founded by Onchestus, son of Poseidon, was situated a little S. of the lake Copais near Haliartus. It contained a celebrated temple and grove of Poseidon, and was the place of meeting of the Boeotian Amphictyony. The ruins of this town are still to be seen on the SW. slope of the mountain Faga. (Il. ii. 506; Pind. Isthm. i. 44; Strab. p. 412; Paus. ix. 26, 5.)—2. A river in Thessaly which rises in the neighbourhood of Eretria, and flows by Cynoscephalae, and falls into the lake Boebēis (Pol. xviii. 3; Liv. xxxii. 6).

Onesicritus (Ὀνησίκριτος), a Greek historical writer, who accompanied Alexander on his campaigns in Asia, and wrote a history of them, which is frequently cited by later authors. He is called by some authorities a native of Astypalaea, and by others of Aegina. (Diog. Laërt. vi. 75; Arrian, Ind. 18.) When Alexander constructed his fleet on the Hydaspes, he appointed Onesicritus chief pilot of the fleet, a post which he held during the descent of the Indus and throughout the voyage to the Persian gulf, which was conducted under the command of Nearchus (Arrian, An. vi. 2, 6, vii. 5, 9; Plut. Alex. 66). Though an eye-witness of much that he described, it appears that he intermixed many fables and falsehoods with his narrative (Strab. pp. 70, 698).

Oningis or Oringis. [ORINGIS.]

Onīros (Ὀνειρος), the Dream-God, was a personification of dreams. According to the Odyssey, Dreams dwell on the dark shores of the W. Oceanus, and the deceitful dreams come through an ivory gate, while the true ones issue from a gate made of horn (Od. xix. 562, xxiv. 12). Hesiod calls dreams the children of Night, Sleep and Death being their brothers (Th. 12). Similarly in Eur. Hec. 71 (rightly punctuated), the 'mother of dusky-winged dreams' is Night, not Earth. Dreams were controlled by Hermes, since they were in some sense messages. Ovid calls them children of Sleep, and names three, who pervade the earth and appear in various forms to sleepers (Met. xi. 633): Morpheus, Icelus or Phobetor, and Phantasus. [For dream-oracles see Dict. of Ant. art. Oraculum.]

Onōba, surnamed Aestuāria (Huelva), a seaport town of the Turdetani in Hispania Baetica, between the mouths of the Baetis and Anas, on an estuary formed by the river Luxia. There are remains of a Roman aqueduct at Huelva. (Strab. p. 143; Ptol. ii. 4, 5.)

Onochōnus (Ὀνόχωνος: Sophaditikos), a river of Thessaly which joins the Apidanus from the W. (Hdt. vii. 129).

Onomacritus (Ὀνομάκριτος), an Athenian, who occupies an interesting position in the history of the early Greek religious poetry.

He lived about B.C. 520-485. He enjoyed the patronage of Hipparchus, until he was detected by Lasus of Hermione (the dithyrambic poet) in making an interpolation in an oracle of Musaeus, for which Hipparchus banished him. He seems to have gone into Persia, where the Pisistratids, after their expulsion from Athens, took him again into favour, and employed him to persuade Xerxes to engage in his expedition against Greece, by reciting to him all the ancient oracles which seemed to favour the attempt. (Hdt. vii. 6.) It appears that Onomarchus had made a collection and arrangement of the oracles ascribed to Musaeus, and that he was the real author of some of the poems which went under the name of Orpheus (Paus. i. 22, viii. 31, 37, ix. 35). Tzetzes speaks of him as one of those who arranged the books of Homer under Pisistratus, and thus he has been set down by Wolf and others as one of the 'Diasceustae' of Homer.

Onomarchus (Ὀνόμαρχος), general of the Phocians in the Sacred war, succeeded his brother Philomelus in this command, B.C. 353. In the following year he was defeated in Thesaly by Philip, and perished in attempting to reach by swimming the Athenian ships, which were lying off the shore, B.C. 352. His body fell into the hands of Philip, who caused it to be crucified, as a punishment for his sacrilege in the Sacred war. (Diod. xvi. 31-61; Paus. x. 2, 5; Just. viii. 1.)

Onosander (Ὀνόσανδρος), the author of a celebrated work on military tactics (entitled Στρατηγικὸς λόγος), which is still extant. All subsequent Greek and Roman writers on the same subject made this work their text-book. He lived about A.D. 50. In his style he imitated Xenophon with some success. Edited by Schwebel, Nürnberg, 1761; and by Köchly, Lips. 1860.

Onu-gnathus (Ὀνούγναθος: Elaphonisi), an island and a promontory on the S. coast of Laconia (Strab. p. 363; Paus. iii. 22, 23).

Onūphis (Ὀνούφης), the capital of the Nomos Onuphites in the Delta of Egypt (Hdt. ii. 166).

Ophēlion (Ὀφελίων), an Athenian comic poet, of the Middle Comedy, B.C. 380 (Athen. pp. 43, 66, 67, 106).

Ophellas (Ὀφέλλας), of Pella in Macedonia, was one of the generals of Alexander the Great, after whose death he followed the fortunes of Ptolemy. In B.C. 322, he conquered Cyrene, of which city he held the government on behalf of Ptolemy for some years. But soon after 313 he threw off his allegiance to Ptolemy, and continued to govern Cyrene as an independent state for nearly five years. In 308 he formed an alliance with Agathocles, and marched against Carthage; but he was treacherously attacked by Agathocles near this city, and was slain. (Diod. xx. 40-42; Just. xxii. 7; Suid. s. v.)

Opheltes (Ὀφέλτης). 1. Also called Archemorus. [ARCHEMORUS.]—2. One of the Tyrrhenian pirates, who attempted to carry off Dionysus, and were therefore metamorphosed into dolphins [p. 294].

Ophion (Ὀφίων). 1. One of the oldest of the Titans, was married to Eurynome, with whom he ruled over Olympus, but being conquered by Cronos and Rhea, he and Eurynome were thrown into Oceanus or Tartarus (Ap. Rh. i. 503; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 1191).—2. Father of the centaur Amycus, who is hence called Ophionodes (Ov. Met. xii. 245).

Ophionenses or Ophienses (Ὀφιονεῖς, Ὀφιεῖς), a people of Aetolia (Strab. pp. 451, 465).

Ophir. [See Dict. of the Bible.]

Ophis (Ὀφίς), a river in Arcadia, which flowed by Mantinea (Paus. viii. 8, 4).

Ophiūsa or Ophiussa (Ὀφιδέσσα, Ὀφιοῦσσα, Ὀφιοῦσα, i.e. abounding in snakes). 1. [PITYUSAE.]—2. Or Ophiussa (perhaps Palanea), a town of European Scythia, on the left bank of the Tyras (Dneister). (Strab. p. 306).—3. A little island near Crete.—4. (Afsia or Rabbi), a small island in the Propontis (Sea of Marmora), NW. of Cyzicus and SW. of Proconnesus.—5. [RHODUS.]—6. [TENOS.]

Ophryniūm (Ὀφρυνεῖον: prob. Fren-Kevi), a small town of the Troad, near the lake of Pteleos, between Dardanus and Rhoeteum, with a grove consecrated to Hector (Hdt. vii. 43; Strab. p. 595; Xen. An. vii. 8, 5).

Opici. [OSCI.]

Opilius Macrinus. [MACRINUS.]

Opilius, Aurelius, the freedman of an Epicurean, taught at Rome, first philosophy, then rhetoric, and finally, grammar. He gave up his school upon the condemnation of Rutilius Rufus (B.C. 92), whom he accompanied to Smyrna. He composed several learned works, one of which, named Musae, is referred to by A. Gellius. (Suet. Gramm. 6; Gell. i. 25.)

Opimius. 1. Q., consul B.C. 154, when he subdued some of the Ligurian tribes N. of the Alps, who had attacked Massilia. He was notorious in his youth for his riotous living, and was described by Lucilius as 'formosus et famosus.' (Pol. xxxiii. 5-8; Cic. de Or. ii. 68, 277; Non. s.v. Fama).—2. L., son of the preceding, was praetor 125, in which year he took Fregellae, which had revolted against the Romans. He belonged to the high aristocratical party, and was a violent opponent of C. Gracchus. He was consul in 121, and took the leading part in the proceedings which ended in the murder of Gracchus. Opimius and his party abused their victory most savagely, and are said to have killed more than 3000 persons. For details see p. 371, b. In the following year (120), he was accused of having put Roman citizens to death without trial; but he was defended by the consul C. Papirius Carbo, and was acquitted. (Liv. Ep. 61; Cic. de Or. ii. 25, 106.) In 112 he was at the head of the commission which was sent into Africa in order to divide the dominions of Micipsa between Jugurtha and Adherbal, and was bribed by Jugurtha to assign to him the better part of the country. Three years after, he was condemned under the law of the tribune C. Mamilius Limetanus, by which an inquiry was made into the conduct of all those who had received bribes from Jugurtha. (Sall. Jug. 16, 40; Vell. Pat. ii. 7.) Opimius went into exile to Dyrrhachium in Epirus, where he lived for some years, hated and insulted by the people, and where he eventually died in great poverty. He richly deserved his punishment, and met with a due recompense for his cruel and ferocious conduct towards C. Gracchus and his party. Cicero, on the contrary, who, after his consulship, had identified himself with the aristocratical party, frequently laments the fate of Opimius. The year in which Opimius was consul (121) was remarkable for the extraordinary heat of the autumn, and thus the vintage of this year was of an unprecedented quality. This wine long remained celebrated as the Vinum Opimianum. (Cic. Brut. 83, 287.)

the Tigris; not mentioned after the Christian era (Hdt. i. 189; Xen. An. vii. 7; Strab. pp. 80, 529).

Opitergium (Opiterginus: Oderzo), a Roman colony in Venetia in the N. of Italy, on the river Liguentia, and on the high road from Aquileia to Verona. In the Marcomannic war it was destroyed by the Quadi, but it was rebuilt, and afterwards belonged to the Exarchate. From it the neighbouring mountains were called Montes Opitergini. (Strab. p. 214; Lucan, iv. 462; Tac. Hist. iii. 6; Amm. Marc. xxix. 6.)

Oppianus (Ὀππιανός), the name of the authors of two Greek hexameter poems still extant, one on fishing, entitled Halieutica (ἁλιευτικά), and the other on hunting, entitled Cynegetica (κυνηγετικά). Modern critics have shown that these two poems were written by two different persons of this name. 1. The author of the Halieutica was born either at Corycus or at Anazarba, in Cilicia, and flourished about A.D. 180. The poem consists of about 3500 hexameter lines, divided into five books, of which the first two treat of the natural history of fishes, and the other three of the art of fishing.—2. The author of the Cynegetica was a native of Apamea or Pella, in Syria, and flourished a little later than the other Oppianus, about A.D. 206. His poem, which is addressed to the emperor Caracalla, consists of about 2100 hexameter lines, divided into four books. Editions of the two poems by Schneider, Lips. 1813, and by F. Lehrs, 1846. There is also a prose paraphrase by Eutechnius of a poem on fowling (ἰευντικά) attributed to Oppianus, but the authorship of the original is doubtful.

Oppius. 1. C., tribune of the plebs B. C. 213, carried a law, under pressure of the second Punic war, to curtail the expenses and luxuries of Roman women. This law was repealed in 195, notwithstanding the vehement opposition of the elder Cato (Liv. xxxiv. 1–8; Val. Max. ix. 1, 3; Tac. Ann. iii. 33).—2. Q., a Roman general in the Mithridatic war, B. C. 88, fell into the hands of Mithridates, but was subsequently surrendered by the latter to Sulla (Liv. Ep. 78; App. Mithr. 17, 20, 112).—3. P., quaestor to M. Aurelius Cotta in Bithynia, B. C. 74, was accused of misappropriation of supplies and also of drawing his sword upon his commander; he was tried in 69 and defended by Cicero in a speech of which only a few fragments remain (Dio Cass. xxxvi. 23; Quintil. v. 13, 17).—4. C., an intimate friend of C. Julius Caesar, whose private affairs he managed in conjunction with Cornelius Balbus (Cic. ad Att. ix. 7, 13, xi. 17, xii. 19, ad Fam. ii. 16). Oppius wrote a Life of Caesar (Plut. Pomp. 10; Suet. Jul. 53), and of Scipio Africanus the elder (Gell. vi. 1, 2). Some believed Oppius to have been the author of the continuation of Caesar's Commentaries (the Bell. Alex., Afr. and Hisp.). This is untenable as regards the two last and improbable as regards the first. The style of the African and Spanish Wars is too poor to be the work of a man with the reputation of Oppius, and it is clear that the author was present in both wars, whereas Oppius at that time was at Rome. There is thought to be some indication in Bell. Alex. (3, 1; 19, 6) that the author was present (which was not the case with either Hirtius or Oppius), but the evidence here is not conclusive [cf. HIRTIIUS].

Ops, a Roman goddess of plenty and fertility, as is indicated by her name, which is connected with opimus, opulentus, inops, and copia. She was regarded as the wife of Saturnus, and the protectress of everything connected with agriculture. (Varro, L. L. vi. 22; Macrob. i. 10, 18.) As goddess of the earth and its fruits, Ops was also a goddess of the underworld, which is indicated by the ancient custom that her worshippers paid their vows crouching down and touching the earth (Macrob. i. 10, 12, iii. 9, 12), which was the attitude of the Greeks in invoking Hades and Persephone (Il. ix. 564). In the three days' summer festival held by the Fratres Arvales, Ops was worshipped with offerings of first-fruits and sacrifices under the name of Dea Dia (who is identified with Ops). [For the ritual see Dict. of Ant. art. Fratres Arvales.] As goddess of seed-time she was called Ops Consiva, whence her August festivals are called Opiconsivia. Her worship was intimately connected with that of Saturnus, and it is probable that the festival of the Opalia in the Forum on December 17, during the period of the Saturnalia, were held in the temple of Saturn. The temple of Ops was on the Capitol (Liv. xxxix. 22; Plin. vi. 174; C. I. L. vi. 507). Here was the treasury of which Cicero speaks (Phil. ii. 37, 93). There was also a sacrum of Ops in the Regia, which contained sacred vessels of the most ancient form [Dict. of Ant. art. Praefriculum]. Her worship was intimately connected with that of her husband Saturnus, for she had both temples and festivals in common with him; but she had likewise a separate sanctuary on the Capitol, and in the Vicus Jugarius, not far from the temple of Saturnus, she had an altar in common with Ceres.

Opus (Ὀπούς, cont. of Ὀπόεις: Ὀπούντιος). 1. (Talanda or Talanti?), the capital of the Opuntian Locrians, was situated, according to Strabo (p. 425), fifteen stadia (two miles) from the sea, and sixty stadia from its harbour Cynos; but, according to Livy (xxviii. 6), it was only one mile from the coast. It was the birthplace of Patroclus (Il. xviii. 326). The bay of the Euboean sea near this town was called Opuntius Sinus. [LOCRI].—2. A small town in Elis.

Ora. 1. (Ὀρα) a city of Carmania, near the borders of Gedrosia (Ptol. vi. 8, 14).—2. (Ὀρα), a city in the N.W. of India, near the sources of the Indus (Arrian, An. iv. 27).

Orae. [ORITAE.]

Orbēlus (Ὀρβηλος), a mountain in the NE. of Macedonia, on the borders of Thrace, extends from Mt. Rhodope along the Strymon to Mt. Pangaeus (Hdt. v. 16; Strab. p. 329).

Orbilius Pupillus, a Roman grammarian and schoolmaster, the teacher of Horace, who gives him the epithet of plagosus from the severe floggings which his pupils received from him. (Hor. Ep. ii. 1, 71). He was a native of Beneventum, and after serving as an apparitor of the magistrates, and also as a soldier in the army, settled at Rome in the fiftieth year of his age, in the consulship of Cicero, B. C. 63. He lived nearly 100 years, but had lost his memory long before his death. (Suet. Gramm. 9.)

Orbōna, an ancient Italian goddess who by slaying children rendered parents childless. She was invoked (to avert her wrath) in the INDIGITAMENTA. (Tertull. ad Nat. ii. 15; Arnob. iv. 7.) Her sanctuary is mentioned by Cic. N. D. iii. 25, 63 (cf. Plin. ii. 16) as on the Via Sacra.

Orcādes Insulae (Orkney and Shetland Isles), a group of several small islands off the N. coast of Britain, with which the Romans first became acquainted when Agricola sailed round the N. of Britain (Tac. Agr. 10; Ptol. ii. 3, 31).

Orchōmēnus (Ὀρχόμενος: Ὀρχομένιος). 1.

(Scripu), an ancient, wealthy, and powerful city of Boeotia, the capital of the Minyeian empire in the prehistorical ages of Greece, and hence called by Homer the Minyeian Orchomenos (Ὀρχ. Μινυόειος, Il. ii. 511). It was situated NW. of the lake Copais, on the river Cephissus, and was built on the slope of a hill on the summit of which stood the acropolis. It is said to have been originally called Andrēis (Ἀνδρηῖς), from Andrews, the son of Peneus, who emigrated from the Peneus in Thessaly; to have been afterwards called Phlegya (Φλεγύα), from Phlegyas, a son of Ares and Chryse; and to have finally obtained its later name from Orchomenus, son of Zeus or Eteocles and the Danaid Hesione, and father of Minyas (Paus. ix. 34-36). This Orchomenus was regarded as the real founder of the Minyeian empire, which before the time of the Trojan war extended over the whole of the W. of Boeotia. Orchomenus, the ruling town of all this district, is described as one of the wealthiest cities in Greece (Il. ix. 381). According to the legends of Thebes it was Heracles who freed that city from its subjection to Orchomenus (Paus. ix. 37, 2; Strab. p. 414; Diod. iv. 18). After the Trojan war the power of the Minyae was overthrown by immigrants from Thessaly, and Orchomenus became merely a member of the Boeotian League, subordinate in power to Thebes. [BOEOTIA.] Orchomenus continued to exist as an independent town till B. C. 367, when it was taken and destroyed by the Thebans, and its inhabitants murdered or sold as slaves (Diod. xv. 79; Paus. ix. 15, 3). In order to weaken Thebes, it was rebuilt at the instigation of the Athenians, but was soon destroyed again by the Thebans, and, although it was again restored by Philip in 338, it never recovered its former prosperity, and in the time of Strabo was in ruins. The most celebrated building in Orchomenus was the so-called treasury of Minyas, which, like the similar monuments at Mycenae, was really a tomb of the ancient princes. It was completely excavated and explored by Schliemann in 1880. It had a passage, or dromos, leading to the vaulted or beehive chamber and another spare room, remarkable for its beautifully-decorated ceiling. The decorations, as well as the general form of the tombs, show the connexion of the Orchomenus of that date as regards art and civilisation with Mycenae [see p. 580, a]. Orchomenus possessed a very ancient temple of the Charites or Graces; and here was celebrated in the most ancient times a musical festival which was frequented by poets and singers from all parts of the Hellenic world (Pind. Pyth. xii. 45; Theocr. xvi. 104). There was a temple of Heracles seven stadia N. of the town, near the sources of the river Melas. Orchomenus is memorable on account of the victory which Sulla gained in its neighbourhood over Archelaus, the general of Mithridates, B. C. 85.—2. (Kalpaki), an ancient town of Arcadia, mentioned by Homer with the epithet πολύμηλος, to distinguish it from the Minyeian Orchomenus (Il. ii. 605; cf. Ov. Met. vi. 413), is said to have been founded by Orchomenus, son of Lycan (Paus. viii. 3, 3). It was situated on a hill NW. of Mantinea, and its territory included the towns of Methydrium, Theisoa, Teuthis, and the Tripolis. In the Peloponnesian war Orchomenus sided with Sparta, and was taken by the Athenians (Thuc. v. 61). After the battle of Leuctra the Orchomenians did not join the Arcadian confederacy, in consequence of its hatred against Mantinea. In the contests between the Achaeans and Aetolians, it was taken successively by Cleomenes and Antigonos Doson; but it eventually became a member of the Achaean League. (Pol. ii. 46, 54, iv. 6; Liv. xxxiii. 5.)

Orcus. [HADES.]

Ordessus (Ὀρδησσός), a tributary of the Ister (Danube) in Scythia, but cannot be identified with any modern river (Hdt. iv. 48).

Ordovices, a people of Britain, opposite the island Mona (Anglesey), occupying the N. portion of Wales (Tac. Ann. xii. 38, Agr. 18).

Orēades. [NYMPHAE.]

Orestae (Ὀρέσται), a people in the N. of Epirus on the borders of Macedonia, inhabiting the district named after them, Orestis or Orestias. They were originally independent, but were afterwards subject to the Macedonian monarchs. They were declared free by the Romans in their war with Philip. According to the legend, they derived their name from Orestes, who is said to have fled into this country after murdering his mother, and to have there founded the town of Argos Oresticum. (Thuc. ii. 80; Strab. pp. 326, 434; Pol. xviii. 30.)

Orestes (Ὀρέστης). 1. Son of Agamemnon and Clytaemnestra, and brother of Chrysothemis, Laodice (Electra), and Iphianassa (Iphigenia). The Homeric account only tells us that in the eighth year after his father's murder Orestes came from Athens to Mycenae and slew the murderer of his father (Od. iii. 306; cf. i. 30, 298, iv. 546). From Od. xi. 542 it appears that Orestes was not in Mycenae at the time of his father's murder. To this story much is added by later writers. Thus it is said that at the murder of Agamemnon it was intended to despatch Orestes also, but that by means of Electra he was secretly carried to Strophius, king in Phocis, who was married to Anaxibia, the sister of Agamemnon. According to some, Orestes was saved by his nurse, who allowed Aegisthus to kill her own child, supposing it to be Orestes (Pind. Pyth. xi. 25; Aesch. Cho. 732). In the house of Strophius, Orestes grew up with the king's son Pylades, with whom he formed that close and intimate friendship which has become proverbial. Being frequently reminded by messengers from Electra of the necessity of avenging his father's death, he consulted the oracle of Delphi, which strengthened him in his plan. He therefore repaired in secret to Argos. Here he pretended to be a messenger of Strophius who had come to announce the death of Orestes and brought the ashes of the deceased (Soph. El. 11, 35, 296, 531, 1346; Eur. El. 1245, Orest. 162, 804). In Homer it is not said that Orestes slew Clytaemnestra as well as Aegisthus, and the inference from the unqualified praise of his action in the Odyssey is that he did not kill his mother; but in the tragedians, after visiting his father's tomb, and sacrificing upon it a lock of his hair, he made himself known to his sister Electra, and soon afterwards slew both Aegisthus and Clytaemnestra in the palace. Immediately after the murder of his mother he was seized with madness. He now fled from land to land, pursued by the Erinnyes of his mother. At length by Apollo's advice, he took refuge with Athene at Athens. The goddess afforded him protection, and appointed the court of the Areiopagus to decide his fate. The Erinnyes brought forward their accusation, and Orestes made the command of the Delphic oracle his excuse. When the court voted, and was equally divided, Orestes was acquitted by the command of Athene (Aesch. Eumenides). According to another modification of the legend, Orestes asked Apollo how he could be delivered from his madness and incessant wandering. The god advised him to go to Tauris in Scythia, and to fetch from that country the image of Artemis, which was believed to have fallen there from heaven, and to carry it to Athens (Eur. Iph. Taur. 79, 968; cf. Paus. iii. 16, 6). Orestes and Pylades accordingly went to Tauris, where Thoas was king. On their arrival they were seized by the natives, in order to be sacrificed to Artemis, according to the custom of the country. But Iphigenia, the priestess of Artemis, was the sister of Orestes, and, after recognising each other, all three escaped with the statue of the goddess. After his return to Peloponnesus Orestes took possession of his father's kingdom at Mycenae, which had been usurped by Aletes or Menelaus. When Cylarabes of Argos died without leaving any heir, Orestes also became king of Argos. The Lacedaemonians likewise made him their king of their own accord, because they preferred him, the grandson of Tyn-dareus, to Nicostratus and Megapenthes, the sons of Menelaus by a slave. The Arcadians and Phocians increased his power by allying themselves with him (Paus. ii. 18, 5, iii. 1, 4; cf. Pind. Pyth. xi. 24). He married Hermione, the daughter of Menelaus, and became by her the father of Tisamenus. The story of his marriage with Hermione, who had previously been married to Neoptolemus, is related elsewhere. [HERMIONE; NEOPTOLEMUS.] He died of the bite of a snake in Arcadia (Schol. ad Eur. Orest. 1640), and his body, in accordance with an oracle, was afterwards carried from Tegea to Sparta, and there buried. His bones are said to have been found at a later time in a war between the Lacedaemonians and Tegeatans, and to have been conveyed to Sparta (Hdt. i. 67; Paus. iii. 11, 8, viii. 54, 3). According to the Arcadian story Orestes had dwelt during his time of madness in Arcadia having gone there from Mycenae in obedience to an oracle (Paus. viii. 5, 4). To this there is a further addition that in his frenzy he gnawed off one of his fingers, a story which seems to have originated in the name of a tomb near Megalopolis called Δακτύλου μνήμα (Paus. viii. 34, 2).—2. Regent of Italy during the short reign of his infant son Romulus Augustulus, A.D. 475–476. He was born in Pannonia, and served for some years under Attila; after whose death he rose to eminence at the Roman court. Having been entrusted with the command of an army by Julius Nepos, he deposed this emperor, and placed his own son Romulus Augustulus on the throne; but in the following year he was defeated by Odoacer and put to death. [ODOACER].—3. L. Aurelius Orestes, consul B. C. 126, received Sardinia as his province, where he remained upwards of three years. C. Gracchus was quaestor to Orestes in Sardinia (Plut. C. Gracch. i. 2).—4. Cn. Aufidius Orestes, consul B. C. 71, originally belonged to the Aurelia gens, whence his surname of Orestes, and was adopted by Cn. Aufidius, the historian. (Cic. Off. ii. 17; Eutrop. vi. 8).

Orestēum, Oresthēum, or Oresthasium (Ὀρέστειον, Ὀρέσθειον, Ὀρεσθάσιον), a town in the S. of Arcadia in the district Maenalia, near Megalopolis (Thuc. v. 64; Paus. viii. 44, 2).

Orestheus (Ὀρεσθεύς), a legendary king of the Locri Ozolae, son of Deucalion. His dog brought forth a log of wood, which Orestheus buried: from it sprang up the shoots (ῥῆζοι) of the vine. Hence the name of his people. (Paus. x. 31, 1; LocRL)

Orestias. 1. The country of the Orestae. [ORESTAE].—2. A name frequently given by the Byzantine writers to Hadrianopolis in Thrace.

Orestilla, Aurelia. [AURELIA.]

Orētāni, a powerful people in the SW. of Hispania Tarraconensis, bounded on the S. by Baetica, on the N. by the Carpetani, on the W. by Lusitania, and on the E. by the Bastetani (Plin. iii. 25). Their chief town was CASTULO.

Oreus (Ὀρεός: Ὀρεῖτης: Orsi), a town in the N. of Euboea, on the river Callas, at the foot of the mountain Telethrium, and in the district Hestiaeotis, was itself originally called Hestiaeae or Histiaeae. According to some it was a colony from the Attic deme Histiaeae (Strab. p. 445). After the Persian wars Oreus, with the rest of Euboea, became subject to the Athenians; but on the revolt of the island, in B. C. 445, Oreus was taken by Pericles, its inhabitants expelled, and their place supplied by 2000 Athenians (Thuc. i. 114; Diod. xii. 7, 22). Oreus was an important place, and its name frequently occurs in the Grecian wars down to the dissolution of the Achaean League (Xen. Hell. v. 4, 56; Dem. de Cor. pp. 248, 252; Diod. xix. 75; Pol. xviii. 30; Liv. xxxi. 46).

Orfitus, 1. Ser. Cornelius, consul A.D. 51, was put to death in Nero's reign through the informer Regulus (Tac. Ann. xii. 41, Hist. iv. 42).—2. Paccius, a centurion of Corbulo's army (Tac. Ann. xiii. 36, xv. 12).

Orgetōrix, the noblest and richest among the Helvetii, formed a conspiracy to obtain the royal power B. C. 61, and persuaded his countrymen to emigrate from their own country. Two years were devoted to making the necessary preparations; but the real designs of Orgetorix having meantime become known, and the Helvetii having attempted to bring him to trial, he suddenly died, probably, as was suspected, by his own hands. (Caes. B. G. i. 2, 26; Dio Cass. xxxviii. 31.)

Oribasius (Ὀρειβάσιος or Ὀριβάσιος), an eminent Greek medical writer, born about A.D. 325, either at Sardis in Lydia, or at Pergamum in Mysia. He was an intimate friend of the emperor Julian, and was almost the only person to whom Julian imparted the secret of his apostasy from Christianity. He accompanied Julian in his expedition against Persia, and was with him at the time of his death, 363. The succeeding emperors, Valentinian and Valens, confiscated the property of Oribasius and banished him. He was afterwards recalled from exile, and was alive at least as late as 395. Of the personal character of Oribasius we know little or nothing, but it is clear that he was much attached to paganism and to the heathen philosophy. He was an intimate friend of Eunapius, who praises him very highly, and wrote an account of his life. We possess at present three works of Oribasius: (1) Collecta Medicinalia (Συναγωγὰ ἱατρικὰ), or sometimes Hebdomontabiblos (Ἑβδομηκοντάβιβλος), which was compiled at the command of Julian, when Oribasius was still a young man. It contains but little original matter, but is very valuable on account of the numerous extracts from writers whose works are no longer extant. More than half of this work is now lost, and what remains is in some confusion. There is no complete edition of the work. (2) An abridgment (Σύνοψις) of the former work, in nine books. It was written thirty years after the former. (3) Euporista or De facile Parabilibus (Εὐπόριστα), in four books. Both this and the preceding work were intended as manuals of the practice of medicine. The best edition is by Daremberg, Paris, 1851-1876.

Oricum or Oricus (Ὀρικόν, Ὀρικός: Ὀρίκιος: Ericho), an important Greek town on the coast of Illyria, near the Ceraunian mountains and the frontiers of Epirus (Hdt. ix. 92; Pol. vii. 19; Hor. Od. iii. 7, 5; Propert. i. 8, 20; Caes. B. C. iii. 11). According to tradition it was founded by the Euboeans, who were cast here by a storm on their return from Troy; but, according to another legend it was a Colchian colony (Scymn. 440; Ap. Rh. iv. 12-16). The town was strongly fortified, but its harbour was not very secure. It was destroyed in the civil wars, but was rebuilt by Herodes Atticus. The turpentine tree (terebinthus) grew in the neighbourhood of Oricum (Verg. Aen. x. 186).

Origènes, usually called Origen, one of the most eminent of the early Christian writers, born at Alexandria, A.D. 186. [See Dict. of Christian Biogr.]

Oringis, Oningis or Aurinx, a wealthy town in Hispania Baetica, with silver mines, near Munda (Liv. xxiv. 42, xxviii. 3; Plin. iii. 3).

Orion (Ὀρίων), son of Hyrieus, of Hyria, in Boeotia, a handsome giant and hunter (Od. xi. 309), said to have been called by the Boeotians Candaon (Strab. p. 404; Tzet. ad Lyc. 328). In the Homeric story he is carried off by Eos on account of his beauty [cf. p. 316, b], but the gods were angry with him and Artemis slew him with her arrows in Ortygia (Od. v. 121). The story given by most later writers is that he came to Chios (Ophiussa), and fell in love with Aero, or Merope, the daughter of Oenopion, by the nymph Helice. He cleared the island from wild beasts, and brought the spoils of the chase as presents to his beloved; but as Oenopion constantly deferred the marriage, Orion once, when intoxicated, offered violence to the maiden. Oenopion now implored the assistance of Dionysus, who caused Orion to be thrown into a deep sleep by satyrs, in which state Oenopion deprived him of his sight. Being informed by an oracle that he should recover his sight if he would go towards the east and expose his eye-balls to the rays of the rising sun, Orion followed the sound of a Cyclops' hammer, went to Lemnos, where Hephaestus gave to him Cedalion as his guide. Having recovered his sight, Orion returned to Chios to take vengeance on Oenopion; but as the latter had been concealed by his friends, Orion was unable to find him, and then proceeded to Crete, where he lived as a hunter with Artemis. (Apollod. i. 4, 3; Parthen. Erot. 20; Hyg. Astr. ii. 34). The cause of his death, which took place either in Crete or Chios, is differently stated, but, as in the Odyssey, Artemis is in most accounts the author of his death. It is possible that he was a local god of the woods and of hunting whose worship was displaced by that of Artemis. According to some, he was beloved by Artemis, and Apollo, indignant at his sister's affection for him, asserted that she was unable to hit with her arrow a distant point which he showed her in the sea. She thereupon took aim, and hit it, but the point was the head of Orion, who had been swimming in the sea. (Hyg. l. c.) Another account, which Horace follows (Hor. Od. iii. 4, 72; cf. Apollod. i. 4, 5; Serv. ad Aen. i. 539), states that he attempted to violate Artemis, and was killed by the goddess with one of her arrows. Lastly, the story followed by Ovid states that he boasted he would conquer every animal, and would clear the earth from all wild beasts; but the earth sent forth a scorpion which destroyed him (Ov. Fast. v. 537). Asclepius attempted to recall him to life, but was slain by Zeus with a flash of lightning. The accounts of his parentage and birthplace vary in the different writers, for some call him a son of Poseidon and Euryale, and others say that he was born of the Earth, or a son of Oenopion. He is further called a Theban, or Tanagraean, but probably because Hyria, his native place, sometimes belonged to Tanagra and sometimes to Thebes. (Apollod. i. 4, 3; Hyg. l. c.; Strab. p. 404; Paus. ix. 20, 3.) After his death, Orion was placed among the stars, where he appears as a giant with a girdle, sword, a lion's skin and a club (Il. xviii. 486, xxii. 29; Od. v. 274). The constellation of Orion set at the commencement of November, at which time storms and rain were frequent; hence he is often called imbrifer, nimbosus, or aquosus.

Orion and Orus (Ὀρίων and Ὀρος), names of ancient grammarians, who are sometimes confounded with each other. It appears that three writers of these names are to be distinguished. —1. Orion, a Theban grammarian, who taught at Caesarea, in the fifth century A.D. and is the author of a lexicon, still extant, published by Sturz, Lips. 1820. —2. Orus, of Miletus, a grammarian, lived in the second century A.D., and was the author of the works mentioned by Suidas. —3. Orus, an Alexandrine grammarian, who taught at Constantinople about the middle of the fourth century A.D.

Oritae, Horitae, or Orae (Ὀρίται, Ὀραι), a people of Gedrosia, who inhabited a district on the coast nearly two hundred miles long, abounding in wine, corn, rice, and palm-trees, the modern Urboo on the coast of Beloochistan. Some of the ancient writers assert that they were of Indian origin, while others say that, though they resembled the Indians in many of their customs, they spoke a different language. (Arrian, Ann. vi. 21; Strab. 720; Curt. ix. 10, 6.)

Orithyia. [BOREAS.]

Ormēnus (Ὀρμενός), son of Cercaphus, grandson of Aeolus and father of Amyntor, was believed to have founded the town of Ormenium, in Thessaly. From him Amyntor is sometimes called Ormenides, and Astydamia, his grand-daughter, Ormenis.

Orneae (Ὀρνεαί: Ὀρνεάρις), an ancient town of Argolis, near the frontiers of the territory of Phlius, and 120 stadia from Argos (Il. ii. 734, vi. 7; Paus. ii. 25, 6, v. 25, 5; Strab. p. 382). The inhabitants were at an early time reduced to the condition of Perioeci or dependents of Argos, and apparently were the first people in Argolis so reduced; for the Argives used the term Ὀρνεάρις as equivalent to Περίοικοι (Hdt. viii. 73). They had, however, sufficient independence of action to be called allies of Argos in the Peloponnesian war, B.C. 418; but in 416 the Lacedaemonians placed the Argive exiles, with some supports of their own men, in Orneae. The citizens of Argos soon afterwards attacked the town and destroyed it. (Thuc. vi. 7.)

Orneus (Ὀρνεός), son of Erechtheus, father of Peteus, and grandfather of Menestheus; from him the town of Orneae was believed to have derived its name (Il. ii. 571; Paus. ii. 25, 5).

Oroanda (Ὀρόανδα: Ὀροανδεύς, or -ικός, Oroandensis), a mountain city of Pisidia, SE. of Antiochia, from which the Oroandicus tractus obtained its name (Liv. xxxviii. 18, 37).

Oroātis ('Οροάτις: Tab.), the largest of the minor rivers which flow into the Persian Gulf, formed the boundary between Susiana and Persis (Strab. p. 727).

Orōbiae ('Οροβίαι), a town on the coast of Euboea, not far from Aegae, with an oracle of Apollo (Strab. p. 445).

Orōdes ('Ορώδης), the name of two kings of Parthia. [ARSACES XIV., XVII.]

Oroetes ('Οροίτης), a Persian, was made satrap of Sardis by Cyrus, which government he retained under Cambyzes. In B.C. 522, he decoyed POLYCRATES into his power by specious promises, and put him to death. (Hdt. i. 69, iii. 39; Thuc. i. 18; Arist. Pol. i. 10.) But being suspected of aiming at the establishment of an independent sovereignty, he was himself put to death by order of Darius (Hdt. iii. 120-128.)

Orontes ('Ορόντης). 1. (Nahr-el-Asy), the largest river of Syria (whence Juv. iii. 62 uses its name to express the Syrian people), has two chief sources in Coele Syria, the one in the Anti-Libanus, the other further N. in the Libanus; flows NE. into a lake S. of Emesa, and thence N. past Epiphania and Apamea, till near Antioch, where it suddenly sweeps round to the SW. and falls into the sea at the foot of M. Pieria. According to tradition its earlier name was Typhon (Τυφών), and it was called Orontes from the person who first built a bridge over it. (Strab. p. 750).—2. A mountain on the S. side of the Caspian, between Parthia and Hyrcania (Ptol. vi. 2, 4).—3. A people of Assyria, E. of Gaugamela (Plin. vi. 30).

Orōpus ('Ορωπός: 'Ορώπιος: Oropo), a town on the eastern frontiers of Boeotia and Attica, near the Euripus, originally belonged to the Boeotians, but was at an early time seized by the Athenians, and was long an object of contention between the two peoples (Paus. i. 34, 1). The Boeotians got possession of it in 412 (Thuc. viii. 60); Philip gave it to the Athenians after Chaeronea, but in 312 Cassander handed it over to the Boeotians (Diod. xix. 77; Strab. p. 404). At a later time Pausanias speaks of it as belonging to Attica. Its seaport was Delphinium, at the mouth of the Asopus, about one mile and a half from the town.

Orōsius, Paulus, a Spanish presbyter, a native of Tarragona, lived under Arcadius and Honorius. Having conceived a warm admiration for St. Augustine, he passed over into Africa about A.D. 413. The following works by Orosius are still extant. (1) Historiarum adversus Paganos Libri VII., dedicated to St. Augustine, at whose suggestion the task was undertaken. The Pagans having been accustomed to complain that the ruin of the Roman empire must be ascribed to the wrath of the ancient deities, whose worship had been abandoned, Orosius, upon his return from Palestine, composed this history to demonstrate that from the earliest epoch the world had been the scene of calamities as great as the Roman empire was then suffering. The work, which extends from the creation down to A.D. 417, is, with exception of the concluding portion, extracted from various authorities. For Roman history he used chiefly an abridged Livy, and Florus; for the imperial period chiefly Eutropius, but also Tacitus and Suetonius; for general history Justin is his main authority. The later part of his history is of value as giving information on many points not procurable now from other sources. Edited by Havercamp, Lugd. Bat. 1738; by Zangermeister, Vienna, 1882. [For other writings of Orosius see Dict. of Christian Biog.]

Orospeda ('Ορόσπεδα), a mountain chain in the SW. of Hispania Tarraconensis, between Castulo and Carthago Nova. It is the modern Sagra Sierra. (Strab. p. 161.)

Orpheus ('Ορφεύς), a mythical personage, was regarded by the Greeks as the most celebrated of the early poets who lived before the time of Homer. It is possible that he may have had a real existence as the author or bard of very ancient religious hymns. Such hymns were ascribed to Olen, Musaeus, Philammon, and Orpheus; and around all these names, and especially around the last, mythical stories gathered. Orpheus is not mentioned in the Homeric or Hesiodic poems, but had attained to great celebrity in the lyric period, at any rate as early as Ibycus, in the middle of the sixth century B.C. (Ibyc. Fr. 22); and by Pindar he is called 'the Father of songs' (Pyth. iv. 177; cf. Plat. Apol. p. 41). There were numerous legends about Orpheus, but the common story ran as follows. Orpheus, the son of Oeagrus and Calliope, lived in Thrace at the period of the Argonauts, whom he accompanied in their expedition (Pind. l.c.; cf. Plat. Symp. p. 179). Presented with the lyre by Apollo, and instructed by the Muses in its use, he enchanted with its music, not only the wild beasts, but the trees and rocks upon Olympus, so that they moved from their places to follow the sound of his golden harp (Aesch. Ag. 1629; Eur. Med. 543, Bacch. 561; Hor. Od. i. 12, 7). The power of his music caused the Argonauts to seek his aid, which contributed materially to the success of their expedition: at the sound of his lyre the Argo glided down into the sea; the Argonauts tore themselves away from the pleasures of Lemnos; the Symplegadae, or moving rocks, which threatened to crush the ship between them, were fixed in their places; and the Colchian dragon, which guarded the golden fleece, was lulled to sleep: other legends of the same kind may be read in the Argonautica, which bears the name of Orpheus. After his return from the Argonautic expedition he took up his abode in a cave near Thrace, and employed himself in the civilisation of its wild inhabitants. There is also a legend of his having visited Egypt. The legends respecting the loss and recovery of his wife, and his own death, are very various. His wife was a nymph named Agriope or Eurydice. In the older accounts the cause of her death is not referred to. The legend followed in the well-known passages of Virgil and Ovid, which ascribes the death of Eurydice to the bite of a serpent, is no doubt of high antiquity; but the introduction of Aristaeus into the story cannot be traced to any writer older than Virgil himself. (Verg. Georg. iv. 454-527; Ov. Met. x. 1; cf. Plat. Symp. p. 179, Rep. p. 620; Diod. iv. 25; Paus. ix. 30, 4; Hyg. Fab. 164.) He followed his lost wife into the abodes of Hades, where the charms of his lyre suspended the torments of the damned, and won back his wife from the most inexorable of all deities; but his prayer was only granted upon this condition, that he should not look back upon his restored wife till they had arrived in the upper world: at the very moment when they were about to pass the fatal bounds, the anxiety of love overcame the poet; he looked round to see that Eurydice was following him; and he beheld her caught back into the infernal regions. His grief for the loss of Eurydice led him to treat with contempt the Thracian women, who in revenge tore him to pieces under the excitement of their Bacchanalian orgies. After his death, the Muses collected the fragments of his body, and buried them at Libethra at the foot of Olympus, where the nightingale sang sweetly over his grave. His head was thrown into the Hebrus, down which it rolled into the sea, and was borne across to Lesbos, where the grave in which it was interred was shown at Antissa. His lyre was also said to have been carried to Lesbos; and both traditions are simply poetical expressions of the historical fact that Lesbos was the first great seat of the music of the lyre: indeed Antissa itself was the birthplace of Terpander, the earliest historical musician. The astronomers taught that the lyre of Orpheus was placed by Zeus among the stars, at the intercession of Apollo and the Muses (Hyg. Astr. ii. 7). In these legends there are some points which are sufficiently clear. The invention of music, in connexion with the services of Apollo and the Muses; its first great application to the worship of the gods, which Orpheus is therefore said to have introduced; its power over the passions, and the importance which the Greeks attached to the knowledge of it, as intimately allied with the very existence of all social order—are probably the chief elementary ideas of the whole legend. But then comes in one of the dark features of the Greek religion, in which the gods envy the advancement of man in knowledge and civilisation, and punish anyone who transgresses the bounds assigned to humanity: or the conflict was viewed, not as between the gods and man, but between the worshippers of different divinities: between Apollo, the symbol of pure intellect, and Dionysus, the deity of the senses; hence Orpheus, the servant of Apollo, falls a victim to the jealousy of Dionysus and the fury of his worshippers.—Orphic Societies and Mysteries. About the time of the first development of Greek philosophy, societies were formed, consisting of persons called the followers of Orpheus (οἱ Ὀρφικοί), who, under the pretended guidance of Orpheus, dedicated themselves to the worship of Dionysus. They performed the rites of a mystical worship, but instead of confining their notions to the initiated, they published them to others, and committed them to literary works. Hence Orpheus is spoken of as the originator of mysteries (Eur. Hipp. 953, Rhes. 944; Aristoph. Ran. 1032). The Dionysus to whose worship the Orphic rites were annexed was Dionysus Zagreus, closely connected with Demeter and Core (Persephone) [see p. 296]. The Orphic legends and poems related in great part to this Dionysus, upon whom the Orphic mystics founded their hopes of the purification and ultimate immortality of the soul. But their mode of celebrating this worship was very different from the popular rites of Bacchus. The Orphic worshippers of Bacchus did not indulge in unrestrained pleasure and frantic enthusiasm, but rather aimed at an ascetic purity of life and manners. The Orpheus of this mythology has an Oriental and Egyptian character, differing altogether from Orpheus the servant of Apollo and the Muses.—Many poems ascribed to Orpheus were current as early as the time of the Pisistratids. [ONOMACRITUS.] They are often quoted by Plato, and the allusions to them in later writers are very frequent (Plat. Crat. p. 402, Phileb. p. 66, Rep. p. 364; Paus. ix. 30). The extant poems which bear the name of Orpheus are the forgeries of Christian grammarians and philosophers of the Alexandrian school; but among the fragments, which form a part of the collection, are some genuine remains of that Orphic poetry which was known to Plato, and which must be assigned to the period of Onomacritus, or perhaps a little earlier. The Orphic literature which in this sense may be called genuine seems to have included Hymns, a Theogony, Oracles, &c. The apocryphal productions which have come down to us are: (1) Argonautica, an epic poem in 1384 hexameters, giving an account of the expedition of the Argonauts. (2) Hymns, eighty-seven or eighty-eight in number, in hexameters, evidently the productions of the Neo-Platonic school. (3) Lithica (Λιθικά), treats of properties of stones, both precious and common, and their uses in divination. (4) Fragments, chiefly of the Theogony. It is in this class that we find the genuine remains of the literature of the early Orphic theology, but intermingled with others of much later date.—Editions by Hermann, 1805, Gesner, 1764; the Lithica by Abel, 1881.

Orthia (Ὀρθία), a name under which Artemis was worshipped at Limnaeum in Laconia, where boys were scourged at her altar. This rite is usually explained as having replaced human sacrifices of an earlier period [see p. 128]; but some modern writers connect it with the severe ordeals through which boys are made to pass in many uncivilised tribes at the time of puberty.

Orthōsia (Ὀρθωσία). 1. A city of Caria, on the Maeander, with a mountain of the same name, where the Rhodians defeated the Carians, B. C. 167 (Strab. p. 650; Pol. xxx. 5; Liv. xlv. 25).—2. A city of Phoenice, S. of the Eleutherus, 12 Roman miles from Tripolis (Strab. p. 753).

Orthrus (Ὀρθρος), the two-headed dog of Geryones, who was begotten by Typhon and Echidna, and was slain by Heracles. [See p. 398, b.]

Ortōna (Ὀρτῶν). 1. An ancient town of Latium, on the borders of the Aequi, not far from Mt. Algidus. It was taken by the Aequi in B. C. 481 and 457. (Liv. ii. 43, iii. 30; Dionys. viii. 91, x. 26.) It was probably destroyed soon afterwards, as it is not mentioned again.—2. (Ortona a Mare), a town of the Frentani on the Adriatic coast between the rivers Aternus and Sagrus (Strab. p. 242; Ptol. iii. 1, 19).

Ortospana or -um (Ὀρτόσπανα: probably Cabul), a considerable city of the Paropamisadae, at the sources of a W. tributary of the river Coēs, and at the junction of three roads, one leading N. into Bactria, and the others S. and E. into India. It was also called Carura or Cabura. (Strab. pp. 514, 723; Ptol. vi. 18, 5; Amm. Marc. xxiii. 6.)

Ortygia (Ὀρτυγία). 1. The ancient name of Delos. Since Artemis (Diana) and Apollo were born at Delos, the poets sometimes call the goddess Ortygia, and give the name of Ortygiae boves to the oxen of Apollo. The ancients connected the name with Ortyx (Ὀρτυξ) a quail. [See p. 485, b.]—2. An island near Syracuse. [SYRACUSAE.]—3. A grove near Ephesus, in which the Ephesians asserted that Apollo and Artemis were born. Hence Propertius calls the Cayster, which flowed near Ephesus, Ortygius Cayster. [EPHESUS.]

Orus. [HORUS; ORION.]

Osca. 1. (Huesca in Arragonia), an important town of the Ibergetes and a Roman colony in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Tarraco to Ilerda, with silver mines; whence Livy speaks of argentum Oscense, though these words may perhaps mean silver money coined at Osca (Ptol. ii. 6, 68; Liv. xxxiv. 10, 46, xl. 43; Plut. Sert. 14.)—2. (W. of Huescar in Granada), a town of the Turdetani in Hispania Baetica (Ptol. ii. 4, 12).

Oscēla. [LEPONTIL.]

Osci or Opici (Ὀπικοί), appear in very early times to have inhabited a large part of central Italy, from which they had driven out the Siculi. The earliest Greek colonists of the Campanian coast found the people, whom they called Ὀπικοί in possession of that country (Thuc. vi. 4; Ar. Pol. vii. 10). The Ausones seem to have been a branch of the Oscans. In language the Oscans (whose name means 'peasant labourers') belong to the stock from which come the Samnites, but they were subdued by a later Samnite immigration. By a strange mistake Strabo (p. 283) represents the Fabulae Atellanæ as acted at Rome in the Oscan language. This language would have been unintelligible at Rome (Liv. x. 10; Gell. xvii. 17; Macrob. vi. 4, 23), but the plays in question were called Osci ludi, because they had their origin in the Oscan town Atella, and the Oscan country was regarded as the scene of the play.

Osi, a people in Germany, probably in the mountains between the sources of the Oder and the Gran, tributary to the Sarmatians, spoke the Pannonian language (Tac. Germ. 28, 43).

Osicerda. [OSSIGERDA.]

Osiris (Ὀσίρις), the great Egyptian divinity, and husband of Isis. His worship, with that of Isis, was the most widely extended in Egypt (Hdt. ii. 42), and the most highly regarded, because the mysteries of these deities contained the most important secrets of Egyptian wisdom. In Egyptian mythology Ra (Amen-Ra or Khem Ra), the Sun, was father of Shu, the Air; Seb, the son of Shu (whom the Greeks called Cronus and the Latins Saturnus) was the Earth; Osiris was the son of Seb and signified Water, and also in a mystic sense stood for the Past or completed existence. It was natural in Egypt above all countries that the god who was the son of the Earth-deity and himself the deity of Water should be the god of all fruitfulness. On the other hand, as god of the past, Osiris represented the deceased, as Ra represented the reigning king. Moreover, from his connexion with the earth and its fruits, as well as from his being the deity of the past, he was the chief deity of the underworld. According to the story of his life upon earth, he is said to have been originally king of Egypt, and to have reclaimed his subjects from a barbarous life by teaching them agriculture and enacting wise laws. He afterwards travelled into foreign lands, spreading, wherever he went, the blessings of civilisation. On his return to Egypt, he was murdered by his brother Typhon (Set), who shut him up in a chest, poured in molten lead, and then cut his body into pieces, and threw them into the Nile. After a long search Isis discovered the mangled remains of her husband, and buried them at Abydos, in Upper Egypt. Then with the assistance of her son Horus, she defeated Typhon, and recovered the sovereign power, which Typhon had usurped. [See Isis; HORUS.] Osiris was thus regarded as the god of the dead and, through his son Horus, of renewed life. This mythology finds its counterpart in the mysteries of Dionysus-Zagreus [see p. 296], whose story presents many similarities. Hence Osiris was identified with Dionysus by the Greeks. The 'voyage of Osiris,' when in his feast at Abydos he was launched in a sacred ship on the lake has also perhaps some reminiscence in the myths of Dionysus [see p. 294].

Osismii, a people in Gallia Lugdunensis, at the NW. extremity of the coast, and in the neighbourhood of the modern Quimper and Brest (Caes. B. G. iii. 9; Strab. p. 195).

Osroënē (Ὀσροηνή; Ὀσροηνόι, pl.: Pashalik of Orfah), the W. of the two portions into which N. Mesopotamia was divided by the river Chaboras (Khabour), which separated it from Mygdonia on the E. and from the rest of Mesopotamia on the S.; the Euphrates divided it, on the W. and NW., from the Syrian districts of Chalybonitis, Cyrrhестice, and Commagene; and on the N. it was separated by M. Masius from Armenia (Procop. Pers. i. 17; Dio Cass. xl. 19; Amm. Marc. xxiv. 1). Its name was said to be derived from Osroës, an Arabian chieftain, who, in the time of the Seleucidae, established over it a petty principality, with EDESSA for its capital, which lasted till the reign of Caracalla. For its history see ABGARUS.

Ossa (Ὀσσα; Kissavo, i.e. ivy-clad), a celebrated mountain in the N. of Magnesia, in Thessaly, connected with Pelion on the SE., and divided from Olympus on the NW. by the vale of TEMPE. It is one of the highest mountains in Greece, but much less lofty than Olympus. (Od. xi. 312; Hdt. vii. 129; Strab. pp. 430, 442.) It is mentioned by Homer, in the legend of the war of the Giants; respecting which see OLYMPUS.

Osset, with the surname Constantia Julia a town in Hispania Baetica, on the right bank of the Baetis, opposite Hispalis (Plin. iii. 11).

Ossigerda or Osicerda (Ossigerdensis), a town of the Edetani in Hispania Tarraconensis, and a Roman municipium (Plin. iii. 24).

Ossigi (Maquiz), a town of the Turduli in Hispania Baetica, on the spot where the Baetis first enters Baetica (Plin. iii. 10).

Ossonōba (Estoy, N. of Faro), a town of the Turdetani in Lusitania, between the Tagus and Anas (Ptol. ii. 5, 3).

Osteōdes, probably also Ustica (Ὀστεώδης νῆσος; Alicur), an island at some distance from the N. coast of Sicily, opposite the town of Soli, and west of the Aeolian islands (Diod. v. 11). Pliny and Ptolemy distinguish Osteodes from Ustica, but there is only one island to fit the two names (Plin. iii. 92; Ptol. iii. 4, 17).

Ostia (Ostiensis; Ostia), a town at the mouth of the river Tiber, and the harbour of Rome, from which it was distant sixteen miles by land, was situated on the left bank of the left arm of the river. It was founded by Ancus Martius, the fourth king of Rome (who is said to have established the salt-works there), was a Roman colony, and eventually became an important and flourishing town, and a permanent station of the Roman fleet. (Liv. i. 33, xxii. 11, xxv. 20, xxvii. 22; Dionys. iii. 44. Cic. Rep. ii. 3, 18; Strab. p. 232.) In the civil wars it was destroyed by Marius, but it was soon rebuilt with greater splendour than before (App. B. C. i. 67). The emperor Claudius constructed a new and better harbour on the right arm of the Tiber, which was enlarged and improved by Trajan (Dio Cass. lx. 11; Suet. Claud. 20; Juv. xii. 75). This new harbour was called simply Portus Romanus or Portus Augusti, and around it there sprang up a flourishing town, also called Portus (which in the reign of Constantine was made an episcopal see): the inhabitants Portuenses. The old town of Ostia remained for some time a populous city, and was adorned with a forum and other buildings by Hadrian, Sept. Severus, Aurelian and Tacitus (Vopis. Aurel. 45, Tac. 10); but in the later empire Ostia gradually declined, and its harbour became choked with sand. The ruins of Ostia are between two and three miles from the coast, as the sea has gradually receded in consequence of the accumulation of sand deposited by the Tiber.

Ostia Nili. [NILUS.]

Ostorius Scapula. [SCAPULA.]

Ostra (Ostrānus), a town in Umbria, in the territory of the Senones (Ptol. iii. 1, 51).

Otācilius Crassus. 1. M., consul B.C. 263, when he besieged Syracuse and forced Hiero to make a treaty with Rome. He was again consul in 246. (Ptol. i. 16.)—2. T., brother of the preceding, consul in 261.—3. T., a Roman general during the second Punic war, was praetor B.C. 217, and subsequently propraetor in Sicily. In 215 he crossed over to Africa, and laid waste the Carthaginian coast. He was praetor for the second time 214, and his command was prolonged for three years. He died in Sicily, 211. (Liv. xxii. 10, 56, xxiv. 7, xxv. 31, xxvi. 22.)

Otācilius Pilutus, L. [VOLTACILIUS.]

Otānes (Ὀτάνης). 1. A Persian, son of Pharnaspes, was the first who suspected the imposture of Smerdis the Magian, and took the chief part in organising the conspiracy against the pretender (B.C. 521). After the accession of Darius Hystaspis, he was placed in command of the Persian force which invaded Samos for the purpose of placing Syloson, brother of Polycrates, in the government. (Hdt. iii. 68, 141; Strab. p. 638.)—2. A Persian, son of Sisamnes, succeeded Megabyzus (B.C. 506) in the command of the forces on the sea-coast, and took Byzantium, Chalcedon, Antandrus, and Lamponius, as well as the islands of Lemnos and Imbros. He was probably the same Otanes who is mentioned as a son-in-law of Darius Hystaspis, and as a general employed against the revolted Ionians in 499. (Hdt. v. 102, vi. 6.)

Otho, L. Roscius, tribune of the plebs B.C. 67, was a warm supporter of the aristocratical party. He opposed the proposal of Gabinius to bestow upon Pompey the command of the war against the pirates; and in the same year he proposed and carried the law which gave to the equites a special place at the public spectacles, in fourteen rows or seats (in quattuordecim gradibus sive ordinibus) next to the place of the senators, which was in the orchestra. This law was very unpopular; and in Cicero's consulship (68) there was such a riot occasioned by the obnoxious measure, that it required all his eloquence to allay the agitation. (Vell. Pat. ii. 32; Cic. pro Muren. 19, ad Att. ii. 1; Tac. Ann. xv. 32; Hor. Epod. iv. 15, Ep. i. 1, 62; Juv. iii. 159, xiv. 324.)

Otho, Salvius. 1. M., grandfather of the emperor Otho, was descended from an ancient and noble family of the town of Ferentinum, in Etruria. His father was a Roman eques; his mother was of low origin, perhaps even a freedwoman. Through the influence of Livia Augusta, in whose house he had been brought up, Otho was made a Roman senator, and eventually obtained the praetorship, but was not advanced to any higher honour (Suet. Oth. 1; Tac. Hist. ii. 50).—2. L., son of the preceding, and father of the emperor Otho, stood so high in the favour of Tiberius and resembled this emperor so strongly in person, that it was supposed by most that he was his son. He was consul suffectus in A.D. 33; was afterwards proconsul in Africa; and in 42 was sent into Illyricum, where he restored discipline among the soldiers, who had lately rebelled against Claudius. At a later time he detected a conspiracy which had been formed against the life of Claudius. (Suet. Oth. 1, Galb. 6.)—3. L., surnamed Titianus, elder son of No. 2, was consul 52, and proconsul in Asia 63, when he had Agricola for his quaestor. It is related to the honour of the latter that he was not corrupted by the example of his superior officer, who indulged in every kind of rapacity (Tac. Agr. 6). On the death of Galba in January 69, Titianus was a second time made consul, with his brother Otho, the emperor. On the death of the latter, he was pardoned by Vitellius (Tac. Hist. i. 75, ii. 23, 39, 60).—4. M., Roman emperor from January 15th to April 16th, A.D. 69, was the younger son of No. 2. He was born in the early part of 32. He was of moderate stature, and had an effeminate appearance. He was one of the companions of Nero in his debaucheries; but when the emperor took possession of his wife, the beautiful but profligate Poppaea Sabina, Otho was sent as governor to Lusitania, which he administered with credit during the last ten years of Nero's life. Otho attached himself to Galba when he revolted against Nero, in the hope of being adopted by him and succeeding to the empire. But when Galba adopted L. Piso, on the 10th of January, 69, Otho formed a conspiracy against Galba, and was proclaimed emperor by the soldiers at Rome, who put Galba to death. Meantime Vitellius had been proclaimed emperor at Cologne by the German troops on the 3rd of January; and his generals forthwith set out for Italy to place their master on the throne. When these news reached Otho, he marched into the north of Italy to oppose the generals of Vitellius. The fortune of war was at first in his favour. He defeated Caecina, the general of Vitellius, in more than one engagement; but his army was subsequently defeated in a decisive battle near Bedriacum by the united forces of Caecina and Valens. He had sufficient forces to continue the contest, but declared that he desired not to involve his country in more bloodshed or to risk the lives of his friends, and put an end to his own life at Brixillum, in the thirty-seventh year of his age. (Suet. Otho; Plut. Otho; Tac. Hist. i. ii.; Dio Cass. lxi.)

Othryades (Ὀθρυάδης). 1. [PANTHOUS.]—2. A Spartan, one of the 300 selected to fight with an equal number of Argives for the possession of Thyrea. Othryades was the only Spartan who survived the battle, and was left for dead. He spoiled the dead bodies of the enemy, and remained at his post, while Alcenor and Chromius, the two survivors of the Argive party, hastened home with the news of victory, supposing that all their opponents had been slain. As the victory was claimed by both sides, a general battle ensued, in which the Argives were defeated. Othryades slew himself on the field, being ashamed to return to Sparta as the one survivor of her 300 champions. (Hdt. i. 82; Thuc. v. 41; Ov. Fast. ii. 663; Anth. Pal. i. 63.)

Othrys (Ὀθρυς), a lofty range of mountains in the S. of Thessaly, which extended from Mt. Tymphrestus, or the most southerly part of Pindus, to the E. coast and the promontory between the Pagasaean gulf and the N. point of Euboea. It shut in the great Thessalian plain on the S. (Hdt. vii. 129; Strab. p. 432; Verg. Aen. vii. 675; Lucan, vi. 337.)

Ottorocorra (Ὀττοροκόρρας), a mountain range of Serica at the east of the Emodi Montes (Ptol. vi. 16, 2), apparently the Pe-Ling Mountains of China. The name of the Attacori, who are compared to the Hyperborei, is another form of the same word (Plin. vi. 55).

Otus, and his brother, Ephialtes, are better known by their name of the Alcōidae. [ALCŌUS.]

P. Ovidius Nāso, the Roman poet, was born at Sulmo, in the country of the Paeligni, on March 20, B.C. 43 (Ov. Am. ii. 1, 1, iii. 15, 11, Pont. iv. 14, 49, Trist. iv. 10, 5). He was descended from an ancient equestrian family, but possessing only moderate wealth (Trist. ii. 113, iv. 10, 7). He, as well as his brother Lucius, who was exactly a year older than himself, was destined to be a pleader, and received a careful education to qualify him for that calling. He studied rhetoric under Arellius Fuscus and Porcius Latro, and attained to considerable proficiency in the art of declamation. But the bent of his genius showed itself very early. The hours which should have been spent in the study of jurisprudence were employed in cultivating his poetical talent. The elder Seneca, who had heard him declaim, tells us that his oratory resembled a solutum carmen, and that anything in the way of argument was irksome to him (Sen. Controv. ii. 10, 8). His father denounced his favourite pursuit as leading to inevitable poverty; but the death of his brother, at the early age of twenty, probably served in some degree to mitigate his father's opposition, for the patrimony which would have been scanty for two might amply suffice for one (Trist. iv. 10, 35). Ovid's education was completed at Athens, where he made himself thoroughly master of the Greek language (Trist. i. 2, 77, Pont. ii. 10, 21). Afterwards he travelled with the poet Macer, in Asia and Sicily. It is a disputed point whether he ever actually practised as an advocate after his return to Rome. The picture Ovid himself draws of his weak constitution and indolent temper prevents us from thinking that he ever followed his profession with perseverance, if indeed at all. The same causes deterred him from entering the senate, though he had put on the latus clavus when he assumed the toga virilis, as being by birth entitled to aspire to the senatorial dignity (Trist. iv. 10, 29). He became, however, one of the Triumviri Capitaes; and he was subsequently made one of the Centumviri, or judges who tried testamentary and even criminal causes; and in due time he was promoted to be one of the Decemviri, who assembled and presided over the court of the Centumviri (Trist. ii. 93, iv. 10, 33, Pont. iii. 5, 23, Fast. iv. 383).—Such is all the account that can be given of Ovid's business life. He married twice in early life at the desire of his parents, but he speedily divorced each of his wives in succession (Trist. iv. 10, 69). The restraint of a wife was irksome to a man like Ovid, who was devoted to gallantry and licentious life. His third marriage was a happier one: he was sincerely attached to his wife (whose name is thought to have been Fabia), and she remained faithful to him in his exile. He had a legitimate daughter, who was twice married (Trist. iv. 10, 75). Her name is not mentioned; for it is certain that she was not, as some have stated, the Perilla of whom he speaks in Trist. iii. 7. Ovid was a grandfather before he lost his father at the age of ninety; soon after whose decease his mother also died. Till his fiftieth year Ovid continued to reside at Rome, where he had a house near the Capitol, occasionally taking a trip to his Pelignian farm. Much speculation has been wasted on the question who the Corinna celebrated in the Amores was. In Trist. iv. 10, 60, he says that it was not a real name, and long afterwards, in the fifth century A.D., Sidonius Apollinaris imagined the allusions to her to be designedly mysterious, and started the notion that she was Julia, the daughter of Augustus (Sid. Apoll. xxiii. 159). That this Julia should have been the mistress of Ovid is improbable, and there is no evidence for it; on the contrary he speaks of Corinna in a way in which he certainly would not have ventured to speak of the emperor's daughter, even under a feigned name. The suggestion of Sidonius should therefore be absolutely rejected. It is not even certain that Corinna represents a real mistress of Ovid, and it is quite allowable to hold, as many modern critics do, that Corinna was only 'a name round which Ovid grouped many experiences and memories, and something of a continuous story.' Ovid enjoyed not only the friendship of a large circle of distinguished men, but the regard and favour of Augustus and the imperial family. But in A.D. 1 Ovid was suddenly commanded by an imperial edict to transport himself to Tomi (Kustindje), a town on the Euxine, near the mouths of the Danube, on the very border of the empire (Trist. iv. 8, 83, iv. 10, 97). He underwent no trial, and the sole reason for his banishment is stated by some writers to have been his having published his poem on the Art of Love (Sidon. xxiii. 157; Vict. Epit. i. 27). The real cause of his banishment has long exercised the ingenuity of scholars. The publication of the Ars Amatoria may well have offended Augustus, who wished to advocate marriage and domestic life among his subjects (Trist. ii. 7, 112), but the poem had been published nearly ten years previously; and, moreover, whenever Ovid alludes to that, the ostensible cause, he invariably couples with it another which he mysteriously conceals, 'duo crimina carmen et error' (Trist. ii. 207). He says repeatedly that it was error, not scelus or facinus (Trist. i. 3, 37, iii. 1, 52, iv. 10, 90). Hence it can scarcely have been owing to a guilty intrigue with the younger Julia, as some have supposed. The clue may possibly be given in his words which blame his eyes as guilty for having witnessed a crime (Trist. ii. 103, iii. 5, 49, Pont. iii. 3, 74), and it is a probable explanation that he had become acquainted with Julia's profligacy by accident, and by concealing it had given offence to Livia, or Augustus, or both. Ovid draws an affecting picture of the miseries to which he was exposed in his place of exile (Trist. i. 3), which was a relegatio, not an exsilium properly so called, i.e. he retained his civitas and his property, but could not, until the sentence was revoked, leave the place assigned for his residence (Trist. ii. 137, v. 11). He complains of the inhospitable soil, of the severity of the climate, and of the perils to which he was exposed when the barbarians plundered the surrounding country and insulted the very walls of Tomi. He supplicated Augustus to change his place of banishment, and besought his friends to use their influence in his behalf. In the midst of all his misfortunes, however, he sought some relief in the exercise of his poetical talents. Not only did he finish his Fasti in his exile, besides writing the Ibis, the Tristia, Ex Ponto, &c., but he likewise acquired the language of the Getae, in which he composed some poems in honour of Augustus. These he publicly recited, and they were received with tumultuous applause by the Tomitae. With his new fellow-citizens, indeed, he had succeeded in rendering himself highly popular, insomuch that they honoured him with a decree declaring him exempt from all public burdens. He died at Tomi in the sixtieth year of his age, A.D. 18.—The following is a list of Ovid's works, arranged, as far as possible, in chronological order:—(1) Amorum Libri III, the earliest of the poet's works. According to the epigram prefixed, the work, as we now possess it, is a second edition, revised and abridged, the former one having consisted of five books. (Ed. L. Müller, 1867.) (2) Epistolae Heroidum, twenty-one in number. (Ed. by Palmer, 1874; Shuckburgh, 1879.) Of these it is generally held with some reason that the epistle of Sappho, and the last six in pairs each of an epistle and an answer (viz. Paris, Helena, Leander, Hero, Acontius, Cydippe), are by an imitator, though some critics think that the last six may be a work of Ovid's later years. Most of the others (including also a Sappho) are mentioned by Ovid himself in Amor. ii. 18, 21–40; where he also says that answers were written by Sabinus. (3) Ars Amatoria, or De Arte Amandi, written about B.C. 2. At the time of Ovid's banishment this poem was ejected from the public libraries by command of Augustus. (Ed. by Williams, 1884.) (4) Remedia Amoris, in one book. (5) To the poems of this period belongs the Medicamina Faciei, an advice to ladies on their toilet, of which only portions remain (cf. A.A. iii. 205). (6) Metamorphoseon Libri XV. This, the greatest of Ovid's poems in bulk and pretensions, appears to have been written between the age of forty and fifty, and for its matter is indebted to Alexandrian authors, especially to Nicander and Parthenius. It consists of such legends or fables as involved a transformation, from the Creation to the time of Julius Caesar, the last being that emperor's change into a star. It is thus a sort of cyclic poem, made up of distinct episodes, but connected into one narrative thread with much skill. (Ed. by Haupt, Korn, and H. J. Müller 1871–78, and Zingerle, Prague, 1885.) (7) Fastorum Libri XII, of which only the first six are extant. This work was incomplete at the time of Ovid's banishment. Indeed, he had perhaps done little more than collect the materials for it; for that the fourth book was written in Pontus appears from ver. 88. The Fasti is a sort of poetical Roman calendar, with its appropriate festivals and mythology, and the substance was probably taken in a great measure from the old Roman annalists. The work shows a good deal of learning, but it has been observed that Ovid makes frequent mistakes in his astronomy, from not understanding the books from which he took it. (Ed. by Merkel, 1841, 1873; Peter, Lips. 1879; Paley, 1888; Hallam, 1881.) (8) Tristium Libri V, elegies written during the first four years of Ovid's banishment. They are chiefly made up of descriptions of his afflicted condition, and petitions for mercy. The tenth elegy of the fourth book is valuable, as containing many particulars of Ovid's life. (Ed. by Owen, 1889.) (9) Epistolarum ex Ponto Libri IV, are also in the elegiac metre, and much the same in substance as the Tristia, to which they were subsequent. It must be confessed that age and misfortune seem to have damped Ovid's genius both in this and the preceding work. Even the versification is more slovenly, and some of the lines very prosaic. (10) Ibis, a satire of between 600 and 700 elegiac verses, also written in exile. The poet inveighs in it against an enemy who had traduced him. The title, Ibis, was taken from a poem of the same kind by Callimachus. Though the variety of Ovid's imprecations displays learning and fancy, the piece leaves the impression of an impotent explosion of rage. The title and plan were borrowed from Callimachus. (11) Of the Haliuticon, on fishes, written during his exile (Plin. xxxii. 11, 152), only fragments remain. Of his lost works, the most celebrated was his tragedy, Medea, of which only two lines remain. The Nux, or complaint of the walnut tree, is not Ovid's, but is of an early date under the empire. The Consolatio ad Liviam, or Epicedion Drusi, is also in late MSS. wrongly attributed to Ovid. It seems to be the work of an early imitator of Ovid, though some writers assign it to the fifteenth century A.D. since no earlier MS. of it has been discovered. It is not without poetical merit.—That Ovid possessed a great poetical genius is unquestionable; which makes it the more to be regretted that it was not always under the control of a sound judgment. He possessed great vigour of fancy, warmth of colouring, and marvellous facility of composition, but it must not be supposed that this facility implies unstudied art. Ovid is a master of form and grace of diction. His verses and their subjects reflect the grace and polish, and the artificiality also, of the most polished society of the Augustan age; indeed, he was the first to depart from that pure and correct taste which characterises the Greek poets and their earlier Latin imitators. His writings abound with those conceits which we find so frequently in the Italian poets.—Editions of Ovid's complete works are by Burmann, Amsterdam, 1727; by Merkel, Lips. 1873; by Lindemann, 1867.

Oxia Palus, or Oxiānus Lacus (the Sea of Aral), the lake or inland sea formed by the rivers JAXARTES and OXUS (Amm. Marc. xxiii. 6, 59). Ptolemy (vi. 12, 3) knows of it as ἡ Ὀξείανη λίμνη, but has been misinformed as to its size and importance.

Oxi Montes (τὰ Ὀξεία, or Ὀξεία, ὄρη: prob. Ak-tagh), a range of mountains between the rivers Oxus and Jaxartes: the N. boundary of Sogdiana towards Scythia (Ptol. vi. 12, 1).

Oxus or Oaxus (Ὀξος, Ὀαξος: Jihoun or Amou), a great river of Central Asia, rose, according to some of the ancient geographers, on the N. side of the Paropamisus M. (Hindoo Koosh), and, according to others, in the Emodi M., and flowed NW., forming the boundary between Sogdiana on the N. and Bactria and Margiana on the S., and then, skirting the N. of Hyrcania, it fell into the Oxia Palus (Sea of Aral). The Greek geographers wrongly represented the principal arms of the Oxus as flowing into the Caspian. It is thought that they were misled by the deep bay at the south of the inland sea, and also by an old river bed traceable for nearly 500 miles through the desert to the Caspian Sea. This no doubt was once a branch of the Oxus, but only in prehistoric times. (Strab. p. 509; Plin. vi. 52; cf. Pol. x. 48; Amm. Marc. xxiii. 6, 52; Ptol. vi. 9.) By a similar mistake they made the OCHUS and even the JAXARTES reach the Caspian.

Oxybii, a Ligurian people on the coast of Gallia Narbonensis, W. of the Alps, and between the Flumen Argenteum (Argens) and Antipolis (Antibes). They were neighbours of the Salluvii and Deciates. (Strab. p. 185.)

Oxylus (Ὀξύλος), the leader of the Heraclidæ in their invasion of Peloponnesus, and subsequently king of Elis. [See p. 302, b.]

Oxyrhynchus (Ὀξύρυγχος: Behnesch, Ru.), a city of Middle Egypt, on the W. bank of the canal which runs parallel to the Nile on its W. side (Bahr Yussuf); the capital of the Nomos Oxyrhynchites, and chief seat of the worship of the fish called oxyrhynchus (Strab. p. 812; Ptol. iv. 5, 59; Amm. Marc. xxii. 16; Ael. H. A. 46).

Ozogardana, a city of Mesopotamia on the Euphrates, the people of which preserved a lofty throne or chair of stone, which they called Trajan's judgment-seat (Amm. Marc. xxiv. 2).

Pacāris. [HYPACYRIS.]

Pacatiāna. [PHRYGIA.]

Pacātus, Drepaniūs, a Roman rhetorician and a friend of Ausonius, wrote a panegyric on Theodosius.—Ed. Bährens, 1874.

Pacōius or Pacciūs Antiōchus, a physician about the beginning of the Christian era, who was a pupil of Philonides of Catana, and lived probably at Rome. He made a large fortune by the sale of a certain medicine of his own invention, the composition of which he kept a secret. At his death he left his prescription as a legacy to the emperor Tiberius, who ordered a copy of it to be placed in all the public libraries.

Paches (Πάχης), an Athenian general in the Peloponnesian war, took Mytilene and reduced Lesbos, B.C. 427. On his return to Athens he was brought to trial, and, perceiving his condemnation to be certain, drew his sword and stabbed himself in the presence of his judges. (Thuc. iii. 18–49; Diod. xii. 55; Plut. Nic. 6.)

Pachymēres, Georgius, a Byzantine writer, was born about A.D. 1242 at Nicaea, but spent the greater part of his life at Constantinople. He wrote several works, the most important of which is a Byzantine History, containing an account of the emperors Michael Palaeologus and Andronicus Palaeologus the elder, in thirteen books.—Edited by Bekker, Bonn, 1835.

Pachynus or Pachynum (Capo Passaro), a promontory at the SE. extremity of Sicily, and one of the three promontories which gave to Sicily its triangular figure, the other two being Pelorum and Lilybaeum. By the side of Pachynus was a bay, which was used as a harbour, and which is called by Cicero Portus Pachyni (Porto di Palo). (Strab. pp. 265, 272; Ov. Fast. iv. 479, Met. xiii. 725.)

Pacilus, the name of a family of the patrician Furia gens, mentioned in the early history of the republic (Liv. iv. 12, 22, ix. 33).

Pacōrus. 1. Son of Orodes I., king of Parthia. His history is given under ARSACES XIV.—2. King of Parthia. [ARSACES XXIV.]

Pactolus (Πακτωλός: Sarabat), a small but celebrated river of Lydia, rose on the N. side of Mt. Tmolus, and flowed N. past Sardis into the Hermus, which it joined thirty stadia below Sardis. The golden sands of Pactolus have passed into a proverb. Lydia was long the gold country of the ancient world to the Greeks, its streams forming so many gold 'washings'; and hence the wealth of the Lydian kings, and the alleged origin of gold money in that country. But the supply of gold was only on the surface, and by the beginning of our era it was so far exhausted as not to repay the trouble of collecting it. (Hdt. v. 101; Xen. Cyr. vi. 2, 1; Strab. p. 554; Soph. Phil. 392; Verg. Aen. x. 142.)

Pactyas (Πακτίας), a Lydian, who on the conquest of Sardis (B.C. 546) was charged by Cyrus with the collection of the revenues of the province. When Cyrus left Sardis on his return to Ecbatana, Pactyas induced the Lydians to revolt against Cyrus; but when an army was sent against him he first fled to Cyme, then to Mytilene, and eventually to Chios. He was surrendered by the Chians to the Persians.

Pactyē (Πακτύη: St. George), a town in the Thracian Chersonesus, on the Propontis, thirty-six stadia from Cardia, to which Alcibiades retired when he was banished by the Athenians, B.C. 407 (Hdt. vi. 36; Nep. Alc. 7).

Pactyca (Πακτυική), the country of the Pactyes (Πακτύες), in the NW. of India, W. of the Indus, and in the 18th satrapy of the Persian empire, is probably the NE. part of Afghanistan, about Jellalabad (Hdt. iii. 93, vii. 67).

M. Pacūvius, one of the early Roman tragedians, was born about B.C. 220, at Brundisium, and is said to have been the son of the sister of Ennius (Euseb. Chron. 156, 3; Cic. Brut. 64, 229). Pacuvius appears to have been brought up at Brundisium, but he afterwards repaired to Rome. Here he devoted himself to painting and poetry, and obtained so much distinction in the former art that a painting of his in the temple of Hercules, in the Forum Boarium, was regarded as only inferior to the celebrated painting of Fabius Pictor (Plin. xxxv. 19; Gell. xiii. 2, 2). After living many years at Rome (for he was still there in his eightieth year), he returned to Brundisium, on account of the failure of his health, and died in his native town, in the ninetieth year of his age, B.C. 130 (Gell. i. 24). We have no further particulars of his life, save that his talents gained him the friendship of Laelius, and that he lived on the most intimate terms with his younger rival, Accius. Pacuvius was universally allowed by the ancient writers to have been one of the greatest of the Latin tragic poets. (Varro, ap. Gell. vii. 14; Cic. Opt. Gen. Or. 1, 6, Brut. 74, 258; Hor. Ep. ii. 1, 56; Pers. i. 77; Mart. xi. 91; Quintil. x. 1, 97.) He is especially praised for the loftiness of his thoughts, the vigour of his language, and the extent of his knowledge. Hence we find the epithet doctus frequently applied to him. His tragedies were taken from the great Greek writers; but he did not confine himself, like his predecessors, to a mere translation of the latter, but worked up his materials with more freedom and independent judgment. Some of the plays of Pacuvius were not based upon the Greek tragedies, but belonged to the class called Prætextatae, in which the subjects were taken from Roman story. One of these was entitled Paulus, which had as its hero L. Aemilius Paulus, the conqueror of Perseus, king of Macedonia.—The fragments of Pacuvius are published by Bothe, Poët. Lat. Scenic. Fragm. Lips. 1834, and by Ribbeck, 1871.

Padus (Po), the chief river of Italy, whose name (by a doubtful etymology) is said to have been of Celtic origin, and to have been given it on account of the pine trees (in Celtic padi) which grew on its banks (Plin. iii. 122). In the Ligurian language it was called Bodencus or Bodincus. Almost all later writers identified the Padus with the fabulous Eridanus, from which amber was obtained; and hence the Roman poets frequently give the name of Eridanus to the Padus. The reason of this identification appears to have been that the Phoenician vessels received at the mouths of the Padus the amber which had been transported by land from the coasts of the Baltic to those of the Adriatic. The Padus rises from two springs on the E. side of Mt. Vesula (Monte Viso) in the Alps, and flows with a general easterly direction through the great plain of Cisalpine Gaul, which it divides into two parts, Gallia Cispadana and Gallia Transpadana. Its importance to N. Italy gained for it the title 'King of Rivers' (Verg. Georg. i. 482), and Strabo believed it to be the largest river in Europe after the Danube (Strab. p. 204). It receives numerous affluents, which drain the whole of this vast plain, descending from the Alps on the N. and the Apennines on the S. These affluents, increased in the summer by the melting of the snow on the mountains, frequently bring down such a large body of water as to cause the Padus to overflow its banks. Hence through a long course of centuries the embankments of the river have been constantly raised to meet the silting up of the bed until it flows often high above the adjacent plain. Pliny states that works to relieve the overflow by cutting additional channels were made by the Etruscans during their occupation of that country (Plin. iii. 120). The whole course of the river, including its windings, is about 450 miles. About twenty miles from the sea the river divides itself into two main branches, of which the N. one was called Padoa (Maestra, Po Grande, or Po delle Fornaci) and the S. one Olana (Po d'Ariano); and each of these now falls into the Adriatic by several mouths. The ancient writers enumerate seven of these mouths, some of which were canals. They lay between Ravenna and Altinum, and bore the following names, according to Pliny, beginning with the S. and ending with the N. (1) Padusa, also called Augusta Fossa, was a canal dug by Augustus, which connected Ravenna with the Po. (2) Vatrenus, also called Eridanum Ostium or Spineticum Ostium (Po di Primaro), from the town of Spina at its mouth. (3) Ostium Caprasiae (Porto Interito di bell' Ochio). (4) Ostium Sagis (Porto di Magnavacca). (5) Olane or Volane, the S. main branch of the river, mentioned above. (6) Padoa, the N. main branch, subdivided into several small branches called Ostia Carbonaria. (7) Fossae Philistinae, connecting the river, by means of the Tartarus, with the Athesis. (Plin. l.c.)

Padūsa. [PADUS.]

Pæan (Παῖν, Παῖων, Παῖων), in Homer the physician of the gods (Il. v. 401, 899); later a designation of APOLLO and of ASCLEPIUS.

Pæānīa (Παιανία: Παιανεύς), a demus in Attica, on the E. slope of Mt. Hymettus, belonging to the tribe Pandionis. It was the demus of the orator DEMOSTHENES.

Paemāni, a people of German origin in Gallia Belgica (Caes. B. G. ii. 4).

Pæōnes (Παῖνες), a powerful Thracian people, who in early times were spread over a great part of Macedonia and Thrace. According to a legend preserved by Herodotus, they were of Teucrian origin; and it is not impossible that they were a branch of the great Phrygian people, a portion of which seems to have settled in Europe [PHRYGIA]. In Homer the Pæonians appear as allies of the Trojans, and are represented as having come from the river Axius (Il. ii. 848, xvi. 287, xxi. 139). In historical times they inhabited the whole of the N. of Macedonia, from the frontiers of Illyria to some little distance E. of the river Strymon. Their country was called Pæōnīa (Παιονία). The Pæonians were divided into several tribes, independent of each other, and governed by their own chiefs; though at a later period they appear to have owned the authority of one king. The Pæonian tribes on the lower course of the Strymon were subdued by the Persians, B.C. 513, and many of them were transplanted to Phrygia; but the tribes in the N. of the country maintained their independence. (Thuc. ii. 99; Pol. v. 97; Strab. pp. 318, 319, 381.) They were long troublesome neighbours to the Macedonian monarchs, whose territories they frequently invaded and plundered; but they were eventually subdued by Philip, the father of Alexander the Great, who allowed them nevertheless to retain their own monarchs (Diod. xix. 2, 4, 22, xvii. 8). They continued to be governed by their own kings till a much later period; and these kings were often virtually independent of the Macedonian monarchy. Thus we read of their king Audoleon, whose daughter Pyrrhus married. After the conquest of Macedonia by the Romans, 168, the part of Pæonia E. of the Axius formed the second, and the part of Pæonia W. of the Axius formed the third, of the four districts into which Macedonia was divided by the Romans.

Paëonius (Παιώνιος). 1. Of Ephesus, an architect, probably lived between B.C. 420 and 380. In conjunction with Demetrius, he finally completed the great temple of Artemis, at Ephesus, which Chersiphron had begun; and, with Daphnis the Milesian, he began to build at Miletus a temple of Apollo, of the Ionic order. The latter was the famous Didymaeum, or temple of Apollo Didymus, the ruins of which are still to be seen near Miletus. The former temple, in which the Branchidae had an oracle of Apollo, was burnt at the capture of Miletus by the army of Darius, 498. The new temple, which was on a scale only inferior to that of Artemis, was never finished. (Hdt. vi. 19; Paus. vii. 5, 4; Strab. p. 684.)—2. Of Mende, in Thrace. His fame rests on his sculptures at the temple of Zeus at Olympia about 436 B.C. He executed the statues and metopes of the east front, while Alcámenes executed those of the west (Paus. v. 10, 6). According to an inscription found recently at Olympia on the base of his statue of Nike, the pediments of the east front were assigned to Paëonius as being successful in a competition. Presumably he held the first place and Alcámenes the second in this competition of artists. The eastern pediment represented the chariot-race of Pelops. The German excavations have recovered his great statue of Nike dedicated by the Messenians (Paus. v. 26, 1), of which the head and arms only have perished.

Paëoplæ (Παιόπλαι), a Paëonian people on the lower course of the Strymon and the Angites, who were subdued by the Persians, and transplanted to Phrygia by order of Darius, B.C. 513. They returned to their native country with the help of Aristagoras, 500; and we find them settled N. of Mt. Pangæus in the expedition of Xerxes, 480. (Hdt. v. 15, vii. 118.)

Paërisades or Parisades (Παιρισάδης or Παρισάδης), the name of two kings of Bosphorus. 1. Son of Leucon, succeeded his brother Spartacus B.C. 349, and reigned thirty-eight years. He continued the same friendly relations with the Athenians which were begun by his father Leucon. (Diod. xvi. 52; Dem. Phorm. p. 909; Strab. p. 310.)—2. The last monarch of the first dynasty that ruled in Bosphorus. The pressure of the Scythian tribes induced Paërisades to cede his sovereignty to Mithridates the Great. The date of this event cannot be placed earlier than 112, nor later than 88. (Strab. l. c.)

Paestānus Sinus. [PAESTUM.]

Paestum (Paestanus), originally called Posidōnia (Ποσειδωνία: Ποσειδωνιάτης), was a city

Coin of Paestum (Posidonia), of 6th cent. B.C.

Obv., ΜΟC[=ΠΟC]ΕΙΔΑ; Poseidon with trident; rev., ΡΟΜΕΙΔΑ (=ΡΟCΕΙΔΑ).

in Lucania, situated between four and five miles SE. of the mouth of the Silarus, and near the bay which derived its name from the town (Ποσειδωνιάτης κόλπος, Paestanus Sinus: G. of Salerno). It was colonised by the Sybarites, probably during the time of their prosperity between 650 and 510 B.C. (Strab. p. 251; SYBARIS.) It soon became a powerful and flourishing city

(Hdt. vi. 127); but after its capture by the Lucanians (between 438 and 424), it gradually lost the characteristics of a Greek city, and its inhabitants at length ceased to speak the Greek language. Its ancient name of Posidonia was probably changed into that of Paestum at this time. Under the supremacy of the Romans, who founded a Latin colony at Paestum about B.C. 274, the town gradually sank in importance (Liv. Ep. 14, xxii. 36, xxvi. 39; Vell. Pat. i. 14; Cic. ad Att. xi. 17); and in the time of Augustus it is only mentioned on account of the beautiful roses grown in its neighbourhood (Verg. Georg. iv. 118; Propert. iv. 5, 59). The ruins of Paestum are magnificent, especially those of its two temples in the Doric style, among the most perfect and beautiful in existence. For a description of the larger temple of Paestum, see Dict. of Ant. art. Templum.

Paesus (Παιός), a town in the Troad, mentioned by Homer, but destroyed before the time of Strabo, its population having been transplanted to Lampsacus. Its site was on a river of the same name (Beiram-Dere) between Lampsacus and Parium. (Il. ii. 828, v. 612; Hdt. v. 117.)

Paëtinus, the name of a family of the Fulvia Gens, which was eventually superseded by the name of Nobilior. [NOBILIOR.]

Paetus, a cognomen in many Roman gentes, signified a person with a slight cast in the eye.

Paetus, Aelius. 1. P., probably the son of Q. Aelius Paetus, a pontifex, who fell in the battle of Cannae. He was plebeian aedile B.C. 204; praetor 203; magister equitum 202; and consul 201. In his consulship he fought a battle with the Boii, and made a treaty with the Ingauni Ligures. In 199, he was censor with P. Scipio Africanus. He afterwards became an augur, and died 174, during a pestilence at Rome. (Liv. xxix. 38, xxxi. 4, xli. 26.) He is mentioned as one of the Roman jurists.—2. Sex., brother of the last, curule aedile 200; consul 198; and censor 193 with Cn. Cethegus. He was a jurist of eminence, and a prudent man, whence he got the cognomen Catus. He is described in a line of Ennius as 'Egregie cordatus homo Catus Aelius Sextus.' (Cic. de Or. i. 45, 212, Brut. 20, 78; Liv. xxxii. 7, xxxiv. 44.) He is enumerated among the old jurists who collected or arranged the matter of law, which he did in a work entitled Tripartita or Jus Aelianum. This was a work on the Twelve Tables, which contained the original text, an interpretation, and the Legis actio subjoined (Pompon. Dig. i. 2, 2, 38).—3. Q., son of No. 1, was elected augur 174, and was consul 167, when he laid waste the territory of the Ligurians (Liv. xlv. 16).

Paetus, P. Autronius, was elected consul for B.C. 65 with P. Cornelius Sulla; but he and Sulla were accused of bribery by L. Aurelius Cotta and L. Manlius Torquatus, and condemned. Their election was accordingly declared void, and their accusers were chosen consuls in their stead. Enraged at his disappointment, Paetus conspired with Catiline to murder the consuls Cotta and Torquatus; and this design is said to have been frustrated solely by the impatience of Catiline, who gave the signal prematurely before the whole of the conspirators had assembled. [CATILINA.] Paetus afterwards took an active part in the Catilinarian conspiracy, which broke out in Cicero's consulship, 63 (Sall. Cat. 18; Dio Cass. xxxvi. 27). After the suppression of the conspiracy Paetus was brought to trial for the share he had had in it; he was condemned, and went into exile.

to Epirus, where he was living when Cicero himself went into banishment in 58. Cicero was then much alarmed lest Paetus should make an attempt upon his life. (Sall. Cat. 47; Cic. pro Sull. 6, ad Att. iii. 2, 7.)

Paetus, C. Caesennius, sometimes called Caesonius, consul A.D. 61, was sent by Nero in 68 to the assistance of Domitius Corbulo in Armenia. He was defeated by Vologeses, king of Parthia, and purchased peace of the Parthians on the most disgraceful terms. (Tac. Ann. xv. 6-25; Dio Cass. lxxii. 21; Suet. Ner. 39.) After the accession of Vespasian, he was appointed governor of Syria, and deprived Antiochus IV., king of Commagene, of his kingdom (Joseph. B. J. vii. 7).

Paetus Thrasēa. [THRASEA.]

Pagae. [PEGAE.]

Pagāsae, called by the Romans Pagāsa, -ae (Παγασαί: Angistri, near Volo), a town of Thessaly, on the coast of Magnesia, and on the bay called after it Sinus Pagasaeus or Pagasicus (Παγασητικός κόλπος: G. of Volo). It was the port of Iolcos, and afterwards of Pherae, and is celebrated in mythology as the place where Jason built the ship Argo. [JASON.] Hence some of the ancients derived its name from πῆγνυμι; but others connected the name with the fountains (πηγαί) in the neighbourhood (Strab. p. 496; Diod. xvi. 31; Propert. i. 20, 17).—The adjective Pagasaeus is applied to Jason on account of his building the ship Argo, and to Apollo because he had a sanctuary at Pagasae. The adjective is also used in the general sense of Thessalian; thus Alcestis, the wife of Admetus, is called by Ovid Pagasaea conjux.

Pagrae (Πάγραι: Bagras), a city of Syria, on the E. side of Mt. Amanus, at the foot of the pass called by Ptolemy the Syrian Gates, on the road between Antioch and Alexandria: the scene of the battle between Alexander Balas and Demetrius Nicator, B.C. 145 (Strab. p. 751; Ptol. v. 15, 12).

Pagus (Πάγος), a remarkable conical hill, about 500-600 feet high, a little N. of Smyrna, was crowned with a shrine of Nemesis, and had a celebrated spring. (Paus. v. 12, 1.)

Palaemon (Παλαίμων). 1. In Greek legends son of Athamas and Ino, and originally called Melicertes. When his mother, who was driven mad by Hera, had thrown herself, with her boy, into the sea, both were changed into marine divinities, Ino becoming Leucothea, and Melicertes Palaemon. (Eur. Iph. Taur. 271; Apollod. iii. 4, 3; Hyg. Fab. 2; Ov. Met. iv. 520, xiii. 919.) [For details see ATHAMAS.] According to some, Melicertes after his apotheosis was called Glaucus, whereas according to another version Glaucus is said to have leaped into the sea from his love of Melicertes [see p. 366, b]. The body of Melicertes, according to the common tradition, was washed by the waves, or carried by dolphins into the port Schoenus on the Corinthian isthmus, or to that spot on the coast where the altar of Palaemon subsequently stood. There the body was found by his uncle, Sisyphus, who ordered it to be carried to Corinth, and on the command of the Nereides he instituted the Isthmian games and sacrifices of black bulls in honour of the deified Palaemon. (Paus. i. 44, 11, ii. 1, 3; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 107, 229; Philostr. Her. 19, Icon. ii. 16.) In the island of Tenedos, it is said that children were sacrificed to him, and this strengthens the conclusion, which it is hard to resist, that in the name Melicertes we have the Phoenician Melcart, whose worship was spread by Phoenician traders over the coasts and islands of the Aegaeian and Mediterranean. It is by no means improbable that the story of the death of the child Melicertes grew out of the Phoenician custom of sacrificing a child to their deity, and that when the worship of Poseidon ousted that of Melcart, as regards the province of the sea, the name of the Phoenician deity was retained in the myth which had thus grown up. The Romans identified Palaemon with their own god Portunus, or Portumnus. [PORTUNUS.]—2. Q. Remmius Palaemon, a grammarian in the reigns of Tiberius, Caligula, and Claudius. He was a native of Vicentia (Vicenza), in the north of Italy, and was originally a slave; but having been manumitted, he opened a school at Rome, where he became the most celebrated grammarian of his time, though his moral character was infamous. (Suet. Gramm. 23; Juv. vi. 451, vii. 215.) He was also successful in the cultivation of vines (Plin. xiv. 41).

Palaepōlis. [NEAPOLIS.]

Palaephātus (Παλαίφατος). 1. Of Athens, a mythical epic poet of the pre-Homeric period. The time at which he lived is uncertain, but he appears to have been usually placed after Phemonoe [PHEMONOE], though some writers assigned him even an earlier date.—2. Of Abydos, a historian, lived in the time of Alexander the Great (Suid. s.v.).—3. A Greek Peripatetic philosopher and grammarian, probably of Alexandria, in the fourth century A.D. His most celebrated work was entitled Troica (Τρωϊκά), which is frequently referred to by the grammarians.—There is extant a small work in fifty-one sections, entitled Παλαίφατος περί ἀπίστων, or On Incredible Tales, giving a brief account of some of the most celebrated Greek legends. It is an abstract of a much larger work, which is lost. The original work is referred to in Ciris, 88: 'Docta Palaephata testatur voce papyrus.' He follows the Euhemeristic method of trying to rationalise the myths into history. The best edition is by Westermann, in the Mythographi, Brunswick, 1843.

Palaerus (Παλαιρός: Palaiρεύς), a town on the coast of Acarnania near Leucas (Thuc. ii. 30; Strab. p. 450).

Palaestē (Palasa), a town of Epirus, a little S. of the Acroceraunian mountains; here Caesar landed his forces when he crossed over to Greece to carry on the war against Pompey (Lucan, Phars. v. 460).

Palaestina (Παλαιστίνη: Palestine). [For the geography and earlier history of Palestine see Dict. of the Bible.] From B.C. 63, when Pompey took Jerusalem, the country was subject to the Romans. At the death of Herod, his kingdom was divided between his sons as tetrarchs, under the sanction of Augustus, Archelaus receiving Judaea, Samaria, and Idumaea, Herod Antipas Galilee and Peraea, and Philip Batanaea, Gaulonitis, and Trachonitis; all standing to the Roman empire in a relation of virtual subjection, which successive events converted into an integral union. First, A.D. 7, Archelaus was deposed by Augustus, and Judaea was placed under a Roman procurator: next, about 31, Philip died, and his government was united to the province of Syria, and was in 37 again conferred on Agrippa I., with the title of king, and with the addition of Abilene, the district round Damascus. In 39, Herod Antipas was banished to Gaul, and his tetrarchy was added to the kingdom of Herod Agrippa; and two years later he received from Claudius the government of Judaea and Samaria, and thus Palestine was reunited under a nominal king. On his death, in 44, Palestine again became a part of the Roman province of Syria under the name of Judaea, which was governed by a procurator. The Jews were, however, most turbulent subjects of the Roman empire, and at last they broke out into a general rebellion, which, after a most sanguinary war, was crushed by Vespasian and Titus; and the latter took and destroyed Jerusalem in A.D. 70. [TITUS.] Under Constantine, Palestine was divided afresh into the three provinces of P. Prima in the centre, P. Secunda in the N., and P. Tertia the S. of Judaea, with Idumaea. [ARABIA, p. 90, b.] Pālāmēdēs (Παλαμήδης). 1. Son of Nauplius and Clymene, and brother of Oeax. He joined the Greeks in the expedition against Troy; but Agamemnon, Diomedes, and Odysseus, envious of his fame, caused a captive Phrygian to write to Palamedes a letter in the name of Priam, and bribed a servant of Palamedes to conceal the letter under his master's bed. They then accused Palamedes of treachery; upon searching his tent they found the letter which they themselves had dictated; and thereupon they caused him to be stoned to death. When Palamedes was led to death, he exclaimed, 'Truth, I lament thee, for thou hast died even before me.' (Eur. Orest. 432; Schol. ad loc.; Philostr. Her. 10; Ov. Met. xiii. 56.) According to some traditions, it was Odysseus alone who hated and persecuted Palamedes (Xen. Mem. iv. 2, 33; Hyg. Fab. 105). The cause of this hatred is also stated variously. According to the usual account, Odysseus hated him because he had been compelled by him to join the Greeks against Troy [see p. 616, b.]. Another story is that Odysseus had been censured by Palamedes for returning with empty hands from a foraging excursion into Thrace (Serv. ad Aen. ii. 81). There are other versions also of his death besides the commonly received story stated above. Some say that Odysseus and Diomedes induced him to descend into a well, where they pretended they had discovered a treasure, and when he was below they cast stones upon him, and killed him (Dict. Cret. ii. 15); others state that he was drowned by them while fishing (Paus. x. 31, 2); and others, that he was killed by Paris with an arrow (Dar. Phryg. 28). His brother Oeax wrote the news on an oar (ὄραξ), which floated to his father Nauplius (Eur. Orest. l.c.; Apollod. ii. 1). For the vengeance taken upon the Greeks, see NAUPLIUS. The story of Palamedes, which is not mentioned by Homer, seems to have been first related in the Cypria, and was afterwards developed by the tragic poets (fragments remain of plays by Aeschylus and Euripides entitled Palamedes, and of the Nauplius by Sophocles), and lastly by the sophists, who liked to look upon Palamedes as their pattern. The tragic poets and sophists describe him as a sage among the Greeks, and as a poet; and he is said to have invented lighthouses, measures, scales, the discus, dice, the alphabet (Eur. Fragm. 581; Paus. ii. 20, 3; Philostr. l.c.).—2. A Greek grammarian, was a contemporary of Athenaeus, who introduces him as one of the speakers in his work.

Pālātīnus Mons. [ROMA.]

Pālātium. [ROMA.]

Palē (Πάλη; Παλῆς, Ion. Παλέες, Att. Παλῆς, in Polyb. Παλαιῆς; nr. Lixuria, Ru.), one of the cities of Cephallenia, on a height opposite Zacynthus (Hdt. ix. 28; Strab. p. 456; Pol. v. 8).

Pālēs, an old Italian goddess of pastoral life, of flocks and shepherds, by the side of whom there seems to have been at one period a male deity of the same name (Serv. ad Georg. iii. 1; Arnob. iii. 40), though the masculine form had certainly fallen early into disuse, and the goddess only was worshipped in the April festival. Her name is connected with the root of pasco, pabulum, and also with that of Palatium. That is to say that while Pales was the deity whom shepherds regarded as their protectress and the giver of increase to their flocks, the Palatine hill was originally the settlement and fortress of a pastoral community. Her festival on April 21, called properly Parilia (a word formed from Pales) and less correctly Palilia, was a ceremony for the lustration or purification of flocks and herds at the opening of spring; and as such it was always regarded in the country, though at Rome itself, owing to the tradition that Romulus began his city on that day, it was solemnised as the birthday of the city. The special rites themselves of purification by passing through fires of lighted straw [see Dict. of Ant. art. Parilia], may be paralleled by similar observances in many countries (e.g. the 'St. John's Fires' of more northern countries).

Palicanus, Lollius. [LOLLIUS.]

Palicē, a town of Sicily founded by DUCETIUS, leader of the Siculi, B.C. 453, near the sulphurous lake of the Palici [Lago di Naftia], 15 miles W. of Leontini: destroyed soon after the death of DUCETIUS (Diod. xi. 88, 90; PALICI).

Palici (Παλικοί), were Sicilian gods whom Aeschylus represents as the twin sons of Zeus and the nymph Thalia, the daughter of Hephaestus. According to the legend thus adopted and transformed by the Greeks, Thalia, from fear of Hera, prayed to be swallowed up by the earth; her prayer was granted; but in due time she sent forth from the earth twin boys, who were called Παλικοί, from τοῦ πάλιν ἰκίσθαι (see Fragments of Aesch. Aetneae, ap. Macrob. v. 19). It is clear, however, that these were really deities of the Sicel race and not of Greek introduction, nor can it reasonably be doubted that the names Palici and Delli are Sicilian words of no Greek origin. Their supposed descent from Hephaestus (in another version they were sons of Hephaestus by Aetna) expresses probably the truth that the springs, of which they were the deities, were hot springs of volcanic origin. They were worshipped in the neighbourhood of Mt. Aetna, near Palice, and not far from the sources of the river Symaethus, and in the earliest times human sacrifices were offered to them. Near their sanctuary there gushed forth from the earth two sulphurous fountains, called Delli, or brothers of the Palici, at which solemn oaths were taken. The oaths were written on tablets, and thrown into one of the fountains; if the tablet swam on the water, the oath was considered to be true, but if it sank down, the oath was regarded as a perjury, and was believed to be punished instantaneously by blindness or death. This sanctuary was also oracular and was an asylum for runaway slaves. These twin deities whom native tradition seemed to regard as sons of the Sicilian deity Adranus, were protectors of agriculture and of sailors. (Diod. xi. 79; Strab. p. 275; Cic. N.D. iii. 22; Verg. Aen. ix. 585; Ov. Met. v. 406; Macrob. l.c.)

Pālimbothra, a city on the Ganges, apparently the modern Patna (Strab. p. 70; Arrian, Ind. 10; Ptol. vii. 1, 73).

Palinūrus (C. Palinuro), a promontory on the W. coast of Lucania, said to have derived its name from Palinurus, son of Jasus, and pilot of the ship of Aeneas, who fell into the sea, and was murdered on the coast by the natives (Verg. Aen. v. 833, vi. 337; Strab. p. 252).

Pallacôpas (Παλλακόπας), a canal in Babylonia, cut from the Euphrates, at a point 800 stadia (eighty geog. miles) S. of Babylon, westward to the edge of the Arabian Desert, where it lost itself in marshes (Arrian, vii. 21, 1).

Pallâdas (Παλλάδας), the author of a large number of epigrams in the Greek Anthology, was a pagan and an Alexandrian grammarian. He lived at the beginning of the fifth century A.D., for in one of his epigrams (No. 115) he speaks of Hypatia, daughter of Theon, as still alive. Hypatia was murdered in A.D. 415.

Pallādium (Παλλάδιον), properly any image of Pallas Athene, but generally applied to an image of this goddess which was kept hidden and secret and was revered as a pledge of the safety of the town where it existed. Among these ancient images of Pallas none is more celebrated than the Trojan Palladium, concerning which there was the following tradition, developed no doubt gradually by post-Homeric writers (nothing is said about the Palladium in the Iliad or the Odyssey). Athene was brought up by Triton; and when his daughter, Pallas, and Athene were once wrestling together, Zeus interfered in the struggle, and suddenly held the aegis before the face of Pallas. Pallas, while looking up to Zeus, was wounded by Athene, and died. Athene in her sorrow caused an image of the maiden to be made, round which she hung the aegis. When Electra had come as a suppliant to the Palladium, Zeus hurled it down from heaven upon the earth, because it had been sullied by the hands of one who was no longer a pure maiden. The image fell upon the earth at Troy, when Ilus was just beginning to build the city. Ilus erected a sanctuary to it. According to some, the image was dedicated by Electra, and according to others it was given by Zeus to Dardanus. The image itself is said to have been three cubits in height, with its legs close together, and holding in its right hand a spear, and in the left a spindle and a distaff. (Apollod. iii. 12, 3; Dionys. i. 69; Schol. ad Eur. Orest. 1129.) This Palladium remained at Troy until Odysseus and Diomedes contrived to carry it away, because the city could not be taken so long as it was in possession of that sacred treasure. The earliest mention of this robbery of the Palladium from Troy is preserved by Proclus from Lesches (cf. Conon, Narr. 34; Verg. Aen. ii. 164). It is quite possible that this story (Paus. i. 28, 9) arose from an attempt to explain the name of the law court for accidental homicide called Palladion. According to some accounts Troy contained two Palladia, one of which was carried off by Odysseus and Diomedes, while the other was conveyed by Aeneas to Italy, or the one taken by the Greeks was a mere imitation, while that which Aeneas brought to Italy was the genuine image (Dionys. l.c.; Paus. ii. 23, 5; Ov. Fast. vi. 421). But this twofold Palladium was probably a mere invention to account for its existence in more than one place. Several towns both in Greece and Italy claimed the honour of possessing the genuine Trojan Palladium: as, for example, Argos and Athens, where it was believed that Demophon took it from Diomedes on his return from Troy. [DEMOPHON.] In Italy the cities of Rome, Lavinium, Luceria, and Siris likewise pretended to possess the Trojan Palladium. (Strab. p.

264; Plut. Camill. 20; Tac. Ann. xv. 41; Serv. ad Aen. ii. 166.) The story was not unfrequently a subject for vase paintings. It was also painted by Polygnotus at Athens (Paus. i. 22, 8). It appears among the scenes in the Tabula Iliaca.

Pallādus (Παλλάδιος). 1. Rutilius Taurus Aemiliānus, lived some time in the fourth century A.D., and was the author of a treatise De Re Rustica, in the form of a Farmer's Calendar, the various operations connected with agriculture and a rural life being arranged in regular order, according to the seasons in which they ought to be performed. It is comprised in fourteen books: the first is introductory, the twelve following contain the duties of the twelve months in succession, commencing with January; the last is a poem, in eighty-five elegiac couplets, upon the art of grafting (De Insitione). A considerable portion of the work is taken from Columella. The work was very popular in the middle ages. Edited in the Scriptores Rei Rusticae by Schneider, Lips. 1794, and by J. C. Schmitt, Wurtzb. 1876.—2. Surnamed Iatrosophista, a Greek medical writer of Alexandria, who lived after Galen.—3. Of Methone, a sophist who lived in the reign of Constantine.—4. A rhetorician and poet, who lived at the end of the fourth century A.D. and apparently imitated Ausonius.—5. Bishop of Helenopolis, A.D. 400. (See Dict. of Christian Biography.)

Pallantiā (Pallantius: Palencia), the chief town of the Vaccaeii in the N. of Hispania Tarraconensis, and on a tributary of the Durus (Ptol. ii. 6, 50).

Pallantias and Pallantis = Aurora, the daughter of the giant Pallas. [Eos.]

Pallantium (Παλλάντιον: Pallantius), an ancient town of Arcadia, near Tegea, said to have been founded by Pallas, the son of Lycaon. Evander is said to have come from this place, and to have called the town which he founded on the banks of the Tiber Pallantium (afterwards Palantium and Palatium), after the Arcadian town. (Paus. viii. 43, 44; Hes. ap. Steph. s.v.; Liv. i. 5.) On the foundation of Megalopolis, most of the inhabitants of Pallantium settled in the new city, and the town remained almost deserted, till it was restored by Antoninus Pius, and exempted from taxes on account of its supposed connexion with Rome (Paus. l.c.; Strab. p. 485).

Pallas. [ATHENE.]

Pallas (Πάλλας). 1. One of the Titans, son of Crius and Eurybia, husband of Styx, and father of Zelus, Cratos, Bia, and Nice (Hes. Th. 376, 383; Apollod. i. 2, 2).—2. A giant, slain by Athene in the battle with the gods (Apollod. i. 6, 2).—3. According to some traditions, the father of Athene, who slew him when he attempted to violate her [p. 138, b].—4. Son of Lycaon, and grandfather of Evander, is said to have founded the town of Pallantium in Arcadia (Paus. viii. 3, 44). Servius (ad Aen. viii. 44) calls him a son of Aegeus. Hence Evander is called by the poets Pallantius heros.—5. Son of Evander, and an ally of Aeneas, was slain by the Rutulian Turnus (Verg. Aen. viii. 104, xi. 140).—6. Son of the Athenian king Pandion, and father of Clytus and Butes. His two sons were sent with Cephalus to implore assistance of Aeacus against Minos. Pallas was slain by Theseus. The celebrated family of the Pallantidae at Athens traced their origin from this Pallas. (Paus. i. 22, 28; Apollod. iii. 15, 5; Eur. Hipp. 35; Plut. Thes. 3.)

Pallas, a favourite freedman of the emperor Claudius. In conjunction with another freedman, Narcissus, he administered the affairs of the empire. After the death of Messalina, Pallas persuaded the weak emperor to marry Agrippina, and as Narcissus had been opposed to this marriage, he now lost his former power, and Pallas and Agrippina became the rulers of the Roman world. It was Pallas who persuaded Claudius to adopt the young Domitius (afterwards the emperor Nero), the son of Agrippina; and it was doubtless with the assistance of Pallas that Agrippina poisoned her husband. Nero soon after his accession became tired of his mother's control, and as one step towards emancipating himself from her authority, he deprived Pallas of all his public offices, and dismissed him from the palace in 56. He was suffered to live unmolested for some years, till at length his immense wealth excited the rapacity of Nero, who had him removed by poison in 68. (Tac. Ann. xi. 29, xii. 2, 25, 65, xiii. 23, xiv. 65; Dio Cass. lxi. 3, lxii. 14; Suet. Claud. 28.) His wealth, which was acquired during the reign of Claudius, had become proverbial, as we see from the line in Juvenal (i. 107), 'ego possideo plus Pallante et Licinis.' The brother of Pallas was Antonius or Claudius Felix, who was appointed by Claudius procurator of Judaea. [FELIX, ANTONIUS.]

Pallas Lacus. [TRITON.]

Pallēne (Παλλήνη). 1. (Παλληναῖος, Παλληναῖος: Kassandra), the most westerly of the three peninsulas running out from Chalcidice in Macedonia. It is said to have been formerly called Phlegra (Φλέγρα), and on the narrow isthmus which connected it with the main-land, stood the important town of Potidaea. (Hdt. vii. 123; Thuc. iv. 120; Pind. Nem. i. 100; Strab. p. 330.)—2. (Παλληνηεύς, rarely Παλληναῖος), a demus in Attica belonging to the tribe Antiochis, was situated on one of the slopes of Pentelich, a few miles SW. of Marathon. It possessed a temple of Athene surnamed Pallenis (Παλληνίς) from the place, and in its neighbourhood took place the contest between Pisistratus and the party opposed to him. (Hdt. i. 61.)

Palma (Palma), a Roman colony on the SW. coast of the island Balearis Major (Majorca).

Palmaria (Palmaruola), a small uninhabited island off the coast of Latium and the promontory Circeium (Plin. iii. 81).

Palmīra (Πάλμυρα: Παλμυρηνός, Palmyrēnus; O. T. Tadmor: Tadmor, Ru.), a celebrated city of Syria, stood in an oasis of the great Syrian Desert, which from its position must have been in the earliest times a halting-place for the caravans between Syria and Mesopotamia. Here Solomon built the city which was called in Hebrew Tadmor. It lies in 34° 18' N. lat. and 38° 14' E. long., and was reckoned 237 Roman miles from the coast of Syria, 176 NE. of Damascus, 80 E. of Emesa, and 113 SE. of Apamea. With the exception of a tradition that it was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar, we hear nothing of it till the time of the government of the East by M. Antonius, who marched to surprise it, but the inhabitants retreated with their moveable property beyond the Euphrates (Appian, B. C. v. 9). Under the early Roman emperors it was a free city and a great commercial emporium. Its position on the border between the Parthian and Roman dominions gave it the command of the trade of both, but also subjected it to the injuries of war. Under Hadrian and the Antonines it was highly favoured and reached its greatest splendour (Plin. v. 88). The history of its temporary elevation to the rank of a capital, in the third century, is related under ODENATHUS and ZENOBI. On its capture by Aurelian, in 270, it was plundered, and soon afterwards an insurrection of its inhabitants led to its partial destruction. After that time it was made a φρούριον or frontier fortress, and was further fortified by Justinian (Steph. Byz. s. v.; Procop. de Aed. ii. 11). In the Arabian conquest it was one of the first cities taken; but it was still inhabited by a small population, chiefly of Jews, till it was taken and plundered by Timour (Tamerlane) in 1400. It has long been entirely deserted, except when a horde of Bedouins pitch their tents among its splendid ruins. Those ruins, which form a most striking object in the midst of the Desert, are of the Roman period, and decidedly inferior in the style of architecture, as well as in grandeur of effect, to those of Baalbek [HELIOPOLIS], the sister deserted city of Syria. The finest remains are those of the temple of the Sun; the most interesting are the square sepulchral towers of from three to five stories. The streets and the foundations of the houses are traceable to some extent; and there are several inscriptions in Greek and in the native Palmyrene dialect, besides one in Hebrew and one or two in Latin. The surrounding district of Palmyrēne contained the Syrian Desert from the E. border of Coele Syria to the Euphrates (Ptol. v. 15, 24).

Paltus (Πάλτος: Belde), a town on the coast of Syria between Aradus and Laodicea (Strab. pp. 728, 735; Cic. ad Fam. xii. 13).

Pamīsus (Πάμισος). 1. A southern tributary of the Peneus in Thessaly (Hdt. vii. 129).—2. (Pinnatza), the chief river of Messenia, rises in the E. part of the country, forty stadia E. of Ithome, flows first SW., and then S. through the Messenian plain, and falls into the Messenian gulf (Strab. pp. 267, 366).—3. A small river in Laconia, falls into the Messenian gulf near Leuctra. It was at one time the boundary between Laconia and Messenia (Strab. p. 361).

Pammēnes (Παμμένης), a Theban general in whom Epaminondas placed confidence. He was entrusted by the Thebans with the defence of Megalopolis in 371 and in 352 B.C. (Paus. viii. 27, 2; Diod. xv. 14). When Philip was sent as a hostage to Thebes he was put under the charge of Pammenes (Plut. Pelop. 26).

Pamphīa or Pamphīum (Παμφία, Πάμφιον), a village of Aetolia, destroyed by the Macedonians (Pol. v. 8, 13).

Pamphīla (Παμφίλη), a female historian of considerable reputation, who lived in the reign of Nero. She is described by Suidas as a native of Epidaurus, by Photius as an Egyptian. Her principal work, of which Photius has given some extracts, was a kind of Historical Miscellany (entitled Συμμίκτων ιστορικῶν ὑπομνημάτων λόγοι). Modern scholars are best acquainted with the name of Pamphila from a statement in her work preserved by A. Gellius (xv. 23), by which is ascertained the year of the birth of Hellanicus, Herodotus, and Thucydides respectively.

Pamphīlus (Πάμφιλος). 1. A disciple of Plato, who is only remembered by the circumstance that Epicurus, when a young man, attended his lectures at Samos (Diog. Laërt. x. 14; Cic. N. D. i. 26, 70).—2. An Alexandrian grammarian, of the school of Aristarchus, and the author of a lexicon, which is supposed by some scholars to have formed the foundation of the lexicon of Hesychius. He appears to have lived in the first century of our era.—3. A philosopher or grammarian of Nicopolis, the author of a work on agriculture, of which there are considerable fragments in the Geoponica.—4. Presbyter of Caesarea, in Palestine, celebrated for his friendship with Eusebius, who, as a memorial of this intimacy, assumed the surname of Pamphilus. [Dict. of Christian Biogr.]—5. Of Amphipolis, one of the most distinguished of the Greek painters, about B.C. 390–350. He was the disciple of Eupompus, the founder of the Sicyonian school of painting, or, rather, the artist from whose time Sicyonic painting began to take a high rank. Pamphilus evidently did much to extend this reputation. It is probable that his special distinction consisted in development of the encaustic method of painting (Plin. xxxv. 74, 123; cf. Dict. of Ant. art. Pictura). Of his own works we have most scanty accounts; but as a teacher of his art he was surpassed by none of the ancient masters. His course of accurate and comprehensive instruction extended over ten years, and the fee was no less than a talent. Among those who paid this price for his tuition were Apelles, Melanthius, and Pausias (Plin. xxxv. 76).

Pamphōs (Πάμφως), a mythical poet, placed by Pausanias later than Olen, and much earlier than Homer. His name is connected particularly with Attica. (Paus. vii. 21, 9, ix. 27, 2.)

Pamphylia (Παμφυλία: Πάμφυλος, Παμφύλιος, Pamphylius), in its original and more restricted sense, was a narrow strip of the S. coast of Asia Minor, extending in a sort of arch along the Sinus Pamphylus (G. of Adalia), between Lycia on the W., and Cilicia on the E., and on the N. bordering on Pisidia. Its boundaries, as commonly stated, were Mt. Climax on the W., the river Melas on the E., and the foot of Mt. Taurus on the N.; but the statements are not very exact: Strabo gives to the coast of Pamphylia a length of 640 stadia, from Olbia on the W. to Ptolemais, some distance E. of the Melas, and he makes it a very narrow strip (p. 667). It was a belt of mountain coast land, intersected by rivers flowing down from the Taurus in a short course, but several of them with a considerable body of water; the chief of them, going from W. to E., were the CATARRHACTES, CESTRUS, EURYMEDON, and MELAS [No. 6], all navigable for some distance from their mouths. The inhabitants were a mixture of races, whence their name Πάμφυλοι, of all races (the genuine old form: the other in -ιοι is later). Besides the aboriginal inhabitants, of the Semitic family, and Cilicians, there were very early Greek settlers and later Greek colonies in the land (Hdt. vii. 91; Strab. p. 668). Tradition ascribed the first Greek settlements to Mopsus, after the Trojan war, from whom the country was in early times called Mopsopia (Plin. v. 96). It was successively a part of the Persian, Macedonian, Greco-Syrian, and Pergamene kingdoms, and passed by the will of Attalus III. to the Romans (B.C. 130), under whom it was made a province (Dio Cass. liii. 26, liv. 34); but this province of Pamphylia was united with Lycia and called Lycia-Pamphylia under Claudius (Dio Cass. lx. 17). Under Galba Pamphylia was united to Galatia (Tac. Hist. ii. 9).

Pamphylum Mare, Pamphylus Sinus (τὸ Παμφύλιον πέλαγος, Παμφύλιος κόλπος: Gulf of Adalia), the great gulf forming in the S. coast of Asia Minor by the Taurus chain and by Mt. Solyma, between the Pr. Sacrum or Chelidonium (C. Khelidonia), the S.E. point of Lycia, and Pr. Anemurium (C. Anemour), the S. point of Cilicia. Its depth from N. to S., from Pr. Sacrum to Olbia, is reckoned by Strabo at 367 stadia (86.7 geog. miles), which is too little (Strab. pp. 121, 125, 666).

Pān (Πάν), the great god of flocks and shepherds among the Greeks. In mythology he is usually described as the son of Hermes (a shepherd deity in Arcadia; see p. 406) by the daughter of Dryops (Hom. Hymn. vii. 34). Herodotus (ii. 145) speaks of him as born from Hermes and Penelope. He was perfectly developed from his birth; and when his mother saw him, she ran away through fear; but Hermes carried him to Olympus, where all the gods were delighted with him, and especially Dionysus. From his delighting all the gods, the Homeric hymn derives his name. He was originally only an Arcadian god; and Arcadia was always the principal seat of his worship. From this country his name and worship afterwards spread over other parts of Greece; but at Athens his worship was not introduced till the time of the battle of Marathon, when he is said to have appeared to the courier Pheidippides and promised aid if the Athenians would worship him (Hdt. vi. 105; Paus. viii. 54, 5). His grotto at Athens was in the rocks on the NW. side of the Acropolis, and he had also a shrine near the Ilissus. In Arcadia he was the god of forests, pastures, flocks, and shepherds, and dwelt in grottoes, wandered on the summits of mountains and rocks, and in valleys, either amusing himself with the chase, or leading the dances of the nymphs. As the god of flocks, both of wild and tame animals, it was his province to increase and guard them; but he was also a hunter, and hunters owed their success or failure to him. The Arcadian hunters used to scourge the statue of the god if they had been disappointed in the chase (Theocr. vii. 107). During the heat of mid-day he used to slumber, and the peasants feared to disturb his rest (Theocr. i. 16). He was especially a god of Nature, and hence associated with the Great Mother, Cybele (Pind. Pyth. iii. 77). Hence in later times he was supposed to be the god of the universe, and that signification was given to his name. As the god of everything connected with pastoral life, he was fond of music, and the inventor of the syrinx or shepherd's flute, which he himself played in a masterly manner, and in which he instructed others also, such as Daphnis. He is thus said to have loved the poet Pindar, and to have sung and danced his lyric songs, in return for which Pindar erected to him a sanctuary in front of his house. Pan, like other gods who dwelt in forests, was dreaded by travellers, to whom he sometimes appeared, and whom he startled with sudden awe or terror. His supposed dreadful shout was doubtless imagined from the unexplained sounds heard in the depths of forests. Hence sudden fright without any visible cause was ascribed to Pan, and was called a Panick fear (cf. Eur. Rhes. 36). He was at the same time believed to be possessed of prophetic powers, and to have even instructed Apollo in this art. While roaming in his forests he fell in love with Echo, by whom or by Pitho he became the father of Lynx [see p. 308]. The shepherd's pipe (σὺριγξ) was a special attribute of Pan, and hence grew up the myth that he loved the Arcadian nymph Syrinx, that she was changed into a reed by the banks of Ladon, and that the reed-pipe was named after her (Ov. Met. i. 691). Fir trees were sacred to him, as the god of mountain forests, and so arose the myth that the nymph Pitys, whom he loved, had been changed into that tree. The sacrifices offered to him consisted of cows, rams, lambs, milk, and honey (Theocr. v. 58; Anth. Pal. ii. 630, 697, vi. 96, 239, vii. 59). At Athens, in his grotto under the Acropolis, there was an annual festival with a torch-race, and the Arcadian custom was to keep fire always burning on his altar (Hdt. vi. 105; Paus. viii. 37, 11). From this some modern writers deduce that Pan was originally an Arcadian god of light; but if he was regarded as a light-god at all it was probably a development of the Orphic religion. The Arcadian custom may perhaps merely indicate that he was the god of the shepherd's home and hearth in Arcadia. Pan is often brought into connexion (as are other deities and nymphs of the country) with Dionysus, and is represented in his train. He was supposed to have accompanied him to India, and to have aided him in battle by the terrors of his voice. He was credited also with attendant deities or demons of the wood and country, called Panes or Panisci (Cic. N. D. iii. 17, 43; Suet. Tib. 43). The Romans identified with Pan their own god Inuus or Faunus [FAUNUS; LUPERCUS]. In works of art Pan is represented as a sensual being, with horns, puck-nose, and goat's feet, sometimes in the act of dancing, and sometimes playing on the syrinx. [See also cut on p. 308.]

Panacea. [ASCLEPIUS.]

Panachaia Mons (τὸ Παναχαϊκὸν ὄρος: Voidia), a mountain in Achaia, 6300 feet high, immediately behind Patrae.

Panactum (Πανάκτων), a town on the frontiers of Attica and Boeotia, originally belonged to Boeotia, and, after being a frequent object of contention between the Athenians and Boeotians, at length became permanently annexed to Attica (Paus. i. 25, 6).

Panaenus (Πάναϊνος), a distinguished Athenian painter, who flourished B.C. 448. He was the nephew of Phidias, whom he assisted in decorating the temple of Zeus at Olympia. He was also the author of a series of paintings of the battle of Marathon, in the Pœcile at Athens (Paus. v. 11, 5; Plin. xxxv. 58).

Panaetius (Παναίτιος). 1. A native of Rhodes (Strab. p. 655), and a celebrated Stoic philosopher, studied first at Pergamum under the grammarian Crates, and subsequently at Athens under the Stoic Diogenes of Babylon and his disciple Antipater of Tarsus. He afterwards went to Rome, where he became an intimate friend of Laelius and of Scipio Africanus the younger (Cic. Div. i. 8, 6, Fin. iv. 9, 23, Tusc. iv. 2, 4). In B.C. 144 he accompanied Scipio on the embassy which he undertook to the kings of Egypt and Asia in alliance with Rome. Panaetius succeeded Antipater as head of the Stoic school, and died at Athens, at all events before 111 (Cic. de Or. i. 11, 45). The principal work of Panaetius was his treatise on the theory of moral obligation (Περὶ τοῦ καθήκοντος), in three books, from which Cicero took the greater part of his work De Officiis. Panaetius had softened down the harsh severity of the older Stoics, and, without giving up their fundamental definitions, had modified them so as to make them applicable to the conduct of life.—2. Of Leontini, made himself tyrant of that city B.C. 608 (Polyaen. v. 47), and was the earliest of the tyrants in Sicilian towns.

Panaetolium, a mountain in Aetolia near Thermon, in which town the general assembly of the Aetolians was held. [AETOLIA.]

Panda, a river in the country of Siraces in Sarmatia Asiatica (Tac. Ann. xii. 16).

Pandareos (Πανδάρως), son of Merops of Miletus, is said to have stolen from the temple of Zeus in Crete the golden dog which Hephaestus had made, and to have carried it to Tantalus. When Zeus sent Hermes to Tantalus to claim the dog back, Tantalus declared that it was not in his possession. The god, however, took the animal by force, and threw Mount Sipylus upon Tantalus. Pandareos fled to Athens, and thence to Sicily, where he perished with his wife Harmothoe. The story of Pandareos derives more interest from that of his three daughters. For the story of the eldest and best known see AEDON; the other daughters of Pandareos, Merope and Cleodora (according to Pausanias, Camira and Clytia), were, as is told in the Odyssey, deprived of their parents by the gods, and remained as helpless orphans in the palace. Aphrodite, however, fed them with milk, honey, and wine. Hera gave them beauty and understanding far above other women. Artemis gave them dignity, and Athene skill in the arts. But retribution was still due for their father's crime, and, when Aphrodite went up to Olympus to arrange the nuptials for her maidens, they were carried off by the Harpies, and given as servants to the Erinyes. (Od. xx. 65–78; Paus. x. 30, 1; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1875.)

Pandarus (Πάνδαρος). 1. A Lycian, son of Lycaon, commanded the inhabitants of Zelea on Mt. Ida in the Trojan war. He was distinguished in the Trojan army as an archer, and was said to have received his bow from Apollo. He was slain by Diomedes, or, according to some, by Sthenelus. He was afterwards honoured as a hero at Pinara in Lycia. (Il. ii. 824, iv. 88, v. 290; Strab. p. 665; Philostr. Her. iv. 2).—2. Son of Alcanor, and twin-brother of Bitias, was a companion of Aeneas, and was slain by Turnus (Verg. Aen. ix. 672, 758).

Pandātaria (Vendutene), a small island off the coast of Campania, to which Julia, the daughter of Augustus, among other state prisoners, was banished (Strab. pp. 123, 233; Tac. Ann. i. 53, xiv. 63; Suet. Tib. 53).

Pandēmos. [APHRODITE, p. 86, b.]

Pandion (Πανδίων). 1. I., king of Athens, son of Erichthonius, by the Naiad Pasithea, was married to Zeuxippe, by whom he became the father of Procne and Philomela, and of the twins Erechtheus and Butes. In a war against Labdacus, king of Thebes, he called upon Tereus of Daulis in Phocis, for assistance, and afterwards rewarded him by giving him his daughter Procne in marriage. [TEREUS.] It was in his reign that Dionysus and Demeter were said to have come to Attica. (Thuc. ii. 29; Apollod. iii. 14, 6; Paus. i. 5, 3.)—2. II., king of Athens, son of Cecrops and Metiadusa. Being expelled from Athens by the Metionidae, he fled to Megara, and there married Pylia, the daughter of king Pylas. When the latter, in consequence of a murder, migrated into Peloponnesus, Pandion obtained the government of Megara, where his grave and ἡρώων were shown (Paus. i. 43, 6). He became the father of Aegeus, Pallas, Nisus, Lycus, and a natural son, Oeneus, and also of a daughter, who was married to Sciron. After his death his four sons, called the Pandionidae (Πανδιονίδαι), returned from Megara to Athens, and expelled the Metionidae. Aegeus obtained Athens, Lycus the E. coast of Attica, Nisus Megaris, and Pallas the S. coast. His statue was placed at Athens among those of the eponymic heroes. (Eur. Med. 660; Apollod. iii. 15, 1; Paus. i. 5, 29.)

Pandōra (Πανδώρα), the name of the first woman on earth. When Prometheus had stolen the fire from heaven, Zeus in revenge caused Hephaestus to make a woman out of earth, who by her charms and beauty should bring misery upon the human race. Aphrodite adorned her with beauty; Hermes bestowed upon her boldness and cunning; and the gods called her Pandora, or Allgifted, as each of the gods had given her some power by which she was to work the ruin of man. Hermes took her to Epimetheus, who made her his wife, forgetting the advice of his brother Prometheus that he should not receive any gifts from Zeus. In the house of Epimetheus was a closed jar, which he had been forbidden to open. But the curiosity of a woman could not resist the temptation to know its contents; and when she opened the lid all the evils incident to man poured out. She had only time to shut down the lid, and prevent the escape of hope. (Hes. Th. 571, Op. 50.) Later writers relate that the box contained all the blessings of the gods, which would have been preserved for the human race had not Pandora opened the vessel, so that the winged blessings escaped (Hyg. Fab. 142).

Pandōsia (Πανδοσία). 1. (Kastrī), a town of Epirus, in the district Thesprotia, on the river Acheron, in the territory of the Cassopaei (Strab. pp. 256, 324).—2. (Castel Franco?), a town in Bruttium near the frontiers of Lucania, either upon or at the foot of three hills, was originally a residence of native Oenotrian chiefs. It was here that Alexander of Epirus fell, B.C. 326, in accordance with an oracle, for here also there was a stream called Acheron. (Strab. p. 256; Liv. viii. 24; Justin. xii. 2.)—3. A town of Lucania, near Heraclea (Plut. Pyrrh. 16).

Pandrosos. [AGLAURUS.]

Panēas. [CAESAREA, No. 2.]

Panēum or -ium (Πάνειον, Πάνιον, i.e. Pan's abode), the Greek name of the cave, in a mountain at the S. extremity of the range of Antilibanus, out of which the river Jordan takes its rise, a little above the town of Paneas or Caesarea Philippi. The mountain, in whose S. side the cave is, was called by the same name; and the surrounding district was called Paneas. (Jos. Ant. xv. 10).

Pangaeum or Pangaeus (Παγγαῖον, Πάγγαῖον: Pangea), a celebrated range of mountains in Macedonia, between the Strymon and the Nestus, in the neighbourhood of Philippi, with gold and silver mines; famous also for its roses (Hdt. v. 16; Thuc. ii. 99; Aesch. Pers. 494; Verg. Georg. iv. 462; Plin. iv. 42).

Panhellēnīus. [ZEUS.]

Paniōnium. [MYCALE: and Dict. of Ant. s.v. Panionia.]

Panīum (Πάνιον), a town on the coast of Thrace, near Heraclea (Suid. s.v.).

Pannōnīa, one of the most important of the Roman provinces between the Danube and the Alps, was separated on the W. from Noricum by the Mons Cetius, and from Upper Italy by the Alpes Juliae, on the S. from Illyria by the Savus, of the E. from Dacia by the Danube, and on the N. from Germany by the same river. It thus corresponded to the eastern part of Austria, Styria, Carinthia, Carniola, the whole of Hungary between the Danube and the Save, Slavonia, and a part of Croatia and Bosnia. The mountains in the S. and W. of the country on the borders of Illyria, Italy, and Noricum, belonged to the Alps, and are therefore called by the general name of the Alpes Pannonicae, of which the separate names are Oera, Carvancas, Cetius, and Albii or Albani Montes. The principal rivers of Pannonia, besides the Danube, were the Dravus (Drave), Savus (Save), and Arrabo (Raab), all of which flows into the Danube.—The Pannonians (Pannonii), sometimes called Paeonians by the Greek writers, were probably of Illyrian origin, and were divided into numerous tribes. They were a brave and warlike people, but are described by the Roman writers as cruel, faithless, and treacherous. They maintained their independence of Rome, till Augustus, after his conquest of the Illyrians (B.C. 35), turned his arms against the Pannonians, who were shortly afterwards subdued by his general Vibius (Dio Cass. xlix. 35–38). In A.D. 7 the Pannonians joined the Dalmatians and the other Illyrian tribes in their revolt from Rome, and were with difficulty conquered by Tiberius, after a desperate struggle, which lasted three years (A.D. 7–9) (Dio Cass. lv. 28–38; Vell. Pat. ii. 110; Suet. Tib. 16). It was after the termination of this war that Pannonia appears to have been reduced to the form of a Roman province, and was garrisoned by several Roman legions. The dangerous mutiny of these troops after the death of Augustus (A.D. 14) was with difficulty quelled by Drusus. From this time to the end of the empire, Pannonia always contained a large number of Roman troops, on account of its bordering on the Quadi and other powerful barbarous nations. The towns Carnuntum, Siscia, and Poetovio stood near its border-line. We find at a later time that Pannonia was the regular quarters of seven legions (Tac. Ann. i. 16; Vell. Pat. ii. 125). In consequence of this large number of troops always stationed in the country, several towns were founded and numerous fortresses were erected along the Danube. Pannonia originally formed only one province, but about 102 A.D. was divided into two provinces, called Pannonia Superior and Pannonia Inferior. These were separated from one another by a straight line drawn from the river Arrabo S. as far as the Savus, the country W. of this line being P. Superior, and the part E. P. Inferior. Each of the provinces was governed by a separate praetor; but they were frequently spoken of in the plural under the name of Pannoniae. The Danube formed the limit and the colonies Mursia and Aquincum were founded as outposts by Hadrian (C. I. L. iii. p. 415). The native settlements were villages (vici) grouped in cantons (pagi). The larger towns were of Roman origin, either colonies or municipia, some of which were first established as outposts or fortresses, and afterwards increased. In the fourth century the part of P. Inferior between the Arrabo, the Danube, and the Dravus, was formed into a separate province with chief towns Sopiana (Fünfkirchen) and Aquincum (Alt-Ofen), by Galerius, who gave it the name of Valeria in honour of his wife. But as P. Inferior had thus lost a great part of its territory, Constantine added to it a portion of P. Superior, comprising the upper part of the course of the Dravus and the Savus. P. Superior was now called Pannonia I., with chief towns Savaria and Siscia, and P. Inferior Pannonia II., with chief town Sirmium; and all three Pannonian provinces (together with the two Noric provinces and Dalmatia) belonged to the six Illyrian provinces of the Western Empire. In the middle of the fifth century Pannonia was taken possession of by the Huns. After the death of Attila it passed into the hands of the Ostrogoths, and subsequently into those of the Lombards.

Panomphaeus (Πανομφαῖος), i.e. the author of all signs and omens, a surname of Zeus, who had a sanctuary on the Hellespont between Capes Rhoeteum and Sigeum (Il. viii. 250; Ov. Met. xi. 198).

Pânōpe (Πανόπη), a nymph of the sea, daughter of Nereus and Doris.

Pânōpeus (Πανοπεύς), son of Phocus and Asteropaea, accompanied Amphitryon on his expedition against the Taphians or Teleboans, and took an oath not to embezzle any part of the booty; but having broken his oath, he was punished by his son Epeus becoming unwarlike. He was one of the Calydonian hunters. (Il. xxiii. 665; Paus. ii. 29, 4; Ov. Met. viii. 312.)

Pânōpeus or Phanoteus, (Πανοπεύς, Hom.), Pânōpēae (Πανοπέαι), or Pânōpe (Πανόπη, Thuc.; Πανοπέυς: Agio Vlasī), an ancient town in Phocis on the Cephissus and near the frontiers of Boeotia, twenty stadia W. of Chaeronea, said to have been founded by Panopeus, son of Phocus (Hes. ap. Strab. p. 424; Hdt. viii. 34; Ov. Met. iii. 19).

Panōpōlis. [CHEMMIS.]

Panoptes. [ARGUS.]

Panormus (Πάνορμος), that is, 'All-Port,' or a place always fit for landing, the name of several harbours. 1. (Πανορμίτης, Panormita, Panormitanus: Palermo), an important town on the N. coast of Sicily and at the mouth of the river Orethus, was founded by the Phoenicians, and at a later time received its Greek name from its excellent harbour (Thuc. vi. 2; Diod. xxii. 10). From the Phoenicians it passed into the hands of the Carthaginians, in whose power it remained for a long time, and who made it one of the chief stations for their fleet (Diod. xi. 20, xiii. 88, xv. 17). It was taken by the Romans in the first Punic war, B.C. 254 (Pol. i. 21, 38). It became a municipium with immunities from taxation and considerable independence. Cicero notices its commercial prosperity (Verr. ii. 26, iii. 6, v. 7); but after the war with Sextus Pompeius it lost its independence, and was made a Roman colony. (Strab. p. 272.) —2. (Porto Raphti), the principal harbour on the E. coast of Attica, near the demus Prasiae, and opposite the S. extremity of Euboea.—3. (Tekieh), a harbour in Achaia, fifteen stadia E. of the promontory Rhium (Thuc. ii. 86; Paus. vii. 22, 10).—4. A harbour in Epirus, in the middle of the Acroceraunian mountains (Strab. p. 324).—5. (Nr. Mylopotamo, Ru.), a town and harbour on the N. coast of Crete.—6. The outer harbour of Ephesus formed by the mouth of the river Cayster (Strab. p. 639; EPHESUS).

Coin of Panormus in Sicily (before 254 B.C.).

Obv., head of Persephone and dolphins; rev., horse's head; name of town in Punic characters.

Pansa, C. Vibius, a friend and partisan of Caesar, was tribune of the plebs B.C. 51, and was appointed by Caesar in 46 to the government of Cisalpine Gaul as successor to M. Brutus. Caesar subsequently nominated him and Hirtius consuls for 43. Pansa was consul in that year along with Hirtius, and fell before Mutina in the month of April. The details are given under HIRTIVS.

Pantācŷas, Pantāgŷas, or Pantāgŷies (Παντακῷας: Fiume di Pocari), a small river on the E. coast of Sicily, flowing into the sea between Megara and Syracuse (Verg. Aen. iii. 689; Ov. Fast. iv. 471).

Pantālēōn (Πανταλέων). 1. Son of Omphalion, king or tyrant of Pisa in Elis at the period of the thirty-fourth Olympiad (B.C. 644), assembled an army, with which he made himself master of Olympia, and assumed by force the sole presidency of the Olympic games. The Eleans on this account would not reckon this as one of the regular Olympiads. Pantaleon assisted the Messenians in the second Messenian war. (Paus. vi. 21, 22; Strab. p. 362.)—2. A king of Bactria or the Indo-Caucasian provinces, whose date, from his coins, is put at about 120 B.C.

Panthēa. [ABRADATAS.]

Panthēum. [ROMA.]

Panthōus contr. Panthūs (Πάνθοος, Πάνθους), one of the elders at Troy, husband of Phrontis, and father of Euphorbus, Polydamas, and Hyperenor (Il. iii. 146, xiv. 450, xvii. 24, 40, 81). Hence both Euphorbus and Polydamas are called Panthōides. He was originally a priest of Apollo at Delphi, and was carried to Troy by Antenor, on account of his beauty. He continued to be a priest of Apollo, and is called by Virgil (Aen. ii. 319) Othryades, or son of Othryas.

Coin of Panticapaeum in the Tauric Chersonesus (about B.C. 300).

Obv., head of Pan (the Greeks erroneously connected the name, which is probably Scythian, with the god Pan); rev., PAN; a griffin with spear in its mouth; below, a stalk of corn, to signify the corn trade of the town.

Panticapaeum (Παντικάπαιον: Παντικάπαιος, Παντικάπαιεύς, Παντικάπιάτης: Kertsch), a town in the Tauric Chersonesus, was situated on a hill twenty stadia in circumference, on the Cimmerian Bosphorus, and opposite the town of Phanagoria in Asia (Strab. pp. 309–311; Appian, Mithr. 107). It was founded by the Milesians, about B.C. 541, and from its position and excellent harbour soon became a place of great commercial importance. It was the residence of the Greek kings of the Bosphorus, and hence is sometimes called Bosphorus. Justinian caused it to be surrounded with new walls. (Strab. p. 495; Diod. xx. 24; Plin. iv. 78; Procop. Aed. iii. 7.) Remains of Greek art of the greatest value to archaeology have been found here, and are now for the most part at St. Petersburg.

Panticapes (Παντικαπής: Samara?) a river in European Sarmatia, which, according to Herodotus, rises in a lake, separates the agricultural and nomad Scythians, flows through the district Hylaea, and falls into the Borysthenes (Hdt. iv. 18, 47, 54; Plin. iv. 83).

Panyasis (Πανύσις). 1. A Greek epic poet, was a native of Halicarnassus, and a relation of the historian Herodotus, probably his uncle. Panyasis was put to death by Lygdamis, the tyrant of Halicarnassus, about B.C. 457. The most celebrated of his poems was Heraclea or Heracleas, which gave a detailed account of the exploits of Heracles. It consisted of fourteen books and 9000 verses. Another poem bore the name of Ionica (Ἰωνικά), and contained 7000 verses; it related the history of Neleus, Codrus, and the Ionic colonies. In later times the works of Panyasis were extensively read, and much admired; some Alexandrine grammarians ranked him with Homer, Hesiod, Pisander, and Antimachus, as one of the five principal epic poets (Suid. s. v.; Paus. x. 8, 5). The scanty fragments which remain give no means of determining the poetical merit of his work (ed. Gaisford, 1823; Dübner, 1840). —2. A philosopher, also a native of Halicarnassus, who wrote two books 'On Dreams' (Περὶ ὀνείρων), was perhaps a grandson of the poet (Suid. s. v.).

Paphlagonia (Παφλαγονία: Παφλαγών, pl. -όνες, Paphlāgo), a district on the N. side of Asia Minor, between Bithynia on the W. and Pontus on the E., being separated from the former by the river Parthenius, and from the latter by the Halys; on the S. it was divided by the chain of Mount Orminius (at some periods by Mount Olgassys) and the bend of the Halys from Phrygia, in the earlier times, but from Galatia afterwards; and on the N. it bordered on the Euxine. These boundaries, however, are not always exactly observed. Xenophon brings the Paphlagonians as far E. as Themiscyrea and the Jasonian promontory (Xen. An. v. 6, 1; cf. Strab. p. 548). It appears to have been known to the Greeks in the mythical period. The Argonautic legends mentioned Paphlagon, the son of Phineus, as the hero eponymus of the country. In the Homeric Catalogue, Pylaemenes leads the Paphlagonians, as allies of the Trojans, from the land of the Heneti, about the river Parthenius, a region famed for its mules; and from this Pylaemenes the later princes of Paphlagonia claimed their descent, and the country itself was sometimes called Pylaemenia (Il. ii. 851, v. 577, xiii. 656; Plin. vi. 5). Herodotus twice mentions the Halys as the boundary between the Paphlagonians and the Syrians of Cappadocia; but we learn also from him and from other authorities that the Paphlagonians were of the same race as the Cappadocians (i.e. the Semitic or Syro-Arabian) and quite distinct, in their language and their customs, from their Thracian neighbours on the W. (Hdt. i. 72, ii. 104; Plut. Lucull. 23.) They were good soldiers, especially as cavalry; but uncivilised and superstitious. The country had also other inhabitants, probably of a different race: namely, the Heneti and the Caucones; and Greek settlements were established on the coast at an early period. The Paphlagonians were first subdued by Croesus. (Hdt. i. 28, iii. 90.) Under the Persian empire they belonged to the third satrapy, but their satraps made themselves independent and assumed the regal title, maintaining themselves in this position (with a brief interruption, during which Paphlagonia was subject to Eumenes) until the conquest of the country by Mithridates, who added the E. part of his own kingdom, and made over the W. part to Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, who gave it to his son Pylaemenes (App. Mithr. 11, 12; Strab. p. 540; Justin, xxxvii. 1–4). After the fall of Mithridates the part of Paphlagonia nearer the coast which had belonged to Mithridates was by Pompey's arrangement, B.C. 65, included in the province of Pontus; the interior was left to the native princes, as tributaries to Rome; but, the race of these princes becoming soon extinct, the whole of Paphlagonia was made Roman, and Augustus made it a part of the province of Galatia. (Strab. pp. 541, 544, 562; Ptol. v. 4, 5.) Pompeiopolis was its μητρόπολις. It was made a separate province under Constantine; but the E. part, from Sinope to the Halys, was assigned to Pontus, under the name of Hellespontus. Paphlagonia was a mountainous country, being intersected from W. to E. by three chains of the Olympus system: namely, the Olympus itself on the S. border, Olgassys in the centre, and a minor chain with no specific name nearer to the coast. The belt of land between this last chain and the sea was very fertile, and the Greek cities of Amastris and Sinope brought a considerable commerce to its shore; but the inland parts were chiefly covered with forests, which were celebrated as hunting grounds. The country was famed for its horses and mules, and in some parts there were extensive sheepwalks; and its rivers were particularly famous for their fish (Strab. p. 547).

Páphus (Πάφος), son of Pygmalion by the statue into which life had been breathed by Aphrodite. From him the town of Paphus derived its name; and Pygmalion himself is called the Paphian hero. (Ov. Met. x. 290.)

Páphus (Πάφος: Πάφιος), the name of two towns on the W. coast of Cyprus, near each other, and called respectively 'Old Paphos,' (Παλαιάπαφος) and 'New Paphos' (Πάφος νέα). Old Paphos was situated near the promontory Zephyrium, ten stadia from the coast, where it had a good harbour; while New Paphos lay more inland, in the midst of a fertile plain, sixty stadia from the former (Hes. Th. 192; Mel. ii. 7; Lucan, viii. 456; Strab. p. 683; Corunt. N. D. 24; Serv. ad Aen. x. 51). It has been said that there was a Paphian river Bocarus, but there is reason to think that this is a confusion with a river Bocarus in the island Salamis (Strab. p. 394). Old Paphos was the chief seat of the worship of Aphrodite, who is said to have landed at this place after her birth among the waves, and who is hence frequently called the Paphian goddess (Paphia). Here she had a celebrated temple, the high priest of which exercised a kind of religious superintendence over the whole island. Every year there was a grand procession from New Paphos to the temple of the goddess in the old city. The foundation of Old Paphos and its temple and temple services are fully described by Tacitus (Hist. ii. 2). The founder was CINYRAS, though Tacitus notices an ancient tradition of a mythical founder, Aerias, which, he says, others regard as a name of the goddess. Originally there were two priestly families, the Cinyradae and the Tamiradae, but eventually the office belonged solely to the descendants of Cinyras. The image of the goddess was a conical stone (cf. Serv. ad Aen. i. 724; Philostr. Vit. Apoll. iii. 58). This cone appears in the Semitic fashion to have been anointed with oil, for a recently discovered inscription mentions a festival of the temple called ἐλαιοχρίσιον. There can be no doubt of the Phoenician origin of Old Paphos, and that the worship of Aphrodite was introduced here from the East. Herodotus (i. 105) speaks of the temple of Aphrodite in Cyprus as established in imitation of the Syrian temple at Ascalon. New Paphos, on the other hand, was a different foundation, traditionally by Agapenor on his return from Troy (Strab. p. 683; Paus. viii. 5, 2). When Paphos is mentioned by later writers without any epithet, they usually mean the New City; but when the name occurs in the poets, we are generally to understand the Old City, as the poets, for the most part, speak of the place in connexion with the worship of Aphrodite. Old Paphos was destroyed by an earthquake in the reign of Augustus, but was rebuilt by order of the emperor, and called Augusta (Dio Cass. liv. 23; cf. Sen. Ep. 91). Under the Romans New Paphos was the capital of one of the four districts into which the island was divided. The excavations carried on by the English archaeologists in 1887 and later years, and described in the Hellenic Journal, have shown that the temple had even the character not so much of a Greek or Roman as of a Phoenician temple with large open courts and several small chambers. It is worthy of remark as supporting the statements of ancient writers, especially of Tacitus, that fragments of marble cones have been found, and that an altar (now in the British Museum) has been found, said to be suitable for the sacrifice of small victims such as Tacitus mentions. It is probable that there was another altar for incense (cf. Od. viii. 302; Hymn. ad Ven. 58; Verg. Aen. i. 4, 15).

Papías, bishop of Hierapolis. [Dict. of Christian Biography.]

Papiniānus, Aemilius, a celebrated Roman jurist, was praefectus praetorio under the emperor Septimius Severus, whom he accompanied to Britain. The emperor died at York A.D. 211, and is said to have commended his two sons Caracalla and Geta to the care of Papinian. (Spart. Carac. 8.) On the death of his father, Caracalla dismissed Papinian from his office, and shortly afterwards put him to death. There are 582 excerpts from Papinian's works in the Digest. These excerpts are from the thirty-seven books of Quaestiones (a work arranged according to the order of the Edict), the nineteen books of Responsa, the two books of Definitiones, the two books De Adulteriis, a single book De Adulteriis, and a Greek work or fragment which probably treated of the office of Aedile both at Rome and in other towns. No Roman jurist had a higher reputation than Papinian. Nor is his reputation unmerited. It was not solely because of his high office, his penetration and his knowledge, that he left a great name; his excellent understanding, guided by integrity of purpose, has made him the model of a true lawyer.

Pāpīnius Stātiūs. [STATIUS.]

Pāpīria Gens, patrician and plebeian. The patrician Papirii were divided into the families of Crassus, Cursor, Maso, and Mugillanus; and the plebeian Papirii into those of Carbo, Paetus, and Turdus. Of these the families of CARBO, CURSOR, MASO, and MUGILLANUS, alone require mention.

Papiriānae Fossae, a village in Etruria on the Via Aemilia, between Luna and Pisa.

Pāpīrius, C. or Sex., the author of a supposed collection of the Leges Regiae, called Jus Papirianum, or Jus Civile Papirianum. He is said to have lived in the reign of Tarquinius Superbus. (Dionys. iii. 36; Liv. i. 20, 32.)

Papius Mutilus. [MUTILUS.]

Pappūa (Παππούα), a lofty rugged mountain on the extreme border of Numidia, perhaps the same as the Thammes of Ptolemy, and as the mountain abounding with wild cats, near the city of Melitene, to which Diodorus Siculus refers (xx. 58), but without mentioning its name (Procop. B. V. ii. 4, 7).

Pappus (Πάππος), of Alexandria, one of the later Greek geometers, is said by Suidas to have lived under Theodosius (A.D. 379–395). Of the works of Pappus, the only one which has come down to us is his celebrated Mathematical Collections (Μαθηματικῶν συναγωγῶν βιβλία). What remains of the work is edited by F. Hultsch, Berl. 1875.

Papremis (Πάπρημις), a city of Lower Egypt, capital of the Nomos Papremites, and sacred to the Egyptian god whom the Greeks identified with Ares (Hdt. ii. 59, 71).

Papus, Aemilius. 1. M., dictator B.C. 321 (Liv. ix. 7).—2. Q., twice consul, 282 and 278; and censor 275. In both his consulships and in his censorship he had as colleague C. Fabricius Luscinus. (Dionys. xviii. 5).—3. L., consul 225, defeated the Cisalpine Gauls with great slaughter. He was censor 220 with C. Flaminius. (Pol. ii. 23; Eutrop. iii. 5.)

Parachelōitis (Παραχελωίτις), the name of the plain in Acarnania and Aetolia, through which the Achelous flows.

Parachoāthras (Παραχοάθρας, τὰ Παραχόαθρα: Mts. of Louristan), a part of the chain of mountains forming the E. margin of the Tigris and Euphrates valley, was the boundary between Susiana and Media. The same name is given to an E. branch of the chain, forming the boundary between Parthia and the desert of Carmania. Strabo places it too far N. (Ptol. vi. 2, 3; Strab. pp. 511, 514, 522.)

Paraetacēnē (Παραϊτακηνή: Παραϊτακά, Παραϊτακηνόι, Paraetacae, Paraetaceni), the name of various mountainous regions in the Persian empire, is the Greek form of a Persian word signifying mountainous. 1. The best known of those districts was on the borders of Media and Persis, and was inhabited by a people of Median origin, who are mentioned several times by the historians of Alexander and his successors (Strab. p. 736; Arrian, iii. 19; cf. Hdt. i. 101).—2. A district between the rivers Oxus and Jaxartes, on the borders of Bactria and Sogdiana (Arrian, iv. 21; Curt. viii. 14).

Paraetōnium or Ammōnīa (Παραϊτόνιον, ἡ Ἀμμωνία: El-Bareton or Marsa-Labeit), an important city on the N. coast of Africa, belonged to Marmarica in its widest sense, but politically to Egypt—namely, to the Nomos Libya: hence this city on the W. and Pelusium on the E. are called 'cornua Aegypti.' It stood near the promontory Artos or Pythis (Ras-el-Hazeit), and was reckoned 200 Roman miles W. of Alexandria, and 1800 stadia N. of Ammonium in the Desert (Siwah), which Alexander the Great visited by the way of Paraetonium (Strab. p. 709; Arrian, An. iv. 3, 3; Ov. Met. ix. 772; Lucan, iii. 295). The city was forty stadia in circuit. It was an important seaport, a strong fortress, and a seat of the worship of Isis. It was restored by Justinian, and continued a place of some consequence till its destruction by Mehmet Ali, in 1820.

Parāgon Sinus (Παράγων κόλπος: Gulf of Oman), a gulf of the Indicus Oceanus, on the coast of Gedrosia (Ptol. vi. 8, 7).

Parālia. [ATTICA, p. 148.]

Parālus (Πάραλος), the younger of the two legitimate sons of Pericles. He and his brother Xanthippus were educated by their father with the greatest care, but they both appear to have been of inferior capacity, which was not compensated by worth of character, though Paralus seems to have been better than his brother. They both fell victims to the plague, B.C. 429. (Plut. Pericl. 24, 36; Plat. Alc. i. p. 118, Protag. p. 319; Athen. p. 505.)

Parapotāmii or -ia (Παραποτάμιοι, -αῖα: Belissii), an ancient town in Phocis, situated on a steep hill, and on the left bank of the river Cephissus, from which it derives its name (cf. Il. ii. 522). It was near the frontiers of Boeotia, being only forty stadia from Chaeronea and sixty stadia from Orchomenus. It was destroyed by Xerxes, but was rebuilt, and was destroyed a second time in the Sacred war. (Hdt. viii. 33; Paus. x. 3, 1; Strab. p. 424.)

Paravaei (Παραβαῖοι), an Epirot tribe on the banks of the Aous (Thuc. ii. 80; Arrian, An. i. 7).

Parcae. [MOIRAE.]

Parentium (Parenzo), a town in Istria, with a good harbour, inhabited by Roman citizens, she bear. Thereupon he carried the boy home, and brought him up along with his own child, and called him Paris (Eur. Troad. 921). When Paris had grown up, he distinguished himself as a valiant defender of the flocks and shepherds, and hence received the name of Alexander, i.e. the defender of men. He also succeeded in discovering his real origin, and was received by Priam as his son. It was said that Priam was holding funeral games for Paris, whom he believed to be dead. The king's servants seized a bull for the prize from the herds of Paris, who therefore took part in the games and conquered his brothers. They were about to attack him in anger, when Cassandra declared that he was really Paris, the son of Priam (Apollod. iii. 12, 5). He now married Oenone, the daughter of the river-god Cebren, by whom, according to some, he became the father of Corythus. The most celebrated event in the life of Paris was his abduction of Helen. This came to pass in the following way. Once upon a time, when Peleus and Thetis solemnised their nuptials, all the gods were invited to the marriage, with the exception of Eris, or Strife. Enraged at her exclusion, the goddess threw a golden apple among the guests, with the inscription, 'To the fairest' (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 93). Thereupon Hera, Aphrodite and Athene each claimed the apple for herself. Zeus ordered Hermes to take the goddesses to Mount Gargarus, a portion of Ida, to the beautiful shepherd Paris, who was there tending his flocks, and who was to decide the dispute. The goddesses accordingly appeared before him. Hera promised him the sovereignty of Asia and great riches, Athene great glory and renown in war, and Aphrodite the fairest of women for his wife. Paris decided in favour of Aphrodite, and gave her the golden apple. (Il. xxiv. 29; Schol. ad Eur. Hec. 642, Troad. 925, Hel. 23; Hyg. Fab. 92.) This judgment called forth in Hera and Athene fierce hatred against Troy.

but not a Roman colony, thirty-one miles from Pola (Ptol. iii. 1, 27).

Pāris (Πάρις), also called Alexander (Ἀλέξανδρος), was the second son of Priam and Hecuba. Before his birth Hecuba dreamed that she had brought forth a firebrand, the flames of which spread over the whole city (Eur. Andr. 298; Cic. Div. i. 21; Verg. Aen. vii. 320; Paus. x. 12, 1). Accordingly as soon as the child was born, he was given to a shepherd, who was to expose him on Mount Ida. After the lapse of five days, the shepherd, on returning to Mount Ida found the child still alive, and fed by a

Under the protection of Aphrodite, Paris now sailed to Greece, and was hospitably received in the palace of Menelaus at Sparta. Here he succeeded in carrying off Helen, the wife of Menelaus, who was the most beautiful woman in the world. [For the various accounts of the abduction and the voyage to Troy see HELENA.] The abduction of Helen gave rise to the Trojan war. Before her marriage with Menelaus, she had been wooed by the noblest chiefs in all parts of Greece. Her former suitors now resolved to revenge her abduction, and sailed against Troy. [AGAMEMNON.]—Homer describes

Paris as a handsome man, fond of music, and a skilful archer, even showing courage in war sometimes, but often dilatory and cowardly, and detested by his own friends for having brought upon them the fatal war with the Greeks (Il. iii. 16, 37, vi. 326, vii. 2, 400). He fought with Menelaus before the walls of Troy, and was defeated, but was carried off by Aphrodite (Il. iii. 58). He is said to have killed Achilles, either by one of his arrows or by treachery in the temple of the Thymbraean Apollo (Il. xxii. 359; Dict. Cret. iv. 11; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 85, 322; ACHILLES). On the capture of Troy, Paris was wounded by Philoctetes with an arrow of Heracles, and then returned to his long abandoned wife Oenone. But she, remembering the wrongs she had suffered, or being prevented by her father, refused to heal the wound. He then went back to Troy and died. Oenone quickly repented, and hastened after him with remedies, but came too late, and in her grief hanged herself (Soph. Phil. 1426; Apollod. iii. 12, 6; Dict. Cret. iv. 19). According to others she threw herself from a tower, or (as in the account followed by Tennyson) rushed into the flames of the funeral pile on which the body of Paris was burning (Lycophr. 65; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 61; Quint. Smyrn. x. 467).—Paris is represented in works of art as a beautiful youth, sometimes with a Phrygian cap, as in the Ægina marbles, and usually so distinguished in reliefs of the Graeco-Roman period and in Pompeian paintings.

Paris, the name of two celebrated pantomimes. 1. The elder Paris lived in the reign of the emperor Nero, with whom he was a great favourite. He was originally a slave of Domitia, the aunt of the emperor, and he purchased his freedom by paying her a large sum of money. Paris was afterwards declared, by order of the emperor, to have been free-born (ingenuus), and Domitia was compelled to restore to him the sum which she had received for his freedom. When Nero attempted to become a pantomime, he put Paris to death as a dangerous rival. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 19–27; Dio Cass. lxxiii. 18; Suet. Ner. 54.)—2. The younger Paris, and the more celebrated of the two, was a native of Egypt, and lived in the reign of Domitian, with whom, and also with the populace, he was a great favourite. He was put to death by Domitian, because he had an intrigue with Domitia, the wife of the emperor. (Dio Cass. lxxvii. 8; Suet. Dom. 8, 10; Mart. xi. 18.)

PARISI. [LUTETIA PARISIORUM.]

Parium (τὸ Πάριον: Παριῶνός, Παριήνός, Παριανός: Kemer, Ru.), a city of Mysia, on the N. coast of the Troad, on the Propontis, between Lampsacus and Priapus, was founded by a colony from Miletus, mingled with natives of Paros and Erythrae, and became a flourishing seaport, having a better harbour than that of Priapus (Strab. p. 588; Paus. ix. 27, 1; cf. Hdt. v. 117; Xen. An. vii. 2, 7). Under Augustus it was made a Roman colony, by the name of Colonia Pariana Julia Augusta. It was a renowned seat of the worship of Eros, Dionysus, and Apollo. The surrounding district was called ἡ Παριανή.

Parma (Parmensis: Parma), a town in Gallia Cispadana, situated on a river of the same name and on the Via Aemilia, between Placentia and Mutina, was originally a town of the Boii, but was made a Roman colony B.C. 188, along with Mutina, and from that time became a place of considerable importance (Liv. xxxix. 55). It suffered some injury in the Civil war after Caesar's death, but was enlarged and embellished by Augustus, and received the name of Colonia Julia Augusta (Plin. iv. 48, v. 141). The country around Parma was originally marshy; but the marshes were drained by the consul Scavrus, and converted into fertile land. The wool of Parma was particularly good (Mart. xiv. 155; Colum. vii. 2, 3).

Parmenides (Παρμενίδης), a distinguished Greek philosopher, was a native of Elea in Italy. According to Plato, Parmenides, at the age of sixty-five, came to Athens to the Panathenaea, accompanied by Zeno, then forty years old, and became acquainted with Socrates, who at that time was quite young. Supposing Socrates to have been nineteen or twenty years of age at the time, we may place the visit of Parmenides to Athens in B.C. 448, and consequently his birth in 518. (Plat. Parmen. p. 127, Soph. p. 217, Theaet. p. 183; Diog. Laërt. ix. 21–25, where the chronology is not quite the same: cf. Athen. p. 505; Macrob. i. 1.) Parmenides was regarded with great esteem by Plato and Aristotle; and his fellow-citizens thought so highly of him that, it is said, they bound their magistrates to render obedience to the laws which he had enacted for them (Plat. U.c.; Arist. Metaph. A, 5 = p. 986, b; Diog. Laërt. ix. 23). XENOPHANES had already taught his views of the unity of Being in opposition to the dualism and motion of Heraclitus and the Ionian school. Parmenides, his pupil and successor in the Eleatic school, pursued the same line. The philosophical opinions of Parmenides were developed in a didactic poem, in hexameter verse, entitled On Nature, of which only fragments remain. In this poem he maintained that the phenomena of sense were delusive; and that it was only by mental abstraction that a person could attain to the knowledge of the only reality, a One and All, a continuous and self-existent substance, which could not be perceived by the senses. But although he believed the phenomena of sense to be delusive, nevertheless he sought to arrive at an explanation of the world of sense, and in his theory, which formed the second part of his poem, he propounded two elements or principles of origin—one that which belongs to light and heat, the other that of darkness and cold. The bright or warm was analogous to fire, the cold or dark to earth. The world as perceived by our senses arose from a union of these two principles under a power analogous to Love. Yet such a world as this has not the real being of absolute unity, and practically human knowledge of real existence is unattainable.—Edition of the fragments of Parmenides is by Karsten, in Philosophorum Graec. Veterum Oper. Reliquiae, Amstelod. 1835.

Parmenion (Παρμενίων). 1. Son of Philotas, a distinguished Macedonian general in the service of Philip of Macedon and Alexander the Great. In 346 he was employed by Philip in the siege of Halus (Dem. P.L. p. 392). Philip held him in high esteem, and used to say of him, that he had never been able to find more than one general, and that was Parmenion (Plut. Apophth. p. 177). In Alexander's invasion of Asia, Parmenion was regarded as second in command. At the three great battles of the Granicus, Issus and Arbela, while the king commanded the right wing of the army, Parmenion was placed at the head of the left, and contributed essentially to the victory on all those memorable occasions. The confidence reposed in him by Alexander appears to have been unbounded, and he is continually spoken of as the most attached of the king's friends, and as holding, beyond all question, the second place in the state. But when Philotas, the only surviving son of Parmenion, was accused in Drangiana (B.C. 330) of being privy to the plot against the king's life, he not only confessed his own guilt, when put to the torture, but involved his father also in the plot. Whether the king really believed in the guilt of Parmenion, or deemed his life a necessary sacrifice to policy after the execution of his son, he caused his aged friend to be assassinated in Media before he could receive the tidings of his son's death (Arrian, Anab. iii. 26; Curt. vii. 2, 11; Diod. xvii. 80; Plut. Alex. 49; Justin. xii. 5). The death of Parmenion, at the age of seventy years, will ever remain one of the darkest stains upon the character of Alexander. It is questionable whether even Philotas was really concerned in the conspiracy, and we may safely pronounce that Parmenion had no connexion with it.—2. Of Macedonia, an epigrammatic poet, whose verses were included in the collection of Philip of Thessalonica; whence it is probable that he flourished in, or shortly before, the time of Augustus.

Parnassus (Παρνασσός, Παρνασσός, Ion. Παρνησός), the name, in its widest signification, of a range of mountains which extends from Oeta and Corax SE. through Doris and Phocis, and under the name of Cirphis (Κίρφης) terminates at the Corinthian gulf between Cirrha and Anticyra. But in its narrower sense, Parnassus indicates the highest part of the range (about 8000 feet above the sea) a few miles N. of DELPHI. Its two highest summits were called Tithorëa (Τίθορῆα: Velitza), and Lycorëa (Λυκάρεα: Liakura), the former being NW. and the latter NE. of Delphi; and hence Parnassus is frequently described by the poets as double-headed. Immediately above Delphi the mountain forms a semicircular range of lofty rocks, at the foot of which the town was built. These rocks were called Phaëdriades (Φαιδριάδες) or the 'Resplendent,' from their facing the S., and thus receiving the full rays of the sun during the most brilliant part of the day. The sides of Parnassus were well wooded: at its foot grew myrtle, laurel and olive-trees, and higher up firs; and its summit was covered with snow during the greater part of the year. It contained numerous caves, glens, and romantic ravines. It is celebrated as one of the chief seats of Apollo and the Muses, and an inspiring source of poetry and song [p. 578, b]. On Mount Lycorea was the Corycian cave, from which the Muses are sometimes called the Corycian nymphs. Just above Delphi was the far-famed Castalian spring, which issued from between two cliffs, called Nauplia and Hyampolia [DELPHI]. The mountain also was sacred to Dionysus [p. 295]. Between Parnassus proper and Mt. Cirphis was the valley of the Plistus, through which the sacred road ran from Delphi to Daulis and Stiris; and at the point where the road branched off to these two places (called σχιστή) Oedipus slew his father Laius [p. 619, b].—2. A town in the NW. of Cappadocia, on the road between Ancyra and Archelais. Its position has been fixed with some probability close to the Halys, at some fords a little above the modern Tchikin Aghyl. The road at this point branched, S. to Archelais, and along the river to Nyssa and so to Megara. (Pol. xxv. 4, 8, 9.)

Parnēs (Πάρνης, gen. Πάρνηθος: Ozia or Nozia), a mountain in the NE. of Attica, in some parts nearly as high as 5000 feet, was a continuation of Mount Cithaeron, from which it extended eastwards as far as the coast at Rhamnus. It was well wooded, abounded in game, and on its lower slopes produced excellent wine. It formed part of the boundary between Boeotia and Attica; and the pass through it between these two countries was easy of access, and was therefore strongly fortified by the Athenians. On the summit of the mountain there was a statue of Zeus Parnethius, and there were likewise altars of Zeus Semaleos and Zeus Ombrius or Apemius. (Strab. p. 404; Paus. i. 32, 1.)

Parnōn (Πάρνων: Malevo), a mountain 6385 feet high, forming the boundary between Laconia and Tegeatis in Arcadia [p. 468, a].

Paropamisadae (Παροπαμισάδαι) or Parapanisadae, the collective name of several peoples dwelling in the S. slopes of Mount Paropamisus [see next article], and the country they inhabited (Ptolemy mentions among the tribes of this district the Bolitae, Ambautae, Parsii, and Pargyetae). It was divided on the N. from Bactria by the Paropamisus; on the W. from Aria, and on the S., from Drangiana and Arachosia, by indefinite boundaries; and on the E. from India by the river Indus: thus corresponding to the E. part of Afghanistan and the strip of the Punjab W. of the Indus. Under the Persian empire it was the north-easternmost district of Ariana. It was conquered by Alexander, when he passed through it on his march to India; but the people soon regained their independence, though parts of the country were nominally included in the limits of the Graeco-Syrian and Bactrian kingdoms. It is a rugged mountain region, intersected by branches of the Paropamisus. In the N. the climate is so severe that, according to the ancient writers, confirmed by modern travellers, the snow almost buries the houses; but in the S. the valleys of the lower mountain slopes yield all the products of the warmer regions of Asia. In its N. was the considerable river Cophes or COPHEN (Cabul), flowing into the Indus, and having a tributary, Choüs, Choës, or CHOASPES (No. 2). The chief cities were Ortospana and Alexandria, the latter founded by Alexander the Great. (Strab. pp. 691, 725; Ptol. vi. 18; Diod. xvii. 82; Arrian, An. v. 3; Curt. vii. 3, 15.)

Paropamisus (Παροπάμιος, and several other forms, of which the truest is probably Πα, απάρωρος: Hindoo-Koosh), is the name of a part of the great mountain-chain which runs from W. to E. through the centre of the S. portion of the highlands of Central Asia, and divides the part of the continent which slopes down to the Indian Ocean from the great central tableland of Tartary and Thibet. It is a prolongation of the chain of Anti-Taurus. The name was applied to that part of the chain between the Sariphi M. (M. of Kohistan) on the W. and M. Imaus (Himalaya) on the E., or from about the sources of the river Margus on the W. to the point where the Indus breaks through the chain on the E. They were, rightly, believed by the ancients to be among the highest mountains in the world, and, wrongly, to contain the sources of the Oxus and the Indus: the last statement being an error which naturally arose from confounding the cleft by which the Indus breaks through the chain with its unknown source. (Strab. p. 689; Ptol. vi. 11, 17; Plin. vi. 60.) When Alexander the Great crossed these mountains, his followers, regarding the achievement as equivalent to what a Greek considered as the highest geographical adventure—namely, the passage of the Caucasus—conferred this glory on their chief by simply applying the name of Caucasus to the mountain chain which he had thus passed (Arrian, An. v. 5); and then, for the sake of distinction, this chain was called Caucasus Indicus, and this name has come down to our times in the native form of Hindoo-Koosh, and in others also. The name Paropamisus is also applied sometimes to the great south branch (Soliman M.) which skirts the valley of the Indus on the W., and is more specifically called PARYETI or PARSYETAE.

Parōpus (Paropinus), a small town in the interior of Sicily, between Panormus and Thermae (Pol. i. 24; Plin. iii. 92).

Parōrēa (Παρώρεια). 1. A town in Thrace on the frontiers of Macedonia, whose inhabitants were the same people as the Paroraei of Pliny (Liv. xxxix. 27, xlii. 51).—2. Or Parōrīa (Παρωρία), a town in the S. of Arcadia, N. of Megalopolis, founded by Paroreus, son of Tricolonus, and grandson of Lycaon, the inhabitants of which took part in the building of Megalopolis (Paus. viii. 27, 3, viii. 35, 6).

Parōrēātai (Παρωρεάται), the most ancient inhabitants of the mountains in Triphylia in Elis, expelled by the Minyae (Strab. p. 346).

Parorios. [PHRYGIA.]

Pāros (Πάρος: Πάριος: Paro), an island in the Aegæan sea, one of the larger of the Cyclades, was situated S. of Delos and W. of Naxos, being separated from the latter by a channel five or six miles wide. It is about thirty-six miles in circumference. It is said to have been originally colonised by Cretans, but was afterwards inhabited by Ionians, and became so prosperous, even at an early period, as to send out colonies to Thasos and to Parium on the Propontis (Thuc. iv. 104; Strab. pp. 315, 487). In the first invasion of Greece by the generals of Darius, Paros submitted to the Persians; and after the battle of Marathon, Miltiades attempted to reduce the island, but failed in his attempt, and received a wound, of which he died. [MILTIADES.] After the defeat of Xerxes, Paros came under the supremacy of Athens and shared the fate of the other Cyclades. Its name rarely occurs in subsequent history. The most celebrated production of Paros was its marble, which was extensively used by the ancient sculptors. It was chiefly obtained from a mountain called Marpessa (Athen. p. 205;

Plin. xxxvi. 62; Diod. ii. 52; Verg. Aen. vi. 471; Hor. Od. i. 19, 6). The Parian figs were also highly prized. The chief town of Paros was situated on the W. coast, and bore the same name as the island. The ruins of it are still to seen at the modern Paroikia. Paros was the birthplace of the poet Archilochus.—In Paros was discovered the celebrated inscription called the Parian Chronicle, which is now preserved at Oxford. The inscription is cut on a block of marble, and in its perfect state contained a chronological account of the principal events in Greek history from Cecrops, B.C. 1582, to the archonship of Diognetus, 264 (C. I. G. ii. p. 293).

Parrhāsia (Παρρασία: Παρράσιοι), a district in the S. of Arcadia, in which the towns Lycosura, Trapezus, and Phigalia were situated. The Parrhasii are said to have been one of the most ancient of the Arcadian tribes. At the time of the Peloponnesian war they were under the supremacy of Mantinea, but were rendered independent of that city by the Lacedaemonians. (Thuc. v. 33; Xen. Hell. vii. 1, 28; Strab. p. 388; Paus. vi. 8, 3, viii. 27, 4.) Homer (Il. ii. 608) mentions a town Parrhasia, said to have been founded by Parrhasus, son of Lycaon, or by Pelasgus, son of Arestor.—The adjective Parrhasius is frequently used by the poets as equivalent to Arcadian.

Parrhāsius (Παρράσιος), one of the most celebrated Greek painters, was a native of Ephesus, the son and pupil of Evenor. He practised his art chiefly at Athens, and by some writers he is called an Athenian, probably because the Athenians had bestowed upon him the right of citizenship. He lived about B.C. 400. Parrhasius did for painting, at least in pictures of gods and heroes, what had been done for sculpture by Phidias in divine subjects, and by Polyclitus in the human figure: he established a canon of proportion, which was followed by all the artists that came after him (Plin. xxxv. 67; Cic. Brut. 18, 70; Diod. xxvi. 1; Dict. of Ant. art. Pictura). Several interesting observations on the principles of art which he followed are made in a dialogue with Socrates, as reported by Xenophon (Mem. iii. 10). The character of Parrhasius was marked in the highest degree by that self-consciousness which often accompanies great artistic genius. In epigrams inscribed on his works he not only made a boast of his luxurious habits, but he also claimed the honour of having assigned with his own hand the precise limits of the art, and fixed a boundary which never was to be transgressed. Respecting the story of his contest with Zeuxis, see ZEUXIS. Among the works of Parrhasius was a picture of the Athenian Demos so drawn as to show the prevailing characteristics of the people (Plin. xxxv. 68).

Parsici Montes (τὰ Παρσικὰ ὄρη, Bushkurd M. in the W. of Beloochistan), a chain of mountains running NE. from the Paragon Sinus (G. of Oman) and forming the boundary between Carmania and Gedrosia. At the foot of these mountains, in the W. of Gedrosia, were a people called Parsidae, with a capital Parsis (perhaps Serbah). (Ptol. vi. 21, 5.)

Parsii. [PAROPAMISADAE.]

Parsyetae or Pargyetae (Παρσυῆται), a people on the borders of Arachosia and the Paropamisadae, with a mountain of the same name, which is probably identical with the PARYETI M. and with the Soliman mountains (Ptol. vi. 18, 3).

Parthālis, or Pertalis, the chief city of the Calingae, a tribe of the Gangaridae, in India intra Gangem, at the head of the Sinus Ganges (Sea of Bengal). (Plin. vi. 65.)

Parthanum (Partenkirchen), a town of Raetia between Augusta Vindelicorum and Veldidena.

Parthēni. [PARTHINI.]

Parthēnias (Παρθενίας), also called Parthēnia, a small river in Elis, flowing into the Alpheus E. of Olympia (Paus. vi. 21, 7).

Parthēnium (Παρθένιον). 1. A town in Mysia, S. of Pergamum (Xen. An. vii. 8, 15; Plin. v. 126).—2. (Felenk-burun), a promontory in the Chersonesus Taurica, on which stood a temple of the Tauric Artemis, from whom it derived its name. In this temple human sacrifices were offered to the goddess. (Strab. p. 308.)

Parthēnium Mare (τὸ Παρθενικὸν πέλαγος), the SE. part of the Mediterranean, between Egypt and Cyprus (Amm. Marc. xiv. 8, 10).

Parthēnius (Παρθένιος), of Nicaea, a celebrated grammarian, is said by Suidas to have been taken prisoner by Cinna, in the Mithridatic war, to have been manumitted on account of his learning, and to have lived to the reign of Tiberius. If this statement is true, Parthenius must have attained a great age, since there were 77 years from the death of Mithridates to the accession of Tiberius. Parthenius taught Virgil Greek; and he seems to have been very popular among the distinguished Romans of his nus wrote many poems, but the only one of his works which has come down to us is in prose, and entitled Περὶ ἐρωτικῶν παθημάτων. It contains thirty-six brief love-stories which ended in an unfortunate manner. It is dedicated to Cornelius Gallus, and was compiled for his use.—Editions by Westermann, in the Mythographi, Brunswick, 1843; Hercher, 1858.

Parthenius, chamberlain of Domitian, assassinated A.D. 97 (Dio Cass. lxxvii. 15; Suet. Dom. 16), was one of the lesser poets of the time (Mart. v. 6, 2, ix. 50, 3).

Parthēnius (Παρθένιος). 1. A mountain on the frontiers of Argolis and Arcadia, through which was an important pass leading from Argolis to Tegea. This pass is still called Parthēni, but the mountain itself, which rises to the height of 3993 feet, bears the name of Roino. It was on this mountain that Telephus, the son of Heracles and Auge, was said to have been suckled by a hind; and it was here also that the god Pan is said to have appeared to Phidippides, the Athenian courier, shortly before the battle of Marathon. (Hdt. vi. 105; Paus. i. 28, 4, viii. 6, 4; Strab. p. 376).—2. (also Παρθένης: Chati-Su or Bartan-Su), the chief river of Paphlagonia, rises in Mt. Olgassys, and flows NW. into the Euxine ninety stadia W. of Amastris, forming in the lower part of its course the boundary between Bithynia and Paphlagonia (Il. ii. 854; Hes. Th. 344; Hdt. ii. 104; Strab. p. 543).

Parthēnōn (ὁ Παρθενών, i.e. the virgin's chamber), one of the finest and, in its influence upon art, one of the most important edifices ever built, the temple of Athene Parthenos on the Acropolis of Athens [see p. 12]. It was erected, under the administration of Pericles, on the site of the older temple of Athene, burnt during the Persian invasion, and was completed by the dedication of the statue of the goddess, B.C. 438. Its architects were Ictinus and Callicrates, but all the works were under the super-time. The emperor Tiberius imitated his poems, and placed his works and statues in the public libraries along with the most celebrated ancient writers. Parthenius exercised considerable influence on the poets of the period: on Virgil—who is said to have translated or adapted the Moretum from a poem of Parthenius (Cod. Ambros.)—and still more upon Gallus. Partheintendence of Phidias. [ICTINUS; PHIDIAS.] It was built entirely of Pentelic marble: its dimensions were, 228 English feet long, 101 broad, and 65 high: it was 50 feet longer than the edifice which preceded it. Its architecture was of the Doric order, and of the purest kind. It consisted of an oblong central building (the cella or cella), surrounded on all sides by a peristyle of pillars, 46 in number, 8 at each end and 17 at each side (reckoning the corner pillars twice), elevated on a platform, which was ascended by 3 steps all round the building. Within the porticoes at each end was another row of 6 pillars, standing on a level with the floor of the cella, and 2 steps higher than that of the peristyle. The cella was divided into two chambers of unequal size. The eastern and larger chamber approached from the east by a pronaos or portico was 100 Greek feet in length, and was therefore called the Hecatompedos (a name sometimes applied, like Parthenon, to the whole temple). It was further divided off by two parallel rows of nine pillars: towards its western end was the statue of Athene by Phidias in ivory and gold (chryselephantine). The other chamber to the west, having also a pronaos as its western approach, was the Parthenon proper. In this chamber were kept the vessels used in processions, the clothes, jewels, and furniture for the temple use. It answered to the Opisthodomos or hinder-chamber of a temple, but if the theory that the old temple was rebuilt is correct [see, however, p. 11], the opisthodomos which acted as the treasury was in the old temple, and, as far as its use as treasury was concerned, supplied the place of a true opisthodomos to the new temple. Both these chambers had inner rows of pillars (in two stories, one over the other), sixteen in the former and four in the latter, supporting the partial roof, for the cella of a temple had its centre open to the sky. [See Dict. of Ant. art. Templum.] Technically, the temple is called peripteral of beams if the roof had been of wood), were filled with sculptures in high relief, 92 in all, 14 on each front, and 32 on each side, representing subjects from the Attic mythology, among which the battle of the Athenians with the Centaurs forms the subject of the 15 metopes from the S. side, which are now in the British Museum. One of these metopes is figured on p. 218. (3) Along the top of the external wall of the cella, under the ceiling of the peristyle, ran a frieze sculptured with a representation of the Panathenaic procession, in low relief. A large number of the slabs of this frieze were brought to England by Lord Elgin, with the 15 metopes just mentioned, and a considerable number of other fragments, including some of the most important, though mutilated, statues from the pediments; and the whole collection was purchased by the nation in 1816, and deposited in the British Museum, where may also be seen excellent models of the ruins of the Parthenon and of the temple as conjecturally restored. The worst of the injuries which it has suffered from war and pillage was inflicted in the siege of Athens by the Venetians in 1687, when a bomb exploded in the very centre of the Parthenon, and threw down much of both the side walls. Its ruins are still, however, in sufficient preservation to show the beauty of its perfect construction.

Parthēnōpaeus (Παρθενόπαιος), one of the seven heroes who accompanied Adrastus in his expedition against Thebes. He is sometimes called a son of Ares or Milanion and Atalanta (Apollod. iii. 9, 2; Eur. Suppl. 888), sometimes of octastyle hypaethral. It was adorned, within and without, with colours and gilding, and with sculptures which are regarded as the masterpieces of ancient art. Besides the great statue of Athene, the other sculptures were executed under the direction of Phidias by different artists, as may still be seen by differences in their style; but the most important of them were doubtless from the hand of Phidias himself. (1) The tympana of the pediments (i.e. the inner flat portion of the triangular gable-ends of the roof above the two end porticoes) were filled with groups of detached colossal statues, those of the E. or principal front representing the birth of Athene, and those of the W. front the contest between Athene and Poseidon for the land of Attica. (2) In the frieze of the entablature (i.e. the upper of the two portions into which the surface between the columns and the roof is divided), the metopes between the triglyphs (i.e. the square spaces between the projections answering to the ends

Meleager and Atalanta, and sometimes of Talaus and Lysimache (Hyg. Fab. 70, 79; Paus. ii. 20, 4). His son, by the nymph Clymene, who marched against Thebes as one of the Epigoni, is called Promachus, Stratolaus, Thesimenes, or Tlesimenes. Parthenopaeus was killed at Thebes by Asphodius, Amphidius or Periclymenus. (Aesch. Sept. c. Theb. 526; Apollod. iii. 6, 8; Paus. ix. 18.)

Parthia, Parthya, Parthiēnē (Παρθία, Παρθυαία, Παρθυνή; Πάρθοι, Παρθυαίοι, Parthi, Parthiēni: Khorassan), a country of Asia, to the SE. of the Caspian. Its extent was different at different times; but, as the term was generally understood by the ancient geographers, it denoted the partly mountainous and partly desert country on the S. of the mountains which hem in the Caspian on the SE. (M. Labuta), and which divided Parthia on the N. from Hyrcania. On the NE. and E., a branch of the same chain, called Masdoranus, divided it from Aria; on the S. the deserts of Parthia joined those of Carmania, and further westward the M. Parachothras divided Parthia from Persis and Susiana: on the W. and NW. it was divided from Media by boundaries which cannot be exactly marked out (Strab. pp. 514, 515; Ptol. vi. 5, 1; Pol. x. 28; Plin. vi. 41). Of this district, only the N. part, in and below the mountains of Hyrcania, seems to have formed the proper country of the Parthi, who were a people of Scythian origin. The ancient writers tell us that the name means exiles (Justin, xli. 1). They were a very warlike people, and were especially celebrated as mounted archers. Their tactics, of which the Romans had fatal experience in their first wars with them, became so celebrated as to pass into a proverb. Their mail-clad horsemen spread like a cloud round the hostile army, and poured in a shower of darts; and then evaded any closer conflict by a rapid flight, during which they still shot their arrows backwards upon the enemy. (Dio Cass. xl. 15, 22; Plut. Crass. 24; Hor. Od. i. 19, 11, ii. 13, 17; Verg. Georg. iii. 31; Ov. A. A. i. 209.) Under the Persian empire, the Parthians, with the Chorasmii, Sogdii, and Aarii, formed the sixteenth satrapy: under Alexander and the Greek kings of Syria, Parthia and Hyrcania together formed a satrapy. About B. C. 250 they revolted from the Seleucidae, under a chieftain named Arsaces, who founded an independent monarchy, the history of which is given under ARSACES. During the period of the downfall of the Syrian kingdom, the Parthians overran the provinces E. of the Euphrates, and about B. C. 180 they overthrew the kingdom of Bactria, so that their empire extended over Asia from the Euphrates to the Indus, and from the Indian Ocean to the Paropamisus, or even to the Oxus; but on this N. frontier they had to maintain a continual conflict with the nomad tribes of Central Asia. On the W. their progress was checked by Mithridates and Tigranes, till those kings fell successively before the Romans, who were thus brought into collision with the Parthians. After the memorable destruction of Crassus and his army, B. C. 53 [CRASSUS], the Parthians threatened Syria and Asia Minor; but their progress was stopped by two signal defeats which they suffered from Antony's legate Ventidius, in 39 and 38. The preparations for renewing the war with Rome were rendered fruitless by the contest for the Parthian throne between Phraates IV. and Tiridates, which led to an appeal to Augustus, and to the restoration of the standards of Crassus, B. C. 20: an event to which the Roman poets often allude in terms of flattery to Augustus, almost as if he had conquered the Parthian empire. It is to be observed that the poets of the Augustan age use the names Parthi, Persae, and Medi indifferently. The Parthian empire had now begun to decline, owing to civil contests and the defection of the governors of provinces, and had ceased to be formidable to the Romans. There were, however, continual disputes between the two empires for the protectorate of the kingdom of Armenia. In consequence of one of these disputes Trajan invaded the Parthian empire, and obtained possession for a short time of Mesopotamia; but his conquests were surrendered under Hadrian, and the Euphrates again became the boundary of the two empires. There were other wars at later periods, which resulted in favour of the Romans, who took Seleucia and Ctesiphon, and made the district of Osroëne a Roman province. The exhaustion which was the effect of these wars at length gave the Persians the opportunity of throwing off the Parthian yoke. Led by Artaxerxes (Ardshir) they put an end to the Parthian kingdom of the Arsacidae, after it had lasted 476 years, and established the Persian dynasty of the Sassanidae, A.D. 226. [ARSACES; SASSANIDAE.]

Parthini or Parthēni (Παρθίνοι, Παρθηνόι), an Illyrian people near Dyrrhachium (Strab. p. 326; Pol. ii. 11; Liv. xxix. 12).

Paryadres (Παρυάδρης: *Kara-bel Dag*h, or Kut-Tagh), a mountain chain of W. Asia, running SW. and NE. from the E. of Asia Minor into the centre of Armenia, and forming the chief connecting link between the Taurus and the mountains of Armenia. It was considered as the boundary between Cappadocia (i.e. Pontus Cappadocius) and Armenia (i.e. Armenia Minor). The name seems sometimes to extend so far NE. as to include M. Abus (Ararat) in Armenia. (Strab. pp. 497, 548; Ptol. v. 13, 5.)

Paryēti Montes (τὰ Παρυητῶν ὄρη, from the Indian word paruta, i.e. a mountain: Soliman M.), the great mountain chain which runs N. and S. on the W. side of the valley of the Indus, and forms the connecting link between the mountains which skirt the N. coast of the Persian Gulf and the Indian Ocean, and the parallel chain, further N., called the Paropamisus or Indian Caucasus; or, between the E. extensions of the Taurus and Anti-Taurus systems, in the widest sense. This chain formed the boundary between Arachosia and the Paropamisadae: it now divides Beloochistan and Afghanistan on the W. from Scinde and the Punjab on the E., and it meets the Hindoo-Koosh in the NE. corner of Afghanistan, between Cabul and Peshawur.

Parysatis (Παρύσατις or Παρυσαδρίς), daughter of Artaxerxes I. Longimanus, king of Persia, was given by her father in marriage to her own brother Darius, surnamed Ochus, who in B.C. 424 succeeded Xerxes II. on the throne of Persia. The feeble character of Darius threw the chief power into the hands of Parysatis, whose administration was little else than a series of murders. Four of her sons grew up to manhood. The eldest of these, Artaxerxes Mnemon, was born before Darius had obtained the sovereign power, and on this pretext Parysatis sought to set aside his claims to the throne in favour of her second son Cyrus. Failing in this attempt, she nevertheless interposed, after the death of Darius, 405, to prevent Artaxerxes from putting Cyrus to death, and prevailed with the king to allow him to return to his satrapy in Asia Minor. (Ctes. Pers. 57; Plut. Art. 1; Xen. An. i. 1.) After the death of Cyrus at the battle of Cunaxa (401), she did not hesitate to display her grief for the death of her favourite son by bestowing funeral honours on his mutilated remains; and she subsequently succeeded in getting into her power all the authors of the death of Cyrus, whom she put to death by the most cruel tortures. She afterwards poisoned Statira, the wife of Artaxerxes. (Ctes. 59-62; Plut. Art. 4-19.) The feeble and indolent king was content to banish her to Babylon; and it was not long before he recalled her to his court, where she soon recovered all her former influence. Of this she availed herself to turn his suspicions against Tissaphernes, whom she had long hated as having been the first to discover the designs of Cyrus to his brother, and who was now put to death by Artaxerxes at her instigation, 396. She appears to have died soon afterwards. (Plut. Art. 20; Diod. xiv. 80.)

Pasargāda or -ae (Πασαργάδα, Πασαργάδαι: Murghab), the older of the two capitals of Persis (the other and later being Persepolis), is said to have been founded by Cyrus the Great, on the spot where he gained his great victory over Astyages (Strab. p. 730). The tomb of Cyrus stood here in the midst of a beautiful park. Strabo describes it as lying in the hollow part of Persis, on the river Cyrus, SE. of Persepolis, and near the borders of Carmania (Strab. l. c.; Arrian, vi. 29). It has been identified with the great sepulchral monument at Murghab, NE. of Persepolis. [See p. 265, b.]

Pasargādae (Πασαργάδαι), the most noble of the three chief tribes of the ancient Persians, the other two being the Maraphii and Maspii. The royal house of the Achaemenidae were of the race of the Pasargadae (Hdt. i. 125; Ptol. vi. 8, 12). They had their residence chiefly in and about the city of PASARGADA.

Pasias, a Greek painter, belonging to the Sicyonian school (Plin. xxxv. 145).

Pasion (Πάσιων), a wealthy banker at Athens, was originally a slave of Antisthenes and Archestratus, who were also bankers. In their service he displayed great fidelity as well as aptitude for business, and was manumitted as a reward (Dem. pro Phorm. p. 957). He afterwards set up a banking concern on his own account, by which, together with a shield manufactory, he greatly enriched himself, while he continued all along to preserve his old character for integrity, and his credit stood high throughout Greece. He did not, however, escape an accusation of fraudulently keeping back some money which had been entrusted to him by a foreigner from the Euxine. The plaintiff's case is stated in an oration of Isocrates (τραπεζιτικός), still extant. Pasion did good service to Athens with his money on several occasions. He was rewarded with the freedom of the city, and was enrolled in the demus of Acharnae. He died at Athens in B.C. 370, after a lingering illness, accompanied with failure of sight. Towards the end of his life his affairs were administered to a great extent by his freedman Phormion, to whom he let his banking shop and shield manufactory, and settled in his will that he should marry his widow Archippe, with a handsome dowry, and undertake the guardianship of his younger son Pasicles. His elder son, Apollodorus, grievously diminished his patrimony by extravagance and lawsuits. (Dem. pro Phorm. p. 958, c. Aphob. i. p. 816.)

Pasiphāē (Πασιφάη), daughter of Helios (the Sun) and Perseis, and a sister of Circe and Aeetes, was the wife of Minos, by whom she became the mother of Androgeos, Catreus, Deucalion, Glaucus, Acalles, Xenodice, Ariadne, and Phaedra (Ap. Rh. iii. 999; Paus. v. 25, 9; Ov. Met. xv. 501). Hence Phaedra is called Pasiphaëia (Ov. Met. xv. 500). Respecting the passion of Pasiphaë for the bull, and the birth of the Minotaurus, see MINOS.

Pasiteles (Πασιτέλης). 1. A statuary, who flourished about B.C. 468, and was the teacher of Colotes, the contemporary of Phidias (Paus. i. 20, 2).—2. A sculptor of the highest distinction, was a native of Magna Graecia, and obtained the Roman franchise with his countrymen in B.C. 90. He worked at Rome from about 60 to 30. Among his most famous pupils were STEPHANUS and Menelaus (Plin. xxxv. 156). Pasiteles also wrote a treatise in five books upon celebrated works of sculpture and chasing.

Pasithēa (Πασιθέα). 1. One of the CHARITES, or Graces, also called Aglaia (Il. xiv. 268).—2. One of the NEREIDS.

Pasitigris (Πασιτίγρης or Πασιτίγρις: prob. Karoon), a considerable river of Asia, rising in the mountains E. of Mesopotamia, on the confines of Media and Persis, and flowing first W. by N. to M. Zagros or Parachoathras; then, breaking through this chain, it turns to the S., and flows through Susiana into the head of the Persian Gulf, after receiving the Eulaeus on its W. side (Strab. p. 729).

Passārōn (Πασάρων: near Dhramisius, SW. of Joannina), a town of Epirus in Molossia, and the ancient capital of the Molossian kings (Plut. Pyrrh. 5). It was destroyed by the Romans, together with seventy other towns of Epirus, after the conquest of Macedonia, B.C. 168 (Liv. xlv. 26–34).

Passiēnus Crispus. [CRISPUS.]

Passiēnus Paulus. [PAULUS.]

Pataeci (Πάταικοι), Phoenician tutelary divinities whose dwarfish figures were attached to Phoenician ships, either at the prow or stern (Hdt. iii. 37; Hesych. and Suid. s.v.).

Patāla, Patalēne. [PATTALA, PATTALENE.]

Patāra (τὰ Πάταρα: Παταρεύς: Patara, Ru.), a chief city of Lycia, was a flourishing seaport, on a promontory of the same name (ἡ Παράρων ἄκρα), 60 stadia E. of the mouth of the Xanthus (Strab. p. 666). It was early colonised by Dorians from Crete, and became a chief seat of the worship of Apollo, who had here a celebrated oracle, which uttered responses in the winter only, and from whose son Patarus the name of the city was mythically derived (Hdt. i. 182; Serv. ad Aen. iv. 143; Hor. Od. iii. 4, 64; Ov. Met. i. 515). It was restored and enlarged by Ptolemy Philadelphus, who called it Arsinoë, but it remained better known by its old name.

Pātāvium (Patavinus: Padova or Padua), an ancient town of the Veneti in the N. of Italy on the Medoacus Minor, and on the road from Mutina to Altinum, was said to have been founded by the Trojan Antenor (Strab. p. 212; Tac. Ann. xvi. 21; cf. Liv. i. 1; Verg. Aen. i. 247; Mel. ii. 4, 2). It became a flourishing and important town in early times, and was powerful enough in B.C. 302 to drive back the Spartan prince Cleonymus with great loss, when he attempted to plunder the surrounding country (Liv. x. 2). Under the Romans Patavium was the most important city in the N. of Italy, and by its commerce and manufactures (of which its woollen stuffs were the most celebrated) it attained great opulence. According to Strabo it possessed 500 citizens whose fortune entitled them to the equestrian rank. It was plundered by Attila; and, in consequence of a revolt of its citizens, it was subsequently destroyed by Agilolf, king of the Lombards, and razed to the ground; hence the modern town contains few remains of antiquity.—Patavium was the birth-place of the historian Livy.—In its neighbourhood were the Aquae Patavinae, also called Aponi Fons, respecting which see p. 92, b.

Paterculus, C. Velleius, a Roman historian, was probably born about B.C. 19, and was descended from a distinguished Campanian family. He adopted the profession of arms, and, soon after he had entered the army, he accompanied C. Caesar in his expedition to the East, and was present with the latter at his interview with the Parthian king, in A.D. 2. Two years afterwards, A.D. 4, he served under Tiberius in Germany, succeeding his father in the rank of Praefectus Equitum, having previously filled in succession the offices of tribune of the soldiers and tribune of the camp. For the next eight years Paterculus served under Tiberius, either as praefectus or legatus, in the various campaigns of the latter in Germany, Pannonia, and Dalmatia, and, by his activity and ability, gained the favour of the future emperor. His name, with the praenomen C., occurs as 'legatus Augusti legionis III. Augustae' on an African milestone (C. I. L. viii. 10311). He was quaestor A.D. 7, but he continued to serve as legatus under Tiberius. He accompanied his commander on his return to Rome in 12, and took a prominent part in the triumphal procession of Tiberius, along with his brother, Magius Celer. The two brothers were praetors in 15. (Vell. Pat. ii. 101, 104, 111, 113, 114, 121, 124.) Paterculus was alive in 30, as he drew up his history in that year for the use of M. Vinicius, who was then consul; and it is conjectured, with much probability, that he perished in the following year (31), along with the other friends of Sejanus. The favourable manner in which he had spoken in his history of this minister would be sufficient to involve him in his ruin. The work of Paterculus, which has come down to us, is a brief historical compendium in two books, and bears the title C. Velleii Paterculi Historiae Romanae ad M. Vinicius Cos. Libri II. The beginning of the work is wanting, and there is also a portion lost after the eighth chapter of the first book. The object of this compendium was to give a brief view of universal history, but more especially of the events connected with Rome, the history of which occupies the main portion of the book. It begins with the colonisation of Magna Graecia, and brings the history of Rome to the end of the Punic wars in the first book; but as he nears his own times he grows more diffuse. His authorities seem to be Cato's Origines, the Annals of Hortensius, Atticus, Nepos, Trogus, Sallust, and Livy, from whom, however, he often dissents. He does not attempt to give a consecutive account of all the events of history; he seizes only upon a few of the more prominent facts, which he describes at length. He is generally trustworthy in his account of isolated facts, but lacks judgment, and is an annalist rather than a historian. His work is valuable for confirmatory evidence, and particularly for its account of the Greek colonies in Italy. The worst feature is his wholesale and indiscriminate praise of Tiberius, which makes his court history of no authority. His style has not literary finish, and is often too ornate and pretentious, reflecting partly haste, partly some tendency to affectation. Only one manuscript of Paterculus has come down to us; and the text is in a very corrupt state.—Editions by Orelli, Lips. 1835; Kritze, 1840; Halm, 1876.

Paternus, Tarruntēnus, a jurist, is probably the same person who was praefectus praetorio under Commodus, and was put to death by the emperor on a charge of treason. He was the author of a work in four books, entitled De Re Militari or Militarium, from which there are two excerpts in the Digest. (Lamprid. Comm. 4; Veget. R. M. i. 8.)

Patmos (Πάτμος; Patmo), one of the islands called Sporades, in the Icarian Sea, at about equal distances S. of Samos, and W. of the Prom. Posidium on the coast of Caria, celebrated as the place to which the Apostle John was banished, and in which he wrote the Apocalypse. The natives still affect to show the cave where St. John saw the apocalyptic visions

(τὸ σπήλαιον τῆς ἀποκαλύψεως). On the E. side of the island was a city with a harbour. (Strab. p. 488; Plin. iv. 69.)

Patrae (Πάτραι, Patréēs Herod.: Πατρεύς; Patras), one of the twelve cities of Achaia, was situated W. of Rhium, near the opening of the Corinthian gulf. It is said to have been originally called Aroe (Ἀρόη), and to have been founded by the autochthon Eumelus; and after the expulsion of the Ionians to have been taken possession of by Patreus, from whom it derived its name. (Hdt. i. 145; Strab. pp. 337, 386; Paus. vii. 18, 2.) The town is rarely mentioned in early Greek history, and was chiefly of importance as the place from which the Peloponnesians directed their attacks against the opposite coast of Aetolia. It was the only Achaean city which took the side of Athens (Thuc. v. 52; Plut. Alc. 15). Patrae was one of the four towns which took the leading part in founding the second Achaean League. In consequence of assisting the Aetolians against the Gauls in B.C. 279, Patrae became so weakened that most of the inhabitants deserted the town and took up their abodes in the neighbouring villages (Pol. v. 2, 3, 28; Paus. vii. 18, 6). Under the Romans it continued to be an insignificant place till the time of Augustus, who rebuilt the town after the battle of Actium, again collected its inhabitants, and added to them those of Rhypae (Paus. vii. 18, 7; Plin. iv. 11). Augustus further gave Patrae dominion over the neighbouring towns, and even over Locris, and also bestowed upon it the privileges of a Roman colony: hence we find it called Colonia Augusta Aroe Patrensis (C. I. L. iii. 498). Strabo describes Patrae in his time as a flourishing and populous town with a good harbour; and it was a common landing-place for persons sailing from Italy to Greece. Pausanias (vii. 21, 14) mentions its trade in cotton stuffs, and also its worship of Aphrodite; both may perhaps be remains of an old Phoenician admixture in the population. He also says that the women were twice as numerous as the men. The modern Patras is still an important place, but contains few remains of antiquity.

Patrocles (Πατροκλῆς), a Macedonian general in the service of Seleucus I. and Antiochus I., kings of Syria. Patrocles held, both under Seleucus and Antiochus, an important government over some of the E. provinces of the Syrian empire. During the period of his holding this position, he collected accurate geographical information, which he afterwards published to the world; but though he is frequently cited by Strabo, who placed the utmost reliance on his accuracy, neither the title nor exact subject of his work is mentioned. It seems clear, however, that it included a general account of India, as well as of the countries on the banks of the Oxus and the Caspian Sea. Patrocles regarded the Caspian Sea as a gulf or inlet of the ocean, and maintained the possibility of sailing thither by sea from the Indian Ocean. (Diod. xix. 100; Plut. Demetr. 47; Strab. pp. 68, 74, 508, 689.)

Patrocli Insula (Πατρόκλου νῆσος; Gadaronesi or Gaidronisi), an island off the coast of Attica, near Senium (Paus. i. 1; Strab. p. 398).

Patroclus (Πατροκλος or Πατροκλῆς), the friend of Achilles, was son of Menoetius of Opus, and grandson of Actor and Aegina, whence he is called Actorides (Il. xi. 608; Ov. Her. i. 17, Met. xiii. 273). Aeacus, the grandfather of Achilles, was a brother of Menoetius, so that Achilles and Patroclus were kinsmen as well as friends (Il. xvi. 14). While still a boy Patroclus involuntarily slew Clysonymus, son of Amphidamas. In consequence of this accident he was taken by his father to Peleus at Phthia, where he was educated together with Achilles. (Il. xxiii. 85; Apollod. iii. 13, 8; Ov. Pont. i. 3, 73.) He is said to have taken part in the expedition against Troy on account of his attachment to Achilles. He fought bravely against the Trojans, until his friend withdrew from the scene of action, when Patroclus followed his example. But when the Greeks were hard pressed, he begged Achilles to allow him to put on his armour, and with his men to hasten to the assistance of the Greeks. Achilles granted the request, and Patroclus succeeded in driving back the Trojans and extinguishing the fire which was raging among the ships. He slew many enemies, and thrice made an assault upon the walls of Troy; but on a sudden he was struck by Apollo, and became senseless. In this state Euphorbus ran him through with his lance from behind, and Hector gave him the last and fatal blow (Il. xvi.). Hector also took possession of his armour. A long struggle now ensued between the Greeks and Trojans for the body of Patroclus; but the former obtained possession of it, and brought it to Achilles, who vowed to avenge the death of his friend. Thetis protected the body with ambrosia against decomposition, until Achilles could burn it with funeral sacrifices (Il. xix. 38). His ashes were collected in a golden urn which Dionysus had once given to Thetis, and were deposited under a mound, where the remains of Achilles were afterwards buried. Funeral games were celebrated in his honour (Il. xxiii.; Od. xxiv. 74; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 273). Achilles and Patroclus met again in the lower world; or, according to the tradition given by Pausanias, they continued after their death to live together in the island of Leuce (Od. xxiv. 15; Paus. iii. 19, 11).

Patron, an Epicurean philosopher, lived for some time in Rome, where he became acquainted with Cicero and others. From Rome he removed to Athens, and there succeeded Phaedrus as president of the Epicurean school, B.C. 52. (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 1, ad Att. v. 11, 19.)

Pattāla. [PATTALENE.]

Pattālēne or Patalēne (Πατταληνή, Παταληνή: Lower Scinde), the name of the great delta formed by the two principal arms by which the Indus falls into the sea (Strab. pp. 691, 701; Ptol. vii. 1, 55; Plin. vi. 80). At the apex of the delta stood the city Pattāla or Patāla (prob. Brahmanabad).

Patulcius. [JANUS.]

Patūmus (Πάτουμος: O. T. Pithom: the Egyptian Pa-Thmu), on the E. margin of the Egyptian Delta, between Bubastes and Succoth, but nearer the latter and not far from the commencement of Necho's canal from the Nile to the Red Sea. It was built by the Israelites during their captivity (Exod. i. 11), and either for that reason, or because it stood on the edge of the desert, is called by Herodotus (ii. 158) ἡ Ἀραβίη πόλις.

Paulina or Paulina. 1. Lollia. [LOLLIA.]—2. Pompeia, wife of Seneca the philosopher, and probably the daughter of Pompeius Paulinus, who commanded in Germany in the reign of Nero. When her husband was condemned to death, she opened her veins, wishing to die with him. After the blood had flowed some time, Nero commanded her veins to be bound up; she lived a few years longer, but with a paleness which testified how near she had been to death. (Tac. Ann. xv. 63, 64; cf. Dio Cass. lxi. 10, lxii. 25.)

Paulinus. 1. Pompeius, commanded in Germany along with L. Antistius Vetus in A.D. 58, and completed the dam to restrain the inundations of the Rhine which Drusus had commenced 63 years before. Seneca dedicated to him his treatise De Brevitate Vitae; and the Pompeia Paulina whom the philosopher married was probably the daughter of this Paulinus. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 53, xv. 18; Sen. Brev. Vit. 18.)—2. C. Suetonius, propraetor in Mauretania in the reign of the emperor Claudius, A.D. 42, when he conquered the Moors who had revolted, and advanced as far as Mt. Atlas (Dio Cass. lx. 9). He had the command of Britain in the reign of Nero, from 59 to 62. For the first two years all his undertakings were successful; but during his absence on an expedition against the island of Mona (Anglesey), the Britons rose in rebellion (61). They at first met with great success, but were conquered by Suetonius on his return from Mona. [Boudicca.] In 66 he was consul; and in 68 he was one of Otho's generals in the war against Vitellius. It was against his advice that Otho fought the battle at Bedriacum. He was pardoned by Vitellius after Otho's death, by a plea which did not redound to his honour. (Tac. Hist. i. 87, 90, ii. 23–41, 44, 60.)

Paullus or Paulus, a Roman cognomen in many gentes, but best known as the name of a family of the Aemilia gens. The name was originally written with a double l, but subsequently with only one l.

Paulus (Παῦλος), Greek writers. 1. Aegina, a celebrated medical writer, of whose personal history nothing is known except that he was born in Aegina, and that he travelled a good deal, visiting, among other places, Alexandria. He probably lived in the latter half of the seventh century after Christ. He wrote several works in Greek, of which the principal one is still extant, with no exact title, but commonly called De Re Medica Libri Septem. This work is chiefly a compilation from former writers. Edited by Brian, Paris, 1855. There is an excellent English translation by Adams, London, 1884, seq.—2. Of Alexandria, wrote in A.D. 278, an Introduction to Astrology (Εἰσαγωγή εἰς τὴν ἀποτελεσματικὴν), which has come down to us: edited by Schatus or Schato, Wittenberg, 1586.—3. Of Samosata, bishop of Antioch, about A.D. 260. [Dict. of Christian Biogr.].—4. Silentiarius, so called because he was one of the silentiarii (ushers who kept order in the palace) under the emperor Justinian. He wrote various poems, of which the following are extant:—(1) A Description of the Church of St. Sophia (Ἐκφρασις τοῦ ναοῦ τῆς ἁγίας Σοφίας), consisting partly of iambs, partly of hexameters. This poem gives a description of the magnificent building which forms its subject, and was recited by its author at the second dedication of the church (A.D. 562), after the restoration of the dome, which had fallen in. Edited by Graefe, Lips. 1822, and by Bekker, Bonn, 1837, in the Bonn edition of the Byzantine historians. (2) A Description of the Pulpit (Ἐκφρασις τοῦ ἁμβωνος), and printed with it a supplement to the former poem. (3) Epigrams, eighty-three in all, given in the Anthologia.

Paulus, Aemilius. 1. M., consul B.C. 302, and magister equitum to the dictator Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus, 301 (Liv. x. 1).—2. M., consul 255 with Ser. Fulvius Paetinus Nobilior, about the middle of the first Punic war. See NOBILIOR, No. 1.—3. L., son of No. 2., consul 219, when he conquered Demetrius of Pharos, and compelled him to fly for refuge to Philip, king of Macedonia (Pol. iii. 16, iv. 37; Appian, Illyr. 8). He was consul a second time in 216 with C. Terentius Varro. This was the year of the memorable defeat at Cannae. [HANNIBAL.] The battle was fought against the advice of Paulus; and he was one of the many distinguished Romans who perished in the engagement, refusing to fly from the field when a tribune of his soldiers offered him his horse. Hence we find in Horace (Od. i. 12): ‘animaeque magnae prodigum Paulum superante Poeno’ (Liv. xxii. 35–49; Pol. iii. 107–116). Paulus was a staunch adherent of the aristocracy, and was raised to the consulship by the latter party to counterbalance the influence of the plebeian Terentius Varro.—4. L., afterwards surnamed MACEDONICUS, son of No. 3, was born about 230 or 229, since at the time of his second consulship, 168, he was upwards of sixty years of age. He was one of the best specimens of the Roman nobles. He would not condescend to flatter the people for the offices of the state, maintained with strictness severe discipline in the army, was deeply skilled in the law of the augurs, to whose college he belonged, and maintained throughout life a pure and unspotted character. He was elected curule aedile 192; was praetor 191, and obtained Further Spain as his province, where he carried on war with the Lusitani; and was consul 181, when he conquered the Ingauni, a Ligurian people. For the next thirteen years he lived quietly at Rome, devoting most of his time to the education of his children. He was consul a second time in 168, and brought the war against Perseus to a conclusion by the defeat of the Macedonian monarch near Pydna, on the 22nd of June. Perseus shortly afterwards surrendered himself to Paulus. [PERSEUS.] Paulus remained in Macedonia during the greater part of the following year as proconsul, and arranged the affairs of Macedonia, in conjunction with ten Roman commissioners, whom the senate had despatched for the purpose. Before leaving Greece, he marched into Epirus, where, in accordance with a cruel command of the senate, he gave to his soldiers seventy towns to be pillaged, because they had been in alliance with Perseus. The triumph of Paulus, which was celebrated at the end of November, 167, was the most splendid that Rome had yet seen. It lasted three days. Before the triumphal car of Aemilius walked the captive monarch of Macedonia and his children, and behind it were two sons of Aemilius, Q. Fabius Maximus and P. Scipio Africanus the younger, both of whom had been adopted into other families. But the glory of the conqueror was clouded by family misfortune. At this very time he lost his two younger sons: one, twelve years of age, died only five days before his triumph, and the other, fourteen years of age, only three days after his triumph. The loss was all the severer, since he had no son left to carry his name down to posterity. In 164 Paulus was censor with Q. Marcius Philippus, and died in 160, after a long and tedious illness. The fortune he left behind him was so small as scarcely to be sufficient to pay his wife's dowry. The Adelphi of Terence was brought out at the funeral games exhibited in his honour. Aemilius Paulus was married twice. By his first wife, Papiria, the daughter of C. Papirius Maso, consul 231, he had four children, two sons, one of whom was adopted by Fabius Maximus and the other by P. Scipio, and two daughters, one of whom was married to Q. Aelius Tubero, and the other to M. Cato, son of Cato the censor. He afterwards divorced Papiria; and by his second wife, whose name is not mentioned, he had two sons, whose death has been mentioned above, and a daughter, who was a child at the time that her father was elected to his second consulship. (Plut. Life of Aem. Paul.; Pol. xxix.–xxxii.; Liv. xlv. 17–xlv. 41.)

Paulus Diaconus (Paul Warnifrid), a Lombard by birth, deacon of the church of Aquileia. Some time after the conquest of the Lombards by Charles the Great, A.D. 774, he became a monk at Mte. Cassino. Besides ecclesiastical works, he wrote (1) a History of the Lombards which, though uncritical in its acceptance of strange legends, is of considerable value; (2) a Roman history mostly from Eutropius; (3) an abridgment of the glossary which Festus made as an epitome of Verrius Flaccus. Since a great part of Festus is lost, this work of Paulus is of great value, and is edited by K. O. Müller, 1880, together with the text of Festus. [See p. 342, a.]

Paulus, Jūlius. 1. One of the most distinguished of the Roman jurists, has been supposed, without any good reason, to be of Greek origin. He was in the auditorium of Papinian, and consequently was acting as a jurist in the reign of Septimius Severus. He was exiled by Elagabalus, but he was recalled by Alexander Severus when the latter became emperor, and was made a member of his consilium. Paulus also held the office of praefectus praetorio: he survived his contemporary Ulpian. Paulus was perhaps the most fertile of all the Roman law writers, and there is more excerpted from him in the Digest than from any other jurist, except Ulpian. Upwards of seventy separate works by Paulus are quoted in the Digest. Of these his greatest work was Ad Edictum, in eighty books (Dict. of Antiq. art. Pandectae).—2. A poet in the reign of Hadrian (Gell. v. 4, xvi. 10, xix. 7).

Paulus, Passiēnus, a contemporary and friend of the younger Pliny, was a distinguished Roman equestrian, and was celebrated for his elegiac and lyric poems. He belonged to the same municipium (Mevania in Umbria) as Propertius, whom he numbered among his ancestors. (Plin. Ep. vi. 15, vii. 6, ix. 22.)

Pausanias (Παυσανίας). 1. A Spartan of the Agid branch of the royal family, the son of Cleombrotus and nephew of Leonidas. Several writers incorrectly call him king, but he only succeeded his father Cleombrotus in the guardianship of his cousin Plistarchus, the son of Leonidas, for whom he exercised the functions of royalty from B.C. 479 to the period of his death. (Hdt. ix. 10; Thuc. i. 94, 182.) In 479 when the Athenians called upon the Lacedaemonians for aid against the Persians, the Spartans sent a body of 5000 Spartans, each attended by seven Helots, under the command of Pausanias. At the Isthmus Pausanias was joined by the other Peloponnesian allies, and at Eleusis by the Athenians, and forthwith took the command of the combined forces, the other Greek generals forming a sort of council of war. The allied forces amounted to nearly 110,000 men. Near Plataeae in Boeotia, Pausanias defeated the Persian army under the command of Mardonius. This decisive victory secured the independence of Greece. Pausanias received as his reward a tenth of the Persian spoils. (Hdt. ix. 10-85; Diod. xi. 29-33.) In 477 the confederate Greeks sent out a fleet under the command of Pausanias, to follow up their success by driving the Persians completely out of Europe and the islands. Cyprus was first attacked, and the greater part of it subdued. From Cyprus Pausanias sailed to Byzantium, and captured the city (Thuc. i. 94). The capture of this city afforded Pausanias an opportunity for the execution of the design which he had apparently formed even before leaving Greece. Already he had shown his arrogant spirit in putting his own name as the author of the victory at Plataeae on the tripod dedicated at Delphi (Thuc. i. 132). Dazzled by his success and reputation, his station as a Spartan citizen had become too restricted for his ambition. His position as regent was one which must terminate when the king became of age. He therefore aimed at becoming tyrant over the whole of Greece, with the assistance of the Persian king. (Hdt. v. 32; Thuc. i. 128.) Among the prisoners taken at Byzantium were some Persians connected with the royal family. These he sent to the king, with a letter, in which he offered to bring Sparta and the rest of Greece under his power, and proposed to marry his daughter. His offers were gladly accepted, and whatever amount of troops and money he required for accomplishing his designs was promised. Pausanias now set no bounds to his arrogant and domineering temper. The allies were so disgusted by his conduct that they all, except the Peloponnesians and Aeginetans, voluntarily offered to transfer to the Athenians that pre-eminence of rank which Sparta had hitherto enjoyed. In this way the Athenian confederacy first took its rise. Reports of the conduct and designs of Pausanias reached Sparta, and he was recalled and put upon his trial: but the evidence respecting his meditated treachery was not yet thought sufficiently strong. Shortly afterwards he returned to Byzantium, without the orders of the ephors, and renewed his treasonable intrigues. He was again recalled to Sparta, was again put on his trial, and again acquitted. But even after this second escape he still continued to carry on his intrigues with Persia. At length a man who was charged with a letter to Persia, having his suspicions awakened by noticing that none of those sent previously on similar errands had returned, counterfeited the seal of Pausanias and opened the letter, in which he found directions for his own death. He carried the letter to the ephors, who prepared to arrest Pausanias; but he took refuge in the temple of Athene Chalcoecus. The ephors stripped off the roof of the temple and built up the door: the aged mother of Pausanias is said to have been among the first who laid a stone for this purpose. When he was on the point of expiring, the ephors took him out lest his death should pollute the sanctuary. He died as soon as he got outside, B.C. 469. He left three sons behind him, Plistoanax (afterwards king), Cleomenes and Aristocles. (Thuc. i. 94-134; Diod. xi. 44; Nepos, Pausanias.)—2. Son of Plistoanax, and grandson of the preceding, was king of Sparta from B.C. 408 to 394. In 403 he was sent with an army into Attica, and favoured the cause of Thrasybulus and the Athenian exiles, in order to counteract the tyrannical plans of Lysander, and restore peace to Athens. (Xen. Hell. ii. 4, 38; Plut. Lys. 21; Arist. Ἀθ. πολ. 38.) He had with him Spartan commissioners, whose numbers are variously stated by Xenophon and Aristotle as ten or fifteen. In 395 Pausanias was sent with an army against the Thebans; but in consequence of the death of Lysander, who was slain under the walls of Haliartus, on the day before Pausanias reached the spot, the king agreed to withdraw his forces from Boeotia. On his return to Sparta he was impeached, and seeing that a fair trial was not to be hoped for, went into voluntary exile, and was condemned to death. He was living in Tegea in 385, when Mantinea was besieged by his son Agesipolis, who succeeded him on the throne. (Xen. Hell. iii. 5, 17-25, v. 2, 3-6.)—3. King of Macedonia, the son and successor of Aeropus. He was assassinated in the year of his accession by Amyntas II., 394. (Diod. xiv. 84.)—4. A pretender to the throne of Macedonia, made his appearance in 367, after Alexander II. had been assassinated by Ptolemaeus. Eurydice, the mother of Alexander, sent to request the aid of the Athenian general, Iphicrates, who expelled Pausanias from the kingdom (Nep. Iphicr. 3).—5. A Macedonian youth of distinguished family, from the province of Orestis. Having been shamefully treated by Attalus, he complained of the outrage to Philip; but as Philip took no notice of his complaints, he directed his vengeance against the king himself. He shortly afterwards murdered Philip at the festival held at Aegae, 336, but was slain on the spot by some officers of the king's guard. Suspicion rested on Olympias and Alexander of having been privy to the deed; but with regard to Alexander at any rate the suspicion is probably totally unfounded. There was a story that Pausanias, while meditating revenge, having asked the sophist Hermocrates which was the shortest way to fame, the latter replied, that it was by killing the man who had performed the greatest achievements. (Diod. xvi. 93; Justin, ix. 6; Plut. Alex. 9.)—6. The traveller and geographer, was perhaps a native of Lydia. He lived under Antoninus Pius and M. Aurelius, and wrote his celebrated work in the reign of the latter emperor. This work, entitled Ἑλλάδος Περιήγησις, a Periegesis (or Itinerary) of Greece, is in ten books, and contains a description of Attica and Megaris (i.), Corinthia, Sicyonia, Phliasia, and Argolis (ii.), Laconica (iii.), Messenia (iv.), Elis (v. vi.), Achaea (vii.), Arcadia (viii.), Boeotia (ix.), Phocis (x.). The work shows that Pausanias visited most of the places in these divisions of Greece, a fact which is clearly demonstrated by the minuteness and particularity of his description. The work is an Itinerary, and has no merits either of style or composition. Pausanias gives no general description of a country or even of a place, but he describes the things as he comes to them. He is above all things an antiquarian, and dwells with most pleasure on objects of antiquity and works of art, such as buildings, temples, statues, and pictures. He also mentions mountains, rivers, and fountains, and the mythological stories connected with them, which, indeed, are his chief inducements to speak of them. He records all the traditions he hears simply, with little sifting or criticism. Hence his work, of very great value for the study of Greek art, is no less indispensable for the history of Greek religion and folk-lore. With the exception of Herodotus, there is no writer of antiquity who has comprehended so many valuable facts in a small volume.—Editions are by Siebelis, Lips. 1822-1828, 5 vols. 8vo, and by Schubart and Walz, Lips. 1838-40, 3 vols. 8vo, revised 1881; translation of that part which refers to Athens, with an excellent commentary, by Harrison and Verrall, 1890.

Pausias (Παυσίας), one of the most distinguished Greek painters, was a contemporary of Aristides, Melanthius, and Apelles (about B.C. 360–380), and a disciple of Pamphilus. He had previously been instructed by his father Brietes, who lived at Sicyon, where also Pausias passed his life. The department of the art which Pausias most practised was painting in encaustic with the cestrum. His favourite subjects were small panel-pictures, chiefly of boys. One of his most celebrated pictures was the portrait of Glycera, a flower-girl of his native city, of whom he was enamoured when a young man. Most of his paintings were probably transported to Rome with the other treasures of Sicyonian art, in the aedileship of Scaurus, when the state of Sicyon was compelled to sell all the pictures which were public property, in order to pay its debts. (Plin. xxxv. 128–129; Paus. ii. 27, 3.)

Pausilypus Mons (Posilipo), the western part of the ridge behind Naples, which formed a barrier between Neapolis and Puteoli. To facilitate the communication with Puteoli and Baiae the ridge was pierced by a tunnel called Crypta Neapolitana (Sen. Ep. 57), now Grotta di Posilipo, 2244 feet long, twenty-one broad, and in some places seventy feet high. Its construction is assigned to M. Cocceius Nerva, the superintendent of aqueducts under Tiberius (Strab. p. 245; Nerva, p. 596, b). The name of the hill (Παυσίλυπον = 'grief-assuaging') was derived from a villa so called which Vedius Pollio possessed in the neighbourhood and which he bequeathed to Augustus. (Dio Cass. liv. 23; Plin. ix. 167.) Its ruins are probably those now seen on Capo di Posilipo. On the hills above the E. entrance of the tunnel there is a tomb which tradition declares to be the tomb of Virgil. [VERGILIUS.]

Pauson (Πάυσων), a Greek painter, who appears from the description of Aristotle (Poët. 2, § 2) to have lived somewhat earlier than the time of this philosopher. The statement of the scholiast that he is the Pauson mentioned by Aristophanes (Ach. 854, Plut. 602) does not seem very probable.

Pausilae (Pausulanus: Monte dell' Olmo), a town in the interior of Picenum between Urbs Salvia and Auximum, on the river Clautus (Plin. iii. 111).

Pax. [IRENE.]

Pax Julia or Pax Augusta (Beja), a Roman colony in Lusitania, and the seat of a Conventus iuridicus (Ptol. ii. 5, 5; Plin. iv. 117).

Paxi (Paxo and Antipaxo), the name of two small islands off the W. coast of Greece, between Corcyra and Leucas (Pol. ii. 10).

Pēdaëum or Pēdaëus (Πήδαϊον), a town of the Troad (Il. xiii. 172).

Pēdālūm (Πηδάλιον). 1. (C. Greco), a promontory of Caria, on the W. side of the Sinus Glaucus, called also Artemesium from a temple of Artemis upon it (Mel. i. 16; Plin. v. 103; Strab. p. 651).—2. (Capo della Greca), a promontory on the E. side of Cyprus.

Pēdāsa (Πηδάσα: Πηδαρεός), a very ancient city of Caria, was originally a chief abode of the Leleges. Alexander assigned it to Halicarnassus. At the time of the Roman empire it had entirely vanished, though its name was preserved in that of the district around its site—namely, Pēdāsis (Πηδάσις). (Hdt. v. 121, vi. 20; Plin. v. 107; Strab. p. 651.) Its site was probably a little ENE. of Theangela, some distance E. of Halicarnassus.

Pēdiaeus (Πηδιαῖος: Pidias), a river of Cyprus which flows into the sea near Salamis.

Pēdāsus (Πηδάσος), a town of Mysia on the Satniois, mentioned by Homer. It was destroyed by the time of Strabo, who says that it was a settlement of the Leleges on M. Ida. (Il. vi. 35, xx. 92, xxi. 87; Strab. pp. 584, 605.)

Pēdianus, Asconius. [ASCONIUS.]

Pēdius. 1. Q., the great-nephew of the dictator C. Julius Caesar, being the grandson of Julia, Caesar's eldest sister (Suet. Jul. 83). He served under Caesar in Gaul as his legatus, B.C. 57 (Caes. B. G. ii. 1). In 55 he was a candidate for the curule aedileship with Cn. Plancius and others, but he lost his election (Cic. pro Planc. 7, 22). In the Civil war he fought on Caesar's side. He was praetor in 48, and in that year he defeated and slew Milo in the neighbourhood of Thurii. In 45, he served against the Pompeian party in Spain. In Caesar's will Pēdius was named one of his heirs along with his two other great-nephews, C. Octavius and L. Pinarius, Octavius obtaining three-fourths of the property, and the remaining one-fourth being divided between Pinarius and Pēdius: the latter resigned his share of the inheritance to Octavius. After the fall of the consuls, Hirtius and Pansa, at the battle of Mutina in April, 43, Octavius marched upon Rome at the head of an army, and in the month of August he was elected consul along with Pēdius. The latter forthwith proposed a law, known by the name of the Lex Pedia, by which all the murderers of Julius Caesar were punished with aquae et ignis interdictio. Pēdius was left in charge of the city, while Octavius marched into the N. of Italy. He died towards the end of the year shortly after the news of the proscription had reached Rome. (Caes. B. C. iii. 22; App. B. C. iii. 94, iv. 6; Cic. ad Att. ix. 14.)—2. Sextus, a Roman jurist, frequently cited by Paulus and Ulpian, lived before the time of Hadrian.

Pēdnēlissus (Πεδνηλίσσος: Ru. near Syrt), a city in the interior of Pisidia, on the Eury-medon. It formed an independent state, but was almost constantly at war with Selge. (Strab. pp. 570, 667; Pol. v. 72.)

Pēdo Albinovānus. [ALBINOVANUS.]

Pēducaeus, Sex. 1. Proprietor in Sicily, B.C. 76 and 75, in the latter of which years Cicero served under him as quaestor (Cic. Verr. ii. 64, iii. 93).—2. Son of the preceding, and an intimate friend of Atticus and Cicero. In the Civil war Pēducaeus sided with Caesar, by whom he was appointed in 48 to the government of Sardinia. In 39, he was proprietor in Spain. (Cic. ad Att. vii. 14, ix. 10, xiii. 1, xvi. 11; App. B. C. ii. 48, v. 54.)

Pēdum (Pēdānus: Gallicano), an ancient town of Latium on the Via Labicana, which fell into decay soon after the Latin war (Liv. ii. 39, vii. 12, viii. 12–14; Dionys. 61).

Pēgae or Pagae (Πηγαί: Psatho), a town of Megaris on the Corinthian gulf (Strab. p. 334; Thuc. i. 103, 114).

Pēgāsīs (Πηγαῖς), i.e. sprung from Pegasus, was applied to the fountain Hippocrene, which was called forth by the hoof of Pegasus (Ov. Trist. iii. 7, 15). The Muses are also called Pegasides, because the fountain Hippocrene was sacred to them (Propert. iii. 1, 19).

Pēgāsus (Πηγάσος). 1. The winged horse, whose origin is thus related. When Perseus struck off the head of Medusa, with whom

Poseidon had had intercourse, there sprang from her Chrysaor and the horse Pegasus. According to Hesiod, Pegasus was so named because he was born near the sources (πηγαί) of Oceanus: it is more likely to mean 'the horse of springs or fountains' [see below]. He ascended to the seat of the immortals, and afterwards lived in the palace of Zeus, for whom he carried thunder and lightning (Hes. Th. 281-286; Apollod. ii. 3, 4; Ov. Met. iv. 783). According to the story at Corinth, where Pegasus was particularly noted and was represented on the coins of the state (see p. 251), Pegasus in his flight after his birth rested at Acrocorinthus and drank at the well Pirene. Since, in order to kill the Chimaera, it was necessary for Bellerophon to obtain possession of Pegasus, the soothsayer Polyidus advised him to spend a night in the temple of Athene at Corinth. As Bellerophon was asleep in the temple, the goddess appeared to him in a dream, commanding him to sacrifice to Poseidon, and gave him a golden bridle. When he awoke he found the bridle, offered the sacrifice, and caught Pegasus while he was drinking at the well (Pind. Ol. xiii. 63-92). According to Pausanias, Athene herself tamed and bridled Pegasus, and surrendered him to Bellerophon (Paus. ii. 4, 1). After he had conquered the Chimaera, he endeavoured to rise up to heaven upon his winged horse, but fell down upon the earth. [BELLEROPHON.] Pegasus, however, continued his flight to heaven.—The connexion of Pegasus with the Muses in Greek mythology was simply that he produced with his hoof the inspiring fountain Hippocrene. The story about this fountain runs as follows. When the Muses engaged in a contest with the daughters of Pierus on Mount Helicon, all became darkness when the daughters of Pierus began to sing; whereas during the song of the Muses, heaven, the sea, and all the rivers stood still to listen, and Helicon rose heavenward with delight, until Pegasus, by command of Poseidon, stopped its ascent by kicking it with his hoof. From this kick there arose Hippocrene, the inspiring well of the Muses, on Mount Helicon, which, for this reason, Persius calls fons caballinus (Pers. Prolog. 1; cf. Ov. Met. v. 256; Strab. p. 379; Paus. ix. 31, 3; Ant. Lib. 9). In later myths Pegasus is described as the horse of Eos; and in the legends of the stars he is placed among connected with Poseidon [see p. 162, b], and so far this agrees with the idea of Hesiod, who makes him the thunder-bringing horse of Zeus; but it is possible that the true origin may have been simpler. Poseidon was specially worshipped in Thessaly as the god of horses and also as the god who (as water-god) caused springs to break forth on the earth. It is far from unlikely that the first beginning of the myth may have been the hoof-marks of Thessalian horses trampling round a sacred spring of Poseidon, and that the story may have travelled with the Dorians southwards, and may have become localised at the various places. There was a well Hippocrene created in the same way by the hoof of Pegasus at Troezen as well as on Helicon and at Corinth (Paus. ii. 31, 9). The idea of Pegasus being the horse of the Muses, upon which poets soar aloft, is modern. It has not been traced to any earlier poem than the Orlando Innamorato of Boiardo in the fifteenth century. In ancient sculptures and paintings Pegasus was a favourite subject, especially his bridling by Bellerophon and the combat with the Chimaera [see p. 162].—2. A Roman jurist, one of the followers or pupils of Proculus and praefectus urbi under Domitian (Juv. iv. 76). The Senatusconsultum Pegasianum, which was passed in the time of Vespasian, when Pegasus was consul suffectus with Pusio, probably took its name from him.

Peiso Lacus. [PELSEO LACUS.]

Pelagōnia (Πελαγονία: Πελάγονες, pl.), a district in Macedonia. The Pelagones were an ancient people, probably of Pelasgic origin, and seem originally to have inhabited the valley of the Axios, since Homer calls Pelagon, a son of Axios (Il. xxi. 140). The Pelagones afterwards migrated westwards to the Erigon, the country around which received the name of Pelagonia, which thus lay S. of Paeonia (Strab. pp. 327, 331, 434; Ptol. iii. 13, 34). The chief town of this district was also called Pelagonia (now Vitolia or Monastir), which was under the Romans the capital of the 4th division of Macedonia. It was situated on the Via Egnatia, not far from the narrow passes leading into Illyria (Liv. xlv. 29).

Pēlasgi (Πελασγοί): the earliest inhabitants of Greece are distinguished by this name; but the accounts of them vary in ancient writers, and have been variously interpreted by modern historians. In the Iliad they are known as dwelling in Asia Minor, allied to the Trojans, with a town called Larissa (Il. ii. 840); Argos is called Pelasgian (ii. 681), and in the Odyssey (xix. 177) Pelasgians are found in Crete. Above all, the Zeus who is worshipped in the groves of Dodona is the Pelasgian Zeus (Il. xvi. 233), with which Hesiod agrees in calling Dodona Pelasgian (Hes. ap. Strab. p. 327). Herodotus supports the view that they were the most ancient inhabitants of Greece when he says that Πελασγία was the original name of Hellas (ii. 56): he assigns a Pelasgian origin to the Arcadians, the Athenians, the Aeolians and the Ionian people of ancient Achaea (i. 146, vii. 94, 95, viii. 44). He distinguishes sharply between Pelasgi and Hellenes as different races with different languages (i. 57, 58), and he mentions them as dwelling in historical times at Crestone in Thrace and at Antandrus in the NW. of Asia Minor. Thucydides agrees with Herodotus in making Pelasgia the old name of most of Hellas (i. 3): like Hellanicus (Fr. 1), he identifies them with the Tyrrhenians and speaks of Pelasgians in Lemnos (iv. 109). Some have them as the heavenly horse (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 17; Ov. Fast. iii. 457; Hyg. Astr. ii. 18). The myths of Pegasus are explained by many modern writers as originating from ideas of the thundercloud, the clouds being supposed to be thought that the name Larissa is a mark of Pelasgian settlement, and that, since towns of that name are found in Thessaly, at Argos, Elis, Ephesus, and in Crete (Strab. pp. 440, 620) it would follow that Pelasgi once spread over these various parts of the Aegæan coast. The most probable explanation of all this is that the term Pelasgi expresses a period rather than a race: i.e. that the Greeks called by this name generally all the prehistoric races of Greece and the Aegæan coasts, and ascribed to them buildings and towns which belonged to a time before the Achæan age. Hence also forms of religion inherited from prehistoric tribes are called Pelasgian, as that of Zeus at Dodona, of the Cabiri in Thrace [p. 177], and some part of the Thesmophoria at Athens. It is not necessary to suppose, nor is it probable, that all these peoples belonged to the same race. Some may have been Semitic, to which race some modern writers have assigned the Pelasgi; but others may have been akin to the Hellenes, though an earlier immigration, and differing widely in dialect. The races called Pelasgian who existed in historic times were apparently relics of earlier races who dwelt on side by side with Hellenic states speaking what was to them a barbarian tongue. To ascribe a Pelasgian origin to Athenians or Arcadians merely expresses that they were an ancient race, and the Πελασγικὸν at Athens implies the admixture of the later dominant people with an earlier race of whose origin nothing was known. It was natural also that the Greek settlers in Italy should regard those 'Aboriginal' peoples whose buildings resembled the so-called Pelasgian stone walls of Greece as belonging to the 'Pelasgi' of their own country.

Pelasgiōtis (Πελασγιῶτις), a district in Thessaly, between Hestiaeotis and Magnesia. [THESSALIA.]

Pelagus, the mythical ancestor of the Pelasgi, who was regarded in Arcadia as autochthonous, or as a son of Zeus (Paus. ii. 14, 3; Apollod. ii. 1, 1); at Argos as founder and king of Argos, and son of Phoroneus (Aesch. Suppl. 251; Paus. i. 14, 2), and in Thessaly as son of Poseidon and Larissa (Dionys. i. 17). [PELASGI.]

Pelendōnes, a Celtiberian people in Hispania Tarraconensis, between the sources of the Duris and the Iberus (Ptol. ii. 6, 54).

Pelethrōnium (Πελεθρόνιον), a mountainous district in Thessaly, part of Mt. Pelion, where the Lapithæ dwelt, and which is said to have derived its name from Pelethronius, king of the Lapithæ, who invented the use of the bridle and the saddle (Strab. p. 299; Verg. Georg. iii. 115; Hyg. Fab. 274; Plin. vii. 202).

Peleus (Πηλεύς), son of Aeacus and Endeis, was king of the Myrmidons at Phthia in Thessaly. He was a brother of Telamon, and step-brother of Phocus, the son of Aeacus by the Nereid Psamathe. (Il. xvi. 15, xxi. 189, xxiv. 535; cf. Ov. Met. vii. 477, xii. 365; Ap. Rh. ii. 869.) Peleus and Telamon resolved to get rid of Phocus, because he excelled them in their military games, and Telamon, or, according to some, Peleus, murdered their step-brother. The two brothers concealed their crime by removing the body of Phocus, but were nevertheless found out, and expelled by Aeacus from Aegina. (Apollod. iii. 12, 6; Diod. iv. 72; Paus. ii. 29, 7.) Peleus went to Phthia in Thessaly, where he was purified from the murder by Eurytion, the son of Actor, married his daughter Antigone, and received with her a third of Eurytion's kingdom. Others relate that he went to Ceyx at Trachis; and as he had come to Thessaly without companions, he prayed to Zeus for an army, and the god, to please Peleus, changed the ants (μύρμηκες) into men, who were accordingly called Myrmidons. (Apollod. iii. 13, 1; Ov. Met. xi. 266; Tzet. ad Lyc. 175.) Peleus accompanied Eurytion to the Calydonian hunt, and involuntarily killed him with his spear, in consequence of which he fled from Phthia to Iolcus, where he was again purified by Acastus, the king of the place. While residing at Iolcus, Astydamia, the wife of Acastus, fell in love with him; but as her proposals were rejected by Peleus, she accused him to her husband of having attempted her virtue. Acastus, unwilling to stain his hand with the blood of the man whom he had hospitably received, and whom he had purified from his guilt, took him to Mt. Pelion, where they hunted wild beasts; and when Peleus, overcome with fatigue, had fallen asleep, Acastus left him alone, and concealed his sword, that he might be destroyed by the wild beasts. When Peleus awoke and sought his sword, he was attacked by the Centaurs, but was saved by Chiron, who also restored to him his sword. (Hes. Fragm. 31; Pind. Nem. iv. 55, v. 25; Apollod. iii. 13, 3.) In some accounts the temptress, instead of Astydamia, is Hippolyte, daughter of Cretheus (Pind. l.c.; Hor. Od. iii. 7, 18). While on Mt. Pelion, Peleus married the Nereid Thetis, by whom he became the father of Achilles. He won her with the aid of Chiron after she had tried to escape by changing into various shapes. The gods took part in the marriage solemnity; Chiron presented Peleus with a lance, Poseidon with the immortal horses Balius and Xanthus, and the other gods with arms (Il. xvi. 143, xviii. 84; Apollod. iii. 13, 5). Eris or Strife was the only goddess who was not invited to the nuptials, and she revenged herself by throwing an apple among the guests, with the inscription 'To the fairest.' [PARIS.] Homer mentions Achilles as the only son of Peleus and Thetis, but later writers state that she had already destroyed by fire six children of whom she was the mother by Peleus, and that as she attempted to make away with Achilles, her seventh child, she was prevented by Peleus (Ap. Rh. iv. 816; Lycophr. 178). After this Peleus, who is also mentioned among the Argonauts, in conjunction with Jason and the Dioscuri, besieged Acastus and Iolcus, slew Astydamia, and over the scattered limbs of her body led his warriors into the city (Ap. Rh. i.

91; Apollod. iii. 13, 7). The flocks of Peleus were at one time worried by a wolf, which Psamathe had sent to avenge the murder of her son Phocus, but she herself afterwards, on the request of Thetis, turned the animal into stone (Ov. Met. xi. 391; Ant. Lib. 38). Peleus, who had in former times joined Heracles in his expedition against Troy, was too old to accompany his son Achilles against that city; he remained at home and survived the death of his son (Il. xviii. 431; Od. xi. 495).

Pēliādes (Πελιάδες), the daughters of Pelias. See PELIAS.

Pēlias (Πελίας), son of Poseidon and Tyro, a daughter of Salmoneus. Poseidon once visited Tyro in the form of the river-god Enipeus, with whom she was in love, and she became by him the mother of Pelias and Neleus. (Od. xi. 234; Apollod. i. 9, 8). To conceal her shame, the mother exposed the two boys, but they were found and reared by some countrymen. They subsequently learnt their parentage; and after the death of Cretheus, king of Iolcus, who had married their mother, they seized the throne of Iolcus, to the exclusion of Aeson, the son of Cretheus and Tyro. Pelias soon afterwards expelled his own brother Neleus, and thus became sole ruler of Iolcus. After Pelias had long reigned over Iolcus, Jason, the son of Aeson, came to Iolcus and claimed the kingdom as his right. In order to get rid of him, Pelias sent him to Colchis to fetch the golden fleece. Hence arose the celebrated expedition of the Argonauts. After the return of Jason, Pelias was cut to pieces and boiled by his own daughters (the Peliades), who had been told by Medea that in this manner they might restore their father to vigour and youth. [See cut, p. 458.] His son Acastus held funeral games in his honour at Iolcus, and expelled Jason and Medea from the country. [For details, see JASON; MEDEA; ARGONAUTAE.] The names of several of the daughters of Pelias are recorded. The most celebrated of them was Alcestis, the wife of Admetus. [ALCESTIS.]

Pēlides (Πηλείδης; Πηλείων), a patronymic from Peleus, generally given to his son Achilles, more rarely to his grandson Neoptolemus.

Pēligni, or Paeligni, a brave and warlike people of Sabine origin in central Italy, bounded SE. by the Marsi, N. by the Marrucini, S. by Samnium and the Frentani, and E. by the Frentani likewise. [See p. 453, b.] The climate of their country was cold (Hor. Od. iii. 19, 8), but it produced a considerable quantity of flax and was celebrated for its honey. The Peligni, like their neighbours, the Marsi, were regarded as magicians. Their principal towns were CORFINIUM and SULMO. They offered a brave resistance to the Romans, but concluded a peace with the republic along with their neighbours the Marsi, Marrucini and Frentani in B.C. 304 (Liv. viii. 6, 29, ix. 41, 45). They took an active part in the Social war (90, 89), and their chief town, Corfinium, was destined by the allies to be the new capital of Italy in place of Rome. They were subdued by Pompeius Strabo (Liv. Ep. 73, 76). They are mentioned by Tacitus as siding with Vespasian against Vitellius (Hist. iii. 59).

Pēlinaeus Mons (τὸ Πελιναῖον ὄρος, or Πελληναῖον; M. Elias), the highest mountain of the island of Chios, a little N. of the city of Chios, with a celebrated temple of Zeus Πελιναῖος (Strab. p. 465).

Pelinna, or more commonly Pelinnæum (Πελίinna, Πελιinnaῖον; Gardhiki), a town of Thessaly in Hestiaeotis, on the left bank of the Peneus, was taken by the Romans in the war with Antiochus (Pind. Pyth. x. 4; Strab. p. 437 Liv. xxxvi. 10, 14).

Pēlion, more rarely Pēlios (τὸ Πήλιον ὄρος; Plessidhi or Zagora), a lofty range of mountains of Thessaly in the district of Magnesia, was situated between the lake Boebëis and the Pagasæan gulf, and formed the promontories of Sepias and Aeantium (Hdt. vii. 129; Il. ii. 744). Its sides were covered with wood, and on its summit was a temple of Zeus Actaeus, where the cold was so severe that the persons who went in procession to this temple once a year wore thick skins to protect themselves. Mt. Pelion was celebrated in mythology. The giants in their war with the gods are said to have attempted to heap Ossa and Olympus on Pelion, or Pelion and Ossa on Olympus in order to scale heaven. [OLYMPUS.] Near the summit of this mountain was the cave of the Centaur Chiron, who was fitly represented as dwelling here, because abundance of medicinal plants grew upon the mountain, and he was celebrated for his skill in medicine. (Il. ii. 743, xvi. 143; CHIRON.) On Pelion also the timber was felled with which the ship Argo was built. [ARGONAUTAE.]

Pella (Πέλλα; Πελλαῖος, Pellaëus). 1. (Alaklisi), an ancient town of Macedonia in the district Bottiaea, was situated upon a hill, and upon a lake formed by the river Lydias, 120 stadia from its mouth (Hdt. vii. 123; Thuc. ii. 94). It continued to be a place of small importance till the time of Philip, who made it his residence and the capital of the Macedonian monarchy, and adorned it with many public buildings. It is frequently mentioned by subsequent writers on account of its being the birthplace of Alexander the Great (Strab. pp. 320, 323, 330; Juv. x. 168; Lucan. x. 20). It was the capital of one of the four districts into which the Romans divided Macedonia [see p. 512, b], and was subsequently made a Roman colony under the name of Col. Jul. Aug. Pella (Liv. xlv. 29; C. I. G. 1997).—2. (Fahil), the southernmost of the ten cities which composed the Decapolis in Peraea—that is, in Palestine E. of the Jordan—stood five Roman miles SE. of Scythopolis, and was also called Βούτις (Plin. v. 74; Joseph. B. J. iii. 3, 3). It was taken by Antiochus the Great, in the wars between Syria and Egypt, and was held by a Macedonian colony, till it was destroyed by Alexander Jannæus on account of the refusal of its inhabitants to embrace the Jewish religion. It was restored and given back to its old inhabitants by Pompey (Pol. v. 70; Jos. B. J. i. 4, 8, Ant. xiv. 4, 4). It was the place of refuge of the Christians who fled from Jerusalem before its capture by the Romans.—3. A city of Syria on the Orontes, formerly called Pharnace, was named Pella by the Macedonians, and afterwards APAMEA (No. 1).—4. In Phrygia. [PELTAE.]

Pellāna. [PELENE, No. 2.]

Pellēnē (Πελλήνη, Dor. Πελλάνα; Πελληνεύς). 1. A city in Achaia bordering on Sicyonia, the most easterly of the twelve Achaean cities, was situated on a hill sixty stadia from the city, and was strongly fortified. Its port-town was Aristonautae. The ancients derived its name from the giant Pallas, or from the Argive Pellen, the son of Phorbas. (Hdt. i. 145; Strab. p. 386; Paus. vii. 26, 12.) It is mentioned in Homer; and the inhabitants of of Scione in the peninsula of Pallene in Macedonia professed to be descended from the Pellenaeans in Achaia, who were shipwrecked on the Macedonian coast on their return from Troy (Il. ii. 574; Thuc. iv. 120). In the Peloponnesian war Pellene sided with Sparta. In the later wars of Greece between the Achaean and Aetolian Leagues, the town was several times taken by the contending parties.—Between Pellene and Aegae there was a smaller town of the same name, where the celebrated Pellean cloaks (Πελληνιακά χαλῖναι) were made, which were given as prizes to the victors in the games at this place (Pind. Ol. ix. 98; Strab. l. c.)—2. Usually called Pellana, a town in Laconia on the Eurotas, about fifty stadia NW. of Sparta, on the road to Megalopolis, belonging to the Spartan Tripolis (Strab. p. 386; Xen. Hell. vii. 5, 9; Pol. iv. 81).

Pēlōdēs (Πηλώδης λιμήν, in App. Παλόεις: Argyro), a port-town belonging to Buthrotum in Epirus, and on a bay which probably bore the same name (Strab. p. 324).

Pēlōpia. [ÆGISTHUS; THYESTES.]

Pēlōpidas (Πελοπίδας), the Theban general and statesman, son of Hippocles, was descended from a noble family and inherited a large estate, of which he made a liberal use. He lived always in the closest friendship with Epaminondas, to whose simple frugality, as he could not persuade him to share his riches, he is said to have assimilated his own mode of life. He took a leading part in expelling the Spartans from Thebes, B.C. 379; and from this time until his death there was not a year in which he was not entrusted with some important command. He was noted as a brilliant leader of cavalry. In 371 he was one of the Theban commanders at the battle of Leuctra, so fatal to the Lacedaemonians, and joined Epaminondas in urging the expediency of immediate action. In 369, he was also one of the generals in the first invasion of Peloponnesus by the Thebans. Respecting his accusation on his return from this campaign see p. 316, b. In 368 Pelopidas was sent again to Thessaly, on two separate occasions, in consequence of complaints against Alexander of Pherae. On his first expedition Alexander of Pherae sought safety in flight; and Pelopidas advanced into Macedonia to arbitrate between Alexander II. and Ptolemy of Alorus. Among the hostages whom he took with him from Macedonia was Philip, the father of Alexander the Great. On his second visit to Thessaly, Pelopidas went simply as an ambassador, not expecting any opposition, and unprovided with a military force. He was seized by Alexander of Pherae, and was kept in confinement at Pherae till his liberation in 367, by a Theban force under Epaminondas. In the same year in which he was released he was sent as ambassador to Susa, to counteract the Lacedaemonian and Athenian negotiations at the Persian court. In 364, the Thessalian towns again applied to Thebes for protection against Alexander, and Pelopidas was appointed to aid them. His forces, however, were dismayed by an eclipse of the sun (June 13), and therefore, leaving them behind, he took with him into Thessaly only 300 horse. On his arrival at Pharsalus he collected a force which he deemed sufficient, and marched against Alexander, treating lightly the great disparity of numbers, and remarking that it was better as it was, since there would be more for him to conquer. At Cynoscephalae a battle ensued, in which Pelopidas drove the enemy from their ground, but he himself was slain as, burning with resentment, he pressed rashly to attack

Alexander in person. The Thebans and Thesalians made great lamentations for his death, and the latter, having earnestly requested leave to bury him, celebrated his funeral with splendour. (Plut. Pelopidas; Nep. Pelopidas; Xen. Hell. vii.; Diod. xv. 62–81.)

Pēlōponnēsus (ἡ Πελοπόννησος: Morea), the S. part of Greece or the peninsula which was connected with Hellas proper by the isthmus of Corinth. It is said to have derived its name Peloponnesus or the 'island of Pelops,' from the mythical Pelops. [PELOPS.] This name does not occur in Homer. In his time the peninsula was sometimes called Apia, from Apis, son of Phoroneus, king of Argos, and sometimes Argos; which names were given to it on account of Argos being the chief power in Peloponnesus at that period. Peloponnesus was bounded on the N. by the Corinthian gulf, on the W. by the Ionian or Sicilian sea, on the S. by the Libyan, and on the E. by the Cretan and Myrtoan seas. On the E. and S. there are three great gulfs, the Argolic, Laconian, and Messenian. Peloponnesus was divided into various provinces, all of which were bounded on one side by the sea, with the exception of ARCADIA, which was in the centre of the country. The political divisions of post-Homeric times were decided in great measure by the mountain system—a great range of which the summits are Erymanthus, Aroanius, and Cyllene, running from West to East and separating the upland of Arcadia from Achaia; from this range run others to the S. and SE.: from the E. extremity the mountains of Argolis ending in the prom. of Scyllaeum, and the more important Parnon running more nearly S. through Laconia: from the central Aroanius a range of which Taygetus is the most important part runs S. and ends in Taenarum. From the west comes down the range through which Alpheus, the only river navigable for boats, cuts its way: this range bends round so as to join Taygetus and form the S. limit of Arcadia. The provinces thus parted off were ACHAIA in the N., ELIS in the W., MESSENIA in the W. and S., LAONIA in the S. and E., and CORINTHIA in the E. and N. A detailed account of the geography of the peninsula is given under these names. The area of Peloponnesus is computed to be 7779 English miles; and it probably contained a population of upwards of a million in the flourishing period of Greek history.—Peloponnesus was to some extent united under the early Achaean princes: it again had a period of union under the Achaean League until its conquest by the Romans. [For its earlier history see ACHAEI; DORES; PELOPS: for its later history see the account of the various states.]

Pēlops (Πέλοψ), grandson of Zeus, and son of Tantalus and Dione, the daughter of Atlas and the favourite of Poseidon. Some writers call his mother Euryanassa or Clytia. He was married to Hippodamia, by whom he became the father of Atreus, Thyestes, Dias, Cynosurus, Corinthius, Hippalmus (Hippalcemus or Hippalcimus), Hippasus, Cleon, Argiūs, Alcathous, Aelius, Pittheus, Troezen, Nicippe, and Lysidice. (Pind. Ol. i. 70; Eur. Or. 1; Apollod. ii. 4, 5; Paus. vi. 22, 5; Hyg. Fab. 83.) Chryseus was his son by Axioche. Pelops was king of Pisa in Elis, and from him the great southern peninsula of Greece was believed to have derived its name Peloponnesus. According to a tradition which became very general in later times, Pelops was a Phrygian, who was expelled by Ilus from Phrygia (hence called by Ovid, Met. viii. 622, Pelopeia arva), and thereupon migrated with his great wealth to Pisa. (Pind. Ol. i. 24, ix. 9; Thuc. i. 9; Soph. Aj. 1292; Paus. ii. 22, 4, v. 1, 5.) Others describe him as a Paphlagonian, and call the Paphlagonians themselves Πελοπῆγοι (Ap. Rh. ii. 358; Diod. iv. 74). Homer (Il. ii. 101), speaking of the transmission of the sceptre to Agamemnon, makes Pelops the first recipient of it from the gods, but does not mention his native country. The legends about Pelops consist mainly of the story of his being cut to pieces and boiled; of his contest with Oenomaus and Hippodamia, and of his relation to his sons. (1) Pelops cut to pieces and boiled (Κρεουργία Πέλοπος). Tantalus, the favourite of the gods, once invited them to a repast, and on that occasion killed his own son, and having boiled him set the flesh before them that they might eat it. But the immortal gods, knowing what it was, did not touch it; Demeter alone, being absorbed by grief for her lost daughter, consumed the shoulder of Pelops. Hereupon the gods ordered Hermes to put the limbs of Pelops into a cauldron, and thereby restore him to life. When this was done, Clotho took him out of the cauldron, and as the shoulder consumed by Demeter was wanting, the goddess supplied its place by one made of ivory; his descendants (the Pelopidae), as a mark of their origin, were believed to have one shoulder as white as ivory. (Pind. Ol. i. 25; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 152; Hyg. Fab. 83; Verg. Georg. iii. 7; Ov. Met. vi. 404.) [For this myth see further under TANTALUS.] (2) Contest with Oenomaus and Hippodamia. As an oracle had declared to Oenomaus that he should be killed by his son-in-law, he refused to give his fair daughter Hippodamia in marriage to anyone. But since many suitors appeared, Oenomaus declared that he would bestow her hand upon the man who should conquer him in the chariot-race, but that he should kill all who were defeated by him (Pind. Ol. i. 70). Among other suitors Pelops also presented himself, but when he saw the heads of his conquered predecessors stuck up above the door of Oenomaus, he was seized with fear, and endeavoured to gain the favour of Myrtilus, the charioteer of Oenomaus, promising him half the kingdom if he would assist him in conquering his master. Myrtilus agreed, and left out the linch-pins of the chariot of Oenomaus. In the race the chariot of Oenomaus broke down, and he was thrown out and killed. Thus Hippodamia became the wife of Pelops. But as Pelops had now gained his object, he was unwilling to keep faith with Myrtilus; and accordingly as they were driving along a cliff he threw Myrtilus into the sea. As Myrtilus sank, he cursed Pelops and his whole race. (Soph. El. 504; Paus. v. 17, 4; Hyg. Fab. 84; MYRTILUS.) Pelops returned with Hippodamia to Pisa in Elis, and soon also made himself master of Olympia, where he restored the Olympian games with greater splendour than they had ever been celebrated before (Pind. Ol. ix. 10; Paus. v. 8, 2). (3) The sons of Pelops. Chrysippus was the favourite of his father, and was in consequence envied by his brothers. The two eldest among them, Atreus and Thyestes, with the connivance of Hippodamia, accordingly murdered Chrysippus, and threw his body into a well. Pelops, who suspected his sons of the murder, expelled them from the country. Hippodamia, dreading the anger of her husband, fled to Midea in Argolis, from whence her remains were afterwards conveyed by Pelops to

Olympia. (Schol. ad Eur. Or. 800, ad Eur. Phoen. 1760; Paus. v. 8, 1, vi. 20, 4; Hyg. Fab. 85, 243.) Pelops, after his death, was honoured at Olympia above all other heroes. His tomb with an iron sarcophagus existed on the banks of the Alpheus, not far from the temple of Artemis near Pisa. The spot on which his sanctuary (Πελοπίον) stood in the Altis was said to have been dedicated by Heracles, who also offered to him the first sacrifices. The magistrates of the Eleans likewise offered to him there an annual sacrifice, consisting of a black ram, with special ceremonies (Paus. v. 13; Apollod. ii. 7, 2). The name of Pelops was so celebrated that it was constantly used by the poets in connexion with his descendants and the cities they inhabited. Hence we find Atreus, the son of Pelops, called Pelopeius Atreus, and Agamemnon, the grandson or great-grandson of Atreus, called Pelopeius Agamemnon. In the same way Iphigenia, the daughter of Agamemnon, and Hermione, the wife of Menelaus, are each called by Ovid Pelopeia virgo. Virgil (Aen. ii. 193) uses the phrase Pelopēa moenia to signify the cities in Peloponnesus which Pelops and his descendants ruled over; and in like manner Mycenae is called by Ovid Pelopeiades Mycenae.—To these traditional accounts of Pelops must be added the evidence from archaeological discoveries, especially those of recent years at MYCENAE and TIRYNS. These discoveries tend to confirm the tradition of a Lydian or Phrygian origin for the dynasty which reigned in those cities (resemblances in art and architecture which have been traced between the remains found in these cities and in Asia Minor have been noticed under MYCENAE). On the whole there is good ground for the story that the founder of the Pelopid dynasty came from Asia Minor: possibly, as tradition stated, from the country of Mount Sipylus; and that the civilisation of the Achaean princes (perhaps also their gold) was brought from that country. The traces of Egyptian and Phoenician influence on their works of art may be ascribed to commercial intercourse.

Pelōris, Pelōrias, or Pelōrus (Πελωρίς, Πελωριάς, Πέλωρος: C. Faro), the NE. point of Sicily, was NE. of Messana on the Fretum Siculum, and one of the three promontories which formed the triangular figure of the island. According to the usual story it derived its name from Pelorus, the pilot of Hannibal's ship, who was buried here after being killed by Hannibal in a fit of anger (Mel. ii. 7, 17; Val. Max. ix. 8, 1); but the name was more ancient than Hannibal's time, being mentioned by Thucydides (iv. 25). On the promontory there was a temple of Poseidon, and a tower, probably a lighthouse, from which the modern name of the Cape (Faro) has come.

Pelōrus (Πέλωρος: prob. Lori or Luri), a river of Iberia in Asia, probably a S. tributary of the Cyrus (Kour). (Dio Cass. xxxvii. 2.)

Pelso or Peiso (Plattensee), a great lake in Pannonia, the waters of which were conducted into the Danube by the emperor Galerius, who thus gained a great quantity of fertile land for his newly formed province of Valeria (Aurel. Vict. Caes. 40; Plin. iii. 146).

Peltae (Πέλται: Πεληνηός), an ancient and flourishing city of Asia Minor, in the N. of Phrygia, ten parasangs from Celaenae (Xenophon), and the same place as the Pella of the Peutinger Table, twenty-six Roman miles N. or NE. of Apamea Ciotus, to the conventus of which it belonged. The surrounding district is called by Strabo τὸ Πελτηνὸν πῆδιον. (Xen. An. i. 2, 10; Strab. p. 576.) Its site is between Kara Agatchlar and Yaka Keni.

Peltuinus (Peltuinus, -ātis: Ansedonia), a town of the Vestini in Italy (Plin. iii. 107).

Pēlūsium (Πηλούσιον: Egypt. Peremoun or Peremai; O. T. Sin: all these names are derived from nouns meaning mud: Πηλουσιώτης; Pelusiōta: Tineh, Ru.), a celebrated city of Lower Egypt, stood on the E. side of the easternmost mouth of the Nile, which was called after it the Pelusiac mouth, twenty stadia (two geogr. miles) from the sea, in the midst of morasses, from which it obtained its name (Strab. p. 802; Ptol. iv. 5, 11, viii. 15, 11). As the key of Egypt on the NE., and the frontier city towards Syria and Arabia, it was strongly fortified, and was the scene of many battles and sieges in the wars of Egypt with Assyria, Persia, Syria, and Rome, from the defeat of Sennacherib near it by Sethon down to its capture by Octavianus after the battle of Actium (Strab. p. 604; Hdt. ii. 10; Diod. xv. 42, xvi. 48; Val. Max. ix. 1). Later it was the capital of the district of Augustamnica. It was the birthplace of the geographer Ptolemy.

Pēnātes (strictly Dii Penates), the household gods in the old Italian religion, both those of a private family and those of the state, as the great family of citizens. Hence we have to distinguish between private and public Penates. The name is connected with penus, the household store of food, and cella penaria, the store-room, which they protected and blessed with increase. They were two in number, and their images stood in old Roman houses in the atrium (Varro, L. L. v. 162), the hearth being for them, as for Vesta, their altar (Serv. ad Aen. xi. 211). In later times they were placed in the hinder part or penetrāle of the house, whence Cicero, while he gives the true etymology from penus, suggests also a false one from penetrāle (Cic. N. D. ii. 27, 68; cf. Fest. p. 208; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 12). A peculiar sanctity attached to the place where their images stood; those who tended it or even stepped into it should be chaste and pure (Colum. xii. 4, 3; cf. Verg. Aen. i. 708). The two state Penates of Rome had a temple in the Velia, in which their images stood—according to Dionysius i. 67, figures of two young men with spears in their hands. According to a tradition which probably started after the legends from Greek cities of Italy began to have their influence, the Penates were brought from Troy to Lanuvium (where, no doubt, as in a religious centre of the Latin religion, there was a specially ancient worship of those true Italian deities), and it was further imagined that the Penates had reached Troy from Samothrace and were the θεοὶ μέγαλοι or Cabiri (Dionys. i. 67; Macrobi. iii. 4, 7, 9). To this should probably be referred the expression of Virgil 'Cum patribus populoque, Penatibus et Magnis Dis' (Aen. viii. 679). For the private worship of the Penates on the hearth a perpetual fire was kept up in their honour, and the table always contained the salt-cellar and the firstlings of fruit for these divinities. Every meal that was taken in the house thus resembled a sacrifice offered to the Penates, beginning with a purification and ending with a libation which was poured either on the table or upon the hearth. [Compare LARES.]

Pēnēis. [DAPHNE.]

Pēnēlēōs (Πηνέλεως), son of Hippalcmus and Asterope, and one of the Argonauts. He was the father of Opheltēs, and is also mentioned among the suitors of Helen. (Apollod. i. 9, 16; Paus. ix. 5, 8.) He was one of the leaders of the Boeotians in the war against Troy, where he slew Ilioneus and Lycon, and was wounded by Polydamas. (Il. ii. 494, xix. 487.) He is said to have been slain by Eurypylus, the son of Telephus.

Pēnēlōpē (Πηνελόπη, Πηνελόπη, Πηνελόπεια), daughter of Icarius and Periboea of Sparta, married Odysseus, king of Ithaca. [Respecting her marriage, see ICARIUS, No. 2.] By Odysseus she had an only child, Telemachus, who was an infant when her husband sailed against Troy. During the long absence of her husband she was beleaguered by numerous and importunate suitors, whom she deceived by declaring that she must finish a large robe which she was making for Laërtes, her father-in-law, before she could make up her mind. During the day-time she accordingly worked at the robe, and in the night she undid the work of the day. By this means she succeeded in putting off the suitors. But at length her stratagem was betrayed by her servants; and when, in consequence, the faithful Penelope was pressed more and more by the impatient suitors, Odysseus at length arrived in Ithaca, after an absence of twenty years. [For details see ODYSSEUS.] While the Odyssey describes Penelope as the type of a faithful wife, some later writers represent her as the reverse, and relate that by Hermes or by the suitors she became the mother of Pan (Lycophr. 772; Schol. ad Hdt. ii. 145; Cic. N. D. iii. 22, 55). They add that Odysseus on his return repudiated her, whereupon she went to Sparta, and thence to Mantinea, where her tomb was shown in after-times (Paus. viii. 12, 8). According to another tradition, she married Telegonus, after he had killed his father (Hyg. Fab. 127).

Pēnēus (Πηνειός). 1. (Salambria or Salambria), the chief river of Thessaly, and one of the most important in all Greece, rises near Alalcomenae in Mt. Lacmon, a branch of Mt. Pindus, flows first SE. and then NE. and after receiving many affluents, of which the chief were the Enipeus, the Lethaeus, and the Titarisus, forces its way through the vale of Tempe between Mts. Ossa and Olympus into the sea. [TEMPE.] As a god Peneus was called a son of Oceanus and Tethys (Hes. Th. 343). By the Naiad Creusa he became the father of Hypseus, Stilbe, and Daphne. Cyrene also is called by some his wife, and by others his daughter; and hence Peneus is described as the genitor of ARISTAEUS (Verg. Georg. iv. 355).—2. (Gastunt), a river in Elis, which rises on the frontiers of Arcadia, flows by the town of Elis, and falls into the sea between the promontory Chelonatas and Ichthys (Strab. p. 338).

Pēnius, a little river of Pontus falling into the Euxine (Ovid, Pont. iv. 10, 47).

Penninae Alpes. [ALPES.]

Pennus, Junius. 1. M., praetor B.C. 201 (Liv. xxix. 11, xxxi. 4).—2. M., son of No. 1, praetor in Nearer Spain 172, consul 167 (Liv. xlii. 9, xlv. 16).—3. M., son of No. 2, tribune in 126, carried, in opposition to C. Gracchus, a law expelling aliens (peregrini) from Rome (Cic. Off. iii. 11, 47, Brut. 28, 109).

Pentāpōlis (Πεντάπολις), the name for any sequence killed by the hero. Thereupon Diomedes, a relative of Thersites, threw the body of Penthesilea into the river Scamander; but, according to other accounts, Achilles himself buried it on the banks of the Xanthus. (Tzet. ad Lyc. 997; AMAZONES.)

Pentheus (Πενθεύς), son of Echion and Agave, the daughter of Cadmus. He succeeded Cadmus as king of Thebes; and having resisted the introduction of the worship of Dionysus into his kingdom, he was driven mad by the god, his palace was hurled to the ground, and he himself was torn to pieces by his own mother and her two sisters, Ino and Autonoe, who in their Bacchic frenzy believed him to be a wild beast. The place where Pentheus suffered death is said to have been Mt. Cithaeron or Mt. Parnassus. It is related that Pentheus got upon a tree, for the purpose of witnessing in secret the revelry of the Bacchic women, but on being discovered by them was torn to pieces. (Eur. Bacchae; Ov. Met. iii. 513; Apollod. iii. 5, 2; Hyg. Fab. 184; Nonn. Dionys.

The dying Penthesilea supported by Achilles. (From a sarcophagus found at Salonica, and now in Paris.)

association of five cities, was applied specifically to the five chief cities of Cyrenaica in N. Africa, Cyrene, Berenice, Arsinoë, Ptolemais, and Apollonia, from which, under the Ptolemies, Cyrenaica received the name of Pentapolis, or Pentapolis Libyae, or, in the Roman writers, Pentapolitana Regio. [CYRENAICA.] When the name occurs alone, this is its usual meaning; the other applications of it are rare.

Pentelēum (Πεντέλειον), a fortified place in the N. of Arcadia near Pheneus (Plut. Cleom. 17, Arat. 39).

Pentēlicus Mons (τό Πεντελικόν ὄρος: Pentelē), a mountain in Attica, celebrated for its marble, which derived its name from the demus of Pentēle (Πεντέλη), lying on its S. slope. It is a branch of Mt. Parnes, from which it runs in a SE. ly direction between Athens and Marathon to the coast. It was also called Brilessus (Βριλησσός). (Thuc. ii. 23; Strab. p. 399.)

Penthesilēa (Πενθεσίλεια), daughter of Ares and Otrera, and queen of the Amazons (Hyg. Fab. 112; Just. ii. 4). After the death of Hector, she came to the assistance of the Trojans, but was slain by Achilles, who mourned over the dying queen on account of her beauty, youth, and valour (Dict. Cret. iii. 15, iv. 2; Paus. v. 11, 2; Quint. Smyrn. i. 40). Thersites ridiculed the grief of Achilles, and was in consequence killed by the hero. According to a Corinthian tradition, the women were afterwards commanded by an oracle to discover that tree, and to worship it like the god Dionysus; and accordingly out of the tree two carved images of the god were made. (Paus. ii. 2, 6.) This gives some support to a theory advocated by some modern writers, that Pentheus was originally Dionysus himself, the god of trees, and especially of vine-trees, torn by winter storms. It is simpler to explain the myth as signifying the resistance offered in certain districts to the worship of Dionysus, when it was first introduced, of which resistance Damascus, Lycurgus and Pentheus are the types [see p. 294, b].

Penthilus (Πένθιλος), son of Orestes and Erigone, is said to have led a colony of Aeolians to Thrace. He was the father of Echelatus and Damasias. (Paus. ii. 18, 5; Strab. p. 582.)

Pentri, one of the most important of the tribes in Samnium, were conquered by the Romans along with the other Samnites, and were the only one of the Samnite tribes who remained faithful to the Romans when the rest of the nation revolted to Hannibal in the second Punic war (Liv. ix. 31, xxii. 61). Their chief town was BOVIANUM.

Pēos Artēmīdos (Πέος, probably corrupted from Σπέος, cave, Ἀρτεμίδος: Beni Hassan, Ru.), a city of the Heptanomis, or Middle Egypt, on the E. bank of the Nile, nearly opposite to Hermopolis the Great on the W. bank. It is remarkable as the site of rock-hewn catacombs, the walls of which are covered with sculptures and paintings of importance for elucidating Egyptian antiquities.

Peparethus (Πεπαρήθος: Πεπαρήθιος: Piperi), a small island in the Aegean sea, off the coast of Thessaly, and of Halonesus, with a town of the same name upon it and two other small places (Thuc. iii. 89; Strab. p. 436). It produced a quantity of wine. It is mentioned in connexion with Halonesus in the war between Philip and the Athenians. [HALONESUS.]

Pephus (Πέφνος), a town of Laconia, on the E. coast of the Messenian gulf, some way N. of Oetylus (Paus. iii. 26, 2).

Pephrêdo (Πεφρηδῶ). [GRAEAE.]

Pepûza (Πέπουζα: Ru. near Yannik Euren), a city in the W. of Phrygia, on the road between Eumeneia and Stektorion.

Pêraea (ἡ Περαιά, sc. γῆ or χώρα, the country on the opposite side), a general name for any district belonging to or closely connected with a country, from the main part of which it was separated by a sea or river, was used specifically for—1. The part of Palestine E. of the Jordan in general, but usually in a more restricted sense, for a part of the region—namely, the district between the rivers Hieromax on the N., and Arnon on the S.—2. Peraea Rhodiorum (ἡ Περαιά τῶν Ῥωδίων), also called the Rhodian Chersonese a district in the S. of Caria, opposite to the island of Rhodes, from Mt. Phoenix on the W. to the frontier of Lycia on the E. (Strab. p. 651; Pol. xvii. 2, 6; Liv. xxxii. 33). This strip of coast, which was reckoned 1500 stadia in length (by sea), and was regarded as one of the finest spots on the earth, was colonised by the Rhodians at an early period, and was always in close political connexion with Rhodes even under the successive rulers of Caria; and after the victory of the Romans over Antiochus the Great, B.C. 190, it was assigned, with the whole of Carian Doris, to the independent republic of the Rhodians. [RHODUS.]—3. P. Tenediôrum (Περαιά Τενεδίων), a strip of the W. coast of Mysia, opposite to the island of Tenedos, between C. Sigeum on the N. and Alexandria Troas on the S. (Strab. p. 596).

Percôtê (Περκώτη, formerly Περκώπη, according to Strabo: Borgas or Burgus, Turk., and Percate, Grk.), a very ancient city of Mysia, between Abydos and Lampsacus, near the Hellespont, on a river called Percotes, in a beautiful situation (Il. ii. 835, xi. 229; Xen. Hell. v. 1, 23; Strab. p. 590).

Perdiccas (Περδίκκας) 1. I., the founder of the Macedonian monarchy, according to Herodotus, though later writers represent Caranus as the first king of Macedonia, and make Perdiccas only the fourth. [CARANUS.] According to Herodotus, Perdiccas and his two brothers, Gauanes and Aëropus, were Argives of the race of Temenus, who settled near Mt. Bermius, from whence they subdued the rest of Macedonia (Herod. viii. 137, 138). It is clear, however, that the dominions of Perdiccas and his immediate successors comprised but a very small part of the country subsequently known under that name (Thuc. ii. 99). Perdiccas was succeeded by his son Argæus.—2. II., king of Macedonia, from about B.C. 454 to 413, was the son and successor of Alexander I. Shortly before the beginning of the Peloponnesian war Perdiccas was at war with the Athenians, who sent a force to support his brother Philip and Derdas, a Macedonian chieftain, against the king, while the latter espoused the cause of Potidaea, which had shaken off the Athenian yoke, B.C. 432 (Thuc. i. 57–63; Diod. xii. 34). In the following year peace was concluded between Perdiccas and the Athenians, but it did not last long, and he was during the greater part of his reign on hostile terms with the Athenians. In 429 his dominions were invaded by Sitalces, king of the powerful Thracian tribe of the Odrysians, but the enemy was compelled, by want of provisions, to return home. (Thuc. ii. 95–101; Diod. xii. 50.) It was in great part at his instigation that Brasidas in 424 set out on his celebrated expedition to Macedonia and Thrace. In the following year (423), however, a misunderstanding arose between him and Brasidas, in consequence of which he abandoned the Spartan alliance, and concluded peace with Athens. (Thuc. iv. 82, 103, 124–132.) Subsequently we find him at one time in alliance with the Spartans, and at another time with the Athenians; and it is evident that he joined one or other of the belligerent parties according to the dictates of his own interest at the moment (Thuc. v. 80, vi. 7, vii. 9).—3. III., king of Macedonia, B.C. 364–359, was the second son of Amyntas II., by his wife Eurydice. On the assassination of his brother Alexander II. by Ptolemy of Alorus, 367, the crown of Macedonia devolved upon him by hereditary right, but Ptolemy virtually enjoyed the sovereign power as guardian of Perdiccas till 364, when the latter caused Ptolemy to be put to death, and took the government into his own hands (Just. vii. 4; Diod. xv. 77, xvi. 2). Of the reign of Perdiccas we have very little information. We learn only that he was at one time engaged in hostilities with Athens on account of Amphipolis, and that he was distinguished for his patronage of men of letters (Aesch. F.L. 29). He fell in battle against the Illyrians, 359.—4. Son of Orontes, a Macedonian of the province of Orestis, was one of the most distinguished of the generals of Alexander the Great. He accompanied Alexander throughout his campaigns in Asia; and the king on his death-bed is said to have taken the royal signet ring from his finger and given it to Perdiccas (Curt. x. 5, 4; Just. xii. 15). After the death of the king (323), Perdiccas had the chief authority entrusted to him under the command of the new king Arrhidaeus, who was a mere puppet in his hands, and he still further strengthened his power by the assassination of his rival Meleager. [MELEAGER.] The other generals of Alexander regarded him with fear and suspicion; and at length his ambitious schemes induced Antipater, Craterus, and Ptolemy, to unite in a league and declare open war against Perdiccas. Thus assailed on all sides, Perdiccas determined to leave Eumenes in Asia Minor, to make head against their common enemies in that quarter, while he himself marched into Egypt against Ptolemy. He advanced without opposition as far as Pelusium, but found the banks of the Nile strongly fortified and guarded by Ptolemy, and was repulsed in repeated attempts to force the passage of the river; in the last of which, near Memphis, he lost great numbers of men. Thereupon his troops, who had long been discontented with Perdiccas, rose in mutiny and put him to death. (Diod. xviii. 14–36; Just. xii. 6, 8.)

mother of Talos, the legends of whose death appear to have grown out of an attempt to explain the presence of Daedalus, as type of primitive art, in Crete as well as Attica. [DAEDALUS.] For the story, see TALOS. Perdix herself probably formed some part of the myths about birds, prevalent especially at Athens and generally connected with something in the notes or habits of birds. It was probably a misinterpretation of the legend which made Perdix the nephew of Daedalus with the same story as TALOS (Ov. Met. viii. 241).

Peregrinus Proteus, a Cynic philosopher, born at Parium, on the Hellespont, in the reign of the Antonines. After a youth spent in debauchery and crimes, he visited Palestine, where he turned Christian, and by dint of hypocrisy attained to some authority in the Church. He next assumed the Cynic garb, and returned to his own native town, where, to obliterate the memory of his crimes, he divided his inheritance among the populace. He again set out on his travels, and after visiting many places, and adopting every method to make himself conspicuous, he at length resolved on publicly burning himself at the Olympic games, and carried his resolution into effect in the 236th Olympiad, A.D. 165. Lucian, who was present at the strange self-immolation of Peregrinus, has left us an account of his life. Gellius, who attended his lectures at Athens, commends the sincerity of his character and teaching. (Gell. xi. 12; Lucian, de Mort. Peregrin.)

Perenna, Anna. [ANNA.]

Perennis, succeeded Paternus in A.D. 183, as sole praefect of the praetorians, and, Commodus being completely sunk in debauchery and sloth, virtually ruled the empire. Having, however, rendered himself obnoxious to the soldiery, he was put to death by them in 186 or 187. Dio Cassius represents Perennis as a man of pure and upright life; but the other historians charge him with having encouraged the emperor in his career of profligacy. (Dio Cass. lxxii. 9; Vit. Commod. 5, 6.)

Perga (Πέργη: Περγᾶος: Murtana, Ru.), an ancient and important city of Pamphylia, lay a little inland, NE. of Attalia, between the rivers Catarrhactes and Cestrus, sixty stadia (six geog. miles) from the mouth of the former. It was a celebrated seat of the worship of Artemis (Strab. p. 667; Callin. Hymn. in Dian. 187). On an eminence near the city stood a very ancient and renowned temple of the goddess, at which a yearly festival was celebrated; and the coins of Perga bear images of the goddess and her temple. Under the later Roman empire, it was the capital of Pamphylia Secunda. It was the first place in Asia Minor visited by the apostle Paul on his first missionary journey (Acts, xiii. 13; see also xiv. 25). There are considerable ruins of the city about sixteen miles NE. of Adalia.

Pergāma, Pergāmīa, Pergāmon = Πium [TROJA].

Pergāmum, 1. less usually Pergāmus (Πέργανον in Polybius, Strabo, Appian, Josephus, Aelian and Plutarch; ἡ Πέργᾶμος in Dio Cassius and Ptolemy: Bergama), a celebrated city of Asia Minor, the capital of the kingdom of Pergamus, and afterwards of the Roman province of Asia, was situated in the district of S. Mytia called Teuthrania, in one of the most beautiful and fertile valleys in the world. It stood on the N. bank of the river Caïcus, at a spot where that river receives the united waters of two small tributaries, the Selinus, which flowed through the city, and, the Cétius, which washed its walls. The navigable river Caïcus connected it with the sea, at the Elaitic Gulf, from which its distance was somewhat less than twenty miles. (Strab. pp. 619, 624; Plin. v. 126; Paus. vi. 16, 1; Liv. xxxvii. 18.) It was built at the foot, and on the lowest slopes, of two steep hills, spurs of Mt. Pindasus (Paus. ii. 26, 8; Plin. v. 126), on one of which stood the upper town, or acropolis, the highest portion of which was the original settlement with a wall of its own. The upper town was enlarged after the kingdom was established, and spread under Eumenes II. still further. Under the Roman dominion the town extended over a large area in the plain. In this upper town the most noticeable buildings were the central Agora with the great altar of Zeus, the temple of Dionysus to the south, and to the north the great temple of Athene, beyond which was the famous library. North of this was the Augusteum or temple of Augustus and Rome, later known as the Trojaneum, a vast building on a terrace 300 yards long. N. of this, and on the highest point, was the smaller Julian temple. The theatre stood on the western slope below the library and the temple of Athene, and to the west of it was a great terrace running all along the slope from the temple of Dionysus to that of Augustus. Much further down the south slope was the gymnasium, which belonged to the lower town. This lower town occupied much of the ground now covered by the modern town and consequently not excavated, and it extended across the river Selinus, on the W. side of which were an amphitheatre, circus, Roman theatre, and still further west the temple of Asclepius.—The origin of the city is lost in mythical traditions, which ascribed its foundation to a colony from Arcadia under the Heracleid Telephus, and its name to Pergamus, a son of Pyrrhus and Andromache, who made himself king of Teuthrania by killing the king Arius in single combat (Paus. i. 4, 5, i. 11, 2). At all events, it was already in the time of Xenophon a very ancient city, with a mixed population of Teuthranians and Greeks (Xen. An. vii. 8, 8, Hell. iii. 1, 6); but it was not a place of much importance until the time of the successors of Alexander. After the defeat of Antigonus at Ipsus, in 301, the NW. part of Asia Minor was united to the Thracian kingdom of LYSIMACHUS, who enlarged and beautified the city of Pergamum, and used the acropolis as a treasury on account of its strength as a fortress. The command of the fortress was entrusted to PHILETAERUS, who, towards the end of the reign of Lysimachus, revolted to Seleucus, king of Syria, retaining, however, the fortress of Pergamum in his own hands; and upon the death of Seleucus, in 280, Philetaerus, established himself as an independent ruler. This is the date of the commencement of the kingdom of Pergamus, though the royal title was only assumed by the second successor of Philetaerus, ATTALUS I., after his great victory over the Gauls. The successive kings of Pergamum were: PHILETAERUS, 280–263; EUMENES I., 263–241; ATTALUS I., 241–197; EUMENES II., 197–159; ATTALUS II. PHILADELPHUS, 159–138; ATTALUS III. PHILOMETOR, 138–133. For the outline of their history see the articles. The kingdom reached its greatest extent after the defeat of Antiochus the Great by the Romans, in B.C. 190, when the Romans bestowed upon Eumenes II. the whole of Mysia, Lydia, both Phrygia, Lycaonia, Pisidia and Pamphylia. It was under the same king that Pergamum reached the height of its splendour, and that the celebrated library was founded, which for a long time rivalled that of Alexandria, and the formation of which occasioned the invention of parchment, charta Pergamena. This library was afterwards united to that of Alexandria, having been presented by Antony to Cleopatra. During its existence at Pergamum, it formed the centre of a great school of literature, which rivalled that of Alexandria. On the death of Attalus III. in B.C. 133, the kingdom, by a bequest in his will, passed to the Romans, who took possession of it in 130 after a contest with the usurper Aristonicus, and erected it into the province of Asia, with the city of Pergamum for its capital, which continued in such prosperity that Pliny calls it 'longe clarissimum Asiae.' The temple of Augustus at Pergamum was the chief sanctuary of the imperial worship in the province of Asia: the people of Pergamum were the chief temple-servants or νεωκόροι of the emperors (Tac. Ann. iv. 37; Dio Cass. li. 20; C.I.G. 1720, 2810). The city was an early seat of Christianity, and is one of the Seven Churches of Asia. Under the Byzantine emperors, the capital of the province of Asia was transferred to Ephesus, and Pergamum lost much of its importance. Among the celebrated natives of the city were the rhetorician Apollodorus and the physician Galen. But the most important proofs of the ancient splendour of Pergamum and of the magnificence of Attalus and Eumenes as patrons of art have been afforded by the excavations undertaken by the Prussian Government and carried out by Hamann, Conze, and others in 1871-1878. These excavations have established the sites of the buildings mentioned above, and have recovered in great measure their dimensions and plans, so that a reconstruction of the architecture can be made with tolerable certainty. Besides this, important sculptures of the Pergamene school have been recovered: especially the splendid colossal sculptures in high relief, now at Berlin, from the platform of the great altar of Zeus built by Eumenes II. They represent the battle of the gods and giants [see cut on p. 364]. In these, as also in the statues of vanquished Gauls dedicated by Attalus (of which the best known are the 'Dying Gaul' in the Capitol of Rome, often called the 'Dying Gladiator,' and another at Venice), the tendency of the Pergamene school to portray dramatically pathos, passion and excitement is evident [Dict. of Ant. art. Statuaria Ars].—2. A very ancient city of Crete, the foundation of which was ascribed to the Trojans who survived their city. The legislator Lycurgus was said to have died here, and his grave was shown. The site of the city is doubtful. Some place it at Perama, others at Platania. (Verg. Aen. iii. 133; Vell. Pat. i. 1; Plut. Lyc. 32.)

Pergāmus. [PERGAMUM.]

Pergē. [PERGA.]

Periander (Περικλῆς). 1. Son of Cypselus, whom he succeeded as tyrant of Corinth, B.C. 625, and reigned forty years, to B.C. 585. His rule was mild and beneficent at first, but afterwards became oppressive. According to the common story this change was owing to the advice of Thrasybulus, tyrant of Miletus, whom Periander had consulted on the best mode of maintaining his power, and who is said to have taken the messenger through a corn-field, cutting off, as he went, the tallest ears, and then to have dismissed him without committing himself to a verbal answer (Hdt. v. 92). The action, however, was rightly interpreted by Periander, who proceeded to rid himself of the most powerful nobles in the state. He made his power dreaded abroad as well as at home; and besides his conquest of Epidaurus, mentioned below, he kept Corcyra in subjection, and he planted a colony at Potidaea. He was, like many of the other Greek tyrants, a patron of literature and philosophy; and Arion and Anacharsis were in favour at his court. He was very commonly reckoned among the Seven Sages, though by some he was excluded from their number, and Myson of Chenae in Laconia was substituted in his room. The private life of Periander was marked by misfortune and cruelty. He married Melissa, daughter of Procles, tyrant of Epidaurus. She bore him two sons, Cypselus and Lycophron, and was passionately beloved by him; but he is said to have killed her by a blow during her pregnancy, having been roused to a fit of anger by a false accusation brought against her. His wife's death embittered the remainder of his days, partly through the remorse which he felt for the deed, partly through the alienation of his younger son, Lycophron, inexorably exasperated by his mother's fate. The young man's anger had been chiefly excited by Procles, and Periander in revenge attacked Epidaurus, and, having reduced it, took his father-in-law prisoner. Periander sent Lycophron to Corcyra; but when he was himself advanced in years, he summoned Lycophron back to Corinth to succeed to the tyranny, seeing that Cypselus, his elder son, was unfit to hold it, from deficiency of understanding. Lycophron refused to return to Corinth, as long as his father was there. Thereupon Periander offered to withdraw to Corcyra, if Lycophron would come home and take the government. To this he assented; but the Corcyraeans, not wishing to have Periander among them, put Lycophron to death. Periander shortly afterwards died of despondency, at the age of eighty, and after a reign of forty years, according to Diogenes Laërtius. He was succeeded by a relative, Psammetichus, son of Gordias. (Hdt. iii. 48-53, v. 92; Ar. Pol. v. 12.)—2. Tyrant of Ambracia, was contemporary with his more famous namesake of Corinth, to whom he was also related, being the son of Gorgus, who was son or brother to Cypselus. Periander was deposed by the people, probably after the death of the Corinthian tyrant (585). (Ar. Pol. v. 4, 10; Ael. V.H. xii. 35.)

Periboea (Περύβοια). 1. Wife of Icarius, and mother of Penelope. [ICARIUS, No. 2.]—2. Daughter of Alcathous, and wife of Telamon, by whom she became the mother of Ajax and Teucer. Some writers call her Eriboea. (Paus. i. 42, 1.)—3. Daughter of Hipponous, and wife of Oeneus, by whom she became the mother of Tydeus. [OENEUS.]—4. Wife of king Polybus of Corinth (Apollod. iii. 5, 7).

Pericles (Περικλῆς). 1. The greatest of Athenian statesmen, was the son of Xanthippus, and Agariste, both of whom belonged to the noblest families of Athens. The fortune of his parents procured for him a careful education, which his extraordinary abilities and diligence turned to the best account. He received instruction from Damon, Zeno of Elea, and Anaxagoras. With Anaxagoras he lived on terms of the most intimate friendship, till the philosopher was compelled to retire from Athens. From this great and original thinker Pericles was believed to have derived not only the cast of his mind, but the character of his eloquence, which, in the elevation of its sentiments and the purity and loftiness of its style, was the fitting expression of the force and dignity of his character and the grandeur of his conceptions. Of the oratory of Pericles no specimens remain to us, but it is described by ancient writers as characterised by singular force and energy. He was described as thundering and lightning when he spoke, and as carrying the weapons of Zeus upon his tongue. (Aristoph. Ach. 503; Cic. de Or. iii. 34; Plut. Moral. p. 118; Quintil. x. 1, 82.) In B.C. 469, Pericles began to take part in public affairs, forty years before his death, and was soon regarded as the head of the more democratical party in the state, in opposition to Cimon (Aristot. Æth. 27). He gained the favour of the people by the laws which he got passed for their benefit. It was at his instigation that his friend Ephialtes proposed in 461 the measure by which the Areopagus was deprived of those functions which rendered it formidable as an antagonist to the democratical party. This success was followed by the ostracism of Cimon, who was charged with Laconism; and Pericles was thus placed at the head of public affairs at Athens. His other chief democratic measures were the opening of the archonship to the Zeugitæ as well as to the wealthier classes, and even to men below the Zeugitæ, the payment of Dicasteries in order to attract all citizens to take part in legal business, and a system of state doles (analogous to those which were pushed to an extreme in a later age at Rome) by grants of money at festivals sufficient to provide the poorer citizens with seats in the theatre and with food for the festal days. Pericles was distinguished as a general as well as a statesman, and frequently commanded the Athenian armies in their wars with the neighbouring states. In 454 he commanded the Athenians in their campaigns against the Sicyonians and Acarnanians; in 448 he led the army which assisted the Phocians in the Sacred war; and in 445 he rendered the most signal service to the state by recovering the island of Euboea, which had revolted from Athens. Cimon had been previously recalled from exile, without any opposition from Pericles, but had died in 449. On his death the aristocratical party was headed by Thucydides, the son of Melesias, but on the ostracism of the latter in 444, the organised opposition of the aristocratical party was broken up, and Pericles was left without a rival. Throughout the remainder of his political course no one appeared to contest his supremacy; but the boundless influence which he possessed was never perverted by him to sinister or unworthy purposes. So far from being a mere selfish demagogue, he neither indulged nor courted the multitude. The next important event in which Pericles was engaged was the war against Samos, which had revolted from Athens, and which he subdued after an arduous campaign, 440. The poet Sophocles was one of the generals who fought with Pericles against Samos. (Thuc. i. 115-117; Diod. xii. 27.) For the next ten years till the outbreak of the Peloponnesian war, the Athenians were not engaged in any considerable military operations. During this period Pericles devoted especial attention to the Athenian navy, as her supremacy rested on her maritime superiority, and he adopted various judicious means for consolidating her empire over the islands of the Aegæan. He strengthened the hold of Athens in various districts by establishing the settlements of citizens called Cleruchies, in Euboea and in Thracian Chersonese, and by planting colonies at Amphipolis, Sinope, and even in Italy at Thurii. The funds derived from the tribute of the allies and from other sources were to a large extent devoted by him to the erection of those magnificent temples and public buildings which rendered Athens the wonder and admiration of Greece. Under his administration the Propylæa, and the Parthenon, and the Odeum were erected, as well as numerous other temples and public buildings. With the stimulus afforded by these works architecture and sculpture reached their highest perfection, and some of the greatest artists of antiquity were employed in erecting or adorning the buildings. The chief direction of the public edifices was entrusted to Phidias. [PHIDIAS.] These works, calling into activity almost every branch of industry and commerce at Athens, diffused universal prosperity while they proceeded, and thus contributed in this, as well as in other ways, to maintain the popularity and influence of Pericles. But he still had many enemies, who were not slow to impute to him base and unworthy motives. From the comic poets Pericles had to sustain numerous attacks. They exaggerated his power, spoke of his party as Pisistratids, and called upon him to swear that he was not about to assume the tyranny. His high character and strict probity, however, rendered all these attacks harmless. But as his enemies were unable to ruin his reputation by these means, they attacked him through his friends. Thus at the beginning of the Peloponnesian war his friends Phidias and Anaxagoras, and his mistress Aspasia, were all accused before the people. Phidias was condemned and cast into prison [PHIDIAS]; Anaxagoras was also sentenced to pay a fine and quit Athens [ANAXAGORAS]; and Aspasia was only acquitted through the entreaties and tears of Pericles. (Plut. Pericl. 24; Diod. xii. 39; Athen. p. 589.) The Peloponnesian war has been falsely ascribed to the ambitious schemes of Pericles. It is true that he counselled the Athenians not to yield to the demands of the Lacedæmonians, and he pointed out the immense advantages which the Athenians possessed in carrying on the war; but he did this because he saw that war was inevitable, and that as long as Athens retained the great power which she then possessed, Sparta would never rest contented. On the outbreak of the war in 431 a Peloponnesian army under Archidamus invaded Attica; and upon his advice the Athenians conveyed their moveable property into the city, and their cattle and beasts of burden to Euboea, and allowed the Peloponnesians to desolate Attica without opposition. Next year (430), when the Peloponnesians again invaded Attica, Pericles pursued the same policy as before. In this summer the plague made its appearance in Athens. The Athenians, being exposed to the devastation of the war and the plague at the same time, began to turn their thoughts to peace, and looked upon Pericles as the author of all their distresses, inasmuch as he had persuaded them to go to war. Pericles attempted to calm the public ferment; but such was the irritation against him that he was sentenced to pay a fine. (Thuc. ii. 64; Plut. Luc.) The ill feeling of the people having found this vent, Pericles soon resumed his accustomed sway, and was again elected one of the generals for the ensuing year (429). Meantime Pericles had suffered in common with his fellow-citizens. The plague carried off most of his near connexions. His son Xanthippus, a profligate and undutiful youth, his sister, and most of his intimate friends died of it. Still he maintained unmoved his calm bearing and philosophic composure. At last his only surviving legitimate son, Paralus, a youth of greater promise than his brother, fell a victim. The firmness of Pericles then at last gave way; as he placed the funeral garland on the head of the lifeless youth he burst into tears and sobbed aloud. He had one son remaining, his child by Aspasia; and he was allowed to enrol this son in his own tribe and give him his own name. In the autumn of 429 Pericles himself died of a lingering sickness. When at the point of death, as his friends were gathered round his bed, recalling his virtues and enumerating his triumphs, Pericles overhearing their remarks, said that they had forgotten his greatest praise: that no Athenian through his means had been made to put on mourning. He survived the commencement of the war two years and six months. (Thuc. ii. 65.) The name of the wife of Pericles is not mentioned. She had been the wife of Hipponicus, by whom she was the mother of Callias. She bore two sons to Pericles, Xanthippus and Paralus. She lived unhappily with Pericles, and a divorce took place by mutual consent, when Pericles connected himself with Aspasia. Of his strict probity he left the decisive proof in the fact that at his death he was found not to have added a single drachma to his hereditary property. The people by a revulsion of feeling showed their honour for his memory by a decree which legitimatised his son by Aspasia.—2. Son of the preceding, by Aspasia, was one of the generals at the battle of Arginusae, and was put to death by the Athenians with the other generals, 406.

Pēriclēmēnos (Περικλέμενος). 1. One of the Argonauts, was son of Neleus and Chloris, and brother of Nestor (Od. xi. 285). Poseidon gave him the power of changing himself into different forms, and conferred upon him great strength, but he was nevertheless slain by Heracles at the capture of Pylos. (Apollod. i. 9, 9; Ov. Met. xii. 556–576; Ap. Rh. i. 156.)—2. Son of Poseidon and Chloris, the daughter of Tiresias, of Thebes. In the war of the Seven against Thebes he was believed to have killed Parthenopaeus; and when he pursued Amphiaraus, the latter by the command of Zeus was swallowed up by the earth. (Eur. Phoen. 1157; Paus. ix. 18, 6; AMPHIARAUS.)

Pēriēres (Περιήρης), son of Aeolus and Enarete, king of Messene, was the father of Aphareus and Leucippus by Gorgophone. In some traditions Perieres was called a son of Cynortas, and besides the sons above mentioned he is also the father of Tyndareos and Icarus. (Apollod. i. 7, 3, iii. 10, 3; Paus. iv. 2, 2.)

Pērilāus (Περίλαος), son of Icarus, and brother of Penelope (Paus. viii. 34, 2).

Pērillos (Περίλλος), a statuary, was the maker of the bronze bull of the tyrant Phalaris, respecting which see further under PHALARIS. Like the makers of other instruments of death, Perillos is said to have become one of the victims of his own handiwork. (Ov. A. A. i. 653.)

Pērinthus (Περίνθος: Περίνθιος: Eregli), an important town in Thrace on the Propontis, was founded by the Samians about B.C. 559 (Plut. Q. G. 56). It was situated twenty-two miles

W. of Selymbria on a small peninsula, and was built on the slope of a hill with rows of houses rising above each other like seats in an amphitheatre. It is celebrated for the obstinate resistance which it offered to Philip of Macedon, at which time it was a more powerful place than Byzantium. (Diod. xvi. 74; Plut. Phoc. 14; Procop. Aed. iv. 9.) Under the Romans it still continued to be a flourishing town, being the point at which most of the roads met leading to Byzantium. The commercial importance of the town is attested by the number of its coins which are still extant. At a later time, but not earlier than the fourth century of the Christian era, we find it called Heraclea, which occurs sometimes alone without any addition and sometimes in the form of Heraclea Thraciae or Heraclea Perinthus.

Pēriphas (Περίφας), an Attic autochthon, previous to the time of Cecrops, was a priest of Apollo, and on account of his virtues was made king of the country. In consequence of the honours paid to him, Zeus wished to destroy him, but at the request of Apollo he was changed by Zeus into an eagle, and his wife into a bird. (Ant. Lib. 6; Ov. Met. vii. 400.)

Pēriphētes (Περιφήτης), son of Hephaestus and Anticlea, surnamed Corynetes—that is, Club-bearer—was a robber at Epidaurus, who slew travellers with an iron club. Theseus at last killed him and took his club for his own use. [THESEUS.]

Permessus (Περμησσός: Kefalari), a river in Boeotia, which descends from Mt. Helicon, unites with the Olmuis, and falls into the lake Copais near Haliartus (Strab. pp. 407, 411).

Pernē (Πέρνη), a little island off the coast of Ionia, opposite to the territory of Miletus, to which an earthquake united it (Plin. ii. 204).

Pēro (Πηρώ), daughter of Neleus and Chloris, was married to Bias, and celebrated for her beauty (Od. xi. 286; Paus. x. 31, 9).

Perorsi (Πέρορσοι), a people on the coast of Africa, opposite the Ins. Fortunatae (Ptol. iv. 6, 16).

Perperēna (Περπερήνα, and other forms), a small town of Mysia, S. of Adramyttium, near which were copper-mines and celebrated vineyards. Said to be the place at which Thucydides died. (Strab. p. 607; Plin. v. 122.)

Perperna or Perpenna. 1. M., praetor B.C. 135, when he carried on war against the slaves in Sicily; and consul 130, when he defeated Aristonicus in Asia, and took him prisoner. He died near Pergamum on his return to Rome in 129. (Liv. Ep. 59; Vell. Pat. ii. 4; Just. xxxvi. 4.)—2. M., son of the last, consul 92, and censor 86. He is mentioned by ancient writers as an instance of longevity. He attained the age of 98 years, and died in 49, the year in which the Civil war broke out between Caesar and Pompey. (Val. Max. viii. 13; Dio Cass. xli. 14; Plin. vii. 156.) He took no prominent part in the agitated times in which he lived.—

3. M. Perperna Vento, son of the last, joined the Marian party in the Civil war, and was raised to the praetorship. After the conquest of Italy by Sulla, in 82, Perperna fled to Sicily, which he quitted, however, upon the arrival of Pompey shortly afterwards. On the death of Sulla, in 78, Perperna joined the consul M. Lepidus in his attempt to overthrow the new aristocratical constitution, and retired with him to Sardinia on the failure of this attempt. Lepidus died in Sardinia in the following year, 77, and Perperna with the remains of his army crossed over to Spain and joined Sertorius.

Perperna was jealous of the ascendancy of Sertorius, and after serving under him some years he and his friends assassinated Sertorius at a banquet in 72. His death brought the war to a close. Perperna was defeated by Pompey, taken prisoner, and put to death. (App. B. C. i. 107-115; Plut. Pomp. 10, 20, Sert. 15-27.)

Perrhaebi (Περραιβοί or Περαιβοί), a powerful and warlike people, who from prehistoric times occupied a part of Thessaly. According to Strabo they had been driven to the more mountainous north of Thessaly from the south by the Lapithae (Strab. pp. 61, 439, 440); migrated from Euboea to the mainland, and settled in the districts of Hestiaeotis and Pelasgiotis. Hence the northern part of this country is frequently called Perrhaebia (Περραιβία, Περαιβία), though it never formed one of the regular Thessalian provinces. (Thuc. iv. 78; Liv. xxxi. 43.) Homer places the Perrhaebi in the neighbourhood of the Thessalian Dodona and the river Titaresius (Il. ii. 749); and at a later time the name of Perrhaebia was applied to the district bounded by Macedonia and the Cambunian mountains on the N., by Pindus on the W., by the Peneus on the S. and SE., and by the Peneus and Ossa on the E. The Perrhaebi were members of the Amphictyonic League. At an early period they were subdued by the Lapithae; at the time of the Peloponnesian war they were subject to the Thessalians, and subsequently to Philip of Macedon; but at the time of the Roman wars in Greece they appear independent of Macedonia.

Perrhidae (Περρίδαι), an Attic demus near Aphidna, belonging to the tribe Antiochis.

when the city was taken by Aratus, B.C. 243. (Paus. ii. 8, 4, vii. 8, 3; Athen. pp. 162, 607.)

Persē (Πέρση), daughter of Oceanus, and wife of Helios (the Sun), by whom she became the mother of Aëtes and Circe (Od. ix. 139; Hes. Th. 356, 956). Also called the mother of Pasiphaë and Perses (Apollod. i. 9, 1).

Persēs. [HECATE.]

Persēphōnē (Περσεφόνη), called Proserpina by the Romans, the daughter of Zeus and Demeter. In Homer she is called Persephonia (Περσεφόνη); the form Persephone first occurs in Hesiod. But besides these forms of the name, we also find Persephassa, Phersephassa, Persephatta, Phersephatta, Pherrephassa, Pherephatta, and Phersephonia. The Latin Proserpina is probably only a corruption of the Greek, for which later etymologists sought an explanation in the word proserpo, signifying the germination of the seed (August. C. D. iv. 8, vii. 20; Arnob. iii. 33). The name Kore (Κόρη, Ion. Κόρη), that is, the Daughter, namely, of Demeter, was adopted in Attica when the Eleusinian mysteries were introduced, and the two were frequently called The Mother and the Daughter (ἡ Μητήρ καὶ ἡ Κόρη). Homer describes her as the wife of Hades, and the dread and terrible queen of the Shades, who rules over the souls of the dead, along with her husband (Il. ix. 457, 565; Od. x. 494, xi. 634). Her epithets in the Iliad are ἐπαινή (which is best explained as meaning 'awful'), and in the Odyssey ἐπαινή and ἀγανή (by which the same idea is intended), and once ἀγνή. Hence she is called by later writers Juno Inferna, Averna, and Stygia; and the Erinnyes are Persephone enthroned. (Gerhard, Archäolog. Zeit. tav. 11.)

Persabōra or Perisabōra (Περσαβώρα: Anbar), a fortified city of Babylonia, on the W. side of the Euphrates, where the canal called Maarsares left the river (Zos. iii. 17).

Persae. [PERSIS.]

Persaeus (Περσαίος), a Stoic philosopher, was a native of Cittium in Crete, and a disciple of Zeno. He lived for some years at the court of Antigonos Gonatas, with whom he was in high favour. Antigonos appointed him to the chief command in Corinth, where he was slain said to have been her daughters by Pluto. In this account Homer probably follows the older conception of the goddess, whose very name is by some writers connected with death. There is no trace in the Homeric poems of her being regarded as the daughter of Demeter; still less of her being in any sense a beneficent deity. Homer speaks of her as the daughter of Zeus (Od. xi. 217), and it is possible that he regarded her as the daughter of Zeus and Styx, as some traditions did (Apollod. i. 3, 1). Her grim character appears also in the ancient Arcadian worship, where she was called Δέσποινα, and was described as the daughter of Demeter Erinys and Poseidon (Paus. viii. 37). Her abode, the realm of the dead, is described in the Iliad as beneath the earth; in the Odyssey the entrance to it seems to be placed at the western extremity of the earth, on the frontiers of the lower world. The story of her being carried off by Hades or Pluto against her will is not mentioned by Homer, unless those are right who believe that the Homeric epithet κλυτόπωλος, applied to Hades, has this reference (Il. v. 654; Schol. ad loc.). The earliest definite mention of it is in Hesiod (Th. 912). The manner in which she was carried off while she was gathering flowers (traditionally the narcissus as the flower of death: see p. 586, b), the scene of this event, the wanderings of her mother in search of her, and the worship of the two goddesses in Attica at the festival of the Eleusinia, are related under DEMETER. In the mystical theories of the Orphics, Persephone is described as the all-pervading goddess of nature, who both produces and destroys everything; and she is therefore connected, or identified with, other mystic divinities, such as Isis, Rhea, Ge, Hestia, Pandora, Artemis, Hecate. This mystic Persephone is further said to have become by Zeus the mother of Dionysus, Iacchus, Zagreus or Sabazius. (Schol. ad Aristoph. Ran. 326; Nonn. Dionys. xxxi. 67; Cic. N. D. iii. 23, 58; Diod. iv. 4). The Romans adopted the legends of Persephone, whom they called Proserpina [see above], but compared her with their own deity Libera [see p. 488, a]. The myth of Persephone, as fully developed in the Hymn to Demeter, and in later poems, expressed the renewal of vegetation in spring, especially of the corn, after it has been buried underground in the winter, and this again in the mysteries was probably carried further so as to symbolise a future life [see more fully on pp. 277, b; 375, b]. It was natural, therefore, that the festivals of the goddess should be in the autumn seed-time, at the Greater Eleusinia, and in the spring at the Anthesphoria and at the Lesser Eleusinia [see Dict. of Ant. s.vv.]. The death of the vegetation was symbolised by the marriage of Persephone, or Kore, with Hades or Pluto, a marriage which preserved in its story the old form of marriage by capture. Persephone is often represented enthroned with Hades [see cuts on pp. 375, 376]; often she is distinguished by a diadem or a calathus on her head: often she has a torch or crossed torches in her hand; her symbols are also a cornucopia, ears of corn, the pomegranate, or a cock (probably as the herald of the dawn, i.e. of a new life).

Persēpōlis (Περσέπολις, Περσαίπολις: in the middle ages, Istakhar: now Takhti-Jemshid, i.e. Throne of Jemshid, is the Greek name of the great city which succeeded Pasargada as the capital of Persis and of the Persian empire (Strab. p. 729; Diod. xvii. 70; Curt. v. 4, 6; Ptol. vi. 4, 4). It is not mentioned by the earlier Greek historians who wrote before the Macedonian conquest. Neither Herodotus, Xenophon, nor Ctesias speaks of Persepolis, though they mention Babylon, Susa, and Ecbatana, as the capitals of the empire. The most probable explanation of this silence is that ambassadors or refugees from foreign states were received by the Great King either at his winter quarters in Susa, or at his summer residence in Ecbatana; and that he came to Persepolis, a temperate region, in spring, partly for religious ceremonies and partly to receive tribute and offerings of first-fruits, and to consider the reports of his chief officials. Its foundation is sometimes ascribed to Cyrus the Great, but more generally to his son Cambyses. On the great platform stood the vast range of palaces and halls, in which the kings received their officers and deputations in state, and sacrificed at the fire-altars. Here were stored the treasures accumulated from long years of tribute which Alexander found, and also the Avesta, which Darius is said to have placed there written in gold letters on 12,000 ox-hides. Over the plain below the palace-platform extended the city itself, occupied by traders and artisans. Persepolis was also a royal burial-place. It was greatly enlarged and adorned by Darius I. and Xerxes, and preserved its splendour till after the Macedonian conquest, when it was burnt; Alexander, as the story goes, setting fire to the palace with his own hand, at the end of a revel, at the instigation of the courtesan Thais, B.C. 331. It was situated in the heart of Persis, in the part called Hollow Persis (κοίλη Πέρσις), not far from the border of the Carmanian Desert, in a beautiful and healthy valley, watered by the river Araxes (Bend-Emir), and its tributaries the Medus and the Cyrus. Its wealth and importance were nearly, though not entirely, destroyed by Alexander's occupation; but it was plundered again by Antiochus, 164 B.C., and in later times under the name of Istakhar was for some centuries the residence of a Parthian viceroy. Its ruins are in the highest degree striking and full of interest, and are important for the history of ancient Persian art. The numerous sculptured figures represent the kings of Persia, but do not, like the sculptures of Egypt and Assyria, describe historical events. An examination of the ruins has shown that the citadel with a triple wall, which Diodorus mentions, had no real existence.

Perseus (Πέρσης). 1. Son of the Titan Crius and Eurybia, and husband of Asteria, by whom he became the father of Hecate (Hes. Th. 409; Apollod. i. 2, 2).—2. Son of Perseus and Andromeda, described by the Greeks as the founder of the Persian nation (Hdt. vii. 61; Apollod. ii. 4, 5).—3. Son of Helios (the Sun) and Perse, and brother of Aeëtes and Circe (Apollod. ii. 4, 5).

Perseus (Περσεύς), the famous Argive hero (perhaps, as some think, originally a deity of light or of the sun), was a son of Zeus and Danaë, and a grandson of Acrisius (Il. xiv. 320). An oracle had told Acrisius that he was doomed to perish by the hands of Danaë's son; and he therefore shut up his daughter in an apartment made of brass or stone. But Zeus having changed himself into a shower of gold, came down through the roof of the prison, and became by her the father of Perseus. From this tradition, which is commonly held to signify the rays of the sun streaming into a chamber, Perseus is sometimes called aurigena (Soph. Ant. 944; Lycophr. 888; Ov. Met. v. 250; Hor. Od. iii. 16). As soon as Acrisius discovered that Danaë had given birth to a son, he put both mother and son into a chest, and threw them into the sea (Simonid. Fr. 7); but Zeus caused the chest to land in the island of Seriphos, one of the Cyclades, where Dictys, a fisherman, found them, and carried them to Polydectes, the king of the country. They were treated with kindness; but Polydectes having afterwards fallen in love with Danaë, and wishing to get rid of Perseus, who had meantime grown up to manhood, sent him away to fetch the head of Medusa, one of the Gorgons. Guided by Hermes and Athene, Perseus first went to the Graeae, the sisters of the Gorgons, took from them their one tooth and their one eye [see p. 371, b] and would not restore them until they showed him the way to the nymphs who possessed the winged sandals, the magic wallet, and the helmet of Hades, which rendered the wearer invisible. Having received from the Nymphs these gifts, from Hermes a sickle, and from Athene a mirror, he mounted into the air, and came to the Gorgons, who dwelt near Tartessus on the coast of the Ocean. [GORGONES.] He found them asleep, and cut off the head of Medusa, looking at her reflection in the mirror, for a sight of the monster herself would have changed him into stone. Perseus put her head into the wallet which he carried on his back, and as he went away he was pursued by the other Gorgons; but his helmet, which rendered him invisible, enabled him to escape in safety. (Hes. Scut. 220-230; Eur. El. 460; Hyg. Astr. ii. 12; Paus. v. 18. 1.) Perseus then proceeded to Aethiopia, where he saved and married Andromeda. [ANDROMEDA.] Perseus is also said to have come to the Hyperboreans, by whom he was hospitably received, and to Atlas, whom he changed by means of the Gorgon's head into the mountain of the same name. On his return to Seriphos, he found his mother with Dictys in a temple, whither they had fled from the violence of Polydectes. Perseus then went to the palace of Polydectes, and changed him and all his guests into stone. (Pind. Pyth. xii. 10; Strab. p. 487.) Dictys was made king. Perseus gave the winged sandals and the helmet to Hermes, who restored them to the nymphs and to Hades, and the head of Gorgon to Athene, who placed it in the middle of her shield or breastplate. He then went to Argos, accompanied by Danaë and Andromeda. Acrisius, remembering the oracle, escaped to Larissa, in the country of the Pelasgians; but Perseus followed him in order to persuade him to return. Some writers state that Perseus, on his return to Argos, found Proetus, who had expelled his brother Acrisius, in possession of the kingdom; and that Perseus slew Proetus, and was afterwards killed by Megapenthes, the son of Proetus (Ov. Met. v. 236; Hyg. Fab. 244). The more common tradition, however, relates that when Teutamidas, king of Larissa, celebrated games in honour of his guest Acrisius, Perseus, who took part in them, accidentally hit the foot of Acrisius with the discus, and thus killed him (Paus. ii. 16, 2). Acrisius was buried outside the city of Larissa, and Perseus, leaving the kingdom of Argos to Megapenthes, the son of Proetus, received from him in exchange the government of Tiryns. According to another account, Perseus remained in Argos, and successfully opposed the introduction of the Bacchic orgies (Paus. ii. 20, 4). An Italian tradition made the chest with Danaë and her son float to the coast of Italy, where king Pylumnus married Danaë and founded Ardea (Verg. Aen. vii. 410; Serv. ad Aen. vii. 372, viii. 345). Perseus is said to have founded the towns of Midea and Mycenae. By Andromeda he became the father of Perses, Alcaeus, Sthenelus, Heleus, Mestor, Electryon, Gorgophone, and Autochthe. Perseus was worshipped as a hero in several places. Herodotus speaks of a temple and statue of Perseus at Chemmis in Egypt (ii. 91).

Perseus or Perses (Περσεύς), the last king of Macedonia, was the eldest son of Philip V., and reigned eleven years, from B.C. 178 to 168. Before his accession he persuaded his father to put to death his younger brother Demetrius, whom he suspected that the Roman senate intended to set up as a competitor for the throne on the death of Philip. Immediately after his accession he began to make preparations for war with the Romans, which he knew to be inevitable, though seven years elapsed before actual hostilities commenced. The war broke out in 171. The first year of the war was marked by no striking action. The consul P. Licinius Crassus first suffered a defeat in Thessaly in an engagement between the cavalry of the two armies, but subsequently gained a slight advantage over the king's troops.—The second year of the war (170), in which the consul A. Hostilius Mancinus commanded, also passed over without any important battle, but was on the whole favourable to Perseus.—The third year (169), in which the consul Q. Marcius Philippus commanded, again produced no important results. The length to which the war had been unexpectedly protracted, and the ill success of the Roman arms, had by this time excited a general feeling in favour of the Macedonian monarch; but the ill-timed avarice of Perseus, who refused to advance the sum of money which Eumenes, king of Pergamus, demanded, deprived him of this valuable ally; and the same unseasonable niggardliness likewise deprived him of the services of 20,000 Gaulish mercenaries, who had actually advanced into Macedonia to his support, but retired on failing to obtain their stipulated pay. He was thus obliged to carry on the contest against Rome single-handed.—The fourth year of the war (168) was also the last. The new consul, L. Aemilius Paulus, defeated Perseus with great loss in a decisive battle fought near Pydna on June 22, 168. Perseus took refuge in the island of Samothrace, where he shortly afterwards surrendered with his children to the praetor Cn. Octavius. When brought before Aemilius, he is said to have degraded himself by the most abject supplications: but he was treated with kindness by the Roman general. The following year he was carried to Italy, where he was compelled to adorn the splendid triumph of his conqueror (Nov. 30, 167), and afterwards cast into a dungeon, from whence, however, the intercession of Aemilius procured his release, and he was permitted to end his days in an honourable captivity at Alba. He survived his removal thither a few years, and died, according to some accounts, by voluntary starvation, while others—fortunately with less probability—represent him as falling a victim to the cruelty of his guards, who deprived him of sleep. Perseus had been twice married: the name of his first wife, whom he is said to have killed with his own hand in a fit of passion, is not recorded; his second, Laodice, was the daughter of Seleucus IV. pator. He left two children: a son, Alexander, and a daughter, both apparently by his second marriage, as they were mere children when carried to Rome. Besides these, he had adopted his younger brother Philip, who was regarded by him as the heir to his throne, and became the partner of his captivity. Persia. [PERSIS.]

Persici Montes. [PARSICI MONTES.]

Persicus Sinus, Persicum Mare (ὁ Περσικὸς κόλπος, ἡ Περσικὴ θάλασσα, and other forms: the Persian Gulf), is the name given by the later geographers to the great gulf of the Mare Erythraeum (Indian Ocean), extending in a SE. direction from the mouths of the Tigris, between the NE. coast of Arabia and the opposite coast of Susiana, Persis, and Carmania, to the narrow strait formed by the long tongue of land which projects from the N. side of Oman in Arabia, by which strait it is connected with the open gulf of the Indian Ocean called Paragon Sinus (Gulf of Oman). The earlier Greek writers know nothing of it. Herodotus does not distinguish it from the Erythraean Sea. The voyage of Alexander's admiral Nearchus from the Indus to the Tigris made it better known, but still the ancient geographers in general give inaccurate statements of its form. (Strab. pp. 78, 727, 765; Ptol. vi. 3, 1, vi. 19, 1; Plin. vi. 41; Mel. iii. 8.)

Persides (Περσείδης, Περσηϊάδης), a patronymic given to the descendants of Perses.

Persis, and very rarely Persia (ἡ Πέρσις, and ἡ Περσική, sc. γῆ, the fem. adjectives, the masc. being Περσικός, from the ethnic noun Πέρσης, pl. Πέρσαι, fem. Πέρσις, Latin Persa and Perses, pl. Persae, Persia), originally a small mountainous district of W. Asia, lying on the NE. side of the Persian Gulf, and surrounded on the other sides by mountains and deserts. On the NW. and N. it was separated from Susiana, Media and Parthia by the little river Oroatis, or Orosis, and by M. Parachoathras; and on the E. from Carmania by no definite boundaries in the Desert. The only level part of the country was the strip of sea-coast called Persis Paralia: the rest was intersected with branches of M. Parachoathras, the valleys between which were watered by several rivers, the chief of which were the

ARAXES, CYPRUS, and MEDUS: in this part of the country, which was called Koile Persis, stood the capital cities PASARGADA and PERSEPOLIS. The country has a remarkable variety of climate and of products: the N. mountainous regions being comparatively cold, but with good pastures, especially for camels; the middle slopes having a temperate climate and producing abundance of fruit and wine; and the S. strip of coast being intensely hot and sandy, with little vegetation except the palm-tree (Strab. p. 727; Arrian, Ind. 39; Plin. vi. 115). The inhabitants were a collection of nomad peoples of the Indo-European stock, who called themselves by a name which is given in Greek as Artaei (Hdt. vii. 61) and which, like the kindred Median name of Arii (Ἄριοι), signifies noble or honourable, and is applied especially to the true worshippers of Ormuzd and followers of Zoroaster: it was, in fact, rather a title of honour than a proper name; the true collective name of the people seems to have been Pāraça. According to Herodotus, they were divided into three classes or castes: first, the nobles or warriors, containing the three tribes of the PASARGADAE, who were the most noble, and to whom the royal family of the Achaemenidae belonged, the Maraphii and the Maspii; secondly, the agricultural and other settled tribes—namely, the Panthialaei, Derusiaei, and Germanii; thirdly, the tribes which remained nomadic—namely, the Daae, Mardi, Dropici, and Sagartii, names common to other parts of W. and Central Asia. The Persians had a close ethnical affinity to the Medes, and followed the same customs and religion [MAGI; ZOROASTER]. The simple and warlike habits which they cultivated in their native mountains, preserved them from the corrupting influences which enervated their Median brethren; so that from being, as we find them at the beginning of their recorded history, the subject member of the Medo-Persian kingdom, they obtained the supremacy under CYRUS, the founder of the great Persian Empire, B.C. 559. An account of the revolution by which the supremacy was transferred from the Medes to the Persians is given under CYRUS. At this time there existed in W. Asia two other great kingdoms: the Lydian, which comprised nearly the whole of Asia Minor, W. of the river Halys, which separated it from the Medo-Persian territories; and the Babylonian, which, besides the Tigris and Euphrates valley, embraced Syria and Palestine. By the successive conquest of these kingdoms, the dominions of Cyrus were extended on the W. as far as the coast of the Euxine, the Aegaeon, and the Mediterranean, and to the frontier of Egypt. Turning his arms in the opposite direction, he subdued Bactria, and effected some conquests beyond the Oxus, but fell in battle with the Massagetae. [CYRUS.] His son Cambyses added Egypt to the empire. [CAMBYSES.] Upon his death the Magian priesthood made an effort to restore the supremacy to the Medes [MAGI; SMERDIS], which was defeated by the conspiracy of the seven Persian chieftains, whose success conferred the crown upon Darius, the son of Hystaspes. This king was at first occupied with crushing rebellions in every part of the empire, and with the two expeditions against Scythia and Cyrenaica, of which the former entirely failed, and the latter was only partially successful. He conquered Thrace; and on the E. he added the valley of the Indus to the kingdom; but in this quarter the power of Persia seems never to have been much more than nominal. The Persian empire had now reached its greatest extent, from Thrace and Cyrenaica on the W. to the Indus on the E., and from the Euxine, the Caucasus (or rather a little below it), the Caspian, and the Oxus and Jaxartes on the N. to Aethiopia, Arabia, and the Erythraean Sea on the S., and it embraced, in Europe, Thrace and some of the Greek cities N. of the Euxine; in Africa, Egypt and Cyrenaica; in Asia, on the W., Palestine, Phoenicia, Syria, the several districts of Asia Minor, Armenia, Mesopotamia, Assyria, Babylonia, Susiana, Atropatene, Great Media; on the N., Hyrcania, Margiana, Bactriana, and Sogdiana; on the E., the Paropamisus, Arachosia, and India (i.e. part of the Punjab and Scinde); on the S., Persis, Carmania and Gedrosia; and in the centre of the E. part, Parthia, Aria, and Drangiana. The capital cities of the empire were Babylon, Susa, Ecbatana in Media, and—though these were seldom, if ever, used as residences—Pasargada and Persepolis in Persis. (See the several articles.) Of this vast empire Darius undertook the organisation, and divided it into twenty satrapies, of which a full account is given by Herodotus. For the other details of his reign, and especially the commencement of the wars with Greece, see DARIUS. Of the remaining period of the ancient Persian history, till the Macedonian conquest, a sufficient abstract will be found under the names of the several kings, a list of whom is now subjoined:—(1) CYRUS, B.C. 559–529; (2) CAMBYSES, 529–522; (3) Usurpation of the pseudo-SMERDIS, seven months, 522–521; (4) DARIUS I. son of Hystaspes, 521–485; (5) XERXES I., 485–465; (6) Usurpation of ARTABANUS, seven months, 465–464; (7) ARTAXERXES I. LONGIMANUS, 464–425; (8) XERXES II., two months; (9) SOGDIANUS, seven months, 425–424; (10) Ochus, or DARIUS II. Nothus, 424–405; (11) ARTAXERXES II. Mnemon, 405–359; (12) Ochus, or ARTAXERXES III., 359–338; (13) ARSES, 338–336; (14) DARIUS III. Codomannus, 336–331 [ALEXANDER]. Here the ancient history of Persia ends, as a kingdom; but, as a people, the Persians proper, under the influence especially of their religion, preserved their existence, and at length regained their independence on the downfall of the Parthian Empire [SASSANIDAE].—In reading the Roman poets it must be remembered that they constantly use Persae, as well as Medi, as a general term for the peoples E. of the Euphrates and Tigris, and especially for the Parthians.

A. Persius Flaccus, the poet, was a Roman knight connected by blood and marriage with persons of the highest rank, and was born at Volaterrae in Etruria on the 4th of December, A.D. 34. The particulars of his life are derived from the Vita A. Persii Flacci by Valerius Probus, probably prefixed to his edition of Persius. There is no ground for the statement sometimes made that the Life was by Suetonius. He received the first rudiments of education in his native town, remaining there until the age of 12, and then removed to Rome, where he studied grammar under the celebrated Remmius Palaemon, and rhetoric under Verginius Flavius. He was afterwards the pupil of Cornutus the Stoic, who became the guide, philosopher and friend of his future life. While yet a youth he was on familiar terms with Lucan, with Caesius Bassus the lyric poet, and with other men of literary eminence (Vit. Pers.; Quint. x.

1, 9; Mart. iv. 29, 7). He was tenderly beloved by the high-minded Paetus Thrasea, and seems to have been well worthy of such affection. He died on the 24th of November, A.D. 62, before he had completed his 28th year. (Vita Persii, ascribed to Probus.) The extant works of Persius, who, we are told, wrote seldom and slowly, consist of six short Satires, extending in all to 650 hexameter lines, and were left in an unfinished state. They were slightly corrected after his death by Cornutus, while Caesius Bassus was permitted, at his own earnest request, to be the editor. In boyhood Persius had written some other poems, which were destroyed by the advice of Cornutus. Few productions have ever enjoyed more popularity than the Satires, especially in the middle ages; but it would seem that Persius owes not a little of his fame to a cause which naturally might have produced an effect directly the reverse—to the multitude of strange terms, proverbial phrases, far-fetched metaphors, and abrupt transitions which everywhere embarrass our progress. The difficulty experienced in removing these impediments necessarily impresses both the words and the ideas upon everyone who has carefully studied his pages, and hence no author clings more closely to the memory. In judging of the ability of Persius it must be recollected that the writings which he has left are what would have been regarded as the poems of his immaturity if his life had been of an average length. He is an imitator of Horace, whose influence appears throughout the six Satires, and it is an imitation marked by stiffness, with none of the grace and ease of the original. But there are signs of power in the arrangement of his subject, and in the success with which he sometimes concentrates a number of thoughts in a few telling words. Here and there are short passages of real force and merit: for instance, a promise of really powerful poetry seems to be given by the single line—

'Virtutem videant intabescantque relictæ.' (iii. 38.)

Pertinax, Helvius, Roman emperor from January 1st to March 28th, A.D. 193, was of humble origin, born at Alba Pompeia, in Liguria, at first a schoolmaster, afterwards, through the interest of his father's friend Lollius Avitus, obtained the post of centurion, and, having distinguished himself in the Parthian wars, in Britain and in Moesia, rose to the highest military and civil commands in the reigns of M. Aurelius and Commodus. On the murder of Commodus on the last day of December, 192, Pertinax, who was then sixty-six years of age, was reluctantly persuaded to accept the empire. He commenced his reign by introducing extensive reforms into the civil and military administration of the empire; but the troops, who had been accustomed both to ease and licence under Commodus, were disgusted with the discipline which he attempted to enforce upon them, and murdered their new sovereign after a reign of two months and twenty-seven days. (Capitol. Pertinax; Dio Cass. lxxi. 3–lxxiii. 10.) On his death the praetorian troops put up the empire to sale, which was purchased by M. Didius Julianus. [See p. 286, a.]

Pērusia (Perusinus: Perugia), an ancient city in the E. part of Etruria between the lake Trasimenus and the Tiber, and one of the twelve cities of the Etruscan confederacy. There is no improbability in the statement of Servius that it was an Umbrian city which fell into the hands of the Etruscans (Serv. ad Aen. x. 201). It was situated on a hill, and was strongly fortified by nature and by art. In conjunction with the other cities of Etruria, it long resisted the power of the Romans, and at a later period it was made a Roman colony (Liv. ix. 37, x. 30, xxiii. 17). It is memorable in the civil wars as the place in which L. Antonius, the brother of the triumvir took refuge, when he was no longer able to oppose Octavianus in the field, and where he was kept closely blockaded by Octavianus for some months, from the end of B. C. 41 to the spring of 40. Famine compelled it to surrender; but one of its citizens having set fire to his own house, the flames spread, and the whole city was burnt to the ground. The war between L. Antonius and Octavianus is known, from the long siege of this town, by the name of the Bellum Perusinum. (App. B. C. v. 32-49; Dio Cass. xlviii. 14; Lucan, i. 41; Propert. i. 22, 3.) It was rebuilt and colonised anew by Augustus, from whom it received the surname of Augusta. In the later time of the empire it was the most important city in all Etruria, and long resisted the Goths. (Dio Cass. l.c.; Strab. p. 226; Procop. B. G. i. 16, iv. 33.) Part of the walls and some of the gates of Perugia still remain. The best preserved of the gates is now called Arco d'Augusta, from the inscription AVGVSTA PERVSIA over the arch: the whole structure is at least sixty or seventy feet high. Several interesting tombs with valuable remains of Etruscan art have been discovered in the neighbourhood of the city.

Pescennius Niger. [NIGER.]

Pessinūs or Pēsinūs (Πεσσινούς, Πέσινος: Πέσσινούριος, fem. Πέσσινουρίς: Bala Hissar, twelve miles SSE. of Sivri Hissar), a city of Asia Minor, in the SW. corner of Galatia, on the S. slope of M. Dindymus, was celebrated as a chief seat of the worship of Cybele, under the surname of Agdistis, whose temple, crowded with riches, stood on a hill outside the city (Paus. i. 4, 5; Strab. p. 567). In this temple was a wooden (Livy says, stone) image of the goddess, which was removed to Rome, to satisfy an oracle in the Sibylline books (Liv. xxix. 10). The worship of the goddess was still continued by the priestly order called Galli, who were rulers of the state (Liv. xxxviii. 18; Pol. xx. 4). Under Constantine the city was made the capital of the province of Galatia Salutaris, but it declined, as its neighbour, Justinianopolis (Sivri Hissar), grew in importance, until the sixth century, after which it is not mentioned.

Petālia or Petālīae (Petalus), a rocky island off the SW. coast of Euboea at the entrance into the Euripus (Strab. p. 444).

Petēlia or Petilia (Πετηλία: Petelinus: Strongoli), an ancient Greek town on the E. coast of Bruttium, founded, according to tradition, by Philoctetes (Strab. p. 254; Virg. Aen. iii. 402). It was situated N. of Croton, to whose territory it originally belonged, but it was afterwards conquered by the Lucanians. It remained faithful to the Romans when the other cities of Bruttium revolted to Hannibal, and it was not till after a long and desperate resistance that it was taken by one of Hannibal's generals (Liv. xxiii. 20, 30; Pol. vii. 1; Sil. It. xii. 431). It was repopled by Hannibal with Bruttians; but the Romans subsequently collected the remains of the former population, and put them in possession of the town (App. Ann. 29, 57).

Pētēōn (Πετρώον: Petēōn), a small town in Boeotia, between Thebes and Anthedon, dependent upon Haliartus, according to some, and upon Thebes, according to others (Il. ii. 500; Strab. p. 410).

Pētēōs (Πετρώος), son of Orneus, and father of Menestheus, was expelled from Athens by Aegeus, and went to Phocis, where he founded Stiris (Il. ii. 552; Paus. ii. 25, 5; Plut. Thes. 32).

Pētilius or Petillius. 1. Capitolinus. [CAPITOLINUS].—2. Cereālis. [CEREALIS].—3. Spurinus. [SPURINUS].

Petosiris (Πετσίρις), an Egyptian priest and astrologer, generally named along with Nechepsos, an Egyptian king. The two are said to be the founders of astrology. Some works on astrology were extant under his name. Like our own Lilly, Petosiris became the common name for an astrologer. (Juv. vi. 580.)

Petovio. [POETOVIO.]

Petra (ἡ Πέτρα: Πετραῖος, Petraeus, later Petrensis), the name of several cities built on rocks, or in rocky places.—1. A place in Elis, not far from the city of Elis. The sepulchral monument of the philosopher Pyrrho was shown here (Paus. vi. 24, 5).—2. (Casa della Pietra), also called Petraea and Petrine (the people Πετρίνοι and Petrini), an inland town of Sicily, on the road from Agrigentum to Panormus (Cic. Verr. iii. 39; Plin. iii. 91; Diod. xxiii. 18). It is probable that its site is marked by Petralia, eight miles W. of Gangi, the ancient Engyum.—3. A town on the coast of Illyricum, with a bad harbour (Caes. B. C. iii. 42).—4. A city of Pieria in Macedonia, in the passes between Pydna and Pythium in Thessaly (Liv. xxxix. 26, xlv. 41).—5. A fortress of the Maedi, in Thrace (Liv. xl. 22).—6. (Pl. neut.), a place in Dacia, on one of the three great roads which crossed the Danube.—7. In Sogdiana, near the Oxus (Q. Curt. vii. 11).—8. By far the most celebrated of all the places of this name was Petra or Petrae (Wady-Musa), in Arabia Petraea, the capital, first of the Idumaeans, and afterwards of the Nabathaeans. It lies in the E. of Arabia Petraea, in the district called under the empire Palaestina Tertia, in the midst of the mountains of Seir, at the foot of Mt. Hor, just halfway between the Dead Sea and the head of the Aelanitic Gulf of the Red Sea, in a valley, or rather ravine, surrounded by almost inaccessible precipices, which is entered by a narrow gorge on the E., the rocky walls of which approach so closely as sometimes hardly to permit two horsemen to ride abreast. On the banks of the river which runs through this ravine stood the city itself, a mile in length, and half a mile in breadth between the sides of the valley, and some fine ruins of its public buildings still remain. But this is not all: the rocks which surround, not only the main valley, but all its lateral ravines, are completely honeycombed with excavations, some of which were tombs, some temples, and some private houses, at the entrances to which the surface of the rock is sculptured into magnificent architectural façades and other figures, whose details are often so well preserved as to appear but just chiselled, while the effect is wonderfully heightened by the brilliant variegated colours of the rock, where red, purple, yellow, sky-blue, black, and white are seen in distinct layers. (Diod. ii. 48, xix. 97; Strab. p. 779; Plin. vi. 144.) These ruins are chiefly of the Roman period, when Petra had become an important city as a centre of the caravan traffic of the Nabathaeans. At the time of Augustus, as Strabo learnt from a friend who had resided there, it contained many Romans and other foreigners, and was governed by a native prince. It had maintained its independence against the Greek kings of Syria, and retained it under the Romans, till the time of Trajan, by whose lieutenant, A. Cornelius Palma, it was taken (Dio Cass. lxxiii. 14). It was the chief city of Arabia Petraea, and under the later empire it was the capital of Palaestina Tertia. [See p. 96, b.]

M. Petreius, a man of great military experience, is first mentioned in B.C. 62, when he served as legatus to the proconsul C. Antonius, and commanded the army in the battle in which Catiline perished (Sall. Cat. 59, 60). He belonged to the aristocratical party, and in 55 he was sent into Spain along with L. Afranius as legatus of Pompey, to whom the provinces of the two Spains had been granted. Soon after the commencement of the Civil war in 49, Caesar defeated Afranius and Petreius in Spain, whereupon the latter joined Pompey in Greece. After the loss of the battle of Pharsalia (48) Petreius crossed over to Africa, and took an active part in the campaign in 46, which was brought to an end by the defeat of the Pompeian army at the battle of Thapsus. Petreius then fled with Juba, and, despairing of safety, they fell by each other's hands. (Caes. B. C. i. 38, 63; Bell. Afr. 18, 91; App. B. C. ii. 42, 95, 100; Suet. Jul. 75.)

Petrucorli, a people in Gallia Aquitania, in the modern Périgord. Their country contained iron-mines, and their chief town was Vesunna (Périgueux). (Caes. B. G. vii. 75; Plin. iv. 109.)

Petrönus, C., or T., surnamed Arbiter, an accomplished voluptuary at the court of Nero. He was one of the chosen companions of Nero, and was regarded as director-in-chief of the imperial pleasures, the judge whose decision upon the merits of any proposed scheme of enjoyment was held as final (Elegantiae arbiter). The influence thus acquired excited the jealous suspicions of Tigellinus: he was accused of treason, and, believing that destruction was inevitable, he resolved to die as he had lived, and to excite admiration by the frivolous eccentricity of his end. Having caused his veins to be opened, he from time to time arrested the flow of blood by the application of bandages. During the intervals he conversed with his friends, and even showed himself in the public streets of Cumae, where these events took place; so that at last, when he sank from exhaustion, his death (A.D. 66), although compulsory, appeared to be the result of natural and gradual decay. He is said to have despatched in his last moments a sealed document to the emperor, taunting him with his brutal excesses. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 18, 19; Plin. xxxvii. 20.)—There is little reason to doubt (though some critics have disputed it) that this Petronius is the author of a work bearing the title Petronii Arbitri Satyricon, which is a sort of character-novel, composed of a series of fragments, chiefly in prose, but interspersed with numerous pieces of poetry, and therefore in form is a Satira Menippeae [Dict. of Ant. art. Satira]. It was originally in twenty books, of which parts of books xv. and xvi. remain, in which the adventures of a certain Encolpius and his companions in the S. of Italy, chiefly in Naples or its environs, are made a vehicle for exposing the false taste and vices of the age. Unfortunately the vices of the personages introduced are depicted with such fidelity that we are perpetually disgusted by the obscenity of the descriptions. The longest section is generally known as the Supper of Trimalchio, presenting us with a detailed account of a fantastic banquet, such as the gourmands of the empire were wont to exhibit, given by a rich parvenu. The great literary ability of the author is seen in his skilful drawing of the characters, who preserve their appropriate manner of speech; in the wit and humour of the dialogue, and in his power of giving a vivid, though generally most unattractive, picture of the manners of the age. The metrical parts are intended as parodies. The best edition is by Bücheler, Berl. 1862 (a smaller edition, 1882). The Supper of Trimalchio is edited separately, with a German translation, by Friedländer, 1892.

Peucē (Πεύκη: Picizina), an island in Moesia Inferior formed by the two southern mouths of the Danube, of which the most southernly was also called Peuce, but more commonly the Sacred Mouth. This island was said by the ancients to be as large as Rhodes. It was inhabited by the Peucini, who were a tribe of the Bastarnae, and took their name from the island. (Strab. p. 105; Ptol. iii. 10, 2.)

Peucēla, Peucelaōtis (Πευκέλα, Πευκελαώτις: Pekheli or Pakholi), a city and district in the NW. of India intra Gangem, between the rivers Indus and Suastus (Strab. p. 698; Arrian, Ind. 1).

Peucestas (Πευκέστας), a Macedonian, and a distinguished officer of Alexander the Great. He had the chief share in saving the life of Alexander in the assault on the city of the Malli in India, and was afterwards appointed by the king to the satrapy of Persia. In the division of the provinces after the death of Alexander (B.C. 323) he obtained the renewal of his government of Persia. He fought on the side of Eumenes against Antigonus (317–316), but displayed insubordination in these campaigns. Upon the surrender of Eumenes by the Argyraspids, Peucestas fell into the hands of Antigonus, who deprived him of his satrapy. (Arrian, An. vi. 9–30, vii. 23; Diod. xix. 44–48.)

Peucētia. [APULIA.]

Peucini. [PEUCE.]

Phacium (Φάκιον: Phakios: Alifaka), a mountain fortress of Thessaly in the district Hestiaotis on the right bank of the Peneus, NE. of Limnaea (Thuc. iv. 78; Liv. xxxii. 13).

Phacusa (Kesem or Pa-kesem, in O. T. Goshen; Fakoos) was a sacred town of the god Supt=Horus, and therefore called Pe-Supt. Under the Ptolemies it was an emporium for Asiatic trade (Strab. p. 805).

Phacussa (Φακούσσα: Fecussa), one of the Sporades (Plin. iv. 68).

Phaea (Φαία), the name of the sow of Crommyon in Megaris, which ravaged the neighbourhood, and was slain by Theseus (Plut. Thes. 9).

Phaeaces (Φαίakes, Φαίηκες), a fabulous people immortalised by the Odyssey, who inhabited the island Scheria (Σχερία), situated at the extreme western part of the earth, and who were governed by king Alcinous. [ALCINOUS.] They are described by Homer as a people fond of the feast, the lyre, and the dance, and hence their name passed into a proverb to indicate persons of luxurious and sensual habits. Thus a glutton is called Phaeax by Horace (Ep. i. 15, 24).—The ancients identified the Homeric Scheria with Coreyra. [See p. 249, b.]

Phaeax (Φαίαξ), an Athenian orator and statesman, a contemporary and rival of Nicias and Alcibiades (Plut. Alc. 13). In 422 B.C. he went on an embassy to Sicily and Italy (Thuc. v. 4, 5). Some critics maintain that the extant speech against Alcibiades, commonly attributed to Andocides, was written by Phaeax. The internal evidence is, however, against its being the work of any contemporary author, whether Phaeax or Andocides, and it is held with probability by recent critics that it was the work of a later sophist.

Phaedon (Φαίδων), a Greek philosopher, was a native of Elis, and of high birth, but was taken prisoner, probably about B.C. 400, and was brought to Athens. It is said that he ran away from his master to Socrates, and was ransomed by one of the friends of the latter. Phaedon was present at the death of Socrates, while he was still quite a youth. He appears to have lived in Athens some time after the death of Socrates, and then returned to Elis, where he became the founder of a school of philosophy. He was succeeded by Plistanus, after whom the Elean school was merged in the Eretrian (Diog. Laërt. ii. 105; Gell. ii. 18). The dialogue of Plato which contains an account of the death of Socrates bears the name of Phaedon.

Phaedra (Φαίδρα), daughter of Minos by Pasiphaë or Crete, and the wife of Theseus. She was the stepmother of Hippolytus, the son of Theseus, with whom she fell in love; but having been repulsed by Hippolytus, she accused him to Theseus of having attempted her dishonour. After the death of Hippolytus, his innocence became known to his father, and Phaedra made away with herself. For details see HIPPOLYTUS.

Phaedriades. [PARNASSUS.]

Phaëdrías (Φαιδρίας), a town in the S. of Arcadia, SW. of Megalopolis, fifteen stadia from the Messenian frontier.

Phaedrus (Φαίδρος). 1. An Epicurean philosopher, and the president of the Epicurean school during Cicero's residence in Athens, B.C. 80. He died in 70, and was succeeded by Patron. (Cic. de Fin. i. 5, 16, ad Fam. xiii. 1, ad Att. xiii. 39.) He was the author of a work on the gods (Περὶ θεῶν), of which an interesting fragment was discovered at Herculaneum in 1806, and published by Petersen, Hamb. 1833. Cicero was largely indebted to this work for the materials of the first book of the De Natura Deorum. —2. The Latin Fabulist, of whom we know nothing but what is collected or inferred from his fables. He was originally a slave, and was brought from Thrace, apparently from Pieria (iii. Prolog. 17), to Rome, where he learned the Latin language. As the title of his work is Phaëdri Aug. Liberti Fabulae Aesopicae, we must conclude that he had belonged to Augustus, who manumitted him. Under Tiberius he appears to have undergone some persecution from Sejanus (ib. 34). The fables extant under the name of Phaedrus are ninety-seven in number, written in iambic verse, and distributed into five books, and probably an abridgment of a larger collection. Most of the fables are, no doubt, renderings of old fables from Greek or other sources, known as 'Aesopian.' [AESOPUS; BABRIUS.] Many of the fables, however, refer to contemporary events and names (e.g. iii. 10); and Phaedrus himself, in the prologue to the fifth book, intimates that he had often used the name of Aesop only to recommend his verses. The expression is generally clear and concise, and the language, with some few exceptions, pure and correct, as we should expect from a Roman writer of the Augustan age.—There is also another collection of thirty-two fables, entitled Epitome Fabularum, which was first published at Naples, in 1809, by Cassitti. This appears to have been another abridgment of the original collection, and adds thirty fables which are not transmitted in the MSS. which give the five books of Phaedrus. They are printed as an appendix to the Fables of Phaedrus. It cannot be asserted positively that they are by Phaedrus, but they are in his manner. A prose version of the fables of Phaedrus by a writer of the tenth century who called himself Romulus supplies paraphrases of several fables which appear in neither of the above-mentioned collections.—Editions of Phaedrus by Pithoeus, Autun, 1596; Bentley, 1726; L. Müller, 1868; Riese, 1885.

Phaenarētē. [SOCRATES.]

Phaenias. [PHANIAS.]

Phaestus (Φαιστός: Φαίστιος). 1. A town in the S. of Crete near Gortyna, twenty stadia from the sea, with a port-town Matala or Matalia, said to have been built by Phaestus, Coin of Phaestus in Crete (about 400 B.C.).

Obv., Heracles fighting the hydra: the crab at his feet; rev., ΦΑΙΣΤΙΟΝ; the bull of the story of Europa.

son of Heracles, who came from Sicily to Crete (Paus. ii. 6, 7). It is mentioned by Homer (Il. ii. 648). According to other accounts Minos formed the town from a collection of villages (Diod. v. 78; Strab. p. 479). It was destroyed by Gortyna. It was the birthplace of Epimenides, and its inhabitants were celebrated for their wit and sarcasm (Athen. p. 261).—2. A town of Thessaly in the district Thessaliotis (Liv. xxxvi. 16).

Phaëthon (Φαέθων), that is, 'the shining,' occurs in Homer as an epithet of Helios (the Sun), and is used by later writers as a proper name for Helios (Il. xi. 734; Ap. Rh. iv. 1236; Verg. Aen. v. 105); but it is more commonly known as the name of a son of Helios by the Oceanid Clymene, the wife of Merops, or a son of Helios by Prote, or, lastly, a son of Helios by the nymph Rhode or Rhodos (Hyg. Fab. 134; Tzetz. Chil. iv. 137). The story of Phaëthon is most fully described by Ovid (Met. i. 751–ii. 400) and by Nonnus (Dionys. xxxviii. 98), but it is earlier than the great Attic tragedians, for it formed the subject of the Heliades of Aeschylus and the Phaëthon of Euripides, of both which plays some fragments remain. He received the significant name of Phaëthon from his father, and was afterwards presumptuous enough to request his father to allow him for one day to drive the chariot of the sun across the heavens. Helios was induced by the entreaties of his son and of Clymene to yield, but the youth being too weak to check the horses, they rushed out of their usual track, and came so near the earth as almost to set it on fire. Thereupon Zeus killed him with a flash of lightning, and hurled him down into the river Eridanus. His kinsman Cycnus became a swan; his sisters, the Heliades or Phaëthontides, who had yoked the horses to the chariot, were changed into poplars and their tears into amber. [HELIADAÆ.] In the original mythology Phaëthon was the sun himself and the myth probably grew from the observation of the hot noon-day sun sinking rapidly to the Eridanus, the river of the extreme west, and from an attempt also to explain the difference between the white races and the Aethiopians. The fall of Phaethon from his quadriga is Phthiotis in Thessaly on the Sinus Maliacus, served as the harbour of LAMIA.

Phālāris (Φάλαρις), ruler of Agrigentum in Sicily, has obtained a proverbial celebrity as a represented in more than one ancient relief: the figures of his guide Phosphorus, of his mother Clymene, of the river-god Eridanus and of Cygnus are introduced.

Phaethontiādes. [HELIADAÆ.]

Phaethūsa. [HELIADAÆ.]

Phagres (Φάγρης: Orfan or Orfana), an ancient and fortified town of the Pierians in Macedonia at the foot of Mount Pangaeon (Hdt. vii. 112; Thuc. ii. 99; Strab. p. 331).

Phālaecus (Φάλαϊκος). 1. Son of Onomarchus, succeeded his uncle Phayllus as leader of the Phocians in the Sacred war, B.C. 351. In order to secure his own safety, he concluded a treaty with Philip, by which he was allowed to withdraw into the Peloponnesus with a body of 8000 mercenaries, leaving the unhappy Phocians to their fate, 346. (Diod. xvi. 38-59; Paus. x. 2, 7.) Phalaecus now assumed the part of a mere leader of mercenary troops, in which character we find him engaging in various enterprises. He was slain at the siege of Cydonia in Crete (Diod. xvi. 63).—2. A lyric and epigrammatic poet of Alexandria, some of whose epigrams are preserved in the Greek Anthology. The hendecasyllabic metre which he especially used is sometimes called Phalaecian. (Athen. p. 440; Terentian. p. 2440.)

Phalaesiāe (Φαλαισίαι), a town in Arcadia, S. of Megalopolis on the road to Sparta, twenty stadia from the Laconian frontier (Paus. viii. 35, 3).

Phalanna (Φάλαννα: Φαλανναῖος: Karad-joli), a town of the Perrhaebi in the Thessalian district of Hestiaeotis on the left bank of the Peneus, not far from Tempe (Strab. p. 440; Liv. xlii. 54).

Phālānthus (Φάλανθος), son of Aracus, was one of the Lacedaemonian Partheniae, or the offspring of some marriages with slaves, which the necessity of the first Messenian war had induced the Spartans to permit. [See Dict. of Antiq. art. Partheniae.] As the Partheniae were looked down upon by their fellow-citizens, they formed a conspiracy under Phalanthus, against the government. Their design having been detected, they went to Italy under the guidance of Phalanthus, and founded the city of Tarentum, about B.C. 708. Phalanthus was afterwards driven out from Tarentum by a sedition, and ended his days at Brundisium. (Strab. pp. 278, 282; Ar. Pol. v. 7; Paus. x. 10; Hor. Od. ii. 6.)

Phalāra (τὰ Φάλαρα: Φαλαρεῦς), a town of cruel and inhuman tyrant; but we have little real knowledge of his life and history. His reign probably began about B.C. 570, and is said to have lasted sixteen years. He was a native of Agrigentum, and appears to have been raised by his fellow-citizens to some high office in the state, of which he afterwards availed himself to assume a despotic authority (Ar. Rhet. ii. 20, Pol. v. 10). He was engaged in frequent wars with his neighbours, and extended his power and dominion on all sides, though more frequently by stratagem than by open force. He perished by a sudden outbreak of the popular fury, in which it appears that Telemachus, the ancestor of Theron, must have borne a conspicuous part (Diod. Fr. p. 25; Cic. Off. ii. 7, 26; Tzetz. Chil. v. 956). No circumstance connected with Phalaris is more celebrated than the brazen bull in which he is said to have burnt alive the victims of his cruelty, and of which we are told that he made the first experiment upon its inventor Perillus. This latter story has much the air of an invention of later times; but the fame of this celebrated engine of torture was inseparably associated with the name of Phalaris as early as the time of Pindar. (Pind. Pyth. i. 185; cf. Diod. xiii. 90; Pol. xii. 25.) Pindar also speaks of Phalaris himself in terms which clearly prove that his reputation as a barbarous tyrant was then already fully established, and all subsequent writers, until a very late period, allude to him in terms of similar import. But in the later ages of Greek literature, there appears to have existed or arisen a totally different tradition concerning Phalaris, which represented him as a man of a naturally mild and humane disposition, and only forced into acts of severity or occasional cruelty by the pressure of circumstances and the machinations of his enemies. He appears at the same time as an admirer of literature and philosophy, and the patron of men of letters. Such is the aspect under which his character is presented to us in two declamations ascribed to Lucian, and still more strikingly in the well-known epistles which bear the name of Phalaris himself. These epistles are now remembered chiefly on account of the literary controversy to which they gave rise, and the masterly dissertation in which Bentley exposed their spuriousness. They are evidently the composition of some sophist; though the period at which this forgery was composed cannot be determined. The first author who refers to them is Stobaeus. Edited by Schaefer, Lips. 1823; Hercher, 1873.

Phalarium (Φαλάριον), a fortress named after Phalaris near the S. coast of Sicily, situated on a hill forty stadia E. of the river Himera (Diod. xix. 118).

Phalasarna (τὰ Φαλάσαρνα), a town on the NW. coast of Crete (Strab. p. 574).

Phalērum (Φάληρον: Φαληρεύς), the most easterly of the harbours of Athens, and the one chiefly used by the Athenians before the Persian wars. [See PIRÆUS, and plan on p. 142.]

Phalōria (Φαλωρία), a fortified town of Thessaly in Hestiaeotis, N. of Tricca on the left bank of the Peneus (Liv. xxxii. 15).

Phānae (Φάναι, ἡ Φανάλα ἄκρα: C. Mastico), the S. point of the island of Chios, celebrated for its temple of Apollo, and for its excellent wine (Strab. p. 645).

Phanagoria (Φαναγόρεια, and other forms: Phanagori, Ru., near Taman, on the E. side of the Straits of Kaffa), a Greek city, founded by a colony of Teians under Phanagoras, on the Asiatic coast of the Cimmerian Bosphorus. It became the great emporium for all the traffic between the coasts of the Palus Maeotis and the countries on the S. side of the Caucasus, and was chosen by the kings of Bosphorus as their capital in Asia. (Strab. p. 495; Ptol. v. 9, 6; App. Mithr. 108.) It had a temple of Aphrodite, and its neighbourhood was rich in olive yards. In the sixth century of our era, it was destroyed by the surrounding barbarians. (Procop. B. G. iv. 5.)

Phanaroea (Φανάροια), a great plain of Pontus in Asia Minor, enclosed by the mountain chains of Paryadres on the E., and Lithrus and Ophlimus on the W., was the most fertile part of Pontus (Strab. pp. 73, 547, 556).

Phanias or Phaenias (Φανίας, Φαινίας), of Eresos in Lesbos, a distinguished Peripatetic philosopher, the immediate disciple of Aristotle, and the contemporary, fellow-citizen, and friend of Theophrastus. He flourished about B.C. 336. Phanias does not seem to have founded a distinct school of his own, but he was a most diligent writer upon every department of philosophy, as it was studied by the Peripatetics, especially logic, physics, history, and literature. His works, all of which are lost, are quoted by later writers. One of his works most frequently cited was a sort of chronicle of his native city, bearing the title of Πρυτάνεις Ἑρέσιοι. (Strab. p. 618; Plut. Sol. 14, 32, 73; Athen. p. 333; Suid. s. v.)

Phanocles (Φανοκλῆς), one of the best of the later Greek elegiac poets, probably lived in the time of Philip and Alexander the Great. He seems only to have written one poem, which was entitled Ἐρωτες ἢ Καλοί (Plut. Symp. p. 671; Athen. p. 603). The work was upon paederastia; but the subject was so treated as to exhibit the retribution which fell upon those who addicted themselves to the practice. We still possess a considerable fragment from the opening of the poem, which describes the love of Orpheus for Calais, and the vengeance taken upon him by the Thracian women.—The fragments of Phanocles are edited by Bach, with those of Hermesianax and Philetas, Halis Sax. 1829; and by Schneidewin, Delect. Poës. Graec. p. 158.

Phanodēmus (Φανόδημος), the author of one of those works on the legends and antiquities of Attica known under the name of Atticides. His age and birthplace are uncertain, but we know that he lived before the time of Augustus, as he is cited by Dionysius of Halicarnassus (Dionys. i. 61; Plut. Them. 13, Cim. 12.)

Phanote (Gardhiki), a fortified town of Epirus in Chaonia near the Illyrian frontier (Liv. xliii. 23; Pol. xxvii. 14).

Phaōn (Φάων), a boatman at Mytilene, is said to have been originally an ugly old man; but in consequence of his carrying Aphrodite across the sea without accepting payment, the goddess gave him youth and beauty (Ael. V.H. xii. 18; Palaeph. 49; Lucian, Dial. Mort. 9). After this Sappho is said to have fallen in love with him, and to have leaped from the Leucadian rock when he slighted her. [SAPPHO.] For the possible origin of this story, see LEUCAS.

Phārae (Φαράι or Φήραι). 1. (Φαραίεύς or Φαρεύς), an ancient town in the W. part of Achaea, and one of the twelve Achaean cities, was situated on the river Pierus, seventy stadia from the sea and 150 from Patrae. It was one of the states which took an active part in reviving the Achaean League in B.C. 281. Augustus included it in the territory of Patrae. (Hdt. i. 145; Strab. p. 388; Paus. vii. 22, 1.)—2. (Φαραίτης, Φαραιάτης, Φαράτης: Kalamata), an ancient town in Messenia mentioned by Homer, on the river Nedon, near the frontiers of Laconia, and about six miles from the sea. In B.C. 180 Pharae joined the Achaean League together with the towns of Thuria and Abia. It was annexed by Augustus to Laconia. (Il. v. 543, ix. 151; Strab. p. 388; Paus. iv. 30, 2.)—3. Originally Pharis (Φάρις: Φαρίτης, Φαριάτης), a town in Laconia in the valley of the Eurotas, S. of Sparta (Paus. iii. 20, 3).

Pharbaethus (Φάρβαιθος: Horbeyt? Ru.), the capital of the Nomos Pharbaethites in Lower Egypt, lay S. of Tanis, on the W. side of the Pelusiac branch of the Nile (Hdt. ii. 166; Strab. p. 802).

Phāris. [PHARAE, No. 3.]

Pharmacussae (Φαρμακοῦσαι). 1. Two small islands off the coast of Attica, near Salamis, in the bay of Eleusis (Strab. p. 395), now called Kyradhes or Megali and Mikri Kyra: on one of them was shown the tomb of Circe.—2. Pharmacusa (Φαρμακοῦσα: Pharmakonisi), an island off the coast of Asia Minor, 120 stadia from Miletus, where king Attalus died, and where Julius Caesar was taken prisoner by pirates (Suet. Jul. 4; Plut. Caes.).

Pharnabāzus (Φαρνάβαζος), son of Pharnaces, succeeded his father as satrap of the Persian provinces near the Hellespont. In B.C. 411 and the following years, he rendered active assistance to the Lacedaemonians in their war against the Athenians. (Thuc. viii. 6, 8, 39, 99–109; Xen. Hell. i. 1–3; Diod. xiii. 49–63.) When Dercyllidas, and subsequently Agesilaus, passed over into Asia to protect the Asiatic Greeks against the Persian power, we find Pharnabazus connecting himself with Conon to resist the Lacedaemonians. In 374 Pharnabazus invaded Egypt in conjunction with Iphicrates, but the expedition failed, chiefly through the dilatory proceedings and the excessive caution of Pharnabazus. [IPHICRATES.] The character of Pharnabazus is distinguished by generosity and openness. He has been charged with the murder of Alcibiades; but the latter probably fell by the hands of others. [ALCIBIADES.]

Pharnāces (Φαρνάκης). 1. King of Pontus, was the son of Mithridates IV., whom he succeeded on the throne, about B.C. 190. He carried on war for some years with Eumenes, king of Pergamus, and Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, but was obliged to conclude with them a disadvantageous peace in 179. The year of his death is uncertain; it is placed by conjecture in 156. (Pol. xv. 2, xxvi. 6, xxvii. 15; Strab. p. 545.)—2. King of Pontus, or more properly of the Bosporus, was the son of Mithridates the Great, whom he compelled to put an end to his life in 63. [MITHRIDATES VI.] After the death of his father, Pharnaces hastened to make his submission to Pompey, who granted him the kingdom of the Bosporus, with the titles of friend and ally of the Roman people. In the Civil war between Caesar and Pompey, Pharnaces seized the opportunity to reinstate himself in his father's dominions, and made himself master of the whole of Colchis and the lesser Armenia. He defeated Domitius Calvinus, the lieutenant of Caesar in Asia, but was shortly afterwards defeated by Caesar himself in a decisive action near Zela (47). The battle was gained with such ease by Caesar that he informed the senate of his victory by the words, Veni, vidi, vici (App. Mithr. 110–120; Dio Cass. xlii. 45; Bell. Alex. 65–77). In the course of the same year, Pharnaces was again defeated, and was slain by Asander, one of his generals. [ASANDER.]

Pharnacia (Φαρνακία: Kheresoun or Kerasunda), a flourishing city of Asia Minor, on the coast of Pontus Polemoniacus, was built near (some think, on) the site of Cerasus, probably by Pharnaces, the grandfather of Mithridates the Great, and peopled by the transference to it of the inhabitants of Cotyora. It had a large commerce and extensive fisheries; and in its neighbourhood were the iron mines of the Chalybes. It was strongly fortified, and was used by Mithridates, in the war with Rome, for the place of refuge of his harem. (Strab. pp. 548–551; Plut. Lucull. 18; Arrian, Peripl. Pont. Eux. p. 17.)

Pharsalus (Φάρσαλος, Ion. Φάρσηλος: Φαρσάλιος: Pharsa or Fersala), a town in Thessaly in the district Thessaliotis, not far from the frontiers of Plithiotis, W. of the river Enipeus, and on the N. slope of Mt. Narthacius. It was divided into an old and a new city, and contained a strongly fortified acropolis (Strab. pp. 431–434; Liv. xlii. 1). In its neighbourhood, N.E. of the town and on the other side of the Enipeus, was a celebrated temple of Thetis, called Thetidion. Near Pharsalus was fought the decisive battle between Caesar and Pompey, B.C. 48, which made Caesar master of the Roman world. It is frequently called the battle of Pharsalia, which was the name of the territory of the town.

Pharus (Φάρος). 1. (Pharos or Raudhat-el-tin, i.e. Fig-garden), a small island off the Mediterranean coast of Egypt, mentioned by Homer, who describes it as a whole day's sail distant from Aegyptus, meaning, probably, not Egypt itself, but the river Nile.

(Od. iv. 355.) When Alexander the Great planned the city of Alexandria, on the coast opposite to Pharos, he caused the island to be united to the coast by a mole seven stadia in length, thus forming the two harbours of the city. [ALEXANDRIA.] The island was chiefly famous for the lofty tower built upon it by Ptolemy II. Philadelphus, for a lighthouse, whence the name of pharus was applied to all similar structures. The island was well peopled, according to Julius Caesar, but soon afterwards Strabo tells us that it was inhabited only by a few fishermen (Strab. p. 791).—2. (Lesina or Hvar), an island of the Adriatic, off the coast of Dalmatia, E. of Issa, with a Greek city of the same name (Civita Vecchia, Ru.), which was taken and destroyed by the Romans under Aemilius Paulus, but probably rebuilt, as it is mentioned by Ptolemy under the name of Pharia (Pol. ii. 11, iii. 16; Strab. p. 315).

Pharūsii (Φαρούσιοι), a people in the interior (probably near the W. coast) of N. Africa, who carried on a considerable traffic with Mauretania (Strab. pp. 131, 828; Ptol. iv. 6, 17).

Phasaëlis (Φασαήλις: prob. Ain-el-Fusail), a city of Palestine, in the valley of the Jordan, N. of Jericho, built by Herod the Great (Jos. Ant. xvi. 5, 2).

Phaselis (Φασήλις, Φασηλίτης: Tekrova, Ru.), an important seaport town of Lycia, near the borders of Pamphylia, stood on the gulf of Pamphylia, at the foot of Mt. Solyma, in a narrow pass between the mountains and the sea. It was founded by Dorian colonists, and from its position, and its command of three fine harbours, it soon gained an extensive commerce (Hdt. ii. 178; Strab. p. 667). It did not belong to the Lycian confederacy, but had an independent government of its own. It became afterwards the head-quarters of the pirates who infested the S. coasts of Asia Minor, and was therefore destroyed by P. Servilius Isauricus (Cic. Verr. iv. 10, 21; Eutrop. vi. 3); and though the city was restored, it never recovered its importance. Phaselis is said to have been the place at which the light quick vessels called φάσηλοι were first built, and the figure of such a ship appears on its coins.

Phâsis (Φάσις). 1. (Faz or Rioni), a renowned river of the ancient world, rose in the Moschici M. (or according to some in the Caucasus, where, in fact, its chief tributaries rise), and flowed westward through the plain of Colchis into the E. end of the Pontus Euxinus (Black Sea), after receiving several affluents, the chief of which were the Glaucus and the Rion: the name of the latter was sometimes transferred, as it now is, to the main river. It was navigable about thirty-eight miles above its mouth for large vessels, and for small ones further up, as far as Sarapana (Sharapan), whence goods were conveyed in four days across the Moschici M. to the river Cyrus, and so to the Caspian. It was spanned by 120 bridges, and had many towns upon its banks. Its waters were celebrated for their purity and for various other supposed qualities, some of a very marvellous nature; but it was most famous in connexion with the story of the Argonautic expedition. [ARGONAUTAE.] Some of the early geographers made it the boundary between Europe and Asia (Strab. p. 497; Hdt. iv. 40); it was afterwards the NE. limit of the kingdom of Pontus, and under the Romans it was regarded as the N. frontier of their empire in W. Asia. Another notable circumstance connected with it is that it has given name to the pheasant (phasianus, φασιανός, φασιανικός ὄρνις), which is said to have been first brought to Greece from its banks, where the bird is still found in great numbers (Mart. iii. 57, 16 Plin. x. 132).—When the geography of these regions was comparatively unknown, it was natural that there should be a doubt as to the identification of certain celebrated names; and thus the name Phasis, like Araxes, is applied to different rivers. The most important of these variations is Xenophon's application of the name Phasis to the river Araxes in Armenia (Anab. iv. 6).—2. Near the mouth of the river, on its S. side, was a town of the same name, founded and fortified by the Milesians as an emporium for their commerce, and used under the kings of Pontus, and under the Romans, as a frontier fort, and now a Russian fortified station, under the name of Pati. Some identify it with Sebastopolis, but most likely incorrectly. (Strab. pp. 498, 500; Ptol. v. 10, 2.)

Phavorinus. [FAVORINUS.]

Phayllus (Φάλλος). 1. A celebrated athlete of Crotona, who had thrice gained the victory at the Pythian games. He fought at the battle of Salamis, B.C. 480, in a ship fitted out at his own expense. (Hdt. viii. 47; Paus. x. 9, 2; Plut. Alex. 34.) He is said to have cleared fifty-five feet in jumping (Anth. Pal. ii. p. 851; Suid. s.v.). It is suggested that (if true at all) it may have been by the 'hop, step, and jump.' [Dict. of Ant. art. Pentathlon.]—2. A Phocian, brother of Onomarchus, whom he succeeded as general of the Phocians in the Sacred war, 352. He died in the following year, after a long and painful illness. Phayllus made use of the sacred treasures of Delphi with a far more lavish hand than either of his brothers, and he is accused of bestowing the consecrated ornaments upon his wife and mistresses. (Diod. xvi. 35–38, 61; Paus. x. 2, 6.)

Phazania (Fessan), a district of Libya Interior. [GARAMANTES.]

Phazemon (Φαζιμόν: prob. Marsiwan), a city of Pontus in Asia Minor, NW. of Amasia, and the capital of the W. district of Pontus, called Phazemonitis (Φαζιμονίτις), which lay on the E. side of the Halys, S. of Gazelonitis, and was celebrated for its warm mineral springs. Pompey changed the name of the city to Neapolis, and the district was called Neapolitis: but these names seem to have been soon dropped. (Strab. pp. 553, 560.)

Phea (Φεία, Φεά, Φεαίος), a town on the frontiers of Elis and Pisatis, with a harbour situated on a promontory of the same name, and on the river Iardanus. In front of the harbour was a small island called Phéas (Φείας). (Il. vii. 135; Od. xi. 297; Strab. p. 350.)

Pheca or Phecadum, a fortress in Thessaly in the district Hestiaeotis (Liv. xxxi. 41, xxxii. 14).

Phēgeus (Φηγεύς), king of Psophis in Arcadia, father of Alpheisiboea or Arsinoe, of Pronous and Agenor, or of Temenus and Axion. He purified Alcmaeon after he had killed his mother, and gave him his daughter Alpheisiboea in marriage. Alcmaeon presented Alpheisiboea with the celebrated necklace and peplos of Harmonia; but when Alcmaeon afterwards wished to obtain them again for his new wife Callirrhoë, he was murdered by the sons of Phegeus, by their father's command. Phegeus was himself subsequently put to death by the sons of Alcmaeon. For details see ALCMAEON.

Phellus (Φέλλος or Φελλός: Φελλίτης: Ru. near Saaret), an inland city of Lycia, on a mountain between Xanthus and Antiphellus; the latter having been at first the port of Phellus, but afterwards eclipsing it (Strab. p. 666).

Phellusa, a small island near Lesbos.

Phēmīus (Φήμιος), a celebrated minstrel, son of Terpius, who entertained with his song the suitors in the palace of Odysseus in Ithaca (Od. i. 154).

Phēmōnōē (Φημονόη), a mythical Greek poetess of the ante-Homeric period, was said to have been the daughter of Apollo, and his first priestess at Delphi, and the inventor of the hexameter verse. There were poems which went under the name of Phemonoë, like the old religious poems which were ascribed to Orpheus, Musaeus, and the other mythological bards. (Paus. x. 5, 7, x. 6, 7; Strab. p. 419.)

Phēneūs (Φένεος or Φενεός: Φενεάτης: Fonia), a town in the NE. of Arcadia, at the foot of Mt. Cyllene, and on the river Aroanius. Its territory was called Pheneātis (Φενεάτις). There were extensive marshes in the neighbourhood, the waters of which were partly carried off by a subterranean channel, which was supposed to have been made by Heracles. (Paus. viii. 14, 3; Catull. 68, 109; Plin. xxxi. 54; cf. p. 400, b.) The town was of great antiquity. It is mentioned by Homer, and was said to have been built by an autochthon Pheneus. It contained a strongly fortified acropolis with a temple of Athene Tritonia; and in the town itself were the tombs of Iphicles and Myrtilus, and temples of Hermes and Demeter. (Il. ii. 605; Paus. viii. 14, 15; Verg. Aen. viii. 165.)

Phērae (Φεραί: Φεραῖος: Valestino), an ancient town of Thessaly, in the SE. of the Pelasgian plain, W. of Mt. Pelion, SW. of the lake Boebēis, and ninety stadia from its port-town, Pagasae on the Pagasaeon gulf. Pherae is celebrated in mythology as the residence of Admetus, and in history on account of its tyrants, who extended their power over nearly the whole of Thessaly. (Il. ii. 711; Thuc. ii. 22; Strab. pp. 403, 439.) Of these the most powerful was Jason, who was made Tagus or generalissimo of Thessaly about B.C. 374. Jason was succeeded in 370 by his two brothers Polydorus and Polyphron. The former was soon after assassinated by Polyphron. The latter was murdered in his turn, in 369, by his nephew Alexander, who was notorious for his cruelty, and who was put to death in 367 by his wife Thebe and her three brothers. [JASON; ALEXANDER, p. 47, b.] In B.C. 191 Pherae was taken by Antiochus, and shortly afterwards surrendered to the Romans under Acilius Glabrio (Liv. xxxvi. 9, 14).

Phērae. [PHARAE.]

Pherecrates (Φερεκράτης), of Athens, one of the best poets of the Old Comedy, was contemporary with the comic poets Cratinus, Crates, Eupolis, Plato, and Aristophanes, being somewhat younger than the first two, and somewhat older than the others. He gained his first victory B.C. 438, and he imitated the style of Crates, whose actor he had been. Crates and Phere-crates, like Epicharmus, very much modified the coarse satire and vituperation of which this sort of poetry had previously been the vehicle, and constructed their comedies on the basis of a regular plot, and with more dramatic action, satirising types of character, not actual persons. Pherecrates did not, however, abstain altogether from personal satire, for we see by the fragments of his plays that he attacked Alcibiades, the tragic poet Melanthius, and others (Athen. pp. 343, 538). He forestalled in the Crapatali the idea, which Aristophanes expressed in the Frogs, of laying the scene of his play in the underworld. Pherecrates invented a new metre, which was named, after him, the Pherecratean.

which may be best explained as a choriambus, with a spondee for its base, and a long syllable for its termination. The metre is very frequent in the choruses of the Greek tragedians, and in Horace, as, for example—Grato Pyrrha sub antro. The extant titles of the plays of Pherecrates are eighteen. (Fragments in Meineke, Fr. Com. Gr.)

Phērecydes (Φερεκύδης). 1. Of Syros, an island in the Aegæan, an early Greek philosopher or rather theologian. He lived in the sixth century B.C. He is said to have obtained his knowledge from the secret books of the Phœnicians, and to have travelled in Egypt. Almost all the ancient writers who speak of him state that he was the teacher of Pythagoras. The most important subject which he is said to have taught was the doctrine of the Metempsychosis adopted by Pythagoras. He gave an account of his views in a work (Περὶ φύσεως καὶ περὶ θεῶν) which was extant in the Alexandrian period. It was written in prose, which he is said to have been the first to employ in the explanation of philosophical questions. (Diog. Laërt. i. 116–122; Arist. Met. xiii. 4 = p. 1092, B; Cic. Tusc. i. 16, 38; Plut. Sull. 36.)—2. Of Leros, one of the most celebrated of the early Greek logographers. He lived in the former half of the fifth century B.C., and was a contemporary of Hellanicus and Herodotus. Most of his life was spent at Athens, whence he is called indifferently the Lertian or the Athenian. His principal work was a history of the mythology and antiquities of Attica, in ten books. It began with a theogony, and then proceeded to give an account of the heroic age and of the great families of that time.—His fragments have been collected by Sturtz, Pherecydis Fragmenta, Lips. 1824, 2nd ed.; and by C. and T. Müller, in Fragm. Hist. Graec. vol. i.

Phēres (Φέρης). 1. Son of Cretheus and Tyro, and brother of Aeson and Amythaon; he was married to Periclymene, by whom he became the father of Admetus, Lycurgus, Idomene, and Periapis. He was believed to have founded the town of Phœrae in Thessaly. (Od. xi. 259; Apollod. i. 9, 11.)—2. Son of Jason and Medea (Paus. ii. 3, 6).

Pheretiades (Φερητιάδης), i.e. a son of Pheres, is especially used as the name of Admetus (Il. ii. 763).

Pheretima (Φερετίμα), wife of Battus III., and mother of Arcesilaus III., successive kings of Cyrene. After the murder of her son by the Barcaeans [BATTIADAE, No. 6], Pheretima fled into Egypt to Aryandes, the viceroy of Darius Hystaspis, and representing that the death of Arcesilaus had been the consequence of his submission to the Persians, she induced him to avenge it. On the capture of Barca by the Persian army, she caused those who had the principal share in her son's murder to be impaled, and ordered the breasts of their wives to be cut off. Pheretima then returned to Egypt, where she died. (Hdt. iv. 162, 200–205.)

Phéron or Phēros (Φέρων, Φερῶς), the Greek name for the son of Sesostris (= Ramses II.). This king of Egypt was really Menephtah II., who succeeded on the death of Ramses (or Sesostris), about 1300 B.C., and won great victories over the Libyans and their allies the Aquasha and Shardana, whom some believe to be the Achæans and Sardinians. By some authorities he is thought to be the Pharaoh of the Exodus. The Greek name Φέρων seems to be a misconception of the title Pharaoh. Herodotus has a story, which is not confirmed by the Egyptian monuments, that he was visited with blindness as a punishment for his impiety in throwing a spear into the waters of the Nile when it had overflowed the fields. By attending to the directions of an oracle he was cured, and he dedicated an obelisk at Heliopolis in gratitude for his recovery (Hdt. ii. 111). Pliny tells us that this obelisk, together with another, also made by him but broken in its removal, was to be seen at Rome in the Circus of Caligula and Nero at the foot of the Vatican hill. Pliny calls the Phéron of Herodotus Nencoreus: Diodorus gives him his father's name, Sesostris (Plin. xxxvi. 74; Diod. i. 59).

Phidias (Φειδίας), the great Greek sculptor. Of his personal history we possess but few details. He was a native of Athens, and the son of Charmides, and was born about the time of the battle of Marathon, B.C. 490. He began to work as a sculptor about 464, and one of his first great works was the statue of Athene Promachos, which may be assigned to about 460. This work must have established his reputation; but it was surpassed by the splendid productions of his own hand, and of others working under his direction, during the administration of Pericles. That statesman not only chose Phidias to execute the principal statues which were to be set up, but gave him the direction of all the works of art which were to be erected. Of these works the chief were the Propylæa of the Acropolis (built by the architect Mnesicles), and, above all, the temple of Athene on the Acropolis, called the PARTHENON (of which Ictinus and Callicrates were the architects), on which, as the central point of the Athenian polity and religion, the highest efforts of the best of artists were employed. There can be no doubt that the sculptured ornaments of this temple, the remains of which form the glory of the British Museum, were executed under the immediate superintendence of Phidias; but the colossal statue of the divinity made of ivory and gold, which was enclosed within that magnificent shrine, was the work of the artist's own hand. The statue was dedicated in 438. Having finished his great work at Athens, he went to Elis and Olympia, which he was now invited to adorn. He was there engaged for about four or five years from 437 to 434 or 433, during which time he finished his statue of the Olympian Zeus, the greatest of all his works. On his return to Athens, he fell a victim to the jealousy against his great patron, Pericles, which was then at its height. The party opposed to Pericles, thinking him too powerful to be overthrown by a direct attack, aimed at him in the persons of his most cherished friends, Phidias, Anaxagoras, and Aspasia. [PERICLES.] Phidias was first accused of peculation, but this charge was at once refuted, as, by the advice of Pericles, the gold had been affixed to the statue of Athene in such a manner that it could be removed and the weight of it examined. The accusers then charged Phidias with impiety, in having introduced into the battle of the Amazons, on the shield of the goddess, his own likeness and that of Pericles. On this latter charge Phidias was thrown into prison, where he died, in 432 (Plut. Pericl. 31). Phidias had executed a statue of Athene for Pallene in Achaia (Paus. vii. 27, 1); and the colossal statue of Athene Promachos on the Acropolis of Athens [see p. 11]; but more famous than these was the statue of Athene in the Parthenon, to which reference has already been made. The statue was of that kind of work which the Greeks called chryselephantine: that is, the statue was formed of plates of ivory laid upon a core of wood or stone, for the flesh parts, while the drapery and other ornaments were of solid gold. The statue stood in the foremost and larger chamber of the temple (prodomus). It represented the goddess standing, clothed with a tunic reaching to the ankles, with her spear in her left hand and an image of Victory four cubits high in her right: she was girded with the aegis, and had a helmet on her head, and her shield rested on the ground by her side. The height of the statue was twenty-six cubits, or nearly forty feet, including the base (Paus. i. 24; Plin. xxxvi. 18). The eyes were of a kind of marble, nearly resembling ivory, perhaps painted to imitate the iris and pupil (Plat. Hipp. Maj. p. 290, B). The weight of the gold upon the statue, which, as above stated, was removable at pleasure, is said by Thucydides to have been forty talents (ii. 13).—Still more celebrated than his statue of Athene was the colossal ivory and gold statue of Zeus which Phidias made for the great temple of this god in the Altis or sacred grove at Olympia. This statue was regarded as the masterpiece, not only of Phidias, but of the whole range of Grecian art; and was looked upon not so much as a statue, but rather as if it were the actual manifestation of the present deity. It was placed in the prodomus or front chamber of the temple, directly facing the entrance. It was only visible, however, on great festivals; at other times it was concealed by a magnificent curtain. The god was represented as seated on a throne of cedar wood, adorned with gold, ivory, ebony, stones, and colours, crowned with a wreath of olive, holding in his right hand an ivory and gold statue of Victory, and in his left hand supporting a sceptre, which was ornamented with all sorts of metals, and surmounted by an eagle. The throne was brilliant both with gold and stones, and with ebony and ivory, and was ornamented with figures both painted and sculptured. The statue almost reached to the roof, which was about sixty feet in height. The idea which Phidias essayed to embody in this his greatest work was that of the supreme deity of the Hellenic nation, no longer engaged in conflicts with the Titans and the Giants, but having laid aside his thunderbolt, and enthroned as a conqueror, in perfect majesty and repose, ruling with a nod the subject world. It is related (Strab. p. 534; Val. Max. iii. 7) that when Phidias was asked what model he meant to follow in making his statue, he replied, that of Homer (Il. i. 528–530):

Ἦ καὶ κυανέῃσιν ἐπ' ὀφρύσι νεύσε Κρονίων.
ἀμβρόσια δ' ἄρα χαῖται ἐπερρώσαντο ἀνακτος κρατὸς ἀπ' ἀθανάτοιο μέγαν δ' ἐλέλιξεν Ὀλύμπου.

The statue was removed by the emperor Theodosius I. to Constantinople, where it was destroyed by a fire in A.D. 475.—The distinguishing character of the art of Phidias was beauty of the sublimest order, especially in the representation of divinities, and of subjects connected with their worship. While on the one hand he set himself free from the stiff and unnatural forms which, by a sort of religious precedent, had fettered his predecessors of the archaic school, on the other hand he did not aim at representing the typical beauty of face and form which is seen in the works of Polyclitus, and still more in those of Praxiteles. In dignity and largeness of style he stood pre-eminent. [See further in Dict. of Ant. art. Statuaria Ars.]

Phidippidēs or Philippidēs (Φειδιππίδης, Φιλίππίδης), a courier, was sent by the Athenians to Sparta in B.C. 490, to ask for aid against the Persians, and arrived there on the second day from his leaving Athens. On his return to Athens, he related that on his way to Sparta the god Pan had met him on Mt. Parthenium, near Tegea, and calling him loudly by name had bidden him ask the Athenians why they paid him no worship, though he had been hitherto their friend, and ever would be so. (Hdt. vi. 105; Paus. i. 28, 4, viii. 54, 6; Nep. Milt. 4.) In consequence of this revelation, they dedicated a temple to Pan after the battle of Marathon, and honoured him thenceforth with annual sacrifices and a torch-race. [PAN.]

Phidon (Φείδων). 1. Son of Aristodamidas, and king of Argos, restored the supremacy of Argos over Cleonae, Phlius, Sicyon, Epidaurus, Troezen, and Aegina, and aimed at extending his dominions over the greater part of the Peloponnesus. Plutarch tells a story of his trying (though unsuccessfully) to obtain 1000 picked youths from Corinth, whom he intended to put to death, and so reduce the power of the Corinthians. The story is improbable in its details, but seems to indicate some claim to supremacy over Corinth also (Plut. Am. 2). The Pisatans invited him, according to the received text of Pausanias, in the 8th Olympiad (B.C. 748), to aid them in excluding the Eleans from their usurped presidency at the Olympic games, and to celebrate them jointly with themselves. The invitation quite fell in with the ambitious pretensions of Phidon, who succeeded in dispossessing the Eleans and celebrating the games along with the Pisatans; but the Eleans not long after defeated him, with the aid of Sparta, and recovered their privilege. Thus apparently fell the power of Phidon; but as to the details of the struggle we have no information. The most memorable act of Phidon was his introduction of copper and silver coinage, and a new scale of weights and measures, which, through his influence, became prevalent in the Peloponnesus, and ultimately throughout the greater portion of Greece. (Hdt. vi. 127; Ephorus, ap. Strab. p. 358; Ar. Pol. v. 10, p. 1810; Paus. vi. 22, 2; Diog. Laërt. viii. 14; Ael. V. H. xii. 10.) The coinage of Phidon is said to have been struck in Aegina, with the type of a tortoise (a symbol of the Phoenician Astarte). [Dict. of Ant. art. Pondera.] There is considerable doubt about the date of Phidon. The date assigned to the earliest Greek coins is the seventh cent. B.C., which agrees with Hdt. vi. 127, where Phidon the tyrant of Argos who regulated measures in the Peloponnesus and interfered at Olympia is said to be the father of one of the suitors of Agariste. This would bring Phidon near to the time of Clisthenes of Sicyon, and would preclude an earlier date for his reign than the middle of the seventh cent. B.C. It has been suggested that the text of Pausanias is corrupt and that Ol. 28, instead of 8 (i. e. 658 B.C.), should be read. The suggestion that there was an earlier Phidon also is not satisfactory.—2. An ancient Corinthian legislator of uncertain date.

Phigalia (Φιγαλία, Φιγάλεια, Φιγαλέα: Φιγαλέως: Pavlitza), at a later time called Phialia, a town in the SW. corner of Arcadia on the frontiers of Messenia and Elis, and upon the river Lymax. It is said to have derived its name from Phigalus, son of Lycaon, its founder (Paus. viii. 39, 2; Steph. B. s. v.). It was taken by the Spartans B.C. 559, but was afterwards recovered by the Phigalians with the help of are standing. The temple is 125 feet long by 46 broad. In 1812 the frieze round the interior of the inner cella was discovered, containing a series of sculptures in alto-rilievo, representing the combat of the Centaurs and the Lapithae, and of the Greeks and the Amazons [see cut on p. 59]. The height of the frieze was a little more than two feet, and the total length about 100 feet. The sculptures were found on the ground under the spot which they originally occupied, and were much injured by their fall, and by the weight of the ruins lying upon them. They were purchased for the British Museum in 1814, where they are preserved. About 3½ miles from Phigalia (according to Paus. viii. 42, 1) under the hill Elaeum was the ancient sanctuary of the 'Black' Demeter, a cave in which was an image of the goddess with a horse's head [see p. 277, b]. A natural tunnel through which the river Neda (Vontziko) runs, the Oresthasians. It is frequently mentioned in the later wars of the Achaean and Aetolian Leagues (Paus. viii. 39, 4; Diod. xv. 40; Pol. iv. 3, 79).—Phigalia, however, owes its celebrity in modern times to the remains of a splendid temple in its territory, situate about six miles NE. of the town at Bassae on Mt. Cotylum. This temple was built by Ictinus, the contemporary of Pericles and Phidias, and the architect, along with Callicrates, of the Parthenon at Athens. It was dedicated to Apollo Epicurius, or the Deliverer, because the god had delivered the country from the pestilence during the Peloponnesian war. Pausanias describes this temple as the most beautiful one in all Peloponnesus after the temple of Athene at Tegea. It is a Doric hexastyle [see Dict. of Ant. art. Templum], but with fifteen columns at the sides, and therefore thirty-eight columns in the whole outer circuit, of which all but three now called Stomion tes Panagias, is shown as the site of this sanctuary. It is about three miles W. of Phigalia.

Phila (Φίλα), daughter of Antipater, the regent of Macedonia, was married to Craterus in B.C. 322, and after the death of Craterus, who survived his marriage with her scarcely a year, she was again married to the young Demetrius, the son of Antigonus. When Demetrius was expelled from Macedonia in 287, she put an end to her own life at Cassandrea. She showed nobility of character in her endeavours to promote peace and to check oppression. She left two children by Demetrius: Antigonus, surnamed Gonatas, and a daughter, Stratonice, married first to Seleucus, and afterwards to his son Antiochus. (Plut. Demetr. 14–45; Diod. xx. 93.)

Phila (Φίλα: Φιλαῖος, Φιλάτης). A town of Macedonia in the province Pieria, situated on a steep hill on the Peneus between Dium and Tempe and at the entrance into Thessaly, built by Demetrius II. and named after his mother Phila (Liv. xlii. 67; Steph. B. s. v.).

Philādelphía (Φιλαδέλφεια: Φιλαδέλφειός). 1. (Allah Shehr, Ru.), a city of Lydia, at the foot of M. Tmolus, on the little river Cogamus, SE. of Sardis. It was built by Attalus Philadelphus, king of Pergamus. It suffered severely from earthquakes; so that in Strabo's time (under Augustus) it had greatly declined. In the reign of Tiberius, it was almost destroyed by one of these visitations. (Strab. p. 628; Tac. Ann. ii. 47; Steph. B. s. v.) It was an early seat of Christianity, and its church is one of the seven to which the Apocalypse is addressed (Rev. iii. 7).—2. A city of Cilicia Aspera, N. of Claudiopolis (Ptol. v. 8, 5).—3. In Palestine. [RABBATAMANA.]

Philādelphus (Φιλάδελφος), a surname of Ptolemaeus II. king of Egypt [PTOLEMAEUS] and of Attalus II. king of Pergamum [ATTALUS].

Philae (Φιλαί: Jesiret-el-Birbeh, i. e. the Island of Temples), an island in the Nile, just above the First Cataract (of Syene), on the S. boundary of the country towards Aethiopia. It was inhabited by Egyptians and Ethiopians jointly, and was covered with magnificent temples, whose splendid ruins still remain. It was celebrated in Egyptian mythology as the burial-place of Osiris and Isis. (Strab. pp. 40, 803, 818, 820; Ptol. iv. 5, 74; Diod. i. 22; Sen. Q. N. iv. 1; Plin. v. 59.)

Philaeni (Φιλαῖνοι), two brothers, citizens of Carthage, of whom the following story is told. A dispute having arisen between the Carthaginians and Cyrenaeans about their boundaries, it was agreed that deputies should start at a fixed time from each of the cities, and that the place of their meeting, wherever it might be, should thenceforth form the limit of the two territories. The Philaeni were appointed for this service on the part of the Carthaginians, and advanced much further than the Cyrenaean party. The Cyrenaeans accused them of having set forth before the time agreed upon, but at length consented to accept the spot which they had reached as a boundary-line, if the Philaeni would submit to be buried alive there in the sand. Should they decline the offer, they were willing, they said, on their side, if permitted to advance as far as they pleased, to purchase for Cyrene an extension of territory by a similar death. The Philaeni accordingly then and there devoted themselves for their country, in the way proposed. The Carthaginians paid high honours to their memory, and erected altars to them where they had died; and from these, even long after all traces of them had vanished, the place still continued to be called 'The Altars of the Philaeni.' (Sall. Jug. 75; cf. Val. Max. v. 6, 4; Strab. pp. 171, 836; Sil. It. xv. 701.) Our main authority for this story is Sallust, who probably derived his information from African traditions during the time that he was proconsul of Numidia. The Greek name by which the heroic brothers have become known to us—Φιλαῖνοι, or lovers of praise—may have been framed to suit the tale, or the tale to explain the name.

Philagrius (Φιλάγριος), a Greek medical writer, born in Epirus, lived after Galen and before Oribasius, and therefore probably in the third century after Christ. He wrote several works, of which only a few fragments remain.

Philammon (Φιλάμμων), a mythical poet and musician of the pre-Homeric period, was said to have been the son of Apollo and the nymph

Chione, or Philonis, or Leuconoë. (Theocr. xxiv. 118; Hyg. Fab. 161; Ov. Met. xi. 317.) By the nymph Agriope, who dwelt on Parnassus, he became the father of Thamyris and Eumolpus (Eur. Rhes. 916; Apollod. i. 8, 3; Paus. iv. 33, 3). He is closely associated with the worship of Apollo at Delphi, and with the music of the cithara. He is said to have established the choruses of girls, who, in the Delphian worship of Apollo, sang hymns in which they celebrated the births of Latona, Artemis, and Apollo. Pausanias relates that in the most ancient musical contests at Delphi, the first who conquered was Chrysothemis of Crete, the second was Philammon, and the next after him his son Thamyris. (Paus. x. 7, 2; Plut. Mus. pp. 1132, 1133.)

Philargyrius Junius, or Philargyrus, or Junilius Flagrius, an early commentator upon Virgil, who wrote upon the Bucolics and Georgics. His observations are less elaborate than those of Servius, and have descended to us in a mutilated condition. The period when he flourished is altogether uncertain. They are printed in the edition of Virgil by Burmann.

Phile or Philes, Manuel (Μανουήλ ὁ Φιλής), a Byzantine poet, and a native of Ephesus, was born about A.D. 1275, and died about 1340. His poem, De Animalium Proprietate, chiefly extracted from Aelian, is edited by De Paw, Traj. Rhen. 1739, and his other poems on various subjects by Wernsdorf, Lips. 1768.

Philēas (Φιλέας), a Greek geographer of Athens, whose time cannot be determined with certainty, but who probably belonged to the older period of Athenian literature (Macrob. v. 20; Avien. Or. Mar. 42). He was the author of a Periplus, which was divided into two parts, one on Asia, and the other on Europe.

Philēmon (Φιλήμων). 1. An aged Phrygian and husband of Baucis. Once upon a time, Zeus and Hermes, assuming the appearance of ordinary mortals, visited Phrygia; but no one was willing to receive the strangers, until the hospitable hut of Philemon and Baucis was opened to them, where the two gods were kindly treated. Zeus rewarded the good old couple by taking them to an eminence, while all the neighbouring district was visited with a sudden inundation. On that eminence Zeus appointed them the guardians of his temple, and allowed them both to die at the same moment, and then changed them into trees (Ov. Met. viii. 620–724).—2. An Athenian poet of the New Comedy, was the son of Damon, and a native of Soli in Cilicia, but at an early age went to Athens, and there received the citizenship (Strab. p. 671). He was born about 360 B.C., a little earlier than Menander, whom, however, he long survived. He began to exhibit about B.C. 330. He was the first poet of the New Comedy in order of time, and the second in celebrity; and he shares with Menander the honour of its invention, or rather of reducing it to a regular form. Philemon lived nearly 100 years. (Diod. xiii. 7; Lucian, Macrob. 25; Val. Max. ix. 12, 6; Suid. s. v.) The manner of his death is differently related: some ascribing it to excessive laughter at a ludicrous incident; others to joy at obtaining a victory in a dramatic contest; while another story represents him as quietly called away by the goddesses whom he served, in the midst of the composition or representation of his last and best work. Although there can be no doubt that Philemon was inferior to Menander as a poet, yet he was a greater favourite with the Athenians, and often conquered his rival in the dramatic contests. [MENANDER.] The extant fragments of Philemon display much liveliness, wit and practical knowledge of life. His favourite subjects seem to have been love intrigues, and his characters were the standing ones of the New Comedy, with which Plautus and Terence have made us familiar. The Mercator and Trinummus of Plautus are adapted from Philemon's plays Ἐμπορος and Θησαυρός. The number of his plays was ninety-seven; the number of extant titles, after the doubtful and spurious are rejected, amounts to about fifty-three; but it is very probable that some of these should be assigned to the younger Philemon. The fragments of Philemon are printed with those of Menander by Meineke, in his Fragmenta Comicorum Graecorum.—3. The younger Philemon, also a poet of the New Comedy, was a son of the former, in whose fame nearly all that belongs to him has been absorbed; so that, although he was the author of fifty-four dramas, there are only two short fragments, and not one title, quoted expressly under his name.—4. The author of a Λεξικὸν τεχνολογικόν, the extant portion of which was first edited by Burney, Lond. 1812, and afterwards by Osann, Berlin, 1821. The author informs us that his work was intended to take the place of a similar Lexicon by the grammarian Hyperechius. The work of Hyperechius was arranged in eight books, according to the eight different parts of speech. Philemon's lexicon was a meagre epitome of this work; and the part of it which is extant consists of the first book and the beginning of the second. Hyperechius lived about the middle of the fifth century of our era, and Philemon may probably be placed in the seventh.

Philætaerus (Φιλέταιρος). 1. Founder of the kingdom of Pergamus, was a native of Tieium in Paphlagonia (Strab. pp. 543, 623). He is first mentioned in the service of Docimus, the general of Antigonos, from which he passed into that of Lysimachus, who entrusted him with the charge of the treasures which he had deposited in the strong fortress of Pergamum. Towards the end of the reign of Lysimachus he declared in favour of Seleucus; and, after the death of the latter (B.C. 280), he took advantage of the disorders in Asia to establish himself in virtual independence. At his death he transmitted the government to his nephew EUMENES. He lived to the age of 80, and died apparently in 263 (Lucian, Macrob. 12).—2. An Athenian poet of the so-called Middle Comedy. He wrote twenty-one plays (Suid. s. v.).

Philetas (Φιλητάς), of Cos, the son of Telephus, a distinguished Alexandrian poet and grammarian, flourished during the reign of the first Ptolemy, who appointed him tutor of his son, Ptolemy II. Philadelphus. His death may be placed about B.C. 280. Philetas seems to have been naturally of a very weak constitution, which at last broke down under excessive study. He was so remarkably thin as to become an object for the ridicule of the comic poets, who represented him as wearing leaden soles to his shoes, to prevent his being blown away by a strong wind. (Athen. pp. 401, 552; Plut. An Seni sit ger. Resp. p. 791; Ael. V.H. ix. 14.) His poetry was chiefly elegiac. Of all the writers in that department he was esteemed the best after Callimachus, to whom a taste less pedantic than that of the Alexandrian critics would probably have preferred him, for, to judge by his fragments, he escaped the snare of learned affectation. These two poets formed the chief models for the Roman elegy; and Propertius expressly states in one passage that he imitated Philetas in preference to Callimachus (Propert. iv. 1, 1). The elegies of Philetas were chiefly amatory, and a large portion of them was devoted to the praises of his mistress Bittis, or, as the Latin poets give the name, Battis. Besides poems, Philetas wrote in prose on grammar and criticism. His most important grammatical work was entitled Ἀτακτα. The fragments of Philetas have been collected by Bach, with those of Hermesianax and Phanocles, Halis Sax. 1829.

Phileus. [PYTHIUS.]

Philinus (Φιλίνος). 1. A Greek of Agrigentum, accompanied Hannibal in his campaigns against Rome, and wrote a history of the Punic wars, in which he exhibited much partiality towards Carthage (Nep. Hann. 18; Pol. i. 14, iii. 26).—2. An Attic orator, a contemporary of Demosthenes and Lysurgus. He is mentioned by Demosthenes in his oration against Midias, who calls him the son of Nicostratus, and says that he was trierarch with him (Dem. Meid. p. 566, § 161). Three orations of Philinus are mentioned by the grammarians (Harpocrat. s. v.).—3. A Greek physician, born in the island of Cos, and the reputed founder of the sect of the Empirici, probably lived in the third century B.C. He wrote a work on part of the Hippocratic collection, and also one on botany.

Philippi (Φίλιπποι: Φιλίππεύς, Φιλίππησιος, Φιλίππηνης: Filibah or Felibejik), a celebrated city in Macedonia Adjuncta [see p. 512, b], was situated on a steep height of Mt. Pangaeus, and on the river Gangas or Gangites, between the rivers Nestus and Strymon. It was founded by Philip on the site of an ancient town Crenides (Κρηνίδες), a colony of the Thasians, who settled here on account of the valuable gold mines in the neighbourhood. (Strab. p. 331; App. B.C. iv. 105, 107.) Philippi is celebrated in history in consequence of the victory gained here by Octavianus and Antony over Brutus and Cassius, B.C. 42, and as the place where the Apostle Paul first preached in Europe, A.D. 53. [For its importance in the history of the Church, see Dict. of the Bible.] It was made a Roman colony by Octavianus after the victory over Brutus and Cassius, under the name of Col. Augusta Julia Philippensis; and it was under the empire a flourishing city (Dio Cass. li. 4; C.I.L. iii. 600). Its seaport was Datum or Datus on the Strymonic gulf.

Philippides (Φιλίππιδης). 1. See PHIDIPPIDES.—2. Of Athens, the son of Philocles, is mentioned as one of the six principal comic poets of the New Comedy by the grammarians. He wrote about B.C. 323. Philippides seems to have deserved the rank assigned to him, as one of the best poets of the New Comedy. He attacked the luxury and corruptions of his age, defended the privileges of his art, and made use of personal satire with a spirit approaching to that of the Old Comedy (Plut.

Demetr. 12, 26, Amat. p. 730). His death is said to have been caused by excessive joy at an unexpected victory (Gell. iii. 15): similar tales are told of the deaths of other poets, as, for example, Sophocles, Alexis, and Philemon. The number of his dramas is stated at forty-five. (Suid. s.v.)

Philippōpolis (Φιλιππόπολις). 1. (Philippopolis), an important town in Thrace founded by Philip of Macedon on the site of a place previously called Eumolpias or Poneropolis. It was situated in a large plain SE. of the Hebrus on a hill with three summits, whence it was sometimes called Trimontium. (Amm. Marc. xxvi. 10, 4; Ptol. iii. 11, 12; Tac. Ann. iii. 38.) Under the Roman empire it was the capital of the province of Thracia in its narrower sense, and one of the most important towns in the country.—2. A city of Arabia, near Bostra, found by the Roman emperor Philippus (Aurel. Vict. Caes. 28).

Philippus (Φίλιππος). I. Minor historical persons. 1. Son of Alexander I. of Macedonia, and brother of Perdiccas II., against whom he rebelled in conjunction with Derdas. The rebels were aided by the Athenians, B.C. 432. (Thuc. i. 57, ii. 95, 100.)—2. Son of Herod the Great, King of Judaea, by his wife Cleopatra, was appointed by his father's will tetrarch of Ituraea and Trachonitis, the sovereignty of which was confirmed to him by the decision of Augustus (Jos. Ant. xvii. 8, xviii. 2). He continued to reign over the dominions thus entrusted to his charge for thirty-seven years (B.C. 4–A.D. 34). He founded the city of Caesarea, surnamed Paneas, but more commonly known as Caesarea Philippi, near the sources of the Jordan, which he named in honour of Augustus. [CAESAREA, No. 2.]—3. Son of Herod the Great, by Mariamne, whose proper name was Herodes Philippus. [See Dict. of the Bible.]

II. Kings of Macedonia.

I., son of Argæus, was the third king, according to Herodotus and Thucydides, who, not reckoning CARANUS and his two immediate successors (Coenus and Thurimas or Turimmas), look upon Perdiccas I. as the founder of the monarchy. Philip left a son, named Aëropus, who succeeded him (Hdt. viii. 137; Thuc. ii. 100; Just. vii. 2).—II., youngest son of Amyntas II. and Eurydice, reigned B.C. 359–336. He was born in 382, and was brought up at Thebes, whither he had been carried as a hostage by Pelopidas, and where he received a most careful education. He thus became acquainted with Greek literature and philosophy, with Greek politics, and with the Greek method of war. (Diod. xvi. 2; Plut. Pelop. 26; Just. vii. 5.) According to some accounts he was for a time a hostage with the Illyrians before he went to Thebes. Upon the death of his brother Perdiccas III., who was slain in battle against the Illyrians, Philip obtained the government of Macedonia, at first merely as regent and guardian to his infant nephew, Amyntas; but within two years he was enabled to set aside the claims of the young prince, and to assume for himself the title of king, B.C. 358. Macedonia was beset by dangers on every side. Its territory was ravaged by the Illyrians on the W., and the Paeonians on the N., while Pausanias and Argæus took advantage of the crisis to put forward their pretensions to the throne. Philip was fully equal to the emergency. By his tact and eloquence he sustained the failing spirits of the Macedonians, while at the same time he introduced among them a stricter military discipline, and organised their army on the plan of the phalanx. He first turned his arms against Argæus, the most formidable of the pretenders, since he was supported by the Athenians. He defeated Argæus in battle, and then concluded a peace with the Athenians. He next attacked the Paeonians, whom he reduced to subjection, and immediately afterwards defeated the Illyrians in a decisive battle, and compelled them to accept a peace, by which they lost a portion of their territory (Diod. xvi. 4). Thus in the short period of one year, and at the age of twenty-four, had Philip delivered himself from his dangerous position, and provided for the security of his kingdom. But energy and talents such as his were not satisfied with mere security, and henceforth his views were directed, not to defence, but to aggrandisement. He first sought to obtain possession of the various Greek cities upon the Macedonian coast. Soon after his accession he had withdrawn his garrison from Amphipolis, and had declared it a free city, because the Athenians had supported Argæus with the hope of recovering Amphipolis, and his continuing to hold the place would have interposed difficulties in the way of a peace with Athens, which was at that time an object of great importance to him. But he had never meant seriously to abandon this important town; and accordingly, having obtained pretexts for war with the Amphipolitans, he laid siege to the town and gained possession of it in 357. (Dem. Olynth. ii. pp. 11, 19, Phil. p. 70; Aristocr. p. 659; [Dem.] Hal. p. 83.) The Athenians had sent no assistance to Amphipolis, because Philip in a secret negotiation with the Athenians, led them to believe that he was willing to restore the city to them when he had taken it, and would do so on condition of their making him master of Pydna. After the capture of Amphipolis, he proceeded at once to Pydna, which seems to have yielded to him without a struggle, and the acquisition of which, by his own arms, and not through the Athenians, gave him a pretext for declining to stand by his secret engagement with them. The hostile feeling which such conduct necessarily excited against him at Athens, made it most important for him to secure the good will of the powerful town of Olynthus, and to detach the Olynthians from the Athenians. Accordingly he gave to the Olynthians the town of Potidaea, which he took from the Athenians in 356. Soon after this, he attacked and took a settlement of the Thasians, called Crenides, and, having introduced into the place a number of new colonists, he named it Philippi after himself. One great advantage of this acquisition was, that it put him in possession of the gold mines of the district, from which he is said to have derived annually a thousand talents (Diod. xvi. 8; Strab. p. 323). From this point there is for some time a pause in the active operations of Philip. In 354 he took Methone after a lengthened siege, in the course of which he himself lost an eye (Diod. xvi. 31, 34; Dem. Olynth. i. p. 12). The capture of this place was a necessary preliminary in any movement towards the S., lying as it did between him and the Thessalian border. He now marched into Thessaly to aid the Aleuadae against Lycophron, the tyrant of Pherae. The Phocians sent a force to support Lycophron, but they were defeated by Philip, at Pagasae, B.C. 352, and their general Onomarchus slain. This victory gave Philip the ascendancy in Thessaly. He established at Pherae what he wished the Greeks to consider a free government, and then advanced southward to Thermopylae. The pass, however, he found guarded by a strong Athenian force, and he was compelled, or at least thought it expedient, to retire. He now turned his arms against Thrace, and succeeded in establishing his ascendancy in that country also. Meanwhile Philip's movements in Thessaly had opened the eyes of Demosthenes to the real danger of Athens and Greece, and his first Philippic (delivered in 352) was his earliest attempt to rouse his countrymen to energetic efforts against their enemy; but he did not produce much effect upon the Athenians. In 349 Philip commenced his attacks on the Chalcidian cities. Olynthus, in alarm, applied to Athens for aid, and Demosthenes, in his three Olynthiac orations, roused the people to efforts against the common enemy, not very vigorous at first and fruitless in the end. In the course of three years Philip gained possession of all the Chalcidian cities, and the war was brought to a conclusion by the capture of Olynthus itself in 348. In the following year he concluded peace with the Athenians on the basis that he kept all that he had gained, and that the Phocians were excluded from the alliance. The consent of the Athenians to this treaty was obtained by the assurances of Philocrates and Aeschines, their ambassadors, who had been bribed by Philip (Dem. F.L. p. 439). In 346 he marched into Phocis, and brought the Phocian war to an end. The Phocian cities were destroyed, and their place in the Amphictyonic council was made over to the king of Macedonia, who was appointed also, jointly with the Thebans and Thessalians, to the presidency of the Pythian games. Ruling as he did over a barbaric nation, such a recognition of his Hellenic character was of the greatest value to him, especially as he looked forward to an invasion of the Persian empire in the name of Greece, united under him in a great national confederacy. During the next few years Philip steadily pursued his ambitious projects. He was engaged in war with Thrace and with Illyria; and he pushed his influence into the Peloponnese by lending troops to aid the Argives in driving back the Spartans (Dem. de Pac. 61; Phil. ii. p. 69). From 342 to 340 he was engaged in an expedition in Thrace, and attempted to bring under his power all the Greek cities in that country (Diod. xvi. 74, 75). In the last of these years he laid siege to Perinthus and Byzantium; but the Athenians, who had long viewed Philip's aggrandisement with fear and alarm, now resolved to send assistance to these cities. Phocion was appointed to the command of the armament destined for this service, and succeeded in compelling Philip to raise the siege of both the cities (339). Philip now proceeded to carry on war against his northern neighbours, and seemed to give himself no further concern about the affairs of Greece. Against the Triballi he was unsuccessful, and received a wound in the thigh (Just. ix. 2). But meanwhile his hirelings were treacherously promoting his designs against the liberties of Greece. In 339 the Amphictyons declared war against the Locrians of Amphissa for having taken possession of a district of the sacred land; but as the general they had appointed to the command of the Amphictyonic army was unable to effect anything against the enemy, the Amphictyons at their next meeting in 338 conferred upon Philip the command of their army. Philip straightway marched through Thermopylae and seized Elatea. The Athenians heard of his approach with alarm; they succeeded, mainly through the influence of Demosthenes, in forming an alliance with the Thebans; but their united army was defeated by Philip in the month of August, 338, in the decisive battle of Chaeronea, which put an end to the independence of Greece. He used his victory, as before in the defeat of the Phocians, with moderation. Thebes was forced to acknowledge the independence of other Boeotian cities and to receive a Macedonian garrison, but escaped destruction: Athens had merely to acknowledge his hegemony in Greece, and received the town of Oropus as a present. Philip now seemed to have within his reach the accomplishment of the great object of his ambition, the invasion and conquest of the Persian empire. In a congress held at Corinth, which was attended by deputies from every Grecian state with the exception of Sparta, war with Persia was determined on, and the king of Macedonia was appointed to command the forces of the national confederacy. In 337 Philip's marriage with Cleopatra, the daughter of Attalus, one of his generals, led to the most serious disturbances in his family. Olympias and Alexander withdrew in great indignation from Macedonia; and though they returned home soon afterwards, they continued to be on hostile terms with Philip. Meanwhile, his preparations for his Asiatic expedition were not neglected, and early in 336 he sent forces into Asia, under Parmenion, to draw over the Greek cities to his cause (Diod. xvi. 91; Just. ix. 5). But in the summer of this year he was murdered at a grand festival which he held at Aegae, to solemnise the nuptials of his daughter with Alexander of Epirus. His murderer was a youth of noble blood, named Pausanias, who stabbed him as he was walking in the procession. The assassin was immediately pursued and slain by some of the royal guards. His motive for the deed is stated by Aristotle to have been private resentment against Philip, to whom he had complained in vain of a gross outrage offered to him by Attalus. Olympias and Alexander were suspected (probably unjustly) of being implicated in the plot. [OLYMPIAS.] Philip died in the forty-seventh year of his age and the twenty-fourth of his reign, and was succeeded by Alexander the Great. Philip had a great number of wives and concubines. Besides Olympias and Cleopatra, we may mention, (1) his first wife, Audata, an Illyrian princess, and the mother of Cynane; (2) Phila, sister of Derdas and Machatas, a princess of Elymiotis; (3) Nicesipolis of Pherae, the mother of Thessalonica; (4) Philinna of Larissa, the mother of Arrhidaeus; (5) Meda, daughter of Cithelas, king of Thrace; (6) Arsinoë, the mother of Ptolemy I., king of Egypt, with whom she was pregnant when she married Lagus. To these numerous connexions temperament as well as policy seems to have inclined him. He was strongly addicted, indeed, to sensual enjoyment of every kind; but his passions, however strong, were always kept in subjection to his interests and ambitious views. He was fond of science and literature, in the patronage of which he appears to have been liberal; and his appreciation of great minds is shown by his connexion with Aristotle. In the pursuit of his political objects he was, as we have seen, unscrupulous, and ever ready to resort to duplicity and corruption; but when we consider the numerous instances of his humanity and clemency, we may admit that he does not appear to disadvantage by the side of other conquerors. (For authorities see the public orations of Demosthenes; Aesch. F. L. and c. Ctes.; Isocr. Phil.; Diod. xvi.; Just. vii.-ix.; Plut. Dem., Phoc., Alex.)—III., the name of Philip was bestowed by the Macedonian army upon Arrhidaeus, the bastard son of Philip II., when he was raised to the throne after the death of Alexander the Great. He accordingly appears in the list of Macedonian kings as Philip III. For his life and reign see ARRHIDAÆUS.—IV., eldest son of Cassander, whom he succeeded on the throne, B.C. 296. He reigned only a few months, and was carried off by a consumptive disorder (Paus. ix. 7; Just. xv. 4, xvi. 1).—V., son of Demetrius II., reigned B.C. 220-178. He was only eight years old at the death of his father, Demetrius (229); and the sovereign power was consequently assumed by his uncle Antigonus Doson, who, though he certainly ruled as king rather than merely as guardian of his nephew, was faithful to the interests of Philip, to whom he transferred the sovereignty at his death in 220, to the exclusion of his own children. (Pol. ii. 45, 70, iv. 2; Just. xxviii. 4.) Philip was only seventeen years old at the time of his accession, but he soon showed that he possessed ability and wisdom superior to his years. In consequence of the defeat of the Achaeans and Aratus by the Aetolians, the former applied for aid to Philip. This was granted; and for the next three years Philip conducted with distinguished success the war against the Aetolians. This war, usually called the Social war, was brought to a conclusion in 217, and at once gained for Philip a distinguished reputation throughout Greece, while his clemency and moderation secured him an equal measure of popularity. (Pol. iv., v.) But a change came over his character soon after the close of the Social war. He became suspicious and cruel; and having become jealous of his former friend and counsellor, Aratus, he caused him to be removed by a slow and secret poison in 213. (Pol. viii. 10-14; Plut. Arat. 52.) Meantime he had become engaged in war with the Romans. In 215 he concluded an alliance with Hannibal; but he did not prosecute the war with any activity against the Romans, who on their part were too much engaged with their formidable adversary in Italy to send any powerful armament against the Macedonian king. (Liv. xxiii. 33-39; Pol. vii. 9.) In 211 the war assumed a new character in consequence of the alliance entered into by the Romans with the Aetolians. It was now carried on with greater vigour and alternate success; but as Philip gained several advantages over the Aetolians, the latter people made peace with Philip in 205. In the course of the same year the Romans likewise concluded a peace with Philip, as they were desirous to give their undivided attention to the war in Africa. It is probable that both parties looked upon this peace as little more than a suspension of hostilities. Such was clearly the view with which the Romans had accepted it; and Philip not only proceeded to carry out his views for his own aggrandisement in Greece, without any regard to the Roman alliances in that country, but he even sent a body of auxiliaries to the Carthaginians in Africa, who fought at Zama under Hannibal. As soon as the Romans had brought the second Punic war to an end, they again declared war against Philip, 200. This war lasted between three and four years, and was brought to an end by the defeat of Philip by the consul Flaminius at the battle of Cynoscephalae in the autumn of 197. [FLAMINIUS.] By the peace finally granted to Philip (196) the king was compelled to abandon all his conquests, both in Europe and Asia, surrender his whole fleet to the Romans, and limit his standing army to 5000 men, besides paying a sum of 1000 talents. (Pol. xviii. 27; Liv. xxxiii. 30.) Philip was now effectually humbled, and endeavoured to cultivate the friendship of the all-powerful republic. But towards the end of his reign he determined to try once more the fortune of war, and began to make active preparations for this purpose. His declining years were embittered by the disputes between his sons Perseus and Demetrius; and the former by forged letters at length persuaded the king that Demetrius was plotting against his life, and induced him to consent to the execution of the unhappy prince. Philip was struck with the deepest grief and remorse when he afterwards discovered the deceit that had been practised upon him. He believed himself to be haunted by the avenging spirit of Demetrius, and died shortly after, imprecating curses upon Perseus. (Liv. xl. 6, 21, 54; Pol. xxiv. 7, 8.) His death took place in 179, in the fifty-ninth year of his age, after a reign of nearly forty-two years.

III. Family of the Marcii Philippi.

1. Q. Marcius Philippus, praetor 188, with Sicily as his province, and consul 186, when he carried on war in Liguria with his colleague Sp. Postumius Albinus. He was defeated by the enemy in the country of the Apuani, and the recollection of his defeat was preserved by the name of the Saltus Marcius. In 169, Philippus was consul a second time, and carried on the war in Macedonia against Perseus, but accomplished nothing of importance. [PERSEUS.] In 164, Philippus was censor with L. Aemilius Paulus, and in his censorship he set up in the city a new sun-dial. (Liv. xxxviii. 35, xxxix. 20, xlii. 37, xlii. 1-16; Plin. vii. 214.)—2. L. Marcius Philippus, was a tribune of the plebs, 104, when he brought forward an agrarian law, and was consul in 91 with Sex. Julius Caesar. In this year Philippus, who belonged to the popular party, opposed with the greatest vigour the measures of the tribune Drusus, who at first enjoyed the full confidence of the senate. But his opposition was all in vain; the laws of the tribune were carried. Soon afterwards Drusus began to be regarded with mistrust and suspicion; Philippus became reconciled to the senate, and on his proposition a senatus consultum was passed, declaring all the laws of Drusus to be null and void, as having been carried against the auspices. [Drusus.] In the civil wars between Marius and Sulla, Philippus took no part. He survived the death of Sulla; and he is mentioned afterwards as one of those who advocated sending Pompey to conduct the war in Spain against Sertorius (Plut. Pomp. 17). Philippus was one of the most distinguished orators of his time (Hor. Epist. i. 7, 46; Cic. de Or. ii. 78). In this respect he was reckoned only inferior to Crassus and Antonius. He was a man of luxurious habits, which his wealth enabled him to gratify: his fish-ponds were particularly celebrated for their magnificence and extent, and are mentioned by the ancients along with those of Lucullus and Hortensius (Varr. R. R. iii. 3, 10). Besides his son, L. Philippus, who is spoken of below, he had a stepson, Gellius Publicola [PUBLICOLA].—3. L. Marcius Philippus, son of the preceding, was consul in 56. Upon the death of C. Octavius, the father of Augustus, Philippus married his widow Atia, and thus became the stepfather of Augustus. Philippus was a timid man. Notwithstanding his close connexion with Caesar's family, he remained neutral in the civil wars; and after the assassination of Caesar, he endeavoured to dissuade his stepson, the young Octavius, from accepting the inheritance which the dictator had left him. (Vell. Pat. ii. 60; Suet. Aug. 8; App. B. C. iii. 10, 13.) He lived till his stepson had acquired the supremacy of the Roman world. He restored the temple of Hercules and the Muses, and surrounded it with a colonnade, which is frequently mentioned under the name of Porticus Philippi (Clari monumenta Philippi, Ov. Fast. vi. 801; cf. Suet. Aug. 29).

IV. Emperors of Rome.

1. M. Julius Philippus I., Roman emperor A.D. 244-249, was an Arabian by birth, and entered the Roman army, in which he rose to high rank. He accompanied Gordianus III. in his expedition against the Persians; and upon the death of the excellent Misitheus [MISITHEUS] he was promoted to the vacant office of praetorian praefect. He availed himself of the influence of his high office to excite discontent among the soldiers, who at length assassinated Gordian, and proclaimed Philippus emperor, 244. Philippus proclaimed his son Caesar, concluded a disgraceful peace with Sapor, founded the city of Philippopolis, and then returned to Rome. In 245 he was engaged in prosecuting a successful war against the Carpi, on the Danube. In 248, rebellions, headed by Iotapinus and Marinus, broke out simultaneously in the East and in Moesia. Both pretenders speedily perished, but Decius having been despatched to recall the legions on the Danube to their duty, was himself forcibly invested with the purple by the troops, and compelled by them to march upon Italy. Philippus having gone forth to encounter his rival, was slain near Verona either in battle or by his own soldiers. The great domestic event of the reign of Philippus was the exhibition of the Secular Games, which were celebrated with even more than the ordinary degree of splendour, since Rome had now, according to the received tradition, attained the thousandth year of her existence (A.D. 248). (Aurel. Vict. Caes. xxviii.; Eutrop. ix. 3; Zonar. xii. 19.)—2. M. Julius Philippus II., son of the foregoing, was a boy of seven at the accession (244) of his father, by whom he was proclaimed Caesar, and three years afterwards (247) received the title of Augustus. In 249 he was slain, according to Zosimus, at the battle of Verona, or murdered, according to Victor, at Rome by the praetorians when intelligence arrived of the defeat and death of the emperor. (Aurel. Vict. Caes. xxviii.; Zos. i. 22.)

V. Literary.

1. Of Medma, in the S. of Italy, a Greek astronomer, and a disciple of Plato. His observations, which were made in the Peloponnesus and in Locris, were used by the astronomers Hipparchus, Geminus the Rhodian, and Ptolemy. (Plin. xviii. 312; Vitruv. ix. 7.)—2. Of Thessalonica, an epigrammatic poet, who, besides composing a large number of epigrams himself, compiled one of the ancient Greek Anthologies. The whole number of epigrams ascribed to him in the Greek Anthology is nearly ninety; but of these six (Nos. 36-41) ought to be ascribed to Lucilius, and a few others are manifestly borrowed from earlier poets, while others are mere imitations. The Anthology (Ἀνθολογία) of Philip, in imitation of that of Meleager, and as a sort of supplement to it, contains chiefly the epigrams of poets who lived in, or shortly before, the time of Philip. The earliest of these poets seems to be Philodemus, the contemporary of Cicero, and the latest Automedon, who probably flourished under Nerva. Hence it is inferred that Philip flourished under Trajan.

Philiscus (Φιλίσκος). 1. Of Abydos, was sent by Ariobarzanes, satrap of Phrygia, B.C. 368, as envoy to mediate between the Thebans and Spartans. A congress was held at Delphi which led to nothing. Philiscus seems to have made the mission a pretext for levying mercenaries for Ariobarzanes, who was meditating a revolt. Philiscus afterwards exercised a tyranny over Greeks in Asia Minor, and was assassinated at Lampsacus. (Xen. Hell. vii. 1; Diod. xv. 70.)—2. An Athenian poet of the Middle Comedy, of whom little is known. He must have flourished about B.C. 400, or a little later, as his portrait was painted by Parrhasius (Plin. xxxv. 70).—3. Of Miletus, an orator or rhetorician, and the disciple of Isocrates, wrote a Life of the orator Lycurgus, and an epitaph on Lysias (Suid. s. v.).—4. Of Aegina, a Cynic philosopher, was the disciple of Diogenes the Cynic, and the teacher of Alexander in grammar (Diog. Laërt. vi. 73).—5. Of Corcyra, a distinguished tragic poet, and one of the seven who formed the Tragic Pleiad at Alexandria, was also a priest of Dionysus, and in that character he was present at the coronation procession of Ptolemy Philadelphus in B.C. 284. He wrote forty-two dramas. (Athen. p. 198; Plin. xxxv. 106.)—6. Of Rhodes, a sculptor, several of whose works were placed in the temple of Apollo, adjoining the portico of Octavia at Rome. One of these statues was that of the god himself: the others were Latona and Diana, the nine Muses, and another statue of Apollo, without drapery (Plin. xxxvi. 34). He probably lived about B.C. 146.

Philistinae Fossae. [PADUS.]

Philistion (Φιλιστίων). 1. Of Nicaea or Magnesia, a mimographer, who flourished in the time of Augustus, about A.D. 7 (Suid. s.v.).—2. A physician, born either at one of the Greek towns in Sicily, or at Locri Epizephyrii in Italy, was tutor to the physician Chrysippus of Cnidos and the astronomer and physician Eudoxus, and therefore must have lived in the fourth century B.C. (Diog. Laërt. viii. 8, 89; Gell. xvii. 11).

Philistus (Φίλιστος), a Syracusan, son of Archonides or Archomenides, was born probably about B.C. 435 (Suid. s.v.; Paus. v. 23, 6). He assisted Dionysius in obtaining the supreme power, and stood so high in the favour of the tyrant that the latter entrusted him with the charge of the citadel of Syracuse. But at a later period he excited the jealousy of the tyrant by marrying, without his consent, one of the daughters of his brother Leptines, and was in consequence banished from Sicily. He at first retired to Thurii, but afterwards established himself at Adria, where he composed his history (Diod. xv. 7). He was recalled from exile by the younger Dionysius soon after his accession, and quickly succeeded in establishing his influence over the mind of the latter. He exerted all his efforts to alienate Dionysius from his former friends, and not only caused Plato to be sent back to Athens, but ultimately succeeded in effecting the banishment of Dion also. Philistus was unfortunately absent from Sicily when Dion first landed in the island and made himself master of Syracuse, B.C. 356. He afterwards raised a powerful fleet, with which he gave battle to the Syracusans, but having been defeated, and finding himself cut off from all hopes of escape, he put an end to his own life (Plut. Dion, 11–35; Diod. xvi. 11, 16). Philistus wrote a History of Sicily, which was one of the most celebrated historical works of antiquity, though unfortunately only a few fragments of it have come down to us. He is accused of an inclination to favour tyranny and palliate the injustice of princes (Plut. Dion, 36; Nep. Dion, 3). It consisted of two portions, which might be regarded either as two separate works, or as parts of one great whole, a circumstance which explains the discrepancies in the statements of the number of books of which it was composed. The first seven books comprised the general history of Sicily, commencing from the earliest times, and ending with the capture of Agrigentum by the Carthaginians, B.C. 406. The second part, which formed a sequel to the first, contained the history of the elder Dionysius in four books, and that of the younger in two: the latter was necessarily imperfect. In point of style Philistus is represented by the concurrent testimony of antiquity as imitating and even closely resembling Thucydides, though still falling far short of his great model (Cic. ad Q. Fr. ii. 13; Quintil. x. 1, 74).—The fragments of Philistus have been collected by Goeller in an appendix to his work De Situ et Origine Syracusarum, Lips. 1818, and by C. Müller, in the Fragm. Hist. Graec. Paris, 1841.

Philo (Φίλων). 1. An Academic philosopher, was a native of Larissa and a disciple of Clitomachus. After the conquest of Athens by Mithridates he removed to Rome, where he settled as a teacher of philosophy and rhetoric, and had Cicero as one of his hearers (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 1, Brut. 89, 306). His works supplied Cicero with materials for his account of the New Academy in the Academica (cf. Cic. Ac. i. 4, 13, ii. 4, 11).—2. Byblius, also called HERENNIUS BYBLIUS, a Roman grammarian, and a native of Byblus in Phoenicia, lived in the time of Vespasian. He wrote many works, which are cited by Suidas and others; but his name is chiefly connected with a translation of the writings of the Phoenician Sanchuniathon which was ascribed to him. [SANCHUNIATHON.]—3. Of Byzantium, a celebrated mechanician, and a contemporary of Ctesibius, flourished about B.C. 146. He wrote a work on military engineering, of which the fourth and fifth books have come down to us. (Ed. Köchly and Rüstow, 1853.) There is also attributed to this Philo a work On the Seven Wonders of the World: i.e. the Hanging Gardens, the Pyramids, the statue of Jupiter Olympius, the Walls of Babylon, the Colossus of Rhodes, the Temple of Artemis at Ephesus, and, we may presume from the prooemium, the Mausoleum; but the last is entirely wanting, and we have only a fragment of the Ephesian temple. The work, however, is probably by a different, and later, writer. Edited by Orelli, Lips. 1816.—4. Judaeus, the Jew, was born at Alexandria, and was descended from a priestly family of distinction. He had already reached an advanced age, when he went to Rome (A.D. 40) on an embassy to the emperor Caligula, in order to procure the revocation of the decree which exacted from the Jews divine homage to the statue of the emperor. We have no other particulars of the life of Philo worthy of record. His most important works treat of the books of Moses, and are generally cited under different titles. His great object was to reconcile the Sacred Scriptures with the doctrines of the Greek philosophy, and to point out the conformity between the two. He maintained that the fundamental truths of Greek philosophy were derived from the Mosaic revelation; and in order to make the latter agree more perfectly with the former, he had recourse to an allegorical interpretation of the books of Moses. Philo adopted Eastern views of emanation, and his doctrines on the emanation of the forces of the world from the Logos, or creative wisdom of God, influenced on the one hand the Gnostics, on the other the later school of Neo-Platonists. The best edition of his works is by Mangey, Lond. 1742, two vols. fo.—5. A Megarian philosopher, was a disciple of Diodorus Cronus, and a friend of Zeno.—6. Of Tarsus in Cilicia, a celebrated physician, frequently quoted by Galen and others.—7. Artists. (1) Son of Antipater, a statuary who lived in the time of Alexander the Great, and made the statue of Hephaestion, and also the statue of Zeus Ourios, which stood on the shore of the Black Sea, at the entrance of the Bosphorus, near Chalcedon, and formed an important landmark for sailors. It was still perfect in the time of Cicero (in Verr. iv. 58, 129), and the base has been preserved to modern times, bearing an inscription of eight elegiac verses. Other works are alluded to by Pliny (xxxiv. 91).—(2) A great architect at Athens in the time of the immediate successors of Alexander. He built for Demetrius Phalereus, about B.C. 318, the portico of twelve Doric columns to the great temple at Eleusis. [See pp. 311, 312.] He also constructed for the Athenians, under the administration of Lycurgus, a basin (armamentarium) in the Piræus in which 1000 ships could lie (Plin. vii. 125; C.I.L. ii. 1054). This work, which excited the greatest admiration, was destroyed in the taking of Athens by Sulla, but afterwards restored. (Plut. Sull. 14; Val. Max. viii. 12, 2; Strab. p. 395.)

Philo, Q. Publilius, a distinguished general in the Samnite wars, and the author of one of the great reforms in the Roman constitution. He was consul B.C. 339, with Ti. Aemilius Mamercinus, and defeated the Latins, over whom he triumphed. In the same year he was appointed dictator by his colleague Aemilius Mamercinus, and, as such, proposed the celebrated Publiliae Leges, which were a most important step in equalising the patrician and plebeian orders, by ordaining that one of the censors must be a plebeian, and by making the decrees of the plebs binding. (Dict. of Antiq. art. Publiliae Leges.) In 337 Philo was the first plebeian praetor, and in 332 he was censor with Sp. Postumius Albinus. In 327 he was consul a second time, and carried on war in the S. of Italy. He was continued in the command for the following year with the title of proconsul, the first instance in Roman history in which a person was invested with proconsular power. He took Palaepolis in 326. In 320 he was consul a third time, with L. Papirius Cursor, and carried on the war against the Samnites. (Liv. viii. 15–26, ix. 7–15; Diod. xix. 56.)

Philo, L. Veturius. 1. L., consul B.C. 220, with C. Lutatius Catulus; dictator 217 for the purpose of holding the comitia; and censor 210 with P. Licinius Crassus Dives, and died while holding this office (Liv. xxii. 33, xxvii. 6).—2. L., praetor 209, with Cisalpine Gaul as his province. In 207 he served under Claudius Nero and Livius Salinator in the campaign against Hasdrubal. In 206 he was consul with Q. Caecilius Metellus, and in conjunction with his colleague carried on the war against Hannibal in Bruttium. He accompanied Scipio to Africa, and after the battle of Zama, 202, was sent to Rome to announce the news of Hannibal's defeat. (Liv. xxviii. 9–11, xxx. 38, 40.)

Philochâres (Φιλοχάρης), a painter, mentioned by Pliny (xxxv. 28), is supposed by some to be the same as the brother of Aeschines of whose artistic performances Demosthenes speaks contemptuously (F. L. p. 329).

Philochôrus (Φιλόχορος), a celebrated Athenian writer, chiefly known by his Atthis, or work on the legends, antiquities, and history of Attica. He was a person of considerable importance in his native city, and was put to death by Antigonus Gonatas when the latter obtained possession of Athens, about B.C. 260. (Suidas s.v.) His most important work, the Atthis, consisted of seventeen books, and related the history of Attica, from the earliest times to the reign of Antiochus Theos, B.C. 261. The work is frequently quoted by the scholiasts, lexicographers, and other later authors.—The fragments have been published by Siebelis, Lips. 1811, and by Müller, Fragm. Hist. Graec.

Philôcles (Φιλοκλῆς). 1. An Athenian tragic poet, the sister's son of Aeschylus; his father's name was Philopithes. He is said to have composed 100 tragedies. In the general character of his plays he was an imitator of Aeschylus, and that he was not unworthy of his great master may be inferred from the fact that he gained a victory over Sophocles when the latter exhibited his Oedipus Tyrannus, B.C. 429. Philocles was frequently ridiculed by the comic poets. One of his plays, called Tereus, on the story of Philomela, is alluded to in Aristoph. Av. 281; in Ar. Vesp. 462 it is insinuated that his lyrics were unmusical, and the scholiast says that he was nicknamed Χολῆς.—2. Joined with Conon in command of the Athenian fleet after the battle of Arginusae. He was cruel to his prisoners, for which Lysander put him to death after Aegospotami. (Xen. Hell. i. 7, 1, ii. 1, 30; Plut. Lys. 13.)

Philôcrâtes (Φιλοκράτης). 1. Son of Ephialtes, went in 390 with ships to aid Evagoras of Cyprus. His squadron was captured by Teutias, the Spartan admiral. (Xen. Hell. iv. 8, 24).—2. An Athenian orator, was one of the venal supporters of Philip in opposition to Demosthenes (Dem. de Cor. p. 230).

Philoctêtes (Φιλοκτήτης), a son of Poeas (whence he is called Poeantiades, Ov. Met. xiii. 313) and Demonassa, the most celebrated archer in the Trojan war. He led the warriors from Methone, Thaumacia, Meliboea, and Oizon, against Troy, in seven ships. But on his voyage thither he was left behind by his men in the island of Lemnos, because he was ill of a wound which he had received from the bite of a snake; and Medon, the son of Oileus and Rhene, undertook the command of his troops. (Il. ii. 716; Od. iii. 190, viii. 219.) This is all that the Homeric poems relate of Philoctetes, with the addition that he returned home in safety; but the cyclic and tragic poets have added numerous details to the story. Thus they relate that he was the friend and armour-bearer of Heracles, who instructed him in the use of the bow, and who bequeathed to him his bow, with the poisoned arrows. These presents were a reward for his having erected and set fire to the pile on Mt. Oeta, where Heracles burnt himself. (Diod. iv. 38; Hyg. Fab. 36; Philostr. Her. 5; Ov. Met. ix. 232.) Philoctetes was also one of the suitors of Helen, and thus took part in the Trojan war. On his voyage to Troy, while staying in the island of Chryse, he was bitten by a snake. This misfortune happened to him when he was showing to the Greeks the altar of Athene Chryse, or while he was looking at the tomb of Troilus in the temple of Apollo Thymbraeus, or as he was pointing out to his companions the altar of Heracles. (Soph. Phil. 1327; Philostr. Im. 17; Dict. Cret. ii. 14.) According to some accounts, the wound in his foot was not inflicted by a serpent, but by his own poisoned arrows (Serv. ad Aen. iii. 402). The wound is said to have become ulcerated, and to have produced such an intolerable stench that the Greeks, on the advice of Odysseus, abandoned Philoctetes, and left him alone on the solitary coast of Lemnos, or (according to the account which Proclus cites from the Cypria, and which Euripides followed in his Philoctetes) on the island of Tenedos. He remained in this island till the tenth year of the Trojan war, when Odysseus and Diomedes came to fetch him to Troy, as an oracle had declared that the city could not be taken without the arrows of Heracles. He accompanied these heroes to Troy, and on his arrival Apollo sent him into a deep sleep, during which Machaon (or Podalirius, or both, or Asclepius himself) cut out the wound, washed it with wine, and applied healing herbs to it. (Quint. Smyrn. x. 180; Soph. Phil. 1426; Propert. ii. 1, 61.) Philoctetes was thus cured, and soon after slew Paris, whereupon Troy fell into the hands of the Greeks (Apollod. iii. 12, 6). On his return from Troy he is said to have been cast upon the coast of Italy, where he settled, and built Petelis and Crimissa. In the latter place he founded a sanctuary of Apollo Alaeus, to whom he dedicated his bow. (Strab. p. 254.)

Philodēmus (Φιλόδημος), of Gadara, in Palestine, an Epicurean philosopher and epigrammatic poet, contemporary with Cicero. The Greek Anthology contains thirty-four of his epigrams, which are chiefly of a light and amatory character, and which quite bear out Cicero's statements concerning the licentiousness of his matter and the elegance of his manner. (Cic. in Pis. 28, 29.) Philodemus is also mentioned by Horace (Sat. i. 2, 121).

Philōlaus (Φιλόλαος), a distinguished Pythagorean philosopher, was a native of Croton or Tarentum. He was a contemporary of Socrates, and the instructor of Simmias and Cebes at Thebes, where he appears to have lived many years. (Plat. Phaed. p. 61; Diog. Laërt. viii. 84.) Pythagoras and his earliest successors did not commit any of their doctrines to writing, and the first publication of the Pythagorean doctrines is pretty uniformly attributed to Philolaus. He composed a work on the Pythagorean philosophy in three books, which Plato is said to have procured at the cost of 100 minae through Dion of Syracuse, who purchased it from Philolaus, who was at the time in deep poverty. (Diog. Laërt. l.c.; Gell. iii. 17.) Plato is said to have derived from this work the greater part of his Timaeus. Some fragments have been collected by Böckh of which those from the work Περὶ ψυχῆς are generally considered to be spurious.

Philōmēla (Φιλομήλα), daughter of king Pandion in Attica, who, being dishonoured by her brother-in-law, Tereus, was metamorphosed into a nightingale. The story is given under TEREUS.

Philōmēlium or Philomēlium (Φιλομήλιον, or in the Pisidian dialect Φιλομηδὴ: Φιλομηλεύς, Philomelensis or Philomeliensis: prob. Ak-Shehr, Ru.), a city of Phrygia Parorios, on the borders of Lycaonia and Pisidia, mentioned by Cicero (ad Fam. iii. 8, xv. 4), said to have been named from the numbers of nightingales in its neighbourhood. In the division of the provinces under Constantine, it belonged to Pisidia. (Strab. p. 663; Procop. Hist. Arc. 18.)

Philōmēlus (Φιλόμηλος), a general of the Phocians in the Phocian or Sacred war, persuaded his countrymen to seize the temple of Delphi, and to apply its riches to the purpose of defending themselves against the Amphictyonic forces, B.C. 357. He commanded the Phocians during the early years of the war, but was slain in battle in 353. He was succeeded in the command by his brother Onomarchus. (Diod. xvi. 23; Paus. x. 2, 8.)

Philōnides (Φιλωνίδης), an Athenian poet of the Old Comedy, who is, however, better known on account of his connexion with the literary history of Aristophanes. Several of the plays of Aristophanes were brought out in the names of Callistratus and Philonides [cf. p. 115]. It appears that Aristophanes used the name of Philonides for the Banquetters and the Frogs.

Philōnōmē. [TENES.]

Philōpoemen (Φιλοποίμην), of Megalopolis in Arcadia, one of the few great men that Greece produced in the decline of her political independence, who is called by Roman admirers 'the last of the Greeks' (Plut. Philop. 1, Arat. 24). The great object of his life was to infuse into the Achaeans a military spirit, and thereby to establish their independence on a firm and lasting basis. He was the son of Craugis, a distinguished man at Megalopolis, and was born about B.C. 252. He lost his father at an early age, and was brought up by Cleander, an illustrious citizen of Mantinea, who had been obliged to leave his native city, and had taken refuge at Megalopolis. He received instruction from Ecdemus and Demophanes, both of whom had studied the Academic philosophy under Arcesilaus. At an early age he became distinguished by his love of arms and his bravery in war, showing a remarkable capacity for strategy (Liv. xxxv. 28; Plut. Philop. 7). He is said to have studied especially the Tactics of Evangelus and the histories of Alexander's campaigns (Plut. ib. 4). His name first occurs in history in B.C. 222, when Megalopolis was taken by Cleomenes (Plut. ib. 5), and in the following year (221) he fought with conspicuous valour at the battle of Sellasia, in which Cleomenes was completely defeated. In order to gain additional military experience, he soon afterwards sailed to Crete, and served for some years in the wars between the cities of that island. On his return to his native country, in 210, he was appointed commander of the Achaean cavalry: and in 203 he was elected strategus or general of the Achaean League, and laboured successfully at military reforms which brought the army into an excellent state of efficiency (Pol. x. 24). In this year he defeated Machanidas, tyrant of Lacedaemon, and slew him in battle with his own hand (Pol. xi. 13). In 201 he was again elected general of the league, when he defeated Nabis, who had succeeded Machanidas as tyrant of Lacedaemon. Soon afterwards Philopoemen took another voyage to Crete, and assumed the command of the forces of Gortyna. He did not return to Peloponnesus till 194. He was made general of the league in 192, when he again defeated Nabis, who was slain in the course of the year by some Aetolian mercenaries. It is said that when Diophanes, the Achaean general, and Flamininus were marching to Sparta in 191 to crush some attempt at revolt, Philopoemen hurried thither in advance, and, having quieted the city, induced the Roman and Achaean troops to pass it by; and that when the Spartans in gratitude offered him 120 talents (the proceeds of the estate of Nabis) he refused the present, as unbecoming a man of honour. Philopoemen was re-elected general of the league several times afterwards; but the state of Greece did not afford him much further opportunity for the display of his military abilities. The Romans were now in fact the masters of Greece, and Philopoemen clearly saw that it would be an act of madness to offer open resistance to their authority. At the same time, as the Romans still recognised in words the independence of the league, Philopoemen offered a resolute resistance to all their encroachments upon the liberties of his country, whenever he could do so without affording them any pretext for war. In 188, when he was general of the league, he took Sparta, whose troops had attacked Las, a town which had joined the league. He demanded the surrender of the instigators, and failing to obtain them treated Sparta with great severity. He razed the walls and fortifications of the city, abolished the institutions of Lycurgus, and compelled the citizens to adopt the Achaean laws in their stead. In 183 the Messenians revolted from the Achaean League. Philopoemen, who was general of the league for the eighth time, hastily collected a body of cavalry, and pressed forward to Messene. He fell in with a large body of Messenian troops, by whom he was taken prisoner, and carried to Messene. Here he was thrown into a dungeon, and was compelled by Dinocrates to drink poison. The news of his death filled the whole of Peloponnesus with grief and rage. An assembly was immediately held at Megalopolis; Lycortas was chosen general, and in the following year he invaded Messenia, which was laid waste far and wide; Dinocrates and the chiefs of his party were obliged to put an end to their lives. The remains of Philopoemen were conveyed to Megalopolis in solemn procession; and the urn which contained the ashes was carried by the historian Polybius. (Plut. Philop. 21; Liv. xxxix. 49; Pol. xxiv. 9, 12.) His remains were then interred at Megalopolis with heroic honours; and soon afterwards statues of him were erected in most of the towns belonging to the Achaean League. It does not detract from the nobility of Philopoemen's character and the purity of his aims, that in much of his military success he was really playing the game of the Romans. His true policy, if it had been possible, would have been to combine with the Spartans and Messenians instead of fighting against them, and to oppose a united Greece to the Romans. But the opportunity for this had probably been irretrievably lost long before when Aratus rejected the overtures of Cleomenes [see p. 97, a]. The contest with Sparta in the time of Machanidas and Nabis was unavoidable. (Life by Plutarch; Paus. viii. 49-52; references to Polybius and Livy, as above.)

Philostéphānus (Φιλοστέφανος), of Cyrene, an Alexandrian writer of history and geography, the friend and disciple of Callimachus, flourished under Ptolemy II. Philadelphus, about B.C. 249 (Athen. pp. 293, 297, 331).

Philostorgius (Φιλοστοργίος), a native of Borsippus in Cappadocia, was born about A.D. 358. He wrote an ecclesiastical history, from the heresy of Arius in 300, down to 425. Philostorgius was an Arian, which is probably the reason why his work has not come down to us. It was originally in twelve books; and we still possess an abstract of it, made by PHOTIUS.

Philostrātus (Φιλόστρατος), the name of a distinguished family of Lemnos, of which there are mentioned three persons in the history of Greek literature. 1. Son of Verus, taught at Athens; but we know nothing about him, with the exception of the titles of his works, given by Suidas. He could not, however, have lived in the reign of Nero, according to the statement of Suidas, since his son was not born till the latter part of the second century.—2.

Flavius Philostratus, son of the preceding, and the most eminent of the three, was born about A.D. 182. He studied and taught at Athens, and is usually called the Athenian, to distinguish him from the younger Philostratus [No. 3], who more usually bears the surname of the Lemnian. Flavius afterwards removed to Rome, where we find him a member of the circle of literary men whom the philosophic Julia Domna, the wife of Severus, had drawn around her. It was at her desire that he wrote the Life of Apollonius. He was alive in the reign of the emperor Philippus (244-249). The following works of Philostratus have come down to us:—(1) The Life of Apollonius of Tyana (τὰ ἐς τὸν Τυανέα Ἀπολλώνιον), in eight books.

[See APOLLONIUS, No. 7.] (2) Lives of the Sophists (Βίοι Σοφιστῶν), in two books, contains the history of philosophers who had the character of being sophists, and of those who were in reality sophists. It began with the Life of Gorgias, and comes down to the contemporaries of Philostratus in the reign of Philippus. (3) Heroica or Heroicus (Ἡρωικά, Ἡρωικός), is in the form of a dialogue, and gives an account of the heroes engaged in the Trojan war. (4) Imagines (Εἰκόνες), in two books, contains an account of various paintings. This is the author's most pleasing work, exhibiting great richness of fancy, power and variety of delineation, and a rich exuberance of style; but there is doubt whether he is describing real or imaginary works of art. (5) Epistolae (Ἐπιστολαί), seventy-three in number, chiefly amatory. The best editions of the collected works of Philostratus are by Olearius, Lips. 1709, and by Kayser, Lips. 1870, 1871.—3. Philostratus, the younger, usually called the Lemnian, as mentioned above, was a son of Nervianus and of a daughter of Flavius Philostratus, but is erroneously called by Suidas a son-in-law of the latter. He enjoyed the instructions of his grandfather and of the sophist Hippodromus. He visited Rome, but he taught at Athens, and died in Lemnos. He wrote several works, and among others one entitled Imagines, in imitation of his grandfather's work, of which a portion is still extant (printed in Kayser's edition of Philostratus No. 2).

Philōtas (Φιλώτας), son of Parmenion, enjoyed a high place in the friendship of Alexander, and in the invasion of Asia obtained the chief command of the ἑταῖροι, or native Macedonian cavalry. He served with distinction in the battles of the Granicus and Arbela, and also on other occasions; but in B.C. 330, while the army was in Drangiana, he was accused of being privy to a plot which had been formed by a Macedonian, named Dimnus, against the king's life. There was no proof of his guilt; but a confession was wrung from him by the torture, and he was stoned to death by the troops after the Macedonian fashion. [PARMENION.]

Philōtīmus (Φιλότιμος), an eminent Greek physician, pupil of Praxagoras, and fellow-pupil of Herophilus, lived in the fourth and third centuries B.C.

Philoxēnus (Φιλόξενος). 1. A Macedonian officer of Alexander the Great, received the government of Cilicia from Perdiccas in 321 (Arrian, An. iii. 6, 6; Diod. xviii. 89).—2. Of Cythera, one of the most distinguished dithyrambic poets of Greece, was born B.C. 435 and died 380, at the age of fifty-five. He was reduced to slavery in his youth, and was bought by the lyric poet Melanippides, by whom he was educated in dithyrambic poetry. After residing some years at Athens, he went to Syracuse, where he speedily obtained the favour of Dionysius, and took up his abode at his court. But soon afterwards he offended Dionysius, and was cast into prison (Cic. ad Att. iv. 6); an act of oppression which most writers ascribe to the wounded vanity of the tyrant, whose poems Philoxenus not only refused to praise, but, on being asked to revise one of them, said that the best way of correcting it would be to draw a black line through the whole paper. Another account ascribes his disgrace to too close an intimacy with the tyrant's mistress, Galatea; but this looks like a fiction arising out of a misunderstanding of the object of his poem entitled Cyclops or Galatea, which was written after his departure from Sicily, and intended as a literary revenge upon Dionysius, who was wholly or partially blind of one eye. After some time he was released from prison, and restored outwardly to the favour of Dionysius; but he finally left his court, and is said to have spent the latter part of his life in Ephesus.—Of the dithyrambs of Philoxenus by far the most important was his Cyclops or Galatea, the loss of which is greatly to be lamented. Philoxenus also wrote another poem, entitled Deipnon (Δείπνον) or the Banquet, which appears to have been the most popular of his works, and of which we have more fragments than of any other. This poem was a most minute and satirical description of a banquet, and the subject of it was furnished by the luxury of the court of Dionysius. Philoxenus was included in the attacks which the comic poets made on all the musicians of the day, for their corruptions of the simplicity of the ancient music; but we have abundant testimony to the high esteem in which he was held both during his life and after his death. (Suid. s.v.; Diod. xiv. 46.) Fragments of his poems by Bippart, Lips. 1843, and in Bergk's Poët. Lyr. Graec.—3. The Leucadian, lived at Athens about the same time as Philoxenus of Cythera, with whom he is frequently confounded by the grammarians. He was the son of Eryxis, and his son also bore that name. Like his more celebrated namesake, the Leucadian was ridiculed by the poets of the Old Comedy, and seems to have spent a part of his life in Sicily. The Leucadian was a most notorious parasite, glutton, and effeminate debauchee; but he seems also to have had great wit and good-humour, which made him a favourite at the tables which he frequented. (Aristoph. Ran. 934; Schol. ad loc.)—4. A celebrated Alexandrian grammarian, who taught at Rome (Suid. s. v.), and wrote on Homer, on the Ionic and Laconian dialects, and several other grammatical works, among which was a Glossary, which was edited by H. Stephanus, Paris, 1573.—5. An Aegyptian surgeon, who wrote several valuable volumes on surgery. He must have lived in or before the first century after Christ.—6. A painter of Eretria, the disciple of Nicomachus, who painted for Cassander a battle of Alexander with Darius (Plin. xxxv. 110).

Philus, Furius. 1. P., was consul B.C. 223 with C. Flaminius, and accompanied his colleague in his campaign against the Gauls in the N. of Italy. He was praetor 216, when he commanded the fleet, with which he proceeded to Africa. In 214 he was censor with M. Atilius Regulus, but died at the beginning of the following year. (Liv. xxii. 35; xxv. 2.)—2. L., consul 136, received Spain as his province, and was commissioned by the senate to deliver up to the Numantines C. Hostilius Mancinus, the consul of the preceding year. Philus, like his contemporaries Scipio Africanus the younger and Laelius, was fond of Greek literature and refinement. He is introduced by Cicero as one of the speakers in his dialogue De Republica. (Val. Max. iii. 7, 5; Cic. Off. iii. 30, 109, Rep. iii. 18, 28.)

Philyllius (Φιλύλλιος), an Athenian comic poet, belongs to the latter part of the Old Comedy and the beginning of the Middle (Athen. p. 700).

Philyræis (Φιλυρηΐς: prob. the little island off C. Zefreh, E. of Kerasunt-Ada), an island off the N. coast of Asia Minor (Pontus), E. of the country of Mosynoeci, and near the promontory of Zephyrium, where CHIRON was nurtured by his mother Philyra (Ap. Rhod. ii. 1231).

Philyres (Φίλυρες), a people on the coast of Pontus, near the island PHILYRÆIS.

Phineus (Φινεύς). 1. Son of Belus and Anchinoë, and brother of Cepheus. He was slain by Perseus. For details see ANDROMEDA and PERSEUS.—2. Son of Agenor, and king of Salmydessus in Thrace. He was first married to Cleopatra, the daughter of Boreas and Orithyia, by whom he had two children, Orythus (Oarthus) and Crambis; but their names are different in the different legends: Ovid calls them Polydectus and Polydorus. (Schol. ad Soph. Ant. 977; Ov. Ib. 273.) Afterwards he was married to Idaea (some call her Dia, Eurytia, or Idothea), by whom he again had two sons, Thynus and Mariandynus (Apollod. iii. 15, 3).—Phineus was a blind soothsayer, who had received his prophetic powers from Apollo, but was blinded because he had revealed the counsels of Zeus (Apollod. i. 9, 21). He is most celebrated on account of his being tormented by the Harpies, who were sent by the gods to punish him on account of his cruelty towards his sons by the first marriage. His second wife falsely accused them of having made an attempt upon her virtue, whereupon Phineus put out their eyes, or, according to others, exposed them to be devoured by wild beasts, or ordered them to be half buried in the earth, and then to be scourged. (Soph. Ant. 973; Diod. iv. 44.) Whenever a meal was placed before Phineus, the Harpies darted down from the air and carried it off; later writers add that they either devoured the food themselves, or rendered it unfit to be eaten. [HARPYIAE.] When the Argonauts visited Thrace, Phineus promised to instruct them respecting their voyage, if they would deliver him from the monsters. This was done by Zetes and Calais, the sons of Boreas, and brothers of Cleopatra. [See p. 106, a.] Phineus now explained to the Argonauts the further course they had to take, and especially cautioned them against the Symplegades. According to another story, the Argonauts, on their arrival at Thrace, found the sons of Phineus half buried, and demanded their liberation, which Phineus refused. A battle thereupon ensued, in which Phineus was slain by Heracles. The latter also delivered Cleopatra from her confinement, and restored the kingdom to the sons of Phineus; and on their advice he also sent the second wife of Phineus back to her father, who ordered her to be put to death. (Diod. l. c.; Apollod. iii. 15, 3.) Some traditions, lastly, state that Phineus was killed by Boreas, or that he was carried off by the Harpies into the country of the Bistones or Milchessians (Strab. p. 302). Those accounts in which Phineus puts out the eyes of his sons add that they had their sight restored to them by the sons of Boreas, or by Asclepius.

Phinópolis (Φινόπολις), a town in Thrace on the Pontus Euxinus near the entrance to the Bosphorus (Strab. p. 319; Plin. iv. 45).

Phintias (Φιντίας). 1. A Pythagorean, the friend of Damon, who was condemned to die by Dionysius the elder. For details see DAMON.—2. Tyrant of Agrigentum, who established his power over that city during the period of confusion which followed the death of Agathocles (B.C. 289). He founded a new city on the S. coast of Sicily, to which he gave his own name, and whither he removed the inhabitants from Gela, which he destroyed. (Diod. xxii. 2.)

Phintias (Φιντίας: Alicata), a town on the

S. coast of Sicily, midway between Agrigentum and Gela [see preceding article]. It never rose to importance, but had a good harbour. (Diod. xxiv. 1; Cic. Verr. iii. 83, 192.)

Phintōnis Insula (Isola di Figo), an island between Sardinia and Corsica (Plin. iii. 83).

Phlēgēthon or Pyrīphlēgēthon (Φλεγέθων, Πυριφλεγέθων), i.e. the flaming, a river in the lower world, in whose channel flowed flames instead of water. [ACHERON; STYX.]

Phlēgon (Φλέγων), a native of Tralles in Lydia, was a freedman of the emperor Hadrian, whom he survived (Spartian, Hadrian. 16). The only two works of Phlegon which have come down to us are a small treatise on wonderful events (Περὶ θαυμασίων), and another short treatise on long-lived persons (Περὶ μακροβίων), which gives a list of persons in Italy who had attained the age of a hundred years and upwards. Besides these two works Phlegon wrote many others, of which the most important was an account of the Olympiads in seventeen books, from Ol. 1 to Ol. 229 (A.D. 137).—Editions by Westermann in his Paradoxographi, Brunswick, 1839, and by Keller, 1877.

Phlegra. [PALLENE.]

Phlegraei Campi (τὰ Φλεγραῖα πεδία, or ἡ Φλέγρα: Solfatara), the name of the volcanic plain extending along the coast of Campania from Cumae to Capua. The frequent outbursts of flame and of hot springs gained for it the name 'burning plains,' and it was believed that the giants were buried beneath it. (Strab. p. 245; Diod. v. 71; Sil. It. viii. 540, xii. 148.) It was also (or part of it) named Laboriae or Laborinus Campus (Terra di Lavoro), perhaps on account of its great fertility and its constant cultivation (Plin. xviii. 111); but the name is in some MSS. Leboriae.

Phlēgyas (Φλεγύας), son of Ares and Chryse, the daughter of Halmus, succeeded Eteocles in the government of Orchomenos in Boeotia, which he called after himself Phlegyantia. He was the father of Ixion and Coronis, the latter of whom became by Apollo the mother of Asclepius. Enraged at this, Phlegyas set fire to the temple of the god, who killed him with his arrows, and condemned him to punishment in the lower world. (Hom. Hymn. xv. 3; Pind. Pyth. iii. 8; Apollod. ii. 26, 4; iii. 5, 10; Serv. ad Aen. vi. 618.) Phlegyas is represented as the mythical ancestor of the race of the Phlegyae, a branch of the Minyae, who emigrated from Orchomenos in Boeotia and settled in Phocis, but the adoption of the worship of Asclepius in other countries caused variations in the story of Phlegyas himself [see p. 181, a].

Phliasia. [PHLIUS.]

Phlius (Φλιός, -ώντος: Φλιάσιος), the chief town of a small province in the NE. of Peloponnesus, whose territory Phliasia (Φλιασία), was bounded on the N. by Sicyonia, on the W. by Arcadia, on the E. by the territory of Cleonae, and on the S. by that of Argos. The greater part of this country was occupied by mountains, called Coelossa, Carneates, Arantinus, and Tricaranon. According to Strabo (p. 382; cf. Il. ii. 571), the most ancient town in the country was Araethyrēa, which the inhabitants deserted, and afterwards founded Phlius; while Pausanias says nothing about a migration, but relates that the town was first called Arantia from its founder Aras, an autochthon, afterwards Araethyreia from the daughter of Aras, and finally Phlius, from Phlius, a grandson of Temenus (Paus. ii. 12, 4). Phlius was originally inhabited by Argives. It afterwards passed into the hands of the Dorians, with whom part of the Argive population intermingled, while part migrated to Samos and Clazomenae. During the greater part of its history it remained faithful to Sparta. When Aratus organised the Achaean League, Cleonymus, tyrant of Phlius, abdicated and united his city to the league (Pol. ii. 44).

Phlygōnium (Φλυγόριον), a town in Phocis, destroyed in the Phocian war (Paus. x. 3, 2).

Phocaëa (Φώκαια: Φωκαεύς, Phocaeënsis: the Ru. called Karaja-Fokia, i.e. Old Fokia, SW. of Fouges or New Fokia), the northernmost of the Ionian cities on the W. coast of Asia Minor, stood at the W. extremity of the tongue of land which divides the Sinus Elaiticus (G. of Fouges), on the N., from the Sinus Hermaeus (G. of Smyrna), on the S. It was said to have been founded by a band of colonists, mainly Coin of Phocaëa (about 568 B.C.).

Phocian, under two Athenian leaders, Philogenes and Damon. It was originally within the limits of Aeolis, in the territory of Cyme; but the Cymaeans voluntarily gave up the site for the new city, which was soon admitted into the Ionian confederacy on the condition of adopting oecists of the race of Codrus. (Strab. pp. 632, 633; Paus. vii. 3, 5; Plin. v. 119.) Admirably situated, and possessing two excellent harbours, Naustathmus and Lampter, Phocaëa became celebrated as a great maritime state—according to Herodotus, i. 163, the earliest of the Greek states who rivalled the Phoenicians in distant voyages—and especially as the founder of the furthest Greek colonies towards the W., namely MASSILIA in Gaul, and the still more distant, though far less celebrated, city of MAENACA in Hispania Baetica. After the Persian conquest of Ionia, Phocaëa had so declined that she could only furnish three ships to support the great Ionian revolt (Hdt. vi. 11); but the spirit of her people had not been extinguished: when the common cause was hopeless, and their city was besieged by Harpagus, they embarked, to seek new abodes in the distant W., and bent their course to the colony of Aleria or Alalia in Corsica, which they had founded twenty years before. They had bound themselves by an oath never to return to their native land until an iron bar which they threw into the sea should float again (Hdt. i. 165; Hor. Epod. xvi. 17–26); but during the voyage a portion of the emigrants resolved to return to their native city, which they restored, and which recovered much of its prosperity, as is proved by the rich booty gained by the Romans when they plundered it under the praetor Aemilius. (Liv. xxxvii. 31, 32; Pol. xxii. 27.) The town and territory was restored to the inhabitants (Liv. xxxviii. 39), after which it does not appear as a place of any consequence in history, except as the seat of a bishopric under Smyrna, though it remained a free state (Dio Cass. xli. 25; Lucan, v. 53).—Care must be taken not to confound Phocaëa with Phocis, or the ethnic adjectives of the former Φωκαεύς and Phocaeënsis, with those of the latter, Φωκεύς and Phocensis: some of the ancient writers themselves have fallen into such mistakes (Lucan. l. c.). The name of Phocaeans is often used with reference to Massilia; and the people of Marseilles still affect to regard themselves as Phocaeans.

Phōcīon (Φωκίων), the Athenian general and statesman, son of Phocus, was a man of humble origin, and appears to have been born in B.C. 402. He studied under Plato and Xenocrates. He distinguished himself for the first time under his friend CHABRIAS, in 376, at the battle of Naxos, but he was not employed prominently in any capacity for many years afterwards. In 354 (according to some, in 350) he was sent into Euboea in the command of a small force, in consequence of an application from Plutarchus, tyrant of Eretria. Here he won the victory of Tamynae, a brilliant success in spite of the treachery of Plutarchus, though the whole campaign was fruitless (Aesch. Ctes. 88; Plut. Phoc. 13), and he was subsequently employed on several occasions in the war between the Athenians and Philip of Macedon. In 339, being sent with 120 triremes to the Hellespont, he raised the siege of Byzantium, and caused Philip to retire. He frequently opposed the measures of Demosthenes, and recommended peace with Philip; but he must not be regarded as one of the mercenary supporters of the Macedonian monarch. His virtue is above suspicion, and his public conduct was always influenced by upright motives. When Alexander was marching upon Thebes, in 335, Phocion rebuked Demosthenes for his invectives against the king. (Plut. Phoc. 16; Diod. xvii. 15.) The true explanation of his policy seems to be that he represented the party at Athens which believed opposition to Macedonia in the existing state of Greek power and politics to be absolutely hopeless, and had come to the conclusion that the wisest course was to acquiesce in this necessity instead of trying to rouse Greece to a war which was, as he thought, certain to fail; and after the destruction of Thebes he advised the Athenians to comply with Alexander's demand for the surrender of Demosthenes and other chief orators of the anti-Macedonian party. This proposal was indignantly rejected by the people, and an embassy was sent to Alexander, which succeeded in deprecating his resentment. According to Plutarch, there were two embassies, the first of which Alexander refused to receive, but to the second he gave a gracious audience, and granted its prayer, chiefly from regard to Phocion, who was at the head of it. Alexander ever continued to treat Phocion with the utmost consideration, and to cultivate his friendship. (Arrian, i. 10, 8; Plut. Phoc. 17; Diod. l. c.) He also pressed upon him valuable presents; but Phocion persisted in refusing them, begging the king to leave him no less honest than he found him. After Alexander's death, Phocion opposed vehemently, and with all the caustic bitterness which characterised him, the proposal for war with Antipater. Thus, to Hyperides, who asked him tauntingly when he would advise the Athenians to go to war, he answered, 'When I see the young willing to keep their ranks, the rich to contribute of their wealth, and the orators to abstain from pilfering the public money.' (Plut. Phoc. 29, 30.) When Alexander, the son of Polysperchon, led his army to Athens in 318, Phocion was suspected of having advised him to occupy the Piraeus; and there is reason to think that Phocion did advocate this step, as he had before favoured the occupation by Nicanor, from fear of what would ensue to himself and his party at Athens if the democratic party prevailed. Being therefore accused of treason by Agnonides, he fled, with several of his friends, to Alexander, who sent them with letters of recommendation to his father, Polysperchon. (Diod. xviii. 65; Plut. Phoc. 33.) The latter, willing to sacrifice them as a peace-offering to the Athenians, sent them back to Athens for the people to deal with them as they would. Here Phocion was sentenced to death. To the last he maintained his calm and dignified and somewhat contemptuous bearing. When some wretched man spat upon him as he passed to the prison, 'Will no one,' said he, 'check this fellow's indecency?' To one who asked him whether he had any message to leave for his son Phocus, he answered, 'Only that he bear no grudge against the Athenians.' And when the hemlock which had been prepared was found insufficient for all the condemned, and the jailer would not furnish more until he was paid for it, 'Give the man his money,' said Phocion to one of his friends, 'since at Athens one cannot even die for nothing.' He perished in 317, at the age of eighty-five. (Plut. Phoc. 34-37; Diod. xviii. 67; Nep. Phoc. 2, 3.) The Athenians are said to have repented of their conduct. A brazen statue was raised to the memory of Phocion, and Agnonides was condemned to death. (Plut. Phoc. 38.) There can be no doubt of Phocion's honesty of purpose and patriotic motives, excepting only in his negotiations with Nicanor and Polysperchon. His opposition to Demosthenes, however honest, was a mistaken policy, and against the true interests of his country, if there was any real prospect of resisting Philip successfully. Phocion undoubtedly thought that there was no such prospect; and his philosophical views, to some extent anticipating the views of the Stoics, tended to a cosmopolitanism which would make it easier for him to acquiesce in the possibility of Greek states admitting the Macedonian supremacy, which, it must not be forgotten, by no means involved that subversion of all their institutions which the Greeks would have suffered from their conquest by a really 'barbarous' nation, such as the Persians.

Phōcis (ἡ Φωκίς: Φωκῆς Hom., Φωκέες Hdt. Φωκῆς Attic, or less correctly Φωκεῖς, Phocenses by the Romans), a country in North Greece, was bounded on the N. by the Locri Epimenidii and Opuntii, on the E. by Boeotia, on the W. by the Locri Ozolae and Doris, and on the S. by the Corinthian Gulf. At one time it possessed a narrow strip of country on the Euboean sea with the seaport Daphnus, between the territory of the Locri Ozolae and Locri Opuntii. (Strab. pp. 424, 425.) It was a mountainous and unproductive country, and owes its chief importance in history to the fact of its possessing the Delphic oracle. Its chief mountain was PARNASSUS, situated in the interior of the country, to which, however, CNEMIS on its N. frontier, CIRPHIS S. of Delphi, and HELICON on the SE. frontier all belonged. The principal river in Phocis was the CERNISSUS, the valley of which contained almost the only fertile land in the country with the exception of the celebrated Crissaeian plain in the SE. on the borders of the Locri Ozolae.—Among the earliest inhabitants of Phocis we find mentioned Leleges, Thracians, Abantes, and Hyantes. Subsequently, but still in the prehistorical period, the Phlegyae, an Achaean race, a branch of the Minyae at Orchomenos, took possession of the country; and from this time the main bulk of the population continued to be Achæan, although there were Dorian settlements at Delphi and Bulis. The Phocians are said to have derived their name from an eponymous ancestor Phocus [Phocus], and they are mentioned under this name in the Iliad. The Phocians were natural enemies of Thebes, and in 456 they readily joined the Athenian alliance. From similar motives they aided the Spartans in 395, but after Leuctra were forced into alliance with Thebes. They refused, however, to send any contingent to Mantinea in 362, and this added to the hostility of the Thebans towards Phocis, which displayed itself fully in the Phocian or Sacred war. The Phocians having cultivated a portion of the Crissæan plain, which the Amphictyons had declared in B.C. 585 should lie waste for ever, the Thebans availed themselves of this pretext to persuade the Amphictyons to impose a fine upon the Phocians, and upon their refusal to pay it, the Thebans further induced the council to declare the Phocian land forfeited to the god at Delphi. Thus threatened by the Amphictyonic council, backed by the whole power of Thebes, the Phocians were persuaded by Philomelus, one of their citizens, to seize Delphi, and to make use of the treasures of the temple for the purpose of carrying on the war. They obtained possession of the temple in B.C. 357. The war which ensued lasted ten years, and was carried on with various success on each side. The Phocians were commanded first by PHILOMELUS, B.C. 356-353, afterwards by his brother ONOMARCHUS, 353-352, then by PHAYLLUS, the brother of the two preceding, 352-351, and finally by PHALAEUS, the son of Onomarchus, 351-346. The Phocians received some support from Athens, but their chief dependence was upon their mercenary troops, which the treasures of the Delphic temple enabled them to hire. The Amphictyons and the Thebans, finding at length that they were unable with their own resources to subdue the Phocians, called in the assistance of Philip of Macedon, who brought the war to a close in 346. The conquerors inflicted the most signal punishment upon the Phocians, who were regarded as guilty of sacrilege. All their towns were razed to the ground with the exception of Abae, and the inhabitants distributed in villages containing not more than fifty inhabitants each. The two votes which they had in the Amphictyonic council were taken away and given to Philip. [For further account of the above events, see PHILIPPUS.]

Phocra (Φόκρα) a mountain of N. Africa, in Mauretania Tingitana, a northerly spur of the Atlas range (Ptol. iv. 1).

Phocus (Φῶκος). 1. Son of Ornytion of Corinth, or, according to some, of Poseidon, is said to have been the leader of a colony from Corinth into the territory of Tithorea and Mt. Parnassus, which derived from him the name of Phocis (Paus. ii. 4, 3, x. 1, 1).—2. Son of Aeacus and the Nereid Psamathe, husband of Asteria or Asterodia, and father of Panopeus and Crissus (Hes. Th. 1004). He was murdered by his half-brothers, Telamon and Peleus. [PELEUS.] According to some accounts the country of Phocis derived its name from him. (Paus. ii. 29, 2).—3. Son of Phocion. [PHOCION.]

Phocylides (Φακυλίδης), of Miletus, an Ionian poet, contemporary with Theognis, was born B.C. 560. His poetry was chiefly gnomic; and the few fragments of it which we possess display that contempt for birth and station, and that love for substantial enjoyment, which always marked the Ionian character. (Arist. Pol. iv. 8; Suid. s.v.) Among the longer pieces in hexameters is a satire on women resembling that of Simonides. The fragments, which are eighteen in number, are included in all the chief collections of the lyric and gnomic poets. Some of these collections contain a didactic poem, in 217 hexameters, entitled Ποίημα νομβητικόν, to which the name of Phocylides is attached, but which is undoubtedly a forgery, probably by an Alexandrian Christian of Jewish origin.

Phoebē (Φοίβη). 1. Daughter of Uranus and Ge, became by Coeus the mother of Asteria and Leto (Latona). (Hes. Th. 136, 404; Apollod. i. 1, 3).—2. Daughter of Tyndareos and Leda, and a sister of Clytaemnestra (Eur. I. A. 50; Ov. Her. viii. 77).—3. Daughter of Leucippus, and sister of Hilaira, a priestess of Athene, was carried off with her sister by the Dioscuri, and became by Pollux the mother of Mnesileos (Paus. ii. 22, 6; Apollod. iii. 10, 3; cf. p. 298, a).—4. [ARTEMIS.]

Phoebidas (Φοιβίδας), a Lacedaemonian, who, in B.C. 382, was appointed to the command of the troops destined to reinforce his brother Eudamidas, who had been sent against Olynthus. On his way Phoebidas halted at Thebes, and treacherously made himself master of the Cadmea. The Lacedaemonians fined Phoebidas 100,000 drachmas, but nevertheless kept possession of the Cadmea. In 378 he was left by Agesilaus as harmost at Thespieae, and was slain in battle by the Thebans. (Xen. Hell. v. 2, 24, v. 4, 41; Diod. xl. 20, 33; Plut. Ages. 23.)

Phoebus. [APOLLO.]

Phoenicē (Φοινίκη: Phoenicia is only found in a doubtful passage of Cicero [de Fin. iv. 20, 56]: Φοίνιξ, pl. Φοίνικες, fem. Φοίνισσα, Phoenix, Phoenices; also, the adj. Punicus, though used specifically in connexion with Carthago, is etymologically equivalent to Φοίνιξ), a country of Asia, on the coast of Syria, extending from the river Eleutherus (Nahr-el-Kebir) on the N. to below Mt. Carmel on the S., and bounded on the E. by Coele Syria and Palestine (Plin. v. 75). It was a mountainous strip of coast land, not more than ten or twelve miles broad, hemmed in between the Mediterranean and the chain of Lebanon, whose lateral branches, running out into the sea in bold promontories, divided the country into valleys, which are well watered by rivers flowing down from Lebanon, and are extremely fertile. Of these rivers the most important are, to one going from N. to S., the Eleutherus (Nahr-el-Kebir); the Sabbaticus (Arka); the river of Tripolis (Kadisha); the Adonis (Nahr-Ibrahim), S. of Byblus; the Lycus (Nahr-el-Kelb), N. of Berytus; the Magoras (Nahr-Beirut), by Berytus; the Tamyras (Nahr-el-Damur), between Berytus and Sidon; the Leo, or Bostrenus (Nahr-el-Auly), N. of Sidon; the larger river Lita (Litani), which flows from Heliopolis SSW., through Coele-Syria, and then, turning westwards, falls into the sea N. of Tyre; the Belus, or Pagida (Numan or Rahwin), by Ptolemais, and the Kishon (Kishon), N. of Mt. Carmel. Of the promontories referred to, omitting a number of less important ones, the chief were: Theu-prosōpon (Rasesh-Shukah), between Tripolis and Byblus, Pr. Album (Ras-el-Abiad, i.e. White Cape), S. of Tyre, and Mt. Carmel, besides those occupied by the cities of Tripolis, Byblus, Berytus, Sidon, Tyrus, and Ptolemais. This conformation of the coast and the position of the country rendered it admirably suited for the home of great maritime states; and accordingly we find the cities of Phoenicia at the head, both in time and importance, of all the naval enterprise of the ancient world. For the history of those great cities, see SIDON, and TYRUS. As to the country in general, there is some difficulty about the origin of the inhabitants and of their name. In the O. T. the name does not occur; the people seem to be included under the general designation of Canaanites, and they are also named specifically after their several cities: as the Sidonians, Gibrilites (from Gebal, i.e. Byblus), Sinites, Arkites, Arvadites, &c. The name Φοινίκη (Od. iv. 83) is first found in Greek writers as early as Homer, and is derived by some from the abundance of palm trees in the country (φοίνιξ, the date-palm), and by others from the purple-red (φοίνις) which was obtained from a fish on the coasts, and was a celebrated article of Phoenician commerce; by others from the complexion of the inhabitants; the mythical derivation is from Phoenix, the brother of Cadmus. The people were of the Semitic race, and are said to have dwelt originally on the shores of the Erythraean sea. Their language was a dialect of the Aramaic, closely related to the Hebrew. Their written characters formed the basis of the Greek alphabet, and hence they were regarded by the Greeks as the inventors of letters (p. 178, b). Other inventions in the sciences and arts are ascribed to them: such as arithmetic, astronomy, navigation, the manufacture of glass, and the coining of money. In the Homeric poems the Phoenicians are the artistic workers in gold and silver. From them the Greeks borrowed the types for all such workmanship, for armour, and for patterns on vases, many of which the Phoenicians had themselves adopted from Egypt. [For their early influence on Greek religion, see APHRODITE; HERACLES.] Respecting Phoenician literature, we know of little beyond the celebrated work of SANCHUNIATHON. In the sacred history of the Israelitish conquest of Canaan, in that of the Hebrew monarchy, and in the earliest Greek poetry, we find the Phoenicians already a great maritime people. Early formed into settled states, supplied with abundance of timber from Lebanon, and placed where the caravans from Arabia and the E. came upon the Mediterranean, they carried over to the coasts of this sea the products of those countries as well as of their own, which was rich in metals, and the shores of which furnished the materials of glass and the purple-fish already mentioned. Their colonies and trading stations were, especially for their trade in purple dye, planted throughout the Aegæan coast and the islands. [See CYPRUS; CRETA; GRAECIA.] They were in possession of the chief places in the Propontis and Bosphorus until, in the eighth century B.C., the Milesians ousted them from those districts. Their voyages and their settlements extended beyond the Pillars of Hercules, to the W. coasts of Africa and Spain, and even as far as our own islands, according to some accounts [but see p. 171, b]. Within the Mediterranean they planted numerous colonies, on its islands, on the coast of Spain, and especially on the N. coast of Africa, the chief of which was CARTHAGO; they had also settlements on the Euxine and in Asia Minor. In the E. seas, we have records of their voyages to OPHIR, in connexion with the navy of Solomon, and to the coasts of Africa under the kings of Egypt. [AFRICA, p. 31, b.] They were successively subdued by the Assyrians, Babylonians, Persians, Macedonians, and Romans; but neither these conquests nor the rivalry of Carthage entirely ruined their commerce, which was still considerable at the Christian era; on the contrary, their ships formed the fleet of Persia and the Syrian kings, and partly of the Romans. [SIDON; TYRUS.] Under the Romans, Phoenice formed a part of the province of Syria; and, under the E. empire, it was erected, with the addition of Coele-Syria, into the province of Phoenice Libanensis or Libanensis.

Phoenice (Φοινίκη: Finiki), an important commercial town on the coast of the Epirus in the district Chaonia, 56 miles NW. of Buthrotum, in the midst of a marshy country (Strab. p. 324; Pol. ii. 5, 8; Liv. xxix. 12). It was strongly fortified by Justinian (Procop. Aed. iv. 1).

Phoenicia. [PHOENICE.]

Phoenicium Mare (τὸ Φοινίκιον πέλαγος: Σιδωνίη θάλασσα), the part of the Mediterranean which washes the coast of Phoenice.

Phoenicūs (Φοινικοῦς: Φοινικούντιος, Φοινικούσιος). 1. Also Phoenix (Φοίνις), a harbour on the S. of Crete, visited by St. Paul during his voyage to Rome (Acts xxvii. 12; Strab. p. 475).—2. A harbour in Messenia, opposite the islands Oenussae (Paus. iv. 34, 12).—3. A seaport of the island of Cythera.—4. (Chesmeh or Egri Liman?), a harbour of Ionia, in Asia Minor, at the foot of Mt. Mimas (Thuc. viii. 34; Liv. xxxvi. 45).—5. (Deliktash, Ru.), a flourishing city in the S. of Lycia, on Mt. Olympus, with a harbour below it. It is a little to the E. of Patara (Liv. xxxvii. 16). It was sometimes called Olympus (Strab. p. 666). Having become, under the Romans, one of the headquarters of the pirates, who celebrated here the festival and mysteries of Mithras, it was destroyed by Servilius Isauricus. [VATIA.]

Phoenicūsa. [AEOLIAE INSULAE.]

Phoenix (Φοίνις). 1. Son of Agenor by Agriope or Telephassa, and brother of Europa, but Homer makes him the father of Europa (Il. xiv. 321). Being sent by his father in search of his sister, who was carried off by Zeus, he settled in the country, which was called after him Phoenicia (Apollod. iii. 1, 1; Hyg. Fab. 178).—2. Son of Amyntor by Cleobule or Hippodamia, and king of the Dolopes, took part in the Calydonian hunt. His father Amyntor neglected his legitimate wife, and attached himself to a mistress; whereupon Cleobule persuaded her son to seduce her rival. When Amyntor discovered the crime, he cursed Phoenix, who shortly afterwards fled to Peleus. Peleus received him kindly, made him the ruler of the country of the Dolopes, on the frontiers of Phthia, and entrusted to him his son Achilles, whom he was to educate. He afterwards accompanied Achilles on his expedition against Troy. (Il. ix. 447–480.) According to another tradition, Phoenix did not dishonour his father's mistress, but she merely accused him of having made overtures to her, in consequence of which his father put out his eyes. But Peleus took him to Chiron, who restored to him his sight. (Apollod. iii. 13, 8.) Phoenix moreover is said to have called the son of Achilles Neoptolemus, after Lycomedes had called him Pyrrhus (Paus. x. 26, 4). Neoptolemus was believed to have buried Phoenix at Eion in Macedonia or at Trachis in Thessaly (Strab. p. 428).—3. A fabulous bird Phoenix, which, according to a tale told to Herodotus

(ii. 73) at Heliopolis in Egypt, visited that place once in every 500 years, on his father's death, and buried him in the sanctuary of Helios. For this purpose the Phoenix was believed to come from Arabia, and to make an egg of myrrh as large as possible; this egg he then hollowed out and put into it his father, closing it up carefully, and the egg was believed then to be of exactly the same weight as before. This bird was represented as resembling an eagle, with feathers partly red and partly golden. It is further related that when his life drew to a close, he built a nest for himself in Arabia, to which he imparted the power of generation, so that after his death a new phoenix rose out of it. As soon as the latter was grown up, he, like his predecessor, proceeded to Heliopolis in Egypt, and burned and buried his father in the temple of Helios. (Tac. Ann. vi. 34.)—According to a story which has gained more currency in modern times, the Phoenix, when he arrived at a very old age (some say 500 and others 1461 years), committed himself to the flames (Lucian, de Mort. Per. 27; Philostr. Apollon. iii. 49).—Others, again, state that only one Phoenix lived at a time, and that when he died a worm crept forth from his body, and was developed into a new Phoenix by the heat of the sun. His death, further, took place in Egypt after a life of 540 years. (Plin. x. 4; Tzetz. Chil. v. 397.)—Another modification of the same story relates that when the Phoenix arrived at the age of 500 years, he built for himself a funeral pile, consisting of spices, settled upon it, and died. Out of the decomposing body he then rose again, and having grown up, he wrapped the remains of his old body up in myrrh, carried them to Heliopolis, and burnt them there. (Ov. Met. xv. 392–407; Stat. Silv. ii. 4, 36.) Similar stories of marvellous birds occur in many parts of the East: as, in Persia, the legend of the bird Simorg, and, in India, that of the bird Semendar.

Phoenix (Φοίνιξ), a small river in Malis, flowing into the Asopus near Thermopylae (Hdt. vii. 200; Strab. p. 428).—2. A river further N. in Thessaly, which flows into the Apidanus (Lucan, vi. 374; Plin. iv. 30).—3. A harbour in Crete. [PHOENICUS, No. 1.]

Phoetiae or Phytia (Φοιτεΐαι, Φοιτίαι, Φυστία, Thuc.), a town in Acarnania on a hill, W. of Stratus (Thuc. iii. 146; Pol. iv. 63).

Pholegandros (Φολέγανδρος: Polykandro), an island in the Aegæan sea, one of the Cyclades, between Melos and Sicinos (Strab. p. 484).

Phölōē (Φολόη: Olonō), a mountain forming the boundary between Arcadia and Elis; being a S. continuation of Mount Erymanthus, in which the rivers Sellēis and Ladon took their origin (Strab. pp. 336, 357). It is mentioned as one of the seats of the Centaurs. [PHOLUS.]

Phölus (Φόλος), a Centaur, a son of Silenus and the nymph Melia. He was accidentally slain by one of the poisoned arrows of Heracles. The mountain, between Arcadia and Elis, where he was buried was called Pholoe after him. For details of his story see p. 397, a.

Phorbantia. [AEGATES.]

Phorbas (Φόρβας). 1. Son of Lapithes and Orsinome, and brother of Periphas. The Rhodians, in pursuance of an oracle, are said to have invited him into their island to deliver it from snakes, and afterwards to have worshipped him as a hero. From this circumstance he was called Ophiuchus, and is said by some to have been placed among the stars. (Diod. v. 58; Hyg. Astr. ii. 14.) According to another tradition, Phorbas went from Thessaly to Olenos, where Alektor, king of Elis, made use of his assistance against Pelops, and shared his kingdom with him. Phorbas then gave his daughter Diogenia in marriage to Alektor, and he himself married Hyrmene, a sister of Alektor, by whom he became the father of Augeas and Actor. (Paus. v. 1, 8; Apollod. ii. 5, 5.) He is also described as a bold boxer, and is said to have plundered the temple of Delphi along with the Phlegyæ, but to have been defeated by Apollo (Ov. Met. xi. 414; Schol. ad Il. xxiii. 660).

Phorcides, Phorcýdes, or Phorceynides, that is, the daughters of Phorcus and Ceto, or the Gorgons and Graeae. [GORGONES and GRAEAE.]

Phorcus, Phorcys, or Phorcyn (Φόρκος, Φόρκυς, Φόρκυν). 1. A sea-deity to whom a harbour in Ithaca was dedicated. He is called the father of the nymph Thoosa (Od. i. 71, xiii. 96, 345). Other writers call him a son of Pontus and Ge, and a brother of Thaumias, Nereus, Eurybia, and Ceto (Hes. Th. 237; Apollod. i. 2, 6). By his sister Ceto he became the father of the Graeae and Gorgones, the Hesperian dragon, and the Hesperides; and by Hecate or Cratais, he was the father of Scylla (Hes. Th. 270, 338).—2. Son of Phaenops, commander of the Phrygians of Ascania, assisted Priam in the Trojan war, but was slain by Ajax (Il. ii. 682, xvii. 312; Paus. x. 26, 6).

Phormiōn (Φορμίων). 1. A celebrated Athenian general, the son of Asopius. He is first mentioned as one of the generals sent to reinforce the Athenians at Samos in 440 B.C. In 432 he commanded in the siege of Potidaea and afterwards in Chalcidice (Thuc. i. 64, 117, ii. 29). In 430 he was sent with thirty ships to Ambracia, and then to Naupactus, to blockade the Gulf of Corinth. He particularly distinguished himself, and with far inferior forces gained some brilliant victories over the Peloponnesian fleet in B.C. 429. In the ensuing winter he landed on the coast of Acarnania, and advanced into the interior, where he also gained some successes. (Thuc. ii. 80–92, 102; Diod. xii. 37, 47.) He died before 428 (Thuc. iii. 7), and was commemorated by a statue on the Acropolis (Paus. i. 23, 10). Pausanias mentions that the Athenians on one occasion paid his debts, because he refused to go on an expedition while he was in debt to anyone. Aristophanes alludes to his hardy and temperate character (Aristoph. Pax, 348, Lys. 804; cf. Athen. p. 419).—2. A Peripatetic philosopher of Ephesus, of whom is told the story that he discoursed before Hannibal on the military art and the duties of a general. When his admiring audience asked Hannibal what he thought of him, the latter replied that of all the old blockheads whom he had seen none could match Phormion (Cic. de Orat. ii. 18, 75).

Phormis or Phormus (Φόρμις, Φόρμος), a native of Maenalus in Arcadia, removed to Sicily, where he became intimate with Gelon, whose children he educated. He distinguished himself as a soldier, both under Gelon and Hieron his brother. In gratitude for his martial successes, he dedicated gifts to Zeus at Olympia, and to Apollo at Delphi. He is associated by Aristotle with Epicharmus, as one of the originators of comedy, or of a particular form of it. (Arist. Poët. 5; Paus. v. 27; Athen. p. 652; Suid. s. v.)

should have the franchise. (Argument to Lys. Περὶ τῆς πολιτείας: Arist. Ἀθ. πολ. 34.)

Phoroneus (Φορωνεύς), son of Inachus and the Oceanid Melia or Archia, was a brother of Aegialeus and the ruler of Argos. He was married to the nymph Laodice, by whom he became the father of Niobe, Apis, and Car. (Paus. i. 39, 4; Apollod. ii. 1, 1; Hyg. Fab. 143.) According to other writers his sons were Pelasgus, Iasus, and Agenor, who, after their father's death, divided the kingdom of Argos among themselves (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 385). Phoroneus is said to have been the first who offered sacrifices to Hera at Argos, and to have united the people, who until then had lived in scattered habitations, into a city which was called after him ἄστυ Φορωνίκον (Paus. ii. 15, 5). The patronymic Phoronides is sometimes used for Argives in general, and especially to designate Amphiaraus and Adrastus.

Phorōnis (Φορωνίς), a surname of Io, who was either a descendant or a sister of Phoroneus (Ov. Met. i. 668).

Phosphorus. [HESPERUS.]

Photius (Φώτιος), patriarch of Constantinople in the ninth century of our era, played a distinguished part in the political and religious history of his age. After holding various high offices in the Byzantine court, he was, although a layman, elected patriarch of Constantinople in A.D. 858, in place of Ignatius, who had been deposed by Bardas, who was all-powerful at the court of his nephew Michael III., then a minor. The patriarchate of Photius was a stormy one, and full of vicissitudes. The cause of Ignatius was espoused by the Romish Church; and Photius thus became one of the great promoters of the schism between the Eastern and Western Churches. In 867 Photius was himself deposed by the emperor Basil I., and Ignatius was restored; but on the death of Ignatius in 877, Photius, who had meantime gained the favour of Basil, was again elevated to the patriarchate. On the death of Basil, in 886, Photius was accused of a conspiracy against the life of the new emperor, Leo VI., and was banished to a monastery in Armenia, where he seems to have remained till his death. Photius was one of the most learned men of his time, and in the midst of a busy life found time for the composition of numerous works, several of which have come down to us. Of these the two most important are (1) Myriobiblion seu Bibliotheca (Μυριοβιβλίον ἢ Βιβλιοθήκη). It may be described as an extensive review of ancient Greek literature by a scholar of immense erudition and sound judgment. It is an extraordinary monument of literary energy, for it was written while the author was engaged in an embassy to Assyria, at the request of his brother Tarasius, who desired an account of the books which Photius had read in his absence. It contains the analyses of or extracts from 280 volumes, and many valuable works are only known to us from the account which Photius has given of them. The best edition of this work is by Bekker, Berlin, 1824-1825. (2) The Lexicon or Glossary, which has reached us in an imperfect state, but is of great value for its citation of authors and for the light which it throws on many Greek terms. It was first published by Hermann, Lips. 1808, and subsequently at London, 1822, from the papers of Porson. Photius likewise wrote many theological works, some of which have been published, and others remain in MS.

Phraāta or Phraaspa (τὰ Φράατα, and other forms), a great city of Media Atropatene, the winter residence of the Parthian kings, especially as a refuge in time of war, lay S.E. of Gaza, near the river Amardus (Appian, Parth. p. 80; Dio Cass. xlix. 25). The mountain fortress of Vera (Οὐέρα), which was besieged by Antony, was probably the same place (Strab. p. 523).

Phraatāces, king of Parthia. [ARSACES XVI.]

Phraātes, the name of four kings of Parthia. [ARSACES, V. VII. XII. XV.]

Phranza or Phranzes, Georgius (Φραντζῆς or Φραντζής), the last, and one of the most important, of the Byzantine historians, was frequently employed on important public business by Constantine XIII., the last emperor of Constantinople. On the capture of Constantinople by the Turks, in 1453, Phranza was reduced to slavery, but succeeded in making his escape. He subsequently retired to a monastery, where he wrote his Chronicon. This work extends from 1259 to 1477, and is a valuable authority for the history of the author's time, especially for the capture of Constantinople.—Edited by Aiter, Vienna, 1796, by Bekker, Bonn, 1838.

Phraortes (Φραόρτης), second king of Media, and son of Deioces, whom he succeeded, reigned from B.C. 656 to 634. [MEDIA.] He first conquered the Persians, and then subdued the greater part of Asia, but was at length defeated and killed while laying siege to Ninus (Nineveh). He was succeeded by his son Cyaxares. (Hdt. i. 73, 102.)

Phricōnis. [CYME; LARISSA, 2.]

Phrixa (Φρίξα, Φρίξαι, Θρίξαι: Paleofanaro), a town of Elis in Triphylia on the borders of Pisatis, was situated upon a steep hill on the river Alpheus, and was thirty stadia from Olympia. It was founded by the Minyae, and is said to have derived its name from Phrixus. (Paus. vi. 21, 6; Strab. p. 348.)

Phrixus (Φρίξος), son of Athamas and Nephele, and brother of Helle. In consequence of the intrigues of his stepmother, Ino, he was to be sacrificed to Zeus; but Nephele rescued her two children, who rode away through the air upon the ram with the golden fleece, the gift of Hermes. Between Sigeeum and the Chersonesus, Helle fell into the sea which was called after her the Hellespont. A fine Pompeian painting (Mus. Borb. vi. 19) shows the exact moment described by Ovid (who possibly had the picture in his mind):

Paene simul perijt dum volt succurrere lapsae
Frater et extensas porrigit usque manus.

(Fast. iii. 871.) Phrixus arrived in safety in Colchis, the kingdom of Aeetes, who gave him his daughter Chalciope in marriage. Phrixus sacrificed the ram which had carried him, to Zeus Phyxius or Laphystius, and gave its fleece to Aeetes, who fastened it to an oak tree in the grove of Ares. (Paus. i. 24, 2; Schol. ad Ap. Rh. ii. 653.) This fleece was afterwards carried away by Jason and the Argonauts. [JASON.] By Chalciope Phrixus became the father of Argus, Melas, Phrontis, Cytissorus, and Presbon. (Apollod. i. 9, 1; Hyg. Fab. 14.) Phrixus either died of old age in the kingdom of Aeetes, or was killed by Aeetes in consequence of an oracle (Ap. Rh. ii. 1151; Hyg. Fab. 3). Pausanias (ix. 34, 5) gives a story that either Phrixus or his son Presbon returned to Orchomenos. Herodotus in his account of the myth (vii. 197) mentions that the people of Phthiotis used to offer a human victim from the family of the Athamantidae to Zeus Laphystius. It is not unlikely that the story of Phrixus in part arose from this rite of sacrifice to the Minyan Zeus. It is held by some mythologists that the ram commonly offered to Zeus symbolised the clouds, and that the golden ram meant the wealth-giving clouds of spring. Phrixus in this view signified the spring rains, and therefore his mother is Nephele or Cloud; and he is drawn towards the land of the sun [see also p. 107, a].

Phrixus (Φρίξος), a river in Argolis, which flows into the Argolic gulf between Temenium and Lerna (Paus. ii. 36, 6).

Phrygia Mater, a name frequently given to Cybele, because she was especially worshipped in Phrygia. [RHEA.]

Phrygia (Φρυγία: Φρύξ, pl. Φρύγες, Phryx, Phryges), a country of Asia Minor, which was of very different extent at different periods. According to the division of the provinces under the Roman empire, Phrygia formed the E. part of the province of Asia, and was bounded on the W. by Mysia, Lydia, and Caria, on the S. by Lycia and Pisidia, on the E. by Lycaonia (which is often reckoned as a part of Phrygia) and Galatia (which formerly belonged to Phrygia), and on the N. by Bithynia. With reference to its physical geography and its early history, Phrygia formed the W. part (as Cappadocia did the E.) of the great central table-land of Asia Minor, supported by the chains of Olympus on the N. and Taurus on the S., and breaking on the W. into the ridges which separate the great valleys of the HERMUS, the MÆANDER, &c., and which form the headlands of the W. coast. This table-land itself was intersected by mountain-chains, and watered by the upper courses and tributaries of the rivers just mentioned in its W. part, and in its N. part by those of the RHYNDACUS and SANGARIUS. These parts of the country were very fertile, especially in the valley of the Sangarius, but in the S. and E. the streams which descend from Taurus lose themselves in extensive salt marshes and salt lakes, some of which are still famous, as in ancient times, for their manufactures of salt.—There has been much dispute about the origin of the Phrygians. Their claim to a high antiquity is indicated by the story in Herodotus (ii. 2) of the experiment made by Psammetichus, king of Egypt, on the first spontaneous speech of children, which was held to show that they were the most ancient of people. Their own legends of a great flood, to escape which their king, Nannacus, built an ark, are also significant (Zosim. vi. 10; Suid. s. v. Νάννακος). Greek writers represent the Phrygians as a Thracian tribe, called in Europe Briges, who either before or shortly after the Trojan war migrated into Asia (Hdt. vii. 73; Strab. pp. 295, 471, 680). Other evidence on the question is to be sought in the character of the people—warlike in the Homeric age, but the reverse afterwards—in their mixed religions, and in their monuments, on which much light has been thrown in recent years. On the whole, the most probable theory is that to which Mr. Ramsay has been brought by his researches in Asia Minor—that the Phrygians were, as Greek tradition related, a European people who crossed the Hellespont before the period of the Trojan war, and established a kingdom in Asia Minor, W. of the Halys; they were a race of hardy warriors, of Aryan descent, and their special deity was akin to Zeus, and was variously called Osogo or Papas (Father) or Bronton (Thunderer); the people whom they found in possession and conquered were a Semitic nation, who practised the orgiastic worship of a female deity (the Greek Cybele), with rites of an Oriental character, and with temples served by slaves [cf. p. 86, b]; the capital of this nation is conjectured to have been Pteria in Cappadocia [PTERIA]; the invading Phrygians probably occupied first the sea-coast on the Asiatic side of the Hellespont, and then, as they pressed inwards, reduced the Semitic people, but adopted much of their religion (just as the Galatians afterwards did), combining it also with their own, and gradually degenerated themselves in courage and manliness. Some early reliefs of armed warriors which have been discovered in Phrygia are taken to represent the invaders before they adopted the softer and weaker manners of the shepherd people whom they conquered. The lion sculptures resembling those of Mycenae [p. 580, a], and the sculptured tombs, such as that of Midas, belonged to the ruling dynasty which the invaders established. If the above conjectures are well founded, it is not unlikely that the stories of the wars with Amazons really represent the struggle which the invaders, whose deity was a god and whose right of inheritance was male, waged against a race who worshipped a goddess served by female temple-slaves, and who counted their descent through the mother (by 'Mutterrecht'). The invaders left their name in the coast district which they first occupied in the neighbourhood of Cyzicus—namely, Phrygia Minor or Phrygia Hellespontus.—The kingdom of Phrygia was conquered by Croesus, and formed part of the Persian, Macedonian, and Syro-Grecian empires; but under the last the NE. part, adjacent to Paphlagonia and the Halys, was conquered by the Gauls, and formed the W. part of GALATIA; and a part W. of this, containing the richest portion of the country, about the Sangarius, was subjected by the kings of Bithynia; this last portion was the object of a contest between the kings of Bithynia and Pergamus, but at last, by the decision of the Romans, it was added, under the name of Phrygia Epictetus (Φ. ἐπίκτητος, i.e. the acquired Phrygia), to the kingdom of Pergamus, to which the whole of Phrygia was assigned by the Romans, after the overthrow of Antiochus the Great in B.C. 190. With the rest of the kingdom of Pergamus, Phrygia passed to the Romans by the testament of Attalus III., and thus became a part of the province of Asia, B.C. 130.—As to the distinctive names: the inland district usually understood by the name of Phrygia, when it occurs alone, was also called Great Phrygia or Phrygia Proper, in contradistinction to the Lesser Phrygia or Phrygia on the Hellespont; and of this Great or Proper Phrygia, the N. part was called, as just stated, Phrygia Epictetus, and the S. part, adjacent to the Taurus, was called, from its position, Phrygia Paroreios (Φ. παρόρειος), a district of mountain valleys between Polybotus and Tyriaeum, in the SE. of Phrygia, with chief towns Antiochia and Apollonia. At the division of the provinces in the fourth century, the last mentioned part, also called Phrygia Pisidicus, was assigned to Pisidia; and the SW. portion, about the Maeander, to Caria; and the remainder was divided into Phrygia Salutaris (or Secunda) on the E., with Synnada, Eucarpia, and Dorylaeum for its chief towns, and Phrygia Pacatiana (or Prima) on the W., with the chief town Laodicea, extending N. and S. from Bithynia to Pamphylia.—Phrygia was rich in products of every kind. Its mountains furnished gold and marble; its valleys oil and wine; the less fertile hills in the W. afforded pasture for sheep, whose wool was celebrated (Strab. pp. 578, 579); and the marshes of the SE. furnished abundance of salt.

Phryne (Φρύνη), one of the most celebrated Athenian hetairae, was a native of Thespie in Boeotia. Her beauty procured for her so much wealth that she is said to have offered to rebuild the walls of Thebes, after they had been destroyed by Alexander, if she might be allowed to put up this inscription on the walls:—‘Alexander destroyed them, but Phryne, the hetaira, rebuilt them.’ She had among her admirers many of the most celebrated men of the age of Philip and Alexander, and the beauty of her form gave rise to some of the greatest works of art. The most celebrated picture of Apelles, his ‘Venus Anadyomene’ [APELLES], is said to have been a representation of Phryne, who, at a festival at Eleusis, entered the sea with dishevelled hair. The Cnidian Venus of Praxiteles, who was one of her lovers, was modelled from her. (Athen. pp. 558, 567, 583, 585, 590; Ael. V. H. ix. 32; Propert. ii. 6, 5; Plin. xxxiv. 71.)

Phrynichus (Φρύνιχος). 1. An Athenian, and one of the early tragic poets, is said to have been the disciple of Thespis. He gained his first tragic victory in B.C. 511, twenty-four years after Thespis (535), twelve years after Choerilus (523), and twelve years before Aeschylus (499); and his last in 476, on which occasion Themistocles was his choragus, and recorded the event by an inscription (Plut. Them. 5). The play is supposed to have been the Phoenissae, which had the same subject as the Persae of Aeschylus. Phrynichus probably went, like other poets of the age, to the court of Hiero, and there died. In all the accounts of the rise and development of tragedy, the chief place after Thespis is assigned to Phrynichus; and the improvements which he introduced in the internal poetical character of the drama entitle him to be considered as the real inventor of tragedy. For the light Bacchanalian stories or satyr plays which are supposed to have been exhibited by Thespis he substituted serious subjects, taken either from the heroic age, or the heroic deeds which illustrated the history of his own time. In these he aimed not so much to amuse the audience as to move their passions; and so powerful was the effect of his tragedy on the capture of Miletus, that the audience burst into tears, and fined the poet 1000 drachmae, because he had exhibited the sufferings of a kindred people, and they even passed a law that no one should ever again make use of that drama. He was celebrated especially for the beauty of his lyrical choruses (Aristoph. Av. 748, Ran. 910, Thesmoph. 166). Phrynichus was the first poet who introduced masks representing female characters in the drama. He also paid particular attention to the dances of the chorus. In the drama of Phrynichus, however, the chorus still retained the principal place, and it was reserved for Aeschylus and Sophocles to bring the dialogue and action into their due position.—2. A comic poet of the Old Comedy, was a contemporary of Eupolis, and flourished B.C. 429 (Aristoph. Ran. 14, Schol. ad loc.).—3. An Athenian general, son of Stratonides, who was sent with a fleet to Asia Minor in 412 B.C. (Thuc. viii. 25). In the following year he endeavoured to strengthen the position of the oligarchical party by calling in the Spartans, and he was assassinated in the Agora (Thuc. viii. 92).—4. A Greek sophist and grammarian, described by some as an Arabian, and by others as a Bithynian, lived under M. Aurelius and Commodus. His great work was entitled Σοφιστικὴ παρασκευὴ in thirty-seven books, of which we still possess a fragment, published by Bekker, in his Anecdota Graeca, Berol. 1814, vol. i. He also wrote a Lexicon of Attic words (Ἐκλογὴ ῥημάτων καὶ ὀνομάτων Ἀττικῶν), edited by Lobeck, Lips. 1830.

Phrynnis (Φρύννις), or Phrynus (Φρύνης), a dithyrambic poet, of the time of the Peloponnesian war, was a native of Mytilene, but flourished at Athens. His innovations, effemacies, and frigidness, are repeatedly attacked by the comic poets (Aristoph. Nub. 971; Plut. Mus. p. 1146). Among the innovations which he made, was the addition of two strings to the heptachord. He was the first who gained the victory in the musical contests established by Pericles in connexion with the Panathenaic festival, probably in B.C. 445.

Phthia. [PHTHIOTIS.]

Phthiōtis (Φθιώτις: Φθιώτης), a district in the SE. of Thessaly, bounded on the S. by the Maliac gulf, and on the E. by the Pagasaeon gulf, and inhabited by Achaeans. [THESSALIA.] Homer calls it Phthia (Φθίη), and mentions a city of the same name, celebrated as the residence of Achilles (Il. i. 155, ii. 688; Strab. pp. 383, 430). Hence the poets call Achilles Phthius heros, and Peleus Phthius rex.

Phthira (τὰ Φθίρα, Φθειρῶν ὄρος), a mountain in Caria, forming a part or a branch of Latmus, inhabited by a people called Φθίρες (Il. ii. 868 Strab. p. 635).

Phthirōphāgi (Φθειρόφαγοι, i.e. eaters of lice), a Scythian people near the Caucasus, or, according to some, beyond the river Rha, in Sarmatia Asiat. (Strab. pp. 449, 492; Plin. vi. 14).

Phya. [PISISTRATUS.]

Phycūs (Φυκοῦς: Ras-Sem or Ras-el-Kazat), a promontory on the coast of Cyrenaica, a little W. of Apollonia and NW. of Cyrene. It is the northernmost headland of Libya E. of the Lesser Syrtis, and the nearest point of this coast to that of Europe, the distance from Phycus to Taenarum, the S. promontory of Peloponnesus, being 208 miles. There was a small town of the same name on the headland. (Strab. pp. 363, 837; Lucan, ix. 40; Plin. v. 32.)

Phylacē (Φυλάκη). 1. A small town of Thessaly, in Phthiotis, on the N. slope of Mt. Othrys, the birthplace of Protesilaus. (Il. ii. 695, xiii. 696; Od. xi. 290; Strab. p. 433.)—2. A town of Epirus, in Molossia (Liv. xlv. 26).—3. A town in Arcadia on the frontiers of Tegea and Laconia (Paus. viii. 54, 1).

Phylacus (Φύλακος), son of Deion and Diomedes, and husband of Periclymene or Clymene, the daughter of Minyas, by whom he became the father of Iphiclus and Alcimedon (Il. ii. 705; Apollod. i. 9, 4). He was believed to be the founder of the town of Phylace, in Thessaly. Either from its name or that of the town, his descendants, Phylacus, Iphiclus, and Protesilaus, are called Phylacidae.

Phylarchus (Φύλαρχος), a Greek historical writer, and a contemporary of Aratus, was probably a native of Naucratis in Egypt, but spent the greater part of his life at Athens (Athen. p. 58). His great work was a history in twenty-eight books, which embraced a period of fifty-two years, from the expedition of Pyrrhus into Peloponnesus, B.C. 272, to the death of Cleomenes, 220. Phylarchus is vehemently attacked by Polybius (ii. 56), who charges him with falsifying history through his partiality to Cleomenes and his hatred against Aratus and the Achaeans. The accusation is probably not unfounded, but it might be retorted with equal justice upon Polybius, who has fallen into the opposite error of exaggerating the merits of Aratus and his party, and depreciating Cleomenes. The fragments of Phylarchus have been collected by Müller, Fragm. Histor. Graec. Paris, 1840 and 1868.

Phylas (Φύλας). 1. King of the Dryopes, was attacked and slain by Heracles, because he had violated the sanctuary of Delphi. By his daughter Midea, Heracles became the father of Antiochus. (Paus. i. 5, 2, iv. 34, 6; Diod. iv. 37.)—2. Son of Antiochus, and grandson of Heracles and Midea, was married to Deiphile, by whom he had two sons, Hippotas and Thero (Paus. ii. 4, 3).—3. King of Ephyra in Thessprotia, and the father of Polymele and Astyoche, by the latter of whom Heracles was the father of Telephus (Il. xvi. 181; Apollod. ii. 7, 6).

Phylē (Φυλή; Φυλάσιος; Fili), a demus in Attica, and a strongly fortified place, belonging to the tribe Oeneis, was situated on the confines of Boeotia, and on the SW. slope of Mt. Parnes, about thirteen miles from Athens. It is placed in a narrow defile 2100 feet above the sea level, and overlooks the plain of Athens and the city itself. The remains of the walls are still visible. It is memorable as the place which Thrasybulus and the Athenian patriots seized, soon after the end of the Peloponnesian war, B.C. 404, and from which they directed their operations against the Thirty Tyrants at Athens. [THRASYBULUS.]

Phyleus (Φυλεύς), son of Augeas, was expelled by his father from Ephyra, because he gave evidence in favour of Heracles. [See p. 397, b.] He then emigrated to Dulichium (Il. xv. 530, xxiii. 637). By Ctímene or Timandra he became the father of Meges, who is hence called Phylides (Paus. v. 3, 4).

Phyllidas (Φυλλίδας), a Theban, secretary to the polemarchs who held the Cadmeia after B.C. 382. He used his opportunities to aid the movement of liberation, and introduced Pelopidas and his associates to the house of Leontades. (Xen. Hell. v. 4, 2; PELOPIDAS.)

Phyllis. [DEMOPHON, No. 2.]

Phyllis (Φύλλις), a district in Thrace, S. of the Strymon, near Mt. Pangaeus (Hdt. vii. 118).

Phyllus (Φύλλος; Petrino), a town of Thessaly in the district Thessaliotis, N. of Metropolis (Strab. p. 435).

Physcon. [PTOLEMAEUS.]

Physcus (Φύσκος). 1. (Marmoras), a town on the S. coast of Caria, in the Rhodian territory, with an excellent harbour, used as the port of Mylasa, and the landing-place for travellers coming from Rhodes (Strab. pp. 652, 663).—2. (Odorneh), an E. tributary of the Tigris in Lower Assyria. The town of Opis stood at its junction with the Tigris. (Xen. An. ii. 4, 25.)

Phytaeum (Φύταιον; Φυταῖος), a town in Aetolia, on the lake Trichonis (Pol. v. 7).

Phytia. [PHOETIAE.]

Picēni. [PICENUM.]

Picentes. [PICENUM.]

Picentia (Picentinus; Vicenza), a town in the S. of Campania at the head of the Sinus Paestanus, and between Salernum and the frontiers of Lucania, the inhabitants of which were compelled by the Romans, in consequence of their revolt to Hannibal, to abandon their town and live in the neighbouring villages (Strab. p. 251). Between the town and the frontiers of Lucania there was an ancient temple of the Argive Juno, said to have been founded by Jason the Argonaut.—The name of Picentini was not confined to the inhabitants of Picentia, but was given to the inhabitants of the whole coast of the Sinus Paestanus, from the promontory of Minerva to the river Silarus (Strab. l.c.; Plin. iii. 70). They were a portion of the Sabine Picentes, who were transplanted by the Romans to this part of Campania after the conquest of Picenum, B.C. 268, when they founded Picentia.

Picentīni. [PICENTIA.]

Picēnum (Picentes, sing. Picens, more rarely Picentini and Piceni), a country in Central Italy, was a narrow strip of land along the N. coast of the Adriatic, and was bounded on the N. by Umbria, from which it was separated by the river Aesis, on the W. by Umbria and the territory of the Sabines, and on the S. by the territory of the Marsi and Vestini, from which it was separated by a range of hills and by the river Matrinus (Strab. p. 240; Plin. iii. 110). It is said to have derived its name from the bird picus, which directed the Sabine immigrants, under the vow of a Ver Sacrum, into the land (Plin. l.c.; Strab. l.c.). That this points to the existence of an ancient tribal totem or sacred animal is by no means impossible. [PICUS.] The inhabitants of the southern portion of Picenum in the neighbourhood of Interamnium and Adria and the river Vomanus had a special name Praetuttii (Praetutianus Ager), from which the modern Abruzzi is derived (Plin. l.c.; Liv. xxii. 9, xxvii. 43), but the part of this district between the Vomanus and Matrinus was distinguished as Ager Hadrianus. Picenum formed the fifth region in the division of Italy made by Augustus, and extended as far as the river Aternus. The country was traversed by a number of hills of moderate height, eastern offshoots of the Apennines, and was drained by several small rivers flowing into the Adriatic through the valleys between these hills. The country was upon the whole fertile, and was especially celebrated for its apples; but the chief employment of the inhabitants was the feeding of cattle and swine.—The Picentes, as already remarked, were Sabine immigrants; but the population of the country appears to have been of a mixed nature. The Umbrians were in possession of the land when it was conquered by the Sabine Picentes, and some of the Umbrian population became intermingled with their Sabine conquerors. In addition to this the S. part of the country was for a time in the possession of the Liburnians, and ANCONA was occupied by Greeks from Syracuse. In B.C. 299 the Picentes made a treaty with the Romans; but having revolted in 269, they were defeated by the consul Sempronius Sophus in the following year, and were obliged to submit to the Roman supremacy. (Flor. i. 19; Liv. Ep. 15; Eutrop. ii. 16.) A portion of the people was transplanted to the coast of the Sinus Paestanus, where they founded the town Picentia. [PICENTIA.] Two or three years afterwards the Romans sent colonies to Firmum and Castrum Novum in Picenum, in order to secure their newly conquered possession. The Picentes fought with the other Socii against Rome in the Social or Marsic war (90–89), and received the Roman franchise at the close of it. (App. B.C. i. 38–48; Flor. iii. 18.)

Picti, a people inhabiting the northern part of Britain, appear to have been either a tribe of the Caledonians, or the same people as the Caledonians, though under another name. It is supposed by many that their name was given by the Romans because the Picti painted their bodies [cf. p. 171, b], but it is quite as probable that (like that of the Pictones) it is a Celtic name. They are first mentioned by the rhetorician Eumenius in an oration addressed to Constantinus Chlorus, A.D. 296; and after this time their name frequently occurs in the Roman writers, and often in connexion with that of the Scoti. In the next century we find them divided into two tribes, the Dicaledonae or Dicaledones, and the Verturiones. (Amm. Marc. xx. 1, xxvi. 4.) [Verturiones is the MS. reading, not Vecturiones, and is supported by the name Verterae in Westmoreland.]

Pictōnes, subsequently Pictāvi, a powerful people on the coast of Gallia Aquitania, whose territory extended N. as far as the Liger (Loire), and E. probably as far as the river Creuse. Their chief town was Limonum, subsequently Pictavi (Poitiers). (Caes. B. G. iii. 11, vii. 4; Strab. p. 190.)

Pictor, Fabius. 1. C., painted the temple of Salus, which the dictator C. Junius Brutus Bubulcus contracted for in his censorship, B.C. 307, and dedicated in his dictatorship, 302. This painting, which must have been on the walls of the temple, was probably a representation of the battle which Bubulcus had gained against the Samnites. This is the earliest Roman painting of which we have any record. It was preserved till the reign of Claudius, when the temple was destroyed by fire. In consequence of this painting C. Fabius received the surname of Pictor, which was borne by his descendants. (Plin. xxxv. 19; Dionys. xvi. 6; Val. Max. viii. 14, 6.)—2. C., son of No. 1, consul 269.—3. N. (i.e. Numerius), also son of No. 1, consul, 266.—4. Q., son of

No. 2, was the most ancient writer of Roman history in prose (Liv. i. 44, ii. 40; Dionys. i. 6, vii. 71). He served in the Gallic war, 225, and also in the second Punic war (Pol. iii. 9; Liv. xxii. 7; Eutrop. iii. 5; Plin. x. 71). After the battle of Cannae he was sent to consult the oracle of Delphi (Liv. xxii. 57; Plut. Fab. Maz. 18). His history was written in Greek, which was then the only language of learning and literature, and was the channel of communication with writers outside the Italian peninsula. The History of Fabius began with the arrival of Aeneas in Italy, and came down to his own time. Polybius (i. 14, 58) speaks of his History as marked by some partiality, though not from design. That he was used as an authority by Livy and Diodorus there can be little doubt, though to what extent is a disputed question. For Polybius he was the chief authority in the account of the second Punic war. There seems to have been a Latin version or abridgment of his history (Gell. v. 4), to which Cicero probably alludes (de Or. ii. 12, 51). The order in which Cicero alludes to this version implies that it was made after Cato's Origines, whether by Fabius Pictor himself in his old age, or by some one else is uncertain. Some have attributed it to No. 6.—5. Q., praetor 189, and flamen Quirinalis (Liv. xxxvii. 47, xlv. 44).—6. Ser., is said by Cicero to have been well skilled in law, literature, and antiquity. He lived about B.C. 150. He wrote a work De Jure Pontificio, in several books. (Cic. Brut. 21, 81; Gell. i. 12, x. 15; Macrobi. iii. 2, 3.)

Picumnus and Pilumnus, two Roman divinities, were regarded as two brothers, and as the beneficent gods of matrimony in the rustic religion of the ancient Romans were worshipped in the Indigitamenta. [See p. 443, a.] They were originally the Italian deities of the grain or meal store and of the fertilisation of the fields: Picumnus was identified with Sterquilinius, the god who presided over the manuring of fields, and Pilumnus presided over the pounding of grain with the pestle, or pilum (Serv. ad Aen. ix. 4; Isid. Or. iv. 11). Hence the two deities were supposed to supply strength and growth to children. A couch was prepared for them in the house in which there was a newly-born child. Pilumnus was believed to ward off all sufferings from the infant with his pilum, and Picumnus conferred upon the infant prosperity (Varro, ap. August. C. D. vi. 9; Non. p. 528). The account cited from Varro states that at the time of childbirth these twin deities, associated with a third called Deverra, were supposed to prevent the incursion of Silvanus, who represented wild forest life. Three men in the character of these gods went round the house where the child was born: the first two smote the threshold with a hatchet and a pestle; the third swept it with a broom.

Picus, a Latin prophetic divinity, is described as a son of Saturnus or Sterculus, as the husband of Canens, and the father of Faunus. In some traditions he was called the first king of Italy. He was a famous soothsayer and augur, and as he made use in his prophetic art of a picus (a woodpecker), he himself was also called Picus. He was represented in a rude and primitive manner as a wooden pillar with a woodpecker on the top of it, but afterwards as a young man with a woodpecker on his head. Pomona, it is said, was beloved by Mars, and when Circe's love for him was not requited, she changed him into a woodpecker, who, however, retained the prophetic powers which he had formerly possessed as a man. (Ov. Met. xiv. 314, Fast. iii. 37; Verg. Aen. vii. 190; Plut. Q. R. 21.) In the stories of Picus there seems to be a combination of various popular beliefs. The woodpecker was a bird of prophetic power sacred to Mars, in his character of the agricultural god: hence Picus is at one time the agricultural deity son of Saturnus or Sterculus; at another the woodpecker itself; while in other traditions he partakes of the warlike character of Mars and is represented as a warrior king of Italy.

Piēria (Πιέρια: Πιέρες). 1. A narrow slip of country on the SE. coast of Macedonia, extending from the mouth of the Peneus in Thessaly to the Haliacmon, and bounded on the W. by Mount Olympus and its offshoots. A portion of these mountains was called by the ancient writers Pierus, or the Pierian mountain. The inhabitants of this country, the Pieres, were a Thracian people, and are celebrated in the early history of Greek poetry and music, since their country was one of the earliest seats of the worship of the Muses, and Orpheus is said to have been buried there. (Il. xiv. 226; Hes. Th. 53; Ap. Rh. i. 23.) After the establishment of the Macedonian kingdom in Emathia in the seventh century B.C. Pieria was conquered by the Macedonians, and the inhabitants were driven out of the country.—2. A district in Macedonia E. of the Strymon near Mount Pangaeus, where the Pierians settled who had been driven out of their original abodes by the Macedonians, as already related. They possessed in this district the fortified towns of Phagres and Pergamum. (Hdt. vii. 112; Thuc. ii. 99; Strab. p. 331.)—3. A district on the N. coast of Syria, so called from the mountain Pieria, a branch of the Amanus, a name given to it by the Macedonians after their conquest of the East. In this district was the city of Seleucia, which is distinguished from other cities of the same name as Seleucia in Pieria. (Strab. pp. 749, 751.)

Piērides (Πιερίδες). 1. A surname of the Muses, which they derived from Pieria, near Mt. Olympus, where they were first worshipped among the Thracians. Some derived the name from an ancient king Pierus, who is said to have emigrated from Thrace into Boeotia, and to have established their worship at Thespieae. Pieris also occurs in the singular. [See p. 578, b.]—2. The nine daughters of Pierus, king of Emathia (Macedonia), whom he begot by Eupippe or Antiope, and to whom he gave the names of the nine Muses. [MUSAE.] They afterwards entered into a contest with the Muses, and, being conquered, they were changed into birds called Colymbas, Iyngx, Cenchris, Cissa, Chloris, Acalanthis, Nessa, Pipo, and Dracontis. (Ov. Met. v. 300–678; Paus. ix. 29, 2; Ant. Lib. 9.)

Pietas, a personification of faithful attachment, love, and veneration among the Romans. At first she had only a small sanctuary at Rome, but in B.C. 191 a larger one was built. She is represented on Roman coins as a matron throwing incense upon an altar, and her attributes are a stork and children. She is sometimes represented as a female figure offering her breast to an aged parent, there being a tradition that the temple was dedicated in memory of a daughter who thus supported her mother in prison. (Plin. vii. 121; Val. Max. v. 417.)

Piētas Julīa. [POLA.]

Pigres (Πίγρης), of Halicarnassus, either the brother or the son of the celebrated Artemisia, queen of Caria. He is said by some writers to have been the author of the Margites and the Batrachomyomachia (Suid. s.v.; Plut. de Herod. Malign. 43, p. 873; cf. p. 425, b.)

Pilia, the wife of T. Pomponius Atticus, to whom she was married on February 12, B.C. 56. In the summer of the following year she bore her husband a daughter, who subsequently married Vipsanius Agrippa. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 16, v. 19, vi. 1, ad Q. Fr. ii. 3.)

Pilōrus (Πίλωρος), a town of Macedonia in Chalcidice, at the head of the Singitic gulf (Hdt. vii. 122).

Pilumnus. [PICUMNUS.]

Pimplēa (Πίμπλεια), a town in the Macedonian province of Pieria, sacred to the Muses, who were hence called Pimplēides (Strab. pp. 410, 471; Iycophr. 273). Horace (Od. i. 26, 9) uses Pimplēa for Pimplēis.

Pināra (τὰ Πίναρα: Πιναρῆς: Minara), an inland city of Lycia, some distance W. of the river Xanthus, at the foot of Mt. Cragus. Here Pandarus was worshipped as a hero (Strab. p. 665; Plin. v. 101). There are fine remains of the city and sculptured rock-tombs.

Pināria Gens, one of the most ancient patrician gentes at Rome, traced its origin to a time long previous to the foundation of the city. The legend related that when Hercules came into Italy he was hospitably received, on the spot where Rome was afterwards built, by the Potitii and the Pinarii, two of the most distinguished families in the country. The hero, in return, taught them the way in which he was to be worshipped; but as the Pinarii were not at hand when the sacrificial banquet was ready, and did not come till the entrails of the victim were eaten, Hercules, angrily exclaiming Τμεῖς δὲ πεινάσετε, determined that the Pinarii should in all future time be excluded from partaking of the entrails of the victims, and that in all matters relating to his worship they should be inferior to the Potitii. (Liv. i. 7; Dionys. i. 40; Diod. iv. 21; Macrobi. iii. 6, 12; Serv. ad Aen. viii. 269.) These two families continued to be the hereditary priests of Hercules till the censorship of App. Claudius (B.C. 312), who, as the story says, induced the Potitii to communicate the knowledge of the sacred rites to public slaves, in whose charge they remained thenceforth, whereat the god was so angry that the whole Potitia gens, containing twelve families and thirty grown-up men, perished within a year, or according to other accounts within thirty days, and Appius himself became blind (Liv. ix. 29). The Pinarii did not share in the guilt of communicating the sacred knowledge, and therefore did not receive the same punishment as the Potitii, but continued in existence to the latest times. The story may have arisen partly from a fancied etymology of the name of the Pinarii, partly from an attempt to account for the disappearance of a family who traditionally had held the priesthood. The worship of Hercules by the Potitii and Pinarii is described as a sacrum gentilitium belonging to these gentes; but it was a sacrum publicum entrusted by the state to these families. If it had been a sacrum privatum it would, as has justly been remarked, have ceased altogether when the family who administered it died out, instead of being entrusted to the public slaves. The Pinarii were divided into the families of Mamercinus, Natta, Posca, Rusca, and Scarpus, but none of them obtained sufficient importance to require a separate notice.

Pinarius, L., the great-nephew of the dictator C. Julius Caesar, being the grandson of Julia, Caesar's eldest sister. In the will of the dictator, Pinarius was named one of his heirs along with his two other great-nephews, C. Octavius and L. Pinarius, Octavius obtaining three-fourths of the property, and the remaining fourth being divided between Pinarius and Pedius. (Suet. Jul. 83; App. B.C. iii. 22.)

Pinārus (Πίναρρος), a river of Cilicia, rising in M. Amanus, and falling into the gulf of Issus near Issus, between the mouth of the Pyramus and the Syrian frontier (Strab. p. 676).

Pindārus (Πίνδαρος), the greatest lyric poet of Greece, was born either at Thebes or at Cynoscephalae, a village in the territory of Thebes, about B.C. 522. His family was one of the noblest in Thebes, and seems also to have been celebrated for its skill in music. The father or uncle of Pindar was a flute-player, and Pindar at an early age received instruction in the art from the flute-player Scopelinus. But the youth soon gave indications of a genius for poetry, which induced his father to send him to Athens to receive more perfect instruction in the art. Later writers tell us that his future glory as a poet was miraculously foreshadowed by a swarm of bees which rested upon his lips while he was asleep, and that this miracle first led him to compose poetry. (Paus. ix. 23, 2; Ael. V.H. xii. 45.) At Athens Pindar became the pupil of Lasus of Hermione, the founder of the Athenian school of dithyrambic poetry. He returned to Thebes before he completed his twentieth year, and is said to have received instruction there from Myrtis and Corinna of Tanagra, two poetesses, who then enjoyed great celebrity in Boeotia. It is said that Corinna objected to his earlier poems that they had too little mythology; but in the next poem he went to the opposite extreme of too profuse reference to myths, and she advised him 'to sow with the hand and not with the sack' (Plut. de Glor. Athen. 14). With both these poetesses Pindar contended for the prize in the musical contests at Thebes, and he is said to have been defeated five times by Corinna. Pindar began his career as a poet at an early age, and was soon employed by different states and princes in all parts of the Hellenic world to compose for them choral songs for special occasions. He received money and presents for his works, but without sacrificing his independent position as a great poet. The earliest of his extant poems appears to be the tenth Pythian ode, which he wrote at the age of twenty in praise of Hippocleas, winner of a Pythian race B.C. 502. It was composed at the instance of Thorax, a prince of Larissa, belonging to the family of the Aleuadae. He composed poems for Hiero, tyrant of Syracuse, Alexander, son of Amyntas, king of Macedonia, Theron, tyrant of Agrigentum, Arcesilaus, king of Cyrene, as well as for many free states and private persons. He was courted especially by Alexander, king of Macedonia, and Hiero, tyrant of Syracuse; and the praises which he bestowed upon the former are said to have been the chief reason which led his descendant, Alexander, the son of Philip, to spare the house of the poet when he destroyed the rest of Thebes. Pindar wrote the seventh Pythian ode in B.C. 490, the year of the battle of Marathon, in honour of the Athenian Megacles, winner of a chariot race. Between that year and the battle of Salamis only three of his extant odes were written—the tenth and eleventh Olympian and the fifth Nemean. This was in honour of the Aeginetan Pytheas, winner in the boys' contest at the Nemean games. It is the earliest of those odes (one fourth of the whole number) which honour Aeginetan victors and sing the praises of the heroic Aeacidae of Aegina. Sicily claimed even a larger share of his work; for fourteen of his odes were written in honour of Sicilian victors. These date after the battle of Salamis, when Pindar was nearly forty years of age. It was probably about that time that he visited Hiero, at whose court he spent four years (476–472), Agrigentum, Camarina, and Himera. It is even possible that he went to Cyrene, which is celebrated in more than one of his odes: notably in one of his finest, the fourth Pythian, written to celebrate the victory of Arcesilas, king of Cyrene, in the chariot race—which deserves mention, not only for its beautiful poetry, but also as a good instance of Pindar's manner of introducing a mythological story. It will be seen that though Pindar's home was Thebes, he frequently left it to visit princes and great men who courted his friendship and employed his services. With Athens he probably was well acquainted: the Athenians were grateful for his praises of their city (Dithyr. 4 = Fragm. 46), and made him their πρόξενος, besides setting up his statue and making him great presents of money (Paus. i. 8, 4; Isocr. περὶ Ἀντιδ. § 166). He is said to have died in the theatre of Argos at the age of 80. The latest work of his which can be dated is the fourth Olympian, which seems to have been written B.C. 452. A peculiar honour was paid to him at Delphi, where he was formally summoned to the sacred feast, and his descendants were admitted to it as his representatives. [Dict. of Ant. art. Theoxenia.] At Delphi, too, an iron chair was preserved on which, as it was said, he used to sit (Paus. x. 24, 4). The only poems of Pindar which have come down to us entire are his Epinicia, or triumphal odes. But these were but a small portion of his works. Besides his triumphal odes he wrote hymns to the gods, paeans, dithyrambs, odes for processions (προσόδια), songs of maidens (παρθένεια), mimic dancing songs (ὁπορχήματα), drinking songs (σκόλια), dirges (θρήνοι), and encomia (ἐγκώμια), or panegyrics on princes. Of these we have numerous fragments. Most of them are mentioned in the well-known lines of Horace (Od. iv. 2):

Seu per audaces nova dithyrambos
Verba devolvit, numerisque fertur
Lege solutis:
Seu deos (hymns and paeans) regesve (encomia)
canit, deorum
Sanguinem: . . .
Sive quos Elea domum reducit
Palma caelestes (the Epinicia): . . .
Flebilli sponsae juvenemve raptum
Plorat (the dirges).

In all of these Pindar excelled, as we see from the numerous quotations made from them by the ancient writers, though they are generally of too fragmentary a kind to allow us to form a judgment respecting them. Our estimate of Pindar as a poet must be formed almost exclusively from his Epinicia, which were composed in commemoration of some victory in the public games. The Epinicia are divided into four books, celebrating respectively the victories gained in the Olympian, Pythian, Nemean, and Isthmian games. In order to understand them properly we must bear in mind the nature of the occasion for which they were composed and the object which the poet had in view. A victory gained in one of the four great national festivals conferred honour, not only upon the conqueror and his family, but also upon the city to which he belonged. It was accordingly celebrated with great pomp and ceremony. Such a celebration began with a procession to a temple, where a sacrifice was offered, and it ended with a banquet and the joyous revelry called by the Greeks comus (κῶμος). For this celebration a poem was expressly composed, which was sung by a chorus. The poems were sung either during the procession to the temple or at the comus at the close of the banquet. Those of Pindar's Epinician odes which consist of strophes without epodes were sung during the procession, but the majority of them appear to have been sung at the comus. In these odes Pindar rarely describes the victory itself, as the scene was familiar to all the spectators, but he dwells upon the glory of the victor, and celebrates chiefly either his wealth (δῶλος) or his skill (ἀρετή)—his wealth, if he had gained the victory in the chariot race, since it was only the wealthy that could contend for the prize in this contest; his skill, if he had been exposed to peril in the contest.—Editions of Pindar by Dissen, 1843; Donaldson, 1868; C. T. Mommsen, 1864; Bergk, 1878; Bury, 1892; Fennell, 1893; Gildersleeve; Transl. by Myers, 1874.

Pindāsus (Πίνδασος), a S. branch of Mount Temnus in Myria, extending to the Elaïtic gulf, and containing the sources of the river Cetus (Plin. v. 126).

Pindenissus (Πινδένισσος), a town of eastern Cilicia on a spur of Mount Amanus, which was taken by Cicero after a siege of two months (Cic. ad Att. v. 20, ad Fam. ii. 10, xv. 4).

Pindus (Πίνδος). 1. A lofty range of mountains in northern Greece, a portion of the great backbone which runs through the centre of Greece from N. to S. (Hdt. i. 56, vii. 129; Strab. pp. 327, 428, 430). The name of Pindus was confined to that part of the chain which separates Thessaly and Epirus, and its most northerly and also highest part was called LACMON.—2. One of the four towns in Doris, near the sources of a small river of the same name which flowed through Locris into the Cephissus (Strab. p. 427; Plin. iv. 28).

Pinna (Pinnensis: Civitas di Penna), the chief town of the Vestini at the foot of the Apennines, surrounded by beautiful meadows. It stood by the Romans in the Social war. It was a municipium, but was made a colony by Augustus. (Plin. iii. 107; Sil. It. viii. 517.)

Pinnes, Pinneus, or Pineus, was the son of Agron, king of Illyria, by his first wife, Tritenta. At the death of Agron (B.C. 231), Pinnes, who was then a child, was left in the guardianship of his stepmother Teuta, whom Agron had married after divorcing Tritenta. When Teuta was defeated by the Romans, the care of Pinnes devolved upon Demetrius of Pharos; but when Demetrius in his turn made war against the Romans and was defeated, Pinnes was placed upon the throne by the Romans, but was compelled to pay tribute. (Liv. xxii. 33; Dio Cass. xxxiv. 46, 151; App. Illyr. 7, 8.)

Pintuaria (Πιντουαρία: Teneriffe), one of the Insulae Fortunatae (Canary Is.) off the W. coast of Africa, also called Convallis, and, from the perpetual snow on its peak, Nivaria. [FORTUNATAE INSULAE.]

Piraeus or Piræus (Πειραιεύς: Porto Leone or Porto Dracone), the most important of the harbours of Athens, was situated in the peninsula about five miles SW. of Athens. This peninsula, which is sometimes called by the general name of Piraeus, contained three harbours, Piraeus proper on the W. side, by far the largest of the three, Zea on the E. side separated from Piraeus by a narrow isthmus, and Munychia (Pharnari) still further to the E. The northern portion of the Piraeus proper (or the great harbour) seems to have been used by the merchant vessels, and the Cantharus, where the ships of war were stationed, was on the S. side of the harbour near the entrance: the docks, called Aphrodisium, were in the middle of the E. side, and derived their name from the temple of Aphrodite built on that part of the shore by Conon after the battle of Cnidus (Paus. i. 1, 3; cf. Schol. ad Aristoph. Pac. 145). It was through the suggestion of Themistocles that the Athenians were induced to make use of the harbour of Piraeus. Before the Persian wars their principal harbour was Phalerum, which was not situated in the Piræan peninsula at all, but lay to the E. of Munychia. [PHALERUM.] At the entrance of the harbour of Piraeus there were two promontories, the one on the right hand called Alcimus (Ἀλκιμος), on which was the tomb of Themistocles (Paus. i. 1, 2; Plut. Them. 32), and the other on the left called Eetionēa (Ἠετιώνεια), on which the Four Hundred erected a fortress (Thuc. viii. 90). The entrance of the harbour, which was narrow by nature, was rendered still narrower by two mole-heads, to which a chain was attached to prevent the ingress of hostile ships. The town or demus of Piraeus was surrounded with strong fortifications by Themistocles, and was connected with Athens by means of the celebrated Long Walls under the administration of Pericles. [See p. 140, b.] The town possessed a considerable population, especially of Metœci who were attracted in large numbers by the facilities for trade. The most important of its public buildings were: the Agora Hippodamia, the market built by Hippodamus of Miletus, which stood in the centre of the town; the temples of Zeus Soter and Athene Soteira (Paus. i. 1, 3; Strab. p. 395; Plin. xxxiv. 74), and a temple of the Syrian Aphrodite. The Scholiast to Aristophanes cited above speaks of five halls (στοαί), the largest of which is mentioned by Thucydides (viii. 90). The Phreatys, where those who had gone into exile for manslaughter, were tried for a new offence of the same kind [Dict. of Ant. art. Phonos], lay on the E. side of the peninsula to the S. of Zea. [For a map of the harbour see p. 142.]

Pirēnē (Πειρήνη), a celebrated fountain at Corinth, which, according to tradition, took its origin from Pirene, a daughter of Oebalus, who here melted away into tears through grief for the loss of her son, Cenchrias. At this fountain Bellerophon is said to have caught the horse Pegasus. It gushed forth from the rock in the Acrocorinthus, was conveyed down the hill by subterraneous conduits, and fell into a marble basin, from which the greater part of the town was supplied with water. The fountain was celebrated for the purity and salubrity of its water, and was so highly valued that the poets frequently employed its name as equivalent to that of Corinth itself. (Strab. p. 379; PEGASUS.)

Pirēsiāe (Πειρεσῖαι), a town of Thessaly, S. of the Peneus, on the river Pannisus and on the road from Tricca to Pharsalus.

Pirithōus (Πειρίθοος), son of Ixion or Zeus by Dia, was king of the Lapithae in Thessaly, and married to Hippodamia, by whom he became the father of Polypoetes (Il. ii. 741, xiv. 317). When Pirithōus was celebrating his marriage with Hippodamia, the intoxicated Centaur Eurytion or Eurytus carried her off, and this act occasioned the celebrated fight between the Centaurs and Lapithae, in which the Centaurs were defeated. (Il. i. 263; Od. xi. 630, xxi. 295; Ov. Met. xii. 210.) Pirithōus once invaded Attica, but when Theseus came forth to oppose him, he conceived a warm admiration for the Athenian king, and from this time a most intimate friendship sprang up between the two heroes. Theseus was present at the wedding of Pirithōus, and assisted him in his battle against the Centaurs. Hippodamia afterwards died, and each of the two friends resolved to wed a daughter of Zeus. With the assistance of Pirithōus, Theseus carried off Helen from Sparta, and placed her at Aethra under the care of Phaedra. Pirithōus was still more ambitious, and resolved to carry off Persephone, the wife of the king of the lower world. Theseus would not desert his friend in the enterprise, and the two friends descended to the lower world. Here they were seized by Pluto and fastened to a rock, where they both remained till Heracles delivered Theseus, who had made the daring attempt only to please his friend, but Pirithōus remained for ever a prisoner (amatores trecentae Pirithoum cohibent catenae, Hor. Od. iii. 4, 80). Pirithōus was worshipped at Athens, along with Theseus, as a hero. [THESEUS.]

Pirus (Πείρος), or Pierus (Πίερος: Kamenitza), the chief river of Achaia, which falls into the gulf of Patrae, near Olenus (Strab. pp. 342, 386).

Pirustae (Πειρούσται), a people in Illyria, exempted from taxes by the Romans, because they deserted Gentius and passed over to the Romans (Strab. p. 314; Liv. xlv. 26).

Pisa (Πῖσα: Πισάτης), the capital of Pisatis (Πισάτης), the middle portion of the province of Elis in Peloponnesus. [ELIS.] In the most ancient times Pisatis formed a union of eight states, of which, in addition to Pisa, we find mention of Salmone, Heraclea, Harpinna, Cycesium and Dyspontium. (Strab. p. 356.) Pisa itself was situated N. of the Alpheus, at a very short distance E. of Olympia (Hdt. ii. 7; cf. Pind. Ol. ii. 3), and, in consequence of its proximity to the latter place, was frequently identified by the poets with it. The history of the Pisatae consists of their struggle with the Eleans, with whom they contended for the presidency of the Olympic games. [ELIS.] The Pisatae obtained this honour in the 8th Olympiad (B.C. 748) with the assistance of Phidon, tyrant of Argos, and also a second time in the 34th Olympiad (644) by means of their own king Pantaleon. In the 52nd Olympiad (572) the struggle between the two peoples was brought to a close by the conquest and destruction of Pisa by the Eleans. So complete was the destruction of the city, that not a trace of it was left in later times, and some persons, as we learn from Strabo, even questioned whether it had ever existed, supposing that by the name of Pisa the kingdom of the Pisatae was alone intended (Strab. l.c.; cf. Paus. vi. 22, 2). Even after the destruction of the city, the Pisatae did not relinquish their claims, and in the 104th Olympiad (364), they had the presidency of the Olympic games along with the Arcadians, when the latter people were making war with the Eleans.

Pisae, more rarely Pisa (Pisanus: Pisa), one of the most ancient and important of the cities of Etruria, was situated at the confluence of the Arnus and Ausar (Serchio), about six miles from the sea; but the latter river altered its course in the twelfth century, and now flows into the sea by a separate channel. According to some traditions, due perhaps to similarity of name, Pisae was founded by the companions of Nestor, the inhabitants of Pisa in Elis, who were driven upon the coast of Italy on their return from Troy; whence the Roman poets give the Etruscan town the surname of Alpheia. (Strab. p. 222; Verg. Aen. x. 179; Claud. Bell. Gild. 483.) Pliny (iii. 50) speaks of it as founded by Pelops; Dionysius calls it a Pelasgian city (i. 20). It would seem that Pisa passed into the hands of the Ligyaes, and from them into those of the Etruscans. It then became one of the twelve cities of Etruria, and was down to the time of Augustus the most northern city in the country. Pisa was an ally of Rome in B.C. 225 (Pol. ii. 27), and is mentioned in the Ligurian wars as the head-quarters of the Roman legions (Liv. xxxiii. 43, xxxv. 22). In B.C. 180 it was made a Latin colony, and appears to have been colonised again in the time of Augustus, since we find it called in inscriptions Colonia Julia Pisana (Liv. xl. 43). Its harbour, called Portus Pisanus, between the mouth of the Arnus and the modern Leghorn, was much used by the Romans; and in the time of Strabo the town of Pisa was still a place of considerable importance on account of the marble quarries in its neighbourhood and the quantity of timber which it yielded for ship-building (Strab. p. 223). About three miles N. of the town were mineral springs, called Aquae Pisanæ (Plin. ii. 227), which have been identified with the modern Bagni di S. Giuliano, between Pisa and Lucca.

Pisander (Πείσανδρος). 1. Son of Polyctor, and one of the suitors of Penelope (Od. xviii. 298, xxii. 268; Ov. Her. i. 91).—2. An Athenian, of the demus of Acharnae, lived in the time of the Peloponnesian war, and was attacked by the comic poets for his rapacity and cowardice (Aristoph. Pax, 339, Av. 1556, Athen. p. 415; Ael. V.H. i. 27). In 412 he comes before us as the chief ostensible agent in effecting the revolution of the Four Hundred. In all the measures of the new government, of which he was a member, he took an active part; and when Theramenes and others withdrew from it, he sided with the more violent aristocrats, and was one of those who, on the counter-revolution, took refuge with Agis at Decelea. (Thuc. vi. 27, 60, viii. 49, 63, 89; Diod. xiii. 34.) His property was confiscated, and it does not appear that he ever returned to Athens.—3. A Spartan, brother-in-law of Agesilaus II., who made him admiral of the fleet in 395. In the following year he was defeated and slain in the sea-fight off Cnidus, against Conon and Pharnabazus. (Xen. Hell. iii. 4, 29, iv. 3, 10).—4. A poet of Camirus in Rhodes, flourished about B.C. 648–645 (Strab. pp. 655, 688). He was the author of a poem in two books on the exploits of Heracles, called Heraclēa (Ἡράκλεια) (Paus. ii. 37, viii. 22; Athen. p. 469; Schol. ad Ar. Nub. 1084). The Alexandrian grammarians thought so highly of the poem that they received Pisander, as well as Antimachus and Panyasis, into the epic canon together with Homer and Hesiod. Only a few lines of it have been preserved. In the Greek Anthology we find an epigram attributed to Pisander of Rhodes, perhaps the poet of Camirus.—5. A poet of Laranda, in Lycia or Lycaonia, was the son of Nestor, and flourished in the reign of Alexander Severus (A.D. 222–235). He wrote a poem, called Ἡρωικὰ θεογαμίαι, which probably treated of the marriages of gods and goddesses with mortals, and of the heroic progeny thus produced. (Zosim. v. 29; Macrobi. v. 2.)

Pisatis. [PISA.]

Pisaurum (Pisaurensis: Pesaro), an ancient town of Umbria, near the mouth of the river Pisaurus (Foglia), on the road to Ariminum (Plin. iii. 113). It was colonised by the Romans in B.C. 186, and probably a second time by Augustus, since it is called in inscriptions Colonia Julia Felix (Liv. xxxix. 44).

Pisaurus. [PISAURUM.]

Pisidia (ἡ Πισιδική: Πισίδης, pl. Πισίδαι, also Πεισίδαι, Πισείδαι and Πισιδικοί, Pisida pl. Pisidae, or Peisidae), an inland district of Asia Minor, bounded by Lycia and Pamphylia on the S.; Cilicia on the SE.; Lycaonia and Isauria (the latter often reckoned a part of Pisidia) on the E. and NE.; Phrygia Parorios on the N., where the boundary varied at different times, and was never very definite; and Caria on the W. It was a mountainous region, formed by that part of the main chain of Mt. Taurus which sweeps round in a semicircle parallel to the shore of the Pamphylian gulf; the strip of shore itself, at the foot of the mountains, constituting the district of PAMPHYLIA. The inhabitants of the mountains were a warlike aboriginal people, related apparently to the Isaurians and Cilicians. They maintained their independence, under petty chieftains, against all the successive rulers of Asia Minor. (Xen. An. i. 1, 11, ii. 1, 4; Strab. pp. 130, 569–571, 670; Liv. xxxv. 13.) The Romans never subdued the Pisidians in their mountain fortresses, though they took some of the towns on the outskirts of their country; for example, Antiochia, which was made a colony with the Jus Italicum. In fact the N. part, in which Antiochia stood, had originally belonged to Phrygia, and was more accessible and more civilised than the mountains which formed the proper country of the Pisidians. Nominally, the country was considered a part of Pamphylia, till the new subdivision of the empire under Constantine, when Pisidia was made a separate province. On the S. slope of the Taurus, several rivers flowed through Pisidia and Pamphylia, into the Pamphylian gulf, the chief of which were the Cestrus and the Catarhactes; and on the N. the mountain streams form some large salt lakes: namely, Ascania (Adjituz) S. of Antiochia, Caralis (Kerelu) SE. of Ascania, and Trogitis (Sighla) further to the SE., in Isauria. Special names were given to certain districts, which are sometimes spoken of as parts of Pisidia, sometimes as distinct countries: namely, Cabalia, in the SW. along the N. of Lycia; Milyas, the district NE. of Lycia and NW. of Pamphylia, and Isauria, in the E. of Pisidia, on the borders of Lycaonia.

Pisistratidae (Πεισιστρατίδαι), the sons of Pisistratus. The name is used sometimes to indicate only Hippias and Hipparchus, and sometimes in a wider application, embracing the grandchildren and near relations of Pisistratus (as by Herod. viii. 52, referring to a time when both Hippias and Hipparchus were dead).

Pisistratus (Πεισίστρατος), the youngest son of Nestor and Anaxibia, was a friend of Telemachus, and accompanied him on his journey from Pylos to Menelaus at Sparta (Od. iii. 400).

Pisistratus (Πεισίστρατος), an Athenian, son of Hippocrates, was so named after Pisistratus, the youngest son of Nestor, since the family of Hippocrates was of Pylian origin, and traced their descent to Neleus, the father of Nestor. The mother of Pisistratus was cousin to the mother of Solon. Pisistratus grew up equally distinguished for personal beauty and for mental endowments. The relationship between him and Solon naturally drew them together, and a close friendship sprang up between them. It is commonly said, on the authority of Plutarch (Sol. 8), that Pisistratus not only assisted Solon by his eloquence in persuading the Athenians to renew their struggle with the Megarians for the possession of Salamis, but afterwards fought with bravery in the expedition which Solon led against the island. It is, however, difficult to suppose that the distinguished services of Pisistratus against the Megarians can have been in Solon's expedition of 600 B.C., i.e. seventy-three years before the death of Pisistratus, especially as Herodotus seems to speak of him as commanding in the capture of Nisaea, which would imply that he was not then in his early youth. It is suggested, with probability, that the exploits of Pisistratus against the Megarians (recorded by Herodotus and Aristotle) were not in the campaign of 600, but in one several years later, possibly about 565, in which the Athenians a second time took Salamis and Nisaea, which had been recaptured by the Megarians (Plut. Sol. 12). In this war it is not unlikely that Pisistratus was στρατηγός, though the sentence in Arist. Aθ. Πολ. 17 is ambiguous (cf. Hdt. i. 59; Arist. Aθ. Πολ. 14). When Solon, after the establishment of his constitution, retired for a time from Athens, the old rivalry between the parties of the Plain, the Highlands and the Coast broke out into open feud. The party of the Plain, comprising chiefly the landed proprietors, was headed by Lycurgus and Miltiades, son of Cypselus; that of the Coast, consisting of the wealthier classes not belonging to the nobles, by Megacles, the son of Alcmaeon; the party of the Highlands, which aimed at more of political freedom and equality than either of the two others, was the one at the head of which Pisistratus placed himself, because they seemed the most likely to be useful in the furtherance of his ambitious designs. His liberality, as well as his military and oratorical abilities, gained him the support of a large body of citizens. Solon, on his return, quickly saw through the designs of Pisistratus, who listened with respect to his advice, though he prosecuted his schemes none the less diligently. When Pisistratus found his plans sufficiently ripe for execution, he one day made his appearance in the agora with his mules and his own person exhibiting recent wounds, pretending that he had been nearly assassinated by his enemies as he was riding into the country. An assembly of the people was forthwith called, in which one of his partisans proposed that a body-guard of fifty citizens, armed with clubs, should be granted to him. (Hdt. i. 59; Plut. Sol. 30; Arist. Aθ. Πολ. 14.) It was in vain that Solon opposed this; the guard was given him. Through the neglect or connivance of the people Pisistratus took this opportunity of raising a much larger force, with which he seized the citadel, B.C. 560, thus becoming what the Greeks called Tyrant of Athens. Having secured to himself the substance of power, he made no further change in the constitution, or in the laws, and governed ably and moderately. His first usurpation lasted but a short time (probably five years, as Aristotle reckons it). Before his power was firmly rooted, the factions headed by Megacles and Lycurgus combined, and Pisistratus was compelled to evacuate Athens. (Hdt. i. 60; Arist. l. c.) He remained in banishment B.C. 555-551 (if we take the 'twelfth year' of Arist. 'Aθ. Πολ. to mean the twelfth year after his first establishment). Meantime the factions of Megacles and Lycurgus revived their old feuds, and Megacles made overtures to Pisistratus, offering to reinstate him in the tyranny if he would connect himself with him by receiving his daughter in marriage. The proposal was accepted by Pisistratus, and the following stratagem was devised for accomplishing his restoration, according to the account of Herodotus. A damsel named Phya, of remarkable stature and beauty, was dressed up as Athene in a full suit of armour, and placed in a chariot, with Pisistratus by her side. The chariot was then driven towards the city, heralds being sent on before to announce that Athene in person was bringing back Pisistratus to her Acropolis. The report spread rapidly, and those in the city, believing that the woman was really their tutelary goddess, worshipped her, and admitted Pisistratus. (Hdt. i. 59, 60; Plut. Sol. 29, 30; Arist. 'Aθ. Πολ. 14.) Pisistratus nominally performed his part of the contract with Megacles; but in consequence of the insulting manner in which he treated his wife, Megacles again made common cause with Lycurgus, and Pisistratus was a second time compelled to evacuate Athens, B.C. 545, after six years of power (Hdt. i. 61; Arist. 'Aθ. Πολ. 15). He retired to Thrace, where he dwelt near Pangaeus, and employed the next ten years in making preparations to regain his power. At the end of that time he transferred his head-quarters to Eretria in Euboea, where he gathered forces of Eretrians and Thebans, and of troops supplied by Lygdamis of Naxos, who aided him in person. With these he invaded Attica, and defeated his opponents near the temple of Athene at Pallene, and then entered Athens without opposition. Lygdamis was rewarded by being restored as tyrant of Naxos, which island Pisistratus conquered. [LYGDAMIS.] Having now become tyrant of Athens for the third time, Pisistratus adopted measures to secure the undisturbed possession of his supremacy. Aristotle mentions a story that he disarmed the democratic party by a stratagem: having engaged their attention by a public speech, he induced them to follow him to a spot more convenient for hearing, and in the meantime their arms, which had been piled, were removed by the guards of Pisistratus ('Aθ. Πολ. 15). He took a body of foreign mercenaries into his pay, and seized as hostages the children of several of the principal citizens, placing them in the custody of Lygdamis, in Naxos. He maintained at the same time the form of Solon's institutions, only taking care, as his sons did after him, that the highest offices should always be held by some member of the family. He not only exacted obedience to the laws from his subjects and friends, but himself set the example of submitting to them. On one occasion he even appeared before the Areopagus to answer a charge of murder, which, however, was not prosecuted. (Arist. Pol. v. 12 = p. 1315; Plut. Sol. 31.) There is abundant testimony to the just and moderate character of his rule. He encouraged commerce and agriculture with occasional aids both by remission of taxes and by presents of seed. For such expenses and for his public works funds were provided by a tax on produce of 10 per cent. (according to Aristotle, 'Aθ. Πολ. 16; Thucydides vi. 54, speaks of a 5 per cent. tax; but there he seems to refer to the rule of Hippias and Hipparchus). He took pains himself to terminate disputes among the agriculturists, and he maintained the state in peace. (Hdt. i. 59; Thuc. vi. 54; Arist. 'Aθ. Πολ. 16.) In spite, however, of the prosperity which Athens enjoyed, there was doubtless an underlying impatience of despotism which broke out against the later and harsher rule of Hippias. Athens was indebted to Pisistratus for many stately and useful buildings. Among these may be mentioned a temple to the Pythian Apollo, and a magnificent temple to the Olympian Zeus, which remained unfinished for several centuries, and was at length completed by the emperor Hadrian. [See p. 143, a.] Pisistratus also encouraged literature in various ways. It was apparently under his auspices that Thespis introduced at Athens his rude form of tragedy (B.C. 535), and that dramatic contests were made a regular part of the Attic Dionysia. [For the accounts of his work in connexion with the Homeric poems, see HOMERUS.] Pisistratus is also said to have been the first person in Greece who collected a library, to which he generously allowed the public access. By his first wife Pisistratus had two sons, Hippias and Hipparchus. By his second wife, Timonassa, he had also two sons, Iophon and Thessalus who are rarely mentioned. He had also an illegitimate son, Hegesistratus, whom he made tyrant of Sigeum, after taking that town from the Mytilenaeans. Pisistratus died at an advanced age in 527, and was succeeded in the tyranny by his eldest son Hippias: but Hippias and his brother Hipparchus appear to have administered the affairs of the state with so little outward distinction, that they are frequently spoken of as though they had been joint tyrants. They continued the government on the same principles as their father. Thucydides (vi. 54) speaks in terms of high commendation of the virtue and intelligence with which their rule was exercised till the death of Hipparchus. Hipparchus inherited his father's literary tastes. Several distinguished poets lived at Athens under the patronage of Hipparchus, as, for example, Simonides of Ceos, Anacreon of Teos, Lasus of Hermione, and Onomacritus. After the murder of Hipparchus in 514, an account of which is given under HARMODIUS, a great change ensued in the character of the government. Under the influence of revengeful feelings and fears for his own safety Hippias now became a morose and suspicious tyrant. (Thuc. vi. 57-60; Arist. 'Aθ. Πολ. 19.) He put to death great numbers of the citizens, and raised money by extraordinary imposts. His old enemies the Alcmaeonidae, to whom Megacles belonged, availed themselves of the growing discontent of the citizens, and, after one or two unsuccessful attempts, they at length succeeded, supported by a large force under Cleomenes, in expelling the Pisistratidae from Attica. Hippias and his connexions retired to Sigeum, 510 (Hdt. v. 65). The family of the tyrants was condemned to perpetual banishment, a sentence which was maintained even in after-times, when decrees of amnesty were passed. Hippias afterwards repaired to the court of Darius, and looked forward to a restoration to his country by the aid of the Persians. He accompanied the expedition sent under Datis and Artaphernes, and pointed out to the Persians the plain of Marathon as the most suitable place for their landing (Hdt. vi. 102, 107). He was now (490) of great age. According to some accounts he fell in the battle of Marathon; according to others he died at Lemnos on his return. (Suid. s.v. Ἱππίας; Cic. ad Att. ix. 10; Just. ii. 9.) Hippias was the only one of the legitimate sons of Pisistratus who had children; but none of them attained distinction.

Piso, Calpurnius, the name of a distinguished plebeian family. The name of Piso, like many other Roman cognomens, is connected with agriculture, the noblest and most honourable pursuit of the ancient Romans: it comes from the verb pisere or pinsere, and refers to the pounding or grinding of corn (Plin. xviii. 10).—1. Was taken prisoner at the battle of Cannae, B.C. 216, and sent by Hannibal to Rome to negotiate the exchange of prisoners (Liv. xxii. 61); was praetor urbanus 211, and afterwards commanded as proprætor in Etruria, 210 (Liv. xxvii. 21). Piso in his prætorship proposed to the senate that the Ludi Apollinares, which had been exhibited for the first time in the preceding year (212), should be repeated and should be celebrated in future annually. The senate passed a decree to this effect. The establishment of these games by their ancestor was commemorated on coins by the Pisones in later times (Liv. xxvi. 23).—2. C., son of No. 1, was praetor 186, and received Further Spain as his province. He returned to Rome in 184, and obtained a triumph for a victory he had gained over the Lusitani and Celtiberi. He was consul in 180, and died during his consulship, not without suspicion of poison. (Liv. xxxix. 6, 30, xl. 37.)

Pisones with the agnomen Caesoninus.

3. L., received the agnomen Caesoninus, because he originally belonged to the Caesonia gens. He was praetor in 154, and obtained the province of Further Spain, but was defeated by the Lusitani. He was consul in 148, and was sent to conduct the war against Carthage, in which he showed little ability; he was succeeded in the command in the following year by Scipio. (App. Hisp. 56, Pun. 110).—4. L., son of No. 3, consul 112 with M. Livius Drusus. In 107 he served as legatus to the consul, L. Cassius Longinus, who was sent into Gaul to oppose the Cimbri and their allies, and he fell together with the consul in the battle in which the Roman army was utterly defeated by the Tigurini in the territory of the Allobroges (Oros. v. 15). This Piso was the grandfather of Caesar's father-in-law, a circumstance to which Caesar himself alludes in recording his own victory over the Tigurini at a later time (Caes. B.G. i. 7, 12).—5. L., son of No. 4, never rose to any of the offices of state, and is only known from the account given of him by Cicero in his violent invective against his son. He married the daughter of Calventius, a native of Cisalpine Gaul, who came from Placentia and settled at Rome; and hence Cicero calls his son in contempt a semi-Placentian (Pis.

23, 53).—6. L., son of No. 5, appears in Cicero (who perhaps somewhat exaggerates his faults) as an unprincipled debauchee and a cruel and corrupt magistrate. He is first mentioned in 59, when he was brought to trial by P. Clodius for plundering a province of which he had the administration after his prætorship, and he was only acquitted by throwing himself at the feet of the judges (Val. Max. viii. 1, 6). In the same year Caesar married his daughter Calpurnia, and through his influence Piso obtained the consulship for 58, having for his colleague A. Gabinius, who was indebted for the honour to Pompey. Both consuls supported Clodius in his measures against Cicero, which resulted in the banishment of the orator. The conduct of Piso in support of Clodius produced that extreme resentment in the mind of Cicero which he displayed against him on many subsequent occasions. At the expiration of his consulship Piso went to his province of Macedonia, where he remained during two years (57 and 56), plundering the province in the most shameless manner. In the latter of these years the senate resolved that a successor should be appointed; and in the debate in the senate which led to his recall, Cicero attacked him in the most unmeasured terms in an oration which has come down to us (De Provinciis Consularibus). Piso on his return (55) complained in the senate of the attack of Cicero, and justified the administration of his province, whereupon Cicero reiterated his charges in a speech which is likewise extant (In Pisonem). Cicero, however, did not venture to bring to trial the father-in-law of Caesar. In 50 Piso was censor with Ap. Claudius Pulcher. On the breaking out of the Civil war (49) Piso accompanied Pompey in his flight from the city; and although he did not go with him across the sea, he still kept aloof from Caesar. He subsequently returned to Rome, and remained neutral during the remainder of the Civil war. After Caesar's death (44) Piso at first opposed Antony, but is afterwards mentioned as one of his partisans. (Caes. B.C. i. 3; Dio Cass. xli. 16; App. B.C. ii. 135, iii. 54).—7. L., son of No. 6, was consul 15, and afterwards obtained the province of Pamphylia; from thence he was recalled by Augustus in 11, in order to make war upon the Thracians, who had attacked the province of Macedonia. He was appointed by Tiberius præfectus urbi, and was a companion of his revels. While retaining the favour of the emperor without condescending to servility, he at the same time earned the good-will of his fellow-citizens by the integrity and justice with which he governed the city. He died in A.D. 82, at the age of eighty, and was honoured, by a decree of the senate, with a public funeral. (Tac. Ann. vi. 16, 17; Dio Cass. liv. 21, 34, lviii. 19; Vell. Pat. ii. 98; Suet. Tib. 42; Plin. xiv. 145.) It was to this Piso and his two sons that Horace addressed his epistle on the Art of Poetry.

8. L., received from his integrity and conscientiousness the surname of Frugi, which is perhaps nearly equivalent to our 'man of worth.' He was tribune of the plebs, 149, in which year he proposed the first law for the punishment of extortion in the provinces (Cic. Brut. 27, 106). He was consul in 133, and carried on war against the slaves in Sicily (Val. Max. ii. 7, 9). He was a staunch supporter of the aristocratical party, and offered a strong opposition to the measures of C. Gracchus. Piso was censor, but it is uncertain in what year (Plin. xiii. 37). He wrote Annals, which contained the history of Rome from the earliest period to the age in which Piso himself lived (Cic. l.c.; Gell. xi. 14).—9. L., son of No. 8, served with distinction under his father in Sicily in 183, and died in Spain about 111, whither he had gone as propraetor (Cic. Verr. iv. 25).—10. L., son of No. 9, was a colleague of Verres in the praetorship, 74, when he thwarted many of the unrighteous schemes of the latter (Cic. Verr. i. 46).—11. C., son of No. 10, married Tullia, the daughter of Cicero, in 63, but was betrothed to her as early as 67. He was quaestor in 58, when he used every exertion to obtain the recall of his father-in-law from banishment; but he died in 57 before Cicero's return to Rome. He is frequently mentioned by Cicero in terms of gratitude on account of the zeal which he had manifested in his behalf during his banishment (Cic. ad Att. i. 3, ii. 24, ad Fam. xiv. 1).

Pisones without an agnomen.

12. C., consul 67, belonged to the high aristocratical party, and in his consulship opposed with the utmost vehemence the law of the tribune Gabinius for giving Pompey the command of the war against the pirates. In 66 and 65, Piso administered the province of Narbonese Gaul as proconsul, and while there suppressed an insurrection of the Allobroges. In 63 he was accused of plundering the province, and was defended by Cicero. The latter charge was brought against Piso at the instigation of Caesar, and Piso, in revenge, implored Cicero, but without success, to accuse Caesar as one of the conspirators of Catiline. (Plut. Pomp. 25, 27; Dio Cass. xxxvi. 20; Sall. Cat. 49).—13. M., usually called M. Pupius Piso, because he was adopted by M. Pupius, when the latter was an old man. He retained, however, his family-name Piso, just as Scipio, after his adoption by Metellus, was called Metellus Scipio. [METELLUS, No. 15.] On the death of L. Cinna, in 84, Piso married his wife, Annia. In 83 he was appointed quaestor to the consul L. Scipio; but he quickly deserted this party, and went over to Sulla, who compelled him to divorce his wife on account of her previous connexion with Cinna (Vell. Pat. ii. 41). After his praetorship, the year of which is uncertain, he received the province of Spain with the title of proconsul, and on his return to Rome in 69, enjoyed the honour of a triumph. He served in the Mithridatic war as a legatus of Pompey. (Dio Cass. xxxvii. 44; Cic. ad Att. i. 12–18.) He was elected consul for 61 through the influence of Pompey. In his consulship Piso gave great offence to Cicero, by not asking the orator first in the senate for his opinion, and by taking P. Clodius under his protection after his violation of the mysteries of the Bona Dea. Cicero revenged himself on Piso, by preventing him from obtaining the province of Syria, which had been promised him. Piso, in his younger days, had so high a reputation as an orator that Cicero was taken to him by his father, in order to receive instruction from him. He belonged to the Peripatetic school in philosophy, in which he received instructions from Staseas. (Cic. N.D. i. 7).—14. Cn., a young noble who had dissipated his fortune by his extravagance and profligacy, and therefore joined Catiline in what is usually called his first conspiracy (66). [For details see p. 207, b.] The senate, anxious to get rid of Piso, sent him into Nearer Spain as quaestor, but with the rank and title of propraetor. Here he was murdered by his escort; and some supposed that this was done at the instigation of Pompey. (Dio Cass. xxxvi. 27; Sall. Cat. 18, 19).—15. Cn., fought against Caesar in Africa (46), and after the death of the dictator joined Brutus and Cassius. He was subsequently pardoned, and returned to Rome; but he disdained to ask Augustus for any of the honours of the state, and was, without solicitation, raised to the consulship in 23. (Tac. Ann. ii. 43).—16. Cn., son of No. 15, inherited all the pride and haughtiness of his father. He was consul B.C. 7, and was sent by Augustus as legate into Spain, where he made himself hated by his cruelty and avarice. Tiberius after his accession was chiefly jealous of Germanicus, his brother's son; and accordingly, when the eastern provinces were assigned to Germanicus in A.D. 18, Tiberius conferred upon Piso the command of Syria, in order that the latter might do every thing in his power to thwart and oppose Germanicus. Plancina, the wife of Piso, was also urged on by Livia, the mother of the emperor, to vie with and annoy Agrippina. Germanicus and Agrippina were thus exposed to every species of insult and opposition from Piso and Plancina, and when Germanicus fell ill in the autumn of 19, he believed that he had been poisoned by them. Piso on his return to Rome (20) was accused of murdering Germanicus; the matter was investigated by the senate; but before the investigation came to an end, Piso was found one morning in his room with his throat cut, and his sword lying by his side. It was generally supposed that, despairing of the emperor's protection, he had put an end to his own life; but others believed that Tiberius dreaded his revealing his secrets, and accordingly caused him to be put to death. The powerful influence of Livia secured the acquittal of Plancina. (Tac. Ann. ii. 43, 55, 57, 69, 74, 80, iii. 10–18; Dio Cass. lvii. 18; Suet. Tib. 15, 52, Cal. 2).—17. C., the leader of the well-known conspiracy against Nero in A.D. 65. Piso himself did not form the plot; but as soon as he had joined it, his great popularity gained him many partisans. He possessed most of the qualities which the Romans prized, high birth, an eloquent address, liberality and affability; and he also displayed a sufficient love of magnificence and luxury to suit the taste of the day, which would not have tolerated austerity of manner or character. The conspiracy was discovered by Milichus, a freedman of Flavius Scevius, one of the conspirators. Piso thereupon opened his veins, and thus died. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 65, xv. 48–59; Dio Cass. lxii. 24; Suet. Ner. 36; Schol. ad Juv. v. 109.) It is probable that the poem De Laude Pisonis refers to this Piso [see No. 19].—18. L., surnamed Licinianus, was the son of M. Licinius Crassus Frugi, and was adopted by one of the Pisones. On the accession of Galba to the throne, he adopted as his son and successor Piso Licinianus; but the latter only enjoyed the distinction four days, for Otho, who had hoped to receive this honour, induced the praetorians to rise against the emperor. Piso fled for refuge into the temple of Vesta, but was dragged out by the soldiers, and despatched at the threshold of the temple, A.D. 69. (Tac. Hist. i. 14, 34, 48; Dio Cass. lxiv. 5; Suet. Galb. 17).—19. T. Cal-urnius Siculus, a poet in Nero's reign; who wrote seven Eclogues in imitation of Virgil and Theocritus. He praises the prosperous opening of Nero's reign, whom he calls 'deus' as well as 'juvenis' (i. 44, iv. 85). Editions by Keene, Lond. 1887, and in Poët. Lat. Min. It is probably right to assign to him also the poem De Laude Pisonis, which used to be ascribed to Saleius Bassus. It is interesting for its description of the game Latrunculi [Dict. of Ant. s.v.]. Editions by C. F. Weber, 1859, and in Poët. Lat. Min.

Pistor—that is, the 'pounder'—a surname of Jupiter at Rome, which probably was applied to him as the destroyer by thunderbolts; but a later tradition arose from a false connexion with the more familiar meaning 'baker'; and the common story was that, when the Gauls were besieging Rome, the god suggested to the besieged the idea of throwing loaves of bread among the enemies, to make them believe that the Romans had plenty of provisions, and thus caused them to give up the siege (Ov. Fast. vi. 343; Lactant. i. 20, 33).

Pistōria or Pistōrium (Pistoriensis: Pistoia), a small place in Etruria, on the road from Luca to Florentia, rendered memorable by the defeat of Catiline in its neighbourhood (Plin. iii. 52; Sall. Cat. 57).

Pitāna. [SPARTA.]

Pitānē (Πιτάνη: Tchanderluk), a seaport town of Aeolis, on the coast of the Elaitic gulf, at the mouth of the Evenus or, according to some, of the Caicus; almost destroyed by an earthquake under Titus (Hdt. i. 149; Strab. pp. 581, 607; Ov. Met. vii. 357). It was the birthplace of the Academic philosopher Arcesilaus.

Pithēcūsa. [AENARIA.]

Pitho (Πειθώ), called Suada or Suadēla by the Romans, the personification of Persuasion. She was worshipped as a divinity at Sicyon, where she was honoured with a temple in the agora, because she had persuaded Apollo and Artemis to return (Hdt. viii. 111; Paus. ii. 7, 7). Pitho also occurs as a surname of Aphrodite, whose worship was said to have been introduced at Athens by Theseus, when he united the country communities into towns. At Athens the statues of Pitho and Aphrodite Pandemos stood close together, and at Megara the statue of Pitho stood in the temple of Aphrodite; so that the two divinities must be conceived as closely connected. Pitho, in fact, was personified as the intercessor who made prayers to a deity effectual (Paus. ii. 22, 3).

Pithon (Πίθων, also Πείθων and Πύθων). 1. Son of Agenor, a Macedonian officer of Alexander the Great. He received from Alexander the government of part of the Indian provinces, in which he was confirmed after the king's death. In B.C. 316, he received from Antigonus the satrapy of Babylon. He afterwards fought with Demetrius against Ptolemy, and was slain at the battle of Gaza, 312. (Arrian, vi. 6; Curt. ix. 8; Diod. xix. 56, 80, 85.)—2. Son of Crateuas or Crateas, a Macedonian officer of Alexander (Just. xiii. 4), who is frequently confounded with the preceding (Arrian, vi. 28, 4). After Alexander's death he received from Perdiccas the satrapy of Media. He accompanied Perdiccas on his expedition to Egypt (321), but he took part in the mutiny against Perdiccas which terminated in the death of the latter (Diod. xviii. 36). Pithon rendered important service to Antigonus in his war against Eumenes; but after the death of Eumenes, he began to form schemes for his own aggrandisement, and was put to death by Antigonus, 316 (Diod. xix. 18).

Pitinum (Pitinas, -ātis). 1. A municipium in the interior of Umbria on the river Pisaurus, whence its inhabitants are called in inscriptions Pitinales Pisaurenses.—2. (Pettino), a town on the borders of the Sabini and Vestini, on the road from Amiternum to Priferum.

Pittācus (Πιττακός), one of those early cultivators of letters who were designated as 'the Seven Wise Men of Greece,' was a native of Mytilene in Lesbos, and was born about B.C. 652. He was highly celebrated as a warrior, a statesman, a philosopher, and a poet. He is first mentioned, in public life, as an opponent of the tyrants of Mytilene. [ALCAEUS.] in conjunction with the brothers of Alcaeus, he overthrew and killed the tyrant Melanchrus, B.C. 612. In 606 he commanded the Mytilenaeans in their war with the Athenians for the possession of Sigeum, on the coast of the Troad, and signalled himself by killing in single combat Phrynon, the commander of the Athenians. This feat Pittacus performed by entangling his adversary in a net, and then despatching him with a trident and a dagger, exactly after the fashion in which the gladiators called retiarii long afterwards fought at Rome (Strab. p. 600). This war was terminated by the mediation of Periander, who assigned the disputed territory to the Athenians; but the internal troubles of Mytilene still continued. The supreme power was fiercely disputed between a succession of tyrants and the aristocratic party headed by Alcaeus and his brother Antimenidas, and the latter were driven into exile. [ALCAEUS.] As the exiles tried to effect their return by force of arms, the popular party chose Pittacus as their ruler, with absolute power, under the title of Aesymnetes (Plut. Sol. 14). He held this office for ten years (589–579), and then voluntarily resigned it, having by his administration restored order to the state and prepared it for the safe enjoyment of a republican form of government. He lived in great honour at Mytilene for ten years after the resignation of his government, and died in 569, at an advanced age. Of the proverbial maxims of practical wisdom which were current under the names of the seven wise men of Greece, two were ascribed to Pittacus: namely, Χαλεπὸν ἐσθλὸν εἶμεναι and Καὶρὸν γινῶθι. (Ar. Pol. ii. 9, 9; Plat. Prot. p. 443; Paus. x. 24, 1.)

Pittheus (Πιτθεύς), king of Troezen, was son of Pelops and Dia, father of Aethra, and grandfather and instructor of Theseus. When Theseus married Phaedra, Pittheus took Hippolytus into his house. His tomb and the chair on which he had sat in judgment were shown at Troezen down to a late time. He is said to have taught the art of speaking, and even to have written a book upon it. Aethra, as his daughter, is called Pitthēis. (Paus. ii. 30, 8; Strab. p. 374; Ov. Her. x. 31.)

Pityia (Πιτυία: prob. Shamelik), a town mentioned by Homer, in the N. of Mysia, between Parium and Priapus, evidently named from the pine forests in its neighbourhood (Il. ii. 289; Strab. p. 588).

Pityonēsus (Πιτυόνησος: Anghistri), an island off the coast of Argolis (Plin. iv. 57).

Pityūs (Πιτυός: Pitzunda), a Greek city, in Sarmatia Asiatica, on the NE. coast of the Euxine, NW. of Dioscurias. In the time of Strabo, it was a considerable city and port. It was afterwards destroyed by the neighbouring tribe of the Heniochi, but it was restored, and long served as an important frontier fortress of the Roman empire. (Strab. p. 496; Arrian, Peripl. p. 18; Plin. vi. 16; Zosim. i. 32.)

Pityūsa, Pityussa (Πιτυούσα, Πιτυούσσα, contracted from πιτυδέσσα, fem. of πιτυδέης), i.e. abounding in pine-trees. 1. (Petsa), a small island in the Argolic gulf (Paus. ii. 34, 8; Plin. iv. 56).—2. The name of two islands off the S. coast of Spain, W. of the Balears. The larger of them was called Ebusus (Iviza), the smaller Ophiussa (Formentera): the latter was uninhabited. (Diod. v. 17; Strab. p. 167; Liv. xxviii. 37; Plin. iii. 76.)

Pixōdārus (Πιξώδαρος), prince or king of Caria, was the youngest of the three sons of Hecatomnus, all of whom successively held the sovereignty of Caria. Pixodarus obtained possession of the throne by the expulsion of his sister ADA, the widow and successor of her brother IDRIEUS, and held it for five years, B.C. 340–335. He was succeeded by his son-in-law Orontobates (Strab. pp. 656, 657).

Placentia (Placentinus: Piacenza), a Roman colony in Cisalpine Gaul, founded at the same time as Cremona, B.C. 219 (Pol. iii. 40; Liv. Ep. 20; Vell. Pat. i. 14). It was situated in the territory of the Anamares, on the right bank of the Po, not far from the mouth of the Trebia, and on the road from Mediolanum to Parma. It was besieged in vain by Hasdrubal, but a few years afterwards was taken and destroyed by the Gauls (Liv. xxvii. 39, xxxi. 10). It was, however, soon rebuilt by the Romans, and became an important place. It seems to have received a fresh colony under Augustus, and continued to be a flourishing town down to the time of the Goths. Its prosperity was partly due to its position close to the river Po, on which it had a port (Liv. xxi. 57; Tac. Hist. ii. 19; Plin. iii. 115; Strab. p. 215).

Plācia (Πλακίη, Ion.: Πλακηνός), an ancient town, in Mysia, E. of Cyzicus, at the foot of Mt. Olympus, seems to have been early destroyed (Hdt. i. 51).

Placīdia, Galla. [GALLA.]

Placītus, Sex., the author of a short Latin work, entitled De Medicina (or Medicamentis) ex Animalibus, consisting of thirty-four chapters, each of which treats of some animal whose body was supposed to possess certain medical properties. As might be expected, it contains numerous absurdities, and is of little or no value or interest. The date of the author is uncertain, but he is supposed to have lived in the fourth century after Christ. The work is printed by Stephanus in the Medicæ Artis Principes, Paris, fol. 1567, and elsewhere.

Plācus (Πλάκος), a mountain of Mysia, above the city of Thebe (Il. vi. 397, xxii. 479). The name had disappeared in Strabo's time (Strab. p. 614).

Planasia (Pianosa), an island between Corsica and the coast of Etruria, to which Augustus banished his grandson Agrippa Postumus (Tac. Ann. i. 3, 6, ii. 39).

Planciādes, Fulgentius. [FULGENTIUS.]

Plancina, Munātia, the wife of Cn. Piso, who was appointed governor of Syria in A.D. 18. While her husband used every effort to thwart Germanicus, she exerted herself equally to annoy and insult Agrippina. She was encouraged in this conduct by Livia, the mother of the emperor, who saved her from condemnation by the senate when she was accused along with her husband in 20. [Piso, No. 16.] She was brought to trial again in 33, a few years after the death of Livia, and, having no longer any hope of escape, she put an end to her own life. (Tac. Ann. ii. 43, 75, iii. 9, 17, vi. 32; Dio Cass. lviii. 22.)

Planciūs, Cn., first served in Africa under the propraetor A. Torquatus, subsequently, in B.C. 60, under the proconsul Q. Metellus in Crete, and next, in 62, as military tribune in the army of C. Antonius in Macedonia. In 58 he was quaestor in Macedonia under the propraetor L. Appuleius, and here he showed great kindness to Cicero when the latter came to this province during his banishment. He was tribune of the plebs in 56; and was elected curule aedile with A. Plotius in 54. But before Plancius and Plotius entered upon their office they were accused by Juventius Laterensis and L. Cassius Longinus, of the crime of sodalitium, or the bribery of the tribes by means of illegal associations and agencies [Dict. of Ant. art. Ambitus], in accordance with the Lex Licinia, which had been proposed by the consul Licinius Crassus in the preceding year. Cicero defended Plancius in an oration still extant, and obtained his acquittal. Plancius espoused the Pompeian party in the civil wars, and after Caesar had gained the supremacy lived in exile in Corcyra. (Cic. pro Plancio; ad Fam. iv. 14, xiv. 1, 3.)

Plancus, Munātius, the name of a distinguished plebeian family. The surname Plancus signified a person having flat splay feet without any bend in them. 1. L., was a friend of Julius Caesar, and served under him both in the Gallic and the Civil wars (Caes. B. G. v. 24). Caesar shortly before his death nominated him to the government of Transalpine Gaul for B.C. 44, with the exception of the Narbonese and Belgic portions of the province, and also to the consulship for 42, with D. Brutus as his colleague. After Caesar's death Plancus hastened into Gaul, and took possession of his province. Here he prepared at first to support the senate against Antony, but when Lepidus joined Antony, and their united forces threatened to overwhelm Plancus, the latter, in spite of Cicero's dissuasion, was persuaded by Asinius Pollio to follow his example, and to unite with Antony and Lepidus. Plancus during his government of Gaul founded the colonies of Lugdunum and Raurica. (Cic. ad Fam. x. 1–24; App. B. C. iii. 46, 74, 81, 97; Plut. Ant. 18.) He was consul in 42 according to the arrangement made by Caesar, and he subsequently followed Antony to Asia, where he remained for some years, and governed in succession the provinces of Asia and Syria (App. B. C. iv. 37; Vell. Pat. ii. 67). He deserted Antony in 32, shortly before the breaking out of the civil war between the latter and Octavian (Plut. Ant. 56). He was favourably received by Octavian, and continued to reside at Rome during the remainder of his life. It was on his proposal that Octavian received the title of Augustus in 27; and the emperor conferred upon him the censorship in 22 with Paulus Aemilius Lepidus. Both the public and private life of Plancus was stained by numerous vices. In his political action he was unprincipled as well as undecided (Vell. Pat. ii. 88). One of Horace's odes (Od. i. 7) is addressed to him.—2. T., surnamed Bursa, brother of the former, was tribune of the plebs B.C. 52, when he supported the views of Pompey, who was anxious to obtain the dictatorship. With this object he did everything in his power to increase the confusion which followed upon the death of Clodius. At the close of the year, as soon as his tribunate had expired, Plancus was accused by Cicero of vis and was condemned. After his condemnation Plancus went to Ravenna in Cisalpine Gaul, where he was kindly received by Caesar. Soon after the beginning of the Civil war he was restored to his civic rights by Caesar; but he appears to have taken no part in the Civil war. After Caesar's death Plancus fought on Antony's side in the campaign of Mutina. He was driven out of Pollentia by Pontius Aquila, the legate of D. Brutus, and in his flight broke his leg. (Cic. Phil. vi. 4, x. 10, xi. 6, xiii. 12; Dio Cass. xl. 49, xlv. 38; Plut. Pomp. 55.)—3. Cn., brother of the two preceding, praetor elect 44, was charged by Caesar in that year with the assignment to his soldiers of lands at Buthrotum in Epirus. As Atticus possessed property in the neighbourhood, Cicero commended to Plancus with much earnestness the interests of his friend. He was praetor in 43, and was allowed by the senate to join his brother Lucius [No. 1] in Transalpine Gaul, but caught a fever and was sent back to Rome. (Cic. ad Att. xvi. 16, ad Fam. x. 15, 17, 21.)—4. L. Plautius Plancus, brother of the three preceding, was adopted by a L. Plautius, and therefore took his praenomen as well as nomen, but retained his original cognomen, as was the case with Metellus Scipio [METELLUS, No. 15], and Pupius Piso [Piso, No. 13]. Before his adoption his praenomen was Caius. He was included in the proscription of the triumvirs, 43, with the consent of his brother Lucius, and was put to death. (Val. Max. xi. 8, 5; App. B. C. iv. 12; Plin. xiii. 25.)

Planudes Maximus, was one of the most learned of the Constantinopolitan monks of the last age of the Greek empire, and was greatly distinguished as a theologian, grammarian, and rhetorician; but his name is now chiefly interesting as that of the compiler of the latest of those collections of minor Greek poems, which were known by the names of Garlands or Anthologies (Στέφανοι, Ἀνθολογίαι). Planudes lived at Constantinople in the first half of the fourteenth century, under the emperors Andronicus II. and III. Palaeologus. In A.D. 1327 he was sent by Andronicus II. as ambassador to Venice. As the Anthology of Planudes was not only the latest compiled, but was also that which was recognised as The Greek Anthology until the discovery of the Anthology of Constantinus Cephalas, this is chosen as the fittest place for an account of the Literary History of the Greek Anthology. 1. Materials. The various collections to which their compilers gave the name of Garlands and Anthologies were made up of short poems, chiefly of an epigrammatic character, and in the elegiac metre. The earliest examples of such poetry were furnished by the inscriptions on monuments, such as those erected to commemorate heroic deeds, the statues of distinguished men, especially victors in the public games, sepulchral monuments, and dedicatory offerings in temples (ἀναθήματα); to which may be added oracles and proverbial sayings. At an early period in the history of Greek literature, poets of the highest fame cultivated this species of composition, which received its most perfect development from the hand of Simonides. Thenceforth, as a set form of poetry, it became a fit vehicle for the brief expression of thoughts and sentiments on any subject; until at last the form came to be cultivated for its own sake, and the literati of Alexandria and Byzantium deemed the ability to make epigrams an essential part of the character of a scholar. Hence the mere trifling, the stupid jokes and the wretched personalities which form so large a part of the epigrammatic poetry contained in the Greek Anthology.—2. The Garland of Meleager. At a comparatively early period in the history of Greek literature, various persons collected epigrams of particular classes, and with reference to their use as historical authorities; but the first person who made such a collection solely for its own sake, and to preserve epigrams of all kinds, was MELEAGER, a Cynic philosopher of Gadara, in Palestine, about B.C. 60. He entitled it The Garland (Στέφανος), with reference to the common comparison of small beautiful poems to flowers. The same idea is kept up in the word Anthology (ἀνθολογία), which was adopted by the next compiler as the title of his work. The Garland of Meleager was arranged in alphabetical order, according to the initial letters of the first line of each epigram. He included in this collection poems by forty-six authors of various dates from Archilochus to his own contemporaries, and also compositions of his own.—3. The Anthology of Philip of Thessalonica, was compiled in the time of Trajan, with the view of adding to the Garland of Meleager the epigrams of more recent writers.—4. Diogenianus, Straton, and Diogenes Laërtius. Shortly after Philip, in the reign of Hadrian, the learned grammarian, Diogenianus of Heraclea, compiled an Anthology, which is entirely lost. It might have been well if the same fate had befallen the very polluted collection of his contemporary, Straton of Sardis. About the same time Diogenes Laërtius collected the epigrams which are interspersed in his Lives of the Philosophers into a separate book.—5. Agathias Scholasticus, of Myrina, who lived in the time of Justinian, made a collection entitled Κύκλος ἐπιγραμμάτων. It was arranged in seven books, according to subjects. The poems included in it were those of recent writers, and chiefly those of Agathias himself and of his contemporaries, such as Paulus Silentiarius and Macedonius.—6. The Anthology of Constantinus Cephalas, or the Palatine Anthology. Constantinus Cephalas appears to have lived about four centuries after Agathias, and to have flourished in the tenth century, under the emperor Constantinus Porphyrogenitus. The labours of preceding compilers may be viewed as merely supplementary to the Garland of Meleager, but the Anthology of Constantinus Cephalas was an entirely new collection from the preceding Anthologies and from original sources. Nothing is known of Constantine himself. The MS. of the Anthology was discovered by the French scholar Saumaise, or Salmasius, in 1606, in the library of the Electors Palatine at Heidelberg. It was afterwards removed to the Vatican, with the rest of the Palatine library (1628), and has become known under the name of the Palatine Anthology. The MS. was restored to its old home at Heidelberg after the peace of 1815.—7. The Anthology of Planudes was an extract from the collection of Cephalas, divided into seven books, each of which, except the fifth and seventh, is subdivided into chapters according to subjects, and these chapters are arranged in alphabetical order. The contents of the books are as follows:—(1) Chiefly ἐπιδεικτικά: that is, displays of skill in this species of poetry, in 91 chapters. (2) Jocular or satiric (σκωπτικά), chaps. 53. (3) Sepulchral (ἐπιτύμβια), chaps. 32. (4) Inscriptions on statues of athletes and other works of art, descriptions of places, &c., chaps. 33. (5) The Ecphrasis of Christodorus, and epigrams on statues of charioteers in the Hippodrome at Constantinople. (6) Dedicatory (ἀναθηματικά), chaps. 27. (7) Amatory (ἐρωτικά). This abridgment by Planudes was the most complete anthology known until the discovery of the Palatine MS. of Cephalas, which then superseded it.—Edition of the Palatine Anthology by Jacobs, Lips. 1813–1817; Tauchnitz edition, Lips. 1872; Dübner, Paris, 1864.

Plātaea, more commonly Plataeae (Πλάταια, Πλαταιαί: Πλαταιεύς), an ancient city of Boeotia, on the N. slope of Mount Cithaeron, not far afterwards (480) their city was destroyed by the Persian army under Xerxes at the instigation of the Thebans; and the place was still in ruins in the following year (479), when the memorable battle was fought in their territory in which Mardonius was defeated, and the independence of Greece secured. (Hdt. ix. 25–70.) In consequence of this victory, the territory of Plataea was declared inviolable, and Pausanias and the other Greeks swore to guarantee its independence (Thuc. ii. 71; Plut. Aristid. 19; Strab. p. 412; Paus. ix. 2, 4). The sanctity of the city was still further secured by its being selected as the place in which the great festival of the Eleutheria was to be celebrated in honour of those Greeks who had fallen in the war. [See Dict. of Antiq. art. Eleutheria.] The Plataeans further received from the Greeks the large sum of eighty talents. Plataea now enjoyed a prosperity of fifty years; but in the third year of the Peloponnesian war (429) the Thebans persuaded the Spartans to attack the town, and after a siege of two years at length succeeded in obtaining possession of the place (427). (Thuc. ii. 1, 71, iii. 20, 52, 68.) Plataea was now razed to the ground. Its inhabitants sought refuge at Scione and afterwards at Athens; but it was again rebuilt after the peace of Antalcidas (387). (Thuc. v. 32; Plut. Lys. 14; Paus. ix. 1, 4.) It was destroyed the third time by its inveterate enemies the Thebans in 372 (Paus. ix. 1, 5; Diod. xv. 48; Isocr. Plataic. § 13). It was once more restored under the Macedonian supremacy, and continued in existence till a very

from the sources of the Asopus, and on the frontiers of Attica. It was said to have been founded by Thebes; and its name was commonly derived from Plataea, a daughter of Asopus. (Hdt. ii. 504; Thuc. iii. 61; Strab. p. 411; Paus. ix. 1, 1.) The town, though not large, played an important part in Greek history, and experienced many striking vicissitudes of fortune. At an early period the Plataeans deserted the Boeotian confederacy and placed themselves under the protection of Athens (Hdt. vi. 108; Thuc. iii. 68), and when the Persians invaded Attica, in B.C. 490, they sent 1000 men to the assistance of the Athenians, and had the honour of fighting on their side at the battle of Marathon. Platamōdes (Πλαταμώδης: C. Kivia), a promontory in the W. of Messenia (Strab. p. 348).

Plātāna, -um, -us (Πλατάνη, Πλάτανος, Πλάτανος), a fortress in Phoenicia, in a narrow pass between Lebanon and the sea, near the river Damuras or Tamyras (Damur). (Pol. v. 68; Jos. Ant. xvi. 11, 1.)

Plātēa (Πλατεία, also -εία, -εία, -αία: Bomba), an island on the coast of Cyrenaica, in N. Africa, the first place taken possession of by the Greek colonists under Battus.

Plāto (Πλάτων), the comic poet, was a native of Athens, contemporary with Aristot-phanes, Phrynichus, Eupolis, and Pherecrates, and flourished from B.C. 428 to 389. He ranked among the best poets of the Old Comedy. From the expressions of the grammarians, and from the large number of fragments which are preserved, it is evident that his plays were only second in popularity to those of Aristophanes. He attacked in many of his plays public characters of the day: e.g. demagogues in the Hyperbolus and the Cleophon, and a contemporary poet in the Cinesias. Purity of language, refined sharpness of wit, and a combination of the vigour of the Old Comedy with the greater elegance of the Middle and the New, were his chief characteristics. Suidas gives the titles of thirty of his dramas. With the Cleophon he won the third prize in 405 B.C., when Aristophanes was first with the Frogs, and Phrynichus second with the Muses.—Fragments in Meineke, Fr. Com. Graec.

Plato (Πλάτων), the philosopher, was born on the seventh day of Thargelion (= May 26th) B.C. 428 (if we follow the statements of Hermodorus and Apollodorus: see Diog. Laërt. iii. 2, 6.) Athens was probably his birthplace, though some say Aegina (Diog. Laërt. l.c.). His father, Aristo, claimed descent from Codrus, and the ancestors of his mother, Perictione, were related to Solon. Plato himself mentions the relationship of Critias, his maternal uncle, with Solon (Charm. p. 155). Originally, we are told, he was named after his grandfather Aristocles, but in consequence of the fluency of his speech, or, as others have it, the breadth of his chest, he acquired that name under which alone we know him (Diog. Laërt. iii. 4). One story made him the son of Apollo; another related that bees settled upon the lips of the sleeping child (Cic. Div. i. 46, 78). He is said to have contended, when a youth, in the Isthmian and other games, as well as to have made attempts in epic, lyric, and dithyrambic poetry, and not to have devoted himself to philosophy till a later time, probably after Socrates had drawn him within the magic circle of his influence. Plato was instructed in grammar, music, and gymnastics by the most distinguished teachers of that time. He was thus by birth and education inclined to the aristocratic and cultivated classes at Athens; but though he had great opportunities for a favourable start in political contests by the help of his connexions, especially of Critias, the most powerful of the Thirty, he preferred a life of philosophic study. At the same time it would be a mistake to suppose that he never took any part in public life. He must necessarily (as Grote points out) have served in military posts after he was eighteen, and the military service of 409–403 B.C. was constant and severe. Plato's birth and means probably placed him in the cavalry. There is abundant evidence from the Republic as well as from his letters that he had no aversion for such active employment, and some indication of his having once thought of political life, though there is no warrant for believing that he ever spoke or acted as a politician. Whatever inclinations that way he may have had were diverted by his disappointment and disgust at the tyranny of the Thirty, and he sought refuge in philosophy. At an early age he had become acquainted, through Cratylus, with the doctrines of Heraclitus, and through other instructors with the philosophical dogmas of the Eleatics and of Anaxagoras. In his twentieth year he is said to have betaken himself to Socrates, and became one of his most ardent admirers (cf. Diog. Laërt. iii. 5; Xen. Mem. iii. 6, 1). Pausanias (i. 30, 3) preserves a story that Socrates on the night before Plato first became his pupil, dreamed that a swan, the bird of Apollo, flew into his lap. After the death of Socrates (399) he withdrew to Megara, where he probably composed several of his dialogues, especially those of a dialectical character. He next went to Cyrene through friendship for the mathematician Theodorus, and is said to have visited afterwards Egypt, Sicily, and the Greek cities in Lower Italy, about 388 B.C. (Plat. Epist. vii. p. 324), in his desire to see new countries, especially Mount Etna. More distant journeys of Plato into the interior of Asia, to the Hebrews, Babylonians, and Assyrians, to the Magi and Persians, are mentioned only by writers on whom no reliance can be placed (Clem. Alex. adv. Gent. p. 46). To this tradition Cicero (Tusc. iv. 19, 43) seems to refer. His journey to Egypt is not mentioned by any writer before Cicero (de Rep. i. 10, 15, de Fin. v. 29, 87); but there is no doubt that he visited Cyrene, and no improbability in his going thence to Egypt. Plato, during his residence in Sicily, became acquainted, through Dion, with the elder Dionysius, but very soon fell out with the tyrant, who disliked his free exposition of social and political truths. It is impossible to reject altogether the story of his being sold into slavery (though of short duration). The best attested account is that Dionysius handed him over to the Spartan envoy Pollis to be taken to Greece, with secret instructions that he should be sold as a slave, that he was sold at Aegina and was purchased for twenty or thirty minae and freed by Anniceris, whom he had known at Cyrene. (Plut. Dion. 5; Diog. Laërt. iii. 17; Nep. Dion. 2.) The story is given differently by Diodorus (xv. 7), who says that Plato was sold by orders of Dionysius in the slave market at Syracuse, and freed by his friends, who subscribed twenty minae for the price. After his return to Athens, about 386, he began to teach, partly in the gymnasium of the Academy and its shady avenues, near the city, between the exterior Ceramicus and the hill Colonus Hippius, and partly in his garden, which was situated at Colonus. He taught without exacting fees, and his lectures were mainly in the form of lively dialogue; yet on the more difficult parts of his doctrinal system he probably delivered also connected discourses. The more narrow circle of his disciples assembled themselves in his garden at common simple meals (Diog. Laërt. ii. 8; Ael. V. H. ii. 18, iii. 35), and it was probably to them alone that the inscription said to have been set up over the vestibule of the house, 'Let no one enter who is unacquainted with geometry,' had reference (Tzet. Chil. viii. 972). Among his pupils were his nephew Speusippus, Xenocrates of Chalcedon, Aristotle, Heraclides Ponticus, Hestiaeus of Perinthus, Philippus the Opuntian, and others, men from the most different parts of Greece. To the wider circle of those who, without attaching themselves to the more narrow community of the school, sought instruction and incitement from him, such distinguished men as Chabrias, Iphicrates, Timotheus, Phocion, Hyperides, Lycurgus, and Isocrates, are said to have belonged. Whether Demosthenes was of the number is doubtful (cf. [Dem.] Epist. v. Cic. de Or. i. 20, 89, Or. 4, 16, de Off. i. 1, 4). Cicero clearly has no doubt of it, but he refers to the letters of Demosthenes as his authority, and these are probably spurious. Plato's occupation as an instructor was twice interrupted by his voyages to Sicily; first when Dion, probably soon after the death of the elder Dionysius, persuaded him to make the attempt to win the younger Dionysius to philosophy; the second time, a few years later (about 360), when the wish of his Pythagorean friends, and the invitation of Dionysius to reconcile the disputes which had broken out between him and his step-uncle Dion, brought him back to Syracuse. His efforts were both times unsuccessful, and he owed his own safety to nothing but the earnest intercession of Archytas. That Plato cherished the hope of realising through the conversion of Dionysius his idea of a state in the rising city of Syracuse was a belief pretty generally spread in antiquity, which finds some confirmation in the expressions of the philosopher himself, and of the seventh Platonic letter (which, though spurious, is written with the most evident acquaintance with the matters treated of). (Plut. Dion, 11-20; Diog. Laërt. iii. 21, 25; [Plat.] Epist. iii., vii.) With the exception of these two visits to Sicily, Plato was occupied from the time when he opened the school in the Academy in giving instruction and in the composition of his works. He died in the 82nd year of his age, B.C. 347. According to some he died while writing; according to others, at a marriage feast. According to his last will his garden remained the property of the school, and passed, considerably increased by subsequent additions, into the hands of the Academic school, who kept as a festival his birthday as well as that of Socrates. Athenians and strangers honoured his memory by monuments. Still he had no lack of enemies and enviers. He was attacked by contemporary comic poets, as Theopompus, Alexis, Cratinus the younger, and others; by one-sided Socratics, as Antisthenes, Diogenes, and the later Megarics, and also by the Epicureans, Stoics, certain Peripatetics, and later writers eager for detraction. Thus even Antisthenes and Aristoxenus charged him with sensuality, avarice, and sycophancy; and others with vanity, ambition, and envy towards other Socratics, Protagoras, Epicharmus and Philolaus. (Diog. Laërt. iii. 26, 35; Athen. pp. 59, 424, 507, 509, 589.) But the admiration is better attested, and the character which his admirers have drawn is substantiated by his writings.—The Writings of Plato. These writings have come down to us complete, and have always been admired as a model of the union of artistic perfection with philosophical acuteness and depth. They are in the form of dialogue. Plato was not the first writer who employed this style of composition for philosophical instruction: Zeno the Eleatic had already written in the form of question and answer; Alexamenus the Teian and Sophron in the mimes had treated ethical subjects in the form of dialogue; and in later periods Xenophon, Aeschines, Antisthenes, Euclides, and other Socratics also made use of the dialogical form. But Plato has handled this form not only with greater mastery than anyone who preceded him, but, in all probability, with the distinct intention of keeping by this very means true to the admonition of Socrates, not to communicate instruction, but to lead to the spontaneous discovery of it, and he is the first who has made this style of writing a literary model. The advantages which he found in this method were that he was able to make Socrates a central figure, that he could more easily argue out every question, from all points of view, and that he had full scope for his dramatic power of drawing character. Various arrangements of the dialogues of Plato have been proposed, but none of them can be maintained by any convincing arguments. There is no ground for the belief that Plato arranged them on any scheme, so as to form a consecutive series, and the probabilities are all the other way. The arrangement, therefore, which assumes progressive stages of philosophy from one dialogue to another will be wisely rejected; nor is there any warrant for saying that certain dialogues belong to certain periods of Plato's life because this or that view is apparent in them. Even if the adoption of any doctrine, such as that of Ideas or of ἀνάνησις, could be assigned to a particular date (which is, to say the least, doubtful), there would still remain the possibility of a later revision of the dialogue in question. Of external evidence as to date there is none, and the guidance from mention of historical events in the dialogues themselves is scanty and precarious. The utmost that can be said is that there are some arguments for the arrangement which places the following dialogues in the earlier period, i.e. before, or near, the time of the death of Socrates: viz. Laches, Hippias Major and Minor, Lysis, Ion, Charmides, Meno, Alcibiades I., Cratylus, Euthydemus, Protagoras, Euthyphron, Gorgias; after the death of Socrates, Apology (which is not, however, a dialogue), Crito. The following seem to belong to a later date, between his first and second journeys to Sicily: viz. Theaetetus, Sophistes, Politicus, Parmenides, Menexenus (a funeral oration), Symposium, Phaedrus, Phaedo, Philebus, Republic, Timaeus, Critias, and, lastly, the Laws, which occupied several years in writing, and was published after his death. Of these Hippias Minor, Alcibiades I. and Menexenus are rejected by many critics and may be set down as doubtful. The following are certainly spurious: viz. Alcibiades II., Axiochus, Clitophon, Demodocus, Epinomis, Erastae, Eryxias, Hipparchus, De Justo, Minos, Sisyphus, Theages, De Virtute. In this list of spurious works the Letters also must be included. The dialogues which are directly cited by Aristotle as written by Plato are: Republic, Timaeus, Laws, Phaedo, Phaedrus, Symposium, Gorgias, Meno, Hippias I.; but it is obvious that his silence does not condemn the others, and several which have not his testimony are universally accepted as Plato's work. Some, however, of the dialogues which have been admitted as certainly genuine in the above list have been objected to by one critic or another.—The Philosophy of Plato. The nature of this work will allow only a few brief remarks upon this subject. Plato, like Socrates, was penetrated with the idea that wisdom is the attribute of the Godhead; that philosophy, springing from the impulse to know, is the necessity of the intellectual man, and the greatest of the blessings in which he participates. When once we strive after Wisdom with the intensity of a lover, she becomes the true consecration and purification of the soul, adapted to lead us from darkness to the true day. An approach to wisdom, however, presupposes an original communion with Being, truly so called; and this communion again presupposes the divine nature of immortality of the soul, and the impulse to become like the Eternal. This impulse is the love which generates in Truth, and the development of it is termed Dialectics. Out of the philosophical impulse which is developed by Dialectics not only correct knowledge, but also correct action springs forth. Socrates' doctrine respecting the unity of virtue, and that it consists in true, vigorous, and practical knowledge, is intended to be set forth in the Protagoras and the smaller kindred dialogues. They are designed, therefore, to introduce a foundation for ethics, by the refutation of the common views that were entertained of morals and of virtue. For although not even the words 'ethics' and 'physics' occur in Plato, and even dialectics are not treated of as a distinct and separate province, yet he must rightly be regarded as the originator of the threefold division of philosophy, inasmuch as he had before him the decided object to develop the Socratic method into a scientific system of dialectics that should supply the grounds of our knowledge as well as of our moral action (physics and ethics). Accordingly, the Theaetetus, Sophistes, Parmenides, and Cratylus, are principally dialectical; the Protagoras, Gorgias, Politicus, Philebus, and the Republic, principally ethical; while the Timaeus is exclusively physical. Plato, in developing the Socratic view of the true conception of objects, was influenced both by the Eleatic doctrine of the unchangeable unity of real existence [PARMENIDES] and the Heraclitean theory of a perpetual flow and change in human life [see p. 403], whence followed the question, how could there be absolute knowledge of the objects of sense which were perpetually changing (Aristot. Met. A. 6). This question Plato solved by his doctrine of Ideas, which became the central part of his system. The objects which our senses perceive are indeed changeable with each perception and unreal, but each of these is an imperfect copy of a perfect original which has a real immutable and eternal existence in another world; and the perfect original was called an idea or eidos, because it was the true form or archetype; and inasmuch as there was only one 'idea' or archetype of each class of things, 'ideas' were sometimes called εἰδές or μονάδες i.e. 'unities' (Phileb. p. 15). The highest of all was the 'idea' of Good, which was the cause of all perfection (but yet nothing personified). The body being a hindrance to the contemplation of these unchangeable realities which are the only absolute knowledge, the philosopher frees himself as far as possible from the disturbance of senses. Further, as an aid to conceiving these true 'ideas,' the human soul has a certain power of 'recollection' (ἀνάμνησις) of the sight which it enjoyed of them before it was linked to the human body. The vision has been to a great extent forgotten, but still the recollection is stirred by the sight of the imperfect copy and is strengthened when the mind abstracts itself from the world of sense, and exercises its reason.—His system of ethics was founded upon his dialectics, as remarked above. Hence he asserted that, not being in a condition to grasp the idea of the Good with full distinctness, we are able to approximate to it only so far as we elevate the power of thinking to its original purity.—Complete editions of Plato by Stallbaum, Lips. 1850-1877; Baiter and Orelli, Zurich, 1839-1874; by C. F. Hermann, Lips. 1874. Translation by Jowett, Oxford, 1881. Among the numerous editions of separate treatises are the Gorgias by W. H.

Thompson; Apology by Riddell; Apology and Phaedo by W. Smith; Phaedo by Archer Hind; Theaetetus by Campbell; Phaedrus by W. H. Thompson; Sophistes and Politicus by Campbell; Philebus by H. Jackson.

Plator. 1. Commanded Oreum for Philip B.C. 207 and betrayed the town to the Romans (Liv. xxviii. 6).—2. Brother of GENTIUS king of Illyria, and son of Pleuratus (Liv. xlv. 30). According to Polybius, xxix. 5, his name was Pleuratus.

Plautia Gens, a plebeian gens at Rome. The name is also written Plotius, just as we have both Clodius and Claudius. The gens was divided into the families of Hypsaeus, Proculus, Silvanus, Venno, Venox. Although several members of these families obtained the consulship, none of them are of sufficient importance to require a separate notice.

Plautianus, Fulvius, an African by birth, the fellow-townsmen of Septimius Severus. He served as praefect of the praetorium under this emperor, who loaded him with honours and wealth, and virtually made over much of the imperial authority into his hands. Intoxicated by these distinctions, Plautianus indulged in the most despotic tyranny, and perpetrated acts of cruelty almost beyond belief. In A.D. 202 his daughter Plautilla was married to Caracalla; but having discovered the dislike cherished by Caracalla towards both his daughter and himself, and looking forward with apprehension to the downfall which awaited him upon the death of the sovereign, he formed a plot against the life both of Septimius and Caracalla. His treachery was discovered, and he was immediately put to death, 203. His daughter, Plautilla, was banished first to Sicily, and subsequently to Lipara, where she was treated with the greatest harshness. After the murder of Geta, in 212, Plautilla was put to death by order of her husband. (Dio Cass. lxxv. 14, lxxvi. 2, lxxvii. 1.)

Plautilla. [PLAUTIANUS.]

Plautius. I. A., a man of consular rank, who was sent by the emperor Claudius in A.D. 43 to subdue Britain. He remained in Britain four years, and subdued the S. part of the island. He obtained an ovation on his return to Rome in 47. (Tac. Agr. 14.) It was alleged against his wife, Pomponia, that she had become a convert to Christianity, and Plautius was commissioned to inquire into the charge, which he reported to be disproved (Tac. Ann. xiii. 32).—2. An early writer of comedies, who is mentioned by Varro as having written plays which were sometimes reckoned among those of Plautus (Gell. iii. 3, 10).—3. A Roman jurist, who lived about the time of Vespasian, and is cited by subsequent jurists.

Plautus, T. Maccius, the most celebrated comic poet of Rome, was a native of Sarsina, a small village in Umbria. His name has been much disputed. Festus (p. 238) explains the name Plotus as meaning in the Umbrian language 'flat-footed' and mentions as bearing that name the poet of Sarsina, called (as it appears in the abridgment of Paulus) Accius. Hence the great comedian was commonly known in modern times as M. Accius Plautus until Ritschl, from a comparison of Plaut. Merc. 6, and the conclusion of the Casina, Menaechmi, and Epidicus in the Ambrosian MS., with Gell. iii. 3, 9, deduced the name Maccius, which is now almost universally accepted. It is suggested with some probability that it was formed from the word maccus, a buffoon, given as a nickname to Plautus, and adopted by him when he became a Roman citizen. The date of his birth is uncertain, but it may be placed about B.C. 254. Cicero (de Sen. 50) speaks of Plautus as having been an old man in 191 B.C. He probably came to Rome at an early age, since he displays such a perfect mastery of the Latin language, and an acquaintance with Greek literature, which he could hardly have acquired in a provincial town. When he arrived at Rome he was in needy circumstances, and was first employed in the service of the actors. With the money he had saved in this inferior station he left Rome and set up in business: but his speculations failed; he returned to Rome, and his necessities obliged him to enter the service of a baker, who employed him in turning a hand-mill (Gell. iii. 3, 14). While in this degrading occupation he wrote three plays, the sale of which to the managers of the public games enabled him to quit his drudgery, and begin his literary career. He was then probably about thirty years of age (224), and accordingly began to write comedies a few years before the breaking out of the second Punic war. He continued to write for about forty years, and died in 184, when he was seventy years of age (Cic. Brut. 60). His contemporaries at first were Livius Andronicus and Naevius, afterwards Ennius and Caecilius: Terence did not rise into notice till almost twenty years after his death. During the long time that Plautus held possession of the stage, he was always a great favourite of the people; and he expressed a bold consciousness of his own powers in the epitaph which he wrote for his tomb, and which has come down to us:—

Postquam est mortem aptus Plautus, comoedia luget,
Scena deserta, dein risus, ludus jocusque

Et numeri innumeri simul omnes collacrumarunt.
(Gell. i. 24, 3.)

Plautus wrote a great number of comedies, and in the last century of the republic there were 130 plays which bore his name. Most of these, however, were not considered genuine by the best Roman critics. There were several works written upon the subject, and of these the most celebrated was the treatise of Varro entitled Quaestiones Plautinae. It appears that towards the end of the republic there had been a tendency to reckon as 'Plautine' all old palliatae comediae, and Varro limited the undoubted comedies of the poet to twenty-one, which were hence called the Fabulae Varronianae. These Varronian comedies are no doubt those which have come down to our own time, with the loss of one. At present we possess only twenty comedies of Plautus; but there were originally twenty-one in the manuscripts, and the Vidularia, which was the twenty-first, and which came last in the collection, was torn off from the manuscript in the middle ages. The titles of the twenty-one Varronian plays are: 1. Amphitruo. 2. Asinaria. 3. Aulularia. 4. Captivi. 5. Curculio. 6. Casina. 7. Cistellaria. 8. Epidicus. 9. Bacchides. 10. Mostellaria. 11. Menaechmi. 12. Miles. 13. Mercator. 14. Pseudolus. 15. Poenulus. 16. Persa. 17. Rudens. 18. Stichus. 19. Trinummus. 20. Truculentus. 21. Vidularia. This is the order in which they occur in the manuscripts, though probably not the one in which they were originally arranged by Varro. The present order is evidently alphabetical; the initial letter of the title of each play is alone regarded, and no attention is paid to those which follow: hence we find Captivi, Curculio, Casina, Cistellaria: Mostellaria, Menaechmi, Miles, Mercator: Pseudolus, Poenulus, Persa. The play of the Bacchides forms the only exception to the alphabetical order. It was probably placed after the Epidicus by some copyist, because he had observed that Plautus in the Bacchides (ii. 2, 36) referred to the Epidicus as an earlier work. The names of the comedies are either taken from some leading character in the play, or from some circumstance which occurs in it: those titles ending in aria are adjectives, giving a general description of the play: thus Asinaria is the 'Ass-Comedy.' The comedies of Plautus enjoyed unrivalled popularity among the Romans, and continued to be represented down to the time of Diocletian. The continued popularity of Plautus through so many centuries was owing, in a great measure, to his being a national poet. Though he founds his plays upon Greek models, the characters in them act, speak, and joke like genuine Romans, and he thereby secured the sympathy of his audience more completely than Terence could ever have done. Whether Plautus borrowed the plan of all his plays from Greek models, it is impossible to say. The Bacchides, Poenulus and (according to some) the Stichus, were taken from Menander; the Casina and Rudens from Diphilus; the Mercator and the Trinummus, and possibly also the Mostellaria, from Philemon; the Asinaria from Demophilus. But in all cases Plautus allowed himself much greater liberty than Terence; and in some instances he appears to have simply taken the leading idea of the play from the Greek, and to have filled it up in his own fashion. It has been inferred from a well-known line of Horace (Epist. ii. 1. 58), 'Plautus ad exemplar Siculi properare Epicharmi,' that Plautus took great pains to imitate Epicharmus. But there is no correspondence between any of the existing plays of Plautus and the known titles of the comedies of Epicharmus; and the verb properare has reference only to the liveliness and energy of Plautus's style, in which he bore a resemblance to the Sicilian poet. There is abundant testimony to the esteem in which Plautus was held alike by the educated Romans and by the general public. Horace (de Arte Poët. 270), indeed, expresses a less favourable opinion of Plautus; but it must be recollected that the taste of Horace had been formed by a different school of literature, and that he disliked the ancient poets of his country. Moreover, it is probable that the censure of Horace does not refer to the general character of Plautus's poetry, but merely to his inharmonious verses and to some of his jests. Cicero (de Off. i. 29, 104) places his wit on a par with that of the Old Attic Comedy (cf. Apoll. Sidon. xxiii. 148). By moderns Plautus has not only been admired but has been selected for imitation by many of the best poets. Thus the Amphitruo (the only play of Plautus which has a mythological plot) has been imitated by Molière and Dryden; the Aulularia by Molière in his Avare; the Mostellaria by Regnard, Addison, and others; the Menaechmi by Shakspeare in his Comedy of Errors; the Trinummus by Lessing in his Schatz; and so with others.—Of the present complete editions the best are by Ritschl, 1848, 1884; Fleckeisen, 1859, 1874; Ussing, 1875. Among useful editions of separate plays are the Aulularia and Menaechmi by Wagner, 1876, 1878; the Captivi by Sonnenschein, 1880; the Mostellaria by Ramsay, 1869, and by Sonnenschein, 1884; the Miles Gloriosus by Tyrrell, 1885; the Trinummus by Wagner, 1875, and by Sloman, 1883; the Truculentus by Studemund, 1868.

Plavis (Piave), a river in Venetia in the N. of Italy, which flows past Bellunum and falls into the sea at Altinum, W. of Aquileia.

Pleiādes (Πλειάδες or Πελειάδες), the Pleiads, are usually called the daughters of Atlas and Pleione, whence they bear the name of the Atlantides (Hes. Op. 383, 614; Hyg. Ast. ii. 21; Apollod. iii. 10). They were called Vergiliae by the Romans (a name which some connected with ver as the season of their rising), and also Suculae (i.e. the herd of little pigs): they were also known as Sidus Parilicium, because they shone at the time of the festival Parilia. (Plin. xviii. 246; Serv. ad Aen. i. 744; Fest. p. 372.) They were the sisters of the Hyades, and seven in number, six of whom are described as visible, and the seventh as invisible. The Pleiades are said to have made away with themselves from grief at the death of their sisters, the Hyades, or at the fate of their father, Atlas, and were afterwards placed as stars at the back of Taurus, where they formed a cluster resembling a bunch of grapes, whence they were sometimes called Bótrvus. According to another story, the Pleiades were virgin companions of Artemis, and, together with their mother, Pleione, were pursued by the hunter Orion in Boeotia; their prayer to be rescued from him was heard by the gods, and they were metamorphosed into doves (Πελειάδες) and placed among the stars. (Pind. Nem. ii. 11; Athen. p. 490; Diod. iii. 59.) The story of the lost Pleiad was that Merope, the seventh of the sisters, hid her light in mortification because she alone had married a mortal (Sisyphus) and become subject to mortality (Ov. Fast. iv. 170). The rising of the Pleiades in Italy was about the beginning of May, and their setting about the beginning of November. Hence the Pleiads were connected with the fertilising rains of spring, with the seed-time of autumn and also with autumn storms, and different parts of the myth are traceable to these different points of view. They are daughters of Atlas because the rain-clouds associated with them rise out of the western sea, and in the pursuit by Orion there is reference to the stormy time of autumn. It is likely that in the Homeric story of the doves who brought ambrosia from the western ocean there is allusion to the Pleiads and their aid to the summer harvests (Od. x. 59; Athen. l. c.). The story of the 'lost Pleiad' here appears in the mention of one dove being killed in the passage of the rocks, and their name—usually connected with Πλείων = 'many in number' (Hyg. Fab. 192)—is not improbably referred to Πέλειαι (doves). Their names are Electra, Maia, Taygete, Alcyone, Celaeno, Sterope, and Merope.

Pleiae (Πλειᾶι), a town in the SW. of Laconia between Asopus and Acriae (Liv. xxxv. 27).

Plemmyrium (Πλεμμύριον: Punta di Gigante), a promontory on the S. coast of Sicily, immediately S. of Syracuse. [SYRACUSAE.]

Plēiōnē (Πληϊόνη), a daughter of Oceanus, and mother of the Pleiades by Atlas. [ATLAS; PLEIADES.]

Pleumoxii, a small tribe in Gallia Belgica, subject to the Nervii (Caes. B. G. v. 39).

Pleuratus (Πλευράτος), king of Illyria, was the son of Scerdilaïdas. His name occurs as an ally of the Romans in the second Punic war, and in their subsequent wars in Greece. (Pol. xviii. 30, xxii. 4; Liv. xxvi. 24.)

Pleurōn (Πλευρών: Πλευρώνιος: Gyphtokastron), an ancient city in Aetolia, and one of the most important in the country, was situated at a little distance from the coast, NW. of the mouth of the Evenus, and on the S. slope of Mt. Aracynthus. It was originally inhabited by the Curetes. (Pl. ii. 639, xiii. 217, xiv. 116; Strab. pp. 450, 451.) This ancient city was abandoned by its inhabitants when Demetrius II., King of Macedon, laid waste the surrounding country, and a new city was built under the same name to the W. of the ancient one. (Strab. l. c.; Paus. vii. 11, 3.) The two cities are distinguished by geographers under the names of Old Pleuron and New Pleuron respectively. The ruins of the later town are remarkable.

Plinius. 1. C. Plinius Secundus, the author of the Historia Naturalis, distinguished as Pliny the Elder, was born A.D. 23, at Novum Comum (Como) in the N. of Italy. He came to Rome while still young, and being descended from a family of wealth and distinction, he had the means at his disposal for availing himself of the instruction of the best teachers to be found in the imperial city. At the age of about 23 he went to Germany, where he served under L. Pomponius Secundus, of whom he afterwards wrote a memoir, and was appointed to the command of a troop of cavalry (praefectus alae). (Tac. Ann. i. 69; Plin. Ep. iii. 5.) It appears from notices of his own that he travelled over most of the frontier of Germany, having visited the Cauci, the sources of the Danube, &c. (Plin. xii. 98, xvi. 2, xxii. 8). It was in the intervals snatched from his military duties that he composed his treatise De Jaculatione equestri. At the same time he began a history of the Germanic wars, which he afterwards completed in twenty books (Plin. Ep. iii. 5). He returned to Rome with Pomponius (52), and applied himself to the study of jurisprudence. The greater part of the reign of Nero he spent in retirement, chiefly, no doubt, at his native place. It may have been with a view to the education of his nephew that he composed the work entitled Studiosus, an extensive treatise in three books, occupying six volumes, in which he marked out the course that should be pursued in the training of a young orator, from the cradle to the completion of his education and his entrance into public life. During the reign of Nero he wrote a grammatical work in eight books, entitled Dubius Sermo (Plin. Ep. iii. 5); and towards the end of the reign of this emperor he was appointed procurator in Spain. He was here in 71, when his brother-in-law died, leaving his son, the younger Pliny, to the guardianship of his uncle, who, on account of his absence, was obliged to entrust the care of him to Virginius Rufus. Pliny returned to Rome in the reign of Vespasian, shortly before 73, when he adopted his nephew (Plin. Ep. v. 8). He had known Vespasian in the Germanic wars, and the emperor received him into the number of his most intimate friends. It was at this period of his life that he wrote a continuation of the History of Aufidius Bassus, in thirty-one books, carrying the narrative down to his own times. Of his manner of life at this period an interesting account has been preserved by his nephew (Epist. iii. 5). It was his practice to spend a portion of the night by candlelight. Before it was light he betook himself to the emperor Vespasian, and after executing such commissions as he might be charged with, returned home and devoted the time which he still had remaining to study. After a slender meal he would, in summer-time, lie in the sunshine while some one read to him, he himself making notes and extracts. He never read anything without making extracts in this way, for he used to say that there was no book so bad but that some good might be got out of it. He would then take a cold bath, and after a slight repast sleep a very little, and then pursue his studies till dinner-time. During this meal some book was read to and commented on by him. At table, as might be supposed, he spent but a short time. Such was his mode of life when in the midst of the bustle and confusion of the city. When in retirement in the country, the time spent in the bath was nearly the only interval not allotted to study, and that he reduced to the narrowest limits, for during all the process of scraping and rubbing he had some book read to him, or himself dictated. When on a journey he had a secretary by his side with a book and tablets. By this incessant application, persevered in throughout life, he amassed an enormous amount of materials, and at his death left to his nephew 160 volumina of notes (lectorum commentarii), written extremely small on both sides. With some reason might his nephew say that, when compared with Pliny, those who had spent their whole lives in literary pursuits seemed as if they had spent them in nothing else than sleep and idleness. From the materials which he had in this way collected he compiled his celebrated Historia Naturalis, which he published about 77. The details of Pliny's death are given in a letter of the younger Pliny to Tacitus (Ep. vi. 16). He perished in the celebrated eruption of Vesuvius which overwhelmed Herculaneum and Pompeii, in 79, being 56 years of age (Plin. Ep. iii. 5, 7). He was at the time stationed at Misenum in the command of the Roman fleet; and it was his anxiety to examine more closely the extraordinary phenomenon which led him to sail to Stabiae, where he landed and perished. The only work of Pliny which has come down to us is his Historia Naturalis. By Natural History the ancients understood astronomy, meteorology, geography, mineralogy, zoology, botany—in short, every thing that does not relate to the results of human skill or the products of human faculties. Pliny, however, has not kept within even these extensive limits. He has broken in upon the plan implied by the title of the work, by considerable digressions on human inventions and institutions (book vii.), and on the history of the fine arts (xxxv.—xxxvii.) Minor digressions on similar topics are also interspersed in various parts of the work, the arrangement of which in other respects exhibits but little scientific discrimination. It comprises, as Pliny says in the preface, 20,000 matters of importance, drawn from 100 selected authors, to whose observations he added many of his own. The authors used by him whose writings are still extant are Aristotle (chiefly through the medium of Pompeius Trogus and Nigidius Figulus), Theophrastus, Cato, Varro, Vitruvius, Columella, and Mela. On botany he seems to have relied a good deal on Sextius Niger, who was largely used also by Dioscorides. The whole work is divided into thirty-seven books, the first of which consists of a dedicatory epistle to Titus, followed by a table of contents of the other books. When it is remembered that this was not the result of the undistracted labour of a life, but written in the hours of leisure secured from active pursuits, and that, too, by the author of other extensive works, it is, to say the least, a wonderful monument of human industry. It may easily be supposed that Pliny, with his inordinate appetite for accumulating knowledge out of books, was not the man to produce a really scientific work. He was not even an original observer. The materials which he worked up into his huge encyclopaedic compilation were almost all derived at second-hand, though doubtless he has incorporated the results of his own observation in a larger number of instances than those in which he indicates such to be the case. Nor did he, as a compiler, show either judgment or discrimination in the selection of his materials, so that in his accounts the true and the false are found intermixed. His love of the marvellous, and his contempt for human nature, lead him constantly to introduce what is strange or wonderful, or adapted to illustrate the wickedness of man, and the unsatisfactory arrangements of Providence. His work is extremely valuable to us from the vast number of subjects treated of, with regard to many of which we have no other sources of information. But what he tells us is often unintelligible, from his retailing accounts of things with which he was himself personally unacquainted, and of which he in consequence gives no satisfactory idea to the reader. Though a writer on zoology, botany, and mineralogy, he has no pretensions to be called a naturalist. His compilations exhibit scarcely a trace of scientific arrangement; and frequently it can be shown that he does not give the true sense of the authors whom he quotes and translates, giving not uncommonly wrong Latin names to the objects spoken of by his Greek authorities.—Editions of Pliny's Natural History, with a commentary, are by Hardouin (Paris, 1685, 5 vols. 4to; 2nd edit. 1723, 3 vols. fol.); critical editions by Sillig, Gotha, 1853; by Jan, Leips. 1870; by Detleson, 1873. There is a French translation by De Grandsagne, with notes by Cuvier and others, Paris, 1833).—2. C. Plinius Caecilius Secundus, frequently called Pliny the Younger, was the son of C. Caecilius and of Plinia, the sister of the elder Pliny. He was born at Comum in A.D. 61; and having lost his father at an early age, he was adopted by his uncle, as has been mentioned above. His education was conducted under the care of his uncle, his mother, and his tutor, Virginius Rufus. From his youth he was devoted to letters. In his fourteenth year he wrote a Greek tragedy. He studied eloquence under Quintilian. His acquirements finally gained him the reputation of being one of the most learned men of the age; and his friend Tacitus, the historian, had the same honourable distinction. He was also an orator. In his nineteenth year he began to speak in the Forum, and he was frequently employed as an advocate before the court of the Centumviri and before the Roman senate. He filled numerous offices in succession. While a young man he served in Syria as tribune militum, and was there a hearer of the Stoic Euphrates and of Artemidorus. He was subsequently quaestor Caesaris, praetor in or about 93, and consul 100, in which year he wrote his Panegyricus, which is addressed to Trajan. In 103 he was appointed propraetor of the province Pontica, where he did not stay quite two years. Among his other functions he also discharged that of curator of the channel and the banks of the Tiber (C.I.L. v. 5262; cf. Plin. Ep. v. 14). He was twice married. His second wife was Calpurnia, the granddaughter of Calpurnius Fabatus, and an accomplished woman: she was considerably younger than her husband, who has recorded her kind attentions to him (Plin. Ep. iv. 19, vi. 4, viii. 10). He had no children by either wife born alive. The life of Pliny is chiefly known from his letters. So far as this evidence shows, he was a kind and benevolent man, fond of literary pursuits, and of building on and improving his estates. He was rich, and he spent liberally. He was a kind master to his slaves. His body was feeble, and his health not good. Nothing is known as to the time of his death. The extant works of Pliny are his Panegyricus and the ten books of his Epistolae. The Panegyricus is a somewhat bombastic eulogium on Trajan. Pliny collected his own letters, as appears from the first letter of the first book, which looks something like a preface to the whole collection. It is not an improbable conjecture that he may have written many of his letters with a view to publication, or that when he was writing some of them the idea of future publication was in his mind. However, they form a delightful collection, and make us acquainted with many interesting facts in the life of Pliny and that of his contemporaries. The letters from Pliny to Trajan and the emperor's replies form the whole of the tenth book: letters 15-121 belong to the period of his Bithynian governorship. The letter on the punishment of the Christians (x. 97) and the emperor's answer (x. 98) are of the greatest interest and value from their bearing on the history of the Church in the first century.—Edition of the Epistolae and Panegyricus by Keil, Leips. 1853 and 1870. Editions of the Epistolae are by Cortius and Longolius, Amsterdam, 1734, and by Gierig, Lips. 1800; by Döring, 1843; book iii. by Mayor, 1880; i. and ii. by Cowan, 1889.

Plinthinē (Πλινθίνη), a city of Lower Egypt, on the bay called from it Sinus Plinthinētes (Πλινθινήτης κόλπος), was the W.-most city of Egypt (according to its narrower limits) on the frontier of Marmarica. It stood a little N. of Taposiris (Abousir). (Strab. p. 799.)

Plistarchus (Πλεισταρχος), king of Sparta, was the son and successor of Leonidas, who was killed at Thermopylae, B.C. 480. He reigned from 480 to 458, but being a mere child at the time of his father's death, the regency was assumed by his cousin Pausanias. It appears that the latter continued to administer affairs in the name of the young king till his own death, about 467 (Hdt. ix. 19).

Plisthēnes (Πλεισθένης), son of Atreus, and husband of Aërope or Eriphyle, by whom he became the father of Agamemnon, Menelaus, and Anaxibia; but Homer makes the latter the children of Atreus. [See AGAMEMNON, ATREUS.]

Plistia (Prestia), a village in Samnium in the valley between M. Tifata and Taburnus (Liv. ix. 21).

Plistōanax or Plistōnax (Πλειστοάναξ, Πλειστονάξ), king of Sparta, was the eldest son of the Pausanias who conquered at Plataea, B.C. 479. On the death of Plistarchus, in 458, without issue, Plistōanax succeeded to the throne, being yet a minor (Thuc. i. 107). He reigned from 458 to 408. In 445 he invaded Attica; but the premature withdrawal of his army from the enemy's territory exposed him to the suspicion of having been bribed by Pericles. He was punished by a heavy fine, which he was unable to pay, and was therefore obliged to leave his country (Thuc. ii. 21, iii. 26; Plut. Per. 22). He remained nineteen years in exile, taking up his abode near the temple of Zeus on Mt. Lycaeus in Arcadia, and having half his house within the sacred precincts that he might enjoy the benefit of the sanctuary. During this period his son Pausanias, a minor, reigned in his stead. The Spartans at length recalled him in 426, in obedience to the injunctions of the Delphic oracle. But he was accused of having tampered with the Pythian priestess to induce her to interpose for him, and his alleged impiety in this matter was continually assigned by his enemies as the cause of all Sparta's misfortunes in the war; and therefore it was that he used all his influence to bring about peace with Athens in 421 (Thuc. v. 16). He was succeeded by his son Pausanias.

Plistus (Πλειστός: Xeropotamo), a small river in Phocis, which rises in Mt. Parnassus, flows past Delphi, where it receives the small stream Castalia, and falls into the Crissaeon gulf near Cirrha (Strab. p. 418; DELPHI).

Plotina, Pompeia, the wife of the emperor Trajan, and a woman of extraordinary merit and virtue. As she had no children, she persuaded her husband to adopt Hadrian. She died in the reign of Hadrian, who honoured her memory by mourning for her nine days, by building a temple in her honour, and by composing hymns in her praise. (Plin. Paneg. 38; Dio Cass. lxi. 10; HADRIANUS.)

Plotinópolis (Πλωτινόπολις), a town in Thrace on the road from Trajanopolis to Hadrianopolis, founded by Trajan, and named in honour of his wife, Plotina (Ptol. iii. 11, 13; Procop. Aed. iv. 11).

Plotinus (Πλωτίνος), the originator of the Neo-Platonic system, was born at Lycopolis in Egypt, about A.D. 203. The details of his life have been preserved by his disciple Porphyry in a biography which has come down to us. From him we learn that Plotinus began to study philosophy in his twenty-eighth year, and remained eleven years under the instruction of Ammonius Saccas. In his thirty-ninth year he joined the expedition of the emperor Gordian (242) against the Persians, in order to become acquainted with the philosophy of the Persians and Indians. After the death of Gordian he fled to Antioch, and from thence to Rome (244). Intent on philosophical study, he lived on the scantiest fare and restricted his hours of sleep to the briefest time possible. For the first ten years of his residence at Rome he gave only oral instruction to a few friends; but he was at length induced, in 254, to commit his instructions to writing. In this manner when, ten years later (264), Porphyry came to Rome and joined himself to Plotinus, twenty-one books of very various contents had been already composed by him. During the six years that Porphyry lived with Plotinus at Rome, the latter, at the instigation of Amelius and Porphyry, wrote twenty-three books on the subjects which had been discussed at their meetings, to which ten books were afterwards added. The correction of these books was committed by Plotinus himself to the care of Porphyry. On account of the weakness of his sight, Plotinus never read them through a second time, still less corrected them; intent simply upon the matter, he was alike careless of orthography, of the division of the syllables, and the clearness of his handwriting. The fifty-four books were divided by Porphyry into six Enneads, or sets of nine books. Plotinus was eloquent in his oral communications, and impressive in manner. He was regarded with admiration and respect by men of science such as the philosophers Amelius, Porphyry, the physicians Paulinus, Eustochius, and Zethus the Arab. He also enjoyed the favour of the emperor Gallienus and the empress Salonina, and almost obtained from them the rebuilding of two destroyed towns in Campania, with the view of their being governed according to the laws of Plato. He died at Puteoli in 262. The philosophical system of Plotinus is founded upon Plato's writings, with the addition of various tenets drawn from the Oriental philosophy and religion. He appears, however, to avoid studiously all reference to the Oriental origin of his tenets; he endeavours to find them all under the veil of the Greek mythology, and points out here the germ of his own philosophical and religious convictions. He was the real founder of the Neo-Platonic school. In his system of Pantheism vous or thought is an emanation from the divine essence, and in it resides all true Being, which is analogous to the Platonic Ideas: the soul of the world, which, as nature, unites with the corporeal world, proceeds from the vous, but the material world is an imperfect copy of a world incomprehensible by the senses. In man the soul is an emanation from the world-soul, which descends into the human body, and whose highest perfection is to be liberated from it and purified from all that is sensuous. Plotinus is not guilty of that commixture and falsification of the Oriental mythology and mysticism which is found in Iamblichus, Proclus, and others of the Neo-Platonic school.—Editions of the Enneads of Plotinus are by Kreuzer, Oxonii, 1835; by Kirchhoff, 1856; by Müller, 1878.

Plōtīus, whose full name was MARIUS PLOTIUS SACERDOS, a Latin grammarian, the author of De Metris Liber, who probably lived towards the end of the third century of the Christian era, in the reign of Diocletian. His work is published by Putschius in the Grammaticae Latinae Auctores, Hannov. 1605, and by Gaisford in the Scriptores Latini Rei Metricae, Oxon, 1837.

Plotus Gallus; Plot. Griphus; Plot. Tuca. [GALLUS; GRIPHUS; TUCCA.]

Plutarchus (Πλούταρχος). 1. Tyrant of Eretria in Euboea, whom the Athenians assisted in B.C. 354 against his rival, Callias of Chalcis. The Athenian army was commanded by Phocion, who defeated Callias at Tamynae; but Phocion having suspected Plutarchus of treachery, expelled him from Eretria. (Plut. Phoc. 12; Dem. de Pac. 5.)—2. The biographer and philosopher, was born at Chaeronea in Boeotia. The year of his birth is not known; but we learn from Plutarch himself that he was studying philosophy under Ammonius at the time when Nero was making his progress through Greece, in A.D. 66; from which we may assume that he was a youth or a young man at that time. He spent some time at Rome and in other parts of Italy, but he tells us that he did not learn the Latin language in Italy, because he was occupied with public commissions and in giving lectures on philosophy; and it was late in life before he busied himself with Roman literature. He was lecturing at Rome during the reign of Domitian, but the statement of Suidas that Plutarch was the preceptor of Trajan ought to be rejected. Plutarch spent the later years of his life at Chaeronea, where he discharged various magisterial offices, and held a priesthood. The time of his death is unknown, but probably took place early in Hadrian's reign.—The work which has immortalised Plutarch's name is his Parallel Lives (Βίοι Παράλληλοι) of forty-six Greeks and Romans. The forty-six Lives are arranged in pairs; each pair contains the Life of a Greek and a Roman, and is followed by a comparison of the two men: in a few pairs the comparison is omitted or lost. He seems to have considered each pair of Lives and the Parallel as making one book (Βιβλίον). The forty-six Lives are the following:—(1) Theseus and Romulus; (2) Lycurgus and Numa; (3) Solon and Valerius Publicola; (4) Themistocles and Camillus; (5) Pericles and Q. Fabius Maximus; (6) Alcibiades and Coriolanus; (7) Timoleon and Aemilius Paulus; (8) Pelopidas and Marcellus; (9) Aristides and Cato the Elder; (10) Philopoemen and Flamininus; (11) Pyrrhus and Marius; (12) Lysander and Sulla; (13) Cimon and Lucullus; (14) Nicias and Crassus; (15) Eumenes and Sertorius; (16) Agesilaus and Pompeius; (17) Alexander and Caesar; (18) Phocion and Cato the Younger; (19) Agis and Cleomenes, and Tiberius and Gaius Gracchus; (20) Demosthenes and Cicero; (21) Demetrius Poliorcetes and M. Antonius; (22) Dion and M. Junius Brutus. There are also the Lives of Artaxerxes Mnemon, Aratus, Galba, and Otho, which are placed in the editions after the forty-six Lives. Perhaps no work of antiquity has been so extensively read in modern times as Plutarch's Lives. The reason of their popularity is that Plutarch has rightly conceived the business of a biographer: his biography is true portraiture. Other biography is often a dull, tedious enumeration of facts in the order of time, with perhaps a summing up of character at the end. The reflections of Plutarch are neither impertinent nor trifling: his sound good sense is always there: his honest purpose is transparent: his love of humanity warms the whole. His work is and will remain the book of those who can nobly think and dare and do. (The best edition of the Lives is by Sintenis, revised issue, Lips. 1875. Among separate editions of particular Lives those of Themistocles and Demosthenes by Holden supply most useful commentaries.)—Plutarch's other writings, above sixty in number, are placed under the general title of Moralia or Ethical works, though some of them are of an historical and anecdotal character, such as the essay on the Malignity (κακοήθεια) of Herodotus, which neither requires nor merits refutation, and his Apophthegmata, many of which are of little value. Eleven of these essays are generally classed among Plutarch's historical works: among them also are his Roman Questions or Inquiries, his Greek Questions, and the Lives of the Ten Orators. But it is likely enough that several of the essays which are included in the Moralia of Plutarch are not by him. At any rate, some of them are not worth reading. The best of the essays included among the Moralia are of a different stamp. There is no philosophical system in these essays: pure speculation was not Plutarch's province. His best writings are practical, and their merits consist in the soundness of his views on the ordinary events of human life, and the benevolence of his temper.—Editions of the Moralia by Wyttenbach, 1795–1821; by Hercher, 1851. Editions of the complete works of Plutarch by Reiske, Lips. 1774–1782, and by Hutten, 1791–1805.—3. The younger, was a son of the last, and is supposed by some to have been the author of several of the works which pass usually for his father's, as e.g. the Apophthegmata (Tzet. Chil. i. 14, ad Lyc. 653).—4. An Athenian, son of Nestorius, presided with distinction over the Neo-Platonic school at Athens in the early part of the fifth century, and was surnamed the Great. He numbered among his disciples Syrianus of Alexandria, who succeeded him as head of the school, and Proclus of Lycia. He wrote commentaries, which are lost, on the Timaeus of Plato, and on Aristotle's treatise On the Soul. He died at an advanced age, about A.D. 430. (Suid. s. v. Πρόκλος; Marin. Vit. Procl. 12.)

Pluto. [HADES.]

Plūtus (Πλούτος), the personification of wealth, is described as a son of Iasion and Demeter. [IASION.] That Wealth should be the offspring of the Earth-goddess expresses the idea that riches come from the earth—primarily from agriculture, but also from metals. The same idea was the cause of the name Πλούτων being given to Hades, the god of the earth and of the underworld [see p. 375, b]. Zeus is said to have deprived Plutus of sight, that he might not bestow his favours on righteous men exclusively, but that he might distribute his gifts blindly and without any regard to merit (Ar. Plut. 90; Schol. ad Theocr. x. 19). At Thebes there was a statue of Tyche or Fortune, at Athens one of Irene or Peace, and at Thespieae one of Athene Ergane, and in each of these cases Plutus was represented as the child of those divinities, symbolically expressing the sources of wealth, from good fortune, peace and industry (Paus. i. 8, 2, ix. 16, 2, ix. 26, 8). A copy of the statue of Irene and Plutus is now at Munich. [CEPHISODOTUS.] He seems to have been also represented as a boy with a cornucopia.

Plūvius, i.e. the sender of rain (Tibull. i. 7, 26), a surname of Jupiter among the Romans (also Pluvialis and Imbricator), to whom sacrifices were offered during long protracted droughts. [JUPITER.]

Pnytagōras (Πυνταγόρας). 1. Eldest son of Evagoras, king of Salamis in Cyprus, was assassinated along with his father, B.C. 374. [EVAGORAS.]—2. King of Salamis in Cyprus, probably succeeded Nicocles, though we have no account of his accession, or his relation to the previous monarchs. He submitted to Alexander in 332, under whom he served with a fleet at the siege of Tyre. (Diod. xvi. 46; Arrian, An. ii. 20; Curt. iv. 3, 11; Athen. p. 167.)

Pōdālirius (Ποδάλειρος), son of Asclepius and Epione or Arsinoe, and brother of Machaon, along with whom he led the Thessalians of Tricca against Troy. He was, like his brother, skilled in the medical art. On his return from Troy he was cast by a storm on the coast of Syros in Caria, where he is said to have settled. He was worshipped as a hero on Mt. Dria. [MACHAON.]

Pōdarcēs (Ποδάρκης). 1. The original name of Priam. [PRIAMUS.]—2. Son of Iphiclus and grandson of Phylacus, was a younger brother of Protesilaus, and led the Thessalians of Phylace against Troy (Il. ii. 695).

Pōdargē. [HARPYIAE.]

Poeas (Ποῖας), son of Phylacus or Thaumacus, husband of Methone, and the father of Philoctetes, who is hence called Poeantiades, Poeantius heros, Poeantia proles, and Poeante satus. Poeas is mentioned among the Argonauts, and is said to have killed with an arrow Talaus in Crete. He set fire to the pile on which Heracles was burnt, and was rewarded by the hero with his arrows. [HERACLES; PHILOCTETES.]

Poemander (Ποίμανδρος), son of Chaeresilaus and Stratonice, was the husband of Tanagra, a daughter of Aeolus or Aesopus, by whom he became the father of Ehippus and Leucippus. He was the reputed founder of the town of Tanagra in Boeotia, hence called Poemandria. When Poemander had inadvertently killed his own son, he was purified by Elephenor. (Strab. p. 404.)

Poemanēnus (Ποιμανηνός; ethnic, the same: prob. Maniās), a fortified place in Mysia, S. of Cyzicus, with a celebrated temple of Asclepius (Steph. Byz. s. v.; Plin. v. 123).

Poetovio, sometimes written Petovio (Pet-tau), a town in Pannonia Superior (Western Pannonia) on the frontiers of Noricum, and on the Dravus (Drave), was at first a fortress, and then a Roman colony with the surname Ulpia, having been probably enlarged and made a colony by Trajan, and station of the legion XIII. Gemina (Tac. Hist. iii. 1; Amm. Marc. xiv. 37; C. I. L. iii. p. 439).

Pōgōn (Πώγων), the harbour of Troezen in Argolis (Strab. p. 373).

Pōla (Pola), an ancient town in Istria, situated on the W. coast, and near the promontory Polaticum, which was the most southerly point in the country. According to tradition Pola was founded by the Colchians who had been sent in pursuit of Medea (Strab. pp. 46, 209, 216; Mel. ii. 3, 13). It was subsequently a Roman colony, with the surname Pietas Julia, and became an important commercial town, being united by good roads with Aquileia and the principal towns of Illyria (Plin. iii. 129). It was here that Belisarius assembled his fleet to cross to Ravenna, A.D. 544 (Procop. B. G. iii. 10). Its importance in antiquity is attested by its magnificent ruins, of which the principal are those of an amphitheatre, of a triumphal arch (Porta aurea), erected to L. Sergius by his wife, Salvia Postuma, and of several temples.

Pōlēmōn (Πολέμων). 1. I., king of Pontus and the Bosporus, was the son of Zenon, the orator of Laodicea. As a reward for the services rendered by his father as well as himself he was appointed by Antony in B.C. 39 to the government of a part of Cilicia; and he subsequently obtained in exchange the kingdom of Pontus. (App. B. C. v. 75; Dio Cass. xlix. 25, 33; Strab. p. 578.) He accompanied Antony in his expedition against the Parthians in 36. After the battle of Actium he was able to make his peace with Octavian, who confirmed him in his kingdom (Dio Cass. liii. 25). About the year 16 he was entrusted by Agrippa with the charge of reducing the kingdom of Bosporus, of which he was made king after conquering the country (Dio Cass. liv. 24). His reign after this was long and prosperous; he extended his dominions as far as the river Tanais; but having engaged in an expedition against the barbarian tribe of the Aspurgians he was not only defeated by them, but taken prisoner, and put to death (Strab. pp. 493, 495, 556). By his second wife, Pythodoris, who succeeded him on the throne, he left two sons, Polemon II., and

Zenon, king of Armenia, and one daughter, who was married to Cotys king of Thrace.—2. II., son of the preceding and of Pythodoris, was raised to the sovereignty of Pontus and Bosphorus by Caligula in A.D. 39. Bosphorus was afterwards taken from him by Claudius, who assigned it to Mithridates, while he gave Polemon a portion of Cilicia in its stead, 41. In 62 Polemon was induced by Nero to abdicate the throne, and Pontus was reduced to the condition of a Roman province. (Dio Cass. lix. 12, lx. 8; Suet. Ner. 18.)—3. Brother of Attalus, a Macedonian officer in the army of Alexander the Great. He was suspected of complicity in the plot of which Philotas was accused, but he was acquitted or pardoned (Arr. An. iii. 27; Curt. vii. 2, 1). After the death of Alexander he became a partisan of Perdiccas, under whose brother, Alcetas, he served (Diod. xviii. 45, xix. 16) until 320, when he shared the defeats and captivity of Attalus. [ATTALUS, No. 2.]—4. Of Athens, an eminent Platonic philosopher, was the son of Philostratus, a man of wealth and political distinction. In his youth Polemon was extremely profligate; but one day, when he was about thirty, on his bursting into the school of Xenocrates, at the head of a band of revellers, his attention was so arrested by the discourse, which chanced to be upon temperance, that he tore off his garland and remained an attentive listener, and from that day he adopted an abstemious course of life (Hor. Sat. ii. 3, 253), and continued to frequent the school, of which, on the death of Xenocrates, he became the head, B.C. 315. He died in 273 at a great age. He esteemed the object of philosophy to be to exercise men in things and deeds, not in dialectic speculation. He placed the summum bonum in living according to the laws of nature. (Diog. Laërt. iv. 16; Athen. p. 44; Cic. de Fin. iv. 2, 6, 16, v. 1, 5.)—5. Of Athens by citizenship, but by birth either of Ilium, or Samos, or Sicily, a Stoic philosopher and an eminent geographer, surnamed Periegetes (ὁ περιηγητής), lived in the time of Ptolemy Epiphanes, at the beginning of the second century B.C. In philosophy he was a disciple of Panaetius. He made extensive journeys through Greece, to collect materials for his geographical works, in the course of which he paid particular attention to the inscriptions on votive offerings and on columns. As the collector of these inscriptions, he was one of the earlier contributors to the Greek Anthology. Athenaeus and other writers make very numerous quotations from his works. They were chiefly descriptions of different parts of Greece; some were on the paintings preserved in various places, and several are controversial, among which is one against Eratosthenes. (Athen. pp. 436, 442.)—6. Antonius, a celebrated sophist and rhetorician, flourished under Trajan, Hadrian, and the first Antoninus, and was in high favour with the two former emperors. He was born of a consular family, at Laodicea, but spent the greater part of his life at Smyrna. His most celebrated disciple was Aristides. Among his imitators in subsequent times was Gregory Nazianzen. His style of oratory was imposing rather than pleasing, and his character was haughty and reserved. During the latter part of his life he was so tortured by the gout that he resolved to put an end to his existence; he had himself shut up in the tomb of his ancestors at Laodicea, where he died of hunger, at the age of sixty-five. (Philostr. Sophist. p. 530; Suid. s.v.) The only extant work of Polemon is the funeral orations for Cynaegirus and Callimachus, the generals who fell at Marathon, which are supposed to be pronounced by their fathers. These orations are edited by Orelli, Lips. 1819.—7. The author of a short Greek work on Physiognomy, which is still extant. He must have lived in or before the third century after Christ, as he is mentioned by Origen, and from his style he cannot be supposed to have lived much earlier than this time. His work consists of two books: in the first, which contains twenty-three chapters, after proving the utility of physiognomy, he lays down the general principles of the science; in the second book, which consists of twenty-seven chapters, he goes on to apply the principles he had before laid down, and describes in a few words the characters of the courageous man, the timid, the impudent, the passionate, the talkative, &c.—Edited by Franz in his Scriptores Physiognomoniae Veteres, Altenburg, 1780.

Pōlēmoniūm (Πολεμώνιον: Πολεμώνιος, and Πολεμωνιεύς: Buleman), a city on the coast of Pontus in Asia Minor, built by king POLEMON (probably the second), on the site of the older city of Side, at the mouth of the river Sidenus (Poleman Chai), and at the bottom of a deep gulf, with a good harbour. It was the capital of the kingdom of Polemon, comprising the central part of Pontus, E. of the Iris, which was hence called Pontus Polemoniaca. (Plin. vi. 11; Ptol. v. 6, 4; Amm. Marc. xxii. 8.)

Pōliās. [ATHENE.]

Pōlichna (Πολίχνη, Dor. Πολίχνα: Πολιχνίτης), a town:—1. In the NW. of Messenia, W. of Andania (Paus. iv. 33, 6).—2. In the NE. of Laconia (Pol. iv. 36).—3. In Chios.—4. In Crete, whose territory bordered on that of Cydonia (Hdt. vii. 170; Thuc. ii. 85).—5. In Mysia, in the district Troas, on the left bank of the Aesepus near its source (Strab. p. 603).

Pōlieus (Πολιεύς), 'the protector of the city,' a surname of ZEUS.

Pōliorcētēs, Demetriūs. [DEMETRIUS.]

Pōlites (Πολίτης), son of Priam and Hecuba, and father of Priam the younger, was a valiant warrior and famed for his swiftness of foot. He was slain by Pyrrhus. (Il. xiii. 533, xv. 339; Verg. Aen. ii. 526, v. 564.)

Politorium, a town in the interior of Latium, destroyed by Ancus Martius (Liv. i. 33; Dionys. iii. 43; Plin. iii. 68).

Polla, Argentāria, the wife of the poet Lucan. [LUCANUS.]

Pollentia (Pollentinus). 1. (Polenza), a town of the Statielli in Liguria at the confluence of the Stura and the Tanarus, and subsequently a Roman municipium (Plin. iii. 49). It was celebrated for its wool. In its neighbourhood Stilicho gained a victory over the Goths under Alaric (Claudian, B. Get. 580–647; Oros. vii. 37).—2. A town in Picenum probably identical with Urbs Salvia (Plin. iii. 111).—3. (Pollenza), a Roman colony on the NE. point of the Balearis Major. [BALEARES.]

Pollentia, a deity worshipped by the Romans among the Indigetes, who was supposed to supply strength to the growing child (Liv. xxxix. 7; Plaut. Cas. iv. 4, 3; cf. INDIGETES).

Pollio, Annīus, was accused of treason (majestas) towards the end of the reign of Tiberius, but was not brought to trial. He was subsequently one of Nero's intimate friends, but was accused of taking part in Piso's conspiracy against that emperor in A.D. 63, and was banished. (Tac. Ann. xv. 56, 71.)

Pollio, C. Asīnīus, a distinguished orator, poet and historian of the Augustan age. He was born at Rome in B.C. 76, and became distinguished as an orator at an early age. At the age of twenty-two he prosecuted C. Cato (Tac. Dial. 34). On the breaking out of the Civil war he joined Caesar, and in 49 he accompanied Curio to Africa. After the defeat and death of Curio, he crossed over to Greece, and fought on Caesar's side at the battle of Pharsalia (48). He also accompanied Caesar in his campaigns against the Pompeian party in Africa (46) and Spain (45). He returned with Caesar to Rome, but was shortly afterwards sent back to Spain, with the command of the Further Province, in order to prosecute the war against Sex. Pompey. He was in his province at the time of Caesar's death (44). He took no part in the war between Antony and the senate; but when Antony was joined by Lepidus and Octavian in 43, Pollio espoused their cause, and persuaded L. Plancus in Gaul to follow his example. In the division of the provinces among the triumvirs, Antony received the Gauls. The administration of the Transpadane Gaul was committed to Pollio by Antony, and he had accordingly the difficult task of settling the veterans in the lands which had been assigned to them in this province. It was upon this occasion that he saved the property of the poet Virgil at Mantua from confiscation, whom he took under his protection from his love of literature. In 40 Pollio took an active part in effecting the reconciliation between Octavian and Antony at Brundisium. In the same year he was consul; and it was during his consulship that Virgil addressed to him his 4th Eclogue. In 39 Antony went to Greece, and sent Pollio with a part of his army against the Parthini, an Illyrian people. Pollio defeated the Parthini and took the Dalmatian town of Salonae; and in consequence of his success obtained the honour of a triumph on the 25th of October in this year. (Hor. Od. ii. 1, 16; C. I. L. i. p. 461.) He gave his son, Asinius Gallus, the agnomen of Saloninus after the town which he had taken. It was during his Illyrian campaign that Virgil addressed to him the 8th Eclogue. From this time Pollio withdrew altogether from political life, and devoted himself to the study of literature. He still continued, however, to exercise his oratorical powers, and maintained his reputation for eloquence by his speeches both in the senate and in the courts of justice. He died at his Tusculan villa, A.D. 4, in the 80th year of his age, preserving to the last the full enjoyment of his health and of all his faculties. (Hieron. ad Euseb. Chron. 2020; cf. Tac. Dial. 17; Sen. Contr. 4, 5.)—Pollio deserves a distinguished place in the history of Roman literature, not so much on account of his works, as of the encouragement which he gave to literature. He was not only a patron of Virgil, Horace (see Od. ii. 1), and other great poets and writers, but he has the honour of having been the first person to establish a public library at Rome, upon which he expended the money he had obtained in his Illyrian campaign (Plin. xxxv. 10). None of Pollio's own works have come down to us, but they possessed sufficient merit to lead his contemporaries and successors to class his name with those of Cicero, Virgil and Sallust, as an orator, a poet and an historian. Catullus (xii. 9) describes him in his youth as 'leporum disertus puer et facetiarum,' and Horace speaks of him in the full maturity of his powers (Od. ii. 1, 13) as 'Insigne maestis praesidium reis et consulenti, Pollio, curiae;'

and we have also the testimony of Quintilian, the two Senecas and Tacitus to the greatness of his oratorical powers (Quint. x. 1, 113; Sen. Contr. 4, 3; Sen. Ep. 100, 7; Tac. Dial. 21).—Pollio wrote the history of the Civil wars in seventeen books (Suid. s. v.). It began with the consulship of Metellus and Afranius, B.C. 60, in which year the first triumvirate was formed, and appears to have come down to the time when Augustus obtained the undisputed supremacy of the Roman world (Hor. Od. ii. 1, 24; Sen. Suas. vi. 15, 24; Suet. Jul. 30; Tac. Ann. iv. 34).—As a poet Pollio was best known for his tragedies, which are spoken of in high terms by Virgil and Horace, but which probably did not possess any great merit, as they are hardly mentioned by subsequent writers (Verg. Ecl. iii. 86, viii. 10; Hor. Od. ii. 1, 9; Sat. i. 10, 42). It has been asserted by some modern critics that Pollio was the author of the Bellum Africanum; but the theory is improbable and has no support.—Pollio also enjoyed great reputation as a critic, but he is chiefly known in this capacity for the severe judgment which he passed upon his great contemporaries. Thus he pointed out many mistakes in the speeches of Cicero (Quint. xii. 1, 22), censured the Commentaries of Caesar for their want of historical fidelity (Suet. Jul. 56), and found fault with Sallust for affectation in the use of antiquated words and expressions (Suet. Gramm. 10; Gell. x. 26). He also complained of a certain Patavinity in Livy, respecting which some remarks are made in the life of Livy [p. 495, a]. Pollio had a son, C. Asinius Gallus Saloninus. [See p. 355, b.] Asinius Gallus married Vipsania, the former wife of Tiberius, by whom he had several children: namely, (1) Asinius Saloninus; (2) Asinius Gallus; (3) Asinius Pollio, consul A.D. 23; (4) Asinius Agrippa, consul A.D. 25; (5) Asinius Celer.

Pollio, Vedius, a Roman eques and a friend of Augustus, was by birth a freedman, and has obtained a place in history on account of his riches and his cruelty. He was accustomed to feed his lampreys with human flesh, and whenever a slave displeased him, the unfortunate wretch was forthwith thrown into the pond as food for the fish. On one occasion Augustus was supping with him, when a slave had the misfortune to break a crystal goblet, and his master immediately ordered him to be thrown to the fishes. The slave fell at the feet of Augustus, praying for mercy; and when the emperor could not prevail upon Pollio to pardon him, he dismissed the slave of his own accord, and commanded all Pollio's crystal goblets to be broken and the fish-pond to be filled up. Pollio died B.C. 15, leaving a large part of his property to Augustus. It was this Pollio who built the celebrated villa of Pausilypum near Naples. (Dio Cass. liv. 23; Sen. de Ira, iii. 40; Plin. ix. 77; Tac. Ann. i. 10, xii. 60.)

Pollusca (Πολλούσκα), a city of Latium near Corioli taken and retaken in the Volscian wars, after which it disappears from history (Liv. ii. 33, 39; Dionys. vi. 91, viii. 36).

Pollux or Polydeuces. [DIOSCUR.]

Pollux, Jūlius (Ἰούλιος Πολυδεύκης). 1. Of Naucratis in Egypt, was a Greek sophist and grammarian. He studied rhetoric at Athens under the sophist Adrian, and afterwards opened a private school in this city, where he gave instruction in grammar and rhetoric. At a later time he was appointed by the emperor Commodus to the chair of rhetoric at Athens.

He died during the reign of Commodus at the age of fifty-eight. He seems to have been attacked by many of his contemporaries on account of the inferior character of his oratory, and especially by Lucian in his Ῥητόρων διδάσκαλος. Pollux was the author of several works, all of which have perished with the exception of the Onomasticon. This work is divided into ten books, each of which contains a short dedication to the Caesar Commodus: it was therefore published before A.D. 177, since Commodus became Augustus in that year. Each book forms a separate treatise by itself, containing the most important words relating to certain subjects, with short explanations of the meanings of the words. The alphabetical arrangement is not adopted, but the words are given according to the subjects treated of in each book.—Editions by Lederlin and Hemstershuis, Amsterdam, 1706; by Dindorf, Lips. 1824; and by Imm. Bekker, Berol. 1846.—2. A Byzantine writer, the author of a Chronicon which treats at some length of the creation of the world, and is therefore entitled Ἱστορία φυσική. It is a universal history, beginning with the creation of the world and coming down to the time of the writer.—Edited by Hardt, Munich, 1792.

Pōlus (Πῶλος). 1. A sophist and rhetorician, a native of Agrigentum. He was a disciple of Gorgias, and wrote a treatise on rhetoric, as well as other works mentioned by Suidas. He is introduced by Plato as an interlocutor in the Gorgias (cf. Plat. Phaedr. p. 267).—2. A celebrated tragic actor, the son of Charicles of Sunium, and a disciple of Archias of Thuri. It is related that at the age of 70, shortly before his death, he acted in eight tragedies on four successive days. (Plut. Dem. 28.)

Pōlŷaegōs (Πολύαιγος: Polybos or Antimelos), an uninhabited island in the Aegean sea, near Melos (Plin. iv. 70; Ptol. iii. 15, 28).

Pōlŷaēnos (Πολύαινος). 1. Of Lampsacus, a mathematician and a friend of Epicurus, adopted the philosophical system of his friend, and, although he had previously acquired great reputation as a mathematician, he now maintained with Epicurus the worthlessness of geometry (Cic. Ac. ii. 33, Fin. i. 6).—2. Of Sardis, a sophist, lived in the time of Julius Caesar. He is the author of four epigrams in the Greek Anthology. His full name was Julius Polyaenus.—3. The Macedonian, the author of the work on Stratagems in war (Στρατηγήματα), which is still extant, lived about the middle of the second century of the Christian era. Suidas calls him a rhetorician, and we learn from Polyaenus himself that he was accustomed to plead causes before the emperor. He dedicated his work to M. Aurelius and Verus, while they were engaged in the Parthian war, about A.D. 163, at which time, he says, he was too old to accompany them in their campaigns. This work is divided into eight books, of which the first six contain an account of the stratagems of the most celebrated Greek generals, the seventh of those of barbarous or foreign people, and the eighth of the Romans. Parts, however, of the sixth and seventh books are lost, so that of the 900 stratagems which Polyaenus described, only 833 have come down to us. The work is written in a clear and pleasing style, though somewhat tinged with the artificial rhetoric of the age. It contains a vast number of anecdotes respecting many of the most celebrated men in antiquity; but its value as a historical authority is very much diminished by the little judgment which the author evidently possessed, and by our ignorance of the sources from which he took his statements.—Editions by Casaubon, 1589; Coray, 1809; Wölflinn, 1860; Wescher, 1867.

Pōlybius (Πολύβιος). 1. The historian, the son of Lycortas, and a native of Megalopolis, in Arcadia, was born about B.C. 204. His father, Lycortas, was one of the most distinguished men of the Achaean League: and Polybius received the advantages of his father's instruction in political knowledge and the military art. He must also have reaped great benefit from his intercourse with Philopoemen, who was a friend of his father's, and on whose death, in 182, Polybius carried the urn in which his ashes were deposited. In the following year Polybius was appointed one of the ambassadors to Egypt, but he did not leave Greece, as the intention of sending an embassy was abandoned. From this time he probably began to take part in public affairs, and he appears to have soon obtained great influence among his countrymen, and as Hipparch attained a position which ranked second in the state. He advised neutrality in the war between Rome and Macedon. After the conquest of Macedonia, in 168, the Roman commissioners who were sent into the S. of Greece commanded, at the instigation of Callistrates, that 1000 Achaeans should be carried to Rome, to answer the charge of not having assisted the Romans against Perseus. This number included all the best and noblest part of the nation, and among them was Polybius. They arrived in Italy in B.C. 167, but, instead of being put upon their trial, they were distributed among the Etruscan towns. Polybius was more fortunate than the rest of his countrymen. He had probably become acquainted in Greece with Aemilius Paulus, or his sons Fabius and Scipio, and the two young men now obtained permission from the praetor for Polybius to reside at Rome in the house of their father, Paulus. Scipio was then eighteen years of age, and soon became warmly attached to Polybius. Scipio was accompanied by his friend in all his military expeditions, and received much advantage from his experience and knowledge. Polybius, on the other hand, besides finding a liberal patron and protector in Scipio, was able by his means to obtain access to public documents, and to accumulate materials for his great historical work. After remaining in Italy seventeen years, he returned to the Peloponnesus in 151, with the surviving Achaean exiles, who were at length allowed by the senate to revisit their native land. He did not, however, remain long in Greece. He joined Scipio in his campaign against Carthage, and was present at the destruction of that city in 146. Immediately afterwards he hurried to Greece, where the Achaeans were waging a mad and hopeless war against the Romans. He appears to have arrived in Greece soon after the capture of Corinth, and he exerted all his influence to alleviate the misfortunes of his countrymen, and to procure favourable terms for them. His grateful fellow-countrymen acknowledged the great services he had rendered them, and statues were erected to his honour at Megalopolis, Mantinea, Pallantium, Tegea, and other places. The base of the statue erected to him by the state of Elis was found at Olympia by the German explorers in 1877. Polybius seems now to have devoted himself to the composition of the great historical work for which he had long been collecting materials. At what period of his life he made the journeys into foreign countries for the purpose of visiting the places which he had to describe in his history, it is impossible to determine. He tells us (iii. 59) that he undertook long and dangerous journeys into Africa, Spain, Gaul, and even as far as the Atlantic, on account of the ignorance which prevailed respecting those parts. Some of these countries he visited while serving under Scipio, who afforded him every facility for the prosecution of his design. At a later period of his life he visited Egypt likewise. He probably accompanied Scipio to Spain in 184, and was present at the fall of Numantia, since Cicero states (ad Fam. v. 12) that Polybius wrote a history of the Numantine war. He died at the age of eighty-two, in consequence of a fall from his horse, about 122.—The History of Polybius consisted of forty books, of which the first five books, and extracts from the other thirty-five books, survive. Books i. and ii. form the Introduction, taking up the history where Timaeus left off, at 264 B.C. They contain some account of the first Punic war and the Achaean League. The remainder of the work fell into two parts. The first comprised a period of thirty-five years, beginning with the second Punic war and the Social war in Greece, and ending with the conquest of Perseus and the downfall of the Macedonian kingdom, in 168. This was in fact the main portion of his work, and its great object was to show how the Romans had in this brief period of fifty-three years conquered the greater part of the world, and to demonstrate that they were marked out as the rulers of nations, and fitted for a universal empire. With the fall of the Macedonian kingdom the supremacy of the Roman dominion was decided, and it was vain for the other nations of the world to resist. In this first part book iii. relates the second Punic war as far as Cannae; iv. and v. deal with the wars in Greece and Syria. Books vi.—xxx. described the progress of Roman conquest to the battle of Pydna, B.C. 168. The second part of the work, which formed a kind of supplement to the former part, comprised the period from the conquest of Perseus, in 168, to the fall of Corinth, in 146. The history of the conquest of Greece seems to have been completed in the thirty-ninth book; and the fortieth book probably contained a chronological summary of the whole work. The History of Polybius is one of the most valuable works that have come down to us from antiquity. His early training had taught him to appreciate military operations as well as political measures, and the leading part which he took in his own country enabled him to judge of the characters and motives of the great actors in history in a way which no mere scholar or rhetorician could do. To these qualifications were added the inestimable advantage of intimate friendship with the greatest men of Rome, and the opportunities of learning at first hand all that those who directed the civil and military actions of the republic could tell him. No one could have a better claim to write a history of the second and third Punic wars than the man who possessed all the information that the Scipios and Aemilii had stored up of the second, and was himself an eye-witness of the conclusion of the third. These materials he supplemented by every means in his power. Thus he not only collected with accuracy and care an account of the events that he intended to narrate, but he also studied the history of the Roman constitution, and made distant journeys to become acquainted with the geography of the countries that he had to describe in his work. A characteristic feature of his work, which distinguishes it from all other histories which have come down to us from antiquity, is its didactic nature. His object was to teach by the past a knowledge of the future, and to deduce from previous events lessons of practical wisdom. Hence he calls his work a Pragmateia (πραγματεία), and not a History (ιστορία). The value of history consisted, in his opinion, in the instruction that might be obtained from it. Thus the narrative of events became in his view of secondary importance; they formed only the text of the political and moral discourses which it was the province of the historian to deliver. Excellent, however, as these discourses are, they materially detract from the merits of the history as a work of art; their frequent occurrence interrupts the continuity of the narrative, and destroys, to a great extent, the interest of the reader in the scenes which are described. Moreover, he frequently inserts long episodes, which have little connexion with the main subject of his work, because they have a didactic tendency. Thus we find that one whole book (the sixth) was devoted to a history of the Roman constitution; and the thirty-fourth book seems to have been exclusively a treatise on geography. The style of Polybius bears the impress of his mind; and, as instruction and not amusement was the great object for which he wrote, he did not seek to please his readers by the choice of his phrases or the composition of his sentences. Hence the later Greek critics were severe in their condemnation of his style. Of the extracts which have been preserved from the lost books (vi.—xl.) some are of considerable length, such as the account of the Roman army, which belonged to the sixth book. There have been discovered at different times four distinct collections of extracts from the lost books. The first collection, discovered soon after the revival of learning in a MS. brought from Corfu, contained the greater part of the sixth book, and portions of the following eleven. In 1582 Ursinus published at Antwerp a second collection of Extracts, entitled Excerpta de Legationibus, which were made in the tenth century of the Christian era. In 1634, Valesius published a third collection of extracts from Polybius, also taken from the Excerpta of Constantinus, entitled Excerpta de Virtutibus et Vitiis. The fourth collection of extracts was published in 1827 by Angelo Mai, who discovered in the Vatican library at Rome the section of the Excerpta of Constantinus Porphyrogenitus entitled Excerpta de Sententiis.—Editions of Polybius, with a commentary, by Schweighauser, Lips. 1789–1795; of the text alone, by Bekker (Berol. 1844, 2 vols. 8vo), who has added the Vatican fragments; Dindorf, 1866; Hultsch, 1871. Edition of portion of the history, with a commentary, by Strachan Davidson, 1890. Livy did not use Polybius till he came to the second Punic war, but from that time he followed him very closely. Cicero likewise chiefly followed Polybius in the account which he gives of the Roman constitution in his De Republica. The History of Polybius was continued by Posidonius and Strabo. [POSIDONIUS; STRABO.] Besides the great historical work of which we have been speaking, Polybius wrote (2) The Life of Philopoemen, in three books; (3) a treatise on Tactics; (4) A History of the Numantine War.—2. A freedman of the emperor Augustus, read in the senate the will of the emperor after his decease (Suet. Aug. 101).—3. A favourite freedman of the emperor Claudius. He was the companion of the studies of Claudius, and on the death of his brother, Seneca addressed to him a Consolatio, in which he bestows the highest praises upon his literary attainments. Polybius was put to death through the intrigues of Messalina, although he had been one of her paramours (Suet. Claud. 28).

Pōlybōtes (Πολυβώτης), one of the giants who fought against the gods, was pursued by Poseidon across the sea as far as the island of Cos. There Poseidon tore away a part of the island, which was afterwards called Nisyria, and throwing it upon the giant buried him under it. [GIGANTES.]

Pōlybōtus (Πολύβοτος: Bulawadin, Ru.), a city of Great Phrygia, E. of Synnada (Procop. Hist. Arc. 18; Hierocl. p. 677).

Pōlybus (Πόλυβος). 1. King of Corinth, by whom Oedipus was brought up. [OEDIPUS.] He was the husband of Periboea or Merope. Pausanias makes him king of Sicyon, and describes him as a son of Hermes and Chthonophyle, and as the father of Lysianassa, whom he gave in marriage to Talaus, king of the Argives. (Soph. O. T. 770; Apollod. iii. 5, 7; Paus. ii. 6, 3.)—2. A Greek physician, was one of the pupils of Hippocrates, who was also his son-in-law, and lived in the island of Cos, in the fourth century B.C. With his brothers-in-law, Thessalus and Dracon, Polybus was one of the founders of the ancient medical sect of the Dogmatici. He was sent abroad by Hippocrates, with his fellow-pupils, during the time of the plague, to assist different cities with his medical skill, and he afterwards remained in his native country. He has been supposed, both by ancient and modern critics, to be the author of several treatises in the Hippocratic collection.

Pōlycarpus (Πολύκαρπος), Bishop of Smyrna [Dict. of Christian Biography].

Pōlyclēs (Πολυκλῆς), the name of two artists. The elder Polycles was probably an Athenian, and flourished about B.C. 370 (Plin. xxxiv. 50). The younger Polycles is placed by Pliny in 155. He was an Athenian sculptor, and with his two sons, Timocles and Timarchides (also sculptors), settled at Rome. Among his works were a statue of Agesarchus the wrestler at Olympia; a statue of Juno, which was placed in the portico of Octavia at Rome, when that portico was erected by Metellus Macedonicus, and (probably) a Hermaphrodite which Pliny calls famous. (Paus. vi. 12, 8; Plin. xxxiv. 52, 80, xxxvi. 35.) The Hermaphrodite is by some attributed to the elder Polycles, but on the whole it is more likely that it belongs to the later period. The two sons of the younger Polycles were authors of the statue of Asclepius at Elatea (Paus. x. 34, 6).

Pōlyclitus (Πολύκλειτος). 1. The Elder, of Argos, probably by citizenship, and of Sicyon, probably by birth, was one of the most celebrated sculptors of the ancient world. He was the pupil of the great Argive sculptor Ageladas, under whom he had Phidias and Myron for his fellow-disciples. He was somewhat younger than Phidias, and about the same age as Myron. He flourished about B.C. 452–412. Of his personal history we know nothing further. As an artist, he stood at the head of the schools of Argos and Sicyon, and approached more nearly than any other to an equality with Phidias, the great head of the Athenian school. The essential difference between these artists was that Phidias was unsurpassed in making the images of the gods, Polyclitus in those of men. One of the most celebrated works of Polyclitus was his Doryphorus or Spear-bearer, a youthful figure, but with the full proportions of a man. This was the statue which became known by the name of The Canon, because in it the artist had embodied a perfect representation of the ideal of the human figure (Plin. xxxiv. 55). Another of his great works was his ivory and gold statue of Hera in her temple between Argos and Mycenae. The goddess was seated on a throne, her head crowned with a garland, on which were worked the Graces and the Hours, the one hand holding the symbolical pomegranate, and the other a sceptre, surmounted by a cuckoo, a bird sacred to Hera (Paus. ii. 17, 4). This statue was accepted as fixing the type of Hera, just as the great statues of Phidias at Olympia and Athens fixed the types of Zeus and Athene. [See the head of the Farnese Hera on p. 393.] It is noticed of Polyclitus that he particularly adopted the attitude of resting on one foot with the other more lightly pressed (Plin. xxxiv. 56), so as to give an easy and graceful pose. In grace of form he excelled, so that Quintilian notices that he gave ideal beauty to the human form, but did not express the full grandeur and majesty of the divine (xii. 10, 7). In this, no doubt, he contrasts him with Phidias. His finish was perfect, a point in which Cicero regarded him as unsurpassed (Brut. 18, 70). With the exception of the Hera, the statues of Polyclitus were in bronze. It is possible to Doryphorus, after Polyclitus. (Naples.)

Marble copy of the Amazon of Polyclitus. Berlin Museum.)

With the exception of the Hera, the statues of Polyclitus were in bronze. It is possible to judge of the form of some of them from marble copies. Of these the most generally recognised are the Doryphorus, the Diadumenus and the Amazon. In the department of toreutic, the fame of Polyclitus no doubt rested chiefly on the golden ornaments of his statue of Hera; but he also made small bronzes (sigilla), and drinking-vessels (phiale).—2. The Younger, also a sculptor of Argos, of whom very little is known, because his fame was eclipsed by that of his more celebrated namesake. His work may be dated about 400–365 B.C. He was pupil, and younger brother or nephew, of Naucydes. His statues were mainly of athletes, set up at Olympia, where the inscribed bases of two have recently been discovered. (Paus. ii. 22, 8, vi. 6, 1, vi. 7, 3.) Pausanias mentions one statue of a different character, that of a Zeus Philios at Megalopolis (viii. 31, 2). He was distinguished as an architect, for there is little doubt that the building of the theatre and tholus in the precincts of the temple of Asclepius at Epidaurus (Paus. ii. 27, 5) should be ascribed to him and not to the elder Polyclitus.—3. Of Larissa, a Greek historian, and one of the numerous writers of the history of Alexander the Great.—4. A favourite freedman of Nero, who sent him into Britain to inspect the state of the island.

Pōlycrātes (Πολυκράτης). 1. Of Samos, one of the most ambitious of the Greek tyrants. With the assistance of his brothers, Pantagnotus and Syloson, he made himself master of the island towards the latter end of the reign of Cyrus. At first he shared the supreme power with his brothers; but he shortly afterwards put Pantagnotus to death, and banished Syloson. Having thus become sole despot, he raised a powerful fleet, which dominated the whole of the eastern Aegæan, and by his piratical enterprises accumulated vast riches. He had formed an alliance with Amasis, king of Egypt, who, however, finally renounced it through alarm at the amazing good fortune of Polycrates, which never met with any check or disaster, and which therefore was sure, sooner or later, to incur the envy of the gods. Such, at least, is the account of Herodotus, who has narrated the story of the rupture between Amasis and Polycrates in his most dramatic manner. In a letter which Amasis wrote to Polycrates, the Egyptian monarch advised him to throw away one of his most valuable possessions, in order that he might thus inflict some injury upon himself. In accordance with this advice Polycrates threw into the sea a seal-ring of extraordinary beauty, but in a few days it was found in the belly of a fish, which had been presented to him by a fisherman. In the reign of Cambyses, the Spartans and Corinthians sent a powerful force to Samos, in order to depose the tyrant, but their expedition failed, and after besieging the city forty days, they left the island. The power of Polycrates now became greater than ever. The great works which Herodotus saw at Samos were probably executed by him. He lived in great pomp and luxury, and, like others of the Greek tyrants, was a patron of literature and the arts. The most eminent artists and poets found a ready welcome at his court, and his friendship for Anacreon is particularly celebrated. But in the midst of all his prosperity he fell by the most ignominious fate. Oroetes, the satrap of Sardis, had formed a deadly hatred against Polycrates. By false pretences, the satrap contrived to allure him to the mainland, where he was arrested soon after his arrival, and crucified, 522. (Hdt. iii. 39, 54, 120; Strab. pp. 637, 638; Paus. viii. 14, 8; Cic. Fin. v. 30, 92).—2. An Athenian rhetorician and sophist of some repute, a contemporary of Socrates and Isocrates, taught first at Athens and afterwards at Cyprus. He was the teacher of Zoilus. He wrote: (1) an accusation of Socrates, which was a declamation on the subject composed some years after the death of the philosopher (Diog. Laërt. ii. 38). (2) A defence of Busiris. The oration of Isocrates entitled Busiris is addressed to Polycrates, and points out the faults which the latter had committed in his oration on this subject. (3) An obscene poem, which he published under the name of the poetess Philaenis, for the purpose of injuring her reputation (Athen. p. 335).

Pōlydāmas (Πολυδάμας). 1. Son of Panthous and Phrontis, was a Trojan hero, a friend of Hector, and brother of Euphorbus (Il. xvi. 534, xviii. 249, xxii. 100).—2. Of Scotussa in Thessaly, son of Nicias, conquered in the Pancratium at the Olympic games, in Ol. 93, B.C. 408. His size was immense, and the most marvellous stories are related of his strength: how he killed without arms a huge and fierce lion on Mt. Olympus; how he stopped a chariot at full gallop, &c. His reputation led the Persian king Darius Ochus to invite him to his court, where he performed similar feats (Paus. vi. 5, 4, vii. 27, 6).—3. Of Pharsalus in Thessaly, was entrusted by his fellow-citizens, about B.C. 375, with the supreme government of their native town. He afterwards entered into a treaty with Jason of Pherae. On the murder of Jason, in 370, his brother Polyphron put to death Polydamas. (Xen. Hell. vi. 1, 2.)

Pōlydectēs (Πολυδέκτης). 1. King of the island of Seriphos, was son of Magnes, and brother of Dictys. He received kindly Danaë and Perseus, when the chest in which they had been exposed by Acrisius floated to the island of Seriphos. (Pind. Pyth. xii. 10; Apollod. i. 9, 6; Paus. i. 22, 6.) His story is related under PERSEUS.—2. King of Sparta, was the eldest son of Eunomus, the brother of Lycurgus the lawgiver, and the father of Charilaüs, who succeeded him. Herodotus, contrary to the other authorities, makes Polydectes the father of Eunomus. (Hdt. viii. 131; Paus. iii. 7, 2; Plut. Lyc. 2.)

Pōlydeucēs (Πολυδεύκης), one of the Dioscuri, and the twin brother of Castor, called by the Romans Pollux. [DIOSCURI.]

Pōlydōrus (Πολύδωρος). 1. King of Thebes, son of Cadmus and Harmonia, husband of Nyctēis, and father of LABDACUS.—2. The youngest among the sons of Priam and Laotoë, was slain by Achilles (Il. xx. 407, xxii. 46). This is the Homeric account; but later traditions make him a son of Priam and Hecuba, and give a different account of his death. One tradition relates that when Ilium was on the point of falling into the hands of the Greeks, Priam entrusted Polydorus and a large sum of money to Polymestor or Polymnestor, king of the Thracian Chersonesus. After the destruction of Troy, Polymestor killed Polydorus for the purpose of getting possession of his treasures, and cast his body into the sea. His body was afterwards washed up on the coast, where it was found and recognised by his mother Hecuba, who, together with other Trojan captives, took vengeance upon Polymestor by putting out his eyes and killing his two children, (Eur. Hecuba; Verg. Aen. iii. 49; Ov. Met.

xiii. 432.) Another tradition stated that Polydorus was entrusted to his sister Ilione, who was married to Polymestor. She brought him up as her own son, while she made everyone else believe that her own son, Deiphilus or Deipylus, was Polydorus. The Greeks, anxious to destroy the race of Priam, promised to Polymestor Electra for his wife, and a large amount of gold, if he would kill Polydorus. Polymestor was prevailed upon, and he accordingly slew his own son. Polydorus, thereupon, persuaded his sister Ilione to kill Polymestor. Pacuvius wrote a tragedy Iliona. (Cic. Ac. ii. 27, Tusc. i. 44; Hor. Sat. iii. 8, 61.)—3. King of Sparta, was the son of Alcamenes and the father of Eurycrates, who succeeded him. He assisted in bringing the first Messenian war to a conclusion, B.C. 724. He was murdered by Polemarchus, a Spartan of high family, but his name was precious among his people on account of his justice and kindness. Crotona and the Epizephyrian Locri were founded in his reign.—4. Brother of Jason of Pherae, obtained the supreme power along with his brother Polyphron, on the death of Jason in B.C. 370, but was shortly afterwards assassinated by Polyphron. [JASON.]—5. A sculptor of Rhodes, one of the associates of Agesander in the execution of the celebrated group of the Laocoon. [AGESANDER.]

Polyeuctus (Πολύευκτος), an Athenian orator, of the demus Sphettus, was a political friend of Demosthenes, with whom he worked in resisting the Macedonian party (Dem. Phil. iii. p. 129; Arist. Rhet. iii. 10, 7; Plut. Dem. 10).

Polygnōtus (Πολύγνωτος), one of the most celebrated Greek painters, was a native of the island of Thasos, and was honoured with the citizenship of Athens, on which account he is sometimes called an Athenian. His father, Aglaophon, was his instructor in his art, and he had a brother, named Aristophon, who was also a painter. Polygnōtus lived on intimate terms with Cimon and his sister Elpinice, and he probably came to Athens in B.C. 463, after the subjugation of Thasos by Cimon. He appears to have been at that time an artist of some reputation, and he continued to exercise his art almost down to the beginning of the Peloponnesian war (431). He was called by some the inventor of painting (Theophrast. ap. Plin. vii. 205), as being the first who raised painting to the position of an art above that of the handicraftsman. His work was between the years 475 and 430 B.C. The famous paintings in the Lesche, or hall of the Cnidians at Delphi, representing the Fall of Troy and the scenes of the underworld (Paus. x. 25-31), were probably executed not later than 470, since they are mentioned by Simonides, who died in 467. The period of his greatest artistic activity at Athens seems to have been that which elapsed from his removal to Athens (463) to the death of Cimon (449), who employed him in the pictorial decoration of the public buildings with which he began to adorn the city, such as the temple of Theseus, the Anacæum, and the Poecile. He appears to have returned to Athens about 435, where he executed a series of paintings in the Propylæa of the Acropolis. The Propylæa were commenced in 437, and completed in 432. The subjects of the pictures of Polygnōtus were almost invariably taken from Homer and the other poets of the epic circle. They were historical pictures, and it was remarked that Polygnōtus excelled as a painter of character (Arist. Poët. 6; Plin.

xxxv. 58). His pictures were without background, as tinted outlines on the white wall without shading, but the beauty of the drawing and the admirable conception of character in his figures won for them admiration undiminished in the age of Pausanias.

Pōlymedium (Πολυμήδιον), a town in Mysia, between Assus and the Prom. Lectum (Strab. pp. 606, 616; Plin. v. 123).

Pōlyhymnia. [POLYMNIA.]

Pōlyidus (Πολύιδος). 1. Son of Coeranus, grandson of Abas and great-grandson of Melampus. He was, like his ancestor Melampus, a celebrated soothsayer at Corinth, and is described as the father of Euchenor, Astycratia, and Manto (Il. xiii. 668). When Alcathous had murdered his own son, Callipolis, at Megara, he was purified by Polyidus, who erected at Megara a sanctuary to Dionysus, and a statue of the god.—2. A dithyrambic poet of the most flourishing period of the later Athenian dithyramb, and also skilful as a painter, was contemporary with Philoxenus, Timotheus, and Telestes, about B.C. 400.

Pōlymestor or Polymnestor. [POLYDORUS.]

Pōlymnestus, or Polymnastus (Πολύμνηστος), the son of Meles of Colophon, was an epic, elegiac and lyric poet, and a musician. He flourished B.C. 675-644. He belongs to the school of Dorian music, which flourished at this time at Sparta, where he carried on the improvements of Thaletas. The Attic comedians attacked his poems for their erotic character (Aristoph. Eq. 1287). As an elegiac poet, he may be regarded as the predecessor of his fellow-countryman, Mimnermus.

Pōlymnia or Polyhymnia. [MUSAE.]

Pōlynicēs (Πολυνείκης), son of Oedipus and Jocasta, and brother of Eteocles and Antigone. His story is given under ETEOCLES and ADRASTUS.

Pōlyphēmus (Πολύφημος). 1. Son of Poseidon and the nymph Thoosa, was one of the Cyclopes in Sicily. [CYCLOPES.] He is represented as a gigantic monster, having only one eye, in the centre of his forehead, caring nought for the gods, and devouring human flesh. He dwelt in a cave near Mt. Aetna, and fed his flocks upon the mountain. He fell in love with the nymph Galatea (Theocr. Id. xi.; Ov. Met. xiii. 780), but as she rejected him for Acis, he destroyed the latter by crushing him under a huge rock. [ACIS.] In the Homeric story, when Odysseus was driven upon Sicily, Polyphēmus devoured some of his companions, and Odysseus would have shared the same fate had he not put out the eye of the monster while he was asleep. [ODYSSEUS.]—2. Son of Elatus or Poseidon and Hippea, was one of the Lapithæ at Larissa in Thessaly. He was married to Laonome, a sister of Heracles. He was also one of the Argonauts, but being left behind by them in Mysia, he founded Cios, and fell in battle against the Chalybes. (Il. i. 264; Ap. Rh. i. 1241; Apollod. i. 9, 16.)

Pōlyphontes (Πολυφόντης), one of the descendants of Heracles who slew Cresphontes, king of Messene, married his wife Merope and took possession of his kingdom. He was slain by Aepyrtus, son of Cresphontes. (Pol. iv. 22; Apollod. ii. 8, 4.)

Pōlyphron (Πολύφρων), brother of Jason of Pherae, succeeded to the supreme power with his brother Polydorus on the death of Jason in B.C. 370. Shortly afterwards he murdered Polydorus. He exercised his power with great cruelty, and was murdered in his turn, 369, by his nephew Alexander, who proved a still greater tyrant. [JASON; ALEXANDER.]

Pōlypoetes (Πολυποίτης), son of Pirithous and Hippodamia, was one of the Lapithae, and joined the Greeks in the Trojan war (Strab. pp. 439, 441).

Pōlyrrhēnia or -ium (Πολυρρηνία: Πολυρρηνίος), a town in Crete, whose territory embraced the whole western corner of the island. It possessed a sanctuary of Dictynna, and is said to have been colonised by Achaeans and Lacedaemonians. (Strab. p. 479; Pol. iv. 53; Plin. iv. 59.)

Pōlyspērchon (Πολυσπέρχων), a Macedonian, and an officer of Alexander the Great, who distinguished himself at Issus and Gaugamela and accompanied Alexander in his Indian campaigns (Arrian, iii. 11, v. 11, vi. 5). In B.C. 323 he was appointed by Alexander second in command of the army of invalids and veterans which Craterus had to conduct home to Macedonia. He afterwards served under Antipater in Europe, and so great was the confidence which the latter reposed in him, that Antipater on his deathbed (319) appointed Polysperchon to succeed him as regent and guardian of the king, while he assigned to his own son Cassander the subordinate station of Chiliarch (Diod. xviii. 48). Polysperchon soon became involved in war with Cassander, who was dissatisfied with this arrangement. It was in the course of this war that Polysperchon surrendered Phocion to the Athenians, in the hope of securing the adherence of Athens. [PHOCION.] Although Polysperchon was supported by Olympias, and possessed great influence with the Macedonian soldiers, he proved no match for Cassander, and was obliged to yield to him possession of Macedonia about 316 (Diod. xviii. 57, 69, xix. 57, 74). For the next few years Polysperchon is rarely mentioned, but in 310, he again assumed an important part by reviving the long-forgotten pretensions of Heracles, the son of Alexander and Barsine, to the throne of Macedonia. Cassander marched against him, but, distrusting the fidelity of his own troops, he entered into secret negotiations with Polysperchon, and persuaded the latter, by promises and flatteries, to murder Heracles. (Diod. xx. 28; Just. xv. 2.) From this time he appears to have served under Cassander; but the period of his death is not mentioned.

Pōlytimētus (Πολυτίμητος: Zeräfschan), a considerable river of Sogdiana, which vanished underground near Maracanda (Samarkand), or was lost in the sands of the steppes (Strab. p. 518).

Pōlyxēna (Πολυξένη), daughter of Priam and Hecuba, was beloved by Achilles. When the Greeks, on their voyage home, were still lingering on the coast of Thrace, the shade of Achilles appeared to them, demanding that Polyxena should be sacrificed to him. Neoptolemus accordingly sacrificed her on the tomb of his father. It was related that Achilles had promised Priam to bring about a peace with the Greeks, if the king would give him his daughter Polyxena in marriage; and that when Achilles had gone to the temple of the Thymbraean Apollo, for the purpose of negotiating the marriage, he was treacherously killed by Paris. (Eur. Hec. 40; Ov. Met. xiii. 448; Hyg. Fab. 110.) Another tradition stated that Achilles and Polyxena fell in love with each other when Hector's body was delivered up to Priam; and that Polyxena fled to the Greeks after the death of Achilles, and killed herself on the tomb of her beloved with a sword. (Philostr. Her. 19, 11.)

Pōlyxenidas (Πολυξενίδας), a Rhodian in the service of Antiochus III., king of Syria, whose fleet he commanded in 192 and 190 B.C. He was defeated by C. Livius off Corycus, and by Aemilius Regillus at Myonnesus. (Liv. xxxvi. 43, xxxvii. 28; App. Syr. 21-27.)

Pōlyxo (Πολυξώ). 1. The nurse of queen Hypsipyle in Lemnos, was celebrated as a prophetess (Ap. Rh. i. 668; Hyg. Fab. 15).—2. An Argive woman, married to Tlepolemus, son of Heracles (Paus. iii. 19, 10), followed her husband to Rhodes, where, according to some traditions, she is said to have put to death the celebrated Helen. [HELENA.]

Pōlyzēlus (Πολύζηλος). 1. Brother of Hieron, the tyrant of Syracuse. [HIERON].—2. Of Rhodes, a historian, of uncertain date, wrote a history of his native country (Athen. p. 361; Plut. Sol. 15).—3. An Athenian comic poet, belonging to the last period of the Old Comedy and the beginning of the Middle. (Meineke, Fr. Com. Graec.)

Pōmōna, the Italian divinity of the fruit of trees, hence called Pomorum Patrona. She is represented by the poets as beloved by several of the rustic divinities, such as Silvanus, Picus and Vertumnus (Ov. Met. xiv. 623). For the myth of her union with the last, see VERTUMNUS. Her worship must originally have been of considerable importance, since a special priest, under the name of flamen Pomonalis, was appointed to attend to her service. (Varro, L. L. vii. 45; Fest. p. 154.) There was a sanctuary for her worship (Pomonal) between Ardea and Ostia (Fest. p. 250).

Pompēia. 1. Daughter of Q. Pompeius Rufus, son of the consul of B.C. 88, and of Cornelia, the daughter of the dictator Sulla. She married C. Caesar, subsequently the dictator, in 67, but was divorced by him in 61, because she was suspected of intriguing with Clodius, who stealthily introduced himself into her husband's house while she was celebrating the mysteries of the Bona Dea. [CLODIUS].—2. Sister of Cn. Pompey, the triumvir, married C. MEMMIUS, who was killed in the war against Sertorius, in 75.—3. Daughter of the triumvir by his third wife Mucia. She married Faustus Sulla, the son of the dictator, who perished in the African war, 46. She afterwards married L. Cornelius Cinna. As her brother Sextus survived her, she must have died before 35.—4. Daughter of Sex. Pompey, the son of the triumvir and of Scribonia. At the peace of Misenum in 39 she was betrothed to M. Marcellus, the son of Octavia, the sister of Octavian, but was never married to him. She accompanied her father in his flight to Asia, 36.—5. Paulina. [PAULINA.]

Pompeianus, Tib. Claudius, son of a Roman knight originally from Antioch, rose to the highest dignities under M. Aurelius. He was consul in 173 A.D. and held a command also in the war against the Marcomanni. Aurelius gave him his daughter Lucilla in marriage. He lived to the reign of Severus. (Dio Cass. lxxi. 3, lxxiii. 3; Vit. M. Anton. 20; Pert. 2.)

Pompēii (Πομπήιοι, Πομπαία, Πομπηία: Pompeianus), a city of Campania, was situated on the coast, at the mouth of the river Sarnus, and at the foot of Mt. Vesuvius; but in consequence of the physical changes which the surrounding country has undergone, the ruins of Pompeii are found at present about two miles from the sea. Pompeii was first in the hands of the Oscans, and afterwards of the Tyrrhenians. (Strab. p. 247; Plin. iii. 62.) It is mentioned as a port in B.C. 310 (Liv. ix. 38), and as taking part in the Social war, during which it was captured by Sulla (App. B.C. i. 39, 50; Vell. Pat. ii. 16). Afterwards it became a Roman municipium and received a colony in the reign of Augustus. It was populous (having apparently nearly 80,000 inhabitants) and flourishing (Tac. Ann. xv. 22; Sen. Q. N. vi. 1), and a favourite resort. Among others Cicero had a villa (Pompeianum) there (Cic. Ac. ii. 3, ad Att. i. 20, ad Fam. vii. 3, xii. 20); but Pompeii never rose above the rank of a second-rate provincial town, and its great importance is due to the manner in which the circumstances of its destruction ensured the preservation of its remains till their excavation in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Pompeii was partly destroyed by an earthquake in A.D. 63, but was overwhelmed in 79, along with Herculaneum and Stabiae, by the great eruption of Mt. Vesuvius. (Dio Cass. lxi. 23; cf. Plin. Ep. vi. 16, 20.) The lava did not reach Pompeii, but the town was covered with successive layers of ashes and other volcanic matter, on which a soil was gradually formed. Thus a great part of the city has been preserved with its market-places, theatres, baths, temples, and private houses, and the excavation of these has thrown great light upon many points of antiquity, such as the construction of Roman houses, and in general all subjects connected with the private life of the ancients. The first traces of the ancient city were discovered in 1689, rising above the ground, but it was not till 1721 that the excavations were commenced. These have been continued with various interruptions down to the present day, and now about one-third of the city is exposed to view. It was surrounded by walls, which were nearly two miles in circumference, surmounted at intervals by towers, and containing eight gates. These walls had been partly demolished during the peace of the early empire and a suburb called 'Pagus Augustus Felix' had grown up outside the gate of Herculaneum, by which room was made for the colony planted by Augustus. The streets are narrow, the widest not exceeding twenty-four feet in width, and many have high stepping-stones for foot-passengers crossing from one raised foot-path to the other [see Dict. of Ant. art. Via]; they are usually straight, but the street which connects the Forum with the gate of Herculaneum, and is continued by the street of tombs, takes a sinuous course. The Forum is distant about four hundred yards from this gate. At its North end stands the temple of Jupiter on an elevated podium; at the South the Basilica and the Tribunals: it is bounded on the West by the temple of Venus, and on the East by the Pantheon or temple of Augustus, the council-chamber (Curia), the temple of Mercury and the Chalcidicum, a building erected by a priestess named Eumachia, which may possibly have been used as an exchange. There was a smaller triangular forum in the S. of the city not far from the gate of Stabiae and adjoining the greater and smaller theatres; close to the great theatre was the temple of Isis, in which a small statue of the deity was found; the amphitheatre has been discovered in the SE. angle of the town between the gate of Nocera and that of the Sarnus. It is impossible here to enter into details regarding the many private houses which have been discovered with much of their fittings and decorations in good preservation, and have proved of the greatest value for the elucidation of Roman domestic architecture [see Dict. of Ant. art. Domus]. There can be little doubt that much of the Pompeii now to be seen was a restoration after the earthquake of 63. The oldest remains, however, are of a very early period, especially the older parts of the walls, built of large blocks of travertine, and a Doric temple near the theatre, known as the 'Greek' temple, which is assigned to the 6th cent. B.C.

Pompeïopolis (Πομπηϊούπολις), the name of several cities founded or enlarged by Pompey. 1. (Tash Köprü), an inland city of Paphlagonia, SW. of Sinope, on the river Amnias (Gök Irmak), a W. tributary of the Halys (Strab. p. 562).—2. [POMPELON].—3. [SOLOË.]

Pompēius. 1. Q. Pompeius, said to have been the son of a flute-player, was the first of the family who rose to dignity in the state. He was consul in 141, when he carried on war against the Numantines in Spain. Having been defeated by the enemy in several engagements, he concluded a peace with them; but on the arrival of his successor in the command, he disowned the treaty, which was declared invalid by the senate. He was censor in 131 with Q. Metellus Macedonicus. (App. B.C. vi. 76; Cic. Fin. ii. 17, Off. iii. 30).—2. Q. Pompeius Rufus, either son or grandson of the preceding, was a zealous supporter of the aristocratical party. He was tribune of the plebs 100, praetor 91, and consul 88, with L. Sulla. When Sulla set out for the East to conduct the war against Mithridates, he left Italy in charge of Pompeius Rufus, and assigned to him the army of Cn. Pompeius Strabo, who was still engaged in carrying on war against the Marsi. Strabo, however, who was unwilling to be deprived of the command, caused Pompeius Rufus to be murdered by the soldiers. (Cic. pro Dom. 31, Brut. 89; App. B.C. i. 57).—3. Q. Pompeius Rufus, son of No. 2, married Sulla's daughter, and was murdered by the party of Sulpicius and Marius in the Forum, during the consulship of his father, 88 (Plut. Sull. 8).—4. Q. Pompeius Rufus, son of No. 3 and grandson of the dictator Sulla, was tribune of the plebs 52, when he distinguished himself as the great partisan of the triumvir Pompey, whom he assisted to obtain the sole consulship. Rufus, however, on the expiration of his office was accused of vis, was condemned, and went into exile at Bauli in Campania (Cic. ad Fam. viii. 1, 4; Dio Cass. xl. 45).—5. Q. Pompeius Rufus, praetor 63, was sent to Capua to watch over Campania and Apulia during Catiline's conspiracy. In 61 he obtained the province of Africa, with the title of proconsul.—6. Sex. Pompeius, married Lucilia, a sister of the poet C. Lucilius.—7. Sex. Pompeius, elder son of No. 6, never obtained any of the higher offices of the state, but acquired great reputation as a man of learning, and is praised by Cicero for his accurate knowledge of jurisprudence, geometry, and the Stoic philosophy (Cic. Brut. 47, 175).—8. Sex. Pompeius, a descendant of No. 7, consul A.D. 14, with Sex. Appuleius, in which year the emperor Augustus died. He seems to have been a patron of literature. Ovid addressed him several letters during his exile (Ov. Pont. iv. 1, 5).—9. Cn. Pompeius Strabo, younger son of No. 6, and father of the triumvir. He was quaestor in Sardinia 103, praetor 94, and proprætor in Sicily in the following year. He was consul 89, when he carried on war with success against the allies, subduing the greater number of the Italian people who were still in arms. Towards the end of the year he brought forward the law (Lex Pompeia) which gave to all the towns of the Transpadani the Jus Latii or Latinitas. [Dict. of Ant. art. Latinitas.] He continued in the S. of Italy as proconsul in the following year (88), and when Pompeius Rufus [No. 2] was appointed to succeed him in the command of the army, Strabo caused him to be assassinated by the troops. Next year (87) the Marian party obtained the upper hand. Strabo was summoned by the aristocratical party to their assistance; and though not active in their cause, he marched to the relief of the city, and fought a battle near the Colline Gate with Cinna and Sertorius (Vell. Pat. ii. 21). Shortly afterwards he was killed by lightning. His avarice and cruelty had made him hated by the soldiers to such a degree that they tore his corpse from the bier and dragged it through the streets. Cicero describes him (Brut. 47) 'as worthy of hatred on account of his cruelty, avarice, and perfidy' (cf. Flor. iii. 18). He possessed some reputation as an orator, and still more as a general. He left behind him a considerable property, especially in Picenum.—

10. Cn. Pompeius Magnus, the Triumvir, son of No. 9, was born on the 30th of September, B.C. 106, in the consulship of Atilius Serranus and Servilius Caepio, and was consequently a few months younger than Cicero, who was born on the 3rd of January in this year, and six years older than Caesar. He fought under his father in 89 against the Italians, when he was only seventeen years of age, and continued with him till his death two years afterwards. For the next few years the Marian party had possession of Italy; and accordingly Pompey, who adhered to the aristocratical party, was obliged to keep in the background, and was only saved from an indictment by the intervention of Carbo. But when it became known, in 84, that Sulla was on the point of returning from Greece to Italy, Pompey hastened into Picenum, where he raised an army of three legions. Although only twenty-three years of age, Pompey displayed great military abilities in opposing the Marian generals by whom he was surrounded; and when he succeeded in joining Sulla in the course of the year (83), he was saluted by the latter with the title of Imperator. During the remainder of the war in Italy Pompey distinguished himself as one of the most successful of Sulla's generals, and when the war in Italy was brought to a close, Sulla sent Pompey against the Marian party in Sicily and Africa. Pompey first proceeded to Sicily, of which he easily made himself master (82): here he put Carbo to death. In 81 Pompey crossed over to Africa, where he defeated Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus and the Numidian king Hiabaras, after a hard-fought battle. On his return to Rome, in the same year, he was received with enthusiasm by the people, and was greeted by Sulla with the surname of Magnus, a name which he bore ever afterwards, and handed down to his children. Pompey, however, not satisfied with this distinction, sued for a triumph, which Sulla at first refused, but at length, overcome by Pompey's importunity, he allowed him to have his own way. Accordingly Pompey, who had not yet held any public office, and was still a simple eque, entered Rome in triumph in September, 81, and before he had completed his twenty-fifth year. Pompey continued faithful to the aristocracy after Sulla's death (78), and supported the consul Catulus in resisting the attempts of his colleague Lepidus to repeal the laws of Sulla; and when Lepidus had recourse to arms in the following year (77), Pompey took an active part in the war against him, and succeeded in driving him out of Italy.—The aristocracy, however, now began to fear the young and successful general; but since Sertorius in Spain had for the last three years successfully opposed Metellus Pius, one of the ablest of Sulla's generals, and it had become necessary to send the latter some effectual assistance, the senate, with considerable reluctance, determined to send Pompey to Spain, with the title of proconsul, and with equal powers to Metellus. Pompey remained in Spain between five and six years (76–71); but neither he nor Metellus was able to gain any decisive advantage over Sertorius. But when Sertorius was treacherously murdered by his own officer Perperna, in 72, the war was speedily brought to a close. Perperna was easily defeated by Pompey in the first battle, and the whole of Spain was subdued by the early part of the following year (71). Pompey then returned to Italy at the head of his army. In his march towards Rome he fell in with the remains of the army of Spartacus, which M. Crassus had previously defeated. Pompey cut to pieces these fugitives, and therefore claimed for himself, in addition to all his other exploits, the glory of finishing the Servile war. Pompey was now a candidate for the consulship; and although he was ineligible by law, inasmuch as he was absent from Rome, had not yet reached the legal age, and had not held any of the lower offices of the state, still his election was certain. His military glory had charmed the people; and as it was known that the aristocracy looked upon Pompey with jealousy, they ceased to regard him as belonging to this party, and hoped to obtain through him a restoration of the rights and privileges of which they had been deprived by Sulla. Pompey was accordingly elected consul, along with M. Crassus; and on the 31st of December, 71, he entered the city a second time in his triumphal car, a simple eque. Pompey now found it necessary to secure power beyond the control of the senate either by force or by the aid of the opposite party. He chose the latter course as safer than a coup d'état, and openly broke with the aristocracy. Thus in his consulship (70) he was regarded as the popular hero. He proposed and carried a law restoring to the tribunes the power of which they had been deprived by Sulla. He also afforded his all-powerful aid to the Lex Aurelia, proposed by the praetor L. Aurelius Cotta, by which the judices were to be taken in future from the senatus, equites, and tribuni aerarii, instead of from the senators exclusively, as Sulla had ordained. In carrying both these measures Pompey was strongly supported by Caesar, with whom he was thus brought into close connexion, and Crassus joined the coalition.—For the next two years (69 and 68) Pompey remained in Rome. In 67 the tribune A. Gabinius brought forward a bill proposing to confer upon Pompey the command of the war against the pirates, with extraordinary powers. This bill was opposed by the aristocracy with the utmost vehemence, but was notwithstanding carried. [GABINIUS.] The pirates were at this time masters of the Mediterranean, and had not only plundered many cities on the coasts of Greece and Asia, but had even made descents upon Italy itself. As soon as Pompey received the command, he began to make his preparations for the war, and completed them by the end of the winter. His plans were formed with great skill and judgment, and were crowned with complete success. In forty days he cleared the western sea of pirates, and restored communication between Spain, Africa, and Italy. He then followed the main body of the pirates to their strongholds on the coast of Cilicia, and after defeating their fleet, he induced a great part of them, by promises of pardon, to surrender to him. Many of these he settled at Soli, which was henceforward called Pompeiopolis. The second part of the campaign occupied only forty-nine days, and the whole war was brought to a conclusion in the course of three months; so that, to adopt the panegyric of Cicero (pro Leg. Man. 12), 'Pompey made his preparations for the war at the end of the winter, entered upon it at the commencement of spring, and finished it in the middle of the summer.' Pompey was employed during the remainder of this year and the beginning of the following in visiting the cities of Cilicia and Pamphylia, and providing for the government of the newly-conquered districts.—During his absence from Rome, Pompey was appointed to succeed Lucullus in the command of the war against Mithridates (66). The bill conferring upon him this command was proposed by the tribune C. Manilius, and was supported by Cicero in an oration which has come down to us (pro Lege Manilia). Like the Gabinian law, it was opposed by the whole weight of the aristocracy, but was carried triumphantly. [MANILIUS.] The power of Mithridates had been broken by the previous victories of Lucullus, and it was only left to Pompey to bring the war to a conclusion. On the approach of Pompey, Mithridates retreated towards Armenia, but he was defeated by the Roman general; and as Tigranes now refused to receive him into his dominions, Mithridates resolved to plunge into the heart of Colchis, and from thence make his way to his own dominions in the Cimmerian Bosphorus. Pompey now turned his arms against Tigranes; but the Armenian king submitted to him without a contest, and was allowed to conclude a peace with the republic. It was bad policy as well as bad faith to fix, as he did, the boundary of the Roman dominion towards Parthia at Oruro, 200 miles E. of the Euphrates, instead of making that river the limit; and it led to difficulties with the Parthians afterwards. In 65 Pompey set out in pursuit of Mithridates, but he met with much opposition from the Iberians and Albanians; and after advancing as far as the river Phasis (Faz), he resolved to leave these savage districts. [MITHRIDATES, p. 569.] He accordingly retraced his steps, and spent the winter at Pontus, which he reduced to the form of a Roman province. In 64 he marched into Syria, deposed the king Antiochus Asiaticus, and made that country also a Roman province. In 63 he advanced further south, in order to establish the Roman supremacy in Phoenicia, Coele-Syria, and Palestine. The Jews refused to submit to him, and shut the gates of Jerusalem against him; and it was not till after a siege of three months that the city was taken. Pompey entered the Holy of Holies, the first time that any human being except the high-priest had dared to penetrate into this sacred spot. It was during the war in Palestine that

Pompey received intelligence of the death of Mithridates. [MITHRIDATES VI.] Pompey spent the next winter in Pontus; and after settling the affairs of Asia, he returned to Italy in 62. He disbanded his army almost immediately after landing at Brundisium, and thus calmed the apprehension of many who feared that, at the head of his victorious troops, he would seize upon the supreme power. He did not, however, return to Rome till the following year (61), and he entered the city in triumph on the 30th of September. He had just completed his forty-fifth year, and this was the third time that he had enjoyed the honour of a triumph.—With this triumph the first and most glorious part of Pompey's life may be said to have ended. Hitherto his life had been an almost uninterrupted succession of military glory. But now he was called upon to play a prominent part in the civil commotions of the commonwealth, a part for which neither his natural talents nor his previous habits had in the least fitted him. It would seem that, on his return to Rome, Pompey hardly knew what part to take in the politics of the city. He had been appointed to the command against the pirates and Mithridates in opposition to the aristocracy, and they still regarded him with jealousy and distrust. At the same time he was not disposed to unite himself to the popular party, which had risen into importance during his absence in the East, and over which Caesar possessed unbounded influence. The object, however, which engaged the immediate attention of Pompey was to obtain from the senate a ratification for all his acts in Asia, and an assignment of lands which he had promised to his veterans. The senate, glad of an opportunity to put an affront upon a man whom they both feared and hated, resolutely refused to sanction his measures in Asia. This was the unwise thing they could have done. If they had known their real interests, they would have sought to win Pompey over to their side, as a counterpoise to the growing and more dangerous influence of Caesar. But their short-sighted policy threw Pompey into Caesar's arms, and thus sealed the downfall of their party. Caesar promised to obtain for Pompey the ratification of his acts; and Pompey, on his part, agreed to support Caesar in all his measures. That they might be more sure of carrying their plans into execution, Caesar prevailed upon Pompey to become reconciled to Crassus, with whom he was at variance, but who, by his immense wealth, had great influence at Rome. The three agreed to assist one another against their common enemies; and thus was first formed the first triumvirate.—This union of the three most powerful men at Rome crushed the aristocracy for the time. Supported by Pompey and Crassus, Caesar was able in his consulship (59) to carry all his measures. Pompey's acts in Asia were ratified, and Caesar's agrarian law, which divided the rich Campanian land among the poorer citizens, enabled Pompey to fulfil the promises he had made to his veterans. In order to cement their union more closely, Caesar gave to Pompey his daughter Julia in marriage. Next year (58) Caesar went to his province in Gaul, but Pompey remained in Rome. While Caesar was gaining glory and influence in Gaul, Pompey was gradually losing the confidence of all parties at Rome. The senate hated and feared him; the people had deserted him for their favourite Clodius; and he had no other resource left but to strengthen his connexion with Caesar. Thus he came to be regarded as the second man in the state, and was obliged to abandon the proud position which he had occupied for so many years. According to an arrangement made with Caesar, Pompey and Crassus were consuls for a second time in 55. Pompey received as his provinces the two Spains, Crassus obtained Syria, while Caesar's government was prolonged for five years more—namely, from the 1st of January, 53, to the end of the year 49. At the end of his consulship Pompey did not go in person to his provinces, but sent his legates, L. Afranius and M. Petreius, to govern the Spains, while he himself remained in the neighbourhood of the city. His object now was to obtain the dictatorship, and to make himself the undisputed master of the Roman world. Caesar's increasing power and influence had at length made it clear to Pompey that a struggle must take place between them sooner or later. The death of his wife Julia, in 54, to whom he was tenderly attached, broke one link which still connected him with Caesar; and the fall of Crassus in the following year (53), in the Parthian expedition, removed the only person who had the least chance of contesting the supremacy with them. In order to obtain the dictatorship, Pompey secretly encouraged the civil discord with which the state was torn asunder; and such frightful scenes of anarchy followed the death of Clodius at the beginning of 52, that the senate had now no alternative but calling in the assistance of Pompey, who was accordingly made sole consul in 52, and succeeded in restoring order to the state. Soon afterwards Pompey became reconciled to the aristocracy, and was now regarded as their acknowledged head. The history of the civil war which followed is related in the Life of CAESAR. It is only necessary to mention here, that after the battle of Pharsalia (48) Pompey sailed to Egypt, where he hoped to meet with a favourable reception, since he had been the means of restoring to his kingdom the father of the young Egyptian monarch. The ministers of the latter, however, dreading Caesar's anger if they received Pompey, and likewise Pompey's resentment if they forbade him to land, resolved to release themselves from their difficulties by putting him to death. They accordingly sent out a small boat, took Pompey on board, and rowed for the shore. His wife and friends watched him from the ship, anxious to see in what manner he would be received by the king, who was standing on the edge of the sea with his troops; but just as the boat reached the shore, and Pompey was in the act of rising from his seat, in order to step on land, he was stabbed in the back by Septimius, who had formerly been one of his centurions, and was now in the service of the Egyptian monarch. Pompey was killed on the 29th of September, B.C. 48, and had just completed his fifty-eighth year. His head was cut off, and his body, which was thrown out naked on the shore, was buried by his freedman Philippus, who had accompanied him from the ship. The head was brought to Caesar when he arrived in Egypt soon afterwards, but he turned away from the sight, shed tears at the melancholy death of his rival, and put his murderers to death. (Plut. Pompeius; Strab. pp. 555–560.) Pompey was married five times. The names of his wives were: (1) Antistia; (2) Aemilia; (3) Mucia; (4) Julia; (5) Cornelia.—11. Cn. Pompeius Magnus, elder son of the triumvir by his third wife, Mucia. In the Civil war in 48, he commanded a squadron of the fleet in the Adriatic Sea. After his father's death, he crossed over to Africa, and after remaining there a short time, he sailed to Spain in 47. In Spain he was joined by his brother Sextus and others of his party, who had fled from Africa after their defeat at Thapsus. Here the two brothers collected a powerful army, but were defeated by Caesar himself at the battle of Munda, fought on the 17th of March, 55. Cneius escaped from the field of battle, but was shortly afterwards taken prisoner, and put to death. (Plut. Ant. 25; Bell. Hisp. 39; Strab. p. 141.)—12. Sex. Pompeius Magnus, younger son of the triumvir by his third wife, Mucia, was born 75. After the battle of Pharsalia he accompanied his father to Egypt, and saw him murdered before his eyes. After the battle of Munda and the death of his brother, Sextus lived for a time in concealment in the country of the Lacetani, between the Iberus and the Pyrenees; but when Caesar quitted Spain, he collected a body of troops, and emerged from his lurking-place. In the civil wars which followed Caesar's death the power of Sextus increased. He obtained a large fleet, became master of the sea, and eventually took possession of Sicily. His fleet enabled him to stop all the supplies of corn which were brought to Rome from Egypt and the eastern provinces, and such scarcity began to prevail in the city that the triumvirs were compelled by the popular discontent to make peace with Pompey. This peace was concluded at Misenum in 39, but the war was renewed in the following year. Octavian made great efforts to collect a large and powerful fleet, which he placed under the command of Agrippa. In 36 Pompey's fleet was defeated off Naulochus, with great loss. Pompey himself fled from Sicily to Lesbos and from Lesbos to Asia. Here he was taken prisoner by a body of Antony's troops, and carried to Miletus, where he was put to death (35), probably by command of Antony, though the latter sought to throw the responsibility of the deed upon his officers. (Dio Cass. xlv. 9, xlviii. 17, xlix. 11; App. B. C. ii. 105, iii. 4, v. 144.)

Pompēius Festus. [FESTUS.]

Pompēius Trogus. [JUSTINUS.]

Pompēlōn (Pamplona), which name is equivalent to Pompeiopolis, so called by the sons of Pompey, was the chief town of the Vascones in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Asturica to Burdigala (Strab. p. 161; Ptol. ii. 6, 67; Plin. iii. 25).

Pompilius. [NUMA; ANDRONICUS.]

Pompōnia. 1. Sister of T. Pomponius Atticus, was married to Q. Cicero, the brother of the orator, B.C. 68. The marriage proved an extremely unhappy one. Q. Cicero, after leading a miserable life with his wife for almost twenty-four years, at length divorced her at the end of 45 or in the beginning of the following year. [CICERO, No. 6.]—2. Daughter of T. Pomponius Atticus. She is also called Caecilia (because her father was adopted by Q. Caecilius) and likewise Attica. She was born in 51, and she was still quite young when she was married to M. Vipsanius Agrippa. Her daughter Vipsania Agrippina married Tiberius, the successor of Augustus.

Pomponiāna. [STOECHADES.]

Pompōnius, Sextus, a distinguished Roman jurist, who lived under Antoninus Pius and M. Aurelius. Some modern writers think that there were two jurists of this name. The works of Pomponius are frequently quoted in the Digest.

Pompōnius Atticus. [ATTICUS.]

Pompōnius Bononiensis, the most celebrated writer of Fabulae Atellanae, was a native of Bononia (Bologna) in northern Italy, about B.C. 91 (Macrob. i. 10, 3, vi. 9, 4; Vell. Pat. ii. 9, 6).

Pompōnius Mela. [MELA.]

Pomptinae Paludes (Ποντινὰί Λίμναι: Paludi Pontine, in English the Pontine Marshes), the name of a low marshy plain on the coast of Latium between Circeii and Terracina, said to have been so called after an ancient town Pontia, which disappeared at an early period. The plain is about thirty miles long, and from seven to eight miles in breadth. The marshes are formed chiefly by the rivers Nymphaeus, Ufens, and Amasenus, and some other small streams, which, instead of finding their way into the sea, spread over this plain. (Strab. p. 233; cf. Verg. Aen. vii. 801; Sil. It. viii. 379.) Hence the plain is turned into a vast number of marshes, the miasmas arising from which are exceedingly unhealthy in the summer. At an early period, however, they appear not to have existed at all, or at any rate to have been confined to a narrow district. There was a tradition that originally there were twenty-three towns situated in this plain (Plin. iii. 59). On the other hand, Theophrastus states that in his time the promontory of Circeii, which had been an island (hence by some considered the Homeric island of Circe), began to be united to the mainland by alluvial deposits (Theophr. H. P. v. 8, 3; Plin. iii. 58). It is certainly improbable that the district was ever habitable and fertile within the period of history; and the cornfields of the Pomptinus ager (Liv. ii. 34, iv. 25, vi. 5, 21) were probably never more than the borderland of the marshes. There was, however, a sufficiently sound tract in the marshy plain to admit of the construction of the Via Appia in 312, and no doubt the formation of the canal helped to preserve the road. This was a navigable canal, parallel with the road from Forum Appii to Feronia (Hor. Sat. v.). That the marshes had a tendency to spread is clear from the not very successful attempts which were made to drain them by the consul Cethegus in 160, by Julius Caesar and by Augustus. (Liv. Ep. 46; Suet. Jul. 44; Plut. Caes. 58; Dio Cass. xlv. 5; Hor. A. P. 65.) Juvenal mentions the marshes as a haunt of highwaymen (iii. 307), no doubt, because they were thinly inhabited. Subsequently the marshes again spread over the whole plain, and the Via Appia entirely disappeared; and it was not until the pontificate of Pius VI. that any serious attempt was made to drain them. The works were begun in 1778, and the greater part of the marshes was drained; but the plain is still unhealthy in the great heats of the summer.

C. Pomptinus, was praetor B.C. 63, when he was employed by Cicero in apprehending the ambassadors of the Allobroges. He afterwards obtained the province of Gallia Narbonensis, and in 61 defeated the Allobroges, who had invaded the province. He triumphed in 54, after suing in vain for this honour for some years. (Sall. Cat. 45; Dio Cass. xxxvii. 47, xxxix. 65.)

Pons, a common name for stations on the Roman roads at the passage of rivers, some of which stations on the more important roads grew into villages or towns. 1. Pons Aelius (Newcastle-upon-Tyne), in the N. of Britain.—2. P. Aeni (Pfünzen) in Vindelicia, at the passage of the Inn, was a fortress with a Roman garrison.

—3. P. Aureoli (Pontirolo), in Gallia Transpadana on the road from Bergamum to Mediolanum, derived its name from one of the Thirty Tyrants who was defeated and slain by Claudius in this place (Aur. Vict. Caes. 33).—4. P. Campanus, in Campania between Sinuessa and Urbana on the Savo.—5. P. Mosae (prob. Maastricht) in the N. of Gaul (Tac. Hist. iv. 66).—6. P. Saravi (Saarbrück), on the road from Divodurum (Metz) to Argentoratum (Strassburg).

Pontia (Ponza), a rocky island, about five miles long, off the coast of Latium opposite Formiae, which was taken by the Romans from the Volscians, and colonised, B.C. 313 (Liv. ix. 28; Strab. p. 233). Under the Romans it was used as a place of banishment for state criminals (Suet. Tib. 54, Cal. 15). There is a group of smaller islands round Pontia, which are sometimes called Insulae Pontiae (Plin. iii. 82).

Ponticus, an epic poet and a friend both of Ovid and Propertius. He wrote a poem on the Theban legendary wars, which Propertius praises as being in the Homeric style. (Propert. i. 7, 1, i. 9, 9; Ov. Trist. iv. 10, 47.)

Pontinus (Ποντινός), a river and mountain in Argolis near Lerna, with a sanctuary of Athene Saitis.

C. Pontius, son of Herennius Pontius, the general of the Samnites in B.C. 321, defeated the Roman army under the two consuls T. Veturius Calvinus and Sp. Postumius Albinus in one of the mountain passes in the neighbourhood of Caudium. The survivors, who were completely at the mercy of the Samnites, were dismissed unhurt by Pontius. They had to surrender their arms, and to pass under the yoke; and as the price of their deliverance, the consuls and the other commanders swore, in the name of the republic, to a humiliating peace. The Roman state, however, refused to ratify the treaty. Nearly thirty years afterwards, Pontius was defeated by Q. Fabius Gurgus (292), was taken prisoner, and was put to death after the triumph of the consul (Liv. ix. 1).

Pontius Aquila. [AQUILA.]

Pontius Pilatus, was the sixth procurator of Judaea, and the successor of Valerius Gratus (Tac. Ann. xv. 44). He held the office for ten years in the reign of Tiberius, from A.D. 26 to 36, and it was during his government that Christ taught, suffered, and died. By his tyrannical conduct he excited an insurrection at Jerusalem, and at a later period commotions in Samaria also, which were not put down without the loss of life. The Samaritans complained of his conduct to Vitellius, the governor of Syria, who deprived him of his office, and sent him to Rome to answer before the emperor the accusations that were brought against him. Eusebius states that Pilatus put an end to his own life early in the reign of Caligula, worn out by the many misfortunes he had experienced (Euseb. H. E. ii. 7). An old tradition (possibly founded on a similarity of name) says that he drowned himself in the lake on Mt. Pilatus near Lucerne, having wandered thither from a place of banishment in Gaul. The early Christian writers refer to an official report, made by Pilatus to the emperor Tiberius, of the condemnation and death of Christ. It is very doubtful whether this document was genuine; and it is certain that the Acts of Pilate, as they are called, which are extant in Greek, as well as his two Latin letters to the emperor, are the productions of a later age.

Pontius Telesinus. 1. A Samnite, and commander of a Samnite army, with which he fought against Sulla. He was defeated by Sulla in a hard-fought battle near the Colline gate, B.C. 82. He fell in the fight; his head was cut off, and carried under the walls of Praeneste, to let the younger Marius know that his last hope of succour was gone. (Vell. Pat. ii. 27.)—2. Brother of the preceding, was shut up in Praeneste with the younger Marius, when his brother was defeated by Sulla. After the death of the elder Pontius, Marius and Telesinus, finding it impossible to escape from Praeneste, resolved to die by one another's hands. Telesinus fell first, and Marius put an end to his own life, or was slain by his slave. [MARIUS.]

Pontus (ὁ Πόντος), the NE.-most district of Asia Minor, along the coast of the Euxine, E. of the river Halys, having originally no specific name, was spoken of as the country ἐν Πόντῳ, on the Pontus (Euxinus), and hence acquired the name of Pontus, which is first found in Xenophon's Anabasis (v. 6, 15). The term, however, was used very indefinitely until the settlement of the boundaries of the country as a Roman province. Originally it was regarded as a part of CAPPADOCIA, but its parts were best known by the names of the different tribes who dwelt along the coast, and of whom some account is given by Xenophon, in the Anabasis. We learn from the legends of the Argonauts, who are represented as visiting this coast, and the Amazons, whose abodes are placed about the river Thermodon, E. of the Iris, as well as from other poetical allusions, that the Greeks had some knowledge of these SE. shores of the Euxine at a very early period. A great accession to such knowledge was made by the information gained by Xenophon and his comrades, when they passed through the country in their famous retreat and long afterwards the Romans became well acquainted with it by means of the Mithridatic war, and Pompey's subsequent expedition through Pontus into the countries at the foot of the Caucasus. Tradition said that this district was subdued by Ninus (Diod. ii. 2). It was under the rule of the Persian kings after Cyrus the Great (Hdt. iii. 94, vii. 77). Its subsequent name, Pontus, first acquired a political rather than a territorial importance, through the foundation of a new kingdom in it, about the beginning of the fourth century B.C., by ARIOBARZANES I. The history of the gradual growth of this kingdom until, under Mithridates VI., it threatened the Roman empire in Asia, is given under the names of its kings, of whom the following is the list:—(1) ARIOBARZANES I., exact date unknown; (2) MITHRIDATES I., to B.C. 363; (3) ARIOBARZANES II., 363–337; (4) MITHRIDATES II., 337–302; (5) MITHRIDATES III., 302–266; (6) ARIOBARZANES III., 266–240? (7) MITHRIDATES IV., 240–190? (8) PHARNACES I., 190–156? (9) MITHRIDATES V. EUERGETES, 156–120? (10) MITHRIDATES VI. EUPATOR, 120–63; (11) PHARNACES II., 63–47. After the death of Pharnaces, the reduced kingdom retained a nominal existence under his son Darius, who was made king by Antony in B.C. 39, but was soon deposed; and under POLEMON I. and POLEMON II., till about A.D. 62, when the country was constituted by Nero a Roman province (Suet. Ner. 18; Eutrop. vii. 14). Of this province the W. boundary was the river Halys, which divided it from Paphlagonia; the furthest E. limit was the Isis (a small river not far S. of the Phasis), which separated it from Colchis; on the S. it was divided from Galatia, Cappadocia, and Armenia Minor by the great chain of the Paryadres and by its branches. It was divided into the three districts of Pontus Galaticus, in the W., bordering on Galatia, P. Polemoniaca in the centre, so called from its capital POLEMONIUM, and P. Cappadocia in the E. bordering on Cappadocia (Armenia Minor). In the new division of the provinces under Constantine, these three districts were reduced to two: Helenopontus in the W., so called in honour of the emperor's mother, Helena, and Pontus Polemoniaca in the E. The country was also divided into smaller districts, named from the towns they surrounded and the tribes who peopled them. Pontus was a mountainous country: wild and barren in the E., where the great chains approach the Euxine; but in the W. watered by the great rivers HALYS and IRIS and their tributaries, the valleys of which, as well as the land along the coast, are extremely fertile. Besides corn and olives, it was famous for its fruit trees, and some of the best of our common fruits are said to have been brought to Europe from this quarter: for example, the cherry (see CERASUS). The sides of the mountains were covered with fine timber, and their lower slopes with box and other shrubs. The E. part was rich in minerals, and contained the celebrated iron mines of the CHALYBES. (Strab. pp. 545, 549; Theophrast. H.P. iv. 5, viii. 4, ix. 16, xix. 17; Xen. An. iv. 8, 16.) Pontus was peopled by numerous tribes, belonging probably to very different races, though the Semitic (Syro-Arabian) race appears to have been the prevailing one, and hence the inhabitants were included under the general name of LEUCOSYRI. [The chief of these peoples are spoken of in separate articles.]

Pontus Euxinus, or simply Pontus (ὁ Πόντος, Πόντος Εὐξείνιος: τὸ Ποντικὸν Πέλαγος, Mare Euxinum: the Black Sea, Turk. Kara Deniz, Grk. Maurethalassa, Russ. Tcheriagó More or Ozarné-More, all names of the same meaning, and supposed to have originated from the terror with which it was at first regarded by the Turkish mariners, as the first wide expanse of sea with which they became acquainted), the great inland sea enclosed by Asia Minor on the S., Colchis on the E., Sarmatia on the N., and Dacia and Thracia on the W., and having no other outlet than the narrow BOSPORUS THRACIUS in the SW. corner. It lies between 28° and 41° 30' E. long., and between 41° and 46° 40' N. lat., its length being about 700 miles, and its breadth varying from 400 to 160. Its surface contains more than 180,000 square miles. It receives the drainage of an immense extent of country in Europe and in Asia, but much the greater portion of its waters flows from the former continent by the following rivers: the Ister or Danubius (Danube), whose basin contains the greater part of central Europe; the Tyras or Danastis (Dniester), Hypanis or Bogus (Boug), Borysthènes (Dniester), and Tanaïs (Don), which drain the immense plains of S. Russia, and flow into the N. side of the Euxine, the last of them (i.e. the Tanaïs) through the Pálus Maeotis (Sea of Azov). The space thus drained is calculated at above 860,000 square miles, or nearly one-fifth of the whole surface of Europe. In Asia, the basin of the Euxine contains, first, the triangular piece of Sarmatia Asiatica between the Tanaïs on the N., the Caucasus on the S., and on the E. the Hippici M., which form the watershed dividing the tributaries of the Euxine from those of the Caspian: the waters of this space flow into the Tanaïs and the Palus Maeotis, and the largest of them is the Hypanis or Vardanes (Kuban), which comes down to the Palus Maeotis and the Euxine at their junction, and divides its waters between them; next we have the narrow strip of land between the Caucasus and the NE. coast of the sea; then, on the E., Colchis, hemmed in between the Caucasus and Moschici M., and watered by the Phasis; and lastly, on the S., the whole of that part of Asia Minor which lies between the Paryadres and Antitaurus on the E. and SE., the Taurus on the S., and the highlands of Phrygia on the W., the chief rivers of this portion being the Iris (Yeshil Irmak), the Halys (Kizil Irmak), and the Sangarius (Sakariyeh). The whole of the Asiatic basin of the Euxine is estimated at 100,000 square miles. As might be expected from this vast influx of fresh water, the water is much less salt than that of the ocean. A curious prediction was founded upon this great influx by Polybius (iv. 39-43)—that the Euxine would in time become choked up and converted into dry land by the deposits of all these rivers (cf. Strab. pp. 49, 50). The great bank of which he speaks as being one day's sail off the mouths of the Danube, is not mentioned by other writers and has no existence now. The waters which the Euxine receives from the rivers that flow directly into it, and also from the Palus Maeotis (Sea of Azov) through the Bosphorus Cimmerius (Straits of Kaffa or Yenikaleh), find their exit at the SW. corner, through the Bosphorus Thracius (Channel of Constantinople), into the Propontis (Sea of Marmara), and thence in a constant rapid current through the Hellespontus (Straits of Gallipoli or Dardanelles) into the Aegeum Mare (Archipelago).—The Argonautic and other legends show that the Greeks had some acquaintance with this sea at a very early period. It is said that they at first called it Ἀέζωρος (inhospitable), from the savage character of the peoples on its coast, and from the supposed terrors of its navigation, and that afterwards, on their favourite principle of euphemism (i.e. abstaining from words of evil omen), they changed its name to Εὐξέωρος, Ion. Εὐξείωρος (hospitable) (Ov. Trist. iv. 4, 55; cf. Scymn. 734; Strab. p. 298; Mel. i. 19, 6; Plin. vi. 1.) The Greeks of Asia Minor, especially the people of MILETUS, founded many colonies and commercial emporiums on its shores, and as early as the Persian wars we find Athens carrying on a regular trade with these settlements in the corn grown in the great plains on its N. side (the Ukraine) and in the Chersonesus Taurica (Crimea), which have ever since supplied W. Europe with large quantities of grain. The history of the settlements themselves will be found under their several names. The Romans had a pretty accurate knowledge of the sea. An account of its coasts exists in Greek, entitled Periplus Maris Euxini, ascribed to Arrian, who lived in the reign of Hadrian. [ARRIANUS.]

Popillius Laenas. [LAENAS.]

Poplicola. [PUBLICOLA.]

Poppaea Sabina. [SABINA.]

Poppaeus Sabinus. [SABINUS.]

Pōpūlōnīa, or -ium (Populoniensis: Populonia), an ancient town of Etruria, situated on a lofty hill, sinking abruptly to the sea, and forming a peninsula. According to one tradition it was founded by the Corsicans; but according to another it was a colony from Volaterrae, or was taken from the Corsicans by the Volater-rani. (Strab. p. 223; Verg. Aen. x. 174; Serv. ad loc.) It was not one of the twelve Etruscan cities, and was never a place of political importance; but it carried on an extensive commerce, and was the principal seaport of Etruria. Part of its trade was in iron obtained from the opposite island of Ilva (Liv. xxviii. 45). It was destroyed by Sulla in the civil wars, and was almost in ruins in the time of Strabo, but is mentioned as an existing town by Pliny (iii. 50).

Obv., Gorgon's head; rev., plain.

There are still remains of the walls of the ancient Populonia, showing that the city was only about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile in circumference.

Porcia. 1. Sister of Cato Uticensis, married L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, consul B.C. 54, who was slain in the battle of Pharsalia. She died in 46. (Plut. Cat. i. 41; Cic. ad Att. ix. 3, xiii. 37, 48.)—2. Daughter of Cato Uticensis by his first wife, Atilia. She was married first to M. Bibulus, consul 59, to whom she bore three children. Bibulus died in 48; and in 45 she married M. Brutus, the assassin of Julius Caesar. She inherited all her father's republican principles, and likewise his courage and firmness of will. She induced her husband on the night before the 15th of March to disclose to her the conspiracy against Caesar's life, and she is reported to have wounded herself in the thigh in order to show that she had a courageous soul and could be trusted with the secret. (Plut. Cat. 25, 73, Brut. 2, 13, 15, 23; App. B. C. iv. 136; Dio Cass. xlv. 13.) She put an end to her own life after the death of Brutus, in 42. The common tale was, that her friends, suspecting her design, had taken all weapons out of her way, and that she therefore destroyed herself by swallowing live coals. (Plut. Brut. 53; Mart. i. 43; Dio Cass. xlvii. 49; Val. Max. iv. 6, 5.) The real fact may have been that she suffocated herself by the vapour of a charcoal fire, which we know was a frequent means of self-destruction among the Romans.

Pordoselēne or Poroselēne (Πορδοσελήνη, Ποροσελήνη), the largest of the group of islands called Hecatonnesi, which lie between Lesbos and the coast of Asia Minor (Strab. p. 618; Ptol. v. 2, 5; Plin. v. 137).

Porphyrio, Pompōnius, one of the most valuable among the ancient commentators on Horace. He lived after Festus and Acro, probably in the third or fourth century A.D.—Ed. by Meyer, Leips. 1874.

Porphyrio (Πορφυρίων), one of the giants who fought against the gods. When he attempted to offer violence to Hera, or to throw the island of Delos against the gods, Zeus hurled a thunderbolt at him, and Heracles completed his destruction with his arrows. [GIGANTES.]

Porphyrus (Πορφύρις), an earlier name of the island of NISYRUS.

Porphyrites Mons (Πορφύριτης : Gebel Dokhan), a range of mountains on the W. shore of the Red Sea opposite the most southerly part of Arabia (Ptol. iv. 5, 27).

Porphyrus (Πορφύριος), usually called Porphyry, the celebrated antagonist of Christianity, was a Greek philosopher of the Neo-Platonic school. He was born A.D. 233 either in Batanea in Palestine or at Tyre. His original name was Malchus, the Greek form of the Syro-Phoenician Melech, a word which signified king. The name Porphyrus (in allusion to the usual colour of royal robes) was subsequently devised for him by his preceptor Longinus. After studying under Origen at Caesarea, and under Apollonius and Longinus at Athens, he settled at Rome in his thirtieth year, and there became a diligent disciple of Plotinus, who entrusted him with the task of correcting and arranging his writings. [PLOTINUS.] After remaining in Rome six years, Porphyry, for the sake of his health, took a voyage to Sicily, where he lived for some time. It was during his residence in Sicily that he wrote his treatise against the Christian religion, in fifteen books. Afterwards he returned to Rome, where he continued to teach until his death, which took place about 305 or 306. Late in life he married Marcella, the widow of one of his friends, and the mother of seven children, with the view, as he avowed, of superintending their education. As a writer Porphyry deserves considerable praise. His style is clear, and his learning was most extensive. His most celebrated work was his treatise against the Christian religion; but of its nature and merits we are not able to judge, as it has not come down to us: it was destroyed by order of the emperor Theodosius. Among his extant works his Life of Pythagoras and Life of Plotinus are the best known.

Porphyrus, Publilius Optatianus, a Roman poet of small merit, who lived in the age of Constantine the Great. He was praefectus urbi in 329 and 333. His verses are in the highest degree artificial, many of them puzzles in the acrostic and other forms rather than poetry. He was brought into notice by a Panegyric upon Constantine.—Ed. by L. Müller, Leips. 1877, and partly in Wernsdorf, Poët. Lat. Min.

Porsenna or Porsena,* Lars, king of the Etruscan town of Clusium, marched against Rome at the head of a vast army, in order to restore Tarquinius Superbus to the throne. He took possession of the hill Janiculum, and would have entered the city by the bridge which connected Rome with the Janiculum, had it not been for the superhuman prowess of Horatius Cocles, who kept the whole Etruscan army at bay, while his comrades broke down the bridge behind him. [COCLES.] The Etruscans proceeded to lay siege to the city, which soon began to suffer from famine. Thereupon a young Roman, named C. Mucius, resolved to deliver his country by murdering the invading king. He accordingly went over to the Etruscan camp, but, ignorant of the person of Porsenna, killed the royal secretary instead. Seized, and threatened with torture, he thrust his right hand into the fire on the altar, and there let it burn, to show how little he heeded pain. Astonished at his courage, the king bade him depart in peace; and Scaevola, as he was henceforward called, told him, out of gratitude, to make peace with Rome, since 300 noble youths had sworn to take the life of the king, and he was the first upon whom the lot had fallen. Porsenna thereupon made peace with the Romans, and withdrew his troops from the Janiculum after receiving twenty hostages from the Romans. Such was the tale by which Roman vanity concealed one of the earliest and greatest disasters of the city. (Liv. ii. 9-15; Plut. Popl. 16; Dionys. v. 21.) The real fact is, that this war was an invasion by the Etruscan king for purposes of conquest, not from any desire to restore the Tarquins: otherwise their restoration would have been a condition of the treaty. This part of the story appears to be an episode introduced to glorify the establishment of the republic, and possibly the real wars of Porsenna may have been at a different period. But whenever the war occurred, Rome was completely conquered by Porsenna. This is expressly stated by Tacitus (Hist. iii. 72), and is confirmed by other writers. Dionysius states (v. 34) that the Romans acknowledged the supremacy of Porsenna by sending him a sceptre, a royal robe, and an ivory chair. Pliny tells us (xxxiv. 139) that so thorough was the subjection of the Romans that they were expressly prohibited from using iron for any other purpose but agriculture. The Romans, however did not long remain subject to the Etruscans. After the conquest of Rome, Aruns, the son of Porsenna, proceeded to attack Aricia, but was defeated before the city by the united forces of the Latin cities, assisted by the Greeks of Cumae (Liv. ii. 15; Dionys. v. 36, vii. 2-11). The Etruscans appear, in consequence, to have been confined to their own territory on the right bank of the Tiber, and the Romans to have availed themselves of the opportunity to recover their independence.—The tomb of Porsenna at Clusium, of great size and magnificence, is described by Pliny (xxxvi. 91), and remains of it have been discovered at Chiusi. [CLUSIUM; Dict. of Ant. art. Labyrinthus.]

Porthaon (Πορθάων), son of Agenor and Epicaste, was king of Pleuron and Calydon in Aetolia, and married to Eurycle, by whom he became the father of Oeneus, Agrius, Alcathous, Melas, Leucopoeus, and Sterope. [OENEUS.]

Porthmus (Πόρθμος: Porto Bufalo), a harbour in Euboea, belonging to Eretria, opposite to Oropus (Dem. Phil. iii. p. 119, de Cor. p. 248; Plin. iv. 64).

Portunus or Portumnus, originally the god of portae and portus, i.e. of doors, gates and harbours (as being the river or maritime entrances (Paul. p. 56). He was thus at first identical with Janus, and, like him, represented with a key in his hand [JANUS, p. 457, a]: but gradually the harbour-god was distinguished from the god of gates, and Portunus received a separate worship as the protecting deity who guarded the harbour and was invoked to grant a safe return to the haven. (Cic. N. D. ii. 26, 56; Verg. Aen. v. 241.) When Greek mythology influenced that of the Romans, Portunus became identified with the Greek sea-god Palaemon or Melicertes [PALAEMON], and sometimes with Neptunus. Portunus had a temple on the Tiber near the Pons Aemilius, and another near Ostia, whence he was connected with the river god Tiberinus; but it is probably a mistake to say that he was identified with Tiberinus. The two names appear as distinct in the same calendar of festivals. The festival of the Portunalia at which Portunus was worshipped took place on the 17th of August. [Dict. of Ant. s.v.]

Pōrus (Πῶρος) king of the Indian provinces E. of the river Hydaspes, offered a formidable resistance to Alexander when the latter attempted to cross this river B.C. 327. The battle which he fought with Alexander was one of the most severely contested which occurred during the whole of Alexander's campaigns. Porus displayed great personal courage in the battle, and when brought before the conqueror, he proudly demanded to be treated in a manner worthy of a king. This magnanimity at once conciliated the favour of Alexander, who not only restored to him his dominions, but increased them by large accessions of territory. From this time Porus became firmly attached to his generous conqueror, whom he accompanied to the Hyphasis. In 321 Porus was treacherously put to death by Eudemus, who commanded the Macedonian troops in the adjacent province. We are told that Porus was a man of gigantic stature—not less than five cubits in height—distinguished for personal strength and prowess in war. (Arrian, v. 18; Plut. Alex. 60; Curt. viii. 14.)

Poseidon (Ποσειδών), called Neptūnus by the Romans, was the god of the sea. (In so far as he was distinguished from Oceanus, his rule referred to the Mediterranean: otherwise it was generally over all seas.) His name is connected with πόντος, πόντος and ποταμός, according to which he is the god of the flowing waters, whether of land or sea: hence his epithet πντάμιος, as nourisher of plants. According to the genealogy recognised by the earliest Greek poets, he was a son of Cronos and Rhea (whence he is called Cronius, and by Latin poets Saturnius). He was accordingly a brother of Zeus, Hades, Hera, Hestia and Demeter, and it was determined by lot that he should rule over the sea. (Il. xv. 187–191; Hes. Th. 453, 464.) Like his brothers and sisters, he was, after his birth, swallowed by his father Cronos, but thrown up again (Apollod. i. 1, 5, i. 2, 1). According to the story given by Pausanias (viii. 8, 2), he was concealed by Rhea, after his birth, among a flock of lambs, and his mother pretended to have given birth to a young horse, which she gave to Cronos to devour. In the Homeric poems Poseidon is described as equal to Zeus in dignity, but less powerful. He resents the attempts of Zeus to intimidate him; he even threatens his mightier brother, and once conspired with Hera and Athene to put him into chains; but on other occasions we find him submissive to Zeus. (Il. i. 309, viii. 210, xv. 165–190, 209–212; Od. xiii. 148.) The palace of Poseidon was in the depth of the sea near Aegae in Achaia, where he kept his horses with brazen hoofs and golden manes (Il. xiii. 21; Od. v. 381). With these horses he drives in a chariot over the waves of the sea, which become smooth as he approaches, and the monsters of the deep recognise him and play around his chariot (Il. xiii. 27; Verg. Aen. v. 817; Ap. Rh. iii. 1240). Although he generally dwelt in the sea, still he also appears in Olympus in the assembly of the gods (Il. xx. 13).—Poseidon in conjunction with Apollo is said to have built the walls of Troy for Laomedon, whence Troy is called Neptunia Pergama (Il. vii. 452; Eur. Andr. 1014; Ov. Fast. i. 525). Laomedon refused to give these gods the reward which had been stipulated, and even dismissed them with threats. Poseidon in consequence sent a sea monster, which was on the point of devouring Laomedon's daughter when it was killed by Heracles, and he continued to bear an implacable hatred against the Trojans. [HESIONE.] He sided with the Greeks in the war against Troy, sometimes witnessing the contests from the heights of Thrace, and sometimes interfering in person, assuming the appearance of a mortal hero and encouraging the Greeks, while Zeus favoured the Trojans (Il. xiii. 12, 44, xiv. 186). In the Odyssey, Poseidon is hostile to Odysseus, whom he prevents from returning home because he had blinded Polyphemus, a son of Poseidon by the nymph Thoosa (Od. i. 20, v. 286, 366, xi. 101; Ov. Trist. i. 2, 9).—Being the ruler of the sea, he is described as gathering clouds and calling forth storms, but at the same time he has it in his power to grant a successful voyage and save those who are in danger; and all other marine divinities are subject to him. As the sea surrounds and holds the earth, he himself is described as the god who holds the earth (γαιήχος), and who has it in his power to shake the earth Ἐννοσίγαιος, ἐννοσίχθων, κινητὴρ γᾶς, τινάκτωρ γαίας, so that Hades feared lest he should tear up its foundation and reveal the depths below (Il. xx. 57). In this belief it is possible also that there may have been some perception of the fact that earthquakes are more frequent and violent near the sea-coast.—Among the many local stories of Poseidon the most famous is the legend of the naming of Athens. It is said that when Poseidon and Athene disputed as to which of them should give the name to the capital of Attica, the gods decided that it should receive its name from the deity who should bestow upon man the most useful gift. Poseidon then created the horse, and Athene called forth the olive tree; in consequence of which the honour was conferred upon the goddess. (Hdt. viii. 55; Apollod. iii. 14; Serv. ad Georg. i. 12.) It should be noticed as regards this story that Poseidon is really Erechtheus, the local deity of Athens who has been transformed into a hero. The myth probably expresses the fact that Poseidon, or Poseidon-Erechtheus, was worshipped by the old Ionian (or so-called Pelasgian) inhabitants of Attica, and after the later immigration occupied a subordinate place in the festivals of the city. At Colonus the worship of Athene was united with the (probably) older worship of Ποσειδῶν Ἰππίος.—The following legends also respecting Poseidon deserve to be mentioned. In conjunction with Zeus he fought against Cronos and the Titans; and in the contest with the Giants he pursued Polybotes across the sea as far as Cos, and there killed him by throwing the island upon him (Apollod. i. 6, 2; Paus. i. 2, 4). He further crushed the Centaurs, when they were pursued by Heracles, under a mountain in Leucosia, the island of the Sirens (Apollod. ii. 5, 4). He sued together with Zeus for the hand of Thetis; but he withdrew when Themis prophesied that the son of Thetis would be greater than his father (Apollod. iii. 13, 5; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 178). At the request of Minos, king of Crete, Poseidon caused a bull to rise from the sea, which the king promised to sacrifice; but when Minos treacherously concealed the animal among a herd of oxen, the god punished Minos by causing his wife Pasiphaë to fall in love with the bull (Apollod. iii. 1, 3).—Poseidon was married to Amphitrite, by whom he had three children, Triton, Rhode, and Benthesisicyme; but he had also a vast number of children by other divinities and by mortal women [see especially DEMETER; TYRO]. It is, no doubt, because the sea is rough and stormy that many of the children of Poseidon are described as rough and passionate, or even savage and gigantic [see AMYCUS, ANTAEUS, BUSIRIS, CERCYON, CYCNUS, PROCRUSTES, SCIRON].—Poseidon seems to have been worshipped originally by the oldest branches of the Ionic race in especial. It is possible that when they were an inland people mainly he was the god of running streams and wells, and that as they occupied more and more sea-coast towns his worship took particularly the form, which eventually everywhere prevailed, appropriate to the god of the sea. In Thessaly, a well-watered country, without many sea-ports, his character was rather that of a god of rivers, who was therefore a lover of nymphs; and, as the Thessalians were in early times an equestrian people, it naturally happened that Poseidon was accepted by them as the god of horses; and other circumstances also may have contributed to this—the impression of the horses' hoofs trampling round the sacred streams and springs, which led also to the stories of Hippocrene [PEGASUS]; and perhaps also the idea of horses shaking the earth in their gallop. This is a more likely origin of his being regarded as the god of horses than the comparison of crested waves with horses. In this aspect he was Π. ἵππιος, or ἵππιος ἀναξ: he was honoured in chariot races, as at the Isthmian games, and the giver of famous horses (Il. xxiii. 277; Pind. Ol. i. 40, Pyth. vi. 43; Eur. Phoen. 1707; Soph. O. C. 712; Paus. i. 30, 4, vi. 20, 8, viii. 25, 5). The worship of Poseidon was specially noticeable in Thessaly, of which country he was indeed the national god, and it belonged, no doubt, to the early inhabitants, the so-called Pelasgian races. Poseidon, as their traditions recorded, not only gave them their rivers and their horses, but he made their land, by cleaving the way through Tempe for the waters to escape. (Hence his epithet πετραῖος: Pind. Pyth. iv. 138.) Thence it had spread to Boeotia, and was probably supreme there before it was superseded by the worship of Apollo and of Dionysus. In Attica, as has been seen, it was established at a very early time, and in the Peloponnesus also, which is said to have been an οἰκητήριον Ποσειδῶνος in pre-Dorian times (Diod. xv. 49), it held an important place. It may have been brought thither by the old Ionian settlers from Asia—to which country it was again brought back to be celebrated in the great Panionian festival—or it may have been planted in various centres of the Peloponnesus by races coming southwards from Thessaly: for instance, from the race of Pelias and Neleus may have arisen the worship of Poseidon at Pylos (Od. iii. 5); from the Lapithae that in Attica. The most famous seats of this worship in the Peloponnesus were Aegae and Helice in Achaia (Il. viii. 503; Hdt. i. 145; Paus. vii. 25, 7), and it is remarkable that Helice was destroyed by an earthquake in 373 B.C. (Strab. p. 384): possibly it had a reputation for earthquakes in earlier times; at Onchestus (Paus. ix. 26, 6); at Calausia and at other cities which united in the Isthmian games; especially also at Taenarum and Malea (Ap. Rh. iii. 1240) the promontories of Lacedaemon, whence probably it was carried to Tarentum (Hor. Od. i. 28, 29), having been adopted by the Dorians from their predecessors. [For the worship of Poseidon at Athens, see ERECHTHEUM.]—The attribute of Poseidon, which distinguishes him, also in works of art, was especially the trident (Od. v. 291; Apollod. i. 2, 1), with which his various works of power are done, the rocks are cleft, the horse or the spring of water is produced from the earth, and the depths of the sea are stirred. It is generally held that the form of his trident was merely adopted from the three-pronged weapon with which the fisher struck the tunny—and this seems to be the idea of Aeschylus when he calls the trident of Poseidon ἰχθυόβολος (Sept. 123): on the other hand, a recent writer has brought arguments to show that it was a development of the sceptre, headed by a lotus or fleur-de-lys, such as was commonly painted on vases as an emblem of power for Zeus, Hades on Poseidon. The bull was also an attribute, symbolising the roar of the stormy sea, whence Poseidon had the epithet ταύρεος or ταύρειος (that the hunting of the bull was the sport in early times of the Thessalians may also have had something to do with this connexion); bulls were sacrificed to him (Od. iii. 1), and the ministers of his sacrifices at Ephesus were called ταῦροι (Athen. p. 245). On the other hand, the dolphin belonged to him as the symbol of his power to calm the sea (Ael. H. A. xii. 45). In art he never appears enthroned, but usually as a standing figure with the trident: sometimes he is fully clothed: sometimes he is naked: in the coin of Paestum [see p. 641], as in the medal engraved here, he is naked except for a cloak thrown over his arm, and on the reverse the attribute of the bull also appears. In the colossal statue of Poseidon in the Lateran Museum the god is standing, naked, with the trident in his left hand and a rudder in his right, one foot is resting on a ship joined to which is a dolphin's head. All these are common attributes, as may be gathered from coins (see coin of Hadrian, engraved here); but in this statue most of them appear to be restorations. The typical head of Poseidon resembles that of Zeus, but has less of repose in it. The contest between Poseidon and Athene was the subject of the sculptures on the W. pediment of the Parthenon, and probably that treatment of it is illustrated by the painting on a vase found at Kertch which is now at St. Petersburg.

Posidippus (Ποσειδίππος, Ποσίδιππος). 1. An Athenian comic poet of the New Comedy, was a native of Cassandrea in Macedonia. He was reckoned one of the six most celebrated poets of the New Comedy. In time, he was the last of all the poets of the New Comedy. Among his plays was one entitled Δίδυμοι, which was possibly the original of the Menæchmi of Plautus. He began to exhibit dramas in the third year after the death of Menander—that is, in B.C. 289. (Fragments in Meineke, Fr. Com. Gr.)—2. An epigrammatic poet of the Alexandrian period. His epigrams formed a part of the Garland of Meleager, and twenty-two of them are preserved in the Greek Anthology.

Posidonium (Ποσειδώνιον), the name of several promontories sacred to Poseidon. 1. (Punta della Licosia), in Lucania, opposite the island Leucosia, the S. point of the gulf of Paestum (Strab. p. 252).—2. In Epirus, opposite the N.E. point of Corcyra (Ptol. iii. 14, 4; Strab. p. 324).—3. (C. Stavros), in Thessaly, forming the W. point of the Sinus Pagasaeus. It is the promontory which Livy (xxxi. 46) calls Zelasion. (Strab. p. 330, 32; Ptol. iii. 13, 17).—4. (C. Helene), the SW. point of Chios (Strab. p. 644).—5. (Marmaras), on the SW. coast of Caria, between Miletus and the Iassius Sinus, with a town of the same name upon it (Strab. pp. 633, 651; Plin. v. 112).—6. On the W. coast of Arabia, with an altar dedicated to Poseidon by Ariston, whom Ptolemy had sent to explore the Arabian gulf (Diod. iii. 42; Strab. p. 776).—7. (Posseda), a seaport town in Syria, in the district Cassiotis (Strab. p. 751; Plin. v. 79).

Posidonia. [PAESTUM.]

Posidonium or Posidium (Ποσειδώνιον: C. Possidhi), a promontory on the SW. coast of the peninsula Pallene in Macedonia, not far from Mende (Thuc. iv. 129; Liv. xlv. 11).

Posidonius (Ποσειδώνιος), a distinguished Stoic philosopher, was a native of Apamea in Syria. The date of his birth is not known with any exactness, but it may be placed about B.C. 135. He studied at Athens under Panaetius, after whose death (112) Posidonius set out on his travels. After visiting most of the countries on the coast of the Mediterranean, he fixed his abode at Rhodes, where he became the president of the Stoic school. He also took a prominent part in the political affairs of Rhodes, and was sent as ambassador to Rome in 86. Cicero, when he visited Rhodes, received instruction from Posidonius (Cic. Tusc. ii. 25, N. D. i. 3, Fin. i. 2, ad Att. ii. 1; Plut. Cic. 4). Pompey also had a great admiration for Posidonius, and visited him twice, in 67 and 62 (Plut. Pomp. 42). To the occasion of his first visit probably belongs the story that Posidonius, to prevent the disappointment of his distinguished visitor, though severely afflicted with the gout, held a long discourse on the topic that pain is not an evil. In 51 Posidonius removed to Rome, and appears to have died soon after, at the age of eighty-four. Posidonius was a man of extensive and varied acquirements in almost all departments of human knowledge. Cicero thought so highly of his powers that he requested him to write an account of his consulship. As a physical investigator he was greatly superior to the Stoics generally, attaching himself in this respect rather to Aristotle. His geographical and historical knowledge was very extensive. He cultivated astronomy with considerable diligence. He also constructed a planetary machine, or revolving sphere, to exhibit the daily motions of the sun, moon, and planets. His calculation of the circumference of the earth differed widely from that of Eratosthenes. He made it only 180,000 stadia, and his measurement was pretty generally adopted. None of the writings of Posidonius has come down to us entire. His fragments are collected by Bake, Lugd. Bat. 1810.

Postūmia Castra (Salado), a fortress in Hispania Baetica, on a hill near the river Salsum (Bell. Hispan. 8).

Postūmia Gens, patrician, was one of the most ancient patrician gentes at Rome. Its members frequently held the highest offices of the state, from the banishment of the kings to the downfall of the republic. The most distinguished family in the gens was that of ALBUS or ALBINUS; but we also find early in the republic families of the names of Megellus and Tubertus (Liv. iv. 27, ix. 44). A Postumius Megellus was consul in 262, and took Agrigentum (Pol. i. 17).

Postūmus, whose full name was M. Cassianus Latinus Postumus, stands second in the list of the so-called Thirty Tyrants. Being nominated by Valerian governor of Gaul, he assumed the title of emperor in A.D. 258, while Valerian was prosecuting his campaign against the Persians. Postumus maintained a strong and just government, and preserved Gaul from the devastation of the warlike tribes upon the eastern border. After reigning nearly ten years, he was slain by his soldiers in 267, and Laelianus proclaimed emperor in his stead. (Trebell. Poll. Trig. Tyr. ii.; Aurel. Vict. Caes. 32; Oros. vii. 22.)

Postumus, M. Curtius, was made tribune of the soldiers by Caesar at the recommendation of Cicero (Cic. ad Q. Fr. ii. 15, iii. 1). He afterwards became a warm adherent of Caesar, and was disliked and suspected by Cicero, though sometimes courted by him (Cic. ad Att. ix. 2, 5, 6, xii. 49, xiv. 9, ad Fam. vi. 12).

Pōtāmi or Pōtāmus (Ποταμοί, Ποταμός: Ποτάμιος: Keratia), a demus in the S. of Attica, belonging to the tribe Leontis, where the tomb of Ion was shown (Paus. i. 31, 3; Strab. p. 398).

Pōtāmon (Ποτάμων). 1. A rhetorician of Mytilene, lived in the time of Tiberius Caesar, whose favour he enjoyed (Strab. p. 617).—2. A philosopher of Alexandria, who is said to have introduced at Rome an eclectic sect of philosophy. He appears to have lived at Rome a little before the time of Plotinus, and to have entrusted his children to the guardianship of the latter. (Suid. s.v.; Diog. Laërt. Proem. 21.)

Potentia (Potentinus; S. Maria di Potenza). 1. A town of Picenum on the river Flosis, between Ancona and Castellum Firmatum, was made a Roman colony in B.C. 184 (Liv. xxxix. 44; Vell. Pat. i. 15; Strab. p. 241).—2. (Potenza), a town of Lucania on the Via Popilia, E. of Forum Popili (Ptol. iii. 1, 70; Plin. iii. 98).

Pōthinus, a eunuch, the guardian of the young king Ptolemy, recommended the assassination of Pompey, when the latter fled to Egypt, B.C. 48. Pothinus plotted against Caesar when he came to Alexandria shortly afterwards, and was put to death by Caesar's order. (Caes. B. C. iii. 108, 112; Dio Cass. xlii. 39; Lucan. viii. 484, x. 333.)

sandra), a town in Macedonia on the narrow isthmus of the peninsula Pallene, was a strongly fortified place and one of considerable importance (Hdt. vii. 123; Thuc. i. 56, 63; Strab. p. 330, 25-28). It was a colony of the Corinthians, and must have been founded before the Persian wars, though the time of its foundation is not recorded. It afterwards became tributary to Athens, and its revolt from the latter city in B.C. 432 was one of the immediate causes of the Peloponnesian war. It was taken by the Athenians in 429 after a siege of more than two years, its inhabitants expelled, and their place supplied by Athenian colonists. (Thuc. ii. 58, 70, iv. 120.) In 356 it was taken by Philip, who destroyed the city and gave its territory to the Olynthians. Cassander, however, built a new city on the same site, to which he gave the name of Cassandrea (Κασσάνδρεια: Κασσανδρεῖς), and which he peopled with the remains of the old population and with the inhabitants of Olynthus and the surrounding towns, so that it soon became the most flourishing city in all Macedonia. (Dem. Phil. ii. p. 170; Strab. l. c.). It was taken and plundered by the Huns, but was restored by Justinian.

Potidania (Ποτιδανία), a fortress in the NE. of Aetolia, near the frontiers of Locris (Thuc. iii. 96; Liv. xxviii. 1).

Pötiti. [PINARIA GENS.]

Pötitus, the name of an ancient and celebrated family of the Valeria gens. This family disappears about the time of the Samnite wars, but the name was revived at a later period by the Valeria gens, as a praenomen: thus we find mention of a Potitus Valerius Messalla, who was consul suffectus in B.C. 29.

Potniae (Ποτνιαί: Ποτνιαῖς), a small town in Boeotia on the Asopus, ten stadia S. of Thebes, on the road to Plataea (Xen. Hell. v. 4, 51; Paus. ix. 8, 1). The adjective Potniades (sing. Potnias) is an epithet frequently given to the mares which tore to death Glaucus of Potniae. [GLAUCUS, No. 1.]

Praaspa. [PHERAATA.]

Practius (Πράκτιος: Bergas), a river of the Troad, rising in M. Ida, and flowing into the Hellespont, N. of Abydos (Il. ii. 835; Strab. p. 590; Arrian, An. i. 12, 6).

Praenestē (Praenestinus: Palestrina), one of the most ancient towns of Latium, was situated on a steep and lofty hill, about twenty miles SE. of Rome, with which it was connected by a road called Via Praenestina. It probably existed before the Greek colonisation, but it claimed a Greek origin, and was said to have been founded by Praenestus, the grandson of Odysseus (Steph. Byz. s. v.; Solin. 2, 9). Another tradition ascribed its foundation to Caeculus, son of Vulcan (Verg. Aen. vii. 678). Strabo speaks of it as a Greek town, and asserts that it was formerly called Πολυστέφανος, for which Pliny writes Stephane (Strab. p. 238; Plin. iii. 64). The traditions which imply a foundation by the earlier inhabitants of Italy are older and probably truer. Dionysius (v. 61) speaks of it as an important member of the Latin confederation. In very early times (from B.C. 499), according to Livy, it was an ally of Rome (Liv. ii. 19, iii. 8), but after the Gallic invasion appears as an enemy of the Romans, and, being strongly fortified by nature and by art, frequently resisted their attacks (Liv. vi. 21). After the Latin war Praeneste lost some territory, but remained nominally independent till after the Social war, when it received the franchise (App. B. C. i. 65) and became a Roman colony (Cic. Cat. i. 3). It was here that the younger Marius took refuge, and was for a considerable time besieged by Sulla's troops. Praeneste possessed a very celebrated and ancient temple of Fortuna, with an oracle, which is often mentioned under the name of Praenestinae sortes (Ov. Fast. vi. 61; Lucan, ii. 194; Cic. Div. ii. 41; FORTUNA). In consequence of its lofty situation Praeneste was a cool and healthy residence in the great heats of summer (frigidum Praeneste, Hor. Od. iii. 4, 22; Juv. iii. 190), and was therefore much frequented at that season by the wealthy Romans. The remains of the ancient walls and some other antiquities are still to be seen at Palestrina. The fragments of a Roman Calendar, called Fasti Praenestini, were found here in 1771, and are probably those which Verrius Flaccus set up in the forum of Praeneste (Suet. Gramm. 17; C. I. L. i. p. 311).

Praesus (Πραῖσος: Πραῖσιος), an inland town in the E. of Crete, belonging to the Eteocretes, which was destroyed by the neighbouring town of Hierapytna (Strab. pp. 475, 478).

Praetoria Augusta. [AUGUSTA, No. 4.]

Praetütii (Πραιτούττιοι), a tribe of Picenum, whose district lay on the N. side of the river Vomanus. Their chief city was Interamnium (Pol. iii. 88; Liv. xxii. 9; Plin. iii. 110).

Präs (Πράς, gen. Πρανός: Πράντες), a town of Thessaly, in the W. of the district Phthiotis, on the NE. slope of Mt. Narthacius (Xen. Hell. iv. 319).

Prasíae (Πρασιαί: Πρασιεύς). 1. Or Prasía (Πρασία), a town of the Eleuthero-lacones, on the E. coast of Laconia, was taken and destroyed by the Athenians in the second year of the Peloponnesian war (Thuc. ii. 56; Strab. pp. 368, 374; Paus. iii. 24, 3).—2. (Prassa), a demus in Attica, S. of Stiria, belonging to the tribe Pandionis, with a temple of Apollo (Thuc. viii. 95).

Prasías Lacus (Πρασιάς λίμνη: Batkovó), a lake in Thrace between the Strymon and Nestus, and near the Strymonic gulf, with silver mines in the neighbourhood.

Prasii, Praesii, and Parrhasii (Πράσιοι: Sanscrit, Prachinas, i.e. people of the E. country), a great and powerful people of India on the Ganges, governed at the time of Seleucus I. by king SANDROCOTTUS. Their capital city was Palibothra (Patna), and the extent of the kingdom seems to have embraced the whole valley of the upper Ganges, at least as far down as that city. At a later time the monarchy declined, so that in Ptolemy we only find the name as that of the inhabitants of a small district, called Prasiaca (Πρασιακή), about the river Soa (Strab. pp. 702, 703; Plin. vi. 68; Diod. xvii. 93; Curt. ix. 2; Plut. Alex. 62).

Prasōdis Mare (Πρασώδης θάλασσα or κόλπος), the SW. part of the Indian Ocean, about the promontory PRASUM.

Prasum (Πράσον ἀκρωτήριο: i.e. 'the green headland': C. Delgado), a promontory on the E. coast of Africa in 10½° S. lat., in the district Zingites (Zind), appears to have been the S.-most point to which the ancient knowledge of this coast extended.

Pratīnas (Πρατίνας), one of the early tragic poets at Athens whose combined efforts brought the art to its perfection, was a native of Phlius, and was therefore by birth a Dorian. It is not stated at what time he went to Athens, but he was older than Choerilus and younger than Aeschylus, with both of whom he competed for the prize in the seventieth Olympiad, according to Suidas, i.e. between 500 and 495 B.C. By the same writer he is said to have invented Satyric drama: that is to say, he introduced the practice of adding a satyr-play to be acted in connexion with the preceding tragedy or tragedies. The Chorus of Satyrs belonged to the earliest phase of drama, and it was possibly with the object of preserving this that he separated the satyr-chorus from the tragedy (as we should now understand it), and confined it to the lighter satyric drama. He is said to have written sixty plays, of which only scanty fragments remain. His satyric dramas were ranked by Pausanias next to those of Aeschylus (Paus. ii. 13, 6; Suid. s. v. Πραγῶρας). He also stood high as writer of lyrical pieces, of which fragments, one of some length, remain (Bergk, Poët. Lyr. 953).

Praxagōras (Πραγαγόρας), a celebrated physician, was a native of the island of Cos, and lived in the fourth century B.C. He belonged to the medical sect of the Dogmatici, and was celebrated for his knowledge of medical science in general, and especially for his attainments in anatomy and physiology. (Gal. ii. p. 905; Plin. xxvi. 10.)

Praxias (Πραξίας), an Athenian sculptor of the age of Phidias, but of the more archaic school of Calamis, commenced the execution of the statues in the pediments of the great temple of Apollo at Delphi—Artemis, Leto and Apollo with the Muses, Dionysus and the Thyiades, and Helios at his setting—but died while he was still engaged upon the work. His date may be placed about B.C. 448 and onwards. (Paus. x. 19, 3.)

Praxidicē (Πραξιδική), i.e. the goddess who carries out the objects of justice, or watches that justice is done to men. Sometimes Praxidice seems to be merely Dike herself, regarded as having attained her ends: for instance, when Menelaus arrived in Laconia, on his return from Troy, he set up a statue of Praxidice near Gytheum, not far from the spot where Paris, in carrying off Helen, had founded a sanctuary of Aphrodite Migonitis (Paus. iii. 22, 2). In other traditions there seems to have been (as so often appears in Greek mythology), a triad. These three Praxidicæ were workers of justice and had a shrine near Haliartus in Boeotia (Paus. ix. 33, 4). In some accounts they are daughters of Ogyges, and their names are Alalcomenia, Thelxinoia, and Aulis (Suid. s. v. Πραξιδική). Pausanias seems to connect the death of Sulla with the working of Alalcomenia in retribution for his severities in Greece (Paus. ix. 33, 6).

Praxilla (Πράξιλλα), of Sicyon, a lyric poetess, who flourished about B.C. 450, and was one of the nine poetesses who were distinguished as the Lyric Muses. Her scolia were among the most celebrated compositions of that species. She belonged to the Dorian school of lyric poetry, but there were also traces of Aeolic influence in her rhythms, and even in her dialect. (Suid. s. v.; Athen. p. 694; Paus. iii. 13, 3.)

Praxiphānes (Πραξιφάνης), a Peripatetic philosopher, a native either of Mytilene or of Rhodes, was a pupil of Theophrastus, and lived about B.C. 322. Epicurus is said to have been one of his pupils. Praxiphanes paid especial attention to grammatical studies, and is hence named along with Aristotle as the founder and creator of the science of grammar. (Clem. Alex. i. p. 365; Strab. p. 655.)

Praxitéles (Πραξιτέλης), one of the greatest Greek sculptors. He was a son of Cephisodotus, also a famous sculptor, and some modern writers argue (but not conclusively) that 'Pasiteles,' whom Pausanias (v. 20, 1) mentions as a sculptor of Paros, was really Praxiteles, and grandfather of the great sculptor. However that may be, Praxiteles was a citizen of Athens, born about 390 B.C., and contemporary with Scopas, with whom he stands at the head of the later Attic school, so called in contradistinction to the earlier Attic school of Phidias. Without attempting those sublime impersonations of divine majesty in which Phidias had been so inimitably successful, Praxiteles was unsurpassed in the exhibition of the softer beauties of the human form. While Phidias was supreme in his attainment of the grandest and noblest ideas, Praxiteles was equally so in his representation of beauty of face and form. In the estimation of ancient writers his most beautiful work was his marble statue of Aphrodite, which was distinguished from the other statues of the goddess by the name of the Cnidians, who purchased it (Plin. xxxvi. 20). The statue at Munich is a copy of this, and the Venus de' Medici is an imitation. [See cuts on p. 86.] It was always esteemed the most perfectly beautiful of the statues of the goddess. Many made the voyage to Cnidus expressly to behold it. So highly did the Cnidians themselves esteem their treasure, that when king Nicomedes offered them, as the price of it, to pay off the whole of their heavy public debt, they preferred to endure any suffering rather than part with the work which gave their city its chief renown. It was afterwards carried to Constantinople, where it perished by fire in the reign of Justinian (Zonar. xiv. 2). Praxiteles modelled it from Phryne, of whom also he made more than one portrait statue. His famous statue of Apollo Sauroctonos (Plin. xxxiv. 70), of a delicate and highly idealised beauty, is also represented by a copy. [See cut on p. 89.] Another of the celebrated works of Praxiteles was his statue of Eros (Paus. ix. 27, 3; Cic. Verr. iv. 2, 4). It was preserved at Thespiae where it was dedicated by Phryne; and an interesting story is told of the manner in which she became possessed of it. Praxiteles had promised to give Phryne whichever of his works she might choose, but he was unwilling to tell her which of them, in his own opinion, was the best. To discover this, she sent a slave to tell Praxiteles that a fire had broken out in his house, and that most of his works had already perished. On hearing this message, the artist rushed out, exclaiming that all his toil was lost if the fire had touched his Satyr or his Eros. Upon this Phryne confessed the stratagem, and chose the Eros. This statue was removed to Rome by Caligula, restored to Thespiae by Claudius, and carried back by Nero to Rome, where it stood in Pliny's time in the schools of Octavia, and it finally perished in the fire which destroyed that building in the reign of Titus. (Paus. i. 20, 2; Dio Cass. lxxvi. 24.) Of the Satyr of Praxiteles a copy exists in the statue of the Faun in the Capitol at Rome. But, above all, since the discovery of the Hermes at Olympia, the supreme skill of Praxiteles in delineating beauty of form can be seen in an original work. This statue, which represented Apollo bearing the infant Dionysus on his left arm, and holding up (probably) a bunch of grapes in his right hand (Paus. v. 17, 3), was found by the German archaeologists in 1877, fairly preserved, and is now in the museum at Olympia.—Praxiteles had two sons, who were also distinguished sculptors, Timarchus and Cephisodotus.

Praxithēa (Πραξιθέα), daughter of Phrasimachus and Diogenia, was the wife of Erechtheus, and mother of Cecrops, Pandorus, Metion, Orneus, Procris, Creusa, Chthonia, and Orithyia. [ERECOTHEUS.]

Preciāni, a people in Gallia Aquitania at the foot of the Pyrenees (Caes. B. G. iii. 27).

Prelūs, or Prilius Lacus (Lago di Castiglione), a lake in Etruria near the coast, between Vetulonia and Rusellae. It was fed and drained by a river of the same name. (Cic. Mil. 27; Plin. iii. 51.)

Premnis, Premis, or Primis (Πρημνίς; Ibrim), a town on the Nile in Aethiopia near the limit of the Roman empire, which was taken by Petronius in his expedition (Strab. p. 820; Ptol. iv. 7, 19; Plin. vi. 181).

Prēpēsīnthus (Πρεπείσινθος; Despotiko), one of the smaller Cyclades, between OIAROS and Siphnos (Strab. p. 485).

Priāmides, that is, a son of Priam, by which name Hector, Paris, Helenus, Deiphobus, and the other sons of Priam, are called.

Priāmus (Πρίαμος), the king of Troy at the time of the Trojan war. He was a son of Laomedon and Strymo or Placia. His original name is said to have been Podarces, i.e. 'the swift-footed,' which was changed into Priamus, 'the ransomed' (from πρίαιμι), because he was the only surviving son of Laomedon and was ransomed by his sister Hesione after he had fallen into the hands of Heracles. He is said to have been first married to Arisbe, the daughter of Merops, by whom he became the father of Aesacus [ARISBE]; but afterwards he gave up Arisbe to Hyrtacus, and married Hecuba, by whom he had the following children: Hector, Alexander or Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus, Pammon, Polites, Antiphus, Hipponous, Polydorus, Troilus, Creusa, Laodice, Polyxena, and Cassandra. By other women he had a great many children besides. According to the Homeric tradition, he was the father of fifty sons (nineteen of whom were children of Hecuba), to whom others add an equal number of daughters. (Il. xxiv. 495.) In the earlier part of his reign, Priam is said to have supported the Phrygians in their war against the Amazons (Il. iii. 184; AMAZONES). When the Greeks landed on the Trojan coast Priam was already advanced in years, and took no active part in the war (Il. xxiv. 487). Once only did he venture upon the field of battle, to conclude the agreement respecting the single combat between Paris and Menelaus (Il. iii. 250). After the death of Hector, Priam, accompanied by Hermes, went to the tent of Achilles to ransom his son's body for burial and obtained it. His death is not mentioned by Homer, but is related by later poets. When the Greeks entered Troy, the aged king put on his armour, and was on the point of rushing against the enemy, but he was prevailed on by Hecuba to take refuge with herself and her daughters, as a suppliant at the altar of Zeus. While he was tarrying in the temple, his son Polites, pursued by Pyrrhus, rushed into the sacred spot, and expired at the feet of his father, whereupon Priam, overcome with indignation, hurled his spear with feeble hand against Pyrrhus, but was forthwith killed by the latter. (Eur. Troad. 17; Verg. Aen. ii. 512.)—Virgil mentions (Aen. v. 564) another Priam, a son of Polites, and a grandson of king Priam. [Dict. of Ant. art. Trojae Ludus.]

Priānsus (Πριάσος; Πριάσιος, Πριάσειός), a town in Crete on the S. coast nearly due S. of Gnosus and E. of Leben, confounded by Strabo with PRAESUS (Strab. p. 478). Its name appears on coins and in inscriptions.

Priāpus (Πρίαπος), son of Dionysus and Aphrodite. It is said that Aphrodite, who was in love with Dionysus, went to meet the god on his return from India, but soon abandoned him, and proceeded to Lampsacus on the Hellespont, to give birth to the child of the god. Hera caused her to give birth to a child of extreme ugliness, who was named Priapus. (Paus. ix. 31, 2; Steph. Byz. s.v. Ἀβάρρος, Ἀδύψακος.) According to Strabo (p. 587) he was son of Dionysus and a nymph. The earliest Greek poets do not mention this divinity. He was worshipped more especially at Lampsacus, Parium, and Cyzicus on the Hellespont, whence he is sometimes called Hellespontiacus. (Catull. 18; Verg. Georg. iv. 110.) The true account seems to be that Priapus was originally worshipped under the image of the phallus as the deity who gave fertility, especially to gardens, vineyards, and all trees. Hence he was identified with Dionysus and the Asiatic Bacchic rites, and thereupon was in myth represented as a son of Dionysus when the worship of that god prevailed, but sometimes as Dionysus himself under another name (Athen. p. 30). In some rites he was connected with other gods of fertility, Hermes and Eros; and also with Silenus (whence the ass was sacrificed to both). He was regarded as the promoter of fertility, not only in vegetation, but also in all animals connected with an agricultural life; and in this capacity he was worshipped as the protector of flocks of sheep and goats, of bees, of the vine, of all garden produce, and even of fishing. The worship of Priapus was accepted in Italy with that of Dionysus and Aphrodite, and he was regarded especially as the protector of gardens, in which his image was commonly placed. (Verg. l.c.; Hor. Sat. i. 8; Plin. xix. 50; C. I. L. vi. 564.) In mystic theology he was recognised as symbolising the doctrine of regeneration and future life; whence his image was placed on tombs, and he appears in sepulchral inscriptions—'Deus Priapus ego sum mortis et vitae locus' (Henzen, 5756; C. I. L. v. 3634). The sacrifices offered to him consisted of the first-fruits of gardens, vineyards, and fields; of milk, honey, cakes; rams, asses, and fishes. He was represented in carved images, mostly in the form of hermae, or carrying fruit in his garment, with either a sickle or cornucopia in his hand. The hermae of Priapus in Italy, like those of other rustic divinities, were usually painted red; whence the god is called ruber or rubicundus.

Priāpus (Πρίαπος, Ion. Πρίηπος: Πριαπηνός; Karaboa, Ru.), a city of Mysia, on the Propontis, E. of Parium, with a small but excellent harbour. It was a colony of the Milesians, and a chief seat of the worship of PRIAPUS. The surrounding district was called Priāpis (Πριαπίς) and Priapēne (Πριαπηνή). (Thuc. viii. 107; Strab. p. 587; Plin. v. 141.)

Priēnē (Πρίηνη: Πριηνεύς, Πριήνιος: Priēneus, pl. Priēnenses; Samsun, Ru.), one of the twelve Ionian cities on the coast of Asia Minor, stood in the NW. corner of Caria, at the S. foot of M. Mycale, and on the N. side of the Sinus Latinicus (Hdt. i. 142, vi. 6). Its foundation was ascribed mythically to the Neleid Aepytus, in conjunction with Cadmeans, from whom it was also called Καδμή (Paus. vii. 2, 7; Strab. p. 636). It stood originally on the seashore, and had two harbours and a small fleet, but the change in the coast by the alluvial deposits of the Maeander left it some distance inland (Strab. p. 579). It was of much religious importance in connexion with the Panionian festival on M. Mycale, at which the people of Priene took precedence in virtue of their being the supposed descendants of those of Helice in Greece Proper (Strab. p. 639). The city was also celebrated as the birthplace of BIAS.

Priferum, a town of the Vestini on the E. coast of central Italy.

Primus, M. Antōnius, a native of Tolosa in Gaul, was condemned for forgery (falsum) in the reign of Nero, was expelled the senate, of which he was a member, and was banished from the city. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 40; Dio Cass. lv. 9.) After the death of Nero (68), he was restored to his former rank by Galba, and appointed to the command of the seventh legion, which was stationed in Pannonia. He was one of the first generals in Europe who declared in favour of Vespasian; and he rendered him the most important services. In conjunction with the governors of Moesia and Pannonia, he invaded Italy, gained a decisive victory over the Vitellian army at Bedriacum, and took Cremona, which he allowed his soldiers to pillage and destroy. (Tac. Hist. ii. 86, iii., iv.; Dio Cass. lxx. 9–18.) He afterwards forced his way into Rome, notwithstanding the obstinate resistance of the Vitellian troops, and had the government of the city till the arrival of Mucianus from Syria. [MUCIANUS, No. 2.] We learn from Martial, who was a friend of Antonius Primus, that he was alive at the accession of Trajan (Mart. x. 23).

Prisciānus, a Roman grammarian, surnamed Caesariensis, because he was born at Caesarea in Mauretania. He lived in the sixth cent. A.D., in the reign of Anastasius, and taught grammar at Constantinople. He was celebrated for the extent and depth of his grammatical knowledge, of which he has left the evidence in his work on the subject, entitled Commentariorum grammaticorum Libri XVIII, addressed to his friend and patron, the consul Julianus. The first sixteen books treat upon the eight parts of speech recognised by the ancient grammarians, letters, syllables, &c. The last two books are on syntax. This treatise soon became the standard work on Latin grammar, and in the epitome of Rabanus Maurus obtained an extensive circulation. His terminology forms the basis of much that is still maintained. His work is also valuable for its citations from ancient writers. Of the earlier grammarians those whom he chiefly follows are the Greek writer Apollonius and the Latin Flavius Caper. The other works of Priscianus still extant are:—(1) A grammatical catechism on twelve lines of the Aeneid, manifestly intended as a school book. (2) A treatise on accents. (3) A treatise on the symbols used to denote numbers and weights, and on coins and numbers. (4) On the metres of Terence. (5) A translation of the Προγυμνάσματα (Praeexercitamenta) of Hermogenes. (6) On the declensions of nouns. (7) A poem on the emperor Anastasius in 312 hexameters, with a preface in twenty-two iambic lines. (8) A piece De Ponderibus et Mensuris, in verse. (9) An Epitome phaenomenon, or De Sideribus, in verse. (10) A free translation of the Periegesis of Dionysius in 1427 lines, manifestly made for the instruction of youth. (11) A couple of epigrams.—The best edition of Priscianus is by Krehl, Lips. 1819–20, 2 vols. 8vo, and in Keil's Gramm. Lat. 1855.

Priscianus Lydus, a writer of the Neo-Platonic school of philosophy in the reign of Justinian. When that emperor suppressed the schools of philosophy at Athens, Priscian with six others went to the court of Chosroes, whose intercession secured their safe return to Greece. Priscian wrote a paraphrase and commentary on the physics of Theophrastus (Metaphrasis in Theophrastum), and answers (solutiones) to questions on philosophy proposed by Chosroes. All that remains of his works has been edited by I. Bywater, Berlin, 1886.

Prisciānus, Theodōrus, a physician, and a pupil of Vindicianus, lived in the fourth century after Christ. He is supposed to have lived at the court of Constantinople, and to have attained the dignity of Archiater. He is the author of a Latin work, entitled Rerum Medicarum Libri Quatuor, published in 1532, both at Strasburg and at Basel.

Priscus (Πρίσκος), a Byzantine historian, was a native of Panium in Thrace, and was one of the ambassadors sent by Theodosius the Younger to Attila, A.D. 445. He died about 471. Priscus wrote an account of his embassy to Attila, enriched by digressions on the life and reign of that king. The work was in eight books, but only fragments of it have come down to us. Priscus was an excellent and trustworthy historian, and his style was remarkably elegant and pure.—The fragments are published by Bekker and Niebuhr, 1829; and by Müller, Fragm. Hist. Graec.

Priscus, Helvidius, son-in-law of Thrasea Paetus, and, like him, distinguished by his love of virtue, philosophy, and liberty. He was quaestor in Achaia during the reign of Nero, and tribune of the plebs A.D. 56. When Thrasea was put to death by Nero (66), Priscus was banished from Italy. He was recalled to Rome by Galba (68); but in consequence of his freedom of speech and love of independence, he was again banished by Vespasian, and was shortly afterwards put to death by order of this emperor. (Tac. Ann. iv. 5, 43, Dial. 5; Suet. Vesp. 15; Dio Cass. lvi. 12.) His life was written by Herennius Senecio at the request of his widow, Fannia; and the tyrant Domitian, in consequence of this work, subsequently put Senecio to death, and sent Fannia into exile (Plin. Ep. vii. 19, 5; Dio Cass. lvii. 13). Priscus left a son, Helvidius, who was put to death by Domitian.

Priscus, Servilius. The Prisci were an ancient family of the Servilia gens, and filled the highest offices of the state during the early years of the republic. They also bore the agnomen of Structus, which is always appended to their name in the Fasti, till it was supplanted by that of Fidenas, which was first obtained by Q. Servilius Priscus Structus, who took Fidenae in his dictatorship, B.C. 435, and which was also borne by his descendants.

Priscus, Tarquinius. [TARQUINIUS.]

Prista (Πρίστη: Rustschuk), a town in Moesia on the Danube (Ptol. iii. 10, 10).

Privernum (Privernas, -ātis: Piperno), an ancient town of Latium on the river Amasenus, belonged to the Volscians (Verg. Aen. xi. 540). It was conquered by the Romans at an early period, and was subsequently made a colony (Liv. vii. 42, viii. 11).

Prōaerēsīus (Προαιρέσιος), a teacher of rhetoric, was a native of Armenia, and was born about A.D. 276. He first studied at Antioch under Ulpian, and afterwards at Athens under Julianus. He became at a later time the chief teacher of rhetoric at Athens, and enjoyed a high reputation. He died 368, in his ninety-second year. (Suid. s.v.; Vit. Soph. i. p. 73.)

Probalinthus (Προβαλίνθος: Προβαλίσσιος), a demus in Attica, S. of Marathon, belonging to the tribe Pandionis (Strab. p. 383).

Probatia (Προβαρία), a river of Boeotia, which, after passing Lebadea, and receiving its tributary the Hercyna, flowed into the lake Copais.

Prōbus, Aemilius. [NEPOS, CORNELIUS.]

Prōbus, M. Aurēlius, Roman emperor A.D.

276–282, was a native of Sirmium in Pannonia, and rose to distinction by his military abilities. He was appointed by the emperor Tacitus governor of the whole East, and, upon the death of that sovereign, the purple was forced upon his acceptance by the armies of Syria. The downfall of Florianus speedily removed his own rival [FLORIANUS], and he was enthusiastically hailed by the united voice of the senate, the people, and the legions. The reign of Probus presents a series of the most brilliant achievements. He defeated the barbarians on the frontiers of Gaul and Illyricum, and in other parts of the Roman empire, and put down the rebellions of Saturninus at Alexandria, and of Proculus and Bonosus in Gaul. But, after crushing all external and internal foes, he was killed at Sirmium by his own soldiers, who had risen in mutiny against him because he had employed them in laborious public works. Probus was as just and virtuous as he was warlike, and is deservedly regarded as one of the greatest and best of the Roman emperors. (Life in Script. Hist. Aug.; Zosim. i. 64.)

Prōbus, Vālērīus. 1. Of Berytus, a Roman grammarian, who lived in the time of Nero. His chief works were editions of Lucretius, Virgil, Horace and Persius with annotations, which he wrote frequently in shorthand (notae). The Life of Persius is taken from his edition. Much of his criticism was given orally and preserved by his pupils. (Gell. ix. 9, 12, xiii. 21; Suet. Gramm. 24; Mart. iii. 2, 12; Serv. ad Georg. i. 277.) To this Probus we may assign those annotations on Terence from which fragments are quoted in the Scholia on the dramatist.—2. Under the same name appears a grammatical treatise of no great value called Grammaticae Institutiones. Since it speaks of the Baths of Diocletian it cannot be dated before the fourth century. He may possibly be the Probus who was a friend and correspondent of Lactantius.

Prōcas, one of the fabulous kings of Alba Longa, succeeded Aventinus, and reigned twenty-three years: he was the father of Numitor and Amulius (Liv. i. 3).

Prōchŷta (Procida), an island off the coast of Campania near the promontory Misenum, is said to have been torn away by an earthquake either from this promontory or from the neighbouring island of Pithecusa or Aenaria (Strab. pp. 60, 123, 248, 258; Plin. ii. 203; Verg. Aen. ix. 715; Ov. Met. xiv. 89).

Procles (Προκλῆς), one of the twin sons of Aristodemus. For details see EURYSTHENES.

Proclus (Πρόκλος)—surnamed Diadochos (Διάδοχος), the Successor, from his being regarded as the genuine successor of Plato in doctrine—was one of the most celebrated teachers of the Neo-Platonic school. He was born at Byzantium A.D. 410, but was brought up at Xanthus in Lycia, to which city his parents belonged, and which Proclus himself regarded as his native place. He studied at Alexandria under Olympiodorus, and afterwards at Athens under Plutarchus and Syrianus. At an early age his philosophical attainments attracted the attention and admiration of his contemporaries. He had written his commentary on the Timaeus of Plato, as well as many other treatises, by his twenty-eighth year. On the death of Syrianus Proclus succeeded him in his school, and inherited from him the house in which he resided and taught. Marinus in his Life of Proclus records, with intense admiration, the perfection to which his master attained in all virtues. The highest of these virtues were, in the estimation of Marinus, those of a purifying and ascetic kind. From animal food he almost totally abstained; fasts and vigils he observed with scrupulous exactitude. The reverence with which he honoured the sun and moon would seem to have been unbounded. He celebrated all the important religious festivals of every nation, himself composing hymns in honour, not only of Grecian deities, but of those of other nations also. It was of course not surprising that such a man should be favoured with various apparitions and miraculous interpositions of the gods. He used to tell how a god had once appeared and proclaimed to him the glory of the city. But the still higher grade of what, in the language of the school, was termed the theurgic virtue he obtained by his profound meditations on the oracles, and the Orphic and Chaldaic mysteries, into the highest secrets of which he was initiated by Asclepigenia, the daughter of Plutarchus, who alone was in complete possession of the theurgic knowledge and discipline, which had descended to her from the great Nestorius. He profited so much by her instructions, as to be able, according to Marinus, to call down rain in a time of drought, to stop an earthquake, and to procure the immediate intervention of Asclepius to cure the daughter of his friend Archiadas. Proclus died A.D. 485. During the last five years of his life he had become superannuated, his strength having been exhausted by his fastings and other ascetic practices. As a philosopher Proclus enjoyed the highest celebrity among his contemporaries and successors, but his writings are characterised by vagueness, and mysticism. His main object was to systematise and bring into a complete form the theological and cosmological tenets handed down by preceding Neo-Platonists, especially those of Plotinus and Iamblichus.—The edition of Cousin (Paris, 6 vols. 8vo, 1820–1827) contains the following treatises of Proclus:—On Providence and Fate; On Ten Doubts about Providence; On the Nature of Evil; a Commentary on the Alcibiades, and a Commentary on the Parmenides. The other principal works of Proclus are:—On the Theology of Plato, in six books: Theological Elements: a Commentary on the Timaeus of Plato; five Hymns of an Orphic character. Proclus was also a mathematician and grammarian. His Commentaries on the first book of Euclid, and on the Works and Days of Hesiod, are still extant.

Procnē (Πρόκνη), daughter of king Pandion of Athens, and wife of Tereus. Her story is given under TEREUS.

Proconnessus (Προκόννησος, or Προικόννησος, i.e. Fawn-island, Marmara), an island of the Propontis (Sea of Marmara), off the N. coast of Mysia, NW. of the peninsula of Cyzicus or Dolionis. A neighbouring island was called Elaphonnesus (Ἐλαφόννησος, i.e. Deer-island); and the two were distinguished by the names of Old and New Proconnessus. (Strab. pp. 587, 589; Scyl. p. 35; Hdt. iv. 14, vi. 33.) Pliny (v. 151) considers the two names to belong to the same island. The island was celebrated for its marble, and hence its modern name. It was the native place of the poet ARISTEAS.

Procopius (Προκόπιος). 1. A native of Cilicia, and a relative of the emperor Julian, served with distinction under Constantius II. and Julian. Having incurred the suspicions of Jovian and of his successor Valens, Procopius remained in concealment for about two years; but in A.D. 365 he was proclaimed emperor at Constantinople, while Valens was staying at Caesarea in Cappadocia. Both parties prepared for war. In the following year (366) the forces of Procopius were defeated in two great battles. Procopius himself was taken prisoner, and put to death by order of Valens.—2. An eminent Byzantine historian, was born at Caesarea in Palestine about A.D. 500. He went to Constantinople when still a young man, and there obtained so much distinction as an advocate and a professor of eloquence, that he attracted the attention of Belisarius, who appointed him his secretary in 527. In this capacity Procopius accompanied the great hero on his different wars in Asia, Africa, and Italy, being frequently employed in state business of importance, or in conducting military expeditions. Procopius returned with Belisarius to Constantinople a little before 542. His eminent talents were appreciated by the emperor Justinian, who conferred upon him the title of illustris, made him a senator, and in 562 created him prefect of Constantinople. Procopius died about the same time as Justinian, 565.—As a historian Procopius deserves great praise. His style is good, and generally full of vigour. His works are:—(1) Histories (Ἱστορίαι), in eight books; viz. two On the Persian War, containing the period from 408–553, and treating more fully of the author's own times; two On the War with the Vandals, 395–545; four On the Gothic War, or properly speaking, only three books, the fourth (eighth) being a sort of supplement containing various matters, and going down to the beginning of 553. It was continued by Agathias till 559. The work is extremely interesting; the descriptions of the habits &c. of the barbarians are faithful and done in a masterly style.—(2) On the Public Buildings erected by Justinian (Κτίσματα), in six books: a work equally interesting and valuable in its kind, though overloaded with flattery of the emperor.—(3) Anecdota (Ἀνέκδοτα), a collection of anecdotes, some of them witty and pleasant, but others most indecent, reflecting upon Justinian, the empress Theodora, Belisarius, and other eminent persons. It is a complete Chronique Scandaleuse of the court of Constantinople, from 549 till 562.—(4) Orationes, probably extracts from the History, which is rather overstocked with harangues and speeches.—The collected works of Procopius are edited by Dindorf, Bonn, 3 vols. 8vo, 1833–1838.

Procrustes (Προκρούστης), that is, 'the Stretcher,' a surname of the famous robber Polypemon or Damastes. He used to tie all travellers who fell into his hands upon a bed: if they were shorter than the bed, he stretched their limbs till they were of the same length; if they were longer than the bed, he made them of the same size by cutting off some of their limbs. He was slain by Theseus, on the Cephissus in Attica. The bed of Procrustes has passed into a proverb. [THESEUS.]

C. Proculeius, a Roman eque, one of the friends of Augustus, was sent by the latter, after the victory at Actium, to Antony and Cleopatra (Plut. Ant. 78). It is of this Proculeius that Horace speaks (Od. ii. 2). He is said to have divided his property with his brothers (perhaps cousins) Caepio and Murena, who had lost their property in the civil wars. [MURENA.] Proculeius put an end to his life by taking gypsum, when suffering from a disease in the stomach.

Proculus, the jurist, was the contemporary of the jurist Nerva the younger, who was probably the father of the emperor Nerva (Pompon. Dig. i. 2, 2, 52). The fact that Proculus gave his name to the school or sect (Proculiani or Proculiani, as the name is also written), which was opposed to that of the Sabiniani, shows that he was a jurist of note. Proculus is often cited, and there are thirty-seven extracts from him in the Digest from his eight books of Epistulae. He appears to have written notes on Labeo. Some writers suppose that Proculus is the Licinius Proculus who was praefectus praetorio under Otho.

Proculus, Julius, a Roman senator, is said in the legend of Romulus to have informed the sorrowing Roman people, after the strange departure of their king from the world, that Romulus had descended from heaven and appeared to him, bidding him tell the people to honour him in future as a god under the name of Quirinus. [ROMULUS.]

Prodicus (Πρόδικος), the celebrated sophist, was a native of Iulis in the island of Ceos (Plat. Protag. p. 315). He lived in the time of the Peloponnesian war and subsequently; but the date cannot be determined either of his birth or of his death. Prodicus came frequently to Athens on the public business of his native city. He is mentioned in the Clouds of Aristophanes, which belongs to B.C. 423; he was one of the teachers of Isocrates, and he was alive at the time of the death of Socrates (399). (Plat. Apol. p. 19.) It is probable that no weight should be attached to the statement of Suidas that Prodicus was put to death by the Athenians as a corrupter of the youth. He is mentioned both by Plato and Xenophon with more respect than the other sophists. Like Protagoras and others he travelled through Greece, delivering lectures for money, and in this way he amassed a large fortune (Xen. Symp. iv. 62). He paid especial attention to the correct use of words, and some have supposed this to be mere idle hair-splitting; yet it is possible that, though he was ridiculed for it by Plato, he may have done service thereby to dialectics. (Plat. Euthyd. p. 277, Cratyl. p. 384, Charmid. p. 163.) We have the substance of one of his lectures preserved by Xenophon in the well-known fable called 'The Choice of Heracles' [see p. 395, b], and it must be confessed that its teaching is such as to raise, not to debase, the minds of the youth.

Proërna (Πρόερνα: Gynaekokastro), a town of southern Thessaly, SW. of Pharsalus, on the W. slope of M. Narthacius, near the sources of the Apidanus (Strab. p. 434; Liv. xxxvi. 14).

Proetides. [PROETUS.]

Proetus (Προῖτος), son of Abas and Ocalea, and twin-brother of Acrisius. In the dispute between the two brothers for the kingdom of Argos, Proetus was expelled (Paus. ii. 25, 7), whereupon he fled to Iobates in Lycia, whose daughter, Antea or Sthenoboea, he married (Il. vi. 160; Serv. ad Ecl. vi. 48). With the assistance of Iobates, Proetus was restored to his kingdom, and took Tiryns, which was now fortified by the Cyclopes. [TIRYNS.] Acrisius then shared his kingdom with his brother, surrendering to him Tiryns, Midea and the coast of Argolis (Paus. ii. 16, 2). By his wife Proetus, besides a son Megapenthes, had three daughters, Lysippe, Iphinoë, and Iphianassa, who are often mentioned under the general name of Pro-

tides. When these daughters arrived at the age of maturity, they were stricken with madness, the cause of which is differently related. Some say that it was a punishment inflicted upon them by Dionysus, because they had despised his worship (Apollod. ii. 4, 1; Diod. iv. 68); others relate that they were driven mad by Hera, because they presumed to consider themselves more handsome than the goddess, or because they had stolen some of the gold of her statue (Serv. l.c.). It is clear from the passage in Virgil (Ecl. vi. 48) that in some traditions their madness took the form of their imagining themselves to be cows. It seems not unlikely that this story may have grown out of some old custom in the locality of women who worshipped Hera putting horns on their heads to symbolise the goddess of the crescent moon [see p. 394, a]; whence the tradition may have survived of women driven by Hera into this form of madness. The frenzy spread to the other women of Argos, till at length Proetus agreed to divide his kingdom between Melampus and his brother Bias, upon the former promising that he would cure the women of their madness. Melampus then chose the most robust among the young men, gave chase to the mad women, amid shouting and dancing, and drove them as far as Sicyon. During this pursuit, Iphinoë died, but the two other daughters were cured by Melampus by means of purifications, and were then married to Melampus and Bias. (Hdt. ix. 34.) The place where the cure was effected upon his daughters is not the same in all traditions, some mentioning the well Anigros, others the fountain Clitor in Arcadia, or Lusi in Arcadia (Strab. p. 436; Paus. viii. 18, 3; Ov. Met. xv. 325). Another and still more famous story tells that when Bellerophon came to Proetus to be purified of a murder which he had committed, the wife of Proetus fell in love with him; but, as Bellerophon declined her advances, she charged him before Proetus with having tried to seduce her. Proetus then sent Bellerophon to Iobates in Lycia, with a letter desiring him to murder Bellerophon. [BELLEROPHON.]—According to Ovid (Met. v. 238) Acrisius was expelled from his kingdom by Proetus, and Perseus, the grandson of Acrisius, avenged his grandfather by turning Proetus into stone by means of the head of Medusa. [PERSEUS.]

Prōmētheus (Προμηθεύς), according to the Greek genealogies son of the Titan Iapetus and Clymene, and brother of Atlas, Menoetius, and Epimetheus (Hes. Th. 508). Other accounts make his mother Asia, one of the Oceanides (Apollod. i. 2, 2; Lycophr. 1283). Aeschylus, with a deeper allegorical meaning, makes him the son of Themis (Aesch. Pr. 18, 207). Prometheus was beyond all doubt originally a god of fire, akin to Hephaestus, with whom and with Athene he was closely connected in ritual at Athens. Thus Prometheus and Hephaestus were worshipped at a common altar in the sanctuary of Athene in the Academy, and it is said that in the sculptures there Prometheus was represented as the superior of the two fire-gods, holding the sceptre (Schol. ad Soph. Oed. Col. 55). All three deities, because they were deities of light and fire, were honoured with a torch-race [Dict. of Ant. art. Lampadedromia]. And as fire was regarded as the source of all crafts and inventions (cf. Plin. xxxvi. 200), so all three deities were patrons of handicrafts, and Prometheus, like Athene, was specially gifted with wisdom (whence his name, which signified 'forethought'). But from this original conception of the fire-god sprang many myths, some bearing all the marks of old popular stories, which were gradually welded into a more or less consecutive story by the poets. It may be seen that the name of the god πυρφόρος, 'the fire-bringer' (cf. Soph. O. C. 56), provided a starting-point for the myth of the robbery of fire from heaven. The story of Hesiod is as follows. Once, in the reign of Zeus, when gods and men were disputing with one another at Mecone (afterwards Sicyon), Prometheus, with a view of deceiving Zeus, cut up a bull and divided it into two parts: he wrapped up the best parts and the intestines in the skin, and at the top he placed the stomach, which is one of the worst parts, while the second heap consisted of the bones covered with fat. (It may be noticed that the office of presiding at sacrifice belonged to Prometheus as fire-god.) When Zeus pointed out to him how badly he had made the division, Prometheus desired him to choose, but Zeus, seeing through the stratagem of Prometheus, chose the heap of bones covered with the fat. The father of the gods avenged himself by withholding fire from mortals, but Prometheus stole it in a hollow tube (ῥάβδις, ferula). This fire he stole from the hearth of Zeus (Hes. Op. 51), or from the lightning (Lucret. v. 1090), or from the sun (Serv. ad Ecl. vi. 42), or from the workshop of Hephaestus and Athene (Plat. Protag. p. 321). Zeus thereupon chained Prometheus to a pillar, where an eagle consumed in the daytime his liver, which was restored in each succeeding night. Prometheus was thus exposed to perpetual torture; but Heracles killed the eagle and delivered the sufferer, with the consent of Zeus, who in this way had an opportunity of allowing his son to gain immortal fame. Further, in order to punish men Zeus gave Pandora as a present to Epimetheus, in consequence of which diseases and sufferings of every kind befell mortals. [For details, see PANDORA.] This is an outline of the legend about Prometheus, as contained in the poems of Hesiod. (Hes. Th. 521, Op. 47; cf. Hyg. Ast. ii. 15; Apollod. ii. 5, 11.)—Aeschylus, in his trilogy Prometheus, added various new features to this legend. Although Prometheus belonged to the Titans, he is nevertheless represented by Aeschylus as having assisted Zeus against the Titans (218). But when Zeus wanted to extirpate the whole race of man, whose place he proposed to fill by an entirely new race of beings, Prometheus prevented the execution of the scheme, and saved mankind from destruction (228). Prometheus further deprived them of their knowledge of the future, and gave them hope instead. He taught them the use of fire, made them acquainted with architecture, astronomy, mathematics, writing, the treatment of domestic animals, navigation, medicine, the art of prophecy, working in metal, and all the other arts (248, 445). But, as he had acted in all these things contrary to the will of Zeus, the latter ordered Hephaestus to chain him to a rock in Scythia, which was done in the presence of Cratos and Bia, two ministers of Zeus. Prometheus, however, still continued to defy Zeus, and declared that there was a decree of fate, according to which Zeus was destined to be dethroned by his own son. As Prometheus steadfastly refused to give any explanation of this decree, Zeus hurled him into Tartarus, together with the rock to which he was chained. After the lapse of a long time, Prometheus returned to the upper world, to endure a fresh course of suffering, for he was now fastened to Mt. Caucasus, and his liver devoured by an eagle, as related in the Hesiodic legend. (It is remarkable that the natives of the Caucasus still have a tradition that a giant dwells on the summit of Mt. Elbruz: but the eagle has been transformed into a cock which visits him every morning at sunrise.) The state of suffering was to last for Prometheus until some other god, of his own accord, should take his place, and descend into Tartarus for him (1025). This came to pass after Heracles had slain the eagle, when Chiron, who had been incurably wounded, desired to go into Hades, and Zeus allowed him to supply the place of Prometheus (Apollod. ii. 5, 4). According to other accounts, Zeus himself delivered Prometheus, after the Titan had been at length prevailed upon to reveal to Zeus the decree of fate, which was that, if he should become by Thetis the father of a son, that son should deprive him of the sovereignty (Apollod. iii. 13, 5; Hyg. Fab. 54). There was also a legend which related that Prometheus had created man out of earth and water, either at the very beginning of the human race, or after the flood of Deucalion, when Zeus is said to have ordered him and Athene to make men out of the mud, and the winds to breathe life into them. Prometheus is said to have given to men a portion of all the qualities possessed by the other animals (Hor. Od. i. 16, 13; Apollod. i. 7, 1; Ov. Met. i. 81). The kind of earth out of which Prometheus formed men was shown in later times near Panopeus in Phocis (Paus. x. 4, 3).

Prōmōna (Πρωμόνα: Petrovacz), a mountain fortress of the Liburni at the N. of Dalmatia, between Burnum and Salona. Its name is preserved in the hill called now Promina, and its site may be the modern Dernis (App. Illyr. 12, 2).

Prōnapīdes (Προναπίδης), an Athenian, is said to have been the teacher of Homer. He is enumerated among those who used the Pelasgic letters, before the introduction of the Phoenician, and is characterised as a graceful composer of song.

Prōnax (Πρόναξ), son of Talaus and Lysimache, brother of Adrastus and Eriphyle, and father of Lycurgus and Amphithea. According to some traditions the Nemean games were instituted in honour of Pronax.

Pronni (Πρόννοι: Pronnaios), a town on the E. coast of Cephallenia, and one of the four towns of the island (Thuc. ii. 30; Pol. v. 8; Strab. p. 455).

Prōnōmus (Πρόνομος), of Thebes, son of Oenias, was one of the most distinguished auletic musicians of Greece at the time of the Peloponnesian war. He was the instructor of Alcibiades in flute-playing. He invented a new sort of flute, the compass of which was such that melodies could be played upon it in all the three modes of music, the Dorian, the Phrygian, and the Lydian, for each of which a separate flute had been necessary.

Prōnōus (Πρόνοος), son of Phegeus, and brother of Agenor, in conjunction with whom he slew Alcmaeon. [For details, see AGENOR and ALCMAEON.]

Prōnūba, a surname of Juno among the Romans, describing her as the deity presiding over marriage. [JUNO.]

Prōpertius, Sex., the Roman poet, was probably born about B.C. 51. He comes in age between Tibullus and Ovid (Ov. Trist. ii. 465, iv. 10, 53). He tells us that he was a native of

Umbria, where it borders on Etruria (i. 22, 9, v. 1, 64), but nowhere mentions the exact spot. It was probably the town of Asisium (cf. v. 1, 125, where Asisi should be read), where other Propertii are mentioned in inscriptions. As regards his name, by himself and other authors he is spoken of simply as Propertius. The praenomen Sextus is derived from Donatus (Vit. Vergil. 45). The idea that he was Sex. Aurelius Propertius is derived from the headings of some MSS., but is generally discredited. It is suggested that it started from a confusion with Aurelius Prudentius. The inscriptions where it occurs are said to be spurious. He was not descended from a family of any distinction, and he was deprived of his paternal estate by an agrarian division of 41 B.C. (v. 1, 127; cf. iii. 34, 55). At the time of this misfortune he had not yet assumed the toga virilis, and was therefore under sixteen years of age. He had already lost his father, who is conjectured to have been one of the victims sacrificed after the taking of Perugia; but this notion does not rest on any satisfactory grounds. We have no account of Propertius's education; but from one of his elegies (v. i.) it would seem that he was destined to be an advocate, but abandoned the profession for that of poetry. The history of his life, so far as it is known to us, is the history of his amours, nor can it be said how much of this is fiction. He began to write poetry at a very early age, and the merit of his productions soon attracted the attention and patronage of Maecenas. This was most probably shortly after the death of Antony, in 30, when Propertius was about twenty-one. It was probably in 32 or 31 that Propertius first became acquainted with his Cynthia. She was a native of Tibur, and her real name was Hostia (Apul. Apol. 10; cf. Mart. viii. 73, 5, xiv. 189; Juv. vi. 7). As Propertius (iii. 20, 8) alludes to her doctus avus, it is probable that she was a grand-daughter of Hostius, who wrote a poem on the Istrian war. [HOSTIUS.] She seems to have inherited a considerable portion of the family talent, and was herself a poetess, besides being skilled in music. It appears that Propertius subsequently married, probably after Cynthia's death, and left legitimate issue, since the younger Pliny twice mentions Passienus Paulus as descended from him. This must have been through the female line. The year of Propertius's death is altogether unknown.—Propertius resided on the Esquiline, near the gardens of Maecenas (iv. 23, 4). He seems to have cultivated the friendship of his brother poets, as Ponticus, Bassus, Ovid, and others. He mentions Virgil (iii. 84, 68) in a way that shows he had heard parts of the Aeneid privately recited. But though he belonged to the circle of Maecenas, he never once mentions Horace. He is equally silent about Tibullus. His not mentioning Ovid is best explained by the difference in their ages; for Ovid alludes more than once to Propertius, and with evident affection (Trist. iv. 10, 45, v. 1, 17).—As an elegiac poet, a high rank must be awarded to Propertius, and among the ancients it was a disputed point whether the preference should be given to him or to Tibullus. It is true that he follows the Alexandrine school of learned poets, adopting their somewhat pedantic and affected display of mythological research, and claiming to be the Roman Callimachus (v. 1, 63), whom, as well as Philetas and other of the Greek elegiac poets, he made his model. But Propertius had a fervour and originality which gave him a rank far above the school of artificial poets, and some of his elegies (e.g. v. 11) have a poetry unsurpassed by any of the Latin elegiac poets. In this metre he uses the licence admitted in Greek elegy. Tibullus generally, and Ovid almost invariably, close their pentameter with a word contained in an iambic foot; Propertius, especially in his first book, frequently ends with a word of four or five syllables. The elegy on Hylas is an instance of the melody which he could produce under these conditions.—Most editors now follow Lachmann in dividing the work into five books. Book i. (the book on Cynthia, which was published first) is the same in all editions; but book ii. of the MSS. is divided at the ninth elegy: so that book ii. 10–34 of the MSS. becomes book iii., and the third and fourth books are numbered iv. and v. An argument for the division of book ii. is found in iii. 18, 25.—Editions of Propertius by Lachmann, 1816; Hertzberg, 1844, 1845; Paley, 1872; Bährens, 1880; A. Palmer, 1881; select elegies by Postgate, 1881.

Prophthasia (Προφθασία: prob. Peshawarun, Ru.), the N.-most city of Drangiana, on the borders of Asia, was probably the place where PHILOTAS was put to death.

Pröpontis (ἡ Προποντίς: Sea of Marmara), so called from its position with reference to the Pontus (Euxinus), and thus more fully described as ἡ πρὸ τοῦ Πόντου τοῦ Εὐξείνου θάλασσα, and 'Vestibulum Ponti,' is the small sea which united the Euxine and the Aegæan [PONTUS EUXINUS] and divides Europe (Thracia) from Asia (Mysia and Bithynia). It is of an irregular oval shape, running out on the E. into two deep gulfs, the Sinus Astacenus (G. of Ismid) and the Sinus Cianus (G. of Modonia), and containing several islands. It received the waters of the RHYNDACUS and other rivers of E. Mysia and W. Bithynia, flowing from Mt. Ida and Olympus; and several important Greek cities stood on its shores, the chief of which were BYZANTIUM and HERACLEA PERINTHUS on the N., and CYZICUS on the S. Its length is calculated by Herodotus at 1400 stadia (140 geog. miles) and its greatest breadth at 500 stadia (50 g. m.) which is very near the truth. (Hdt. iv. 85; Strab. pp. 563, 574, 583; Aesch. Pers. 876; Plin. iv. 76, v. 141; Mel. i. 1, 3, 19.)

Pröserpina. [PERSEPHONE.]

Prospalta (τὰ Πρόσπαλτα: Προσπάλτιος), a demus in the S. of Attica, belonging to the tribe Acamantis.

Prosper, a celebrated ecclesiastical writer, was a native of Aquitania, and lived during the first half of the fifth century. Many of his theological works are extant [for which see Dict. of Christ. Biogr.], and he also left a Chronicle which is of value since its last thirty years supply information not to be obtained elsewhere. It is called Chronicon Consulare, and extends from A.D. 379, the date at which the Chronicle of Jerome ends, down to 455, the events being arranged according to the years of the Roman consuls. We find short notices with regard to the Roman emperors, the Roman bishops, and political occurrences in general, but the troubles of the Church are especially dwelt upon, and above all the Pelagian heresy. The Chronicon Imperiale, comprehended within the same limits as the preceding (379–455), which treats of the period arranged according to the reigns of the emperors, is erroneously ascribed to Prosper. It was probably not written by Prosper of Aquitania, and is assigned by most critics to Prosper Tiro, who, it is imagined, flourished in the sixth century. There are likewise several poems which have come down to us under the name of Prosper.—The best edition of Prosper's works is the Benedictine, Paris, 1711.

Prōsymna (Πρόσυμνα: Προσυμναῖος), an ancient town of Argolis, with a temple of Hera, N. of Argos (Strab. p. 373; Stat. Theb. iv. 44).

Prōta (Πρώτα: Prote), an island in the Propontis near Chalcedon (Steph. Byz. s.v. Χαλκίτις).

Protagōras (Πρωταγόρας), a celebrated sophist, was born at Abdera, in Thrace (Plat. Protag. pp. 316, 349, Rep. p. 606), probably about B.C. 480, and died about 411, at the age of nearly seventy years. It is said that Protagoras was once a poor porter, and that the skill with which he had fastened together, and poised upon his shoulders, a large bundle of wood, attracted the attention of Democritus, who conceived a liking for him, took him under his care, and instructed him in philosophy. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 53, x. 8; Gell. v. 3; Athen. p. 354.) This well-known story, however, appears to have arisen out of the statement of Aristotle, that Protagoras invented a sort of porter's knot for the more convenient carrying of burdens. It cannot be true that he was patronised or instructed by Democritus, who was twenty years younger than Protagoras himself. Protagoras was the first who called himself a sophist (i.e. in the original sense of the name, one who professed to teach skill and practical life instead of only theory and abstract truth); and he is said to have been the first who taught for pay. He practised his profession for the space of forty years. He must have come to Athens before B.C. 445, since he drew up a code of laws for the Thurians, who left Athens for the first time in that year (Diog. Laërt. ix. 50). Whether he accompanied the colonists to Thurii, we are not informed; but at the time of the plague (430) we find him again in Athens. Between his first and second visit to Athens, he had spent some time in Sicily, where he had acquired great fame; and he brought with him to Athens many admirers out of other Greek cities through which he had passed (Plat. Protag. p. 315). His instructions were so highly valued that he sometimes received one hundred minae from a pupil; and Plato says that Protagoras made more money than Phidias and ten other sculptors. In 411 he was accused of impiety by Pythodorus, one of the Four Hundred. His impeachment was founded on his book on the gods, which began with the statement: 'Respecting the gods, I am unable to know whether they exist or do not exist.' The impeachment was followed by his banishment, or, as others affirm, only by the burning of his book. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 52; Cic. N. D. i. 23.) His profession being to fit for practical life, it followed that his object was to enable his pupils to persuade others to take their view, whatever it might be, since at that time success in political life depended upon skilful oratory and upon the power to maintain in speech, if need be, a bad cause (τὸν ἥττω λόγον κρείττω ποιεῖν).—Protagoras wrote a large number of works, of which the most important were entitled Truth (Ἀλήθεια) and On the Gods (Περὶ Θεῶν). The first contained the theory that 'Man is the measure of all things' (i.e. that everything is, as regards each man, what it appears to him to be; and so that absolute truth, independent of opinion, could not exist) refuted by Plato in the Theaetetus. Plato gives a vivid picture of the teaching of Protagoras in the dialogue that bears his name (cf. Plat. Theaet. pp. 156, 160; Cic. Ac. ii. 46, 142, N. D. i. 2, 12). Protagoras was especially celebrated for his skill in the rhetorical art. By way of practice in the art he was accustomed to make his pupils discuss Theses (communes loci); an exercise which is also recommended by Cicero (Brut. 12, 45).

Protesilaus (Πρωτεσίλαος), son of Iphiclus and Astyoche, belonged to Phylace in Thessaly. He is called Phylacius and Phylacides, either from his native place, or from his being a grandson of Phylacus. He led the warriors of several Thessalian places against Troy, and was the first of all the Greeks who was killed by the Trojans, being the first who leaped from the ships upon the Trojan coast. (Il. ii. 695; Ov. Met. xii. 67.) According to the common tradition he was slain by Hector. Protesilaus is most celebrated in ancient story for the strong affection existing between him and his wife Laodamia, the daughter of Acastus. [For details see LAODAMIA.] His tomb was shown near Eleus, in the Thracian Chersonesus, where a magnificent temple was erected to him. There was a belief that nymphs had planted elm-trees around his grave, which died away when they had grown sufficiently high to see Troy, and that fresh shoots then sprang from the roots. There was also a sanctuary of Protesilaus at Phylace, at which funeral games were celebrated. (Hdt. vii. 33, ix. 116, 120; Plin. xvi. 99; Strab. pp. 296, 394, 432, 595.) Euripides made the story of Protesilaus the subject of a tragedy, of which only fragments remain.

Proteus (Πρωτεύς), the prophetic old man of the sea, is described in the earliest legends as a subject of Poseidon, whose flocks (the seals) he tended. According to Homer he lived in the island of Pharos, at the distance of one day's journey from the river Aegyptus (Nile); whereas Virgil places his dwelling in the island of Carpathos, between Crete and Rhodes. At midday Proteus rose from the sea, and slept in the shadow of the rocks of the coast, with the monsters of the deep lying around him. Any one wishing to learn from him the future, was obliged to catch hold of him at that time: as soon as he was seized, he assumed every possible shape, in order to escape the necessity of prophesying, but whenever he saw that his endeavours were of no avail, he resumed his usual form, and told the truth. After finishing his prophecy he returned into the sea. (Od. iv. 351 ff.; Verg. Georg. iv. 386 ff.) Homer ascribes to him a daughter Idothea.—Later traditions describe Proteus as a son of Poseidon, and as a king of Egypt, who had two sons, Telegonus and Polygonus or Tmolus. His Egyptian name is said to have been Cetes, for which the Greeks substituted that of Proteus, and his wife's name was Psamathe. These names seem to have been taken from κῆτος (a sea-monster) and ψάμαθος (sand), as relics of the older myth to which they belonged. Besides the above-mentioned sons, Theoclymenus and Theonoë are likewise called his children (Eur. Hel. 9, 13). He is said to have hospitably received Dionysus during his wanderings. Hermes brought to him Helena after her abduction, or, according to others, Proteus himself took her from Paris, gave to the lover a phantom, and restored the true Helen to Menelaus after his return from Troy. (Hdt. ii. 112, 118; Eur. Helena; Diod. i. 62; see p. 388, a.)

Prōtōgēnēs (Πρωτογένης), a celebrated Greek painter. He was a native of Caunus, in Caria, a city subject to the Rhodians, and flourished B.C. 332-300. (Paus. i. 3, 4; Plin. xxxv. 101.) He resided at Rhodes almost entirely; the only other city of Greece which he is said to have visited is Athens, where he executed one of his great works in the Propylaea. Up to his fiftieth year he is said to have lived in poverty and in comparative obscurity, supporting himself by painting ships. It has been suggested that he originally made pictures of ships as votive offerings for escape from shipwreck. His fame had, however, reached the ears of Apelles, who, upon visiting Rhodes, made it his first business to seek out Protogenes. As the surest way of making the merits of Protogenes known to his fellow-citizens, Apelles offered him for his finished works the enormous sum of fifty talents apiece, and thus led the Rhodians to understand what an artist they had amongst them. Protogenes was distinguished by the care with which he wrought up his pictures. It is said that in his picture of a satyr resting he introduced a partridge so naturally painted that it absorbed all the attention of those who came to see the picture, and that Protogenes, annoyed at this, painted out the bird. His masterpiece was the picture of Ialysus, the tutelary hero of Rhodes, on which he is said to have spent seven years, or even, according to another statement, eleven; and to have painted it four times over. This picture was so highly prized even in the artist's lifetime that when Demetrius Poliorcetes was using every effort to subdue Rhodes, he refrained from attacking the city at its most vulnerable point, lest he should injure this picture, which had been placed in that quarter. (Plut. Demetr. 22; Ael. V. H. xii. 41.) There is a celebrated story about this picture, relating to the accidental production of one of the most effective parts of it, the foam at the mouth of a tired hound. The artist, it is said, dissatisfied with his repeated attempts to produce the desired effect, at last, in his vexation, dashed the sponge, with which he had repeatedly effaced his work, against the faulty place; and the sponge charged as it was by repeated use with the necessary colours, left a mark in which the painter recognised the very foam which his art had failed to produce (Plin. l. c.).

Prōtōgēnia (Πρωτογένεια), daughter of Deucalion and Pyrrha, and wife of Locrus; but Zeus carried her off, and became by her the father of Opus (Apollod. i. 7, 2; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. ix. 85.)

Provincia. [GALLIA, p. 353, b.]

Proxēnus (Πρόξενος). 1. A Boeotian, was a disciple of Gorgias, and a friend of Xenophon. Being connected by the ties of hospitality with the younger Cyrus, the latter engaged him in his service. He was seized by Tissaphernes and put to death, with the other Greek generals. It was at the invitation of Proxenus that Xenophon was induced to enter the service of Cyrus. (Xen. An. i. 1, 11, ii. 6, 16, v. 3, 5.)—2. Of Tegea, took a leading part in opposition to Sparta and in the scheme for founding Megalopolis. He was killed in a disturbance at Tegea. (Xen. Hell. vi. 5, 6; Paus. vii. 27, 2.)—3. An Athenian general in the Sacred war, B.C. 347 (Aesch. F.L. 37).

Prudentius, Aurélius Clemens, the earliest of the Christian poets of any celebrity, was a native of Spain, and was born A.D. 348. After practising as an advocate, and discharging the duties of a civil and criminal judge in two important cities, he received from the emperor Theodosius, or from Honorius, a high military appointment at court; but as he advanced in years, he became sensible of the emptiness of worldly honour, and earnest in the exercises of religion. His poems, which are composed in a great variety of metres, have much of the artificiality which belonged to the time, and great fondness for obscure allegory; but in vigour of poetry and in style he not only stands before other Christian writers of Latin verse, but shows more genius than any contemporary poet, even than Ausonius and Claudian, though in his versification he is inferior to them. His poem on martyrdom (Peristephanon) is his most powerful.—Editions of Prudentius are by Arevalus, Rom. 1788 and 1789; by Obbarius, Tubing. 1845; and by Dressel, Leips. 1860.

Prūsā or Prūsias (Προύσα: Προυσιεύς: Broussa), a great city of Bithynia, on the N. side of M. Olympus, fifteen Roman miles from Cius and twenty-five from Nicaea, was built by Prusias, king of Bithynia, or, according to some, by Hannibal (Strab. p. 564; Plin. v. 148). It was a prosperous city under the Roman emperors and celebrated for its warm baths (Plin. Ep. x. 85; Athen. p. 43).

Prūsias (Προυσίας). 1. I., king of Bithynia from about B.C. 228 to 180, though the date neither of his accession nor his death is exactly known. He was the son of Zieles, whom he succeeded. He appears to have been a monarch of vigour and ability, and raised his kingdom of Bithynia to a much higher pitch of power and prosperity than it had previously attained. (Pol. iv. 50, v. 90, viii. 17, xxii. 27.) It was at his court that Hannibal took refuge; and when the Romans demanded the surrender of the Carthaginian general, the king basely gave his consent, and Hannibal only escaped falling into the hands of his enemies by a voluntary death (Nep. Hann. 10; Just. xxxii. 4).—2. II., king of Bithynia, son and successor of the preceding, reigned from about 180 to 149. He courted assiduously the alliance of the Romans. He carried on war with Attalus, king of Pergamus, with whom, however, he was compelled by the Romans to conclude peace in 154. He was slain in 149 by order of his son Nicomedes, as is related in the Life of the latter. [NICOMEDES II.] Prusias is described to us as a man in whom personal deformity was combined with a character the most vicious and degraded. His passion for the chase is attested by the epithet of the 'Huntsman' (Κυνηγός). (Pol. xxiv. 1, xxix. 3, xxxvii. 2; Just. xxxiv. 4.)

Coin of Prusias I., King of Bithynia, ob. A.D. 149.
Obv., head of Prusias; rev., ΒΑΣΙΛΕΥΣ ΠΡΟΥΣΙΟΥ; Zeus standing with sceptre.

Prymnēsia or Prymnēsus (Πρυμνησία, Πρυμνησός, Πρυμνησσός: Seulun, near Afiom Kara Hissar), a city in the N. of Phrygia, which appears, from its coins, to have been a seat of the worship of Midas as a hero (Ptol. v. 2, 24).

Prytānis (Πρύτανις), king of Sparta, of the Proclid line, was the son of Eurypon, and fourth king of that race.

Psamathe (Ψαμάθη). 1. Daughter of Nereus and Doris, and mother of Phocus (Hes. Th. 260, 1004; Ov. Met. xi. 381, 398).—2. [PROTEUS.]

Psamathūs (Ψαμαθοῦς, -οὔντος: Ψαμαθοῦντιος, Ψαμαθοῦσιος), a seaport town in Laconia near the promontory Taenarum (Strab. p. 353).

Psammenitus (Ψαμμήνιτος) = Psamthek III., king of Egypt, succeeded his father, Amasis, in B.C. 526, and reigned only six months. He was conquered by Cambyses in 525, and his country made a province of the Persian empire. His life was spared by Cambyses, but as he was detected shortly afterwards in endeavouring to excite a revolt among the Egyptians, he was compelled to put an end to his life by drinking bull's blood. (Hdt. iii. 10, 13-15.)

Psammis (Ψάμμις) = Psamthek II., king of Egypt, succeeded his father, Necho, and reigned from B.C. 601 to 595. He carried on war against Ethiopia, and died immediately after his return from the latter country. He was succeeded by his son APRIES. (Hdt. ii. 159-161.)

Psammitichus or Psammetichus (Ψαμμίτιχος or Ψαμμήτιχος), the Greek form of the Egyptian Psamthek I., king of Egypt about B.C. 666, and founder of the Saitic dynasty. He was the great-grandson of Technactis (Tefnekt), who had in vain opposed the establishment of the Ethiopian power in Egypt in 733. Psammitichus was originally one of the twelve petty kings who obtained an independent sovereignty. Having been driven into banishment by the other kings, he took refuge in the marshes; but shortly afterwards, with the aid of some Ionian and Carian pirates, he conquered the other kings, and became sole ruler of Egypt (Hdt. ii. 149-152). A clue to the manner in which he obtained the power which the Ethiopian dynasty had held, and so restored peace and union to Egypt, is afforded by the monuments, which state that he married the heiress of the Ethiopian dynasty, Shep-en-apt. Having thus established his power, his object was to secure his frontiers, and therefore he provided a settlement for his Greek mercenaries on the Pelusiatic or eastern branch of the Nile, a little below Bubastis; for he appears to have mainly relied upon them for the maintenance of his power. In order to facilitate intercourse between the Greeks and his other subjects, he ordered a number of Egyptian children to live with them, that they might learn the Greek language; and from them sprang the class of interpreters (Hdt. ii. 154). The employment of foreign mercenaries by Psammitichus gave great offence to the military caste in Egypt; and being indignant at other treatment which they received from him, they emigrated in a body of 240,000 men, into Ethiopia, where settlements were assigned to them by the Ethiopian king (Hdt. ii. 30; Diod. i. 67). It must, therefore, have been chiefly with his Ionian and Carian troops that Psammitichus carried on his wars against Syria and Phoenicia. He laid siege to the city of Azotus (the Ashod of Scripture) for twenty-nine years, till he took it (Hdt. ii. 157). As Psammitichus had displeased a large portion of his subjects by the introduction of foreigners, he seems to have paid especial court to the priesthood. He built the southern propylaea of the temple of Hephaestus at Memphis, and a splendid aula, with a portico round it, for the habitation of Apis, in front of the temple.

Psēbo (Ψεβώ: Thana), a lake in Aethiopia SE. of Méroë, the source of the Astapus (Strab. p. 822).

Pselcis (Ψελκίς: Dakke), the chief city in the Dodecaschoenus—that is, the N. part of Aethiopia, which was adjacent to Egypt, to which it was regarded by the Romans as belonging. The city stood on the W. bank of the Nile, between Syene and Tachompsos, the latter of which was so far eclipsed by Pselcis as to acquire the name of Contrapselcis. Under the later empire, Pselcis was garrisoned by a body of German horsemen. (Strab. p. 820; Dio Cass. liv. 5.)

Psellus (Ψέλλος). 1. Michael Psellus, the elder, of Andros, flourished in the ninth century after Christ. He was a learned man, and an eager student of the Alexandrian philosophy. He was probably the author of some of the works which are ascribed to the younger Psellus.—2. Michael Constantius Psellus, the younger, a far more celebrated person, flourished in the eleventh century of our era. He was born at Constantinople 1020, and lived at least till 1105. He taught philosophy, rhetoric, and dialectics, at Constantinople, where he stood forth as almost the last upholder of the falling cause of learning. The emperors honoured him with the title of Prince of the Philosophers. His works are both in prose and poetry, on a vast variety of subjects, and distinguished by an eloquence and taste which are worthy of a better period. They are edited by Migne, 1863.

Psillis (Ψίλλις), a river of Bithynia, which flows into the Propontis between Artane and Calpe (Strab. p. 543).

Psōphis (Ψωφίς: Ψωφίδιος: Tripotamo), a town in the NW. of Arcadia, on the river Erymanthus, is said to have been originally called Phegia (Paus. viii. 24, 2). It sided with the Aetolians against the Achaeans, but was taken B.C. 219 by Philip, king of Macedonia, who was then in alliance with the Achaeans (Pol. iv. 70).

Psychē (Ψυχή), 'the soul,' occurs in the later times of antiquity as a personification of the human soul, and hence as pursued by Eros as personified love. Upon this is built the myth related by Apuleius (Met. iv. 28-vi. 24). Psyche was the youngest of the three daughters of a king, and excited by her beauty the jealousy and envy of Venus. In order to avenge herself, the goddess ordered Cupid to inspire Psyche with a love for the most contemptible of all men: but Cupid was so smitten with her beauty that he himself fell in love with her. He accordingly conveyed her to a charming spot, where unseen and unknown he visited her every night, and left her as soon as the day began to dawn. Psyche might have continued to enjoy this state of happiness, if she had attended to the advice of her lover, who told her never to give way to her curiosity, or to inquire who he was. But her jealous sisters made her believe that in the darkness of night she was embracing some hideous monster, and accordingly once, while Cupid was asleep, she drew near to him with a lamp, and, to her amazement, beheld the most handsome and lovely of the gods. In her excitement of joy and fear, a drop of hot oil fell from her lamp upon his shoulder. This awoke Cupid, who censured her for her mistrust, and escaped. Psyche's happiness was now gone, and after attempting in vain to throw herself into a river, she wandered about from temple to temple, inquiring after her lover, and at length came to the palace of Venus. There her real sufferings began, for Venus retained her, treated her as a slave, and imposed upon her the hardest and most humiliating labours. Psyche would have perished under the weight of her sufferings, had not Cupid, who still loved her in secret, invisibly comforted and assisted her in her toils. With his aid she at last succeeded in overcoming the jealousy and hatred of Venus:

she became immortal, and was united to him for ever. It is not difficult to recognise in this beautiful story the idea of which it is merely the mythical embodiment; for Psyche is evidently the human soul, which is purified by passions and misfortunes, and is thus prepared for the enjoyment of true and pure happiness. [Cf. APULEIUS, p. 94, a.] In works of art Psyche is usually represented as a maiden with the wings of a butterfly, but in the beautiful group of Eros and Psyche in the Capitol, both are represented without wings.

Psychium (Ψύχιον), a town on the S. coast of Crete (Ptol. iii. 17, 4).

Psylli (Ψύλλοι), a Libyan people, the earliest known inhabitants of the district of N. Africa called Cyrenaica, who lived on the shores of the Greater Syrtis, W. of the Nasamones.

Psyra (τὰ Ψυρά: Ψύριος: Psara), a small island of the Aegæan sea, forty stadia (four geogr. miles) in circuit, lying fifty stadia (five geogr. miles) W. of the NW. point of Chios. It had a city of the same name. (Od. iii. 171; Strab. p. 645.)

Psytallæa (Ψυττάλεια: Lipsokutali), a small island off the Attic coast, between Salamis and the Peiræus. [SALAMIS.]

Ptēlēōs (Πτελέως), a small lake in Mysia, near Ophryniūm, on the coast of the Hellespont (Hdt. vii. 42; Strab. p. 595).

Ptēlēum (Πτελέον: Πτελεάτης, Πτελεούσιος). 1. (Ptelia), an ancient seaport town of Thessaly in the district Phthiotis, at the SW. extremity of the Sinus Pagasæus, was destroyed by the Romans (Pl. ii. 697; Strab. p. 433; Liv. xlii. 6). —2. A town in Elis Triphylia, said to have been a colony from the preceding (Pl. ii. 594; Strab. p. 349). —3. A fortress of Ionia, on the coast of Asia Minor, belonging to Erythrae (Thuc. viii. 24; Plin. v. 115).

Ptōlēmaeus (Πτολεμαῖος) usually called Ptolemy. I. Minor historical persons. 1. Nephew of Antigonus, king of Asia. He carried on war in Greece on behalf of Antigonus, but in 310 he abandoned the cause of his uncle and concluded a treaty with Cassander and Ptolemy the son of Lagus. He soon gave offence to the Egyptian king, and was in consequence compelled to put an end to his life by poison, B.C. 309 (Diod. xix. 57–87, xx. 27). —2. Son of Lysimachus, king of Thrace. He was the eldest of the three sons of that monarch by his last wife, Arsinoë, and the only one who escaped falling into the hands of Ptolemy Ceraunus (Just. xxiv. 2). —3. Son of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, by his wife Antigone, the stepdaughter of Ptolemy Soter. When only fifteen years of age he was left by his father in charge of his hereditary dominions when Pyrrhus himself set out on his expedition to Italy, 280. At a later time he fought under his father in Greece, and was slain in the course of Pyrrhus's campaign in the Peloponnesus, 272. (Just. xviii. 1, xxv. 4; Plut. Pyrrh. 28, 30). —4. Surnamed PHILADELPHUS, son of M. Antony, the Triumvir, by Cleopatra. After the death of Antony, 30, his life was spared by Augustus, at the intercession of Juba and Cleopatra, and he was brought up by Octavia with her own children. (Dio Cass. li. 15; Plut. Ant. 87.)

II. Kings of Egypt.

I., surnamed Soter, the Preserver, but more commonly known as the son of Lagus, reigned B.C. 323–285. His father, Lagus, was a Macedonian of ignoble birth, but his mother, Arsinoë, had been a concubine of Philip of Macedon, on which account it seems to have been generally believed that Ptolemy was in reality the offspring of that monarch (Curt. ix. 8, 22; Paus. i. 6, 2). Ptolemy is mentioned among the friends of the young Alexander before the death of Philip. He accompanied Alexander throughout his campaigns in Asia, and was always treated by the king with the greatest favour. He was sent to arrest Bessus; in all the Indian campaigns his name is among the most prominent, and he is said to have saved the life of Alexander by discovering a plot against his life (Curt. viii. 1, 45). In the march through Gedrosia he had command of a division, and he accompanied Alexander on his last expedition, against the Cossæans (Curt. ix. 10, 5; Arr. An. vii. 4, 15). He therefore held a leading place among the officers of Alexander, and on the division of the empire which followed Alexander's death (323) Ptolemy obtained the government of Egypt. In 321 his dominions were invaded by Perdiccas, the regent; but the assassination of Perdiccas by his mutinous soldiers soon delivered Ptolemy from this danger. (Curt. x. 6, 13; Just. xiii. 2.) In the following year Ptolemy enlarged his dominions by seizing upon the important satrapy of Phœnicia and Coele-Syria. It was probably during this expedition that he made himself master of Jerusalem, by attacking the city on the Sabbath day (Jos. Ant. xii. 1). A few years afterwards (316) Ptolemy entered into an alliance with Cassander and Lysimachus against Antigonus, whose growing power had excited their common apprehensions. In the war which followed, Antigonus conquered Coele-Syria and Phoenicia (315, 314); but Ptolemy recovered these provinces by the defeat of Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, near Gaza, in 312. (Diod. xix. 57-105.) In 311 hostilities were suspended by a general peace. This peace, however, was of short duration, and Ptolemy appears to have been the first to recommence the war. He crossed over to Greece, where he announced himself as the liberator of the Greeks, but he effected little. In 306 Ptolemy was defeated by Demetrius in a great sea-fight off Salamis in Cyprus. In consequence of this defeat, Ptolemy lost the important island of Cyprus, which had previously been subject to him. Antigonus was so much elated by this victory as to assume the title of king, an example which Ptolemy, notwithstanding his defeat, immediately followed. (Diod. xx. 19-53; Plut. Demetr. 18.) Antigonus and Demetrius followed up their success by the invasion of Egypt, but were compelled to return to Syria without effecting any thing. Next year (305) Ptolemy rendered the most important assistance to the Rhodians, who were besieged by Demetrius; and when Demetrius was at length compelled to raise the siege (304), the Rhodians paid divine honours to the Egyptian monarch as their saviour and preserver (Σωτήρ), a title which appears to have been now bestowed upon Ptolemy for the first time. (Diod. xx. 81-100; Paus. i. 8, 6; Athen. p. 696.) Ptolemy took comparatively little part in the contest which led to the decisive battle of Ipsus, in which Antigonus was defeated and slain (301). The latter years of Ptolemy's reign appear to have been devoted almost entirely to the arts of peace, and to promoting the internal prosperity of his dominions. In 285 Ptolemy abdicated in favour of his youngest son Ptolemy Philadelphus, the child of his latest and most beloved wife, Berenice, excluding from the throne his two eldest sons, Ptolemy Ceraunus and Meleager, the offspring of Eurydice (Just. xvi. 2). The elder Ptolemy survived this event two years, and died in 283. His reign is variously estimated at thirty-eight or forty years, according as we include or not these two years which followed his abdication.—The character of Ptolemy has been generally represented in a very favourable light by historians, and there is no doubt that if we compare him with his contemporary and rival potentates he appears to deserve the praises bestowed upon his mildness and moderation. But it is only with this important qualification that they can be admitted: for there are many evidences that he did not shrink from any measure that he deemed requisite in order to carry out the object of his ambition. But as a ruler Ptolemy certainly deserves the highest praise. By his able and vigorous administration he laid the foundations of the wealth and prosperity which Egypt enjoyed for a long period. Under his fostering care Alexandria quickly rose to the place designed for it by its founder, that of the greatest commercial city of the world. Not less eminent were the services rendered by Ptolemy to the advancement of literature and science. In this department, indeed, it is not always easy to distinguish the portion of credit due to the father from that of his son: but it seems certain that to the elder monarch belongs the merit of having originated those literary institutions which assumed a more definite and regular form, as well as a more prominent place, under his successor. Such appears to have been the case with the two most celebrated of all, the Library and the Museum of Alexandria. The first suggestion of these important foundations is ascribed by some writers to Demetrius of Phalerus, who spent all the latter years of his life at the court of Ptolemy. But many other men of literary eminence were also gathered around the Egyptian king: among whom may be especially noticed the geometer Euclid, the philosophers Stilpo of Megara, Theodorus of Cyrene, and Diodorus surnamed Cronus; as well as the elegiac poet Philetas of Cos, and the grammarian Zenodotus. To the last two we are told Ptolemy confided the literary education of his son Philadelphus. Many anecdotes sufficiently attest the free intercourse which subsisted between the king and the men of letters by whom he was surrounded, and prove that the easy familiarity of his manners corresponded with his simple and unostentatious habits of life. We also find him maintaining a correspondence with Menander, whom he in vain endeavoured to attract to his court, and sending overtures, probably of a similar nature, to Theophrastus. Nor were the fine arts neglected: the rival painters Antiphilus and Apelles both exercised their talents at Alexandria, where some of their most celebrated pictures were produced.—Ptolemy was himself an author: he composed a history of the wars of Alexander, which is frequently cited by later writers, and is one of the chief authorities which Arrian made the groundwork of his own history.—II., Philadelphus (B.C. 285-247), the son of Ptolemy I. by his wife Berenice, was born in the island of Cos, 309. (Theocr. xvii. 58; Schol. ad loc.). He was a pupil of Zenodotus and Philebus. His long reign was marked by few events of a striking character. He was engaged in war with his half-brother, Magas, who had governed Cyrene as viceroy under Ptolemy Soter, but on the death of that monarch not only asserted his independence, but even attempted to invade Egypt. Magas was supported by Antiochus II., king of Syria; and the war was at length terminated by a treaty, which left Magas in undisputed possession of Cyrenaica, while his infant daughter Berenice was betrothed to Ptolemy, the son of Philadelphus. (Just. xxvi. 3; Paus. i. 7, 3.) Ptolemy also concluded a treaty with the Romans. He was frequently engaged in hostilities with Syria, which were terminated towards the close of his reign by a treaty of peace, by which Ptolemy gave his daughter Berenice in marriage to Antiochus II. Ptolemy's chief care, however, was directed to the internal administration of his kingdom, and to the patronage of literature and science. The institutions of which the foundations had been laid by his father quickly rose under his fostering care to the highest prosperity. The Museum of Alexandria became the resort and abode of all the most distinguished men of letters of the day, and in the library attached to it were accumulated all the treasures of ancient learning. Among the illustrious names which adorned the reign of Ptolemy, may be mentioned those of the poets Philetas and Theocritus, the philosophers Hegesias and Theodorus, the mathematician Euclid, and the astronomers Timocharis, Aristarchus of Samos, and Aratus. Nor was his patronage confined to the ordinary cycle of Hellenic literature. By his interest in natural history he gave a stimulus to the pursuit of that science which gave birth to many important works, while he himself formed collections of rare animals within the precincts of the royal palace. He encouraged expeditions for trade and commerce with Aethiopia and with India. (Diod. i. 37, 38; Plin. vi. 58; cf. Theocr. xv.) It was during his reign also, and perhaps at his desire, that Manetho gave to the world in a Greek form the historical records of the Egyptians; and according to a well-known tradition, it was by his express command that the Holy Scriptures of the Jews were translated into Greek. The new cities or colonies founded by Philadelphus in different parts of his dominions were extremely numerous. On the Red Sea alone we find at least two bearing the name of Arsinoë, one called after another of his sisters, Philotera, and two cities named in honour of his mother, Berenice. The same names occur also in Cilicia and Syria: and in the latter country he founded the important fortress of Ptolemais in Palestine. All authorities concur in attesting the great power and wealth to which the Egyptian monarchy was raised under Philadelphus. He possessed at the close of his reign a standing army of 200,000 foot, and 40,000 horse, besides war-chariots and elephants; a fleet of 1500 ships, and a sum of 740,000 talents in his treasury; while he derived from Egypt alone an annual revenue of 14,800 talents. His dominions comprised, besides Egypt itself, and portions of Ethiopia, Arabia and Libya, the important provinces of Phoenicia and Coele-Syria, together with Cyprus, Lycia, Caria, and the Cyclades; and during a great part at least of his reign, Cilicia and Pamphylia also. Before his death Cyrene was reunited to the monarchy by the marriage of his son Ptolemy with Berenice, the daughter of Magas. The private life and relations of Philadelphus do not exhibit his character in as favourable a light as we might have inferred from the splendour of his administration. He put to death two of his brothers; and he banished his first wife, Arsinoë, the daughter of Lysimachus, to Coptos in Upper Egypt on a charge of conspiracy. After her removal Ptolemy married his own sister Arsinoë, the widow of Lysimachus: a flagrant violation of the religious notions of the Greeks of that age: which, however, was frequently imitated by his successors. He evinced his affection for Arsinoë, not only by bestowing her name upon many of his newly-founded colonies [ARSINOË], but by assuming himself the surname of Philadelphus, a title which some writers referred in derision to his unnatural treatment of his two brothers. By this second marriage Ptolemy had no issue; but his first wife had borne him two sons—Ptolemy, who succeeded him on the throne, and Lysimachus; and a daughter, Berenice, whose marriage to Antiochus II., king of Syria, has been already mentioned.—III., Euergetes (B.C. 247–222), eldest son and successor of Philadelphus. Shortly after his accession he invaded Syria, in order to avenge the death of his sister Berenice. [BERENICE, No. 2.] He met with the most striking success. He advanced as far as Babylon and Susa, and after reducing all Mesopotamia, Babylonia, and Susiana, received the submission of all the upper provinces of Asia as far as the confines of Bactria and India. From this career of conquest he was recalled by the news of seditions in Egypt, and returned to that country, carrying with him an immense booty, comprising, among other objects, all the statues of the Egyptian deities which had been carried off by Cambyzes to Babylon or Persia. (Diod. i. 46–55; Just. xxvii. 1.) These he restored to their respective temples, an act by which he earned the greatest popularity with his native Egyptian subjects, who bestowed on him in consequence the title of Euergetes (the Benefactor), by which he is generally known. While the arms of the king himself were thus successful in the East, his fleets reduced the maritime provinces of Asia, including Cilicia, Pamphylia, and Ionia, as far as the Hellespont, together with Lysimachia and other important places on the coast of Thrace which continued for a long period subject to the Egyptian rule. Concerning the events which followed the return of Euergetes to his own dominions (probably in 243) we are almost wholly in the dark; but it appears that the greater part of the eastern provinces speedily fell again into the hands of Seleucus, while Ptolemy retained possession of the maritime regions and a great part of Syria itself. He soon obtained a valuable ally in the person of Antiochus Hierax, the younger brother of Seleucus, whom he supported in his wars against his elder brother. He was unfriendly to Macedonia, and hence was led to support Aratus and the Achaean League, until the unfortunate policy which Aratus adopted, of seeking the alliance of Macedonia, caused Ptolemy to ally himself with Clomenes (Plut. Arat. 24, 41, Cleom. 22). We find Euergetes maintaining the same friendly relations as his father with Rome (Eutrop. iii. 1). During the latter years of his reign he subdued the Ethiopian tribes on his southern frontier, and advanced as far as Adule, a port on the Red Sea, where he established an emporium, and set up an inscription commemorating the exploits of his reign. To a copy of this, accidentally preserved to us by an Egyptian monk, Cosmas Indicopleustes, we are indebted for much of the scanty information we possess concerning his reign. Ptolemy Euergetes is scarcely less celebrated than his father for his patronage of literature and science; he added so largely to the library at Alexandria that he has been sometimes erroneously deemed its founder. Eratosthenes, Apollonius Rhodius and Aristophanes the grammarian flourished at Alexandria during his reign—sufficient to prove that the literature and learning of the Alexandrian school still retained their former eminence. By his wife Berenice, who survived him, Euergetes left three children: (1) Ptolemy, his successor; (2) Magas; and (3) Arsinoë, afterwards married to her brother Ptolemy Philopator.—IV., Philopator or Tryphon (B.C. 222–205), eldest son and successor of Euergetes. He was very far from inheriting the virtues or abilities of his father, and his reign was the commencement of the decline of the Egyptian kingdom, which had been raised to such a height of power and prosperity by his three predecessors. Its first beginning was stained with crimes of the darkest kind. He put to death his mother, Berenice, and his brother, Magas, and his uncle Lysimachus, the brother of Euergetes. Cleomenes, the exiled king of Sparta, fell under his suspicion, and being thrown into prison, and having failed to escape, put an end to his own life. (Pol. v. 34-39; Plut. Cleom. 33-37.) He then gave himself up without restraint to a life of indolence and luxury, while he abandoned to his minister, Sosibius, the care of all political affairs. The latter seems to have been as incapable as his master, and the kingdom was allowed to fall into a state of the utmost disorder, of which Antiochus the Great, king of Syria, was not slow to avail himself. In the first two campaigns (219, 218), Antiochus conquered the greater part of Coele-Syria and Palestine, but in the third year of the war (217), he was completely defeated by Ptolemy in person at the decisive battle of Raphia, and was glad to conclude a peace with the Egyptian monarch. On his return from his Syrian expedition, Ptolemy gave himself up more and more to every species of vice and debauchery. His mistress, Agathoclea, and her brother, Agathocles, divided with Sosibius the patronage and distribution of all places of honour or profit. Towards the close of his reign Ptolemy put to death his wife, Arsinoë. His debaucheries shortened his life. He died in 205, leaving only one son, a child of five years old.—We find Ptolemy following up the policy of his predecessors, by cultivating the friendship of the Romans, to whom he furnished large supplies of corn during their struggle with Carthage. Plunged as he was in vice and debauchery, Philopator appears to have still inherited something of the love of letters for which his predecessors were so conspicuous. We find him associating on familiar terms with philosophers and men of letters, and especially patronising the distinguished grammarian Aristarchus, and he wrote a tragedy called Adonis (Diog. Laërt. vii. 177).—V., Epiphanes (B.C. 205-181), son and successor of Ptolemy IV. He was a child of five years old at the death of his father, 205. Philip, king of Macedonia, and Antiochus III. of Syria determined to take advantage of the minority of Ptolemy, and entered into a league to divide his dominions between them. In pursuance of this arrangement Antiochus conquered Coele-Syria, while Philip reduced the Cyclades and the cities in Thrace which had still remained subject to Egypt. In this emergency the Egyptian ministers had recourse to the powerful intervention of the Romans, who commanded both monarchs to refrain from further hostilities, and restore all the conquered cities. In order to evade this demand without openly opposing the power of Rome, Antiochus concluded a treaty with Egypt, by which it was agreed that the young king should marry Cleopatra, the daughter of Antiochus, and receive back the Syrian provinces as her dowry. (Pol. xv. 20-33, xvi. 39, xviii. 33; Just. xxx. 2, xxxi. 1; Liv. xxxi. 2, 9.) This treaty took place in 199, but the marriage was not actually solemnised until six years after. The administration of Egypt was placed in the hands of Aristomenes, a man who was every way worthy of the charge. As early, however, as 196 the young king was declared of full age, and the ceremony of his Anacleteria, or coronation, was solemnised with great magnificence. It was on this occasion that the decree was issued which has been preserved to us in the celebrated inscription known as the Rosetta stone, a monument of great interest in regard to the internal history of Egypt under the Ptolemies, independently of its importance as having afforded the key to the discovery of hieroglyphics. In 193 the marriage of Ptolemy with the Syrian princess Cleopatra was solemnised at Raphia (Liv. xxxv. 13). Ptolemy, however, refused to assist his father-in-law in the war against the Romans, which was at this time on the eve of breaking out, and he continued steadfast in his alliance with Rome. But he derived no advantage from the treaty which concluded it, and Antiochus still retained possession of Coele-Syria and Phoenicia. As long as Ptolemy continued under the guidance and influence of Aristomenes, his administration was equitable and popular. Gradually, however, he became estranged from his able and virtuous minister, and threw himself more and more into the power of flatterers and vicious companions, until at length he was induced to rid himself of Aristomenes, who was compelled to take poison (Pol. xxiii. 16). Ptolemy seems to have followed the policy of his predecessors in offering help to the Achaean League (Pol. xxiii. 1, 7, xxv. 7). Towards the close of his reign he conceived the project of recovering Coele-Syria from Seleucus, the successor of Antiochus, and had assembled a large mercenary force for that purpose: but having, by an unguarded expression, excited the apprehensions of some of his friends, he was cut off by poison in the twenty-fourth year of his reign and the twenty-ninth of his age, 181 (Jos. Ant. xii. 4, 11). He left two sons, both named Ptolemy, who subsequently ascended the throne, under the names of Ptolemy Philometor and Euergetes II., and a daughter, who bore her mother's name of Cleopatra. His reign was marked by the rapid decline of the Egyptian monarchy, for the provinces and cities wrested from it during his minority by Antiochus and Philip were never recovered, and at his death Cyprus and Cyrenaica were the only foreign possessions of importance still attached to the crown of Egypt. According to Varro (ap. Plin. xii. 70) it was the prohibition by Ptolemy of the export of papyrus (a measure dictated by jealousy of the library of the Pergamene kings) which led to the 'invention' of parchment at Pergamene (i.e. to its improved manufacture and its name pergamena). By this Ptolemy Epiphanes must be meant [see Dict. of Ant. art. Liber].—VI., Philometor (B.C. 181-146), eldest son and successor of Ptolemy V. He was a child at the death of his father in 181, and the regency was assumed during his minority by his mother, Cleopatra, who, by her able administration, maintained the kingdom in a state of tranquillity. But after her death, in 173, the chief power fell into the hands of Eulaeus and Lenaeus, ministers as corrupt as they were incapable, who had the rashness to engage in war with Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria, in the vain hope of recovering the provinces of Coele-Syria and Phoenicia. But their army was totally defeated by Antiochus, near Pelusium, and Antiochus was able to advance without opposition as far as Memphis, 170. The young king himself fell into his hands, but was treated with kindness and distinction, as Antiochus hoped by his means to make himself the master of Egypt. On learning the captivity of his brother, the younger Ptolemy, who was then at Alexandria with his sister, Cleopatra, assumed the title of king, under the name of Euergetes II., and prepared to defend the capital to the utmost. Antiochus hereupon laid siege to Alexandria; but he was unable to take the city, and withdrew into Syria, after establishing Philometor as king at Memphis, but retaining in his hands the frontier fortress of Pelusium. This last circumstance, together with the ravages committed by the Syrian troops, awakened Philometor, who had hitherto been a mere puppet in the hands of the Syrian king, to a sense of his true position, and he hastened to make overtures of peace to his brother and sister at Alexandria. It was agreed that the two brothers should reign together, and that Philometor should marry his sister, Cleopatra. But this arrangement did not suit the views of Antiochus, who immediately renewed hostilities. The two brothers were unable to offer any effectual opposition, and he had advanced a second time to the walls of Alexandria, when he was met by a Roman embassy, headed by M. Popilius Laenas, who haughtily commanded him instantly to desist from hostilities. (Liv. xiv. 11; Pol. xxvii. 17, xxviii. 16-19, xxix. 8, 11.) Antiochus did not venture to disobey, and withdrew to his own dominions, 168. Dissensions soon broke out between the two brothers, and Euergetes expelled Philometor from Alexandria. Hereupon Philometor repaired in person to Rome, 164, where he was received by the senate with the utmost honour, and deputies were appointed to reinstate him in the sovereign power. This they effected with little opposition; but they settled that Euergetes should obtain Cyrene as a separate kingdom. Euergetes, however, shortly afterwards laid claim to Cyprus as well, in which he was supported by the Romans; but Philometor refused to surrender the island to him, and in the war which ensued, Euergetes was taken prisoner by his brother, who not only spared his life, but sent him back to Cyrene on condition that he should thenceforth content himself with that kingdom. (Pol. xxxi. 18-27, xxxiii. 5; Liv. Ep. 46, 47.) The attention of Philometor appears to have been, from this time, principally directed to the side of Syria. Demetrius Soter having sought during the dissensions between the two brothers to make himself master of Cyprus, Ptolemy now supported the usurper Alexander Balas, to whom he gave his daughter Cleopatra in marriage, 150. But when Ptolemy advanced with an army to the assistance of his son-in-law, Ammonius, the favourite and minister of Alexander, formed a plot against the life of Ptolemy, who thereupon took away his daughter Cleopatra from her faithless husband, and bestowed her hand on Demetrius Nicator, the son of Soter, whose cause he now espoused. In conjunction with Demetrius, Ptolemy carried on war against Alexander, whom he defeated in a decisive battle; but he died a few days afterwards in consequence of an injury which he had received from a fall from his horse in this battle, 146. (Pol. xl. 12; Just. xxxv. 1, 2; App. Syr. 67.) He had reigned thirty-five years from the period of his first accession, and eighteen from his restoration by the Romans. Philometor is praised for the mildness and humanity of his disposition. Polybius even tells us that not a single citizen of Alexandria was put to death by him for any political or private offence. On the whole, if not one of the greatest, he was at least one of the best of the race of the Ptolemies. He left three children: (1) a son, Ptolemy, who was proclaimed king after his father's death, under the name Ptolemy Eupator, but was put to death almost immediately after by his uncle Euergetes; (2) a daughter, Cleopatra, married first to Alexander Balas, then to Demetrius II., king of Syria; and (3) another daughter, also named Cleopatra, who was afterwards married to her uncle Ptolemy Euergetes.—VII., Euergetes II. or Physcon (Φύσκων), that is, Big-Belly, reigned B.C. 146-117. His history down to the death of his brother has been already given. In order to secure undisputed possession of the throne, he married his sister Cleopatra, the widow of his brother Philometor, and put to death his nephew, Ptolemy, who had been proclaimed king under the surname of Eupator (Just. xxxviii. 8). A reign thus commenced in blood was continued in a similar spirit. Many of the leading citizens of Alexandria, who had taken part against him on the death of his brother, were put to death, while the populace were given up to the cruelties of his mercenary troops, and the streets of the city were repeatedly deluged with blood. Thousands of the inhabitants fled from the scene of such horrors, and the population of Alexandria was so greatly thinned that the king found himself compelled to invite foreign settlers from all quarters to repopulate his deserted capital. At the same time that he thus incurred the hatred of his subjects by his cruelties, he rendered himself an object of their aversion and contempt by abandoning himself to the most degrading vices. In consequence of these, he had become bloated and deformed in person, and enormously corpulent, whence the Alexandrians gave him the nickname of Physcon, by which appellation he is more usually known (Just. l.c.; Athen. pp. 184, 252, 549). His union with Cleopatra was not of long duration. He became enamoured of his niece, Cleopatra (the offspring of his wife by her former marriage with Philometor), and he did not hesitate to divorce the mother and receive her daughter instead, as his wife and queen. By this proceeding he alienated still more the minds of his Greek subjects, and his vices and cruelties at length produced an insurrection at Alexandria. Thereupon he fled to Cyprus, and the Alexandrians declared his sister Cleopatra queen (130). Enraged at this, Ptolemy put to death Memphitis, his son by Cleopatra, and sent his head and hands to his unhappy mother. But Cleopatra having been shortly afterwards expelled from Alexandria in her turn, Ptolemy found himself unexpectedly reinstated on the throne, 127. (Just. xxxviii. 9; Val. Max. ix. 2; Oros. v. 10.) His sister Cleopatra fled to the court of her elder sister Cleopatra, the wife of Demetrius II., king of Syria, who espoused the cause of the fugitive. Ptolemy, in revenge, set up against him a pretender named Zabinas or Zebina, who assumed the title of Alexander II. But the usurper behaved with such haughtiness to Ptolemy that the latter suddenly changed his policy, became reconciled to his sister Cleopatra, whom he permitted to return to Egypt, and gave his daughter Tryphaena in marriage to Antiochus Grypus, the son of Demetrius. Ptolemy died after reigning twenty-nine years from the death of his brother Philometor; but he himself reckoned the years of his reign from the date of his first assumption of the regal title in 170. (Just. xxxix. 1, 2; Jos. Ant. xiii. 9.) Although the character of Ptolemy Physcon was stained by the most infamous vices, and by the most sanguinary cruelty, he still retained that love of letters which appears to have been hereditary in the whole race of the Ptolemies. He had in his youth been a pupil of Aristarchus, and not only courted the society of learned men, but was himself the author of a work called Ἰστορικὰ μνημῆματα, or Memoirs, which extended to twenty-four books. He left two sons: Ptolemy, afterwards known as Soter II., and Alexander, both of whom subsequently ascended the throne of Egypt; and three daughters: (1) Cleopatra, married to her brother Ptolemy Soter; (2) Tryphaena, the wife of Antiochus Grypus, king of Syria; and (3) Selene, who was unmarried at her father's death. To his natural son, Ptolemy, surnamed Apion, he bequeathed by his will the separate kingdom of Cyrene.—VIII., Soter II., and also Philometor, but more commonly called Lathyrus or Lathurus (Λάθουρος), reigned B.C. 117–107, and also 89–81. Although he was of full age at the time of his father's death (117), he was obliged to reign jointly with his mother, Cleopatra, who had been appointed by the will of her late husband to succeed him on the throne. She was, indeed, desirous of associating with herself her younger son, Ptolemy Alexander; but since Lathyrus was popular with the Alexandrians, she was obliged to give way, and sent Alexander to Cyprus. After declaring Lathyrus king, she compelled him to repudiate his sister Cleopatra, of whose influence she was jealous, and to marry his younger sister, Selene, in her stead. (Just. xxxix. 3; Paus. i. 9, 1.) After reigning ten years jointly with his mother, he was expelled from Alexandria by an insurrection of the people which she had excited against him, 107 (Just. xxxix. 4; Jos. Ant. xiii. 10). His brother, Alexander now assumed the sovereignty of Egypt, in conjunction with his mother, while Lathyrus was able to establish himself in the possession of Cyprus. Cleopatra, indeed, attempted to dispossess him of that island also, but without success, and Ptolemy held it as an independent kingdom for the eighteen years during which Cleopatra and Alexander reigned in Egypt. After the death of Cleopatra and the expulsion of Alexander, in 89, Ptolemy Lathyrus was recalled by the Alexandrians and established anew on the throne of Egypt, which he occupied thenceforth without interruption till his death, in 81. The most important event of this period was the revolt of Thebes, in Upper Egypt, which was still powerful enough to hold out for three years against the arms of Ptolemy, but at the end of that time was taken and reduced to the state of ruin in which it has ever since remained (Just. xxxix. 5; Paus. i. 9, 3). Lathyrus reigned in all 35½ years; 10 in conjunction with his mother (117–107), 18 in Cyprus (107–89), and 7½ as sole ruler of Egypt. He left only one daughter, Berenice, called also Cleopatra, who succeeded him on the throne: and two sons, both named Ptolemy, who, though illegitimate, became severally kings of Egypt and Cyprus.—IX., Alexander I., youngest son of Ptolemy VII., reigned conjointly with his mother, Cleopatra, from the expulsion of his brother, Lathyrus, B.C. 107–90. In this year he assassinated his mother; but he had not reigned alone a year when he was compelled by a general sedition of the populace and military to quit Alexandria. He, however, raised fresh troops, but was totally defeated in a sea-fight by the rebels; whereupon Lathyrus was recalled by the Alexandrians to Egypt, as has been already related. Alexander now attempted to make himself master of Cyprus, and invaded that island, but was defeated and slain. He left a son, Alexander, who afterwards ascended the throne of Egypt. (Just. xxxix. 4, 5; Jos. Ant. xiii. 13, 1.)—X., Alexander II., son of the preceding, was at Rome at the death of Ptolemy Lathyrus, in 81. Sulla, who was then dictator, nominated the young Alexander (who had obtained a high place in his favour) king of Egypt, and sent him to take possession of the crown. It was, however, agreed, in deference to the claims of Cleopatra Berenice, the daughter of Lathyrus, whom the Alexandrians had already placed on the throne, that Alexander should marry her, and admit her to share the sovereign power. He complied with the letter of this treaty by marrying Cleopatra, but only nineteen days afterwards caused her to be assassinated. The Alexandrians thereupon rose against their new monarch, and put him to death (App. Mithr. 23; Porphyr. ap. Euseb. Chron. p. 117). It was probably this Alexander, not his predecessor, who bequeathed his dominions and his wealth to the Roman people (Cic. de Leg. Agr. i. 4, 12; 15, 38; 16, 41). The Romans accepted the treasure (which apparently had been deposited at Tyre and not yet transferred to Egypt), but, not wishing to place Egypt in the hands of any Roman consul, they did not take over that country.—XI., Dionysus or Nothus, but more commonly known by the appellation of Auletes, the flute-player (in which capacity he entered into public competition: Strab. p. 796), was an illegitimate son of Ptolemy Lathyrus. When the assassination of Berenice and the death of Alexander II. had completed the extinction of the legitimate race of the Lagidae, Ptolemy was proclaimed king by the Alexandrians, B.C. 80. He was anxious to obtain from the Roman senate (who might now even consider themselves the rightful owners) their ratification of his title to the crown, but it was not till the consulship of Caesar (59) that he was able to purchase by vast bribes the desired privilege. He had expended immense sums in the pursuit of this object, which he was compelled to raise by the imposition of fresh taxes, and the discontent thus excited combining with the contempt entertained for his character, led to his expulsion by the Alexandrians, in 58. Thereupon he proceeded in person to Rome to procure from the senate his restoration (Suet. Jul. 54). His first reception was promising; and he procured a decree from the senate commanding his restoration, and entrusting the charge of effecting it to P. Lentulus Spinther, then consul of Cilicia. Meanwhile, the Alexandrians sent an embassy of 100 of their leading citizens to plead their cause with the Roman senate; but Ptolemy had the audacity to cause the deputies, on their arrival in Italy, to be waylaid, and the greater part of them murdered. The indignation excited at Rome by this proceeding produced a reaction: the tribunes took up the matter against the nobility; and an oracle was produced from the Sibylline books, forbidding the restoration of the king by an armed force. The intrigues and disputes thus raised were protracted throughout the year 56, and at length Ptolemy, despairing of a favourable result, quitted Rome in disgust, and withdrew to Ephesus. (Dio Cass. xxxix. 12-16; Cic. ad Fam. i. 1-7, ad Q. Fr. 2, 3, pro Rabir. 2, 3; Plut. Pomp. 49.) But in 55, A. Gabinius, who was proconsul in Syria, was induced, by the influence of Pompey, aided by the enormous bribe of 10,000 talents from Ptolemy himself, to undertake his restoration. The Alexandrians had in the meantime placed on the throne of Egypt Berenice, the eldest daughter of Ptolemy, who had married Archelaus, the son of the general of Mithridates, and they opposed Gabinius with an army on the confines of the kingdom. They were, however, defeated in three successive battles, Archelaus was slain, and Ptolemy once more established on the throne, 55. One of his first acts was to put to death his daughter, Berenice, and many of the leading citizens of Alexandria. (Dio Cass. xxxix. 55-58.) He survived his restoration only 3½ years, during which time he was supported by a large body of Roman soldiers who had been left behind by Gabinius for his protection (Caes. B. C. iii. 103, 110). He died in 51, after a reign of twenty-nine years from the date of his first accession (Cic. ad Fam. viii. 4). He left two sons, both named Ptolemy, and two daughters, Cleopatra and Arsinoë.—XII., eldest son of the preceding. By his father's will the sovereign power was left to himself and his sister Cleopatra jointly, and this arrangement was carried into effect without opposition, 51. Auletes had also referred the execution of his will to the Roman senate, and the latter accepted the office, confirmed its provisions, and bestowed on Pompey the title of guardian of the young king (Caes. B. C. iii. 108; Eutrop. vi. 21). But the approach of the Civil war prevented them from taking any active part in the administration of affairs, which fell into the hands of a eunuch named Pothinus. It was not long before dissensions broke out between the latter and Cleopatra, which ended in the expulsion of the princess, after she had reigned in conjunction with her brother about three years, 48. Hereupon she took refuge in Syria, and assembled an army, with which she invaded Egypt. The young king, accompanied by his guardians, met her at Pelusium, and it was while the two armies were here encamped opposite to one another that Pompey landed in Egypt, to throw himself as a suppliant on the protection of Ptolemy; but he was assassinated, by the orders of Pothinus, before he could obtain an interview with the king himself. (Caes. B. C. iii. 103, 104; Plut. Pomp. 77-79; App. B. C. ii. 84.) Shortly after, Caesar arrived in Egypt, and took upon himself to settle the dispute between Ptolemy and his sister. But as Cleopatra's charms gained for her the support of Caesar, Pothinus determined to excite an insurrection against Caesar. Hence arose what is usually called the Alexandrian war. Ptolemy, who was at first in Caesar's hands, managed to escape, and put himself at the head of the insurgents, but he was defeated by Caesar, and was drowned in an attempt to escape by the river, 47. (Caes. B. C. iii. 106-112; Dio Cass. xlii. 3-9; Bell. Alex. 1-31.)—XIII., youngest son of Ptolemy Auletes, was appointed by Caesar to reign jointly with Cleopatra, after the death of his elder brother, Ptolemy XII., 47; and although he was a mere boy, it was decreed that he should marry his sister, with whom he was thus to share the power. Both his marriage and his regal title were, of course, purely nominal; and in 43 Cleopatra put him to death. (Dio Cass. xlii. 44, xliii. 27; Strab. p. 797.)

III. Kings of other Countries.

1. Surnamed Alorites (that is, of Alorus), regent, or, according to some authors, king of Macedonia. He obtained the supreme power by the assassination of Alexander II., the eldest son of Amyntas, B.C. 367, but was, in his turn, assassinated by Perdiccas III., 364. (Diod. xv. 7, 7; Plut. Pelop. 26, 27.)—2. Surnamed Apion, king of Cyrene (117-96), was an illegitimate son of Ptolemy Physcon, king of Egypt, who left him by his will the kingdom of Cyrenaica. At his death in 26, Apion bequeathed his kingdom by his will to the Roman people. The senate, however, refused to accept the legacy, and declared the cities of Cyrenaica free. They were not reduced to the condition of a province till nearly thirty years afterwards. (Just. xxxix. 5; Liv. Ep. 70; Eutrop. vi. 11.)—3. Surnamed Ceraunus on account of his rashness (Paus. x. 19, 7), king of Macedonia, was the son of Ptolemy I., king of Egypt, by his second wife, Eurydice. When his father, in 285, set aside the claim of Ceraunus to the throne, and appointed his younger son, Ptolemy Philadelphus, his successor, Ceraunus repaired to the court of Lysimachus. After Lysimachus had perished in battle against Seleucus (281) Ptolemy Ceraunus was received by the latter in the most friendly manner; but shortly afterwards (280) he basely assassinated Seleucus, and took possession of the Macedonian throne. After reigning a few months he was defeated in battle by the Gauls under their chief, Belgius, taken prisoner and put to death. (Just. xvii. 2, xxiv. 1-5; Pol. ix. 35, 4.)—4. Tetrarch of Chalcis in Syria, the son of Mennaeus. He appears to have held the cities of Heliopolis and Chalcis as well as the mountain district of Ituraea, from whence he was in the habit of infesting Damascus and the more wealthy parts of Coele-Syria with predatory incursions. He reigned from about 70 to 40, when he was succeeded by his son Lysanias (Strab. p. 753; Jos. Ant. xiii. 16, xiv. 3).—5. King of Cyprus, was the younger brother of Ptolemy Auletes, king of Egypt, being, like him, an illegitimate son of Ptolemy Lathyrus. He was acknowledged as king of Cyprus at the same time that his brother Auletes obtained possession of the throne of Egypt, 80. He had offended P. Clodius, by neglecting to ransom him when he had fallen into the hands of the Cilician pirates; and accordingly Clodius, when he became tribune (58), brought forward a law to deprive Ptolemy of his kingdom, and reduce Cyprus to a Roman province. Cato, who had to carry into execution this nefarious decree, sent to Ptolemy, advising him to submit, and offering him his personal safety, with the office of high-priest at Paphos, and a liberal maintenance. But the unhappy king refused these offers, and put an end to his own life, 57. (Strab. p. 684; Cic. pro Dom. viii. 20; Plut. Cat. 34-36, Brut. 3.)—6. King of Epirus, was the second son of Alexander II., king of Epirus, and Olympias, and grandson of the great Pyrrhus. He succeeded to the throne on the death of his elder brother, Pyrrhus II., but reigned only a very short time. The date of his reign cannot be fixed with certainty, but as he was contemporary with Demetrius II., king of Macedonia, it may be placed between 239–229. (Just. xxviii. 1, 3; Paus. iv. 35, 3.)—7. King of Mauretania, was the son and successor of Juba II. By his mother, Cleopatra, he was descended from the kings of Egypt, whose name he bore. The period of his accession cannot be determined with certainty, but we know that he was on the throne in A.D. 18. He continued to reign without interruption till A.D. 40, when he was summoned to Rome by Caligula, and shortly after put to death, his great riches having excited the cupidity of the emperor. (Tac. Ann. iv. 23, 26; Suet. Cal. 26, 35; Dio Cass. lix. 25.)

IV. Literary.

1. Claudius Ptolemaeus, a celebrated mathematician, astronomer, and geographer. Of Ptolemy himself we know absolutely nothing but his date. He certainly observed in A.D. 139, at Alexandria; and since he survived Antoninus he was alive A.D. 161. His writings are as follows:—(1) Μεγάλη σύνταξις τῆς ἀστρονομίας, usually known by its Arabic name of Almagest. Since the Tetrabiblus, the work on astrology, was also entitled σύνταξις, the Arabs to distinguish the two, probably called the greater work μεγάλη, and afterwards μεγίστη: the title Almagest is a compound of this last adjective and the Arabic article. The Almagest is divided into thirteen books. It treats of the relations of the earth and heaven; the effect of position upon the earth; the theory of the sun and moon, without which that of the stars cannot be undertaken; the sphere of the fixed stars, and those of the five stars called planets. The seventh and eighth books are the most interesting to the modern astronomer, as they contain a catalogue of the stars. This catalogue gives the longitudes and latitudes of 1022 stars, described by their positions in the constellations. It seems that this catalogue is in the main really that of Hipparchus, altered to Ptolemy's own time by assuming the value of the precession of the equinoxes given by Hipparchus as the least which could be; some changes having also been made by Ptolemy's own observations. Indeed, the whole work of Ptolemy appears to have been based upon the observations of Hipparchus, whom he constantly cites as his authority. The best edition of the Almagest is by Halma, Paris, 1813, 1816, 2 vols. 4to. There are also two other volumes by Halma (1819–1820), which contain some of the other writings of Ptolemy.—(2) Τετραβιβλος σύνταξις, generally called Tetrabiblus, or Quadrupartitum de Apotelesmatibus et Judiciis Astrorum. With this goes another small work, called Καρπὸς, or Fructus Librorum suorum, often called Centiloquium, from its containing a hundred aphorisms. Both of these works are astrological, and it has been doubted by some whether they are genuine. But the doubt merely arises from the feeling that the contents are unworthy of Ptolemy.—(3) Κανὼν Βασιλέων, a catalogue of Assyrian, Persian, Greek, and Roman sovereigns, with the length of their reigns, several times referred to by Syncellus.—(4) Φάσεις ἀπλανῶν ἀστέρων καὶ συναγωγὴ ἐπισημασειῶν, De Apparentiis et Significationibus inerrantium, an annual list of sidereal phenomena.—(5, 6) De Analemmate and Planisphaerium. These works are obtained from the Arabic. The Analemma is a collection of graphical processes for facilitating the construction of sun-dials. The Planisphere is a description of the stereographic projection, in which the eye is at the pole of the circle on which the sphere is projected.—(7) Περὶ ὑποθέσεων τῶν πλανωμένων, De Planetarum Hypothesibus. This is a brief statement of the principal hypotheses employed in the Almagest for the explanation of the heavenly motions.—(8) Ἀρμονικῶν βιβλία γ', a treatise on the theory of the musical scale.—(9) Περὶ κριτηρίου καὶ ἡγεμονικοῦ, De Judicandi Facultate et Animi Principatu, a metaphysical work, attributed to Ptolemy (ed. Hanow, Lips. 1871).—(10) Γεωγραφικὴ ὑφήγησις, in eight books, the great geographical work of Ptolemy. This work was the last attempt made by the ancients to form a complete geographical system; it was accepted as the text-book of the science, and it maintained that position during the middle ages and until the fifteenth century, when the rapid progress of maritime discovery caused it to be superseded. It was based on a work by Maximus of Tyre (Ptol. i. 6). It contains very little information respecting the objects of interest connected with the different countries and places, for, with the exception of the introductory matter in the first book, and the latter part of the work, it is a mere catalogue of the names of places, with their longitudes and latitudes (in which he uses the calculations of Poseidonius), and with a few incidental references to objects of interest. The latitudes of Ptolemy are tolerably correct; but his longitudes are very wide of the truth, his length of the known world, from east to west, being much too great. It is, however, well worthy of remark in passing, that the modern world owes much to this error; for it tended to encourage that belief in the practicability of a western passage to the Indies which occasioned the discovery of America by Columbus. The first book is introductory. The next six and a half books (ii–vii. 4) are occupied with the description of the known world, beginning with the West of Europe, the description of which is contained in book ii.; next comes the East of Europe, in book iii.; then Africa, in book iv.; then Western or Lesser Asia, in book v.; then the Greater Asia, in book vi.; then India, the Chersonesus Aurea, Serica, the Sinae, and Taprobane, in book vii. cc. 1–4. The form in which the description is given is that of lists of places with their longitudes and latitudes, arranged under the heads, first, of the three continents, and then of the several countries and tribes. Prefixed to each section is a brief general description of the boundaries and divisions of the part about to be described; and remarks of a miscellaneous character are interspersed among the lists, to which, however, they bear but a small proportion. The remaining part of the seventh and the whole of the eighth book are occupied with a description of a set of maps of the known world. These maps are still extant, appended to the MSS. of Ptolemy's Geography at Vienna and Venice [AGATHODAEMON].—Editions of the Geographia of Ptolemy are by Petrus Bertius, Lugd. Bat. 1619, fol.; reprinted Antwerp, 1624, fol.; by F. A. Nobbe, Lips. 1845.—2. Of Megalopolis, the son of Agesarchus, wrote a history of king Ptolemy IV. Philopator (Athen. pp. 246, 425).—3. An Egyptian priest, of Mendes, who wrote on the ancient history of Egypt. He probably lived under the first Roman emperors (Syncell.

p. 64).—4. Surnamed Chemnus, a grammarian of Alexandria, flourished under Trajan and Hadrian. An epitome of one of his works is preserved by Photius (cf. Suid. s.v.).

Ptolēmaïs (Πτολεμαῖς: Πτολεμαίτης and Πτολεμαεύς). 1. Also called Ace (Ἀκή, a corruption of the native name, Acco, O. T.: Arab. Akka, Fr. St. Jean d'Acre, Eng. Acre), a celebrated city on the coast of Phoenicia, S. of Tyre, and N. of M. Carmel, lies at the bottom of a bay surrounded by mountains, in a position marked out by nature as a key of the passage between Coele-Syria and Palestine (Strab. p. 758). It is one of the oldest cities of Phoenicia, being mentioned in the Book of Judges (i. 31). Under the Persians it was made the headquarters of the expeditions against Egypt; but it was not till the decline of Tyre that it acquired its great importance as a military and commercial city. The Ptolemy who enlarged and strengthened it, and from whom it obtained its Greek name, was probably Ptolemy I. [see p. 765]. After the change of its name, its citadel continued to be called Ace. Under the Romans it was a colony, and belonged to Galilee (Plin. v. 75). To recount its great celebrity in medieval and modern history does not fall within the province of this work.—2. (At or near El-Lahm), a small town of Middle Egypt, in the Nomos Arsinoïtes, between Arsinoë and Heracleopolis the Great.—3. P. Hermii (Π. ἡ Ἑρμείου, Πτολεμαϊκή πόλις: Menschieh, Ru.), a city of Upper Egypt, on the W. bank of the Nile, below Abydos, was a place of great importance under the Ptolemies, who enlarged and adorned it, and made it a purely Greek city, exempt from all peculiarly Egyptian laws and customs. (Strab. p. 813; Ptol. i. 15, 11, iv. 5, 56.)—4. P. Thērōn, or Epithēras (Π. Θηρών, ἡ ἐπὶ θήρας), a port on the Red Sea, on the coast of the Troglodytae, which Ptolemy Philadelphus enlarged, fortified and renamed as an emporium for the trade with India and Arabia. It was a great depot for ivory and for live elephants. Ptolemaïs was remarkable in the history of mathematical geography, inasmuch as, the sun having been observed to be directly over it forty-five days before and after the summer solstice, the place was taken as one of the fixed points for determining the length of a degree of a great circle on the earth's surface. (Strab. pp. 768-776; Ptol. i. 8, 1, iv. 7, 7, viii. 16, 10.)—5. (Tolmeita or Tolometa, Ru.), on the NW. coast of Cyrenaica, one of the five great cities of the Libyan Pentapolis, was at first only the port of BARCA, which lay 100 stadia (10 geogr. miles) inland, but which was so entirely eclipsed by Ptolemaïs that, under the Romans, even the name of Barca was transferred to the latter city. From which of the Ptolemies it took its name, we are not informed. Its magnificence is attested by its splendid ruins, which are now partly covered by the sea. They are four miles in circumference, and contain the remains of several temples, three theatres, and an aqueduct. [BARCA.]

Ptōon (Πτῶον: Skroponeri), a mountain in Boeotia, an offshoot of Helicon, which extends from the SE. side of the lake Copaïs southwards to the coast (Strab. p. 413).

Publicōla, or Poplicūla, or Poplicōla, a Roman cognomen, signified 'one who courts the people' (from populus and colo), and thus 'a friend of the people.' The form Poplicula or Poplicola was employed down to the end of the republic, but the name was written Publi- cola under the empire, and appears so in the best MSS. of Livy.

Publicōla, Gellius. 1. L., consul with Cn. Lentulus Clodianus, B.C. 72. Both consuls carried on war against Spartacus, but were defeated by the latter. In 70, Gellius was censor, and in 67 and 66 he served as one of Pompey's legates in the war against the pirates. He belonged to the aristocratical party. In 63 he warmly supported Cicero in the suppression of the Catilinarian conspiracy. In 59 he opposed the agrarian law of Caesar, and in 57 he spoke in favour of Cicero's recall from exile. He was alive in 55, when Cicero delivered his speech against Piso, but he probably died soon afterwards. He was married twice. He must have reached a great age, since he is mentioned as the contubernalis of C. Papirius Carbo, who was consul in 120. (App. B.C. i. 117; Plut. Pomp. 22, Cic. 26; Liv. Ep. 96, 98; Cic. ad Att. xii. 21.)—2. L., son of the preceding by his first wife. He espoused the republican party after Caesar's death (44), and went with M. Brutus to Asia. After plotting against the lives of both Brutus and Cassius, he deserted the triumvirs, Octavian and Antony. He was rewarded for his treachery by the consulship in 36. In the war between Octavian and Antony, he espoused the side of the latter, and commanded the right wing of Antony's fleet at the battle of Actium. (Dio Cass. xlix. 54; Plut. Ant. 65; Vell. Pat. ii. 85.)—3. Brother probably of No. 1, is called stepson of L. Marcus Philippus, consul 91, and brother of L. Marcus Philippus, consul 56. According to Cicero's account he was a profligate and a spendthrift, and having dissipated his property, united himself to P. Clodius. (Cic. pro Sest. 51, 52, 110, 111, ad Att. iv. 3, ad Q. Fr. ii. 1.)

Publicōla, or Poplicola, P. Valērius, took an active part in expelling the Tarquins from the city, and was thereupon elected consul with Brutus (B.C. 509). He secured the liberties of the people by proposing several laws, one of the most important of which was that every citizen who was condemned by a magistrate should have the right of appeal to the people. He also ordered the lictors to lower the fasces before the people, as an acknowledgment that their power was superior to that of the consuls. Hence he became so great a favourite with the people, that he received the surname of Poplicola. He was consul three times again: namely, in 508, 507 and 504. He died in 503. He was buried at the public expense, and the matrons mourned for him ten months, as they had done for Brutus. (Liv. i. 58, ii. 2-16; Dionys. iv. 67, v. 12, 40; Plut. Public.)—His descendants bore the same surname, and several of them held the highest offices of state during the early years of the republic.

Publilia, the second wife of M. Tullius Cicero, whom he married B.C. 46. As Cicero was then sixty years of age, and Publilia quite young, the marriage occasioned great scandal. It appears that Cicero was at the time in great pecuniary embarrassments; and after the divorce of Terentia, he was anxious to contract a new marriage for the purpose of obtaining money to pay his debts. Publilia had a large fortune, which had been left to Cicero in trust for her. The marriage proved an unhappy one, as might have been expected, and Cicero divorced her in 45. (Cic. ad Att. xii. 32; Dio Cass. xlv. 18; cf. p. 228, b.)

Publilius Philo. [PHILO.]

Publilius Syrus. [SYRUS.]

Publilius, Volēro, tribune of the plebs B.C. 472, and again 471, effected an important change in the Roman constitution. In virtue of the laws which he proposed, the tribunes of the plebs and the aediles were elected by the comitia tributa, instead of by the comitia centuriata, as had previously been the case, and the tribes obtained the power of passing resolutions on matters affecting the whole nation. It appears also (though there is some doubt about it) that the number of the tribunes was now for the first time raised to five, having been only two previously. (Liv. ii. 55; Dict. of Ant. art. Tribuni.)

Pūcinum (Πούκινον: Duino), a fortress in Venetia, in the territory of the Carni, was situated on a steep rock, about two miles from the sources of the Timavus and sixteen from Trieste. It was famous for its wine. (Plin. iii. 127, xiv. 60.)

Pūdicītia (Αἰδώς), a personification of modesty, was worshipped both in Greece and at Rome. At Athens an altar was dedicated to her. At Rome two sanctuaries were dedicated to her, one under the name of Pudicitia patricia, and the other under that of Pudicitia plebeia. The former was in the Forum Boarium near the temple of Hercules (Liv. x. 23; Fest. p. 242). When the patrician Virginia was driven from this sanctuary by the other patrician women, because she had married the plebeian consul L. Volumnius, she built a separate sanctuary to Pudicitia plebeia in the Vicus Longus. The cult of these altars is said to have fallen into disuse in the second century B.C. (Plin. xvii. 244; Propert. ii. 6, 25). Under the empire it was common to erect altars to ladies of the imperial family under the title of Pudicitia, as a compliment: e.g. to Livia (Val. Max. vi. 1, 11).

Pulcher, Claudius. [CLAUDIUS.]

Pulchēria, eldest daughter of the emperor Arcadius, was born A.D. 399. In 414, when she was only fifteen years of age, she became the guardian of her brother Theodosius, and was declared Augusta or empress. She had the virtual government in her hands during the whole lifetime of her brother, who died in 450. On his death she remained at the head of affairs, and shortly afterwards she married Marcian, with whom she continued to reign in common till her death in 453. Pulcheria was a woman of ability, and was celebrated for her piety and her public and private virtues. [THEODOSIUS II.; VALENTINIANUS III.]

Pulchrum Promontorium (Καλὸν Ἀκρωτήριον), a promontory on the N. coast of the Carthaginian territory in N. Africa, where the elder Scipio Africanus landed; probably identical with the APOLLINIS PROMONTORIUM.

Pullus, L. Jūnius, consul B.C. 249, in the first Punic war. His fleet was destroyed by a storm off Camarina, on account, it was said, of his neglecting the auspices. In despair he put an end to his own life. (Pol. i. 53; Cic. N.D. ii. 3.)

Pupienus Maximus, M. Clōdīus, was elected emperor with Balbinus, in A.D. 238, when the senate received intelligence of the death of the two Gordians in Africa; but the new emperors were slain by the soldiers at Rome in the same year. [BALBINUS.]

Pūpius, a Roman dramatist of the Augustan age, of small merit, whose tragedies are noticed as drawing tears from the less critical part of the audience ('lacrimosa poemata,' Hor. Ep. i. 1, 67; Acro, ad loc.).

Pūra (Πούρα: prob. Bunpur), the capital of Gedrosia, in the interior of the country, on the borders of Carmania. [GEDROSIA.]

Purpurāriæ Insulæ (prob. the Madeira group), a group of islands in the Atlantic Ocean, off the NW. coast of Africa, which are supposed to have derived their name from the purple muscles which abound on the opposite coast of Africa (Gaetulia). (Plin. vi. 203.)

Purpurēo, L. Furius, praetor B.C. 200, obtained Cisalpine Gaul as his province, and gained a brilliant victory over the Gauls who had laid siege to Cremona. He was consul 196, when he defeated the Boii. (Liv. xxxi. 47-49, xxxviii. 44, xxxix. 54.)

Pūtēōlānum, a country-house of Cicero near Puteoli, where he wrote his Quaestiones Academicæ, and where the emperor Hadrian was buried (Cic. ad Att. xiv. 7; Vit. Hadr. 25).

Pūtēōlānus Sinus (Bay of Naples), a bay of the sea on the coast of Campania between the promontory Misenum and the promontory of Minerva, which was originally called Cumānus, but Puteolanus from the town Puteoli. The NW. corner of it was separated by a dike eight stadia in length from the rest of the bay, thus forming the LUCRINUS LACUS.

Pūtēōli (Puteolānus: Pozzuoli), originally named Dicaearchia (Δικαιαρχία, Δικαιάρχεια: Δικαιαρχεύς, Δικαιαρχείτης, -χίτης), a celebrated seaport town of Campania, situated on a promontory on the E. side of the Puteolanus Sinus, and a little to the E. of Cumae, was founded by the Greeks of Cumae, B.C. 521, under the name of Dicaearchia (Strab. p. 245; Steph. Byz. s.v.; cf. Diod. iv. 22, v. 13). In the second Punic war it was fortified by the Romans, who changed its name into that of Puteoli, either from its numerous wells or from the stench arising from the mineral springs in its neighbourhood (Varro, L.L. v. 25; Strab. l.c.). The town was indebted for its importance to its excellent harbour, which was protected by an extensive mole formed from the celebrated reddish earth of the neighbouring hills. This earth, called Pozzolana, when mixed with lime, forms an excellent cement, which in course of time becomes as hard in water as stone. The mole was built on arches like a bridge, and seventeen of the piers are still visible projecting above the water. To this mole Caligula attached a floating bridge, which extended as far as Baiae, a distance of two miles. (Suet. Cal. xix. 32; Dio Cass. lix. 17.) Puteoli was the chief emporium for the commerce with Alexandria and with the greater part of Spain (Liv. xxvi. 17, xxx. 22; Strab. p. 793; Suet. Aug. 98). The town was colonised by the Romans in B.C. 194 (Liv. xxxiv. 45; Plin. iii. 61), and also anew by Augustus, Nero, and Vespasian. It was destroyed by Alaric in A.D. 410, by Genseric in 455, and also by Totila in 545, but was on each occasion speedily rebuilt. There are still many ruins of the ancient town at the modern Pozzuoli. Of these the most important are the remains of the temple of Serapis, of the amphitheatre, and of the mole already described.

Pydna (Πύδνα: Πυδναῖος: Kitron), a town of Macedonia in the district Pieria, was situated at a small distance W. of the Thermaic gulf, on which it had a harbour. It was originally a Greek colony, but it was subdued by the Macedonian kings, from whom, however, it frequently revolted. (Thuc. i. 61, 137; Strab. p. 330, 20, 22.) Towards the end of the Peloponnesian war it was taken after a long siege by Archelaus, and its inhabitants removed twenty stadia inland; but at a later period we still find the town situated on the coast (Diod. xiii. 49). It again revolted from the Macedonians, and was subdued by Philip, who enlarged and fortified the place. It was here that Olympias sustained a long siege against Cassander, B.C. 317-316. (Polyaen. iv. 11, 3.) It is memorable on account of the victory gained under its walls by Aemilius Paulus over Perseus, the last king of Macedonia, 168 (Liv. xlv. 32-46). Under the Romans it was also called Citrum (Strab. l. c.).

Pygēla or Phygēla (Πύγελα, Φύγελα), a small town of Ionia, on the coast of Lydia, with a temple of Artemis Munychia. Tradition ascribed its foundation to Agamemnon. (Xen. Hell. i. 2, 2; Strab. p. 639.)

Pygmaei (Πυγμαῖοι, i.e. men of the height of a pygmē, i.e. 13½ inches), a fabulous people, first mentioned by Homer (Il. iii. 5) as dwelling on the shores of Ocean, and attacked by cranes in spring time. The fable is repeated by numerous writers, in various forms, especially as to the locality, some placing them in Aethiopia, others in India, and others in the extreme N. of the earth. The story is referred to by Ovid and Juvenal, and forms the subject of several works of art. (Arist. H. A. viii. 12; Juv. xiii. 167; Plin. v. 109, vi. 188; Ov. Fast. vi. 176, Met. vi. 90.) It is possible that the stories may have arisen from vague accounts of the dwarfish races in the interior of Africa, such as those which have been met with by recent explorers between the Congo and the Upper Nile.

Pygmalion (Πυγμαλίων). 1. King of Cyprus and father of Metharme. He is said to have fallen in love with the ivory image of a maiden which he himself had made, and therefore to have prayed to Aphrodite to breathe life into it. When the request was granted, Pygmalion married the maiden, and became by her the father of Paphus (Ov. Met. x. 243).—2. Son of Belus and brother of Dido, who murdered Sichaeus, Dido's husband. For details see DIDO.

Pylādes (Πυλάδης). 1. Son of Strophius and Anaxibia, a sister of Agamemnon. His father was king of Phocis, and after the death of Agamemnon, Orestes was secretly carried to his father's court. Here Pylades contracted that friendship with Orestes, which became proverbial. He assisted Orestes in murdering his mother, Clytaemnestra, and also accompanied him to the Tauric Chersonesus; and he eventually married his sister, Electra, by whom he became the father of Hellanicus, Medon, and Strophius. For details see ORESTES.—2. A pantomime dancer in the reign of Augustus, spoken of under BATHYLLUS.

Pylae (Πύλαι, Gates), a general name for any narrow pass, such as THERMOPYLAE, Pylae Albaniae, Caspiae, &c. (See the specific names.)

Pylaemēnes (Πυλαιμένης), appears to have been in early times the name of many princes of Paphlagonia, so as to have become a kind of hereditary appellation (Il. ii. 851, v. 576, xiii. 643; cf. Liv. i. 1).

Pylas. [PYLOS.]

Pylēnē (Πυλήνη), an ancient town of Aetolia on the S. slope of Mount Aracynthus, on whose site Proschium was subsequently built.

Pýlos (Πύλος), the name of three towns on the W. coast of Peloponnesus. 1. A town in the SW. of Messenia, about sixty-three miles from Sparta, situated on the promontory of Coryphasium forming the northern horn of the bay of Navarino, of which the southern horn is occupied by the town called Navarino in the middle ages (the name is supposed to be derived from the Avars), but now more usually Neocastro. The spurs of Mount Aegaleos stretch nearly down to the N. shores of the bay, which forms the largest and safest harbour in all Greece. It was fronted and protected by the small island of Sphacteria (Sphagia), which stretched along the coast about 1½ mile, leaving only two narrow entrances at each end. In the second Messenian war the inhabitants of Pylos offered a long and brave resistance to the Spartans; but after the capture of Ira, they migrated to Cyllene, and thence with the other Messenians to Sicily. (Paus. iv. 8, 1, iv. 23, 1.) The old town of Pylos, of which the ruins are now known as Old Pylos or Old Navarino, is, almost certainly, the place which was traditionally founded by Neleus, and the Pylos of Homer (Il. xi. 681, Od. iii. 4; Paus. iv. 36; cf. Pind. Pyth. vi. 35). In Homer Πύλος also expresses the territory of Nestor generally (Il. xi. 711, 715). The arguments of Strabo (p. 337) in favour of the Triphylian Elis have not much weight. The peninsula of Coryphasium, where stand the ruins of the old town and fortress (some of the walls being of polygonal masonry), is precipitous on the E. and NW. side or towards the lagoon, but on most of the W. side or towards the open sea it slopes gradually, particularly on the SW., where Demosthenes succeeded in preventing the landing of Brasidas and the Lacedaemonians. The promontory is higher at the northern end. Below the ruined fortress at the northern end there is a fine cavern, called Voidhó-Kiliá (Βοῖδὸ-κοιλιά), 'the ox's belly,' which gives name to the small circular port immediately below it, which has been already spoken of. This cavern is sixty feet long, forty wide, and forty high, having a roof like a Gothic arch. The entrance is triangular, thirty feet long and twelve high; at the top of the cavern there is an opening in the surface of the hill above. This, according to the Peloponnesian tradition, was the cave into which the infant Hermes drove the cattle which he had stolen from Apollo [see p. 405, a]. It is mentioned in the Homeric hymn to Hermes as situated upon the sea-side (v. 341); but in Ant. Lib. 23, it is expressly said to have been at Coryphasium. In Ovid (Met. ii. 684) Mercury is represented as beholding from Mount Cyllene the unguarded cattle proceeding into the fields of Pylos. —The bay of Voidhó-Kiliá is separated by a low semicircular ridge of sand from the large shallow lagoon of Osmyn-Aga. As neither Thucydides nor Pausanias says a word about this lagoon, which now forms so striking a feature, we may conclude that it is of recent formation. The peninsula must, in that case have been surrounded with a sandy plain, as Pausanias describes it; and accordingly, if we suppose this to have been the site of the Homeric Pylos, the epithet ἡμαθόεις, which the poet gives to it, would be perfectly applicable. As regards the bay occupied and blockaded by the Athenians in the famous incident of the Peloponnesian war (Thuc. iv. 3-13, 29-40), it seems clear that Arnold and others were mistaken in supposing that it was the lagoon of Osmyn-Aga, originally (as they thought) open to the sea at each end of Coryphasium. The objections to this theory are: (1) that we should then have three neighbouring islands instead of only two (Prote and Sphacteria) as Thucydides describes; (2) that on the promontory, which by Arnold's theory becomes Sphacteria, there are ruins of buildings older than the date of the war, and Thucydides describes the island as never having been inhabited; (3) the name Sphagia probably preserves the old name. There is in truth no difficulty in supposing the entrances to the Bay of Navarino to have widened in the course of 2000 years, and as regards the expression ὁ σμικρός, applied to the harbour, it is not inconsistent with the great size of Navarino. Thucydides would have spoken thus of the largest harbour in Greece. When Epaminondas restored the Messenians to their country, they again occupied Pylos (Pol. xviii. 25; Liv. xxvii. 30; Paus. l. c.). —2. In Elis, at the foot of Mount Scollis, and about seventy or eighty stadia from the city of Elis on the road to Olympia, near the confluence of the Ladon and the Peneus. It is said to have been founded by Pylon or Pylas of Megara, to have been destroyed by Heracles, and to have been afterwards rebuilt by the Eleans. (Paus. iv. 36, 1, vi. 22, 5; Plin. iv. 15.) —3. In Triphylia, about thirty stadia from the coast, on the river Mamaus, W. of the mountain Minthe, and N. of Lepreum (Strab. p. 344).

Pyramia (τὰ Πυράμια), a town of Argolis, in the district Thyreatis, where Danaus is said to have landed.

Pyramon. [CYCLOPES.]

Pyramus. [THISBE.]

Pýramus (Πύραμος: Jihan), one of the largest rivers of Asia Minor, rises in the Anti-Taurus range, near Arabissus in Cataonia (the SE. part of Cappadocia), and, after running SE. first underground and then as a navigable river, breaks through the Taurus chain by a deep and narrow ravine, and then flows SW. through Cilicia, in a deep and rapid stream, about one stadium (606 feet) in width, and falls into the sea near Mallus (Strab. pp. 53, 536). Its ancient name is said to have been Leucosyrus, from the LEUCOSYRI, who dwelt on its banks.

Pýrasus (Πύρασος), a town of Phthiotis in Thessaly, situated in fertile corn-land, whence, probably, its name and also the worship of Demeter in that district (Il. ii. 495, Strab. p. 435). It had been destroyed before Strabo's time, and its place was taken by the town Demetrium in the neighbourhood (Liv. xxviii. 6).

Pýrēnē or Pýrēnaei Montes (Πυρήνη, τὰ Πυρηναῖα ὄρη: Pyrenees), a range of mountains extending from the Atlantic to the Mediterranean, and forming the boundary between Gaul and Spain. The length of these mountains is about 270 miles in a straight line; their breadth varies from about forty miles to twenty; their greatest height is between 11,000 and 12,000 feet. The Romans first became acquainted with these mountains by their campaigns against the Carthaginians in Spain in the second Punic war. Their name, however, had travelled eastward at a much earlier period, since Herodotus (ii. 33) speaks of a city Pyrene belonging to the Celts, near which the Ister rises. The ancient writers usually derived the name from πῦρ, 'fire,' and then, according to a common practice, invented a story to explain the false etymology, relating that a great fire once raged upon the mountains. (Strab. p. 147; Diod. v. 25; Sen. Q. N. 1.) The name is probably connected with the Celtic Byrin or Bryn, 'a mountain.' The continuation of the mountains along the Mare Cantabricum was called Saltus Vasconum, and still further W. Mons Vindius or Vinnius. The Romans were acquainted with only three passes over the Pyrenees: the one on the W. near Carasae (Garis) not far from the Mare Cantabricum; the one in the middle leading from Caesaraugusta to Beneharnum (Barèges); and the one on the E., which was most frequently used, near the coast of the Mediterranean by Juncaria (Junquera). (Strab. p. 160; Liv. xxi. 23; Itin.)

Pýrēnēs Promontorium, or Prom. Vēnēris (C. Creus), the SE. extremity of the Pyrenees in Spain, on the frontiers of Gaul, derived its second name from a temple of Venus on the promontory; below this was a port called Port. Veneris or Pyrenaei Portus, now Vendres (Liv. xxxiv. 8).

Pýrētus (Πυρετός: Pruth), a river of Scythia which falls into the Danube (Hdt. iv. 48).

Pyrgi. 1. (Πύργοι or Πύργος: Pyrgi), the most southernly town of Triphylia in Elis, near the Messenian frontier, said to have been founded by the Minyae (Hdt. iv. 148; Strab. p. 348). —2. (Pyrgensis: Santa Severa), an ancient town on the coast of Etruria, was used as the port of Caere or Agylla, and was a place of considerable importance as a commercial emporium. It was at an early period the headquarters of the Tyrrhenian pirates (Serv. ad Aen. x. 184). It possessed a very wealthy temple of Ilithyia, which Dionysius of Syracuse plundered in B.C. 384. (Strab. p. 226; Diod. xv. 14). Pyrgi is mentioned at a later time as a Roman colony, but lost its importance under the Roman dominion (Liv. xxxvi. 3; Mart. xii. 2). There are still remains at S. Severa of the ancient polygonal walls of Pyrgi.

Pyrgōtēles (Πυργωτέλης), one of the most celebrated gem-engravers of ancient Greece, was a contemporary of Alexander the Great, who placed him on a level with Apelles and Lysippus, by naming him as the only artist who was permitted to engrave seal-rings for the king (Plin. vii. 125, xxxvii. 8).

Pyricus (Πύρικός), a Greek painter, who probably lived soon after the time of Alexander the Great. He devoted himself entirely to the production of small pictures of low and mean subjects.

Pyriphlēgēthōn (Πυριφλεγέθων)—that is, flaming with fire—the name of one of the rivers in the lower world.

Pyromachus or Phyromachus (Πυρόμαχος, Φυρόμαχος: the latter appears to be the more correct form: the name is so written on the inscription). 1. An Athenian sculptor, who executed the bas-reliefs on the frieze of the temple of Athene Polias, about B.C. 408 (C.I.A. i. 324). He is probably the same as the Pyromachus mentioned by Pliny (xxxiv. 80), as author of a sculpture representing Alcibiades driving a chariot.—2. A sculptor of Pergamum (Plin. xxxiv. 84), who worked with Isigonus, Stratonicus and Antigonus in representing the battles of Attalus and Eumenes against the Gauls. The 'Dying Gaul' (the so-called 'Dying Gladiator') of the Capitol is a copy from one of these groups. It is possible that the same sculptors may have executed the figures in the Gigantomachia on the great altar of Pergamum [see p. 364]. It is probable that they worked in the reign of Eumenes II. B.C. 197–159; not, as some have thought, under Eumenes I.

Pyrrha (Πύρρα: Πυρραῖος). 1. A town on the W. coast of the island of Lesbos, on the inner part of the deep bay named after it, and consequently on the narrowest part of the island (Thuc. iii. 18; Strab. p. 617; Athen. p. 88).—2. A town and promontory of Phthiotis in Thessaly, on the Pagasaeon gulf and near the frontiers of Magnesia. Off this promontory there were two small islands, named Pyrrha and Deucalion. (Strab. p. 435).—3. A small Ionic town in Caria on the N. side of the Sinus Latmicus and fifty stadia from the mouth of the Maeander (Strab. p. 636).

Pyrrhi Castra (Πύρρου χάραξ), a fortified place in the N. of Laconica, where Pyrrhus probably encamped in his invasion of the country in B.C. 272 (Pol. v. 19; Liv. xxxv. 27).

Pyrrhichus (Πύρριχος), a town of the Eleuthero-lacones, in the SW. of Laconica (Paus. iii. 21, 7, iii. 25, 1).

Pyrrho (Πύρρων), the founder of the Sceptical or Pyrrhonian school of philosophy, was a native of Elis in Peloponnesus. He is said to have been poor, and to have followed, at first, the profession of a painter. He is then said to have been attracted to philosophy by the books of Democritus, to have attended the lectures of Bryson, a disciple of Stilpon, to have attached himself closely to Anaxarchus, and with him to have joined the expedition of Alexander the Great. During the greater part of his life he lived in retirement, and endeavoured to render himself independent of all external circumstances. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 61–67; Paus. vi. 24, 5; Suid. s.v.) His disciple Timon of Phlius extolled with admiration his divine repose of soul (ἀταραξία), and his indifference to pleasure or pain. So highly was he valued by his fellow-citizens that they made him their high priest, and erected a monument to him after his death. The Athenians conferred upon him the rights of citizenship.—He asserted that certain knowledge on any subject was unattainable; that we must not say 'This is so,' but, 'This seems so'; and that hence the only wisdom is a suspension of judgment (ἐποχή or ἀκαταληψία). This is the virtue which the philosopher will strive after, and the result will be the happiness of tranquillity.—Pyrrho wrote no works, except a poem addressed to Alexander, which was rewarded by the latter in a royal manner. His philosophical system was first reduced to writing by his disciple Timon. The so-called Ten Tropes (δέκα τρόποι) of Pyrrho, which professed to show that everything is relative and nothing positive, should be ascribed to Aenesidemus. He reached the age of ninety years, but we have no mention of the year either of his birth or of his death.

Pyrrhus (Πύρρος). 1. Mythological. [NEOPTOLEMUS].—2. I., king of Epirus, son of Aeacides and Phthia, was born B.C. 318. His ancestors claimed descent from Pyrrhus the son of Achilles, who was said to have settled in Epirus after the Trojan war, and to have become the founder of the race of Molossian kings. (Plut. Pyrrh. 1.) On the deposition of his father by the Epirots [AEACIDES], Pyrrhus, who was then a child of only two years old, was saved from destruction by the faithful adherents of the king, who carried him to Glaucias, the king of the Taulantians, an Illyrian people. Glaucias took the child under his care, and brought him up with his own children. (Just. xvii. 3.) He not only refused to surrender Pyrrhus to Cassander, but about ten years afterwards he marched into Epirus at the head of an army, and placed Pyrrhus on the throne, leaving him, however, under the care of guardians, as he was then only twelve years of age. In the course of four or five years, however, Cassander, who had regained his supremacy in Greece, prevailed upon the Epirots to expel their young king. Pyrrhus, who was still only seventeen years of age, joined Demetrius, who had married his sister Deidamia, accompanied him to Asia, and was present at the battle of Ipsus, 301, in which he gained great renown for his valour. (Plut. Pyrrh. 4.) Antigonus fell in the battle, and Demetrius became a fugitive; but Pyrrhus did not desert his brother-in-law in his misfortunes, and shortly afterwards went for him as a hostage into Egypt. Here he was fortunate enough to win the favour of Berenice, the wife of Ptolemy, and received in marriage Antigone, her daughter by her first husband. Ptolemy, who wished him to counteract the power of Demetrius Poliorcetes, now supplied him with a fleet and forces, with which he returned to Epirus. Neoptolemus, who had reigned from the time that Pyrrhus had been driven from the kingdom, agreed to share the sovereignty with Pyrrhus. But such an arrangement could not last long, and Pyrrhus anticipated his own destruction by putting his rival to death. This appears to have happened in 295, in which year Pyrrhus is said to have begun to reign. He was now twenty-three years old, and he soon became one of the most popular princes of his time. His daring courage made him a favourite with his troops, and his affability and generosity secured the love of his people. He seems at an early age to have taken Alexander as his model, and to have been fired with the ambition of imitating his exploits and treading in his footsteps. His eyes were first directed to the conquest of Macedonia. By assisting Alexander, the son of Cassander, against his brother, Antipater, he obtained possession of the whole of the Macedonian dominions on the western side of Greece. But the Macedonian throne itself fell into the hands of Demetrius, greatly to the disappointment of Pyrrhus. The two former friends now became the most deadly enemies, and open war broke out between them in 291. After the war had been carried on with great vigour and various vicissitudes for four years, Pyrrhus joined the coalition formed in 287 by Seleucus, Ptolemy, and Lysimachus against Demetrius. Lysimachus and Pyrrhus invaded Macedonia; Demetrius was deserted by his troops, and obliged to fly in disguise, and the kingdom was divided between Lysimachus and Pyrrhus. (Plut. Pyrrh. 7-10; Demetr. 41.) But the latter did not long retain his portion; the Macedonians preferred the rule of their old general Lysimachus, and Pyrrhus was accordingly driven out of the country after a reign of seven months (286). For the next few years Pyrrhus reigned quietly in Epirus without embarking in any new enterprise. But a life of inactivity was insupportable to him; and accordingly he readily accepted the invitation of the Tarentines to assist them in their war against the Romans. He crossed over to Italy early in 280, in the thirty-eighth year of his age. He took with him 20,000 foot, 3000 horse, 2000 archers, 500 slingers, and 20 elephants, having previously sent Milo, one of his generals, with a detachment of 3000 men. As soon as he arrived at Tarentum, he began to make vigorous preparations for carrying on the war, and as the giddy and licentious inhabitants of Tarentum complained of the severity of his discipline, he forthwith treated them as their master rather than as their ally, shut up the theatre and all other public places, and compelled their young men to serve in his ranks. In the first campaign (280) the Roman consul, M. Valerius Laevinus, was defeated by Pyrrhus near Heraclea, on the bank of the river Siris. The battle was long and bravely contested, and it was not till Pyrrhus brought forward his elephants, which bore down everything before them, that the Romans took to flight. The loss of Pyrrhus, though inferior to that of the Romans, was still very considerable. A large proportion of his officers and best troops had fallen; and he said, as he viewed the field of battle, 'Another such victory, and I must return to Epirus alone.' (Plut. Pyrrh. 21; Pol. xviii. 11; Flor. i. 18; Dionys. xviii. 1.) He therefore availed himself of his success to send his minister Cineas to Rome with proposals of peace, while he himself marched slowly towards the city. His proposals, however, were rejected by the senate. He accordingly continued his march, ravaging the Roman territory as he went along. He advanced within twenty-four miles of Rome; but as he found it impossible to compel the Romans to accept the peace, and two armies had gathered near Rome, while the forces of Laevinus still menaced his rear, he retraced his steps, and withdrew into winter-quarters to Tarentum. As soon as the armies were quartered for the winter, the Romans sent an embassy to Pyrrhus, to endeavour to obtain the ransom of the Roman prisoners. The ambassadors were received by Pyrrhus in the most distinguished manner, and his interviews with C. Fabricius, who was at the head of the embassy, form one of the most celebrated stories in Roman history [FABRICIUS.] In the second campaign (279) Pyrrhus gained another victory near Asculum over the Romans, who were commanded by the consuls P. Decius Mus and P. Sulpicius Saverrio. The battle, however, was followed by no decisive results, and the brunt of it had again fallen, as in the previous year, almost exclusively on the Greek troops of the king. He was therefore unwilling to hazard his surviving Greeks by another campaign with the Romans, and accordingly he lent a ready ear to the invitations of the Greeks in Sicily, who begged him to come to their assistance against the Carthaginians. The Romans were likewise anxious to get rid of so formidable an opponent, that they might complete the subjugation of southern Italy without further interruption. When both parties had the same wishes, it was not difficult to find a fair pretext for bringing the war to a conclusion. This was afforded at the beginning of the following year (278), by one of the servants of Pyrrhus deserting to the Romans and proposing to the consuls to poison his master. The consuls Fabricius and Aemilius sent back the deserter to the king, stating that they abhorred a victory gained by treason. Thereupon Pyrrhus, to show his gratitude, sent Cineas to Rome with all the Roman prisoners without ransom and without conditions; and the Romans granted him a truce, though not a formal peace, as he had not consented to evacuate Italy. Pyrrhus now crossed over into Sicily, where he remained upwards of two years, from the middle of 478 nearly to the end of 476. At first he met with brilliant success, defeated the Carthaginians and took Eryx; but having failed in an attempt upon Lilybaeum, he lost his popularity with the Greeks, who began to form cabals and plots against him. This led to retaliation on the part of Pyrrhus, and to acts which were deemed arbitrary and tyrannical by the Greeks. His position in Sicily at length became so uncomfortable and dangerous that he soon desired to abandon the island. Accordingly, when his Italian allies again begged him to come to their assistance, he gladly complied with their request. Pyrrhus returned to Italy, where his troops had continued to hold Tarentum, in the autumn of 276. (Plut. Pyrrh. 22-26; Dionys. xix. 6-9; Just. xxiii. 3.) In the following year (275) the war was brought to a close. Pyrrhus was defeated with great loss near Beneventum by the Roman consul Curius Dentatus, and was obliged to leave Italy. He brought back with him to Epirus only 8000 foot and 500 horse, and had not money to maintain even these without undertaking new wars. Accordingly, in 273, he invaded Macedonia, of which Antigonus Gonatas, the son of Demetrius, was then king. His only object at first seems to have been plunder, but his success far exceeded his expectations. Antigonus was deserted by his own troops, and Pyrrhus thus became king of Macedonia a second time. But scarcely had he obtained possession of the kingdom before his restless spirit drove him into new enterprises. On the invitation of Cleonymus he turned his arms against Sparta, but was repulsed in an attack upon this city. From Sparta he marched towards Argos in order to support Aristetas, one of the leading citizens at Argos, against his rival, Aristippus, whose cause was espoused by Antigonus. In the night-time Aristetas admitted Pyrrhus into the city, but the alarm having been given, the citadel and all the strong places were seized by the Argives of the opposite faction. On the dawn of day Pyrrhus saw that it would be necessary for him to retreat; and as he was fighting his way out of the city, an Argive woman hurled down from the house-top a ponderous tile, which struck Pyrrhus on the back of his neck. He fell from his horse stunned with the blow, and being recognised by some of the soldiers of Antigonos, was quickly despatched. His head was cut off and carried to Antigonos, who turned away from the sight, and ordered the body to be interred with becoming honours. (Paus. i. 13; Plut. Pyrrh. 31; Just. xxv. 5.) Pyrrhus perished in 272, in the forty-sixth year of his age, and in the twenty-third of his reign.—He was the greatest warrior and one of the best princes of his time. With his daring courage, his military skill, and his kingly bearing, he might have become the most powerful monarch of his day, if he had steadily pursued the immediate object before him. But he never rested satisfied with any acquisition, and was ever grasping at some fresh object: hence Antigonos compared him to a gambler who made many good throws with the dice but was unable to make the proper use of the game. Pyrrhus was regarded in subsequent times as one of the greatest generals that had ever lived. Hannibal said that of all generals Pyrrhus was the first, Scipio the second, and himself the third; or, according to another version of the story, Alexander was the first, Pyrrhus the second, and himself the third (Plut. Pyrrh. 8, Flam. 21).—Pyrrhus wrote a work on the art of war, which was read in the time of Cicero (Cic. ad Fam. ix. 25); and his commentaries are quoted both by Dionysius and Plutarch. Pyrrhus married four wives: (1) Antigone, the daughter of Berenice; (2) a daughter of Audoleon, king of the Paeonians; (3) Bircenna, a daughter of Bardylis, king of the Illyrians; (4) Lanassa, a daughter of Agathocles of Syracuse. His children were: (1) Ptolemy, born 295, killed in battle, 272; (2) Alexander, who succeeded his father as king of Epirus; (3) Helenus; (4) Nereis, who married Gelo of Syracuse; (5) Olympias, who married her own brother, Alexander; (6) Deidamia or Laodamia.—3. II., king of Epirus, son of Alexander II. and Olympias, and grandson of Pyrrhus I., was a child at the time of his father's death (between 262 and 258). During his minority the kingdom was governed by his mother, Olympias. According to one account, Olympias survived Pyrrhus, who died soon after he had grown up to manhood; according to another account, Olympias had poisoned a maiden to whom Pyrrhus was attached, and was poisoned by him in revenge. (Just. xxviii. 3; Athen. p. 589.)

Pythāgōras (Πυθαγόρας). 1. A celebrated Greek philosopher, was a native of Samos (Hdt. iv. 95), and the son of Mnesarchus, who was a merchant, or, according to other accounts, an engraver. The date of his birth is uncertain, but all authorities agree that he lived in the times of Polycrates and Tarquinius Superbus (B.C. 540–510). He studied in his own country under Creophilus, Pherecydes of Syros, and others, and is said to have visited Egypt and many countries of the East for the purpose of acquiring knowledge. It is therefore quite permissible to accept the dates commonly given: about 580 for his birth; about 540 for his coming to Italy, and about 500 for his death. (Diog. Laërt. viii. 2; Porphyry. Vit. Pyth. 11; Iamblichus. Vit. Pyth. 14.) It is probable that many of his travels (in which he is even said to have visited the Indians in one direction and the Druids of Gaul in another) are fictitious; but there is little doubt that he did visit

Egypt, and it is by no means improbable that he travelled to Babylon. The biographies of Pythagoras are late and fond of dealing with the marvellous. It is impossible to accept with absolute confidence anything but the statements contained in the fragments of Philolaus, or in the writings of Aristotle and Theophrastus, or in citations directly from them. To these may be added as having authority the mention of him in Herodotus, and scanty notices in fragments of Xenophanes, Heraclitus and Plato. No certainty can be arrived at as to the length of time spent by Pythagoras in Egypt or the East, or as to his residence and efforts in Samos or other Grecian cities, before he settled at Crotona in Italy. He probably removed to Crotona because he found it impossible to realise his schemes in his native country while under the tyranny of Polycrates. The reason why he selected Crotona as the sphere of his operations it is impossible to ascertain; but soon after his arrival in that city he attained extensive influence, and gained over great numbers to enter into his views. His adherents were chiefly of the noble and wealthy classes. Three hundred of these were formed into a select brotherhood or club, bound by a sort of vow to Pythagoras and each other, for the purpose of cultivating the religious and ascetic observances of their master, and of studying his religious and philosophical theories. Everything that was done and taught among the members was kept a profound secret from all without its pale. It was an old Pythagorean maxim, that everything was not to be told to everybody. There were also gradations among the members themselves, rising from the Ἀκουσματικοί (Listeners), who were in the class of the 'exoterics,' to the esoteric class of Μαθηματικοί or Students, and Philosophers. In the admission of candidates Pythagoras is said to have placed great reliance on his physiognomical discernment. If admitted, they had to pass through a period of probation lasting from two to five years, in which their powers of maintaining silence were especially tested, as well as their general temper, disposition, and mental capacity. As regards the nature of the esoteric instruction to which only the most approved members of the fraternity were admitted, some have supposed that it had reference to the political views of Pythagoras. Others have maintained, with greater probability, that it related mainly to the orgies, or secret religious doctrines and usages, which undoubtedly formed a prominent feature in the Pythagorean system (Hdt. ii. 83), and were peculiarly connected with the worship of Apollo. Some of his disciples at Crotona are said to have identified Pythagoras himself with the Hyperborean Apollo. There were some outward peculiarities of an ascetic kind in the mode of life to which the members of the brotherhood were subjected. Some represent him as forbidding all animal food; but all the members cannot have been subjected to this prohibition, since the athletic Milo, for instance, could not possibly have dispensed with animal food. According to some ancient authorities, Pythagoras allowed the use of all kinds of animal food except the flesh of oxen used for ploughing, and rams. There is a similar discrepancy as to the prohibition of beans [see below]. But temperance of all kinds seems to have been strictly enjoined. It is also stated that they had common meals, resembling the Spartan syssitia, at which they met in companies of ten. Considerable importance seems to have been attached to music and gymnastics in the daily exercises of the disciples. Their whole discipline is represented as tending to produce a lofty serenity and self-possession, regarding which various anecdotes were current in antiquity. The purity of life which was required in the initiated is called by Plato Πυθαγόρειος τρόπος βίου (Rep. x. p. 600). Among the best ascertained features of the brotherhood are the devoted attachment of the members to each other, and their sovereign contempt for those who did not belong to their ranks. It appears that they had some secret conventional symbols by which members of the fraternity could recognise each other, even if they had never met before. Clubs similar to that at Crotona were established at Sybaris, Metapontum, Tarentum, and other cities of Magna Graecia.—The institutions of Pythagoras were certainly not intended to withdraw those who adopted them from active exertion that they might devote themselves exclusively to religious and philosophical contemplations. He rather aimed at the production of a calm bearing and elevated tone of character, through which those trained in the discipline of the Pythagorean life should exhibit in their personal and social capacities a reflection of the order and harmony of the universe. Whether he had any distinct political designs in the foundation of his brotherhood is doubtful; but it was perfectly natural, even without any express design on his part, that a club such as the Three Hundred of Crotona should gradually come to mingle political with other objects, and by the facilities afforded by their secret and compact organisation should speedily gain extensive political influence. That this influence should be decisively on the side of aristocracy or oligarchy resulted naturally both from the nature of the Pythagorean institutions, and from the rank and social position of the members of the brotherhood. Through them, of course, Pythagoras himself exercised a large amount of indirect influence over the affairs both of Crotona and of other Italian cities. This Pythagorean brotherhood or order resembled in many respects the one founded by Loyola. It is easy to understand how this aristocratical and exclusive club would excite the jealousy and hostility not only of the democratical party in Crotona, but also of a considerable number of the opposite faction. Their political activity was the cause of their downfall, since the hatred which they had excited emboldened their enemies to use force for their suppression. The populace of Crotona rose against them; and an attack was made upon them while they were assembled either in the house of Milo or in some other place of meeting. The building was set on fire, and many of the assembled members perished; only the younger and more active escaped. Similar commotions ensued in the other cities of Magna Graecia in which Pythagorean clubs had been formed. As an active and organised brotherhood the Pythagorean order was everywhere suppressed; but the Pythagoreans still continued to exist as a sect, the members of which kept up among themselves their religious observances and scientific pursuits, while individuals, as in the case of Archytas, acquired now and then great political influence. Respecting the fate of Pythagoras himself, the accounts varied. Some say that he perished with his disciples, others that he fled first to Tarentum, and that, being driven thence, he escaped to Metapontum, and there starved himself to death. His tomb was shown at Metapontum in the time of Cicero. (Cic. de Fin. iv. 2, 4; Diog. Laërt. viii. 40; Iambl. Vit. Pyth. 249; Just. xx. 4.)—According to some accounts Pythagoras married Theano, a native of Crotona, and had a daughter, Damo, and a son, Telauges, or, according to others, two daughters, Damo and Myia; while other notices seem to imply that he had a wife and a daughter grown up when he came to Crotona.—When we come to inquire what were the philosophical or religious opinions held by Pythagoras himself, we are met at the outset by the difficulty that even the authors from whom we have to draw possessed no authentic records bearing upon the age of Pythagoras himself. If Pythagoras ever wrote anything, his writings perished with him, or not long after. The probability is that he wrote nothing. Everything current under his name in antiquity was spurious. It is all but certain that Philolaus was the first who published the Pythagorean doctrines, at any rate in a written form [PHILOLAUS]. Still there was so marked a peculiarity running through the Pythagorean philosophy, that there can be little question as to the germs of the system at any rate having been derived from Pythagoras himself. Pythagoras resembled the philosophers of the Ionic school, who undertook to solve by means of a single primordial principle the vague problem of the origin and constitution of the universe as a whole. His predilection for mathematical studies led him to trace the origin of all things to number, his theory being suggested, or at all events confirmed, by the observation of various numerical relations, or analogies to them, in the phenomena of the universe. According to Philolaus, who may here be representing the actual opinions of Pythagoras, 'Number is that which brings what is obscure within the range of our knowledge, rules all true order of the universe, and allows of no error.' Further it was held by later Pythagoreans, if not by their founder, that since uneven numbers set a limit to the division by two, while even do not, the uneven are limiters or definers (περὶ λυνοῦντες); the even are not. The limiter, which imposes a form, is held to be more perfect than that which is unlimited, and so without definite form, though capable of having form imposed upon it: hence uneven numbers were regarded as lucky, and what seems in part an arbitrary list of ten opposites was drawn up: limited and unlimited; odd and even; one and many; right and left; rest and motion; masculine and feminine; light and darkness; good and evil; straight and crooked; square and oblong. These antithetical principles were the elements (στοιχεῖα) of the universe (Arist. Met. A. 5, Eth. Nic. i. 4, ii. 5), wherein these opposites were brought together by harmony.—Musical principles likewise played almost as important a part in the Pythagorean system as mathematical or numerical ideas. The story, indeed, that Pythagoras discovered the arithmetical relations of the musical scale by observing accidentally the various sounds produced by hammers of different weights striking the same anvil (Diog. Laërt. viii. 12) might have been discovered to be false if the experiment had been verified. But there is no need to doubt his researches into the musical scale. We find running through the entire system the idea that order, or harmony of relation, is the regulating principle of the whole universe. The intervals between the heavenly bodies were supposed to be determined according to the laws and relations of musical harmony. Hence arose the celebrated doctrine of the harmony of the spheres: for the heavenly bodies in their motion could not but occasion a certain sound or note, depending on their distances and velocities; and as these were determined by the laws of harmonical intervals, the notes altogether formed a regular musical scale or harmony. This harmony, however, we do not hear, either because we have been accustomed to it from the first, and have never had an opportunity of contrasting it with stillness, or because the sound is so powerful as to exceed our capacities for hearing.—The ethics of the Pythagoreans consisted more in ascetic practice and maxims for the restraint of the passions, especially of anger, and the cultivation of the power of endurance, than in scientific theory. What of the latter they had was, as might be expected, intimately connected with their number theory. Happiness consisted in the science of the perfection of the virtues of the soul, or in the perfect science of numbers. Likeness to the Deity was to be the object of all our endeavours, man becoming better as he approaches the gods, who are the guardians and guides of men. Great importance was attached to the influence of music in controlling the force of the passions. Self-examination was strongly insisted on. A great feature of the religious doctrines of Pythagoras was the metempsychosis, or transmigration of souls from one man, at his death, into another man, and into animals, and from animals to men. This doctrine Pythagoras adopted from the Orphic mysteries, which again were in all probability more or less derived from Egypt. The transmigration of souls was viewed apparently in the light of a process of purification. Souls under the dominion of sensuality either passed into the bodies of animals, or, if incurable, were thrust down into Tartarus, to meet with expiation or condign punishment. The pure were exalted to higher modes of life, and at last attained to incorporeal existence. Connected with this doctrine is the story told by Xenophanes, that Pythagoras interceded for a dog which was being beaten, because, as he said, he recognised in its cries the voice of a departed friend (Xenoph. Fr. 7); and again, that Pythagoras claimed to have been Euphorbus, a hero of the Trojan war, whose soul had passed into his body. (Porph. Vit. Pyth. 26; Diog. Laërt. viii. 5; Hor. Od. i. 28, 10; cf. Paus. ii. 17, 3.) Ennius is said to have followed the same doctrine, and to have believed that the soul of Homer had passed to him through various bodies, among them that of a peacock, which Persius therefore calls 'pavo Pythagoreus' (vi. 10). The idea that Pythagoras believed the soul of one of his family to have passed into a bean (Hor. Sat. ii. 6, 63) is a mere travesty of his doctrine, founded upon a tradition that Pythagoras forbade his disciples to eat beans (Cic. de Div. i. 30, 62; Lucian, Oneir. 4); and this tradition, moreover, appears to be false (Aristox. ap. Gell. iv. 11).—As regards the fruits of this system of training or belief, it is worthy of remark, that wherever we have notices of distinguished Pythagoreans, we usually hear of them as men of great uprightness, conscientiousness, and self-restraint, and as capable of devoted and enduring friendship. [See ARCHYTAS; DAMON and PHINTIAS].—2. Of Rhegium, one of the most celebrated sculptors of Greece, probably flourished B.C. 480–430.

His most important works appear to have been his statues of athletes (Paus. vi. 13, 1, vi. 18, 1). Pliny notices in especial a statue at Syracuse of a man limping (perhaps Philoctetes) with a sore in his foot, the anguish of which was felt by those who looked at the statue (Plin. xxxiv. 59).

Pythēas (Πυθέας). 1. An Athenian orator, distinguished by his unceasing animosity against Demosthenes. He had no political principles, made no pretensions to honesty, and changed sides as often as suited his convenience or his interest. Of the part that he took in political affairs only two or three facts are recorded. He opposed the honours which the Athenians proposed to confer upon Alexander, but he afterwards espoused the interests of the Macedonian party. He accused Demosthenes of having received bribes from Harpalus. In the Lamian war, B.C. 322, he joined Antipater, and had thus the satisfaction of surviving his great enemy Demosthenes. He is said to have been the author of the well-known saying, that the orations of Demosthenes smelt of the lamp. (Ael. V.H. vii. 7; Plut. Dem. 8; Vit. X. Or. p. 846.)—2. Of Massilia, in Gaul, a celebrated Greek navigator, who sailed to the western and northern parts of Europe, and wrote a work containing the results of his discoveries. He was a contemporary of Aristotle, and lived in the middle of the fourth century B.C., for he is quoted by Dicaearchus, a pupil of Aristotle (Strab. p. 104). He appears to have undertaken two voyages: one in which he visited Britain and Thule, and of which he probably gave an account in his work On the Ocean; and a second, undertaken after his return from his first voyage, in which he coasted along the whole of Europe from Gadir (Cadiz) to the Tanais, and the description of which probably formed the subject of his Periplus. Pytheas made Thule a six days' sail from Britain, and said that the day and the night were each six months long in Thule (Strab. p. 63; Plin. ii. 187). Hence some modern writers have supposed that he must have reached Iceland; while others have maintained that he advanced as far as the Shetland Islands. But either supposition is very improbable, and neither is necessary, for reports of the great length of the day and night in the northern parts of Europe had already reached the Greeks before the time of Pytheas. There has been likewise much dispute as to what river we are to understand by the Tanais. The most probable conjecture is that upon reaching the Elbe, Pytheas concluded that he had arrived at the Tanais, separating Europe from Asia. Pytheas had discovered, probably from his voyage along the N. German coast, that amber came from the north; and he seems to have been the first person who attempted to fix the latitude of a place by the shadow of the sun (Strab. pp. 71, 115). As regards the truth of his information, he was discredited by Strabo (pp. 63, 102, 148, 157), but probably with injustice. He magnified distances, which, if we accept his long voyages as authentic, may well have been due to the slow and tentative manner of sailing in these unknown seas. Neither Strabo nor Polybius (who also doubts him) had travelled as far, and their doubts were therefore in some cases due to want of information.—The fragments of Pytheas are edited by Schmeckel, 1848.—3. A silver-chaser, who flourished at Rome in the age immediately following that of Pompey, and whose productions commanded a remarkably high price (Plin. xxxiii. 156).

Pythias (Πυθίας). 1. The sister or adopted daughter of Hermias, and the wife of Aristotle. —2. Daughter of Aristotle and Pythias. [ARISTOTELES.]

Pythium (Πύθιον). 1. A place in Attica, not far from Eleusis (Strab. p. 392). —2. A town of Thessaly in the E. part of the district Hestiaeotis, which with Azorus and Doliche formed a Tripolis (Liv. xlii. 53; Ptol. iii. 13, 42).

Pythius (Πύθιος). 1. A Lydian, the son of Atys, was a man of enormous wealth, which he derived from his gold mines in the neighbourhood of Celaenae in Phrygia. When Xerxes arrived at Celaenae, Pythius banqueted him and his whole army. His five sons accompanied Xerxes. Pythius, alarmed by an eclipse of the sun which happened, came to Xerxes, and begged that the eldest might be left behind. This request so enraged the king that he had the young man immediately killed and cut in two, and the two portions of his body placed on either side of the road, and then ordered the army to march between them. (Hdt. vii. 21, 38; Sen. de Ira, iii. 17). —2. One of the architects of the Mausoleum of Caria (B.C. 353), and the sculptor of the four-horse chariot of which fragments are in the British Museum (Plin. xxxvi. 31; Dict. of Ant. art. Mausoleum). His name is also written Pythis, Phiteus, and Phileus.

Pythoclides (Πυθοκλείδης), a musician of the time of Pericles, was a native of Ceos, and flourished at Athens, under the patronage of Pericles, whom he instructed in his art (Plat. Protag. p. 316; Plut. Per. 4, de Mus. 16).

Pythodoris (Πυθοδωρίς), wife of Polemon I. king of Pontus. After the death of her husband she retained possession of the government. She subsequently married Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, but after his death (A.D. 17) returned to her own kingdom, of which she continued to administer the affairs herself until her death, which probably did not take place until A.D. 38. Of her two sons, the one, Zenon, became king of Armenia, while the other, Polemon, succeeded her on the throne of Pontus. (Strab. pp. 499, 555–560, 649; POLEMON.)

Pythodorus (Πυθόδορος), an Athenian admiral in the Peloponnesian war. He was unsuccessful in Sicily B.C. 425 and was banished, but held a command again nine years later. (Thuc. iii. 115, iv. 2, 65, vi. 105.)

Pythôn (Πύθων). 1. The serpent which was produced from the mud left on the earth after the deluge of Deucalion. He lived in the caves of Mt. Parnassus, but was slain by Apollo, who founded the Pythian games in commemoration of his victory, and received in consequence the surname Pythius. [APOLLO, p. 88, b.] —2. Of Catania, a dramatic poet of the time of Alexander, whom he accompanied into Asia, and whose army he entertained with a satyric drama when they were celebrating the Dionysia on the banks of the Hydaspes. The drama was in ridicule of Harpalus and the Athenians. (Athen. pp. 586, 595.)

Pyxites (Πυξίτης: Vitche), a river of Pontus, falling into the Euxine near Trapezus (Arrian, Peripl. Pont. p. 6; Plin. vi. 12).

Pyxus. [BUXENTUM.]

Q.

Quadi, a powerful German people of the Suevic race, dwelt in the SE. of Germany, between Mt. Gabreta, the Hercynian forest, the Sarmatian mountains, and the Danube. They were bounded on the W. by the Marcomanni, with whom they were always closely united, on the N. by the Gothini and Osi, on the E. by the Iazyges Metanastae, from whom they were separated by the river Granuas (Gran), and on the S. by the Pannonians, from whom they were divided by the Danube. (Tac. Germ. 42, Ann. xii. 29; Plin. iv. 81.) They probably settled in this district at the same time as the Marcomanni made themselves masters of Bohemia [MARCOMANNI], but we have no account of the earlier settlements of the Quadi. When Maroboduus, and shortly afterwards his successor Catualda, had been expelled from their dominions and had taken refuge with the Romans in the reign of Tiberius, the Romans assigned to the barbarians who had accompanied these monarchs, and who consisted chiefly of Marcomanni and Quadi, the country between the Marus (March) and Cusus (Gusen), and gave to them, as king, Vannius, who belonged to the Quadi, whence Pliny calls the country 'regnum Vannianum' (Tac. Ann. ii. 63; Plin. l.c.). Vannius was expelled by his nephews, Vangio and Sido, but this new kingdom of the Quadi continued for a long time afterwards under Roman protection (Tac. Ann. xii. 29). In the reign of M. Aurelius, however, the Quadi joined the Marcomanni and other German tribes in the long and bloody war against the empire which lasted during the greater part of that emperor's reign (Dio Cass. lxxi. 8–20). The independence of the Quadi and Marcomanni was secured by the peace which Commodus made with them in A.D. 180. Their name is especially memorable in the history of this war by the victory which M. Aurelius gained over them in 174, when his army was in great danger of being destroyed by the barbarians, and was said to have been saved by a sudden storm, which was attributed to the prayers of his Christian soldiers. [See p. 153, b.] The Quadi disappear from history towards the end of the fourth century. They probably migrated with the Suevi further west.

Quadratae (Chivasso), a military station, mentioned in the Itineraries, between Augusta Taurinorum (Turin) and Eporedia (Ivrea).

Quadratus, Asinius, lived in the times of Philippus I. and II., emperors of Rome (A.D. 244–249), and wrote two historical works in the Greek language. (1) A History of Rome, in fifteen books, in the Ionic dialect, called Χιλιετηρίς, because it related the history of the city from its foundation to the one thousandth year after its nativity (A.D. 248), when the Ludi Saeculares were performed with extraordinary pomp. (2) A History of Parthia. (Suid. s.v. Κόδρατος; Dio Cass. lxx. 3; Zos. v. 27.)

Quadratus, Fannius. [FANNIUS, No. 7.]

Quadratus, L. Ninnius, tribune of the plebs B.C. 58, distinguished himself by his opposition to the measures of his colleague P. Clodius against Cicero, and proposed Cicero's recall and the dedication of the property of Clodius to Ceres (Dio Cass. xxxviii. 14, 30; Cic. pro Sest. 31, 68, de Dom. 48, 125).

Quadratus, Ummidius. 1. Governor of Syria during the latter part of the reign of Claudius, and the commencement of the reign of Nero, from about A.D. 51–60. In 52 he marched into Judaea to put down disturbances there. (Jos. Ant. xx. 5, 2, B. J. ii. 12, 5; Tac. Ann. xii. 45, 49, 54.) —2. A friend and admirer of the younger Pliny, whom he took as his model in oratory (Plin. Ep. vi. 11, 29, vii. 24).

Quadrifrons. [JANUS.]

Quadrifrons, Q. Claudius, a Roman annalist who lived about B.C. 120-70. His work, which contained at least twenty-three books, commenced immediately after the destruction of Rome by the Gauls, and must in all probability have come down to the death of Sulla, since the seventh consulship of Marius was commemorated in the nineteenth book. By Livy he is uniformly referred to simply as Claudius or Clodius. By other authors he is cited as Quintius, as Claudius, as Q. Claudius, as Claudius Quadrifrons, or as Quadrifrons. From the caution evinced by Livy in making use of him as an authority, especially in matters relating to numbers, it would appear that he was disposed to indulge, although in a less degree, in those exaggerations which disfigured the productions of his contemporary Valerius Antias. By A. Gellius he is quoted repeatedly, and praised in the warmest terms. (Liv. xxxiii. 10, xxxvi. 19, xxxviii. 23; Gell. x. 13, xiii. 29, xv. 1.) It is possible that he is the Clodius mentioned in Cic. Legg. i. 6, 37.

Quariates, a people in Gallia Narbonensis, on the W. slope of the Alpes Cottiae, on the left bank of the Durance below Briançon. Their name is preserved by the modern Queiras. (Plin. iii. 35.)

Querquetulum (prob. Corcollo), an old town of Latium, NE. of Gabii (Plin. iii. 69; Dionys. v. 61).

Quies, the personification of tranquillity, was worshipped as a divinity by the Romans. She had one sanctuary on the Via Labicana (probably a pleasant resting-place for the weary traveller), and another outside the Porta Collina. (Liv. iv. 41; cf. Cic. Orat. i. 1.) It is probable that this deity is identical with the Diva Fessonia, the protectress of the weary (cf. August. C. D. iv. 16, 21).

Quietus, Q. Lusius, an independent Moorish chief, served with distinction under Trajan both in the Dacian and Parthian wars. Trajan made him governor of Judaea, and raised him to the consulship in A.D. 116 or 117. After Trajan's death he returned to his native country, but he was suspected by Hadrian of fomenting the disturbances which then prevailed in Mauretania, and was shortly afterwards put to death by order of Hadrian. (Dio Cass. lxxviii. 8, 22, 30, 32, lxxix. 2.)

Quintilius Varus. [VARUS.]

Quintia (or Quinctia) Gens, an ancient patrician gens at Rome, was one of the Alban houses removed to Rome by Tullus Hostilius, and enrolled by him among the patricians. Its members often, throughout the whole history of the republic, held the highest offices of the state. Its three most distinguished families bore the name of Capitolinus, Cincinnatus, and Flaminius. [For the question of the connexion of the Quintian gens with the Lupercalia, see Dict. of Ant. s.v.]

Quintilianus, M. Fabius, the most celebrated of Roman rhetoricians, was born at Calagurris (Calahorra), in Spain, A.D. 40 (Auson. Prof. Burd. i. 7). If not reared at Rome, he completed his education there, where his father also was a rhetorician (Quint. ix. 3, 73; Sen. Contr. 10, 2). While he was still a very young man, he attended the lectures of Domitius Afer, who died in 59 (Quint. x. 1, 86, xii. 11, 3). Having revisited Spain, he returned thence (61) in the train of Galba, and forthwith began to practise in the law courts, where he acquired considerable reputation. But he was chiefly distinguished as a teacher of eloquence, bearing away the palm in this department from all his rivals, and associating his name, even to a proverb, with pre-eminence in the art (Plin. Ep. ii. 14, 10; Mart. ii. 90, 1). Among his pupils were numbered Pliny the Younger and the two grand-nephews of Domitian. By this prince he was invested with the insignia and title of consul (consularia ornamenta), and is, moreover, celebrated as the first public instructor who, in virtue of the endowment by Vespasian, received a regular salary from the imperial exchequer. (Suet. Vesp. 3, Dom. 15; cf. Juv. vii. 186.) After having devoted twenty years, commencing probably with 69, to the duties of his profession, he retired into private life, and died probably about the end of the first century. The great work of Quintilian is a complete system of rhetoric in twelve books, entitled De Institutione Oratoria Libri XII, or sometimes, Institutiones Oratoriae, dedicated to his friend Marcellus Victorius, himself a celebrated orator, and a favourite at court. It was written during the reign of Domitian, while the author was discharging his duties as preceptor to the sons of the emperor's niece. In a short preface to his bookseller, Trypho, he acquaints us that he began this undertaking after he had retired from his labours as a public instructor (probably in 89), and that he finished his task in little more than two years. The first book contains a dissertation on the preliminary training requisite before a youth can enter directly upon the studies necessary to mould an accomplished orator, and presents us with a carefully sketched outline of the method to be pursued in educating children, from the time they leave the cradle until they pass from the hands of the grammarian. In the second book we find an exposition of the first principles of rhetoric, together with an investigation into the nature or essence of the art. The five following are devoted to invention and arrangement (inventio, dispositio); the eighth, ninth, tenth, and eleventh to composition (including the proper use of the figures of speech) and delivery, comprised under the general term elocutio; and the last is occupied with what the author considers by far the most important portion of his project, an inquiry, namely, into various circumstances not included in a course of scholastic discipline, but essential to the formation of a perfect public speaker: such as his manners; his moral character; the principles by which he must be guided in undertaking, in preparing, and in conducting causes; the peculiar style of eloquence which he may adopt with greatest advantage; the collateral studies to be pursued; the age at which it is most suitable to commence pleading; the necessity of retiring before the powers begin to fail; and various other kindred topics. This production bears throughout the impress of a clear, sound judgment, keen discrimination and pure taste, improved by extensive reading, deep reflection, and long practice. The diction is highly polished, and graceful. The sections which possess the greatest interest for general readers are those chapters in the first book which relate to elementary education, and the first part of the tenth book, which furnishes us with a compressed but valuable history of Greek and Roman literature. There are also extant 164 declamations under the name of Quintilian, nineteen of considerable length; the remaining 145, which form the concluding portion only of a collection which originally extended to 388 pieces, are mere skeletons or fragments. The nineteen longer declamations are unquestionably of a later date; and it is improbable that the few scholars who believe the remaining 145 to be by Quintilian are right in their opinion. They apparently belong, not only to different persons, but to different periods, and neither in style nor in substance are they valuable. They are edited by Burmann, 1720.—Editions of Quintilian by Burmann, 1720; C. Halm, 1868; Petersen, Oxford, 1891: a separate edition of book x. by J. E. B. Mayor, 1872; Krüger, 1888.

Quintillus, M. Aurélius, the brother of the emperor M. Aurelius Claudius, was elevated to the throne by the troops whom he commanded at Aquileia, in A.D. 270. But as the army at Sirmium, where Claudius died, had proclaimed Aurelian emperor, Quintillus put an end to his own life, seeing himself deserted by his own soldiers, to whom the rigour of his discipline had given offence. (Trebell. Claud. 10-13; Eutrop. ix. 12; Zos. i. 47.)

T. Quintus Capitolinus Barbatus, a celebrated general in the early history of the republic, and equally distinguished in the internal history of the state. He frequently acted as mediator between the patricians and plebeians, by both of whom he was held in the highest esteem. He was six times consul: namely, in B.C. 471, 468, 465, 446, 443, 439. (Liv. ii. 56, iii. 2, 66.) Several of his descendants held the consulship, but none of these require mention except T. Quintus Pennus Capitolinus Crispinus, who was consul 208, and was defeated by Hannibal (Liv. xxv. 18, xxvii. 27; Pol. x. 32).

Quintus, an eminent physician at Rome, in the first half of the second century after Christ. He was so much superior to his medical colleagues that they grew jealous of his eminence, and formed a sort of coalition against him, and forced him to quit the city by charging him with killing his patients. He died about A.D. 148.

Quintus Curtius. [CURTIUS.]

Quintus Smyrnaeus (Κόϊντος Σμυρναῖος), commonly called Quintus Calaber, from the circumstance that the first copy through which his poem became known was found in a convent at Otranto in Calabria. He was the author of an epic poem in fourteen books, entitled Τὰ μετ' Ὀμήρου (Posthomericæ), or Παραλειπόμενα Ὀμήρου. Scarcely anything is known of his personal history; but it appears most probable that he lived towards the end of the fourth century after Christ. The matters treated of in his poem are the events of the Trojan war from the death of Hector to the return of the Greeks. The materials for his poem he found in the works of the earlier poets of the Epic Cycle. In phraseology, similes, and other technicalities, Quintus closely copied Homer. But not a single poetical idea of his own seems ever to have inspired him. His gods and heroes are alike devoid of all character: everything like pathos or moral interest was quite beyond his powers. With respect to chronology his poem is as punctual as a diary. His style, however, is clear, and marked on the whole by purity and good taste, without any bombast or exaggeration. There can be little doubt that his work is nothing more than an amplification or remodelling of the poems of Arctinus and Lesches. He appears to have also made diligent use of Apollonius.—Edited by A. Köchly, Lips. 1853.

Quirinalis Mons. [ROMA.]

Quirinus was the name under which the Sabine and Latin god Mars was worshipped in old times upon the Quirinal by the people who were settled there (whether we call them Sabines or 'Hill' Romans) in the same manner as Mars was worshipped by the Montani, or Romans on the Palatine (Varro, L. L. v. 51; Dionys. ii. 48). From the idea of his Sabine origin he was represented as father of Modius Fabidius the traditional founder of Cures, just as Mars was the father of Romulus in Roman legend (Ov. Fast. ii. 475; iv. 56, 808). It is likely enough that the name Quirinus was originally an adjective in the title Mars Quirinus, i.e. 'Mars the god of the spear' (quiris), or of 'the assembled citizens,' and that in Sabine usage it was taken as the name of the god himself. As regards the etymology, it is an open question whether that from quiris, or that from Curia is correct. It is not likely that the old derivation of Quirinus and Quirites from the town Cures is correct. After the complete union of the two settlements it was natural that both worships should be preserved, and in the religious system ascribed to Numa, Jupiter, Mars and Quirinus were worshipped as great deities, and for Quirinus there were a special priest, the Flamen Quirinalis, and a special festival, Quirinalia (Liv. i. 20; Ov. Fast. ii. 475, iv. 910). The attributes and functions of Quirinus were the same as those of Mars, for he was the god of agriculture as well as of war [see p. 529, b.]. Hence the Flamen Quirinalis presided also at the festivals of Acca Larentia and Robigus. With Quirinus was associated Hora or Horta Quirini (Non. p. 120; Plut. Q. R. 46), who was the same as Hersilia (Ov. Met. xiv. 832). This association corresponded to the union of Mars and Nerio [see p. 530, a.]. In course of time, since the deities Mars and Quirinus were essentially the same, the name Mars was given generally to the great deity, and Quirinus became the title of Romulus, the founder and hero of the united Roman people, represented as the son of Mars (Verg. Georg. iii. 27, Aen. i. 292; Ov. Fast. vi. 375; Juv. xi. 105).

Quirinus, P. Sulpicius, was a native of Lanuvium, and of obscure origin, but was raised to the highest honours by Augustus. He was consul B.C. 12, and subsequently carried on war against some of the robber tribes dwelling in the mountains of Cilicia. In B.C. 1, Augustus appointed him to direct the counsels of his grandson, C. Caesar, then in Armenia. (Dio Cass. liv. 25; Tac. Ann. ii. 30, iii. 22; Strab. p. 569.) Some years afterwards, but not before A.D. 5, he was appointed governor of Syria, and while in this office, according to Josephus, he took a census of the Jewish people (Jos. Ant. xviii. 1, 1; see further in Dict. of the Bible). Quirinus had been married to Aemilia Lepida, whom he divorced; but in A.D. 20, twenty years after the divorce, he brought an accusation against her (Suet. Tib. 49). The conduct of Quirinus met with general disapprobation as harsh and revengeful. He died in A.D. 21, and was honoured with a public funeral. (Tac. Ann. iii. 48.)

Quiza (Κοῖζα: Giza near Oran), a municipium on the coast of Mauretania Caesariensis in N. Africa, on the river Chydemath, between Arsenaria and Portus Magnus (Ptol. iv. 2, 3; Plin. v. 19).

Rabathmōba ('Ραβαθμῶβα, i.e. Rabbath-Moab, O. T., also called Rabbah, and aft. Areopōlis: Rabbah), the ancient capital of the Moabites, lay in a fertile plain, on the E. side of the Dead Sea, and S. of the river Arnon, in the district of Moabitis in Arabia Petraea, or, according to the later division of the provinces, in Palaestina Tertia (Steph. Byz. s.v.).

Rabbatāmāna ('Ραβαθἀμᾶνα, i.e. Rabbath-Ammon, O. T.: Amman, Ru.), the ancient capital of the Ammonites, lay in Peraea on a S. tributary of the Jabbok, NE. of the Dead Sea [see Dict. of Bible, s.v.]. Ptolemy II. Philadelphus gave it the name of Philadelphia; and it long continued a flourishing and splendid city (Jos. B. J. i. 6, 3; Plin. v. 74; Amm. Marc. xiv. 8, 8).

Rābirius. 1. C., an aged senator, was accused in B.C. 63, by T. Labienus, tribune of the plebs, of having put to death the tribune L. Appuleius Saturninus in 100, nearly forty years before. [SATURNINUS.] The accusation was set on foot at the instigation of Caesar, who judged it necessary to deter the senate from resorting to arms against the popular party, by some measure which would mark the sovereignty of the people and the sanctity of the tribunes. To make the warning still more striking, Labienus did not proceed against him on the charge of majestas, but revived the old accusation of perduellio, which had been discontinued for some centuries. The Duoviri Perduellionis appointed to try Rabirius were C. Caesar himself and his relative, L. Caesar. With such judges the result could not be doubtful: Rabirius was forthwith condemned; and the sentence of death would have been carried into effect had he not availed himself of his right of appeal to the people in the comitia of the centuries. The case excited the greatest interest; since it was not simply the life or death of Rabirius, but the power and authority of the senate, which were at stake. Rabirius was defended by Cicero; but the eloquence of his advocate was of no avail, and the people would have ratified the decision of the duumvirs had not the meeting been broken up by the praetor, Q. Metellus Celer, who removed the military flag which floated on the Janiculum. (Dio Cass. xxxvii. 26-28; Suet. Jul. 12; Cic. pro Rabir.) This was in accordance with an ancient custom, which was intended to prevent the Campus Martius from being surprised by an enemy when the territory of Rome scarcely extended beyond the boundaries of the city.—2. C. Rabirius Postumus, was the son of the sister of the preceding. He was born after the death of his father, C. Curius, whence his surname, Postumus; and he was adopted by his uncle, whence his name, C. Rabirius. He had lent large sums of money to Ptolemy Auletes; and after the restoration of Ptolemy to his kingdom by means of Gabinius, in B.C. 55, Rabirius repaired to Alexandria, and was invested by the king with the office of Diocetes, or chief treasurer. In this office he had to amass money both for himself and for Gabinius; but his extortions were so terrible that Ptolemy had him apprehended, either to secure him against the wrath of the people, or to satisfy their indignation, lest they should drive him again from his kingdom. Rabirius escaped from prison, probably through the connivance of the king, and returned to Rome. Here a trial awaited him. Gabinius had been sentenced to pay a heavy fine on account of his extortions in Egypt; and as he was unable to pay this fine, a suit was instituted against Rabirius, who was liable to make up the deficiency, if it could be proved that he had received any of the money of which Gabinius had illegally become possessed (Cic. pro Rab. Post.). Rabirius was defended by Cicero, and was probably condemned and banished. He is mentioned at a later time (46) as serving under Caesar, who sent him from Africa into Sicily, in order to obtain provisions for his army (Bell. Afr. 8; Suet. Jul. 12).—3. A Roman epic poet, contemporary with Ovid, who is praised by Ovid and Paternulus, and considered worth reading by Quintilian (Ov. Pont. iv. 16, 5; Vell. Pat. ii. 36, 3; Quint. x. 1, 90). He wrote a poem on the Civil wars. A portion of this poem was found at Herculaneum, and was edited by Kreyssig, under the title Carminis Latini de bello Actiaco s. Alexandrino fragmenta, 4to, Schneeberg, 1814. It is included in Böhrens' Poët. Lat. Min. 1879.—4. Epicurean philosopher. [AMAFINIUS].

L. Racilius, tribune of the plebs B.C. 56, and a warm friend of Cicero and of Lentulus Spinther. In the Civil war Racilius espoused Caesar's party, and was with his army in Spain in 48. There he entered into the conspiracy formed against the life of Q. Cassius Longinus, the governor of that province, and was put to death, with the other conspirators. (Cic. ad Q. F. ii. 1, ad Fam. i. 7; Bell. Alex. 52.)

Radagaisus, a Scythian, invaded Italy at the head of a formidable host of barbarians in the reign of the emperor Honorius. He was defeated by Stilicho, near Florence, in A.D. 408, and was put to death after the battle, although he had capitulated on condition that his life should be spared. (Zos. v. 26; Oros. vii. 37.)

Raetia, or, less correctly, Rhaetia, a Roman province S. of the Danube, was originally distinct from Vindelicia, and was bounded on the W. by the Helvetii, on the E. by Noricum, on the N. by Vindelicia, and on the S. by Cisalpine Gaul, thus corresponding to the Grisons in Switzerland, and to the greater part of the Tyrol. Raetia, like the adjoining districts, was conquered by Drusus and Tiberius, B.C. 15, and was at first a distinct province (Suet. Aug. 21; Vell. Pat. ii. 39; Liv. Ep. 136). Towards the end of the first century, however, Vindelicia was added to the province of Raetia, whence Tacitus speaks of Augusta Vindelicorum as situated in Raetia. At a later time Raetia was subdivided into two provinces, Raetia Prima and Raetia Secunda, the former of which answered to the old province of Raetia, and the latter to that of Vindelicia. The boundaries between the two provinces are not accurately defined, but it may be stated in general that they were separated from each other by the Brigantinus Lacus (Lake of Constance) and the river Oenus (Inn). Vindelicia is spoken of in a separate article. [VINDELICIA.] Raetia was a very mountainous country, since the main chain of the Alps ran through the greater part of the province. These mountains were called Alpes Raeticae or Raetae, and extended from the St. Gothard to the Orteler by the pass of the Stelvio, and in them rose the Oenus (Inn) and most of the chief rivers in the N. of Italy, such as the Athesis (Adige) and the Addua (Adda). The valleys produced corn and excellent wine, the latter of which was much esteemed in Italy. Augustus drank Raetian wine in preference to all others. The original inhabitants of the country, the Raeti, are said by most ancient writers to have been Tuscans who were driven out of the N. of Italy by the invasion of the Celts, and who took refuge in this mountainous district under a leader called Raetus. (Strab. pp. 204, 292, 313; Plin. iii. 133.) [For the question of the connexion of Raetians and Etruscans, see p. 328, b.] In the time of the Romans the country was inhabited by various Celtic tribes. The Raeti are first mentioned by Polybius (xxxiv. 10). They were a brave and warlike people, and caused the Romans much trouble by their marauding incursions into Gaul and the N. of Italy. They were not subdued by the Romans till the reign of Augustus, and they offered a brave and desperate resistance against both Drusus and Tiberius, who finally conquered them, as has been mentioned above (cf. Hor. Od. iv. 14). The Raeti were divided into several tribes, such as the LEPONTII, VENNONES, TRIDENTINI, &c. The only town in Raetia of any importance was TRIDENTINUM (Trent).

Rāgae or Rhāgae (Ραγαί, Ράγα, Ραγαί: Ραγηνός: Rai, Ru. SE. of Tehran), the greatest city of Media, lay in the extreme N. of Great Media, at the S. foot of the mountains (Caspian M.) which border the S. shores of the Caspian Sea, and on the W. side of the great pass through those mountains called the Caspiae Pylae (Arrian, An. iii. 20; Strab. pp. 514, 524). It was therefore the key of Media towards Parthia and Hyrcania. Having been destroyed by an earthquake, it was restored by Seleucus Nicator, and named Eurōpus (Εὐρώπος). In the Parthian wars it was again destroyed, but it was rebuilt by Arsaces (Strab. p. 524), and called Arsacia (Ἀρσακία). In the middle ages it was still a great city under its original name, slightly altered (Rai); and it was finally destroyed by the Tartars in the twelfth century. The surrounding district, which was a rugged volcanic region, subject to frequent earthquakes, was called Ραγιαρῆ.

Rambacia (Ραμβακία), the chief city of the Oritae, on the coast of Gedrosia, colonised by Alexander the Great (Arrian, An. vi. 21).

Ramitha. [LAODICEA, No. 3.]

Ramses or Ramessu, the name of thirteen kings of Egypt of the eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth dynasties. The second and third of these kings were known to the Greeks as SESOSTRIS and RHAMPSINITUS.

Raphāna or Raphaneae (Ραφανεία: Rafaniat, Ru.), a city of Syria, in the district of Cassiotis, at the N. extremity of Lebanon (Jos. B. J. vii. 5, 1).

Raphia or Raphēa (Ραφία, Ράφεια: Repha), a seaport town in the extreme SW. of Palestine, beyond Gaza, on the edge of the desert. It was restored by Gabinius. (Pol. v. 80; Strab. p. 759; Jos. Ant. xiii. 13, 3.)

Rasēna. [ETRURIA.]

Ratiārīa (Archer), an important town in Moesia Superior on the Danube, the headquarters of a Roman legion, and the station of one of the Roman fleets on the Danube (Ptol. iii. 9, 4; Procop. Aed. iv. 6).

Ratomagus. [ROTOMAGUS.]

Raudiī Campi. [CAMPI RAUDII.]

Raurāci, a people in Gallia Belgica, bounded on the S. by the Helvetii, on the W. by the Sequani, on the N. by the Tribocci, and on the E. by the Rhine. They must have been a people of considerable importance, as 23,000 of them are said to have emigrated with the Helvetii in B.C. 58, and they possessed several towns, of which the most important were Augusta (Augst) and Argentovaria (Horburg). Basilia (Bâle) was in their territory (Ptol. ii. 9, 18; Plin. iv. 106).

Rauranum (Rom or Raum, nr. Chenay), a town of the Pictones in Gallia Aquitania, S. of Limonum.

Rāvenna (Ravennas, -ātis: Ravenna), an important town in Gallia Cisalpina, on the river Bedesis and about a mile from the sea, though it is now about four miles in the interior in consequence of the sea having receded all along this coast. Ravenna was situated in the midst of marshes, and was only accessible in one direction by land, probably by the road leading from Ariminum. The town laid claim to a high antiquity. It was said to have been founded by Thessalians, and afterwards to have passed into the hands of the Umbrians (Strab. pp. 214, 217), but it long remained an insignificant place. It is mentioned as being occupied by Metellus, the lieutenant of Sulla, in B.C. 82 (App. B. C. i. 89); and its name occurs frequently in the civil wars between Antony and Octavian (App. B. C. iii. 42, v. 33, 50). It is probable that Augustus made Ravenna a colony, but its great importance began when he made it one of the two chief stations of the Roman fleet. He not only enlarged the town, but caused a large harbour to be constructed on the coast, capable of containing 240 triremes, and he connected this harbour with the Po by means of a canal called Padusa or Augusta Fossa (Plin. iii. 119; Jordan. Get. 29). This harbour was called Classes, and between it and Ravenna a new town sprang up, to which the name of Caesarea was given. All three were subsequently formed into one town, and were surrounded by strong fortifications. Ravenna thus suddenly became one of the most important places in the N. of Italy. It held the position for the Adriatic which Misenum had for the other coast of Italy, as a permanent station of a fleet (Tac. Ann. iv. 5, Hist. ii. 100; Veget. R. M. v. 1), and under the later empire was no less important as a military fortress. The town itself, however, was mean in appearance. In consequence of the marshy nature of the soil, most of the houses were built of wood, and since an arm of the canal was carried through some of the principal streets, the communication was carried on to a great extent by gondolas, as in modern Venice. The town also was very deficient in a supply of good drinking-water; but it was not considered unhealthy, since the canals drained the marshes to a great extent, and the ebb and flow of the tide prevented the waters from stagnating. In the neighbourhood good wine was made, notwithstanding the marshy nature of the soil. When the Roman empire was threatened by the barbarians, the emperors of the West took up their residence at Ravenna, which, on account of its situation and its fortifications, was regarded as impregnable. After the downfall of the Western empire, Theodoric also made it the capital of his kingdom; and after the overthrow of the Gothic dominion by Narses, it became the residence of the Exarchs or the Governors of the Byzantine empire in Italy, till the Lombards took the town, A.D. 752. The modern Ravenna stands on the site of the ancient town; the village Porto di Fuori on the site of Caesarea; and the ancient harbour is called Porto Vecchio del Caudiano, but the accumulation of alluvial deposit has pushed the coast further out, and Ravenna now stands at a distance of four miles from the sea, from which it is separated by a sandy tract covered with pine woods.

Rēatē (Reatinus: Rieti), an ancient town of the Sabines in central Italy, said to have been founded by the Aborigines or Pelasgians, was situated on the Lacus Velinus and the Via Salaria (Dionys. ii. 49). It was the chief place of assembly for the Sabines, and was subsequently a praefectura (Cic. Cat. iii. 2, N. D. ii. 2). Later it was a municipium. The valley in which Reate was situated was so beautiful that it received the name of Tempe (Cic. ad Att. iv. 15), and in its neighbourhood is the celebrated waterfall which is now known under the name of the fall of Terni. This waterfall owed its origin to a canal constructed by M. Curius Dentatus, in order to carry off the superfluous waters from the lake Velinus into the river Nar. It falls into this river from a height of 140 feet. By this undertaking, the Reatini gained a large quantity of land, which was called Rosea Rura. (Verg. Aen. vii. 712; Serv. ad loc.; Varro, R. R. i. 7, 10, ii. 1, 16; Dict. of Ant. art. Emissarium.)—Reate was celebrated for its mules and asses (Varro, R. R. ii. 1, 8).

Rebilus, C. Caninius, was one of Caesar's legates in Gaul B.C. 52 and 51 (Caes. B. G. vii. 83, 90, viii. 24). He followed Caesar to Italy in 49, fought in Africa in that year, and again in 46, when he took possession of Thapsus (Caes. B. C. i. 26, ii. 24; Bell. Afr. 86, 93). On the last day of the year 45 he was appointed consul to supply the place of Fabius, who had died suddenly. The consulship, therefore, of Rebilus lasted only one day. (Cic. ad Fam. vii. 30; Suet. Jul. 76; Dio Cass. xliii. 46; Tac. Hist. iii. 37.)

Redicūlus, a Roman divinity who had a temple near the Porta Capena, and who received his name from having induced Hannibal, when he was near the gates of the city, to return (redire) southward. A place on the Appian road, near the second milestone from the city, was called Campus Rediculi. [INDIGETES, p. 443, a.]

Redōnes, a people in the W. of Gallia Lugdunensis, whose chief town was Condate (Rennes) (Caes. B. G. ii. 34, vii. 75).

Rēdux. [FORTUNA.]

Regaliānus, Regalliānus, or Regilliānus, a Dacian, who served with distinction under the emperors Claudius and Valerian. The Moesians, terrified by the cruelties inflicted by Gallienus on those who had taken part in the rebellion of Ingenuus, suddenly proclaimed Regalianus emperor, and, with the consent of the soldiers, in a new fit of alarm, put him to death, A.D. 263. Hence he is enumerated among the Thirty Tyrants. (Vict. Caes. xxxiii.; Trebell. Poll. Trig. Tyr. ix.)

Regiāna or Regina (Villa de Reyna), a town in Hispania Baetica on the road from Astigi (Ecija) to Emerita (Ptol. ii. 4, 13; Plin. iii. 15).

Regillum, a small place in the Sabine territory, from which Appius Claudius migrated to Rome. Its site is uncertain, as it disappeared at an early period. (Liv. ii. 16; Dionys. v. 40; Suet. Tib. 1.)

Regillus, Aemilius. 1. M., had been declared consul, with T. Otacilius, for B.C. 214, by the centuria praerogativa, and would have been elected had not Q. Fabius Maximus, who presided at the comitia, pointed out that there was need of generals of more experience to cope with Hannibal. Regillus died in 205, at which time he is spoken of as Flamen Martialis. (Liv. xxiv. 7, xxix. 11.)—2. L., son of the preceding, was praetor 190, when he received the command of the fleet in the war against Antiochus (Liv. xxxvii. 14–32; App. Syr. 26).

Regillus Lacus (L. di Cornufelle), a lake in Latium, memorable for the victory gained on its banks by the Romans over the Latins, B.C. 498 (Liv. ii. 19; Dionys. vi. 3). It was E. of Rome, in the territory of Tusculum, and between Lavicum and Gabii. The lake with which it is identified is a volcanic crater, which has in modern times been drained.

Reginum or Castra Regina (Regensburg), a Roman fortress in Vindelicia on the Danube, and on the road to Vindobona, was the headquarters of a Roman legion. [VINDELICIA.]

Regium Flumen. [NAARMALCHA.]

Regium Lepidi, Regium Lepidum, or simply Regium, also Forum Lepidi (Regienses a Lepido: Reggio), a town of the Boii in Gallia Cisalpina, between Mutina and Tarentum, which was probably made a colony by the consul M. Aemilius Lepidus when he constructed the Aemilia Via through Cisalpine Gaul, though we have no record of the foundation of the colony (Strab. p. 216; Plin. iii. 116; Cic. ad Fam. xi. 9; Tac. Hist. ii. 50).

Regni, a people on the S. coast of Britain, in Sussex, whose chief town bore the same name, and probably is represented by Chichester (Ptol. ii. 3, 28).

Rēgūlus, M. Aquilius, was one of the delatores or informers in the time of Nero, and thus rose from poverty to great wealth. Under Domitian he resumed his old trade, and became one of the instruments of that tyrant's cruelty. He survived Domitian, and is frequently spoken of by Pliny with the greatest detestation and contempt (Ep. i. 5, ii. 10, vi. 2). Martial, on the contrary, who flattered all the creatures of Domitian, celebrates the virtues, the wisdom, and the eloquence of Regulus (Mart. i. 13, 83, 112).

Rēgulus, Atilius. 1. M., consul B.C. 335, carried on war against the Sidicini (Liv. viii. 16).—2. M., consul 294, carried on war against the Samnites (Liv. x. 32).—3. M., consul 267, conquered the Sallentini, took the town of Brundisium, and obtained in consequence the honour of a triumph (Flor. i. 20). In 256, he was consul a second time with L. Manlius Vulso Longus. The two consuls defeated the Carthaginian fleet at Ecnomus, and afterwards landed in Africa with a large force. They met with great and striking success; and after Manlius returned to Rome with half of the army, Regulus remained in Africa with the other half, and prosecuted the war with the utmost vigour. (Pol. i. 29; Flor. ii. 2, 10.) The Carthaginian generals, Hasdrubal, Bostar, and Hamilcar, avoided the plains, where their cavalry and elephants would have given them an advantage over the Roman army, and withdrew into the mountains. There they were attacked by Regulus, and defeated with great loss: 15,000 men are said to have been killed in battle, and 5000 men, with eighteen elephants, to have been taken. The Carthaginian troops retired within the walls of the city, and Regulus now overran the country without opposition. (Pol. i. 30, 31.) Numerous towns fell into the power of the Romans, and among others Tunis, at the distance of only twenty miles from the capital. The Carthaginians in despair sent a herald to Regulus to solicit peace. But the Roman general would only grant it on such intolerable terms that the Carthaginians resolved to continue the war and hold out to the last. (Pol. i. 31; Zonar. viii. 13; Diod. xxiii. 10.) In the midst of their distress and alarm, success came to them from an unexpected quarter. Among the Greek mercenaries who had lately arrived at Carthage, was a Lacedaemonian of the name of Xanthippus. He pointed out to the Carthaginians that their defeat was owing to the incompetency of their generals, and not to the superiority of the Roman arms, and he inspired such confidence in the people that he was forthwith placed at the head of their troops. Relying on his 4000 cavalry and 100 elephants, Xanthippus boldly marched into the open country to meet the enemy. In the battle which ensued, Regulus was totally defeated: scarcely 2000 of his men escaped to Clupea, and Regulus himself was taken prisoner, with 500 more (255). (Pol. i. 32-34.) Of the further history of Regulus, and his end, nothing is related on good authority. Polybius says nothing about it, and does not even mention the embassy to Rome in which later writers make him play the principal part. The well-known tradition, a favourite theme with orators and poets, relates that Regulus remained in captivity for the next five years, till 250, when the Carthaginians, after their defeat by the proconsul Metellus, sent an embassy to Rome to solicit peace, or at least an exchange of prisoners. They allowed Regulus to accompany the ambassadors on the promise that he would return to Carthage if their proposals were declined, thinking that he would persuade his countrymen to agree to an exchange of prisoners in order to obtain his own liberty. The story then sets forth how Regulus at first refused to enter the city as a slave of the Carthaginians; how afterwards he would not give his opinion in the senate, as he had ceased by his captivity to be a member of that illustrious body; how, at length, when he was allowed by the Romans to speak, he endeavoured to dissuade the senate from assenting to a peace, or even to an exchange of prisoners, and when he saw them wavering, from their desire of redeeming him from captivity, how he told them that the Carthaginians had given him a slow poison, which would soon terminate his life; and how, finally, when the senate through his influence refused the offers of the Carthaginians, he firmly resisted all the persuasions of his friends to remain in Rome, and returned to Carthage, where he is said to have been put to death with the most excruciating tortures. It was related that he was placed in a chest covered over in the inside with iron nails, and thus perished; other writers stated that after his eyelids had been cut off, he was first thrown into a dark dungeon and then suddenly exposed to the full rays of a burning sun. When the news of the barbarous death of Regulus reached Rome, the senate is said to have given Hamilcar and Bostar, two of the noblest Carthaginian prisoners, to the family of Regulus, who revenged themselves by putting them to death with cruel torments. (Cic. Off. iii. 26, 99, de Fin. v. 27, 82, pro Sest. 59, 127; Liv. Ep. 18; Val. Max. i. 1, 14; Eutrop. ii. 25; Zonar. viii. 15; Hor. Od. iii. 5; Sil. It. vi. 346-551.) This celebrated tale is not mentioned by any writer before the age of Cicero, and the silence of Polybius may well be held to condemn it. It seems to have been imagined by rhetoricians as a stock instance of heroic constancy in misfortune, or to have been invented by annalists in order to excuse the cruelties perpetrated by the family of Regulus on the Carthaginian prisoners committed to their custody. Regulus was one of the favourite characters of early Roman story. Not only was he celebrated on account of his heroism in giving the senate advice which secured him a martyr's death, but also on account of his frugality and simplicity of life. Like Fabricius and Curius he lived on his hereditary farm, which he cultivated with his own hands; and subsequent ages loved to tell how he petitioned the senate for his recall from Africa when he was in the full career of victory, as his farm was going to ruin in his absence, and his family was suffering from want. (Val. Max. iv. 4, 6.)—4. C., surnamed Serranus, consul 257, when he defeated the Carthaginian fleet off the Liparean islands, and obtained possession of the islands of Lipara and Melite (Pol. i. 25; Zonar. viii. 12). He was consul a second time in 250, with L. Manlius Vulso. The two consuls undertook the siege of Lilybaeum, but they were foiled in their attempts to carry the place by storm, and after losing a great number of men, were obliged to turn the siege into a blockade. (Pol. i. 39-48; Zonar. viii. 15.) This Regulus is the first Atilius who bears the surname Serranus, which afterwards became the name of a distinct family in the gens. The origin of this name is spoken of under SERRANUS.—5. M., son of No. 3, was consul 227, and again 217, in the latter of which years he was elected to supply the place of C. Flaminius, who had fallen in the battle of the Trasimene lake. He was censor in 214. (Liv. xxii. 25, 32, 34, 40, xxiii. 21, xxiv. 43; Val. Max. ii. 9, 8.) Polybius (iii. 116) seems to be in error in stating that he fell at Cannae.—6. C., consul 225, conquered the Sardinians, who had revolted. On his return to Italy he fought against the Gauls, and fell in the battle. (Pol. ii. 23-28; Eutrop. iii. 5.)

Regulus Livineius, M. and L., two brothers, friends and supporters of Cicero. One of them fought under Caesar in Africa. (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 60, ad Att. iii. 17; Bell. Afr. 89.)

Reii Apollinares (Riez), a Roman colony in Gallia Narbonensis, with the surname Julia Augusta, E. of the Druentia, NE. of Massilia and NW. of Forum Julii (Plin. iii. 36).

Remesiana or Romesiana (Mustapha Palanka), a town in Moesia Superior, between Naisus and Serdica.

Rēmi or Rhēmi, one of the most powerful people in Gallia Belgica, inhabited the country through which the Axona flowed, and were bounded on the S. by the Nervii, on the SE. by the Veromandui, on the E. by the Suesiones and Bellovaci, and on the W. by the Nervii. They formed an alliance with Caesar when the rest of the Belgae made war against him, B.C. 57. (Caes. B. G. ii. 3, 12, vi. 4; Plin. iv. 106; Lucan. i. 424.) Their chief town was Durocortorum, afterwards called Remi (Rhēms), and sometimes the residence of Roman governors (Strab. p. 194; Ptol. ii. 9, 12).

Remmīus Palaemon. [PALAEMON.]

Rēmūs. [ROMULUS.]

Resaina, Resaena, Rhessaena, Resina ('Ρέσινα, 'Ρέσινα: Ras-el-Ain), a city of Mesopotamia, near the sources of the Chaboras, on the road from Carrae to Nisibis. After its restoration and fortification by Theodosius, it was called Theodosiopolis (Θεοδοσιούπολις). (Ptol. v. 18, 13; Amm. Marc. xxxii. 5.)

Restio, Antius. 1. The author of a sumptuary law of uncertain date, but passed after the sumptuary law of the consul Aemilius Lepidus, B.C. 78, and before that of Caesar (Gell. ii. 24; Macrob. ii. 13).—2. Probably a son of the preceding, proscribed by the triumvirs in 43, but preserved by the fidelity of a slave (Val. Max. vi. 8, 7).

Restitutus, Claudius, an orator in Trajan's reign, a friend of the younger Pliny and of Martial (Plin. Ep. iii. 9; Mart. x. 87).

Reudigni, a people in the N. of Germany on the right bank of the Albis, N. of the Lango-bardi (Tac. Germ. 40).

Rex, Marcius. 1. Q., praetor B.C. 144, built the aqueduct called Aqua Marcia, which was one of the most important at Rome (Dict. of Antiq. art. Aquaeductus).—2. Q., consul 118, founded in this year the colony of Narbo Martius in Gaul, and carried on war against the Stoeni, a Ligurian people at the foot of the Alps (Liv. Ep. 62; Val. Max. v. 10, 3; Gell. xiii. 19).—3. Q., consul 68, and proconsul in Cilicia in the following year. On his return to Rome in 66 he sued for a triumph, but as obstacles were thrown in the way by political opponents, he remained outside the city to prosecute his claims, and was still there when the Catilinarian conspiracy broke out in 63. The senate sent him to Faesulae, to watch the movements of C. Mallius or Manlius, Catiline's general. (Dio Cass. xxxv. 14–17, xxxvi. 26, 31; Sall. Cat. 32.)

Rha (Pá: Volga), a great river of Sarmatia, first mentioned by Ptolemy, who describes it as rising in the N. of Sarmatia, in two branches, Rha Occidentalis and Rha Orientalis (the Volga and the Kama), after the junction of which it flowed SW., forming the boundary between Sarmatia Asiatica and Scythia, till near the Tanais (Don), where it suddenly turns to the SE. and falls into the NW. part of the Caspian (Ptol. v. 9, vi. 14; Amm. Marc. xxii. 8, 28).

Rhadamanthys (Pádámanthys), son of Zeus and Europa, and brother of king Minos of Crete (Il. xiv. 322). From fear of his brother he fled to Ocalea in Boeotia, and there married Alcmena (Paus. viii. 53, 2; Diod. v. 79). In the Homeric account he dwelt, with other heroes of surpassing merit, in Elysium (Od. iv. 564; ELYSIUM). But in later tradition he is represented as one of the judges of the dead, either in the Islands of the Blest (Pind. Ol. ii. 75) or in Hades (Plat. Min. p. 320), since he had in life been notable for wisdom and justice and had won the surname δ δίκαιος (Ibyc. ap. Athen. p. 603; Theogn. 701). In Od. vii. 323 he is brought (? from Elysium) by the Phaeacians to Tityus in Euboea. His name suggests an Egyptian source for his story.

Rhaetia. [RAETIA.]

Rhamnūs (Pámuōs, -oūvtos: Pámuōsios: Obrio Kastro), a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Aeantis, which derived its name from the rhamnus, a kind of prickly shrub. (Pámuōs is an adjective, a contraction of Pámuōsis, which comes from Pámuos.) Rhamnus was situated on a small rocky peninsula on the E. coast of Attica, sixty stadia from Marathon (Paus. i. 33, 2; Plin. iv. 24). It possessed a celebrated temple of Nemesis, who is hence called by the Latin poets Rhamnusia dea or virgo (Catull. lxvi. 71; Ov. Met. iii. 406, Trist. v. 819). In this temple there was a colossal statue of the goddess made by Agoracritus, the disciple of Phidias (Strab. p. 396).

Another account, but less trustworthy, relates that the statue was the work of Phidias, and was made out of the block of Parian marble which the Persians brought with them to serve as a trophy for their anticipated victory at Marathon (Paus. l. c.). There are still remains of this temple, as well as of a smaller one to the same goddess. Below the terrace on which the temples stood remains of the city walls can be traced.

Rhampsinitus (Páμψινίτος), = Ramses III., one of the ancient kings of Egypt, succeeded by Cheops. This king is said to have possessed immense wealth; and in order to keep it safe he had a treasury built of stone, respecting the robbery of which Herodotus (ii. 121) relates a romantic story, which bears a great resemblance to the one told about the treasury built by the two brothers Agamedes and Trophonius of Orchomenus. [AGAMEDES.] Rhampsinitus, or Ramses III., belongs to the twentieth dynasty (about 1200 B.C.). His popular name was Ra-messu-pa-neter (Ramses the god), which the Greeks corrupted into Páμψινίτος. He won victories over the Danau of Asia Minor (whom, however, some take to be the Greek Dnani), the Cypriotes, and the Shardana (whom some place in Colchis, others in Sardinia).

Rhapta (Pá Páπτά), the southernmost seaport known to the ancients, the capital of the district of Barbaria, or Azania, on the E. coast of Africa. It stood on a river called Rhaptus (Doara), and near a promontory called Rhaptum (Formosa), and the people of the district were called Páμψιοι Αἰθίοπες. (Ptol. i. 9, 1; Peripl. Mar. Eryth. p. 10.)

Rhaucus (Páukos) a town in the interior of Crete, near Mount Ida, between Gnosus and Gortyna (Pol. xxxi. 1, xxxiii. 15; Scyl. p. 19).

Rhēa (Péa, Epic and Ion. Péla, or Pélē, Pén), a nature-goddess of the old Greek religion, who gave fruitfulness alike of men and beasts and vegetation. Hence in the genealogies of the poets she is represented as the daughter of the Sky and the Earth (Uranus and Ge), and the wife of Cronos, by whom she became the mother of Hestia, Demeter, Hera, Hades, Poseidon and Zeus. Cronos devoured all his children by Rhea, but when she was on the point of giving birth to Zeus, she went to Lyctus in Crete, by the advice of her parents. When Zeus was born she gave to Cronos a stone wrapped up like an infant, which the god swallowed supposing it to be his child. (Hes. Th. 133, 453–491; cf. Apollod. i. 1, 5; Diod. v. 70.) In Homer also (Il. xv. 187), Rhea is spoken of as the wife of Cronos and mother of Zeus, Poseidon and Hades. As appears from this account of Hesiod, the worship of Rhea belonged originally to Crete and spread thence to other parts of Greece. Rhea was afterwards identified by the Greeks in Asia Minor with the great Phrygian nature-goddess, known under the name of 'the Great Mother,' and also bearing other names such as Cybele, Agdistis and Dindymene. Hence her worship became of a wild and enthusiastic character, and various Eastern rites were added to it, which were adopted throughout the whole of Greece. Under the name of Cybele her worship was universal in Phrygia. She was in one aspect the goddess of wild, unrestrained nature dwelling in the forests and mountains of Phrygia, whence the wild beasts of the mountain forests, the lions and panthers were represented as her attendants, and her name itself was connected with mountains (e.g. Dindymene from Mount Dindymus). For the same reason the Greeks called her Μήτηρ ὀπέλα (Eur. Hipp. 144; Ap. Rh. i. 1119); and the name 'Idaeian mother' (Ap. Rh. i. 1128; Verg. Aen. x. 252) was perhaps originally in a general sense 'mother of forests' (Ἰδαί) and thus particularly connected with the Mount Ida in Crete and the Phrygian Ida. The principal seat of her worship was PESSINUS, and from Mount Agdus (a part of Mount Dindymus) in that district she was called Agdistis (Strab. p. 567), but in the legend of her love for Attis, which grew out of an allegory about the productiveness of nature, Agdistis appears as a separate personage [see ATTIS]. Here she was worshipped under the image of a rude block of stone, and her attendant priests were the emasculated Γάλλοι. In Lydia the principal seat of her worship was Mount Tmolus, and in Lydian legend she was called the nurse or foster-mother of Dionysus, because as earth-goddess she had to do with the vine as with other trees. And, as giver of wealth, she became recognised in the great cities which grew up as the goddess of settled life also and of towns, whence her crown of walled cities (cf. Lucret. ii. 625). She was conceived to be accompanied by the Curetes, who are connected with the birth and bringing up of Zeus in Crete, and in Phrygia by the Corybantes, the Idaeian Dactyli, Atys, and Agdistis. The Corybantes were her enthusiastic priests, who with drums, cymbals, horns, and in full armour, performed their orgiastic dances in the forests and on the mountains of Phrygia. [CORYBANTES; CURETES; DACTYLI.] This form of worship of Rhea-Cybele, borrowed from Asia, was adopted in Greece, where her temple was called 'The Temple of the Mother' (μητρῶον). She was connected in ritual with Dionysus, and with Demeter, her daughter, and is even spoken of as Earth herself (Soph. Phil. 391). At Athens in especial her sanctuary (the Metroon: see p. 143, b), which was also the repository of the state archives, contained her statue by Phidias (according to Plin. xxxvi. 17, by Agoracritus) enthroned, with cymbals in her hand and lions at her feet (Paus. i. 3, 5; Arrian, Peripl. Pont. 9). It is probable that this worship at Athens was originally of Rhea the earth-goddess, and that the wild Asiatic ritual was not introduced till later. At Rome the worship of Cybele was introduced from Pessinus in the year 204 B.C., when by direction of the Sibylline oracle the sacred stone was brought from that city to Rome as a means of driving Hannibal out of the country (Liv. xxix. 14; Ov. Fast. iv. 305; CLAUDIA QUINTA). Her temple, dedicated in 191, was on the Palatine, and her festival, the Megalesia, was celebrated in April. It is noticeable that, as coming from Phrygia, the country of Aeneas, she was regarded as a national deity, and so her temple was within the pomerium. The fully Asiatic character of her rites, with all their extravagance and all their allegory, was not introduced till after the end of the Republic. [For an account of them see Dict. of Ant. art. Megalesia.] Her priests were the Galli, as in Phrygia.—In art Rhea-Cybele is represented as crowned either with the modius or with a mural crown [see above]. She was seated on a throne with lions by her, or drawn by lions in a chariot (cf. Lucret. ii. 610-643). Her attributes were the cymbals, used in her worship, and the pine-tree, connected with the story of Attis.

Rhea Silvia (also called Ilia), according to the traditions followed by Roman poets and historians, was daughter of Numitor and one of the Vestal Virgins. (Ennius and Naevius, however, placing her at an earlier date, called her Ilia, and represented her as daughter of Aeneas; in this they probably followed a Greek tradition: Serv. ad Aen. i. 273, vi. 778.) By Mars she became the mother of Romulus and Remus [ROMULUS], and was thrown either into the Anio or the Tiber by orders of Amulius. She was saved by the river-god and became his wife and a river-goddess (Hor. Od. i. 2, 17; Ov. Am. iii. 6, 45; Serv. ad Aen. i. 273). It is suggested with great probability that originally Rhea Silvia = the Idaeian Rhea (Idaea Mater or Cybele), since Silvia and Ἰδαία mean the same thing [see preceding article]. In that case the myth would describe the founder of Rome as born from Mars and a goddess of the earth. It is true that such an interpretation assigns a Greek, and therefore comparatively later, origin to the introduction of Rhea Silvia into the story; but there are other signs of Greek influence in parts of the story of Romulus. Others take Rhea to be a corruption of Rea, which they explain as meaning 'dedicated to the gods,' and Silvia to be a gentile name. Others who seek the explanation in a sun-myth are probably wide of the mark.

Rhēbas (Ῥήβας, Ῥήβαος; Riva), a river of Bithynia, in Asia Minor, falling into the Euxine NE. of Chalcedon (Ptol. v. 1, 5; Plin. vi. 4); very small and insignificant in itself, but celebrated in the Argonautic legends (Ap. Rh. ii. 650, 787; Orph. Arg. 711).

Rhēdōnes. [REDONES.]

Rhēgium (Ῥήγιον; Rheginus: Reggio), an important city of Magna Graecia on the coast of Bruttium in the S. of Italy, was situated on the Fretum Siculum, or the Straits which separate Italy and Sicily. The ancients derived its name from the verb ῥήγνυμι ('break'), because it was supposed that Sicily was at this place torn asunder from Italy (Strab. p. 257; cf. Diod. iv. 85). Rhēgium was founded about the beginning of the first Messenian war, B.C. 743, by Aeolian Chalcidians from Euboea and by Doric Messenians who had quitted their native country on the commencement of hostilities between Sparta and Messenia (Thuc. vi. 5; Strab. l.c.). At the end of the second Messenian war, 668, a large body of Messenians, under the conduct of the sons of Aristomenes, settled at Rhēgium, which now became a flourishing and important city, and extended its authority over several of the neighbouring towns. Even before the Persian wars Rhegium was sufficiently powerful to send 3000 of its citizens to the assistance of the Tarentines, and in the time of the elder Dionysius it possessed a fleet of eighty ships of war. The government was an aristocracy, but in the beginning of the fifth century B.C. Anaxilaus, who was of a Messenian family, made himself tyrant of the place (Paus. iv. 23, 6). In 494 this Anaxilaus conquered Zancle in Sicily, the name of which he changed into Messana (Diod. xi. 48; Arist. Pol. v. 12; Thuc. l.c.). He ruled over the two cities, and on his death in 476 he bequeathed his power to his sons. About ten years afterwards (466) his sons were driven out of Rhegium and Messana, and republican governments were established in both cities, which now became independent of one another (Hdt. vii. 170; Diod. xi. 76). In 427 when the Athenian fleet came to support Leontini, the Rhegians sided with the Chalcidian cities of Sicily, and therefore their city became the headquarters of the Athenians (Thuc. iii. 86, iv. 1, 24). But they maintained neutrality during the Athenian expedition of 415 (Thuc. vi. 44, vii. 1, 58; Diod. xiii. 3). At a later period Rhegium incurred the deadly enmity of the elder Dionysius in consequence of a personal insult which the inhabitants had offered him. It is said that when he asked the Rhegians to give him one of their maidens for his wife, they replied that they could only grant him the daughter of their public executioner. Dionysius carried on war against the city for a long time, and after two or three unsuccessful attempts he at length took the place, which he treated with the greatest severity. (Diod. xiv. 44, 87, 10-112; Strab. p. 258.) Rhegium never recovered its former greatness, though it still continued to be a place of considerable importance. The younger Dionysius gave it the name of Phoebia, but this name never came into general use, and was speedily forgotten (Strab. l.c.). The Rhegians having applied to Rome for assistance when Pyrrhus was in the S. of Italy, the Romans placed in the town a garrison of 4000 soldiers, who had been levied among the Latin colonies in Campania. These troops seized the town in 279, killed or expelled the male inhabitants, and took possession of their wives and children. (Pol. i. 7; Oros. iv. 3; App. Samn. iii. 9.) The Romans were too much engaged at the time with their war against Pyrrhus to take notice of this outrage; but when Pyrrhus was driven out of Italy, they took signal vengeance upon these Campanians, and restored the surviving Rhegians to their city (Pol. i. 6, 7; Liv. xxxi. 1). Rhegium suffered greatly from an earthquake shortly before the breaking out of the Social war, 90, but its population was augmented by Augustus, who settled here a number of veterans from his fleet, whence the town bears in Ptolemy the surname Julium (App. B.C. iv. 3, v. 81; Dio Cass. xlviii. 18; Ptol. iii. 1, 9). It was a flourishing city under the later empire and a strong fortress (Procop. B. G. i. 8, iii. 18), and after the seventh century was chiefly subject to the Greek emperors until it fell into the hands of Robert Guiscard in 1060. Rhegium was the place from which persons usually crossed over to Sicily, but the spot at which they embarked was called Columna Rhegina (Ῥήγινα στῆλῆς: Torre di Cavallo), and was 100 stadia N. of the town (Plin. iii. 71; Strab. l.c.).

Rhēnea (Ῥήνεια, also Ῥήνη, Ῥηνάλα), formerly called Ortygia and Celadussa, an island in the Aegean sea and one of the Cyclades, W. of Delos, from which it was divided by a narrow strait only four stadia in width. When Polycrates took the island, he dedicated it to Apollo, and united it by a chain to Delos; and Nicias connected the two islands by means of a bridge. When the Athenians purified Delos in B.C. 426, they removed all the dead from the latter island to Rhenea. (Strab. p. 486; DELOS.)

Rhēnus. 1. (Rhein in German, Rhine in English), one of the great rivers in Europe, forming in ancient times the boundary between Gaul and Germany, having its sources partly in the St. Gothard, partly in the Adula group of the Lepontine Alps [ADULA MONS], from three principal branches: the Vorder-Rhein, which rises in the mountain called Badus (a little E. of Andermatt and the St. Gothard); the Mittel-Rhein, which rises near the Lukmanier Pass; and the Hinter-Rhein, which rises from the glaciers of Piz Valrhin, the highest of the Adula group, and joins the other two near Reichenau. The Rhine then flows first in a westerly direction, passing through the Lacus Brigantinus (Lake of Constance), till it reaches Basilia (Basle), where it takes a northerly direction and eventually flows into the Ocean by several mouths. The ancients spoke of two main arms into which the Rhine was divided in entering the territory of the Batavi, of which the one on the E. continued to bear the name of Rhenus, while that on the W., into which the Mosa (Maas or Meuse) flowed, was called Vahalis (Waal). Hence it was called bicornis (Verg. Aen. viii. 724; cf. Caes. B. G. iv. 17). But some writers incorrectly believed that it entered the sea by only two mouths (Strab. p. 192). After Drusus, in B.C. 12, had connected the Flevo Lacus (Zuyder-Zee) with the Rhine by means of a canal (in making which he probably made use of the bed of the Yssel), we find mention of three branches of the Rhine. Of these the names, as given by Pliny, are, on the W. Helium (the Vahalis of other writers), in the centre Rhenus, and on the E. Flevum (Plin. iv. 101). Pliny seems in this account to reckon only two outlets besides the Flevum, reckoning the Mosa as one of them. Tacitus and Mela agree with Pliny, but Ptolemy distinguishes the Meuse from the Rhine and reckons three outlets for the Rhine proper (Tac. Ann. ii. 6, Hist. v. 23; Ptol. ii. 9, 4).—The Rhine is described by the ancients as a broad, rapid and deep river. It receives many tributaries, of which the most important were the Arura (Aar) and the Mosella (Moselle), on the left, and the Nicer (Neckar), Moenus (Main) and Luppia (Lippe) on the right. It passed through various tribes, of which the principal on the W. were the Nantuates, Helvetii, Sequani, Mediomatrici, Tribocci, Treviri, Ubii, Batavi, and Canninefates, and the principal on the E. were the Raeti, Vindelici, Mattiaci, Sigambri, Tencteri, Usipetes, Bructeri, and Frisii. The length of the Rhine is stated differently by the ancient writers. Its whole course amounts to about 950 miles. The inundations of the Rhine near its mouth are mentioned by the ancients. Caesar was the first Roman general who crossed the Rhine. He threw a bridge of boats across the river, probably in the neighbourhood of Cologne. The system of embankments against floods in the lower course of the Rhine (near Wesel) was begun by the Romans in the reign of Nero (Tac. Ann. xiii. 53).—2. (Reno), a tributary of the Padus (Po) in Gallia Cisalpina near Bononia, on a small island of which Octavian, Antony and Lepidus formed the celebrated triumvirate (Plin. iii. 118; CAESAR, p. 182, b).

Rhescuporis, Rhascuporis, or Rescuporis, the names of several kings of Bosphorus under the Roman empire [see p. 170, a].

Rhēsus (Ῥῆσος). 1. A river-god in Bithynia, one of the sons of Oceanus and Tethys (Il. xii. 20; Hes. Th. 840; Strab. p. 590, 602).—2. Son of king Eioneus in Thrace, marched to the assistance of the Trojans in their war with the Greeks. An oracle had declared that Troy would never be taken if the snow-white horses of Rhesus should once drink the water of the Xanthos and feed upon the grass of the Trojan plain. But as soon as Rhesus had reached the Trojan territory and had pitched his tents late at night, Odysseus and Diomedes penetrated into his camp, slew Rhesus himself, and carried off his horses. (Il. x. 434; [Eur.] Rhesus; Verg. Aen. i. 469.) In later writers Rhesus is described as a son of Strymon and Euterpe, or Calliope, or Terpsichore.

Rhiānus (Ῥιανός), of Crete, a distinguished Alexandrian poet and grammarian, flourished B.C. 222. He wrote several epic poems, one of which was on the Messenian wars, and was a source of information to Pausanias as regards that period. He also wrote epigrams, ten of which are preserved in the Palatine Anthology, and one by Athenaeus. His fragments are printed in Gaisford's Poetae Minores Graeci; and separately edited by Nic. Saal, Bonn, 1831.

Rhidagus, a tributary of the river Zioberis in Parthia.

Rhinocolūra or Rhinocorūra (τὰ Ῥινοκόλουρα or Ῥινοκόρουρα, and ἡ Ῥινοκολούρα or Ῥινοκορούρα: Kasr-el-Arish), the frontier town of Egypt and Palestine, lay in the midst of the desert, at the mouth of the brook (El-Arish) which was the boundary between the countries. It was sometimes reckoned to Syria, sometimes to Egypt (Strab. pp. 741, 759; Pol. v. 80; Ptol. iv. 5, 12; Liv. xlv. 11). Its name, 'The cut-off-noses,' was said to be derived from its having been the place of exile of criminals who had first been so mutilated, under the Ethiopian dynasty of kings of Egypt (Strab. p. 759).

Rhinthōn (Ῥινθων), of Syracuse or Tarentum, said to have been the son of a potter, was a dramatic poet, of that species of burlesque tragedy which parodied myths, and was called φλυακογραφία or ίλαροτραγωδία, and flourished in the reign of Ptolemy I., king of Egypt. Among his followers in this style of composition was Sciras or Scleris of Tarentum (Athen. p. 402). When he is placed at the head of the composers of this burlesque drama, we are not to suppose that he actually invented it, but that he was the first to develop in a written form, and to introduce into Greek literature, a species of dramatic composition which had already long existed as a popular amusement among the Greeks of southern Italy and Sicily, and especially at Tarentum. The species of drama which he cultivated may be described as an exhibition of the subjects of tragedy in the spirit and style of comedy. A poet of this description was called φλύαξ. This name, and that of the drama itself, φλυακογραφία, seem to have been the genuine terms used at Tarentum. Rhinthon wrote thirty-eight dramas. (Suid. s.v.; Cic. ad Att. i. 20; Varro, R. R. iii. 3, 9.)

Rhipaei Montes (τὰ Ῥιπαία ὄρη, also Ῥίπαι), the name of a lofty range of mountains in the northern part of the earth, respecting which there are diverse statements in the ancient writers. The name seems to have been given by the Greek poets quite indefinitely to all the mountains in the northern parts of Europe and Asia. (Soph. O. C. 1247; cf. Verg. Georg. i. 240.) In Aeschylus the source of the Ister is placed in this range. Thus the Rhipaei Montes are sometimes called the Hyperborei Montes. [HYPERBOREI.] The later geographical writers place the Rhipaeian mountains N.E. of M. Alaunus on the frontiers of Asiatic Sarmatia, and state that the Tanais rises in these mountains. According to this account the Rhipaeian mountains may be regarded as the western branch of the Ural Mountains. (Strab. pp. 295, 299; Mel. i. 19, 18; Plin. iv. 78.)

Rhithymna (Ῥίθυμνα: Retimo), a town on the N. coast of Crete, between the promontories Drepanum and Dium (Ptol. iii. 17, 7; Plin. iv. 59).

Rhium (Ῥίον: Castello di Morea), a promontory in Achaia, opposite the promontory of Antirrhium (Castello di Romelia), on the borders of Aetolia and Locris, with which it formed the narrow entrance to the Corinthian gulf, which straits are now called the Little Dardanelles. It is sometimes called Ἀχαϊκὸν Ῥίον, to distinguish it from the opposite promontory, which was surnamed Μολυκρικὸν or Αἰτωλικὸν. On the promontory of Rhium there was a temple of Poseidon. (Thuc. ii. 84; Strab. p. 355; Paus. vii. 22, 10.)

Rhizōn or Rhizinium (Ῥίζων: Ῥιζωνίτης: Risano), an ancient town in Dalmatia, situated at the upper end of the gulf called after it Rhizonaeus Sinus (G. of Cattaro). It was a stronghold of Queen Teuta. (Pol. ii. 11; Strab. p. 316; Liv. xlv. 26.)

Rhizus (Ῥίζους). 1. A seaport of Pontus which was strongly fortified by Justinian. It was a few miles W. of the river Ascurus (Procop. Aed. iii. 4; Ptol. v. 6, 6).—2. A town of Magnesia in Thessaly (Strab. p. 436).

Rhōda or Rhōdus (Ῥόδη, Ῥόδος: Rozas), a Greek emporium on the coast of the Indigetæ in Hispania Tarraconensis, founded by the Rhodians, and subsequently occupied by the inhabitants of Massilia (Strab. p. 654; Liv. xxxiv. 8).

Rhōdānus (Rhône), one of the chief rivers of Gaul, rises in a glacier W. of the St. Gothard (included in the range called Adula by the ancients), not far from the sources of the Vorder-Rhein, flows first in a westerly direction, and after passing through the Lacus Lemanus, turns to the S., passes by the towns of Lugdunum, Vienna, Avenio and Arelate, receives several tributaries, and finally falls by several mouths into the Sinus Gallicus in the Mediterranean. The number of the mouths of the Rhone is stated differently by the ancient writers (Strab. p. 188); which is not surprising, as the river has frequently altered its course near the sea. Pliny mentions three mouths, of which the most important was called Os Massalioticum, while the two others bore the general name of Libyca ora, being distinguished from each other as the Os Hispaniense and the Os Metapinum (Plin. iii. 33). Polybius reckons only two, the Massaliotic and the western branch (Pol. iii. 41). Besides these mouths there was a canal to the E. of the Os Massalioticum, called Fossae Marianae, which was dug by order of Marius during his war with the Cimbri, in order to make an easier connexion between the Rhone and the Mediterranean, as the mouths of the river were frequently choked up with sand (Plut. Mar. 15; Strab. p. 183). The Rhone is a very rapid river, and its upward navigation is therefore difficult, though it is navigable for large vessels as high as Lugdunum, and by means of the Arar still further N.

Rhōdē. [RHODOS.]

Rhōdia and Rhodiōpōlis (Ῥωδία, Ῥωδιόπολις: Ῥωδιεύς, Ῥωδιοπολίτης: Eski-Hissar, Ru.), a mountain city of Lycia, near Corydallus, with a temple of Asclepius (Ptol. v. 3, 6; Steph. Byz. s. v.).

Rhōdiūs (Ῥόδιος: Kodja-tschai), a small river of the Troad, mentioned both by Homer and Hesiod. It rose on the lower slopes of Mt. Ida, and flowed NW. into the Hellespont, between Abydus and Dardanus, after receiving the Selleis from the W. (Il. xii. 20, xx. 215; Hes. Th. 341; Strab. pp. 554, 595; Plin. v. 124). It is identified by some with the river Πόδιος, which Thucydides mentions, between Cynossema and Abydus (Thuc. viii. 106). Some made it erroneously a tributary of the Aesepus. It is mentioned on the coins of Dardanus.

Rhōdōpē (Ῥωδόπη: Despoto-Planina), one of the highest ranges of mountains in Thrace, extending from Mt. Scamius, E. of the river Nestus and the boundaries of Macedonia, in a south-easterly direction almost down to the coast. It is highest in its northern part, and is thickly covered with wood. (Hdt. vi. 49; Thuc. ii. 96; Strab. pp. 208, 313.) Rhodope, like the rest of Thrace, was sacred to Dionysus, and is frequently mentioned by the poets in connexion with the worship of this god (Hor. Od. iii. 25, 12).

Rhōdōpis (Ῥωδῶπις), a Greek courtesan, of Thracian origin, was said to have been a fellow-slave with the poet Aesop, both of them belonging to the Samian Iadmon. She afterwards became the property of Xanthes, another Samian, who carried her to Naucratis in Egypt, in the reign of Amasis, and at this great seaport she carried on the trade of a hetaera for the benefit of her master. While thus employed, Charaxus, the brother of the poetess Sappho, who had come to Naucratis as a merchant, fell in love with her, and ransomed her from slavery for a large sum of money. She was in consequence attacked by Sappho in a poem (cf. Ov. Her. xv. 63). She continued to live at Naucratis, and with the tenth part of her gains she dedicated at Delphi ten iron spits, which were seen by Herodotus. She is called Rhodopis by Herodotus, but Sappho in her poem spoke of her under the name of Doricha. It is therefore probable that Doricha was her real name, and that she received that of Rhodopis, which signifies the 'rosy-cheeked,' on account of her beauty. (Hdt. ii. 134, 135; Athen. p. 596; Strab. p. 808; Suid. s. v.) There was a tale current in Greece (which Herodotus rejects) that Rhodopis built the third pyramid. This tale confuses her with Nitocris, who lived 2400 years earlier. Another story (Ael. V.H. xiii. 33) tells that Psammitichus III. picked up her shoe and was so struck with it that he sought out and married the owner. This is merely one of the many stories of which Cinderella is another. Psammitichus lived nearly a century after Rhodopis. His wife also was called Nitocris, and this suggests a confusion between the names Doricha and Nitocris as the origin of both stories.

Rhōdōs (Ῥόδος), sometimes called Rhōdē, daughter of Poseidon and Halia, or of Poseidon and Aphrodite, or lastly of Oceanus (Diod. v. 55; Pind. Ol. vii. 24; TELCHINES). From her the island of Rhodes is said to have derived its name, and in this island she bore to Helios seven sons (Pind. Ol. vii. 72).

Rhōdus (Ῥήδος: Ῥόδιος, Rhodius: Rhodos, Rhodes), the easternmost island of the Aegean or, more specifically, of the Carpathian sea, lies off the S. coast of Caria, due S. of the promontory of Cynossema (C. Alope), at the distance of about twelve geogr. miles. Its length, from NE. to SW. is about forty-five miles; its greatest breadth about twenty to twenty-five. A chain of mountains with lateral spurs forms the backbone of the island. The highest point, about 4000 feet above the sea, is Mt. Atabyrus, on which stood a temple of Zeus Atabyrius (Strab. p. 655). In early times it was called Aethraea and Ophiussa (Strab. p. 653; Steph. Byz. s. v.; Plin. v. 132). The earliest Greek records make mention of it. Mythological stories ascribed its origin to the power of Helios, who, because he had received no portion of land, raised it from beneath the waves (Pind. Ol. vii. 55); and its first peopling to the Telchines, children of Thalatta (the Sea), upon whose destruction by a deluge, the Heliadae were planted in the island by Helios, where they formed seven tribes, and founded a kingdom, which soon became flourishing by their skill in astronomy and navigation, and other sciences and arts. [TELCHINES.] These traditions appear to signify the early peopling of the island by some of the civilised races of W. Asia, probably the Phoenicians. After other alleged migrations into the island we come to its Hellenic colonisation, which is ascribed to Tlepolemus, the son of Heracles, before the Trojan war, and after that war to Althaemenes. [For the legend of Helen's connexion with Rhodes, see p. 588, a.] Homer mentions the three Dorian settlements in Rhodes: namely, Lindus, Ialysus, and Camirus (Il. ii. 653); and these cities, with Cos, Cnidus, and Halicarnassus, formed the Dorian Hexapolis, which was established, from a period of unknown antiquity, in the SW. corner of Asia Minor, but after the expulsion of Halicarnassus became a Pentapolis (Hdt. i. 144). Rhodes soon grew into a great maritime state, or rather confederacy, the island being parcelled out between the three cities above mentioned. The Rhodians made distant voyages, and founded numerous colonies, of which the chief were, Rhoda in Iberia; Gela, in Sicily; Parthenope, Salacia, Siris, and Sybaris, in Italy; settlements in the Balearic islands; and, in their own neighbourhood, Soli in Cilicia, and Gagae and Corydalla in Lycia. During this early period the government of each of the three cities seems to have been monarchical; but about B.C. 660 the whole island seems to have been united in an oligarchical republic, the chief magistrates of which, called prytanes, were taken from the family of the Eratidae, who had been the royal family of Ialysus. [DIAGORAS: DORIEUS.] Rhodes escaped the Persian dominion as long as there was no Persian fleet; but it was reduced by Darius, and Rhodians were employed in the fleet of Xerxes (Aesch. Pers. 891; Diod. xi. 3). Themistocles restored its independence (Timocr. Fr. 1). At the beginning of the Peloponnesian war Rhodes was one of those Dorian maritime states which were subject to Athens, but in the twentieth year of the war, 412, it joined the Spartan alliance, and the oligarchical party, which had been depressed and their leaders, the Eratidae, expelled, recovered their former power, under Dorieus, but remained under the control of Sparta until the end of the Peloponnesian war. (Thuc. viii. 41, 44, 60; Xen. Hell. i. 1, 5, ii. 1; Diod. xiii. 69.) In 408, the new capital, called Rhodus, was built, and peopled from the three ancient cities of Ialysus, Lindus, and Camirus. It stood on the E. side of the long promontory which forms the northernmost point of the island. At the back of the town rose the acropolis, in front of it the greater and lesser harbours protected by moles, but the greater harbour was exposed to the N. winds. The history of the island presents a series of conflicts between the democratical and oligarchical parties, and of subjection to Athens and Sparta in turn, till the end of the Social war, 355, when its independence was acknowledged. Then followed a conflict with the princes of Caria, during which the island was for a time subject to Artemisia, and again to her successor, Idrieus. During this period there were great internal dissensions, which were at length composed by a mixed form of government, uniting the elements of aristocracy and democracy. At the Macedonian conquest, they submitted to Alexander, but upon his death they expelled the Macedonian garrison (Diod. xviii. 8). In the ensuing wars they formed an alliance with Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, and their city, Rhodes, successfully endured a most famous siege by the forces of Demetrius Poliorcetes (Diod. xx. 82-98), who at length, when he raised the siege, left behind him all his siege train, from the sale of which they defrayed the cost of the celebrated Colossus, which is described under the name of its artist, CHARES. The state now for a long time flourished, with an extensive commerce, and with such a maritime power that it compelled the Byzantines to remit the toll which they levied on ships passing the Bosphorus (Pol. iv. 38). From the time of Alexander it had been the chief maritime power in the Aegæan. At various times they occupied the islands of Nisyros, Andros, Tenos and Naxos (Diod. v. 54; App. B. C. v. 7), and when a small volcanic island near Thera was upheaved in 197 B.C., they took possession and built there a temple to Poseidon Asphaleios, i.e. averter of earthquakes (Strab. p. 57). At length they came into connexion with the Romans, whose alliance they joined (Ptol. xxx. 5; Liv. xlv. 25), with Attalus, king of Pergamus, in the war against Philip III. of Macedon. In the ensuing war with Antiochus, the Rhodians gave the Romans great aid with their fleet; and in the subsequent partition of the Syrian possessions of Asia Minor they were rewarded by the supremacy of S. Caria, where they had had settlements from an early period. [PERAIA RHODIORUM.] A temporary interruption of their alliance with Rome was caused by their espousing the cause of Perseus (probably from fear of the growth of the Roman power; but it was a false move at that time), for which they were severely punished by the loss of their territory on the mainland, 168; but they recovered the favour of Rome by the important naval aid they rendered in the Mithridatic war. In the Civil wars they took part mainly with Caesar, and suffered in consequence from Cassius, 42, but were afterwards compensated for their losses by the favour of Antonius. (App. B. C. iv. 60-74, v. 7.) They were deprived of their independence by Claudius, but recovered it again under Nero (Dio Cass. lx. 24; Tac. Ann. xii. 58). Under Vespasian Rhodes was made part of the province of Asia (Suet. Vesp. 8); but a separate Province of the Islands (Insularum Provincia, ἐπαρχία νήσων) under Diocletian and afterwards included Rhodes and fifteen other islands (C. I. L. iii. 450, 460). But earlier than this the prosperity of Rhodes received its final blow from an earthquake, which laid the city in ruins, in the reign of Antoninus Pius, A.D. 155.—The celebrated mediaeval history of the island, as the seat of the Knights of St. John, does not belong to this work. The island is of great beauty and fertility, with a delicious climate. It was further celebrated as the home of distinguished schools of Greek art and of Greek oratory. The city of Rhodes was famous for the beauty and regularity of its architecture, and the number of statues which adorned it; it was designed by Hippodamus of Miletus. Among its treasures of sculpture was the chariot and horses in the temple of Helios by Lysippus; among the great works of the Rhodian school of sculpture was the Laocoon [AGESANDER]. Tombs on the sites of Camirus and Ialysus have yielded an important store of antiquities, both terra-cotta figures and pottery. Some of the Rhodian ware presents striking points of similarity to that of Naucratis. [For a description of Rhodian vase-painting see Dict. of Antiq. art. Vas.]—The most noticeable feature in the religious worship of Rhodes was the position of Helios as the chief god of the island (Pind. Ol. vii. 70). His image appeared on the Colossus and on the coins: he was honoured by an annual sacrifice of a team of four horses. Poseidon also was particularly honoured, for which two reasons might be assigned—the maritime character of the people, and the liability of their island to earthquakes. [Comp. IALYSUS, LINDUS, and CAMIRUS.]

Rhoecus (Ροῖκος). 1. A centaur, who, in conjunction with Hylaeus, pursued Atalanta in Arcadia, but was killed by her with an arrow. The Roman poets called him Rhoetus, and relate that he was wounded at the nuptials of Pirithous (Apollod. iii. 9, 2).—2. Son of Phileas or Philaeus, of Samos, an architect and sculptor, belonging to the earliest period in the history of Greek art, is mentioned as the head of a family of Samian artists. He lived about B.C. 640. He was the first architect of the great temple of Hera at Samos, which Theodorus completed. In conjunction with Smilis and Theodorus, he constructed the labyrinth at Lemnos; and he, and the members of his family who succeeded him, are said to have invented the art of casting statues in bronze. (Hdt. iii. 60; Paus. viii. 14, 5, x. 38, 3; Plin. xxxv. 152, xxxvi. 90.)

Rhoetëum (τὸ Ῥοίτειον ἄκρον, ἢ Ῥοίτειὰς ἀκτὴ, Ῥοιτήϊαι ἀκταί: Virg. Rhoetea litora: C. Intepeh or Barbieri), a promontory, or a strip of rocky coast breaking into several promontories, in Mysia, on the Hellespont, near Acontium, with a town of the same name (prob. Paleo Castro). (Hdt. vii. 43; Strab. p. 595.)

Rhoetus. 1. A centaur. [RHOECUS.]—2. One of the giants, who was slain by Dionysus; he is usually called Eurytus (Hor. Od. ii. 19, 23).

Rhoxolāni or Roxolāni, a warlike people in European Sarmatia, on the coast of the Palus Maeotis, and between the Borysthenes and the Tanais. They frequently attacked and plundered the Roman provinces S. of the Danube, and Hadrian was even obliged to pay them tribute. They are mentioned as late as the eleventh century. They fought with lances and with long swords wielded with both hands; and their armies were composed chiefly of cavalry. (Strab. pp. 114, 294, 306; Tac. Hist. i. 79.)

Rhudiae. [RUDIAE.]

Rhyndācus (Ῥυνδακός: Adirnas), a considerable river of Asia Minor. Rising in Mount Dindymene, in Phrygia Epictetus, it flows N. through Phrygia, then turns NW., then W. and then N. through the lake Apolloniatis, into the Propontis. From the point where it left Phrygia it formed the boundary of Mysia and Bithynia (Strab. p. 576; Mel. i. 19; Plin. v. 142). It is an error of Pliny to make it the same river as the Lycus. Its chief tributary, which joins it from the W. below the lake Apolloniatis, was called MAESTUS. On the banks of the Rhyndacus, Lucullus gained a great victory over Mithridates, B.C. 73 (Plut. Luc. ii.; Pol. v. 17).

Rhypes (Ῥύπες and other forms: Ῥυπαῖος), one of the twelve cities of Achaia, situated between Aegium and Patrae (Hdt. i. 145; Thuc. vii. 34). It was destroyed by Augustus and its inhabitants removed to Patrae (Paus. vii. 18, 7; Strab. p. 387).

Rhytium (Ῥύτιον), a town in Crete, mentioned by Homer, in the district of Gortyna (Il. ii. 648; Plin. iv. 59; Strab. p. 479).

Ricimer, the Roman 'King-Maker,' was the son of a Suevian chief, and was brought up at the court of Valentinian III., in whose reign he served with distinction under Aëtius. In A.D. 456 he commanded the fleet of the emperor Avitus, with which he gained a great victory over the Vandals, and in the same year he deposed Avitus; but as he was a barbarian by birth, he would not assume the title of emperor, but gave it to Majorian, intending to keep the real power in his own hands. But as Majorian proved more able and energetic than Ricimer had expected, he was put to death in 461 by order of Ricimer, who now raised Libius Severus to the throne. On the death of Severus in 465, Ricimer kept the government in his own hands for the next eighteen months; but in 467 Anthemius was appointed emperor of the West by Leo, emperor of the East. Ricimer acquiesced in the appointment, and received the daughter of Anthemius in marriage; but in 472 he made war against his father-in-law, and took Rome by storm. Anthemius perished in the assault, and Olybrius was proclaimed emperor by Ricimer, who died, however, only forty days after the sack of Rome. (Procop. Vand. i. 7, 57; Evagr. ii. 7-16.)

Ricina. 1. (Ricinensis), a town in Picenum, colonised by the emperor Severus. Its mines are on the river Potenza near Macerata (Plin. iii. 111).—2. One of the Ebudae Insulae, or the Hebrides (Ptol. ii. 2, 11).

Rigodūlum (Reol), a town of the Treviri in Gallia Belgica, distant three days' march from Mogontiacum (Tac. Hist. iv. 71).

Rigomagus. 1. (Prob. Trino Vecchio), a town in Cisalpine Gaul, on the road from Ticinum (Pavia) to Augusta Taurinorum (Turin).—2. (Remagen), a town on the Rhine, between Bonna (Bonn) and Antunnaum (Andernach).

Robigo. [ROBIGUS.]

Rōbigus was a divinity worshipped for the purpose of averting blight or too great heat from the young cornfields (Varro, L.L. vi. 16, R.R. i. 1, 6; Gell. v. 12, 14; Paul. p. 267; Serv. ad Georg. i. 151). The name was derived from robustus=rufus (red), referring to the rusty colour of the blighted corn (cf. ἐρυσίβη). Robigus and Flora were worshipped together as a pair of kindred deities, Flora being possibly called also Robiga. In later writers robigo (blight) was personified, as if the deity were a goddess Robigo (Tertull. Spectac. 5; August. C.D. iv. 21). There is a similar personification of robigo in Ovid, but it does not appear that the deity was worshipped under that feminine name. The festival of the Robigalia was celebrated on April 25, and was said to have been instituted by Numa. It was held in the sacred grove of Robigus on the Via Nomentana, five miles from Rome. The offerings made by the Flamen Quirinalis included liver-coloured puppies, in allusion to the red dog-star, whose influence blighted the crops. (Ov. Fast. iv. 905; Plin. xviii. 285; Dict. of Ant. art. Robigalia.)

Roma (Romanus; Rome): A. Geographical Situation.—Rome stands, roughly speaking, about the middle of the Western side of Italy, on the left bank of the Tiber, some fourteen miles from its mouth, and close to what was in ancient times the boundary between Latium and Etruria. The river in this part varies from 300 to 200 feet in breadth, and from 15 to 20 feet in depth, and from Rome to its mouth is affected both by floods and by silting of earth carried down. Hence, although it was suited for the commerce of the city in early days, it was quite inadequate when Rome was the capital of the world, especially as traffic is not assisted by any tide. The plain through which the Tiber flows, the Roman Campagna, is apt to mislead by its title. Broadly speaking, in relation to the bounding ranges of the Apennines and the Alban hills, it is, no doubt, a plain; but to those who are upon it it presents a very uneven appearance of eminences and ravines. What was in remote ages an alluvial flat has been broken up by the volcanic disturbances which have produced hills of tufa or of volcanic ash, subsequently sharpened and carved out by weather and streams; and so far from the Tiber appearing to pass through a wide champaign country, it flows at a considerable depth below the plain in its own relatively narrow valley. Still more apt to mislead is the mention of the hills of Rome; for it is difficult for anyone who has not seen the country to realise that, if he were to stand on the Campagna, he would be on the same level as the Roman hills, and the city would seem to be built on a plain, though, viewed from the river, it stands for the most part on several eminences rising from 120 to 160 feet above the river bank. These eminences, like others in the Campagna, are of volcanic formation, but they have been carved out by erosion, chiefly by the Tiber itself and by water flowing into it. Three have thus become isolated hills, and these (the Palatine, Aventine, and Capitoline), were naturally early occupied as defensible positions. The others, though hills when seen from the river valley, are really promontories bases of the Palatine, Viminal, Quirinal and Capitoline, was the site eventually of the Forum Romanum; its lower branch towards the Tiber, separating the Palatine from the Capitoline, was the Velabrum (whose name preserved the recollection of the marshes) and the Forum Boarium; the indentation between the Esquiline and the Quirinal was the Subura; the valley running E. between the bases of the Palatine, Esquiline and Caelian was eventually occupied by the Colosseum, and the long low valley which separates the Aventine and Palatine was the site of the Circus Maximus. These natural differences of level have been modified from the Campagna jutting out into it, and on their other side running back at a level into the general plain. A reference to the annexed plan will show that, further from the river than the three isolated hills, come the Caelian (which is nearly isolated), the Esquiline (which includes two spurs, the Oppian and Cispian), the Viminal and Quirinal, and, a little further north, the Pincian, which was not included within the Servian walls: all these being connected at the back by the line of table-land. The bays or depressions between these belong to the floor of the Tiber valley, and were in early times covered mainly by marshes and pools. The central depression, between the at various times and by different causes: the hills, at first artificially made more pronounced by escarpment for defence, were afterwards made lower in appearance by levelling up in road making, or, in the middle ages, by the accumulation of debris: on the other hand, the valley between the Quirinal and Viminal was cut wider and deeper to receive the Forum Trajanum. Lastly, in the present time the exigencies of a nineteenth century capital have changed the natural features still more, under what is called the 'piano regolatore,' and threatens to improve away much more of the hills of Rome. The river Tiber, besides contributing to the defence and the commercial prosperity of early Rome, had a great deal to do with the shape of the city. It has been best described as divided into five reaches: the first, or upper reach, about $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile long running nearly due S.; the second making a great bend for $\frac{2}{3}$ of a mile to the W., and thus affording space for the Campus Martius (once a wide swamp); the third turning again at right angles and running $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile SE., including in its lower part the Island of the Tiber (about 300 yards \times 90); the fourth diverted by the Aventine for a distance of about $\frac{1}{3}$ of a mile to the SW.; and the fifth running for a mile nearly due S. to the point where the Aurelian wall left the river. The principal wharves were placed in these two lower reaches. As regards the hills on the western side of the river, the long ridge of the Janiculum reaches a greater elevation (260 feet) than those on the eastern side; but the Vatican is lower. It should be noted that the volcanic character of all this district materially contributed to the magnificent strength of Roman masonry. The tufa of the neighbourhood was largely used from the earliest times (as in the walls of Roma Quadrata); but greater strength was gained by employing the peperino from Alba, as in parts of the Servian walls and of the Cloaca Maxima, or that from Gabii, as in the Tabularium; but, above all, the abundance of volcanic dust ('pulvis Puteolanus,' pozzolana), found all over the Roman district as well as at Puteoli, which gave the name, provided the elements of strength in the imperishable Roman cement. The lime for this cement was derived from the travertine (lapis Tiberinus) found at Tivoli, and also much used for Roman buildings [see Dict. of Ant. art. Murus].

—B. Origin of the City.—The traditional account, adopted by Livy and more generally accepted than any other, was that Rome (i.e. the earliest settlement on the Roman hills) was a colony from Alba Longa, founded by Romulus B.C. 753. [For the legend, see ROMULUS.] Of late years, since the discovery in 1874 of several tombs, having some appearance of being Etruscan, on the Esquiline, writers of authority have put forward the theory that there was an Etruscan settlement on the hills earlier than any Latin town. As far as archaeological evidence goes, this theory cannot be said to be substantiated as yet, and the best Roman archaeologists reject it altogether. The evidence of certain traditions and myths, put forward in its favour, may be largely discounted, but, for their bearing on literature, it is worth while to mention them. It was said (a) that Evander before the Trojan war brought a colony of Pelasgians from Arcadia, and built a city, Pallantium, under the Palatine (Dionys. i. 33; Liv. i. 5; Verg. Aen. ix. 9); (b) that Rome was founded first by colonists from Athens and Sicyon (Fest. p. 266); (c) that there were older settlements made by Romus, son of Aeneas (Dionys. i. 72), or that there were a Romulus and Romus founders of an earlier city, and another pair of the same name who founded a later one (Dio Cass. iii. 5); (d) that Saturnus, Janus, Picus and Faunus were prehistoric kings reigning there [see the articles under these names]. All these accounts bear the stamp, not of traditions about some fact of ancient history, but of stories invented, long after the settlement of Rome, to maintain some theory, or account for some name or rite. Thus (a) and (b) are evidently due to a desire to find a Greek origin, after the relations with Greek colonies began, and (a) is also due partly to an attempt to explain the name Palatinus and the rites of Faunus or Lupercus [see p. 338]; (c) seems to have been invented from a wish to carry back the foundation to an earlier date so as to reconcile conflicting chronicles [SILVIUS]; (d) belongs to the class of fictions, like those of Euhemerus, which transformed the deities worshipped in the rites of the early inhabitants into actual kings who once reigned there. The received account of Romulus himself, in its simplest form a Latin tradition and probably with elements of truth in it, connected him by descent with the Trojan Aeneas (not much before the time of Naevius), because the Homeric story was becoming famous in Italy, and probably through the direct influence of the Cumaeans and their stories of their Aeolian mother-country [cf. p. 24]. On the other hand, Professor Lanciani, insisting strongly on the truth of the traditional colonisation from Alba, argues from the discovery (in 1817 and 1867) of an inhabited district near Alba, of the bronze age, underneath a stratum of lava, that Rome was founded by Alban shepherds migrating because their pasture grounds had been overwhelmed by volcanic eruptions. It is true that the evidence of the earliest remains at Rome and also of the 'taboo' of iron in much of their ancient ritual [e.g. in that of the Arvales Fratres: Dict. of Ant. s. v.] point to the bronze age as the period of the original settlement; but it can only be a guess to connect their arrival with the volcanic disturbances at Alba. There is no reason (though Mommsen on the whole discredits it) to reject the tradition of the first settlers coming from Alba. However that may be, all trustworthy evidence supports the theory that they were primarily Latin, and were originally village communities (probably, as was said, emigrants from Alba), who had grouped themselves round the Roman hills, and built the old Rome on the Palatine as their ring wall or common fortress [Dict. of Ant. art. Pagus]. They were probably an amalgamation of three communities represented by the Tities, Ramnes, and Luceres (of whom the last two were Latin and the first may have been Sabellian), who chose a common fortress on a site convenient both for defence and for commerce. The shepherd origin ascribed in tradition is confirmed by the pastoral rites of the Lupercalia and the Parilia. The origin of the name given to the city is uncertain: some connect it with the name of the Ramnes, others with rumon (stream), as 'the city on the river' [see p. 799, b]. The old-fashioned theory of a connexion with ῥώμη (strength) may safely be set aside.—C. Development of the City.—The fortified enclosure ascribed to Romulus and called Roma Quadrata, was built on the Palatine, which had precipitous sides on the NW. and SW., and was at that time further defended in those directions by marshes. But it afforded an easier ascent on the other sides: this may, as has been suggested, have been desirable for the shepherds, who in sudden alarms had to drive their flocks up to the fortress. The walls, of which there are remains at various points on the NW. and SW. sides of the hill, are formed of tufa blocks (see Dict. of Ant. art. Murus). It was called 'Quadrata' because the form was roughly rectangular, according to the shape of a templum, embracing the whole of the Palatine. [See Dict. of Ant. art. Pomerium.] The points named (Tac. Ann. xii. 24), viz. Ara Herculis, Ara Consii, Curiae Veteres, and Sacellum Larum, designate respectively the

SW., SE., and NW. corners and the N. side of the hill as being within the limits. In Roma Quadrata was the Lupercal, regarded as the oldest sanctuary in Rome, a cave, afterwards built up as a shrine, probably near the W. angle of the hill. Its exact site is unknown; for the remains often shown as the Lupercal belong to the castellum of an aqueduct. Another sacred spot of ancient times was the hut of Romulus near the Lupercal. The Palatine settlement was enlarged so as to include the district called 'the city of seven hills' or Septimontium, the recollection of which was preserved in the festival of that name [Dict. of Ant. art. Sacra], which was held at seven places on the 'Montes' of Rome. It must be noted that these seven 'Montes' were not those which were afterwards known as the seven hills of Rome [see above, A.] They were (1) the Palatium, (2) the Germalus (SW. slope of the Palatine), (3) the Velia (northern base of the Palatine), (4) the Oppian, (5) the Cispian, (6) the Fagutal (the depression between the Oppian and Cispian) and (7) the Subura, probably already including the Caelian Hill, so that the seven 'Montes' were made up of hills and the adjacent depressions. The most probable account of this development is that these districts had gradually grown up as suburbs with weaker circumvallations of their own, and were joined on to, and numbered with, the older Palatine ring-wall, and just as the Lupercalia preserved the memory of the limits of Roma Quadrata by beating the bounds, so the limits of the extended settlement were fixed by the festival of Septimontium. Some have supposed that in this common settlement the Tities occupied the fortress in the Subura, the Ramnes the Palatine, and the Luceres the Esquiline. Meanwhile another town, as yet separate, had been built on the Quirinal with the Viminal as its suburb. It is probable, though this is disputed, that this was a Sabine settlement [see QUIRINUS]. By the union of the people of the seven Montes (hence called Montani) with the people of the Quirinal hill and the Viminal hill (hence called Collini), the City of Four Regions was formed [see below, under D.] The memory of this union was preserved by the twofold arrangement of many of their sacred rites [see MARS; QUIRINUS]. The combined population had as a common fortress and religious centre the Capitoline hill, which before this union had had a wall of its own, some remains of which, resembling the wall of Roma Quadrata, may still be seen. The Capitoline was not reckoned in any of the four regions, because it was regarded as set apart for the gods of the amalgamated settlements and had no dwelling houses upon it. The absence of the Aventine from the 'city of the Four Regions' merely implies that the houses had not yet spread so far. The next stage in the development of Rome was the so-called 'Servian' city, the limits of which are clearly defined by the walls which enclosed it [see below]. The chief alteration was that by this time the Aventine was partially occupied for habitation and at any rate necessary for defensive purposes, and was therefore included within the walls, but there was also an extension in two other parts, for the ground to the E. and NE. of the Quirinal and Esquiline was thenceforth part of the city, and also the strip along the Tiber W. of the Palatine and SW. of the Capitol, which was occupied by the Forum Boarium, and included the E. end of the Sublician bridge, thus communicating with the outpost on the Janiculum. The limits of the Servian walls sufficed for some centuries, because there was room for the growth of population in the districts which had been very sparsely occupied when they were first included. By the time of Sulla, however, the whole was fully inhabited, and the houses extended further and further beyond the walls. This at length necessitated an entirely new distribution of the city, which Augustus carried out in his Fourteen Regions [see below], Rome no longer needing fortification, and having none until the whole space was enclosed by the walls of Aurelian which are described below. It is said that the appearance of the interior of republican Rome was greatly affected by the fact that the city, having been almost entirely destroyed by the Gauls in 390 B.C., was rebuilt after their departure hastily, without attention to regularity and with narrow and crooked streets. After the conquest of Carthage, Macedonia and Syria, the city began to be adorned with many public buildings and handsome private houses; and it was still further embellished by Augustus, who introduced improvements into all parts, and both erected many public buildings himself and induced the leading men of the day to follow his example. So greatly had the appearance of the city improved during his long and prosperous reign that he used to boast that he found it of brick and would leave it of marble. Still the main features of the city remained the same; and the narrow streets and mean houses formed a striking and disagreeable contrast to the splendid public buildings and magnificent palaces which had been recently erected. The great fire at Rome in the reign of Nero (A.D. 64) destroyed two-thirds of the city. Nero availed himself of this opportunity to indulge his passion for building, and the city now assumed a more regular and stately appearance. The new streets were made both wide and straight; the height of the houses was restricted; and a certain part of each was required to be built of Gabian or Alban stone, which was proof against fire.—D. Divisions of the City.—Mention has been made of the four Regiones or districts of which the city consisted after the union of the Palatine city of seven Montes (Montani) with the Quirinal settlement (Collini). These regions were generally called the 'Servian Regions' and were ascribed to Servius Tullius, but (as has been pointed out) they belonged to an earlier period of development than the 'Servian' city, as defined by the walls ascribed to Servius. Their names were: (1) Suburana, comprehending the space from the Subura to the Caelius, both inclusive; (2) Esquilina, comprehending the Esquiline hill; (3) Collina, extending over the Quirinal and Viminal; (4) Palatina, comprehending the Palatine hill. These seem to have been subdivided into twenty-seven Vici, for each of which there was an 'Argean chapel.' The number of twenty-seven Sacella Argeorum seems to arise from assigning nine to each of the three tribes (there is no need to alter twenty-seven into twenty-four). [For the rites of these chapels see Dict. Ant. art. Argei.] The Aventine and other districts were added in the 'Servian' city, and yet more afterwards [see above, C], but no other arrangement of Regions was made till the time of Augustus. This emperor made a fresh division of the city into fourteen Regions, which comprised both the ancient city of Servius Tullius and all the suburbs which had been subsequently added. This division was made by Augustus to facilitate the internal government of the city. Each region was subdivided into Vici (265 in all), and each Vicus had its shrine of Lares Compitales [Dict. of Ant. art. Vicus]. The names of the Regions were:—(1) Porta Capena, at the SE. corner of the city by the Porta Capena, and extending as far as the subsequent limit of the Aurelian walls. It had ten Vici. (2) Caelimontana, NE. of the preceding, embracing M. Caelius, with seven Vici. (3) Isis et Serapis, NW. of No. 2, in the valley between the Caelius, the Palatine and Esquiline, in which the Colosseum was afterwards built. It contained eight Vici. (4) Templum Pacis, NW. of No. 3, embracing the valley between the Esquiline, Viminal and Quirinal towards the Palatine, including the Via Sacra and the buildings on the NE. side of the Forum, among them the Temple of Peace. It had eight Vici. (5) Esquilina cum Colle Viminali, NE. of No. 4, comprehending the whole of the Esquiline and Viminal, with fifteen Vici. (6) Alta Semita, NW. of No. 5, comprising the Quirinal, with seventeen Vici. (7) Via Lata, (domus). The middle and lower classes lived in blocks (insulae). Each insula contained several apartments or sets of apartments which were let to different families, and it was frequently surrounded with shops. The insulae contained several stories; and as the value of ground increased in Rome, they were frequently built of a dangerous height. Hence Augustus restricted the height of all new houses to seventy feet, and Trajan to sixty feet. (Suet. Aug. 30, 89; Dio Cass. lv. 8; Aurel. Vict. Ep. 13.) No houses of any description were allowed to be built close together at Rome, and it was provided by the Twelve Tables that a space of at least 2½ feet should be left between the houses. From the Notitia Regionum it appears that before the end of the fourth century A.D. there were 46,602 insulae at Rome and 1790 domus. As regards the population there is very uncertain evidence. From the statement of the Monumentum Ancyranum that there were 320,000 males of the plebs urbana it has been roughly computed that in the reign of Augustus the total population, free and slave, exceeded one million, and there is no improbability in the supposition that the population of Rome and the neighbouring Cam-

Ancient Rome restored.

W. of No. 6, between the Quirinal and Campus Martius, bounded on the west by the Via Lata (the modern Corso), with fifteen Vici. (8) Forum Romanum, S. of No. 7, comprehending the Capitoline and the valley between it and the Palatine, including, therefore, three other Fora, those of Julius Caesar, Augustus and Trajan. It had thirty-four Vici. (9) Circus Flaminius, NW. of No. 8, extending as far as the Tiber, and comprehending the whole of the Campus Martius, with thirty-five Vici. (10) Palatium, SE. of No. 8, containing the Palatine, with twenty Vici. (11) Circus Maximus, SW. of No. 10, comprehending the plain between the Palatine, Aventine and Tiber, with the Velabrum and Forum Boarium, having eighteen Vici. (12) Piscina Publica, SE. of No. 11, between the Caelian and Aventine, and extending to the subsequent limits of the Aurelian walls. It had fourteen Vici. (13) Aventinus, NW. of No. 12, embracing the Aventine, with seventeen Vici. (14) Trans Tiberim, the only region on the right bank of the river, containing the Insula Tiberina, the valley between the river and the Janiculum, the Janiculum itself and the Vatican. It had seventy-eight Vici. As regards the dwelling-houses, the richer men had their own separate town houses pagnain the later empire amounted to 2,000,000.

—E. Walls and Gates. I. Wall of Romulus (i.e. of Roma Quadrata).—The course of this wall and the limits comprised within it have been noticed under C. In it there were three gates: (1) Porta Mugonia (which was taken by some to mean 'cattle-gate,' from mugire: Varr. L. L. v. 34), also called Porta vetus Palatii, at the slope of the Palatine. Remains with probability regarded as belonging to this gateway were found near the point where the Summa Via Nova joins an old lava-paved road (discovered in 1883) leading from the Summa Via Sacra up to the Palatine: i.e. the gate was not far from the Arch of Titus, but further up the Palatine slope. (2) Porta Romanula, at the NW. angle of the hill near the temple of Victory, where the Clivus Victoriae passes from beneath the palace of Caligula, which was built over it. The approach to this gate sloped up from the Velabrum, and its name has been connected with the word rumon=stream (by those who thence derive the name of Rome), as signifying that it was the water-gate, or access to the river from the fortress. (3) The position of the third gate, which Varro states to have been the Porta Janualis, is not known. Besides these gates the 'stairs of Cacus' (Scalae Caci), said to have been derived from a Cacus who lived near, are described as coming up near the house of Romulus. They have probably been rightly identified with a flight of steps cut in the tufa rock which ascend from the direction of the Circus Maximus (cf. Plut. Rom. 20; Solin. i. 18).—II. Walls of Servius Tullius.—These walls enclosed, as was stated above, not merely the seven 'montes' of the Septimontium, but also the other suburbs which belonged to the 'Four Regions,' and lastly the more recent additions, among which was the Aventine. It thus included all the hills afterwards regarded as the 'seven hills' of Rome [see above, pp. 796, 798]; and later writers, as Virgil in Georg. ii. 535, refer to these hills, and not to the Septimontium, as giving the city her title (cf. Hor. Carm. Sec. 7). The wall was, of course, more massive and elaborate where it crossed the level ground than where it was following the hill. In those parts it consisted of a ditch 30 feet deep and 100 feet wide, the earth from which formed an agger from 30 to 50 feet high, kept up by a retaining back wall of stone 9 feet thick, and faced with masonry on the side towards the ditch. The total width of the rampart exceeded 20 feet. [See Dict. of Ant. art. Murus.] Starting from the southern extremity of this mound at the Porta Esquilina, the fortifications of Servius ran along the outside edge of the Caelian and Aventine hills to the river Tiber by the Porta Trigemina. From this point to the Porta Flumentana near the SW. extremity of the Capitoline hill, there appears to have been no wall, but only a stone quay formed of blocks of tufa, the river itself being considered a sufficient defence. At the Porta Flumentana the fortifications again commenced, and ran along the outside edge of the Capitoline and Quirinal hills till they reached the northern extremity of the agger at the Porta Collina, and continued along the Campus Viminalis to the Esquiline gate. It was in this plain, between the Colline and Esquiline gates, that the most massive fortification was employed. A great part of it has been discovered near the railway station. A part of the wall on the Aventine also still remains of magnificent construction, 50 feet high and 10½ feet thick. In many parts, no doubt, the Servian walls followed the line of the older walls of the suburbs incorporated in the city, and replaced them by stronger work. The number of the gates in the walls of Servius is uncertain, and the position of many of them is doubtful. Pliny, indeed, states that their number was thirty-seven; but it is almost certain that this number includes many mere openings made through the walls to connect different parts of the city with the suburbs, since the walls of Servius had long since ceased to be regarded. The following is a list of the gates as far as they can be ascertained: (1) Porta Collina, at the N. extremity of the agger, and the most northerly of all the gates, stood at the point of junction of the Via Salaria and Via Nomentana. Its remains have been discovered on the site of the modern Ministero delle Finanze, a little to the S. of the road leading to Porta Pia. This gate was also called Porta Quirinalis or Agonalis. It was of great importance as being in a particularly accessible part of the walls. The Gauls approached at this point in 360, Hannibal in the next century, and Sulla when he led his troops back in 88; and it was the scene of the battle in 82 which secured the power of Sulla and ended the last struggle of the Samnites. (2) P. Viminalis, S. of No. 1, and in the centre of the agger. The roadway through it was discovered in 1872 in digging the foundations of the Public Offices. (3) P. Esquilina, S. of No. 2, on the site of the Arch of Gallienus, which probably replaced it; the Via Praenestina and Labicana began here. It was discovered in 1876. (4) P. Querquetulana, S. of No. 3. (5) P. Caeliomontana, S. of No. 4, on the heights of M. Caelius, behind the hospital of S. Giovanni in Laterano, at the point of junction of the two modern streets which bear the name of S. Stefano Rotondo, and the SS. Quattro Coronati. (6) P. Capena, one of the most celebrated of all the Roman gates, from which issued the Via Appia. It stood SW. of No. 5, and at the SW. foot of the Caelian. Its foundations were discovered near the church of S. Gregorio, and the remains of the Marcian aqueduct which passed over it and by its leakage gained for it the epithet 'madida.' (Juv. iii. 11; Mart. iii. 47, 1). (7, 8, 9) P. Lavernalis, P. Rauduscula, and P. Naevia, three of the most southerly gates of Rome, lying between the Caelian and the Aventine. The walls of Servius probably here took a great bend to the S., inclosing the heights of S. Balbina and S. Saba. (10) P. Trigemina, on the NW. of the Aventine, near the Tiber and the great salt-magazines. The arch discovered in 1887 near the church of S. Maria in Cosmedin is thought to belong to this gate. (11) P. Flumentana, N. of the preceding, near the SW. slope of the Capitol and close to the Tiber. (12) P. Carmentalis, N. of No. 11, and at the foot of the SW. slope of the Capitoline, near the altar of Carmenta, and leading to the Forum Oitorium and the Theatre of Marcellus. This gate contained two passages, of which the right-hand one was called Porta Scelerata from the time that the three hundred Fabii passed through it, and was always avoided. (Liv. ii. 49; Ov. Fast. ii. 201.) (13) P. Ratumena, N. of No. 12, and at the N. slope of the Capitoline, just below the Arx, leading to the Campus Martius and the Via Flaminia. The remains of the gate and part of the wall were found under a house in the Via di Marforio. (14) P. Fontinalis, N. of No. 13 on the W. slope of the Quirinal, also leading to the Campus Martius. (15) P. Sanqualis, N. of No. 14, also on the W. slope of the same hill, deriving its name from the temple of Sancus which stood near it. [SANCUS.] (16) P. Salutaris, N. of No. 15, on the NW. slope of the same hill, near the temple of Salus. (17) P. Triumphalis. The position of this gate is quite uncertain, except that it led, more or less directly, to the Campus Martius. It was probably opened only for triumphal processions. (Cic. Pis. 23, 55; Jos. B. J. vii. 5, 4).—III. Walls of Aurelian. These walls are essentially the same as those which surround the modern city of Rome, with the exception of the part beyond the Tiber. The Janiculum and the adjacent suburb was the only portion beyond the Tiber which was included within the fortifications of Aurelian; for the Vatican was not surrounded with walls till the time of Leo IV., in the ninth century. The wall, a circuit of twelve miles, is built of concrete faced with brick. The lower part is solid; the upper has a passage for soldiers, vaulted overhead, and having arches looking into the interior. There were 383 towers, at intervals of 45 feet, about 70 feet high, the average height of the wall being 50 feet. The top of the wall was battlemented, but most of the battlements have perished. On the left bank of the Tiber the walls of Aurelian embraced on the N. the Collis Hortulorum or Pincianus, on the W. the Campus Martius, on the E. the Campus Esquilinus, and on the S. the Mons Testaceus. There were fifteen gates in the Aurelian walls, most of which derived their names from the roads issuing from them. These were, on the N. side: (1) Porta Cornelia, on the Tiber in front of the Pons Aelius. (2) Porta Flaminia, now Porta del Popolo. (3) P. Pinciana, on the hill of the same name. (4) P. Salaria, extant under the same name, but restored in modern times. Between this and No. 4 comes the modern Porta Pia, called after Pius IV. (5) P. Nomentana, leading to the ancient P. Collina. On the E. side: very little S. of the Via Nomentana was the Praetorian Camp, which, when the Aurelian walls were built, was set in them, projecting from them on either side: in the angle where the wall abutted on the S. side of the camp wall there is a blocked gateway now called Porta Clausa, whose ancient name is unknown. (6) P. Tiburtina, leading to the old P. Esquilina, now Porta S. Lorenzo. (7) P. Praenestina or Laticlana, now Porta Maggiore. On the S. side: (8) P. Asinaria, close to the remains of the Domus Laterana. It has been blocked up and the modern Porta S. Giovanni a few yards to the E. is used instead. (9) P. Metronis, or Metronii, or Metrovia, which has now disappeared, probably at the entrance to the Caelian, between S. Stefano Rotondo and the Villa Mattei. (10) P. Latina, now walled up. (11) P. Appia, now Porta S. Sebastiano. The roads through this gate and through No. 9, both led to the old Porta Capena. (12) P. Ostiensis, leading to Ostia, now Porta S. Paolo. On the W. side: (13) P. Portuensis, on the other side of the Tiber near the river, from which issued the road to Portus. (14) P. Aurelia, on the W. slope of the Janiculum, now Porta S. Pancrazio. (15) P. Septimiana, near the Tiber, on the road connecting the Janiculum with the Vatican, was destroyed by Alexander VI.

—F. Bridges. There were eight bridges across the Tiber, which probably ran in the following order from N. to S.:—(1) Pons Aelius, which was built by Hadrian, and led from the city to the mausoleum of that emperor, now the bridge and castle of St. Angelo (Dio Cass. lxi. 23). (2) Pons Neronianus, or Vaticanus, which led from the Campus Martius to the Vatican and the gardens of Caligula and Nero. The remains of its piers may still be seen, when the waters of the Tiber are low, at the back of the Hospital of S. Spirito. (3) Pons Agrippae, at a spot about 130 yards above the Ponte Sisto, where the foundations of a three-arched bridge were found in 1887, with an inscription on a cippus near which mentioned the name of the bridge. (4) Very little below No. 3, P. Aurelius also called Janiculensis, which led to the Janiculum and the Porta Aurelia. It occupied the site of the present 'Ponte Sisto,' which was built by Sixtus IV. upon the ruins of the old bridge. (5, 6) P. Fabricius and P. Cestius, the two bridges which connected the Insula Tiberina with the opposite sides of the river, the former with the city, the latter with the Janiculum. Both are still remaining. The P. Fabricius, which was built by one L. Fabricius, curator viarum, B.C. 62 (Dio Cass. xxxviii. 45), whose name appears in an inscription cut on one of the arches, now bears the name of 'Ponte Quattro Capi.' The P. Cestius, which was probably built by L. Cestius, praefectus urbi in

B.C. 46, is now called 'Ponte S. Bartolommeo.' (7) P. Aemilius or Lapideus, wrongly called Palatinus, below the Island of the Tiber, formed the communication between the Palatine and its neighbourhood and the Janiculum. It was the earliest stone bridge, begun by Aemilius Lepidus 179 B.C. and completed in 142. (8) P. Sublicius, the oldest of the Roman bridges, connecting the city with the Janiculum, said to have been built by Ancus Marcius, when he erected a fort on that hill (Liv. i. 33). It was built of wood, whence its name, which comes from sublicae, 'wooden beams.' It was carried away several times by the river, but from a feeling of religious respect was always rebuilt of wood down to the latest times, though with stone piers. Its site is uncertain, but probably led out of the Forum Boarium. Some think that some foundations near the Marmoratum belong to it. Others ascribe those remains to a bridge of the emperor Probus. (9) P. Milvius, or Mulvius, now 'Ponte Molle,' was situated outside the city, higher up the river where the Via Flaminia crosses, and was built by Aemilius Scaurus the censor, B.C. 109. [See also Dict. of Ant. art. Pons.]—G. Interior of the City. I. Fora. The Fora were open spaces of ground, paved with stones, surrounded by buildings, and used as market places, or for the transaction of public business. At Rome the number of fora increased with the growth of the city. They were level pieces of ground of an oblong form, and were surrounded by buildings, both private and public. They were divided into two classes: fora civilia, in which justice was administered and public business transacted, and fora venalia, in which provisions and other things were sold, and which were distinguished as the Forum Boarium, Olietorium, Suarium, Piscarium, &c. The principal fora at Rome were: 1. Forum Romanum, also called simply the Forum, and at a later time distinguished by the epithets vetus or magnum. It ran lengthwise from the foot of the ascent to the Capitol (Clivus Capitolinus) near the Arch of Septimius Severus in the direction of the Arch of Titus; but it did not extend so far as the latter, and came to an end at the ascent to the Velian ridge, where was the temple of Antoninus and Faustina. Its shape was that of an irregular quadrangle, of which the two longer sides were not parallel, but were wider near the Capitol than at the other end. This represents a space of about 200 yards by 70; but the central area of the Forum, kept clear of buildings (though not of statues and monuments) between the three bounding roads was about 375 feet long, 150 wide at the NW. end and 110 at the SE., paved with slabs of travertine. This was an extent undoubtedly small for the greatness of Rome; but it must be recollected that the limits of the Forum were fixed in the early days of Rome and never underwent any alteration, the relief being afforded by the transference of public shows to other places, and by the erection of basilicas for certain business and the building of new fora by successive Caesars. The origin of the Forum is ascribed to Romulus and Tatius, who are said to have filled up the swamp or marsh which occupied its site, and to have set it apart as a place for the administration of justice and for holding the assemblies of the people. There is no doubt that the ground was originally a marsh (Ov. Fast. vi. 401), and it was drained by the Cloaca Maxima. The Forum in its widest sense included the Forum properly so called and the magnificent temple of Venus Genetrix. Remains of five arches, built of tufa blocks with key-stones of travertine, have been found, communicating with vaulted chambers, which are supposed to have been used as offices.—3. Forum Augusti, built by Augustus, because the two existing fora were not found sufficient for the great increase of business which had taken place. It stood behind the Forum Julium, and its entrance at the other end was by an arch, now called Arco de' Pantani. Augustus adorned it with a temple of Mars Ultor, and with the statues of the most distinguished men forum lying in the narrow strip between the Forum Pacis and the Forum Augusti. It was begun by Domitian, who demolished the private buildings on this strip, and it was finished by Nerva. It was called Transitorium because it served as a passage from the Forum Romanum to the Subura and Carinae. It was sometimes called Forum Palladium, because a temple of Minerva stood in it. There was also a sanctuary of Janus Quadrifrons at the intersection of the roads communicating with the other fora and with the Subura [see p. 498, a]. There are some remains of these temples and of the republic. There are magnificent remains of the wall which enclosed this forum, 86 feet high, built of blocks of peperino in three stages, divided by string courses of travertine; arched doorways are traceable.—4. The Forum Pacis of Vespasian lay to the SE. of the Forum of Augustus, divided from it by the street leading to the Subura. In it was the Temple of Peace dedicated by Vespasian after the end of the Jewish war and containing spoils from the Jewish Temple. Part of the circuit wall of this forum remains, opposite the NW. end of the Basilica of Constantine.—5. Forum Nervae or Forum Transitorium, was a small of the wall of the forum.—6. Forum Trajani, built by the emperor Trajan, who employed the architect Apollodorus for the purpose. It lay between the Forum of Augustus and the Campus Martius. It was the most splendid of all the fora, and considerable remains of it are still extant. It consisted of the forum-area surrounded by a magnificent colonnade; the Basilica Ulpia and its two Bibliothecae, between which rose the great column 120 feet high and the Temple of Trajan. To provide space for these buildings the ridge of tufa rock between the Capitoline and the Quirinal was cut away. The column remains in situ, and also a great curved line of wall, part of the circuit wall, which contained three stories of chambers.—7. The Forum Boarium, or cattle market, lay between the Velabrum to the E. and the Tiber to the W.; to the N. lay the Capitol. In it were the still existing Temple of Fors Fortuna, the Temple of Ceres, and the still existing round Temple of Hercules, which was at the S. end of the forum, next to Circus Maximus. The vegetable market (Forum Olitorium) lay outside the wall of Servius, between the Forum Boarium and the Campus Martius.—II. Capitolium. The Capitoline hill had two summits: the SW. peak, on which stood the Temple of Jupiter, being called Capitolium; the NE. peak, on which stood the Temple of Juno Moneta (and now stands the Ara Coeli), being called the Arx. The space between them was called the Asylum, because (as the legends said) Romulus had there established a refuge for fugitives. In reality, before the union of the 'Four Regions' it would seem that the Capitoline hill belonged to the settlement in the Quirinal, with which it was more nearly united by the low intervening ridge. The approaches, however, were more difficult in ancient times than they became later, and the cliffs could originally be ascended only on the side of the Forum, either by the Sacred Way up to the Asylum, or by the Gradus Monetae up to the Arx. The whole hill is said to have been once called Mons Saturnius (Varro, L. L. v. 41) and also Mons Tarpeius [TARPEIA], but the name 'Tarpeian Rock' belonged to that part of the cliff which faced the Vicus Jugarius and the Forum, and has now been so completely transformed as to present no idea of the steep cliff from which criminals were thrown. [An escarped piece of the rock on the W. side of the hill, towards the Tiber, is often, but wrongly, shown as the Tarpeian Rock.] The primitive wall, of which remains are traceable, may belong to a time when the Capitoline was an altogether independent fortress occupied by a settlement not as yet united either with the Quirinal or the Palatine city; and it appears that the Arx had also a separate wall of its own. The name Capitolium Vetus was applied to the citadel on the Quirinal hill, which, before the united city had its common sanctuary on the Capitoline, possessed a threefold temple there to Jupiter, Juno and Minerva (Varro, L. L. v. 158). The most ancient sanctuary, according to tradition, on the Capitol was the small temple of Jupiter Feretrius, said to have been built by Romulus on the site of a sacred oak, which belonged to a still more primitive cult (Liv. i. 10). It was rebuilt by Augustus. But the worship of the Capitoline triad Jupiter, Juno and Minerva must have belonged also to the earliest settlements on the hill, and gave it through all Roman history its chief sanctity. In the Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus on the Capitoline, the statue of Jupiter occupied the centre chamber, but there were two smaller ones, that on the right containing the statue of Minerva, that on the left the statue of Juno. This temple was many times destroyed and rebuilt. It is said to have been first built by the Tarquins (if so, it probably took the place of something earlier), and dedicated in 509 B.C. It contained a terracotta statue of Jupiter of Etruscan make, and a chariot of the same material stood on the pediment (Plin. xxxv. 157). It was burnt down in the civil wars, 83, but was rebuilt by Sulla, and was dedicated by Q. Catulus, 69. It was burnt down a second time by the soldiers of Vitellius, A.D. 69, and was rebuilt by Vespasian; it was burnt down a third time in the reign of Titus, 80, and was again rebuilt by Domitian with greater splendour than before. The Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus was the most magnificent at Rome. Its front was towards the Forum, above the Tarpeian Rock. It stood on a very large elevated platform or podium. The columns were Corinthian, of Pentelic marble. The gates were of bronze, and the ceilings and tiles gilt. The gilding alone of the building cost Domitian 12,000 talents. These gilt-bronze tiles were partly removed by Genesius, and the rest were used by Pope Honorius in 630 to roof the Basilica of St. Peter. In the temple were kept the Sibylline books. Here the consuls upon entering on their office offered sacrifices and took their vows; and hither the victorious general who entered the city in triumph was carried in his triumphal car to return thanks to the Father of the gods. Remains of the podium have been found on this SW. peak, and in 1875 the drum of a column of Pentelic marble was discovered there, and also the remains of a small podium which may belong either to the small temple of Jupiter Tonans or to that of Jupiter Feretrius rebuilt by Augustus. The Temple of Juno Moneta, used also as a mint [Dict. of Ant. art. Moneta], built by Camillus B.C. 344, stood on the Arx (the NE. peak), which is now occupied by the church of Ara Coeli. In this space between the two peaks, called, as has been stated, the Asylum, and on the side of it above the Forum, stands the so-called Tabularium, a building of which the use and history have never been ascertained [see Dict. of Ant. s. v.].—III. Campi, as certain open spaces of ground were called: 1. Campus Martius, the 'Plain of Mars,' frequently called the Campus simply, was, in its widest signification, the open plain at Rome outside the city-walls, lying between the Tiber and the hills Capitolinus, Quirinal, and Pincius; but it was more commonly used to signify the NW. portion of the plain lying in the bend of the Tiber, which here nearly surrounded it on three sides, and stretching along the bank of the upper reach of the river as far as was included in the Aurelian walls. The S. portion of the plain in the neighbourhood of the Circus Flaminius was called Campus Flaminius or Prata Flaminia. The Campus Martius is said to have belonged originally to the Tarquins, and to have become the property of the state and to have been consecrated to Mars upon the expulsion of the kings. Here the Roman youths were accustomed to perform their gymnastic and warlike exercises, and here the comitia of the centuries were held (cf. Hor. Od. i. 8, iii. 7, 25, iv. 1, 39, Sat. ii. 6, 49, i. 6, 126, Ep. i. 7, 59, i. 11, 4, A. P. 162; Mart. ii. 14, iv. 8). The Septa or inclosure for voting purposes originally consisted of pens like sheepfolds (Juv. vi. 529), but the Septa Julia, begun by Julius Caesar and completed by Agrippa (Cic. ad Att. iv. 16, Dio Cass. liii. 23) were built of stone and adorned with statues. Remains of travertine piers in eight rows are visible in Via Lata under the church of S. Maria, and the Palazzo Doria. At a later time it was surrounded by temples, porticoes, theatres and thermae [see under these heads]. 2. Campus Sceleratus, close to the Porta Collina and within the walls of Servius, where the Vestals who had broken their vows of chastity were entombed alive. 3. Campus Agrippae, probably on the SW. slope of the Pincian hill, E. of the Campus Martius, on the right of the Corso, and N. of the Piazza degli Apostoli. 4. Campus Esquilinus, outside of the agger of Servius and near the Porta Esquilina, where criminals were executed, and the lower classes were buried. Recent excavations showed the terribly insanitary manner in which corpses had been piled up in the ditch of the Servian fortification at this point till they filled it up. Every kind of refuse was also thrown out here, till Maecenas covered the whole with a great embankment of earth and converted the space into pleasure-grounds known as Horti Maecenatis. The benefit to the health of the neighbourhood is alluded to in the lines of Horace (Sat. i. 8, 14-16).—IV. Streets and Districts. There are said to have been in all 215 streets in Rome. The broad streets were called Viae and *Vici; the narrow streets Angiportus. The chief streets were: (1) Via Sacra, the principal street in Rome. It began near the Sacellum Streniae, in the valley between the Caelian and the Esquiline, and leaving the Flavian Amphitheatre (Colosseum) on the left ran along the N. slope of the Palatine; passing under the Arch of Titus, it bent slightly to the N. (probably to avoid ancient sacred buildings), skirted the N. side of the Temple of Julius, beyond which it turned to the S., skirting the narrow E. end of the Forum, passed along the SW. side of the Forum (i.e. between the Forum and the Basilica Julia), and thence by a winding course up the Clivus Capitolinus to the Capitol and the Temple of Jupiter. It should be noticed that it passes a little distance to the N. of the temple and the house of Vesta, but the sacred precincts of Vesta included not only these but also a sacred grove, which probably stretched up to the Via Sacra. Hence Horace (Sat. i. 9, 35) speaks of the Via Sacra as reaching the sanctuary or dwelling of Vesta. The road was called 'sacred' in all probability because it led from the Forum to the most sacred ancient places, the precincts of Vesta and the shrine of the Penates. The part of it originally, or specially, so spoken of was that between the Velia and the entrance to the Forum (Varro, L. L. v. 47). The Summa Via Sacra was that part which passed over the Velian ridge by the Arch of Titus. Some have thought that originally the Via Sacra went straight from the Regia to the S. side of the Forum and that the deflection by the Temple of Julius was only made because that temple was built. This at present wants evidence. (2) Via Lata, led from the N. side of the Capitol and the Porta Ratumena to the Porta Flaminia, whence the N. part of it was called Via Flaminia. (3) Via Nova, by the side of the W. slope of the Palatine, led from the ancient Porta Romanula and the Velabrum to the Forum, and was connected by a side street with the Via Sacra. Starting from the road which led from the Via Sacra up to the Palatine near the Porta Magonia (Summa Via Sacra) it skirted the N. side of the hill, passed by the S. side of the Atrium Vestae and bent round the W. side of the Palatine to the Velabrum, near the Porta Romanula. It has been laid bare by excavations from the Summa Via Nova to the church of S. Maria Liberatrice, near the SW. angle of the Atrium Vestae, from which point a flight of steps lead from the Via Nova to the Forum (cf. Ov. Fast. vi. 395). (4) Vicus Jugarius, led from the Porta Carmentalis under the Capitol to the Forum Romanum, which it entered near the Basilica Julia and the Lacus Servilius. (5) Vicus Tuscus, connected the Velabrum with the Forum, running W. of, and nearly parallel with, the Via Nova. It contained a great number of shops, where articles of luxury were sold, and its inhabitants did not possess the best of characters (Tusci turba impia vici, Hor. Sat. ii. 3, 228). From the Velabrum it continued to the Circus Maximus. It derived its name from an early settlement there of Tuscans, possibly shopkeepers, possibly employed in the making of the Cloaca Maxima. A tradition states the settlers to have been soldiers of the Etruscan Caelius Vibenna, removed to the lower city from Mons Caelius (Varr. L. L. v. 46; Tac. Ann. iv. 65). Livy (ii. 14) speaks of the settlers as remnants of the army of Porsenna. (6) Vicus Cyprius, ran from the Colosseum valley to the Esquiline. The upper part of it, turning on the right to Urbicus Clivus, was called Sceleratus Vicus, because Tullia here drove her chariot over the corpse of her father, Servius. (7) Vicus Patricius, in the valley between the Esquiline and the Viminal in the direction of the modern Via Urbana and Via di S. Pudenziana. (8) Vicus Africus, in the district of the Esquiline, but the exact situation of which cannot be determined, said to have been so called because African hostages were kept here during the first Punic war. (9) Vicus Sandalarius, also in the district of the Esquiline, extending as far as the heights of the Carinae. (10) Vicus Vitriarius or Vitrarius, in the SE. part of the city, near the Porta Capena. (11) Vicus Longus, in the Vallis Quirini between the Quirinal and Viminal, now S. Vitale. (12) Caput Africae, near the Colosseum. (13) Subura or Suburra, a district through which a street of the same name ran, was the whole valley between the Esquiline, Quirinal and Viminal. It was one of the busiest parts of the town and contained a great number of shops (Juv. xi. 51, Mart. v. 22), and also brothels, from which it derived its bad reputation (Pers. v. 32; Mart. vi. 66). (14) Velia, a height near the Forum, which extended from the Palatine near the Arch of Titus, to the Esquiline, and which separated the valley of the Forum from that of the Colosseum. On the Velia were situated the Basilica of Constantine and the Temple of Venus and Rome. (15) Carinae, a district on the SW. part of the Esquiline, or the modern height of S. Pietro in Vincoli, where Pompey, Cicero and many other distinguished Romans lived: hence called 'lautae' (Verg. Aen. viii. 361, cf. Suet. Tib. 15). (16) Velabrum, a district on the W. slope of the Palatine, between the Vicus Tuscus and the Forum Boarium, was originally a morass. (17) Aequimaelium, a place at the E. foot of the Capitol and by the side of the Vicus Jugarius, where the house of Sp. Maelius is said to have stood. (18) Argiletum, a district S. of the Quirinal, between the Subura, the Forum of Nerva and the Forum of Peace, and running down to the back of the Basilica Aemilia. It was a booksellers' quarter. Its name was probably derived from argilla, 'white clay'; but traditions spoke of a hero Argus, a friend of Evander, who is said to have been buried here. (19) Lautumiae, a district where there had been old quarries, near the Robur

* Vicus properly signified a quarter of the city, but the principal street in a Vicus was frequently called by the name of the Vicus to which it belonged.

Tullianum or Mamertine prison [see below].—V. Temples. [For the strict uses of the words aedes and templum, see Dict. of Ant. art. Templum.] Out of the vast number of temples in Rome (of which there are said to have been 400) the following (in alphabetical order) are the most important to notice. Templum Aesculapii, on the Island in the Tiber, to which sick persons were brought for cure. A sacred snake, representing the god, had been brought from Epidaurus in 292 B.C. to avert a pestilence, and the temple built on the island, because the snake had swum ashore there (Liv. ii. 5, Ep. 11). T. Antonini et Faustinae, at the further end of the N. side of the Forum, built by Antoninus Pius in honour of his wife Faustina, 141 A.D. It was converted into the church of S. Lorenzo in Miranda, and most of the old cella destroyed, but the fine Corinthian front remains. T. Apollinis (1) on the Palatine, dedicated by Augustus in 28 B.C. in memory of his victory over Sex. Pompeius in 36. It was of great magnificence both for its architecture and its treasures. The statue of Apollo was by Scopas. At the sides of the portico or peristyle were two large libraries, one for Greek, the other for Latin books. (2) In the Campus Martius, near the Theatre of Marcellus. It was dedicated to the Delphic Apollo, in 428 B.C. Remains of it have been found near the Piazza Montanara. T. Augusti, founded by Tiberius, on the slope of the Palatine towards the Via Nova. T. Bellonae, in which the senate assembled to receive foreign ambassadors and to hear the applications of generals for a triumph, as it was outside the pomerium. It stood near the Circus Flaminius. T. Bonae Deae on the SE. side of the Aventine near the Sacrum Saxum, where Remus took the auspices (Ov. Fast. v. 148). Aed. Castoris, the temple of Castor and Pollux, at the SE. end of the Forum, divided from the Basilica Julia by the Vicus Tuscus. It was said to have been founded near the fountain of Juturna, on the spot where the twin gods halted in the Forum to announce the victory of Regillus. It was vowed by A. Postumius in that battle and dedicated by his son in 482 B.C., restored in 119 by L. Metellus Dalmaticus, rebuilt by Tiberius and Drusus after their German campaigns, A.D. 6, with Corinthian columns of Pentelic marble, three of which and the entablature are now standing. It was sometimes used as a place of meeting for the senate (Cic. pro Scaur. 46), and as an office for testing weights and measures. T. Cereris, in which Liber and Libera were associated with Ceres, in the Forum Boarium, near the Circus Maximus, dedicated by the consul Sp. Cassius in 494 B.C. Remains of it are built up into the walls of the church of S. Maria in Cosmedin. T. Concordiae, on the slope of the Capitoline hill above the Forum, founded by Camillus B.C. 367, rebuilt by Opimius in 121, and again, B.C. 6, by Tiberius and Drusus from the spoils of Germany. The senate often met in it. Remains of the podium may be seen, besides fragments of columns and cornices. T. Dianae, on the Aventine, said to have been built by Servius Tullius, and restored by Augustus. T. Fidei, on the Capitol, said to have been founded by Numa, rebuilt in the first Punic war. Aed. Fortunae, the temple of Fors Fortuna or Fortuna Virilis [see p. 346, a], in the Forum Boarium, near the Porta Carmentalis, said to have been built by Servius Tullius. It stood close to the temple of Mater Matuta. Both were burnt down B.C. 213 and rebuilt the following year. (Dionys. iv. 27; Ov. Fast. vi. 481; Liv. xxiv. 47, xxv. 7.) The existing temple called that of Fortuna Virilis is by some supposed to be the temple of Mater Matuta; by others (with greater probability) it is taken to be the temple of Portunus, which stood near the Pons Aemilius (Kal. Aug. 17), the modern Ponte Rotto. This temple is well preserved and is an Ionic temple, said to be of a date earlier than the middle of the first century B.C. There was also a temple of Fortuna Redux dedicated by Domitian in the Campus Martius, of Fortuna Respiciens on the Palatine, and three temples of Fortune near the Porta Colina. T. Florae on the Quirinal, near the 'Tiburtina pila' (probably a stone of Lares Compitales), and the old shrine of Jupiter at the Capitolium Vetus (Mart. v. 62). T. Fauni or Jovis et Fauni in the Island of the Tiber, dedicated 196 B.C. Aed. Herculis. A round temple of Hercules stood in the SE. corner of the Forum Boarium near the Ara Maxima (Liv. x. 23; Tac. Ann. xv. 41; Macrobius. iii. 6), of great antiquity, and traditionally ascribed to Evander. It was rebuilt in the time of Augustus, and there is little doubt that it is the beautiful round temple with Corinthian columns which stands at this spot and is often erroneously called a temple of Vesta. There was also a temple of Hercules Musarum (= Ἡρακλῆς Μουσᾶγέρης) close to the Portico of Octavia, between the theatre of Marcellus and the Circus Flaminius. It was built by M. Fulvius Nobilior about 187 B.C., who adorned it with terra-cotta statues of the Muses and of Heracles playing on the lyre (Plin. xxxvi. 66) which he had brought from Greece. [For the connexion of Heracles and the Muses see p. 401, a.] There was also a temple of Hercules Custos in the same district. T. Honoris et Virtutis, near the Porta Capena, founded by Marcellus in 212 B.C. from the spoils of Syracuse: another, founded by Marcius, stood on the Capitol. T. Isidis et Serapis, was built in the time of Nero in the Campus Martius near the temple of Minerva: it was damaged by the fires in the reigns of Nero and of Titus and was restored by Alex. Severus. Many works of Egyptian art have been found on this spot. Another temple of Isis stood somewhere in the third region. T. Jani, the most notable temple of Janus, was at the NE. end of the Forum. [For an account of it see p. 457, b.] The temple of Janus Quadrifrons (a quadruple arch) stood in the Forum Nervae at the intersection of the road from the Forum to the Subura with that from the Forum Pacis to the Forum Augusti. It is thought that the remains found at the SW. end of the Forum Nervae belong to this temple. T. Jovis. For the temples of Jupiter Capitolinus, Custos, Feretrius and Tonans on the Capitolium, see above, G. II. The temple of Jupiter Stator was said to have been originally built by Romulus in gratitude for the staying of the flight of the Romans before the Sabines (Liv. i. 12; Dionys. ii. 50; Ov. Fast. vi. 793, Trist. iii. 1, 31). It was on the Palatine between the Porta Magonia and the site of the Arch of Titus, and between the Via Sacra and Via Nova. Another temple of Jupiter Stator was in the Campus Martius. A temple of Jupiter Victor, of which it is thought that the foundations have been discovered, stood on the Palatine overlooking the Campus Martius. A temple of the Asiatic Jupiter Dolichenus [p. 464, b] stood in the Campus Martius near the church of S. Alessio, where inscriptions relating to it have been found (C.I.L. vi. 406-413). T. Julii, built by Augustus in 42 B.C. at the E. end of the Forum opposite the temple of Castor. It stood on a high platform (cf. Ov. Pont. ii. 2, 85). T. Junonis Monetae, on the Arx or N.E. peak of the Capitoline hill [see above]. T. Junonis Sospitae, in the Forum Olitorium, near the theatre of Marcellus, may be one of three small temples of which remains have been found on the site of the church of S. Niccolo. The temple of Juno Regina was on the Aventine. T. Lunae, said to have been founded by Servius Tullius on the Aventine above the Forum Boarium (Liv. xl. 2; Tac. Ann. 41). T. Martis. The temple of Mars Ultor in the centre of the Forum of Augustus, was dedicated in B.C. 2. It was the place where the senate deliberated on the question of granting a triumph (as before in the temple of Bellona). Three Corinthian columns of Luna marble, with the architrave above them, and a pilaster against the wall of the forum still remain and testify to the great beauty of the temple. There were two temples of Mars built by Augustus on the Capitol; a temple of Mars in the Campus Martius, built, or rebuilt, by D. Brutus Callaicus, consul in 138 B.C.; and another on the Appian Way outside the Porta Capena. T. Magnae Matris, on the slope of the Palatine towards the Via Sacra, built in 191 B.C. to receive the sacred stone of Cybele or Magna Mater Idaea, which had meantime been placed in the temple of Victory. Some remains of the temple have been found near the Arch of Titus. T. Matris Matutae, in the Forum Boarium near that of Fortuna [see above]. T. of Minerva. Besides the cella of Minerva in the temple of the Capitoline Jupiter [see above], there was a separate temple of Minerva in the Forum of Nerva. Its marble columns were used by Paul V. in 1606 for a chapel in the church of S. Maria Maggiore, but part of the apse and two Corinthian columns, and a relief of Minerva on the portion of entablature still remain. The temple of Minerva Chalcidica was founded by Pompey in the Campus Martius near the Pantheon, and restored, after damage from fire, by Domitian. Its site is marked by the church of S. Maria sopra Minerva. The ancient temple of Minerva Capta [p. 565, a] was on the slope of the Caelian, near the Colosseum. T. Minervae

Medicae, of which the remains were recently discovered, near the Porta Praenestina (Porta Maggiore). The Pantheon was built as a temple to Mars, Venus, and the deified ancestors of the Julian gens by Agrippa in 27 B.C. (Dio Cass. lxxiii. 27). The original building was damaged by fire in 80 A.D. (Dio Cass. lxxvi. 24), and there is record of two subsequent restorations, by Hadrian and by Severus. It is an error to suppose that it was connected with the Baths of Agrippa, from which it is separated by an interval of twenty feet, the walls which are imagined to be the junction being of a much later date. The drain in the floor, which was made another argument for the theory, is designed to carry away the water which fell from the opening in the roof. The temple has a fine portico, but its great characteristic is the magnificent dome, 142½ feet in diameter, and the same in height from the floor, lighted by an opening in the top, through which the sky is seen. The dome is a solid mass standing by its own coherence, not by the principle of the arch, and therefore is a remarkable proof of the great strength of Roman concrete. It was entirely covered with marble lining, which has in great part disappeared. Its exterior was overlaid with tiles of gilt bronze, of which a very small part remains, round the hypaethral opening. The whole interior was lined with precious marbles, some of which remain, and had fluted marble columns. Much of this adornment was due to Hadrian's restoration. The great bronze doors have fortunately been left as they were. A new question has been raised by recent discoveries of archaeologists, especially of the French school, that bricks of the rotunda belong to the time of Hadrian. If it is established that bricks of this date are not merely surface repairs, but integral parts of the structure, it follows that in the present building the portico and vestibule alone are the work of Agrippa, the rotunda with its great dome having been joined on to them by Hadrian, replacing the older temple. It is argued moreover that this explains certain anomalies of style, assigns the domed cupola to a period when such an innovation was more probable, and also disposes of the difficulty which some have felt in understanding how a fire could lay hold on a building such as the Pantheon now is. The preservation of this temple is due to the fact that it was consecrated as the church of S. Maria ad Martyres by Boniface IV. in 608. T. Pacis, built by Vespasian in the Forum Pacis, mentioned above. Aed. Quirini, on the Quirinal, near the church of S. Vitale. It was mentioned as existing in B.C. 432 (Liv. iv. 21), was rebuilt by Papirius Cursor in 293, and again by Augustus in 16 (Dio Cass. liv. 19). T. Portunus, in the Forum Boarium [see T. Fortunae]. T. Salutis, on the slope of the Quirinal, near the Porta Salutaris, built by Junius Bubulcus B.C. 104 and adorned with paintings by Fabius Pictor, burnt down in the reign of Claudius (Liv. ix. 43; Fest. p. 327). T. Sanci, the temple of Semo Sancus or Dius Fidius, stood on the Quirinal, and was regarded as one of the most ancient in Rome. The neighbouring Porta Sanqualis was called after it. T. Saturni, was on the Clivus Capitolinus near the Temple of Concord, and overlooking the Forum. It was said to have been built by Tarquin. In it was the treasury. [Dict. of Ant. art. Aerarium.] Part of the travertine podium, of the time of Augustus, remains, and eight columns and the entablature, of the age of Domitian. Some marble steps which exist are supposed to have been the entrance to a treasure chamber. T. Solis, near the Spina of the Circus Maximus (Tac. Ann. xv. 74; Tertull. Spect. 8). T. Spei, in the Forum Olitorium, probably one of the three small temples built in the walls of S. Niccolo in Carcere. T. Telluris, near the house of Pompey in the Carinae (SW. slope of the Esquiline), often used for meetings of the senate. T. Trajani, in the Forum of Trajan [see above]. T. Vejovis, on the island in the Tiber; also on the Capitoline hill. T. Veneris et Romae, built by Hadrian, who employed Apollodorus of Damascus as architect. It stood at the E. end of the Forum, on the slope of the Velia, raised on a high stylobate above the Via Sacra, and was the largest, and among the most magnificent, at Rome. It had two cellae, one for Venus, the other for Roma Aeterna. There are fine remains adjoining the monastery of S. Francesca. T. Veneris Erycinae, was on the Capitoline hill close to the temple of Mars: these two were vowed by Fabius Maximus and T. Otacilius B.C. 217 (Liv. xxii. 10). Another temple of Venus Erycina was built, B.C. 181, just outside the Porta Collina (Ov. Fast. iv. 871; Liv. xl. 34). The temple of Venus Genetrix, vowed in the battle of Pharsalia, was built in the centre of the Forum Julium, and dedicated B.C. 46. T. Vespasiani, was built by Domitian on the slope of the Capitoline hill under the Tabularium and next to the temple of Concord; and was restored by Sept. Severus. Three columns (belonging to the six of the portico) with the entablature above are still standing; they are part of the building of Domitian. Aed. Vestae, stands at the S. angle of the Forum. The original temple was destroyed by the Gauls B.C. 390, and three successive temples were burnt in 241 B.C., 66 A.D. and 191 A.D. The existing temple (preserving the ancient circular shape, the form of the primitive house) was built by Sept. Severus [see further under VESTA]. T. Victoriae, on the Clivus Victoriae, a N. slope of the Palatine, was built on the site of a very ancient altar of Victory (Dionys. i. 32). It was rebuilt in 294 B.C. from the proceeds of fines imposed by the aediles (Liv. x. 33), and restored by Augustus. Some remains of it were discovered near the church of S. Maria Liberatrice. Volcanal: a very ancient altar to Vulcan stood on the slope of the Capitol, with a wide space of sacred ground round it called Area Volcani (Liv. xxxix. 46; Fest. p. 290; C.I.L. vi. 457). The Area Volcani was used for meetings of the people (Dionys. ii. 50, vi. 57). Part of it was afterwards occupied by the temple of Concord. T. Urbis or Sacrae Urbis stood at the SE. corner of the Forum Pacis. A square-headed doorway of travertine in the remains of the bounding wall of the Forum Pacis led from the side of the Basilica of Constantine into the T. Sacrae Urbis. The two end walls of the temple, rebuilt by Severus, remain. The map of the city was engraved or painted on one of the walls of this temple.

—VI. Circi. The Circi were places for chariot-races and horse-races. 1. Circus Maximus, frequently called simply the Circus, was founded by Tarquinius Priscus, in the Vallis Murcia, between the Palatine and the Aventine, and was successively enlarged by Julius Caesar and Trajan. Under the emperors it contained seats for 385,000 persons. It was restored by Constantine the Great, and games were celebrated in it as late as the sixth century. [For a full description see Dict. of Ant. art. Circus.] 2. C. Flaminius, erected by Flaminius B.C. 221 in the Prata Flaminia before the Porta Carmentalis; it was not sufficiently large for the population of Rome, and was therefore seldom used. 3. C. Caili et Neronis, erected by Caligula in the gardens of Agrippina on the other side of the Tiber, under the Vatican hill, and enlarged by Nero. 4. C. Maxentii, wrongly ascribed to Caracalla, on the Via Appia, two miles from the gates. It was built by Maxentius A.D. 311. Remarkable remains of the external wall still exist. 5. C. Hadriani, is the title given to a circus of which some remains have been found near the Mausoleum of Hadrian. Among the Circi we may also reckon: 6. The Stadium, likewise called C. Agonalis and C. Alexandri, in the Campus Martius, erected by Domitian in place of the wooden Stadium built by Augustus, and was restored by Alexander Severus. Its remains still exist in the Piazza Navona.—VII. Theatres. Theatres were not built at Rome till a comparatively late period, and long after the Circi. At first they were only made of wood for temporary purposes, and were afterwards broken up; but many of these wooden theatres were notwithstanding constructed with great magnificence. The splendid wooden theatre of M. Aemilius Scaurus was capable of containing 80,000 spectators. [Dict. of Ant. art. Theatrum.] 1. Theatrum Pompeii, the first permanent stone theatre, was erected by Cn. Pompey, B.C. 55, in the Campus Martius, NE. of the Circus Flaminius, after the model of the theatre of Mytilene. It contained seats for 40,000 spectators. It was restored successively by Augustus, Tiberius, Caligula, Diocletian, and Theodoric. Its ruins are by the Palazzo Pio, not far from the Campo di Fiore. 2. Th. Cornelii Balbi, SE. of the preceding, near the Tiber, on the site of the Palazzo Cenci. It was dedicated by Cornelius Balbus in B.C. 13, was partly burnt down under Titus, but was subsequently restored. It contained seats for 11,600 persons. Some of its columns are visible, built into houses in Via di S. Maria in Cacaberis. 3. Th. Marcelli, in the Forum Oltorium, SE. of the preceding, between the slope of the Capitoline and the Island of the Tiber, on the site of the temple of Pietas. It was begun by Julius Caesar, and dedicated by Augustus in B.C. 13, to the memory of his nephew Marcellus. It was restored by Vespasian, and perhaps also by Alexander Severus. It contained seats for 20,000 spectators. The remains of its Cavea exist near the Piazza Montanara, arcades with engaged columns in two stories supporting an entablature to each story. There was also an Odeum, in the Campus Martius, built by Domitian, and enlarged by Trajan: it contained seats for about 11,000 persons.—

VIII. Amphitheatres. The amphitheatres, like the theatres, were originally made of wood for temporary purposes. They were used for the shows of gladiators and wild beasts. The first wooden amphitheatre was built by C. Scribonius Curio (the celebrated partisan of Caesar), and the next by Julius Caesar during his per-middle ages to the amphitheatre at Capua. The Flavian Amphitheatre was situated in the valley between the Caelian, the Esquiline and the Velia, on the marshy ground which was previously the pond of Nero's palace. It was begun by Vespasian, and was completed by Titus, who dedicated it in A.D. 80, when 5000 animals of different kinds were slaughtered. To this period belong the three tiers of open arches on the façade and the interior up to a level with the top of the arcades. The highest tiers of seats and the fourth story with pilasters belong to the third century. This wonderful building covered nearly six acres of ground, and furnished seats for 87,000 spectators. In the reign of Macrinus it was struck by lightning, and so much damage was done to it that the games were for some years celebrated in the Stadium. Its restoration was commenced by Elagabalus and completed by Alexander Severus. 3. Amph. Castrense, at the SE. of the Aurelian walls.—IX. Naumachiae. These petual dictatorship, B.C. 46. 1. Amph. Statilii Tauri, in the Campus Martius, was the first stone amphitheatre in Rome, and was built by Statilius Taurus, B.C. 80. This edifice was the only one of the kind until the building of the Flavian Amphitheatre. It did not satisfy Caligula, who began an amphitheatre near the Septa; but the work was not continued by Claudius. Nero, too, A.D. 57, erected a vast amphitheatre of wood, but this was only a temporary building. The amphitheatre of Taurus was destroyed in the burning of Rome, A.D. 64, and was probably never restored, and it is not again mentioned. [Dict. of Ant. art. Amphitheatrum.] 2. Amph. Flavium, or, as it has been called since the middle ages, the Colosseum or Coliseum, a name said to be derived from the Colossus of Nero, which once stood near, but had been destroyed before the name was given to the amphitheatre. It is more likely that the name (which first appears in the writings of Bede) was descriptive of its vast size. The same name was applied in the were buildings of a kind similar to the amphitheatres. They were used for representations of sea-fights, and consisted of artificial lakes or ponds, with stone seats around them to accommodate the spectators. [Dict. of Ant. art. Naumachiae.] 1. Naumachia Julii Caesaris, in the middle part of the Campus Martius, called the 'Lesser Codeta.' This lake was filled up in the time of Augustus, so that we find in later writers mention only of two Naumachiae. 2. N. Augusti, constructed by Augustus on the other side of the Tiber under the Janiculum, in the Horti Caesariani or Nemus Caesarum. It was subsequently called the Vetus Naumachia, to distinguish it from the following one. 3. N. Domitiani, constructed by the emperor Domitian, probably on the other side of the Tiber under the Vatican and the Circus Neronis.—X. Thermae. The Thermae were some of the most magnificent buildings of imperial Rome. They were distinct from the Balneae, or common baths, of which there were a great number at Rome. In the Thermae the baths constituted a small part of the building. They were, properly speaking, a Roman adaptation of the Greek gymnasia; and besides the baths they contained places for athletic games and youthful sports, exedrae or public halls, porticoes and vestibules for the idle, and libraries for the learned. They were decorated with the finest objects of art, and adorned with fountains, and shaded walks and plantations. [Dict. of Ant. art. Balnea.] 1. Thermae Agrippae, in the Campus Martius, erected by M. Agrippa, about twenty feet behind the Pantheon, which was supposed by some, but without sufficient reason, to have served originally as a vestibule to these Thermae [see above]. On the removal of some houses in 1881 remains of a great hall, lined and paved with marble and with fluted columns, belonging to these Thermae were found. 2. Th. Neronis, erected by Nero in the Campus Martius alongside of the Thermae of Agrippa: they were restored by Alexander Severus, and were from that time called Th. Alexandrinae. 3. Th. Titi, on the Esquiline, near the amphitheatre of this emperor, of which there are still considerable remains. 4. Th. Trajani, also on the Esquiline, immediately behind the two preceding, towards the NE. 5. Th. Commodianae and Th. Severianae, close to one another, near S. Balbina, in the SE. part of the city. 6. Th. Antoniniana (the Baths of Caracalla), also in the SE. part of the city, behind the two preceding, one of the most magnificent of all the Thermae, in which 2300 men could bathe at the same time. The greater part of it was built by Caracalla, and it was completed by Elagabalus and Alexander Severus. The remains of this immense building are among the most remarkable in Rome. (For a full description see Dict. of Ant. art. Balnea). 7. Th. Diocletiani, in the NE. part of the city between the Agger of Servius and the Viminal and Quirinal, covering nearly all the ground between the Porta Viminalis and Porta Collina. It was the most extensive of all the Thermae, containing a library, picture-gallery, Odeum, &c., and such immense baths that 3000 men could bathe in them at the same time. The great hall of the Tepidarium was transformed by Michelangelo into the nave of the church of S. Maria degli Angeli, and one of the hot rooms (laconica) forms the vestibule of the church. 8. Th. Constantini, on the Quirinal, on the site of the modern Palazzo Rospigliosi, of which all traces have disappeared. The following Thermae were smaller and less celebrated. 9. Th. Decianae, on the Aventine. 10. Th. Suranae, erected by Trajan to the memory of his friend Sulpicius Sura, also in the neighbourhood of the Aventine, probably the same as the Th. Varianae. 11. Th. Philippi, near S. Matteo in Merulana. 12. Th. Agrippinae, on the Viminal, behind S. Lorenzo. 13. Th. Caii et Lucii, on the Esquiline, called in the middle ages the Terme di Galluccio.—

XI. Basilicae. The Basilicae were buildings which served as courts of law, and exchanges or places of meeting for merchants and men of business. 1. Basilica Porcia, erected by M. Porcius Cato, in the Forum, adjoining the Curia, B.C. 184. It was burnt down along with the Curia in the riots which followed the death of Clodius, 52. 2. B. Aemilia, also called Aemilia et Fulvia, because it was built by the censors L. Aemilius Lepidus and M. Fulvius Nobilior in 179. It was situated in the Forum, near the preceding one. It was restored by Aemilius Paulus in the time of Caesar, and was hence called B. Aemilia or Pauli. It was dedicated by his son Paulus Aemilius Lepidus in his consulship, 34. It was burnt down twenty years afterwards (14), and was rebuilt nominally by Paulus Lepidus, but in reality by Augustus and the friends of Paulus. The new building was a most magnificent one; its columns of Phrygian marble were especially celebrated. It was repaired by another Lepidus in the reign of Tiberius, A.D. 22. 3. B. Sempronia, built by Ti. Sempronius Gracchus, B.C. 171, in the Forum, at the end of the Vicus Tuscus. 4. B. Opimia, in the Forum, near the temple of Concordia. 5. B. Julia, begun by Julius Caesar and finished by Augustus, in the Forum, between the temples of Castor and Saturn, probably on the site of the B. Sempronia mentioned above. It was restored after a fire by Sept. Severus. The building can now be traced by the remains of marble piers, of the cancelli and of the pavement. 6. B. Argentaria, in the Forum, near the Clivus Argentarius and before the temple of Concordia, destroyed to make room for the imperial fora. The remains of this building are behind S. Martina, alongside of the Salita di Marforio. 7. B. Ulpia, in the middle of the Forum of Trajan, of which there are still considerable remains. 8. B. Constantiana, a magnificent building, between the temple of Peace and the temple of Rome and Venus, of which little remains except three vaulted chambers. [For fuller description see Dict. of Ant. art. Basilica.]—XII. Porticoes. The Porticoes (Porticus) were covered walks, supported by columns, and open on one side. There were several public porticoes at Rome, many of them of great size, which were used as places of recreation, and for the transaction of business. 1. Porticus Pompeii, adjoining the theatre of Pompey, and erected to afford shelter to the spectators in the theatre during a shower of rain. It was restored by Diocletian, and was hence called P. Jovia. 2. P. Argonautarum, or Neptuni or Agrippae, erected by Agrippa in the Campus Martius, as a thank-offering for his naval victories, around the temple of Neptune, and adorned with paintings representing the story of the Argonauts. Eleven marble columns of the temple still exist and traces of a portico. 3. P. Philippi, by the side of the T. Herculis Musarum, and the Porticus Octaviae, built by M. Philippus, the father-in-law of Augustus, and adorned with splendid works of art (Plin. xxxv. 114). 4. P. Minucia et Frumentaria, in the Campus Martius, near the Circus Flaminius, built by Q. Minucius Rufus in B.C. 109, to commemorate his victories over the Scordisci and Triballi in the preceding year. It appears that the tesserae, or tickets, which entitled persons to a share in the public distribution of corn were given to them in the P. Minucia. (Liv. iv. 12; Vell. Pat. ii. 813.) 5. P. Metelli, built by Q. Metellus, after his triumph over Perseus, king of Macedonia, B.C. 146. It was situated in the Campus Martius between the Circus Flaminius and the theatre of Marcellus, and surrounded the two temples of Jupiter Stator and Juno Regina. 6. P. Octaviae, built by Augustus on the site of the P. Metelli just mentioned, in honour of his sister Octavia. It was a magnificent building, containing a vast number of works of art and a public library, in which the senate frequently assembled; hence it is sometimes called Curia Octavia. It was burnt down in the reign of Titus. Its ruins are near the church of S. Angelo in Pescaria. Remains also of Corinthian columns have been found since the destruction of the Ghetto. 7. P. Octavia, which must be carefully distinguished from the P. Octaviae just mentioned, was built by Cn. Octavius, who commanded the Roman fleet in the war against Perseus, king of Macedonia. It was situated in the Campus Martius, between the theatre of Pompey and the Circus Flaminius. It was rebuilt by Augustus, and contained two rows of columns of the Corinthian order, with brazen capitals, whence it was also called P. Corinthia. 8. P. Europae, in the Campus Martius, probably N. of the Pantheon, so called from the statues or frescoes in it relating to the story of Europa (Mart. ii. 14, iii. 20, vii. 32). 9. P. Pollae, built by the sister of Agrippa in the Campus Agrippae. In it was the map of the Roman world which Agrippa caused to be painted or carved upon the walls (Plin. iii. 17). 10. P. Livia, on the Esquiline, surrounding a temple of Concordia (Ov. Fast. vi. 637). 11. P. Deorum Consentium, a portico forming shrines for the twelve statues of the Dii Consentes [CONSENTES]. It was built on the slope of the Capitol, above the temple of Saturn. 12. P. Vipsania was probably only another name of the Porticus Pollae (= Vipsaniae): the neighbouring arch, which dripped, may have belonged to the Aqua Virgo (Mart. iv. 18). 13. P. Meleagri, near the P. Europae, and also named from the paintings or statues in it. 14. P. Boni Eventus, in the Campus Martius, near the Thermae of Agrippa.—XIII. Triumphal Arches. The Triumphal Arches (Arcus) were structures peculiar to the Romans, and were erected by victorious generals in commemoration of their victories. They were built across the principal streets of the city, and, according to the space of their respective localities, consisted either of a single archway or of a central one for carriages, with a smaller one on each side for foot-passengers. Ancient writers mention twenty-one arches in the city of Rome. Of these the most important were: 1. Arcus Fabianus, also called Fornix Fabianus, near the beginning of the Via Sacra, built by Fabius Maximus in B.C. 121, in commemoration of his victory over the Allobroges. 2. A. Drusi, erected by the senate in B.C. 9, in honour of Nero Claudius Drusus, in Regio I., but the existing arch which is called the 'Arch of Drusus,' over the Via Appia, is merely an arch of the aqueduct built by Caracalla to supply his thermae, and more highly ornamented because it crossed a road. It is clearly of a much later date than the time of Drusus. 3. A. Augusti, in the Forum, near the house of Julius Caesar. 4. A. Tiberii, near the temple of Saturn on the Clivus Capitolinus, erected by Tiberius, A.D. 16, in honour of the victories of Germanicus in Germany. 5. A. Claudii, in the plain E. of the Quirinal, erected across the Via Lata A.D. 51, to commemorate the victories of Claudius in Britain. Remains of it have been dug up at the beginning of the Piazza Sciarra, by the Via di Pietra. 6. A. Titi, in the middle of the Via Sacra at the foot of the Palatine, which still exists. It was erected to the honour of Titus, after his conquest of Judaea, but was not finished till after his death, since in the inscription upon it he is called 'Divus,' and he is also represented as being carried up to heaven upon an eagle. The bas-reliefs of this arch represent the spoils from the Temple of Jerusalem carried in triumphal procession. Another Arch of Titus once stood in the Circus Maximus. 7. A. Trajani, in the forum of this emperor, at the point where it is entered from the Forum of Augustus. 8. A. Veri, on the Via Appia, erected to the honour of Verus after his victory over the Parthians. 9. A. Marci Aurelii, in the Via Flaminia, not far from the Arch of Claudius, probably erected to commemorate the victory of this emperor over the Marcomanni. It existed under different names near the Piazza Fiano down to 1662, when it was broken up by order of Alexander VII. 10. A. Septimii Severi, still extant in the Forum, at the end of the Via Sacra and the Clivus Capitolinus before the temple of Concordia, near the church of SS. Sergio e Bacco, was erected by the senate, A.D. 203, in honour of Septimius Severus and his two sons, Caracalla and Geta, on account of his victories over Parthians and Arabians. 11. A. Argentariorum, in the Forum Boarium (a gateway rather than an arch), was also erected in honour of Sept. Severus and his two sons by the silversmiths and merchants of the district. Caracalla erased all that referred to his brother Geta. 12. A. Gallieni, erected to the honour of Gallienus by a private individual, M. Aurelius Victor, also on the Esquiline, SE. of the Porta Esquilina. It is still extant near the church of S. Vito. 13. A. Constantini, at the entrance to the valley between the Palatine and the Caelian, is still extant. It was erected by the senate in honour of Constantine after his victory over Maxentius, A.D. 312. It is profusely ornamented, and many of the bas-reliefs which adorn it were taken from one of the arches erected in the time of Trajan. 14. A. Dolabellae, on the Caelian hill, a plain arch of travertine, with an inscription stating that it was erected by Dolabella in his consulship (A.D. 10). It is not a triumphal arch, nor can it have been made for the Claudian aqueduct which passes over it, but is of a later date. It is suggested that it may have been built for the Aqua Marcia, and afterwards used for the Aqua Claudia.—XIV. Curiae or Senate-Houses. 1. Curia Hostilia, frequently called Curia simply, was built by Tullus Hostilius, and was used as the ordinary place of assembly for the senate down to the time of Julius Caesar. It stood on the N. side of the Comitium. It was burnt to the ground in the riots which followed the death of Clodius, B.C. 52. It was, however, soon rebuilt, the direction of the work being entrusted to Faustus, the son of the dictator Sulla; but scarcely had it been finished, when the senate, at the suggestion of Caesar, decreed that it should be destroyed, and a temple of Fortune erected on its site, while a new Curia should be erected, which should bear the name of Julia. This Curia Julia stood nearly, but not exactly, on the site of the old one. It was burnt, and rebuilt by Domitian, and rebuilt again after another fire by Diocletian. It has been fairly established that the Curia of Diocletian is the existing church of S. Adriano. C. Pompeia or Pompeii, attached to the Portico of Pompey in the Campus Martius. It was in this Curia, at the foot of the statue of Pompey which stood there (generally supposed to be the statue now in Palazzo Spada), that Caesar was assassinated on the Ides of March.—XV. Prisons. The only prison in the earliest times was said to have been built by Ancus Marcius (Liv. i. 33), and was on the slope of the Capitoline, to the right of the ascent from the Forum. It was called Tullianum, Robur Tullianum, Robur, or Carcere: the name Carcere Mamertinus, or Mamertine Prison, by which it is now generally known, dates only from the middle ages, and was derived from a statue of Mars which stood near it and gave the name also to the Via del Marforio. The name Tullianum has nothing to do with any additions by Servius Tullius, as old etymologists supposed, but is derived from tullius (a spring), and means 'the well-house,' the lower chamber having been originally a cistern for the use of the Capitol excavated in the rock to collect the water of the spring which still exists there. It is a circular chamber partly hollowed in the rock, partly built up with blocks of stone, forming originally a vaulted or conical roof closed at the top by a stone which was removed to let the prisoners down into the lower chamber (or Tullianum proper): this is now reached by a modern staircase. Above was a larger room, of a later date, but still very old. Above the whole has been built the church of S. Pietro in Carcere. In this lower prison Jugurtha was confined and probably died of the cold: in one or other of the chambers captives were slain as the triumphal procession went up to the Capitol, and criminals were executed (e.g. the Catiline conspirators). (Liv. xxix. 22, xxxiv. 44; Sall. Cat. 55.) Near this prison were the Scalae Gemoniae or steps down which the bodies of those who had been executed were thrown into the Forum, to be exposed to the gaze of the Roman populace. It is said (Liv. iii. 57) that App. Claudius built a new prison. It is of course possible that this may be the upper chamber over the Tullianum: or it may have been the prison called Lautumiae: or the Lautumiae may have been a third state prison. Some writers believe the Lautumiae to have been merely another name for the Tullianum, or for the upper part of it, but it is more likely that it was a separate and more recent building. (Liv. xxxii. 26, xxxvii. 3; Juv. iii. 212.) It was, no doubt, near the Tullianum, and derived its name from the district Lautumiae, in which there had once been quarries. This is more likely than the derivation of the name from the Syracusan λάρουλα.—XVI. Castra or Barracks. 1. Castra Praetoria, in the NE. corner of the city, on the slope of the Quirinal and Viminal, and beyond the Thermae of Diocletian, were built by the emperor Tiberius in the form of a Roman camp. Here the Praetorian troops or imperial guards were always quartered. This camp was outside the city limits when it was first made, but was incorporated in the Aurelian walls [see above, p. 801, a]. 2. Castra Peregrina, on the Caelian, probably built by Septimius Severus for the use of the foreign troops, who might serve as a counterpoise against the Praetorians. 3. The barracks (castra) of the Equites Singulares or imperial cavalry guard, were on the Caelian hill. The remains of the building, with many inscriptions, have been found in the Via Tasso, near the Lateran. 4. Traces of barracks of the Cohortes urbanae have been found in the Campus Agrippae: there were others near the Thermae of Titus, but the exact position for each region is uncertain. 5. Remains of the buildings forming the stationes or headquarters of the cohorts of Vigiles have been found on the Quirinal, Esquiline, Aventine, and Caelian; and interesting remains of smaller barracks (excubitoria) near the church of S. Crisogono in Trastevere.—XVII. Aqueducts. The Aqueducts (Aquaeductus) supplied Rome with an abundance of pure water from the hills which surround the Campagna. The Romans at first had recourse to the Tiber and to wells sunk in the city. It was not till B.C. 313 that the first aqueduct was constructed, but their number was gradually increased till they amounted to eleven. 1. Aqua Appia, was begun by the censor Appius Claudius Caecus in B.C. 313. Its sources were near the Via Praenestina, between the seventh and eighth milestones, and its termination was at the Salinae by the Porta Trigemina. Its length was 11,190 passus; for 11,180 of which it was carried under the earth, and for the remaining sixty passus, within the city, from the Porta Capena to the Porta Trigemina, it was on arches. No traces of it remain. 2. Anio Vetus, commenced B.C. 273, by the censor M. Curius Dentatus, and finished by M. Fulvius Flaccus. The water was derived from the river Anio, above Tibur, at a distance of twenty Roman miles from the city; but on account of its windings its actual length was forty-three miles, of which length less than a quarter of a mile only (viz. 221 passus) was above the ground. There are considerable remains of this aqueduct on the Aurelian wall, near the Porta Maggiore, and also in the neighbourhood of Tivoli. 3. Aqua Marcia, which brought the coldest and most wholesome water to Rome, was built by the praetor Q. Marcius Rex, by command of the senate, in B.C. 144. It started at the side of the Via Valeria, thirty-eight miles from Rome; its length was 61,710½ passus, of which only 7463 were above ground: namely, 528 on solid substructions, and 6935 on arches. It ended near the Porta Capena. It was repaired by Agrippa in his aedileship, B.C. 33 [see below No. 5], and the volume of its water was increased by Augustus, by means of the water of a spring 800 passus from it: the short aqueduct which conveyed this water was called Aqua Augusta, but is never enumerated as a distinct aqueduct. The supply of the Marcian water was restored by Pius IX. in 1870, and is called 'Acqua Pia.' 4. Aqua Tepula, which was built by the censors Cn. Servilius Caepio and L. Cassius Longinus in B.C. 127, began in a spot in the Lucullan or Tusculan land, two miles to the right of the tenth milestone on the Via Latina. 5. Aqua Julia. Among the splendid public works executed by Agrippa in his aedileship, B.C. 33, was the formation of a new aqueduct, and the restoration of all the old ones. From a source two miles to the right of the twelfth milestone on the Via Latina he constructed his aqueduct (the Aqua Julia), which was carried for some distance on the same arches as Nos. 3 and 4. The water was carried along three distinct channels, on the same substructions (which were probably the original substructions of the Aqua Marcia and Aqua Tepula newly restored), the lowest channel being the Aqua Marcia, the middle Aqua Tepula, and the upper the Aqua Julia. In the city the channels were separated and carried to different quarters. The arch built by Augustus where the triple aqueduct crosses a road is still to be seen close to the Porta S. Lorenzo. It bears an inscription referring to the repairs under Caracalla. The whole course of the Aqua Julia, from its source, amounted to 15,426 passus, partly on massive substructions and partly on arches. 6. Aqua Virgo, built by Agrippa to supply his baths. Its water was as highly esteemed for bathing as that of the Aqua Marcia was for drinking. It commenced by the eighth milestone on the Via Collatina, and was conducted by a very circuitous route, chiefly under the ground, to the M. Pincius, whence it was carried on arches to the Campus Martius: its length was 14,105 passus, of which 12,865 were under ground.

Arch of Titus.

7. Aqua Alsietina, sometimes called also Aqua Augusta, on the other side of the Tiber, was constructed by Augustus from the Lacus Alsietinus (Lago di Martignano) which lay 6500 passus to the right of the fourteenth milestone on the Via Claudia, and was brought to the part of the Regio Transtiberina below the Janiculum. Its length was 22,172 passus, of which only 354 were on arches; and the water was so bad that it could only have been intended for the supply of Augustus's Naumachia, and for watering gardens. 8, 9. Aqua Claudia, and Anio Novus (or Aqua Aniena Nova), the two most magnificent of all the aqueducts, both begun by Caligula in A.D. 36, and finished by Claudius in A.D. 50. The Aqua Claudia commenced near the thirty-eighth milestone on the Via Sublacensis. Its water was reckoned the best after the Marcia. Its length was 46,406 passus (nearly 46½ miles), of which 9567 were on arches. The Anio Novus began at the forty-second milestone on the Via Sublacensis. Its length was 58,700 passus (nearly 59 miles), and some of its arches were 109 feet high. In the neighbourhood of the city, these two aqueducts were united, forming two channels on the same arches, the Claudia below and the Anio Novus above. An interesting monument connected with these aqueducts is the gate now called Porta Maggiore, which was originally a magnificent double arch, by means of which the aqueduct was carried over the Via Labicana and the Via Praenestina. Over the double arch are three inscriptions, which record the names of Claudius as the builder, and of Vespasian and Titus as the restorers, of the aqueduct. By the side of this arch the aqueduct passes along the wall of Aurelian for some distance, and then it is continued upon the Arcus Neroniani or Caelimontani, which were added by Nero to carry the water on over the Caelian to the Palatine, with a branch passing toward the Colosseum. 10. Aqua Trajana, was brought by Trajan from the Lacus Sabatinus (now Bracciano) to supply the Janiculum and the Regio Transtiberina. 11. Aqua Alexandrina, constructed by Alexander Severus; its source was in the lands of Tusculum, about fourteen miles from Rome, between Gabii and the lake Regillus. Its small height shows that it was intended for the baths of Severus, which were in one of the valleys of Rome. These eleven were the separate aqueducts of Rome: Procopius brings the number up to fourteen by reckoning branches drawn off from some of them. The Aqua Crabra was a small brook which flowed under the wall between Porta Latina and the Lateran, and was enclosed in a euripus or open channel at the Circus Maximus. Several of these aqueducts have been restored for modern use. (1) The Acqua Vergine, the ancient Aqua Virgo, which was restored by Pope Pius IV. and further embellished by Benedict XIV. and Clement XIII. The chief portion of its waters gushes out through the beautiful Fontana di Trevi, but it also supplies twelve other public fountains and the greater part of the lower city. (2) The Acqua Felice, named after the conventual name of its restorer Sixtus V. (Fra Felice), is a part of the ancient Aqua Alexandrina. It supplies twenty-seven public fountains and the eastern part of the city. (3) The Acqua Paola, the ancient Trajana, supplies the Trastevere and the Vatican, and feeds, among others, the splendid fountains before St. Peter's. (4) The Acqua Pia, restored in 1870 by

Pius IX. to convey the water of the Aqua Marcia.—XVIII. Sewers. Of these the most celebrated was the Cloaca Maxima, constructed by Tarquinius Priscus, which was formed to carry off the waters brought down from the adjacent hills into the Velabrum and valley of the Forum. It empties itself into the Tiber nearly opposite one extremity of the Insula Tiberina. This cloaca was formed by three arches, one within the other, the innermost of which is a semicircular vault about fourteen feet in diameter. It is still extant in its original state. Even larger than the so-called Cloaca Maxima is the cloaca which drained the valley of the Circus Maximus and the ground at the base of the Caelian, and has its opening about one hundred yards below the Cloaca Maxima. That which drains the Campus Martius was possibly the largest of all. (Plin. xxxvi. 104; Dionys. iii. 68; Dict. of Ant. art. Cloacae).—XIX. Palaces. The house of Augustus was built on the site of the house of Hortensius on the S. of the Palatine overhanging the Circus Maximus, where the Villa Mills now stands. The Domus Tiberiana, which was originally a separate house of Tiberius on the Palatine and was afterwards united to the palace of Augustus. It was on the W. side of the hill turned towards the Velabrum, where a long row of vaulted chambers, supposed to be guard-rooms, exist. The Palatium was considerably enlarged by Caligula, who extended the buildings a long way beyond the Domus Tiberiana, across the Clivus Victoriae, thus occupying the NW. angle of the Palatine; but it did not satisfy Nero's love of pomp and splendour. Nero built two magnificent palaces, which must be distinguished from one another. The first, called the Domus Transitoria Neronis, covered the whole of the Palatine, and extended as far as the Esquiline to the gardens of Maecenas. This palace was burnt to the ground in the great fire of Rome, thereupon Nero commenced a new palace, known by the name of Domus Aurea, which embraced the whole of the Palatine, the Velia, the valley of the Colosseum and the heights of the Thermae of Titus, extended near the Esquiline gate, and was cut through not only by the Via Sacra but also by other streets. The whole building, however, was not finished at the time of Nero's death; and Vespasian confined the imperial palace to the Palatine, converting the other parts of the Domus Aurea into public or private buildings. The palace itself was not finished till the time of Domitian, who adorned it with numerous works of art. This, which is called the Flavian palace, occupied and filled up the depression which divided the summits of the Palatine. The emperor Septimius Severus added buildings on the S. side of the Palatine, extending into the valley towards the Caelian. A part of this palace at the SE. base of the hill was especially lofty and splendid, and was called Septizonium, probably because it had seven stories of colonnades. There were considerable remains of this Septizonium down to the end of the sixteenth century, when Sixtus V. caused them to be destroyed, and the pillars brought to the Vatican. The buildings variously called the House of Germanicus or of Livia stand E. of the remains of the Domus Tiberiana, and are remarkable for the preservation of its form and even of some of its paintings; a crypto-porticus, or covered passage, led from it to the palace of Caligula. The Domus Gelotiana (Suet. Cal. 18) stood on the SW. slope of the Palatine, above the Circus, and contains curious writings and drawings cut into the plaster, some of which seem to show that at one time it was used as a paedagogium for the imperial pages. Domus Vectiliana, near the Colosseum, was a palace of Commodus. Among the numerous private palaces at Rome the following were some of the most important. Domus Ciceronis, close to the Porticus Catuli, on the N. slope of the Palatine, was built by M. Livius Drusus, and purchased by Cicero of one of the Crassi. It was destroyed by Claudius after the banishment of Cicero, but was subsequently rebuilt at the public expense. D. Pompeii, the palace of Pompey, was situated in the Carinae near the temple of Tellus. It was afterwards the residence of M. Antonius. D. Crassi, the palace of L. Crassus the orator, on the Palatine. D. Scauri, also on the Palatine, celebrated for its magnificence, subsequently belonged to Clodius. D. Lateranorum, on the E. confines of the Caelian, was a palace originally belonging to the distinguished family of the Plautii Laterani; but after the execution of Plautius Lateranus under Nero, it became imperial property. It was given by Septimius Severus to his friend Lateranus, and was subsequently the palace of Constantine, who adorned it with great magnificence. The modern Basilica and palace of the Lateran occupies most of its site, but there are remains of the older palace.—XX. Horti. The Horti were parks or gardens which were laid out by wealthy Roman nobles on the hills around the city, and were adorned with beautiful buildings and works of art. (1) Horti Luculliani, on M. Pincius, which hill was hence called Collis Hortorum. They were laid out by Lucullus, the conqueror of Mithridates. In the reign of Claudius they belonged to Valerius Asiaticus, who was put to death through the influence of Messallina, chiefly because she coveted the possession of these gardens. From this time they appear to have belonged to the imperial house. (2) H. Sallustiani, laid out by the historian Sallust, on his return from Numidia, in the valley between the Quirinal and the Pincius. (3) H. Caesaris, bequeathed by Julius Caesar to the people, were situated on the right bank of the Tiber at the foot of the Janiculum, where Augustus afterwards constructed his great Naumachia. (4) H. Maecenatis, in the Campus Esquilinus, bequeathed by Maecenas to Augustus and frequently used by the imperial family [see above, p. 805, a]. (5) H. Agrippinae, on the right bank of the Tiber, at the base of the Vatican hill, in which Caligula built his Circus. It was here that Nero burnt the Christians in tunics covered with pitch to serve as lights for his nocturnal games. (Tac. Ann. xv. 44; Juv. i. 155.) Adjoining these were: (6) H. Domitiae, also on the right bank of the Tiber, in which Hadrian built his Mausoleum. (7) H. Pallantiani, on the Esquiline, laid out by Pallas, the powerful freedman of Claudius. (8) H. Getae, on the other side of the Tiber, laid out by Septimius Severus.—XXI. Sepulchral Monuments. (1) Mausoleum Augusti, was situated in the Campus Martius and was built by Augustus as the burial-place of the imperial family. It was surrounded with an extensive garden or park, and was considered one of the most magnificent buildings of his reign; but there are only some insignificant ruins of it still extant. (2) Mausoleum Hadriani, was commenced by Hadrian in the gardens of Domitia on the right bank of the Tiber, and was connected with the city by the Pons

Aelius; it was finished and dedicated by Antoninus Pius, A.D. 140. Here were buried Hadrian, Antoninus Pius, L. Verus, Commodus, and probably also Septimius Severus, Geta, and Caracalla. This building, stripped of its ornaments and converted into a fortress before the time of Procopius (it is said, by Belisarius), is round the pillar, which represents the emperor's wars against Decebalus and the Dacians, and is one of the most valuable authorities for archaeological inquiries. (4) Col. Antonini Pii, erected in honour of Antoninus Pius after his death, consisted of a column of red granite on a pediment of white marble, and was situated the Castle of S. Angelo. (3) Sepulcrum Scipionum, the burial-place of the Scipios, was situated, left of the Via Appia, near the Porta Capena. Most of the tombs of the distinguished Roman families during the Republican period lay on the Via Appia. The tomb of the Scipios was discovered in 1780, about 400 paces within the modern Porta S. Sebastiano. It contained many interesting monuments and inscriptions, which were deposited in the Museo Pio-Clementino. (4) Sepulcrum Caeciliae Metellae. [See p. 556.] (5) Sepulcrum Cestii, situated S. of the Aventine, near the Porta Ostiensis, being partly within and partly without the walls of Aurelian. This monument, which is still extant, is in the form of a pyramid, and was built in the time of Augustus for a certain C. Cestius.—XXII. Columns (Columnae) were frequently erected at Rome to commemorate persons and events. (1) Columna Maeniana, in the Forum, was erected to the honour of the consul C. Maenius, who conquered the Latins and took the town of Antium, B.C. 388. (2) Col. Rostrata, also in the Forum, erected in honour of the consul C. Duilius, to commemorate his victory over the Carthaginian fleet, B.C. 260. The name of Rostrata was given to it from its being adorned with the beaks of the conquered ships. Part of its inscribed base was found near the Arch of Severus in the sixteenth cent., and is preserved in the Capitoline Museum. (3) Col. Trajani, in the Forum (also called C. Cochlis, from its spiral staircase), in which the ashes of the emperor Trajan were deposited. This column is still extant, and is one of the most interesting monuments of ancient Rome. It is, including the pedestal, 117 feet high. The top was originally crowned with the statue of the emperor; it is now surmounted by that of the apostle Peter. A spiral bas-relief is folded in the Campus Martius, near the temple dedicated to this emperor. It stood not far from the Curia Innocenziana on Monte Citorio, in the garden of the Casa della Missione. At present the basis only is extant, and is preserved in the garden of the Vatican. (5) Col. M. Aurelii Antonini, generally called the Antonine Column, erected to the memory of the emperor M. Aurelius, also in the Campus Martius, and still extant. It is an imitation of the Column of Trajan, and contains bas-reliefs representing the wars of M. Aurelius against the Marcomanni.—XXIII. Obelisks. The Obelisks (Obelisci) at Rome were mostly works of Egyptian art, which were transported from Egypt to Rome in the time of the emperors. Augustus caused two obelisks to be brought to Rome, one of which was erected in the Circus and another in the Campus Martius. The former was restored in 1589, and is called at present the Flaminian Obelisk. Its whole height is about 116 feet, and without the base about 78 feet. The obelisk in the Campus Martius was set up by Augustus as a sun-dial. It stands at present on the Monte Citorio, where it was placed in 1792. Its whole height is about 110 feet, and without its base 71 feet. Another obelisk was brought to Rome by Caligula, and placed on the Vatican in the Circus of Caligula. It stands at present in front of St. Peter's, where it was placed in 1586, and its whole height is about 132 feet, and without the base and modern ornaments at top about 88 feet. But the largest obelisk at Rome is that which was originally transported from Heliopolis to Alexandria by Constantine, and conveyed to Rome by his son Constantius, who placed it in the Circus Maximus. Its present position is before the north portico of the Lateran church, where it was placed in 1588.

Its whole height is about 149 feet, and without the base about 105 feet. There are nine other obelisks at Rome, besides those mentioned above.—H. Roads leading out of Rome. Of these the most important were: (1) Via Latina, the most ancient of the south roads, which issued at first from the Porta Capena, and after the time of Aurelian from the Porta Latina. It joined the Via Appia at Casilinum. (2) Via Appia, the Great South Road, also issued from the Porta Capena, and was the most celebrated of all the Roman roads. It was commenced by Appius Claudius, when censor, and was eventually carried to Brundisium. [APPIA VIA.] (3) Via Ostiensis, originally passed through the Porta Trigemina, afterwards through the Porta Ostiensis, and kept the left bank of the Tiber to Ostia. (4) Via Portuensis, issued from the same gate as the Via Ostiensis, and kept the right bank of the Tiber to Portus, the new harbour founded by Claudius, near Ostia. (5) Via Labicana, issued from the Porta Esquilina, and passing Labicum fell into the Via Latina at the station ad Bivium, thirty miles from Rome. (6) Via Praenestina, originally the Via Gabina, issued at first from the Porta Esquilina, and subsequently from the Porta Praenestina. Passing through Gabii and Praeneste, it joined the Via Latina just below Anagnina. (7) Via Tiburtina, issued originally from the Porta Esquilina, or from the Porta Viminalis, and subsequently from the Porta Tiburtina, and proceeded to Tibur, from which it was continued under the name of the Via Valeria, past Corfinium to Adria. (8) Via Nomentana, anciently Ficulnensis, ran from the Porta Collina, subsequently from the Porta Nomentana, across the Anio to Nomentum, and a little beyond fell into the Via Salaria at Eretum. (9) Via Salaria, ran from the Porta Collina, subsequently from the Porta Salaria, past Fidenae to Reate and Asculum Picenum. At Castrum Truentinum it reached the coast, which it followed until it joined the Via Flaminia at Ancona. (10) Via Flaminia, the Great North Road (commenced in the censorship of C. Flaminius), issued from the Porta Flaminia, and proceeded past Oriculum, Narnia and Pisaurum to Ariminum, from which town it was continued under the name of the Via Aemilia to Placentia and Aquileia. (11) Via Aurelia, the Great Coast Road, issued originally from the Porta Janiculensis. It reached the coast at Alsium, and followed the shore of the Lower Sea along Etruria and Liguria by Genoa, as far as Forum Julii in Gaul. [For the construction of Roman roads, see Dict. of Ant. art. Viae.]

Romulea, a town of Samnium taken by the Romans in the third Samnite war, B.C. 297, after which it seems to have fallen into decay (Liv. x. 17; Steph. Byz. s.v.). Its site seems to have been near the modern Bilaccia, on the Via Appia, between Aeclanum and Aquilonia.

Romulus, was the traditional founder of Rome, whose name expressed that of the city, and whose story grew up out of a number of legends connected with the origin of the city and of the Roman people, or attempting to explain it. [For the meaning of his other name, QUIRINUS, see that article.] The story of Romulus commonly accepted by ancient writers (Liv. i. 4–15; Dionys. i. 72–ii. 76; Plut. Romulus; Fest. s.v. Roma) runs as follows:—At Alba Longa there reigned a long line of kings [SILVIUS] descended from Aeneas. The last of these left two sons, Numitor and Amulius.

Amulius, who was the younger, deprived Numitor of the kingdom, but left him his life. Fearful, however, lest the heirs of Numitor might assert their rights, he murdered the only son, and made the daughter, Silvia, or Rhea Silvia, one of the Vestal virgins. Silvia was violated by Mars, and in course of time gave birth to twins. Amulius doomed the guilty Vestal and her babes to be drowned in the river. [RHEA SILVIA.] The stream carried the cradle in which the children were lying into the Tiber, which had overflowed its banks far and wide. It was stranded at the foot of the Palatine, and overturned on the root of a wild fig-tree, which, under the name of the Ficus Ruminalis, was preserved and held sacred for many ages after. [For the origin of this tradition see RUMINA.] A she-wolf, which had come to drink of the stream, carried them into her den hard by, and suckled them, where they were discovered by Faustulus, the king's shepherd, who took the children to his own house, and gave them to the care of his wife, Acca Larentia. They were called Romulus and Remus, and were brought up with the other shepherds on the Palatine hill. As they grew up, they became distinguished by the beauty of their person and the bravery of their deeds, and fought boldly against wild beasts and robbers. A quarrel having arisen between these shepherds and the herdsmen of Numitor, who stalled their cattle on the neighbouring hill of the Aventine, Remus was taken by a stratagem, during the absence of his brother, and carried off to Numitor. This led to the discovery of the parentage both of Romulus and Remus, who now slew Amulius, and placed their grandfather Numitor on the throne.—Romulus and Remus loved their old abode, and therefore left Alba to found a city on the banks of the Tiber. A strife arose between the brothers where the city should be built, and after whose name it should be called. Romulus wished to build it on the Palatine, Remus on the Aventine. It was agreed that the question should be decided by augury; and each took his station on the top of his chosen hill (cf. Enn. i. 106). The night passed away, and as the day was dawning Remus saw six vultures; but at sunrise, when these tidings were brought to Romulus, twelve vultures flew by him. Each claimed the augury in his own favour; but the shepherds decided for Romulus, and Remus was obliged to yield. Romulus now proceeded to mark out the pomerium of his city (see Dict. of Antiq. s.v.), and to raise the wall. Remus, who still resented the wrong he had suffered, leapt over the wall in scorn, whereupon he was slain by his brother (cf. Ov. Fast. iv. 842). As soon as the city was built, Romulus found his people too few in numbers. He therefore set apart, on the Capitoline hill, an asylum, or a sanctuary, in which homicides and runaway slaves might take refuge. The city thus became filled with men, but they wanted women. Romulus, therefore, tried to form treaties with the neighbouring tribes, in order to obtain conubium, or the right of legal marriage with their citizens; but his offers were treated with disdain, and according to the story, which seems to be an attempt to explain the ancient custom of 'marriage by capture,' he resolved to obtain by force what he could not gain by entreaty. In the fourth month after the foundation of the city, he proclaimed that games were to be celebrated in honour of the god Consus, and invited his neighbours, the Latins and Sabines, to the festival (cf. Ov. Fast. iii. 199). Suspecting no treachery, they came in numbers, with their wives and children. But the Roman youths rushed upon their guests, and carried off the maidens. Their parents returned home and prepared for vengeance. The inhabitants of three of the Latin towns, Caenina, Antemnae, and Crustumerium, took up arms one after the other, and were successively defeated by the Romans. Romulus slew with his own hand Acron, king of Caenina, and dedicated his arms and armour, as spolia opima, to Jupiter. At last the Sabine king, Titus Tatius, advanced with a powerful army against Rome. The fortress of the Saturnian (afterwards called the Capitoline) hill, was surrendered to the Sabines by the treachery of Tarpeia, the daughter of the commander of the fortress. [TARPEIA.] On the next day the Romans endeavoured to recover the hill, and a long and desperate battle was fought in the valley between the Palatine and the Capitoline. At length, when both parties were exhausted with the struggle, the Sabine women rushed in between them, and prayed their husbands and fathers to be reconciled. Their prayer was heard; the two people not only made peace, but agreed to form only one nation. The Romans continued to dwell on the Palatine under their king Romulus; the Sabines built a new town on the Capitoline and Quirinal hills, where they lived under their king Titus Tatius. The two kings and their senates met for deliberation in the valley between the Palatine and the Capitoline hills, which was hence called comitium, or the place of meeting. But this union did not last long. Titus Tatius was slain at a festival at Lavinium by some Laurentines, to whom he had refused satisfaction for outrages which had been committed by his kinsmen. Henceforward Romulus ruled alone over both Romans and Sabines. After reigning thirty-seven years, he was at length taken away from the world. One day as he was reviewing his people in the Campus Martius, near the Goat's Pool, the sun was suddenly eclipsed, darkness overspread the earth, and a dreadful storm dispersed the people (a story which may have been invented to explain the name of the festival Poplifugium or Populifugium: Dict. of Ant. s.v.). When daylight had returned, Romulus had disappeared, for his father, Mars, had carried him up to heaven in a fiery chariot (Quirinus Martis equis Acheronta fugit, Hor. Od. iii. 3, 15; cf. Ov. Fast. ii. 496; Liv. i. 16; Cic. de Rep. i. 16, 25). Shortly afterwards he appeared in more than mortal beauty to Proculus Julius, and bade him tell the Romans to worship him as their guardian god under the name of Quirinus. Such was the glorified end of Romulus in the genuine legend. But as it staggered the faith of a later age, a tale was invented to account for his mysterious disappearance. It was related that the senators, discontented with the tyrannical rule of their king, murdered him during the gloom of a tempest, cut up his body, and carried home the mangled pieces under their robes.—As Romulus was regarded as the founder of Rome, its most ancient political institutions and the organisation of the people were ascribed to him. Thus he is said to have divided the people into three tribes, which bore the names Ramnes, Tities, and Luceres. The Ramnes were supposed to have derived their name from Romulus, the Tities from Titus Tatius, the Sabine king, and the Luceres from Lucumo, an Etruscan chief who had assisted Romulus in the war against the Sabines. Each tribe contained ten curiae, which received their names from the thirty Sabine women who had brought about the peace between the Romans and their own people. Further, each curia contained 10 gentes, and each gens 100 men. Thus the people, according to the general belief, were divided originally into 3 tribes, 30 curiae, and 300 gentes, which mustered 3000 men, who fought on foot, and were called a legion. Besides those there were 300 horsemen, called Celeres, the same body as the Equites of a later time. To assist him in the government of the people Romulus is said to have selected a number of the aged men in the state, who were called Patres or Senatores. The council itself, which was called the Senatus, originally consisted of 100 members; but this number was increased to 200 when the Sabines were incorporated in the state. In addition to the senate, there was another assembly, consisting of the members of the gentes, which bore the name of comitia curiata, because they voted in it according to their division into curiae.—This legendary account of the eponymous hero of the Romans derived from stories of old folklore and old records interwoven with some myths of Greek origin and others invented to account for ancient names, customs or rites, seems to have been first written in a historical form by the annalist Q. Fabius Pictor, who lived in the time of the second Punic war. The probable origin of Rome has been mentioned at the beginning of the article ROMA. The personality of Romulus seems to have been imagined to account for the Latin settlement predominating at Rome instead of at the more ancient Alba; his name appears to be formed (as was the case with most traditions of ancient towns, especially in Greece) from that of the town itself: very possibly it is connected with that of the Ramnes (whose name some interpret as meaning 'foresters'). Some writers take Romulus and the Ramnes to represent one of three races whose union or 'synoikismus' formed the Roman people, the Sabine Titius and Titienses representing the second, and the Luceres the third; but there is no ground for this supposition: all traditions agree in ascribing this triple division to Romulus himself. It is not unlikely that the idea of the twin brothers Romulus and Remus may have arisen from the ancient worship of two Lares [see p. 474, a], especially as the mother in the story is connected with the worship of the state-hearth. Similarly connected with a religion perhaps even older may be the introduction of the wolf into the story, which may represent a tribal observance akin to totemism [cf. HIRPINI;

LUPERCUS]. But the idea of the twins being miraculously preserved and suckled by the wolf is merely the reappearance of a myth or fairy-tale which is met with in Greece and in the East, and of which the story of Cyrus the Great is an instance. It is possible that it may be one of the Greek elements in the story, the very fact of an eponymous hero worshipped as a god being rather Greek than Italian in character. The rape of the Sabines is probably what is called an 'aetiological' myth, i.e. it was an attempt (as was said above) to explain the custom of marriage by capture [see Dict. of Ant. art. Matrimonium]. Similarly the story of the asylum may be an explanation of the sacred spot between the Arx and the Capitolium [see p. 804, a].

Roscillus. [AEGUS.]

Roscius. 1. L., is said to have been sent as ambassador by the Romans to Fidenae in B.C. 438. He and his three colleagues were killed by the inhabitants of Fidenae, at the instigation of Lar Tolumnius, king of the Veientes. The statues of all four were erected in the Rostra at Rome. (Liv. iv. 17; Plin. xxxiv. 23.)

—2. Sex., of Ameria, a town in Umbria. The father of this Roscius had been murdered at the instigation of two of his relations and fellow-townsmen, T. Roscius Magnus and T. Roscius Capito, who coveted the wealth of their neighbour. These two Roscii struck a bargain with Chrysogonus, the freedman and favourite of Sulla, to divide the property of the murdered man between them. But as the proceeding excited the utmost indignation at Ameria, and the magistrates of the town made an effort to obtain from Sulla the restitution of the property to the son, the robbers accused young Roscius of the murder of his father, and hired witnesses to swear to the fact. Roscius was defended by Cicero (B.C. 80) in an oration which is still extant, and was acquitted (Cic. pro Rosc. Am.). Cicero's speech was greatly admired at the time, and though at a later period he found fault with it himself, as bearing marks of youthful exaggeration and rhetorical embellishment, it displays abundant evidence of his great oratorical powers (Cic. Orat. 30, 107; Quintil. xii. 6, 4).—3. Gallus, Q., the most celebrated comic actor at Rome, was a native of Solonium, a small place in the neighbourhood of Lanuvium (Cic. Div. i. 36, 79, ii. 31, 66). His histrionic powers procured him the favour of many of the Roman nobles, and, among others, of the dictator Sulla, who presented him with a gold ring, the symbol of equestrian rank. Roscius enjoyed the friendship of Cicero, who constantly speaks of him in terms both of admiration and affection. Roscius was considered by the Romans to have reached such perfection in his own profession that it became the fashion to call everyone who became particularly distinguished in his own art by the name of Roscius (de Or. i. 28, 130, iii. 26, 101, Brut. 84, 289; cf. Hor. Ep. ii. 1, 82). In his younger years Cicero received instruction from Roscius; and at a later time he and Roscius often used to try which of them could express a thought with the greatest effect, the orator by his eloquence, or the actor by his gestures. These exercises gave Roscius so high an opinion of his art, that he wrote a work in which he compared eloquence and acting. It is possible that Roscius introduced the custom, borrowed from the Greeks, of acting in masks (cf. Cic. de Or. iii. 69, 221). Like his celebrated contemporary, the tragic actor Aesopus, Roscius realised an immense fortune by his profession (Plin. vii. 129; Macrob. ii. 10). He died in 62.—One of Cicero's extant orations is entitled Pro Q. Roscio Comoedo. It was delivered before the judex C. Piso, probably in 68, and relates to a claim for 50,000 sesterces, which one C. Fannius Chaerea brought against Roscius.—4. Fabātus. [FABATUS.]—5. Otho. [OTHO.]

Rotomāgus (Rouen), a town on the Sequana (Seine), the capital of the Vellocasses, in Ptolemy called Ῥωμάγιος (Amm. Marc. xv. 11; Ptol. ii. 8, 8).

Roxāna (Ῥωξάνη), daughter of Oxyartes the Bactrian, fell into the hands of Alexander on his capture of the hill-fort in Sogdiana, named 'the rock,' B.C. 327. Alexander was so captivated by her charms, that he married her. (Arrian, An. iv. 18; Curt. viii. 4; Plut. Alex. 47.) Soon after Alexander's death (323), she gave birth to a son (Alexander Aegus), who was admitted to share the nominal sovereignty with Arrhidaeus, under the regency of Perdiccas. Before the birth of the boy she had drawn Statira, or Barsine, to Babylon by a friendly letter, and there caused her to be murdered. Roxana afterwards crossed over to Europe with her son, and placed herself under the protection of Olympias. She shared the fortunes of Olympias, and threw herself into Pydna along with the latter, where they were besieged by Cassander. In 316 Pydna was taken by Cassander; Olympias was put to death; and Roxana and her son were placed in confinement in Amphipolis. Here they were detained under the charge of Glaucias till 311, in which year, soon after the general peace then concluded, they were murdered in accordance with orders from Cassander. (Plut. Alex. 77; Arrian, An. vii. 27; Diod. xviii. 3, 39, xix. 11, 52, 105; Strab. pp. 517, 794.)

Roxolāni. [RHODOLANI.]

Rubellius Blandus. 1. A Roman knight of Tibur, who taught rhetoric at Rome in the reign of Augustus (Tac. Ann. vi. 27; Sen. Contr. i. 7, 13).—2. Grandson of No. 1, who married Julia, daughter of Drusus and grand-daughter of Tiberius (Tac. Ann. vi. 27, 45).—3. Grandson of No. 2, and son of RUBELLIUS PLAUTUS, assumed the surname of his grandfather, and was noted for pride in his imperial descent (Juv. viii. 39).

Rubellius Plautus, son of RUBELLIUS BLANDUS (No. 2), and great-grandson of Tiberius. He excited the suspicions of Nero, and was ordered to retire to his estates in Asia, A.D. 60, but by the orders of Nero at the instigation of Tigellinus he was murdered there two years afterwards. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 19, xiv. 22, 57, 59; Dio Cass. lxii. 14.)

Rubi (Rubustinus: Ruvo), a town in Apulia on the road from Canusium to Brundisium, about twenty-eight miles SE. of the former, and ten miles from the coast (Hor. Sat. i. 5, 94; Plin. iii. 105). In tombs on the site many vases have been found.

Rūbīcō or Rubicon, a small river in Italy, falling into the Adriatic a little N. of Ariminum, formed the boundary in the republican period between the province of Gallia Cisalpina and Italia proper. [GALLIA, p. 354, b.] It is celebrated in history on account of Caesar's passage across it at the head of his army, by which act he declared war against the republic (App. B.C. ii. 35; Plut. Caes. 32; Suet. Jul. 31; Lucan, i. 185, 213-227). A papal decree, issued in 1756, declared the modern Lusa to be the ancient Rubico, but the Rugone, a little further N., has better claims to this honour.

Rubra Saxa (Prima Porta), called 'Rubrae breves' (sc. petrae) by Martial, a small place in Etruria, nine miles from Rome, near the river Cremera, and on the Via Flaminia. It was near this spot that the great battle was fought in which Maxentius was defeated by Constantine, A.D. 312. (Liv. ii. 49; Cic. Phil. ii. 31; Tac. Hist. iii. 79; Mart. iv. 64, 15.)

Rubrenus Lappa, a contemporary of Juvenal, author of a tragedy called Atreus, obliged while he was writing it to live by pawning his dress (Juv. vii. 71).

Rubrēsus Lacus. [NARBO.]

Rubricātus. 1. Or Ubus (Seibous), a considerable river of Numidia in N. Africa, rising in the mountains SE. of Cirta (Constantineh), flowing NE., and falling into the Mediterranean E. of Hippo Regius (Bonah). (Ptol. iv. 3, 5.)

—2. (Llobregat), a small river of Hispania Tarraconensis, flowing into the sea W. of Barcino (Plin. iii. 21).

Rubrum Mare. [ERYTHRAEUM MARE.]

Rūdīae (Rudīnus: Rugge), a town of the Sallentines or Messapians in Calabria, the southernmost part of Apulia, a little W. of Lupiae (Strab. p. 281; Ptol. iii. 1, 76). Strabo stands alone in calling it a Greek city, and it is more likely that it was Messapian. It was afterwards a Roman municipium. It had no importance except as the birthplace of ENNIUS, who is on that account called a 'Calabrian.' (Hor. Od. iv. 8, 20; Ov. A.A. iii. 409; Sil. Ital. xii. 393.) It is clear, therefore, that Pliny (iii. 102) and Mela (ii. 4, 7) are wrong in reckoning it a town of the Pediculi and outside Calabria.

Ruesium or Reveissio (Ρυέσιον: S. Paulien), a town of the Vellavi or Velauni, hence called simply Civitas Vellavorum, in Gallia Aquitania (in the modern Velay), on the frontiers of Auvergne (Ptol. ii. 7, 20).

Rūfinus. 1. P. Cornēlius Rufinus, was consul B.C. 290, with M'. Curius Dentatus, and in conjunction with his colleague brought the Samnite war to a conclusion, and obtained a triumph in consequence. He was consul a second time in 277, and carried on the war against the Samnites and the Greeks in Southern Italy. The chief event in his second consulship was the capture of the important town of Croton. In 275, Rufinus was expelled from the senate by the censors C. Fabricius and Q. Aemilius Papus, on account of his possessing ten pounds of silver plate. The dictator Sulla was descended from this Rufinus. His grandson was the first of the family who assumed the surname of Sulla. (Liv. Ep. 11, 14; Eutrop. ii. 9; Vell. Pat. ii. 17; Plu. Sull. 1; Cic. de Or. ii. 66.)

2. Licinīus Rufinus, a jurist, who lived under Alexander Severus. There are in the Digest seventeen excerpts from twelve books of Regulae by Rufinus.—3. The chief minister of state under Theodosius the Great, was an able, but at the same time a treacherous and dangerous man. He instigated Theodosius to those cruel measures which brought ruin upon Antioch, A.D. 390. After the death of Theodosius in 395, Rufinus exercised paramount influence over the weak Arcadius; but towards the end of the year a conspiracy was formed against him by

Eutropius and Stilicho, who induced Gainas, the Gothic ally of Arcadius, to join in the plot. Rufinus was in consequence slain by the troops of Gainas. (Claudian, Rufinus; Zos. iv. and v.)

—4. Surnamed Tyrannius or Turranius, or Toranus, an ecclesiastical writer of the fourth century. [Dict. of Christian Biogr.].—5. A grammarian of Antioch, whose treatise De Metris Comicis (or rather extracts from it) is contained in the Grammaticae Latinae Auctores Antiqui of Putschius, Hannov. 1605. He was possibly also the author of a little poem in twenty-two lines, Pasiphaes Fabula ex omnibus Metris Horatianis, which, as the name imports, contains an example of each of the different metres employed by Horace. Some have also ascribed to him the Carmen de Ponderibus (ed. by Hultsch, Script. Metrol.).

—6. The author of thirty-eight epigrams in the Greek Anthology. His date is uncertain; but there can be no doubt that he was a Byzantine. His verses are of the same light amatory character as those of Agathias, Paulus, Macedonius, and others. [PLANODES.]

Rufrae or Rufrium, a town of the Samnites, on the borders of Campania (Verg. Aen. vii. 739; Liv. viii. 25; Sil. Ital. viii. 568).

Rufus, Antonius, a Latin grammarian (Quintil. i. 5, 43) and poet (Schol. ad Hor. A.P. 268); possibly the lyric poet mentioned by Ovid (Pont. iv. 16, 28).

Rufus, Curtius. [CURTIUS.]

Rūfus Ephesius, so called from the place of his birth, a Greek physician, lived in the reign of Trajan (A.D. 98-117), and wrote several medical works, some of which are still extant.

Rūfus, L. Caecilius, brother of P. Sulla by the same mother, but not by the same father. He was tribune of the plebs, B.C. 63, when he rendered warm support to Cicero, and in particular opposed the agrarian law of Rullus. In his praetorship, 57, he joined most of the other magistrates in proposing the recall of Cicero from banishment. (Cic. pro Sull. 22, 23; Dio Cass. xxxvii. 25.)

Rūfus, M. Caelius, a young Roman noble, distinguished as an elegant writer and eloquent speaker, but equally conspicuous for his profligacy and extravagance. Notwithstanding his vices he lived on intimate terms with Cicero, who defended him in B.C. 56 in an oration still extant. The accusation was brought against him by Sempronius Atratinus, at the instigation of Clodia Quadrantaria, whom he had lately deserted. Clodia charged him with having borrowed money from her in order to murder Dion, the head of the embassy sent by Ptolemy Auletes to Rome; and with having made an attempt to poison her (Cic. pro Caelio). In 52 Caelius was tribune of the plebs, and in 50 aedile. During the years 51 and 50 he carried on an active correspondence with Cicero, who was then in Cilicia, and some of the letters which he wrote to Cicero at that time are preserved in the collection of Cicero's letters (Cic. ad Fam. viii. 12, 14). On the breaking out of the Civil war in 49 he espoused Caesar's side, and was rewarded for his services by the praetorship, in 48. Being at this time overwhelmed with debt, he availed himself of Caesar's absence from Italy to bring forward a law for the abolition of debts. He was, however, resisted by the other magistrates and deprived of his office; whereupon he went into the S. of Italy to join Milo, whom he had secretly sent for from Massilia. Milo was killed near Thurii before Caelius could join him [Milo]; and Caelius himself was put to death shortly afterwards at Thurii. (Caes. B. C. iii. 20-22; App. B. C. ii. 22; Dio Cass. xlii. 22.)

Rufus, Minucius. [MINUCIUS.]

Rufus, Munatius, a friend of Cato the younger, about whom he wrote a memoir. In 58 B.C. he accompanied Cato to Cyprus. (Plut. Cat. Min. 9, 30; Val. Max. iv. 3, 2.)

Rufus, Musonius. [MUSONIUS.]

Rufus, Sextus. [SEXTUS RUFUS.]

Rufus, Valgius. [VALGIUS.]

Rugii, an important people in Germany, originally dwelt on the coast of the Baltic between the Viadus (Oder) and the Vistula (Tac. Germ. 43). After disappearing a long time from history, they are found at a later time in Attila's army; and after Attila's death they founded a new kingdom on the N. bank of the Danube in Austria and Hungary, the name of which is still preserved in the modern Rugiland. (Prop. B. G. ii. 14; Sidon. Paneg. ad Avit. 319.) They have left traces of their name in the country which they originally inhabited in the modern Rügen, Rügenwalde, Rega, Regenwalde.

Rullus, P. Servilius, tribune of the plebs B.C. 63, proposed an agrarian law, which Cicero attacked in three orations which have come down to us. It was the most extensive agrarian law that had ever been brought forward, including the creation of a board of ten commissioners to carry it out, each of whom was to have military and judicial powers like those of a praetor, and powers to raise great sums by sale of lands and of the booty in the hands of Pompey; there was moreover a scheme of colonisation on a large scale, like that of C. Gracchus. The whole measure was an attack on the power of the senate, and was instigated by Caesar. Cicero's attacks on it had great effect, and the bill was so unpopular that it was withdrawn by Rullus himself.

Rumina (from ruma, the breast), the goddess who presided over the suckling of children, one of the old Italian deities worshipped in the Indigitamenta [see p. 443, a]. She had an ancient sanctuary on the NW. side of the Palatine—a shrine with the fig-tree sacred to her (Ficus Ruminalis), which a (probably) later tradition connected with Romulus: that is to say, the story of the suckling of Romulus and Remus probably grew out of the worship paid to Rumina. (Varro, R. R. ii. 2, 5, ii. 11, 5; Plut. Q. R. 57, Rom. 4, 6; cf. Varro, L. L. v. 54; Liv. i. 4; Plin. xv. 77; Tac. Ann. xiii. 58.)

P. Rupilius, consul B.C. 132, prosecuted with the utmost vehemence all the adherents of Tib. Gracchus, who had been slain in the preceding year. In his consulship he was sent into Sicily against the slaves, and brought the Servile war to a close. He remained in the island as pro-consul in the following year; and, with ten commissioners appointed by the senate, he made various regulations for the government of the province, which were known by the name of Leges Rupiliae. [Dict. of Ant. s. v.] Rupilius was condemned in the tribunate of C. Gracchus, 123, on account of his illegal and cruel acts in the prosecution of the friends of Tib. Gracchus (Vell. Pat. ii. 7). He was an intimate friend of Scipio Africanus the younger, who obtained the consulship for him, but who failed in gaining the same honour for his brother Lucius. He is said to have taken his brother's failure so much to heart as to have died in consequence. (Cic. de Amic. 19, 71, Tusc. iv. 17, 40.)

Ruscino (Rousillon), a town of the Tectosages in the SE. part of Gallia Narbonensis, at the foot of the Pyrenees, on the river Ruscino (Tet), and on the road from Spain to Narbo. A salt-water lake near it was famed for mullets. (Liv. xxi. 24; Strab. p. 182; Ptol. ii. 10, 9.)

Rusellae (Rusellanus: near Grosseto, Ru.), one of the most ancient cities of Etruria, probably one of the twelve cities of the Etruscan League, situated on an eminence E. of the lake Prelius and on the Via Aurelia. It is first mentioned in the time of Tarquinius Priscus. (Dionys. iii. 51). It was taken by the Romans in B.C. 294, when 2000 of its inhabitants were slain, and as many more made prisoners (Liv. x. 37). It was subsequently a Roman colony, (Plin. iii. 51) and continued in existence till 1138, when its inhabitants were removed to Grosseto. The walls of Rusellae still remain, and are among the most ancient in Italy. They are formed of enormous masses of travertine, piled up without regard to form, with small stones inserted in the interstices. The masses vary from six to eight feet in length, and from four to eight in height. The area enclosed by the walls forms an irregular quadrangle, between 10,000 and 11,000 feet, or about two miles in circuit.

Rusicada (SE. of Storah, Ru.), a seaport and Roman colony in Numidia, used especially as the port of Cirta (Plin. v. 22; Ptol. iv. 3, 3).

Ruspinum, a town of Africa Propria (Byzacium), two miles from the sea, between Leptis Parva and Hadrumetum (Strab. p. 831; Plin. v. 25; Bell. Afr. 6).

Russadir (Ras-ud-Dir, or C. di Tres Forcas: Rus in ancient Punic, and Ras in Arabic, alike mean cape), a promontory of Mauretania Tingitana, in N. Africa, on the coast of the Metagonitae. SE. of it was a city of the same name (prob. Melillah). (Plin. v. 9; Ptol. iv. 1, 7.)

Rusticus, Fabius, a Roman historian, in the reigns of Claudius and Nero, and a friend of Seneca (Tac. Agr. 10, Ann. xiii. 20, xiv. 2).

Rusticus. 1. L. Junius Arulenus, more usually called Arulenus Rusticus, but sometimes Junius Rusticus. He was a friend and pupil of PAETUS THRASEA, and an ardent admirer of the Stoic philosophy. He was put to death by Domitian, because he had written a panegyric upon Thrasea. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 25, Hist. iii. 90, Agr. 2; Dio Cass. lxvii. 18; Plin. Ep. i. 5, iii. 11; Suet. Dom. 10.)—2. Q. Junius, probably a grandson of the above, a Stoic philosopher, and one of the teachers of M. Aurelius, who had a great regard for him, and raised him to the consulship (Dio Cass. lxxi. 35; Capitol. M. Ant. Phil. 2, 6; C. I. L. vi. 858).

Rusucurum (Coleah, opposite Algier), a considerable seaport in the E. part of Mauretania Caesariensis, constituted a Roman colony under Claudius (Ptol. iv. 2, 2; Plin. v. 20).

Rutēni, a people in Gallia Aquitania on the frontiers of Gallia Narbonensis in the modern Rovergne. Their chief town was Segodunum, afterwards Civitas Rutenorum (Rodez). The country of the Rutēni contained silver mines, and produced excellent flax. (Plin. iv. 109; Ptol. ii. 7, 21; Strab. p. 191.)

Rutilius Lupus. [LUPUS.]

Rutilius Namatianus, Claudius, a Roman poet, and a native of Gaul, lived at the beginning of the fifth century of the Christian era. He resided at Rome a considerable time, where he attained the dignity of praefectus urbi, about A.D. 413 or 414 (Cod. Theod. vi. 26, 8). He afterwards returned to his native country, and has described his return to Gaul in an elegiac poem, which bears the title of Itinerarium, or De Reditu. Of this poem the first book, consisting of 644 lines, and a small portion of the second, have come down to us. It is superior both in poetical colouring and purity of language to most of the productions of the age; and the passage in which he celebrates the praises of Rome is not unworthy of the pen of Claudian. Its versification is admirable. Rutilius was a heathen, and attacks the Jews and monks with no small severity.—Editions by L. Müller, 1870, and in Poët. Lat. Min. by A. W. Zumpt, Berlin, 1840.

P. Rutilius Rufus, a Roman statesman and orator. He was military tribune under Scipio in the Numantine war, praetor B.C. 111, consul 105, and legatus in 95, under Q. Mucius Scaevola, proconsul of Asia. While acting in this capacity he displayed so much honesty and firmness in repressing the extortions of the publicani, that he became an object of fear and hatred to the whole body. Accordingly, on his return to Rome, he was impeached of malversation (de repetundis), found guilty, and compelled to withdraw into banishment, 92. (Cic. Brut. 22, 85; 30, 113; pro Balb. 11, 28; Tac. Ann. iv. 43.) He retired first to Mytilene, and from thence to Smyrna, where he fixed his abode, and passed the remainder of his days in tranquillity, having refused to return to Rome, although recalled by Sulla. Besides his orations, Rutilius wrote an autobiography, and a History of Rome in Greek, which contained an account of the Numantine war, but we know not what period it embraced. (Charis. i. 120, 125; Isid. Or. xxii. 11; Liv. xxxix. 52; Gell. vi. 14.)

Rutilus, C. Marcius, was consul B.C. 357, when he took the town of Privernum. In 356 he was appointed dictator, being the first time that a plebeian had attained this dignity. In his dictatorship he defeated the Etruscans with great slaughter. In 352 he was consul a second time; and in 351, he was the first plebeian censor. He was consul for the third time in 344, for the fourth time in 342. (Liv. vii. 16, 21, 38.) The son of this Rutilus took the surname of Censorinus, which in the next generation entirely supplanted that of Rutilus, and became the name of the family. [CENSORINUS.]

Rutuba (Roya), a river which rises in the Col di Tenda and flows into the sea at Albium Intemelium (Ventimiglia), on the coast of Liguria (Luc. ii. 422; Plin. iii. 48).

Rutuli, an ancient people in Italy, inhabiting a narrow slip of country on the coast of Latium a little to the S. of the Tiber. Their chief town was Ardea, which was the residence of Turnus. They were subdued at an early period by the Romans, and disappear from history (Dionys. v. 61; Liv. i. 56; TURNUS).

Rutupae or Rutupiae (Richborough), a port town of the Cantii in the SE. of Britain, from which the passage was commonly made to the harbour of Gessoriacum in Gaul (Lucan. vi. 67; Ptol. ii. 3, 27; Amm. Marc. xx. 1, xxvii. 8). Excellent oysters were obtained in the neighbourhood of this place (Rutupino edita fundo ostrea, Juv. iv. 141). There are still several Roman remains at Richborough.

Säba. [SABAEI.]

Sabäcon (Σαβακων = Shabaka or Shabatak), according to Herodotus (ii. 137–140), a king of Ethiopia who invaded Egypt in the reign of the blind king Anysis, whom he dethroned and drove into the marshes. The Ethiopian conqueror then reigned over Egypt for fifty years, but at length quitted the country in consequence of a dream; whereupon Anysis regained his kingdom. In Manetho's account there were three Ethiopian kings who reigned over Egypt, named Sabacon, Sebichus, and Taracus, whose collective reigns amount to forty or fifty years, and who form the twenty-fifth dynasty of that writer. The Ethiopian dynasty was the twenty-fifth, which displaced and put to death Bakenraf (Bocchoris), having invaded and occupied Egypt from Napata in Ethiopia about 733 B.C. The invasion was led by the priest-king Piankhi, who overthrew the various petty princes who ruled in different parts of Egypt. The other kings of the dynasty were Shabaka (Sabacon) about 700 B.C., Shabataka, and Taharaka (= Tirhakah), who reigned at Thebes B.C. 693–666 and fought against the invading Assyrian kings Sennacherib, Esarhaddon and Assurbanipal.

Säbaei or Säbae (Σαβαῖοι, Σάβαι: O. T. Sheba'im), one of the chief peoples of Arabia, dwelt in the SW. corner of the peninsula, in the most beautiful part of Arabia Felix, the N. and centre of the province of El-Yemen. The Sabaeans of El-Yemen were celebrated for their wealth and luxury. (Ptol. vi. 7, 23; Catull. xi. 5; Propert. ii. 10, 16; Verg. Georg. i. 57, Aen. i. 416; Hor. Od. i. 29, 2, ii. 12, 24.) Their country produced all the most precious spices and perfumes of Arabia, and they carried on an extensive trade with the East. Their capital was at Saba, where we are told that their king was kept a close prisoner in his palace. (Dio Cass. liii. 29; Strab. p. 771.) The Homeritae were subsequently the dominant tribe in their district. [ARABIA, p. 96, a; HOMERITAE.]

Sabäte (Trevignano), a town of Etruria, on the road from Cosa to Rome, and on the NW. corner of a lake which was named after it Lacus Sabatinus (Lago di Bracciano). (Strab. p. 226; Liv. vi. 4.)

Sabatini, a people in Campania, who derived their name from the river Sabatus (Sabbato), a tributary of the Calor, which flows into the Volturnus (Liv. xxvi. 33).

Sabaria or Savaria (Stein, on the Anger) a town in the N. of Upper Pannonia, which in the time of Augustus and Tiberius, like Carnuntum, belonged to Noricum. Claudius made it a colony (Plin. iii. 146; Ptol. ii. 15, 4). Sept. Severus was proclaimed emperor here (Aurel. Vict. Ep. 19).

Sabazius (Σαβάζιος) a Thracian and Phrygian deity, identified sometimes with Zeus but usually with Dionysus [pp. 293, b, 295, a], and worshipped in connexion with Rhea-Cybele. The snake was sacred to him (Theophrast. Char. 28), either because it was taken as a symbol of the earth and its reproduction of fruits, or in allusion to the story of Dionysus Zagreus [p. 296, a].

Säbelli. [SABINI.]

Säbina, the wife of the emperor Hadrian, was the grand-niece of Trajan, being the daughter of Matidia, who was the daughter of Marciana, the sister of Trajan. Sabina was married to Hadrian about A.D. 100, through the influence of Plotina, the wife of Trajan. The marriage did not prove a happy one. Sabina at length put an end to her life: for no credence need be attached to the report that she had been poisoned by her husband. She was alive in 136, and probably did not die till 138, a few months before Hadrian. She was enrolled among the gods after her decease. (Spart. Hadrian. 1, 2, 11, 23; Aurel. Vict. Ep. 14; Oros. vii. 18.)

Sābīna, Poppaea, a woman of surpassing beauty, but licentious morals, was the daughter of T. Ollius, but assumed the name of her maternal grandfather, Poppaeus Sabinus, who had been consul in A.D. 9. She was first married to Rufius Crispinus, and afterwards to Otho, who was one of the boon companions of Nero. The latter soon became enamoured of her, and in order to get Otho out of the way Nero sent him to govern the province of Lusitania (58). Poppaea now became the acknowledged mistress of Nero, over whom she exercised absolute sway. Anxious to become the wife of the emperor, she persuaded Nero first to murder his mother, Agrippina (59), who was opposed to such a disgraceful union, and next to divorce and shortly afterwards put to death his innocent and virtuous wife, Octavia (62). Immediately after the divorce of Octavia, Poppaea became the wife of Nero. In the following year she gave birth to a daughter at Antium; but the infant died at the age of four months. In 65 Poppaea was pregnant again, but was killed by a kick from her brutal husband in a fit of passion. She was enrolled among the gods, and a magnificent temple was dedicated to her by Nero. Poppaea was inordinately fond of luxury and pomp, and took immense pains to preserve the beauty of her person. Thus we are told that all her mules were shod with gold, and that 500 asses were daily milked to supply her with a bath. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 45, xiv. 1, 60, xv. 23, xvi. 6, 21; Suet. Ner. 35; Dio Cass. lxi. 11, lxii. 27, lxiii. 26.)

Sābīni, one of the most ancient and powerful of the peoples of central Italy, for whom the ancients found an eponymous hero in Sabinus, a son of the native god Sancus. The word Sabellus is an adjective applied to the Samnites and also used as an equivalent for the adjectival Sabinus. (Liv. viii. 1; Verg. Georg. ii. 167, Aen. vii. 665; Hor. Od. iii. 6, 37.) The Sabini, or Sabellian race, though having a common parentage with the Oscans and Latins, were more closely connected with the Umbrians, from whom they branched off at a later period [see p. 453, a]. Eventually the Umbrian branch of the Umbro-Sabellian stock settled on the East of the Apennines in the district thenceforth called UMBRIA; the Sabellian branch migrated further southward and was again subdivided; the Sabini proper retaining the country between the Nar, the Anio and the Tiber, between Latium, Etruria, Umbria and Picenum. This district was mountainous, and better adapted for pasturage than corn. The chief towns were Amiternum (according to Cato, ap. Dionys. i. 14, ii. 49, the oldest town of the Sabines), Reate, Nursia, Cutiliae, Cures, Eretum and Nomentum. From this district at various times other migratory bands went forth, who are described in separate articles: the Vestini, Marsi, Marrucini, Paeligni, Frentani, Hirpini, Picentes, and (most important and powerful of all) the Samnites. [SAMNIUM.] The Sabellian tribes adopted a peculiar system of emigration. In times of great danger and distress they vowed a Ver Sacrum, or Sacred Spring, and all the children born in that spring were regarded as sacred to the god, and were compelled, at the end of twenty years, to leave their native country and seek a new home in foreign lands. [Dict. of Ant. art. Ver Sacrum.] The Sabines were distinguished by their hardy and frugal manner of life (Liv. i. 18; Cic. Vatin. 15, 37; Hor. Od. iii. 6, 38, Epod. 2, 41; Juv. iii. 169), and their piety, which in their use of incantations took the form of extreme superstition (Hor. Epod. 17, 28, Sat. i. 9, 29). [For the union of the Sabines and Latins see ROMA.] The Sabini proper were subdued by M'. Curius Dentatus, B.C. 290 (Liv. Ep. 11; Flor. i. 15), and in 268 received the Roman franchise, after which date they reckoned as part of the Roman state with full citizenship (Vell. Pat. i. 14).

Sābinus. 1. A contemporary poet and a friend of Ovid. Ovid informs us that Sabinus had written answers to six of the Epistolae Heroidum of Ovid (Ov. Am. ii. 18, 27, Pont. iv. 16, 13.) Three answers enumerated by Ovid in this passage are printed in many editions of the poet's works as the genuine poems of Sabinus, but they were written by a modern scholar, Angelus Sabinus, about the year 1467. —2. M. Caelius, a Roman jurist, who succeeded Cassius Longinus, was consul A.D. 69. He was not the Sabinus from whom the Sabiniani took their name [see below, No. 7]. He wrote a work, Ad Edictum Aedilium Curulium. There are no extracts from Caelius in the Digest, but he is often cited, sometimes as Caelius Sabinus, sometimes by the name of Sabinus only (Gell. iv. 2, vi. 4). —3. C. Calvisius, one of Caesar's legates in the Civil war, B.C. 48 (Caes. B. C. iii. 34). In 45 he received the province of Africa from Caesar. Having been elected praetor in 44, he obtained from Antony the province of Africa again; but he did not return to Africa, as the senate, after the departure of Antony for Mutina, conferred the province upon Q. Cornificius. Sabinus was consul 39, and in the following year commanded the fleet of Octavian in the war with Sex. Pompeius. He was superseded by Agrippa in the command of the fleet. He is mentioned at a later time as one of the friends of Octavian. (Dio Cass. xlviii. 34, 46; App. B. C. v. 81, 96, 132.) —4. T. Flāvius, father of the emperor Vespasian, was one of the farmers of the taxes in Asia, and afterwards carried on business as a money-lender among the Helvetians (Suet. Vesp. 1). —5. Flāvius, elder son of the preceding, and brother of the emperor Vespasian. He governed Moesia for seven years during the reign of Claudius, and held the important office of praefectus urbi during the last eleven years of Nero's reign. He was removed from this office by Galba, but was replaced in it on the accession of Otho, who was anxious to conciliate Vespasian, who commanded the Roman legions in the East. He continued to retain the dignity under Vitellius, but when Vespasian was proclaimed emperor by the legions in the East, and Antonius Primus and his other generals in the West, after the defeat of the troops of Vitellius, were marching upon Rome, Vitellius, despairing of success, offered to surrender the empire, and to place the supreme power in the hands of Sabinus till the arrival of Vespasian. The German soldiers of Vitellius, however, refused submission to this arrangement, and resolved to support their sovereign by arms. Sabinus thereupon took refuge in the Capitol, where he was attacked by the Vitellian troops. In the assault the Capitol was burnt to the ground, Sabinus was taken prisoner, and put to death by the soldiers in the presence of Vitellius, who endeavoured in vain to save his life. Sabinus was a man of distinguished reputation, and of unspotted character. He left two sons, Flavius Sabinus, and Flavius Clemens. (Tac. Hist. i. 46, ii. 55, iii. 64-74, iv. 47; Dio Cass. lv. 17; Suet. Vesp. 1, Vitell. 15.)—6. Flāvius, son of the preceding, married Julia, the daughter of his cousin Titus. He was consul 82, with his cousin Domitian, but was afterwards slain by the latter. (Dio Cass. lxxv. 17; Suet. Dom. 10.)—7. Masurius, a hearer of Ateius Capito, was a distinguished jurist in the time of Tiberius (Gell. iv. 1, v. 6; Macrobi. iii. 6, 11). This is the Sabinus from whom the school of the Sabiniani took its name. [CAPITO.] There is no direct excerpt from Sabinus in the Digest, but he is often cited by other jurists, who commented upon his Libri tres Juris Civilis. It is conjectured that Persius means to refer to this work (Sat. v. 90), when he says, 'Excepto si quid Masuri rubrica vetavit.' Masurius also wrote numerous other works, which are cited by name in the Digest.—8. Nymphidius. [NYMPHIDIUS.]—9. Poppaeus, consul A.D. 9, was appointed in the lifetime of Augustus governor of Moesia, and was not only confirmed in this government by Tiberius, but received from the latter the provinces of Achaia and Macedonia in addition. He continued to hold these provinces till his death, in 35, having ruled over Moesia for twenty-four years. He was the maternal grandfather of Poppaea Sabina, the mistress, and afterwards the wife, of Nero. (Suet. Vesp. 2; Tac. Ann. i. 80, iv. 46, xiii. 45.)—10. T. Sicinius, consul B.C. 487, fought successfully against the Volsci. (Liv. ii. 40; Dionys. viii. 64, 67.)—11. Titius, a Roman knight, friend of Germanicus, executed through the influence of Sejanus (Tac. Ann. iv. 18, 68, 70, vi. 4; Dio Cass. lviii. 1).—12. Q. Titurius, one of Caesar's legates in Gaul, who perished along with L. Aurunculeius Cotta in the attack made upon them by Ambiorix in B.C. 54 (Caes. B. G. ii. 5, iii. 17, v. 24; Suet. Jul. 26).

Sabis (Sambre). 1. A broad and deep river in Gallica Belgica and in the territory of the Ambiani, falling into the river Mosa (Caes. B. G. ii. 16).—2. A small river on the coast of Carmania (Mel. iii. 8).—3. See SAPIS.

Sabrata. [ABROTONUM.]

Sabrīna, also called Sabriāna (Severn), a river in the W. of Britain, which flowed by Venta Silurum into the ocean (Ptol. ii. 3; Tac. Ann. xii. 31).

Sacādas (Σακάδας), of Argos, an eminent Greek musician, was one of the masters who established at Sparta the second great school of music, of which Thaletas was the founder, as Terpander had been of the first. He gained the prize for flute-playing at the first of the musical contests which the Amphictyons established in connexion with the Pythian games (B.C. 590), and also at the next two festivals in succession (586, 582). Sacadas was a composer of elegies, as well as a musician (Plut. de Mus. 8-12, pp. 1134, 1135).

Sacae (Σάκαι), one of the most numerous and most powerful of the Scythian nomad tribes, had their abodes E. and NE. of the Massagetae, as far as Serica, in the steppes of Central Asia, which are now peopled by the Kirghiz Khasaks, in whose name that of their ancestors is traced by some geographers. They were very warlike, and excelled especially as cavalry, and as archers both on horse and foot. Their women shared in their military spirit; and, if we are to believe Aelian, they had the custom of settling before marriage whether the man or woman should rule the house, by the result of a combat between them. In early times they extended their predatory incursions as far W. as Armenia and Cappadocia. They were made tributary to the Persian empire, to the army of which they furnished a large force of cavalry and archers, who were among the best troops that the king of Persia had. (Hdt. iv. 6, v. 113, vii. 64; Xen. Cyr. v. 3, 32; Strab. p. 511; Arr. An. iii. 8, 11.) It should be remembered that the name of the Sacae is often used loosely for other Scythian tribes, and sometimes for the Scythians in general.

Sācāsēnē (Σακασσηνή), a fertile district of Armenia Major, on the river Cyrus and the confines of Albania, so called from its having been at one period conquered by the Sacae (Strab. pp. 78, 509, 511, 529).

Sacastēnē (Σακαστηνή), a district of Drangiana, apparently, at one time occupied by the Sacae (Arr. Peripl. Mar. Eryth. 38). It is conjectured that the name Seistan is formed from Sacastene.

Sācer Mons, an isolated hill in the country of the Sabines, on the right bank of the Anio and W. of the Via Nomentana, three miles from Rome, to which the plebeians repaired in their secessions (Liv. ii. 32; Dionys. vi. 45). The hill is not called by any special name at the present day, but there is upon its summit the Torre di Specchio.

Sacili, with the surname Martialium, a town of the Turduli in Hispania Baetica (Plin. iii. 11).

Sacra Via. [ROMA, p. 805, a.]

Sacraria, a town in Umbria on the road between Treba and Spoletium, supposed to be identical with Clitumni Fanum on the river CLITUMNUS.

Sacriportus, a small place in Latium, of uncertain site, memorable for the victory of Sulla over the younger Marius, B.C. 82 (App. B. C. i. 87; Vell. Pat. ii. 26; Lucan, ii. 144).

Sacrum Promontōrium. 1. (C. St. Vincent), on the W. coast of Spain, said by Strabo to be the most westerly point in the whole earth (Strab. p. 137).—2. (C. Khelidoni), a promontory in Lycia, near the confines of Pamphylia, and opposite the Chelidonian islands, whence it was also called Prom. Chelidonium (Strab. p. 682).

Sadocus (Σάδοκος), son of Sitalces, king of Thrace, was made a citizen of Athens B.C. 481 (Thuc. ii. 29, 67; SITALCES).

Sadyattes (Σαδυάττης), king of Lydia, succeeded his father, Ardys, and reigned B.C. 629-617 (Hdt. i. 16, 18). He carried on war with the Milesians for six years, and at his death bequeathed the war to his son and successor, Alyattes. [ALYATTES.]

SaePINUM or SepINUM (Sepinas, -ātis: Sepino), a municipium in Samnium on the road from Allifae to Beneventum (Liv. x. 44; Plin. iii. 107).

Saetābis. 1. (Alcoy?), a river on the S. coast of Hispania Tarraconensis, S. of the Suero (Ptol. ii. 6, 14).—2. Or Setābis (Setabitanus: Jativa), an important town of the Contestani in Hispania Tarraconensis, and a Roman municipium, was situated on a hill S. of the Suero, and was celebrated for its manufacture of linen (Strab. p. 160; Plin. iii. 25, xix. 9; Catull. 12, 14).

Sagalassus (Σαγαλασσός, or Σελγησσός: Aghlasun), a large fortified city of Pisidia, near the Phrygian border, a day's journey SE. of Apamea Cibotus. It lay, as its large ruins still show, in the form of an amphitheatre on the side of a hill, and had a citadel on a rock thirty feet high. It was taken by assault by Alexander the Great (Arr. An. i. 18). Its inhabitants were reckoned the bravest of the Pisidians, and seem, from the word Λακεδαιμόνων on their coins, to have claimed a Spartan origin (Strab. p. 569; Liv. xxxviii. 15; Steph. s.v.). Among the ruins of the city are the remains of a very fine temple, of an amphitheatre, and of fifty-two other large buildings.

Sagānus (Σαγανός), a small river on the coast of Carmania (Ptol. vi. 8, 4).

Sāgāris, a river of Sarmatia Europaea, falling into a bay in the NW. of the Euxine, which was called after it Sagarius Sinus, and which also received the river Axiaces (Ov. Pont. iv. 10, 47; Plin. iv. 82). The bay appears to be that on which Odessa now stands, and the rivers the Bol-Kouialnik and the Mal-Kouialnik.

Sagartii (Σαγάρτιοι), according to Herodotus, a nomad people of Persia. Afterwards they are found, on the authority of Ptolemy, in Media and the passes of M. Zagros. (Hdt. i. 125.)

Sagra, a small river in Magna Graecia on the SE. coast of Bruttium, falling into the sea between Caulonia and Locri, on the banks of which [see p. 258, b] a memorable victory was gained by 10,000 Locrians over (as it was said) 120,000 Crotoniates (Strab. p. 261; Cic. N. D. iii. 5; Just. xx. 3; Plin. iii. 95). This victory appeared so extraordinary that it gave rise to the proverbial expression, 'It is truer than what happened on the Sagra,' when a person wished to make any strong asseveration (Suid. s.v.).

Sagrus (Sangro), a river of Samnium, which rises in the Marsian and Paelignian hills, and flows, with a course of about seventy miles, into the Adriatic N. of Histonium (Strab. p. 242; Ptol. iii. 1, 19).

Saguntia. 1. (Xigonzā or Gigonza, NW. of Medina Sidonia), a town in the W. part of Hispania Bastica, S. of the Baetis (Liv. xxxiv. 12; Plin. iii. 16).—2. A town of the Arevaci in Hispania Tarraconensis, SW. of Bilbilis, near the Mons Solarius (App. B. C. i. 110; Plut. Sert. 21).

Sāguntum, more rarely Saguntus (Saguntinus: Murviēdro), a town of the Edetani or Sedetani in Hispania Tarraconensis, S. of the Iberus on the river Palantias, about three miles from the coast. It is said to have been founded by Greeks from Zacynthus, with whom Rutulians from Ardea were intermingled, whence it is sometimes called Ausonia Saguntus. (Strab. p. 159; Liv. xxi. 7; Sil. Ital. i. 332.) It was situated on an eminence in the midst of a fertile country, and became a place of great commercial importance. Although S. of the Iberus, it had formed an alliance with the Romans; and its siege by Hannibal, B.C. 219, was the immediate cause of the second Punic war. The inhabitants defended their city with the utmost bravery against Hannibal, who did not succeed in taking the place till after a siege of nearly eight months (Liv. xxi. 14). The greater part of the city was destroyed by Hannibal; but it was rebuilt by the Romans eight years afterwards, and made a colony (Liv. xxviii. 39; Plin. iii. 20). Saguntum was celebrated for its manufacture of beautiful drinking-cups (Mart. iv. 46, xiv. 108; Plin. xxxv. 160); and the figs of the surrounding country were much valued in antiquity (Plin. xv. 72). The ruins of the ancient town, consisting of a theatre and a temple of Bacchus, are extant at Murviēdro, which is a corruption of Muri veteres.

Sais (Σαῖς, Σαῖτης: Sa-el-Hajjar, Ru.), a great city of Egypt, in the Delta, on the E. side of the Canopic branch of the Nile in lower Egypt (Hdt. ii. 169). It was the capital of the twenty-fourth and twenty-sixth dynasties, and under the twenty-sixth dynasty (B.C. 666–528) became the capital of all Egypt and both the residence and the burial-place of the kings of these two dynasties. Its accessibility to Greek traders increased its wealth, but after the foundation of Alexandria all its importance passed to that city. It was the chief seat of the worship of the Egyptian goddess Nit, who had here a splendid temple in the middle of an artificial lake, where a great feast of lamps was celebrated yearly by worshippers from all parts of Egypt. The city gave its name to the Saïtes Nomos.

Saītis (Σαῖτις), a surname of Athene, under which she had a sanctuary on Mount Pontinus, near Lerna in Argolis (Paus. ii. 36). The name was traced by the Greeks to the Egyptians, among whom Athene was said to have been called Sais (cf. Hdt. ii. 175).

Sala. 1. (Saale), a river of Germany, between which and the Rhine Drusus died (Strab. p. 291; Liv. Ep. 140). It was a tributary of the Albis (Elbe).—2. (Saale), also a river of Germany, and a tributary of the Moenus (Main), which formed the boundary between the Hermunduri and Chatti, with great salt springs in its neighbourhood, for the possession of which these two peoples frequently contended (Tac. Ann. xiii. 57).—3. (Burargag), a river in the N. part of the W. coast of Mauretania Tingitana, rises in the Atlas Minor, and falls into the Atlantic, N. of a town of the same name (Ptol. iv. 1, 2).—4. A town in Pannonia, on the road from Sabaria to Poetovio.—5. (Shella), a town in the N. part of the W. coast of Mauretania Tingitana, S. of the mouth of the river of the same name mentioned under No. 3 (Plin. v. 5). This town was the furthest place in Mauretania towards the S. possessed by the Romans; for although the province nominally extended further S., the Romans never fully subdued the nomad tribes beyond this point.

Salacia. [NEPTUNUS.]

Sālācia (Alcacer do Sal), a municipium of Lusitania, in the territory of the Turdetani, NW. of Pax Julia and SW. of Ebora, with the surname of Urbs Imperatoria, celebrated for its woollen manufactures (Strab. p. 144; Ptol. ii. 5, 3).

Sālāmis (Σαλαμίς: Σαλαμίνιος). 1. (Koluri), an island off the W. coast of Attica, from which it is separated by a narrow channel. It forms the S. boundary of the bay of Eleusis. Its form is that of an irregular semicircle towards the W., with many small indentations along the coast. Its greatest length, from N. to S., is about ten miles, and its width, in its broadest part, from E. to W., is a little more (Strab. p. 393). In ancient times it is said to have been called Pityussa, from the pines which grew in it, and also Sciras and Cychrēa, from the names of two native heroes (Paus. i. 36, 1). It is further said to have been called Salamis from a daughter of Asopus of this name (Paus. i. 35, 2). It was colonised at an early time by the Aeacidae of Aegina. Telamon, the son of Aeacus fled thither after the murder of his half-brother Phocus, and became sovereign of the island. His son Ajax accompanied the Greeks with twelve Salaminian ships to the Trojan war (Il. ii. 557). Salamis continued an independent state till about the beginning of the fortieth Olympiad (B.C. 620), when a dispute arose for its possession between the Megarians and the Athenians. After a long struggle it fell into the hands of the Megarians, but was finally taken possession of by the Athenians through a stratagem of Solon [SOLON], and became one of the Attic demi. It continued to belong to Athens till the time of Cassander, when its inhabitants voluntarily surrendered it to the Macedonians, 318 (Diod. xviii. 69; Paus. i. 85, 2). The Athenians recovered the island in 232 through means of Aratus, and punished the Salaminians for their desertion to the Macedonians with great severity (Plut. Arat. 34). The old city of Salamis stood on the S. side of the island, opposite Aegina; but this was after-galeos. (Hdt. viii. 83-90.)—2. A city of Cyprus, situated in the middle of the E. coast a little N. of the river Pediaeus. It is said to have been founded by Teucer, the son of Telamon, who gave it the name of his native island, from which he had been banished by his father. [TEUCER.] Salamis possessed an excellent harbour, and was by far the most important city in the whole of Cyprus. It became subject to the Persians with the rest of the island; but it recovered its independence about 385 under Evagoras, who extended his sovereignty over the greater part of the island. [CYPRUS.] Under the Romans the whole of the E. part of the island formed part of the territory of Salamis. In the time of Trajan a great part of the town was destroyed in an insurrection of the Jews; and under Constantine it suffered still more from an earthquake, which buried a large por-wards deserted, and a new city of the same name built on the E. coast opposite Attica, on a small bay now called Ambelakia. Even this new city was in ruins in the time of Pausanias. At the extremity of the S. promontory forming this bay was the small island of Psyttaleia (Lyphokutali), which is about a mile long, and from 200 to 300 yards wide (Hdt. viii. 95; Aesch. Pers. 447).—Salamis is chiefly memorable on account of the great battle fought off its coast, in which the Persian fleet of Xerxes was defeated by the Greeks, 480. The battle took place in the strait between the E. part of the island and the coast of Attica, and the Greek fleet was drawn up in the small bay in front of the town of Salamis. The battle was witnessed from the Attic coast by Xerxes, who had erected for himself a lofty throne on one of the projecting declivities of Mt. Aetion of the inhabitants beneath its ruins. It was, however, rebuilt by Constantine, who gave it the name of Constantia, and made it the capital of the island (Hierocl. p. 706). A systematic exploration of the site of Salamis was begun by Mr. Tubbs under direction of the British School of Athens in 1890, when the plan of the Agora and its colonnades, the Temenos of Zeus, and other buildings were discovered, besides valuable finds of pottery and some of sculpture. It is probable that the complete excavation of the site may produce results of great value to archaeology.

Salapia (Salapinus: Salpi), an ancient town of Apulia, in the district Daunia, was situated S. of Sipontum on a lake named after it (Strab. p. 284). According to the common tradition it was founded by Diomedes, though others ascribe its foundation to the Rhodian Elpias (Vitruv.

i. 4, 12; Strab. p. 654). It is not mentioned till the second Punic war, when it revolted to Hannibal after the battle of Cannae, but it subsequently surrendered to the Romans, and delivered to the latter the Carthaginian garrison stationed in the town (Liv. xxiv. 20, xxvi. 88). The original site of Salapia was at some distance from the coast; but in consequence of the unhealthy exhalations arising from the lake above mentioned, the inhabitants removed to a new town on the sea coast, which was built by M. Hostilius with the approbation of the Roman senate, about B.C. 200 (Vitruv. l. c.). This new town served as the harbour of Arpi. The ruins of the ancient town still exist at some distance from the coast at the village of Salpi.

Sālāpina Palus (Lago di Salpi), a lake of Apulia, between the mouths of the Cerbalus and Aufidus, which derived its name from the town of Salapia situated upon it, and which M. Hostilius connected with the Adriatic by means of a canal (Strab. p. 284; Lucan, v. 377).

Sālārīa, a town of the Bastetani in Hispania Tarraconensis and a Roman colony.

Sālārīa Via. [ROMA, p. 818.]

Salassi, a brave and warlike people in Gallia Transpadana, in the valley of the Duria (Val d'Aosta) at the foot of the Graian and Pennine Alps, whom some regarded as a branch of the Saljyes or Salluvii in Gaul. The approaches to the Alpine passes of the Great and Little St. Bernard lay through their territory, which was itself rendered difficult of access from the plain of the Po by the narrowness of the remarkable gorge (at the modern Fort de Bard) which forms the only entrance to the valley. (Liv. xxi. 39; cf. ALPES, p. 56, a.) The Salassi defended their territory with such obstinacy and courage that it was long before the Romans were able to subdue them. At length in the reign of Augustus the country was permanently occupied by Terentius Varro with a powerful Roman force; the greater part of the Salassi were destroyed in battle, and the rest, amounting to 36,000, were sold as slaves. Their chief town was Augusta Praetoria (Aosta), which Augustus colonised with soldiers of the Praetorian cohorts. (Dio Cass. liii. 25; Strab. p. 205; Liv. Ep. 135.)

Saldāe (Σάλδαι: Bougie), a large seaport town of N. Africa, originally the E. frontier town of the kingdom of Mauretania, afterwards in Mauretania Caesariensis, and, after the division of that province, the W. frontier town of Mauretania Sitifensis. Augustus made it a colony. (Strab. p. 831; Ptol. iv. 2, 9; Plin. v. 21.)

Saldūba. 1. (Rio Verde), a river in the territory of the Turduli in Hispania Baetica, at the mouth of which was situated a town of the same name (Ptol. ii. 4, 11).—2. See CAESAR-AUGUSTA.

Salē (Σάλη), a town on the coast of Thrace, a little W. of the mouth of the Hebrus (Hdt. vii. 59).

Salebro, a place in Etruria between Cosa and Populonium.

Saleius Bassus. [BASSUS.]

Sālentinī or Sallentinī, a people in the S. part of Calabria, who dwelt around the promontory Iapygium, which is hence called Salentinum or Salentina (Strab. p. 282). They laid claim to a Greek origin and pretended to have come from Crete into Italy under the guidance of Idomeneus (Strab. l. c.; Verg. Aen. iii. 400.) They were subdued by the Romans at the conclusion of their war with Pyrrhus, and having revolted in the second Punic war were again easily reduced to subjection (Liv. Ep. 15; Flor. i. 20; Zonar. viii. 7).

Sālernum (Salernitanus: Salerno), an ancient town in Campania, at the innermost corner of the Sinus Paestanus, was situated on a height not far from the coast, and possessed a harbour at the foot of the hill (Liv. xxxii. 29; Strab. p. 251; Hor. Ep. i. 15, 1). It was made a Roman colony at the same time as Puteoli, B.C. 194; but it attained its greatest prosperity in the middle ages, after it had been fortified by the Lombards (Paul. Hist. Lang. ii. 17).

Salices (Ad), a town in Moesia, not far from the mouth of the Danube, sixty-two Roman miles from Tomi (Amm. Marc. xxxi. 7).

Salganeus or Salganēa (Σαλγανεύς: Σαλγάνιος, Σαλγανέτης), a small town of Boeotia on the Euripus (the N. entrance of which it commanded), and on the road from Anthedon to Chalcis. (Strab. p. 403; Liv. xxxv. 37, 51.)

Sālīnae, salt-works, the name of several towns which possessed salt-works in their vicinity. 1. A town in Britain, probably on the E. coast, in the S. part of Lincolnshire (Ptol. iii. 8, 7).—2. A town of the Suetrii in the Maritime Alps in Gallia Narbonensis, E. of Reii (Ptol. iii. 1, 42).

Sālīnātor, Livius. 1. M., consul B.C. 219, with L. Aemilius Paulus, carried on war along with his colleague against the Illyrians. On their return to Rome, both consuls were brought to trial on the charge of having unfairly divided the booty among the soldiers. Paulus escaped with difficulty, but Livius was condemned. The sentence seems to have been an unjust one, and Livius took his disgrace so much to heart that he left the city and retired to his estate in the country, where he lived some years without taking any part in public affairs. (Ptol. iii. 19; Zonar. viii. 20; App. Illyr. 8; Liv. xxii. 35.) In 210 the consuls compelled him to return to the city, and in 207 he was elected consul a second time with C. Claudius Nero. He shared with his colleague in the glory of defeating Hasdrubal on the Metaurus. [For details, see NERO, CLAUDIUS, No. 2.] Next year (206) Livius was stationed in Etruria, as proconsul, with an army, and his imperium was prolonged for two successive years. In 204 he was censor with his former colleague in the consulship, Claudius Nero. The two censors had long been enemies, and their long-smothered resentment now burst forth, and occasioned no small scandal in the state. Livius, in his censorship imposed a tax upon salt, in consequence of which he received the surname of Salinator, which seems to have been given him in derision, but which became, notwithstanding, hereditary in his family. (Liv. xxix. 37; Val. Max. ii. 9, 6, vii. 2, 6.)—2. C., curule aedile 203, and praetor 202, in which year he obtained Bruttii as his province. In 193 he fought under the consul against the Boii, and in the same year was an unsuccessful candidate for the consulship. (Liv. xxix. 38, xxxv. 5, 10.)—3. C., praetor 191, when he had the command of the fleet in the war against Antiochus. He was consul 188, and obtained Gaul as his province. (Liv. xxxvi. 42, xxxvii. 9–25; App. Syr. 22.)

Sallentinī. [SALENTINI.]

Sallustius or Salustius (Σαλούστιος), praefectus praetorio under the emperor Julian. He was probably the author of a treatise Περὶ θεῶν καὶ κόσμου, which is still extant, of the school of the Neo-Platonists. Edited by Orellius.

C. Sallustius Crispus, or Salustius. 1. The Roman historian, belonged to a plebeian family, and was born B.C. 86, at Amiternum, in the country of the Sabines. He was quaestor about 59, and tribune of the plebs in 52, the year in which Clodius was killed by Milo. In his tribunate he joined the popular party, and took an active part in opposing Milo. It is said that he had been caught by Milo in the act of adultery with his wife, Fausta, the daughter of the dictator Sulla; that he had received a sound whipping from the husband; and that he had been only let off on payment of a sum of money (Gell. xvii. 18). In 50 Sallust was expelled from the senate by the censors, probably because he belonged to Caesar's party, though some give as the ground of his ejection from the senate the act of adultery already mentioned (Dio Cass. xl. 68). In the Civil war he followed Caesar's fortune. In 47 we find him praetor elect, by obtaining which dignity he was restored to his rank. He nearly lost his life in a mutiny of some of Caesar's troops in Campania, who had been led thither to pass over into Africa (App. B. C. ii. 92). He accompanied Caesar in his African war, 46, and was left by Caesar as the governor of Numidia, in which capacity he is charged with having oppressed the people, and enriched himself by unjust means (Bell. Afr. 8, 34; Dio Cass. xliii. 9). He was accused of maladministration before Caesar, but it does not appear that he was brought to trial ([Cic.] Invect. in Sallust. 19). The charge is somewhat confirmed by the fact of his becoming immensely rich, as was shown by the expensive gardens which he formed (horti Sallustiani) on the Quirinalis (cf. Hor. Od. ii. 2; Tac. Ann. iii. 30). He retired into privacy after he returned from Africa, and he passed quietly through the troublesome period after Caesar's death (Sall. Cat. 4). He died 34, about four years before the battle of Actium. The story of his marrying Cicero's wife, Terentia, ought to be rejected. [TERENTIA.] It was probably not till after his return from Africa that Sallust wrote his historical works. (1) The Catilina, or Bellum Catilinarium, is a history of the conspiracy of Catiline during the consulship of Cicero, 68. The introduction to this history is a somewhat overstrained effort to introduce philosophy and morals, but the writing is not without vigour, and there is no reason to regard the remarks as insincere. The history, though not clear in its chronology, is valuable. Sallust was a living spectator of the events which he describes, and considering that he was not a friend of Cicero, and was a partisan of Caesar, he wrote with fairness. The speeches which he has inserted in his history are certainly his own composition. [As regards his representation of Caesar's action, see p. 181, b.] Editions by Cook, 1884; Turner, 1887; Eussner, Leips. 1887. (2) The Jugurtha, or Bellum Jugurthinum, contains the history of the war of the Romans against Jugurtha, king of Numidia, which began 111, and continued until 106. It is likely enough that Sallust was led to write this work from having resided in Africa, and that he collected some materials there. He cites the Punic Books of King Hiempsal as authority for his general geographical description (Jug. c. 17). The Jugurthine War has a philosophical introduction of the same stamp as that to the Catilina. As a history of the campaign, the Jugurthine War is not very trustworthy: there is a total neglect of geographical precision, and apparently not a very strict regard to chronology. Editions by Herzog, Leips. 1840; Schmalz, Gotha, 1886; Brook, Lond. 1885. (3) His greatest work, which has perished almost entirely, was the Histories, in five books, which were dedicated to Lucullus, a son of L. Licinius Lucullus. The work comprised the period from the consulship of M. Aemilius Lepidus and Q. Lutatius Catulus, 78, the year of Sulla's death, to the consulship of L. Vulcatius Tullus and M. Aemilius Lepidus, 66, the year in which Cicero was praetor. This work was intended as a continuation of Sisenna's History; the history of Sulla was omitted (Jug. 95). The few remaining fragments comprise four speeches and two letters. These fragments are included in Jordan's edition of Sallust, 1887. (4) Duae Epistolae de Re Publica ordinanda, which appear to be addressed to Caesar at the time when he was engaged in his Spanish campaign (49) against Petreius and Afranius, and the Invectiva (or Declamatio) in Ciceronem are attributed to Sallust, but are probably works of a rhetorical writer of the first century, A.D., as is also the supposed retort of Cicero, Invect. in Sallustium. These are also printed in Jordan's Sallust, Berl. 1887, which is the best complete edition.—Some of the Roman writers considered that Sallust imitated the style of Thucydides (Quint. x. 1). His language is generally concise and perspicuous: perhaps his love of brevity may have caused the ambiguity that is sometimes found in his sentences. He also affected archaic words. Though he has considerable merit as a writer, his art is always apparent. He had no pretensions to great research or precision about facts. His reflections have often something of the same artificial and constrained character as his expressions; yet several are forcible and suggestive, and are familiar aphorisms, e.g. 'Idem velle idem nolle, ea demum firma amicitia est.' One may judge that his object was to obtain distinction as a writer: that style was what he thought of more than matter. He has, however, probably the merit of being the first Roman who aimed at writing philosophical history, and who was successful in depicting character. In his view of the times he was a pessimist, who painted the vices of the patricians in the darkest colours, with, perhaps, something of bitterness from the retrospect of his own life. Caesar and Cato alone are excepted from the general reprobation.—2. The grandson of the sister of the historian, was adopted by the latter, and inherited his great wealth. In imitation of Maecenas, he preferred remaining a Roman eque. On the fall of Maecenas he became the principal adviser of Augustus. He died in A.D. 20, at an advanced age. (Tac. Ann. i. 6, ii. 40, iii. 30; Sen. de Clem. 10.) One of Horace's odes (Od. ii. 2) was addressed to him after he was in favour with the imperial court: he is satirised for his profligacy in Sat. i. 2, 48.

Salmācis. [HERMAPHRODITUS.]

Salmantica (Salamanca), called Helmantica or Hermandica by Livy, and Elmantica by Polybius, an important town of the Vettones in Lusitania, S. of the Durius, on the road from Emerita to Caesaraugusta. It was taken by Hannibal. A bridge was built here by Trajan, of which the piers still exist. (Pol. iii. 14; Liv. xxi. 5; Ptol. ii. 5, 9.)

Salmōna or Salmōnīa. 1. (Σαλμώνη, Σαλμώνια), a town of Elis, in the district Pisatis, on the river Enipeus, said to have been founded by Salmoneus (Diod. iv. 68).—

2. (Salme), a branch of the Mosella (Aus. Mos. 366).

Salmōneus (Σαλμωνεύς), son of Aeolus and Enarete, and brother of Sisyphus (Apollod. i. 7, 8). He was first married to Alcidece and afterwards to Sidero; by the former of whom he became the father of Tyro (Od. xi. 235; Diod. iv. 68). He originally lived in Thessaly, but emigrated to Elis, where he built the town of Salmone (Strab. p. 356). His presumption and arrogance were so great that he deemed himself equal to Zeus, and ordered sacrifices to be offered to himself; nay, he even imitated the thunder and lightning of Zeus, but the father of the gods killed him with his thunderbolt, destroyed his town, and punished him in the lower world. This story of impiety is later than the Odyssey, where he is called ἄμύμων. (Apollod. i. 9, 7; Verg. Aen. vi. 585; Claud. in Rufin. ii. 514; Hyg. Fab. 60, 61.) His daughter Tyro bears the patronymic Salmonis.

Salmōnium or Salmōna (Σαλμώνιον, Σαλμώνη: C. Salmon), the most easterly promontory of Crete (Strab. pp. 106, 474).

Salmydessus, called Halmydessus also in later times (Σαλμυδεσσός, Ἁλμυδεσσός: Σαλμυδεσσός: Midja or Midjeh), a town of Thrace, on the coast of the Euxine, S. of the promontory Thynias (Ptol. iii. 11, 4). Aeschylus wrongly places it in Asia on the Thermodon (Prom. 726). The name was originally applied to the whole coast from this promontory to the entrance of the Bosphorus; and it was from this coast that the Black Sea obtained the name of Pontus Axenos (Ἄξενος), or inhospitable. The coast itself was rendered dangerous by shallows and marshes, and the inhabitants were accustomed to plunder any ships that were driven upon them. (Strab. p. 319; Xen. An. v. 4, 12; Hdt. iv. 93.)

Sālo (Xalon), a tributary of the Iberus in Celtiberia, which flowed by Bilbilis, the birth-place of Martial, who frequently mentions it in his poems (Mart. i. 49, x. 20, 103).

Salodurum (Solothurn or Soleure), a town in the E. of Gallia Belgica, on the Arurius (Arar), and on the road from Aventicum to Vindonissa. [HELVETH.]

Sālōna, Sālōnae, or Salon (Salona), an important town of Illyria and the capital of Dalmatia, was situated on a small bay of the sea (Lucan, viii. 104). It was strongly fortified by the Romans after their conquest of the country, and was at a later time made a Roman colony, and the seat of a conventus iuridicus (App. Illyr. 11; Caes. B.C. iii. 9; Plin. iii. 141). The emperor Diocletian was born at the small village Dioclea near Salona [p. 288]; and after his abdication he retired to the neighbourhood of this town, and here spent the rest of his days. The magnificent remains of his huge palace are still to be seen at Spalatro (Palatium), three miles S. of Salona, where they form a town in themselves.

Sālōnina, Cornēlia, wife of Gallienus and mother of Salonius. She witnessed with her own eyes the death of her husband before Milan, in A.D. 268. [GALLIENUS.]

Sālōninus, P. Licinius Cornēlius Valerianus, son of Gallienus and Salonina, grandson of the emperor Valerian. When his father and his grandfather assumed the title of Augustus, in A.D. 253, the youth received the designation of Caesar. Some years afterwards he was left in Gaul, and was put to death upon the capture of Colonia Agrippina by Postumus in 259, being about 17 years old. (Trebell. Poll. Salonin.; Zosim. i. 38.)

Salpensa, a Latin colony in Baetica between Hispalis (Seville) and Gades (Cádiz). The laws of Domitian regulating its government and that of Malaca were found in 1851 (C.I.L. 1963), and are important for the knowledge of Roman municipal affairs. (Dict. of Ant. art. Lex Salpensana.)

Salpenum, an ancient city of Etruria, not far from Volsinii, possibly where Orvieto now stands (Liv. v. 31).

Salsum Flumen, a tributary of the Baetis in Hispania Baetica, between Attegua and Attubis (Bell. Afr. 7).

Salviānus, an accomplished ecclesiastical writer of the fifth century A.D., was born in the vicinity of Treves, and passed the latter part of his life as a presbyter of the church at Marseilles. The following works of Salvianus are still extant:—(1) Adversus Avaritiam Libri IV ad Ecclesiam Catholicam, published under the name of Timotheus, about A.D. 440. (2) De Providentia s. de Gubernatione Dei et de Justo Dei praesentique Judicio Libri VIII, written during the inroads by the barbarians upon the Roman empire, 451–455. (3) Epistolae IX, addressed to friends upon familiar topics. Apart from their bearing on theological and ecclesiastical questions, these writings are valuable for their vivid description of the life and morals of the period.—The best editions of these works are by Halm, Berl. 1877, and Pauly, Vienna, 1883.

Q. Salvidiēnus Rufus, one of the early friends of Octavian (Augustus), whose fleet he commanded in the war against Sex. Pompeius, B.C. 42. In the Perusian war (41–40) he took an active part as one of Octavian's legates against L. Antonius and Fulvia. He was afterwards sent into Gallia Narbonensis, from whence he wrote to M. Antonius, offering to induce the troops in his province to desert from Octavian. But Antonius, who had just been reconciled to Octavian, revealed the treachery of Salvidienus. The latter was forthwith summoned to Rome on some pretext, and on his arrival was accused by Octavian in the senate, and condemned to death, 40. (App. B.C. iv. 85, v. 20–35, 66; Dio Cass. xlviii. 13, 18, 33.)

Salvius, the leader of the revolted slaves in Sicily, better known by the name of Tryphon, which he assumed. [TRYPHON.]

Salvius Juliānus. [JULIANUS.]

Salvius Otho. [OTHO.]

Salus, an Italian goddess, the personification of health, prosperity, and the public welfare. She was invoked by all communities for prosperity and safety in whatever might be their undertakings: for instance, by agriculturists (Ov. Fast. iii. 882; Macrobi. i. 16). At Rome in especial she was the goddess who gave public welfare (Salus Publica or Romana), to whom a temple had been vowed in the year B.C. 305 by the censor C. Junius Bubulcus on the Quirinal hill, which was afterwards (in 501) decorated with paintings by C. Fabius Pictor (Liv. ix. 43, x. 1; Val. Max. viii. 14). The temple was destroyed by fire in the reign of Claudius (Plin. xxxv. 19). She was worshipped publicly on April 30, in conjunction with Pax, Concordia, and Janus. It had been customary at Rome every year, about the time when the consuls entered upon their office, for the augurs and other high priests to observe the signs for the purpose of ascertaining the fortunes of the republic during the coming year; this observation of the signs was called augurium Salutis (Cic. de Leg. ii. 8, 20, Div. i. 47, 105; Tac. Ann. xii. 23; Suet. Aug. 31). In the time of Cicero this ceremony had become neglected; but Augustus restored it, and the custom afterwards remained as long as paganism was the religion of the state. She was also petitioned for particular persons by a sort of state prayer, as for Pompey B.C. 49 (Dio Cass. xli. 6); and this was constantly done for the emperor, who represented the state itself, so that Salus Augusta = Salus Publica. As goddess of health Salus was identified with HYGIEA, after the Greek influence was felt, and was represented with the same attributes [see p. 433, a].

Salustius. [SALLUSTIUS.]

Sal̄yes or Salluv̄ii, the most powerful and most celebrated of all the Ligurian tribes, inhabited the S. coast of Gaul from the Rhone to the Maritime Alps (Strab. p. 203). They were troublesome neighbours to Massilia, with which city they frequently carried on war. They were subdued by the Romans in B.C. 123 after a long and obstinate struggle, and the colony of Aquae Sextiae was founded in their territory by the consul Sextius [p. 94, b].

Samachonitis Lacus. [SEMECHONITIS LACUS.]

Sam̄ara. [SAMAROBRIVA.]

Sām̄aria (Σαμαρεία: Heb. Shomron, Chaldee, Shamraïn: Σαμαρείς, Σαμαρείτης, Samaritae, pl. Σαμαρείται, Samaritae), aft. Sēbaste (Σεβαστή: Sebastieh, Ru.), one of the chief cities of Palestine, built by Omri, king of Israel on a hill in the midst of a plain surrounded by mountains, just in the centre of Palestine W. of the Jordan. For its history before the Roman occupation, see Dictionary of the Bible. Pompey assigned the district to the province of Syria, and Gabinius fortified the city anew. Augustus gave the district to Herod, who greatly renovated the city of Samaria, which he called Sebaste in honour of his patron. It had its own administration, under control of the Roman authority. As Sebaste it received a colony in the reign of Septimius Severus. [For the political history see PALÆSTINA.]

Samarobriva, afterwards Ambiāni (Amiens), the chief town of the Ambiani in Gallia Belgica, on the river Samara: whence its name, which signifies Samara-Bridge (Caes. B. G. v. 24, 46, 53; Ptol. ii. 9, 8; Amm. Marc. xv. 11).

Sambana (Σαμβανα), a city of Assyria, two days' journey N. of Sittace. In its neighbourhood dwelt the people called Sambatae (Σαμβαταί). (Diod. xvii. 27.)

Sambastae (Σαμβασταί), a people of India intra Gangem, on the Lower Indus, near the island Pattalene. The fort of Sevistan or Sehoun in the same neighbourhood has been thought to preserve their name, and is by some identified with the Brahman city taken by Alexander. (Arr. An. vi. 15.)

Sāmē or Sāmos (Σάμη, Σάμος), the ancient name of Cephallenia. [CEPHALLENIA.] It was also the name of one of the four towns of Cephallenia. The town Same or Samos was situated on the E. coast, opposite Ithaca, and was taken and destroyed by the Romans B.C. 189. (Strab. p. 455; Liv. xxxviii. 28.)

Samia (Σαμία: Khaiaffa), a town of Elis in the district Triphylia, S. of Olympia, between Lepreum and the Alpheus, with a citadel called Samicum (Σαμικόν), the same as the Homeric Arene (Il. ii. 591, xi. 723; Strab. pp. 346, 347; Paus. v. 5, 3).

Saminthus (Σάμινθος: nr. Phiklia), a place in Argolis, on the W. edge of the Argive plain, opposite Mycenae (Thuc. v. 58).

Sammonius. [SERENUS.]

Samnium (Samnites, more rarely Samnītae, pl.), a country in the centre of Italy, bounded on the N. by the Marsi, Paeligni, and Marrucini, on the W. by Latium and Campania, on the S. by Lucania, and on the E. by the Frentani and Apulia. The Samnites were an offshoot of the Sabines (Strab. p. 250; Varro, L. L. vii. 29; Gell. xi. 1), who emigrated from their country between the Nar, the Tiber, and the Anio, before the foundation of Rome, and settled in the country afterwards called Samnium. [SABINI.] This country was at the time of their migration inhabited by Opicans, whom the Samnites conquered, and whose language they adopted. Samnium is a country marked by striking physical features. The greater part of it is occupied by a huge mass of mountains, called at the present day the Matese, which stands out from the central line of the Apennines. The circumference of the Matese is between seventy and eighty miles, and its greatest height is 6000 feet. The two most important tribes of the Samnites were the Caudini and Pentri, of whom the former occupied the S. side, and the latter the N. side of the Matese. To the Caudini belonged the towns of Allifae, Telesia, and Beneventum; to the Pentri, those of Aesernia, Bovianum, and Sepinum. Besides these two chief tribes, we find mention of the Caraceni, who dwelt N. of the Pentri, and to whom the town of Aufidena belonged; and of the Hirpini, who dwelt SE. of the Caudini, but who are sometimes mentioned as distinct from the Samnites. The Samnites were distinguished for their bravery and love of freedom. Issuing from their mountain fastnesses, they overran a great part of Campania; but it has been remarked that these bands of adventurers gained or lost for themselves, and their conquests did not really extend the dominion of the parent state as did those which the Romans made. The reason of the difference lay partly in the looseness of the Samnite confederacy, which was formed of a number of communes of herdsmen and agriculturists who nominated representatives in an assembly, and only on occasion of need appointed a federal general. In one of the Samnite expeditions Capua applied to the Romans for assistance against the Samnites, and this led to the war which broke out between the Romans and Samnites in B.C. 343. The Romans found the Samnites the most warlike and formidable enemies whom they had yet encountered in Italy, and the war which commenced in 343 was continued with few interruptions for the space of fifty-three years. It was not till 290, when all their bravest troops had fallen, and their country had been repeatedly ravaged in every direction by the Roman legions, that the Samnites sued for peace and submitted to the supremacy of Rome. They never, however, lost their love of freedom; and accordingly they not only joined the other Italian allies in the war against Rome (90), but, even after the other allies had submitted, they still continued in arms. The civil war between Marius and Sulla gave them hopes of recovering their independence; but they were defeated by Sulla before the gates of Rome (82), the greater part of their troops fell in battle, and the remainder were put to death. Their towns were laid waste, the inhabitants sold as slaves, and their place supplied by Roman colonists. (App. B. C. i. 93; Strab. p. 249; Plut. Sull. 80.)

Samos or Sāmus (Σάμος: Σάμος, Samius: Grk. Samos), one of the principal islands of the Aegean Sea, lying in that portion of it called the Icarian Sea, off the coast of Ionia, from which it is separated only by a narrow strait formed by the overlapping of its E. promontory Posidium (C. Colonna) with the westernmost spur of M. Mycale, Pr. Trogillum (C. S. Maria). This strait, which is little more than three-fourths of a mile wide, was the scene of the battle of MYCALE. The island is formed by a range of mountains extending from E. to W., whence it derived its name, for Σάμος was an old Greek word signifying a mountain: and the same root is seen in Same, the old name of Cephallenia, and Samothrace, i.e. the Thracian Samos. The circumference of the island is about eighty miles. It was and is very fertile, and some of its products are indicated by its ancient names, Dryusa, Anthemura, Melamphyllus and Cyparissia (Plin. v. 135). According to the earliest traditions, it was a chief seat of the Carians and Leleges, and the residence of their first king, Ancaeus, and was afterwards colonised by Aeolians from Lesbos, and by Ionians from Epidaurus (Paus. vii. 4, 1; Strab. p. 637). In the earliest historical records, we find Samos decidedly Ionian, and a powerful member of the Ionic confederacy. Thucydides tells us that the Samians were the first of the Greeks, after the Corinthians, who paid great attention to naval affairs (Thuc. i. 13). The Samian Colaeus is said to have discovered the passage of the Straits of Gibraltar (Hdt. iv. 152). They early acquired such power at sea that, besides obtaining possession of parts of the opposite coast of Asia, they founded many colonies: among which were Bisanthe and Perinthus, in Thrace; Celenderis and Nagidus, in Cilicia; Cydonia, in Crete; Dicaearchia (Puteoli), in Italy; and Zancle (Messana), in Sicily. After the government by a heroic monarchy followed, at the end of the seventh century B.C., an oligarchy of the land-owners (Geomori), who sent a colony to Perinthus and defeated the Megarians; but a revolution followed about 565 B.C., in which it is said that the oppressed people of Samos joined with the Megarian prisoners against the oligarchs: thus the island became subject to a democracy (Plut. Q. Gr. 57), but not long afterwards the power fell into the hands of the most distinguished of the so-called tyrants, POLYCRATES (B.C. 532), under whom its power and splendour reached their highest pitch, and Samos would probably have become the mistress of the Aegæan, but for the murder of Polycrates. At this period the Samians had extensive commercial relations with Egypt, and they obtained from Amasis the privilege of a separate temple at NAUCRATIS. Their commerce extended into the interior of Africa, partly through their relations with Cyrene, and also by means of a settlement which they effected in one of the Oases, seven days' journey from Thebes. The Samians now became subject to the Persian empire: the island was 'netted' in Persian fashion, nearly all the men hunted down and destroyed, and then Samos was handed over to Syloson, brother of Polycrates. (Hdt. iii. 120-125.) The Samians were governed by tyrants, with a brief interval at the time of the Ionic revolt, until the battle of Mycale, which made them independent, B.C. 479. They now joined the Athenian confederacy, of which they continued independent members until B.C. 440, when an opportunity arose for reducing them to entire subjection and depriving them of their fleet, which was effected by Pericles after an obstinate resistance of nine months' duration. (For the details see the Histories of Greece.) In the Peloponnesian war, Samos held firmly to Athens to the last, and in the history of the latter part of that war the island becomes extremely important as the head-quarters of the exiled democratical party of the Athenians. Transferred to Sparta after the battle of Aegospotami, 405, it was soon restored to Athens by that of Cnidus, 394, but went over to Sparta again in 390. Soon after, it fell into the hands of the Persians, being conquered by the satrap Tigranes; but it was recovered by Timotheus for Athens. In the Social war, the Athenians successfully defended it against the attacks of the confederated Chians, Rhodians, and Byzantines, and placed in it a body of 2000 cleruchi, B.C. 352. After Alexander's death, it was taken from the Athenians by Perdikkas, 323; but restored to them by Polysperchon 319. In the subsequent period, it seems to have been rather nominally than really a part of the Greco-Syrian kingdom: we find it engaged in a long contest with Priene on a question of boundary, which was referred to Antiochus II., and afterwards to the Roman senate. In the Macedonian war, Samos was taken by the Rhodians, then by Philip, and lastly by the Rhodians again, B.C. 200. In the Syrian war, the Samians took part with Antiochus the Great against Rome. Little further mention is made of Samos till the time of Mithridates, with whom it took part in his first war against Rome, on the conclusion of which it was finally united to the province of Asia, B.C. 84. Meanwhile it had greatly declined, and during the war it had been wasted by the incursions of pirates. Its prosperity was partially restored under the propraetorship of Q. Cicero, B.C. 62, but still more by the residence in it of Antony and Cleopatra, 32, and afterwards of Octavianus, who made Samos a free state. (Plin. v. 135). It was favoured by Caligula, but was deprived of its freedom by Vespasian, and it sank into insignificance as early as the second century, although its departed glory is found still recorded, under the emperor Decius, by the inscription on its coins, Σαίων πρώτων ἱερωτάς.—Samos may be regarded as among the chief centres of Ionian manners, energies, luxury, science, and art. In very early times, there was a native school of archaic sculpture, at the head of which was Rhoecus, to whom tradition ascribed the invention of casting in metal. [RHOECUS; TELECLES; THEODORUS.] In the hands of the same school architecture flourished greatly; the Heraeum, one of the finest of Greek temples, was erected in a marsh, on the W. side of the city of Samos; and the city itself, especially under the government of Polycrates, was furnished with other splendid works, among which was an aqueduct pierced through a mountain. In pottery Samos has given its name to the 'Samian' ware, a red pottery with reliefs (the successor perhaps of a black pottery with reliefs made at Samos), which was in vogue both in Greece and Italy in the second century B.C., and was imitated by potters of Gaul and Britain. In philosophy Pythagoras has made the name of Samos famous; among the lesser men of literature born in the island were the poets Asiut and Choerilus and the historian Duris.—The capital city, also called Samos, stood on the S.E. side of the island, opposite Pr. Trogilium, partly on the shore, and partly rising on the hills behind in the form of an amphitheatre. It had a magnificent harbour, and numerous splendid buildings, among which, besides the Heraeum and other temples, the chief were the senate-house, the theatre, and a gymnasium dedicated to Eros. The Heraeum of Samos, which commemorated the tradition that Hera was born by the river Imbrasus in Samos (Paus. vii. 4, 4), was built by RHOECUS (as principal architect), in the middle of the seventh century B.C., or (as some maintain) at the end of that century, possibly on the site of a still older temple. It was seen by Herodotus, who speaks of it as the largest existing temple (Hdt. iii. 60; cf. Paus. vii. 4), and in fact the report of the excavations of 1880 showed a façade of fully fifty metres. It was of the Ionic order, as may be seen by the existing remains—not Doric as Vitruvius states (vii. praef. 12).

Sāmōsāta (τὰ Σαμόσατα: Σαμοσατεύς, Samosatensis: Samisat), the capital of the province, and afterwards kingdom, of Commagene, in the N. of Syria, stood on the right bank of the Euphrates, NW. of Edessa (Strab. p. 749). It was taken by Antony in his Syrian campaign (Jos. Ant. xiv. 15). It was strongly fortified as a frontier post against Osroëne (Jos. B. J. vii. 7, 1). In the first century of our era, it was the capital of the kings of Commagene. It is celebrated, in literary history, as the birthplace of Lucian, and, in Church history, as that of the heretic Paul, bishop of Antioch, in the third century.

Sāmōthrācē, Samothrace, or Samothraciā [see Liv. xlii. 50, xlii. 45, 46] (Σαμοθράκη, Σαμοθρακία, Ep. Σάμος Θρηάκη: Σαμόθρακες: Samothraki), a small island in the N. of the Aegean sea, opposite the mouth of the Hebrus in Thrace, from which it was thirty-eight miles distant. It is about thirty-two miles in circumference, and contains in its centre a lofty mountain, called Saōce, from which Homer says that Troy could be seen. (Il. xiii. 12; Plin. iv. 73.) Samothrace bore various names in ancient times. It is said to have been called Melite, Saonnesus, and more frequently Dardania, from Dardanus, the founder of Troy, who is reported to have settled here. (Strab. pp. 457, 472; Paus. vii. 4, 3.) Homer calls the island simply Samos; sometimes the Thracian Samos, because it was colonised, according to some accounts, from Samos on the coast of Asia Minor. Samothrace was the chief seat of the worship of the Cabiri, and was celebrated for its religious mysteries, which were among the most famous in the ancient world. [See CABIRI, and Dict. of Ant. art. Cabiria.] The political history of Samothrace is of little importance. The Samothracians fought on the side of Xerxes at the battle of Salamis (Hdt. viii. 90), and at this time they possessed on the Thracian mainland a few places, such as Sale, Serhion, Mesambria, and Tempyra (Hdt. vii. 108). In the time of the Macedonian kings, Samothrace appears to have been regarded as a kind of asylum, and Perseus accordingly fled thither after his defeat by the Romans at the battle of Pydna (Liv. xlv. 6).

Sampsiceramus, the name of two princes of Emesa in Syria [EMESA], a nickname given by Cicero to Cn. Pompeius, in allusion probably to his talking much of his Eastern victories, this name being selected as particularly high-sounding (Cic. ad Att. ii. 14, 16, 17, 23).

Sanchuniathon (Σαρχουνιάθων), said to have been an ancient Phoenician writer, whose works were translated (as was pretended) into Greek by Philo Byblius, who lived in the latter half of the first century of the Christian era. A considerable fragment of the translation of Philo is preserved by Eusebius in the first book of his Praeparatio Evangelica. Philo was one of the many adherents of the doctrine of Euhemerus, that all the gods were originally men who had distinguished themselves in their lives as kings, warriors, or benefactors of man, and were worshipped as divinities after their death. This doctrine Philo applied to the religious system of the Oriental nations, and especially of the Phoenicians; and in order to gain more credit for his statements, he pretended that they were taken from an ancient Phoenician writer. Sanchuniathon, he says, was a native of Berytus, lived in the time of Semiramis, and dedicated his work to Abibalus, king of Berytus. It is probable that Sanchuniathon never existed, and that the name was formed from the Phoenician god Sanchon, and was invented for an imaginary Phoenician writer to whom Philo professed to ascribe the materials which he had gathered from traditions of various religions, Egyptian, Greek, and especially Phoenician.—The fragments of this work have been published separately by J. C. Orelli, Lips. 1826. In 1835 a manuscript, purporting to be the entire translation of Philo Byblius, was discovered in a convent in Portugal. The Greek text was published by Wagenfeld, Bremae, 1837.

Sancus, or Semo Sancus, an Italian divinity, originally a Sabine god, and identical with Hercules and Dius Fidius. The name, which is etymologically the same as Sanctus, and connected with Sancire, seems to justify this belief, and characterises Sancus as a divinity presiding over oaths (Ov. Fast. vi. 213; Propert. v. 9, 71). Sancus also had a temple at Rome, on the Mucialis (the S. slope of the Quirinal), which was said to have been consecrated in 466 B.C. by Postumius Regillensis (Dionys. ix. 60): near it was the 'Gate of Semo' (Porta Sanqualis; Fest. p. 345). There was also an altar on the island in the Tiber dedicated to Sanco (C. I. L. vi. 567), from which Christian writers derived their fallacious notion that Simon Magus was worshipped at Rome (Tertull. Apol. 13; Euseb. H. E. ii. 13). [See further under FIDIUS, and HERACLES, pp. 400, 401, b.]

Sandrocottus (Σανδρόκοττος), an Indian king at the time of Seleucus Nicator, ruled over the powerful nation of the Gangaridae and Prasii on the banks of the Ganges. He was a man of mean origin, and was the leader of a band of robbers, before he obtained the supreme power. In the troubles which followed the death of Alexander, he extended his dominions over the greater part of northern India, and conquered the Macedonians who had been left by Alexander in the Punjab. His dominions were invaded by Seleucus, who did not, however, succeed in the object of his expedition, for, in the peace concluded between the two monarchs, Seleucus ceded to Sandrocottus not only his conquests in the Punjab, but also the country of the Paropamisus. Seleucus in return received 500 war elephants. (Plut. Alex. 62; Just. xv. 4; Arr. An. v. 6, 2; Strab. pp. 702, 709, 724; App. Syr. 55; Athen. p. 18.) Megasthenes subsequently resided for many years at the court of Sandrocottus as the ambassador of Seleucus. [MEGASTHENES.] Sandrocottus is probably the same as the Chandragupta of the Sanscrit writers.

Sangala (Σάγγαλα), a town taken by Alexander in the country of the Punjab (Arr. An. v. 22). Some identify it with Lahore.

Sangarius, Sangaris, or Sagaris (Σαγγάριος, Σάγγαρις, Σάγαρις: Sakariyeh), the largest river of Asia Minor after the Halys, had its source in a mountain called Adoreus, near the little town of Sangia, on the borders of Galatia and Phrygia, whence it flowed first N. through Galatia, then W. and NW. through the NE. part of Phrygia, and then N. through Bithynia, of which it originally formed the E. boundary. It fell at last into the Euxine, about half way between the Bosphorus and Heraclea. It was navigable in the lower part of its course. Its chief tributaries were the Thymbres or Thymbrus, the Bathys, and the Gallus, flowing into it from the W. (Il. iii. 187, xvi. 719; Hes. Th. 344; Strab. p. 543; Ov. Pont. iv. 10, 17.)

Sangia. [SANGARIUS.]

Sannyrion (Σαννυρίων), an Athenian comic poet, belonging to the latter years of the Old Comedy, and the beginning of the Middle. He flourished B.C. 407 and onwards. We know nothing of his personal history, except that his excessive leanness was ridiculed by Strattis and Aristophanes. (Athen. p. 551.)

Santones or Santōni, a powerful people in Gallia Aquitania, dwelt on the coast of the ocean, N. of the Garumna. Under the Romans they were a free people. Their chief town was Mediolanum, afterwards Santones (Saintes). (Caes. B. G. i. 10, iii. 11, vii. 75; Ptol. ii. 7, 17.) Their country produced a species of wormwood which was much valued, and also a thick woollen cloth (Plin. xxvii. 60; Mart. ix. 95; Juv. viii. 145).

Saōcōras. [MASCAS.]

Sāpaei (Σαπαῖοι, Σάπαιοι), a people in Thrace, on Mt. Pangaeus, between the lake Bistonis and the coast (Hdt. vii. 110; Strab. p. 549).

Sapaudia, a district of E. Gaul, S. of the Lake of Geneva, and extending to Grenoble (Amm. Marc. xv. 11). Its name is preserved in Savoy.

Saphar, Sapphar, or Taphar (Σάφαρ or Ἄφαρ, Σάπφαρ, Τάφαρον: Dhafar, Ru.), one of the chief cities of Arabia, stood on the S. coast of Arabia Felix, opposite to the Aromata Pr. in Africa (C. Guardafui). It was the capital of the Homeritae, a part of which tribe bore the name of Sapharitae or Sappharitae (Σαπφαρίται). (Ptol. vi. 6, 25.)

Santra, a Roman grammarian, who lived about the end of the Republic, and wrote on the history of literature. He is cited frequently by later writers. (Mart. xi. 2, 7; Suet. Gr. 14; Gell. vii. 15; Quint. xii. 10, 16; Fest. p. 277; Non. 170, 21.)

Sāpis (Savio), a small river in Gallia Cisalpina, rising in the Apennines, and flowing into the Adriatic S. of Ravenna, between the Po and the Aternus (Strab. p. 217; Lucan, ii. 406).

Sapor. [SASSANIDAE.]

Sappho (Σαπφώ, or, in her own Aeolic dialect, Σάπφα), one of the two great leaders of the Aeolian school of lyric poetry (Alcaeus being the other), was a native of Mytilene, or, as some said, of Eresos in Lesbos. Her father's name was Scamandronymus, who died when she was only six years old (Hdt. ii. 135). She had three brothers, Charaxus, Larichus, and Eurigius. Charaxus was violently upbraided by his sister in a poem, because he became so enamoured of the courtesan Rhodopis at Naucratis in Egypt, as to ransom her from slavery at an immense price. [RHODOPIS.] It is probably an entire mistake to deduce from Fr. 85 (where Sappho calls Kleis 'a fair daughter') that the poetess was married and had children. She is speaking in the character of the poetical subject, not in her own person. Sappho was contemporary with Alcaeus, Stesichorus, and Pittacus. That she was not only contemporary, but lived in friendly intercourse, with Alcaeus, is shown by existing fragments of the poetry of both. Of the events of her life we have scanty information. From the Parian marble (36) we learn that political troubles drove her from Lesbos, like other partisans of the aristocracy, and that she went to Sicily (cf. Ov. Her. xv. 51). As regards the well-known story, that being in love with Phaon, and finding her love unrequited, she leapt down from the Leucadian rock, it seems to have been an invention of later times evolved out of a misunderstanding of some of her verses, and a confusion with the popular legend of Phaon's love for Aphrodite [p. 686, b]. It is even possible that in one of her poems she may have addressed Phaon in the character of Aphrodite (though his name does not occur in any existing fragment), and that, as in the case of Kleis, a too prosaic interpreter started the error, which was first promulgated by the comedians. (Strab. p. 452; Athen. pp. 69, 441.) As for the leap from the Leucadian rock, it is a fiction, which arose from an expiatory rite connected with the worship of Apollo [p. 486, a]. At Mytilene Sappho appears to have been the centre of a female literary society, most of the members of which were her pupils in poetry. [ERINNA.] Upon the mention of these younger pupils and followers a foolish love of scandal in a later age based an attack against the moral character of Sappho, which should be dismissed as a groundless fabrication. This also was started by the comedians. It may have been suggested in the first instance partly by the incapacity of the Athenians to imagine any such freedom of women in society as was possible without any taint among the Aeolians and Dorians, and partly from the prurient imagination of the comedians. Read with an intelligent mind, the poems which have survived imply no want of purity in Sappho, and Aristotle's approbation of the reply which Sappho made to Alcaeus does not suggest a disbelief in her nobility of character. Of her poetical genius, however, there cannot be a question. The ancient writers agree in expressing the most unbounded admiration for her poetry. Even in her own age the recitation of one of her poems so affected Solon that he expressed an earnest desire to learn it before he died (Ael. ap. Stob. Serm. xxix. 58). The Alexandrian school numbered her among the nine great lyric poets, and in force and passion she probably surpassed them all. Her lyric poems formed nine books, but of these only fragments have come down to us. The longest is a splendid ode to Aphrodite.—The fragments are edited by Neue, Berl. 1827, and in Bergk's Poetae Lyrici, 1867.

Sarancae, Sarangae or -es (Σαράγγαι, Σαράγγες Herod.), a people of Sogdiana (Hdt. iii. 93).

Sardānāpalus (Σαρδανάπαλος), the last king of the Assyrian empire of Nineveh. The familiar account of his life, as derived from Ctesias, gives a false view both of his date and his character. It asserts that he passed his time in his palace unseen by any of his subjects, dressed in female apparel, and surrounded by concubines. At length Arbaces, satrap of Media, and Belesys, the noblest of the Chaldaean priests, resolved to renounce allegiance to such a worthless monarch, and advanced at the head of a formidable army against Nineveh. But all of a sudden the effeminate prince threw off his luxurious habits, and appeared an undaunted warrior. Placing himself at the head of his troops, he twice defeated the rebels, but was at length worsted and obliged to shut himself up in Nineveh. Here he sustained a siege for two years, till at length, finding it impossible to hold out any longer, he collected all his treasures, wives, and concubines, and placing them on an immense pile which he had constructed, set it on fire, and thus destroyed both himself and them. The enemies then obtained possession of the city, in the eighth century B.C. This is the account of Ctesias, which has been preserved by Diodorus Siculus and which has been followed by most subsequent writers and chronologists (Diod. ii. 21; Syncell. p. 359; Agath. p. 120; August. C.D. xviii. 21). Modern writers have shown that the narrative of Ctesias is mythical, and must not be received as a genuine history. The legend of Sardanapalus, who so strangely appears at one time sunk in the lowest effeminacy, and immediately afterwards a heroic warrior, has perhaps been composed from popular stories of the god Sandon, who was worshipped in Asia both as a heroic and a female divinity. The real Sardanapalus was the king Assur-bani-pal, son of Esarhaddon, who is described in the cuneiform record as making two successful expeditions against Egypt, about the years 670–650 B.C. In the first he defeated Taharqa (Tirhakah) who had combined with some of the petty kings set up in Egypt by Esarhaddon, to drive out all who favoured Assyria; in the second, besides defeating Urdameneh, Taharqa's successor, he carried Neku [NECO, No. 1] prisoner to Nineveh. But meantime his own empire had been weakened by dissensions. The end came in 606 B.C., when the governor of Babylon in alliance with Cyaxares, king of Media, brought an army against Nineveh, took the city and rased it to the ground. Sardanapalus, or Assur-bani-pal, with all his family perished with the city. [See also pp. 135, 156.]

Sardemisus, a branch of M. Taurus, extending southwards on the borders of Pisidia and Pamphylia, as far as Phaselis in Lycia, whence it was continued in the chain called Climax.

It divided the district of Milyas from Pisidia Proper (Plin. v. 96).

Sardi. [SARDINIA.]

Sardinia (ἡ Σαρδῶ or Σαρδών, gen. Σαρδόνος, dat. Σαρδοῖ, acc. Σαρδῶ: subsequently Σαρδωνία, Σαρδανία, or Σαρδηνία: Σαρδῶος, Σαρδόνιος, Σαρδώνιος, Sardus: Sardinia), a large island in the Mediterranean, is in shape in the form of a parallelogram, upwards of 140 nautical miles in length from N. to S. with an average breadth of sixty. It was regarded by many of the ancients as the largest of the Mediterranean islands (Hdt. i. 170, v. 106; Scyl. p. 56; cf. Strab. p. 654), and this opinion, though usually considered an error, is now found to be correct, since it appears by actual measurement that Sardinia is a little larger than Sicily. Sardinia lies in almost a central position between Spain, Gaul, Italy, and Africa. The ancients derived its name from Sardus, a son of a native deity identified by the Greeks with Heracles (Paus. x. 17, 2), who was worshipped in the island under the name of Sardus Pater. The Greeks called it Ichnusa (Ἰχνοῦσα) from its resemblance to the print of a foot, and Sandaliotis (Σανδαλιώτις) from its likeness to a sandal (Sil. It. xii. 358; Paus. l.c.; Plin. iii. 85). A chain of mountains runs along the whole of the E. side of the island from N. to S., occupying about one third of its surface. These mountains were called by the ancients Insani Montes (Liv. xxx. 39; Claud. Bell. Gild. 513; τὰ Μαινόμενα Όρη, Ptol. iii. 3, 6), a name which they probably derived from their wild and savage appearance, and from their being the haunt of numerous robbers. In the W. and S. parts of Sardinia there are numerous plains, intersected by ranges of smaller hills, but this part of the island was in antiquity, as in the present day, exceedingly unhealthy, owing to the extensive marshes and lagoons. (Strab. p. 225; Paus. x. 17, 11; Mart. iv. 60, 6; Tac. Ann. ii. 85.) The principal rivers are the Terminus (Termo) in the N., the Thyrus (Oristano) on the W. (the largest river in the island), and the Flumen Sacrum (Uras) and the Saeprus (Flumendoso) on the E. The chief towns in the island were: on the N. coast, Tibula (Porto Pollo) and Turris Libyssonis; on the S. coast, Sulci and Caralis (Cagliari); on the E. coast, Olbia; and in the interior, Cornus (Corneto) and Nora (Nurri).—Sardinia was very fertile, but was not extensively cultivated, in consequence of the uncivilised character of its inhabitants. Still the plains in the W. and S. parts of the island produced a great amount of corn, of which a large quantity was exported to Rome every year. Among the products of the island one of the most celebrated was the Sardonica herba, a poisonous plant, which was said to produce fatal convulsions in the persons who ate of it. These convulsions, it was said, agitated and distorted the mouth, so that the person appeared to laugh, though in excruciating pain: hence the well-known risus Sardonius. (Paus. x. 17, 13; Serv. ad Ecl. vii. 41; Suid. s.v. Σαρδάνιος γέλως). No plant possessing these properties is found at present in Sardinia; and it is not impossible that the whole tale may have arisen from a piece of bad etymology, since we find mention in Homer of the Σαρδάνιος γέλως, which cannot have any reference to Sardinia, but is probably connected with the verb σαίρειν, 'to grin.' The bitterness of the Sardinian honey, which was supposed to be caused by this herb, is still observed. Another of the principal productions of Sardinia was its wool, which was obtained from a breed of domestic animals between a sheep and a goat, called musmones (μούσμων: moufflon; Strab. p. 225; Paus. l.c.; Ael. H. A. xvi. 34). The skins of these animals were used by the inhabitants as clothes, whence we find them often called Peliti and Mastrucati. Sardinia also contained a large quantity of the precious metals, especially silver, the mines of which were worked in antiquity to a great extent (Solin. 4, 4). There were likewise numerous mineral springs; and large quantities of salt were manufactured on the W. and S. coasts.—The population of Sardinia was of a very mixed kind. To what race the original inhabitants belonged we are not informed; most likely they were Iberians, i.e. of the same race as the non-Aryan element in Spain and Sicily. Phoenicians, Tyrrhenians, and Carthaginians settled in the island at different periods. The Greeks are also said to have planted colonies in the island, but this account is very suspicious. The first Greek colony is said to have been led by Iolaus, a son of Heracles. The story probably arose from the name of a tribe in the island, called Iolai (Ἰόλαιοι, Ἰολαῖοι, Ἰολαεῖς), or Ilienses (Ἰλιεῖς) [see p. 445, a]. These were some of the most ancient inhabitants of Sardinia, and were probably not of Greek, but of Iberian origin. Their name is event, the Romans availed themselves of the dangerous war which the Carthaginians were carrying on against their mercenaries in Africa, to take possession of Sardinia, B.C. 238 (Pol. i. 88, iii. 10; Liv. xxi. 1). It was now formed into a Roman province under the government of a praetor; but a large portion of it was only nominally subject to the Romans; and it was not till after many years and numerous revolts, that the inhabitants submitted to the Roman dominion. It was after one of these revolts that so many Sardinians were thrown upon the slave market as to give rise to the proverb, 'Sardi venales,' to indicate any cheap and worthless commodity (Aurel. Vict. Vir. Ill. 65). After 122 B.C. the island was governed by a praetor, whose title in 27, when the province was given to the senate, became proconsul. In A.D. 6 it was placed under an imperial procurator (Dio Cass. lxxv. 28): after Diocletian under a praeses. The inhabitants of the mountains in the E. side of the island were never completely subdued, and gave trouble to the Romans even in the time of Tiberius. Sardinia continued to belong to the Roman empire till the fifth century, when it was taken possession of by the Vandals.

still preserved in the modern town of Iliola, in the middle of the W. coast. We also find in the island Corsi, who had crossed over from Corsica, and Balari, who, according to Pausanias, were descendants of Libyan mercenaries of the Carthaginians, who had settled in the mountains. Probably it is to the Iberian inhabitants that the peculiar towers (called Nuraghe) are due. Greek writers evidently regarded them as of great antiquity. ([Aristot.] de Mirab. 100 = p. 838; cf. Diod. iv. 30.) They are built of massive stones in the form of a truncated cone, and contain vaulted chambers with a staircase in the thickness of the wall. At a later time all these names became merged under the general appellation of Sardi, although even in the Roman period we still find mention of several tribes in the island under distinct names. The Sardi are described as a rude and savage people, addicted to thievery and lying.—Sardinia was known to the Greeks as early as B.C. 545 (Hdt. i. 170); and a generation later Histiaeus of Miletus promised Darius that he would render the island of Sardo tributary to his power (Hdt. v. 106, 124). It was conquered by the Carthaginians at an early period (Diod. v. 35), and continued in their possession till the end of the first Punic war. Shortly after this most ancient and famous cities of Asia Minor, and the capital of the great Lydian monarchy, stood on the S. edge of the rich valley of the Hermus, at the N. foot of M. Tmolus, on the little river Pactolus, thirty stadia (three geogr. miles) S. of the junction of that river with the Hermus (Hdt. v. 101; Aesch. Pers. 45; Strab. p. 625). On a lofty precipitous rock, forming an outpost of the range of Tmolus, was the almost impregnable citadel which some suppose to be the Hyde of Homer, who, though he never mentions the Lydians or Sardis by name, speaks of M. Tmolus and the lake of Gyges (Il. xx. 385; Strab. p. 626). The erection of this citadel was ascribed to Meles, an ancient king of Lydia (Hdt. i. 81); but it was probably first a western outpost of the great Hittite empire. It was surrounded by a triple wall, and contained the palace and treasury of the Lydian kings. At the downfall of the Lydian empire, it resisted all the attacks of Cyrus, and was only taken by surprise. The story is told by Herodotus, who relates other legends of the fortress. The rest of the city, which stood in the plain on both sides of the Pactolus, was very slightly built, and was repeatedly burnt down, first by the Cimmerians, then by the Greeks in the great Ionic revolt, and again, in part at least, by Antiochus the Great (Pol. v. 15, viii. 23); but on each occasion it was restored. For its history as the capital of the Lydian monarchy see LYDIA. Under the Persian and Greco-Syrian empires, it was the residence of the satrap of Lydia. The rise of Pergamum greatly diminished its importance; but under the Romans it was still a considerable city, and the seat of a conventus iudicis (Plin. v. 111), and a place where the religious festivals of the province of Asia (κοινὸν Ἀσίας) were held for the worship of Rome and Augustus (C.I.G. 5918). In the organisation of Diocletian it was the capital of Lydia. In the reign of Tiberius, it was almost entirely destroyed by an earthquake, but it was restored by the emperor's aid. (Tac. Ann. ii. 47; Strab. p. 627.) It was one of the earliest seats of the Christian religion, and one of the seven Churches of the province of Asia. [Dict. of the Bible.] In 1402 the city was destroyed by Tamerlane, and its site now presents a melancholy scene of desolation. The triple wall of the acropolis can still be traced, and remains of the temple of Cybele, the theatre, stadium and other buildings. The necropolis of the city stood on the banks of the lake of Gyges [GYGAEUS LACUS], near which the sepulchre of Alyattes may still be seen. [ALYATTES.]

Sardōum or Sardonium Mare (τὸ Σαρδῶνον or Σαρδάνιον πέλαγος), the part of the Mediterranean sea on the W. and S. of Sardinia, separated from the Libyan sea by a line drawn from the promontory Lilybaeum in Sicily (Hdt. i. 166; Strab. pp. 50, 54; Plin. iii. 75).

Sarepta or Sarephtha (Σάρεπτα, Σάρεφθα, Σάραπτα: O. T. Zarephath: Surafend, Seraphant, or Tzarphand), a city of Phoenicia, about ten miles S. of Sidon, to the territory of which it belonged (Jos. Ant. viii. 13, 2; Plin. v. 76; Dict. of the Bible).

Sargētia (Strel or Strey, a tributary of the Marosch), a river in Dacia, on which was situated the residence of Decebalus (Dio Cass. lxxviii. 14).

Sarīphi Montes (τὰ Σάριφα ὄρη), a mountain-range in the N. of Parthia, running eastward from the SE. corner of the Caspian.

Sarmatae or Saurōmatae (Σαρμάται, Strabo; Σαυρομάται, Hdt.), a people of Asia, dwelling on the NE. of the Palus Maeotis (Sea of Azov), E. of the river Tanaïs (Don) which separated them from the Scythians of Europe. This is the account of Herodotus, who tells us that the Sarmatians were allied to the Scythians, and spoke a corrupted form of the Scythian language, and that their origin was ascribed to the intercourse of Scythians with Amazons (Hdt. iv. 21, 110-117). Strabo also places the Sauromatae proper between the Tanaïs and the Caspian (pp. 497, 500, 507); but in many passages he makes no very distinct separation between Sarmatians and Scythians. The Sarmatae had before his time invaded and occupied much of what had been Scythian territory, and continued to push their influence further, so that Tacitus (Germ. 1) speaks of them as neighbours of the Germans (i.e. reaching to Poland and E. Prussia), and Ptolemy brings them up to the Vistula. At the same time their power was roving and fluctuating: there were numerous independent and dominant tribes within these limits who are spoken of under their own name, and Sarmatia in its extended sense is rather a geographical expression than a country of one ruling nation. [SARMATIA.]

Sarmātia (ἡ Σαρματία: Σαρμάται, Σαυρομάται: the E. part of Poland, and S. part of Russia in Europe), a name first used by Mela (ii. 4) for the part of N. Europe and Asia extending from the Vistula (Wistla) and the SARMATICI MONTES on the W., which divided it from Germany, to the Rha (Volga) on the E., which divided it from Scythia; bounded on the SW. and S. by the rivers Ister (Danube), Tibiscus (Theiss), and Tyras (Dniester), which divided it from Pannonia and Dacia, and, further, by the Euxine, and beyond it by M. Caucasus, which divided it from Colchis, Iberia, and Albania; and extending on the N. as far as the Baltic and the unknown regions of N. Europe. The part of this country which lies in Europe corresponds to the Scythia of Herodotus. The people from whom the name of Sarmatia was derived inhabited at first only a small portion of the country. [SARMATAE.] The greater part of it was peopled by Scythian tribes, who, before the Christian era, had yielded to a great extent to the Sarmatian power and name; but some of the inhabitants of its W. part seem to have been of German origin, as the VENEDI on the Baltic, and the IAZGES, RHOXOLANI, and HAMAXOBII in S. Russia: the chief of the other tribes W. of the Tanaïs were the Alauni or Alani Scythae, a Scythian people who came out of Asia and settled in the central parts of Russia. [ALANI.] The people E. of the Tanaïs were not of sufficient importance in ancient history to require specific mention. The whole country was divided by the river Tanaïs (Don) into two parts, called respectively Sarmatia Europaea and Sarmatia Asiatica (ἡ ἐν Εὐρώπῃ and ἡ ἐν Ἀσίᾳ Σαρματία); but it should be observed that, according to the modern division of the continent, the whole of Sarmatia belongs to Europe. It should also be noticed that the Chersonesus Taurica (Crimea), though falling within the specified limits, was not considered as a part of Sarmatia, but as a separate country.

Sarmaticae Portae (αἱ Σαρματικαὶ πύλαι: Pass of Dariel), the central pass of the Caucasus, leading from Iberia to Sarmatia (Pol. v. 9, 11). It was more commonly called Caucasiae Portae. [CAUCASUS.] It was also called Caspiae Portae (Suet. Ner. 19; Tac. Hist. i. 6), apparently through a confusion with the pass of that name at the E. end of the Caucasus. [CASPIAE PORTAE.] The remains of an ancient wall are still seen in the pass.

Sarmatici Montes (τὰ Σαρματικά ὄρη: part of the Carpathian Mountains), a range of mountains in Central Europe, extending from the sources of the Vistula to the Danube, between Germany on the W. and Sarmatia on the E. (Ptol. ii. 11, 6).

Sarmaticus Oceanus and Pontus, Sarmaticum Mare (Σαρματικὸς ὠκεανός: Baltic), a great sea, washing the N. coast of European Sarmatia (Ptol. vii. 5, 2), but Roman poets applied the name sometimes to the Black Sea (Ov. Pont. iv. 10, 38; Val. Flacc. viii. 207).

Sarmizegethusa (near Vachely, also called Gradischte, Ru.), the most important town of Dacia, and the residence of its kings, was situated on the river Sargetia (Strel or Strey) (Dio Cass. lxxviii. 9, lxxviii. 8, 14). After Trajan's conquests [DACIA] it was made a Roman colony under the name of Col. Ulpia Trajana Aug., and the capital of the province in which a legion had its head-quarters (Dio Cass. lv. 23; C.I.L. iii. p. 228).

Sarnus (Sarno), a river in Campania, flowing by Nuceria, and falling into the Sinus Puteolanus near Pompeii. Its course was changed by the great eruption of Vesuvius, A.D. 79. On its banks dwelt a people named Sarrastes, who are said to have migrated from Peloponnesus. (Strab. p. 247; Verg. Aen. vii. 738; Serv. ad loc.)

Saron. [SARONICUS SINUS.]

Sarōn (Σάρων: O. T. Sharon), a fertile plain of Palestine, extending along the coast N. of Joppa towards Caesarea. [Dict. of the Bible.]

Sarōnīcus Sinus (Σαρωνικός κόλπος, also πόρος, πέλαγος, and πόντος: G. of Egina), a bay of the Aegæan sea lying between Attica and Argolis, and commencing between the promontory of Sunium in Attica and that of Scyllaeum in Argolis. It contains within it the islands of Aegina and Salamis. (Aesch. Ag. 317; Strab. pp. 335, 369.) Its name was traditionally derived from Saron, king of Troezen, who was supposed to have been drowned in this part of the sea while swimming in pursuit of a stag. The story, founded apparently in part on the name, and in part on the rites of Artemis, tells that he was buried in the precincts of the temple which he had built for Artemis, and the neighbouring sea was called Saronis instead of Phoebea (Paus. iii. 30, 7).

Sarpēdon (Σαρπηδών). 1. Son of Zeus and Europa, and brother of Minos and Rhadamanthus. Being involved in a quarrel with Minos about Miletus, he took refuge with Cilix, whom he assisted against the Lycians. He afterwards became king of the Lycians, and Zeus granted him the privilege of living three generations. (Hdt. i. 173; Apollod. iii. 1, 2; Paus. vii. 3, 4; MILETUS.)—2. Son of Zeus and Laodamia, or, according to others, of Evander and Deidamia, and a brother of Clarus and Themon (Il. vi. 199; Apollod. iii. 1, 1; Verg. Aen. x. 125). He was a Lycian prince, and a grandson of No. 1, with whom he is confused in Eur. Rhes. 29. In the Trojan war he was an ally of the Trojans, and distinguished himself by his valour, but was slain by Patroclus (Il. v. 479, xii. 292, xvi. 480). Apollo, by the command of Zeus, cleansed Sarpēdon's body from blood and dust, covered it with ambrosia, and gave it to Sleep and Death to carry into Lycia, there to be honourably buried (Il. xvi. 667; MORS).

Sarpēdon Promontorium (Σαρπηδών: C. Lissan el Kapsh), a promontory of Cilicia, in long. 34° E., eighty stadia W. of the mouth of the Calycadnus. In the peace between the Romans and Antiochus the Great, the W. boundary of the Syrian kingdom was fixed here. (Strab. p. 670; App. Syr. 39; Liv. xxxviii. 38.)

Sarpēdōnium Prom. (ἡ Σαρπηδονίη ἄκρα: Gremia), a promontory of Thrace between the mouths of the rivers Melas and Erginus, opposite the island of Imbros (Hdt. vii. 58).

Sarrastes. [SARNUS.]

Sars (Sar), a small river on the W. coast of Hispania Tarraconensis, between the Prom. Nerium and the Minus (Mel. iii. 1).

Sarsīna (Sarsinas, -ātis: Sarsina), an ancient town of Umbria, on the river Sapis, SW. of Ariminum, and subsequently a Roman municipium (Strab. p. 227; Plin. iii. 114), celebrated as the birthplace of the comic poet PLAUTUS.

Sarta (Σάρτη: Sykia), a town on the E. coast of the Sithonian promontory of Chalcidice (Hdt. vii. 122).

Sarus (ὁ Σάρος: Seihan), a considerable river in the SE. of Asia Minor. Rising in the Anti-Taurus, in the centre of Cappadocia, it flows S. past Comana to the borders of Cilicia, where it receives a W. branch that has run nearly parallel to it; and thence, flowing through Cilicia Campestris in a winding course, it falls into the sea a little E. of the mouth of the Cydnus, and SE. of Tarsus. Xenophon gives three plethra (303 feet) for its width at its mouth. (Xen. An. i. 4, 1; Strab. p. 535.)

Sāso or Sasonis Insula (Saseno, Sassono, Sassa), a small rocky island off the coast of Illyria, N. of the Acroceraunian promontory, much frequented by pirates (Pol. v. 110; Strab. p. 281; Plin. iii. 152).

Saspīres, or -i, or Sapīres (Σάσπειρες, Σασπειροί, Σάπειρες, Σάππειρες), a Scythian people of Asia, S. of Colchis and N. of Media, in the district of N. Armenia called Hysparatis, along the river Acampsis (Hdt. i. 104, iv. 37, vii. 79; Amm. Marc. xxii. 8, 21). Apollonius Rhod. (ii. 397, 1242), wrongly places them on the coast of the Euxine.

Sassanidae, the name of a dynasty which reigned in Persia from A.D. 226 to A.D. 651.

1. Artaxerxes (the Ardashir or Ardshir of the Persians), the founder of the dynasty of the Sassanidae, reigned A.D. 226–241. He was a son of one Papak or Pabek, an inferior officer, who was the son of Sassan, and his ancestors had been viceroys of the Persian province, i.e. of the centre of the Iranian people, under the supremacy of the Arsacidae. Artaxerxes had served with distinction in the army of Artabanus, the king of Parthia, was rewarded with ingratitude, and took revenge in revolt. He obtained assistance from several grandees, and having met with success, claimed the throne on the plea of being descended from the ancient kings of Persia, the progeny of the great Cyrus. The people warmly supported his cause as he declared himself the champion of the ancient Persian religion. In 226 Artabanus was defeated, in a decisive battle; and Artaxerxes thereupon assumed the pompous but national title of 'King of Kings.' Persepolis was the nominal capital of the Parthian empire, but Ctesiphon was the real seat of government. Henceforth the Sassanid kings held themselves as equals of the Caesars, which had never been fully the case with the Arsacidae. It is noticed, among other things, that the Sassanidae from the first struck gold coins, which the Arsacidae never had done. One of the first legislative acts of Artaxerxes (Ardashir) was to restore the pure religion of Zoroaster and fire-worship, and the power of the Magian order. The reigning branch of the Parthian Arsacidae was exterminated, but some collateral branches were suffered to live and to enjoy the privileges of Persian grandees, who, along with the Magi, formed a sort of senate. Having succeeded in establishing his authority at home, Artaxerxes demanded from the emperor Alexander Severus the immediate cession of all those portions of the Roman empire that had belonged to Persia in the time of Cyrus and Xerxes—that is, the whole of the Roman possessions in Asia as well as Egypt. A war between the two empires was the direct consequence. After a severe contest, peace was restored, shortly after the murder of Alexander, in 235, each nation retaining the possessions which they held before the breaking out of the war.—2. Sapor I. (Shapur), the son and successor of Artaxerxes I., reigned 241–272. He carried on war first against Gordian, and afterwards against Valerian. The latter emperor was defeated by Sapor, taken prisoner, and kept in captivity for the remainder of his life. After the capture of Valerian, Sapor conquered Syria, destroyed Antioch, and having made himself master of the passes in the Taurus, laid Tarsus in ashes and took Caesarea. His further progress was stopped by Odenathus and Zenobia, who drove the king back beyond the Euphrates, and founded a new empire, over which they ruled at Palmyra. In his reign lived the celebrated Mani, who, endeavouring to amalgamate the Christian and Zoroastrian religions, gave rise to the famous sect of the Manichaeans, who spread over the whole East, exposing themselves to most sanguinary persecutions from both Christians and fire-worshippers.—3. Hormisdas I. (Hormuz), son of the preceding, who reigned only one year, and died 274.—4. Varanes or Vararanes I. (Bahram or Bahram), son of Hormisdas I., reigned 274–277. He carried on unprofitable wars against Zenobia, and, after her captivity, was involved in a contest with Aurelian, which, however, was not attended with any serious results, on account of the sudden death of Aurelian in 275. In his reign Mani was put to death.—5. Varanes II. (Bahram), son of Varanes I., reigned 277–294. He was defeated by Carus, who took both Seleucia and Ctesiphon, and his dominions were only saved from further conquests by the sudden death of Carus (283).—6. Varanes III. (Bahram), elder son of Varanes II., died after a reign of eight months, 294.—7. Narses (Narsi), younger son of Varanes II., reigned 294–303. He carried on a formidable war against the emperor Diocletian. The Roman army was commanded by Galerius Caesar, who in the first campaign (296) sustained most signal defeats in Mesopotamia, and fled in disgrace to Antioch. In the second campaign Narses was defeated with great loss, and was obliged to conclude a peace with the Romans, by which he ceded to Diocletian Mesopotamia, S. Armenia as far as lake Thospitis, including all the valley of the Upper Tigris, that river being in its lower course the boundary between the two empires. The Romans had also the supremacy over Iberia. In 303 Narses abdicated in favour of his son, and died soon afterwards.—8. Hormisdas II. (Hormuz), son of Narses, reigned 303–310. During his reign nothing of importance happened regarding Rome.—9. Sapor II. Postumus (Shapur), son of Hormisdas II., was born after the death of his father, and was crowned in his mother's womb, the Magi placing the diadem with great solemnity upon the body of his mother. He reigned 310–381. His reign was signalised by a cruel persecution of the Christians. He carried on war for many years against Constantius II. and his successors. The armies of Constantius were repeatedly defeated; Julian, as is related elsewhere [JULIANUS], perished in battle, and the war was at length brought to a conclusion by Jovian ceding to the Persians the five provinces beyond the Tigris, and the fortresses of Nisibis, Singara, &c. Iberia and Armenia were left to their fate, and were completely reduced by Sapor in 365 and the following year. Sapor has been surnamed the Great, and no Persian king had ever caused such terror to Rome as this monarch.—10. Artaxerxes II. (Ardashir), the successor of Sapor II., reigned 381–385. He was a prince of royal blood, but was not a son of Sapor.—11. Sapor III. (Shapur), reigned 385–390. He sent an embassy to Theodosius the Great, with splendid presents, which was returned by a Greek embassy headed by Stilichos going to Persia. Owing to these diplomatic transactions, an arrangement was made in 384, according to which Armenia and Iberia recovered their independence.—12. Varanes IV. (Bahram), reigned A.D. 300–404, or perhaps not so long. He was the brother of Sapor III., and founded Kermanshah, still a flourishing town.—13. Yesdigerd I. (Yezdijird), surnamed Ulathim, or the Sinner, son or brother of the preceding, reigned 404–420 or 421. He was on friendly terms with the emperor Arcadius, who is said to have appointed him the guardian of his infant son and successor, Theodosius the Younger. He concluded a peace with Arcadius for 100 years.—14. Varanes V. (Bahram), son of Yesdigerd I., surnamed Gour, or the 'Wild Ass,' on account of his passion for the chase of that animal, reigned 420 or 421–448. He persecuted his Christian subjects with such severity that thousands of them took refuge within the Roman dominions. He carried on war with Theodosius, which was terminated by a peace for 100 years, which peace lasted till the twelfth year of the reign of the emperor Anastasius. During the latter part of his reign Varanes carried on wars against the Huns, Turks, and Indians, in which he is said to have achieved those valorous deeds for which he has ever since continued to be a favourite hero in Persian poetry. He was accidentally drowned in a deep water-tank together with his horse, and neither man nor beast ever rose again.—15. Yezdigerd II., son of the preceding, reigned 448–458. The persecutions against the Christians were renewed by him with unheard of cruelty. His relations with Rome were peaceful.—16. Hormisdas III. (Hormuz), and 17. Peroses (Firoze), sons of the preceding, claimed the succession, and rose in arms against each other. Peroses gained the throne by the assistance of the White Huns, against whom he turned his sword in after years. He perished in a great battle with them in 484, together with all of his sons except Pallas and Cobades.—18. Pallas (Pallash), who reigned 484–488, had to contest the throne with Cobades. He fell in battle fighting against his brother Cobades in 488.—19. Cobades (Kobad), reigned 488–498, and again 501 or 502–531. The years from 498 till 502, were filled up by the short reign of 20. Zames (Jamaspes). The latter was the brother of Cobades, whom he dethroned and compelled to fly to the Huns, with whose assistance Cobades recovered his throne about 502. He carried on war with success against the emperor Anastasius; but in consequence of the Huns, who had previously been his auxiliaries, turning their arms against him, he made peace with Anastasius in 505, on receiving 11,000 pounds of gold as an indemnity. He also restored Mesopotamia and his other conquests to the Romans, being unable to maintain his authority there on account of the protracted war with the Huns. About this time the Romans constructed the fortress of Dara, the strongest bulwark against Persia, and situated in the very face of Ctesiphon. The war with Constantinople was renewed in 521, in the reign of the emperor Justin I.—21. Chosroes I. (Khosru or Khosrew), surnamed Nushirwan, or 'the generous mind,' reigned 531–579. He carried on several wars against the Romans. The first war was finished in 532 or 533, Justinian having purchased peace by an annual tribute of 440,000 pieces of gold. One of the conditions of Chosroes was, that seven Greek, but Pagan, philosophers who had resided some time at the Persian court, should be allowed to live in the Roman empire without being subject to the imperial laws against Pagans. The second war lasted from 540 to 561. Peace was concluded on condition of Justinian promising an annual tribute of 40,000 pieces of gold, and receiving in return the cession of the Persian claims upon Colchis and Lazica. The third war broke out in 571, in the reign of Justin II., but Chosroes died before it was concluded. Chosroes was one of the greatest kings of Persia. In his protracted wars with the Romans he disputed the field with the conquerors of Africa and Italy, and with those very generals, Tiberius and Mauricius, who brought Persia to the brink of ruin but a few years after his death. His empire extended from the Indus to the Red Sea, and large tracts in Central Asia, perhaps a portion of eastern Europe, recognised him for a time as their sovereign. He received embassies and presents from the remotest kings of Asia and Africa. His internal government was despotic and cruel, but of that firm description which pleases Orientals, so that he still lives in the memory of the Persians as a model of justice. He provided for all the wants of his subjects, and agriculture, trade, and learning were equally protected by him. He caused the best Greek, Latin, and Indian works to be translated into Persian.—22. Hormisdas IV. (Hormuz), son of Chosroes, reigned 579–590. He continued the war with the Romans, which had been bequeathed him by his father, but was defeated successively by Mauricius and Heraclius. Hormisdas was deprived of his sight, and subsequently put to death by the Persian aristocracy.—23. Varanes VI. (Bahram) Shubin, a royal prince, usurped the throne on the death of Hormisdas, and reigned 590–591. Unable to maintain the throne against Chosroes, who was supported by the emperor Mauricius, he fled to the Turks.—24. Chosroes II. (Khosru) Purwiz, reigned 590 or 591–628. He was the son of Hormisdas IV., and recovered his father's throne with the assistance of the emperor Mauricius. After the murder of Mauricius, Chosroes declared war against the tyrant Phocas, and met with extraordinary success. In several successive campaigns he conquered Mesopotamia, Syria, Palestine, Egypt, Asia Minor, and finally pitched his camp at Chalcedon, opposite Constantinople. At length Heraclius saved the empire from the brink of ruin, and in a series of splendid campaigns not only recovered the provinces which the Romans had lost, but carried his victorious arms into the heart of the Persian empire. Borne down by his misfortunes, and worn out by age and fatigue, Chosroes resolved, in 628, to abdicate in favour of his son Merdaza; but Shirweh, or Siroes, his eldest son, anticipated his design, and at the head of a band of conspirators seized upon the person of his father, deposed him, and put him to death. The Orientals say that Chosroes reigned six years too long. No Persian king lived in such splendour as Chosroes; and however extraordinary the Eastern accounts respecting his magnificence may be, they are true in the main, as is attested by the Western writers.—25. Siroes (Shirweh), reigned only eight months, 628. He concluded peace with the emperor Heraclius. The numerous captives were restored on both sides. Siroes also restored the holy cross which had been taken at the conquest of Jerusalem.—26. Artaxerxes III. (Ardashir), the infant son of Siroes, was murdered a few days after the death of his father. He was the last male Sassanid. After him the throne was disputed by a host of candidates of both sexes and doubtful descent, who had no sooner ascended the throne than they were hurried from it into death or captivity.—The last king was Yesdigerd III., who was defeated and slain in 651 by Kaleb, the general of the khalif Abu-Bekr. Persia now became a Mohammedan country.

Sassula, a town in Latium, belonging to the territory of Tiber (Liv. vii. 19).

Sātāla (τὰ Σάταλα, ἡ Σαρδῶνα). 1. (Sadagh), a considerable town in the NE. of Armenia Minor, important as the key of the mountain passes into Pontus. It stood at the junction of four roads leading to places on the Euxine, a little N. of the Euphrates, in a valley surrounded by mountains, 325 Roman miles from Caesarea in Cappadocia, and 185 from Trapezus. Under the later Roman empire, it was the station of the 15th legion. (Ptol. i. 15, 9; Dio Cass. lxxviii. 18; Procop. Aed. iv. 3.)—2. (Sandal), a town in Lydia, near the Hermus, and on the road from Sardis to Ceramon Agora.

Sātīcūla (Saticulanus), a town of Samnium, situated upon a mountain on the frontiers of Campania, probably upon one of the furthest heights of the mountain chain of Cajazzo (Liv. vii. 32). It was conquered by the Romans and colonised B.C. 313 (Liv. ix. 21, 22; Vell. Pat. i. 14).

Satnīōis (Σατνιόεις: Tuzla), a river in the S. of the Troad, rising in M. Ida, and flowing W. into the Aegean N. of Prom. Lectum, between Larissa and Hamaxitus. (Il. vi. 34, xxi. 87; Strab. p. 605.)

Satrae (Σάτραι), a Thracian people in the hill country between the Nestus and the Strymon (Hdt. vii. 110).

Satricum (Satricanus: Casale di Conca), a town in Latium, near Antium, to the territory of which it belonged (Dionys. v. 61; Liv. ii. 39, vi. 7). It was destroyed by the Romans in B.C. 348 (Liv. vii. 27), but was rebuilt by the Antistates (Liv. viii. 1). It was taken by Papirius in 320, after which time it seems to have had no importance (Liv. ix. 12, xxviii. 11).

Sātūrae Palus (Lago di Paola), a lake or marsh in Latium, formed by the river Nymphaeus, and near the promontory Circeium. [POMPTINAE PALUDES.]

Sātūrium or Satureium, the name of a district near Tarentum (Steph. Byz. s.v.), possibly an old native name for the region in which Tarentum was built (cf. Strab. p. 279; Verg. Georg. ii. 197). There is no good authority for the statement that there was a town of that name. Horace uses the adjective Satureianus (of a breed of horses: Sat. i. 6, 59) as equivalent to Tarentinus.

Sātūrnīa. 1. An ancient name of Italy [ITALIA].—2. (Saturninus: Saturnia), formerly called Aurinia, an ancient town of Etruria, said to have been founded by the Pelasgians, was situated in the territory of Caletta, on the road from Rome to Cosa, about twenty miles from the sea (Dionys. i. 20; Plin. iii. 52). It was colonised by the Romans, B.C. 183 (Liv. xxxix. 55; Ptol. iii. 1, 49). The ancient town was rather more than two miles in circuit, and there are still remains of its walls and tombs. The tombs are not of the Etruscan type, and probably were the work of an earlier race.

Sātūrnīnus I., one of the Thirty Tyrants, was a general of Valerian, by whom he was much beloved. Disgusted by the debauchery of Gallienus, he accepted from the soldiers the title of emperor, but was put to death by the troops, who could not endure the sternness of his discipline. (Trebell. Poll. Trig. Tyr. 22.)—II., a native of Gaul, and an able officer, was appointed by Aurelian commander of the Eastern frontier, and was proclaimed emperor at Alexandria during the reign of Probus. He was eventually slain by the soldiers of Probus, although the emperor would willingly have spared his life. (Vopisc. Saturn.)

Saturninus, L. Antōnīus, governor of Upper Germany in the reign of Domitian, raised a rebellion against that emperor, A.D. 91, but was defeated and put to death by Appius Maximus, the general of Domitian (Suet. Dom. 6, 7; Dio Cass. lxxvii. 11; Mart. iv. 11).

Saturninus, L. Appuleius, was quaestor B.C. 104, and tribune of the plebs for the first time 102. He entered into a close alliance with Marius and his friends, and soon acquired great popularity. He became a candidate for the tribunate for the second time 100. At the same time Glaucia, who next to Saturninus was the greatest demagogue of the day, offered himself as a candidate for the praetorship, and Marius for the consulship. Marius and Glaucia carried their elections; but A. Nonius, a partisan of the aristocracy, was chosen tribune instead of Saturninus. Nonius, however, was murdered on the same evening by the emissaries of Glaucia and Saturninus; and early the following morning, Saturninus was chosen to fill up the vacancy. As soon as he had entered upon his tribunate, he brought forward an agrarian law which led to the banishment of Metellus Numidicus, as is related elsewhere. [METELLUS, No. 10.] Saturninus proposed other popular measures, with the object of embarrassing the senate, such as a Lex Frumentaria, reducing the price fixed in 123 B.C. for the dole of corn, and a law for founding new colonies in Sicily, Achaia, and Macedonia. By these measures he and his associates won over the populace to their side, but were opposed by the aristocracy and by the moneyed classes. Saturninus and Glaucia went further in their schemes than Marius, and were no longer supported by him, so that loss of office would have been fatal to them. In the comitia for the election of the magistrates for the following year, Saturninus obtained the tribunate for the third time, and along with him there was chosen a certain Equitius, a runaway slave, who pretended to be a son of Tib. Gracchus. Glaucia was at the same time a candidate for the consulship; the two other candidates were M. Antonius and C. Memmius. The election of M. Antonius was certain, and the struggle lay between Glaucia and Memmius. As the latter seemed likely to carry his election, Saturninus and Glaucia hired some ruffians who murdered him openly in the comitia. This last act produced a complete reaction against Saturninus and his associates. The senate declared them public enemies, and ordered the consuls to put them down by force. Marius was unwilling to act against his friends, but he had no alternative, and his backwardness was compensated by the zeal of others. Driven out of the forum, Saturninus, Glaucia, and the quaestor Saufeius took refuge in the Capitol, but the partisans of the senate cut off the pipes which supplied the Capitol with water. Unable to hold out any longer, they surrendered to Marius. The latter did all he could to save their lives: as soon as they descended from the Capitol, he placed them for security in the Curia Hostilia, but the mob pulled off the roof of the senate-house, and pelted them with the tiles till they died. The senate gave their sanction to these proceedings by rewarding with the citizenship a slave of the name of Scaeva who claimed the honour of having killed Saturninus. (App. B. C. i. 28–32; Plut. Mar. 28–30; Vell. Pat. ii. 12; Cic. pro Rabir.) Nearly forty years after these events, the tribune T. Labienus accused an aged senator Rabirius, of having been the murderer of Saturninus. An account of this trial is given elsewhere. [RABIRIUS.]

Saturninus, Claudius, a jurist, from whose Liber Singularis de Poenis Paganorum there is a single excerpt in the Digest. He was praetor under Antoninus Pius.

Saturninus, Pompeius, a contemporary of the younger Pliny, by whom he is praised as a distinguished orator, historian, and poet. Several of Pliny's letters are addressed to him (Plin. Ep. i. 8, v. 9, vii. 7).

Saturninus, C. Sentius. 1. Proprætor of Macedonia during the Social war, and probably for some time afterwards. He defeated the Thracians, who had invaded his province. (Oros. v. 18; Cic. Verr. iii. 93.)—2. One of the persons of distinguished rank who deserted Sex. Pompeius in B.C. 35, and passed over to Octavian (Vell. Pat. ii. 77; App. B. C. v. 139). He was consul in 19, and was afterwards appointed to the government of Syria. Three sons of Saturninus accompanied him as legati to Syria, and were present with their father at the trial of Herod's sons at Berytus in B.C. 6. (Dio Cass. liv. 10; Jos. Ant. xvi. 11, 3.)—3. Cn. Sentius, consul suffectus A.D. 4, governor of Syria A.D. 19 (Tac. Ann. ii. 74, 79, 81, iii. 7).

Saturninus, Venulēius, a Roman jurist, is said to have been a pupil of Papinianus, and a consiliarius of Alexander Severus. There are seventy-one excerpts from his writings in the Digest.

Saturninus, L. Volusius. 1. Consul suffectus B.C. 12, accumulated great wealth (Tac. Ann. iii. 30).—2. His son, consul suffectus A.D. 3 (Tac. Ann. xiii. 30).—3. Q., consul A.D. 56, and a commissioner for the census in Gaul A.D. 61 (Tac. Ann. xiii. 25, xiv. 46).

Saturnius, that is, a son of Saturnus, and accordingly used as a surname of Jupiter, Neptune, and Pluto. For the same reason the name of Saturnia is given both to Juno and Vesta.

Saturnus, an old Italian god of agriculture, especially connected with seed-time and harvest, his name being a contraction of Sæturnus from serere, 'to sow' (C. I. L. i. 58). He was naturally represented as wedded to the earth-goddess Ops [cf. LUGA], and with her as presiding over all forms of tillage and fruit-growing (Varro, L. L. v. 57; Fest. p. 186; Macrobi. i. 7, 24). The tendency of popular tradition to change gods of the country into ancient kings who had benefited the land, produced the version of the myth which makes Saturn an old king of Latium or of Italy who taught agriculture and civilisation, and in whose reign was the golden age. When Greek mythology was adopted, Saturn was identified with CRONUS, who in one of his aspects was a harvest god. Accordingly it was imagined that Cronus, deposed by Zeus, reigned in Latium as Saturnus. The story ran that the god came to Italy in the reign of Janus, by whom he was hospitably received, and that he formed a settlement on the Capitoline hill, which was hence called the Saturnian hill. At the foot of that hill, on the road leading up to the Capitol, there stood in after times the temple of Saturn. (Dionys. i. 19; Varro, L. L. v. 74; Macrobi. i. 7, 28; Just. xliii. 1.) Saturn then taught the people agriculture, suppressed their savage mode of life, and introduced among them civilisation and morality. The result was that the whole country was called Saturnia or the land of plenty. Saturn was suddenly removed from earth to the abodes of the gods, whereupon Janus erected an altar to him in the Forum. (Verg. Aen. viii. 319-329; Ov. Fast. i. 233; Macrobi. l. c., Arnob. iv. 24.) [As regards the old theory that Latium derived its name from Saturn's concealment there, see p. 475, b.] The connexion of Saturnus with Janus is indicated in this story. It was natural that the god of harvest should be connected with the god who presided over the year and its seasons [see p. 457, a]. Saturn, like other deities of the earth, was also worshipped as a god of the underworld and the dead, which accounts for the dedication of funeral urns to him. Respecting the festival solemnised by the Romans in honour of Saturn, see Dict. of Ant. s. v. Saturnalia. The statue of Saturnus was hollow and filled with oil (Plin. xv. 32), probably to denote the fertility of Latium in olives, and woollen fillets were wrapped about its feet, except on the days of his festival (Macrobi. i. 8, 5; Strab. Silv. i. 6, 4). This custom arose from the old superstition of binding the image of a god to secure his presence and favour: at his festival he was attracted by other means. The god was represented with a pruning knife or with a sickle, like that of Cronus (Verg. Aen. vii. 179; Mart. vi. 6, 1). The temple of Saturn was built in a very early period at the foot of the slope leading up from the Forum to the Capitol, on the site of an altar to Saturn of unknown antiquity, traditionally erected by Hercules (Dionys. i. 31, vi. 1; Liv. ii. 21). This temple was rebuilt in 42 B.C. by Munatius Plancus (Suet. Aug. 29; C.I.L. vi. 1816). In it was the State treasury (aerarium Saturni), presided over at first by quaestors and then by praefecti [see p. 807, b].

Satýri (Σάτυροι), were nature-deities or daemons of mountain forests and streams, of a subordinate or subaltern character [cf. DAEMON], and therefore especially the attendants of Dionysus, like whom they represented the luxuriant vital powers of nature. They are not mentioned by Homer, but this does not prove that they were invented after his time. On the contrary, it is probable that their deformity is due to traditions handed down from the most primitive times when the powers of nature were conceived in the form of animals of forests and mountains. The uglier parts of mythology are often passed over by Homer and reappear in Hesiod. By Hesiod (ap. Strab. p. 471) Satyrs are described as akin to the mountain nymphs and the Curetes, and as a good-for-nothing, idle race. By later writers (Xen. Symp. v. 7; Nonn. Dionys. xiv. 113) they are said to be the sons of Hermes and Ipithima, or of the Naiads. The Satyrs are represented with bristly hair, the nose broad and somewhat turned upwards, the ears pointed at the top like those of animals, with small horns growing out of the top of the forehead, and with a tail like that of a horse or goat. In works of art they are represented at different stages of life; the older ones were commonly called Sileni, and the younger ones are termed Satyrisci. The Satyrs are always described as fond of wine (whence they often appear either with a cup or a thyrsus in their hand), and of every kind of sensual pleasure, whence they are seen sleeping, playing musical instruments, or engaged in voluptuous dances with nymphs. Later writers, especially the Roman poets, confound the Satyrs with the Italian Fauni, and accordingly both Satyrs and Fauns were represented, like Pan, with horns and goat's feet, although originally they were quite distinct [p. 340, b]. Satyrs usually appear with flutes, the thyrsus, syrinx, the shepherd's staff, cups or bags filled with wine; they are dressed with the skins of animals, and wear wreaths of vine, ivy or fir. The most celebrated representation in antiquity was the Satyr of Praxiteles at Athens, which led the way in representing Satyrs in a less repulsive form. In this type they are youthful, with a wanton or roguish expression, and of their animal form nothing remains but the pointed ears and the hair coming down over the forehead. [See also cut on p. 754.]

Satyr. (From a statue in the Louvre.)

Satýrus (Σάτυρος). 1. I., king of Bosphorus, was son of Spartacus I., and reigned B.C. 407 or 406-393. He maintained friendly relations with Athens. He was slain at the siege of Theudisia in 393, and was succeeded by his son Leucon (Diod. xiv. 93).—2. II., king of Bosphorus, was the eldest of the sons of Paerisades I., whom he succeeded in 311, but reigned only nine months (Diod. xx. 22-26).—3. A comic actor at Athens, is said to have given instruction to Demosthenes in the art of giving full effect to his speeches by appropriate action (Plut. Dem. 7). Demosthenes praises him for his generosity in choosing as his gift from Philip the liberation of Olynthian captives (Dem. F. L.

p. 401, § 213).—4. A distinguished Peripatetic philosopher and historian, who lived in the time of Ptolemy Philopator, and wrote a collection of biographies, among which were Lives of Philip and Demosthenes, frequently cited by ancient writers.

Sauconna. [ARAR.]

Saufeius. 1. C., quaestor B.C. 100, was one of the partisans of Saturninus, took refuge with him in the Capitol, and was slain along with his leader, when they were obliged to surrender to Marius (Cic. pro Rab. 7; App. B. C. i. 82).—2. L., a Roman equestrian, was a friend of Atticus, and an admirer of the Epicurean philosophy. He had valuable property in Italy, which was confiscated by the triumvirs, but was restored to him through the exertions of Atticus. (Cic. ad Att. i. 3, vii. 1, xv. 4; Nep. Att. 12.)

Saurōmātae. [SARMATAE.]

Saurōmātes (Σαυρομάτης), the name of several kings of Bosphorus, who are for the most part known only from their coins. We find kings of this name reigning over Bosphorus from the time of Augustus to that of Constantine.

Saverriō, P. Sulpicius. 1. Consul B.C. 304, when he carried on the war against the Samnites. He was censor in 229 with Sempronius Sophus, his former colleague in the consulship. In their censorship two new tribes were formed, the Aniensis and Terentina (Liv. ix. 49, x. 9).—2. Son of the preceding, consul 279 with P. Decius Mus, commanded, with his colleague, against Pyrrhus (Flor. i. 18, 21; Val. Max. ix. 1).

Sāvō (Savone), a river in Campania, which flows into the sea S. of Sinuessa (Plin. iii. 6; Stat. Silv. iv. 3, 36).

Sāvus (Save or Sau), a navigable tributary of the Danube, which rises in the Carnic Alps, forms first the boundary between Noricum and Italy, and afterwards between Pannonia and Illyria, and falls into the Danube near Singidunum (Strab. pp. 207, 314; Plin. iii. 139).

Saxa, Decidiū, a native of Celtiberia, was originally one of Caesar's common soldiers (Caes. B. C. i. 66). He was tribune of the plebs in 44, and after Caesar's death in this year he took an active part in supporting the friends of his murdered patron. He served under M. Antonius in the siege of Mutina, and subsequently under both Antonius and Octavianus in their war against Brutus and Cassius. After the battle of Philippi Saxa accompanied Antony to the East, and was made by the latter governor of Syria. Here he was defeated by the younger Labienus and the Parthians, and was slain in the flight after the battle (40). (App. B. C. iv. 87, v. 102–107; Dio Cass. xlvii. 35, xlviii. 24; Cic. Phil. viii. 3, ix. 26, xii. 8, xiv. 4.)

Saxa, Q. Voconius, tribune of the plebs B.C. 169, proposed the Voconia Lex, defining a woman's rights of property and inheritance, which was supported by the elder Cato, who spoke in its favour, when he was sixty-five years of age. Respecting this law, see Dict. of Ant. s.v.

Saxa Rubra. [RUBRA SAXA.]

Saxōnes, a powerful people in Germany, who originally dwelt in the S. part of the Cimbric Chersonesus, between the rivers Albis and Chalusus (Trave), in the modern Holstein. They are not mentioned by Tacitus and Pliny, since these writers appear to have comprehended all the inhabitants of the Cimbric Chersonesus under the general name of Cimbri. The Saxones first occur in history in A.D. 286, when they are mentioned as brave and skilful sailors, who often joined the Chauci in piratical expeditions against the coast of Gaul (Eutrop. vii. 13; Oros. vii. 25). The Saxones afterwards appear at the head of a powerful confederacy of German peoples who became united under the general name of Saxons, and who eventually occupied the country between the Elbe, the Rhine, the Lippe, and the German Ocean (Ptol. ii. 11, 11). The history of their part in the conquest of Britain does not fall within the period here treated of.

Scaeva, Cassius, a centurion in Caesar's army, who distinguished himself by his valour at the battle of Dyrrhachium (Caes. B. C. iii. 53; Suet. Jul. 68; Val. Max. iii. 2, 23). He survived his numerous wounds and is mentioned as one of the partisans of Caesar, after the death of the latter (Cic. ad Att. xiii. 23, xiv. 10).

Scaevōla, Q. Cervidius, a Roman jurist, lived under Antoninus Pius. He wrote several works, and there are 307 excerpts from him in the Digest.

Scaevōla, Mucius. 1. C., the hero of a celebrated story in early Roman history. [For the probable history of the war, see PORSENNA.] When King Porsenna was blockading Rome, C. Mucius, a young man of the patrician class, resolved to rid his country of the invader. He went out of the city with a dagger hid beneath his dress, and approached the place where Porsenna was sitting, with a secretary by his side, dressed nearly in the same style as the king himself. Mistaking the secretary for the king, Mucius killed him on the spot. Being seized, he declared his name, and his design to kill the king himself, adding that there were 300 Roman youths ready to attempt his life. In reply to the threats of Porsenna, Mucius thrust his right hand into a fire which was already lighted for a sacrifice, and held it there without flinching. The king, who was amazed at his firmness, bade him go away free. Porsenna being alarmed for his life, which he could not secure against so many desperate men, made proposals of peace to the Romans, and evacuated the territory. Mucius received the name of Scaevola, or left-handed, from the loss of his right hand. The patricians gave him a tract of land beyond the Tiber, which was thenceforth called Mucia Prata (Liv. ii. 13). The Mucius of this story was a patrician; but the Mucii of the historical period were plebeians.—2. Q., praetor B.C. 215, had Sardinia for his province, where he remained for the next three years. He was decemvir sacrorum, and died 209. (Liv. xxiii. 24, xxvii. 8).—3. Q., probably son of No. 2, was praetor 179, with Sicily for his province, and consul 174 (Liv. xl. 44).—4. P., brother of No. 3, was praetor with his brother 179, and consul 175. In his consulship he gained a victory over the Ligurians. (Liv. xl. 44, xli. 19).—5. P., called by Plutarch ὁ νομοδότης, probably son of No. 4, was tribune of the plebs 141, praetor urbanus 136, and consul 133, the year in which Tib. Gracchus lost his life (Plut. Gracch. 9). In 131 he succeeded his brother Mucianus [MUCIANUS] as Pontifex Maximus (Cic. de Or. ii. 12, 52). Scaevola was distinguished for his knowledge of the Jus Pontificium. He was also famed for his skill in playing at ball, as well as at the game called Duodecim Scripta (Cic. de Or. i. 50, 217; Val. Max. viii. 8, 2; Quint. xi. 2, 38). His fame as a lawyer is recorded by Cicero in several passages (Cic. de Leg. ii. 19, 47, de Or. i. 37, 170). There is no excerpt from his writings in the Digest, but he is cited several times by the jurists whose works were used for that compilation.—6. Q., called the Augur, was son of No. 3, and married the daughter of C. Laelius, the friend of Scipio Africanus the younger (Cic. de Amic. 8, 26, Brut. 26, 101). He was tribune of the plebs 128, plebeian aedile 125, and as praetor was governor of the province of Asia in 121, the year in which C. Gracchus lost his life. He was prosecuted after his return from his province for the offence of repetundae, in 120, by T. Albucius, but was acquitted. He was consul 117. He lived at least to the tribunate of P. Sulpicius Rufus, 88. Cicero, who was born 106, informs us that, after he had put on the toga virilis, his father took him to Scaevola, who was then an old man, and that he kept as close to him as he could, in order to profit by his remarks (Cic. de Amic. 1). After his death Cicero became a hearer of Q. Mucius Scaevola, the Pontifex. The Augur was distinguished for his knowledge of the law (Vell. Pat. ii. 9, 2; Cic. Brut. 58, 212), but none of his writings are recorded.—Mucia, the Augur's daughter, married L. Licinius Crassus, the orator, who was consul 95, with Q. Mucius Scaevola, the Pontifex Maximus; whence it appears that the Q. Mucius who is one of the speakers in the treatise de Oratore, is not the Pontifex and the colleague of Crassus, but the Augur, the father-in-law of Crassus. He is also one of the speakers in the Laelius sive de Amicitia (c. 1), and in the de Republica (i. 12).—7. Q., PONTIFEX MAXIMUS, was son of No. 5, and is quoted by Cicero as an example of a son who aimed at excellence in that which had given his father distinction (de Off. i. 32, 116). He was tribune of the plebs in 106, curule aedile in 104, and consul 95, with Licinius Crassus, the orator, as his colleague. After his consulship Scaevola was the governor (proconsul) of the province of Asia, in which capacity he gained the esteem of the people who were under his government. Subsequently he was made Pontifex Maximus, by which title he is often distinguished from Q. Mucius the Augur. He lost his life in the consulship of C. Marius the younger and Cn. Papirius Carbo (82), having been proscribed by the Marian party, from which we may conclude that he belonged to Sulla's party. His body was thrown into the Tiber. (Vell. Pat. ii. 26; Flor. iii. 21; Cic. de Or. iii. 3, 9; Lucan, ii. 126; App. B. C. i. 88.) The virtues of Scaevola are recorded by Cicero, who, after the death of the Augur, became an attendant (auditor) of the Pontifex. The purity of his moral character (Cic. de Off. iii. 15, 62), his exalted notions of equity and fair dealing, his abilities as an administrator, an orator, and a jurist, place him among the first of the illustrious men of all ages and countries. He was, says Cicero, the most eloquent of jurists, and the most learned jurist among orators (de Or. i. 39, 180; cf. Hor. Ep. ii. 2, 89). He is cited by Quintilian (xi. 2, 38) as an instance of a man with a strong memory. Q. Scaevola the Pontifex is the first Roman to whom we can attribute a scientific and systematic handling of the Jus Civile, which he accomplished in a work in eighteen books. He also wrote a Liber Singularis περί ὅρων, a work on Definitions, or perhaps, rather, short rules of law, from which there are four excerpts in the Digest. This is the oldest work from which there are any excerpts in the Digest, and even these may have been taken at second hand.

Scaevus, or Scaevius Memor, a tragic poet of the time of Domitian (Mart. xi. 9, 10; Schol. ad Juv. i. 20).

Scaldis (Scheldt), an important river in the N. of Gallia Belgica, flowing into the ocean, but which Caesar erroneously makes a tributary of the Mosa (B. G. vi. 33; Plin. iv. 98, 105). Ptolemy calls this river Tabudas or Tabullas, which name it is said to have borne in the middle ages under the form of Tabul or Tabula (Ptol. ii. 3, 9).

Scallabis (Santarem), a town in Lusitania, on the road from Olisipo to Emerita and Bracara, also a Roman colony with the surname Praesidium Julium, and the seat of one of the three Conventus Juridici of the province (Plin. iv. 117). The town is erroneously called Scalabiscus by Ptolemy (ii. 5, 7).

Scāmander (Σκάμανδρος), the celebrated river of the Troad. [TROAS.] As a mythological personage, the river-god was called Xanthus by the gods. His contest with Achilles is described by Homer (Il. xxi. 136, foll.).

Scamandrius. [ASTYANAX.]

Scambōnidae (Σκαμβωνίδαί), a demus in Attica, between Athens and Eleusis, belonging to the tribe Leontis.

Scampa (Σκάμπα: Skumbi or Iscampi), a town in the interior of Greek Illyria, on the Via Egnatia between Clodiana and Lychnidus. [ILLYRICUM.]

Scandēa (Σκάνδεια), a port-town on the E. side of the island Cythera, forming the harbour of the town of Cythera, from which it was ten stadia distant. [CYTHERA.]

Scandīa, Scandināvia or Scatinavia, the name given by the ancients to the islands in the Baltic, Fünen, Zealand and Laaland, and vaguely also to the coasts of Sweden and Norway. Even the later Romans had a very imperfect knowledge of the Scandinavian peninsula, though some knowledge of the Baltic had probably been gathered by Pytheas [see p. 781, b]. They supposed it to have been surrounded by the ocean, and to have been composed of several islands called by Ptolemy Scandiae. Of these the largest bore especially the name of Scandia or Scandinavia. It was said to have a lofty mountain called Sevo, and to be washed by the Sinus Codanus (Cattegat?). (Mel. iii. 3, 6; Ptol. ii. 11, 33; Plin. iv. 96.) This country was inhabited by the Hilleuones, of whom the Suiones and Sitones appear to have been tribes (Plin. l. c.; Tac. Germ. 44).

Scandīla (Scandole), a small island in the NE. of the Aegæan sea, between Peparethos and Scyros (Plin. iv. 72; Mel. ii. 7, 8).

Scantīa Silva, a wood in Campania, in which were probably the Aquae Scantiae mentioned by Pliny (Cic. de Leg. Agr. i. 1, 3; Plin. ii. 240).

Scaptē Hylē (Σκαπή ὕλη), also called, but less correctly, Scaptēsytle (Σκαπησύλη), a small town on the coast of Thrace opposite the island of Thasos. It contained celebrated gold mines, which were originally worked by the Thasians. Thucydides, who had some property in these mines, retired to this place after his banishment from Athens, and here arranged the materials for his history. (Plut. Cim. 4, de Exil. p. 605; Marcell. Thuc. 19.)

Scaptīa (Scaptiensis or Scaptius), an ancient town in Latium, which gave its name to a Roman tribe, but disappeared at an early period (Dionys. v. 61; Liv. viii. 17; Plin. iii. 68).

Scaptius, P., a Roman trader in Cilicia who lent money to people of Salamis in Cyprus, and enforced usurious terms by the aid of the troops of App. Claudius. Cicero very properly refused to support him, and deprived him of the prefecture of Salamis, which Claudius had given him (Cic. ad Att. v. 21, vi. 1-3, xv. 13).

Scapula, P. Ostorius. 1. Succeeded A. Plautius as governor of Britain, about A.D. 50. He defeated the powerful tribe of the Silures, took prisoner their king Caractacus, and sent him in chains to Rome. In consequence of this success he received the insignia of a triumph, but died soon afterwards in the province. (Tac. Ann. xii. 31-39, Agr. 14.)—2. Son of the preceding, fought with distinction under his father; was accused of treason by Sossianus and condemned to death by Nero (Tac. Ann. xii. 31, xiv. 48, xvi. 14).

Scarbantia, or Scarabantia (Oedenburg), a town in Pannonia Superior on the road from Vindobona to Poetovio, and a municipium with the surname Flavia Augusta (Ptol. ii. 15, 5; Plin. iii. 146; C. I. L. iii. 4192).

Scardōna (Σκαρδῶνα or Σκαρδών: Skardona or Skardin), the chief town of Liburnia in Illyria, on the right bank of the Titius, twelve miles from its mouth, the seat of a Conventus Juridicus (Strab. p. 315; Plin. iii. 139).

Scardus, Scodrus or Scordus Mons (τὸ Σκαρδὸν ὄρος: Schar), a range of lofty mountains to the E. of Scodra, between Illyria and Dardania, and dividing the head waters of the Axios from the Drilon (Ptol. ii. 16, 1; Pol. xviii. 8; Liv. xliii. 20, xlv. 31.)

Scarphē, Scarphēa or Scarphīa (Σκαρφή, Σκαρφεῖα, Σκαρφήα: Skarphēus, Skarphēus, Skarphaῖos, Skarphios), a town of the Epimenidii Locri, ten stadia from the coast, at which the roads united leading through Thermopylae. It possessed a harbour on the coast, probably at the mouth of the river Boagrius. (Il. ii. 532; Strab. p. 426; Paus. viii. 15, 3; Liv. xxxiii. 3.)

Scarponna (Charpeigne), a town in Gallia Belgica on the Mosella, and on the road from Tullum to Divodurum (Amm. Marc. xvii. 2).

Scato or Cato, Vettius, one of the Italian generals in the Marsic war, B.C. 90. He defeated the consuls L. Julius Caesar and P. Rutilius Lupus in two successive battles. He was afterwards taken prisoner, and was stabbed to death by his own slave as he was being dragged before the Roman general, being thus delivered from the ignominy and punishment that awaited him. (App. B. C. i. 40-43; Sen. de Benef. iii. 23.)

Scaurus, Aemilius. 1. M., raised his family from obscurity to the highest rank among the Roman nobles. He was born in B.C. 163. His father, notwithstanding his patrician descent, had been obliged, through poverty, to carry on the trade of a charcoal-merchant, and left his son a very slender patrimony. The latter had thought at first of carrying on the trade of a money-lender; but he finally resolved to devote himself to the study of eloquence, with the hope of rising to the honours of the state. (Aurel. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 72; Val. Max. iv. 4, 11; Plut. Q. R. 50.) Cicero speaks highly of his eloquence (Brut. 29, 111). He was curule aedile in 123. He obtained the consulship in 115, when he carried on war with success against several of the Alpine tribes. In 112 he was sent at the head of an embassy to Jugurtha; and in 111 he accompanied the consul L. Calpurnius Bestia as one of his legates in the war against Jugurtha. The Numidian king bestowed large sums of money upon both Bestia and Scaurus, in consequence of which the consul granted the king most favourable terms of peace. This disgraceful transaction excited the greatest indignation at Rome, and C. Mamilius, the tribune of the plebs, 110, brought forward a bill by which an inquiry was to be instituted against all those who had received bribes from Jugurtha. Although Scaurus had been one of the most guilty, such was his influence in the state that he contrived to be appointed one of the three quaesitores who were elected under the bill for the purpose of prosecuting the criminals. But though he thus secured himself, he was unable to save any of his accomplices. Bestia and many others were condemned (Sull. Jug. 15, 25, 28, 40). In 109 Scaurus was censor with M. Livius Drusus. In his consulship he restored the Milvian bridge, and constructed the Aemilian road, which ran by Pisae and Luna as far as Dertona (Strab. p. 217). In 107, he was elected consul a second time, in place of L. Cassius Longinus, who had fallen in battle against the Tigurini. In the struggles between the aristocratical and popular parties, Scaurus was always a warm supporter of the former. He was several times accused of different offences, chiefly by his private enemies, but such was his influence in the state that he was always acquitted. He died about 89. By his wife, Caecilia, Scaurus had three children, two sons mentioned below, and a daughter, Aemilia, first married to M'. Glabrio, and next to Cn. Pompey, subsequently the triumvir. He wrote an autobiography, of which nothing remains (Cic. Brut. 29, 112; Plin. xxxiii. 21).—2. M., eldest son of the preceding, and stepson of the dictator Sulla, whom his mother, Caecilia, married after the death of his father. In the third Mithridatic war he served under Pompey as quaestor. The latter sent him to Damascus with an army, and from thence he marched into Judaea, to settle the disputes between the brothers Hyrcanus and Aristobulus. Scaurus was left by Pompey in the command of Syria with two legions. During his government of Syria he made a predatory incursion into Arabia Petraea, but withdrew on the payment of 300 talents by Aretas, the king of the country. (Jos. Ant. xiv. 3, B. J. i. 7; App. Syr. 51.) He was curule aedile in 58, when he celebrated the public games with extraordinary splendour. The temporary theatre which he built accommodated 80,000 spectators, and was adorned in the most magnificent manner. The combats of wild beasts were equally astonishing: 150 panthers were exhibited in the circus, and five crocodiles and a hippopotamus were seen for the first time at Rome. (Cic. Sest. 54, 116, de Off. ii. 16, 57; Plin. xxxvi. 114.) In 56 he was praetor, and in the following year governed the province of Sardinia, which he plundered without mercy. On his return to Rome he was accused of the crime of repetundae. He was defended by Cicero, in the speech of which fragments only remain, Hortensius, and others, and was acquitted, notwithstanding his guilt. (Ascon. Argum. ad Scaur.) He was accused again in 52, under Pompey's new law against ambitus, and was condemned. [See also references in Index to Cicero.] He married Mucia, who had been previously the wife of Pompey, and by her he had one son [No. 4].—3. Younger son of No. 1, fought under the proconsul Q. Catulus against the Cimbri at the Athesis, and having fled from the field, was indignantly commanded by his father not to come into his presence; whereupon the youth put an end to his life (Val. Max. v. 8, 4; Front. Strat. iv. 1, 3).—4. M., son of No. 2 and Mucia, the former wife of Pompey the triumvir, and consequently the half-brother of Sex. Pompey. He accompanied the latter into Asia, after the defeat of his fleet in Sicily, but betrayed him into the hands of the generals of M. Antonius, in 35. After the battle of Actium, he fell into the power of Octavian, and escaped death, to which he had been sentenced, only through the intercession of his mother, Mucia. (App. B. C. v. 142; Dio Cass. li. 2, lvi. 38.)—5. Mamercus, son of No. 5, was a distinguished orator and poet, but of a lazy and dissolute character (Tac. Ann. iii. 66, vi. 29; Sen. Contr. x. praef. 2). He was a member of the senate at the time of the accession of Tiberius, A.D. 14, when he offended this suspicious emperor by some remarks which he made in the senate. Being accused of majestas in 34, he put an end to his own life (Dio Cass. lviii. 24).

Scaurus, M. Aurélius, consul suffectus B.C. 108, and three years afterwards consular legate in Gaul, where he was defeated by the Cimbri, taken prisoner, and put to death (Liv. Ep. 67; Tac. Germ. 37; Vell. Pat. ii. 12).

Scaurus, Q. Terentius, a celebrated grammarian who flourished under the emperor Hadrian, and whose son was one of the preceptors of the emperor Verus. He was the author of an Ars Grammatica and of commentaries upon Plautus, Virgil, and the Ars Poëtica of Horace. (Gell. xi. 15; Capitol. Ver. 2, 5; Charis. i. 133, 136.) An abstract survives of a treatise entitled Q. Terentii Scauri de Orthographia ad Theseum, and of another on Adverbs and Prepositions. They are included in the Grammaticae Latinae Auctores Antiqui of Putschius (Hannov. 1605).

Sceleratus Campus. [ROMA, p. 804, b.]

Scēnae (Σκηναί, i.e. the tents), a town of Mesopotamia, on the borders of Babylonia, on a canal of the Euphrates, twenty-five days' journey below Zeugma (Strab. p. 748). It belonged to the SCENITAE, and was probably only a collection of tents or huts.

Scenitae (Σκηνῖται, i.e. dwellers in tents), the general name used by the Greeks for the Bedawee (Bedouin) tribes of Arabia Deserta (Plin. vi. 125).

Scepsis (Σκηψίς: prob. Eski-Upshi or Eski-Shupshe, Ru.), an ancient city in the interior of the Troad, SE. of Alexandria Troas, in the mountains of Ida. Its inhabitants were removed by Antigonius to Alexandria, but being permitted by Lysimachus to return to their homes, they built a new city, called ἡ νέα κώμη, and the remains of the old town were then called Παλαισκήψις (Strab. pp. 603, 607, 635). Scepsis is celebrated in literary history as the place where certain MSS. of Aristotle and Theophrastus were buried, to prevent their transference to Pergamum. When dug up again, they were found nearly destroyed by mould and worms, and in this condition they were removed by Sulla to Athens. (Strab. p. 608; ARISTOTELES.) The philosopher Metrodorus and the grammarian Demetrius were natives of Scepsis.

Scerdilaidas, or Scerdilaedus (Σκερδिलाίδας or Σκερδ(λ)αιδος), king of Illyria, was in all probability a son of Pleuratus, and younger brother of Agron, both of them kings of that country. After the defeat and abdication of Teuta (B.C.

229), he probably succeeded to a portion of her dominions, but did not assume the title of king till after the death of his nephew Pinnes (Pol. ii. 5, 6). He carried on war for some years against Philip, king of Macedonia, and thus appears as an ally of the Romans. He probably died about 205, and was succeeded by his son Pleuratus. (Pol. v. 95–110; Liv. xxvi. 24, xxvii. 30, xxix. 12.)

Schedia (Σχεδία), a town of Lower Egypt, on the canal which connected Alexandria with the Canopic arm of the Nile (Strab. pp. 800, 803).

Schēdius (Σχέδιος). 1. Son of Iphitus and Hippolyte, commanded the Phocians in the war against Troy, along with his brother Epistrophus. He was slain by Hector, and his remains were carried from Troy to Anticyra in Phocis. (Il. ii. 517, xvii. 306; Paus. x. 4, 1.)—

2. Son of Perimedes, likewise a Phocian, who was killed at Troy by Hector (Il. xv. 515; Strab. p. 424).

Scheria. [PHAEACES.]

Schoenus (Σχοῖνος: Σχοινιεύς), a town of Boeotia, on a river of the same name, and on the road from Thebes to Anthedon (Il. ii. 497; Strab. p. 408). It was (in the Boeotian story) the birthplace of Atalanta (Paus. viii. 35, 10; Stat. Theb. vii. 267).

Schoenūs (Σχοινούς, -οὔντος). 1. A harbour of Corinth, N. of Cenchreae, at the narrowest part of the isthmus (Strab. pp. 369, 380).—2. A place in the interior of Arcadia near Methydrium (Paus. viii. 35, 10).

Sciathus (Σκιάθος: Σκιάθιος: Skiathos), a small island in the Aegaeon sea, N. of Euboea and E. of the Magnesian coast of Thessaly, with a town of the same name upon it. It is said to have been originally colonised by Pelasgians from Thrace (Strab. p. 436; Plin. iv. 72). It is frequently mentioned in the history of the invasion of Greece by Xerxes, since the Persian and Grecian fleets were stationed near its coasts (Hdt. vii. 176, viii. 7). It subsequently became one of the subject allies of Athens, but attained such little prosperity that it only had to pay the small tribute of 200 drachmae yearly. Its chief town was destroyed by the last Philip of Macedonia. At a later time it was restored by Antonius to the Athenians (App. B. C. v. 7).

Scidrus (Σκίδρος), a place in the S. of Italy of uncertain site, in which some of the Sybarites settled after the destruction of their own city (Hdt. vi. 21).

Scillus (Σκιλλοῦς, -οὔντος: Σκιλλοῦντιος, Σκιλλοῦσιος), a town of Elis, in the district Triphylia, on the river Selinus, twenty stadia S. of Olympia. It was destroyed by the Eleans in the war which they carried on against the Pisaeans, whose cause had been espoused by the inhabitants of Scillus (Paus. v. 6, 43, vi. 22, 4). The Lacedaemonians subsequently took possession of the territory of Scillus; and although the Eleans still laid claim to it, it was given to Xenophon after his banishment from Athens. Xenophon resided at this place for more than twenty years, and erected here a sanctuary to Artemis, which he had vowed during the retreat of the Ten Thousand. A statue of Xenophon was seen here by Pausanias. (Xen. An. v. 3, 7; Paus. v. 6, 5; Strab. p. 344.)

Scingomagus (Césanne), a small place in the Cottian Alps, on the Italian side of the pass of Mt. Genèvre [ALPES], about five miles above Ocelum (Oulx).

Sciōnē (Σκιώνη: Σκιωνῆος, Σκιωνεύς), the chief town in the Macedonian peninsula of Palene, on the W. coast. It is said to have been founded by some Pellenians of Achaia, who settled here after their return from Troy. It revolted from the Athenians in the Peloponnesian war, but was taken by Cleon; whereupon all the men were put to death, the women and children sold as slaves, and the town given to the Plataeans. (Hdt. vii. 123, viii. 128; Thuc. iv. 120, 133. v. 32; Strab. p. 330.)

Scipio, the name of an illustrious patrician family of the Cornelia gens. This name, which signifies a stick or staff, is said to have been given to the founder of the family because he served as a staff in directing his blind father (Macrob. i. 6). This family produced some of the greatest men in Rome. The family tomb of the Scipios was discovered in 1780, on the left of the Appia Via, about 400 paces within the modern Porta S. Sebastiano. The inscriptions, of the greatest interest as specimens of early Latin, are printed in C. I. L. i. 29-39.—1. P. Cornelius Scipio, magister equitum B.C. 396, and consular tribune 395 and 394 (Liv. v. 19, 24, 31, vi. 1).—2. L. Corn. Scipio, consul 350 (Liv. vii. 21).—3. P. Corn. Scipio Barbatus, consul 328, and dictator 306. He was also pontifex maximus (Liv. ix. 44, 46).—4. L. Corn. Scipio Barbatus, consul 298, when he carried on war against the Etruscans, and defeated them near Volaterrae. He also served under the consuls in 297, 295, and 293 against the Samnites. This Scipio was the great-great-grandfather of the conqueror of Hannibal. (Liv. x. 11, 12, 14, 25, 26, 40, 41.) His epitaph, written in Saturnian verse, records victories in Samnium and Lucania (C. I. L. i. 29). The genealogy of the family can be traced with more certainty from this time.—5. Cn. Corn. Scipio Asina, son of No. 4, was consul 260, in the first Punic war. In an attempt upon the Liparaean islands, he was taken prisoner with seventeen ships. He probably recovered his liberty when Regulus invaded Africa, for he was consul a second time in 254. In this year he and his colleague A. Atilius Calatinus crossed over into Sicily, and took the town of Panormus. He obtained a triumph. (Pol. i. 21, 38; Val. Max. vi. 6, 2, vi. 9, 11; Macrob. i. 6).—6. L. Corn. Scipio, also son of No. 4, was consul 259. He drove the Carthaginians out of Sardinia and Corsica, defeating Hanno, the Carthaginian commander. He was censor in 258. (Liv. Ep. 17; Eutrop. ii. 20; Val. Max. v. 1, 2; C. I. L. i. 31).—7. P. Corn. Scipio Asina, son of No. 5, was consul 221, and carried on war, with his colleague M. Minucius Rufus, against the Istri, who were subdued by the consuls. He is mentioned again in 211, when he recommended that the senate should recall all the generals and armies from Italy for the defence of the capital, because Hannibal was marching upon the city (Liv. xxii. 34, xxvi. 8; Oros. iv. 13; Eutrop. iii. 7).—8. P. Corn. Scipio, son of No. 6, was consul, with Ti. Sempronius Longus, in 218, the first year of the second Punic war. He sailed with an army to Gaul, in order to encounter Hannibal before he crossed the Alps; but finding that Hannibal had crossed the Rhone, and had got the start of him by a three days' march, he resolved to sail back to Italy, and await Hannibal's arrival in Cisalpine Gaul. But as the Romans had an army of 25,000 men in Cisalpine Gaul, under the command of two praetors, Scipio sent into Spain the army which he had brought with him, under the command of his brother, Cn. Scipio. On his return to Italy, Scipio took the command of the army in Cisalpine Gaul, and hastened to meet Hannibal. An engagement took place between the cavalry and light-armed troops of the two armies. The Romans were defeated; the consul himself received a severe wound, and was only saved from death by the courage of his young son, Publius, the future conqueror of Hannibal. Scipio now retreated across the Ticinus, crossed the Po also, first took up his quarters at Placentia, and subsequently withdrew to the hills on the left bank of the Trebia, where he was joined by the other consul, Sempronius Longus. The latter resolved upon a battle, in opposition to the advice of his colleague. The result was the complete defeat of the Roman army, which was obliged to take refuge within the walls of Placentia. In the following year 217, Scipio, whose imperium had been prolonged, crossed over into Spain. He and his brother Cneius continued in Spain till their death in 211, and did the most important service to their country by preventing reinforcements being sent to Hannibal from Spain. In 215 they transferred the war from the Ebro to the Guadalquivir and won two great victories at Iliturgis and Intibilis. They fortified an important harbour at Tarraco and regained Saguntum, and by adroit policy induced Syphax to turn against the Carthaginians in Africa; but in 212, having to confront three armies under Hasdrubal Barca, Hasdrubal Gisgo and Mago, they enlisted 20,000 Celtiberians and divided their armies. This was a fatal step: the Spaniards were untrustworthy, and the armies of the Scipios were defeated separately and both the brothers were slain by the Carthaginians. (Pol. iii.; Liv. xxi.-xxv.; App. Annib. 5-8, Hisp. 14-16).—9. Cn. Corn. Scipio Calvus, son of No. 6, and brother of No. 8, was consul 222, with M. Claudius Marcellus. In conjunction with his colleague he carried on war against the Insubrians. In 218 he carried on war as the legate of his brother Publius for eight years in Spain, as has been related above. (Pol. ii. 34; Plut. Marcell. 6, 7).—10. P. Corn. Scipio Africanus Major, son of No. 8, was born in 237. (According to Liv. xxvi. 18 and Val. Max. iii. 7, 1, he was born in 234, but the authority of Polybius should be followed, who says that he was twenty-seven when he went to Spain.) He was unquestionably one of the greatest men of Rome, and he acquired at an early age the confidence and admiration of his countrymen. His enthusiastic mind led him to believe that he was a special favourite of the gods; and he never engaged in any public or private business without first going to the Capitol, where he sat some time alone, enjoying communication with the gods. For all he proposed or executed he alleged the divine approval; and the Roman people gave credit to his assertions and regarded him as a being almost superior to the common race of men (Liv. xxvi. 19). There can be no doubt that Scipio believed himself in the divine revelations which he asserted to have been vouchsafed to him; and the extraordinary success which attended all his enterprises must have deepened this belief, and his faith in himself helped him to inspire enthusiasm in others. He is first mentioned in 218 at the battle of the Ticinus, when he saved the life of his father, as has already been related. He fought at Cannae two years afterward (216), when he was already a tribune of the soldiers, and was one of the few Roman officers who survived that fatal day. He was chosen along with Appius Claudius to command the remains of the army, which had taken refuge at Canusium; and it was owing to his youthful heroism and presence of mind that the Roman nobles, who had thought of leaving Italy in despair, were prevented from carrying their rash project into effect (Liv. xxii. 53; Val. Max. v. 6, 7). He had already gained the favour of the people to such an extent that he was elected aedile in 212, although he had not yet reached the legal age. In 210, after the death of his father and his uncle in Spain, the Romans resolved to increase their army in that country, and to place it under the command of a proconsul. But when the people assembled to elect a proconsul, none of the generals of experience ventured to sue for so dangerous a command. At length Scipio, who was then barely twenty-seven (Pol. x. 6), offered himself as a candidate, and was chosen with enthusiasm to take the command. His success in Spain was striking and rapid. In the first campaign (210) he took the important city of Carthago Nova, and in the course of the next three years he drove the Carthaginians entirely out of Spain, and became master of that country. He returned to Rome in 206, and was elected consul for the following year (205), although he had not yet filled the office of praetor, and was only thirty years of age. He was anxious to cross over at once to Africa, and bring the contest to an end at the gates of Carthage; but the oldest members of the senate, and among them Q. Fabius Maximus, opposed his project, partly through timidity and partly through jealousy of the youthful conqueror. All that Scipio could obtain was the province of Sicily, with permission to cross over to Africa; but the senate refused him an army, thus making the permission of no practical use. The allies had a truer view of the interests of Italy than the Roman senate, and from all the towns of Italy volunteers flocked to join the standard of the youthful hero. The senate could not refuse to allow him to enlist volunteers, and such was the enthusiasm in his favour that he was able to cross over to Sicily with an army and a fleet, contrary to the expectations and even the wishes of the senate. After spending the winter in Sicily, and completing all his preparations for the invasion of Africa, he crossed over to the latter country in the following year. Success again attended his arms. The Carthaginians and their ally Syphax were defeated with great slaughter, and the former were compelled to recall Hannibal from Italy as the only hope of saving their country. The long struggle between the two peoples was at length brought to a close by the battle fought near the city of Zama on the 19th of October, 202, in which Scipio gained a decisive and brilliant victory over Hannibal. Carthage had no alternative but submission; but the final treaty was not concluded till the following year (201). Scipio returned to Italy in 201, and entered Rome in triumph. He was received with universal enthusiasm, and the surname of Africanus was conferred upon him. The people wished to make him consul and dictator for life, and to erect his statue in the comitia, the rostra, the curia, and even in the Capitol, but he prudently declined all these invidious distinctions (Liv. xxxviii. 56; Val. Max. iv. 1, 6). As he did not choose to usurp the supreme power, and as he was an object of suspicion and dislike to the majority of the senate, he took no prominent part in public affairs during the next few years. He was censor in 199 with P. Aelius Paetus, and consul

a second time in 194 with Ti. Sempronius Longus. In 193 he was one of the three commissioners who were sent to Africa to mediate between Masinissa and the Carthaginians; and in the same year he was one of the ambassadors sent to Antiochus at Ephesus, at whose court Hannibal was then residing. The tale runs that he had there an interview with the great Carthaginian, who declared him the greatest general that ever lived. The compliment was paid in a manner the most flattering to Scipio. The latter had asked, 'Who was the greatest general?' 'Alexander the Great,' was Hannibal's reply. 'Who was the second?' 'Pyrrhus.' 'Who the third?' 'Myself,' replied the Carthaginian. 'What would you have said, then, if you had conquered me?' asked Scipio, in astonishment. 'I should then have placed myself before Alexander, before Pyrrhus, and before all other generals.' (Liv. xxxv. 14.) It should be noticed that Scipio alone in the senate opposed the persecution of Hannibal after his fall (Liv. xxxiii. 47).—In 190 Africanus served as legate under his brother Lucius in the war against Antiochus the Great. Shortly after his return, he and his brother Lucius were accused of having received bribes from Antiochus to let the monarch off too leniently, and of having appropriated to their own use part of the money which had been paid by Antiochus to the Roman state. It appears that there were two distinct prosecutions, and the following is the most probable history of the transaction. In 187 two Petilii, tribunes of the people, instigated by Cato and the other enemies of the Scipios, required L. Scipio to render an account of all the sums of money which he had received from Antiochus. L. Scipio accordingly prepared his accounts, but as he was in the act of delivering them up, the proud conqueror of Hannibal indignantly snatched them out of his hands, and tore them up before the senate. But this haughty conduct appears to have produced an unfavourable impression, and his brother, when brought to trial in the course of the same year, was declared guilty, and sentenced to pay a heavy fine. The tribune C. Minucius Augurinus ordered him to be dragged to prison and there detained till the money was paid; whereupon Africanus rescued his brother from the hands of the tribune's officer. The contest would probably have been attended with fatal results had not Tib. Gracchus, the father of the celebrated tribune, and then tribune himself, had the prudence to release Lucius from the sentence of imprisonment. The successful issue of the prosecution of Lucius emboldened his enemies to bring the great Africanus himself before the people. His accuser was M. Naevius, the tribune of the people, and the accusation was brought in 185. When the trial came on, and Africanus was summoned, he proudly reminded the people that this was the anniversary of the day on which he had defeated Hannibal at Zama, and called upon them to follow him to the Capitol, in order there to return thanks to the immortal gods, and to pray that they would grant the Roman state other citizens like himself. Scipio struck a chord which vibrated on every heart, and was followed by crowds to the Capitol. Having thus set all the laws at defiance, Scipio immediately quitted Rome, and retired to his country seat at Liternum. The tribunes wished to renew the prosecution, but Gracchus wisely persuaded them to let it drop. (Liv. xxxviii. 50–60; Gell. iv. 18, vii. 19; Val.

Max. iii. 7, 1.) Scipio never returned to Rome. He passed his remaining days in the cultivation of his estate at Liternum; and at his death is said to have requested that his body might be buried there, and not in his ungrateful country (Sen. Ep. 86). Some accounts represent his burial-place as being at Rome, but there was at any rate a monument to his memory at Liternum, which Livy saw (Liv. xxxviii. 56). The year of his death is uncertain; but he probably died in 183. Scipio married Aemilia, the daughter of L. Aemilius Paulus, who fell at the battle of Cannae, and by her he had four children—two sons [Nos. 12, 13], and two daughters, the elder of whom married P. Scipio Nasica Corculum [No. 17], and the younger Tib. Gracchus, and thus became the mother of the two celebrated tribunes. [CORNELIA.]—11. L. Corn. Scipio Asiaticus, also called Asiagenes or Asiagenus, was the son of No. 8, and the brother of the great Africanus. He served under his brother in Spain; was praetor in 193, when he obtained the province of Sicily, and consul in 190, with C. Laelius. The senate had not much confidence in his abilities, and in truth his capacity was small. It was only through the offer of his brother Africanus to accompany him as a legate that he obtained the province of Greece and the conduct of the war against Antiochus. He defeated Antiochus at Mt. Sipylus in 190, entered Rome in triumph in the following year, and assumed the surname of Asiaticus. (Liv. xxviii. 3, 4, 17, xxxiv. 54, xxxvi. 45, xxxvii. 1.) The history of his accusation and condemnation has been already related in the Life of his brother. He was a candidate for the censorship in 184, but was defeated by the old enemy of his family, M. Porcius Cato, who deprived Asiaticus of his horse at the review of the equites. (Liv. xxxix. 22, 40, 44.)—12. P. Corn. Scipio Africanus, elder son of the great Africanus, was prevented by his weak health from taking any part in public affairs, but he was elected augur in 180 B.C. (Liv. xl. 42). Cicero praises his oratiunculae and his Greek History, and remarks that with the greatness of his father's mind he possessed a larger amount of learning (Cic. Brut. 19, 77, de Off. i. 33; Vell. Pat. i. 10). He had no son of his own, but adopted the son of L. Aemilius Paulus [see below, No. 15]. His epitaph has great poetic merit (C. I. L. i. 38).—13. L. or Cn. Corn. Scipio Africanus, younger son of the great Africanus. He accompanied his father into Asia in 190, and was taken prisoner by Antiochus. This Scipio was a degenerate son of an illustrious sire, and only obtained the praetorship, in 174, through Cicereius, who had been a scribe of his father, giving way to him. In the same year he was expelled from the senate by the censors. (Liv. xli. 27; Val. Max. iii. 5, 1, iv. 5, 3).—14. L. Corn. Scipio Asiaticus, a descendant of No. 11, belonged to the Marian party, and was consul in 83 with C. Norbanus. In this year Sulla returned to Italy: Scipio was deserted by his troops, and taken prisoner in his camp along with his son Lucius, but was dismissed by Sulla uninjured. He was, however, included in the proscription in the following year (82), whereupon he fled to Massilia, and passed there the remainder of his life. His daughter was married to P. Sestius. (App. B. C. i. 82, 85; Plut. Sull. 28; Flor. iii. 21; Cic. pro Rab. Perd. 7, 21, Phil. xii. 11, 27.)—15. P. Corn. Scipio Aemilianus Africanus Minor was the younger son of L. Aemilius Paulus, the conqueror of Macedonia, and was adopted by P. Scipio [No. 12], the son of the conqueror of Hannibal. He was born about 185. In his seventeenth year he accompanied his father Paulus to Greece, and fought under him at the battle of Pydna, 168. (Plut. Aemil. 22.) Scipio devoted himself with ardour to the study of literature, and formed an intimate friendship with Polybius when the latter came to Rome along with the other Achaean exiles in 167. [POLYBIUS.] At a later period he also cultivated the acquaintance of the philosopher Panaetius, and he admitted the poets Lucilius and Terence to his intimacy, and is said to have assisted the latter in the composition of his comedies. [TERENTIUS.] His friendship with Laelius, whose tastes and pursuits were so congenial to his own, has been immortalised by Cicero's celebrated treatise entitled Laelius sive de Amicitia. Although thus devoted to the study of literature, Scipio cultivated the virtues which distinguished the older Romans, and made Cato the model of his conduct. If we may believe his panegyrists, he possessed all the simple virtues of an old Roman, mellowed by the refining influences of Greek civilisation. Scipio first served in Spain with great distinction as military tribune, under the consul L. Lucullus in 151. (Vell. Pat. i. 12; Flor. ii. 17.) On the breaking out of the third Punic war in 149 he accompanied the Roman army to Africa, again with the rank of military tribune. By his personal bravery and military skill he repaired, to a great extent, the mistakes of the consul Manilius, whose army on one occasion he saved from destruction. He returned to Rome in 148, and had already gained such popularity that when he became a candidate for the aedileship for the following year (147) he was elected consul, although he was only thirty-seven, and had not, therefore, attained the legal age. (Pol. xxxv. 4.) The senate assigned to him Africa as his province, to which he forthwith sailed, accompanied by his friends Polybius and Laelius. He prosecuted the siege of Carthage with the utmost vigour. The Carthaginians defended themselves with the courage of despair, and the Romans were unable to force their way into the city till the spring of the following year (146). The fate of this once magnificent city moved Scipio to tears, and anticipating that a similar catastrophe might one day befall Rome, he repeated the lines of the Iliad (vi. 448) in which Hector bewails the approaching fall of Troy. After reducing Africa to the form of a Roman province, Scipio returned to Rome in the same year, and celebrated a splendid triumph on account of his victory. (App. Pun. 113–131; Pol. xxxix.) The surname of Africanus which he had inherited by adoption from the conqueror of Hannibal, had now been acquired by him by his own exploits. In 142 Scipio was censor, and in the administration of the duties of his office he attempted to redress the growing luxury and immorality of his contemporaries. His efforts, however, were thwarted by his colleague Mummius, who had himself acquired a love of Greek and Asiatic luxuries. (Val. Max. vi. 4, 2; Gell. iv. 20, v. 19.) In 139 Scipio was accused by Ti. Claudius Asellus of majestas. Asellus attacked him out of private animosity, because he had been deprived of his horse and reduced to the condition of an aerarian by Scipio in his censorship. Scipio was acquitted, and the speeches which he delivered on the occasion were held in high esteem in a later age. (Gell. ii. 20, iii. 4, vii. 11; Cic. de Or. ii. 64, 258; 66, 268.) It appears to have been after this event that Scipio was sent on an embassy to Egypt and Asia to attend to the Roman interests in those countries. The long continuance of the war in Spain again called Scipio to the consulship. He was appointed consul in his absence, and had the province of Spain assigned to him in 134. His operations were attended with success; and in 133 he brought the war to a conclusion by the capture of the city of Numantia after a long siege. (App. Hisp. 48-98; Eutrop. iv. 17.) He now received the surname of Numantius in addition to that of Africanus. During his absence in Spain Tib. Gracchus had been put to death. Scipio was married to Sempronia, the sister of the fallen tribune, but he had no sympathy with his reforms, and no sorrow for his fate. On receiving the news of the death of Gracchus he is said to have quoted the line of the Odyssey (i. 47)—

and upon his return to Rome in 132, when he was asked in the assembly of tribes by C. Papirius Carbo, the tribune, what he thought of the death of Tib. Gracchus, he replied that he was justly slain (jure caesum). His reply to the murmurs of the populace which greeted this expression of opinion, 'Taceant quibus Italia noverca est,' showed his aristocratic spirit of contempt for the Roman mob, whom he seemed to think unfit to reckon as Roman citizens, and may have contributed to the feeling against him which afterwards caused his death. He now took the lead in opposing the efforts of the commissioners to make the agrarian law of Tib. Gracchus apply also to the lands of Latin citizens, and he proposed in the senate (129) that all disputes respecting the lands of the allies should be taken out of the hands of the commissioners appointed under the law of Tib. Gracchus, and should be committed to other persons. Fulvius Flaccus, Papirius Carbo and C. Gracchus, the three commissioners, offered the most vehement opposition to his proposal. In the Forum he was accused by Carbo with the bitterest invectives as the enemy of the people, and upon his again expressing his approval of the death of Tib. Gracchus, the people shouted out, 'Down with the tyrant.' In the evening he went home with the intention of composing a speech for the following day; but next day he was found dead in his room. It is clear that the assassination was contrived by some of the Gracchan party; but who committed the murder or who instigated it was never established. Suspicion fell upon various persons: even upon his wife, Sempronia, and her mother, Cornelia. Carbo, Fulvius, and C. Gracchus were suspected by many. Of these Carbo was most generally believed to have been guilty, and is expressly mentioned as the murderer by Cicero. (App. B. C. i. 19, 20; Vell. Pat. ii. 4; Plut. C. Gracch. 10; Cic. de Or. ii. 40, 170, ad Fam. ix. 21, ad Q. Fr. ii. 3.) The general opinion entertained by the Romans of a subsequent age respecting Scipio is given by Cicero in his work on the Republic, in which Scipio is introduced as the principal speaker.—16. P. Corn. Scipio Nasica, that is, 'Scipio with the pointed nose,' was the son of Cn. Scipio Calvus, who fell in Spain in 211. [No. 9.] He is first mentioned in 204 as a young man who was judged by the senate to be the best citizen in the state, and was therefore sent to Ostia along with the Roman matrons to receive the statue of the Idaean Mother, which had been brought from Pessinus (Liv. xxxv. 10). He was curule aedile 196; praetor in 194, when he fought with success in Further Spain; and consul 191, when he defeated the Boii, and triumphed over them on his return to Rome. Scipio Nasica was a celebrated jurist, and a house was given him by the state in the Via Sacra, in order that he might be more easily consulted. (Pomp. Dig. i. 2, 2, 37.)—17. P. Corn. Scipio Nasica Corculum, son of No. 16, inherited from his father a love of jurisprudence, and became so celebrated for his discernment and for his knowledge of the pontifical and civil law that he received the surname of Corculum (i.e. 'acute': Fest. s.v.). He married a daughter of Scipio Africanus the elder. He was consul for the first time 162, but abdicated, together with his colleague, almost immediately after they had entered upon their office, on account of some fault in the auspices. He was censor 159 with M. Popillius Laenas, and was consul a second time in 155, when he subdued the Dalmatians (Liv. Ep. 47). He was a firm upholder of the old Roman habits and manners, and in his second consulship he induced the senate to stop the building of a theatre, as injurious to public morals. When Cato repeatedly expressed his desire for the destruction of Carthage, Scipio, on the other hand, declared that he wished for its preservation, since the existence of such a rival would prove a useful check upon the licentiousness of the multitude (Plut. Cat. Maj. 27; Aurel. Vict. Vir. Ill. 44; App. Pun. 69, B. C. i. 28). He was elected pontifex maximus in 150.—18. P. Corn. Scipio Nasica Serapio, son of No. 17, is chiefly known as the leader of the senate in the murder of Tib. Gracchus. He was consul in 138, and in consequence of the severity with which he and his colleague conducted the levy of troops, they were thrown into prison by C. Curiatius, the tribune of the plebs. It was this Curiatius who gave Nasica the nickname of Serapio, from his resemblance to a person of low rank of this name; but though given him in derision, it afterwards became his distinguishing surname. (Liv. Ep. 55; Val. Max. ix. 14, 3; Plin. vii. 54.) In 133, when the tribes met to re-elect Tib. Gracchus to the tribunate, and the utmost confusion prevailed in the Forum, Nasica called upon the consuls to save the republic; but as they refused to have recourse to violence, he exclaimed, 'As the consul betrays the state, do you who wish to obey the laws follow me,' and so saying he rushed forth from the temple of Fides, where the senate was sitting, followed by the greater number of the senators. The people gave way before them, and Gracchus was assassinated as he attempted to escape. (App. B. C. i. 16; Plut. Tib. Gracch. 19.) In consequence of his conduct on this occasion Nasica became an object of such detestation to the people, that the senate found it advisable to send him on a pretended mission to Asia, although he was pontifex maximus, and ought not, therefore, to have quitted Italy. He did not venture to return to Rome, and, after wandering about from place to place, died soon afterwards at Pergamum. (Plut. Tib. Gracch. 21; Cic. Flacc. 31, 75.)—19. P. Corn. Scipio Nasica, son of No. 18, was consul 111, and died during his consulship (Sall. Jug. 27; Cic. de Off. i. 30).—20. P. Corn. Scipio Nasica, son of No. 19, praetor 94, is mentioned by Cicero as one of the advocates of Sex. Roscius of Ameria. He married Licinia, the second daughter of L. Crassus the orator. (Cic. Rosc. Am. 28, 77, Brut. 58, 212.) He had two sons, both of whom were adopted, one by his maternal grandfather, L. Crassus, in his testament, and is therefore called L. Licinius Crassus Scipio; and the other by Q. Caecilius Metellus Pius, consul 80, and is therefore called Q. Caecilius Metellus Pius Scipio. This Scipio became the father-in-law of Cn. Pompey the triumvir, and fell in Africa in 47. His life is given under METELLUS, No. 15.—21. Cn. Corn. Scipio Hispallus, son of L. Scipio, who is only known as a brother of the two Scipios who fell in Spain. Hispallus was praetor 179, and consul 171. (Liv. xl. 44, xli. 16.)—22. Cn. Corn. Scipio Hispallus, son of No. 21, was praetor in 139, when he published an edict that all Chaldaeans (i.e. astrologers) should leave Rome and Italy within ten days (Val. Max. i. 8, 2).—23. P. Corn. Scipio, husband of Scribonia, who afterwards married Octavianus (Suet. Oct. 62).—24. P. Corn. Scipio, son of No. 21, was consul B.C. 16 (Dio Cass. liv. 19; Propert. v. 11, 67).—25. Corn. Scipio, first son of No. 21, served under Junius Blaesus against Tacfarinas (Tac. Ann. iii. 74).—26. P. Corn. Scipio, son of the preceding, husband of Poppaea Sabina, was consul A.D. 56 (Tac. Ann. xi. 2, xii. 53, xiii. 25).

Sciras or Scelērias. [RHINTHON.]

Sciras (Σκίρας), a surname of Athene, under which she had a temple in the Attic port of Phaleron, and in the island of Salamis. The foundation of the temple at Phaleron is ascribed by Pausanias to a soothsayer, Scirus of Dodona, who is said to have come to Attica at the time when the Eleusinians were at war with Erechtheus (Paus. i. 1, 4, i. 36, 3).

Sciritis (Σκίριτις), a wild and mountainous district in the N. of Laconia, on the borders of Arcadia, with a town Scirus (Σκίρος), (also called Scirtonium) on the road from Sparta to Tegea, originally belonging to Arcadia. Its inhabitants, the Sciritae (Σκίριται), formed a special division of the Lacedaemonian army. This body, which in the time of the Peloponnesian war was 600 in number, was stationed in battle at the extreme left of the line, formed on march the vanguard, and was usually employed on the most dangerous kinds of service. (Thuc. v. 33, 67; Xen. Cyr. iv. 2, 1, Hell. v. 2, 24; Diod. xv. 32.)

Sciron (Σκίρων or Σκείρων), in the Athenian story, was a famous robber who infested the frontier between Attica and Megaris. He not only robbed the travellers who passed through the country, but compelled them on the Scironian rock to wash his feet, and kicked them into the sea while they were thus employed. At the foot of the rock (according to Pausanias, and the Schol. on Eur. Hipp. 979), there was a tortoise, which devoured the bodies of the robber's victims. He was slain by Theseus. It is noticeable that Plutarch makes no suggestion of the tortoise, and it has been suggested that this part of the story grew out of vase-paintings, where the painter put in a tortoise (as in the British Museum vase) to indicate the sea shore upon which Sciron was about to fall. Diodorus supplies another explanation when he says that the precipice over which he fell was called Χελώνη (tortoise). Plutarch mentions also the Megarean story, which is totally different. They said that Sciron was a good and just prince, no robber, but a punisher of robbers, son-in-law of Cychreus and father-in-law of Aeacus, and that he was slain by Theseus in war. (Plut. Thes. 10; Paus. i. 44, 12; Diod. iv. 59; Strab. p. 391; Ov. Met. vii. 445.)

Scirōnia Saxa (Σκίρωνίδες πέτραι, also Σκίραδες: Derveni Bouno), large rocks on the E. coast of Megaris, between which and the sea there was only a narrow dangerous pass, called the Scironian road (ἡ Σκίρωνη or Σκίρωνος ὁδός: Kaki Skala). (Strab. p. 391; Paus. i. 44.) This road was afterwards enlarged by the emperor Hadrian. The name of the rocks was said to be derived from the celebrated robber SCIRON.

Scirōnides (Σκίρωνίδης), an Athenian general who acted at the siege of Miletus and against Chios in B.C. 412, 411 (Thuc. viii. 25, 30, 54).

Scirri or Sciri, a people placed by Pliny in European Sarmatia, on the N. coast, immediately E. of the Vistula, in the modern Curland and Samogitien; but by others described as a Scythian tribe beyond the Danube, which afterwards joined the Huns, and to which belonged Odoacer, the conqueror of Italy (Plin. iv. 97; Jornand. R. G. 49; Sidon. vii. 322).

Scirtōnium. [SCIRITIS.]

Scirtus (Σκίρτος: Daisan), a river in Mesopotamia, flowing past Edessa into a small lake near Charrae. Its name, which signifies leaping, was derived from its rapid descent in a series of small cascades. (Procop. Aed. ii. 7.)

Sclērias. [RHINTHON.]

Scodra (Scodrensis: Scodar or Scutari), one of the most important towns in Illyricum, on the left bank of the river Barbana, at the SE. corner of the Lacus Labeatis, and about seventeen miles from the coast. It was strongly fortified, and was the residence of the Illyrian king Gentius (Liv. xlv. 31, xlv. 26). It was a populous town under the Romans (Plin. iii. 144) and the capital of the district, called Praevalitana, of Dalmatia in the time of Diocletian.

Scodrus. [SCARDUS.]

Scodises, Scydisses, or Scordiscus (Σκοιδίσης, Σκυδίσσης, Σκορδίσκος: Dassim Dagh, or Chambu-Bel Dagh), a mountain in the NE. of Asia Minor, dividing Pontus Cappadocius from Armenia Minor, and forming a part of the same range as M. Paryades (Strab. pp. 497, 548; Ptol. v. 6, 8).

Scollis (Σκόλλις: Santameri), a rocky mountain between Elis and Achaia, 3330 feet high, which joins on the E. the mountain Lampēa (Strab. p. 341). Strabo identifies it with the Olenian rock of Il. ii. 617 (Strab. p. 387).

Scōlōti. [SCYTHIA.]

Scōlus (Σκώλος: Σκώλιος, Σκωλιεύς). 1. An ancient town in Boeotia, on the road from Thebes to Aphidna in Attica, was situated on the N. slope of Mt. Cithaeron, five or six miles S. of the Asopus and NW. of Hysiae (Il. ii. 497; Strab. p. 408; Hdt. ix. 15; Paus. ix. 4, 4). The site is traceable to the right of the road from Athens to Thebes.—2. A small place in Macedonia, near Olynthus (Thuc. v. 18; Strab. p. 408).

Scombraria (Islote), an island in front of the bay, on the SE. coast of Spain, which formed the harbour of Carthago Nova. It received its name from the scombrī, or mackerel, taken off its coast, from which the Romans prepared their garum. (Strab. p. 159.)

Scōmīus or Scombrus Mons (τὸ Σκόμιον ὄρος), a mountain in Macedonia, which runs E. of Mt. Scardus, in the direction of N. to S. towards Mt. Haemus (Thuc. ii. 96).

Scōpas (Σκόπας). 1. One of the greatest Greek sculptors, was a native of Paros, and appears to have belonged to a family of artists in that island (Strab. p. 604; Paus. viii. 45, 5). The period of his work extended over forty-four years at least, for this was the interval between his work at Tegea in 394 and that at Halicarnassus in 351. He was probably somewhat older than Praxiteles, with whom he stands at the head of that second period of perfected art which is called the later Attic school (in contradistinction to the earlier Attic school of Phidias), and which arose at Athens after the Peloponnesian war. Scopas was an architect and a statuary as well as a sculptor. He was the architect of the temple of Athene at Tegea, in Arcadia, which was built to replace an older temple burnt down in B.C. 394. From the sculptures which Scopas executed for this temple, two heads—mutilated, but still of great beauty and valuable for judging of the style of Scopas—have been discovered at Tegea and are in the Museum at Athens. The subjects of the sculptures mentioned by Pausanias are the Calydonian Hunt, and the fight of Telephus and Achilles. He was one of the artists employed in executing the bas-reliefs which decorated the frieze of the Mausoleum at Halicarnassus in Caria. A portion of these bas-reliefs is now deposited in the British Museum Head by Scopas, from Tegea.

[Dict. of Ant. art. Mausoleum.] A noticeable feature in the style of Scopas was that he introduced the representation of passion which was afterwards carried further by the Pergamene sculptors and by later schools. Pliny states that the famous group of figures representing the destruction of the sons and daughters of Niobe was ascribed by some to Scopas, by others to Praxiteles. It has been remarked since the discovery of the original statue by Praxiteles of Hermes [see p. 557], and of the original head by Scopas, that the heads of the Niobe group bear more resemblance to the style of Praxiteles than to that of Scopas. On the other hand, the passion of the subject is more like the style of Scopas. But possibly the group in question was merely assigned by Roman critics to the period of these two great sculptors, and was not the genuine work of either. In Pliny's time the statues stood in the temple of Apollo Sosianus (Plin. xxxvi. 28). The remaining statues of this group, or copies of them, are all in the Florence Gallery. The most esteemed of all the works of Scopas, in antiquity, was his group which stood in the shrine of Cn. Domitius in the Flaminian Circus, representing Achilles conducted to the island of Leuce by the divinities of the sea. It consisted of figures of Neptune, Thetis, and Achilles, surrounded by Nereids, and attended by Tritons, and by an assemblage of sea monsters (Plin. xxxvi. 26). Pliny mentions among the famous single statues by Scopas an Apollo Palatinus, and it is argued by many that the Apollo Citharoedus [see p. 90] is a copy of this statue, with alterations in all probability of the drapery. Of his other statues a colossal seated Ares (Plin. ib.), and a statue of Apollo Smintheus (Strab. p. 604; cf. APOLLO, p. 89, b), was particularly famous in ancient times.—2. An Aetolian, who held a leading position among his countrymen in the war with Philip and the Achaeans, B.C. 220. He commanded the Aetolian army in the first year of the war; and he is mentioned again as general of the Aetolians when the latter people concluded an alliance with the Romans (211). (Pol. iv. 5–13, 62, v. 11; Liv. xxxvi. 24.) After the close of the war with Philip, Scopas and Dorimachus were appointed to reform the Aetolian constitution (204). Scopas had only undertaken the charge from motives of ambition; on finding himself disappointed in this object, he withdrew to Alexandria. Here he was received with favour by the ministers of the young king Ptolemy V., and appointed to the command of the army against Antiochus the Great. At first he was successful, but was afterwards defeated by Antiochus at Panium, and reduced to shut himself up within the walls of Sidon, where he was compelled by famine to surrender. (Pol. xiii. 1, xvi. 18, 39; Jos. Ant. xii. 3, 3.) Notwithstanding this ill success he continued in favour at the Egyptian court; but having formed a plot in 296 to obtain the chief administration of the kingdom, he was arrested and put to death (Pol. xviii. 36–38).

Scôpas (Σκόπας: Aladan), a river of Galatia, falling into the Sangarius, from the E., at Juliolis (Procop. Aed. v. 4).

Scordisci, a people in Pannonia Superior, are sometimes classed among the Illyrians, but were the remains of an ancient and powerful Celtic tribe. They dwelt between the Savus and Dravus. (Strab. pp. 293, 313; Liv. xlv. 23.)

Scordiscus. [SCOEDISES.]

Scôti, a people whom the later Roman writers mention as dwelling in Ireland. Thus Claudian contrasts the Picti dwelling in Thule with the Scoti dwelling in Ierne (de IV. Cons. Hon. 3, cf. de Laud. Stil. ii. 251; Oros. i. 2; Amm. Marc. xxvii. 8, 4; Isid. Or. xiv. 6). At a later period the migration of the Scoti into Caledonia transferred the names Scotia and Scoti to that country.

Scotitas (Σκοτίτας), a woody district in the N. of Laconia, on the frontiers of Tegeatis (Paus. iii. 10, 6).

Scôtussa (Σκότουσσα: Σκοτουσσαῖος), a very ancient town of Thessaly, in the district Pelasgiotis, near the source of the Onchestus, and not far from the hills Cynoscephalae, where Flamininus gained his celebrated victory over Philip, B.C. 197 (Strab. pp. 329, 441; Diod. xv. 75; Liv. xxxiii. 6, xxxvi. 9, 14). The ruins of the ancient fortifications may be seen at Supli, five miles N. of the railway which runs from Volo (Iolcus) to Phersala (Pharsalus).

Scribônia, wife of Octavianus (afterwards the emperor Augustus), had been married twice before. By one of her former husbands, P. Scipio, she had two children, P. Scipio, who was consul B.C. 16, and a daughter, Cornelia, who was married to Paulus Aemilius Lepidus, censor B.C. 22, and whose death is lamented in the beautiful elegy of Propertius (v. 11; cf. p. 483, b). Scribonia was the sister of L. Scribonius Libo, who was the father-in-law of Sex. Pompey. Augustus married her in 40, on the advice of Maecenas, because he was then afraid that Sex. Pompey would form an alliance with Antony to crush him; but having renewed his alliance with Antony, Octavian divorced her in the following year (39)—on the very day on which she had borne him a daughter, Julia—in order to marry Livia. Scribonia long survived her separation from Octavian. In A.D. 2 she accompanied, of her own accord, her daughter Julia into exile, to the island of Pandataria. (Suet. Aug. 62, 69; App. B. C. v. 53; Vell. Pat. ii. 100; Tac. Ann. ii. 27.)

Scribonius Curio. [CURIO.]

Scribonius Largus. [LARGUS.]

Scribonius Libo. [LIBO.]

Scribonius Proculus. [PROCLUS.]

Scriptores Historiae Augustae. Under this title a collection was made, how or under whose authority and editorship is not known, of biographies of the emperors from Hadrian to Numerian (117–284), by six contributors. The Lives of Philip—Valerian have not been handed down entire. There is considerable doubt as to the authorship of the different biographies. The Lives of Hadrian, Aelius, Didius Julianus, Septimius Severus, Pescennius Niger, Caracalla and Geta have been commonly printed as the work of SPARTIANUS; those of Antoninus Pius, M. Antoninus Philosophus (M. Aurelius), Verus, Pertinax, Clodius Albinus, Macrinus, the two Maximins, the three Gordians, Maximus and Balbinus, as the work of CAPITOLINUS; the Life of Avidius Cassius, as the work of VULCACIUS; the Lives of Commodus, Diadumenus, Elagabalus and Alexander Severus, as the work of LAMPRIIDIUS [these Lives, whoever were their respective authors, seem to have been written in the time of Diocletian]; the Lives of Aurelianus, Tacitus, Florianus, Probus, Firmus, Saturninus, Proculus, Bonosus, Carus and his sons, as the work of VOPISCUS; the Lives of Valerian, Gallienus, the so-called Thirty Tyrants, Claudius and the fragments of Philip, Decius, Gallus and Aemilian, as the work of TREBELLIIUS POLLIO. [These Lives seem to have been written in the first decade of the fourth century.] The assignment to the authors mentioned above is grounded upon the titles to the various biographies; but these titles have in many cases clearly been confused and miscopied by the scribes, and therefore it is a matter of great uncertainty which are correct and which are misplaced. This confusion belongs to the earlier Lives (Hadrian—Gordian III.). Hence the apportionment of the works of Spartianus, Capitolinus, Lampridius and Vulcavius lacks authority, while there is more warrant for the assignment to Vopiscus and Trebellius Pollio of the Lives which are ascribed to them. At the same time for convenience and conciseness of reference the names generally used are often retained, and there seems no reasonable objection to that course. The collection has value as supplying details otherwise unattainable; but the biographies are all feeble in style and composition, and, worse still, they are so distinctly the work of Court historians that their view of history is limited and partial, and often altogether untrustworthy.

Scutenna (Panaro), a river in Gallia Cispadana, rising in the Apennines, and flowing to the E. of Mutina into the Po (Strab. p. 218; Plin. iii. 118; Liv. xli. 16).

Scupi (Uskub), a town in Moesia Superior, on the Axios, and the capital of Dardania. It was a frontier town towards Macedonia, and was a Roman colony under Trajan. (Ptol. iii. 9, 6; Procop. Aed. iv. 4.)

Scydissae. [SCOEDISAE.]

Scylacē (Σκυλάκη), or Scylaceion, an ancient city on the coast of Mysia Minor, E. of Cyzicus, at the foot of M. Olympus (Plin. v. 142; Mel. i. 19). It is one of the places whose inhabitants Herodotus mentions as speaking the language or dialect, differing from any Greek of his own day, which he calls Pelasgian (Hdt. i. 57; PELASGI).

Scylaciūm, also Scylacēum, or Scyllētium (Σκυλάκιον, Σκυλακείον, Σκυλλήτιον: Squillace), a Greek town on the E. coast of Bruttium, was situated on two adjoining hills at a short distance from the coast, between the rivers Caecinus and Carcines. The common tradition was that it was founded by Athenians under Menestheus (Strab. p. 261; Plin. iii. 95), but others referred it to Odysseus (Serv. ad Aen. iii. 5, 53). There is, however, no evidence of its ever having been Greek in historical times, and it is not mentioned among Greek colonies in the Periplus attributed to Scylax. It was a dependency of Crotona and afterwards belonged to Locri. It was colonised by the Romans B.C. 124, and again under Nerva. It is described by Cassiodorus (Var. xii. 15), who was born there. It had no harbour, whence Virgil (Aen. iii. 553) speaks of it as navifragum Scylaceum. From this town the Scylacius or Scylleticus Sinus (Σκυλλητικός κόλπος) derived its name. The isthmus which separated this bay from the Sinus Hipponiates on the W. coast of Bruttium, was only twenty miles broad, and formed the ancient boundary of Oenotria.

Scylax (Σκύλαξ), of Caryanda in Caria, was sent by Darius Hystaspis on a voyage of discovery down the Indus. Setting out from the city of Caspatyrus and the Pactyican district, Scylax reached the sea, and then sailed W. through the Indian Ocean to the Red Sea, performing the whole voyage in thirty months. (Hdt. iv. 44.)—There is still extant a Periplus, containing a brief description of certain countries in Europe, Asia, and Africa, around the coasts of the Mediterranean and Euxine, and bearing the name of Scylax of Caryanda. This work has been ascribed by some writers to the Scylax mentioned by Herodotus, and by others to Scylax, an astronomer of Halicarnassus, and friend of Panaetius (Cic. Div. ii. 42). Suidas (s. v.) appears to confuse the two. It is clear from internal evidence that the Periplus must have been composed long after the time of Herodotus; whilst, from its omitting to mention any of the cities founded by Alexander, such as Alexandria in Egypt, we may conclude that it was drawn up before the reign of Alexander. Hence it is probably right to assume that the author lived about 400–350 B.C., and to suppose that he prefixed to his work the name of Scylax of Caryanda, on account of the celebrity of this navigator.—This Periplus is edited by Fabricius, 1878, and in Geogr. Graec. Minor. by C. Müller, 1861.

Scylax (Σκύλαξ: Choterlek-Irmak), a river in the SW. of Pontus, falling into the Iris, between Amasia and Gaziura (Strab. p. 547).

Scylitzes or Scylitza, Joannes, a Byzantine historian, surnamed, from his office, Curopolates, flourished A.D. 1081. His work extends from the death of Nicephorus I. (811), down to the reign of Nicephorus Botaniotes (1078–1081). The portion of the History of Cedrenus which extends from the death of Nicephorus I. (811) to the close of the work (1057) is found almost verbatim in the History of Scylitzes. It is a question which was the original. The works of Cedrenus and Scylitzes are edited together by Bekker, 1838.

Scylla (Σκύλλα), the personification of the danger to mariners from a rock-bound coast. In the Homeric account Scylla and Charybdis are opposite to each other, but the place of their dwelling is not very clear, nor is Charybdis distinctly personified. In later writers Scylla and Charybdis are localised in the Straits of Messina between Italy and Sicily (Strab. p. 24; Plin. iii. 87), Scylla being placed at the Promontory Scyllaeum (the name of which may very possibly have reached Homer). Charybdis is the whirlpool (which does actually exist now sufficiently to be a difficulty for undecked boats) just outside the spit of land which forms the harbour of Messina (Strab. p. 268): but the whirlpool was apparently often supposed to be immediately opposite Scyllaeum Pr. at Cape Pelorus, nine miles further N., where there is no doubt often a strong current (Thuc. iv. 24). The myth which grew out of these perils of the sea was that in a cave high up on a rock dwelt Scylla, a daughter of Crataeis, a fearful monster, barking like a dog, with twelve feet, and six long necks and heads, each of which contained three rows of sharp teeth. The opposite rock, which was much lower, contained an immense fig-tree, under which dwelt Charybdis, who thrice every day swallowed down the waters of the sea, and thrice threw them up again: both were formidable to the ships which had to pass between them. (Od. xii. 73-110, 235-259, 430-444.) Hence the proverb, versified by a writer of the thirteenth century (the Alexandreis of Philip Gualtier): 'Incidis in Scyllam cupiens vitare Charybdim.' (For Charybdis as a proverb for danger cf. Hor. Od. i. 27, 19; Athen. p. 558; Cic. Phil. ii. 27, 67.) This is the Homeric account. Later traditions give different accounts of Scylla's parentage. Some describe her as a monster with six heads of different animals, or with three heads (Tzet. ad Lyc. 650; Eustath. p. 1719). One tradition relates that Scylla was originally a beautiful maiden, who often played with the nymphs of the sea, and was beloved by the marine god Glaucus, who applied to Circe for means to make Scylla return his love; but Circe, jealous of the fair maiden, threw magic herbs into the well in which Scylla was wont to bathe, by means of which the lower part of her body was changed into the tail of a fish or serpent, surrounded by dogs, while the upper part remained that of a woman. (Ov. Met. xiii. 732, 905, xiv. 40-67; Tibull. iii. 4, 89.) Another tradition related that Scylla was beloved by Poseidon, and that Amphitrite, from jealousy, metamorphosed her into a monster (Serv. ad Aen. iii. 420). Heracles is said to have killed her, because she stole some of the oxen of Geryon; but Phorcyas is said to have restored her to life (Hygr. Fab. praef.; Eustath. l. c.). Virgil (Aen. vi. 286) speaks of several Scyllae, and places them in the lower world. Charybdis is described as a daughter of Poseidon and Gaea, and a voracious woman, who stole oxen from Heracles, and was hurled by the thunderbolt of Zeus into the sea (Serv. ad Aen. iii. 420). It is likely that her voice like a dog's bark in the Odyssey, improved by later myths into dogs surrounding her lower limbs, was imagined partly from her name being connected with σκύλαξ, partly from the noise of waves upon the rocks.

Scyllaeum (Σκύλλαιον). 1. (Sciglio), a promontory on the coast of Bruttium, at the N. entrance of the Sicilian straits, where the monster Scylla was supposed to live [SCYLLA]. —2. (Scilla or Sciglio), a town in Bruttium, on the above-named promontory. There are still remains of the ancient citadel. (Plin. iii. 73.) —3. A promontory in Argolis, on the coast of Troezen, forming, with the promontory of Sunium in Attica, the entrance to the Saronic gulf (Paus. ii. 34, 7; Strab. p. 373). It is said to have derived its name from Scylla, the daughter of Nisus. [NISUS.]

Scymnus (Σκύμνος), of Chios, wrote a Periegesis, or description of the earth, which is referred to by later writers (Steph. Byz. s. v. Πάρος, Ἐρμῶνας; Schol. ad Ap. Rh. iv. 284). This work was in prose, and consequently different from the Periegesis in iambic metre which has come down to us, and which many modern writers have erroneously ascribed to Scymnus of Chios. The poem is dedicated to king Nicomedes, whom some modern writers suppose to be the same as Nicomedes III, king of Bithynia, who died B.C. 74; but this is quite uncertain.—The poem is edited by Meineke, Berlin, 1846, and in C. Müller, Geogr. Graec. Min.

Scyros (Σκύρος; Σκύριος; Scyro), an island in the Aegean sea, E. of Euboea, and one of the Sporades. It contained a town of the same name, and a river called Cephissus. (Strab. pp. 424, 436; Scyl. p. 23; Ptol. iii. 13, 47.) Its ancient inhabitants are said to have been Pelagians, Carians, and Dolopians. The island is frequently mentioned in the stories of the mythical period. Here Thetis concealed her son Achilles in woman's attire among the daughters of Lycomedes, in order to save him from the fate which awaited him under the walls of Troy. (Paus. i. 22, 6; Strab. p. 436; Apollod. iii. 13, 8.) It was here also that Pyrrhus, the son of Achilles by Deidamia, was brought up, and it was from this island that Odysseus fetched him to the Trojan war (Il. xix. 326, Od. xi. 509; Soph. Phil. 239). According to another tradition, the island was conquered by Achilles, in order to revenge the death of Theseus, who is said to have been treacherously destroyed in Scyros by Lycomedes (Il. ix. 664; Paus. l. c.; Plut. Thes. 35). The bones of Theseus were discovered by Cimon in Scyros, after his conquest of the island in B.C. 470, and were conveyed to Athens, where they were preserved in the Thesæum (Thuc. i. 98; Diod. xi. 60). From this time Scyros continued subject to Athens till the period of the Macedonian supremacy; but the Romans compelled the last Philip to restore it to Athens in 196 (Liv. xxxiii. 30). The soil of Scyros was unproductive; but it was celebrated for its breed of goats, and for its quarries of variegated marble.

Scythia (ἡ Σκυθική, ἡ Σκυθία, Ion. Σκυθίη, ἡ τῶν Σκυθέων χώρα, Hdt.: Σκύθης, Scythes, Scythia, pl. Σκύθαι, Scythae; fem. Σκυθίς, Scythia, Scythissa), a name applied to very different countries at different times. The Scythians are not named by Homer, though it is probable that they are those whom he calls ἱππημολγοί and γαλακτοφάγοι (mare-milkers and feeders on milk; Il. xiii. 7). Hesiod (Fr. 63) speaks of Scythians as dwelling in waggons and living on mares' milk, and Alcaeus (Fr. 49) calls Achilles 'ruler of Scythia' (i.e. at Leuce). From the Greek colonies on the Euxine founded in the seventh century B.C. more knowledge of the Scythians was gained by Hecataeus, Hippocrates and Herodotus, who had also visited the coasts of the Euxine. The Scythia of Herodotus comprises, to speak generally, the SE. parts of Europe between the Carpathian mountains and the river Tanaïs (Don). He describes the country as a square of 4000 stadia (400 geog. miles) each way, the W. boundary being the Ister (Danube) and the mountains of the Agathyrsi; the S. the shores of the Euxine and Palus Maeotis, from the mouth of the Ister to that of the Tanaïs, this side being divided into two equal parts, of 2000 stadia each, by the mouth of the Borysthenes (Dnieper); the E. boundary was the Tanaïs, and on the N. Scythia was divided by deserts from the Melanchlaeni, Androphagi, and Budini. It corresponded to the S. part of Russia in Europe. Herodotus says that the inhabitants, whom the Greeks named Scythians, called themselves Scoloti (Σκόλοτοι). He gives as the legend prevalent among the Scythians themselves about their origin, that Targitaus, the son of Zeus by a daughter of the river Borysthenes, was the father of Leipoxais, Arpoxais, and Colaxais. In their reign, there fell from heaven a yoke, an axe (σάγαρις), a plough-share, and a cup, all of gold. The two elder failed in taking them up, for they burnt when they approached them. But the younger did not fail, and retained the kingdom. From Leipoxais descended the Achaetae (γένος); from Arpoxais the Catiari and Traspies; from Colaxais the Paralatai. The general name for all is Scoloti. This was exactly 1000 years before the invasion of Darius. The gold was sacred; the country large. It extended so far north that the continual fall of feathers (snow) prevented things from being seen. The number of the kingdoms was three, the greatest of which had charge of the gold. Of this legend, the elements seem partly Scythian, and partly due to the country in which the Scythians settled. The descent from the Borysthenes belongs to this latter class. The story of the sons of Targitaus is found, in its main features, among the present Tartars. A tradition of the Pontic Greeks brought Heracles with the cattle of Geryones to Scythia. Three sons of Heracles and Echidna were mentioned, Agathesus, Gelonus and Scythes. The test of supremacy was being able to bend the bow which Heracles had left. This Scythes did, and remained as ruler (Hdt. iv. 8-10). Aristaeus tells also of the Scythians as neighbours of Hyperborei, Arimaspi, and gold-guarding Griffins (Hdt. iv. 13). This (like the Scythian legend) had probably a connexion with the gold actually found in the Ural mountains [HYPERBOREI]. The Scythians were believed by Herodotus to be of Asiatic origin, and his account of them, taken in connexion with the description given by Hippocrates of their physical peculiarities, leaves the impression that they were a part of the great Mongol race, who have wandered, from unknown antiquity, over the steppes of Central Asia. Driven out of their abodes in Asia, N. of the Araxes, by the Massagetae, and migrating into Europe, they pressed upon the Cimmerians, who passed over into Asia Minor, occupied the country about Sinope, sacked Magnesia and took Sardis in the reign of Ardys, B.C. 640-629 (Hdt. i. 6-15, iv. 12; Callin. Fr. 2, 3; Strab. pp. 627, 647, 648). Except for the occupation of the N. coast, this inroad of Cimmerians was temporary and brief. The Scythians themselves made a more formidable invasion of Asia about the same time. They swept over the country to Media, where they defeated CYAXARES, who had returned from the siege of Nineveh to meet them. They spread over Asia as far as Palestine and the borders of Egypt, from the invasion of which they were bought off by Psammethichus. At Ascalon they sacked the temple of Aphrodite, who was supposed to have visited them with a hereditary disease as a punishment. After twenty-eight years of invasion they were driven out by Cyaxares 607 B.C. (Hdt. i. 105). Herodotus adds that on their return to their own country they found that their slaves had intermarried with their wives, and they reduced them to submission by meeting them with whips instead of weapons of war. [For the subsequent invasion of Scythia by Darius, see p. 271, b.] The Scythians were a nomad people, shepherds or herdsmen, who had no fixed habitations, but roamed over a vast tract of country at their pleasure, and according to the wants of their cattle. They lived in a kind of covered waggons, which Aeschylus describes as 'lofty houses of wicker-work, on well-wheeled chariots' (Prom. 710; cf. Hor. Od. iii. 24, 9). They kept large troops of horses, and were most expert in cavalry exercises and archery; and hence, as the Persian king Darius found when he invaded their country (B.C. 507), it was almost impossible for an invading army to act against them. They simply retreated, waggons and all, before the enemy, harassing him with their light cavalry, and leaving famine and exposure, in their bare steppes, to do the rest. Like all the Mongol race, they were divided into several hordes, the chief of whom were called the Royal Scythians, and to these all the rest owed some degree of allegiance. As regards their religion, they worshipped chiefly the war-god whose symbol was a sword, displayed aloft on a platform and honoured by sacrifices of sheep and horses, and of prisoners taken in war. They took scalps from their foes and used the skulls of the slain as drinking cups (Hdt. iv. 62-75). Their government was a sort of patriarchal monarchy or chieftainship. An important modification of their habits had, however, taken place, to a certain extent, before Herodotus described them. The fertility of the plains on the N. of the Euxine, and the influence of the Greek settlements at the mouth of the Borysthenes, and along the coast, had led the inhabitants of this part of Scythia to settle down as cultivators of the soil, and had brought them into commercial and other relations with the Greeks. Accordingly, Herodotus mentions two classes or hordes of Scythians who had thus abandoned their nomad life: first, on the W. of the Borysthenes, two tribes of Hellenised Scythians, called Callipidae and Alazones; then, beyond these, 'the Scythians who are ploughers (Σκύθαι ἀροτῆρες), who do not grow their corn for food, but for sale; these dwelt about the river Hypanis (Bug) in the region now called the Ukraine, which is still, as it was to the Greeks, a great corn-exporting country. Again, on the E. of the Borysthenes were 'the Scythians who are husbandmen' (Σκύθαι γεωργοί), i.e. who grew corn for their own consumption: these were called Borysthenitae by the Greeks: their country extended three days' journey E. of the Borysthenes to the river PANTICAPES. Beyond these, to the E., dwelt 'the nomad Scythians (νομάδες Σκύθαι), who neither sow nor plough at all.' (Hdt. iv. 16-20.) Herodotus expressly states that the tribes E. of the Borysthenes were not Scythian. As regards the history of these Scythian tribes after the time of Herodotus, it is clear from the notice of Thucydides that they were regarded as formidable—indeed, irresistible—if they should ever unite in one common purpose (Thuc. ii. 95). Scythian slaves were sent from the Greek cities of the Bosphorus to Athens and were used by the state as a police (Σκύθαι or τοξόται) [Dict. of Ant. art. Demosii]. In later times they were gradually overpowered by the neighbouring people, especially the Sarmatians, who gave their name to the whole country. [SARMATIA.] At the same time the name of Scythian was still applied in Roman literature to the people and places N. of the Euxine: and not, perhaps, incorrectly, since there can be little doubt that the inhabitants of those lands were in great measure descendants of the Herodotean Scythians. This use of Scythian is particularly noticeable in Ovid's description of Tomi and the neighbouring districts; and it became geographically correct when Diocletian formed the province of Scythia (as part of the diocese of Thrace), consisting of the district between the mouths of the Danube and Odessus (Varna), with the chief towns Dionysopolis, Tomi and Calates. Meanwhile, the conquests of Alexander and his successors in Central Asia had made the Greeks acquainted with tribes beyond the Oxus and the Jaxartes who resembled the Scythians, and belonged, in fact, to the same great Mongol race, and to whom, accordingly, the same name was applied. [Some tribes of these Scythians were encountered and defeated by Alexander in Sogdiana (Arr. An. iv. 6, 11; Curt. vii. 9, 22).] Hence in writers of the time of the Roman empire the name of Scythia (except as regards Diocletian's province of Scythia Minor, mentioned above) denotes the whole of N. Asia, from the river Rha (Volga) on the W., which divided it from Asiatic Sarmatia, to Serica on the E., extending to India on the S. It was divided, by M. Imaus, into two parts, called respectively Scythia intra Imaum, on the NW. side of the range, and Scythia extra Imaum on the SE. side (Ptol. vi. 13-16). With the history of these countries we are not here concerned.

Scythini (Σκυθινός), a people on the W. border of Armenia, through whose country the Greeks under Xenophon marched four days' journey. Their territory was bounded on the E. by the river Harpasus, and on the W. by the river Apsarus. (Xen. An. iv. 7, 18; Diod. xiv. 29.)

Scythinus (Σκυθίνος), of Teos, turned into verse the great work of the philosopher Heraclitus, of which a considerable fragment is preserved by Stobaeus (Diog. Laërt. ix. 16; Müller, Fr. Hist. Graec.).

Scythópolis (Σκυθόπολις): O. T. Bethshan: Beisan, Ru.), an important city of Palestine, in the SE. of Galilee. It stood on a hill in the Jordan valley, W. of the river, and near one of its fords. Its site was fertilised by numerous springs; and to this advantage, as well as to its being the centre of several roads, it owed its great prosperity and its importance in the history of Palestine. It had a mixed population of Canaanites, Philistines, and Assyrian settlers, with perhaps some remnants of the Scythians. Its name is probably a relic of the Scythian incursion (p. 855, b; cf. Plin. v. 74; Dict. of the Bible, art. Bethshan). Under the later Roman empire, it became the seat of the archbishop of Palaestina Secunda, and it continued a flourishing city to the time of the first Crusade.

Scythotauri, Tauri Scythae, or Tauroscythae, a people of Sarmatia Europaea, just without the Chersonesus Taurica, between the rivers Carcinites and Hypanis, as far as the tongue of land called Dromos Achilleos (Ptol. iii. 5, 25; Plin. iv. 85).

Sēbastē (Σεβαστή = Augusta: Σεβαστηνός). 1. (Ayash, Ru.), a city on the coast of Cilicia Aspera, built for a residence by Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, to whom the Romans had granted the sovereignty of Cilicia, and named in honour of Augustus. It stood W. of the river Lamus, on a small island called Eleousa, the name of which appears to have been afterwards transferred to the city. (Strab. p. 671.)—2. (Segikler), a city of Phrygia, NW. of Eumenia.—3. [CABIRA].—4. [SAMARIA].

Sēbastēa (Σεβαστεία: Sivas), a city of Pontus, on the upper part of the river Halys, at a junction of roads from Comana Pontica, Nicopolis, Melitene, Comana Cappadociae, Mazaca and Tavium (Strab. pp. 559, 560).

Sēbastópolis (Σεβαστόπολις: Suhe Serai), a city of Pontus, SE. of Zela.

Sebennytus (Σεβέννυτος, ἡ Σεβεννυτική πόλις: Semennout, Ru.), a considerable city of Lower Egypt, in the Delta, on the W. side of the branch of the Nile called after it the Sebennytic Mouth, just at the fork made by this and the Phatnitic Mouth, and S. of Busiris. It was the capital of the Nomos Sebennytes or Sebennyticus (Strab. p. 802; Ptol. iv. 5, 50).

Sebēthus (Maddalena), a small river in Campania, flowing round Vesuvius, and falling into the Sinus Puteolanus at the E. side of Neapolis (Stat. Silv. i. 2, 263; Colum. x. 134).

Sebinus Lacus (Lago Seo or Tseo), a lake in Gallia Cisalpina, formed by the river Ollius between the lakes Larius and Benacus (Plin. ii. 224).

Secundus, P. Pompōnius, a tragic poet in the reigns of Tiberius, Caligula, and Claudius. He was one of the friends of Sejanus, and on the fall of that minister, in A.D. 31, was thrown into prison, where he remained till the accession of Caligula, in 37, by whom he was released. He was consul in 41, and in the reign of Claudius commanded in Germany, when he defeated the Chatti. (Tac. Ann. v. 8, xi. 13, xii. 28.) Secundus was an intimate friend of the elder Pliny, who wrote his Life in two books (Plin. vii. 8; Quintil. x. i. 98). His tragedies were the most celebrated of his literary compositions.

Sedētāni. [EDETANI.]

Sedigitus, Volcātius, a didactic poet in the middle of the second century B.C., from whose work De Poëtis A. Gellius (xv. 24) has preserved thirteen Iambic senarians, in which the principal Latin comic dramatists are enumerated in the order of merit. In this 'Canon,' as it has been termed, the first place is assigned to Caecilius Statius, the second to Plautus, the third to Naevius, the fourth to Licinius, the fifth to Attilius, the sixth to Terentius, the seventh to Turpilius, the eighth to Trabea, the ninth to Luscius, the tenth, 'causa antiquitatis,' to Ennius (Gell. l.c.).

Sedūlius, Coelius, of Seville, a Christian poet, about A.D. 450. His works are:—(1) Paschale Carmen s. Mirabilium Divinorum Libri V, in heroic measure. (2) Veteris et Novi Testamenti Collatio, a sort of hymn containing a selection of texts from the Old and New Testaments, arranged in such a manner as to enable the reader to compare the two dispensations. (3) Hymnus de Christo, an account of the life and miracles of Christ. (4) De Verbi Incarnatione, a Cento Virgilianus. He follows classical rhythm and diction.—Editions are by Cellarius, Hal. 1704 and 1739; Arevalus, Rome, 1794; Hulmer, Vienna, 1885.

Sedūni, an Alpine people in Gallia Belgica, E. of the lake of Geneva, in the valley of the Rhone, in the modern Vallais, who lived further up the valley than the Veragri. Their chief town was called Civitas Sedunorum, the modern Sion or Sitten. (Caes. B. G. iii. 1, 7; Plin. iii. 137.)

Sedusii, a German people, forming part of the army of Ariovistus when he invaded Gaul, B.C. 58. They are not mentioned at a later period, and consequently their site cannot be determined. (Caes. B. G. i. 51.)

Segēsāma or Segīsāmo (Segisamonensis: Sasamo), a town of the Murbogi or Turmodigi in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Taraco to Asturica (Strab. p. 162; Plin. iii. 25).

Segesta (Segestanus: nr. Alcamo, Ru.), the later Roman name of the town called by the Greeks Egesta or Aegesta (Ἐγέστα, Αἰγέστα, in Virg. Acesta: Ἐγέσταϊος, Αἰγέσταϊός, Acestaeus), situated in the NW. of Sicily, near the coast between Panormus and Drepanum. It was a town of the Elymi, and is said to have been founded by Trojans on two small rivers, to which they gave the names of Simois and Scamander; hence the Romans made it a colony of Aeneas. (Thuc. vi. 2; Dionys. i. 52; Strab. p. 608: see SICILIA.) Its inhabitants were constantly engaged in hostilities with Selinus; and it was at their solicitation that the Athenians were led to embark in their unfortunate expedition against Sicily. The town was taken by Agathocles, who destroyed or sold as slaves all its inhabitants, peopled the city with a body of deserters, and changed its name into that of Dicaeopolis; but after the death of this tyrant, the remains of the ancient inhabitants returned to the city and resumed their former name. In the neighbourhood of the city, on the road to Drepanum, were celebrated mineral springs, called Aquae Segestanae or Aquae Pintianae. Its ruins are of great beauty, especially those of its Doric temple dating from the sixth century B.C.

Segestes, a Cheruscan chieftain, the opponent of Arminius. Private injuries embittered their political feud, for Arminius carried off the daughter of Segestes. In A.D. 9 Segestes warned Quintilius Varus of the movement of Arminius against him; but his warning was disregarded, and Varus perished. In 14 Segestes was forced by his tribesmen into a war with Rome; but he afterwards made his peace with the Romans, and was allowed to live at Narbonne. (Tac. Ann. i. 55–59; Vell. Pat. ii. 118; Flor. iv. 12.) His son's name was Segimundus (Tac. Ann. i. 57).

Segetia or Segesta. [INDIGETES, p. 443, a.]

Segni, a German people in Gallia Belgica, between the Treveri and Eburones (Caes. B. G. vi. 32).

Segobriga, the chief town of the Celtiberi, in Hispania Tarraconensis, SW. of Caesaraugusta, probably in the neighbourhood of the modern Priego (Ptol. ii. 6, 58; Strab. p. 162).

Segontia or Seguntia, a town of the Celtiberi, in Hispania Tarraconensis, sixteen miles from Caesaraugusta (Liv. xxxiv. 19).

Segovia. 1. (Segovia), a town of the Arevaci, on the road from Emerita to Caesaraugusta. A magnificent Roman aqueduct is still extant at Segovia. (Ptol. ii. 6, 56.)—2. A town in Hispania Baetica on the Flumen Silicense, near Sacili.

Segusiāni, one of the most important peoples in Gallia Lugdunensis, bounded by the Allobroges on the S., by the Sequani on the E., by the Aedui on the N., and by the Arverni on the W. In the time of Caesar they were dependent on the Aedui. (Caes. B. G. i. 10, vii. 64; Strab. p. 186.) In their territory was the town of LUGDUNUM, the capital of the province.

Segusio (Susa), the capital of the Segusini and the residence of king Cottius, was situated in Gallia Transpadana, at the foot of the Cottian Alps. The triumphal arch erected at this place by Cottius in honour of Augustus is still extant. After the death of the younger Cottius in the reign of Nero it became a Roman municipal town. (Suet. Ner. 18; Strab. pp. 179, 204.)

Seius Strabo. [SEJANUS.]

Sejanus, Aelius, was born at Vulsinii, in Etruria, and was the son of Seius Strabo, who was commander of the praetorian troops at the close of the reign of Augustus, A.D. 14 (Tac. Ann. iv. 1; Vell. Pat. ii. 127). In the same year Sejanus was made the colleague of his father in the command of the praetorian bands, and upon his father being sent as governor to Egypt, he obtained the sole command of these troops. He ultimately gained such influence over Tiberius that he made him his confidant. Not content with this position of influence, Sejanus formed the design of obtaining the imperial power. With this view he sought to make himself popular with the soldiers, and gave posts of honour and emoluments to his creatures and favourites. With the same object he resolved to get rid of all the members of the imperial family. He seduced Livia, the wife of Drusus, the son of Tiberius, and by promising her marriage and a participation in the imperial power, he was enabled, in A.D. 23, to poison Drusus with her connivance and assistance. (Tac. Ann. iv. 8, 10.) An accident increased the credit of Sejanus, and confirmed the confidence of Tiberius. The emperor, with Sejanus and others, was feasting in a cave between Amyclae and the hills of Fundi. The entrance of the cave suddenly fell in, and crushed some of the slaves; and all the guests, in alarm, tried to make their escape. Sejanus, resting his knees on the couch of Tiberius, and placing his shoulders under the falling rock, protected his master, and was discovered in this posture by the soldiers who came to their relief. After Tiberius had shut himself up in the island of Capreae, Sejanus had full scope for his machinations; and the death of Livia, the mother of Tiberius (29), was followed by the banishment of Agrippina and her sons Nero and Drusus. Tiberius at last began to suspect the designs of Sejanus, and felt that it was time to rid himself of a man who was almost more than a rival. To cover his schemes and remove Sejanus from about him, Tiberius made him joint consul with himself, in 31. He then sent Sertorius Macro to Rome, with a commission to take the command of the praetorian cohorts. Macro, after assuring himself of the troops, and depriving Sejanus of his usual guard, produced a letter from Tiberius to the senate, in which the emperor expressed his apprehensions of Sejanus. The consul Regulus conducted him to prison, and the people loaded him with insult and outrage. The senate on the same day decreed his death, and he was immediately executed. His body was dragged about the streets, and finally thrown into the Tiber. Many of the friends of Sejanus perished at the same time, and his son and daughter shared his fate. (Tac. Ann. iv. 41-59, 74, v. 6-9; Suet. Tib.; Dio Cass. lvii. lviii.; Juv. x. 65-86.)

Sēlēnē (Σελήνη), called Lūna by the Romans, was the goddess of the moon, or the moon personified as a divine being. She is called a daughter of Hyperion and Thia, and accordingly a sister of Helios (Sol) and Eos (Aurora); but others speak of her as a daughter of Hyperion by Euryphaessa, or of Pallas, or of Zeus and Latona (Hes. Th. 371; Hymn. in Merc. 100; Apollod. i. 2, 2). By Endymion, whom she loved, and whom she sent to sleep in order to kiss him, she became the mother of fifty daughters; and to Zeus she bore Pandia, Ersa, and Nemea. [For this myth see ENDYMION.] Pan is said to have wooed her in the shape of a white ram. Selene was represented at Elis with a crescent moon above her head (Paus. vi. 24, 5). She drove, like her brother Helios, across the heavens in a chariot drawn by two white horses. In later myths Selene was identified with Artemis or Diana, and the worship of the two became amalgamated. At Rome Luna had an ancient temple on the Aventine and another on the Palatine.

Sēlēne. [CLEOPATRA, No. 9.]

Seleucia, (Σελεύκεια: Σελευκίς: Seleucenis, Seleucēnus), the name of several cities in Asia, built by Seleucus I., king of Syria. 1. S. ad Tigrin (ἡ ἐπὶ τοῦ Τίγρητος ποταμοῦ, πρὸς Τίγρει, ἀπὸ Τίγριος), also called S. Babylonia (Σ. ἡ ἐν Βαβυλῶνι), S. Assyriae, and S. Parthorum, a great city on the confines of Assyria and Babylonia, and for a long time the capital of W. Asia, until it was eclipsed by CTESIPHON. It stood on the W. bank of the Tigris, N. of its junction with the Royal Canal, opposite to the mouth of the river Delas or Silla (Diala), and to the spot where Ctesiphon was afterwards built by the Parthians. It was a little to the S. of the modern city of Bagdad. Perhaps a better site could not be found in W. Asia. It commanded the navigation of the Tigris and Euphrates, and the whole plain of those two rivers; and it stood at the junction of all the chief caravan roads by which the traffic between E. and W. Asia was carried on. (Strab. p. 738; App. Syr. 57; Tac. Ann. vi. 42; Jos. Ant. xviii. 4, 8; Ptol. v. 18, 8.) In addition to these advantages, its people had, by the gift of Seleucus, the government of their own affairs. It was built in the form of an eagle with expanded wings, and was peopled by settlers from Assyria, Mesopotamia, Babylonia, Syria, and Judaea. It rapidly rose, and eclipsed Babylon in wealth and splendour. Even after the Parthian kings had become masters of the banks of the Tigris, and had fixed their residence at Ctesiphon, Seleucia, though deprived of much of its importance, remained a very considerable city, and preserved its Greek character. In the reign of Titus, it had, according to Pliny, 600,000 inhabitants (Plin. vi. 122). It was burned by Trajan in his Parthian expedition, and again by L. Verus, the colleague of M. Aurelius Antoninus, when its population is given by different authorities as 300,000 or 400,000. It was again taken by Severus, and from this blow it never recovered. In Julian's expedition it was found entirely deserted. (Amm. Marc. xxiv. 5.)—2. S. Pieria (Σ. Πιερία, ἡ ἐν Πιερία, ἡ πρὸς Ἀντιοχείᾳ, ἡ πρὸς θαλάσσεια, ἡ ἐπιθαλασσία: Ru., called Seleukeh or Kepse, near Suadeiah), a great city and fortress of Syria, founded by Seleucus in April B.C. 300, one month before the foundation of Antioch. It stood on the site of an ancient fortress, on the rocks overhanging the sea, at the foot of M. Pieria, about four miles N. of the Orontes, and twelve miles W. of Antioch. Its natural strength was improved by every known art of fortification, to which were added all the works of architecture and engineering required to make it a splendid city and a great seaport, while it obtained abundant supplies from the fertile plain between the city and Antioch. (Strab. pp. 656, 749, 750; Pol. v. 58.) The remains of Seleucus I. were interred at Seleucia, in a mausoleum surrounded by a grove. In the war with Egypt which ensued upon the murder of Antiochus II. Seleucia surrendered to Ptolemy III. Euergetes (B.C. 246). It was afterwards recovered by Antiochus the Great (219). In the war between Antiochus VIII. and Antiochus IX. the people of Seleucia made themselves independent (109 or 108). Afterwards, having successfully resisted the attacks of Tigranes for fourteen years (84-70), they were confirmed in their freedom by Pompey. The city had fallen entirely into decay by the sixth century of our era. There are considerable ruins of the harbour and mole, of the walls of the city, and of its necropolis. The surrounding district was called SELEUCIS.—3. S. Tracheotis (Selefkeh, Ru.), an important city of Cilicia Aspera, was built by Seleucus I. on the W. bank of the river Calycadnus, about four miles from its mouth, and peopled with the inhabitants of several neighbouring cities. It had an oracle of Apollo, and annual games in honour of Zeus Olympius. (Strab. p. 670; Plin. v. 93; Zos. i. 57; Amm. Marc. xiv. 25.) It vied with Tarsus in power and splendour, and was a free city under the Romans. It was the birthplace of the philosophers Athenaeus and Xenarchus, and of the sophist Alexander. —There were other cities of the name, of less importance, in Pisidia, Pamphylia, Palestine, Elymais.

Sēleucis (Σελευκίς). A beautiful and fertile district of Syria, containing the NW. part of the country, between M. Amanus on the N., the Mediterranean on the W., the districts of Cyrrhestice and Chalybonitis on the NE., the desert on the E. and Coelesyria and the mountains of Lebanon on the S. It included the valley of the lower Orontes, and contained the four great cities of Antioch, Seleucia, Laodicea, and Apamea, whence it was also called Tetrapolis. In later times, the name was confined to the small district N. of the Orontes; the S. part of the former Seleucis being divided into Cassiotis, W. of the Orontes, and Apamene, E. of the river. (Ptol. v. 5, 15; Strab. p. 749.)

Seleucus (Σέλευκος), the name of several kings of Syria. I., surnamed Nicator, the founder of the Syrian monarchy, reigned B.C. 312-280. He was the son of Antiochus, a Macedonian of distinction among the officers of Philip II., and was born about 358. He accompanied Alexander on his expedition to Asia, and distinguished himself in the Indian campaigns. (Ar. An. v. 13, 16.) After the death of Alexander (323) he espoused the side of Perdiccas, whom he accompanied on his expedition against Egypt; but he took a leading part in the mutiny of the soldiers which ended in the death of Perdiccas (321). (App. Syr. 57; Diod. xviii. 3.) In the second partition of the provinces which followed, Seleucus obtained the satrapy of Babylonia. In the war between Antigonus and Eumenes, Seleucus afforded support to the former; but after the death of Eumenes (316), Antigonus began to treat the other satraps as his subjects. Thereupon Seleucus fled to Egypt, where he induced Ptolemy to unite with Lysimachus and Cassander in a league against their common enemy. In the war that ensued Seleucus took an active part. At length, in 312, he recovered Babylon; and whole of Asia, from the remote provinces of Bactria and Sogdiana to the coasts of Phoenicia, and from the Paropamisus to the central plains of Phrygia, where the boundary which separated him from Lysimachus is not clearly defined. It formed a realm much larger but, full of discordant elements, far less compact and united than that of the Ptolemies. Seleucus appears to have felt the difficulty of exercising a vigilant control over so extensive an empire, and accordingly, in 293, he consigned the government of all the provinces beyond the Euphrates to his son Antiochus, upon whom he bestowed the title of king, as well as the hand of his own youthful wife, Stratonice, for whom the prince had conceived a violent attachment. (App. Syr. 55-62.) In 288, the ambitious designs of Demetrius (now become king of Macedonia) once more aroused the common jealousy of his old adversaries, and led Seleucus again to unite in a league with Ptolemy and Lysimachus against him. After Demetrius had been driven from his kingdom by Lysimachus, he transported the seat of war into Asia Minor, but he was compelled to surrender to Seleucus in 286. The Syrian king kept Demetrius in confinement till three years afterwards, but during the whole of that time treated him in a friendly manner. (Plut. Demetr. 44-50.) For some time jealousies had existed between Seleucus and Lysimachus; but the immediate cause of the war between the two monarchs, which terminated in the defeat and death of Lysimachus (281), is related in the life of the latter. Seleucus now crossed the Hellespont in order to take possession of the throne of Macedonia, which had been left vacant by the death of Lysimachus; but he had advanced no farther than Lysimachia, when he was assassinated by Ptolemy Ceraunus, to whom, as the son of his old friend and ally, he had extended a friendly protection. His death took place in the beginning of 280, only seven months after that of Lysimachus, and in the thirty-second year of his reign. He was in his seventy-eighth year. (App. Syr. 62, 63; Just. xvii. 1; Paus. i. 16, 2.) Seleucus appears to have carried out with great energy and perseverance the projects originally formed by Alexander himself for the Hellenisation of his Asiatic empire; and we find him founding, in almost every province, Greek or Macedonian colonies, which became so many centres of civilisation and refinement. Of these no less than sixteen are mentioned as bearing the name of Antiochia after his father; five that of Laodicea, from his mother; seven were called after himself Seleucia; three from the name of his first wife, Apamea; and one Stratonicea, from his second wife, the daughter of Demetrius. Numerous other cities, whose names attest their Macedonian origin—Beroea, Edessa, Pella, &c.—likewise owed their first foundation to Seleucus.—II., surnamed Callinicus (246-226), was the eldest son of Antiochus II. by his first wife, Laodice. The first measure of his administration, or rather that of his mother, was to put to death his stepmother Berenice, together with her infant son. (Just. xxvii. 1.) This act of cruelty produced the most disastrous effects. In order to avenge his sister, Ptolemy Euergetes, king of Egypt, invaded the dominions of Seleucus, and not only made himself master of Antioch and the whole of Syria, but carried his arms unopposed beyond the Euphrates and the Tigris. During these operations Seleucus kept wholly aloof, it is from this period that the Syrian monarchy is commonly reckoned to commence. (Diod. xix. 58-91; App. Syr. 64.) The Seleucian era on their coins dates from Oct. 1st B.C. 312. Soon afterwards Seleucus defeated Nicanor, the satrap of Media, and followed up his victory by the conquest of Susiana, Media, and some adjacent districts. For the next few years he gradually extended his power over all the eastern provinces which had formed part of the empire of Alexander, from the Euphrates to the banks of the Oxus and the Indus. In 306 Seleucus followed the example of Antigonus and Ptolemy, by formally assuming the regal title and diadem (Diod. xx. 53). In 302 he joined the league formed for the second time by Ptolemy, Lysimachus, and Cassander, against Antigonus. The united forces of Seleucus and Lysimachus gained a decisive victory over Antigonus at Ipsus (301), in which Antigonus himself was slain. In the division of the spoil, Seleucus obtained the largest share, being rewarded for his service with a great part of Asia Minor (which was divided between him and Lysimachus) as well as with the whole of Syria, from the Euphrates to the Mediterranean. The empire of Seleucus was now by far the most extensive and powerful of those which had been formed out of the dominions of Alexander. It comprised the but when Ptolemy had been recalled to his own dominions by domestic disturbances, he recovered possession of the greater part of the provinces which he had lost. (Just. xxvii. 2; Polyæn. viii. 61). Soon afterwards Seleucus became involved in a dangerous war with his brother, Antiochus Hierax, who attempted to obtain Asia Minor as an independent kingdom for himself. This war lasted several years, but was at length terminated by the decisive defeat of Antiochus, who was obliged to quit Asia Minor and take refuge in Egypt. Seleucus undertook an expedition to the East, with the view of reducing the revolted provinces of Parthia and Bactria, which had availed themselves of the disordered state of the Syrian empire to throw off its yoke. He was, however, defeated by Arsaces, king of Parthia, in a great battle which was long afterwards celebrated by the Parthians as the foundation of their independence. After the expulsion of Antiochus, Attalus, king of Pergamus, extended his dominions over the greater part of Asia Minor; and Seleucus appears to have been engaged in an expedition for the recovery of these provinces when he was accidentally killed by a fall from his horse, in the twenty-first year of his reign, 226. He left two sons, who successively ascended the throne, Seleucus Ceraunus and Antiochus, afterwards surnamed the Great. (Just. xxvii. 3; App. Syr. 66.) His own surname of Callinicus was probably assumed after his recovery of the provinces that had been overrun by Ptolemy.—III., surnamed Ceraunus (226-223), eldest son and successor of Seleucus II. The surname of Ceraunus was given him by the soldiery, apparently in derision, as he appears to have been feeble both in mind and body. He was assassinated by two of his officers, after a reign of only three years, and was succeeded by his brother, Antiochus the Great. (Pol. iv. 48, v. 40; App. Syr. 66.)—IV., surnamed Philopator (187-175), was the son and successor of Antiochus the Great. The defeat of his father by the Romans, and the ignominious peace which followed it, had greatly diminished the power of the Syrian monarchy, and the reign of Seleucus was in consequence feeble and inglorious, and was marked by no striking events. He was assassinated in 175 by one of his own ministers. He left two children: Demetrius, who subsequently ascended the throne; and Laodice, married to Perseus, king of Macedonia. (App. Syr. 45, 66.)—V., eldest son of Demetrius II., assumed the royal diadem on learning the death of his father, 125; but his mother, Cleopatra, who had herself put Demetrius to death, was indignant at hearing that her son had ventured to take such a step without her authority, and caused Seleucus also to be assassinated (App. Syr. 68, 69; Just. xxxix. 1).—VI., surnamed Epiphanes and also Nicator (95-93), was the eldest of the five sons of Antiochus VIII. Grypus. On the death of his father, in 95, he ascended the throne, and defeated and slew in battle his uncle Antiochus Cyzicenus, who had laid claim to the kingdom. But shortly after Seleucus was in his turn defeated by Antiochus Eusebes, the son of Cyzicenus, and expelled from Syria. He took refuge in Cilicia, where he established himself in the city of Mopsuestia; but in consequence of his tyranny, the citizens attacked and burnt the palace, and Seleucus perished in the flames. (App. Syr. 69; Jos. Ant. xiii. 13, 4.)

Selgē (Σέλγη: Σελγεύς: Sürk, Ru.), one of the chief of the independent mountain cities of Pisidia, stood on the S. side of M. Taurus, on the Eurymedon, just where the river breaks through the mountain chain. On a rock above it was a citadel named Κεσβέδιον, in which was a temple of Hera. Its inhabitants, who were the most warlike of all the Pisidians, claimed descent from the Lacedaemonians, and inscribed the name Λακεδαιμίων on their coins (Strab. p. 570). They could bring an army of 20,000 men into the field, and, as late as the fifth century, we find them beating back a horde of Goths (Zos. v. 15). From a valley near the city, in the heart of lofty mountains, came wine and oil and other products of the most luxuriant vegetation. The site of the ancient city is marked by fine ruins.

Sicily, situated upon a hill on the SW. coast, and upon a river of the same name. It is said to have derived its name from the quantity of wild parsley (σελινός) which grew in the neighbourhood. It was founded by the Dorians from Megara Hyblaea on the E. coast of Sicily, about B.C. 628. (Thuc. vi. 4, vii. 57; Strab. p. 272.) It soon attained great prosperity. In 480 it took part with the Carthaginians (Diod. xi. 21). In 416 the dispute with the Segestans, who sought the aid of Athens, occasioned the Athenian expedition to Sicily. After the defeat of the Athenians, the Carthaginians came to help Segesta, and took Selinus in 409, when most of its inhabitants were slain or sold as slaves, and the greater part of the city destroyed. The population of Selinus must at that time have been very considerable, since we are told that 16,000 men fell in the siege and conquest of the town, 5000 were carried to Carthage as slaves, 2600 fled to Agrigentum, and many others took refuge in the surrounding villages. The Carthaginians, however, allowed the inhabitants to return to Selinus in the course of the same year, and it continued to be a place of secondary importance till 249, when it was again destroyed by the Carthaginians and its inhabitants transferred to Lilybaeum. (Diod. xiii. 48-59, xxiv. 1.) The surrounding country produced excellent wheat. East of Selinus on the road to Agrigentum, were celebrated mineral springs called Aquae Selinuntiae, subsequently Aquae Labodae or Labodes, the modern Baths of Sciacca. The ruins of Selinus are of great magnificence and important in archaeology. The oldest temple, of a date early in the sixth cent. B.C., had remarkable sculptures of an archaic type on the metope (now at Palermo); and the gradual refinement of art is traced in the metopes of the later temples. The great Doric temple of Zeus in the Agora with seventeen columns at the sides is one of the largest Greek temples, of which very considerable remains are extant, 359 feet in length [see Dict. of Ant. art. Templum].—2. (Selenti), a town in Cilicia, situated on the coast and upon a rock which was almost entirely surrounded by the sea. In consequence of the death of the emperor Trajan in this town, it was for a long time called Trajanopolis. (Strab. p. 682; Hierocl. p. 709.)

Sellasia (Σελλασία or Σελασία), a town in Laconica, N. of Sparta, was situated near the river Oenus, and commanded one of the principal passes leading to Sparta. Here the celebrated battle was fought between Cleomenes III. and Antigonus Doson, B.C. 221, in which the former was defeated. (Pol. ii. 65-70.)

Sellēis (Σελλήεις). 1. A river in Elis, on which the Homeric Ephyra stood, rising in mount Pholoë and falling into the sea, S. of the Peneus (Il. ii. 659, xv. 531).—2. A river near Sicyon.—3. A river in Troas, near Arisbe, and a tributary of the Rhodius.

Selli or Helli. [DODONA.]

Selymbria or Selybria (Σηλυμβρία, Σηλυβρία, Dor. Σαλαμβρία; Σηλυμβριανός; Selivria), an important town in Thrace, situated on the Propontis. It was a colony of the Megarians, and was founded about 660 B.C., two years before Byzantium. (Hd. vi. 33; Xen. An. vii. 2, 15; Strab. p. 319.) It was taken by Alcibiades in 410 (Xen. Hell. i. 1, 21). It continued to be a place of considerable importance till its conquest by Philip, the father of Alexander, from which time its decline may be dated. Under the later emperors it was called Eudoxiapolis, in honour of Eudoxia, the wife of Arcadius (Hierocl. p. 632); but it afterwards recovered its ancient name.

Sēmēchōnitis or Samachonitis Lacus (Σεμεχωνίτις, Σαμαχωνίτις and -ιτων λίμνη; O. T. Waters of Merom: Nahr-el-Huleh), a small lake in the N. of Palestine, the highest of the three formed by the Jordan, both branches of which fall into its N. end, while the river flows out of its S. end in one stream. [Dict. of the Bible, art. Merom.]

Sēmēlē. [DIONYSUS.]

Sēmīrāmis (Σεμίραμις) and Nīnus (Νῖνος), the mythical founders of the Assyrian empire of Ninus or Nineveh. Ninus was the Greek name for the historical Rimmon Mirari who lived about 1330 B.C. [see p. 135, b]. According to the Greek legends about him, related by Diodorus, who derives his account from Ctesias, Ninus was a great warrior, who built the town of Ninus or Nineveh, about B.C. 2182, and subdued the greater part of Asia. Semiramis was the daughter of the fish-goddess Derceto of Ascalon in Syria by a Syrian youth; but being ashamed of her frailty, she made away with the youth, and exposed her infant daughter. But the child was miraculously preserved by doves, who fed her till she was discovered by the shepherds of the neighbourhood. She was then brought up by the chief shepherd of the royal herds, whose name was Simmas, and from whom she derived the name of Semiramis. Her beauty attracted the notice of Onnes, one of the king's generals, who married her. He subsequently sent for his wife to the army, which was engaged in the siege of Bactra. Upon her arrival in the camp she planned an attack upon the citadel of the town, mounted the walls with a few brave followers, and obtained possession of the place. Ninus was so charmed by her bravery and beauty, that he resolved to marry her, whereupon her husband put an end to his life. By Ninus Semiramis had a son, Ninyas, and on the death of Ninus she succeeded him on the throne (Diod. ii. 1-20). According to another account, Semiramis had obtained from her husband permission to rule over Asia for five days, and availed herself of this opportunity to cast the king into a dungeon, or, as is also related, to put him to death, and thus obtained the sovereign power (Diod. ii. 20; Ael. V. H. vii. 1). Her fame threw into the shade that of Ninus; and later ages loved to tell of her marvellous deeds and her heroic achievements. She built numerous cities, and erected many wonderful buildings; and several of the most extraordinary works in the East which were extant in a later age, and the authors of which were unknown, were ascribed by popular tradition to this queen. In Nineveh she erected a tomb for her husband, nine stadia high, and ten wide; she built the city of Babylon, with all its wonders; and she constructed the hanging gardens in Media, of which later writers give us such strange accounts (Hdt. i. 184). Besides conquering many nations of Asia, she subdued Egypt and a great part of Ethiopia, but was unsuccessful in an attack which she made upon India. After a reign of forty-two years she resigned the sovereignty to her son Ninyas, and disappeared from the earth, taking her flight to heaven in the form of a dove. It is probable that some of the myths connected with the worship of Ishtar or Astarte, the Eastern Aphrodite, gathered round the name of Semiramis.

Semnōnes, more rarely Sennōnes, a German people, described by Tacitus as the most powerful tribe of the Suevic race, dwelt between the rivers Viadus (Oder) and Albis (Elbe), from the Riesengebirge in the S. as far as the country around Frankfurt on the Oder and Potsdam in the N. (Tac. Germ. 39; Strab. p. 290; Ptol. ii. 11, 15).

Sēmō Sancus. [SANCUS.]

Semprōnia. 1. Daughter of Tib. Gracchus, censor B.C. 169, and sister of the two celebrated tribunes, married Scipio Africanus minor. [SCIPIO].—2. Wife of D. Junius Brutus, consul 77, was a woman of great personal attractions and literary accomplishments, but of a profligate character. She took part in Catiline's conspiracy, though her husband was not privy to it (Sall. Cat. 25, 40).

Semprōnia Gens, was of great antiquity, and one of its members, A. Sempronius Atratinus, obtained the consulship as early as B.C. 497, twelve years after the foundation of the republic. The Sempronii were divided into many families, of which the ATRATINI were patrician, but all the others were plebeian: their names are ASELLIO, BLAESUS, GRACCHUS, SOPHUS, TUDITANUS.

Sēna (Senensis). 1. (Senigaglia), surnamed Gallica, and sometimes called Senogallia, a town on the coast of Umbria, at the mouth of the small river Sena, was founded by the Senones, a Gallic people, and was made a colony by the Romans after the conquest of the Senones, B.C. 283 (Ptol. ii. 19; Sil. It. viii. 453). Near it was fought the battle in which Hasdrubal was defeated and slain. [METAURUS.] In the Civil war it espoused the Marian party, and was taken and sacked by Pompey (App. B. C. i. 88).—2. (Siena), a town in Etruria and a Roman colony, on the road from Clusium to Florentia, is only mentioned in the times of the emperors (Tac. Hist. iv. 45). Its importance, as a great city of Tuscany, dates from the middle ages.

Sena Insula (I. de Sein), an island off the coast of the Osismii, the W. point of Brittany, which possessed an oracle of a Celtic goddess tended by nine maidens, who could raise or lull storms by their chants (Mel. iii. 6).

Sēneca. 1. M. Annaeus, the rhetorician, was born at Corduba (Cordova) in Spain, about B.C. 61. Seneca was at Rome in the early period of the power of Augustus, for he says that he had heard Ovid declaiming before Arellius Fuscus. He afterwards returned to Spain, and married Helvia, by whom he had three sons, L. Annaeus Seneca, L. Annaeus Mela or Mella, the father of the poet Lucan, and M. Novatus. Novatus was the eldest son, and took the name of Junius Gallio, upon being adopted by Junius Gallio. Seneca was rich, and he belonged to the equestrian class. At a later period Seneca returned to Rome, where he resided till his death, which probably occurred near the end of the reign of Tiberius. In character he was strict and conservative of the old school (Sen. ad Helv. 17, 3). In his writings he aimed at maintaining the style of Cicero. Two of Seneca's works have come down to us. (1) Controversiarum Libri decem, which he addressed to his three sons. The first, second, seventh, eighth, and tenth books only are extant, and these are somewhat mutilated: of the other books only fragments remain. These Controversiae are rhetorical exercises on imaginary cases, filled with citations and anecdotes which bear out his reputation for having a wonderful memory. (2) Suasoriarum Liber, which is not complete. We may collect from its contents what the subjects were on which the rhetoricians of that age exercised their wits: one of them is, 'Shall Cicero apologise to M. Antonius? Shall he agree to burn his Philippics, if Antonius requires it?' Another is, 'Shall Alexander embark on the ocean?' The rhetorical themes in themselves are trivial; but this and the preceding work are valuable for the history of rhetoric in the age of Augustus and Tiberius. Editions by Gronovius, 1649; Kiessling, 1872; H. J. Müller, Prague, 1887.—2. L. Annaeus, the philosopher, the son of the preceding, was born at Corduba, probably a few years B.C., and brought to Rome by his parents when he was a child. Though he was naturally of a weak body, he was a hard student from his youth, and he devoted himself with great ardour to rhetoric and philosophy. He also soon gained distinction as a pleader of causes, and he excited the jealousy of Caligula by the ability with which he conducted a case in the senate before the emperor. In the first year of the reign of Claudius (A.D. 41) Seneca was banished to Corsica, on account of his intimacy with Julia, the niece of Claudius, of whom Messallina was jealous (Tac. Ann. xiii. 42; Dio Cass. lxi. 10). After eight years' residence in Corsica, he was recalled (49) by the influence of Agrippina, who had just married her uncle, the emperor Claudius. He now obtained a praetorship, and was made the tutor of the young Domitian, afterwards the emperor Nero, who was the son of Agrippina by a former husband. On the accession of his pupil to the imperial throne (54) after the death of Claudius, Seneca became one of his chief advisers (Suet. Ner. 7). He exerted his influence to check Nero's vicious propensities, but at the same time he profited from his position to amass an immense fortune (Tac. Ann. xiii. 2, 11, 13, 42; Dio Cass. l.c.). He supported Nero in his contests with his mother, Agrippina, and was not only a party to the death of the latter (60), but he wrote the letter which Nero addressed to the senate in justification of the murder (Tac. Ann. xiv. 11). After the death of his mother Nero abandoned himself without any restraint to his vicious propensities, and the presence of Seneca soon became irksome, while his wealth excited the emperor's cupidity. Burrus, the prefect of the praetorian guards, who had always been a firm supporter of Seneca, died in 63. His death broke the power of Seneca, and Nero now fell into the hands of persons who were exactly suited to his taste. Tigellinus and Fennius Rufus, who succeeded Burrus in the command of the praetorians, began an attack on Seneca. His enormous wealth, his gardens and villas, more magnificent than those of the emperor, his exclusive claims to eloquence, and his disparagement of Nero's skill in driving and singing, were all urged against him; and it was time, they said, for Nero to get rid of a teacher. Seneca heard of the charges against him: he was rich, and he knew that Nero wanted money. He asked the emperor for permission to retire, and offered to surrender all that he had. Nero affected to be grateful for his past services, refused the proffered gift, and sent him away with perfidious assurances of his respect and affection. Seneca now altered his mode of life, saw little company, and seldom visited the city, on the ground of feeble health (he suffered from asthma) or of being occupied with his philosophical studies. The conspiracy of Piso (65) gave the emperor a pretext for putting Seneca to death, though there was not complete evidence of his being a party to the conspiracy. Seneca was at the time returning from Campania, and had rested at a villa four miles from the city. Nero sent a tribune to him with the order of death. Without showing any sign of alarm, Seneca cheered his weeping friends by reminding them of the lessons of philosophy. Embracing his wife, Pompeia Paulina, he prayed her to moderate her grief, and to console herself for the loss of her husband by the reflection that he had lived an honourable life. But as Paulina protested that she would die with him, Seneca consented, and the veins in the arms of both were opened. Seneca's body was attenuated by age and meagre diet, perhaps also from his attacks of asthma; the blood would not flow easily, and he opened the veins in his legs. His torture was excessive; and to save himself and his wife the pain of seeing one another suffer, he bade her retire to her chamber. His last words were taken down in writing by persons who were called in for the purpose, and were afterwards published. Seneca's torments being still prolonged, he took hemlock from his friend and physician, Statius Annaeus, but it had no effect. At last he entered a warm bath, and as he sprinkled some of the water on the slaves nearest to him he said, that he made a libation to Jupiter the Liberator. He was then taken into a vapour stove, where he was quickly suffocated. (Tac. Ann. xv. 60-64.) Seneca died, as was the fashion among the Romans, with the courage of a Stoic, but with somewhat of a theatrical affectation which detracts from the dignity of the scene. Seneca's great misfortune was to have known Nero; and though we cannot say that he was a truly great or a truly good man, his character will not lose by comparison with that of many others who have been placed in equally difficult circumstances.—Seneca's fame rests on his numerous writings, of which the following are extant:—(1) De Ira, in three books, addressed to Novatus, probably the earliest of Seneca's works. In the first book he combats what Aristotle says of Anger in his Ethics. (2) De Consolatione ad Helviam Matrem Liber, a consolatory letter to his mother, written during his residence in Corsica. It is one of his best treatises. (3) De Consolatione ad Polybium Liber, also written in Corsica. If it is the work of Seneca, it does him no credit. Polybius was the powerful freedman of Claudius, and the Consolatio is intended to comfort him on the occasion of the loss of his brother. But it also contains adulation of the emperor, and many expressions unworthy of a true Stoic or of an honest man. (4) Liber de Consolatione ad Marciam, written after his return from exile, was designed to console Marcia for the loss of her son. Marcia was the daughter of A. Cremutius Cordus. (5) De Providentia Liber, or Quare bonis viris mala accidunt cum sit Providentia, is addressed to the younger Lucilius, procurator of Sicily. The question that is here discussed often engaged the ancient philosophers: the Stoical solution of the difficulty is that suicide is the remedy when misfortune has become intolerable. In this discourse Seneca says that he intends to prove 'that Providence hath a power over all things, and that God is always present with us.' (6) De Animi Tranquillitate, addressed to Serenus, probably written soon after Seneca's return from exile. It is in the form of a letter rather than a treatise: the object is to discover the means by which tranquillity of mind can be obtained. (7) De Constantia Sapientis seu quod in sapientem non cadit injuria, also addressed to Serenus, is founded on the Stoical doctrine of the impassiveness of the wise man. (8) De Clementia ad Neronem Caesarem Libri duo, written at the beginning of Nero's reign. There is too much of the flatterer in this; but the advice is good. The second book is incomplete. It is in the first chapter of this second book that the anecdote is told of Nero's unwillingness to sign a sentence of execution, and his exclamation, 'I would I could neither read nor write.' (9) De Brevitate Vitae ad Paulinum Liber, recommends the proper employment of time and the getting of wisdom as the chief purpose of life. (10) De Vita Beata ad Gallionem, addressed to his brother, L. Junius Gallio, is probably one of the later works of Seneca, in which he maintains the Stoical doctrine that there is no happiness without virtue; but he does not deny that other things, as health and riches, have their value. The conclusion of the treatise is lost. (11) De Otio aut Secessu Sapientis, is sometimes joined to No. 10. (12) De Beneficiis Libri septem, addressed to Aebucius Liberalis, is an admirable treatise on the way of conferring a favour, and of the duties of the giver and of the receiver. (13) Epistolae ad

Lucilium, 124 in number, are not the correspondence of daily life, like that of Cicero, but a collection of moral maxims and remarks without any systematic order. They contain much good matter, and have been favourite reading with many distinguished men. It is possible that these letters, and indeed many of Seneca's moral treatises, were written in the latter part of his life, and probably after he had lost the favour of Nero. That Seneca sought consolation and tranquillity of mind in literary occupation is manifest. (14) Apocolocyntosis, is a satire against the emperor Claudius. The word is a play on the term Apotheosis or deification, and is equivalent in meaning to Pumpkinification, or the reception of Claudius among the pumpkins. The subject was well enough, but the treatment has no great merit; and Seneca probably had no other object than to gratify his spite against the emperor. (15) Quaestionum Naturalium Libri septem, addressed to Lucilius Junior, is not a systematic work, but a collection of natural facts from various writers, Greek and Roman, many of which are curious. The first book treats of meteors, the second of thunder and lightning, the third of water, the fourth of hail, snow and ice, the fifth of winds, the sixth of earthquakes and the sources of the Nile, and the seventh of comets. Moral remarks are scattered through the work; and indeed the design of the whole appears to be to find a foundation for ethics, the chief part of philosophy, in the knowledge of nature (physics). (16) Tragoediae, nine in number. They are entitled Hercules Furens, Thyestes, Thebais or Phoenissae, Hippolytus or Phaedra, Oedipus, Troades or Hecuba, Medea, Agamemnon, and Hercules Oetaeus. The titles themselves indicate sufficiently what the tragedies are—Greek mythological subjects treated in a peculiar fashion. They are written in Iambic senarii, interspersed with choral parts in anapaestic and other metres. The Octavia, which describes Nero's ill-treatment of his wife, his passion for Poppaea, and the exile of Octavia, is included among Seneca's writings in one recension, but is not his work; for it mentions Nero's death. These tragedies are not adapted, and certainly were never intended for the stage. They were designed for reading or for recitation after the Roman fashion, and they bear the stamp of a rhetorical age. They contain many striking passages, and have some merit as poems. Moral sentiments and maxims abound, and the style and character of Seneca are as conspicuous here as in his prose works.—The judgments on Seneca's writings have been as various as the opinions about his character; and both in extremes. It has been said of him that he looks best in quotations; but this is an admission that there is something worth quoting, which cannot be said of all writers. That Seneca possessed great mental powers cannot be doubted. He had seen much of human life, and he knew well what man was. His philosophy, so far as he adopted a system, was the Stoical, but it was rather an eclecticism of Stoicism than pure Stoicism. His style is antithetical, and apparently laboured; and when there is much labour, there is generally affectation. Yet his language is clear and forcible; it is not mere words: there is thought always. It would not be easy to name any modern writer who has treated on morality and has said so much that is practically good and true, or has treated the matter in so attractive a way. Beyond question he is, with the exception of Tacitus, the most important writer of the post-Augustan age. From the tone and expression of some of his writings, especially of the letters to Lucilius, some have imagined that he was acquainted with and influenced by Christian teaching, and there was once a tradition of friendship with the Apostle Paul. This may be set aside as improbable and absolutely without evidence. The sentiments of a Christian character which are found in his treatises are merely the expression of his philosophy, which was a gentler form of Stoicism.—Editions of Seneca are by J. F. Gronovius, Leiden, 1649–1658; by Ruhkopf, Leipzig, 1797–1811; by Fickert, Leips. 1845; by Haase, Leips. 1852. The Dialogues of Seneca are edited by Gertz, Copenh. 1886; the Letters by Schweighäuser, 1809, and by Bücheler (in part), Bonn, 1879; editions of the Tragedies by Peiper and Richter, Leips. 1867, and by Leo, Berl. 1878.

Senecio, Herennius, was a native of Baetica in Spain, where he served as quaestor. He was put to death by Domitian on the accusation of Metius Carus, in consequence of his having written the Life of Helvidius Priscus, which he composed at the request of Fannia, the wife of Helvidius. (Dio Cass. lxxvii. 13; Tac. Agr. 2, 45; Plin. Ep. i. 5, iv. 7, vii. 33.)

Senia (Senensis: Segna or Zengg), a Roman colony in Liburnia in Illyricum, on the coast, and on the road from Aquileia to Siscia (Tac. Hist. iv. 45).

Senones. 1. A powerful people in Gallia Lugdunensis, dwelt along the upper course of the Sequana (Seine), and were bounded on the N. by the Parisii, on the W. by the Carnutes, on the S. by the Aedui, and on the E. by the Lingones and Mandubii. Their chief town was Agedincum, afterwards called Senones (Sens). (Caes. B.G. ii. 2, v. 54, vi. 37.)—2. A branch (no doubt) of the same stock at an earlier period, which crossed the Alps about B.C. 400, in order to settle in Italy; and as the greater part of Upper Italy was already occupied by other Celtic tribes, the Senones were obliged to penetrate a considerable distance to the S., and took up their abode on the Adriatic sea between the rivers Utis and Aesis (between Ravenna and Ancona), after expelling the Umbrians (Liv. v. 35). In this country they founded the town of Sena. They extended their ravages into Etruria; and it was in consequence of the interference of the Romans while they were laying siege to Clusium, that they marched against Rome and took the city, B.C. 390. From this time we find them engaged in constant hostilities with the Romans, till they were at length completely subdued and the greater part of them destroyed by the consul Dolabella, 284. [GALLIA CISALPINA.]

Sentinum (Sentinas, Sentinatis: nr. Sassoferrato, Ru.), a fortified town in Umbria, not far from the river Aesis, famous for the battle in the third Samnite war, B.C. 295, when Q. Fabius defeated the Samnites and Gauls, Decius having devoted himself (Liv. x. 27; Pol. ii. 19).

Sentius Saturninus. [SATURNINUS.]

Sēpias (Σηπιάς: St. George), a promontory in the SE. of Thessaly in the district Magnesia, on which a great part of the fleet of Xerxes was wrecked (Hdt. vii. 113, 188; Strab. p. 443).

Seplasia, one of the principal streets in Capua, where perfumes and luxuries of a similar kind were sold (Cic. Pis. 11, 24; Plin. xvi. 40).

Sepphōris (Σεφφωρίς: Sefurieh), a city of Palestine, in the middle of Galilee, about halfway between M. Carmel and the lake of Tiberias, was an insignificant place until Herod Antipas fortified it and made it the capital of Galilee under the name of Diocaesarea. It was the seat of one of the five Jewish Sanhedrim; and continued to flourish until the fourth century, when it was destroyed by the Caesar Gallus, on account of a revolt of its inhabitants. (Jos. Ant. xiv. 15, 4, B.J. ii. 18, 11; Socr. Hist. Eccl. ii. 33.)

Septem Aquae, a place in the territory of the Sabini, near REATE.

Septem Fratres (Ἑπτὰ ἀδελφοί: Jebel Zatout, i.e. Apes' Hill), a mountain on the N. coast of Mauretania Tingitana, at the narrowest part of the Fretum Gaditanum (Straits of Gibraltar), connected by a low tongue of land with the promontory of ABYLA, which is also included under the modern name (Strab. p. 827).

Septem Maria, the name given by the ancients to the lagoons formed at the mouth of the Po by the frequent overflows of this river. Persons usually sailed through these lagoons from Ravenna to Altinum. (Plin. iii. 120; Herodian, viii. 7.)

Septempēda (Septempedanum: San Severino), a Roman municipium in the interior of Picenum, on the road from Auximum to Urbs Salvia (Plin. iii. 111; Strab. p. 241).

Septimius Geta. [GETA.]

Septimius Serenus. [SERENUS.]

Septimius Severus. [SEVERUS.]

Septimius Titius, a Roman poet, whom Horace (Ep. i. 3. 9, 14) represents as having ventured to quaff a draught from the Pindaric spring, and as having been ambitious to achieve distinction in tragedy. In this passage Horace speaks of him under the name of Titius; and he is probably the same individual with the Septimius who is addressed in the sixth Ode of the second book, and who is introduced in the ninth Epistle of the first book.

Sēquāna (Σηκοάνας: Seine), one of the principal rivers of Gaul, rising in the central parts of that country, and flowing through the province of Gallia Lugdunensis into the ocean opposite Britain. It is 346 miles in length. Its principal affluents are the Matrona (Marne), Esia (Oise) with its tributary the Axona (Aisne) and Incaunus (Yonne). This river has a slow current, and is navigable beyond Lutetia Parisiorum (Paris). (Caes. B.G. i. 1; Ptol. ii. 8, 2; Strab. pp. 192, 193.)

Sēquāni, a powerful Celtic people in Gallia Belgica, separated from the Helvetii by Mons Jurassus, from the Aedui by the Arar, and from the province Narbonensis by the Rhone, inhabiting the country called Franche Comté and Burgundy. In the later division of the provinces of the empire, the country of the Sequani formed a special province under the name of Maxima Sequanorum. They derived their name from the river Sequana, which had its source in the NW. frontiers of their territory; but their country was chiefly watered by the rivers Arar and Dubis. Their chief town was Vesontio (Besançon). They were governed by kings of their own, and were constantly at war with the Aedui. (Caes. B.G. i. 1, 3, 10–12, iv. 10; Strab. p. 192; Lucan, i. 425.)

Sēquester, Vibius, the name attached to a glossary which professes to give an account of the geographical names contained in the Roman poets. The tract is divided into seven sections:—(1) Flumina; (2) Fontes; (3) Lacus; (4) Nemora; (5) Paludes; (6) Montes; (7) Gentes. To which in some MSS. an eighth is added, containing a list of the seven wonders of the world. Concerning the author personally we know nothing; and he probably lived not earlier than the middle of the fifth century A.D.—Ed. by Bursian, Zurich, 1867.

Sēra. [SERICA.]

Serapio, a surname of P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, consul B.C. 138. [SCIPIO, No. 18.]

Serapion (Σεραπίων), a physician of Alexandria, who lived in the third century B.C. He belonged to the sect of the Empirici, and so much extended and improved the system of Philinus that the invention of it is by some authors attributed to him. Serapion wrote against Hippocrates with much vehemence; but neither this, nor any of his other works, are now extant. He is several times mentioned and quoted by Celsus, Galen, and others.

Serāpis or Sarāpis (Σάραπις: Serapis is the correct Latin form), an Egyptian divinity, whose worship was introduced into Greece in the time of the Ptolemies, and into Rome with that of Isis. The Egyptian Serapis was originally the manifestation of Osiris on earth in the form of a bull; but his separate worship was introduced as the special Alexandrian religion in the time of the Ptolemies, and gradually superseded that of Osiris, whose functions were transferred to him. Hence, like Osiris [see p. 635], he was regarded as the god of the dead and of the underworld, worshipped with all the mysteries belonging to that religion, and as the husband of Isis. He was also honoured, not only as born from the sun-god, but as the sun-god himself, and hence as god of healing, and thus identified by the Greeks not only with Hades, as god of the dead, and with Zeus (Zeus-Serapis), as god of heaven, but also with Asclepius, as god of healing. His worship in all these characters was accepted from Alexandria (where his temple, the Serapiæum, was particularly famous) through Asia Minor, the islands, Greece, and at Rome in the same manner and period as that of Isis [see p. 450]. In art he was represented like Hades or Pluto with a three-headed dog and a serpent by his side; but is distinguished from Hades or Pluto by the modius or calathus upon his head. Similarly the head of Zeus-Serapis resembles the Zeus type, but is distinguished by the modius.

Serbōnis Lācus. [SIRBONIS LACUS.]

Serdica or Sardica (Sofia), an important town in Upper Moesia, and the capital of Dacia Mediterranea, situate in a fertile plain near the sources of the Oescus, and on the road from Naissus to Philippopolis. It was the birthplace of the emperor Maximianus; it was destroyed by Attila, but was soon afterwards rebuilt; and it bore in the middle ages the name of Triaditza. Serdica derived its name from the Thracian people Serdi. (Ptol. iii. 11, 12; Eutrop. ix. 14, 22; Procop. Aed. iv. 1; Amm. Marc. xxx. 16.)

Sērēna, niece of Theodosius the Great, foster-mother of the emperor Honorius, and wife of Stilicho.

Sērēnus, Annaeus, one of the most intimate friends of the philosopher Seneca, who dedicated to him his works De Tranquillitate and De Constantia. He was praefectus vigiliū under Nero. (Sen. Ep. 63; Tac. Ann. xiii. 13.)

Sērēnus, Q. Sammonicus (or Samonicus), enjoyed a high reputation at Rome, in the early part of the third century after Christ, as a man of taste and varied knowledge. As the friend of Geta, by whom his compositions were studied with great pleasure, he was murdered while at supper, by command of Caracalla, A.D. 212, having written many learned works, of which nothing remains. (Macrob. iii. 16, 6; Spartian. Get. 5, Carac. 4.) His son, who bore the same name, was the preceptor of the younger Gordian, and bequeathed to his pupil the magnificent library which he had inherited from his father. A medical poem, extending to 115 hexameter lines, has descended to us under the title Q. Sereni Sammonici de Medicina praecepta saluberrima, or Praecepta de Medicina parvo pretio parabili, which is usually ascribed to the elder Sammonicus. It contains a considerable amount of information, extracted from the best authorities, on natural history and the healing art, and mixed up with a number of puerile superstitions, the whole expressed in plain and almost prosaic language.—Edited by Burmann and by Bährens among the Poetae Lat. Minores.

Sērēnus, A. Septimius, a Roman lyric poet, who exercised his muse chiefly in depicting the charms of the country and the delight of rural pursuits. His works are lost, but are frequently quoted by the grammarians.—Fragments in Wernsdorf, Poet. Lat. Min.

Sēres. [SERICA.]

Sergia Gens, patrician. The Sergii traced their descent from the Trojan Sergestus (Virg. Aen. v. 121). The Sergii were distinguished in the early history of the republic, and the first member of the gens who obtained the consulship was L. Sergius Fidenas, in B.C. 437. Catiline belonged to this gens. [CATILINA.] The Sergii bore also the surnames of Esquilinus, Fidenas, Orata, Paulus, Plancus, and Silus; but none of them are of sufficient importance to require a separate notice.

Sergius, a grammarian of uncertain date, but later than the fourth century after Christ, the author of two tracts; the first entitled In primam Donati Editionem Commentarium; the second, In secundam Donati Editionem Commentaria. They are printed in the Grammaticae Latinae Auctores antiqui of Putschius (Hannov. 1605, pp. 1816-1838).

Sērīca (ἡ Σηρικὴ, Σήρες; Sēres, also rarely in the sing, Σήρ, Sēr), a country in the extreme E. of Asia, famous as the native region of the silkworm, which was also called σήρ; and hence the adjective 'sericus' for silken. The name was known to the W. nations at a very early period, through the use of silk, first in W. Asia, and afterwards in Greece. It is clear, however, that, until some time after the commencement of our era, the name had no distinct geographical signification. Serica and Seres were simply the unknown country and people, in the far East, from whom the article of commerce, silk, was obtained. [Dict. of Ant. art. Sericum.] At a later period, some knowledge of the country was obtained from the traders, the results of which are recorded by Ptolemy, who names several positions that can be identified with reasonable probability, but the detailed mention of which does not fall within the object of this work. (Ptol. vi. 16, 1-6, vii. 2, 1, viii. 24, 5.) The Serica of Ptolemy corresponds to the NW. part of China, and the adjacent portions of Thibet and Chinese Tartary. The capital, Sera, is supposed by most to be Singan, on the Hoang-ho, but by some Peking. The country was bounded, according to Ptolemy, on the N. by unknown regions, on the W. by Scythia, on the S. and SE. by India and the Sinae. The people were said by some to be of Indian, by others of Scythian origin, and by others to be a mixed race (Paus. vi. 22, 2; Strab. p. 701; Plin. vi. 88). The Great Wall of China is mentioned by Ammianus Marcellinus under the name of Aggeres Serium (Amm. Marc. xxiii. 6, 64).

Serīphus (Σέριφος: Σερίφιος: Serpho), an island in the Aegaeon sea, and one of the Cyclades, lying between Cythnus and Siphnus. It was a small rocky island about twelve miles in circumference. (Strab. p. 487.) It is celebrated in mythology as the island where Danaë and Perseus landed after they had been exposed by Acrisius, where Perseus was brought up, and where he afterwards turned the inhabitants into stone with the Gorgon's head. [DANAË; PERSEUS.] Seriphus was colonised by Ionians from Athens, and it was one of the few islands which refused submission to Xerxes. At a later time the inhabitants of Seriphus were noted for their poverty and wretchedness, and for this reason the island was employed by the Roman emperors as a place of banishment for state criminals. (Tac. Ann. ii. 85, iv. 21; Juv. x. 170.)

Sermyla (Σερμύλη: Σερμύλιος), a town in Macedonia on the isthmus of the peninsula Sithonia (Hdt. vii. 122; Thuc. v. 18).

Serrānus, Atilius. Serranus was originally an agnomen of C. Atilius Regulus, consul B.C. 257, but afterwards became the name of a distinct family of the Atilia gens. Most of the ancient writers derive the name from serere, and relate that Regulus received the surname of Serranus because he was engaged in sowing when the news was brought him of his elevation to the consulship (Virg. Aen. iv. 845). It appears, however, from coins, that Saranus is the proper form of the name, and it is possibly derived from Saranum, a town of Umbria.—1. C., praetor B.C. 218, the first year of the second Punic war, was sent into northern Italy. At a later period of the year he resigned his command to the consul P. Scipio. He was an unsuccessful candidate for the consulship for 216. (Liv. xxi. 26, 62; Pol. iii. 40.)—2. C., curule aedile 193, with L. Scribonius Libo. They were the first aediles who exhibited the Mega-lesta as ludi scenici. He was praetor 185. (Liv. xxxiv. 54.)—3. A., praetor 192, when he obtained as his province Macedonia and the command of the fleet. He was praetor a second time in 173. He was consul in 170. (Liv. xxxv. 10, xli. 28, xlii. 37-47.)—4. M., praetor 174, when he obtained the province of Sardinia (Liv. xli. 21).—5. M., praetor 152, in Further Spain, defeated the Lusitani.—6. Sex., consul 136.—7. C., consul 106 with Q. Servilius Caepio, the year in which Cicero and Pompey were born. Although a 'stultissimus homo,' according to Cicero, he was elected in preference to Q. Catulus. He was one of the senators who took up arms against Saturninus in 100. (Cic. pro Planc. 5; Vell. Pat. ii. 53; Gell. xv. 28.)—8. Sex., surnamed Gavianus, because he originally belonged to the Gavia gens. He was quaestor in 63 in the consulship of Cicero, who treated him with distinguished favour; but in his tribunate of the plebs, 57, he took an active part in opposing Cicero's recall from banishment. After Cicero's return to Rome he put his veto upon the decree of the senate restoring to Cicero the site on which his house had stood, but he found it advisable to withdraw his opposition. (Cic. Sest. 33-43, Post Red. 5, ad Att. iv. 2.)

Serrhūm (Σέρρειον), a promontory of Thrace in the Aegaeon Sea, opposite the island of Samothrace, with a fortress of the same name upon it (Hdt. vii. 59; Liv. xxxi. 16).

Q. Sertōrius, one of the most extraordinary men in the later times of the republic, was a native of Nursia, a Sabine village, and was born of obscure but respectable parents. He served under Marius in the war against the Teutones; and before the battle of Aquae Sextiae (Aix), B.C. 102, he entered the camp of the Teutones in disguise as a spy, for which hazardous undertaking his intrepid character and some knowledge of the Gallic language well qualified him. He also served as tribune militum in Spain under T. Didius (97). He was quaestor in 91, and had before this time lost an eye in battle. On the outbreak of the Civil war in 88, he declared himself against the party of the nobles, though he was by no means an admirer of his old commander, C. Marius, whose character he well understood. He commanded one of the four armies which besieged Rome under Marius and Cinna (App. B.C. i. 67). He was, however, opposed to the bloody massacre which ensued after Marius and Cinna entered Rome, and he was so indignant at the horrible deeds committed by the slaves whom Marius kept as guards, that he fell upon them in their camp, and slew 4000 of them (Plut. Sert. 5, Mar. 44). In 83 Sertorius was praetor, and either in this year or the following he went into Spain, which had been assigned to him as his province by the Marian party. After collecting a small body of troops in Spain, he crossed over to Mauretania, where he gained a victory over Paccianus, one of Sulla's generals. In consequence of his success in Africa, he was invited by the Lusitani, who were exposed to the invasion of the Romans, to become their leader. He gained great influence over the Lusitanians and the other barbarians in Spain, and soon succeeded in forming an army, which for some years successfully opposed all the power of Rome. He also availed himself of the superstitious character of the people among whom he was, to strengthen his authority over them. A fawn was brought to him by one of the natives as a present, which soon became so tame as to accompany him in his walks, and attend him on all occasions. After Sulla had become master of Italy, Sertorius was joined by many Romans who had been proscribed by the dictator, and this not only added to his consideration, but brought him many good officers. In 79 Metellus Pius was sent into Spain with a considerable force against Sertorius; but Metellus could effect nothing against the enemy. He was unable to bring Sertorius to any decisive battle, but was constantly harassed by the guerilla warfare of the latter. In 77 Sertorius was joined by M. Perperna with fifty-three cohorts [PERPERNA]. To give some show of form to his formidable power, Sertorius established a senate of 300, into which no provincial was admitted; but to soothe the more distinguished Spaniards, and to have some security for their fidelity, he established a school at Huesca (Oscā), in Aragon, for the education of their children in Greek and Roman learning. The continued want of success on the part of Metellus induced the Romans to send Pompey to his assistance, but with an independent command. Pompey arrived in Spain in 76 with 30,000 infantry and 1000 cavalry, but even with this formidable force he was unable to gain any decisive advantages over Sertorius. (App. B. C. i. 110.) For the next five years Sertorius kept both Metellus and Pompey at bay, and cut to pieces a large number of their forces. Sertorius was at length assassinated in 72 at a banquet by Perperna and some other Roman officers, who had long been jealous of the authority of their commander. (Plut. Sertorius.)

Servilia. 1. Daughter of Q. Servilius Caepio and the daughter of Livia, the sister of the celebrated M. Livius Drusus, tribune of the plebs B.C. 91. Servilia was married twice: first to M. Junius Brutus, by whom she became the mother of the murderer of Caesar, and secondly to D. Junius Silanus, consul 62. She was the favourite mistress of the dictator Caesar, and it is reported that Brutus was her son by Caesar (Plut. Cat. 24, Brut. 5). This tale, however, cannot be true, as Caesar was only fifteen years older than Brutus, the former having been born in 100, and the latter in 85. She survived both her lover and her son. After the battle of Philippi, Antony sent her the ashes of her son. (Suet. Jul. 50; Plut. Brut. 2, 5, 53.)—2. Sister of the preceding, was the second wife of L. Lucullus, consul 74. She bore Lucullus a son, but, like her sister, she was faithless to her husband, and the latter, after putting up with her conduct for some time from regard to M. Cato Uticensis, her half-brother, at length divorced her. (Plut. Lucull. 38, Cat. 54.)

Servilia Gens, was one of the Alban houses removed to Rome by Tullus Hostilius. This gens was very celebrated during the early ages of the republic, and it continued to produce men of influence in the state down to the imperial period. It was divided into numerous families, of which the most important bore the names of AHALA, CAEPIO, CASCA, GLAUCIA, RULLUS, VATIA.

Servius Maurus Honoratus, or Servius Marius Honoratus, a Latin grammarian of the fourth century, contemporary with Macrobius, who introduces him among the dramatis personae of the Saturnalia. His most celebrated production was a Commentary upon Virgil. This, the original work of Servius, has been largely added to. The Commentary of Servius was supplemented by an anonymous writer with a great deal of useful information, drawn from earlier authorities, about Greek and Roman legends, customs, and religion. It is attached to many of the earlier editions of Virgil, but it is edited separately by Thilo and Hagen, Leips. 1878. We possess also the following treatises bearing the name of Servius:—(1) In secundam Donati Editionem Interpretatio. (2) De Ratione ultimarum Syllabarum ad Aquilinum Liber. (3) Ars de centum Metris s. Centimetrum.

Servius Tullius. [TULLIUS.]

Sēsāmus (Σησαμός), a little coast river of Paphlagonia, with a town of the same name: both called afterwards AMASTRIS.

Sēsostriis (Σέσωστρις), the name given by the Greeks to the great king of Egypt, Ramses II. (Ra-messu Meri-Amen), son of Seti or Menep-tah I., and father of Menep-tah II. From his popular name, Ses or Setesu, the Greeks developed the name Sesostris (in Manetho 'Sethosis, who is called Ramesses'). He belonged to the nineteenth dynasty, and reigned about 1333 B.C. He was a great conqueror. In the Greek historians he is said to have subdued Ethiopia, a great part of Asia, Thrace, and Scythia (Hdt. ii. 102-11; Diod. i. 53-59). It must not, however, be supposed that he ever reached any part of Europe. From the Egyptian monuments, including the epic poem of Pentaur, the court scribe, we learn that, besides his successful campaigns into Ethiopia, he overran Syria, and in the fifth year of his reign began his great campaigns against the Kheta—that is, the Hittite—empire [CETEI], in the course of which he won a great victory at Kadesh on the Orontes. The struggle, however, between the two empires was not pushed to an end, and a treaty of alliance was eventually made between Ramses and the Hittite king. Some of the victories of Ramses are recorded also in the rock tablets at Beyrout; but the monuments which Herodotus believed him to have set up between Smyrna and Ephesus (ii. 106) are Hittite. As a builder, he was no less great than as a conqueror. He built at Abydos, Memphis, and Thebes, especially at Karnak, Luxor, and the rock temples Abu-Simbel. He built himself also a new city, fortress and palace at Pa-Ramessu (= Zoan) in the Delta, on the way to Palestine.

Sestiānae Arae (C. Villano), the most westerly promontory on the N. coast of Hispania Tarraconensis in Gallaecia, with three altars consecrated to Augustus.

Sestinum (Sestinas, -ātis: Sestino), a town in Umbria on the Apennines, near the sources of the Pisaurus.

Sestius. [SEXTIUS.]

Sestus (Σηστός: Σήστιος: Ialova), a town in Thrace, situated at the narrowest part of the Hellespont opposite Abydos in Asia, from which it was only seven stadia distant (Strab. p. 591). It was founded by the Aeolians (Hdt. vii. 33). It was celebrated in Grecian poetry on account of the loves of Leander and Hero [LEANDER], and in history on account of the bridge of boats which Xerxes here built across the Hellespont. Sestus was always reckoned a place of importance in consequence of its commanding to a great extent the passage of the Hellespont. It was for some time in the possession of the Persians, but was retaken by the Greeks, B.C. 478, after a long siege. The Athenians held it till 404 B.C., and captured it again in 387 (Diod.

xvi. 34). It was taken by the Romans in 190 (Liv. xxxvii. 9).

Setābis. [SAETABIS.]

Sēthon (Σεθών), seems to have been a priest of Ptah (=Hephaestus) about the time of Taharaka I. (Tirhakah=Taracus), and the end of the Ethiopian dynasty (twenty-fifth) in Egypt (about 690 B.C.), who lived on into the reign of Psamthek or Psammetichus I. in the twenty-sixth dynasty. He thus might have been living in the wars with Sennacherib. [For the history see SABACO; PSAMMETICHUS.] Herodotus relates (ii. 141) that in Sethon's reign Sanacharibus, king of the Arabians and Assyrians, advanced against Egypt, at which Sethon was in great alarm, as he had insulted the warrior class, and deprived them of their lands, and they now refused to follow him to the war. But the god Hephaestus came to his assistance; for while the two armies were encamped near Pelusium, the field-mice in the night gnawed to pieces the bow-strings, the quivers, and the shield-handles of the Assyrians, who fled on the following day with great loss. The recollection of this miracle was perpetuated by a statue of the king in the temple of Hephaestus, holding a mouse in his hand, and saying, 'Let everyone look at me and be pious.' In this account Herodotus seems to have wrongly made Sethon, or Sethos, a king, whereas he was only a priest, though at a time when the priestly power was great. The statue to which he refers was probably one with a mouse upon it as an emblem, as in the statues of Apollo Smintheus, and possibly with the same meaning [see p. 89, b].

Sētia (Setinus: Sezza or Sesse), an ancient town of Latium in the E. of the Pontine Marshes, originally belonged to the Volscian confederacy, but was subsequently taken by the Romans and colonised (Dionys. v. 61; Liv. vi. 30; Vell. Pat. i. 14). It was here that the Romans kept the Carthaginian hostages (Liv. xxxii. 26). It was celebrated for the excellent wine produced in the neighbourhood of the town, which was reckoned in the time of Augustus the finest wine in Italy (Mart. x. 36, xiii. 112; Juv. x. 27; Strab. pp. 234, 237).

Sēvērus, M. Aurēlius Alexander, usually called Alexander Sēvērus, Roman emperor, A.D. 222-235, the son of Gessius Marcianus and Julia Mamaea, and first cousin of Elagabalus, was born at Arce, in Phoenicia, in the temple of Alexander the Great, to which his parents had repaired for the celebration of a festival, October 1, A.D. 205. His original name appears to have been Alexianus Bassianus, the latter appellation having been derived from his maternal grandfather. Upon the elevation of Elagabalus, he accompanied his mother and the court to Rome, a report having been spread abroad that he also, as well as the emperor, was the son of Caracalla. In 221 he was adopted by Elagabalus and created Caesar. The names Alexianus and Bassianus were laid aside, and those of M. Aurelius Alexander substituted: M. Aurelius in virtue of his adoption; Alexander in consequence, as was asserted, of a direct revelation on the part of the Syrian god. [ELAGABALUS.] On the death of Elagabalus, on March 11, A.D. 222, Alexander ascended the throne, adding Severus to his other designations, in order to mark more explicitly the descent which he claimed from the father of Caracalla. After reigning in peace some years, during which he reformed many abuses in the state, he was involved in a war with Artaxerxes, king of Persia, who had lately founded the new empire of the Sassanidae on the ruins of the Parthian monarchy. Alexander gained a great victory over Artaxerxes in 232; but he was unable to prosecute his advantage in consequence of intelligence having reached him of a great movement among the German tribes. He celebrated a triumph at Rome in 233, and in the following year (234) set out for Gaul, which the Germans were devastating; but before he had made any progress in the campaign, he was waylaid by a small band of mutinous soldiers, instigated, it is said, by Maximinus, and slain, along with his mother, in the early part of 235, in the thirtieth year of his age, and the fourteenth of his reign. Alexander Severus was distinguished by justice, wisdom, and clemency in all public transactions, and by the simplicity and purity of his private life. (Herodian, v. 5, 17-23, vi. 1-18; Lamprid. Alex. Sever.; Zos. i. 11-13; Dio Cass. lxxviii. 30, lxxx. Fr.)

Sēvērus, A. Caecina. [CAECINA.]

Sēvērus, Cassius, an orator and satirical writer in the time of Augustus and Tiberius, was born about B.C. 50 at Longula, in Latium. He was a man of low origin and dissolute character, but was much feared from the severity of his attacks upon the Roman nobles. Towards the end of the reign of Augustus, Severus was banished by Augustus to the island of Crete on account of his libellous verses; but as he still continued to write libels, he was removed by Tiberius in A.D. 24 to the desert island of Seriphos, where he died in great poverty in the twenty-fifth year of his exile, A.D. 33. (Tac. Ann. i. 72, iv. 21; Sen. Contr. 3, praef. 2; Tac. Dial. 19; Quint. x. i. 116.) He cannot have been, as some commentators thought, the subject of Horace's sixth Epode, since he can hardly have been more than a boy when the Epodes were written.

Sēvērus, Cornēlius, the author of a poem entitled Bellum Siculum, was contemporary with Ovid, by whom he is addressed in one of the Epistles written from Pontus (Ov. Pont. iv. 16, 9; Quint. x. i. 89).

Sēvērus, Flāvius Valērius, Roman emperor, A.D. 306-307. He was proclaimed Caesar by Galerius in 305; and on the death of Constantius Chlorus, in the following year, he was further proclaimed Augustus by Galerius. Soon afterwards he was sent against Maxentius, who had assumed the imperial title at Rome. The expedition, however, was unsuccessful; and Severus having surrendered at Ravenna, was taken prisoner to Rome and compelled to put an end to his life. [MAXENTIUS.]

Sēvērus Libius, Roman emperor, A.D. 461-465, was a Lucanian by birth, and owed his accession to Ricimer, who placed him on the throne after the assassination of Majorian. During his reign the real government was in the hands of Ricimer. Severus died a natural death. (Jordan. de Reb. Goth. 45; Evagr. ii. 7.)

Sēvērus Sanctus Endelechius, a Gothic rhetorician and poet at the end of the fourth century. A poem of his on cattle, and on a plague from which they suffered, in the form of a pastoral dialogue (de Mortibus Boum) has considerable merit.—Ed. by Giles, London, 1838, and in Wernsdorf, Poët. Lat. Min.

Sēvērus, L. Septimius, Roman emperor, A.D. 193-211, was born 146, near Leptis in Africa. After holding various important military commands under M. Aurelius and Commodus, he was at length appointed commander-in-chief of the army in Pannonia and Illyria. By this army he was proclaimed emperor after the death of Pertinax (193). He forthwith marched upon Rome, where Julianus had been made emperor by the praetorian troops. Julianus was put to death upon his arrival before the city. [JULIANUS.] Severus then turned his arms against Pescennius Niger, who had been saluted emperor by the Eastern legions. The struggle was brought to a close by a decisive battle near Issus, in which Niger was defeated by Severus, and having been shortly afterwards taken prisoner was put to death (194). Severus then laid siege to Byzantium, which refused to submit to him even after the death of Niger, and which was not taken till 196. The city was treated harshly by Severus. Its walls were levelled with the earth, its soldiers and magistrates put to death, and the town itself, deprived of all its political privileges, made over to the Perinthians. During the continuance of this siege, Severus had crossed the Euphrates (195) and subdued the Mesopotamian Arabians. He returned to Italy, in 196, and in the same year proceeded to Gaul to oppose Albinus, who had been proclaimed emperor by the troops in that country. Albinus was defeated and slain near Lyons on the 19th of February, 197. Severus returned to Rome in the same year; but after remaining a short time in the capital, he set out for the East to repel the invasion of the Parthians, who were ravaging Mesopotamia. He crossed the Euphrates early in 198; Seleucia and Babylon were evacuated by the enemy; and Ctesiphon was taken and plundered after a short siege. After spending three years in the East, and visiting Arabia, Palestine, and Egypt, Severus returned to Rome in 202. For the next seven years he remained tranquilly at Rome, but in 208 he went to Britain with his sons Caracalla and Geta, and carried on war against the Caledonians. After remaining two years in Britain he died at Eboracum (York) on the 4th of February, 211, in the sixty-fifth year of his age, and the eighteenth of his reign. (Dio Cass. lxxiv., lxxv., lxxvi.; Eutrop. viii. 10; Aurel. Vict. xx.; Spartian. Sever.)

Séverus, Sulpicius, chiefly celebrated as an ecclesiastical historian, was a native of Aquitania, and flourished towards the close of the fourth century under Arcadius and Honorius. He was descended from a noble family, and was originally an advocate; but he eventually became a presbyter of the church, and attached himself closely to St. Martin of Tours. The extant works of Severus are:—(1) Historia Sacra, an epitome of sacred history, extending from the creation of the world to the consulship of Stilicho and Aurelianus, A.D. 400. (2) Vita S. Martini Turonensis. (3) Tres Epistolae. (4) Dialogi duo, containing a review of the dissensions which had arisen among ecclesiastics in the East regarding the works of Origen. (5) Epistolae Sex.—The best edition of the complete works of Severus is by C. Hahn, Vienna, 1886.

Seuthes (Σευθης), the name of several kings of the Odrysians in Thrace. Of these the most important was the nephew of Sitalces, whom he succeeded on the throne in 424. During a long reign he raised his kingdom to a height of power and prosperity, which it had never previously attained (Thuc. ii. 97, iv. 101).

Sextia or Sestia Gens, plebeian, one of whose members—namely, L. Sextius Sextinus Lateranus—was the first plebeian who obtained the consulship, B.C. 366.

Sextiae Aquae. [AQUAE SEXTIAE.]

Sextius or Sestius. 1. P., quaestor B.C. 68, and tribune of the plebs 57. In the latter year he took an active part in obtaining Cicero's recall from banishment. Like Milo, he kept a band of armed retainers to oppose P. Clodius and his partisans; and in the following year (56) he was accused of Vis on account of his violent acts during his tribunate. He was defended by Cicero in an oration still extant, and was acquitted on the 14th of March, chiefly in consequence of the powerful influence of Pompey. In 53, Sextius was praetor. On the breaking out of the Civil war in 49, Sextius first espoused Pompey's party, but he afterwards joined Caesar, who sent him, in 48, into Cappadocia. He was alive in 43, as appears from Cicero's correspondence. (Cic. pro Sestio, ad Att. iii. 19, 20, 23, iv. 3, ad Fam. v. 6.)—2. L., son of the preceding by his first wife, Postumia. He served under M. Brutus in Macedonia, but subsequently became the friend of Augustus. One of Horace's Odes (i. 4) is addressed to him. (Bell. Alex. 34; Cic. ad Att. xiii. 2, xv. 17, 27.)—3. T., one of Caesar's legates in Gaul, and afterwards governor of the province of Numidia, or New Africa, at the time of Caesar's death (44). Here he carried on war against Q. Cornificius, who held the province of Old Africa, and whom he defeated and slew in battle. (Caes. B.G. vi. 1, vii. 49; Dio Cass. xlviii. 21–24; App. B.C. iv. 53, v. 75.)

Sextius Calvinus. [CALVINUS.]

Sextus Empiricus, was a physician, and received his name Empiricus from belonging to the school of the Empirici. He was a contemporary of Galen, and lived in the first half of the third century of the Christian era. Nothing is known of his life. He belonged to the Sceptical school of philosophy. Two of his works are extant:—(1) Πυρρώνειαι ὑποτυπώσεις ἢ σκεπτικὰ ὑπομνήματα, containing the doctrines of the Sceptics in three books. (2) Πρὸς τοὺς μαθηματικούς ἀντιρρητικοί, against the Mathematici, in eleven books, is an attack upon all positive philosophy. The first six books are a refutation of the six sciences of grammar, rhetoric, geometry, arithmetic, astrology, and music. The remaining five books are directed against logicians, physical philosophers, and ethical writers, and form, in fact, a distinct work, which may be viewed as belonging to the ὑποτυπώσεις. The two works are a great repository of doubts; the language is as clear and perspicuous as the subject will allow.—Edited by Fabricius, Lips. 1718.

Sextus Rufus Festus, or perhaps more correctly Rufus Festus alone, is the name prefixed to an abridgment of Roman History in twenty-eight short chapters, entitled Breviarium de Victoriis et Provinciis Populi Romani, and executed by command of the emperor Valens, to whom it is dedicated. This work is usually printed with the larger editions of Eutropius, and of the minor Roman historians. [EUTROPUS.] Some have suggested that Rufus or Rufus Festus the historian and Rufus Festus Avienus are the same person; but there is no probability in this, though they may possibly be father and son. [AVIENUS.]

Siatutanda (Σιατούτανδα), is given by Ptolemy (ii. 1, 27) as the name of a town in Germany, but there is little doubt that this is an amusing and instructive mistake, and that Ptolemy invented the town from misunderstanding the words of Tacitus (Ann. iv. 73) 'ad sua tutanda digressis rebellibus.'

Sibae or Sibi (Σίβαι, Σίβοι), a rude people in the NW. of India (in the Punjab), above the confluence of the rivers Hydaspes (Jelum) and Acesines (Chenab), who were clothed in skins and armed with clubs, and whom therefore the soldiers of Alexander regarded as descendants of Heracles (Arrian, Ind. 5; Diod. xvii. 96; Strab. p. 688).

Sibyllae (Σιβυλλαί), the name by which several prophetic women are designated. The first Sibyl, from whom all the rest are said to have derived their name, is called a daughter of Dardanus and Neso (cf. Heracleit. Fr. 12). Some authors mention only four Sibyls, the Erythraean, the Samian, the Egyptian, and the Sardinian; but as time went on the number grew to ten: namely, the Babylonian, the Libyan, the Delphian, the Cimmerian, the Erythraean, the Samian, the Cumaean, the Hellespontian or Trojan, the Phrygian, and the Tiburtine. The most celebrated of these Sibyls is the Cumaean, who is mentioned under the names of Herophile, Demo, Phemonoë, Deiphobe, Demophile, and Amalthea. She was consulted by Aeneas before he descended into the lower world. She is said to have come to Italy from the East, and she is the one who, according to tradition, appeared before king Tarquinius, offering him the Sibylline books for sale (Varro, ap. Lactant. Inst. Div. i. 6; Dionys. iv. 62; Isid. Orig. viii. 815). Respecting the Sibylline books, see Dict. of Antiq. art. Sibyllini Libri.

Sicambri. [SUGAMBRI.]

Sicāni, Sicēli, Siceliōtae. [SICILIA.]

Sicca, a friend of Cicero, who had a country house at Vibo in Bruttium. Cicero took refuge there twice, in 58 B.C. and in 44. (Cic. ad Att. iii. 2, 4, viii. 12, xvi. 6.)

Sicca Veneria (prob. Al-Kaff), a considerable city of N. Africa, on the frontier of Numidia and Zeugitana, built on a hill near the river Bagradas. It derived its name from a temple of Venus in which the goddess was worshipped with rites peculiar to the corresponding Eastern deity Astarte, whence it may be inferred that the place was a Phoenician settlement. (Val. Max. ii. 6, 15; Sall. Jug. 56; Ptol. iv. 3, 30.)

Sichaeus, also called Acerbas. [ACERBAS.]

Sicilia (Σικελία: Sicily), except Sardinia, is the largest island in the Mediterranean Sea. It is probable that its original name to the Greeks was Thrinacia (Θρινακία). [The idea that Thrinacia was the Peloponnese is untenable.] It is probable also that the name of the island Thrinacia in the Odyssey (xi. 107, xii. 127) is borrowed from it; but it is clear that the Homeric Thrinacia was conceived by the poet as different from Sicily. It was a small island, and it was reached after Scylla was passed: moreover it was not the island of the Cyclopes. The name Σικανίη also appears in Od. xxiv. 307 (by many considered a later addition). The names Trinacria or Trinacris (Verg. Aen. iii. 440, &c.) were believed by the ancients to express the triangular shape of the island (Ov. Fast. iv. 420). Recently it has been strongly urged that these names are merely corruptions of the old Thrinacia, and themselves gave the notion, not absolutely correct, that the island was a perfect triangle. This may be to some extent true. At the same time it should not be forgotten that the words Θρινάξ and Τρινάξ are the same, and therefore that, though Thrinacia may have been the original Greek name, there is no reason why it should express any idea different from Trinacria. The island is of course not a regular triangle, but an irregular quadrilateral with a short fourth side to the W. between Eryx and Lilybaeum. Still there is a rough resemblance to a three-pointed island (which navigators even as early as the writing of the Odyssey may have perceived) sufficient to give rise to the name, whether Thrinacia or Trinacria, and it is on the whole more likely that it was so called for this reason than because it was sacred to Poseidon, the god of the trident. It is very likely that the name did tend to strengthen the conception of a regular triangle, which found expression in the name Triquetra (Lucret. i. 718; Hor. Sat. ii. 6, 55); but, when all is said, even those who have a modern map before them may well recognise an approach to a triangular shape. Its more usual name was also its proper name, derived from its inhabitants, the Siceli, whence it was called Sicelia (Σικελία), which the Romans changed into Sicilia. And from the Sicani [see below] the island was also called Sicania (Σικανία).—Sicily is separated from the S. coast of Italy by a narrow channel called Fretum Siculum, sometimes simply Fretum (Πορθμός), and also Scyllaeum Fretum, of which the modern name is Faro di Messina. The sea on the E. of the island was also called Mare Siculum, which was regarded as the W. portion of the Mare Ionium. The sea on the S. was called Mare Africum. The N. and S. sides of the island are about 175 miles each in length, not including the windings of the coast; and the length of the E. side is about 115 miles; the short western side, from Eryx to Lilybaeum, which blunts the triangle and makes it a quadrilateral, is about thirty miles. The NW. end, the Prom. Lilybaeum, is about ninety miles from C. Bon on the coast of Africa; the NE. point, Prom. Pelorus, is about three miles from the coast of Calabria in Italy; and the SE. point, Prom. Pachynus, is sixty miles from the island of Malta. Sicily formed originally part of Italy, and was torn away from it by some volcanic eruption, as the ancients generally believed. [RHEGIUM.] A range of mountains, which are a continuation of the Apennines, extends throughout the island from E. to W. The general name of this mountain-range was Nebrodes Montes (Madonia), which rise to a height of about 3000 feet, and of which the Heraclei Montes of Diodorus seem to be part. But the most important feature of the island is the separate volcanic mountain AETNA, which rises to a height of 10,874 feet on the east coast, with a base of elevated ground ninety miles in circumference. The detached mass of Mt. Eryx also, in the extreme W. near Drepanum, presents a bold appearance, though its height is only 2184 feet. Otherwise the coasts at the W. end of the island are comparatively low and shelving. In the centre of Sicily a mountain-range branches off to the S. from the Nebrodes and from the hilly country about Enna. The SE. part of the island is an elevated limestone tract, broken up by valleys and ravines with a gradual slope towards the S. and SE. A large number of rivers flow down from the mountains, but most of them are dry, or nearly so, in the summer. The soil of Sicily was very fertile, and produced in antiquity an immense quantity of wheat, on which the population of Rome relied to a great extent for their subsistence (Strab. p. 273; Diod. v. 2). So celebrated was it even in early times on account of its corn, that it was represented as sacred to Demeter, and as the favourite abode of this goddess. Hence it was in this island that her daughter, Persephone, was carried away by Pluto. [DEMETER; PERSEPHONE.] Besides corn the island produced excellent wine, saffron, honey, almonds, and the other southern fruits.— It is probable that the mention of the Cyclopes and Laestrygonians in the Odyssey was due to reports of a rough and savage people dwelling in Sicily. Apart from these legends the prevalent tradition was that the Sicani, being hard pressed by the Ligyes (Ligures), crossed the Alps and settled in Latium; that, being driven out of this country by the Aborigines with the help of Pelasgians, they migrated to the S. of the peninsula, where they lived for a considerable time along with the Oenotrians; and that at last they crossed over to Sicily, to which they gave their name (Sicania). They spread over the greater part of the island, but in later times were found chiefly in the interior and in the W. and NW. parts, having been driven thither by the later invasion of Sicels. The next immigrants into the island are said to have been the Elymi (Ἐλυμοί), who are described as a Trojan race who came there after the fall of Troy and settled in the country about Eryx. The Sicels (Σικελοί, Siculi) are described as having been driven out of Italy by the Oscans, and as having crossed the Straits of Messina on rafts. (Thuc. vi. 2; Dionys. i. 22, v. 6.) There is much controversy as to the real origin and nationality of these races; but Freeman is probably right in not rejecting the views of Thucydides and Philistus (ap. Diod. v. 6), that the Sicani were Iberians (i.e. of the same race as the Ligurians and the Basques), and that they were distinct from the Sicels (though Schwegler and Holm regard them as identical and as both being Iberian). According to this view, the Sicani were a non-Aryan race and the earliest inhabitants; the Sicels were the vanguard of the Aryan settlers, who, pressed out of Italy by later immigrants, passed over the straits and dispossessed the Sicani and Elymi of most of the island. There is still more doubt about the Elymi. Some say they were a mixed race of Asiatic barbarians and Ionians from Asia Minor: some say they were Elamites. On the whole, it is most likely that there was an element of truth in the story about the Trojans, and that they were of Phrygian origin. The chief cities of Elymaean origin were Eryx, Segesta, and Entella. Besides these settlements, there was possibly an invasion from Crete at a period earlier than the foundation of the Greek colonies, which may be indicated in the legend that Cretans came to Sicily under their king, Minos, in pursuit of Daedalus, and that they settled on the S. coast in the neighbourhood of Agrigentum, where they founded Minoa (afterwards Heraclea Minoa). [MINOS.] The Phoenicians likewise at an early period formed settlements, for the purposes of commerce, on all the coasts of Sicily, but more especially on the N. and NW. parts. They were subsequently obliged to retire from the greater part of their settlements before the increasing power of the Greeks, and to confine themselves to Motya, Solus, and Panormus. But the most important of all the immigrants into Sicily were the Greeks. The first body of Greeks who landed in the island were Chalcidians from Euboea, and Megarians led by the Athenian Thucles. These Greek colonists built the town of Naxos, B.C. 735. They were soon followed by other Greek colonists, who founded a number of very flourishing cities: Syracuse, founded by Corinthians in 734; Leontini and Catana by the Sicilian Naxos in 730; Megara Hyblea by Megarians from Greece in 728; Gela by Lindians from Rhodes and by Cretans in 690; Zancle, afterwards Caiarina, by Cumaeans and Chalcidians about 700; Himera, a colony from Zancle in 648; Acrae, Casmenae and Camarina from Syracuse between 650 and 599; Selinus from Megara Hyblaea in 630, Agragas or Agrigentum from Gela in 582. The Greeks soon became the ruling race in the island, and received the name of Siceliōtai (Σικελιώται) to distinguish them from the earlier inhabitants. The Sicel towns were mostly inland: a few, of small importance, on the N. coast. Their fusion, and that of the other inhabitants, with the Greeks was fairly complete before the Roman conquest, each nationality to some extent having influenced the other, but Greek influence and character predominating. Meantime the Carthaginians obtained a firm footing in Sicily. Their first attempt was made in 480; but they were defeated by Gelo of Syracuse, and obliged to retire with great loss. It is remarkable that the Asiatic nationalities, Persia and the Phoenician Carthaginians, attacked the Greek states simultaneously at opposite quarters: nor is it to be supposed that this was without design and concert. In the period after this invasion occurred the Athenian expedition of 415 [SYRACUSAE]. The second Carthaginian invasion, in 409, was more successful than the first. They took Selinus in this year, and four years afterwards (405) the powerful city of Agrigentum. They now became the permanent masters of the W. part of the island, and were engaged in frequent wars with Syracuse and the other Greek cities. The struggle between the Carthaginians and Greeks continued, with a few interruptions, down to the first Punic war; at the close of which (241) the Carthaginians were obliged to evacuate the island, the W. part of which now passed into the hands of the Romans, and was made a Roman province. The E. part still continued under the rule of Hiero of Syracuse as an ally of Rome; but after the revolt of Syracuse in the second Punic war, and the conquest of that city by Marcellus, the whole island was made a Roman province, and was administered by a praetor. Under the Roman dominion more attention was paid to agriculture than to commerce, and consequently the Greek cities on the coast gradually declined in prosperity and in wealth. Augustus, after his conquest of Sex. Pompey, who had held the island for several years, founded colonies at Messana, Tauromenium, Catana, Syracuse, Thermae, and Panormus (Strab. p. 272). On the downfall of the Roman empire, Sicily formed part of the kingdom of the Ostrogoths; but it was taken from them by Belisarius in A.D. 536, and annexed to the Byzantine empire. It continued a province of this empire till 828, when it was conquered by the Saracens.

Sicima. [NEAPOLIS, No. 5.]

Sicinius. 1. L. Sicinius Bellutus, the leader of the plebeians in their secession to the Sacred Mount in B.C. 494. He was chosen one of the first tribunes.—2. L. Sicinius Dentatus, called by some writers the Roman Achilles (Gell. ii. 11). He is said to have fought in 120 battles, to have slain eight of the enemy in single combat, to have received forty-five wounds on the front of his body, and to have accompanied the triumphs of nine generals, whose victories were principally owing to his valour. He was tribune of the plebs in 454. He was put to death by the decemvirs in 450, because he endeavoured to persuade the plebeians to secede to the Sacred Mount. The persons sent to assassinate him fell upon him in a lonely spot, but he killed most of them before they succeeded in despatching him. (Dionys. x. 48, xi. 25-27; Liv. iii. 43; Val. Max. ii. 3, 24.)

Sicinus (Σικινός: Σικινίτης: Sikino), a small island in the Aegean sea, one of the Sporades, between Pholegandrus and Ios, with a town of the same name (Strab. p. 484; Scyl. p. 19). It is said to have been originally called Oenoë from its cultivation of the vine, but to have been named Sicinus after a son of Thoas and Oenoë (Ap. Rh. i. 623; Steph. Byz. s. v.). It was probably colonised by the Ionians. During the Persian war it submitted to Xerxes (Hdt. viii. 4), but it afterwards formed part of the Athenian maritime empire.

Sicoris (Segre), a river in Hispania Tarracensis, which had its source in the territory of the Cerretani, divided the Ilergetes and Lacetani, flowed by Ilerda and, after receiving the river Cinga (Cinca), fell into the Iberus, near Octogesa (Caes. B. C. i. 40, 48; Lucan, iv. 13).

Sicyonia (Σικυωνία), a small district in the NE. of Peloponnesus, bounded on the E. by the territory of Corinth, on the W. by Achaia, on the S. by the territory of Phlius and Cleonae, and on the N. by the Corinthian gulf. The area of the country was probably somewhat less than 100 square miles. It consisted of a plain near the sea with mountains in the interior. Its rivers, which ran in a north-easterly direction, were Sythas on the frontier of Achaia, Helisson, Selleis, and Asopus in the interior, and Nemea on the frontier of the territory of Corinth. The land was fertile, and produced excellent oil. Its almonds and its fish were also much prized. Its chief town was Sicyon (Σικυών: Σικυώνιος), which was situated a little to the W. of the river Asopus, and at the distance of twenty stadia from the sea. It is situated on a plateau with steep sides, affording a defensible position. The harbour, which, according to some, was connected with the city by means of long walls, was well fortified, and formed a town of itself. Sicyon was regarded as one of the most ancient cities of Greece. It is said to have been originally called Aegialēa or Aegiali (Αἰγιάλεια, Αἰγιάλοι), after an ancient king, Aegialeus (a name clearly formed from the tribe or district); to have been subsequently named Mecōne (Μηκώνη), and to have been finally called Sicyon from an Athenian of this name, who became king of the city. (Hes. Th. 535; Strab. p. 382; Paus. ii. 6, 5.) The story suggests that the district of Sicyon was originally only a part of the Achaean Aegalia, and became an independent state when Athenian influence and aid withdrew it from the rest of Achaia. Sicyon is represented by Homer as forming part of the empire of Agamemnon (Il. ii. 572, xxiii. 299); but on the invasion of Peloponnesus it became subject to Phalces, the son of Temenus, and was henceforward a Dorian state. The ancient inhabitants, however, were formed into a fourth tribe, called Aegialeis, which possessed equal rights with the three tribes of the Hylleis, Pamphyli, and Dymanatae, into which the Dorian conquerors were divided. Sicyon, on account of the small extent of its territory, never attained much political importance, and was generally dependent either on Argos or Sparta. At the time of the second Messenian war it became subject to a succession of tyrants, who administered their power with moderation and justice for 100 years (Ar. Pol. v. 9, 21). The first of these tyrants was Andreas, who began to rule B.C. 676. He was followed in succession by Myron, Aristonymus, and Clisthenes, on whose death, about 576, a republican form of government was established. Clisthenes had no male children, but only a daughter, Agariste, who was married to the Athenian Megacles (Hdt. vi. 126; Paus. ii. 8, 1). In the Persian war the Sicyonians sent fifteen ships to the battle of Salamis, and 300 hoplites to the battle of Plataea (Hdt. viii. 43, ix. 28). In the interval between the Persian and the Peloponnesian wars, the Sicyonians were twice defeated and their country laid waste by the Athenians, first under Tolmides in 456, and again under Pericles in 454. In the Peloponnesian war they took part with the Spartans. Sicyon was occupied by Ptolemy in 308, and by Demetrius Poliorcetes in 303, when its name was changed (but only for a short time) to Demetrias (Diod. xx. 102). In the middle of the third century Sicyon took an active part in public affairs in consequence of its being the native town of Aratus, who united it to the Achaean League in 251 (Plut. Arat. 9; Pol. ii. 43). Under the Romans it gradually declined; and in the time of Pausanias, in the second century of the Christian era, many of its public buildings were in ruins.—Sicyon was for a long time one of the chief seats of Grecian art. It gave its name to one of the great schools of painting, which was founded by Eupompus, and which produced Pamphilus and Apelles. It is also said to have been the earliest school of statuary in Greece, which was introduced into Sicyon by Dipoenus and Scyllis from Crete about 560; but its earliest native artist of celebrity was Canachus. Lysippus was also a native of Sicyon.—There are considerable ruins of the ancient city, showing the position of the Acropolis, the temple of the Dioscuri, the Stadion and the Theatre, in which the tiers of seats and the stage have in recent years been completely excavated by the American School at Athens.

Sida, Sidē (Σιδῆ, Σιδίτης, and Σιδήτης, Sidites, and Sidētes). 1. (Ἐσκι Αἰδάλια, Ru.), a city of Pamphylia, on the coast, a little W. of the river Melas. It was an Aeolian colony from Cyme in Aeolis, and was a chief seat of the worship of Athene, who is represented on its coins holding a pomegranate (σίδη) as the emblem of the city. In the division of the provinces under Constantine, it was made the capital of Pamphylia Prima. (Xen. An. i. 2, 12; Athen. p. 350; Paus. viii. 17, 31; Cic. ad Fam. iii. 6).—2. The old name of POLEMONIUM, from which a flat district in the N.E. of Pontus Polemoniacus, along the coast, obtained the name of Sidēne (Σιδηνή).

Sidēnus. [POLEMONIUM.]

Sidicīni, an Ausonian people in the NW. of Campania and on the borders of Samnium, who, being hard pressed by the Samnites, united themselves to the Campanians (Liv. vii. 29; Strab. p. 237). Their chief town was TEANUM.

Sidon, gen. -onis (Σιδών, gen. Σιδῶνος, Σιδόνος, O.T. Zidon; Σιδών, Σιδώνιος, Σιδόνιος, Sidonius: Saida), for a long time the most powerful, and probably the most ancient, of the cities of Phoenice. It stood in a plain, about a mile wide, on the coast of the Mediterranean, 200 stadia (20 geogr. miles) N. of Tyre, 400 stadia (40 geogr. miles) S. of Berytus, 66 miles W. of Damaacus, and a day's journey NW. of the source of the Jordan at Paneas. It had a fine double harbour, now almost filled with sand; and was strongly fortified. It was the chief seat of the maritime power of Phoenice, until eclipsed by its own colony, Tyre [TYRUS]; and its power on the land side seems to have extended over all Phoenice, and at one period over a part of Palestine. In the expedition of Xerxes against Greece, the Sidonians furnished the best ships in the whole fleet, and their king obtained the highest place, next to Xerxes, in the council, and above the king of Tyre. Sidon received a great blow to her prosperity in the reign of Artaxerxes III. Ochus, when the Sidonians, having taken part in the revolt of Phoenice and Cyprus, and being betrayed to Ochus by their own king, Tennes, burnt themselves with their city, B.C. 351. The city was rebuilt, but the fortifications were not restored, and the place was therefore of no further importance in military history. It shared the fortunes of the rest of Phoenicia, and under the Romans it retained much of its commercial importance, which it has not yet entirely lost. [PHOENICE.]

Sidōnīus Apollināris, whose full name was C. Sollius Modestus Apollinaris Sidonius, was born at Lyons about A.D. 431. At an early age he married Papianilla, the child of Flavius Avitus; and upon the elevation of his father-in-law to the imperial dignity (456), he accompanied him to Rome, and celebrated his consulship in a poem still extant. Avitus raised Sidonius to the rank of a senator, nominated him prefect of the city, and caused his statue to be placed among the effigies which graced the library of Trajan. The downfall of Avitus threw a cloud over the fortunes of Sidonius, who having been shut up in Lyons, and having endured the hardships of the siege, purchased pardon by a complimentary address to the victorious Majorian. The poet was not only forgiven, but was rewarded with a laurelled bust, and with the title of count. After passing some years in retirement during the reign of Severus, Sidonius was despatched to Rome (467) in the character of ambassador from the Arverni to Anthemius, and on this occasion delivered a third panegyric in honour of a third prince, which proved not less successful than his former efforts, for he was now raised to the rank of a patrician, again appointed prefect of the city, and once more honoured with a statue. But a still more remarkable tribute was soon afterwards rendered to his talents; for although he was not a priest, the vacant see of Clermont in Auvergne was forced upon his reluctant acceptance (472) at the death of the bishop Eparchius. During the remainder of his life he devoted himself to the duties of his sacred office, and especially resisted with energy the progress of Arianism. He died in 482, or, according to others, in 484. The extant works of Sidonius are:—(1) Carmina, twenty-four in number, composed in various measures upon various subjects. Of these the most important are the three panegyrics already mentioned. (2) Epistolarum Libri IX, containing 147 letters, many of them interspersed with pieces of poetry. They are addressed to a wide circle of relatives and friends upon topics connected with politics, literature and domestic occurrences, but seldom touch upon ecclesiastical matters. They are imitations of the letters of Pliny and Symmachus. The writings of Sidonius are characterised by great subtlety of thought, expressed in phraseology abounding with harsh and violent metaphors, and full of learned mythology. Hence he is generally obscure; but his works throughout bear the impress of an acute and highly cultivated intellect.—The best editions of his works are by Sirmond, Paris, 1652, and by C. Lütjohann, Berl. 1887.

Sidūs (Σιδούς, -οῦντος: Σιδούντιος), a fortified place in the territory of Corinth, on the bay of Cenchreae, and a little to the E. of Crommyon. It was taken by the Lacedaemonians in the Corinthian war, and retaken by Iphicrates. (Xen. Hell. iv. 4, 13, iv. 5, 19.)

Sidussa (Σιδούσσα), a small place in Lydia, belonging to the territory of the Ionian city of Erythra (Thuc. viii. 24).

Sidýma (τὰ Σίδυμα: Tortoorcar Hisar, Ru.), a town in the interior of Lycia, on a mountain, N. of the mouth of Xanthus (Plin. v. 101; Ptol. v. 3, 5; Hierocl. p. 684). There are interesting remains of the town, with valuable inscriptions.

Siga (Σίγα), a considerable seaport town of Mauretania Caesariensis, on a river of the same name, the mouth of which opened into a large bay, which formed the harbour of the town (Ptol. iv. 2, 2; Strab. p. 829).

Sigēum (Yenisher), the NW. promontory of the Troad, of Asia Minor, and of all Asia, and the S. headland at the entrance of the Hellespont, opposite to the Prom. Mastusium (C. Helles), at the extremity of the Thracian Chersonese. It is here that Homer places the Grecian fleet and camp during the Trojan war [TROJA]. Near it was a seaport town of the same name, which was the object of contention between the Aeolians and the Athenians in the war in which Pittacus distinguished himself by his valour and in which Alcaeus lost his shield. [PITTACUS; ALCAEUS.] It was afterwards the residence of the Pisistratidae, when they were expelled from Athens. (Strab. p. 599; Hdt. v. 95.)

Signia (Signinus: Segni), a town in Latium on the E. side of the Volscian mountains, said to have been founded by Tarquinius Priscus

(Liv. i. 55; Dionys. iv. 68). It held a strong position on a hill commanding the valley of the Trerus and overlooking the plain towards Praeneste. It was a Latin colony in the time of the Punic wars, and was faithful to Rome (Liv. xxi. i. 10); and it was afterwards an important municipal town. It was celebrated for its temple of Jupiter Urius, for its astringent wine (Mart. xiii. 116; Strab. p. 237), for its pears, and for a particular kind of tessellated pavement, called opus Signinum. There are still remains of the polygonal walls of the ancient town, including a gate which is a remarkable instance of Cyclopean building.

Sigrium (Σίγριον: Sigri), the W. promontory of the island of Lesbos (Strab. p. 616).

Sila Silva (Aspromonte), a large forest in Bruttium on the Apennines, extending S. of Consentia to the Sicilian straits, a distance of 700 stadia. It was celebrated for the excellent pitch which it yielded. (Strab. p. 261.)

Silanion (Σιλανίων), a distinguished Greek sculptor, was an Athenian and a contemporary of Lysippus, about 324. The statues of Silanion belonged to two classes, ideal and actual portraits. Of the former the most celebrated was his dying Jocasta, in which a deadly paleness was given to the face by the mixture of silver with the bronze (Plin. xxxiv. 82). His statue of Sappho, which stood in the prytaneum at Syracuse in the time of Verres, is alluded to by Cicero in terms of the highest praise (Cic. Verr. iv. 57, 125).

Silanus, Junius. 1. M., was praetor 212. In 210 he accompanied P. Scipio to Spain, and served under him with great distinction during the whole of the war in that country. He fell in battle against the Boii in 196, fighting under the consul M. Marcellus. (Liv. xxv. 2, xxviii. 1; Pol. xi. 20-26; App. Hisp. 28, 32.)—2. D., surnamed Manlianus, son of the jurist T. Manlius Torquatus, but adopted by a D. Junius Silanus. He was praetor 142, and obtained Macedonia as his province. Being accused of extortion by the inhabitants of the province, the senate referred the investigation of the charges to his own father, Torquatus, who condemned his son, and banished him from his presence; and when Silanus hanged himself in grief, his father would not attend his funeral. (Val. Max. v. 8, 3; Cic. Fin. i. 7.)—3. M., consul 109, fought in this year against the Cimbri in Transalpine

Gaul, and was defeated. He was accused in 104, by the tribune Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, in consequence of this defeat, but was acquitted. (Liv. Ep. 65; Sall. Jug. 43; Flor. iii. 3, 4.)—4. D., stepfather of M. Brutus, the murderer of Caesar, having married his mother Servilia. He was elected consul in 63 for the following year; and in consequence of his being consul designatus, he was first asked for his opinion by Cicero in the debate in the senate on the punishment of the Catilinarian conspirators. He was consul 62, with L. Licinius Murena, along with whom he proposed the Lex Licinia Julia. (Sall. Cat. 50; App. B. C. ii. 5; Plut. Cic. 20, 21; Cic. Off. ii. 16, ad Att. i. 1, ii. 9.)—5. M., son of No. 4 and of Servilia, served in Gaul as Caesar's legatus in 53. After Caesar's murder in 44, he accompanied M. Lepidus over the Alps, and in the following year Lepidus sent him with a detachment of troops into Cisalpine Gaul, where he fought on the side of Antony. He was consul in 25. He had two sisters, one married to M. Lepidus, the triumvir, and the other to C. Cassius, one of Caesar's murderers. (Caes. B. G. vi. 1; Dio Cass. xlv. 38, 51, liii. 25; Vell. Pat. ii. 77.)—6. M., consul 19, with L. Norbanus Balbus. In 33 his daughter Claudia was married to C. Caesar, afterwards the emperor Caligula. Silanus was governor of Africa in the reign of Caligula, but was compelled by his father-in-law to put an end to his life. Julius Graecinus, the father of Agricola, had been ordered by Caligula to accuse Silanus, but he declined the odious task. (Tac. Ann. ii. 59, iii. 24, vi. 20, Hist. iv. 48, Agr. 4; Suet. Cal. 12, 23.)—7. App., consul A.D. 28 with Silius Nerva. Claudius soon after his accession gave to Silanus in marriage Domitia Lepida, the mother of his wife Messallina, and treated him otherwise with the greatest distinction. But shortly afterwards, having refused the embraces of Messallina, he was put to death by Claudius, on the accusations of Messallina and Narcissus. (Dio Cass. ix. 14; Tac. Ann. iv. 68, vi. 9, xi. 29; Suet. Claud. 37.) The first wife of Silanus was Aemilia Lepida, the proneptis or great-granddaughter of Augustus.—8. M., son of No. 7, consul 46. Silanus was proconsul of Asia at the succession of Nero in 54, and was poisoned by command of Agrippina, who feared that he might avenge the death of his brother [No. 9] and that his descent from Augustus might lead him to be preferred to the youthful Nero. (Dio Cass. lx. 27; Tac. Ann. xiii. 1.)—9. L., also a son of No. 7, was betrothed to Octavia, the daughter of the emperor Claudius, which roused the jealousy of Agrippina, and when, through her influence, Octavia was married to Nero, in 48, Silanus knew that his fate was sealed and therefore put an end to his life. (Tac. Ann. xii. 3, 8; Dio Cass. lx. 5, 31.)—10. D. Junius Torquatus Silanus, probably also a son of No. 7, was consul 53. He was compelled by Nero in 64 to put an end to his life, because he had boasted of being descended from Augustus. (Tac. Ann. xii. 58, xv. 35.)—11. L. Junius Torquatus Silanus, son of No. 8, and consequently the atnepos, or great-great-grandson of Augustus. His descent from Augustus rendered him an object of suspicion to Nero. He was accordingly accused in 65, was sentenced to banishment, and was shortly afterwards put to death at Barium in Apulia. (Tac. Ann. xv. 52, xvi. 7-9.)

Silārus (Sele), a river in lower Italy, forming the boundary between Lucania and Campania, rises in the Apennines, and after receiving the Tanager (Negri) and Calor (Calore), falls into the Sinus Paestanus a little to the N. of Paestum. Its water is said to have petrified plants. (Strab. pp. 251, 252; Mel. ii, 4, 9.)

Silēnus (Σειληνός). 1. (Mythological.) Silenus, who is familiar in Greek and Roman literature and art as the satyr-like half-drunken attendant of the youthful Dionysus, or foster-father of the infant Dionysus, was originally something quite different. In Lydia, which was always recognised as his home (Lucian, Deor. Conc. 4) he was the god of springs and running water, and even the personification of water. In popular belief there were several Sileni, who were, in fact, male Naiads (among whom may be reckoned MARSYAS), and also inventors of the flute; but one Silenus had a separate personality, and was regarded as the Lydian water-god. As was the case with nymphs and other nature-deities in Greece, Silenus was credited with prophetic power. This attribute, as well as his connexion with springs, appears in the Lydian story of Midas capturing him by mixing wine with the spring, and so extorting a prophesy. [MIDAS.] It is probably right to understand the ass in the Asiatic myth of Silenus as symbolising his prophetic power, since Pindar speaks of the ass as the animal sacrificed to the Hyperborean Apollo (Pyth. x. 33). Even in Greece and Italy there were traces of the belief in Sileni as water-deities. In the Homeric Hymn to Aphrodite (262) they are companions of nymphs. At Malea in Laconia the people believed that Silenus gave them their water, and that he was the son of a Malean naiad (Paus. iii. 25, 2); and in Italy fountains were called 'silani,' and the water was made to flow from the head or from the water-skin of a sculptured Silenus (Lucr. vi. 1264). When the worship of Dionysus prevailed, it was natural that Silenus should be brought into connexion with that deity as the tree-god, since water gives vitality to trees; and when Dionysus was worshipped specially as the god of the vine and of wine, a transformation came upon Silenus. Instead of being the deity of springs, he was the drunken attendant of the wine-god, himself a demigod or demon, like the Satyrs: his water-skin became a wine-skin, and the ass, instead of a symbol of prophetic power, was travestied in Bacchic processions, and was supposed to be needed to carry Silenus, a drunken old man supported by other satyrs. (Ov. A. A. i. 543; Lucian, Bacch. 2.) His parentage, too, is Grecised: he is the son of Hermes (Serv. ad Ecl. vi. 13), or of Pan (Nonn. Dionys. xiv. 97). In art he is represented as an oldish man with shaggy hair and beard, crowned with ivy: sometimes he is seated astride on his wine-skin; sometimes he has the infant Dionysus in his arms; in the pictures and reliefs of Bacchic processions he is riding on an ass; sometimes also playing on a flute (as in the cut on p. 297). —2. C. Silius Italicus, whose full name seems to have been C. Catius Silius Italicus (C. I. L. vi. 1984), a Roman poet, was born about A.D. 25. The place of his birth is uncertain, as is also the import of his surname Italicus. Some have taken it to mean that he was born at Italica in Spain; but if that had been so Martial would probably have claimed him as a fellow-countryman. From his early years he devoted himself to oratory and poetry, taking Cicero as his model in the former, and Virgil in the latter. He acquired great reputation as an advocate, and was afterwards one of the Centumviri. He was consul in 68, the year in which Nero perished; he was admitted to familiar intercourse with Vitellius, and was subsequently proconsul of Asia. (Tac. Hist. iii. 65.) His two favourite residences were a mansion near Puteoli, formerly the Academy of Cicero, and the house in the vicinity of Naples once occupied by Virgil (Mart. vii. 63, xi. 48); and here he continued to live until he had completed his seventy-fifth year, when, suffering from an incurable disease, he starved himself to death (Plin. Ep. iii. 7). The great work of Silius Italicus was a heroic poem in seventeen books, entitled Punica, which has descended to us entire. It contains a narrative of the events of the second Punic war, from the capture of Saguntum to the triumph of Scipio Africanus. The materials are derived almost entirely from Livy and Polybius. It is a dull, heavy performance, with little in it that can be called poetry.—Editions are by Drakenborch, 4to, Traj. ad Rhen. 1717; Ruperti, 2 vols. 8vo, Goetting. 1795; Bauer, Leips. 1890; and in Weber's *Corp. Silō, Q. Pompeidius, the leader of the Marsi in the Social war, and the soul of the whole undertaking. He fell in battle against Q. Metellus Pius, B.C. 88, and with his death the war came to an end. (App. B. C. i. 40–53; Vell. Pat. ii. 16.)

Silo (Σιλώ, Σηλῶν, Σιλουῖν: O. T. Shiloh and Shilon: Seilun), a city of Palestine, in the mountains of Ephraim. [See Dict. of the Bible.]

Silsilis (Σιλσιλῖς: Hajjar Selseleh or Jebel Selseleh, Ru.), a fortified station in Upper Egypt, on the W. bank of the Nile, S. of Apollinopolis the Great. The name signifies the Rock or Hill of a Chain, and is derived from the circumstance of the river flowing here in a ravine so narrow that a chain can easily be stretched across it to command the navigation.

Silures, a powerful people in Britain, inhabiting South Wales, long offered a formidable resistance to the Romans, and were the only people in the island who at a later time maintained their independence against the English (Tac. Ann. xii. 2; Bede, H.E. i. 12).

Silvanus, an Italian deity of the country, very nearly akin to Faunus and also to the agricultural Mars [see pp. 340, 529]. From Faunus he differed little in attributes, except that woods and trees were his especial province (Tibull. ii. 5, 30); but he also presided over flocks and herds (Verg. Aen. viii. 600), from which, like Faunus, he drove off wolves. As god of the fields and homestead, he was regarded as defender of boundaries (Hor. Epod. ii. 22). By agriculturists he was therefore worshipped as their protector in three ways: (1) as Silvanus Domesticus, who guarded the homestead; (2) as Silvanus Agrestis, who gave fertility to the fields; (3) as Silvanus Orientalis, who watched over the place where the boundary-fence started. From the guardianship of the house he assumed a character like that of a Lar or of a Genius, so that he appears in inscriptions with the name of some family attached (C.I.L. vi. 645). For some reason not easy to explain, Silvanus was specially connected with the pine-tree and cypress (Verg. Georg. i. 20). Some have supposed that this implied a superintendence of the dead and of funeral rites, and that the Collegia Silvani had this function, but there is no clear evidence of this. The attribute of the pine-tree gave him the name Silvanus Dendrophorus (C.I.L. vi. 641), and brought him into connexion with the dendrophori, or pine-bearers of Cybele. A tradition sprang up, to explain his bearing a pine or a cypress branch, that Silvanus loved the youth Cyparissus, who was turned into a cypress-tree. (Serv. ad Georg. i. 20; cf. Ov. Met. x. 120.)

Silvium (Silvinus), a town of the Peucetii in Apulia on the borders of Lucania, twenty miles S.E. of Venusia (Strab. p. 283; Diod. xx. 80).

Silvius, the son of Ascanius, is said to have been so called because he was born in a wood. All the succeeding kings of Alba bore the cognomen Silvius. The first trace of this line of Alban kings is found in Alexander Polyhistor (ap. Serv. ad Aen. viii. 330), who wrote early in the first century B.C. The series of these mythical kings is given somewhat differently by Livy, Ovid, and Dionysius, as the following list will show:

Livy.	Ovid.	Dionysius.
1. Aeneas.	Aeneas.	Aeneas.
2. Ascanius.	Ascanius.	Ascanius.
3. Silvius.	Silvius.	Silvius.
4. Aeneas Silvius.		Aeneas Silvius.
5. Latinus Silvius.	Latinus.	Latinus Silvius.
6. Alba.	Alba.	Alba.
7. Atys.	Epytus.	Capetus.
8. Capys.	Capys.	Capys Silvius.
9. Capetus.	Capetus.	Calpetus.
10. Tiberinus.	Tiberinus.	Tiberinus.
11. Agrippa.	Remulus.	Agrippa.
12. Romulus Silvius.	Acrota.	Alladius.
13. Aventinus.	Aventinus.	Aventinus.
14. Proca.	Palatinus.	Procas.
15. Amulius.	Amulius.	Amulius.

But the lists are all due to the same cause. The date of the fall of Troy having been fixed at 400 years before the first Olympiad, the inference was that Rome was founded 432 years after Aeneas started on his voyage. When the story of the connexion of Aeneas with the origin of Rome was first popularised (apparently by Naevius) it was imagined that Romulus directly succeeded him [see p. 797]; but it became necessary to reconcile this with the chronology which made several centuries intervene. To fill up this gap, and at the same time to maintain the descent from Aeneas, and the colonisation of Rome from Alba, fifteen generations of Alban kings were invented, with no distinct personality or legendary history, and with names partly (as Ascanius and Capys) taken from Homeric or Trojan legends, partly connected with Roman local or tribal names. (Liv. i. 3; Dionys. i. 70, 71; Ov. Met. xiv. 609-624.)

Simmias (Σιμμίας). 1. Of Thebes, first the disciple of the Pythagorean philosopher Philolaus, and afterwards the friend and disciple of Socrates, at whose death he was present, having come from Thebes, with his brother Cebes (Plat. Phaedr. p. 242). The two brothers are the principal speakers, besides Socrates himself, in the Phaedo. Simmias wrote twenty-three dialogues on philosophical subjects, all of which are lost.—2. Of Rhodes, a poet and grammarian of the Alexandrian school, flourished about B.C. 300. The Greek Anthology contains six epigrams ascribed to Simmias, besides three short poems of that fantastic species called griphi or carmina figurata—that is, pieces in which the lines are so arranged as to make the whole poem resemble the form of some object; those of Simmias are entitled, from their forms, the Wings (πτέρυγες) [comp. the poem of George Herbert], the Egg (ᾠόν), and the Hatchet (πέλεκυς).

Simois. [TROAS.] As a mythological personage, the river-god Simois is the son of Oceanus and Tethys, and the father of Astyocheus and Hieromneme (Hes. Th. 342; cf. Il. v. 774, xii. 22; Verg. Aen. v. 261).

Simon (Σίμων). 1. One of the disciples of Socrates, and by trade a leather-cutter. Socrates was accustomed to visit his shop, and converse on various subjects. These conversations Simon afterwards committed to writing, in thirty-three dialogues, all of which are lost. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 122).—2. Of Aegina, a celebrated statuary in bronze, who flourished about B.C. 475.

Simōnides (Σιμωνίδης). 1. Of Amorgos, was the second, both in time and reputation, of the three principal iambic poets of the early period of Greek literature: namely, Archilochus, Simonides, and Hipponax; but in merit there is a wide interval between the vigour of the warlike and roving Archilochus and the stay-at-home, somewhat commonplace Simonides. He was a native of Samos, whence he led a colony to the neighbouring island of Amorgos, where he founded three cities, Minoa, Aegialus, and Arcesine, in the first of which he fixed his own abode. He lived about B.C. 664. The iambic poems of Simonides were of two species, gnomic and satirical. The most important of his extant fragments is a satire upon women, in which he derives the various, though generally bad, qualities of women from the variety of their origin: thus the uncleanly woman is formed from the swine; the cunning woman, from the fox; the talkative woman, from the dog, and so on.—The best separate edition of the fragments of Simonides of Amorgos is by Welcker, Bonn, 1835; also in Bergk, Poët. Lyr. Graec. 1866.—2. Of Ceos, one of the most celebrated lyric poets of Greece, was the perfecter of the Elegy and Epigram, and the rival of Lasus and Pindar in the Dithyramb and the Epinician Ode. He was born at Iulis, in Ceos, B.C. 556, and was the son of Leoprepes. He appears to have been brought up to music and poetry as a profession. From his native island he proceeded to Athens, probably on the invitation of Hipparchus, who attached him to his society by great rewards ([Plat.] Hipparch. p. 228; Ael. V.H. viii. 2). After remaining at Athens some time, probably even after the expulsion of Hippias, he went to Thessaly, where he lived under the patronage of the Aleuads and Scopads (Theocr. xvi. 34). He afterwards returned to Athens, and soon had the noblest opportunity of employing his poetic powers in the celebration of the great events of the Persian wars. In 489, he conquered Aeschylus in the contest for the prize which the Athenians offered for an elegy on those who fell at Marathon [p. 28, a]. Ten years later, he composed the epigrams which were inscribed upon the tomb of the Spartans who fell at Thermopylae, as well as an encomium on the same heroes (Paus. iii. 8, 2; Thuc. i. 132); and he also celebrated the battles of Artemisium and Salamis, and the great men who commanded in them. He had completed his eightieth year when his long poetical career at Athens was crowned by the victory which he gained with the dithyrambic chorus (477), being the fifty-sixth prize which he had carried off. Shortly after this he was invited to Syracuse by Hiero, at whose court he lived till his death in 467. Simonides was a great favourite with Hiero, and was treated by the tyrant with the greatest munificence. He still continued, when at Syracuse, to employ his muse occasionally in the service of other Grecian states. Simonides is said to have been the inventor of the mnemonic art (cf. Cic. de Or. ii. 86, 352), and of the long vowels and double letters in the Greek alphabet. He made literature a profession, and is said to have been the first who took money for his poems; and the reproach of avarice is too often brought against him by his contemporary and rival, Pindar, as well as by subsequent writers, to be altogether discredited. The chief characteristics of the poetry of Simonides were melodious sweetness and elaborate finish, combined with the truest poetic conception and perfect power of expression, though in originality and fervour he was far inferior, not only to the early lyric poets, such as Sappho and Alcaeus, but also to his contemporary Pindar. He was probably both the most prolific and the most generally popular of the Grecian lyric poets.—The best edition of his fragments in a separate form is by Schneidewin, Bruns. 1835; also in Bergk, Poët. Lyr. Graec. 1866. The Lamentatio Danae is separately edited by Ahrens, Hanov. 1853.

Simplicius (Σιμπλικίος), one of the last philosophers of the Neo-Platonic school, was a native of Cilicia and a disciple of Ammonius and Damascius. In consequence of the persecutions to which the pagan philosophers were exposed in the reign of Justinian, Simplicius was one of the seven philosophers who took refuge at the court of the Persian king Chosroës. [PRISCIANUS.] These philosophers returned home about A.D. 533 in consequence of a treaty of peace concluded between Chosroës and Justinian, in which the former had stipulated that the philosophers should be allowed to return without risk, and to practise the rites of their paternal faith. Of the subsequent fortunes of the seven philosophers we learn nothing; nor do we know where Simplicius lived and taught. Simplicius wrote commentaries on several of Aristotle's works. His commentaries on the Categories, on the De Coelo, on the Physica, Auscultatio, and on the De Anima are extant, and are of great value for the history of philosophy. In explaining Aristotle, Simplicius endeavours to show that Aristotle substantially agrees with Plato even on those points which the former controverts; but though he attaches himself too much to the Neo-Platonists, his writings are marked by sound sense and real learning.—Ed. Karsten, 1865. He also wrote a commentary on the Enchiridion of Epictetus, which is likewise extant: ed. Enk, Vienna, 1867. The complete works by Schweighäuser, Leips. 1800.

Simyra (τὰ Σίμυρα: Zamura or Sumore), a fortress on the coast of Phoenice, a little way N. of the mouth of the Eleutherus, of no importance except as being the point from which the N. part of Lebanon was usually approached (Strab. 753).

Sinae (Σίναί), the easternmost people of Asia, of whom nothing but the name was known to the western nations, till about the time of Ptolemy, who describes their country as bounded on the N. by Serica, and on the S. and W. by India extra Gangem. It corresponded to the S. part of China and the E. part of the Burmese peninsula. (Ptol. vii. 3.)

Sinai or Sina (LXX Σινά: Jebel-et-Tur), a cluster of dark, lofty, rocky mountains in the S. angle of the triangular peninsula enclosed between the two heads of the Red Sea, and bounded on the N. by the deserts on the borders of Egypt and Palestine. [See Dict. of the Bible.]

Sinda (Σίνδα: Σινδεύς, Sindensis). 1. A city of Pisidia, N. of Cibra, near the river Caularis (Strab. pp. 570, 680; Liv. xxxviii. 15).—2, 3. [SINDI.]

Sindi (Σινδοί). 1. A people of Asiatic Sarmatia, on the E. coast of the Euxine, and at the foot of the Caucasus. They probably dwelt in and about the peninsula of Taman (between the Sea of Azov and the Black Sea), and to the S. of the river Hypanis (Kouban). They had a capital called Sinda (Anapa?) with a harbour (Σινδικὸς λιμήν). Their country is called Σινδική. They are also mentioned by the names of Sindones and Sindiāni. (Hdt. iv. 28; Mel. ii. 19; Strab. p. 495.)—2. A people on the E. coast of India extra Gangem (in Cochin China), also called Sindae (Σίνδαι), and with a capital city Sinda (Ptol. vii. 2, 7).

Sindice. [SINDI.]

Sindomāna (Σινωμάνη), a city of India, on the lower course of the Indus, near the island of Pattalene (Arr. An. vi. 15; Strab. p. 701).

Sindus (Σίνδος), a town in the Macedonian district of Mygdonia on the Thermaic gulf, and at the mouth of the Echedorus (Hdt. vii. 123).

Singāra (τὰ Σίγγαρα: Sinjar), a strongly fortified city and Roman colony in the interior of Mesopotamia, eighty-four Roman miles S. of Nisibis. It lay in a dry plain, at the foot of M. Singaras (Sinjar), an E. prolongation of M. Masius. It was the scene of the defeat of Constantius by Sapor, through which the place was lost to the Romans. (Dio Cass. xviii. 22; Amm. Marc. xviii. 5.)

Singidūnum (Belgrade), a town in Moesia Superior at the confluence of the Savus and the Danube, was a strong fortress, and the headquarters of a legion (Ptol. iii. 9, 3; Procop. Aed. iv. 6).

Singiticus Sinus. [SINGUS.]

Singus (Σίγγος: Σίγγαίος), a town in Macedonia on the E. coast of the peninsula Sithonia, which gave its name to the Sinus Singiticus (Hdt. vii. 122; Thuc. v. 18).

Sinis or Sinnis (Σίνις or Σίννις), son of Polyemon, Pemon or Poseidon by Sylea, the daughter of Corinthus. He was a robber who frequented the isthmus of Corinth and killed the travellers whom he captured, by fastening them to the top of a fir-tree, which he bent down and then let spring up again. He himself was killed in this manner by Theseus. The name is connected with σίνωμα. (Apollod. iii. 16, 2; Paus. ii. 1, 3; Eur. Hipp. 977; Ov. Met. vii. 440.)

Sinon (Σίνων), son of Aesimus, or, according to Virgil, of Sisyphus, and grandson of Autolycus, was a relation of Odysseus, whom he accompanied to Troy. After the Greeks had constructed the wooden horse, Sinon mutilated himself, in order to make the Trojans believe that he had been maltreated by the Greeks, and then allowed himself to be taken prisoner by the Trojans. He informed the Trojans that the wooden horse had been constructed as an atonement for the Palladium which had been carried off by the Greeks, and that if they would drag it into their own city, Asia would gain the supremacy over Greece. The Trojans believed the deceiver, and dragged the horse into the city; whereupon Sinon in the dead of night let out the Greeks, who thus took Troy. (Verg. Aen. ii. 77, 259; Dict. Cret. v. 12; Hyg. Fab. 108.)

Sinōpē (Σινώπη: Σινωπεύς, Sinopensis: Sinope, Sinoub, Ru.), the most important of the Greek colonies on the shores of the Euxine, stood on the N. coast of Asia Minor, on the W. headland of the great bay of which the delta of the river Halys forms the E. headland, and a little E. of the northernmost promontory of Asia Minor. Thus placed, and built on a peninsula, the neck of which formed two fine harbours, it had every advantage for becoming a great maritime city. Its foundation was referred mythically to the Argonaut Autolycus, who was worshipped in the city as a hero, and had an oracle; but it appears in history as a very early colony of the Milesians. (Strab. p. 546; Ap. Rh. ii. 947; Hdt. iv. 12.) Having been destroyed in the invasion of Asia by the Cimmerians, it was restored by a new colony from Miletus, B.C. 632, and soon became the greatest commercial city on the Euxine. Several colonies were established by the Sinopians on the adjacent coasts, the chief of which were Cotyora, Trapezus, and Cerasus. Its territory, called Sinōpis (Σινωπία, also Σινωπία), extended to the banks of the Halys. At the beginning of the Peloponnesian war the Athenians sent 600 colonists to strengthen it after the Sinopians had expelled their tyrant (Plut. Pericl. 20). Xenophon in his retreat found it a prosperous city (Xen. An. v. 5, 3; cf. Diod.

xiv. 30). It remained an independent state till it was taken by Pharnaces I., king of Pontus. It was the birthplace and residence of Mithridates the Great, who enlarged and beautified it. After an obstinate resistance to the Romans under Lucullus, it was taken and plundered, and proclaimed a free city. Shortly before the murder of Julius Caesar, it was colonised by the name of Julia Caesarea Felix Sinope, and remained a flourishing city, though it never recovered its former importance. At the time of Constantine, it had declined so much as to be ranked second to Amasia. In addition to its commerce, Sinope was greatly enriched by its fisheries. It was the native city of the renowned Cynic philosopher Diogenes, of the comic poet Diphilus, and of the historian Baton. (Strab. p. 477; Plin. Ep. x. 91.)

Sintica, a district in Macedonia, inhabited by the Thracian people Sinti, extended E. of Crestonia and N. of Bisaltia as far as the Strymon and the lake Prasias. Its chief town was Heraclaea Sintica. The Sinti were spread over other parts of ancient Thrace, and are identified by Strabo with the Sintians (Σίντιες) of Homer, the ancient inhabitants of Lemnos. (Thuc. ii. 98; Liv. xlii. 51, xlv. 29; Strab. p. 331.)

Sinuessa (Sinuessanus: Rocca di Mandragone), the last city of Latium on the confines of Campania, to which it originally belonged, was situated on the sea-coast, about six miles N. of the mouth of the Volturnus, and on the Via Appia, in the midst of a fertile country. It was colonised by the Romans, together with the neighbouring town of Minturnae, B.C. 296. (Liv. x. 21.) It possessed a good harbour, and was a place of considerable importance (Cic. ad Att. ix. 15, ad Fam. xii. 20; Hor. Sat. i. 5, 40). In its neighbourhood were celebrated warm baths, called Aquae Sinuessanae (Tac. Ann. xii. 66).

Siphnus (Σίφνος: Σίφνιος: Siphno), an island in the Aegean sea, forming one of the Cyclades, SE. of Seriphus. It is of an oblong form, and about forty miles in circumference. Its original name was Merope; and it was colonised by Ionians from Athens (Hdt. viii. 48). In consequence of their gold and silver mines, of which the remains are still visible, the Siphnians attained great prosperity, and were regarded in the time of Polycrates as the wealthiest of the islanders. Their treasury at Delphi, in which they deposited the tenth of the produce of their mines, was equal in wealth to that of any other Greek state. (Paus. x. 11, 2.) Their riches, however, exposed them to pillage; and a party of Samian exiles in the time of Polycrates invaded the island, and compelled them to pay 100 talents (Hdt. iii. 57). Siphnus was one of the few islands which refused tribute to Xerxes; and one of its ships fought on the side of the Greeks at Salamis. At a later time the mines were less productive; and Pausanias relates that in consequence of the Siphnians neglecting to send the tithe of their treasure to Delphi, the god destroyed their mines by an inundation of the sea. (Strab. p. 448; Paus. x. 11, 2.) The moral character of the Siphnians stood low, and hence to act like a Siphnian (Σίφνιάζειν) became a term of reproach.

Sipontum or Sipuntum (Sipontinus: Siponto), called by the Greeks Sipūs (Σίπους, -οῦντος), an ancient town in Apulia, in the district of Daunia, on the S. slope of Mt. Garganus, and on the coast. It is said to have been founded by Diomedes, and was of Greek origin. (Strab. p. 284.) It was colonised by the Romans, under whom it became a place of some commercial importance (Liv. xxxiv. 25; App. B. C. v. 56; Lucan, v. 377). The inhabitants were removed from the town by king Manfred in the thirteenth century, in consequence of the unhealthy nature of the locality, and were settled in the neighbouring town of Manfredonia, founded by this monarch.

Sipylus (Σίπυλος: Sipuli-Dagh), a mountain of Lydia, in Asia Minor, of volcanic formation, and rent by frequent earthquakes. It is a branch of the Tmolus, from the main chain of which it proceeds NW. along the course of the river Hermus, as far as Magnesia and Sipylum. It is mentioned by Homer (Il. xxiv. 16). The ancient capital of Maeonia was said to have been situated in the heart of the mountain chain, and to have been called by the same name; but it was early swallowed up by an earthquake, and its site became a little lake called Sale or Saloë, near which was a tumulus, supposed to be the grave of Tantalus. The mountain was rich in metals, and many mines were worked in it. (Strab. pp. 58, 579, 680; Paus. vii. 24, 7.)

Siracēnē (Σιρακηνή). 1. A district of Hyrcania.—2. A district of Armenia Major.—3. [SIRACENI.]

Siracēni, Sirāci, Sirāces (Σιρακηνοί, Σιρακοί, Σίρακες), a powerful people of Sarmatia Asia-tica, dwelt in the district of Siracene, E. of the Palus Maeotis, as far as the river Rha (Volga). The Romans were engaged in a war with them in A.D. 50. (Ptol. v. 9, 17; Strab. p. 504; Tac. Ann. xii. 15.)

Sirbōnis Lacus (Σιρβωνίδος λίμνη, aft. Σιρβωνίς λίμνη and Σίρβων: Sabakat Bardawal), a large and deep lake on the coast of Lower Egypt, E. of M. Casius. Its circuit was 1000 stadia. It was strongly impregnated with asphaltus. A connexion (called τὸ ἔκρεγμα) existed between the lake and the Mediterranean; but this being stopped up, the lake grew continually smaller by evaporation, and it is now nearly dry. (Hdt. ii. 6; Strab. pp. 760–763; Plin. v. 63.) Part of the army of Darius Ochus was swallowed up in it B.C. 350 (Diod. i. 80).

Sirēnes (Σειρήνες), sea-nymphs who had the power of charming by their songs all who heard them. When Odysseus came near the island on the beach of which the Sirens were sitting, and endeavouring to allure him and his companions, he stuffed the ears of his companions with wax, and tied himself to the mast of his vessel, until he was so far off that he could no longer hear their song. [For a vase-painting of this scene, see ODYSSEUS.] According to Homer, the island of the Sirens was situated between Aeaea and the rock of Scylla, near the SW. coast of Italy (Od. xii. 39); but the Roman poets place them on the Campanian coast. Homer says nothing of their number, but later writers mention both their names and number: some state that they were two, Aglaopheme and Thelxiepiā; and others, that there were three, Pisinōe, Aglaope, and Thelxiepiā, or Parthenope, Ligia, and Leucosia. They are called daughters of Phorcus, of Achelous and Sterope, of Terpsichore, of Melpomene, of Caliope, or of Gaea. (Strab. pp. 22, 246, 252; Ap. Rh. iv. 893; Serv. ad Georg. iv. 562.) The Sirens are also connected with the legends of the Argonauts and the rape of Persephone. When the Argonauts sailed by the Sirens, the latter began to sing, but in vain, for Orpheus surpassed them; and as it had been decreed that they should live only till some one hearing their song should pass by unmoved, they threw themselves into the sea, and were changed into rocks. (Apollod. i. 9, 25; Hyg. Fab. 141.) Later poets represent them as provided with wings, which they are said to have received at their own request, in order to be able to search after Persephone (Ov. Met. v. 552–563). Once, however, they allowed themselves to be prevailed upon by Hera to enter into a contest with the Muses, and being defeated, were deprived of their wings (Paus. ix. 34, 2). The idea of the Homeric Sirens seems to arise from an attempt to express the deceptive beauties of a calm sea luring men to destruction. But there is a distinct character of the Sirens which appears in the Attic representations of them in epitaphs (Anth. Pal. vii. 491), and in sculptures on tombstones. Why a Siren should be the commonest mythological figure for monuments of the dead is not quite clear. The connexion may be with the destructive character of the Homeric Siren, or with the myth of Persephone and the underworld, or the Siren of the tombstone may merely represent the wail of the mourner.

Sirenusae, called by Virgil (Aen. v. 864) Sirenium scopuli, three small uninhabited and rocky islands near the S. side of the Prom. Misenum, off the coast of Campania, which were, according to tradition, the abode of the Sirens (Strab. p. 22).

Siris. 1. (Sinno), a river in Lucania flowing into the Tarentine gulf, memorable for the victory which Pyrrhus gained on its banks over the Romans.—2. (Torre di Senna), an ancient Greek town in Lucania at the mouth of the preceding river. It was apparently an old Oenotrian city, though Strabo notices a tradition of its foundation by Trojans (p. 264). It was occupied by Ionian colonists from Colophon about 690 B.C. Siris was destroyed by the people of Sybaris and Crotona about 550 B.C., and when the country was re-settled by Athenians from Thurii a hundred years later, the city was built at first on the site of Siris and then transferred to Heraclea, three miles distant (Diod. xii. 36; Strab. l.c.).

Sirmio (Sirmione), a beautiful promontory on the S. shore of the Lacus Benacus (Lago di Garda), on which Catullus had an estate (Catull. ii. 31).

Sirmium (Mitrovitz), an important city in Pannonia Inferior, was situated on the left bank of the Savus. It was founded by the Taurisci, and under the Romans became the capital of Pannonia, and the head-quarters of all their operations in their wars against the Dacians and the neighbouring barbarians. It contained a large manufactory of arms, a spacious forum, an imperial palace, &c. It was the residence of the admiral of the first Flavian fleet on the Danube, and the birthplace of the emperor Probus. (Herodian, vii. 2; Amm. Marc. xvii. 13, xix. 11.)

Sisāpon (Almaden, in the Sierra Morena), an important town in Hispania Baetica, N. of Corduba, between the Baetis and Anas, celebrated for its silver mines and cinnabar (Strab. p. 142; Cic. Phil. ii. 19).

Siscia (Sissek), called Segesta by Appian, an important town in Pannonia Superior, situated upon an island formed by the rivers Savus, Colapis, and Odra, and on the road from Aemona to Sirmium (Dio Cass. xlix. 37; Vell. Pat. ii. 113; Strab. pp. 202, 214). It was a strongly fortified place, and was conquered by Tiberius in the reign of Augustus, from which time it became the most important town in all Pan-nonia. It was probably made a colony by Tiberius, and was colonised anew by Septimius Severus. At a later time its importance declined, and Sirmium became the chief town in Pannonia (Zosim. ii. 48).

Sisenna, L. Cornélius, a Roman annalist, was praetor in B.C. 78, the year when Sulla died (C.I.L. i. p. 110; Cic. Fragm. Cornel. i. 18). During the piratical war (67) he acted as the legate of Pompey, and having been despatched to Crete in command of an army, died in that island at the age of about 52 (Dio Cass. xxxvi. 1; App. Mithr. 95). He is mentioned also as a friend and defender of Verres in conjunction with Hortensius (Cic. Verr. ii. 45, 100). His great work, entitled Historiae, extended to more than twelve books, which contained the history of his own time. Cicero pronounces Sisenna superior as a historian to his predecessors, but adds that he belonged to a period when the true method of writing history was not understood (Brut. 64, 228; cf. de Leg. i. 7). In addition to his Historiae, Sisenna translated the Milesian tales of Aristides (Ov. Trist. ii. 443; Vell. Pat. ii. 9, 5). He is probably not the same as the Sisenna who wrote a commentary on Plautus, cited by grammarians; since in one place Charisius (p. 221) cites this commentator as quoting from Virgil.

Sisygambis (Σισύγαμβίς), mother of Darius Codomannus, the last king of Persia, fell into the hands of Alexander, after the battle of Issus, B.C. 333, together with the wife and daughters of Darius. Alexander treated these captives with the greatest generosity, and displayed towards Sisygambis in particular a delicacy of conduct which is one of the brightest ornaments of his character (Arrian, An. ii. 11; Plut. Alex. 21; Curt. iii. 11, 21). On her part, Sisygambis became so strongly attached to her conqueror, that she felt his death as a blow not less severe than that of her own son, and, overcome by this long succession of misfortunes, put an end to her own life by voluntary starvation (Curt. x. 5, 19; Diod. xvii. 118).

Sisyphus (Σίσυφος), son of Aeolus and Enarete, whence he is called Aeolides (Il. vi. 154; Hor. Od. ii. 14, 20). He was married to Merope, a daughter of Atlas or a Pleiad, and became by her the father of Glaucus, Ornytion (or Porphyron), Thersander and Halmus (Apollod. i. 7, 3; Paus. x. 31, 2). In post-Homeric writers, as the type of a crafty man, he is also called a son of Autolycus (Serv. ad Aen. ii. 79), and the father of Odysseus by Anticlea [ANTICLEA]; whence we find Odysseus sometimes called Sisyphides (Soph. Aj. 190, Phil. 417). The myths which make Sisyphus father of Glaucus, and the mention of the worship of a deity named ὁ Ταράξιππος at the Isthmus, whom Pausanias (vi. 20, 8) believes to be Poseidon, make it not improbable that Sisyphus was originally a deity of that district, who, when his worship was superseded by that of Poseidon, appeared in fable as a man characterised by the wiliness and treachery of the sea. In the various stories about him Sisyphus is said to have built the town of Ephrya, afterwards Corinth. As king of Corinth he promoted navigation and commerce, but he was fraudulent, avaricious, and deceitful. His wickedness during life was punished in the lower world, where he had to roll up hill a huge stone, which as soon as it reached the top always rolled down again. (Od. xi. 593; cf. Cic. Tusc. i. 5, 10; Lucr. iii. 1013; Verg. Georg. iii. 39; Ov. Met. iv. 459.) The reasons for this punishment are not the same in all authors: some relate that it was because he had betrayed the designs of the gods (Serv. ad Aen. vi. 16); others, because he had betrayed to Asopus that Zeus had carried off Aegina, the daughter of the latter (Apollod. i. 9, 3, iii. 12, 6; Paus. ii. 5, 1). It appears that there was an early legend of his having escaped from Hades by his craft; for Theognis (703) speaks of his coming back to earth, 'having persuaded Persephone by cunning words.' This may have been the subject of the satyric play Σίσυφος Δραπέτης, which existed besides the drama called Σίσυφος Πετροκυλιστής. The story was further developed in later writers (Eustath. ad Hom. pp. 631, 1702). Sisyphus contrived by his arts to chain Death, whom Zeus had sent to fetch him, so that neither he himself nor other men could die, and there was no longer any fear of the gods, until Ares was sent and delivered Death. Even then Sisyphus secured himself by directing his wife not to bury him, and when she complied with his request, Sisyphus in the lower world complained of this seeming neglect, and obtained from Pluto or Persephone permission to return to the upper world to punish his wife. He then refused to return to the lower world, until Hermes carried him off by force; and this deceit is said to have been the cause of his punishment.

Sitacē or Sittacē (Σιτάκη, Σιττάκη), a great and populous city of Babylonia, near the Tigris, a little above Seleucia. It gave the name of Sittacene to the district on the lower course of the Tigris E. of Babylonia and NW. of Susiana. (Strab. pp. 524, 744.)

Sitalces (Σιτάλκης), king of the Thracian tribe of the Odrisians, was a son of Teres, whom he succeeded on the throne. He increased his dominions by successful wars, so that they ultimately comprised the whole territory from Abdera to the mouths of the Danube, and from Byzantium to the sources of the Strymon (Thuc. ii. 29, 97; Diod. xii. 50). At the beginning of the Peloponnesian war he entered into an alliance with the Athenians, to whom he showed his friendship by giving up to them Corinthian and Spartan ambassadors (Thuc. ii. 67; cf. Hdt. vii. 137), and in 429 he invaded Macedonia with a vast army, but was obliged to retire through failure of provisions (Thuc. ii. 95-101; Diod. xii. 51). He was defeated and killed in 424, fighting against the Triballi (Thuc. iv. 101).

Sithonia (Σιθωνία), the central one of the three peninsulas running out from Chalcidice in Macedonia, between the Toronaic and Singitic gulfs. The Thracians originally extended over the greater part of Macedonia; and the ancients derived the name of Sithonia from a Thracian king Sithon. We also find mention of a Thracian people, Sithonii, on the shores of the Pontus Euxinus; and the poets frequently use Sithonis and Sithonius in the general sense of Thracian. (Hdt. vii. 123; Verg. Ecl. x. 66; Hor. Od. i. 18, 9.)

Sitifis (Σίτιφα: Setif), an inland city of Mauretania Caesariensis, on the borders of Numidia, stood upon a hill, in an extensive and beautiful plain. It first became an important place under the Romans, who made it a colony; and, upon the subdivision of M. Caesariensis into two provinces, it was made the capital of the eastern province, which was called after it Mauretania Sitifensis. (Ptol. iv. 2, 34; Amm. Marc. xxviii. 6.)

asserts to have been ruled by queens (Germ. 45).

Sittace, Sittacène. [SITACE.]

Sittius or Sitius, P., of Nuceria in Campania, was connected with Catiline, and went to Spain in B. C. 64, from which country he crossed over into Mauretania in the following year. It was said that P. Sulla had sent him into Spain to excite an insurrection against the Roman government; and Cicero, when he defended Sulla, in 62, was obliged to deny the truth of the charges that had been brought against Sittius (pro Sull. 20). Sittius did not return to Rome. His property in Italy was sold to pay his debts, and he continued in Africa, where he fought in the wars of the kings of the country. He joined Caesar when the latter came to Africa, in 46, to prosecute the war against the Pompeian party. He was of great service to Caesar in this war, and at its conclusion was rewarded by Caesar with the western part of Numidia, where he settled down, distributing the land among his soldiers. After the death of Caesar, Arabio, the son of Masinissa, returned to Africa, and killed Sittius by stratagem. (Sall. Cat. 21; Bell. Afr. 25, 93-96; App. B.C. iv. 54; Cic. ad Att. xv. 17.)

Siuph (Σιούφ), a city of Lower Egypt, in the Saitic nome, only mentioned by Herodotus (ii. 172).

Smaragdus Mons (Σμάραγδον ὄρος: Jebel Zaburah), a mountain of Upper Egypt, near the coast of the Red Sea, N. of Berenice. The extensive emerald mines from which it obtained its name were worked under the ancient kings of Egypt, under the Ptolemies, and under the Romans. (Strab. p. 815; Plin. xxxvii. 65.) They seem to have been exhausted, as few emeralds of any value are now found in the neighbourhood.

Smerdis (Σμέρδης), according to Herodotus, was the name of the son of Cyrus, and was murdered by order of his brother, Cambyzes. His true name was Bardēs, which appears in Aesch. Pers. 780 as Mardus, and in Just. i. 4 as Merdis. Ctesias calls him Tanyoxarces. The death of Smerdis was kept a profound secret; and accordingly, when the Persians became weary of the tyranny of Cambyzes, one of the Magians, whom Herodotus calls Patizithes, who had been left by Cambyzes in charge of his palace and treasures, availed himself of the likeness of his brother to the deceased Smerdis, to proclaim this brother as king, representing him as the younger son of Cyrus. Cambyzes heard of the revolt in Syria, but he died of an accidental wound in the thigh, as he was mounting his horse to march against the usurper. According to Herodotus this Magian usurper was also called Smerdis; but this is an error. His name appears on Persian inscriptions as Gomates or Gaumata. The name of Sphendates which Ctesias (Pers. 8-14) gives to him is really only a priestly title. The false Smerdis was acknowledged as king by the Persians, and reigned for seven months without opposition. The leading Persian nobles, however, were not quite free from suspicion; and this suspicion was increased by the king never inviting any of them to the palace, and never appearing in public. Among the nobles who entertained these suspicions was Otanes, whose daughter Phaedima had been one of the wives of Cambyzes, and had been transferred to his successor. The new king had some years before been deprived of his ears by Cyrus for some offence; and Otanes persuaded his daughter to ascertain whether her master had really lost his ears. Phaedima found out that such was the fact, and communicated the decisive information to her father. Otanes thereupon formed a conspiracy, and in conjunction with six other noble Persians, succeeded in forcing his way into the palace, where they slew the false Smerdis with his brother Patizithes in the eighth month of his reign, 521. (Hdt. iii. 30, 61-79.) The story of the usurpation of this Magian pretender and the combination of nobles which overthrew him is confirmed in its leading facts by the inscriptions. But the character of the struggle, which is represented as political and national between Medes and Persians, has sometimes been misunderstood. It is tolerably clear from the inscriptions that Gomates (the real name, as has been said, of the false Smerdis) was not a Mede. His attempt was a religious movement of the Magians to establish more firmly their religion and the power of the priestly caste, by placing one of their own order on the throne. This attempt was defeated by the nobles, who disliked the innovation of a priest-king. The Aryan religion was restored after the slaughter of Gomates and the leading Magi, and this slaughter was kept in memory, for the terror of the Magian priests, by an annual festival called Magophonia, during which no Magian was allowed to show himself in public.

Smilis (Σμίλις), son of Euclides, of Aegina, a sculptor of the legendary period, whose name appears to be derived from σμίλη, a knife for carving wood, and afterwards a sculptor's chisel. Smilis is the legendary head of the Aeginetan school of sculpture, just as Daedalus is the legendary head of the Attic and Cretan schools. He is said to have carved the ξόανον of Hera at Samos. (Paus. vii. 4, 4.)

flourishing cities of Asia Minor, and the only one of the great cities on its W. coast which has survived to this day, stood in a position alike remarkable for its beauty and for other natural advantages. Lying just about the centre of the W. coast of Asia Minor—on the banks of the little river Meles, at the bottom of a deep bay, the Sinus Hermaeus or Smyrnaeus (G. of Smyrna), which formed a safe and immense harbour for the largest ships up to the very walls of the city; at the foot of the rich slopes of Tmolus and at the entrance to the great and fertile valley of the Hermus, in which lay the great and wealthy city of Sardis—and in the midst of the Greek colonies on the E. shore of the Aegean; it was marked out by nature as one of the greatest emporiums for the trade between Europe and Asia, and has preserved that character to the present day. There are various accounts of its origin. The most probable is that which represents it as an Aeolian colony from Cyme. (Hdt. i. 150; Paus. vii. 5, 1.) At an early period it fell, by a stratagem, into the hands of the Ionians of Colophon, and remained an Ionian city from that time forth: this appears to have happened before Ol. 23 (B.C. 688). Smyrna from its position commanded the trade of the Hermus valley, and thus became a dangerous rival of the Lydian kings at Sardis. An attempt upon the city by Gyges was repulsed, but Smyrna was taken and destroyed by ALYATTES; its inhabitants were left dwelling in village communities (κωμηδόν, Strab. p. 646) for three centuries, but with something that could still be called a town, as is clear from the mention in Pindar (Fr. 155). At length, at the end of the fourth cent. B.C. Antigonos rebuilt the city on the SE. side of the bay on which the old city had stood. The new city was enlarged and beautified by Lysimachus, standing partly on the sea-shore and partly on a hill called Mastusia. It had a magnificent harbour, with such a depth of water that the largest ships could lie alongside the quays. The city soon became one of the greatest and most prosperous in the world. It was especially favoured by the Romans on account of the aid it rendered them in the Syrian and Mithridatic wars. It was the seat of a conventus iudicis. In the civil wars it was taken and partly destroyed by Dolabella, but it soon recovered. It occupies a distinguished place in the early history of Christianity, as one of the only two among the seven Churches of Asia which St. John addresses, in the Apocalypse, without any admixture of rebuke, and as the scene of the labours and martyrdom of Polycarp. In the years A.D. 178-180, a succession of earthquakes, to which the city has always been much exposed, reduced it almost to ruins; but it was restored by the emperor M. Aurelius (Dio Cass. lxxi. 32). In the successive wars under the Eastern empire it was frequently much injured, but always recovered; and, under the Turks, it has survived repeated attacks of earthquake, fire, and plague, and still remains the greatest commercial city of the Levant. In addition to all her other sources of renown Smyrna stood at the head of the cities which claimed the birth of Homer. The poet was worshipped as a hero in a magnificent building called the Homerœum (Ὁμήρειον). Near the sea-shore there stood a magnificent temple of Cybele, whose head appears on the coins of the city. Smyrna built a temple for the imperial worship, and was a place where the festivals of the province of Asia belonging to Κοινὸν Ἀσίας were celebrated. (Tac. Ann. iv. 56; cf. PERGAMUM; SARDES.)

Smyrna Trachēa. [EPHESUS.]

Smyrnaeus Sinus (Σμυρναίων κόλπος, Σμυρναϊκὸς κόλπος: G. of Smyrna), the great gulf on the W. coast of Asia Minor, at the bottom of which Smyrna stands. Its entrance lies between Pr. Melaena (C. Kara Burnu) on the W., and Phocaea (Fokia) on the E. Its depth was reckoned at 350 stadia. It received the river Hermus, whence it was called Hermēus Sinus (Ἑρμείος κόλπος). It is sometimes also called Μελήτου κόλπος, from the little river Meles, on which Old Smyrna stood. (Strab. p. 645; Met. i. 17.)

Sōcrātes (Σωκράτης). 1. The great Athenian philosopher, was born in the demus Alopecce, in the immediate neighbourhood of

Athens, B.C. 469. His father, Sophroniscus, was a sculptor, of whose proficiency nothing is known: his mother Phaenarete was a midwife. In his youth Socrates seems for a time to have followed the profession of his father. The group of clothed Graces which was preserved in the Acropolis was shown as his work down to the time of Pausanias (Paus. i. 22, 8, ix. 25, 2). But there is reason to believe that this is a confusion of names. Pliny (xxxvi. 32) clearly never entertained the idea that the author of that group was the great philosopher. He does not even allude to such a tradition, but says that some considered the sculptor to be the same as the painter Socrates. Socrates is not made in the dialogues to speak as if he had been himself an eminent sculptor. Some knowledge of the art is implied in Xen. Mem. iii. 10, but not more than a brief period of work with his father would secure. There would surely be more reference made to the fact if he had been eminent enough as a sculptor to be selected for an important public work. It has been suggested that the idea arose from coins of Athens with figures of the Graces, on some of which the magistrate's name is Socrates. But there is no improbability in this group being the work of a Socrates distinct from the philosopher. It is thought by some that the relief of those draped Graces in the Museo Chiaramonti represents the Athenian group. If so, it must have belonged to a more archaic period of art than the age of the philosopher Socrates. All that can be said is that Socrates probably worked, like his father, as a sculptor for a time, but certainly soon gave up that occupation for the work which has made him famous, and which he thought most beneficial to himself and his fellow-men. The personal qualities of Socrates were marked and striking. His physical constitution was healthy, robust, and enduring to an extraordinary degree. He was capable of bearing fatigue or hardship, and indifferent to heat or cold, in a measure which astonished all his companions. He went barefoot in all seasons of the year, even during the winter campaign at Potidaea, under the severe frosts of Thrace; and the same homely clothing sufficed for him in winter as well as in summer. In features he is represented as having been singularly, and even grotesquely, ugly—with a flat nose, thick lips, and prominent eyes, like a Satyr or Silenus (Plat. Symp. p. 215, A, Theaet. p. 143, E; Xen. Symp. 5). Of the circumstances of his life we are almost wholly ignorant; he served as a hoplite at Potidaea, Delium, and Amphipolis with great credit to himself. He seems never to have filled any political office until 406, in which year he was a member of the senate of Five Hundred, and one of the Prytanes, when he refused, on the occasion of the trial of the six generals, to put an unconstitutional question to the vote, in spite of all personal hazard. He displayed the same moral courage in refusing to obey the order of the Thirty for the apprehension of Leon the Salaminian. (Plat. Symp. p. 219, A, Alc. p. 194, Charm. p. 153, Lach. p. 181, Apol. p. 32; Xen. Mem. i. 1, 18, iv. 4, 2; Diog. Laërt. ii. 22-24.) All the middle and later part of his life at least was devoted exclusively to the self-imposed task of teaching; excluding all other business, public or private, and to the neglect of all means of fortune. His wife, Xanthippe, is represented as a woman of a peevish and quarrelsome disposition. He never opened a school, nor did he, like the sophists of his time, deliver public lectures. Everywhere, in the market-place, in the gymnasia, and in the workshops, he sought and found opportunities for awakening and guiding, in boys, youth, and men, moral consciousness and the impulse after self-knowledge respecting the end and value of our actions. His object, however, was only to aid them in developing the germs of knowledge which were already present in them, not to communicate to them ready-made knowledge; and he therefore professed to practise a kind of mental midwifery, just as his mother, Phaenarete, exercised the corresponding corporeal art. (Plat. Theaet. p. 149.) Unweariedly and inexorably did he fight against all false appearance and conceit of knowledge, in order to pave the way for correct knowledge. Consequently to the mentally proud and the mentally idle he appeared an intolerable bore, and often experienced their bitter hatred and calumny. This was probably the reason why he was selected by Aristophanes and the other comic writers to be attacked as a general representative of philosophical and rhetorical teaching; the more so as his grotesque physiognomy admitted so well of being imitated in the mask which the actor wore. (See Aristoph. Nubes, and cf. Av. 1282; Eupolis, Fr. 9, 10, 11; Diog. Laërt. ii. 28.) The audience at the theatre would more readily recognise the peculiar figure which they were accustomed to see every day in the market-place than if Prodicus or Protagoras, whom most of them did not know by sight, had been brought on the stage; nor was it of much importance either to them or to Aristophanes whether Socrates was represented as teaching what he did really teach, or something utterly different. Attached to none of the prevailing parties, Socrates found in each of them his friends and his enemies. Hated and persecuted by Critias, Charicles, and others among the Thirty Tyrants, who specially referred to him in the decree which they issued forbidding the teaching of the art of oratory, he was impeached after their banishment and by their opponents. An orator named Lycon, and a poet (a friend of Thrasybulus) named Meletus, had united in the impeachment with the powerful demagogue Anytus, an embittered antagonist of the sophists and their system, and one of the leaders of the band which, setting out from Phyle, forced their way into the Piræus, and drove out the Thirty Tyrants. The judges also are described as persons who had been banished, and who had returned with Thrasybulus. The chief articles of impeachment were, that Socrates was guilty of corrupting the youth, and of despising the tutelary deities of the state, putting in their place other new divinities. At the same time it had been made a matter of accusation against him that Critias, the most ruthless of the Tyrants, had come forth from his school. Some expressions of his, in which he had found fault with the democratic mode of electing by lot, had also been brought up against him; and there can be little doubt that use was made of his friendly relations with Theramenes, one of the most influential of the Thirty, with Plato's uncle, Charmides, who fell by the side of Critias in the struggle with the popular party, and with other aristocrats, in order to irritate against him the party which at that time was dominant. The substance of the speech which Socrates delivered in his defence is probably preserved by Plato in the piece which goes under the name of the 'Apology of Socrates.' Being condemned by a majority of only six votes, he expresses the conviction that he deserved to be maintained at the public cost in the Prytaneum, and refuses to acquiesce in the adjudication of imprisonment, or a large fine, or banishment. He will assent to nothing more than a fine of sixty minae, on the security of Plato, Crito, and other friends. Condemned to death by the judges, who were incensed by this speech, by a majority of eighty votes, he departs from them with the protestation that he would rather die after such a defence than live after one in which he should have endeavoured to excite their pity. The sentence of death could not be carried into execution until after the return of the vessel which had been sent to Delos on the periodical Theoric mission. The thirty days which intervened between the condemnation of Socrates and its return were devoted by him to poetic attempts (the first he had made in his life), and to his usual conversation with his friends. One of these conversations, on the duty of obedience to the laws, Plato has reported in the Crito, so called after the faithful follower of Socrates, who had endeavoured without success to persuade him to make his escape. In another, imitated or worked up by Plato in the Phaedo, Socrates immediately before he drank the cup of hemlock developed the grounds of his immovable conviction of the immortality of the soul. He died with composure and cheerfulness in his seventieth year, B.C. 399. Mr. Grote, whose account of Socrates is here followed in many particulars, has well described Socrates as distinguished by three peculiarities:—(1) His long life passed in contented poverty and in public dialectics, of which we have already spoken. (2) His persuasion of a special religious mission. He had been accustomed constantly to hear, even from his childhood, what he spoke of as a divine voice—interfering, at moments when he was about to act, in the way of restraint, but never in the way of instigation. Such prohibitory warning was wont to come upon him very frequently, not merely on great, but even on small occasions, intercepting what he was about to do or to say. Though later writers speak of this as the Daemon or Genius of Socrates, he himself does not personify it, but treats it merely as a 'divine sign, a prophetic or supernatural voice.' It may be interpreted as being a prompting of conscience or of quick and intuitive judgment. He was accustomed not only to obey it implicitly, but to speak of it publicly and familiarly to others, so that the fact was well known both to his friends and to his enemies. (Plat. Apol. pp. 31, 40, Phaedr. p. 242, Theaet. p. 151, Rep. p. 496; Xen. Mem. i. 1, 4, iv. 8, 1–5.) (3) His great intellectual originality, both of subject and of method, and his power of stirring and forcing the germ of inquiry and ratiocination in others. He was the first who turned his thoughts and discussions distinctly to the subject of ethics, and was the first to proclaim that 'the proper study of mankind is man.' With the philosophers who preceded him the subject of examination had been Nature, or the Kosmos as one undistinguishable whole, blending together cosmogony, astronomy, geometry, physics, metaphysics, &c. In discussing ethical subjects Socrates employed the dialectic method, and thus laid the foundation of formal logic, which was afterwards explained by Plato, and systematised by Aristotle. The originality of Socrates is shown by the results he achieved. Out of his intellectual school sprang, not merely Plato, himself a host, but all the other leaders of Grecian speculation for the next half century, and all those who continued the great line of speculative philosophy down to later times. Euclid and the Megaric school of philosophers—Aristippus and the Cyrenaic Antisthenes and Diogenes, the first of those called the Cynics—all emanated more or less directly from the stimulus imparted by Socrates, though each followed a different vein of thought. Ethics continued to be what Socrates had first made them, a distinct branch of philosophy, alongside of which politics, rhetoric, logic, and other speculations relating to man and society, gradually arranged themselves; all of them more popular as well as more keenly controverted than physics, which at that time presented comparatively little charm, and still less of attainable certainty. There can be no doubt that the individual influence of Socrates permanently enlarged the horizon, improved the method, and multiplied the ascendant minds, of the Grecian speculative world in a manner never since paralleled. Subsequent philosophers may have had a more elaborate doctrine, and a larger number of disciples who imbibed their ideas; but none of them applied the same stimulating method with the same efficacy, and none of them in an equal degree struck out of other minds that fire which sets light to original thought.—2. The ecclesiastical historian, was born at Constantinople about A.D. 379. He was a pupil of Ammonius and Helladius, and followed the profession of an advocate in his native city, whence he is surnamed Scholasticus. The Ecclesiastical History of Socrates extends from the reign of Constantine the Great, 306, to that of the younger Theodosius, 439. He appears to have been a man of less bigotry than most of his contemporaries, and the very difficulty of determining from internal evidence some points of his religious belief may be considered as arguing his comparative liberality. His History is divided into seven books.—His work is included in the editions of the ancient Greek ecclesiastical historians by Valesius, Paris, 1668, reprinted at Mentz, 1677; by Reading, Camb. 1720.

Sōdōma, gen. -orum and -ae, also -um, gen. -i, and -i, gen. -ōrum (τά Σόδομα: Σοδομίτης, Sodomita), an ancient city of Canaan. [See Dict. of the Bible.]

Soemis or Soaemias, Jūlia, daughter of Julia Maesa, and mother of Elagabalus, either by her husband, Sextus Varius Marcellus, or, according to the report industriously circulated with her own consent, by Caracalla. After the accession of her son, she became his chosen counsellor, and seems to have encouraged and shared his follies and enormities. She took a place in the senate, which then for the first time witnessed the intrusion of a woman, and was herself the president of a sort of female parliament, which held its sittings in the Quirinal, and published edicts for the regulation of all matters connected with the morals, dress, etiquette, and equipage of the matrons. She was slain by the praetorians, in the arms of her son, on the 11th of March, A.D. 222. (Lamprid. Elagab. 2; Dio Cass. lxxviii. 30, 38; Herodian, v. 5.)

Sogdiāna (ή Σογδιανή: Σόγδιοι, Σογδιανόι: parts of Turkestan and Bokhara, including the district still called Sogd), the NE. province of the ancient Persian empire, separated on the

S. from Bactriana and Margiana by the upper course of the Oxus (Jihoun); on the E. and N. from Scythia by the Sogdii Comedarum and Oscii M. (Kara-Dagh, Alatan and Ak Tagh) and by the upper course of the Jaxartes (Sihoun); and bounded on the NW. by the great deserts E. of the Sea of Aral. The S. part of the country was fertile and populous. It was conquered by Cyrus, and afterwards by Alexander, both of whom marked the extreme limits of their advance by cities on the Jaxartes, Cyreschata and Alexandreschata. After the Macedonian conquest, it was subject to the kings, first of Syria, and then of Bactria, till it was overrun by the barbarians. The natives of the country were a wild warlike people of the great Aryan race, resembling the Bactrians in their character and customs. (Arrian, An. iii. 30, iv. 16, 18; Curt. iii. 2, 9; Strab. pp. 516, 517.)

Sogdianus (Σογδιανός), was one of the illegitimate sons of Artaxerxes I. Longimanus. The latter, on his death in B.C. 425, was succeeded by his legitimate son, Xerxes II., but this monarch, after a reign of only two months, was murdered by Sogdianus, who now became king. Sogdianus, however, was murdered in his turn, after a reign of seven months, by his brother, Ochus. Ochus reigned under the name of Darius II. (Diod. xii. 71.)

Sogdii Montes. [SOGDIANA.]

Sol. [HELIOS.]

Soletum (Soletto), a town of Calabria, twelve miles S. of Lupiae (Leccce). It was ruined before the time of Pliny, but the survival of its name shows that it must have been occupied again (Plin. iii. 101).

Sōli or Soloe (Σόλοι). 1. (Ethnic, Σολεύς, Solensis: Mezetlu, Ru.), a city on the coast of Cilicia, SW. of Tarsus, between the rivers Lamus and Cydnus, said to have been colonised by Argives and Lydians from Rhodes (Strab. pp. 671, 675; Xen. An. i. 2, 24; Mel. i. 13; Liv. xxxvii. 56). It was a flourishing city in the time of Alexander, who fined its people 200 talents for their adhesion to the Persians (Arrian, An. ii. 5, 5). The city was destroyed by Tigranes, who probably transplanted the inhabitants to Tigranocerta (Dio Cass. xxxvi. 20; Plut. Pomp. 28). Pompey restored the city after his war with the pirates, and peopled it with the survivors of the defeated bands; and from this time forth it was called Pompeiopolis (Πομπηιοῦπολις). It was celebrated in literary history as the birthplace of the Stoic philosopher Chrysippus, of the comic poet Aratus. Its name has been curiously perpetuated in the grammatical word solecism (solecismus), which is said to have been first applied to the corrupt dialect of Greek spoken by the inhabitants of this city—or, as some say, of Soli in Cyprus. (Diog. Laërt. i. 2, 4; Strab. p. 683; Suid. s. v. Σόλοι).—2. (Ethnic, Σόλιος: Paleokhora, in the valley of Solea, Ru.), a considerable seaport town in the W. part of the N. coast of Cyprus, on a little river (Strab. p. 683). According to some, it was a colony of the Athenians; while others ascribed its erection to a native prince acting under the advice of Solon (Plut. Sol. 26). The visit of Solon to Cyprus is mentioned by Herodotus (v. 113). It had temples of Isis and Aphrodite, and there were mines in its vicinity.

Solicinium, a town in Roman Germany (the Agri Decumates), on the mountain Pirus, where Valentinian gained a victory over the Alemanni in A.D. 869, perhaps in the neighbourhood of the modern Heidelberg, but the position is uncertain (Amm. Marc. xxvii. 10, xxviii. 2, xxx. 7).

Solinus, C. Jūlius, the author of a geographical compendium, divided into fifty-seven chapters, containing a brief sketch of the world as known to the ancients, diversified by historical notices, remarks on the origin, habits, religious rites and social condition of various nations enumerated. The arrangement, and frequently the very words, are derived from the Natural History of Pliny, but little knowledge, care or judgment is displayed in the selection. We know nothing of Solinus himself, but he must have lived after the reign of Alexander Severus, and before that of Constantine. He may perhaps be placed in the reigns of Valerian and Gallienus. It was called Collectanea Rerum Memorabilium; but it was revised in the sixth century with the title of Polyhistor.—The most notable edition is that of Salmasius, published at Utrecht in 1689, prefixed to his Plinianae Exercitationes; critical edition by Th. Mommsen, Berl. 1864.

Sōlis Fons. [OASIS, No. 3.]

Sōlis Mons. [SOLOIS.]

Sōlis Promontorium (ἄκρα Ἡλίου ἱερὰ: Ras Anfir), a promontory of Arabia Felix, near the middle of the Persian Gulf (Ptol. vi. 7, 14).

Soloe. [SOL.]

Sollium (Σόλλιον), a town on the coast of Acarnania, S. of Palaerus and opposite the island of Leucas (Thuc. ii. 30, iii. 95).

Sōlōis (Σολόεις: C. Cantin, Arab. Ras el Houdik), a promontory running far out into the sea, in the S. part of the W. coast of Mauretania. Herodotus believed it to be the westernmost headland of all Libya. Upon it was a Phoenician temple of Poseidon.

Sōlōn (Σόλων), the great Athenian legislator, was born about B.C. 638. By birth he was a Eupatrid. His father, Execestides, was a descendant of Codrus, and his mother was a cousin of the mother of Pisistratus. Execestides had seriously crippled his resources by a too prodigal expenditure; and Solon found it either necessary or convenient in his youth to betake himself to the life of a foreign trader. It is likely enough that while necessity compelled him to seek a livelihood in some mode or other, his active and inquiring spirit led him to select that pursuit which would furnish the amplest means for its gratification. Solon early distinguished himself as a poet. His first poems were in a light and amatory strain, which afterwards gave way to the more dignified and earnest purpose of inculcating profound reflections and sage advice, or inciting his countrymen to deeds of patriotism as Tyrtaeus had done by his warlike songs. So widely, indeed, did his reputation spread that his name appears in all the lists of the Wise Men. The occasion which first brought Solon prominently forward as an actor on the political stage was the contest between Athens and Megara respecting the possession of Salamis. The ill success of the attempts of the Athenians to make themselves masters of the island had led to the enactment of a law forbidding the writing or saying anything to urge the Athenians to renew the contest. Solon, indignant at this dishonourable renunciation of their claims, hit upon the device of feigning to be mad: and causing a report of his condition to be spread over the city, he rushed into the agora, and there recited a short elegiac poem of 100 lines, in which he called upon the Athenians to retrieve their disgrace and reconquer the lovely island. Pisistratus (who, however, must have been extremely young at the time) came to the support of his kinsman; the pusillanimous law was rescinded; war was declared, and Solon himself appointed to conduct it. The Megarians were driven out of the island, but a tedious war ensued, which was finally settled by the arbitration of Sparta. Both parties appealed, in support of their claim, to the authority of Homer (Arist. Rhet. i. 16), and there is an improbable story, which was currently believed in antiquity, that Solon had surreptitiously inserted the line (Il. ii. 558) which speaks of Ajax as ranging his ships with the Athenians. Solon's character was not that of a literary forger, nor would the argument have helped his cause. The Spartans decided in favour of the Athenians, about B.C. 596. Solon himself, probably, was one of those who received grants of land in Salamis, and this may account for his being termed a Salaminian. Soon after these events (about 595) Solon took a leading part in promoting hostilities on behalf of Delphi against Cirrha, and was the mover of the decree of the Amphictyons by which war was declared. According to a common story, which, however, rests only on the authority of a late writer, Solon hastened the surrender of the town by causing the waters of the Plistus to be poisoned. (Paus. x. 37, 7; Polyaen. Strat. vi. 13.) It was about the time of the outbreak of this war that, in consequence of the distracted state of Attica, which was rent by civil commotions, Solon was called upon by all parties to mediate between them, and alleviate the miseries that prevailed (Plut. Sol. 12; 'Aθ. Πολ. 5). He was chosen archon 594, and under that legal title was invested with unlimited power for adopting such measures as the exigencies of the state demanded. In fulfilment of the task entrusted to him, Solon addressed himself to the relief of the existing distress. This he effected with the greatest discretion and success by his celebrated disburdening ordinance (σεισάχθεια), a measure consisting of various distinct provisions calculated to relieve the debtors with as little infringement as possible on the claims of the wealthy creditors. He showed his sense of the emergency by the extreme step of cancelling outstanding debts: for the future he made it illegal to lend money on the security of the borrower's person, so that the selling into slavery for debt became impossible; a limit was placed to the rate of interest, and also to the accumulation of land. (Arist. 'Aθ. Πολ. 6; Plut. Sol. 15–23.) With a view to facilitate and increase trade and commerce, he altered the standard of coinage from the Phidonian, which circulated in the Peloponnesus and Boeotia, to the Euboic, which was used in Chalcis and Eretria, then great channels of commerce, so that the Attic currency was adapted to that of the chief Ionian trading centres (Arist. 'Aθ. Πολ. 10). [For these standards see Dict. of Ant. art. Pondera.] It is a mistake to connect his monetary changes with the reliefs for debtors, and to suppose that he was *debas*ing the coinage. The success of the Seisachtheia and his improvements of commerce procured for Solon such confidence and popularity that he was further charged with the task of entirely remodelling the constitution. As a preliminary step, he repealed all the laws of Draco except those relating to bloodshed. Our limits only allow us to glance at the principal features of the constitution established by Solon. It must be premised that, Solon's laws being the origin of political liberty at Athens, it became customary to ascribe to him all old constitutional measures of which the authors were unknown. His constitution was based upon the timocratic principle—that is, the title of citizens to the honours and offices of the state was regulated by their wealth. All the citizens were distributed into four classes. The first class consisted of those who had an annual income of at least 500 medimni of dry or liquid produce (equivalent to 500 drachmae, a medimnus being reckoned at a drachma), and were called Pentacosiomedimni. The second class consisted of those whose incomes ranged between 300 and 500 medimni or drachmae, and were called Hippeis (ἵππεις, ἵππῆς), from their being able to keep a horse, and being bound to perform military service as cavalry. The third class consisted of those whose incomes varied between 200 and 300 medimni or drachmae, and were termed Zeugitae (Ζευγῖται). The fourth class included all whose property fell short of 200 medimni or drachmae, and bore the name of Thetes. The first three classes were liable to direct taxation, in the form of a graduated income tax. A direct tax, however, was an extraordinary, and not an annual, payment. The fourth class were exempt from direct taxes, but of course they, as well as the rest, were liable to indirect taxes. In this arrangement the archonship was restricted to the first class (i.e. practically to Eupatrids), the second and third classes were admitted to other offices, but the Thetes to none. He thus limited the democracy. To Solon has been ascribed the institution of the Boule (βουλή), or deliberative assembly of Four Hundred; but it appears from Aristotle's Aθ. Πολ. that this council existed before [see under DRACO]. Solon, however, transferred to it some of the functions of the Areopagus—the initiation of proposals for the Ecclesia, and the dealings with foreign ambassadors, and he made its number 400 (100 from each tribe) instead of 401, as Draco had constituted it. (Arist. Aθ. Πολ. 8.) He greatly enlarged the functions of the Ecclesia (ἐκκλησία), which no doubt existed before his time, though it probably possessed scarcely more power than the assemblies which we find described in the Homeric poems. He gave it the right of electing the archons and other magistrates, and what was even more important, made the archons and magistrates accountable directly to it when their year of office was expired. He also gave it what was equivalent to a veto upon any proposed measure of the Boule, though it could not itself originate any measure. Besides the arrangement of the general political relations of the people, Solon was the author of a great variety of special laws, which do not seem to have been arranged in any systematic manner. Those relating to debtors and creditors have been already referred to. Several had for their object the encouragement of trade and manufactures. Foreign settlers were not to be naturalised as citizens unless they carried on some industrious pursuit. If a father did not teach his son some trade or profession, the son was not liable to maintain his father in his old age. The council of Areopagus had a general power to punish idleness. Solon forbade the exportation of all produce of the Attic soil except olive oil. He was the first who gave to those who died childless the power of disposing of their property by will. He enacted several laws relating to marriage, especially with regard to heiresses. The rewards which he appointed to be given to victors at the Olympic and Isthmian games are for that age unusually large (500 drachmae to the former and 100 to the latter). One of the most curious of his regulations was that which denounced atimia against any citizen who on the outbreak of a sedition remained neutral. (Arist. Aθ. Πολ. 8; Gell. ii. 12.) The laws of Solon were inscribed on wooden rollers (ἄξονες) and triangular tablets (κύρβεις), and were set up at first in the Acropolis, afterwards in the Prytaneum. The Athenians were also indebted to Solon for some rectification of the calendar. It is said that Solon exacted from the people a solemn oath, that they would observe his laws without alteration for a certain space—10 years according to Herodotus—100 years according to other accounts. It is related that he was himself aware that he had been compelled to leave many imperfections in his system and code. He is said to have spoken of his laws as being, not the best, but the best which the Athenians would have received. After he had completed his task—being, we are told, greatly annoyed and troubled by those who came to him with all kinds of complaints, suggestions or criticisms about his laws—in order that he might not himself have to propose any change, he absented himself from Athens for ten years, after he had obtained the oath referred to. (Arist. Aθ. Πολ. 11; Plut. Sol. 25; Hdt. i. 29.) He first visited Egypt; and from thence proceeded to Cyprus, where he was received with great distinction by Philocyprus, king of the little town of Aepea. Solon persuaded the king to remove from the old site, and build a new town on the plain. The new settlement was called Soli, in honour of the illustrious visitor. (Hdt. v. 113.) He is further said to have visited Lydia, and his interview with Croesus was one of the most celebrated stories in antiquity. [CROESUS.] During the absence of Solon the old dissensions were renewed, and shortly after his arrival at Athens the supreme power was seized by Pisistratus, who, after his usurpation, is said to have paid considerable court to Solon, and on various occasions to have solicited his advice. [PISISTRATUS.] Solon probably died about 558, two years after the overthrow of the constitution, at the age of eighty. There was a story current in antiquity that, by his own directions, his ashes were collected and scattered round the island of Salamis. (Diog. Laërt. i. 62; cf. Plut. Sol. 32, where doubt is expressed.) Of the poems of Solon several fragments remain. They do not indicate any great degree of imaginative power, but their style is vigorous and simple. Those that were called forth by special emergencies appear to have been marked by no small degree of energy. The fragments of these poems are incorporated in the collections of the Greek gnomie poets and in Bergk, Poët. Lyr. Graec. 1866; and there is also a separate edition of them by Bach, Lugd. Bat. 1825.

Sōlūs (Σολοῦς, -οὔντος, contr. of Σολοῦεις: Σολευντίνος), called Soluntum (Solentinus) by the Romans, an ancient town on the N. coast of Sicily, between Panormus and Thermae, a colony of the Phoenicians (Thuc. vi. 2). It fell into the hands of Dionysius in 396 (Diod. xiv. 78), but was recovered by the Carthaginians some time afterwards. Under the Romans it was a municipal town (Cic. Verr. ii. 42; cf. Ptol. iii. 4, 8).

Sölýma (τὰ Σόλυμα). 1. (Taktalu-Dagh), the mountain range which runs parallel to the E. coast of Lycia, and is a southern continuation of M. Climax. Sometimes the whole range is called Climax, and the name of Solyima is given to its highest peak.—2. Another name of JERUSALEM (Strab. p. 666).

Sölými. [LYCIA.]

Somnus (Ὕπνος), the personification and god of sleep, is described as a brother of Death (Θάνατος, Mors), and as a son of Night. In works of art Sleep and Death are represented alike as two youths, sleeping or holding inverted torches in their hands. [MORS.]

Sontius (Isonzo), a river in Venetia in the N. of Italy, rising in the Carnic Alps and falling into the Sinus Tergestinus E. of Aquileia.

Sōpāter (Σάπατρος). 1. Of Paphōs, a writer of parody and burlesque (φλυαρογράφος), between B.C. 323 and 283 (Athen. p. 71).—2. Of Apamea, and the head for some time of the school of Plotinus, was a disciple of Iamblichus, after whose death (before A.D. 330) he went to Constantinople. Here he enjoyed the favour and personal friendship of Constantine, who afterwards, however, put him to death (between A.D. 330 and 337), wishing, as was alleged, to give a proof of the sincerity of his own conversion to Christianity. (Sozom. H. E. i. 5; Suid. s.v.)—3. The younger sophist, of Apamea, or of Alexandria, is supposed to have lived about 200 years later than the former. Besides his extant works (sometimes wrongly ascribed to No. 2), Photius has preserved an extract of a work, entitled the Historical Extracts (ἐκλογή), which contained a vast variety of facts and figments, collected from a great number of authors. The remains of his rhetorical works are contained in Walz's Rhetores Graeci.

Sōphēnē (Σωφηνή, later Σωφανηνή), a district of Armenia Major, lying between the ranges of Antitaurus and Masius; separated from Melitene in Armenia Minor by the Euphrates, from Mesopotamia by the Antitaurus, and from the E. part of Armenia Major by the river Nymphius (Strab. pp. 521, 532). In the time of the Greek kings of Syria, it formed, together with the adjacent district of Acilisene, an independent W. Armenian kingdom, which was subdued and united to the rest of Armenia by Tigranes. It was taken from Tigranes by Pompey and given by Nero to Sohaemus (Tac. Ann. xiii. 7).

Sōphīlus (Σώφιλος), a comic poet of the Middle Comedy, was a native of Sicyon or of Thebes, and lived about B.C. 348 (Suid. s.v.).—Fragments in Meineke, Fr. Com. Graec.

Sōphōcles (Σοφοκλῆς). 1. The great tragic poet, was born at Colonus, a village little more than a mile to the NW. of Athens, B.C. 495. He was thirty years younger than Aeschylus, and fifteen years older than Euripides. His father's name was Sophilus, or Sophillus, who traded as an iron-worker, i.e. he employed slaves as smiths. Sophocles received an education not inferior to that of the sons of the most distinguished citizens of Athens. In both of the two leading branches of Greek education, music and gymnastics, he was carefully trained, and in both he gained the prize of a garland. Of the skill which he had attained in music and dancing in his sixteenth year, and of the perfection of his bodily form, we have conclusive evidence in the fact that, when the Athenians were assembled in solemn festival around the trophy which they had set up in Salamis to celebrate their victory over the fleet of Xerxes,

Sophocles was chosen to lead, naked and with lyre in hand, the chorus which sang the songs of triumph (480). (Athen. p. 20.) His first appearance as a dramatist took place in 468, under peculiarly interesting circumstances—not only from the fact that Sophocles, at the age of twenty-seven, came forward as the rival of the veteran Aeschylus, whose supremacy had been maintained during an entire generation, but also from the character of the judges. The solemnities of the Great Dionysia were rendered more imposing by the occasion of the return of Cimon from his expedition to Scyros, bringing with him the bones of Theseus. Public expectation was so excited respecting the approaching dramatic contest, and party feeling ran so high, that Apsephion, the Archon Eponymus, whose duty it was to appoint the judges, had not yet ventured to proceed to the final act of drawing the lots for their election, when Cimon, with his nine colleagues in the command, having entered the theatre, the Archon detained them at the altar, and administered to them the oath appointed for the judges in the dramatic contests. Their decision was in favour of Sophocles, who received the first prize, the second only being awarded to Aeschylus, who was so mortified at his defeat that he left Athens and retired to Sicily. (Plut. Cim. 8; C. I. G. 2374; Aeschylus.) From this epoch Sophocles held the supremacy of the Athenian stage, not without rivals by whom he was sometimes defeated—even the Oedipus Tyrannus only obtained the second prize—but even against so formidable a rival as Euripides (whose first victory was in 441) he maintained his place till his death as the favourite poet of the Athenians. In 442 he was on the board of the Hellenotamiae, or treasurers of the tribute paid by allies (C. I. A. i. 237). The year 440 is a most important era in the poet's life. In the spring of that year he brought out the earliest of his extant dramas, the Antigone, and in the same year, but probably for reasons apart from poetical merit, he was appointed one of the ten strategi, of whom Pericles was the chief, in the war against Samos. It would seem that in this war Sophocles neither obtained nor sought for any military reputation: he is represented as good-humouredly repeating the judgment of Pericles concerning him, that he understood the making of poetry, but not the commanding of an army. It was probably for this reason that Pericles sent him to look after supplies at Lesbos, where Ion records a meeting with him (Athen. p. 604). The family dissensions which troubled his last years are connected with a well-known and beautiful story, concerning the exactness of which, however, there is some doubt. His family consisted of two sons, Iophon, the offspring of Nicostrate, who was a free Athenian woman, and Ariston, his son by Theoris of Sicyon; and Ariston had a son named Sophocles, for whom his grandfather showed the greatest affection. Iophon, who was by the laws of Athens his father's rightful heir, jealous of his love for the young Sophocles, and apprehending that Sophocles purposed to bestow upon his grandson a large proportion of his property, is said to have summoned his father, as being mentally incompetent, before the Phratores [the jurisdiction in such matters would belong to the Archon]. As his only reply, Sophocles exclaimed, 'If I am Sophocles, I am not beside myself; and if I am beside myself, I am not Sophocles;' and then he read from his Oedipus at Colonus, which was lately written, but not yet brought out, the magnificent chorus, beginning—

whereupon the judges at once dismissed the case, and rebuked Iophon for his undutiful conduct. (Plut. An Seni sit gerend. Respubl. 3, p. 775.) Sophocles died soon afterwards, in 406, in his ninetieth year. All the various accounts of his death and funeral are of a fictitious and legendary character. According to a foolish story he was choked by a grape, which is probably a too literal interpretation of the epigram by Simonides saying that Socrates died 'Ὀλῳπὸν Βάκχου βότρυον ἐρεπτόμενος,' a paraphrase for 'working at a tragedy' (Anth. Pal. vii. 20). Another writer related that in a public recitation of the Antigone he sustained his voice so long without a pause that, through the weakness of extreme age, he lost his breath and his life together; while others ascribed his death to excessive joy at obtaining a victory.—In considering the development of the Greek drama it is important to notice that Sophocles first increased the number of actors from two to three: and this he must have done early in his career, since the change was adopted by Aeschylus in his Oresteia in B.C. 460. Sophocles also raised the number of the chorus from twelve to fifteen. Of the three additional members one was intended to act as coryphaeus of the whole, the other two to lead the sections in a divided chorus. [See Dict. of Ant. art. Tragoedia.] His chorus takes a less leading part than the chorus of Aeschylus: it is entirely subordinate to the actors and does not develop the action of the play. The subjects and style of Sophocles are human, while those of Aeschylus are essentially heroic. The latter excite terror, pity, and admiration, as we view them at a distance; the former bring those same feelings home to the heart, with the addition of sympathy and self-application. No individual human being can imagine himself in the position of Prometheus, or derive a personal warning from the crimes and fate of Clytemnestra; but everyone can, in feeling, share the self-devotion of Antigone in giving up her life at the call of fraternal piety, and the calmness which comes over the spirit of Oedipus when he is reconciled to the gods. In Aeschylus, the sufferers are the victims of an inexorable destiny; but Sophocles brings more prominently into view those faults of their own which form one element of the destiny of which they are the victims, and is more intent upon inculcating, as the lesson taught by their woes, that wise calmness and moderation, in desires and actions, in prosperity and adversity, which the Greek poets and philosophers celebrate under the name of σωφροσύνη. On the other hand, he does not, in the same manner as Euripides, bring tragedy to the level of everyday life, nor does he in a like degree use a miserable condition of life as a means of exciting pity [see p. 334, b]. A characteristic difference between the two poets is illustrated by the saying of Sophocles that 'he himself represented men as they ought to be, but Euripides exhibited them as they are' (Aristot. Poët. 25). A great modern critic has well said: 'There is no other Greek poet whose genius belongs so peculiarly to the best Greek time. Aeschylus has an element of Hebrew grandeur: Euripides has strong elements of modern pathos and romance; these things come easily home to us. But in order fully to appreciate Sophocles we must place ourselves in sympathy with the Greek mind in its most characteristic modes of thought, and with the Greek sense of beauty in its highest purity.'—The number of plays ascribed to Sophocles was 130. He contended not only with Aeschylus and Euripides, but also with Choerilus, Aristias, Agathon, and other poets, among whom was his own son Iophon; and he carried off the first prize twenty or twenty-four times, frequently the second, and never the third. It is remarkable, as proving his growing activity and success, that, of his 130 dramas, eighty-one were brought out after his fifty-fourth year, and also that all his extant dramas, which of course in the judgment of the grammarians were his best, belong to this latter period of his life. The seven extant tragedies were probably brought out in the following chronological order:—Antigone, Electra, Trachiniae, Oedipus Tyrannus, Ajax, Philoctetes, Oedipus at Colonus: the last of these was brought out, after the death of the poet, by his grandson.—Of the numerous editions of Sophocles, the best is that of Professor Jebb, now nearly complete.—2. Son of Ariston, and grandson of the elder Sophocles, was also an Athenian tragic poet. The love of his grandfather towards him has been already mentioned. In 401 he brought out the Oedipus at Colonus of his grandfather; but he did not begin to exhibit his own dramas till 396.—3. Son of Sostratides, was an Athenian commander in the Peloponnesian war, sent to reinforce the fleet in Sicily and to aid the popular party at Corcyra; was banished because he assented to the peace in Sicily in B.C. 424 (Thuc. iii. 115, iv. 2, 46, 65).

Sophonisba, daughter of the Carthaginian general, Hasdrubal, the son of Gisco. She had been betrothed by her father, at a very early age, to the Numidian prince Masinissa, but at a subsequent period Hasdrubal, being desirous to gain over Syphax, the rival monarch of Numidia, to the Carthaginian alliance, offered him the hand of his daughter in marriage. The beauty and accomplishments of Sophonisba prevailed over the influence of Scipio: Syphax married her, and from that time became, under her influence, the zealous supporter and ally of Carthage. After the defeat of Syphax, and the capture of his capital city of Cirta by Masinissa, Sophonisba fell into the hands of the conqueror, upon whom her beauty exercised so powerful an influence, that he determined to marry her himself. Their nuptials were accordingly celebrated without delay, but Scipio (who was apprehensive lest she should exercise the same influence over Masinissa which she had previously done over Syphax) refused to ratify this arrangement and, upbraiding Masinissa with his weakness, insisted on the immediate surrender of the princess. Unable to resist this command, the Numidian king spared her the humiliation of captivity, by sending her a bowl of poison, which she drank without hesitation, and thus put an end to her own life. (Liv. xxix. 23, xxx. 3–15; Pol. xiv. 1, 7; App. Pun. 10, 27, 28; Zonar. ix. 11–13.)

Sōphrōn (Σώφρων), of Syracuse, was the principal writer of that species of composition called the Mime (μῖμος), which was one of the numerous varieties of the Dorian Comedy. He lived about B.C. 460–420. When Sophron is called the inventor of mimes, the meaning is, that he reduced to the form of a literary composition a species of amusement which the Greeks of Sicily, who were pre-eminent for broad humour and merriment, had practised from time immemorial at their public festivals, and probably also in private society. They consisted in a delineation of ordinary character brought out in a dramatic dialogue representing some scene of social life. The second Idyll of Theocritus is borrowed from the Ἀκροαταί of Sophron, and the fifteenth (Adoniazusae) from Sophron's Ἰσθμιαῖοι. There is, however, some difficulty in determining whether Sophron's were in mere prose, or in mingled poetry and prose, or in prose with a peculiar rhythmical movement but no metrical arrangement. Plato was a great admirer of Sophron, and is said to have been the first who made the Mimes known at Athens. (Suidas, s.v. Σώφρων, Ῥηγίλους; Arist. Poët. i. 8; Athen. p. 505; cf. HERONDAS.) The best collection of the fragments of Sophron is by L. Botzou, Marienburg, 1867.

Sophroniscus. [SOCRATES.]

Sophus, P. Semprounus, consul 304, and one of the first plebeian pontifices B. C. 300 (Liv. xi. 45, x. 9), is mentioned as one of the earliest jurists, and is said to have owed his name of Sophus or Wise to his great merits (Pompon. Dig. i. 2, 2, 37).

Sopianae (Fünfkirchen), a town in Pannonia Inferior, on the road from Mursa to Vindobona, the birthplace of the emperor Maximinus (Amm. Marc. xxviii. 1).

Sōra. 1. (Soranus: Sora), a town in Latium, on the right bank of the river Liris and N. of Arpinum, with a strongly fortified citadel. It was the most northerly town of the Volsci in Latium, and afterwards joined the Samnites; but it was conquered by the Romans, and was twice colonised by them, since the inhabitants had destroyed the first body of colonists. (Liv. ix. 23, 43, x. 1; Diod. xix. 72, xx. 90.) Juvenal speaks of it as a quiet country town (iii. 223). There are still remains of the polygonal walls of the ancient town.—2. (Zora) A town in Paphlagonia, near Andrappa and NW. of Tavium. It is possibly the same as Sebaste Paphlagoniae.

Sōractē (Monte di S. Oreste), a celebrated mountain in Etruria, in the territory of the Falisci, near the Tiber, about twenty-six miles from Rome, the summit of which, in winter covered with snow, was clearly visible from the city. (Vides ut alta stet nive candidum Soracte, Hor. Od. i. 9.) It rises in a bold and abrupt form, but to a height of only 2420 feet. On its summit was a temple of Apollo SORANUS.

Sorānus. 1. A Sabine divinity worshipped on Mt. Soracte, the name of which was possibly derived from this worship. Soranus was apparently a sun-god of the district, and hence was identified with Apollo as Apollo Soranus. At his festival the worshippers were supposed to pass over burning embers without injury. (Verg. Aen. vii. 785–790; Sil. It. v. 175; Plin. vii. 19.) The rite may have been originally a sun-charm, like the 'St. John's fires,' and had the additional meaning of purification from evil influences which belonged to the similar rites of PALES.—2. The name of several physicians, of whom the most celebrated seems to have been a native of Ephesus, and to have practised his profession first at Alexandria, and afterwards at Rome, in the reigns of Trajan and Hadrian, A.D. 98–138. There are several medical works still extant under the name of Soranus, but whether they were written by the native of Ephesus cannot be determined.

Sordicē (Etang de Leucate), a lake in Gallia Narbonensis, at the foot of the Pyrenees, formed by the river Sordis (Avien. Or. Mar. 560).

Sordones or Sordi, a small people in Gallia

Narbonensis, at the foot of the Pyrenees, whose chief town was Ruscino (Plin. iii. 35; Mel. ii. 5).

Sosibius (Σωσίβιος), a distinguished Lacedaemonian grammarian, who flourished in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus (about B. C. 251), and was contemporary with Callimachus (Suid. s. v.; Athen. p. 493).

Sosigēnes (Σωσιγένης), the Peripatetic philosopher, was the astronomer employed by Julius Caesar to superintend the correction of the calendar (B. C. 46). He is called an Egyptian, but may be supposed to have been an Alexandrian Greek. (See Dict. of Antiq. art. Calendarium.)

Sosiphānes (Σωσιφάνης), the son of Sosicles, of Syracuse, was one of the seven tragedians who were called the Tragic Pleiad. He lived about B. C. 340–280. (Suid. s. v.)

Sosithēus (Σωσίθεος), of Syracuse or Athens, or Alexandria in the Troad, was a distinguished tragic poet, one of the Tragic Pleiad, and the antagonist of the tragic poet Homer. He lived about B. C. 284. (Suid. s. v.)

Sosistratos (Σωσίστρατος). 1. Held the chief power at Syracuse before the rise of AGATHOCLES; he was expelled by a revolution and retired to Agrigentum, where he was assassinated B. C. 314 (Diod. xix. 71).—2. Divided the chief power at Syracuse with his rival, Thynion, about B. C. 277. They called in Pyrrhus to aid them when they were besieged by the Carthaginians (Plut. Pyrrh. 23).

Sosius. 1. C., quaestor, B. C. 66, and praetor 49. He was afterwards one of Antony's principal lieutenants in the East. He was appointed by Antony, in 38, governor of Syria and Cilicia in the place of Ventidius. Like his predecessor in the government, he carried on the military operations in his province with great success. In 37, he advanced against Jerusalem along with Herod, and after hard fighting became master of the city, and placed Herod upon the throne. In return for these services, Antony obtained for Sosius the honour of a triumph in 34, and the consulship in 32. Sosius commanded the left wing of Antony's fleet at the battle of Actium. He was afterwards pardoned by Octavian, at the intercession of L. Arruntius. (Suet. Aug. 17; App. B. C. v. 73; Vell. Pat. ii. 85.)—2. The name of two brothers (Sosii), booksellers at Rome in the time of Horace. They were probably freedmen, perhaps of the Sosius mentioned above. (Hor. Ep. i. 20, 2; A. P. 345.)

Sospita. [JUNO.]

Sosthēnes (Σωσθένης), a Macedonian officer of noble birth, who obtained the supreme direction of affairs during the period of confusion which followed the invasion of the Gauls. He defeated the Gauls in 280. (Just. xxiv. 5, 6.)

Sostrātus (Σώστρατος), the son of Dexiphanes, of Cnidus, was one of the great architects who flourished during and after the life of Alexander the Great. He built for Ptolemy I., the son of Lagus, the celebrated Pharos of Alexandria. He also embellished his native city, Cnidus, with a work which was one of the wonders of ancient architecture: namely, a portico, or colonnade, supporting a terrace, which served as a promenade. (Strab. p. 791; Plin. xxxvi. 83.)

Sōtādes (Σωτάδης). 1. An Athenian comic poet of the so-called Middle Comedy, who must not be confounded with the more celebrated poet of Maronea (Athen. pp. 293, 368).—2. A native of Maronea in Thrace, flourished at Alexandria about B. C. 280. He wrote lascivious poems (called φλύακες or κίναιδοι) in the Ionic dialect, whence they were also called Ἰωνικοὶ λόγοι (Suid. s.v.; Athen. p. 620). They were also called Sotadean poems (Σωτάδεια ἄσματα). It would seem that Sotades carried his lascivious and abusive satire to the utmost lengths, and the freedoms which he took at last brought him into trouble (Mart. ii. 86, 2). According to Plutarch (Op. Moral. p. 11), he made a vehement and gross attack on Ptolemy Philadelphus, on the occasion of his marriage with his sister Arsinoë, and the king threw him into prison, where he remained for a long time. According to Athenaeus, the poet attacked both Lysimachus and Ptolemy, and, having fled from Alexandria, he was overtaken at Caunus by Ptolemy's general Patroclus, who shut him up in a leaden chest and cast him into the sea.

Sōtīon (Σωτίων). 1. A philosopher and a native of Alexandria, who flourished at the close of the third century B.C. He is chiefly remarkable as the author of a work (entitled Διαδοχαί) on the successive teachers in the different philosophical schools (Athen. p. 162; Diog. Laërt. v. 86).—2. A philosopher, and also a native of Alexandria, who lived in the age of Tiberius. He was the instructor of Seneca, who derived from him his admiration of Pythagoras. It was perhaps this Sotion who was the author of a treatise on anger, quoted by Stobaeus (Sen. Ep. 108).

Sottiātes or Sotiātes, a powerful and warlike people in Gallia Aquitania, on the frontiers of Gallia Narbonensis, were subdued by P. Crassus Caesar's legate, after a hard-fought battle. The modern Sos probably represents the ancient town of this people. (Caes. B.G. iii. 20; Athen. p. 249; Oros. vi. 8.)

Sozōmēnus (Σωζόμενος), usually called Sozomen in English, was a Greek ecclesiastical historian of the fifth century. He was probably a native of Bethelia or Bethel, a village near Gaza in Palestine. His parents were Christians. He practised as an advocate at Constantinople, like his predecessor, Socrates, and he was still engaged in his profession when he wrote his History. His Ecclesiastical History, which is extant, is in nine books, and is dedicated to the emperor Theodosius II. It begins with the reign of Constantine, and comes down a little later than the death of Honorius, A.D. 423. The work is incomplete, and breaks off in the middle of a chapter. The author, we know, had proposed to bring it down to 439, the year in which the History of Socrates ends. Sozomen excels Socrates in style, but is inferior to the latter in soundness of judgment. The History of Sozomen is printed along with the other Greek ecclesiastical historians. [SOCRATES, No. 2.]

Sozopolis, aft. Sozupōlis (Σωζόπολις, Σωζούπολις: Susu, Ru.), a considerable city of Pisidia, in a plain surrounded by mountains, N. of Termessus (Hierocl. p. 672).

Sparta (Σπάρτη, Dor. Σπάρτα: Σπαρτιάτης, Spartiātes, Spartanus) also called Lacedaemon (Λακεδαίμων: Λακεδαμόνιος, Lacedaemonius), the capital of Laconia and the chief city of Peloponnesus, was situated on the right bank of the Eurotas (Iri), about twenty miles from the sea. It stood on a plain which contained within it several rising grounds and hills. It was bounded on the E. by the Eurotas, on the NW. by the small river Oenus (Kelesina), and on the SE. by the small river Tisia (Magula). Both of these streams fell into the Eurotas, which here for some distance is less narrowly enclosed by the mountains on either side. Below its confluence with the Oenus the river runs for eighteen miles in a valley or plain about four miles broad. On its left bank the ground is marshy; on its right there are low spurs running down from Taygetus, and forming a space of ground elevated above the river upon which Sparta was built. Below, the river is again confined by mountain gorges. The actual plain of Sparta was therefore difficult of approach and easily defended against invaders. The city was about six miles in circumference, and consisted of several distinct quarters, which were originally separate villages, and which were never united into one regular town. (Thuc. i. 10; Paus. iii. 16, 9.) Its site is occupied by the modern villages of Magula and Psykhiko, and the principal modern town in the neighbourhood is Mistra, which lies about two miles to the W. on the slopes of Mt. Taygetus. During the flourishing times of Greek independence, Sparta was never surrounded by walls, since the bravery of its citizens, and the difficulty of access to it, were supposed to render such defences needless. It was first fortified by the tyrant Nabis, B.C. 195 (Paus. vii. 8, 5; Liv. xxxiv. 27), but it did not possess regular walls till the time of the Romans. Sparta, unlike most Greek cities, had no proper Acropolis, but this name, after the fortification of the city by Nabis, was given to one of the steepest hills of the town, on the summit of which stood the temple of Athene Poliuchos, or Chalciocus. Five quarters (originally distinct villages) are mentioned: (1) Pitane (Πιτάνη), towards the N. of the city, in which was situated the Agora, containing the council-house of the senate, and the offices of the public magistrates (Hdt. iii. 55; Pind. Ol. vi. 46; Eur. Troad. 1112; Plut. Ages. 32, de Exsil. p. 601). It was also surrounded by temples and other public buildings. Of these the most splendid was the Persian Stoa or portico, originally built of the spoils taken in the Persian war, and enlarged and adorned at later times. (2) Limnae (Λίμναι), a suburb of the city in which stood the famous temple of Artemis Orthia, on the banks of the Eurotas, probably NE. of Pitane, was originally low ground covered with water. (3) Mesoa or Messoa (Μεσόα, Μεσσόα), also by the side of the Eurotas, probably in the SE. part of the city, containing the Dromus and the Platanistas, which was a spot nearly surrounded with water, and so called from the plane-trees growing there. (4) Cynosūra (Κυνόσουρα: Κυνόσουρεῖς), in the SW. of the city, and S. of Pitane. (5) Aegidae (Αἰγείδαι), in the NW. of the city, and W. of Pitane.—The two principal streets of Sparta ran from the Agora to the extreme end of the city: these were, (1) Aphetas or Aphetais (Ἀφέται, Ἀφεταῖς sc. ὁδός), extending in a south-easterly direction, past the temple of Dictynna (which stood on the rising ground included in New Sparta) and the tombs of the Eurypontidae; and (2) Skias (Σκιάς), running nearly parallel to the preceding one, but further to the E., and which derived its name from an ancient tholos or skias (a circular building). The hills on the outskirts of the city were the Dictynnaeum (above mentioned) on the S., the Issorion on the W., and the Alpeon on the N. To the SE., on the left bank of the Eurotas, was the hill Menelaion (Hag. Elias), so called from the sanctuary of Menelaus and Helen which stood upon it (Pol. v. 22; Paus. iii. 19, 9; Liv. xxxiv. 28). The most important remains of ancient Sparta are the ruins of the theatre, which was near the Agora.—In the Homeric period, Argos was the chief city in Peloponnesus, and Sparta is represented as subject to it. Here reigned Menelaus, the younger brother of Agamemnon; and, according to tradition, by the marriage of Orestes, the son of Agamemnon, with Hermione, the daughter of Menelaus, the two kingdoms of Argos and Sparta became united. The Dorian conquest of Peloponnesus made Sparta the capital of the country. Laconica fell to the share of the two sons of Aristodemus, Eurysthenes and Procles, who took up their residence at Sparta, and ruled over the kingdom conjointly. The old inhabitants of the country maintained themselves at Amyclae, which was not conquered for a long time. After the complete subjugation of the country we find three distinct classes in the population: the pure Dorians, who resided in the capital, and who were called Spartiatae or Spartans; the Perioeci or old Achaean inhabitants (but probably with some admixture of Dorian blood), who became tributary to the Spartans, and possessed no political rights; and the Helots, who were also a portion of the old Achaean inhabitants, but were reduced to a state of slavery. [See also Dict. of Ant. art. Perioeci.] From various causes the Spartans became distracted by intestine quarrels, till at length Lycurgus, who belonged to the royal family, was selected by all parties to give a new constitution to the state. [See LYCURGUS.] Sparta extended her sway over the greater part of Peloponnesus. In B.C. 743 the Spartans attacked Messenia, and after a war of twenty years subdued this country, 723. In 685 the Messenians again took up arms, but at the end of seventeen years were again completely subdued; and their country from this time forward became an integral portion of Laconia. [For details see MESSENIA.] After the close of the second Messenian war the Spartans continued their conquests in Peloponnesus. They defeated the Tegeans, and wrested the district of Thyrae from the Argives. At the time of the Persian invasion, they were confessedly the first people in Greece, and to them was granted by unanimous consent the chief command in the war. But after the final defeat of the Persians the haughtiness of Pausanias disgusted most of the Greek states, particularly the Ionians, and led them to transfer the supremacy to Athens (477). From this time the power of Athens steadily increased, and Sparta possessed little influence outside the Peloponnesus. The Spartans, however, made several attempts to check the rising greatness of Athens, and their jealousy of the latter led at length to the Peloponnesian war (431). This war ended in the overthrow of Athens, and the restoration of the supremacy of Sparta over the rest of Greece (404). But the Spartans did not retain this supremacy more than thirty years. Their decisive defeat by the Thebans under Epaminondas at the battle of Leuctra (371) gave the Spartan power a shock from which it never recovered; and the restoration of the Messenians to their country two years afterwards completed the humiliation of Sparta. Thrice was the Spartan territory invaded by the Thebans, and the Spartan women saw for the first time the watch-fires of an enemy's camp. The Spartans now finally lost their supremacy over Greece, but no other Greek state succeeded to their power, and about thirty years afterwards the greater part of Greece was obliged to yield to Philip of Macedon. The Spartans, however, kept haughtily aloof from the Macedonian conqueror, and refused to take part in the Asiatic expedition of his son, Alexander the Great. Under the later Macedonian monarchs the power of Sparta still further declined; the institutions of Lycurgus were neglected, luxury crept into the state, the number of citizens diminished, and the landed property became vested in a few families. Agis endeavoured to restore the ancient institutions of Lycurgus, but he perished in the attempt (240). Cleomenes III., who began to reign 236, was more successful. He succeeded in putting the Ephors to death, and overthrowing the existing government (225); and he then made a redistribution of the landed property, and augmented the number of the Spartan citizens by admitting some of the Perioeci to this honour. His reforms infused new blood into the state; and for a short time he carried on war with success against the Achaeans. But the mistaken policy of Aratus, the general of the Achaeans, called in the assistance of Antigonus Doson, the king of Macedonia, who defeated Cleomenes at the decisive battle of Sellasia (221), and followed up his success by the capture of Sparta. Sparta now sank into insignificance, and was ruled by a succession of native tyrants till at length it was compelled to abolish its peculiar institutions, and to join the Achaean League. Shortly afterwards it fell, with the rest of Greece, under the Roman power.

Spartacus, the name of several kings of the Cimmerian Bosphorus. 1. Succeeded the dynasty of the Archaeonactidae in B.C. 438, and reigned until 431. He was succeeded by his son Seleucus. (Diod. xii. 31.)—2. Began to reign in 427 and reigned twenty years. He was succeeded in 407 by his son Satyrus. (Diod. xiv. 93.)—3. Succeeded his father, Leucon, in 353, and died, leaving his kingdom to his son, Parysades, in 348 (Diod. xvi. 31, 52).—4. Son of Eumelus, began to reign in 304, and reigned twenty years (Diod. xx. 100).

Spartacus, by birth a Thracian, was successively a shepherd, a soldier, and a chief of banditti. On one of his predatory expeditions he was taken prisoner, and sold to a trainer of gladiators. In 73 he was a member of the company of Lentulus, and was detained in his school at Capua in readiness for the games at Rome. He persuaded his fellow-prisoners to make an attempt to gain their freedom. About seventy of them broke out of the school of Lentulus, and took refuge in the crater of Vesuvius. Spartacus was chosen leader, and was soon joined by a number of runaway slaves. They were blockaded by C. Claudius Pulcher at the head of 3000 men, but Spartacus attacked the besiegers and put them to flight. His numbers rapidly increased, and for two years (B.C. 73-71) he defeated one Roman army after another, and laid waste Italy from the foot of the Alps to the southernmost corner of the peninsula. After both the consuls of 72 had been defeated by Spartacus, M. Licinius Crassus, the praetor, was appointed to the command of the war. Crassus carried on the contest with vigour and success, and after gaining several advantages over the enemy, at length defeated them on the river Silarus in a decisive battle, in which Spartacus was slain.—The character of Spartacus has been maligned by the Roman writers. Cicero compares the vilest of his contemporaries to him; Horace (Od. iii. 14, 19) speaks of him as a common robber; none recognise his greatness, but the terror of his name survived to a late period of the empire. Accident made Spartacus a free-booter and a gladiator; nature had given him many of the qualities of a hero. The excesses of his followers he could not always repress, and his efforts to restrain them often cost him his popularity. But he was in himself not less just than he was able and valiant. (Plut. Crass. 8-12, Pomp. 21; Liv. Ep. 95-97; App. B.C. i. 116-121; Cic. Verr. v. 2, 5, ad Att. vi. 2.)

Spartarius Campus. [CARTHAGO NOVA.]

Sparti (Σπαρτοί from σπείρω), the Sown-men, was the name given to the armed men who sprang from the dragon's teeth sown by Cadmus, and who were believed to be the ancestors of the five oldest families at Thebes. [CADMUS; THEBAE.]

Spartianus, Aelius. [SCRIPTORES HISTORIAE AUGUSTAE.]

Spartolus (Σπάρτωλος), a town in the Macedonian peninsula of Chalcidice, N. of Olynthus (Thuc. ii. 79, v. 18).

Spauta or Capauta (Σπαῦτα: L. of Urmī), a large salt lake in the W. of Media, whose waters were singularly bitter and acrid. It was also called Matiana (Ματιανή λίμνη) from the name of the people who dwelt round it. (Strab. p. 523.)

Speos Artemidos. [PEOS ART.]

Spercheus (Σπερχεός: Elladha), a river in the S. of Thessaly, which rises in Mt. Tymphrestus, runs in an easterly direction through the territory of the Aenianes and through the district Malis, and falls into the innermost corner of the Sinus Maliacus (Hdt. vii. 198; Strab. p. 433). As a river-god Spercheus is a son of Oceanus and Ge, and the father of Menesthius by Polydora, the daughter of Peleus. To this god Peleus dedicated the hair of his son Achilles, in order that he might return in safety from the Trojan war. (Il. xvi. 174, xxiii. 142; Apollod. iii. 14, 4; Paus. i. 37, 2.)

Spēs, the personification of Hope, was worshipped at Rome, where she had several temples, the most ancient of which was built in B.C. 354, by the consul Atilius Calatinus, near the Porta Carmentalis in the Forum Olitorium, and was rebuilt in 17 A.D. (Liv. xxiv. 47; Tac. Ann. ii. 49). The goddess Spes represented especially the hope and promise of gardens, over which she presided, as Venus did also (with whom she was sometimes identified in art). Hence the vegetable-market was a fitting place for her sanctuary (cf. Tibull. i. 1, 9). She was represented, like Flora, crowned with flowers, and with ears of corn. She bore also the cornucopia, like Fortune, in conjunction with whom she is often addressed on monumental inscriptions: 'Spes et Fortuna valete' (cf. Έλπίς καὶ σὺ Τύχη μέγα χαίρετε, Anth. Pal. ix. 49).

Speusippus (Σπεύσιππος), the philosopher, was a native of Athens, and the son of Eurygmedon and Potone, a sister of Plato (Diog. Laërt. iv. 1). He accompanied his uncle Plato on his third journey to Syracuse, where he displayed considerable ability and prudence (Plut. Dion. 22). He succeeded Plato as president of the Academy, but was at the head of the school for only eight years (B.C. 347-339). He died, as it appears, of a lingering paralytic illness. He wrote several works, all of which are lost, in which he developed the doctrines of his great master.

Sphaeria (Σφαίρα: Poros), an island off the coast of Troezen in Argolis, and between it and the island of Calauria, with the latter of which it was connected by a sand-bank. Here Sphaerus, the charioteer of Pelops, is said to have been buried. (Paus. ii. 38, 1, v. 10, 2.)

Sphaerus (Σφαῖρος), a Stoic philosopher, studied first under Zeno of Citium, and afterwards under Cleanthes. He lived at Alexandria during the reigns of the first two Ptolemies. (Diog. Laërt. viii. 177; Athen. p. 334.) He also taught at Lacedaemon, and was believed to have had considerable influence in moulding the character of Cleomenes (Plut. Cleom. 2). He was in repute among the Stoics for the accuracy of his definitions (Cic. Tusc. 24, 53). He was the author of several works, all of which are lost.

Sphendālē (Σφενδάλη: Σφενδαλεύς), a demus in Attica belonging to the tribe Hippothoontis, on the frontiers of Boeotia between Tanagra and Decelea.

Sphettus (Σφηττός: Σφήττιος), a demus in the S. of Attica, near the silver mines of Sunium, belonging to the tribe Acamantis.

Sphinx (Σφίγξ, gen. Σφιγγός), according to the Greek tradition, a she-monster, daughter of Orthus and Chimaera, born in the country of the Arimi, or of Typhon and Echidna, or lastly of Typhon and Chimaera. She is said to have proposed a riddle to the Thebans, and to have murdered all who were unable to guess it. Oedipus solved it, whereupon the Sphinx slew herself. [For details see OEDIPUS.] The legend appears to have come from Egypt, but the figure of the Sphinx is represented somewhat differently in Greek mythology and art. The Egyptian Sphinx is the figure of a lion without wings in a lying attitude, the upper part of the body being that of a human being. This Sphinx was male, and represented the god Hor-em-khu (= Horus, Harmachis, or Kheper). The statue existed before the time of Khufu (as is mentioned in an inscription), i.e. before the Fourth Dynasty, which probably began about 3700 B.C. The common idea of a Greek Sphinx, on the other hand, is that of a winged body of a lion, the breast and upper part being the figure of a woman. The winged type, probably derived from Assyria, was the commoner; but some terracotta figures of a wingless Sphinx have been found in Boeotia. The Sphinx in Greece was primarily an emblem of the mysterious power of death. Hence she is represented, like the Harpy or the Siren, bearing a slain body; and especially she is the slayer of those who die prematurely. Her appearance in the Theban story is due to her being regarded as both pitiless and mysterious. Among the most remarkable Greek sculptures of the Sphinx are those which appear in a relief recently found at Assos. The figure of the Sphinx is a common emblem on tombs.

Spīna, a town in Gallia Cispadana, in the territory of the Lingones, on the most southerly of the mouths of the Po, which was called after it Ostium Spineticum. It was a very ancient town (Dionys. i. 18, 28), but in the time of Strabo had ceased to be a place of any importance (Strab. pp. 214, 421).

Spintharus (Σπινθαρος), of Heraclea on the Pontus, a tragic poet, contemporary with Aristophanes, who designates him as a barbarian and a Phrygian. He was also ridiculed by the other comic poets. (Aristoph. Av. 763; Suid. s.v.)

Spolatum. [SALONA.]

Spolētium or Spolētum (Spoletinus: Spoletum), a town in Umbria, on the Via Flaminia, colonised by the Romans B.C. 242. It suffered severely in the civil wars between Sulla and Marius. At a later time it was taken by Totila; but its walls, which had been destroyed by the Goths, were restored by Narses.

(Liv. xxii. 9; App. B.C. i. 89; Strab. p. 227; Procop. B.G. iii. 12.)

Spōrādes (Σποράδες, sc. νῆσοι, from σπείρω), a group of scattered islands in the Aegean sea, off the island of Crete and the W. coast of Asia Minor, so called in opposition to the Cyclades, which lay in a circle around Delos. The division, however, between these two groups of islands was not always defined, and we find some of the islands at one time described as belonging to the Sporades, and at another time as belonging to the Cyclades. (Strab. pp. 484, 485; Plin. iv. 71.)

Spurinna, Vestritius. 1. The haruspex who warned Caesar to beware of the Ides of March. It is related that, as Caesar was going to the senate-house on the fatal day, he said to Spurinna in jest, 'Well, the Ides of March are come,' upon which the seer replied, 'Yes, they are come, but they are not past.' (Suet. Jul. 81; Plut. Caes. 63; Val. Max. viii. 11, 2.)—2. A Roman general, who fought on the side of Otho against the Vitellian troops in the N. of Italy (Tac. Hist. ii. 11, 18, 26; Plut. Oth. 5). In the reign of Trajan he gained a victory over the Bructeri. Spurinna lived upon terms of the closest friendship with the younger Pliny, who gives a valuable and interesting account of the manner in which Spurinna passed his day (Plin. Ep. iii. 1). In the same letter Pliny mentions that Spurinna wrote lyric poems; but there is no doubt that the four poems published as Spurinna's by Barth in 1613 are forgeries (see Wernsdorf, Poët. Lat. Min. iii. 325).

Spurinus, Q. Petillius, praetor urbanus in B.C. 181, in which year the books of king Numa Pompilius are said to have been discovered upon the estate of one L. Petillius. Spurinus obtained possession of the books, and upon his representation to the senate that they ought not to be read and preserved, the senate ordered them to be burnt. [NUMA.] Spurinus was consul in 176, and fell in battle against the Ligurians. (Liv. xl. 18, 26, 29; Val. Max. i. 1, 12.)

Stābiāe (Stabianus; Castel a Mare di Stabia), an ancient town in Campania, between Pompeii and Surrentum, which was destroyed by Sulla in the Social war, but which continued to exist as a small place down to the great eruption of Vesuvius in A.D. 79, when it was overwhelmed along with Pompeii and Herculaneum. It was at Stabiae that the elder Pliny perished. (Ov. Met. xv. 711; Plin. Ep. vi. 16.) Remains of some interest have been excavated there [cf. Dict. of Ant. art. Torcular].

Stagīrus, subsequently Stagīra (Στάγειρος, τὰ Στάγαιρα, ἢ Στάγαιρα; Στάγειρις; Stavro), a town of Macedonia, in Chalcidice, on the Strymonic gulf and a little N. of the isthmus which unites the promontory of Athos to Chalcidice. It was a colony of Andros, was founded B.C. 656, and was originally called Orthagoria (Hdt. vii. 115; Thuc. iv. 88). It is celebrated as the birthplace of Aristotle, and was in consequence restored by Philip, by whom it had been destroyed (Plut. Alex. 7; Diog. Laërt. v. 4; Ael. V. H. iii. 17).

Staienus, C., one of the judices at the trial of Oppianicus. It was believed that he took bribes from both sides. He claimed, without right, to belong to the Aelian gens, and therefore adopted the Aelian cognomen Paetus. He was condemned for exciting a mutiny among the soldiers in his quaestorship. (Cic. Cluent. 36, 98, Brut. 68.)

Staphylus (Στάφυλος), son of Dionysus and Ariadne, or of Theseus and Ariadne, and was one of the Argonauts. By Chrysothemis he became the father of three daughters, Molpadia, Rheo, and Parthenos. (Apollod. i. 9, 16; Diod. v. 52; DIONYSUS.)

Stasinus (Στασίος), of Cyprus, an epic poet, to whom some of the ancient writers attributed the poem of the Epic Cycle entitled Cypria (Κύπρια), because Cyprus was the birthplace of its supposed author. In the earliest historical period of Greek literature the Cypria was accepted without question as a work of Homer; and it is not till we come down to the times of Athenaeus and the grammarians that we find any mention of Stasinus (Athen. pp. 35, 334, 682). Stasinus was said to be the son-in-law of Homer, who, according to one story, composed the Cypria and gave it to Stasinus as his daughter's marriage portion (Procl. Chrest. p. 471; Ael. V. H. ix. 15); manifestly an attempt to reconcile the two different accounts, which ascribed it to Homer and Stasinus. The Cypria was the first, in the order of the events contained in it, of the poems of the Epic Cycle relating to the Trojan war. It embraced the period antecedent to the beginning of the Iliad, to which it was designed to form an introduction, relating the marriage of Thetis, the judgment of Paris to award the golden apple, the rape of Helen, and the first nine years of the war. Its substance is preserved in the prose summary by PROCLUS.

Stata Mater, the deity at Rome who was invoked to stay the progress of fires, and was therefore worshipped in each vicus, under the direction of the Magistri Vicorum (C. I. L. vi. 763-766). Her statue stood in the Forum (Fest. s.v.). It is probable that her worship was merely one aspect of the worship of Vesta. [VESTA.]

Statielli, Statiellātes, or Statiellenses, a small tribe in Liguria, S. of the Po, whose chief town was Statiellae Aquae (Acqui), on the road from Genua to Placentia (Liv. xlii. 7, 21; Cic. ad Fam. xi. 11).

Statilia Messallina. [MESSALLINA.]

Statilius Taurus. [TAURUS.]

Statira (Στάτειρα). 1. Wife of Artaxerxes II., king of Persia, was poisoned by Parysatis, the mother of the king, who was a deadly enemy of Statira (Plut. Artax. 2-19).—2. Sister and wife of Darius III., celebrated as the most beautiful woman of her time. She was taken prisoner by Alexander, together with her mother-in-law, Sisygambis, and her daughters, after the battle of Issus, B.C. 333. They were all treated with the utmost respect by the conqueror, but Statira died shortly before the battle of Arbela, 331 (Curt. iii. 3, 22-26, iv. 10, 18-34; Arr. An. ii. 11, iv. 19).—3. Also called Barsine, elder daughter of Darius III. [BARSINE.]

Stātius Murcus. [MURCUS.]

Stātius, P. Papīnius, was born at Neapolis, about A.D. 61 (cf. Stat. Silv. v. 3, 235), and was the son of a distinguished grammarian. He accompanied his father to Rome, where the latter acted as the preceptor of Domitian, who held him in high honour. Under the skilful tuition of his father, the young Statius speedily rose to fame, and became peculiarly renowned for the brilliancy of his extemporaneous effusions, so that he gained the prize three times in the Alban contests (Silv. iii. 5, 28); but having, after a long career of popularity, been vanquished in the quinquennial Capitoline games, he retired to Neapolis, the place of his nativity, along with his wife, Claudia, whose virtues he frequently commemorates (Silv. iii. 5, 31). It is likely, however, that the cause of his retirement was, not personal pique, but rather weariness of the state of Roman society, of the recitations, and of the necessity of seeking court favour and patronage. He died about A.D. 96. It has been inferred from a passage in Juvenal (vii. 82) that Statius, in his earlier years at least, was forced to struggle with poverty: but the passage, rightly understood, expresses no more than the circumstances under which poets had to find a sale for their work, without any reference to the wealth or poverty of Statius in particular. Statius also, no doubt, profited by the patronage of Domitian (Silv. iv. 2), whom he addresses in strains of the most fulsome adulation. The story of the secret conversion of Statius to Christianity, mentioned by Dante (Purgat. xxii. 89), rests on no authority, and is in itself extremely improbable. Dante was glad to believe possible for the most eminent imitator of Virgil what he was obliged to recognise as impossible for Virgil himself. The extant works of Statius are:—(1) Silvarum Libri V, a collection of thirty-two occasional poems, many of them of considerable length, divided into five books. To each book is prefixed a dedication in prose, addressed to some friend. The metre chiefly employed is the heroic hexameter, but four of the pieces (i. 6, ii. 7, iv. 3, 9) are in Phalaecian hendecasyllables, one (iv. 5) in the Alcaic, and one (iv. 7) in the Sapphic stanza. (2) Thebaidos Libri XII, a heroic poem in twelve books, embodying the ancient legends with regard to the expedition of the Seven against Thebes. (3) Achilleidos Libri II, a heroic poem breaking off abruptly. According to the original plan, it would have comprised a complete history of the exploits of Achilles, before and after the time embraced by the Iliad, but was never finished. Statius may justly claim the praise of standing in the foremost rank among the heroic poets of the Silver Age. He is in a great measure free from extravagance and pompous pretensions, though he draws too largely on his store of mythological learning; but, on the other hand, in no portion of his works do we find the impress of high natural talent or power; the pieces which form the Silvae, although evidently thrown off in haste, are better than the ambitious poems of the Thebaid or the Achilleid.—Editions of the Silvae by Markland, Lond. 1728, and by Sillig, Dresd. 1827: of the Thebais and Achilleis by O. Müller, 1870: of the complete works of Statius by Bährens and Kohlmann, Leips. 1876–1884.

Statōnia (Statoniensis), a town in Etruria, and a Roman Praefectura, on the river Albinia, and on the Lacus Statoniensis, in the neighbourhood of which were stone quarries, and excellent wine was produced. Near it was a lake, which is probably the L. di Mezzano, a little W. of the L. di Bolsena (L. Volsiniensis); Statonia was probably between this and Tarchynia. (Strab. p. 226; Plin. ii. 209; Vitruv. ii. 7, 3.)

Stātor. [JUPITER, p. 464, a.]

Stectōrium (Στεκτόριον: Emir Hisar) a city of Great Phrygia, between Peltae and Synnada (Ptol. v. 2, 22; Paus. x. 27, 1).

Stellas or Stellatinus Campus, a part of the Campania plain, N. of M. Tifata, between Cales and the Volturnus (Liv. xxii. 13).

Stentōr (Στέντωρ), a herald of the Greeks in the Trojan war, whose voice was as loud as that of fifty other men together. His name has become proverbial for anyone shouting with an unusually loud voice. (Il. v. 783; Juv. xiii. 112.)

Stentōris Lacus. [HEBRUS.]

Stenyclarus (Στενύκληρος, Dor. Στενύκλαρος: Στενυκλήριος), a town in the N. of Messenia, NE. of Messene, which was the residence of the Dorian kings of the country. After the time of the third Messenian war the town is no longer mentioned; but its name continued to be given to an extensive plain in the N. of Messenia. (Paus. iv. 3, 7; Strab. p. 361; Hdt. ix. 64.)

Stēphānē or -is (Στεφάνη, Στεφάνις: Stephanio), a seaport town of Paphlagonia, on the coast of the Mariandyni, W. of Sinope (Ptol. v. 4, 2).

Stēphānus (Στέφανος). 1. An Athenian comic poet of the New Comedy, was probably the son of Antiphanes, some of whose plays he is said to have exhibited (Athen. p. 469).—2. Of Byzantium, the author of the geographical lexicon entitled Ethnica (Ἔθνικά), of which unfortunately we only possess an Epitome. Stephanus was a grammarian at Constantinople, and lived after the time of Arcadius and Honorius, and before that of Justinian II. His work was reduced to an Epitome by a certain Hermolaus, who dedicated his abridgment to the emperor Justinian II. According to the title, the chief object of the work was to specify the gentile names derived from the several names of places and countries in the ancient world. But, while this is done in every article, the amount of information given went far beyond this. Nearly every article in the Epitome contains a reference to some ancient writer as an authority for the name of the place; but in the original, as we see from the extant fragments, there were considerable quotations from the ancient authors, besides a number of very interesting particulars, topographical, historical, mythological, and others. Thus the work was not merely what it professed to be, a lexicon of a special branch of technical grammar, but a valuable dictionary of geography. How great would have been its value to us if it had come down to us un mutilated may be seen by anyone who compares the extant fragments of the original with the corresponding articles in the Epitome. These fragments, however, are unfortunately very scanty, being only the last part of the letter Δ, the article Ἰβηρία δύο and an account of Sicily.—The best editions of the Epitome of Stephanus are by Dindorf, Lips. 1825, &c., 4 vols.; by Westermann, Lips. 1839, 8vo; and by Meineke, Berlin, 1849.

Stercūlius, Stercutius, or Sterquillinus.

Stērōpes. [CYCLOPES.]

Stesichōrus (Στησίχορος), of Himera in Sicily, a celebrated Greek poet, contemporary with Sappho, Alcaeus, Pittacus, and Phalaris, is said to have been born B.C. 632, and to have died in 552 at the age of eighty. His real name was Tisias, the name by which he is known being merely a surname, meaning 'organiser of choruses' (Suid. s.v.). Of the events of his life we have only a few obscure accounts. Like other great poets, his birth is fabled to have been attended by an omen: a nightingale sat upon the babe's lips and sang. He is said to have been carefully educated at Catana, and afterwards to have enjoyed the friendship of Phalaris, the tyrant of Agrigentum. Many writers relate the fable of his being miraculously struck with blindness after writing an attack upon Helen, and recovering his sight when he had composed a Palinodia. [HELENA.] Another story told of him is that he warned the citizens of the designs of Phalaris by telling them the fable of the horse and the stag, and in consequence had to fly from Agrigentum to Catana (Ar. Rhet. ii. 20). He is said to have been buried at Catana near a gate of the city which was called after him the Stesichorean gate. Stesichorus was one of the nine chiefs of lyric poetry recognised by the ancients. He stands, with Alcman, at the head of one branch of the lyric art, the choral poetry of the Dorians. He was the first to break the monotony of the strophe and antistrophe by the introduction of the epode, and his metres were much more varied, and the structure of his strophes more elaborate, than those of Alcman. His odes contained the elements of the choral poetry perfected by Pindar and the tragedians. The subjects of his poems were chiefly heroic (hence 'graves Camenae,' Hor. Od. iv. 9, 8); he transferred the subjects of the old epic poetry to the lyric form, dropping, of course, the continuous narrative, and dwelling on isolated adventures of his heroes. He also composed poems on other subjects. His extant remains may be classified under the following heads:—(1) Mythical Poems; (2) Hymns, Encomia, Epithalamia, Paeans; (3) Erotic Poems, and Scolia; (4) A pastoral poem, entitled Daphnis; (5) Fables; (6) Elegies. The dialect of Stesichorus was Dorian, with an intermixture of the Epic.—The best edition of his fragments is by Kleine, Berol. 1828.

Stēsimbrotus (Στησίμβροτος), of Thasos, a rhapsodist and historian in the time of Cimon and Pericles, who is mentioned with praise by Plato and Xenophon, and who wrote a work upon Homer, the title of which is not known. He also wrote some historical works. (Plat. Ion, p. 550; Xen. Mem. iv. 2, 10; Plut. Cim. 4, 14, 16, Per. 8, 26.)

Stheneboea (Σθενέβοια), called Antēa by many writers, was a daughter of the Lycian king Iobates, and the wife of Proetus. Respecting her love for Bellerophon, see BELLEROPHONTES.

Sthēnelus (Σθένηςλος). Son of Perseus and Andromeda, king of Mycenae, and husband of Nicippe, by whom he became the father of Alcinoë, Medusa, and Eurystheus (Il. xix. 116; Apollod. ii. 4, 5). Eurystheus, as the great enemy of Heracles, is called by Ovid Stheneleus hostis (Ov. Her. ix. 25, Met. ix. 273).—2. Son of Androgeos and grandson of Minos. He accompanied Heracles from Paros on his expedition against the Amazons, and together with his brother Alcaeus he was appointed by Heracles ruler of Thasos (Apollod. ii. 5, 9).—3. Son of Actor, likewise a companion of Heracles in his expedition against the Amazons; but he died and was buried in Paphlagonia, where he afterwards appeared to the Argonauts (Ap. Rh. ii. 911).—4. Son of Capaneus and Evadne, belonged to the family of the Anaxagoridæ in Argos, and was the father of Cylarabes (Il. v. 109; Paus. ii. 18, 4). He was one of the Epigoni, by whom Thebes was taken, and he commanded the Argives under Diomedes, in the Trojan war, being the faithful friend and companion of Diomedes. (Il. ii. 564, ix. 367, 505, xxiii. 511; Hor. Od. i. 15, 3, iv. 9, 20.) He was one of the Greeks concealed in the wooden horse (Hyg. Fab. 108), and at the distribution of the booty he was said to have received an image of a three-eyed Zeus, which was in after-times shown at Argos (Paus. ii. 45, 5, viii. 46, 2). His own statue and tomb also were believed to exist at Argos.—5. Father of Cynus, who was metamorphosed into a swan. Hence we find the swan called by Ovid Stheneleis volucris and Stheneleia proles (Ov. Met. ii. 368).—6. A tragic poet, contemporary with Aristophanes, who attacked him in the Wasps (Aristoph. Vesp. 1312).

Stheno. [GORGONES.]

Stilicho, son of a Vandal captain under the emperor Valens, became one of the most distinguished generals of Theodosius I. On the death of Theodosius, A.D. 395, Stilicho became the real ruler of the West under the emperor Honorius; and his power was strengthened by the death of his rival, Rufinus [RUFINUS], and by the marriage of his daughter Maria to Honorius. His military abilities saved the Western empire; and after gaining several victories over the barbarians, he defeated Alaric at the decisive battle of Pollentia, 403, and compelled him to retire from Italy. In 405 he gained another great victory over Radagaisus, who had invaded Italy at the head of a formidable host of barbarians. It was alleged that these victories raised the ambition of Stilicho, and that he aspired to make himself master of the Roman empire; but there is no proof of this. The influence of Stilicho was undermined by the intrigues of Olympius, who, for his own purposes, persuaded Honorius to regard Stilicho as dangerous and disloyal. Stilicho was apprehended and put to death at Ravenna in 408. (Claudian, Stilicho, Serena, Rufinus; Zosim. iv., v.)

Stilo, L. Aelius Praeconinus, a Roman grammarian, one of the teachers of Varro and Cicero. He received the surname of Praeconinus because his father had been a praeco, and that of Stilo on account of his compositions. He himself was a knight, and, as one of the aristocratical party, accompanied Q. Metellus Numidicus into exile in B.C. 100. He wrote Commentaries on the Songs of the Salii and on the Twelve Tables, a work De Proloquiis, &c. He and his son-in-law, Ser. Claudius, may be regarded as the founders of the study of grammar at Rome. (Suet. Gram. 2; Cic. Brut. 56, 205; Quint. x. 1, 99; Gell. i. 18, x. 21.) Some modern writers suppose that the work on Rhetoric ad C. Herennium, which is printed in the editions of Cicero, is the work of this Aelius, but this is probably erroneous [see CORNIFICIUS].

Stilpo (Στίλπων), the philosopher, was a native of Megara, and taught philosophy in his native town. According to one account, he engaged in dialectic encounters with Diodorus Cronus at the court of Ptolemaeus Soter; while, according to another, he did not comply with the invitation of the king to visit Alexandria. He acquired a great reputation; and so high was the esteem in which he was held that Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, spared his house at the capture of Megara. He is said to have surpassed his contemporaries in inventive power and dialectic art, and to have inspired almost all Greece with a devotion to the Megarian philosophy. He made the idea of virtue the especial object of his consideration. He maintained that the wise man ought not only to overcome every evil, but not even to be affected by any. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 113–118; Sen. Ep. 9.)

which in childhood and youth incited to emulation or love (Aug. C. D. iv. 11); but, perhaps only from some similarity of sound, this name was applied also to Semele after the introduction of the Bacchanalian worship into Italy. This Stimula (= Semele) had a sanctuary near Ostia. (Liv. xxxix. 12; Ov. Fast. vi. 503.)

Stiria (Στεῖρῖα: Στεῖριεύς: Ru. on the bay Porto Rafti), a demus in Attica, SE. of Brauron, belonging to the tribe Pandionis, to which there was a road from Athens called Στεῖριακὴ ὁδός. It is the birthplace of Theramenes and Thrasylulus. (Paus. x. 45, 8; Strab. p. 399.)

Stobaeus, Joannes (Ἰωάννης ὁ Στοβαῖος), derived his surname apparently from being a native of Stobi in Macedonia. Of his personal history we know nothing. Even the age in which he lived cannot be fixed with accuracy; but he must have been later than Hierocles of Alexandria, whom he quotes. Probably he lived not very long after him, as he quotes no writer of a later date. We are indebted to Stobaeus for a very valuable collection of extracts from earlier Greek writers. Stobaeus was a man of very extensive reading, in the course of which he noted down the most interesting passages. The materials which he had collected in this way he arranged, in the order of subjects, for the use of his son Septimius. This collection of extracts has come down to us, divided into two distinct works, of which one bears the title of Ἐκλογαὶ φυσικαὶ διαλεκτικαὶ καὶ ἠθικαὶ (Eclogae Physicae, etc.), and the other the title of Ἀνθολόγιον (Florilegium or Sermones). The Eclogae consist for the most part of extracts conveying the views of earlier poets and prose writers on points of physics, dialectics, and ethics. The Florilegium or Sermones is devoted to subjects of a moral, political, and economical kind, and maxims of practical wisdom. Each chapter of the Eclogae and Sermones is headed by a title describing its matter. The extracts quoted in illustration begin usually with passages from the poets, after whom come historians, orators, philosophers and physicians. To Stobaeus we are indebted for a large proportion of the fragments that remain of the lost works of poets. Euripides seems to have been an especial favourite with him. He has quoted above 500 passages from him in the Sermones, 150 from Sophocles, and above 200 from Menander. In extracting from prose writers, Stobaeus sometimes quotes verbatim, sometimes gives only an epitome of the passage.—Editions of the Eclogae are by Heeren, Gotting. 1792–1801, and by Meineke, Leips. 1860; and of the Florilegium by Gaisford, Oxon. 1822, and by Meineke, Leips. 1857.

Stōbi (Στόβοι: Στοβαῖος), a town of Macedonia, and the most important place in the district Paeonia, was situated on the river Erigon, at its junction with the Axios, NE. of Heraclea (Strab. p. 329; Ptol. iii. 13, 4; Liv. xxxiii. 19, xlv. 29). It was made a Roman colony and a municipium, and under the later emperors was the capital of the province Macedonia II. or Salutaris (Plin. iv. 34; C. I. L. iii. 629). It was destroyed at the end of the fourth century by the Goths; but it is still mentioned by the Byzantine writers as a fortress under the name of Stypēum (Στύπειον). Its ruins are near the modern Gradsko.

Stoechades Insulae (I. d'Hyères) a group of five small islands in the Mediterranean, off the coast of Gallia Narbonensis and E. of Massilia, on which the Massiliotes kept an armed force to protect their trade against pirates. The three larger islands (mentioned by Pliny) were called Prote, Mese or Pomponiana, and Hypaea, the modern Porquerolle, Port Croz, and Isle de Levant or du Titan; the two smaller ones are probably the modern Ratoneau and Promègne. (Strab. p. 184; Tac. Hist. iii. 43; Lucan, iii. 516; Plin. iii. 35.)

Stoeni, a Ligurian people in the Maritime Alps, conquered by Q. Marcius Rex B.C. 118, before he founded the colony of Narbo Martius (Liv. Ep. 62; Val. Max. 10, 3).

Strābo, a cognomen in many Roman gentes, properly signified a person who squinted, and is accordingly classed with Paetus, though the latter word did not indicate such a complete distortion of vision as Strabo (Hor. Sat. i. 3, 45; Cic. N. D. i. 29; Plin. xi. 150).

Strābo, the geographer, was a native of Amasia in Pontus. The date of his birth is unknown, but may perhaps be placed about B.C. 54. He lived during the whole of the reign of Augustus, and during the early part, at least, of the reign of Tiberius. He is supposed to have died about A.D. 24. He received a careful education. He studied grammar under Aristodemus at Nysa in Caria, and philosophy under Xenarchus of Seleucia in Cilicia and Boethus of Sidon. (Strab. pp. 650, 670.) He lived some years at Rome, and also travelled much in various countries. We learn from his own work that he was with his friend Aelius Gallus in Egypt in B.C. 24 (pp. 110, 818). He wrote a historical work (Ἱστορικὰ Ὑπομνήματα) in forty-three books, which is lost. It began where the History of Polybius ended, and was probably continued to the battle of Actium. (Strab. p. 13; Plut. Lucull. 28, Sull. 26.) But his work on Geography (Γεωγραφικά), in seventeen books, has come down to us entire, with the exception of the seventh, of which we have only a meagre epitome. Strabo's work, according to his own expression, was not intended for the use of all persons. It was designed for all who had had a good education, and particularly for those who were engaged in the higher departments of administration. Consistently with this view, his plan does not comprehend minute description, except when the place or the object is of great interest or importance; nor is his description limited to the physical characteristics of each country: it comprehends the important political events of which each country has been the theatre, a notice of the chief cities and the great men who have illustrated them; in short, whatever was most characteristic and interesting in every country. Strabo's Geography is the most important ancient work on that subject which has been preserved, and forms a striking contrast with the Geography of Ptolemy, and the dry list of names, occasionally relieved by something added to them, in the geographical portion of the Natural History of Pliny. It is in short a book intended for reading, and it may be read: a kind of historical geography. Strabo's language is generally clear, except in those passages where the text has been corrupted; it is appropriate to the matter, simple and without affectation. From this it will be understood that, while his work is naturally of no value in its mathematical geography, it is interesting and extremely valuable for its notices of topography (where, however, he deals only with those places which he considers most important), of history and of customs. The first two books of Strabo are an introduction to his Geography, and contain that in which he was weakest, his views on the form and magnitude of the earth, and other subjects connected with mathematical geography. In the third book he begins his description: he devotes eight books to Europe; six to Asia; and the seventeenth and last to Egypt and Libya. Strabo adopted the geography of Eratosthenes as his basis, but in his own work he aimed at something much more complete, comprising, as was said above, historical as well as physical geography. With the W. of Europe he was naturally better acquainted than Eratosthenes had been, though it is strange to find that he conceived the Pyrenees as running from N. to S. parallel with the Rhine (p. 177). In his views of the geography of Asia and Africa he departs little from those of Eratosthenes, nor does he differ much in his conception of the map of the world, which he regarded as 'shaped like a chlamys,' an oblong measuring about 9000 miles in length from E. to W. and 4000 in breadth (p. 113), the habitable earth extending about 400 N. of Borysthenes to a latitude corresponding with the N. of Ierne (Ireland). It is to be regretted that in his judgment of his predecessors he not only unduly discredits Herodotus but also (from following Polybius implicitly in this point) altogether rejects the authority of Pytheas. Yet Pytheas might have saved him from some erroneous ideas about the N. of Europe. Pytheas, for instance, was nearer the truth as regards the geography of Britain, when he described it as an island stretching away lengthwise to the N., with Thule to the N. of it (Strab. p. 114), than Strabo himself, who believed Britain to be a triangle with its longest side, 500 miles long, opposite the whole Gallic coast from the Rhine to the Pyrenees (that coast being, as it were, flattened out into a continuous line facing mainly N.), and who placed Ireland N. of Britain, as the most northerly point of the world.—The best editions of Strabo are by Kramer, Berl. 1847–1852; by C. Müller and Dübner, Paris, 1857, and the text by Meineke, Leips. 1866; selections by H. F. Tozer, 1893.

Strābo, Fannius. 1. C., consul B.C. 161 with M. Valerius Messalla. In their consulship the rhetoricians were expelled from Rome. (Gell. xv. 11).—2. C., son of the preceding, consul 122 (C. I. L. i. 560). He owed his election to the consulship chiefly to the influence of C. Gracchus, who was anxious to prevent his enemy Opimius from obtaining the office. But in his consulship Fannius supported the aristocracy, and took an active part in opposing the measures of Gracchus. He spoke against the proposal of Gracchus, who wished to give the Roman franchise to the Latins, in a speech which was regarded as a master-piece in the time of Cicero (Cic. Brut. 26, 99). He served in Africa, under Scipio Africanus, in 146, and in Spain under Fabius Maximus in 142 (Plut. Ti. Gr. 4; App. Hisp. 67). He owed his celebrity in literature to his History, which was written in Latin, and of which Brutus made an abridgment (Cic. de Or. ii. 67, 270, Brut. 87, 299).—3. The son-in-law of Laelius, whom Cicero introduces as one of the speakers in the de Republica and de Amicitia, was stated in the Brutus (26, 101) to be the same as the historian Fannius, but Cicero himself corrects this statement (ad Att. xii. 5, 3).

Strābo Seius. [SEJANUS.]

Strātōcles (Στρατοκλῆς). 1. An Athenian orator, and a friend of the orator Lysurgus. He was a virulent opponent of Demosthenes, whom he charged with having accepted bribes from Harpalus. Stratocles especially distinguished himself by his extravagant flattery of Demetrius. (Plut. Demetr. 11, 24; Vit. X. Or. p. 852).—2. An actor at Rome (Juv. iii. 99; Quintil. xi. 3, 178).

Strāton (Στράτων). 1. Son of Arcesilaus, of Lampsacus, was a distinguished Peripatetic philosopher, and the tutor of Ptolemy Philadelphus. He succeeded Theophrastus as head of the school in B.C. 288, and, after presiding over it eighteen years, was succeeded by Lycon. He devoted himself especially to the study of natural science, whence he obtained the appellation of Physicus. Cicero, while speaking highly of his talents, blames him for neglecting the most necessary part of philosophy—that which has respect to virtue and morals—and giving himself up to the investigation of nature. Straton appears to have taught a pantheistic system, the specific character of which cannot, however, be determined. He seems to have denied the existence of any god outside the material universe, and to have held that every particle of matter has a plastic and seminal power, but without sensation or intelligence; and that life, sensation, and intellect, are but forms, accidents, and affections of matter. (Diog. Laërt. v. 58; Cic. Acad. i. 9, 34, de Fin. v. 5, 13).—2. Of Sardis, an epigrammatic poet, and the compiler of a Greek Anthology devoted to licentious subjects. [PLANUDES].—3. A physician of Berytus in Phoenicia, one of whose medical formulæ is quoted by Galen.—4. Also a physician, and a pupil of Erasistratus in the third century B.C. (Diog. Laërt. v. 3, 61).

Strātōnicē (Στρατονίκη). 1. Wife of Antigonus, king of Asia, by whom she became the mother of Demetrius Poliorcetes (Plut. Demetr. 2). After the battle of Ipsus she fled to Salamis in Cyprus with her son Demetrius.—2. Daughter of Demetrius Poliorcetes and Phila, the daughter of Antipater. In 300, at which time she could not have been more than seventeen years of age, she was married to Seleucus, king of Syria. Notwithstanding the disparity of their ages, she lived in harmony with the old king for some years, when it was discovered that her stepson, Antiochus, was deeply enamoured of her, and Seleucus, in order to save the life of his son, which was endangered by the violence of his passion, gave up Stratonice in marriage to the young prince. She bore three children to Antiochus: (1) Antiochus II., surnamed Theos; (2) Apama, married to Magas, king of Cyrene; and (3) Stratonice. (Plut. Demetr. 31, 32, 38; App. Syr. 59).—3. Daughter of the preceding and of Antiochus I., was married to Demetrius II., king of Macedonia. She quitted Demetrius in disgust, on account of his second marriage with Phthia, the daughter of Olympias, and retired to Syria. Here she was put to death by her nephews Seleucus II., against whom she had attempted to raise a revolt. (Just. xxviii. 1).—4. Daughter of Antiochus II., king of Syria, married to Ariarathes III., king of Cappadocia (Diod. xxxi. p. 518).—5. One of the favourite wives of Mithridates the Great (App. Mithr. 107).

Strātōnicēa (Στρατονίκηια, Στρατονίκη: Στρατονικεύς, Stratoniceus, Stratonicensis: Eski-Hisar, Ru.), one of the chief inland cities of Caria, built by Antiochus I. Soter, who fortified it strongly, and named it in honour of his wife, Stratonice (Strab. p. 660). It stood E. of Mylasa and S. of Alabanda, near the river Marsyas, a S. tributary of the Maeander, and on the road from Alabanda to Idymus. It afterwards belonged to Rhodes (Liv. xxxiii. 18, 30). Under the Romans it was a free city; and it was improved by Hadrian, who called it Hadrianopolis (Steph. Byz. s. v.; Tac. Ann. iii. 62; Dio Cass. xlviii. 26). Near it stood the great temple of Zeus Chrysaoreus, the centre of the national worship of the Carians. There is some reason to believe that Stratonicea stood on the site of a former city, called Idrias and, still earlier, Chrysaoris. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἰδρίας.)

Stratōnis Turris. [CAESAREA, No. 3.]

Strattis (Στράτις or Στράτις), an Athenian poet of the Old Comedy, from B.C. 412 to 380, who parodied plays of Euripides (Ath. p. 551; Suid. s. v.).

Stratus (Στράτος). 1. (Στράτιος: Sourovigli near Lepanu), the chief town in Acarnania, ten stadia W. of the Achelous. Its territory was called Stratice. It was a strongly fortified town, and commanded the ford of the Achelous on the high road from Aetolia to Acarnania. (Strab. p. 450; Thuc. ii. 82, iii. 106; Xen. Hell. iv. 6.) Hence it was a place of military importance, and was at an early period taken possession of by the Aetolians (Pol. iv. 63; Liv. xxxvi. 11). There are remains of its walls and gates.—2. A town in Achaia, afterwards called Dyme.

Strombichides (Στρομβιχίδης), son of Diotimus, was an Athenian admiral on the coast of Asia B.C. 412. He recovered Lampsacus, which had revolted, in 411. He was put to death by the Thirty, because he opposed the policy of Theramenes in his dealings with Sparta. (Thuc. viii. 15, 30–40, 60–79; Lys. c. Agor. p. 180.)

Strongylē. [NAXOS.]

Strongylion (Στρογγυλίων), a distinguished Greek sculptor during the last thirty or forty years of the fifth century B.C. He was famous for his statues of oxen and horses. (Paus. ix. 30, 1.)

Strōphādes Insulae (Στροφάδες), formerly called Plōtae (Πλωταί: Strofadia and Strivali), two islands in the Ionian sea, off the coast of Messenia and S. of Zacynthus (Strab. p. 359; Verg. Aen. iii. 210). The Harpies were pursued to these islands by the sons of Boreas; and it was from the circumstance of the latter returning from these islands after the pursuit, that they are supposed to have obtained the name of Strophades. [HARPYIAE.]

Strōphius (Στρόφιος), king of Phocia, son of Crissus and Antiphatia, and husband of Cydragora, Anaxibia or Astyochia, by whom he became the father of Astydamia and Pylades. See ORESTES.

Strūchātes (Στρούχαιες), one of the six tribes of ancient Media (Hdt. i. 101).

Strymon (Struma, by the Turks Kara-Su), an important river in Macedonia, forming the boundary between that country and Thrace down to the time of Philip. It rose in Mt. Scomius, flowed first S. and then SE., passed through the lake Prasias, and, immediately S. of Amphipolis, fell into a bay of the Aegæan sea called after it Strymonicus Sinus (Hes. Th. 339; Aesch. Ag. 192; Hdt. vii. 75; Thuc. ii. 96; Strab. p. 323). The numerous cranes on its banks are frequently mentioned by ancient writers (Verg. Aen. x. 269; Juv. xiii. 167).

Strymonii (Στρυμόνιοι), the old name, according to Herodotus, of the Bithynians, who migrated into Asia Minor from the banks of the river Strymon. Bithynia was sometimes called Strymonis (Hdt. vii. 75).

Stubēra or Stymbara (Στύβερα, Στύμβαρα), a town of Macedonia in the district Paeonia, on the river Erigon (Strab. p. 327; Pol. xxviii. 8; Liv. xxxi. 39).

Stura (Stura), a river of N. Italy, which rises in the glaciers of the Levanna, and flows into the Po from the N. a few miles below Turin (Plin. iii. 118).

Stymphālides. [STYMPHALUS.]

Stymphālis (Στυμφαλίς). 1. A lake in Arcadia. [STYMPHALUS.]—2. A district in Macedonia, between Atintania and Elimiotis (Liv. xlv. 30).

Stymphālus (Στύμφαλος, Στύμφηλος: Στυμφάλιος), a town in the NE. of Arcadia. The territory of Stymphalus is a plain about six miles in length, bounded by Achaia on the N., Sicyonia and Phliasia on the E., the territory of Mantinea on the S. and that of Orchomenus and Pheneus on the W. This plain is shut in on all sides by mountains. On the N. rises the gigantic mass of Cyllene, from which a projecting spur, called Mt. Stymphalus, descends into the plain. (Στύμφαλος ὄρος, Ptol. iii. 16, § 14; Hesych. s. v.; 'nivalis Stymphalus,' Stat. Silv. iv. 6, 100.) The mountain at the southern end of the plain, opposite Cyllene, was called Apelaurum (τὸ Ἀπέλαυρον, Polyb. iv. 69), and at its foot is the katavothra or subterranean outlet of the lake of Stymphalus (ἡ Στυμφαλὶς λίμνη, Strab. viii. p. 371; ἡ Στυμφηλὴ λίμνη, Herod. vi. 76). This lake is formed partly by the rain-water descending from Cyllene and Apelaurum, and partly by three streams which flow into it from different parts of the plain, the waters of which have not sufficient outlet by the katavothra. It is now called Zaraka. The water which flows from it, after an underground course of twenty-two miles, appears again a few miles from Argos (where its ancient name was Erasinus), and now turns several mills belonging to that city. The district was one of military importance, since it commanded one of the chief roads from Arcadia to Argolis. Its name is said to have been derived from Stymphalus, a son of Elatus and grandson of Arcas (Paus. viii. 4, 4, viii. 22, i). It is mentioned by Homer (Il. ii. 608), and by Pindar (Ol. vi. 169). On the shores of the lake dwelt, according to tradition, the birds called Stymphālides (Στυμφαλίδες), destroyed by Heracles. [For details, see p. 397, b.] Stymphalus was one of the cities of the Achaean League (Pol. ii. 55, iv. 68). There are ruins extant of the polygonal walls of the citadel, and the foundations of two temples: one of these is probably the temple of Artemis, on which were sculptures of the birds (Paus. viii. 22, 5).

Styra (τὰ Στύρα: Στυρεὺς: Stura), a town in Euboea on the SW. coast, not far from Carystus, and nearly opposite Marathon in Attica. The inhabitants were originally Dryopes, though they subsequently denied their descent from this people (Il. ii. 539; Hdt. viii. 46; Paus. iv. 34, 11; Strab. p. 446). They took an active part in the Persian war, and fought at Artemisium, Salamis and Plataea. They afterwards became subject to the Athenians, and paid a yearly tribute of 1200 drachmae (Thuc. vii. 57). The town was destroyed in the Lamian war by the Athenian general Phaedrus; and its territory was annexed to Eretria (Strab. l.c.).

Styx (Στύξ), connected with the verb στυγέω, to hate or abhor, is the name of the principal river in the nether world, around which it flows seven times (Il. ii. 755, viii. 369, xiv. 271; Verg. Georg. iv. 480, Aen. vi. 439). Styx is described as a daughter of Oceanus and Tethys. As a nymph she dwelt at the entrance of Hades, in a lofty grotto which was supported by silver columns (Hes. Th. 361, 778). In the Iliad the Styx is the only river of the lower world, but in the Odyssey (x. 513), the Acheron is the chief river, into which Periphlegethon and Styx with its affluent Cocytus flow. Styx was regarded as flowing out of Oceanus (Hes. Th. 789). By Pallas Styx became the mother of Zelus (zeal), Nike (victory), Bia (strength), and Kratos (power). She was the first of all the immortals who took her children to Zeus to assist him against the Titans; and in return for this her children were allowed for ever to live with Zeus, and Styx herself became the divinity by whom the most solemn oaths were sworn. When one of the gods had to take an oath by Styx, Iris fetched a cup full of water from the Styx, and the god, while taking the oath, poured out the water. (Il. ii. 755, xiv. 271, Od. v. 185, xv. 37; Hes. Th. 775; Verg. Aen. vi. 324; Ov. Met. iii. 290.)

Styx (Στύξ: Mavra-neria), a river in the N. of Arcadia, near Nonacris, descending from a high rock, and falling into the Crathis. The description of the mythical Styx, as falling from a high rock (Il. viii. 369, xv. 37; Hes. Th. 785, 805), evidently suits this real stream, and the wild and gloomy character of its ravine led to the superstitious romance attached to it (Paus. viii. 17, 6; Hdt. vi. 74). It is a mere thread of water except when it is swelled by the melting snow. The ancients believed that the water of this river was poisonous; and according to one tale Alexander the Great was poisoned by it. It was said also to break all vessels made of glass, stone, metal and any other material except of the hoof of a horse or a mule (Arr. An. vii. 27; Plut. Alex. 77; Strab. p. 389; Ael. H.A. x. 40).

Suada, Suadela. [PITHO.]

Suāgēla (Σουάγελα), an ancient city of Caria, near Myndus, was the burial-place of the old kings of the country, and thence derived its name, the Carian word soûa signifying tomb, γέλας king (Steph. Byz. s.v.). Strabo calls it Syangela (p. 611).

Suāna (Sovana), a town of S. Etruria in the valley of the Arminia (Fiora) and about twenty miles W. of Volsinii (Bolsena). It was a municipium under the empire (Plin. iii. 52). There are numerous ancient rock-tombs in the valleys round the town.

Suasa (Suasanus: ruins near S. Lorenzo), a municipium in Umbria on the Sena.

Suastus, a river of India, an affluent of the COPHEN.

Subertum or Sudertum (Sudertanus: Sorano?), a town in the interior of Etruria (Liv. xxvi. 23).

Sublaquēum (Sublacensis: Subiaco), a place on the Anio near its source, where stood the celebrated villa of Claudius and Nero (Villa Sublacensis), from which was derived the name of the Via Sublacensis, a branch of the Via Tiburtina (Tac. Ann. xiv. 22). It derived its name from three lakes called Simbrivii Lacus or Simbruina Stagna, which have now disappeared (Plin. iii. 109; Frontin. Aquaed. 93). It is doubtful if in ancient times there was anything here which could be called a town, and the district was included in the territory of the Tibur. It was more celebrated in a later age as the cradle of the Benedictine order.

Sublicius Pons. [ROMA, p. 801, b.]

Subur. 1. A town of the Laetini in Hispania Tarraconensis, E. of Tarraco.—2. (Subu), a river in Mauretania Tingitana, flowing past the colony Banasa into the Atlantic Ocean (Ptol. ii. 6, 17).

Sübūra or Sūburra. [ROMA, p. 805, b.]

Subzupara (Zarvī), a town in Thrace on the road from Philippopolis to Hadrianopolis.

Succabar (Σουχάβαρι, Ptol.: Mazuna?), an inland city of Mauretania Caesariensis, SE. of the mouth of the Chinalaph. It was a colonia, and is mentioned by Ammianus Marcellinus under the name of 'oppidum Sugar-baritanum.' (Amm. Marc. xxix. 5).

Succi or Succorum Angustiae. [HAEMUS.]

Sucro. 1. (Xucar), a river in Hispania Tarraconensis, rising in a S. branch of Mt. Idubeda in the territory of the Celtiberi, and falling S. of Valentia into a gulf of the Mediterranean called after it Sinus Sucronensis (Gulf of Valencia). (Strab. pp. 158, 163, 167).—2. (Cullera), a town of the Edetani in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the preceding river, and between the Iberus and Carthago Nova (Strab. p. 158; Liv. xxviii. 24).

Sudertum. [SUBERTUM.]

Sudēti Montes, a range of mountains in the SE. of Germany, in which the ALBIS takes its rise.

Suebi. [SUEVI.]

Suel (Fuengirola), a town in Hispania Baetica on the road from Malaca to Gades (Ptol. ii. 4, 7).

Suessa Aurunca (Suessanus: Sessa), a town of the Aurunci in Latium, E. of the Via Appia, between Minturnae and Teanum, on the W. slope of Mons Massicus. It was situated in a beautiful district called Vescinus ager, whence it has been supposed that the town itself was at one time called Vescia. It was made a Roman colony in the Samnite wars, but must have been afterwards colonised afresh, since we find it called in inscriptions Col. Julia Felix (Liv. ix. 28; Vell. Pat. i. 14; Plin. iii. 64). It was the birthplace of the poet Lucilius (Juv. i. 20).

Suessa Pōmētīa (Suessanus, also called Pōmētīa simply, an ancient and important town of the Volsci in Latium, S. of Forum Appii, conquered by the Romans under Tarquinius Priscus, and taken a second time and sacked by the consul Servilius. (Liv. i. 53, ii. 25; Dionys. iv. 50; Tac. Hist. iii. 72; Verg. Aen. vi. 776.) It was one of the twenty-three cities situated in the plain afterwards covered by the Pomptine Marshes, which are said indeed to have derived their name from this town, which had ceased to exist in historical times (Fest. s.v. Pomptina).

Suessetāni, a people in Hispania Tarraconensis, mentioned in connexion with the Sedetani (Liv. xxv. 34, xxviii. 24).

Suessiōnes or Suessōnes, a powerful people in Gallia Belgica, who were reckoned the bravest of all the Belgic Gauls after the Bellovaci, and who could bring 50,000 men into the field in Caesar's time. Their king Divitiacus, shortly before Caesar's arrival in the country, was reckoned the most powerful chief in all Gaul, and had extended his sovereignty even over Britain. The Suessiones dwelt in an extensive and fertile country E. of the Bellovaci, S. of the Veromandui, and W. of the Remi. They possessed twelve towns, of which the capital was Noviodunum, subsequently Augusta Suessionum or Suessones (Soissons). (Caes. B. G. ii. 3, 12, vii. 75, viii. 6; Ptol. ii. 9, 11.)

Suessūla (Suessulanus: Torre di Sessola), a town in Samnium, on the S. slope of Mt. Tifata (Liv. iii. 37, xxiii. 14, 31, xxv. 7, xxvi. 9).

Suētōnīus Paulinus. [PAULINUS.]

C. Suētōnīus Tranquillus, the Roman historian, was born about the beginning of the reign of Vespasian (Suet. Ner. 57). His father was Suetonius Lenis, who was a tribune of the thirteenth legion in the battle of Bedriacum, in which Otho was defeated (Suet. Oth. 12). Suetonius practised as an advocate at Rome in the reign of Trajan. He lived on intimate terms with the younger Pliny, many of whose letters are addressed to him. (Plin. Ep. i. 18, 24, iii. 8, v. 10, ix. 34, ad Traj. 94.) At the request of Pliny, Trajan granted to Suetonius the jus trium liberorum, for though he was married he had not three children, which number was necessary to relieve him from various legal disabilities. Suetonius was afterwards appointed private secretary (Magister Epistolarum) to Hadrian, but was deprived of this office by the emperor, along with Septicius Clarus, the Praefect of the Praetorians, on the ground of his showing too little respect to Sabina, the emperor's wife (Spart. Had. 12). Suetonius wrote many works, of which those extant are:—Vitae Duodecim Caesarum, or the Twelve Emperors, of whom the first is C. Julius Caesar and the last is Domitian; Liber de illustribus Grammaticis; Liber de claris Rhetoribus; Vitae Terentii, Horatii, Lucani, Plinii Majoris. His chief work is his Lives of the Caesars. Suetonius does not follow the chronological order in his Lives, but he groups together many things of the same kind. His language is very brief and precise, sometimes obscure, without any affectation of ornament. He certainly tells a prodigious number of scandalous anecdotes about the Caesars, but though many were probably exaggerations, there is no reason to doubt that Suetonius himself believed them. As a great collection of facts of all kinds, the work on the Caesars is invaluable for the historian of this period. His judgment and his honesty have both been attacked by some modern critics, but on both grounds a careful study of his work will justify him. The treatise De illustribus Grammaticis, that De claris Rhetoribus, and the Lives above mentioned belonged to a series De Viris illustribus, which comprised the Lives of poets, orators, and historians. Among the lost works was one in several books called Prata (the name is a translation of λεῖμων = patchwork or flowery embroidery; cf. Gell. Praef. 6), which was a miscellany of information about antiquities, natural history, &c. It is likely that some of the works cited under separate titles by Suidas (e.g. the book about games, of which Tzetzes made a paraphrase, Hist. Var. vi. 874) were merely parts of this encyclopaedic work.—The best edition of Suetonius is by C. Roth, Leips. 1858: the edition of Burmann, Amsterd. 1736, is useful.

Suēvi or Suebi (Σούηβοι), one of the greatest and most powerful peoples of Germany, or, more properly speaking, the collective name of a great number of German tribes, who were grouped together. The Suevi are described by ancient writers as occupying the greater half of Germany; but the accounts vary respecting the part of the country which they inhabited, because the migrations of these tribes altered at various times their geographical limits. Caesar represents them as dwelling E. of the Ubii and Sugambri, and W. of the Cherusci, and their country as divided into 100 cantons.

Strabo makes them extend in an easterly direction beyond the Albis, and in a southerly as far as the sources of the Danube. Tacitus gives the name of Suebia to the whole of the E. of Germany from the Danube to the Baltic. The name, as used by the Romans, applied first, and especially, to the leading tribe, the Semnones, who dwelt between the Elbe and the Oder, and this may have been the home or centre from which the Suevi known to Caesar had for a time extended their settlements westward; but in the wider use of the name, when it referred, as it does in Tacitus, to all upper and central Germany, it included, besides the Semnones, the Rugii, the Varini, the Hermanduri, the Marcomanni, and the Quadi. (Caes. B. G. i. 37, 51, 54, iii. 7, iv. 1; Tac. Ann. i. 44, Germ. 38–45; Strab. p. 290.) At a later time the collective name of the Suevi gradually disappeared; and the different tribes of the Suevic race were each more usually called by their distinctive names. In the second half of the third century, however, we again find a people called Suevi, emigrants probably, or adventurers from the more eastern Suebia, dwelling between the mouth of the Main and the Black Forest, whose name is still preserved in the modern Suabia. (Amm. Marc. xvi. 10; Jordan. Get. 55.) As regards the relations of the Suevi to the Roman empire, there was no period at which more than a few of the tribes so designated were in any sense subject to Rome. In the first century the Suebian peoples of Bohemia and Moravia recognised the Roman power [see VANNIUS], but the Suebians of the Danube were always independent. [See also GERMANIA.]

Sufēnas, M. Nonius, tribune of the plebs in B.C. 56, fought on Pompey's side at the battle of Pharsalia (Cic. ad Att. iv. 15, vi. 1, viii. 15).

Sufes (Sbiba), a city of N. Africa, in the Carthaginian territory (Byzacena).

Sufetūla (Sbitla), a city of Byzacena, S. of Sufes, of which its name is a diminutive. It became, however, a much more important place, as a chief centre of the roads in the interior of the province of Africa. Its ruins are magnificent.

Sugambri, Sygambri, Sigambri, Sycambri, or Sicambri, one of the most powerful peoples of Germany at an early time, belonged to the Istaevoones, and dwelt originally N. of the Ubii, on the Rhine, from whence they spread towards the N. as far as the Lippe. The Sugambri are mentioned by Caesar, who invaded their territory. (Caes. B. G. iv. 16, vi. 35.) They are described as warlike people (Hor. Od. iv. 2, 36, iv. 14, 51). They were conquered by Tiberius in the reign of Augustus, and a large number of them were transplanted to Gaul, where they received settlements between the Maas and the Rhine as Roman subjects. The portion of the Sugambri who remained in Germany withdrew further S., probably to the mountainous country in the neighbourhood of the Tannus. (Tac. Ann. ii. 26, iv. 47, xii. 39; Dio Cass. liv. 20–36.) Shortly afterwards they disappear from history, and are not mentioned again till the time of Ptolemy, who places them much further N., close to the Bructeri and the Langobardi, somewhere between the Vecht and the Yssel (Ptol. ii. 11, 8). At a still later period we find them forming an important part of the confederacy known under the name of Franci.

Sūidas (Σουίδας), a Greek lexicographer, of whom nothing is known. No certain conclusions as to the age of the compiler can be derived from passages in the work, since it may have received numerous interpolations and additions; but it is probable that he lived in either the tenth or the eleventh century A.D. He is quoted by Eustathius, who lived about the end of the twelfth century. The Lexicon of Suidas is a dictionary of words arranged in alphabetical order, with some few peculiarities of arrangement; but it contains both words which are found in dictionaries of languages and also names of persons and places, with extracts from ancient Greek writers, grammarians, scholiasts, and lexicographers, and some extracts from later Greek writers. The plan of this work is not well conceived: it is incomplete as to the number of articles, and exceedingly irregular and unequal in the execution. Some articles give full information; others scarcely any. As to the biographical notices, it has been conjectured that Suidas or the compiler got them all from one source, which, it is further supposed, may be the Onomatologos or Pinax of Hesychius of Miletus. The Lexicon, though without merit as to its execution, is extremely valuable both for the literary history of antiquity, for the explanation of words, and for the citations from many ancient writers. The best editions of the Lexicon are by Küster, Cambridge, 1705; by Gaisford, Oxford, 1834; and by Bernhardt, Halle, 1834: text by Bekker, 1854.

Suiones, the general name of all the German tribes inhabiting Scandinavia. [SCANDIA.]

Sulci (Sulcitanus: S. Antioco), an ancient town in Sardinia, founded by the Carthaginians, and a place of considerable maritime and commercial importance (Paus. x. 17, 9; Claudian, B. Gild. 518; Strab. p. 225; Zonar. viii. 12). It was situated on a promontory on the SW. corner of the island, and the neighbouring district of the mainland is still called Sulcis.

Sulgas (Sorgue), a river in Gaul, descending from the Alps, and flowing into the Rhone near Vindalun (Strab. pp. 185, 191).

Sulla, Cornēlius, the name of a patrician family. This family was originally called Rufinus [RUFINUS], and the first member of it who obtained the name of Sulla was P. Cornelius Sulla, mentioned below [No. 1]. The origin of the name is uncertain. Some writers suppose that it is a word of the same signification as Rufus or Rufinus, and refers simply to the red colour of the hair or the complexion; but it has been conjectured with greater probability that it is a diminutive of Sura, which was a cognomen in several Roman gentes. There is no authority for writing the word Sylla, as is done by many modern writers. 1. P., great-grandfather of the dictator Sulla, and grandson of P. Cornelius Rufinus, who was twice consul in the Samnite wars. [RUFINUS, CORNELIUS.] His father is not mentioned. He was flamen dialis, and likewise praetor urbanus in B.C. 212, when he presided over the first celebration of the Ludi Apollinares (Liv. xxv. 2, 12). —2. P., son of No. 1, and grandfather of the dictator Sulla, was praetor in 186 (Liv. xxxix. 6). —3. L., son of No. 2, and father of the dictator Sulla, lived in obscurity, and left his son only a slender fortune (Plut. Sull. i.). —4. L. surnamed Felix, the dictator, was born in 138. Although his father left him only a small property, his means were sufficient to secure for him a good education. He studied Greek and Roman literature with diligence and success, and appears early to have imbibed that love for literature and art by which he was distinguished throughout life. At the same time he prosecuted pleasure with equal ardour, and his youth, as well as his manhood, was disgraced by the most sensual vices. Still his love of pleasure did not absorb all his time, nor did it enervate his mind; for no Roman during the latter days of the republic, with the exception of Julius Caesar, had a clearer judgment, a keener discrimination of character, or a firmer will. The slender property of Sulla was increased by the liberality of his stepmother and of a courtesan named Nicopolis, both of whom left him all their fortune. His means, though still scanty for a Roman noble, now enabled him to aspire to the honours of the state. He was quaestor in 107, when he served under Marius in Africa. Hitherto he had only been known for his profligacy; but he displayed zeal and ability in the discharge of his duties, and gained the approbation of his commander and the affections of the soldiers. It was to Sulla that Jugurtha was delivered by Bocchus; and the quaestor thus shared with the consul the glory of bringing this war to a conclusion. Sulla himself was so proud of his share in the success, that he had a seal-ring engraved representing the surrender of Jugurtha, which he continued to wear till the day of his death. Sulla continued to serve under Marius with great distinction in the campaigns against the Cimbri and Teutones; but Marius becoming jealous of the rising fame of his officer, Sulla left Marius in 102, and took a command under the colleague of Marius, Q. Catulus, who entrusted the chief management of the war to Sulla. Sulla now returned to Rome, where he appears to have lived quietly for some years. He was praetor in 93, and in the following year (92) was sent as propraetor into Cilicia, with special orders from the senate to restore Ariobarzanes to his kingdom of Cappadocia, from which he had been expelled by Mithridates. Sulla met with complete success. He defeated Gordius, the general of Mithridates, in Cappadocia, and placed Ariobarzanes on the throne. The enmity between Marius and Sulla now assumed a more deadly form. Sulla's ability and increasing reputation had already led the aristocratical party to look up to him as one of their leaders; and thus political animosity was added to private hatred. In addition to this, Marius and Sulla were both anxious to obtain the command of the impending war against Mithridates; and the success which attended Sulla's recent operations in the East had increased his popularity, and pointed him out as the most suitable person for this important command. About this time Bocchus dedicated in the Capitol gilded figures representing the surrender of Jugurtha to Sulla, at which Marius was so enraged that he could scarcely be prevented from removing them by force. The exasperation of both parties became so violent that they nearly had recourse to arms against each other; but the breaking out of the Social war hushed all private quarrels for the time. Marius and Sulla both took an active part in the war against the common foe. But Marius was now advanced in years; and he had the deep mortification of finding that his achievements were thrown into the shade by the superior energy of his rival. Sulla gained some brilliant victories over the enemy, and took Bovianum, the chief town of the Samnites. He was elected consul for 88, and received from the senate the command of the Mithridatic war. The events which followed—his expulsion from Rome by Marius, his return to the city at the head of his legions, and the proscription of Marius and his leading adherents—are related in the Life of Marius. Sulla remained at Rome till the end of the year, and set out for Greece at the beginning of 87, in order to carry on the war against Mithridates. He landed at Dyrrhachium, and forthwith marched against Athens, which had become the head-quarters of the Mithridatic cause in Greece. After a long and obstinate siege, Athens was taken by storm on March 1, 86, and was given up to rapine and plunder. Sulla then marched against Archelaus, the general of Mithridates, whom he defeated in the neighbourhood of Chaeronea in Boeotia; and in the following year he again gained a decisive victory over the same general near Orchomenus. But while Sulla was carrying on the war with such success in Greece, his enemies had obtained the upper hand in Italy. The consul Cinna, who had been driven out of Rome by his colleague Octavius, soon after Sulla's departure from Italy, had entered it again with Marius at the close of the year. Both Cinna and Marius were appointed consuls 86, and all the regulations of Sulla were swept away. Sulla, however, would not return to Italy till he had brought the war against Mithridates to a conclusion. After driving the generals of Mithridates out of Greece, Sulla crossed the Hellespont, and early in 84 concluded a peace with the king of Pontus. He now turned his arms against Fimbria, who had been appointed by the Marian party as his successor in the command. But the troops of Fimbria deserted their general, who put an end to his own life. Sulla now prepared to return to Italy. After leaving his legate, L. Licinius Murena, in command of the province of Asia, with two legions, he set sail with his own army to Athens. While preparing for his deadly struggle in Italy, he did not lose his interest in literature. He carried with him from Athens to Rome the valuable library of Apellicon of Teos, which contained most of the works of Aristotle and Theophrastus [APELLICON]. He landed at Brundisium with 40,000 soldiers in the spring of 83. The Marian party outnumbered him in troops, and had every prospect of victory; but Cinna had been murdered the year before, and Carbo, the oldest survivor of the Marian party, was in Cisalpine Gaul. Two consular armies opposed Sulla in S. Italy, but he routed one under Norbanus at Capua, and induced the troops of the other consul, Scipio, to desert the Marian cause and join his standard. In like manner by bribes or promises he persuaded many of the Italian towns to espouse his cause. In the field his efforts were crowned by equal success, and he was ably supported by several of the Roman nobles, who espoused his cause in different parts of Italy. Of these one of the most distinguished was the young Cn. Pompey, who was at the time only twenty-three years of age. [POMPEIUS, No. 10.] Sulla wintered in Campania, and in the following year (82) the struggle was brought to a close by the decisive victory which he gained over the Samnites and Lucanians under Pontius Telesinus before the Colline gate of Rome. This victory was followed by the surrender of Praeneste and the death of the younger Marius, who had taken refuge in this town. In N. Italy his lieutenants, Metellus, C. Pompeius and Crassus, had been equally successful, and the surviving leaders of the opposite party had quitted Italy in despair. Sulla was now master of Rome and Italy; and he resolved to take the most ample vengeance upon his enemies, and to extirpate the popular party. One of his first acts was to draw up a list of his enemies who were to be put to death, called a Proscriptio. It was the first instance of the kind in Roman history. All persons in this list were outlaws who might be killed by anyone with impunity, even by slaves; their property was confiscated to the state, and was to be sold by public auction; their children and grandchildren lost their votes in the comitia, and were excluded from all public offices. Further, all who killed a proscribed person, received two talents as a reward, and whoever sheltered such a person was punished with death. Terror now reigned, not only at Rome, but throughout Italy. Fresh lists of the proscribed constantly appeared. No one was safe, for Sulla gratified his friends by placing in the fatal lists their personal enemies, or persons whose property was coveted by his adherents. The confiscated property, it is true, belonged to the state, and had to be sold by public auction, but the friends and dependents of Sulla purchased it at a nominal price, as no one dared to bid against them. The number of persons who perished by the proscriptions is stated differently, but it appears to have amounted to many thousands. The acts of severity and injustice then perpetrated continued long afterwards to bear fruit in civil strife and violence, since bands of discontented men were always ready to follow any unprincipled agitator. At the commencement of these horrors Sulla had been appointed dictator for as long a time as he judged to be necessary. This was towards the close of 82. Sulla's chief object in being invested with the dictatorship was to carry into execution in a legal manner the great reforms which he meditated in the constitution and in the administration of justice. He had no intention of abolishing the republic, and consequently he caused consuls to be elected for the following year, and was elected to the office himself in 80, while he continued to hold the dictatorship. At the beginning of 81, he celebrated a splendid triumph on account of his victory over Mithridates. In a speech which he delivered to the people at the close of the ceremony, he claimed for himself the surname of Felix, as he attributed his success in life to the favour of the gods. The general object of Sulla's reforms was to restore, as far as possible, the ancient Roman constitution, and to give back to the senate and the aristocracy the power which they had lost. He enacted that the Senatus auctoritas should be necessary for proposals in the popular assembly; he limited the effect of the tribune's intercessio to the right of protecting plebeians, so that they could no longer interfere with legislation; and he made it illegal for anyone who had been a tribune to proceed to any other office in the state. He restored to the senate the sole right of sitting as judges, which had been granted before to the equestrian order, and in other ways he strengthened the senatorial power. Thus by increasing the number of praetors (eight instead of six), which was rendered necessary by his alterations in the law-courts, he rendered each great officer less powerful and more dependent on the senate; and the same result followed from the increase in the number of quaestors, though no doubt the larger number (20) was required by the extended provincial government. His reforms in criminal jurisdiction were the wisest and the only enduring part of his constitution. He so largely extended as practically to reconstitute the system of permanent courts for the trial of particular offences (quaestiones perpetuae), in which courts the praetors presided, or, if their number was insufficient, a judex quaestionis. In order to strengthen his power, Sulla established military colonies throughout Italy. The inhabitants of the Italian towns which had fought against Sulla were deprived of the full Roman franchise, and were only allowed to retain the commercium; their land was confiscated and given to the soldiers who had fought under him. Twenty-three legions, or, according to another statement, forty-seven legions received grants of land in various parts of Italy. A great number of these colonies was settled in Etruria, the population of which was thus almost entirely changed. These colonies had the strongest interest in upholding the institutions of Sulla, since any attempt to invalidate the latter would have endangered their newly acquired possessions. Sulla likewise created at Rome a kind of body-guard for his protection by giving the citizenship to a great number of slaves who had belonged to persons proscribed by him. The slaves thus rewarded are said to have been as many as 10,000, and were called Corneli after him as their patron. After holding the dictatorship till the beginning of 79, Sulla resigned this office, to the surprise of all classes. He retired to his estate at Puteoli, and there, surrounded by the beauties of nature and art, he passed the remainder of his life in those literary and sensual enjoyments in which he had always taken so much pleasure. He died in 78 in the sixtieth year of his age. He was honoured with a public funeral, and a monument was erected to him in the Campus Martius the inscription on which had been composed by himself. It stated that none of his friends ever did him a kindness, and none of his enemies a wrong, without being fully repaid.—Sulla was married five times: (1) to Ilia or Julia, who bore him a daughter, married to Q. Pompeius Rufus, the son of Sulla's colleague in the consulship in 88; (2) to Aelia; (3) to Coelia; (4) to Caecilia Metella, who bore him a son, who died before Sulla, and likewise twins, a son and a daughter; (5) Valeria, who bore him a daughter after his death. (For the Life of Sulla see Plutarch's Sulla and the references in Indices to Cicero and Sallust.) Sulla wrote a history of his own life and times, called Commentarii Rerum Gestarum or Ἱστορίαι (Plut. Sull. 37, Lucull. 1; Suet. Gramm. 12; Cic. Div. i. 172). It was dedicated to L. Lucullus, and extended to twenty-two books, the last of which was finished by Sulla a few days before his death. The Greek Anthology contains a short epigram on Aphrodite which is ascribed to him (App. B. C. i. 97).—5. Faustus, son of the dictator by his fourth wife, Caecilia Metella, and a twin brother of Fausta, was born not long before 88, the year in which his father obtained his first consulship. He and his sister received the names of Faustus and Fausta respectively on account of the good fortune of their father. (Plut. Sull. 22, 34, 37.) At the death of his father in 78, Faustus and his sister were left under the guardianship of L. Lucullus. Faustus accompanied Pompey into Asia, and was the first who mounted the walls of the Temple of Jerusalem, in 63 (Jos. Ant. xiv. 4, 4, B. J. i. 7, 4). In 60 he exhibited the gladiatorial games which his father in his last will had enjoined upon him. In 54 he was quaestor. In 52 he received from the senate the commission to rebuild the Curia, which had been burnt down in the tumults following the murder of Clodius. He married Pompey's daughter, and sided with his father-in-law in the Civil war. He was present at the battle of Pharsalia, and subsequently joined the leaders of his party in Africa. After the battle of Thapsus in 46, he attempted to escape into Mauretania, but was taken prisoner by P. Sittius, and carried to Caesar. Upon his arrival in Caesar's camp he was murdered by the soldiers in a tumult. Faustus seems only to have resembled his father in his extravagance. We know from Cicero that he was overwhelmed with debt at the breaking out of the Civil war. (Caes. B. C. i. 6; Bell. Afr. 87, 95; App. B. C. ii. 100).—6. P., nephew of the dictator, was elected consul along with P. Autronius Paetus for the year 65, but neither he nor his colleague entered upon the office, as they were accused of bribery by L. Torquatus the younger, and were condemned. It was currently believed that Sulla was privy to both of Catiline's conspiracies, and he was accordingly accused of this crime by his former accuser, L. Torquatus, and by C. Cornelius. He was defended by Hortensius and Cicero, and the speech of the latter on his behalf is still extant. He was acquitted; but, independent of the testimony of Sallust (Cat. 17), his guilt may almost be inferred from the embarrassment of his advocate. In the Civil war Sulla espoused Caesar's cause. He served under him as legate in Greece, and commanded along with Caesar himself the right wing at the battle of Pharsalia (48). He died in 45. (Cic. pro Sulla, ad Fam. ix. 10, x. 17, ad Att. xi. 21, 22; Caes. B. C. iii. 51, 89; App. B. C. ii. 76).—7. Serv., brother of No. 6, took part in both of Catiline's conspiracies. His guilt was so evident that no one was willing to defend him; but we do not read that he was put to death along with the other conspirators. (Sall. Cat. 17, 47; Cic. pro Sull. 2.)

Sulmo (Sulmonensis; Sulmona), a town of the Paeligni, seven miles S. of Corfinium (Caes. B. C. i. 18), and ninety miles from Rome (Ov. Trist. iv. 10, 4), on the road to Capua. It stood in the upland valley of the Gizio, where some smaller streams join that river. The district of the Paeligni was very cold in winter (Hor. Od. iii. 19, 8): hence we find the town called by the poets gelidus Sulmo. It is celebrated as the birthplace of Ovid (Ov. Fast. iv. 81, Am. ii. 16; Sil. It. viii. 511). It was destroyed by Sulla (Flor. lil. 21) but was afterwards restored, and is mentioned as a Roman colony.

Sulpicia, a Roman poetess who flourished towards the close of the first century A.D., celebrated for sundry amatory effusions, addressed to her husband Calenus. Their general character may be gathered from the expressions of Martial and Sidonius Apollinaris, by whom they are noticed (Mart. x. 35, 38; Sidon. ix. 262). There is extant a satirical poem, in seventy hexameters, on the edict of Domitian, by which philosophers were banished from Rome and from Italy, which is written in the character of Sulpicia, but is evidently the work of a later period brought out under her name. It is generally appended to the editions of Juvenal and Persius, and is included in Wernsdorf's Poët. Lat. Min.

Sulpicia Gens, was one of the most ancient Roman gentes, and produced a succession of distinguished men from the foundation of the republic to the imperial period. The chief families of the Sulpicii during the republican period bore the names of CAMERINUS, GALBA, GALLUS, RUFUS (given below), SAVERRIO.

Sulpicius Apollināris, a teacher of A. Gellius, was a grammarian (Gell. iv. 17). He wrote epistles on learned subjects and the metrical Arguments to the plays of Terence and to the Aeneid, and it is possible that the Arguments to the plays of Plautus may also be by his hand. His Arguments to the twelve books of the Aeneid (six lines to each book) are printed in Wernsdorf's Poët. Lat. Min.

Sulpicius Rufus. 1. P., one of the most distinguished orators of his time, was born B.C. 124. He entered public life as a supporter of the aristocratical party, and acquired great influence in the state by his splendid talents, while he was still young. In 93 he was quaestor, and in 89 he served as legate of the consul Cn. Pompeius Strabo in the Marsic war. In 88, he was elected to the tribunate, but he deserted the aristocratical party, and joined Marius. The causes of this sudden change are not expressly stated, but we are told that he was overwhelmed with debt, and there can be little doubt that he was bought by Marius. Sulpicius brought forward a law in favour of Marius and his party, of which an account is given under MARIUS. When Sulla marched upon Rome at the head of his army, Marius and Sulpicius took to flight. Marius succeeded in making his escape to Africa, but Sulpicius was discovered in a villa, and put to death. (App. B. C. i. 58, 60; Plut. Sull. 10; Vell. Pat. ii. 18; Cic. de Or. iii. 3, Brut. 68, 203.)—2. P., probably son or grandson of the last, was one of Caesar's legates in Gaul and in the Civil war. He was praetor in 48. Cicero addresses him in 45 as imperator. It appears that he was at that time in Illyricum, along with Vatinius. (Caes. B. G. iv. 22, B. C. i. 74, iii. 101; Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 77.)—3. Ser., with the surname Lemonia, indicating the tribe to which he belonged, was a contemporary and friend of Cicero, and of about the same age (Cic. Brut. 40, 150). He first devoted himself to oratory, and he studied this art with Cicero in his youth. He afterwards studied law, and he became one of the best jurists as well as most eloquent orators of his age. He was quaestor of the district of Ostia, in 74; curule aedile 69; praetor 65; and consul 51 with M. Claudius Marcellus. He appears to have espoused Caesar's side in the Civil war, and was appointed, about 46, by Caesar proconsul of Achaia (Cic. ad Fam. iv. 3). He died in 48 in the camp of M. Antony, having been sent by the senate on a mission to Antony, who was besieging Dec. Brutus in Mutina. Sulpicius wrote a great number of legal works. He is often cited by the jurists whose writings are excerpted in the Digest; but there is no excerpt directly from him. He had numerous pupils, the most distinguished of whom were A. Oflus and Alfenus Varus. There are extant in the collection of Cicero's Epistles two letters from Sulpicius to Cicero, one of which (iv. 5) is the well-known letter of consolation on the death of Tullia, the daughter of the orator; the other (iv. 12) gives an admirable account of the death of Marcellus. The same book contains several letters from Cicero to Sulpicius. He is also said to have written some erotic poetry (Plin. Ep. v. 3, 5; Ov. Trist. ii. 441).—Sulpicius left a son, Servius, who is frequently mentioned in Cicero's correspondence.

Summānus, an ancient Roman or Sabine divinity, who may be regarded as the Jupiter of the night; for as Jupiter was the god of heaven in the bright day, so Summanus was the god of the nocturnal heaven, and hurled his thunderbolts during the night (Varro, L. L. v. 74). Summanus had a temple at Rome near the Circus Maximus (Ov. Fast. vi. 725; Liv. xxxii. 29; Plin. xxix. 57), and there was a representation of him in the pediment of the Capitoline temple (Cic. Div. i. 10; Liv. Ep. 14).

Sūnium (Σουνίον: Σουνίος: C. Colonnī), a promontory forming the S. extremity of Attica, with a town of the same name upon it (Od. iii. 278; Soph. Aj. 1235; Paus. i. 1, 1). The promontory falls on three sides perpendicularly 200 feet to the sea, and on it, at the highest part of the promontory, was a splendid temple of Athene, fully 300 feet above the sea, eleven columns of which are still extant, and have given the modern name to the cape. It was fortified by the Athenians in the Peloponnesian war (Thuc. viii. 4), and remains of the ancient walls, with the temple of Athene, are still extant. There is also a marble platform or terrace, which some take to be part of a propylaeum, others to be the base of the altar of Poseidon (cf. Aristoph. Av. 869, Eq. 557).

Sunonensis Lacus (L. Sabanjah), a lake in Bithynia, between the Ascania Palus and the river Sangarius, near Nicomedia (Amm. Marc. xxvi. 8).

Sūperbus, Tarquiniūs. [TARQUINIUS.]

Sura, Lentūlus. [LENTULUS, No. 9.]

Sūra, L. Liciniūs, an intimate friend of Trajan, and three times consul, in A.D. 98, 102 and 107. On the death of Sura, Trajan honoured him with a public funeral, and erected baths to perpetuate his memory. Two of Pliny's letters are addressed to him. (Dio Cass. lxxviii. 9, 15; Plin. Ep. iv. 30, vii. 27.)

Sūra (Σούρα: Surie), a town of Syria, in the district Chalybonitis, on the Euphrates, a little W. of Thapsacus (Ptol. v. 15, 25).—2. (Sour) a branch of the Mosella, above Trèves (Auson. Mosell. 354).

Surani or Suarni (Σουρανοί), a people of Sarmatia Asiatica, near the Portae Caucasiae and the river Rha. Their country contained many gold mines. (Ptol. v. 9, 20; Plin. vi. 30.)

Surenas, the general of the Parthians who defeated Crassus in B.C. 54. [CRASSUS.]

Sūrius (Σούριος), a tributary of the Phasis in Colchis, the water of which had the power of forming petrifications (Plin. ii. 226, vi. 13). At its confluence with the Phasis stood a town named Surium (Σούριον). The plain through which it flows is still called Suram.

Surrentini Colles. [SURRENTUM.]

Surrentum (Surrentinus: Sorrento), an ancient town of Campania, opposite Capreae, and situated about seven miles from the promontory (Prom. Minervae) separating the Sinus Paestanus from the Sinus Puteolanus. It was subsequently a Roman colony. The temple of the Sirens which was supposed (probably erroneously) to have given the name to the town, stood near it; and on the hills (Surrentini Colles) in its neighbourhood was produced one of the best wines in Italy, which was strongly recommended to convalescents, on account of its thinness and wholesomeness. (Strab. p. 247; Plin. iii. 62.) Statius describes the villa which his friend Pollius Felix had there (Silv. ii. 2), of which considerable remains exist.

Sūsa, gen. -orum (τὰ Σούσα: O. T. Shushan: Σούσιος, Susiānus: Sus, Ru.), the winter residence of the Persian kings, stood in the district Cissia of the province Susiana, on the E. bank of the river Choaspes or Eulaeus (the modern Kerkhah), and between that river and the Pasitigris. Some, with less probability, believe that the Eulaeus is the river to the E. of Susa and is the Pasitigris or a branch of it. The position of the city at any rate on the E. of the modern Kerkhah is placed beyond doubt by the remains which have been discovered. Its name was said to be derived from a word signifying lily, because that flower abounded in the neighbouring plain (Athen. p. 513; Steph. Byz. s.v.). Susa was of a quadrangular form, fifteen miles in circuit, and without fortifications; but it had a strongly fortified citadel, containing the palace and treasury of the Persian kings (Strab. p. 728; Arr. An. vii. 7; Diod. xix. 18; Plin. vi. 133; cf. Hdt. i. 188; Aesch. Pers. 535). The Greek name of this citadel, Memnonice or Memnonium (Hdt. v. 54), is perhaps a corruption of a native name, whence may have arisen the idea of connecting the place with the myth of Memnon [see p. 546, b] and asserting that Tithonus founded the city. It is also possible that the citadel may have been built for Cyrus by some Memnon (Cassiod. vii. 15). The climate of Susa was very hot, and hence the choice of it for the winter palace. It was here that Alexander and his generals celebrated their nuptials with the Persian princesses, B.C. 325 (Curt. vii. 4, 5). The ruins of the huge palaces of Darius and Xerxes, which were first excavated in 1852, preserve the ancient name.

Sūsārion (Σουσαρίων), to whom the origin of the Attic Comedy is ascribed, was a native of Megara, whence he removed into Attica, to the village of Icaria, a place celebrated as a seat of the worship of Dionysus (Plut. Sol. 10; C. I. A. ii. p. 301; cf. Arist. Poët. 3, 5; Athen. p. 40, b). This account agrees with the claim which the Megarians asserted to the invention of Comedy, and which was generally admitted. Before the time of Susarion there was, no doubt, practised, at Icaria and the other Attic villages, that extempore jesting and buffoonery which formed a marked feature of the festivals of Dionysus; but Susarion was the first who so regulated this species of amusement, by developing the dialogue of the comic chorus and a single actor into a kind of short farce, as to lay the foundation of Comedy, properly so called. The Megaric Comedy appears to have flourished, in its full development, soon after B.C. 600; and it was introduced by Susarion into Attica between 580-564. [See Dict. of Ant. art. COMOEDIA.]

Susiāna, -ē, or Sūsis (ἡ Σουσιανή, ἡ Σουσίς: nearly corresponding to Khuzistan), one of the chief provinces of the ancient Persian empire, lay between Babylonia and Persis, and between M. Parachoatras and the head of the Persian Gulf. It was an alluvial plain formed by the rivers Choaspes (Kerkhah) and Pasitigris (Karun). On the Persian Gulf its coast extended from the junction of the Euphrates with the Tigris, to about the mouth of the river Oroatis (Tab). (Strab. p. 729; Ptol. vi. 3, 1.) It was divided from Persis on the SE. and E. by a mountainous tract (Montes Uxii), inhabited by independent tribes, who made even the kings of Persia pay them for a safe passage. The chief pass through these mountains was called Susides or Persides Portae (Σουσιδῆς πόλαι, αἱ πόλαι αἱ Περσίδες, Σουσιδῆς πύλαι: Polyæn. iv. 3, 27). On the N. it was separated from Great Media by the range of Mt. Orontes (Elwend), which contained the sources of the Copratas, and of one branch of the Choaspes. On the W. it was divided from Assyria by the range of Mt. Zagros, in which were the sources of some affluents of the Choaspes, and by an imaginary line drawn S. from the end of that range to the Tigris; and from Babylonia by the Tigris itself. The country was mountainous and cool in the N., and low and very hot in the S.; and the coast along the Persian Gulf was marshy. The mountains were inhabited by various wild and independent tribes; and the plains by a quiet agricultural people, of the Semitic race, called Susii or Susiani.

Sutrium (Sutrinus: Sutri), an ancient town of Etruria, on the E. side of the Saltus Ciminus, and on the road from Vulturni to Rome, from which it was distant thirty-two miles. It was taken by the Romans at an early period; and in B.C. 383, or seven years after the capture of Rome by the Gauls, it was made a Roman colony. (Liv. vi. 3; Diod. xiv. 117; Vell. Pat. i. 14.) It was celebrated for its fidelity to Rome, and was in consequence besieged several times by the Etruscans (Liv. ix. 32, x. 14). On one occasion it was obliged to surrender to the Etruscans, but was retaken by Camillus in the same day, whence arose the proverb ire Sutrium (Liv. vi. 3; Plaut. Casin. iii. 1, 10). There are still remains of the walls and tombs of the ancient town, and of an amphitheatre of Roman work.

Syagrus (Σάγρος ἄκρα: Ras Fartak), a promontory on the SE. of Arabia, near Moscha (Ptol. vi. 7, 11). Its importance lay in its being the point where land was quitted on the voyage to India (Peripl. 30; Plin. vi. 100).

Sybaris (Σύβαρις). 1. (Coscile or Sibari), a river in Lucania, flowing by the city of the same name, and falling into the Crathis. It was said to have derived its name from the fountain Sybaris, near Bura, in Achaia. (Strab. p. 386.)

—2. (Συβαρίτης, Sybarita), a celebrated Greek town in Lucania, was situated between the rivers Sybaris and Crathis at a short distance from the Tarentine gulf, and near the confines of Bruttium (Strab. p. 263; Diod. xii. 9; Scymn. p. 360). It was founded B.C. 720 by Achaeans and Troezenians, and soon attained an extraordinary degree of prosperity and wealth. It carried on an extensive commerce with Asia Minor and other countries on the Mediterranean, and its inhabitants became so notorious for their love of luxury and pleasure, that their name was employed to indicate any voluptuary. (Athen. pp. 518-521; Hdt. vi. 127; Suid. s.v.) At the time of their highest prosperity their city was fifty stadia, or nearly six miles, in circumference, and they exercised dominion over twenty-five towns, so that we are told they were able to bring into the field 300,000 men, a number, however, which is obviously incredible (Strab. l.c.). But their prosperity was of short duration. The Achaeans having expelled the Troezenian part of the population, the latter took refuge at the neighbouring city of Croton, the inhabitants of which espoused their cause. In the war which ensued between the two states, the Sybarites were completely conquered by the Crotoniates, who followed up their victory by the capture of Sybaris, which they destroyed by turning the waters of the river Crathis against the town, B.C. 510 (Diod. xii. 9; Hdt. v. 44; Athen. p. 521; Scymn. pp. 337-360; Strab. l.c.). The greater number of the surviving Sybarites took refuge in other Greek cities in Italy; but a few remained near their ancient town, and their descendants formed part of the population of Thurii, which was founded in 443 near Sybaris. [THURII.]

Sybōta (τὰ Σύβοτα: Συβότιος: Syvota), a number of small islands off the coast of Epirus, and opposite the promontory Leucimne in Corcyra, with a harbour of the same name on the main land. It was here that a naval battle was fought between the Corcyraeans and Corinthians, B.C. 432, just before the commencement of the Peloponnesian war. (Thuc. i. 47-54, iii. 76; Strab. p. 324.)

Sychaeus or Sichaeus, also called Acerbas. [ACERBAS.]

Syēnē (Συήνη: Συηνίτης and Συηνήτης, Syenites: Assouan, Ru.), a city of Upper Egypt, on the E. bank of the Nile, just below the First Cataract. It was the S. frontier city of Egypt towards Aethiopia, and under the Romans it was kept by a garrison of three cohorts. From its neighbourhood was obtained the fine red granite called Syenites lapis. It was also an important point in the astronomy and geography of the ancients, as it lay just under the tropic of Cancer, and was therefore chosen as the place through which they drew their chief parallel of latitude. The sun was vertical to Syene at the time of the summer solstice, and a well was shown in which the reflection of the sun was then seen at noon; or, as the rhetorician Aristides expresses it, the disc of the sun covered the well as a vessel is covered by its lid. (Hdt. ii. 30; Strab. pp. 133, 317, 797; Plin. xxxvi. 13; Ptol. v. 5, 15, viii. 15, 15.)

Syennēsis (Συέννεσις), a common name of the kings of Cilicia. Of these the most important are:—1. A king of Cilicia who joined with Labynetis in mediating between Cyaxares and Alyattes, the kings respectively of Media and Lydia, probably in B.C. 610 (Hdt. i. 74).—2. Contemporary with Darius Hystaspis, to whom he was tributary. His daughter was married to Pixodarus (Hdt. iii. 90, v. 118).—3. Contemporary with Artaxerxes II. (Mnemon), ruled over Cilicia, when the younger Cyrus marched through his country in his expedition against his brother Artaxerxes (Xen. An. i. 2, 21-27, vii. 8, 25, Hell. iii. 1; Diod. xiv. 20).

Sygambri. [SUGAMBRI.]

Sylla. [SULLA.]

Syllium (Σύλλιον: prob. Ru. near Bolkassku, N. of Legelakhoi), a strongly fortified town of Pamphylia, on a mountain, forty stadia (four geographical miles) from the coast, between Side and Aspendus (Strab. p. 667; Arr. An. i. 25).

Sylvānus. [SILVANUS.]

Sylvius. [SILVIUS.]

Symaethus (Σύμαιθος: Simeto, or Giarretta), a river on the E. coast of Sicily, which rises in the chain of M. Nebrodes, and first flowing S. skirts the base of Aetna; then turning E., flows into the sea eight miles S. of Catania. In the lower part of its course it formed the boundary between Leontini and Catana. (Thuc. vi. 65; Strab. p. 272; Verg. Aen. ix. 584.)

Symē (Σύμη: Συμαῖος, Συμεύς: Symi), a small island off the SW. coast of Caria, lay in the mouth of the Sinus Doridis to the W. of the promontory of Cynossema. (Hdt. i. 174; Thuc. viii. 41; Strab. p. 656; Athen. p. 296.) It was one of the early Dorian states, that existed in the SW. of Asia Minor before the time of Homer, and Nireus is said to have sailed from it (Il. ii. 671). Its connexion both with Cnidus and with Rhodes, between which it lay, is indicated by the tradition that it was peopled by a colony from Cnidus led by Cthonius, the son of Poseidon and of Syme, the daughter of Ialysus. Some time after the Trojan war, the Carians are said to have obtained possession of the island, but to have deserted it again in consequence of a severe drought. Its final settlement by the Dorians is ascribed to the time of their great migration (Diod. v. 33). The island was reckoned at thirty-five miles in circuit. It had eight harbours and a town, which was also called Syme.

Symmachus, Q. Aurélius. 1. A distinguished scholar, statesman, and orator in the latter half of the fourth century of the Christian era. By his example and authority, he inspired for a time new life and vigour into the literature of his country. He was educated in Gaul, and having discharged the functions of quaestor and praetor, he was afterwards appointed (A.D. 365) Corrector of Lucania and the Bruttii, and in 373 he was proconsul of Africa. His zeal for the ancient religion of Rome checked for a while the prosperous current of his fortunes, and involved him in danger and disgrace. Having been chosen by the senate to remonstrate with Gratian on the removal of the altar of Victory (382) from their council hall, and on the curtailment of the sums annually allowed for the maintenance of the Vestal Virgins, and for the public celebration of sacred rites, he was ordered by the indignant emperor to quit his presence, and to withdraw himself to a distance of 100 miles from Rome. Nothing daunted by this repulse, when he was appointed prefect of the city (384) after the death of his persecutor, he addressed a letter to Valentinianus, again urging the restoration of the pagan deities to their former honours. This application was resisted by St. Ambrose, and was again unsuccessful. Symmachus afterwards espoused the cause of the usurper Maximus (387); but he was pardoned by Theodosius and raised to the consulship in 391. His personal character seems to have been unimpeachable, as he performed the duties of the high offices which he filled in succession with a degree of mildness, firmness and integrity seldom found among statesmen in that corrupt age. The extant works of Symmachus are: (1) Epistolarum Libri X, published after his death by his son. The last book contains his official correspondence, and is chiefly composed of the letters presented by him when praefect of the city to the emperors under whom he served. The remaining books comprise a multitude of epistles, addressed to a wide circle of relations, friends, and acquaintances. (2) Novem Orationum Fragmenta, published for the first time by Mai from a palimpsest in the Ambrosian Library, Mediolan. 1815.—The best edition of the extant writings of Symmachus is by Seeck, Berl. 1883.—2. Father-in-law of BOETHIUS, and put to death at the same time [THEODORICUS].

Synēsīus Συνέσιος), was a native of Cyrene, and devoted himself to the study of Greek literature, first in his own city, and afterwards at Alexandria, where he was a pupil of Hypatia. He became celebrated for his skill in eloquence and poetry, as well as in philosophy, in which he belonged to the Neo-Platonic school. About A.D. 397, he was sent by his fellow-citizens of Cyrene on an embassy to Constantinople, to present the emperor Arcadius with a crown of gold: on which occasion he delivered an oration on the government of a kingdom (περὶ βασιλείας), which is still extant. Soon after this he embraced Christianity, and in 410 was ordained bishop of Ptolemais, the chief city of the Libyan Pentapolis. He presided over his diocese with energy and success for about twenty years, and died about 430. Of his extant writings, besides the above-mentioned oration, the most notable are the Dion, in which he relates how he became a philosopher; the Aegyptius, which describes the evils of the time under the guise of an Egyptian myth, and the Φαλάκρας ἐγκώμιον (Praise of Baldness), an exercise of wit in reply to the Κόμης ἐγκώμιον of Chrysostom.—Edition of his works by Morel, Paris, 1633–1640.

Synnāda, also Synnas (τὰ Σύνναδα: Συνναδεύς, Synnadensis: Tschifut Cassaba), a city in the N. of Phrygia Salutaris, at first inconsiderable, but afterwards a place of much importance, and, from the time of Constantine, the capital of Phrygia Salutaris. It stood in a fruitful plain, according to Strabo (p. 577), planted with olives, but this is said to be impossible: it was near a mountain from which was quarried the celebrated Synnadic marble, which was of a beautiful white, with red veins and spots (Συνναδικὸς λίθος, Synnadicus lapis, called also Docimicus, from a still nearer place, Docimia).

Sýphax (Σύφαξ), king of the Massaesylians, the westernmost tribe of the Numidians. His history is related in the Life of his contemporary and rival, MASINISSA. Syphax was taken prisoner by Masinissa, B.C. 203, and was sent by Scipio, under the charge of Laelius, to Rome. Polybius states that he was one of the captives who adorned the triumph of Scipio, and that he died in confinement shortly after. Livy, on the contrary, asserts that he was saved from that ignominy by a timely death at Tibur, whither he had been transferred from Alba. (Pol. xvi. 23; Liv. xxx. 13, 16.)

Syrāco. [SYRACUSAE.]

Syrācūsae (Συράκουσαι: Συρακόσιος, Syracusanus; Siracusa in Italian, Syracuse in English), the wealthiest and most populous town in Sicily, was situated on the S. part of the E. coast, 400 stadia N. of the promontory Plemmyrium, and ten stadia NE. of the mouth of the river Anapus, near the lake or marsh called Syraco (Συράκω), from which it derived its name. It was founded B.C. 734, one year after the foundation of Naxos, by a colony of Corinthians and other Dorians, led by Archias the Corinthian.—Syracuse was situated on a table-land forming the prolongation of a ridge which branches off from the still more elevated table-land of the interior, and projects quite down to the sea, between the bay known as the Great Harbour of Syracuse and the more extensive bay which stretches on the N. as far as the peninsula of Thapsus or Magnisi. The broad end of the kind of promontory thus formed, which abuts upon the sea for a distance of about $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles, may be considered as the base of a triangular plateau which extends for above four miles into the interior, having its apex formed by the point now called Mongi-bellisi, which was occupied by the ancient fort of Euryelus. This communicates, as already stated, by a narrow ridge with the table-land of the interior, but is still a marked point of separation, and was the highest point of the ancient city, from whence the table-land slopes very gradually to the sea. Though of small elevation, this plateau, called Epipolae, is bounded on all sides by precipitous banks or cliffs, varying in height, but only accessible at a few points. It is divided into two portions by a slight valley or depression running across it from N. to S., about a mile from the sea.—The SE. angle of the plateau is separated from the Great Harbour by a small tract of low and level ground, opposite to which lies the island of Ortygia, a low islet, extending across the mouth of the Great Harbour, and originally divided by only a narrow strait from the mainland, whilst its southern extremity was separated from the nearest point of the headland of Plemmyrium by an interval of about 1200 yards, forming the entrance into the Great Harbour. This last was a spacious bay, of above five miles in circumference, thus greatly exceeding the dimensions of what the ancients usually understood by a port, but forming a very nearly land-locked basin of a somewhat oval form, which afforded a secure shelter to shipping in all weather, and is even at the present day one of the finest harbours in Sicily. But between the island of Ortygia and the mainland to the N. of it was a deep bight or inlet, forming what is called the Lesser Port or Portus Lacceius, which, though very inferior to the other, was still equal to the ordinary requirements of ancient commerce.—S. of the Great Harbour again rose the peninsular promontory of Plemmyrium, forming a table-land bounded, like that on the N. of the bay, by precipitous escarpments and cliffs, though of no great elevation. This table-land was prolonged by another plateau at a somewhat lower level, bounding the southern side of the Great Harbour, and extending from thence towards the interior. On its NE. angle and opposite to the heights of Epipolae, stood the Olympieum, overlooking the low marshy tract which intervenes between the two table-lands, and through which the river Anapus finds its way to the sea. The beautiful stream of the Cyane rises in a source about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile to the N. of the Olympieum, and joins its waters with those of the Anapus almost immediately below the temple.—The town was originally confined to the island Ortygia (Thuc. vi. 2; Strab. p. 269; Scymn. pp. 279–282), but it afterwards spread over the neighbouring mainland, and at the time of its greatest extension under the elder Dionysius it consisted of four distinct quarters, each surrounded by separate walls. (Cic. Verr. iv. 52; Diod. xxvi. 19; Auson. Clar. Urb. 11.) When Strabo calls it πεντάπολις, he perhaps reckoned in Epipolae. These four quarters of the city were: 1. Ortygia (Ὀρτυγία), frequently called simply the Island (Nāsos or Nῆσος), an island of an oblong shape, about a mile long and somewhat less than half a mile broad, lying between the Great Harbour on the W. and the Little Harbour on the E. It was, as has been already remarked, the portion of the city first built, and it afterwards formed the strongest part of the city, and was utilised by Dionysius as his fortress. Within it he built an interior citadel, and the whole was surrounded by double walls, which Timoleon caused to be destroyed. It was specially sacred to Artemis (Diod. v. 8; Pind. Nem. i. 8), [see pp. 127, b, 485, b], and in it was the fountain of Arethusa. It was originally separated from the mainland by a narrow channel, which was subsequently filled up by a causeway (Thuc. vi. 8); but it was severed from the mainland, probably by the elder Dionysius, and afterwards connected with it by means of a bridge.—2. Achradina (Ἀχραδίνη), or 'the Outer City,' consisted probably of the level plain between the Great Harbour and the foot of Epipolae, bordered stantly use it. It has been argued with probability from the language of Diodorus and Livy (e.g. Diod. xi. 73, 76; Liv. xxv. 80) that Achradina was, as has been said, the flat ground below Epipolae. But it should be mentioned that many writers believe it to have included the E. part of the plateau of Epipolae; and the question cannot be said to be decided either way. Achradina communicated with the Island by a fortified entrance called Pentapyla, at the end of the isthmus or causeway. At the time of the siege of Syracuse by the Athenians in the Peloponnesian war (415), the city consisted only of the two parts already mentioned, Ortygia forming the inner and Achradina the outer city.—3. Tyche (Τύχη), named after the temple on the W. by the marshes of Lysimeleia. When the city, in the time of Gelo, spread beyond its original limits in Ortygia, the level plain was occupied, and became what Thucydides calls the 'Outer City.' The Agora was in the part nearest the Island, and was surrounded with porticoes by Dionysius the elder (Diod. xiv. 7; Cic. Verr. iv. 53, 119). Adjoining it was the temple of Jupiter (Diod. xvi. 83) and probably the Prytaneum (Cic. Verr. iv. 57, 125). The name Achradina does not seem to have been used before the end of the fifth century B.C., and even the later writers Plutarch and Diodorus use the name ἡ ἔξω πόλις in speaking of events of the Athenian siege. But in speaking of later history Diodorus, Livy, and Cicero con-of Tyche or Fortune, was situated W. of Achradina, in the direction of the port called Troglus. At the time of the Athenian siege of Syracuse it was only an unfortified suburb, which is mentioned by Diodorus (xi. 68) as existing in 466; but it probably had very few houses until Dionysius fortified the N. part of the plateau, after which time it became the most populous part of the city. In this quarter stood the gymnasium.—4. Neapolis (Νέα πόλις), nearly SW. of Achradina. At the time of the Athenian siege of Syracuse, a suburb called Temenitis, from having within it the statue and consecrated ground of Apollo Temenites, stood on the high ground above the site in which the theatre was afterwards built. This suburb was temporarily fortified at the time of the siege (Thuc. vi. 75). Not many years afterwards the city was permanently extended to this district, occupying both the high ground of Temenitis and the lower slopes to the S.; and the whole was called the 'New City' (Neapolis). Neapolis contained the chief theatre of Syracuse, which was the largest in all Sicily, and many temples, and an amphitheatre of the Roman period of which some remains exist (cf. Tac. Ann. xiii. 49).—5. Epipolae (αἱ Ἐπιπολάι), a space of ground rising above the three quarters of Achradina, Tyche, and Neapolis, which gradually diminished in breadth as it rose higher, until it ended in a small conical mound. This rising ground was surrounded with strong walls by the elder Dionysius, and was thus included in Syracuse, which now became one of the most strongly fortified cities of the ancient world. The highest point of Epipolae was called Euryelus (Εὐρύηλος), on which stood the fort Labdulum (Λάβδαλον). After Epipolae had been added to the city, the circumference of Syracuse was 180 stadia or upwards of twenty-two English miles; and the entire population of the city is supposed to have amounted to 500,000 at the time of its greatest prosperity.—There were several stone quarries (lautumiae) in Syracuse, which are frequently mentioned by ancient writers, and in which the Athenian prisoners were confined. These quarries were in higher ground above Achradina, and in Neapolis under the S. cliff of Epipolae. From them was taken the stone of which the city was built. (Thuc. vii. 86; Diod. xiii. 33; Cic. Verr. i. 5, 14, v. 27, 68.) The so-called 'Ear of Dionysius,' which is shown in the modern Latomia del Paradiso, as a place where the tyrant overheard the conversations of his captives, is an invention of a writer of the Renaissance. [Dict. of Ant. art. Lautumiae.] Round the Olympieum, or Temple of Zeus, which stood on a height a mile and a half S. of Neapolis and on the other side of the Anapus, grew up a collection of houses called ἡ πολίχρη. It was important as commanding the passage of the Anapus. Some remains of the old bridge and of the old road which led to Helorus, as well as remains of the temple itself, are still visible. The city was supplied with water from an aqueduct, which was constructed by Gelo and improved by Hiero. It was brought through Epipolae and Neapolis to Achradina and Ortygia.—The government of Syracuse was at an early period an aristocracy, and the political power was in the hands of the landed proprietors called Geomori or Gamori. In course of time the people, having increased in numbers and wealth, expelled the Geomori and established a democracy. (Hdt. vii. 155; Dionys. vi. 62.) But this form of government did not last long. Gelo espoused the cause of the aristocratical party, and proceeded to restore them by force of arms; but on his approach the people opened the gates to him, and he was acknowledged without opposition tyrant or sovereign of Syracuse, B.C. 485. Under his rule and that of his brother Hiero, Syracuse was raised to an unexampled degree of wealth and prosperity. Hiero died in 467, and was succeeded by his brother Thrasybulus; but the rapacity and cruelty of the latter soon provoked a revolt among his subjects, which led to his deposition and the establishment of a democratical form of government. The next most important event in the history of Syracuse was the siege of the city by the Athenians, which ended in the total destruction of the great Athenian armament in 413. The democracy continued to exist in Syracuse till 406, when the elder Dionysius made himself tyrant of the city. After a long and prosperous reign he was succeeded in 367 by his son, the younger Dionysius, who was finally expelled by Timoleon in 343. A republican form of government was again established; but it did not last long, and in 317 Syracuse fell under the sway of Agathocles. This tyrant died in 280; and the city being distracted by factions, the Syracusans voluntarily conferred the supreme power upon Hiero II., with the title of King, in 270. Hiero cultivated friendly relations with the Romans; but on his death in 216, at the advanced age of ninety-two, his grandson, Hieronymus, who succeeded him, espoused the side of the Carthaginians. A Roman army under Marcellus was sent against Syracuse, and after a siege of two years, during which Archimedes assisted his fellow-citizens by the construction of various engines of war [ARCHIMEDES], the city was taken by Marcellus in 212. From this time Syracuse became a town of the Roman province of Sicily. Its prosperity was greatly diminished by the wars of Sex. Pompeius, and, though Augustus sent a new colony to it in B.C. 21, these settlers occupied only the Island and a portion of Achradina and Neapolis. (Strab. p. 270; Dio Cass. liv. 7.)

A, circular fort (κυκλος) of Athenian siege; dotted line from Troglus to Portella del Fusco, Athenian wall (double thence to the sea); BA, direction of 1st Syracusan cross-wall; CD, direction of 2nd Syracusan cross-wall; EFGH, direction of last Syracusan counter-wall and forts.

Syrgis (Σύργις), according to Herodotus, a river of European Sarmatia, rising in the country of the Thyssagetæ, and flowing through the land of the Maeotæ into the Palus Maeotis. (Hdt. iv. 123). It is possibly the same as the Hyrgis which he mentions elsewhere (iv. 57) as an affluent of the Tanais.

Syria Dea (Συρία θεός), 'the Syrian goddess,' a name by which the Syrian Atargatis was commonly spoken of by Greeks and Romans. She was a goddess of the productiveness of nature = Derceto = Astarte, and the Eastern equivalent of Aphrodite [see p. 85, a]. The chief seat of her worship was Hierapolis in Syria. The orgiastic and effeminate cult of this temple is described by Lucian. Her worship was introduced into Italy under the empire, especially by Nero; and she had a temple at Rome in the Transtiberine district. (Lucian, de Dea Syria; Apul. Met. viii. 24; Suet. Ner. 56; C.I.L. vi. 115, 116.)

Syria (ἡ Συρία: Σύριος, Sýrius: Arab. Esh-Sham, Syria) a country of W. Asia, lying along the E. end of the Mediterranean sea, between Asia Minor and Egypt. In a wider sense the word was used for the whole tract of country bounded by the Tigris on the E., the mountains of Armenia and Cilicia on the N., the Mediterranean on the W., and the Arabian Desert on the S.; the whole of which was peopled by the Aramaean branch of the great Semitic (or Syro-Arabian) race, who occupied a great part of the country which had formerly belonged to the Kheta or Hittites: hence this region is included in the O. T. under the name of Aram. It may be well described physically as the great triangular depression of W. Asia encircled on the N. and NE. by the Taurus and its prolongation to the SE., or, in other words, by the highlands of Cilicia, Cappadocia, Armenia, and Asia; and subsiding on the S. and W. into the Mediterranean and the Great Desert of Arabia. Even a wider extent than this is often given to Syria, so as to include the E. part of Asia Minor, as far as the river Halys and the Euxine. The people were of the same races, and those of the N. of the Taurus in Cappadocia and Pontus are called White Syrians [LEUCOSYRI] in contradistinction to the people of darker complexion in Syria Proper, who are sometimes even called Black Syrians (Σύριοι μέλαρες). The Greeks thus designated as Syria the country lying beyond Phoenicia, and included under the same name the country of Canaan or Palestine. Greek writers, especially Herodotus, often not only reckoned the Phoenicians as Syrians, but even identified Syrians with Assyrians (Hdt. ii. 158, vii. 63). In the narrower sense, Syria was bounded on the W. (beginning from the S.) by M. Hermon, at the S. end of Antilibanus, which separated it from Palestine, by the range of Libanus, dividing it from Phoenice, by the Mediterranean, and by M. Amanus, which divided it from Cilicia; on the N. (where it bordered on Cappadocia) by the main chain of M. Taurus, almost exactly along the parallel of 38° N. lat., and striking the Euphrates just below Juliopolis, and considerably above Samosata: hence the Euphrates forms the E. boundary, dividing Syria, first from a very small portion of Armenia, and then from Mesopotamia, to about or beyond the thirty-sixth parallel of N. lat., whence the SE. and S. boundaries, towards Babylonia and Arabia, in the Great Desert, are exceedingly indefinite. [Comp. ARABIA.] The W. part of the S. boundary ran just below Damascus, being formed by the highlands of Trachonitis. The name Coele Syria (ἡ κοίλη Συρία: 'hollow Syria') was first given to the low-lying part between Libanus and Antilibanus in the valleys of the upper Orontes and the Lita; but it was extended so as to include the country E. of Antilibanus up to, and beyond, Damascus. The W. part of Syria was intersected by a series of mountains, running S. from the Taurus, under the names of AMANUS, PIERIA, CASIUS, BARGYLUS, and LIBANUS and ANTILIBANUS; and the N. part, between the Amanus and the Euphrates, was also mountainous. The chief river of Syria was the ORONTES, and the smaller rivers CHALUS, CHRYSORRHOAS and Lita, were also of importance. The valleys among the mountains were fertile, especially in the N. part: even the E., which is now merged in the Great Desert of Arabia, appears to have had more numerous and more extensive spaces capable of cultivation, and supported great cities, the ruins of which now stand in the midst of sandy wastes.—Having been a part successively of the Assyrian, Babylonian, Persian, and Macedonian empires, Syria fell, after the battle of Ipsus (B.C. 301), to the share of Seleucus Nicator, and formed a part of the great kingdom of the Seleucidae, whose history is given in the articles SELEUCUS, ANTIOCHUS, DEMETRIUS, &c. In this partition, however, Coelesyria and Palestine went, not to Syria, but to Egypt, and the possession of those provinces became the great source of contention between the Ptolemies and the Seleucids. By the irruptions of the Parthians on the E., and the unsuccessful war of Antiochus the Great with the Romans on the W., the Greek Syrian kingdom was reduced to the limits of Syria itself, and became weaker and weaker, until it was overthrown by TIGRANES, king of Armenia, B.C. 79. Soon afterwards, when the Romans had conquered Tigranes as well as Mithridates, Syria was quietly added by Pompey to the empire of the republic and was constituted a province, B.C. 64; but its N. district, Commagene, was not until a later period included in this arrangement. [COMMAGENE.] As the E.

province of the Roman empire, and with its great desert frontier, Syria was constantly exposed to the irruptions of the Parthians, and, after them, of the Persians; but it long remained one of the most flourishing of the provinces. The attempt of Zenobia to make it the seat of empire is noticed under PALMYRA and ZENOBIA. While the Roman emperors defended this precious possession against the attacks of the Persian kings with various success, a new danger arose, as early as the fourth century, from the Arabians of the Desert, who began to be known under the name of Saracens; and, when the rise of Mohammed had given to the Arabs that great religious impulse which revolutionised the E. world, Syria was the first great conquest that they made from the E. empire, A.D. 632-638.—In the time immediately succeeding the Macedonian conquest, Syria was regarded as consisting of two parts; the N., including the whole country down to the beginning of the Lebanon range, and the S., consisting of Coelesyria in its more extended sense. The former, which was called Syria Proper, or Upper Syria (ἡ ἄνω Συρία, Syria Superior), was divided into four districts or tetrarchies, which were named after their respective capitals, Seleucia, Antiochene, Laodicea, and Apamene. The Roman province of Syria as originally constituted by Pompey in 64 B.C. was by no means a single homogeneous region. Owing to the different nationalities and interests which Syria properly so called comprised, it was at first parcelled out between the Roman jurisdiction and a number of independent territories which were allowed to remain within it. Under the Roman proconsul of Syria were at first Upper Syria (with the chief towns Antioch, Seleucia, Apamea, Laodicea, Cyrrhus, Hieropolis and Beroea), and the land of Phoenicia including Tripolis, Byblus, Tyre and Sidon; but Judaea was left for a time nominally independent, except for a short time when Gabinius broke it up into five districts. Caesar made Judaea a client state under its own princes, and it did not become a Roman province (of the second rank, under a procurator) until A.D. 6. Similarly Commagene was left under its own princes until A.D. 17, and again from 38 till 72, when it was finally joined to the province of Syria: Chalcis retained its own princes till 92, when Domitian added it to the province: Abilene till 49: Arethusa and Emesa till 78: Damascus was not included in the province of Syria till 106. The province of Syria under the empire was governed by an imperial legate residing at Antioch: it was eventually divided into ten districts, named (mostly after their capital cities) Commagene, Cyrrhestice, Pieria, Seleucia, Chalcidice, Chalybonitis, Palmyrene, Apamene, Cassiotis, and Laodicea; but the last is sometimes included under Cassiotis. (See the several articles.) From 66 A.D. Judaea or Syria Palaestina was recognised as a separate province, and at the end of the second century Syria was divided into two provinces, Syria Magna or Coelesyria, and Syria Phoenice. Constantine the Great separated the two N. districts—namely, Commagene and Cyrrhestice—and erected them into a distinct province, called Euphratensis or Euphratesia; and the rest of Syria was afterwards divided by Theodosius II. into the two provinces of Syria Prima, including the sea-coast and the country N. of Antioch, and having that city for its capital; and Syria Secunda, the district along the Orontes, with Apamea for its capital: the E. districts no longer formed a part of Syria, but had fallen under the power of the Persians.

Syriæ Portæ (αἱ Συρίαι πύλαι: Pass of Beilan), a most important pass between Cilicia and Syria, lying between the shore of the Gulf of Issus on the W., and M. Amanus on the E. Xenophon, who called the pass (or rather its fortifications) the Gates of Cilicia and of Syria, describes it as three stadia in length and very narrow, with walls built from the mountains to the sea at both ends (the Cilician and the Syrian), and gates in the walls. These walls and gates are not mentioned by the historians of Alexander. (Xen. An. i. 4, 4; Arr. An. ii. 8; Strab. p. 676.)

Syrianus (Συριανός), a Greek philosopher of the Neo-Platonic school, was a native of Alexandria, and studied at Athens under Plutarchus, whom he succeeded as head of the Neo-Platonic school in the early part of the fifth century. The most distinguished of his disciples was Proclus, who regarded him with the greatest veneration, and gave directions that at his death he should be buried in the same tomb with Syrianus. Syrianus wrote several works, some of which are extant. Of these the most valuable are the commentaries on the Metaphysics of Aristotle.

Syrinx, an Arcadian nymph, who being pursued by Pan, fled into the river Ladon, and at her own request was metamorphosed into a reed, of which Pan then made his flute. [PAN.]

Syros, or Sýrus (Σύρος, called Συρίη by Homer, and Σύρα by a few writers: Σύριος: Syra), an island in the Aegean sea, and one of the Cyclades, lying between Rhenea and Cythnus. It was twenty Roman miles in circumference, and rich in pastures, wine, and corn. It contained two cities in Homer's time, but only one in Ptolemy's (Od. xv. 403-414; Ptol. iii. 15, 30; Strab. p. 487). The philosopher Pherecydes was a native of Syros. The fertility of Syros, praised by Homer, has disappeared, apparently since the seventeenth century, and probably from the destruction of its trees. The present prosperity of the island is therefore entirely due to the circumstances which made it a centre of commerce since the liberation of Greece, and the capital of the Cyclades. The traces of two towns (confirming the account in the Odyssey) are to be seen near the modern Delle Grazie. It is conjectured that some time after the Homeric age these were abandoned for a new city built on the site of the modern Hermoupolis, where an inscription relating to a temple of Poseidon has been found.

Syrtes, gen. -idos (Σύρτις, gen. -ιδος and -εως, Ion. -ιος), the Greek name for each of the two great gulfs in the E. half of the N. coast of Africa, is derived by ancient writers from σύρω, to draw, with reference to the quicksands by which, in the Greater Syrtis at least, ships were liable to be swallowed up; but the more probable derivation is from the Arabic sert = a sandy desert, which is at the present day applied to the country along this coast, the REGIO SYRTICA of the ancients. Both these gulfs were proverbially dangerous: the Greater Syrtis from its sandbanks and quicksands, and its unbroken exposure to the N. winds; the Lesser from its shelving rocky shores, its exposure to the NE. winds, and the consequent variability of the tides in it. 1. Syrtis Major (ἡ μεγάλη Σύρτις: Gulf of Sidra), the E. of the two, is a wide and deep gulf on the shores of Tripolita and Cyrenaica, exactly opposite to the Ionic sea, or mouth of the Adriatic, between Sicily and Peloponnesus. Its greatest extent inland from N. to S. is about 110 geographical miles; from E. to W. about 230 geographical miles, between Cephalæ Prom. (Ras Kharra) on the W., and Boreum Prom. (Ras Teyonas) on the E. The Great Desert comes down close to its shores, forming a sandy coast [SYRTICA REGIO].—2. Syrtis Minor (ἡ μικρά Σύρτις: Gulf of Gabes), lies in the SW. angle of the great bend formed by the N. coast of Africa as it drops down to the S. from the neighbourhood of Carthage, and then bears again to the E.: in other words, in the angle between the E. coast of Zeugitana and Byzacena (Tunis) and the N. coast of Tripolitana (Tripoli). Its mouth faces the E., between Caput Vada or Brachodes Prom. (Ras Kapoudiah) on the N., and the island called Meninx or Lotophagitis (Jerbah) on the S. In its mouth, near the N. extremity, lie the islands of Cercina and Cercinitis, which were often regarded as its N. extremity. The true width (between Ras Kapoudiah and the E. point of Jerbah) is about eighty geog. miles, and the greatest depth, measured westward from the line joining those points, is about sixty-five geog. miles. (Strab. pp. 834, 835; Scyl. p. 48; Pol. i. 39, ii. 28.)

Syrtica Regio (ἡ Συρτική: W. part of Tripoli), the special name of that part of the N. coast of Africa which lay between the two Syrtis, from the river Triton, at the bottom of the Syrtis Minor, on the W., to the Philaenorum Arae, at the bottom of the Syrtis Major, on the E. It was for the most part a very narrow strip of sand, interspersed with salt marshes, between the sea and a range of mountains forming the edge of the Great Desert (Sahara), with here and there a few spots capable of cultivation, especially about the river Cinyps. It was peopled by Libyan tribes, the chief of whom were the Lotophagi, Macae, Psylli, and Nasamones; and several Egyptian and Phoenician colonies were settled on the coast at an early period. The Greeks of Cyrene disputed with the Carthaginians the possession of this district until it was secured to Carthage by the self-devotion of the PHILAENI. Under the Romans it formed a part of the province of Africa. It was often called Tripolitana, from its three chief cities, ABROTONUM, OEA, and LEPTIS MAGNA; and this became its usual name under the later empire, and has been handed down to our own time in the modern name of the Regency of Tripoli. (Strab. p. 834; Hdt. iv. 198; Ov. Pont. iii. 7, 25.)

Sýrus, Publius, a slave brought from Antioch to Rome some years before the downfall of the republic, and designated, according to the usual practice, from the country of his birth. He attracted attention while yet a youth, by his beauty and his wit, was manumitted by his master, who probably belonged to the Clodia gens, assumed the name of Publius from his patron (sometimes incorrectly given as Publius), and soon became celebrated as a mimographer, about B.C. 45, and still more as an improvisatore. His mimic improvisations were committed to writing, and extensively circulated at an early period; and a collection of pithy moral sayings extracted from his works appears to have been used as a school-book in the boyhood of St. Jerome. A compilation of this description, extending to upwards of 800 lines in iambic and trochaic measures, every apophthegm being comprised in a single line, and the whole ranged alphabetically, according to the initial letter of the first word in each, is now extant under the title Publii Syri Sententiae. These proverbs have been drawn from various sources, and are evidently the work of many different hands; but a considerable number may be ascribed to Syrus and his contemporaries. (Plin. xxxv. 199; Macrob. ii. 7, 6; Gell. xvii. 14; Sen. de Tranq. An. 11, 8; Cic. ad Fam. xii. 18; Hieron. ad Euseb. Chron. 1974).—The best edition of the Sententiae is by Wölfflin, Leips. 1869.

Sythas (Σύθας), a river on the frontiers of Achaia and Sicyonia (Paus. vii. 27, 12).

Tābae (Τάβαι: Ταβηνός). 1. (Dawas), a city of Caria, on the borders of Phrygia (Strab. pp. 570, 576; Liv. xxxviii. 13).—2. (Tabbas), a city of Persis, in the district of Paraetacene, E. of Ecbatana.

Tābernae. [TRES TABERNAE.]

Tabuda. [SCALDIS.]

Tāburnus (Taburno), a mountain belonging half to Campania and half to Samnium. Its S. side was very fertile, and was celebrated for its pastures and olive grounds (Verg. Georg. ii. 38, Aen. xii. 715). It shut in the Caudine pass on its S. side.

Tācāpē (Τακάπη: Gabes), a city of N. Africa, in the Regio Syrtica, at the innermost angle of the Syrtis Minor, to which the modern town gives its present name. Under the Romans it at first belonged to Byzacene, but it was afterwards raised to a colony and made the W. town of Tripolitana. It had an indifferent harbour. A little to the W. was the bathing place (Plin. v. 30) called, from its warm mineral springs, Aquae Tacipitanae (El Hammat-el-Khabs).

Tacfarinas, a Numidian in the reign of Tiberius, had originally served among the auxiliary troops in the Roman army, but he deserted; and, having collected a body of freebooters, he became at length the acknowledged leader of the Musulamii, a powerful people in the interior of Numidia, bordering on Mauretania. For some years he defied the Roman arms, in spite of the successful campaign of Blaesus against him; but he was at length defeated and slain in battle by Dolabella, A.D. 24. (Tac. Ann. ii. 52, iii. 73, iv. 24.)

Tachompso (Ταχομψά, also Tacompsos, Plin., and Μετακομψά, Ptol.), aft. Contrapselcis, a city in the Dodecaschoenus (that is, the part of Aethiopia immediately above Egypt), built on an island (Derar?) near the E. bank of the river, a little above Pselcis, which stood on the opposite bank. [PSELGIS.]

Tachos (Ταχός), king of Egypt, succeeded Acoris, and maintained the independence of his country for a short time towards the end of the reign of Artaxerxes II., B.C. 364–361. He invited Chabrias, the Athenian, to take the command of his fleet, and Agesilaus to undertake the supreme command of all his forces. Both Chabrias and Agesilaus came to Egypt; but the latter was much aggrieved in having only the command of the mercenaries entrusted to him. Accordingly, when Nectanabis laid claim to the Egyptian crown, Agesilaus deserted Tachos, and espoused the cause of Nectanabis, who thus became king of Egypt, B.C. 361. (Diod. xv. 92; Nep. Chabr. 2; Xen. Ages. ii. 28; Plut. Ages. 36–40.)

Tācītus. 1. Cornelius, the historian:

whether his praenomen was C. or P. remains doubtful. The time and place of his birth are unknown. He was a little older than the younger Pliny, who was born A.D. 61. His father was probably Cornelius Tacitus, a Roman equester, who is mentioned as a procurator in Gallia Belgica, and who died in 79 (Plin. vii. 76). Tacitus was first promoted by the emperor Vespasian, and he received other favours from his sons, Titus and Domitian (Hist. i. 1). The most probable account is that Tacitus was appointed tribunus militum laticlavus by Vespasian, quaestor by Titus, and praetor by Domitian. In 78 he married the daughter of C. Julius Agricola, to whom he had been betrothed in the preceding year, while Agricola was consul. In the reign of Domitian, and in 88, Tacitus was praetor, and he assisted as one of the quindecimviri at the solemnity of the Ludi Seculares which were celebrated in that year (Ann. xi. 11). Agricola died at Rome in 93, but neither Tacitus nor the daughter of Agricola was then with him. It is not known where Tacitus was during the last illness of Agricola, but he may have been, as some think, praetorian legate in Germany, or propraetor of Belgica. In the reign of Nerva, 97, Tacitus was appointed consul suffectus, in the place of T. Virginus Rufus, who had died in that year, and whose funeral oration he delivered. We know that Tacitus had attained oratorical distinction when the younger Pliny was beginning his career. He and Tacitus were appointed in the reign of Trajan (99) to conduct the prosecution of Marius, proconsul of Africa. Tacitus and Pliny were most intimate friends. In the collection of the letters of Pliny, there are eleven letters addressed to Tacitus. The time of the death of Tacitus is unknown, but he appears to have survived Trajan, who died in 117. Nothing is recorded of any children of his, though the emperor Tacitus claimed a descent from the historian, and ordered his works to be placed in all (public) libraries. As a historian Tacitus wrote undoubtedly with a bias from his intense political sympathies with the senate of the older period as against the imperial constitution. His interest, too, was concentrated upon Italy somewhat to the exclusion of the provinces, which prevented him from allowing that the imperial rule was necessary for the provincial government. But for acuteness of thought, for insight into character, he is among the greatest of historians; and for power of description in a few telling words he is unrivalled. The following are the extant books of Tacitus in the order in which they were written: (1) Dialogus de Oratoribus an essay, to show the decay of oratory under the empire, written in the form of a dialogue, the speakers being literary men of Vespasian's reign, Curatius Maternus, M. Aper, Julius Secundus, and Vipstanus Messalla. This was written early in the life of Tacitus, when he was chiefly influenced in style by Cicero's rhetorical works. It is probable that the time when the dialogue was supposed to take place was A.D. 74 (Dial. 17), when Tacitus was about twenty (cf. Dial. 1), and that it was written and published about A.D. 84, at the period of Domitian's reign when freedom of speech was more possible (cf. Suet. Dom. 9). The difference in diction between this and his later works has caused many to deny that it is a genuine work of Tacitus, but there is no good ground for this denial. The date accounts for the style: in acuteness of thought it is Tacitean, and there is no one else of this period who could have written it. It has been remarked, too, that a comparison of Plin. Ep. ix. 10, 2 with Tac. Dial. 12, shows that Pliny wrote to Tacitus as the author of the Dialogue (see also Plin. Ep. i. 6, 2; Tac. Dial. 9). Separate editions by Bährens, Leips. 1881; Peterson, Oxford, 1898.—(2) Vita Agricola, the Life of Agricola, which was written, as we may probably conclude from the introduction, after Trajan's accession, i.e. after 98. This Life is justly admired as a specimen of biography. It is a monument to the memory of a good man and an able commander and administrator, by an affectionate son-in-law, who has portrayed in his peculiar manner and with many masterly touches, the virtues of one of the most illustrious of the Romans. It is written on the model of one of Sallust's monographs. Separate edition by Haverfield (announced), or with Germ. by Frost, Lond. 1861; Schoene, Berl. 1889; Church and Brodrick, Lond. 1889.—(3) Germania, or De Moribus et Populis Germaniae, a treatise describing the Germanic nations, also written early in Trajan's reign. The main matter is the description of the political institutions, the religion, and the habits, of the various tribes included under the denomination of Germani, of which he had had in all probability personal means of judging from official employment in the country. Separate edition by Haverfield (announced).—(4) Historiae, which were written after the death of Nerva, 98, and before the Annales. They comprehended the period from the second consulship of Galba, 68, to the death of Domitian, 96, and the author designed to add the reigns of Nerva and Trajan. The first four books alone are extant in a complete form, and they comprehend only the events of about one year. Book v. is imperfect, and goes no further than the commencement of the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, and the war of Civilis in Germany. It is not known how many books of the Historiae there were, but it must have been a large work if it was all written on the same scale as the first five books, and probably consisted of twelve or fourteen books. Separate editions by Simcox, 1876; A. Godley, 1887–1890.—(5) Annales (of which the genuine title appears to be Ab excessu divi Augusti, though Tacitus himself describes it also as annales), which commence with the death of Augustus, 14, and comprise the period to the death of Nero, 68, a space of fifty-four years. The greater part of the fifth book is lost; and also the seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, the beginning of the eleventh, and the end of the sixteenth, which is the last book. These lost parts comprised the whole of Caligula's reign, the first five years of Claudius, and the last two of Nero. Separate editions by Orelli-Baiter, Zur. 1859; Furneaux, Oxf. 1884; Allen, Boston, 1890. Editions of the complete works with a commentary by Orelli, revised by different editors, 1859–1880; of the text by C. Halm, Leips. 1884. Translation by Church and Brodrick.—2. M. Claudius, Roman emperor from the 25th of September, A.D. 275, until April, A.D. 276. He was elected emperor by the senate after the death of Aurelian, the army having requested the senate to nominate a successor to the imperial throne. Tacitus was at the time seventy years of age, and was with difficulty persuaded to accept the purple. The high character which he had borne before his elevation to the throne he amply sustained during his brief reign. He endeavoured to repress the luxury and licentiousness of the age by various sumptuary laws, and he himself set an example to all around, by the abstemiousness, simplicity, and frugality of his own habits. The only military achievement of this reign was the defeat and expulsion from Asia Minor of a party of Goths, who had carried their devastation across the peninsula to the confines of Cilicia. He died either at Tarsus or at Tyana, about the 9th of April, 276. (Life in the Script. Hist. August.; Eutrop. ix. 10; Aurel. Vic. Caes. xxxvi.; Zonar. xii. 28.)

Taenarum (Taivapov: C. Matapan), a promontory in Laconica, forming the southerly point of the Peloponnesus, on which stood a celebrated temple of Poseidon, possessing an inviolable asylum. A little to the N. of the temple and the harbour of Achilleus was a town also called Taenarum or Taenarus, and at a later time Caenēpōlis. It was situated forty stadia from the extreme point of the promontory, and was said to have been built by Taenarus, a son of Zeus, or Icarus or Elatus. On this promontory was a cave, one of the supposed entrances to the underworld (probably so considered because of the stern and gloomy character of its rocks), through which Heracles is said to have dragged Cerberus to the upper world. Here also was a statue of Arion seated on a dolphin, since he is said to have landed at this spot after his miraculous preservation by a dolphin. (Hdt. i. 23; Thuc. i. 128, 133; Pind. Pyth. iv. 77; Paus. iii. 25, 4; Strab. p. 363; Verg. Georg. iv. 467.) In the time of the Romans there were celebrated marble quarries on the promontory (Strab. p. 367).

Tagae (Tayai: Dameghan?), a city mentioned by Polybius as in Parthia, on the border towards Hyrcania (Pol. x. 29, 3).

Tagaste (Tagilt, Ru.), an inland town of Numidia, on a tributary of the Bagradas, remarkable as the birthplace of St. Augustine.

Tages, a mysterious Etruscan being, who is described as a boy with the wisdom of an old man. Once when an Etruscan, of the name of Tarchon, was ploughing in the neighbourhood of Tarquinii, there suddenly rose out of the ground Tages, the son of a Genius Jovialis, and grandson of Jupiter. When Tages addressed Tarchon, the latter shrieked from fear, whereupon other Etruscans hastened to him, and in a short time all the people of Etruria were assembled around him. Tages now instructed them in the art of the haruspices, and died immediately after. The Etruscans, who had listened attentively to his instructions, afterwards wrote down all he had said, and thus arose the books of Tages, which, according to some, were twelve in number. (Cic. Div. ii. 23, 50; Ov. Met. xv. 588; Fest. s. v. Tages.) Traces of a later version of these books of ritual have been found in Serv. ad Aen. i. 42, and in Amm. Marc. xvii. 10, 2. It is still a matter of uncertainty whether the recently discovered Etruscan book will throw further light on the subject.

Tagus (Spanish Tajo, Portuguese Tejo, English Tagus), one of the chief rivers in Spain, rising in the land of the Celtiberians, between the mountains Orospea and Idubeda, and, after flowing in a westerly direction, falling into the Atlantic. The whole course of the Tagus exceeds 550 English miles. At its mouth stood Olisippo (Lisbon). The ancient writers relate that much gold sand and precious stone were found in the Tagus. (Strab. pp. 139, 152, 162; Plin. iv. 115; Mart. x. 78; Catull. xx. 30; Ov. Met. ii. 251.)

Talabrīga, a town in Lusitania, between Aeminium and Lagobriga (Plin. iv. 113).

Talassio or Talassius (sometimes written Talassius or Thalassius), an old Italian, probably Sabine, deity invoked in the Indigitamenta [INDIGETES] as a god presiding over marriage. During the bridal procession in the songs which attended it there were cries of 'Talasae,' as if calling for his presence [Dict. of Ant. art. Matrimonium]. Various explanations were given. Varro connected his name with τάλαρος, a wool-basket, as symbolising household work (Plut. Q. R. 31). A legend was invented to account for the custom: that Talassus or Talus was a companion of Romulus in the rape of the Sabines. Some modern writers have connected him with Consus, from the theory that his name = θαλάσσιος. But he was clearly Latin, not Greek, and there is no reason to doubt that he was one of the Sabine Indigetes.

Tālāus (Τάλαος), son of Bias and Pero, and king of Argos. He was married to Lysimache (Eurynome, or Lysianassa), and was father of Adrastus, Parthenopaeus, Pronax, Mecisteus, Aristomachus, and Eriphyle. (Paus. ii. 6, 3; Apollod. i. 9, 13; Pind. Nem. ix. 14.) His name occurs among the Argonauts, and his tomb was shown at Argos. The patronymic Talaionides (Ταλαϊονίδης) is given to his sons Adrastus and Mecisteus. (Il. ii. 566, xxiii. 67; Pind. Ol. vi. 24.)

Talmis (El-Kalabshah, Ru.), a city of the Dodecaschoenus—that is, the district of Aethiopia immediately above Egypt—stood on the W. bank of the Nile, S. of Philae, and N. of Pselcis. Its ruins consist of an ancient rock-hewn temple, with splendid sculptures, and of a later temple of the Roman period, in the midst of which stands the modern village. There was a place on the opposite bank called Contra-Talmis.

Talna, Juventius. [THALNA.]

Talos (Τάλως). 1. Son of Perdix, the sister of DAEDALUS. He is one of those mythical persons to whom were ascribed various inventions or primitive works of art, of which the origin was unknown. Talos is said to have invented the saw, from observing the teeth of a serpent, or (in some accounts) the backbone of a fish. He was credited also with the invention of the chisel, the compasses, and the potter's wheel. Daedalus was jealous of his skill and threw him down from the Acropolis. The place where he fell was marked by a tomb, which Pausanias visited, on the S. side of the Acropolis just above the Theatre. Some writers confused Talos and Perdix. (Paus. i. 21, 4; Diod. iv. 76; Apollod. iii. 15, 9; Ov. Met. viii. 241; PERDIX.)—2. A man of brass, the work of Hephaestus. This wonderful being was given to Minos by Zeus or Hephaestus, and watched the island of Crete by walking round the island thrice every day. Whenever he saw strangers approaching, he made himself red hot in fire, and then embraced the strangers when they landed. In the Argonaut story Talos receives the voyagers with a shower of stones. He had a vein running down to his foot, where the flow of blood was stopped by a nail: Medea made this nail fall out by her magic (or, as some said, Poëas shot it out with an arrow) and Talos bled to death. (Apollod. i. 9, 26; Ap. Rh. iv. 1638; Zenob. v. 85; [Plat.] Min. p. 320; Schol. ad Plat. Rep. p. 425.) It will be observed that the story of Talos burning strangers by his embrace may well have arisen from an image of Moloch and human sacrifices offered to it.

Talthybius (Ταλθύβιος), the herald of Agamemnon at Troy. He was worshipped as a hero at Sparta and Argos, where sacrifices also were offered to him.

Tamāra. 1. Or Tamāris (Tambre), a small river in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the coast of Gallaecia, falling into the Atlantic between the Minius and the Prom. Nerium (Ptol. ii. 6, 2).—2. (Tamerton, near Plymouth), a town of the Damnonii in the S. of Britain, at the mouth of the Tamarus (Ptol. ii. 3, 30).

Tamarīci, a people in Gallaecia, on the river Tamara.

Tamāris. [TAMARA.]

Tamārus (Tamar), a river in the S. of Britain (Ptol. ii. 3, 4).

Tamassus or Tamāsus (Ταμασσός, Τάμασος: Ταμασίτης, Ταμάσιος), probably the same as the Homeric Temēsē (Od. i. 184), a town in the middle of Cyprus, NW. of Olympus, and twenty-nine miles SE. of Soloë, on the road from the latter place to Tremithus, was situated in a fertile country and in the neighbourhood of extensive copper mines. Near it was a celebrated plain (ager Tamaseus), sacred to Venus. (Ov. Met. x. 644; Ptol. v. 14, 6.) The site is marked by ruins in the district called Tamasia.

Tambrax (Τάμβραξ), a great city of Hyrcania, on the N. side of Mt. Coronus, mentioned by Polybius (x. 31). It is perhaps the same place which Strabo called Ταλαβρόκη (p. 508).

Tamēsis or Tamēsa (Thames), a river in Britain flowing into the sea on the E. coast, on which stood Londinium (Caes. B. G. v. 11; Tac. Ann. xiv. 32).

Tamna or Thomna (Τάμνα), a city in the SW. of Arabia Felix, the capital of the Catabani. It maintained a caravan traffic in spices and other products of Arabia with Gaza (Strab. p. 768; Plin. vi. 153, xii. 64).

Tamōs (Ταμός), a native of Memphis in Egypt, was lieutenant-governor of Ionia under Tissaphernes (Thuc. viii. 31, 87). He afterwards attached himself to the service of the younger Cyrus, upon whose death, he sailed to Egypt, where he hoped to find refuge with Psammetichus, on whom he had conferred an obligation. Psammetichus, however, put him to death, in order to possess himself of his money and ships. (Xen. An. i. 2, 21, ii. 1, 3; Hell. iii. 1, 1; Diod. xiv. 19, 35.)

Tamphilus or Tampilus, Baebius. 1. Cn., tribune of the plebs, B.C. 204; praetor 199, when he was defeated by the Insubrians; and consul 182, when he fought against the Ligurians with success (Liv. xxix. 37, xxxix. 23, xl. 25).—2. M., brother of the last, was praetor 192, and served in Greece both in this year and the following, in the war against Antiochus. In 181 he was consul, when he defeated the Ligurians (Liv. xl. 35–38).

Tamynae (Ταμύναι: Aliveri), a town in Euboea, on Mt. Cotylaeum, in the territory of Eretria, with a temple of Apollo, said to have been built by Admetus. Here the Athenians under Phocion gained a celebrated victory over Callias of Chalcis, B.C. 354. (Hdt. vi. 101; Plut. Phoc. 12; Strab. p. 447.)

Tamyrāca, a town and promontory of European Sarmatia at the innermost corner of the Sinus Carcinites, which was also called from this town Sinus Tamyraces (Ptol. iii. 5, 8).

Tamyras or Damūras (Ταμύρας, Δαμούρας: Damur), a little river of Phoenicia, rising on Mt. Libanus, and falling into the Mediterranean about half way between Sidon and Berytus (Strab. p. 756; Pol. v. 68).

Tanāger (Tanagro), a river of Lucania, rising in a north-easterly direction, loses itself under the earth near Polla for a space of about two miles, emerging from a cleft called La Pertusa, and finally falls into the Silarus near Forum Popilii. This disappearance is alluded to in the epithet siccus (Verg. Georg. iii. 151; cf. Plin. ii. 225).

Tanagra (Távaypa; Tavaypāios; Grimadha), a celebrated town of Boeotia, situated on a steep ascent on the left bank of the Asopus, 180 stadia from Oropus, and 200 stadia from Plataeae, in the district Tanagraea, which was also called Poemandris (Strab. p. 404; Steph. Byz. s. v.). Tanagra was by some supposed to be the same town as the Homeric Graea (Il. ii. 498; Lycophr. 644); but others identified that town with Oropus. The most ancient inhabitants are said to have been the Gephyraei, who came with Cadmus from Phoenicia; but it was afterwards taken possession of by the Aeolian Boeotians (Hdt. v. 57). It was a place of considerable commercial importance, and was celebrated, among other things, for its breed of fighting cocks. At a later time it belonged to the Boeotian confederacy. Being near the frontiers of Attica, it was frequently exposed to the attacks of the Athenians; and near it the Athenians sustained a great defeat, B.C. 457. (Thuc. i. 108; Diod. xi. 81.) The principal temple at Tanagra was that of Dionysus: near it were those of Themis, Aphrodite, Hermes Criophorus, and Hermes Promachus, which last stood near the theatre (Paus. ix. 20). The excavations on the site of Tanagra have shown the circuit of walls, and the position of more than forty towers, of three gates, and of the theatre. But far more important was the discovery, in 1873, of the Necropolis from which come the numerous terracotta statuettes, or 'figurines,' with which the name of Tanagra is now chiefly associated [see Dict. of Ant. art. Terracotta].

Tānāis (Távāis). 1. (Don, i.e. Water), a great river, which rises in the N. of Sarmatia Europaea (about the centre of Russia), and flows to the SE. till it comes near the Volga, when it turns to the SW. and falls into the NE. angle of the Palus Maeotis (Sea of Azov) by two principal mouths and several smaller ones. It was usually considered the boundary between Europe and Asia. The ancients regarded its source as doubtful: some even fancied that it rose in the W. near the Danube: others in the E. near the Caucasus. Strabo rejects these theories and correctly makes it flow from the N. into the P. Maeotis (Strab. p. 493; cf. Hdt. iv. 83). Pytheas seems to have mistaken the Elbe for a part of the Tanaïs (Strab. p. 104); but that is hardly more strange than the belief of the Macedonians that the Jaxartes was the Tanaïs (Strab. p. 510; Arr. An. iii. 30, 11).—2. (Ru. near Kassatchei), a city of Sarmatia Asiatica, on the N. side of the S. mouth of the Tanaïs, at a little distance from the sea. It was founded by a colony from Miletus, and became a very flourishing emporium. It reduced to subjection several of the neighbouring tribes, but in its turn it became subject to the kings of Bosporus. It was destroyed by Polemon on account of an attempted revolt, and, though afterwards restored, it never regained its former prosperity. (Ptol. iii. 5, 26; Strab. p. 493.)

Tānāquil. [TARQUINIUS.]

Tanarus (Tanaro), a river of Liguria, which rises in the Maritime Alps, is joined by the Stura, and flows into the Po a little below Valenza (Forum Fulvii). It passes the walls of Asti (Plin. iii. 118).

Tanetum (Tanetanus; Taneto), a town of the Boii in Gallia Cispadana, between Mutina and Parma (Pol. iii. 40; Liv. xxi. 25).

Tānis (Távīs; O. T. Zoan; Távίτης; San, Ru.), a very ancient city of Lower Egypt, in the E. part of the Delta, on the right bank of the arm of the Nile which was called after it the Tanitic, and on the SW. side of the great lake between this and the Pelusiatic branch of the Nile, which was also called, after the city, Tanis (Lake of Menzaleh). It was one of the capitals of Lower Egypt in early times, fortified by the kings of the twelfth and thirteenth dynasties, who raised great buildings there (about B.C. 2400).

Tantālus (Távταλος). 1. Son of Zeus and Pluto, daughter of Himantes (Paus. ii. 22, 3; Hyg. Fab. 155). His wife is called by some Euryanassa, by others Taygete or Dione, and by others Clytia or Eupryto. He was the father of Pelops, Broteas and Niobe. Tantalus is represented as a wealthy king of Lydia, especially of the region about the Hermus and Mt. Sipylus. He is selected by poets as the type of extreme prosperity followed by a sudden and fearful downfall. The causes of his punishment after death are differently stated by the ancient authors. According to the common account Zeus invited him to his table, and communicated his divine counsels to him. Tantalus divulged the secrets thus intrusted to him; and he was punished in the lower world by being afflicted with a raging thirst, and at the same time placed in the midst of a lake, the waters of which always receded from him as soon as he attempted to drink them. Over his head, moreover, hung branches of fruit, which receded in like manner when he stretched out his hand to reach them. (Od. iv. 77; Diod. iv. 74; Hyg. Fab. 82; Hor. Sat. i. 1, 68; Ov. Met. iv. 457.) Another version related that there was suspended over his head a huge rock ever threatening to crush him (Pind. Ol. i. 56, Isthm. vii. 20; Eur. Or. 5; Cic. Fin. i. 18, 60, Tusc. iv. 16, 35). In another story Tantalus, wishing to test the gods, cut his son Pelops in pieces, boiled them and set them before the gods at a repast [PELOPS]. In another, Tantalus stole nectar and ambrosia from the table of the gods and gave them to his friends (Pind. Ol. i. 60). Yet another tradition relates the following story. Rhea caused the infant Zeus and his nurse to be guarded in Crete by a golden dog, whom Zeus afterwards appointed guardian of his temple in Crete. Pandareus stole this dog, and, carrying him to Mount Sipylus in Lydia, gave him to Tantalus to take care of. But when Pandareus demanded the dog back, Tantalus took an oath that he had never received it. Zeus thereupon changed Pandareus into a stone, and threw Tantalus down from Mount Sipylus, or, in some accounts, buried him under the mountain (Ant. Lib. 36). This story seems to have more connexion with the punishment (as in Pindar) of the stone ever about to fall upon him. The other punishment of Tantalus was proverbial in ancient times, and from it the English language has borrowed the verb 'to tantalize'—that is, to hold out hopes or prospects which cannot be realised. The paintings of Polygnotus at Delphi represented both traditions of his punishment in Hades (Paus. x. 31, 12). The tomb of Tantalus was shown near Mt. Sipylus.

The patronymic Tantalides is frequently given to the descendants of Tantalus. Hence we find, not only his son Pelops, but also Atreus, Thyestes, Agamemnon, Menelaus, and Orestes called by his name. [For the confirmation derived from archaeology of those traditions which ascribe a Lydian origin to the Pelopidae who reigned at Tiryns and Mycenae see PELOPS, p. 669, b; MYCENAE.]—2. Son of Thyestes, who was killed by Atreus. Others call him a son of Broteas. He was married to Clytaemnestra before Agamemnon, and is said by some to have been killed by Agamemnon (Ov. Met. vi. 240; Apollod. iii. 5, 6).—3. Son of Amphion and Niobe (Paus. ii. 18, 2; Hyg. Fab. 88).

Tanus or Tanaus (Τάνος or Ταναός: Kani), a river in the district of Thyreatis, on the E. coast of Peloponessus, rising in Mt. Parnon, and falling into the Thyreatic gulf, after forming the boundary between Argolis and Cynuria (Paus. ii. 88, 7).

Taōcē (Ταόκη), a city on the coast of Persia, near the mouth of the river Granis, used occasionally as a royal residence. The surrounding district was called Taokēnē. (Strab. p. 728; Arr. Ind. 39.)

Taōchi (Τάοχοι), a people of Pontus, on the borders of Armenia, who are frequently mentioned by Xenophon in the Anabasis (iv. 4, 18, v. 15, 17).

Taphiae Insulae, a number of small islands in the Ionian sea, lying between the coasts of Leucadia and Acarnania. They were also called the islands of the Teleboae, and their inhabitants were in like manner named Taphii (Τάφιοι) or Teleboae (Τηλεβόαι). The largest of these islands was called Taphus (Τάφος) by Homer, but Taphiūs (Ταφιοῦς) or Taphiūsa (Ταφιοῦσα) by later writers (now Megarisi). They are mentioned in Homer as the haunts of notorious pirates, and are celebrated in mythology on account of the war carried on between them and Electryon, king of Mycenae. (Od. i. 417, xv. 427, xvi. 426; Hdt. v. 59; Strab. p. 459.)

Taphiassus (Ταφιασσός: Macrivoros and Rigani), a mountain in Aetolia and Locris, properly only a S.W. continuation of Mts. Oeta and Corax. [OETA.]

Taphis (Ταπα, Ru.), a city of the Dodecaschoenus—that is, the district of Aethiopia immediately above Egypt—stood on the W. bank of the Nile, S. of Tzitzis, and N. of Talmis. It is also called Taθίς and Tarίς. There was a town on the opposite bank called Contra-Taphis. (Ptol. iv. 4, 17.)

Taphrae or Tāphros (Τάφραι or Τάφρος; Tāphrios), a town on the isthmus of the Chersonesus Taurica, so called because a trench or ditch was cut across the isthmus at this point (Hdt. iv. 3; Plin. iv. 85).

Taphus. [TAPHIAE.]

Taposiris (Ταπόσειρις, Ταπόσιρις, Ταπόσιρις, i.e. the tomb of Osiris: Abousir, Ru.), a city of Lower Egypt, on the NW. frontier, in the Libya Nomos, W. of Alexandria, so called because it claimed to be considered the burial-place of Osiris (Strab. p. 799; Ptol. iv. 5, 34).—Mention is also made of a Lesser Taposiris (ἡ μικρὰ Ταπόσειρις) near it (Strab. p. 800).

Taprōbānē (Ταπροβάνη: Ceylon), a great island of the Indian Ocean, opposite to the S. extremity of India intra Gangem. The Greeks first became acquainted with it through the researches of Megasthenes and Onesicritus in the time of Alexander, and through information obtained by residents in India. This early information spoke of its elephants, its gold and precious stones, but greatly exaggerated its distance from India. The Roman geographers acquired additional knowledge respecting the island through an embassy which was sent from it to Rome in the reign of Claudius. Of the accounts given of it by the ancients it is only necessary here to state that all agree in describing it as very much larger than it really is. Ptolemy, who gives a great deal of correct information about the island, also exaggerates its size. (Strab. p. 690; Ptol. vii. 4; Plin. vi. 81; Met. iii. 77; Ov. Pont. i. 5, 80.)

Tāpūri (Τάπουροι or Ταπουροί), a powerful people, apparently of Scythian origin, who dwelt in Media, on the borders of Parthia, S. of M. Coronus. They also extended into Margiana, and probably further N. on the E. side of the Caspian, where their original abodes seem to have been in the mountains called by their names. (Strab. pp. 514, 520, 523; Ptol. vi. 10, 2; Curt. vi. 4, 24.)

Tāpūri Montes (τὰ Τάπουρα ὄρη), a range of mountains on the E. of the Caspian sea, inhabited by the TAPURI.

Tāras. [TARENTUM.]

Tarbelli, one of the most important people in Gallia Aquitania, between the Ocean (hence called Tarbellicum Aequor and Tarbellus Oceanus) and the Pyrenees (hence called Tarbella Pyrene). Their country was sandy and unproductive, but contained gold and mineral springs. Their chief town was Aquae Tarbellicae or Augustae, on the Aturus (Dax on the Adour). (Caes. B. G. iii. 27; Strab. p. 190; Lucan, i. 421.)

Tarchon, son of Tyrrhenus, who is said to have built the town of Tarquinii. [TARQUINII.]

Tarentinus Sinus (Ταρεντίνος κόλπος: G. of Tarentum), a great gulf in the S. of Italy, between Bruttium, Lucania, and Calabria, beginning W. near the Prom. Lacinium, and ending E. near the Prom. Iapygium, and named after the town of Tarentum. According to Strabo, it is 1920 stadia in circuit, and the entrance to it is 700 stadia wide, which is a fair approximation. (Strab. pp. 261, 262.)

Tarentum, called Taras by the Greeks (Τάρας, -αντος: Taρεντίνος, Tarentinus: Taranto), an important Greek city in Italy, situated on the W. coast of the peninsula of Calabria, and on a bay of the sea about 100 stadia in circuit, forming an excellent harbour, and being a portion of the great Gulf of Tarentum. The city stood in the midst of a beautiful and fertile country, S. of Mt. Aulon and W. of the mouth of the Galaesus. According to some traditions, to which no great weight is attached, it was originally built by the Iapygians, who are said to have been joined by some Cretan colonists from the neighbouring town of Uria, and it derived its name from the mythical Taras, a son of Poseidon (Paus. x. 10, 6). The greatness of Tarentum (and probably its real origin) date from B.C. 708, when the town was built or taken possession of by a strong body of Lacedaemonian Partheniae under the guidance of Phalanthus [PHALANTHUS]. It soon became the most powerful and flourishing city in the whole of Magna Graecia, and exercised a kind of supremacy over the other Greek cities in Italy. It carried on an extensive commerce, possessed a considerable fleet of ships of war, and was able to bring into the field, with the assistance of its allies, an army of 80,000 foot and 3000 horse. The city itself in its most flourishing period contained 22,000 men capable of bearing arms. The government of Tarentum was different at various periods. In the time of Darius Hystaspis, Herodotus speaks of a king (i.e. a tyrant) of Tarentum; but at a later period the government was a democracy. Archytas, who was born at Tarentum, and who lived about B.C. 400, drew up a code of laws for his native city. With the increase of wealth the citizens became luxurious and effeminate, and being hard pressed by the Lucanians and other barbarians in the neighbourhood, they were obliged to apply for aid to the mother-country. Archidamus, son of Agesilaus, was the first who came to their assistance, in B.C. 338; and he fell in battle fighting on their behalf (Diod. xvi. 83, 88). The next prince whom they invited to succour them was Alexander, king of Epirus, and uncle to Alexander the Great. At first he met with considerable success, but was eventually defeated and slain by the Brutii in 326 near Pandosia on the banks of the Acheron. Shortly afterwards the Tarentines had to encounter a still more formidable enemy. Having attacked some Roman ships, and then grossly insulted the Roman ambassadors who had been sent to demand reparation, they became involved in war with the powerful republic. The Tarentines were saved for a time by Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, who came to their help in 281; but two years after the defeat of this monarch and his withdrawal from Italy, the city was taken by the Romans (272). [PYRRHUS.] In the second Punic war Tarentum revolted from Rome to Hannibal (212); but it was retaken by the Romans in 207, and was treated by them with great severity. From this time Tarentum declined in prosperity and wealth. It was subsequently made a Roman colony, and it still continued to be a place of considerable importance in the time of Augustus. (App. B.C. ii. 40, v. 93; Tac. Ann. i. 10.) Its inhabitants retained their love of luxury and ease, and it is described by Horace as molle Tarentum and imbelle Tarentum. Even after the downfall of the Western Empire the Greek language was still spoken at Tarentum; and it was long one of the chief strongholds of the Byzantine empire in the south of Italy. The town of Tarentum consisted of two parts: the town on the peninsula at the entrance of the harbour was connected with the town on the mainland by a very low isthmus. On the NW. corner of the peninsula, close to the entrance of the harbour, was the citadel; the principal part of the town was situated SW. of the isthmus. The principal gate on the E. side of the city was called the Temenid gate. (Strab. p. 278; Pol. viii. 30.) The entrance to the inner harbour was closed by a bridge. The modern town is confined to the island or peninsula on which the citadel stood. The neighbourhood of Tarentum produced the best wool in all Italy, and was also celebrated for its excellent wine, figs, pears, and other fruits. Its purple dye was also much valued in antiquity. (Pol. x. 1; Flor. i. 18, 3; Strab. p. 278; Scymn. p. 332.) Some part of the district close to Tarentum was called Saturium (Strab. p. 279; Steph. Byz. s.v. Σατύριον). Hence Virgil applies this word as an epithet of Tarentum, and Horace uses it to describe the Tarantine breed of horses (Verg. Georg. ii. 197; Hor. i. 6, 59). [SATURIUM.] The remains of the ancient town are important in archaeology. The line of walls is visible in many places, built of large blocks; there are remains of a Doric temple within the ancient acropolis, of a porticus and of a Roman amphitheatre, which stood on the neck of the isthmus, probably on the site of the old theatre, famous for the outbreak of hostilities with Rome. Of special interest is the rich find of terracotta statuettes, many of them connected with the worship of the Chthonic Dionysus and Persephone.

Tarichēa or -ēae (Ταρίχεια, -έαι, -αῖαι: El-Kereh, Ru.), a town of Galilee, at the S. end of the lake of Tiberias, strongly fortified, and with a turbulent population, who gave the Romans much trouble during the Jewish war. It obtained its name from the quantities of the fish of the neighbouring lakes which were salted here. (Strab. p. 764; Jos. B.J. iii. 10. 1.)

Tarnē (Τάρνη), a city of Lydia, on M. Tmolus, mentioned by Homer. Pliny mentions simply a fountain of the name. (Il. v. 44; Strab. p. 413; Plin. v. 110.)

Tarpa, Sp. Maecius, was engaged by Pompeius to select the plays that were acted at his games exhibited in B.C. 55. Tarpa was likewise employed by Augustus as a censor (perhaps as Magister Collegii) at the public readings of the poets in the Collegium Poetarum. (Cic. ad Fam. vii. 1; Hor. Sat. i. 10, 38, A.P. 287.)

Tarpēia, daughter of Sp. Tarpeius, the governor of the Roman citadel on the Saturnian hill, afterwards called the Capitoline, was tempted by the gold on the Sabine bracelets and collars to open a gate of the fortress to T. Tatius and his Sabines. As they entered, they threw upon her their shields, and thus crushed her to death. She was buried on the hill, and her memory was preserved by the name of the Tarpeian rock, which was given to a part of the Capitoline (Liv. i. 11). Dionysius (ii. 40) speaks of a custom of offering annual libations to her, which suggests the probability that Tarpeia was originally some local deity worshipped at that spot from whom the Tarpeian rock was named, but whose identity had been obscured and confused in later stories. There are similar stories of the betrayal of a fortress and its punishment in other places. One very like it is still told on the site of Gergovia in Auvergne. A legend still exists at Rome which relates that the fair Tarpeia ever sits in the heart of the hill, covered with gold and jewels, and bound by a spell.

Tarphē (Τάρφη), a town in Locris on Mt. Oeta, mentioned by Homer, and subsequently called Pharygae (Il. ii. 533; Strab. p. 426).

Tarquīnia. [TARQUINIUS.]

Tarquīnii (Tarquiniensis: Turchina, nr. Corneto), a city of Etruria, situated on a hill and on the river Marta, SE. of Cosa and on a road leading from the latter town to Rome. It was one of the twelve Etruscan cities, and was probably regarded as the metropolis of the Confederation. It is said to have been founded by Tarchon, the son or brother of Tyrrhenus, who was the leader of the Lydian colony from Asia to Italy (Strab. p. 219; Serv. ad Aen. x. 179, 198). It was in the neighbourhood of Tarquinii that the seer Tages appeared, from whom the Etruscans learnt their civil and religious polity. [TAGES.] There can be no doubt that Tarquinii was an original Etruscan city, and that Tarchon is merely a personification of the race of the Tyrrhenians. It was at Tarquinii that Demaratus, the father of Tarquinius Priscus, is said to have settled. After the expulsion of Tarquinius Superbus from Rome, the Tarquinienses, in conjunction with the Veientes, are said to have espoused his cause, but to have been defeated by the Romans (Liv. ii. 6; Dionys. v. 14). From this time the Tarquinienses were frequently engaged in war with the Romans; but they were at length obliged to submit to Rome about B.C. 310 (Liv. ix. 32-41). Tarquinii was subsequently made a Roman colony and a municipium (App. B.C. i. 49), but it gradually declined in importance; and in the eighth or ninth century of the Christian era it was deserted by its inhabitants, who founded Corneto on the opposite hill. There are few remains of the ancient city itself; but the cemetery of Tarquinii, consisting of a vast number of subterranean caves in the hill on which Corneto stands, is still in a state of excellent preservation, and contains numerous Etruscan paintings: here some of the most interesting remains of Etruscan art have been discovered in modern times.

Tarquinius, the name of a family in early Roman history to which the fifth and seventh kings of Rome belonged. The legend of the Tarquins ran as follows. Demaratus, their ancestor, belonged to the noble family of the Bacchiadae at Corinth, and fled from his native city when the power of his order was overthrown by Cypselus. He settled at Tarquinii in Etruria, where he had mercantile connexions. He married an Etruscan wife, by whom he had two sons, Lucumo and Aruns. The latter died in the lifetime of his father, leaving his wife pregnant; but as Demaratus was ignorant of this circumstance, he bequeathed all his property to Lucumo, and died himself shortly afterwards. But, although Lucumo was thus one of the most wealthy persons at Tarquinii, and had married Tanaquil, who belonged to a family of the highest rank, he was excluded, as a stranger, from all power and influence in the state. Discontented with this inferior position, and urged on by his wife, he resolved to leave Tarquinii, and remove to Rome. He accordingly set out for Rome, driving in a chariot with his wife, and accompanied by a large train of followers. When they had reached the Janiculum an eagle seized his cap, and after carrying it away to a great height placed it again upon his head. Tanaquil, who was skilled in the Etruscan science of augury, bade her husband hope for the highest honour from this omen. Her predictions were soon verified. The stranger was received with welcome, and he and his followers were admitted to the rights of Roman citizens. He took the name of L. Tarquinius, to which Livy adds Priscus. His wealth, his courage and his wisdom gained him the love both of Ancus Marcius and of the people. The former appointed him guardian of his children; and, when he died, the senate and the people unanimously elected Tarquinius to the vacant throne. The reign of Tarquinius was distinguished by great exploits in war, and by great works in peace. He defeated the Latins and Sabines; and the latter people ceded to him the town of Collatia, where he placed a garrison under the command of Egerius, the son of his deceased brother, Aruns, who took the surname of Collatinus. Some traditions relate that Tarquinius defeated the Etruscans likewise. Among the important works which Tarquinius executed in peace, the most celebrated are the vast sewers by which the lower parts of the city were drained, and which still remain [see p. 816, a]. He is also said in some traditions to have laid out the Circus Maximus in the valley which had been drained by the sewers, and also to have instituted the Great or Roman Games, which were henceforth performed in the Circus. The Forum, with its porticoes and rows of shops, was also his work, and he likewise began to surround the city with a stone wall, a work which was finished by his successor, Servius Tullius. The building of the Capitoline temple is moreover attributed to the elder Tarquinius, though most traditions ascribe this work to his son, and only the vow to the father. Tarquinius also made some changes in the constitution of the state. He added 100 new members to the senate who were called patres minorum gentium, to distinguish them from the old senators, who were now called patres majorum gentium. He wished to add other tribes to the three established by Romulus, and to call them after himself and two of his friends. His plan was opposed by the augur Attus Navius, who gave a convincing proof that the gods were opposed to his purpose. [NAVIUS.] Accordingly, he gave up his design of establishing new tribes, but with each of the three he associated another under the same name, so that henceforth there were the first and second Ramnes, Tities and Luceres. Tarquinius was murdered, after a reign of thirty-eight years, at the instigation of the sons of Ancus Marcius. But they did not secure the reward of their crime, for Servius Tullius, with the assistance of Tanaquil, succeeded to the vacant throne. (Liv. i. 34-41; Dionys. iii. 46-73, iv. 1; Cic. de Rep. iii. 20.) Tarquinius left two sons and two daughters. His two sons, L. Tarquinius and Aruns, were subsequently married to the two daughters of Servius Tullius. One of his daughters was married to Servius Tullius, and the other to M. Brutus, by whom she became the mother of the celebrated L. Brutus, the first consul at Rome. Servius Tullius, whose life is given under TULLIUS, was murdered after a reign of forty-four years, by his son-in-law, L. Tarquinius, who ascended the vacant throne.—L. Tarquinius Superbus began his reign without any of the forms of election. One of the first acts of his reign was to abolish the rights which had been conferred upon the plebeians by Servius; and at the same time all the senators and patricians whom he mistrusted, or whose wealth he coveted, were put to death or driven into exile. He surrounded himself by a body-guard, by means of which he was enabled to do what he liked. His cruelty and tyranny obtained for him the surname of Superbus. But, although a tyrant at home, he raised Rome to great influence and power among the surrounding nations. He gave his daughter in marriage to Octavius Mamilius of Tusculum, the most powerful of the Latin chiefs; and under his sway Rome became the head of the Latin Confederacy. He defeated the Volscians, and took the wealthy town of Suessa Pometia, with the spoils of which he commenced the erection of the Capitol, which his father had vowed. In the vaults of this temple he deposited the Sibylline books, which the king purchased from a Sibyl or prophetess. She had offered to sell him nine books for 300 pieces of gold. The king refused the offer with scorn. Thereupon she went away, and burned three, and then demanded the same price for the six. The king still refused. She again went away and burnt three more, and still demanded the same price for the remaining three. The king now purchased the three books, and the Sibyl disappeared. He next engaged in war with Gabii, one of the Latin cities which refused to enter into the League. Unable to take the city by force of arms, Tarquinius had recourse to stratagem. His son, Sextus, pretending to be ill-treated by his father, and covered with the bloody marks of stripes, fled to Gabii. The infatuated inhabitants intrusted him with the command of their troops: whereupon he sent a messenger to his father to inquire how he should deliver the city into his hands. The king, who was walking in his garden when the messenger arrived, made no reply, but kept striking off the heads of the tallest poppies with his stick. Sextus took the hint. He put to death or banished all the leading men of the place, and then had no difficulty in compelling it to submit to his father (cf. Ov. Fast. ii. 686-710). In the midst of his prosperity, Tarquinius fell through a shameful outrage committed by one of his sons. Tarquinius and his sons were engaged in besieging Ardea, a city of the Rutulians. Here, as the king's sons, and their cousin, Tarquinius Collatinus, the son of Egerius, were feasting together, a dispute arose about the virtue of their wives. To settle the matter they mounted their horses, and first went to Rome, where they surprised the king's daughters at a splendid banquet; then to Collatia, where, though it was late in the night, they found Lucretia, the wife of Collatinus, spinning amid her handmaids. The beauty and virtue of Lucretia had fired the evil passions of Sextus. A few days afterwards he returned to Collatia, where he was hospitably received by Lucretia as her husband's kinsman. In the dead of night he entered her chamber with a drawn sword: by threatening to lay a slave with his throat cut beside her, whom he would pretend to have killed in order to avenge her husband's honour, he forced her to yield to his wishes. As soon as Sextus had departed, Lucretia sent for her husband and her father. Collatinus came, accompanied by L. Brutus; Lucretius, with P. Valerius, who afterwards gained the surname of Publicola. They found her in an agony of sorrow. She told them what had happened, enjoined them to avenge her dishonour, and then stabbed herself to death (cf. Ov. Fast. ii. 725-832). They all swore to avenge her. Brutus threw off his assumed stupidity, and placed himself at their head. They carried the corpse to Rome. Brutus, who was Tribunus Celerum, summoned the people, and related the deed of shame. All classes were inflamed with indignation. A decree was passed deposing the king, and banishing him and his family from the city. The army encamped before Ardea likewise renounced their allegiance to the tyrant. Tarquinius, with his two sons, Titus and Aruns, took refuge at Caere in Etruria. Sextus repaired to Gabii, his own principality, where he was shortly after murdered by the friends of those whom he had put to death. Tarquinius reigned twenty-four years. He was banished B.C. 510. The people of Tarquinii and Veii espoused the cause of the exiled tyrant, and marched against Rome. The two consuls advanced to meet them. A bloody battle was fought, in which Brutus and Aruns, the son of Tarquinius, slew each other. Tarquinius next repaired to Lars Porsena or Porsenna, the powerful king of Clusium, who marched against Rome at the head of a vast army. [See under PORSENA.] Next Tarquinius took refuge with his son-in-law, Mamilius Octavius of Tusculum, and the Latin states declared war against Rome. The contest was decided by the celebrated battle of the lake Regillus, in which the Romans gained the victory by the help of Castor and Pollux. Tarquinius himself was wounded, but escaped with his life; his son Sextus is said to have fallen in this battle, though, according to another tradition, as we have already seen, he was slain by the inhabitants of Gabii. Tarquinius Superbus had now no other state to which he could apply for assistance. He had already survived all his family, and he now fled to Aristobulus at Cumae, where he died a wretched and childless old man. (Liv. ii. 1-21; Dionys. v. 1-vi. 21.) Such is the story of the Tarquins according to the ancient writers; but this story must not be received as a real history. It is the attempt to assign a definite origin to certain Roman institutions, to some features in the military organisation, and to some ancient public works in the city, of which the history had been obscured by lapse of time. There can be little doubt that it indicates as the time when these things were carried out a period during which a family of Etruscan origin held the chief power at Rome; and there is at least great probability (though this is denied by some writers of great authority) that this rule was imposed upon Rome by the dominant power of the Etruscans.

Tarracina (Tarracinensis: Terracina), also called Anxur (Anxurates), an ancient town of Latium situated fifty-eight miles SE. of Rome on the Via Appia and upon the coast, with a strongly fortified citadel upon a high hill, on which stood the temple of Jupiter Anxurus (Liv. iv. 49; Verg. Aen. vii. 799; Hor. Sat. i. 5, 26; Lucan. iii. 84; Mart. v. 1, 6). It originally belonged to the Volsci, by whom it was called Anxur. It was conquered by the Romans, who gave it the name of Tarracina, and it was made a Roman colony, B.C. 329 (Liv. viii. 21; Vell. Pat. i. 14). Three miles W. of the town stood the grove of Feronia, with a temple of this goddess. The ancient walls of the citadel of Tarracina are still visible on the slope of Montecchio.

Tarraco (Tarraconensis: Tarragona), an ancient town on the coast of Spain situated on a rock 760 feet high, between the river Iberus and the Pyrenees, on the river Tulcis. It was founded by the Massilians, and was made the head-quarters of the brothers P. and Cn. Scipio, in their campaigns against the Carthaginians in the second Punic war (Liv. xxi. 61; Pol. x. 34). It subsequently became a populous and flourishing town; and Augustus, who wintered here (B.C. 26) after his Cantabrian campaign, made it the capital of one of the three Spanish provinces (Hispania Tarraconensis) and also a Roman colony. Hence we find it called Colonia Tarraconensis, also Col. Victrix Togata and Col. Julia Victrix Tarraconensis. (Strab. p. 159; Plin. iii. 18; Tac. Ann. i. 78; Mart. x. 104, xiii. 118.) The modern town of Tarragona is built to a great extent with the remains of the ancient city, and Roman inscriptions may frequently be seen embedded in the walls of the houses. The ancient Roman aqueduct, having been repaired in modern times, still supplies the city with water; and at a short distance to the NW. of Tarragona, along the sea coast, is a Roman sepulchre called the Tower of the Scipios, although the real place of the burial of the Scipios is quite unknown.

Tarruntēnus Paternus. [PATERNUS.]

Tarsia (Ταρσίη: Ras Bostana), a promontory of Carmania, on the coast of the Persian Gulf, near the frontier of Persis. The neighbouring part of the coast of Carmania was called Tarsiana (Arr. Ind. 37).

Tarsius (ὁ Τάρσιος: Karadere), a river of Mysia, rising in M. Temnus, and flowing NE., through the Miletopolites Lacus, into the Macestus (Strab. p. 587).

Tarsus, Tarsos (Ταρσός, Ταρσοί, Τερσός, Θαρσός: Ταρσεύς, Tarsensis: Tersus, Ru.), the chief city of Cilicia, stood near the centre of Cilicia Campestris, on the river Cydnus, about twelve miles above its mouth, in a very large and fertile plain at the foot of M. Taurus, the chief pass through which (Pylae Ciliciae) led down to Tarsus. Its position gave it the full benefit of the natural advantages of a fertile country, and the command of an important highway of commerce. It had also an excellent harbour, twelve miles from the city, formed by a lagoon into which the Cydnus flows, but this has now been filled up with sand. The city was of unknown antiquity. Some ascribed its foundation to the Assyrian king Sardanapalus; others to Perseus, in connexion with whose legend the name of the city is fancifully derived from a hoof (ταρσός) which the winged horse Pegasus lost here; and others to the Argive chieftain Triptolemus, whose effigy appears on the coins of the city (Strab. p. 673; Staph. Byz. s.v.). All that can be determined with certainty seems to be that it was a very ancient city of the Syrians, who were the earliest known inhabitants of this part of Asia Minor, and that it received Greek settlers at an early period. In the time of Xenophon, who gives us the first historical notice of Tarsus, it was the capital of the Cilician prince Syennesis, and was taken by Cyrus (Xen. An. i. 2, 23). [Comp. CILICIA.] At the time of the Macedonian invasion, it was held by the Persian troops, who were about to burn it, when they were prevented by Alexander's arrival (Arr. An. ii. 4; Curt. iii. 5). After playing an important part as a military post in the wars of the successors of Alexander, and under the Syrian kings, it became, by the peace between the Romans and Antiochus the Great, the frontier city of the Syrian kingdom on the NW. At the time of the Mithridatic war, it suffered, on the one hand, from Tigranes, who overran Cilicia, and, on the other, from the pirates, who had their strongholds in the mountains of Cilicia Aspera, and made frequent incursions into the level country. From both these enemies it was rescued by Pompey, who made it the capital of the new Roman province of Cilicia, B.C. 66. In the Civil war, it took part with Caesar, and assumed, in his honour, the name of Juliopolis (Bell. Alex. 66; Dio Cass. xlvii. 24). For this the inhabitants were punished by Cassius, but were recompensed by Antony, who made Tarsus a free city. Under Augustus, the city obtained immunity from taxes, through the influence of the emperor's tutor, the Stoic Athenodorus, who was a native of the place. It was the scene of important events in the wars with the Persians, the Arabs, and the Turks, and also in the Crusades. The people of Tarsus were celebrated for their mental power, their readiness in repartee, and their fondness for the study of philosophy. Among the most distinguished natives of the place were: the Stoics Antipater, Archedemus, Heraclides, Nestor, Zeno, and the two Athenodori; the Academic Nestor; the Epicureans Diogenes (celebrated for his powers of improvising), Lysias (who was for a time tyrant of the city), and Plutarch; the tragic poets Dionysides and Bion; the grammarian Artemidorus; the historian Hermogenes; the physicians Herodotus and Philo; and, above all, the apostle Paul, who belonged to one of several families of Jews who had settled at Tarsus in considerable numbers, under the Persian and Syrian kings.

Tartarus (Τάρταρος), son of Aether and Ge, and by his mother Ge the father of the Gigantes Typhoeus and Echidna (Hes. Th. 821; Apollod. ii. 1, 2; Hyg. Fab. 152). [For Tartarus in the underworld, see HADES, p. 376.]

Tartarus (Tartaro), a river of Venetia between the Athesis (Adige) and the Po. Its waters now pass by canals into these rivers. In ancient times it had an exit, partly artificial, to the sea, and in part of its course formed wide marshes (Tac. Hist. iii. 9; Plin. iii. 121).

Tartessus (Ταρτησσός: Ταρτήσσιος), a district in the S. of Spain colonised, or occupied for trading purposes, by the Phoenicians. It extended on both sides of the Baetis (Guadalquivir) in the lower part of its course, and that river itself was sometimes called Tartessus (Stesich. ap. Strab. p. 148; Avien. Or. Mar. i. 224). The country was rich in metals, iron, tin, lead, silver, and (to some extent) gold; and it is probably (though some writers deny it) the Tarshish of Scripture. It is likely that a town or port called Tartessus stood at the mouth of the Baetis and was a trading station of the Phoenicians. But it disappeared in early times, possibly because it was superseded by Gades, which belonged to the same district. (Hdt. i. 163, iv. 152; Strab. pp. 148, 151; Plin. iii. 7; Mel. ii. 6.) * By some writers it was (probably erroneously) taken to have been the ancient name of one or other town of the district, such as Gades or Carteia (Hdt. i. 163, iv. 152; Strab. pp. 148, 151; Plin. iii. 7; Mel. ii. 6).

Taruscon or Tarascon (Tarusconienses: Tarascon), a town of the Salvi in Gaul, on the E. bank of the Rhone, N. of Arelate, and E. of Nemausus.

Tarvisium (Tarvisanus: Treviso), a town of Venetia in the N. of Italy, on the river Silis, which became the seat of a bishopric, and a place of importance in the middle ages.

Tatianus (Τατιανός), a Christian writer of the second century. [Dict. of Christ. Biogr.]

T. Tātius, king of the Sabines. [ROMULUS.]

Tatta (ἡ Τάρτα: Tuz-Göl), a great salt lake in the centre of Asia Minor, on the Phrygian table-land, on the confines of Phrygia, Galatia, Cappadocia, and Lycaonia. It supplies the whole surrounding country with salt, as it doubtless did in ancient times (Strab. p. 558; Plin. xxxi. 84).

Tauchira or Teuchira (Ταύχειρα, Τεύχειρα: Taukra, Ru.), a colony of Cyrene, on the NW. coast of Cyrenaica, in N. Africa. Under the Ptolemies, it was called Arsinoë, and was one of the five cities of the Libyan Pentapolis. It became a Roman colony, and was fortified by Justinian. It was a chief seat of the worship of Cybele, who had here a great temple and an annual festival. (Hdt. iv. 171; Strab. p. 836; Procop. de Aed. vi. 3.)

Taulantii (Ταυλάντιοι), a people of Illyria, in the neighbourhood of Epidamnus, frequently mentioned by the Greek and Roman writers. One of their most powerful kings was Glaucias, a contemporary of Alexander the Great, who fought against the latter monarch, and at a later period afforded an asylum to the infant Pyrrhus, and refused to surrender him to Cassander. (Thuc. i. 24; Arr. An. i. 5; Liv. xlv. 26.)

Taurus (Taunus), a range of mountains in Germany, at no great distance from the confluence of the Moenus (Main) and the Rhine (Tac. Ann. i. 56, xii. 58; Mel. iii. 3).

Taurasia. 1. An ancient city of Samnium, in the country of the Hirpini, on the right bank of the Calor. It is mentioned among the towns taken by Scipio Barbatus.—2. [TAURINI.]

Tauri, the inhabitants of the Chersonesus Taurica (Crimea), the remnant of a people, perhaps the Cimmerians, who had retreated before the Scythians. They were divided into tribes of whom some were nomad, others agricultural. (Hdt. iv. 11, 12; Strab. p. 311.) They are described as a rude and savage people, addicted to piracy (Hdt. iv. 103; Strab. p. 308; Tac. Ann. xii. 17). In particular their religious rites were cruel, according to which they offered human sacrifices to their goddess, whom the Greeks identified with ARTEMIS [see p. 128]. Especially, shipwrecked sailors were thus sacrificed (Eur. I. T.; Diod. iv. 44; Hdt. iv. 103; Ov. Pont. iii. 2, 57). [CHERSONESUS.]

Taurianum (Traviano), a town of Bruttium, on the Via Popilia, twenty-three miles SE. of Vibo.

Taurini, a people of Liguria dwelling on the upper course of the Po, at the foot of the Alps. Their chief town was Taurasia, afterwards colonised by Augustus, and called Augusta Taurinorum (Turin). (Pol. ii. 17, iii. 60; Liv. xxi. 38; App. Annib. 5; Strab. p. 204.)

Tauris (Torcola), a small island off the coast of Illyria, between Pharos and Coreyra (Bell. Alex. 47).

Taurisci, a Celtic people in Noricum, and probably the old Celtic name of the entire population of the country. They were subsequently called Norici by the Romans after their capital Noreia. [NORICUM.]

Taurolis, Tauroentium (Ταυρόεις, Ταυροέντιον), a colony of the Massaliots between Massilia and Telo Martius (Toulon). Its site is marked by the modern Tarente. (Caes. B.C. ii. 4; Strab. pp. 180, 184.)

Tauroménion: Ταυρομενίτης, Tauromenitanus: Taormina, a city on the E.

Augustus, most of its inhabitants were expelled from the city, and their place supplied by a colony of veterans: hence we find the town called Col. Augusta Tauromenitana. From this time Tauromenium became a place of secondary importance. (Diod. xiv. 58, 96; Strab. p. 267; App. B.C. v. 103–111; Juv. v. 93.) The hills in the neighbourhood produced excellent wine. There are still remains of the ancient town, of which the most important is a splendid theatre cut out of the rock, and capable of holding from 30,000 to 40,000 spectators, from which we may form some idea of the populousness of Tauromenium.

Tauroschythae. [SCYTHOTAURI.]

Taurunum (Semlin), a strongly fortified town in Pannonia at the confluence of the Savus and the Danube (Ptol. ii. 16, 4).

Taurus, Statilius, a distinguished general of Octavian. At the battle of Actium, B.C. 31, he commanded the land-forces of Octavian, which were drawn up on the shore. In 29 he defeated the Cantabri, Vaccaei, and Astures. He was consul in 26; and in 16, when the emperor went to Gaul, the government of the city and of Italy was left to Taurus, with the title of praefectus urbi. (App. B.C. v. 97–118; Tac. Ann. vi. 11; Dio Cass. xlix. 14, li. 20, liv. 19.) In the fourth consulship of Augustus, 30, Taurus built an amphitheatre of stone at his own expense. [ROMA, p. 811, a.]

Taurus (ὁ Ταῦρος, from the Aramaean Tur, a high mountain: Taurus, Ala-Dagh, and other special names), a great mountain chain of Asia. In its widest extent the name was applied by the later geographers to the whole of the great chain which runs through Asia from W. to E., forming the S. margin of the great table-land of Central Asia, which it divides from the Mediterranean coast of Asia Minor, from Syria and the Tigris and Euphrates valley, from the low lands on the N. shore of the Indian Ocean, and from the two great peninsulas of India (Strab. pp. 490, 689). But in its usual significance, it denotes the mountain chain in the S. of Asia Minor which begins at the Sacrum or Chelidonium Prom. at the SE. angle of Lycia, surrounds the gulf of Pamphylia, passing through the middle of Pisidia; then along the S. frontier of Lycaonia and Cappadocia, which it divides from Cilicia and Commagene; thence, after being broken through by the Euphrates, it proceeds almost due E. through the S. of Armenia, forming the water-shed between the sources of the Tigris on the S. and the streams which feed the upper Euphrates and the Araxes on the N.; thus it continues as far as the S. margin of the lake Arsissa, where it ceases to bear the name of Taurus, and is continued in the chain which, under the names of Niphates, Zagros, &c., forms the NE. margin of the Tigris and Euphrates valley. (Strab. pp. 129, 520, 651, 666; Mel. i. 15; Plin. v. 99.) This main chain sends off branches which are nearly as important as itself. In the middle of the frontier between Cilicia and Cappadocia, E. of the Cilician Gates, the ANTITAURUS branches off to the NE. In the E. of Cilicia, the AMANUS goes off to the SW. and S. Immediately E. of the Euphrates, a branch proceeds to the SE., forming, under the name of MASIUS, the frontier between Armenia and Mesopotamia, and dividing the valley of the Upper Tigris from the waters which flow through Mesopotamia into the Euphrates. The Taurus is of moderate height, for the most part steep, and wooded to the summit. Its general character coast of Sicily, situated on the hill Taurus, from which it derived its name, between Mesana and Catana, and founded B.C. 358 by Andromachus with the remains of the inhabitants of Naxos, whose town had been destroyed by Dionysius nearly fifty years before. [NAXOS, No. 2.] Tauromenium soon became a large and flourishing city; but in consequence of its espousing the side of Sex. Pompey against greatly resembles the mountains of central Germany.

Tāvium (Ταύιον, Ταύιον), the capital of the Trocmi, in Galatia, stood on the E. side of the Halys, but at some distance from the river, and formed the centre of meeting for roads leading to all parts of Asia Minor (Strab. p. 567; Plin. v. 146; Steph. Byz. s.v.). It was therefore a place of considerable commercial importance. It had a temple and bronze colossus of Zeus. The position of the city has been much disputed, but it seems to have been proved by the discovery of a milestone marking the caput viae at the modern Nefez Keni, that this was the site of Tavium.

Taxila or Taxiāla (τὰ Τάξιλα, Ταξίλα), an important city of India intra Gangem, stood in a large and fertile plain between the Indus and the Hydaspes, and was the capital of the Indian king Taxiles, in the time of Alexander (Arr. An. v. 8; Ptol. vii. 1, 45; Strab. pp. 698-714). Its position was probably at Shah Dheri, about forty miles from the Indus, where there are extensive ruins.

Taxiles (Ταξίλης). 1. An Indian prince or king, who reigned over the tract between the Indus and the Hydaspes, at the period of the expedition of Alexander, B.C. 327. His real name was Mophis, or Omphis, and the Greeks appear to have called him Taxiles or Taxilas, from the name of his capital city of Taxila. On the approach of Alexander he hastened to meet him with valuable presents, and was in consequence confirmed in his kingdom by the Macedonian monarch. (Diod. xvii. 86; Curt. viii. 12, 4; Arr. An. iv. 22, v. 3, 8; Strab. p. 698; Just. xiii. 4.)—2. A general in the service of Mithridates the Great, and one of those in whom he reposed the highest confidence (Plut. Sull. 15, Lucull. 17).

Tāygetē (Ταῦγέτη), daughter of Atlas and Pleione, one of the Pleiades, from whom Mt. Taygetus in Laconia is said to have derived its name. By Zeus she became the mother of Lacedaemon and of Eurotas. (Apollod. iii. 10, 1; Paus. iii. 1, 2.)

Tāygetus or Taygetum or Taygēta (Ταῦγετος, Ταῦγετον, τὰ Ταῦγετα pl.), a lofty range of mountains of a wild and savage character, separating Laconica and Messenia, and extending from the frontiers of Arcadia down to the Prom. Taenarum. Its highest points were called Talētus and Evōras, about three miles S. of Sparta. [LACONIA.]

Teānum (Teanenensis). 1. Apūlum (Civitate), a town of Apulia on the river Frento and the confines of the Frentani, eighteen miles from Larinum (Liv. ix. 20; Cic. pro Clu. 9; Strab. p. 285).—2. Sidicinum (Teano), an important town of Campania, and the capital of the Sidicini, situated on the N. slope of Mt. Massicus and on the Via Praenestina, six miles W. of Cales (Liv. xxii. 57; Cic. ad Att. viii. 11; Strab. p. 237). It was made a Roman colony by Augustus; and in its neighbourhood were some celebrated medicinal springs. There are remains of the theatre and of the amphitheatre.

Teārus (Τέαρος): Teara, Deara, or Dere, a river of Thrace, the waters of which were useful in curing cutaneous diseases. Herodotus relates that it rises from thirty-eight fountains, all flowing from the same rock, some warm and others cold. It falls into the Contadesus; this into the Agrianes; and the latter again into the Hebrus. (Hdt. iv. 90.)

Teātē (Teatinus: Chieti), the capital of the Marrucini, situated on a steep hill on the river Aterras, and on the road from Aternum to Corfinium (Strab. p. 241; Sil. Ital. viii. 520).

Teomessa (Τέκμησσα), the daughter of the Phrygian king Teleutas, whose territory was ravaged by the Greeks during a predatory excursion from Troy. Teomessa was taken prisoner, and was given to Ajax, the son of Telamon, by whom she had a son, Eurysaces. [AJAX.]

Tecmōn (Τέκμων), a town of the Molossi in Epirus (Liv. xlv. 26; Steph. Byz. s.v.).

Tectaeus and Angellōn (Τεκταῖος καὶ Ἀγγελλίων), early Greek sculptors, who are always mentioned together. They were pupils of Dipoenus and Scyllis, and instructors of Callon of Aegina, and therefore they must have lived about B.C. 548. They were authors of a statue of Apollo at Delos, holding in his right hand a bow, and in his left figures of the three Graces. (Paus. ii. 32, 5, ix. 35, 3.)

Tectōsāges (Τεκτόσαγες). 1. In Gallia. [VOLCAE.]—2. In Asia Minor. [GALATIA.]

Tecum, Tētum or Ticis (Τεcli), a river in Gallia Narbonensis in the territory of the Sardones, called Illiberis by the Greeks from a town of this name upon the river (Mel. ii. 5; Plin. iii. 32).

Tedanūs, a river in Illyricum, separating Iapydia and Liburnia (Ptol. ii. 16, 3).

Tēgēa (Τεγέα). 1. (Τεγεάτης: Piali), an important city of Arcadia, and the capital of the district Tegeātis (Τεγεαῖτις), which was bounded on the E. by Argolis and Laconica, on the S. by Laconica, on the W. by Maenalia, and on the N. by the territory of Mantinea (Il. ii. 607; Paus. viii. 3, 4; Strab. p. 337). It was one of the most ancient towns of Arcadia, and is said to have been founded by Tegeates, the son of Lycaon. It was formed out of nine small townships, which were united into one city by Aleus, who was thus regarded as the real founder of the city. At a later time we find Tegea divided into four tribes, each of which possessed a statue of Apollo Agyieus, who was especially honoured in Tegea. The Tegeatae long resisted the supremacy of Sparta; and, according to tradition, it was not till the Spartans discovered the bones of Orestes that they were enabled to conquer this people. (Hdt. i. 65-67; Paus. iii. 7, 3, viii. 5, 9, viii. 45-48.) The Tegeatae sent 3000 men to the battle of Plataea, in which they were distinguished for their bravery (Hdt. ix. 26). They remained faithful to Sparta in the Peloponnesian war, but after the battle of Leuctra they joined the rest of the Arcadians in establishing their independence. During the wars of the Achaean League Tegea was taken both by Cleomenes, king of Sparta, and Antigonus Doson, king of Macedonia, and the ally of the Achaeans (Pol. ii. 46, 54). It continued to be a place of importance in the time both of Strabo and of Pausanias. Its most splendid public building was the temple of Athene, which was the largest and most magnificent building in the Peloponnesus. It was erected soon after B.C. 394, in place of a more ancient temple of this goddess, which was burnt down in this year. The architect was Scopas, and the sculpture in the pediments were probably by the hand of Scopas himself (Paus. viii. 45, 4; Scopas). Remains of the city are found at the villages of Piali and Haghios Sostis. At the latter a great number of statuettes of bronze and terracotta were dug up, which seem to have been offerings to Demeter and Kore, whose temple must have been on this spot.—2. A town in Crete, said to have been founded by Agamemnon (Vell. Pat. i. 1).

Tegiānum (Diano) a municipal town of Lucania, situated on the river Tanager (Plin. iii. 98).

Tēlāmōn (Τελαμών), son of Aeacus and Endeis, and brother of Peleus. Having assisted Peleus in slaying their half-brother, Phocus [PELEUS], Telamon was expelled from Aegina, and came to Salamis. Here he was first married to Glaucē, daughter of Cychreus, king of the island, on whose death Telamon became king of Salamis (Diod. iv. 72). He afterwards married Periboea or Eriboea, daughter of Alcaethous, by whom he became the father of Ajax, who is hence frequently called Telamoniades, and Telamoniūs heros. [AJAX.] Telamon himself was one of the Calydonian hunters and one of the Argonauts. He was also a friend of Heracles, whom he joined in his expedition against Laomedon of Troy, which city he was the first to enter. He there erected an altar to Heracles Callinicus or Alexicacus. (Apollod. ii. 6, 4; Theoc. xiii. 38; Schol. ad Ap. Rh. i. 1289.) Heracles, in return, gave to him Theanira or Hesione, a daughter of Laomedon, by whom he became the father of Teucer and Trambelus. On this expedition Telamon and Heracles also fought against the Meropes in Cos, on account of Chalciopē, the beautiful daughter of Eurypylus, the king of the Meropes, and against the giant Alcioneus, on the isthmus of Corinth. Telamon likewise accompanied Heracles on his expedition against the Amazons, and slew Melanippe (Pind. Nem. iii. 65; Schol. ad loc.).

Tēlāmōn (Telamone), a town and harbour of Etruria, S. of the river Umbro, said to have been founded by Telamon on his return from the Argonautic expedition (Diod. iv. 56), but there can be little doubt that it was originally an Etruscan town. In its neighbourhood a great victory was gained over the Gauls in B.C. 225 (Pol. i. 27–31). It was here that Marius landed on his return from Africa in 87 (Plut. Mor. 41). Telamon is mentioned as a port in Pliny (iii. 51) and in the Itineraries of the fourth century, but since that time there has been nothing on the site but a poor village and ruins of Roman buildings.

Telchines (Τελχίνες), a family or tribe of mythical beings or demons, analogous in some respects to the trolls or goblins of Northern, and the genii of Oriental, folk-lore. They are said to have been the children of Thalassa (for which reason a late writer—Eustathius, ad Hom. p. 771—represents them as like mermen, with fins instead of feet). They came from Crete to Cyprus and from thence to Rhodes, where they founded Camirus, Ialysus, and Lindus. Rhodes, which was named after them Telchinis, was abandoned by them, because they foresaw that the island would be inundated. They then spread in different directions. Lycus went to Lycia, where he built the temple of the Lycian Apollo. This god had been worshipped by them at Lindus, and Hera at Ialysus and Camirus. There is a further indication of their connexion with a sea-going people in the Rhodian story that Poseidon was intrusted to them by Rhea, and they brought him up in conjunction with Caphira, a daughter of Oceanus. Poseidon wedded Halia, the sister of the Telchines, who bore six sons and a daughter, Rhodos, from whom the island was named. The sons drove Aphrodite from the island, and she sent madness upon them, which caused Poseidon to bury them beneath the earth. In their operation they are represented in different aspects:—(1) As sorcerers and malicious sprites. Their very eyes and aspect are said to have been destructive. They had it in their power to bring on hail, rain, and snow, and to assume any form they pleased; they further mixed Stygian water with sulphur, in order thereby to destroy animals and plants. One account represents Zeus as destroying them with an inundation (Ov. Met. vii. 367) as malicious or βόσκανοι: another makes their destroyer Apollo in the shape of a wolf (Serv. ad Aen. iv. 377). (2) As inventors of agriculture. (3) As artists and handicraftsmen. They are said to have invented useful arts and institutions, and to have made images of the gods. They worked in brass and iron, made the sickle of Cronos and the trident of Poseidon (Diod. v. 55; Strab. pp. 472, 653; Paus. ix. 19, 1; Tzetz. Chil. vii. 124). The origin of these myths seems to be partly the widespread superstition of gnomes or goblins working at metals, or rich in metals, dwelling beneath mountains, and acting sometimes in malice, sometimes in kindness—but partly also the attempt to explain the origin of certain works and inventions in Rhodes or elsewhere. It is probable that in this aspect the Phoenicians were the originals of the Telchines, and the myth is really describing how Phoenician arts and metal-working were introduced by this maritime people from the side of Crete, and how the ingenious race of artisans migrated from Rhodes to Lycia and elsewhere. Of this last event we have no particular evidence: but it is not improbable, and the Termilae in Lycia were said to be Cretans. [See p. 504, a.] The account of the Telchines may be compared with that of the Idaean DACTYLI.

Tēlēbōae. [TAPHIAE.]

Tēlēbōas (Τηλεβόας), a river of Armenia Major, falling into the Euphrates; probably identical with the ARSANIAS.

Tēlēclides (Τηλεκλειδης), an Athenian comic poet of the Old Comedy, about the same time as Crates and Cratinus, and a little earlier than Aristophanes. He was an earnest advocate of peace, a great admirer of the ancient manners of the age of Themistocles, a supporter of Nicias, and an assailant of Pericles (Plut. Per. 3, 16, Nic. 4). Fragments of his plays are included in Meineke's Fragm. Com. Graec.

Tēlēclus (Τήλεκλος), king of Sparta, eighth of the Agids, and son of Archelaus. He was slain by the Messenians, in a temple of Artemis Limnatis, on the borders. His death was the immediate occasion of the first Messenian war, B.C. 743. (Hdt. vii. 104; Paus. iii. 2, 6, iv. 4, 2.)

Tēlēgōnus (Τηλέγονος), son of Odysseus and Circe. After Odysseus had returned to Ithaca, Circe sent out Telegonus in search of his father. A storm cast his ship on the coast of Ithaca, and being pressed by hunger he began to plunder the fields. Odysseus and Telemachus being informed of the ravages caused by the stranger, went out to fight against him; but Telegonus ran Odysseus through with a spear which he had received from his mother. At the command of Athene, Telegonus, accompanied by Telemachus and Penelope, went to Circe in Aëaea, there buried the body of Odysseus, and married Penelope, by whom he became the father of Italus. [See ODYSSEUS, p. 618, b.] In Italy Telegonus was believed to have been the founder of the towns of TUSCULUM and

Tēlēmachus (Τηλέμαχος), son of Odysseus and Penelope. He was still an infant when the Trojan war began, and when his father had been absent from home nearly twenty years, Telemachus went to Pylos and Sparta to gather information concerning him. He was hospitably received by Nestor, who sent his own son to conduct Telemachus to Sparta. Menelaus also received him kindly, and communicated to him the prophecy of Proteus concerning Odysseus. From Sparta Telemachus returned home; and on his arrival there he found his father, whom he assisted in slaying the suitors. [ODYSSEUS.] According to some accounts, Telemachus became the father of Perseptolis either by Polycaste, the daughter of Nestor, or by Nausicaa, the daughter of Alcinoos (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1796; Dict. Cret. vi. 6). Others relate that he was induced by Athene to marry Circe, and became by her the father of Latinus [see p. 618, b]; or that he married Cassiphone, a daughter of Circe, but in a quarrel with his mother-in-law slew her, for which he was in his turn killed by Cassiphone (Tzet. ad Lyc. 808).

Tēlēmus (Τήλεμος), son of Eurymus, and a celebrated soothsayer (Od. ix. 509; Ov. Met. xiii. 771; Theocr. vi. 23).

Tēlēphus (Τήλεφος), son of Heracles and Auge, the daughter of king Aleus of Tegea, and priestess of Athene. As soon as he was born he was exposed by his grandfather, who was angry because his daughter had broken the vows of her office. In some accounts she was set adrift, like Danaë, with her child and cast on the Mysian coast. In other versions of the story Telephus was reared by a hind (ἔλαφος), and educated by king Corythus in Arcadia. On reaching manhood, he consulted the Delphic oracle to learn his parentage, and was ordered to go to king Teuthras in Mysia. (Apollod. iii. 9, 1; Diod. iv. 33; Hyg. Fab. 100.) He there found his mother, and succeeded Teuthras on the throne of Mysia. He married Laodice or Astyoche, a daughter of Priam; and he attempted to prevent the Greeks from landing on the coast of Mysia. Dionysus, however, caused him to stumble over a vine, whereupon he was wounded by Achilles. (Pind. Ol. ix. 112, Isth. v. 52, viii. 109; Paus. x. 28; Dict. Cret. ii. 3.) Being informed by an oracle that the wound could only be cured by 'the wounder,' Telephus repaired to the Grecian camp; and as the Greeks had likewise learnt from an oracle that without the aid of Telephus they could not reach Troy, Achilles cured Telephus by means of the rust of the spear by which he had been wounded (Dict. Cret. ii. 10; Hor. Epod. xvii. 8; Ov. Met. xii. 112, Rem. Am. 47). Telephus, in return, pointed out to the Greeks the road which they had to take. According to one story Telephus, in order to induce the Greeks to help him, went to Argos and snatching Orestes from his cradle threatened to kill him unless Agamemnon would persuade Achilles to heal the wound. The story of Telephus (unknown to the Iliad) formed the subject of numerous vase paintings, and of a tragedy of Euripides, who was ridiculed because he introduced Telephus in so miserable and ragged a condition (cf. Hor. A. P. 96).

Tēleptē. [THALA.]

Telesia (Telesinus: Telese), a town in Samnium in the valley of the Calor, on the road from Allifae to Beneventum, taken by Hannibal in the second Punic war, and afterwards retaken by the Romans. It was colonised by Augustus with a body of veterans. It was the birthplace of PONTIUS, who fought against Sulla, and who was hence surnamed Telesinus. (Liv. xxii. 13, xxiv. 20; Strab. p. 250.) The ruins show a circuit of walls about one mile and a half in circumference with several gates. They belong to the Roman, not to the Samnite, town.

Tēlēsilla (Τελέσιλλα), a lyric poetess of Argos, about B.C. 510. In the war of Argos against Sparta, she not only encouraged her countrymen by her lyre and song, but she took up arms at the head of a band of her countrywomen, and greatly contributed to the victory which they gained over the Spartans. In memory of this exploit, her statue was erected in the temple of Aphrodite at Argos, with the emblems of a poetess and a heroine; Ares was worshipped in that city as a patron deity of women, and the prowess of her female associates was commemorated by the annual festival called Hybristica. The scanty remnants of her poetry are in Bergk, Poët. Lyr. Graec. (Plut. de Mul. Virt. p. 245; Paus. ii. 20, 7; cf. Hdt. vi. 77.)

Tēlēsinus, Pontius. [PONTIUS.]

Tēlestas or Tēlestēs (Τελέστας, Τελέστης), of Selinus, a poet of the later Athenian dithyramb, about B.C. 398. A few lines of his poetry are preserved by Athenaeus (pp. 616, 626, 637).

Tēlēthrius (Τελέθριος), a mountain in the N. of Euboea near Histiaea (Strab. p. 445).

Tēlentias (Τελεντίας), half-brother of Agesilaus II., was a Spartan admiral, who served in the Corinthian war B.C. 393, off the coast of Asia B.C. 390-388, and against the Olynthians B.C. 382 (Xen. Hell. iv. 23-25, v. 1-3; Diod. xv. 21.)

Tellenae, a town in Latium between the later Via Ostiensis and the Via Appia, destroyed by Ancus Marcius (Dionys. i. 16, iii. 38, 43; Liv. i. 33). It was, however, partially restored, for it existed in Strabo's time (Strab. p. 231). Some writers identify with it the ruins at Giostra, about ten miles from Rome.

Tellus. [GAEA.]

Telmessus or Telmissus (Τελμησσός, Τελμισσός: Macri), a city of Lycia, near the borders of Caria, on a gulf called Telmissicus Sinus, and close to the promontory Telmissis (Strab. p. 665; Liv. xxxvii. 16; Lucan, viii. 248). There are considerable remains on the site, of a theatre, porticoes, and rock tombs.

Telo Martius (Toulon), a port-town of Gallia Narbonensis on the Mediterranean, is rarely mentioned by the ancient writers, and did not become a place of importance till a late period of the Roman empire. It may be the town mentioned in Sil. It. xiv. 443.

Tēlos (Τήλος: Τήλιος: Telos or Piskopi), a small island of the Carpathian sea, one of the Sporades, lay off the coast of Caria SW. of the mouth of the Sinus Doridis, between Rhodes and Nisyrus. It was also called Agathusa. (Hdt. vii. 153; Strab. p. 488; Plin. iv. 69.) At the town of Telos there are the remains of the walls and a Greek temple converted into a church, beside several ancient tombs.

Telphussa. [THELPUSA.]

Temēnidae. [TEMENUS.]

Temēnites. [SYRACUSAE.]

Tēmēnus (Τήμενος), son of Aristomachus, was one of the Heraclidae who invaded Peloponnesus. After the conquest of the peninsula, he received Argos as his share. His descendants, the Temenidae, being expelled from Argos, are said to have founded the kingdom of Macedonia, whence the kings of Macedonia called themselves Temenidae. (Hdt. viii. 138; Thuc. ii. 99; ARGOS.)

Tēmēsa or Tempsa (Temesaeus or Tempsanus: Torre del Piano del Casale), a town in Bruttium on the Sinus Terinaeus, was one of the most ancient Ausonian towns in the S. of Italy, and is said to have been afterwards colonised by a body of Aetolians under Thoas (Strab. p. 225). At a still later time it was successively in the possession of the Locrians, of the Bruttians, and finally of the Romans, who colonised it in B. C. 196 (Liv. xxxiv. 45). There was a sanctuary of Polites near it (Paus. vi. 6, 7). Temesa was famous for its copper mines (Ov. Met. xv. 707; Stat. Silv. i. 1, 42).

Temnus. 1. (τὸ Τῆνον ὄρος: Demirdj-Dagh), a mountain of Mysia, extending eastward from Ida to the borders of Phrygia, and dividing Mysia into two parts. It contains the sources of the Macestus, Mysius, Caicus, and Evenus. (Strab. p. 616.)—2. (Kayajik), a city of Aeolis, in the NW. of Lydia, thirty miles S. of Cyme. Its site has been identified with remains of a citadel, and was of considerable extent on a hill above the station of Emin Aalim, seventeen miles down the river from Magnes: that is, upon the hill side above the right bank of the Hermus a little way above the point where the river enters the lower valley of Larissa, and a few miles off the road from Smyrna to Cyme. It was nearly destroyed by an earthquake in the reign of Tiberius, and is not noticed by Pliny. Under the Byzantine empire it was called Archangelos. (Strab. p. 621; Xen. Hell. iv. 8, 5; Hdt. i. 149; Pol. v. 77; Tac. Ann. ii. 47.)

Tempē (Τέμπε, contr. of Τέμπεα), a beautiful and romantic valley in the N. of Thessaly, between Mts. Olympus and Ossa, through which the Peneus escapes into the sea. The scenery of this glen is frequently praised by poets; and it was also celebrated as one of the favourite haunts of Apollo, who had transplanted his laurel from this spot to Delphi. The whole valley is rather less than five miles in length, and opens gradually to the E. into a wide plain. Tempe is also of great importance in history, as it is the only pass through which an army can invade Thessaly from the N. In some parts the rocks on each side of the Peneus approach so close to each other as only to leave room between them for the stream, and the road is cut out of the rock in the narrowest point. Tempe is the only channel through which the waters of the Thessalian plain descend into the sea; and it was the common opinion in antiquity that these waters had once covered the country with a vast lake, till an outlet was formed for them by some great convulsion in nature which rent the rocks of Tempe asunder. (Hdt. vii. 129; Strab. p. 430; Caes. B. C. iii. 34; Catull. lxiv. 285; Ov. Met. i. 568; Verg. Georg. ii. 469; Hor. Od. iii. 1, 24.) So celebrated was the scenery of Tempe that its name was given to any beautiful valley. Cicero so calls a valley in the land of the Sabines near Reate, through which the river Velinus flowed (Cic. ad Att. iv. 15); and there was a Tempe in Sicily, through which the river Helorus flowed, hence called by Ovid Tempe Heloria (Fast. iv. 477).

Tempyra, a town in Thrace at the foot of a narrow mountain pass between Mt. Rhodope and the coast (Ov. Trist. i. 10, 21; Liv. xxxviii. 41.)

Tenctēri or Tenchtēri, a people of Germany dwelling on the Rhine between the Ruhr and the Sieg, S. of the Usipetes, in conjunction with whom their name usually occurs. They crossed the Rhine together with the Usipetes, with the intention of settling in Gaul; but they were defeated by Caesar with great slaughter, and those who escaped took refuge in the territories of their S. neighbours, the SUGAMBRI. The Tenctēri afterwards belonged to the League of the Cherusci, and at a still later period they are mentioned as a portion of the confederacy of the Franks. (Caes. B. G. iv. 1, 4-16; Tac. Germ. 32, Ann. xiii. 56, Hist. iv. 77.)

Tenea (Τενέα), a town in Corinthia, about eight miles S. of Corinth (Paus. ii. 5, 4; Strab. p. 380; Cic. ad Att. vi. 2, 8).

Tēnēdos or Tēnēdus (Τένεδος: Τενέδιος), a small island of the Aegæan sea, off the coast of Troas, of an importance very disproportionate to its size, on account of its position near the mouth of the Hellespont, from which it is about twelve miles distant. Its distance from the coast of the Troad was forty stadia (four geog. miles), and from Lesbos fifty-six stadia: its circuit was eighty stadia. It was called, in early times, by the names of Calydna, Leucophrys, Phoenixe, and Lyrnessus. It had an ancient temple of Apollo (Il. i. 38, 452). The mythical derivation of its usual name is from Tenes, son of Cynus (Strab. p. 380; Diod. v. 83). It had an Aeolian Coin of Tenedos, of 2nd cent. B.C.

Obs., double head, male and female, explained by some as Bacchus dimorphus; rev., TENEAIΩN: double axe, owl and grapes, suggesting a combined worship of Athene and Dionysus. (Steph. Byz. s.v. Τένεδος, cites Aristotle as referring this type of the double axe to a decree of a king of Tenedos that adulterers should be beheaded. It is rightly objected that this would be a very unlikely theme to introduce on a coin; more probably it refers to a local myth imperfectly understood: cf. Paus. x. 14.)

city of the same name, with two harbours. Its name appears in several proverbs, such as Τενέδιος πέλεκυς, Τ. ἄνθρωπος, Τ. αὐλητής, Τ. κακόν. It appears in the legend of the Trojan war as the station to which the Greeks withdrew their fleet in order to induce the Trojans to think that they had departed, and to receive the wooden horse (Verg. Aen. ii. 21). In the Persian war it was used by Xerxes as a naval station (Hdt. vi. 31). It afterwards became a tributary ally of Athens, and adhered to her during the whole of the Peloponnesian war, and down to the peace of Antalcidas, by which it was surrendered to the Persians (Thuc. ii. 2; Xen. Hell. v. 1, 6; Demosth. c. Polycl. p. 1223.) At the Macedonian conquest the Tenedians regained their liberty (Arr. An. ii. 2). In the war against Philip III., Attalus and the Romans used Tenedos as a naval station, and in the Mithridatic war Lucullus gained a naval victory over Mithridates off the island (Plut. Lucull. 3). About this time the Tenedians placed themselves under the protection of Alexandria Troas (Paus. x. 14, 4). The island was celebrated for the beauty of its women (Athen. p. 609).

Tenes or Tennes (Τήνης), son of Cynus and Proclea, and brother of Hemitheia. Cynus was king of Colona in Troas. His second wife was Philonome, who fell in love with her stepson;

but as he repulsed her advances, she accused him to his father, who threw both his son and daughter in a chest into the sea. But the chest was driven on the coast of the island of Leucophris, of which the inhabitants elected him king, and which he called Tenedos, after his own name. Cynus at length heard of the innocence of his son, killed Philonome, and went to his children in Tenedos. Here both Cynus and Tenes were slain by Achilles. Tenes was afterwards worshipped as a hero in Tenedos. (Paus. x. 14, 2; Diod. v. 83; Strab. p. 640.)

Tēnos (Τήνος: Τήνιος: Tino), a small island in the Aegean sea, SE. of Andros and N. of Delos. It is about fifteen miles in length. It was originally called Hydrussa (Ὑδροῦσσα) because it was well watered, and Ophiussa (Ὀφιοῦσσα) because it abounded in snakes. (Plin. iv. 66; Steph. Byz. s.v.) It possessed a town of the same name on the site of the modern S. Nicolo. It had also a celebrated temple of Poseidon, which is mentioned in the time of the emperor Tiberius. (Hdt. viii. 82; Thuc. vii. 57; Strab. p. 487; Tac. Ann. iii. 63.) The wine of Tēnos was celebrated in antiquity and is still valued at the present day.

Tentyra (τὰ Τέντυρα: Τεντυρίτης, Tentyrites: Denderah, Ru.), a city of Upper Egypt, on the W. bank of the Nile, between Abydos and Coptos, with celebrated temples of Hathor—the Queen of Heaven (= Aphrodite), who was specially worshipped there—of Isis, and of Typhon (Strab. p. 814; Ptol. iv. 5, 6). Its people were distinguished for their hatred of the crocodile; and upon this and the contrary propensities of the people of Ombi, Juvenal founds his fifteenth Satire. [OMBI.] There are still magnificent remains of the temples of Hathor and Isis.

Tēos (ἡ Τέως: Τήιος, Tēius: Sighajik), one of the Ionian cities on the coast of Asia Minor, renowned as the birthplace of the lyric poet ANACREON. It stood on the S. side of the isthmus which connects the peninsula of M. Mimas with the mainland of Lydia, at the bottom of the bay between the promontories of Coryceum and Myonesus (Strab. p. 663; Hdt. i. 142). It was a flourishing seaport, until, to free themselves from the Persian yoke, most of its inhabitants retired to Abdera (Hdt. i. 168). It was still, however, a place of importance in the time of the Roman emperors (Mel. i. 17; Ptol. v. 2, 6; Plin. v. 138). It had two harbours, and a celebrated temple of Dionysus, of which, as well as of the theatre, there are fine remains.

Terēdon (Τερηδών: prob. Dorah), a city of Babylonia, on the W. side of the Tigris, below its junction with the Euphrates, and not far from its mouth. It was a great emporium for the traffic with Arabia. It is no doubt the Diridotis (Διρίδωτις) of Arrian.

Terentia. 1. Wife of M. Cicero, the orator, to whom she bore two children, a son and a daughter. She was a woman of sound sense and great firmness of character. After Cicero's banishment in B.C. 58, Terentia by her letters endeavoured to keep up his fainting spirits, and exerted herself on his behalf among his friends in Italy. During the Civil war, however, Cicero was offended with her conduct in money matters, and divorced her in 46 (ad Att. xi. 16, 24; Plut. Cic. 41). Shortly afterwards he married Publilia, a young girl of whose property he had the management. Terentia could not have been less than fifty at the time of her divorce, and it is not probable that she married again. It is related, indeed, by Jerome that she married Sallust the historian, and subsequently Messalla Corvinus (Hieron. in Jovin. i. p. 52); but these marriages are not mentioned by any other writer, and may be rejected. Terentia is said to have attained the age of 103.—2. Also called Terentilla, the wife of Maecenas and believed to be the mistress of Augustus. The intrigue between Augustus and Terentia is said to have disturbed the good understanding which subsisted between the emperor and his minister. [MAECENAS.]

Terentiānus Maurus, a Roman poet, probably lived near the end of the second century of our era, and was a native of Africa, as his surname, Maurus, indicates. There is still extant a poem of Terentianus, entitled De Literis, Syllabis, Pedibus, Metris, which treats of prosody and the different kinds of metre with much elegance and skill. The work is edited by Santen and Van Lennep, Traj. ad Rhen. 1825, and by Lachmann, Berol. 1836.

P. Terentius Afer, usually called Terence, the celebrated comic poet, was born at Carthage probably about 190 B.C., and at an early age came to Rome, where he became the slave of P. Terentius Lucanus, a Roman senator. A handsome person and promising talents recommended Terence to his master, who afforded him the best education of the age, and finally manumitted him. On his manumission, according to the usual practice, Terence assumed his patron's nomen, Terentius, having been previously called Publius or Publitor. His Life in Suetonius de Poëtis, is the chief authority. The Andria was the first play offered by Terence for representation. The curule aediles referred the piece to Caecilius, then one of the most popular play-writers at Rome. Unknown and meanly clad, Terence began to read from a low stool his opening scene. A few verses showed the elder poet that no ordinary writer was before him, and the young aspirant, then in his twenty-seventh year, was invited to share the couch and supper of his judge. This reading of the Andria, however, must have preceded its performance nearly two years, for Caecilius died in 168, and it was not acted till 166. Meanwhile, copies were in circulation, envy was awakened, and Lucius Lavinius, a veteran and not very successful play-writer, began his unwearied attacks on the dramatic and personal character of the author. The Andria was successful, and, aided by the accomplishments and good address of Terence himself, was the means of introducing him to the most refined and intellectual circles of Rome. His chief patrons were Laelius and the younger Scipio, both of whom treated him as an equal, and are said even to have assisted him in the composition of his plays. (Suet. l.c.; cf. Cic. ad Att. vii. 8, 10; Quint. x. 1, 99.) After living some years at Rome, Terence went to Greece, and while there he translated 108 of Menander's comedies. He never returned to Italy, and we have various accounts of his death. According to one story, after embarking at Brundisium, he was never heard of more; according to others, he died at Stymphalus in Arcadia (Auson. Epist. xviii. 16), in Leucadia, or at Patrae in Achaia. One of his biographers said he was drowned, with all the fruits of his sojourn in Greece, on his home-passage (see Suet. l.c.). But the prevailing report was, that his translations of Menander were lost at sea, and that grief for their loss caused his death. He died in the thirty-sixth year of his age, in 159 or in the year following. He left a daughter, but nothing is known of his family. Six comedies are all that remain to us; and they are probably all that Terence produced. His later versions of Menander were, in all likelihood, from their number and the short time in which they were made, merely studies for future dramas of his own. They were brought forward at the following seasons: (1) Andria, 'the woman of Andros,' so-called from the birth-place of Glycerium, its heroine, was first represented at the Megalesian Games, on the 4th of April, 166. It was an adaptation of Menander's Ἀνδρία with some of the Περὶ θία of Menander incorporated in it (ed. Freeman and Sloman, 1886). (2) Hecyra, 'the Stepmother,' produced at the Megalesian Games, in 165. (3) Heautontimoroumenos, 'the Self-Tormentor,' performed at the Megalesian Games, 163, adapted from the ἑαυτὸν τιμωρούμενος of Menander (ed. Shuckburgh, Lond. 1878). (4) Eunuchus, 'the Eunuch,' played at the Megalesian Games, 161. It was at the time the most popular of Terence's comedies. It was adapted from the Εὐνοῦχος and the Κόλαξ of Menander (ed. by Papillon, 1870). (5) Phormio, was performed in the same year as the preceding, at the Roman Games on the 1st of October. It was adapted from the Ἐπιδικάζόμενος of Apollodorus (ed. Bond and Walpole, Lond. 1879; Dziatzko, Leips. 1885). (6) Adelphi, 'the Brothers,' was acted for the first time at the funeral games of L. Aemilius Paullus, 160. It was adapted from the Ἀδελφοί of Menander with one scene from the Συναποθήσκοντες of Diphilus (ed. Ashmore, 1893).—The comedies of Terence have been translated into most of the languages of modern Europe, and in conjunction with those of Plautus were, on the revival of the drama, the models of playwrights. The ancient critics are unanimous in ascribing to Terence purity and elegance of language, and nearly so in denying him vis comica. But it should be recollected that four of Terence's six plays are more or less sentimental comedies—in which vis comica is not a primary element. Moreover, Terence is generally contrasted with Plautus, with whom he had very little in common. Granting to the elder poet the highest genius for exciting laughter, and a natural force which his rival wanted, there will remain in Terence greater consistency of plot and character, closer observation of generic and individual distinctions, deeper pathos, subtler wit, more skill and variety in metre and in rhythm, and a wider command of the middle region between sport and earnest. It may be objected that Terence's superiority in these points arises from his copying his Greek originals. But no servile copy is an animated copy, and we have corresponding fragments enough of Menander to prove that Terence retouched and sometimes improved his model. In summing up his merits we ought not to omit the praise which has been universally accorded him—that, although a foreigner and a freedman, he divides with Cicero and Caesar the palm of pure Latinity.—Editions of the complete works by Bentley, 1726; Fleck-eisen, Leips. 1857; Wagner, Lond. 1869; Dziatzko, Leips. 1884.

Terentius Culléo. [CULLEO.]

Terentius Varro. [VARRO.]

Têres (Τήρης). 1. King of the Odrysae and father of SITALCES, was the founder of the great Odrysian monarchy (Hdt. iv. 80, vii. 137; Thuc. ii. 29).—2. King of a portion of Thrace in the time of Philip of Macedon (Diod. xvi. 71).

Têreus (Τηρεός), son of Ares, king of the Thracians in Daulis, afterwards Phocis (Thuc. ii. 29). Pandion, king of Attica, who had two daughters, Philomela and Procne, called in the assistance of Tereus against some enemy, and gave him his daughter Procne in marriage. Tereus became by her the father of Itys, and then concealed her in the country, that he might dishonour her sister Philomela, whom he deceived by saying that Procne was dead. At the same time he deprived Philomela of her tongue. [Ovid (Met. vi. 565) reverses the story by stating that Tereus told Procne that her sister Philomela was dead.] Philomela, however, soon learned the truth, and made it known to her sister by a few words which she wove into a peplus. Procne thereupon killed her own son Itys, and served up the flesh of the child in a dish before Tereus. She then fled with her sister. Tereus pursued them with an axe, and when the sisters were overtaken they prayed to the gods to change them into birds. Procne, accordingly, became a nightingale, Philomela a swallow, and Tereus a hoopoe. (Apollod. iii. 14, 8; Tzet. Chil. vii. 142, 459; Ov. Met. vi. 424–675; Serv. ad Ecl. vi. 78.) According to some, Procne became a swallow, Philomela a nightingale, and Tereus a hawk (Hyg. Fab. 45). It is clear that this story is a development of the older myth about Aedon, daughter of Pandareus (Od. xix. 58; AEDON), and that the plaintive song of the nightingale had much to do with its origin, as even Pausanias admits (i. 41, 8).

Tergestë (Tergestinus: Trieste), a town of Istria, on a bay in the N.E. of the Adriatic gulf, called after it Tergestinus Sinus. It was at first an insignificant place, with which the Romans became acquainted in their wars with the Iapydes; but under the Roman dominion it became a town of considerable commercial importance. It was made a Roman colony by Vespasian. (Strab. pp. 215, 314; Plin. iii. 127; Caes. B. G. viii. 24; App. Illyr. 18.)

Teria (Τηρείη ὄρος αἰπύ, Hom.), a mountain of Mysia, probably in the neighbourhood of Cyzicus. Some identified it with a hill near Lampsacus, on which was a temple of Cybele. (Il. ii. 829; Strab. pp. 565, 569.)

Têrias (F. di S. Lionardo), a river in Sicily near Leontini (Thuc. vi. 50, 96; Diod. xiv. 14).

Teridâtes. [TIRIDATES.]

Terina (Terinaeus: S. Eufemia), a town on the W. coast of Bruttium, from which the Sinus Terinaeus derived its name (Thuc. vi. 104; Plin. iii. 72). It was a Greek city founded by Croton, and was originally a place of some importance; but it was destroyed by Hannibal in the second Punic war (Diod. xvi. 15; Liv. viii. 24; Strab. p. 256).

Termantia, Termes, or Termes (Termetinus: Tiermes), a town of the Arevaci in Hispania Tarraconensis, originally situated on a steep hill, the inhabitants of which frequently resisted the Romans, who compelled them in consequence to abandon the town, and build a new one on the plain, B.C. 98 (App. Hisp. vi. 76, 99; Tac. Ann. iv. 45).

Termēra (τὰ Τέρμερα: Assarlik), a Dorian city in Caria, on the promontory of Termerium (Τερμέριον), the NW. headland of the Sinus Ceramicus. Under the Romans, it was a free city. (Hdt. v. 37; Strab. p. 657.)

Termes. [TERMANTIA.]

Termessus (Τερμησσός: Termessenses), a city of Pisidia, high up on the Taurus, in the pass through which the river Catarrhactes flowed. It was almost impregnable by nature and art, so that even Alexander did not attempt to take it. (Strab. pp. 630, 666; Pol. xxii. 18; Liv. xxxviii. 15.) In later times its full title was Termessus Jovia et Eudocias. Termessus was recognised as a free city by the Lex Antonia de Termessensibus (C.I.L. i. 204; Dict. of Ant. art. Lex Antonia.)

Terminus, a Roman divinity presiding over boundaries and frontiers. His worship is said to have been instituted by Numa, who ordered that everyone should mark the boundaries of his landed property by stones consecrated to Jupiter, and at these boundary-stones every year sacrifices should be offered at the festival of the Terminalia (Dionys. ii. 74; Plut. Num. 16). The Terminus of the Roman state originally stood between the fifth and sixth milestones on the road towards Laurentum, near a place called Festi. Another public Terminus stood in the temple of Jupiter in the Capitol. It is said that when this temple was to be founded, all the gods gave way to Jupiter and Juno, with the exception of Terminus and Juventas, whose sanctuaries the auguries would not allow to be removed. This legend refers to his steadfastness of position and also to the fact that he was identified in his functions with Jupiter Terminalis (Liv. i. 55; Varro, L.L. v. 74). It was taken as an omen that the Roman state would remain ever undiminished and young, and the chapels of the two divinities were enclosed within the walls of the new temple. The statue of Terminus was merely a stone or post placed at boundaries. This stone was consecrated by a sacrifice; the blood of the victim was poured into a trench with the body of the victim and offerings of fruits: the whole was consumed by a fire of pine-branches, and the stone set upon the bed of ashes. Periodical festivals were held, when the owners of the adjacent properties crowned the stone with garlands and offered a lamb or a pig, corn, honey and wine. (Ov. Fast. 639; Hor. Epod. ii. 59; Dict. of Ant. art. Terminalia.)

Terpander (Τέρπανδρος), the father of Greek music, and through it of lyric poetry. He was a native of Antissa in Lesbos, and flourished between B.C. 700 and 650 (Pind. ap. Athen. p. 635; Plut. de Mus. 30, p. 1141). He removed from Lesbos to Sparta, and there introduced his new system of music, and established the first musical school or system that existed in Greece. He added three strings to the lyre, which before his time had only four strings, thus making it seven-stringed. But other accounts seem to show that he only raised the scale to the compass of an octave, without altering the number of strings. [See Dict. of Ant. art. Lyra.] His music produced a powerful effect upon the Spartans, and he was held in high honour by them, during his life and after his death. He was the first who obtained a victory in the musical contests at the festival of the Carnēa (676) (Athen. p. 635). We have only three or four fragments of the remains of his poetry (Bergk, Poët. Lyr. Graec.).

Terra. [GAEA.]

Terracina, more usually written Tarracina. [TARRACINA.]

Tertullianus, Q. Septimius Florens, usually called Tertullian, the Christian Apologist, A.D. 160–240. [See Dict. of Christ. Biogr.]

Testa, C. Trebatius, a Roman jurist, and a contemporary and friend of Cicero. He was recommended by Cicero to Julius Caesar during his proconsulship of Gaul, and he followed Caesar's party after the Civil war broke out (Cic. ad Fam. xii. 5–18). Cicero dedicated to Trebatius his book of Topica, which he wrote to explain to him this book of Aristotle. Trebatius enjoyed considerable reputation under Augustus as a lawyer. In politics he advocated moderate and conciliatory measures both to Caesar and to Augustus (Justin. Inst. ii. 25). Horace addressed to him the first Satire of the second Book. Trebatius was a pupil of Q. Cornelius Maximus, and master of Labeo. He wrote some books De Jure Civili, and De Religionibus (Gell. vii. 12; Macrobi. iii. 7, 8).

Tēthys (Τηθύς), daughter of Uranus and Gaea, and wife of Oceanus, by whom she became the mother of the Oceanides and of the numerous river-gods (Hes. Th. 136, 337; Apollod. i. 1, 3; Ov. Fast. v. 81; Verg. Georg. i. 31).

Tētrica (perh. the Gran Sasso), a mountain on the frontiers of Pisenum and the land of the Sabines, belonging to the great chain of the Apennines (Verg. Aen. vii. 713; Sil. It. viii. 417; Varro, R.R. ii. 1, 5).

Tetricus, C. Pesuvius, one of the Thirty Tyrants, and the last of the pretenders who ruled Gaul during its separation from the empire under Gallienus and his successor. He reigned in Gaul from A.D. 267 to 274, and was defeated by Aurelian in 274, at the battle of Châlons, on which occasion he was believed to have betrayed his army to the emperor. It is certain that although Tetricus, along with his son, graced the triumph of the conqueror, he was immediately afterwards treated with the greatest distinction by Aurelian. (Trebell. Poll. Trig. Tyr. 23; Eutrop. ix. 9; Zonar. xii. 27.)

Teucer (Τεύκρος). 1. Son of the river-god Scamander, by the Nymph Idaea, was the first king of Troy, whence the Trojans are sometimes called Teucri. Dardanus of Samothrace came to Teucer, received his daughter Batea or Arisbe in marriage, and became his successor in the kingdom. According to another account, Dardanus was a native prince of Troy, and Scamander and Teucer immigrated into Troas from Crete, bringing with them the worship of Apollo Smintheus. (Hdt. vii. 122; Apollod. iii. 12, 1; Strab. p. 604; DARDANUS.)—2. Son of Telamon and Hesione, was a stepbrother of Ajax, and the best archer among the Greeks at Troy. (Il. viii. 281, xiii. 170; Soph. Ajax.) On his return from the Trojan war, Telamon refused to receive him in Salamis, because he had not avenged the death of his brother Ajax. Teucer thereupon sailed away in search of a new home, which he found in the island of Cyprus, which was given to him by Belus, king of Sidon. He there founded the town of Salamis, and married Eune, the daughter of Cyprus, by whom he became the father of Asteria. (Pind. Nem. iv. 60; Aesch. Pers. 896; Paus. ii. 29, 4; Hor. Od. i. 7, 21; cf. AJAX; SALAMIS.)

Teucris. [MYRIA; TROAS.]

Teumessus (Τευμησσός), a mountain and village in Boeotia, near Hypatus, and close to Thebes, on the road from the latter place to Chalcis. It was from this mountain that Dionysus, enraged with the Thebans, sent the fox which committed such devastations in their territory. (Paus. ix. 19, 1; Ant. Lib. 41.)

Teuta (Τεύτα), wife of Agron, king of the Illyrians, assumed the sovereign power on the death of her husband, B.C. 231. In consequence of the injuries inflicted by the piratical expeditions of her subjects upon the Italian merchants, the Romans sent C. and L. Coruncanius to demand satisfaction, but she not only refused to comply with their demands, but caused the younger of the two brothers to be assassinated on his way home. (Pol. ii. 4-8; Zonar. viii. 19.) War was now declared against her by the Romans. The greater part of her territory was soon conquered, and she was obliged to sue for peace, which was granted to her (B.C. 228), on condition of her giving up the greater part of her dominions. (Pol. ii. 9-12; App. Illyr. 7.)

Teuthrania. [MYRIA.]

Teuthras (Τεύθρας), an ancient king of Mysia, who married (or, according to other accounts, adopted as his daughter) Auge, the daughter of Aleus (Paus. viii. 4; Strab. p. 571). He also received with hospitality her son Telephus, when the latter came to Asia in search of his mother. He was succeeded in the kingdom of Mysia by Telephus. [TELEPHUS.]

Teuthras (Τεύθρας), a mountain in the Mysian district of Teuthrania, a SW. branch of Temnus. [TEMNUS.]

Teutoburgiensis Saltus, a range of hills in Germany covered with wood, extending N. of the Lippe, from Osnabrück to Paderborn, and known in the present day by the name of the Teutoburger Wald or Lippische Wald. It is celebrated on account of the defeat and destruction of Varus and three Roman legions by the Germans under Arminius, A.D. 9. (Tac. Ann. i. 60; cf. Dio Cass. lvi. 20, 21.) [VARUS.]

Teutones or Teutoni, a powerful people in Germany, who invaded Gaul and the Roman dominions along with the Cimbri, at the end of the second century B.C. The history of their invasion is given under CIMBRI. The name Teutones is not a collective name of the whole people of Germany, but only of one particular tribe, who probably dwelt on the coast of the Baltic, near the Cimbri.

Thabor, Tabor, or Atabyrium (Ἀταβύριον, LXX: Ἰταβύριον, Joseph.: Jebel Tur), an isolated mountain at the E. end of the plain of Esdraelon in Galilee, between 1700 and 1800 feet high. Its summit was occupied by a fortified town, under the Maccabees and the Romans. [Cf. Dict. of the Bible.]

Thabraca or Tabraca (Θάβρακα, Τάβρακα: Tabarca), a city of Numidia, at the mouth of the river Tusca, and on the frontier towards Zeugitana in a well-wooded district (Ptol. vi. 3, 5; Juv. x. 194; Claud. Laud. Stil. i. 359).

Thaïs (Θαῖς), a celebrated Athenian courtesan, who accompanied Alexander the Great on his expedition into Asia. Her name is best known from the story of her having stimulated the conqueror during a great festival at Persepolis, to set fire to the palace of the Persian kings; but this anecdote, immortalized as it has been by Dryden's famous ode, is in all probability a mere fable. (Athen. p. 576; Diod. xvii. 72; Plut. Alex. 38; Curt. v. 7, 3.) After the death of Alexander, Thaïs attached herself to Ptolemy Lagi, by whom she became the mother of two sons, Leontiscus and Lagus, and of a daughter, Irene (Athen. l. c.).

Thala (Θάλα: Thala), a great city of Numidia, NE. of Theveste, and seventy-one Roman miles NW. of Capsa (Sall. Jug. 75, 77, 80, 89; Tac. Ann. iii. 21).

Thalāmae (Θαλάμαι), a fortified town in Elis, situated in the mountains above Pylos (Xen. Hell. iv. 4, 26; Pol. iv. 75).

Thalassius. [TALASSIUS.]

Thālēs (Θαλῆς), the Ionic philosopher, a contemporary of Solon and Croesus, and one of the Seven Sages, was born at Miletus about B.C. 636, and died about 546, at the age of ninety, though the exact date neither of his birth nor of his death is known. He is said to have predicted the eclipse of the sun which happened in the reign of the Lydian king Alyattes; to have diverted the course of the Halys in the time of Croesus; and later, in order to unite the Ionians when threatened by the Persians, to have instituted a federal council in Teos. Aristotle preserves a story of his knowledge of meteorology which was turned to a practical use (Pol. i. 11, p. 1259). In the lists of the Seven Sages his name seems to have stood at the head; and he displayed his wisdom both by political sagacity, and by prudence in acquiring wealth. He was also one of the founders in Greece of the study of philosophy and mathematics. In the latter science, indeed, we find attributed to him only proofs of propositions which belong to the first elements of geometry, and which could not possibly have enabled him to calculate the eclipses of the sun and the course of the heavenly bodies. He may, however, have obtained his knowledge of the higher branches of mathematics from Egypt, which country he is said to have visited. He may be regarded as the founder of Greek philosophy, as being the first who looked for a physical origin of the world instead of resting upon mythology. Thales maintained that water is the origin of things, meaning thereby that it is water out of which everything arises, and into which everything resolves itself, and that the earth floated upon the water. Thales left no works behind him. (Hdt. i. 74, 170; Diog. Laërt. i. 25; Aristot. Metaph. i. 3, p. 983.)

Thālēs or Thalētas (Θαλῆς, Θαλήτας), a musician and lyric poet, was a native of Gortyna in Crete. On the invitation of the Spartans he removed to Sparta, where, by the influence of his music, he appeased the wrath of Apollo (who had visited the city with a plague) and composed the factions of the citizens, who were at enmity with each other. He founded the second of the musical schools which flourished at Sparta, the first having been established by Terpander. (Plut. de Mus. 9, p. 1135; Paus. i. 14, 4.) The date of Thaletas is uncertain, but he may probably be placed shortly after Terpander. [TERPANDER.]

Thālia (Θάλεια, Θάλια). 1. The Muse of Comedy. [MUSAE.]—2. One of the Nereides.—3. One of the Charites or Graces.

Thallo. [HORAE.]

Thalna or Talna, M'. Juventius, was tribune of the plebs B.C. 170; praetor 167; and consul 163, when he subdued the Corsicans. The senate voted him the honour of a thanksgiving; and he was so overcome with joy at the intelligence, which he received as he was offering a sacrifice, that he dropped down dead on the spot. (Liv. xliii. 8, xlv. 16, 21.)

Thambes (Θάμβης, Θάμης, Θάμης), a mountain in the E. of Numidia, containing the source of the river Rubricatus (Ptol. iv. 3, 16).

Thamydēni or Thamydītae (Θαμυδηνόι, Θαμυδίται), a people of Arabia Felix, on the Sinus Arabicus (Diod. iii. 44).

Thamýris or Thamýras (Θάμυρις), an ancient Thracian bard, was a son of Philammon and the nymph Argiope. In his presumption he challenged the Muses to a trial of skill, and being overcome in the contest, was deprived by them of his sight and of the power of singing. He was represented with a broken lyre in his hand. (Il. ii. 595; Apollod. 1, 3, 3; Paus. iv. 33, 4, ix. 30, 2, x. 7, 2; Eur. Rhes. 925.)

Thanátos. [MORS.]

Thapsa, a city of N. Africa, probably identical with RUSICADA.

Thapsācus (Θάψακος: O. T. Tiphseh: an Aramean word meaning a ford: Θαψακηνός: Ru. at Dibsi), a city of Syria, in the province of Chalybonitis, on the left bank of the Euphrates, 2000 stadia S. of Zeugma, and fifteen parasangs from the mouth of the river Chaboras (the Araxes of Xenophon). At this place was the usual, and for a long time the only, ford of the Euphrates, by which a passage was made between Upper and Lower Asia. (Xen. An. i. 4, 11; Arr. An. ii. 13; Strab. pp. 77, 81, 746.)

Thapsus (Θάψος: Θάψιος). 1. A city on the E. coast of Sicily, on a peninsula of the same name (Isola degli Magnisi), founded by Dorian colonists from Megara, who soon abandoned it in order to found Megara Hybla.—2. (Demas, Ru.), a city on the E. coast of Byzacena, in Africa Propria, where Caesar finally defeated the Pompeian army, and finished the Civil war, B.C. 46 (Ptol. iv. 3, 10; Strab. p. 831; Bell. Afr. 28). There are remarkable ruins of its fortifications [see Dict. of Ant. art. Murus].

Thāsos or Thāsus (Θάσος: Θάσιος: Thaso or Tasso), an island in the N. of the Aegæan sea, off the coast of Thrace and opposite the mouth of the river Nestus. It was at a very early period taken possession of by the Phoenicians, on account of its valuable gold mines. According to tradition, the Phoenicians were led by Thasus, son of Poseidon, or Agenor, who came from the East in search of Europa, and from whom the island derived its name (Hdt. ii. 44, vi. 47; Paus. v. 25, 12). Thasos was afterwards colonised by the Parians, B.C. 708, and among the colonists was the poet Archilochus (Thuc. iv. 104; Strab. p. 487). Besides the gold mines in Thasos itself, the Thasians possessed still more valuable gold mines at Scapte Hyle on the opposite coast of Thrace. The mines in the island had been most extensively worked by the Phoenicians, but even in the time of Herodotus they were still productive. The clear surplus revenue of the Thasians before the Persian conquest amounted to 200, and sometimes even to 300, talents (46,000*l.*, 66,000*l.*), of which sum the mines in Scapte Hyle produced eighty talents, and those in the island somewhat less (Hdt. vi. 46; Thuc. iv. 107). They possessed at this time a considerable territory on the coast of Thrace, and were one of the richest and most powerful peoples in the N. of the Aegæan. They were subdued by the Persians under Mardonius, and subsequently became part of the Athenian maritime empire. They revolted, however, from Athens in B.C. 465, and after sustaining a siege of three years, were subdued by Cimon in 463 (Thuc. i. 100; Diod. xi. 70). They were obliged to surrender to the Athenians all their possessions in Thrace, to destroy their fortifications, to give up their ships, and to pay a large tribute for the future. They again revolted from Athens in 411, and called in the Spartans, but the island was again restored to the Athenians by Thrasybulus in 407 (Thuc. viii. 64; Xen. Hell. i. 1, 12). In addition to its gold mines, Thasos was celebrated for its marble and its wine. The soil, however, is otherwise barren, and merits even at the present day the description applied to it by the poet Archilochus, 'an ass's backbone, overspread with wild wood' (Fr. 17). The principal town in the island, also called Thasos, was situated on the N. coast upon three eminences. There are still a few remains of the ancient town. The site of the Agora has been excavated, and there is a triumphal arch, apparently in honour of Caracalla.

Thaumas (Θάυμας), son of Pontus and Ge, and by the Oceanid Electra the father of Iris and the Harpies. Hence Iris is called Thaumantias, Thaumantis, and Thaumantēa virgo (Hes. Th. 237; Ov. Met. iv. 479).

Theaetētus (Θεαίτητος), an Athenian, the son of Euphronius of Sunium, is introduced as one of the speakers in Plato's Theaetetus and Sophistes, in which dialogues he is spoken of as a noble and well-disposed youth, and ardent in the pursuit of knowledge, especially in the study of geometry.

Theagēnes (Θεαγένης). 1. Tyrant of Megara, obtained his power about B.C. 630, having espoused the part of the commonalty against the nobles. He was driven out before his death. He gave his daughter in marriage to Cylon. [CYLON.]—2. A Thasian, the son of Timosthenes, renowned for his extraordinary strength and swiftness. He gained numerous victories at the Olympian, Pythian, Nemean, and Isthmian games, and is said to have won 1400 crowns. He lived about B.C. 480. (Paus. vi. 6, 5, vi. 11, 2.)

Thēano (Θεανώ), daughter of Cisseus, wife of Antenor, and priestess of Athene at Ilion (Il. v. 70, xi. 224).

Thēano (Θεανώ), the most celebrated of the female philosophers of the Pythagorean school, appears to have been the wife of Pythagoras, and the mother by him of Telauges, Mnesarchus, Myia, and Arignote (Diog. Laërt. viii. 42; Suid. s.v.). Several letters are extant under her name; and, though they are not genuine, they are valuable remains of a period of considerable antiquity (ed. Hercher, 1873).

Thēbae (Θῆβαι), in the poets sometimes Thebe (Θήβη, Dor. Θήβα), aft. Diospōlis Magna (Διόσπολις μεγάλη, i.e. Great City of Zeus), in O.T. No or No Ammon, which represents its sacred name Nu-Amun or Amon (the city of Amun), was the capital of Thebais, or Upper Egypt, and, for a long time, of the whole country. It stood in about the centre of the Thebaïd, on both banks of the Nile, above Coptos, and in the Nomos Coptites. The Greek historians had exaggerated ideas of its relative antiquity (in relation, that is, to other Egyptian cities), and by ascribing its foundation to Menes placed it on a level, as regards date, with far older cities, such as Memphis and Thinis (Diod. i. 50, xv. 45). Thebes was made their capital by the kings of the eleventh dynasty (between 3030 and 2500 B.C.). The great temple of Ammon (the Egyptian Amun or Amen), who was specially worshipped at Thebes [AMMON], was founded by Amenemhat I., of the twelfth dynasty, about 2460 B.C. Thebes was the capital of the dynasties 11, 12, 13, 18, 19 and 20. Its time of greatest splendour was probably in the nineteenth dynasty, especially in the reign of RAMSES II. (1330 B.C.), who was a great builder as well as a great conqueror. Though the capital dignity was transferred after 1100 B.C. to other cities, Bubastis, Tanis and Sais, Thebes still retained its grandeur and much of its importance. It suffered from the sack by the Assyrian Assurbanipal [SARDANAPALUS], about 660 B.C. The sources of its wealth still remained: for these consisted in the position of the city, which stood on the banks of the Nile as a highway for trade N. and S. and at a junction of trade routes eastward to Myos Hormos on the Red Sea and westward to the Oases. All these advantages combined to make Thebes a centre of commerce until Alexandria became the successful rival. Thebes was in great measure destroyed and left in ruins by Ptolemy Lathyrus B.C. 86 (Paus. i. 9, 3). The fame of its grandeur had reached the Greeks as early as the time of Homer, who describes it as having a hundred gates, from each of which it could send out 200 war chariots fully armed (Il. ix. 381). It may be noted that in the time of the Trojan war (according to the most probable theory as to that date), Thebes was still the capital of the Egyptian kings; but before the probable date of the Odyssey the capital was in Lower Egypt [cf. HOMERUS]. Homer's epithet of 'Hundred-Gated' (ἐκατόμυλοι) is repeatedly applied to the city by later writers. Its real extent was calculated by the Greek writers at 140 stadia (14 geogr. miles) in circuit; and in Strabo's time, when the transference of the seat of power and commerce to Lower Egypt had caused it to decline greatly, it still had a circuit of eighty stadia (Diod. l.c.; Strab. pp. 805, 815). That these computations are not exaggerated is proved by the existing ruins, which extend from side to side of the Nile valley, here about six miles wide; while the rocks which bound the valley are perforated with tombs. These ruins, which are perhaps the most magnificent in the world, enclose within their site the four modern villages of Karnak, Luxor, Medinet Habou, and Gurnah: the two former on the E., and the two latter on the W. side of the river.

Thēbae, in Europe. 1. (Θῆβαι: in poetry Θήβη: Θῆβαιος, Thēbāios; Thion), the chief city in Boeotia, was situated in a plain SE. of the lake Hylice and NE. of Plataeae. Its acropolis, which was an oval eminence of no great height, was called Cadmēa (Καδμεία), because it was said to have been founded by Cadmus, the leader of a Phoenician colony. On each side of this acropolis is a small valley, running up from the Theban plain into the low ridge of hills by which it is separated from that of Plataeae. Of these valleys, the one to the W. is watered by the Dirce; and the one to the E. by the Ismenus; both of which, however, are insignificant streamlets, though so celebrated in ancient history. The greater part of the city stood in these valleys, and was built some time after the acropolis. Theban legends said that the fortifications of the lower city were constructed by Amphion and his brother Zethus; and that when Amphion played his lyre the stones moved of their own accord and formed the wall. [AMPHION.] The territory of Thebes was called Thēbāis (Θηβαίς), and extended eastwards as far as the Euboean sea. No city is more celebrated in the mythical ages of Greece than Thebes. It was here that the use of letters was first introduced from Phoenicia into W. Europe. [CADMUS.] It was the reputed birthplace of the two great divinities DIONYSUS and HERACLES. It was also the native city of the mythical seer Tiresias, as well as of the mythical musician Amphion. It was the scene of the tragic fate of Oedipus, and of one of the most celebrated wars in the mythical annals of Greece. Polynices, who had been expelled from Thebes by his brother, Eteocles, induced six other heroes to espouse his cause, and marched against the city; but they were all defeated and slain by the Thebans, with the exception of Adrastus—Polynices and Eteocles falling by each other's hands. This is usually called the war of the 'Seven against Thebes.' [ADRASTUS.] A few years afterwards the 'Epigoni,' or descendants of the seven heroes, marched against Thebes to revenge their fathers' death; they took the city and razed it to the ground. It is probable that in these stories of the foundation and early history of Thebes there are elements of truth. It is likely enough that the Phoenicians at an early period established a trading station at Thebes a few miles inland, with the fortified citadel ascribed to the Phoenician Cadmus. In the movement of tribes about the time of the Dorian migrations, the Aeolian Arnaeans or Boeotians were pushed southwards from Thessaly, and drove out the Cadmeans from Thebes. If there is any chronological order in the wars of the Seven and of the Epigoni, the former (which is before the Trojan war: Il. iv. 378) may represent an attack by Achaean Argives on the Cadmeans; the story of the latter may be based on traditions about the capture of Thebes by the Boeotians. It is remarked that the number seven of the gates of Thebes is a sacred Semitic number; which agrees with their traditional Phoenician origin. Thebes is not mentioned by Homer in the catalogue of the Greek cities which fought against Troy, and this may point to the fact that in the Homeric traditions of the period before the Dorian migration Thebes was still Cadmean, or mainly Phoenician, and did not cast in its lot with the Greeks. In the Iliad the Thebans are in fact called Cadmeans (Il. iv. 388, v. 807, xxiii. 68; cf. Od. xi. 276; Thuc. i. 12). Its government, after the abolition of monarchy, was an aristocracy, or rather an oligarchy, which continued to be the prevailing form of government for a long time, although exchanged for that of a democracy in the period of ten years between the Athenian success at Tanagra, in 457 B.C., and the battle of Coronea, in 447. Towards the end of the Peloponnesian war, however, the oligarchy finally disappears; and Thebes appears under a democratical form of government from this time till it becomes with the rest of Greece subject to the Romans. The Thebans were from an early period inveterate enemies of their neighbours, the Athenians. Their hatred of the latter people was probably one of the reasons which induced them to desert the cause of Grecian liberty in the great struggle against the Persian power. In the Peloponnesian war the Thebans naturally espoused the Spartan side, and contributed not a little to the downfall of Athens. But, in common with the other Greek states, they soon became disgusted with the Spartan supremacy, and joined the confederacy formed against Sparta in B.C. 394. The peace of Antalcidas, in 387, put an end to hostilities in Greece; but the treacherous seizure of the Cadmea by the Lacedaemonian general Phoebidas in 382, and its recovery by the Theban exiles in 379, led to a war between Thebes and Sparta, in which the former not only recovered its independence, but for ever destroyed the Lacedaemonian supremacy. This was the most glorious period in the Theban annals; and the decisive defeat of the Spartans at the battle of Leuctra, in 371, made Thebes the first power in Greece. Her greatness, however, was mainly due to the pre-eminent abilities of her citizens Epaminondas and Pelopidas; and with the death of the former at the battle of Mantinea, in 362, she lost the supremacy which she had so recently gained. [EPAMINONDAS.] Soon afterwards Philip of Macedon began to exercise a paramount influence over the greater part of Greece. The Thebans were induced, by the eloquence of Demosthenes, to forget their old animosities against the Athenians, and to join the latter in protecting the liberties of Greece; but their united forces were defeated by Philip, at the battle of Chaeronea, in 338. Soon after the death of Philip and the accession of Alexander, the Thebans made a last attempt to recover their liberty, but were cruelly punished by the young king. The city was taken by Alexander in 336, and was entirely destroyed, with the exception of the temples, and the house of the poet Pindar; 6000 inhabitants were slain, and 30,000 sold as slaves. [ALEXANDER.] In 316 the city was rebuilt by Cassander, with the assistance of the Athenians. In 290 it was taken by Demetrius Poliorcetes, and again suffered greatly. Dicaearchus, who flourished about this time, has left us an interesting account of the city. He describes it as about seventy stadia (about eight miles) in circumference, in form nearly circular, and in appearance somewhat gloomy. He says that it is plentifully provided with water, and contains better gardens than any other city in Greece; that it is most agreeable in summer, on account of its plentiful supply of cool and fresh water, and its large gardens; but that in winter it is very unpleasant, being destitute of fuel, exposed to floods and cold winds, and frequently visited by heavy falls of snow. He further represents the people as proud and insolent, and always ready to settle disputes by fighting, rather than by the ordinary course of justice. It is supposed that the population of the city at this time may have been between 50,000 and 60,000 souls. After the Macedonian period Thebes rapidly declined in importance; and it received its last blow from Sulla, who gave half of its territory to the Delphians. Strabo describes it as only a village in his time; and Pausanias, who visited it in the second century of the Christian era, says that the Cadmea alone was then inhabited. The ground on which Thebes stood rises generally 150 feet above the plain. This space is bounded on the E. and W. by the two small rivers Ismenus and Dirce (united a little below the city), between which flowed a smaller stream, probably the Strophia (Callim. Hymn. in Del. 76), dividing the city into two parts. In the western half, and probably on the rising ground at the S. of it, was the Cadmea. Of the seven gates three are fairly described by Pausanias. The Electrae was the gate by which the road from Plataeae entered the city: i.e. it was in the centre at the S. of the city, probably where the present Plataean road comes in (Paus. ix. 8, 6); the road to Chalcis went out by the Proetides (Paus. ix. 18, 1): i.e. that gate was at the NE. of the city; the Neitae was opposite on the NW., since it led to Onchestus across the Dirce (Paus. ix. 25, 1, ix. 26, 5). There is not evidence enough to determine the positions of the other four gates, called Ogygiae, Hypsistae, Crenaeae or Oncas, and Homoloides (Aesch. Sept. 360; Eur. Phoen. 1120; Paus. ix. 8; Apollod. iii. 6, 6; Stat. Theb. viii. 353; cf. Nonn. Dionys. v. 69.)—2. Surnamed Phthioticae (Θῆβαι αἱ φθιώτιδες), an important city of Thessaly in the district Phthiotis, at a short distance from the coast, and with a good harbour (Pol. v. 99: Liv. xxxii. 33; Strab. p. 433; Steph. Byz. s.v.)

Thēbāis. [AEGYPTUS.]

Thēbē (Θῆβη Ὑποπλακίη), a city of Mysia, on the wooded slope of M. Placus, destroyed by Achilles. It was said to have been the birthplace of Andromache and Chryseis (Il. i. 366, vi. 397, xxii. 479). It existed in the historical period, but by the time of Strabo it had fallen into ruin, and by that of Pliny it had vanished. Its site was near the head of the Gulf of Adramyttium, where a beautiful tract of country was named, after it, τὸ Θῆβης πεδῖον. (Hdt. vii. 42; Xen. An. vii. 8, 7; Strab. pp. 584–588; Liv. xxxvii. 19.)

Thēisōa (Θείσοα: Lavda). 1. A town of Arcadia, on the N. slope of Mt. Lycaeus, in the district of Cynuria (Paus. viii. 38, 3).—2. A town of Arcadia, in the district of Orchomenus (Paus. viii. 27, 7). Perhaps the modern Karkalon.

Thelepte or Telepte (Θελέπτη, Τελέπτη: Medinet-Kedima), a fortified town of Numidia, lying S. of Thala on the borders of the desert country. From it ran the road to Tacape or Syrtis Minor. (Procop. Aed. vi. 6.)

Thelpūsa or Telphussa (Θέλπουσα, Τέλφουσσα: Τελφούσιος: nr. Vanena, Ru.), a town in Arcadia on the river Ladon. It was famous for the worship of Demeter-Erinnys [p. 324, b], and possessed also another temple of Demeter, Persephone, and Dionysus. The former was below the city; the latter above. Temples of Asclepius and of Apollo Oncestes are also mentioned. (Paus. viii. 25, 2; Steph. Byz. s.v. Ὀγκειον.)

Thēmis (Θέμις), daughter of Uranus and Ge, was married to Zeus, by whom she became the mother of the Horae, Eunomia, Dike (Astraea), Irene, and of the Moerae (Hes. Th. 135, 901; Apollod. i. 3, 1). In the Homeric poems, Themis is the personification of the order of things established by law, custom and equity: whence she is described as reigning in the assemblies of men, and as convening, by the command of Zeus, the assembly of the gods. She dwells in Olympus, and is on friendly terms with Hera (Il. xv. 87, xx. 4, Od. ii. 68). As the divine exponent of law and order Themis is said to have been in possession of the Delphic oracle after Ge and before Apollo (Aesch. Eum. 2; Paus. x. 3, 5; Ov. Met. i. 321). Her connexion with Zeus and with the lawful ordering of the world is indicated by her sharing a temple with Zeus and the Fates at Thebes, Zeus and the Horae at Olympia (Paus. v. 14, 8, ix. 25, 4). Her worship at Aegina, Athens, and Troezen is particularly mentioned (Pind. Ol. viii. 20; Paus. i. 22, 1, ii. 31, 8). She is represented on coins with a figure like that of Athene, holding a cornucopia and a pair of scales.

Themiscyra (Θεμισκυρα: Terme), a city and a plain on the coast of Pontus, extending E. of the river Iris beyond the Thermodon, celebrated in ancient myths as the country of the Amazons. [AMAZONES.] It was well watered, and rich in pasture. The town Themiscyra stood near the mouth of the Thermodon on the road from Amisus to Oenoe. (Hdt. iv. 86; Paus. i. 2, 2.)

Thēmīson (Θεμισών), a celebrated Greek physician, and the founder of the medical sect of the Methodici, was a native of Laodicea in Syria, and lived in the first century B.C. He wrote several medical works, but of these only the titles and a few fragments remain. The physician mentioned by Juvenal was probably a contemporary of the poet, and consequently a different person from the founder of the Methodici (Juv. x. 221).

Themistius (Θεμιστίος), a philosopher and rhetorician, was a Paphlagonian, and lived first at Constantinople and afterwards at Rome, in the reigns of Constantius, Julian, Jovian, Valens, Gratian, and Theodosius. After holding various public offices, and being employed on many important embassies, he was made prefect of Constantinople by Theodosius, A.D. 384, and tutor to Arcadius. Gregory of Nazianzus, his friend and correspondent, in an epistle still extant, calls him the 'king of arguments' (Greg. Naz. Ep. 140). The orations (πολιτικοὶ λόγοι) of Themistius, extant in the time of Photius, were thirty-six in number, of which thirty-four have come down to us in the original Greek, and one in a Latin version.—Edited by Dindorf, Lips. 1832, 8vo.

Thēmistócles (Θεμιστοκλῆς), the celebrated Athenian, was the son of Neocles and Abrotonon, a Thracian woman, and was born about B.C. 514. In his youth he had an impetuous character; he displayed great intellectual power combined with a lofty ambition and desire of political distinction. He obtained the archonship in 493 B.C., and, convinced by the war with Aegina of the importance of a strong navy, he persuaded the Athenians to fortify Peiraeus as a naval arsenal (Dionys. vi. 34; cf. Thuc. i. 93); some modern writers doubt this earlier archonship. The fame which Miltiades acquired by his generalship at Marathon made a deep impression on Themistocles; and he said that the trophy of Miltiades would not let him sleep. His rival Aristides was ostracised in 483, to which event Themistocles contributed; and from this time he was the political leader in Athens. In 482 he was Archon Eponymus. It was about this time that he persuaded the Athenians to employ the produce of the silver mines of Laurium in building ships, instead of distributing it among the Athenian citizens. (Hdt. vii. 144; Aristot. Ἀθ. Πολ. 22; Plut. Them. 4.) His great object was to draw the Athenians to the sea, as he was convinced that it was only by her fleet that Athens could repel the Persians and obtain the supremacy in Greece. Upon the invasion of Greece by Xerxes, Themistocles was appointed to the command of the Athenian fleet; and to his energy, prudence, foresight, and courage the Greeks mainly owed their salvation from the Persian dominion. Upon the approach of Xerxes, the Athenians, on the advice of Themistocles, deserted their city, and removed their women, children, and infirm persons to Salamis, Aegina, and Troezen; but as soon as the Persians took possession of Athens, the Peloponnesians were anxious to retire to the Corinthian isthmus. Themistocles used all his influence in inducing the Greeks to remain and fight with the Persians at Salamis, and with the greatest difficulty and by means of bribes persuaded the Spartan commander, Eurybiades, to stay at Salamis. (Plut. Them. 7, 10; Hdt. viii. 5; cf. Aristot. Ἀθ. Πολ. 23.) But as soon as the fleet of Xerxes made its appearance, the Peloponnesians were again anxious to sail away; and when Themistocles saw that he should be unable to persuade them to remain, he sent a faithful slave to the Persian commanders, informing them that the Greeks intended to make their escape, and that the Persians had now the opportunity of accomplishing a great enterprise, if they would only cut off the retreat of the Greeks. The Persians believed what they were told, and in the night their fleet occupied the whole of the channel between Salamis and the mainland. The Greeks were thus compelled to fight, and the result was the glorious victory in which the greater part of the fleet of Xerxes was destroyed. Looking to the character of Themistocles, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that in this struggle he was securing himself for either event. If it resulted in a Greek victory, as he doubtless expected, he would be the saviour of his country; but if the battle favoured the Persians, he would win the gratitude of Xerxes. However that may be, this victory, as being due to Themistocles, established his reputation among the Greeks. On his visiting Sparta, he was received with extraordinary honours by the Spartans, who gave Eurybiades the palm of bravery, and to Themistocles the palm of wisdom and skill, with a crown of olive, and the best chariot that Sparta possessed. (Hdt. viii. 124; Plut. Them. 17.) The Athenians began to restore their ruined city after the barbarians had left the country, and Themistocles advised them to rebuild the walls, and to make them stronger than before. The Spartans sent an embassy to Athens to dissuade them from fortifying their city, for which we can assign no motive except a miserable jealousy. Themistocles, who was at that time Προστάτης τοῦ δήμου (i.e. one of the leaders of the popular party: Aristot. Ἀθ. Πολ. 23), went on an embassy to Sparta, where he amused the Spartans with lies, till the walls were far enough advanced to be in a state of defence. It was upon his advice also that the Athenians fortified the port of Peiraeus. The influence of Themistocles does not appear to have survived the expulsion of the Persians from Greece and the fortification of the ports. He was probably justly accused of enriching himself by unfair means, for he had no scruples about the way of accomplishing an end. A story is told that, after the retreat of the fleet of Xerxes, when the Greek fleet was wintering at Pagasae, Themistocles told the Athenians in the public assembly that he had a scheme to propose which was beneficial to the state, but could not be divulged. Aristides was named to receive the secret, and to report upon it. His report was that nothing could be more profitable than the scheme of Themistocles, but nothing more unjust: the Athenians were guided by the report of Aristides. It is difficult, if not impossible, to reconcile the statement in Arist. Ἀθ. Πολ. 25, that Themistocles intrigued for the overthrow of Areopagus, with the date of his exile from Athens. The attack upon the Areopagus was in 463; but in 471, in consequence of the political strife between Themistocles and Aristides, the former was ostracised from Athens, and retired to Argos. After the discovery of the treasonable correspondence of Pausanias with the Persian king, the Lacedaemonians sent to Athens to accuse Themistocles of being privy to the design of Pausanias. Thereupon the Athenians sent off persons with the Lacedaemonians with instructions to arrest Themistocles (466). Themistocles, hearing of what was designed against him, first fled from Argos to Corcyra, and then to Epirus, where he took refuge in the house of Admetus, king of the Molossi, who happened to be from home. Admetus was no friend to Themistocles, but his wife told the fugitive that he would be protected if he would take their child in his arms, and sit on the hearth. The king soon came in, and respecting his suppliant attitude, raised him up, and refused to surrender him to the Lacedaemonian and Athenian agents. Themistocles finally reached the coast of Asia in safety. Xerxes was now dead (465), and Artaxerxes was on the throne. (Thuc. i. 235; Plut. Them. 23; Nep. Them. 4.) Themistocles went up to visit the king at his royal residence; and on his arrival he sent the king a letter, in which he promised to do the king a good service, and prayed that he might be allowed to wait a year and then to explain personally what brought him there. In a year he made himself master of the Persian language and the Persian usages, and, being presented to the king, he obtained the greatest influence over him, and such as no Greek ever before enjoyed—partly owing to his high reputation and the hopes that he gave to the king of subjecting the Greeks to the Persians. The king gave him a handsome allowance, after the Persian fashion; Magnesia supplied him with bread nominally, but paid him annually fifty talents. Lampsacus supplied wine, and Myus the other provisions. Before he could accomplish anything he died; some say that he poisoned himself, finding that he could not perform his promise to the king. A monument was erected to his memory in the Agora of Magnesia, which place was within his government. It is said that his bones were secretly taken to Attica by his relations, and privately interred there.—Themistocles undoubtedly possessed great talents as a statesman, great political sagacity, a ready wit, and excellent judgment: but he was not an honest man; and, like many other clever men with little morality, he ended his career unhappily and ingloriously. Twenty-one letters attributed to Themistocles are spurious.

Themistogēnes (Θεμιστογένης), of Syracuse, is said by Xenophon (Hell. iii. 1, § 2) to have written a work on the Anabasis of Cyrus. Some have supposed that Xenophon really refers to his own work under the name of Themistogenes (cf. Plut. de Glor. Ath. p. 361). The name, however, of Themistogenes is mentioned by Suidas (s.v.). [XENOPHON.]

Theōcles (Θεόκλης), son of Hegylus, was a Lacedaemonian sculptor, and a pupil of Dipoeus and Scyllis, about B.C. 550. His father was also a sculptor. (Paus. v. 17, 1.)

Theoclymēnus (Θεοκλύμενος), son of Polyphides by Hyperasia, and a descendant of Melampus, was a soothsayer, and in consequence of a murder was obliged to take to flight, and came with Telemachus to Ithaca (Od. xv. 256, 507, xx. 350).

Theōcosmus (Θεόκοσμος), of Megara, a sculptor contemporary with Phidias (Paus. i. 40, 3).

Theōcritus (Θεόκριτος), the great bucolic poet, was a native of Syracuse, and the son of Praxagoras and Philinna. He visited Alexandria towards the end of the reign of Ptolemy Soter, where he received the instruction of Philetas and Asclepiades, and began to distinguish himself as a poet. Other accounts make him a native of Cos, which would bring him more directly into connexion with Philetas (Suidas, s.v. Θεόκριτος). His first efforts obtained for him the patronage of Ptolemy Philadelphus, who was associated in the kingdom with his father, Ptolemy Soter, in B.C. 285, and in whose praise, therefore, the poet wrote the fourteenth, fifteenth, and seventeenth Idyls. At Alexandria he became acquainted with the poet Aratus, to whom he addressed his sixth Idyl. Theocritus afterwards returned to Syracuse, and lived there under Hiero II. It appears from the sixteenth Idyl that Theocritus was dissatisfied, both with the want of liberality on the part of Hiero in rewarding him for his poems, and with the political state of his native country. It may therefore be supposed that he devoted the latter part of his life almost entirely to the contemplation of those scenes of nature and of country life on his representations of which his fame chiefly rests. Theocritus was the creator of bucolic poetry in Greek, and, through imitators, such as Virgil, in Roman literature. The bucolic Idyls of Theocritus are of a dramatic and mimetic character. They are pictures of the ordinary life of the common people of Sicily; whence their name, εἶδη, εἰδύλλια. The pastoral poems and romances of later times are a totally different sort of composition from the bucolics of Theocritus, who knows nothing of the affected sentiment which has been ascribed to the imaginary shepherds of a fictitious Arcadia. He merely exhibits simple and faithful pictures of the common life of the Sicilian people, in a thoroughly objective, although truly poetical spirit. Dramatic simplicity and truth are impressed upon the scenes exhibited in his poems, into the colouring of which he has thrown much of the natural comedy which is always seen in the common life of a free people. In his dramatic dialogue he is influenced by the mimes of Sophron, as may be seen especially in the fifteenth Idyl (Adoniazusae). [SOPHRON.] The poems of Theocritus of this class may be compared with those of HERONDAS, who belonged, like Theocritus, to the literary school of Philetas at Cos. In genius, however, Theocritus was greatly the superior. The collection which has come down to us under the name of Theocritus consists of thirty poems, called by the general title of Idyls, a fragment of a few lines from a poem entitled Berenice, and twenty-two epigrams in the Greek Anthology. But these Idyls are not all bucolic, and were not all written by Theocritus. Those Idyls of which the genuineness is the most doubtful are the twelfth, twenty-third, twenty-sixth, twenty-seventh and twenty-ninth; and Idyls xiii., xvi., xvii., xxii., xxiv. and xxvi. are in Epic style, and have more of Epic dialect, especially Idyll xvi. It is likely that these poems on Epic subjects were written early in the poet's life, and, as court poems, had some of the artificial and imitative character of the Alexandrians. In general the dialect of Theocritus is Doric, but two of the Idylls (xxviii. and xxix.) are in the Aeolic.—Editions of Theocritus by Wüstemann, Gotha, 1830; Fritzsche, Leips. 1869; Paley, 1863; Kynaston, 1873.

Theōdēktēs (Θεοδέκτης), of Phaselis, in Pamphylia, was a rhetorician and tragic poet in the time of Philip of Macedon. He was the son of Aristander, and a pupil of Isocrates and Aristotle. The greater part of his life was spent at Athens, where he died at the age of forty-one. The people of his native city honoured the memory of Theodectes with a statue in their agora, which Alexander, when he stopped at Phaselis on his march towards Persia, crowned with garlands, to show his respect for the memory of a man who had been associated with himself by means of Aristotle and philosophy (Suid. s.v.; Plut. Alex. 17; Paus. i. 37, 3). The passages of Aristotle in which Theodectes is mentioned show the strong regard and high esteem in which he was held by the philosopher (Arist. Rhet. ii. 23, 13). None of the works of Theodectes have come down to us.

Theodōrias. [VACCA.]

Theodōricus or Theodēricus. 1. I., king of the Visigoths from A.D. 418 to 451, was the successor of Wallia, but appears to have been the son of the great Alaric. He fell fighting on the side of Aëtius and the Romans at the great battle of Châlons, in which Attila was defeated 451 (Jordan. de Reb. Goth. 34-41).—2. II., king of the Visigoths A.D. 452-466, second son of Theodoric I. He succeeded to the throne by the murder of his brother Thorismund. He ruled over the greater part of Gaul and Spain. He was assassinated in 466 by his brother Euric, who succeeded him on the throne. Theodoric II. was a patron of letters and learned men. The poet Sidonius Apollinaris lived for some time at his court. (Jordan. de Reb. Get. 43, 44; Sidon. Paneg. Avit.)—3. Surnamed the Great, king of the Ostrogoths (who appears in the Nibelungen Lied as Dietrich of Bern, i.e. of Verona), succeeded his father Theodemir, in 475. He was at first an ally of Zeno, the emperor of Constantinople, but was afterwards involved in hostilities with the emperor. In order to get rid of Theodoric, Zeno gave him permission to invade Italy, and expel the usurper Odoacer from the country. Theodoric entered Italy in 489, and after defeating Odoacer in three great battles, laid siege to Ravenna, in which Odoacer took refuge. After a siege of three years Odoacer capitulated on condition that he and Theodoric should rule jointly over Italy; but Odoacer was soon afterwards murdered by his more fortunate rival (493). Theodoric thus became master of Italy, which he ruled thirty-three years, till his death in 526. His long reign was prosperous and beneficent, and under his sway Italy recovered from the ravages to which it had been exposed for so many years. Theodoric was also a patron of literature; and among his ministers were CASSIODORUS and BOETHIUS, the two last writers who can claim a place in the literature of ancient Rome. But prosperous as had been the reign of Theodoric, his last days were darkened by disputes with the Catholics, and by the condemnation and execution of Boëthius and Symmachus, whom he accused of a conspiracy to overthrow the Gothic dominion in Italy. His death is said to have been hastened by remorse. It is related that one evening, when a large fish was served on the table, he fancied that he beheld the head of Symmachus, and was so terrified that he took to his bed, and died three days afterwards. Theodoric was buried at Ravenna, and a monument was erected to his memory by his daughter, Amalasuntha. His ashes were deposited in a porphyry urn which is still to be seen at Ravenna. (Jordan. de Reb. Get.; Procop. de Bell. Goth.; Cassiodor. Chron.; Ennod. Panegy. Theod.)

Theodōridas (Θεοδώριδας), of Syracuse, a lyric and epigrammatic poet, who lived about B.C. 235. He had a place in the Garland of Meleager. There are eighteen of his epigrams in the Greek Anthology.

Theōdōrus (Θεόδωρος). 1. Of Byzantium, a rhetorician, and a contemporary of Plato, who speaks of him somewhat contemptuously as a tricky logician (Phaedr. p. 266). Cicero describes him as excelling rather in the theory than the practice of his art (Brut. 12, 48).—2. A philosopher of the Cyrenaic school to one branch of which he gave the name of 'Theodorians,' Θεωδωρείοι. He is usually designated by ancient writers as the Atheist. He was a disciple of the younger Aristippus, and was banished from Cyrene, but on what occasion is not stated. He then went to Athens, and only escaped being cited before the Areopagus, by the influence of Demetrius Phalereus. He was afterwards banished from Athens, probably with Demetrius (307), and went to Alexandria, where he was employed in the service of Ptolemy, son of Lagus, king of the Macedonian dynasty in Egypt; it is not unlikely that he shared the overthrow and exile of Demetrius. While in the service of Ptolemy, Theodorus was sent on an embassy to Lysimachus, whom he offended by the freedom of his remarks. One answer which he made to a threat of crucifixion which Lysimachus had used has been celebrated by many ancient writers: 'Employ such threats to those courtiers of yours; for it matters not to Theodore whether he rots on the ground or in the air.' He returned at length to Cyrene, where he appears to have ended his days. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 97-103, 116; Plut. de Exil. p. 391; de An. Tranq. p.

829; Suid. s.v.).—3. A rhetorician of the age of Augustus, was a native of Gadara, in the country east of the Jordan. He settled at Rhodes, where Tiberius, afterwards emperor, during his retirement (B.C. 6–A.D. 2) to that island, was one of his hearers (Suet. Tib. 57; Quintil. iii. 1, 17). He also taught at Rome; but whether his settlement at Rome preceded that at Rhodes is uncertain. Theodorus was the founder of a school of rhetoricians, called 'Theodorei,' as distinguished from the 'Apollodorei,' or followers of Apollodorus of Pergamum, who had been the tutor of Augustus Caesar at Apollonia (Juv. vii. 177; Strab. p. 625).—4. A Greek monk, surnamed Prodromus, who lived in the first half of the twelfth century. Several of his works have come down to us, of which the following may be mentioned: (1) A metrical romance in nine books, on the loves of Rhodanthe and Dosicles, written in iambic metre, and exhibiting very little ability. (2) A poem entitled Galeomyomachia, in iambic verse, on 'the battle of the mice and cats' in imitation of the Homeric Batrachomyomachia.—Edited by Hercher, Leips. 1873.—5. Sculptors. (1) Of Samos, the son of Rhoecus, and brother of Telecles, flourished about B.C. 600, and was an architect and sculptor (Diog. Laërt. ii. 103; Diod. i. 98). He wrote a work on the Heraeum at Samos, in the erection of which he was probably engaged as well as his father. He was also engaged with his father in the erection of the labyrinth of Lemnos, and he prepared the foundation of the temple of Artemis at Ephesus. (Plin. xxxiv. 83). In conjunction with his brother, Telecles, he made the wooden statue of Apollo Pythius for the Samians, according to the fixed rules of the hieratic style (Paus. x. 38, 3). He built also the Skias at Sparta (Paus. iii. 12, 20). (2) The son of Telecles, nephew of the elder Theodorus, and grandson of Rhoecus, flourished about 560, in the times of Croesus and Polycrates, and renowned in sculpture and also in the arts of engraving metals and of gem-engraving; his works in those departments being celebrated gold and silver craters, and the ring of Polycrates (Hdt. i. 51, iii. 41, vii. 27). Many writers believe that the author of all the above-mentioned works was one and the same Theodorus, of the earlier date; and that is possible if we suppose the works of art by his hand to have been made some time before they came into the possession of Croesus and Polycrates.

Theodosiopolis (Θεοδοσιούπολις: Erzeroum), a city of Armenia Major, near the sources of the Araxes and the Euphrates; built by Theodosius II. as a mountain fortress: enlarged and strengthened by Anastasius and Justinian. Its position made it a place of commercial importance. (Procop. Aed. iii. 5.)

Theōdōsius. I, surnamed the Great, Roman emperor of the East, A.D. 378–395, was the son of the general Theodosius who restored Britain to the empire and was beheaded at Carthage in the reign of Valens, 376. The future emperor was born in Spain about 346. He learned the art of war under his father, whom he accompanied in his British campaigns. During his father's lifetime he was raised to the rank of Duke (dux) of Moesia, where he defeated the Sarmatians (374) and saved the province. On the death of his father he retired before court intrigues to his native country. He acquired a considerable military reputation in the lifetime of his father; and after the death of Valens, who fell in battle against the Goths, he was proclaimed emperor of the East by Gratian, who felt himself unable to sustain the burden of the empire. The Roman empire in the East was then in a critical position; for the Romans were disheartened by the defeat which they had sustained. Theodosius, however, showed himself equal to the position in which he was placed; he gained two signal victories over the Goths, and concluded a peace with the barbarians in 382. In the following year (383) Maximus assumed the imperial purple in Britain, and invaded Gaul with a powerful army. In the war which followed Gratian was slain; and Theodosius, who did not consider it prudent to enter into a contest with Maximus, acknowledged him as emperor of the countries of Spain, Gaul, and Britain, but secured to Valentinian, the brother of Gratian, Italy, Africa, and western Illyricum. But when Valentinian was expelled from Italy by Maximus in 387, Theodosius espoused his cause and marched into the W. at the head of a powerful army. After defeating Maximus in Pannonia, Theodosius pursued him across the Alps to Aquileia. Here Maximus was surrendered by his own soldiers and was put to death. Theodosius spent the winter at Milan, and in the following year (389) he entered Rome in triumph, accompanied by Valentinian and his own son Honorius. Two events in the life of Theodosius about this time may be mentioned as evidence of his uncertain character and his savage temper. In 387 a riot took place at Antioch, in which the statues of the emperor, of his father, and of his wife were thrown down; but these idle demonstrations were quickly suppressed by an armed force. When Theodosius heard of these riots, he degraded Antioch from the rank of a city, stripped it of its possessions and privileges, and reduced it to the condition of a village dependent on Laodicea. But in consequence of the intercession of the senate of Constantinople, he pardoned the city, and all who had taken part in the riot. The other event is a grave blot on the fame of Theodosius. In 390, while the emperor was at Milan, a serious riot broke out at Thessalonica, in which the imperial officer and several of his troops were murdered. Theodosius resolved to take the most signal vengeance upon the whole city. An army of barbarians was sent to Thessalonica; the people were invited to the games of the Circus, and as soon as the place was full, the soldiers received the signal for a massacre. For three hours the spectators were indiscriminately exposed to the fury of the soldiers, and 7000 of them, or, as some accounts say, more than twice that number, paid the penalty of the insurrection. St. Ambrose, the archbishop of Milan, represented to Theodosius his crime in a letter, and told him that penitence alone could efface his guilt. Accordingly, when the emperor proceeded to perform his devotions in the usual manner in the great church of Milan, the archbishop stopped him at the door, and demanded an acknowledgment of his guilt. The conscience-struck Theodosius humbled himself before the Church, which has recorded his penance as one of its greatest victories. He laid aside the insignia of imperial power, and in the posture of a suppliant in the church of Milan entreated pardon for his great sin before all the congregation. After eight months, the emperor was restored to communion with the Church. Theodosius spent three years in Italy, during which he established Valentinian II. on the throne of the West. He returned to Constantinople towards the end of 391. Valentinian was slain in 392 by Arbogastes, who raised Eugenius to the empire of the West. This involved Theodosius in a new war; but it ended in the defeat and death both of Eugenius and Arbogastes in 394. Theodosius died at Milan four months after the defeat of Eugenius, on the 17th of January, 395. His two sons, Arcadius and Honorius, had already been elevated to the rank of Augusti, and it was arranged that the empire should be divided between them, Arcadius having the East, and Honorius the West. Theodosius was a firm Catholic, and a fierce opponent and persecutor of the Arians and all heretics. It was in his reign also that the formal destruction of paganism took place; and we still possess a large number of the laws of Theodosius, prohibiting the exercise of the pagan religion, and forbidding the heathen worship under severe penalties, in some cases extending to death.—II., Roman emperor of the East, A.D. 408–450, was born in 401, and was only seven years of age at the death of his father Arcadius, whom he succeeded. Theodosius was a weak prince; and his sister, Pulcheria, who became his guardian in 414, possessed the virtual government of the empire during the remainder of his long reign. The principal external events in the reign of Theodosius were the war with the Persians, which only lasted a short time (421–422), and was terminated by a peace for 100 years, and the war with the Huns, who repeatedly defeated the armies of the emperor, and compelled him at length to conclude a disgraceful peace with them in 447 or 448. Theodosius died in 450, and was succeeded by his sister, Pulcheria, who prudently took for her colleague in the empire the senator Marcian, and made him her husband. Theodosius had been married in 421 to the accomplished Athenais, the daughter of the sophist Leontius, who received at her baptism the name of Eudocia. Their daughter Eudoxia was married to Valentinian III., the emperor of the West. In the reign of Theodosius, and that of Valentinian III., was made the compilation called the Codex Theodosianus. It was published in 438. It consists of sixteen books, which are divided into titles, with appropriate rubricae or headings; and the constitutions belonging to each title are arranged under it in chronological order. The first five books comprise the greater part of the constitution which relates to Jus Privatum; the sixth, seventh, and eighth books contain the law that relates to the constitution and administration; the ninth book treats of criminal law; the tenth and eleventh treat of the public revenue and some matters relating to procedure; the twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth books treat of the constitution and the administration of towns and other corporations; and the sixteenth contains the law relating to ecclesiastical matters [Dict. of Antiq. s.v.]. Edited by J. Gothofredus, Lyons, 1665, and Leipzig, 1736–1745; and by Haenel, Bonn, 1842.—III. Literary. 1. Of Bithynia, a mathematician, mentioned by Strabo and by Vitruvius, the latter of whom speaks of him as the inventor of a universal sun-dial (Strab. p. 566; Vitruv. ix. 9, 8).—2. Of Tripolis, a mathematician and astronomer of some distinction, who appears to have flourished later than the reign of Trajan. He wrote several works, of which the three following are extant, and have been edited by

Nizze, Berol. 1852: (1) Σφαιρικά, a treatise on the properties of the sphere, and of the circles described on its surface. (2) Περὶ ἡμερῶν καὶ νυκτῶν. (3) Περὶ οἰκήσεων. (Suid. s. v.)

Theōdōta (Θεοδότῃ), an Athenian courtesan, and one of the most celebrated persons of that class in Greece, is introduced as a speaker in Xenophon's Memorabilia (iii. 11). She at last attached herself to Alcibiades, and, after his murder, she performed his funeral rites (Athen. pp. 220, 574).

Theognis (Θέογνις). 1. Of Megara, an ancient elegiac and gnomic poet, is said to have flourished B.C. 548 or 544. He may have been born about 570, and would therefore have been eighty at the commencement of the Persian wars, 490, at which time we know from his own writings that he was alive. Theognis belonged to the oligarchical party in his native city, and in its fates he shared. He was a noble by birth, and all his sympathies were with the nobles. They are, in his poems, the ἀγαθοί and ἐσθλοί, and the commons the κακοί and δειλοί, terms which, in fact, at that period, were regularly used in this political signification, and not in their later ethical meaning. He was banished with the leaders of the oligarchical party, having previously been deprived of all his property; and most of his poems were composed while he was an exile. Most of his political verses are addressed to a certain Cynos, the son of Polypas. The other fragments of his poetry are of a social, most of them of a festive, character. They place us in the midst of a circle of friends who formed a kind of convivial society; all the members of this society belonged to the class whom the poet calls 'the good.' The collection of gnomic poetry which has come down to us under the name of Theognis contains, however, many additions from later poets. The genuine fragments of Theognis, with some passages which are poetical in thought, have much that helps us to understand his times.—The best editions are by Bekker, Lips. 1815 and 1827; by Orellius, Turic. 1840, and by Bergk, 1866.—2. A tragic poet, contemporary with Aristophanes, by whom he is satirised.

Theōn (Θέων). 1. The name of two mathematicians who are often confounded together. The first is Theon the elder, of Smyrna, best known as an arithmetician, who lived in the time of Hadrian. The second is Theon the younger, of Alexandria, the father of HYPATIA, best known as an astronomer and geometer, who lived in the time of Theodosius the elder. Both were pagans, a fact which the date of the second makes it desirable to state; and each held the Platonism of his period. Of Theon of Smyrna all that we have left is a portion of a work entitled Τῶν κατὰ μαθηματικὴν χρῆσιν εἰς τὴν τοῦ Πλάτωνος ἀνάγνωσιν. The portion which now exists is in two books, one on arithmetic, and one on music; there was a third, on astronomy, and a fourth, Περὶ τῆς ἐν κόσμῳ ἁρμονίας. Edited by Hiller, Leips. 1878. Of Theon of Alexandria the following works have come down to us: (1) Scholia on Aratus; (2) Edition of Euclid; (3) Commentary on the Almagest of Ptolemy, addressed to his son Epiphanius; (4) Commentary on the Tables of Ptolemy. Edited by Halma, Paris, 1822.—2. Aelius Theon, of Alexandria, a sophist and rhetorician of uncertain date, wrote several works, of which one entitled Progymnasmata (Προγυμνάσματα) is still extant. It is a useful treatise on the proper system of preparation for the profession of an orator, according to the rules laid down by Hermogenes and Aphthonius. Edited by Finckh, Stuttgart, 1834.—3. Of Samos, a painter who flourished from the time of Philip onwards to that of the successors of Alexander. The peculiar merit of Theon was his prolific fancy. (Quint. xii. 10, 6; Ael. V.H. ii. 44; Plin. xxxv. 140.)

Theōnōē (Θεονόη), daughter of Proteus and Psammathē, also called Idothea. [IDOTHEA.]

Theōphānes (Θεοφάνης). 1. Cn. Pompeius Theōphānes, of Mytilene in Lesbos, a learned Greek, and one of the most intimate friends of Pompey (Caes. B. G. iii. 18; Strab. p. 617). Pompey appears to have made his acquaintance during the Mithridatic war, and soon became so much attached to him that he presented to him the Roman franchise in the presence of his army. This occurred about B.C. 62; and in the course of the same year Theophanes obtained from Pompey the privileges of a free state for his native city, although it had espoused the cause of Mithridates. (Val. Max. viii. 14, 3; Cic. pro Arch. 10.) Theophanes came to Rome with Pompey; and on the breaking out of the Civil war he accompanied his patron to Greece. Pompey appointed him commander of the Fabri, and chiefly consulted him and Luceius on all important matters in the war, much to the indignation of the Roman nobles. After the battle of Pharsalia Theophanes fled with Pompey from Greece, and it was owing to his advice that Pompey went to Egypt. After the death of his patron, Theophanes took refuge in Italy, and was pardoned by Caesar. (Plut. Pomp. 76, 78; Cic. ad Att. xv. 19.) After his death the Lesbians paid divine honours to his memory (Tac. Ann. vi. 18). Theophanes wrote the history of Pompey's campaigns, in which he represented the exploits of his patron in the most favourable light.—2. M. Pompeius Theophanes, son of the preceding, was sent to Asia by Augustus, in the capacity of procurator, and was at the time that Strabo wrote one of the friends of Tiberius. The latter emperor, however, put his descendants to death towards the end of his reign, A.D. 33, because their ancestor had been one of Pompey's friends, and had received after his death divine honours (Strab. p. 617; Tac. Ann. vi. 18).—3. A Byzantine historian, flourished most probably in the latter part of the sixth century of our era. He wrote, in ten books, the history of the Eastern Empire during the Persian war under Justin II., from A.D. 567 to 581. The work itself is lost, but some extracts from it are preserved by Photius.—4. Surnamed Isaurus, also a Byzantine historian, lived during the second half of the eighth century, and the early part of the ninth. In consequence of his supporting the cause of image worship, he was banished by Leo the Armenian to the island of Samothrace, where he died, in 818. Theophanes wrote a Chronicon, which is still extant, beginning at the accession of Diocletian, in 277, and coming down to 811. It consists, like the Chronica of Eusebius and of Syncellus, of two parts, a History arranged according to years, and a Chronological Table, of which the former is very superior to the latter. It is published in the Collections of the Byzantine writers, Paris, 1655, fol., Venet. 1729, fol., and by De Boor, Lips. 1883.

Theophilus (Θεόφιλος). 1. An Athenian comic poet, most probably of the Middle Comedy (Pollux, ix. 15; Suid. s.v.).—2. A historian and geographer, quoted by Josephus, Plutarch, and Ptolemy (Jos. c. Ap. i. 23; Plut.

p. 309; Ptol. i. 9, 3).—3. One of the lawyers of Constantinople who were employed by Justinian on his first Code, on the Digest, and on the composition of the Institutes. [JUSTINIANUS.] Theophilus is the author of the Greek translation or paraphrase of the Institutes of Justinian, which has come down to us. It is entitled Ἰνστιτούτα Θεοφίλου Ἀντικένσως, Instituta Theophili Anticensoris. It became the text for the Institutes in the East, where the Latin language was little known, and entirely displaced the Latin text. Edited by Reitz, Haag. 1751, 2 vols. 4to.—4. Theophilus Protospatharius, the author of several Greek medical works, which are still extant. Protospatharius was originally a military title given to the colonel of the body-guards of the emperor of Constantinople (Spatharii), but afterwards became also a high civil dignity. Theophilus probably lived in the seventh century after Christ. Of his works the two most important are: (1) Περὶ τῆς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου κατασκευῆς, De Corporis Humani Fabrica, an anatomical and physiological treatise in five books. The best edition is by Greenhill, Oxon. 1842, 8vo. (2) Περὶ οὕρων, De Urinis, of which the best edition is by Guidot, Lugd. Bat. 1703 (and 1731), 8vo.—5. Bishop of Antioch in the second century.—6. Bishop of Alexandria in the fourth century. [Dict. of Christ. Biogr.]

Theōphrastus (Θεόφραστος), the Greek philosopher, was a native of Eresus in Lesbos, and studied philosophy at Athens, first under Plato, and afterwards under Aristotle. He became the favourite pupil of Aristotle, who is said to have changed his original name of Tyrtamus to Theophrastus (or the Divine Speaker), to indicate the fluent and graceful address of his pupil; but this tale is scarcely credible. Aristotle named Theophrastus his successor in the presidency of the Lyceum, and in his will bequeathed to him his library and the originals of his own writings. Theophrastus was a worthy successor of his great master, and nobly sustained the character of the school. He is said to have had 2000 disciples, and among them such men as the comic poet Menander. He was highly esteemed by the kings Philippos, Cassander, and Ptolemy, and was not the less the object of the regard of the Athenian people, as was decisively shown when he was impeached of impiety; for he was not only acquitted, but his accuser would have fallen a victim to his calumny had not Theophrastus generously interfered to save him. Nevertheless, when the philosophers were banished from Athens, in B.C. 305, according to the law of Sophocles, Theophrastus also left the city, until Philo, a disciple of Aristotle, in the very next year, brought Sophocles to punishment, and procured the repeal of the law. From this time Theophrastus continued to teach at Athens without any further molestation till his death. He died in 278, having presided over the Academy about thirty-five years. His age is differently stated. According to some accounts he lived eighty-five years; according to others, 107 years. (Diog. Laërt. v. 36-70; Strab. p. 618; Gell. xiii. 5.) He is said to have closed his life with the complaint respecting the short duration of human existence, that it ended just when the insight into its problems was beginning. The whole population of Athens took part in his funeral obsequies. He bequeathed his library to Neleus of Scepsis.—Theophrastus exerted himself to carry out the philosophical system of Aristotle, to throw light upon the difficulties contained in his books, and to fill up the gaps in them. With this view he wrote a great number of works, the great object of which was the development of the Aristotelian philosophy. Unfortunately, most of these works have perished. The following are alone extant: (1) Characteres (Ἡθικοί χαρακτήρες), in thirty chapters, containing brief, but exceedingly clear and graphic, descriptions of various types of human weakness, which are generally as easy of personal application now as they were in the third century B.C. Various theories are held about this book: (a) that it was composed as it stands by Theophrastus; (b) that it is a set of extracts from two treatises which he wrote on Moral Philosophy (Ἡθικά and Περὶ ἡθῶν); (c) that it is a collection of fugitive sketches which had been circulated by him among his friends and were gathered by them after his death. On the whole it seems most probable that it was formed partly according to (b) and partly according to (c). (2) A treatise on Sensuous Perception and its Objects (Περὶ αἰσθήσεως [καὶ αἰσθητῶν]). (3) A fragment of a work on Metaphysics (Τῶν μετὰ τὰ φυσικά). (4) On the History of Plants (Περὶ φυτῶν ἱστορίας), in ten books, one of the earliest works on botany which have come down to us, and entitle him to be considered the real founder of botanical science. It was largely used by Pliny. (5) On the Causes of Plants (Περὶ φυτῶν αἰτιῶν), originally in eight books, of which six are still extant. (6) Of Stones (Περὶ λίθων).—The best editions of the complete works of Theophrastus are by Schneider, Lips. 1818–21, five vols., and by Wimmer, Vratislaviae, 1842–62. The best separate edition of the Characteres is by Jebb, Lond. 1870. The works on Plants are edited separately by Stackhouse, Oxf. 1814, and by Schneider, Leips. 1821.

Theōphylactus (Θεοφυλάκτος), surnamed Simocatta, a Byzantine historian, lived at Constantinople, where he held some public offices under Heraclius, about A.D. 610–629. His chief work is a history of the reign of the emperor Maurice, in eight books, from the death of Tiberius II. and the accession of Maurice, in 582, down to the murder of Maurice and his children by Phocas in 602. Ed. by Bekker, Bonn, 1834. There is also extant another work of Theophylactus, entitled Quaestiones Physicae. Ed. by Boissonade, Paris, 1835; De Boor, 1886.

Theōpompus (Θεόπομπος). 1. King of Sparta, reigned about B.C. 770–720. He is said to have established the ephoralty, and to have been mainly instrumental in bringing the first Messenian war to a successful issue. (Paus. iii. 7, 5, iv. 7, 7; Plut. Lyc. 7; Arist. Pol. v. 11.)—2. Of Chios, the Greek historian, was the son of Damasistratus and the brother of Caucalus, the rhetorician. He was born about B.C. 378. He accompanied his father, who was exiled on account of his espousing the interests of the Lacedaemonians, but he was restored to his native country in the forty-fifth year of his age (333), in consequence of the letters of Alexander the Great, in which he exhorted the Chians to recall their exiles. Before he left his native country, he attended the school of rhetoric which Isocrates opened at Chios. Ephorus the historian was a fellow-student with him, but was of a very different character, and Isocrates used to say of them, that Theopompus needed the bit and Ephorus the spur. (Cic. Brut. 56, ad Att. vi. 1, 12.) By the advice of Isocrates, Theopompus did not devote his oratorical powers to the pleading of causes, but gave his chief attention to the study and composition of history. Like his master, however, he composed many laudatory speeches on set subjects. Thus in 352 he contended at Halicarnassus with Naucrates and his master Isocrates for the prize for oratory given by Artemisia in honour of her husband, and gained the victory. (Gell. x. 18; Plut. Vit. X. Orat. p. 838.) On his return to Chios in 333, Theopompus, who was a man of great wealth as well as learning, took an important position in the state; but his vehement temper, and his support of the aristocratical party, soon raised against him a host of enemies. Of these one of the most formidable was the sophist Theocritus (Strab. p. 645). As long as Alexander lived, his enemies dared not take any open proceedings against Theopompus, and even after the death of the Macedonian monarch, he appears to have enjoyed for some years the protection of the royal house; but he was eventually expelled from Chios as a disturber of the public peace, and fled to Egypt to Ptolemy, about 305, being at the time seventy-five years of age. Of his further fate we have no particulars.—None of the works of Theopompus have come down to us, but the following were his chief works:

(1) Ἑλληνικαὶ ἱστορίαι or Σύνταξις Ἑλληνικῶν, A History of Greece, in twelve books, which was a continuation of the History of Thucydides. Starting from B.C. 411, where the History of Thucydides breaks off, it embraced a period of seventeen years down to the battle of Cnidus, in 394 (Diod. xiii. 42, xiv. 84). (2) Φιλιππικά, also called ἱστορίαι (κατ' ἐξοχήν), The History of Philip, father of Alexander the Great, in fifty-eight books, from B.C. 360 to 336. This work contained so many digressions that Philip V., king of Macedonia, was able, by retaining only what belonged to the proper subject, to reduce the work from fifty-eight books to sixteen. Fifty-three of the fifty-eight books of the original work were extant in the ninth century of the Christian era, and were read by Photius, who has preserved an abstract of the twelfth book. (3) Orationes, which were chiefly Panegyrics, and what the Greeks called Συμβουλευτικοὶ λόγοι. Of the latter kind one of the most celebrated was addressed to Alexander on the state of Chios. Theopompus is praised by ancient writers for his diligence and accuracy. In his descriptions of battles, it is true, he sacrificed exactness to ornamental writing, so that his topography is sometimes impossible to follow. He is said to have taken more pleasure in blaming than in commending; but the charge of malignity brought against him (Nep. Alcib. 11; Plut. Lys. 30; Pol. viii. 12) was probably undeserved; and it would be fairer to say that his judgment of politicians was severe (cf. Dionys. Ep. ad Cn. Pomp. 6). The style of Theopompus was formed on the model of Isocrates, and possessed the characteristic merits and defects of his master. It was pure, clear, and elegant, but deficient in vigour, loaded with ornament, and in general too artificial. Theopompus is noticed by Pliny as the earliest Greek writer who made any definite mention of Rome: he spoke of the capture of the city by the Gauls (Plin. iii. 57).—The best collections of the fragments of Theopompus are by Wickers, Lugd. Bat. 1829, and by C. and Theod. Müller in the Fragmenta Historicorum Graecorum, Paris, 1841.—3. An Athenian comic poet, of the Old, and also of the Middle Comedy, was the son of Theodectes or Theodorus, or Tisamenus, and wrote as late as B.C. 380.

Thēra (Θήρα: Θηραίος: Santorin, but now again called Thera or Phera), an island in the Aegæan sea, and the chief of the Sporades, distant from Crete 700 stadia, and twenty-five Roman miles S. of the island of Ios. Thera is of volcanic origin, and the ancients themselves seem to have been aware that it had not always existed there. It is said to have been formed by a clod of earth thrown from the ship Argo, and to have received the name of Calliste, when it first emerged from the sea (Ap. Rhod. iv. 1762). Its earlier name is mentioned by Herodotus (iv. 147; cf. Strab. p. 484; Plin. iv. 71). Thera is said to have been originally inhabited by Phoenicians, but was afterwards colonised by Lacedaemonians and Minyans of Lemnos under the guidance of the Spartan Theras, who gave his name to the island (Hdt. i. c.). Cyrene was a colony from Thera, founded in B.C. 631. [CYRENE.] Thera remained faithful to the Spartans, and was one of the few islands which espoused the Spartan cause at the commencement of the Peloponnesian war (Thuc. ii. 31). Thera, the largest of a group of volcanic islands, has been likened in form to a horse-shoe; but a crescent with its two points elongated towards the west would be a more exact description. The distance round the inner curve is twelve miles, and round the outer eighteen, making the coast-line of the whole island thirty miles: its breadth is in no part more than three miles. Opposite to Thera westward is Therasia, which still bears the same name. (Strab. pp. 57, 484; Steph. Byz. s. v. Θηραία; Plin. iv. 70.) Its circuit is $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles, its length from N. to S. about $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and its breadth a mile. About $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile S. of Therasia, lies Aspronisi, or White Island, only a mile in circuit, and so called from being capped with a deep layer of pozzolana: the name of this island is not mentioned by the ancient writers. These three islands, Thera, Therasia, and Aspronisi, enclose an expanse of water nearly eighteen miles in circumference, which is in reality the crater of a great volcano. The islands were originally united, and were subsequently separated by the eruption of the crater. In the centre of this basin three volcanic mountains rise, known by the name of Kamméni or the Burnt (καυμένη, i. e. καυμένη instead of κεκαυμένη), and distinguished as the Palaea or Old, the Nea or New, and the Mikra or Little. The only fertility of the island consists in its vines, which, like those of other volcanic districts, are highly productive. The volcano has been active periodically from prehistoric times to the present day; for, though Herodotus does not mention the phenomenon, there are evidences of eruptions long before his time. On the SW. promontory of Thera (C. Akroteri) remains of houses were recently found below the layers of pumice, containing iron implements and pottery, apparently of the date of Hissarlik pottery; and on Therasia dwellings were excavated belonging to a still earlier period, buried beneath pumice, and themselves built partly of volcanic stone. The most remarkable eruptions recorded in ancient times were those of B.C. 198, when the oldest of the three volcanic islets (Palaea Kamméni) rose from the sea (Strab. p. 57; Just. xxx. 4; Euseb. Chron. p. 144)—the Rhodians occupied it and built on it a temple to Poseidon Asphalius—and of 50–60 A.D. (Sen. Q. N. ii. 26, vi. 4; Dio Cass. lx. 29; Georg. Cedren. i. p. 197).

Therambo (Θεράμβω, also Θεράμβος), a town of Macedonia, on the peninsula Pallene (Hdt. vii. 123).

Theramenes (Θηραμένης), an Athenian, son of Hagnon, was a leading member of the oligarchical government of the 400 at Athens in B.C. 411. In this, however, he does not appear to have occupied as eminent a station as he had hoped to fill, while at the same time the declaration of Alcibiades and of the army at Samos against the oligarchy made it evident to him that its days were numbered. Accordingly he withdrew from the more violent aristocrats and began to cabal against them; and he subsequently took not only a prominent part in the deposition of the 400, but came forward as the accuser of Antiphon and Archeptolemus, who had been his intimate friends, but whose death he was now procuring. At the battle of Arginusæ, in 406, Theramenes held a subordinate command in the Athenian fleet, and he was one of those who, after the victory, were commissioned by the generals (according to their own story) to repair to the scene of action and save as many as possible of the disabled galleys and their crews. A storm, it is said, rendered the execution of the order impracticable; yet, instead of trusting to this ground of defence, Theramenes thought it safer to divert the popular anger from himself to others, and took a leading part in bringing them to trial. After the capture of Athens by Lysander, Theramenes was chosen one of the Thirty Tyrants (404). He endeavoured to check the tyrannical proceedings of his colleagues, foreseeing that their violence would be fatal to the permanence of their power. His opposition, however, had no effect in restraining them, but only induced the desire to rid themselves of so troublesome an associate, whose former conduct, moreover, had shown that no political party could depend on him, and who had earned, by his trimming, the nickname of 'Turncoat' (Κόθορπος—a boot which might be worn on either foot). He was therefore accused by Critias before the council as a traitor, and when his nominal judges, favourably impressed by his able defence, exhibited an evident disposition to acquit him, Critias introduced into the chamber a number of men armed with daggers, and declared that, as all who were not included in the privileged Three Thousand might be put to death by the sole authority of the Thirty, he struck the name of Theramenes out of that list, and condemned him with the consent of all his colleagues. Theramenes then rushed to the altar, which stood in the council-chamber, but was dragged from it and carried off to execution. When he had drunk the hemlock, he dashed out the last drops from the cup, exclaiming, 'This to the health of the handsome Critias!' (Xen. Hell. ii. 3, 2; Diod. xiv. 5; cf. Cic. Tusc. i. 40.)

Thérapiæ (Θεράπαι, also Θεράπνη, Dor. Θεράπαι: Θεράπαιος). 1. A town in Laconica, on the left bank of the Eurotas, and a little above Sparta. It received its name from Therapne, daughter of Lelex, and is celebrated in mythology as the birthplace of Castor and Pollux, and contained temples of these divinities as well as temples of Menelaus and Helen, both of whom were said to be buried here (Pausanias, iii. 19, 9; Dioscuri).—2. A town in Boeotia, on the road from Thebes to the Asopus.

Théras. [THERA.]

Thérāsia. [THERA.]

Thériclēs (Θηρικλῆς), a Corinthian potter, whose works obtained such celebrity that they became known throughout Greece by the name of Θηρίκλεια (sc. ποτήρια) or κύλικες Θηρίκλειαί (or -αι), and these names were applied not only to cups of earthenware, but also to those of wood, glass, gold, and silver (Athen. pp. 470-472; Plin. xvi. 205).

Therma (Θέρμη: Θεμαῖος), a town in Macedonia, afterwards called Thessalonica, situated at the NE. extremity of a great gulf of the Aegæan sea, lying between Thessaly and the peninsula Chalcidice, and called Thermaicus or Thermaeus Sinus (Θερμαῖος κόλπος), from the town at its head. This gulf was also called Macedonicus Sinus: its modern name is Gulf of Saloniki. [THESSALONICA.]

Thermae (Θέρμαι), a town in Sicily, built by the inhabitants of Himera, after the destruction of the latter city by the Carthaginians. For details see HIMERA.

Thermaicus Sinus. [THERMA.]

Thermōdon (Θερμῶδων: Thermē), a river of Pontus, in the district of Themiscyra, the reputed country of the Amazons, rises in a mountain called Amazonius M. (and still Mason Dagh), near Phanaroea, and falls into the sea about thirty miles E. of the mouth of the Iris, after a short course, but with so large a body of water that its breadth, according to Xenophon, was three plethra (above 300 feet), and it was navigable. (Xen. An. v. 6, 9, vi. 2, 1; AMAZONES.) At its mouth was the city of THEMISCYRA.

Thermopylae, often called simply Pylae (Θερμοπύλαι, Πύλαι), that is, the Hot Gates or the Gates, a celebrated pass leading from Thessaly into Locris. It lay between Mt. Callidromus, a part of the ridge of Mt. Oeta, and an inaccessible morass, forming the edge of the Malic Gulf. At one end of the pass, close to Anthela, the mountain approached so close to the morass as to leave room for only a single carriage between; this narrow entrance formed the W. gate of Thermopylae. About a mile to the E. the mountain again approached close to the sea, near the Locrian town of Alpeni, thus forming the E. gate of Thermopylae. The space between these two gates was wider and more open, and was distinguished by its abundant flow of hot springs, which were sacred to Heracles: hence the name of the place. Thermopylae was the only pass by which an enemy can penetrate from northern into southern Greece; whence its great importance in Grecian history. It is especially celebrated on account of the heroic defence of Leonidas and the 300 Spartans against the mighty host of Xerxes. They only fell because the Persians had discovered a path over the mountains, and were enabled to attack them in the rear. This mountain path began near Trachis, ascended the gorge of the river Asopus and the hill called Anopaea, then crossed the crest of Oeta, and descended in the rear of Thermopylae near the town of Alpeni. In 279 B.C. the Greeks held the pass for some time against the Gauls, till they were taken in the rear, as Leonidas had been. (Hdt. vii. 207-228; cf. Strab. p. 428; Liv. xxxvi. 15; Paus. iv. 35, 9, x. 19-22; Pol. x. 41.)

Thermum or Therma (Θέρμουν or τὸ Θέρμα), a town of the Aetolians near Stratus, with warm mineral springs, was regarded for some time as the capital of the country, since it was the place of meeting of the Aetolian Confederacy (Strab. p. 463; Pol. v. 7).

Thermus, Minūcius. 1. Q., served under Scipio as tribus militum in the war against Hannibal in Africa in B.C. 202; was tribune of the plebs 201; curule aedile 197; and praetor 196, when he carried on war with great success in Nearer Spain. He was consul in 193, and carried on war against the Ligurians in this and the two following years. On his return to Rome in 190, a triumph was refused him, through the influence of M. Cato, who delivered on the occasion his two orations entitled De decem Hominibus and De falsis Pugnīs (Gell. x. 3, xiii. 24). Thermus was killed in 188, while fighting under Cn. Manlius Vulso against the Thracians. (Pol. xxii. 26; Liv. xxxviii. 41, 46; App. Syr. 39.)—2. M., proprætor in 81, accompanied L. Murena, Sulla's legate, into Asia. Thermus was engaged in the siege of Mytilene, and it was under him that Julius Caesar served his first campaign and gained his first laurels (Suet. Jul. 2.)—3. Q., proprætor 51 and 50 in Asia, where he received many letters from Cicero, who praises his administration of the province. On the breaking out of the Civil war he espoused the side of Pompey. (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 53-57; Caes. B.C. i. 12; App. B.C. v. 139.)

Thērōn (Θήρων), tyrant of Agrigentum in Sicily, was the son of Aenesidemus, and descended from one of the most illustrious families in his native city. He obtained the supreme power about B.C. 488, and retained it till his death in 472. He conquered Himera in 482, and united this powerful city to his own dominions. He was in close alliance with Gelo, ruler of Syracuse and Gela, to whom he had given his daughter Demarete in marriage; and he shared with Gelo in the great victory gained over the Carthaginians in 480. On the death of Gelo in 478, Theron espoused the cause of Polyzelus, who had been driven into exile by his brother Hiero. Theron raised an army for the purpose of reinstating him, but hostilities were prevented, and a peace concluded between the two sovereigns. (Diod. xi. 20-25, 48, 53; Pind. Ol. ii. iii.; Hdt. vii. 165; Gelo.)

Thersander (Θέρσανδρος), son of Polynices and Argia, and one of the Epigoni, was married to Demonassa, by whom he became the father of Tisamenus. He went with Agamemnon to Troy, and was slain in that expedition by Telephus. His tomb was shown at Elaea in Mysia, where sacrifices were offered to him. (Hdt. iv. 147; Paus. iii. 15, 4, vii. 3, 1, ix. 3, 7, x. 10, 2.) Virgil (Aen. ii. 261) enumerates Thersander among the Greeks concealed in the wooden horse.

Thersites (Θερσίτης), son of Agrius, the ugliest man and the most impudent talker among the Greeks at Troy (Il. ii. 212). According to the later poets, he was killed by Achilles, because he had ridiculed him for lamenting the death of Penthesilea, queen of the Amazons (Tzet. ad Lyc. 999; Quint. Smyrn. i. 800).

Thēseus (Θησεύς), the great legendary hero of Attica, was the son of Aegæus, king of Athens, and of Aethra, the daughter of Pittheus, king of Troezen. This, however, was the Attic tradition, which aimed at making Theseus a prince of Athenian descent. The older legend of Troezen itself made Theseus the son of Poseidon (Paus. i. 17, 3; Diod. iv. 59; Plut. Thes. 6; Eur. Hipp. 887). Plutarch in his Theseus has gathered into a connected story various legends, some of Athenian origin, some from other countries: (1) his journey from Troezen to Athens, an Attic glorification of their hero; (2) the Cretan story of the Minotaur adapted to the Attic legends; (3) his later adventures, some of which are of Spartan origin. But the story may be related consecutively as Plutarch has given it. He was brought up at Troezen, and when he reached maturity, he took, by his mother's directions, the sword and sandals, the tokens which had been left by Aegeus, and proceeded to Athens. Eager to emulate Heracles, he went by land, displaying his prowess by destroying the robbers and monsters that infested the country. Periphetes, Sinis, Phaea the Crommyonian sow, Sciron, Cercyon, and Procrustes fell before him. At Athens he was immediately recognised by Medea, who laid a plot for poisoning him at a banquet to which he was invited. By means of the sword which he carried, Theseus was recognised by Aegeus, acknowledged as his son, and declared his successor. The sons of Pallas, thus disappointed in their hopes of succeeding to the throne, attempted to secure the succession by violence, and declared war, but, being betrayed by the herald Leos, were destroyed. The capture of the Marathonian bull (cf. the story of Heracles and the Cretan bull), which had long laid waste the surrounding country, was the next exploit of Theseus. After this Theseus went of his own accord as one of the seven youths whom the Athenians were obliged to send every year, with seven maidens, to Crete, to be devoured by the Minotaur. When they arrived at Crete, Ariadne, the daughter of Minos, became enamoured of Theseus, and provided him with a sword with which he slew the Minotaur, and a clue of thread by which he found his way out of the labyrinth. Having effected his object, Theseus sailed away, carrying off Ariadne. There were various accounts about Ariadne; but according to the general account Theseus abandoned her in the island of Naxos on his way home. [ARIADNE.] He was generally believed to have had by her two sons, Oenopion and Staphylus; yet this does not agree with the account in the Odyssey, which represents her as dying before her wedding with Theseus was brought about, and apparently after her union with Dionysus (Od. xi. 320). As the vessel in which Theseus sailed approached Attica, he neglected to hoist the white sail which was to have been the signal of the success of the expedition; whereupon Aegeus, thinking that his son had perished, threw himself into the sea. [AEGEUS.] Theseus thus became king of Athens. Other adventures followed, again repeating those of Heracles. Theseus is said to have assailed the Amazons before they had recovered from the attack of Heracles, and to have carried off their queen Antiope. The Amazons in their turn invaded Attica, and penetrated into Athens itself; and the final battle in which Theseus overcame them was fought in the very midst of the city. [AMAZONES.] By Antiope Theseus was said to have had a son named Hippolytus or Demophon, and after her death to have married Phaedra [HIPPOLYTUS; PHAEDRA]. Theseus again was one of the Argonauts (the anachronism of the attempt of Medea to poison him does not seem to have been noticed); he joined in other famous expeditions (as in the Calydonian hunt), and he aided Adrastus in recovering the bodies of those slain before Thebes. He contracted a close friendship with Pirithous, and aided him and the Lapithae against the Centaurs. With the assistance of Pirithous he carried off Helen from Sparta while she was quite a girl, and placed her at Aphidnae, under the care of Aethra. It should be noted that this is one of that group of legends which appear to have started from the Peloponnesus and represent Theseus in the character of a marauding chief with little of the hero about him: but it was incorporated in the Athenian story. After this he helped Pirithous in his attempt to carry off Persephone from the lower world. Pirithous perished in the enterprise, and Theseus was kept in durance until he was delivered by Heracles. Meanwhile Castor and Pollux invaded Attica, and carried off Helen and Aethra, ACADEMUS having informed the brothers where they were to be found. [For the Troezenian story of Hippolytus and its adoption in Attic legends see HIPPOLYTUS.] Menestheus incited the people against Theseus, who on his return found himself unable to re-establish his authority, and retired to Scyros, where he met with a treacherous death at the hands of Lycomedes. The departed hero was believed to have reappeared to aid the Athenians at the battle of Marathon. In 469 the bones of Theseus were discovered by Cimon in Scyros, and brought to Athens, where they were deposited in a temple (the Theseum) erected in honour of the hero. [This is not the temple now standing which is often called the Theseum: see p. 143, b.] A festival in honour of Theseus was celebrated on the eighth day of each month, especially on the 8th of Pyanepsion.—There can be no doubt that Theseus is a purely legendary personage. Nevertheless, in later times the Athenians came to regard him as the author of a very important political revolution in Attica. Before his time Attica had been broken up into twelve petty independent states or townships, acknowledging no head, and connected only by a federal union. Theseus abolished the separate governments, and erected Athens into the capital of a single commonwealth. The festival of the Panathenaea was instituted to commemorate this important revolution. Theseus is said to have established a constitutional government, retaining in his own hands only certain definite powers and functions. He is further said to have distributed the Athenian citizens into the three classes of Eupatridae, Geomori, and Demiurgi. It would be a vain task to attempt to decide whether there is any historical basis for the legends about Theseus, and still more so to endeavour to separate the historical from the legendary in what has been preserved. The Theseus of the Athenians was a hero who fought the Amazons, and slew the Minotaur, and carried off Helen. A personage who should be nothing more than a wise king, consolidating the Athenian commonwealth, however possible his existence might be, would have no historical reality; rather it should be said that Theseus was invented to account for the growth of institutions whose history was lost; or that a local divinity round whom many legends had gathered was transformed into a national hero and further credited with the changes in the state which had actually taken place. The connexion of Theseus with Poseidon, the national deity of the Ionic tribes, his coming from the Ionic town Troezen, forcing his way through the Isthmus into Attica, and establishing the Isthmia as an Ionic Panegyris, rather suggest that Theseus is, at least in part, the mythological representative of an Ionian immigration into Attica, which, adding perhaps to the strength and importance of Ionian settlers already in the country, might easily have led to that political aggregation of the disjointed elements of the state which is assigned to Theseus.

Thesmia, Thesmōphoros. [DEMETER.]

Thespiæ or Thespia (Θεσπιαί, Θεσπιά, Θέσπεια, Θεσπία: Θεσπιεύς, Θεσπιάδης, Thespiensis: Eremo or Rimokastro), an ancient town in Boeotia on the SE. slope of Mt. Helicon, at no great distance from the Crissaean Gulf, on which stood its harbour Creusis (Il. ii. 498; Hdt. viii. 50; Paus. ix. 26, 6). Its inhabitants did not follow the example of the other Boeotian towns in submitting to Xerxes, and a number of them bravely fought under Leonidas at Thermopylae, and perished with the Spartans. Their city was burnt to the ground by the Persians, but was subsequently rebuilt. (Hdt. vii. 132, 200, 222, viii. 50.) In the Peloponnesian war the Thebans made themselves masters of the town and destroyed its walls (Thuc. iv. 133, vi. 95). The inhabitants were expelled altogether from the city after the battle of Leuctra (Paus. ix. 14, 2); but the city was afterwards rebuilt and occupied (Pol. xxviii. 1; Liv. xlii. 43; Strab. p. 410). At Thespiæ was preserved the celebrated marble statue of Eros by Praxiteles, who had given it to Phryne, by whom it was presented to her native town. [PRAXITELES.] From the vicinity of the town to Mt. Helicon the Muses are called Thespiades, and a valley close to Thespiæ was sacred to them. Helicon itself is named the Thespiæ rupes (Ov. Met. v. 310; Varr. L.L. vii. 2). There are considerable remains of the walls of the town. Remains of an Ionic temple and of a theatre with a well-preserved proscenium have been excavated in the Valley of the Muses.

Thespis (Θέσπις), the father of Greek Tragedy, was a contemporary of Pisistratus, and a native of Icarus, one of the demi in Attica, where the worship of Dionysus had long prevailed. The alteration made by Thespis, which gave to the old Tragedy a new and dramatic character, was very simple but very important. Before his time the leader of the Chorus had recited the adventures of Dionysus and had been answered by the Chorus. Thespis introduced an actor (ὑποκριτής, or 'answerer') to reply to the leader of the Chorus. It is clear that, though the performance still remained, as far as can be gathered, chiefly lyrical, and the dialogue was of comparatively small account, yet a decided step towards the drama had been made. [See Dict. of Ant. art. Tragedia.] There is no reason to believe Horace's statement that Thespis went about in a waggon as a strolling player (A.P. 276). It is suggested that the expressions for the freedom of jesting at the festival of the Lenæa (τὰ ἐξ ἀμαζῶν, ἐξ ἀμάξης ὑβρίζειν) may have given rise to the story.

Thespius (Θέσπιος), son of Erechtheus, who, according to some, founded the town of Thespiæ in Boeotia (Paus. ix. 26, 4).

Thesprōti (Θεσπρωτοί), a people of Epirus, inhabiting the district called after them Thesprōtia (Θεσπρωτία) or Thesprōtis (Θεσπρωτίς), which extended along the coast from the Ambracian gulf northwards as far as the river Thyamis, and inland as far as the territory of the Molossi. The SE. part of the country on the coast, from the river Acheron to the Ambracian gulf, was called Cassopæa from the town Cassope, and is sometimes reckoned as a distinct district. The Thesproti were the most ancient inhabitants of Epirus, and are said to have derived their name from Thesprotus, the son of Lycaon. Here was the oracle of Dodona, the great centre of the Pelasgic worship. [DODONA; PELASGI.] From Thesprotia issued the Thessalians, who took possession of the country afterwards called Thessaly. In the historical period the Thesprotians were a people of small importance, having become subject to the kings of the Molossians. (Hdt. vii. 176, viii. 47; Thuc. i. 46, iv. 35, v. 22; Strab. p. 256; MOLOSSI.)

Thessālīa (Θεσσαλία or Θετταλία: Θεσσαλός or Θετταλός), the largest division of Greece, was bounded on the N. by the Cambunian mountains, which separated it from Macedonia; on the W. by Mt. Pindus, which separated it from Epirus; on the E. by the Aegæan sea; and on the S. by the Maliac gulf and Mt. Oeta, which separated it from Locris, Phocis and Aetolia. Thessaly Proper is a large plain lying between the Cambunian mountains on the N. and Mt. Othrys on the S., Mt. Pindus on the W., and Mts. Ossa and Pelion on the E. It is thus shut in on every side by mountain barriers, broken only at the NE. corner by the valley and defile of Tempe, which separates Ossa from Olympus, and is the only road through which an invader can enter Thessaly from the N. This plain is drained by the river Penēus and its affluents, and is said to have been originally a vast lake, the waters of which were afterwards carried off through the vale of Tempe by some sudden convulsion, which rent the rocks of this valley asunder. [PENEUS; TEMPE.] The lake of Nessonis at the foot of Mt. Ossa, and that of Boebeis at the foot of Mt. Pelion, are supposed to have been remains of this vast lake. In addition to the plain already described there were two other districts included under the general name of Thessaly: one called Magnesia, being a long narrow strip of country, extending along the coast of the Aegæan sea from Tempe to the Pagasæan gulf, and bounded on the W. by Mts. Ossa and Olympus; and the other, called Malis, being a long narrow vale at the extreme S. of the country, lying between Mts. Othrys and Oeta, and drained by the river Sperchēus. Thessaly is said to have been originally known by the names of Pyrria, Aemonia and Aeolis (Hdt. vii. 176). The two former appellations belong to mythology [PYRRHA]; the latter refers to the period when the country was inhabited by Aeolians, who were afterwards expelled from the country by the Thessalians about sixty years after the Trojan war. The Thessalians are said to have come from Thesprotia, but at what period their name became the name of the country cannot be determined. It does not occur in Homer, who only mentions the several principalities of which it was composed (Il. ii. 683, 749, 756), and does not give any general appellation to the country. Thessaly was divided in very early times into four districts or tetrarchies, a division which we still find subsisting in the Peloponnesian war. These districts were Hestiaeotis, Pelasgiotis, Thessaliotis and Phthiotis. They comprised, however, only the great Thessalian plain; and besides them, we find mention of four other districts, viz. Magnesia, Dolopia, Oetaea, and Malis, which was less probably included in Thessaly. Perrhaebia was, properly speaking, not a district, since Perrhaebi was the name of a Pelasgic people settled in Hestiaeotis and Pelasgiotis. [PERRHAEBI.] 1. Hestiaeōtis (Ἑστιάωτις or Ἑστιῶτις), inhabited by the Hestiaeōtae (Ἑστιάωται or Ἑστιῶται) the NW. part of Thessaly, bounded on the N. by Macedonia, on the W. by Epirus, on the E. by Pelasgiotis and on the S. by Thessaliotis: the Peneus may be said in general to have formed its S. limit.—2. Pelasgiōtis (Πελασγῶτις), the E. part of the Thessalian plain, was bounded on the N. by Macedonia, on the W. by Hestiaeotis, on the E. by Magnesia, and on the S. by the Sinus Pagasaeus and Phthiotis. The name shows that it was originally inhabited by people who had been settled there in prehistoric times, and one of the chief towns in the district was Larissa, which is regarded as a specially 'Pelasgian' name. [PELASGI].—3. Thessaliōtis (Θεσσαλιῶτις), the SW. part of the Thessalian plain, so called because it was first occupied by the Thessalians who came across Mt. Pindus from Thesprotia. It was bounded on the N. by Hestiaeotis, on the W. by Epirus, on the E. by Pelasgiotis, and on the S. by Dolopia and Phthiotis.—4. Phthiōtis (Φθιώτις), inhabited by the Phthiōtæ (Φθιώται), the SE. of Thessaly, bounded on the N. by Thessaliotis, on the W. by Dolopia, on the S. by the Sinus Maliacus, and on the E. by the Pagasaeus gulf. Its inhabitants were Achaeans, and are frequently called the Achaean Phthiōtæ. It is in this district that Homer places Phthia and Hellas proper, and the dominions of Achilles. The other districts which were reckoned less properly as part of Thessaly were: Magnēsia [MAGNESIA].—Dōlōpīa (Δολοπία), inhabited by the Dōlōpēs (Δόλοπες), a small district bounded on the E. by Phthiotis, on the N. by Thessaliotis, on the W. by Athamania, and on the S. by Oetaea. They were an ancient people, for they are not only mentioned by Homer as fighting before Troy, but they also sent deputies to the Amphictyonic assembly.—Oetaea (Οἰταία), inhabited by the Oetaei (Οἰταῖοι) and Aenīanes (Αἰνιᾶνες), a district in the upper valley of the Spercheus, lying between Mts. Othrys and Oeta, and bounded on the N. by Dolopia, on the S. by Phocis, and on the E. by Malis.—Malis [MALIS].—History of Thessaly. [For the important legendary history of Thessaly, see CENTAURI; LAPITHAE; ARGONAUTAE.] The Thessalians, as was said above, were a Thesprotian tribe. Under the guidance of leaders said to be descendants of Heracles, they invaded the W. part of the country, afterwards called Thessaliotis, and drove out or reduced to the condition of Penestæ or bondsmen the ancient Aeolian inhabitants. The Thessalians afterwards spread over the other parts of the country, compelling the Perrhaebi, Magnetes, Achaean Phthiōtæ, &c., to submit to their authority and pay them tribute. The population of Thessaly, therefore, consisted, like that of Laconica, of three distinct classes: (1) the Penestæ, whose condition was nearly the same as that of the Helots [see Dict. of Ant. art. PENESTÆ]; (2) the subject people, corresponding to the Perioeci of Laconica; (3) the Thessalian conquerors, who alone had any share in the public administration, and whose lands were cultivated by the Penestæ. For some time after the conquest, perhaps down to the time of the Persian wars (cf. Hdt. v. 63, vii. 6) and even to 454 B.C. (cf. Thuc. i. 111), Thessaly was governed by kings said to be of the race of Heracles. When the kingly power was abolished, the government in the separate cities became oligarchical, the power being chiefly in the hands of a few great families descended from the ancient kings. Of these two of the most powerful were the Aleuadae and the Scopadae, the former of whom ruled at Larissa, and the latter at Cranon or Crannon. These nobles, who are compared to the feudal lords of the middle ages, had vast estates cultivated by the Penestæ; they were celebrated for their hospitality and princely mode of life, and they attracted to their courts many of the poets and artists of southern Greece. Chief among the national sports of the Thessalians, as an equestrian people, was the Taureia or bull-hunting, in which the mounted pursuers leapt upon the bull when he was exhausted by running and pulled him to the ground. At an early period the Thessalians were united into a confederate body. Each of the four districts into which the country was divided probably regulated its affairs by some kind of provincial council; and when occasion required, a chief magistrate was elected under the name of Tagus (Ταγός), whose commands were obeyed by all the four districts. His command was of a military rather than of a civil nature, and he seems to have been appointed only in case of war. This confederacy, however, was not of much practical benefit to the Thessalian people, and appears to have been used only by the Thessalian nobles as a means of cementing and maintaining their power. The Thessalians never became of much importance in Grecian history. They submitted to the Persians on their invasion of Greece, and they exercised little influence on Grecian affairs till after the end of the Peloponnesian war. About this time the power of the aristocratical families began to decline, and Lycophron, who had established himself as tyrant at Pherae, offered a formidable opposition to the great aristocratical families, and endeavoured to extend his power over all Thessaly. His ambitious schemes were realised by Jason, the successor, and probably the son, of Lycophron, who caused himself to be elected Tagus about B.C. 374. While he lived the whole of Thessaly was united as one political power, and he began to aim at making himself master of all Greece, when he was assassinated, in 370, [See more fully in Dict. of Ant. art. TAGUS.] The office of Tagus became a tyranny under his successors, Polydorus, Polyphron, Alexander, Tisiphon and Lycophron; but at length the old aristocratical families called in the assistance of Philip of Macedonia, who deprived Lycophron of his power in 353, restored the ancient government in the different towns, and reorganised the country in tetrarchies and decarchies. The country, however, only changed masters; for a few years later (344) Philip made it completely subject to Macedonia, by placing at the head of the four divisions of the country governors devoted to his interests, and probably members of the ancient noble families, who had now become little better than his vassals. From this time Thessaly remained in a state of dependence upon the Macedonian kings, till the victory of T. Flamininus at Cynoscephalæ, in 197, again gave them a semblance of independence under the protection of the Romans. Thessaly was incorporated in the province of Achaia in 27 B.C. (Pharsalus remaining a free town), but in the second century of our era it formed part of Macedonia. The Thessalians were, however, allowed independence in their civic administration, for which a diet was held at Larissa.

Thessalonica (Θεσσαλονίκη) daughter of Philip, the father of Alexander the Great, by his wife or concubine, Nicesipolis of Pherae. She was taken prisoner by Cassander along with Olympias on the capture of Pydna, in B.C. 317; and Cassander embraced the opportunity to connect himself with the ancient royal house of Macedonia by marrying her. By Cassander she became the mother of three sons, Philip, Antipater, and Alexander; and her husband paid her the honour of conferring her name upon the city of Thessalonica, which he founded on the site of the ancient Therma. [See below.] After the death of Cassander, Thessalonica was put to death by her son Antipater (295). (Paus. ix. 7, 3; Diod. xix. 35, 52.)

Thessalonica (Θεσσαλονίκη, also Θεσσαλονίκη: Θεσσαλονικεύς: Salonica), more anciently Therma (Θέρμη: Thermaios), an ancient city in Macedonia, situated at the N.E. extremity of the Sinus Thermaicus. Under the name of Therma it was not a place of much importance. It was taken and occupied by the Athenians a short time before the Peloponnesian war (B.C. 432) but was soon after restored by them to Perdiccas. It was made an important city by Cassander, who collected in this place the inhabitants of several adjacent towns (about B.C. 315), and who gave it the name of Thessalonica, in honour of his wife, the daughter of Philip and sister of Alexander the Great. (Strab. p. 330.) From this time it became a large and flourishing city. Its harbour was well situated for commercial intercourse with the Hellespont and the Aegean; and under the Romans it had the additional advantage of lying on the Via Egnatia, which led from the W. shores of Greece to Byzantium and the East. It was visited by the Apostle Paul about A.D. 53; and about two years afterwards he addressed from Corinth two epistles to his converts in the city. Thessalonica continued to be, under the empire, one of the most important cities of Macedonia; and at a later time it became the residence of the prefect, and the capital, of the Illyrian provinces. It is celebrated at this period on account of the fearful massacre of its inhabitants by order of Theodosius, in consequence of a riot in which some of the Roman officers had been assassinated by the populace. [THEODOSIUS.]

Thessalus (Θεσσαλός.) 1. A Greek physician, son of Hippocrates, passed some of his time at the court of Archelaus, king of Macedonia, who reigned B.C. 413-399. He was one of the founders of the sect of the Dogmatici, and is several times highly praised by Galen, who calls him the most eminent of the sons of Hippocrates. He was supposed by some of the ancient writers to be the author of several of the works that form part of the Hippocratic Collection, which he might have compiled from notes left by his father.—2. Also a Greek physician, was a native of Tralles in Lydia, and one of the founders of the medical sect of the Methodici. He lived at Rome in the reign of the emperor Nero, A.D. 54-68, to whom he addressed one of his works; and here he died and was buried, and his tomb was to be seen in Pliny's time on the Via Appia. He considered himself superior to all his predecessors. He is frequently mentioned by Galen, but always in terms of contempt and ridicule. None of his works are extant.—3. Son of Pisistratus (Thuc. i. 20). In Arist. Ἀθ. πολ. 18 he is said to be the same as Hegesistratus, and plays the part assigned to Hipparchus in the events which led to Aristogeiton's conspiracy.

Thestius (Θέστιος,) son of Ares and Demonicé or Androdice: in other accounts, son of Agenor and grandson of Pleuron, the king of Aetolia. He was the father of Iphiclus, Eupippus, Plexippus, Eurypylus, Leda, Althaea, and Hypermnestra. His wife is not the same in all traditions, some calling her Lycippe or Laophonte, a daughter of Pleuron, and others Deidamia. (Apollod. i. 7, 7; Paus. iii. 13, 5.) The patronymic Thestiades is given to his grandson Meleager, as well as to his sons, and the female patronymic Thestias to his daughter Althaea, the mother of Meleager.

Thestor (Θέστωρ), son of Idmon and Laothoë, and father of Calchas, Theoclymenus, Leucippe, and Theonoë (Il. i. 69; Hyg. Fab. 128). The patronymic Thestorides is frequently given to his son Calchas.

Thetis (Θέτις), one of the daughters of Nereus and Doris, was the wife of Peleus, by whom she became the mother of Achilles (Il. i. 538, xviii. 35; Hes. Th. 244). As a goddess of the sea she dwelt, like her sisters the Nereids, below the waves with her father Nereus (Il. i. 357, xx. 207). She there received Dionysus on his flight from Lycurgus, and the god, in his gratitude, presented her with a golden urn (Il. vi. 135; Od. xxiv. 75). When Hephaestus was thrown down from heaven, he was likewise received by Thetis. She had been brought up by Hera, and when she reached the age of maturity, Zeus and Hera gave her, against her will, in marriage to Peleus. Such was the Homeric story (Il. xviii. 85, 432); but later accounts add that Poseidon and Zeus himself first sued for her hand; but when Themis declared that the son of Thetis would be stronger than his father, both gods desisted from their suit, and desired her marriage with a mortal (Pind. Isthm. viii. 58; Aesch. Pr. 767; Ov. Met. xi. 225, 350). Chiron informed his friend Peleus how he might gain possession of her, even if she should metamorphose herself: for Thetis, like Proteus, had the power of assuming any form she pleased; and she had recourse to this means of escaping from Peleus, who, instructed by Chiron, held the goddess fast till she again assumed her proper form, and promised to marry him (Pind. Nem. iii. 60; Apollod. iii. 13, 5; Paus. viii. 18, 1). This story, which appears first in Pindar, was a favourite subject in vase-painting of an early date. The wedding of Peleus was honoured with the presence of all the gods, with the exception of Eris or Discord, who was not invited, and who avenged herself by throwing among the assembled gods the apple which was the source of so much misery. [PARIS.] For the action of Thetis in the story of her son see ACHILLES.

Theūprōsōpon (Θεοῦ Πρόσωπον, i.e. the face of a god: Ras-esh-Shukeh), a lofty, rugged promontory on the coast of Phoenice, between Tripolis and Byblus, formed by a spur of Lebanon, and running far out to sea. Some travellers have fancied that they can trace in its side-view that resemblance to a human profile which its name implies. (Strab. 754, 755.)

Thēvestē (Θεουέστη: Tebessa, Ru.), a considerable city of N. Africa, on the frontier of Numidia and Byzacena, at the centre of several roads, and the station of a legion from the time of Augustus. It was of comparatively late origin, and a Roman colony. Among its recently discovered ruins are a fine triumphal arch, and the old walls of the city, the circuit of which was large enough to have contained 40,000 inhabitants. (Ptol. iv. 3, 30.)

Thia (Θεία), daughter of Uranus and Ge, one of the female Titans, became by Hyperion the mother of Helios, Eos, and Selene—that is, Hyperion and Thia formed the pair of divinities from whom light proceeded (Pind. Isthm. iv. 1; Hes. Th. 135, 171; Catull. lxvi. 44).

Thibron or Thimbron (Θίβρων, Θίμβρων). 1. A Lacedaemonian, sent with 3000 men, B.C. 399, to aid the Ionians against Tissaphernes. He did his work badly, and was superseded by Dercyllidas. In 392 he was sent again to oppose Struthos, but was defeated and slain (Xen. An. viii. 6, 1, Hell. iii. 1, 4, iv. 8, 17; Diod. xiv. 36). —2. An officer of Harpalus, satrap of Babylon, after whose death, in 324 (he is said by some to have murdered him), he set out on a filibustering expedition against Cyrene, but was eventually put to death by an officer of Ptolemy Lagi (Diod. xvii. 108, xviii. 19).

Thilsaphata (prob. Tell Afad, between Mosul and Sinjar), a town of Mesopotamia, near the Tigris (Amm. Marc. xxv. 8).

Thilutha (Τίλβη), a fort in the S. of Mesopotamia, on an island in the Euphrates (Amm. Marc. xxiv. 2).

Thinae or Thina (Θίναί, Θίνα), a chief city of the SINAE, and a great emporium for the silk and wool trade of the extreme E. In the Periplus it is not imagined so far to the E. as it is placed by Ptolemy. (Peripl. Mar. Erythr. p. 36; Ptol. vii. 3, 6; SINAE.)

Thinis or Thisi (Θίσις: Θινίτης), a great city of Upper Egypt, capital of the Thinites Nomos. It was the Egyptain Tini, and was situated near ABYDOS. It was one of the most ancient cities in Egypt, and the capital of the first two dynasties (B.C. 4400–4000), but its importance was merged in that of Abydos, of which it became a separate quarter.

Thiōdāmas (Θειοδάμας), father of Hylas, and king of the Dryopes (Apollod. ii. 7, 7).

Thisbē (Θίσβη), a beautiful Babylonian maiden, beloved by Pyramus. The lovers living in adjoining houses, often secretly conversed with each other through an opening in the wall, as their parents would not sanction their marriage. Once they agreed to meet at the tomb of Ninus. Thisbe arrived first, and while she was waiting for Pyramus, she perceived a lioness which had just torn to pieces an ox, and took to flight. In her haste she dropped her garment, which the lioness soiled with blood. In the mean time Pyramus arrived, and finding her garment covered with blood, he imagined that she had been murdered, and made away with himself under a mulberry tree, the fruit of which henceforth was as red as blood. Thisbe, who afterwards found the body of her lover, likewise killed herself. (Ov. Met. iv. 55–465.)

Thisbe, afterwards Thisbae (Θίσβη, Θίσβαι: Θισβαίος, Θισβεύς: Kakosia), a town of Boeotia, on the borders of Phocis, and between Mt. Helicon and the Corinthian gulf. It was famed even in the time of Homer for its wild pigeons, which are still found in abundance in the neighbourhood of Kakosia. (Il. ii. 502; Strab. p. 411; Xen. Hell. vi. 4, 3; Ov. Met. xi. 380; Stat. Theb. vii. 261.) Its ruins are chiefly of the date of Alexander.

Thisoa. [THEISOA.]

Thmūis (Θμουίς: Tmaie, Ru., near Mansourah), a city of Lower Egypt, on a canal on the E. side of the Mendesian mouth of the Nile. It was a chief seat of the worship of the god Mendes (the Egyptian Pan), under the symbol of a goat. It was the chief city of the Nomos Thmūites, which was afterwards united with the Mendesian Nomos. (Hdt. ii. 166; Ptol. iv. 5, 51.)

Thōas (Θόας). 1. Son of Andraemon and Gorge, was king of Calydon and Pleuron, in Aetolia, and sailed with forty ships against Troy (Il. ii. 638, iv. 529, xv. 281; Paus. v. 3, 5). —2. Son of Dionysus and Ariadne, was king of Lemnos, and married to Myrina, by whom he became the father of Hypsipyle and Sicinus (Il. xiv. 230; Diod. v. 79). When the Lemnian women killed all the men in the island, Hypsipyle saved her father, Thoas, and concealed him. Afterwards, however, he was discovered by the other women, and killed; or, according to other accounts, he escaped to Taurus, or to the island of Oenoë near Euboea, which was henceforth called Sicinus. The patronymic Thoantias is given to Hypsipyle, as the daughter of Thoas. (Apollod. i. 9, 17, iii. 6, 4). —3. Son of Borysthenes, and king of Tauris, into whose dominions Iphigenia was carried by Artemis, when she was to have been sacrificed (Ant. Lib. 27; Eur. Iphig. in Taur.). —4. An Aetolian who was praetor of the League in B.C. 193, and urged the war against the Romans. After the defeat of Antiochus, the Romans made the surrender of Thoas a condition of peace, but set him at liberty. In 169 he was killed in a popular tumult. (Liv. xxxv. 37–45, xxxviii. 38; Pol. xxviii. 4.)

Thomas Magister, a rhetorician and grammarian, about A.D. 1310. He was a native of Thessalonica, and lived at the court of the emperor Andronicus Palaeologus I., where he held the offices of marshal (Magister Officiorum) and keeper of the archives (Chartophylax); but he afterwards retired to a monastery, where he assumed the name of Theodulus, and devoted himself to the study of the ancient Greek authors. His chief work, which has come down to us, is a Lexicon of Attic Words (Κατὰ ἀλφάβητον ὀνομάτων Ἀττικῶν ἐκλογαί), compiled from the works of the elder grammarians, such as Phrynichus, Ammonius, Herodian, and Moeris.—Edited by Ritschl, Halis Sax. 1831.

Thōricus (Θόρικος or Θορικός: Θορίκιος, Θορικεύς: Theriko), one of the twelve ancient towns in Attica, and subsequently a demus belonging to the tribe Acamantis, was situated on the SE. coast a little above Sunium, and was fortified by the Athenians towards the close of the Peloponnesian war (Strab. p. 397; Xen. Hell. i. 2, 1). It was from Thoricus that Eos caught up Cephalus (Apollod. ii. 4, 7), with which some suppose the idea of Soph. O. C. 1595 to be associated. There are important remains, especially of the theatre.

Thornax (Θόρναξ: Pavlaika), a mountain in Laconica, NE. of Sparta, on which stood a celebrated temple of Apollo (Paus. ii. 36, 1).

Thospites Lacus (Θωσπίτις λίμνη: Vangol), a lake in Armenia Major, through which the Tigris flows. The lake, and the surrounding district, also called Thospitis, were both named from a city Thospia (Θωσπία) at the N. end of the lake (Ptol. v. 13, 18).

Thraciā (Θράκη, Ion. Θρήκη, Θρηκή: Ὀράξ, pl. Ὀράκες, Ion. Θρήξ and Θρηξίς, pl. Ὀρήκες, Ὀρήκες: Thrax, pl. Thraces), was in earlier times the name of the vast space of country bounded on the N. by the Danube, on the S. by the Propontis and the Aegæan, on the E. by the Pontus Euxinus, and on the W. by the river Strymon and the easternmost of the Illyrian tribes. It was divided into two parts by Mt. Haemus (the Balkan), running from W. to E., and separating the plain of the lower Danube from the rivers which fall into the Aegæan. Two extensive mountain ranges branch off from the S. side of Mt. Haemus; one running SE. towards Constantinople; and the other, called Rhodope, E. of the preceding one, and also running in a south-easterly direction near the river Nestus. Between these two ranges there are many plains, which are drained by the Hebrus, the largest river in Thrace. At a later time the name Thrace was applied to a more limited extent of country. The district between the Strymon and the Nestus was added to Macedonia by Philip, and was usually called Macedonia Adjuncta. [MACEDONIA.] Under Augustus the part of the country N. of the Haemus was made a separate Roman province under the name of Moesia [MOESIA]; but the district between the Strymon and the Nestus had been previously restored to Thrace by the Romans. The Roman province of Thrace was accordingly bounded on the W. by the river Nestus, which separated it from Macedonia; on the N. by Mt. Haemus, which divided it from Moesia; on the E. by the Euxine, and on the S. by the Propontis and Aegean.—Thrace, in its widest extent, was peopled in the times of Herodotus and Thucydides by a vast number of different tribes; but their customs and characters were marked by great uniformity. Herodotus says that, next to the Indians, the Thracians were the most numerous of all races, and if united under one head would have been irresistible. He describes them as a savage, cruel, and rapacious people, delighting in blood, but brave and warlike. According to his account, which is confirmed by other writers, the Thracian chiefs sold their children for exportation to foreign merchants; they purchased their wives; they punctured or tattooed their bodies and those of the women belonging to them, as a sign of noble birth; they despised agriculture, and considered it most honourable to live by war and robbery. (Hdt. v. 3-6; cf. Strab. pp. 315-318; Liv. xxvi. 25; Tac. Ann. ii. 64; Thuc. vii. 27.) Deep drinking prevailed among them extensively, and their quarrels over their wine cups were notorious even in the time of Augustus (Hor. Od. i. 27). They worshipped deities whom the Greeks identified with Ares, Dionysus, and Artemis: the great sanctuary and oracle of their god Dionysus was in one of the loftiest summits of Mt. Rhodope. [DIONYSUS.] The tribes on the S. coast attained to some degree of civilisation, owing to the numerous Greek colonies which were founded in their vicinity; but the tribes in the interior seem to have retained their savage habits, with little mitigation, down to the time of the Roman empire. There is a remarkable difference in the account of the Thracians derived from the poems of Homer and from early traditions. They are a civilised people, with finely wrought armour, cultivators of the vine (Il. vi. 132, x. 436, xxiii. 560), among whom were born the earliest Greek poets, Orpheus, Linus and Musaeus. Eumolpus, likewise who founded the Eleusinian mysteries in Attica, is said to have been a Thracian, and to have fought against Erechtheus, king of Athens.

It may be, as some hold, that this was really a case of civilisation receding and that the older Thracians gained from the Phoenicians arts and culture which they afterwards lost; but it is not an impossible explanation that the Homeric idea of Thracians was derived from the Asiatic branch, who were identified with the skilful and musical Phrygians. [For the Thracian emigration into Asia see PHRYGIA.] But if without refinements of civilisation, their history shows them to have been a brave and spirited people, with a remarkable strain of religious enthusiasm.—The principal Greek colonies along the coast, beginning at the Strymon and going eastwards, were: AMPHIPOLIS, at the mouth of the Strymon; ABDERA, a little to the W. of the Nestus; DICAËA or Dicaeopolis, a settlement of Maronea; MARONEA itself, colonised by the Chians; STRYME, a colony of the Thasians; MESEMBRIA, founded by the Samothracians; and AENOS, a Lesbian colony at the mouth of the Hebrus. The Thracian Chersonesus was probably colonised by the Greeks at an early period, but it did not contain any important Greek settlement till the migration of the first Mitiades to the country, during the reign of Pisistratus at Athens. [CHERSONESUS.] On the Propontis the two chief Greek settlements were those of PERINTHUS and SELYMBRIA; and on the Thracian Bosphorus was the important town of BYZANTIUM. There were only a few Greek settlements on the SW. coast of the Euxine; the most important were those of APOLLONIA, ODESSUS, CALLATIS, TOMI, renowned as the place of Ovid's banishment, and ISTRIA, near the S. mouth of the Danube.—The Thracians are said to have been conquered by Sesostris, king of Egypt, but that is a pure fiction [SESOSTRIS], nor can much faith be placed in the account of their conquest by Teucrians and Mysians (Hdt. vii. 20). The first really historical fact respecting them (apart from the foundations of colonies in Thrace mentioned above) is their subjugation by Megabazus, the general of Darius (Hdt. v. 1-10). After the Persians had been driven out of Europe by the Greeks, the Thracians recovered their independence; and at the beginning of the Peloponnesian war, almost all the Thracian tribes were united under the dominion of Sitalces, king of the Odrysae, whose kingdom extended from Abdera to the Euxine and the mouth of the Danube. In the third year of the Peloponnesian war (B.C. 429), Sitalces, who had entered into an alliance with the Athenians, invaded Macedonia with a vast army of 150,000 men, but was compelled by the failure of provisions to return home, after remaining in Macedonia thirty days (Thuc. ii. 29, 95). Sitalces fell in battle against the Triballi in 424, and was succeeded by his nephew, Seuthes, who during a long reign raised his kingdom to a height of power and prosperity which it had never previously attained, so that his regular revenues amounted to the annual sum of 400 talents, in addition to contributions of gold and silver in the form of presents, to a nearly equal amount. After the death of Seuthes, which appears to have happened a little before the close of the Peloponnesian war, we find his powerful kingdom split up into different parts; and when Xenophon, with the remains of the 10,000 Greeks, arrived on the opposite coast of Asia, another Seuthes applied to him for assistance to reinstate him in his dominions (Xen. An. vii.). Philip, the father of Alexander the Great, reduced the greater part of Thrace; and after the death of Alexander the country fell to the share of Lysimachus. It subsequently formed a part of the Macedonian dominions, but it continued to be governed by its native princes, and was only nominally subject to the Macedonian monarchs. Even under the Romans Thrace was for a long time governed by its own chiefs. At the time of the Moesian campaign (B.C. 29) the Thracian Odrysae were involved in a religious war with the Bessi for possession of the shrine of Dionysus and its sacred grove. Crassus conferred the custody upon the Odrysae, to whose princes he left the rule over all the Thracian tribes S. of the Haemus as vassal kings under the suzerainty of Rome. The position of the vassal king Rhoemetalses and his descendants, who from the latter part of Augustus's reign till the time of Claudius held this power, has been compared, not inaptly, to that of the Herods in Palestine. There were interruptions to this arrangement: in B.C. 11 Piso had, not without difficulty, to repress disturbances. COTYS reigned after the death of Rhoemetalses, but was murdered by his uncle, Rhascuporis, who had previously ruled part of Thrace. The Romans interfered, Rhascuporis was put to death, and Tiberius appointed a guardian of the young Rhoemetalses, son of Rhascuporis (19 A.D.). Not long after, when the Thracians resisted conscription, he placed the control practically in the hands of this guardian. Caligula restored the principality to Rhoemetalses II.; but in A.D. 46 Claudius constituted Thrace a province under a procurator. Trajan raised it to a higher rank as a province under a legatus Augusti pro praetore.

P. Thrāsēa Paetus, a distinguished Roman senator and Stoic philosopher, in the reign of Nero, was a native of Patavium, and was probably born soon after the death of Augustus. He appears at an early period of his life to have made the younger Cato his model, of whose life he wrote an account. He married Arria, the daughter of the heroic Arria, who showed her husband Caecina how to die; and his wife was worthy of her mother and her husband. At a later period he gave his own daughter in marriage to Helvidius Priscus, who trod closely in the footsteps of his father-in-law. Thrasea and Helvidius showed their spirit of conservative republicanism by a custom of celebrating the birthdays of Brutus and Cassius; Thrasea would not attend the Neronian games or the funeral of Poppaea, nor would he sacrifice to the Genius of the emperor. This roused the jealousy of Nero, and Thrasea was condemned to death by the senate by command of the emperor, A.D. 66. By his execution and that of his friend Barea Soranus, Nero, says Tacitus, resolved to murder Virtue herself. The panegyric of Thrasea was written by Arulenus Rusticus, who was in consequence put to death by Domitian. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 49, xiv. 12, 48, xv. 20-22, xvi. 21-35, Hist. ii. 91, iv. 5, Agr. 2; Dio Cass. lxi. 15, lxii. 26; Juv. v. 36; Mart. i. 9.)

Thrāsýbūlus (Θρασύβουλος). 1. Tyrant of Miletus, was a contemporary of Periander and Alyattes, the king of Lydia (Hdt. i. 22, vi. 92; Ar. Pol. iii. 13, v. 10). The story of the mode in which Thrasybulus gave his advice to Periander as to the best means of securing his power is given under PERIANDER.—2. A celebrated Athenian, son of Lycus. He was zealously attached to the Athenian democracy, and took an active part in overthrowing the oligarchical government of the 400 in B.C. 411

(Thuc. viii. 73). He was appointed as one of the generals at Samos, when those who favoured the oligarchy were deposed, and from this time he took a prominent part in the conduct of the war, especially at the battle of Cyzicus, B.C. 410 (Thuc. viii. 75-105; Xen. Hell. i. 1, 12). On the establishment of the Thirty at Athens he was banished, and was living in exile at Thebes when the rulers of Athens were perpetrating their excesses of tyranny. Being aided by the Thebans with arms and money, he collected a small band, crossed the frontier, and seized the deserted fortress of Phyle. He repelled the troops sent against him from Athens, and, taking the offensive, marched upon the Peiraeus, which fell into his hands. From this place he carried on war for several months against the Ten, who had succeeded to the government, and eventually, upon the intervention of Pausanias, the democracy was restored in the autumn of 403 B.C. In 390 Thrasybulus commanded the Athenian fleet in the Aegean, and was slain by the inhabitants of Aspendus, upon whom he was levying a forced contribution. (Diod. xiv. 94, 99; Xen. Hell. iv. 8, 25; Dem. Lept. p. 475.)—3. Brother of Gelo and Hiero, tyrants of Syracuse. He succeeded Hiero in the government, B.C. 467, and was soon afterwards expelled by the Syracusans, whom he had provoked by his rapacity and cruelty. He withdrew to Locri, in Italy, and there ended his days. (Diod. xi. 67.)

Thrāsýdaeus (Θρασύδαίος), tyrant of Agrigentum, was the son and successor of Theron, B.C. 472. Shortly after his accession he was defeated by Hiero of Syracuse; and the Agrigentines took advantage of this disaster to expel him from their city. He escaped to Greece, but was arrested at Megara, and executed. (Diod. xi. 53.)

Thrāsýllus or Thrasylus (Θρασύλλος, Θράσυλος). 1. An Athenian, who actively assisted Thrasybulus in opposing the oligarchical revolution in B.C. 411, and, like him, was appointed as one of the generals at Samos. [THRASYBULUS.] He was one of the commanders at the battle of Arginusae, and was among the six generals who returned to Athens and were put to death, 406. [ARGINUSAE.]—2. An astrologer at Rhodes, with whom Tiberius became acquainted during his residence in that island, and whom he ever after held in the highest honour. In the scenes between him and the emperor, as described by Tacitus, Suetonius, and Dio, Thrasyllus is the prototype for Scott (in Quentin Durward) of Martius Galeotti, the astrologer of Louis XI. He confirmed the faith of Tiberius in his skill by casting his own horoscope as well as that of his master, and saying that he himself had reached a great crisis of danger, having suspected, as was the truth, that Tiberius was on the point of having him thrown over a precipice. This proof of prophetic power saved his life. He died in A.D. 36, the year before Tiberius, and is said to have saved the lives of many persons whom Tiberius would otherwise have put to death, by falsely predicting for this very purpose that the emperor would live a certain period longer than his intended victims. The son of this Thrasyllus succeeded to his father's skill, and he is said to have predicted the empire to Nero. (Tac. Ann. vi. 20-22; Suet. Aug. 98, Tib. 14, 62, Cal. 19; Dio Cass. lv. 11, lvii. 15, lviii. 27.)

Thrāsýmāchus (Θρασύμαχος), a native of Chalcedon, was a sophist, and one of the earliest cultivators of the art of rhetoric. He was a contemporary of Gorgias. He is introduced by Plato as one of the interlocutors in the Republic, and is referred to several times in the Phaedrus (cf. Cic. Orat. 12, 52, de Orat. iii. 82, 128; Quint. iii. 1, 10; Athen. p. 416).

Thrāsŷmēdēs (Θρασυμήδης). 1. Son of the Pylian Nestor and Anaxibia, accompanied his father on the expedition against Troy, and returned with him to Pylos (Il. ix. 81, xvii. 378, 705; Od. iii. 442; Paus. ii. 18, 7).—2. A sculptor of Paros, contemporary with Phidias, whose assistant he seems to have been. He was author of the statue of Asclepius at Epidaurus (Paus. ii. 27, 2).

Thrāsŷmēnus. [THRASIMENUS.]

Thrōnium (Θρόνιον: Θρόνιος, Θρονιεύς), the chief town of the Locri Epicnemidii, on the river Boagrius, at a short distance from the sea, with a harbour upon the coast (Il. ii. 533; Thuc. ii. 26; Strab. p. 436). It was destroyed by Onomarchus in the Sacred war, and its inhabitants were sold into slavery. Its ruins (called Palaeocastro) are at the modern Pik-raki.

Thūcŷdīdēs (Θουκυδίδης). 1. An Athenian statesman, of the demus Alopece, son of Melesias. After the death of Cimon (with whom he was connected by marriage), in B.C. 449, Thucydides became the leader of the aristocratic party, which he concentrated and more thoroughly organised in opposition to Pericles. He was ostracised in 443, thus leaving the undisputed political ascendancy to Pericles. He left two sons, Melesias and Stephanus; and a son of the former of these, named Thucydides after his grandfather, was a pupil of Socrates. (Arist. Ἀθ. Πολ. 28; Plut. Per. 6-16; Plat. Men. p. 94; Athen. p. 234).—2. The great Athenian historian, of the demus Halimus, was the son of Olorus or Orolus and Hegesipyle. He is said to have been connected with the family of Cimon; and we know that Miltiades, the conqueror of Marathon, married Hegesipyle, the daughter of a Thracian king called Olorus, by whom she became the mother of Cimon; and it has been conjectured that the mother of Thucydides was a granddaughter of Miltiades and Hegesipyle. Others suppose that his father, Olorus, was connected with Olorus king of Thrace; but a direct Thracian descent on the father's side can hardly be possible. The fact of the relationship of the other Thucydides to Cimon may suggest the possibility of a confusion. According to a statement of Pamphila [PAMPHILA], Thucydides was forty years of age at the commencement of the Peloponnesian war, or B.C. 431, and accordingly he was born in 471. There is a story in Lucian of Herodotus having read his History at the Olympic games to the assembled Greeks; and Suidas adds that Thucydides, then a boy, was present, and shed tears of emotion: a presage of his own future historical distinction. The story as it stands is impossible, but it is quite possible that Thucydides in his youth may have heard Herodotus recite some parts of his History at Athens [see HERODOTUS, p. 410, a]. Thucydides is said to have been instructed in oratory by Antiphon, and in philosophy by Anaxagoras. He informs us (iv. 105) that he possessed gold mines in that part of Thrace which is opposite to the island of Thasos, and that he had influence in that part of Thrace. This property, according to some accounts, he had from his ancestors; according to other accounts, he married an heiress of that neighbourhood. Thucydides (ii. 48) was one of those who suffered from the great plague of Athens, and one of the few who recovered. We have no trustworthy evidence of Thucydides having distinguished himself as an orator, though it is not unlikely that he did, for his oratorical talent is shown by the speeches that he has inserted in his History. He was, however, employed in a military capacity, and he was in command of an Athenian squadron of seven ships, at Thasos, B.C. 424, when Eucles, who commanded in Amphipolis, sent for his assistance against Brasidas. That general, fearing the arrival of a superior force, offered favourable terms to Amphipolis, which were readily accepted. Thucydides arrived at Eion, at the mouth of the Strymon, on the evening of the same day on which Amphipolis surrendered; and though he was too late to save Amphipolis, he prevented Eion from falling into the hands of the enemy. In consequence of this failure, Thucydides became an exile, probably to avoid a severer punishment; for Cleon, who was at this time in great favour with the Athenians, appears to have excited popular suspicion against him. His own words certainly imply that, during his exile, he spent much of his time either in the Peloponnesus or in places which were under Peloponnesian influence (v. 26), and his work was the result of his own experience and observations. His minute description of Syracuse and the neighbourhood leads to the probable conclusion that he was personally acquainted with the localities: and if he visited Sicily, it is probable that he also saw some parts of southern Italy. Thucydides says that he lived twenty years in exile (v. 26), and as his exile began in 423, he may have returned to Athens in 403, about the time when Thrasybulus liberated Athens. Thucydides is said to have been assassinated at Athens soon after his return; but other accounts say that he was killed by a robber in Thrace. The time of his death is quite uncertain. In iii. 116 he mentions eruptions of Aetna, but does not know of the eruption of B.C. 396 (Diod. xiv. 59). It is therefore probable that he died before that year, though possible that he lived on without revising the passage in question. The time when he composed his work has been a matter of dispute. He informs us himself that he was busy in collecting materials all through the war from the beginning to the end (i. 22), and of course he would register them as he got them. Plutarch says that he wrote the work in Thrace; but the work in the shape in which we have it was certainly not finished until after the close of the war, and he was probably engaged upon it at the time of his death. A needless question has been raised as to the authorship of the eighth and last book of Thucydides, which breaks off in the middle of the twenty-first year of the war (411). It differs from all the other books in containing no speeches, and was less systematically composed. Accordingly, several ancient critics supposed that the eighth book was not by Thucydides: some attributed it to his daughter, and some to Xenophon or Theopompus, because both of them continued the history. This is an absurd story, not merely because nothing can be less like the style of Xenophon and of Theopompus. It may be regarded as certain that Thucydides wrote the book, and the differences alluded to (the differences of style are imaginary) are accounted for by the fact that it was an unfinished work, in which he would probably have inserted speeches.—The work of

Thucydides, from the commencement of the second book, is chronologically divided into winters and summers, and each summer and winter make a year (ii. 1). His summer comprises the time from the vernal to the autumnal equinox, and the winter comprises the period from the autumnal to the vernal equinox. The division into books and chapters was probably made by the Alexandrine critics. The history of the Peloponnesian war opens the second book of Thucydides, and the first is introductory to the history. He begins his first book by observing that the Peloponnesian war was the most important event in Grecian history, which he shows by a rapid review of the history of the Greeks from the earliest period to the commencement of the war (i. 1-21). After his introductory chapters he proceeds to explain the alleged grounds and causes of the war: the real cause was, he says, the Spartan jealousy of the Athenian power. His narrative is interrupted (c. 89-118), after he has come to the time when the Lacedaemonians resolved on war, by a digression on the rise and progress of the power of Athens; a period which had been either omitted by other writers, or treated imperfectly, and with little regard to chronology, as by Hellanicus in his Attic History (c. 97). He resumes his narrative (c. 119) with the negotiations that preceded the war; but this leads to another digression of some length on the treason of Pausanias (c. 128-134), and the exile of Themistocles (c. 135-138). He concludes the book with the speech of Pericles, who advised the Athenians to refuse the demands of the Peloponnesians; and his subject, as already observed, begins with the second book.—The work of Thucydides shows the most scrupulous care and diligence in ascertaining facts; his strict attention to chronology, and the importance that he attaches to it, are additional proof of his historical accuracy. His narrative is brief and concise to a degree which makes the thought, or the crowd of thoughts, concentrated in a short and involved sentence often hard to understand; it generally contains bare facts expressed in the fewest possible words, but this stern and apparently passionless brevity is able to produce a pathos unsurpassed by any prose writer. This is seen most notably in his account of the Athenian catastrophe at Syracuse. Few could read it (and there are other passages almost as moving in the history) without agreeing with the opinion of Gray and Macaulay (both masters of style, especially the former), that nothing finer has been written in prose. But it is still more important to notice that Thucydides is the founder of philosophical history. He first showed that a great historian should not merely narrate events accurately, should not even content himself with a critical examination of his authorities, but should also try to trace the causes of events, and their consequences, their teaching in politics, and the light which they throw upon character. Many of his speeches are political essays, or materials for them; they are not mere imaginations of his own for rhetorical effect; they contain in many cases the general sense of what was actually delivered as nearly as he could ascertain, and in many instances he had good opportunities of knowing what was said, for he heard some speeches delivered (i. 22); but they are employed to show the motives and sentiments of the speakers and of their partisans or countrymen.—Editions of Thucydides by Poppe, Leips. 1821, Thulē (Θούλη), an island in the N. part of the German Ocean, regarded by the ancients as the most northerly point in the whole earth. It is first mentioned by Pytheas, the celebrated Greek navigator of Massilia, who undertook a voyage to Britain, of which he gave a description in his work on the Ocean. [PYTHEAS.] It is not definitely stated by those who mention Pytheas's account, whether he claimed to have actually visited the island, or whether he only derived his information from those whom he met in Britain. (Strab. pp. 63, 104, 114, 201; Plin. ii. 187.) According to Pytheas, as cited by these writers, Thule was a six days' sail from Britain, and the day and night there were each six months long, i.e. the solstitial day was twenty-four hours long. He further stated that in Thule and those distant parts the air was heavy and the sea thick and gelatinous, impenetrable to rowing. The astronomical observation, which is accepted as true by Hipparchus, Eratosthenes, Mela and Pliny (Strab. l.c.; Plin. iv. 104; Mel. iii. 6), implies that Thule lay within the Arctic circle. It is tolerably certain that Pytheas did not sail so far north; but if he took his account from others he may very well have heard of the very much greater length of the day in summer and its shortness in winter—tales even may have reached him from places as far north as the North Cape. The thickened sea is possibly a confused account of a frozen ocean in the north, but may only be based on some stories of banks of sea-weed. It is curious that when Agricola's expedition came in sight of the Shetlands, which they took to be Thule, they imagined the conventional thickness of the water (Tac. Agr. 10). On the whole it is useless to speculate whether Pytheas's account referred to the Shetlands, Iceland, or Norway. It is pretty clear that Ptolemy (ii. 6, 32) placed Thule at the Shetlands; and in literature Thule was universally accepted as the most distant and most northerly part of the world (Verg. Georg. i. 30).

Thuria (Θουρία), a town of Messenia on the river Aris, ten miles from Pharae (Paus. iv. 31, 1; Thuc. i. 101; Pol. xv. 1). Its ruins are near the modern Veisaga, six miles from Kalamata.

Thūrii, more rarely Thūriūm (Θούριοι, Θούριον; Θούριος, Θουριεύς, Thurius, Thurinus; Terra Nuova), a Greek city in Lucania, founded B.C. 443, near the site of the ancient Sybaris, which had been destroyed more than sixty years before. [SYBARIS.] It was built by the remains of the population of Sybaris, who had failed in their first attempt of 452, and in their successful enterprise were assisted by colonists from all parts of Greece, but especially from Athens. Among these colonists were the historian Herodotus and the orator Lysias, the latter of whom, however, was only a youth at the time, and subsequently returned to Athens. (Diod. xii. 10; Strab. p. 263; Plut. Per. 11.) The new city, from which the remains of the Sybarites were soon expelled, rapidly attained great power and prosperity, and became one of the most important Greek towns in the S. of Italy. Thus we are told that the Thurians were able to bring 14,000 foot soldiers and 1000 horse into the field against the Lucanians (Diod. xiv. 101). In the Samnite wars Thurii received a Roman garrison; but it revolted to Hannibal in the second Punic war. The Carthaginian general, however, at a later time, not trusting the Thuriens, plundered the town, and removed 3500 of its inhabitants to Croton (App. Ann. 57). The Romans subsequently sent a Latin colony to Thurii, and changed its name into Copiae; but it continued to retain its original name, under which it is mentioned by Caesar in the Civil war as a municipium. (Liv. xxxiv. 53; Strab. p. 263; Caes. B. C. iii. 21.)

Thyāmis (Θυάμις: Kalama), a river in Epirus, flowing into the sea near a promontory of the same name (Thuc. i. 46; Strab. p. 324).

Thyādes. [THYIA.]

Thyāmus (Θυάμος: Pietala), a mountain in Acarnania, south of Argos Amphilochicum (Thuc. iii. 106).

Thyatīra (τὰ Θυάτειρα: Ak-hissar), a city in the N. of Lydia, on the river Lycus. It was formerly called Pelopeia, and received its new name in the Macedonian period. (Strab. p. 646; Steph. Byz. s. v.; Liv. xxxvii. 44.)

Thyestes (Θυέστης), son of Pelops and Hippodamia, was the brother of Atreus and the father of Aegisthus. See ATREUS and AEGISTHUS.

Thyia (Θυία), a daughter of Castalius or Cephisus, became by Apollo the mother of Delphus. She is said to have been the first to sacrifice to Dionysus, and to have celebrated orgies in his honour. (Hdt. vii. 178; Paus. x. 6, 2.) It was believed that from her the Attic women, who went yearly to Mt. Parnassus to celebrate the Dionysiac orgies with the Delphian Thyiades, received themselves the name of Thyiādes or Thyādes. There is little doubt that her story was simply an attempt to explain this name, which is probably connected with θύω and has the same meaning as Maenades.

Thyillus (Θύλλος), a Greek poet, living at Rome about B.C. 67, and a friend of Cicero. He seems to have been engaged on a poem about the Eleusinian rites (Cic. ad Att. i. 9, 12, 16). Some editions write his name Chilius.

Thymbra (Θύμβρη), a city of the Troad, N. of Ilium Vetus, on a hill by the side of the river Thymbrius, with a celebrated temple of Apollo, who derived from this place the epithet Thymbraeus (Il. x. 430, xx. 53, 151; Strab. p. 598; cf. [Eur.] Rhes. 224).

Thymbria (Θυμβρία), a place in Caria, on the Maeander, four stadia E. of Myus, with a Charonium—that is, a cave containing mephitic vapour (Strab. p. 636).

Thymbrium (Θύμβριον: Thymbriāni), a small town of Phrygia, a little S. of Philomelium, on the road to Iconium, with the so-called Fountain of Midas (Xen. Anab. i. 2). It was re-founded as Hadrianopolis. Its site is near the modern Daghan Hissar.

Thymbrius (Θύμβριος: Thimbrek), a river of the Troad, falling into the Scamander. At the present day, it flows direct into the Hellespont; and, on this and other grounds, some doubt whether the Thimbrek is the ancient river.

Thymēlē, an actress in the reign of Domitian (Juv. i. 35, viii. 197).

Thymoetes (Θυμοίτης), one of the elders of Troy. A soothsayer had predicted that on a certain day a boy should be born, by whom Troy should be destroyed. On that day Paris was born to Priam, and Munippus to Thymoetes. Priam ordered Munippus and his mother Cylla to be killed (Il. iii. 146). Hence Virgil (Aen. ii. 31) represents Aeneas saying that it was doubtful whether Thymoetes advised the Trojans to draw the wooden horse into the city in order to revenge himself.

Thyni (Θυνί), a Thracian people, whose original abodes were near Salmydessus, but who afterwards passed over into BITHYNIA.

Thynia (Θυνία). 1. The land of the Thyni in Thrace.—2. Another name for BITHYNIA.—3. [THYNIA.]

Thynias or Thynia (Θυνίας, Θυνία). 1. (In-ada), a promontory on the coast of Thrace, NW. of Salmydessus, with a town of the same name (Strab. p. 319).—2. (Kirpe), a small islet of the Euxine, on the coast of Bithynia, near the Prom. Calpe, also called Apollonia and Daphnusa (Ap. Rh. ii. 177).

Thyōnē. [DIONYSUS, p. 294, b; SEMELE.]

Thyreā (Θυρέα), the chief town in Cynuria, the district on the borders of Laconia and Argolis, was situated upon a height 2000 feet above the sea-level, on the bay of the sea called Sinus Thyreates (Θυρεάτης κόλπος). It was for the possession of Thyrea that the celebrated battle was fought between the 300 Spartans and 300 Argives. The territory of Thyrea was called Thyreātis (Θυρεάτης). (Strab. p. 376; Hdt. i. 82; Thuc. v. 41; Ov. Fast. ii. 663; OTHRYADES.) Its ruins, known as Helleniko or Tichio, show the position of the walls and towers.

Thyrēum or Thyrrhēum (Θύρειον, Θύρρειον: Vasilios), a town in N. Acarnania, between Anactorium and Limnaea, close to the Sinus Ambracius (Pol. iv. 25; Cic. ad Fam. xvi. 5).

Thysdrus, Tisdrus, or Tusdrus (Θυσδρός: El-Jemm, Ru.), a large fortified city of Byzacena, NW. of the promontory Brachodes (Ras Kapoudiah). Under the Romans it was a free city. It was here that the emperor Gordian assumed the purple. (Ptol. iv. 3, 39; Herodian, vii. 4.)

Thyssagētae (Θυσσαγέται), a people of Sarmatia Asiatica, on the E. shores of the Palus Maeotis (Hdt. iv. 22; Mel. i. 19).

Thyssus (Θύσσοις or Θυσσός), a town of Macedonia on the peninsula of Acte (Hdt. vii. 22; Thuc. iv. 109; Strab. p. 331).

Tiarantus, a river of Scythia and a tributary of the Danube (Hdt. iv. 48).

Tibarēni, or Tibāri (Τιβάρηνοί, Τίβαροι), a quiet agricultural people on the N. coast of Pontus, E. of the river Iris (Hdt. iii. 94; Xen. An. v. 5, 2; Strab. p. 527).

Tibērias. 1. (Τιβεριάς: Tiberiūs), a city of Galilee, on the SW. shore of the Lake of Tiberias, built by Herod Antipas in honour of the emperor Tiberius. After the destruction of Jerusalem, it became the seat of the Jewish Sanhedrim. Near it were the warm baths of Emmaus. (Ptol. viii. 20, 16; Jos. Ant. xviii. 3, B.J. ii. 21.)—2. Gennēsāret, also the Sea of Galilee, in the O. T. Chinnereth (Bahr Tubariyeh), the second of the three lakes in Palestine, formed by the course of the Jordan. [JORDANES.] Its length is eleven or twelve geographical miles, and its breadth from five to six. It lies deep among fertile hills. Its surface is 750 feet below the level of the Mediterranean. (Paus. v. 7, 4; Ptol. v. 16, 4; Jos. B.J. iv. 26.)

Tiberinus. [TIBERIS.]

Tiberinus, the deified personification of the river Tiber, to whom various myths attached, some stories making him a king of Veii, others a king of Alba who was drowned in the Tiber, others again representing him as the son of Janus [see p. 157, b]. The river-god Tiberinus was addressed in solemn invocations (Cic. N.D. iii. 20, 52; Serv. ad Aen. i. 273), and a festival was held in his honour on the Island of the Tiber, where he seems to have had a shrine. In his worship he was connected, or perhaps sometimes identified, with Portunus.

Tiberiopólis (Τιβεριούπολις: near the modern Amed.), a city of Great Phrygia, near Eumenia, where a worship of Tiberius and Livia was established (Ptol. v. 2, 25).

Tiberis also Tibris, Tybris, Thybris, Amnis Tiberinus or simply Tiberinus (Tiber or Tevere), the chief river in central Italy, on which stood the city of Rome. It is said to have been originally called Albula, and to have received the name of Tiberis in consequence of Tiberinus, king of Alba, having been drowned in it. It has been supposed that Albula was the Latin and Tiberis the Etruscan name of the river. The Tiber rises from two springs of limpid water in the Apennines, near Tifernum, and flows in a south-westerly direction, separating Etruria from Umbria, the land of the Sabines, and Latium. After flowing about 110 miles it receives the Nar (Nera), and from its confluence with this river its regular navigation begins. Three miles above Rome, at the distance of nearly seventy miles from the Nar, it receives the Anio (Teverone), and from this point becomes a river of considerable importance. Within the walls of Rome, the Tiber is about 300 feet wide and from twelve to eighteen feet deep. After heavy rains the river in ancient times, as at the present day, frequently overflowed its banks, and did considerable mischief to the lower parts of the city. (Liv. xxiv. 9, xxx. 38, xxxv. 9, 21, xxxviii. 28; Dio Cass. xxxix. 61, liii. 20; cf. Cic. ad Q. Fr. iii. 7; Hor. Od. i. 2, 13.) To guard against these dangers Augustus instituted the Curatores alvei Tiberis (Suet. Aug. 37). At Rome the maritime navigation of the river begins; and at eighteen miles from the city, and about four miles from the coast, it divides into two arms, forming an island, which was sacred to Venus and called Insula Sacra (Isola Sagra). The left branch of the river runs into the sea by Ostia, which was the ancient harbour of Rome; but in consequence of the accumulation of sand at the mouth of the left branch, the right branch was widened by Trajan, and was made the regular harbour of the city under the name of Portus Romanus, Portus Augusti, or simply Portus. [OSTIA.] The whole length of the Tiber, with its windings, is about 200 miles. The waters of the river are muddy and yellowish, whence it is frequently called by the Roman poets flavus Tiberis. The poets also give it the epithets of Tyrrhenus, because it flowed past Etruria during the whole of its course, and of Lydius, because the Etruscans are said to have been of Lydian origin.

Tiberius. 1. Emperor of Rome, A.D. 14-37. His full name was Tiberius Claudius Nero Caesar. He was the son of T. Claudius Nero and of Livia, and was born on the 16th of November, B.C. 42, before his mother married Augustus. Tiberius was tall and strongly made, and his health was very good. His face was handsome, and his eyes were large. He was carefully educated, and became well acquainted with Greek and Latin literature. His master in rhetoric was Theodorus of Gadara. Though not without military courage, as his life shows, he had a great timidity of character, and was of a jealous and suspicious temper; and these qualities rendered him cruel after he had acquired power. There can be little doubt that his morose reserve and his dissimulation had been increased, if not created, by his relations to Augustus. As emperor the difficulties of his position, and the influence of Livia and still more of Sejanus, increased his tendency to jealousy and suspicion of all who seemed rivals or dangerous from their popularity. The system of espionage and delation once begun could only increase with each act of tyranny and cruelty till his rule became a veritable reign of terror. Yet in reading his history, especially the tales of his monstrous and incredible licentiousness it must be recollected that Tacitus and Suetonius both wrote with a strong bias against him and his rule, and were ready to accept as true the worst scandals which were handed down. If Velleius was prejudiced in the other direction it is at least right to adopt some part of his less unfavourable portrait and to imagine that the old age of Tiberius was not so absolutely contradictory of his youth as it is sometimes made to appear. The cruelty of his rule applied only to Rome. The testimony of Josephus and Philo shows that his provincial government was just and lenient.—In B.C. 11, Augustus compelled Tiberius, much against his will, to divorce his wife Vipsania Agrippina, and to marry Julia, the widow of Agrippa, and the emperor's daughter, with whom Tiberius, however, did not long live in harmony. Tiberius was thus brought into still closer contact with the imperial family; but as C. and L. Caesar, the grandsons of Augustus, were still living, the prospect of Tiberius succeeding to the imperial power seemed very remote. He was employed on various military services. In 20 he was sent by Augustus to restore Tigranes to the throne of Armenia. It was during this campaign that Horace addressed one of his Epistles to Julius Florus (i. 12), who was serving under Tiberius. In 15, Drusus and his brother Tiberius were engaged in warfare with the Raeti, and the exploits of the two brothers were sung by Horace (Od. iv. 4, 14). [RAETIA.] In 13, Tiberius was consul with P. Quintilius Varus. In 11, while his brother, Drusus, was fighting against the Germans, Tiberius conducted the war against the Dalmatians and against the Pannonians. Drusus died in 9, owing to a fall from his horse. On the news of the accident, Tiberius was sent by Augustus to Drusus, whom he found just alive. Tiberius returned to the war in Germany, and crossed the Rhine. In 7 he was consul a second time. In 6 he obtained the tribunitia potestas for five years, but during this year he retired with the emperor's permission to Rhodes, where he spent the next seven years. Tacitus says that his chief reason for leaving Rome was to get away from his wife, who treated him with contempt, and whose licentious life was no secret to her husband; probably, too, he was unwilling to stay at Rome when the grandsons of Augustus were attaining years of maturity, for there was mutual jealousy between them and Tiberius. He returned to Rome A.D. 2. He was relieved from one trouble during his absence, for his wife, Julia, was banished to the island of Pandataria (B.C. 2), and he never saw her again. After the deaths of L. Caesar (A.D. 2) and C. Caesar (A.D. 4), Augustus adopted Tiberius, with the view of leaving to him the imperial power; and at the same time he required Tiberius to adopt Germanicus, the son of his brother Drusus, though Tiberius had a son Drusus by his wife Vipsania. From the year of his adoption to the death of Augustus, Tiberius was in command of the Roman armies, though he visited Rome several times. He was sent into Germany A.D. 4. He reduced all Illyricum to subjection A.D. 9; and in A.D. 12 he had the honour of a triumph at Rome for his German and Dalmatian victories. On the death of Augustus at Nola, on the 19th of August, A.D. 14, Tiberius, who was on his way to Illyricum, was immediately summoned home by his mother, Livia. He took the imperial power without any opposition, affecting all the while a great reluctance. He began his reign by putting to death Postumus Agrippa, the surviving grandson of Augustus, and he alleged that it was done pursuant to the command of the late emperor. When he felt himself sure in his place, he began to strengthen the principate. He took from the popular assembly the election of the magistrates, and transferred it to the senate. The news of the death of Augustus roused a mutiny among the legions in Pannonia, which was quelled by Drusus, the son of Tiberius. The armies on the Rhine under Germanicus showed a disposition to reject Tiberius, and if Germanicus had been inclined to try the fortune of a campaign, he might have had the assistance of the German armies against his uncle. But Germanicus restored discipline to the army by his firmness, and maintained his fidelity to the new emperor. The first year of his reign was marked by the death of Julia, whom Augustus had removed from Pandataria to Rhegium. The death of Germanicus in the East, in A.D. 19, relieved Tiberius from all fear of a rival claimant to the throne; and it was believed by many that Germanicus had been poisoned by order of Tiberius. From this time Tiberius began to indulge with less restraint in his love of tyranny, and many distinguished senators were soon put to death on the charge of treason against the emperor (laesa majestas). Notwithstanding his suspicious nature, Tiberius gave his complete confidence to Sejanus, who for many years possessed the real government of the state. This ambitious man aimed at the imperial power. In 23 Drusus, the son of Tiberius, was poisoned by the contrivance of Sejanus. Three years afterwards (26) Tiberius left Rome, and withdrew into Campania. He never returned to the city. He left on the pretext of dedicating temples in Campania, but the real cause was probably his dislike to Rome, where he knew that he was unpopular; and Sejanus was only too anxious to encourage any feeling which would keep the emperor at a distance from the city. That Tiberius went because he wished to hide his licentiousness in this place of retirement may be set down as a silly invention. Rome was not a place where licentiousness was scouted. He took up his residence (27) in the island of Capreae, at a short distance from the Campanian coast. The death of Livia (29), the emperor's mother, released Tiberius from one cause of anxiety. He had long been tired of her, because she wished to exercise authority, and one object in leaving Rome was to be out of her way. Livia's death gave Sejanus and Tiberius free scope, for Tiberius never entirely released himself from a kind of subjection to his mother, and Sejanus did not venture to attempt the overthrow of Livia's influence. The destruction of Agrippina and her children was now the chief purpose of Sejanus: he finally got from the tyrant (31) the reward that was his just desert, an ignominious death. [SEJANUS.] The death of Sejanus was followed by the execution of his friends; and for the remainder of the reign of Tiberius, Rome continued to be the scene of tragic occurrences. Tiberius died on the 16th of March, 37, at the villa of Lucullus, in Misenum. He was seventy-eight years of age, and had reigned twenty-two years. He was succeeded by Gaius (Caligula), the son of Germanicus, but, according to Tacitus, he had himself appointed no successor (Tac. Ann. vi. 46), though he had appointed Gaius the heir of his private property (Suet. Tib. 76) in conjunction with Tiberius Gemellus, whom Gaius afterwards put to death. On the other hand, Josephus has a story of Tiberius committing the empire to Gaius (Ant. xviii. 6, 9). Tiberius did not die a natural death. It was known that his end was rapidly approaching, and having had a fainting fit, he was supposed to be dead. Thereupon Gaius came forth and was saluted as emperor; but he was alarmed by the intelligence that Tiberius had recovered and called for something to eat. Gaius was so frightened that he did not know what to do; but Macro, the prefect of the praetorians, with more presence of mind, gave orders that a quantity of clothes should be thrown on Tiberius, and that he should be left alone. (Tac. Ann. v. 50; Dio Cass. lvi. 28.) Suetonius mentions a suspicion that Tiberius was poisoned at the last by Gaius (Suet. Tib. 73, Cal. 12). Tiberius wrote a brief commentary of his own life, the only book that the emperor Domitian studied (Suet. Tib. 67, Dom. 20), and also Greek poems, and a lyric poem on the death of L. Caesar (Suet. Tib. 70).—2. Tiberius Gemellus, son of Drusus junior (DRUSUS, No. 5), twin with another son, who died early. He was therefore grandson of Tiberius and regarded as a dangerous rival by Caligula, who put him to death soon after his accession. (Suet. Tib. 54, Cal. 14, 23). It is said that Tiberius doubted his legitimacy. This and his youth may have been reasons against his being named successor to the empire (Suet. Tib. 62; Tac. Ann. vi. 46).—3. A philosopher and sophist, of unknown time, the author of numerous works on grammar and rhetoric. One of his works, on the figures in the orations of Demosthenes (Περὶ τῶν παρὰ Δημοσθένει σχημάτων), is still extant.—Ed. Spengel, 1856.)

Tibilis. 1. A town of Numidia, in N. Africa, on the road from Cirta to Carthage, with warm springs, called Aquae Tibilitanae.—2. (Tiflis), a town on the Cyrus in the Asiatic Iberia.

Tibiscum, a town of Dacia and a Roman municipium on the river Tibiscus (Ptol. iii. 8, 10).

Tibiscus or Tiviscus (Temes), a river of Dacia, which rises in the district of Sarmizegetusa and joins the Danube a little below Singidunum (Belgrade).

Tibullus, Albius, the Roman poet, was of equestrian family. The date of his birth is uncertain; but he died young, soon after Virgil. His birth is therefore placed by conjecture B.C. 54, and his death B.C. 18. Of his youth and education absolutely nothing is known. The estate belonging to the equestrian ancestors of Tibullus was at Penum, between Tibur and Praeneste. This property, like that of the other great poets of the day, Virgil and Horace, had been either entirely or partially confiscated during the civil wars; yet Tibullus retained or recovered part of it, perhaps through Messalla, and spent there the better portion of his short, but peaceful and happy, life (Tib. i. 1, 19; cf. Hor. Ep. i. 4, 7). When his friend and patron, Messalla, was going to his prefecture in Asia, B.C. 30, Tibullus, after first refusing, eventually agreed to accompany him, but fell ill on the way at Coreyra and returned thence to Rome (Tib. i. 1, i. 3). Afterwards, in 28, he went to Aquitania with Messalla, who had been sent by Augustus to suppress a formidable insurrection which had broken out in this province. Part of the glory of the Aquitanian campaign, which Tibullus celebrates in language of unwonted loftiness, redounds, according to the poet, to his own fame. He was present at the battle of Atax (Aude in Languedoc), which broke the Aquitanian rebellion (Tib. i. 7). So ceased the active life of Tibullus; his life is now the chronicle of his poetry and of the loves which inspired it. The first object of his attachment is celebrated under the poetic name of Delia: according to Apuleius (Apol. 10) her real name was Plania. To Delia are addressed the first six Elegies of the first book. The poet's attachment to Delia had begun before he left Rome for Aquitania. But Delia seems to have been faithless during his absence from Rome. On his return from Coreyra he found her ill, and attended her with affectionate solicitude (Eleg. i. 5), and hoped to induce her to retire with him into the country. But first a richer lover appears to have supplanted him with the inconstant Delia, and afterwards there appears a husband in his way. The second book of Elegies is chiefly devoted to a new mistress named Nemesis (cf. Ov. Am. iii. 9, 32; Mart. viii. 73, 7). It is probable, though not certain, that this Nemesis is the same as the Glycera mentioned only by Horace (Od. i. 33, 2), who reproves him for dwelling so long in his plaintive elegies on the 'pitiless Glycera.'—The poetry of his contemporaries shows Tibullus as a gentle and singularly amiable man. To Horace especially he was an object of warm attachment. Besides the ode which alludes to his passion for Glycera (Hor. Od. i. 33), the Epistle of Horace to Tibullus gives the most full and pleasing view of his poetical retreat, and of his character: it is written by a kindred spirit. Horace does homage to that perfect purity of taste which distinguishes the poetry of Tibullus: he takes pride in the candid but favourable judgment of his own Satires. The time of Tibullus he supposes to be shared between the finishing his exquisite small poems, which were to surpass even those of Cassius of Parma, up to that time the models of that kind of composition, and the enjoyment of the country. Tibullus possessed, according to his friend's notions, all the blessings of life—a competent fortune, favour with the great, fame, health; and he seemed to know how to enjoy all those blessings.—The first two books alone of the Elegies under the name of Tibullus are of undoubted authenticity. The third is the work of another, a very inferior poet, whether Lygdamus be a real or fictitious name. This poet was much younger than Tibullus, for he was born in the year of the battle of Mutina, 43. It is probable that he was a less gifted member of Messalla's literary circle: this connexion with the patron of Tibullus might account for his Elegies being confused with the genuine poems of Tibullus. The hexameter poem on Messalla, which opens the fourth book, is so bad that, although a successful elegiac poet may have failed when he attempted epic verse, it cannot readily be ascribed to a writer of the exquisite taste of Tibullus. If it is his, it must be supposed that it was an early poem written in an imitative manner, when he was under the full influence of the Alexandrian school. The smaller Elegies of the fourth book have all the inimitable grace and simplicity of Tibullus. With the exception of the thirteenth (of which some lines are hardly surpassed by Tibullus himself) these poems relate to the love of a certain Sulpicia, a woman of noble birth, for Cerinthus, the real or fictitious name of a beautiful youth. Nor is there any improbability in supposing that Tibullus may have written Elegies in the name or by the desire of Sulpicia. If Sulpicia was herself the poetess, she approached nearer to Tibullus than any other writer of Elegies.—The first book of Elegies alone seems to have been published during the author's life, probably soon after the triumph of Messalla (27). The second book probably did not appear till after the death of Tibullus. With it may have been published the Elegies of his imitator, perhaps his friend and associate in the society of Messalla, Lygdamus (if that be a real name), i.e. the third book; and likewise the fourth, made up of poems belonging, as it were, to this intimate society of Messalla: the Panegyric by some nameless author, which, feeble as it is, seems to be of that age; the poems in the name of Sulpicia, with the concluding one, the thirteenth, a fragment of Tibullus himself.—Editions of Tibullus by Lachmann, Berol. 1829; Dissen, Göttingen, 1835; Bährens, Leips. 1878; Hiller, Leips. 1885; selections by Ramsay.

Tibur (Tiburs, pl. Tiburtes, Tiburtinus: Tivoli), one of the most ancient towns of Latium, sixteen miles N.E. of Rome, situated on the slope of a hill (hence called by Horace supinum Tibur), on the left bank of the Anio, which here forms a magnificent waterfall (Strab. p. 238; Hor. Od. i. 17, 13). It is said to have been originally built by the Siculi (Dionys. i. 16), i.e. by the very early inhabitants of Italy who were driven southwards into Sicily [SICILIA]. According to one tradition these earlier occupants were expelled from their city by Tiburtus (who renamed it), Coras, and Catillus or Catilus, the three sons of a Catillus who was himself a son of Amphiaraus, and migrated to Italy before the time of the Trojan war (Hor. Od. i. 18, 2; Verg. Aen. vii. 670; Ov. Fast. iv. 71, Am. iii. 6, 45; Stat. Silv. i. 3, 74; Sil. It. iv. 225). In some accounts Catillus accompanied Evander. But it is probable that this theory of a colonisation by Greeks had no foundation, and arose merely from a tendency at a particular time to look for a Greek origin of Italian towns which were really of a Latin foundation. It was afterwards one of the chief towns of the Latin League, and was reduced to submission in 335 (Liv. vii. 19), but was left independent, though deprived of territory. Hence Roman exiles could go there (Pol. vi. 14), which explains the story in Ovid (Fast. vi. 665; cf. Liv. ix. 30; App. B. C. i. 65; Ov. Pont. i. 3, 81). Tibur remained in the position of being a civitas foederata until after the Social war (B.C. 90) when it received the franchise [cf. PRÆNESTE]. Tibur continued to be a large and flourishing town, since the salubrity and beautiful scenery of the place led many of the most distinguished Roman nobles to build here magnificent villas. Of these the most splendid was the villa of the emperor Hadrian, in the extensive remains of which many valuable specimens of ancient art have been discovered. Here also Zenobia lived after adorning the triumph of her conqueror, Aurelian. Horace had a country house in the neighbourhood of Tibur, which he preferred to all his other residences. [HORATIUS.] The deity chiefly worshipped at Tibur was Hercules: and in the neighbourhood were the grove and temple of the Sibyl Albunea, whose oracles were consulted from the most ancient times. [ALBUNEA.] The beautiful round temple which remains, in fair preservation, is generally called the temple of the Sibyl; but it may be more correct to regard it as the temple of Vesta (who is known to have had a temple at Tibur), and to regard the neighbouring temple (now the church of S. Giorgio) as the temple of the Sibyl. The more important temple of Hercules Victor, the presiding deity of Tibur, probably stood on the site of the present cathedral.

Tichis or Tecum. [TECUM.]

Tichiussa (Τειχιούσσα), a fortress in the territory of Miletus (Thuc. viii. 26, 28).

Ticinum (Ticinensis: Pavia), a town of the Laevi, or, according to some, of the Insubres, in Gallia Cisalpina, on the left bank of the Ticinus. It was subsequently a Roman municipium; but it owed its greatness to the Lombard kings, who made it the capital of their dominions. The Lombards gave it the name of Pavia, which it still retains under the slightly changed form of Pavia. (Strab. p. 217; Tac. Ann. iii. 5; Procop. B. G. ii. 12, 25, iv. 32.)

Ticinus (Tessino) an important river in Gallia Cisalpina, rises in Mons Adula, and after flowing through Lacus Verbanus (Lago Maggiore), falls into the Po near Ticinum. It was upon the bank of this river that Hannibal gained his first victory over the Romans, by the defeat of P. Scipio, B.C. 218. (Strab. pp. 209, 217; Liv. xxi. 45; Pol. iii. 65.)

Tifāta, a mountain in Campania, E. of Capua, near which the Samnites defeated the Campanians, and where at a later time Sulla gained a victory over the proconsul Norbanus (Liv. viii. 29, xxiii. 36-43; Vell. Pat. ii. 25). On this mountain there was a temple of Diana [p. 285, a], and also one of Jupiter, who (like Zeus Lycæus) was worshipped in oak groves) on hill-tops, as is implied in the titles Jupiter Apenninensis, Jupiter Culminalis, &c. [JUPITER.]

Tifernum. 1. Tiberinum (Tifernates Tiberini, pl.: Città di Castello), a town of Umbria, near the sources of the river Tiber, whence its surname, and upon the confines of Etruria. Near this town the younger Pliny had a villa. (Plin. Ep. v. 6).—2. Metaurense (Tifernates Metaurense: S. Angelo in Vado), a town in Umbria, E. of the preceding, on the river Metaurus, whence its surname.

Tifernus (Biferno), a river of Samnium, rising in the Apennines, and flowing through the country of the Frentani into the Adriatic (Liv. x. 30; Mel. ii. 4, 6).

Tigellinus Sophonius, the son of a native of Agrigentum, owed his rise from poverty and obscurity to his handsome person and his unscrupulous character. He was banished to Scyllaceum in Bruttii (A.D. 39-40) for an intrigue with Agrippina and Julia Livilla, sisters of Caligula. (Dio Cass. lix. 23.) He was probably among the exiles restored by Agrippina, after she became empress, since early in Nero's reign he was again in favour at court, and at the death of Burrus (68) was appointed praetorian prefect jointly with Fenius Rufus (Tac. Ann. xiv. 58). Tigellinus ministered to Nero's worst passions, and of all his favourites was the most obnoxious to the Roman people (Tac. Ann. xv. 59, Hist. i. 72; Dio Cass. lxii. 13). He inflamed his jealousy or his avarice against the noblest members of the senate and the most pliant dependants of the court. In 65, Tigellinus entertained Nero in his Aemilian gardens, with a sumptuous profligacy unsurpassed even in that age, and in the same year shared with him the odium of burning Rome, since the conflagration had broken out on the scene of the banquet. (Tac. Ann. xv. 37; Dio Cass. lxii. 15.) It was certain death, according to Juvenal, to describe him as he was (Juv. i. 155); and of this proof was given in the murder of Thermus, who had spoken against Tigellinus (Tac. Ann. xvi. 20), and the narrow escape of the outspoken Apollonius of Tyana, who was spared only from a superstitious dread of his prophetic powers (Philostr. Ap. iv. 42). On Nero's fall he joined with Nymphidius Sabinus, who had succeeded Fenius Rufus as praetorian prefect, in transferring the allegiance of the soldiers to Galba. The people clamorously demanded his death. During the brief reign of Galba his life was spared; but on the accession of Otho, he was compelled to put an end to his own life. (Suet. Galb. 15; Tac. Hist. i. 72.)

Tigellius Hermogēnes. [HERMOGENES.]

Tigrānes (Τυγράνης), kings of Armenia. 1. Reigned B.C. 96-56. He united under his sway Armenia, Atropatene, and Gordyene, and thus raised himself to a degree of power superior to that of his predecessors. He assumed the title of King of Kings, and appeared in public accompanied by tributary princes as attendants. (Strab. p. 532; Plut. Lucull. 21; App. Syr. 48.) His power was strengthened by his alliance with Mithridates the Great, king of Pontus, whose daughter Cleopatra he had married at an early period of his reign. In consequence of the dissensions in the royal family of Syria, Tigranes was enabled in 83 to make himself master of the whole Syrian monarchy from the Euphrates to the sea. He was now at the summit of his power, and continued in the undisputed possession of these dominions for nearly fourteen years. At the instigation of his son-in-law, Mithridates, he invaded Cappadocia in 74, and is said to have carried off into captivity no less than 300,000 of the inhabitants, a large portion of whom he settled in his newly founded capital of Tigranocerta. [TIGRANOCERTA.] In other respects he appears to have furnished little support to Mithridates in his war against the Romans; but when the Romans haughtily demanded from him the surrender of Mithridates, who had taken refuge in his dominions, he returned a peremptory refusal, accompanied with an express declaration of war. Lucullus invaded Armenia in 69, defeated the mighty host which Tigranes led against him, and followed up his victory by the capture of Tigranocerta. In the following year (68) the united forces of Tigranes and Mithridates were again defeated by Lucullus (Plut. Lucull. 22-28; App. Mithr. 84-86); but the mutinous disposition of the Roman troops prevented Lucullus from gaining any further advantages over the Armenian king, and enabled the latter, not only to regain his dominions, but also to invade Cappadocia (Plut. Luc. 34; Dio Cass. xxxv. 15). The arrival of Pompey (66) soon changed the face of events. Mithridates, after his final defeat by Pompey, once more threw himself upon the support of his son-in-law; but Tigranes, who suspected him of abetting the designs of his son Tigranes, who had rebelled against his father, refused to receive him, while he himself hastened to make overtures of submission to Pompey. That general had already advanced into the heart of Armenia under the guidance of the young Tigranes, when the old king repaired in person to the Roman camp, and presenting himself as a suppliant before Pompey, laid his tiara at his feet. By this act of humiliation he at once conciliated the favour of the conqueror, who treated him in a friendly manner, and left him in possession of Armenia Proper with the title of king, depriving him only of the provinces of Sophene and Gordyene, which he erected into a separate kingdom for his son Tigranes. (Plut. Pomp. 32, 33; Dio Cass. xxxvi. 33-36; App. Mithr. 105.) The elder monarch was so overjoyed at obtaining these unexpectedly favourable terms, that he not only paid the sum of 6000 talents demanded by Pompey, but added a large sum as a donation to his army, and continued ever after the steadfast friend of the Roman general. He died in 56 or 55, and was succeeded by his son Artavasdes. (Dio Cass. xl. 16).—2. Son of Artavasdes, and grandson of the preceding. He was living an exile at Rome when a party of his countrymen, discontented with the rule of his elder brother, Artaxias, sent to request that he should be placed on the throne. To this Augustus assented, and Tiberius was charged with the duty of accomplishing it, a task which he effected apparently without opposition (B.C. 20). (Tac. Ann. ii. 3; Dio Cass. liv. 9; Suet. Tib. 9.)

Tigranocerta (τὰ Τίγρανόκερτα and ἡ Τίγρ., i. e., in Armenian, the City of Tigranes; Sert, Ru.), the later capital of Armenia, built by Tigranes, on a height by the river Nicephorius, in the valley between M. Masius and Niphates. It was strongly fortified, and peopled chiefly with Macedonians and Greeks forcibly removed from Cappadocia and Cilicia; but, after the defeat of Tigranes by Lucullus under its walls, these people were permitted to return to their homes. The city was at the same time partially destroyed; but it still remained a considerable place. (Strab. pp. 522, 532, 539, 747; App. Mithr. 67; Tac. Ann. xii. 50, xiv. 24.) Its site is placed by some modern geographers at Tell Ermen.

Tigris, gen. -idos and -is (ὁ Τίγρις, gen. Τίγριδος and Τίγριος, also Τίγρης, gen. Τίγρητος: Tigris), a great river of W. Asia, rises from several sources on the S. side of that part of the Taurus chain called Niphates, in Armenia, and flows SE., first through the narrow valley between M. Masius and the prolongation of M. Niphates, and then through the great plain which is bounded on the E. by the last-named chain, till it falls into the head of the Persian Gulf, after receiving the Euphrates from the W. [Comp. EUPHRATES.] Its other chief tributaries, all falling into its E. side, were the NICEPHORIUS or CENTRITES, the LYCUS, the CAPRUS, the PHYCUS, the GORGUS, SILLAS or DELAS, the GYNDES, and the CHOASPES. It divided Assyria and Susiana on the E. from Mesopotamia and Babylonia, and (at its mouth) Arabia, on the W. (Hdt. vi. 20; Xen. An. iv. 1, 3; Arr. An. vii. 7; Strab. pp. 79, 529, 728; Verg. Ecl. i. 63.) The name is sometimes applied to the PASTIGRIS.

Tigurini, a tribe of the Helvetii, who joined the Cimbri in invading the country of the Allobroges in Gaul, where they defeated the consul L. Cassius Longinus, B.C. 107. They formed in the time of Caesar the most important of the four cantons (pagi) into which the Helvetii were divided. [HELVETII.]

Tiliaventus (Tagliamento), a river of Venetia which falls into the Adriatic between Aquileia and Concordia (Plin. iii. 126).

Tilphūsium (Τίλφουσιον), a town in Boeotia, situated upon a mountain of the same name, S. of lake Copais, and between Coronea and Haliartus. It derived its name from the fountain Tilphūsa, which was sacred to Apollo, and where Tiresias is said to have been buried (Paus. ix. 33, 1).

Timaeus (Τίμαιος). 1. The historian, was the son of Andromachus, tyrant of Tauro-menium, in Sicily. Timaeus attained the age of 96; and though we do not know the exact date either of his birth or death, we cannot be far wrong in placing his birth in B.C. 352, and his death in 256. Timaeus received instruction from Philiscus, the Milesian, a disciple of Isocrates (Suid. s. v.); but we have no further particulars of his life, except that he was banished from Sicily by Agathocles, and passed his exile at Athens, where he had lived fifty years when he wrote the thirty-fourth book of his History. The great work of Timaeus was a History of Sicily from the earliest times to 264, in which year Polybius commences the introduction to his work (Pol. i. 5). This History was one of great extent. We have a quotation from the thirty-eighth book, and there were probably many books after this (Suid. s. vv. ὅ τὸ ἔργον πῦρ). The value and authority of Timaeus as a historian have been most vehemently attacked by Polybius in many parts of his work (Pol. ii. 16, xii. 3, 5). Most of the charges of Polybius appear to have been well founded; yet he has not only omitted to mention some of the peculiar excellencies of Timaeus, but has even regarded some good points as deserving the severest censure. Thus it was one of the great merits of Timaeus, for which he is loudly denounced by Polybius, that he attempted to give the myths in their simplest and most genuine form, as related by the most ancient writers. Timaeus also collected the materials of his history with the greatest diligence and care, a fact which even Polybius is obliged to admit, and he is praised for his learning and general information by Cicero (de Orat. ii. 14). He likewise paid very great attention to chronology, and was the first writer who introduced the practice of recording events by Olympiads, which was adopted by almost all subsequent writers of Greek history. The fragments of Timaeus have been collected by Göller, in his De Situ et Origine Syracusarum, Lips. 1818, and by Car. and Theod. Müller, in the Fragmenta Historic. Graec. Paris, 1841.—2. Of Locri, in Italy, a Pythagorean philosopher, is said to have been a teacher of Plato (Cic. de Fin. v. 29, de Rep. i. 10). There is an extant work, bearing his name, written in the Doric dialect, and entitled Περὶ ψυχᾶς κόσμου καὶ φύσιος: but its genuineness is very doubtful, and it is in all probability nothing more than an abridgment of Plato's dialogue of Timaeus. Ed. by Gelder, Leyden, 1836.—3. The Sophist, wrote a Lexicon to Plato, addressed to a certain Gentianus, which is still extant. The time at which he lived is quite uncertain. He is usually placed in the third century of the Christian era, which produced so many ardent admirers of the Platonic philosophy, such as Porphyry, Longinus, Plotinus, &c. The Lexicon bears the title Τιμαίου σοφιστοῦ περὶ τῶν παρὰ Πλάτωνα λέξεων. It is very brief, but is of value for its explanations of words. It has been edited by Ruhnken, Leyden, 1754, and again, Leyden, 1789; and by Koch, Leipzig, 1828, and 1833.

Timāgēnes (Τιμαγένης), a rhetorician and a historian, was a native of Alexandria, from which place he was carried as a prisoner to Rome, where he was first employed as a slave in menial offices, but being liberated by Faustus Sulla, the son of the dictator, he opened a school of rhetoric, in which he taught with great success. (Comp. Hor. Ep. i. 19, 15.) The emperor Augustus induced him to write a History of his exploits, but having offended Augustus by sarcastic remarks upon his family, he was forbidden the palace; whereupon he burnt his historical works, gave up his rhetorical school, and retired from Rome to the house of his friend Asinius Pollio at Tusculum. He afterwards went to the East, and died at Dabanum in Mesopotamia. (Sen. de Ira, iii. 23; Plut. de Adul. p. 68; Quint. x. 1; Suid. s. v. Τιμαγένης.)

Timantāēs (Τιμάνθης), a Greek painter at Sicyon, contemporary with Zeuxis and Parrhasius, about B.C. 400. The masterpiece of Timanthes was his picture of the sacrifice of Iphigenia, in which Agamemnon was painted with his face hidden in his mantle. The ancient critics tell us that the picture showed Iphigenia, standing by the altar, surrounded, among the assistants, by Calchas, whose prophetic voice had demanded her sacrifice, and whose hand was about to complete it; Odysseus, who had brought her from her home, and Menelaus, her father's brother, all manifesting different degrees of grief, so that, when the artist had painted the sorrow of Calchas, and the deeper sorrow of Odysseus, and had added all his powers to express the woe of Menelaus, his resources were exhausted, and, unable to give a powerful expression to the agony of the father, he covered his head with a veil. (Plin. xxxv. 73; Cic. Orat. 22; Quint. ii. 13.) But this is clearly not the reason why Timanthes hid the face of Agamemnon. Timanthes probably expressed by his painting exactly what Tennyson, in describing the same scene, expresses by the words 'My father held his hand upon his face'—the abhorrence of Agamemnon from the sacrifice which he cannot prevent (cf. TIMOLEON; Plut. Tim. 4). It is likely that the composition of this, undoubtedly one of the most famous and probably one of the most powerful of ancient pictures, set the conventional method of representing the scene, and that in the Pompeian picture of the sacrifice of Iphigenia (Mus. Borb. iv. 3) we have the attitude of the Agamemnon of Timanthes preserved.

Timāvus (Timavo), a small river in the N. of Italy, forming the boundary between Istria and Venetia, and falling into the Sinus Tergestinus in the Adriatic, between Tergeste and Aquileia. It formed sometimes a pool or basin near its issue to the sea, which Livy calls the Lake of Timavus (Liv. xli. 1). This river is frequently celebrated by the poets and other ancient writers, who speak of its numerous sources, its lake, and its subterranean passage. This is to some extent confirmed by the nature of the river, which bursts in several streams of considerable volume from the foot of a rock, and has a course of little over a mile before it reaches the sea. It is believed in the country to be the outflow of a stream which disappears near S. Canzian about thirteen miles from the reappearance, and this does not differ much from an estimate as old as Posidonius, who says that its subterranean course is 130 stadia (Strab. p. 215). That the number of mouths by which it issued from the rock varied at different times is likely enough. Nine, seven, six, and four are mentioned. (Verg. Aen. i. 245; Strab. l. c.; Mart. iv. 25, 6.)

Timocles (Τιμοκλῆς), an Athenian comic poet of the Middle Comedy, who lived at a period when the revival of political energy, in consequence of the encroachments of Philip, restored to the Middle Comedy much of the vigour and real aim of the Old. He is conspicuous for the freedom with which he discussed public men and measures (Athen. pp. 224, 341). He lived till after B.C. 324 (Suid. s. v.). Fragments in Meineke, Fr. Com. Graec.

Timocrēon (Τιμοκρέων), of Rhodes, a lyric poet, celebrated for the bitter and pugnacious spirit of his works, especially for his attacks on Themistocles and Simonides, and also for his great bodily strength. He was a native of Ialysus in Rhodes, whence he was banished on the then common charge of an inclination towards Persia (μηδισμός); and in this banishment he was left neglected by Themistocles, who had formerly been his friend and was connected with him by the ties of hospitality. Timocreon was still living after B.C. 471, since one of his poems, of which we have a fragment, was an attack upon Themistocles after his exile. (Athen. pp. 415, 416; Plat. Gorg. p. 493; Plut. Them. 21.)

Timōlēon (Τιμολέων), son of Timodemus or Timaenetus and Demariste, belonged to one of the noblest families at Corinth. His early life was stained by a deed of blood. We are told that when his brother, Timophanes, whose life he had previously saved in battle at the risk of his own (Plut. Tim. 4), endeavoured to make himself tyrant of their native city, Timoleon murdered him rather than allow him to destroy the liberty of the state. It is related that he visited him with two friends, who first joined Timoleon in urging him to lay down his power, and, failing in this, stabbed him, Timoleon meanwhile standing aside with his face veiled (Plut. Tim. 4, Reipubl. Gerend. Praecept. p. 808; Nep. Tim. 1). The murder was perpetrated just before an embassy arrived from several of the Greek cities of Sicily, begging the Corinthians to send assistance to the island, which was distracted by internal dissensions, and was expecting an invasion of the Carthaginians. It is said that the Corinthians were at the very moment of the arrival of the Sicilians deliberating respecting Timoleon's act, and had not come to any decision respecting it; and that they avoided the difficulty of a decision by appointing him to the command of the Sicilian expedition, with the singular provision, that if he conducted himself justly in the command, they would regard him as a tyrannicide, and honour him accordingly; but if otherwise, they would punish him as a fratricide. To whatever causes Timoleon owed his appointment, his extraordinary success justified the confidence which had been reposed in him. His history reads like a romance; and yet of the main facts of the narrative we cannot entertain any reasonable doubt. Although the Corinthians had readily assented to the request of the Sicilians in the appointment of a commander, they were not prepared to make many sacrifices in their favour; and accordingly it was only with ten triremes and 700 mercenaries that Timoleon sailed from Corinth to repel the Carthaginians, and restore order to the Sicilian cities. He reached Sicily in B.C. 344, and straightway marched against Syracuse, of two quarters of which he obtained possession. In the following spring (343) Dionysius, despairing of success, surrendered the citadel to Timoleon, on condition of his being allowed to depart in safety to Corinth. [DIONYSIUS.] Timoleon soon afterwards obtained possession of the whole of Syracuse. He destroyed the citadel, which had been for so many years the seat and bulwark of the power of the tyrants, and restored the democratic form of government. He then proceeded to expel the tyrants from the other Greek cities of Sicily, but was interrupted in this undertaking by a formidable invasion of the Carthaginians, who landed at Lilybaeum in 339, with an army, under the command of Hasdrubal and Hamilcar, consisting of 70,000 foot and 10,000 horse. Such an overwhelming force struck the Greeks with consternation and dismay. So great was their alarm that Timoleon could only induce 12,000 men to march with him against the Carthaginians. But with this small force he gained a brilliant victory over the Carthaginians on the river Crimissus (339). It is said that on his march to meet the enemy Timoleon met some mules laden with parsley, which, since parsley was used for wreaths placed on tombstones, struck the soldiers as a bad omen; but Timoleon, placing a wreath of it on his head, exclaimed: 'This is an omen of victory; for at Corinth it crowns the victors in the Isthmian games.' (Plut. Tim. 26; Diod. xvi. 79.) The terrible storm which beat in the face of the Carthaginians and contributed to their defeat was regarded by his troops and by others as a mark of divine favour to Timoleon. This victory justly ranks as one of the greatest gained by Greeks over barbarians. The booty which Timoleon acquired was prodigious; and some of the richest of the spoils he sent to Corinth and other cities in Greece, thus spreading the glory of his victory throughout the mother country. Timoleon now resolved to carry into execution his project of expelling all the tyrants from Sicily. Of these, two of the most powerful, Hicetas of Leontini, and Mamercus of Catana, had recourse to the Carthaginians for assistance, who sent Gisco to Sicily with a fleet of seventy ships and a body of Greek mercenaries. Although Gisco gained a few successes at first, the war was upon the whole favourable to Timoleon, with whom the Carthaginians were glad to conclude a treaty in 338, fixing the river Halycus as the boundary of the Carthaginian and Greek dominions in Sicily. During the war with Gisco Hicetas fell into the hands of Timoleon, and was slain by his order. His wife and daughters were carried to Syracuse, where they were executed by the people, as a satisfaction to the manes of Dion, whose wife Arete and sister Aristomache had both been put to death by Hicetas. This is one of the greatest stains upon Timoleon's character, as he might easily have saved these unfortunate women if he had chosen. After the treaty between the Carthaginians and Timoleon, Mamercus, being unable to maintain himself in Catana, fled to Messana, where he took refuge with Hippon, tyrant of that city. Timoleon quickly followed, and besieged Messana so vigorously by sea and land that Hippon, despairing of holding out, attempted to escape by sea, but was taken and put to death in the public theatre. Mamercus now surrendered, stipulating only for a public trial before the Syracusans, with the condition that Timoleon should not appear as his accuser. But as soon as he was brought into the assembly at Syracuse, the people refused to hear him, and unanimously condemned him to death. Thus almost all the tyrants were expelled from the Greek cities in Sicily, and a democratic form of government established in their place. Timoleon, however, was in reality the ruler of Sicily, for all the states consulted him on every matter of importance; and the wisdom of his rule is attested by the flourishing condition of the island for several years even after his death. He did not assume any title or office, but lived as a private citizen among the Syracusans. Timoleon died in 337, having become blind a short time before his death. He was buried at the public expense in the market-place at Syracuse, where his monument was afterwards surrounded with porticoes and a gymnasium, which was called after him the Timoleonteum. Annual games were also instituted in his honour. (Life of Tim. by Plutarch and by Nepos; cf. Diod. xvi. 65-90; Polyae. v. 3, 8.)

Timomachus (Τιμόμαχος), a distinguished painter, of Byzantium, lived (according to Pliny) in the time of Julius Caesar, who purchased two of his pictures, the Ajax and Medea, for the immense sum of eighty Attic talents, and dedicated them in the temple of Venus Genetrix (Plin. vii. 126, xxxv. 136; cf. Anth. Pal. ii. p. 667). It is held by most critics that Timomachus belonged to the Alexandrine period of Greek art, and that Pliny was mistaken in supposing that the pictures which Caesar bought were painted in Caesar's time.

Timon (Τίμων). 1. The son of Timarchus of Phlius, a philosopher of the sect of the Sceptics, flourished in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, about B.C. 279, and onwards. He first studied philosophy at Megara, under Stilpon, and then returned home and married. He next went to Elis with his wife, and heard Pyrrho, whose tenets he adopted. Driven from Elis by straitened circumstances, he spent some time on the Hellespont and the Propontis, and taught at Chalcedon as a sophist with such success that he realised a fortune. He then removed to Athens, where he passed the remainder of his life, with the exception of a short residence at Thebes. He died at the age of almost 90.—Timon appears to have been endowed by nature with a powerful and active mind, and with that quick perception of the follies of men which betrays its possessor into a spirit of universal distrust both of men and truths, so as to make him a sceptic in philosophy and a satirist in everything. His agnosticism (to use a modern term) is shown by his saying that man need only know three things: viz. what is the nature of things, how we are related to them, and what we can gain from them: but, as our knowledge of things must always be subjective and unreal, we can only live in a state of suspended judgment. He wrote numerous works both in prose and poetry. The most celebrated of his poems were the satiric compositions called Silli (σίλλοι), a word of somewhat doubtful etymology, but which undoubtedly describes metrical compositions of a character at once ludicrous and sarcastic. The invention of this species of poetry is ascribed to Xenophanes of Colophon. [XENOPHANES.] The Silli of Timon were in three books, in the first of which he spoke in his own person, and the other two are in the form of a dialogue between the author and Xenophanes of Colophon, in which Timon proposed questions, to which Xenophanes replied at length. The subject was a sarcastic account of the tenets of all philosophers, living and dead: an unbounded field for scepticism and satire. They were in hexameter verse, and from the way in which they are mentioned by the ancient writers, as well as from the few fragments of them which have come down to us, it is evident that they were very admirable productions of their kind. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 12, 109–115; Euseb. Praep. Ev. xiv. p. 761.)—The fragments of his poems are collected by Wölke, De Graecorum Syllis, Varsav. 1820; and by Paul, Dissertatio de Sillis, Berol. 1821.—2. The Misanthrope (δ μισάνθρωπος), lived in the time of the Peloponnesian war. He was an Athenian, of the demos of Colyttus, and his father's name was Echekratides. In consequence of the ingratitude he experienced, and the disappointments he suffered, from his early friends and companions, he secluded himself entirely from the world, admitting no one to his society except Alcibiades, in whose reckless and variable disposition he probably found pleasure in tracing and studying an image of the world he had abandoned; and at last he is said to have died in consequence of refusing to suffer a surgeon to come to him to set a broken limb. One of Lucian's pieces bears his name. (Aristoph. Av. 1548, Lys. 809; Plut. Ant. 70; Lucian, Timon; Suid. s. v.)

Timophanes. [TIMOLEON.]

Timothæus (Τιμόθεος). 1. Son of Conon, the famous general, was himself a distinguished Athenian general. He was first appointed to a public command in B.C. 378; and from this time his name frequently occurs as one of the Athenian generals down to 356. In this year he was associated with Iphicrates, Menestheus, and Chares in the command of the Athenian fleet. In consequence of his failure to relieve Samos he was arraigned in 354, and condemned to the crushing fine of 100 talents (more than 24,000*l.*). Being unable to pay the fine, he withdrew to Chalcis in Euboea, where he died shortly after. The Athenians subsequently remitted nine-tenths of the penalty, and allowed his son Conon to expend the remainder on the repair of the walls, which the famous Conon had restored. (Life of Timoth. in Nepos; Diod. xv. 81, xvi. 7, 21; IPHICRATES.)—2. Son of Clearchus, the tyrant of Heraclea on the Euxine, whom he succeeded in the sovereignty, B.C. 353 (Diod. xvi. 36). There is extant a letter addressed to him by Isocrates.—3. A celebrated musician and poet of the later Athenian dithyramb, was a native of Miletus, and the son of Thersander. He was born B.C. 446, and died in 357, in the ninetieth year of his age. Of the details of his life we have very little information. He was at first unfortunate in his professional efforts. Even the Athenians, fond as they were of novelty, were offended at the bold innovations of Timotheus, and hissed off his performance. On this occasion it is said that Euripides encouraged Timotheus by the prediction that he would soon have the theatres at his feet. This prediction appears to have been accomplished in the vast popularity which Timotheus afterwards enjoyed. The Ephesians rewarded him for his dedicatory hymn to Artemis with the sum of 1000 pieces of gold; and the last accomplishment by which the education of the Arcadian youth was finished was learning the nomes of Timotheus and Philoxenus. (Pol. iv. 20; Athen. pp. 626, 636; Suid. s. v.) Timotheus is said to have died in Macedonia. He delighted in the most artificial and intricate forms of musical expression: the most important of his innovations, as the means of introducing all the others, was his addition to the number of the strings of the cithara. [See Dict. of Ant. art. Lyra.]—4. A sculptor, whose country is not mentioned, but who belonged to the later Attic school of the time of Scopas and Praxiteles. He was one of the artists who executed the bas-reliefs which adorned the frieze of the Mausoleum. He is also mentioned as the author of a statue of Asclepius at Troezen and one of Artemis which was at Rome. (Paus. ii. 32, 3; Plin. xxxvi. 32; cf. BRYAXIS; LEOCHARIS.)

Tingis (ἡ Τίγγις: Tangier), a city of Mauretania, on the S. coast of the Fretum Gaditanum (Straits of Gibraltar), was a place of very great antiquity. It was made by Augustus a free city, and by Claudius a colony, and the capital of Mauretania Tingitana. (Strab. pp. 140, 827; Dio Cass. xlviii. 45; Plin. v. 2.)

Tinia (Timia), a small river in Umbria, rising near Spoletium, and falling into the Tiber, after receiving the Clitumnus (Strab. p. 227; Sil. It. viii. 452).

Tirēsias (Τειρεσίας), one of the mythical types of prophecy from augury, among whom were Melampus and Calchas; but Tiresias was the most widely celebrated soothsayer of all. He was represented as a Theban, son of Evers and Chariclo: hence Theocritus calls him Euerides (Id. xxiv. 70). He was blind from his seventh year, but lived to a very old age. Various stories are told about the origin of his blindness, each probably a local legend, but it is difficult to say which is the oldest, or where each was started. One story was that his blindness was occasioned by his having revealed to men things which they ought not to have known. Another that he had seen Athene while she was bathing, wherefore the goddess deprived him of sight by sprinkling water upon his face. Chariclo prayed to Athene to restore his sight, but as the goddess was unable to do this, she conferred upon him the power of understanding the voices of birds, and gave him a staff, with the help of which he could walk as safely as if he had his eyesight. (Apollod. iii. 6, 7; Callim. Lav. Pall. 75.) Another tradition accounts for his blindness in the following manner. Once, when on Mount Cithaeron (others say Cyllene), he saw a male and a female serpent together; he struck at them with his staff, and as he happened to kill the female, he himself was metamorphosed into a woman. Seven years later he again saw two serpents, and now killing the male, he again became a man. It was for this reason that Zeus and Hera, when disputing whether a man or a woman had more enjoyments, referred the matter to Tiresias, who declared that women enjoyed more pleasure than men. Hera, indignant at the answer, deprived him of sight, but Zeus gave him the power of prophecy, and granted him a life which was to last for seven or nine generations. This story is said to have been related by Hesiod. (Tzet. ad Lyc. 632; cf. Apollod. l.c.; Ov. Met. iii. 320; Hyg. Fab. 75.) It seems to belong to an early date, when serpents were symbols of prophetic and oracular power, and it probably grew out of a primitive Boeotian superstition. In the war of the Seven against Thebes, he declared that Thebes would be victorious if Menoeceus would sacrifice himself; and during the war of the Epigoni, when the Thebans had been defeated, he advised them to commence negotiations of peace, and to avail themselves of the opportunity that would thus be afforded them to take to flight. He himself fled with them (or, according to others, he was carried to Delphi as a captive), but on his way he drank from the well of Tilphossa and died. (Diod. iv. 66; Paus. ix. 33, 1; Apollod. iii. 7, 3.) His daughter, Manto (or Daphne), was sent by the victorious Argives to Delphi, as a servant to Apollo. Even in the lower world Tiresias was believed to retain the powers of perception, while the souls of other mortals were mere shades, and there also he continued to use his golden staff (Od. x. 492, xi. 90). His tomb was shown in the neighbourhood of the Tilphusian well near Thebes, and in Macedonia likewise. The place near Thebes where he had observed the birds was pointed out as a remarkable spot even in later times. (Paus. ix. 16, 1; cf. Soph. O. T. 493.) The blind seer Tiresias acts so prominent a part in the mythical history of Greece that there is scarcely any event with which he is not connected in some way or other; and this introduction of the seer in so many occurrences separated by long intervals of time was facilitated by the belief in his long life. In Pindar (Nem. 60) he prophesies to the parents of Heracles; in Sophocles, as a very old man, to Oedipus; and, in the stories of the Epigoni, to the grandsons of Oedipus.

Tiribazus (Τιρίβαζος), satrap of Armenia in 401, hung on the retreat of the 10,000, but without success (Xen. An. iv. 4, vii. 8; Diod. xiv. 27). He succeeded Tithraustes as satrap of W. Asia, and favoured the views of Antalcidas. In 386 he commanded the expedition against EVAGORAS. Some time afterwards he conspired against Artaxerxes II., and was put to death (Plut. Artax. 29).

Tiridates or Teridates (Τηριδάτης). 1. The second king of Parthia. [ARSACES II.]—2. [See ARSACES XXIII.]—3. Tiridates III. [SASSANIDAE.]

Tiro, M. Tullius, the freedman of Cicero, to whom he was an object of tender affection. He appears to have been a man of very amiable disposition, and highly cultivated intellect. (Cic. ad Fam. xvi. 4, ad Att. vii. 5; Gell. vi. 3.) He was not only the amanuensis of the orator, and his assistant in literary labour, but was himself an author of no mean reputation, and notices of several works from his pen have been preserved by ancient writers. Among them were a biography of Cicero, vindicating his character from detraction (Plut. Cic. 41, 49; Tac. Dial. 17; Gell. iv. 10, xv. 16), a treatise on grammar (Gell. xiii. 9), and some poetry (Cic. ad Fam. xvi. 18). Tiro was the chief agent in bringing together and arranging the works of his illustrious patron, and in preserving his correspondence from being dispersed and lost. After the death of Cicero, Tiro purchased a farm in the neighbourhood of Puteoli, where he lived until he reached his 100th year. Tiro was the inventor or improver of the art of shorthand writing among the Romans, and hence abbreviations of this description, which are common in MSS. from the sixth century downwards, have very generally been designated as Notae Tironianae. [See Dict. of Ant. art. Notae.]

Tiryns (Τίρυνς, -υρθος: Τηρύνθιος), an ancient town in Argolis, S.E. of Argos, and one of the most ancient in all Greece, is said to have been founded by Proetus, the brother of Acrisius, who, having returned from Lycia [PROETUS], built the massive walls of the city with the help of the Cyclopes. [For the legendary connexion with HERACLES, see that article.] Tiryns was built on a low flat-topped rock, which rises about sixty feet above the plain of Argolis $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile from the sea-coast, Mycenae being $9\frac{1}{4}$ miles further inland. The legends point to the first foundation of Tiryns (as a strong citadel at any rate) by a dynasty of immigrants from Asia Minor. Such is the natural construction of the story of Proetus. The story of Heracles the Tirynthian serving the Mycenaean Eurystheus points to the fact that Tiryns, the more ancient city, fell under the dominion of Mycenae, a later foundation. [For the reason why it should do so, though apparently more favourably situated for commerce, see MYCENAE.] In the Persian wars the Tirynthians served at Plataea (Hdt. ix. 28), and it is said that this dissociation from Argos was one cause of the jealousy which led the Argives to destroy Tiryns and Mycenae (Paus. ii. 25, 8); after which time it remained uninhabited, or at any rate unrestored. These traditions are in many particulars confirmed by the excavations undertaken by Dr. Schliemann and Dr. Dörpfeld in 1876-1884. As regards the relative antiquity, the walls of Tiryns appear to be older than the oldest parts of Mycenae; they are described as 'colossal roughly hewn blocks, showing no vestige of later restoration,' and, though some have thought the style of work to be Phoenician, the most probable view, as at present appears, is that they should rather be compared to remains found in Lydia. The excavations have laid bare the whole palace, with its gates and walls, its courts and its apartments for men and women. How interesting and valuable this is for the illustration of the Homeric poems as regards life in the palace of an Achaean prince may easily be understood [see Dict. of Ant. art. Domus]. This palace and fortress is built on a platform of rock 328 yards by 109, with three terraces, on which stand the upper, middle, and lower citadels. On the upper, to the S., is the palace; on the middle are smaller houses, and others, only partially excavated, on the lowest and smallest platform; but it is probable that the

they had been cemented with a clay mortar, of which the yellow dust remains. The walls round the lower citadel were from twenty-three to twenty-six feet thick, and twenty-four feet high: those round the upper citadel were even thicker. The wall is made more defensible by projecting and re-entering angles with towers, galleries, and chambers, and a long corridor, or arched gallery, with arched doors. These were at first supposed to be sallyports, whence soldiers came out to defend the platform; but they have been found to communicate with main city lay, as at Troy, beneath the citadel-hill. The walls of the palace are still in some places three feet high: the outer wall of the citadel is built solely of very large stones (limestone, quarried near Tiryns), bearing out the legend of Proetus employing Cyclopean builders: many of the stones are from six to ten feet long, and three feet in breadth and thickness; they are not, however, absolutely unhewn, for many are roughly dressed with the pick-hammer: they are arranged to some extent in layers, and (contrary to the ideas entertained before the later explorations) it was found that chambers which were probably store-rooms. Remarkable skill and ingenuity have been shown in bringing the approaches, alike the main entrance and the small rock staircase, by a circuitous route commanded throughout by the walls and galleries [see plan]. The fortifications of Tiryns are noticed in Il. ii. 559. As regards the gain to archaeology, not only has it been made possible to realise thoroughly the arrangement of the Homeric palace, as was said above, but the system of decoration, the painted ceilings (in Egyptian patterns), and the vases which have been found have supplmented the richer discoveries of Mycenae. As regards the history, although there are striking analogies to Phoenician architecture in the walls (e.g. to the walls of Carthage), yet it is probable that those are right who regard the remains as proving a Lydian origin for the dynasty, so-called, of Proetus and Perseus [see MYCENAE]. Again, though some argue that the ruins testify to a much earlier destruction, it does not yet appear that anything has disproved the statement of Pausanias, that the destruction was in the fifth century B.C. Indeed, there are remains of a small Doric temple of the seventh century B.C. The report of its deserted state which Pausanias gives is certainly borne out by the excavations, which seem to show that the site was hardly, if at all, occupied for many centuries, until the date of Byzantine tombs and a Byzantine church.

Gallery at Tiryns.

Tisāmēnus (Τισαμενός). 1. Son of Orestes and Hermione, was king of Argos, but was deprived of his kingdom when the Heraclidae invaded Peloponnesus. He was slain in a battle against the Heraclidae, and his tomb was afterwards shown at Helice, from which place his remains were subsequently removed to Sparta by command of an oracle. (Paus. ii. 18, 5, vii. 1, 3; Apollod. ii. 8, 2).—2. Son of Thersander and Demonassa, was king of Thebes, and the father of Autesion (Hdt. iv. 147; Paus. iii. 15, 4).—3. An Elean soothsayer, of the family of the Clytiadae. He was assured by the Delphic oracle that he should be successful in five great conflicts. Supposing this to be a promise of distinction as an athlete, he devoted himself to gymnastic exercises; but the Spartans, understanding the oracle to refer, not to gymnastic, but to military victories, made great offers to Tisamenus to induce him to take with their kings the joint command of their armies. This he refused to do on any terms short of receiving the full franchise of their city, which the Spartans eventually granted. He was present with the Spartans at the battle of Plataea, B.C. 379, which was the first of the five conflicts referred to by the oracle. The second was with the Argives and Tegeans at Tegea; the third, with the Arcadians at Dipaea; the fourth was the third Messenian war (465–455); and the last was the battle of Tanagra, with the Athenians and their allies, in 457. (Hdt. ix. 33–36.)

Tisia (Tisiates, pl.). 1. A town in Bruttium in the Sila Silva, of uncertain site (App. An. 44).—2. (Theiss), a river of Dacia and Sarmatia, which rises in the Montes Bastarnici, and flows into the Danube. It was also called Patusus.

Tisicrātes, an eminent Greek sculptor, of the school of Lysippus, whose works those of Tisicrates closely imitated (Plin. xxxiv. 67).

Tisiphōnē. [EUMENIDAE.]

Tissa (Tissiensis, Tissinensis), a town in Sicily, N. of Mt. Aetna (Cic. Verr. iii. 38; Ptol. iii. 4, 12).

Tissaphernes (Τισσαφέρνης), a famous Persian, who was appointed satrap of Lower Asia in B.C. 414. He espoused the cause of the Spartans in the Peloponnesian war, but he did not give them any effectual assistance, since his policy was not to allow either Spartans or Athenians to gain the supremacy, but to exhaust the strength of both parties by the continuance of the war. His plans, however, were thwarted by the arrival of Cyrus in Asia Minor in 407. This prince supplied the Lacedaemonians with effectual assistance. Tissaphernes and Cyrus were not on good terms; and after the death of Darius, they were engaged in continual disputes about the cities in the satrapy of the latter, over which Cyrus claimed dominion. The ambitious views of Cyrus towards the throne at length became manifest to Tissaphernes, who lost no time in repairing to the king with information of the danger. At the battle of Cunaxa, in 401, he was one of the four generals who commanded the army of Artaxerxes, and his troops were the only portion of the left wing that was not put to flight by the Greeks. When the 10,000 had begun their retreat, Tissaphernes professed his great anxiety to serve them, and promised to conduct them home in safety. In the course of the march he treacherously arrested Clearchus and four of the other generals, who were put to death. After this, Tissaphernes annoyed and harassed the Greeks in their march, without, however, seriously impeding it, till they reached the Carduchian Mountains, at which point he gave up the pursuit. Not long after, Tissaphernes, as a reward for his great services, was invested by the king, in addition to his own satrapy, with all the authority which Cyrus had enjoyed in Western Asia. On his arrival he claimed dominion over the Ionian cities, which applied to Sparta for aid. Their request was granted, and the Spartans carried on war against Tissaphernes with success for some years under the command successively of Thimbron, Dercyllidas, and Agesilaus (400–395). The continued want of success on the part of Tissaphernes led to grievous complaints against him, and the charges were transmitted to court, where they were backed by all the influence of Parysatis, eager for revenge on the enemy of Cyrus, her favourite son. The result was that Tithraustes was commissioned by the king to put Tissaphernes to death and to succeed him in his government, which was accordingly done (395). (Thuc. viii.; Xen. Hell. i. 1, 2, 5, iii. 1, 2, 4, Anabasis; Diod. xiii. 46, xiv. 23–27, 80.)

Titane (Τίταν), a town of Sicyonia, between Sicyon and Phlius (Paus. ii. 11, 3, ii. 27, 1; Steph. Byz. s.v.).

Titānes (Τιτάνες, sing. Τίτάν, Ion. Τίτηνες; fem. Τίτανίδες, sing. Τίτανίς). 1. The sons and daughters of Uranus and Ge or Gaea (the Earth), originally dwelt in heaven, whence they are called Οὐρανίους or Οὐρανίδαι. They were twelve or thirteen in number, who fall generally into pairs, viz.: Oceanus and Tethys = the sea; Hyperion and Theia = sun and moon; Coeus and Phoebe = light or star deities; Creios and Eurybia = deities of strength; Cronus and Rhea = heaven and earth; Themis and Mnemosyne, and Iapetus, who is to produce mankind (Hes. Th. 133; Apollod. i. 1, 3). It is said that Uranus, the first ruler of the world, threw his sons, the Hecatoncheires (Hundred-Handed)—Briareus, Cottys, Gyes—and the Cyclopes—Arges, Steropes, and Brontes—into Tartarus. Gaea, indignant at this, produced iron, persuaded the Titans to rise against their father, and gave to Cronus an iron sickle. They did as their mother bade them, with the exception of Oceanus. Cronus, with his sickle, mutilated his father. [For this myth, see URANUS.] From the drops of his blood there arose the Erinnyes, Alecto, Tisiphone, and Megaera. The Titans then deposed Uranus, liberated their brothers who had been cast into Tartarus, and raised Cronus to the throne. But Cronus hurled the Cyclopes back into Tartarus, and married his sister Rhea. Having been warned by Gaea and Uranus that he should be dethroned by one of his own children, he swallowed successively his children Hestia, Demeter, Hera, Pluto, and Poseidon. Rhea therefore, when she was pregnant with Zeus, went to Crete, and gave birth to the child in the Dictaeon Cave, where he was brought up by the Curetes. When Zeus had grown up he availed himself of the assistance of Thetis, the daughter of Oceanus, who gave to Cronus a potion which caused him to bring up the stone and the children he had swallowed. [ZEUS; CRONUS.] United with his brothers and sisters, Zeus now began the contest against Cronus and the ruling Titans. This contest (usually called the Titanomachia) was carried on in Thessaly, Cronus and the Titans occupying Mount Othrys, and the sons of Cronus Mount Olympus. It lasted ten years, till at length Gaea promised victory to Zeus if he would deliver the Cyclopes and Hecatoncheires from Tartarus. Zeus accordingly slew Campe, who guarded the Cyclopes, and the latter furnished him with thunder and lightning. The Titans then were overcome, and hurled down into a cavity below Tartarus, and the Hecatoncheires were set to guard them. (Hes. Th. 617, 697, 851; Apollod. i. 2, 1; Paus. viii. 37, 8; cf. Il. xiv. 279.) It must be observed that the fight of the Titans is sometimes confounded by ancient writers with the fight of the Gigantes. [GIGANTES.]—This myth of the Titans grew out of an attempt to reconcile the Greek religion with those of other non-Greek nations who had occupied the Greek lands before them. Hence many of its features (especially the account of the wounding of Uranus) are not of a Greek character, and are ignored by Homer, but preserved by Hesiod [see pp. 412, b, 425, a]. The Titan dynasties represent primitive alien supreme deities who have been brought into connexion with the supreme Zeus of the Greeks and the other Olympian deities. In the Greek conception of the story the Titans express the more terrible forces of nature, and also the struggle against the will of Zeus, i.e. against the lawful and orderly course of things (cf. Il. viii. 478, xiv. 200, xv. 224; Plat. Leg. iii. p. 701).—2. The name Titans is also given to those divine or semi-divine beings who were descended from the Titans, such as Prometheus, Hecate, Latona, Pyrrha, and especially Helios (the Sun) and Selene (the Moon), as the children of Hyperion and Thia, and even the descendants of Helios, such as Circe.

Titarēsīus (Tiraphaios; Xeraghi), a river of Thessaly, also called Europus, rising in Mt. Titarus, flowing through the country of the Perrhaebi, and falling into the Peneus, SE. of Phalanna. Its waters were impregnated with an oily substance, whence it was said to be a branch of the infernal Styx. (Strab. pp. 329, 421; Il. ii. 751.)

Tithōnus (Tithonōs), son of Laomedon and Strymo, and brother of Priam (Il. xx. 237). By the prayers of Eos (Aurora), who loved him, he obtained from the gods immortality, but not eternal youth, in consequence of which he became withered and shrunken in his old age; whence an old decrepit man was proverbially called Tithonus. As he could not die, Eos changed him into a cicada. (Hes. Th. 984; Hymn. ad Ven. 219; Apollod. iii. 12, 4; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 18; Hor. Od. i. 28, 8; Ov. Fast. i. 461.) [For the meaning of this and kindred myths about the Dawn, see EOS.]

Tithōréa. [NEON.]

Tithraustes (Tithraustēs), a Persian, who succeeded Tissaphernes in his satrapy, and put him to death by order of Artaxerxes Mnemon, B.C. 395. Being unable to make peace with Agesilaus, he sent Timocrates, the Rhodian, into Greece with fifty talents, to distribute among the leading men in the several states, in order to induce them to excite a war against Sparta at home. (Xen. Hell. iii. 4, 25; Diod. xiv. 80.)

Titianus, Jūlius, a Roman writer, was the father of the rhetorician Titianus, who taught the younger Maximinus. The elder Titianus may therefore be placed in the reigns of Commodus, Pertinax, and Severus. He was called the ape of his age, because he had imitated everything. All his works are lost. (Sidon. Ep. i. 1; Capitol. Maximin. 27, 5.)

Titinius, a Roman dramatist whose productions belonged to the department of the Comœdia Togata, is commended by Varro on account of the skill with which he developed the characters of the personages whom he brought upon the stage. It appears that he was younger than Caecilius, but older than Terence, and flourished about B.C. 170. (Varro, ap. Charis. i. 241.) The names of upwards of fourteen plays, together with a considerable number of short fragments, have been preserved by the grammarians.—Published in Ribbeck, Com. Lat.

Titius Septimius. [SEPTIMIUS.]

Titus Flavius Sabinus Vespasianus, Roman emperor, A.D. 79–81, commonly called by his praenomen Titus (also, with Imperator as a cognomen, Titus Caesar Imperator Vespasianus), was the son of the emperor Vespasianus and his wife Flavia Domitilla. He was born on the 30th of December, A.D. 40. When a young man he served as tribune militum in Britain and in Germany, with great credit. After having been quaestor, he had the command of a legion, and served under his father in the Jewish wars. Vespasian returned to Italy after he had been proclaimed emperor on the 1st of July, A.D. 69; but Titus remained in Palestine to prosecute the siege of Jerusalem, during which he showed the talents of a general and the daring of a soldier. The siege of Jerusalem was concluded by the capture of the place, on the 8th of September, 70. Titus returned to Italy in the following year (71), and triumphed at Rome with his father. He also received the title of Caesar, and became the associate of Vespasian in the government. Titus became attached to Berenice, the sister of Agrippa II., when he was in Judaea, and after the capture of Jerusalem she followed him to Rome with her brother, Agrippa. This attachment caused so much scandal and dissatisfaction among the Romans—not indeed from a sense of morality, but because they disliked her nationality and feared lest she should prevail upon Titus to marry her—that Titus yielded to the popular feeling and sent Berenice away from Rome after he became emperor. (Suet. Tit. 7; Dio Cass. lxi. 15, 18). Titus succeeded his father in 79, and his government proved an agreeable surprise to those who had anticipated a return of the times of Nero. He was idolised by his army (Tac. Hist. v. 1), but he had a reputation for severity, and even cruelty, and for licentiousness, which made the Romans regard him as unpromising. But Titus exerted himself in every way to win the affection of the people. He could control his passions, as he showed by his dismissal of Berenice, and he gave proofs of clemency by pardoning his brother, Domitian, who intrigued against him, and in a still more welcome and popular manner by checking delation: the informer was punished by scourging and exile (Suet. Tit. 8). He assumed the office of Pontifex Maximus after the death of his father, and with the purpose, as he declared, of keeping his hands free from blood (Suet. Tit. 9). It was recorded by his admirers that at the end of a day on which he had benefited no one by any gift, he exclaimed: 'I have lost a day'

(Suet. Tit. 8). It must be admitted that this often quoted saying, as well as another of his, 'No one should leave his prince's presence dissatisfied,' however conducive to popularity, points rather to lavish extravagance than to discretion. The first year of his reign is memorable for the great eruption of Vesuvius, which desolated a large part of the adjacent country, and buried with lava and ashes the towns of Herculaneum and Pompeii. Titus endeavoured to repair the ravages of this great eruption: he sent two consulars with money to restore the ruined towns, and he applied to this purpose the property of those who had been destroyed and had left no next of kin. At the beginning of the following year (80) there was a great fire at Rome, which lasted three days and three nights, and destroyed the Capitol, the library of Augustus, the theatre of Pompeius, and other public buildings, besides many houses. The emperor declared that he should consider all the loss as his own, and he set about repairing it with great activity: he took even the decorations of the imperial residences and sold them to raise money. The eruption of Vesuvius was followed by a dreadful pestilence, which the emperor sought all possible means to mitigate. His magnificence, too, was an important element in his popularity. In the same year (80) he completed the great amphitheatre called the Amphitheatrum Flavium (in a later age named the Colosseum: see p. 811), which had been begun by his father; and also the baths called the Baths of Titus. The dedication of these buildings was celebrated by spectacles which lasted 100 days; by a naval battle in the old naumachia, and fights of gladiators: on one day alone 5000 wild animals are said to have been exhibited, a number which we may reasonably suspect to be exaggerated. He died, of a fever, on the 18th day of September, 81, after a reign of two years and two months and twenty days. He was in the forty-first year of his age, and in the height of his popularity, called by Suetonius 'the darling of the whole world' ('amor et deliciae humani generis': Suet. Tit. 1; cf. Eutrop. vi. 14). It is possible that, had he lived on, this popularity might have waned: for he was spending lavishly, and probably unwisely, the treasures which the parsimony of Vespasian had gathered, and could not have continued either his display or his donations through a long life. Hence Ausonius says that he was 'felix imperii brevitatem'; but there is no reason, in spite of an ill-natured suggestion of Dio (that his supposed virtue was only luck: lxi. 18), to doubt the truth of his character for gentleness and clemency, to which both Suetonius and Tacitus bear testimony. (Suet. Titus; Tac. Hist. iv. 86.) To his popularity, as was natural, a single exception was furnished by the Jews, who recorded in their Talmud that his early death was a divine judgment, and added an absurd tradition of its cause. Titus left a daughter, Julia Sabina, married to Flavius Sabinus, a nephew of Vespasian.

Tītŷus (Τίτυός), son of Gaea, or of Zeus and Elara, the daughter of Orchomenus, was a giant in Euboea, and a type of incontinent passion. Instigated by Hera, he attempted to offer violence to Leto or Artemis (Latona), when she passed through Panopaeus to Pytho, but he was killed by the arrows of Artemis or Apollo; according to other accounts, Zeus destroyed him with a flash of lightning. He was cast into Tartarus, and there he lay outstretched on the ground, covering nine acres, with two vultures devouring his liver. (Od. vii. 324, xi. 576; Apollod. i. 4, 1; Hyg. Fab. 55; Paus. iii. 18, 9; Hor. Od. iii. 4, 77, iv. 6, 2.) His destruction by the arrows of Artemis and Apollo was represented on the throne of Apollo at Amyclae (Paus. x. 11, 1).

Tius or Tium (Τίος, Τίον), a seaport town of Bithynia, on the river Billaeus; a colony from Miletus, and the native place of Philetaerus, the founder of the Pergamene kingdom (Memn. 17; Mel. i. 19; Arr. Periplus p. 14).

Tlēpōlēmus (Τληπόλεμος), son of Heracles by Astyoche, daughter of Phylas, or by Astydamia, daughter of Amyntor. He was king of Argos, but, after slaying his uncle Licymnius, he was obliged to take to flight, and, in conformity with the command of an oracle, he settled in Rhodes, where he built the towns of Lindos, Ialysus, and Camirus. He joined the Greeks in the Trojan war with nine ships, but was slain by Sarpedon. (Il. ii. 658, v. 627; Diod. iv. 58, v. 59; Apollod. ii. 8, 2.)

Tlōs (Τλῶς, gen. Τλῶ: Τλῶεύς, Τλῶίτης: Ru. near Duver), a considerable city, in the interior of Lycia, about 2½ miles E. of the river Xanthus, on the road leading over M. Massicytus to Cibra (Strab. p. 665; Ptol. v. 3, 5; Steph. Byz. s. v.).

Tmārus. [TOMARUS.]

Tmōlus (Τμῶλος), god of Mt. Tmolus in Lydia, is described as the husband of Pluto (the daughter of Himantes) or of Omphale, and father of Tantalus, and is said to have decided the musical contest between Apollo and Pan (Apollod. ii. 6, 3; Ov. Met. ix. 157).

Tmōlus or Timōlus (Τμῶλος: Boz-Dagh), a celebrated mountain of Asia Minor, running E. and W. through the centre of Lydia, and dividing the plain of the Hermus, on the N., from that of the Cayster, on the S. At its E. end it joins M. Messogis, thus entirely enclosing the valley of the Cayster. On the W., after throwing out the NW. branch called Sipylus, it runs far out into the Aegean, forming, under the name of Mimas, the great Ionian peninsula, beyond which it is still further prolonged in the island of Chios. On its N. side are the sources of the Pactolus and the Cogamus; on its S. side those of the Cayster. It produced wine, saffron, zinc, and gold. (Il. ii. 373; Strab. p. 591; Aesch. Pers. 50; Hdt. i. 84; Verg. Georg. ii. 97.)

Togāta, Gallia. [GALLIA.]

Tolbiacum (Zulpich), a town of Gallia Belgica, on the road from Colonia Agrippina to Treviri (Tac. Hist. iv. 79).

Tolentinum (Tolinas, -ātis: Tolentino), a town of Picenum, on a height on the river Flusor (Chienti). (Plin. iii. 111.)

Tolerium, an ancient town of Latium, probably near Labicum. It was destroyed at an early period. (Dionys v. 61, viii. 17; Plut. Cor. 28.)

Tolenus or Telōnius (Turano), a river in the land of the Sabines, rising in the country of the Marsi and Aequi, and falling into the Velinus (Ov. Fast. vi. 565; Oros. v. 18).

Tolētum (Toledo), the capital of the Carpetani in Hispania Tarraconensis, situated on the river Tagus, which nearly encompasses the town, and upon seven hills. A tradition of the middle ages that it was founded by Jewish fugitives from Nebuchadnezzar may possibly point to an older popular belief in a Phoenician foundation. It was taken by the Romans under the proconsul M. Fulvius, B.C. 192, when it is described as a small but fortified town. It was celebrated in ancient as well as in modern times for the manufactory of swords; but it owed its greatness to the Gothic kings, who made it the capital of their dominions. (Liv. xxxv. 7, xxxix. 30; Ptol. ii. 6, 57; Plin. iii. 25.) It still contains many Roman remains.

Tolistobogi, Tolistoboji. [GALATIA.]

Tolmides (Τολμίδης), an Athenian commander, who cruised round the Peloponnesus in B.C. 455, took Naupactus from the Locrians, and settled the Messenians there. In 447 he was slain at Coroneia. (Thuc. i. 103, 108, 113; Diod. xi. 84, xii. 6; Paus. i. 27.)

Tōlōphōn (Τολοφών: Tolophōnios), a town of Locris, on the Corinthian gulf (Thuc. iii. 101; Steph. Byz. s. v.).

Tōlōsa (Toulouse), a town of Gallia Narbonensis, and the capital of the Tectosages, was situated on the Garumna, near the frontiers of Aquitania (Caes. B. G. i. 10, iii. 20). It was subsequently made a Roman colony, and was surnamed Palladia. It was a large and wealthy town, and contained a celebrated temple, in which great riches were deposited. In this temple there is said to have been preserved a great part of the booty taken by Brennus from the temple at Delphi (Strab. p. 188; cf. Just. xxxii. 3), which may have been brought back (if the story is true) by the Tectosages, who served in the army of Brennus. The town and temple were plundered by the consul Q. Servilius Caepio, in B.C. 106; but the subsequent destruction of his army and his own unhappy fate were regarded as a divine punishment for his sacrilegious act. Hence arose the proverb, Aurum Tolosanum habet. (Liv. Ep. 67; Oros. v. 15, Gell. iii. 19; cf. Cic. N. D. iii. 30.) There are the ruins of a small amphitheatre and some other Roman remains at the modern town.

Tōlumnīus, Lar, king of the Veientes, to whom Fidenae revolted in B.C. 438, and at whose instigation the inhabitants of Fidenae slew the four Roman ambassadors who had been sent to Fidenae to inquire into the reasons of their recent conduct. Statues of these ambassadors were placed on the Rostra at Rome, where they continued till a late time. In the war which followed, Tolumnius was slain in single combat by Cornelius Cossus, who dedicated his spoils in the temple of Jupiter Feretrius, the second of the three instances in which the spolia opima were won. (Liv. iv. 17-19; Cic. Phil. ix. 2.)

Tōmī or Tōmīs (Τόμοι, Τόμης: Томаи, Томи), a town of Thrace (subsequently Moesia), situated on the W. shore of the Euxine, and at a later time the capital of Scythia Minor. According to tradition (derived partially from the name of the town) it was called Tomi (from τέμνω, 'cut'), because Medea here cut to pieces the body of her brother Absyrtus. It is said to have been a colony of the Milesians. It is renowned as the place of Ovid's banishment. (Ov. Trist. iii. 9, 33; Apollod. i. 9, 25; Hyg. Fab. 13; Strab. p. 319.)

Tōmōrus or Tmarus (Τόμορος, Τμάρος: To-maro), a mountain in Epirus, in the district Molossia, between the lake Pambotis and the river Arachthus, near Dodona. [DODONA.]

Tōmŷris (Τόμυρις), a queen of the Massagetae, who dwelt south of the Araxes (Jaxartes), by whom Cyrus was slain in battle, B.C. 529 (Hdt. i. 205-214; CYRUS).

Tōrōnē (Τορώνη: Topanaïos), a town of Macedonia, in the district Chalcidice, and on the SW. side of the peninsula Sithonia, from which the gulf between the peninsulas Sithonia and Pallene was called Sinus Toronaicus (Hdt. vii. 122; Thuc. iv. 110; Liv. xlv. 12; Tac. Ann. v. 10).

Torquātus, the name of a patrician family of the Manlia Gens. 1. T. Manlius Imperiosus Torquatus, the son of L. Manlius Capitolinus Imperiosus, dictator B.C. 363, was a favourite hero of Roman legendary story. Manlius is said to have been dull of mind in his youth, and was brought up by his father in the closest retirement in the country. When the tribune M. Pomponius accused the elder Manlius in B.C. 362, on account of the cruelties he had practised in his dictatorship, he endeavoured to excite an odium against him by representing him at the same time as a cruel father. As soon as the younger Manlius heard of this, he hurried to Rome, obtained admission to Pomponius early in the morning, and compelled the tribune, by threatening him with instant death if he did not take the oath, to swear that he would drop the accusation against his father. In 361 Manlius served under the dictator T. Quintius Pennus in the war against the Gauls, and in this campaign earned immortal glory by slaying in single combat a gigantic Gaul. From the dead body of the barbarian he took the chain (torques) which had adorned him, and placed it around his own neck, and from this circumstance he obtained the surname of Torquatus. He was dictator in 353, and again in 349. He was also three times consul: namely, in 347, 344, and in 340. In the last of these years Torquatus and his colleague, P. Decius Mus, gained the great victory over the Latins at the foot of Vesuvius which established for ever the supremacy of Rome over Latium. [DECIVS.] Shortly after the battle, when the two armies were encamped opposite to one another, the consuls published a proclamation that no Roman should engage in single combat with a Latin on pain of death. Notwithstanding this proclamation, the young Manlius, the son of the consul, provoked by the insults of a Tusculan noble, Mettius Geminus, accepted his challenge, slew his adversary, and bore the spoils in triumph to his father. The consul would not overlook this breach of discipline, and the unhappy youth was executed in presence of the assembled army. This severe sentence rendered Torquatus an object of detestation among the Roman youths as long as he lived, and the recollection of his severity was preserved by the expression Manliana imperia. (Liv. iv. 5, 19-28, viii. 3-12; Cic. Off. iii. 31, Fin. i. 7, ii. 19, Tusc. iv. 22; Gell. i. 13.)

—2. T. Manlius Torquatus, consul B.C. 235, when he conquered the Sardinians; censor 231; and consul a second time in 224. He possessed the hereditary sternness and severity of his family; and we accordingly find him opposing in the senate the ransom of those Romans who had been taken prisoners at the battle of Cannae. In 217 he was sent into Sardinia, where he carried on the war with success against the Carthaginians and the Sardinians. He was dictator in 210. (Liv. xxii. 60, xxiii. 40, xxvi. 22, xxvii. 33, xxx. 39.)—3. T. Manlius Torquatus, consul 165 with Cn. Octavius. He also inherited the severity of his ancestors; of which an instance is related in the condemnation of his son, who had been adopted by D. Junius Silanus. [SILANUS, No. 2.]—4. L. Manlius Torquatus, consul B.C. 65 with L. Aurelius Cotta. Torquatus and Cotta obtained the consulship in consequence of the condemnation, on account of bribery, of P. Cornelius Sulla and P. Autronius Paetus, who had been already elected consuls. After his consulship Torquatus obtained the province of Macedonia. He took an active part in suppressing the Catilinarian conspiracy in 63; and he also supported Cicero when he was banished in 58. (Sall. Cat. 18; Liv. Ep. 101; Dio Cass. xxxvi. 27; Cic. pro Sull. 4, 10, 12, 29.)—5. L. Manlius Torquatus, son of No. 4, accused of bribery (in 66) the consuls elect, P. Cornelius Sulla and P. Autronius Paetus, and thus secured the consulship for his father. He was closely connected with Cicero during the praetorship (65) and consulship (63) of the latter. In 62 he brought a second accusation against P. Sulla, whom he now charged with having been a party to both of Catiline's conspiracies. Sulla was defended by Hortensius and by Cicero in a speech which is still extant. Torquatus, like his father, belonged to the aristocratical party, and accordingly opposed Caesar on the breaking out of the Civil war in 49. He was praetor in that year, and was stationed at Alba with six cohorts. He subsequently joined Pompey in Greece, and in the following year (48) he had the command of Oricum intrusted to him, but was obliged to surrender both himself and the town to Caesar, who, however, dismissed Torquatus uninjured. After the battle of Pharsalia Torquatus went to Africa, and upon the defeat of his party in that country in 46 he attempted to escape to Spain along with Scipio and others, but was taken prisoner by P. Sittius at Hippo Regius and slain together with his companions. (Cic. pro Sull. 1, 8-12, ad Att. iv. 16, vii. 12, ix. 8; Caes. B. C. i. 24, iii. 11; Bell. Afr. 93.) Torquatus was well acquainted with Greek literature, and is praised by Cicero as a man well trained in every kind of learning. He belonged to the Epicurean school of philosophy, and is introduced by Cicero as the advocate of that school in his dialogue De Finibus, the first book of which is called Torquatus in Cicero's letters to Atticus.—6. Torquatus, addressed by Horace (Od. iv. 7, Ep. i. 5), is conjectured with some probability to be the C. Nonius Asprenas who assumed the name Torquatus when Augustus presented him with a golden torques on the occasion of his taking part in a 'Ludus Trojae' and meeting with an accident (Suet. Aug. 43, 56). Another theory is that he is the A. Torquatus mentioned in the Atticus of Nepos as having taken part in the campaign of Brutus and Cassius.

Torquatus Silanus. [SILANUS.]

Toxandri or Texuandri, a people in Gallia Belgica, between the Menapii and Morini, on the right bank of the Scaldis (Plin. iv. 106; Amm. Marc. xvii. 8).

Trābēa, Q., a Roman comic dramatist who occupies the eighth place in the Canon of Volcatius Sedigitus [SEDIGITUS]. The period when he flourished is uncertain, but he has been placed about B.C. 130. No portion of his works has been preserved with the exception of half a dozen lines quoted by Cicero. (Varr. ap. Charis. i. 241; Cic. Tusc. iv. 31, 67.)

Trachalus, Galerius, consul A.D. 68 with Silius Italicus, is frequently mentioned by his contemporary Quintilian, as one of the most distinguished orators of his age (Quint. x. 119; Tac. Hist. i. 83, 90, ii. 60).

Trāchis or Trāchin (Τραχίς, Ion. Τρηχίς, Τραχίς: Τραχίνιος). 1. Also called Heraclea Trachiniae, or Heraclea Phthiotidis, or simply Heraclea (Ἡράκλεια ἡ ἐν Τραχίναϊς, or Ἡ. ἡ ἐν Τραχίνι), a town of Thessaly in the district Malis, celebrated as the residence of Heracles for a time. Heraclea was taken by Glabrio in B.C. 191. (Hdt. vii. 176; Strab. p. 428; Thuc. iii. 92; Diod. xii. 177; cf. Il. ii. 682; Soph. Trachiniae, Liv. xxxvi. 24.)—2. A town of Phocis, on the frontiers of Boeotia, and on the slope of Mt. Helicon in the neighbourhood of Lebadea (Strab. p. 423; Paus. x. 3, 2).

Trachonitis or Trachon (Τραχωνίτις, Τράχων), the N. district of Palestine beyond the Jordan, lay between Antilibanus and the mountains of Arabia, and was bounded on the N. by the territory of Damascus, on the E. by Auranitis, on the S. by Ituraea, and on the W. by Gaulanitis. It was for the most part a sandy desert, intersected by two ranges of rocky mountains, called Trachōnes (Τραχῶνες), the caves in which gave refuge to numerous bands of robbers. For its political relations under the Asmonaeans and Idumaeans princes, see PALAESTINA.

Traens, or Trais (Trionto), a river of Brutium, on which the Sybarites were defeated by the Crotoniates about 510 B.C. [SYBARIS.]

Tragia, Tragiae, or Tragias (Τραγία, Τραγίαί, Τραγίας), a small island (or more than one) in the Aegæan sea, near Samos, probably between it and Pharmacussa, where Pericles gained a naval victory over the Samians, B.C. 439 (Thuc. i. 116; Plut. Per. 95; Strab. p. 635).

Tragurium (Trau or Troghe), a town of Dalmatia, in Illyricum, celebrated for its marble, and situated on an island connected with the mainland by means of a mole (Pol. xxxii. 18; Strab. pp. 124, 315).

Trajanópolis. 1. (Orichovo), a town in the interior of Thrace, on the Hebrus, founded by Trajan (Ptol. iii. 11, 13; Procop. Aed. iv. 11).—2. A town of Cilicia. [SELINUS].—3. A town in Mysia, on the borders of Phrygia (Ptol. v. 2, 14). It was a city of the Grimenothyritæ, and was refounded and renamed by Trajan in 119 A.D. Its site is fixed by Ramsay at Giaour Euren = 'Infidel Ruins,' six miles E. of Ushak.

Trajanus, M. Ulpius, Roman emperor A.D. 98–117, was born at Italica, near Seville, September 18, 52 or 53 A.D. He was trained to arms, and, after ten years' service as military tribune, rose through the lower offices to the rank of praetor in 85, served with distinction in the East and in Germany, to which country he was sent from Spain by Domitian on the occasion of the revolt of Antonius Saturninus, legatus with the Spanish legion Adjutrix under his command. He was consul in 91, and at the close of 97 he was adopted by the emperor Nerva, who gave him the rank of Caesar and the names of Nerva and Germanicus, and shortly after the title of Imperator, and the tribunitia potestas. His style and title after his elevation to the imperial dignity were Imperator Caesar Nerva Trajanus Augustus. He was the first emperor who was born out of Italy. Nerva died in January 98, and was succeeded by Trajan, who was then at Cologne. His accession was hailed with joy, and he did not disappoint the expectations of the people. He was a great soldier both in the field and in military organisation: and he was scarcely less great as an administrator. His finances were prosperous, partly from his good economy, though partly also from the good fortune of Dacian mining operations. Personally, he was strong and healthy, of a majestic appearance, laborious, and inured to fatigue. Though not a man of letters, he had good sense, a knowledge of the world, and a sound judgment. His mode of living was very simple, and in his campaigns he shared all the sufferings and privations of the soldiers, by whom he was both loved and feared. He was a friend to justice, and he had a sincere desire for the happiness of the people. Trajan did not return to Rome for some months, being employed in settling the frontiers on the Rhine and the Danube. Especially, he completed the fortifications of the Rhine and of the Agri Decumates, founded a new military station, Colonia Trajana, near Vetera, and constructed new roads by the Rhine and by the Danube, the latter work in preparation for the Dacian war. In 99 he proceeded to Rome, which he entered on foot, accompanied by his wife, Pompeia Plotina. In March 101 A.D. Trajan left Rome for his campaign against the Daci. Decebalus, king of the Daci, had compelled Domitian to purchase peace by an annual payment of money; and Trajan determined on hostilities, which should settle matters so as to secure the peace of the frontier. This war employed Trajan between two and three years, but it ended with the defeat of Decebalus, who sued for peace at the feet of the Roman emperor. Trajan assumed the name of Dacius, and entered Rome in triumph (103). In the following year (104) Trajan commenced his second Dacian war against Decebalus, who had accepted the Roman terms merely to gain time, and now showed his intentions by building forts, collecting war material, and welcoming Roman deserters. Decebalus was completely defeated, and put an end to his life (106). In the course of this war Trajan built (105) a permanent bridge across the Danube at the modern Turn Severin. The piers were of stone and of an enormous size, but the arches were of wood. After the death of Decebalus Dacia was reduced to the form of a Roman province, strong forts were built in various places, and Roman colonies were planted. [DACIA.] The Column of Trajan at Rome was erected to commemorate his Dacian victories. In its sculptured illustration of the campaign it has a historical value which has been well compared to that of the Bayeux tapestry. On his return Trajan had a triumph, and he exhibited games to the people for 123 days. It is said that 11,000 animals were slaughtered during these amusements, and that 10,000 gladiators fought in the arena.—About this time Arabia Petraea was subjected to the empire by A. Cornelius Palma, the governor of Syria, and an Indian embassy came to Rome. [ARABIA.] The dominions of Agrippa II., who died A.D. 100, were also added to the province of Syria. In 114 Trajan left Rome to make war on the Armenians and the Parthians, the cause of the war being that the Parthian king, Chosroes, had deposed from the throne of Armenia Axidares, the Roman nominee. Trajan spent the winter of 114 at Antioch, and in the following year he invaded the Parthian dominions. The most striking and brilliant success attended his arms. In the course of two campaigns (115–116), he conquered the greater part of the Parthian empire, and took the Parthian capital of Ctesiphon. In 116 he descended the Tigris and entered the Erythraean Sea (the Persian Gulf). While he was thus engaged the Parthians rose against the Romans, but were again subdued by the generals of Trajan, Erucius Clarus, who reduced Babylonia and burnt Seleucia, and Lusius Quietus, who reduced Mesopotamia. On his return to Ctesiphon, Trajan determined to give the Parthians a king, and placed the diadem on the head of Parthamaspatēs, son of Chosroes. In 117 Trajan fell ill, and as his complaint grew worse he set out for Italy. He lived to reach Selinus in Cilicia, afterwards called Trajanopolis, where he died in August, 117, after a reign of nineteen years, six months, and fifteen days. [For his death in this city, and not, as Eutropius says, at Seleucia, see C. I. L. vi. 1884.] His ashes were taken to Rome in a golden urn, carried in triumphal procession, and deposited under the column which bears his name. He left no children, and he was succeeded by Hadrian. [HADRIANUS.] Trajan constructed several great roads in the provinces and in Italy: among them was the road across the Pomptine Marshes, which he constructed with magnificent bridges over the streams. At Ostia he built a large new basin. At Rome he constructed the aqueduct called by his name, built a theatre in the Campus Martius and, above all, made the Forum Trajanum, with its basilicas and libraries, and his column in the centre.

Trajāni Portus. [CENTUM CELLAE.]

Trajectum (Utrecht), a town of the Batavi on the Rhine, called at a later time Trajectus Rheni, or Traj. ad Rhenum.

Tralles or Trallis (αἱ Τραλλεῖς, ἡ Τράλλις; Τραλλιανός, Tralliānos: Ghiuzel-Hisar, Ru., near Aidin), a flourishing commercial city of Lydia, in Asia Minor. It stood on a plateau at the S. foot of Mt. Messogis (with a citadel on a higher point), on the banks of the little river Endon, a N. tributary of the Maeander, from which the city was distant 80 stadia (8 geogr. miles). It was said to have been founded by Argives and Thracian settlers on the site of an older town called Anthea. (Strab. p. 648; Diod. xvii. 65; Steph. Byz. s.v.) Under the Seleucidae it bore the names of Seleucia and Antiochia.

Tranquillus, Suetōnius. [SUETONIUS.]

Transcellensis Mons, a mountain of Mauretania Caesariensis, between Caesarea and the river Chinalaph (Amm. Marc. xxix. 5).

Trapezopolis (Τραπεζούπολις), a town of Phrygia, on the S. slope of Mt. Cadmus. Its site was near the modern Assar and Kadi Keni.

Trapezūs (Τραπεζοῦς; Τραπεζούντιος and -ούσιος). 1. (Near Mavria), a city of Arcadia, on the Alpheus, the name of which was mythically derived from the τράπεζα, or altar, on which Lycaon was said to have offered human sacrifices to Jove. At the time of the building of Megalopolis, the inhabitants of Trapezus, as was alleged, rather than be transferred to the new city, migrated to the shores of the Euxine, and their city fell to ruin. (Paus. viii. 3, 2; Apollod. iii. 8, 1; Hdt. vi. 127.)—2. Tarabosan, Trabezun, or Trebizond, a colony of Sinope, at almost the extreme E. of the N. shore of Asia Minor. The city derived its name either from the table-like plateau on which it was built, or because emigrants from the Arcadian Trapezus took some part in its settlement (Paus. xiii. 27, 4). The former is the more likely statement, since there is no reason why the main body of colonists from Sinope should have given it the name of another town. After Sinope lost her independence, Trapezus belonged, first to Armenia Minor, and afterwards to the kingdom of Pontus. Under the Romans, it was made a free city, probably by Pompey, and, by Trajan, the capital of Pontus Cappadocia. Hadrian constructed a new harbour; and the city became a place of first-rate commercial importance. It was also strongly fortified (Tac. Ann. xiii. 39, Hist. iii. 47; Strab. pp. 309, 320, 499, 548). It was taken by the Goths in the reign of Valerian; but it had recovered, and was in a flourishing state at the time of Justinian, who repaired its fortifications (Zosim. i. 33; Procop. Aed. iii. 7). In the middle ages it was for some time the seat of a fragment of the Greek empire, called the empire of Trebizond.

Trāsīmēnus Lacus (Lago di Perugia, or L. Trasimeno), sometimes, but not correctly, written Thrasymēnus, a lake in Etruria, between Clusium and Perusia, memorable for the victory gained by Hannibal over the Romans under Flaminius, B.C. 217, at a point where the hills from Cortona extend to the margin of the lake (Liv. xxii. 4; Strab. p. 226; Ov. Fast. vi. 770).

Trausi (Τραυσολ), a Thracian people who dwelt on the SE. of Mt. Rhodope (Hdt. v. 3, 4; Liv. xxxviii. 41).

Treba (Trebanus: Trevi), a town in Latium near the sources of the Anio, NE. of Anagnina. (Plin. iii. 64; Ptol. iii. 1, 62).

Trebātius Testa. [TESTA.]

Trebellius Pollio. [SCRIPTORES HISTORIAE AUGUSTAE.]

Trebia (Trebbia), a small river in Gallia Cisalpina, falling into the Po near Placentia. It is memorable for the victory which Hannibal gained over the Romans, B.C. 218. This river is generally dry in summer, but is filled with a rapid stream in winter, which was the season when Hannibal defeated the Romans. (Pol. iii. 66–74; Liv. xxi. 52–56; Strab. p. 217; Lucan, ii. 46; Eutrop. iii. 9; Flor. ii. 6, 12.)

Trebōnius, C., played rather a prominent part in the last days of the republic. He commenced public life as a supporter of the aristocratical party, and in his quaestorship (B.C. 60) he attempted to prevent the adoption of P. Clodius into a plebeian family. (Cic. ad Fam. xv. 21.) He changed sides soon afterwards, and in his tribunate of the plebs (55) he was the instrument of the triumvirs in proposing that Pompey should have the two Spains, Crassus Syria, and Caesar the Gauls and Illyricum for another period of five years. This proposal received the approbation of the comitia, and is known by the name of the Lex Trebonia. For this service he was rewarded by being appointed one of Caesar's legates in Gaul, where he remained till the breaking out of the Civil war in 49. In the course of the same year he was intrusted by Caesar with the command of the land forces engaged in the siege of Massilia. (Caes. B.G. v. 24, vi. 40, B.C. i. 36, ii. 1; Dio Cass. xli. 19.) In 48 Trebonius was city-praetor, and in the discharge of his duties resisted the seditious attempts of his colleague, M. Caelius Rufus, to obtain by force the repeal of Caesar's law respecting the payment of debts. Towards the end of 47, Trebonius, as propraetor, succeeded Q. Cassius Longinus in the government of Further Spain, but was expelled from the province by a mutiny of the soldiers who espoused the Pompeian party. Caesar raised him to the consulship in October, 45, and promised him the province of Asia. (Dio Cass. xliii. 29, 46.) In return for all these honours and favours, Trebonius was one of the prime movers in the conspiracy to assassinate Caesar, and after the murder of his patron (44) he went as proconsul to the province of Asia. In the following year (43) Dolabella, who had received from Antonius the province of Syria, surprised the town of Smyrna, where Trebonius was then living, and slew him in his bed. (Dio Cass. xlvii. 21-29; Plut. Brut. 19; App. B.C. ii. 118, 117, iii. 2, 26.)

Trebula (Trebulanus). 1. (Treglia), a town of Campania, N. of the Volturnus, in the mountain tract which extends from Calatia (Cajazzo) to the Via Latina. It received the Roman franchise in 303 B.C. (Liv. x. i.).—2. Mutusca, a town of the Sabines, called by Virgil simply Mutuscae (Verg. Aen. vii. 711; Plin. iii. 108). Its site is at Monte Leone, on the right of the Via Salaria.—3. Suffenas, also a town of the Sabines, of uncertain site.

Trerus (Sacco), a river in Latium, and a tributary of the Liris.

Tres Tabernae. 1. A station on the Via Appia in Latium, between Aricia and Forum Appii (Cic. ad Att. ii. 12).—2. (Borghetto), a station in Gallia Cisalpina, on the road from Placentia to Mediolanum.

Tretum (Τρητόν: C. Bugiaroni, or Ras Seba Rous, i.e. Seven Capes), a great promontory on the coast of Numidia, forming the W. headland of the Sinus Olcachites (Bay of Storah).

Treviri or Trevēri, a powerful people in Gallia Belgica, who were faithful allies of the Romans, and whose cavalry was the best in all Gaul (Caes. B.G. iii. 11, iv. 10, vi. 32; Tac. Germ. 28). The river Mosella flowed through their territory, which extended westward from the Rhine as far as the Remi. Their chief town was made a Roman colony by Augustus, and was called Augusta Trevirorum (Trier or Trèves). It stood on the right bank of the Mosella, and became under the later empire one of the most flourishing Roman cities N. of the Alps. It was the capital of Belgica Prima; and after the division of the Roman world by Diocletian (A.D. 292) into four districts, it became the residence of the Caesar who had the government of Britain, Gaul, and Spain. Here dwelt Constantius Chlorus and his son Constantine the Great, as well as several of the subsequent emperors. The modern city still contains many interesting Roman remains. The most important of these remains is the Porta Nigra or Black Gate, a large and massive building in an excellent state of preservation. [Dict. of Ant. art. Portae.] In addition to this, there are extensive remains of the Roman baths, of the amphitheatre, and of the palace of Constantine. The piers of the bridge over the Moselle are likewise Roman.

Triarius, Valerius. 1. L., quaestor urbanus B.C. 81; and propraetor in Sardinia 77, when he repulsed Lepidus, who had fled into that island after his unsuccessful attempt to repeal the laws of Sulla. Triarius served under Lucullus as one of his legates in the war against Mithridates, and at first gained considerable distinction by his zeal and activity. In 68 Triarius was despatched to the assistance of Fabius, who had been intrusted with the defence of Pontus while Lucullus invaded Armenia, and who was now attacked by Mithridates with overwhelming numbers. Triarius compelled Mithridates to assume the defensive, and early in the following year he commenced active operations against the Pontic king. Anxious to gain the victory over Mithridates before the arrival of Lucullus, Triarius allowed himself to be attacked at a disadvantage, and was defeated with great slaughter near Zela. (App. Mithr. 88, 112, 120; Plut. Pomp. 35; Dio Cass. xxxv. 10-12.)—2. P., son of the preceding, accused M. Aemilius Scaurus, in 54, first of repetundae and next of ambitus. Scaurus was defended on both occasions by Cicero (Cic. pro Scaur. 1, 2, ad Att. iv. 16, 17).—3. C., a friend of Cicero, who introduces him as one of the speakers in his dialogue De Finibus, and praises his oratory in his Brutus. He fought on Pompey's side at the battle of Pharsalia. Triarius perished in the civil wars, probably in Africa, for Cicero speaks in 45 of his death, and adds that Triarius had left him the guardian of his children (Caes. B.C. iii. 5, 92; Cic. ad Att. xii. 28).

Triballi, a powerful people in Thrace, a branch of the Getae dwelling along the Danube, who were defeated by Alexander the Great, B.C. 335, and obliged to sue for peace (Hdt. iv. 49; Thuc. iv. 101; Arr. An. 1, 2; Strab. p. 317).

Tribocci, a German people, settled in Gallia Belgica, between M. Vogesus and the Rhine, in the neighbourhood of Strasbourg (Caes. B. G. i. 51, iv. 10; Strab. p. 193; Ptol. ii. 9, 17).

Tribonianus, a jurist, commissioned by Justinianus, with sixteen others, to compile the Digest or Pandect. For details see JUSTINIANUS.

Tricāla. [TRICOCALA.]

Tricarānon (Τρικάρανον: Τρικαρανέως), a fortress in Phlissia, SE. of Phlius, on a mountain of the same name.

Tricasses, Tricassii, Tricassini, a people in Gallia Lugdunensis, E. of the Senones, whose chief town was Augustobona, afterwards Tricassae (Troyes). (Plin. iv. 107; Ptol. ii. 8, 13.)

Tricastini, a people in Gallia Narbonensis, between the Cavares and Vocontii, inhabiting a narrow slip of country between the Drôme and the Isère, on the banks of the Isère. They were to the N. of the Vocontii, and Hannibal, in his march from the 'Island' near Valence to the place where he crossed the Alps (as was said above, either the M. Genève or the Col d'Argentière: probably the former; see ALPES, HANNIBAL), passed first through the country of the Tricastini, then through that of the Vocontii, then through that of the Tricorii (Liv. xxi. 34; Ptol. ii. 10, 13). Their chief town was Augusta Tricastinorum, or simply Augusta (Aouste).

Tricca, subsequently Tricāla (Τρίκκη, Τρίκαλα: Trikkala), an ancient town of Thessaly in the district Hestiaiotis, situated on the Lethaeus, N. of the Peneus. Homer represents it as governed by the sons of Asclepius, and it contained in later times a celebrated temple of this god. (Il. ii. 729, iv. 202; Strab. p. 437; Liv. xxxii. 13.)

Trichōnis (Τριχωνίς: Vrakhori), a large lake in Aetolia, E. of Stratos and N. of Mt. Aracynthus.

Trichōnium (Τριχώνιον: Τριχωνιεύς), a town in Aetolia, E. of lake Trichonis (Strab. p. 450; Pol. iv. 3; Paus. ii. 37, 3).

Triciptinus, Lucrētius. [LUCRETIA GENS.]

Tricōlōni (Τρικόλωνι: Τρικολωνεύς), a town of Arcadia, a little N. of Megalopolis, of which a temple of Poseidon alone remained in the time of Pausanias (Paus. viii. 3, 4, viii. 27, 3).

Tricomia (Τρικωμία: Kaimaz), a town of the Trocnades (possibly a union of three villages) in Phrygia (but afterwards assigned to Galatia Salutaris), between Midaion and Pessinus (Ptol. v. 2, 22).

Tricorii, a people who dwelt on the river Drac, and whose chief town was probably the modern St. Bonnet, on the N. side of the Col Bayard, which leads to Gap (Vapincum). They dwelt S. of the Vocontii [see TRICASTINI].

Tricorythus (Τρικόρυθος: Τρικορύσιος), a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Aiantis, between Marathon and Rhamnus.

Tricrana (Τρίκρανα: Trikhiri), an island off the coast of Argolis, near Hermione (Paus. ii. 84, 8).

Tridentum (Trent, in Italian Trento), the capital of the Tridentini, and the chief town of Raetia, situated on the river Athesis (Adige), and on the pass of the Alps leading to Verona (Plin. iii. 180; Just. xx. 5). Its greatness dates from the middle ages, and it is chiefly celebrated on account of the ecclesiastical council which assembled within its walls, A.D. 1545.

Trières or Triēris (Τριήρης: Enfeh), a small fortress on the coast of Phoenicia, between Tripolis and the Prom. Theuprosopon (Pol v. 68; Strab. p. 754).

Trifanum, a town in Latium, between Minturnae and Sinuessa (Liv. viii. 11).

Trinacria. [SICILIA.]

Trinemeis or Trinemia (Τρινεμείς, Τρινέμεια: Trinemeús), a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Cecropis, on Mt. Parnes.

Trinobantes, one of the most powerful people of Britain, inhabiting the modern Essex. They are mentioned in Caesar's invasion of Britain, and they offered a formidable resistance to the invading force sent into the island by the emperor Claudius. (Caes. B. G. v. 20; Tac. Ann. xiv. 31.)

Triocāla or Tricāla (Τριόκαλα, Τρίκαλα: Triokālōnos, Tricalinus: nr. Calata Bellota), a mountain fortress in the interior of Sicily, near the Crimissus, was in the Servile war the headquarters of the slaves, and the residence of their leader Tryphon (Diod. xxxvi. 7; Cic. Verr. v. 4; Ptol. iii. 4, 14).

Triōpas (Τριόπας or Τρίοψ), son of Poseidon and Canace, a daughter of Aeolus, or of Helios and Rhodos, and the father of Iphimedia and Erysichthon. Hence, his son Erysichthon is called Triopēus, and his granddaughter Mestra or Metra, the daughter of Erysichthon, Triopēis. Triopas expelled the Pelasgians, or original inhabitants, from the district of Dotium (Dotius Campus), S. of Ossa in Thessaly, but was himself obliged to emigrate, and went to Caria, where he founded Cnidus on the Triopian promontory. (Hdt. i. 174; Diod. v. 56; Apollod. i. 7, 4; Ov. Met. viii. 751.) His son Erysichthon was punished by Demeter with insatiable hunger, because he had violated her sacred grove; but the same story is also told of Triopas himself. [ERYSICHTHON.]

Triōpīa or Triōpīon, an early name of CNIDUS.

Triōpīum (Τριόπιον: C. Krio), the promontory which terminates the peninsula of Cnidus, forming the SW. headland of Caria and of Asia Minor. Upon it was a temple of Apollo, sur-named Triopius, which was the centre of union for the states of DORIS. Hence it was also called the Sacred Promontory. (Thuc. viii. 35, 60; Mel. i. 16; Steph. Byz. s.v.)

Triphylia (Τριφυλία: Triphylia), the S. portion of Elis, lying between the Alpheus and the Neda, is said to have derived its name from the three different tribes by which it was peopled. [ELIS.] Its chief town was PYLOS.

Tripodiscus (Τριποδίσκος: Tripodiskios: nr. Derueni, Ru.), a town in the interior of Megaris, NW. of Megara, and at the foot of Mt. Geraneia (Thuc. iv. 70; Strab. p. 394; Paus. i. 43, 8).

Tripōlis (Τρίπολις: Tripolitis) is properly the name of a confederacy composed of three cities, or a district containing three cities, but it is also applied to single cities which had some such relation to others as to make the name appropriate. 1. In Arcadia, comprising the three cities of Callia, Dipena, and Nonacris: its name is preserved in the modern town of Tripolitsa. [ARCADIA.]—2. T. Pelagonia, in Thessaly, comprising the three towns of Azorus, Doliche, and Pythium (Liv. xlii. 53).—3. In Rhodes, comprising the three Dorian cities, Lindus, Ialysus, and Camirus. [RHODUS.]—4. (Derebol), a city of Lydia, on the Maeander, twelve miles W. of Hierapolis, on the road from Sardis to Laodicea (Ptol. v. 2, 18; Hierocl. p. 669).—5. (Tireboli), a fortress on the coast of Pontus, on a river of the same name (Tireboli Su), ninety stadia E. of the Prom. Zephyrium (C. Zefreh).—6. (Tri-poli, Tarabulus), on the coast of Phoenicia, consisted of three distinct cities, one stadium (600 feet) apart, each having its own walls, but all united in a common constitution, having one place of assembly, and forming in reality one city. They were colonies of Tyre, Sidon, and Aradus respectively. Tripolis stood about thirty miles S. of Aradus, and about the same distance N. of Byblus, on a bold headland formed by a spur of Mt. Lebanon. It had a fine harbour, and a flourishing commerce. (Ptol. v. 15, 4; Strab. p. 754; Diod. xvi. 41).—7. The district on the N. coast of Africa, between the two Syrtes, comprising the three cities of Sabrata (or Abrotonum), Oea, and Leptis Magna, and also called Tripolitana Regio. [SYRTICA.] Its name is preserved in that of the regency of Tripoli, the W. part of which answers to it, and in that of the city of Tripoli, probably the ancient Oea.

Tripolitāna Regio. [SYRTICA: TRIPOLIS, No. 7.]

Triptōlēmus (Τριπτόλεμος), a local hero of Eleusis (in which character he appears in the Homeric Hymn to Demeter), and worshipped there as a deity connected with the sowing of corn. He is described in the Attic story as son of Celeus, king of Eleusis, and Metanira. Other legends describe him as son of king Eleusis by Cothonea, or of Oceanus and Gaea, or of Trochilus by an Eleusinian woman; or his father is Rarus (cf. the Rarian plain) or Dysaules. (Paus. i. 14, 2; Hymn. in Cer. 153; Apollod. i. 5, 2; Hyg. Fab. 147; Serv. ad Georg. i. 19.) By the Latin poets he is commonly regarded as the inventor of the plough (Verg. Georg. i. 19); but it is doubtful if this was the original conception of him. According to the most familiar Attic legend, Celeus, the father of Triptolemus, Eubulus, Diocles, and Demophon or Demophoon, hospitably received Demeter at Eleusis, when she was wandering in search of her daughter. The goddess, in return, wished to make his son Demophon immortal, and placed him in the fire in order to destroy his mortal parts; but Metanira screamed out at the sight, and the child was consumed by the flames. As a compensation for this bereavement, the goddess gave to Triptolemus a chariot with winged dragons and seeds of wheat. In this chariot Triptolemus was borne over the earth, making man acquainted with the blessings of agriculture (Ov. Met. v. 646; Paus. i. 38, 6, vii. 18, 2, viii. 4, 1), and hence of laws and civilisation. [Dict. of Ant. art. Thesmophoria.] On his return to Attica, Celeus endeavoured to kill him, but by the command of Demeter he was obliged to give up his country to Triptolemus, who now established the worship of Demeter, and instituted the Thesmophoria (Apollod. l.c.).

This is not the version of the Homeric Hymn to Demeter (123, 474), which, as was said above, describes him as one of the heroic chiefs or princes of Eleusis, instructed by Demeter in her sacred rites: the legend which makes him son of Eleusis points to his local worship as hero or deity being ancient in that district. The period and reason of the introduction of Demophon and of the strengthening by fire are not very clear, nor why Triptolemus entirely took the place of Demophon as son of Celeus and favourite of Demeter; but the most natural inference is that the belief in Triptolemus as god of corn-sowing was a very old one, and that his story was altered when the worship of Demeter became supreme and he was fitted into the myth. In the vases of the fifth and fourth centuries B.C. Triptolemus is constantly represented in his winged chariot, sometimes drawn by serpents (symbols of the powers of the earth); and there is little doubt that the myth of Triptolemus primarily signified the introduction of corn-growing and its communication from one country to another. It has been suggested, with some probability, that the idea of Triptolemus as especially the god of ploughing arose from a confusion of him with Osiris, the god of ploughing, and a vase now at St. Petersburg is noticed which represents Triptolemus in his serpent-chariot starting from Egypt. In this view he becomes the ploughing god in the Alexandrian period (cf. Serv. ad Georg. i. 19). Whether his name should be connected in derivation with triple ploughing (τρίς, πολεῖν) is doubtful: there were certainly three sacred ploughings recognised by the Athenians corresponding to the three actual ploughings for certain crops; but, if the conjecture is right that he was not primarily the god of the plough, the connexion of sound may be accidental. On the other hand, it is quite possible that, though primarily the distributor of seed, he may in very early times have been the god of the culture which followed it, and have been named accordingly. He is represented on earlier vases in his chariot as a full-grown man with ears of corn in his hand, or like a king, with a sceptre; but in later art he is often a youth or a boy (as in Latin poets), an idea which perhaps was borrowed from that of Iacchus in the mysteries.

Tritaea (Τρίταια: Τριταίεος). 1. A town of Phocis, NW. of Cleonae, on the left bank of the Cephissus and on the frontiers of Locris (Thuc. iii. 101).—2. (Kastritz), one of the twelve cities of Achaia, 120 stadia E. of Pharae and near the frontiers of Arcadia. Augustus made it dependent upon Patrae. (Hdt. i. 145; Pol. ii. 41; Strab. p. 386; Paus. vii. 226.)

Tritō or Tritōgēnia. [ATHENE.]

Tritōn (Τρίτων), son of Poseidon and Amphitrite (or Celaeno), who dwelt with his father and mother in a golden palace in the bottom of the sea, or, according to Homer, at Aegae (Hes. Th. 930; Apollod. i. 4, 6). Later writers describe him as riding over the sea on horses or other sea-monsters. Sometimes we find mention of Tritons in the plural. Their appearance is differently described; though they are always conceived as having the human figure in the upper part of their bodies, and that of a fish in the lower part. The chief characteristic of Tritons in poetry as well as in works of art is a trumpet made out of a shell (concha), which the Tritons blow as they follow in the train of Poseidon (Ov. Met. i. 333). It is probable that Triton was once an independent sea-deity or impersonation of the sea, represented like the Phoenician fish-deities; and became a son and attendant of Poseidon when the worship of that deity prevailed everywhere as the supreme god of the sea.

Triton Fl., Tritōnis, or Tritonitis Palus (Τρίτων, Τριτωνίς, Τριτωνίτις), a river and lake on the Mediterranean coast of Libya, which are mentioned in several old Greek legends, especially in the mythology of ATHENE, whom one account represented as born on the lake Tritonis, and as the daughter of the nymph of the same name and of Poseidon: hence her surname of Τριτογένεια [see p. 138, b]. When the Greeks first became acquainted geographically with the N. coast of Africa, they identified the gulf afterwards called the Lesser SYRTIS with the lake Tritonis. This seems to be the notion of Herodotus, in the story he relates of Jason (iv. 178, 179; ARGONAUTAE). A more exact knowledge of the coast showed them a great lake beyond the inmost recess of the Lesser Syrtis, to which the name Tritonis was then applied. This lake had an opening to the sea, as well as a river flowing into it, and accordingly the geographers represented the river Triton as rising in a mountain, called Zuchabari, and forming the lake Tritonis on its course to the Lesser Syrtis, into which it fell. The lake is undoubtedly the great salt lake, in the S. of Tunis, now in great part dried up, called Sebkhat-Farun. Lucan (ix. 346) appears to make Tritonis the lake or the estuary of the river Lathon or Lethon in Cyrenaica. [LATHON.]

Trivium (Trivico), a small town in Samnium, situated among the mountains separating Samnium from Apulia, in the country of the Hirpini (Hor. Sat. i. 5, 79).

Troās (ἡ Τρωάς, sc. χῆρα, the fem. of the adj. Τρώς: Τρωαδῆος: Chan), the territory of Ilium or Troy, formed the NW. part of Mysia. It was bounded on the W. by the Aegean sea, from Pr. Lectum to Pr. Sigeum at the entrance of the Hellespont; on the NW. by the Hellespont, as far as the river Rhodius, below Abydos; on the NE. and E. by the mountains which border the valley of the Rhodius, and extend from its sources southwards to the main ridge of M. Ida, and on the S. by the N. coast of the Gulf of Adramyttium along the S. foot of Ida; but on the NE. and E. the boundary is sometimes extended so far as to include the whole coast of the Hellespont and part of the Propontis, and the country as far as the river Granicus, thus embracing the district of Dardania, and somewhat more. Strabo extends the boundary still further E., to the river Aesepus, and also S. to the Caicus; but this clearly results from his including in the territory of Troy that of her neighbouring allies. (Il. ix. 321, xxiv. 544; Hdt. vii. 42; Strab. pp. 581–616.) The Troad is for the most part mountainous, being intersected by M. Ida and its branches: the largest plain is that in which Troy stood. The chief rivers were the SATNOIS on the S., the RHODIUS on the N., and the Scamander (Mendere) with its affluent the Simois (Dombrek) in the centre. The last two, whose connexion with scenes in the Iliad gives them an importance beyond their size, are discussed more particularly under TROJA.

Trocmi or -ii. [GALATIA.]

Troēs. [TROAS.]

Troezen (Τροιζήν, more rarely Τροιζήνη: Τροιζήνιος: Dhamala), the capital of Troezenia (Τροιζηνία), a district in the SE. of Argolis on the Saronic gulf, and opposite the island of Aegina. The town was situated at some little distance from the coast, on which it possessed a harbour called Pōgōn (Πώγων), opposite the island of Calauria. Troezen was a very ancient city, and is said to have been originally called Poseidonia, on account of its worship of Poseidon. [CALAURIA.] The legend of a contest between Poseidon and Athene for the protectorship of Troezen, which ended in their agreeing to share it (hence both appear on the coins) probably arose from the fact that the worship of Athene was accepted side by side with the older worship of Poseidon. (Paus. ii. 30, 5.) Traditionally it received the name of Troezen from Troezen, one of the sons of Pelops; and it is celebrated in mythology as the place where Pittheus, the maternal grandfather of Theseus, lived, and where Theseus himself was born. In the Homeric age Troezen was for a long time dependent upon the kings of Argos (Il. ii. 56), and this dependence seems to have continued after the Dorian conquest of both towns (Paus. ii. 30, 9), but in the historical period it appears as an independent state. It was a city of some importance, for we read that the Troezenians sent five ships of war to Salamis and 1000 heavy-armed men to Plataea. When the Persians entered Attica the Troezenians distinguished themselves by the kindness with which they received the Athenians, who were obliged to abandon their city (Hdt. viii. 41; Plut. Them. 10.) The friendship continued till the Peloponnesian war, when the Troezenians allied themselves with Sparta (Thuc. ii. 56).

Trogilīae, three small islands, named Pylon, Argennon, and Sandalion, lying off the promontory of Trogilium. [MYCALE.]

Trogitis Lacus. [PISIDIA.]

Troglodytae (Τρωγλοδῦται, i.e. dwellers in caves), the name applied by the Greek geographers to various uncivilised people, who had no abodes but caves, especially to the inhabitants of the W. coast of the Red Sea, along the shores of Upper Egypt and Aethiopia (Hdt. iv. 183; Peripl. 2-7). The whole of this coast was called Troglodytice (Τρωγλοδυτική). (Agatharch. 61-63; Diod. iii. 32, 33.) There were also Troglodytae in Moesia, on the banks of the Danube. The Troglodytes of the W. coast of the Red Sea are described by Agatharchides as a barbarous people, who wore little clothing, had wives in common, and put to death the aged and infirm. They lived on the produce of their flocks and herds. In the Periplus the Ethiopian Troglodytes are described as of a wild appearance and swifter than horses. This swiftness of foot is noticed also by Herodotus as characterising the Ethiopian Troglodytes, and is said to be still a characteristic of the cave-dwellers in the same district. Herodotus adds that their language was like the twittering of bats, and that their food consisted of lizards and other reptiles.

Trogus, Pompeius. [JUSTINUS.]

Troilium. [TROSSULUM.]

Troilus (Τρωῖλος), son of Priam and Hecuba. He fell by the hand of Achilles. (Il. xxiv. 257; Verg. Aen. i. 474; Hor. Od. ii. 9, 16.)

Troja or Ilium (Τροία, Ἴλιον: Troy, Ruins at Hissarlik); also called Pergama (Πέργαμος, Περγάμων or Πέργαμα: Trōs, Trōs, fem. Trōas, Trojānus; also Tros and Trōius), a name properly applied only to the fortress or citadel of the town: the chief city of the Troad in the Homeric age, and the capital of the dominion ruled over by Priam. The site of Troy has been disputed from the time of Demetrius of Scepsis, in the second century B.C., who denied that the then existing Ilium stood on the site of the Homeric city, chiefly on the ground that the plain near Ilium Novum, required as a battle-ground, was a recent alluvial deposit. Modern geologists have shown that it is an error to regard this formation of land (to any important extent) as more recent than the Homeric age. Demetrius placed the site at Ἰλίου κάμνη (the village of the Ilions) three or four miles further up the Scamander. His views did not meet with general acceptance, and the Romans especially continued to look upon Ilium Novum as occupying the site of their supposed mother city. At the end of the last century, partly because Le Chevalier discovered a hot and cold spring near Bunarbashi which seemed to correspond to the springs mentioned in Il. xxii. 147, the hill called Bali Dag was fixed upon as the hill of Troy, and this view is still maintained by some scholars of great authority. Few disputed it at all till the excavations of Dr. Schliemann in 1871-1879 at Hissarlik, continued (latterly in conjunction with Dr. Dörpfeld) in 1882-1886, led him to revert to the oldest belief—that the site of Ilium Vetus, or the Homeric Troy, was the same as that of Ilium Novum. The question is not even now one upon which it is wise to pronounce dogmatically. The supporters of both views have in some cases pressed points of correspondence or divergence too far, but the objections to accepting the site at Bali Dag, near Bunarbashi, are much more serious than those which have been alleged against Hissarlik; and if it is admitted that the Homeric descriptions were written with considerable knowledge of the local features derived from tradition or from personal knowledge (and there is nothing to discuss if this is not admitted), but yet were written, not by a topographer, but by a poet with some poetical licence of exaggeration of scale, and of removing or creating some natural obstacles, the claim of Hissarlik to be regarded as the hill of Troy is fairly established. The map of the district given on p. 973 is taken from one constructed by Sir C. Wilson. The main features of the Homeric Troy and its neighbourhood are that the town, or its Acropolis, was situated on a hill near the Hellespont and looking to the island of Tenedos (Il. xiii. 33); the Greek camp was on the shores of the Hellespont, near the mouth of the Scamander or Xanthos (i.e. W. of Cape Rhoeteum), and with the river Scamander between it and the city of Troy (xiv. 31, xxiv. 350, 692); further, Troy was not a great distance from this shore, since the fighting goes on near the city and near the camp, backwards and forwards over the plain on the same day; Idaeus goes early in the morning to the camp and gets back to the assembly at Troy just after sunrise (vii. 381, 413), Priam drives in the night, eats and sleeps in Achilles' tent, and gets back to Troy at sunrise (xxiv. 366-695); the Simois joins the Scamander, and apparently on the N. side of the city (v. 774): that this plain reaches up to the neighbourhood of the citadel is clear from the description of the battle rolling up to the walls. There are other details of topography which do not affect the narrative and may be imaginary, though they have an appearance of local colouring about them. Such are the Scaean gates leading into the plain towards the Greek camp, and the two springs, one hot and the other cold, which break out near it (xxii. 147), and a rising ground or 'swelling of the plain' (θρῶς πεδίοιο) between the city and the camp (x. 160, xi. 56). [It must be confessed that this last detail is more likely to be imagined than to be carefully taken from nature.] As regards the sites mentioned, the Ἰλίου κώμη of Demetrius has nothing to recommend it. It is too distant from the sea, it stands near the swamps, and it has no ruins. It seems to have been chosen because date than can belong to the Homeric poems. The principal objections urged against Hissarlik were: (1) that it was not high enough to be the 'windy' Troy; (2) the plain is on the wrong side of the Scamander. As regards (1), the hill of Hissarlik rises from the plain to a height of 50-65 feet: now it must be recollected that the plain about it is destitute of high ground, and this isolated height might well be called 'lofty,' 'windy,' &c.; and it is just the sort of place which in those days was chosen for a citadel—the false theory of the coast having greatly advanced seemed to necessitate a site further inland, and the name was seized upon as evidence. Bali Dag, no doubt, is a commanding height, and well suited for a fortress, but it stands on hilly ground with no plain coming up to it: moreover it is about twelve miles from the Greek camp, which alone is a strong objection, however much it may be argued that poets can disregard distance and time: lastly, the only remains here and at Eski Hissarlik close by are walls which are of a much more recent near the sea and yet safe from pirates [cf. THYRS]. As regards (2), it has been discovered that the old bed of the Mendere (Scamander) ran further to the E. and through the E. side of the plain, instead of, as now, to the W. Hissarlik is $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles from the Aegæan and $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles from the Hellespont—a distance which agrees with the Homeric narrative. The Dombrek-Su, which joins the Scamander N. of Hissarlik, will answer to the ancient Simois. Dr. Schliemann claims to have found the springs and washing-troughs 'in an ancient rock channel' at the foot of Hissarlik. This may be so, but it is unwise to press it as an essential point. As far as the springs are concerned, Bunarbashi has the better evidence; but it is by no means unlikely that if the natural phenomenon of hot and cold springs was well known further up the Scamander it may have been transferred in the poem to the neighbourhood of the city; nor again is it much worth considering whether the swelling of the ground which Dr. Schliemann fixed upon will answer to the θρωσμός πεδίοιο. In the arguments for or against it is well to remember the remark of Grote, that it is a mistake 'to apply to Homer and to the Homeric siege of Troy criticisms which would be perfectly just if brought to bear on the Athenian siege of Syracuse as described by Thucydides.' The excavations on Hissarlik have revealed a succession of cities with strata, sometimes including burnt debris between them. The uppermost is the Ilium Novum, the Greek city of historical times; the lowest, upon the actual rock, is small and of very rude and primitive character in its building, its pottery, in the great rarity of metal, and in the use of stone hatchets. Above the ruins of this was built on a larger scale what Schliemann calls the Homeric Troy. Here were found walls partly of stone, partly of brick, with three gates inclosing (among other buildings somewhat of the Homeric type with a courtyard) megara and women's apartments; further, a quantity of pottery and a considerable find of golden vessels and ornaments. The citadel and palace are small, the space occupied by the walls being only 330 feet in diameter, and it is necessary to admit the glorification of the palace and its surroundings by poetry. There is, however, no objection to the theory that there was a lower city below the Acropolis and enclosed by a wall, just as was the case at Tiryns. The objects found belong to a stage of art distinctly inferior to the Mycenaean art, and archaeologists of authority are disposed to say that this city appears to belong to a date anterior to either Tiryns or Mycenae. It is, however, possible either that the Trojans were less advanced in civilisation than the Greeks who besieged them, or that there was an interval after the fall of Troy and before the Dorian invasion during which the art of Mycenae advanced to the stage which is evidenced by the Mycenaean discoveries. On the other hand, the more recent explorations of Dr. Dörpfeld in 1893 seem likely, when they are completed and fully described, to give a clearer insight into the matter. Dr. Dörpfeld has now distinguished five 'pre-Mycenaean' or pre-Homeric strata of remains on the mound of Hissarlik, and that which he reckons as the second of these he dates earlier than 2000 B.C. In the sixth stratum (i.e. separated by three unimportant settlements from the above) he recognises the Homeric citadel, about as large as that of Tiryns, and containing pottery of what is called the Mycenaean period. It has remains of seven large buildings like the μέγαρα of Homer, walls of the Mycenaean type, and a tower at the NE. angle. If the matured report should eventually result in ascribing to the Homeric Troy a different stratum of remains from that upon which Schliemann fixed, it will in any case tend to confirm his opinion that the Homeric city really stood on Hissarlik, and will throw much more light on its date. For the nationality of the Trojans, see PHRYGIA.—The mythical account of the kingdom of Troy is briefly as follows. Teucer, the first king, had a daughter, who married Dardanus, the chieftain of the country NE. of the Troad. [DARDANIA.] Dardanus had two sons, Ilus and Erichonius, and the latter was the father of Tros, from whom the country and people derived the names of Troas and Troes. Tros was the father of Ilus, who founded the city, which was called after him Ilium, and also, after his father, Trōja. The next king was LAOMEDON, and after him PRIAM. [PRIAMUS.] In his reign the city was taken and destroyed by the confederated Greeks, after a ten years' siege. [For details see HELENA, PARIS, AGAMEMNON, ACHILLES, HECTOR, AJAX, ODYSSEUS, NEOPTOLEMUS, AENEAS.] As to the historical facts which may be regarded as established, there is evidence of a considerable city having been sacked and burnt at a period which archaeologists put not later than the twelfth century B.C. That this invasion may have been an enterprise of the Achaeans at that time is neither impossible nor unlikely. If the interpretation of recent Egyptian discoveries is right which makes Achaeans appear as assailants of Egypt in the reign of Ramses III., it would follow that the Achaeans of the twelfth or thirteenth centuries had power and spirit enough for such an enterprise [see p. 424]: but in any case the history of TIRYNS and MYCENAE, as attested by their ruins, is evidence to the existence of their power at that time. There is therefore no reason why the traditions upon which the Iliad is based should not be regarded as true in their main outlines. It is probable enough that to avenge an act of piracy (which is a common and simple explanation of the rape of Helen) the Greeks of the 'Achaean' period besieged and sacked Troy and thence returned to hold their own possessions undisturbed until the Dorian invasion. That there was no Greek settlement upon the site of Troy until a much later period is deduced from the remains of towns of a low state of civilisation and of small importance which have been discovered above the ruins of the second city (assumed to be Priam's). The later towns (if Dr. Schliemann is right in distinguishing three or four) between the Homeric city and the Greek 'New Ilium' were poor settlements with no history and no importance. The last, an Aetolian foundation which lasted on through the Hellenistic and Roman periods, was visited by Xerxes and by Alexander the Great; and has yielded some fine pieces of sculpture from a Greek temple of Athene, and inscriptions from the fourth century B.C. to late Roman times. (Cf. Hdt. vii. 42; Strab. pp. 593, 601; Arr. An. i. 11, 7.) It was established by Alexander, Lysimachus, and Julius Caesar, who, as well as Sulla, enabled the town to recover the damage inflicted in the Mithridatic war by Fimbria (Strab. p. 594; App. Mithr. 53), and it was made a free city, exempt from taxes. (Strab. p. 595; Suet. Claud. 25; Tac. Ann. xii. 58.) Commercially its importance was eclipsed by that of ALEXANDRIA TROAS.

Trophonius (Τροφώνιος), son of Erginus, king of Orchomenus, and brother of Agamedes. He and his brother built the temple at Delphi and the treasury of king Hyrieus in Boeotia. For details see AGAMEDES. Trophonius after his death was worshipped as a hero, and had a celebrated oracle in a cave in Boeotia. (See Dict. of Antiq. art. Oraculum.)

Trös (Τρός), son of Erichthonius and Astyoche, and grandson of Dardanus. He was married to Callirrhoë, by whom he became the father of Ilus, Assaracus, and Ganymedes, and was king of Phrygia. (Il. xx. 230.) The country and people of Troy were supposed to have derived their name from him. He gave up his son Ganymedes to Zeus for a present of horses. [GANYMEDES.]

Trossulum (Trossulanus: Trosso), a town in Etruria, nine miles from Volsinii, which is said to have been taken by some Roman equites without the aid of foot-soldiers; whence (according to Roman etymologists) the equites obtained the name of Trossuli (Plin. xxxiii. 9; Fest. s.v. Trossuli).

Truentum, a town of Picenum, on the river Truentus or Truentinus (Tronto). (Strab. p. 241; Mel. ii. 4, 6.)

Trutulensis Portus, a harbour on the NE. coast of Britain, perhaps near the estuary Taus (Tay). The exact site is unknown. (Tac. Agr. 38.)

Tryphiōdōrus (Τρυφιδάωρος), a Greek grammarian and poet, was a native of Egypt; but nothing is known of his personal history. He lived probably early in the sixth century of the Christian era. Of his grammatical labours we have no record; but one of his poems has come down to us, entitled 'Ἰλίου ἄλωσις, the Capture of Ilium, consisting of 691 lines, of small merit. It contains a description of the warriors in the wooden horse (whom Helen is about to betray, but she is prevented by Athene), and of the scenes of the sack of the city. Editions are by Northmore, London, 1804, and by Köchly, Zürich, 1850.

Tryphōn (Τρύφων). 1. Diodōtus, a usurper of the throne of Syria during the reign of Demetrius II. Nicator. After the death of Alexander Balas in B.C. 146, Tryphon first set up Antiochus, the infant son of Balas, as a pretender against Demetrius, but in 142 he murdered Antiochus and reigned as king himself. Tryphon was defeated and put to death by Antiochus Sidetes, the brother of Demetrius, in 139, after a reign of three years. [See DEMETRIUS II.]—2. Salvius, one of the leaders of the revolted slaves in Sicily, was supposed to have a knowledge of divination, for which reason he was elected king by the slaves in 103. He displayed considerable abilities, and in a short time collected an army of 20,000 foot and 2000 horse, with which he defeated the propraetor P. Licinius Nerva. After this victory Salvius assumed all the pomp of royalty, and took the surname of Tryphon, probably because it had been borne by Diodotus, the usurper of the Syrian throne. He chose the strong fortress of Triocala as the seat of his new kingdom. Tryphon was defeated by L. Lucullus in 102, and was obliged to take refuge in Triocala. But Lucullus failed to take the place, and returned to Rome without effecting anything more. Lucullus was succeeded by C. Servilius; and on the death of Tryphon, about the same time, the kingdom devolved upon Athenion who was not subdued till 101. (Diod. xxxvi Fragm.; Flor. iii. 19.)

Tryphoninus, Claudius, a Roman jurist, wrote under the reigns of Septimius Severus and Caracalla.

Tubantes, a people of Germany, allies of the Cherusci, originally dwelt between the Rhine and the Yssel; in the time of Germanicus on the S. bank of the Lippe, between Paderborn, Hamm, and the Amsberger Wald; and at a still later time in the neighbourhood of the Thüringer Wald between the Fulda and the Werra. (Tac. Ann. i. 51, xiii. 55, Germ. 36; Ptol. ii. 11, 23.) Subsequently they are mentioned as a part of the great league of the Frangi.

Tubero, Aelius. 1. Q., son-in-law of L. Aemilius Paulus, served under the latter in his war against Perseus, king of Macedonia. This Tubero, like the rest of his family, was so poor that he had not an ounce of silver plate, till his father-in-law gave him five pounds of plate from the spoils of the Macedonian monarch. (Liv. xlv. 7, 8; Val. Max. iv. 4, 9; Plut. Aem. Paul. 28.)—2. Q., son of the preceding, was a pupil of Panaetius, and is called the Stoic. He had a reputation for talent and legal knowledge. He was praetor in 123, and consul suffectus in 118. He was an opponent of Tib. Gracchus, as well as of C. Gracchus, and delivered some speeches against the latter, 123. (Cic. Off. iii. 15; Tac. Ann. xvi. 22; Gell. i. 22.) Tubero is one of the speakers in Cicero's dialogue de Republica.—3. L., an intimate friend of Cicero. He was a relation and a school-fellow of the orator, had served with him in the Marsic war, and had afterwards served under his brother Quintus as legate in Asia. On the breaking out of the Civil war, Tubero, who had espoused the Pompeian party, received from the senate the province of Africa; but as Atius Varus and Q. Ligarius, who likewise belonged to the aristocratical party, would not surrender it to him, he passed over to Pompey in Greece. He was afterwards pardoned by Caesar, and returned with his son Quintus to Rome. (Cic. pro Lig. 4, 7, 8, ad Q. Fr. i. 1.) Tubero cultivated literature and philosophy. He wrote a History, and the philosopher Aenesidemus dedicated to him his work on the sceptical philosophy of Pyrrhon.—4. Q., son of the preceding. In 46 he made a speech before C. Julius Caesar against Q. Ligarius, who was defended by Cicero in a speech which is extant (pro Q. Ligario). Tubero obtained considerable reputation as a jurist. He had a great knowledge both of Jus Publicum and of Jus Privatum, and he wrote several works on both these divisions of law. He married a daughter of Servius Sulpicius, and the daughter of Tubero was the mother of the jurist C. Cassius Longinus. (Quint. x. 1, 23; Gell. vii. 19, xiv. 2.) Like his father, Q. Tubero wrote a History. (Liv. iv. 23; Suet. Jul. 83.) Tubero the jurist who is often cited in the Digest is this Tubero; but there is no excerpt from his writings.

Tucca, Plotius, a friend of Horace and Virgil. The latter poet made Tucca one of his heirs, and bequeathed his unfinished writings to him and Varius, who afterwards published the Aeneid by order of Augustus (Hor. Sat. i. 5, 40, i. 10, 81).

Tüder (Tuders, -tis: Todi), an ancient town of Umbria, situated on a hill near the Tiber, and on the road from Mevania to Rome. (Plut. Mar. 17, Crass. 6; Strab. p. 227; Plin. iii. 113.) It was subsequently made a Roman colony.

There are still remains of the polygonal walls of the ancient town.

Tūditānus, Sēmprōnīus. 1. M., consul B.C. 240, and censor 230 (Gell. xvii. 21).—2. P., tribune of the soldiers at the battle of Cannae in 216, and one of the few Roman officers who survived that fatal day. In 214 he was curule aedile; in 213 praetor, with Ariminum as his province, and was continued in the command for the two following years (212, 211). He was censor in 209 with M. Cornelius Cethegus, although neither he nor his colleague had yet held the consulship. In 205 he was sent into Greece with the title of proconsul, for the purpose of opposing Philip, with whom, however, he concluded a treaty, which was ratified by the Romans. Tuditanus was consul in 204, and received Bruttii as his province. He was at first defeated by Hannibal, but shortly afterwards he gained a decisive victory over the Carthaginian general. (Liv. xxii. 50, 60, xxiv. 43-47, xxvii. 11, xxix. 11-13, xxxi. 2; App. Annib. 26).—3. C., plebeian aedile 198, and praetor 197, when he obtained Nearer Spain as his province. He was defeated by the Spaniards with great loss, and died shortly afterwards of a wound which he had received in the battle. (Liv. xxxii. 27, xxxiii. 42; App. Hisp. 39).—4. M., tribune of the plebs 193; praetor 189, when he obtained Sicily as his province; and consul 185. In his consulship he carried on war in Liguria, and defeated the Apuani, while his colleague was equally successful against the Ingauni. He was carried off by the great pestilence which devastated Rome in 174. (Liv. xxxix. 40, 46, xli. 21).—5. C., praetor 182, and consul 179. In his consulship he carried on war against the Iapydes in Illyricum, over whom he gained a victory chiefly through the military skill of his legate, D. Junius Brutus. Tuditanus was an orator and a historian, and in both obtained considerable distinction. (Vell. Pat. ii. 4; App. B. C. i. 19, Illyr. 10; Cic. Brut. 25; Dionys. i. 11.)

Tulcis, a river on the E. coast of Spain, near Tarraco (Mel. ii. 6).

Tulingi, a people of Gaul of no great importance, who dwelt on the Rhine between the Rauraci and the Helvetii.

Tullia, the name of the two daughters of Servius Tullius, the sixth king of Rome. [TULLIUS.]

Tullia, frequently called by the diminutive Tulliolā, was the daughter of M. Cicero and Terentia, and was probably born B.C. 79 or 78. She was betrothed in 67 to C. Calpurnius Piso Frugi, whom she married in 63 during the consulship of her father. During Cicero's banishment Tullia lost her first husband. She was married again in 56 to Furius Crassipes, a young man of rank and large property; but she did not live with him long, though the time and the reason of her divorce are alike unknown. In 50 she was married to her third husband, P. Cornelius Dolabella, who was a thorough profligate. The marriage took place during Cicero's absence in Cilicia, and, as might have been anticipated, was not a happy one. On the breaking out of the Civil war in 49, the husband and the father of Tullia espoused opposite sides. While Dolabella fought for Caesar, and Cicero took refuge in the camp of Pompey, Tullia remained in Italy. On the 19th of May, 49, she was delivered of a seven months' child, which died soon afterwards. After the battle of Pharsalia, Dolabella returned to Rome; but he continued to lead a dissolute and profligate life, and at length (46) a divorce took place by mutual consent. At the beginning of 45 Tullia was delivered of a son. As soon as she was sufficiently recovered to bear the fatigues of a journey, she accompanied her father to Tusculum, but she died there in February. Her loss was a severe blow to Cicero. (See Index to Cicero.) Among the many consolatory letters which he received on the occasion is the well-known one from the celebrated jurist Serv. Sulpicius (ad Fam. iv. 5). To dissipate his grief, Cicero drew up a treatise on Consolation.

Tullia Gens, patrician and plebeian. The patrician Tullii were one of the Alban houses which were transplanted to Rome in the reign of Tullus Hostilius. The patrician branch of the gens appears to have become extinct at an early period, for after the early times of the republic no one of the name occurs for some centuries, and the Tullii of a later age are not only plebeians, but, with the exception of their bearing the same name, cannot be regarded as having any connexion with the ancient gens. The first plebeian Tullius who rose to the honours of the state was M. Tullius Decula, consul B.C. 81, and the next was the celebrated orator M. Tullius Cicero. [CICERO.]

Tullianum. [ROMA, p. 814.]

Tullius Servius, according to the legends, the sixth king of Rome. The stories about his reign merely express the popular idea of the original growth of the constitution, and as he embodies a great part of this growth, the history of which was lost, he is represented as a king with a peaceful reign, devoted to legislation and to public works in the city, but also to military organisation. The legendary account states that his mother, Ocrisia, was one of the captives taken at Corniculum, and became a slave of Tanaquil, the wife of Tarquinius Priscus (Dionys. iv. 2; Ov. Fast. vi. 625). He was born in the king's palace, and notwithstanding his servile origin was brought up as the king's son, since Tanaquil by her powers of divination had foreseen the greatness of the child; and Tarquinius gave him his daughter in marriage, and entrusted him with the government. His rule was mild and beneficent, and so popular did he become that the sons of Ancus Marcius, fearing lest they should be deprived of their inheritance, procured the assassination of Tarquinius. [TARQUINIUS.] They did not, however, reap the fruit of their crime, for Tanaquil, pretending that the king's wound was not mortal, told the people that Tarquinius had commanded Servius meantime to discharge the duties of the kingly office. Servius began to act as king; and when the death of Tarquinius could no longer be concealed, he was already in firm possession of the royal power. The great deeds of Servius were deeds of peace, and he was regarded by posterity as the author of all their civil rights and institutions, just as Numa was of their religious rites and ordinances. Three important events are assigned to Servius by tradition. First, he gave a new constitution to the Roman state. The two main objects of this constitution were to give the plebs political independence, and to assign to property that influence in the state which had previously belonged to birth exclusively. In order to carry his purpose into effect, Servius made a twofold division of the Roman people, one territorial, and the other according to property. For details, see Dict. of Antiq. art. Comitia. Secondly, he was credited with the extension of the pomerium, or boundary of Rome, and with the completion of the 'Servian' city by incorporating with it the Quirinal, Viminal, and Esquiline hills and its fortification. [ROMA, p. 798.] Thirdly, he established an important alliance with the Latins, by which Rome and the cities of Latium became the members of one great league. By his new constitution Servius incurred the hostility of the patricians, who conspired against him with L. Tarquinius. Servius, soon after his succession, had given his two daughters in marriage to the two sons of Tarquinius Priscus. L. Tarquinius the elder was married to a gentle wife; Aruns, the younger, to an aspiring and ambitious woman. On the other hand, Lucius was proud and haughty, but Aruns unambitious and quiet. The wife of Aruns, fearing that her husband would tamely resign the sovereignty to his elder brother, resolved to destroy both her father and her husband. She persuaded Lucius to murder his wife, and she murdered her own husband; and the survivors straightway married. Tullia now urged her husband to murder her father. A conspiracy was formed with the discontented patricians, and Tarquinius having entered the senate-house arrayed in the kingly robes, ordered the senators to be summoned to him as their king. At the first news of the commotion, Servius hastened to the senate-house, and, standing at the doorway, ordered Tarquinius to come down from the throne. Tarquinius sprang forward, seized the old man, and flung him down the steps. The king sought refuge in his house, but before he reached it, he was overtaken by the servants of Tarquinius, and murdered. Tullia drove to the senate-house, and greeted her husband as king; and as she was returning, her charioteer pulled up, and showed her the corpse of her father lying across the road. She commanded him to drive on: the blood of her father spirted over the carriage and on her dress; and from that day forward the street bore the name of the Vicus Sceleratus, or Wicked Street. Servius had reigned forty-four years. (Liv. i. 42-46; Dionys. iv. 2-12; Cic. de Rep. ii. 21; Ov. Fast. vi. 581.)

Tullius Tiro. [TIRO.]

Tullum (Toul), the capital of the Leuci, a people in the SE. of Gallia Belgica, between the Matrona and Mosella (Ptol. ii. 9, 13).

Tullus Hostilius, third king of Rome, is said to have been the grandson of Hostus Hostilius, who fell in battle against the Sabines in the reign of Romulus (Liv. i. 12, 22; Plin. xvi. 11). His legend ran as follows. Tullus Hostilius departed from the peaceful ways of Numa, and aspired to the martial renown of Romulus. He made Alba acknowledge Rome's supremacy in the war wherein the three Roman brothers, the Horatii, fought with the three Alban brothers, the Curiatii, at the Fossa Cluilia. [HORATIA GENS.] Next he warred with Fidenae and with Veii, and being straitly pressed by their joint hosts, he vowed temples to Pallor and Pavor—Paleness and Panic. After the fight was won, he tore asunder with chariots Mettius Fufetius, the king or dictator of Alba, because he had desired to betray Rome; and he utterly destroyed Alba, sparing only the temples of the gods, and bringing the Alban people to Rome, where he gave them the Caelian hill to dwell on. Then he turned himself to war with the Sabines; and being again straitened in fight in a wood called the Wicked Wood, he vowed a yearly festival to Saturn and Ops, and to double the number of the Salii, or priests of Mamers. And when, by their help, he had vanquished the Sabines, he performed his vow, and its records were the feasts Saturnalia and Opalia. In his old age, Tullus grew weary of warring; and when a pestilence struck him and his people, and a shower of burning stones fell from heaven on Mt. Alba, and a voice as of the Alban gods came forth from the solitary temple of Jupiter on its summit, he remembered the peaceful and happy days of Numa, and sought to win the favour of the gods, as Numa had done, by prayer and divination. But the gods heeded neither his prayers nor his charms, and when he would inquire of Jupiter Elicius, Jupiter was wroth, and smote Tullus and his whole house with fire.—It has been remarked that Tullus Hostilius is in the legends a sort of double of Romulus. Each adds another people to Rome, one the Sabines, the other the Albans; each has a war with a Mettius. His story seems to have grown out of a double set of legends, explaining the origin of certain names, and the growth of the city. But another reign was imagined to fill up a gap in the chronology and Hostus Hostilius, the general of the Romulus legend, reappears as the king Tullus Hostilius, who is represented as his grandson.

Tunes, or Tunis (Τύννης, Τύνις: Τυνησαῖος: Tunis), a strongly fortified city of N. Africa, stood at the bottom of the Carthaginian gulf, ten miles SW. of Carthage, at the mouth of the little river Catada. At the time of Augustus it had greatly declined. (Strab. p. 834; Pol. xiv. 10; Liv. xxx. 9.)

Tungri, a German people who crossed the Rhine, and settled in Gaul in the country formerly occupied by the Aduatici and the Eburones. Their chief town was called Aduata or Atuata Tungrorum (Tongern), on the road from Castellum Morinorum to Colonia Agrippina. (Tac. Germ. 2, Hist. iv. 55, 79.)

Turba. [BIGERRIONES.]

Turdetani, the most numerous people in Hispania Baetica, dwelt in the S. of the province on both banks of the Baetis as far as Lusitania. They were regarded as the most civilised people in all Spain, having a written code of laws. Their country was called Turdetania. (Strab. pp. 136, 139, 151; Pol. xxxiv. 9; Diod. v. 33.)

Turduli, a people in Hispania Baetica, situated to the E. and S. of the Turdetani (Strab. p. 139; Pol. xxxiv. 9).

Turia or Turium (Guadalaviar), a river on the E. coast of Spain, flowing into the sea at Valentia, memorable for the battle fought on its banks between Pompey and Sertorius (Plut. Pomp. 18, Sert. 19; Plin. iii. 20).

Turiasso (Turiassonensis: Tarrazona), a town of the Celtiberi in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Caesaraugusta to Numantia. It possessed a fountain the water of which was said to be very excellent for hardening iron. (Plin. iii. 24, xxxiv. 144.)

Turnus (Τύρνος). 1. Son of Daunus and Venilia, and king of the Rutuli at the time of the arrival of Aeneas in Italy. He was a brother of Juturna, and related to Amata, the wife of king Latinus; and he fought against Aeneas, because Latinus had given to the Trojan hero his daughter Lavinia, who had been previously promised to Turnus. He appears in the Aeneid as a brave warrior; but in the end he fell by the hand of Aeneas. (Verg. Aen. vii. 408, x. 76, xii. 408, 926; Liv. i. 2.) The name of Turnus is not improbably connected with Tyrrhenus, and in the legends he is allied with the Etruscan Mezentius. It is likely that the story of his battles represents the struggle of the Latin Confederation against an Etruscan power which was at that period settled at Ardea and Terracina.—2. A Roman satiric poet, was a native of Aurunca, and lived under Vespasian and Domitian. (Mart. vii. 97, xi. 10; Sidon. ix. 216; Schol. ad Juv. i. 20.) The thirty hexameters about Nero's reign which have been ascribed to Turnus are a forgery of the seventeenth century.

Turnus Herdonius. [HERDONIUS.]

Tūrōnes, Tūrōni or Tūrōnii, a people in the interior of Gallia Lugdunensis, between the Aulerci, Andes and Pictones. Their chief town was Caesarodūnum, subsequently Turōni (Tours) on the Liger (Loire). (Caes. B. G. ii. 35, vii. 4, 75, viii. 46; Tac. Ann. iii. 41; Ptol. ii. 8, 14.)

Turpilianus, P. Petronius, triumvir of the mint under Augustus. His name occurs on several coins.

Turpillius, Sextus, a Roman dramatist, who rendered Greek plays of the New Comedy in Latin. The titles of thirteen or fourteen of his plays have been preserved, together with a few fragments (ed. Ribbeck, Com. Lat.). He died, when very old, at Sinuessa in B.C. 101 (Hieron. ad Euseb. Chron. 1914).

Turpio, L. Ambivius, a celebrated actor in the time of Terence, in most of whose plays he acted (Cic. de Sen. 14; Tac. Dial. 14).

Turris Hannibālis (Bourj Salektah, Ru.), a castle on the coast of Byzacena, between Thapsus and Acholla, belonging to Hannibal, who embarked here when he fled to Antiochus the Great (Liv. xxxiii. 48; Just. xxxi. 2).

Turris Stratōnis. [CAESAREA, No. 3.]

Tuscania (Tuscaniensis: Toscanella), a town of Etruria, on the river Marta, rarely mentioned by ancient writers (Plin. iii. 52), but celebrated in modern times on account of the great number of Etruscan antiquities which have been discovered in its tombs. Among these are the inscribed dice upon which some of the arguments about the origin of the Etruscan language have been based.

Tusci, Tuscia. [ETRURIA.]

Tusculum (Tusculanus: nr. Frascati, Ru.), an ancient town of Latium, situated about ten miles SE. of Rome, on a lofty summit of the mountains, which are called after the town Tusculāni Montes, and which are a continuation of Mons Albanus. Tusculum was one of the most strongly fortified places in all Italy, both by nature and by art. It is said to have been founded by Telegonus, the son of Odysseus (Dionys. iv. 45; Ov. Fast. iii. 91, iv. 71; Propert. iii. 30, 4; Hor. Od. iii. 29, 8, Epod. i. 30); and it was always one of the most important of the Latin towns. Its importance in the time of the Roman kings is shown in the legends by Tarquinius Superbus giving his daughter in marriage to Octavius Mamilius, the chief of Tusculum (Liv. i. 49), and it was his place of refuge after his expulsion from Rome (Liv. ii. 15, 18). The Tusculans are represented as friendly to Rome after this war (Liv. iii. 7, 18, iv. 45) until the Latin war. After the Latin war it became a Roman municipium, and was the birthplace of several distinguished Roman families. Cato the Censor was a native of Tusculum. Its proximity to Rome, its salubrity, and the beauty of its situation made it a favourite residence of the Roman nobles during the summer (Strab. p. 239). Cicero, among others, had a favourite villa at this place, which he frequently mentions under the name of Tusculānum, probably on the W. side, near La Rufinella. The ruins of ancient Tusculum are situated on the summit of the mountain about two miles above Frascati, on the ridge, which is really the rim of an ancient crater. The site of the citadel is a platform 2700 feet in circumference, and 200 feet above the rest of the ridge. The town itself lay W. of the citadel, where remains of a theatre and other buildings exist. There are remains of an amphitheatre between this spot and Frascati. Frascati itself stands on the supposed site of the villa of Lucullus. It was occupied as a settlement by the surviving inhabitants of Tusculum after that city was sacked and destroyed by the Romans in 1191 A.D.

Tūtīcānus, a Roman poet and a friend of Ovid, who had translated into Latin verse a portion of the Odyssey relating to Phaeacia (Ov. Pont. iv. 12; cf. iv. 16, 27).

Tyāna (Túava: Tyaneús: Kiz Hisar, Ru.), a city of Asia Minor, stood in the S. of Cappadocia, at the N. foot of M. Taurus, on the high road to the Cilician Gates, 300 stadia from Cybistra, and 400 from Mazaca, in a position of great natural strength, which was improved by fortifications (Strab. pp. 537, 587; Ptol. v. 6, 18). Under Caracalla it was made a Roman colony. In B.C. 272 it was taken by Aurelianus, in the war with Zenobia, to whose territory it then belonged. Valens made it the chief city of Cappadocia Secunda. (Vopisc. Aurel. 22; Hierocl. p. 700.) In its neighbourhood was a great temple of Jupiter, by the side of a lake in a swampy plain; and near the temple was a remarkable effervescing spring called Asma-baeon (Philostr. Apoll. i. 4; Amm. Marc. xxiii. 6). Tyana was the native place of Apollonius, the supposed worker of miracles. [APOLLONIUS.] The S. district of Cappadocia, in which the city stood, was called Tyanitis.

Tychē. [FORTUNA.]

Tychē. [SYRACUSAE.]

Tydeus (Tυδεύς), son of Oeneus, king of Calydon, and Periboea. He was obliged to leave Calydon in consequence of some murder which he had committed. Some say that he killed his father's brother, Melas, Lycopus, or Alcaethous; others that he slew Thoas or Aphareus, his mother's brother; others that he slew his brother Olenias; and others again that he killed the sons of Melas, who had revolted against Oeneus. He fled to Adrastus at Argos, who purified him from the murder, and gave him his daughter, Deīpyle, in marriage, by whom he became the father of Diomedes, who is hence frequently called Tydidēs. He accompanied Adrastus in the expedition against Thebes, where he was wounded by Melanippus, who, however, was slain by him. (Il. xiv. 114–132.) A strange story is told in later authors that when Tydeus lay on the ground wounded, Athene appeared to him with a remedy which she had received from Zeus, and which was to make him immortal. This, however, was prevented by a stratagem of Amphiaraus, who hated Tydeus, for he cut off the head of Melanippus and brought it to Tydeus, who divided it and ate the brain, or devoured some of the flesh. Athene, seeing this, shuddered, and left Tydeus to his fate, who consequently died, and was buried by Macon. (Apollod. iii. 6, 8; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1273.)

Tyle, or Tylis (Tύλη: Tulovo?), a town of Thrace, on the S. side of the Haemus, where the Celts established a kingdom at the end of the 4th cent. B.C. It was occupied and destroyed by the Thracians at the time of the second Punic war. (Pol. iv. 46; Steph. Byz. s. v.)

Týlōs or Tyros (Τύλος, Τύρος: Bahrein), an island in the Persian Gulf, off the coast of Arabia, celebrated for its pearl fisheries (Strab. p. 766; Arr. An. vii. 20; Plin. vi. 148).

Tymbres or Tembrogius (Pursek), a river of Phrygia, rising in M. Dindymene, and flowing past Cotyaeum and Dorylaeum into the Sangarius. It was the boundary between Phrygia Epictetus and Phrygia Salutaris. (Liv. xxviii. 18; Plin. vi. 1.)

Tymnes (Τύμνης), an epigrammatic poet, whose epigrams were included in the Garland of Meleager, but respecting whose exact date we have no further evidence. There are seven of his epigrams in the Greek Anthology.

Tymphaei (Τυμφαῖοι), a people of Epirus, on the borders of Thessaly, so called from Mt. Tympe (Τύμψη), sometimes, but less correctly, written Stymphe (Στύμψη). Their country was called Tymphaea (Τυμφαία). (Strab. pp. 325, 327; Plin. iv. 6; Arr. An. i. 7.)

Tymphrestus (Τυμφρηστός: Elladha), a mountain in Thessaly, in the country of the Dryopes, in which the river Spercheus rises. [PINDUS.]

Tyndāreus (Τυνδάρεως), was son of Perieres and Gorgophone, or, according to another account, son of Oebalus, by the nymph Batia or by Gorgophone. Tyndareus and his brother Icarius were expelled by their stepbrother Hippocoon and his sons; whereupon Tyndareus fled to Thesius in Aetolia, and assisted him in his wars against his neighbours. In Aetolia Tyndareus married Leda, the daughter of Thesius, and was afterwards restored to Sparta by Heracles. (Apollod. iii. 10, 4; Paus. iii. 1, 4.) By Leda, Tyndareus became the father of Timandra, Clytaemnestra, and Philonoe. [For the birth of Castor and Pollux, and Helen, see DROSCUR, HELENA.] The patronymic Tyndāridae is given to Castor and Pollux, and the female patronymic Tyndāris to Helen and Clytaemnestra. When Castor and Pollux had been received among the immortals, Tyndareus invited Menelaus to come to Sparta, and surrendered his kingdom to him.

Tyndāris or Tyndārium (Τυνδαρίς, Τυνδαρίον: Tyndaritanus: Tindaro), a town on the N. coast of Sicily, with a good harbour, a little W. of Messina, near the promontory of the same name, founded by the elder Dionysius, B.C. 396, which became an important place (Diod. xiv. 78, xvi. 69; Pol. i. 25; Cic. Verr. iii. 43, iv. 39). It was the headquarters of Agrippa, the general of Octavian, in the war against Sex. Pompeius. (App. B.C. v. 105, 109, 116; Strab. p. 272.)

Typaneae (Τυπαναίαι), a town of Triphylia in Elis, which was taken by Philip in the Social war (Strab. p. 343; Pol. iv. 77).

Týphōn or Typhōeus (Τυφῶν, Τυφωεύς, contracted into Τυφῶς), a monster of the primitive world, who was the embodiment in myth of volcanoes and earthquakes, i.e. of the fire and steam ejected from the earth in volcanic countries, and of the convulsions and storms which accompany volcanic disturbances. Hence Typhoeus, or Typhon, is represented sometimes as a fire-breathing giant, sometimes as a hurricane. His dwelling, or prison-house, though differently placed in different writers is always in a region at one time volcanic. According to Homer, he was concealed in the earth in the country of the Arimi (ἐν Ἀρίμοις, of which the Latin poets have made Inarime), on which Zeus cast lightning (Il. ii. 782.) In Hesiod, Typhoeus (or Typhaon) is the youngest son of Tartarus and Gaea (the Earth), and by Echidna he became the father of the dog Orthus, Cerberus, the Lernaean hydra, and the Chimaera. He is described as a monster with 100 heads, fearful eyes, and terrible voices; he aimed at the sovereignty of gods and men, but was subdued, after a fearful struggle, by Zeus, with a thunderbolt. He begot also the winds, whence he is also called the father of the Harpies: but the beneficent winds Notus, Boreas, Argestes, and Zephyrus, were not his sons. (Hes. Th. 306–325, 821–880.) Other accounts made him also the father of the Sphinx and the Nemean lion (Apollod. ii. 3, 1, iii. 5, 8), as though the more terrible monsters were born from the Earth and the subterranean fires. Aeschylus and Pindar describe him as living in a Cilician cave (Pind. Ol. iv. 7, Pyth. i. 15, viii. 16; Aesch. Prom. 351). He is further said to have at one time been engaged in a struggle with all the immortals, and to have been killed by Zeus with a flash of lightning; he was buried in Tartarus under Mount Aetna, the workshop of Hephaestus, which is hence called by the poets Typhois Aetna (Aesch. l.c.; Pind. Pyth. 15–27; Ov. Her. xv. 11, Fast. iv. 491). A myth related in Apollod. i. 6, 3, and Schol. ad Il. ii. 783 (but alluded to in Hymn. ad Apoll. Pyth. 153, and Stesich. Fr. 60) represents Typhoeus as born from Hera alone, in her wrath with Zeus; or from an egg which she placed under the mountains of the Arimi—a myth which resembles the stories of the hatching of dragon's eggs in northern legends. Another representation of Typhon comes from Egypt, and identifies him with Set, the power of darkness (represented in serpent or crocodile form), who slew Osiris (Hdt. ii. 156, iii. 5). The gods, it is said, unable to hold out against him, fled to Egypt, where, from fear, they metamorphosed themselves into animals, with the exception of Zeus and Athene (Ov. Met. v. 321; Ant. Lib. 28; Apollod. i. 6, 3).

Tyragētae, Tyrigētae, or Tyrangetae, a people in European Sarmatia, probably a branch of the Getae, dwelling E. of the river Tyras (Strab. p. 289; Ptol. iii. 5, 25).

Tyrannion (Τυραννίων). 1. A Greek grammarian, a native of Amisus in Pontus, was originally called Theophrastus, but received from his instructor the name of Tyrannion on account of his domineering behaviour to his fellow-disciples. In B.C. 72 he was taken captive by Lucullus, who carried him to Rome. He was given by Lucullus to Murena, who manumitted him. At Rome Tyrannion occupied himself in teaching. He was also employed in arranging the library of Apellicon, which Sulla brought to Rome. This library contained the writings of Aristotle, upon which Tyrannion bestowed considerable care and attention. Cicero speaks in the highest terms of the learning and ability of Tyrannion, and Strabo speaks of having attended his lectures, which must have been at Rome when Tyrannion was an old man. Tyrannion amassed considerable wealth, and died at a very advanced age of a paralytic stroke. (Plut. Lucull. 19, Sull. 26; Cic. ad Att. ii. 6, iv. 4, ad Q. Fr. ii. 4; Strab. p. 548; ARISTOTELES.) —2. A native of Phoenicia, the son of Artemidorus, and a disciple of the preceding. His original name was Diocles. He was taken captive in the war between Antony and Octavian, and was purchased by Dymas, a freedman of the emperor. By him he was presented to Terentia, the wife of Cicero, who manumitted him. He taught at Rome, and wrote a great number of works, which are all lost. (Suid. s.v.).

Týras (Τύρας, Τύρης: Dniester), subsequently called Danastris, a river in European Sarmatia, forming in the lower part of its course the boundary between Dacia and Sarmatia, and falling into the Pontus Euxinus, N. of the Danube. At its mouth there was a town of the same name, probably on the site of the modern Ackjermann. The town was originally Greek, founded by Miletus. It was joined to the province of Moesia by Nero, B.C. 56, but it was given up by Maximinus to the Goths in 237, under whom it became a centre of piracy. (Hdt. iv. 51; Ptol. iii. 5, 17; Zosim. i. 42; Strab. p. 107.)

Tyriaeum (Τυριαῖον: Ilghin), a city of Lycania, described by Xenophon (in the Anabasis) as twenty parasangs W. of Iconium. It lay due W. of Laodicea. (Xen. An. i. 2, 24; Strab. p. 668.)

Týrō (Τυρώ), daughter of Salmoneus and Alcidece. She was wife of Cretheus, and beloved by the river-god Enipeus in Thessaly, in whose form Poseidon appeared to her, and became by her the father of Pelias and Neleus. By Cretheus she was the mother of Aeson, Phereus, and Amythaon. (Od. xi. 235; Apollod. i. 9, 8.)

Tyrrhēni, Tyrrhēniā. [ETRURIA.]

Tyrrhēnum Mare. [ETRURIA.]

Tyrrhēnus (Τυρρηνός or Τυρσηνός), son of the Lydian king Atys and Callithea, and brother of Lydus, is said to have led a Pelasgian colony from Lydia into Italy, into the country of the Umbrians, and to have given to the colonists his name, Tyrrhenians (Hdt. iv. 94; Dionys. i. 27). Other traditions call Tyrrhenus a son of Heracles by Omphale, or of Telephus and Hiera, and a brother of Tarchon (Dionys. i. 28; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 1242.)

Tyrrheus, a shepherd of king Latinus. As Ascanius was hunting, he killed a tame stag belonging to Tyrrheus, whereupon the country people took up arms, which was the first conflict in Italy between the natives and the Trojan settlers. (Verg. Aen. vii. 483, ix. 28.)

Tyrtaeus (Τυρταῖος or Τύπραος), described as the son of Archembrotus, of Aphidnae in Attica, in the seventh century introduced the Ionic elegy into Sparta. According to the older tradition, the Spartans during the second Messenian war were commanded by an oracle to take a leader from among the Athenians, and thus to conquer their enemies, whereupon they chose Tyrtaeus as their leader. (Plato, de Legg. i. p. 629; Lycurg. c. Leoch. p. 211; Diod. xv. 66.) Later writers state that Tyrtaeus was a lame schoolmaster, of low family and reputation, whom the Athenians, when applied to by the Lacedaemonians in accordance with the oracle, purposely sent as the most inefficient leader they could select, being unwilling to assist the Lacedaemonians in extending their dominion in the Peloponnesus, but little thinking that the poetry of Tyrtaeus would achieve that victory which his physical constitution seemed to forbid him aspiring to (Paus. iv. 15, 3; Just. iii. 5; Themist. xv. p. 242; Schol. ad Hor. A. P. 402). The poems of Tyrtaeus exercised an important influence upon the Spartans, quieting their dissensions at home, and animating their courage in the field. In order to appease their civil discords, he composed his celebrated elegy entitled Legal Order (Εὐνομία: Ar. Pol. v. 7, 1; Paus. iv. 18, 2). But still more celebrated were the poems by which he animated the courage of the Spartans in their conflict with the Messenians. These poems were of two kinds: namely, elegies, containing exhortations to constancy and courage, and descriptions of the glory of fighting bravely for one's native land; and more spirited compositions, in the anapaestic measure, which were intended as marching songs, to be performed with the music of the flute. (Paus. iv. 14, 1; Athen. p. 630; Plut. Cleom. 2; Hor. A. P. 402; Suid. s. v.) He lived, it is said, to see the success of his efforts in the entire conquest of the Messenians, and their reduction to the condition of Helots. His life therefore lasted down to B.C. 668, which was the last year of the second Messenian war. It has been observed that Tyrtaeus in a fragment of the Eunomia seems to speak of himself as a Lacedaemonian, and though this might be explained by his having been made a citizen of Sparta, yet Hdt. ix. 35 does not include him among the few foreigners who became Spartan citizens. Hence some (following Strab. p. 362) have doubted the truth of his Athenian origin. On the other hand, there is so strong a consensus of ancient authorities, including Plato (l.c.), for his Athenian origin that it can hardly be resisted.—The fragments of his poems are edited by Bach, with the remains of the elegiac poets Callinus and Asius, Lips. 1831, and in Bergk's Poët. Lyr. Graec. 1866.

Týrus (Τύρος: Aram. Tura; O. T. Tsor: Τύριος, Tyrius: Sur, Ru.), one of the greatest and most famous cities of the ancient world, stood on the coast of Phoenice, about twenty miles S. of Sidon. It was a colony of the Sidonians, but gradually eclipsed the mother city, and came to be the chief place of all Phoenice for wealth, commerce, and colonising activity. Respecting its colonies and maritime enterprise, see PHOENICE and CARTHAGO. The Assyrian king Shalmaneser laid siege to Tyre for five years, but without success. It was again besieged for thirteen years by Nebuchadnezzar, and there is a tradition that he took it, but the matter is not quite certain. At the period when the Greeks began to be well acquainted with the city, its old site had been abandoned, and a new city erected on a small island about half a mile from the shore and a mile in length, and a little N. of the remains of the former city, which was now called Old Tyre (Παλαιότυρος). This island, which Pliny estimated at 2½ miles in circumference, was separated from the mainland by a channel $\frac{1}{10}$ of a mile broad (Strab. p. 756), or, according to Diodorus and Curtius, 4 stadia (Diod. xvii. 60; Curt. iv. 2). At present the breadth is only $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile. With the additional advantage of its insular position, this new city soon rose to a prosperity scarcely less than that of its predecessor; though, under the Persian kings, it seems to have ranked again below Sidon. [SIDON.] There were two harbours: one on the N. of the island, known as the Sidonian harbour, the other on the S. side, known as the Egyptian harbour (Arr. An. ii. 20; Strab. l.c.), the names expressing the direction in which they faced. In B.C. 322 the Tyrians refused to open their gates to Alexander, who laid siege to the city for seven months, and united the island on which it stood to the mainland by a mole constructed chiefly of the ruins of Old Tyre. This mole has ever since formed a permanent connexion between the island and the mainland. (Arr. ii. 17–26; Curt. iv. 4–27; Diod. xvii. 40–45.) After its capture and sack by Alexander, Tyre never regained its former consequence, and its commerce was for the most part transferred to Alexandria. It was subject to the Syrian kings, but became a free city with its own coinage in 126 B.C., and till the time of Augustus, when it lost its independence (Dio Cass. liv. 7). Septimius Severus made it a Roman colony. It was the see of a bishop, and Jerome calls it the most beautiful city of Phoenicia. It was a place of considerable importance in mediaeval history, especially as one of the last points held by the Christians on the coast of Syria. The wars of the Crusades completed its ruin, and its site is now occupied by a poor village; and even its ruins are for the most part covered by the sea.

Tzetzes (Τζέτζης). 1. Joannes, a Greek grammarian of Constantinople, flourished about A.D. 1150. His writings bear evident traces of the extent of his learning, and not less of the inordinate self-conceit with which they had filled him. He wrote a vast number of works, of which several are still extant. Of these the two following are the most important: (1) Iliaca, which consists properly of three poems collected into one under the titles Tὰ πρὸ Ὀμήρου, τὰ Ὀμήρου, καὶ τὰ μεθ' Ὀμήρου. The whole amounts to 1676 lines, and is written in hexameter metre. It is a very dull composition. Edited by Bekker, Berlin, 1816. (2) Chiliades, consisting in its present form of 12,661 lines. This name was given to it by the first editor, who divided it, without reference to the contents, into thirteen divisions of 1000 lines, the last being incomplete. Its subject-matter is of the most miscellaneous kind, but embraces chiefly mythological and historical narratives, arranged under separate titles, and without any further connexion. The following are a few of them, as they occur: Croesus, Midas, Gyges, Codrus, Alcmaeon, &c. It is written in bad Greek, and in the metre called political verse. Nevertheless his writings are valuable for their information about ancient legends and myths, which he derived from works no longer extant. Edited by Kiessling, Lips. 1826.—2. Isaac, brother of the preceding, the author of a valuable commentary on the Cassandra of Lycophron. The commentary is printed in most of the editions of Lycophron.

Tzitzis or Tzutis (Barambram), a city in the N. of the Dodecaschoenus—that is, the part of Aethiopia immediately above Egypt—S. of Philae, and N. of Taphia.

U.

Ubii, a German people, who originally dwelt on the right bank of the Rhine, but were transported across the river by Agrippa in B.C. 37, at their own request, because they wished to escape the hostilities of the Suevi (Caes. B. G. iv. 3, 18, vi. 29; Tac. Ann. xii. 27, Hist. iv. 28, Germ. 28; Suet. Aug. 21; Strab. p. 194). They took the name of Agrippenses, from their town COLONIA AGRIPPINA.

Ucālēgōn (Οὐκαλέγων), one of the elders at Troy, whose house was burnt at the destruction of the city (Il. iii. 147; Verg. Aen. ii. 312). Hence in 'Proximus ardet Ucalegon' Juvenal uses his name for the neighbour whose house is on fire (iii. 199).

Ucubis, a town in Hispania Baetica, near Corduba (Bell. Hisp. 7).

Ufens (Uffente), a river in Latium, flowing from the Volscian hills past Setia, through the Pontine Marshes, with a sluggish stream, into the Amasenus (Verg. Aen. vii. 801; Sil. It. viii. 382).

Uffugum, a town in Bruttium, between Scyllacium and Rhegium.

Ugernum (Beaucaire), a town in Gallia Narbonensis, on the road from Nemausus to Aquae Sextiae, where Avitus was proclaimed emperor (Strab. p. 178).

Ulia (Montemayor), a Roman municipium in Hispania Baetica, situated upon a hill and upon the road from Gades to Corduba (Strab. p. 141).

Uliarus or Olarionensis Insula (Oleron), an island off the W. coast of Gaul, in the Aquitanian Gulf (Plin. iv. 109).

Ulpianus. 1. Domitius Ulpianus, a celebrated jurist, derived his origin from Tyre in Phoenicia, but was probably not a native of Tyre himself. The time of his birth is unknown. The greater part of his juristical works was written during the reign of Caracalla, especially the two great works Ad Edictum and the Libri ad Sabinum. He was banished or deprived of his functions under Elagabalus, who became emperor in 217; but on the accession of Alexander Severus, 222, he became the emperor's chief adviser. The emperor conferred on Ulpian the office of scriniorum magister, and made him a consiliarius. He also held the office of praefectus annonae, and he was likewise made praefectus praetorio. (Lamprid. Elagab. 16, 4, Alex. Sev. 26, 5.) Ulpian perished in the reign of Alexander by the hands of the soldiers, who forced their way into the palace at night, and killed him in the presence of the emperor and his mother (228). (Dio Cass. lxxx. 2; Zosim. i. 11.) His promotion to the office of praefectus praetorio was probably an unpopular measure. A great part of the numerous writings of Ulpian was still extant in the time of Justinian, and a much greater quantity is excerpted from him by the compilers of the Digest than from any other jurist. The number of excerpts from Ulpian is said to be 2462; and many of the excerpts are of great length, and altogether they form about one-third of the whole body of the Digest. [Dict. of Ant. art. Pandectae.] The excerpts from Paulus and Ulpian together make about one half of the Digest. Ulpian's style is perspicuous, and presents fewer difficulties than that of many of the Roman jurists who are excerpted in the Digest. The great legal knowledge, the good sense, and the industry of Ulpian place him among the first of the Roman jurists, and he has exercised a great influence on the jurisprudence of modern Europe, through the copious extracts from his writings which have been preserved by the compilers of Justinian's Digest. We possess a fragment of a work under the title of Domitii Ulpiani Fragmenta; it is an abridgment of Ulpian's Liber Singu- laris Regularum. Edition by Böcking, Bonn, 1855. Also a small fragment of his Institutiones, included in Huschke's Jurisprud. Antejust.—2. Of Antioch, a sophist, lived in the time of Constantine the Great, and wrote several rhetorical works.

Ulpus Trajanus. [TRAJANUS.]

Ultor, 'the avenger,' a surname of Mars, to whom Augustus built a temple at Rome in the Forum, after taking vengeance upon the murderers of Julius Caesar. [ROMA, p. 807.]

Ulūbrae (Ulubranus, Ulubrensis), a small town in Latium, of uncertain site, but in the neighbourhood of the Pontine Marshes.

Ulysses. [ODYSSEUS.]

Umbria, called by the Greeks Ombrīca (Ὠμβρική), a district of Italy, bounded on the N. by Gallia Cisalpina, from which it was separated by the river Rubicon; on the E. by the Adriatic sea; on the S. by Picenum, from which it was separated by the river Aesis, and by the land of the Sabines, from which it was separated by the river Nar; and on the W. by Etruria, from which it was separated by the Tiber. Under Augustus it formed the sixth Regio of Italy. The Apennines ran through the W. part of the country, but it contained many fertile plains on the coast. For the origin of its inhabitants, the Umbri, see ITALIA, p. 456, a. The Umbri were at a very early period the most powerful people in central Italy, and extended across the peninsula from the Adriatic to the Tyrrhene seas. Thus they inhabited the country afterwards called Etruria, and we are expressly told that Crotona, Perugia, Clusium and other Etruscan cities were built by the Umbrians. They were afterwards deprived of their possessions W. of the Tiber by the Etruscans, and confined to the country between this river and the Adriatic. Their territories were still further diminished by the Senones, a Gallic people, who took possession of the whole country on the coast, from Ariminum to the Aesis. (Dionys. i. 19, ii. 49; Liv. v. 35.) The Umbri were subdued by the Romans in B.C. 307; and after the conquest of the Senones by the Romans in 283, they again obtained possession of the country on the coast of the Adriatic. This district, however, continued to be called Ager Gallicus down to a late period. The chief towns of Umbria were ARIMINUM, FANUM FORTUNAE, MEVANIA, TUDER, NARNIA, and SPOLETIUM.

Umbro (Ombro), one of the largest rivers in Etruria, falling into the Tyrrhene sea, near a town of the same name (Plin. iii. 51).

Ummidius Quadratus. [QUADRATUS.]

Unelli, a maritime people on the N. coast of Gaul, on a promontory opposite Britain (the modern Cotentin), belonging to the Armorici (Caes. B. G. ii. 34, iii. 1; cf. VENETI).

Upis (Ὀπίς). 1. A goddess of childbirth identified with ARTEMIS, and hence also represented as one of her nymphs (Callim. Hymn. in Dian. 240; Verg. Aen. xi. 532).

Ur. [EDESSA.]

Urānia. [MUSAE; APHRODITE.]

Urānus (Ὀὐρανός) or Heaven, sometimes called a son, and sometimes the husband, of Gaea (Earth). By Gaea Uranus became the father of Oceanus, Coeus, Crius, Hyperion, Iapetus, Thia, Rhia, Themis, Mnemosyne, Phoebe, Tethys, Cronos; of the Cyclopes—Storpes, Steropes, Arges; and of the Hecatoncheires—Cottus, Briareus, and Gyes. Cicero mentions traditions that Uranus was also the father of Hermes by Dia, and of Aphrodite by Hemera (Cic. N. D. iii. 22, 55–58). Uranus hated his children, and immediately after their birth he confined them in Tartarus, in consequence of which he was mutilated and dethroned by Cronos at the instigation of Gaea. Out of the drops of his blood sprang the Gigantes, the Erinyes, the Melian nymphs, and according to some, Silenus, and from the foam gathering around the part which was thrown into the sea sprang Aphrodite. (Hes. Th. 126–193; Apollod. i. 1; Serv. ad Aen. v. 801, ad Ecl. vi. 18.) It has been remarked above [TITANES] that the dynasties of gods which Greek mythology eventually represented as preceding Zeus are really the deities of earlier inhabitants of Greek lands whom the Greeks adopted and fitted into their own theogony, accounting for the supremacy of Zeus, the great Greek deity, by representing the supreme deities of primitive barbarous tribes as earlier races of gods. The savage myths attached to them are simply the savage superstitions of these primitive tribes, which, though preserved by Hesiod, are unnoticed by Homer, who rejects most of the ugly and un-Greek myths. It is suggested that the barbarous myth of the mutilation of Uranus was a savage representation of the separation of earth and sky, which were regarded as having been so joined as to cause darkness. It is said that the Maoris of New Zealand have a similar story.

Urbigēnus Pagus. [HELVETII.]

Urbīnum (Urbinas, -atis). 1. Hortense (Urbino), a town in Umbria and a municipium, situated on a steep round rock (Tac. Hist. iii. 62; Procop. B. G. ii. 29).—2. Metaurense (Urbania), a town in Umbria, on the river Metaurus, and not far from its source (Plin. iii. 114).

Urbs Salvia. [POLLENTIA, No. 2.]

Urci, a town of the Bastetani in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the coast, and on the road from Castulo to Malaca (Plin. iii. 26; Ptol. ii. 6, 14).

Urcinīum (Ajaccio), a town on the W. coast of Corsica.

Urgo or Gorgon (Gorgona), an island off the coast of Etruria, N. of ILVA.

Uria (Urias: Oria), called Hyria (Ἥρην) by Herodotus, a town in Calabria on the road from Brundisium to Tarentum, was the ancient capital of Iapygia, and is said to have been founded by the Cretans under Minos (Hdt. vii. 170; Strab. p. 282).

Urium, a small town in Apulia, from which the Sinus Urias took its name, being the bay on the N. side of Mt. Garganus opposite the Diomedean islands.

Urseius Ferox, one of the most eminent jurists in the reign of Vespasian.

Urso (Osuna), a town of Hispania Baetica, the last refuge of the Pompeians (Strab. p. 141; App. Hisp. 16).

Ursus, a contemporary of Domitian, whom he dissuaded from killing his wife, Domitia (Dio Cass. lxxvii. 3). Statius addressed to him a poem of consolation on the death of a favourite slave (Silv. ii. 6), and he also mentions him in the Preface to the second book of his Silvae.

Uscāna, a large town in Illyria, on a tributary of the Aous (Liv. xliii. 10).

Usipētes or Usipii, a German people, who, being driven out of their abodes by the Suevi, crossed the Rhine and penetrated into Gaul; but they were defeated by Caesar, and compelled to recross the river [cf. TENCTERI]. They were now received by the Sugambri, and allowed to dwell on the N. bank of the Lippe; but we afterwards find them S. of the Lippe; and at a still later time they become lost under the general name of Alemanni. (Caes. B.G. iv. 4; Tac. Ann. i. 50, xiii. 54, Agr. 27.)

Ustica, a valley near the Sabine villa of Horace. [HORATIUS.]

Utica (ἡ Ὑτική or Οὐτική: Ὑτικάϊος, Uticensis: Bou-Shater, Ru.), the greatest city of ancient Africa, after Carthage, was a Phoenician colony, older (and, if the chronologers are to be trusted, much older) than Carthage. Like others of the very ancient Phoenician colonies in the territory of Carthage, Utica maintained a comparative independence, even during the height of the Punic power, and was rather the ally of Carthage than her subject. (Vell. Pat. i. 2; Just. xviii. 4; Strab. p. 832.) It stood on the shore of the N. part of the Carthaginian Gulf, a little W. of the mouth of the Bagradas, and twenty-seven Roman miles NW. of Carthage; but its site is now inland, in consequence of the changes effected by the Bagradas in the coast-line. [BAGRADAS.] In the third Punic war, Utica took part with the Romans against Carthage, and was rewarded with the greatest part of the Carthaginian territory. (Ptol. xxxvi. 1; App. Pun. 75, 113.) It afterwards became renowned to all future time as the scene of the last stand made by the Pompeian party against Caesar, and of the glorious, though mistaken, self-sacrifice of the younger Cato. [CATO.]

Utis (Montone), a river of Gallia Cisalpina, which rises in the Apennines and flows past Forum Julii (Forlì) and Ravenna into the Adriatic (Liv. v. 35).

Utus (Vid), a river in Moesia and a tributary of the Danube, falling into the latter river at the town Utus.

Uxāma (Osma), a town of the Arevaci in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Asturica to Caesaraugusta, fifty miles W. of Numantia (Ptol. ii. 6, 56; Flor. iii. 22; Sil. It. iii. 384).

Uxantis (Ushant), an island off the NW. coast of Gaul.

Uxellodūnum (Issolu), a town of the Cadurci in Gallia Aquitania, situated on a steep hill, rising out of the plain, at the foot of which a river flowed. It was besieged and taken by Caesar, and its inhabitants were treated with great barbarity. ([Caes.] B.G. viii. 32-44.)

Uxentum (Uxentinus: Ugento), a town in Calabria, NW. of the Iapygian promontory (Ptol. iii. 1, 76; Plin. iii. 102).

Uxii (Ὀὔξιοι), a warlike people, of predatory habits, who had their strongholds in M. Parachoathras, on the N. border of Persis, in the district called Uxia (Ὀὔξια), but who also extended over a considerable tract of country in Media (Arr. An. iii. 17; Strab. pp. 524, 729).

V.

Vacca, Vaga, or Vaba (Ὀῤαγα, Βάγα: Beja), a city of Zeugitana in N. Africa, on the borders of Numidia, on an E. tributary of the river Tusca, a good day's journey S. of Utica. It was a great emporium for the trade between Hippo, Utica and Carthage and the interior. It was destroyed by Metellus in the Jugurthine war, but was restored and colonised by the Romans. Its fortifications were renewed by Justinian, who named it Theodorias in honour of his wife. (Strab. p. 831; Ptol. iv. 3, 28; Sall. Jug. 29, 47; Procop. Aed. vi. 5.)

Vaccaei, a people in the interior of Hispania Tarraconensis, occupying the modern Toro, Palencia, Burgos, and Valladolid, E. of the Astures, S. of the Cantabri, W. of the Celtiberi (Liv. xxx. 7; Pol. iii. 14; Strab. p. 152; Diod. v. 34; Plin. iii. 19). Their chief towns were PALLANTIA and INTERCATIA.

Vacua, Vagia, or Vacca (Vouga), a river of Lusitania, which flows into the Atlantic a little S. of the Douro (Plin. iv. 113; Strab. p. 153).

Vacuna, a Sabine goddess, worshipped especially in a sacred grove near the Lacus Velinus and Reate (Plin. iii. 109); and also in a temple near Horace's farm (Hor. Ep. i. 10, 49). Vacuna was particularly regarded as the goddess of victory, but also as a great national deity of the Sabines (Ov. Fast. vi. 307); she also presided over the works of the garden and field (hence identified both with Venus and with Ceres), and over the woods and hunting (hence identified with Diana). Moreover, as goddess of victory in war she is sometimes confused with Bellona and sometimes with Minerva (Dionys. i. 15; Schol. ad Hor. l.c.).

Vada. 1. A fortress of the Batavi in Gallia Belgica, E. of Batavodurum (Tac. Hist. v. 21).

—2. Vada Sabbatia (Vado), a town of Liguria, on the coast, which was the harbour of Sabbata or Savo (Cic. ad Fam. xi. 10; Strab. p. 202).

—3. Vada Volaterrana (Torre di Vado), a small town on the coast of Etruria, in the territory of Volaterrae.

Vadicassii, a people in Gallia Belgica, near the sources of the Sequana (Plin. iv. 107; Ptol. ii. 8, 16).

Vadimōnis Lacus (Lago di Bassano), a small lake of Etruria of a circular form, with sulphureous waters, and renowned for its floating islands, a minute description of which is given by the younger Pliny (Ep. viii. 20). It is celebrated in history for the defeat of the Etruscans in two great battles: first, by the dictator Papirius Cursor, in B.C. 309, from the effects of which the Etruscans never recovered (Liv. ix. 39); and again in 288, when the allied forces of the Etruscans and Gauls were routed by the consul Cornelius Dolabella (Pol. ii. 20; Flor. i. 13). The lake has so shrunk in dimensions in modern times as to be only a small stagnant pond, almost lost in the tall reeds and bulrushes which grow in it.

Vagienni, a small tribe in Liguria, whose chief town was Augusta Vagiennorum. Their site is uncertain, but they perhaps dwelt near Saluzzo (Plin. iii. 117).

Vāhālis. [RHENUS.]

Vālēns, emperor of the East A.D. 364-378, was born about A.D. 328, and was made emperor by his brother Valentinian. [VALENTINIANUS.] The greater part of Valens' reign is occupied by his wars with the Goths. At first he gained great advantages over the barbarians, and concluded a peace with them in 370, on the condition that they should not cross the Danube. In 376 the Goths were driven out of their country by the Huns, and were allowed by Valens to cross the Danube and settle in Thrace and the country on the borders of the Danube. Dissensions soon arose between the Romans and these dangerous neighbours, and in 377 the Goths took up arms under Fritigern. Valens collected a powerful army, and marched against the Goths, but he was defeated by them with immense slaughter, near Hadrianople, on the 9th of August, 378. Valens was never seen after the battle: some say he died on the field; and others relate that he was burnt to death in a peasant's house, to which he was carried, and which the barbarians set fire to without knowing who was in it. (Amm. Marc. xxxi. 13.) The reign of Valens is important in the history of the empire on account of the admission of the Goths into the countries S. of the Danube, the commencement of the decline of the Roman power. The furious contests between the rival creeds of the Catholics and the Arians also characterise this reign.

Valens, Aburnius (L. Fulvius Aburnius Valens), one of the jurists who are excerpted in the Digest, belonged to the school of the Sabinians. He flourished under Antoninus Pius, and is probably the Valens mentioned in Capitol. Ant. Pi. 12, 1.

Valens, Fabius, one of the principal generals of the emperor Vitellius in A.D. 69, marched into Italy through Gaul, and, after forming a junction with the forces of Caecina, defeated Otho in the decisive battle of Bedriacum, which secured for Vitellius the sovereignty of Italy. Vitellius raised Valens and Caecina to the consulship, and he left the whole government in their hands. Valens remained faithful to Vitellius, when Antonius Primus, the general of Vespasian, marched into Italy; but as he had not sufficient forces to oppose Antonius after the capture of Cremona, he resolved to sail to Gaul and rouse the Gallic provinces to espouse the cause of Vitellius; but he was taken prisoner at the islands of the Stoechades (Hyères), off Massilia, and was shortly afterwards put to death at Urbinum (Urbino). (Tac. Hist. i. 7, 52-66, ii. 24-30, 56, 92, 99, iii. 40, 62; Plut. Oth. 6.)

Valens, Vettius, a physician in the reign of Claudius. He was one of the paramours of Messallina, and was put to death A.D. 48. (Tac. Ann. xi. 31, 35; Plin. xxix. 7.)

Valentia. 1. (Valencia), the chief town of the Edetani on the river Turia, three miles from the coast, and on the road from Carthago Nova to Castulo. It was founded by Junius Brutus, who settled here the soldiers of Viriathus; it was destroyed by Pompey, but it was soon afterwards rebuilt and made a Roman colony. It continued to be an important place down to the latest times. (Liv. Ep. 55; Plut. Pomp. 18; Plin. iii. 20; Mel. ii. 6; Ptol. ii. 6, 62.)—2. (Valencia), a town in Gallia Narbonensis on the Rhone, and a Roman colony (Plin. iii. 36; Ptol. ii. 10, 12).—3. A town in the interior of Sardinia.—4. Or Valentium, a town in Apulia, ten miles from Brundisium, SE. of Usellis (Plin. iii. 85).—5. [VIBO].—6. A fifth province of Britain, added in 369 to the four of the Diocletian arrangement. [BRITANNIA].—7. Or Valentinum. [FORUM FULVII.]

Valentinianus. I., Roman emperor A.D. 364-375, was the son of Gratianus, and was born A.D. 321, at Cibalis in Pannonia. His first wife was Valeria Severa, by whom he became the father of the emperor Gratianus. He held important military commands under Julian and Jovian; and on the death of the latter, in February 364, Valentinian was elected emperor by the troops at Nicæa. A few weeks after his elevation Valentinian, by the desire of the soldiers, associated in the empire his brother Valens, and assigned to him the East, while he himself undertook the government of the West. Valentinian was a Catholic, though his brother Valens was an Arian; but he did not persecute either Arians or heathens. He possessed good abilities, prudence, and vigour of character. He had a capacity for military matters, and was a vigilant, impartial, and laborious administrator. The greater part of Valentinian's reign was occupied by the wars against the Alemanni and the other barbarians on the Roman frontiers. His operations were attended with success. He not only drove the Alemanni out of Gaul, but on more than one occasion crossed the Rhine, and carried the war into the enemy's country. His usual residence was Treviri (Trèves). In 375 he went to Carnuntum on the Danube, in order to repel the Quadi and Sarmatians, who had invaded Pannonia. After an indecisive campaign he took up his winter-quarters at Bregetio. In this place, while giving an audience to the deputies of the Quadi, and speaking with great heat, he fell down in a fit and expired suddenly, on the 17th of November. (Amm. Marc. xxviii.-xxx.; Zosim. iv. 17.)—II., Roman emperor A.D. 375-392, younger son of the preceding, was proclaimed Augustus by the army after his father's death, though he was then only four or five years of age. His elder brother Gratianus, who had been proclaimed Augustus during the lifetime of their father, assented to the choice of the army, and a division of the West was made between the two brothers. Valentinian had Italy, Illyricum, and Africa. Gratian had the Gauls, Spain, and Britain. In 383 Gratian was defeated and slain by Maximus, who left Valentinian a precarious authority out of fear for Theodosius, the emperor of the East; but in 387 Valentinian was expelled from Italy by Maximus, and fled for refuge to Theodosius. In 388 Theodosius defeated Maximus, and restored Valentinian to his authority as emperor of the West. Theodosius returned to Constantinople in 391; and in the following year (392) Valentinian was murdered by the general Arbogastes, who raised Eugenius to the throne. Valentinian perished on the 15th of May, being only a few months above twenty years of age. His funeral oration was pronounced by St. Ambrose.—III., Roman emperor A.D. 425-455, was born 419, and was the son of Constantius III. by Placidia, the sister of Honorius and the daughter of Theodosius I. He was declared Augustus in 425 by Theodosius II., and was placed over the West, but as he was only six years of age the government was intrusted to his mother Placidia. During his long reign the empire was repeatedly exposed to the invasions of the barbarians; and it was only the military abilities of Aëtius which saved the empire from ruin. In 429 the Vandals under Genseric crossed over into Africa, which they conquered, and of which they continued in possession till the reign of Justinian. The weakness of the empire during this reign was shown also by the fact that the Britons (from whose country the Roman troops had been withdrawn forty years before), finding it vain to apply to Rome for aid against the incursions of the Picts, invited the Jutes under Hengest and Horsa to help them, in 449. The Goths likewise established themselves in Gaul; but Aëtius finally made peace with them (439), and with their assistance gained a great victory over Attila and the vast army of the Huns at Châlons in 451. [ATTILA.] The power and influence of Aëtius excited the jealousy and fears of Valentinian, who murdered his brave and faithful general in 454. [AETIUS.] In the following year the emperor himself was slain by Petronius Maximus, whose wife he had violated. He was a feeble and contemptible prince.

Valéria. 1. Sister of P. Valerius Publicola, advised the Roman matrons to ask Veturia, the mother of Coriolanus, to go to the camp of Coriolanus in order to deprecate his resentment. [CORIOLANUS.]—2. The last wife of Sulla, was the daughter of M. Valerius Messalla, and bore a daughter soon after Sulla's death (Plut. Popl. 35, 37).—3. Galéria Valéria, daughter of Diocletian and Prisca, was, upon the reconstruction of the empire in A.D. 292, united to Galerius, one of the new Caesars. After the death of her husband, in 311, Valeria rejected the proposals of his successor, Maximinus, who in consequence stripped her of her possessions, and banished her along with her mother. After the death of Maximinus, Valeria and her mother were executed by order of Licinius, 315. [GALERIUS.]—4. Messallina. [MESSALLINA.]

Valéria Gens, one of the most ancient patrician houses at Rome. The Valerii were of Sabine origin, and their ancestor, Volesus or Volusus, is said to have settled at Rome with Titus Tatius. One of the descendants of this Volesus, P. Valerius, afterwards surnamed Publicola, plays a distinguished part in the story of the expulsion of the kings, and was elected consul in the first year of the republic, B.C. 509. From this time forward down to the latest period of the empire, for nearly 1000 years, the name occurs more or less frequently in the Fasti, and it was borne by the emperors Maximinus, Maximianus, Maxentius, Diocletian, Constantius, Constantine the Great, and others. The Valeria gens enjoyed extraordinary honours and privileges at Rome. In the Circus a conspicuous place, with a sella curulis (Liv. ii. 31), was set apart for them. They were also allowed to bury their dead within the walls (Cic. Legg. ii. 23, 58; Plut. Popl. 23). The Valerii in early times were always foremost in advocating the rights of the plebeians, and the laws (especially the law of appeal) which they proposed at various times were the great charters of the liberties of the second order. (See Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Leges Valeriae.) The Valeria gens was divided into various families under the republic, the most important of which bore the names of CORVUS, FLACCUS, LAEVINUS, MESSALLA, PUBLICOLA, and TRIARIUS.

Valéria, a province in Pannonia formed by Galerius, and named in honour of his wife. [PANNONIA.]

Valérianus. 1. Roman emperor A.D. 253–260, whose full name was P. Licinius Valerianus. Valerian was proclaimed emperor by the troops whom he was leading against the usurper Aemilianus. Valerian proclaimed his son Gallienus Augustus, and first carried on war against the Goths, whom he defeated (257). But though the barbarians still threatened the Roman frontiers on the Danube and the Rhine, the conquests of the Persians, who had crossed the Euphrates and stormed Antioch, compelled him to hasten to the East. For a time his measures were both vigorous and successful. Antioch was recovered, and the Persian king Sapor was compelled to fall back behind the Euphrates; but the emperor, flushed by his good fortune, followed too rashly. He was surrounded, in the vicinity of Edessa, by the countless horsemen of his active foe; he was entrapped into a conference, taken prisoner (260), and passed the remainder of his life in captivity, subjected to every insult which Oriental cruelty could devise. After death his skin was stuffed and long preserved as a trophy in the chief temple of the nation. (Aurel. Vict.

Caes. 32; Eutrop. ix. 6; Amm. Marc. xxiii. 5.)—2. Son of the preceding, but not by the same mother as Gallienus. He perished along with Gallienus at Milan in 268. [GALLIENUS.]

Válérius. [VALERIA GENS.]

Válérius, P. Asiaticus. 1. Consul suffectus under Caligula, and consul A.D. 46 under Claudius. He was wealthy and had beautiful gardens, coveted by Messallina, who procured an accusation of treason against him which led to his death in 47. (Tac. Ann. xi. 1, xiii. 43; Dio Cass. lix. 30, lx. 27–31).—2. Legatus of Gallia Belgica at the death of Nero. He was son-in-law and supporter of Vitellius. (Tac. Hist. i. 59, iv. 4, 6.)

Válérius Volusus Máximus, M' (or M.?). 1. Was a brother of P. Valerius Publicola. He fought at the battle of L. Regillus, and was killed (Liv. ii. 16, 20; Dionys. v. 37; Plut. Popl. 20).—2. Dictator in B.C. 494, when the dissensions between the burghers and commonalty of Rome de nexis were at the highest. Valerius was popular with the plebs, and induced them to enlist for the Sabine and Aequian wars by promising that when the enemy was repulsed the condition of the debtors (nexi) should be alleviated. He defeated and triumphed over the Sabines; but, unable to fulfil his promise to the commons, resigned his dictatorship. The plebs, seeing that Valerius at least had kept faith with them, escorted him honourably home. (Liv. ii. 30, 31.) According to Livy, he was son of the Valerius Volusus who fought at Regillus, but some have conjectured that he was the same man, and was only wounded, not killed, at Regillus. It is certainly strange that the dictator of 494 should have had a father active in battle in 497.

Válérius Máximus, is known to us as the compiler of a large collection of historical anecdotes, entitled De Factis Dictisque Memorabilibus Libri IX, arranged under different heads, the sayings and doings of Roman worthies being, moreover, kept distinct in each division from those of foreigners. He lived in the reign of the emperor Tiberius, to whom he dedicated his work. Of his personal history we know nothing, except the solitary circumstance, recorded by himself, that he accompanied Sex. Pompeius into Asia (ii. 6, 8)—the Sextus Pompeius who was consul A.D. 14, and afterwards proconsul of Asia. The subjects treated of in the work are miscellaneous, and it seems to have been compiled as a collection of historical instances for the use of rhetoricians. In some books the topics selected for illustration are closely allied to each other; in others no bond of union can be traced. Thus the first book is entirely devoted to matters connected with sacred rites; the second book relates chiefly to certain remarkable civil institutions; the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth, to the more prominent social virtues; but in the seventh the chapters De Strategematis, De Repulsis, are abruptly followed by those De Necessitate, De Testamentis Rescissis, De Ratis Testamentis et Insperatis. The work is by no means without value, since it preserves a record of many curious events not to be found elsewhere; but, regarded as a history, it is wholly uncritical and shallow, so written as to flatter Tiberius wherever it was possible, and with a violent tirade against Sejanus, added, probably, after the fall of that minister, though before the first publication of the book. He uses as his chief sources, but often confusedly, Livy, Cicero, Sallust, and Pompeius Trogus. For the events of his own time the value of his testimony is impaired by his desire to write only what would be likely to please Tiberius. The work of Valerius Maximus became very popular in the later times of the empire and in the middle ages. It was frequently abridged, and we still possess an abridgment of it made by Julius Paris.—The best editions of the original work are by Kempf, Leips. 1888, and C. Holm, Leips. 1865.

Valerius Flaccus. [FLACCUS.]

Valgius Rufus, C., a Roman poet, and a contemporary of Virgil and Horace, the latter of whom ranks him, along with Varius, Maecenas, and Virgil, among those friends of genius whose approbation far more than compensated for the annoyance caused by the attacks of his detractors (Hor. Sat. i. 10, 82). He was consul suffectus in B.C. 12. He wrote elegies and epigrams, and perhaps some epic poetry (Hor. Od. ii. 9; Tib. iv. 1, 180; Serv. ad Aen. xi. 457), and books on botany (Plin. xxv. 4) and on grammar (Gell. xii. 13).

Vandāli, Vandālii, or Vindālii, a confederacy of German peoples, probably of the great Suevic race, to which the Burgundiones, Gothones, Gepidae, and Rugii belonged. They dwelt originally on the N. coast of Germany, but were afterwards settled N. of the Marcomanni in the Riesengebirge, which are hence called Vandalici Montes. (Capitol. M. Ant. Phil. 17; Eutrop. viii. 13; Jordan. Get. 22.) They subsequently appear for a short time in Dacia and Pannonia; but at the beginning of the fifth century (A.D. 409) they traversed Germany and Gaul, and invaded Spain. In this country they subjugated the Alani, and founded a powerful kingdom, the name of which is still preserved in Andalusia (Vandalusia). In A.D. 429 they crossed over into Africa, under their king Genseric, and conquered all the Roman dominions in that country. Genseric subsequently invaded Italy, and took and plundered Rome in 455. The Vandals continued masters of Africa till 535, when their kingdom was destroyed by Belisarius, and annexed to the Byzantine empire. [BELISARIUS.]

Vangiones, a German people, dwelling along the Rhine, in the neighbourhood of the modern Worms (Caes. B. G. i. 51; Tac. Ann. xii. 27, Germ. 28).

Vannius, king of the Suevi, recognised by the Romans, A.D. 19, after the overthrow of Maroboduus. He reigned for thirty years, but was dispossessed by his nephews, Sido and Vangio, A.D. 50. Claudius did not aid him with troops, but gave him a territory in Pannonia. (Tac. Ann. ii. 63, xii. 29, 30; Plin. iv. 81.)

Vapincum (Gap), a town in Gallia Narbonensis, S. of Cularo (Grenoble), and not far from the Druentia (Durance). It lies just S. of the Col Bayard, which was probably 'the first ascent to the Alps' on Hannibal's route (Pol. iii. 49), and Vapincum was in all probability the town which is mentioned both by Polybius and by Livy as the chief town or castellum of the natives who defended that defile (Pol. l. c.; Liv. xxi. 33), though Livy places it on the wrong side of the Druentia [cf. HANNIBAL].

Varagri. [VERAGRI.]

Vardanes or Bardanes. [ARSACES XXI.]

Vardūli, a people in Hispania Tarraconensis, W. of the Vascones, in the modern Guipuzcoa and Alava (Strab. p. 162; Ptol. ii. 6, 9; Pl. n. iii. 26).

Vargunteius, a senator and one of Catiline's conspirators, undertook, in conjunction with C. Cornelius, to murder Cicero in B.C. 63, but their plan was frustrated by information conveyed to Cicero through Fulvia. He was afterwards brought to trial, but could find no one to defend him. (Sall. Cat. 17, 47.)

Vāria. 1. (Vicovaro), a town of the Sabines, in the valley of the Anio, about eight miles above Tibur, and near Horace's villa (Hor. Ep. i. 14, 3; Strab. p. 237; HORATIUS, p. 428, a). —2. (Varea), a town of the Berones in Hispania Tarraconensis on the Iberus, which was navigable from this town (Plin. iii. 21; Strab. p. 162).

Varini, a people of Germany, on the right bank of the Albis, N. of the Langobardi (Tac. Germ. 40).

Vārius. 1. Q. Varius Hybrida, tribune of the plebs, B.C. 90, was a native of Sucro in Spain, and received the surname of Hybrida because his mother was a Spanish woman. In his tribuneship he carried a lex de majestate, in order to punish all those who had assisted or advised the Socii to take up arms against the Roman people. Under this law many distinguished senators were condemned; but in the following year Varius himself was condemned under his own law, and was put to death. (App. B. C. i. 57; Val. Max. viii. 6, 4; Cic. de Or. i. 25; N. D. iii. 33.) —2. L. Varius Rufus, one of the most distinguished poets of the Augustan age, the companion and friend of Virgil and Horace. By the latter he is placed in the foremost rank among the epic bards, and Quintilian has pronounced that his tragedy of Thyestes might stand a comparison with any production of the Grecian stage. (Quint. x. 1, 98; Tac. Dial. 12.) He enjoyed the friendship of Maecenas, and it was to the recommendation of Varius in conjunction with that of Virgil, that Horace was indebted for an introduction to the minister, about B.C. 39. Virgil appointed Plotius Tucca and Varius his literary executors, and they revised the Aeneid. Hence Varius was alive subsequent to B.C. 19, in which year Virgil died; but from Verg. Ecl. ix. 85 it may be inferred that Varius was somewhat older than Virgil. It has been inferred from Hor. Ep. ii. 1, 247, that Varius was dead before the second book of the Epistles was written, and this is probably right, though the words are not conclusive. Besides the tragedy Thyestes Varius wrote two epic poems (cf. Hor. Sat. i. 10, 44), one De Morte on the death of Caesar (Macrob. vi. 1, 39, vi. 2, 19), the other a panegyric of Augustus, from which, according to the scholiast, Horace quotes the three lines of Ep. i. 16, 27–29, and this poem, which included the praises of Agrippa, is alluded to in Hor. Od. i. 6.

Varro, Atacinus. [See below, Varro, No. 3.]

Varro, Cingōnius, a Roman senator under Nero, supported the claims of Nymphidius to the throne on the death of Nero, and was put to death in consequence by Galba, being at the time consul designatus (Tac. Ann. xiv. 45; Hist. i. 6, 37; Plut. Galb. 14).

Varro, Terentius. 1. C., consul B.C. 216 with L. Aemilius Paulus. Varro is said to have been the son of a butcher, to have carried on business himself as a factor in his early years, and to have risen to eminence by pleading the causes of the lower classes in opposition to the opinion of all good men (Liv. xxii. 25; Val. Max. iii. 4, 4). Notwithstanding the strong opposition of the aristocracy, he was raised to the consulship by the people, who thought that it only needed a man of energy at the head of an overwhelming force to bring the war against Hannibal to a close, and who, moreover, had an unfounded mistrust of the aims and motives of the senate. His colleague was L. Aemilius Paulus, one of the leaders of the aristocratical party. The two consuls were defeated by Hannibal at the memorable battle of Cannae. [HANNIBAL.] The battle was fought by Varro against the advice of Paulus. The Roman army was all but annihilated. Paulus and almost all the officers perished. Varro was one of the few who escaped and reached Venusia in safety, with about seventy horsemen. His conduct after the battle seems to have deserved praise. He proceeded to Canusium, where the remnant of the Roman army had taken refuge, and there adopted every precaution which the exigencies of the case required. His defeat was forgotten in the services he had lately rendered. On his return to the city all classes went out to meet him, and the senate returned him thanks because he had not despaired of the commonwealth. This marked the determination of patricians and plebeians to work heartily together against the foreign enemy. (Liv. xxii. 35-61; Pol. iii. 106-116; Plut. Fab. 14-18; App. Ann. 17-26.) Varro continued to be employed in Italy for several successive years in important military commands till nearly the close of the Punic war (Liv. xxiii. 32, xxvii. 35, xxxi. 49).—2. M. Terentius Varro Reatinus, the celebrated writer, whose vast and varied erudition in almost every department of literature earned for him the title of the 'most learned of the Romans' (Quint. x. i. 95; Dionys. ii. 21; August. C. D. vi. 2; cf. Cic. Acad. Post. i. 3, 9) was born at Reate B.C. 116, and was trained under L. Aelius Stilo Praeconinus, and afterwards by Antiochus, a philosopher of the Academy. Varro held a high naval command in the wars against the pirates and Mithridates, and afterwards served as the legatus of Pompeius in Spain in the Civil war, but was compelled to surrender his forces to Caesar. (Flor. ii. 13, 29; Caes. B. C. i. 38, ii. 17-20.) He then passed over into Greece, and shared the fortunes of the Pompeian party till after the battle of Pharsalia, when he obtained the forgiveness of Caesar, who employed him in superintending the collection and arrangement of the great library designed for public use. (Suet. Jul. 44; Isid. Or. vi. 5.) For some years after this period Varro remained in literary seclusion, passing his time chiefly at his country seats near Cumae and Tusculum, occupied with study and composition. Caesar had forced Antony to restore to Varro an estate which he had seized (Cic. Phil. ii. 40, 103), and, perhaps in consequence, upon the formation of the second triumvirate his name appeared upon the list of the proscribed; but he succeeded in making his escape, and, after having remained for some time concealed, he obtained the protection of Octavian. His life is said to have been saved by Fufius Calenus (App. B. C. iv. 47), and it is probable that he recovered a great portion of his estates; but most of his magnificent library had been destroyed (Gell. iii. 10). The remainder of his career was passed in tranquillity, and he continued to labour in his favourite studies. His death took place B.C. 28, when he was in his eighty-ninth year. Not only was Varro the most learned of Roman scholars, but he was likewise the most voluminous of Roman authors. Gellius (l. c.) states that Varro claimed to have written 490 books before he was seventy-seven: Ausonius gives in round numbers 600 as the total number of books written by Varro (Prof. Burd. xx. 10); and this agrees with a list given by Jerome which makes out the writings of Varro to consist of seventy-four different works, containing altogether 620 books. Hence it would appear that 130 of the books were written in the last twelve years of his life. Of these works only two have survived:—(1) De Re Rustica Libri III, still extant, was written when the author was eighty years old (R. R. i. 1, 1), and is the most important of all the treatises upon ancient agriculture now extant, being far superior to the more voluminous production of Columella, with which alone it can be compared. Edited by Keil, Halle, 1849, and in the Scriptores Rei Rusticae veteres Latini, by Schneider, Lips. 1764-1797. (2) De Lingua Latina, a grammatical treatise which extended to twenty-four books; but six only (v.-x.) have been preserved, and these are in a mutilated condition. The remains of this treatise are particularly valuable, since they have been the means of preserving many terms and forms which would otherwise have been altogether lost, and much curious information is here treasured up connected with the ancient usages, both civil and religious, of the Romans. Editions by Spengel, Berl. 1826 (re-edited 1885), and by O. Müller, Leips. 1883. The work entitled Antiquitatum Libri was divided into two sections: Antiquitates Rerum humanarum, in twenty-five books, and Antiquitates Rerum divinarum, in sixteen books. It described the political and religious institutions of Rome, and was Varro's great work, upon which chiefly his reputation for profound learning was based; but unfortunately only a few fragments of it have come down to us. With the second section of the work we are, comparatively speaking, familiar, since Augustine drew very largely from this source in his De Civitate Dei [cf. INDIGITAMENTA, p. 442, b]. Varro wrote also a collection of biographies called Imagines or Hebdomades in fifteen books; Disciplinae in nine books, which described the 'liberal arts,' viz. grammar, dialectic, rhetoric, geometry, arithmetic, astrology, music, medicine, and architecture; and other works on philosophy (Logistorici in seventy-six books), geography, and law. Among his poetical works were the Saturae, which were composed in a variety of metres, with an admixture of prose also. Varro in these pieces copied to a certain extent the productions of Menippus the Gadarene [MENIPPUS], and hence designated them as Saturae Menippeae s. Cynicae. They appear to have been a series of disquisitions on a vast variety of subjects, frequently, if not uniformly, couched in the shape of dialogue, the object proposed being the inculcation of moral lessons and serious truths in a familiar, playful, and even jocular style. The best editions of the fragments of these Saturae are by Riese, Leips. 1865, and Bücheler (with Petronius), Berl. 1882. The Sententiae Varronis, a collection of pithy sayings, may possibly have been gathered from the writings of Varro Reatinus; but even that is uncertain (ed. Devit, Padua, 1843).—3. P., a Latin poet of considerable celebrity, surnamed Atacinus, from the Atax, a river of Gallia Narbonensis, his native province, was born B.C. 32. Of his personal history nothing further is known. He seems to have written, first, an epic on part of Caesar's Gallic wars, called Bellum Sequanicum (Prisc. Gr. Lat. ii. 497), and Saturae in imitation of Lucilius (Hor. Sat. i. 10, 46); and at a later time to have imitated the Alexandrian poets in the Argonautae (borrowed from Ap. Rhod.), and in elegiac love-poems. (Quint. x. 1, 87; Ov. Am. i. 15, 21, Trist. ii. 439; Propert. ii. 34, 85; Prob. ad Verg. Georg. ii. 126.)

Vārus, a cognomen in many Roman gentes, signified a person who had his legs bent inwards, and was opposed to Valgius, which signified a person having his legs turned outward.

Vārus, P. Alfēnus. 1. A Roman jurist, was a pupil of Servius Sulpicius, and the only pupil of Servius from whom there are any excerpts in the Digest (Gell. vii. 5). The scholiast on Horace (Sat. i. 3, 130) tells us that the 'Alfenus vafer' of Horace was a lawyer, and that he was a native of Cremona, where he carried on the trade of a shoemaker; that he came to Rome, where he became a pupil of Servius Sulpicius, attained the dignity of the consulship, and was honoured with a public funeral. It is probable that he is the Varus who attended the lectures of Siron at the same time as Virgil (Serv. ad Ecl. vi. 13), and whom Virgil mentions in the Eclogues (vi. 13, ix. 27), referring to the time when Alfenus Varus was Octavian's legate, and able to help him in preserving his property (B.C. 40).—2. A general of Vitellius, in the Civil war in A.D. 69, and perhaps a descendant of the jurist (Tac. Hist. ii. 29, iii. 55, iv. 11.)

Vārus, Atius. 1. P., a partisan of Pompey in the Civil war, was stationed in Picenum on the breaking out of the Civil war in B.C. 49. He subsequently crossed over into Africa, and took possession of the province, which was then governed by Q. Ligarius. [LIGARIUS.] Varus, having been propraetor of Africa, was well acquainted with the country, and was able to raise two legions without difficulty. Meantime, L. Aelius Tubero, who had received from the senate the province of Africa, arrived to take the command; but Varus would not allow him to land. In the course of the same year Varus, assisted by king Juba, defeated Curio, Caesar's legate, who had crossed over from Sicily to Africa. [CURIO.] He fought with the other Pompeians in Africa against Caesar in 46; but after the battle of Thapsus he sailed away to Cn. Pompey in Spain, and fell at the battle of Munda. His head was carried to Caesar. (Cic. ad Att. viii. 13, 15, 20; Caes. B.C. i. 12, 13, 31; App. B.C. ii. 44–46, 105; Dio Cass. xliii. 31; Lucan, iv. 713).—2. Q. Atius Varus, commander of the cavalry under C. Fabius, one of Caesar's legates in Gaul, and probably the same as the Q. Varus who commanded the cavalry under Domitius, one of Caesar's generals in Greece in the war with Pompey (Caes. B.C. iii. 37; [Caes.] B.G. viii. 28).

Vārus, Quintilius. 1. Sex., quaestor B.C. 49, belonged to the Pompeian party. He fell into Caesar's hands at the capture of Corfinium, but was dismissed by Caesar. He afterwards fought under Brutus and Cassius against the triumvirs; and after the loss of the battle of Philippi, he ordered his freedman to slay him (Caes. B.C. i. 23, ii. 28; Vell. Pat. ii. 71).—2. P., son of the preceding, was consul B.C. 13, and was subsequently appointed to the government of Syria, where he acquired enormous wealth. Shortly after his return from Syria he was made governor of Germany (probably about A.D. 7). Drusus had conquered a great part of central Germany as far as the Visurgis (Weser); and Varus received orders from Augustus to introduce the Roman jurisdiction into the newly conquered country. The Germans, however, were not prepared to submit to the Roman yoke, and found a leader in ARMINIUS, who secretly organised a general revolt of all the German tribes near the Visurgis. When he had matured his plans, he suddenly attacked Varus, who was marching with three legions and three squadrons of cavalry through a pass of the Saltus Teutoburgiensis, a range of hills covered with wood, which extends N. of the Lippe from Osnabrück to Paderborn. Varus had diverged into this difficult country instead of following the safer route from his summer quarters on the Visurgis (probably near Minden) to Aliso, because a message had arrived that a tribe had revolted in that district, and, having no suspicion of Arminius, he thought it would be an easy matter to suppress the movement on his way. He seems to have managed his march with great carelessness and to have been taken quite unprepared. The battle lasted three days, and ended with the destruction of the Roman army. Varus put an end to his own life. The scene of the disaster is placed by some modern writers in the district of Venne, near the sources of the Haute. Of the 20,000 men who comprised his force only the cavalry and a few stragglers escaped. [Cf. GERMANIA.] When the news of this defeat reached Rome, the whole city was thrown into consternation; and Augustus, who was both weak and aged, gave way to the most violent grief, tearing his garments and calling upon Varus to give him back his legions. (Tac. Ann. i. 61, 71; Dio Cass. lvi. 18–25; Suet. Aug. 23, Tib. 16; Vell. Pat. ii. 117.)

Vārus (Var or Varo), a river in Gallia Narbonensis, forming the boundary between this province and Italy, rises in Mt. Cema in the Alps, and falls into the Mediterranean sea, between Antipolis and Nicaea (Mel. ii. 4; Ptol. ii. 10, 1; Lucan, i. 404).

Vasātes, a people in Gallia Aquitanica, on the Garumna, whose chief town was Cossium (Bazas), on the road from Burdigala to Elusa.

Vascōnes, a powerful people on the N. coast of Hispania Tarraconensis, between the Iberus and the Pyrenees, in the modern Navarre and Guipuzcoa (Strab. pp. 116, 155; Ptol. ii. 8, 10). Their chief towns were POMPELON and CALAGURRIS. They fought in battle bare-headed. Under the empire they were regarded as skilful diviners and prophets (Sil. It. iii. 358). They belonged to the old Iberian race. Their name is still retained in that of the modern Basques.

Vascōnum Saltus. [PYRENE.]

Vasīo (Vaison), a considerable town of the Vocontii in Gallia Narbonensis (Ptol. ii. 10, 17; Mel. ii. 5).

Vatīa Isaurīcus, P. Servilius. 1. Consul in B.C. 79, was sent in the following year as proconsul to Cilicia, in order to clear the seas of the pirates, whose ravages now spread far and wide. He carried on the war with great ability and success, and from his conquest of the Isauri, he obtained the surname of Isauricus. After giving Cilicia the organisation of a Roman province, he entered Rome in triumph in 74. (Liv. Ep. 90, 93; Oros. v. 25; Flor. iii. 6; Strab. pp. 667, 671). After his return Servilius took a leading part in public affairs. In 70 he was one of the judges at the trial of Verres; in 66 he supported the rogation of Manilius for conferring upon Pompey the command of the war against the pirates; in 63 he was a candidate for the dignity of pontifex maximus, but was defeated by Julius Caesar; in the same year he spoke in the senate in favour of inflicting the last penalty of the law upon the Catili-narian conspirators; in 57 he joined the other nobles in procuring Cicero's recall from banishment; in 56 he opposed the restoration of Ptolemy to his kingdom; and in 55 he was censor with M. Valerius Messalla Niger. He took no part in the civil wars, probably on account of his advanced age, and died in 44. (Cic. Verr. i. 21, ad Fam. i. 1, xvi. 23, ad Att. xii. 21; Dio Cass. xlv. 16; Val. Max. viii. 5, 6.) —2. Praetor 54, belonged originally to the aristocratical party, but espoused Caesar's side on the breaking out of the Civil war, and was consul with Caesar in 48. In 46 he governed the province of Asia as proconsul, during which time Cicero wrote to him several letters. After the death of Caesar in 44, he supported Cicero and the rest of the aristocratical party, in opposition to Antony. But he soon changed sides again, became reconciled to Antony, and was made consul a second time in 41. (Caes. B.C. iii. 21; App. B.C. ii. 48; Dio Cass. xli. 43, xlii. 17, xlvi. 4, 13.)

Vatinius. 1. P., a political adventurer in the last days of the republic, who is described by Cicero as one of the greatest scamps and villains that ever lived. His personal appearance was unprepossessing; his face and neck were covered with swellings, to which Cicero alludes, calling him the struma civitatis. Vatinius was quaestor B.C. 63, and tribune of the plebs 59, when he sold his services to Caesar, who was then consul along with Bibulus. It was Vatinius who proposed the bill to the people by which Caesar received the provinces of Cisalpine Gaul and Illyricum for five years. Vatinius continued to take an active part in political affairs. In 56 he appeared as a witness against Milo and Sestius, two of Cicero's friends, in consequence of which the orator made a vehement attack upon the character of Vatinius, in the speech which has come down to us. Vatinius was praetor in 55, and in the following year (54) he was accused by C. Licinius Calvus of having gained the praetorship by bribery. He was defended on this occasion by Cicero, in order to please Caesar, whom Cicero had offended by his former attack upon Vatinius. Soon afterwards Vatinius went to Gaul, where we find him serving in 51. He accompanied Caesar in the Civil war, and was made consul suffectus for a few days, at the end of December 47. At the beginning of the following year, he was sent into Illyricum, where he carried on the war with success. After Caesar's death he was compelled to surrender Dyrrhachium and his army to Brutus, who had obtained possession of Macedonia, because his troops declared in favour of Brutus. (Cic. in Vat.; pro Sest. 53, 63, ad Q. Fr. ii. 4, iii. 9, ad Att. ii. 6; [Caes.] B.G. viii. 46; Caes. B.C. iii. 19, 100; App. B.C. iv. 75; Dio Cass. xlvii. 21.) —2. Of Beneventum, one of the vilest and most hateful creatures in Nero's court, equally deformed in body and in mind. He was originally a shoemaker's apprentice, next earned his living as one of the lowest kinds of scurrae or buffoons, and finally obtained great power and wealth by accusing the most distinguished men in the state. A certain kind of drinking-cups having nasi or nozzles, bore the name of Vatinius, probably because they were supposed to caricature his profile. (Tac. Ann. xv. 34; Juv. v. 46; Mart. x. 3, xiv. 96.)

Vatrénus. [PADUS.]

Vectis or Vecta (Isle of Wight), an island off the S. coast of Britain and opposite Portus Magnus (Portchester, near Portsmouth), with which the Romans became acquainted before their conquest of Britain, by means of the inhabitants of Massilia, who were accustomed to visit this island for the purpose of obtaining tin. It is related by Diodorus (v. 22, 38), that at low water the space between Vectis and the coast of Britain was almost entirely dry, so that the Britons used to bring tin to the island in waggons. It was conquered by Vespasian in the reign of Claudius (Suet. Vesp. 4; Mel. iii. 6; Plin. iv. 103.) Interesting remains of Roman villas have been found at Carisbrook and Brading.

Vedius Pollio. [POLLIO.]

Vegetius, Flavius Renatus, the author of a treatise, Rei Militaris Institutio, or Epitoma Rei Militaris. The exact date is not established, but it was probably composed early in the fifth century A.D. It is a question whether the dedication to Theodosius is genuine, and some writers maintain that it was addressed to Valentinian III. The materials were derived, according to the declaration of the writer himself, from Cato the Censor De Disciplina Militari, from Cornelius Celsus, from Frontinus, from Paternus, and from the imperial constitutions of Augustus, Trajan, and Hadrian. The work is divided into four books. The first treats of the levying and training of recruits, including instructions for the fortification of a camp; the second, of the different classes into which soldiers are divided, and especially of the organisation of the legion; the third, of the operations of an army in the field; the fourth, of the attack and defence of fortresses, and of marine warfare. The value of this work (which is a somewhat uncritical compilation from different historians) is much diminished by the fact that the usages of periods the most remote from each other are mixed together into one confused mass, and not unfrequently, we have reason to suspect, are blended with arrangements which never existed except in the fancy of the author. Edition by C. Lang, Leips. 1885. It is probably right to ascribe to the same Vegetius the work on veterinary art called Mulomedicina (on the treatment of horses and mules), though it is written in a more popular style, as being intended for the use of less refined readers (ed. in Schneider's Script. Rei Rusticae, Leips. 1797).

Veiento, Fabricius, was praetor A.D. 55, and ran dogs instead of horses in the games. He was banished A.D. 62, in consequence of his having published several libels. He afterwards returned to Rome, and became, in the reign of Domitian, one of the most infamous informers and flatterers of that tyrant. He also enjoyed the friendship of Nerva. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 50; Dio Cass. lxi. 6; Plin. Ep. iv. 22; Juv. iii. 185; iv. 113.)

Veii (Veiens, -entis, Veientanus: Isola Farnese), one of the most ancient and powerful cities of Etruria, situated on the river Creméra, about twelve miles from Rome. It possessed a strongly fortified citadel, built on a hill rising precipitously from the deep glens which bound it, save at the single point where a narrow ridge unites it to the city. It was one of the twelve cities of the Etruscan Confederation, and apparently the largest of all. As far as we can judge from its present remains, it was about seven miles in circumference, which agrees with the statement of Dionysius, that it was equal in size to Athens. Its territory (Ager Veiens) was extensive, and appears originally to have extended on the S. and E. to the Tiber; on the

SW. to the sea, embracing the salinae or salt-works at the mouth of the river; and on the W. to the territory of Caere. The Ciminian forest appears to have been its NW. boundary; on the E. it must have embraced all the district S. of Soracte and eastward to the Tiber. The cities of Capena and Fidenae were colonies of Veii. Veii was a powerful city at the time of the foundation of Rome, and the most formidable and dangerous of her neighbours (Liv. i. 15; Dionys. ii. 54; Eutrop. i. 20). The Veientes were engaged in almost unceasing hostilities with Rome for more than three centuries and a half, and we have records of many wars between the two peoples (Liv. i. 27, 33, 42, ii. 6, 42, 48, iv. 17, 31). Veii was at length taken by the dictator Camillus, after a siege which is said to have lasted ten years, during which period, apparently, the emissarium for draining the Alban lake was formed, and by tradition was connected with an oracle about the siege. The city fell, according to the common story, by means of a cuniculus or mine, which was carried by Camillus from the Roman camp under the city into the citadel of Veii, in the year 396. (Liv. v. 8-22; Cic. Div. i. 44, iii. 32; Plut. Cam. 5.) So well built and spacious was Veii, that the Romans were anxious, after the destruction of their own city by the Gauls in 390, to remove to Veii, and are said to have been only prevented from carrying their purpose into effect by the eloquence of Camillus (Liv. v. 49). From this time Veii was abandoned; but after the lapse of ages it was colonised afresh by Augustus, and made a Roman municipium. The new colony, however, occupied scarcely a third of the ancient city, and had again sunk into decay in the reign of Hadrian. From this time Veii disappears entirely from history, and, on the revival of letters, even its site was long an object of dispute. It is now settled, however, beyond a doubt, that it stood in the neighbourhood of the hamlet of Isola Farnese, where several remains of the ancient city have been discovered. Of these the most interesting is its cemetery.

Veiovis, an old Italian deity, whose temple at Rome stood between the Capitolium and the Arx in the 'Asylum,' between the sacred groves ('inter duos lucos': Ov. Fast. iii. 430; Gell. v. 12). He was said to be represented as a youthful god armed with arrows, and hence was by some identified with Apollo. His origin and the meaning of his name have been variously explained. It is tolerably certain that the old explanation, Veiovis=the little Jupiter (Ov. Fast. iii. 445) is wrong. The prefix means rather 'separate from,' or 'distinct from.' Hence Veiovis or Vediovis is a deity distinguished from Jupiter, and the most natural inference would be that he was the Jupiter Inferus presiding over the dead, and that the arrows are the arrows of death: nor would it militate against this view that he seems to have been a deity to whom expiatory sacrifices (of a goat) were offered. Some modern writers, however, regard him rather as the god of the spring-sun which was supposed to bring fevers, and therefore as the deity who could avert such fevers. His festival on the Capitoline hill was celebrated in March. He had also a temple on the Island of the Tiber, where he was worshipped in conjunction with Aesculapius in January. He had an ancient altar at Bovillae.

Velauni or Vellavi, a people in Gallia Aquitania, in the modern Velay (Plin. iii. 137).

Vēlēda, a prophetic virgin, by birth belonged to the Beucteri, and was regarded as a divine being by most of the nations in central Germany in the reign of Vespasian. She dwelt in a lofty tower in the neighbourhood of the river Luppia (Lippe). She encouraged Civilis in his revolt against the Romans, but she was afterwards taken prisoner and carried to Rome. (Tac. Hist. iv. 61, 65, v. 22, 24, Germ. 8; Stat. Silv. i. 4, 90; Dio Cass. lxxvii. 5.)

Vēlia or Elēa, also called Hyēle (Ἑλέα, 'Ἑλέη: Castell' a Mare della Brucca), a Greek town of Lucania, on the W. coast between Paestum and Buxentum, was founded by the Phocaeans, who had abandoned their native city to escape from the Persian sovereignty, about B.C. 543 (Hdt. i. 164; Strab. p. 254). It was situated about three miles E. of the river Hales, and possessed a good harbour. It is celebrated as the place which gave the name to the Eleatic school of philosophy; for XENOPHONES established himself at Velia, and Parmenides and Zeno were born there (Diog. Laert. ix. 2, 20). It was noted also for its mild climate (Hor. Ep. i. 15, 1). It possessed a celebrated temple of Demeter.

Vēlinus (Velino), a river in the territory of the Sabines, rising in the central Apennines, and falling into the Nar. This river in the neighbourhood of Reate overflowed its banks and formed several small lakes, the largest of which was called Lacus Velinus (Piediluco, also Lago dei Mormori). In order to carry off these waters, a channel was cut through the rocks by Curius Dentatus, the conqueror of the Sabines, by means of which the waters of the Velinus were carried through a narrow gorge to a spot where they fall from a height of several hundred feet into the river Nar. This fall, which is one of the most celebrated in Europe, is known at the present day by the name of the fall of Terni, or the Cascata dei Mormori. (Tac. Ann. i. 79; Plin. iii. 17; Cic. ad Att. iv. 15.)

Vēlitræ (Veliternus: Velletri), an ancient town of the Volscians in Latium, but subsequently belonging to the Latin League. It was conquered by the Romans, and colonised at an early period, but it frequently revolted from Rome. It is celebrated as the birthplace of the emperor Augustus. (Dionys. v. 61; Liv. iii. 41, viii. 14; Diod. xiv. 34; Suet. Aug. 1.)

Vēlius Longus, a Latin grammarian, known to us from a treatise, De Orthographia, still extant, printed in the Grammaticae Latinae Auctores Antiqui, of Putschius, 4to, Hanov. 1605. Velius also wrote a commentary on Virgil, which is mentioned by Macrobius. He lived in the time of Trajan. (Gell. xviii. 9; Macrobius. iii. 6, 8.)

Vellaunodūnum (Beaune), a town of the Senones in Gallia Lugdunensis (Caes. B. G. vii. 11).

Vellavi. [VELAUNI.]

Velleius Paterculus. [PATERCULUS.]

Vellocasses, a people in Gallia Lugdunensis, NW. of the Parisii, extending along the Sequana as far as the ocean, their chief town was Ratomagus (Caes. B. G. ii. 4.)

Vēnāfrum (Venafranum: Venafri), a town in the N. of Samnium, near the river Volturnus, and on the confines of Latium, celebrated for the excellence of its olives (Hor. Od. ii. 6, 16, Sat. ii. 4, 69; Juv. v. 86; Mart. xiii. 98; Varr. R.R. i. 2, 6). It stood on a hill rising from the right bank of the Volturnus, about sixteen miles from Casinum, and on the Via Latina. A colony was planted there under Augustus.

Venantius Fortunatus (in full Venantius Honorius Clementianus Fortunatus), a poet of the sixth century A.D. (535–600). He was born at Tarvisium (Treviso), in Venetia, and educated at Ravenna, and eventually became a presbyter and bishop of Poitiers, having travelled much over the Frankish kingdoms, and even to Britain (Venant. Fort. iii. 26). He wrote an epic poem on the life of St. Martin and a number of shorter poems in eleven books, chiefly in the elegiac metre—panegyrics, elegies, and hymns. His metre is good, and his writings are useful for a description of his time. He wrote also some prose biographies of Saints.—Editions of his prose works by Krusch and of his poems by Leo, Berl. 1881–1885.

Venēdi or Venēdae, a people in European Sarmatia, dwelling on the Baltic E. of the Vistula. The Sinus Venēdicus (Gulf of Riga), and the Venēdici Montes, a range of mountains between Poland and East Prussia, were called after this people. The name is represented by the Slavonic Wends. (Tac. Germ. 46; Plin. iv. 97.)

Venētia. 1. A district in the N. of Italy, was originally included under the general name of Gallia Cisalpina, but was made by Augustus the tenth Regio of Italy. It was bounded on the W. by the river Athesis (Adige), which separated it from Gallia Cisalpina; on the N. by the Carnic Alps; on the E. by the river Timavus, which separated it from Istria; and on the S. by the Adriatic Gulf. This country was, and is, very fertile, and its inhabitants enjoyed great prosperity. The chief productions of the country were excellent wool, a sweet but much prized wine, and race-horses. Dionysius, the tyrant of Syracuse, is said to have kept a stud of race-horses in this country. (Strab. p. 212.)—Its inhabitants, the Venēti, frequently called Henēti (Ἠνετοί) by the Greeks, were in Greek traditions said to be descendants of the Paphlagonian Heneti, whom Antenor led into the country after the Trojan war (Il. ii. 85); but this tale, like so many others, has evidently arisen from the mere similarity of the name. Others supposed the Veneti to be a branch of the Celtic Veneti in Gaul; but this supposition is disproved by the express testimony of Polybius, that they spoke a language entirely different from the Celtic; and that they had no connexion with the Celts, may be inferred from the fact that they were always on hostile terms with the Celtic tribes settled in Italy. Herodotus regards them as an Illyrian race; and all writers are agreed that they did not belong to the original population of Italy. (Hdt. i. 196, v. 9; Pol. ii. 17; Liv. i. 1; Strab. pp. 543, 608; Scymn. p. 389; Verg. Aen. i. 247.) There is no reason to suppose them to be a Slavonic people because their name resembled that of the Baltic Venēdi, and on the whole the most probable view is that they were an Illyrian people who had held their own against the Celts, and had progressed in trade and civilisation beyond the more easterly Illyrians. In consequence of their hostility to the Celtic tribes in their neighbourhood, they formed at an early period an alliance with Rome; and their country was defended by the Romans against their dangerous enemies. On the conquest of the Cisalpine Gauls, the Veneti likewise became included under the Roman dominions, and they were almost the only people in Italy who became the subjects of Rome without offering any resistance, no doubt for the reason that they regarded the Celtic races as their chief enemies (cf. Pol. ii. 23, 24). In the arrangement of Augustus Venetia and Histria formed the tenth Region, the limits of which were the Addua on the W., the Carnic Alps on the N., the Arsia on the E., and the Po and Adriatic on the S. (Plin. iii. 126–131). The Veneti continued to enjoy great prosperity down to the time of the Marcomannic wars, in the reign of the emperor Aurelius; but from this time their country was frequently devastated by the barbarians who invaded Italy, and at length, in the fifth century, many of its inhabitants, to escape the ravages of the Huns under Attila, took refuge in the islands off their coast, on which now stands the city of Venice. The chief towns of Venetia in ancient times were, PATAVIUM, ALTINUM, and AQUILEIA. The two latter carried on an extensive commerce, and exported, among other things, large quantities of amber, which was brought from the Baltic through the interior of Europe to these cities.—2. A district in the NW. of Gallia Lugdunensis (the W. coast of Brittany) inhabited by the Veneti, who were a brave people, and the best sailors in all Gaul. Caesar gives an interesting account of the naval campaign against them in B.C. 56. The name is preserved by the modern town of Vannes. Off their coast was a group of islands called Insulae Venēticae (Belle Ile).

Venētus Lacus. [BRIGANTINUS LACUS.]

Venilia, a nymph, daughter of Piliunus, sister of Amata (wife of king Latinus) and mother of Turnus and Juturna by Daunus.

Vennōnes or Venonetes, a people of Raetia, and according to Strabo the most savage of the Raetian tribes, inhabiting the S. side of the Alps near the sources of the Addua (Adda). (Strab. pp. 204, 206; Plin. iii. 136; Ptol. ii. 13, 3.)

Venta. 1. Belgārum (Winchester), the chief town of the Belgae in Britain. The modern city contains Roman remains.—2. Icenōrum. [ICENI.]—3. Silūrum (Caerwent), a town of the Silures in Britain, in Monmouthshire.

Venti (ἄνεμοι), the winds. They appear personified, even in the Homeric poems, but at the same time they are conceived as ordinary phenomena of nature. The master and ruler of all the winds is Aeolus, who resides in the island Aeolia [AEOLUS]; but the other gods also, especially Zeus, exercise a power over them (Il. xii. 281). Homer mentions by name Boreas (N. wind), Eurus (E. wind), Notus (S. wind), and Zephyrus (W. wind). Though possibly at one time regarded as personal deities their distinct personality, except in the case of Boreas, seems to have faded away before the time of Homer. Boreas appears in Il. xx. 225 as the father of a race of horses, and the myths relating to him were more clearly developed in the Attic story. [BOREAS.] Yet relics of divinity ascribed to the winds generally are seen in the sacrifices offered to them from the time of Homer down to the Roman imperial period. When the funeral pile of Patroclus could not be made to burn, Achilles promised to offer sacrifices to the winds; and Iris accordingly hastened to them, and found them feasting in the palace of Zephyrus in Thrace. Boreas and Zephyrus thereupon straightway crossed the Thracian sea into Asia; to cause the fire to blaze. (Il. xxiii. 195; cf. ii. 145, ix. 5; Od. v. 295.) According to Hesiod, the beneficial winds, Notus, Boreas, Argestes, and Zephyrus, were the sons of Astraeus and Eos; and the destructive ones are said to be the sons of Typhoeus (Hes. Th. 378, 869). The beneficial nature of Boreas does not, however, always appear, and his stormy character, resembling that of Typhon, seems to be indicated by his representation with serpents' feet on the chest of Cypselus (Paus. v. 19, 1). Later, especially philosophical, writers endeavoured to define the winds more accurately, according to their places in the compass. Thus Aristotle, besides the four principal winds (Boreas or Aparctias, Eurus, Notus, and Zephyrus, mentions three, the Meses, Kaikias, and Apeliotes, between Boreas and Eurus; between Eurus and Notus he places the Phoenicias; between Notus and Zephyrus he has only the Lips; and between Zephyrus and Boreas he places the Argestes (Olympias or Skiron) and the Thraskias (Ar. Meteor. ii. 6).—The winds were represented by poets and artists in different ways; the latter usually represented them as beings with wings at their heads and shoulders. The most remarkable monument representing the winds is the octagonal tower of Andronicus Cyrrhestes at Athens. Each of the eight sides of the monument represents one of the eight principal winds in a flying attitude. A moveable Triton in the centre of the cupola pointed with his staff to the wind blowing at the time. All these eight figures have wings at their shoulders, all are clothed, and the peculiarities of the winds are indicated by their bodies and various attributes. (1) Boreas wears a thick chiton and is blowing on a Triton's horn, to signify his power of raising storms at sea [see under BOREAS]. (2) Kaikias, the NE. wind (= Aquilo), has a vessel from which he is discharging hailstones. (3) Apeliotes (= Subolanus), the East wind, being regarded as kindly in Greece, carries fruit and flowers in the sinus of his robe. (4) Euros (= Eurus or Volturnus), the warm and rainy SE. wind, shapes clouds with his robe. (5) Notos (= Notus or Auster) the south wind, pours rain from his jar. (6) Lips (= Africus), the SW. wind, which blows mariners over the sea to the harbours of Peiraeus, holds a ship's aplustre. (7) Zephyrus (= Zephyrus or Favonius) carries spring flowers. (8) Skiren (= Corus or Caurus), the NW., a parching wind, holds a vessel from which he is supposed to discharge hot charcoal. Black lambs were offered as sacrifices to the destructive winds, and white ones to favourable or good winds (Hor. Epod. x. 23; Verg. Aen. iii. 120, v. 772; Aristoph. Ran. 847). Boreas had a temple on the river Ilissus in Attica; and Zephyrus had an altar on the sacred road to Eleusis. An altar to the winds has been found at Antium; and there is mention of sacrifices offered to winds by Roman commanders before an expedition, as by Scipio at Rome and by Octavian at Puteoli. (Liv. xxix. 27; App. B.C. v. 98.)

Ventidius Bassus, P., a Roman general, was a native of Picenum, and was taken prisoner by Pompeius Strabo in the Social war (B.C. 89), and carried to Rome. When he grew up to man's estate, he got a poor living by undertaking to furnish mules and vehicles for those magistrates who went from Rome to administer a province. (Dio Cass. xliii. 51; Gell. xv. 4; Val. Max. vi. 919.) He became known to C. Julius Caesar, whom he accompanied into Gaul. In the Civil war he executed Caesar's orders with ability, and became a favourite of his great commander. He obtained the rank of tribune of the plebs, and was made a praetor for B.C. 43. After Caesar's death Ventidius sided with M. Antony in the war of Mutina (43), and in the same year was made consul suffectus. (Cic. ad Fam. x. 33, xi. 10; Vell. Pat. ii. 65; Dio Cass. xlvii. 15, xlviii. 10; App. B.C. v. 31.) In 39 Antony sent Ventidius into Asia, to oppose Labienus and the Parthians. He conducted this war with distinguished ability and success. In the first campaign (39) he defeated the Parthians and Labienus, the latter of whom was slain in his flight after the battle; and in the second campaign (38) Ventidius gained a still more brilliant victory over the Parthians, who had again invaded Syria. Pacorus, the king's son, fell in this battle. (Dio Cass. xlviii. 39, xlix. 21; Eutrop. vii. 3.) Antony, however, far from being pleased with the success of Ventidius, showed great jealousy of him, and dismissed him from his employment (Plut. Ant. 34). Yet his services were too great to be overlooked; and he had a triumph in November, 38. Nothing more is known of him. Ventidius was often cited as an instance of a man who rose from the lowest condition to the highest honours (Juv. vii. 199): a captive became a Roman consul and enjoyed a triumph; but this was in a period of revolution.

Venus, an Italian goddess, who, after the Greek mythology influenced the Roman, was identified with Aphrodite, and in Latin literature has the same myths and characteristics [see under APHRODITE]. Originally the Italian Venus was a goddess of gardens and of spring flowers, having somewhat the same characteristics as Flora, Feronia, and Libera. Her worship at Rome was not extremely ancient: that is to say, it is not traceable earlier than the fourth century B.C. Her name does not occur in the ritual of the Fratres Arvales or in the hymns of the Salii. But she had ancient sanctuaries in other Latin settlements, especially at Ardea and Lavinium (Strab. p. 532; Plin. iii. 56), and she seems to have been regarded as the deity who promoted union among the members of the League. Perhaps for this reason, as Venus Concordia, or, more probably because both were goddesses of gardens and growth in spring, when the Greeks introduced the knowledge of Aphrodite she was identified with Venus. It is likely enough that this influence came first from Sicily and that the Italianised Aphrodite was first known as Venus Erycina. This deity was naturalised at Ardea and Lavinium, and there the Greek stories of Aeneas took root. When these were adopted by the Romans the importance of Venus was increased, for she was now regarded as the parent of the Roman race through her son Aeneas. She was Venus Genetrix because she had taken the characteristics of Aphrodite, the goddess of creative power (Lucret. i. 1-38), and Venus Victrix as giving victory to lovers; but both these names gained a fresh significance when she was regarded as the mother of the Roman people, who gave victory to their armies. The three oldest sanctuaries of Venus at Rome were supposed to be those of Venus Murcia, Venus Cloacina, and Venus Libitina. For the last see LIBITINA. The name Murcia was corrupted into Myrtea, as though it meant the goddess to whom the myrtle was sacred: by many it has been derived from mulcere, 'to soften,' and Cloacina from a word cloare, 'to purify'; but it is much more probable that both these were names from the localities where the temples of the goddess were situated, i.e. near the Circus in the Vallis Murcia, and near the Cloaca Maxima. Somewhat later, in the same district of the Circus, Q. Fabius Gurgus founded a temple of Venus Obsequens ('the Compliant') B.C. 295, because she had granted his wishes in the Samnite wars (Liv. x. 31; Serv. ad Aen. i. 720). At the beginning of the second Punic war, the worship of Venus Erycina was introduced from Sicily, and a temple was dedicated to her on the Capitol, to which subsequently another was added outside the Colline gate. In the year B.C. 114, a Vestal virgin was killed by lightning; and as the general moral corruption, especially among the Vestals, was believed to be the cause of this disaster, the Sibylline books, upon being consulted, commanded that a temple should be built to Venus Verticordia (= Ἀποστροφία, the goddess who turns the hearts of men) on the Via Salaria. (Ov. Fast. iv. 157; Val. Max. viii. 15, 12.) Scipio Africanus the younger founded the temple of Venus Genetrix, in which he was afterwards followed by Caesar, who added that of Venus Victrix. Hadrian identified her with the well-being of the state in building the magnificent temple of Venus and Rome, A.D. 135. Another name borne by Venus at Rome was Calva ('the bald'), which is explained by the story (not unknown in other countries, e.g. at Carthage), that in the Gallic siege of Rome the women cut off their hair to make bow-strings (Serv. ad Aen. i. 720). A less romantic explanation was that she was prayed to by women to prevent their hair falling off. The month of April, as the beginning of spring, was peculiarly sacred to her, both in her old character as goddess of gardens and in her Greek character as goddess of love and growth.

Vēnūsia (Venusinus: Venosa), an ancient town of Apulia, S. of the river Aufidus, and near Mt. Vultur, situated in a romantic country, and memorable as the birthplace of the poet Horace. It seems to have been an Apulian city which had received an accession of territory from Lucania (Plin. iii. 104; Ptol. iii. 1, 73). It was captured by the Romans B.C. 262, and a colony was sent to it (Vell. Pat. i. 14; Hor. Sat. ii. 1, 34). It was a refuge of a remnant of the army from Cannae, and often a headquarters of the army (Liv. xxii. 49, xxvii. 10, 20, 41). It was ravaged in the Social war (App. B.C. i. 52), but recovered its prosperity, which was favoured by its position on the Appian Road (Cic. ad Att. v. 5, xvi. 5; Strab. p. 250).

Verāgri or Varāgri, a people in Gallia Belgica, on the Pennine Alps, near the confluence of the Dranse and the Rhone (Caes. B.G. iii. 1; Strab. p. 204; Liv. xxi. 38). Their territory stretched up the Val de Bagnes and the Val d'Entremont as far as the summit of the pass of the Great St. Bernard. It is not impossible that their name is preserved in Vernayaz, at the lower end of the valley.

Verbānus Lacus (Lago Maggiore), a lake in Gallia Cisalpina, and the largest lake in all Italy, being about forty miles in length from N. to S.; its greatest breadth is eight miles. It is formed by the river Ticinus and other streams descending from the Alps, and the river Ticinus issues from its southern extremity. (Plin. iii. 131; Strab. p. 209.)

Vercellae (Vercellensis: Vercelli), the chief town of the Libici in Gallia Cisalpina, and subsequently a Roman municipium, and a place of considerable importance (Strab. p. 218; Tac. Hist. i. 70). For the battle fought near it by Marius, see CAMPI RAUDII.

Vercingetōrix, the celebrated chieftain of the Arverni, who carried on war with great ability against Caesar in B.C. 52. The history of this war occupies the seventh book of Caesar's Commentaries on the Gallic War. Vercingetorix, who had roused the spirit of his countrymen and had organised their defence with great skill and heroic courage, fell into Caesar's hands on the capture of Alesia, was subsequently taken to Rome, where he adorned the triumph of his conqueror in 45, and was afterwards put to death. (Dio Cass. xl. 41, xliii. 19; CAESAR, p. 183.)

Veretum (Veretinus: Alessano), more anciently called Baris, a town in Calabria, on the road from Leuca to Tarentum, and 600 stadia SE. of the latter city (Strab. p. 281; Ptol. iii. i. 76).

Vergae, a town in the interior of Bruttium.

Vergellus, a rivulet in Apulia crossing the plain of Cannae, which is said to have been choked by the dead bodies of the Romans slain in the memorable battle against Hannibal (Flor. ii. 6, 18; Val. Max. ix. 2, 2).

Vergilius or Virgilius Maro, P., the Roman poet, was born on the 15th of October, B.C. 70, at Andes (Pietola), a small village near Mantua, in Cisalpine Gaul. There is no doubt that Vergilius is the more correct spelling: the arguments are as follows: inscriptions where the name occurs in the republic and in the earlier centuries of the empire write Vergilius, never Virgilius, and the same is true of the older MSS., as the Medicean: moreover the Greek authors write Βεργίλιος or Οὐβεργίλιος. In the middle ages the spelling Virgilius became common and eventually prevailed, owing to fanciful derivations from virgo or virga. The earliest known instance of the spelling Virgilius is in the fifth century A.D. (C.I.L. vi. 1710). It is therefore better to write the Latin name Vergilius; but when it is Anglicised the established form, Virgil, may reasonably be retained.—Virgil's father probably had a small estate which he cultivated, and he is said to have supplemented this by keeping bees. His mother's name was Magia Polla. He was educated at Cremona and Mediolanum (Milan), and he took the toga virilis at Cremona on the day on which he began his sixteenth year, in 55. It is said that he subsequently studied at Neapolis (Naples) under Parthenius, a native of Bithynia, from whom he learned Greek. He was also instructed by Siron, an Epicurean, whose lectures were attended also by Alfenus Varus (VARUS, No. 1), at Rome, where he was also taught rhetoric by Epidius at the same time as Octavianus. Virgil's writings prove that he received a learned education, and traces of Epicurean opinions are apparent in them (e.g. Georg. ii. 490). The health of Virgil was always feeble, and there is no evidence of his attempting to rise by those means by which a Roman gained distinction, oratory and the practice of arms. After completing his education, Virgil appears to have retired to his paternal farm. After the battle of Philippi (42) Octavian assigned to his soldiers lands in various parts of Italy. Octavius Musa, who was charged with this allotment in the Cremona district, extended the limits so as to include Mantua (cf. Ecl. ix. 28), and the farm belonging to Virgil's father was assigned to a centurion, whose name is given as Arrius. Asinius Pollio, the legatus of Transpadane Gaul, and Cornelius Gallus interested themselves in Virgil, who was probably already known to them as a poet, and advised him to apply to Octavian at Rome. Virgil did so, his father's farm was restored, and the first Eclogue expresses gratitude to Octavian. But there was a second spoliation when, after the war of Perugia, Alfenus Varus became legatus in Pollio's place. A primipilaris named Milienus Toro got possession of the farm and Virgil himself was nearly killed by the violence of a certain Clodius. Virgil and his father took refuge in a country house belonging to Siro (Catal. 10), and thence removed to Rome, where he wrote the Eclogues. Here Maecenas also became interested in Virgil, who was compensated by Augustus. He did not, indeed, recover his paternal estate, but land was given him elsewhere—possibly the estate which he had near Nola in Campania (Gell. vi. 20). His friendship with Maecenas was soon so firmly established that he was able to gain the same patronage for Horace (Hor. Sat. i. 6, 54). Horace, in one of his Satires (Sat. i. 5), in which he describes the journey from Rome to Brundisium, mentions Virgil as one of the party, and in language which shows that they were then in the closest intimacy. The most finished work of Virgil, his Georgica, an agricultural poem, was undertaken at the suggestion of Maecenas (Georg. iii. 41). The concluding lines of the Georgica were written at Naples (Georg. iv. 559), and the poem was completed after the battle of Actium, B.C. 31, while Octavian was in the East. (Comp. Georg. iv. 560, and ii. 171.) Some of his pastoral poetry seems to have been written in the country of Tarentum (Prop. iii. 24, 67). His Eclogues had all been completed, and probably before the Georgica were begun (Georg. iv. 565). The epic poem of Virgil, the Aeneid, was probably long contemplated by the poet. While Augustus was in Spain (27), he wrote to Virgil to express his wish to have some monument of his poetical talent. Virgil appears to have begun the Aeneid about this time. In 23 died Marcellus, the son of Octavia (Caesar's sister) by her first husband; and Virgil introduced into his sixth book of the Aeneid (883) the well-known allusion to the virtues of this youth, who was cut off by a premature death. Octavia is said to have been present when the poet was reciting this allusion to her son and to have fainted from her emotions. She rewarded the poet munificently for his excusable flattery. As Marcellus did not die till 23, these lines were of course written after that date, but that does not prove that the whole of the sixth book was written so late. A passage in the seventh book (606) appears to allude to Augustus receiving back the Parthian standards, which event belongs to 20. When Augustus was returning from Samos, where he had spent the winter of 20, he met Virgil at Athens. The poet, it is said, had intended to make a tour of Greece, but he accompanied the emperor to Megara and thence to Italy. His health, which had long been declining, was now completely broken, and he died soon after his arrival at Brundisium, on the 22nd of September, 19, not having quite completed his fifty-first year. His remains were transferred to Naples, which had been his favourite residence, and on the road from Naples to Puteoli (Pozzuoli) a monument is still shown, supposed to be the tomb of the poet. The inscription said to have been placed on the tomb,

Mantua me genuit, Calabri rapuere, tenet nunc Parthenope. Cecini pascua, rura, duces,

we cannot suppose to have been written by the poet. Virgil named as heredes in his testament his half-brother Valerius Proculus, to whom he left one half of his property, and also Augustus, Maecenas, L. Varius and Plotius Tucca. It is said that in his last illness he wished to burn the Aeneid, to which he had not given the finishing touches, but his friends would not allow him. Whatever he may have wished to be done with the Aeneid, it was preserved and published by his friends Varius and Tucca. The poet had been enriched by the liberality of his patrons, and he left behind him a considerable property and a house on the Esquiline Hill near the gardens of Maecenas. He used his wealth liberally, and it is said that he supported his father, who became blind, but did not die before his son had attained a mature age. In his fortunes and his friends Virgil was a happy man. Munificent patronage gave him ample means of enjoyment and of leisure, and he had the friendship of all the most accomplished men of the day, among whom Horace entertained a strong affection for him. He was an amiable, good-tempered man, free from the mean passions of envy and jealousy; and in all but health he was prosperous. His fame, which was established in his lifetime, was cherished after his death as an inheritance in which every Roman had a share, and his works became school-books even before the death of Augustus. His poems were consulted for chance oracles (sortes Vergilianae) under the Roman empire (Capit. Albin. 5; Lamprid. Alex. Sev. 4; Spartian. Hadr. 2). The learned poems of Virgil soon gave employment to commentators and critics. Aulus Gellius has numerous remarks on Virgil, and Macrobius, in his Saturnalia, has filled four books (iii.-vi.) with his critical remarks on Virgil's poems. One of the most valuable commentaries on Virgil, in which a great amount of curious and instructive matter has been preserved, is that of Servius [SERVIUS].—The chief authority for the Life of Virgil, apart from casual notices in his own poems or in those of contemporary poets, is the biography prefixed to the commentary on Virgil written by Aelius Donatus in the fourth century A.D. This Life was derived by Donatus from the biography composed by Suetonius in his de Viris Illustribus. [DONATUS.] Suetonius is said to have derived his information from accounts by Varius, and by Melissus, who was a freedman of Maecenas (Gell. xvii. 10). Another Life of Virgil was compiled from the commentary of Valerius Probus; a third, found in Jerome, is also derived from Suetonius; a fourth, of unknown authorship, is prefixed to the commentary of Servius on the Aeneid; and a fifth, also of unknown date, is found in the Bernese MS. of Virgil. The grammarian Phocas, in the fifth century, made a version in hexameters of Donatus's Life of Virgil. Virgil was the great poet of the middle ages, too, and Dante owned him for his master and his model.—The ten short poems called Bucolica were the earliest works of Virgil, and probably all written between 41 and 39. These Bucolica are not Bucolica in the same sense as the poems of Theocritus, which have the same title. They have all a pastoral form and colouring, but some of them have nothing more. They are also called Eclogae or Selections, but there is no reason to suppose that this name originated with the poet. Their merit consists in their versification (which was smoother and more polished than the hexameters which the Romans had yet seen), and in many natural and simple touches. But as an attempt to transfer the Syracusan muse into Italy, they bear the stamp of imitations and, however graceful and melodious, cannot be ranked with the more genuine pastorals of Theocritus. The fourth Eclogue, entitled Pollio, which may have been written in 40, after the peace of Brundisium, has nothing of the pastoral character about it. It is half allegorical, half historical and prophetic—anything, in fact, but Bucolic. The first Eclogue is Bucolic in form and in treatment, with a historical basis. The second Eclogue, the Alexis, is an amatory poem, with a Bucolic colouring. The third, the fifth, the seventh, and the ninth, are more clearly modelled on the form of the poems of his Sicilian prototype; and the eighth, the Pharmaceutria, is a direct imitation of the original Greek. The tenth entitled Gallus, perhaps written the last of all, is a love poem, which, if written in elegiac verse, would be more appropriately called an Elegy than a Bucolic.—The Georgica or 'Agricultural Poem' in four books, written (37–30 B.C.), is a didactic poem, which Virgil dedicated to his patron Maecenas. He treats of the cultivation of the soil in the first book, of fruit trees in the second, of horses and other cattle in the third, and of bees in the fourth. This is generally regarded as his masterpiece, and it is unquestionably the most finished and perfect of his works, showing wonderful skill in treating the more prosaic subjects of practical daily life and embellishing them with magnificent bursts of poetry, yet so as to present a complete and harmonious work. Its versification is the perfection of the Latin hexameter. Yet, great as are these merits, the Aeneid is the greater poem of the two; in grandeur, in poetical matter and, to most readers, in interest, it is superior, and yields only to the Georgics in artistic completeness. The Georgics are, no doubt, based on the works of Hesiod and Aratus, but are so treated as to be rightly regarded as an original poem. In the first book he enumerates the subjects of his poem, among which is the treatment of bees; yet the management of bees seems but meagre material for one fourth of the whole poem, and the author accordingly completed the fourth book with matter somewhat extraneous—the long story of Aristaeus.—The Aeneid, or adventures of Aeneas after the fall of Troy, is an epic poem on the model of the Homeric poems. It was founded upon an old Roman tradition that Aeneas and his Trojans settled in Italy, and were the founders of the Roman name. In the first book we have the story of Aeneas being driven by a storm on the coast of Africa, and being hospitably received by Dido, queen of Carthage, to whom he relates in the episode of the second and third books the fall of Troy and his wanderings. In the fourth book the poet has elaborated the story of the attachment of Dido and Aeneas, the departure of Aeneas in obedience to the will of the gods, and the suicide of the Carthaginian queen. The fifth book contains the visit to Sicily, and the sixth the landing of Aeneas at Cumae in Italy, and his descent to the infernal regions, where he sees his father Anchises, and has a prophetic vision of the glorious destinies of his race and of the future heroes of Rome. In the first six books the adventures of Odysseus in the Odyssey are the model, and these books contain more variety of incident and situation than those which follow. The last six books, the history of the struggles of Aeneas in Italy, are founded on the model of the battles of the Iliad. Latinus, the king of the Latini, offers the Trojan hero his daughter Lavinia in marriage, who had been betrothed to Turnus, the warlike king of the Rutuli. The contest is ended by the death of Turnus, who falls by the hand of Aeneas. The fortunes of Aeneas and his final settlement in Italy are the subject of the Aeneid; but it is the national epic of the Roman people, and its real object is to set forth the glories of Rome and, less directly, of the Julian house, to which Augustus belonged, and to foster in the Romans a patriotic feeling and, still more, a religious sentiment for the gods and heroes of their ancestors. In the first book the foundation of Alba Longa is promised by Jupiter to Venus (Aeneid, i. 254), and the transfer of empire from Alba to Rome; from the line of Aeneas will descend the 'Trojan Caesar,' whose empire will only be limited by the ocean, and his glory by the heavens. The future rivalry between Rome and Carthage, and the ultimate triumphs of Rome are predicted. The poems abound in allusions to the history of Rome; and the aim of the poet to confirm and embellish the popular tradition of the Trojan origin of the Roman state, and the descent of the Julii from Venus, is apparent throughout. More interest is excited by Turnus than by Aeneas. It is true that it might be said of the Iliad that the character of Hector wins more admiration than that of Achilles; but the cases are not parallel, since Aeneas is in himself a weak and insipid personage, and unsuited to be the hero of an epic. Virgil imitated other poets besides Homer, and he has occasionally borrowed from them, especially from Apollonius of Rhodes. The historical colouring which pervades it, and the great amount of antiquarian learning which he has scattered through it make the Aeneid a study for the historian of Rome.—The larger editions of Virgil contain some short poems, which are attributed to him. The Culex or Gnat is a kind of Bucolic poem in 413 hexameters, often very obscure. Virgil is known to have written a poem of this name (Donat. Vit.; Sueton. Vit. Lucan.; Stat. Silv. ii. 7, 73); but it is on the whole probable that the poem which we have is by an imitator of Virgil. The Ciris, or the mythus of Scylla the daughter of Nisus, king of Megara, in 541 hexameters, borrows from Virgil's forms, but was probably written by an imitator of Catullus, belonging to the literary circle of Messalla. The Moretum, in 123 verses, the name of a dish of various ingredients is a poem in hexameters, on the daily labour of a cultivator, but it contains only the description of the labours of the first part of the day, which consists in preparing the Moretum. It is suggested, with probability, that this may be a translation or adaptation by Virgil of a Greek poem of Parthenius. The Copa, in elegiac verse, is an invitation by a female tavern keeper or servant attached to a Caupona to passengers to come in and enjoy themselves. There is no reason against accepting this as Virgil's work. There are also fourteen short pieces in various metres, classed under the general name of Catalepton (sometimes written Catalecta). The name is derived from a title (κατὰ λεπτὸν) which Aratus gave to a set of small poems (Strab. p. 486). They were written in the period of Virgil and it is probable that many are by Virgil—some the work of his earlier years.—Editions of Virgil by Heyne, Leips. 1798; Ribbeck, Leips. 1859; Conington (revised by Nettleship), 1883; Sidgwick, 1890.

Verginius. [VERGINIUS.]

Vermina, son of Syphax. He sided with the Carthaginians, and was attacked and defeated by the Romans after the battle of Zama. He made his peace with them, but much of his territory went to Masinissa. (Liv. xxix. 331, xxx. 36, xxxi. 11, 19.)

Verolamium or Verulamium (Old Verulam, near St. Albans), the chief town of the Catuvellauni in Britain, probably the residence of the king Cassivellaunus, which was conquered by Caesar. It was subsequently made a Roman municipium. It was destroyed by the Britons under Boudicca or Boadicea, in their insurrection against the Romans, but was rebuilt and continued to be an important place.

Veromandui, a people in Gallia Belgica, between the Nervii and Suessiones, in the modern Vermandois. Their chief town was Augusta Veromanduorum (St. Quentin). (Caes. B.G. ii. 4; Ptol. iii. 9, 11.)

Vērōna (Veronensis: Verona), an important town in Gallia Cisalpina, on the river Athesis (Adige: Sil. It. viii. 595), was originally the capital of the Euganei, but subsequently belonged to the Cenomani. At a still later time it was made a Roman colony, with the surname Augusta; and under the empire it was one of the largest and most flourishing towns in the N. of Italy. It was the birthplace of Catullus. (Ov. Am. iii. 15, 7; Mart. x. 103.) It is celebrated on account of the victory won in its neighbourhood by Theodoric the Great over Odoacer (Jordan. Get. 57). Theodoric took up his residence in this town, whence it is called by the German writers of the middle ages Dietrichs Bern, to distinguish it from Bern in Switzerland. There are still many Roman remains at Verona, and, among others, a magnificent amphitheatre, and part of the walls built by Gallienus A.D. 265.

Verres, C., was quaestor B.C. 82, to Cn. Papirius Carbo, and therefore at that period belonged to the Marian party. He, however, deserted Carbo, embezzling at the same time the state money which he held as quaestor, and went over to Sulla, who sent him to Beneventum, where he was allowed a share of the confiscated estates. Verres next appears as the legate of Cn. Cornelius Dolabella, praetor of Cilicia in 80–79, and one of the most rapacious of the provincial governors. On the death of the regular quaestor, C. Malleolus, Verres became the pro-quaestor of Dolabella. In Verres Dolabella found an active and unscrupulous agent, and, in return, connived at his excesses. But the pro-quaestor proved as faithless to Dolabella as he had been to Carbo, and gave evidence against him on his prosecution by M. Scaurus in 78. Verres was praetor urbanus in 74, and afterwards pro-praetor in Sicily, where he remained nearly three years (73–71). The extortions and exactions of Verres in the island have become notorious through the celebrated orations of Cicero. No class of the inhabitants of Sicily was exempted from his avarice, his cruelty, or his insults. The wealthy had money or works of art to yield up; the middle classes might be made to pay heavier imposts; and the exports of the vineyards, the arable land and the loom he saddled with heavier burdens. By capricious changes or violent abrogation of their compacts, Verres reduced to beggary both the producers and the farmers of the revenue. His three years' rule desolated the island more effectually than the two recent Servile wars, and than the old struggle between Carthage and Rome for the possession of the island. So diligently did he employ his opportunities that he boasted of having amassed enough for a life of opulence, even if he were compelled to disgorge two-thirds of his plunder in stifling inquiry or purchasing an acquittal. As soon as he left Sicily the inhabitants resolved to bring him to trial. They committed the prosecution to Cicero, who had been quaestor in Sicily in 75, and had promised his good offices to the Sicilians whenever they might demand them. Cicero heartily entered into the cause of the Sicilians, and spared no pains to secure a conviction of the great criminal. Verres was defended by Hortensius, and was supported by the whole power of the aristocracy. At first his partisans attempted to stop the prosecution by bribes, flatteries, and menaces; but finding this to be impossible, they endeavoured to substitute a sham prosecutor in the place of Cicero. Hortensius therefore offered as prosecutor Q. Caecilius Niger, who had been quaestor to the defendant, had quarrelled with him, and had consequently, it was alleged, the means of exposing officially his abuse of the public money. But the Sicilians rejected Caecilius altogether, not merely as no match for Hortensius, but as foisted into the cause by the defendant or his advocate. By a technical process of the Roman law, called Divinatio, the judices, without hearing evidence, determined from the arguments of counsel alone who should be appointed prosecutor. [Dict. of Ant. art. Divinatio.] They decided in Cicero's favour. The oration which Cicero delivered on this occasion was the Divinatio in Q. Caecilium. The pretensions of Caecilius were thus set aside. But hope did not yet forsake Verres and his friends. Evidence for the prosecution was to be collected in Sicily itself. Cicero was allowed 110 days for the purpose. Verres once again attempted to set up a sham prosecutor, who undertook to impeach him for his former extortions in Achaia, and to gather the evidence in 108 days. But the new prosecutor never went even so far as Brundisium in quest of evidence, and the design was abandoned. Instead of the 110 days allowed, Cicero, assisted by his cousin Lucius, completed his researches in fifty, and returned with a mass of evidence and a crowd of witnesses gathered from all parts of the island. Hortensius now grasped at his last chance of an acquittal, and it was not an unlikely one. Could the impeachment be put off to the next year, Verres was safe. Hortensius himself would then be consul, with Q. Metellus for his colleague, and M. Metellus would be praetor urbanus. For every firm and honest judex whom the upright M. Acilius Glabrio, then praetor urbanus, had named, a partial or venal substitute would be found. Glabrio himself would give place as quaesitor or president of the court to M. Metellus, a partisan, if not a kinsman, of the defendant. It was already the month of July. The games to be exhibited by Cn. Pompey were fixed for the middle of August, and would occupy a fortnight; the Roman games would immediately succeed them, and thus forty days intervene between Cicero's charge and the reply of Hortensius, who again, by dexterous adjournments, would delay the proceedings until the games of Victory and the commencement of the new year. Cicero therefore abandoned all thought of eloquence or display, and, merely introducing his case in the first of the Verrine orations, rested all his hopes of success on the weight of testimony alone. Hortensius was quite unprepared with counter-evidence, and after the first day he abandoned the cause of Verres. Before the nine days occupied in hearing evidence were over Verres quitted the city in despair, and was condemned in his absence. He retired to Marseilles, retaining so many of his treasures of art as to cause eventually his proscription by M. Antony in 43.—Of the seven Verrine orations of Cicero, two only, the Divinatio and the Actio Prima, were spoken, while the remaining five were compiled from the depositions after the verdict. Cicero's own division of the impeachment is the following:

1. Preliminary — (1. In Q. Caecilium or Divinatio.
2. Prooemium—Actio Prima—
Statement of the Case.

These alone were spoken.

2. Orations — (3. Verres' official life to B.C. 73.
founded on 4. Jurisdictio Siciliensis.
the Depositions. 5. Oratio Frumentaria.
6. ——— De Signis.
7. ——— De Suppliciis.

These were circulated as documents or manifestoes of the cause after the flight of Verres.

Verrugo, a town of the Volsci in Latium, of uncertain site, perhaps at Colle Ferro, near Segni (Liv. iv. 1, 55, v. 28; Diod. xiv. 11).

Verticordia. [VENUS.]

Vertumnus or Vortumnus is said to have been an Etruscan divinity whose worship was introduced at Rome by an ancient Vulsinian colony occupying at first the Caelian hill and afterwards the Vicus Tuscus. But he was really an Italian deity, worshipped by Latins and Sabines, and the only reason for the tradition of his Etruscan origin seems to have been that his statue stood in the Vicus Tuscus. (Varro, L. L. v. 74.) The name is evidently the old present participle passive of verto, and belonged to him as the god of the 'turning year'—that is, of the seasons, whose various hues and fruits at different times are represented by the myth of the metamorphoses of Vertumnus; the god being in reality the giver of the seasonable produce of the year, connected with the transformation of plants and their progress from blossom to fruit. (Propert. v. 2, 11; Tibull. iv. 2, 13; Colum. x. 308.) Hence the story that when Vertumnus was in love with Pomona he assumed all possible forms, until at last he gained his end by changing himself into a handsome youth (Propert. v. 2; Ov. Met. xiv. 623; POMONA). Gardeners accordingly offered to him the first produce of their gardens and garlands of budding flowers. The shrine and statue of Vertumnus stood at the W. end of the Vicus Tuscus, where remains have been found. It was probably from his presence in a busy street of traders that he was supposed to be connected with trade and sale or exchange. Propertius alludes also to a tradition that the Tiber had flowed once where his shrine stood, and that he was named 'verso ab amne' (v. 2, 10). This story may come partly from the name and partly from recollection of the ancient draining of that quarter.

Verulae (Verulanus: Veroli), a town of the Hernici in Latium, SE. of Alatrium, and N. of Frusino, subsequently a Roman colony (Liv. ix. 42).

Verulamium. [VEROLAMIUM.]

Vērus, L. Aurēlius, the colleague of M. Aurelius in the empire, A.D. 161–169. He was born in 130, and his original name was L. Ceionius Commodus. His father, L. Ceionius Commodus, was adopted by Hadrian in 136; and, on the death of his father in 138, he was, in pursuance of the command of Hadrian, adopted, along with M. Aurelius, by M. Antoninus. On the death of Antoninus, in 161, he succeeded to the empire along with M. Aurelius. The history of his reign is given under AURELIUS. Verus died suddenly at Altinum, in the country of the Veneti, towards the close of 169. He had been married to Lucilla, the daughter of his colleague.

Vescinus Ager. [SUESSA AURUNCA.]

Veseris, a small river of Campania, near Vesuvius, on the banks of which the battle against the Latins was fought by Manlius Torquatus and Decius Mus B.C. 340 (Liv. viii. 8; Cic. Fin. i. 7; Aurel. Vict. Vir. iii. 26, 28).

Vēsēvus. [VESUVIUS.]

Vesontio (Besançon), the chief town of the Sequani in Gallia Belgica, situated on the river Dubis (Doubs), which flowed around the town, with the exception of a space of 600 feet, on which stood a mountain, forming the citadel of the town, and connected with the latter by means of walls. Vesontio was an important place under the Romans, and still contains ruins of an aqueduct, a triumphal arch, and other Roman remains. (Caes. B. G. i. 38; Ptol. ii. 9, 21; Dio Cass. xxxviii. 34.)

Vespasianus, T. Flāvius Sabinus, Roman emperor A.D. 70–79, was born in the Sabine country on the 17th of November, A.D. 9. His father was a man of mean condition, of Reate, in the country of the Sabini. His mother, Vespasia Polla, was the daughter of a praefectus castrorum, and the sister of a Roman senator. She was left a widow with two sons—Flavius Sabinus and Vespasian. Vespasian served as tribunus militum in Thrace, and was quaestor in Crete and Cyrene. He was afterwards aedile and praetor. About this time he took to wife Flavia Domitilla, the daughter of a Roman eques, by whom he had two sons, both of whom succeeded him. In the reign of Claudius he was sent into Germany as legatus legionis, and in 43 he held the same command in Britain, and reduced the Isle of Wight. He was consul in 51, and proconsul of Africa under Nero. He was at this time very poor, and was accused of getting money by dishonourable means. But he had a great military reputation, and he was liked by the soldiers. Nero afterwards sent him to the East (66), to conduct the war against the Jews. His conduct of the Jewish war had raised his reputation, when the war broke out between Otho and Vitellius after the death of Galba. He was proclaimed emperor at Alexandria on the 1st of July, 69, and soon after all through the East. Vespasian came to Rome in the following year (70), leaving his son Titus to continue the war against the Jews. Titus took Jerusalem after a siege of five months; and a formidable insurrection of the Batavi, headed by Civilis, was put down about the same period. Vespasian, on his arrival at Rome, worked with great industry to restore order in the city and in the empire. He disbanded some of the mutinous soldiers of Vitellius, and maintained discipline among his own. He co-operated in a friendly manner with the senate in the public administration. The simplicity and frugality of his mode of life formed a striking contrast with the profusion and luxury of some of his predecessors, and his example is said to have done more to reform the morals of Rome than all the laws which had ever been enacted. He lived more like a private person than a man who possessed supreme power: he was affable and easy of access to all persons. The personal anecdotes of such a man are some of the most instructive records of his reign. He was never ashamed of the meanness of his origin, and ridiculed all attempts to make out for him a distinguished genealogy. When Vologeses, the Parthian king, addressed to him a letter commencing in these terms, 'Arsaces, king of kings, to Flavius Vespasianus,' the answer began, 'Flavius Vespasianus to Arsaces, king of kings.' If it be true, as it is recorded, that he was not annoyed at satire or ridicule, he exhibited an elevation of character almost unparalleled in one who filled so exalted a station. He knew the bad character of his son Domitian, and as long as he lived he kept him under proper restraint. The stories that are told of his avarice and of his modes of raising money, if true, detract from the dignity of his character; and it seems that he had a taste for little savings and for coarse humour. Yet it is admitted that he was liberal in all his expenditure for purposes of public utility. In 71 Titus returned to Rome, and both father and son triumphed together on account of the conquest of the Jews. The reign of Vespasian was marked by the conquest of North Wales and the island of Anglesey by Agricola, who was sent into Britain in 78. Vespasian also busied himself in securing the German frontier: he fortified the Agri Decumates and strengthened the defences of the Limes Germanicus. [GERMANIA.] In Italy he reorganised the praetorian guard, forming it of nine cohorts levied only from Italians. His financial management was marked by great economy; but he was the author of some remarkable public works at Rome, the building of the magnificent Temple of Peace, and the rebuilding of the Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus. [ROMA, pp. 803, 804.] In the summer of 79 Vespasian, whose health was failing, went to spend some time at his paternal house in the mountains of the Sabini, but derived no benefit from the treatment. He still attended to business, just as if he had been in perfect health, and, on feeling the approach of death, he said that an emperor should die standing; and in fact he did die in this attitude, on the 24th of June, 79, being sixty-nine years of age. (Tac. Hist.; Suet. Vesp.; Dio Cass. cxvi.)

Vesta, an Italian goddess of the hearth and more especially of the fire on the hearth, both in name and in nature akin to the Greek HESTIA, but worshipped by the Italian nations, particularly by the Latins, from ancient times independently of any connexion with Greece. It has been well shown, especially by Mr Frazer, that the worship of Vesta had its origin in the difficulty and the necessity of obtaining fire in primitive times. Hence, as even in the present time among savage tribes, arose the custom of keeping a fire always alight somewhere for the use of the community and of carrying fire thence for any new settlement. This custom was preserved by the conservatism of religion among civilised Greeks and Romans, after the necessity had ceased to exist [see Dict. of Ant. art. Prytaneum], and the state-hearth was preserved in each Latin state, just as in Greece; and in like fashion an outgoing settlement carried its sacred fire from the parent city. It was natural that from these observances the sacred flame itself should become personified as a goddess (Ov. Fast. vi. 291) who presided over the hearth of each house, and in the state-hearth (or sanctuary of Vesta) over the whole commonwealth. Vesta was thus intimately connected with the Penates as deities of the household and of the state [PENATES]; and the fact that the sacred fire was brought from the parent city made the Romans trace back the origin of the cult to the more ancient Latin settlements, first to Lanuvium and Alba, and, after the idea of a Trojan origin prevailed, to Troy itself, whence it was supposed the sacred fire of Vesta as well as the Penates had come (Verg. Aen. ii. 296). To this cause belongs the ancient custom at Rome that praetors, consuls and dictators, before they began their functions, sacrificed at Lanuvium, that town having been an ancient religious centre of the Latins. At Rome, as in other Latin cities, the sacred fire was tended and the service of Vesta maintained by a body of virgin priestesses, who lived together in a house (Atrium Vestae) to the SE. of the Forum, and under the NW. side of the Palatine, abutting on the Via Nova. This house, as rebuilt under Hadrian, was excavated in 1883, and from its character and the inscriptions (as late as the beginning of the fourth century A.D.) and sculptures found in it much additional light has been thrown on the Vestal service. An account is given in Dict. of Ant. art. Vestales: it is enough here to notice that in all matters a simplicity of life and of the household implements was preserved which marks the institution as being very ancient, with its peculiar characteristics handed down from a primitive age. In fact it is no doubt right to assume that the Vestals represented the daughters of the chief in the primitive tribe, who maintained the state-fire in their father's hut. When Vesta was recognised as a personal deity it became necessary that the priestesses should dwell in a sort of nunnery, and that the goddess should have a separate temple; but this Aedes Vestae preserved the shape of the primitive chief's hut, and was a round building [see ROMA, p. 810]. The public worship of Vesta was maintained in this temple: her private worship belonged to every domestic hearth—in the earliest Roman houses in the Atrium [see Dict. of Ant. art. Domus, and compare LARES; PENATES]. In her aspect as a benign goddess of fire Vesta seems to have been akin to or identical with STATUA MATER.

Vestini, a Sabellian people in central Italy, dwelling between the Apennines and the Adriatic sea, and separated from Picenum by the river Matrinus, and from the Marrucini by the river Aternus. Their country is cut in two by a spur of the Apennines through which the Aternus finds its way by a narrow passage. They are mentioned in connexion with the Marsi, Marrucini, and Paeligni; but they subsequently separated from these peoples, and joined the Samnites in their war against Rome. They were conquered by the Romans, B.C. 322, when their towns Cutina and Cingilia were taken (Liv. viii. 29); in 301 they made a treaty with Rome (Liv. x. 3), and from that time appear as faithful allies until the Social war, when they joined the Italian states against Rome, and were conquered by Pompeius Strabo in 89. (App. B.C. i. 39, 52.) Juvenal speaks of them as still retaining their rustic simplicity (xiv. 181; cf. Sil. It. viii. 513).

Vesūlus (Monte Viso), the loftiest summit of the Cottian Alps. It reaches a height of 12,641 feet, and from its prominent position, standing forward at a bend of the range, it was regarded by the ancients as the loftiest peak of the Alps, with a further claim to special notice, that it contained the sources of the Padus (Plin. iii. 117; Mel. ii. 414; Verg. Aen. x. 708).

Vesūvius, also called Vesēvus, Vesbūius, or Vesvius, the celebrated volcanic mountain in Campania, rising out of the plain SE. of Nea- polis. There are no records of any eruption of Vesuvius before the Christian era, but the ancient writers were aware of its volcanic nature from the igneous appearance of its rocks (Diod. iv. 21; Strab. p. 247). The slopes of the mountain were extremely fertile, but the top was a rough and sterile plain, on which Spartacus and his gladiators were besieged by a Roman army (Flor. iii. 20, 4; Plut. Crass. 9; App. B.C. i. 116; Vell. Pat. ii. 30). In A.D. 63 the volcano gave the first symptoms of agitation in an earthquake, which occasioned considerable damage to several towns in its vicinity; and on the 24th of August, A.D. 79, occurred the first great eruption of Vesuvius, which overwhelmed the cities of Stabiae, Herculaneum, and Pompeii. It was in this eruption that the elder Pliny lost his life. [PLINIUS.] The altered appearance of the country is noticed by Tacitus (Ann. iv. 67; cf. Mart. iv. 44; Sil. It. xvii. 594). The next recorded eruption was in A.D. 203 (Dio Cass. lxxvi. 2).

Vētēra or Castra Vetera, the chief military station of the lower Rhine, held usually by two legions. It was not far from the junction of the Lippe with the Rhine on the site of the modern Birten, near Xanten. (Tac. Ann. i. 48; Hist. iv. 22.)

Vetranio, commanded the legions in Illyria and Pannonia, at the period (A.D. 350) when Constantine was treacherously destroyed and his throne seized by Magnentius. Vetranio was proclaimed emperor by his troops; but at the end of ten months he resigned his pretensions in favour of Constantius, by whom he was treated with great kindness, and permitted to retire to Prusa, in Bithynia, where he passed the remaining six years of his life. (Amm. Marc. xv. 1, xxi. 8; Aurel. Vict. Caes. 41, 42; Zosim. ii. 43, 44.)

Vettius, L., a Roman eque, in the pay of Cicero in B.C. 63, to whom he gave some valuable information respecting the Catilinarian conspiracy. He again appears in 59, as an informer. In that year he accused Curio, Cicero, L. Lucullus, and many other distinguished men, of having formed a conspiracy to assassinate Pompey. This conspiracy was a sheer invention for the purpose of injuring Cicero, Curio, and others; but there is difficulty in determining who were the inventors of it. Cicero regarded it as the work of Caesar, who used the tribune Vatinius as his instrument. At a later period, when Cicero had returned from exile, and feared to provoke the triumvir, he threw the whole blame upon Vatinius. Vettius gave evidence first before the senate and on the next day before the assembly of the people; but his statements were regarded with great suspicion, and on the following morning he was found strangled in the prison to which the senate had sent him. It was given out that he had committed suicide; but the marks of violence were visible on his body, and Cicero at a later time charged Vatinius with the murder. (Suet. Jul. 17, 20; Dio Cass. xxxvii. 41, xxxviii. 9; Cic. in Vat. 10, 11, ad Att. ii. 24; App. B.C. ii. 12.)

Vettius Scato. [SCATO.]

Vettones or Vectones, a people in the interior of Lusitania, E. of the Lusitani and W. of the Carpetani, extending from the Durius to the Tagus (Strab. p. 152; Cass. B.C. i. 88).

Vētūlōnia, Vetulōnium, or Vetulōnii, an ancient city of Etruria, and one of the twelve cities of the Etruscan Confederation. From this city the Romans are said to have borrowed the insignia of their magistrates—the fasces, sella curulis, and toga praetexta—as well as the use of the brazen trumpet in war (Dionys. iii. 51; Strab. p. 220; Flor. i. 5; Sil. It. viii. 483). After the time of the Roman kings we find no further mention of Vetulonia, except in the catalogues of Pliny and Ptolemy, both of whom place it among the inland colonies of Etruria. Pliny also states that there were hot springs in its neighbourhood not far from the sea, in which fish were found, notwithstanding the warmth of the water (Plin. ii. 227). The very site of the ancient city was supposed to have been entirely lost; but it has been discovered in this century near a small village called Magliano, between the river Osa and the Albegna, and about eight miles inland. It appears to have had a circuit of at least four and a half miles.

Veturia Gens, anciently called Vetusia, patrician and plebeian. The Veturi rarely occur in the later times of the republic, and after B.C. 206, when L. Veturius Philo was consul, their name disappears from the Fasti. The most distinguished families in the gens bore the names CALVINUS, CICURINUS, and PHILO.

Vetūrius Māmūrius, was said in old traditions to have been the armourer who made the eleven ancilia exactly like the one that was sent from heaven in the reign of Numa (Plut. Num. 13; Ov. Fast. iii. 384; Dionys. ii. 71). But there is good reason to think that this was merely an attempt to explain the invocations of Mamurius in the hymns of the Salii, and that Mamurius Veturius is really = Mars Vetus [see MARS, p. 529, b]. This 'Old Mars' was represented by a man clothed in skins who was driven out of the city (Lyd. iv. 36), to symbolise the old season of wintry darkness driven out before the new spring year. [See Dict. of Ant. art. Salii]. Similar ceremonies to represent the driving out of winter have been observed in the folklore of other countries.

Vetus, Antistius. 1. Proprætor in Further Spain about B.C. 68, under whom Caesar served as quaestor (Plut. Caes. 5; Vell. Pat. ii. 43).—2. C., son of the preceding, quaestor in 61, and tribune of the plebs in 57, when he supported Cicero in opposition to Clodius. In the Civil war he espoused Caesar's party, and we find him in Syria in 45, fighting against Q. Caecilius Bassus. In 34 Vetus carried on war against the Salassi, and in 30 was consul suffectus. He accompanied Augustus to Spain in 25, and on the illness of the emperor continued the war against the Cantabri and Astures, whom he reduced to submission. (Cic. ad Q. Fr. ii. 1; Dio Cass. xlvii. 27, liii. 25; Flor. iv. 12, 21).—3. C., son of No. 2, consul B.C. 6; and as he lived to see both his sons consuls, he must have been alive at least as late as A.D. 28. He was a friend of Velleius Paterculus. (Dio Cass. lv. 9; Vell. Pat. ii. 43).—4. L., grandson of No. 3, and consul with the emperor Nero, A.D. 55. In 58 he commanded a Roman army in Germany, and formed the project of connecting the Mosella (Moselle) and the Arar (Saône) by a canal, and thus forming a communication between the Mediterranean and the Northern Ocean, as troops could be conveyed down the Rhone and the Saône into the Moselle through the canal, and down the Moselle into the Rhine, and so into the Ocean. Vetus put an end to his life in 65, in order to anticipate his sentence of death, which Nero had resolved upon. Vetus was the father-in-law of Rubellius Plautus. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 11, 53, xiv. 57, xvi. 10.)

Viādus (Oder), a river of Germany, falling into the Baltic (Ptol. ii. 11, 2).

Vibilius, king of the Hermanduri, aided Vangio and Sido in expelling Vannius from his dominions in the reign of Claudius (Tac. Ann. ii. 63, xii. 29; VANNIUS).

Vibinum, or Vibonium (Ἰβώνιον: Bovino), a town of Apulia, in the interior, seven miles S. of Aecae and fifteen from Luceria (Pol. iii. 88; Plin. 105).

Vibiūs Pansa. [PANSÆ.]

Vibiūs Sequester. [SEQUESTER.]

Vibo, the Roman name of the Greek town Hippōnium (Ἰππώνιον: Ἰππωνιάτης), situated on the SW. coast of Bruttium, and on a gulf called after it Sinus Vibonensis or Hipponiates. It is said to have been founded by the Locri Epizephyrii (Strab. p. 256; Scymn. p. 308; Scyl. iv. 12); but it was destroyed by the elder Dionysius, who transplanted its inhabitants to Syracuse. It was afterwards restored, and at a later time it fell into the hands of the Bruttii, together with the other Greek cities on this coast. (Diod. xiv. 107, xv. 24, xvi. 15.) It was taken from the Bruttii by the Romans, who colonised it B.C. 194, and called it Vibo Valentia (Strab. l.c.; Liv. xxi. 51; Vell. Pat. i. 14). Cicero speaks of it as a municipium, and in the time of Augustus it was one of the most flourishing cities in the S. of Italy (Cic. Verr. v. 16; Caes. B.C. iii. 101; App. B.C. v. 91, 103). The walls of the ancient fort are traceable at Bivona: it is conjectured that Vibo itself stood above on the site of the modern town Monte Leone.

Vibulanus, the name of the most ancient family of the Fabia Gens. It was so powerful in the early times of the republic that three brothers of the family held the consulship for seven years in succession, B.C. 485–479. The last person of the gens who bore this surname was Q. Fabius Vibulanus, consul 412. This Vibulanus assumed the agnomen of Ambustus, and his descendants dropped the name of Vibulanus and took that of Ambustus in its place. In the same way Ambustus was after a time supplanted by that of Maximus.—1. Q. Fabius Vibulanus, consul 485, when he carried on war with success against the Volsci and Aequi, and consul a second time in 482. In 480 he fought under his brother Marcus [No. 3] against the Etruscans, and was killed in battle. (Liv. ii. 41, 46; Dionys. viii. 77, 90, ix. 11).—2. K., brother of the preceding, was quaestor parricidii in 485, and along with his colleague, L. Valerius, accused Sp. Cassius Viscellinus, who was in consequence condemned by the votes of the populus. He was consul in 484, when he took an active part in opposing the agrarian law which the tribunes of the people attempted to bring forward. (Liv. ii. 42; Dionys. viii. 82–86.) In 481 he was consul a second time, and in 479 a third time, when he espoused the cause of the plebeians, to whom he had become reconciled. As his propositions were rejected with scorn by the patricians, he and his house resolved to quit Rome altogether, where they were regarded as apostates by their own order. They determined to found a settlement on the banks of the Cremera, a small stream that falls into the Tiber a few miles above Rome. According to the legend, the consul Kaeso went before the senate and said that the Fabii were willing to carry on the war against the Veientes, alone and at their own cost. Their offer was joyfully accepted, for the patricians were glad to see them expose themselves voluntarily to such dangers. On the day after Kaeso had made the proposal to the senate, 306 Fabii, all patricians of one gens, assembled on the Quirinal at the house of Kaeso, and from thence marched, with the consul at their head, through the Porta Carmentalis [ROMA, p. 800, b], which was afterwards called Porta Scelerata (Serv. ad Aen. viii. 337). They proceeded straight to the banks of the Cremera, where they erected a fortress. Here they took up their abode along with their families and clients, and for two years continued to devastate the territory of Veii. They were at length destroyed by the Veientes in 477. Ovid says that the Fabii perished on the Ides of February; but all other authorities state that they were destroyed on the day on which in a later year the Romans were conquered by the Gauls at the Allia—that is, on the 15th before the Kalends of Sextilis, June the 18th (Liv. vi. 1; Tac. Hist. ii. 91; Plut. Cam. 19). The whole Fabia gens perished at the Cremera with the exception of one individual, the son of Marcus, from whom all the later Fabii were descended. (Liv. ii. 48–50; Dionys. ix. 14–22; Gell. xvii. 21; Ov. Fast. ii. 195; Fest. s. v. Scelerata Porta.)—3. M., brother of the two preceding, was consul 483, and a second time 480. In the latter year he gained a great victory over the Etruscans, in which, however, his colleague the consul Cincinnatus and his brother Q. Fabius were killed. (Liv. ii. 43–47.)—4. Q., son of No. 3, is said to have been the only one of the Fabii who survived the destruction of his gens at the Cremera, but he could not have been left behind at Rome on account of his youth, as the legend relates, since he was consul ten years afterwards. He was consul in 467, a second time in 465, and a third time in 459. Fabius was a member of the second decemvirate (450), and went into exile on the deposition of the decemvirs. (Liv. iii. 1, 9, 41, 58.)

Vibullius Rufus, L., a senator and a friend of Pompey, who made him praefectus fabrum in the Civil war. He was taken prisoner by Caesar at Corfinium (49), and a second time in Spain later in the year. When Caesar landed in Greece in 48, he despatched Vibullius to Pompey with offers of peace. Vibullius made the greatest haste to reach Pompey, in order to give him the earliest intelligence of the arrival of his enemy in Greece. (Cic. ad Q. Fr. iii. 1, ad Att. vii. 24, viii. 1, 2, 11, 15; Caes. B. C. i. 15, 23, 38, iii. 10, 11.)

Vica Pota. [NIKE.]

Vicentia or Vicetia, less correctly Vincentia (Vicentinus: Vicenza), a town in Venetia, in the N. of Italy, on the river Togisonus, between Verona and Patavium. It was a Roman municipium. (Cic. ad Fam. xi. 19; Plin. Ep. v. 4, 14.)

Victor, Sex. Aurelius, a Latin writer, flourished in the middle of the fourth century under the emperor Constantius and his successors. He was born of humble parents, but rose to distinction by his zeal in the cultivation of literature. Having attracted the attention of Julian when at Sirmium, he was appointed by that prince governor of one division of Pannonia (Amm. Marc. xxi. 10, 6). At a subsequent period he was made city prefect by Theodosius, and he is perhaps the same as the Sex. Aurelius Victor who was consul with Valentinian in A.D. 373. The following works, which present in a very compressed form a continuous record of Roman affairs, from the fabulous ages down to the death of the emperor Theodosius, have all been ascribed to this writer; but evidence upon which the determination of authorship depends is very slender, and in all probability the third alone belongs to the Sex.

Aurelius Victor whom we have noticed above. (1) Origo Gentis Romanae, in twenty-three chapters, containing the annals of the Roman race, from Janus and Saturnus down to the era of Romulus. It is probably a production of some of the later grammarians who were desirous of prefixing a suitable introduction to the series. (2) De Viris Illustribus Urbis Romae, in eighty-six chapters, commencing with the birth of Romulus and Remus, and concluding with the death of Cleopatra, a work of merit, though of unknown authorship. (3) De Caesaribus, in forty-two chapters, exhibiting short biographies of the emperors, from Augustus to Constantius. There is no reason to doubt that this was a genuine work of Aurelius Victor. He uses Suetonius to a great extent in the earlier Lives. (4) Epitome de Caesaribus, in forty-eight chapters, beginning with Augustus and concluding with Theodosius.—Editions of these four pieces are by Arntzenius, Amst. et Traj. Bat. 1733, and by Schröter, Leips. 1831. The Origo is edited separately by Sepp, Munich, 1879, and the de Vir. Illustr. by Keil, Bresl. 1872.

Victor, Publius, the name prefixed to an enumeration of the principal buildings and monuments of ancient Rome, distributed according to the Regions of Augustus. The true account of this work appears to be that two lists of the fourteen Regions of Rome were derived from a document of the time of Constantine: the first was the Notitia, the later recension, supposed to have been made in the latter half of the fourth century, was called the Curiosum Urb. Rom. Regionum. A sort of guide-book was made up out of the Curiosum, with additions from other sources by writers of the fifteenth century, and was represented as an old work by a P. Victor.

Victōria. [NIKE.]

Victōria or Victōrina, the mother of Victorinus, after whose death she was hailed as the mother of camps (Mater Castrorum), and coins were struck bearing her effigy. Feeling herself unequal to the weight of empire, she transferred her power to Marius, and then to Tetricus, by whom some say that she was slain, while others affirm that she died a natural death. (Trebell. Poll. Trig. Tyr. 4, 6, 30; Aurel. Vict. Caes. 33.)

Victorinus. 1. One of the Thirty Tyrants, was third of the usurpers who in succession ruled Gaul during the reign of Gallienus. He was assassinated at Agrippina by one of his officers in A.D. 268, after reigning somewhat more than a year. (Trebell. Poll. Trig. Tyr. 5; Aurel. Vict. Caes. 33.)—2. C. Marius Victorinus, surnamed Afer from the country of his birth, taught rhetoric at Rome in the middle of the fourth century, with so much reputation that his statue was erected in the Forum of Trajan. In his old age he embraced Christianity; and when the edict of Julian, prohibiting Christians from giving instruction in polite literature, was promulgated, Victorinus chose to shut up his school rather than deny his religion. Besides his commentaries on the Scriptures, and other theological works, many of which are extant, Victorinus wrote:—Commentarius s. Expositio in Ciceronis Libros de Inventione, the best edition of which is in the fifth volume of Orelli's edition of Cicero. 2. Ars Grammatica de Orthographia et Ratione Metrorum, a complete and voluminous treatise upon metres, in four books, printed in the Grammaticae Latinae Auctores Antiqui of Putschius, Hannov. 1605. The fame enjoyed by Victorinus as a public instructor does not gain any accession from his works. The exposition of the De Inventione is more difficult to comprehend than the text which it professes to explain.—4. Maximus Victorinus. We possess three short tracts—(1) De Re Grammatica; (2) De Carmine Heroico; (3) De Ratione Metrorum—all apparently the work of the same author, and usually ascribed in MSS. to a Maximus Victorinus; but whether we ought to consider him the same with the rhetorician who flourished under Constantius, or as an independent personage, it is impossible to decide. They were printed in the collection of Putschius, Hannov. 1605, and in that of Lindemann, Leips. 1831.

Victrix. [VENUS.]

Viducasses, a tribe of the Armorici in Gallia Lugdunensis, S. of the modern Caen (Ptol. ii. 8, 5; Plin. iv. 107).

Vienna (Viennensis: Vienne), the chief town of the Allobroges in Gallia Lugdunensis, situated on the Rhone, S. of Lugdunum. It was subsequently a Roman colony, and a wealthy and flourishing town. Under the later emperors it was the capital of the province called after it Gallia Viennensis. (Caes. B.G. vii. 9; Tac. Hist. i. 65, 66; Mart. vii. 88.) The modern town contains several Roman remains, of which the most important is a temple, supposed to have been dedicated to Augustus, and now converted into a museum.

Villius Annalis. [ANNALIS.]

Viminālis. [ROMA.]

Vindalum, a town of the Cavares in Gallia Narbonensis, situated at the confluence of the Sulgas (Sorgue) and the Rhone (Strab. p. 185).

Vindelicia, the country of the Vindelici, a Celtic people, whose territory stretched along the N. of RAETIA, being bounded on the N. by the Danube, which separated it from Germany, on the W. by the territory of the Helvetii in Gaul, and on the E. by the river Oenus (Inn), which separated it from Noricum, thus corresponding to the NE. part of Switzerland (the country about the NW. end of the Lake of Constance), the SE. of Baden, and the S. of Würtemberg and Bavaria. The Vindelici were subdued by Tiberius, who defeated them both by land in the country S. of the Danube, and in a naval battle on the Lake of Constance (Tac. Ann. ii. 17; Suet. Aug. 21; Vell. Pat. ii. 39; Strab. pp. 193, 207, 293, 313; Hor. Od. iv. 4, 18). It was made part of the Raetian province [RAETIA]. In the fourth cent. A.D., when Raetia was divided, the northern province, called Raetia Secunda, corresponding mainly to the old territory of the Vindelici, had as its chief town Augusta Vindelicorum (Augsburg).

Vindex, C. Jūlius, praetor of Gallia Lugdunensis in the reign of Nero, was the first of the Roman governors who disowned the authority of Nero (A.D. 68). He did not, however, aspire to the empire himself, but offered it to Galba, intending, probably, to make Gaul a separate and independent kingdom, freed from the Roman yoke, and governed by himself, as a vassal prince under Galba. Virginius Rufus, the governor of Upper Germany, marched with his army against Vindex. The two generals had a conference before Vesontio (Besançon), in which they appear to have come to some agreement; but as Vindex was going to enter the town, he was attacked by the soldiers of Virginius, and put an end to his own life. (Dio Cass. lxxiii. 22-26; Tac. Ann. xx.

74, Hist. vi. 6, 8, 51, iv. 17, 57; Plut. Galb. 4; Suet. Ner. 40, 45, Galb. 9, 11.)

Vindicius, a slave, who is said to have given information to the consuls of the conspiracy which was formed for the restoration of the Tarquins, and who was rewarded in consequence with liberty and the Roman franchise. He is said to have been the first slave manumitted by the Vindicta, the name of which was derived by some persons from that of the slave; but it is unnecessary to point out the absurdity of this etymology. (Liv. ii. 5; cf. Dict. of Antiq. art. Manumissio.)

Vindili. [VANDILL.]

Vindius or Vinnius, a mountain in the NW. of Hispania Tarraconensis, forming the boundary between the Cantabri and Astures (Ptol. ii. 6, 21).

Vindobona (Vienna, Engl.; Wien, Germ.), a town in Pannonia, on the Danube, was originally a Celtic settlement, and subsequently a Roman municipium. Under the Romans it became a town of importance; it was the chief station of the Roman fleet on the Danube, and the headquarters of a Roman legion. It was taken and plundered by Attila, but continued to be a flourishing town under the Lombards. It was here that the emperor M. Aurelius died, A.D. 180. (Ptol. ii. 15, 3; Aurel. Vict. Caes. 16; Jordan. Get. 50.)

Vindonissa (Windisch), a town in Gallia Belgica, on the triangular tongue of land between the Aar and Reuss, was an important Roman fortress in the country of the Helvetii (Tac. Hist. iv. 61, 70). It was used as a chief military station in Upper Germany. Several Roman remains have been discovered on the site of the ancient town, and the foundations of walls, the traces of an amphitheatre, and a subterranean aqueduct, are still to be seen.

Vinicius, M., was consul A.D. 30, and in 33 married Julia Livilla, the daughter of Germanicus. He was consul again in 45, and was put to death in 46 at the instigation of Messalina. He was a patron of Velleius Paterculus. (Tac. Ann. vi. 15, 45; Dio Cass. lx. 25, 27.)

Vinius, T., consul in A.D. 69 with the emperor Galba, and one of the chief advisers of the latter during his brief reign. He recommended Galba to choose Otho as his successor, but he was notwithstanding killed by Otho's soldiers, after the death of Galba. (Tac. Hist. i. 6, 11, 37, 42, 48; Suet. Galb. 14, Vitell. 7.)

Vipsania Agrippina. 1. Daughter of M. Vipsanius Agrippa by his first wife, Pomponia, the daughter of T. Pomponius Atticus, the friend of Cicero. Augustus gave her in marriage to his stepson Tiberius, by whom she was much beloved; but after she had borne him a son, Drusus, Tiberius was compelled to divorce her by the command of the emperor, in order to marry Julia, the daughter of the latter. Vipsania afterwards married Asinius Gallus. She died in A.D. 20. (Tac. Ann. i. 12, iii. 19; Dio Cass. liv. 31, lvii. 2.)—2. Daughter of M. Vipsanius Agrippa by his second wife, Julia, better known by the name of Agrippina. [AGRIPPINA.]

Vipsanius Agrippa, M. [AGRIPPA.]

Virbius, a Latin divinity worshipped with Diana in the grove at Aricia, at the foot of the Alban Mt. [p. 284, a; cf. Dict. of Ant. art. Rex Nemorensis]. When the Italian myths were affected by those of Greece, and Diana was identified with Artemis, Virbius was said to be the same as Hippolytus, who was restored to life by Asclepius at the request of Artemis. It was alleged that Hippolytus was placed by this goddess under the care of the nymph Aricia, and received the name of Virbius. By this nymph he became the father of a son, who was also called Virbius, and whom his mother sent to the assistance of Turnus against Aeneas (Verg. Aen. vii. 761; Serv. ad loc.; Ov. Met. xv. 545). This was clearly a transference to Italy of the story of Hippolytus being devoted to the service of Artemis. It is suggested with great probability that Virbius was originally a tree spirit of the sacred grove, to whom horses (as representatives of the spirit) were sacrificed. Hence they were in time represented as hostile to the deity Virbius, and therefore excluded from the grove. This 'taboo' was accounted for by making Virbius the same as Hippolytus, whose death was caused by his horses running away.

Virido. [VINDELICIA.]

Virdumarus. [VIRIDOMARUS.]

Virgilius. [VERGILIUS.]

Virginia, daughter of L. Virginus, a centurion, was a beautiful and innocent girl, betrothed to L. Icilius. Her beauty excited the passion of the decemvir Appius Claudius, who got one of his clients to seize the damsel and claim her as his slave. The case was brought before the decemvir for decision; her friends begged him to postpone his judgment till her father could be fetched from the camp, and offered to give security for the appearance of the maiden. Appius, fearing a riot, agreed to let the cause stand over till the next day; but on the following morning he pronounced sentence, assigning Virginia to his freedman. Her father, who had come from the camp, seeing that all hope was gone, prayed the decemvir to be allowed to speak one word to the nurse in his daughter's hearing, in order to ascertain whether she was really his daughter. The request was granted; Virginus drew them both aside, and, snatching up a butcher's knife from one of the stalls, plunged it in his daughter's breast, exclaiming, 'There is no way but this to keep thee free.' In vain did Appius call out to stop him. The crowd made way for him, and, holding his bloody knife on high, he rushed to the gate of the city, and hastened to the Roman camp. Both camp and city rose against the decemvirs, who were deprived of their power, and the old form of government was restored. L. Virginus was the first who was elected tribune, and he hastened to take revenge upon his cruel enemy. By his orders Appius was dragged to prison to await his trial, and he there put an end to his own life in order to avoid a more ignominious death. (Liv. iii. 44-58; Dionys. xi. 28-46; Cic. Fin. ii. 20, De Rep. ii. 37.)

Virgīnia or Vergīnia Gens, patrician and plebeian. The patrician Virgīnii frequently filled the highest honours of the state during the early years of the republic. They all bore the cognomen of Tricostus, but none of them are of sufficient importance to require a separate notice.

Virgīnius, L., father of Virginia, whose tragic fate occasioned the downfall of the decemvirs, B.C. 449. [VIRGINIA.]

Virgīnius Rufus, consul A.D. 63, and governor of Upper Germany at the time of the revolt of Julius Vindex in Gaul (68). The soldiers of Virginus wished to raise him to the empire; but he refused the honour, and marched against Vindex, who perished before Vesontio. [VINDE.] After the death of Nero, Virginus supported the claims of Galba, and accompanied him to Rome. After Otho's death, the soldiers again attempted to proclaim Virginus emperor, and in consequence of his refusal of the honour he narrowly escaped with his life. Virginus died in the reign of Nerva, in his third consulship, A.D. 97, at eighty-three years of age. He was honoured with a public funeral, and his panegyric was pronounced by the historian Tacitus, who was then consul. His epitaph, composed by himself, notices his refusal of empire:

Hic situs est Rufus, pulso qui Vindice quondam
Imperium adseruit non sibi sed patriae.

The younger Pliny, of whom Virginus had been the tutor or guardian, also mentions him with praise. (Tac. Hist. i. 8, 77, ii. 49, 68; Plut. Galb. 4, 6, 10; Dio Cass. lxxiii. 24-27, lxxiv. 4, lxxviii. 2; Plin. Ep. ii. 1, v. 3, vi. 10, ix. 19.)

Viriāthus, a celebrated Lusitanian, is described by the Romans as originally a shepherd or huntsman, and afterwards a robber, or, as he would be called in Spain in the present day, a guerilla chief. His character is drawn very favourably by many of the ancient writers, who celebrate his justice and equity, which was particularly shown in the fair division of the spoils he obtained from the enemy. Viriathus was one of the Lusitanians who escaped the treacherous and savage massacre of the people by the proconsul Galba in B.C. 150. [GALBA, No. 2.] He was destined to be the avenger of his country's wrongs. He collected a formidable force, and for several successive years he defeated one Roman army after another. At length, in 141, the proconsul Fabius Servilianus concluded a peace with Viriathus, in order to save his army, which had been enclosed by the Lusitanians in a mountain pass, much in the same way as their ancestors had been by the Samnites at the Caudine Forks. The treaty was ratified by the senate; but Servilius Caepio, who had succeeded to the command of Further Spain in 140, renewed the war, and shortly afterwards procured the assassination of Viriathus by bribing three of his friends. (App. Hisp. 60-75; Eutrop. iv. 16; Vell. Pat. ii. 1; Val. Max. ix. 6, 4; [Aurel. Vict.] Vir. Illustr. 71; Frontin. Strat. ii. 5, iii. 10, 11, iv. 5.)

Viriplacea. [INDIGETES, p. 443, a.]

Viridomarus. 1. Or Britomartus, the leader of the Gauls, slain by Marcellus. [MARCELLUS, No. 1.]—2. Or Virdumarus, a chieftain of the Aedui, whom Caesar had raised from a low rank to the highest honour, but who afterwards joined the Gauls in their great revolt in B.C. 52 (Caes. B. G. vii. 38, 54, 63).

Viroconium or Uriconium (Wroxeter), a town in Britain on the roads from Deva (Chester) to Londinium and to Glevum (Gloucester). It stood at the confluence of the Terne with the Severn, and here Ostorius Scapula fortified a camp for the 14th Legion as a defence of the Welsh border (Tac. Ann. xii. 31; cf. Ptol. ii. 3, 19).

Virtus, the Roman personification of manly valour. She was represented with a short tunic, her right breast uncovered, a helmet on her head, a spear in her left hand, a sword in the right, and standing with her right foot on a helmet, while Honos has the laurel crown. [See coin on p. 426.] A temple of Virtus was built by Marcellus close to one of Honos. [HONOS.]

Virunum (Mariasal), a town in Noricum, S. of Noreia, and a Roman colony (Plin. iii. 146; Ptol. ii. 14, 3; Steph. Byz. s.v.).

Viscellinus, Sp. Cassius. [CASSIUS, No. 1.]

Vistula (Vistula, Engl.; Weichsel, Germ.), an important river of Germany, forming the boundary between Germany and Sarmatia, rising in the Hercynia Silva and falling into the Mare Suevicum or the Baltic (Ptol. viii. 10, 2; Mel. iii. 4; Plin. iv. 100). It was first described in the map of Agrippa (Plin. iv. 81).

Visurgis (Weser), an important river of Germany, falling into the German Ocean. Ptolemy makes it rise in M. Meliboeus. (Mel. iii. 4; Plin. iv. 100; Tac. Ann. i. 70, ii. 9; Strab. p. 291; Ptol. ii. 11, 1.)

Vitellia, a town of Latium, on the frontiers of the Aequi, which disappears from history after the time of the Gallic invasion (Liv. ii. 39, v. 29; Dionys. v. 61).

Vitellius. 1. L., father of the emperor, was a consummate flatterer, and by his arts he gained promotion. After being consul in A.D. 34, he had been appointed governor of Syria, and had made favourable terms of peace with Artabanus. But all this only excited Caligula's jealousy, and he sent for Vitellius to put him to death. The governor saved himself by his abject humiliation and the gross flattery which pleased and softened the savage tyrant. He paid the like attention to Claudius and Messalina, and was rewarded by being twice consul with Claudius, and censor. (Dio Cass. lix. 27; Tac. Ann. xi. 1-3, xii. 42.)—2. L., son of the preceding, and brother of the emperor, was consul in 48. He was put to death by the party of Vespasian on his brother's fall. (Tac. Hist. iv. 2; Dio Cass. lxxv. 22.)—3. A., Roman emperor from January 2nd to December 22nd, A.D. 69, was the son of No. 1. He was consul during the first six months of 48, and his brother Lucius during the six following months. He had some knowledge of letters and some eloquence. His vices made him a favourite of Tiberius, Caius Caligula, Claudius, and Nero, who loaded him with favours. People were much surprised when Galba chose such a man to command the legions in Lower Germany, for he had little military talent. Both Upper and Lower Germany had been attached to Virginius Rufus, and disliked the rule of Galba; the two legions at Moguntiacum had not taken the oath of allegiance to him. Accordingly, they had already been disposed to find a nominee of their own, and when the news of Galba's death arrived the legions of both Germanies combined to acknowledge Vitellius as Imperator, and he was proclaimed at Colonia Agrippinensis (Cologne) on the 2nd of January, 69. His generals Fabius Valens and Caecina marched into Italy, defeated Otho's troops at the decisive battle of Bedriacum, or Bedriacum, and thus secured for Vitellius the undisputed command of Italy. The soldiers of Otho, after his death, took the oath of fidelity to Vitellius. [Otho.] Vitellius reached Rome in July. He did not disturb any person in the enjoyment of what had been given by Nero, Galba, and Otho, nor did he confiscate any person's property. Though some of Otho's adherents were put to death, he let the next of kin take their property. But though he showed moderation in this part of his conduct, he showed none in his expenses. He was a glutton and an epicure, and his chief amusement was the table, on which he spent enormous sums of money. Meantime Vespasian, who had at first taken the oath of allegiance to Vitellius, was proclaimed emperor at Alexandria on the 1st of July. Vespasian was speedily recognised by all the East; and the legions of Illyricum under Antonius Primus entered the N. of Italy and declared for Vespasian. Vitellius despatched Caecina with a powerful force to oppose Primus; but Caecina was not faithful to his master. Primus defeated the Vitellians in two battles, and afterwards took and pillaged the city of Cremona. Primus then marched upon Rome, and forced his way into the city, after much fighting. Vitellius was seized in the palace, led through the streets with every circumstance of ignominy, and dragged to the Gemoniae Stalae, where he was killed with repeated blows. His head was carried about Rome, and his body was thrown into the Tiber; but it was afterwards buried by his wife, Galeria Fundana. A few days before the death of Vitellius, the Capitol had been burnt in the assault made by his soldiers upon this building, where Flavius Sabinus, the brother of the emperor Vespasian, had taken refuge. (Tac. Hist. ii. iii.; Suet. Vitell.; Dio Cass. lxxv.)

Vitruvius Pollio, M., the author of the celebrated treatise on Architecture, of whom we know nothing except a few facts contained in scattered passages of his own work. He appears to have served as a military engineer under Julius Caesar, in the African war, B.C. 46, and he was broken down with age when he composed his work, which is dedicated to the emperor Augustus. Though he usually speaks of the emperor as Imperator or Caesar, he employs also the title Augustus, which was adopted in B.C. 27, and he mentions (iii. 2, 7) the temple of Quirinus, which was built B.C. 16; but he knows only one stone theatre at Rome (iii. 2, 2): whence it is inferred that the work was completed between B.C. 16 and B.C. 13, in which year two more stone theatres were built. He professes his intention to furnish the emperor with a standard by which to judge of the buildings he had already erected, as well as of those which he might afterwards erect; which can have no meaning, unless he wished to protest against the style of architecture which prevailed in the buildings already erected. That this was really his intention appears from several other arguments, and especially from his frequent references to the unworthy means by which architects obtained wealth and favour, with which he contrasts his own moderation and contentment in his more obscure position. In a word, having apparently few great buildings of his own to point to as embodying his views (the basilica at Fanum is the only work of his which is mentioned), he desired to lay before the world in writing his principles of architecture. His work is a valuable compendium of those written by numerous Greek architects, whom he mentions chiefly in the preface to his seventh book, and by some Roman writers on architecture. Its chief defects are its brevity, of which Vitruvius himself boasts, and which he often carries so far as to be unintelligible, and the obscurity of the style, arising in part from the natural difficulty of technical language, but in part also from the author's want of skill in writing, and sometimes from his imperfect comprehension of his Greek authorities. His work is entitled De Architectura Libri X. In the first book, after the dedication to the emperor, and a general description of the science of architecture and an account of the proper education of an architect, he treats of the choice of a proper site for a city, the disposition of its plan, its fortifications, and the several buildings within it. The second book is on the materials used in building. The third and fourth books are devoted to temples and the four orders of architecture employed in them: namely, the Ionic, Corinthian, Doric, and Tuscan. The fifth book relates to public buildings, the sixth to private houses, and the seventh to interior decorations. The eighth is on the subject of water: the mode of finding it; its different kinds; and the various modes of conveying it for the supply of cities. The ninth book treats of various kinds of sun-dials and other instruments for measuring time; and the tenth of the machines used in building, and of military engines. Each book has a preface, upon some matter more or less connected with the subject; and these prefaces are the source of most of our information about the author.—The best editions of Vitruvius are those by Schneider, 3 vols., Lips. 1807, 1808, 8vo; of Stratico, 4 vols., Udine, 1825-30, with plates and a Lexicon Vitruvianum; by Marini, 4 vols. Rom. 1836, which has recently been revised by Lorentzen; and by Rose and Müller-Strübing, Leips. 1867; translation and commentary by Reber, Stuttg. 1864.

Vocātes, a people in Gallia Aquitania, dwelling in the neighbourhood of the Tarusates, Sossiates, and Elusates, S. of Bordeaux.

Vocetius (Bözberg), a mountain in Gallia Belgica, an eastern branch of the Jura (Tac. Hist. i. 68).

Voconius Saxa. [SAXA.]

Vöcontii, a powerful and important people in Gallia Narbonensis, inhabiting parts of Dauphiné and of Provence. They dwelt between the Tricastini to the N. and the Tricorii to the S. and their territory extended from Vizille (Vigilae) on the Drac to the river Drome, and far enough S. to include Vasio (Vaison, in the department of Vaucluse), which is mentioned as one of their chief towns. Livy speaks of Hannibal passing through the edge of the Vocontian territory between the Tricastini and the Tricorii. This 'extrema ora Vocontiorum' was probably the district between Vizille and Corps, about which point he entered the territory of the Tricorii. (Liv. xxi. 81; Caes. B. G. i. 10; Ptol. ii. 10, 17; Plin. iii. 37.)

Vögēsus. [VOSAGUS.]

Volandum, a strong fortress in Armenia Major, some days' journey W. of Artaxata, mentioned by Tacitus (Ann. xiii. 39).

Vōlāterrae (Volaterranus: Volaterra), called by the Etruscans Velathri, one of the twelve cities of the Etruscan Confederation, was built on a lofty hill, about 1800 English feet above the level of the sea, rising from a deep valley, and precipitous on every side (Strab. p. 223). The city was about four or five miles in circuit. It was the most northerly city of the Confederation, and possessed an extensive territory. Its dominions extended eastward as far as the territory of Arretium, which was fifty miles distant; westward as far as the Mediterranean, which was more than twenty miles off; and southward at least as far as Populonia, which was either a colony or an acquisition of Volaterrae. In consequence of possessing the two great ports of Luna and Populonia, Volaterrae, though so far inland, was reckoned as one of the powerful maritime cities of Etruria. Volaterrae is mentioned as one of the five cities which, acting independently of the rest of Etruria, determined to aid the Latins against Tarquinius Priscus (Dionys. iii. 51); but its name is rarely mentioned in connexion with the Romans, and we have no record of its conquest. Volaterrae, like most of the Etruscan cities, espoused the Marian party against Sulla; and such was the strength of its fortifications that it was not till after a siege of two years that the city fell into Sulla's hands. Cicero speaks of Volaterrae as a municipium, and a military colony was founded in it under the triumvirate. (Strab. l. c.; Liv. Ep. 89; Cic. pro Rosc. Am. 7, 20, pro Caecin. 7, 18, ad Fam. xiii. 4.) It continued to be a place of importance even after the fall of the Western Empire, and it was for a time the residence of the Lombard kings, who fixed their court here on account of the natural strength of the site. The modern town covers but a small portion of the area occupied by the ancient city. It contains, however, several interesting Etruscan remains. Of these the most important are the massive ancient walls in which is a double gateway, nearly thirty feet deep, known as Porta all' Arco, and the family tomb of the Caecinae.

Volaterrāna Vada. [VADA, No. 3.]

Volcae, a powerful Celtic people in Gallia Narbonensis, divided into the two tribes of the Volcae Tectosages and Volcae Arecomici, extending from the Pyrenees and the frontiers of Aquitania along the coast as far as the Rhone. They lived under their own laws, without being subject to the Roman governor of the province, and they also possessed the Jus Latii. The Tectosages inhabited the western part of the country from the Pyrenees as far as Narbo, and Arecomici the E. part from Narbo to the Rhone, and even beyond the Rhone (Liv. xxi. 26; Strab. p. 203). The chief town of the Tectosages was TOLOSA. A portion of the Tectosages left their native country under Brennus, and were one of the three great tribes into which the Galatians in Asia Minor were divided. [GALATIA.]

Volcanus or Vulcanus (which is the later form of the word), was the Italian god of fire. Volcanus differed originally from Vesta in being the god rather of destructive fire than of the kindly hearth-fire; and it is probable that the Volcanal as one of the central sanctuaries in an Italian town (e.g. the altar and Area Volcani in the Comitium at Rome) was originally a place for propitiatory offerings against destructive fire. In this way Volcanus was connected with the goddess who stayed conflagrations [STATA MATER]. That, however, in some places he was at one time also regarded as a god of the hearth-fire is indicated by the story of his son CAECULUS, and perhaps by that of Servius Tullius. But another primitive characteristic was his benign influence also as a god of summer heat, which led to his being paired with Maia, the goddess of spring or summer crops fostered by the sun (Gell. xiii. 23; Macrob. i. 12; Varr. L. L. v. 84); and in this aspect he may have been connected with the Italian Venus even before the Greek influence introduced this association from the analogy of Hephaestus and Aphrodite. As regards the connexion of the Italian Vulcan with the smith's works of forging and melting, there is no clear evidence. It is asserted that Mulciber, a synonym of Volcanus (and possibly once the name of another deity amalgamated or identified with him), represents this function of Vulcan, and is derived from mulcere, to soften metals; but this is by no means certain, and it is possible that the connexion of Vulcanus (or Mulciber) with metal-work and the smithy is merely part of the transference to him of all the attributes of Hephaestus, with whom he is entirely identified in literature. For all the myths thus transferred to Vulcanus, see HEPHAESTUS.

Volcatus Sedigitus. [SEDIGITUS.]

Volci or Vulci. 1. (Volcientes, pl.: Vulci), an inland city of Etruria, about eighteen miles NW. of Tarquinii, was about two miles in circuit, and was situated upon a hill of no great elevation. Of the history of this city we know nothing. It is only mentioned in the catalogues of the geographers and in the Fasti Capitolini, from which we learn that its citizens, in conjunction with the Volsinienses, were defeated by the consul Tib. Coruncanius, B.C. 280. But its extensive sepulchres, and the vast treasures of ancient art which they contain, prove that Vulci must at one time have been a powerful and flourishing city. These tombs were discovered in 1828, and have yielded a greater number of works of art than have been discovered in any other parts of Etruria.—2. (Volcentes, Volcentani, pl.: Vallo), a town in Lucania, thirty-six miles SE. of Paestum, on the road to Buxentum (Liv. xxvii. 15; Plin. iii. 98; Ptol. iii. 1, 70).

Volero Publilius. [PUBLILIUS.]

Vologeses, the name of five kings of Parthia. [ARSACES XXIII., XXVII., XXVIII., XXIX., XXX.]

Volsi, an ancient people in Latium, but originally distinct from the Latins, dwelt on both sides of the river Liris, and extended down to the Tyrrhene sea. Their language was nearly allied to the Umbrian. They were from an early period engaged in almost unceasing hostilities with the Romans. About 400 B.C. they had established their power as far N. as Antium and Velitrae, but their decline is marked by the establishment of a Roman colony greatly to the S. of this line, at Circeii, B.C. 393. They were not completely subdued till B.C. 338, from which time they were merged in the Roman people, a great part being included in the Pomptine tribe. (Liv. i. 53, ii. 33, iv. 26, viii. 14; Strab. pp. 228, 231.)

Volsinii or Vulsinii (Volsiniensis: Bolsena), called Velsina or Velsuna by the Etruscans, one of the most ancient and most powerful of the twelve cities of the Etruscan Confederation (Liv. x. 37; Val. Max. ix. 1, 2), was situated on a lofty hill on the NE. extremity of the lake called after it, Lacus Volsiniensis and Vulsiniensis (Lago di Bolsena). Volsinii is first mentioned in B.C. 392, when its inhabitants invaded the Roman territory, but were easily defeated by the Romans, and were glad to purchase a twenty years' truce on humiliating terms (Liv. v. 32). The Volsinienses also carried on war with the Romans in 311, 294, and 280, but were on each occasion defeated, and in the last of these years appear to have been finally subdued (Liv. ix. 32–37). On their final subjugation their city was razed to the ground by the Romans, and its inhabitants were compelled to settle on a less defensible site in the plain (Zonar. viii. 7). The new city, on the site of which stands the modern Bolsena, also became a place of importance. It was the birthplace of Sejanus, the favourite of Tiberius (Tac. Ann.

iv. 1; cf. Juv. x. 74). Of the ancient city there are scarcely any remains. It occupied the summit of the highest hill, NE. of Bolsena, above the remains of a Roman amphitheatre. From the Lacus Volsiniensis the river Marta issues; and the lake contains two islands.

Voltacilius, L. Pilutus or Plotus, was the freedman of a Voltacilius who opened a school as a rhetorician. Pompey was among his pupils, and he followed the Pompeian party, supporting their cause in his historical writings or pamphlets. He is identified by some with the Voltacilius Pitholaus of Macrob. ii. 2, 13, and with the Pitholaus of Suet. Jul. 75 (Suet. Gramm. 27).

Volturcius, Vulturcius, T., of Crotona, one of Catiline's conspirators, was sent by Lentulus to accompany the ambassadors of the Allobroges to Catiline. Arrested along with the ambassadors on the Mulvian bridge, and brought before the senate by Cicero, Volturcius turned informer upon obtaining the promise of pardon. (Sall. Cat. 44–50; Cic. Cat. iii. 2, 4, iv. 3; App. B.C. ii. 4.)

Volumnia, wife of Coriolanus. [CORIOLANUS.]

Volupia, or Voluptas, the personification of sensual pleasure among the Romans, who was honoured with a temple near the Porta Romanula.

Volsianus, son of the emperor Trebonianus Gallus, upon whom his father conferred the title of Caesar in A.D. 251, and of Augustus in 252. He was slain along with his father in 254. [GALLUS.]

L. Völusius Maecianus, a jurist, was in the consilium of Antoninus Pius, and was one of the teachers of M. Aurelius. Maecianus wrote several works; and there are forty-two excerpts from his writings in the Digest. A treatise De Asse et Ponderibus is attributed to him, but there is some doubt about the authorship. It is edited by Böcking, Bonn, 1831.

Völusus or Völésus, the reputed ancestor of the Valeria gens, who is said to have settled at Rome with Titus Tatius. [VALERIA GENS.]

Vomānus (Vomano), a small river in Picenum.

Vōnōnēs, the name of two kings of Parthia. [ARSACES XVIII., XXII.]

Vopiscus, a Roman praenomen, signified a twin-child who was born alive, while the other twin died before birth (Plin. vii. 47; Solin. 1). Like many other ancient Roman praenomens, it was afterwards used as a cognomen.

Vōpiscus, Flāvius. [SCRIPTORES HISTORIAE AUGUSTAE.]

Vōsāgus, Vosegus, or Voges (Vosges), the range of mountains which extend from the Dubis (Doubs) to the Saravus (Saar), more or less parallel to the course of the Rhine, and contains the sources of the Saône, Moselle, and Saar (Caes. B. G. iv. 10; Lucan, Phars. i. 397). A Celtic deity, Vosagus, was worshipped on its heights. Pliny praises the fir woods of the range (xvi. 197).

Vulcānus. [VOLCANUS.]

Vulci. [VOLCI.]

Vulgientes, an Alpine people in Gallia Narbonensis, whose chief town was Apta Julia (Apt).

Vulsinii. [VOLSINII.]

Vulso, Manlius. 1. L., consul B.C. 256 with M. Atilius Regulus. He invaded Africa along with his colleague. [For details see REGULUS, No. 3.] Vulso returned to Italy at the fall of the year with half of the army, and obtained the honour of a triumph. In 250 Vulso was consul a second time with T. Atilius Regulus Serranus, and with his colleague commenced the siege of Lilybaeum. (Pol. i. 39-48; Zonar. viii. 15.)—2. Cn., curule aedile 197, praetor with Sicily as his province 195, and consul 189. He was sent into Asia in order to conclude the peace which Scipio Asiaticus had made with Antiochus, and to arrange the affairs of Asia. He attacked and conquered the Gallograeci or Galatians in Asia Minor without waiting for any formal instructions from the senate. His march, which is important in the discussion of the topography of Asia Minor, and has been carefully traced by Professor Ramsay, was from Ephesus by Magnesia, Hiera Kome, Antiocheia, Gordiu Teichos, Tabae, Eriza, Thabusion, Sinda, Mandropolis, Lagoe, Isinda, the river Taurus, Cormasa, and Aporidos Kome to Rhocrini Fontes; and thence to Synnada, Beudus Vetus, Anabura, Mandri Fontes, Abbassus, Lalandum Flumen, Amorion, Alyattus, and Cuballum to the Sangarius, which he crossed, to Ancyra, in the country of the Tectosages, and as far as the banks of the Halys (Liv. xxxviii. 12-27; Pol. xxii. 16). He set out on his return to Italy in 188, but in his march through Thrace he suffered much from the attacks of the Thracians, and lost a considerable part of the booty he had obtained in Asia. He reached Rome in 187. His triumph was a brilliant one, but his campaign in Asia had a pernicious influence upon the morals of his countrymen. He had allowed his army every kind of licence, and his soldiers introduced into the city the luxuries of the East. (Liv. xxxviii. 37-50; xxxix. 6; Pol. xxii. 24; App. Syr. 42.)

Vultur, a mountain dividing Apulia and Lucania near Venusia, is a branch of the Apennines. It is celebrated by Horace as one of the haunts of his youth (Od. iii. 4, 9-16; Lucan, ix. 185). [HORATIUS.] It attains an elevation of 4433 feet above the sea. From it the SE. wind was called Vulturnus by the Romans.

Vulturnum (Castel di Volturno), a town in Campania, at the mouth of the river Vulturnus, was originally a fortress erected by the Romans in the second Punic war (Liv. xxv. 20, 22). At a later time it was made a colony (Liv. xxxiv. 45; Varr. L. L. v. 5).

Vulturnus (Volturno), the chief river in Campania, rising in the Apennines in Samnium, and falling into the Tyrrhene sea. It has a deep, rapid and turbid stream. Its principal affluents are the Calor (Calore), Tamarus (Tamaro), and Sabatus (Sabato). (Verg. Aen. vii. 729; Ov. Met. xv. 714; Lucan, ii. 423; Strab. pp. 238, 249.)

Xanthippē. [SOCRATES.]

Xanthippus (Ξάνθιππος). 1. Son of Ariphron and father of Pericles. In B.C. 490 he impeached Miltiades on his return from his unsuccessful expedition against the island of Paros. He succeeded Themistocles as commander of the Athenian fleet in 479, and commanded the Athenians at the decisive battle of Mycale. (Hdt. vi. 131, 136, viii. 131, ix. 114-120; Plut. Themist. 10.)—2. The elder of the two legitimate sons of Pericles, Paralus being the younger. For details, see PARALUS.—3. The Lacedaemonian, who commanded the Carthaginians against Regulus. For details, see REGULUS, No. 3. Xanthippus appears to have left Carthage a short time after his victory over Regulus.

Xanthus (Ξάνθος). 1. A lyric poet, older than Stesichorus, who mentioned him in one at least of his poems, and who borrowed from him in some of them. Xanthus may be placed about B.C. 650. No fragments of his poetry survive. (Athen. p. 513; Ael. V. H. iv. 26.)—2. A Lydian historian, older than Herodotus, lived about B.C. 480 (Athen. p. 515). The genuineness of the Four Books of Lydian History which the ancients possessed under the name of Xanthus, and of which some considerable fragments have come down to us, was questioned by some of the ancient grammarians themselves, and there has been considerable controversy respecting it among modern scholars. It is certain that much of the matter in the extant fragments is spurious, and the probability appears to be that the work from which they are taken is the production of an Alexandrian grammarian, founded upon the genuine work of Xanthus. (Müller, Fragm. Hist. Graec.)

Xanthus (Ξάνθος), rivers. 1. [SCAMANDER.]—2. (Echen Chai), the chief river of Lycia, rises in M. Taurus, on the borders of Pisidia and Lycia, and flows S. through Lycia, between M. Cragus and M. Massicytus, in a large plain called the Plain of Xanthus (τὸ Ξάνθιον πεδῖον), falling at last into the Mediterranean sea, a little W. of Patara. Though not a large river, it is navigable for a considerable part of its course. (Il. ii. 877, v. 479; Strab. p. 665; Hdt. i. 176; Ov. Met. ix. 645.)

Xanthus (Ξάνθος: Ξάνθιος, Xanthius: Gunik, Ru.), the most famous city of Lycia, stood on the W. bank of the river of the same name, sixty or seventy stadia from its mouth (Pol. xxvi. 7; Strab. p. 666; Ptol. v. 3, 5; Steph. Byz. s.v.). Twice in the course of its history it sustained sieges, which terminated in the self-destruction of the inhabitants with their property, first against the Persians under Harpagus, and long afterwards against the Romans under Brutus (Hdt. i. 176; Dio Cass. xlvii. 34; App. B. C. iv. 18). The city was never restored after its destruction on the latter occasion. Xanthus was rich in temples and tombs, and other monuments of a most interesting character of art. Among its temples the most celebrated were those of Sarpedon and of the Lycian Apollo; besides which there was a renowned sanctuary of Latona (τὸ Λητώων), near the river Xanthus, ten stadia from its mouth, and sixty stadia from the city. (Diod. v. 77; Strab. l.c.) The splendid ruins of Xanthus were first thoroughly explored by Sir C. Fellows and his coadjutors, and several important remains of its works of art are now in the British Museum.

Xēnarchus (Ξέναρχος). 1. Son of Sophron, and, like his father, a celebrated writer of mimes. He lived during the Rhegian war (B.C. 399-389), at the court of Dionysus. (Suid. s.v. 'Ρηγιῶν; Arist. Poët. 2.)—2. An Athenian comic poet of the Middle Comedy, who lived as late as the time of Alexander the Great (Suid. s.v.). Several fragments of his writings are collected in Meineke's Fragm. Com. Graec.—3. Of Seleucia in Cilicia, a Peripatetic philosopher and grammarian, in the time of Strabo, who heard him. He taught first at Alexandria, afterwards at Athens, and lastly at Rome, where he enjoyed the friendship of Augustus. (Strab. p. 670.)

Xenippa (prob. Uratippa), a city of Sogdiana, mentioned by Curtius (viii. 2, 14).

Xenocles (Ξενοκλῆς). 1. An Athenian tragic poet, son of Carcinus (who was also a tragic poet), and a contemporary of Aristophanes, who attacks him on several occasions. His poetry seems to have been indifferent (Aristoph. Ran. 82, Nub. 1259), and to have resembled the worse parts of Euripides; but he obtained a victory over Euripides, B.C. 415. There was another tragic poet of the name of Xenocles, a grandson of the preceding, of whom no particulars are recorded.—2. An Athenian architect, of the demos of Chologos, was one of the architects who superintended the erection of the temple of Demeter, at Eleusis, in the time of Pericles (Plut. Per. 18).

Xenocrates (Ξενοκράτης). 1. The philosopher, was a native of Chalcedon. He was born B.C. 396, and died 314 at the age of eighty-two. He attached himself first to Aeschines, the Socratic, and afterwards, while still a youth, to Plato, whom he accompanied to Syracuse. After the death of Plato he betook himself, with Aristotle, to Hermias, tyrant of Atarneus; and, after his return to Athens, he was repeatedly sent on embassies to Philip of Macedonia, and at a later time to Antipater during the Lamian war. He is said to have wanted quick apprehension and natural grace, but these defects were more than compensated by persevering industry, pure benevolence, freedom from all selfishness, and a moral earnestness which obtained for him the esteem and confidence of the Athenians of his own age. Yet he is said to have experienced the fickleness of popular favour, and being too poor to pay the alien's tax (μετοίκιον), to have been saved from prosecution only by the intervention of the orator Lycurgus. (Plut. Flamin. 10, X. Orat. 7.) He became president of the Academy even before the death of Speusippus, who was bowed down by sickness, and he occupied the post for twenty-five years.—He seems in his development of Plato's theories to have in some things approached (as did his predecessor Speusippus) to the tenets of Pythagoras, especially in his tracing the origin of things to number, to unity and duality, which he symbolically called the father and the mother of the gods [cf. PYTHAGORAS]. It was, perhaps, a trace of Pythagorean influence also that he advised his disciples to abstain from meat, lest they should thereby take into themselves something of the animal nature. Like Speusippus, he reckoned Aether among the material elements of the world. In ethics he followed Plato, and held that virtue is the source of happiness, and is alone of value in itself. (Diog. Laërt. iv. 11-16; Arist. de Cael. i. 10, Top. ii. 6; Stob. Ecl. Phys. i. 62; Cic. Tusc. v. 10, 18.)—2. A physician of Aphrodisias in Cilicia, lived about the middle of the first century after Christ. Besides some short fragments of his writings there is extant a little essay by him entitled Περὶ τῆς ἀπὸ τῶν ἐνδύων τροφῆς, 'De Alimento ex Aquatilibus,' which is an interesting record of the state of natural history at the time in which he lived. Edited by Franz, 1774, Lips., and by Coray, 1794, Neap., and 1814, Paris.—3. A sculptor of the school of Lysippus, was the pupil either of Tisicrates or of Euthykrates. He also wrote works upon the art. He flourished about B.C. 260.

Xenocratus (Ξενοκράτης), of Locri Epizephyrii, in Lower Italy, a musician and lyric poet, was one of the leaders of the second school of Dorian music, which was founded by Thaletas, and was a composer of Paeanes (Plut. de Mus. 9, p. 1134).

Xenophanes (Ξενοφάνης) a celebrated philosopher about 576-480 B.C., was a native of Colophon. He was a poet as well as a philosopher, and considerable fragments have come down to us of his elegies, and of a didactic poem On Nature. According to the fragments of one of his elegies, he had left his native land at the age of twenty-five, and had already lived sixty-seven years in Hellas, when, at the age of ninety-two, he composed that elegy. He quitted Colophon as a fugitive or exile, and lived some time at Elea (Velia) in Italy, as the founder of the Eleatic school of philosophy. He sang in one of his poems of the foundation of Velia. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 10, 18; Plat. Soph. p. 224; Arist. Rhet. ii. 23.) Xenophanes was regarded in antiquity as the originator of the Eleatic doctrine of the oneness of the universe. The Deity was in his view the animating power of the universe, which is expressed by Aristotle (Met. p. 986) in the words, that, looking on the natural world, Xenophanes said, 'God is the One.' He expressly reprobated the anthropomorphic deities of Homer and Hesiod, human alike in form and passions, and from their imperfections deduced that the supreme Being can only be one; but it is clear that in this he did not speak of a single personal god, but of an all-pervading influence of unity—that is, he was a pantheist rather than a deist. In his physical theories of the earth having gradually risen from the sea, which he based on the observation of shells and fossils in the rocks, he approached strangely near to scientific geology. The earth itself, as well as man, he held to be destined to perish. (Aristot. Xenoph. pp. 974-977; Sext. Emp. Pyrrh. Hyp. i. 225.)

Xenophon (Ξενοφών). 1. The Athenian, was the son of Gryllus, and a native of the demos Erchia. The time of his birth is not known, but if the story is true that Xenophon fell from his horse in the flight after the battle of Delium, B.C. 424, and was taken up by Socrates, the philosopher, on his shoulders and carried a distance of several stadia, Xenophon could not well have been born after 444. (Diog. Laërt. Xen.; Strab. p. 403.) But the authorities for this story are late, and it is somewhat discredited by Plato's mentioning that Socrates saved the life of Laches in this battle (Symp. p. 221). On the other hand, the words in Xen. An. vi. 4, 25 seem to imply that Xenophon was not more than thirty in B.C. 401, and was therefore born probably about 430 B.C. Neither is the time of his death precisely stated; but Lucian says that Xenophon attained to above the age of ninety, and Xenophon himself mentions the assassination of Alexander of Phrae, which happened in 357. In his early life he was a pupil of Socrates; but the turning-point in his career came when he decided to serve in the Greek contingent raised by Cyrus against Artaxerxes in 401. Xenophon himself mentions (Anab. iii. 1) the circumstances under which he joined this army. Proxenus, a friend of Xenophon, was already with Cyrus, and he invited Xenophon to come to Sardis, and promised to introduce him to the Persian prince. Xenophon consulted his master, Socrates, who advised him to consult the oracle of Delphi, for it was rather a hazardous matter for him to enter the service of Cyrus, who was considered to be the friend of the Lacedaemonians and the enemy of Athens. Xenophon went to

Delphi, but he did not ask the god whether he should go or not: he probably had made up his mind. He merely asked to what gods he should sacrifice in order that he might be successful in his intended enterprise. Socrates was not satisfied with his pupil's mode of consulting the oracle, but as he had got an answer, he told him to go; and Xenophon went to Sardis, which Cyrus was just about to leave. He accompanied Cyrus into Upper Asia. In the battle of Cunaxa, Cyrus lost his life, his barbarian troops were dispersed, and the Greeks were left alone on the wide plains between the Tigris and the Euphrates. It was after the treacherous massacre of Clearchus and others of the Greek commanders by the Persian satrap Tissaphernes that Xenophon came forward. He had held no command in the army of Cyrus, nor had he, in fact, served as a soldier. He was now elected one of the generals, and took the principal part in conducting the Greeks in their memorable retreat along the Tigris over the high table-lands of Armenia to Trapezus (Trebizond) on the Black Sea. From Trapezus the troops were conducted to Chrysopolis, which is opposite to Byzantium. The Greeks were in great distress, and some of them under Xenophon entered the service of Seuthes, king of Thrace. As the Lacedaemonians under Thimbron, or Thibron, were now at war with Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus, Xenophon and his troops were invited to join the army of Thimbron, and Xenophon led them back out of Asia to join Thimbron (399). Xenophon, who was very poor, made an expedition into the plain of the Caicus with his troops before they joined Thimbron, to plunder the house and property of a Persian named Asidates. The Persian, with his women, children, and all his moveables were seized, and Xenophon, by this robbery, replenished his empty pockets (Anab. vii. 8, 23). He tells the story himself as if he were not ashamed of it. In other ways also he showed himself the prototype of an adventurous leader of condottieri, with no ties of country or preference of nationality. He formed a scheme for establishing a town with the Ten Thousand on the shores of the Euxine; but that fell through. He joined the Spartans, as has been seen, and he continued in their service even when they were at war with Athens. Agesilaus, the Spartan king, was commanding the Lacedaemonian forces in Asia against the Persians in 396, and Xenophon was with him at least during part of the campaign. When Agesilaus was recalled (394), Xenophon accompanied him, and he was on the side of the Lacedaemonians in the battle which they fought at Coronea (394) against the Athenians. As a natural consequence a decree of exile was passed against him at Athens. It seems that he went to Sparta with Agesilaus after the battle of Coronea, and soon after he settled at Scillus in Elis, not far from Olympia, a spot of which he has given a description in the Anabasis (v. 3, 7, &c.). Here he was joined by his wife, Philesia, and his children. His children were educated in Sparta. Xenophon was now a Lacedaemonian so far as he could become one. His time during his long residence at Scillus was employed in hunting, writing, and entertaining his friends; and perhaps the Anabasis and part of the Hellenica were composed here. The treatise on Hunting and that on the Horse were probably also written during this time, when amusement and exercise of that kind formed part of his occupation. On the downfall of the Spartan supremacy, at Leuctra in 471, Xenophon was at last expelled from his quiet retreat at Scillus by the Eleans, after remaining there about twenty years. The sentence of banishment from Athens was repealed on the motion of Eubulus, but it is uncertain in what year. There is no evidence that Xenophon ever returned to Athens. He is said to have retired to Corinth after his expulsion from Scillus, and as we know nothing more, we assume that he died there. In the battle of Mantinea, which was fought in 362, the Spartans and the Athenians were opposed to the Thebans, and Xenophon's two sons, Gryllus and Diodorus, fought on the side of the allies. Gryllus fell in the same battle in which Epaminondas lost his life. The events alluded to in the Epilogus to the Cyropaedia (viii. 8, 4) show that the Epilogus at least was written after 362. The time of his death, for reasons given above, seems to have been later than 357.—The following is a list of Xenophon's works. (1) The Anabasis (Ἀνάβασις) or the History of the Expedition of the Younger Cyrus, and of the retreat of the Greeks who formed part of his army. It is divided into seven books. As regards the title it will be noticed that under the name 'The March up' (i.e. inland from the coast of Cumaxa) is included also the much longer account of the return march down to the Euxine. This work has immortalised Xenophon's name. It is a clear and fascinating narrative, written in a simple style, free from affectation; and it gives a great deal of curious information on the country which was traversed by the retreating Greeks, and on the manners of the people. It was the first work which made the Greeks acquainted with some portions of the Persian empire, and it showed the weakness of that extensive monarchy. The skirmishes of the retreating Greeks with their enemies, and the battles with some of the barbarian tribes, are not such events as elevate the work to the character of a military history, nor can it as such be compared with Caesar's Commentaries. Separate editions of the Anabasis by Krüger, Leips. 1871; by Cobet (revised), 1873: books i.-iv. by Goodwin and White, 1886; iv. by Stone, 1890. There is no weight whatever in the argument that, because Xenophon (Hell. iii. 1, 2) speaks of the expedition of Cyrus as having been related by Themistogenes, therefore the Anabasis is not Xenophon's work. The statement can be explained either on the theory that Xenophon speaks of his own work under a fictitious name (which was possibly the case also with the Oeconomicus), or, more simply, by supposing that another account was actually written by Themistogenes. It is known that a separate account was written by Sophacetus, and there may have been others. If the latter theory is correct, it would be a natural inference that Xenophon's Anabasis was written after the third book of the Hellenica. (2) The Hellenica (Ἑλληνικά) of Xenophon is divided into seven books, and comprehends the space of forty-eight years, from the time when the History of Thucydides ends [THUCYDIDES] to the battle of Mantinea, 362. The Hellenica is generally a dry narrative of events, and there is nothing in the treatment of them which gives a special interest to the work. Some events of importance are briefly treated, but a few striking incidents are presented with some particularity. The Hellenica was not all written at the same time. Differences are traced between the first two and the later books as regards the arrangement, which in the earlier books is year by year, while in the later events growing out of one another are grouped together; and, as regards political sentiment, in the diminished admiration for Sparta which appears in the last three books. It is clear that book vi. was written after 357, since it mentions the death of Alexander of Phœræ (vi. 4, 35); but the first four books were probably written a good deal earlier. Editions of the Hellenica by Breitenbach, 1873; by Keller, 1890; i.-iv. by Manatt, 1888; i. and ii. by Dowdall, 1890. (3) The Cyropaedia (Κυροπαδεία) in eight books, is a kind of political romance, the basis of which is the history of Cyrus, the founder of the Persian monarchy. It shows how citizens are to be made virtuous and brave; and Cyrus is the model of a wise and good ruler. As a history it has no authority at all. Xenophon adopted the current stories as to Cyrus and the chief events of his reign, without any intention of subjecting them to a critical examination; nor have we any reason to suppose that his picture of Persian morals and Persian discipline is anything more than a fiction. Xenophon's object was to represent what a state might be, and he placed the scene of his fiction far enough off to give it the colour of possibility. His own philosophical notions and the usages of Sparta were the real materials out of which he constructed his political system. The Cyropaedia is evidence enough that Xenophon did not like the political constitution of his own country, and that a well-ordered monarchy or kingdom appeared to him preferable to a democracy like Athens. Ed. Holden, 1887. (4) The Agesilaus (Ἀγησίλαος) is a panegyric on Agesilaus II., king of Sparta, the friend of Xenophon. The genuineness is disputed, not without reason, and a recent critic holds it to be the work of a young rhetorician of the school of Isocrates. Ed. Güthling, 1887. (5) The Hipparchicus (Ἱππάρχικος) is a treatise on the duties of a commander of cavalry, and it contains many military precepts. (6) The De Re Equestri, a treatise on the Horse (Ἱππική), was written after the Hipparchicus, to which treatise he refers at the end of the treatise on the Horse. This essay is not limited to horsemanship as regards the rider: it shows how a man is to avoid being cheated in buying a horse, how a horse is to be trained, and the like. (7) The Cynegeticus (Κυνηγετικός) is a treatise on hunting; and on the dog, and the breeding and training of dogs; on the various kinds of game, and the mode of taking them. It is a treatise written by a genuine sportsman who loved the exercise and excitement of the chase, and it may be read with pleasure by a sportsman of the present day. (8, 9) The Respublica Lacædæmoniorum and Respublica Atheniensium, the two treatises on the Spartan and Athenian states (Λακεδαιμονίων πολιτεία, and Ἀθηναίων πολιτεία) were both ascribed to Xenophon, but the Respublica Atheniensium is certainly not by his hand. It was written by some one of the oligarchical party, and possibly it is right to date it as early as 420, and therefore to regard it as the earliest Attic prose work. On the other hand, the most recent critic of Xenophon (Hartman) believes it to be by a later writer compiling from Xenophon, Aristophanes, and other sources of information. The same critic denies the genuineness of the Resp. Lacæd., which is more generally accepted. (10) The De Vectigalibus, a treatise on the Revenues of

Athens (Πόροι ἢ περὶ προσόδων) is designed to show how the public revenue of Athens may be improved. (11) The Memorabilia of Socrates, in four books (Ἀπομνημονεύματα Σωκράτους), was written by Xenophon to defend the memory of his master against the charge of irreligion and of corrupting the Athenian youth. Socrates is represented as holding a series of conversations, in which he develops and inculcates his moral doctrines. It is entirely a practical work, such as we might expect from the practical nature of Xenophon's mind, and it professes to exhibit Socrates as he taught. It is true that it may exhibit only one side of the Socratic argumentation, and that it does not deal in subtleties of philosophy. Xenophon was a hearer of Socrates, an admirer of his master, and anxious to defend his memory. The charges against Socrates for which he suffered were, that 'Socrates was guilty of not believing in the gods which the state believed in, and introducing other new daemons (δαίμονια): he was also guilty of corrupting the youth.' Xenophon replies to these two charges specifically, and he then goes on to show what Socrates' mode of life was. The whole treatise is intended to be an answer to the charge for which Socrates was executed, and it is therefore, in its nature, not intended to be a complete exhibition of Socrates. That it is a genuine picture of the man is indisputable, and its value therefore is very great. Ed. by Marshall, 1891. (12) The Apology of Socrates (Ἀπολογία Σωκράτους πρὸς τοὺς δικαστάς) is a short speech, containing the reasons which induced Socrates to prefer death to life. It is not a first-rate performance, and was probably a rhetorical exercise much later than Xenophon. (13) The Symposium (Συμπόσιον), or Banquet of Philosophers, in which Xenophon delineates the character of Socrates. The speakers are supposed to meet at the house of Callias, a rich Athenian, at the celebration of the great Panathenaea. Socrates and others are the speakers. The piece is interesting as a picture of an Athenian drinking party, and of the amusement and conversation with which it was diversified. The nature of love and friendship is discussed. It is probable that Plato wrote his Symposium later, to some extent as a corrective. (14) The Hiero (Ἱέρων ἢ Τυραννικός) is a dialogue between king Hiero and Simonides, in which the king speaks of the dangers and difficulties incident to an exalted station, and the superior happiness of a private man. The poet, on the other hand, enumerates the advantages which the possession of power gives, and the means which it offers of obliging and doing services. Ed. Holden, 1885. (15) The Oeconomicus (Οἰκονομικός) is an excellent treatise in the form of a dialogue between Socrates and Critobulus, in which Socrates gives instruction in the art called Oeconomic, which relates to the administration of a household and of a man's property. Ed. Holden, 1888.—In language as well as in politics Xenophon was a cosmopolitan. His long residence in other lands resulted in his losing or abandoning pure Attic: he admits words from all dialects: hence he cannot be adduced as an authority for strict Attic usage, and it has been well shown by abundant instances that his diction is in many respects an anticipation of the common dialect of the Macedonian period.—Editions of Xenophon's complete works by Sauppe, Leips. 1867; Henning, Leips. 1863.—2. The Ephesian, the author of a romance, still extant, entitled Ephesiaca, or the Loves of Anthia and Abrocomas (Ἐφεσιακά, τὰ κατὰ Ἀνθίαν καὶ Ἀβροκώμην). The style of the work is simple, and the story is conducted without confusion, notwithstanding the number of personages introduced. The adventures are of a very improbable kind. The age when Xenophon lived is uncertain. He is probably the oldest of the Greek romance writers. Editions of his work by Peirlkamp, Haarlem, 1818, and by Passow, Lips. 1833.

Xerxes (Ξέρξης). I. King of Persia B.C. 485-465. The name is said by Herodotus (vi. 98) to signify 'the warrior,' but it is probably the same word as the Zend ksathra and the Sanscrit kshatra, 'a king.' Xerxes was the son of Darius and Atossa. Darius was married twice. By his first wife, the daughter of Gobryas, he had three children before he was raised to the throne; and by his second wife, Atossa, the daughter of Cyrus, he had four children after he had become king. Artabazanes, the eldest son of the former marriage, and Xerxes, the eldest son of the latter, each laid claim to the succession; but Darius decided in favour of Xerxes, no doubt through the influence of his mother, Atossa, who completely ruled Darius. Xerxes succeeded his father at the beginning of 485. Darius had died in the midst of his preparations against Greece, which had been interrupted by the revolt of the Egyptians. The first care of Xerxes was to reduce the latter people to subjection. He accordingly invaded Egypt at the beginning of the second year of his reign (B.C. 484), compelled the people again to submit to the Persian yoke, and then returned to Persia, leaving his brother Achaemenes governor of Egypt. The next four years were devoted to preparations for the invasion of Greece. In the spring of 480 he set out from Sardis on his memorable expedition against Greece. He crossed the Hellespont by a bridge of boats, and continued his march through the Thracian Chersonese till he reached the plain of Doriscus, which is traversed by the river Hebrus. Here he resolved to number both his land and his naval forces. Herodotus has left us a most minute and interesting catalogue of the nations comprising this mighty army, with their various military equipments and different modes of fighting. The land forces contained forty-six nations. (Herod. vii. 61, sqq.) In his march through Thrace and Macedonia, Xerxes received a still further accession of strength; and when he reached Thermopylae the land and sea forces amounted to 2,641,610 fighting men. This does not include the attendants, the slaves, the crews of the provision ships, &c., which according to the supposition of Herodotus were more in number than the fighting men; but supposing them to have been equal, the total number of male persons who accompanied Xerxes to Thermopylae reaches the astounding figure of 5,283,220! Such a vast number must be dismissed as incredible; but, considering that this army was the result of a maximum of effort throughout the empire, and that provisions had been collected for three years before along the line of march, we may well believe that the numbers of the army were greater than were ever before assembled, and may not have fallen short of a million. After the review at Doriscus Xerxes continued his march through Thrace. On reaching Acanthus, near the isthmus of Athos, Xerxes left his fleet, which received orders to sail through the canal that had been previously dug across the isthmus—of which the remains are still visible [ATHOS]—and await his arrival at Therme, afterwards called Thessalonica. After joining his fleet at Therme, Xerxes marched through Macedonia and Thessaly without meeting with any opposition till he reached Thermopylae. Here the Greeks resolved to make a stand. Leonidas, king of Sparta, conducted a land force to Thermopylae; and his colleague Eurybiades sailed with the Greek fleet to the N. of Euboea, and took up his position on the N. coast, which faced Magnesia, and was called Artemisium from the temple of Artemis belonging to the town of Hestiaeae. Xerxes arrived in safety with his land forces before Thermopylae, but his fleet was overtaken by a violent storm and hurricane off the coast of Sepias, in Magnesia, by which at least 400 ships of war were destroyed, as well as an immense number of transports. Xerxes attempted to force his way through the pass of THERMOPYLAE, but his troops were repulsed again and again by Leonidas, till a Malian, of the name of Ephialtes, showed the Persians a pass over the mountains of Oeta, and thus enabled them to fall on the rear of the Greeks. Leonidas and his Spartans disdained to fly, and were all slain. [LEONIDAS.] On the same days on which Leonidas was fighting with the land forces of Xerxes, the Greek ships at Artemisium attacked the Persian fleet. In the first battle, the Greeks had the advantage, and in the following night the Persian ships suffered still more from a violent storm. Two days afterwards the contest was renewed, and both sides fought with the greatest courage. Although the Greeks at the close still maintained their position, and had destroyed a great number of the enemy's ships, yet their own loss was considerable, and half the Athenian ships were disabled. Under these circumstances the Greek commanders abandoned Artemisium and retired to Salamis, opposite the SW. coast of Attica. It was now too late to send an army into Boeotia, and Attica thus lay exposed to the full vengeance of the invader. The Athenians removed their women, children, and infirm persons to Salamis, Aegina, and Troezen. Meantime Xerxes marched through Phocis and Boeotia, and at length reached Athens. About the same time as Xerxes entered Athens, his fleet arrived in the bay of Phalerum. He now resolved upon an engagement with the Greek fleet. The history of this memorable battle, of the previous dissensions among the Greek commanders, and of the glorious victory of the Greeks at the last, is related elsewhere. [SALAMIS; THEMISTOCLES.] Xerxes witnessed the battle from a lofty seat, which was erected for him on the shore of the mainland on one of the declivities of Mount Aegaleos, and thus beheld with his own eyes the defeat and dispersion of his mighty armament. Xerxes now became alarmed for his own safety, and resolved to leave Greece immediately. He was confirmed in his resolution by Mardonius, who undertook to complete the conquest with 300,000 of his troops. Xerxes left Mardonius the number of troops which he requested, and with the remainder set out on his march homewards. He reached the Hellespont in forty-five days from the time of his departure from Attica. On arriving at the Hellespont, he found the bridge of boats destroyed by a storm, and he crossed over to Asia by ship. He entered Sardis towards the end of the year 480. In the following year, 479, the war was continued in Greece; but Mardonius was defeated at Plataea by the combined forces of the Greeks, and on the same day another victory was gained over the Persians at Mycale in Ionia. Next year, 478, the Persians lost their last possession in Europe by the capture of Sestos on the Hellespont (Hdt. vii.-ix.). Thus the struggle was virtually brought to an end, though the war still continued for several years longer. Xerxes was murdered in 465, after a reign of twenty years, by Artabanus, who aspired to become king of Persia. (Diod. xi. 69; Just. iii. 1; Ctes. Pers. 29.) He was succeeded by his son ARTAXERXES I.—II. The only legitimate son of Artaxerxes I., succeeded his father as king of Persia in 425, but was murdered after a short reign of only two months by his half-brother Sogdianus, who thus became king (Diod. xii. 71).

Xiphilinus (Ξιφίλινος), of Trapezus, was a monk at Constantinople, and made an abridgment of Dio Cassius from the thirty-sixth to the eightieth book at the command of the emperor Michael VII. Ducas, who reigned from A.D. 1071 to 1078. The work is executed with carelessness, and is only of value as preserving the main facts of the original, the greater part of which is lost. It is printed along with Dio Cassius.

Xiphōnīa (Ξιφώνια: Capo di S. Croce), a promontory on the E. coast of Sicily, with a harbour (Ξιφώνειος λιμὴν), between Catana and Syracuse (Strab. p. 267; Diod. xxiii. 4).

Xōis or Chōis (Χοῖς, Χοῖς: Sakkra), an ancient city of Lower Egypt, N. of Leontopolis, on an island of the Nile, in the Nomos Sebenyticus, the seat of the fourteenth dynasty of Egyptian kings.

Xuthus (Ξούθος), in Attic legends is represented as the son of Hellen by the nymph Orseis, and a brother of Dorus and Aeolus. He was king of Peloponnesus, and the husband of Creusa, the daughter of Erechtheus, by whom he became the father of Achaeus and Ion. (Eurip. Ion; Apollod. i. 7, 3; Ion.) Another version states that after the death of his father, Hellen, Xuthus was expelled from Thessaly by his brothers, and went to Athens, where he married the daughter of Erechtheus. After the death of Erechtheus, Xuthus, being chosen arbitrator, adjudged the kingdom to his eldest brother-in-law, Cecrops, in consequence of which he was expelled by the other sons of Erechtheus, and settled in Aegialus in Peloponnesus (Paus. vii. 1, 2). It has been inferred, with some probability, from Paus. i. 31, 2, where there is mention of the tomb of Ion at Potamoi near Prasias, that Xuthus was originally a local hero of Potamoi, and his son Ion the eponymous founder of a family, but when the Attic story made Ion the hero of the Ionian race it became necessary to give him a divine father and a mother who represented this Cecropian line: hence Xuthus is brought in as the putative, and Apollo as the real, father.

Xylinē, a town of Pisidia, between Corbasa and Termessus, mentioned by Livy (xxxviii. 15).

Xynia or Xymiae (Ξυνία: Ξυνιεύς: Taukli), a town of Thessaly in the district Phthiotis, E. of the lake of the same name (ἡ Ξυνίας λίμνη: Nizero or Dereli). It was plundered by the Aetolians B.C. 198. (Liv. xxxii. 13, xxxiii. 3.)

Xypētē (Ξυπέτη: Ξυπεταίων, Ξυπεταίων, Ξυπεταιωνεύς, Ξυπετεύς, Ξυπέτιος), said to have been anciently called Troja, a demus of Attica belonging to the tribe Cecropis, W. of Athens.

Zabātus (Ζάβατος). [LYCUS, No. 5.]

Zabē (Ζάβη), a town and district of SE. Mauretania, near the borders of Numidia (Procop. B. Vand. ii. 20).

Zacynthus (Ζάκυνθος: Ζακύνθιος, Zacynthius: Zante), an island in the Ionian sea, off the coast of Elis, about forty miles in circumference. It contained a large and flourishing town of the same name upon the E. coast, the citadel of which was called Psophis (Paus. viii. 24, 3; Strab. p. 458; Liv. xxvi. 14). There are two considerable chains of mountains in the island. The ancient writers mention M. Elatus, which is probably the same as the modern Scopo in the SE. of the island, and which rises to the height of 1509 feet. Zacynthus was celebrated in antiquity for its pitch wells, which were visited by Herodotus, and which still supply a large quantity of bitumen (Hdt. iv. 195). Zacynthus was inhabited by a Greek population at an early period. It is said to have derived its name from Zacynthus, a son of Dardanus, who colonised the island from Psophis in Arcadia (Paus. l.c.). Thucydides speaks of the Zacynthians as a colony of Achaeans from the Peloponnese (ii. 66), and according to an ancient tradition, the Zacynthians founded the town of Saguntum in Spain. [SAGUNTUM.] The island is frequently mentioned by Homer, who speaks of it as the 'woody Zacynthus' (Il. ii. 634, Od. i. 246, ix. 24; Strab. p. 159). It formed part of the maritime empire of Athens, and continued faithful to the Athenians during the Peloponnesian war. At a later time it was subject to the Macedonian monarchs, and on the conquest of Macedonia by the Romans passed into their hands. (Pol. v. 102; Liv. xxxvi. 32.)

Zadracarta (Ζαδράκαρτα), one of the capital cities and royal residences in Hyrcania, lay at the SE. of the Caspian, N. of the chief pass through M. Coronus. It was probably on the site of Astarabad.

Zagreus. [DIONYSUS, p. 296, a.]

Zagros or -us (ὁ Ζάγρος and τὸ Ζάγριον ὄρος, Mts. of Kurdistan), the general name for the range of mountains forming the SE. continuation of the Taurus, and the E. margin of the Tigris and Euphrates valley, from the SW. side of the Lake Arsissa (Van) in Armenia, to the NE. side of the head of the Persian Gulf, and dividing Media from Assyria and Susiana. More specifically, the name Zagros was applied to the central part of the chain, the N. part being called the mountains of the Cordueni or Gordyaei, and the S. part Parachoathras. (Pol. v. 44; Strab. p. 522; Ptol. vi. 2, 4.)

Zaitha or Zautha (Ζαυθά), a town of Mesopotamia, on the E. bank of the Euphrates, twenty Roman miles S. of Circesium (Zosim. iii. 14; Amm. Marc. xxiii. 5).

Zaleucus (Ζάλευκος), the lawgiver of the Epizephyrian Locrians, is said by some to have been originally a slave, but is described by others as a man of good family. He could not, however, have been a disciple of Pythagoras, as some writers state, since he lived upwards of 100 years before Pythagoras. The date of the legislation of Zaleucus is assigned to B.C. 660 (Euseb. Chron. 1356). His code is stated to have been the first collection of written laws that the Greeks possessed (Strab. pp. 259, 398). The general character of his laws was severe, but they were observed for a long period by the Locrians, who obtained in consequence a high reputation for legal order (Schol. ad Pind. Ol. x. 17; cf. Arist. Pol. ii. 10). Among other enactments we are told that the penalty of adultery was the loss of the eyes (Ael. V. H. xiii. 24; Val. Max. v. 5, 3). There is a celebrated story of the son of Zaleucus having become liable to this penalty, and the father himself suffering the loss of one eye that his son might not be utterly blinded. It is further related that among his laws was one forbidding any citizen under penalty of death to enter the senate house in arms. On one occasion, however, on a sudden emergency in time of war, Zaleucus transgressed his own law, which was remarked to him by one present; whereupon he fell upon his own sword, declaring that he would himself vindicate the law (Eustath. ad Il. p. 62). Other authors tell the same story of Charondas, or of Diocles (Diod. xii. 19; Val. Max. vi. 5, 4).

Zalmoxis or Zamolxis (Ζάλμοξις, Ζάμολξις), said to have been so called from the bear's skin (Ζάλμος) in which he was clothed as soon as he was born. He was, according to the story current among the Greeks on the Hellespont, a Getan, who had been a slave to Pythagoras in Samos, but was manumitted, and acquired, not only great wealth, but large stores of knowledge from Pythagoras, and from the Egyptians, whom he visited in the course of his travels. He returned among the Getae, introducing the civilisation and the religious ideas which he had gained, especially regarding the immortality of the soul. He was said to have lived in a subterranean cave for three years, and after that to have again made his appearance among the Getae. Herodotus inclines to place the age of Zalmoxis a long time before Pythagoras, and expresses a doubt, not only about the story itself, but as to whether Zalmoxis was a man, or an indigenous Getan deity. The latter appears to have been the real state of the case. The Getae believed that the departed went to him, and it is a probable conjecture that Zalmoxis was really the same as Sabaz'us, the Thracian Dionysus (Dionysus, p. 295, a). (Porph. Vit. Pyth. 14; Hdt. iv. 95; Strab. p. 297.)

Zāma Regia (Zāma: Zamensis: Djama), a strongly fortified city in the interior of Numidia, on the borders of the Carthaginian territory. It was the ordinary residence of King Juba, who had here his treasury and his harem. It was the scene of one of the most important battles in the history of the world, that in which Hannibal was defeated by Scipio, and the second Punic war was ended, B.C. 202. (Pol. xv. 5; Liv. xxx. 29; Bell. Afr. 91.) Strabo tells us that it was destroyed by the Romans; but if so, it must have been restored, for we find it mentioned under the empire as a colony and a bishop's see. Vitruvius speaks of a fountain in its neighbourhood. (Strab. pp. 829, 831; Vitruv. viii. 3, 24; Plin. v.) There were unimportant places of the same name in Cappadocia and Mesopotamia.

Zanclē. [MESSANA.]

Zaradrus (Sutlej) a river of N. India, the S. boundary of the Punjab (Ptol. vii. 1, 27). It falls into the Hyphasis (Gharra).

Zarangae. [DRANGIANA.]

Zarax or Zarex (Ζάραξ, Ζάρηξ). 1. The central part of the chain of mountains extending along the E. coast of Laconica from Mt. Parnon, on the frontiers of Argolis, down to the promontory Malea (Ptol. iii. 15, 10).—2. (Jeraka), a town on the E. coast of Laconica, at the foot of the mountain of the same name (Paus. iii. 24, 1; Pol. iv. 36).

Zariaspe. [BACTRA.]

Zariaspis, an earlier, probably the native, name for the river on which Bactra stood, and which is usually called Bactrus. [BACTRA.]

Zēla or Ziela (τὰ Ζήλα: Zilleh), a city in the S. of Pontus, due S. of Amasia, and on the road from Tavium to Comana Pontica. It stood on an artificial hill, and was strongly fortified. Near it was an ancient and famous temple of Anaitis and other Persian deities, in which great religious festivals were held. The surrounding district was called Zelētis or Zelitis. At Zela the Roman general Valerius Triarius was defeated by Mithridates; but the city is more celebrated for another great battle, that in which Julius Caesar defeated Pharnaces, and of which he wrote this despatch to Rome: VENI: VIDI: VICI. (App. Mithr. 89; Plut. Caes. 50; Dio Cass. xlii. 47; Bell. Alex. 73.)

Zelasium, a Thessalian town in the district Phthiotis, of uncertain site.

Zelia (Ζέλεια), an ancient city of Mysia, at the foot of Mt. Ida, and on the river Aesepus, eighty stadia from its mouth, belonging to the territory of Cyzicus. At the time of Alexander's invasion the headquarters of the Persian army were fixed here. (Il. ii. 824; Strab. pp. 565, 587; Arr. An. i. 13.)

Zēno, Zēnon (Ζήνων). 1. The founder of the Stoic philosophy, was a native of Citium in Cyprus, and the son of Mnaseas. He began at an early age to study philosophy through the writings of the Socratic philosophers, which his father was accustomed to bring back from Athens when he went thither on trading voyages. At the age of twenty-two, or, according to others, of thirty years, Zeno was shipwrecked in the neighbourhood of Piraeus; whereupon he was led to settle in Athens, and to devote himself entirely to the study of philosophy. According to some writers he lost all his property in the shipwreck; according to others, he still retained a large fortune; but whichever of these accounts is correct, his moderation and contentment became proverbial, and a recognition of his virtues shines through even the ridicule of the comic poets. The weakness of his health is said to have first determined him to live rigorously and simply, but his desire to make himself independent of all external circumstances seems to have been an additional motive, and to have led him to attach himself to the Cynic Crates. In opposition to the advice of Crates, he studied under Stilpo of the Megaric school (Diog. Laërt. vii. 24); and he subsequently received instruction from the two other contemporary Megarics, Diodorus Cronus and Philo, and from the Academics Xenocrates and Polemo. The period which Zeno thus devoted to study is said to have extended to twenty years. At its close, and after he had developed his peculiar philosophical system, he opened his school in the porch adorned with the paintings of Polygnotus (Stoa Poecile), which, at an earlier time, had been a place in which poets met. (Diog. Laërt. vii. 5.) From this place his disciples were called Stoics. Among the warm admirers of Zeno was Antigonus Gonatas, king of Macedonia. The Athenians likewise placed the greatest confidence in him, and displayed the greatest esteem for him; for although the well-known story that they deposited the keys of the fortress with him, as the most trustworthy man, may be a later invention, there seems no reason for doubting the authenticity of the decree of the people by which a golden crown and a public burial in the Ceramicus were awarded him. The Athenian citizenship, however, he is said to have declined, that he might not become unfaithful to his native land, where in return he was highly esteemed. We do not know the precise dates of Zeno's birth and death. He is said to have presided over his school for fifty-eight years, and to have died at the age of ninety-eight. He is also said to have been still alive in the 130th Olympiad (B.C. 260). Zeno wrote numerous works, but the writings of Chrysippus and the later Stoics seem to have obscured those of Zeno, and even the warm adherents of the school seem seldom to have gone back to the books of its founder. Hence it is difficult to ascertain how much of the later Stoic philosophy really belongs to Zeno.—The Stoics, like earlier schools of philosophy, regarded logic and physics as the necessary foundations for ethics. Zeno (or his followers) divided logic into rhetoric and dialectic, but the latter, as providing the tests of truth, is the more important. Knowledge is attained by impressions made through the senses as upon a tabula rasa. The mind has a power of assent to the presentations which come to the mind from a true impression; and Zeno is said to have illustrated the stages by which this assent, i.e. the existence of truth, is obtained by the gradual progress from the flat and open hand to the fully clenched fist. Rhetoric was the open hand, dialectic the clenched. (Cic. Orat. 32, 113, Acad. i. 11, 40.) In his theory of physics everything that existed was corporeal, even the soul itself. In this, as in most of his system, he aims at substituting what is material and practical for the visionary speculations of the Platonic school. The world consists of matter and Reason or God: for the god of the Stoics is the single, all-pervading soul of the world, which is the moving force of matter; but the one cannot be separated from the other, so that there is no dualistic tendency in the Stoic philosophy. In ethics the chief good is virtue: but this is defined as 'living according to reason' or 'according to nature,' which is, in other words, the reason of the world. This virtue or life according to reason could only be attained by the wise man, who was to be self-sufficing and independent of externals, unmoved, therefore, by pain or pleasure. Virtue is the only good thing, vice the only evil, and all else is indifferent. But the good and the evil are absolute, so that the tendency of the Stoic philosophy was to put good deeds together on an equality on one side, and bad deeds or crimes on an equality on the other. Another tendency of Stoicism, which had some political importance, was towards cosmopolitanism: that is to say, that, regarding all the human race as differentiated only by virtue and vice, wisdom and folly, they were inclined to be citizens of the world rather than of a particular state. It was a sign, and might in some small degree be a cause, of the breaking down of the barriers of the numerous and small, but intensely patriotic, Greek states which marks the change of the Macedonian period.—2. The Eleatic philosopher, was a native of Elea (Velia) in Italy, son of Teleutagoras, and the favourite disciple of Parmenides. He was born about B.C. 488, and at the age of forty accompanied Parmenides to Athens. [PARMENIDES.] He appears to have resided some time at Athens, and is said to have unfolded his doctrines to men like Pericles and Callias for the price of 100 minae. Zeno is said to have taken part in the legislation of Parmenides, to the maintenance of which the citizens of Elea had pledged themselves every year by an oath. His love of freedom is shown by the courage with which he exposed his life in order to deliver his native country from a tyrant. Whether he perished in the attempt or survived the fall of the tyrant is a point on which the authorities vary. They also state the name of the tyrant differently. Zeno devoted all his energies to explain and develop the philosophical system of Parmenides. [PARMENIDES.]—3. An Epicurean philosopher, a native of Sidon, was a contemporary of Cicero, who heard him when at Athens. He was sometimes termed Coryphaeus Epicureorum. He seems to have been noted for the disrespectful terms in which he spoke of other philosophers. For instance, he called Socrates the Attic buffoon. He was a disciple of Apollodorus, and is described as a clear-headed thinker and perspicuous expounder of his views.

Zēnōbia, queen of Palmyra. After the death of her husband, Odenathus, whom, according to some accounts, she assassinated (A.D. 266), she assumed the imperial diadem, as regent for her sons, and discharged all the active duties of a sovereign. But not content with enjoying the independence conceded by Gallienus and tolerated by Claudius, she sought to include all Syria, Asia, and Egypt within the limits of her sway, and to make good the title which she claimed of Queen of the East. By this rash ambition she lost both her kingdom and her liberty. She was defeated by Aurelian, taken prisoner on the capture of Palmyra (273), and carried to Rome, where she adorned the triumph of her conqueror (274). Her life was spared by Aurelian, and she passed the remainder of her years with her sons in the vicinity of Tibur (Tivoli). (Trebell. Poll. Trig. Tyr. 31; Zonar. xii. 27.) Longinus lived at her court, and was put to death on the capture of Palmyra. [LONGINUS.]

Zēnōbia (Ζηνοβία: Chelebi or Zelevi), a city of Chalybonitis, in Syria, on the W. bank of the Euphrates, between Sura and Circesium. It was founded by Zenobia.

Zēnōbius (Ζηνοβίος), lived at Rome in the time of Hadrian, and was the author of a collection of proverbs in Greek, which have come down to us. In this collection the proverbs are arranged alphabetically, and divided into hundreds. The last division is incomplete, the total number collected being 552. It is printed in the collection of Schottus (Παροιμίας Ἑλληνικά, Antwerp, 1612).

Zēnōdōrus, a Greek artist, who made for Nero the colossal statue of that emperor which he set up in front of the Golden House and which was afterwards dedicated afresh by Vespasian as a statue of the Sun. It was 110 feet in height. Pliny notes that, great as was the skill of Zenodorus in modelling and chasing, he could not restore the old excellence of casting in bronze (Plin. xxxiv. 45).

Zēnōdōtium or -ia (Ζηνοδότιον, Ζηνοδοτία), a fortress in the N. of Mesopotamia, on the small tributary of the Euphrates called Bilecha, a little above Nicephorium and below Ichnae. It was a Macedonian settlement, and the only one of the Greek cities of Mesopotamia which did not revolt from the Parthians at the approach of Crassus. (Dio Cass. xl. 12; Plut. Crass. 17.)

Zēnōdōtus (Ζηνόδοτος). 1. Of Ephesus, a celebrated grammarian, was the first superintendent of the great library at Alexandria, and flourished under Ptolemy Philadelphus about B.C. 208. Zenodotus was employed by Philadelphus, together with his two great contemporaries, Alexander the Aetolian and Lycophron the Chalcidian, to collect and revise all the Greek poets. Alexander, we are told, undertook the task of collecting the tragedies, Lycophron the comedies, and Zenodotus the poems of Homer and of the other illustrious poets. Zenodotus, however, devoted his chief attention to the Iliad and Odyssey. Hence he is called the first Reviser (Διορθωτής) of Homer, and his recension (Διορθωσις) of the Iliad and Odyssey obtained the greatest celebrity. The corrections which Zenodotus applied to the text of Homer were of three kinds. (1) He expunged verses. (2) He marked them as spurious, but left them in his copy. (3) He introduced new readings or transposed or altered verses. The great attention which Zenodotus paid to the language of Homer caused a new epoch in the grammatical study of the Greek language. The results of his investigations respecting the meaning and the use of words were contained in two works which he published under the title of a Glossary (Γλῶσσαί), and a Dictionary of barbarous or foreign phrases.—2. Of Alexandria, a grammarian, lived after Aristarchus, whose recension of the Homeric poems he attacked (Suid. s. v.).

Zephýra. [HALICARNASSUS.]

Zephýrium (Ζεφύριον, sc. ἀκρωτήριον, i.e. the W. promontory), the name of several promontories of the ancient world. The chief of them were the following:—I. In Europe. 1. (C. di Brussano), a promontory in Bruttium, forming the SE. extremity of the country, from which the Locri who settled in the neighbourhood are said to have obtained the name of Epizephyrîi (Strab. pp. 259, 270; Plin. iii. 74).—2. A promontory on the W. coast of Cyprus (Strab. p. 683). II. In Asia. 1. In Pontus (C. Zefreh), a headland W. of TRIPOLIS, with a fort and harbour of the same name (Ptol. v. 6, 11).—2. [CARIA].—3. In Cilicia (prob. C. Cavaliere), a far-projecting promontory, W. of Prom. Sarpedon (Strab. p. 671). III. In Africa (Kasser Maarah), a headland on the NE. coast of Cyrenaica, W. of Darnis.

Zephýrus (Ζέφυρος), the personification of the W. wind, is described by Hesiod as a son of Astraeus and Eos (Th. 579). By the Harpy Podarge, Zephyrus became the father of the horses Xanthus and Balius, which belonged to Achilles (Il. xvi. 150); but he was married to Chloris, whom he had carried off by force, and by whom he had a son, Carpus. (Ov. Fast. v. 197.) [VENTI.]

Zerynthus (Ζήρυνθος; Ζηρόνθιος), a town of Thrace, in the territory of Aenos (or, as some say, in Samothrace), with a temple of Apollo and a cave of Hecate, who are hence called Zerynthius and Zerynthia (Steph. Byz. s. v.; Liv. xxxviii. 41; Ov. Trist. i. 10, 19; Tzet. Lyc. 449, 958).

Zētēs (Ζήτης) and Calāis (Κάλαϊς), sons of Boreas and Orithyia, frequently called the Borēadae, are mentioned among the Argonauts, and are described as winged beings (Pind. Pyth. iv. 325; Ap. Rh. i. 219; Hyg. Fab. 14). Their sister, Cleopatra, who was married to Phineus, king of Salmydessus, had been thrown with her sons into prison by Phineus at the instigation of his second wife. Here she was found by Zetes and Calais, when they arrived at Salmydessus in the Argonautic expedition. They liberated their sister and her children, gave the kingdom to the latter, and sent the second wife of Phineus to her own country, Scythia. (Diod. iv. 44.) Other accounts relate that the Boreadae delivered Phineus from the Harpies; for it had been foretold that the Harpies might be killed by the sons of Boreas, but that the sons of Boreas must die if they should not be able to overtake the Harpies (Apollod. i. 9, 21). Others, again, state that the Boreadae perished in their pursuit of the Harpies, or that Heracles killed them with his arrows near the island of Tenos (Hyg. Fab. 14; HARPYIAE). Their tombs were said to be in Tenos, adorned with sepulchral stelae, one of which moved whenever the wind blew from the north. Calais is also mentioned as the founder of the Campanian town of Cales (Sil. It. viii. 515).

Zēthus (Ζήθος), son of Zeus and Antiope, and brother of Amphion. For details see AMPHION.

Zeugis, Zeugitāna Regio (ἡ Ζευγίτανή: N. part of Tunis), the N. district of Africa Propria. [AFRICA.]

Zeugma (Ζεύγμα, i.e. Junction: prob. Rum-keleh), a city of Syria, on the borders of Commagene and Cyrrhестice, built by Seleucus Nicator, on the W. bank of the Euphrates, at a point where the river was crossed by a bridge of boats which had been constructed by Alexander the Great: hence the name. Afterwards, when the ford of Thapsacus became impassable for travellers, on account of the hordes of Arabs who infested the banks of the Lower Euphrates, the bridge at Zeugma gave the only passage over the river. (Strab. p. 746; Pol. v. 43; Dio Cass. xl. 17; Procop. Aed. ii. 9.)

Zeus (Ζεύς), the greatest of the Greek gods, was primarily the god of the sky (literally the 'bright sky'), worshipped by the old Greeks on mountain tops, such as would give an uninterrupted view of the sky. But the commixture of the myths and traditions of many different national or tribal religions caused a number of different stories to be attached to Zeus from which the Zeus of Greek literature (or the Jupiter in Latin literature, when the Greek stories were adopted) has been formed. Homer has these stories, but gives them only partially. Zeus is the son of Cronos and Rhea, a brother of Poseidon, Hades (Pluto), Hestia, Demeter, Hera, and is married to his sister Hera. When Zeus and his brothers distributed among themselves the government of the world by lot, Poseidon obtained the sea, Hades the lower world, and Zeus the heavens and the upper regions, but the earth became common to all. According to the Homeric account Zeus dwelt on Mt. Olympus in Thessaly, which was believed to penetrate with its lofty summit into heaven itself. He is called the father of gods and men, the most high and powerful among the immortals, whom all others obey. He is the supreme ruler, who with his counsel manages everything; the founder of kingly power, and of law and of order, whence Dike, Themis, and Nemesis are his assistants. For the same reason he protects the assembly of the people (ἀγοραῖος), the meetings of the council (βουλαιος), and as he presides over the whole state, so also over every house and family (ἐρκεῖος). He also watched over the sanctity of the oath (ὄρκιος) and the laws of hospitality (ξένιος), and protected suppliants (ικέσιος). He avenged those who were wronged, and punished those who had committed a crime, for he watched the doings and sufferings of all men (ἐπὶ πάντας). He was further the original source of all prophetic power, from whom all prophetic signs and sounds proceeded (πανομφαῖος). Everything, good as well as bad, comes from Zeus; according to his own choice he assigns good or evil to mortals; and fate itself was subordinate to him. He is armed with thunder and lightning (the original attributes of the god of the sky), and the shaking of his aegis produces storm and tempest; epithets of Zeus in the Homeric poems describe him as τερπικέραυνος, ἐρίγδουπος, ὕψιβρεμέτης, the thunderer, νεφέληγερέτης, the gatherer of clouds, and in later writers δυβριος or ὑέτιος, the sender of rain. Hence Zeus Μετρίχιος (the placable) was worshipped at the Attic Diasia, that he might give favourable weather for the spring crops, and Zeus Μαιμάκτης at the approach of winter, that he might not send heavy storms. Hesiod has adopted the myth which belonged to Crete and to Asia Minor and has in literature superseded the purer conception of Zeus. In this story also Zeus is the son of Cronos and Rhea, and the brother of Hestia, Demeter, Hera, Hades, and Poseidon. Cronos swallowed his children immediately after their birth, but when Rhea was pregnant with Zeus, she applied to Uranus and Ge to save the life of the child. Uranus and

Ge therefore sent Rhea to Lyctos in Crete, requesting her to bring up her child there. Rhea accordingly concealed Zeus in a cave of Mount Aegaeon, and gave to Cronos a stone wrapped in cloth, which he swallowed in the belief that it was his son. Cronos, by a cunning device of Ge or Metis, was made to vomit up the children he had swallowed, and first of all the stone, which was afterwards set up by Zeus at Delphi (Hes. Th. 468-500; cf. Paus. x. 24, 5). The infant Zeus was brought up in Crete, nursed by Amalthea, and guarded by the Curetes, who clashed their cymbals that his cries might not be heard by his father [AMALTHEA; CURETES]. Coming to manhood Zeus delivered the Cyclopes from the bonds with which they had been fettered by Cronos, and they in their gratitude provided him with thunder and lightning. On the advice of Ge, Zeus also liberated the hundred-armed Gigantes, Briareus, Cottus and Gyes, that they might assist him in his fight against the Titans. The Titans were conquered and shut up in Tartarus, where they were henceforth guarded by the Hecatoncheires. Thereupon Tartarus and Ge begot Typhoeus, who began a fearful struggle with Zeus, but was conquered. [Cy-

CLOPES; GIGANTES; TITANES; TYPHOEUS.] Zeus now reigned supreme, and chose Metis for his wife. When she was pregnant with Athene, he took the child out of her body and concealed it in his head, on the advice of Uranus and Ge, who told him that thereby he would retain the supremacy of the world. For if Metis had given birth to a son, this son (so fate had ordained it) would have acquired the sovereignty. [ATHENE, p. 138, a.] His position as supreme lawgiver is represented in myth by his second marriage, with Themis (Justice or Law), from which sprang the Fates and the Seasons [HORAE; MOERAE]. But his marriage with Hera was the 'sacred marriage,' the type of all marriages [see HERA, p. 393, b]. Twelve great Olympian gods were recognised: or rather six pairs of deities (cf. Hymn. ad Merc. 128). It is likely that the list in Liv. xxii. 10, which mentions the twelve deities worshipped in Greek fashion at lectisternia, represents the twelve to whom the altar at Athens was erected (Thuc. vi. 54). These were Zeus (the head of them all), Poseidon, Apollo, Ares, Hermes, Hephaestus, Hestia, Demeter, Hera, Athene, Artemis and Aphrodite. The altars to twelve gods were common in Greece, but not always to the same twelve, including sometimes deities not usually regarded as belonging to the Olympian 'dynasty.' The altar at Olympia was to the following six pairs: Zeus and Poseidon, Hera and Athene, Hermes and Apollo, Dionysus and the Charites, Artemis and Alpheus, Cronus and Rhea (Schol. ad Pind. Ol. v. 5). In the prevalent Greek mythology, though Zeus was always recognised as supreme god, the minister and announcer of his will was Apollo.—Such is the representation of Zeus in literature, but it must not be forgotten that this account, and many other legends about him are the outcome of a combination of mythologies. The change of dynasties from Uranus to Cronus and from Cronus to Zeus represents in reality the partial acceptance of a theology belonging to older inhabitants of Greek lands whose supreme gods are retained as predecessors of the Greek Zeus. Moreover, as has been pointed out above, the older Greek Zeus (the Zeus of the so-called 'Pelasgians') was the god of the bright sky [cf. JUPITER], worshipped on mountains such as Olympus (more than one), Ithome, Parnes, Cithaeron, Laphystion, Ida and Samothrace. Many, no doubt, of the myths about him refer to the phenomena of the sky: the fight with Typhoeus, for instance, is probably a myth from the strife of the elements, and the story of the Cyclopes supplying him with thunderbolts obviously refers to thunderstorms; but it is an error to apply this interpretation as universally as some have done. The many transformations of Zeus in his amours have been rightly explained as no sky-phenomena, but as additions gradually made to the story of Zeus from the common habit of tracing the descent of noble families from the god. Thus a number of separate local genealogies of this kind gathering round the name of Zeus, from whom these local families traced their descent, necessitated the belief in a number of unions between Zeus and local nymphs or mortal women; and, further, those primitive tribes who had totemistic symbols had traditions which are preserved in the stories of Zeus taking an animal form. It is likely enough that the true explanation of Zeus as a bull or Zeus as a swan is given by those who say that the descent in such tribes became a descent from Zeus =

a bull, or from Zeus = a swan. The early or 'Pelagian' conception of Zeus varied in different localities. The Arcadian Zeus (Ζεὺς Ἀρκαῖος) was born, according to the legends of the country, in Arcadia, either on Mt. Parrhasium, or on Mt. Lycaeus. He was brought up there by the nymphs Thiso, Neda, and Hagno. Lycaon, son of Pelasgus, erected a temple to Zeus Lycaeus on Mt. Lycaeus, and instituted the festival of the Lycaea in honour of him [LYCAEUS; LYCAON]. In the festival [see Dict. of Ant. art. Lycaea] we see Zeus dwelling in light on the summit of the mountain where it caught the first rays of the sun, and worshipped by rites, part of which is a rain charm, part a relic of human sacrifice. Those may be right who see in this sacrifice 'the cannibal feast of a wolf-tribe.' Especially regarded as 'Pelagian' was the Zeus of Dodona in Epirus called Ζεὺς Δωδωναῖος or Πελασγικός, who was worshipped originally without image or temple in the sacred oak-grove—the tree sacred to the chief god of Aryan nations—and possessing the oldest oracle of Greece [for a full account, see Dict. of Ant. art. Oraculum]. The national Hellenic Zeus of the less primitive time was worshipped at Olympia in Elis, and the great national Panegyris was celebrated once in four years. There Zeus was regarded as the father and king of gods and men, and as the supreme god of the Hellenic nation. His statue at Olympia was executed by Phidias, a few years before the outbreak of the Peloponnesian war, the sublime idea of this great work having been suggested to the artist by the words of Homer (Il. i. 527). [PHIDIAS.]—The Greek and Latin poets give to Zeus or Jupiter an immense number of epithets and surnames, which are derived partly from the places where he was worshipped, and partly express the hopes and aspirations of those who worshipped him. The most familiar and significant, besides those mentioned at the beginning of the article, are Γενέθλιος or Γενήτωρ as the father of the nation or the family (Pind. Pyth. iv. 167; Aesch. Suppl. 196); Ἐλευθέριος, the giver of freedom, especially as deliverer from the Persian yoke (Plut. Aristid. 19; cf. Pind. Ol. xii. 1); Σωτήρ, the protector of the race or of the household, to whom the third cup of wine at the Greek dinner was drunk (the first being to the Olympian gods, the second to the heroes: cf. Pind. Isthm. v. 8; Plat. Phileb. p. 66); Γαμήλιος, who gives happy and fruitful wedlock; Τέλειος, who answers prayer (Pind. Pyth. i. 67; Aesch. Ag. 978). The eagle, the oak, and the summits of mountains were sacred to him, and his sacrifices generally consisted of goats, bulls, and cows. His usual attributes are the sceptre, eagle, thunderbolt, and a figure of Victory in his hand, and sometimes also a cornucopia. The Olympian Zeus sometimes wears a wreath of olive, and the Dodonaean Zeus a wreath of oak leaves. In works of art Zeus is generally represented as the omnipotent father and king of gods and men, according to the idea which was embodied in the statue of the Olympian Zeus by Phidias. Respecting the Roman god, see JUPITER.

Zeuxidamus (Ζευξίδαμος). 1. King of Sparta, and tenth of the Eurypontidae. He was grandson of Theopompus, and father of Anaxidamus, who succeeded him (Paus. iii. 7).—2. Son of Leotychides, king of Sparta. He was also named Cyniscus. He died before his father, leaving a son, Archidamus II. (Hdt. vi. 71; Thuc. ii. 47.)

Zeuxis (Ζεῦξις), the great Greek painter, who excelled all his contemporaries except Parrhasius, was a native of Heraclea (probably of the city of this name on the Euxine), and was born between 450 and 440 B. C. He came to Athens soon after the beginning of the Peloponnesian war, when he had already achieved a great reputation, although a young man. (Plat. Protag. p. 318, Gorg. p. 453, cf. Aristoph. Ach. 991.) He passed some time in Macedonia, at the court of Archelaus, for whom he decorated the royal palace at Pella with paintings, probably soon after 413 (Ael. V. H. xiv. 17). He must have spent some time in Magna Graecia, as we learn from the story respecting the picture of Helen, which he painted for the city of Croton; and it is also probable that he visited Sicily, as we are told that he gave away one of his pictures to the Agrigentines. His travels through Greece itself were no doubt extensive. We find him at Olympia, where he made an ostentatious display, before the eyes of all Greece, of the wealth which his art had brought him, by appearing in a robe embroidered with his own name in letters of gold (Plin. xxxv. 62). The pallia, however, are explained by some as being curtains hung in front of his pictures. After acquiring a great fortune by the exercise of his art, he adopted the custom of giving away his pictures, because no adequate price could be set upon them. The time of his death is unknown. The masterpiece of Zeuxis was his picture of Helen, in painting which he had as his models the five most beautiful maidens of Croton, whom he was allowed to select for this purpose. It was painted for the temple of Hera at Croton. This picture and its history were celebrated by many poets, who preserved the names of the five maidens upon whom the choice of Zeuxis fell. (Plin. xxxv. 62; Cic. de Invent. ii. 1.) The accurate painting of 'still life' was a department of the art which Zeuxis and his younger rival Parrhasius appear to have carried almost to perfection. The well-known story of the trial of skill in that species of painting between these two artists, if not literally true, indicates the opinion which was held in ancient times of their powers of imitation. In this contest the picture of Zeuxis represented a bunch of grapes, so naturally painted that the birds flew at the picture to eat the fruit; upon which the artist, confident in this proof of his success, called upon his rival no longer to delay to draw aside the curtain and show his picture: but the picture of Parrhasius was the curtain itself, which Zeuxis had mistaken for real drapery. On discovering his error, Zeuxis honourably yielded the palm to Parrhasius, saying that he himself had deceived birds, but Parrhasius had deceived an artist (Plin. l. c.). Besides this accuracy of imitation, many of the works of Zeuxis displayed great dramatic power. This appears to have been especially the case with his Infant Heracles strangling the Serpent, where the chief force of the composition consisted in the terror of Alcmena and Amphitryon, as they witnessed the struggle. It is thought that this theme is reproduced on a vase now in the British Museum. Another picture, in which he showed the same dramatic power, applied to a very different subject, was his Female Hippocentaur, which was lost in a shipwreck off Cape Malea, on its way to Rome, whither it had been sent by Sulla (Lucian, Zeux. 3). The composition of this picture is perhaps preserved in a mosaic from the villa of Hadrian [see Dict. of Ant. art. Pictura].

Zioberis (Jinjeran), a river of Parthia (Curt. vi. 4, 4).

Zoetium or Zoetēum (Ζοίτιον, Ζοίτειον; Ζοιτειεύς), a town of Arcadia in the district Eutresia, N. of MEGALOPOLIS.

Zōilus (Ζωῖλος), a grammarian, was a native of Amphipolis, and lived in the time of Philip of Macedon. He was celebrated for the asperity with which he assailed Homer (Suid. s.v. 'Ομηρομάστιξ). He found fault with him principally for introducing fabulous and incredible stories in his poems. From the list that we have of his writings it also appears that he attacked Plato and Isocrates. His name became proverbial for a captious and malignant critic. (Ov. Rem. Am. 366; Ael. V. H. xi. 10.)

Zōnāras, Joannes (Ἰωάννης ὁ Ζωναράς), a celebrated Byzantine historian and theologian, lived in the twelfth century under the emperors Alexius I. Comnenus and Calo-Joannes. Besides his theological works there is still extant his Annales (Χρονικόν), in eighteen books, from the creation of the world to the death of Alexis in 1118. It is compiled from various Greek authors, whose very words Zonaras frequently retains. The earlier part is chiefly taken from Josephus; and in the portion which relates to Roman history he has for the most part followed Dio Cassius. In consequence of the latter circumstance the Annals of Zonaras are of great importance in studying the early history of Rome. Of the first twenty books of Dio Cassius we have nothing but the abstract of Zonaras; and even of the later books, of which Xiphilinus has made a fuller epitome, Zonaras has preserved many statements of Dio which are entirely omitted by Xiphilinus. — Editions by Du Cange, Paris, 1686, fol., and by Dindorf, Leips. 1875.

Zōnē (Ζώνη; Ζωναῖος), a town of Thrace on a promontory of the same name in the Aegaean, where Orpheus is said to have sung (Hdt. vii. 59; Ap. Rh. i. 29; Mel. ii. 2, 8).

Zōpyrus (Ζωπυρός). 1. A Persian, son of Megabyzus. After Darius Hystaspis had besieged Babylon for twenty months in vain, Zopyrus resolved to gain the place for his master by the most extraordinary self-sacrifice. Accordingly, one day he appeared before Darius with his body mutilated in the most horrible manner: both his ears and nose were cut off, and his person otherwise disfigured. After explaining to Darius his intentions, he fled to Babylon as a victim of the cruelty of the Persian king. The Babylonians gave him their confidence, and placed him at the head of their troops. He soon found means to betray the city to Darius, who severely punished the inhabitants for their revolt. Darius appointed Zopyrus satrap of Babylon for life, with the enjoyment of its entire revenues. (Hdt. iii.

153-160.)—2. The Physiognomist, attributed many vices to Socrates in an assembly of his disciples, who laughed at him and at his art in consequence; but Socrates admitted that such were his natural propensities, but said that they had been overcome by philosophy. (Cic. Tusc. iv. 37, de Fat. 5.)

Zōrōaster or Zoroastres (Ζωροάστρης), the Zarathustra of the Zendavesta, and the Zerdusht of the Persians, was the reformer of the Magian religion. There were extant in the later Greek literature several works bearing the name of Zoroaster; but these writings were forgeries of a later age, and belong to the same class of writings as the works of Hermes Trismegistus, Orpheus, &c. There is still extant a collection of oracles ascribed to Zoroaster, which are, of course, spurious. They have been published by Morell, Paris, 1595, and by other editors.

Zōsimus (Ζώσιμος), a Greek historian, who lived in the time of the younger Theodosius. He wrote a History of the Roman empire in six books, which is still extant. This work must have been written after A.D. 425, as an event is mentioned in it which took place in that year. The first book comprises a sketch of the history of the early emperors, down to the end of the reign of Diocletian (305). The second, third, and fourth books are devoted to the history of the fourth century, which is treated much less concisely. The fifth and sixth books embrace the period from 395 to 410, when Attalus was deposed. The work of Zosimus is mainly (though not altogether) an abridgment or compilation of the works of previous historians. His style is concise, clear, pure, and not unpleasing. His chief fault as a historical writer is his neglect of chronology. Zosimus was a pagan, and comments severely upon the faults and crimes of the Christian emperors. Hence his credibility has been assailed by several Christian writers. There are, no doubt, numerous errors of judgment to be found in the work, and sometimes (especially in the case of Constantine) an intemperate expression of opinion, which sometimes exaggerates, if it does not distort the truth. But he does not seem fairly chargeable with deliberate invention or wilful misrepresentation. — Editions by Bekker, 1837, and by Mendelssohn, 1887.

Zostēr (C. of Vari), a promontory on the W. of Attica, between Phalerum and Sunium. It was a sacred spot, and contained altars of Leto, Artemis, and Apollo (Paus. i. 31, 1).

Zygantes or Gygantes (Ζύγαντες, Γύγαντες), a people of Libya, whom Herodotus places on the W. side of the lake Triton. Others mention a city Zygantis and a people Zyges on the coast of Marmarica. (Hdt. iv. 194; Steph. Byz. s.v.)

APPENDIX

It is thought that some of those who wish to pursue further the subjects (apart from the domain of the historians of Greece and Rome) which cannot be exhaustively dealt with in a book of this size, may be helped by the following list of works. It is not intended to be anything approaching a complete bibliography on any of the departments included in this Dictionary. The object has been to name the more easily procurable books among modern authorities which will carry most students as far as they need, and will themselves furnish a more complete list of writers in all languages on their several subjects. To most of the books mentioned below the Editor has to acknowledge deep obligations for information, suggestions, or references.

A.

For Mythology:—Roscher's Ausführliches Lexikon der griechischen und römischen Mythologie (which, however, as yet does not extend beyond letter K). [This is the best and fullest work which has yet appeared, though some of its most learned contributors are too prone to retain the meteorological explanation of myths, to the exclusion of that derived from customs and rites traceable in 'folk-lore.']. Preller-Pleu's Griechische Mythologie and Preller-Jordan's Röm. Myth. Great assistance and guidance may be obtained from Mannhardt's Mythol. Forschungen and Wald- und Feldkulte, and from Lang's Custom, Myth and Ritual; also from Harrison's Mythology and Monuments of Athens, Frazer's Golden Bough, Dyer's Gods of Greece, and from articles in Baumeister's Denkmäler (especially for the representation of myths in ancient art).

B.

For Topography:—Fuller information and more references will be found in Smith's Dictionary of Ancient Geography. See also Bunbury's History of Ancient Geography, Kiepert's Lehrbuch der alten Geographie and the English translation. Among the more recent books for particular countries and for the more important towns are Ramsay's Historical Geo-
