Siamese Fighting Fish

(Betta splendens) × 2

Betta splendens (Siamese Fighting Fish)

Size 2 $\frac{3}{4}$ " Habitat : Thailand, Cambodia, Indonesia.

These beautiful aquarium fish are equipped with an organ called the labyrinth enabling them to store a limited amount of oxygen taken into the mouth at the water surface; feeds on daphnia, mosquito larvae, etc: chopped shrimp, cooked fish or meat also good proprietary dried foods. Males which are distinguishable from females by their long flowing fins, may be bright red, cornflower blue, turquoise green, or even cream bodied with contrasting fins. Though not usually aggressive to other species, male Bettas will fight to the death, unless one gives in and swims away.

In the Far East huge sums of money are still wagered on the outcome of such fights, by the owners and supporters.

Females are less aggressive and similarly coloured. At breeding time, the male builds a nest of bubbles at the water surface, each tiny bubble being coated with saliva. In due course the female is coaxed beneath this nest, and the male wraps his body around her in the nuptial embrace.

Each egg is caught as it falls through the water, coated in a bubble and placed in the nest.

After spawning the male drives the female away, and alone tends the eggs and fry.
