One third of HIV-positive gay men don't know they have HIV

If you know you have HIV, you can make informed decisions about your health, the sex you have and your future.

- An HIV test could give you the knowledge you need to stay healthy

One in four HIV-positive gay men are diagnosed late when HIV has already seriously damaged their immune system.

If you are diagnosed early you can start treatment before this happens. This makes it more likely you'll live longer and enjoy better health.

- An HIV test could help you to take care of your sexual partners

About one in four gay men with HIV believe they were infected during sex with a regular partner.

Knowing your HIV status will help you to make choices about your own sexual safety and the safety of your partners.

- An HIV test won't change your HIV status, but it could help you to get on with your life

If you don't test and are HIV-positive, you will probably find out when you become ill. Taking a test means taking control of when you find out.

There are now HIV tests that can detect HIV one month after infection.
