

The Buddha of Christendom : a book for the present crisis / by Robert Anderson.

Contributors

Anderson, Robert, 1841-1918.

Publication/Creation

London : Hodder and Stoughton, 1899.

Persistent URL

<https://wellcomecollection.org/works/wqka5h63>

License and attribution

This work has been identified as being free of known restrictions under copyright law, including all related and neighbouring rights and is being made available under the Creative Commons, Public Domain Mark.

You can copy, modify, distribute and perform the work, even for commercial purposes, without asking permission.

Wellcome Collection
183 Euston Road
London NW1 2BE UK
T +44 (0)20 7611 8722
E library@wellcomecollection.org
<https://wellcomecollection.org>

THE BUDDHA OF CHRISTENDOM

R. ANDERSON C.B.

22501675853

THE BUDDHA OF CHRISTENDOM

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2016

<https://archive.org/details/b2488604x>

THE BUDDHA OF CHRISTENDOM

A Book for the Present Crisis

BY

ROBERT ANDERSON, C.B., LL.D.

ASSISTANT COMMISSIONER OF POLICE OF THE METROPOLIS ; AUTHOR OF "THE SILENCE OF GOD," ETC.

London

HODDER AND STOUGHTON

27, PATERNOSTER ROW

—
MDCCCXCIX

Wellcome Library for the History and Understanding of Medicine

(2) ZFGT

PREFACE.

THE Reformation has been well described as “the greatest achievement in English history.” To emphasise its true character and aim, so strangely ignored in the Ritualistic controversy, is the chief design of the present volume.

“It was the main purpose of the then rulers of the Church,” the Archbishops declared in their decision in the Incense case, “to put prominently forward the supremacy of the Bible.” Rome maintains the supremacy of “the Church”: it is the foundation of her entire system. The Reformers rejected the pretensions of the Church, and made the Bible the supreme standard of authority. This was the vital question at issue in the sixteenth century: it is the vital question at issue to-day.

And here the Ritualists are on the side of Rome. Their refusal to accept the judgment of the very tribunal for which they clamoured is due, not to the decision itself, but to the grounds on which it is based. They were prepared to obey "the Church." But at Lambeth the Archbishops, instead of speaking ex cathedrâ in the name of "the Church," appealed to Holy Scripture and the law of the realm. In a word, abandoning the position assumed in their letter of February 19, 1897, in reply to the Papal Bull on Anglican Orders—the position which the Ritualists have hitherto maintained with episcopal approval—they recognised "the Reformation Settlement," and sank to the level of "mere Protestants." Hence the indignation of the Ritualists: they think they have been betrayed.

All who accept the Ritualists' conception of the Church are on a road which, as every logical and unprejudiced thinker acknowledges, leads straight to Rome. They who accept the Reformers' conception of the Church are separated from Rome by a barrier which is impassable and indestructible. The one position is the religion of Christendom and of its Buddha: the other is Christianity.

The "argument" of these pages is so plain that no further prefatory words are needed, save to thank my friend, the Rev. E. W. Bullinger, D.D., for his kind help in reading the proofs and preparing the index.

R. A.

39, LINDEN GARDENS, W.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

CHAPTER I.

	PAGE
How did life begin?—Lord Kelvin's testimony—Mr. Herbert Spencer quoted to refute abiogenesis—Absurdity of the hypothesis—If man was developed from a life-germ, the life-germ must have been eternal—Tyndall's problem, "Who made God?"—Mr. Spencer further quoted . . .	1

CHAPTER II.

Creation : "the orthodox belief"—The transcendental philosophy and our conception of the existence of God—What Genesis teaches about creation—The creation "day"—The language of Scripture allows of evolution in the case of the lower creation ; but not in the case of man—Charles Darwin quoted—Evidence of design—"Missing links"—The question discussed—The testimony of philology—Professor Max Müller quoted . . .	10
---	----

CHAPTER III.

PAGE

Man is a religious animal—Renan's dictum—Testimony of Professor Tiele, Professor Max Müller, and Charles Darwin—How can the fact be explained?—How can man's evil propensities be accounted for?—These appear in the spiritual, more universally than in the moral, sphere—The Pelagian heresy—If man is a religious being, why is not religion always pure and true?—The tendency of all religions is to degenerate and to corrupt mankind—The only possible explanation of this . . . . .	24
---	----

CHAPTER IV.

It follows that religion should always be regarded with suspicion—By what standard, then, can its truth be tested? The Christian answers, "By the Bible"; and yet most Christians set up the Church as the authority—What and where is the Church?—The Church of England claims no such position—The claim of Rome is an instance of "the confidence trick"—How, then, is the question to be decided?—The claims of the Greek Church are superior to those of Rome, but in England they are ignored—The dogma of Papal supremacy stated and discussed—It is unsupported by evidence and refuted by Scripture—The Apostle Peter's ministry—To him were given the keys of the kingdom , which Rome confounds with the Church—The acceptance of the dogma confirms the story of the Eden fall . . . . .	38
---	----

CHAPTER V.

The main doctrines of the religion of Christendom—Are they true?—And on what ground are they presented to our faith?—Dr. Pusey's answer: Scripture as interpreted by the Fathers—This is refuted by the testimony of the Fathers themselves, and by the condition of the early Church—The Bampton Lecture , 1864, quoted—The Church of Christendom was founded, not on the Apostles, but on the Fathers—Augustine's position and influence—His Confessions —The teaching of the Greek School contrasted with that of the Latin Fathers—Clement and Augustine—Dean Farrar on the Church as formulated by Augustine .	53
---	--

	PAGE

CHAPTER VI.

The teaching of Gautama and the corruptions of Buddhism—The Lamaism of Tibet—The Christian religion marked by corruptions akin to those of Buddhism and the old classic cults—The explanation of this strange phenomenon—The Divine religion of Judaism differed from all other religions—The character of the apostasy it suffered—The "Golden Calf" . . . . .	72
---	----

CHAPTER VII.

The religion of Christendom refuses an appeal to Scripture—Not so was it with the Reformers—Article XX.—The true character of the Reformation—Henry VIII. and Paul III.—The vital question is whether the supreme authority is the Bible or the Church—Canon Gore cited as an exponent of the Romish view— Lux Mundi and The Ministry of the Christian Church —The absurdity and effrontery of his position—Professor Harnack quoted—The figment of Apostolic Succession, as championed by Canon Gore, stated and refuted . . . . .	87
---	----

CHAPTER VIII.

PAGE

With the Romanisers the Church is paramount—The one mediator—This is the cause of the secessions to Rome—The true character of Protestantism—Salvation a personal matter—The teaching of the Law and the Gospel contrasted: Moses and Paul—The sense in which “religion” is used in this work: Trench and Carlyle quoted—The Times correspondence on Ritualism—A typical letter quoted—What these men mean by “The Church”—The Reformers’ definition of it—The vital importance of the distinction—The revival of the Confessional in England—The filthy character of the manuals in use by priests—The profanity of priestly absolution—An appeal to Scripture condemns it—Its degrading effect on national character . . . . .	109
---	-----

CHAPTER IX.

The fate of an unbaptised infant—The change alleged to be caused by baptism—“What kind of God is this that is thus presented to us?”—Three facts established by an appeal to Scripture—Baptismal regeneration traced to the classic cults of Paganism—Mithras worship—The Eleusinian mysteries—Description of the cult, and its influence on the Christian Church—The Hibbert Lectures , 1888—Similar rites in Mexico and Tibet—The early corruption of the other “Sacrament” . . . . .	131
--	-----

CHAPTER X.

“The illuminated mind of primitive Christendom”—The Church of Christendom and “the Church in the wilder-
--

CONTENTS

xiii

PAGE

ness"—The early Church marked by false doctrine and low morality—Cyprian and his times—The prevalence of pledged celibacy and asceticism—Nuns and nunneries—Tertullian's baneful teaching—The testimony of Cyprian and Clement to its evil effects—Chrysostom and the state of the Church in his day—The Imperial Edict of 370 to shield women from the greed of the clergy—Cyril of Alexandria and the Council of 431—The "Council of Robbers"—Salvian and his testimony to the state of the Church in his time—"A sink of vices"—Ritualism appeals to this "primitive Church," whereas the Reformers appealed to the Christianity of the New Testament—The decline of the Evangelical party, and its causes 153

CHAPTER XI.

The title of this volume—The religion of Christendom an apostasy in a deeper sense than "the Jews' religion"—The apostasy of Buddhism affords a juster parallel—But for Satan's influence the religion of Christendom could not have survived the sixteenth century—Alexander VI. and his infamous immoralities—The Emperor Charles V. and his dreams of reform—The Edict of Worms—Charles' efforts to obtain the calling of a Council—The Council of Trent and Paul III.—The Massacre of St. Bartholomew and Gregory XIII.—And yet submission to the Pope is declared to be the way of salvation—Cardinal Vaughan's statement of this—Macaulay's problem—Human religion has been a curse to mankind—Mill's dictum discussed and justified—The God of the historic Church of Christendom a monster . . . . . 181

CHAPTER XII.

	PAGE
The true method of theological study—The typology of Scripture shown to be a safeguard against the false teaching of Ritualism—The Passover ; the Exodus ; Sinai ; the Covenant—Redemption was thus completed entirely apart from priesthood—The antitype of all this in Christianity, as unfolded in the New Testament—Latin theology ignores or denies the truth of it—Canon Gore again cited as an exponent of the Romish view of the Church—The covenant is for the covenant people : How, then, can men be brought within it?—The answer is to be found in the great fundamental, but forgotten, truth of Grace—The doctrine explained and vindicated . . . . .	206

CHAPTER XIII.

“ Martyrs of disgust ”—Ritualism promoted by certain types of Protestantism—With the many Christ is not a living person but a dead Buddha—This appears from the manner in which He is named—The habits of speech of the post-apostolic Fathers contrasted with those of the Christians of the New Testament—The Lordship of Christ—This rests on revelation ; i. e. , not the Church, but the Scriptures—Cardinal Newman’s position—Pope Leo XIII. quoted—Lordship connected with Grace—Sentiment versus faith—Concluding remarks upon the present crisis ; its character, and the influences that have led to it—The vital question is the pretensions of “ The Church.” The martyrs were the opponents and victims of the Church—Every true Christian is of necessity a Protestant . . . . .	234
--	-----

CONTENTS . . . . . xv

APPENDIX I. . . . . PAGE

Christian Baptism and Baptismal Regeneration . . . . . 259

APPENDIX II.

Romish Propagandism . . . . . 274

APPENDIX III.

Paolo Sarpi and the Council of Trent . . . . . 281

APPENDIX IV.

NOTE

- I. Bishops . . . . . 290
- II. "Deacons" . . . . . 291
- III. "The Church" . . . . . 293
- IV. "The Priest in Absolution" . . . . . 296
- V. Death-dates of leading Fathers . . . . . 298
- VI. The "Virgin Mary" myth . . . . . 298
- VII. The Apostle Paul on Celibacy . . . . . 299
- VIII. "We have an altar" . . . . . 301
- IX. The Epistles of Ignatius . . . . . 304
- X. Prevailing Irreverence in the use of the Lord's Names . 305
- XI. Popular Hymnology . . . . . 309

INDEX . . . . . 315

CHAPTER I

SOME men would deny, with Berkeley, the reality of matter; others, with Hume, the reality of mind; but neither the idealist nor the sceptic ever questioned the fact of his own existence. Here it is that knowledge begins; and at this point knowledge is absolute. I EXIST: this is a fact enthroned beyond the sphere where doubt is possible.

But the question remains, How did I come to exist? I live: How did life begin? To say I am descended from a first man is no solution of it. Where did the first man come from? To reply that he was evolved or developed from a life-germ, is merely to put the difficulty back. How is the life-germ to be accounted for?

The greatest living authority to whom we can appeal will tell us that "inanimate matter cannot become living except under the influence of matter already living. This," he adds, "is a fact in science which seems to me as well ascertained as the law of gravitation." And again, "I am ready to accept as an article of faith in science, valid for all time and in all space, that life is produced by life and only by life."<sup>1</sup>

The falseness of the alternative proposition—that life originally came from nowhere out of nothing—is apparent. "Besides being absolutely without evidence to give it external support, this hypothesis cannot support itself internally—cannot be framed into a coherent thought. It is one of those illegitimate symbolic conceptions so continually mistaken for legitimate symbolic conceptions because they remain untested. Immediately an attempt is made to elaborate the idea into anything like a definite shape, it proves to be a pseud-idea, admitting of no definite shape." It "implies the establishment of a relation in thought between nothing and something—a relation of which one term is absent—an impossible relation.”

<sup>1</sup> Lord Kelvin, Brit. Assoc., Edinburgh, 1871.

 “The case is one of those where men do not really believe, but rather believe they believe. For belief, properly so called, implies a mental representation of the thing believed; and no such mental representation is here possible.”

These words are borrowed from Mr. Herbert Spencer <sup>1</sup>—borrowed “without permission,” of course; for it is needless to say they are not intended by their author to refute, as in fact they do refute, the figment of abiogenesis,<sup>2</sup> upon which his own biological system rests. He assumes that, at some time or other, “living matter must have arisen from not-living matter;” although his own words so pitilessly expose the absurdity of the suggestion. For it involves a “pseud-idea”; and therefore, as he tells us, it cannot be believed, because “belief implies a mental representation of the thing believed, and no such representation is here possible.”

The question before us is, not how the various developments of life can be explained, but how life itself can be accounted for. And this inquiry leads us abruptly to the startling conclusion that the human mind is incapable not only of believing, but even of thinking that life ever came except from life; or, in other words, that life ever had a beginning.

<sup>1</sup> “Principles of Biology,” § 112.

<sup>2</sup> Abiogenesis is what used to be called “spontaneous generation. Huxley it was who coined the new term.

But, it may be urged, the only possible alternative to the hypothesis of evolution is that of creation; and Mr. Spencer's argument, while clearly destructive of the one, is no less valid against the other.<sup>1</sup> The objection is an unintelligent one. All are agreed, of course, that there must have been a first man—let us call him Adam; and the question is how Adam came into existence. That he suddenly began to be, begotten by nothing out of nothing, is a suggestion the absurdity of which is manifest. But not a whit less preposterous is the notion that, at some moment in an "abysmal past," a life-germ from which he was gradually developed was begotten by nothing out of nothing.

<sup>1</sup> I do not forget that Mr. Spencer's argument is aimed against special creations. But that is merely a side issue. Every act of creation must be "special," and if his argument is valid, it is valid against belief in creation generally.

The evolutionist requires of us that we shall 'postulate' this germ, or, in other words, that we shall take for granted the origin of life. Nor is this a gratuitous "leap in the dark." There is no escape from it, and we only stultify ourselves by imagining that we can avoid it by putting back the event to the year B.C. 100,000,000. Here again we are shut up to one of two alternatives. Either this germ from which all life has been developed must have been produced by a Creator; or else it was self-existent and eternal, and inherently capable of such infinite development that it became the parent of all the wonderful forms of life in the world. Let us then accept this hypothesis, and the question arises, By what term shall this life-germ be known to us? The biologist may try to delude us by giving it the uncouth yet unpretending designation of "a particle of living protoplasm," but there is only one word known to human language by which a great first cause, self-existent and eternal, can be adequately described, and that word is GOD.

Let no one here fling down the book as though this were but an abstract metaphysical inquiry devoid of practical importance. There is a sentence in one of Tyndall's treatises<sup>1</sup> which might well excite pathetic interest in this discussion in every house where there is a children's nursery or a baby's cot. "Athwart all play and amusement," he wrote, "a thread of seriousness ran through my character; and many a sleepless night of my childhood has been passed, fretted by the question 'Who made God?'"<sup>2</sup> And in many a home to-day there are little brains perplexed with kindred problems, which, in the strange isolation of child life, they brood over in the darkness. For the sceptical philosophy of the nursery is too often met by ridicule or reproof, or else by pious platitudes, instead of by wise and sympathetic words.

The youngest child can be made to understand that the question "Who made God?" is essentially absurd. For no matter how much we try, we cannot get rid of the thought of a being that had no beginning, and therefore was never "made;" and this is our primary conception of God. And while the evolutionist, perchance, would train his babies to bow down to some "symbolic conception" of the great "primordial germ," the cult being regulated by the Principles of Biology, others, with the help of a very different book, will teach their children to worship the "God who created the heavens and the earth."

<sup>1</sup> "Prof. Virchow and Evolution."

<sup>2</sup> John Stuart Mill tells in his "Autobiography" (p. 43) how his father urged this absurd problem upon him in childhood.

"The fool hath said in his heart, there is no God." <sup>1</sup> And he is a fool, not because his thesis is heretical, but because it is absurd—absurd because his own existence implies the existence of God. His words are thus an outrage upon reason. The existence of God is, next to our own, the most certain fact in the whole range of human knowledge.

For let us not forget that in seeking the origin of life in the world our choice is strictly limited to one of two hypotheses, creation or abiogenesis. And abiogenesis proves wholly worthless—"worthless in its intrinsic incoherence; worthless as absolutely without evidence; worthless as not supplying an intellectual need ; worthless as not satisfying a moral want. We must, therefore, consider it as counting for nothing in opposition to any other hypothesis respecting the origin of organic beings."

<sup>1</sup> Psa. xiv. and liii.

These words also are Mr. Herbert Spencer's. They are used by him, of course, to refute the hypothesis of creation ; but while they tell with relentless force against his own position, it is obvious that here they have no validity whatever.<sup>1</sup> For, as we have seen, science itself guides us into a path which leads to belief in God ; and once we recognise a God, no chasm separates us from the acknowledgment of a Creator. Nor will it avail to plead that we cannot understand creation. Some of the most familiar processes in nature we cannot understand. But while we can believe what is incomprehensible, it is impossible, as Mr. Spencer has shown us, really to believe what is unthinkable. Our choice here lies, as he himself insists, between creation and abiogenesis ; that is, between what is incomprehensible and what is absurd, between an insoluble mystery and unthinkable nonsense.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The abiogenesis theory may be expressed by the formula, "Something has been produced by nothing" ; the creation hypothesis, "Something has been produced by something."

<sup>1</sup> The "Abiogenesisist" who resents this plain speaking is like the man who, when a weapon with which he has been inflicting pain on others, is wrenched from his hand and turned against himself, makes a whining protest against violence. For he it is who seeks to brand the greatest thinkers and scholars not only of the past, but of his own age, as the ignorant dupes of a "pseud-idea," a "formula for ignorance." And this in spite of the fact that, as Huxley admits, "the present state of knowledge furnishes us with no link between the living and the not living;" and as Tyndall declares, "every attempt made in our day to generate life independently of antecedent life has utterly broken down."

CHAPTER II

SIX thousand years ago this universe of ours had no existence. Infinite space was an empty waste where darkness and silence reigned. But on a certain day—the week date is known, it was a Sunday—God created this earth on which we dwell. A shapeless mass it was at first, but Monday and Tuesday sufficed to fashion and furnish it as a home for life. To create the sun and moon and stars was Wednesday's task. On Thursday the sea and air were filled with fish and fowl; and on the Friday the land became peopled with its inhabitants, man himself being the crowning triumph of creative power.

Such was once "the orthodox belief." And as the creed of "the Catholic Church" can never change, such, presumably, is its belief still. And not a few who pose as scholars, and claim even to be teachers, suppose that this is what the Bible teaches! No book in all the world is so little understood. No book has been so wronged by its adherents, so travestied and maligned by critics.

The Transcendental philosophy has taught us that ideas of a certain kind give proof, not of the power and liberty of the human mind, but of its subjection. In the wild license of fancy, for example, we can imagine the annihilation of the universe, nothing remaining by which to measure space or time; but no madman's dream can compass the thought that space and time could ever cease to exist. By the law of our being, the mind is governed by these ideas and cannot divest itself of them.

And our conception of the existence of God is in the same category. Were it otherwise a revelation would of course be impossible; for a revelation implies this knowledge on the part of those to whom it is addressed.<sup>1</sup> The Bible, therefore, nowhere asserts the existence of the Deity; but, assuming it, opens by declaring that "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth."

<sup>1</sup> As Aristotle pointed out, all intellectual teaching is based upon what is previously known to the person taught.

As to when that was, revelation is silent. And science, so called, would be less unworthy of its name if it were silent too; for people who talk about untold millions of years are like babies who prattle about untold millions of money. "God created." The emphasis here is commonly misplaced. It is not that the earth was created, but that GOD created it. When, and how, we know not; for as to this, I repeat, revelation is silent. And it says nothing about the manner of its creation,<sup>1</sup> but merely asserts the fact, and then goes on to record that, at the epoch of the narrative, it existed in a chaotic state. That this was not its original condition, Scripture expressly declares.<sup>2</sup> But how its ruin came about—it was probably due to some cataclysm which engulfed an earlier economy of life—and what was the duration of the ages that had intervened, we cannot tell. What concerns us is the fact that at the epoch here in view, “the earth was waste and void.”<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> With many the use of the word "create" is taken as settling the whole question, for they assume it can only mean "to make out of nothing." That this is a blunder is obvious from the statement that man was created out of the dust of the earth. The fact is that neither in Hebrew nor in English is there a word for "making out of nothing" (Query, is there in any language?), any more than there was in the old languages a word to express the idea which the term annihilate was coined to convey. The word "make," used in Gen. i. 7, 16, 25, 26, is elastic in meaning. The heavenly bodies, ex. gr., were made, or appointed, "to give light upon the earth" (ver. 17), just as the cities of Numb. xxxv. 6, were appointed (it is the same Hebrew word) to be "cities of refuge." In Gen. i. the word "create" is used only in verses 1, 21, and 27.

<sup>2</sup> Isa. xlv. 18.

The narrative proceeds to notice in brief outline the stages by which our planet was rendered a fitting home for its new tenant, man. The Bible has been discredited by insisting on giving a literal meaning to the word “day” in the creation story. That God could not have refurnished the earth in a few brief hours is the ignorant dogmatism of unbelief. But in insisting that He did so in fact, theology has committed the typical blunder of identifying the language of Scripture with what is mere inference and exegesis. A Divine revelation can be made only in human language; but we must never forget that with God limitations of time have no place.<sup>2</sup> Again we have the fact that it was not till the fourth creation "day" that the heavenly bodies shone upon our planet, and therefore it may be urged that to speak here of a day of twenty-four hours is an obvious anachronism. Further, we have the fact that the seventh "day" is still running its course. God, indeed, is working, because sin has broken His "sabbath"; but the Creator rests. Here Science and Revelation are at one. And, finally, this conclusion is confirmed by an appeal to the deeper teaching of Scripture, which tells of an eighth creation "day" that is yet to come; for the epoch of the new creation is still future.

<sup>1</sup> Literally “became.” The opening sentences of the Bible are these:—“In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth, and the earth became waste and void.” Within these words lie all the ages of which geology speaks.

<sup>2</sup> 2 Pet. iii. 8 applies here.

What has been said of the earth itself applies also to its population. All living things are God's creatures, but of the methods by which He made them we know nothing. If Charles Darwin's attention had been called to the language of the first chapter of Genesis he would doubtless have appealed to it in support of his hypothesis. For its language is most striking. "And God said, Let the earth put forth grass, herb yielding seed, and fruit tree bearing fruit after its kind, wherein is the seed thereof, upon the earth: and it was so. And the earth brought forth grass," &c.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Gen. i. 11, 12.

Again: "And God said, Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life."<sup>1</sup> And so also of "the land population," we read, "And God said, Let the earth bring forth the living creature after its kind, cattle, and creeping thing, and beast of the earth after its kind: and it was so."<sup>2</sup> That God made them is expressly declared, but how He made them is an open question; and it is idle to deny that these words are consistent with the hypothesis of evolution—an hypothesis which is legitimate and reasonable, and which, though incapable of proof, can appeal to a considerable volume of indirect evidence in its support.

But all this only serves to lend increased emphasis to the marked and striking difference in the language used when the creation of man is recorded. "And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness. . . . And God created man in His own image."<sup>3</sup> This seems plainly to indicate that man was God's creature in a more immediate sense than the brute. And even if it were proved that the brute was produced by the operation of natural laws, this would only serve to create a presumption that man has been similarly developed. That presumption would no doubt be immensely strengthened by the facts of physiology. But those facts admit of an alternative explanation. It is only those who boast of their ignorance of God—they delight to proclaim themselves Agnostics—who venture to assert that God could not have created man otherwise than by evolution; or that, had He done so, man could not have the mysterious physiological peculiarities which characterise him. Such assertions—whatever else may be said of them—are too silly for discussion. Indeed it may be averred that the evolution theory implies a far more amazing act of creative power than orthodox theology dreams of.<sup>1</sup> The thought that even the Almighty created a germ capable of the infinite developments of life in the world is absolutely overwhelming. And remember, the fact that all living things are His creatures is no longer in dispute. The only question open is as to the method of His working. For, as

<sup>1</sup> Gen. i. 20.

<sup>2</sup> Gen. i. 24.

<sup>3</sup> Gen. i. 26, 27.

<sup>1</sup> In an article in the Westminster Review of July, 1858, Mr. Spencer used this argument in almost an extreme form in defending the Nebular hypothesis.

Darwin, the apostle of evolution, declares, "The birth both of the species and of the individual are equally parts of that grand sequence of events which our minds refuse to accept as the result of blind chance."<sup>1</sup>

It is not easy indeed to speak with conventional respect of those who find in the most trifling evidence of design—as, for example, a shaped piece of flint—a sufficient proof that man has been at work, and yet deny that the infinite wonders of nature afford proof that God has been at work. Moreover, if their theory be true their argument is false. If man be the product of evolution, the entire mass of evidence offered us as proof that intelligent beings were living upon earth during a remote past would not avail to prove the antiquity of the human race. For, ex hypothesi, long ages before the appearance upon earth of a being with any claim to the dignified title of man, his "hairy ancestors" may have acquired sufficient intelligence to account for their forming and using rough instruments of husbandry or of war.

In fact, the evolutionist is, to use a legal term,

<sup>1</sup> "Descent of Man," part ii., chap. xxi.

estopped from appealing to paleontology in proof of the antiquity of the race. For his theory implies that man is the product of processes which must have operated slowly and without a break, during vast periods of time, whereas his argument assumes that the transition from the brute stage to the man stage of his development was brief and sudden. Even if the truth of evolution were established, the exhibits of the paleontologist might reasonably be assigned to the "missing link" era.

Moreover the fact that there are "missing links" must not be dismissed in the light way common with evolutionists. Words are supposed to be subordinate to thoughts, but sometimes thoughts are controlled by them; and this is a case in point. People talk as though man was united to the brute by a chain which only needs certain links to make it complete. There is no "chain" whatever in the case. And having regard to his higher nature, he is separated from the brute by a gulf as impassable as that which divides the living from the not-living. Even Huxley has protested against the misrepresentation which makes evolutionists "seem to say that the structural differences between man and even the highest apes are small and insignificant." "No one," he says, "is more strongly convinced than I am of the vastness of the gulf between civilised man and the brutes." Even as to his animal structure this gulf is so great that, if he was evolved from the brute, the process must have occupied myriads of ages. And millions of creatures intermediate between them must have been produced. But where are the traces of them? Nor should we be dependent here upon "the testimony of the rocks." As any intelligent schoolboy can see, we should be surrounded by creatures in every conceivable stage of development between the two.

One of two conclusions we must here accept: either man is not the product of evolution at all; or else, at a certain stage of the creature's development, the Creator intervened to raise him to the high position he now occupies in the scale of creation. That is to say, the only question open is whether the matter of which he was created was inanimate matter as Genesis seems to teach, or matter already living as this alternative theory would assume. In either case the fact remains that man is the product of a "special creation."<sup>1</sup>

In all this moreover we are thinking of man merely as the highest type of animal. Thus regarded, Darwin declares in the closing sentence of his treatise, "Man still bears in his bodily frame the indelible stamp of his lowly origin." But what account can be given of his moral nature? And what of his spiritual nature?<sup>2</sup> To dismiss such considerations with a few high-sounding phrases is to stultify ourselves by mere words. No reasonable account of them has ever been attempted.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> A third suggestion is perhaps theoretically possible. Just as a builder, when his edifice is reared, destroys all traces of the scaffolding; so the Creator, as soon as evolution had fulfilled His purpose, destroyed all traces of the transitional economy of the life between the ape and the man.

<sup>2</sup> These considerations led A. R. Wallace, who shares with Darwin the fame of formulating the evolution hypothesis, to account for man's moral and spiritual nature by immediate Divine intervention.

<sup>3</sup> No book that has yet been written deals seriously with the problem. Mr. Clodd's "Pioneers of Evolution from Thales to Huxley" is an example of the sort of stuff which satisfies the credulous on these subjects. I should not notice this work were

The phenomena of language again present insuperable difficulties which evolutionists studiously ignore. If man were the product of evolution we should confidently expect to find that, with advancing civilisation, language would ever tend to gain in precision, to acquire new powers, and to become more elaborate ; whereas it is a well-known fact that its tendency is to change in a direction the very opposite. "Nor is this a peculiar feature of one language, but the universal law of all." <sup>1</sup>

But this is not all. The language of the race gives testimony still more definite. Professor Max Müller writes as follows :—

"As far as we can trace back the footsteps of men, even on the lowest strata of history, we see that the Divine gift it not that, to the great discredit of the Oxford University Extension movement, the delegates have included it in their list. Here is a choice extract from it: "Only the mentally anæmic, the emotionally overwrought, the unbalanced, and the epileptic are the victims, whether of the lofty illusions of august visions such as carried St. Paul, St. Theresa, and Joan of Arc into the presence of the holiest ; or hallucination of drowned cat, thin and dripping with water, born of the disordered nerves of Mrs. Gordon Jones" (p. 142). The man in whom such profane drivel excites no emotion of disgust and indignation is incapable of generous, or even gentlemanly, feeling.

---

<sup>1</sup> Archbishop Trench, "English Past and Present," lect. iii.

of a sound and sober intellect belonged to him from the very first; and the idea of a humanity merging slowly from the depths of an animal brutality can never be maintained again. The earliest work of art wrought by the human mind, more ancient than any literary document, and prior even to the first whisperings of tradition—the human language—forms an uninterrupted chain from the dawn of history down to our own times. We still speak the language of the first ancestors of our race, and this language, with its wonderful structure, bears witness against such gratuitous imputations.”<sup>1</sup>

In a word, the theory that man is the product of evolution is vetoed by the philologist.

Still more emphatically is it vetoed by the Christian. There is no reason perhaps why the various Buddhas, including the Buddha of Christendom—the traditional Jesus of the so-called “Christian religion,” should not have been derived from an ape. But the suggestion that the Lord Jesus Christ of Christianity was thus derived, is one from which the Christian will instinctively recoil. The more he knows of Christianity the more thoroughly will his intelligent convictions confirm the judgment of his spiritual instincts. Our Divine Lord is declared to be “the image of the invisible God," "the very image of His substance."<sup>1</sup> Words full of mystery, and yet they enable us to grasp the thought contained in the Creation record, "Let us make man in our image." Not Adam, but "the second man, the Lord from heaven," was the "type," the ideal representative, whose likeness the redeemed of earth shall bear.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> “Chips from a German Workshop,” vol. ii. p. 8.

<sup>1</sup> Col. i. 15; Heb. i. 3.

<sup>2</sup> 1 Cor. xv. 47-49. It may perhaps be urged that God may have worked by evolution in producing a species conformable to the "type." I will only say that if such an hypothesis satisfies any one, he is welcome to it.

One general remark in conclusion. I deprecate the idea that these opening chapters are intended as a treatise on the evolution controversy. I have been compelled to notice it in so far as the origin of man is concerned, but apart from that special question I have sought to avoid it. "There ought to be a clear distinction made between science in a state of hypothesis and science in a state of fact. And inasmuch as it is still in its hypothetical stage, the bar of exclusion ought to fall on the theory of evolution. Those who hold the theory are by no means ignorant of the uncertainty of their data, and thus only yield to it a provisional assent." These words of Tyndall's leave nothing to be desired. But some writers of eminence as scientists are wholly devoid of the judgment needed for dealing with any question of the kind. And, it may be added, many people are evolutionists for the same reason that small boys smoke cigarettes—it seems naughty, and they imagine it shows their independence!

CHAPTER III

“AS soon as man grew distinct from the animal he became religious.” No one gifted with a sense of humour could have gravely penned a suggestion so grotesque as this. That the remote descendant of an ape might become intelligent, philosophical, mathematical, musical, poetical, scientific—all this possibly we could understand ; but why should he become religious ?

And yet this dictum of Renan's<sup>1</sup> is most important as a testimony from such a quarter to the fact that man is a religious being. The universality of religion has, indeed, been denied ;<sup>2</sup> but the following testimony will carry conviction that the denial is based on grounds that are inadequate.

<sup>1</sup> “Vie de Jésus,” chap. i.

<sup>2</sup> See ex. gr. Sir John Lubbock's “Prehistoric Times,” chaps. xi., xii., xiii.

“The statement,” says Professor Tiele, “that there are nations or tribes which possess no religion, rests either on inaccurate observations, or on a confusion of ideas. No tribe or nation has yet been met with destitute of belief in any higher beings, and travellers who asserted their existence have been afterwards refuted by facts. It is legitimate, therefore, to call religion, in its most general sense, an universal phenomenon of humanity.” And in quoting these words, Professor Max Müller declares: “We may safely say that, in all researches, no human beings have been found anywhere who do not possess something which to them is religion.”<sup>1</sup> And Charles Darwin himself admits that “a belief in all-pervading spiritual agencies seems to be universal.”<sup>2</sup>

Accepting the conclusion, therefore, that man is by nature religious, the question remains, How can this fact be accounted for? Philosophers may amuse themselves with the theory that it is due to his losing a tail and learning to talk ; but all who acknowledge the reign of law, and insist on seeking a cause for an effect, will see in it a proof that, as even heathen poets taught, man is in a special sense the offspring of God.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> “Origin and Growth of Religion,” lect. ii

<sup>2</sup> “Descent of Man,” part iii., chap. xxi.

This conclusion suggests the inquiry why it is that he is so unworthy of his origin. Were there a competent court to issue the writs, what damages human nature might obtain in libel actions against biological science and Augustinian theology ! Bad as it is to proclaim that man is the child of an anthropoid ape, it is almost worse to declare that, through and through, and in every sense, he is only and altogether bad. True it is that the history of the race has been black and hateful. No less true is it that wrong-doing is easy, whereas well-doing calls for sustained effort. But in this connection such facts, important though they be, are not everything. In a real sense the truest test of a man is not what he does, but what he approves ; not what he is, but what he would wish to be. Vicious indulgence may have so depraved him that vice seems no longer vicious. Just as his physical faculties may be destroyed by abuse, so his conscience may become "seered as with a hot iron." But this is an abnormal condition.

<sup>1</sup> The words of Aratus (τοῦ γὰρ καὶ γένος ἐσμὲν) are quoted in Acts xvii. 28. Twice again the Apostle Paul quotes from heathen poets. In 1 Cor. xv. 33, "Evil communications corrupt good manners," is from the Comic poet Menander, who possibly took it from Euripides. And in Titus i. 12, he quotes Epimenides (Alford).

What is called the "moral" law is so described because it is the law of our being. It was not the commandment which made thieving wrong. It was because it was wrong that the commandment was given. It has been said, indeed, by a modern disciple of Hobbes, that "Thou shalt not steal" is merely the selfish precept of the hog in the clover to warn off the hog outside the fence. But such teaching is the outcome of a reprobate mind, and merely exemplifies the fact that a man may sink morally to the level of a hog. But, it may be urged, we can point to communities that see no evil in theft. True ; and we could also point to a nation whose women have stumps instead of feet. But let the lowest savage and the Chinese woman be removed in infancy from the influences which distort the conscience of the one and the limbs of the other, and in both cases nature will assert itself.

A full discussion of this problem would fill a volume. But no such discussion is necessary here. For no infidel will raise the question; and in the case of the believer an appeal to Scripture should settle it. Its testimony is clear: "When Gentiles which have no law do by nature the things of the law, these, having no law, are a law unto themselves; in that they show the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience bearing witness therewith, and their thoughts one with another accusing or else excusing them."<sup>1</sup>

Words could not be plainer. A heathen, though destitute of a Divine revelation, has a knowledge of good and evil, for that is inherent in man. That such a knowledge was implanted in him by his Creator will be very generally admitted, but the popularity of a belief is no pledge of its truth. According to Scripture man was created innocent, and it was his lapse from innocency that brought him the knowledge of evil.

But the knowledge of good and evil would not

<sup>1</sup> Rom. ii. 14-15, R.V. It may be useful to note that it is not the law, but the work of the law, which is written in man's heart by nature.

of itself make man religious. He was religious before he acquired that knowledge, and the atheistic evolutionist is theoretically right in holding that he might possess it now apart from religion. The fact is that what is so commonly mistaken for "conscience" is but a subordinate characteristic of conscience. For it is what may be termed God-consciousness, and not the knowledge of good and evil, which constitutes man a religious being; and it was this that the Creator implanted in him when He made him a spiritual being.

Here then is the question: Man being the "offspring of God," and having instincts befitting his origin, how is it that he does not always choose the good and turn from the evil? Who will dare to answer that it is because he cannot? Not the Christian, certainly; for his Scriptures assert the responsibility of man; and indeed the whole doctrine of future judgment is based upon that truth. Nor yet the infidel, for the dignity of humanity is his favourite theme. But the fact remains that while some, not only among Pagans, but even among those who, like Renan for example, affect to ignore all religions, can lead worthy and excellent lives, these are few and exceptional. The lives of the vast majority of men are evil. And they choose the evil in spite of knowing that it is evil, and in spite of a fitful desire to shun it. Apart from special depravity, a man's higher nature turns towards the good even while he yields to the evil. He praises virtue though he practises vice. It is his will that is paralysed, not his judgment. He is like a bird with a broken wing, whose instincts prompt it to fly while it flounders helplessly on the ground. Man has instincts<sup>1</sup> and aspirations which indicate for him a noble origin and a still nobler destiny, but yet he is practically a failure. How is this to be accounted for? In the whole range of nature, man excepted, there is nothing to correspond with it. It must of course be due to the operation of some law which applies only to the human race. All other creatures fulfil the patent purpose of their being : man alone not merely falls short of this but outrages it. How is this mystery to be explained ?

<sup>1</sup> I speak of a religious instinct with knowledge of what Professor Max Müller and others have urged against the expression ("Origin of Religion," lecture iv.). But if I might venture to do so, I would express a doubt whether the objector always distinguishes between "instinct" and "faculty." It is not instinct which enables a duckling to swim; but it is instinct which leads it to seek the water.

It may be said perhaps that man's vices are merely the natural propensities of the brute from which he is derived. But here we can silence the evolutionist once again by appealing to the phenomena of religion. The religious instincts of the race are certainly not derived from the brute, and it is precisely in this sphere that the corruption and perversity of human nature are most manifest. If it were merely a question of animal-worship among Pagan races, the evolutionist might again bring in his theories. But the fact to be explained is that, in the most advanced civilisations, whether of classic heathendom or of modern Christendom, religion has invariably tended to degenerate, and to make its votaries a prey to superstition.

Let us approach the matter from another standpoint. The bird is unable to fly : is it unreasonable to suppose that some mishap must have occurred to it ? Let us then tentatively adopt the suggestion that some disaster in the moral and spiritual sphere befell the human race in primeval times; and let us consider what results might be expected as the consequence of such a catastrophe? Man's moral equilibrium would of course be disturbed. The machinery of his moral being would, so to speak, be thrown out of gear. But the effect upon his spiritual nature, by reason of its greater delicacy and sensitiveness, would be absolutely disastrous. A broken water-pipe may in a measure serve its purpose, but no electricity will pass along a broken wire.

And is not this precisely in accordance with experience? In the sphere of morals men differ vastly from one another. Apart from Christianity altogether, some men lead pure and excellent lives. Others are steeped in vice. And the fact that some are moral is proof that all might be so. In this limited sphere, indeed, we may, even at the risk of being made the quarry in a heresy hunt, adopt the dogma of Pelagius, "That as man has ability to sin, so has he also not only ability to discern what is good, but likewise to desire it and to perform it." And the truth of this is recognised when our selfish interests are involved.

If a man steals his neighbour's cash, he goes to gaol ; for "original sin" is no defence to a criminal charge. True it is that a thief comes in time to weaken his moral power to keep his hands out of his neighbour's pocket. But prison discipline is rightly deemed a useful tonic in such a case. And what the fear of human judgment is to the criminal, the fear of Divine judgment is intended to be to the sinner. But orthodoxy so dings it into men's ears that they have no power to live moral and virtuous lives, that they naturally believe it, and cease to make the effort. That they can, but will not, is the righteous basis of the judgment that awaits them.

The vital error of the Pelagian heresy was the application of it in the spiritual sphere. But in the fifth century, revealed truth had been swamped by theology, and the distinction was ignored. A traveller who has missed his way in a forest can stand upright and walk like a man ; but so long as the heavens are shut out from his view, he cannot direct his steps, he is lost. The morality of Saul of Tarsus, the profane persecutor, was as unimpeachable as that of Paul, the inspired apostle ;

but his splendid morality only served to bring into stronger relief the depth of his spiritual blindness and depravity.<sup>1</sup>

Man, then, is a religious being, not moral, merely, but religious. And he is religious because he is spiritual. Here is the parting of the ways, where we must break once for all with the mere evolutionist. It is idle for him to talk to us of "embryonic developments" — dog's teeth and donkey's ears, and any amount besides. Even if we accept his account of the origin of man's animal structure, the fact remains that the spiritual element in his complex being must have come from God.

<sup>1</sup> Some people are held in high esteem by all who do not know them: the Apostle Paul could appeal to those who had known him from his youth (Acts xxvi. 4, 5). "I have lived in all good conscience before God until this day," he could declare in the scene of his early life (xxiii. 1). His life throughout had been blameless (ἄμεμπτος: Phil. iii. 6). Never perhaps did any other mere man live a life so perfect. Therefore it was he wrote the words: "Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief" (1 Tim. i. 15). The claim to stand forth as "first" (πρωτός), in all the long line of sinners, was not inspired (as with thousands who since have adopted the words) by "the pride that apes humility;" it was due to the fact that while he had had advantages which raised him above all other men, his religion had served only to make him a God-hater, "a blasphemer and a persecutor." Mere religion always drags a man down spiritually.

But this only serves to emphasise our difficulties. Were we to reason out the matter a priori, we should expect to find complete unity in the religious beliefs of the race, and they would have for us the same certainty as the truths and facts which are apparent to reason or the senses. And further, religion would always and inevitably tend to elevate and ennoble mankind. But if we could imagine any so ignorant and simple as to cherish such dreams, the records of the past and the facts of life on earth should bring them a rude awakening. As for the religious beliefs of the world, there is nothing too crude, too wild, too false, too monstrous, to find enthusiastic adherents. And whenever a great teacher has appeared, and has sought to elevate the religion of men, his system has soon been perverted and depraved.

It has ever been so. Of the early Egyptian religion, all that was sublime was demonstrably ancient, and its last stage was the grossest and most corrupt. In China the lofty system of ethics formulated by Confucius has suffered the utmost deterioration. In India the pure nature-worship of the Vedas has ended in superstitious puerilities. And the teaching of Gautama, sublime in its rejection of all idolatry and priestcraft, has ended in the gross asceticisms and superstitions of modern Buddhism. The Divine revelation of Judaism was degraded to the level of "the Jew's religion," which made that race the common enemy of God and His people. And Christianity itself has been almost swamped by the religion of Christendom, that tangled skein of Divine truth and Pagan superstition.

The whole history of the race records no exception to the rule. It is a law, like that of gravitation, that religion ever tends to degenerate, and in its decadence to corrupt and deprave mankind. This subject will claim further notice in these pages. The question here is, What explanation can be given of facts so patent and yet so extraordinary?

In the moral sphere we have to account for the phenomenon of a right judgment thwarted and violated. But in the spiritual sphere the problem is stranger still. It is not that the bird has a broken wing, but that instead of endeavouring to soar, its normal instinct is utterly perverted, and it clings to the ground and even struggles to burrow into it. How is this mystery to be accounted for? Only one solution of it has ever been proposed, and that is the story of the Eden Fall. And that explanation is so entirely reasonable and adequate that if it had been left for some thinker to suggest it, the discovery might well have evoked an exclamation such as that with which Huxley is said to have greeted the Darwinian theory of the origin of species, "How stupid not to have thought of that!"<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> I do not stop to inquire whether the story of the Fall should be taken literally or as an allegory, for I desire to avoid here all side issues. If any choose to regard the forbidden tree as a "sacrament" (I use the word in the classical, not the superstitious, sense), it will not affect the argument.

CHAPTER IV

ONE of the most obvious consequences of the conclusion reached in the last chapter is neglected or refused by many who profess to accept that conclusion most unreservedly. If it be the spiritual side of man's complex being that has suffered most by the disaster which has befallen him, it is here that the result will be most apparent. And while his moral nature may be capable of self-adjustment, we shall expect to find that, in the spiritual sphere, he is absolutely dependent upon a Divine revelation. In fact, nothing relating to man should be regarded with so much distrust as his religion, and yet this is precisely the sphere where self-satisfaction most prevails. The phenomenon is all the stranger because every one is convinced that all religions are wrong save one; the exception of course being the particular cult of which he himself is a votary.

And the unanimity felt by people who agree becomes to them a strong confirmation of their faith. After shouting "Great is Diana of the Ephesians!" "with one voice for about the space of two hours," the worship of Diana is raised to the level of "things that cannot be spoken against."<sup>1</sup>

At the close of his Essays on Religion, John Stuart Mill states thus the result of his argument: "It follows that the rational attitude of a thinking mind towards the supernatural, whether in natural or revealed religion, is that of scepticism as distinguished from belief on the one hand and from atheism on the other." This position is generally regarded as hostile to faith; but our nature being what it is, it becomes a test and safeguard of faith. No matter how excellent my chronometer may be, I am glad at all times to test it by the sun in the heavens. And as I belong to a fallen race, and it is in the sphere of religion that the effects of the catastrophe are most felt, I ought to be ever ready to test my religious tenets by whatever standard is the true one. Men may differ as to the standard, and as to how the testing process should be carried out, but all will agree upon the principle here enunciated.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Acts xix. 34-36.

What guarantee have we that the religion which prevails in Christendom to-day is true? To many the very statement of the question will seem scandalous and profane. They will set themselves angrily to shout it down, as the Ephesian Diana worshippers treated what they deemed to be the Christian heresy. But thoughtful people will welcome the inquiry. Assuming that Christianity is a Divine revelation, the question still remains, How far may we not have departed from "the faith once for all delivered"? We know how we can test our chronometers. Is there any standard by which we can test our religion?

"All who profess and call themselves Christians" will reply with united voice in pointing us to the Bible. But this unanimity is merely apparent, not real. The vast majority of Christians will object to our appealing to the Bible directly and immediately. We must in turning to it subject our minds to an authority that claims to be its interpreter. Every citizen is supposed to know the laws of his country ; but though the statute-book is the standard of authority, the interpretation of the statutes does not depend on the citizen's private reading of them, but on the decisions of competent tribunals. So also in the religious sphere. The Bible is the only, as it is the infallible, standard of faith and practice, but the Church claims to be its authorised exponent.

<sup>1</sup> To the evolutionist this argument should appeal with irresistible force. If man is struggling from the brute condition towards God he is doubly dependent on some higher authority to guide him in all that pertains to religion.

At first sight nothing can be simpler than this, nothing more reasonable, nothing more practical. But no sooner do we attempt to act upon it than difficulties overwhelm us. What is the Church? and where are we to find it? There are rival claimants to the title ; to which of them shall it be accorded? Answer will be made that the Eastern Church is heretical. But what tribunal has so decided? And by what standard? The tribunal, we shall be told, was the Catholic Church, and the standard was the common faith. But this is a most transparent begging of the question. What took place was that the head of the Western Church excommunicated the Eastern Church for refusing to acknowledge his supremacy, which supremacy the Eastern Church denounces as "the chief heresy of the latter days." Which, then, is in the right?

If we appeal to the Church of England, her answer will be definite and clear, that both are wrong, and that they have "erred, not only in their living and manners of ceremonies, but also in matters of faith."<sup>1</sup> Nor need we look to the Church of England to claim for herself the place she refuses to accord to any other Church, of being "the witness and keeper" of the truth. Hers is the humbler position of being "a witness and a keeper of Holy Writ"; and to that supreme authority she appeals as the only sanction for her practice and her teaching.<sup>2</sup>

But, we are told, Christ did not write a book; He founded a Church; and He speaks in and through the Church; our part, therefore, is to commit ourselves to the Church's teaching and guidance.

<sup>1</sup> Article xix.

<sup>2</sup> Article xx.

This is merely an attempt to get behind the question which it pretends to solve. How do I know that Christ founded a Church? And how do I know that I can trust myself to the teaching of what claims to be the Church? The only possible answer to these questions is an appeal either to the Church itself or else to the New Testament. If the former, then I am to trust the Church because the Church claims my confidence—a flagrant case of what in another sphere is known as “the confidence trick.” If the latter, then by all means let me turn to the New Testament. But no “thimble-rigging” can be tolerated here. If the Church speaks with inherent authority, I must render unreasoning obedience to her teaching; but if she appeals to Holy Scripture, she must place an open Bible in my hands.<sup>1</sup>

If we accept the former alternative we find ourselves again at the point from which the argument has moved away. What, and where, is the Church? Is this question to be decided by a plebiscite? Are we to be content to settle it by blindly joining the biggest crowd? Or are we to yield to whichever authority presents its claims with the greatest arrogance? It is not thus that in sublunary affairs the thoughtful direct their conduct. But it is precisely thus that in highly-favoured England, in this enlightened age, people of culture decide a question which concerns their eternal destiny!

<sup>1</sup> Such is the position assumed by the Reformers in the plain language of Articles xix., xx., and xxi.

If our choice must be limited to one or other of the two most ancient Churches, it is extraordinary that educated Englishmen, acquainted with the history of both, should hesitate for a moment which to choose. That Rome should loom greater in our view is natural, but that Rome should engross our attention can be accounted for only by our insular ignorance and prejudice. For, as Dean Stanley writes—

“That figure which seemed so imposing when it was the only one which met our view, changes all its proportions when we see that it is overtopped by a vaster, loftier, darker figure behind. If we are bent on having dogmatical belief and conservative tradition to its fullest extent, we must go, not to the Church which calls itself Catholic, but to the Church which calls itself Orthodox.”<sup>1</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> “Eastern Church,” p. 45.

And yet the fact is clear that in a book addressed to English readers the Eastern Church may be ignored as absolutely as though it had no existence.

Papal supremacy is the special characteristic of the Western Church. Even if the history of Christendom had run differently, and this dogma was accepted by Christians of every name, a sceptic would be none the less entitled to ask on what authority it rests. Christ, we are told, entrusted to the Apostle Peter the keys of the Church, thus conferring upon him the primacy of the Church. Peter became Bishop of Rome, and every after-occupant of the See of Rome has succeeded to the Primacy. The Bishop of Rome, therefore, is supreme Pontiff, Christ's Vicar upon earth. By all means let us investigate this without prejudice or passion. Let us refuse to be influenced by the fact that some of those who have filled the Papal throne were shameless profligates of infamous character. Let us refuse also to take account of the high personal qualities of its present occupant. And his environment is nothing to us. Gorgeous vestments, a magnificent ceremonial, regal dignity and pomp—all these serve but to prove the faith of those who accept his claims. What concerns us is the evidence on which those claims are based.

Suppose it be conceded that the Apostle Peter held the place thus claimed for him, what ground is there for believing that his successors in the See of Rome had equal precedence and power? The only ground is that they themselves have asserted it, and that half Christendom has yielded them the position. Evidence there is absolutely none. What ground, again, is there for believing that the Apostle Peter was ever the Bishop of Rome? The only ground is that the Roman Church asserts it. Evidence there is absolutely none.

Indeed the very statement itself implies an anachronism as glaring as if it were asserted that the apostle was a cardinal. Of course there must have been bishops in the Church in Rome, as in the other Churches, but the thought of a bishop with a diocese, or see, belongs to post-apostolic times; the New Testament knows nothing of it. And as Dean Alford bluntly says, "The episkopoi of the New Testament have officially nothing in common with our bishops." <sup>1</sup>

Moreover the bishops were appointed by an apostle, and therefore if Peter was a bishop in Rome he must, instead of being superior to any of his brethren, have become subordinate to them all—a complete reductio ad absurdum.

It is proverbially difficult to prove a negative; but the absence of all reference to Peter in Romans makes it reasonably certain that he had no relations with the Church in Rome when that Epistle was written: the last chapter of The Acts makes it practically certain that he was not in Rome during Paul's first imprisonment; and the last chapter of 2 Timothy leaves no doubt whatever that he was not there during Paul's last imprisonment. And to turn to a witness of post-apostolic times, Clement of Rome, will confirm us in this conclusion. He was admittedly bishop of the Church in Rome before the end of the first century, and his Epistle to the Corinthians is admittedly genuine. Can any honest-minded man believe that his Epistle was written with the knowledge that the Apostle Peter had ever preceded him in the bishopric? <sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> "Gr. Test. Com.," 1 Tim. iii. 1. He adds: "The identity of ἐπίσκοπος and πρεσβύτερος in apostolic times is evident from Titus i. 5-7." See Appendix IV., Note I.

Lastly, what ground is there for supposing that the Apostle Peter was entrusted with the keys of the Church? The only ground is the fact that to him were given "the keys of the kingdom of heaven," and that that Church which proudly boasts of being the keeper of Holy Writ is so crassly ignorant of Scripture that it confounds "the kingdom of heaven" with the Church!

Every well-instructed Sunday-school child is aware that the book which records these words is the Hebrew Gospel, "The book of the generation of Jesus Christ, the son of David, the son of Abraham"<sup>1</sup>—in a word, the book which presents Him as Israel's Messiah. It deals only with the favoured nation—the covenant people—to the exclusion of Gentiles altogether. The gospel of the Grace of God is not in it. The very word "Grace" does not occur in it even once. And the reason why the Apostles were twelve in number was because the "tribes of Israel" were twelve in number.<sup>2</sup> And among the twelve, Peter held the foremost place. To him were committed "the keys of the kingdom of the heavens"—an expression that is used only in connection with Israel.<sup>3</sup> To him, therefore, it was that, at Pentecost, the

<sup>1</sup> The letter in question was written in the name, not of Clement, but of the Church in Rome. The only reference which it contains to Peter is in the following passage: "Peter by unjust envy underwent not one or two, but many labours, and thus having borne testimony unto death, he went unto the place of glory which was due to him."

<sup>1</sup> Matt. i. 1.

<sup>2</sup> Matt. xix. 28.

<sup>3</sup> The expression occurs only in Matthew. In the loose way of reading Scripture which prevails, it is wrongly taken as synonymous with the "kingdom of God." But the one is strictly limited to the kingdom in its earthly aspect; the other embraces the entire sphere of God's rule and action in relation to the earth. Therefore it is that sometimes they may be used interchangeably, just as sometimes the same things may be averred of England and of the British Empire. And if the accurate Bible student will examine the passages in Matthew where "kingdom of God" occurs he cannot fail to see that "kingdom of heaven" could not be used (viz., Matt. vi. 33; xii. 28; xix. 24; xxi. 31 and 43). Take, ex. gr., the last: although the kingdom of heaven has been (temporarily) taken from the Jew, it could not be said that it would be given to proclamation of the great amnesty to Israel was entrusted.<sup>1</sup> And when "the word which God sent unto the children of Israel" was to be carried to Gentile proselytes,<sup>2</sup> he was the appointed messenger. Throughout what theologians describe as "the Hebraic portion" of the Acts, his ministry is pre-eminent. He is the foremost, the commanding figure. But when Israel proved again impenitent and finally rejected the gospel of the kingdom, the very name of "the Apostle of the Circumcision" disappears from the narrative.<sup>3</sup>

Nay more, it disappears from the New Testament, save for his two Epistles addressed to "the elect who are sojourners of the Dispersion,"<sup>4</sup> that is of Israel; and again for that passage in the Epistle to the Galatians, which proves to demonstration that he had no precedence whatever except in relation to Israel. In the Gentile Church another nation. But the Lord's actual words were fulfilled when the gospel turned from the Jew to the Gentile.

<sup>1</sup> Acts ii. 22; iii. 12.

<sup>2</sup> Acts x. 36.

<sup>3</sup> Peter is named only once in the last sixteen chapters of Acts (viz., in xv. 7) whereas in the first twelve chapters his name occurs no less than fifty-six times.

<sup>4</sup> 1 Peter i. 1; and 2 Peter iii. 1. See R.V.

of this Gentile dispensation the pre-eminence is with "the Apostle of the Gentiles."<sup>1</sup>

We are not dealing here with deep theological problems beyond the power of common men to investigate. And the conclusion is clear; first, that even if it could be shown that Peter was "the Vicar of Christ on earth," the fact would give no such precedence or dignity to the Roman Popes—a bishop might as well claim to be a cardinal or a marquis because his predecessor in the see wore the hat of the one or the coronet of the other; secondly, that the story that Peter was ever Bishop of Rome is the merest legend, and absolutely inconsistent with his office of Apostle; and, thirdly, that the figment of his having had a position of supreme authority in the Church is exploded by the very Scripture to which appeal is made in its support.

Some errors are based on misread passages of Scripture. Others grow up apart from Scripture altogether, and Scripture is afterwards perverted to support them. In this latter category is the figment of the supremacy of Rome. It had its origin in the pride begotten of citizenship in the Imperial city—in what Augustine himself described as “the insolence of the city of Rome.”<sup>1</sup> Such is the foundation upon which rests the claim of the Pope to be the Vicar of Christ on earth. And yet his pretensions are acknowledged, not merely by ignorant peasants and superstitious women, but by educated and sensible men; by men reputed to be thinkers and scholars; by some even who are trained lawyers, holding high judicial offices. How, then, is the phenomenon to be accounted for? In presence of such facts evolution-talk is idle. When human ingenuity can suggest an answer, it will claim consideration. Meanwhile the story of the Eden fall holds the field.

<sup>1</sup> No one can read Gal. ii. 1-14 without recognising this.

<sup>1</sup> Until I came to pen these pages I had not read any Roman Catholic work on this subject; and I have always supposed that a fair primâ facie case could be made out for the Papal claims. But a perusal of Rev. Luke Rivington’s “Primitive Church and the See of Peter”—a work of high repute, to which Cardinal Vaughan has contributed a preface—has destroyed that illusion. Any one who is versed in Holy Scripture or accustomed to deal with evidence will search these 480 pages in vain for either. All that the writer proves may be freely conceded—namely, that the Pope has been acknowledged by vast numbers of people from very early times.

CHAPTER V

A THEORY, a legend, and a blunder—such, as we have seen, are the pillars upon which rest the proud pretensions of the great Western Church of Christendom. And the discovery may well lead us to distrust the Church's teaching, and fearlessly to investigate the truth of every dogma for which she claims our faith.

The incarnation of Christ; His death as a propitiatory sacrifice for human sin; His resurrection from the dead; His ascension; His session at the right hand of God; His coming again to judgment; the sending of the Holy Spirit; regeneration and remission of sins by the sacrament of baptism; the maintenance of grace by the sacrament of the Eucharist—the efficacy of both sacraments being dependent on the continuance in the Church of a body of men mystically endowed as successors of the apostles, and empowered to forgive sins and to mediate on behalf of Christ between the sinner and God—such are, in brief, the chief doctrines of the religion of Christendom. Are they true? And on what ground are they presented to our faith?

If true, they are without exception transcendent truths; it is idle therefore to appeal to human experience or human authority in their support. Scepticism is here the only rational attitude of mind. A Divine revelation alone can justify our accepting them. Have we such a revelation? And will an appeal to it convince us of their truth? To the first of these questions Christians of every name and creed will reply in perfect unison. But when we come to the second our suspicions will be aroused, not only by the fact that some of these doctrines the Churches of the Reformation repudiate, but also by the reluctance of those who champion them to permit an unfettered appeal to the authority on which they are supposed to rest. The Church is to limit and control our access to the Scriptures, either directly, in virtue of its own mystical authority—one of the very points at issue—or else indirectly, by insisting that we shall interpret the Scriptures in accordance with the writings of the Fathers.

Scripture, we are told, is “reverenced as paramount.” “The Old and New Testaments are the fountain, the Catholic Fathers the channel, through which it has flowed down to us. The contrast, then, in point of authority is not between Holy Scripture and the Fathers, but between the Fathers and us.” They are not “equalled, much less preferred, to Holy Scripture, but only to ourselves: i.e., the ancient to the modern, the waters near the fountain to the troubled estuary rolled backward and forward by the varying tide of human opinion, and rendered brackish by the continued contact with the bitter waters of the world.”<sup>1</sup>

This is the language of a teacher than whom no one has borne bolder testimony to the supreme authority and value of Holy Scripture. In the preface to his Daniel the Prophet, Dr. Pusey writes: "No book can be written in behalf of the Bible like the Bible itself. Man's defences are man's word; they may help to beat off attacks, they may draw out some portion of its meaning. The Bible is God's Word, and through it God the Holy Ghost, who spake it, speaks to the soul which closes not itself against it." That he who wrote these words should thus seek to identify the Bible with the writings of men gives proof how well he knew that, apart from the writings of men, the Bible would lend no sanction to the system with which his name is associated.

<sup>1</sup> “Library of the Fathers,” vol. i. Preface.

Let us apply this principle in another sphere. "Nature is revered as paramount. But we should interpret nature by the great Masters of the past. The contrast in point of authority is not between nature and the Masters, but between the Masters and us. They are not equalled, much less preferred to nature, but only to ourselves." If successive generations of artists had acted on this principle for centuries, modern art would probably bear the same relation to nature that theology now bears to Holy Writ.

And yet how plausible it is! It seems the perfection of reasonableness. The simple reader might suppose that in regard to doctrine and practice the Fathers were agreed. But the Fathers differed, and the Churches with which they were severally connected differed; and their differences led to many a division, many a feud. And so Dr. Pusey goes on to warn us that no Father in particular is to be accepted as our guide, but we are to follow them only so far as their teaching was "universally received." "It is this only," he adds, "which according to Vincentius' invaluable rule, was received 'by all, in all Churches, and at all times,' which has the degree of evidence upon which we can undoubtedly pronounce that it is Apostolic." More plausible still! But, in fact, it is but dust flung into our eyes. If the "Catholic faith" is to be thus limited to doctrines universally accepted, we shall jettison at once not a few of the Pagan superstitions which are "undoubtedly pronounced to be Apostolic;" but with them will disappear also such vital truths as the divinity of Christ and the atonement, and we shall be left with nothing but what is called "the Apostles' Creed," which asserts neither the one nor the other of these great fundamental doctrines of the Christian faith.<sup>1</sup>

And who is to decide for us what is the residuum of mingled truth and error which is to serve as a creed by which we shall mould our character and shape our course in view of the solemnities of our existence? The most honoured of the Fathers were men whose minds were impregnated by the superstitions of Pagan religion, and the subtleties of Pagan philosophy: are we to assume that nineteen centuries of the Christian religion have so enfeebled or depraved the intellect of Christendom that we are less capable of understanding the Scriptures than they were? They were "near the fountain" of Christianity, forsooth; yes, but they were nearer still to the cesspool of Paganism. And inquiry will show that it is to the cesspool that we should attribute every perversion of the truth which to-day defaces what is called the Christian religion.

<sup>1</sup> I would not be understood as saying that the framers of the creed did not hold these truths. I merely refer to the fact that the creed does not assert them. Hence its universal acceptance; for Arians, Unitarians, and Sadducees of all sorts, can place their own meaning on it.

The Christian turns to the Bible to hear in it the voice of his living Saviour and Master and Lord, who, by the Holy Spirit, sent down from heaven to that very end, "speaks" in and through that Word, "to the soul which closes not itself against it." But the founder of this religious system is the Buddha of Christendom, who died nineteen centuries ago, the pure waters of whose teaching are now dissipated in "the troubled estuary rolled backward and forward by the varying tide" of the opinions of the Fathers, and "rendered brackish by the continued contact with the bitter waters" of a corrupt and apostate Church.

Let those who thus appeal to the Fathers hear the Fathers. No one among them is held in higher esteem than Chrysostom. The most famous of the Greek Fathers, he has been canonised by the Roman Church; and both Greek and Roman Churches celebrate his festival. And with abundant reason. For he lived a pure and noble life in an age when this much-vaunted "primitive Church" was characterised by shameless profligacy and corruption. Here is Chrysostom's testimony to the Scriptures :—

"And why does he bid all Christians at that time to betake themselves to the Scriptures? Because at that time, when heresy hath got possession of those Churches, there can be no proof of true Christianity, nor any other refuge for Christians wishing to know the true faith but the Divine Scriptures. For before it was shown in many ways which was the Church of Christ, and which heathenism; but now it is known in no way to those who wish to ascertain which is the true Church of Christ, but only through the Scriptures. Why? Because all those things which are properly Christ's in the truth, those heresies have also in their schism: Churches alike, the Holy Scripture alike, bishops alike, and the other orders of clergy, baptism alike, the eucharist alike, and everything else; nay, even Christ Himself. Therefore, if any one wishes to ascertain which is the true Church of Christ, whence can he ascertain it, in the confusion arising from so great a similitude, but only by the Scriptures? . . .

"Therefore the Lord, knowing that such a confusion of things would take place in the last days, commands on that account, that the Christians who are in Christianity, and desirous of availing themselves of the strength of the true faith, should betake themselves to nothing else but the Scriptures; otherwise, if they should look to other things, they shall stumble and perish, not understanding which is the true Church."<sup>1</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> "Matt. Hom." xliii.

These were the words of the most famous of the Greek Fathers: now let us hear the testimony of Augustine, the most famous of the Latin Fathers. He says—

“I declare unto you that the Holy Scriptures which are called canonical, are the only books in the world to which I have learned to pay such honour and reverence, that I most firmly believe that none of their authors has committed any error therein. Other authors are read by me with the persuasion that however they may excel in holiness and learning, what they write is not true because they write it, but because they can prove it to be true either by Scripture or reason.”<sup>1</sup>

In “all things that pertain to life and godliness” the words of Holy Writ are so simple and clear that a little child can grasp their meaning. Thus the apostle could write to Timothy, “From a child thou hast known the Holy Scriptures which are able to make thee wise unto salvation.” But who is to interpret the Fathers for us? Rival schools of Christian thought appeal to them in support of their opposing tenets; who, then, is to arbitrate between them? And by what standard? And why should we turn from what is plain and simple to writings which are a maze of mingled heresy and truth?

<sup>1</sup> Wordsworth's “Church History,” vol. iii. p. 222.

“Near the fountain!” These men talk as though the apostles left behind them a pure and united Church, and the Ante-Nicene Fathers had entered without a break upon the heritage. But what are the facts? “While the apostles wrote, the actual state of the visible tendencies of things showed too plainly what Church history would be.” The quotation is from the Bampton Lectures for 1864, one of the most valuable works in our standard theological literature; and the writer goes on to say—

“I know not how any man, in closing the Epistles, could expect to find the subsequent history of the Church essentially different from what it is. In those writings we seem, as it were, not to witness some passing storms which clear the air, but to feel the whole atmosphere charged with the elements of future tempest and death. Every moment the forces of evil show themselves more plainly. They are encountered, but not dissipated. . . .

“The fact which I observe is not merely that these indications of the future are in the Epistles, but that they increase as we approach the close, and after the doctrines of the gospel have been fully wrought out, and the fulness of personal salvation and the ideal character of the Church have been placed in the clearest light, the shadows gather and deepen on the external history. The last words of St.

Paul in the second Epistle to Timothy, and those of St. Peter in his second Epistle, with the Epistles of St. John and St. Jude, breathe the language of a time in which the tendencies of that history had distinctly shown themselves; and in this respect these writings form a prelude and a passage to the Apocalypse."<sup>1</sup>

In very truth those "last words" were wrung from men depressed by patent signs of general apostasy. The same apostle who had exulted in the fact that "all they which dwelt in Asia heard the word of the Lord Jesus,"<sup>2</sup> lived to pen the sad lament, "This thou knowest, that all they which are in Asia turned away from me."<sup>3</sup> And then, taking a still wider view of the condition of the Church, he indited the solemn forecast, "Evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived."<sup>4</sup> And for more than a century before Irenæus, the earliest of the Patristic theologians, appeared upon the scene, the leaven had been working. That heresies should be the subject of the only treatise we possess from his pen, may indicate the state into which the Church had

<sup>1</sup> Lecture viii.

<sup>2</sup> Acts xix. 10.

<sup>3</sup> 2 Tim. i. 15.

<sup>4</sup> 2 Tim. iii. 13.

already passed. "Dogs," "Evil workers," "the Concision,"<sup>1</sup> warned against even in apostolic times, increased in number and in influence, as the traditions of apostolic times lost their power in the Church. Such men were ever at work, lowering the standard of Christian life, and corrupting the purity and simplicity of the Christian faith and the Christian ordinances.

Error is a weed of rank and rapid growth. But it was not until more than a century after Irenæus had gone to his rest, when the last and fiercest of the persecutions had ended, and, with the advent of Constantine, the wolf of paganism openly assumed the sheep's clothing of "the Christian religion," that the errors, which were in the very warp and woof of that religion, began to ripen and spread unchecked; and ere another century had passed, the standard even of outward morality in the professing Church sank to the level of that of the heathen world.<sup>2</sup>

The Church of God is "built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets"; the Church of

<sup>1</sup> Phil. iii. 2.

<sup>2</sup> These words shall be established in the sequel. See especially Chap. X. post.

Christendom is built upon the foundation of the Latin Fathers. What the Apostle Paul was to the one, Augustine of Hippo was to the other. Though inferior to Jerome in learning, he was practically the founder of the Latin Church. The personal greatness of the man is beyond question. His writings give proof of it. Throughout the Middle Ages their authority was supreme, and their influence is felt to the present hour. Till yesterday his Confessions were known only to the theologian and the student; but, as one of the much advertised Hundred Best Books, the work now finds a place in thousands of English homes. But, as the inspired apostle wrote, "God accepteth no man's person," so we may fearlessly bring the teaching of Augustine to the test of Scripture.

Can any spiritually intelligent Christian read the Confessions without being struck by the ignorance it betokens of Christian doctrine? It reveals the experience of a great and pure and earnest soul reaching out after God in the midst of mists and darkness which the sunlight of Christianity would have dispelled. Intense reverence for God, and desire to please Him—these are manifest in it throughout. But it all savours of what the apostle describes as the effort to be "made perfect in the flesh." Indeed it is startling to notice how little there is of Christ in it all, even in the theology of it. It is possible of course that men unknown to fame, of whom no record has come down to us, may have been spiritually in advance of their ecclesiastical superiors. What is true in our own day may have been true in the days of the Fathers. But if the Patristic literature is to be our guide, the great truth of Grace disappeared from the Church with the Apostles who were its heralds. And ignorance of Grace will go far to account for the differences which marked the systems of Greek and Latin theology, and for the heresies by which the one and the other were corrupted.

Before the law of gravitation was discovered, various problems in astronomy were solved as clearly and accurately as they are to-day; but there was no unity in the science, and much pertaining to it was incomprehensible. And so, if Grace be unknown, various Christian doctrines may still be understood, but the central principle which binds them together is wanting, and there are elements not only of darkness, but even of seeming contradiction.

The truth of Grace having been lost, the doctrine of Divine wrath, eternal and inexorable, against human sin, became overwhelming and intolerable; and the theologies of the Fathers struggled to bridge over the chasm which separated God from men. The Greek school, under the influence of the Neo-Platonism of which Alexandria was the cradle and the home, leant towards the conception of a Deity "immanent" in the world, and especially in humanity. The incarnation, not the cross, was to them the climax of the Divine revelation to men. But though a climax it was not a crisis. It was rather the unfolding and display of the principle on which the Supreme had been working throughout the ages. Thus it was that God restored relations with the fallen race, alienated and lost by sin. Thus was humanity redeemed; for the true emblem of Redemption was not the Cross of Calvary, but the manger of Bethlehem. It was Paganism in a Christian dress.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> I refer here merely to the doctrine of redemption by incarnation, not to the general teaching of the Alexandrian school. Indeed there is, in many respects, more of Christianity in the writings of Clement than in those of most of the Latin Fathers.

The theology of the Latin Fathers, on the other hand, was governed by the old Platonic conception of the "transcendent" Deity, a God far removed from men; whose alienation, moreover, was rendered more terrible by the doctrine of original sin. In their view the benefits of the work of Christ were limited to a privileged few, and their system aimed at extending the number of that minority, and mitigating for them the perils of their position. The simple baptism of the New Testament—a public confession of Christ by those whom the gospel had won to the ranks of His disciples—was remodelled on Pagan lines,<sup>1</sup> as a mystical regeneration and cleansing from sin, bringing the sinner from under the storm-cloud of Divine wrath into the sphere where a mystically endowed priesthood could minister to him further grace.

For in this theology Divine sovereignty became sheer favouritism; election was degraded to mean no more than immunity from wrath; and grace, instead of being, as in the New Testament, the principle of the Divine action, and the characteristic of the Divine attitude towards mankind was regarded rather as a sort of spiritual electricity, to be communicated to the favoured few by ordinances which owed their validity to a sacerdotal class. The Church, which in their system meant the hierarchy, was the mediator between an alienated and angry God, and men depraved and doomed. The horrors of the system became further alleviated by the figment of a purgatory, prayers and masses for the dead, the invocation of saints, and all the superstitions which, to the present day, characterise the religion of Christendom. Paganism, again, in a Christian dress.

<sup>1</sup> See Chap. IX. post.

It is not that these conflicting views were taught thus plainly by all the leaders of the rival schools of Christian thought. Far from it. But in varying degrees the writings of all are tainted by them. Clement of Alexandria, rival claimant with Irenæus to the title of father of Greek theology, and Augustine of Hippo, so specially honoured by the Latin Church, are the most pronounced exponents of them. Though the fame of Clement is eclipsed by that of his brilliant disciple and successor as head of the Alexandrian catechetical school,<sup>1</sup> he remains to the present hour the "patron saint" of "the sect of the Sadducees." It was not till two centuries after his time that the Roman Church was moulded by Augustine into the form it has ever since maintained. Of all the errors that later centuries developed in her teaching there is scarcely one that cannot be found in embryo in his writings.<sup>2</sup>

"The Church to him," says the Dean of Canterbury, "was an external establishment, subjected to the autocracy of bishops, largely dependent on the opinion of Rome. It was a Church represented almost exclusively by a sacerdotal caste, cut off by celibacy from ordinary human interests, armed with fearful spiritual weapons, and possessing the sole right to administer a grace which came magically through none but mechanical channels. And this Church might, nay, was bound to, enforce the acceptance of its own dogmas and customs even in <sup>1</sup> Origen is really the founder of dogmatic theology. And, it may be added, he alone of the Greek Fathers, as Jerome of the Latin, could read the Hebrew Scriptures.

<sup>2</sup> No one of his predecessors, as Professor Harnack has somewhere said, in so determined and open a manner rested Christendom upon the authority of the Church, or confounded the living authority of Christ with the authority of the Church.

minute details and in outward organisation. It was justified in enforcing unity by using the arm of the State to fetter free consciences by cruel persecution. And outside this Church, with its many abuses, its few elect, its vast masses arbitrarily doomed to certain destruction, its acknowledged multitudes of ambitious, greedy, ignorant and unworthy priests—there was no salvation! Augustine substituted an organised Church and a supernatural hierarchy for an ever-present Christ. To Augustine more than to any one else is due the theory which is most prolific of the abiding curse inflicted on many generations by an arrogant and usurping priestcraft.

“The outward Church of Augustine was Judaic, not Christian. The whole Epistle to the Hebrews is a protest against it. And all that was most deplorable in this theology and ecclesiasticism became the most cherished heritage of the Church of the Middle Ages in exact proportion to its narrowest ignorance, its tyrannous ambition, its moral corruption, and its unscrupulous cruelty.”<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> “Lives of the Fathers,” vol. ii. p. 603.

CHAPTER VI

“THE extravagances which disfigure the record and practice of Buddhism are to be referred to that inevitable degradation which priesthoods always inflict upon great ideas committed to their charge.” Thus writes Sir Edwin Arnold, in the preface to his great Indian poem ; and the words may serve to “point a moral” here.

In its origin Buddhism was no more than “a mere system of morality and philosophy, founded on a pessimistic theory of life.”<sup>1</sup> It was lacking in the essential element of a religion, for it had no God. And yet it had much in common with Christianity. It resembled it notably in its repudiation of idolatry and priestcraft and asceticism, and in its contempt for everything unworthy, material, and base. And not only in these respects, but also in its doctrine of the "path," it comes nearer to Christianity than does the religion of Christendom. A man's acts and words, important though they be, are in one respect not so important as his aims, and the belief that inspires them. For his acts and words may be like the clothes he wears, assumed; but his aims bespeak the deeper currents of his inner life, and his beliefs are part and parcel of himself.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Sir Monier Williams, “Buddhism,” lect. xviii.

But though the teaching traditionally attributed to Gautama was thus beautiful and pure, the Buddhism of to-day is one of the most degraded forms of Paganism. But what concerns us here is to mark that, though Buddhism and Christianity have flowed in channels wholly separate, the corruptions of both are of the same type, both having developed errors and superstitions so precisely similar that the apparatus of the one cult could easily be adapted to the other. The following most striking language is used by Dr. Rhys Davids<sup>1</sup> in describing the Lamaism of Tibet:—

<sup>1</sup> The principles of "the noble eightfold path" are (1) right belief; (2) right aims; (3) right speech; (4) right actions; (5) right means of livelihood; (6) right endeavour; (7) right mindfulness; and (8) right meditation. The more this is studied the more will the order be approved.

“Lamaism, indeed, with its shaven priests, its bells, and rosaries, its images, and holy water, and gorgeous dresses ; its service with double choirs, and processions, and creeds, and mystic rites, and incense, in which the laity are spectators only ; its abbots and monks, and nuns of many grades ; its worship of the double Virgin, and of the saints and angels ; its fasts, confessions, and purgatory ; its images, its idols, and its pictures ; its huge monasteries, and its gorgeous cathedrals, its powerful hierarchy, its cardinals, its Pope, bears outwardly at least a strong resemblance to Romanism, in spite of the essential difference of its teachings, and of its mode of thought.”

Such is Buddhism in countries where it has made its home. Is it any wonder that when Roman Catholic missionaries settled in certain provinces of China, they were amazed to find all the externals of their own religion ready to their hand ; and that a change of images and of nomenclature alone seemed needed to “Christianise” the native cult?

But more than this, both Christianity and Buddhism in their decadence bear a family resemblance to the religions of classic Paganism, and to the old-world cults of Babylon and Egypt. What is common to all is the presence of some material representation of the God, a priesthood and an altar, and mystical rites and ceremonies of essentially kindred types.

<sup>1</sup> “Buddhism,” ch. ix.

This intensely interesting fact has escaped the attention it deserves. How is it to be accounted for? Evolution-talk about "cells and sacs and nerves" and "abnormal reversions" will throw no light on it. Neither dogs, nor donkeys, nor anthropoid apes, display the least appreciation of images, or priests, or millinery, or "incense used ceremonially." Therefore, even if it were only among degraded races that these frauds and fooleries of human religion prevailed, evolution could claim no hearing. Not so, indeed, if men turned naturally to atheism; for the lapse might fairly be described as an "abnormal reversion." But atheism is always a revolt against a false religion, and it never maintains its hold upon the minds of men. The problem here, however, is that the superstitions which prevail in the midst of Western civilisation are essentially identical with those of Buddhism in its most depraved form, and with those of the Pagan religions of the ancient world.

Quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus!

The same phenomena apparent everywhere, whether in ancient Babylon or in modern England ; whether in the decaying civilisations of the East or the advancing civilisation of the West. One explanation only is possible, and it is that already urged. Man is by nature the slave of perverted religious instincts. The existence of such instincts is proof of the Divine origin of the race ; the perversion of them is proof of a great catastrophe in its primeval history. Man is God's creature in a special sense ; but he is a fallen creature, and it is in his religion that the effects of the fall first and most declare themselves.

And not only is man, regarded as a spiritual being, thus subject to a law of "degeneration," but there is some mysterious influence which so guides the operation of that law, that it invariably leads to similar results. No matter what the point of departure, no matter what the environment, man's religion assumes the same phase, and displays the same general characteristics.

In a world so full of doubt it is not easy to find a "rough and ready" test by which to distinguish truth from error. But "Vincent's famous rule,"<sup>1</sup> already cited, will rarely fail us. The method of its application, however, must depend upon the sphere in which it is to be applied. Speaking generally, what mankind in the mass approves is seldom wrong. And the intuitive judgment of the many is not infrequently a safer guide than the reason of the few. But in one province, at least, the presumption is reversed. Quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus: In the religious sphere anything which satisfies this threefold test we may with reasonable confidence reject. It may generally be taken as an authentic "hall-mark" of falsehood.

In no other sphere save that of religion do men of intelligence and culture willingly subject their minds to delusions. The "historic Church" once tried to compel belief that this planet was the fixed centre of the solar system ; but who believes it now ? Men cannot be made to believe that water runs up-hill, or that five and five make anything but ten. In no other sphere can they be induced to stultify reason and common sense. But in religion there seems to be no limit to their credulity. And in every age, and in all kinds of different environments, credulity fastens, and feeds itself, upon errors and superstitions of a kindred type.

<sup>1</sup> See p. 57 ante. It is said that this "famous rule" was formulated by Vincent of Lerins as a caveat against the teaching of Augustine, who was distrusted by the Lerins school.

One exception only has there been to this rule. In the ages when His people were in a state of tutelage, God gave them a religion. It was a concession to the weakness of human nature. That Divine religion is expressly described as "a shadow of the good things to come," namely, Christianity ; for, to the spiritual discernment, Christ Himself was the sum and substance of it all. It was the only Divine religion the world has ever known ; for Christianity is not, strictly speaking, a "religion" at all, but a revelation and a faith. And how did it differ from human religions, not excepting that which calls itself

Christian? It differed essentially in these respects :—

(1) In the absence of any material representation of God.

(2) In the absence of mystical rites.

(3) In the absence of a mystically endowed priesthood.

(4) In the absence of tradition. It was based altogether upon a Divine revelation which every Israelite was expected to study and obey.

And though in their apostasy the Jews lapsed into idolatry, the evil was eradicated by the judgments which fell on them in the era of the Captivity ; and after the great revival under Ezra it never again declared itself. The post-Captivity apostasy was not due to idolatry, but to the prevalence of human tradition, by which, as the Lord declared, they “made the word of God of none effect,” “teaching for doctrines the commandments of men.”<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Matt. xv. 3, 6, 9. The Sermon on the Mount was largely a protest and a warning against the traditions by which the Scriptures were perverted. The Great Synagogue and the Great Sanhedrim were to the Jews' religion what the “historic Church” is to the Christians' religion. Therefore it was they had to be saved as

But never even in the darkest period of the nation's history was their religion corrupted by the Pagan conception of priesthood. "The Jews' religion" was, I repeat, an apostasy; but it never sank to the level to which "the Christians' religion" has fallen. It never knew the degradation of openly displaying those brand-marks of Paganism—mystical ordinances and a priesthood with mystical powers. "Sacraments"<sup>1</sup> abounded. The priest himself, the appointed rites which he discharged, the altars at which he ministered, the sacrifices which were offered on them, the shrine, and every detail of its divinely ordered furniture—each and all proclaimed some spiritual truth, and pointed forward to the Messiah who was the reality of every type, the substance of every shadow, of the national religion. But there was not a single act, a single rite, in the prescribed ritual, even for the high-priest himself, which the humblest Israelite really from their religion as from their sins—as the Apostle Peter declared, "redeemed from their vain manner of life received by tradition from their fathers" (1 Pet. i. 18).

<sup>1</sup> I use the word "sacrament" in the Christian sense, as an outward symbol of a spiritual truth—not in the Pagan sense, in which the religion of Christendom has adopted it (see "The Silence of God," Appendix IV., Note V.).

might not have discharged. The priest's position was unique, his privileges and duties were exclusively his own; but mystical powers he had absolutely none. The prophets in Israel were specially inspired. They uttered God-breathed words: they "spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." But if the members of the Aaronic house were, like the prophets, a class apart, it was solely and altogether in virtue of the Divine appointment which separated them to the service of the altar. In no respect did they differ from the people in whose behalf they ministered.

The book has yet to be written which will describe what Israel might have been, and the world would have been, had the favoured nation been true to the revelation God entrusted to them. Solomon's prophetic prayer at the dedication of the temple gives a transient glimpse of the vision.<sup>1</sup> Blessed with the knowledge of the true God in a world that had wilfully lost it, they would have been a rallying centre to which earnest souls of every kindred might have come to seek and find the light. Professing a sublime faith, and commending it by noble and blameless living, they would have been missionaries to all the nations. The traditions of Eden, which even now still linger in some of the old religions of the world, of a coming deliverer, destined to bring blessing to mankind, would have been voiced by every part of their national cult. But that ritual was maintained solely in the interests of a carnal and corrupt priesthood. False prophets were honoured in proportion to the audacity with which they pandered to the nation's pride, and God-sent messengers were persecuted and slain. Appeal followed appeal, warning succeeded warning, one judgment after another fell on them ; but all without avail. Their divinely taught religion, became utterly degraded and in its degradation dragged down the nation to still lower depths ; until at last, in the name of that religion—in the name of the God who gave it them—they became “ the betrayers and murderers ” of the Son of God.

<sup>1</sup> 1 Kings viii. and 2 Chron. vi.

And these were nominally “ the people of God,” and their priests were “ the priests of God ” ; and during His life on earth our blessed Lord acknowledged them, and called them to repentance on the ground of their divinely given promises and covenant. If ever there was a people who had seemingly a right to boast of knowing the true God, and of having a divinely ordained religion, it was the Hebrews. In every detail their cult was ordered by an express revelation. During all their pilgrimage from the house of bondage to the land of promise the tabernacle of Jehovah was in their midst. But what was the judgment of God who reads the heart? We here recall the words of the prophet, quoted by the martyr Stephen: "Have ye offered unto me slain beasts and sacrifices forty years in the wilderness? Yea, ye took up the tabernacle of Moloch."<sup>1</sup> Outwardly and with their hands they bore the tabernacle of Jehovah; but inwardly and with their hearts they were carrying the tabernacle of Moloch.

Who was the god they served when they stoned the prophets and persecuted the messengers of heaven? That god was Moloch, the god of blood; though Jehovah was the name by which they called him. Who was the god they served when they "killed the Prince of life"? That god was Moloch, though the name they gave him was Jehovah. The nation as a whole had in all respects the same ordinances, and used the same nomenclature, as those among them who were the true "Israel of God"; but they knew nothing of their spiritual significance; they were dead to their spiritual power.

<sup>1</sup> Acts vii. 42, 43. The suggestion that they had a Pagan shrine which they carried about with them in secret, is refuted by the whole testimony of Scripture. Heaven was not silent in that dispensation, and open apostasy was openly judged.

It will be said that the making of the golden calf is proof that the Jews were always idolaters, whereas the Christians' religion has a pure and spiritual worship. The plea will not avail. Idolatry in the sense this argument implies has no existence save perhaps among the more degraded races of mankind. The golden calf was to fill the place of Moses, not of God. But yesterday, Moses the mediator of the covenant had offered the sacrifice by which the covenant was dedicated, and now he had gone up to the Mount, where for forty days he remained with God.<sup>1</sup> The tabernacle had not yet been made: the daily ritual had not yet been appointed. So they cried out for something to represent to them and make vivid to their minds the solemnities of their religion. And to this end they made an effigy of the calf which was the appointed victim in the great sacrifice of the covenant<sup>1</sup>; and Aaron forthwith proclaimed a feast, but it was a feast to Jehovah.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Exod. xxiv.

It is the crassest stupidity to suppose that these men imagined that the image of the calf was the God of their deliverance. It was nothing but an outward symbol. It met the craving of man's fallen nature for something material in religion. It was idolatry, no doubt, but it was idolatry of the kind in which the Christians' religion is steeped. Altars and crucifixes, images and pictures, relics and the "hocus-pocus"<sup>3</sup> of the mass—these fill precisely the same place in the religion of Christendom which the golden calf was designed by Aaron to hold in the cult of Israel. But "God is Spirit,<sup>4</sup> and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit." All such idolatry is hateful to Him.<sup>5</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Comp. Heb. ix. 19 with Exod. xxiv.

<sup>2</sup> Exod. xxxii. 1-5.

<sup>3</sup> The derivation of the word is supposed to be the "hoc est corpus" of the mass.

<sup>4</sup> πνεῦμα ὁ Θεός, John iv. 24.

<sup>5</sup> Therefore "God gave them up," Acts vii. 42.

And are we to learn nothing from all this in our judgment of Christendom? The religion entrusted to the Jews was Divine, but yet "the Jews' religion" was false; false, moreover, although in externals it had right ordinances, and it used a correct nomenclature. Why, then, should we suppose that the religion of Christendom is different? Like apostate Judaism, it is a human religion based upon a Divine ideal; and, as we have seen, every human religion gravitates towards error and evil.

CHAPTER VII

THE great religions of the world appeal to sacred writings for their sanction. But the religion of Christendom differs in this respect from the religions of the East, that its pretended appeal to Scripture is but a juggler's trick. It claims our acceptance of doctrines which none but the credulous would believe on human testimony ; and when we demand to know when and where has God revealed them, the answer given us is that "He has founded a Church, and in and through the Church He speaks to us." When we seek authority for this we are referred back to Holy Scripture ; but when in turn we claim to be allowed access to Scripture, human tradition is foisted upon us instead. This sort of thing is well known in another sphere: "ringing the changes" is what the vulgar call it!

How different, this, from the attitude and language of the great men who, in the sixteenth century, sought to free England from the toils and tricks of priestcraft. Here are their words:—

"It is not lawful for the Church to ordain anything that is contrary to God's Word written; neither may it expound one place of Scripture, that it be repugnant to another. Wherefore although the Church be a witness and a keeper of Holy Writ, yet, as it ought not to decree anything against the same, so, besides the same, ought it not to enforce anything to be believed for necessity of salvation."<sup>1</sup>

This was precisely the question at issue in the sixteenth century. Obviously so; for the Reformation was essentially a revolt against the pretensions of "the Church," and an appeal to the supreme authority of Holy Scripture. Different sorts of men of course were moved by different motives. With the devout, the ruling influence was love of truth: with others, it was detestation of the Church's immoralities and tyrannies. As for Henry VIII., he cared little for either piety or morals. What he wanted was to be master in his own realm. Roman Catholics seek to discredit the movement in England by representing Henry as its leader. But they are on dangerous ground. They forget that it was from the Pope that Henry obtained the title of "Defender of the Faith." Immorality and hypocrisy were no bar to Papal favour. Let them paint the King as black as they can, and brand him as hypocrite and scoundrel, the fact remains that he was no worse than the man who then sat in "the chair of St. Peter." The vices of Henry VIII. were of a kind that the Church habitually condoned. But what shall be said of Paul III.? This "Vicar of Christ on earth," so far from being ashamed of his immoralities, flaunted them in the face of the world. The Duchies of Parma and Piacenza he conferred upon his illegitimate son Lewis, and he made provision for two of his grandsons, although they were schoolboys in their teens, by appointing them Cardinals.<sup>1</sup> These things need to be remembered in these days when the salaried servants of the Church of the Reformation are trying to undermine the work of the Reformation.

<sup>1</sup> Article xx.

<sup>1</sup> They were aged 15 and 14 respectively. Julius III., who, as Cardinal Del Monte, had presided for Paul III. at the Council of Trent, made a Cardinal of a boy whom he had brought into his house on account of his taking a fancy to him on the stage, and whom he had employed in keeping his monkey-house. Such were the men that settled the creed of Christendom !

Nothing is more unfair in controversy than to state in our own words the tenets of others from whom we differ. And to many the discussion of principles, apart from the men who champion them, seems too academic to be interesting. Let us then select an exponent of the views it is here desired to challenge. Dr. Pusey's immediate successor, as head of the House which bears his name, will serve the purpose admirably. All the more so because he is deemed a man of moderate opinions and of Christian spirit. His personal contribution to Lux Mundi gave prominent expression to certain of the errors here assailed, and The Ministry of the Christian Church was written in defence of them.<sup>1</sup>

"How irrational it is," he says, "considering the intimate links by which the New Testament canon is bound up with the historic Church, not to accept the mind of that Church as interpreting the mind of the apostolic writers.”<sup>1</sup> The logic of this is charming. Let us test it by a parallel case. “How irrational it is, considering the intimate links by which the Old Testament canon is bound up with the Jews (and they, moreover, were the divinely appointed custodians of them), not to accept the mind of the Jews as interpreting the Messianic prophecies.”

<sup>1</sup> "The Mission of the Church" presents the same teaching in a briefer and more popular form.

The glaring fallacy of this argument lies in confounding questions of fact with interpretations of doctrine. The question of the genuineness of the books of the New Testament is of the same character as issues of fact such as are dealt with every day in our courts of justice.<sup>2</sup> We owe our obligations to the historic Church in early times for settling and preserving the sacred canon. But this does not blind us to the fact that the hatred of the Scriptures which it displayed in later times was the natural fruit of the false teaching of the Fathers.

<sup>1</sup> “Lux Mundi,” pp. 339, 340.

<sup>2</sup> Ex. gr., whether a footpath was used by the public before a certain time. A number of very old people are called to give their evidence; and possibly the best witness may be the most notorious old rascal in the parish! I well remember such a case at the assizes.

But the statement above cited calls for further criticism. First, it raises the whole question whether we possess a Divine revelation at all.<sup>1</sup> Secondly, the question again presents itself, What is the Church? The argument assumes that it means the clergy—a figment which no one accepts who has not already given up his Bible. And, thirdly, waiving that point, How is the mind of the Church to be ascertained? If by the decrees of Councils, then we are met by the fact that the mind of the Church was not declared until after the epoch when “the mind of the apostolic writers” would, by lapse of time, have been lost. If by the writings of the Fathers, then the fact obtrudes itself that the Councils were convened to detect and expose their heresies, and, therefore, they cannot be safe guides to the “apostolic mind.”

But our author is logical enough to see that this position is untenable, so he abandons it for another. Pusey revered the Bible as supreme but his disciple is unembarrassed by any enthusiasm of faith in Holy Scripture. In his opinion "the Scriptures have suffered greatly from being isolated."<sup>1</sup> "Nor can a hard-and-fast line be drawn between what lies within, and what lies without, the canon."<sup>2</sup> And lest any one should miss the meaning of these monstrous statements, he explains them by an illustration. "The Epistle to the Hebrews and S. Clement's letter are closely linked together." And, he adds, "How impossible to tear the one from the other." Suffice it to say that in the letter referred to, appeal is made to the Pagan myth of the Phœnix, not incidentally, nor as an allegory or illustration, but gravely and as a fact, to establish the truth of the resurrection.<sup>3</sup> Impossible to tear apart the Scrip-

<sup>1</sup> “The mind of the apostolic writers” is the nearest approach this author can make to an acknowledgment of inspiration.

<sup>1</sup> "Lux Mundi," p. 337.

<sup>2</sup> Ibid., p. 339.

<sup>3</sup> And yet the letter which is traditionally attributed to Clement of Rome is in some respects vastly superior to the writings of the later Fathers. Suffice it here to say that while expressly connected with the apostolic Epistles to the Corinthians, it has nothing whatever in common with the Epistle to the Hebrews. Why then bracket them thus together? The answer to this question may be gleaned from the following sentence: "For Clement interprets the high-priesthood of Christ in a sense which, instead of excluding, makes it the basis of, the ministerial hierarchy of the Church." Now, first, this appeal to Clement is an admission that Scripture will not support what is pleaded for. And, secondly, the view here attributed to Clement the ordinary reader will search for tures from puerilities and blunders like these! Could any one have written the sentence above quoted who believed the New Testament to be a Divine revelation?

Having thus undermined confidence in Holy Scripture, the writer goes on to set up the authority of "the Church" in its place. In a word, he falls back upon the position of mediæval superstition which was repudiated at the Reformation by the Church of which he is a minister. The immense importance of the subject must be my apology for pursuing it; for this is the teaching by which the people of this nation are being insidiously drawn back to the darkness, the intellectual and spiritual degradation, from which the Reformation delivered our forefathers.

Proceeding with his argument upon inspiration, he says:—

"Let us bear carefully in mind the place which the

---

in vain. In the clause referred to he enforces the maxim of 1 Cor. xiv. 40 (that "all things should be done in order") by referring to the Jewish orders of chief priest, priest, levite, and layman, each having his fitting duties; but in the next clause but one he gives clear proof (as has been noticed by numberless writers) that he knew nothing of a "ministerial hierarchy."

doctrine holds in the building up of a Christian faith. It is, in fact, an important part of the superstructure, but it is not among the bases of the Christian belief. The Christian creed asserts the reality of certain historical facts. To these facts, in the Church's name, we claim assent ; but we do so on grounds which, so far, are quite independent of the inspiration of the evangelic records. All that we claim to show at this stage is that they are historical ; not historical so as to be absolutely without error, but historical in the general sense, so as to be trustworthy. All that is necessary for faith in Christ is to be found in the moral dispositions which predispose to belief, and make intelligible and credible the thing to be believed ; coupled with such acceptance of the generally historical character of the Gospels, and of the trustworthiness of the other apostolic documents, as justifies belief that our Lord was actually born of the Virgin Mary. . . ." (p. 340).

Here in a single clause—and it is the climax of an argument—we have the root error of the apostasy, as definitely formulated by Augustine of Hippo. As Professor Harnack expresses it, "The Church guaranteed the truth of the faith, when the individual could not perceive it."<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> In the same connection he says, "When he (Augustine) threw himself into the arms of the Catholic Church he was perfectly conscious that he needed its authority not to sink in scepticism or nihilism" ("History of Dogma," vol. v. ch. iii.). We are asked to follow the teaching of Augustine, and yet he himself was simply following the crowd—superstition calls it "the Church"—because, like a timid man in the dark, he could not trust himself to be alone!

“To these facts, in the Church’s name, we claim assent.” If ever there was an appeal to ignorance and superstition it is here. Having regard to the Church’s history the effrontery of it is amazing. Its folly will be apparent to any one who brings reason and common sense to bear upon the question at issue.

The first of “these facts,” upon which all the rest depend, is that the Nazarene was the Son of God. The founder of Rome was believed to be the divinely begotten child of a vestal virgin. And in the old Babylonian mysteries a similar parentage was ascribed to the martyred son of Semiramis, Queen of Heaven. What reason have we, then, for distinguishing the birth at Bethlehem from these and other kindred legends of the ancient world? These men disparage the Scriptures, and, though yielding a conventional assent to their claim to inspiration, they refuse even to pledge themselves to their truth; and yet in the Church’s name “they claim assent” to that to which no consensus of mere human testimony could lend even an a priori probability.

All we need for faith is to be found, forsooth, in "the moral dispositions which predispose to belief." When the weak-nerved guest who has been plied with tales about the haunted room, retires to rest with "the moral dispositions which predispose to belief" in ghosts, the ghost is certain to appear, and the reality of ghosts is never questioned more! And so also here: if we will but allow our minds to be hypnotised by priests, we shall be prepared to believe in the Incarnation, the sacrifice of Calvary, the sacrifice of the Mass, apostolic succession, and the mystic efficacy of the sacraments. And we shall swallow all these doctrines without any exercise of mind or heart or conscience, and without any capacity to distinguish between Divine truth and human error and superstition.

If, on the other hand, the New Testament is a Divine revelation; if "the evangelic records" are, in the language of the Apostle Paul, "God-breathed Scriptures," then indeed the Christian can face his fellow men with the confession of his faith that the crucified Jew was the Son of God. But, apart from such a revelation, faith in anything which is outside the sphere of reason and the senses is mere superstition. The foundation fact of Christianity is of that character ; and those who accept it on the authority of "the Church" are poor superstitious creatures who would believe anything.

And such these men prove themselves to be. They believe that the Nazarene was the Son of God ; they believe the same, and on the same authority, of a piece of bread from the baker's oven. They are like the schoolboy who answers that six and seven are thirteen, and later on, in reply to a further question, says that six and eight are thirteen. The wrong answer destroys the value of the right one, by showing that it rests on no intelligent basis. And so here. Faith in that which is true is not necessarily true faith. In this instance it would seem to be sheer credulity.

One quotation more to make clearer still the anti-christian character of this system :—

"If we believe . . . that our Lord founded a visible Church, and that this Church with her creed and Scriptures, ministry and sacraments, is the instrument which He has given us to use, our course is clear. We must devote our energies to making the Church adequate to the Divine intention—as strong in principle, as broad in spirit, as our Lord intended her to be ; trusting that, in proportion as her true motherhood is realised, her children will find their peace within her bosom. We cannot believe that there is any religious need which at the last resort the resources of the Church are inadequate to meet.”<sup>1</sup>

What does a man need in the spiritual sphere? Forgiveness of his sins?—the Church will grant him absolution. Peace with God?—he will find it in the Church’s “bosom.” “Grace to help in time of need”? Comfort in sorrow? Strength for the struggles of life, and support in the solemn hour of death? The whole mass of his need “the resources of the Church” are adequate to meet.

Christ is all in all in Christianity. But the Buddha of this religion holds a position akin to that of the Sovereign in the British Constitution. Supreme in a sense, of course, the Queen must be regarded ; but the Queen never touches the life of the ordinary citizen. And so here. Professor Harnack describes it admirably in a single sentence : “Christ as a person is forgotten. The fundamental questions of salvation are not answered by reference to Him ; and in life the baptized has to depend on means which exist partly alongside, partly independent of Him, or merely bear His badge." <sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> “The Mission of the Church,” p. vii.

These words, descriptive of the Romish system under Gregory the Great, might be fitly placed upon the title-page of The Church and the Ministry. Witness the prevalence of such language as "salvation through the Church," "grace communicated from without"—expressions and ideas wholly foreign to Scripture, but well known in Romish theology. The work opens, of course, with an appeal to tradition. As soon as the writer comes to Scripture he at once betrays hopeless confusion between the kingdom of heaven and the Church of God.<sup>2</sup> The kingdom was the burden of Hebrew prophecy; the Church was a "mystery" revealed after Israel's rejection of Messiah. He goes on to confound the Church regarded as "the body of Christ," with the Church as an organised society on earth. The former necessarily includes all the redeemed of the Christian dispensation; the latter is as necessarily limited to those who are actually in the world at any particular time. Distinctions of this kind, so clear upon the open page of Scripture, Romish theology ignores; and ignorance of them makes the New Testament seem a maze of inconsistencies and contradictions.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> "History of Dogma," vol. v. ch. v.

<sup>2</sup> P. 43, see pp. 48-49 ante.

Apostolic Succession, which is the burden of the book, is the special subject of the second chapter. The pundits of the Council of Trent had to face the fact that the Papal system rested upon a single text<sup>2</sup>; the figment of Apostolic Succession <sup>1</sup> Such distinctions explain, ex. gr., how the Lord could say, "I am not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel"; "Go not into the way of the Gentiles," &c.; and yet how He could speak of Divine love to the world, and eternal life for "whosoever believeth in Him"! And as regards the twofold aspect of the Church, we find, in Eph. iv. 11, the ministry designed to fulfil the Divine purpose for the one, and, in 1 Cor. xii. 28, we have the provision for the needs of the other. "For the building up of the body of Christ" (Eph. iv. 12) we have (in addition to apostles, prophets, and teachers, which are common to both) evangelists or preachers of the gospel. In the Church as organised on earth we have no evangelists (for the Church is supposed to be composed of those who have been brought in by the gospel), but we have "helps, governments," &c. The sphere of government is the Church on earth; the sphere of the ministry of the gospel is the world. The Apostle Paul had this double ministry. "The gospel . . . whereof I am made a minister"; and "the Church whereof I am made a minister" (Col. i. 23-25).

<sup>2</sup> "Thou art Peter," &c.

has not even one perverted text to support it. It is not a question whether provision has been made for a true ministry in the Church until the end; that is assured by Divine faithfulness and power. But what we are here asked to believe is that the Buddha of Christendom set in motion a mechanical system which, by a process of finger-tip touches, to be repeated generation after generation, would transmit to all posterity certain mystical influences, for the maintenance of what is called "grace."

Now this may be considered from the standpoint either of Christianity or of reason.<sup>1</sup> As regards the latter, suffice it here to ask, Is it any wonder that in view of such teaching, so many intelligent and honest-minded men of the world should come to look upon religion as a jumble of silly fables and shameful frauds? And as regards the former, it would be idle to expect that the ordinary reader would follow an exhaustive exegesis of Scripture on the subject, and perhaps a clear statement of the error will render unnecessary an elaborate exposition of the truth.

<sup>1</sup> If any one wishes a powerful refutation of this figment on theological grounds, he will find it in the Dean of Norwich's "Donnellan Lectures," published by Hodder and Stoughton, under the title, "The Christian Ministry."

The case stands thus. In the Apostolic Church there were apostles, bishops (or elders), and ministers.<sup>1</sup> The apostles held a unique position. They admittedly had to do with the foundation of the Church. That they have successors is a mere inference. To establish that inference is the object of the treatise here under notice.<sup>2</sup> A perusal of it will suggest to the intelligent reader a juggler's attempt to place a ball at rest half way down an inclined plane. Ordinary folk will place it either at the top or at the bottom. The Christian takes his stand upon Scripture; the Romanist falls back upon tradition; but these <sup>1</sup> Not "deacons." There was no word in the Greek language for steam-engine when the New Testament was written; neither was there for deacon; and for the same reason! See Appendix IV., Note II.

<sup>2</sup> No one can fail to mark the contrast between the tone of this book and that of the volume cited in the fifth chapter (p. 62, ante). As we read Canon Bernard's Lectures we seem to be breathing the pure air of heaven; when we turn to Canon Gore's treatise we are oppressed by the atmosphere of the crypt and the cloister. In the one we have Christian theology; in the other the theology of Christendom.

Romanising Anglicans are the advocates of an unintelligent and impossible compromise. It is a clever piece of casuistry, nothing more.

Here is the scheme : As there were three orders at the first, there must be three orders now. But as we have no longer apostles, the "bishops" of the New Testament are moved up, so to speak, to fill their place ; and the position thus vacated by the promoted bishops is occupied by "priests"—not "presbyters writ small," but priests. The Romanist, more intelligent and more consistent than his imitators, recognises that above the apostles there was Christ, and so he sets up a Vicar of Christ, the Pope.

In the sublime arrogance, the daring profanity, of Rome there is something which almost commands an unwilling admiration ; but this halting imitation of Rome evokes feelings of a very different kind. And there is nothing more pitiable about these men than their repudiation of the name of "Protestant." If their position be not a protest against Rome, it must be designed as a half-way house to inveigle the unwary over to Rome. If they are not Protestants they must be

Jesuits. But whatever be their intention, there is no doubt as to the legitimate tendency and results of their teaching. Cardinal Vaughan writes: "The recent revival of Catholic doctrines and practices in the Church of England is very wonderful. It is a hopeful sign. It exhibits a yearning and a turning of the mind and heart towards the Catholic Church. It is a national clearing the way for something more."<sup>1</sup>

This religion bears a relation to Christ, akin to that which the Buddhism of to-day bears to Gautama. Nineteen centuries ago, as already explained, the Buddha of Christendom injected into His apostles the "grace" upon which our salvation depends; and the stock of the commodity now available has come down to us on the finger-tip touch system through a long succession. Salvation is thus "through the Church," by means of the sacraments; and therefore, apart from Apostolic Succession in an episcopacy, there can be no "Church," no valid sacraments, and of course no salvation. No, not quite that; for, we are told, "God's love is not limited by His covenant":

<sup>1</sup> "The Primitive Church and the See of Peter." Preface.

He is not bound to His sacraments.<sup>1</sup> Which suggests that, considering the long ages during which the "sacramental grace" has been flowing through the filthiest channels, sensible people will do well to distrust the orthodox "grace," and to cast themselves upon the "uncovenanted mercy" of God.

The Christian of course takes higher ground and denounces the whole system as both false and profane. It is false ; for this theory of salvation "through the covenant" by "sacramental grace" denies the great characteristic truth of Christianity. This shall be demonstrated in the sequel.<sup>2</sup> And it is profane, for it assumes that a holy, holy, holy God can recognise immoral and wicked men as His specially accredited ministers. What would be thought of the army—what would be thought of the Sovereign—if men convicted of crime, or even disgraced by flagrant and notorious acts of immorality were allowed to hold the Queen's commission? The only Scripture that can be cited in support of the profanity refutes it.

<sup>1</sup> "The Church and the Ministry," p. 110.

<sup>2</sup> See Chap. XII., post.

For it was not the death of Judas which determined his apostleship, but his sin. All the apostles died ; but Judas "by transgression fell." The man who stands upon Apostolic Succession may be indeed a minister of "the Christians' religion," but he has no valid claim to be acknowledged as a minister of Christ. He is separated from Christ by nineteen centuries of time, and by an impassable slough of moral filth and spiritual apostasy.

To the superficial the grossness of the imposture is not apparent in the case of those whose life and character give them personal claims to respect and veneration. But if the position be tenable at all, such men are "in the same boat" with the vilest of the miscreants who disgraced the clerical office during all the centuries until the Reformation shamed "the historic Church" into a show of outward decency, and compelled it to set its house in order. They moreover were "nearer to the fountain" than are their successors of to-day. And they, forsooth, were pillars of the Church, and custodians of "grace," while men like a Chalmers or a Spurgeon are mere interlopers, whose deliverance from the doom of Uzzah is due to the uncovenanted mercy of God! That educated men can be deluded by such a system is proof of the baneful influence of human religion upon the mind.

CHAPTER VIII

IN the Church's name! "Great is Diana of the Ephesians." The only sacred thing on earth is "the Church." As for Holy Scripture that may be patronised or mangled at pleasure: the dissecting knife of criticism cannot be applied to it too remorselessly. But to question the Divine authority of "the Church" is profanity beyond forgiveness. Just as in Pagan Rome men were free to believe in anything or in nothing, as it pleased them, so long as they were willing to burn incense at the appointed shrine, so is it in "Christian" England. There is but one God and "the Church" is His prophet.

"In the Church's name!" With these men "the Church" is the one mediator between God and men. No, they will exclaim, not the Church but Christ ; the mediator is Christ, speaking in and through the Church. How plainly and fully the Divine Spirit anticipated this plausible falsehood when He inspired the words : " There is one God and one mediator between God and men, THE MAN Christ Jesus, who gave Himself a ransom for all." <sup>1</sup> Not the Church, not Christ in the Church, not the " mystical Christ " ; but Christ THE MAN who died for men ; He is the only mediator between men and God.

Society is occasionally startled by some notable secession to Rome ; and the inference is a natural one that if " men of light and leading " take a step so momentous there cannot but be the most cogent reasons in its favour. As a matter of fact every one of these perverts has been angled for individually,<sup>2</sup> and the bait by which they have all been tempted is " the Church." <sup>3</sup> As the champions of the Neo-Romanism, so popular to-day in England, have taught them the foundation lie of the apostasy, that salvation is in and through " the

<sup>1</sup> 1 Tim. ii. 5, 6.

<sup>2</sup> I have myself been honoured in this way. See Appendix II.

<sup>3</sup> See Appendix IV., Note III.

Church,"<sup>1</sup> they are easily drawn into the net, and duly make their submission to Rome.

The great Orthodox Church being ignored, this result is inevitable. A simple process of negative induction leads to it. For the position claimed by the ritualists for the Church of England is obviously that of a schismatical sect, severed from and repudiated by that Church to which it owes everything which they deem vital; and Protestantism regarded as a religion is rightly rejected as a transparent fraud. It was a common saying in the days of the Council of Trent that the Bible was the religion of Protestants. Protestantism affords no anchorage for faith. But it provides a breakwater which makes our anchorage secure: it shields us from influences which make Christianity impossible. While priestcraft would set up a Church to mediate between God and man, Protestantism places in our hands an open Bible, and thus points us to the only mediator, the Lord Jesus Christ, and leaves us free to "obey the gospel."

Christianity makes salvation a personal matter

<sup>1</sup> The lie is a venerable one. "Outside the Church there is no salvation" was a favourite maxim of Cyprian's.

between the sinner and God. It is not a question of subjection to ordinances of religion, but of personal submission to the Lord Jesus Christ. The contrast is presented in the most emphatic way in the great doctrinal treatise of the New Testament. At the close of his parting charge to Israel, Moses spoke as follows :—

“For this commandment which I command thee this day, it is not hidden from thee, neither is it far off. It is not in heaven, that thou shouldest say, Who shall go up for us to heaven, and bring it unto us, that we may hear it, and do it? Neither is it beyond the sea, that thou shouldest say, Who shall go over the sea for us, and bring it unto us, that we may hear it, and do it? But the word is very nigh unto thee, in thy mouth, and in thy heart, that thou mayest do it” (Deut. xxx. 11-14).

And now, mark how the inspired apostle uses these words. Addressing the Romans, he says :—

“For Moses writeth that the man that doeth the righteousness which is of the law shall live thereby. But the righteousness which is of faith saith thus, Say not in thy heart, Who shall ascend into heaven? (that is, to bring Christ down :) or, Who shall descend into the abyss? (that is, to bring Christ up from the dead.) But what saith it? The word is nigh thee, in thy mouth, and in thy heart : that is, the word of faith, which we preach : because if thou shalt confess with thy mouth Jesus as Lord, and shalt believe in thy heart that God raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved" (Rom. x. 5-9).

According to the Divine revelation of Judaism, the way of life was obedience to ordinances: according to the Divine revelation of grace in Christianity, it is faith in Christ, and the acknowledgment of Him as Lord. And thus the apostle adds, "For with the heart man believeth unto righteousness; and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation. . . . For whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved." And the inspired definition of the Church is, "All that in every place call upon the name of the Lord Jesus Christ."<sup>1</sup> Salvation therefore is not by the Church, but the Church is composed of those who are thus saved by Christ.

But this is mere Christianity, and what men crave for is a religion. For their "affairs" they have a lawyer; for their bodies, a doctor; and for their souls they want a priest. Christianity is Divine and therefore, as men deem it, supernatural and visionary; whereas religion is human and natural, and therefore practical.

<sup>1</sup> 1 Cor. i. 2.

Here, and throughout these pages, the word "religion" is used in its proper classical meaning—the only meaning in which it is used in our English Bible. "How little 'religion' once meant godliness," says Archbishop Trench, "how predominantly it was used for the outward service of God, is plain from many passages in our homilies and from other contemporary literature." So Thomas Carlyle writes that, "In Scotland, Dr. Laud, much to his regret, found 'no religion at all,' no surplices, no altars in the east or anywhere; no bowing, no responding; not the smallest regularity of fuglemanship or devotional drill exercise; in short, 'no religion at all that I could see—which grieved me much.'" <sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Carlyle's "Cromwell's Letters and Speeches" (Introduction). Archbishop Laud was an authority upon religion, but not upon Christianity. For the Christian, "pure religion" (the Apostle James declares) "is to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted in the world." And in commenting on this, Archbishop Trench remarks that the very θησαυρία of Christianity "consists in acts of mercy, of love, of holiness." In other words, Christianity is not a religion at all. (See "The Silence of God," pp. 43-45, and Note II. of the Appendix.)

The secular press has taken up religion of late. Priests and altars, confession and absolution, "the ornaments rubric" and "incense used ceremonially"—these and kindred topics have been freely discussed in the daily newspapers. But no letters in the interests of Christianity have appeared in their columns. Letters of that kind gravitate to the waste-paper basket, while every one has been free to air his faith in the superstitions of human religion—superstitions which, formerly, the manhood of Christendom, especially in Roman Catholic countries, treated with cynical contempt.

It cannot seem trivial to insert here a typical specimen of the sort of effusion above alluded to. It is taken at random from The Times.<sup>1</sup> The writer is the minister of a fashionable church in the West-end of London. After referring to the statement of a previous correspondent, that "a clergyman who has a High celebration with Catholic ritual" cannot teach the doctrines of the Church of England, he proceeds as follows:—

"So I used to think, but I found I was mistaken. I had never read any theology in those days; I had only glanced at my Prayer-book ; I knew nothing of the Ornaments Rubric, the Act of Uniformity, the Tractarian movement, &c. Consequently I bore false witness against my neighbours—viz., the ritualistic clergy. But when God revealed the truth to me and I understood what conversion meant, and what the Incarnation, the Catholic Church, the Eucharistic Sacrifice, the Real Presence, Confession and Absolution, and all the rest meant, then a new light dawned on my soul and I found a beautiful peace in the Church of England. Then I saw that what looked to me in my ignorance to be idolatry, formalism, treachery, was really love of Jesus, faith in God's promises, and loyalty to the Church of England as part of the one true Church."

---

<sup>1</sup> Nov. 26, 1898.

It is not easy to gauge the spiritual, or even the intellectual condition of men who in presence of the awful solemnities of "sin and righteousness and judgment to come" can find "a beautiful peace" through the study of the ornaments rubric and the Act of Uniformity. Were it not indeed for the solemnity of the subject, it would be exquisitely amusing. But it is too serious and too sad for ridicule. Of course ecclesiastical doctrines and practices may be discussed in a cold and formal way, without reference to experience. But here the writer discloses his own spiritual history and the ground of his soul's peace. And yet there is not a word about Christ and His atoning sacrifice.

“Christ as a person is forgotten ; the fundamental questions of salvation are not answered by reference to Him.”<sup>1</sup> Instead of Calvary we have the “Eucharistic sacrifice” of the mass, that the Church of which the writer is a paid servant describes as a “blasphemous fable.”<sup>2</sup> A discussion of the many questions here raised would fill a volume ; but let us seize upon this vital error of “the one true Church,” “the Catholic Church.”

The haughty isolation, the dignified reserve, of the Greek Church is well fitted to impress the imagination, as is also the lofty intolerance of Rome. We know what “the Church” means with them, and we know what the Reformers meant by it. But what is “the one true Church” of these Neo-Romanists? Not the company of “all that call upon the name of our Lord Jesus Christ,” but the aggregate of the Episcopal communities, including that Church which rejects their fellowship with such disdain. The Reformers defined the Church as “a congregation of faithful men in the which the pure Word of God is preached, and the sacraments be duly administered” ;<sup>3</sup> and judging the Greek and Roman Churches by these tests, they in express terms excluded them from the category.<sup>1</sup> Mark what this implies. Prior to the Reformation, the English Church was but a branch of the Church of Rome; but the Reformers openly seceded from the Roman Communion; and in doing so they expressly repudiated its claims to be a true Church at all, and denounced its most characteristic ordinances as "blasphemous fables and dangerous deceits." But the Reformers were not so narrow-minded and silly as to imagine that there was no Church on earth save in the southern half of this little island of Britain. Rome limits the Church to those who are within her pale; but they, refusing the place of a mere sect, which is the position occupied by the Neo-Romanists to-day, so defined the Church as to include all Christians everywhere who took their stand with them upon the truth and practice of primitive Christianity.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> P. 99, ante.

<sup>2</sup> Article xxxi.

<sup>3</sup> Article xix.

<sup>1</sup> Article xix.

<sup>2</sup> Their language is very noteworthy—"A (i.e., any) congregation of faithful men," &c. And the 55th canon is still more explicit: "The whole congregation of Christian people dispersed throughout the whole world" (see Appendix IV., Note III.).

The Church founded by Augustine of Canterbury was not the Church of England, but a branch of the Church of Rome in England. Pope Gregory's mission corrupted and eventually stamped out, so far as the southern kingdom was concerned, the purer Christianity of the ancient Church of Britain—a Church founded in apostolic times by apostolic emissaries, if not by the Apostle Paul himself. Was the Reformation then no more than a surface cleaning of the English branch of the apostate Church, or was it a repudiation of that evil system, and a return to the purer faith of earlier days?

Great issues depend upon the answer given to this question. The time foretold in prophecy is not yet, when there can be no salvation within the professing Church of Christendom. Not until the earthly people shall have been restored to favour as "the Bride" will the Church of Christendom be openly revealed as "the Harlot." And then the command will be peremptory: "Come out of her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues. For her sins have reached even unto heaven, and God hath remembered her iniquities.”<sup>1</sup>

For Divine judgments are cumulative. He is “a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate Him.” It is not that the innocent suffer for the guilty, but that succeeding generations of God-haters, by identifying themselves with the sin of those who have gone before them, become heirs of their guilt. The Israel of Messianic days, by the murder of the Son of God, became guilty of “the blood of all the prophets, which was shed from the foundation of the world.”<sup>2</sup> And by her own deliberate acts the “historic Church” entered upon the awful heritage of guilt; and when, at the close of this day of grace, her sins shall come up for judgment, upon her shall be avenged His holy <sup>1</sup> Rev. xviii. 4, 5. I would not be understood as palliating the sin of remaining in the communion of an apostate Church. And if the Church of England be a branch of the Catholic Church, in the sense in which the Romanisers use that term, no Christian should remain in it for a single day; not because there is no salvation within the historic Church—this may not be asserted—but because the Christian has to stand before the judgment-seat of Christ.

<sup>2</sup> Luke xi. 50, 51.

apostles and prophets, for "in her," we read, "was found the blood of prophets and of saints, even of all that have been slain upon the earth."<sup>1</sup>

The Churches of the Reformation sought to "break the entail" of guilt, but these Neo-Romanists are determined, so far as in them lies, to restore it. Upon every man who stands upon "the continuity of the historic Church," "the blood of the martyrs" calls aloud for vengeance.<sup>2</sup> The question here involved is the pivot on which the pending controversy turns. The ritualist regards the Reformation as merely an incidental episode in the Church's history, and the Thirty-nine Articles as a passing ebullition of Protestant ignorance and bigotry. Therefore he practically ignores both. Therefore it is that he dreads the jurisdiction of the ordinary tribunals, knowing well that every lawyer will regard the Reformation and the Articles as vital. The Articles are the Church's confession of faith, framed after the Prayer-book was compiled; and therefore the Prayer-book must be interpreted by the Articles not the Articles by the Prayer-book.

<sup>1</sup> Rev. xviii. 20, 24.

<sup>2</sup> Rev. xvii. 6.

Men of the world are Gallios in all that concerns religion. Why should they take sides with this Church against that—with one party against another? But the revival of the confessional is putting an end to this indifference. There is no type of insanity more dangerous than that of the poor religious maniac who hears what he believes to be a Divine voice. To-day he will lavish affection upon wife and children; to-morrow, in obedience to the voice, he will hack them in pieces. And the man who hears "the voice of the Church" is just as dangerous. True he can no longer, as in dark days gone by, set up the rack, or rekindle the fires of the stake; but he can inflict outrages which true manhood feels more keenly even than physical pain. Men are beginning to understand that the question here at issue is one which touches all that is most precious and sacred in private and family life. And the more fully this is realised, the stronger will be the tide of popular indignation.

The standard theological treatises prepared for the guidance of priests in questioning penitents in the confessional, and actually used for this purpose are so indescribably filthy that a pamphlet containing bare extracts from them in English, although admittedly published and circulated with a good motive, has been condemned for obscenity ;<sup>1</sup> and an enthusiast who sought thus to excite public feeling against the system has suffered imprisonment for his offence.

Silly women have been writing to the newspapers to assert that they have frequented the confessional without being plied with indecent questions. But the questioning will come by and by. As yet this abomination is only in its infancy in England. A baby tiger is said to be a charming pet for children, but yet no sensible man will have a baby tiger in his home. Not one of these women, moreover, has told us what she said to her confessor.

“If in these days,” says Froude, “the Church of Rome were to persuade any secular power to burn a single heretic for it—as in past centuries it burned thousands—I suppose the whole system would at once be torn to atoms.” And if some English gentleman should be sent to gaol for horsewhip-

<sup>1</sup> See Appendix IV., Note IV.

ping a "priest" who has received his wife's confession in matters relating to the secret confidences of married life, the event would do more than the bishops are likely to effect to put down this iniquity in the land.<sup>1</sup>

Confession to a man is an outrage upon men; hence the popular clamour against the infamy of it. Absolution by a man is a far greater outrage upon God; but of this men seem to be unmindful. And yet there is in it something appallingly profane. It belongs to the Pagan conception of priesthood, by which the primitive Church was so soon corrupted. The Jew knew nothing of it. Even in the days of his deepest apostasy, he never forgot that the forgiveness of sins is a Divine prerogative. And no great knowledge of Scripture is needed to satisfy any one that the apostles themselves never claimed the power to which these priests of Christendom so impiously pretend. To point sinners to the Lord Jesus Christ was the aim of all their ministry. "To Him give all the prophets witness, that through His name, whosoever believeth in Him shall receive remission of sins."<sup>1</sup> Such was the Apostle Peter's testimony. And the Apostle Paul's was to the same effect: "Through Him is proclaimed unto you remission of sins; and by Him, every one that believeth is justified from all things."<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Said the Archbishop of Canterbury, when speaking on this subject in the House of Lords on 14th June, 1877, "I am sure it would be the duty of any father of a family to remonstrate with the clergyman who had put the questions, and warn him never to approach his house again." I mean nothing more than this, save that I suggest a method of "remonstrating" that would be efficacious!

There was nothing distinctively apostolic about this. To give such a testimony to Christ is the privilege of every Christian. Indeed, until ecclesiasticism corrupted Christianity it was plainly recognised as his responsibility. In the persecution which followed the martyrdom of Stephen, the Christians, we are told, were all scattered abroad, except the apostles; and the record adds, "They that were scattered abroad went everywhere, preaching the word."<sup>3</sup> That is to say, not only was missionary work of this kind not "an apostolic function," but at that particular stage of the Church's history the apostles alone refrained from entering upon it.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Acts x. 43.

<sup>2</sup> Acts xiii. 38. The words are διὰ τούτου: literally "through this one." The introduction of the word man in our English translations is unfortunate.

<sup>3</sup> Acts viii. 4.

Auricular confession, like papal supremacy, depends on the perversion of a single text. The precept, "Confess your sins one to another," is the only Scripture to which it can appeal. Here is the passage in full :—

"Is any among you suffering? let him pray. Is any cheerful? let him sing praise. Is any among you sick? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord: and the prayer of faith shall save him that is sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he have committed sins, it shall be forgiven him. Confess therefore your sins one to another, and pray one for another, that ye may be healed. The supplication of a righteous man availeth much in its working" (James v. 13-16, R.V.).

If men did not take leave of reason and common sense in all that concerns religion, could any one find priestly absolution here? "Confess your sins one to another," means, forsooth, "confess your sins to a priest"; and "pray for one another," means, "and the priest will absolve you"! Forgiveness is with God ; and if the weak would invoke human aid, that aid will be found in "the supplication of a righteous man," or (as the Reformers suggested) the counsel of a "minister of God's word," who, "by the ministry of God's holy word," may be able to quiet the conscience of the penitent.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Under Divine guidance, no doubt. While the testimony was specially addressed to Israel (that is, during the Pentecostal dispensation), Jerusalem was the divinely appointed centre.

If the Apostle Peter had known of the power to prescribe a penance, and to absolve the penitent, would he have said to Simon Magus, "Pray God, if perhaps the thought of thy heart may be forgiven thee" ? If Simon had ever heard of it, would he have replied, "Pray ye the Lord for me" ?<sup>2</sup>

Paul alone of all the apostles, compelled by the attacks of the Judaisers, "magnified his office," insisting upon the dignity and power which pertained to the apostleship. Yet he it was who wrote, "What then is Apollos ? and what is Paul ?"<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> "The ever memorable Mr. John Hales, of Eaton," an Oxford Professor in his day, and altogether a notable person—he got preferment from Laud—wrote as follows : "Your Pliny tells you 'that he that is stricken by a scorpion, if he go immediately and whisper it into the ears of an ass, shall find himself immediately eased.' That sin is a scorpion and bites deadly, I have always believed ; but that to cure the bite of it it was a sovereign remedy to whisper it into the ear of a priest, I do as well believe as I do that of Pliny."

<sup>2</sup> Acts viii. 22-24.

<sup>3</sup> 1 Cor. iii. 5, R.V.

And the answer is—not “Priests to stand between you and God,” but “Ministers by whom ye believed.” The same might have been said of any one of the thousands of the scattered Pentecostal Church. And he further emphasises this by declaring, “In nothing am I behind the very chiefest apostles, though I be nothing.”<sup>1</sup>

The apostles had a position of undoubted pre-eminence and power in the Church—a position absolutely unique, though these sham priests pretend to share it ; and yet so far as the remission of a sinner’s sins was concerned, an apostle was no more than the humblest Christian. At this point man is absolutely nothing, and his intervention is indeed the sin of Korah—a sin compared with which the foulest immorality ever disclosed in the confessional is trivial. If such an outrage upon the Divine Majesty does not bring down swift and signal vengeance, it is because this is the age of a silent Heaven, the age of the reign of grace. Its punishment awaits the awful day when the priest and his dupe shall stand together before the throne of God.

<sup>1</sup> 2 Cor. xii. 11.

But while, as already noticed, the question in this aspect of it is altogether a religious one, it has another side, in which it closely concerns the national character and the future of this realm. "It is yours, Right Reverend Fathers," said Cardinal Manning in addressing the English Roman Catholic prelates, "to subjugate and to subdue, to bend and to break the will of an imperious race, the will which, as the will of Rome of old, rules over nations and people, invincible and inflexible." And no method can be more certain of achieving this fell purpose of humiliating the spirit of Englishmen than that of habituating them to the degradation of confession to a priest. The ritualistic controversy abounds in questions respecting which wide differences of opinion must be tolerated in a Church which claims to be national. But here no toleration is possible.

Persecution? Yes, if needs be—persecution of the kind that sends men to gaol for fraud, or for dispensing poisons without a label. Let these men join the Church of Rome, and they can follow the practices of their religion unhindered. But the salaried servants of the National Church, the Church of the Reformation, shall not be permitted to destroy the work of the Reformation. If the bishops will not, and the courts cannot, put down this abomination, the constituencies must deal with it. God forbid that the appeal should need to be carried further. But our liberties have been won at the cost of revolution, and we are prepared to maintain them, let the further cost be what it may.

CHAPTER IX

HERE is an infant, born but yesterday, and yet so frail and sickly that its young life may flicker out at any moment. The question arises, If it should die, what is to be its future?

If it dies in its present condition, it must, we are told, be lost ; heaven it cannot enter.

But, we plead, the poor creature does not know its right hand from its left ; it is absolutely innocent. Why should it be thus punished ?

Personally innocent, yes, we are answered ; but by natural generation it belongs to the fallen race, and Adam's sin must banish it to hell, unless by regeneration it is brought within the family of God. But by the sacrament of baptism this change can be brought about without delay or difficulty, and thus the child's salvation can be secured if death should seize on it. Any one, perhaps, can perform the rite ; but, as that is a disputed point, it may be well to make assurance still more sure, and call in the aid of one who is divinely appointed to administer the sacraments.

But suppose the man we summon to our aid should be false to his profession, and prove to be of evil character and immoral life?

That, we are assured, will in no way affect the validity of the sacrament, or the reality of the change it will produce in the child. If the man be lawfully ordained, God will acknowledge him as His minister, notwithstanding.

In a case of this kind nothing is gained by an appeal to passion. But will thoughtful and fair minds consider the matter, and honestly answer the question, whether in the superstitions of Pagan races whom we send out missionaries to convert, there can be found a conception of God more unworthy, more revolting than this?

What kind of God is this that is thus presented to us? A Being, unjust, unloving, and cruel, who devotes an innocent and helpless infant to destruction. A Being, unreasonable, arbitrary, and capricious, who will change its eternal destiny if a few drops of water are sprinkled upon it, accompanied by the utterance of a few cabalistic words. An unholy, an immoral Being, for He employs and recognises agents no matter what their character and life may be.

And yet this gross and profane misrepresentation of God is an essential part of the religion of Christendom. And not only does Western civilisation tolerate the system, but even in England, in these days of vaunted enlightenment, "men of light and leading" are turning back to it. And notwithstanding this proof of the power of religion to blind and deprave the human mind, men who pretend to be freethinkers sneer at the truth of Adam's fall, and refuse to believe in the spiritual apostasy of the fallen race!

For the question here at issue is not of Protestantism versus Romanism—there are Protestant Churches which champion these profane falsehoods; nor of Low Church versus High—the so-called evangelical party is not free from them; it is, as the sequel will show, a question of Paganism versus Christianity.

Although this figment of baptismal regeneration is but one link in a catena of errors, it is the first and most important; and if this can be pulverised and destroyed the rest will crumble and disappear. But how is the discussion to be conducted? Of course the vital question is, What does the Bible teach upon the subject? And yet the majority of those who will read these pages would refuse to follow such an inquiry.<sup>1</sup> This indeed is the secret of the influence of priests. I will here content myself therefore with calling attention to three plain and salient facts, which any one with the help of a concordance can verify.

The first fact is that in not a single passage of the New Testament where baptism is mentioned is it connected with regeneration or spiritual birth. The next fact is still more significant, namely, that in those passages where the doctrine of baptism is unfolded it is definitely and emphatically connected with death, which of course is the very antithesis of birth. The third fact shall be stated in borrowed words. In combating these errors the Bishop of Liverpool writes :—

<sup>1</sup> I have therefore dismissed it to the Appendix. See App. I.

“It is most extraordinary that there is so little about baptism in the Epistles of the New Testament. In Romans it is only twice mentioned, and in 1 Corinthians seven times. In Galatians, Ephesians, Colossians, Hebrews, and 1 Peter, we find it named once in each Epistle. In thirteen of the remaining Epistles it is neither named nor referred to. In the two pastoral Epistles to Timothy, where we might expect something about baptism, if anywhere, there is not a word about it! In the Epistle to Titus the only text that can possibly be applied to baptism is by no means clearly applicable (Titus iii. 5). Nor is this all. In the one Epistle which mentions baptism seven times, we find the writer saying that ‘Christ sent me, not to baptize, but to preach the gospel’; and actually ‘thanking God’ that he had baptized none of the Corinthians save Crispus and Gaius (1 Cor. i. 14, 17).”<sup>1</sup>

To recapitulate. Baptism is nowhere connected with regeneration in the New Testament; it symbolises death and not birth; and it has but a small and incidental place in Christian doctrine. How, then, it may well be asked, could it have come to assume a meaning so different, and to hold a place so engrossing, in the religion of Christendom?

In this connection the fact claims notice that while the writers of the New Testament, and the teachers whose names the New Testament has made familiar to us, were, without exception, men whose minds had been formed by the study of the Hebrew Scriptures, there was scarcely one of the post-apostolic Fathers of whom this could be averred. What the Scriptures and the Jewish faith were to the writers and teachers of the New Testament, the writings of the Greek philosophers and the cults of classic Paganism were to the Fathers.

<sup>1</sup> “Expository Thoughts on the Gospels” (John iii.).

Then again, we must clear our minds from the views which ordinary Christians hold of these cults. They were not the brutal and brutalising systems so commonly supposed. They had many characteristics which made them not only practically useful, but congenial to human nature at its best. So much so, indeed, that vast numbers of nominal Christians turned back to them, not merely under pressure of persecution, but after the persecutions had ceased, and in spite of penal laws of drastic severity. And lastly—a matter of principal importance—those cults gave prominence to baptism, and therefore it was easy to confound the Pagan with the Christian rite, and to associate with the latter the superstitions of the former.

The religion of ancient Rome was marked by formalism and coldness. Every element of religious emotion and enthusiasm was due to the foreign cults which prevailed during the period of the Empire. Isis worship, which had its home in Egypt, and the Mithras worship of Persia, were widely popular. The former had its tonsured priesthood and its initiatory rite of baptism. And the latter had still more in common with the religion of Christendom. Its baptism of neophytes and confirmation, its oblation of the consecrated bread, its expiation from sin by washing in blood,<sup>1</sup> its symbolic teaching of the resurrection, and its festival of the god on the 25th of December, marked it out as a dangerous enemy of the so-called Christian religion. Thus it was regarded by the early Christians; and Renan goes the length of surmising that if Christianity had received some fatal check it might have become the religion of the Western world.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> But see Note, p. 265 post.

<sup>2</sup> On this whole subject see Professor Dill's "Roman Society in the Last Century of the Western Empire," pp. 66-70.

But great as was the influence of the cults of Isis and of Mithras, it was not from these that the Fathers derived the leaven which corrupted the doctrine and perverted the ordinances of the Christian faith. All that was noble and true in Greek philosophy these men attributed to the Hebrew prophets. Justin Martyr, himself a thorough Platonist, went so far as to declare, in referring to the Greek Sophists, that "they who lived agreeably to reason were really Christians."<sup>1</sup> It was only natural therefore that they should look upon the Greek religion as a reasonable cult, worthy of the race and the age to which it belonged.

But, like the religion of old Rome, the national religion of Greece had lost its hold on the popular conscience. It failed to deal with the subjects which troubled the minds of men—sin, a future life, and punishment for guilt. "But the mysteries concerned themselves precisely with these very subjects; they provided a series of preliminary purifications for their votaries; they turned men's minds to the deeper problems of life and death, and gave them new ideas; they made some attempt to reach and touch the individual mind."<sup>1</sup> The human mind is the same in every age; therefore it is, that religious movements in different ages have so much in common. Just as, in our own day, wherever mere Protestantism is made a cult, instead of being a bulwark behind which spiritual Christianity can develop and flourish, men turn away from it to a system which parodies the great realities for which they instinctively crave; so in ancient Greece the mysteries marked a popular revival of religion.

<sup>1</sup> "Apol." i. 61. And see what he says in 57 and 76 about Plato's borrowing from the Bible. This is asserted still more plainly by Tertullian. "Who is there of the poets and sophists" (he demands) "who hath not drunk at the fountain of the prophets?" ("Apol." xlvii.).

The chief shrine, of world-wide fame, was at Eleusis, a city some fourteen miles from Athens. The great yearly celebration took place in the month Boedromion, which answered to the Jewish Tisri, in which fell the great day of expiation and the Feast of Tabernacles. All classes were admitted to the festival, but the immoral and the impure were warned off by a solemn initiatory proclamation. Notorious sinners were peremptorily excluded, while others were left to the judgment of their own conscience. They were asked to confess their sins before taking part in the rites. Confession was followed by a baptism. The candidates, having bathed in the sea, came from the bath new men: it was a laver of regeneration. This was followed by a sacrifice, which was known as "a sacrifice of salvation." Then, after an interval, took place a great procession of the candidates, bearing torches and singing the praises of the god. The sixth day of the festival was known by the name of Iacchus. To him, "the holy child," and "to his death and resurrection" the Homeric hymn in covert terms refers.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Professor Ramsay in Encyc. Brit., "Mysteries."

The climax of the celebration was the mystic plays. Their torches were extinguished; they stood outside the temple in the silence and the darkness. Then the doors were opened, and in a blaze of light there was acted before them the great drama of the festival. "There was probably no dogmatic teaching—there were possibly no words spoken—it was all an acted parable. But it was all kept in silence. There was an awful individuality about it. They saw the sight in common, but they saw it each man for himself. It was his personal communion with the Divine life. The glamour and the glory of it were gone when it was published to all the world. The effect of it was conceived to be a change both of character and of relation to the gods. The initiated were by virtue of their initiation made partakers of a life to come. ‘Thrice happy they who go to the world below having seen these mysteries: to them alone is life there, to all others is misery.’”

<sup>1</sup> The words in inverted commas are Professor Ramsay's.

The question before us is how the simple baptism of the New Testament, administered to those who professed belief in Christ, as an acknowledgment by them of submission to His lordship over them and their identification with Him in death, was supplanted in the cult of “the historic Church” by a mystic rite by which the sinner is cleansed from sin and, as Augustine has it, “born of the bowels of the Church.” Here is the solution of the problem! This brief notice of the Eleusinian mysteries has been given almost entirely in borrowed words, lest any should suppose the facts are misstated for a purpose. In the sequel, for the same reason, the language of another shall be followed still more closely.<sup>1</sup> My purpose is to show to what extent the influence of the mysteries, and analogous religious cults, modified and corrupted the Christian ordinance of baptism.

“In the earliest times (1) baptism followed at once upon conversion; (2) the ritual was of the simplest kind; nor does it appear that it needed any special minister.” Both these points are clearly established by the narrative of the Acts of the Apostles.

“A later, though still very early stage, with significant modifications, is seen in the teaching of the Apostles: (1) No special minister of baptism is specified, the vague ‘he that baptizeth,’ seeming to exclude a limitation of it to an officer;

<sup>1</sup> I refer to “The Hibbert Lectures, 1888,” already quoted. Where I do not use inverted commas, it is merely because of trifling omissions or verbal changes, which preclude my doing so. And I have not given the Greek terms used, nor have I added the authorities cited by Dr. Hatch.

(2) the only element that is specified is water ; (3) previous instruction is implied, but there is no period of catechumenate defined ; (4) a fast is enjoined before baptism. These were the simple elements of early Christian baptism. When it emerges, after a period of obscurity—like a river which flows under the sand—the enormous changes of later times have already begun.

“The first point is the change of name. (a) So early as the time of Justin Martyr we find a name given to baptism which comes straight from the Greek mysteries—the name ‘enlightenment.’ It came to be the constant technical term.

“(b) The name ‘seal,’ which also came from the mysteries and from some forms of foreign cult, was used partly of those who had passed the test and who were ‘consignati,’ as Tertullian calls them, partly of those who were actually sealed upon the forehead in sign of a new ownership.

“(c) The term mysterion is applied to baptism, and with it comes a whole series of technical terms unknown to the Apostolic Church, but well known to the mysteries, and explicable only through ideas and usages peculiar to them.”

Thus we have a number of words expressive either of the rite or act of initiation itself, or of the agent or minister, or descriptive of the baptized or the unbaptized—all unknown to Scripture, all derived from the mysteries.

“The second point is the change of time, which involves a change of conception. (a) Instead of baptism being given immediately upon conversion, it came to be in all cases postponed by a long period of preparation, and in some cases deferred until the end of life. (b) The Christians were separated into two classes—those who had, and those who had not, been baptized. Tertullian regards it as a mark of heretics that they have not this distinction. . . . And Basil gives the customs of the mysteries as a reason for the absence of the catechumens from the service. (c) As if to show conclusively that the change was due to the influence of the mysteries, baptized persons were, as we have seen, distinguished from unbaptized by the very term which was in use for the similar distinction in regard to the mysteries—initiated and uninitiated—and the minister is a mystagogue.”

As those who were admitted to the inner sights of the mysteries had a formula or password, so the catechumens, on the eve of their baptism, were entrusted with the sacred formula—the very word for it was borrowed from the mysteries—and the communication of it was an important preparatory rite.

Sometimes the newly baptized received the communion at once, just as the newly initiated at Eleusis were permitted, after a day's fast, to drink of the mystic cup and to eat of the sacred cakes.

“The baptized were sometimes crowned with a garland, as the initiated wore a mystic crown at Eleusis.”

Mention has been made of the blaze of light which marked the climax of the initiation festival at Eleusis; “so Chrysostom pictures Christian baptism in the blaze of Easter eve; and Cyril describes the white-robed band of the baptized approaching the doors of the church when the light turned darkness into day.”

Baptism was no longer administered, as in primitive days, at any place or time, but only in the great churches, and, as a rule, only once a year. "The primitive 'See, here is water; what doth hinder me to be baptized?' passed into a ritual which at every turn recalls the ritual of the mysteries."

The following is the account given of the administration of the baptismal sacrament at Rome as late as the ninth century:—

"Preparation went on through the greater part of Lent. The candidates were examined and tested; they fasted; they received the secret symbols, the Creed, and the Lord's Prayer. On Easter eve, as the day declined towards afternoon, they assembled in the Church of St. John Lateran. The rites of exorcism and renunciation were gone through in solemn form, and the rituals survive. The Pope and his priests come forth in their sacred vestments, with lights carried in front of them, which the Pope then blesses; there is a reading of lessons and a singing of psalms. And then, while they chant a litany, there is a procession to the great bath of baptism, and the water is blessed. The baptized come forth from the water, are signed with the cross, and are presented to the Pope one by one, who vests them in a white robe and signs their foreheads again with the cross. They are arranged in a great circle, and each of them carries a light. Then a vast array of lights is kindled; the blaze of them, says a Greek Father, makes night continuous with dawn. It is the beginning of a new life. The mass is celebrated—the mystic offering on the Cross is represented in figure; but for the newly baptized the chalice is filled, not with wine, but with milk and honey, that they may understand, says an old writer, that they have entered already upon the promised land. And there was one more symbolical rite in that early Easter sacrament, the mention of which is often suppressed—a lamb was offered on the altar, afterwards cakes in the shape of a lamb. It was simply the ritual which we have seen already in the mysteries. The purified crowd at Eleusis saw a blaze of light, and in the light were represented in symbol life and death and resurrection.”

Utter paganism in a Christian dress. To us who recognise the essential distinction between spirit and matter the thought of washing the soul from sin by water baptism is sheer nonsense. But it was otherwise with those whose minds were steeped in Pagan philosophy. The Greeks knew no such distinction. With them the soul was matter as well as the body—matter in a more subtle form. There was nothing incongruous, therefore, in the thought of washing it with water. And the practice of exorcising or blessing the water sprang from the Gnostic belief that evil attached to everything corporeal.

What further proof is needed of the Pagan origin of the baptism of Christendom? The early corrupters of Christianity transferred to their new religion a rite with which their old religion had made them familiar, and this they described by the term which Holy Scripture provided. Nor was it confined to the Eleusinian mysteries. In Prescott's Conquest of Mexico a description is given of the rite in use in that country when the Spaniards landed on its shores. The priestess midwife sprinkled water on the head of the infant, and then, after exorcising the unclean spirit (as does the Romish priest), she used these words: "He now liveth anew and is born anew; now he is purified and cleansed." And in his work on Buddhism Sir Monier Williams describes<sup>1</sup> a similar rite practised in Tibet and Mongolia. The child is baptized on the third or tenth day after birth. "The priest consecrates the water, while candles and incense are burning. He then dips the child three times, blesses it, and gives it a name."

It was not from Greece that these superstitious rites were derived. All had a common origin, and that origin is to be sought in the mysteries of ancient Babylon.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Lecture xiii. p. 356.

The corruption of the other "sacrament" proceeded on similar lines. First the doctrine of it became leavened by that of the mysteries, and at a later stage the ceremonial was altered to suit the corrupted ordinance. The Paschal Supper was a memorial of Israel's redemption; the Lord's Supper, a memorial of the great antitype of that redemption. No mind formed upon the teaching of Scripture could miss its meaning as a celebration of the Lord's death until He returns. Pliny's famous letter to Trajan gives proof of the simplicity of the rite in those early days; and the Apology of Tertullian<sup>2</sup> bears testimony that, so far as the ceremonial of it was concerned, the rite was still uncorrupted a century after the close of the apostolic age. Not so its doctrine. In the same passage in which Justin Martyr gives proof how entirely the Pagan view of baptism had obtained, he uses language about the Eucharist that may fairly be appealed to in support of "transubstantiation," the "mixed chalice," and "the reservation of the sacrament."<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The Gorham case decided that baptismal regeneration is not the doctrine of the Church of England. The then Bishop of Exeter refused to institute Mr. Gorham to a living in his diocese because he rejected this doctrine, and the Dean of Arches Court of Canterbury upheld the bishop's decision. But the judgment of the Court below was reversed on appeal by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (March 8, 1850). It is an interesting fact that, as the result of that judgment, one of Bishop Philpot's chaplains "verted" to Rome, and the other became a thorough evangelical. In those days men had a conscience and acted upon its dictates.

<sup>2</sup> Chap. xxxix.

The conception of the table as an altar came in later; and of the elements as "mysteries," later still. By a natural sequence of error the minister in due course became a priest. But it was not until the fifth century that the ordinance had been completely paganised. The following extracts describe the simple ritual of the middle of the second century and the beginning of the third, and of the Pagan cult which had superseded it two centuries later.

In the passage already referred to from his Apology Justin describes the assembling of the Christians, and the order of service, and then proceeds:—

"After which, there is brought to that one of the brethren who presides bread and a cup of wine mixed with water. And he having received them gives praise and glory to the Father of all things through the name of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, and gives thanks in many words for that God hath vouchsafed these things. And when he hath finished his praises and thanksgiving, all the people who are present express their assent, saying, 'Amen,' which in the Hebrew tongue means, 'So be it.' The President having given thanks, and the people having expressed their assent, those whom we call deacons give to each of those who are present a portion of the bread which hath been blessed, and of the wine mixed with water; and carry some away for those who are absent."<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> "Apol." I. 85, 86.

And Tertullian writes:—

"Our supper sufficiently shows its meaning by its very name. It is called by a term which in Greek signifies love. . . . We sit not down to eat until prayer to God be made, as it were, the first morsel. . . . Our conversation is that of men who are conscious that the Lord hears them. After water is brought for the hands, and lights, we are invited to sing to God, according as each one can propose a subject from the Holy Scriptures, or of his own composing. Prayer in like manner concludes the feast."<sup>2</sup>

The following is the description of what is ostensibly the same supper, as "celebrated" a few generations afterwards:—

"Then the sacred hierarch initiates the sacred prayer

---

<sup>1</sup> Justin, "Apol." I. 85.

<sup>2</sup> "Apol." xxxix.

and announces to all the holy peace ; and after all have saluted each other, the mystic recital of the sacred lists is completed. The hierarch and the priests wash their hands in water ; he stands in the midst of the Divine altar, and around him stand the priests and the chosen ministers. The hierarch sings the praises of the Divine working, and consecrates the most Divine mysteries, and by means of the symbols which are sacredly set forth he brings into open vision the things of which he sings the praises. And when he has shown the gifts of the Divine working, he himself comes into a sacred communion with them, and then invites the rest. And having both partaken and given to the others a share in the thearchic communion, he ends with a sacred thanksgiving ; and while the people bend over what are Divine symbols only, he himself, always by the thearchic spirit, is led in a priestly manner, in purity of his Godlike frame of mind, through blessed and spiritual contemplation, to the holy realities of the mysteries.”<sup>1</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> Dionysius the Areopagite (“Eccles. Hier.” c. 3). The above translation is from Hatch’s “Hibbert Lectures,” X. pp. 303, 304. Though the works attributed to this writer be not authentic, their genuineness is accepted. As Dr. Hatch says, “There are few Catholic treatises on the Eucharist and few Catholic manuals of devotion into which his conceptions do not enter.”

CHAPTER X

“THE illuminated mind of primitive Christendom” is a favourite illusion of modern Christian thought. It is the popular belief that in the early centuries of our era, in the days of “the undivided Church,” the faith was pure, and a high morality marked the lives of those who professed it. To dispel so pleasing an illusion is an uncongenial task. But the rôle of the iconoclast is sometimes a useful one. When the brazen serpent became a fetish in Israel, and the people burned incense to it, the good king Hezekiah contemptuously “called it a piece of brass,” and “brake it in pieces.”<sup>1</sup> And since the Church has become an idol and an enemy to Christianity, it becomes a duty to expose the falseness of its pretensions. The position accorded to it in the religion of Christendom is itself a mark of the apostasy; and in the place which God in fact designed that it should hold in the world, it has utterly failed.

<sup>1</sup> 2 Kings xviii. 4 (marg.).

In this respect its history in no way differs from that of "the Church in the wilderness."<sup>1</sup> In the one case as in the other, it is a story of Divine forbearance and of human failure and sin. When Israel's redemption was accomplished, and the mediator of the covenant had gone up to God, the people forthwith showed themselves to be "stiffnecked" by making the golden calf. And thereupon, Moses "took the tabernacle, and pitched it without the camp, . . . and every one that sought the Lord went out unto the tabernacle of the congregation, which was without the camp."<sup>2</sup> Organised religion proved a failure at the very outset. And so has it been in Christendom. Even in apostolic times incipient apostasy had declared itself; and the very Epistle which was written expressly to unfold the right of access to

<sup>1</sup> Acts vii. 38.

<sup>2</sup> Exod. xxxii. xxxiii. 7.

God in virtue of "eternal redemption" secured in Christ, gives prominence to the exhortation to "go forth unto Him without the camp."<sup>1</sup> Upon Him, only and altogether, spiritual blessing depends.

Of the Church of the martyrs we would speak with deep and unfeigned respect. The noble testimony rendered by the devoted lives of Christians, amidst the indescribable sufferings of those awful times, is the heritage of the Church in all succeeding ages. And yet it is a startling fact that even in presence of the constant danger of the most terrible persecution, abounding false doctrine produced its "kindly fruit" in lowering the standard of Christian morality.

Cyprian, the enthusiastic admirer and disciple of Tertullian, was born about the beginning of the third century.<sup>2</sup> The child of heathen parents, he lived the life of a heathen until, at about 45 years of age, he was converted to Christianity. Within a few months after his baptism he was ordained presbyter, and some three years later (248) he became bishop of Carthage. Ten years afterwards he suffered martyrdom in the persecution under Valerian. In those early days a bishop was appointed "with the consent of the whole Church," or by popular acclamation;<sup>1</sup> and never was the popular voice more thoroughly justified than in the case of Cyprian. But what concerns us here is not the excellence of the man, but the condition to which organised Christianity had sunk at this early stage of its history.

<sup>1</sup> Heb. xiii. 13. This is not an exhortation to an isolated act, such as seceding from a corrupt communion. But, like the "Let us draw near" of chap. x. 22, it represents the true attitude and habit of the Christian life. Mark the tense in both cases (pres. subj.).

<sup>2</sup> That is, only about a hundred years after the death of the last of the apostles. See Appendix IV., Note V.

The first eighteen months of Cyprian's episcopal rule were the close of a period during which the Church had rest from its enemies. In the absence of persecution Christianity had spread, but it had deteriorated. "Serious scandals existed even among the clergy. Bishops were farmers, traders, and money-lenders, and by no means always honest. Some were too ignorant to teach the catechumens. Presbyters made money by helping in the manufacture of idols."<sup>1</sup> But this was not all. With the close of the apostolic age the great truth of Grace had disappeared. No statement of it is to be found in the patristic literature. And in the century and a half which had passed since the last of the apostles disappeared from the scene, Christian doctrines had become corrupted by the teaching of Greek paganism. As already noticed, Pagan baptism had superseded Christian baptism as the initiatory rite of Christian fellowship. Christian thought had become leavened by the Gnostic philosophy which regarded everything corporeal as evil. The result was an attempt to set up a more fastidious morality and a more exalted piety than were taught by Christianity itself. Christianity raised the marriage relationship to a dignity it had never before possessed;<sup>1</sup> but gnosticism taught the Church to disparage it, and to confound asceticism with sanctity. And even in those early days a system of pledged celibacy led to the deplorable evils which have always characterised it.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The case of the great Ambrose of Milan is a specially remarkable instance of this. He was Consular Prefect of the Roman province of which Milan was the seat of government. Called in to suppress a riot between the "Catholic" party and the Arians, at an Episcopal election in the year 374—such were the ways of the "Primitive Church"—he made a speech to the "Christian" rioters; and they responded by cries of "Ambrose for Bishop." To escape from them he fled from Milan; but the Emperor (Valentinian I.) ordered him to accept the office. So he was forthwith baptized, and a week afterwards he was consecrated Bishop. He it was to whom Augustine owed his instruction in the Christian faith; and to him tradition assigns the authorship of the Te Deum.

<sup>1</sup> Dr. Plummer's "Church of the Early Fathers," chap. vii.

There is no sadder reading than the story of "saints" shut up in lonely cells, and wasting their lives in wrestling with evil passions which Christians who make no special claim to saintship overcome, as God intended they should be overcome, by turning away from them to the healthy activities of Christian work, or the no less healthy duties of a useful life. The Divine command, like all Divine commands, is intensely reasonable: "Flee youthful lusts; but follow after righteousness, faith, love, peace, with them that call on the Lord out of a pure heart,"<sup>3</sup>—not abstract virtues to be spun out, like a spider's web, in solitude and gloom, but Christian graces to be cultivated in an active life, helped and gladdened by Christian fellowship, the companionship, not of monks or nuns, but of all like-minded.

<sup>1</sup> See Appendix IV., Note VI.

<sup>2</sup> See Appendix IV., Note VII.

<sup>3</sup> 2 Tim. ii. 22.

But the religion of Christendom, in violation of the truth of God and of the common sense of mankind, has ever taught that the better way is for men and women in the flush of youthful vigour to turn away from all that forms the Christian character, and constitutes the true discipline of Christian life, and to shut themselves up to the morbid contemplation of evil, and the effort to overcome it by unchristian asceticism and penances.<sup>1</sup> The result has too often been utter shipwreck of both faith and morals. And not a few who seem to have succeeded have become, not saints, but pharisees.

As regards women the subject is a delicate one. The vows of a nun are no longer the introduction to a life of sin. In England, at least, where the Reformation is a power, it may be assumed that morality is not outraged in a nunnery. But English law and the rights of citizens are outraged there. Although our gaols are open to inspection of the fullest and most systematic kind, official and unofficial, we do not tolerate life imprisonment even for the worst of criminals. But religious women who have been trapped into taking vows are shut up for life, where no inspection whatever is allowed. And can any one doubt that not a few of them eat out their very hearts in hopeless yearnings for liberty, and sink at last in madness or despair? Mahometans would not be permitted to entomb women in this way in this country ; but Paganism which shelters itself under the name of Christ can override the law, and outrage the very principles of our constitution.

<sup>1</sup> "Why," the apostle demands, "do ye subject yourselves to ordinances . . . after the precepts and doctrines of men? Which things have indeed a show of wisdom in will-worship, and humility, and severity to the body; but are not of any value against the indulgence of the flesh" (Col. ii. 20-23, R.V.).

Tertullian, the founder of Latin theology, was the originator of the sanctimonious sentiment about marriage to Christ, which has in every age betrayed so many thousands of impressionable young women into wrecking their lives by taking vows of celibacy.<sup>1</sup> His letters to his wife dis-

<sup>1</sup> I am not unmindful of the language of 2 Cor. xi. 2, but I refuse to read into it the sentimental and pestilently mischievous close the extent to which these baneful errors had obtained even then. The New Testament prescribes that "a bishop must be the husband of one wife": the Church had already reached the point of substituting may for "must." Indeed, the word celibacy had practically taken the place of "marriage" in the New Testament injunction, "Let marriage be held in honour among ALL."<sup>1</sup> idea that a woman who devotes herself to a life of religious asceticism becomes "the spouse of Christ." The words referred to were addressed to "the Church of God which is at Corinth," and not to any young woman at all; and they point, not to the time when that Church was formed, but to the day of future glory. Not even the Church corporately is the bride—a vagary of religious doctrine which Scripture negatives; first, by never asserting it; secondly, by teaching that the Church holds a relationship which is inconsistent with it, namely, that of the body of Christ; and thirdly, by assigning the bridal relationship to Israel. It was to Israel that John the Baptist referred in John iii. 29, and the bride then disappears from the New Testament until in the Revelation we read of the New Jerusalem—the future glory of the true Israel ("our mother"—see Gal. iv. 26). But Eph. v. 25-33 is conclusive. The earthly relationship is readjusted according to a heavenly standard, and as the Church is the body of Christ, the Christian is to love his wife "even as himself." Mark the force of "nevertheless" in verse 33.

The results of this pestilent system, even at

<sup>1</sup> Heb. xiii. 4. The words which follow in the text prove conclusively the meaning of the exhortation. The marriage intended was no Platonic union such as Tertullian might have approved.

that early period, may be learned from Cyprian's words. He charges the nuns (the word had not yet been coined) with "frequenting public places, sumptuously arrayed, alluring the eyes of youth, fomenting lawless passions, and kindling the sparks of desire." He charges them with "hearing and taking part in licentious conversations, hearing what offends good morals, and seeing what must not be spoken of." "What have the virgins of the Church to do," he exclaims, "at promiscuous baths, there to violate the commonest dictates of feminine modesty! The places you frequent are more filthy than the theatre itself: all modesty is there laid aside, and with your robes, your personal honour and reserve are cast off."<sup>1</sup>

To appreciate this we must remember that these "virgins of the Church" were held in special honour for their supposed sanctity. The state of things here described would have been impossible if the general standard of piety, and even of morality, had not been utterly lowered.

Nor was this peculiar to Carthage. The writings of some of the earlier Fathers disclose their distress at the condition of the Church. Half a century before Cyprian wrote the words above cited, Clement of Alexandria had bewailed the worldliness and the low morality which prevailed around him even when, as he said, "the wells of martyrdom were flowing daily." His testimony, moreover, is the more striking because, unlike the majority of the Fathers, his teaching on the subject of marriage and celibacy was, in the main, Christian.<sup>1</sup> "Those who make profession of Christianity," he urges, "should be all of a piece." But in contrast with this he charges the Christians with bearing one aspect while in church, and as soon as they left it, mingling in the crowd so as to be in no way distinguished from it. "After having reverently waited upon God and heard of Him," he says, "they leave Him there; and without, find their pleasure in ungodly fiddling and love-songs and what not—stage-plays and gross revelries."

<sup>1</sup> "De Habitu Virginum."

<sup>1</sup> No one of them, indeed, excelled him in sobriety of judgment on all subjects. He enjoys the special honour of having been gazetted "saint," and then having had his name struck out of the calendar by Pope Benedict XIV.

But the true test of the teaching of the Fathers is to be found in the state of things which prevailed in the halcyon days when the persecutions had finally ceased, and the Church was free to shape her destiny and pursue her mission to the world unchecked. The condition of this much vaunted primitive Church in the days of Chrysostom may be judged by the fact that at a single visitation that great and good man deposed no fewer than thirteen bishops for simony and licentiousness. Referring to the means by which men obtained election to bishoprics, he says: "That some have filled the churches with murders, and made cities desolate when contending for this position, I now pass over, lest I should seem to say what is incredible to any."<sup>1</sup> He was equally unsparing in dealing with the vices of the lower orders of clergy. The natural result followed. The "historic Church" convened a packed council which deprived him of his archbishopric, and he was banished to Nicæa. Moved, however, by the indignant fury of the laity, the Emperor recalled him, and his return to Constantinople was like a public triumph. But his fearless and scathing denunciations of the corruptions and immoralities of Church and Court led to the summoning of another council, more skilfully arranged, and his second banishment was intended to be, as in fact it proved, a death sentence. He practically died a martyr—one of the first of the great army whose blood cries to God for vengeance upon the “historic Church.”

<sup>1</sup> "De Sac." lib. iii. c. x.

Nor were licentiousness and simony evils of recent growth in the Church; nor were they peculiar to the See of Chrysostom. In 370 an Imperial edict was read in the churches of Rome, prohibiting clerics and monks from resorting to the houses of widows or female wards, and making them “incapable of receiving anything from the liberality or will of any woman to whom they may have attached themselves under the plea of religion; and (the edict adds) any such donations or legacies as they shall have appropriated to themselves shall be confiscated.”

This edict, sweeping though were its terms, had to be confirmed and strengthened by another twenty years later. And here is the comment of Jerome on the subject: "I blush to say it, heathen priests, players of pantomimes, drivers of chariots in the circuses, and harlots, are allowed to receive legacies; clergy and monks are forbidden to do so by Christian princes. Nor do I complain of the law (he adds), but I am grieved that we deserve it."<sup>1</sup> According to Jerome, so great was the evil that men actually sought ordination in order to gain easier access to the society of women, and to trade upon their credulity. He at least maintained no reserve about the vices of the clergy of his day. And the picture he draws of the state of female society among the Christians is so repulsive that, as a recent writer remarks, we would gladly believe it to be exaggerated; but, he adds, "if the priesthood, with its enormous influence, was so corrupt, it is only too probable that it debased the sex which is always most under clerical influence."<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Wordsworth's "Church History," vol. iii. p. 92.

<sup>2</sup> Professor Dill's "Roman Society in the Last Century of the Western Empire," p. 113.

Among Chrysostom's enemies was Theophilus, Patriarch of Alexandria, whose nephew Cyril succeeded him in the patriarchate about the year 412, some five years after Chrysostom's death. Cyril inherited his uncle's antipathy to Chrysostom, and opposed as long as he could every effort to cancel the infamous sentence pronounced against him. He is held in fame as a "Saint" and a "Father": in his lifetime he was famous as a mob leader. He violently closed the churches of those whom he deemed heretics, attacked the synagogues, and drove the Jews in thousands from Alexandria, giving up their houses to pillage. As Dean Milman writes of him: "While ambition, intrigue, arrogance, rapacity, and violence are proscribed as unchristian means—barbarity, persecution, bloodshed, as unholy and unevangelic wickednesses, posterity will condemn this orthodox Cyril as one of the worst of heretics against the spirit of the Gospel."<sup>1</sup>

This turbulent Pagan was the ruling spirit in the third of the "Œcumenical" Councils held at Ephesus in 431 to deal with the Nestorian heresy. This is not the place to discuss the controversy then at issue; but the intelligent Christian will recognise, first, that all, orthodox and heretics alike, ignored the Lord's solemn warning that "No man knoweth the Son but the Father"; and, secondly, that the prominence given to the charge that Nestorius refused the title of "Mother of God" to the Virgin Mary, is proof that the so-called orthodox had no monopoly of the truth. But Nestorius and his adherents were condemned and banished. Cyril secured this "ripe decision" of "the illuminated mind of primitive Christendom" <sup>1</sup> partly by forcing on the business of the council before the arrival of bishops who, it was known, would support Nestorius, and partly by the free use of a hired mob.

<sup>1</sup> The murder of the beautiful and accomplished Hypatia is attributed to his instigation. The verdict of a Scotch Court upon the case against him would perhaps be Not proven.

Some people deem it impiety to doubt that such a council was controlled by the Holy Ghost. Others deem it profanity to call the name of God over scenes of the kind. The reader must judge for himself which is right. Whatever his decision may be, the fact remains that the Emperor, unable to restrain the disorder which prevailed in the council, dissolved it at length with the rebuke, "God is my witness that I am not the author of this confusion. His providence will discover and punish the guilty. Return to your provinces, and may your private virtues repair the mischief and scandal of your meeting."

<sup>1</sup> Liddon deprecates "the earnest but short-sighted piety which imagines that it can dare . . . to ignore those ripe decisions which we owe to the illuminated mind of primitive Christendom" ("Bampton Lectures," 1866, p. 64).

Disgraceful as were the scenes which characterised this Œcumenical Council, they were far surpassed by those which marked the "Council of Robbers," as it is called, which assembled in Ephesus eighteen years later. On that occasion the violence of the orthodox majority was unrestrained. They openly called in their hired bullies, and the unfortunate Flavian, bishop of Byzantium, was so brutally beaten by them that he died from his injuries. That there were men of God among these bishops, whose hearts were filled with shame and sorrow by such proceedings, we may well assume. But the majority of them must have been a set of baptismally regenerated Pagans.

But some may think perhaps that the proceedings of these councils did not fairly represent the state of the Church in this post-Nicene era of its history. The testimony of a contemporary writer of the highest repute will silence all such generous doubts. Salvian, a presbyter in the Church at Marseilles, was born about the year 390. He was thus a contemporary of Jerome and Augustine, and his celebrated treatise on Providence appeared some twenty years after the death of the former, and ten years after the death of the latter of these great lights of Latin theology. If ever there was a time when the teaching of the Fathers might fairly be judged by its fruits it was then.

“The silence of God” was a favourite theme with the Fathers. If there was indeed a sovereign and righteous administration of human affairs—if God was indeed the God of His people, why was the Church left to its fate? Augustine had attempted a learned and elaborate reply to the cavil. Salvian answers it bluntly thus: “See what Christians actually are, everywhere, and then ask whether, under the administration of a righteous and holy God, such men can expect any favour? What happens every day under our eyes is rather an evidence of the doctrine of Providence, as it displays the Divine displeasure, provoked by the debauchery of the Church itself."

The scope of this indictment shall be given in Salvian's own words. The following passages are culled from pages full of earnest, and at times pathetic, appeals, and of scathing denunciations of abounding profligacy and evil. Roman Catholics of course resent his unsparing disclosure of the state of the "primitive Church," but no honest mind can fail to be impressed by the transparent truthfulness of his language, and the evident pain which it cost him. Here is his testimony<sup>1</sup>:—

"How can we wonder that God does not hearken to our prayers, seeing that we listen not to His commands? Not merely do we neglect what is enjoined, but with our utmost endeavour we do the very contrary. God commands us to love one another; we rend each other. He commands us all to impart of our substance to the needy ; we encroach upon each other's rights. God commands that the Christian should be pure, even as to the eye ; but who among us does not roll himself in the mire of fornication ? And what more ? Alas, how grievous and doleful is what I have to say ! The very Church of God, which in all things ought to be the pacificatrix of God, what, in fact, is she but the provoker of God ? And a very few excepted, who flee from evil, what else is almost every assembly of Christians but a sink of vices ? For you will find in the Church scarcely one who is not either a drunkard, or a glutton, or an adulterer, or a fornicator, or a ravisher, or a frequenter of brothels, or a robber, or a murderer ;—and, what is worse than all—almost all these without limit. I put it now to the consciences of all Christian people, whether it be not so, that you will hardly find one who is not addicted to some of the vices and crimes which I have mentioned : or rather, who is it that is not guilty of all ? Truly you will more easily find the man who is guilty of all, than one who is guilty of none. As to this 'none,' my imputations perhaps may seem too serious : I will go further—sooner will you find those chargeable with every crime, than not chargeable with any ; sooner those addicted to the greatest crimes than those guilty of the less. I mean to say, more are living in the perpetration of the greater as well as of the lighter vices, than of the lighter alone. Into this shameless dissoluteness of manners, is nearly the entire ecclesiastical mass so sunk, that throughout the Christian community it has come to be regarded as a species of sanctity, if one is a little less vicious than others. And so it is that the churches, or rather the temples and altars of God, are by some held in less reverence than the most inferior courts and common magistrates' rooms. . . .

---

<sup>1</sup> Salvian "De Gub. Dei." The Latin original of these passages will be found in the appendix of Taylor's "Ancient Christianity"; and in the main I have adopted Taylor's translation of them.

“The churches are outraged by indecencies, and by the irreverence of those who rush thence, after the formal confession of their past sins, to the perpetration of more. You may well imagine what men have been thinking about at church when you see them hurry off, some to plunder, some to get drunk, some to practise lewdness, some to rob on the highway. . . .

“Let us then see whether any of this rank [i.e., the rich and noble] can plead exemption from one of these two capital crimes—murder and adultery. Who is there, that if his hands do not reek with human blood, is not soiled with foul impurities? And yet, though one of these burdens is enough to sink a man to perdition, hardly is there a rich man who is not chargeable with both!”

He goes on to assert plainly that the Christians were actually worse than the heathen around them, differing from them in nothing save in “the knowledge and profession of Catholic doctrine.” And he goes on to say:—

“I must not be understood as affirming this absolutely of the entire mass of the Roman world. For I except, first, all the monks,<sup>1</sup> and then some even of the seculars, not inferior to them, or, if that be saying too much, at least comparable to the monks in virtuous behaviour. As for the rest, all, or nearly all, I affirm to be more guilty than the heathen. . . . Reader, art thou angry at seeing this stated? Condemn me if I lie; condemn me if I do not make good what I assert.”

---

<sup>1</sup> Omnes religiosos. It is a significant fact that even in those early days the word religious had already been corrupted.

If the writer had declared that most of the monks were free from these charges it would be a grateful relief from the terrible darkness of the picture. But when he says, "I except all the monks," it is too obvious that he does so merely on grounds of policy. The sequel, moreover, makes this clear. Later on in his treatise he breaks through the reserve he had imposed upon himself, and speaks out thus:—

"But it is only the laity, I warrant you, who sin at this rate! surely not some of the clergy; worldly men, but surely not many of the monks? Aye, indeed, under a colour of religion, sold to worldly vices, these men who, inscribing themselves with a title of sanctity after a course of shameless profligacy and crime, differ from what they were in profession only, not in conduct . . . . Can any one believe that men should have been thinking anything of conversion and of God, who, abstaining from intercourse with their own wives, have made no scruple of trenching upon the rights of others; and who, while they make profession of bodily continence, act like bacchanals in the debaucheries of the mind? . . . ."

One quotation more:—

"How should we exult and leap for joy if indeed we could believe that the good and the bad were nearly balanced in the Church as to numbers. . . . Yea, how could we be but happy in so thinking, when, in fact, we have to mourn over almost the whole mass as guilty. . . . If all are not equally bad, they would fain be so if they could, and even display an ambition not to be outdone in wickedness."

These are but extracts. There is far more besides of the same character. He refers, for example, to the infamous profanity of swearing by the name of Christ—a habit that had long been common with the monks, and had in Salvian's time apparently become habitual. "They seem to think (he says) that when they have sworn by Christ their crimes are in some way sanctioned by religion." He cites cases even where men committed shameful acts of wrong because they had already sworn to Christ to do them!

The morality of the Early Christians is one of Gibbon's "Five causes of the growth of Christianity." And Tertullian could boast that among those who were brought to justice for offences against the law no Christian could be found, "unless, indeed, the name of Christian were his only offence." Any, he declared, who transgressed the strict rules of Christian discipline and propriety were no longer considered Christians at all.<sup>1</sup> And yet, two centuries later, "ALMOST EVERY ASSEMBLY OF CHRISTIANS HAD BECOME A SINK OF VICES." If the ages which followed were "dark," as indeed they were, it was because the Church had utterly failed of its mission, and was sunk in error and evil of every kind. God has never left Himself without a witness, and doubtless there were those who feared Him and thought upon His name. But organised Christianity had disappeared from the earth. When Pagan baptism became the initiatory rite of Christian fellowship, the Church of Christendom morally ceased to be the Church of God ; and when, the fear of persecution having ceased, Pagans flocked in through that open door in thousands, the entire mass soon sank to the level of the heathen world.

<sup>1</sup> "Apology," xliv. and xlvi. Origen uses language as strong in his apology "Against Celsus."

Indeed, the case might be stated still more strongly. Even the heathen world was scandalised by the exhibition of impurity and hatred presented by what is blasphemously called the Church of God. "See how these Christians love one another" had given place to "See how these Christians hate one another." In the fight for the Popedom between the faction of Damasus and of Ursinus one hundred and thirty-seven corpses were left on the pavement of one of the churches of Rome in a single day.<sup>1</sup> What wonder that a Pagan historian of that age—a man whose writings are praised for the moderation with which he speaks of the Christians—declared that no savage beasts could equal the cruelty of Christians to one another!<sup>2</sup> What wonder that penal laws of merciless severity were needed to keep the baptismally regenerated Pagans from turning back to paganism!<sup>3</sup>

If the reader will but bring an honest and intelligent mind to bear upon the problem he cannot fail to recognise the moral of it. A tree is known by its fruits. In no possible circumstances could Christianity produce results such as have here been depicted. As surely as ever effect followed its cause, these results were the natural outcome of the doctrinal teaching—the christianised paganism—which had taken the place of Christianity in this much vaunted primitive Church

<sup>1</sup> Dill's "Roman Society," p. 111.

<sup>2</sup> Ibid. p. 28.

<sup>3</sup> Between 381 and 396 six enactments of this kind were added to the code, denouncing the apostates in tones of ever-increasing severity, and this at a time when the Christians were in high favour at the Imperial Court.

—the Church of the Fathers. The theory that that Church entered the Dark Ages united, pure, and powerful, and that the corruptions which characterised it when the light of a brighter age began to shine in Christendom, are to be attributed to Rome—this is a delusion.

And the delusion is a mischievous one. The misguided men who are now seeking to drag England back into the darkness are only embittered by charges based upon this error. Among them there are Jesuits, who from base motives cling to the Church which they betray. But these are an unworthy minority. The Ritualists as a body are sincere. And they know that the main doctrines for which they contend are derived, not from Rome, but from “the primitive and undivided Church” of the Fathers. The Reformers knew this also; and therefore they appealed, not to the cult of primitive Christendom, but to the Christianity of the New Testament. And no other appeal is worth struggling for. In the sixteenth century “The Bible was the religion of Protestants”; and if “the Evangelical Party” to-day is powerless to rally the country round them, or to stem the rising tide of error and superstition, it is because the Bible is no longer the labarum of the evangelical cause. These unworthy descendants of the sixteenth century Protestants seem to think more of the dregs of Pagan sacramentalism and priestcraft, left unpurged in their ritual, than of the great principles on which the Reformers took their stand, and in the power of which they triumphed over "the superstitions of a thousand years." Could those noble men but return to the scene of their labours and their triumph, with what indignant wonder they would regard their degenerate successors of this age of false liberality and compromise! <sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> There are very many of the evangelical clergy, and vast numbers of the laity, to whom my words do not apply. But I am speaking of the party as a unit; and the influence of the party is destroyed by the attitude of compromise maintained by the majority of its clerical members. If the evangelical party stood to-day where it stood half a century ago, it would have the country behind it, and it could dictate terms to those in authority. But instead of taking their stand upon the Bible, these men seek to go as far as they possibly can with the Romanisers, and slavishly follow them in many of their evil practices. How can such men excite enthusiasm for the principles of the Reformation? Fancy a temperance movement led by men who drink with the drunkards, stopping short only at getting drunk themselves! The old evangelicals put Christ first in everything; the modern ritualists put the Church first in everything. The one position is Christianity ; the other the Christian religion. Modern evangelicalism in the Church of England is a feeble attempt at compromise between the truth and the error. Instead, therefore, of being a barrier against ritualism, it is but a half-way house on the road to it ; as ritualism is a half-way house on the road to Rome. We can understand the position of those who hold that the Episcopal Churches of Christendom constitute the Church. But what can be said for men who imagine that the Church of England is the Church, though they have reserves about the Ritualists? They are like the old Scotchwoman who narrowed the pale of orthodoxy to herself and her husband, adding, after a pause, " And I'm no' sure about my husband ! "

CHAPTER XI

SOME who thought, perhaps, when first opening these pages, that the title was no more than "a quaint conceit," will have come to see what depth of meaning there is in it. Just as "the Jews' religion" was a human system based upon a Divine revelation, so is it with the religion of Christendom. But the Judaism of Messianic times was not an apostasy in the sense in which that can be averred of the religion of Christendom. For the Lord could sanction by His presence the services both of the temple and the synagogue. The cult was right: it was the men who were wrong. "God is Spirit, and they who worship Him must worship in spirit."<sup>1</sup> With unspiritual men, therefore, even a religion which in itself was true became of necessity false. "For the kingdom of God is not meat and drink ; but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost." <sup>1</sup> And if this was true in regard to the cult in which ordinances and the external element filled so large a place, how intensely true must it be of Christianity.

<sup>1</sup> John iv. 24. See p. 85, ante.

Moses was the Buddha of "the Jews' religion." And in externals at least there was no wilful departure from his teaching. Any blunders in this respect were made honestly and through ignorance. Blunders there were, as for example in the celebration of the Day of the Firstfruits. This error, which has escaped the notice of theologians, destroyed the significance of one of the great characteristic types of the law. The law enjoined that "on the morrow after the Sabbath" of Passover week, the first sheaf of the harvest should be cut and carried to the temple, to be "waved before Jehovah." The true "Day of the Firstfruits," therefore, always fell upon the "first day of the week." But in Ezra's revival, misreading the injunction, they took "the Sabbath" to mean the festival day of the passover. And thus it came about that on that Sabbath day during which the Lord lay in the grave, the Jews were celebrating a rite divinely ordained to typify His resurrection from the dead.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Rom. xiv. 17.

But while those who made a Buddha of Moses sought to follow his teaching with the most scrupulous care, the New Testament has received very different treatment in the religion of Christendom. When the Lord and His disciples met to eat the paschal supper, the rite was essentially the same as in the days of Hezekiah or of Samuel. And if a heathen stranger could have passed from that "upper room" to other kindred scenes in <sup>1</sup> See Lev. xxiii. 10, 11, 15, 16; and Deut. xvi. 9. Also John xix. 31 ("that Sabbath was an high day," because it was "the day of the firstfruits"). I have dealt more fully with this in The Coming Prince, Chapter ix., and have there pointed out that the true "Day of Pentecost," as divinely ordered, was not the Sabbath upon which the Jews observed it, but that "first day of the week" on which the Holy Spirit was given. 1 Cor. xv. 20, 23 especially refers to the firstfruits as a type of the resurrection. Just as God's accepting the first sheaf gathered was a token and pledge of His acceptance of the whole harvest, so the resurrection of Christ is a token and pledge of the resurrection of His people. I have seen it stated that one of the points on which the Karaites differed from the "orthodox" Jews was that they followed the Scriptures in celebrating the Day of the Firstfruits, and therefore also the Day of Pentecost, upon the first day of the week.

Jerusalem, no difference in the ritual would have attracted his attention. Here, was Israel's Messiah surrounded by His disciples ; there, were apostate Jews who on the morrow would clamour for Messiah's death. But disciples and apostates alike were celebrating the same ordinance according to the same ritual. The only difference between them was that while the disciples were spiritually quickened and enlightened, the apostates were spiritually in darkness and in death.

And if a Jew of those days could now come back to life he could again take part in the familiar rite in the home of any pious co-religionist. But imagine one of the primitive disciples present in St. Peter's at Rome to-day during the celebration of a baptism or a mass ! A devotee of the old Eleusinian mysteries would find himself at home in the scene ; but the disciple would shrink away from it, as from a specially profane development of paganism. Between the religion of Christendom and the revelation upon which it claims to be founded there yawns a gulf which is impassable. To the apostasy of Christendom Judaism affords no parallel. As already noticed, Judaism appears to be an exception to the strange law of degeneration which marks the religion of mankind. The Scriptures are still read in the synagogues, and the paschal supper is still celebrated in simplicity. And in the Scriptures and the paschal rite may yet be found the means of their spiritual restoration. The altar is there and the wood for the sacrifice: all that is lacking is the fire from heaven to kindle it—a signal proof of the truth that “God has not cast away His people.”<sup>1</sup> For though in this age of a silent Heaven, He does not declare Himself as the God “that repayeth them that hate Him to their face,” He is none the less “the faithful God which keepeth covenant . . . to a thousand generations.”<sup>2</sup>

Paganism is not less evil or less hateful because it masquerades in a Christian dress, and uses the language of Christianity. The guilt and infamy of Judas were all the greater because he ranked as an apostle of the Lord. And if there be indeed apostolic succession in the historic Church, we know to what source to trace its origin! The Judaism which crucified the Lord was essentially a true religion: it became a false religion only because the very truth of God when administered by carnal men is changed into a lie. But the religion of Christendom is essentially a false religion, and so lost to shame, moreover, that it makes no effort even to cover itself with a Christian terminology. About the priest and the altar the New Testament is silent, save in that Epistle which was written expressly to teach that they belong in type to Judaism and in antitype to Christ. And as for baptismal regeneration, and the mass, with its vestments and "candles vainly lighted at noon-day"<sup>1</sup>—these are the well-known stock-in-trade of a Pagan priesthood, and the New Testament knows absolutely nothing of them.

<sup>1</sup> Rom. xi. 2.

<sup>2</sup> Deut. vii. 9, 10.

Judaism, I repeat, affords no parallel to such an apostasy as this; but a counterpart may be sought in Buddhism. Just as the principles and practices of Buddhism are marked by the most flagrant opposition to the teaching of Gautama, so also the religion of Christendom stands out in open contrast with the teaching of Christ. I would not be understood as bracketing Gautama with the Lord Jesus Christ. I deplore such profanity.<sup>1</sup> But again I appeal to the history of Buddhism as a striking instance of the working of that same law of spiritual gravitation which has been so apparent and so disastrous in the history of what—if it be lawful to coin a much needed word—might be described as Christianism. For while in the sphere of morals and of mind man is master of himself, the ruin of his spiritual nature is complete. Here he is so entirely the slave of perverted religious instincts that, apart from Divine grace, his recovery is impossible.

<sup>1</sup> Tertullian ("Apol." xlvi.) used the words contemptuously of the practice of the Pagans.

But even here we must distinguish. Divine grace is needed for the apprehension of Divine truth, but not for the detection of human error. No grace is needed to save a man from card sharpers and “confidence trick” men; and his native wit might equally avail to save him from the artifices and errors of human religion.<sup>2</sup> In the only address to a heathen audience recorded in the New Testament, the Apostle appealed to reason and common sense to teach his hearers that their cult was false.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> I believe, moreover, that all that was best in the teaching of Gautama was derived from the Hebrew prophets. See Daniel in the Critics' Den, p. 49, note.

<sup>2</sup> But while the victim of the criminal is eager to hide his shame,

True it is that in the most solemn prophecy ever uttered—for the words fell from the lips of our Divine Lord—a time is foretold when false prophets shall arise who “shall show great signs and wonders, inasmuch that if it were possible they shall deceive the very elect.”<sup>2</sup> But that time is yet to come. “Great signs and wonders”! The only wonder is that any man can be deceived by such transparent frauds. The victim of the “confidence trick” can plead that with his eyes he saw the sheaf of counterfeit bank-notes, and he took them to be genuine. But what excuse can the victim of these sham priests set up to excuse his credulity? An honest-hearted schoolboy might well be ashamed of being duped by them. They are proved to be the dupe of the priest seems always ready to glory in it. Not many years ago one of our great city houses was defrauded of £20,000 in gold by a very clever, but very transparent trick; but their chief anxiety was to avoid the ridicule which publicity would have brought upon them.

<sup>1</sup> Acts xvii. 22-29.

<sup>2</sup> Matt. xxiv. 24.

impostors by the after lives of the babies they pretend to regenerate. The gaping yokels clustered round some travelling juggler on a village green are not such pitiable creatures as the men and women who are deluded by the hocus-pocus of the mass. And as for priestly absolution, if even-handed justice were meted out to all, the Vagrant Act would suffice to deal with it. Ignorant women are sent to gaol for deceiving people about their future in this world, but educated men are allowed to deceive them with impunity about their future in the next.

And yet human religion has a terrible power behind it. Satan is not, as men suppose, the instigator of their crimes. Religion is the special sphere of his influence. What other meaning can be given to the awful title, "the god of this world," accorded him in Holy Writ? Were it otherwise the religion of Christendom would never have survived the sixteenth century. When that century opened, the infamous Alexander VI. was on the papal throne. The letter of a devout Roman Catholic, recorded in the diary of a high official in personal attendance on the Pope, describes life in the Vatican under the Borgias. Here are extracts from it: "Everything can be had for money. Crimes grosser than Scythian are committed without disguise under the eyes of the Pope. There are rapes, murders, incests, debaucheries, cruelties, exceeding those of the Neros and Caligulas. Licentiousness past description is paraded in contempt of God and man. Sons and daughters are polluted. Harlots and procuresses are gathered together in the mansion of St. Peter. On All Saints' day fifty women of the town were invited to dinner." At this point the historian from whom the foregoing is quoted breaks off the narrative by adding: "The details of what followed are totally unmentionable."<sup>1</sup> The letter goes on to speak of the universal sale of indulgences, to provide a portion for the Pope's daughter, Lucretia, and also to mention his son Cesar Borgia as being as great a monster as himself. And as for the Sacred College, not a single voice is raised in warning or remonstrance.

Was it any wonder that when Charles V. ascended the Imperial throne the laity everywhere

<sup>1</sup> Froude's "Council of Trent," pp. 18, 19.

were in revolt against the Church? But the Emperor was no friend of Luther, no patron of the Protestants. The Edict of Worms, which devoted Luther to the flames, gave proof of his zeal for the Church; and it was no fault of his that that edict was frustrated. But the dream of his life was the calling of a council which, by dealing with the flagrant immoralities of the clergy, and allowing the voice of the laity a hearing, would prepare the way for his putting down the Protestants by force. Pope succeeded Pope, however, without his achieving his purpose. Neither Leo X. nor Clement VII. had any wish to be "reformed"; and when, a quarter of a century after Charles's accession, Paul III. found himself compelled at last to yield, he took care that the council should neither parley with the laity nor meddle with the vices of the clergy.

The secret history of the Council of Trent has been laid bare by its "incomparable historian," as Gibbon calls him—Paolo Sarpi of Venice, that amazing prodigy of genius and learning. The shameful story is before the world.<sup>1</sup> There was a

<sup>1</sup> See Appendix III.

Lot even in Sodom, and doubtless there were not a few such at Trent—the Spanish bishops were believed to be pure ; but the Italian majority were for the most part men of the same kidney as Pope Paul—that “Vicar of Christ” who openly pensioned his bastard children upon the State, and made cardinals of his schoolboy grandsons.<sup>1</sup> And these men, unknown to fame as theologians, and bound by their ordination oath to obey their master the Pope, settled the creed of Christendom, not omitting to devote to eternal damnation all who refuse the blasphemous lie that a thrice-holy God accredits licentious profligates as His ministers.

The Council of Constance<sup>2</sup> had claimed jurisdiction over the popes, and proceeded to try and depose the rival claimants to the chair of St. Peter, including John XXIII., of whom Gibbon writes : “The Vicar of Christ was only accused of piracy, murder, rape, sodomy, and incest ; the most scandalous charges were suppressed."<sup>1</sup> But the Council of Trent established the supreme authority of the Pope.

<sup>1</sup> See p. 89 ante. His friend and biographer, Cardinal Pallavicino, pleads that he was no worse than his contemporaries ! One might expect a “Vicar of Christ” to be better ; but this perhaps is proof of Protestant ignorance and bigotry.

<sup>2</sup> 1414–1417. Here it was that John Huss, who attended under an Imperial “safe conduct,” was seized and burnt at the stake.

Nine years after it was finally dissolved, occurred the "Massacre of St. Bartholomew." The leading Protestants of France were invited to Paris by the French king, Charles IX., to celebrate the marriage of his sister. They had been granted solemn and oath-bound pledges of safety, but at midnight on the festival of St. Bartholomew (21st Aug., 1572), the signal was given for their butchery. Ten thousand Huguenots, men, women, and children, including some five hundred persons of rank, were massacred. Their mangled bodies were flung into the streets; the gutters were choked with their blood. In other towns like butcheries were perpetrated. According to the estimate of Sully, the defenceless victims numbered seventy thousand. But when Charles, repenting too late of his hideous guilt, sought to palliate it by inventing charges of political conspiracy against the Huguenots, the "Vicar of Christ" rebuked his repentance by celebrating a Te Deum and ordering public rejoicings in honour of the crime. More than this, he sent Cardinal Orsino to convey his congratulations to the king. At Lyons, on his way to Paris, the emissary sought out the leader of the butchery, and gave him absolution and his blessing. And on reaching the capital he urged Charles to claim openly the credit of his acts, which future generations would attribute to zeal for the Catholic religion, now purified from heresy by the Council of Trent and by the extermination of the Protestant sect within his realm.

<sup>1</sup> "Decline and Fall," chap. lxx.

And this "Vicar of Christ" was not a depraved sensualist like some of his predecessors, but a theologian and a scholar.<sup>1</sup> Gregory XIII. had much in common with his successors of our own times. But on this very account his memory is branded with eternal infamy. If his name is to be bracketed with that of any living potentate, let it be, not with that of Leo XIII., but with that of "Abdul the damned," the guilty patron and apologist of the Armenian massacres.

And yet the Council of Trent has settled it

<sup>1</sup> He it was who introduced the Gregorian reform of the calendar.

that Leo XIII., notwithstanding his personal claims to veneration, has no better title to the homage of Christendom than an obscene monster like Alexander VI., or a monster as hateful, though of another kind, like Gregory XIII. That he is the successor of the Apostle Peter is a mere theory ; that he is the successor of these men is a plain fact. Just as a family or a nation can morally separate itself from its past, so can a Christian Church ; for it depends only on the living Christ in heaven, the Divine Spirit present upon earth, and the inspired word of God. But the Church of Christendom is united to its Buddha by a chain that reaches back through all the centuries of our era, and if one link be broken the chain is destroyed.

And if, remembering all this, we ask the way of life, we shall get answer, "Submission to the Church." And when we press the inquiry and ask, What is submission? we shall be told, "Not the profession of Catholic doctrines, but obedience to the voice of the Shepherd." For "the sheep hear the voice of their Shepherd and they follow Him. He chooses the pastures ; He leads His sheep into them. The relations of sheep and Shepherd correspond to those of disciple and Teacher. And hence it is clear that no one ought to be received into the Catholic Church unless he comes into the fold through the gate, of which Peter the Chief Shepherd is the Keeper."

The words are Cardinal Vaughan's. Referring to the difficulties and prejudices which have to be overcome, he proceeds: "Now, instead of entering into a maze of objections, into a labyrinth of difficulties, a shorter and more satisfactory course should be taken. Find the Divine Teacher, find the Supreme Shepherd, find the Vicar of Christ. Concentrate all your mental and moral faculties upon finding the Head of God's Church upon earth. This is the key to the situation."<sup>1</sup>

The daring profanity of this is accentuated by the use of capital letters, which lead the reader to suppose that the Divine titles so familiar to the student of Scripture refer to his Divine Lord. But he is startled and shocked to find that they are applied to an Italian priest, whose claim to them is, as we have seen, no better than that of the incarnate fiends of eternally infamous memory, who ruled the Church of Rome in other days.

<sup>1</sup> "The Primitive Church and the See of Peter." Preface.

Nothing ever penned by Edmund Burke has been more often challenged than the statement in the most brilliant passage of the most brilliant of his treatises, that "vice itself lost half its evil in losing all its grossness." By parity of reasoning it might perhaps be urged that the superstitions of Christendom are less degrading than those of Pagan cults. But the true contrast is between human superstitions on the one hand, and Christianity on the other. And this explodes the fallacy of Macaulay's well-known problem "Whether England owes more to the Roman Catholic religion or to the Reformation."<sup>1</sup> "For political and intellectual freedom," the historian goes on to say, "and for all the blessings which political and intellectual freedom brought in their train, she is chiefly indebted to the great rebellion of the laity against the priesthood." This is her debt to the Reformation. To the Church of Rome she owes it that the dawning of that bright day was delayed for centuries; that by her hideous cruelties, and the debasing influence of her teaching, the chains were riveted which at last made that "rebellion" a necessity.

<sup>1</sup> "History of England," chap. i.

It is commonly assumed that religion, if earnest and sincere, must be pleasing to God and a benefit to men. But Scripture and history combine to refute such an error. The religious zeal of those who crucified the Lord was altogether exemplary. Nor was religion with them what it has so often proved in the history of Christendom—a mere cloak for immorality. In the terrible denunciations of the pharisees, which fell from the lips of Christ Himself, the secret sinfulness of their hearts was exposed, but there was not a word to justify the charge that they were outwardly immoral. Nor was any such reproach ever cast upon them by the great apostle who had been trained in their school, and whose knowledge of their lives was intimate and full. "I bear them witness," he declared, "that they have a zeal for God."<sup>1</sup> And if such men were branded by the Lord Himself as a "generation of vipers," "children of hell," and farther from the kingdom than publicans and harlots, why should we doubt that there are men among us to-day of scrupulous morality and intense religious zeal, who, like them, are "children of hell," and farther from the kingdom than the openly dishonest and impure?

<sup>1</sup> Rom. x. 2.

The religion of Christendom has so lowered the standard of morals that morality has come to mean no more than freedom from one special lust. But God makes no such distinction between sins; and even men of the world have often juster thoughts. It was not thus that John Stuart Mill used the word when recording how his father taught him to regard religion as "the greatest enemy of morality."<sup>1</sup> The indictment is a terrible one; but in the light of notorious facts, who can resist the charge, inspired though it be by the bitterest prejudice?

From the murder of Abel to the supreme tragedy of Calvary, and down through the ages to these days of Armenian massacres and Mahdist horrors, religion has been the fruitful cause of more wickedness and hate and cruelty and bloodshed, than all the common lusts and vices of humanity. These lusts and vices have degraded men to the level of the brute, but religion has changed them into fiends.<sup>1</sup> Hence it is that in every age religion has been the most implacable enemy of God, the most relentless persecutor of His people.

<sup>1</sup> "Autobiography," p. 40.

“It cannot be,” the Lord exclaimed, “that a prophet perish out of Jerusalem!” With common men the prophet’s mantle would insure immunity from outrage. Religion it was that made it the outward badge and emblem of martyrdom. "Which of the prophets did not your fathers persecute?" was the martyr Stephen's scathing charge against the religious leaders of his people—"They killed them which showed before of the coming of the Righteous One, of whom ye have been now the betrayers and murderers." Religion it was that crucified the Lord of Glory, and stoned His faithful servant.<sup>1</sup> Religion inspired the persecutions even of Pagan Rome. For though in the case of a monster like Nero it was no more than a cloak for his infamies, in the case of emperors of a different type it was the genuine motive of their cruelties.

<sup>1</sup> The following is Hume’s account of the massacre of the Protestants in Ireland in 1641: “But death was the lightest punishment inflicted by these rebels. All the tortures which wanton cruelty could devise, all the lingering pains of body, the anguish of mind, the agonies of despair, could not satiate revenge excited without injury, and cruelty derived from no cause. To enter into particulars would shock the least delicate humanity. Such enormities, though attested by undoubted evidence, appear almost incredible. Amidst all these enormities the sacred name of RELIGION resounded on every side, not to stop the hands of these murderers, but to enforce their blows, and to steel their hearts against every movement of human or social sympathy.” This quotation is specially apt at a time when certain politicians are seeking to hinder the nation from giving too long deferred honour to the memory of the great man who, in 1649, meted out well-deserved punishment to the authors and abettors of these crimes.

<sup>1</sup> It was the Lord's misinterpreted words about the temple which most excited the malignity of the religious Jews (Mark xiv. 58, xv. 29). Stephen received a patient hearing until referring to Isaiah's words he declared that God did not dwell "in temples made with hands" (Acts vii. 48). This evidently provoked an outburst of opposition which led to his breaking off his narrative, and launching the rebuke of verses 51-53. Just as in the case of Paul, the declaration that he had been charged to preach to the Gentiles so exasperated his hearers that in a frenzy of passion they exclaimed, "Away with such a fellow from the earth; for it is not fit that he should live." And but for the intervention of the Roman power they would have murdered him then and there (Acts xxii. 21-24). Such is religion!

Nor will it avail to plead that theirs was a heathen cult. It is matter of common knowledge, astounding though the fact may be, that the persecutions of the Christian centuries, perpetrated in the name of the Christian religion, equal in fiendish malignity and cruelty the atrocities of Pagan Rome. As a matter of fact, in the case of such men as Trajan and Marcus Aurelius, persecution was not the outcome of malignity at all. The State required that every man should have a religion. But Christianity had not yet degenerated into a religion, and so the Christians ranked as Atheists, and they were punished accordingly.<sup>1</sup> Christianity was aggressive. It proclaimed a revelation, and inculcated a faith, that drew away men from all religions. It thus came to be regarded as an enemy to religion; and rightly so. Religion therefore became the enemy of Christianity. Such it has ever been. As Renan tersely puts it, the temple has always been anti-Christian.

<sup>1</sup> This accusation is mentioned by both Justin ("Apol." i., 5, 16) and Tertullian ("Apol." x.). And Eusebius records that when the Roman pro-consul called upon Polycarp to renounce his fellowship with Christians, he did so in the words, "Repent: say, 'Away with the Atheists.'" "

But here mark the contrast. In his famous letter to Pliny, Trajan enjoined upon his pro-consul not officiously to press inquiries concerning the Christians, and on no account to receive charges made against them by informers. How different this from the spirit and the methods of the persecutions inspired by the so-called Christian Church in the name of Christ! In the passage already quoted, Mill goes on to say that a hundred times he heard his father declare that the Christian's God was "the most perfect conception of wickedness which the human mind can devise." And if the Christian's God be the god of "the historic Church"—the god of the religion of Christendom, is not this true?

If the judgment which we mete out to men in other spheres is to be applied in this, and guilt is to be measured by enlightenment and privileges neglected and abused, the Church of Christendom stands out as the most hideous impersonation of evil which the world has ever known. "No means came amiss to it, sword or stake, torture chamber or assassin's dagger. The effects of the Church's working were seen in ruined nations and smoking cities, in human beings tearing one another to pieces, like raging maniacs, and the honour of the Creator of the world befouled by the hideous crimes committed in His name. All this is forgotten now," the writer here quoted sorrowfully adds—"forgotten, or even audaciously denied."<sup>1</sup>

We judge of a Pagan god by the acts of his worshippers, committed in his name and in his honour. Let us be consistent and fair, and apply the same test here; and instead of denouncing Mill as a coarse blasphemer, we shall hang our heads as we deplore the ignorance which confounds the god of Christendom with the Christian's God, and the Buddha of Christendom with the Christ of the New Testament.

The god of Christendom is a god who can own as his specially accredited agents and ministers men whose lives were marked by immoralities and crimes so flagrant and so shameful that the record of them here would render these pages unfit for the eyes of the innocent and pure; a god who can sanction and bless atrocities as hideous and hateful as any that we associate with the names of Nero and Diocletian ; or, in these last days, with such names as Armenia, Benin, the Soudan. With all the passion of which we are capable we protest against the blasphemy of confounding this god with the God of the Bible : and if the Christ of "the historic Church" is here described as "the Buddha of Christendom," the words are used with an unfeigned apology to the disciples of Gautama.

<sup>1</sup> Froude's "Council of Trent," p. 301.

CHAPTER XII

ANY one who approaches the study of theology with a mind trained and formed by full and systematic study of Holy Scripture enjoys an immense advantage over those who, reversing the process, have been taught to read the Scriptures in the light of theology. In dealing with the ritualists and sacerdotalists of apostolic days, the Epistle to the Hebrews attributes their errors to ignorance of "the first principles of the oracles of God;"<sup>1</sup> that is, the rudiments of revealed religion, the A B C of the Divine revelation of the Old Testament. To what extent, then, has the theology of Christendom fallen under a similar reproach?

<sup>1</sup> Heb. v. 12.

The Old Testament Scriptures admit of a four-fold division—the historical, the typical, the prophetic, and the devotional or experimental. Of these, the first and the last—history and spiritual experience—are not specially the domain of the theologian at all. What then of the others? It is notorious that theology ignores them altogether. Prophecy it rejects with deliberate purpose; and as regards typology the dictum of Hengstenberg still holds good, that “the elucidation of the doctrine of the types, now entirely neglected, is an important problem for future theologians.”<sup>1</sup> But in this intensely valuable and interesting study, “now entirely neglected,” may be found landmarks to guide us in our search for truth, and safeguards against the errors by which at this moment Christianity is assailed, and our liberties as Englishmen are endangered.

By one school of theologians the Divine revelation of Judaism is bracketed with old-world paganism: by others it is dismissed to the sphere of archæology. But the Mosaic types are the alphabet of the language in which the truths of

<sup>1</sup> “Christology,” (Arnold’s edition) § 765.

Christianity have been delivered to us ; or, if the illustration may be pardoned, the Divine guide-book to the City of God. Without further preface, then, will the reader bear with a brief excursion into this wonderful field of inquiry? <sup>1</sup>

Though in a sense the Bible is a literature, its unity must never be ignored. Regarded as a book, Genesis constitutes its introduction. Adam and the history of his world for thousands of years are dismissed in a brief preface of eleven chapters, and the rest of the Old Testament concerns itself with Abraham and his race.<sup>2</sup> The narrative of Genesis closes by recording how the descendants of Abraham came to be sojourners in the land of Egypt. As we turn the page, the opening chapter of Exodus describes their condition as one of hard and degrading servitude. This is the point at which the history of Israel in its typical character begins. Man's condition by nature is that of slavery in the house of bondage. He is absolutely dependent on a Divine deliverer.

<sup>1</sup> "The elucidation of the doctrine of the types" must not be confounded with the allegorising of Scripture which renders the exegesis of the Fathers so fanciful—a system derived from the Greeks, who had learned to treat their classics in this way.

<sup>2</sup> Gen. i.-xi. covers chronologically a longer period than all the rest of the Old Testament.

The narrative opens, then, by representing the Israelites as the slaves of Pharaoh, and it proceeds to unfold the story of their deliverance. And here the essentially typical character of the history is apparent. First, the fact of their deliverance is made subordinate to its purpose: "Let my people go, that they may serve Me" was the Divine demand. And secondly, as the deliverance must be in the way of redemption, the history leads up to the promulgation of a death sentence: "All the first-born in the land of Egypt shall die"<sup>1</sup>—the first-born being typically the representative of the family. This was not a sentence upon the Egyptians, but upon the inhabitants of the land. The doom fell upon Egypt and upon all who dwelt in Egypt. There was no difference here between the Israelite and the Egyptian. And a death sentence can be satisfied only by death. But God provided a redemption.

The story of the Passover is known to all. Every Hebrew family was to sacrifice a lamb, and the blood of that sacrifice was to be sprinkled upon the lintel and the door-posts of every Hebrew hut. For the Divine word declared, "I will pass through the land of Egypt this night, and will smite all the firstborn in the land of Egypt. . . . And when I see the blood I will pass over you." Or, as Moses explained it to the people, "The Lord will pass over the door, and will not suffer the destroyer to come into your houses to smite you." <sup>1</sup> Death was the appointed judgment upon Egypt; but upon the blood-stained house death had already passed. They were redeemed from death by a death already accomplished—redeemed by the blood of the paschal lamb. And that bloodshedding typified the great sacrifice of Calvary: hence the inspired words—"Redeemed . . . with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot." <sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Exod. xi. 5.

But this was merely redemption from Egypt's doom. Redemption from Egypt's bondage was to follow. But let us keep clearly in view the moral order of it; for this is a truth which theology has mystified, if it has not lost. Who is there who has not pictured to himself that midnight scene when the Egyptians "rose up in the night," and "there was a great cry in Egypt"—a nation lamenting its dead! And that same night the Hebrew slaves arose as freemen, and set out upon their march to the promised land.<sup>1</sup> The redemption in Egypt was followed by redemption from Egypt. The sinner is saved in his sins; but that is not all: he is saved from his sins, Israel's redemption in Egypt was only and altogether by the blood of the lamb: redemption from Egypt was by "the strong hand and the outstretched arm" of Israel's God.

<sup>1</sup> Exod. xii. 12, 13, 23.

<sup>2</sup> 1 Pet. i. 18, 19.

<sup>1</sup> Two words in passing on Exod. xii. Ignorance raises a moral difficulty on vers. 35, 36, and sees a blunder in ver. 40. The Israelites did not "borrow"—did not steal—from the Egyptians. But being urged with importunity to hasten their departure (ver. 33) they pleaded poverty, and asked for clothing and bullion; and the Egyptians "let them have what they asked for" (see R.V.). Then as to ver. 40. The error alluded to depends on reading it as averring that the Israelites were 430 years in Egypt. "The sojourning of the children of Israel" (reckoned from the date of the covenant with Abraham until the Exodus) "was 430 years." The words "who dwelt in Egypt" are a Hebraism; as are also the words "they shall afflict them" in Gen. xv. 13. The former words are merely a parenthetical description, further defining the people of Israel; the latter are equivalent to "they shall be afflicted." This is obvious, because ver. 16 definitely states that the sojourn in Egypt was to last only for four generations; which was exactly fulfilled, for Moses' mother was a daughter of Levi.

The passage of the sea was the first event in that wonderful journey. "The waters were divided," and the redeemed people passed through as on dry land. But when the Egyptians pressed after them, the waters returned and overwhelmed them.<sup>1</sup> The people had already been taught the atoning efficacy of death: they had now to learn its separating power. Death rolled between them and the scene of their bondage. Death to sin is no mere theory of doctrine; it is a great fact in the Christian's heart and life.

Now, these things, we are expressly told, were "types."<sup>2</sup> And, as a matter of fact, the crucifixion of Christ took place upon the anniversary of the Exodus; and "that self-same day" was again the anniversary of the covenant with Abraham.<sup>3</sup> The resurrection therefore was on the anniversary of the passage of the Red Sea; as that again was on the anniversary of the resting of the ark on Ararat.<sup>4</sup> Every part of the wonderful story, indeed, is rich in typical teaching. The manna

<sup>1</sup> Exod. xiv. 21-28.

<sup>2</sup> 1 Cor. x. 6 (τύποι).

<sup>3</sup> Exod. xii. 41.

<sup>4</sup> Gen. viii. 4. On this whole question I would refer to "The Coming Prince," p. 118.

from heaven for their food was a type of Christ. The rock that gave out water for their thirst was a type of Christ. God is not a mere turnkey who releases us from the prison-house of sin: the Christian learns to say of Him, "The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want."

But passing by all this, the events of Sinai claim special notice here. Then it was that the law was given—not the ten commandments merely, but the ritual of the national worship; not till then was it that the covenant was dedicated. At this point the typology of Exodus becomes of transcendent importance in delivering us from the errors and superstitions of the religion of Christendom. For the 24th chapter of Exodus, which fills so large a place in the doctrinal teaching of the New Testament, is practically ignored in the theology of Christendom.

A few weeks only had passed since the Israelites had groaned in Egyptian bondage: now they stood a redeemed people around Mount Sinai, and God had given them a law, and prescribed for them a religion. But while His purpose was to have His people near Him, the scene only emphasised the distance which separated them from Him. Great and wonderful though the blessings were which they had already proved, their redemption was wholly incomplete. Moses, indeed, could approach, but this was only because of his typical position as mediator of the covenant. As for the rest, not even the elders of Israel, not even Aaron, could stand in that awful presence. The Divine command was clear: "Moses alone shall come near the Lord; but they shall not come nigh, neither shall the people go up with him."<sup>1</sup>

When Moses had thus received "all the words of the Lord and all the judgments," he came and told them to the people, and then recorded them in writing.<sup>2</sup> This accomplished, he set up an altar, and the great sacrifice of the covenant was offered; and by the blood of that sacrifice, sprinkled both upon the book and upon the people, the covenant was dedicated. In other words, Israel was thus brought into covenant with God, and became a holy people, as befitted the relationship.

<sup>1</sup> Exod. xxiv. 2.

<sup>2</sup> Exod. xxiv. 3.

And now mark the change. THEN (the next verse records) went up Moses and Aaron and his sons, and the elders of Israel, "and they saw the God of Israel." The very same men who had been warned off the mountain at the peril of their lives were now bidden to participate in its most dread solemnities. And, as expressive of the fulness of their welcome, and of the peace which ruled their hearts in that holy presence, the word records that "they saw God, and did eat and drink."<sup>1</sup> And the very first command which followed this amazing transformation was, "Let them make Me a sanctuary that I may dwell among them."<sup>2</sup> And then, and not till then, there followed the consecration of the priest.<sup>3</sup> God, whose care it had been to keep the people at a distance—He could not suffer them to approach Him—was able now, in virtue of the blood of the covenant, to "dwell among them."

But, some one will ask, What possible difference could the blood of a dead calf make in the moral or spiritual condition of the Israelites? The answer is, Absolutely none. It was the stupid error of the Jewish ritualists to suppose that such ordinances were anything but mere shadows of spiritual realities. Then, it will be demanded, if we have the reality, why should we go back to the type? The answer is, Because, owing to the neglect of the type, Christendom has lost the knowledge of the reality. The theology of Christendom insists that the ministry of a priest is needed to enable us to gain this position of nearness to God. The theology of Christendom is thus characterised by ignorance of "the first principles of the oracles of God." It was not until redemption in all its completeness had been accomplished that the priest was consecrated. Priesthood had no part in obtaining redemption: that was the work, not of Aaron, but of Moses; not of the priest, but of the mediator. The great redemption sacrifices, offered once for all, and never to be repeated, to which Israel owed the position of a saved and covenant people, were not priestly offerings at all.

<sup>1</sup> Exod. xxiv. 9-11; Cf. ver. 2 and xix. 12, 21, 24.

<sup>2</sup> Exod. xxv. 8.

<sup>3</sup> Exod. xxviii.

Repetition may be pardoned here, because the truth in question is outraged and denied by the Pagan conception of priesthood, which prevails in Christendom. The moral order of these types is clear. The deliverance of Israel by the blood of the Passover was accomplished in Egypt—in the very scene of their bondage: God saves the sinner in his sins—as he is, and where he is. Then the Israelites were delivered out of Egypt, and permitted to see the destruction of the power which had held them in servitude: God saves the sinner from his sins, and teaches him that sin has no longer the power to enslave him. Finally, the Israelites were brought near to God as a holy people, through “the blood of the covenant,” and taught to be at peace in His holy presence: “But now” (we read) “in Christ Jesus, ye who once were far off are made nigh by the blood of Christ; for He is our peace.”<sup>1</sup>

And all this apart from priesthood. Where, then, did the priest come in? Not, I repeat, until redemption was complete, and the tabernacle—the dwelling-place of Jehovah—was set up. Then, and only then, the priest was consecrated.<sup>2</sup> His functions had to do with the worship of the people.

<sup>1</sup> Eph. ii. 13, 14.

<sup>2</sup> Exod. xxviii.

But the teaching of the Epistle to the Hebrews is clear and emphatic, that the repetition of the sacrifices in Israel was due to the fact that those sacrifices were but "a shadow of good things to come." They could not "take away sins"; therefore they could not "make the comers thereunto perfect." "Else would they not have ceased to be offered?"<sup>1</sup> But what they could not do, Christ has done. "He appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself." And this He has actually accomplished. "For by one offering He hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified." And therefore the language of the new covenant is, "Their sins and iniquities will I remember no more." And the words which immediately follow declare, "Now, where remission of these is there is no more offering for sin."

The types teach in part by comparison, in part by contrast. While the continually repeated sacrifices of the law were a Divine protest and warning that sin was not actually put away, the great redemption sacrifices, offered once for all, foreshadowed the accomplishment of the Divine will on Calvary.

<sup>1</sup> Heb. x. 1-4.

What those sacrifices prefigured, Christ has actually accomplished. What those sacrifices were in type, He is in reality. To the sinner who believes on Him He is, in fact, what the passover and the burnt-offering of the covenant were to the Israelite in type—"both righteousness and sanctification, even redemption."<sup>1</sup>

And as it was in the type, so it is here. Redemption being now complete, the exhortation which immediately follows is "Let us draw near." This is the climax of the doctrinal teaching of the Epistle to the Hebrews. The purpose of that Epistle is not to teach how a sinner can be redeemed. Redemption is assumed. The passover has no place in the doctrine of it. That is past; and it is to the great burnt-offering of the covenant that the opening words of the Epistle refer. Just as Moses made purification of sins, and then went up to God, so also did the Lord Jesus Christ.<sup>2</sup> And the teaching of the <sup>1</sup> 1 Cor. i. 30. Why should the τε και be ignored? And surely the second και must be epexegetical. Redemption includes both righteousness and sanctification: it is not an added benefit distinct from them.

<sup>2</sup> "The Son . . . when He had made purification of sins, sat

Epistle, pursued with many a digression, due to prevailing ignorance and error, is that there is now no need for further offering or sacrifice, no need for a human priest; but that, in virtue of the great sacrifice and of what Christ is to the redeemed sinner, there is access even to the Divine presence.<sup>1</sup>

At this point the type becomes confused. The Divine intention was that the mediator of the covenant should himself become the priest. But this failed, owing to the unbelief and wilfulness of Moses, who claimed to have Aaron associated down on the right hand of the Majesty on high" (Heb. i. 3, R.V.). The Epistle thus begins, not at Exod. xii., but at Exod. xxiv., the references to which abound throughout (see especially chaps. viii. ; ix. 19; xii. 18-29; xiii. 20, 21). This is also the type referred to in 1 Pet. i. 2.

<sup>1</sup> The clause beginning ch. x. 26 is used against this truth. I content myself by giving Dean Alford's comment upon it, as follows:—"The sin meant is sufficiently defined by the connection with the preceding exhortations, and by the description of one who has so sinned, in ver. 29. . . . It is the sin of apostasy from Christ back to the state which preceded the reception of Christ, viz., Judaism. This is the ground sin of all other sins. Notice the present, not the aorist participle. 'If we be found wilfully sinning,' not 'if we have wilfully sinned,' at that Day. It is not of an act, or of any number of acts of sin, that the writer is speaking, which might be repented of and blotted out; but of a state of sin in which a man is found when that day shall come."

with him.<sup>1</sup> But Christ is both Mediator and Priest. And His priesthood is of the order of Melchisedek, whose ministry was not to sacrifice for sins, but to succour and bless.<sup>2</sup> It began therefore, not with Calvary, but with His ascension to the right hand of God. Then it was that He was "named of God a priest." Save in the sense in which every Christian is a priest, there can be no priest on earth apart from the family of Aaron. This rule is so absolute that it applies even to Christ Himself. As the Epistle to the Hebrews emphatically declares, "If He were on earth He would not be a priest at all."<sup>3</sup> If any one therefore claims to be a priest, we know he must be a Pagan priest.<sup>4</sup> A Christian priest! A man might as well call himself a Christian atheist. It was not due to narrow intolerance, but to appreciation of truth, that the Reformers described the sacrifice of the Mass as not merely a "fable," but a "blasphemous fable."<sup>5</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Exod. iv. 10-16.      <sup>2</sup> Gen. xiv. 18, 19; Heb. v. 10; vii. 1-21.

<sup>3</sup> Chap. viii. 4, R.V.

<sup>4</sup> I am not speaking here of the Reformers' use of the English word as the equivalent for "presbyter"—a most unfortunate use it is.

<sup>5</sup> Article xxxi.

But all this is only for the covenant people, "the Israel of God"; and men by nature are "aliens from the commonwealth of Israel and strangers from the covenants of promise."<sup>1</sup> How, then, can the gulf be passed which separates these positions? This is a question to which practical men may well demand a plain answer. Latin theology, ignoring Divine grace, points men to priestly mediation and mystical rites as the appointed means of bringing them within the covenant. The covenant is thus widened and lowered to reach men in their natural condition. Here, for example, is the opening sentence of the treatise on "Apostolic Succession," already referred to: "Jesus Christ founded a visible society, which, as embodying God's new covenant with men and representing His goodwill towards them, was intended to embrace all mankind."<sup>2</sup> This amazing statement, so pregnant with error and yet so "orthodox," merits close attention and careful analysis.<sup>3</sup> It tells us:—

<sup>1</sup> Eph. ii. 12.

<sup>2</sup> "The Church and the Ministry," chap. ii. (see Chapter VII. ante.).

<sup>3</sup> The statement is not quoted from some newspaper report of an

(1) That Jesus Christ founded a Church. (Not the Lord Jesus Christ; but "Jesus Christ," the Buddha of Christendom—the dead Buddha.)

(2) That the Church embodies God's new covenant.

(3) That the new covenant is with men, i.e., with the Adamic race.

(4) That the Church therefore represents His goodwill towards men; and this being so,

(5) That the Church was intended to embrace all mankind.

These propositions display the hopeless confusion which Latin theology makes between the Church and the Kingdom—the Church of this dispensation, and the Kingdom which was preached in the early period of the Lord's earthly ministry, and which will again be preached hereafter, when Israel is restored to Divine favour. The very word ἐκκλησία refutes the error. The Church is not the extempore address. It is the formal thesis of Canon Gore's argument in a work to which, long years after its publication, he appealed (in the Preface to "The Mission of the Church") as an end of controversy on this subject. And the author was then the head of a famous theological college; and this is the sort of teaching that theological students receive in such colleges to-day.

world christianised, but an election out of the world. In these days it may seem hypercritical to distinguish thus between the Church and the Kingdom; but it was this blind and wicked ignorance which led the historic Church to burn the martyrs.<sup>1</sup>

God was on the side of the martyrs; the devil was on the side of the Church and its theology. And yet we are told that the Church represents the goodwill of God towards men! If it were so, we might well pray to be delivered from His goodwill! In view of the Church's actual history, the statement is an insult to our intelligence. And, whatever the Church's history, to put it thus in the place of Christ is an outrage upon Divine truth, and a hall-mark of apostasy. "IN THIS was manifested the love of God toward us, that God sent His only-begotten Son into the world, that we might live through Him."<sup>2</sup>

Underlying all this is the fiction of salvation through a covenant made with men as men—an error from which acquaintance with "the first principles of the oracles of God" (to quote Hebrews again) would guard us. The covenant, as we have seen, was made with a people already redeemed and saved. Here is the truth which underlies Calvinism. "The new covenant" is not for the race of Adam, but for "the seed of Abraham," "the house of Israel"<sup>1</sup>—not "Israel after the flesh," but "the Israel of God."

<sup>1</sup> See Matt. xiii. 41.

<sup>2</sup> 1 John iv. 9.

But this only brings us back to the question How can we, who by nature are estranged from the covenant, be brought within the covenant?<sup>2</sup> The answer is to be found in the great characteristic truth of Christianity, the forgotten truth of Grace—a truth which has dropped out of all human theologies. Men are ready to believe in Divine benevolence to a favoured class. The popular description of this class would be that of good, religious people. The Calvinist would define it as the elect; the sacerdotalist, as the sacramentally initiated. But all alike, whether the sham priest, the theologian, or the man in the street, agree in setting limits to the Divine benevolence.

<sup>1</sup> Heb. ii. 16; viii. 8.

<sup>2</sup> Some who are teachers of the teachers of Christianity, in ignorance of the very alphabet of the language in which the New Testament is written (namely, the typology of the Old Testament), note the difference between Matt. xxvi. 28 and I Cor. xi. 25 as an "inaccuracy." Its significance is that whereas the Jew reached Christ in virtue of the covenant, the Gentile becomes a partaker of the covenant in virtue of union with Christ. In the one, therefore, it is, "This is My blood of the new covenant"; in the other, "This is the new covenant in My blood."

And this, in fact, characterised the Old Testament revelation on the public side of it. And the same is true even of the Lord's earthly ministry. Hence such words as, "Salvation is of the Jews"; "I am not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." He was Israel's Messiah, "a minister of the circumcision."<sup>1</sup> But the ministry and death of Christ were infinitely more than this. They were the supreme revelation of Divine love to a lost world. In the estimation of Christendom, the crucifixion of Christ was merely an event in history, the greatest of all events perhaps—what the Exodus was to Israel—the basis of religion and the beginning of a new era. But in fact it was the world's "crisis."<sup>2</sup> And it was this because it was the supreme manifestation of Divine love to man, and of man's hatred to God. "God so loved the world that He gave His only-begotten Son": man so hated God that he crucified His only-begotten Son. The Jew has thus lost the position of religious privilege under the covenant. Every covenant has been broken, every promise forfeited. Man's probation has closed: he is shut up to wrath, and there is no appeal and no escape. The whole world has become guilty before God.<sup>1</sup> Nothing remains but the day of judgment.

<sup>1</sup> Rom. xv. 8. This characterised also the special testimony of the transitional Pentecostal dispensation, as unfolded in the Acts of the Apostles. But a discussion of this here would involve a prolonged digression. I have dealt with it in "The Silence of God."

<sup>2</sup> κρίσις, John xii. 31.

But this was made the occasion for "the revelation of a mystery which was kept secret since the world began"<sup>2</sup>—the great "mystery" of Grace in the Gospel. To the Son the Father has assigned the Divine prerogative of judgment;<sup>3</sup> and His own throne is a throne of judgment.<sup>4</sup> But judgment is postponed. The only Being in the universe who can condemn a sinner is the Crucified of Calvary, and He is now sitting on the throne of God as a SAVIOUR. When the day of judgment comes

<sup>1</sup> Rom. iii. 19.

<sup>2</sup> Rom. xvi. 25.

<sup>3</sup> John v. 22.

<sup>4</sup> Matt. xxv. 31.

He will be only a judge ; but in this day of grace He is only a Saviour. It is not that there is grace for the elect, or the good, or the sacramentally initiated ; but that grace is the principle on which God is dealing with a lost world. Grace is supreme. **Grace reigns, through righteousness, unto eternal life, by Jesus Christ our Lord.*"<sup>1</sup>

The Epistle to the Hebrews is given to teach us how a redeemed sinner can draw near to God as a worshipper, in virtue of the blood of the covenant, with a great Priest to bless and succour him. So the Epistle to the Romans is given to teach how a lost sinner can be saved, and reach the place where alone worship is possible, and the need of a priest arises. The one begins with the burnt-offerings and peace-offerings of the covenant ; the other with the passover in Egypt.<sup>2</sup> But it is the full display of that which the passover prefigured but dimly. The Gospel has revealed God, but it has not changed Him. Grace there always was, but it was veiled.

The distinction here made is one that ordinary

<sup>1</sup> Rom. v. 21.

<sup>2</sup> Hebrews begins doctrinally at Exod. xxiv. ; Romans at Exod. xii.

intelligence can grasp. Grace may lead a man to write a money bill, or to adopt a child ; but it is not grace that makes him meet the bill when due, or support the child he has adopted. Promise, covenant, relationship, and the obligations arising from them, oust grace altogether. In the Old Testament story, once God took up the Hebrews as His favoured people there was no longer room for the display of grace. But when that people became the betrayers and murderers of Christ, when the Cross stood between an outraged God and a guilty and doomed world, then the only possible alternatives were grace and judgment. God must either deal with men according to their deserts, or else, in infinite mercy and love, pardon and bless them in spite of all.

And this, and nothing less than this, is "the Gospel of the grace of God." "God so loved the world that He gave His only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life. For God sent not His Son into the world to condemn the world, but that the world through Him might be saved."<sup>1</sup> "By grace are ye saved, through faith, and that (salvation) not of yourselves, it is the gift of God ; not of works, lest any one should boast.”<sup>1</sup> “ The wages of sin is death ” (that is what men have earned) “ but the gift of God is eternal life in Christ Jesus our Lord.”<sup>2</sup> A gift may be deserved, but these words are a climax of an argument in which it is emphatically called “ the gift by grace.”<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> John iii. 16, 17.

This will not be found in the newspapers. Neither will men believe it. The religion of Christendom is a systematised denial of it. But human religion has always been anti-Christian. The Lord Jesus Christ preached the Gospel to sinners, and “ the common people heard Him gladly,” for they owned that they were sinners ; but the religious people retaliated by crucifying Him. And when His Apostle, addressing his co-religionists, announced that he had been commissioned to preach this gospel to the heathen, <sup>1</sup> Eph. ii. 8-9. The gender of τοῦτο, though not conclusive, points to the conclusion that the gift of God here is not faith but the main subject of the passage, i.e., salvation. And this is clearly established by the words which follow, for they would be wholly irrelevant if referred to faith.

<sup>2</sup> Rom. vi. 23, R.V.

<sup>3</sup> Rom. v. 15.

they flew into a frenzy of passion, cast off their clothes, threw dust into the air, and shouted, "Away with such a fellow from the earth ; it is not fit that he should live."<sup>1</sup> He had not, like some of his "successors," committed odious crimes ; he had only preached forgiveness to common sinners in their sins, not through religion, but through Christ. And if this preaching excited fury in the days of real priests with real altars, need we wonder at opposition to it in these days of sham priests with sham altars ! Theirs is the religion of the Buddha of Christendom, which, like a pirate, holds the tortuous channel of salvation by ordinances ; while Divine grace has cleared the way right out into the open sea.

This doctrine is met by the profane taunt that it makes every one "his own absolver," and tends to levity and sin. But, in fact, it is "the truth which is according to godliness."<sup>2</sup> Writing to men who were converts from paganism, the Apostle declared that everywhere it brought forth fruit, even from the day they "heard and knew the grace of God in truth."<sup>3</sup> This Gospel changed Onesimus, a runaway slave who robbed his master, into a "profitable" servant and a "faithful and beloved brother."<sup>1</sup> For grace not merely saves a man, but moulds his character, and controls his conduct. "For" (we read) "the grace of God hath appeared, salvation-bringing to all men, instructing us, to the intent that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly and righteously and godly in this present world."<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Acts xxii. 22, 23.

<sup>2</sup> Titus i. 1.

<sup>3</sup> Col. i. 6.

"Love your enemies and do them good," said the Lord to His disciples, "and ye shall be sons of the Most High ; for He is kind to the unthankful and to the evil."

Is this true? Or is the prevailing belief well founded, that Divine benevolence is for those who give proof in some way that they deserve it, or who have by religious ordinances attained some vantage ground of favour? No one can pretend to be indifferent upon such a question, for the issues at stake are of overwhelming interest and importance. If the popular belief be false—if the words of Holy Writ be true—then even one who may hitherto have led a godless life, ignoring alike the claims and the benefits of Christianity, is nevertheless an object of Divine pity and love, and may cast himself upon God with the certainty of being accepted and forgiven. “For He is kind to the unthankful and to the evil.”

<sup>1</sup> Col. iv. 9; Philemon 11, 16.

<sup>2</sup> Titus ii. 11, 12. I venture to render σωτήριος by "salvation-bringing." Of course "ungodly men" may "turn the grace of our God into lasciviousness." Indeed, any gospel which cannot be thus perverted is thereby proved not to be the gospel of grace, but a counterfeit.

CHAPTER XIII

“MARTYRS of disgust.” Whoever coined the phrase had grasped a truth of practical importance. It is not easy to estimate how much of the popularity of Ritualism is due to a recoil from the slovenliness, if such a word may be allowed, of certain types of Protestantism. What constitutes “the Church” is the Divine presence—the fulfilment of the promise, “There am I in the midst.” No gorgeous shrine, no splendid ceremonial, no sensuous music is needed to secure that presence; it is the assured possession of His people gathered in His name.

On the very evening of the Resurrection the disciples received an object lesson of what that promise meant. Near by stood the holy Temple, in all its proud magnificence. But that house was "desolate."<sup>1</sup> The Lord was not there, but in the "upper room" where the disciples had met in secret to await His coming. And not all the splendour of that shrine could relieve its utter desolation when the Divine presence was denied it, nor could the bare poverty of that humble scene detract from its solemnity while He was "in the midst." And if men boast that theirs is the cult of the "upper room," while yet they give proof that they have no sense of the Divine presence—no appreciation of the reverence which is its due, is it strange that so many turn away to that which has at least a semblance of the lost reality?

The last of the old Hebrew prophets charged it upon the people that they had less respect for God than for their superiors in social rank. And so it is with ourselves. The presence perhaps of some distinguished stranger will serve to prevent any slovenliness of dress or manner on the part of the minister, and in all the service the effect of that presence will be felt. But the Divine presence is a mere theory, which too often fails to influence those who profess to be controlled by it.

<sup>1</sup> "Your house is left unto you desolate" (Matt. xxiii. 38).

A barren Protestantism, a mere negation of the outward trappings and superstitions of religion, may fill a church with Christianised rationalists ; and if genuine piety and earnest philanthropy be not wanting, such men will command respect and make their influence felt. But there are times in every life when great thoughts of "sin and righteousness and judgment" oppress the soul with fear, and "heart and flesh cry out for the living God." The spiritual realities of vital Christianity alone can banish such fear and satisfy such yearnings. But human religion will act as a narcotic to soothe and deaden them ; and in ignorance of the great sacrifice of Calvary and of the great Priest who has passed into the heavens, men will turn to a system which provides at least a travesty of Christian truth.

How few there are to whom the Lord Jesus Christ is a living and ever-present Divine Person ! How entirely the dead Buddha, the historic Jesus of the Rationalist, or the traditional Jesus of the Romanist, has supplanted Him! The truth of these statements admits of a plain and simple test. To "the man in the street" our leading statesmen are mere institutions. He speaks of them, therefore, as freely, as unceremoniously, as would their intimate friends and equals. With him the Prime Minister of England is "Salisbury," the First Lord of the Treasury is "Balfour." But when we pass within the circle where they are personally known, we notice a change at once. It is now Lord Salisbury and Mr. Balfour. And even "the man in the street," were he to find himself in their company, would at once show his consciousness of their presence by altering his mode of speaking of them.

Now let us apply this test to the case before us. Let us mark how men speak and write of the Lord Jesus Christ. There is not recorded in the four Gospels, from first to last, one solitary instance where a disciple ever addressed Him or spoke of Him save as "Lord" or "Master." This indeed was a definite characteristic of discipleship; so much so that even those whose conduct belied their words always called Him "Lord."<sup>1</sup> He was known to the world as "Jesus of Nazareth"; and if one of the Jews had been sent to fetch the beast to carry Him in His mock triumphal entry into Jerusalem, or to bespeak the guest-chamber for the paschal supper, his language would have been that "Jesus" required it. But His own disciples declared themselves even in the very mention of His name. With them it was, "The Master saith"; "The Lord hath need of it."<sup>2</sup> To this rule the Gospels contain absolutely no exception.

Let me not be misunderstood. In the narrative of the Gospels He is spoken of by His personal name, because GOD is the narrator. Had Leaves from Our Journal in the Highlands been published anonymously, the mode in which the members of the Royal House are mentioned would have disclosed the Queen's authorship of the book. And so also the manner in which the Lord is named in the Gospel narrative is one of many incidental proofs of its Divine authorship.

<sup>1</sup> Luke vi. 46.

<sup>2</sup> Luke xix. 31, 34; xxii. 11. Note that the words were dictated by the Lord Himself.

But in every case, without exception, where the narrative introduces words spoken by the disciples as men, whether addressed to Him, or to others about Him, a title of reverence is used. Not one single instance is recorded in which He is named with the freedom, not to say familiarity, common with Christians now. Just as in the Queen's book the Royal children are spoken of by their personal names, so in God's book our Divine Lord is spoken of in the same way. But they must have a strange conception of what inspiration means who urge that the language of the Bible should in this respect be imitated in our colloquial speech, or even in the formal discourse of the pulpit. Even the most elevated and solemn of mere human utterances are separated by an unmeasured distance from the inspired Scriptures.

Rationalism, of course, ever seeks to bring down our Divine Lord to the level of mere humanity, and Rationalism has entirely leavened our literature, even our standard theological literature. Its influence is felt everywhere. But it was not Rationalism that taught "the primitive Church" to abandon the habits of reverence in speaking of the Lord, which had prevailed in Apostolic days. In this respect, indeed, there is a striking difference between the writings of Clement and Polycarp, who had come directly under apostolic influence, and the patristic writings of a later age.<sup>1</sup>

Even a century later Tertullian wrote, referring to the solemn converse of the Christians at the Agape, "Our conversation is that of men who are conscious that the Lord hears them."<sup>2</sup> Here is the true test. Let the pulpit be judged by it. If the preacher be a man of refinement he will not offend by speaking of the Lord, or even of the Apostles, with the flippant familiarity so popular with many. But do his words impress the hearers with the conviction that he is speaking of his living Lord, and that he is conscious of His presence? Or is he not rather speaking of the mythical Jesus of sentimental religion, or of "the historic Jesus," the dead Buddha of nineteen centuries ago.

Many there are, moreover, who would be offended by the omission of the conventional title of "saint" before the name of an apostle,<sup>1</sup> and yet who see nothing unseemly in speaking of the Lord after the example, not of the apostles, but of the strolling Jewish exorcists mentioned in the nineteenth chapter of the Acts.<sup>2</sup> With not a few this is due to thoughtlessness, with others again, to sheer carelessness—slovenliness would not be too strong a word. It takes less time and less breath to say "Jesus" than to say "the Lord Jesus," and this it is that governs their practice. But those who seek to obey the Divine command, "Sanctify in your hearts Christ as LORD,"<sup>3</sup> learn both to think of Him and to speak of Him as Lord; and this, not as a matter of effort or training, but instinctively and of course.

<sup>1</sup> As regards Ignatius, see Appendix IV., Note IX. ; and on the general question, see Note X.

<sup>2</sup> "Apol." xxxix.

The prominence which the truth of the Lordship of Christ holds in Christian doctrine is sometimes <sup>1</sup> It has been my habit to give this title to the saints of the New Testament and to none others; but I may say here that a renewed and fuller study of Church history has led me to omit it altogether in these pages. A title that belongs to men like Cyril of Alexandria, a title, moreover, that depends on decrees of the apostate Church, is not a title of honour.

<sup>2</sup> "We adjure you by Jesus" was their formula, and the evil spirit copied them, "Jesus I know" (Acts xix. 13, 15). Mark in contrast the manner in which the Evangelist names Him in verses 10, 13, 17.

<sup>3</sup> 1 Pet. iii. 15, R.V.

obscured even in our Authorised Version of the New Testament. The text just quoted is an instance of this. Another will be found in that most striking passage from the Epistle to the Romans: "If thou shalt confess with thy mouth Jesus AS LORD, and shalt believe in thine heart that God raised Him from the dead, thou shalt be saved."<sup>1</sup> Now that religion has superseded Christianity, and men believe whatever "the Church" enjoins, the doctrine of salvation through confessing Christ as Lord must seem absurd. But not with those who face the problem fairly. What answer can be made to such a challenge as this: "You point me to a man hanging between two thieves, condemned by both Church and State—condemned as a profane impostor by all that was respectable and trustworthy in the sphere of ecclesiastical as well as of secular authority—and you ask me to believe that that crucified Jew is now seated on the throne of the universe of God! But why should I accept the judgment of Christendom against that of the Church of His own times, which deliberately preferred even Jesus Barabbas to Jesus the Rabbi?"<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Rom. x. 9, R.V. See Chap. VIII. ante.

It must be conceded at once that the challenge can be met only by an appeal to revelation. But what and where is the revelation? This brings up again the question discussed in an earlier chapter.<sup>2</sup> The religionist believes that He was the Son of God, on the same authority on which he believes this of a piece of bread, namely, the authority of the Church. Of Transubstantiation Cardinal Newman writes: "I did not believe the doctrine till I was a Catholic. I had no difficulty in believing it as soon as I believed that the Catholic Roman Church was the oracle of God, and that she had declared this doctrine to be part of the original revelation." Of course not. On the same ground a man would have "no difficulty" in believing that the earth is a plane, and the centre of the solar system, and that the Spanish Inquisition and the Massacre of St. Bartholomew were divinely sanctioned and blessed. But this whole position only proves the depth of the degradation to which even such a man as John Henry Newman sinks when he turns away from Christianity to religion.

<sup>1</sup> Tradition says that the personal name of Barabbas was Jesus.

<sup>2</sup> See Chap. VII. ante.

But what is the answer which Holy Scripture makes to the challenge? "I give you to understand," says the Apostle Paul, "that no man can say 'Jesus is Lord,' " or (still more literally), "No man can say 'Lord Jesus' but by the Holy Spirit." And the Lord Himself teaches in the most express terms that to know Him as Divine betokens a Divine revelation to the individual.<sup>1</sup> Any one who owns a copy of the New Testament may know the Buddha of Christendom; the spiritual Christian alone can know the Christ of God. Therefore it is that such a gulf separates the religion of Christendom from Christianity.

But the religion of Christendom has changed all that. Instead of Lordship we have "brotherhood," and instead of the Divine voice in the Holy Scriptures by the Divine Spirit, we have the voice of the Church, claiming to be Divine. That voice finds articulate expression by the lips of the man who pretends to be vicar of Christ on earth. Here are the words of Pope Leo XIII. He is referring to those who claim to be Christians while repudiating what he calls "the Church": "Let such take counsel with themselves and realise that they can in no wise be counted among the children of God unless they take Christ Jesus as their Brother, and at the same time the Church as their mother."<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> See, ex. gr., Matt. xvi. 17; John vi. 45.

No one can deny that the New Testament plainly proclaims the motherhood of the historic Church; but in the one and only passage which teaches it, she is described as "the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth."<sup>2</sup> And the doctrine of the brotherhood of Jesus belongs to the cult of the Buddha of Christendom. Holy Scripture lends no sanction to it. Salvation, as we have seen, depends upon owning Him as Lord; and the man who, setting this aside, talks of "taking Jesus as his brother," be he Pope or peasant, has yet to learn

<sup>1</sup> Encyclical Letter on the Unity of the Church, June 29, 1896.

<sup>2</sup> Rev. xvii. 5. This doctrine of the motherhood of the Church comes, of course, like most other errors in Latin theology, from Augustine of Hippo, and to him the Pope refers it. Our mother is the heavenly Jerusalem, Abraham's city (Gal. iv. 26, Heb. xi. 10, 16). The Church is not "the Bride of the Lamb" (Rev. xxi.), but the body of Christ—a wholly incompatible relationship (see p. 160 ante Note 1).

the rudiments of Christian truth.<sup>1</sup> In His infinite grace the Son of God is "not ashamed" to call us brethren;<sup>2</sup> but the response of every heart that grace has won is to call Him Lord. We have the same Father and the same God—for even such an one as He is has a God; but in the very words by which He teaches the nearness of the relationship, He forbids the inference which the unspiritual would draw from it. "Go," He said, "to My brethren, and say unto them, I ascend" (not unto our Father and God, but) "unto My Father and your Father, and My God and your God."<sup>3</sup>

The truth of the Lordship of Christ is closely allied with that great characteristic truth of Christianity which, as already noticed, was so soon lost by the Church. "Let all the house of Israel know assuredly," the Apostle Peter proclaimed on the day of Pentecost, "that God hath made Him both Lord and Christ—this Jesus whom ye crucified."<sup>4</sup> Messiahship was immediately

<sup>1</sup> I am aware of course that a certain sort of Protestant literature, and notably our hymnology, has adopted this; but my contention is that the habits of thought and speech of seventeen centuries have accustomed us to much that revolts the true instincts of spiritual life.

<sup>2</sup> Heb. ii. 11.

<sup>3</sup> John xx. 17.

<sup>4</sup> Acts ii. 36, R.V.

connected with covenant; Lordship, with grace. The Jew knew Him first as Christ, and then as Lord. With the Gentile the moral order was reversed, and submitting to Him first as Lord, he came to know Him as Christ. Christ was "a minister of the circumcision for the truth of God, to confirm the promises made unto the fathers, and that the Gentiles might glorify God for His mercy."<sup>1</sup> The Jew was heir to "the promises"; and in fulfilment of these Christ became "a minister of the circumcision": the Gentiles, being "strangers from the covenants of promise,"<sup>2</sup> are absolutely dependent upon mercy.

"Eighteenth century deism," says Renan, "and a certain kind of Protestantism, have accustomed us to think of the founder of the Christian faith only as a great moralist, a benefactor of mankind." Precisely: "the Buddha of Christendom." But Rationalism is only one of "the three R's" by which Christianity is undermined. Romanism and Revivalism, in their various developments and phases, though so entirely opposed to Rationalism and to one another, tend in this respect to produce similar results. Sentiment is a marked characteristic of both. Even in human relationships sentiment is a poor thing, and in the spiritual sphere it is easily mistaken for faith. There is a "peace in believing," even if the belief be mere credulity. The peace of God "passeth all understanding"; but it has its human counterfeit which can be thoroughly understood — a peace, for example, like that which Cardinal Newman found in the Church of Rome, as described in his Apologia, the peace of one who gives up the life of faith and commits himself to "the Church," who shirks the discipline of the pilgrim's path by joining a "personally conducted" expedition to the heavenly city. So also there is a peace which springs from sentiment. We all know the woman who found such peace from the sermon, and when pressed for an explanation, declared it was "that sweet word 'Mesopotamia.'"

<sup>1</sup> Rom. xv. 8, 9

<sup>2</sup> Eph. ii. 12.

An American book which was immensely popular some years ago, tells of a man who spent a holiday in charge of two baby nephews. One of his experiences is his being made to sing a hopelessly senseless doggerel to comfort his charge when sick or sore. His bachelor mind tried in vain to discover how such drivel could pacify any one. But a fuller knowledge of child nature would have solved the mystery. For, as the story discloses, the verses in question were a lullaby by which their mother soothed them to sleep in infancy. The words in themselves were nothing: the comfort they brought depended entirely on the sentiment attached to them. And on the same principle it is that "children of a larger growth" find peace in "that sweet word 'Mesopotamia,'" or in some combination of words as little fitted to quiet either heart or conscience in view of the stern facts of human existence. How many there are who live and die with a peace which rests altogether upon sentiment connected with mawkish, irreverent, and unchristian hymns,<sup>1</sup> or other literature of a kindred type—a peace which the light of truth would dissipate as night-mists are scattered by the rising sun!

The Christian's peace does not depend on ignoring the solemn facts of life and death, the stern realities of human sin and Divine righteousness, nor yet on sentiment about the mythical Jesus of our popular hymnology—a “sweet, gentle Jesus” whom men can fondle and patronise. The disciple whom He loved, who leaned upon His breast at the supper, was given to see Him in His glory, and here are the words in which he describes the vision: “His countenance was as the sun shineth in his strength. And when I saw Him I fell at His feet as one dead. And He laid His right hand upon me, saying, Fear not; I am the first and the last, and the Living one; and I was dead, and behold I am alive for evermore, and I have the keys of death and of hell.”<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> See Appendix IV., Note XI.

His voice once shook the earth; and the sacred Word declares that in the awful future He will shake not the earth only, but also heaven. But the Christian has to do with “things which cannot be shaken”—“the precious blood of Christ,” the eternal redemption it has won, and life in a glorious Saviour and Lord who has the keys of death and of hell—and to such the exhortation comes: “Let us have grace whereby we may serve

<sup>1</sup> Rev. i. 16-18, R.V.

God acceptably, with reverence and godly fear. For our God is a consuming fire.”<sup>1</sup>

I am well aware that this book will give pain to many, and offence to some, whose friendship I greatly value. But when interests so momentous are in question, considerations of that kind can have no place. We shall be told, of course, that there is nothing in the events of the day to give cause for disquietude. Such is the answer always made whenever a warning voice is raised against the encroachments of either of the two great powers from which, in their respective spheres, England has most to fear—Russia and Rome. Those powers resemble each other in the patient pertinacity with which they work out their aims. Their advance is like that of a flowing tide upon a level shore.

But there is this essential difference. Russian aggression is entirely hostile, and works from without; it finds no encouragement in the sympathies of a single Englishman. But Rome, on the other hand, appeals to the hearts of men, and its success depends on the hold it has upon human nature. For man is a religious being who has apostatised from his Creator; and therefore, as urged in previous chapters, he must have a religion, and his religion always gravitates towards superstition and evil. If the history of Christendom could be effaced, and Christianity restored to its pristine purity, errors akin to those which now prevail would soon again declare themselves. It is unnecessary therefore to suggest, nor do I for one believe, that the movement Romewards which is now so rife in the English Church is the outcome of a definite Jesuit plot hatched in the Vatican. It is the result of influences of a general character, far deeper and more subtle. But on this very account the danger is all the greater. Those who guide the destinies of the Church of England, instead of keeping to the channel marked out by the Reformers, are, of set purpose, so diverting the stream, that it is drawing nearer and nearer to the dead sea of Rome; and the dividing barrier is becoming so perilously slight that leakage is inevitable, and some adverse influence may undermine it altogether.

<sup>1</sup> Heb. xii. 26-29.

The reunion of Christendom is as certain as the day of judgment ; it will, in fact, herald the great apostasy which is to precede the day of judgment. And if the reunion of the Church of England with the Church of Rome is not imminent, it is because the Pope has more independence—I had almost said more principle—than the men who at this moment govern the Church of England. When the Romanisers appealed to the Pope to recognise Anglican orders, a favourable response to that appeal would have gone far to precipitate the crisis. But in his Bull of September, 1896, the Pope pitilessly exposed the duplicity and ignorance of the conspirators. “A new rite” (he declared) “was publicly introduced under Edward VI. ; the true Sacrament of Orders, as introduced by Christ, lapsed, and with it the hierarchical succession.”

In a word, while these sham “Catholic priests” affect to ignore the Reformation, the Pope of Rome insists upon the vital importance of the Reformation, and finds in it a sufficient reason for denying the validity of Anglican orders. “They have persuaded themselves,” Cardinal Vaughan writes, "that their clergy are really sacerdotal ; that they possess sacrificing powers, and that they hold direct continuity from the old Catholic Church of England as founded by St. Augustine." A "strange and almost incomprehensible belief," he very naturally calls it ; for a main object with the Reformers was to break that "continuity," and to establish the national Church upon a basis only and altogether Divine.<sup>1</sup>

We are told that the conspirators are an insignificant minority, and that they have in no way compromised the Church of England. But this plea is as disingenuous as was the appeal of the conspirators themselves. Did the English hierarchy repudiate their action? Did they seize an opportunity so apt as that which the Papal Bull afforded them to reaffirm the principles of the Reformation? Did they even remain passive and silent? On the contrary, in their "letter" of February 19, 1897, in answer to the Papal Bull, the English archbishops openly took sides with the conspirators in ignoring the Reformation. Their letter was an implied appeal to their "venerable brother, Pope Leo XIII.," to acknowledge that English clergymen are not Christian ministers, but sacrificing priests, and therefore stand upon the same footing as the priests of Rome. Is it any wonder, then, that another "revolt of the laity" should be in progress? And while in the revolt of the sixteenth century the laity found leaders among the bishops, there is not so much as one member of the episcopal bench to-day, who has stood forward publicly to champion the truths of the Reformation, and to protest against the Romish conception of "the Church," which underlies the agitation of the Ritualists and the apologia of the archbishops.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> See pp. 117-121, ante. The above words are quoted from a letter to the Cardinal Archbishop of Toledo, warning the Spanish bishops against being deceived by Lord Halifax and the Church Union conspiracy. It is given in the Times of November 29, 1894. In that letter Cardinal Vaughan uses the following striking and ominous words : "This movement is widely extended, so much so that a multitude of the better educated and most zealous of the Anglican clergy and laity teach Catholic doctrines almost in their totality, so that they only want the key—the office and authority of St. Peter—to close the arch. . . . Some even go so far as to boldly communicate in Catholic churches abroad, while others actually want to say Mass at our altars in Catholic countries, as though they were really priests and members of the Catholic Church." In other words, these men are Romanists, though not Papists.

<sup>1</sup> Since writing the above I have been reminded that there was one.

If the Romish view of the Church be the true one, as these ecclesiastics assume, the Pope is in the right, and they are entirely in the wrong. If the Reformers' view be just, they are all in the wrong together. And this is the vital question in the present controversies: not the pretensions of the Pope—that element is merely incidental—but the pretensions of “the Church.”<sup>1</sup> To vindicate the doctrines of the Reformers in this regard is one main object of these pages.

But that is not their only object. There are multitudes of thoughtful people who, knowing nothing of these distinctions, and misreading the history of Christendom, confound the religion which calls itself Christian with the Divine revelation of Christianity; and rightly rejecting that religion, they turn away from Christianity itself. Such men need to be reminded that there are vast numbers of Christians who revolt, as they do, against the religion of Christendom, but whose faith in Christ is on that very account all the more intelligent and enthusiastic.

In the days of Pagan Rome, the Church was entirely on the side of the martyrs. In the days of Papal Rome the martyrs were the victims of "the Church" in its apostasy. Here in England Wycliffe and Tyndale, and the reformers of the sixteenth century, were the proscribed antagonists of the religion of Christendom. The struggle for the truth, and for those liberties which we owe to the maintenance of the truth, was waged by men who dared to stand out against "the Church," denouncing its errors and superstitions, and defying its power. Their attitude towards human religion was that of scepticism. But enlightened scepticism is merely a means to an end. As Mill observes, it is not a permanent resting-place for human reason. When men turn it into a cult it becomes a mere cloak for self-will, if not for immorality.

<sup>1</sup> See Chaps. VII. and VIII. ante, and Appendix IV., Note III.

The position maintained by the martyrs was no mere negation of the false; it was a testimony to the true. The Christian converts of early days turned from idols to "serve the living and true God." The martyrs of later days turned from "the Church" that they might be loyal to Christ. So it must ever be. There can be no true loyalty to the king without denouncing the pretender. Loyalty to Christ implies the repudiation of what is false to Christ. Christendom being what it is, every true Christian is, of necessity and in the very nature of things, a Protestant.

APPENDICES

APPENDIX I

CHRISTIAN BAPTISM AND BAPTISMAL REGENERATION

ALL Christians recognise that baptism is—in the true, as distinguished from the superstitious sense of the word—a sacrament; that is, it is an outward symbol to represent a spiritual truth. But most even of those who reject that root error of the apostasy, baptismal regeneration, cling to the belief that the truth which the rite symbolises is the new birth.

This is one of the many amazing vagaries of religious thought. For, as already noticed, Scripture in the plainest possible way connects baptism with death; and there is not one solitary passage in which it is mentioned in connection with regeneration or birth; not one which connects it in any way with the operation of the Holy Spirit, or the communication of spiritual life.

But, it will be said, there are two passages in which, though not expressly mentioned, it is clearly referred to, which negative this statement. I allude of course to John iii. and Titus iii. With these passages therefore I now propose to deal.

The occasion of the Nicodemus sermon was the first Passover of the Lord's ministry. The fame of His miracles was abroad, and many were led thereby to "believe in His name." They were miracle-made disciples. Theirs was a political faith, for the hope of a Messiah was part of the politics of every Jew. Nicodemus, however, seems to have had deeper aspirations, which led him to seek out the Lord, albeit he came to Him in secret. The multitude thought only of a greater Judas Maccabæus; Nicodemus hailed him as a God-sent teacher. He was as much in advance of the sensual crowd as is the Pharisee of our own day, but he was just as far from the Kingdom. Therefore he was "answered" at the very threshold by the overwhelming announcement, "Except a man be born anew he cannot see the kingdom of God."

The retort of Nicodemus was not the expression of ignorant coarseness. Coming from such a man, it betokens rather his impatience at being met by what may have seemed to him an enigmatical subtlety. Possibly it was a weariness of such subtleties, the stock-in-trade of the Rabbis, which brought him to the Saviour. But his question only brought out the still more explicit statement, "Except a man be born of water and the Spirit he cannot enter into the kingdom of God."

Now, first it is essential to notice that this is not a twofold birth (of water, and of the Spirit), but emphatically one—a birth of water-and-Spirit, in contrast with the birth which is of flesh. This is not obvious in a translation; but in the original it is unmistakable. It is a birth ἐξ ὕδατος καὶ Πνεύματος. And the context emphasises it, for in the very next sentence, and again in verse 8, the water is omitted altogether, and the new man is spoken of merely as “born of the Spirit.” It follows, therefore, that whatever the water signifies it must be implied in the words “born of the Spirit,” and every one who has been “born anew” has been “born of water and the Spirit.”

Secondly, it is certain that the doctrine here implied ought to have been known to Nicodemus; for the Lord rebuked his ignorance of it. But what is called “Christian baptism” had not yet been instituted. Even “the Twelve” knew nothing of it: how then could Nicodemus have known of it? The only baptism then known was that of the Baptist, and that baptism was expressly contrasted with the Spirit’s work (Matt. iii. 11). It was a public confession of failure and sin, preparatory to receiving a coming Messiah. But “Christian baptism” was a public confession of faith in a Christ already come and gone back to heaven, and a public submission to the Lordship of Christ on the part of those who professed to have been already “born of the Spirit.”<sup>1</sup> That is to say, baptism followed the new birth.

<sup>1</sup> Acts xix. 1-6 gives in a marked way the contrast between the two baptisms. The disciples then were re baptized, not to make them Christians, but because they were Christians. And the coming upon them of the Holy Spirit, as there mentioned, had reference expressly to the exercise of Pentecostal gifts.

When Cornelius and his household were brought in, the question was not "Why should not baptized persons receive the Spirit?" but "Can any man forbid water that these should not be baptized, who have received the Holy Ghost as well as we?" Their baptism was not the completion of the new birth, but the recognition that they were already born of water and the Spirit.

But all this is negative. The water of John iii. does not refer to baptism: the question remains, What is its true symbolism?

Here we must keep prominently in view that the truth involved ought to have been known to Nicodemus. "Art thou the teacher of Israel, and knowest not these things!" the Lord exclaimed in indignant wonder at his ignorance. Therefore in speaking of the new birth by water and the Spirit the Lord referred to some distinctive truth of the Old Testament Scriptures, which ought to have been familiar to a Rabbi of the Sanhedrin.

Before we turn to the Old Testament, it is important to inquire whether any further light can be obtained from the New. The second passage already mentioned at once suggests itself: "According to His mercy He saved us, through the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost" (Titus iii. 5).

Each of the prominent words here used occurs but once again in the New Testament: "renewing" in Rom. xii. 2; "regeneration" in Matt. xix. 28; and "washing" in Eph. v. 26.

The word rendered "washing" is a noun, not a verb. This loutron is, strictly speaking, not the washing, but the vessel which contains the water. Certain expositors of course wish to read it "font" or "laver"; but this is a false exegesis. The New Testament is written in the language of the Septuagint version of the Old; and we turn to that authority to settle for us the meaning of any doubtful term. And for this purpose the Apocryphal books are sometimes as useful as the sacred Scriptures. Now, loutron is not the rendering for "laver" in the Greek version. The LXX use it twice; namely in Cant. iv. 2 (where it is the washing place for sheep); and in Ecclesiasticus xxxi. 25, where the Son of Sirach writes: "He that washeth himself after the touching of a dead body, if he touch it again what avails his loutron?"

This last passage is of the very highest importance here, and gives us the clew we are in search of. The reference is to one of the principal ordinances of the Mosaic ritual—a type, moreover, which fills a large place in New Testament doctrine—especially in Hebrews—namely, the great sin-offering as connected with "the water of purification" (Numb. xix.).

In Titus iii. 5, as in John iii. 5, a false exegesis depends on separating the words in a way that the original will not permit. The absence of both preposition and article before "renewing," requires that the words shall be construed together:—"the loutron of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Spirit." The reference here is not to a mystical rite established in after times by the Church in its decadence, but to one of the greatest of the types of the divinely ordered Hebrew religion. The great sin-offering of Numbers xix. was burned outside the camp, and water which had flowed over the ashes had cleansing efficacy.

But does Scripture connect this type with the Spirit's work? First let us note that in Matt. xix. 28—the only other passage where the word "regeneration"<sup>1</sup> is used—it refers to the fulfilment of the Kingdom blessings to Israel, the epoch described in Acts iii. 21 as "the times of the restoration of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all His holy prophets." With this clew to guide us, we turn to one of the most definite of these prophecies, Ezek. xxxvi., xxxvii. We there read: "I will take you from among the heathen, and gather you out of all countries, and will bring you into your own land. Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you. . . . A new heart also will I give you. . . . And I will put my Spirit within you." Then follows the vision of the valley full of dry bones. The prophet is commanded to say, "Thus saith the Lord God, Come from the four winds, O breath, and breathe upon these slain, that they may live." And once again the words are repeated, "I shall put my Spirit in you, and ye shall live."

Here then is the most characteristic of all the prophecies of that great revival which the Lord's own lips have described as the "regeneration"—a prophecy to which the Jew clung with special earnestness, a prophecy ignorance of which in a

<sup>1</sup> The words are, "In the regeneration, when the Son of Man shall sit on the throne of His glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones."

Rabbi of the Sanhedrin was as disgraceful as if an English theologian knew nothing of the Nicodemus sermon! And it was the great truth of this prophecy—salvation through the sin-offering in the power of the Divine Spirit, that the Lord enforced in His words to Nicodemus, and which the Apostle emphasised in the Epistle to Titus. Thus only could the sinner enter the kingdom.

We conclude, then, that whatever the water typified in Ezek. xxxvi. and Numb. xix., it symbolised also in John iii. How could the defiled Israelite gain access to the sacrifice of the great sin-offering for purification? Water<sup>1</sup> which had flowed over the ashes of the sacrifice was sprinkled upon him. We know what the sacrifice typified, what did the water typify? What is the means by which the defiled sinner is brought into contact, as it were, with the great sin-offering of Calvary? By “the word of the truth of the Gospel.” And so we find in the only other passage where the word loutron occurs, the cleansing is “by the loutron of water in the word” (Eph. v. 26).

<sup>1</sup> In the Hebrew of Numb. xix. 17, it is “living water,” i.e., water from a fountain, which is the word used in Zech. xiii. 1, a prophecy relating to precisely the same period as Ezek. xxxvi. and Acts iii. The paganism of our theology has made this a fountain of blood, but such a thought is not more revolting in itself than it is abhorrent to the theology of Scripture. The error was of course confirmed by the popular reading of Rev. i. 5 (“washed” for loosed), rejected by all critics, and corrected in R.V. And this reacted upon Rev. vii. 14. The washed robes are the righteousnesses of saints (xix. 8, R.V.). But “all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags” (Is. lxiv. 6). And so to the words “they washed their robes” (a figure well known in Scripture, see Eccles. ix. 8) is added, “and they made them white in the blood of the Lamb.” God’s acceptance of even the very best that man can do depends altogether upon redemption.

Baptism is a public act performed by man, for which man can fix the day and hour. The new birth of water and the Spirit is altogether the work of God ; and as our Lord so expressly declares, no man can forecast, no man can command it. "The Spirit breathes where He wills, and thou hearest His voice, but knowest not whence He cometh and whither He goeth : so is every one that is born of the Spirit." It was presumably the obvious reference to Ezekiel which led our translators to render πνεῦμα by wind. Of course it may have that meaning ; just as in English, "spirit" may mean alcohol. But the word πνεῦμα occurs 370 times in the New Testament (23 times in John), and yet nowhere else is it translated wind.

But the need of all this discussion depends solely on the necessity of clearing away the accumulations of error and prejudice which obscure and distort the teaching of the passage. In added words the Lord Himself has made His meaning unequivocally clear. In the ninth verse Nicodemus repeats as a humbled seeker after truth, the question which he has previously raised (verse 4) in petulant unbelief, "How can a man be born anew ?" And now the answer is vouchsafed to him : "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have eternal life." The new birth is not the result of a mystical human rite, but of faith in Christ—not as a teacher or an example, but as the antitype of the great sin-offering ; as "lifted up," that is, as crucified (comp. chap. viii.

28, and xii. 32). And as other scriptures tell us, "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God." "We are born again by the living and eternally abiding word of God" (1 Pet. i. 23).

Every one who sanctions the baneful delusion that the water of John iii. refers to baptism, serves as a decoy not only for the advocates of baptismal regeneration, but also for those who preach salvation apart from the great sacrifice of Calvary.

In this matter Christendom is in direct conflict with Scripture. Christendom teaches that baptism symbolises birth. Holy Scripture declares that it symbolises death. Christendom teaches that it is the putting away of the filth of the flesh. Holy Scripture declares it is "not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God." And in the same passage (1 Pet. iii. 21) the Apostle enforces the symbolism of death, by declaring that baptism is the antitype of the Flood. The water which overwhelmed the world bore up the ark. Noah was thus saved from death by death; as is the sinner who on believing in Christ becomes one with Him in death. But if it be a question of the new birth "we are born again BY THE WORD OF GOD" (1 Pet. i. 23).

The word "baptism" occurs 22 times, and the verb "baptize" 77 times, in the New Testament. But this statement might leave a false impression as to the prominence given it in the doctrinal teaching of the Scriptures. Of these 99 occurrences, 55 are in the Gospel narratives, and 27 in the Acts of the Apostles. The rest only are in the Epistles, and in only nine passages. Of these, one (1 Cor. x. 2) relates to the Israelites being "baptized unto Moses," another (1 Cor. xii. 13) to the Spirit's baptism; and a third (1 Cor. xv. 29) to "baptism for the dead."

But a further analysis will show results still more startling. In 1 Cor. i. 13-17, not only is the mention of baptism not doctrinal, but the Apostle there thanks God that he himself had not baptized, and declares that Christ had not sent him to baptize. Could he have possibly used such language if he had been acting under the commission of Matt. xxviii. 19, or if baptism held the place which Christendom has given it?

It appears, therefore, that in the theology of the Epistles there are but five passages where baptism is doctrinally mentioned. They are as follows:—

"Are ye ignorant that all we who were baptized unto<sup>1</sup> Christ Jesus were baptized unto His death? We were buried therefore with Him through baptism unto death" (Rom. vi. 3, 4). "For as many of you as were baptized unto Christ did put on Christ" (Gal. iii. 27). "One Lord, one faith, one baptism" (Eph. iv. 5). "Buried with Him in baptism" (Col. ii. 12). "Which also (i.e., Noah's flood) in the antitype doth now save you, even baptism, not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the interrogation of a good conscience toward God, through the resurrection of Jesus Christ" (1 Pet. iii. 21).

The words of 1 Cor. vi. 11 have been adapted by both translators and revisers to suit the popular reference of them to baptism. But the margin of R.V. gives what the Apostle actually wrote. He specifies sinners of the worst type, and adds: "And such were some of you; but ye washed yourselves (ἀπελούσασθε), but ye were sanctified, but ye were justified in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ and in the Spirit of our God." Now, the "washing" is a figure; sanctification and justification are facts: what, then, does the figure denote? The typology of the Mosaic ritual will supply the answer. Washing with water always means practical cleansing.<sup>1</sup> Ignorance of this has had baneful effects on Christian doctrine, tending, as it does, to make the great Atonement seem an excuse for neglecting practical purity of life. The Apostle's meaning is thus clear: "You turned from your sins, you were sanctified, you were justified."

<sup>1</sup> εἰς—compare 1 Cor. x. 2.

And this will enable us to understand Acts xxii. 16 (the only other passage where the same expression occurs). The Apostle records the words which Ananias addressed to him at his conversion: "Arise and be baptized, and wash away thy sins, calling on the name of the Lord." To suppose that, in direct opposition to his definite teaching about baptism, the Apostle in this didactic and incidental way intended to teach that it was a purging from sin, is too wild for discussion. His meaning again is clear: "Arise and be baptized, and turn away from your evil courses, calling on His name."

<sup>1</sup> Such is its meaning, ex. gr., in Heb. x. 22. It is a reference to the ritual of Numb. xix. The Israelite was cleansed by being sprinkled with the water which had flowed over the ashes of the great sin-offering, and then by bathing himself in water.

This note would be incomplete without some reference to Matt. xxviii. 19.<sup>1</sup> But the questions to which the passage gives rise are much too large to allow of their being adequately discussed here. The fact that the commission there recorded remained a dead letter is wrongly used to discredit the authenticity of the words. That the commission was not acted on by the Apostles is clear to every student of the Acts.<sup>2</sup> It directed them to go out and make disciples of the Gentiles, whereas they preached to the Jews only. A special vision was needed to lead Peter to visit the house of Cornelius; and the Apostle to the Gentiles declared emphatically, "He sent me not to baptize." At the Council of Acts xv., no one of the inspired apostles was led to refer to this commission, and there is no mention in Acts of any case of baptism in the name of the Trinity.

All this is urged as proof that the passage is an interpolation. But here the answer is obvious that, were this so, the passage would have been so framed as to avoid such a criticism. The solution of the difficulty is to be found in the essentially prophetic character of the first Gospel, and the well-known distinction between ultimate and intermediate fulfilment. If this distinction be overlooked, many a page of Holy Scripture must be rejected on the same ground. Regarded as a prophecy, the commission belongs to the day, still future, when "the Lord shall be king over all the earth," and "all peoples, nations, and languages shall serve Him." And when that day comes, the question will not be of individual faith in an absent and rejected Saviour and Lord, but of national submission to Divine sovereignty, openly declared and enforced on earth. And baptism will become "the outward and visible sign" of that submission. The intelligent Bible student will here turn at once to passages like Daniel vii. 13, 14, Zechariah xiv., and the many "kingdom" Psalms (such as xcvi. to c.). And now we can understand still more fully why it should be at the close of Matthew's Gospel that this commission is recorded, and why it is to the Gentile nations that the messengers are sent forth blessing to Israel being assumed. The reason is simple and clear, namely, that prophetically the commission belongs to the age when the Church of this dispensation shall have passed to heaven (1 Thess. iv. 16, 17), and when the true remnant of Israel—the "all Israel" of Romans xi. 26 (see ix. 6, 27), typified by the "five hundred brethren" who gathered round the Lord upon the mountain—shall be the missionaries to the world.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> I do not cite Mark xvi. 16, because, as every one knows, the last twelve verses of the second Gospel are of doubtful authenticity; and though Dean Burgon's treatise in defence of them gives proof that there are two sides to that controversy, more than this can scarcely be claimed for it.

<sup>2</sup> See "The Silence of God," Appendix, Note III.

<sup>1</sup> It is generally admitted that this was the appearing mentioned in 1 Cor. xv. 6. If not, then this, the most important event of the "forty days," is unnoticed in the Gospels—an incredible supposition. I may here remark that the English reader is apt to be misled by the "then" and the "theys" of Matt. xxviii. 16, 17. These words, which seem so emphatically to limit the appearing to the Eleven, are in fact not in the Greek at all. "Then" is "the de resumptive," often untranslatable, sometimes (as in verse 1) left untranslated. It here marks that verse 16 is not a continuation of a consecutive narrative, but the record of a special event, and the pronouns are merely implied in the verbs used. The Eleven are

May I add that any one of "the five hundred" could have framed a narrative of all the appearances of the "forty days"? The omission of such a record in Matthew is not to be explained by ignorant talk about "fragmentary materials," &c. As I have said elsewhere,<sup>1</sup> those who profess to account for the Bible on natural principles can give no explanation of the omissions of Scripture. The first Gospel ignores the Lord's appearances in Jerusalem for the same reason that it ignores Jerusalem altogether, so far as it was possible to ignore it, in the record of the Lord's ministry from first to last.

The purpose of the four Gospels in the Divine scheme of revelation is to present Christ in different aspects of His Person and work, as Israel's Messiah, Jehovah's Servant, Son of Man, and Son of God. It is with the first that we have here to do. Galilee was prophetically and dispensationally connected with the godly remnant, which, in the apostasy of the nation, was divinely regarded as the true Israel. Therefore it is that to the Lord's ministry in Galilee such prominence is given in the Hebrew Gospel. According to Matthew, the last words spoken to the Eleven before the agony in Gethsemane were that after He was risen again He would go before them into Galilee (Matt. xxvi. 32). And the first message sent to His "brethren" after the resurrection, first by the mouth of the angel who appeared to the women at the sepulchre, and afterwards by expressly mentioned, no doubt, because every one knew that the "five hundred brethren" were there, and the Lord's command to the apostles to remain in Jerusalem might have cast a doubt upon the fact that they were present.

<sup>1</sup> "The Silence of God," pp. 50, 51.

His own lips, was that He would meet them in Galilee (Matt. xxviii. 7, 10).

What, then, was needed to complete the book? But for the guiding and restraining Spirit of God, the Apostle would doubtless have given a record of the events of those forty days. From a practical and common sense point of view, it is idle to talk here of "fragmentary materials." Any one of the disciples could have compiled such a narrative, but it would have been wholly foreign to the scope and purpose of the first Gospel. As it is the Galilee ministry which is the burden of it, all that remains is to record how, in the scene of that ministry, the Lord gathered His disciples round Him, and gave them the pregnant and prophetic words with which that Gospel closes.

APPENDIX II

ROMISH PROPAGANDISM

A FEW years ago I received a letter from a gentleman living near London, expressing solicitude for my spiritual welfare, and an earnest desire to see me within the fold of the Catholic Church.

Though the writer was a stranger to me, the tone in which he wrote was such that I was careful to reply in terms befitting the courtesy and grace which marked his letter. My acknowledgment drew from him a rejoinder of several sheets, in which, still more urgently, he pressed his appeal. In answer to this I wrote in terms which I supposed would be deemed final, and enclosed a copy of one of my books (The Gospel and its Ministry), to which I referred as proof that I already possessed in Christ every blessing which he imagined the Church could give; and, moreover, that I was, from his point of view, a hopeless heretic. My surprise therefore was great at receiving again a prompt reply at considerable length, assuring me of the pleasure with which he had read my book, and of the increasing desire he felt that I should be in my right place, namely, within "the Church."

My kind and courteous, though unknown, friend, never failed promptly to renew his appeals to me, whenever, by replying to his letters (which I did generally after long intervals), I afforded him the opportunity. I fear my Protestant zeal led me to say many things that were galling and some that were unjust; but nothing from my pen availed to betray my correspondent into an expression of anger or even of disappointment.

Towards the close of our correspondence he sent me a copy of a Catholic treatise,<sup>1</sup> to show me how grievously I misjudged his Church. His letter, enclosing the book, gave me the first definite hint of what I naturally guessed, that his letters to me were part of a systematic effort to lead selected Protestants to make their submission to Rome.

This fact renders the correspondence worthy of mention in these pages. Nor is there any breach of confidence in my giving extracts from his letters, for I exclude everything that could possibly betray his identity. Such are the methods by which the preverts to Rome are won. Here are the arguments which influence them.

In returning the book I wrote as follows:—

"If your object were to satisfy me how much of Christian truth your Church has preserved, and what a gulf separates the English Roman Catholicism of to-day from the Popery of darker days, and from the degrading and hateful cult which still rests as a blight and curse upon Ireland, you might have the gratification of knowing that your aim had been achieved. But your letters have assured me that your object is far different. And truth and candour forbid my allowing you to imagine that the kindlier feelings thus excited towards English Roman Catholics, modify in the least my repudiation of the system they are connected with. According to the newspaper reports of a recent address of Cardinal Vaughan, his Eminence said, 'That the Divine Founder of Christianity established His religion as a sacramental and sacrificial system, absolutely dependent upon a sacerdotal order issued by Christ Himself.' That whole position I reject. And while I gladly own that in the infinite grace of God those who are thus deceived may be eternally saved through Christ, this will, I know well, be in spite of their religion, and not in virtue of it.

---

<sup>1</sup> Catholic Doctrine and Discipline Simply Explained, by Philip Bold. With Cardinal Vaughan's "Imprimatur."

"And here I make no distinction between Roman Catholics and Protestants. The recent appeal to Rome for recognition of the 'Anglican Orders' is proof how many Protestants are in the same case. The whole position is one which as an intellectual—I might say an intelligent—man I despise, and as a Christian I deplore. It is a sheer denial of Christianity. But I check myself. If we could find any common ground, I should be eager to meet you and to do my utmost to draw you away from a position which I deem so evil and so perilous. But there is none. I refuse to listen to 'the Church,' and I turn with faith and confidence to the Word of God. But with you the Church is everything, and even the Word of God is made subordinate to it. Common ground, therefore, there is none."

The following is an extract from his reply:—

"You refuse to listen to the Church, and you turn with confidence to a Book—a Book which you have received from the Church, and apart from which you cannot understand! Christ referred you to no book. He told you to hear the Church, and no one for 1,600 years after His ascension ever thought that faith came by reading a book or a collection of books, but by humbly hearing the voice of the Divine Teacher. I know the Book is the written Word of God, and I value it and reverence it as such; but the written word and the spoken word are to me one and the same Word. God does not speak one thing, and cause men to write as His Word another thing. God's Word is one, spoken and written; and He cannot contradict Himself. What the Church teaches is Divine; she is God's voice speaking to the unbelieving world; qui vos audit me audit. What has been preserved to us of the written Word confirms the teaching of the Church. The Church received her teaching, not from the Bible, but from Christ. She taught before a word of the New Testament was ever written, she could have gone on teaching for ever if it had never been written, or if it had perished. The living Word of God can never perish, the Church's voice is eternal and it is world-wide."

To this letter I wrote a reply at once, but my letter lay unposted for more than six months. I then sent it with an explanatory note, again expressing my appreciation of his kindness and zeal, and making one more appeal to him. The following is copied from the enclosure:—

"You refuse my appeal to the written Word of God, and point me to 'the Church.' But when I ask, 'Why should I trust "the Church?"' you refer me to the written Word of God! It amazes me that an intelligent man like yourself cannot see the inconsistency of such a position. Either 'the Church' can justify its pretensions by an appeal to Scripture, or it cannot. If it cannot there is an end of the matter. If it can, then let us turn to Scripture and bow to its decision. The passage you have quoted again and again (Luke x. 16) consists of words spoken by the Lord to a company of Jews who were sent out as Jews to preach the kingdom to Jews, in a dispensation before the Church was constituted ! . . .

“I accept your clearly implied, but courteously veiled, taunt that I am setting up my judgment against that of Christendom. And I am not afraid of this. Even if I stood alone I should not swerve. But behind me are the apostles and prophets and the million martyrs who have dared to stand for God and His Word against an apostate Christendom, and have sealed their testimony with their blood.

“And speaking of martyrs, may I ask in the name of common fairness and common sense, How is it that if your Church believes, as you say, that God alone, and His grace alone, can produce the change of mind and heart which is called conversion, that same Church has tortured and murdered the unnumbered victims of her persecutions for not getting ‘converted’? Do you not know that if my lot had been cast in darker days, your Church would have burned me at the stake, or torn me to pieces on the rack? You seem to me to shut your eyes both to history and Scripture, and blindly to accept a theory which Scripture knows nothing of and history refutes. Have you not read such passages as the close of Matt. xxiii.? If the Church of the last dispensation merited such scathing words, may not the Church of this dispensation be equally apostate? Have you never read 2 Tim.? And pray look at the close of chap. iii. In the midst of error and apostasy, even then leavening the whole lump, ‘The Holy Scriptures’ are declared to be the true safeguard and guide.”

This brought me a reply, from which I quote the following :—

“I am much obliged to you for your letter of yesterday’s date, enclosing your reply written last September. My correspondence is rather voluminous, and I regret to say that I forget what I then said.

“I am always very grateful to any one who wishes and tries to do me what he conscientiously believes is good, however misled and mistaken I may myself find him to be. It is therefore no mere form when I cordially thank you for your kind wishes and kind expressions. I value both, but I believe your religious opinions to be in many important matters entirely erroneous and indeed pernicious and contrary to revealed truth and to the revealed will of God. Therefore it would be the greatest calamity to me if I were able—per impossibile—to adopt such opinions in lieu of the one eternal truth revealed by God, and taught by the Divine Teacher sent by God, i.e., His Church. If I lost confidence in the Divine Teacher, I should at once lose confidence in the Deity whose mouthpiece she is. If the Catholic Church is not true, not Divine, therefore fallible, ‘apostate,’ &c., &c. (as her enemies suppose), then to me Christianity is an illusion, a mythology, a falsehood, a merely human thing on a level with Buddhism, Islamism, &c., &c., in many respects superior to them, doubtless, but no more Divine than they. I see no alternative between Catholicism and Agnosticism. I accepted the former in exchange for the latter, and I daily see more and more its holiness, beauty, perfection, divinity, truth. You are surprised at this. No wonder. You see the painted window on the outside, I see it from within—that is the difference. . . . You trust the New Testament which came after the Church and which she has declared to be the written word. I require no Bible to convince me of the truth and divinity of the Holy Church of God. I value the Bible because the Church tells me it is the written word. . . .

“You ask me how it is that the Church ‘has tortured and murdered the unnumbered victims of her persecutions for not getting converted.’ The answer is most simple. The Church has never ‘tortured or murdered’ any one whatever! Did not Fénelon say what all her best divines approve: ‘By force hypocrites and not converts are made.’ You read ‘history’ written by bigots, who distort and pervert the truth. The cruelties inflicted by kings and statesmen for State reasons cannot with justice be referred to the Church. . . . The Church is not the author of those uncivilised methods, and they form no part of her teaching.

“The Church and Christ are one. Her voice is His voice—and so long as we hear that, and obey, we are doing God’s will. That is our position. Conversion is the work of God alone—no force, argument, or persuasion of man’s invention, can accomplish it. Place yourself on your knees before God and ask light and grace from Him, tell Him you will sacrifice all things for His sake; that you are ready to do His will and to obey; and you will rise up, if He will, as new a creature as Saul of Tarsus after he had heard the voice.”

His last letter remains unanswered; for I am utterly at a loss to know what answer is possible to one who thus ignores or distorts both history and Scripture, and honestly and earnestly believes in what he calls “the Church.” Here, I repeat are the arguments by which the perverts to Rome are being won. Here, in its most advanced development, is the pestilently evil and profane view of “the Church,” which is slowly but surely undermining Christianity in the Church of England at this moment.

APPENDIX III

PAOLO SARPI AND THE COUNCIL OF TRENT

OF Paolo Sarpi it has been said that "there was no department of human knowledge about which he did not know everything that had been ascertained by others, and few to which he did not make substantial contributions." In truth, he seems to have been one of the most extraordinary men of his own or of any age. Born in Venice in 1552, he joined the Servites at thirteen years of age, and was immediately put forward as their champion at the great annual disputation in the Frari Church, where, before all the noble and great and wise of Venice, he held his own against all disputants. Five years later, at eighteen, he was appointed to the chair of Positive Theology at Mantua, and became private theologian to the Duke. In 1575 he returned to Venice, where he held the chairs of Philosophy and Mathematics in the monastery until, in 1579, he became a Principal of his Order. His high character, his intense piety, and his altogether phenomenal erudition and genius, secured for him the friendship of all who were best qualified to supply him with materials for his history of the Council of Trent.

His quarrel with the Vatican came later, and was brought about as follows: In 1606 the Senate of Venice, in order to secure his services, created for him the office of Theological Counsellor; and in the fierce struggle of that year between the Republic and the Pope, Paolo Sarpi was the adviser of the Senate. Paul V. launched his Bull of interdict and excommunication against Venice. Sarpi held that this action was ultra vires; and, acting on their Counsellor's advice, the Senate confronted and thwarted the Pope at every point. The Pope ordered the clergy to close the churches and suspend all services and sacraments. The Republic threatened to punish any priest who acted on the order. The Pope ordered the clergy to leave the country and repair to Rome. They were warned that if they attempted to act on the order they would be hanged at the frontier. The Pope was brought to his knees, and after pleading in vain for some way to save his dignity, he was compelled to issue another Bull, withdrawing the interdict; and this the Senate, acting on Sarpi's advice, would not permit to be read in the churches. Never since has any Pope dared to issue such an interdict.

Needless to say, the result was to make the Pope the bitter enemy of Paolo Sarpi. Having tried in vain every artifice to get him to Rome, he determined to be revenged by other means. Though honours and money were pressed upon Sarpi, he refused to change his mode of life ; and while his days were spent in the public service, he insisted on returning nightly to his cell in the monastery. On the night of the 5th October, 1607, he was way-laid by assassins hired by Paul V., and left for dead within a few hundred yards of the monastery. But to the bitter disappointment of the Pope, and to the amazement of everybody, he recovered. For another fifteen years he continued his career of service to Venice and the world, and, notwithstanding further Papal plots against his life, he died peacefully in his cell on the 15th of January, 1623.

His fame may be judged by the fact that his death was formally reported to all the Courts of Europe, and that he was voted a State funeral and a public monument. But the malignity of the Vatican is undying. Plot after plot was hatched to desecrate the dead friar's tomb and scatter his ashes. Ten times those ashes were disturbed, and secretly reinterred to save them from the Papal emissaries ; and for 270 years the decree of the Senate to erect a monument to his memory remained in abeyance. It was not till seven years ago (20th September, 1892) that, in pursuance of that decree, the statue that now stands in the Campo di Santa Fosca was unveiled in honour of that truly great and noble man.

---

“ To magnify the importance of the Council of Trent I believe to be impossible,” says Froude ;

and for the sake of those who may not have access to such a book as his, I give the following brief outline of the wonderful story.

The Papal Bull summoning the council bore date the 22nd of May, 1542, but the ecclesiastics who came together at Trent in the August following were too few in number to enter on their task. France, in alliance with the Turks, had declared war against the Emperor, and neither French nor German bishops could attend. England, of course, stood aloof; for Cardinal Pole represented no one but himself and the Pope. And the Spaniards had not yet arrived. Thus the year passed away, and when in the winter the Italian bishops, impatient of delay, seemed about to proceed to business, Granvelle, the Imperial chancellor, was despatched to stop them. On January 9, 1543, he delivered in peremptory terms his master's orders; and though Pope Paul would have gladly disregarded them, the fear of man restrained him; for not sixteen years had passed since Rome had been stormed by a German army, and what had happened so recently might happen again. After many delays, the 15th of March, 1545, was fixed by another Bull for the Council to reassemble, but it was not until May that any of the bishops arrived.

Cardinal Del Monti, afterwards Pope Julius III., was the chief Papal Legate. His first trouble was the claim of the Emperor's representative, Mendoza, Spanish ambassador at Venice, to sit next to him, and above the bishops. Next came Mendoza's demand for further delay. By the end of May only twenty bishops were present, all Italians.

They must wait for the Spaniards. Again the year almost ran out, and it was not till the 13th of December that the opening ceremony at last took place. But Monti's patience and skill were sorely taxed. One of the first dangers he had to meet was a demand on the part of the bishops to make the Council independent of the Pope. This was with difficulty avoided. The next was the Imperial demand that the question of morals should have precedence of discussions upon doctrine. This was regarded by Paul as a covert attack upon himself. There was too much glass about his house to make stone-throwing pleasant or safe. Del Monti was ordered to force forward the examination of doctrine and to thrust aside reform. But all he was able to attain was a compromise, that doctrine and morals should be dealt with in alternate sessions. The Imperial representative remonstrated that three cardinals and forty bishops, all of whom were personally insignificant, were incompetent to settle the faith of the world; but the forty bishops thought otherwise, and the Council proceeded to business. On the motion of Cardinal Pole, they began by affirming the "Apostles' creed." The next proposal, to declare allegiance to "the apostolic see," might have caused a division had not the news of Luther's death (February 18, 1546) come opportunely to put every one in good humour. They proceeded to consider and anathematise the arch-heretic's doctrines. The Vulgate, that most depraved translation, was canonised as being itself (including the Apocrypha) Divine Scripture; human tradition was raised to the same level as the Scriptures themselves, and the laity were declared incompetent to interpret, or even to understand them.

Explosions occurred from time to time, as one bishop or another paraded his personal grievances against the Pope or the Curia; but in spite of these interruptions the formulating of dogmas went on apace by the obedient vote of "the Pope's brigade" of Italian bishops. The Emperor was indignant. It was a reform of morals he wanted, and a fair hearing for the Protestants. But he was helpless. Twenty Spanish bishops had joined the Council, but the Spaniards, though personally abler and purer than the Italians, were, as ecclesiastics, still less disposed to parley with heretics. They forced to the front, however, the question of the corruptions which allowed the Roman cardinals to live in splendid idleness by drawing the revenues of benefices which they never visited; and it taxed the firmness of Paul and the diplomacy of Del Monti to save the offenders.

The winter of 1546 was exceptionally severe, and the effeminate Italians were miserable at Trent. It was the Emperor's determination alone which had fixed a German town as the meeting-place, and it was fear of the Emperor that kept them there. But the action of the Spaniards threatened to wreck the whole fabric of the Papacy, and in the following spring, under Del Monti's advice, the Pope decided to remove the Council to Papal territory. A rumour was started that the plague was in Trent. Paolo Sarpi declares that two physicians were secretly instructed to encourage the belief. The Papal Legate arranged the scheme in spite of the protests of the Imperial representative, and the Council adjourned to Bologna, Don Francis of Toledo and most of the Spaniards alone remaining in Trent. But the work of the Council was practically accomplished. The creed of Christendom—that astounding monument of narrow intolerance and base superstition—had been settled.

The rest is easily told. In November, 1549, Paul III. died, and Del Monti succeeded to the Pontificate. Willing to propitiate the Emperor, he offered to send the Fathers back to Trent. But doctrines had been settled, and the reform of morals was hopeless. Paolo Sarpi narrates that on one occasion when the question was brought up, the bishops set to discussing whether their own exemption from the jurisdiction of ordinary courts ought not to be extended to their concubines! All that remained, therefore, of Charles' original scheme was to get the German Reformers to the Council. But the Council of Constance had decided that a safe conduct granted to a heretic need not be respected; and, with the fate of Huss before their minds, the Reformers were cautious. The Council was to reassemble on May 2, 1551, but another year passed, and these difficulties still blocked the way. And even then the only Germans who attended were laymen.

The full Council met, and the foreign ministers of State were present in their robes. In plain language Leonard Badehorn addressed the brilliant assembly, repudiating the authority of the Council, because the Scriptures were not the rule of controversy with them, and the members were the servants of the Pope who ought to be on his trial with the rest of them. He scouted the idea that sixty such bishops could settle the faith of the world. He spoke, he declared, as the representative of the Elector Maurice of Saxony. The next day, after Mass in the cathedral, the reply of the Council was read, acceding to the full the German demand for a safe conduct such as they could trust. But it was made plain that the Protestants were to be heard only to please the Emperor. They were to have no deliberative voice, nor were the decrees already passed in condemnation of their doctrines to be reconsidered. Melanchthon and the divines of the Augsburg confession therefore never attended.

The events which followed in Germany—the march of Maurice of Saxony upon Innsbruck, and the flight of the Emperor—are among the enigmas of history. But Innsbruck was only three days' march from Trent; and when the news reached the Council, the Italian bishops stampeded, as the historian describes it, "like a gang of coiners surprised by the police." The Papal Legate, Cardinal Crescentio, and a few of the Spaniards, lingered long enough to pass a vote declaring that all their decrees should be valid for ever.

The Council of Trent of ten years later was, in everything but name, a new assembly. Such in briefest outline is the story of a Council which was repudiated, not only by England and Germany, but even by Catholic France. Thus was the faith of Christendom decreed by a gang of some three-score Italian and Spanish priests. Thus ended one of the most transparent, and yet one of the most successful, impostures in the history of the world.

APPENDIX IV

NOTE I.—BISHOPS

The Epistle to the Philippians is addressed to "all the saints," "with the bishops and ministers." Upon which Dean Alford remarks, "The simple juxtaposition of the officers with the members of the Church, and indeed their being placed after those members, shows the absence of hierarchical views such as those in the Epistles of the apostolic Fathers." And again, in his comments on Acts xx. 17, 28 (which records that Paul addressed the elders of the Church in Ephesus as bishops), he refers thus to the perversion of the passage by Irenæus: "So early did interested and disingenuous interpretations begin to cloud the light which Scripture might have thrown on ecclesiastical questions." And he notices the mistranslation of verse 28 in A.V. ("overseers" in lieu of bishops), as concealing "the fact of elders and bishops having been originally and apostolically synonymous." This is obvious from Tit. i. 5, 7, which enjoins the appointment of "elders in every city . . . if any man is blameless . . . for the bishop must be blameless." And so again in Acts xiv. 23, "And when they had appointed for them elders in every church."

Some who would despise Dean Alford, and who would regard a layman who discusses such subjects, as being "in the gainsaying of Korah," will listen perhaps to the most learned of the Latin Fathers. In Jerome's Commentary on Titus they will find all this in the plainest words. He says, "A presbyter is the same as a bishop and . . . Churches were governed by a common council of presbyters." And again, "Therefore, as we have shown, among the ancients presbyters were the same as bishops; but by degrees, that the plants of dissension might be rooted up, all responsibility was transferred to one person."

NOTE II.—"DEACONS"

The word deacon occurs in two passages in our English Bible, viz., Phil. i. 1 and 1 Tim. iii. 8-13. It there represents the Greek word διάκονος, which occurs eight times in the Gospels and twenty-two times in the Pauline Epistles, and nowhere else. In the Gospels it means servant in the common sense of that word, save only in John xii. 26 ("There shall my servant be"). The Apostle uses it only in the higher sense, save in Rom. xiii. 4. But by an extraordinary vagary of Christian thought, the seven men appointed, as recorded in Acts vi. to take charge of the collections are called deacons; and the word having thus acquired the meaning of a subordinate minister, it was then, with an ecclesiastical bias, introduced into the two passages above indicated. Its use there is not translation but exegesis; for when the New Testament was written the Greek language possessed no word corresponding to it. And "using the office of a deacon" (A.V.) or "serving as a deacon" (R.V.) in verses 10 and 13, is a sheer mistranslation. The verb thus rendered is the kindred term διακονέω, used thirty-six times in the New Testament, and it ought to be rendered "to minister."

The New Testament knows nothing of "the office of a deacon." Besides the apostles, there were in the Church "bishops" and "ministers." The functions of an elder or bishop were not ministry, but rule. If he ruled well he was to be doubly esteemed, and still more esteemed if (in addition to discharging the duties of his office) he "laboured in the word and in teaching" (1 Tim. v. 17). The "bishop" was generally appointed by an apostle or his delegate (Tit. i. 5). But the practice of appointing "ministers" belongs to post-apostolic times. The call to ministry was altogether of God. They who claimed to have received the call were duly tested; the command was, "Let them first be proved, and then, if they be blameless, let them minister" (1 Tim. iii. 10). This survives in the service for "the making of deacons," which is very ancient. (The service for "ordering of priests" belongs to a later and more corrupt era.) Before the bishop proceeds to ordain the candidate he requires him to declare that he is "truly called, according to the will of our Lord Jesus Christ, to the ministry." The call itself is neither of men nor by man.

NOTE III.—"THE CHURCH"

In controversies of the kind raised by "the Oxford movement" and by the present ritualistic revival, the real question at issue is "the Church." On the one side there is the Romish view; on the other is that of the Reformers. Which is right? This question is of vital importance. No one, whatever his opinions may be, can fail to be struck by the silence of Scripture respecting that which is the paramount reality in the religion of Christendom. Prominence is given to "the Church which is His body"; but about the Church as an organised society on earth, there is, if we except 1 Cor. xii. 28 and 1 Tim. iii. 15, practically nothing in the New Testament, save warnings of its apostasy. Latin theology, however, maintains its position, first, by ignoring all this; secondly, by confounding the Church with the kingdom; and thirdly, by taking words spoken to the apostles in the days of the Lord's earthly ministry as applicable to "the Church" of Christendom.

John xx. 23 may seem an exception to this. But let the objector answer this question, Whether were the Lord's words addressed to the whole company of the disciples there assembled, or to the apostles as such? If the former, there is an end of the matter from the Romish standpoint;

if the latter, then let those who claim to have the powers of apostles in the spiritual sphere, give proof that they possess their powers in the sphere where we can test them.

Since the beginning of the "Oxford movement" to the present hour, no one has seceded to Rome who has not taken that step as the result of deciding the question, Whether is the Church of Rome or the Church of England the Church? It is like one of those silly catch questions which are framed so to fix the attention on a side issue that the real issue involved escapes notice.<sup>1</sup> Of course we answer, with the Reformers, "Neither the one nor the other."

According to them "the Church" is "a congregation of faithful men, in the which the pure Word of God is preached, and the sacraments be duly administered according to Christ's ordinance in all those things that of necessity are requisite to the same" (Art. xix.). This is the creed of the Church of England. And if any bigot should set up the plea that by these concluding words the Reformers intended to limit their definition to episcopacy, he is answered by the language of the 55th Canon of the Convocation of 1603, which is as follows: "Before all sermons, lectures, and homilies, the preachers and ministers shall move the people to join with them in prayer, in this form, or to this effect, as briefly as conveniently they may; Ye shall pray for Christ's Holy Catholic Church, that is, for the whole congregation of Christian people dispersed throughout the whole world, and especially for the Churches of England, Scotland, and Ireland." Such is "the Catholic Church" for whose "good estate" prayer is made continually in our churches. In 1603 the only Episcopal Churches outside the kingdom were those which Article xix. expressly excludes; and the Church of Scotland (which is here expressly named) was Presbyterian.

<sup>1</sup> Such, ex. gr., as "Would you say 5 and 7 is 13, or are 13."

All that Dean Hook has here to urge is that, as the Archbishop who presided at the Convention was (he declares) a bitter and unscrupulous bigot, it is "monstrous to suppose" the Presbyterian Church of Scotland was intended. But the fact remains that there was no Episcopal Church in Scotland. The plain truth is that the Church of England does not teach this anti-Christian figment of Apostolic Succession in an episcopacy. Article xxiii. could never have been framed by men corrupted by such an error. And Hooker, who is so high an authority upon the doctrines of the Church, repudiates it. "Some do infer" (he says) "that no ordination can stand but such only as is made by Bishops, which have had their ordination likewise by other Bishops before them till we come to the very apostles, . . . to this we answer, that there may be sometimes very just and sufficient reason to allow ordination made without a Bishop" (Eccles. Pol. vii. 14).

If Rome has paramount claims to the position she assumes, it is as being indisputably the most distinctive and advanced embodiment of the apostasy. When the historic Church adopted the pagan rite of baptism it ceased to have any moral right to be considered the Church of God; and when in a later age it gave up the Lordship and Headship of Christ its fall was complete. For if baptismal regeneration is *un*Christian, apostolic succession is anti-Christian.

In "the Christian religion" the Church is everything. In Christianity the Church sinks to its true place as "a congregation of faithful men," and the great test of faithfulness is that the Lord Jesus Christ is all in all.

NOTE IV.—"THE PRIEST IN ABSOLUTION"

In the course of official duty I have read many obscene books, but I have seldom read anything more gratuitously filthy than the standard works intended for the guidance of priests in questioning penitents. Compared with Romish treatises, those in use among the Romanisers in the Church of England seem mild. Dr. Pusey's Manual for Confessors (based on Abbé Gaume's work) entirely omits the section relating to the seventh commandment—an acknowledgment that, in his day, Englishmen would not tolerate it. But impurity is an evil plant of rapid growth, and no such reserve was used by "The Society of the Holy Cross" when, in 1866, they issued The Priest in Absolution. Part I. of this work, a tract of 90 pages, was published and sold openly, and reached a second edition in 1869. Part II., a book of 322 pages, was "privately printed for the use of the clergy." It was dedicated "to the Masters, Vicars, and Brethren of the Society of the Holy Cross," and its circulation has been chiefly among the conspirators of that Jesuitical organisation. I have been fortunate enough, however, to see a copy of it, and I have made extracts which I intended to set out here. But this purpose I have abandoned, for I have sought to exclude everything from these pages which would render them unfit for general readers. When the late Lord Redesdale brought the book before the House of Lords (June 14, 1877) the extracts he read from it were deemed too indecent even for the secular newspapers, and the Archbishop of Canterbury (Dr. Tait), who followed Lord Redesdale, declared "that it is a disgrace to the community that such a book should be circulated under the authority of clergymen of the Established Church."

The history of this shameful book, and of the controversy to which it gave rise, will be found in Chapter IV. of Mr. Walsh's Secret History of the Oxford Movement—a work which ought to be in the hands of every voter in the country. With his usual coldness he discusses the question as though these "priests" who practise this abominable system were all excellent men, whose only error is doctrinal. But, suffice it to say—for the subject is a delicate one—that while no one party in the Church can taunt another in this respect, those who claim to be priests with authority to forgive sins need expect no quarter when they outrage morality. The scandal is still recent respecting one leading member of the Society of the Holy Cross, whose name figures in Mr. Walsh's pages; and were I to refer to others it would not betoken Protestant bigotry, but special knowledge.

NOTE V.—DEATH-DATES OF LEADING FATHERS

The death of the Apostle John is believed to have occurred in the year 100. The following are the death-dates of the principal "Fathers" mentioned in these pages; some of them are given approximately :—

Clement (of Rome)	.	Greek	.	.	100
Ignatius	.	"	.	.	115
Justin Martyr	.	"	.	.	166
Polycarp	.	"	.	.	169
Irenæus	.	"	.	.	200
Clement (of Alexandria)	.	"	.	.	217
Tertullian	.	Latin	.	.	220
Origen	.	Greek	.	.	253
Cyprian	.	Latin	.	.	258
Athanasius	.	Greek	.	.	373
Ambrose	.	Latin	.	.	397
Chrysostom	.	Greek	.	.	407
Jerome	.	Latin	.	.	420
Augustine	.	"	.	.	430
Cyril (of Alexandria)	.	Greek	.	.	444

NOTE VI.—THE "VIRGIN MARY" MYTH

If, in the face of the plain statements of the 19th, 20th, and 25th verses of the first chapter of Matthew, people can deny that the mother of our Lord became Joseph's wife, it is idle to argue the question. Jerome it was who first formulated the Virgin Mary myth in a systematic way. With reference to the verses above cited, he exposed the fallacy of holding, as Hooker expresses it, "that a thing denied with special circumstance doth import an opposite affirmative when once that circumstance is expired." Sound logic this, provided "the thing denied" be something against the doing of which there exists a presumption, on account of its being vicious or wrong. And this Jerome's argument assumes, thus begging the whole question. If we deny that a man committed some grossly immoral act on the day when a wife whom he dearly loved lay dying, we do not imply that he committed such acts on other days, but merely give a special reason for rejecting the charge that he did so on the day in question. But if we assert that a man did not eat meat during Lent we do distinctly imply that he did do so at Easter. Some who deplore Mariolatry may perhaps shrink from the thought that Mary became the wife of Joseph. But the question arises, how far that feeling may be due to the very error which God intended to correct by recording so plainly that she, whom all generations call blessed, entered into the marriage relationship. "Let marriage be had in honour among ALL" (Heb. xiii. 4).

NOTE VII.—THE APOSTLE PAUL ON CELIBACY

The Apostle Paul's words in 1 Cor. vii. 25-40 have been misused in support of pernicious teaching on the subject of celibacy. But as Dr. Chr. Wordsworth writes (Church History, vol. iii. chap. vi.), he "qualifies his commendations of celibacy by grounding them on considerations of the present distress (in 1 Cor. vii. 26) in which the Christian Church was, in that age of persecution ; and he condemns in the strongest terms those who forbid to marry, even as contravening the divine truths which flow from the doctrine of the Incarnation, and as led astray by seducing spirits and doctrines of devils, and declares his will that younger women should marry and bear children (1 Tim. v. 14), and that every man should have his own wife, and every woman her own husband (1 Cor. vii. 2), and that marriage is honourable in all (Heb. xiii. 4) and 'a great mystery,' being a figure of Christ's union with His Church (Eph. v. 23-33)."

But the Bishop overlooks the fact that the Apostle never contemplates pledged celibacy. A life pledge not to do that which God sanctions to be done is entirely beyond the scope of his words. And any suggestion of monasticism is absolutely abhorrent to his teaching.

And further, not only are these words of counsel framed with special reference to the persecution then prevailing, but they form no part of the inspired Scriptures. The Apostle prefaces them by the express warning, "Now concerning virgins I have no commandment of the Lord." And when at the close of the passage he expresses his judgment that a widow is happier to remain a widow, he adds, "And I think also that I have the Spirit of God." These reservations are of immense importance as indicating the meaning of inspiration, and the supreme authority of inspired Scripture. "The exception proves the rule," and of the rest of the Epistle the Apostle could write, "If any man think himself to be a prophet or spiritual, let him acknowledge that the things that I write unto you are the commandments of the Lord" (1 Cor. xiv. 37). Nothing can be more explicit than the distinction. In the one case it is, "I command, yet not I, but the Lord"; in the other case it is, "But to the rest speak I, not the Lord" (1 Cor. vii. 10, 12).

NOTE VIII.—"WE HAVE AN ALTAR"

The language of Heb. xiii. 10 is freely used against the truth which it is the main object of the Epistle to establish. Here is the passage: "We have an altar whereof they have no right to eat which serve the tabernacle. For the bodies of those beasts whose blood is brought into the sanctuary by the high priest for sin, are burned without the camp. Wherefore Jesus also, that He might sanctify the people with His own blood, suffered without the gate. Let us go forth, therefore, unto Him without the camp, bearing His reproach."

The briefest summary of the views of commentators upon the words "We have an altar," would fill many a page. And it would convey the false impression that the statement is a hopeless enigma; whereas, in fact, its meaning is simple and clear to those who understand the language in which it is written, i.e., the typology of Scripture, "now entirely neglected" (as Hengstenberg so truly says) by theologians. But let us keep in view: (1) That the passage belongs, not to the doctrinal, but to the practical teaching of the Epistle; (2) That so far from its being the promulgation of some deep or mysterious truth, it is merely an incidental appeal to one of the plainest and best known ordinances of the law, and this, as the basis of the practical exhortation of verse 13; and (3) That there is no emphasis on the pronouns "we" and "they": as a matter of fact they are not expressed in the original at all.

We may therefore at once rule out any explanation which makes the "we" refer to Christians and the "they" to Jews; or which "involves the anachronism of a distinction between clergy and laity, which certainly then had no place" (Alford). The words "Ἐχομεν θυσιαστήριον" are equivalent to "There is an altar." And as the words were addressed to Hebrews, and no one versed in the teaching of the law would tolerate the thought of eating the great sin-offering, we may rule out also any exposition which rests on a blunder so gross. The priests were to eat of the ordinary sin-offerings, but not of those of which the blood was carried into the holy place (Lev. vi. 30; x. 16, 18). Having regard to (3) we dismiss also of course the exegesis, "We have an altar," namely, the Cross. Moreover, this also rests upon ignorance of the types; for under the law no victim was ever killed upon the altar, and there was no altar of sin-offering at all. The blood of the sin-offering was put upon the altar of burnt-offering, and in certain specified cases, upon the altar of incense. The use of the word "altar" in the passage is merely an instance of the familiar figure of Metonymy; as when, ex. gr., we say that a man keeps a good table, meaning thereby good food.

To conclude : the passage may be thus amplified and explained (though neither amplification nor explanation was needed for those to whom the Epistle was written) : We know that in the aspect of His work, which was typified by the great sin-offering, Christ stood absolutely alone and apart from His people. But the Cross does not speak to us merely of the curse of God upon sin : it expresses also the reproach of men, poured out without measure upon Him who was the Sin-bearer. We cannot share the Cross in its aspect towards God ; but let us on that very account be eager to share it in its aspect towards the world—"Let us go forth, therefore, unto Him without the camp, bearing His reproach."

It is the Hebrews version of Galatians vi. 14. And, as the tense of the verb makes clear in the original, it is not a call to some heroic act of renunciation, but (like the "Let us draw near" of ch. x. 22) an exhortation to the habit and attitude of life and heart which become those who profess to have been saved by the Cross of Christ.

Space forbids my noticing, important though it be, either the way in which this passage brackets together Exod. xxiv. 8 and xxxiii. 7, and Lev. xvi. ; or those other aspects of the great Sacrifice of Calvary in respect of which His people are "partakers of the Altar." (In the Passover, ex. gr., the people fed upon the lamb whose blood brought them redemption.)

In repudiating the very word "altar" the Reformers gave proof of spiritual intelligence. Just as the only Priest known to Christianity is the Lord Jesus Christ Himself, so the only altar is in the scene of His priestly ministry—the Divine presence in heaven. An altar upon earth must be either Jewish or Pagan. The Church of England knows nothing of it; albeit her paid servants revel in the apostasy betokened by the revival of the name, and the re-introduction of the abomination itself, in violation of the truth of God and of the law of this realm.

NOTE IX.—THE EPISTLES OF IGNATIUS.

Textual criticism has discredited the genuineness of most of the Epistles attributed to Ignatius, but even the three which, in the Syriac version at least, have stood the test (to Polycarp, the Ephesians, and the Romans) ought to be rejected by the “higher criticism,” on account of the manner in which the Lord is named in them. It is no longer “the Lord Jesus Christ,” as with Clement and Polycarp, but “Jesus Christ”—a clear indication that they belong to a later age. This conclusion is confirmed by the glaring anachronism of the mention of “bishops, presbyters, and deacons,” instead of “bishops and deacons.” And I venture to add that the Ignatius whom his own and succeeding generations held in such high repute cannot have been the poor creature these Epistles which bear his name represent. Take this for example, “Let all reverence the deacons as Jesus Christ, and the bishop as the Father, and the presbyters as the council of God and the assembly of the Apostles.” This sort of thing clearly belongs to a later age. In view of his actual imprisonment and his approaching martyrdom, such a man as Ignatius would surely have had something worthier to say as a last message to the Churches than the drivel about obeying their bishops, which abounds in the Epistles attributed to him. How different the Apostle Paul's words in Acts xx. 28-32! His forecast of "apostolic succession" was the entering in of "grievous wolves, not sparing the flock."

NOTE X.—PREVAILING IRREVERENCE IN THE USE OF THE LORD'S NAMES

These strictures upon the irreverence with which the Lord is addressed and named, are met by appealing to the practice of writers and preachers of repute. But this answer will not avail with those who are ready to bring everything to the test of Scripture. For my contention is that in this matter our habits are governed, not by Scripture, but by the evil traditions of Christendom. The spiritual Christian is betrayed into speaking of his Lord and Saviour with the familiarity which Christendom uses towards its mythical Jesus. This influence has prevailed from very early times.

Here are the Lord's own words: "For the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son: that all men should honour the Son even as they honour the Father" (John v. 22, 23). And in view of such words it is strange that any one can justify the prevailing practice. Every knee in the universe shall yet bow "in the name of Jesus" <sup>1</sup>—the name of His humiliation; and every tongue in the universe shall yet own Him Lord (Phil. ii. 10, 11). It behoves the Christian to give this testimony now and here.

Two books lie before me, both equally representative, both equally reprehensible in this respect. The one is the late Cardinal Manning's The Love of Jesus to Penitents; the other is a religious novel entitled What Would Jesus Do? I say nothing here of the profanity of using the sacred name in this way as the title of a book, to be bandied about in the publisher's warehouse and the bookseller's shop. I deal with the contents. The Catholic manual names the Lord on every page, but, with rare exceptions, it is always "Jesus"; never once "the Lord Jesus." <sup>2</sup> This is characteristic of Roman Catholic books of piety; for while Christianity brings men to God, human religion brings God down to men. Latin theology knows nothing either of grace or of lordship. And the "Jesus" of this American novel is made to dance to every one's piping. It discusses such problems as these: If "Jesus" was a singing woman, would He sing on the stage (undressed of course)? If He was a mechanic with a wife and three children, and lost his employment (through drink, for example), what would He do? The book is deplorably profane, but it fails to shock ordinary readers. Over 1,000,000 copies of it are said to be in circulation.

Gossip had it some years ago that in a certain historic home in England, socialism prevailed, and the servants were taught to speak of their noble master by his Christian name. But even in the degradation of such a household the true question for a servant to keep in view would be—not “What would George do?” but “What would he wish me to do?” And so here, the question which each one who seeks to live the Christian life should ever keep before him is, “What would the Lord Jesus Christ have me to do?” The moment the Christian drags his Lord and Master down to his own level, as the author of this novel does, he ceases morally to be a Christian at all.

<sup>1</sup> Not at, but in the name.

<sup>2</sup> I find in one place "Our L. J. C."; and in a very few others, "Our Lord," or "Our Divine Lord."

I have already spoken of the use of the Lord's personal name in the Gospels. When we turn to the Epistles we must remember (1) that the A.V. is not infrequently at fault in this regard; and (2) that in certain instances the text itself may be erroneous. 1 Thess. iv. 14 is a probable instance of this. “Sleeping in Jesus” has such a hold on the public mind that even the Revisers have retained it, although it is not a correct translation, and it would not be easy to put a doctrinal meaning on the expression. Which leads me to add (3) that there is always a doctrinal significance in the way in which the Lord is named in the inspired Scriptures. See, ex. gr., the passage last cited. The first “Jesus” in verse 14, gives emphasis to the fact that Christ as Man in His humiliation is intended. But in the three following verses we have “the Lord” five times repeated, and “dead in Christ” in verse 16—not “dead in Jesus,” which Scripture would never use. See again Rom.

viii. 11 in this connection. Ephesians iv. 21 is the only instance in that Epistle where He is called "Jesus"; and the meaning is that in the Lord's life on earth we find the pattern of the practical working out of the truth He teaches. In this connection see also 2 Cor. iv. 10, 11. Again, in Romans we have "the blood of Christ," never "the blood of Jesus"; whereas in Hebrews it is "the blood of Jesus," and not "the blood of Christ," save in chapter ix. 14 (where it refers to the cleansing of the conscience). The significance of this depends on the doctrinal difference between the two Epistles, as explained in Chapter XII., ante.

"Jesus" is the personal name of His humiliation; "Christ" and "Lord" are His official titles. To the Jew, "Christ" meant Messiah: for example, in Acts v. 42 he would read, "They ceased not to teach and to preach Jesus as the Messiah." For us "Christ" brings in the truth of resurrection, and "Lord" of ascension and glory. The true Christian life is lived out in the power of all that He is (Col. ii. 6).

Space forbids my going into this subject more fully, and dealing with the differences in this respect between different books of the New Testament, and especially Hebrews, 1 John, and Revelation. But I trust I have said enough to suggest inquiry. The Christian will find that while in our religious literature there is obviously no guide known in using the names and titles of the Lord, save euphony, and the writer's reverence (or irreverence) of spirit, there is in their use in Scripture an unexplored mine of deep and important teaching.

NOTE XI.—POPULAR HYMNOLOGY

To criticise our popular hymnology will seem to many to savour of sacrilege. And yet it is strange that people who are accustomed to join in the majestic praise of the Te Deum and the old Psalms can tolerate the poor stuff that abounds in our hymn books. "A good hymn," says Lord Selborne in the preface of his Book of Praise, "should have simplicity, freshness, and reality of feeling; a consistent elevation of tone, and a rhythm easy and harmonious, but not jingling or trivial. Its language may be homely, but should not be slovenly or mean. Affectation or visible artifice is worse than excess of homeliness: a hymn is easily spoiled by a single falsetto note. Nor will the most exemplary soundness of doctrine atone for doggerel, or redeem from failure a prosaic, didactic style."

Most of our hymn books, if revised in the light of these weighty words, would lose at once half their contents. But there would still remain a considerable number of hymns which Christians would discard if they knew what it means "to sanctify Christ in their hearts as Lord"—hymns of which the faultless rhythm only makes their influence more pernicious. To illustrate my meaning I take, for instance, the hymn beginning—

"Sweet Saviour, bless us ere we go," with the refrain at the end of every verse—

"O gentle Jesu, be our light."

Who is the Being whom people are taught to address in such terms and in such a manner? One moment's intelligent thought will satisfy any one that He is not our risen and glorified Lord and Saviour. His personal name occurs nearly a thousand times in the New Testament, but never once with an adjective. Not even in the days of His humiliation did His chosen disciples ever once address Him thus. The plain truth is—and it is an awfully solemn truth—that this “sweet, gentle Jesu” is a mere idol. The same tendency in human nature which leads the Catholic to worship a mythical Virgin Mary (the mother of our Lord now sleeps with all the holy dead) declares itself in impersonating this mythical Jesus, an object of sentiment, not of faith. And this tendency is so deep and general that in scores of hymns we find this utterly unchristian, “O Jesus,” when the rhythm of the verse is positively spoiled by it, and would be saved by the use of the Christian mode of address, “Lord Jesus.”

If we want to find this influence at its worst, we must turn to Roman Catholic writers, and nothing perhaps in the language equals in evil F. W. Faber's collection. I appeal to the popularity of this author's hymns as being in itself a sufficient proof of my contention that the Jesus of this religion is an idol. I have the book before me as I write—not the earlier edition, published under the appropriate title, Jesus and Mary (the two myths), but the second (1871) edition of the complete collection. Here is a typical hymn, beginning—

“O Jesus, Jesus! dearest Lord!”

Another verse begins—

“What limit is there to thee, love?”

Another ends—

“Ah! dearest Jesus! I have grown Childish with love of Thee!”

“Childish” truly, though not childlike! Charity would fain accept this plea in extenuation of the writer’s most serious offence. The Apostle wrote, “If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ let him be anathema”; and that love brings out all that is worthiest and best in the Christian character. But love of this mythical Jesus is one of the strange influences of human religion: hence this profane drivel.

The following is another choice specimen from the same source:—

“Oh, come and mourn with me awhile!
See, Mary calls us to her side;
Oh come and let us mourn with her;
Jesus, our Love, is crucified!”

“Come, take thy stand beneath the Cross,
And let the Blood from out that Side
Fall gently on thee drop by drop;
Jesus, our Love, is crucified!”

Here we have the mawkish irreverence of the love song, combined with the revolting materialism of “the religion of the shambles.” But enough; the book as a whole is an outrage upon Christianity.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> In fairness I should add this: Some years ago I sent the late Mr. Kegan Paul a pamphlet of mine, written in the sense of this note, and he assured me that many Catholics deplored such hymns as strongly as I did. He told me that at that moment he was pressing for a revision of the Catholic hymnal, and that he would use my pamphlet to strengthen his appeal.

As I am treating of typical hymns, I will give one more :—

“ Safe in the arms of Jesus,
 Safe on His gentle breast ;
 There, by His love o’ershaded,
 Sweetly my soul shall rest.
 Hark ! ’tis the voice of angels,
 Borne in a song to me,
 Over the fields of glory,
 Over the jasper sea.”

This hymn, though so greatly superior to those above cited, is reeking with mere sentiment. Here we have the motherly arms and the “gentle breast” ; and as for “the voice of angels,” “the fields of glory,” and “the jasper sea,” they savour of “that sweet word Mesopotamia.” Can any one imagine the “beloved disciple” singing such words? But as the hymn is a prime favourite with such multitudes, I am not content to stop at destructive criticism, but venture to offer the following verses as a substitute :—

Safe in Jehovah’s keeping,
 Led by His glorious arm,
 God is Himself my refuge,
 A present help from harm.
 Fears may at times distress me,
 Griefs may my soul annoy ;
 God is my strength and portion,
 God my exceeding joy.

Safe in Jehovah’s keeping,
 Led by His glorious arm, &c.

Safe in Jehovah’s keeping,
 Safe in temptation’s hour,
 Safe in the midst of perils,
 Kept by Almighty power,

Safe when the tempest rages,
Safe though the night be long ;
E'en when my sky is darkest
God is my strength and song.
Safe in Jehovah's keeping,
Led by His glorious arm, &c.

Sure is Jehovah's promise,
Nought can my hope assail ;
Here is my soul's sure anchor,
Entered within the veil.
Blest in His love eternal,
What can I want beside !
Safe through the blood that cleanseth,
Safe in the Christ that died.
Safe in Jehovah's keeping,
Led by His glorious arm, &c.

INDEX OF SUBJECTS

- Abiogenesis, 3
     ,, defined, 7
     ,, versus creation, 8
 Absolution, 124, 126, 189
 Agnostics, 16
 Alford, Dean, quoted, 47
     ,, ,, on bishops, 290
 Altar: the word repudiated by the Reformers, 303
     ,, We have an, 301
 Ambrose of Milan, 156
 Anglican Orders, the Papal Bull on, 253
 Appendices, 259
 Apostles, position and ministry of the, 103, 125, 128
 Apostolic succession, 101-107,
     305
 Aratus, 26
 Aristotle quoted, 11
 Arnold, Sir Edwin, quoted, 72
 Articles, The, 42, 43, 121
     ,, No. XX. quoted, 88
 Asceticism, 158, 159
 Atheism a revolt against false religion, 75
 Atheists, the early Christians called, 202
 Augustine of Canterbury, 119
 Augustine, Bishop of Hippo, 61,
     65, 69, 95, 141
     ,, his testimony to the Scriptures, 61
     ,, his Confessions, 65
     ,, the Church according to his teaching, 70
 Babylonian Mysteries, The, 96
 Bampton Lectures, 1864, quoted,
     62
 Baptism, 131-148, 259-273
     ,, Facts concerning, 134
     ,, its place in the New Testament, 134,
         142, 259-273
     ,, its corruptions traced to the Eleusinian Mysteries, 139-147
     ,, in the ninth century, 146
     ,, its Pagan origin, 147
     ,, in Mexico, 148
     ,, Christian, 141, 259
     ,, ,, symbolises death, 134, 267
     ,, of Christendom symbolises birth, 267

- Baptism of New Testament remodelled on Pagan lines, 68, 147
 „ Infant, 131
 Baptismal regeneration, 134, 259
 Bartholomew, Massacre of St., 193
 Bernard, Canon, his Lectures quoted, 62, 103
 Bible, the least understood of books, 11
 „ the only standard, 41
 „ claim of the Church to expound it, 41
 „ testimony to by Chrysostom, 59, 60
 „ „ Augustine, 61
 Bishops, 47, 290
 „ how appointed in the Primitive Church, 156
 Borgias, the, 190
 Brazen serpent, the, 153
 Brotherhood of Christ substituted for His lordship, 244
 Buddha of Christendom, "The, 22, 59, 231, 236, 237
 „ design of this title, 181
 „ of Jews' religion, 183
 Buddhism, Origin and teaching of, 72, 73
 Buddhism and Christianity, 73, 186
 Burke, Edmund, quoted, 197
 Canterbury, Dean of, quoted, 70
 Carlyle, Thomas, quoted, 114
 Catholic faith, the, 57
 Catholic Church, the, 117, 294
 Celibacy, 157
 „ Clement of Alexandria on, 163
 „ Tertullian on, 160
 „ the Apostle Paul on, 299
 Celebrate vows, 159
 China, religion of, 35
 Christ, Priesthood of, 221
 Christianity, 187
 Christendom and revelation, 54
 „ its three pillars, 53
 „ reunion of, 253
 „ its root error, 95
 „ built on the Latin Fathers, 65
 „ its pretended appeal to Scripture, 87
 Christianity, Corruption of, 63, 68, 69
 „ versus Religion, 113
 Christianised Rationalists, 236
 Chrysostom, 59, 60, 145, 164, 167
 Church, the, What is, 41-43, 92, 293
 „ not the "Kingdom," 48, 223, 293
 „ not the Bride, 161
 „ apostasy of, 62-64
 „ put in the place of Christ, 99, 109, 224
 „ according to Scripture, 100, 101, 293
 „ according to the Latin Fathers, 69-71
 „ according to the Reformers, 42, 88, 117, 294

- Church, the, according to the Ritualists, 98, 105, 109, 117, 118, 293
 ,, state of, in the third century, 156-158,
 162
 ,, state of, in the fourth century, 164-166
 ,, state of, in the fifth century, 167-175
 ,, state of, in the sixteenth century, 189-190
 ,, of Christendom, its future and doom, 119-120
 ,, of Christendom, the enemy of Christianity, 153
 ,, of Christendom, the impersonation of evil, 203
 ,, the "Catholic Church" of the Prayer-book, 294
- Clement of Alexandria, 69
 ,, ,, on the state of the Church, 163
 ,, of Rome, 47, 93, 240
- Clodd, Mr., quoted, 20
- "Confidence Trick, The," 43, 187
- Confessional, the, 122-129
 ,, in the Church of England, 296
- Conscience of man, the, 29
- Council of Constance, 192
 ,, Ephesus, 168
 ,, Trent, 191, 281
- "Council of Robbers," the, 169
- Corruption in all religions inevitable, 252
- Corruptions universal, 76
 ,, similar, 186
 ,, of the Church, 153
 ,, Jerome's testimony, 166
 ,, Salvian's testimony,
 171
 ,, of Christianity and Judaism compared, 186
- Covenant, the, 225
- Create, the word, 12
- Creation, according to the "orthodox belief," 10
 ,, according to Scripture, 12
- Cross, the Incarnation put in place of the, 67
- Cyprian, 155, 162
 ,, character of his episco-pate, 156
- Cyril of Alexandria, 167
- Dark Ages, the, 178
- Darwin and Scripture, 14, 15
 ,, quoted, 17, 25
- Davids, Dr. Rhys, quoted, 74
- Day, The Creation, 13
- Deacons, 103, 291
 ,, office of, unknown in New Testament, 292
- Design, Evidence from, 17
- Dill, Prof., quoted, 137, 166, 177
- Dionysius the Areopagite, 152
- Divine Titles, Use of in New Testament, 238
 ,, ,, Modern Pulpit, 240
 ,, ,, Hymnology, 309

- Edict against the clergy, Imperial, 165
 Egyptian religion, Corruption of, 35
 Eleusinian Mysteries described, 139, 140
 Eleusis, 139, 145
 Encyclical Letter of 1896, the Pope's, 245
 Ephesian Diana, 39, 40
 Ephesus, Council of, 168
Episcopoi, 47
 Eusebius quoted, 202
 Evangelical party, the condition of, 133, 178, 179
 Evolution, 14, 15, 19, 20, 23
 Evolutionists' requirements, the, 5
 Exodus, Teaching of the, 209
- Faber's Hymns, 310
 Faith and Credulity, 98
 Fall, the, 37, 52
 Fathers, the, 55
   ,, their disagreements, 57
   ,, "near the fountain," 58, 62
   ,, tainted by Paganism, 69
   ,, dates of their death, 298
 Firstfruits, Day of the, 182
 Flavian, Bishop of Byzantium, 169
 Froude quoted, 123, 190, 204
- Gautama, Teaching of, 73
 God of Christendom, The, 204
 Golden calf, the, 84, 85
 Gorham case, the, 149
 Gore, Canon, quoted, 90, 93, 94, 98, 100, 222, 223
- "Grace," word not in Matthew, 49
   ,, doctrine of, lost, 66
   ,, human limitations of, 225
   ,, the mystery of, 227
   ,, versus Covenant, 229
 Greek Church, the, 44, 117
- Hales, John, of Eaton, quoted, 127
 Hatch, Dr., quoted, 142-147
 Harnack, Prof., quoted, 70, 99
 Hebrews, Epistle to the, 206
   ,, its scope and teaching, 218
   ,, begins at Exodus xxiv., 228
- Henry VIII., 89
 Hengstenberg quoted, 207
 Hibbert Lectures, 1888, quoted, 142, 152
 Holy Cross, Society of the, 296
 Hume's Account of Irish Massacre, 200
 Human depravity: whence derived, 30
 Huss, John, 192
 Huxley, Prof., 3, 9, 18, 37
 Hypatia, murder of, 167
 Hymnology, Modern, 309
- Ignatius, Epistles of, 304
 Incarnation, redemption by, 67
 Infant Baptism, 131
 Inspiration, 94, 300
 Instinct, the religious, 30
 Irish Massacre of 1641, Hume on, 200
 Irreverence in use of Divine names, 305

- Jerome, 70, 166
 Jesus : name never used by His disciples, 237
   ,, of modern hymnology, 250 Jews' religion, character and corruption of, 36, 78-85, 181-185
 Judas Iscariot, 107
 Judgments cumulative, 120
 Justin Martyr quoted, 138, 143,
   150
- Kelvin, Lord, on "Life," 2
 Keys, Power of the, 45
 "Keys of the Kingdom," 47-49
 Knowledge, beginning of, 1
 Kingdom not the Church, 223
 Korah, the sin of, 128
- Lamaism of Tibet, the, 74
 Language, phenomena of, 21
 Leo XIII., Pope, quoted, 245, 253
 Liddon's Bampton Lectures, 168
 Life, Origin of, 5
   ,, produced only by life, 2
   ,, germ, 5
 Liverpool, Bishop of, quoted, 135
 Lord's Supper, the, 149
   ,, ,, described by Justin Martyr,
     151
   ,, ,, corruptions of, 149-152
 Lordship of Christ, 241
Lux Mundi quoted, 90, 93
- Macaulay, Lord, quoted, 197
 Man, origin of, 1
- Man, a religious animal proved, 24
   ,, his religion to be distrusted, 38
   ,, his responsibility, 29
   ,, and the ape, 26
 Manning, Cardinal, quoted, 129
   ,, his Love of Jesus to
     Penitents, 306
 Martyrs of Pagan and Papal Rome, the, 257
   ,, the Church of the, 155
 Mass, the, 85, 98, 117, 189, 221
 Massacre of St. Bartholomew,
   193
 Matthew : the scope of his Gospel, 49
 Mediator, the Church or Christ —which? 109, 110
 Melchisedek, order of, 221
 "Mesopotamia," that sweet word, 249, 312
 Mill, John Stuart, quoted, 39, 199, 203
 Milman, Dean, quoted, 167
 Missing-link, the, 18
 Moloch, 83
 Monti, Cardinal del, 284-287
 Moral law, the, 27
 Moral nature adjustable ; not the spiritual, 32-38
 Motherhood of the Church, 245
 Müller, Prof. Max, quoted, 21, 25, 30
- Neo Romanists, 110, 117, 121
 Nidocemus, 260
 Norwich, Dean of, quoted, 102
 Newman, Cardinal, quoted, 243, 248

- Nunneries, 159, 160
- “Orders,” Ecclesiastical, 104
- Origen, 70
- Origin of man, 1
 „ life, 5
- Oxford Movement, the, 293
- Pagan Sacraments, 80
- Paganism in the Church of the Fathers, 137
- Pallavicino, Cardinal, quoted, 192
- Papal supremacy, 45
- Peace of God,” “The, and its counterfeit, 248
- Pelagius, the dogma of 32, 33
- Penal laws against apostasy to Paganism, 177
- Persecution so-called, 129
- “Personally conducted” Religion, 248
- Peter never Bishop of Rome, 46
 „ ministry of, 49, 50
- Philology vetoes Evolution, 23
- Phoenix, The myth used by Clement, 93
- Pliny’s letter, 203
- Plummer, Dr., quoted, 157
- Polycarp, 202, 240
- Popes, the immorality of 89, 189, 192
- Pope Alexander VI., 189
 „ Clement VII., 191
 „ Gregory XIII., 194
 „ John XXIII., 192
 „ Julius III., 89
 „ Leo X., 191
 „ Leo XIII., 195, 244, 253
- Pope Paul III., 89, 191, 284-287
 „ Paul V., 282, 283
- Prescott’s Conquest of Mexico quoted, 148
- Prophecy ignored by theology, 207
- Protestantism, 111, 234, 236
- Protoplasm, 5
- Priest, the position and duties of the Jewish, 81
 „ first consecration of 215, 217
- Priest in Absolution*, the, 296
- Priesthood of Christ, 221
 „ Pagan corruption of 217
- Priesthoods, their influence, 72
- Presbyter, 221
- Pusey, Dr. quoted, 55, 56
 „ „ his manual for confessors, 296
- Ramsey, Professor, quoted, 139
- Rationalism, 239, 247
- Redesdale, Lord, 297
- Reformation, the, 88, 94, 119, 121, 253
- Reformers’ attitude to Scripture, 88 „ attitude to human religion, 257
- Regeneration,” “In the, 264
- Religion, use of the word in this work, 114
 „ universality of, 25
 „ its tendency to become degenerate and to corrupt mankind, 34-37, 76-78, 86

- Religion, the only God-given, 78
 „ the Jews', distinctive character and purity of, 79-83
 „ turns men to fiends, 200
 „ the great persecutor of God's people, 200-202
 „ the crucifier of Christ, 201
 „ characterised by irreverence, 237
 Renan quoted, 24, 247
 "Rest of the Creator," the, 14
 Revelation : its limitations, 13
 „ the silences of, 17
 Rivington, Rev. Luke, quoted, 52
 Romans, Epistle to, 228
 Rome, Pagan and Modern, 257
 „ the aims of in England, 129
 „ aggression of, 251
 Romish propagandism in England, 110, 274
 Sacrament of Baptism, 131
 „ of the Lord's Supper, 149
 "Safe in Jehovah's keeping," 312
 Salvation through the Church a venerable lie, 111
 Salvian of Marseilles, 170
 „ on corruption in the Church, 171-175
 "Saint," avoidance of the title in these pages, 241
 Sarpi, Fra Paolo, of Venice, the historian of the Council o. Trent, 191, 281
 Satan's sphere of influence, 189
 Selborne, Lord, on "a good hymn," 309
 Sentiment in religion, 248
 Sheldon's, What would Jesus do? 306
 Silence of God, the, 170
 Sinai, events at, 213
 Sincerity useless in itself, 198
 Spencer, Mr. Herbert, quoted, 3, 4, 8, 16
 Stanley, Dean, quoted, 44
 Submission to the Church, 195
 Tertullian, 143, 149, 151, 160, 175, 240
 Theophilus of Alexandria, 167
 "Thimble-rigging," 43
Times, The, quoted, 115
 Tiele, Professor, quoted, 25
 Trajan, 202, 203
 Trench, Archbishop, quoted, 21, 114
 Trent, Council of, 191, 281, 283-289
 Transcendental Philosophy, the 11
 Tyndall, Professor, 6, 9, 23
 Typology ignored by theologians, 207
 Typical teaching of the Bible, 208
 Unbelief, its dogmatism, 13
 Vaughan, Cardinal, quoted, 105, 196, 253, 254
 Vincentius's famous rule, 57, 77
 Virgin Mary myth, the, 298

- Virgins of the Church, 162
Voice of the Church, the, 244
- Walsh, Mr. Walter, his Secret History of the Oxford Movement, 297
Wallace, A. R. quoted, 20
- Water, the ceremonial use of, 265
Westminster Review quoted, 16
"Who made God?" 6
Williams, Sir Monier, quoted, 72, 148
Wordsworth, Bishop, quoted, 61, 166, 299

INDEX OF TEXTS

GENESIS.	PAGE	NUMBERS	PAGE
i. . . . .	12	xix. 17 . . . . .	263
i. 2 . . . . .	13	DEUTERONOMY.
i. 11, 12 . . . . .	14	xvi. 9 . . . . .	183
i. 20 . . . . .	15	xxx. 11-14 . . . . .	112
i. 24 . . . . .	15	I KINGS.
i. 26, 27 . . . . .	15	viii. . . . .	81
viii. 4 . . . . .	212	2 KINGS.
xiv. 18, 19 . . . . .	221	xviii. 4 . . . . .	153
EXODUS.		2 CHRONICLES.
iv. 10-16 . . . . .	221	vi. . . . .	81
xii. 12, 13, 23 . . . . .	210	PSALMS.
xii. 35, 36, 40 . . . . .	211	xiv. 1 . . . . .	7
xii. 41 . . . . .	212	liii. 1 . . . . .	7
xiv. 21-28 . . . . .	212	ECCLESIASTES.
xxiv. . . . .	84	ix. 8 . . . . .	265
xxiv. 1, 2 . . . . .	214	CANTICLES.
xxiv. 8 . . . . .	303	iv. 2 . . . . .	263
xxiv. 9-11 . . . . .	215	ISAIAH.
xxv. 8 . . . . .	215	xl. 18 . . . . .	12
xxviii. . . . .	215	EZEKIEL.
xxxii. . . . .	154	xxxvi., xxxvii. . . . .	264, 265
xxxii. 1-5 . . . . .	85
xxxiii. 7 . . . . .	154, 303
LEVITICUS.
xvi. . . . .	303
xxiii. 10-16 . . . . .	183

INDEX OF TEXTS

325

	PAGE		PAGE
xiv. 40 . . . . .	94	2 TIMOTHY.
xv. 6 . . . . .	271	i. 15 . . . . .	63
xv. 20, 23 . . . . .	183	ii. 22 . . . . .	158
xv. 33 . . . . .	26	iii. 13 . . . . .	63
xv. 47-49 . . . . .	23	TITUS.
2 CORINTHIANS.		i. 1 . . . . .	231
iv. 10, 11 . . . . .	308	i. 12 . . . . .	26
xi. 2 . . . . .	160, 161	ii. 11, 12 . . . . .	232
xii. 11 . . . . .	128	iii. 5 . . . . .	262
GALATIANS.		PHILEMON.
ii. 1-14 . . . . .	51	II, 16 . . . . .	232
vi. 14 . . . . .	303	HEBREWS.
EPHESIANS.		Epistle . . . . .	206
ii. 8, 9 . . . . .	230	i. 3 . . . . .	23
ii. 12 . . . . .	222, 247	ii. 11 . . . . .	246
iv. 21 . . . . .	308	ii. 16 . . . . .	225
v. 26 . . . . .	262, 265	v. 10 . . . . .	221
PHILIPPIANS.		v. 12 . . . . .	206
iii. 2 . . . . .	64	vii. 1-21 . . . . .	221
iii. 6 . . . . .	34	viii. 4 . . . . .	221
COLOSSIANS.		viii. 8 . . . . .	225
i. 6 . . . . .	231	ix. 19 . . . . .	85
i. 15 . . . . .	23	x. 1-4 . . . . .	218
ii. 20-23 . . . . .	159	x. 22 . . . . .	269
iv. 9 . . . . .	232	x. 26 . . . . .	220
1 THESSALONIANS.		xii. 26-29 . . . . .	251
iv. 14 . . . . .	307	xiii. 4 . . . . .	161, 299
iv. 16, 17 . . . . .	271	xiii. 10 . . . . .	301
1 TIMOTHY.		xiii. 13 . . . . .	155
i. 15 . . . . .	34	JAMES.
ii. 5, 6 . . . . .	110	v. 13-16 . . . . .	126
iii. 1 . . . . .	47	1 PETER.
		i. 1 . . . . .	50
		i. 18 . . . . .	80

	PAGE		PAGE
i. 18, 19 . . . . .	210	I JOHN.
i. 23 . . . . .	267	iv. 9 . . . . .	224
iii. 15 . . . . .	241
iii. 21 . . . . .	267	REVELATION.
		i. 5 . . . . .	265
2 PETER.		i. 16-18 . . . . .	250
iii. 1 . . . . .	50	xvii. 5 . . . . .	245
iii. 8 . . . . .	13	xviii. 4, 5 . . . . .	120

WORKS BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

Published by JAMES NISBET & CO., 21, BERNERS ST., W.

THE GOSPEL AND ITS MINISTRY.

A HANDBOOK OF EVANGELICAL TRUTH.

Eighth Edition. Cloth, gilt, 2s. 6d.

---

Published by WM. BLACKWOOD & SONS, 37, PATERNOSTER Row, E.C. ; AND EDINBURGH.

DANIEL IN THE CRITICS' DEN.

AN ANSWER TO DEAN FARRAR'S "BOOK OF DANIEL."

Cloth, 3s. 6d.

---

Published by HODDER & STOUGHTON, 27, PATERNOSTER Row, E.C.

THE COMING PRINCE ; OR, THE SEVENTY WEEKS OF DANIEL.

WITH AN ANSWER TO THE HIGHER CRITICISM.

Fifth Edition. Cloth, 5s.

---

HUMAN DESTINY.

Fourth Edition. Cloth, 3s. 6d.

A HANDBOOK ON THE ESCHATOLOGICAL CONTROVERSY, BEING AN ANSWER TO THE WORKS ENTITLED "ETERNAL HOPE," "ETERNAL LIFE IN CHRIST," "SALVATOR MUNDI," AND
"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS."

FIFTH AND CHEAPER EDITION.

THE SILENCE OF GOD.

Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

“We are profoundly grateful to Dr. Anderson for this most striking endeavour to move a terrible stumbling-block out of the way of many. It bears the marks of intense conviction in every page, and we have seldom read a book so compelling in its logical directness.—The Record.”

“It deals with a problem of inexhaustible interest.”—Literature.

“It will take careful reading and some meditation before it can be properly reviewed.”—Spectator.

“He writes forcibly, eloquently, with much knowledge of what others think and say, and with profound conviction and confidence.”

Daily News.

“Previous literary productions by this remarkably logical thinker, whose latest volume has largely occupied our minds, predisposed us to look in its pages for deep intellectual entertainment. Nor have we in that regard been disappointed.”—The English Churchman.

“Ingenious, original, and in earnest.”—British Weekly.

“This is certainly one of the most thoughtful and instructive books of modern times.”—Church Bells.

“A masterly production.”—Morning Star.

“A book which has astounded religious Europe.”

New York Herald.

“An ingenious and subtle attempt to meet scepticism on its own ground. . . . It is a book which reveals deep learning, argumentative subtlety, and spiritual power.”—New York Daily Tribune.

“Dr. Anderson’s book, had he lived in a more theological age, would have made a sensation.”—The Christian Church.

“No more remarkable book has for a long time issued from the press.”—Things to Come.

---

LONDON: HODDER & STOUGHTON, 27, PATERNOSTER ROW.

