THE COVNTESSE OF PEMBROKES ARCADIA.

WRITTEN BY SIR PHILIP SIDNEY Knight.

NOW THE THIRD TIME published, with sundry new additions of the same Author.

LONDON
Imprinted for William Ponsonbie.
Anno Domini. 1598.

TO MY DEARE LADY AND SISTER, THE COVNTESSE OF PEMBROKE.

HEre now haue you (moſt deare, and moſt worthie to bee moſt deare Ladie) this idle work of mine: which I feare (like the Spiders webbe) will bee thought fitter to bee ſwept away, then worne to any other purpoſe. For my part, in very trueth (as the cruell fathers among the Greekes, were wont to doe to the babes they would not foſter) I could well find in my heart, to caſt out in ſome deſert of forgetfulnes this child, which I am loth to father. But you deſired me to do it, and your deſire, to my heart is an abſolute commandement. Now, it is done onely for you, onely to you: if you keepe it to your ſelfe, or to ſuch friends, who will weigh errors in the ballance of good will, I hope, for the fathers ſake, it will be pardoned, perchance made much of, though in it ſelfe it haue deformities. For indeed, for ſeuerer eyes it is not, being but a trifle, and that triflingly handled. Your deare ſelfe can beſt witnes the maner, being done in looſe ſheetes of paper, moſt of it in your preſence, the reſt, by ſheetes, ſent vnto you, as faſt as they were done. In ſumme, a yong head, not ſo well ſtaied as I would it were, (and ſhall bee when God will) will) hauing many many fancies begotten in it, if it had not been in some way deliuered, would haue growne a monſter, and more ſory might I be that they came in, then that they gat out. But his chiefe ſafety, ſhall be the not walking abroad; and his chiefe protection, the bearing the liuerie of your name; which (if much much good will do not deceiue me) is worthy to be a ſanctuary for a greater offender. This ſay I, becauſe I know the vertue ſo; and this ſay I, becauſe it may be euer ſo, or to ſay better, becauſe it will be euer ſo. Reade it then at your idle times, and the follies your good iudgement will finde in it, blame not, but laugh at. And ſo, looking for no better ſtuffe, then, as in a Haberdaſhers ſhop, glaſſes, for eathers, you will continue to loue the writer, who doth exceedingly loue you, and moſte moſte heartilie praies you may long liue, to be a principall ornament to the family of the Sidneis.

Your louing brother.

Philip Sidney.

To the Reader.

THE disfigured face, gentle Reader, wherewith this worke not long since appeared to the common view, moued that noble Lady, to whose Honour consecrated, to whose protection it was committed, to take in hand the wiping away those spots wherewith the beauties thereof were vnworthely blemished. But as often in repairing a ruinous house, the mending of some olde part occasioneth the making of some new: so here her honorable labour begun in correcting the faults, ended in supplying the defects; by the view of what was ill done, guided to the consideration of what was not done. Which part with what aduise entred into, with what successe it hath been passed through, most by her doing, all by her directing, if they may be entreated not to define, which are vnfurnisht of meanes to discerne, the rest (it is hoped) will fauourably censure. But this they shall, for their better satisfaction, vnderstand, that though they finde not here what might be expected, they may finde neuertheless as much as was intended, the conclusion not the perfection of Arcadia: and that no further then the Authors own writings, or knowne determinations could direct. Whereof who sees not the reason, must consider there may be reason which he sees not. Albeit I dare affirme he either sees, or from wiser iudgements then his owne may heare, that Sir Philip Sidneies writings can no more be perfected without Sir Philip Sidney, then Apelles pictures without Apelles. There are that thinke the contrary: and no wonder. Neuer was Arcadia free from the comber of such Cattell. To vs, say they, the pastures are not pleasant: and as for the flowres, such as we light on: we take no delight in, but the greater part growe not within our reach. Poore soules! what talke they of flowres? They are Roses, not flowres, must doe them good, which if they finde not here, they shall doe well to goe feed elswhere: Any place will better like them: For without Arcadia nothing growes in more plentie, then Lettuce sutable to their Lippes, If it be true that likenes is a great cause of liking, and that contraries, infer contrary consequences: then is it true, that the worthles Reader can neuer worthely esteeme of so worthy a writing: and as true, that the noble, the wise, the vertuous, the curteous, as many as haue had any acquaintance with true learning and knowledge, will with all loue and dearenesse entertaine it, as well for affinitie with themselues, as being childe to such a father. Whom albeit it doe not exactly and in euery lineament represent; yet considering the fathers vntimely death preuented the timely birth of the childe, it may happily seeme a thanke-worthy labour, that the defects being so few, so small, and in no principall part, yet the greatest vnlikenes is rather in defect then in deformity. But howsoeuer it is, it is now by more then one interest The Countesse of Pembrokes Arcadia: done, as it was, for her: as it is, by her. Neither shall these pains be the last (if no vnexpected accident cut off her determination) which the euerlasting loue of her excellent brother, will make her consecrate to his memory.

THE COVNTESSE OF PEMBROKES ARCADIA, VVRITTEN BY SIR PHILIP SIDNEI.

The first Booke.

IT was in the time that the earth begins to put on her new apparell againſt the approch of her louer, and that the Sun running a moſt euen courſe, becomes an indifferent arbiter betweene the night and the day; when the hopeleſſe ſhepheard Strephon was come to the ſands, which lie againſt the Iſland of Cithera; where viewing the place with a heauy kind of delight, and ſometimes caſting his eyes to the Iſleward, he called his friendly riuall, the paſtor Claius vnto him, and ſetting firſt downe in his darkened countenance a dolefull copie of what he would ſpeake: O my Claius, ſaide he, hither we are now come to pay the rent, for which we are ſo called vnto by ouer-buſie Remembrance, Remembrance, reſtleſſe Remembrance, which claymes not only this dutie of vs, but for it will haue vs forget our ſelues. I pray you when we were amid our flocke, and that of other ſhepheards ſome were running after their ſheepe ſtraied beyond their bounds, ſome delighting their eyes with ſeeing them nibble vpon the ſhort & ſweet graſſe, ſome medicining their ſicke ewes, ſome ſetting a bell for an enſigne of a ſheepiſh ſquadron, ſome with more leaſure inuenting new games of exerciſing their bodies and ſporting their wits: did Remembrance graunt vs any holiday, either for paſtime or deuotion, nay either for neceſſary foode or naturall reſt? but that ſtill it forced our thoughts to worke vpon this place, where we laſt (alas that the word laſt ſhould ſo long laſt) did graze our eyes vpon her euer floriſhing beautie: did it not ſtill crie within vs? Ah you baſe minded wretches, are your thoughts ſo deeply bemired in the trade of ordinary worldlings, as for reſpect of gaine ſome paultry wooll may yeeld you, to let ſo much time paſſe without knowing perfectly her eſtate, eſpecially in ſo troubleſome a ſeaſon? to leaue that ſhore vnſaluted, from whence you may ſee to the Iſland where ſhe dwelleth? to leaue thoſe ſteps vnkiſſed wherein Vrania printed the farewell of all beautie? Wel then, Remembrance commaunded, we obeyd, & here we find, that as our remembrance came euer cloathed vnto vs in the forme of this place, ſo this place giues new heate to the feauer of our languiſhing remembrance. Yonder my Claius, Vrania lighted, the verie horſe (me thought) bewayled to be ſo disburdned: and as for thee, poore Claius, when thou wentſt to help her downe, I ſaw reuerence and deſire ſo deuide thee, that thou didſt at one inſtant both bluſh and quake, and in ſtead of bearing her, weart readie to fall down thy ſelfe. There ſhe ſate, vouchſafing my cloake(then moſt gorgeous)vnder her: at yonder riſing of the ground ſhee turned her ſelfe, looking backe toward her woonted abode, and becauſe of her parting, bearing much ſorrow in her eyes, the lightſomneſſe whereof had yet ſo naturall a cherefulneſſe, as it made euen ſorrow ſeeme to ſmile; at that turning ſhee ſpake to vs all, opening the cherrie of her lips, and Lord how greedily mine eares did feed vpon the ſweete words ſhe vttered? And here ſhe laide her hand ouer thine eyes, when ſhee ſaw the teares ſpringing in them, as if ſhee would conceale them from other, and yet her ſelfe feele ſome of thy ſorrow: But woe is me, yonder, yonder, did ſhee put her foote into the boate, at that inſtant, as it were diuiding her heauenly beautie, betweene the Earth and the Sea. But when ſhe was imbarked, did you not marke how the windes whiſtled, and the ſeas daunſt for ioy, how the ſailes did ſwell with pride, & all becauſe they had Vrania? O Vrania, bleſſed be thou Vrania, the ſweeteſt fairneſſe and faireſt ſweetneſſe: with that word his voice brake ſo with ſobbing, that he could ſay no further; and Claius thus anſwered; Alas my Strephon (ſaid he) what needes this skore to recken vp onely our loſſes? What doubt is there, but that the ſight of this place doth call our thoughts to appeare at the court of affection, held by that racking ſteward, Remembrance? Aſwell may ſheepe forget to feare when they ſpie woolues, as we can miſſe ſuch fancies, when we ſee any place made happie by her treading. Who can chooſe that ſaw her but thinke where ſhe ſtayed, where ſhe walkt, where ſhe turned, where ſhe ſpoke? But what is all this? truely no more, but as this place ſerued vs to thinke of thoſe things, ſo thoſe things ſerue as places to call to memorie more excellent matters. No, no, let vs thinke with conſideration, and conſider with acknowledging, & acknowledge with admiration, & admire with loue, and loue with ioy in the midſt of all woes: let vs in ſuch ſort thinke, I ſay, that our poore eyes were ſo inriched as to behold, & our lowe hearts ſo exalted as to loue a maide, who is ſuch, that as the greateſt thing the world can ſhewe, is her beautie, ſo the leaſt thing that may be praiſed in her, is her beautie. Certainly as her eye-lids are more pleaſant to behold, then two white kiddes climbing vp a faire tree, and browſing on his tendreſt branches, and yet are nothing, compared to the day-ſhining ſtarres contained in them; and as her breath is more ſweete then a gentle South-weſt wind, which comes creeping ouer flowrie fieldes and ſhadowed waters in the extreame heate of ſommer, and yet is nothing, compared to the hony flowing ſpeach that breath doth carrie: no more all that our eyes can ſee of her (though when they haue ſtene her, what elſe they ſhall euer ſee is but drie ſtubble after clouers graſſe) is to be matched with the flocke of vnſpeakeable vertues, laid vp delightfully in that beſt builded fold. But in deed as we can better conſider the ſunnes beautie, by marking how he guildes theſe waters and mountaines, then by looking vpon his owne face, too glorious for our weake eyes: ſo it may be our conceits (not able to beare her ſun-ſtayning excellencie) will better way it by her workes vpon ſome meaner ſubiect employed. And alas, who can better witneſſe that then we, whoſe experience is grounded vpon feeling? hath not the onely loue of her made vs (being ſilly ignorant ſhepheards) raiſe vp our thoughts aboue the ordinary leuell of the world, ſo as great clearks doe not diſdaine our conference? hath not the deſire to ſeeme worthie in her eyes, made vs when others were ſleeping, to ſit viewing the courſe of heauens? when others were running at baſe, to runne ouer learned writings? when other marke their ſheepe, we to marke our ſelues? hath not ſhe throwne reaſon vpon our deſires, and, as it were giuen eyes vnto Cupid? hath in any, but in her, loue-fellowſhip maintained friendship between riuals, & beautie taught the beholders chastitie? He was going on with his praises, but Strephon bad him stay, and looke: and so they both perceiued a thing which floated drawing nearer and nearer to the banke; but rather by the fauourable working of the Sea, then by any self industrie. They doubted a while what it should be; till it was cast vp euen hard before them: at which time they fully saw that it was a man. Wherupon running for pitie sake vnto him, they found his hands (as it should appeare, constanter friends to his life than his memorie) fast griping vpon the edge of a square small coffer, which lay all vnder his breast: els in him selfe no shew of life, so as the boord seemed to be but a beere to carrie him a land to his Sepulcher. So drew they vp a yong man of so goodly shape, & well pleasing fauour, that one would thinke death had in him a louely countenance; and, that though he were naked, nakednesse was to him an apparell. That sight increased their compassion, and their compassion called vp their care; so that lifting his feete aboue his head, making a great deale of salt water come out of his mouth, they layd him vpon some of their garments, and fell to rub and chafe him, till they brought him to recouer both breath the seruant, and warmth the companion of liuing. At length opening his eyes, he gaue a great groan, (a doleful note but a pleasant dittie) for by that, they found not onely life, but strength of life in him. They therefore continued on their charitable office, vntil (his spirits being well returned,) he (without so much as thanking them for their paines) gate vp, and looking round about to the vttermost limits of his sight, and crying vpon the name of Pyrocles, nor seeing nor hearing cause of comfort, what (said he) and shall Musidorus liue after Pyrocles destruction? therewithall hee offered wilfully to cast himselfe againe into the sea: a strange sight to the shepheards, to whom it seemed, that before being in apparance dead, had yet saued his life, and now comming to his life, should be a cause to procure his death; but they ranne vnto him, and pulling him back (then too feeble for them) by force stickled that vnnaturall fray. I pray you (said he) honest men, what such right haue you in me, as not to suffer me to do with my selfe what I list? and what pollicie haue you to bestowe a benefite where it is counted an iniury? They hearing him speake in Greeke (which was their naturall language) became the more tender hearted towards him; and considering by his calling, and looking, that the losse of some deare friend was great cause of his sorrow; tolde him, they were poore men that were bounde by course of humanitie to preuent so great a mischiefe; and that they wisht him, if opinion of some bodies perishing bred such desperate anguish in him, that he should be comforted by his own proofe, who had lately escaped as apparant danger as any might be. No, no (said he) it is not for me to attend so high a blissefulnes: but since you take care of me, I pray you find meanes that some Barke may be prouided, that wil go out of the hauen, that if it be possible we may find the bodie farre farre too precious a food for fishes: and for the hire (said he) I haue within this casket, of value sufficient to content them. Claius presently went to a Fisherman, & hauing agreed with him, & prouided some apparell for the naked stranger, he imbarked, & the Shepheards with him: and were no sooner gone beyond the mouth of the hauen, but that some way into the sea they might discerne (as it were) a staine of the waters colour, & by times some sparkes & smoke mounting thereout. But the yong man no sooner saw it, but that beating his breast, he cried, that there was the beginning of his ruine, intreating them to bend their course as neere vnto it as they could: telling, how that smoke was but a small relique of a great fire, which had driuen both him & his friend rather to commit themselues to the cold mercie of the ſea,than to abide the hot crueltie of the fire : and that therefore though they both had abandoned the ſhip, that he was (if any where) in that courſe to be met withall. They ſteared therefore as neare thither-ward as they could: but when they came ſo near as their eies were ful maſters of the obiect, they ſaw a ſight ful of piteous ſtrãgeneſſe: a ſhip, or rather the carkas of the ſhip, or rather ſome few bones of the carkas, hulling there, part broken, part burned, part drowned: death hauing vſed more than one dart to that deſtruction. About it floted great ſtore of very rich things, and many cheſtes which might promiſe no leſſe. And amidſt the precious things were a number of dead bodies, which likewiſe did not only teſtifie both elements violence, but that the chiefe violence was growne of humane inhumanity: for their bodies were full of griſly wounds, and their bloud had (as it were) filled the wrinkles of the ſeas viſage: which it ſeemed the ſea would not waſh away, that it might witneſſe it is not alwaies his fault, when we condemne his crueltie. In ſumme, a defeate, where the conquered kept both field and ſpoile: a ſhipwrack without ſtorme or ill footing: and a waſt of fire in the midſt of the water.

But a little way off they ſaw the maſt, whoſe proude height now lay along; like a widdow hauing loſt her make of whom ſhe held her honour: but vpon the maſt they ſaw a yong man (at leaſt if hee were a man) bearing ſhew of about 18. yeares of age, who ſate (as on horſebacke) hauing nothing vpon him but his ſhirt, which being wrought with blew ſilke and gold; had a kind of reſemblance to the ſea: on which the ſun (then neare his Weſterne home) did ſhoote ſome of his beames. His haire (which the young man of Greece vſed to weare very long) was ſtirred vp and downe with the wind, which ſeemed to haue a ſport to play with it, as the ſea had to kiſſe his feete; himſelfe full of admirable beautie, ſet foorth by the ſtrangeneſſe both of his ſeate and geſture: for, holding his head vp full of vnmoued maieſtie, he held a ſword aloft with his faire arme, which often he waued about his crowne, as though he wold threaten the world in that extremitie. But the fiſhermen, when they came ſo neare him, that it was time to throwe out a rope, by which hold they might draw him, their ſimplicity bred ſuch amaſement, and their amaſement ſuch ſuperſtition, that (aſſuredly thinking it was ſome God begotten betweene Neptune & Venus, that had made all this terrible ſlaughter) as they went vnder ſaile by him, held vp their hands and made their praiers. Which when Muſidorus ſaw, though he were almoſt as much rauiſhed with ioy, as they with aſtoniſhment, he leapt to the Mariner, and tooke the cord out of his hand and (ſaying, doeſt thou liue, and art well? who anſwered, thou canſt tell beſt, ſince moſt of my well being ſtands in thee,) threwe it out, but alreadie the ſhippe was paſt beyond Pyrocles: and therefore Muſidorus could doe no more but perſwade the Mariners to caſt about againe, aſſuring them that he was but a man, although of moſt deuine excellencies, and promiſing great rewards for their paine.

And now they were alreadie come vpon the ſtaies; when one of the ſailers deſcried a Galley which came with ſailes and oares directly in the chaſe of them; and ſtreight perceiued it was a wel knowne Pirate, who hunted not only for goods but for bodies of men, which he emploied either to be his Galley ſlaues, or to ſell at the beſt market. Which when the Maiſter vnderſtood, he commaunded foorthwith to ſet on all the canuaſſe they could, and flie homeward, leauing in that ſort poore Pyrocles ſo neare to be reſcued. But what did not Muſidorus ſaie? what did he not offer to perſwade them to venture the fight? But feare ſtanding at the gates of their eares, put backe all perſwaſions: ſo that he had nothing wherewith to accompanie

Pyrocles,

Pyrocles, but his eyes; nor to succour him, but his wishes. Therefore praying for him, and casting a long looke that way, he saw the Galley leaue the pursuite of them, and turne to take vp the spoiles of the other wracke: and lastly he might well see them lift vp the young man; and alas (said hee to himselfe) deare Pyrocles shall that body of thine be enchained? shal those victorious hãds of thine be cõmanded to base offices? shal vertue becõe a slaue to those that be slaues to viciousnesse? Alas, better had it bin thou hadst ended nobly thy noble daies: what death is so euil as vnworthy seruitude? But that opinion soone ceased, when he saw the gallie setting vpon another shippe, which held long and strong fight with her: for then he began afresh to feare the life of his friend, & to wish well to the Pirates whom before he hated, least in their ruine he might perish. But the fishermen made such speede into the hauen, that they absented his eyes from beholding the issue: where being entred, he could procure neither them nor any other as then to put themselues into the sea: so that being as ful of sorrow for being vnable to do any thing, as voide of counsell how to do any thing, besides, that sickneſse grew something vpon him, the honest shepheards Strephon & Claius (who being themselues true friends, did the more perfectly iudge the iustnesse of his sorrow) aduise him, that he should mitigate somwhat of his woe, since he had gotten an amendment in fortune, being come from assured perswasion of his death, to haue no cause to dispaire of his life: as one that had lamented the death of his sheepe, should after know they were but straied, would receiue pleasure though readily he knew not where to find them.

Now sir (said they) thus for our selues it is; We are in profession but shepheards, and in this countrie of Laconia little better then straungers, and therefore neither in skill, nor ability of power greatly to stead you. But what we can present vnto you is this: Arcadia, of which countrie we are, is but a little way hence; and euen vpon the next confines there dwelleth a Gentleman, by name Kalander, who vouchsafeth much fauour vnto vs: A man who for his hospitalitie is so much haunted, that no newes stirre, but comes to his eares; for his vpright dealing so beloued of his neighbours, that he hath many euer readie to doe him their vttermost seruice, and by the great good will our Prince beares him, may soone obtaine the vse of his name and credit, which hath a principall swaie, not onely in his owne Arcadia, but in all these countries of Peloponnesus: & (which is worth all) all these things giue him not so much power, as his nature giues him will to benefit: so that it seemes no Musick is so sweet to his eare as deserued thanks. To him we will bring you, & there you may recouer againe your health, without which you cannot be able to make any diligent search for your friend: and therefore you must labour for it Besides, we are sure the comfort of curtesie, and ease of wise counsell shall not be wanting.

Musidorus (who besides he was meerly vnacquainted in the countrie, had his wits astonished with sorrow) gaue easie consent to that, from which hee saw no reason to disagree: and therefore (defraying the Mariners with a ring bestowed vpon them) they tooke their iourney together through Laconia; Claius and Strephon by course carying his chest for him, Musidorus only bearing in his countenance euident markes of a sorrowful mind supported with a weake bodie, which they perceiuing, and knowing that the violence of sorrow is not at the first to be striuen withall: (being like a mighty beast, sooner tamed with following, than ouerthrowne by withstanding) they gaue way vnto it for that day and the next; neuer troubling him, either with asking questions, or finding fault with his melancholie, but rather fitting to his dolor dolorous discourses of their owne and other folks misfortune. Which ſpeeches, though they had not a liuely entrance to his ſences ſhut vp in ſorow, yet like one halfe aſleepe he tooke hold of much of the matters ſpoken vnto him, ſo as a man may ſay, ere ſorow was aware, they made his thoughts beare away ſomething els beſide his own ſorow, which wrought ſo in him, that at length he grew content to marke their ſpeeches, then to maruell at ſuch wit in ſhepheards, after to like their company, and laſtly to vouchſafe conference: ſo that the third day after, in the time that the morning did ſtrow roſes & violets in the heauenly floore againſt the comming of the Sun, the nightingales (ſtriuing one with the other which could in moſt dainty varietie recount their wrong cauſed ſorow) made them put off their ſleep, & riſing from vnder a tree (which that night had bin their pauilion) they went on their iorney, which by and by welcomed Muſidorus eyes (wearied with the waſted ſoile of Laconia) with delightfull proſpects. There were hilles which garniſhed their proud heights with ſtately trees: humble valleis, whoſe baſe eſtate ſeemed comforted with refreſhing of ſiluer riuers: medowes, enameld with allſortes of ey-pleaſing floures: thickets, which being lined with moſt pleaſant ſhade, were witneſſed ſo too, by the cherefull depoſition of many wel-tuned birds: ech paſture ſtored with ſheepe feeding with ſober ſecuritie, while the pretie lambes with bleating oratorie craued the dams comfort: here a ſhepheards boy piping, as though he ſhould neuer be old: there a yong ſhepherdeſſe knitting, and withall ſinging, and it ſeemed that her voice comforted her hands to worke, and her hands kept time to her voices muſick. As for the houſes of the country (for many houſes came vnder their eye) they were all ſcattered, no two being one by th' other, & yet not ſo far off as that it barred mutuall ſuccor: a ſhew, as it were, of an accompanable ſolitarines, & of a ciuil wildnes. I pray you (ſaid Muſidorus, then firſt vnſealing his long ſilent lips) what countreyes be theſe we paſſe through, which are ſo diuers in ſhewe, the one wanting no ſtore, th'other hauing no ſtore but of want.

The country (anſwered Claius) where you were caſt a ſhore, and now are paſt through, is Laconia, not ſo poore by the barrennes of the ſoyle (though in it ſelfe not paſſing fertill) as by a ciuill warre, which being theſe two yeares within the bowels of that eſtate, betweene the gentlemen and the peaſants (by them named Helots) hath in this ſorte as it were disfigured the face of nature, and made it ſo vnhoſpitall as now you haue found it: the townes neither of the one ſide nor the other, willingly opening their gates to ſtrangers, nor ſtrangers willingly entring for feare of being miſtaken.

But this countrie (where now you ſet your foot) is Arcadia: & euen hard by is the houſe of Kalander whither we leade you: this country being thus decked with peace, & (the child of peace) good husbandrie. Theſe houſes you ſee ſo ſcattered are of men, as we two are, that liue vpon the commoditie of their ſheepe: and therefore in the diuiſiō of the Arcadian eſtate are termed ſhepheards; a happy people, wanting litle, becauſe they deſire not much. What cauſe then ſaide Muſidorus, made you venter to leaue this ſweet life, and put your ſelfe in yonder vnpleaſant and dangerous realme? Guarded with pouertie (anſwered Strephon) and guided with loue. But now (ſaid Claius) ſince it hath pleaſed you to aske any thing of vs whoſe baſenes is ſuch as the very knowledge is darknes: geue vs leaue to know ſomething of you, and of the yong man you ſo much lament, that at leaſt we may be the better inſtructed to enforme Kalander, and he the better know how to proportion his entertainment. Muſidorus (according to the agreement betweene Pyrocles & him to alter their names) anſwered, that he called himſelfe Palladius, and his friend Daiphantus; but till I haue him him againe (said he) I am indeed nothing, and therefore my storie is of nothing, his entertainment (since so good a man he is) cannot be so low as I account my estate: and in summe, the summe of all his curtesie may be to help me by some meanes to seeke my friend.

They perceiued he was not willing to open himselfe further, and therefore without further questioning brought him to the house; about which they might see (with fit consideration both of the aire, the prospect, and the nature of the ground) all such necessarie additions to a great house, as might well shew, Kalander knew that prouision is the foundation of hospitalitie, & thrift the fewell of magnificence. The house it selfe was built of faire and strong stone, not affecting so much any extraordinarie kind of fineneſſe, as an honourable representing of a firme statelineſſe. The lights, doores and staires, rather directed to the vse of the guest, then to the eye of the Artificer; & yet as the one chieflie heeded, so the other not neglected; each place handsome without curiositie, and homely without lothsomneſſe; not so dainty as not to be trode one, nor yet slubbered vp with good felowship; all more lasting than beautiful, but that the consideration of the exceeding lastingneſſe made the eye beleeue it was exceeding beautifull. The seruants not so many in number, as cleanly in apparell, and seruiceable in behauiour, testifying euen in their countenances, that their maister tooke aswell care to be serued, as of them that did serue. One of them was forthwith ready to welcome the shepheards, as men, who though they were poore, their maister greatly fauored; and vnderstanding by them, that the young man with them was to be much accounted of, for that they had seen tokens of more then common greatneſſe, how soeuer now eclipsed with fortune: he ran to his maister, who came presently forth, and pleasantly welcomming the shepheards, but especially applying him to Musidorus, Strephon priuately told him all what he knew of him, and particularlie that he found this straunger was loth to be knowne.

No said Kalander (speaking aloud) I am no Herald to enquire of mens pedegrees, it sufficeth me if I know their vertues; which (if this young mans face be not a false witneſſe) do better apparel his mind, thē you haue done his body. While he was thus speaking, there came a boy, in shew like a Marchāts prentise, who taking Strephon by the sleeue, deliuered him a letter, written iointly both to him and Claius from Vrania: which they no sooner had read, but that with short leaue-taking of Kalander (who quickly gueſſed and smiled at the matter) and once againe (though hastily) recommending the yong man vnto him, they went away, leauing Musidorus euen loth to part with them, for the good conuersation he had of them, and obligation he accounted himselfe tied in vnto them: and therefore, they deliuering his cheſt vnto him, he opened it, and would haue presented them with two verie rich iewels, but they absolutely refused them, telling him, that they were more then enough rewarded in the knowing of him, & without harkening vnto a reply (like men whose harts disdained all desires but one) gat speedily away, as if the letter had brought wings to make them flie. But by that sight Kalander soone iudged, that his gueſt was of no meane calling; & therfore the more respectfully entertaining him, Musidorus found his sickneſſe (which the fight, the sea, and late trauell had layd vpon him) grow greatlie; so that fearing some sodaine accident, he deliuered the cheſt to Kalander, which was full of most precious stones, gorgeouslie and cunningly set in diuerse maners, desiring him he would keep those trifles, and if he died, he would bestow so much of it as was needfull, to find out and redeeme a young man, naming himselfe Daiphantus, as then in the hands of Laconia pirats.

But Kalander seeing him faint more and more, with carefull speed conueyed him to the most commodious lodging in his house: where being possest with an extreame burning feuer, he continued some while with no great hope of life: but youth at length got the victorie of sickneſſe, so that in sixe weeks the excellencie of his returned beautie was a credible Embassador of his health, to the great ioy of Kalander; who, as in this time he had by certaine friends of his, that dwelt neare the sea in Messenia, set forth a ship and a galley to seeke and succour Daiphantus: so at home did he omit nothing which he thought might either profite or gratifie Palladius.

For, hauing found in him (besides his bodily gifts beyond the degree of admiration) by daylie discourses, which he delighted himselfe to haue with him, a mind of most excellent composition (a piercing wit quite voyd of ostentation, high erected thoughts seated in a heart of courtesie, an eloquence as sweet in the vttering, as slow to come to the vttering, a behauiour so noble, as gaue a maiestie to aduersitie: and all in a man whose age could not be aboue one and twentie yeares) the good olde man was euen enamoured with a fatherlie loue towards him, or rather became his seruant by the bonds such vertue laid vpon him; once, he acknowledged himselfe so to be, by the badge of diligent attendance.

But Palladius hauing gotten his health, & only staying there to be in place, where he might heare answere of the ships set forth, Kalander one afternoone led him abroad to a well arrayed ground he had behind his house, which he thought to shew him before his going, as the place himselfe more then in anie other delighted. The backside of the house was neither field, garden, nor orchard; or rather it was both field, garden, and orchard: for as soone as the descending of the staires had deliuered them downe, they came into a place cunningly set with trees of the most tast-pleasing fruits: but scarcely they had taken that into their consideration, but that they were sodainly stept into a delicate greene, of each side of the greene a thicket, and behind the thickets againe new beds of flowers, which being vnder the trees, the trees were to them a Pauillion, and they to the trees a Mosaicall floore: so that it seemed that Arte therein would needs be delightfull, by counterfeyting his enemie Errour, and making order in confusion.

In the middest of all the place was a faire pond, whose shaking christall was a perfect mirrour to all the other beauties, so that it bare shew of two gardens; one in deede, the other in shadowes: and in one of the thickets was a fine fountaine made thus: A naked Venus of white marble, wherin the grauer had vsed such cunning, that the natural blew veines of the marble were framed in fit places, to set forth the beautifull veynes of her bodie. At her breast she had her babe Aeneas, who seemed (hauing begun to sucke) to leaue that, to looke vpon her faire eyes, which smiled at the babes follie, meane while the breast running. Hard by was a house of pleasure built for a sommer retiring place, whither Kalander leading him, he found a square roome full of delightfull pictures, made by the most excellent workeman of Greece. There was Diana when Acteon saw her bathing, in whose cheeks the Painter had set such a colour, as was mixt betweene shame and disdaine; and one of her fooliſh Nymphs, who weeping, and withall lowring, one might see the workman meant to set forth teares of anger. In another table was Atalanta; the posture of whose limmes was so liuely expressed, that if the eyes were the only iudges, as they be the only seers, one wold haue sworn the very picture had run. Besides many mo, as of Helena, Omphale, Iole: but in none of them all beautie seemed to speake so much as in a large table, which which contained a comely old man, with a Ladie of middle age, but of excellēt beautie, and more excellent would haue bene deemed, but that there ſtood between them a young maide, whoſe wonderfulneſſe tooke away all beautie frō her, but that which it might ſeeme ſhe gaue her backe againe by her verie ſhadow. And ſuch difference (being knowne that it did indeed counterfeit a perſon liuing) was there betweene her and all the other, though Goddeſſes, that it ſeemed the skill of the Painter beſtowed on the other new beautie, but that the beauty of her beſtowed new skill of the Painter. Though he thought inquiſitiueneſſe an vncomely gueſt, he could not chooſe but aske who ſhe was, that bearing ſhew of one being in deed, could with naturall gifts go beyond the reach of inuention. Kalander anſwered, that it was made by Philoclea, the younger daughter of his Prince, who alſo with his wife were contained in that Table: the Painter meaning to repreſent the preſent condition of the young Ladie, who ſtood watched by an ouer-curious eye of her parents; and that he would alſo haue drawne her eldeſt ſiſter, eſteemed her match for beautie, in her ſhepheardiſh attire, but that the rude clowne her gardian would not ſuffer it; neither durſt he aske leaue of the Prince for feare of ſuſpition. Palladius perceiued that the matter was wrapt vp in ſome ſecrecie, and therefore would for modeſtie demaund no further: but yet his countenance could not but with dumbe eloquence deſire it: Which Kalander perceiuing, well, ſayd he, my deare gueſt, I know your mind, and I will ſatisfie it; neither will I do it like a niggardly anſwerer, going no further then the bounds of the queſtion, but I will diſcouer vnto you, aſwell that wherein my knowledge is common with others, as that which by extraordinarie means is deliuered vnto me: knowing ſo much in you (though not long acquainted) that I ſhall find your eares faithfull treaſurers. So then ſitting downe in two chaires, and ſometimes caſting his eye to the picture, he thus ſpake.

This countrie Arcadia among all the prouinces of Greece, hath euer bene had in ſingular reputation: partly for the ſweetneſſe of the aire, and other naturall benefits, but principally for the well tempered mindes of the pople, who (finding that the ſhining title of glorie, ſo much affected by other nations, doth indeed help litle to the happineſſe of life) are the only people, which as by their iuſtice and prouidence giue neither cauſe nor hope to their neighbours to annoy them, ſo are they not ſtirred with falſe praiſe to trouble others quiet, thinking it a ſmall reward for the waſting of their owne liues in rauening, that their poſteritie ſhold long after ſay, they had done ſo. Euen the Muſes ſeeme to approue their good determination, by chooſing this countrie for their chiefe repairing place, and by beſtowing their perfections ſo largely here, that the very ſhepheards haue their fancies lifted to ſo high conceits, as the learned of other nations are content both to borrow their names, and imitate their cunning.

Here dwelleth and raigneth this Prince (whoſe picture you ſee) by name Baſilius, a Prince of ſufficient skill to gouerne ſo quiet a countrie, where the good minds of the former Princes had ſet downe good lawes, & the well bringing vp of the people doth ſerue as a moſt ſure bond to hold thē. But to be plaine with you, he excels in nothing ſo much, as in the zealous loue of his people, wherein he doth not onely paſſe all his own fore-goers, but as I think all the Princes liuing. Wherof the cauſe is, that though he exceed not in the vertues which get admiration; as depth of wiſedome, height of courage and largeneſſe of magnificence, yet is he notable in thoſe which ſtirre affection, as truth of word, meekneſſe, curteſie, mercifulneſſe, and liberality.

He being already well ſtriken in yeares, maried a young Princeſſe named Gynecia, daughter to the king of Cyprus, of notable beautie, as by her picture you see: a woman of great wit, and in truth of more princely vertues than her husband; of most vnspotted chastitie, but of so working a mind, and so vehement spirits, as a man may say, it was happie she tooke a good course, for otherwise it would haue bene terrible.

Of these two are brought to the world two daughters, so beyond measure excellent in all the gifts allotted to reasonable creatures, that we may thinke they were borne to shew, that nature is no stepmother to that sexe, how much soeuer some men (sharp-witted only in euill speaking) haue sought to disgrace them. The elder is named Pamela; by many men not deemed inferiour to her sister: for my part, whē I marked thē both, me thought there was (if at least such perfections may receiue the word of more) more sweetnesse in Philoclea, but more maiesty in Pamela: me thought loue plaid in Philocleas eyes, and threatned in Pamelas: me thought Philocleas beautie only perswaded, but so perswaded as all hearts must yeeld: Pamelas beautie vsed violence, and such violence as no heart could resist: and it seems that such proportion is betweene their minds: Philoclea so bashfull, as though her excellencies had stolne into her before she was aware; so humble, that she will put all pride out of countenance; in summe, such proceeding as will stirre hope, but teach hope good maners. Pamela of high thoughts, who auoyds not pride with not knowing her excellencies, but by making that one of her excellencies to be voyd of pride; her mothers wisedome, greatnesse, nobilitie, but (if I can guesse aright) knit with a more constant temper. Now then, our Basilius being so publikelie happie as to be a Prince, and so happie in that happinesse, as to be a beloued Prince, and so in his priuate blessed as to haue so excellent a wife, and so ouer excellent children, hath of late taken a course, which yet makes him more spoken of than all these blessings. For, hauing made a iourney to Delphos, and safely returned, within short space he brake vp his Court, and retired himselfe, his wife & children into a certain forrest hereby, which he calleth his desert; wherein (besides a house appointed for stables, and lodgings for certaine persons of meane calling, who do all houshold seruices) he hath builded two fine lodges: in the one of them himselfe remaines with his yonger daughter Philoclea, which was the cause they three were matched together in this picture, without hauing any other creature liuing in that lodge with him.

Which, though it be straunge, yet not so straunge, as the course he hath taken with the Princesse Pamela, whom he hath placed in the other lodge: but how thinke you accompanied? truly with none other but one Dametas, the most arrant doltish clowne, that I thinke euer was without the priuiledge of a bable, with his wife Miso, and daughter Mopsa, in whom no wit can deuise any thing wherein they may pleasure her, but to exercise her patience, and to serue for a foyle of her perfections. This lowtish clowne is such, that you neuer saw so ilfauoured a visar; his behauiour such, that he is beyond the degree of ridiculous; and for his apparell, euen a I would wish him: Miso his wife, so handsome a beldame, that onely her face and her splay-foote haue made her accused for a witch; only one good point she hath, that she obserues decorum, hauing a froward mind in a wretched body. Between these two personages (who neuer agreed in any humour, but in disagreeing) is issued forth mistresse Mopsa, a fit woman to participate of both their perfections: but because a pleasant fellow of my acquaintance set forth her praises in verse, I will only repeat them, and spare mine owne tongue, since she goes for a woman. The verses are these, which I haue so often caused to be sung, that I haue them without booke:

VVhat

VVhat length of verse can serue braue Mopsas good to show?
VVhose vertues strange, and beauties such, as no man them may know:
Thus shrewdly burdned then, how can my Muse escape?
The gods must help, and precious things must serue to shew her shape.
Like great god Saturne faire, and like faire Venus chaste:
As smooth as Pan, as Iuno mild, like goddesse Iris faste.
VVith Cupid she foresees, and goes god Vulcans pace:
And for a taste of all these gifts, she steales god Momus grace.
Her forehead Iacinth like, her cheeks of Opall hue,
Her twinckling eyes bedect vvith pearle, her lips as Saphir blew:
Her haire like Crapal stone, her mouth ô heauenly wide:
Her skin like burnisht gold, her hands like siluer vre vntride.
As for her parts vnknowne, which hidden sure are best:
Happie be they which well beleeue, and neuer seeke the rest.

Now truly hauing made these descriptions vnto you, me thinks you should imagine that I rather faine some pleasant deuise, then recount a truth, that a Prince (not banished from his owne wits) could possiblie make so vnworthie a choise But trulie (deare guest) so it is, that Princes (whose doings haue bene often smoothed with good successe) thinke nothing so absurd, which they cannot make honourable. The beginning of his credit was by the Princes straying out of the way, on time he hunted, where meeting this fellow, and asking him the way, and so falling into other questions, he found some of his answeres (as a dog sure if he could speake, had wit enough to describe his kennell) not vnsensible, and all vttered with such rudenesse, which he interpreted plainnesse (though there be great difference betweene them) that Basilius conceiuing a sodaine delight, tooke him to his Court, with apparant shew of his good opinion: where the flattering Courtier had no sooner taken the Princes mind, but that there were straight reasons to confirme the Princes doing, & shadowes of vertues found for Dametas. His silence grew wit, his bluntnesse integritie, his beastlie ignorance vertuous simplicitie: and the Prince (according to the nature of great persons, in loue with that he had done himselfe) fancied, that his weakenesse with his presence would much bee mended. And so like a creature of his owne making, he liked him more and more; and thus hauing first giuen him the office of principall heardman; lastly, since he tooke this strange determination, he hath in a maner put the life of himselfe and his children into his hands. VVhich authority (like too great a saile for so small a boat) doth so ouer-sway poore Dametas, that if before he were a good foole in a chāber, he might be allowed it now in a comedy: so as I doubt me (I feare me indeed) my master will in the end (with his cost) find, that his office is not to make men, but to vse men as men are, no more then a horse will be taught to hunt, or an asse to mannage. But in sooth I am afraid I haue giuen your eares too great a surfet, with the grosse discourses of that heauy peece of flesh. But the zealous griefe I conceiue to see so great an errour in my Lord, hath made me bestow more words, then I confesse so base a subiect deserueth.

Thus much now that I haue told you, is nothing more then in effect anie Arcadian knowes. But what moued him to this strange solitarinesse, hath bene imparted (as I thinke) but to one person liuing. My selfe can coniecture, and indeed more then coniecture by this accident that I will tell you: I haue an only sonne, by name Clitophon, who is now absent, preparing for his owne mariage, which I meane shortly ſhalbe here celebrated. This ſonne of mine (while the Prince kept his Court) was of his bed chamber; now ſince the breaking vp thereof, returned home, and ſhewed me (among other things he had gathered) the copie which hee had taken of a letter: which when the Prince had read, he had laid in a windowe, preſuming no body durſt looke in his writings: but my ſonne not only tooke a time to reade it, but to copie it. In truth I blamed Clitophon for the curioſitie, which made him breake his dutie in ſuch a kind, whereby kings ſecrets are ſubiect to be reuealed: but ſince it was done, I was content to take ſo much profite, as to know it. Now here is the letter, that I euer ſince for my good liking, haue caried about me: which before I reade vnto you, I muſt tell you from whom it came. It is a noble-man of this countrie, named Philanax, appointed by the Prince, regent in this time of his retiring, & moſt worthy ſo to be: for, there liues no man, whoſe excellent witte more ſimplye imbraceth integritie, beſides his vnfained loue to his maiſter, wherein neuer yet any could make queſtion, ſauing whether he loued Baſilius or the Prince better: a rare temper, while moſt men either ſeruile-ly yeeld to all appetites, or with an obſtinate auſteritie looking to that they fancie good, in effect neglect the Princes perſon. This then being the man, whome of all other (and moſt worthie) the Prince chiefely loues, it ſhould ſeeme (for more then the letter I haue not to gheſſe by) that the Prince vpon his returne from Delphos, (Philanax then lying ſick) had written vnto him his determination, riſing (as euidently appeares) vpon ſome Oracle he had there receiued: whereunto he wrote this anſwere.

Philanax his letter to Baſilius.

Moſt redoubted and beloued Prince, if as well it had pleaſed you at your going to Delphos as now, to haue vſed my humble ſeruice, both I ſhould in better ſeaſon, and to better purpoſe haue ſpoken: and you (if my ſpeech had preuailed) ſhould haue been at this time, as no way more in danger, ſo much more in quietnes; I would then haue ſaide, that wiſedome and vertue be the onely deſtinies appointed to man to follow, whence we ought to ſeeke all our knowledge, ſince they be ſuch guides as cannot faile; which, beſides their inward comfort, do leade ſo direct a way of proceeding, as either proſperitie muſt enſue; or, if the wickedneſſe of the world ſhould oppreſſe it, it can neuer be ſaid, that euil happeneth to him, who falles accompanied with vertue: I would then haue ſaid, the heauenly powers to be reuerenced, and not ſerched into; & their mercies rather by praiers to be ſought, then their hidden counſels by curioſitie. Theſe kindes of ſoothſayings (ſince they haue left vs in our ſelues ſufficient guides) to be nothing but fancie, wherein there muſt either be vanitie, or infalliblenes, & ſo, either not to be reſpected, or not to be preuented. But ſince it is weakeneſſe too much to remember what ſhould haue beene done, and that your commaundement ſtretcheth to know what is to be done, I do (moſt deare Lord) with humble boldnes ſay, that the manner of your determination doth in no ſort better pleaſe me, then the cauſe of your going. Theſe thirtie yeares you haue ſo gouerned this Region, that neither your Subiects haue wanted iuſtice in you, nor you obedience in them; and your neighbours haue found you ſo hurtleſly ſtrong, that they thought it better to reſt in your friendſhip, then make new trial of your enmitie. If this then haue proceeded out of the good conſtitution of your ſtate, and out of a wiſe prouidence, generally to preuent all thoſe things, which might encomber your happines: why ſhould you now ſeeke new courſes, ſince your own example comforts you to continue, & that it is to me moſt certaine though it pleaſe you not to tell me the verie words of the Oracle)that yet no deſtiny nor influence whatſoeuer, can bring mans wit to a higher point,than wiſdome and goodneſſe?Why ſhold you depriue your ſelfof gouernment,for feare of loſing your gouernment, like one that ſhould kill himſelfe for feare of death?Nay rather if this Oracle be to be accounted of,arme vp your courage the more againſt it:for who wil ſticke to him that abandons himſelfe; let your ſubiects haue you in their eyes; let them ſee the benefits of your iuſtice dayly more & more; and ſo muſt they needs rather like of preſent ſureties then vncertaine chaunges. Laſtly, whether your time call you to liue or die,do both like a Prince. Now for your ſecond reſolution;which is to ſuffer no worthy Prince to be a ſuter to either of your daughters,but while you liue to keepe them both vnmaried, &, as it were, to kill the ioy of poſteritie, which in your time you may enioy, moued perchance by a miſ-underſtood Oracle: what ſhall I ſay,if the affection of a father to his owne children, cannot plead ſufficientlie againſt ſuch fancies? once certaine it is, the God which is God of nature, doth neuer teach vnnaturalneſſe: and euen the ſame mind hold I touching your baniſhing them from companie,leaſt,I know not what ſtrange loues ſhould follow. Certainlie ſir,in my Ladies your daughters, nature promiſeth nothing but goodneſſe, and their education by your fatherly care hath bene hitherto ſuch, as hath bene moſt fit to reſtraine all euill; giuing their minds vertuous delights,and not grieuing them for want of well ruled libertie. Now to fall to a ſodaine ſtraightning them,what can it do but argue ſuſpition,a thing no more vnpleaſant,then vnſure,for the preſeruing of vertue. Leaue womens minds, the moſt vntamed that way of any: ſee whether a cage can pleaſe a bird?or whether a dog grow not fiercer with tying? what doth iealouſie, but ſtirre vp the mind to thinke, what it is from which they are reſtrained? for they are treaſures or things of great delight, which men vſe to hide, for the aptneſſe they haue to each mans fancies: and the thoughts once awaked to that, harder ſure it is to keepe thoſe thoughts from accompliſhment,then had bene before to haue kept the mind (which being the chiefe part, by this means is defiled) from thinking. Laſtly, for the recommending ſo principall a charge of the Princeſſe Pamela (whoſe mind goes beyond the gouerning of manie thouſands ſuch) to ſuch a perſon as Dametas is (beſides that the thing in it ſelfe is ſtrange) it comes of a verie euill ground, that ignorance ſhould be the mother of faithfulneſſe;O no;he cannot be good that knowes not why he is good,but ſtands ſo farre good as his fortune may keepe him vnaſſayed: but comming once to that,his rude ſimplicitie is either eaſily changed, or eaſily deceiued: and ſo growes that to be the laſt excuſe of his fault,which ſeemed to haue bene the firſt foundation of his faith. Thus farre hath your commandement and my zeale drawne me; which I, like a man in a valley that may diſcerne hilles, or like a poore paſſenger that may ſpie a rocke, ſo humblie ſubmit to your gracious conſideration, beſeeching you againe to ſtand wholly vpon your owne vertue,as the ſureſt way to maintaine you in that you are, and to auoyd any euill which may be imagined.

By the contents of this letter you may perceiue, that the cauſe of all, hath bene the vanitie which poſſeſſeth many, who (making a perpetuall māſion of this poore baiting place of mans life) are deſirous to know the certaintie of things to come; wherein there is nothing ſo certaine as our continuall vncertaintie. But what in particular points the Oracle was, in faith I know not; neither (as you may ſee by one place of Philanax letter) he himſelfe diſtinctly knew. But this experience ſhewes vs,that Baſilius iudgement,corrupted with a Princes fortune,hath rather heard then followed the wiſe(as I take it)counſell of Philanax. For hauing left the ſterne of his gouernment, with much amazement to the people, among whom many ſtraunge bruits are receiued for currant, and with ſome apparance of danger in reſpect of the valiant Amphialus his nephew,& much enuying the ambitious number of the Nobilitie againſt Philanax, to ſee Philanax ſo aduanced, though (to ſpeake ſimplie) he deſerue more then as many, of vs as there be in Arcadia: the Prince himſelfe hath hidden his head, in ſuch ſort as I told you, not ſticking plainely to confeſſe, that he means not (while he breathes) that his daughters ſhal haue any husband, but keepe them thus ſolitary with him: where he giues no other body leaue to viſite him at any time but a certaine Prieſt, who being excellent in poetrie, he makes him write out ſuch things as he beſt likes, he being no leſſe delightfull in conuerſation, then needfull for deuotion, and about twenty ſpecified ſhepheards, in whom (ſome for exerciſes, and ſome for Eglogs) he taketh greater recreation.

And now you know as much as my ſelfe: wherein if I haue held you ouer long, lay hardly the fault vpon my olde age, which in the verie diſpoſition of it is talkatiue: whether it be(ſaid he ſmiling) that nature loues to exerciſe that part moſt, which is leaſt decayed, and that is our tongue: or, that knowledge being the onlie thing whereof we poore olde men can brag, we cannot make it knowne but by vtterance: or, that mankind by all meanes ſeeking to eternize himſelfe ſo much the more, as he is neare his end, doth it not onely by the children that come of him, but by ſpeeches and writings recommended to the memorie of hearers & readers. And yet thus much I will ſay for my ſelfe, that I haue not laid theſe matters, either ſo openly or largely to anie as to your ſelfe: ſo much (if I much faile not) do I ſee in you, which makes me both loue and truſt you. Neuer may he be old, anſwered Palladius, that doth not reuerence that age, whoſe heauineſſe, if it waie downe the frayle and fleſhlie ballance, it as much lifts vp the noble and ſpirituall part; and well might you haue alleaged another reaſon, that their wiſedome makes them willing to profite others. And that haue I receiued of you, neuer to be forgotten, but with vngratefulneſſe. But among many ſtrange conceits you told me, which haue ſhewed effects in your Prince, truly euen the laſt, that he ſhould conceiue ſuch pleaſure in ſhepheards diſcourſes, would not ſeeme the leaſt vnto me, ſauing that you told me at the firſt, that this countrie is notable in thoſe wits, and that indeed my ſelfe hauing bene brought not only to this place, but to my life by Strephon and Claius, in their conference found wits as might better become ſuch ſhepheards as Homer ſpeaks of, that be gouernours of peoples, then ſuch Senators who hold their Councel in a ſheep cote. For them two (ſaid Kalander) eſpecially Claius, they are beyond the reſt by ſo much, as learning commonly doth adde to nature: for, hauing neglected their wealth in reſpect of their knowledge, they haue not ſo much impaired the meaner, as they bettered the better. Which all notwithſtanding, it is a ſport to heare how they impute to loue, which hath indued their thoughts (ſay they) with ſuch a ſtrength.

But certainly all the people of this countrie from high to lowe, is giuen to thoſe ſports of the wit, ſo as you would wonder to heare how ſoone euen children will begin to verſifie. Once, ordinarie it is amongſt the meaneſt ſort, to make ſongs and dialogues in meeter, either loue whetting their braine, or long peace hauing begun it; example and emulation amending it. Not ſo much, but the Clowne Dametas will ſtumble ſometimes vpon ſome ſongs that might become a better braine: but no ſort of people ſo excellent in that kind as the paſtors; for their liuing ſtanding

but vpon the looking to their beasts, they haue ease, the Nurse of Poetrie. Neither are our shepheards such, as (I heare) they be in other countries; but they are the verie owners of the sheepe, to which either themselues looke, or their children giue dayly attendance. And then truly, it would delight you vnder some tree, or by some riuers side (when two or three of them meet together) to heare their rurall Muse, how pretilie it will deliuer out, sometimes ioyes, sometimes lamentations, sometimes chalengings one of the other, sometimes vnder hidden formes vttering such matters, as otherwise they durst not deale with. Then haue they most commonlie one, who iudgeth the prise to the best doer, of which they are no lesse glad, then great Princes are of Triumphs: and his part is to set downe in writing all that is said, saue that it may be, his pen with more leasure doth polish the rudenesse of an vnthought-on song. Now the choise of all (as you may well thinke) either for goodnesse of voice, or pleasantnesse of wit, the Prince hath: among whom also there are two or three strangers, whom inward melancholies hauing made wearie of the worlds eyes, haue come to spend their liues among the countrie people of Arcadia; and their conuersation being well approoued, the Prince vouchsafeth them his presence, and not onely by looking on, but by great curtesie & liberalitie, animates the shepheards the more exquisitely to labour for his good liking. So that there is no cause to blame the Prince for sometimes hearing them; the blame-worthinesse is, that to heare them, he rather goes to solitarinesse, then makes them come to companie. Neither do I accuse my maister for aduauncing a countriman, as Dametas is, since God forbid, but where worthinesse is (as truly it is among diuerse of that fellowship) any outward lowneſſe should hinder the highest raising, but that he would needs make election of one, the baseneſſe of whose mind is such, that it sinks a thousand degrees lower then the basest body could carie the most base fortune: which although it might be answered for the Prince, that it is rather a trust he hath in his simple plainnesse, then any great aduauncement, but being chiefe heardman; yet all honest hearts feele, that the trust of their Lord goes beyond all aduauncement. But I am euer too long vpon him, when he crosseth the way of my speach, and by the shadow of yonder tower, I see it is a fitter time, with our supper to pay the duties we owe to our stomacks, then to breake the aire with my idle discourses: and more wit I might haue learned of Homer (whom euen now you mentioned) who neuer entertained either guests or hosts with long speeches, till the mouth of hunger be throughly stopped. So withall he rose, leading Palladius through the garden againe to the Parler, where they vsed to suppe; Palladius assuring him that he had already bene more fed to his liking, then he could be by the skilfullest trenchermen of Media.

But being come to the supping place, one of Kalanders seruants rounded in his eare; at which (his colour changing) he retired himselfe into his chamber; commanding his men diligently to wait vpon Palladius, and to excuse his absence with some necessary businesse he had presently to dispatch. Which they accordingly did, for some few dayes forcing thēselues to let no change appeare, but though they framed their countenances neuer so cunningly, Palladius perceiued there was some ill-pleasing accidēt fallen out. Wherupon, being againe set alone at supper, he called to the steward, and desired him to tell him the matter of his sudden alteration: who after some trifling excuses, in the end confessed vnto him, that his master had receiued newes, that his sonne before the day of his neare mariage, chaunst to be at a battaile, which was to be fought betweene the Gentlemen of Lacedæmon and the Helots: who winning the victorie, he was there made prisoner, going to deliuer a friend of his taken prisoner by the Helots; that the poore young Gentleman had offered great ransome for his life; but that the hate those peasants conceiued against all Gentlemen was such, that euery houre he was to look for nothing, but some cruell death: which hitherunto had only bene delayed by the Captaines vehement dealing for him, who seemed to haue a heart of more manly pitie then the rest. Which losse had stricken the old Gentleman with such sorrow, as if abundance of teares did not seeme sufficiently to witnesse it, he was alone retired, tearing his beard and haire, and cursing his old age, that had not made his graue to stop his eares from such aduertisements: but that his faithfull seruants had written in his name to all his friends followers, and tenants (Philanax the gouernour refusing to deale in it as a priuate cause, but yet giuing leaue to seeke their best redresse, so as they wronged not the state of Lacedæmon) of whom there were now gathered vpon the frontiers good forces, that he was sure would spend their liues by any way, to redeeme or reuenge Clitophon. Now sir (said he) this is my maisters nature, though his griefe be such, as to liue is a griefe vnto him, and that euen his reason is darkened with sorrow; yet the lawes of hospitalitie (long and holily obserued by him) giue still such a sway to his proceeding, that he will no way suffer the straunger lodged vnder his roofe, to receiue (as it were) any infection of his anguish, especially you, toward whom I know not whether his loue, or admiration be greater. But Palladius could scarce heare out his tale with patience, so was his heart torne in peeces with compassion of the case, liking of Kalanders noble behauiour, kindnesse for his respect to himward, and desire to find some remedie, besides the image of his deareſt friend Daiphantus, whom he iudged to suffer either a like or worse fortune. Therfore rising from the boord, he desired the steward to tell him particularly, the ground & euent of this accident, because by knowledge of many circumstances, there might perhaps some way of help be opened. Wherunto the steward easily in this sort condiscended.

My Lord (said he) when our good King Basilius, with better successe then expectation, tooke to wife (euen in his more then decaying yeares) the faire young Princesse Gynecia; there came with her a yong Lord, cousin german to her selfe, named Argalus, led hither, partly with the loue and honour of his noble kinswoman, partly with the humour of youth, which euer thinks that good, whose goodnesse he sees not: & in this Court he receiued so good increase of knowledge, that after some years spent, he so manifested a most vertuous mind in all his actions, that Arcadia gloried such a plant was transported vnto them, being a Gentleman indeed most rarely accomplished, excellently learned, but without all vaine glorie: friendly, without factiousnesse; valiant, so as for my part, I think the earth hath no man that hath done more heroicall acts then he; how soeuer now of late the fame flies of the two Princes of Thessalia and Macedon, and hath long done of our noble Prince Amphialus; who indeed, in our parts is onely accounted likely to match him: but I say for my part, I thinke no man for valour of mind, and abilitie of body to be preferred, if equalled to Argalus; and yet so valiant as he neuer durst do any body iniurie: in behauiour some will say euer sad, surely sober, and somewhat giuen to musing, but neuer vncurteous; his word euer led by his thought, and followed by his deed; rather liberall then magnificent, though the one wanted not, and the other had euer good choise of the receiuer: in summe (for I perciue I shall easilie take a great draught of his praises, whom both I and all this countrie loue so well)

ſuch a man was (and I hope is) Argalus, as hardly the niceſt eye can find a ſpot in, if the ouer-vehemēt conſtancy of yet ſpotleſſe affection, may not in hard wreſted conſtructions be counted a ſpot: which in this maner began that worke in him, which hath made both him, and it ſelfe in him ouer all this countrey famous. My maiſters ſonne Clitophon (whoſe loſſe giues the cauſe to this diſcourſe, & yet giues me cauſe to begin with Argalus, ſince his loſſe proceeds from Argalus) being a young Gentleman, as of great birth (being our kings ſiſters ſonne) ſo truly of good nature, and one that can ſee good and loue it, haunted more the companie of this worthy Argalus, then of any other: ſo as if there were not a friendſhip (which is ſo rare, as it is to be doubted whether it be a thing indeed, or but a word) at leaſt there was ſuch a liking and friendlineſſe, as hath brought forth the effects which you ſhall heare. About two yeares ſince, it ſo fell out, that hee brought him to a great Ladies houſe, ſiſter to my maiſter, who had with her her onelie daughter, the faire Parthenia; faire indeed (ſame I thinke it ſelfe daring not to call anie fairer, if it be not Helena Queene of Corinth, & the two incomparable ſiſters of Arcadia) & that which made her faireneſſe much the fairer, was, that it was but a faire Embaſſadour of a moſt faire mind, full of wit, and a wit which delighted more to iudge it ſelfe, then to ſhew it ſelfe: her ſpeech being as rare as precious; her ſilence without ſullenneſſe; her modeſtie without affectation; her ſhamefaſtneſſe without ignorance: in ſumme, one that to praiſe well, one muſt firſt ſet downe with himſelfe, what it is to be excellent: for ſo ſhe is.

I thinke you think, that theſe perfections meeting, could not chooſe but find one another, and delight in that they found; for likeneſſe of maners is likely in reaſon to draw liking with affection: mens actions do not alwaies croſſe with reaſon: to be ſhort, it did ſo indeed. They loued, although for a while the fire thereof (hopes wings being cut off) were blowne by the bellowes of diſpaire vpon this occaſion.

There had bene a good while before, & ſo continued, a ſuter to this ſame Ladie, a great noble man, though of Laconia, yet neare neighbour to Parthenias mother, named Demagoras: a man mighty in riches & power, and proud thereof, ſtubbornlie ſtout, louing no body but himſelfe, and for his owne delights ſake Parthenia: & purſuing vehemētlie his deſire, his riches had ſo guilded ouer al his other imperfectiōs, that the olde Lady (though contrarie to my Lord her brothers mind) had giuen her conſent; & vſing a mothers authority vpon her faire daughter, had made her yeeld thereunto, not becauſe ſhe liked her choiſe, but becauſe her obedient mind had not yet taken vpon it to make choiſe; & the day of their aſſurance drew neare, when my young Lord Clitophon brought this noble Argalus, perchance principallie to ſee ſo rare a ſight, as Parthenia by all well iudging eyes was iudged.

But though few dayes were before the time of aſſurance appointed, yet loue that ſaw he had a great iourney to make in ſhort time, haſted ſo himſelfe, that before her word could tie her to Demagoras, her heart hath vowed her to Argalus, with ſo gratefull a receipt in mutuall affection, that if ſhe deſired aboue all things to haue Argalus, Argalus feared nothing but to miſſe Parthenia. And now Parthenia had learned both liking and miſliking, louing and loathing, and out of paſſion began to take the authoritie of iudgement; in ſo much, that when the time came that Demagoras (full of proud ioy) thought to receiue the gift of her ſelfe, ſhe with words of reſolute refuſal (though with teares ſhewing ſhe was ſorie ſhe muſt refuſe) aſſured her mother, ſhe would firſt be bedded in her graue, then wedded to Demagoras. The chaunge was no more ſtraunge, then vnpleaſant to the mother: who being determinately (leaſt I ſhould ſay of a great Lady wilfullie) bent to marie her to Demagoras, tried all wayes which a wittie and hard-hearted mother could vſe, vpon ſo humble a daughter; in whō the only reſiſting power was loue. But the more ſhe aſſaulted, the more ſhe taught Parthenia to defend; and the more Parthenia defended, the more ſhe made her mother obſtinate in the aſſault: who at length finding, that Argalus ſtanding betweene them, was it that moſt eclipſed her affection from ſhining vpon Demagoras, ſhe ſought all meanes how to remoue him, ſo much the more as he manifeſted himſelfe an vnremoueable ſuter to her daughter: firſt, by employing him in as many dangerous enterpriſes, as euer the euill ſtepmother Iuno recommended to the famous Hercules: but the more his vertue was tried, the more pure it grew, while all the things ſhe did to ouerthrow him, did ſet him vp vpon the height of honour; enough to haue moued her heart, eſpecially to a man euerie way ſo worthie as Argalus: but ſhe ſtrugling againſt all reaſon, becauſe ſhe would haue her will, and ſhew her authoritie in matching her with Demagoras, the more vertuous Argalus was, the more ſhe hated him, thinking herſelfe conquered in his conqueſts, and therefore ſtill imploying him in more & more dangerous attempts: in the meane while, ſhe vſed all extremities poſſible vpon her faire daughter, to make her giue ouer her ſelfe to her direction. But it was hard to iudge, whether he in doing, or ſhe in ſuffring, ſhewed greater cōſtancy of affection: for, as to Argalus the world ſooner wanted occaſions, then he valour to go through them: ſo to Parthenia, malice ſooner ceaſed, then her vnchanged patience. Laſtly, by treaſons, Demagoras and ſhe would haue made away Argalus; but he with prouidence and courage ſo paſt ouer all, that the mother tooke ſuch a ſpitefull griefe at it, that her heart brake withall; and ſhe died.

But then, Demagoras aſſuring himſelfe, that now Parthenia was her owne ſhe would neuer be his, and receiuing as much by her owne determinate anſwere, not more deſiring his owne happineſſe, then enuying Argalus, whome he ſaw with narrow eyes, euen ready to enioy the perfection of his deſires, ſtrengthening his conceit with all the miſchieuous counſels which diſdained loue, and enuious pride could giue vnto him; the wicked wretch (taking a time that Argalus was gone to his countrie, to fetch ſome of his principall friends to honour the mariage, which Parthenia had moſt ioyfullie conſented vnto) the wicked Demagoras (I ſay) deſiring to ſpeake with her, with vnmercifull force (her weake armes in vaine reſiſting) rubd all ouer her face a moſt horrible poyſon: the effect whereof was ſuch, that neuer leaper lookt more vgly then ſhe did: which done, hauing his men and horſes ready, departed away in ſpite of her ſeruants, as ready to reuenge as they could be, in ſuch an vnexpected miſchiefe. But the abhominableneſſe of this fact being come to my L. Kalander, he made ſuch means, both by our kings interceſſion, and his owne, that by the King & Senate of Lacedæmon, Demagoras was vpon paine of death baniſhed the countrie: who hating the puniſhment, where he ſhould haue hated the fault, ioyned himſelfe, with all the powers he could make, vnto the Helots, lately in rebellion againſt that ſtate: and they (glad to haue a man of ſuch authoritie among them) made him their General: & vnder him haue committed diuerſe the moſt outragious villanies, that a baſe multitude (full of deſperate reuenge) can imagine.

But within a while after this pitifull fact cōmitted vpon Parthenia, Argalus returned (poore Gentleman) hauing her faire image in his hart, & already promiſing his eyes the vttermoſt of his felicitie, when they (no body elſe daring to tell it him) were the firſt meſſengers to themſelues of their owne misfortune. I meane not to moue passions with telling you the griefe of both, when hee knew her, for at first he did not, nor at first knowledge could possibly haue vertues aide so ready, as not euen weakely to lament the losse of such a iewell, so much the more, as that skilfull men in that art assured it was vnrecouerable: but within a while, truth of loue (which still held the first face in his memorie) a vertuous constancie, and euen a delight to bee constant, faith giuen, and inward worthinesse shining through the foulest mistes, tooke so full hold of the noble Argalus, that not only in such comfort which witty arguments may bestow vpon aduersitie, but euen with the most abundant kindnesse that an eye-rauished louer can expresse, he laboured both to driue the extremity of sorrow from her, and to hasten the celeration of their mariage: whereunto he vnfainedly shewed himselfe no lesse cherefully earnest, then if she had neuer bene disinherited of that goodly portion, which nature had so liberally bequeathed vnto her: & for that cause deferred his intended reuenge vpon Demagoras, because he might continually be in her presence; shewing more humble seruiceablenesse, and ioy to content her, then euer before.

But as he gaue this rare example, not to be hoped for of any other, but of another Argalus: so of the other side, she tooke as strange a course in affection: for, where she desired to enioy him, more then to liue; yet did she ouerthrow both her owne desire and his, and in no sort would yeeld to marry him; with a strange encounter of loues affects, and effects, that he by an affection sprong from excessiue beautie, should delight in horrible foulnesse; & she, of a vehement desire to haue him, should kindly build a resolution neuer to haue him: for truth is, that so in heart she loued him, as she could not find in her heart he should be tied to what was vnworthy of his presence.

Truly Sir, a very good Orator might haue a faire field to vse eloquence in, if he did but only repeate the lamentable, and truly affectionated speeches, while he coniured her by remembrance of her affection, & true oathes of his owne affection, not to make him so vnhappie, as to thinke he had not only lost her face, but her hart; that her face, when it was faireſt, had bene but as a marshall, to lodge the loue of her in his mind; which now was so well placed, as it needed no further helpe of any outward harbinger: beseeching her, euen with teares, to know, that his loue was not so superficiall, as to go no further then the skin; which yet now to him was most faire, since it was hers: how could he be so vngratefull, as to loue her the lesse for that which she had only receiued for his sake? that he neuer beheld it, but there in he saw the loueliness of her loue toward him: protesting vnto her, that he would neuer take ioy of his life, if he might not enioy her, for whom principally he was glad he had life. But (as I heard by one that ouerheard them) she (wringing him by the hand) made no other answere but this: my Lord (said she) God knowes I loue you: if I were Princesse of the whole world, and had withall, all the blessings that euer the world brought forth, I should not make delay, to lay my selfe, and them vnder your feete: or if I had continued but as I was, though (I must confesse) far vnworthy of you, yet wold I (with too great a ioy for my hart now to thinke of) haue accepted your vouchsafing me to be yours, and with faith and obedience would haue supplied all other defects. But first let me be much more miserable then I am, ere I match Argalus to such a Parthenia: Liue happy, deare Argalus, I giue you full liberty, and I beseech you take it; and I assure you I shal reioyce (whatsoeuer become of me) to see you so coupled, as may be fit, both for your honour & satisfaction. With that she burst out in crying and weeping, not able longer to containe her selfe from blaming her fortune, and wishing her owne death.

But Argalus with a moſt heauie hart ſtill purſuing his deſire, ſhe fixt of mind to auoid further intreatie, and to fly all company; which (euen of him) grew vnpleaſant vnto her; one night ſhe ſtole away: but whither, as yet is vnknowne, or indeede what is become of her.

Argalus ſought her long, and in many places: at length (diſpairing to find her, and the more he deſpaired, the more enraged) wearie of his life, but firſt determining to bee reuenged of Demagoras, hee went alone diſguiſed into the chiefe towne held by the Helots: where comming into his preſence, garded about by many of his ſouldiers, he could delay his furie no longer for a fitter time: but ſetting vpon him, in deſpight of a great many that helped him, gaue him diuerſe mortall wounds, and himſelfe (no queſtion) had bene there preſently murthered, but that Demagoras himſelfe deſired hee might be kept aliue; perchaunce with intention to feede his owne eyes with ſome cruell execution to bee layd vpon him, but death came ſooner then he lookt for; yet hauing had leiſure to appoint his ſucceſſor, a yong man, not long before deliuered out of the priſon of the King of Lacedæmon, where he ſhould haue ſuffered death for hauing ſlaine the kings Nephew: but him hee named, who at that time was abſent, making roades vpon the Lacedæmonians, but being returned, the reſt of the Helots, for the great liking they conceiued of that yong man, eſpecially becauſe they had none among themſelues to whom the others would yeeld, were content to follow Demagoras appointment. And well hath it ſucceeded with them, he hauing ſince done things beyond the hope of the yongeſt heads, of whom I ſpeake the rather, becauſe he hath hitherto preſerued Argalus aliue, vnder pretence to haue him publiquelie, and with exquiſite torments executed, after the ende of theſe warres, of which, they hope for a ſoone and proſperous iſſue.

And he hath likewiſe hitherto kept my young Lord Clitophon aliue, who (to redeeme his friend) went with certaine other noble men of Laconia, and forces gathered by them, to beſiege this young and new ſucceſſor: but hee iſſuing out (to the wonder of all men) defeated the Laconians, ſlue many of the noble men, and tooke Clitophon priſoner, whom with much a doe he keepeth aliue: the Helots being villanouſly cruel; but he tempereth them ſo ſometimes by following their humor, ſometimes by ſtriuing with it, that hitherto hee hath ſaued both their liues, but in different eſtates; Argalus being kept in a cloſe and hard priſon, Clitophon at ſome liberty. And now Sir, though (to ſay the truth) we can promiſe our ſelues litle of their ſafeties, while they are in the Helots hands, I haue deliuered all I vnderſtand touching the loſſe of my Lords ſonne, and the cauſe thereof: which, though it was not neceſſarie to Clitophons caſe, to be ſo particularlie told, yet the ſtrangeneſſe of it, made me thinke it would not be vnpleſant vnto you.

Palladius thanked him greatly for it, being euen paſſionatly delighted with hearing ſo ſtraunge an accident, of a knight ſo famous ouer the world, as Argalus, with whom he had himſelfe a long deſire to meete: ſo had fame powred a noble emulation in him towards him.

But thē (well bethinking himſelfe) he called for armour, deſiring them to prouide him of horſe & guide, and armed all ſauing the head, he wēt vp to Kalander, whom he found lying vpon the ground, hauing euer ſince baniſhed both ſleepe and foode, as enemies to the mourning, which paſſion perſwaded him was reaſonable. But Pallodius rayſed him vp, ſaying vnto him: No more, no more of this, my Lord Kalander; let vs labour to finde, before wee lament the loſſe: you knowe my ſelfe miſſe one,

one,who though he be not my ſonne,I would diſdaine the fauour of life after him: but while there is hope left, let not the weakeneſſe of ſorrow, make the ſtrength of it languiſh: take comfort, and good ſucceſſe will follow. And with thoſe words, comfort ſeemed to lighten in his eyes, and that in his face and geſture was painted victorie.Once, Kalanders ſpirits were ſo reuiued withall,that(receiuing ſome ſuſtenance,and taking a little reſt)he armed himſelfe, and thoſe few of his ſeruants he had left vnſent,and ſo himſelfe guided Palladius to the place vpon the frontiers; where already there were aſſembled betweene three & four thouſand men,all well diſpoſed (for Kalanders ſake)to abide any perill: but like men diſuſed with a long peace,more determinate to do, then skilfull how to do: luſtie bodies,and braue armours; with ſuch courage,as rather grew of deſpiſing their enemies,whom they knew not, then of any confidence for any thing which in themſel ues they knew; but neither cunning vſe of their weapons,nor art ſhewed in their marching,or in camping. Which Palladius ſoone perceiuing, hee deſired to vnderſtand (as much as could be deliuered vnto him) the eſtate of the Helots.

And he was anſwered by a man well acquainted with the affaires of Laconia, that they were a kind of people, who hauing bene of old, freemen and poſſeſſioners, the Lacedæmonians had conquered them,and laid, not only tribute,but bondage vpon them;which they had long borne;till of late the Lacedæmonians through greedineſſe growing more heauie then they could beare,and through contempt leſſe carefull how to make them beare, they had with a generall conſent (rather ſpringing by the generalneſſe of the cauſe, then of any artificiall practiſe) ſet themſelues in armes, and whetting their courage with reuenge, and grounding their reſolution vpon diſpaire, they had proceeded with vnlooked for ſucceſſe hauing already taken diuerſe Townes and Caſtels,with the ſlaughter of many of the gentrie;for whom no ſex nor age could be accepted for an excuſe. And that although at the firſt they had fought rather with beaſtly fury, then any ſouldierly diſcipline, practiſe had nowe made them comparable to the beſt of the Lacedæmonians,and more of late then euer; by reaſon, firſt of Demagoras a great Lord, who had made himſelfe of their party, and ſince his death,of another Captaine they had gotten,who had brought vp their ignorance, and brought downe their furie, to ſuch a meane of good gouernment, and withall led them ſo valourouſly,that(beſides the time wherein Clitophon was taken) they had the better in ſome other great conflicts: in ſuch wiſe,that the eſtate of Lacedæmon had ſent vnto them,offering peace with moſt reaſonable and honourable conditions.Palladius hauing gottē his generall knowledge of the party againſt whom,as he had already of the party for whom he was to fight,he went to Kalander, and told him plainly,that by plaine force, there was ſmall apparance of helping Clitophon: but ſome deuice was to be taken in hand,wherein no leſſe diſcretion then valour was to be vſed.

Whereupon,the counſell of the chiefe men was called, and at laſt, this way Palladius (who by ſome experience, but eſpecially by reading Hiſtories, was acquainted with ſtratagemes) inuented, and was by all the reſt approoued: that all the men there ſhould dreſſe themſelues like the pooreſt ſorte of the people in Arcadia, hauing no banners, but bloudie ſhirtes hanged vpon long ſtaues, with ſome bad bagge-pipes in ſtead of drumme and fiſe, their armour they ſhould aſwell as might bee, couer, or at leaſt make them looke ſo ruſtilie, and ill fauouredly as might well become ſuch wearers; and this the whole number ſhould do, ſauing two hundred of the beſt choſen Gentlemen, for courage and ſtrength, whereof Palladius himselfe would bee one, who should haue their armes chayned, and be put in cartes like prisoners. This being performed according to the agreement, they marched on towards the towne of Cardamila where Clitophon was Captaine; and being come two houres before Sunne-set within viewe of the walles, the Helots alreadie descrying their number, and beginning to sound the Allarum, they sent a cunning fellow (so much the cunninger as that he could maske it vnder rudenesse) who with such a kind of Rhetorike, as weeded out all flowers of Rhetorike, deliuered vnto the Helots assembled together, that they were countrie people of Arcadia, no lesse oppressed by their Lords, and no lesse desirous of libertie then they, and therefore had put themselues in the field, and had already (besides a great number slaine) taken nine or ten score Gentlemen prisoners whom they had there well and fast chained. Now because they had no strong retiring place in Arcadia, and were not yet of number enough to keepe the field against their Princes forces, they were come to them for succour; knowing that dayly more and more of their qualitie wold flocke vnto them, but that in the meane time, least their Prince should pursue them, or the Lacedæmonian King & Nobility (for the likenesse of the cause) fall vpon them, they desired that if there were not roome enough for them in the towne, that yet they might encampe vnder the walles, and for surety haue their prisoners (who were such men as were euer able to make their peace) kept within the towne.

The Helots made but a short cõsultatiõ, being glad that their cõtagion had spread it selfe into Arcadia, and making account that if the peace did not fall out betweene them and their King, that it was the best way to set fire in all the parts of Greece; besides their greedinesse to haue so many Gentlemen in their hands, in whose raunsomes they already meant to haue a share; to which hast of concluding, two things wel helped; the one, that their Captaine with the wisest of them, was at that time absent about cõfirming or breaking the peace with the state of Lacedæmon: the second, that ouer many good fortunes began to breede a proude reckelesnesse in thẽ: therfore sending to view the Campe, and finding that by their speach they were Arcadians, with whom they had had no warre, neuer suspecting a priuate mans credit could haue gathered such a force, and that all other tokens witnessed them to bee of the lowest calling (besides the chaines vpon the Gentlemen) they graunted not onely leaue for the prisoners, but for some others of the companie, and to all, that they might harbour vnder the walles. So opened they the gates, and receiued in the carts; which being done, and Palladius seeing fit time, hee gaue the signe, and shaking off their chaines (which were made with such arte, that though they seemed most strong and fast, he that ware them might easilie loose them) drewe their swordes hidden in the cartes, and so setting vpon the ward, made them to flye eitheir from the place, or from their bodies, and so giue entrie to all the force of the Arcadians before the Helots could make anie head to resist them.

But the Helots being men hardened against daungers, gathered (as well as they could) together in the market place, and thence would haue giuen a shrewd welcome to the Arcadians, but that Palladius (blaming those that were slow, hartning them that were forward, but especially with his owne example leading them) made such an impression into the squadron of the Helots, that at first the great body of them beginning to shake and stagger; at length, euery particular bodie recommended the protection of his life to his feete. Then Kalander cried to go to the prison, where he thought his sonne was, but Palladius wisht him (first scouring the streetes) to house all the Helots, and make themselues maister of the gates.

But

But ere that could bee accompliſhed, the Helots had gotten new heart, and with diuers ſortes of ſhot from corners of ſtreetes, and houſe windowes, galled them; which courage was come vnto them by the returne of their Captaine, who though he brought not many with him (hauing diſperſt moſt of his companies to other of his holds) yet meeting a great number running out of the gate, not yet poſſeſt by the Arcadians, he made them turne face, and with banners diſplayed, his Trumpet giue the lowdeſt teſtimonie he could of his returne; which once heard, the reſt of the Helots which were otherwiſe ſcattered, bent thitherward, with a new life of reſolution: as if their Captaine had been a roote, out of which (as into branches) their courage had ſprong. Then began the fight to grow moſt ſharpe, & the encounters of more cruell obſtinacie. The Arcadians fighting to keepe that they had woune; the Helots to recouer what they had loſt. The Arcadians, as in an vnknowne place, hauing no ſuccour but in their hands; the Helots, as in their owne place fighting for their liuings, wiues & children. There was victorie and courage againſt reuenge & diſpaire: ſafety of both ſides being no otherwiſe to be gotten, but by deſtruction.

At length, the left wing of the Arcadians began to looſe ground; which Palladius ſeeing, he ſtraight thruſt him ſelfe with his choiſe band againſt the throng that oppreſſed them, with ſuch an ouerflowing of valour, that the Captaine of the Helots (whoſe eies ſoone iudged of that wherewith themſelues were gouerned) ſawe that he alone was worth al the reſt of the Arcadians. Which he ſo wondred at, that it was hard to ſay, whether he more liked his doings, or miſliked the effects of his doings: but determining that vpon that caſt the game lay, and diſdaining to fight with any other, ſought only to ioyne with him: which minde was no leſſe in Palladius, hauing eaſily marked, that he was as the firſt mouer of all the other hands. And ſo their thoughts meeting in one point, they conſented (though not agreed) to trie each others fortune: and ſo drawing themſelues to be the vttermoſt of the one ſide, they began a combat, which was ſo much inferior to the battaile in noiſe and number, as it was ſurpaſſing it in brauerie of fighting, & (as it were) delightful terriblenes. Their courage was guided with skill, and their skill was armed with courage; neither did their hardineſſe darken their wit, nor their wit coole their hardineſſe: both valiant, as men deſpiſing death; both confident, as vnwonted to be ouercome; yet doubtful by their preſent feeling, and reſpectfull by what they had alreadie ſeene. Their feete ſtedie, their hands diligent, their eyes watchfull, and their harts reſolute. The partes either not armed, or weakly armed, were well knowne, and according to the knowledge ſhould haue bene ſharply viſited, but that the anſwere was as quick as the obiection. Yet ſome lightning; the ſmart bred rage, and the rage bred ſmart againe: till both ſides beginning to wax faint, and rather deſirous to die accompanied, then hopefull to liue victorious, the Captaine of the Helots with a blow, whoſe violence grew of furie, not of ſtrength, or of ſtrength proceeding of furie, ſtrake Palladius vpō the ſide of the head, that he reeled aſtonied: and withall the helmet fell off, he remaining bare headed: but other of the Arcadians were readie to ſhield him from any harme might riſe of that nakednes ſe.

But little needed it, for his chiefe enemie in ſteed of purſuing that aduantage, kneeled down, offering to deliuer the pommel of his ſword, in tokē of yelding, withal ſpeaking alowd vnto him, that he thought it more liberty to be his priſoner, then any others General. Palladius ſtāding vpō himſelf, & miſdoubting ſome craft, & the Helots (that were next their captain) wauering between looking for ſome ſtratagem, or fearing treſō; what, ſaid the captain, hath Palladius forgotē the voice of Daiphātus?

By that watch word Palladius knew that it was his onely friend Pyrocles, whom he had loſt vpon the Sea, and therefore both moſt full of wonder, ſo to be met, if they had not bene fuller of ioy then wonder, cauſed the retrait to be ſounded, Daiphantus by authoritie and Palladius by perſwaſion; to which helped well the little aduantage that was of either ſide: and that of the Helots partie their Captaines behauiour had made as many amazed as ſawe or heard of it: and of the Arcadian ſide the good old Kalander ſtriuing more then his old age could atchiue, was newly taken priſoner. But in deede the chiefe parter of the fray was the night, which with her black armes pulled their malicious ſights one from the other. But he that tooke Kalander, meant nothing leſſe then to ſaue him, but onely ſo long, as the Captaine might learne the enemies ſecrets; towards whom he led the old Gentleman, when he cauſed the retreit to be ſounded: looking for no other deliuerie from that captiuitie, but by the painfull taking away of all paine: when, whom ſhould he ſee next to the Captaine (with good tokens how valiantly he had fought that day againſt the Arcadians) but his ſonne Clitophon? But now the Captaine had cauſed all the principall Helots to be aſſembled, as well to deliberate what they had to do, as to receiue a meſſage from the Arcadians; Among whom Palladius vertue (beſides the loue Kalander bare him) hauing gotten principall authoritie, hee had perſwaded them to ſeeke rather by parley to recouer the Father and the Sonne, then by the ſworde: ſince the goodnes of the Captaine aſſured him that way to ſpeede, and his value (wherewith he was of old acquainted) made him thinke any other way dangerous. This therefore was done in orderly maner, giuing them to vnderſtand, that as they came but to deliuer Clitophon, ſo offering to leaue the footing, they alreadie had in the towne, to goe away without any further hurt, ſo as they might haue the father and the ſonne without raunſome deliuered. Which conditions being heard and conceiued by the Helots, Daiphantus perſwaded them without delay to accept them. For firſt (ſaid he) ſince the ſtrife is within our owne home, if you looſe, you looſe all that in this life can be deare vnto you: if you winne, it will be a bloudie victorie with no profit, but the flattering in our ſelues that ſame bad humour of reuenge. Beſides, it is like to ſtirre Arcadia vpon vs, which now, by vſing theſe perſons well, may be brought to ſome amitie. Laſtly, but eſpecially, leaſt the king & nobilitie of Laconia (with whom now we haue made a perfect peace) ſhould hope by occaſion of this quarrel to ioyn the Arcadians with them, and ſo breake off the profitable agreement alreadie concluded. In ſumme, as in all deliberations (waying the profit of the good ſucceſſe with the harme of the euil ſucceſſe) you ſhall finde this way moſt ſafe and honorable.

The Helots as much moued by his authoritie, as perſwaded by his reaſons, were content therewith. Whereupon, Palladius tooke order that the Arcadians ſhould preſently march out of the towne, taking with them their priſoners, while the night with mutuall diffidence might keepe them quiet, and ere day came they might be well on of their way, and ſo auoid thoſe accidents which in late enemies, a looke, a word, or a particular mans quarell might engender. This being on both ſides concluded on, Calander and Clitophon, who now (with infinite ioy did knowe each other) came to kiſſe the hands and feete of Daiphantus: Clitophon telling his father, how Daiphantus (not without danger to himſelfe) had preſerued him from the furious malice of the Helots: and euen that day going to conclude the peace (leaſt in his abſence he might receiue ſome hurt) he had taken him in his companie, and geuen him armour, vpon promiſe he ſhould take the part of the Helots; which he had in this fight performed, litle knowing that it was againſt his father; but (ſaid Clitophon) here is he, who (as a father) hath new begotten me, and (as a God) hath saued me from many deathes, which already layed hold on me: which Kalander with teares of ioy acknowledged (besides his owne deliuerance) onely his benefite. But Daiphantus, who loued doing well for it selfe, and not for thankes, brake off those ceremonies, desiring to know how Palladius (for so he called Musidorus) was come into that companie, and what his present estate was; whereof receiuing a briefe declaration of Kalander, he sent him word by Clitophon, that he should not as now come vnto him, because he held himselfe not so sure a maister of the Helots mindes, that he would aduenture him in their power, who was so well knowne with an vnfriendly acquaintance, but that he desired him to returne with Kalander, whither also he within few dayes (hauing dispatched himselfe of the Helots) would repaire. Kalander would needes kisse his hand againe for that promise, protesting he would esteeme his house more blessed then a temple of the gods, if it had once receiued him. And then desiring pardon for Argalus. Daiphantus assured them that he would die but he would bring him (though till then kept in close prison, indeede for his safety, the Helots being so animated against him as else he could not haue liued) and so taking their leaue of him, Kalander, Clitophon, Palladius and the rest of the Arcadians swearing that they would no further in ia any sort molest the Helots, they straight way marched out of the towne, carying both their dead and wounded bodies with them; and by morning were already within the limits of Arcadia.

The Helots of the other side shutting their gates, gaue thēselues to bury their dead, to cure their wounds, and rest their wearied bodies: till (the next day bestowing the cheerefull vse of the light vpon them) Daiphantus making a generall conuocation spake vnto them in this maner. We are first (sayd he) to thanke the Gods, that (further then wee had either cause to hope; or reason to imagine) haue deliuered vs out of this gulfe of daunger, wherein we were already swallowed. For all being lost, (had they not directed, my returne so iust as they did) it had bene too late to recouer that, which being had, wee could not keepe. And had I not happened to know one of the principall men among them, by which meanes the truce began betweene vs, you may easily conceiue, what litle reason we haue to thinke, but that either by some supply out of Arcadia, or from the Nobilitie of this Country (who would haue made fruits of wisedome grow out of this occasion) we should haue had our power turned to ruine, our pride to repentance and sorrow. But now the storme, as it fell, so it ceased: and the error committed, in retaining Clitophon more hardly then his age or quarrel deserued, becomes a sharply learned experience, to vse in other times more moderation.

Now haue I to deliuer vnto you the conclusion betweene the kings with the Nobilitie of Lacedæmon, and you; which is in all points as your selues desired: aswell for that you would haue graunted, as for the assurance of what is graunted. The Townes and Fortes you presently haue, are still left vnto you, to be kept either with or without garrison, so as you alter not the lawes of the Countrie, and pay such duties as the rest of the Laconians do: Your selues are made by publique decree, free men, and so capable both to giue and receiue voice in election of Magistrates. The distinction of names betweene Helots and Lacedæmonians to bee quite taken away, and all indifferently to enioy both names of priuiledges of Laconians. Your children to be brought vp with theirs in the Spartane discipline: and so you (framing your selues to bee good members of that estate) to bee hereafter fellowes, and no longer seruants.

Which conditions you see, cary in themselues no more contention then assurance. For this is not a peace which is made with them, but this is a peace by which you are made of them. Lastly a forgetfulnesse decreed of all what is past, they shewing themselues glad to haue so valiant men as you are, ioyned with them, so that you are to take mindes of peace, since the cause of warre is finished; and as you hated them before like oppressours, so now to loue them as brothers; to take care of their estate because it is yours, and to labour by vertuous doing, that the posteritie may not repent your ioyning. But now one Article onely they stood vpon, which in the end I with your commissioners haue agreed vnto, that I should no more tarry here, mistaking perchance my humor, and thinking me as seditious as I am young, or else it is the king Amiclas procuring, in respect that it was my ill hap to kill his Nephew Eurileon; but how so euer it be; I haue condiscended. But so will not we, cried almost the whole assemblie, counselling one another, rather to try the vttermost euent, then to loose him by whom they had beene victorious. But he as well with generall orations, as particular dealing with the men of most credit, made them throughly see how necessary it was to preferre such an oportunitie before a vaine affection; but yet could not preuaile, till openly he sware, that hee would (if at any time the Lacedæmonians brake this treatie) come backe againe, and be their Captaine.

So then after a few daies, setting them in perfect order, he tooke his leaue of them, whose eyes bad him farewell with teares, and mouthes with kissing the places where he stept, and after making temples vnto him as to a demi-God: thinking it beyond the degree of humanitie to haue a wit so farre ouergoing his age, and such dreadfull terror proceede from so excellent beautie. But he for his sake obtained free pardon for Argalus, whom also (vpon oath neuer to beare armes against the Helots) hee deliuered: and taking onely with him certaine principall Iewels of his owne, hee would haue parted alone with Argalus (whose countenance well shewed, while Parthenia was lost he counted not himselfe deliuered) but that the whole multitude wold needes gard him into Arcadia. Where againe leauing them all to lament his departure, hee by enquirie got to the well-knowne house of Kalander: There was hee receiued with louing ioye of Kalander, with ioyfull loue of Palladius, with humble (though dolefull) demeanor of Argalus (whom specially both he and Palladius regarded) with gratefull seruiceablenes of Clitophon, & honourable admiration of all. For being now well viewed to haue no haire on his face, to witnesse him a man, who had done acts beyond the degree of a man, and to looke with a certaine almost bashfull kinde of modestie, as if he feared the eyes of men, who was vnmooued with sight of the most horrible countenances of death; and as if nature had mistaken her worke to haue a Marses heart in a Cupids bodie: All that beheld him (and all that might behold him, did behold him) made their eyes quicke messengers to their minds, that there they had seene the vttermost that in mankind might be seene. The like wonder Palladius had before stirred, but that Daiphantus, as younger and newer come, had gotten now the aduantage in the moyst and fickle impression of eye-sight. But while all men (sauing poore Argalus) made the ioy of their eyes speake for their hearts towards Daiphantus: Fortune (that belike was bid to that banket, and meant then to play the good fellow) brought a pleasant aduenture among them. It was that as they had newly dined, there came in to Kalander a messenger, that brought him word, a yong noble Lady, neare kinswoman to the faire Helen Queene of Corinth, was come thither thither, and desired to be lodged in his house. Calander (most glad of such an occasion, went out, and all his other worthy guests with him, saving onely Argalus, who remained in his chamber, desirous that this company were once broken vp, that he might goe in his solitarie quest after Parthenia. But when they met this Lady; Kalander straight thought he saw his neece Parthenia, and was about in such familiar sort to haue spoken vnto her: but she in graue and honourable manner giuing him to vnderstand that he was mistaken, he halfe athamed excused himselfe with the exceeding likenesse was betweene them, though indeede it seemed that this Lady was of the more pure and daintie complexion; she sayd, it might very well be, hauing bene many times taken one for another. But assoone as she was brought into the house, before she would rest her, she desired to speake with Argalus publikely, who she heard was in the house. Argalus came hastilie, and as hastilie thought as Kalander had done, with sudden changes of ioy into sorrow. But she when she had staid their thoughts with telling them her name and qualitie, in this sort spake vnto him. My Lord Argalus, sayd she, being of late left in the Court of Queene Helen of Corinth, as chiefe in her absence (she being vpon some occasion gone thence) there came vnto me the Lady Parthenia, so disfigured, as I thinke Greece hath nothing so ougly to behold. For my part, it was many daies, before with vehement oathes, and some good proofes, she could make me thinke that she was Parthenia. Yet at last finding certainely it was she, and greatly pitying her misfortune, so much the more, as that all men had euer told me (as now you do) of the great likenesse betweene vs, I tooke the best care I could of her: and of her vnderstood the whole tragicall historie of her vndeserued aduenture: and therewithall, of that most noble constancy in you my Lord Argalus: which whosoeuer loues not, shewes himselfe to be a hater of vertue, and vnworthy to liue in the societie of mankind. But no outward cherishing could salue the inward sore of her mind, but a few daies since she died: before her death earnestly desiring, and perswading me, to thinke of no husband but of you; as of the only man in the world worthy to be loued, withall she gaue me this Ring to deliuer you; desiring you, and by the authoritie of loue commanding you, that the affection you bare her, you should turne to me: assuring you, that nothing can please her soule more, then to see you and me matched together. Now my L. though this office be not (perchance) sutable to my estate nor sex, who should rather looke to be desired; yet, an extraordinary desert requires an extraordinary proceeding: and therefore I am come (with faithfull loue built vpon your worthinesse) to offer my selfe, and to beseech you to accept the offer: and if these noble Gentlemen present will say it is great folly, let them withal, say it is great loue. And then she staid, earnestly attending Argalus his answere, who first making most harty sighes do such obsequies as he could to Parthenia, thus answered her.

Madame (sayd hee) infinitly am I bound vnto you, for this, no more rare then noble courtesie; but most bound for the goodnesse I perceiue you shewed to the Lady Parthenia (with that the teares ranne downe his eyes; but hee followed on) and as much as so vnfortunate a man, fit to bee the spectacle of miserie, can doe you seruice; determine you haue made a purchase of a slaue (while I liue) neuer to fayle you. But this great matter you propose vnto me, wherein I am not so blind as not to see what happinesse it shold be vnto me; Excellent Lady, know, that if my hart were mine to giue, you before all other should haue it; but Parthenias it is though dead: there I began, there I ende all matter of affection: I hope I shall not long tarry after her, with whose beautie if I had onely bene in loue, I should be so with you, who haue the ſame beautie: but it was Parthenias ſelfe I loued, and loue; which no likeneſſe can make one; no commandement diſſolue, no foulneſſe defile, nor no death finiſh. And ſhall I receiue (ſaid ſhe) ſuch diſgrace, as to be refuſed? Noble Lady (ſaid he) let not that hard word be vſed; who know your exceeding worthineſſe farre beyond my deſert: but it is onely happineſſe I refuſe, ſince of the onely happineſſe I could and can deſire, I am refuſed.

He had ſcarce ſpoken thoſe words, when ſhe ranne to him, and imbracing him, why then Argalus (ſaid ſhe) take thy Parthenia; and Parthenia it was indeede. But becauſe ſorrow forbad him too ſoone to beleeue, ſhe told him the truth, with all circumſtances; how being parted alone, meaning to die in ſome ſolitary place, as ſhe hapned to make her complaint, the Queene Helen of Corinth (who likewiſe felt her part of miſeries) being then walking alſo alone in that lonely place, heard her, and neuer left till ſhe had knowne the whole diſcourſe. Which the noble Queene greatly pitying, ſhe ſent her to a Phiſition of hers the moſt excellent man in the world, in hope he could helpe her: which in ſuch ſort as they ſaw he had performed, and ſhe taking with her of the Queenes ſeruants, thought yet to make this triall, whether he would quickly forget his true Parthenia, or no. Her ſpeech was confirmed by the Corinthian Gentlemen, who before had kept her counſell, and Argalus eaſily perſwaded to what more then ten thouſand yeares of life he deſired: and Kalander would needes haue the mariage celebrated in his houſe, principally the longer to hold his deare gueſts, towards whom he was now (beſides his owne habite of hoſpitalitie) caried with loue and duty: and therefore omitted no ſeruice that his wit could inuent, and his power miniſter.

But no way he ſaw he could ſo much pleaſure them, as by leauing the two friends alone, who being ſhrunke aſide to the banquetting houſe where the pictures were; there Palladius recounted vnto him, that after they had both abandoned the burning ſhip (& either of them taken ſome thing vnder him, the better to ſupport him to the ſhore) hee knew not how, but either with ouer-labouring in the fight, and ſudden cold, or the too much receiuing of ſalt water, he was paſt himſelfe: but yet holding faſt (as the nature of dying men is to do) the cheſt that was vnder him, he was caſt on the ſands, where he was taken vp by a couple of ſhepheards, and by them brought life againe, and kept from drowning himſelfe, when hee deſpaired of his ſafetie. How after hauing failed to take him into the fiſher boate, he had by the ſhepheards perſwaſion come to this Gentlemans houſe; where being dangerouſlie ſicke, hee had yeelded to ſeeke the recouery of health, onely for that hee might the ſooner goe ſeeke the deliuerie of Pyrocles: to which purpoſe Kalander by ſome friends of his in Meſſena, had alreadie ſet a ſhippe or two abroad, when this accident of Clitophons taking had ſo bleſſedly procured their meeting. Then did he ſet foorth vnto him the noble intertainment and carefull cheriſhing of Kalander towards him, and ſo vpon occaſion of the pictures preſent, deliuered with the franknes of a friends tongue, as neare as he could, word by word what Kalander had told him touching the ſtrange ſtory (with all the particularities belonging) of Arcadia, which did in many ſorts ſo delight Pyrocles to heare; that hee would needes haue much of it againe repeated, and was not contented till Kalander himſelfe had anſwered him diuerſe queſtions.

But firſt at Muſidorus requeſt, though in briefe maner, his minde much running vpon the ſtrange ſtorie of Arcadia, he did declare by what courſe of aduentures he was come to make vp their mutuall happineſſe in meeting. When (coſin ſaid he)

we had ſtript our ſelues, and were both leapt into the Sea, and ſwome a little toward the ſhoare, I found by reaſon of ſome wounds I had, that I ſhould not be able to get the land, and therefore turned backe againe to the maſt of ſhippe, where you found me, aſſuring my ſelfe, that if you came aliue to the ſhoare, you would ſeeke me; if you were loſt, as I thought it as good to periſh as to liue, ſo that place as good to periſh in as another. There I found my ſword among ſome of the ſrowds, withing (I muſt confeſſe) if I died, to bee found with that in my hand, and withall wauing it about my head, that ſaylers by, might haue the better glimpſe of me. There you miſſing mee, I was taken vp by Pyrates, who putting me vnder boord priſoner, preſently ſet vpon another ſhip and maintaining a long fight, in the end, put them all to the ſword. Amongſt whom I might heare them greatly praiſe one young man, who fought moſt valiantlie, whom (as loue is carefull, and misfortune ſubiect to doubtfulneſſe) I thought certainely to bee you. And ſo holding you as dead, from that time till the time I ſaw you, in truth I ſought nothing more then a noble end, which perchaunce made me more hardie then otherwiſe I would haue beene. Tryall whereof came within two dayes after: for the Kings of Lacedæmon hauing ſet out ſome Galleys, vnder the charge of one of their Nephewes, to ſcowre the Sea of the Pyrates, they met with vs, where our Captaine wanting men, was driuen to arme ſome of his priſoners, with promiſe of libertie for well fighting: among whom I was one, and being boorded by the Admirall, it was my fortune to kill Euryleon the Kings Nephew: but in the end they preuailed, and we were all taken priſoners: I not caring much what became of me (onely keeping the name of Daiphantus; according to the reſolution you know is betweene vs) but being laid in the iayle of Tenaria, with ſpeeciall hate to me for the death of Euryleon, the popular ſort of that towne conſpired with the Helots, and ſo by night opened them the gates; where entring and killing all of the gentle and rich faction, for honeſtie ſake brake open all priſons, and ſo deliuered me: and I mooued with gratefulneſſe, and encouraged with careleſneſſe of life ſo behaued my ſelfe in ſome conflicts they had with in few dayes, that they barbarouſlie thinking vnſenſible wonders of mee, and with all ſo much the better truſting mee, as they heard I was hated of the King of Lacedæmon, their chiefe Captaine being ſlaine, as you know by the noble Argalus (who helped thereunto by his perſwaſion) hauing borne a great affection vnto mee, and to auoide the daungerous emulation which grew among the chiefe, who ſhould haue the place, and alſo affected, as rather to haue a ſtraunger then a competitour, they elected mee (God wot little proude of that dignity;) reſtoring vnto me ſuch things of mine as being taken firſt by the Pyrates, and then by the Lacedæmonians, they had gotten in the ſacke of the towne. Now being in it, ſo good was my ſucceſſe with many victories, that I made a peace for them to their owne liking the very day that you deliuered Clitophon, whom I with much a do had preſerued. And in my peace the King Amiclas of Lacedæmon would needes haue mee baniſhed, and depriued of the dignitie whereunto I was exalted: which (and you may ſee how much you are bound to mee) for your ſake I was content to ſuffer, a new hope riſing in mee, that you were not dead: and ſo meaning to trauaile ouer the world to ſeeke you; and now heere (my deare Muſidorus) you haue mee. And with that (embracing and kiſſing each other) they called Kalander, of whom Daiphantus deſired to heare the full ſtorie, which before hee had recounted to Palladius, and to ſee the letter of Philanax, which hee read and well marked.

But within some dayes after, the marriage betweene Argalus and the faire Parthenia being to be celebrated Daiphantus and Palladius selling some of their Iewels, furnished themselues of very faire apparell, meaning to do honour to their louing host; who as much for their sakes, as for the marriage, set foorth each thing in most gorgeous manner. But all the cost bestowed did not so much enrich, nor all the fine deckings so much beautifie, nor all the daintie deuises so much delight, as the faire-nesse of Parthenia, the pearle of all the maides of Mantinea: who as she went to the Temple to be maried, her eyes themselues seemed a temple, wherein loue and beautie were married: her lips though they were kept close with modest silence, yet with a prety kind of naturall swelling, they seemed to inuite the guests that lookt on them, her cheekes blushing, and withall when she was spoken vnto, a little smiling, were like roses, when their leaues are with a little breath stirred: her haire being laied at the full length downe her backe, bare shew as if the voward fayled, yet that would conquer. Daiphantus marking her, ô Iupiter (said he speaking to Palladius) how happens it, that beautie is onely confined to Arcadia? But Palladius not greatly attending his speech, some daies were continued in the solemnizing the marriage, with all conceipts that might deliuer delight to mens fancies.

But such a chaunge was growne in Daiphantus, that (as if cheerefulnesse had bene tediousnesse, & good entertainement were turnd to discourtesie) he would euer get himselfe alone, though almost when he was in company, he was alone, so little attention he gaue to any that spake vnto him: euen the colour and figure of his face began to receiue some alteration; which he shewed little to heede: but euery morning earely going abroad, either to the garden, or to some woods towards the desert, it seemed his onely comfort was to be without a comforter. But long it could not be hid from Palladius, whom true loue made ready to marke, and long knowledge able to marke; and therefore being now growne weary of his abode in Arcadia, hauing informed himselfe fully of the strength and riches of the country, of the nature of the people, and maner of their lawes: and seeing the court could not be visited, prohibited to all men, but to certaine shepheardish people, he greatly desired a speedie returne to his owne countrie, after the many mazes of fortune he had troden. But perceiuing this great alteration in his friend, he thought first to breake with him thereof; and then to hasten his returne; whereto he found him but smally enclined: whereupon one day taking him alone with certaine graces and countenances, as if he were disputing with the trees, began in this manner to say vnto him.

A mind well trained and long exercised in vertue (my sweete and worthie cosin) doth not easily chaunge any course it once vndertakes, but vpon well grounded and well waied causes. For being witnesse to it selfe of his owne inward good, it findes nothing without it of so high a price, for which it should be altered. Euen the very countenance and behauiour of such a man doth shew forth Images of the same constancy, by maintaining a right harmonie betwixt it and the inward good, in yeelding it selfe sutable to the vertuous resolution of the mind. This speech I direct to you (noble friend Pyrocles) the excellencie of whose mind and well chosen course in vertue, if I do not sufficiently know, hauing seene such rare demonstrations of it, it is my weakenesse, and not your vnworthinesse, but as in deede I know it, and knowing it most dearely loue both it, and him that hath it; so must I needes say, that since our late comming into this countrie, I haue marked in you, I will not say an alteration, but a relenting truly, and a slacking of the maine career, you had so notably begun & almost performed; and that in such sort, as I cannot find sufficient reason in my great loue toward you how to allow it, for (to leaue off other secreter arguments which my acquaintance with you makes me easilie find) this in effect to any man may be manifest, that whereas you were wont in all places you came, to giue your selfe vehemently to the knowledge of those things which might better your mind; to seeke the familiaritie of excellent men in learning and souldierie: and lastly, to put all these things in practise both by continuall wise proceeding, and worthie enterprises, as occasion fell for them; you now leaue all these things vndone: you let your mind fall asleepe: beside your countenance troubled (which surely comes not of vertue) for vertue like the cleare heauē is without clouds)' & lastly you subiect your selfe to solitarines, the slie enemy, that doth most separate a man from well doing. Pyrocles mind was al this while so fixed vpon another deuotion, that he no more attentiuely marked his friends discourse, then the child that hath leaue to play, markes the last part of his lesson; or the diligēt Pilot in a dangerous tēpest doth attēd the vnskilfull words of a passinger: yet the very sound hauing imprinted the generall points of his speech in his hart, pierced with any mislike of so deerely an esteemed friēd, & desirous by degrees to bring him to a gentler consideration of him, with a shamefast looke (witnessing he rather could not helpe, then did not know his fault) answered him to this purpose. Excellent Musidorus, in the praise you gaue me in the beginning of your speech, I easily acknowledge the force of your good will vnto me, for neither could you haue thought so well of me, if extremitie of loue had not made your iudgement partiall, nor you could haue loued me so intirely, if you had not bene apt to make so great (though vndeserued) iudgements of me; and euen so must I say to those imperfections, to which though I haue euer through weaknes bene subiect, yet you by the dayly mending of your mind haue of late bin able to looke into them, which before you could not discerne; so that the change you speake of, falles not out by my impairing, but by your bettering. And yet vnder the leaue of your better iudgement, I must needes say thus much, my deare cosin, that I find not my selfe wholie to be condemned, becaue I do not with continuall vehemency folow those knowledges, which you call the bettering of my mind; for both the mind it selfe must (like other things) sometimes be vnbent, or else it wil be either weakned, or broken: And these knowledges, as they are of good vse, so are they not all the minde may stretch it selfe vnto: who knowes whether I feede not my minde with higher thoughts? Truely, as I know not all the particularities, so yet I see the bounds of all these knowledges: but the workings of the mind I find much more infinite, then can be led vnto by the eie, or imagined by any, that distract their thoughts without themselues.

And in such contemplation, or as I thinke more excellent, I enioy my solitarinesse; & my solitarines perchance, is the nurse of these cōtemplations. Eagles we see flie alone; & they are but sheepe, which alwayes heard together; condemne not therfore my mind sometimes to enioy it selfe; nor blame not the taking of such times as serue most fit for it. And alas, deare Musidorous, if I bee sadde, who knowes better then you the iust causes I haue of sadnesse? And here Pyrocles suddenly stopped, like a man vnsatisfied in himselfe, though his wit might well haue serued to haue satisfied another. And so looking with a countenance, as though hee desired hee should know his mind without hearing him speake, and yet desirous to speake, to breath out some part of his inward euill, sending againe new bloud to his face, he continued his speech in this manner. And Lord (deare cosin, said he) doth not the pleasantnesse of this place carry in it selfe sufficient reward for any time lost in it? Do you not see how all things conspire together to make this countrie a heauenly dwelling? Do you not ſee the graſſe, how in colour they excell the Emeralds, euery one ſtriuing to paſſe his fellow, and yet they are all kept of an equall height? And ſee you not the reſt of theſe beautifull flowers, each of which would require a mans wit to know, & his life to expres? Do not theſe ſtately trees ſeeme to maintaine their floriſhing old age with the only happineſſe of their ſeat, being clothed with a continual ſpring, becauſe no beautie here ſhould euer fade? Doth not the aire breath health, which the birds (delightful both to eare and eye) do dayly ſolemnize with the ſweete conſent of their voices? Is not euery Eccho thereof a perfect Muſicke? & theſe freſh & delightfull brookes how ſlowly they ſlide away, as loth to leaue the company of ſo many things vnited in perfection? & with how ſweete a murmure they lament their forced departure? Certainely, certainely, coſin, it muſt needs be that ſome Goddeſſe inhabiteth this Region, who is the ſoule of this ſoyle: for neither is anie leſſe then a Goddeſſe, worthie to be ſhrined in ſuch a heape of pleaſures: nor anie leſſe then a Goddeſſe could haue made it ſo perfect a plotte of the celeſtiall dwellings. And ſo ended with a deepe ſigh, rewfully caſting his eye vpon Muſidorus as more deſirous of pitie then pleading. But Muſidorus had all this while held his looke fixed vpon Pyrocles countenance; and with no leſſe louing attention marked how his words proceeded from him: but in both theſe he perceiued ſuch ſtrange diuerſities, that they rather increaſed new doubts, then gaue him ground to ſettle anie iudgement: for beſides his eyes ſometimes euen great with teares, the oft changing of his colour, with a kind of ſhaking vnſtayedneſſe ouer all his body, he might ſee in his countenance ſome great determination mixed with feare; and might perceiue in him ſtore of thoughts, rather ſtirred then digeſted; his words interrupted continually with ſighes (which ſerued as a burthen to each ſentence) and the tenor of his ſpeech (though of his wonted phraſe) not knit together to one conſtant end, but rather diſſolued in it ſelfe, as the vehemency of the inward paſſion preuailed: which made Muſidorus frame his aunſwere neareſt to that humor, which ſhould ſooneſt put out the ſecret. For hauing in the beginning of Pyrocles ſpeech which defended his ſolitarines, framed in his mind a replie againſt it, in the praiſe of honourable action, in ſhewing that ſuch a kind of contemplation is but a glorious title to idleneſſe; that in action a man didnot onely better himſelfe but benefit others; that the gods would not haue deliuered a ſoule into the body, which hath armes and legges, only inſtruments of doing, but that it were intended the mind ſhould imploy them, and that the mind ſhould beſt know his owne good or euill by practiſe, which knowledge was the onely way to increaſe the one, and correct the other: beſides many other argumentes, which the plentifulneſſe of the matter yeelded to the ſharpeneſſe of his wit. When hee found Pyrocles leaue that, and fall into ſuch an affected praiſing of the place, hee left it likewiſe, and ioyned with him therein: becauſe he found him in that humor vtter more ſtore of paſſion; and euen thus kindly embracinghim, he ſaid: Your words are ſuch (noble coſin) ſoſweetly and ſtrongly handled in the praiſe of ſolitarineſſe, as they would make me likewiſe yeeld my ſelfe vp into it, but that the ſame words make me know, it is more pleaſant to enioy the companie of him that can ſpeake ſuch words, then by ſuch words to be perſwaded to follow ſolitarineſſe. And euen ſo do I giue you leaue (ſweete Pyrocles euer to defend ſolitarineſſe, ſo long as to defend it, you euer keepe companie. But I marueil at the exceſſiue praiſes you giue to this country; in truth it is not vnpleaſant: but yet if you would returne into Macedon, you ſhould either ſee many heauens, or find this no more then earthly. And euen Tempe in my Theſſalia (where you and

I to my great happineſſe were brought vp together) is nothing inferiour vnto it. But I thinke you will make mee ſee, that the vigor of your wit can ſhew it ſelfe in any ſubiect: or elſe you feede ſometimes your ſolitarineſſe with the conceipts of the Poets, whoſe liberall pennes can as eaſily trauaile ouer mountaines, as molehils: and ſo like well diſpoſed men, ſet vp euery thing to the higheſt note; eſpecially, when they put ſuch words in the mouthes of one of theſe fantaſtical mind-infected people, that children & Muſitians call Louers. This word, Louer, did no leſſe pierce poore Pyrocles, then the right tune of muſicke toucheth him that is ſicke of the Tarantula. There was not one part of his body, that did not feele a ſudden motion, while his hart with panting, ſeemed to daunce to the ſonnd of that word, yet after ſome pauſe (lifting vp his eyes a little from the ground, and yet not daring to place them in the eyes of Muſidorus) armed with the very countenance of the poore priſoner at the barre, whoſe anſwer is nothing but guiltie: with much a do he brought foorth this queſtion. And alas, ſayd he, deare coſin, what if I be not ſo much the Poet (the freedome of whoſe pen can exerciſe it ſelfe in any thing) as euen that miſerable ſubiect of his cunning, whereof you ſpeake? Now the eternall Gods forbid (mainely cryed out Muſidorus) that euer my eare ſhould be poyſoned with ſo euill newes of you. O let me neuer know that any baſe affection ſhould get any Lordſhip in your thoughts. But as he was ſpeaking more, Kalander came, and brake off their diſcourſe, with inuiting them to the hunting of a goodly ſtagge, which being harboured in a wood thereby, he hoped would make them good ſport, and driue away ſome part of Daiphantus melancholy. They condiſcended, and ſo going to their lodgings, furniſhed themſelues as liked them, Daiphantus writing a few words which he left ſealed in a letter againſt their returne.

Then went they together abroad, the good Kalander entertaining them with pleaſant diſcourſing, how well he loued the ſport of hunting, when he was a yong man, how much in the compariſon thereof he diſdained all chamber delights, that the Sunne (how great a iourney ſoeuer he had to make) could neuer preuent him with earlineſſe, nor the Moone (with her ſober countenance) diſſwade him from watching till midnight for the deares feeding. O, ſayd he, you will neuer liue to my age, without you keepe your ſelues in breath with exerciſe, and in heart with ioyfulneſſe: too much thinking doth conſume the ſpirits, and oft it falles out, that while one thinks too much of his doing, he leaues to doe the effect of his thinking. Then ſpared he not to remember, how much Arcadia was chaunged ſince his youth: actiuitie and good fellowſhip being nothing in the price it was then held in, but according to the nature of the old growing world, ſtill worſe and worſe. Then would he tell them ſtories of ſuch gallants as he had knowne: and ſo with pleaſant company beguiled the times haſt, and ſhortned the wayes length, till they came to the ſide of the wood, where the hounds were in couples ſtaying their comming, but with a whining accent craning libertie: many of them in colour and markes ſo reſembling, that it ſhewed they were of one kind. The huntſmen handſomely attired in their greene liueries, as though they were children of Summer, with ſtaues in their hands to beate the guiltleſſe earth, when the houndes were at a fault, and with hornes about their neckes, to ſound an alarum vpon a ſillie fugitiue. The hounds were ſtraight vncoupled, and ere long the Stagge thought it better to truſt to the nimbleneſſe of his feete, then to the ſlender fortification of his lodging: but euen his feete, betraied him; for howſoeuer they went, they themſelues vttered themſelues to the ſent of their enemies; who one taking it of another, and ſometimes beleeuing the windes aduertiſements, ſometimes the view of (their faithfull counſellers) the huntſmen, with open mouthes then denounced warre, when the warre was already begun. Their crie being compoſed of ſo well ſorted mouthes, that any man would perceiue therein ſome kind of proportion, but the skilfull woodmen did find a muſicke. Then delight and varietie of opinion drew the horſemen ſundrie wayes; yet cheering their houndes with voyce and horne, kept ſtill (as it were) together. The wood ſeemed to conſpire with them againſt his owne citizens, diſperſing their noiſe through all his quarters, and euen the Nimph Eccho left to bewaile the loſſe of Narciſſus, and became a hunter. But the Stagge was in the end ſo hotly purſued, that (leauing his flight hee was driuen to make courage of diſpaire; and ſo turning his head, made the hounds (with change of ſpeech) to teſtifie that he was at a bay: as if from hot purſuite of their enemy, they were ſuddenly come to a parley.

But Kalander (by his skill of coaſting the countrey) was a mong the firſt that came in to the beſieged Dere; whom when ſome of the younger ſort would haue killed with their ſwordes, he would not ſuffer: but with a Croſſe-bow ſent a death to the poore beaſt, who with teares ſhewed the vnkindneſſe he tooke of mans crueltie.

But by the time that the whole company was aſſembled, and that the Stagge had beſtowed him ſelfe liberally among them that had killed him, Daiphantus was miſt, for whom Palladius carefully enquiring, no newes could bee giuen him, but by one that ſayd, he thought hee was returned home; for that hee markt him, in the chiefe of the hunting, take a by way, which might leade to Kalanders houſe. That anſwere for the time ſatisfying, and they hauing perfourmed all duties, as well for the Stagges funerall, as the hounds triumph, they returned: ſome talking of the fatneſſe of the Deares body; ſome of the faireneſſe of his head; ſome of the hounds cunning; ſome of their ſpeede; and ſome of their cry: till comming home (about the time that the candles begin to inherit the Sunnes office) they found Daiphantus was not to be found. Whereat Palladius greatly maruelling, and a day or two paſſing, while neither ſearch nor inquirie could helpe him to knowledge, at laſt he lighted vpon the letter, which Pyrocles had written before hee went a hunting, and left in his ſtudy among other of his writings. The letter was directed to Palladius himſelfe, and contained theſe words.

My onely friend, violence of loue leades me into ſuch a courſe, whereof your knowledge may much more vexe you, then helpe me. Therefore pardon my concealing it from you, ſince, if I wrong you, it is in the reſpect I beare you. Retume into Theſſalia, I pray you, as full of good fortune, as I am of deſire: and if I liue, I will in ſhort time follow you; if I die, loue my memory.

This was all, and this Palladius read twiſe or thriſe ouer. Ah (ſaid he) Pyrocles, what meanes this alteration? what haue I deſerued of thee, to be thus baniſhed of thy coũſels? Heretofore I haue accuſed the ſea, cõdẽned the Pyrats, & hated my euil fortune, that depriued me of thee; but now thy ſelf is the ſea, which drownes my comfort, thy ſelf is the Pirat that robs thy ſelfe frõ me: thy own wil becomes my euil fortune. Thẽ turned he his thoughts to all formes of gheſſes that might light vpon the purpoſe and courſe of Pyrocles: for he was not ſo ſure by his words, that it was loue, as he was doubtful where the loue was. One time he thought, ſome beautie in Laconia had layed hold of his eies; another time he feared, that it might be Parthenias excellency, which had brokẽ the bands of al former reſolutiõs; but the more he thought, the more he knew not what to thinke, armies of obiectiõs riſing againſt any accepted opinion.

Then

Then as carefull he was what to do himselfe: at length determined, neuer to leaue seeking him, till his search should be either by meeting accomplished, or by death ended. Therfore(for all the vnkindnesse bearing tender respect,that his friends secret determination should be kept from any suspition in others)he went to Kalander,and told him, that he had receiued a message from his friend, by which he vnderstood he was gone backe againe into Laconia,about some matters greatly importing the poore men,whose protection he had vndertaken,and that it was in any sort fit for him, to follow him, but in such priuate wise, as not to be knowne, and that therefore he would as then bid him farewell: arming himselfe in a blacke armour, as either a badge, or prognostication of his mind: and taking onely with him good store of money, and a few choise iewels, leauing the greatest number of them, and most of his apparell with Kalander: which he did partly to giue the more cause to Kalander to expect their returne,and so to be the lesse curiously inquisitiue after them: and partly to leaue those honourable thanks vnto him, for his charge and kindnesse, which hee knew hee would no other way receiue. The good olde man hauing neither reason to disswade, nor hope to perswade, receiued the things, with minde of a keeper, not of an owner; but before he went, desired he might haue the happinesse, fully to know what they were: which he sayd,he had euer till then delayed,fearing to be any way importune: but now he could not be so much an enemy to his desires as any longer to impriſon them in silence; Palladius told him,that the matter was not so secret, but that so worthie a friend deseruedthe knowledge, and should haue it as soone as he might speake with his friend: without whose consent (because their promise bound him otherwise) he could not reueale it: but bad him hold for most assured, that if they liued but a while, he should find, that they which bare the names of Daiphantus and Palladius, would giue him and his cause to thinke his noble courtesie well imployed. Kalander would presse him no further, but desiring that hee might haue leaue to goe, or at least to send his sonne and seruants with him,Palladius brake off all ceremonies,by telling him; his case stood so,that his greatest fauour should be in making least a do of his parting. Wherewith Kalander knowing it to be more cumber then curtesie,to striue,abstained from further vrging him,but not from hartie mourning the losse of so sweete a conuersation.

Onely Clitophon by vehement importunitie obtained to goe with him, to come againe to Daiphantus, whom hee named and accounted his Lord. And in such priuate guise departed Palladius, though hauing a companion to talke withall, yet talking much more with vnkindnesse. And first they went to Mantinæa;whereof because Parthenia was, he suspected there might be some cause of his abode. But finding there no newes of him,hee went to Tegæa, Ripa, Enispæ, Stimphalus, and Pheneus,famous for the poisonous Stygian water,and through al the rest of Arcadia, making their eyes, their eares, and their tongues serue almost for nothing, but that enquirie. But they could know nothing but that in none of those places he was knowne. And so went they,making one place succeede to another, in like vncertainty to their search,many times encountring strange aduentures, worthy to be registred in the roules of fame; but this may not be omitted. As they past in a pleasant valley(of either side of which high hils lifted vp their beetle-browes,as if they would ouer looke the pleasantnesse of their vnder-prospect) they were by the daintinesse of the place,& the wearinesse of themselues,inuited to light from their horses; and pulling off their bits,that they might somthing refresh their mouthes vpon the grasse (which plentifully grew, brought vp vnder the care of those well shading trees) they themſelues layed them downe hard by the murmuring muſicke of certaine waters, which ſpouted out of the ſide of the hils, and in the bottome of the vallie made of many ſprings a pretie brooke, like a common-wealth of many families: but when they had a while harkened to the perſwaſion of ſleepe, they roſe, and walkt onward in that ſhadie place, till Clitophon eſpied a peece of armour, and not far off another peece: and ſo the ſight of one peece teaching him to looke for more, he at length found all, with head-peece and ſhield, by the deuice whereof, which was he ſtraight knew it to be the armour of his coſin, the noble Amphialus. Wherupō (fearing ſome inconuenience hapned vnto him) he told both his doubt and cauſe of doubt to Palladius, who (conſidering thereof) thought beſt to make no longer ſtay, but to follow on: leaſt perchance ſome violence were offered to ſo worthie a Knight, whom the fame of the world ſeemed to ſet in ballance with any Knight liuing. Yet with a ſudden conceipt, hauing long borne great honour to the name of Amphialus, Palladius thought beſt to take that armour, thinking thereby to learne by them that ſhould know that armour, ſome newes of Amphialus, and yet not hinder him in the ſearch of Daiphantus too. So he by the helpe of Clitophon quickly put on that armour, whereof there was no one peece wanting, though hacked in ſome places, bewraying ſome fight not long ſince paſſed. It was ſomething too great, but yet ſerued wel inough. And ſo getting on their horſes, they trauelled but a little way, when in opening of the mouth of the valley into a faire field, they met with a coach drawne with foure milke-white horſes furniſhed all in blacke, with a blacke a More boy vpon euery horſe, they all apparelled in white, the coach it ſelfe very richly furniſhed in blacke and white. But before they could come ſo neare as to diſcerne what was within, there came running vpon them aboue a doſen horſemen, who cried to them to yeelde themſelues priſoners, or elſe they ſhould die. But Palladius not accuſtomed to graunt ouer the poſſeſſion of himſelfe vpon ſo vniuſt titles, with ſworde drawne, gaue them ſo rude an aunſwere, that diuerſe of them neuer had breath to reply againe: for being well backt by Clitophon, and hauing an excellent horſe vnder him, when he was ouerpreſt by ſome, he auoided them, & ere th'other thought of it, puniſhed in him his fellowes faults: and ſo either with cunning or with force, or rather with a cunning force, leſt none of them either liuing, or able to make his life ſerue to others hurt. Which being done, he approched the coach, aſſuring the blacke boies they ſhould haue no hurt, who were elſe ready to haue run away, and looking into the coach, he found in the one end a Lady of great beautie, & ſuch a beautie, as ſhewed forth the beames both of wiſedome and good nature, but all as much darkned, as might be, with ſorrow. In the other, two Ladies (who by their demeanure ſhewed well, they were but her ſeruants) holding before them a picture; in which was a goodly Gentleman (whom he knew not) painted, hauing in their faces a certaine waiting ſorrow, their eies being infected with their miſtres weeping. But, the chiefe Lady hauing not ſo much as once heard the noiſe of this cōflict (ſo had ſorrow cloſed vp all the entries of her mind, & loue tied her ſēces to that beloued picture (now the ſhadow of him falling vpon the picture made her caſt vp her eie, & ſeeing the armour which too well ſhe knew, thinking him to be Amphialus the Lord of her deſires (bloud cōming more freely into her cheekes, as though it would be bold, & yet there growing new againe pale for feare) with a pitiful look (like one vniuſtly condemned:) My Lord Amphialus ſayd ſhe, you haue inough puniſhed me: it is time for crueltie to leaue you, and euill fortune me; If not I pray you (and to graunt, my praier fitter time nor place you can haue haue)accompliſh the one euen now,& finiſh the other. With that,ſorow impatient to be ſlowly vttered in her often ſtaying ſpeeches,poured it ſelfe ſo faſt in teares,that Palladius could not hold her longer in error,but pulling off his helmet, Madam (ſaid he) I perceiue you miſtake me: I am a ſtranger in theſe parts, ſet vpon (without any cauſe giuē by me)by ſome of your ſeruants,whom becauſe I haue in my iuſt defence euill entreated, I came to make my excuſe to you, whom ſeeing ſuch as I do, I finde greater cauſe,why I ſhould craue pardon of you. When ſhe ſaw his face,& heard his ſpeech,ſhe looked out of the coach,& ſeeing her men,ſome ſlaine,ſome lying vnder their dead horſes,& ſtriuing to get from vnder them,without making more account of the matter,Truly(ſaid ſhe)they are wel ſerued that durſt lift vp their armes againſt that armour. But Sir Knight (ſaid ſhe) I pray you tell me, how come you by this armour? for if it be by the death of him that owed it,then haue I more to ſay vnto you. Palladius aſſured her it was not ſo; telling her the true manner how he found it. It is like enough(ſaid ſhe)for that agrees with the manner he hath lately vſed. But I beſeech you Sir(ſaid ſhe)ſince your proweſſe hath bereft me of my company: let it yet ſo farre heale the wounds it ſelfe hath giuen, as to gard me to the next towne. How great ſo euer my buſineſſe be fayre Lady (ſaid he)it ſhall willingly yeeld to ſo noble a cauſe: But firſt euen by the fauour you beare to the Lord of this noble armour,I coniure you to tell mee the ſtorie of your fortune herein,leſt hereafter when the image of ſo excellēt a Ladie in ſo ſtrange a plight come before mine eyes, I condemne my ſelfe of want of conſideration in not hauing demanded thus much. Neither aske I it without proteſtation, that wherein my ſword and faith may auaile you, they ſhall bind themſelues to your ſeruice. Your coniuration,faire Knight(ſaid ſhe) is too ſtrong for my poore ſpirite to diſobey,and that ſhall make me(without any other hope,my ruine being but by one vnrelieueable)to graunt your will herein: and to ſay the truth,a ſtrange niceneſſe were it in me to refraine that from the eares of a perſon repreſenting ſo much worthineſſe,which I am glad euen to rockes & woods to vtter. Know you then that my name is Helen,Queene by birth: and hitherto poſſeſſion of the faire citie & territorie of Corinth. I can ſay no more of my ſelfe,but beloued of my people: and may iuſtly ſay, beloued, ſince they are content to beare with my abſence,& folly. But I being left by my fathers death and accepted by my people,in the higheſt degree, that countrie could receiue; aſſoone, or rather, before that my age was ripe for it; my court quickly ſwarmed full of ſuters; ſome perchance louing my ſtate,others my perſon,but once I know all of them, howſoeuer my poſſeſſions were in their hearts,my beautie (ſuch as it is) was in their mouthes; many ſtrangers of princely & noble blood, and all of mine own countrie, to whom either birth or vertue gaue courage to auowe ſo high a deſire.

Among the reſt,or rather before the reſt,was the Lord Philoxenus,ſonne & heire to the vertuous noble man Timotheus: which Timotheus was a man both in power, riches,parentage,and(which paſſed all theſe) goodnes, and (which followed all theſe)loue of the people,beyond any of the great men of my countrie. Now this ſonne of his,I muſt ſay truly,not vnworthie of ſuch a father,bending himſelfe by all meanes of ſeruiceablenes to mee, and ſetting forth of himſelfe to win my fauour, wan thus farre of mee, that in truth I leſſe miſliked him then any of the reſt: which in ſome proportion my countenance deliuered vnto him. Though I muſt proteſt it was a verie falſe embaſſadour, if it deliuered at all any affection, whereof my heart was vtterly void, I as then eſteeming my ſelfe borne to rule, and thinking foule ſcorne willingly to ſubmit my ſelfe to be ruled.

But whiles Philoxenus in good ſort purſued my fauour, and perchance nouriſhed himſelfe with ouer much hope, becauſe he found I did in ſome ſort acknowledge his valew, one time among the reſt he brought with him a deare friend of his. With that ſhe looked vpō the picture before her, & ſtraight ſighed, & ſtraight teares followed, as if the Idole of dutie ought to be honoured with ſuch oblations, and then her ſpeach ſtaied the tale, hauing brought her to that looke, but that looke hauing quite put her out of her tale. But Palladius greatly pitying ſo ſweete a ſorrow in a Ladie, whom by fame he had already knowne & honoured, beſought for her promiſe ſake, to put ſilence ſo long vnto her moning, till ſhe had recounted the reſt of this ſtory. Why ſaid ſhe, this is the picture of Amphialus: what need I ſay more to you? what eare is ſo barbarous but hath heard of Amphialus? who followes deeds of armes, but euery where findes monumēts of Amphialus? who is curteous, noble, liberal, but he that hath the example before his eyes of Amphialus? where are al heroical parts, but in Amphialus? O Amphialus I would thou were not ſo excellent, or I would I thought thee not ſo excellent, and yet would I not that I would ſo: with that ſhe wept againe, till he againe ſoliciting the concluſion of her ſtory: Then muſt you (ſaid ſhe) know the ſtory of Amphialus: for his will is my life, his life my hiſtory: and in deed in what can I better emploie my lips then in ſpeaking of Amphialus?

This Knight then whoſe figure you ſee, but whoſe mind can be painted by nothing, but by their true ſhape of vertue, is brothers ſonne to Baſilius King of Arcadia, and in his childhood eſteemed his heire: till Baſilius in his old yeares marrying a yong and a faire Ladie, had of her thoſe two daughters, ſo famous for their perfection in beautie: which put by their yong coſin from that expectation.

Whereupon his mother (a woman of a haughtie heart, being daughter to the King of Argos, either diſdaining, or fearing, that her ſonne ſhould liue vnder the power of Baſilius, ſent him to that Lord Timotheus (betweene whom and her dead husband there had paſſed ſtraight bands of mutuall hoſpitalitie, to be brought vp in companie with his ſonne Philoxenus.

A happie reſolution for Amphialus, whoſe excellent nature was by this meanes trained on with as good education, as any Princes ſonne in the world could haue, which otherwiſe it is thought his mother (farre vnworthie of ſuch a ſonne) would not haue giuen him. The good Timotheus no leſſe louing him then his own ſonne, well they grew in yeares; and ſhortly occaſions fell aptly to trie Amphialus, and all occaſions were but ſteppes for him to clime fame by. Nothing was ſo hard, but his valour ouercame: which yet ſtill he ſo guided with true vertue, that although no man was in our parts ſpoken of but he for his manhood, yet, as though therein he excelled himſelfe, he was commonly called the curteous Amphialus. An endleſſe thing it were for me to tell, how manie aduentures (terrible to be ſpoken of) he atchieued: what monſters, what Giants, what conqueſts of countries, ſometimes vſing policie, ſometimes force, but alwaies vertue well followed, and but followed by Philoxenus: betweene whom, and him, ſo faſt a friendſhip by education was knit, that at laſt Philoxenus hauing no greater matter to imploy his friendſhip in, then to winne me, therein deſired, & had his vttermoſt furtherance: to that purpoſe brought he him to my court, where truely I may iuſtly witneſſe with him, that what his wit could conceiue (and his wit can conceiue as farre as the limits of reaſon ſtretch) was all directed to the ſetting forward the ſuite of his friend Philoxenus: mine eares could heare nothing from him, but touching the worthineſſe of Philoxenus, and of the great happineſſe it would be vnto me to haue ſuch a husband ; with manie arguments,which God knowes , I cannot well remember becauſe I did not much beleeue. For why ſhold I vſe many circumſtances to come to that where already I am, & euer while I liue muſt continue ? in fewe words,while he pleaded for another, he wanne me for himſelfe: if at leaſt (with that ſhe ſighed) he would account it a winning, for his fame had ſo framed the way to my mind , that his preſence ſo full of beautie,ſweetnes,& noble conuerſation , had entred there before he vouchſafed to call for the keyes. O Lord , how did my ſoule hang at his lippes while he ſpake! O when he in feeling maner would deſcribe the loue of his friend,how wel(thought I) doth loue betweene thoſe lippes! when he would with daintieſt eloquence ſtirre pitie in me toward Philoxenus,why ſure (ſaid I to my ſelfe) Helen , be not afraid, this heart cannot want pitie : and when he would extoll the deeds of Philoxenus, who in deede had but waited of him therein,alas(thought I)good Philoxenus how euil doth it become thy name to be ſubſcribed to his letter ? what ſhould I ſaie ? nay , what ſhould I not ſaie(noble Knight)who am not aſhamed,nay am delighted,thus to expreſſe mine owne paſſions?

Dayes paſt, his eagerneſſe for his friend neuer decreaſed,my affection to him euer increaſed. At length,in way of ordinarie curteſie,I obtained of him (who ſuſpected no ſuch matter)this his picture, the only Amphialus, I feare that I ſhall euer enioy: and growen bolder, or madder, or bolde with madneſſe, I diſcouered my affection vnto him. But, Lord,I ſhall neuer forget,how anger and curteſie, at one inſtant appeared in his eyes, when he heard that motion : how with his bluſh he taught me ſhame. In ſumme,he left nothing vnaſſayed,which might diſgrace himſelf,to grace his friend;in ſweet termes making me receiue a moſt reſolute refuſall of himſelfe. But when he found that his preſence did far more perſwade for himſelfe , then his ſpeech could do for his friend,he left my court : hoping that forgetfulneſſe (which commonly waits vpō abſence)would make roome for his friend: to whom he would not vtter thus much (I thinke) for a kinde feare not to grieue him , or perchaunce (though he cares litle for me)of a certaine honourable gratefulneſſe , not yet to diſcouer ſo much of my ſecrets: but as it ſhould ſeeme, meant to trauel into farre countries,vntill his friends affection either ceaſed,or preuailed.But within a while, Philoxenus came to ſee how onward the fruits were of his friends labour, when (as in trueth I cared not much how he took it)he found me ſitting,beholding this picture, I know not with how affectionate countenance, but I am ſure with a moſt affectionate mind. I ſtraight found ielouſie & diſdaine tooke hold of him : and yet the froward paine of mine own heart made me ſo delight to puniſh him,whom I eſteemed the chiefeſt let in my way; that when he with humble geſture,& vehement ſpeeches ſued for my fauor; I told him, that I would heare him more willingly, if he would ſpeake for Amphialus,as well as Amphialus had done for him : he neuer anſwerd me, but pale & quaking,went ſtraight away;and ſtraight my heart miſgaue me ſome euil ſucceſſe: and yet though I had authoritie enough to haue ſtayed him (as in theſe fatall things it falles out,that the high-working powers make ſecōd cauſes vnwittingly acceſſarie to their determinations) I did no further but ſent a foot-man of mine (whoſe faithfulnes to me I well knew)from place to place to follow him,& bring me word of his proceedings: which (alas) haue brought forth that which I feare I muſt euer rewe.

For he had trauailed ſcarſe a daies iorney out of my countrey, but that(not farre from this place)he ouer-tooke Amphialus , who (by ſuccouring a diſtreſſed Lady) had bene here ſtayed: and by and by called him to fight with him, proteſting that one of them two ſhould die: you may eaſily iudge how ſtrange it was to Amphialus, whoſe hart could accuſe it ſelf of no fault, but too much affectiō toward him, which he (refuſing to fight with him) would faine haue made Philoxenus vnderſtand, but (as my ſeruant ſince told me) the more Amphialus went back, the more he followed, calling him Traytor, & coward, yet neuer telling the cauſe of this ſtrange alteratiō. Ah Philoxenus (ſaid Amphialus) I know I am no Traytor, & thou well knoweſt I am no coward: but I pray thee content thy ſelfe with this much, & let this ſatisfie thee, that I loue thee, ſince I beare thus much of thee, but he leauing words drew his ſword & gaue Amphialus a great blow or two, which but for the goodnes of his armor would haue ſlaine him: and yet ſo far did Amphialus containe himſelfe, ſtepping aſide, and ſaying to him: Well Philoxenus, & thus much villany am I content to put vp, not any longer for thy ſake (whom I haue no cauſe to loue, ſince thou doſt iniurie me, & wilt not tell me the cauſe) but for thy vertuous fathers ſake, to whom I am ſo much bound. I pray thee go away, & conquer thine owne paſſions, & thou ſhalt make me ſoone yeeld to be thy ſeruant. But he would not attend his words, but ſtill ſtrake ſo fiercely at Amphialus, that in the end (nature preuailing aboue determination) he was faine to defend himſelfe, & withall ſo to offend him, that by an vnlucky blow the pore Philoxenus fel dead at his feet; hauing had time only to ſpeak ſome words, wherby Amphialus knew it was for my ſake: which whē Amphialus ſaw, he forthwith gaue ſuch tokens of true-felt ſorow; that as my ſeruant ſaid, no imagination could cōceiue greater wo. But that by and by, an vnhappie occaſion made Amphialus paſſe himſelfe in ſorrow: for Philoxenus was but newly dead, when there comes to the ſame place, the aged & vertuous Timotheus, who (hauing heard of his ſonnes ſodaine and paſſionate manner of parting from my Court) had followed him as ſpeedily as he could; but alas not ſo ſpeedily, but that he found him dead before he could ouertake him. Though my heart be nothing but a ſtage for Tragedies; yet I muſt confeſſe, it is euen vnable to beare the miſerable repreſentation thereof: knowing Amphialus & Timotheus as I haue done. Alas what ſorrow, what amaſement, what ſhame was in Amphialus, when he ſaw his deere foſter father, find him the killer of his onely ſonne? In my heart I know, he wiſhed mountaines had laine vpon him, to keep him from that meeting. As for Timotheus, ſorrow of his ſonne & (I think principally) vnkindneſſe of Amphialus ſo deuoured his vitall ſpirites, that able to ſay no more but Amphialus, Amphialus, haue I? he ſanke to the earth, and preſently died.

But not my tongue, though daily vſed to complaints; no nor if my heart (which is nothing but ſorrow) were turned to tongues, durſt it vnder-take to ſhew the vnſpeakablenes of his griefe. But (becauſe this ſerues to make you know my fortune) he threw away his armour, euen this which you haue now vpon you, which at the firſt ſight I vainly hoped, he had put on againe; and then (as aſhamed of the light) he ranne into thickeſt of the woods, lamenting, and euen crying out ſo pitifully, that my ſeruant, (though of a fortune not vſed to much tenderneſſe) could not refraine weeping when he told it me. He once ouertooke him, but Amphialus drawing his ſword, which was the onely part of his armes (God knowes to what purpoſe) he carried about him, threatned to kill him if he followed him, and withall bad him deliuer this bitter meſſage, that he wel inough found, I was the cauſe of all this miſchiefe: and that if I were a man, he would go ouer the world to kill me: but bad me aſſure my ſelfe, that of all creatures in the world, he moſt hated me. Ah ſir knight (whoſe eares I think by this time are tired with the rugged wayes of theſe misformisfortunes) now weigh my case, if at least you know what loue is. For this cause haue I left my countrey, putting in hazard how my people will in time deale by me, aduenturing what perils or dishonors might ensue, onely to follow him, who proclaimeth hate against me, & to bring my neck vnto him, if that may redeeme my trespasse and aslwage his furie. And now sir (said she) you haue your request, I pray you take paines to guide me to the next towne, that there I may gather such of my company againe, as your valor hath left me. Palladius willingly cõdiscended: but ere they began to go, there came Clitophon, who hauing bene something hurt by one of them, had pursued him a good way: at length ouertaking him, and ready to kil him, vnderstood they were seruants to the faire Queene Helen, and that the cause of this enterprise was for nothing, but to make Amphialus prisoner, whom they knew their mistresse sought; for she concealed her sorrow, nor cause of her sorrow frõ no body.

But Clitophon (verie sory for this accident) came back to comfort the Queene, helping such as were hurt, in the best sort that he could, and framing friendly constructiõs of this rashly vnder-taken enmitie, whẽ in comes another (til that time vnseen) all armed, with his beuer downe, who first looking round about vpon the company, as soone as he spied Palladius, he drew his sword, & making no other prologue, let flie at him. But Palladius (sorie for so much harme as had alreadie happened) sought rather to retire, and ward, thinking he might be some one that belonged to the faire Queene, whose case in his heart he pitied. Which Clitophon seeing, stept betweene them, asking the new come knight the cause of his quarell; who answered him, that he would kill that theefe, who had stolen away his maisters armour, if he did not restore it. With that Palladius lookt vpon him, and saw that he of the other side had Palladius own armour vpon him: truely (said Palladius) if I haue stolen this armour, you did not buy that: but you shall not fight with me vpon such a quarell, you shall haue this armour willingly, which I did onely put on to do honor to the owner. But Clitophon straight knew by his words and voice, that it was Ismenus, the faithfull and diligent Page of Amphialus: and therefore telling him that he was Clitophon, and willing him to acknowledge his error to the other, who deserued all honor, the yong Gentleman pulled off his head-peece, and (lighting) went to kisse Palladius hands; desiring him to pardon his follie, caused by extreame griefe, which easilie might bring foorth anger. Sweete Gentleman (said Palladius) you shall onely make me this amends, that you shall carie this your Lords armour from me to him, and tell him from an vnknown knight (who admires his worthinesse) that he cannot cast a greater mist ouer his glorie, then by being vnkind to so excellent a Princesse as this Queene is. Ismenus promised he would as soone as he durst find his maister: and with that went to do his duetie to the Queene, whom in all these encounters astonishment made hardie; but assoone as shee saw Ismenus (looking to her picture) Ismenus (said shee) here is my Lord, where is yours? or come you to bring me some sentence of death from him? if it be so, welcome be it. I pray you speake; and speake quickly. Alas Madame, said Ismenus, I haue lost my Lord, (with that teares came vnto his eyes) for assoone as the vnhappie combat was concluded with the death both of father and sonne, my maister casting off his armor, went his way: forbidding me vpon paine of death to follow him. Yet diuers daies I followed his steppes; till lastly I found him, hauing newly met with an excellent Spaniell, belonging to his dead companion Philoxenus. The dog straight fawned on my maister for old knowledge: but neuer was there thing more pitifull then to heare my maister blame the dog for louing his maisters murtherer, renewing a fresh his complaints, with the dumbe counſeller, as if they might comfort one another in their miſeries. But my Lord hauing ſpied me, roſe vp in ſuch rage, that in truth I feared he would kill me: yet as then he ſaid only, if I would not diſpleaſe him I ſhould not come neere him til he ſent for me: too hard a commaundement for me to diſobey: I yeelded, leauing him onely waited on by his dog, and as I thinke ſeeking out the moſt ſolitary places, that this or any other countrie can graunt him: and I returning where I had left his armour, found another in ſteede thereof, and (diſdaining I muſt confeſſe that any ſhould beare the armour of the beſt Knight liuing) armed my ſelfe therein to play the foole, as euen now I did. Faire Iſmenus (ſaid the Queene) a fitter meſſenger could hardly be to vnfold my Tragedie: I ſee the end, I ſee my end.

With that (ſobbing) ſhe deſired to be conducted to the next towne, where Palladius left her to be waited on by Clitophon, at Palladius earneſt entreatie, who deſired alone to take that melancholy courſe of ſeeking his friend: and therefore changing armours againe with Iſmenus (who went withal to a caſtle belonging to his maiſter) he continued his queſt for his friend Daiphantus.

So directed he his courſe to Laconia, aſwell among the Helots, as Spartans. There indeede he found his fame flouriſhing, his monuments engraued in Marble, & yet more durably in mens memories; but the vniuerſall lamenting his abſented preſence, aſſured him of his preſent abſence. Thence into the Elean prouince, to ſee whether at the Olympian games (there celebrated) he might in ſuch concourſe bleſſe his eyes with ſo deſired an encounter: but that huge and ſportfull aſſemblie grew to him a tedious lonelineſſe, eſteeming no bodie found, ſince Daiphantus was loſt. Afterward he paſſed through Achaia and Sicyonia, to the Corinthians, prowde of their two Seas, to learne whether by the ſtreight of that Iſthmus, it were poſſible to know of his paſſage. But finding euery place more dumbe then other to his demaunds, and remembring that it was late-taken loue, which had wrought this new courſe, he returned againe (after two moneths trauaile in vaine) to make a freſh ſearch in Arcadia; ſo much the more, as then firſt he bethought him ſelfe of the picture of Philoclea (which reſembling her he had once loued) might perhaps awake againe that ſleeping paſſion. And hauing alreadie paſt ouer the greateſt part of Arcadia, one day comming vnder the ſide of the pleaſant mountaine Manalus, his horſe (nothing guiltie of his inquiſitiueneſſe) with flat-tyring taught him, that diſcreete ſtayes make ſpeedie iourneis. And therfore lighting down, & vnbridling his horſe, he him ſelfe went to repoſe him ſelfe in a litle wood he ſaw there by. Where lying vnder the protection of a ſhadie tree, with intention to make forgetting ſleepe comfort a ſorrowfull memorie, he ſaw a ſight which perſwaded, and obtained of his eies, that they would abide yet awhile open. It was the appearing of a Ladie, who becauſe ſhe walked with her ſide toward him, he could not perfectly ſee her face; but ſo much he might ſee of her, that was a ſuretie for the reſt, that all was excellent.

Well might he perceiue the hanging of her haire in faireſt quantitie, in lockes ſome curled, and ſome as it were forgotten, with ſuch a careleſſe care, & an art ſo hiding art, that ſhe ſeemed ſhe would lay them for a pattern, whether nature ſimply, or nature helped by cunning, be the more excellent: the reſt whereof was drawne into a coronet of gold richly ſet with pearle, and ſo ioyned all ouer with gold wiers and couered with feathers of diuers colours, that it was not vnlike to an helmet, ſuch a glittering ſhewe it bare, & ſo brauely it was held vp from the head. Vpon her body ſhe ware a doublet of Skie colour ſattin, couered with plates of gold, and as it were nailed with precious ſtones, that in it ſhe might ſeem armed; the neatherpart of her garment garment was full of ſtuffe, and cut after ſuch a faſhion, that though the length of it reached to the ankles, yet in her going one might ſometimes diſcerne the ſmall of her legge, which with the foote was dreſſed in a ſhort paire of crimſon veluet buſkins, in ſome places opē (as the ancient maner was) to ſhew the fairneſſe of the skin. Ouer all this ſhe ware a certaine mantell, made in ſuch maner, that comming vnder her right arme, and couering moſt of that ſide, it had no faſtening on the left ſide, but onely vpon the top of the ſhoulder, where the two ends met, and were cloſed together with a verie rich iewell: the deuiſe whereof as he after ſaw was this: a Hercules made in litle forme, but ſet with a diſtaffe in his hand as he once was by Omphales commandement with a word in Greeke, but thus to be interpreted, Neuer more valiant. On the ſame ſide, on her thigh ſhe ware a ſword, which as it witneſſed her to be an Amazon, or one following that profeſſion, ſo it ſeemed but a needleſſe weapō, ſince her other forces were without withſtāding. But this Ladie walked outright till he might ſee her enter into a fine cloſe arbour: it was of trees whoſe branches ſo louinglie enterlaced one the other, that it could reſiſt the ſtrōgeſt violence of eye-ſight; but ſhe went into it by a doore ſhe opened; which moued him as warilie as he could to follow her, and by and by he might heare her ſing this ſong, with a voice no leſſe beautifull to his eares, then her goodlineſſe was full of harmony to his eyes.

TRansformd in shew, but more transformd in mind,
I ceaſe to ſtriue with double conqueſt foilde:
For (wo is me) my powers all I find
VVithoutward force, and inward treaſon ſpoilde.

For from without came to mine eyes the blow,
VVhereto mine inward thoughts did faintly yeeld:
Both theſe conſpir'd poore Reaſons ouerthrow;
Falſe in my ſelfe, thus haue I loſt the field.

Thus are my eyes ſtill captiue to one ſight,
Thus all my thoughts are ſlaues to one thought ſtill:
Thus Reaſon to his ſeruants yeelds his right,
Thus is my power transformed to your vvill:
VVhat maruell then I take a womans hue,
Since what I ſee, thinke, know, is all but you?

The dittie gaue him ſome ſuſpition, but the voice gaue him almoſt aſſurance, who the ſinger was. And therefore boldly thruſting open the doore, and entring into the arbour, he perceiued indeed that it was Pyrocles thus diſguiſed, wherwith not receiuing ſo much ioy to haue found him, as griefe ſo to haue found him, amazedlie looking vpon him (as Apollo is painted when he ſaw Daphne ſodainly turned into a Laurell) he was not able to bring forth a word. So that Pyrocles (who had as much ſhame, as Muſidorus had ſorow) riſing to him, would haue formed a ſubſtantiall excuſe; but his inſinuation being of bluſhing, and his diuiſion of ſighes, his whole oration ſtood vpon a ſhort narration, what was the cauſer of this Metamorphoſis. But by that time Muſidorus had gathered his ſpirits together, and yet caſting a gaſtfull countenance vpon him (as if he would coniure ſome ſtrange ſpirits) he thus ſpake vnto him.

And is it possible, that this is Pyrocles, the onlie young Prince in the world, formed by nature, and framed by education to the true exercise of vertue? or is it indeed some Amazon that hath counterfeited the face of my friend, in this sort to vexe me? for likelier sure I would haue thought it, that any outward face might haue bin disguised, then that the face of so excellent a mind could haue bin thus blemished. O sweet Pyrocles, separate your selfe a little (if it be possible) from your selfe, and let your owne mind looke vpon your owne proceedings, so shall my words be needlesse, and you best instructed. See with your selfe, how fit it will be for you in this your tender youth, borne so great a Prince, and of so rare, not only expectation but proofe, desired of your old father, and wanted of your natiue countrie, now so neare your home, to diuert your thoughts frō the way of goodnesse, to loose, nay to abuse your time. Lastlie, to ouerthrow all the excellent things you haue done, which haue filled the world with your fame; as if you should drowne your ship in the long desired hauen, or like an ill player, should marre the last act of his Tragedie. Remember (for I know you know it) that if we will be men, the reasonable part of our soule is to haue absolute commandement; against which if any sensuall weakenesse arise, we are to yeeld all our sound forces to the ouerthrowing of so vnnatural a rebellion, wherein how can we want courage, since we are to deale against so weake an aduersarie, that in it selfe is nothing but weakenesse? Nay, we are to resolue, that if reason direct it, we must do it; and if we must do it, we will do it; for to say I cannot, is childish, and I will not, womanish. And see how extreamely euery way you endaunder your mind; for to take this womanish habite (without you frame your behauior accordingly) is whollie vaine: your behauiour can neuer come kindly from you, but as the mind is proportioned vnto it. So that you must resolue, if you will play your part to any purpose, whatsoeuer peuish imperfectiōs are in that sexe, to soften your hart to receiue thē, the very first down-step to all wickednes, for do not deceiue your selfe, my deare cosin, there is no man sodainly either excellently good, or extreamly euill, but growes either as he holds himselfe vp in vertue, or lets himselfe slide to viciousnesse. And let vs see, what power is the authour of all these troubles; forsooth loue, loue, a passion, and the basest and fruitlessest of all passions: feare breedeth wit, anger is the cradle of courage; ioy openeth and enableth the heart: sorrow, as it closeth, so it draweth it inward to looke to the correcting of it selfe; and so all of them generallie haue power towards some good by the direction of Reason. But this bastard Loue (for indeed the name of Loue is most vnworthily applied to so hatefull a humour) as it is engendred betwixt lust and idlenesse, as the matter it works vpon is nothing but a certain base weaknes, which some gentle fooles call a gentle heart; as his adioined companions be vnquietnesse, longings, fond comforts, faint discomforts, hopes, iealousies, vngrounded rages, causlesse yeeldings; so is the highest end it aspires vnto, a litle pleasure with much paine before, and great repentance after. But that end how endlesse it runnes to infinite euils, were fit enough for the matter we speak of, but not for your eares, in whom indeed there is so much true dispositiō to vertue: yet thus much of his worthy effects in your selfe is to be seene, that (besides your breaking lawes of hospitalitie with Kalander, and of friendship with me) it vtterly subuerts the course of nature, in making reason giue place to sence, & man to woman. And trulie I thinke hereupon it first gat the name of Loue: for indeed the true loue hath that excellēt nature in it, that it doth transforme the verie essence of the louer into the thing loued; vniting, and as it were incorporating it with a secret and inward working. And herein do these kind of loues imitate the excellent; for as the loue of heauen makes one heauenly, the loue of vertue, vertuous, so doth the loue of the world make one become worldly, and this effeminate loue of a woman, doth so womanize a man, that (if he yeeld to it) it will not onely make him an Amazon, but a launder, a distaffe spinner, or whatsoeuer other vile occupation their idle heads can imagine and their weake hands performe. Therefore (to trouble you no longer with my tedious but louing words) if either you remember what you are, what you haue bene, or what you must be: if you consider what it is that moued you, or by what kind of creature you are mooued, you shall finde the cause so small, the effect so dangerous, your selfe so vnworthie to run into the one, or to be driuen by the other, that I doubt not I shall quicklie haue occasion rather to praise you for hauing conquered it, then to giue you further counsell, how to do it. But in Pyrocles this speech wrought no more, but that hee, who before he was espied, was afraid; after, being perceiued, was ashamed, now being hardly rubd vpon, left both feare and shame, and was moued to anger. But the exceeding good will he bare to Musidorus striuing with it, he thus, partly to satisfie him, but principally to loose the reines to his owne motions, made him answere. Cosin, whatsoeuer good disposition nature hath bestowed vpon me, or howsoeuer that disposition hath bene by bringing vp confirmed, this must I confesse, that I am not yet come to that degree of wisdome, to thinke light of the sexe, of whom I haue my life; since if I be any thing (which your friendship rather finds, thē I acknowledge) I was to come to it, borne of a woman, & nursed of a woman. And certainely (for this point of your speach doth neareſt touch me) it is strange to see the vnmanlike crueltie of mankind; who not content with their tyrannous ambition, to haue brought the others vertuous patience vnder them (like childish maisters) thinke their maisterhood nothing, without doing iniurie to them, who (if we will argue by reason) are framed of nature with the same parts of the minde for the exercise of vertue, as we are. And for example, euen this estate of Amazons, (which I now for my greatest honour do seeke to counterfeit) doth well witnesse, that if generally the sweetnesse of their disposition did not make them see the vainnesse of these things, which we account glorious, they neither want valour of mind, nor yet doth their fairnesse take away their force. And truely we men, and praisers of men should remember, that if we haue such excellencies, it is reason to thinke them excellent creatures, of whom we are, since a Kyte neuer brought forth a good flying Hawke. But to tell you true, as I thinke it superfluous to vse any words of such a subiect, which is so praised in it selfe as it needs no praises, so withall I feare least my conceit (not able to reach vnto them) bring forth words, which for their vnworthinesse may be a disgrace to them I so inwardly honour. Let this suffice, that they are capable of vertue, and vertue (you your selues say) is to be loued, and I too trulie, but this I willinglie confesse, that it likes me much better, when I finde vertue in a faire lodging, then when I am bound to seeke it in an ilfauored creature, like a pearle in a dunghill. As for my fault of being an vnciuill guest to Kalander, if you could feele what an inward guest my selfe am hoste vnto, ye would thinke it verie excusable, in that I rather performe the duties of an host, then the ceremonies of a guest. And for my breaking the lawes of friendship with you (which I would rather die, then effectuallie do) truely, I could finde in my heart to aske you pardon for it, but that your now handliug of me giues me reason to confirme my former dealing And here Pyrocles stayed, as to breath himselfe, hauing bene transported with a litle vehemencie, because it seemed him Musidorus had ouer-bitterly glaunced against the reputation of womankind: but then quieting his countenance (aſwel as out of an vnquiet mind it might be) he thus proceeded on: And poore Loue (ſaid he) deare coſin, is litle beholding vnto you, ſince you are not contented to ſpoile it of the honour of the higheſt power of the mind, which notable men haue attributed vnto it, but ye deiect it below all other paſſions, in truth ſomwhat ſtrangely; ſince, if loue receiue any diſgrace, it is by the company of theſe paſſions you preferre before it. For thoſe kinds of bitter obiections (as, that luſt, idleneſſe, and a weake heart, ſhould be, as it were, the matter and forme of loue) rather touch me, deare Muſidorus, then loue: but I am good witneſſe of mine owne imperfections, and therefore will not defend my ſelfe: but herein I muſt ſay, you deale contrarie to your ſelfe: for if I be ſo weake, then can you not with reaſon ſtir me vp as ye did, by remembrance of mine owne vertue: or if indeed I be vertuous, then muſt ye confeſſe, that loue hath his working in a vertuous heart; and ſo no doubt hath it, whatſoeuer I be: for, if we loue vertue, in whom ſhall we loue it but in a vertuous creature? without your meaning be, I ſhould loue this word Vertue, where I ſee it written in a booke. Thoſe troubleſome effects you ſay it breeds, be not the faults of loue, but of him that loues, as an vnable veſſell to beare ſuch a liquor; like euill eyes, not able to looke on the Sun; or like a weake braine ſooneſt ouerthrowne with the beſt wine. Euen that heauenly loue you ſpeake of, is accompanied in ſome hearts with hopes, griefes, longings, and diſpaires. And in that heauenly loue, ſince there are two parts, the one the loue it ſelf, th'other the excellencie of the thing loued; I, not able at the firſt leap to frame both in me, do now (like a diligent workeman) make ready the chiefe inſtrument, & firſt part of that great worke, which is loue it ſelfe; which when I haue awhile practiſed in this ſort, then you ſhall ſee me turne it to greater matters. And thus gently you may (if it pleaſe you) thinke of me. Neither doubt ye, becauſe I weare a womans apparell, I will be the more womaniſh, ſince I aſſure you (for all my apparell) there is nothing I deſire more, then fullie to proue my ſelfe a man in this enterpriſe. Much might be ſaid in my defence, much more for loue, and moſt of all for that diuine creature, which hath ioyned me and loue together. But theſe diſputations are fitter for quiet ſchooles then my troubled braines, which are bent rather in deeds to performe, then in words to defend the noble deſire that poſſeſſeth me. O Lord (ſaid Muſidorus) how ſharp-witted you are to hurt your ſelfe? No (anſwered he) but it is the hurt you ſpeake of, which makes me ſo ſharp-witted. Euen ſo ſaid Muſidorus) as euerie baſe occupation makes one ſharpe in that practiſe, and fooliſh in all the reſt. Nay rather (anſwered Pyrocles) as each excellent thing once well learned, ſerues for a meaſure of all other knowledges. And is that become (ſaid Muſidorus) a meaſure for other things, which neuer receiued meaſure in it ſelfe? It is counted without meaſure (anſwered Pyrocles) becauſe the workings of it are without meaſure, but otherwiſe, in nature it hath meaſure, ſince it hath an end alotted vnto it. The beginning being ſo excellent, I would gladly know the end. Enioying, anſwered Pyrocles, with a deep ſigh. O (ſaid Muſidorus) now ſet ye forth the baſeneſſe of it; ſince if it end in enioying, it ſhewes all the reſt was nothing. Ye miſtake me (anſwered Pyrocles) I ſpake of the end to which it is directed; which end ends not, no ſooner then the life. Alas, let your owne braine diſenchaunt you (ſaid Muſidorus.) My heart is too farre poſſeſſed (ſayd Pyrocles.) But the head giues you direction. And the heart giues me life, anſwered Pyrocles.

But Muſidorus was ſo grieued to ſee his welbeloued friend obſtinate (as hee thought) to his owne deſtruction, that it forced him with more then accuſtomed vehe-vehemencie to speake these words; Well, well, (said he) you list to abuse your selfe; it was a verie white and red vertue, which you could picke out of a painterly glosse of a visage. Confesse the truth, and ye shall finde the vtmost was but beautie; a thing, which though it be in as great excellency in your selfe as may be in any, yet I am sure you make no further reckening of it, thē of an outward fading benefit Nature bestowed vpon you. And yet such is your want of a true grounded vertue, which must be like it selfe in all points, that what you wisely account a trifle in your selfe, you fondly become a slaue vnto in another. For my part I now protest, I haue left nothing vnsaid, which my wit could make me know, or my most entire friendship to you requires of me; I do now beseech you euen for the loue betwixt vs (if this other loue haue left any in you towards me) and for the remembrance of your old carefull father (if you can remember him that forget your selfe,) lastly for Pyrocles owne sake (who is now vpon the point of falling or rising) to purge your selfe of this vile infection, otherwise giue me leaue to leaue off this name of friendship, as an idle title of a thing which cannot be, where vertue is abolished. The length of these speeches before had not so much cloyed Pyrocles, though he were verie impatient of long deliberations, as this last farewell of him he loued as his own life, did wound his soule. For thinking himselfe afflicted, he was the apter to conceiue vnkindnesse deeply: in so much, that shaking his head, & deliuering some shew of teares, he thus vttered his griefes. Alas (said he) Prince Musidorus, how cruellie you deale with me; if you seeke the victorie, take it, and if ye list the triumph; haue you all the reason of the world, and with me remaine all the imperfections; yet such as I can no more lay frō me, then the Crow can be perswaded by the Swan to cast off all his blacke feathers. But truly you deale with me like a Physition, that seeing his Patient in a pestilent feuer, should chide him in steed of ministring helpe, and bid him be sicke no more; or rather like such a friend, that visiting his friend condemned to perpetuall prison, & loden with grieuous fetters, should wil him to shake off his fetters, or he wold leaue him. I am sicke, and sicke to the death; I am prisoner, neither is there any redresse, but by her to whom I am a slaue. Now if you list, leaue him that loues you in the highest degree: But remember euer to carie this with you, that you abandon your friend in his greatest extremitie.

And herewith the deepe wound of his loue being rubbed afresh with this new vnkindnesse, began as it were to bleed again, in such sort that he was vnable to beare it any longer, but gushing out abundance of teares, & crossing his armes ouer his wofull heart, he sunke downe to the ground: which sodaine trance went so to the heart of Musidorus, that falling downe by him, and kissing the weeping eyes of his friend, he besought him not to make account of his speech; which if it had bin ouervehement, yet was it to be borne withall, because it came out of a loue much more vehement; that he had not thought fancie could haue receiued so deepe a wound: but now finding in him the force of it, he would no further contrarie it, but employ all his seruice to medicine it, in such sort as the nature of it required But euen this kindnesse made Pyrocles the more melt in the former vnkindnesse, which his manlike teares well shewed, with a silent looke vpon Musidorus, as who should say, And is it possible that Musidorus should threaten to leaue me? And this strooke Musidorus minde and senses so dumbe too, that for griefe being not able to say anie thing, they rested with their eyes placed one vpon another, in such sort, as might well paint out the true passion of vnkindnesse to be neuer aright, but betwixt them that most dearely loue.

And thus remained they a time; till at length Muſidorus embracing him, ſaid, and will you thus ſhake off your friend? It is you that ſhake me off (ſaid Pyrocles) being for my vnperfectneſſe vnworthy of your friendſhip. But this (ſaid Muſidorus) ſhewes you more vnperfect, to be cruell to him, that ſubmits himſelfe vnto you; but ſince you are vnperfect (ſaid he ſmiling) it is reaſon you be gouerned by vs wiſe and perfect men. And that authoritie will I begin to take vpon me, with three abſolute commandements: the firſt, that you increaſe not your euill with further griefes: the ſecond, that you loue her with all the powers of your mind: and the laſt commandement ſhall be, you command me to do what ſeruice I can towards the attaining of your deſires. Pyrocles heart was not ſo oppreſſed with the two mighty paſſions of loue and vnkindneſſe, but that it yeelded to ſome mirth at this commandement of Muſidorus, that he ſhould loue: ſo that ſomething clearing his face from his former ſhewes of griefe: Well (ſaid he) deare coſin, I ſee by the well chooſing of your commandements, that you are farre fitter to be a Prince than a Counſeller, and therfore I am reſolued to imploy all my endeuour to obey you, with this condition, that the commandements ye command me to lay vpon you, ſhall onely be, that you continue to loue me, & looke vpon my imperfections with more affection then iudgement. Loue you? (ſaid he) alas, how can my heart be ſeparated from the true embracing of it, without it burſt, by being too full of it? But (ſaid he) let vs leaue off theſe flowers of new begun friendſhip; and now I pray you againe tell me, but tell it me fully, omitting no circumſtance, the ſtorie of your affections, both beginning, and proceeding; aſſuring your ſelfe, that there is nothing ſo great, which I will feare to do for you, nor nothing ſo ſmall, which I will diſdaine to do for you. Let me therefore receiue a cleare vnderſtanding, which many times we miſſe, while thoſe things we account ſmall, as a ſpeech, or a looke are omitted, like as a whole ſentence may faile of his congruitie by wanting one particle. Therefore betweene friends all muſt be laid open, nothing being ſuperfluous nor tedious. You ſhal be obeyed (ſaid Pyrocles) and here are we in as fit a place for it as may be; for this arbor no body offers to come into but my ſelfe, I vſing it as my melancholy retiring place, and therefore that reſpect is borne vnto it; yet if by chaunce any ſhould come, ſay that you are a ſeruant ſent from the Queene of the Amazons to ſeeke me, & then let me alone for the reſt. So ſate they downe, and Pyrocles thus ſaid.

Coſin (ſaid he) then began the fatall ouerthrow of all my liberty, when walking among the pictures in Kalanders houſe, you your ſelfe deliuered vnto me what you had vnderſtood of Philoclea, who much reſembling (though I muſt ſay) much ſurpaſſing) the Lady Zelmane, whom ſo well I loued: there were mine eyes infected, and at your mouth did I drinke my poyſon. Yet alas, ſo ſweet was it vnto me, that I could not be contented, till Kalander had made it more and more ſtrong with his declaration. Which the more I queſtioned, the more pitie I conceiued of her vnworthie fortune: and when with pitie once my heart was made tender, according to the aptneſſe of the humour, it receiued quickly a cruell impreſſion of that wonderfull paſſion, which to be defined is impoſſible, becauſe no words reach to the ſtrange nature of it; they only know it, which inwardly feele it, it is called loue. Yet did I not (poore wretch) at firſt know my diſeaſe, thinking it only ſuch a wonted kind of deſire to ſee rare ſights; and my pitie to be no other, but the fruits of a gentle nature. But euen this arguing with my ſelfe came of further thoughts, and the more I argued, the more my thoughts encreaſed. Deſirous I was to ſee the place where ſhe remained, as though the Architecture of the lodges would haue bene much for my learning;

but more desirous to see her selfe, to be iudge, forsooth, of the Painters cunning. For thus at the first did I flatter my selfe, as though my wound had bene no deeper: but when within short time I came to the degree of vncertaine wishes, and that those wishes grew to vnquiet longings, when I could fixe my thoughts vpon nothing, but that within litle varying they should end with Philoclea: when each thing I saw, seemed to figure out some part of my passions; whē euen Parthenias faire face became a lecture to me of Philocleas imagined beautie; when I heard no word spoken, but that me thought it caried the sound of Philocleas name: then indeed, then I did yeeld to the burthen, finding my selfe prisoner, before I had leasure to arme my selfe: and that I might well, like the spaniell, gnaw vpon the chaine that ties him, but I should sooner marre my teeth, then procure libertie: yet I take to witnesse the eternall spring of vertue, that I had neuer read, heard, nor seene any thing; I had neuer anie taste of Philosophie, nor inward feeling in my selfe, which for a while I did not call to my succour. But (alas) what resistance was there, when ere long my very reason was, (you will say corrupted) I must confesse, conquered; and that me thought euen reason did assure me, that all eyes did degenerate from their creation, which did not honour such beautie? Nothing in truth could hold any plea with it, but the reuerent friendship I beare vnto you. For as it went against my heart to breake any way from you, so did I feare more than any assault to breake it to you: finding (as it is indeed) that to a heart fully resolute, counsell is tedious, but reprehension is lothsome: and that there is nothing more terrible to a guiltie heart, then the eye of a respected friend. This made me determine with my selfe (thinking it a lesse fault in friendship to do a thing without your knowledge, then against your will) to take this secret course: which conceit was most builded vp in me, the last day of my parting and speaking with you, when vpon your speech with me, and my but naming loue (when else perchaunce I would haue gone further) I saw your voyce and countenance so chaunge, as it assured me, my reuealing it should but purchase your griefe with my cumber: and therefore (deare Musidorus) euen ran away from thy well knowne chiding: for hauing written a letter, which I know not whether you found or no, and taken my chiefe iewels with me, while you were in the middest of your sport, I got a time (as I thinke) vnmarked by any, to steale away, I cared not whither, so I might escape you, and so came I to Ithonia in the prouince of Messenia; where lying secret, I put this in practise, which before I had deuised. For remembring by Philanax his letter & Kalanders speech, how obstinately Basilius was determined not to marie his daughters, and therefore fearing least any publike dealing should rather increase her captiuitie, then further my loue; Loue (the refiner of inuention) had put in my head thus to disguise my self, that vnder that maske I might (if it were possible) get accesse, and what accesse could bring forth, commit to fortune and industrie, determining to beare the countenance of an Amazon. Therefore in the closest maner I could, naming my selfe Zelmane, for that deare Ladies sake, to whose memory I am so much bound, I caused this apparell to be made, and bringing it neare the Lodges, which are hard at hand, by night, thus dressed my selfe, resting till occasion might make me to be found by them whom I sought: which the next morning hapned as wel as my own plot could haue laid it. For after I had run ouer the whole petigree of my thoughts, I gaue my selfe to sing a litle, which, as you know, I euer delighted in, so now especiallie, whether it be the nature of this clime to stirre vp Poeticall fancies, or rather as I thinke, of loue, whose scope being pleasure, will not so much as vtter his griefes, but in some forme of pleasure.

But I had ſong verie litle, when (as I thinke, diſpleaſed with my bad muſicke) comes maſter Dametas with a hedging bill in his hand, chafing and ſwearing by the pantable of Pallas, and ſuch other othes as his ruſticall brauerie could imagine; and when he ſaw me, I aſſure you, my beautie was no more beholding to him then my harmony; for leaning his hands vpon his bill, and his chin vpon his hands, with the voyce of one that playeth Hercules in a play, but neuer had his fancy in his head, the firſt word he ſpake to me, was, Am not I Dametas? why, am not I Dametas? he needed not name himſelf, for Kalanders deſcription had ſet ſuch a note vpon him, as made him verie notable vnto me; and therefore the height of my thoughts would not deſcend ſo much as to make him any anſwere, but continued on my inward diſcourſes: which he (perchaunce witneſſe of his owne vnworthineſſe, and therefore the apter to thinke himſelfe contemned) tooke in ſo hainous maner, that ſtanding vpon his tiptoes, and ſtaring, as if he would haue had a mote pulled out of his eye, Why (ſaid he) thou woman, or boy, or both, whatſoeuer thou be, I tell thee here is no place for thee, get thee gone, I tell thee it is the Princes pleaſure, I tell thee it is Dametas pleaſure. I could not chooſe, but ſmile at him, ſeeing him looke ſo like an ape that had newly taken a purgation; yet taking my ſelfe with the maner, ſpake theſe words to my ſelfe: O ſpirit (ſaid I) of mine, how canſt thou receiue any mirth in the midſt of thine agonies, and thou mirth, how dareſt thou enter into a minde ſo growne of late thy profeſſed enemie? Thy ſpirit (ſaid Dametas) doeſt thou thinke me a ſpirit? I tell thee I am Baſilius officer, and haue charge of him and his daughters. O only pearle (ſaid I ſobbing) that ſo vile an oyſter ſhould keepe thee? By the combecaſe of Diana (ſware Dametas) this woman is mad: oyſters and pearles? doeſt thou thinke I will buy oyſters? I tell thee once againe get thee packing, and with that lifted vp his bill to hit me with the blunt end of it: but indeed that put me quite out of my leſſon, ſo that I forgat all Zelmanes ſhip, and drawing out my ſword, the baſeneſſe of the villaine yet made me ſtay my hand, & he (who, as Kalander told me, from his child-hood euer feared the blade of a ſword) ran backe, backward (with his hands aboue his head) at leaſt twentie paces, gaping and ſtaring, with the verie grace (I thinke) of the clownes, that by Latonas prayers were turned into Frogs. At length ſtaying, finding himſelfe without the compaſſe of blowes, he fell to a freſh ſcolding, in ſuch manerlie maner, as might wel ſhew he had paſſed through the diſcipline of a Tauerne. But ſeeing me walke vp and downe, without marking what he ſaid, he went his way (as I perceiued after) to Baſilius: for within a while he came vnto me, bearing indeed ſhewes in his countenance of an honeſt and well minded Gentleman, and with as much curteſie as Dametas with rudeneſſe ſaluting me, Faire Lady (ſayd he) it is nothing ſtrange, that ſuch a ſolitarie place as this ſhould receiue ſolitarie perſons; but much do I maruel, how ſuch a beautie as yours is, ſhould be ſuffered to be thus alone. I (that now knew it was my part to play) looking with a graue maieſtie vpon him, as if I found in my ſelfe cauſe to be reuerenced: They are neuer alone (ſayd I) that are accompanied with noble thoughts. But thoſe thoughts (replied Baſilius) cannot in this your lonelineſſe neither warrant you from ſuſpition in others, nor defend you from melancholie in your ſelfe. I then ſhewing a miſlike that he preſſed me ſo farre, I ſeeke no better warrant ſaid I, then my owne conſcience, nor no greater pleaſure, then mine owne contentation. Yet vertue ſeekes to ſatisfie others, ſaide Baſilius. Thoſe that be good, ſaid I, and they will be ſatisfied as long as they ſee no euill. Yet will the beſt in this countrie, ſaid Baſilius, ſuſpect ſo excellent beautie being ſo weakely garded.

Then

Then are the beſt but ſtarke naught, (anſwered I) for open ſuſpecting others, comes of ſecret condemning themſelues: but in my countrie (whoſe maners I am in all places to maintaine and reuerence) the generall goodneſſe (which is nouriſhed in our hearts) makes euerie one thinke the ſtrength of vertue in another, whereof they find the aſſured foundation in themſelues. Excellent Ladie, ſaid he, you praiſe ſo greatlie (and yet ſo wiſely) your countrie, that I muſt needs deſire to know what the neſt is, out of which ſuch birds do flie. You muſt firſt deſerue it (ſaid I) before you may obtaine it. And by what means (ſaid Baſilius) ſhall I deſerue to know your eſtate? By letting me firſt know yours (anſwered I:) To obey you (ſaid he) I will do it, although it were ſo much more reaſon yours ſhould be knowne firſt, as you do deſerue in all points to be preferd. Know you (faire Lady) that my name is Baſilius, vnworthily Lord of this country: the reſt, either fame hath already brought to your eares, or (if it pleaſe you to make this place happie by your preſence) at more leaſure you ſhall vnderſtand of me. I that from the beginniug aſſured my ſelfe it was he, but would not ſeeme I did ſo, to keepe my grauitie the better, making a peece of reuerence vnto him; Mighty Prince (ſaid I) let my not knowing you ſerue for the excuſe of my boldneſſe, and the litle reuerence I do you, impute it to the maner of my countrie, which is the inuincible land of the Amazons: my ſelfe neece to Senicia, Queene thereof, lineally deſcended of the famous Pentheſilea, ſlaine by the bloudie hand of Pyrrhus: I hauing in this my youth determined to make the world ſee the Amazons excellencies, as well in priuate, as in publike vertue, haue paſſed ſome dangerous aduentures in diuerſe countries, till the vnmercifull ſea depriued me of my company; ſo that ſhipwracke caſting me not farre hence, vncertaine wandring brought me to this place. But Baſilius (who now began to taſte of that, which ſince he hath ſwallowed vp, as I will tell you) fell to more cunning intreating my abode, then any greedy hoſte would vſe to well paying paſſengers. I thought nothing could ſhoot righter at the marke of my deſires; yet had I learned already ſo much, that it was againſt my womanhood to be forward in my owne wiſhes. And therfore he (to proue whether interceſſions in fitter mouthes might better preuaile) commaunded Dametas to bring forthwith his wife & daughters thither, three Ladies, although of diuerſe, yet of excellent beautie.

His wife in graue Matronlike attire, with countenance and geſture ſutable, and of ſuch faireneſſe (being in the ſtrength of her age) as if her daughters had not bene by, might with iuſt price haue purchaſed admiration; but they being there, it was enough that the moſt daintie eye would thinke her a worthie mother of ſuch children. The faire Pamela, whoſe noble heart I find doth greatly diſdaine, that the truſt of her vertue is repoſed in ſuch a louts hands as Dametas, had yet, to ſhew an obedience, taken on ſhepheardiſh apparell, which was but of ruſſet cloath, cut after their faſhion: with a ſtraight bodie, open breaſted, the neather part full of pleights, with long and wide ſleeues: but beleeue me ſhe did apparell her apparel, and with the preciouſneſſe of her body made it moſt ſumptuous. Her haire at the ful length, wound about with gold lace, onely by the compariſon to ſhew how farre her haire doth excell in colour: betwixt her breaſts (which ſweetly roſe vp like two faire Mountainets in the pleaſant vale of Tempe) there hong a verie rich Diamond ſet but in a blacke horne, the word I haue ſince read is this: Yet ſtill my ſelfe. And thus particularlie haue I deſcribed them, becauſe you may know that mine eyes are not ſo partiall, but that I marked them too. But when the ornament of the earth, the modell of heauen, the triumph of nature, the life of beautie, the Queene of Loue, young Philoclea appeared in her Nymph-like apparell, so neare nakednesse, as one might well discerne part of her perfections; and yet so apparelled, as did shew she kept best store of her beautie to her selfe: her haire (alas too poore a word, why should I not rather call them her beams) drawne vp into a net, able to haue caught Iupiter when he was in the forme of an eagle; her body (ô sweet bodie) couered with a light Taffeta garment, so cut, as the wrought smocke came through it in many places, enough to haue made your restrained imagination haue thought what was vnder it: with the cast of her blacke eyes, blacke indeed, whether nature so made them, that we might be the more able to behold & beare their wonderfull shining, or that she (goddesse-like) would worke this miracle with her selfe, in giuing blackenesse the price aboue all beautie. Then (I say) indeed me thought the Lillies grew pale for enuie, the Roses me thought blushed to see sweeter roses in her cheekes, & the apples, me thought, fel downe from the trees, to do homage to the apples of her breast; then the clouds gaue place, that the heauens might more freely smile vpon her, at the least the clouds of my thoughts quite vanished: and my sight (then more cleare and forcible then euer) was so fixed there, that (I imagine) I stood like a well wrought Image, with some life in shew, but none in practise. And so had I bene like enough to haue stayed long time, but that Gynecia stepping betweene my sight and the onelie Philoclea, the chaunge of obiect made me recouer my sences; so that I could with reasonable good maner receiue the salutation of her, and of the Princesse Pamela, doing them yet no further reuerence then one Princesse vseth to another. But when I came to the neuer-enough praised Philoclea, I could not but fall downe on my knees, and taking by force her hand, and kissing it (I must confesse) with more then womanly ardencie; Diuine Lady (said I) let not the world, nor these great Princesses maruell, to see me (contrarie to my maner) do this especiall honour vnto you, since all both men and women, do owe this to the perfection of your beautie. But she blushing (like a faire morning in May) at this my singularitie, and causing me to rise, Noble Ladie (said she) it is no maruell to see your iudgement much mistaken in my beautie, since you begin with so great an errour, as to do more honour vnto me then to them, to whom I my selfe owe all seruice. Rather (answered I with a bowed downe countenance) that shewes the power of your beautie, which forced me to do such an errour, if it were an errour. You are so well acquainted (said she sweetly, most sweetly smiling) with your owne beautie, that it makes you easily fall into the discourse of beautie. Beauty in me? (said I truly sighing) alas if there be any, it is in my eyes, which your blessed presence hath imparted vnto them.

But then (as I thinke Basilius willing her so to do, Well, said she, I must needs confesse I haue heard that it is a great happinesse to be praised of them that are most praise worthie: and well I find that you are an inuincible Amazon, since you will ouercome, though in a wrong matter. But if my beautie be any thing, then let it obtaine thus much of you, that you will remaine some while in this companie, to ease your owne trauell, and our solitarinesse. First let me die (said I) before anie word spoken by such a mouth should come in vaine. And thus with some other words of entertaining, was my staying concluded, and I led among them to the Lodge; trulie a place for pleasantnesse, not vnfit to flatter solitarinesse, for it being set vpon such an vnsensible rising of the ground, as you are come to a pretie height before almost you perceiue that you ascend, it giues the eye Lordship ouer a good large circuit, which according to the nature of the countrie, being diuersified betweene hilles and dales, woods and plaines, one place more cleare, another more darkedarkeſome, it ſeemes a pleaſant picture of nature, with louely light ſomneſſe and artificiall ſhadowes. The Lodge is of a yellow ſtone, built in the forme of a ſtarre, hauing ronnd about a garden framed into like points: and beyond the garden, ridings cut out, each anſwering the angles of the Lodge, at the end of one of them is the other ſmaller Lodge, but of like faſhion; where the gracious Pamela liueth: ſo that the Lodge ſeemeth not vnlike a faire Comet, whoſe taile ſtretcheth it ſelf to a ſtarre of leſſe greatneſſe.

So Gynecia her ſelfe bringing me to my lodging, anon after I was inuited and brought downe to ſup with them in the garden, a place not fairer in naturall ornaments, then artificial inuentions: where, in a banketting houſe among certaine pleaſant trees, whoſe heads ſeemed curled with the wrappings about of vine-branches. The table was ſet neere to an excellent water-worke; for by the caſting of the water in moſt cunning maner, it makes (with the ſhining of the ſunne vpon it) a perfect rain-bow, not more pleaſant to the eye then to the mind, ſo ſenſibly to ſee the proofe of the heauenly Iris. There were birds alſo made ſo finely, that they did not only deceiue the ſight with their figure, but the hearing with their ſongs, which the waterie inſtruments did make their gorge deliuer. The table at which we ſate was round, which being faſt to the floore whereon we ſate, and that deuided from the reſt of the buildings (with turning a vice, which Baſilius at firſt did to make me ſport) the table, and we about the table did all turne round, by meanes of water which ran vnder, and caried it about as a mill. But alas, what pleaſure did it to me, to make diuerſe times the full circle round about, ſince Philoclea (being alſo ſet) was caried ſtill in equall diſtance from me, and that only my eyes did ouertake her? which when the table was ſtayed, and we began to feed, dranke much more eagerly of her beautie, then my mouth did of any other liquor. And ſo was my common ſence deceiued (being chieflie bent to her) that as I dranke the wine, and withall ſtole a looke on her, me ſeemed I taſted her deliciouſneſſe. But alas, the one thirſt was much more inflamed then the other quenched. Sometimes my eyes would lay themſelues open to receiue all the darts ſhe did throw, ſometimes cloſe vp with admiration, as if with a contrary fancie, they wold preſerue the riches of that ſight they had gotten, or caſt my lids as curtaines ouer the image of beautie, her preſence had painted in them. True it is, that my Reaſon (now growne a ſeruant to paſſion) did yet often tell his maiſter, that he ſhould more moderately vſe his delight. But he, that of a rebel was become a Prince, diſdained almoſt to allow him the place of a Counſeller: ſo that my ſences delights being too ſtrong for any other reſolution, I did euen looſe the reines vnto them: hoping, that (going for a woman) my lookes would paſſe, either vnmarked, or vnſuſpected.

Now thus I had (as me thought) well playd my firſt act, aſſuring my ſelfe, that vnder that diſguiſement, I ſhould find oportunitie to reueale my ſelfe to the owner of my heart. But who wold thinke it poſſible (though I feele it true) that in almoſt eight weekes ſpace I haue liued here (hauing no more companie but her parents, and I being familiar, as being a woman, and watchfull, as being a louer) yet could neuer find oportunitie to haue one minutes leaſure of priuate conference: the cauſe whereof is as ſtrange, as the effects are to me miſerable. And (alas) this it is.

At the firſt ſight that Baſilius had of me (I thinke Cupid hauing headed his arrowes with my misfortune) he was ſtriken (taking me to be ſuch as I profeſſe) with great affection towards me, which ſince is growne to ſuch a doting loue, that till I was faine to get this place, ſometimes to retire vnto freely) I was euen choked with his tediouſneſſe. You neuer ſawe foureſcore yeares daunce vp and downe more liuely in a young louer: now, as fine in his apparell, as if he would make me in loue with a cloake: and verſe for verſe with the ſharpeſt-witted Louer in Arcadia. Do you not thinke that this is a ſallet of wormewood, while mine eyes feed vpon the Ambroſia of Philocleas beautie. But this is not all; no, this is not the worſt; for he (good man) were eaſie enough to be dealt with: but, as I thinke, Loue and miſchiefe hauing made a wager, which ſhould haue moſt power in me, haue ſet Gynecia alſo on ſuch a fire towards me, as will neuer (I feare) be quenched but with my deſtruction. For ſhe (being a woman of excellent wit, and of ſtrong working thoughts) whether ſhe ſuſpected me by my ouer-vehemēt ſhewes of affection to Philoclea (which loue forced me vnwiſely to vtter, while hope of my maske fooliſhly encouraged me) or that ſhe hath taken ſome other marke of me, that I am not a woman: or what diuell it is hath reuealed it vnto her, I know not; but ſo it is, that all her countenances, words, and geſtures, are euen miſerable portraitures of a deſperate affection. Wherby a man may learne, that theſe auoydings of companie, do but make the paſſions more violent, when they meete with fit ſubiects. Truly it were a notable dumbe ſhew of Cupids kingdome, to ſee my eyes (languiſhing with ouer-vehement longing) direct themſelues to Philoclea: & Baſilius as buſie about me as a Bee, and indeed as cumberſome; making ſuch vehement ſuits to me, who neither could if I would, nor would if I could, help him: while the terrible wit of Gynecia, caried with the beere of violent loue, runnes through vs all. And ſo iealous is ſhe of my loue to her daughter, that I could neuer yet begin to open my mouth to the vneuitable Philoclea, but that her vnwiſhed preſence gaue my tale a concluſion, before it had a beginning. And ſurely if I be not deceiued, I ſee ſuch ſhewes of liking, & (if I be acquainted with paſſions) of almoſt a paſſionate liking in the heauenly Philoclea, towards me, that I may hope her eares would not abhorre my diſcourſe. And for good Baſilius, he thought it beſt to haue lodged vs together, but that the eternall hatefulneſſe of my deſtinie made Gynecias iealouſie ſtop that, and all other my bleſſings. Yet muſt I confeſſe, that one way her loue doth me pleaſure; for ſince it was my fooliſh fortune, or vnfortunate follie, to be knowne by her, that keeps her from bewraying me to Baſilius. And thus (my Muſidorus) you haue my tragedie played vnto you by my ſelfe, which I pray the gods may not indeed prooue a tragedie. And therewith he ended, making a full point of a heartie ſigh.

Muſidorus recommended to his beſt diſcourſe, all which Pyrocles had told him. But therin he found ſuch intricateneſſe, that he could ſee no way to leade him out of the maze; yet perceiuing his affectiō ſo grounded, that ſtriuing againſt it, did rather anger then heale the wound, and rather call his friendſhip in queſtion then giue place to anie friendlie counſell. Well (ſaid he) deare coſin, ſince it hath pleaſed the gods to mingle your other excellencies with this humour of loue, yet happie it is, that your loue is imployed vpon ſo rare a woman: for certainely, a noble cauſe doth eaſe much a grieuous caſe. But as it ſtands now, nothing vexeth me, as that I cannot ſee wherein I can be ſeruiceable vnto you. I deſire no greater ſeruice of you (anſwered Pyrocles) then that you remaine ſecretly in this country, and ſometimes come to this place, either late in the night or earlie in the morning, where you ſhall haue my key to enter, becauſe as my fortune either amends or impaires, I may declare it vnto you, and haue your counſell and furtherance: and hereby I wil of purpoſe leade her, that is the praiſe, and yet the ſtaine of all womankind, that you may haue ſo good a view, as to allow my iudgement: and as I can get the moſt conuenient time, I will come vnto you; for though by reaſon of yonder wood you cannot ſee the Lodge, it is harde at hande. But now (ſaid ſhe) it is time for me to leaue you, and towardes euening we will walke out of purpoſe hitherward, therefore keepe your ſelfe cloſe in that time. But Muſidorus bethinking him ſelfe that his horſe might happen to bewray them, thought it beſt to returne for that day to a village not farre off, and diſpatching his horſe in ſome ſort, the next day early to come a foot thither, and ſo to keepe that courſe afterward, which Pyrocles very well liked of. Now farewell deere couſin (ſaid he) from me, no more Pyrocles, nor Daiphantus now, but Zelmane: Zelmane is my name, Zelmane is my title, Zelmane is the onely hope of my aduauncement. And with that word going out, and ſeeing that the coaſt was cleare, Zelmane diſmiſſed Muſidorus, who departed as full of care to help his friend, as before he was to diſſwade him.

Zelmane returned to the lodge, where (inflamed by Philoclea, watched by Gynecia, and tired by Baſilius) ſhe was like a horſe, deſirous to runne, and miſerably ſpurred, but ſo ſhort raind, as he cannot ſtirre forward: Zelmane ſought occaſion to ſpeake with Philoclea; Baſilius with Zelmane; & Gynecia hindered them all. If Philoclea happned to ſigh (and ſigh ſhe did often) as if that ſigh were to be wayted on, Zelmane ſighed alſo; whereto Baſilius and Gynecia ſoone made vp foure parts of ſorrow. Their affection increaſed their conuerſation; and their conuerſation increaſed their affection. The reſpect borne bred due ceremonies; but the affection ſhined ſo through them, that the ceremonies ſeemed not ceremonious. Zelmanes eyes were (like children before ſweet meate) eager, but fearefull of their ill-pleaſing gouernors. Time in one inſtant, ſeeming both ſhort, and long vnto them: ſhort, in the pleaſingneſſe of ſuch preſence: long, in the ſtay of their deſires.

But Zelmane failed not to intice them all many times abroad, becauſe ſhe was deſirous her friend Muſidorus (neere whom of purpoſe ſhe led them) might haue full ſight of them. Sometimes angling to a litle riuer neere hand, which for the moiſture it beſtowed vpon rootes of ſome flouriſhing trees, was rewarded with their ſhadow. There would they ſit down, and pretie wagers be made betweene Pamela and Philoclea, which could ſooneſt beguile ſilly fiſhes, while Zelmane proteſted, that the fit pray for them was hearts of Princes. She alſo had an angle in her hand; but the taker was ſo taken, that ſhe had forgotten taking. Baſilius in the meane time would be the cooke himſelfe of what was ſo caught, and Gynecia ſit ſtill, but with no ſtill penſiueneſſe. Now ſhe brought them to ſee a ſeeled Doue, who the blinder ſhe was, the higher ſhe ſtraue. Another time a Kite, which hauing a gut cunningly pulled out of her, and ſo let flie, cauſed all the Kites in that quarter, who (as oftentimes the world is deceiued) thinking her proſperous, when in deede ſhe was wounded, made the poore Kite finde, that opinion of riches may well be dangerous.

But theſe recreations were interrupted by a delight of more gallant ſhew; for one euening, as Baſilius returned from hauing forced his thoughts to pleaſe themſelues in ſuch ſmall conqueſts, there came a ſhepheard, who brought him word, that a Gentleman deſired leaue to do a meſſage from his Lord vnto him. Baſilius granted; whereupon the Gentleman came, and after the dutifull ceremonies obſerued, in his maiſters name tolde him, that he was ſent from Phalantus of Corinth, to craue licence, that as he had done in many other courts, ſo he might in his preſence defie all Arcadian Knights in the behalfe of his miſtreſſe beautie, who would beſides, her ſelfe in perſon be preſent, to giue euident proofe what his launce ſhould affirme. The conditions of his chalenge were, that the defendant ſhould bring his miſtreſſe

Picture,which being set by the image of Artesia (so was the mistresse of Phalantus named) who in sixe courses should haue better of the other, in the iudgement of Basilius,with him both the honors and the pictures should remaine. Basilius (though he had retired himselfe into that solitarie dwelling, with intention to auoid, rather then to accept any matters of drawing companie; yet because he would entertaine Zelmane,(that she might not thinke the time so gainfull to him,losse to her) graunted him to pitch his tent for three daies, not farre from the lodge, and to proclaime his challenge,that what Arcadian Knight(for none els but vpon his perill was licensed to come) would defend what he honored against Phalantus,should haue the like freedome of accesse and returne.

This obteined and published,Zelmane being desirous to learne what this Phalantus was,hauing neuer knowne him further then by report of his good iusting, in so much as he was commonly called, The faire man of armes, Basilius told her that he had had occasion by one verie inward with him, to know in part the discourse of his life,which was,that he was bastard-brother to the faire Helen Queen of Corinth, and deerely esteemed of her for his exceeding good parts, being honorablie courteous, and wrongleslie valiant, considerately pleasant in conuersation, and an excellent courtier without vnfaithfulnesse; who finding his sisters vnperswadeable melancholy,through the loue of Amphialus)had for a time left her court, and gone into Laconia: where in the warre against the Helots,he had gotten the reputation of one,that both durst and knew. But as it was rather choise then nature, that led him to matters of armes, so as soone as the spur of honor ceased, he willingly rested in peaceable delights,being beloued in all companies for his louely qualities, and (as a man may terme it)winning cherefulnesse,whereby to the Prince and Court of Laconia,none was more agreable then Phalantus: and he not giuen greatly to struggle with his own disposition,followed the gentle currant of it, hauing a fortune sufficient to content,and he content with a sufficient fortune. But in that court he saw,& was acquainted with this Artesia, whose beautie he now defends, became her seruant,said himselfe,and perchaunce thought himselfe her louer. But certainly,said Basilius,many times it falles out,that these yong companions make themselues beleeue they loue at the first liking of a likely beautie; louing, because they will loue for want of other businesse,not because they feele in deed that diuine power, which makes the heart find a reason in passion: and so (God knowes) as inconstantly leaue vpon the next chaunce that beautie castes before them. So therefore taking loue vpon him like a fashion, he courted this Ladie Artesia, who was as fit to paie him in his owne monie as might be. For she thinketh she did wrong to her beautie if she were not prowd of it,called her disdaine of him chastitie, and placed her honour in litle setting by his honouring her: determining neuer to marrie, but him, whom she thought worthie of her: and that was one, in whom all worthinesses were harboured. And to this conceipt not only nature had bent her, but the bringing vp she receiued at my sister in law Cecropia, had confirmed her: who hauing in her widowhood taken this yong Artesia into her charge; because her father had bene a deare friend of her dead husbands, had taught her to thinke that there is no wisdome but in including both heauen and earth in ones selfe: and that loue, curtesie, gratefulnesse,friendship,and all other vertues are rather to be taken on, then taken in ones selfe: And so good a disciple she found of her, that liking the fruits of her own planting,she was content (if so her sonne could haue liked of it) to haue wished her in marriage to my Nephew Amphialus. But I thinke that desire hath lost some of his heat, heat, since she hath knowne, that such a Queene as Helen is, doth offer so great a price as a Kingdome, to buy his fauour; for if I be not deceiued in my good sister Cecropia, she thinks no face so beautifull, as that which lookes vnder a Crowne. But Artesia in deede liked well of my Nephew Amphialus; for I can neuer deeme that loue, which in haughtie hearts proceeds of a desire onely to please, and as it were, peacock themselues; but yet she hath shewed vehemencie of desire that way, I think, because all her desires be vehement, in so much that she hath both placed her only brother (a fine youth called Ismenus) to be his squire, and her selfe is content to wait vpon my sister, till she may see the vttermost what she may worke in Amphialus: who being of a melancholie (though I must say truly curteous and noble) mind, seemes to loue nothing lesse then Loue: and of late hauing through some aduenture, or inward miscontentment, withdrawne himselfe from any bodies knowledge, where he is: Artesia the easier condiscended to go to the court of Laconia, whither she was sent for by the Kings wife, to whome she is somewhat allied.

And there after the war of the Helots, this Knight Phalantus, (at least for tongue-delight) made him selfe her seruant, and she so little caring, as not to shewe mislike thereof, was content onely to be noted to haue a notable seruant. For truely one in my court neerely acquainted with him, within these few dayes made me a pleasant description of their loue, while he with cheerefull lookes would speake sorowful words, vsing the phrase of his affection in so high a stile, that Mercurie would not haue wooed Venus with more magnificent Eloquence: but els neither in behauiour, nor action, accusing in himselfe any great trouble in mind, whether he sped or no. And she on the other side, well finding how litle it was, and not caring for more, yet taught him, that often it falleth out but a foolish wittinesse, to speake more then one thinks.

For she made earnest benefite of his iest, forcing him in respect of his profession, to do her such seruices, as were both cumbersome and costly vnto him, while he still thought he went beyond her, because his heart did not commit the idolatrie. So that lastly, she (I thinke) hauing in mind to make the fame of her beautie an oratour for her to Amphialus, (perswading her selfe perhaps, that it might fall out in him, as it doth in some that haue delightfull meat before them, & haue no stomack to it, before other folks praise it) she tooke the aduantage one day vpon Phalantus vnconscionable praisings of her, & certaine cast-away vowes, how much he would do for her sake, to arrest his word assoone as it was out of his mouth, & by the vertue therof to charge him to go with her through all the courts of Greece, and with the chalenge now made, to giue her beautie the principalitie ouer all other. Phalantus was entrapped, & saw round about him, but could not get out. Exceedingly perplexed he was (as he confest to him that told me the tale) not for doubt he had of himselfe, (for in deede he had litle cause, being accounted, with his Launce especially) whereupon the calleng is to be tryed) as perfect as any that Greece knoweth; but because he feared to offend his sister Helen, and withall (as he said) he could not so much beleeue his loue, but that he must think in his heart (whatsoeuer his mouth affirmed) that both she, my daughters, & the faire Parthenia (wife to a most noble Gentleman my wiues neere kinsman) might far better put in their claime for that prerogatiue. But his promise had bound him prentice, and therefore it was now better with willingnesse to purchase thanks, then with a discontented doing to haue the paine, and not the reward; and therefore went on, as his faith, rather then loue, did lead him. And now hath he alreadie passed the courts of Laconia, Elis, Argos & Corinth: &

(as many times it happēs)that a good pleader makes a bad cauſe to preuaile; ſo hath his Launce brought captiues to the triumph of Arteſias beautie, ſuch, as though Arteſia be among the faireſt,yet in that companie were to haue the preheminence: for in thoſe courts many knights(that had bene in other farre countries) defended ſuch as they had ſeen,and liked in their trauaile: but their defence had bene ſuch;as they had forfaited the pictures of their Ladies, to giue a forced falſe teſtimonie to Arteſias excellencie. And now laſtly is he come hither where he hath leaue to trie his fortune. But I aſſure you, if I thought it not in due and true conſideration an iniurious ſeruice and churliſh curteſie,to put the danger of ſo noble a title in the deciding of ſuch a dangerleſſe combat, I would make yong maiſter Phalantus know,that your eyes can ſharpen a blunt Launce,and that age,which my gray haires(only gotten by the louing care of others)make ſeeme more then it is,hath not diminiſhed in me the power to protect an vndeniable veritie. With that he buſtled vp himſelfe,as though his heart would faine haue walked abroad. Zelmane with an inward ſmyling gaue him outward thanks,deſiring him to reſerue his force for worthier cauſes. So paſſing their time according to their woont, they waited for the comming of Phalantus, who the next morning hauing alreadie cauſed his tents to be pitched, neere to a faire tree hard by the Lodge, had vpon the tree made a ſhield to be hanged vp, which the defendant ſhould ſtrike, that would call him to the maintaining his challenge. The Impreſa in the ſhield; was a heauen full of ſtarres, with a ſpeech ſignifying,that it was the beautie which gaue it the praiſe.

Himſelfe came in next after a triumphant chariot,made of Carnation veluet, enriched with purle and pearle, wherein Arteſia ſate, drawne by foure winged horſes with artificiall flaming mouths,and fiery wings, as if ſhe had newly borowed them of Phœbus.Before her marched, two after two, certaine footmen pleaſantly attired, who betweene them held one picture after another of them, that by Phalantus well running had loſt the prize in the race of beauty, and at euery pace they ſtayed, turning the pictures to each ſide, ſo leaſurely,that with perfect iudgement they might be diſcerned. The firſt that came in (following the order of the time wherein they had bene wonne)was the picture of Andromana, Queene of Iberia; whom a Laconian Knight hauing ſometime (and with ſpeciall fauour) ſerued, (though ſome yeares ſince returned home) with more gratefulneſſe then good fortune defended. But therein Fortune had borrowed wit; for in deede ſhe was not comparable to Arteſia; not becauſe ſhe was a good deale elder (for time had not yet bene able to impouerish her ſtore thereof)but an exceeding red haire with ſmall eyes, did (like ill companions) diſgrace the other aſſembly of moſt commendable beauties.

Next after her was borne the counterfait of the princeſſe of Elis, a Ladie that taught the beholders no other point of beautie, but this, that as lyking is not alwaies the child of beautie,ſo whatſoeuer liketh is beautifull; for in that viſage there was neither maieſtie, grace, fauour, nor faireneſſe; yet ſhe wanted not a ſeruant that would haue made her fairer then the faire Arteſia. But he wrote her praiſes with his helmet in the duſt, and left her picture to be as true a witneſſe of his ouerthrow,as his running was of her beautie.

After her was the goodly Artaxia, great Q. of Armenia, a Lady vpon whom nature beſtowed,and well placed her moſt delightfull colours; and withall, had proportioned her without any fault,quickly to be diſcouered by the ſenſes, yet altogether ſeemed not to make vp that harmony,that Cupid delights in,the reaſon whereof might ſeeme a manniſh countenance,which ouerthrew that louely ſweeteneſſe,the noblest power of womankinde, farre fitter to preuaile by parley then by battell.

Of a farre contrary consideration was the representation of her that next followed, which was Erona Queene of Licia, who though of so browne a haire, as no man should haue iniuried it to haue called it black, and that in the mixture of her cheeks the white did so much ouercome the redde (though what was, was very pure) that it came neare to paleness, and that her face was a thought longer then the exact Symmetrians perhaps would allow; yet loue plaid his part so well in euerie parte, that it caught hold of the iudgement, before it could iudge, making it first loue, and after acknowledge it faire, for there was a certaine delicacie, which in yeelding conquered; and with a pitifull looke made one finde cause to craue helpe himselfe.

After her came two Ladies, of noble, but not of royall birth: the former was named Baccha, who though very faire, & of a fatnes rather to allure, then to mislike, yet her breasts ouer-familiarly laid open, with a made countenance about her mouth, between simpring and smyling, her head bowed somewhat downe, seemed to languish with ouer-much idleness, and with an inuiting looke cast vpward; disswaded with too much perswading, while hope might seem to ouer-run desire.

The other (whose name was written Leucippe) was of a fine daintinesse of beauty, her face carying in it a sober simplicitie; like one that could do much good, & meant no hurt, her eyes hauing in them such a cheerefulnesse, as nature seemed to smile in them: though her mouth and cheekes obeyed to that pretie demureness which the more one markte, the more one would iudge the poore soule apt to beleeue; and therefore the more pitie to deceiue her.

Next came the Queene of Laconia, one that seemed borne in the confines of beauties kingdome: for all her lineaments were neither perfect possessioners thereof, nor absolute strangers thereto: but she was a Queene, and therefore beautifull.

But she that followed, conquered in deed with being conquered; and might wel haue made all the beholders wait vpō her triumph, while her selfe were led captiue. It was the excellently-faire Queene Helen, whose Iacinth haire curled by nature, but intercurled by art (like a fine brooke through goldē sands) had a rope of faire pearle, which now hiding, now hidden by the haire, did as it were play at fast and loose, each with other, mutually giuing & receiuing richnesse. In her face so much beauty & fauour expressed, as if Helen had not bene knowne, some would rather haue iudged it the painters exercise, to shew what he could do, then the conterfaiting of any liuing patterne: for no fault the most fault-finding wit could haue found, if it were not, that to the rest of the body the face was somewhat too little: but that little was such a sparke of beauty, as was able to enflame a world of loue: for euery thing was full of a choice fineness, that if it wanted any thing in maiestie, it supplied it with increase in pleasure; and if at the first it strake not admiration, it rauished with delight. And no indifferent soule there was, which if it could resist from subiecting it self to make it his princesse, that would not long to haue such a playfellow. As for her attire, it was costly & curious, though the looke (fixt with more sadnesse then it seemed nature had bestowed to any that knew her fortune) bewraied, that as she vsed those ornaments, not for her selfe, but to preuaile with another, so she feared that all would not serue. Of a farre differing (though esteemed equal) beautie, was the faire Parthenia, who next waited on Artesias triumph, though farre better she might haue sit in the throne. For in her euery thing was goodly, & stately; yet so, that it might seeme that great-mindednes was but the auncient-bearer to the humblenes. For her great graie eye, which might seeme full of her own beautie: a large, and exceedingly faire forehead,with all the reſt of her face and body,caſt in the mould of Nobleneſſe,was yet ſo attired,as might ſhew, the miſtres thought it either not to deſerue , or not to neede any exquiſite decking, hauing no adorning but cleanlineſſe;and ſo farre from all art, that it was full of careleſneſſe : vnleſſe that careleſneſſe it ſelfe (in ſpight of it ſelfe) grew artificiall. But Baſilius could not abſtaine from praiſing Parthenia, as the perfect picture of a womanly vertue , and wiuely faithfulneſſe : telling withall Zelmane,how he had vnderſtood,that when in the court of Laconia, her picture (maintained by a certaine Sycionian Knight) was loſt,through want rather of valour, then iuſtice : her husband(the famous Argalus) would in a chafe haue gone & redeemed it with a new triall. But ſhe (more ſporting then ſorowing for her vndeſerued champion)told her husband,ſhe deſired to be beautifull in no bodies eye but his ; and that ſhe would rather marre her face as euill as euer it was , then that it ſhould be a cauſe to make Argalus put on armour . Then would Baſilius haue tolde Zelmane that which ſhe already knew,of the rare triall of that coupled affection : but the next picture made their mouthes giue place to their eyes.

It was of a young maid, which ſate pulling out a thorne out of a Lambes foote, with her looke ſo attentiue vpon it, as if that little foote could haue bene the circle of her thoughts, her apparell ſo poore,as it had nothing but the inſide to adorne it; a ſheephooke lying by her,with a bottle vpon it . But withall that pouertie , beauty plaid the prince, and cammanded as many harts as the greateſt Queene there did. Her beautie and her eſtate made her quicklie to be knowne to be the faire ſhepheardeſſe Vrania, whom a rich knight called Lacemon, farre in loue with her,had vnluckily defended.

The laſt of all in place, becauſe laſt in the time of her being captiue , was Zelmane, daughter to the King Plexirtus : who at the firſt ſight ſeemed to haue ſome reſembling of Philoclea,but with more marking(comparing it to the preſent Philoclea, who indeed had no paragon but her ſiſter)they might ſee,it was but ſuch a likeneſſe as an vnperfect glaſſe doth giue; anſwerable enough in ſome features and colours, but erring in others.But Zelmane ſighing,turning to Baſilius, Alas ſir (ſaid ſhe) here be ſome pictures which might better become the tombes of their Miſtreſſes , then the triumph of Arteſia. It is true ſweeteſt Lady (ſaid Baſilius) ſome of them be dead, and ſome other captiue : But that hath happened ſo late , as it may be the Knights that defended their beauty, knew not ſo much : without we will ſay (as in ſome harts I know it would fall out)that death it ſelfe could not blot out the image which loue hath engrauen in them. But diuers beſides theſe (ſaid Baſilius) hath Phalantus wonne,but he leaues the reſt, carying onely ſuch, who either for greatnes of eſtate, or of beauty,may iuſtly glorifie the glory of Arteſias triumph.

Thus talked Baſilius with Zelmane, glad to make any matter ſubiect to ſpeake of with his miſtreſſe,while Phalantus in this pompous maner,brought Arteſia with her gentlewomen into one Tent , by which he had another : where they both wayted who would firſt ſtrike vpon the ſhield , while Baſilius the Iudge appointed ſticklers and trumpets,to whom the other ſhould obey.But none that day appeared, nor the next,til alreadie it had conſumed halfe his allowance of light ; but then there came in a knight,proteſting himſelfe as contrarie to him in mind , as he was in apparell. For Phalantus was all in white, hauing in his baſes,and capariſon imbroidered a waning water : at each ſide whereof he had nettings caſt ouer , in which were diuers fiſhes naturally made,and ſo pretily, that as the horſe ſtirred , the fiſhes ſeemed to ſtriue,and leape in the net.

But

But the other knight by name Nestor, by birth an Arcadian, & in affection vowed to the faire Shepherdesse, was all in black, with fire burning both vpon his armour and horse. His impresa in his shield, was a fire made of Iuniper, with this word, More easie, and more sweete. But this hote knight was cooled with a fall, which at the third course he receiued of Phalantus, leauing his picture to keepe companie with the other of the same stampe; he going away remedilesly chafing at his rebuke. The next was Polycetes, greatly esteemed in Arcadia, for deedes he had done in armes: and much spoken of for the honourable loue he had long borne to Gynecia; which Basilius himselfe was content, not onely to suffer, but to be delighted with; he carried it in so honourable and open plainnesse, setting to his loue no other marke, then to do her faithfull seruice. But neither her faire picture, nor his faire running, could warrant him from ouerthrow, and her from becomming as then the last of Artesias victories: a thing Gynecias vertues would little haue recked at another time, nor then, if Zelmane had not seene it. But her champion went away asmuch discomforted, as discomfited. Then Telamon for Polexena and Eurilion for Elpine, and Leon for Zoana; all braue Knights, all faire Ladies, with their going downe, lifted vp the ballance of his praise for actiuitie, and hers for faireneſſe.

Vpon whose losse as the beholders were talking, there comes into the place where they ranne, a shepheard stripling (for his height made him more then a boy, and his face would not allow him a man) brown of complexion (whether by nature or by the Sunnes familiaritie) but verie louely withall; for the rest so perfectly proportioned. that Nature shewed, shee doth not like men, who slubber vp matters of meane account. And well might his proportion be iudged; for he had nothing vpō him but a paire of sloppes, and vpon his bodie a Gote-skinne, which he cast ouer his shoulder, doing all things with so pretie a grace, that it seemed ignorance could not make him do a misse, because he had a hart to do well, holding in his right hand a long staffe, and so comming with a looke full of amiable fiercenesse, as in whom choller could not take away the sweetnesse, he came towards the king, and making a reuerence (which in him was comely because it was kindly.) My liege Lord (said he) I pray you heare a few words; for my heart will breake if I say not my minde to you. I see here the picture of Vrania, which (I cannot tell how, nor why) these men when they fall downe, they say, is not so faire as yonder gay woman. But pray God, I may neuer see my old mother aliue, if I think she be any more match to Vrania, then a Goate is to a fine Lambe; or then the Dog that keepes our flock at home, is like your white Greyhound, that pulled downe the Stagge last day.

And therefore I pray you let me be drest as they be, and my hart giues me, I shall tumble him on the earth: for in deede he might aswel say, that a Couslip is as white as a Lillie: or els I care not, let him come with his great staffe, and I with this in my hand, and you shall see what I can do to him. Basilius saw it was the fine shepheard Lalus, whom once he had afore him in Pastorall sportes, and had greatly delighted in his wit full of pretie simplicitie, and therefore laughing at his earnestnesse, he bad him be content, since he saw the pictures of so great Queenes, were faine to follow their champions fortune. But Lalus (euen weeping ripe) went among the rest, longing to see some bodie that would reuenge Vranias wrong; and praying hartily for euery bodie that ran against Phalantus, then beginning to feele pouerty, that he could not set him selfe to that triall. But by and by, euen when the Sunne (like a noble hart) began to shew his greatest countenāce in his lowest estate, there came in a Knight, called Phebilus, a Gentleman of that countrey, for whom hatefull fortune had borowed the dart of loue, to make him miſerable by the ſight of Philoclea. For he had euē frō her infancie loued her, & was ſtrikē by her before ſhe was able to know what quiuer of arrowes her eyes caried; but he loued & diſpaired; & the more he diſpaired, the more he loued. He ſaw his own vnworthineſſe, and therby made her excellencie haue more terrible aſpect vpon him: he was ſo ſecret therin, as not daring to be open, that to no creature he euer ſpake of it, but his hart made ſuch ſilent complaints within it ſelfe, that while al his ſenſes were attentiue thereto, cunning iudges might perceiue his mind: ſo that he was known to loue though he denied, or rather was the better known, becauſe he denied it. His armour and his attire was for a Sea colour, his Impreſa, the fiſh called Scpia, which being in the net, caſtes a blacke inke about it ſelfe, that in the darkeneſſe thereof it may ſcape: his word was, Not ſo. Philocleas picture with almoſt an idolatrous magnificence was borne in by him. But ſtraight iealouſie was a harbinger for diſdaine in Zelmanes heart, when ſhe ſaw any (but her ſelfe) ſhould bee auowed a champion for Philoclea: in ſomuch that ſhee wiſht his ſhame, till ſhe ſaw him ſhamed: for at the ſecond courſe hee was ſtriken quite frō out of the ſaddle, ſo full of griefe, and rage withall, that he wold faine with the ſword haue reuenged it: but that being contrary to the order ſet downe, Baſilius wold not ſuffer; ſo that wiſhing himſelf in the bottome of the earth, he went his way, leauing Zelmane no leſſe angry with his loſſe, then ſhee would haue bene with his victory. For if ſhe thought before a riuals praiſe would haue angred her, her Ladies diſgrace did make her much more forget what ſhe then thought, while that paſſion raigned ſo much the more, as ſhe ſaw a prety bluſh in Philocleas cheekes bewray a modeſt diſcontentment. But the night commanded truce for thoſe ſports, and Phalantus (though intreated) would not leaue Arteſia, who in no caſe would come into the houſe, hauing (as it were) ſuckt of Cecropias breath a mortall miſlike againſt Baſilius.

But the night meaſured by the ſhort ell of ſleepe, was ſoone paſt ouer, and the next morning had giuen the watchfull ſtars leaue to take their reſt, when a trumpet ſummoned Baſilius to play his Iudges part: which he did, taking his wife and daughters with him; Zelmane hauing lockt her dore, ſo as they would not trouble her for that time: for already there was a Knight in the field, ready to proue Helen of Corinth had receiued great iniury, both by the erring iudgement of the challenger, and the vnlucky weakeneſſe of her former defender. The new Knight was quickly knowne to be Clitophon (Kalanders ſonne of Baſilius his ſiſter) by his armour, which all guilt, was ſo well handled, that it ſhewed like a glittering ſand and grauell, enterlaced with ſiluer riuers: his deuiſe hee had put in the picture of Helen which hee defended: It was the Ermion with a ſpeach that ſignified, Rather dead then ſpotted. But in that armour ſince hee had parted from Helen (who would no longer his company, finding him to enter into tearmes of affection) hee had performed ſo honourable actions (ſtill ſeeking for his two friends by the names of Palladius and Daiphantus) that though his face were couered, his being was diſcouered, which yet Baſilius (which had brought him vp in his court) would not ſeeme to do; but glad to ſee triall of him, of whom he had heard very well, he commanded the trumpets to ſound; to which the two braue Knights obeying, they performed their courſes, breaking their ſix ſtaues, with ſo good, both skill in the hitting, and grace in the maner, that it bred ſome difficulty in the iudgement. But Baſilius in the end gaue ſentence againſt Clitophon, becauſe Phalantus had broken more ſtaues vpon the head, and that once Clitophon had receiued ſuch a blow, that he had loſt the raines of his horſe,with his head well nie touching the croper of the horſe. But Clitophon was ſo angrie with the iudgement(wherein he thought he had receiued wrong)that he omitted his duetie to his Prince, and vncle; and ſodainly went his way ſtill in the queſt of them,whom as then he had left by ſeeking: and ſo yeelded the field to the next commer.

Who comming in about two houres after, was no leſſe marked then all the reſt before, becauſe he had nothing worth the marking. For he had neither picture,nor deuice, his armor of as old a faſhion(beſides the ruſtie pooreneſſe,) that it might better ſeeme a monument of his grandfathers courage: about his middle he had in ſteede of baſes, a long cloak of ſilke,which as vnhandſomely, as it needes muſt, became the wearer: ſo that all that lookt on, meaſured his length on the earth alreadie,ſince he had to meete one who had bene victorious of ſo many gallants. But he went on towards the ſhield,and with a ſober grace ſtrake it; but as he let his ſword fall vpon it, another Knight, all in blacke came ruſtling in,who ſtrake the ſhield almoſt as ſoone as he,& ſo ſtrongly, that he brake the ſhield in two: the ill appointed Knight(for ſo the beholders called him)angrie with that,(as he accounted) inſolēt iniurie to himſelfe, hit him ſuch a ſound blow, that they that looked on ſaid,it well became a rude arme. The other aunſwered him againe in the ſame caſe, ſo that Launces were put to ſilence,the ſwords were ſo buſie.

But Phalantus angrie of this defacing his ſhield,came vpon the black Knight,and with the pommell of his ſword ſet fire to his eyes, which preſently was reuenged, not onely by the Black, but the ill apparelled Knight,who diſdained another ſhould enter into his quarrell,ſo as, who euer ſaw a matachin daunce to imitate fighting, this was a fight that did imitate the matachin: for they being but three that fought, euery one had two aduerſaries,ſtriking him, who ſtrooke the third, and reuenging perhaps that of him,which he had receiued of the other. But Baſilius riſing himſelf came to part them,the ſticklers authoritie ſcarſly able to perſwade cholerike hearers; and part them he did.

But before he could determine,comes in a fourth, halting on foote, who complained to Baſilius, demaunding iuſtice on the blacke Knight, for hauing by force taken away the picture of Pamela from him, which in little forme he ware in a Tablet,and couered with ſilke had faſtened it to his Helmet, purpoſing for want of a bigger,to paragon the little one with Arteſias length,not doubting but euen in that little quantitie, the excellencie of that would ſhine thorow the weakeneſſe of the other: as the ſmalleſt ſtarre doth thorow the whole Element of fire. And by the way he had met with this black Knight,who had(as he ſaid) robbed him of it. The iniurie ſeemed grieuous,but when it came fully to be examined, it was found, that the halting Knight meeting the other, asking the cauſe of his going thitherward, and finding it was to defend Pamelas diuine beautie againſt Arteſias, with a prowd iollitie commaunded him to leaue that quarrell onely for him,who was onely worthie to enter into it. But the blacke Knight obeying no ſuch cōmaundements, they fell to ſuch a bickering, that he gat a halting, and loſt his picture. This vnderſtood by Baſilius,he told him he was now fitter to looke to his own bodie, then an others picture: and ſo (vncomforted therein) ſent him away to learne of Æſculapius, that he was not fit for Venus. But then the queſtion ariſing,who ſhould be the former againſt Phalantus, of the blacke, or the ill apparelled Knight, (who now had gotten the reputation of ſome ſturdie lout, he had ſo well defended himſelfe;) of the one ſide, was, alleaged the hauing a picture,which the other wanted: of the other ſide, the first striking the shield; but the conclusion was, that the ill apparelled Knight should haue the precedence, if he deliuered the figure of his mistresse to Phalantus; who asking him for it, Certainly (said he) her liuelyest picture, (if you could see it, is in my hart, and the best comparison I could make of her, is of the Sunne and of all the other heauenly beauties. But because perhaps all eyes cannot taste the diuinitie of her beautie, & would rather be dazeled, then taught by the light, if it be not clowded by some maner thing; know ye then, that I defēd that same Ladie, whose image Phebilus so feebly lost yesternight, and in steede of another (if you ouercome mee) you shall haue me your slaue to carrie that image in your mistresse triumph. Phalantus easily agreed to the bargaine, which alreadie he made his owne.

But when it came to the trial, the ill apparelled Knight choosing out the greatest staues in all the store, at the first course gaue his head such a remembrance, that he lost almost his remēbrance, he himselfe receiuing the incounter of Phalantus without any extraordinarie motion. And at the second gaue him such a counterbuffe, that because Phalantus was so perfit a horseman, as not to be driuen from the saddle, the saddle with broken girthes was driuen from the horse: Phalantus remaining angrie and amazed, because now being come almost to the last of his promised enterprise, that disgrace befell him, which he had neuer before knowne.

But the victorie being by the Iudges giuen, and the trumpets witnessed to the ill apparelled Knight; Phalantus disgrace was ingrieued in lieu of comfort of Arteſia, who telling him she neuer lookt for other, bad him seeke some other mistresse. He excusing himselfe, and turning ouer the fault to Fortune, Then let that be your ill Fortune too (said she) that you haue lost me.

Nay truely Madam (said Phalantus) it shall not be so: for I think the losse of such a Mistresse will proue a great gaine: and so concluded; to the sport of Basilius, to see young folkes loue, that came in maskt with so great pomp, go out with so little constancie. But Phalantus first professing great seruice to Basilius for his curteous intermitting his solitarie course for his sake, would yet conduct Arteſia to the castle of Cecropia, whither she desired to go: vowing in himselfe, that neither hart, nor mouth-loue, should euer any more intangle him: and with that resolutiō he left the company. Whence all being dismissed (among whom the black Knight went away repining at his luck, that had kept him frō winning the honor, as he knew he should haue done, to the picture of Pamela) the ill apparelled Knight (who was only desired to stay, because Basilius meant to shew him to Zelmane) puld off his Helmet, & then was known himself to be Zelmane: who that morning (as she told) while the others were busie, had stolne out to the Princes stable, which was a mile off frō the Lodge, had gotten a horse (they knowing it was Basilius pleasure she should be obeyed) and borrowing that homely armour for want of a better, had come vpon the spur to redeeme Philocleas picture, which she said, she could not beare, (being one of that little wilderneſſe-company) should be in captiuitie, if the cunning she had learned in her countrie of the noble Amazons, could withstand it: and vnder that pretext faine she would haue giuen a secret pasport to her affection. But this act painted at one instant redneſſe in Philocleas face, & paleneſſe in Gynecias, but brought forth no other countenances but of admiration, no speeches but of cōmendations: all these few (besides loue) thinking they honoured themselues, in honouring so accomplished a person as Zelmane: whom daily they sought with some or other sports to delight, for which purpose Basilius had in a house not farre off, seruaunts, who though they came not vncalled, yet at call were readie.

And

And ſo many daies were ſpent, and many waies vſed, while Zelmane was like one that ſtoode in a tree waiting a good occaſion to ſhoot, & Gynecia a blancher, which kept the deareſt deere from her. But the day being come, on which according to an appointed courſe, the ſhepheards were to aſſemble, and make their paſtorall ſports afore Baſilius: Zelmane (fearing, leſt many eyes, and comming diuers waies, might hap to ſpy Muſidorus) went out to warne him thereof.

But before ſhe could come to the Arbour, ſhe ſawe walking from her-ward, a man in ſhepherdiſh apparell, who being in the ſight of the Lodge, it might ſeeme he was allowed there. A long cloke he had on, but that caſt vnder his right arme, wherein he held a ſheephooke, ſo finely wrought, that it gaue a brauerie to pouertie; and his rayments, though they were meane, yet receiued they handſomneſſe by the grace of the wearer; though he himſelfe went but a kinde of languiſhing pace, with his eyes ſometimes caſt vp to heauen, as though his fancies ſtraue to mount higher; ſometimes throwne downe to the ground, as if the earth could not beare the burthen of his ſorrowes; at length, with a lamentable tune, he ſong theſe fewe verſes.

Come ſhepheards weedes, become your maiſters minde:
Teeld outward ſhew, what inward change he tryes:
Nor be abasht, ſince ſuch a gueſt you finde,
VVhoſe ſtrongeſt hope in your weake comfort lyes.

Come ſhepheards weedes, attend my wofull cryes:
Diſuſe your ſelues from ſweete Menalcas voice:
For other be thoſe tunes which ſorrow tyes,
From thoſe cleere notes which freely may reioyce.
Then powre out plaint, and in one word ſay this:
Helpleſſe his plaint, who ſpoiles himſelfe of bliſſe.

And hauing ended, he ſtrake himſelfe on the breaſt; ſaying, O miſerable wretch, whither do thy deſtenies guide thee? The voice made Zelmane haſten her pace to ouertake him: which hauing done, ſhe plainly perceiued that it was her deare friend Muſidorus, whereat maruelling not a litle, ſhe demaunded of him, whether the Goddeſſe of thoſe woods had ſuch a power to transforme euery bodie, or whether, as in all enterpriſes elſe he had done, he meant thus to match her in this new alteration. Alas, (ſaid Muſidorus) what ſhall I ſay, who am loth to ſay, & yet faine would haue ſaid? I find in deede, that all is but lip-wiſdome, which wants experience. I now (woe is me) do try what loue can do. O Zelmane, who will reſiſt it, muſt either haue no wit, or put out his eyes: can any man reſiſt his creation? certainly by loue we are made, and to loue we are made. Beaſts onely cannot diſcerne beautie, and let them be in the roll of Beaſts that do not honor it. The perfect friendſhip Zelmane bare him, and the great pitie ſhe (by good triall) had of ſuch caſes, could not keepe her from ſmiling at him, remembring how vehemently he had cryed out againſt the folly of louers. And therefore a litle to puniſh him, Why how now deare couſin (ſaid ſhe) you that were laſt day ſo high in the pulpit againſt louers, are you now become ſo meane an auditor? Remember that loue is a paſſion; and that a worthie mans reaſon muſt euer haue the maſterhood. I recant, I recant (cried Muſidorus) and withall falling downe proſtrate, O thou celeſtiall, or infernall ſpirit of Loue; or what other heauenly or helliſh title thou liſt to haue (for effects of both I finde in my ſelfe)

haue cõpaſſion of me,& let thy glory be as great in pardoning thẽ that be ſubmitted to thee, as in conquering thoſe that were rebellious. No,no,ſaid Zelmane, I ſee you well inough: you make but an enterlude of my miſhaps,& do but coũterfeit thus, to make me ſee the deformity of my paſſiõs:but take heede,that this ieſt do not one day turne to earneſt. Now I beſeech thee(ſaid Muſidorus taking her faſt by the hand)euẽ for the truth of our friendſhip,of which(if I be not altogether an vnhappy man)thou haſt ſome remembrance, and by thoſe ſecret flames which (I know) haue likewiſe nearely touched thee, make no ieſt of that, which hath ſo earneſtly pierced me thorough, nor let that be light to thee, which is to me ſo burdenous, that I am not able to beare it. Muſidorus both in words and behauiour,did ſo liuely deliuer out his inward griefe,that Zelmane found indeede, he was throughly wounded: but there roſe a new iealouſie in her mind,leſt it might be with Philoclea,by whom,as Zelmane thought, in right all harts and eyes ſhould be inherited. And therefore deſirous to be cleered of that doubt,Muſidorus ſhortly(as in haſt and full of paſſionate perplexedneſſe)thus recounted his caſe vnto her.

The day(ſayd he)I parted from you,I being in mind to returne to a towne, from whence I came hither, my horſe being before tired, would ſcarce beare me a mile hence:where being benighted,the light of a candle(I ſaw a good way off)guided me to a young ſhepheards houſe, by name Menalcas, who ſeeing me to be a ſtraying ſtranger,with the right honeſt hoſpitality which ſeemes to be harbored in the Arcadian breaſts,& though not with curious coſtlineſſe,yet with cleanly ſufficiency,entertained me: and hauing by talke with him,found the maner of the country,ſomething more in particular,then I had by Kalanders report,I agreed to ſoiourne with him in ſecret,which he faithfully promiſed to obſerue. And ſo hither to your arbour diuerſe times repaired:and here by your meanes had the ſight(ô that it had neuer bin ſo,nay, ô that it might euer be ſo)of the Goddeſſe,who in a definite compaſſe can ſet forth infinite beautie. All this while Zelmane was racked with iealouſie. But he went on, for(ſaid he)I lying cloſe, and in truth thinking of you, and ſaying thus to my ſelfe,ô ſweete Pyrocles,how art thou bewitched? where is thy vertue?where is the vſe of thy reaſon?how much am I inferior to thee in the ſtate of the mind? And yet know I,that all the heauẽs cannot bring me to ſuch thraldome. Scarcely,thinke I,had I ſpokẽ this word, when the Ladies came forth; at which ſight, I thinke the very words returned backe againe to ſtrike my ſoule;at leaſt, an vnmeaſurable ſting I felt in my ſelfe,that I had ſpoken ſuch words. At which ſight?ſaid Zelmane,not able to beare him any longer. O(ſaid Muſidorus)I know your ſuſpition;No,no,baniſh al ſuch feare,it was,it is, and muſt be Pamela: Then all is ſafe(ſaid Zelmane)proceede,deare Muſidorus. I will not(ſaid he)impute it to my late ſolitary life (which yet is prone to affections) nor to the much thinking of you(though that cald the cõſideratiõ of loue into my mind, which before I euer neglected) nor to the exaltation of Venus, nor reuenge of Cupid; but euen to her,who is the Planet,nay,the Goddeſſe,againſt which, the only ſhield muſt be my Sepulcher. When I firſt ſaw her,I was preſently ſtriken,and I(like a fooliſh child,that when any thing hits him, will ſtrike himſelfe againe vpon it) would needes looke againe,as though I would perſwade mine eyes, that they were deceiued. But alas, well haue I found,that Loue to a yeelding hart is a king: but to a reſiſting,is a tyrant. The more with arguments I ſhaked the ſtake,which he had plãted in the ground of my hart,the deeper ſtill it ſanke into it. But what meane I to ſpeake of the cauſes of my loue,which is as impoſſible to deſcribe, as to meaſure the backſide of heauen? Let this word ſuffice,I loue.

And

And that you may know I do ſo, it was I that came in blacke armour to defend her picture, where I was both preuented, and beaten by you. And ſo, I that waited here to do you ſeruice, haue now my ſelfe moſt neede of ſuccor. But whereupon got you your ſelfe this apparell, ſaid Zelmane? I had forgotten to tell you (ſaid Muſidorus) though that were one principall matter of my ſpeech; ſo much am I now maiſter of my owne mind. But thus it happened: being returned to Menalcas houſe, full of tormenting deſire, after a while fainting vnder the waight, my courage ſtird vp my wit to ſeeke for ſome reliefe, before I yeelded to periſh. At laſt this came into my head, that very euening, that I had to no purpoſe laſt vſed my horſe and armour. I told Menalcas, that I was a Theſſalian Gentleman, who by miſchaunce hauing killed a great fauorite of the Prince of that cuntry, was purſued ſo cruelly, that in no place, but either by fauour, or corruption, they would obtaine my deſtruction; and that therefore I was determined (till the fury of my perſecutors might be aſſwaged) to diſguiſe my ſelfe among the ſhepheards of Arcadia, and (if it were poſſible) to be one of them that were allowed the Princes preſence; becauſe if the woorſt ſhould fall, that I were diſcouered, yet hauing gotten the acquaintance of the Prince, it might happen to moue his hart to protect me. Menalcas (being of an honeſt diſpoſition) pitied my caſe, which my face through my inward torment made credible; and ſo (I giuing him largely for it) let me haue this rayment, inſtructing me in all the particularities, touching himſelfe, or my ſelfe, which I deſired to know: yet not truſting ſo much to his conſtancie, as that I would lay my life, and life of my life, vpon it, I hired him to go into Theſſalia to a friend of mine, and to deliuer him a letter from me; coniuring him to bring me as ſpeedy an anſwere as he could, becauſe it imported me greatly to know, whether certaine of my friends did yet poſſeſſe any fauour, whoſe interceſſions I might vſe for my reſtitution. He willingly tooke my letter, which being well ſealed, indeede contained other matter. For I wrote to my truſtie ſeruant Calodoulus (whom you know) that aſſoone as he had deliuered the letter, he ſhould keepe him priſoner in his houſe, not ſuffering him to haue conference with any body, till he knew my further pleaſure: in all other reſpects that he ſhould vſe him as my brother. And thus is Menalcas gone, and I heere a poore ſhepheard; more proude of this eſtate, then of any kingdome: ſo manifeſt it is, that the higheſt point outward things can bring one vnto, is the contentment of the mind: with which, no eſtate; without which, all eſtates be miſerable. Now haue I choſen this day, becauſe (as Menalcas told me) the other ſhepheards are called to make their ſports, and hope that you will with your credite, find meanes to get me allowed among them. You neede not doubt (anſwered Zelmane) but that I wil bee your good miſtreſſe: marrie the beſt way of dealing muſt be by Dametas, who ſince his blunt braine hath perceiued ſome fauour the Prince doth beare vnto me (as without doubt the moſt ſeruile flatterie is lodged moſt eaſilie in the groſſeſt capacity, for their ordinary conceipt draweth a yeelding to their greaters, and then haue they not wit to diſcerne the right degrees of dutie) is much more ſeruiceable vnto me, then I can find anie cauſe to wiſh him. And therefore diſpaire not to winne him: for euery preſent occaſion will catch his ſenſes, and his ſenſes are maiſters of his fillie mind; onely reuerence him, and reward him, and with that bridle and ſaddle you ſhall well ride him. O heauen and earth (ſaid Muſidorus) to what a paſſe are our mindes brought, that from the right line of vertue, are wryed to theſe crooked ſhifts? But ô Loue, it is thou that dooſt it: thou changeſt name vpon name; thou diſguiſeſt our bodies, and diſfigureſt our minds.

But indeed thou haſt reaſon, for though the wayes be foule, the iourneys end is moſt faire and honourable.

No more ſweet Muſidorus (ſaid Zelmane) of theſe philoſophies, for here comes the verie perſon of Dametas. And ſo he did indeed, with a ſword by his ſide, a forreſt bill on his necke, and a chopping-knife vnder his girdle: in which well prouided ſort he had euer gone ſince the feare Zelmane had put him in. But he no ſooner ſaw her, but with head and armes he laid his reuerence afore her, enough to haue made any man forſweare all curteſie. And then in Baſilius name he did inuite her to walke downe to the place, where that day they were to haue the paſtorals.

But when he ſpied Muſidorus to be none of the ſhepheards allowed in that place, he would faine haue perſwaded himſelfe to vtter ſome anger, but that he durſt not; yet muttering & chāping, as though his cud troubled him, he gaue occaſion to Muſidorus to come neare him, and feine this tale of his owne life: That he was a younger brother of the ſhepheard Menalcas, by name Dorus, ſent by his father in his tender age to Athens, there to learne ſome cunning more then ordinarie, that he might be the better liked of the Prince: and that after his fathers death, his brother Menalcas (lately gone thither to fetch him home) was alſo deceaſed: where (vpō his death) he had charged him to ſeeke the ſeruice of Dametas, and to be wholly & euer guided by him, as one in whoſe iudgement & integritie the Prince had ſingular confidence. For token whereof, he gaue to Dametas a good ſumme of gold in ready coine, which Menalcas had bequeathed vnto him, vpon condition he ſhould receiue this poore Dorus into his ſeruice, that his mind and maners might grow the better by his dayly example. Dametas, that of all maners of ſtile could beſt conceiue of golden eloquēce, being withall tickled by Muſidorus praiſes, had his braine ſo turned, that he became ſlaue to that, which he that ſued to be his ſeruant offered to giue him: yet for countenance ſake, he ſeemed verie ſqueamiſh, in reſpect of the charge he had of the Princeſſe Pamela. But ſuch was the ſecret operation of the gold, helped with the perſwaſion of the Amazon Zelmane (who ſaid it was pitie ſo handſome a young man ſhould be any where elſe then with ſo good a maiſter) that in the end he agreed (if that day he behaued himſelfe ſo to the liking of Baſilius, as he might be contented) that then he would receiue him into his ſeruice.

And thus went they to the Lodge, where they found Gynecia and her daughters ready to go to the field, to delight themſelues there a while, vntill the ſhepheards comming: whither alſo taking Zelmane with them, as they went, Dametas told them of Dorus, and deſired he might be accepted there that day in ſtead of his brother Menalcas. As for Baſilius, he ſtayed behind to bring the ſhepheards, with whom he meant to conferre, to breed the better Zelmanes liking (which he onely regarded) while the other beautifull band came to the faire field, appointed for the ſhepheardiſh paſtimes. It was indeed a place of delight; for through the middeſt of it there ran a ſweet brooke, which did both hold the eye open with her azure ſtreams, & yet ſeeke to cloſe the eye with the purling noiſe it made vpon the pibble ſtones it ran ouer: the field it ſelfe being ſet in ſome places with roſes, & in all the reſt conſtantlie preſeruing a flouriſhing greene: the roſes added ſuch a ruddy ſhew vnto it, as though the field were baſhfull at his owne beautie: about it (as if it had bene to incloſe a Theatre) grew ſuch ſort of trees, as either excellencie of fruit, ſtatelineſſe of growth, contiuuall greenneſſe, or poeticall fancies, haue made at any time famous. In moſt part of which there had bene framed by art ſuch pleaſant arbors, that (one anſwering another) they became a gallerie aloft from tree to tree almoſt round about, which below gaue a perfect shadow, a pleasant refuge then from the cholericke looke of Phœbus.

In this place while Gynecia walked hard by them, carying many vnquiet contentions about her, the Ladies sate them downe, inquiring diuerse questions of the shepheard Dorus; who (keeping his eye still vpon Pamela,) answered with such a trembling voice, and abashed countenance, and oftentimes so far from the matter, that it was some sport to the young Ladies, thinking it want of education, which made him so discountenanced with vnwonted presence. But Zelmane that saw in him the glasse of her owne miserie, taking the hand of Philoclea, and with burning kisses setting it close to her lips (as if it should stād there like a hand in the margine of a booke, to note some saying worthy to be marked) began to speake these words. O Loue, since thou art so changeable in mens estates, how art thou so constant in their torments? when sodenlie there came out of a wood a monstrous Lyon, with a the Beare not farre from him, of litle lesse fierceneesse, which (as they ghest) hauing bene hunted in forrests farre off, were by chaunce come hither, where before such beasts had neuer bene seene. Then care, not feare; or feare, not for themselues, altered something the countenances of the two Louers, but so, as any man might perceiue, was rather an assembling of powers, then dismayednesse of courage. Philoclea no sooner espied the Lyon, but that obeying the commandement of feare, she leapt vp, and ran to the Lodge-ward, as fast as her delicate legges could carie her, while Dorus drew Pamela behind a tree, where she stood quaking like the Partridge, on which the Hauke is euen ready to seaze. But the Lyon (seeing Philoclea run away) bent his race to her-ward, and was readie to seaze himselfe on the praie, when Zelmane (to whom daunger then was a cause of dreadlesnesse, all the composition of her elements being nothing but fierie) with swiftnesse of desire crost him, and with force of affection strake him such a blow vpon his chine, that she opened all his bodie: wherewith the valiant beast turning vpon her with open iawes, she gaue him such a thrust through his breast, that all the Lyon could do, was with his paw to teare off the mantle & sleeue of Zelmane, with a litle scratch, rather then a wound; his death-blow hauing taken away the effect of his force: but therewithall hee fell downe, and gaue Zelmane leasure to take off his head, to carie it for a present to her Ladie Philoclea: who all this while (not knowing what was done behind her) kept on her course, like Arethusa when she ran from Alpheus; her light apparell being caried vp with the wind, that much of those beauties, she wold at another time haue willinglie hidden, was presented to the sight of the twise wounded Zelmane. Which made Zelmane not follow her ouer hastilie, least she should too soon depriue her selfe of that pleasure: but carying the Lyons head in her hand, did not fullie ouertake her, till they came to the presence of Basilius. Neither were they long there, but that Gynecia came thither also; who had bene in such a traunce of musing, that Zelmane was fighting with the Lyon, before she knew of anie Lyons comming: but then affection resisting, and the soone ending of the fight preuenting all extremitie of feare, she marked Zelmanes fighting: and when the Lyons head was off, as Zelmane ran after Philoclea, so she could not find in her heart but run after Zelmane: so that it was a new sight, Fortune had prepared to those woods, to see these great personages thus run one after the other: each caried forward with an inward violence: Philoclea with such feare, that she thought she was still in the Lyons mouth: Zelmane with an eager and impatient delight; Gynecia with wings of loue, flying she neither knew, nor cared to know whither. But now, being all come before Basilius, amazed with this ſight, and feare hauing ſuch poſſeſſion in the faire Philoclea, that her bloud durſt not yet to come to her face, to take away the name of paleneſſe from her moſt pure whiteneſſe, Zelmane kneeled downe, and preſenting the Lyons head vnto her: Onlie Ladie (ſaid ſhe) here ſee you the puniſhmēt of that vnnaturall beaſt, which contrarie to his own kind, would haue wronged Princes bloud, guided with ſuch traiterous eyes, as durſt rebell againſt your beautie. Happie am I, & my beautie both (anſwered the ſweete Philoclea then bluſhing, for Feare had bequeathed his roome to his kinſman Baſhfulneſſe) that you excellent Amazon, were there to teach him good maners. And euen thanks to that beautie (anſwered Zelmane) which can giue an edge to the bluntеſt ſwords. There Philoclea told her father how it had happened: but as ſhe had turned her eyes in her tale to Zelmane, ſhe perceiued ſome bloud vpon Zelmanes ſhoulder, ſo that ſtarting with the louely grace of pitie, ſhe ſhewed it to her father and mother: who, as the nurſe ſometimes with ouer-much kiſſing may forget to giue the babe ſucke, ſo had they with too much delighting, in beholding and praiſing Zelmane, left off to marke whether ſhe needed ſuccour. But then they ran both vnto her, like a father and mother to an onlie child, and (though Zelmane aſſured them it was nothing) would needs ſee it; Gynecia hauing skill in Chirurgerie, an arte in thoſe dayes much eſteemed, becauſe it ſerued to vertuous courage, which euen Ladies would (euer with the contempt of cowards) ſeeme to cheriſh. But looking vpon it (which gaue more inward bleeding wounds to Zelmane, for ſhe might ſometimes feele Philocleas touch, whiles ſhe helped her mother) ſhe found it was indeed of no importance: yet applied ſhe a precious baulme vnto it, of power to heale a greater griefe.

But euen then, and not before, they remembred Pamela, and therefore Zelmane (thinking of her friend Dorus) was running backe to be ſatisfied, when they might all ſee Pamela comming betweene Dorus and Dametas, hauing in her hand the paw of a Beare, which the ſhepheard Dorus had newly preſented vnto her, deſiring her to accept it, as of ſuch a beaſt, which though ſhe deſerued death for her preſumption, yet was her wit to be eſteemed, ſince ſhe could make ſo ſweet a choice Dametas for his part came piping and dauncing, the merieſt man in a pariſh: but when he came ſo neare as he might be heard of Baſilius, he would needs breake through his eares with this ioyfull ſong of their good ſucceſſe:

NOw thanked be the great God Pan,
Which thus preſerues my loued life:
Thanked be I that keepe a man,
vvho ended hath this bloudie ſtrife:
For if my man muſt praiſes haue, vvhat then muſt I that keepe the knaue?

For as the Moone the eye doth pleaſe, vvith gentle beames not hurting ſight:
Yet hath ſir Sunne the greateſt praiſe, becauſe from him doth come her light:
So if my man muſt praiſes haue,
what then muſt I that keepe the knaue?

Being all now come together, and all deſirous to know each others aduentures, Pamelas noble heart would needs gratefullie make knowne the valiant meane of her

ſafety, which (directing her ſpeech to her mother) ſhe did in this maner. Aſſoon, ſaid ſhe, as ye were al run away, & that I hoped to be in ſafty, there came out of the ſame woods a horrible fowle Beare, which (fearing belike to deale, while the Liõ was preſent, as ſoone as he was gone) came furiouſlie towards the place where I was, & this yong ſhepheard left alone by me; I truly (not guilty of any wiſdom, which ſince they lay to my charge, becauſe they ſay, it is the beſt refuge againſt that beaſt, but euen pure feate bringing forth that effect of wiſdome) fel downe flat on my face, needing not counterfeit being dead, for indeed I was litle better. But this young ſhepheard with a wõderful courage, hauing no other weapõ but that knife you ſee ſtãding before the place wher I lay, ſo behaued himſelf, that the firſt ſight I had (whẽ I thought my ſelfe already neare Charons ferrie) was the ſhepheard ſhewing me his bloudie knife in token of victorie. I pray you (ſaid Zelmane, ſpeaking to Dorus, whoſe valour ſhe was carefull to haue manifeſted) in what ſort, ſo il weaponed, could you atchieue this enterpriſe? Noble Lady, ſaid Dorus, the maner of theſe beaſts fighting with anie man, is to ſtand vp vpon their hinder feet; and ſo this did, and being ready to giue me a ſhrewd embracemẽt, I think the God Pan (euer carefull of the chief bleſſings of Arcadia) guided my hand ſo iuſt to the heart of the beaſt, that neither ſhe could once touch me, nor (which is the only matter in this worthie remẽbrance) breed anie danger to the Princeſſe. For my part, I am rather (with all ſubiected humbleneſſe) to thanke her excellencies, ſince the dutie thereunto gaue me heart to ſaue my ſelfe, then to receiue thankes for a deed, which was her only inſpiring. And this Dorus ſpake, keeping affection as much as he could backe from comming into his eyes and geſtures. But Zelmane (that had the ſame character in her heart) could eaſilie diſcipher it, and therefore to keepe him the longer in ſpeech, deſired to vnderſtand the concluſion of the matter; and how the honeſt Dametas was eſcaped. Nay ſaid Pamela, none ſhall take that office from my ſelfe, being ſo much bound to him as I am, for my education. And with that word, ſcorne borrowing the countenãce of mirth, ſomewhat ſhe ſmiled, and thus ſpake on: When (ſaid ſhe) Dorus made me aſſuredly perceiue, that all cauſe of feare was paſſed (the truth is) I was aſhamed to find my ſelfe alone with this ſhepheard; and therefore looking about me, if I could ſee any body; at length we both perceiued the gentle Dametas, lying with his head and breaſt as far as he could thruſt himſelfe into a buſh, drawing vp his legs as cloſe vnto him as he could: for, like a man of a verie kind nature, ſoone to take pitie of himſelfe, he was full reſolued not to ſee his owne death. And when this ſhepheard puſhed him, bidding him to be of good cheare; it was a great while ere wee could perſwade him, that Dorus was not the beare: ſo that he was faine to pull him out by the heeles, and ſhew him the beaſt, as dead as he could wiſh it: which you may beleeue me, was a verie ioyfull ſight vnto him. But then he forgate all curteſie, for he fell vpon the beaſt, giuing it manie a manfull wound: ſwearing by much, it was not well ſuch beaſts ſhould be ſuffered in a common wealth. And then my gouernour, as full of ioy, as before of feare came dauncing and ſinging before as euen now you ſaw him. Well wel (ſaid Baſilius) I haue not choſen Dametas for his fighting, nor for his diſcourſing, but for his plainneſſe & honeſty, & therin I know he wil not deceiue me. But then he told Pamela (not ſo much becauſe ſhe ſhould know it, as becauſe he would tel it) the wonderful act Zelmane had perfourmed, which Gynecia likewiſe ſpake off, both in ſuch extremitie of praiſing, as was eaſie to be ſeene, the cõſtructiõ of their ſpeach might beſt be made by the Grammer rules of affection. Baſilius told with what a gallant grace ſhee ranne with the Lyons head in her hand, like another Pallas with the ſpoiles of Gorgon. Gynecia ſware, ſhee ſawe the very face of the young Hercules killing the Nemean Lion, and all with a gratefull aſſent confirmed the ſame praiſes: only poore Dorus (though of equall deſert, yet not proceeding of equall eſtate) ſhould haue bin left forgotten, had not Zelmane againe with great admiration begun to ſpeake of him; asking, whether it were the faſhion or no, in Arcadia, that ſhepheards ſhould performe ſuch valorous enterpriſes.

This Baſilius (hauing the quicke ſence of a louer) tooke, as though his Miſtreſſe had giuen him a ſecret reprehenſion, that he had not ſhewed more gratefulneſſe to Dorus; and therefore (as nimblie as he could) enquired of his eſtate, adding promiſe of great rewards: among the reſt, offering to him, if he would exerciſe his courage in ſouldierie, hee would commit ſome charge vnto him vnder his Lieutenant Philanax. But Dorus (whoſe ambition climed by another ſtaire) hauing firſt anſwered touching his eſtate, that he was brother to the ſhepherd Menalcas; who among other, was wont to reſort to the Princes preſence, and excuſed his going to ſouldierie, by the vnaptneſſe he found in himſelfe that way; he told Baſilius, that his brother in his laſt teſtament had willed him to ſerue Dametas; and therefore (for due obedience therunto) he wold thinke his ſeruice greatly rewarded, if he might obtaine by that meane to liue in the ſight of his Prince, and yet practiſe his owne choſen vocation. Baſilius (liking well his goodly ſhape and handſome maner) charged Dametas to receiue him like a ſonne into his houſe; ſaying, that his valour, and Dametas truth would be good bulwarkes againſt ſuch miſchieſes, as (he ſticked not to ſay) were threatned to his daughter Pamela.

Dametas, no whit out of countenance with all that had bene ſaid (becauſe he had no worſe to fall into then his owne) accepted Dorus: and withall telling Baſilius, that ſome of the ſhepheards were come; demanded in what place he would ſee their ſports: who firſt, curious to know whether it were not more requiſite for Zelmanes hurt to reſt, then ſit vp at thoſe paſtimes; and ſhee (that felt no wound but one) earneſtly deſired to haue the Paſtorals. Baſilius commanded it ſhould be at the gate of the Lodge: where the throne of the Prince being (according to the ancient maner) he made Zelmane ſit betweene him and his wife therein, who thought her ſelfe betweene drowning and burning: and the two young Ladies of either ſide the throne, and ſo prepared their eyes and eares to be delighted by the ſhepheards.

But before all of them were aſſembled to begin their ſports, there came a fellow who being out of breath (or ſeeming ſo to be for haſte) with humble haſtineſſe told Baſilius, that his Miſtreſſe, the Ladie Cecropia, had ſent him to excuſe the miſchance of her beaſts raunging in that dangerous ſort, being happened by the follie of the keeper; who thinking himſelfe able to rule them, had caried them abroad, & ſo was deceiued: whom yet (if Baſilius wold puniſh for it) ſhe was readie to deliuer. Baſilius made no other anſwere, but that his Miſtreſſe if ſhe had any more ſuch beaſts, ſhold cauſe them to be killed: & then he told his wife and Zelmane of it, becauſe they ſhold not feare thoſe woods, as though they harboured ſuch beaſts, where the like had neuer bene ſeene. But Gynecia tooke a further conceit of it, miſtruſting greatlie Cecropia, becauſe ſhe had heard much of the diuelliſh wickedneſſe of her heart, and that particularlie ſhe did her beſt to bring vp her ſonne Amphialus (being brothers ſon to Baſilius) to aſpire to the Crowne, as next heire male after Baſilius, and therfore ſaw no reaſon, but that ſhe might coniecture, it proceeded rather of ſome miſchieuous practiſe, then of misfortune. Yet did ſhe only vtter her doubt to her daughters, thinking, ſince the worſt was paſt, ſhe wold attend a further occaſion, leaſt ouer much haſt might ſeeme to proceede of the ordinarie miſlike betweene ſiſters in law, onlie they maruelled that Baſilius looked no further into it, who (good man) thought ſo much of his late conceiued common wealth, that all other matters were but digreſſions vnto him. But the ſhepheards were readie, and with well handling themſelues, called their ſenſes to attend their paſtimes.

The firſt Eclogues.

Baſilius, becauſe Zelmane ſo would haue it, vſed the artificiall day of torches, to lighten the ſports their inuentions could miniſter: and becauſe many of the ſhepheards were but newly come, he did in a gentle manner chaſtiſe their negligence, with making them (for that night) the torch-bearers; and the others, he willed with all fredome of ſpeech and behauiour to keepe their accuſtomed method: which while they prepared to do, Dametas, who much diſdained (ſince his late authoritie) all his old companions, brought his ſeruant Dorus in good acquaintance and allowance of them, and himſelfe ſtood like a directer ouer them, with nodding, gaping, winking, or ſtamping, ſhewing how hee did like or miſlike thoſe thinges he did not vnderſtand. The firſt ſports the ſhepheards ſhewed, were ful of ſuch leaps and gambols, as being accorded to the pipe (which they bare in their mouthes, euen as they daunced) made a right picture of their chiefe God Pan, and his cõpanions the Satyres. Then would they caſt away their pipes; & holding hand in hand, daunce as it were in a braule, by the onely cadence of their voyces, which they would vſe in ſinging ſome ſhort coplets, whereto the one half beginning, the other halfe ſhould anſwere as the one halfe, ſaying:

VVe loue, and haue our loues rewarded.

The others would anſwere.

VVe loue, and are no vvhit regarded.

The firſt againe.

We find moſt ſweet affections ſnare.

With like tune it ſhould be as in a quire ſent backe againe.

That ſweet, but ſowre deſpairefull care.

A third time likewiſe thus:

Who can deſpaire, whom hope doth beare?

The anſwere.

And who can hope that feeles deſpaire?

Then all ioyning their voyces, and dauncing a faſter meaſure, they would conclude with ſome ſuch words:

As without breath no pipe doth moue,
No muſicke kindly without loue.

Hauing thus varied both their ſongs and daunces into diuerſe ſorts of inuentions; their laſt ſport was, one of them to prouoke another to a more large expreſſing of his paſſions: which Thirſis (accounted one of the beſt ſingers amongſt them) hauing marked in Dorus dauncing, no leſſe good grace and handſome behauiour, then extreame tokens of a troubled mind; began firſt with his pipe, and then with his voice, thus to chalenge Dorus, and was by him anſwered in the vnderwritten ſort.

Thyrſis and Dorus.

Thyrſis. Come Dorus, come let ſongs thy ſorrowes ſignifie,
And if for want of vſe thy mind aſhamed is,
That verie ſhame with loues high title dignifie.
No ſtile is held for baſe, where loue well named is:
Each eare ſucks vp the vvords a true-loue ſcattereth,
And plaine ſpeech oft, than quaint phraſe better framed is.

Dorus. Nightingales ſeldome ſing, the Pie ſtill chattereth,
The wood cries moſt, before it throughly kindled be,
Deadlie wounds inward bleed, each ſleight ſore mattereth.
Hardlie they heard, which by good hunters ſingled be:
Shallow brooks murmure moſt, deepe ſilent ſlide away,
Nor true-loue loues, his loues with others mingled be.

Thyrſis. If thou wilt not be ſeene, thy face go hide away,
Be none of vs, or els maintaine our faſhion:
Who frownes at others feaſts, doth better bide away.
But if thou haſt a loue, in that loues paſſion,
I challenge thee by ſhew of her perfection,
Which of vs two deſerueth moſt compaſſion.

Dorus. Thy challenge great, but greater my protection:
Sing then, and ſee (for now thou haſt inflamed me)
Thy health too meane a match for my infection.
No though the heau'ns for high attempts haue blamed me,
Yet high is my attempt. O Muſe hiſtorifie
Her praiſe, whoſe praiſe to learne your skill hath framed me.

Thyrſis. Muſe hold your peace: but thou my God Pan glorifie
My Kalas gifts, vvho with all good gifts filled.
Thy pipe, ô Pan, ſhall help, though I ſing ſortlie:
A heape of ſweetes she is, where nothing ſpilled is;
Who though she be no Bee, yet full of honey is:
A lillie field, with plough of Roſe which tilled is.
Mild as a Lambe, more daintie then a Conie is:
Her eyes my eye-ſight is, her conuerſation
More glad to me, then to a miſer money is.
What coy account she makes of eſtimation?
How nice to touch? how all her ſpeeches peiſed be?
A Nymph thus turn'd, but mended in tranſlation.

Dorus. Such Kala is: but ah my fancies raiſed be
In one, vvhoſe name to name were high preſumption,
Since vertues all, to make her title, pleaſed be
O happie Gods, which by inward aſſumption

Enioy

Enioy her ſoule, in bodies faire poſſeſsion,
And keepe it ioyn'd, fearing your ſeats conſumption.
How oft with raine of teares skies make confeſsion,
Their dwellers rapt vvith ſight of her perfection,
From heau'nly throne to her heau'n vſe digreſsion?
Of beſt things then vvhat vvorld shall yeeld confection
To liken her? decke yours wish your compariſon:
She is her ſelfe of beſt things the collection.

Thyrſis. How oft my dolefull Sire cride to me, tarie ſonne,
When firſt he ſpied my loue? how oft he ſaid to me,
Thou art no ſouldier fit for Cupids garriſon?
My ſonne, keepe this, that my long toyle hath layd to me:
Loue well thine owne: me thinks vvools whiteneſſe paſſeth all:
I neuer found long loue ſuch wealth hath paid to me.
This vvind he ſpent: but when my Kala glaſſeth all
My ſight in her faire limmes, I then aſſure my ſelfe,
Not rotten sheepe, but high crownes she ſurpaſſeth all.
Can I be poore, that her gold haire procure my ſelfe?
Want I white vvooll, whoſe eyes her white skin garnished?
Till I get her, ſhall I to keepe inure my ſelfe?

Dorus. How oft, when Reaſon ſaw, Loue of her harniſed
With armour of my heart he cried, ô vanitie
To ſet a pearle in ſteele ſo meanelie varnished?
Looke to thy ſelfe, reach not beyond humanitie.
Her mind, beames, ſtate, farre from thy weake wings banished:
And loue vvhich louer hurts is inhumanitie:
Thus Reaſon ſaid: but she came, Reaſon vanished;
Her eyes ſo maiſtering me, that ſuch obiection
Seem'd but to ſpoile the food of thoughts long famished,
Her peerleſſe height my mind to high erection
Drawes vp; and if hope failing end lifes pleaſure,
Of fairer death how can I make election?

Thyrſis. Once my well waiting eyes eſpied my treaſure,
With ſleeues turn'd vp, looſe haire, and breaſt enlarged,
Her fathers corne (mouing her faire limmes) meaſure.
O cried I, of ſo meane worke be diſcharged:
Meaſure my caſe how by thy beauties filling
With ſeed of woes my heart brim full is charged.
Thy father bids thee ſaue, and chides for ſpilling.
Saue then my ſoule, ſpill not my thoughts well heaped,
No louely praiſe was euer got by killing.
Theſe bold words she did beare, this fruit I reaped,
That she whoſe looke alone might make me bleſſed,
Did ſmile on me, and then away she leaped.

Dorus. Once, O ſweet once, I ſaw with dread oppreſſed
Her vvhom I dread: ſo that with proſtrate lying
Her length the earth in Loues chiefe clothing dreſſed.
I ſaw that riches fall, and fell a crying;
Let not dead earth enioy ſo deare a couer,
But decke therevvith my ſoule for your ſake dying:
Lay all your feare vpon your fearfull Louer:
Shine eyes on me that both our liues be guarded;
So I your ſight, you ſhall your ſelues recouer.
I cried, and was with open rayes rewarded:
But ſtraight they fled, ſummond by cruell honour,
Honour, the cauſe deſert is not regarded.

Thyrſis. This Maide, thus made for ioyes, ô Pan bemone her,
That vvithout loue ſhe ſpends her yeares of loue:
So faire a field: would well become an owner.
And if enchauutment can a hard heart moue,
Teach me vvhat circle may acquaint her ſprite,
Affections charmes in my behalfe to proue.
The circle is my (round about her) ſight,
The power I vvill inuoke dwels in her eyes:
My charme ſhould be ſhe haunt me day and night.

Dorus. Farre other caſe, ô Muſe, my ſorow tries,
Bent to ſuch one in vvhom my ſelfe muſt ſay,
Nothing can mend one point that in her lies.
VVhat circle then in ſo rare force beares ſway?
VVhoſe ſprite all ſprites can foile, raiſe, damne or ſaue:
No charme holds her, but vvell poſſeſſe ſhe may,
Poſſeſſe ſhe doth, and makes my ſoule her ſlaue,
My eyes the bands, my thoughts the fatall knot.
No thrall like them that inward bondage haue.

Thyrſis. Kala at length conclude my lingring lot:
Diſdaine me not, although I be not faire.
VVho is an heire of manie hundreth sheepe,
Doth beauties keepe vvhich neuer ſunne can burne,
Nor ſtormes do turne: faireneſſe ſerues oft to wealth.
Yet all my health I place in your good will.
Which if you vvill (ô do) beſtow on me,
Such as you ſee, ſuch ſtill you ſhall me find,
Conſtant and kind, my sheep your food ſhall breed,
Their wooll your weed, I vvill you muſike yeeld
In flowry field, and as the day begins
With twentie ginnes we will the ſmall birds take,
And paſtimes make, as nature things hath made.
But vvhen in shade we meet of Mirtle bowes,
Then loue allowes our pleaſures to enrich,

The thought of which doth passe all vvorldly pelfe.

Dorus. Ladie your selfe vvhom neither name I dare,
And titles are but spots to such a worth,
Heare plaints come forth from dungeon of my mind.
The noblest kind reiects not others vvoes.
I haue no shewes of wealth: my wealth is you,
My beauties hewe your beams, my health your deeds;
My mind for vveeds your vertues liuerie weares.
My food is teares, my tunes waymenting yeeld:
Dispaire my field; the flowers spirits warres:
My day new cares; my ginnes my dayly sight,
In which do light small birds of thoughts orethrowne:
My pastimes none: time passeth on my fall.
Nature made all but me, of dolours made:
I find no shade, but vvhere my sunne doth burne:
No place to turne; without, vvithin it fries:
Nor helpe by life or death, vvho liuing dies.

Thyrsis But if my Kala thus my suite denies,
VVhich so much reason beares:
Let Crowes picke out mine eyes, which too much saw.
If she still hate loues law,
My earthy mould doth melt in watrie teares.

Dorus. My earthy mould doth melt in watrie teares,
And they againe resolue
To aire of sighes, sighes to the hearts fire turne, VVhich doth to ashes burne.
Thus doth my life within it selfe dissolue.

Thyrsis Thus doth my life within it selfe dissolue,
That I grow like the beast,
Which beares the bit a weaker force doth guide,
Yet patient must abide.
Such weight it hath, which once is full possest.

Dorus. Such weight it hath vvhich once is full possest,
That I become a vision,
Which hath in others head his only being,
And liues in fancie seeing.
O vvretched state of man in selfe diuision!

Thyrsis O wretched state of man in selfe diuision!
O vvell thou sayest! a feeling declaration
Thy tongue hath made, of Cupids deepe incision.
But now hoarse voyce, doth faile this occupation,
And others long to tell their loues condition.
Of singing thou hast got the reputation.

Dorus. Of ſinging thou haſt got the reputation,
Good Thyrſis mine, I yeeld to thy abilitie;
My heart doth ſeeke another eſtimation.
But ah my Muſe, I would thou hadſt facilitie
To worke my goddeſſe ſo by thy inuention,
On me to caſt thoſe eyes where shine Nobilitie:
Seene and vnknowne; heard, but without attention.

Dorus did ſo well in anſwering Thyrſis, that euerie one deſired to heare him ſing ſomthing alone. Seeing therfore a Lute lying vnder the Princeſſe Pamelas feet, glad to haue ſuch an errand to approch her, he came, but came with a diſmayed grace, all his bloud ſtirred betwixt feare and deſire: & playing vpon it with ſuch ſweetneſſe, as euerie bodie wondred to ſee ſuch skill in a ſhepheard, he ſang vnto it with a ſorowing voice theſe Elegiake verſes:

Dorus. --Fortune, Nature, Loue, long haue contended about me,
VVhich should most miſeries caſt on a worme that I am.
--Fortune thus gan ſay; miſerie and miſfortune is all one,
And of miſfortune, fortune hath onely the gift.
--VVith ſtrong foes on land, on ſea with contrarie tempeſts,
Still do I croſſe this wretch, what ſo he taketh in hand.
--Tush, tush, ſaid Nature, this is all but a trifle, a mans ſelfe Giues haps or mishaps, eu'n as he ordereth his heart.
--But ſo his humour I frame, in a mould of choller aduſted,
That the delights of life shall be to him dolorous.
--Loue ſmiled, and thus ſaid; Want ioyn'd to deſire is vnhappie:
But if he nought do deſire, what can Heraclitus aile?
--None but I workes by deſire: by deſire haue I kindled in his ſoule Infernall agonies vnto a beautie diuine:
--VVhere thou poore Nature left'ſt all thy due glorie, to Fortune
Her vertue is ſoueraigne, Fortune a vaſſall of hers.
--Nature abasht went backe: Fortune blusht: yet she replide thus:
And eu'n in that loue shall I reſerue him a ſpite.
--Thus, thus, alas! wofull by Nature, vnhappie by Fortune,
But moſt wretched I am, now Loue awakes my deſire.

Dorus when he had ſung this, hauing had all the while a free beholding of the faire Pamela (who could well haue ſpared ſuch honor, & defended the aſſault he gaue vnto her face with bringing a faire ſtaine of ſhamefaſtneſſe vnto it) let fall his armes, & remained ſo faſtened in his thoughts, as if Pamela had grafted him there to grow in continuall imagination. But Zelmane eſpying it, and fearing he ſhould too much forget himſelfe, ſhe came to him, and tooke out of his hand the Lute, and laying faſt hold of Philocleas face with her eyes, ſhe ſung theſe Saphikes, ſpeaking as it were to her owne hope.

If mine eyes can ſpeake to do heartie errand,
Or mine eyes language she do hap to iudge of,
So that eyes meſſage be of her receiued,
Hope we do liue yet.

But if eyes faile then, when I moſt do need them,
Or if eyes language be not vnto her knowne,
So that eyes meſſage do returne reiected,
Hope we do both dye.
Yet dying, and dead, do we ſing her honour;
So become our tombes monuments of her praiſe;
So becomes our loſſe the triumph of her gaine;
Hers be the glory.
If the ſpheares ſenſeleſſe do yet hold a muſique,
If the Swannes ſweet voice be not heard, but at death,
If the mute timber vvhen it hath the life loſt,
Yeldeth a Lutes tune:
Are then humane mindes priuiledg'd ſo meanly,
As that hatefull death can abridge them of powre
With the vowe of truth to record to all worlds
That we be her ſpoiles?
Thus not ending, ends the due praiſe of her praiſe:
Fleshly vaile conſumes; but a ſoule hath his life,
VVhich is held in loue; loue it is, that hath ioynd
Life to this our ſoule.
But if eyes can ſpeake to do hartie errand,
Or mine eyes language she doth hap to iudge of,
So that eyes meſſage be of her receiued,
Hope we do liue yet.

Great was the pleaſure of Baſilius, and greater would haue bene Gynæcias, but that ſhee found too well it was intended to her daughter. As for Philoclea ſhee was ſweetly rauiſhed withall. When Dorus deſiring in a ſecret maner to ſpeake of their caſes, as perchaunce the parties intended might take ſome light of it, making low reuerence to Zelmane, began this prouoking ſong in hexamiter verſe vnto her. Whereunto ſhee ſoone finding whither his words were directed (in like tune and verſe) anſwered as followeth:

Dorus. Zelmane.

Dorus. Lady reſerued by the hau'ns to do paſtors company honor,
Ioyning your ſweet voice to the rurall muſe of a deſerte,
Here you fully do finde this ſtrange operation of loue,
How to the woods loue runnes as well as rydes to the Pallace,
Neither he beares reuerence to a Prince nor pittie to begger,
But (like a point in midſt of a circle) is ſtill of a neerneſſe,
All to a leſſon he draw's, neither hills nor caues can auoide him.

Zelmane. VVorthy shepeheard by my ſong to my ſelfe all fauor is hapned,
That to the ſacred Muſe my annoyes ſomewhat be reuealed,
Sacred Muſe, vvho in one contaynes vvhat nine do in all them.
But ô happy be you, vvhich ſafe from fyry reflection
Of Phœbus violence in shade of ſweet Cypariſſus,

Or pleaſant mirtell, may teach th'vnfortunate Eccho
In theſe vvoods to reſound the renowmed name of a goddeſſe.
Happy be you that may to the ſaint, your onely Idea,
(Although ſimply attyrde) your manly affection vtter.
Happy be thoſe miſhapps vvhich iuſtly proportion holding,
Giue right ſound to the eares, and enter aright to the iudgement.
But vvretched be the ſoules, vvhich vaild in a contrary ſubiect:
How much more we do loue, ſo the leſſe our loues be beleeued.
VVhat skill ſalueth a ſore of a vvrong infirmitie iudged?
VVhat can iuſtice auaile, to a man that tells not his owne caſe?
Youthough feares do abash, in you ſtill poßible hopes be:
Nature againſt vve do ſeeme to rebell, ſeeme fooles in a vaine ſute.
But ſo vnheard, condemn'd, kept thence vve do ſeeke to abide in,
Selfe-loſt in wandring, banished that place vve do come from,
VVhat meane is there, alas, vve can hope our loſſe to recouer?
VVhat place is there left, vve may hope our vvoes to recomfort?
Vnto the heau'ns? our vvings be too short: earth thinks vs a burden.
Aire vve do ſtill vvith ſighes encreaſe: to the fire? we do want none.
And yet his outward heate our teares would quench, but an inward
Fire no liquor can coole: Neptunes realme would not auaile vs.
Happy shepheard, with thanks to the Gods, ſtill thinke to be thankfull,
That to thy aduauncement their vviſedomes haue thee abaſed.

Dorus. Vnto the Gods vvith a thankfull heart all thanks I do render,
That to my aduauncement their vviſdomes haue me abaſed.
But yet, alas! O but yet alas! our haps be but hard haps, VVhich muſt frame contempt to the fitteſt purchaſe of honour.
VVell may a Paſtor plaine, but alas his plaints be not eſteem'de:
Silly shepheards poore pype, vvhen his harsh ſound teſtifies anguish,
Into the faire looker on, paſtime, not paßion, enters.
And to the vvoods or brookes, vvho do make ſuch dreery recitall?
VVhat be the pangs they beare, and vvhence thoſe pangs be derived,
Pleaſd to receiue that name by rebounding anſwere of Eccho,
May hope thereby to eaſe their inward horrible anguish,
VVhen trees daunce to the pype, and ſwift ſtreames ſtay by the muſicke,
Or vvhen an Eccho begins vnmou'd to ſing them a loue ſong;
Say then, vvhat vantage do vve get, by the trade of a Paſtor?
(Since no eſtates be ſo baſe, but loue vouchſafeth his arrow,
Since no refuge doth ſerue from wounds we do carry about vs,
Since outward pleaſures be but halting helps to decayd ſoules)
Saue that dayly we may diſcerne vvhat fire vve do burne in.
Farre more happy be you, vvhoſe greatneſſe gets a free acceſſe;
VVhoſe faire bodily gifts are fram'd moſt louely to each eye.
Vertue you haue, of vertue you haue left proofe to the whole world.
And vertue is gratefull, with beautie and richneſſe adorned:
Neither doubt you awhit, time will your paßion vtter.
Hardly remains fier hid, where skill is bent to the hiding,
But in a minde that would his flames should not be repreſſed,

Nature

Nature worketh enough vvith a small help for the reuealing.
Giue therefore to the Muse great praise, in vvhose verie likenesse
You do approch to the fruit your onely desires be to gather.

Zelmane. First shall fertill grounds not yeeld increase of a good seed:
First the riuers shall cease to repay their fludds to the Ocean:
First may a trustie Greyhound transforme himselfe to a Tigre:
First shall vertue be vice, and beautie be counted a blemish,
Ere that I leaue vvith song of praise her praise to solemnize,
Her praise, whence to the world all praise hath his only beginning:
But yet well I do finde each man most wise in his owne case.
None can speake of a vvound vvith skill, if he haue not a vvound felt.
Great to thee my state seemes, thy state is blest by my iudgement:
And yet neither of vs great or blest deemeth his own selfe.
For yet (weigh this alas!) great is not great to the greater.
VVhat iudge you doth a hillocke shew, by the loftie Olympus?
Such my minute greatnes, doth seeme comparde to the greatest.
VVhen Cedars to the ground fall downe by the weight of an emmot,
Or when a rich rubies iust price be the worth of a walnut,
Or to the Sunne for wonders seeme small sparkes of a candle:
Then by my high Cedar, rich Ruby, and only shining Sunne, Vertue, richesse, beauties of mine shall great be reputed.
Oh no no, worthie shepheard, worth can neuer enter a title,
VVhere proofes iustly do teach, thus matcht, such worth to be nought worth,
Let not a puppet abuse thy sprite, Kings Crownes do not help them
From the cruell headache, nor shooes of gold do the gowt heale:
And precious couches full oft are shak't with a feauer.
If then a bodily euill in a bodily gloze be not hidden,
Shall such morning deawes be an ease to the heat of a loues fire?

Dorus. O glittring miseries of man, if this be the fortune
Of those fortune lulls? so small rest rests in a kingdome?
What maruaile tho a Prince transforme himselfe to a Pastor?
Come from marble bowres manie times the gay harbor of anguish,
Vnto a silly caban, though weake, yet stronger against woes.
Now by thy words I begin, most famous Ladie, to gather Comfort into my soule I do finde, I do find what a blessing
Is chaunced to my life, that from such muddie abundance
Of carking agonies (to states which still be adherent)
Destinie keepes me aloofe, for if all this state to thy vertue
Ioyn'd, by thy beautie adorn'd be no meanes these greefes to abolish:
If neither by that help, thou canst clime vp to thy fancie,
Nor yet fancie so dreast do receiue more plausible hearing:
Then do I thinke indeed, that better it is to be priuate
In sorrowes toments, then tied to the pomps of a pallace,
Nurse inward maladies, which haue not scope to be breath'd out:
But perforce digest all bitter ioyces of horror
In silence, from a mans owne selfe with company robbed.

Better yet do I liue, that though by my thoughts I be plunged
Into my liues bondage, yet may disburden a paſſion (Oppreſt with ruinouſe conceits (by the helpe of an outcrye:
Not limited to a vvhiſpering note, the Lament of a Courtier.
But ſometimes to the woods, ſometimes to the heau'n do decyphire
VVith bold clamor vnheard, vnmarkt, vvhat I ſeeke vvhat I ſuffer:
And vvhen I meete theſe trees, in the earths faire liuery clothed,
Eaſe I do feele (ſuch eaſe as falls to one vvholy diſeaſed)
For that I finde in them parte of my ſtate repreſented.
Lawrell shew's what I ſeeke, by the Mirre is show'd how I ſeeke it,
Oliue paints me the peace that I muſt aſpire to by the conqueſt:
Mirtel makes my requeſt, my requeſt is crown'd vvith a willowe?
Cyprus promiſeth help, but a help vvhere comes no recomfort:
Sweete Iuniper, ſaith this, though I burne, yet I burne in a ſweet fire.
Ewe doth make me thinke what kind of bow the boy holdeth
VVhich ſhootes ſtrongly without any noyſe, and deadly without ſmart.
Firre trees great and greene, fixt on a hye hill but a barrein,
Lyke to my noble thoughts, ſtill new, well plac'd, to me fruteleſſe.
Figge that yeeldes moſt pleaſant fruite, his ſhadow is hurtfull.
Thus be her giftes moſt ſweete, thus more danger to be neere her,
Now in a palme when I marke, how he doth riſe vnder a burden,
And may I not (ſay I then) get vp though griefs be ſo weightie?
Pine is a maſt to a ſhippe, to my ſhippe ſhall hope for a maſt ſerue,
Pine is hye, hope is as hye, ſharp leau'd, ſharp yet be my hopes buddes.
Elme embraſte by a vine, embracing fancy reuiueth:
Popler changeth his hew from a riſing ſunne to a ſetting:
Thus to my ſunne do I yeeld, ſuch lookes her beames do aforde me
Olde aged oke cutt downe, of newe worke ſerues to the building:
So my deſires by my feare cutt downe, be the frames of her honor.
Ashe makes ſpeares which ſhields do reſiſt, her force no repulſe takes.
Palmes do reioyce to be ioynd by the match of a male to a female,
And ſhall ſenſiue things be ſo ſenceleſſe as to reſiſt ſence?
Thus be my thoughts diſperſt, thus thinking nurſeth a thinking,
Thus both trees and each thing elſe, be the bookes of a fancy.
But to the Cedar Queene of woods, when I lift my beteard eyes.
Then do I shape to my ſelfe that forme vvhich raign's ſo within me,
And think there she do dwell & heare vvhat plaints I do vtter:
VVhen that noble toppe doth nodd, I beleeue she ſalutes me;
VVhen by the vvinde it maketh a noyſe, I do thinke she doth anſwer.
Then kneling to the ground, oft thus do I ſpeake to that Image:
Onely Iuell, O only Iuell, vvhich only deſerueſt,
That mens harts be thy ſeate, and endleſſe fame be thy ſeruant,
O deſcend for a vvhile, from this great height to behold me.
But nought els do behold (elſe is nought worth the beholding)
Saue vvhat a vvorke, by thy ſelfe is vvrought: & ſince I am altred
Thus by thy vvorke, diſdaine not that vvhich is by thy ſelfe done.
In meane caues oft treaſure abides, to an hoſtrie a king comes.
And ſo behind foule clowds full oft faire ſtarres do lie hidden.

Hardie

Zelmane. Hardy shepheard, such as thy merits, such may be her insight
Iustly to graunt thee reward, such enuie I beare to thy fortune.
But to my selfe what wish can I make for a salue to my sorrowes, VVhom both nature seems to debarre from meanes to be helped,
And if a meane were found, fortune th'whole course of it hinders.
This plagu'd how can I frame to my sore any hope of amendment?
VVhence may I shew to my minde any light of possible escape?
Bound and bound by so noble bands, as loth to be vnbound,
Iaylor I am to my selfe, prison & prisoner to mine own selfe.
Yet be my hopes thus plast, here fixt liues all my recomfort,
That that deare Dyamond, where wisdome holdeth a sure seate,
VVhose force had such force so to transforme, nay to reforme me,
VVill at length perceiue these flames by her beames to be kindled,
And will pitty the wound festred so strangely within me.
O be it so, graunt such an euent, ô Gods, that euent giue.
And for a sure sacrifice I do daily oblation offer
Of mine owne hart, where thoughts be the temple, sight is an aultar.
But ceasse worthie shepheard, now ceasse we to wearie the hearers
VVith monefull melodies, for enough our griefes be reuealed,
If by the parties meant our meanings rightly be marked,
And sorrows do require some respit vnto the sences.

What exclaming praises Basilius gaue to this Eclogue any man may ghesse, that knowes loue is better then a paire of spectacles to make euery thing seeme greater which is seene through it: and then is neuer tongue tied where fit commendation (whereof womankind is so likerous) is offered vnto it. But before any other came in to supplie the place, Zelmane hauing heard some of the shepheards by chaunce name Strephon and Klaius, supposing thereby they had bene present, was desirous both to heare them for the fame of their friendly loue, and to know them, for their kindnesse towards her best loued friend. Much grieued was Basilius, that any desire of his mistresse should be vnsatisfied, and therefore to represent them vnto her (as well as in their absence it might be) he commaunded one Lamon, who had at large set down their country pastimes & first loue to Urania, to sing the whole discourse, which he did in this manner.

A Shepheards tale no height of stile desires,
To raise in words what in effect is lowe:
A plaining song plaine-singing voice requires,
For warbling notes from inward chearing flow.
I then, whose burd'ned breast but thus aspires
Of shepheards two the seely cause to show,
Need not the stately Muses help inuoke
For creeping rimes, which often sighings choke.
But you, ô you, that thinke not teares too deare,
To spend for harms, although they touch you not:
And deigne to deeme your neighbors mischiefe neare,
Although they be of meaner parents got:
You I inuite with easie eares to heare

The poore-clad truth of loues wrong-ordred lot.
VVho may be glad, be glad you be not such:
VVho share in woe, vveygh others haue as much.
There was (ô seldome blessed word of vvas!)
A paire of friends, or rather one cald two,
Traind in the life vvhich no short-bitten grasse
In shine or storme must set the clowted shoe:
He, that the other in some yeares did passe,
And in those gifts that yeares distribute doe,
VVas Klaius cald, (ah Klaius, wofull wight!)
The later borne, yet too soone Strephon hight.
Epeirus high, was honest Klaius nest,
To Strephon Æoles land first breathing lent:
Put East & VVest were ioin'd by frendships hest.
As Strephons eare & heart to Klaius bent:
So Klaius soule did in his Strephon rest.
Still both their flocks flocking togither went,
As if they would of owners humour be,
And eke their pipes did vvell, as frends agree.
Klaius for skil of herbs & shepheards art,
Among the vviseſt was accounted vviſe;
Yet not so vviſe, as of vnstained hart:
Strephon vvas yong, yet markt vvith humble eies
How elder rul'd their flocks, & cur'd their smart,
So that the graue did not his words despise.
Both free of minde, both did clear-dealing loue,
And both had skill in verse their voice to moue.
Their chearfull minds, till pois'ned was their cheare,
The honest sports of earthy lodging proue;
Now for a clod-like Hare in form they peere,
Now bolt & cudgill Squirrels leape do moue.
Now the ambitious Larke vvith mirror cleare
They catch, vvhile he (foole!) to himself makes loue:
And now at keeles they trie a harmles chaunce,
And now their curre they teach to fetch & daunce.
VVhen merrie May first earlie calls the morne,
VVith merrie maids a Maying they do go:
Then do they pull from sharp & niggard thorne
The plenteous sweets (can sweets so sharply grow?)
Then some greene gownes are by the lasses worne
In chasteſt plaies, till home they walke arowe,
VVhile daunce about the May-pole is begun,
VVhen, if neede were, they could at quintain run:
VVhile thus they ran a low, but leauel'd race,
VVhile thus they liu'd, this was indeede a life)
VVith nature pleas'd, content with present case,
Free of proud feares, braue begg'ry, smiling strife,
Of clime-fall Court, the enuy-hatching place:

VVhile

VVhile those restlesse desires in great men rife
To visite so low folkes did much disdaine,
This while, though poore, they in thēselues did raigne.
One day (ô day, that shin'd to make them darke!)
VVhile they did vvard sun-beames vvith shadie bay,
And Klaius taking for his yongling carke,
(Lest greedie eies to them might challenge lay)
Busy with oker did their shoulders marke,
(His marke a Piller vvas deuoid of stay,
As bragging that free of all passions mone,
VVell might he others beare, but leane to none.)
Strephon vvith leauie twigs of Laurell tree
A garland made on temples for to weare,
For he then chosen vvas the dignitie
Of village Lord that vvhitsontide to beare:
And full, poore foole, of boyish brauerie,
VVith triumphs shewes vvould shew he nought did feare.
But fore-accounting oft makes builders misse,
They found, they felt, they had no lease of blisse.
For ere that either had his purpose done,
Behold (beholding well it doth deserue)
They saw a maid vvho thitherward did runne,
To catch her sparrow vvhich from her did swerue,
As shee a black-silke capon him begunne
To sett for foile of his milke-white to serue.
She chirping ran, he peeping flew away,
Till hard by them both he & shee did stay.
Well for to see they kept themselues vnseene,
And saw this faireſt maid of fairer minde,
By fortune meane, in Nature borne a Queene,
How vvell apaid shee was her bird to finde:
How tenderly her tender hands betweene
In iuory cage she did the micher binde:
How rosie moist'ned lips about his beake
Mouing, shee seem'd at once to kisse, & speake.
Chastned but thus, & thus his lesson tought
The happie wretch shee put into her breast, VVhich to their eies the bowles of Venus brought,
For they seem'd made euen of skie mettall best,
And that the bias of her bloud vvas vvrought.
Betwixt them two the peeper tooke his nest,
VVhere snugging vvell he vvell appear'd content,
So to haue done amisse, so to be shent.
This done, but done with captiue-killing grace,
Each motion seeming shott from beauties bow,
With length laid downe she deckt the lonely place.
Proud grew the grasse that vnder her did growe,

The trees ſpred out their armes to ſhade hir face,
But she on elbow lean'd with ſigh's did show
No graſſe, no trees, nor yet her ſparow might
To long perplexed mind breed long delight.
She troubled was (alas that it mought be!)
VVith tedious brawlings of her parents deare,
VVho would haue her in will & word agree
To wed Antaxius their neighbor neare.
A heardman rich of much account was he,
In whome no euill did raigne, nor good appeare.
In ſome ſuch one she lik'd not his deſire,
Faine would be free, but dreadeth parents ire.
Kindly, ſweet ſoule, she did vnkindneſſe take
That bagged baggage of a miſers mudd,
Should price of her, as in a market, make.
But golde can guild a rotten piece of wood,
To yeeld she found her noble heart did ake:
To ſtriue she fear'd how it with vertue ſtood.
This doubting clouds ore-caſting heau'nly braine,
At length in rowes of Kiſſe-cheeks teares they raine.
Cupid the wagg, that lately conquer'd had
Wiſe Counſellours, ſtout Captaines, puiſſant Kings,
And ti'de them faſt to leade his triumph bad,
Glutted with them now plaies with meaneſt things.
So oft in feaſts with coſtly changes clad
To crammed mawes a ſpratt new Stomake brings.
So Lords with ſport of Stagg & Hearon full
Sometimes we ſee ſmall birds from neſts do pull.
So now for pray theſe shepheards two he tooke,
VVhoſe mettall ſtiff he knew he could not bend
With hear-ſay pictures, or a vvindow looke,
With one good dawnce, or letter finely pend,
That were in Court a well proportion'd hooke,
Where piercing vvitts do quickly apprehend,
Their ſences rude plaine obiects only moue,
And ſo muſt ſee great cauſe before they loue.
Therfore Loue arm'd in her now takes the field,
Making her beames his brauery & might:
Her hands which pierc'd the ſoules ſeau'n-double shield,
VVere now his darts leauing his wonted fight.
Braue creſt to him her ſcorn-gold haire did yeeld,
His compleat harneis was her pureſt white.
But fearing leſt all white might ſeeme too good.
In cheeks & lipps the Tyran threatens bloud.
Beſides this force, within her eies he kept
A fire, to burne the priſoners he gaines,
VVhoſe boiling hart encreaſed as she wept:

For eu'n in forge cold water fire maintaines.
Thus proud & fierce vnto the hearts he ſtept
Of them poore ſoules: & cutting Reaſons raines,
Made them his owne before they had it wiſt.
But if they had, could shephookes this reſiſt?
Klaius ſtreight felt, & groned at the blowe,
And cal'd now vvounded, purpoſe to his aide:
Strephon, fond boy, delighted did not knowe,
That it vvas Loue that shin'de in shining maid:
But lickrous, Poiſon'd, faine to her would goe,
If him new-learned manners had not ſtai'd.
For then Vrania homeward did ariſe,
Leauing in paine their wel fed hungry eies.
She went, they ſtaid; or rightly for to ſay,
She ſtaid in them, they went in thought with hyr:
Klaius in deede vvould faine haue puld away
This mote from out his eye, this inward burre,
And now, proud Rebell gan for to gainſay
The leſſon which but late he learn'd too furre:
Meaning with abſence to refresh the thought
To vvhich her preſence ſuch a feauer brought.
Strephon did leap with ioy & iolitie,
Thinking it iuſt more therein to delight,
Then in good Dog, faire field, or shading tree.
So haue I ſeene trim bookes in veluet dight
With golden leaues, and painted baberie
Of ſeely boies pleaſe vnacquainted ſight:
But vvhen the rod began to play his part,
Faine vvould, but could not fly from golden ſmart.
He quickly learn'd Vrania vvas her name,
And ſtraight for failing grau'd it in his heart:
He knew her haunt, and haunted in the ſame,
And taught his sheepe her sheepe in food to thwart.
Which ſoone as it did bate full queſtion frame,
He might on knees confeſſe his faultie part,
And yeeld himſelfe vnto her punishment,
While nought but game, the ſelfe-hurt wanton ment.
Nay euen vnto her home he oft would go,
Where bold and hurtleſſe many play he tries,
Her parents liking well it should be ſo,
For ſimple goodneſſe shined in his eyes.
There did he make her laugh in ſpite of woe,
So as good thoughts of him in all ariſe,
While into none doubt of his loue did ſinke,
For not himſelfe to be in loue did thinke.
But glad Deſire, his late emboſom'd gueſt,
Yet but a babe, with milke of Sight he nurſt:

Deſire the more he ſuckt, more ſought the breſt,
Like dropſie folke ſtill drinke to be a thirſt.
Till one faire eau'n an hour ere Sun did reſt,
VVho then in Lions caue did enter firſt,
By neighbors prai'd she went abroad thereby.
At Barly brake her ſweet ſwift foot to trie.
Neuer the earth on his round shoulders bare
A maid train'd vp from high or low degree,
That in her doings better could compare
Mirth vvith reſpect, few words vvith curteſie,
A careleſſe comlineſſe vvith comely care.
Self-gard vvith mildneſſe, Sport vvith Maieſtie:
VVhich made her yeeld to deck this shepheards band,
And ſtill, beleeue me, Strephon was at hand.
A field they go, vvhere manie lookers be,
And thou ſeek-ſorow Klaius them among:
Indeed thou ſaid'ſt it vvas thy frend to ſee
Strephon, vvhoſe abſence ſeem'd vnto thee long,
VVhile moſt vvith her he leſſe did keepe vvith thee.
No, no, it vvas in ſpite of wiſdomes ſong
VVhich abſence vvisht: loue plai'd a victors part:
The beau'n-loue lodeſtone drew thy iron hart.
Then couples three be ſtreight allotted there,
They of both ends the middle two do flie,
The two that in mid place, Hell called vvere,
Muſt ſtriue with waiting foot, and watching eye
To catch of them, and them to hell to beare,
That they, aſwell as they, Hell may ſupplie:
Like ſome which ſeeke to ſalue their blotted name
VVith others blott, till all do taſt of shame.
There may you ſee, ſoone as the middle two
Do coupled towards either couple make,
They falſe and fearfull do their hands vndoe,
Brother his brother, frend doth frend forſake,
Heeding himſelfe, cares not how fellow do,
But of a ſtranger mutuall help doth take:
As periur'd cowards in aduerſitie
VVith ſight of feare from frends to fremb'd do flie.
Theſe ſports shepheards deuiz'd ſuch faults to show.
Geron, though old yet gameſome, kept one end
VVith Coſma, for vvhoſe loue Pas paſt in woe.
Faire Nous with Pas the lott to hell did ſend:
Pas thought it hell, while he was Coſma fro.
At other end Vran did Strephon lend
Her happy-making hand, of vvhome one looke
From Nous and Coſma all their beautie tooke.
The play began: Pas durſt not Coſma chace,

But

But did intend next bout with her to meete,
So he with Nous to Geron turn'd their race,
VVith whome to ioyne fast ran Vrania sweet?
But light-legd Pas had got the middle space.
Geron straue hard, but aged were his feet,
And therefore finding force now faint to be,
He thought gray haires a forded subtiltie.
And so when Pas hand reached him to take,
The fox on knees and elbowes tumbled downe;
Pas could not stay, but ouer him did rake,
And crown'd the earth with his first touching crowne:
His heels grow'n prowd did seeme at heau'n to shake.
But Nous that slipt from Pas, did catch the clowne.
So laughing all, yet Pas to ease some dell
Geron with Vran were condemn'd to hell.
Cosma this while to Strephon safely came,
And all to second barly-brake are bent:
The two in hell did toward Cosma frame,
VVho should to Pas, but they would her preuent.
Pas mad with fall, and madder with the shame,
Most mad with beames which he thought Cosma sent,
VVith such mad haste he did to Cosma goe,
That to her breast he gaue a noysome blowe.
She quick, and proud, and who did Pas despise,
Vp vvith her fist, and tooke him on the face,
Another time, quoth she, become more wise.
Thus Pas did kisse her hand with little grace,
And each way luckles, yet in humble guise
Did hold her fast for feare of more disgrace, while Strephon might with preatie Nous haue met,
But all this while another course he set.
For as Vrania after Cosma ran,
He rauished with sight how gracefullie
She mou'd her lims, and drew the aged man,
Left Nous to coast the loued beautie nie:
Nous cri'd, and chaf'd, but he no other can.
Till Vran seeing Pas to Cosma flie,
And Strephon single, turned after him.
Strephon so chas'd did seeme in milke to swimme.
He ran, but ran with eye ore shoulder cast,
More marking her, then how himselfe did goe,
Like Numid Lions by the hunters chas'd,
Though they do flie, yet backwardly do glowe
VVith proud aspect, disdaining greater hast.
VVhat rage in them, that loue in him did show.
But God giues them instinct the man to shun,
And he by law of Barly-brake must run.

But as his heate with running did augment,
Much more his ſight encreaſt his hote deſire:
So is in her the beſt of Nature ſpent,
The aire her ſweet race mou'd doth blow the fire.
Her feet be purſeuants from Cupid ſent,
VVith whoſe fine ſtepps all loues and ioyes conſpire.
The hidden beauties ſeem'd in wait to lye,
To downe proud hearts that would not willing dye.
Thus, faſt he fled from her he follow'd ſore,
Still shunning Nous to lengthen pleaſing race,
Till that he ſpied old Geron could no more,
Then did he ſlacke his loue-enſtructed pace.
So that Vran, whoſe arme old Geron bore,
Laid hold on him with moſt lay-holding grace.
So caught, him ſeem'd he caught of ioyes the beſt,
And thought it heau'n ſo to be drawn to heſt.
To hell he goes, and Nous with him muſt dwell.
Nous ſware it was no right; for his default
VVho would be caught, that she should go to hell:
But ſo she muſt. And now the third aſſault
Of Barly-brake among the ſix befell.
Pas Coſma matcht, yet angrie with his fault,
The other end Geron with Vran gard.
I thinke you thinke Strephon bent thitherward.
Nous counſeld Strephon Geron to purſue,
For he vvas old, and eaſly would be cought:
But he drew her as loue his fancie drew,
And ſo to take the gemme Vrania ſought.
VVhile Geron old came ſafe to Coſma true,
Though him to meete at all she ſturred nought.
For Pas, whether it were for feare, or loue,
Mou'd not himſelfe, nor ſuffred her to moue.
So they three did togither idly ſtay,
VVhile deare Vrán, vvhoſe courſe vvas Pas to meet,
(He ſtaying thus) vvas faine abroad to ſtray
VVith larger round, to shun the following feet.
Strephon, vvhoſe eyes on her back-parts did play,
VVith loue drawne on, ſo faſt vvith pace vnmeet
Drew dainty Nous, that she not able ſo
To runne, brake from his hands, and let him goe.
He ſingle thus, hop'd ſoone vvith her to be,
VVho nothing earthly, but of fire and aire,
Though vvith ſoft leggs, did runne as faſt as he.
He thriſe reacht, thriſe deceiu'd, vvhen her to beare
He hopes, vvith daintie turns she doth him flee.
So on the down's vve ſee, neere Wilton faire,
Ahaſt'ned Hare from greedy Grayhound goe,

And

And past all hope his chaps to frustrate so.
But this strange race more strange conceits did yeeld:
Who victor seem'd, was to his ruine brought:
Who seem'd orethrowne was mistresse of the field:
She fled, and tooke; he followed, and was cought.
So haue I heard to pierce pursuing shield,
By Parents train'd the Tartars wilde are tought,
With shafts shot out from their back-turned bow.
But ah! her darts did farre more deeplie go.
As Venus bird the vvhite, swift, louely Doue,
(O happie Doue that art compar'd to her!)
Doth on her wings her vtmost swiftnesse proue,
Finding the gripe of Falcon fierce not furre:
So did Vran: the narre, the swifter moue,
(Yet beautie still as fast as she did sturre)
Till with long race deare she was breathlesse brought,
And then the Phœnix feared to be cought.
Among the rest that there did take delight
To see the sports of double-shining day,
And did the tribute of their wondring sight
To Natures heire, the faire Vrania pay,
I told you Klaius was the hapless wight,
Who earnest found what they accounted play.
He did not there do homage of his eyes,
But on his eyes his heart did sacrifice.
With gazing lookes, short sighes, vnsetled feet
He stood, but turn'd, as Girosol, to Sun:
His fancies still did her in halfe way meet,
His soule did flie as she was seene to run.
In summe, proud Boreas neuer ruled Fleet
(Who Neptunes vveb on daungers distaffe spun)
With greater power, then she did make them wend
Each vvay, as she that ages praise, did bend.
Till spying well she vvelnigh vvearie vvas,
And surelie taught by his loue-open eye,
His eye, that eu'n did marke her troden grasse,
That she would faine the catch of Strephon flie,
Giuing his reason pasport for to passe
VVhither it would, so it would let him die,
He that before shund her, to shun such harmes,
Now runnes, and takes her in his clipping armes.
For vvith pretence from Strephon her to guard,
He met her full, but full of warefulnesse,
VVith inbow'd bosome well for her prepar'd,
When Strephon cursing his owne backwardnesse,
Came to her backe, and so with double ward
Impriſon her, vvho both them did possesse

As heart-bound ſlaues : and happie then embrace
Vertues proofe, fortunes victor, beauties place.
Her race did not her beauties beames augment,
For they were euer in the beſt degree,
But yet a ſetting forth it ſome way lent,
As Rubies luſtre when they rubbed be.
The daintie deaw on face and bodie went
As on ſweet flowers, when mornings drops vve ſee.
Her breath then short, ſeem'd loth from home to paſſe, VVhich more it mou'd, the more it ſweeter was.
Happie, ô hapie! if they ſo might bide,
To ſee her eyes, with how true humbleneſſe,
They looked downe to triumph ouer pride:
With how ſweet ſawes she blam'd their ſawcineſſe.
To feele the panting heart, vvhich through her ſide
Did beat their hands, vvhich durſt ſo neare to preſſe,
To ſee, to feele, to heare, to taſte, to know
More then, beſides her, all the earth could show.
But neuer did Medeas golden weed
On Creons child his poyſon ſooner throw,
Then thoſe delights through all their ſinewes breed,
A creeping ſerpent like of mortall vvoe.
Till she brake from their armes (although indeed Going from them, from them she could not go)
And fare-welling the flocke, did homeward vvend,
And ſo that euen the barlie-brake did end.
It ended, but the others vvoe began,
Began at leaſt to be conceiu'd as vvoe.
For then wiſe Klaius found no abſence can
Helpe him, vvho can no more her ſight forgo.
He found mans vertue is but part of man,
And part muſt follow vvhere vvhole man doth go.
He found that Reaſons ſelfe now reaſons found
To faſten knots, vvhich fancie firſt had bound.
So doth he yeeld, ſo takes he on his yoke,
Not knowing vvho did draw vvith him therein;
Strephon, poore youth, becauſe he ſaw no ſmoke,
Did not conceiue vvhat fire he had vvithin:
But after this to greater rage it broke,
Till of his life it did full conqueſt win,
Firſt killing mirth, then banishing all reſt,
Filling his eyes vvith teares, vvith ſighes his breaſt.
Then ſports grew paines, all talking tedious:
On thoughts he feeds, his looks their figure chaunge,
The day ſeemes long, but night is odious;
No ſleeps, but dreames, no dreames, but viſions ſtraunge,
Till finding ſtill his euill encreaſing thus,

One day he vvith his flocke abroad did raunge:
And comming vvhere he hop'd to be alone,
Thus on a hillocke set, he made his mone.
Alas! vvhat weights are these that lode my heart!
I am as dull as vvinter-sterued sheep,
Tir'd as a iade in ouerloden cart,
Yet thoughts do flie, though I can scarcely creepe.
All visions seeme, at euerie bush I start:
Drowsie am I, and yet can rarelie sleepe.
Sure I bewitched am, it is euen that,
Late neare a crosse I met an vgly Cat.
For, but by charmes, how fall these things on me,
That from those eyes where heau'nly apples bene,
Those eyes, which nothing like themselues can see,
Of faire Vrania, fairer then a greene,
Proudly bedect in Aprils liuerie,
A shot vnheard gaue me a wound vnseene?
He was inuisible that hurt me so,
And none inuisible, but spirits, can goe.
VVhen I see her, my sinewes shake for feare,
And yet, deare soule, I know she hurteth none:
Amid my flocke with woe my voice I teare,
And, but bewitch'd, vvho to his flocke would mone?
Her chery lips, milke hands, and golden haire
I still do see, though I be still alone.
Now make me thinke that there is not a fiend,
VVho hid in Angels shape my life would end.
The sports wherein I wonted to do vvell,
Come she, and sweet the aire with open breast,
Then so I faile, vvhen most I would do vvell,
That at me so amaz'd my fellowes iest:
Sometimes to her newes of my selfe to tell
I go about, but then is all my best
Wry vvords, and stam'ring, or else doltish dombe,
Say then, can this but of enchantment come?
Nay each thing is bewitcht to know my case:
The Nightingales for woe their songs refraine:
In riuer as I look'd, my pining face,
As pin'd a face as mine I saw againe.
The curteous mountaines grieu'd at my disgrace
Their snowie haire teare off in melting paine.
And now the dropping trees do weepe for me,
And now faire euenings blush my shame to see.
But you my pipe, whilome my chiefe delight,
Till straunge delight, delight to nothing ware,
And you my flocke, care of my carefull sight,
While I was I, and so had cause to care,

And thou my dogge, vvhose truth and valiant might
Made wolues (not inward wolues) my Ewes to spare:
Go you not from your maister in his woe,
Let it suffice that he himselfe forgoe.
For though like vvaxe this magicke makes me waste,
Or like a Lambe, vvhose damme away is fet,
(Stolne from her young by theeues vnchoosing-haste)
He treble beas for help, but none can get:
Though thus, and worse, though now I am at last,
Of all the games that here ere now I met,
Do you remember still you once were mine,
Till mine eyes had their curse from blessed eyne.
Be you vvith me vvhile I vnheard do crie,
VVhile I do score my losses on the vvind,
While I in heart my vvill vvrite ere I die.
In which by vvill, my will and wits I bind,
Still to be hers, about her ay to flie.
As this same sprite about my fancies blind
Doth dailie haunt: but so, that mine become
As much more louing, as lesse cumbersome.
Alas! a cloud hath ouercast mine eyes:
And yet I see her shine amid the cloud.
Alas! of ghosts I heare the gastlie cries:
Yet there, me seemes, I heare her singing loud.
This song she sings in most commanding vvise:
Come shepheards boy, let now thy heart be bow'd,
To make it selfe to my least looke a slaue:
Leaue sleepe, leaue all, I will no pieting haue.
I vvill, I vvill, alas, alas, I will:
Wilt thou haue more? more haue, if more I be.
Away ragg'd rammes, care I what murraine kill?
Out shreaking pipe, made of some witched tree:
Go bawling curre thy hungrie maw go fill
On you foule flocke belonging not to me.
VVith that his dog he henc'd, his flocke he curst,
VVith that (yet kissed first) his pipe he burst.
This said, this done, he rase, euen tir'd vvith rest,
With heart as carefull, as with careless grace,
With shrinking legges, but vvith a swelling breast,
VVith eyes vvhich threatned they vvould drowne his face,
Fearing the worst, not knowing vvhat vvere best,
And giuing to his sight a vvandring race,
He saw behind a bush vvhere Klaius sate:
His vvell knowne friend, but yet his vnknowne mate,
Klaius the vvretch, vvho latelie yeelden vvas
To beare the bonds vvhich time nor vvit could breake, (With blushing soule at sight of iudgements glasse, while

VVhile guiltie thoughts accus'd his reason vveake)
This morne alone to lonely vvalke did passe,
VVithin himselfe of her deare selfe to speake,
Till Strephons plaining voice him nearer drew,
Where by his vvords his self-like case he knew.
For hearing him so oft vvith vvords of woe
Vrania name, whose force he knew so vvell,
He quicklie knew vvhat vvitchcraft gaue the blow,
Which made his Strephon thinke himselfe in hell.
Which vvhen he did in perfect image show
To his owne vvit, thought vpon thought did swell,
Breeding huge stormes vvithin his inward part,
Which thus breath'd out with earthquake of his heart.

As Lamon would haue proceeded, Basilius knowing, by the wasting of the torches, that the night also was farre wasted, and withall remembring Zelmanes hurt, asked her, whether she thought it not better to reserue the complaint of Klatus till another day. Which she, perceiuing the song had alreadie worne out much time, and not knowing when Lamon would end, being euen now stepping ouer to a new matter, though much delighted with what was spoken, willinglie agreed vnto. And so of all sides they went to recommend themselues to the elder brother of death.

The end of the first Booke.

THE SECOND BOOKE OF THE COVNTESSE OF PEMBROKES ARCADIA.

IN theſe paſtorall paſtimes a great number of dayes were ſent to follow their flying predeceſſours, while the cup of poyſon (which was deeplie taſted of this noble companie) had left no ſinew of theirs without mortallie ſearching into it; yet neuer manifeſting his venimous worke, till once, that the night (parting away angrie, that ſhe could diſtill no more ſleepe into the eyes of Louers) had no ſooner giuen place to the breaking out of the morning light, and the Sunne beſtowed his beames vpon the toppes of the mountaines, but that the wofull Gynecia (to whom reſt was no eaſe) had left her lothed lodging, and gotten her ſelfe into the ſolitarie places thoſe deſerts were full of, going vp and downe with ſuch vnquiet motions, as a grieued and hopeleſſe minde is wont to bring forth. There appeared vnto the eyes of her iudgement the euils ſhee was like to runne into, with vglie infamie waiting vpon them: ſhe felt the terrours of her owne conſcience: ſhe was guiltie of a long exerciſed vertue, which made this vice the fuller of deformitie. The vttermoſt of the good ſhe could aſpire vnto, was a mortall wound to her vexed ſpirits: and laſtlie, no ſmall part of her euils was, that ſhe was wiſe to ſee her euils. In ſo much, that hauing a great while throwne her countenance ghaſtlie about her (as if ſhe had called all the powers of the world to be witneſſe of her wretched eſtate) at length caſting vp her waterie eyes to heauen; O Sunne (ſaid ſhe) whoſe vnſpotted light directs the ſteps of mortall mankind, art thou not aſhamed to impart the cleareneſſe of thy preſence to ſuch a duſt-creeping worme as I am? O you heauens (which continuallie keepe the courſe allotted vnto you) can none of your influences preuaile ſo much vpon the miſerable Gynecia, as to make her preſerue a courſe ſo long imbraced by her? O deſerts, deſerts, how fit a gueſt am I for you, ſince my heart can people you with wild rauenous beaſts, which in you are wanting? O Vertue, where doeſt thou hide thy ſelfe? What hideous thing is this which doth eclipſe thee? Or is it true that thou wert neuer but a vaine name, and no eſſentiall thing, which haſt thus left thy profeſſed ſeruant, when ſhe had moſt need of thy louely preſence? O imperfect proportion of reaſon, which can too much foreſee, and too litle preuent! Alas, alas (ſaid ſhe) if there were but one hope for all my paines, or but one excuſe for for all my faultineſſe. But wretch that I am, my torment is beyond all ſuccour, and my euill deſeruing doth exceed my euill fortune. For nothing elſe did my husband take this ſtrange reſolution to liue ſo ſolitarilie: for nothing elſe haue the winds deliuered this ſtraunge gueſt to my countrie: for nothing elſe haue the deſtinies reſerued my life to this time, but that onelie I (moſt wretched I) ſhould become a plague to my ſelfe, and a ſhame to womankind. Yet if my deſire (how vniuſt ſoeuer it be) might take effect, though a thouſand deaths followed it, and euery death were followed with a thouſand ſhames; yet ſhould not my ſepulcher receiue me without ſome contentment. But alas, though ſure I am, that Zelmane is ſuch as can anſwere my loue; yet as ſure I am, that this diſguiſing muſt needs come for ſome foretaken conceit: and then, wretched Gynecia, where canſt thou find any ſmall ground plot for hope to dwel vpon? No, no, it is Philoclea his hart is ſet vpon; it is my daughter I haue borne to ſupplant me: but if it be ſo, the life I haue giuen thee (vngratefull Philoclea) I will ſooner with theſe hands bereaue thee of, then my birth ſhall glorie ſhe hath bereaued me of my deſires: In ſhame there is no comfort, but to be beyond all bounds of ſhame.

Hauing ſpoken thus, ſhe began to make a piteous warre with her faire haire, whē ſhe might heare (not farre from her) an extreamely dolefull voyce, but ſo ſuppreſſed with a kind of whiſpering note, that ſhe could not cōceiue the words diſtinctly. But (as a lamentable tune is the ſweeteſt muſicke to a wofull mind) ſhe drew thither neare-away, in hope to find ſome companion of her miſerie: and as ſhe paced on, ſhe was ſtopped with a number of trees, ſo thicklie placed together, that ſhe was afraid ſhe ſhould (with ruſhing through) ſtop the ſpeech of the lamentable partie, which ſhe was ſo deſirous to vnderſtand: and therefore ſetting her downe as ſoftlie as ſhe could (for ſhe was now in diſtance to heare) ſhe might firſt perceiue a Lute excellently well plaid vpon, and then the ſame dolefull voyce accompanying it with theſe verſes.

IN vaine, mine eyes, you labour to amend
VVith flowing teares your fault of haſtie ſight:
Since to my heart her ſhape you did ſo ſend,
That her I ſee, though you did loſe your light.

In vaine, my heart, now you vvith ſight are burn'd,
With ſighes you ſeeke to coole your hot deſire:
Since ſighes (into mine inward furnace turn'd)
For bellowes ſerue to kindle more the fire.

Reaſon, in vaine (now you haue loſt my heart)
My head you ſeeke, as to your ſtrongeſt fort:
Since there mine eyes haue plaid ſo falſe a part,
That to your ſtrength your foes haue ſure reſort.
Then ſince in vaine I find vvere all my ſtrife,
To this ſtraunge death I vainlie yeeld my life.

The ending of the ſong ſerued but for a beginning of new plaints, as if the mind (oppreſſed with too heauie a burthen of cares) was faine to diſcharge it ſelfe of all ſides, and as it were, paint out the hideouſneſſe of the paine in al ſorts of colours. For the woful perſon (as if the lute had euil ioyned with the voice) threw it to the groūd with ſuch like words: Alas, poore Lute, how much art thou deceiu'd, to thinke that in my miſeries thou couldſt eaſe my woes, as in my careleſſe times thou was wont to pleaſe my fancies? The time is changed, my Lute, the time is changed; and no more did my ioyfull mind then receiue euerie thing to a ioyfull cõſideration, thẽ my carefull mind now makes each thing taſt like the bitter iuyce of care. The euil is inward, my Lute, the euill is inward; which all thou doeſt, doth ſerue but to make me think more freely of. And alas, what is thẽ thy harmony, but the ſweet meats of ſorow? the diſcord of my thoughts, my Lute, doth ill agree to the concord of thy ſtrings; therefore be not aſhamed to leaue thy maiſter, ſince he is not afraid to forſake himſelfe.

And thus much ſpoke (in ſteed of a concluſion) was cloſed vp with ſo heartie a groning, that Gynecia could not refraine to ſhew her ſelf, thinking ſuch griefs could ſerue fitly for nothing but her owne fortune. But as ſhe came into the litle Arbour of this ſorowfull muſicke, her eyes met with the eyes of Zelmane, which was the partie that thus had indited her ſelfe of miſerie: ſo that either of them remained confuſed with a ſodain aſtoniſhment. Zelmane fearing, leaſt ſhe had heard ſome part of thoſe cõplaints, which ſhe had riſen vp that morning early of purpoſe, to breath out in ſecret to her ſelf. But Gynecia a great while ſtood ſtil, with a kind of dul amaſemẽt, looking ſtedfaſtlie vpon her: at length returning to ſome vſe of her ſelf, ſhe began to aske Zelmane, what cauſe caried her ſo earlie abroad? But as if the opening of her mouth to Zelmane, had opened ſome great floud-gate of ſorow (wherof her heart could not abide the violent iſſue (ſhe ſanke to the ground, with her hands ouer her face, crying vehemently, Zelmane help me, ô Zelmane haue pitie on me. Zelmane ran to her, maruelling what ſodain ſickneſſe had thus poſſeſſed her: & beginning to aske her the cauſe of her paine, and offering her ſeruice to be imployed by her: Gynecia opening her eyes wildly vpon her, pricked with the flames of loue, and the tormentes of her owne conſcience; O Zelmane, Zelmane, ſaid ſhe, doeſt thou offer me phyſick, which art my only poyſon? or wilt thou do me ſeruice, which haſt already brought me into eternall ſlauerie? Zelmane then knowing wel at what marke ſhe ſhot, yet loth to enter into it: Moſt excellent Lady (ſaid ſhe) you were beſt retire your ſelfe into your lodging, that you the better may paſſe this ſodaine fit. Retire my ſelfe? (ſayd Gynecia) If I had retyred my ſelfe into my ſelfe, when thou to me (vnfortunate gueſt) cameſt to draw me from my ſelfe, bleſſed had I bene, and no need had I had of this counſell. But now alas, I am forced to flie to thee for ſuccour, whom I accuſe of all my hurt; & make thee iudge of my cauſe, who art the only author of my miſchief. Zelmane the more aſtoniſhed, the more ſhe vnderſtood her; Madam (ſaid ſhe) wherof do you accuſe me, that I will not cleare my ſelfe? Or wherein may I ſteed you, that you may not command me? Alas, anſwered Gynecia, what ſhall I ſay more? Take pitie of me, ô Zelmane, but not as Zelmane, and diſguiſe not with me in words, as I know thou doeſt in apparell.

Zelmane was much troubled with that word, finding her ſelfe brought to this ſtraight. But as ſhe was thinking what to anſwer her; they might ſee old Baſilius paſſe hard by them, without euer ſeeing them: complaining likewiſe of loue very freſhly; and ending his complaint with this ſong, Loue hauing renewed both his inuention, and voyce.

LEt not old age diſgrace my high deſire,
O heauenly ſoule, in humaine shape conteind:
Old wood inflam'd, doth yeeld the braueſt fire,
VVhen yonger doth in ſmoke his vertue ſpend.

Ne let vvhite haires, which on my face do grow,
Seeme to your eyes of a disgracefull hue:
Since vvhiteneſſe doth present the ſweeteſt show,
Which makes all eyes do homage vnto you.

Old age is wiſe, and full of conſtant truth;
Old age well ſtayed, from ranging humour liues:
Old age hath knowne vvhat euer was in youth:
Old age orecome, the greater honour giues.
And to old age ſince you your ſelfe aſpire,
Let not old age diſgrace my high deſire.

Which being done, he looked verie curiouſlie vpon himſelfe, ſomtimes fetching a litle skip, as if he had ſaid his ſtrength had not yet forſaken him. But Zelmane hauing in this time gotten ſome leaſure to thinke for an anſwere; looking vpon Gynecia, as if ſhe thought ſhe did her ſome wrong: Madam (ſaid ſhe) I am not acquainted with thoſe words of diſguiſing, neither is it the profeſſion of an Amazon, neither are you a partie with whom it is to be vſed: if my ſeruice may pleaſe you, imploy it, ſo long as you do me no wrong in miſiudging of me. Alas Zelmane (ſaid Gynecia) I perceiue you know full litle how piercing the eyes are of a true louer: there is no one beame of thoſe thoughts you haue planted in me, but is able to diſcerne a greater cloud then you do go in. Seeke not to conceale your ſelfe further from me, nor force not the paſſion of loue into violent extremities. Now was Zelmane brought to an exigent, when the king turning his eyes that way through the trees, perceiued his wife and miſtreſſe together, ſo that framing the moſt louely countenance he could, he came ſtraight way towards them; and at the firſt word (thanking his wife for hauing entertained Zelmane) deſired her ſhe would now returne into the Lodge, becauſe he had certaine matters of eſtate to impart to the Lady Zelmane. The Queene (being nothing troubled with iealouſie in that point) obeyed the kings commandement; full of raging agonies, and determinatly bent, that as ſhe would ſeeke all louing means to winne Zelmane, ſo ſhe would ſtirre vp terrible tragedies, rather then faile of her intent. And ſo went ſhe from them to the Lodge-ward, with ſuch a battell in her thoughts, and ſo deadly an ouerthrow giuen to her beſt reſolutions, that euen her body (where the field was fought) was oppreſſed withall: making a languiſhing ſickneſſe wait vpõ the triumph of paſſion; which the more it preuailed in her, the more it made her iealouſie watchfull, both ouer her daughter, and Zelmane, hauing euer one of them entruſted to her owne eyes.

But as ſoone as Baſilius was rid of his wiues preſence, falling downe on his knees, O Ladie (ſaid he) which haſt onely had the power to ſtirre vp againe thoſe flames which had ſo long laine dead in me; ſee in me the power of your beautie, which can make old age come to aske counſell of youth; and a Prince vnconquered to become a ſlaue to a ſtranger: and when you ſee that power of yours, loue that at leaſt in me, ſince it is yours, although of me you ſee nothing to be loued. Worthie Prince (anſwered Zelmane, taking him vp from his kneeling) both your maner, and your ſpeech are ſo ſtraunge vnto me, as I know not how to anſwere it better then with ſilence. If ſilence pleaſe you (ſaid the king) it ſhall neuer diſpleaſe me, ſince my heart is whollie pledged to obey you: otherwiſe, if you would vouchſafe mine eares ſuch happineſſe as to heare you, they ſhall conuey your words to ſuch a mind, which is with the humbleſt degree of reuerence to receiue them. I diſdaine not to ſpeake to you (mightie Prince ſaid Zelmane) but I diſdaine to ſpeak to anie matter which may bring my honour into queſtion: and therewith with a braue counterfeited ſcorne ſhe departed from the king; leauing him not ſo ſorie for his ſhort anſwere, as proud in himſelfe that he had broken the matter. And thus did the king (feeding his mind with thoſe thoughts) paſſe great time in writing verſes, and making more of himſelfe, then he was wont to do: that with a litle helpe, he would haue growne into a pretie kind of dotage.

But Zelmane being rid of this louing, but litle-loued companie, Alas (ſaid ſhe) poore Pyrocles, was there euer one, but I, that had receiued wrong, and could blame no bodie? that hauing more then I deſire, am ſtill in want of that I would? Trulie Loue, I muſt needs ſay thus much on thy behalfe; thou haſt imployed my loue there, where all loue is deſerued; and for recompence haſt ſent me more loue then euer I deſired. But what wilt thou do Pyrocles? which way canſt thou find to rid thee of thy intricate troubles? To her whom I would be knowne to, I liue in darkneſſe: and to her am reuealed, from whom I would be moſt ſecret. What ſhift ſhall I find againſt the diligent loue of Baſilius? what ſhield againſt the violent paſſions of Gynecia? And if that bee done, yet how am I the nearer to quench the fire that conſumes me? Well, well, ſweet Philoclea, my whole confidence muſt be builded in thy diuine ſpirit, which cannot be ignorant of the cruell wound I haue receiued by you.

But as ſicke folkes when they are alone, thinke companie would relieue them, and yet hauing companie do find it noiſome; changing willingly outward obiects, when indeed the euill is inward: ſo poore Zelmane was no more wearie of Baſilius, then ſhe was of her ſelfe, when Baſilius was gone: and euer the more, the more ſhe turned her eyes to become her owne iudges. Tired wherewith, ſhe longed to meet her friend Dorus; that vpon the ſhoulders of friendſhip ſhe might lay the burthen of ſorrow, and therefore went toward the other lodge; where among certaine Beeches ſhe found Dorus, apparelled in ſlanen, with a Goats skin caſt vpon him, and a garland of Laurell mixt with Cypres leaues on his head, waiting on his maiſter Dametas, who at that time was teaching him how with his ſheephook to catch a wāton Lambe, and how with the ſame to caſt a litle clod at anie one that ſtrayed out of companie. And while Dorus was practiſing, one might ſee Dametas holding his hand vnder his girdle behind him, nodding from the waſte vpwards, and ſwearing he neuer knew man go more aukewardlie to worke: and that they might talke of booke-learning what they would; but for his part, hee neuer ſaw more vnfeatie fellowes then great clearks were.

But Zelmanes comming ſaued Dorus from further chiding. And ſo ſhe beginning to ſpeake with him of the number of his maiſters ſheep, and which prouince of Arcadia bare the fineſt wooll, drewe him on to follow her in ſuch countrie diſcourſes, til (being out of Dametas hearing) with ſuch vehemēcie of paſſiō, as though her heart would clime into her mouth, to take her tongues office, ſhe declared vnto him, vpon what briers the roſes of her affections grew: how time ſtill ſeemed to forget her, beſtowing no one houre of cōfort vpon her; ſhe remaining ſtil in one plight of ill fortune, fauing ſo much worſe, as continuance of euill doth in it ſelfe increaſe euill. Alas my Dorus (ſaid ſhe) thou ſeeſt how long and languiſhingly the weeks are paſt ouer ſince our laſt talking. And yet I am the ſame, miſerable I, that I was: onlie ſtrōger in longing, & weaker in hoping. Thē fell ſhe to ſo pitifull a declaratiō of the insupportableneſſe of her deſires, that Dorus eares (not able to ſhew what wounds that diſcourſe gaue vnto them) procured his eyes with tears to giue teſtimony, how much they ſuffered for her ſuffering: till paſſion (a moſt cumberſome gueſt to it ſelfe made Zelmane (the ſooner to ſhake it off) earneſtlie intreat Dorus that he alſo (with like freedome of diſcourſe) would beſtow a Mappe of his litle world vpon her, that ſhe might ſee, whether it were troubled with ſuch vnhabitable climes of cold deſpaires, and hot rages as hers was. And ſo walking vnder a few palme trees, (which being louing in their owne nature, ſeemed to giue their ſhadow the willinglier, becauſe they held diſcourſe of loue.) Dorus thus entred to the deſcription of his fortune: Alas, ſaid he, deare couſin, that it hath pleaſed the high powers to throwe vs to ſuch an eſtate, as the onlie entercourſe of our true friendſhip, muſt bee a bartring of miſeries: for my part, I muſt confeſſe indeed, that from a huge darkneſſe of ſorowes, I am crept (I cannot ſay to a lightſomneſſe, but) to a certaine dawning, or rather peeping out of ſome poſſibilitie of comfort: but wo is me, ſo farre from the marke of my deſires, that I rather think it ſuch a light, as comes through a ſmall hole to a dungeō, that the miſerable caitife may the better remember the light, of which he is depriued; or like a ſcholler, who is only come to that degree of knowledge, to find himſelfe vtterlie ignorant: but thus ſtands it with me: After that by your means I was exalted to ſerue in yonder bleſſed lodge, for a while I had in the fornace of my agonies, this refreſhing; that (becauſe of the ſeruice I had done in killing of the Beare) it pleaſed the Princeſſe (in whom indeed ſtatelineſſe ſhines through curteſie) to let fall ſome gracious looke vpon me: ſometimes to ſee my exerciſes, ſometimes to heare my ſongs. For my part, my heart would not ſuffer me to omit anie occaſion, whereby I might make the incomparable Pamela, ſee how much extraordinarie deuotion I bare to her ſeruice: and withall ſtraue to appeare more worthie in her ſight; that ſmall deſert ioyned to ſo great affection, might preuaile ſomething in the wiſeſt Ladie. But too well (alas) I found, that a ſhepheards ſeruice was but conſidered of, as from a ſhepheard, and the acceptation limited to no further proportion, then of a good ſeruant. And when my countenance had once giuen notice that there lay affectiō vnder it, I ſaw ſtraight, Maieſtie (ſitting in the throne of Beautie) draw forth ſuch a ſword of iuſt diſdaine, that I remained as a man thunder-ſtriken, not daring, no not able to behold that power. Now to make my eſtate knowne, ſeemed againe impoſſible, by reaſon of the ſuſpitiouſneſſe of Dametas, Miſo, & my young miſtreſſe Mopſa: for Dametas (according to the conſtitution of a dull head) thinks no better way to ſhew himſelfe wiſe, then by ſuſpecting euerie thing in his way: which ſuſpition Miſo (for the hoggiſh ſhrewdneſſe of her braine) and Mopſa (for a verie vnlikelie enuie ſhe hath ſtumbled vpō againſt the Princeſſes vnſpeakeable beautie) were verie glad to execute: ſo that I (finding my ſeruice by this means lightlie regarded, my affection deſpiſed, and my ſelfe vnknowne) remained no fuller of deſire, then voyd of counſell how to come to my deſire; which (alas) if theſe trees could ſpeake, they might well witneſſe: for, many times haue I ſtood here, bewayling my ſelfe vnto them: manie times haue I, leaning to yonder Palme, admired the bleſſedneſſe of it, that it could beare loue without ſence of paine: manie times, when my maiſters cattell came hither to chew their cud in this freſh place, I might ſee the young Bull teſtifie his loue: but how? with proud lookes and ioyfulneſſe. O wretched mankind (ſaid I then to my ſelfe) in whom wit (which ſhould be the gouernour of his welfare) becomes the traitor to his bleſſedneſſe: theſe beaſts like childrē to nature, inherit her bleſſings quietly, we, like baſtards, are laid abroad euen as foundlings to be trained vp by griefe and ſorrow. Their minds grudge not at their bodies comfort, nor their ſences are letted from enioying their obiects: wee haue the impediments of honour, and the torments of conſcience. Truly in ſuch cogitations haue I ſometimes ſo long ſtood, that me thought my feet began to grow into the ground, with ſuch a darkneſſe and heauineſſe of mind, that I might easilie haue bene perſwaded to haue reſigned ouer my verie eſſence. But loue (which one time layeth burthens, another time giueth wings) when I was at the loweſt of my downward thoughts, pulled vp my heart to remēber, that nothing is atchieued before it be throughlie attempted, and that lying ſtill doth neuer go forward; and that therfore it was time, now or neuer, to ſharpē my inuention, to pierce through the hardneſſe of this enterpriſe; neuer ceaſing to aſſemble al my conceits, one after another, how to manifeſt both my mind & eſtate, till at laſt I lighted & reſolued on this way, which yet perchaunce you wil thinke was a way rather to hide it. I began to counterfeit the extreameſt loue towards Mopſa that might be; & as for the loue, ſo liuelie it was indeed within me, (although to another ſubiect) that litle I needed to counterfeit anie notable demonſtrations of it; and ſo making a contrarietie the place of my memorie, in her fouleneſſe I beheld Pamelas faireneſſe, ſtill looking on Mopſa, but thinking on Pamela; as if I ſaw my Sun ſhine in a pudled water: I cried out of nothing but Mopſa; to Mopſa my attendance was directed; to Mopſa the beſt fruits I could gather were brought; to Mopſa it ſeemed ſtil that mine eye conueyed my tongue: ſo that Mopſa was my ſaying; Mopſa was my ſinging; Mopſa (that is onlie ſutable in laying a foule complexion vpon a filthy fauour, ſetting forth both in ſluttiſhneſſe) ſhe was the lode-ſtarre of my life; ſhe the bleſſing of mine eyes, ſhe the ouerthrowe of my deſires, and yet the recompence of my ouerthrow; ſhe the ſweetneſſe of my heart, euen ſweetning the death, which her ſweetneſſe drew vpon me. In ſumme, whatſoeuer I thought of Pamela, that I ſaid of Mopſa; whereby as I gate my maiſters good wil, who before ſpited me, fearing leaſt I ſhold win the Princeſſe fauour from him, ſo did the ſame make the Princeſſe the better content to allow me her preſence: whether indeed it were, that a certaine ſparke of noble indignation did riſe in her, not to ſuffer ſuch a baggage not to winne away any thing of hers, how meanly ſoeuer ſhe reputed of it; or rather (as I thinke) my words being ſo paſſionate, and ſhooting ſo quite contrarie frō the marks of Mopſas worthineſſe, ſhe perceiued well enough whither they were directed; and therefore being ſo masked, ſhe was contented as a ſport of wit to attend them: whereupon one day determining to find ſome means to tell (as of a third perſon) the tale of mine owne loue and eſtate, finding Mopſa (like a Cuckoe by a Nightinghale) alone with Pamela, I came in vnto them, and with a face (I am ſure) full of clowdie fancies, tooke a harpe and ſung this ſong.

SInce ſo mine eyes are ſubiect to your ſight,
That in your ſight they fixed haue my braine:
Since ſo my heart is filled with that light,
That onlie light doth all my life maintaine.

Since in ſweet you all goods ſo richlie raigne,
That where you are no vvished good can want:
Since ſo your liuing image liues in me,
That in my ſelfe your ſelfe true loue doth plant:

How

How can you him vnworthie then decree,
In vvhose chiefe part your worthes implanted be?

The song being ended, which I had often broken off in the middest with grieuous sighes, which ouertooke euery verse I sang, I let fall my harpe from mee; and casting mine eye sometime vpon Mopsa, but setling my sight principally vpon Pamela, And is it the onely fortune most beautifull Mopsa (said I) of wretched Dorus, that fortune must be the measure of his mind? Am I onely he, that because I am in miserie, more miserie must be laid vpon me? must that which should be cause of compassion, become an argument of crueltie against me? Alas excellent Mopsa, consider, that a vertuous Prince requires the life of his meanest subiect, & the heauenly Sunne disdaines not to giue light to the smallest worme. O Mopsa, Mopsa, if my hart could be as manifest to you, as it is vncomfortable to me, I doubt not the height of my thoughts should well counteruaile the lowneſſe of my qualitie. Who hath not heard of the greatneſſe of your estate? who seeth not, that your estate is much excelled with that sweet vniting of all beauties, which remaineth and dwelleth with you? who knowes not, that all these are but ornaments of that diuine sparke within you, which being descended from heauen, could not els-where picke out so sweete a mansion? But if you will know what is the band that ought to knit all these excellencies together, it is a kind mercifulneſſe to such a one, as is in his soule deuoted to those perfections. Mopsa (who alreadie had had a certaine smackring towards me) stood all this while with her hand sometimes before her face, but most commonly with a certaine speciall grace of her owne, wagging her lips, and grinning in steede of smiling: but all the words I could get of her, was, wrying her waste, and thrusting out her chinne, In faith you iest with me: you are a merrie man in deede. But the euer-pleasing Pamela (that well found the Comedie would be marred, if she did not help Mopsa to her part) was content to vrge a little further of me. Master Dorus (said the faire Pamela) me thinks you blame your fortune verie wrongfully, since the fault is not in Fortune, but in you, that cannot frame your selfe to your fortune: and as wrongfully do require Mopsa to so great a disparagement as to her Fathers seruaunt; since she is not worthie to be loued, that hath not some feeling of her owne worthines. I staied a good while after her words, in hope she would haue continued her speech (so great a delight I receiued in hearing her) but seeing her say no further, (with a quaking all ouer my bodie) I thus answered her: Ladie, most worthie of all dutie, how falles it out that you in whō all vertue shines, will take the patronage of fortune, the only rebellious handmaid against vertue? Especially, since before your eyes, you haue a pittifull spectacle of her wickednesse, a forlorne creature, which must remaine not such as I am, but such as she makes me, since she must be the ballance of worthinesse or disparagement. Yet alas, if the condemned man (euen at his death) haue leaue to speake, let my mortall wound purchase thus much consideration; since the perfections are such in the partie I loue, as the feeling of them cannot come into any vnnoble hart; shall that hart, which doth not onely feele them, but hath all the working of his life placed in them, shall that hart I saie, lifted vp to such a height, be counted base? O let not an excellent spirit do it selfe such wrong, as to thinke, where it is placed, imbraced, and loued; there can be any vnworthinesse, since the weakest mist is not easilier driuen away by the Sunne, then that is chased away with so high thoughts. I will not denie (answered the gracious Pamela) but that the loue you beare to Mopsa, hath brought you to the consideration of her vertues, and that consideration may haue made you the more vertuous, and so the more worthie: But euen that then (you must confesse) you haue receiued of her, and so are rather gratefully to thank her, then to presse any further, till you bring something of your owne, whereby to claime it. And truely Dorus, I must in Mopsaes behalfe say thus much to you, that if her beauties haue so ouertaken you, it becomes a true Loue to haue your heart more set vpon her good then your owne, and to beare a tenderer respect to her honour, then your satisfaction. Now by my hallidame, Madame (said Mopsa, throwing a great number of sheeps eyes vpon me) you haue euen touched mine owne minde to the quicke, forsooth. I (finding that the pollicie that I had vsed, had at least wise produced thus much happinesse vnto me, as that I might euen in my Ladies presence, discouer the sore which had deepely festered within me, and that shee could better conceiue my reasons applied to Mopsa, then she would haue vouchsafed them, whilest her selfe was a partie) thought good to pursue on my good beginning, vsing this fit occasion of Pamelaes wit, and Mopsaes ignorance. Therefore with an humble piercing eye, looking vpon Pamela, as if I had rather bene condemned by her mouth, then highly exalted by the other, turning my selfe to Mopsa, but keeping mine eye where it was: Faire Mopsa (said I) well do I find by the wise knitting together of your answere, that any disputation I can vse is asmuch too weake, as I vnworthy. I find my loue shalbe proued no loue, without I leaue to loue, being too vnfit a vessell in whom so high thoughts should be engraued. Yet since the Loue I beare you, hath so ioyned it self to the best part of my life, as the one can not depart, but that the other will follow, before I seeke to obey you in making my last passage, let me know which is my vnworthinesse, either of mind, estate, or both? Mopsa was about to say, in neither; for her heart I thinke tumbled with ouermuch kindnesse, when Pamela with a more fauourable countenance then before (finding how apt I was to fall into despaire) told me, I might therein haue aunswered my selfe; for besides that it was graunted me, that the inward feeling of Mopsaes perfections had greatly beautified my minde, there was none could denie, but that my minde and bodie deserued great allowance. But Dorus (said she) you must be so farre maister of your loue, as to consider, that since the iudgement of the world stands vpon matter of fortune, and that the sexe of womankind of all other is most bound to haue regardfull eye to mens iudgements, it is not for vs to play the Philosophers, in seeking out your hidden vertues: since that, which in a wise Prince would be counted wisedome, in vs will be taken for a light-grounded affection: so is not one thing, one, done by diuers persons. There is no man in a burning feuer feeles so great contentment in cold water greedily receiued (which as soone as the drinke ceaseth, the rage reneweth) as poore I found my soule refreshed with her sweetly pronounced words; and newly, and more violently againe enflamed, assoone as she had closed vp her delightfull speech, with no lesse well graced silence. But remembring in my selfe, that aswell the Souldier dieth which standeth still, as he that giues the braueſt onset: and seeing that to the making vp of my fortune, there wanted nothing so much as the making knowne of mine estate, with a face well witnessing how deeply my soule was possessed, and with the most submissiue behauior, that a thralled heart could expresse, euen as my words had bene too thicke for my mouth, at length spake to this purpose: Alas, most worthie Princesse (said I) and do not then your owne sweet words sufficiently testifie, that there was neuer man could haue a iuster action against filthie fortune, then I, since all other things being granted graunted me, her blindneſſe is my only let? O heauenly God, I would either ſhe had ſuch eyes as were able to diſcerne my deſerts, or I were blind not to ſee the dayly cauſe of my misfortune. But yet (ſaid I) moſt honoured Ladie, if my miſerable ſpeeches haue not alreadie cloied you, and that the verie preſence of ſuch a wretch become not hatefull in your eyes: let me reply thus much further againſt my mortall ſentence, by telling you a ſtorie, which happened in this ſame countrie long ſince (for woes make the ſhorteſt time ſeeme long) whereby you ſhall ſee that my eſtate is not ſo contemptible, but that a Prince hath bene content to take the like vpon him, and by that onely hath aſpired to enioy a mightie Princeſſe. Pamela graciouſly hearkened, and I told my tale in this ſort.

In the countrie of Theſſalia, (alas, why name I that accurſed countrie, which brings foorth nothing, but matters for tragedies? but name it I muſt) in Theſſalia I ſay) there was (wel may I ſay, there was) a Prince (no, no Prince, whome bondage wholly poſſeſſed; but yet accounted a Prince, and) named Muſidorus. O Muſidorus, Muſidorus; but to what ſerue exclamations, where there are no eares to receiue the ſound? This Muſidorus being yet in the tendreſt age, his worthy father paied to nature (with a violent death) her laſt duties, leauing his child to the faith of his friends, and the proofe of time: death gaue him not ſuch pangs as the foreſightfull care he had of his ſilly ſucceſſour. And yet if in his foreſight he could haue ſeene ſo much, happie was that good Prince in his timely departure, which barred him from the knowledge of his ſonnes miſeries, which his knowledge could neither haue preuented, nor releeued. The young Muſidorus (being thus, as for the firſt pledge of the deſtenies good will, depriued of his principall ſtay) was yet for ſome yeares after (as if the ſtarres would breath themſelues for a greater miſchiefe) lulled vp in as much good luck, as the heedful loue of his doleful mother, and the floriſhing eſtate of his countrie could breed vnto him.

But when the time now came, that miſery ſeemed to be ripe for him, becauſe he had age to knowe miſery, I thinke there was a conſpiracy in all heauenly and earthly things, to frame fit occaſions to leade him vnto it. His people (to whō all forrain matters in foretime were odious) began to wiſh in their beloued Prince, experience by trauaile: his deare mother whoſe eyes were held open, onely with the ioy of looking vpon him) did now diſpenſe with the comfort of her widowhead life, deſiring the ſame her ſubiects did, for the increaſe of her ſonnes worthineſſe. And hereto did Muſidorus owne vertue (ſee how vertue can bee a miniſter to miſchiefe) ſufficiently prouoke him: for indeed thus much I muſt ſay for him, although the likeneſſe of our miſhaps makes me preſume to patterne my ſelfe vnto him, that well-doing was at that time his ſcope, from which no faint pleaſure could with-hold him. But the preſent occaſion which did knit all this together, was his vncle the king of Macedon; who hauing lately before gotten ſuch victories, as were beyond expectation, did at this time ſend both for the Prince his ſonne (brought vp together, to auoid the warres, with Muſidorus) and for Muſidorus himſelf, that his ioy might be the more ful, hauing ſuch partakers of it. But alas, to what a ſea of miſeries my plaintfull toung doth lead me; & thus out of breath, rather with that I thought, then that I ſaid, I ſtayed my ſpeech, til Pamela ſhewing by coũtenãce that ſuch was her pleaſure, I thus continued it: Theſe two yong Princes to ſatisfie the king, tooke their way by ſea, towards Thrace, whither they would needs go with a Nauie to ſuccor him: he being at that time before Bizantium with a mighty Army beſieging it; where at that time his court was. But when the conſpired heauens had gotten this Subiect of their wrath vpō ſo fit a place as the ſea was, they ſtreight began to breath out in boiſtrous winds ſome part of their malice againſt him; ſo that with the loſſe of al his Nauie, he only with the Prince his coſin, were caſt a land, far off frō the place whither their deſires would haue guided them. O cruel winds in your vncōſiderate rages, why either began you this furie, or why did you not end it in his end? But your crueltie was ſuch, as you would ſpare his life for many deathfull torments. To tell you what pitifull miſhaps fell to the yong Prince of Macedon his coſin, I ſhould too much fill your eares with ſtrange horrors; neither will I ſtaie vpon thoſe laborſome aduentures, nor lothſom miſaduentures, to which, & through which his fortune & courage conducted him; My ſpeech haſtneth it ſelf to come to the ful point of Muſidorus infortunes. For as we find the moſt peſtilent diſeaſes do gather into themſelues all the infirmities with which the body before was annoyed; ſo did his laſt miſerie embrace in the extremitie of it ſelfe all his former miſchieſes.

Arcadia, Arcadia was the place prepared to be the ſtage of his endleſſe ouerthrow. Arcadia was, (alas wel might I ſay it is) the charmed circle, where all his ſpirits for euer ſhould be enchanted. For here (& no where els) did his infected eyes make his mind know, what power heauēly beautie hath to throw it down to helliſh agonies. Here, here did he ſee the Arcadian Kings eldeſt daughter, in whō he forthwith placed ſo all his hopes of ioy, & ioyfull parts of his heart, that he left in himſelf nothing, but a maze of longing, & a dungeon of ſorrow. But alas, what can ſaying make them beleue, whom ſeeing cannot perſwade? Thoſe paines muſt be felt before they can be vnderſtood; no outward vtterance can command a conceipt. Such was as then the ſtate of the king, as it was no time by direct meanes to ſeeke her. And ſuch was the ſtate of his captiued will, as he could delay no time of ſeeking her.

In this intangled cauſe, he clothed himſelfe in a ſhepheards weede, that vnder the baſeneſſe of that forme, he might at laſt haue free acceſſe to feed his eyes with that which ſhould at length eat vp his heart. In which doing, thus much without doubt he hath manifeſted, that this eſtate is not alwaies to be reiected, ſince vnder that vaile there may be hidden things to be eſteemed. And if he might with taking on a ſhepherds looke caſt vp his eyes to the faireſt Princeſſe Nature in that time created; the like, nay the ſame deſire of mine need no more to be diſdained, or held for diſgracefull. But now alas mine eyes waxe dimme, my toung beginnes to falter, and my hart to want force to helpe, either with the feeling remembrance I haue, in what heape of miſeries the caitife Prince lay at this time buried. Pardon therefore moſt excellēt Princeſſe, if I cut off the courſe of my dolorous tale, ſince if I be vnderſtood, I haue ſaid enough for the defence of my baſeneſſe; and for that which after might befal to that patterne of ill fortune, (the matters are too monſtrous for my capacitie) his hatefull deſtinies muſt beſt declare their owne workmanſhip.

Thus hauing deliuered my tale in this perplexed manner, to the end the Princeſſe might iudge that he meant himſelfe, who ſpake ſo feelingly; her aunſwere was both ſtrange, and in ſome reſpect comfortable. For would you thinke it? ſhee hath heard heretofore of vs both, by meanes of the valiant Prince Plangus, and particularly of our caſting away: which ſhe (following mine owne ſtile) thus delicately brought foorth: You haue told (ſaid ſhe) Dorus, a pretie tale; but you are much deceiued in the latter end of it. For the Prince Muſidorus with his coſin Pyrocles did both periſh vpon the coaſt of Laconia; as a noble gentleman called Plangus (who was well acquainted with the hiſtorie) did aſſure my father. O how that ſpeach of hers did powre ioyes in my hart? ô bleſſed name (thought I) of mine, ſince thou haſt bene in that toung, and paſſed through thoſe lips, though I can neuer hope to approch them. As for Pyrocles (ſaid I) I will not denie it, but that he is periſhed: (which I ſaid, leaſt ſooner ſuſpition might ariſe of your being here, then your ſelfe would haue it) and yet affirmed no lye vnto her, ſince I onely ſaid, I would not deny it. But for Muſidorus (ſaid I) I perceiue indeed you haue either heard or read the ſtory of that vnhappy Prince; for this was the verie obiection, which that peereleſſe Princeſſe did make vnto him, when he ſought to appeare ſuch as he was before her wiſdome: and thus as I haue read it faire written in the certaintie of my knowledge he might anſwere her, that indeed the ſhip wherin he came, by a treaſon was periſhed, and therefore that Plangus might eaſily be deceiued: but that he himſelfe was caſt vpon the coaſt of Laconia, where hee was taken vp by a couple of ſhepheards, who liued in thoſe dayes famous; for that both louing one faire maide, they yet remained conſtant friends; one of whoſe ſongs not long ſince was ſong before you by the ſhepheard Lamon, and brought by them to a noble-mans houſe, neere Mantinea, whoſe ſonne had a little before his mariage, bene taken priſoner, and by the helpe of this Prince, Muſidorus (though naming himſelfe by another name) was deliuered. Now theſe circumlocutions I did vſe, becauſe of the one ſide I knew the Princeſſe would know well the parties I meant; and of the other, if I ſhould haue named Strephon, Claius, Kalander and Clitophon, perhappes it would haue rubd ſome coniecture into the heauie head of Miſtreſſe Mopſa.

And therefore (ſaid I) moſt diuine Lady, he iuſtly was thus to argue againſt ſuch ſuſpitions, that the Prince might eaſily by thoſe parties be ſatisfied, that vpon that wrack ſuch a one was taken vp, and therefore that Plangus might wel erre, who knew not of anies taking vp: againe that hee that was ſo preſerued brought good tokens to be one of the two, chiefe of that wracked companie: which two ſince Plangus knew to be Muſidorus and Pyrocles, hee muſt needes bee one of them, although (as I ſaide) vpon a foretaken vow, he was otherwiſe at that time called. Beſides, the Princeſſe muſt needes iudge, that no leſſe then a Prince durſt vndertake ſuch an enterpriſe, which (though he might get the fauour of the Princeſſe) he could neuer defend with leſſe then a Princes power, againſt the force of Arcadia. Laſtly, (ſaid he) for a certaine demonſtration, he preſumed to ſhew vnto the Princeſſe a marke he had on his face, as I might (ſaid I) ſhew this of my neck to the rare Mopſa: and withall, ſhewed my necke to them both, where (as you know) there is a redde ſpot bearing figure (as they tell me) of a Lyons pawe, that ſhee may aſcertaine her ſelfe, that I am Menalcas brother. And ſo did he, beſeeching her to ſend ſome one ſhe might truſt, into Theſſalia, ſecretly to bee aduertiſed, whether the age, the complexion, & particularly that notable ſigne, did not fully agree with their Prince Muſidorus. Do you not know further (ſaide ſhe, with a ſetled countenance, not accuſing any kind of inward motion) of that ſtorie. Alas no, (ſaid I) for euen here the Hiſtoriographer ſtopped, ſaying, The reſt belonged to Aſtrologie. And therewith, thinking her ſilent imaginations began to worke vpon ſomwhat, to mollifie them (as the nature of Muſick is to do) and withall, to ſhew what kinde of ſhepheard I was, I tooke vp my Harpe, and ſang theſe few verſes:

MY ſheepe are thoughts, vvhich I both guide and ſerue:
Their paſture is faire hilles of fruitleſſe loue:
On barren ſweetes they feed, and feeding ſterue:
I waile their lott, but will not other proue.

My sheepehooke is wanne hope, which all vpholds:
My weedes, Desire, cut out in endlesse folds.
VVhat wooll my sheepe shall beare, whiles thus they line,
In you it is, you must the iudgement giue.

And then, partly to bring Mopsa againe to the matter (lest she should too much take heed to our discourses) but principally, if it were possible, to gather some comfort out of her answeres, I kneeled downe to the Princesse, and humblie besought her to moue Mopsa in my behalf, that she would vnarme her noble hart of that steely resistance against the sweet blowes of Loue: that since all her parts were decked with some particular ornament; her face with beautie, her head with wisdome, her eyes with maiestie, her countenãce with gracefulnesse, her lips with louelinesse, her tongue with victorie; that shee would make her hart the throne of pittie, being the most excellent rayment of the most excellent part.

Pamela without shew either of fauour or disdaine, either of heeding or neglecting what I had said, turned her speech to Mopsa, and with such a voice and action, as might shew shee spake of a matter which litle did concerne her, Take heede to your selfe (said shee) Mopsa, for your shepheard can speake well: but truly, if he doe fully proue himselfe such as he saith, I mean, the honest shepheard Menalchas his brother and heire, I know no reason why you should thinke scorne of him. Mopsa though (in my conscience) shee were euen then farre spent towards me, yet shee answered her, that for all my queint speaches, she would keepe her honestie close inough: And that as for the way of matrimony, shee would step neuer a foote further, till my Master her father had spoken the whole word himselfe, no shee would not. But euer and anon turning her muzzell toward me, shee threwe such a prospect vpon me, as might well haue giuen a surfet to any weake louers stomacke. But Lord what a foole am I, to mingle that driuels speeches among my noble thoughts? but becausse shee was an Actor in this Tragedie, to geue you a full knowledge, and to leaue nothing (that I can remember) vnrepeated.

Now the Princesse being about to withdraw her selfe from vs, I tooke a Iewell made in the figure of a Crab-fish, which, becausse it lookes one way and goes another, I thought it did fitly patterne out my looking to Mopsa, but bending to Pamela: The word about it was, By force, not choice; and still kneeling, besought the Princesse that she would vouchsafe to giue it Mopsa, and with the blessednes of her hand to make acceptable vnto her that toye which I had found, following of late an acquaintaunce of mine at the plowe. For (said I) as the earth was turned vp, the plow-share lighted vpon a great stone: wee puld that vp, and so found both that and some other prety things, which we had deuided betwixt vs.

Mopsa was benummed with ioy when the Princesse gaue it her: but in the Princesse I could find no apprehension of what I either said or did, but with a calme careles nesse letting each thing slide, iustly as we doo by their speeches (who neither in matter nor person doo any way belong vnto vs) which kinde of cold temper, mixt with that lightning of her naturall maiestie, is of all others most terrible vnto me: for yet if I found she contemned mee, I would desperatly labour both in fortune and vertue to ouercome it; if she only misdoubted me, I were in heauen; for quickly I would bring sufficient assurance: lastly, if shee hated me, yet I should know what passion to deale with; and either with infiniteness of desert I would take away the fewell from that fire; or if nothing would serue, then I would giue her her my hart-bloud to quench it. But this cruell quietneſſe, neither retiring to miſlike nor proceeding to fauour; gracious, but gracious ſtill after one maner; all her curteſies hauing this engrauen in them, that what is done, is for vertues ſake, not for the parties (euer keeping her courſe like the Sun, who neither for our prayſes, nor curſes, will ſpur or ſtop his horſes.) This (I ſay) heauenlineſſe of hers (for howſoeuer my miſery is I cannot but ſo entitle it) is ſo impoſſible to reach vnto, that I almoſt begin to ſubmit my ſelfe to the tyranny of diſpaire, not knowing any way of perſwaſion, where wiſdome ſeemes to be vnſenſible. I haue appeared to her eyes, like my ſelfe, by a deuice I vſed with my maiſter, perſwading him that we two might put on certaine rich apparell I had prouided, and ſo practiſe ſomething on horſebacke before Pamela, telling him, it was apparell I had gotten for playing well the part of a king in a Tragedy at Athens: my horſe indeede was it I had left at Menalcas houſe, & Dametas got one by friendſhip out of the Princes ſtable. But howſoeuer I ſhew, I am no baſe body, all I do is but to beate a rocke and get ſome.

But as Dorus was about to tell further, Dametas (who came whiſtling, and counting vpon his fingers, how many loade of hay his ſeuenteene fat oxen eate vp in a yeare) deſired Zelmane from the king that ſhe wold come into the lodge, where they ſtayed for her. Alas (ſayd Dorus, taking his leaue) the ſum is this, that you may well finde you haue beaten your ſorrow againſt ſuch a wall, which with the force of rebound may well make your ſorrow ſtronger. But Zelmane turning her ſpeech to Dametas, I ſhall grow (ſayd ſhe) skilfull in countrey matters, if I haue often conference with your ſeruant. In ſooth (anſwered Dametas with a graceleſſe ſcorne) the Lad may proue well enough, if hee ouerſoone thinke not too well of himſelfe, and will beare away that hee heareth of his elders. And therewith as they walked to the other lodge, to make Zelmane find ſhee might haue ſpent her time better with him, he began with a wilde Methode to runne ouer all the art of husbandrie: eſpecially imploying his tongue about well dunging of a field: while poore Zelmane yeelded her eares to thoſe tedious ſtrokes, not warding them ſo much as with any one anſwere, till they came to Baſilius, and Gynecia, who attended for her in a coach to cary her abroade to ſee ſome ſportes prepared for her. Baſilius, and Gynecia ſitting in the one ende, placed her at the other, with her left ſide to Philoclea. Zelmane was moued in her mind, to haue kiſſed their feete for the fauour of ſo bleſſed a ſeate: for the narrowneſſe of the coach made them ioyne from the foote to the ſhoulders very cloſe together; the truer touch whereof though it were barred by their enuious apparell, yet as a perfect Magnes, though but in an iuorie box, will through the box ſend foorth his imbracing vertue to a beloued needle; ſo this imparadiſed neighbourhood made Zelmanes ſoule cleaue vnto her, both thorow the iuory caſe of her body, and the apparell which did ouer-cloude it. All the bloud of Zelmanes body ſtirring in her, as wine will do when ſuger is haſtily put into it, ſeeking to ſucke the ſweeteneſſe of the beloued gueſt; her heart, like a lion new impriſoned, ſeeing him that reſtraines his liberty, before the grate; not panting, but ſtriuing violently (if it had beene poſſible) to haue leapt into the lappe of Philoclea. But Dametas, euen then proceeding from being maiſter of a carte, to bee doctor of a coach, not a little proude in himſelfe, that his whippe at that time guided the rule of Arcadia, draue the coach (the couer whereof was made with ſuch ioynts, that as they might (to auoide the weather) pull it vp cloſe when they liſted, ſo when they would they might put each ende downe, and remaine as diſcouered and open ſighted as on horſebacke) till vpon the ſide of the forreſt they had both greyhounds, ſpaniels, and hounds: where of the firſt might ſeeme the Lords, the ſecond the Gentlemen, and the laſt the yeomen of dogges; a caſt of Merlins there was beſides, which flying of a gallant height ouer certaine buſhes, would beate the birds (that roſe) downe vnto the buſhes, as Falcons will doe wild-foule ouer a riuer. But the ſport which for that day Baſilius would principallie ſhew to Zelmane, was the mountie at a Hearne, which getting vp on his wagling wings with paine, till he was come to ſome height (as though the aire next to the earth were not fit for his great body to flie thorough) was now growne to diminiſh the ſight of himſelfe, and to giue example to great perſons, that the higher they be, the leſſe they ſhould ſhew: when a Ierfaulcon was caſt off after her, who ſtreight ſpying where the pray was, fixing her eye with deſire, and guiding her wing by her eye, vſed no more ſtrength then induſtry. For as a good builder to a high tower will not make his ſtayre vpright, but winding almoſt the full compaſſe about, that the ſteepeneſſe bee the more vnſenſible: ſo ſhe, ſeeing the towring of her purſued chaſe, went circkling, and compaſſing about, riſing ſo with the leſſe ſence of riſing; and yet finding that way ſcantly ſerue the greedineſſe of her haſt, as an ambitious bodie will go far out of the direct way, to win to a point of height which hee deſires; ſo would ſhe (as it were) turne taile to the Heron, and flie quite out another way, but all was to returne in a higher pitch; which once gotten, ſhe would either beate with cruell aſſaults the Heron, who now was driuen to the beſt defence of force, ſince flight would not ſerue; or elſe claſping with him, come downe together, to bee parted by the ouer-partiall beholders.

Diuerſe of which flights Baſilius ſhewing to Zelmane, thus was the richeſſe of the time ſpent, and the day deceaſſed before it was thought of, till night like a degenerating ſucceſſour made his departure the better remembred. And therefore (ſo conſtrained) they willed Dametas to driue homeward, who (halfe ſleeping, halfe muſing about the mending of a wine preſſe) guided the horſes ſo ill, that the wheele comming ouer a great ſtub of a tree, it ouerturned the coach. Which though it fell violently vpon the ſide where Zelmane and Gynecia ſate, yet for Zelmanes part, ſhe would haue bin glad of the fall, which made her beare the ſweete burthen of Philoclea, but that ſhe feared ſhe might receiue ſome hurt. But indeede neither ſhe did, nor any of the reſt, by reaſon they kept their armes and legs within the coach, ſauing Gynecia, who with the onely bruze of the fall, had her ſhoulder put out of ioynct; which though by one of the Faulkeners cunning, it was ſet well againe, yet with much paine was ſhe brought to the lodge; and paine (fetching his ordinary companion, a feuer with him) draue her to entertaine them both in her bed.

But neither was the feuer of ſuch impatient heate, as the inward plague-ſore of her affection, nor the paine halfe ſo noyſome, as the iealouſie ſhe conceiued of her daughter Philoclea, leaſt this time of her ſickneſſe might giue apt occaſion to Zelmane, whom ſhe miſdoubted. Therefore ſhe called Philoclea to her, and though it were late in the night, commanded her in her eare to go to the other lodge, & ſend Miſo to her, with whom ſhe would ſpeake, and ſhe lie with her ſiſter Pamela. The meane while Gynecia kept Zelmane with her, becauſe ſhe would be ſure, ſhe ſhould be out of the lodge, before ſhe licenced Zelmane. Philoclea not skild in any thing better thē obedience, went quietly downe; and the Moone then full (not thinking ſcorne to be a torch-bearer to ſuch beauty) guided her ſteppes, whoſe motions beare a mind which bare in it ſelfe farre more ſtirring motions. And alas (ſweete Philoclea) how hath my penne till now forgot thy paſſions, ſince to thy memory principally all this long matter is intended? pardon the slackenesse to come to those woes, which hauing caused in others, thou didst feele in thy selfe.

The sweete minded Philoclea was in their degree of well doing, to whom the not knowing of euill serueth for a ground of vertue, and hold their inward powers in better forme with an vnspotted simplicity, then many, who rather cunningly seeke to know what goodnesse is, then willingly take into themselues the following of it. But as that sweete and simple breath of heauenly goodnesse, is the easier to be altered, because it hath not passed through the worldly wickednesse, nor feelingly found the euill, that euill caries with it; so now the Lady Philoclea (whose eyes and senses had receiued nothing, but according as the naturall course of each thing required; whose tender youth had obediently, liued vnder her parents behests, without framing out of her owne will the fore-chosing of any thing) when now shee came to appoint, wherein her iudgement was to be practised, in knowing faultines by his first tokens, she was like a yong Faune, who comming in the wind of the hunters, doth not know whether it bee a thing or no to bee eschewed; whereof at this time she began to get a costly experience. For after that Zelmane had a while liued in the lodge with her, and that her onely being a noble straunger had bred a kind of heedfull attention; her comming to that lonely place (where she had no body but her parents) a willingnes of conuersation; her wit & behauiour, a liking and silent admiration; at length the excellency of her naturall gifts, ioyned with the extreame shewes she made of most deuout honouring Philoclea (carying thus in one person, the only two bands of good will, louelinesse and louingnesse) brought forth in her hart a yeelding to a most friendly affection; which when it had gotten so full possession of the keyes of her mind, that it would receiue no message from her senses, without that affection were the interpreter; then streight grew an exceeding delight still to be with her, with an vnmeasurable liking of all that Zelmane did: matters being so turned in her, that where at first liking her manners did breede good-will, now good-will became the chiefe cause of liking her manners: so that within a while Zelmane was not prized for her demeanure, but the demeanure was prized because it was Zelmanes. Then followed that most naturall effect of conforming ones selfe to that, which she did like, and not onely wishing to be her selfe such an other in all things, but to ground an imitation vpon so much an esteemed authoritie: so that the next degree was to marke all Zelmanes doings, speeches, and fashions, and to take them into her selfe, as a patterne of worthie proceeding. Which when once it was enacted, not onely by the comminaltie of Passions, but agreed vnto by her most noble Thoughts, and that by Reason it selfe (not yet experienced in the issues of such matters) had granted his royall assent; then Friendship (a diligent officer) tooke care to see the statute throughly obserued. Then grew on that not onely she did imitate the soberneſse of her countenance, the gracefulneſse of her speech, but euen their particular gestures: so that as Zelmane did often eye her, she would often eye Zelmane; and as Zelmanes eyes would deliuer a submissiue, but vehement desire in their looke, she, though as yet she had not the desire in her, yet should her eyes answere in like piercing kindneſse of a looke. Zelmane as much as Gynecias iealousie would suffer, desired to bee neare Philoclea; Philoclea, as much as Gynecias iealousie would suffer, desired to be neare Zelmane. If Zelmane tooke her hand, and softly strained it, she also (thinking the knots of friendship ought to be mutuall) would (with a sweete fastneſse) shew she was loth to part from it. And if Zelmane sighed, she would sigh also; when Zelmane was sad, she deemed it wisdome, and therefore ſhe would be ſad too. Zelmanes languiſhing countenance with croſt armes, and ſometimes caſt-vp eyes, ſhe thought to haue an excellent grace: and therefore ſhe alſo willingly put on the ſame countenance: till at the laſt (poore ſoule, ere ſhe were aware) ſhe accepted not onely the badge, but the ſeruice; not only the ſigne, but the paſſion ſignified. For whether it were, that her wit in continuance did find, that Zelmanes friendſhip was full of impatient deſire, hauing more then ordinary limits, and therfore ſhe was content to ſecond Zelmane, though her ſelfe knew not the limits; or that in truth, true loue (well conſidered) hath an infectiue power; at laſt ſhe fell in acquaintance with loues harbinger, wiſhing: Firſt ſhe would wiſh, that they two might liue all their liues together, like two of Dianas Nimphes. But that wiſh, ſhe thought not ſufficient, becauſe ſhe knew, there would be more Nimphes beſides them, who alſo would haue their part in Zelmane. Then would ſhe wiſh, that ſhe were her ſiſter, that ſuch a naturall band might make her more ſpeciall to her. But againſt that, ſhe conſidered, that though being her ſiſter, if ſhe happened to be married, ſhe ſhould be robbed of her. Then growne bolder, ſhe would wiſh either her ſelfe, or Zelmane a man, that there might ſucceede a bleſſed mariage betwixt them. But when that wiſh had once diſplaied his enſigne in her minde, then followed whole ſquadrons of longings, that ſo it might be, with a maine battell of miſlikings, and repinings againſt their creation, that ſo it was not. Then dreames by night began to bring more vnto her, then ſhe durſt wiſh by day, where out making did make her know her ſelfe the better by the image of thoſe fancies. But as ſome diſeaſes when they are eaſie to be cured, they are hard to bee knowne, but when they grow eaſie to be knowne, they are almoſt impoſſible to bee cured: ſo the ſweete Philoclea, while ſhe might preuent it, ſhe did not feele it, now ſhe felt it, when it was paſt preuenting; like a riuer, no rampiers being built againſt it, till already it haue ouerflowed. For now indeed loue puld off his maske, and ſhewed his face vnto her, and told her plainly, that ſhe was his priſoner. Then needed ſhe no more paint her face with paſſions; for paſſions ſhone thorough her face; then her roſie colour was often encreaſed with extraordinary bluſhing: and ſo another time, perfect whiteneſſe deſcended to a degree of paleneſſe; now hot, then cold, deſiring ſhe knewe not what, nor how, if ſhe knew what. Then her minde (though too late) by the ſmart was brought to thinke of the diſeaſe, and her owne proofe taught her to know her mothers minde; which (as no error giues ſo ſtrong aſſault, as that which comes armed in the authoritie of a parent) ſo greatly fortified her deſires, to ſee, that her mother had the like deſires. And the more iealous her mother was, the more ſhe thought the Iewell precious, which was with ſo many lockes garded. But that preuailing ſo farre, as to keepe the two louers from priuate conference, then began ſhe to feele the ſweetneſſe of a louers ſolitarineſſe, when freely with words and geſtures, as if Zelmane were preſent, ſhe might giue paſſage to her thoughts, and ſo as it were, vtter out ſome ſmoke of thoſe flames, wherewith elſe ſhe was not onely burned, but ſmothered. As this night, that going from the one lodge to the other by her mothers commandement, with dolefull geſtures and vncertaine paces, ſhe did willingly accept the times offer, to be a while alone: ſo that going a little aſide into the wood; where many times before ſhe had delighted to walke, her eyes were ſaluted with a tuft of trees, ſo cloſe ſet together, as with the ſhade the Moone gaue through it, it might breede a fearefull kinde of deuotion to looke vpon it. But true thoughts of loue baniſhed all vaine fancie of ſuperſtition. Full well ſhe did both remember and like the place;

for there had she often with their shade beguiled Phœbus of looking vpon her: There had she enioyed her selfe often, while she was mistresse of her selfe, and had no other thoughts, but such as might arise out of quiet senses.

But the principall cause that inuited her remembrance, was a goodly white marble stone, that should seeme had beene dedicated in ancient time to the Siluan gods: which she finding there a few dayes before Zelmanes comming, had written these words vpon it, as a testimonie of her mind, against the suspition her captiuitie made her thinke she liued in. The writing was this.

YOu liuing powers enclosd in stately shrine
Of growing trees: you rurall Gods that wield
Your scepters here, if to your eares diuine
A voice may come, which troubled soule doth yeeld:
This vow receiue, this vow ô Gods maintaine;
My virgin life no spotted thought shall staine.

Thou purest stone; whose pureness doth present
My purest mind; whose temper hard doth show
My tempred hart; by thee my promise sent Vnto my selfe let after-liuers know.
No fancy mine, nor others wrong suspect
Make me, ô vertuous shame, thy lawes neglect.

O Chastity, the Chiefe of heauenly lights,
VVhich makst vs most immortall shape to weare,
Hold thou my hart, establish thou my sprights:
To onely thee my constant course I beare.
Till spotlesse soule vnto thy bosome flie.
Such life to leade, such death I vow to die.

But now that her memory serued as an accuser of her change, and that her owne hand-writing was there, to beare testimony against her fall; she went in among those few trees, so closed in the tops together, as they might seeme a litle chappell: and there might she by the helpe of the Moone-light perceiue the goodly stone, which serued as an altar in that woodie deuotion. But neither the light was enough to reade the words, and the inke was alreadie foreworne, and in many places blotted: which as she perceiued, Alas (sayd she) faire marble, which neuer receiuedst sport but by my writing, well do these blots become a blotted writer. But pardon her which did not dissemble then, although she haue changed since. Enioy, enioy the glory of thy nature, which can so constantly beare the markes of my inconstancie. And herewith hiding her eies with her soft hand, there came into her head certaine verses, which if she had had present commoditie, she would haue adioyned as a retractation to the other. They were to this effect.

MY words, in hope to blaze a stedfast mind,
This marble chose, as of like temper knowne:
But loe, my words defaste, my fancies blind,
Blots to the stone, shames to my selfe I find:

And witneſſe am, how ill agree in one,
A womans hand with conſtant marble ſtone.

My words full weake, the marble full of might;
My words in ſtore, the marble all alone;
My words blacke inke, the marble kindly white;
My words vnſeene, the marble ſtill in ſight,
May witneſſe beare, how ill agree in one,
A womans hand, with conſtant marble ſtone.

But ſeeing ſhe could not ſee meanes to ioyne as then this recantation to the former vowe (laying all her faire length vnder one of the trees) for a while ſhe did nothing but turne vp and downe, as if ſhe had hoped to turne away the fancie that maiſtred her, and hid her face, as if ſhe could haue hidden her ſelfe from her owne fancies. At length with a whiſpring note to her ſelfe; O me vnfortunate wretch (ſayd ſhe) what poyſonous heates bee theſe, which thus torment me? How hath the ſight of this ſtrange gueſt inuaded my ſoule? Alas, what entrance found this deſire, or what ſtrength had it thus to conquer me? Then, a cloud paſſing betweene her ſight and the Moone, O Diana (ſayd ſhe) I would either the cloud that now hides the light of my vertue, would as eaſily paſſe away, as you will quickly ouercome this let; or elſe that you were for euer thus darkened, to ſerue for an excuſe of my outragious folly. Then looking to the ſtarres, which had perfitly as then beautified the cleare skie: My parents (ſayd ſhe) haue told me, that in theſe faire heauenly bodies, there are great hidden deities, which haue their working in the ebbing and flowing of our eſtates. If it be ſo, then (ô you ſtars) iudge rightly of me, and if I haue with wicked intent made my ſelfe a pray to fancie, or if by any idle luſts I framed my heart fit for ſuch an impreſſion, then let this plague daily encreaſe in me, till my name be made odious to womankind. But if extreame and vnreſiſtable violence haue oppreſſed me, who will euer do any of you ſacrifice (ô you ſtars) if you do not ſuccour me, No, no, you will not helpe me. No, no, you cannot helpe me: Sinne muſt be the mother, and ſhame the daughter of my affection. And yet are theſe but childiſh obiections (ſimple Philoclea) it is the impoſſibilitie that doth torment me: for, vnlawfull deſires are puniſhed after the effect of enioying; but vnpoſſible deſires are puniſhed in the deſire it ſelfe. O then, ô tenne times vnhappie that I am, ſince where in all other hope kindleth loue; in me deſpaire ſhould be the bellowes of my affection: and of all deſpaires the moſt miſerable, which is drawne from impoſſibility. The moſt couetous man longs not to get riches out of a ground which neuer can beare any thing; Why? becauſe it is impoſſible. The moſt ambitious wight vexeth not his wits to clime into heauen; Why? becauſe it is impoſſible. Alas then, ô Loue, why doſt thou in thy beautifull ſampler ſet ſuch a worke for my deſire to take out, which is as much impoſſible? And yet alas, why do I thus condemne my fortune, before I heare what ſhe can ſay for her ſelfe? What do I, fillie wench, know what Loue hath prepared for mee? Do I not ſee my mother, as well, at leaſt as furiouſlie as my ſelfe, loue Zelmane? And ſhold I be wiſer then my mother? Either ſhe ſees a poſſibility in that which I thinke impoſſible, or elſe impoſſible loues neede not misbecome me. And doe I not ſee Zelmane (who doth not thinke a thought which is not firſt wayed by wiſedome and vertue) doth not ſhe vouchſafe to loue me with like ardour? I ſee it, her eyes depoſe it to be true;

What

What then? and if ſhe can loue poore me, ſhall I thinke ſcorne to loue ſuch a woman as Zelmane? Away then all vaine examinations of why and how. Thou loueſt me, excellent Zelmane, and I loue thee: and with that, embracing the very ground whereon ſhe lay, ſhe ſayd to her ſelfe (for euen to her ſelfe ſhe was aſhamed to ſpeake it out in words) ô my Zelmane, gouerne and direct me: for I am wholly giuen ouer vnto thee.

In this depth of muzes, and diuerſe ſorts of diſcourſes, would ſhe rauingly haue remained, but that Dametas and Miſo (who were round about to ſeeke her, vnderſtanding ſhe was to come to their lodge that night) came hard by her; Dametas ſaying, that he would not deale in other bodies matters; but for his part, he did not like, that maides ſhould once ſtirre out of their fathers houſes, but if it were to milke a cow, or ſaue a chicken from a kites foot, or ſome ſuch other matter of importance. And Miſo ſwearing that if it were her daughter Mopſa, ſhe would giue her a leſſon for walking ſo late, that ſhould make her keepe within doores for one fortnight. But their iangling made Philoclea riſe, and pretending as though ſhe had done it but to ſport with them, went with thē (after ſhe had willed Miſo to waite vpon her mother) to the lodge; where (being now accuſtomed by her parents diſcipline, as well as her ſiſter, to ſerue herſelfe) ſhe went alone vp to Pamelas chamber: where meaning to delight her eyes, and ioy her thoughts with the ſweete conuerſation of her beloued ſiſter, ſhe found her (though it were in the time that the wings of night doth blow ſleepe moſt willingly into mortall creatures) ſitting in a chaire, lying backeward, with her head almoſt ouer the backe of it, and looking vpon a waxe-candle which burnt before her; in one hand holding a letter, in the other her hand-kerchiefe, which had lately drunke vp the teares of her eyes, leauing in ſteede of them, crimſen circles, like redde flakes in the element, when the weather is hotteſt. Which Philoclea finding (for her eyes had learned to know the badges of ſorrow) ſhe earneſtlie intreated to know the cauſe thereof, that either ſhe might comfort, or accompanie her dolefull humor. But Pamela, rather ſeeming ſorie that ſhe had perceiued ſo much, then willing to open any further, O my Pamela (ſayd Philoclea) who are to me a ſiſter in nature, a mother in counſell, a Princeſſe by the law of our countrey, and which name (me thinke) of all other is the deareſt, a friend by my choice and your fauour, what meanes this baniſhing me from your counſels? Doe you loue your ſorrow ſo well, as to grudge me part of it? Or doe you thinke I ſhall not loue a ſad Pamela, ſo well as a ioyfull? or be my eares vnworthie, or my tongue ſuſpected? What is it (my ſiſter) that you ſhould conceale from your ſiſter, yea and ſeruant Philoclea? Theſe words wanne no further of Pamela, but that telling her they might talke better as they lay together, they impoueriſhed their clothes to enrich their bed, which for that night might well ſcorne the ſhrine of Venus: and there cheriſhing one another with deare, though chaſte embracements; with ſweete, though cold kiſſes; it might ſeeme that loue was come to play him there without darte; or that weary of his owne fires, he was there to refreſh himſelfe between their ſweete-breathing lippes. But Philoclea earneſtly againe intreated Pamela to open her griefe; who (drawing the curtaine, that the candle might not complaine of her bluſhing) was ready to ſpeake: but the breath almoſt formed into words, was againe ſtopt by her, and turned into ſighes. But at laſt, I pray you (ſayd ſhee) ſweete Philoclea, let vs talke of ſome other thing: and tell me whether you did euer ſee any thing ſo amended as our Paſtorall ſports bee, ſince that Dorus came hither? O loue, how farre thou ſeeſt with blind eyes? Philoclea had ſtraight found her, and therefore to draw out more, Indeede (sayd she) I haue often wondred to my selfe how such excellencies I could be in so meane a person; but be like fortune was afraide to lay her treasures, where they should be stained with so many perfections: onely I maruaile how he can frame himselfe to hide so rare gifts vnder such a blocke as Dametas. Ah (sayd Pamela) if you knew the cause: but no more doe I neither; and to say the trueth: but Lord, how are we falne to talke of this fellow? and yet indeede if you were sometimes with me to marke him, while Dametas reades his rusticke lecture vnto him (how to feede his beastes before noone, where to shade them in the extreame heate, how to make the manger handsome for his oxen, when to vse the goade, and when the voice: giuing him rules of a heardman, though hee pretend to make him a shepheard) to see all the while with what a grace (which seemes to set a crowne vpon his base estate) he can descend to those poore matters, certainly you would: but to what serues this? no doubt we were better sleepe then talke of these idle matters. Ah my Pamela (sayd Philoclea) I haue caught you, the constancy of your wit was not wont to bring foorth such disiointed speeches: you loue, dissemble no further. It is true (sayd Pamela) now you haue it; and with lesse adoe should, if my hart could haue thought those words sutable for my mouth. But indeed (my Philoclea) take heede: for I thinke vertue it selfe is no armour of proofe against affection. Therefore learne by my example. Alas thought Philoclea to her selfe, your sheares come too late to clip the birds wings that already is flowne away. But then Pamela being once set in the streame of her loue, went away amaine withall, telling her how his noble qualities had drawne her liking towardes him; but yet euer waying his meanne esse, and so held continually in due limits; till seeking many meanes to speake with her, and euer kept from it (as well because she shund it, seeing and disdaining his mind, as because of her iealous iaylours) he had at length vsed the finest pollicie that might be in counterfaiting loue to Mopsa, and saying to Mopsa whatsoeuer hee would haue her know: and in how passionate manner he had told his owne tale in a third person, making poore Mopsa beleeue, that it was a matter fallen out many ages before. And in the end, because you shall know my teares come not, neither of repentance nor misery, who thinke you, is my Dorus fallen out to be? euen the Prince Musidorus, famous ouer all Asia, for his heroicall enterprises, of whom you remember how much good the straunger Plangus told my father; he not being drowned (as Plangus thought) though his cosin Pyrocles indeede perished. Ah my sister, if you had heard his words, or seene his gestures, when he made me know what, and to whom his loue was, you would haue matched in your selfe (those two rarely matched together) pitie and delight. Tell me deare sister (for the Gods are my witnesses I desire to do vertuously) can I without the detestable staine of vngratefulnesse abstaine from louing him, who (farre exceeding the beautifulnesse of his shape with the beautifulnesse of his mind, and the greatnesse of his estate with the greatnesse of his actes) is content so to abase himselfe, as to become Dametas seruant for my sake? you will say, but how know I him to be Musidorus, since the hand maid of wisedome is slow of beliefe? That consideration did not want in me: for the nature of desire it selfe is no easier to receiue beliefe, then it is hard to ground beliefe. For as desire is glad to embrace the first shew of comfort, so is desire desirous of perfect assurance: and that haue I had of him, not onely by necessary arguments to any of common sense, but by sufficient demonstrations. Lastly he would haue me send to Thessalia: but truly I am not as now in mind to do my honourable loue so much wrong, as so farre to suspect him:

yet poore ſoule knowes he no other, but that I do both ſuſpect, neglect, yea and deteſt him. For euery day he finds one way or other to ſet forth himſelfe vnto me, but all are rewarded with like coldneſſe of acceptation.

A few dayes ſince, he and Dametas had furniſhed themſelues very richly to run at the ring before me. O how mad a ſight it was to ſee Dametas, like rich Tiſſew furd with lambe-skins? But ô how well it did with Dorus, to ſee with what a grace hee preſented himſelfe before me on horſebacke, making maieſtie wait vpon humbleneſſe? how at the firſt, ſtanding ſtill with his eyes bent vpon me, as though his motions were chained to my looke, he ſo ſtaid till I cauſed Mopſa bid him do ſomething vpon his horſe: which no ſooner ſayd, but (with a kinde rather of quicke geſture, then ſhew of violence) you might ſee him come towards me, beating the ground in ſo due time, as no dancer can obſerue better meaſure. If you remember the ſhip we ſaw once, when the ſea went hie vpon the coaſt of Argos; ſo went the beaſt. But he (as if Centaurlike he had bene one peece with the horſe) was no more moued then one is with the going of his owne leggs: and in effect ſo did he command him, as his owne limmes: for though he had both ſpurres and wand, they ſeemed rather markes of ſoueraignty, then inſtruments of puniſhment; his hand and legge (with moſt pleaſing grace) commanding without threatning, and rather remembring thē chaſtiſing, at leaſt if ſometimes he did, it was ſo ſtolne, as neither our eyes could diſcerne it, nor the horſe with any change did complaine of it: he euer going ſo iuſt with the horſe, either foorth right, or turning, that it ſeemed as he borrowed the horſes body, ſo he lent the horſe his mind: in the turning one might perceiue the bridle-hand ſomething gently ſtirre, but indeede ſo gently, as it did rather diſtill vertue, then vſe violence. Him ſelfe (which mee thinkes is ſtrange) ſhewing at one inſtant both ſteadineſſe and nimbleneſſe; ſome times making him turne cloſe to the ground, like a cat, when ſcratchingly ſhe wheeles about after a mouſe: ſometimes with a little more riſing before, now like a Rauen leaping from ridge to ridge, then like one of Dametas kiddes bound ouer the hillockes: and all ſo done, as neither the luſty kinde ſhewed any rough neſſe, nor the eaſier any idleneſſe: but ſtill like a well obeyed maiſter, whoſe becke is enough for a diſcipline, euer concluding each thing hee did with his face to me-wards, as if thence came not onely the beginning, but ending of his motions. The ſport was to ſee Dametas, how he was toſt from the ſaddle to the mane of the horſe, and thence to the ground, giuing his gay apparell almoſt as foule an outſide, as it had an inſide. But as before hee had euer ſayd, he wanted but horſe and apparell to be as braue a courtier as the beſt, ſo now bruſed with proofe, he proclaimed it a folly for a man of wiſedome, to put himſelfe vnder the tuition of a beaſt; ſo as Dorus was faine alone to take the Ring. Wherein truely at leaſt my womaniſh eyes could not diſcerne, but that taking his ſtaffe from his thigh, the deſcending it a little downe, the getting of it vp into the reſt, the letting of the pointe fall, and taking the Ring was but all one motion, at leaſt (if they were diuerſe motions) they did ſo ſtealinglie ſlippe one into another, as the latter parte was euer in hand, before the eye could diſcerne the former was ended. Indeede Dametas found fault that he ſhewed no more ſtrength in ſhaking of his ſtaffe: but to my conceite the fine cleanneſſe of bearing it was exceeding delightfull.

But how delightfull ſoeuer it was, my delight might well be in my ſoule, but it neuer went to looke out of the window to doe him any comfort. But how much more I found reaſon to like him, the more I ſet all the ſtrength of mind to ſuppreſſe it,or at leaſt to conceale it. Indeede I muſt confeſſe, that as ſome Phiſitions haue told me,that when one is cold outwardly,he is not inwardly;ſo truely the cold aſhes layd vpon my fire, did not take the nature of fire from it. Full often hath my breaſt ſwollen with keeping my ſighes impriſoned;ful often haue the teares I draue backe from mine eyes,turned backe to drowne my hart.But alas what did that helpe poore Dorus?whoſe eyes(being his diligent intelligencers)could carry vnto him no other newes,but diſcomfortable.I thinke no day paſt,but by ſome one inuention he wold appeare vnto me to teſtifie his loue.One time he daunced the Matachine daunce in armour(ô with what a gracefull dexterity!)I thinke to make me ſee, that he had bin brought vp in ſuch exerciſes: an other time he perſwaded his maiſter (to make my time ſeeme ſhorter) in maner of a Dialogue, to play Priamus while he playd Paris. Thinke(ſweete Philoclea)what a Priamus we had:but truly,my Paris was a Paris,and more then a Paris: who while in a ſauage apparell,with naked necke,armes,& legs, he made loue to Oenone,you might well ſee by his chaunged countenance,and true teares, that he felt the part he playd. Tell me (ſweete Philoclea) did you euer ſee ſuch a ſhepheard? tell mee, did you euer heare of ſuch a Prince? And then tell me, if a ſmall or vnworthy aſſault haue conquered mee. Truely I would hate my life, if I thought vanity led me. But ſince my parents deale ſo cruelly with mee, it is time for me to truſt ſomething to my owne iudgement. Yet hitherto haue my lookes beene as I told you,which continuing after many of theſe his fruitleſſe trials, haue wrought ſuch change in him, as I tell you true (with that word ſhe layd her hand vpon her quaking ſide) I do not a little feare him.See what a letter this is(then drew ſhe the curtaine,and tooke the letter from vnder the pillow)which to day(with an afflicted humbleneſſe) he deliuered me, pretending before Mopſa,that I ſhould reade it vnto her,to mollifie(forſooth)her iron ſtomacke; with that ſhe read the letter containing thus much.

MOſt bleſſed paper,which ſhalt kiſſe that hand,where to all bleſſednes is in nature a ſeruant, do not yet diſdaine to cary with thee the wofull words of a miſer now deſpairing: neither be afraide to appeare before her,bearing the baſe title of the ſender. For no ſooner ſhall that diuine hand touch thee, but that thy baſeneſſe ſhall bee turned to moſt high preferment. Therefore mourne boldly my inke; for while ſhe lookes vpon you, your blackeneſſe will ſhine: cry out boldly my lamentation;for while ſhe reades you,your cries will be muſicke. Say then(ô happie meſſenger of a moſt vnhappy meſſage) that the too ſoone borne, and too late dying creature, which dares not ſpeake, no not looke, no not ſcarcely thinke (as from his miſerable ſelfe, vnto her heauenly highneſſe) onely preſumes to deſire thee (in the time that her eyes and voyce do exalt thee) to ſay, and in this manner to ſay, not from him, ô no, that were not fitte, but of him, thus much vnto her ſacred iudgement: O you, the onely honour to women,to men the onely admiration, you that being armed by loue, defie him that armed you, in this high eſtate wherein you haue placed mee, yet let me remember him to whom I am bound for bringing me to your preſence; and let me remember him, who (ſince he is yours, how meane ſo euer he be) it is reaſon you haue an account of him. The wretch(yet your wretch) though with languiſhing ſteppes runnes faſt to his graue, and will you ſuffer a temple (how poorely built ſoeuer,but yet a temple of your deitie) to be raſed? But he dieth: it is moſt true,he dieth;and he in whom you liue,to obey you,dieth. Whereof though he plaine, he doth not complaine: for it is a harme,but no wrong,which he hath receiued. He dies, becauſe in wofull language all his ſenſes tell him, that ſuch is your pleaſure: for ſince you will not that he liue, alas, alas, what followeth, what followeth of the moſt ruined Dorus, but his end? End then, euill deſtinied Dorus, end; and end thou wofull letter, end; for it ſufficeth her wiſdom to know, that her heauenly will ſhall be accompliſhed.

O my Philoclea, is he a perſon to write theſe words? and are theſe words lightly to be regarded? But if you had ſeene, when with trembling hand he had deliuered it, how he went away, as if he had beene but the coffin that carried himſelfe to his ſepulcher. Two times (I muſt confeſſe) I was about to take curteſie into mine eyes; but both times the former reſolution ſtopt the entrie of it: ſo that he departed without obtaining any further kindneſſe. But he was no ſooner out of the dore, but that I looked to the dore kindly; and truely the feare of him euer ſince hath put me into ſuch perplexity, as now you found me. Ah my Pamela (ſayd Philoclea) leaue ſorrow. The riuer of your teares will ſoone looſe his fountaine; it is in your hand as well to ſtitch vp his life againe, as it was before to rent it. And ſo (though with ſelfe-grieued mind) ſhe comforted her ſiſter, till ſleepe came to bath himſelfe in Pamelaes faire weeping eyes.

Which when Philoclea found, wringing her hands, O me (ſayd ſhe) indeede the onely ſubiect of the deſtinies diſpleaſure, whoſe greateſt fortunateneſſe is more vnfortunate, then my ſiſters greateſt vnfortunateneſſe. Alas ſhe weepes becauſe ſhee would be no ſooner happy; I weepe, becauſe I can neuer be happie; her teares flow from pitty; mine from being too farre lower then the reach of pitty. Yet do I not enuy thee, deare Pamela, I do not enuy thee, onely I could wiſh that being thy ſiſter in nature, I were not ſo farre off a kin in fortune.

But the darkeneſſe of ſorrow ouer-ſhadowing her mind, as the night did her eyes, they were both content to hide themſelues vnder the wings of ſleepe, till the next morninghad almoſt loſt his name, before the two ſweete ſleeping ſiſters awaked from dreames, which flattered them with more comfort, then their waking could, or would conſent vnto. For then they were called vp by Miſo; who hauing bene with Gynecia, had receiued commandement to be continually with her daughters, and particularly not to let Zelmane, and Philoclea haue any priuate conference, but that ſhe ſhould be preſent to heare what paſſed. Miſo hauing now her authority increaſed, but came with skowling eyes to deliuer a ſlauering good morrow to the two Ladies, telling them, it was a ſhame for them to marre their complexions, yea and conditions too, with long lying a bed: and that, when ſhe was of their age, ſhe trowed, ſhe would haue made a hand-kerchiefe by that time a day. The two ſweete Princes with a ſmiling ſilence anſwered her entertainement, and obeying her direction, couered their dainty beauties with the glad clothes. But as ſoone as Pamela was ready (and ſooner ſhe was then her ſiſter) the agony of Dorus giuing a fit to her ſelfe, which the words of his letter (liuely imprinted in her mind) ſtill remembred her of, ſhe called to Mopſa, and willed her to fetch Dorus to ſpeake with her: becauſe (ſhe ſayd) ſhe would take further iudgement of him, before ſhe would moue Dametas to graunt her in mariage vnto him, Mopſa (as glad as of ſweet-meate to goe of ſuch an arrant) quickly returned with Dorus to Pamela, who entended both by ſpeaking with him to giue ſome comfort to his paſſionate heart, and withall to heare ſome part of his life paſt; which although fame had already deliuered vnto her, yet ſhe deſired in more particular certainties to haue it from ſo beloued an hiſtorian. Yet the ſweetneſſe of vertues diſpoſition, iealous, euen ouer it selfe, suffered her not to enter abruptlie into questions of Musidorus (whom shee was halfe ashamed she did loue so well, and more then halfe sory she could loue no better) but thought best first to make her talke arise of Pyrocles, and his vertuous father: which thus she did.

Dorus (sayd she) you told me the last day, that Plangus was deceiued in that he affirmed the Prince Musidorus was drowned: but withall, you confessed his cosin Pyrocles perished; of whom certainly in that age there was a great losse, since (as I haue heard) he was a young Prince, of whom all men expected as much, as mans power could bring forth, and yet vertue promised for him, their expectation should not bee deceiued. Most excellent Lady (sayd Dorus) no expectation in others, nor hope in himselfe could aspire to a higher marke, then to be thought worthy to be praised by your iudgement, and made worthy to be praised by your mouth. But most sure it is, that as his fame could by no meanes get so sweet & noble an aire to flie in, as in your breath, so could not you (leauing your selfe aside) finde in the world a fitter subiect of commendation; as noble, as a long succession of royall ancestors, famous, and famous for victories could make him: of shape most louely, and yet of mind more louely; valiant, curteous, wise, what should I say more? sweete Pyrocles, excellent Pyrocles, what can my words but wrong thy perfections, which I wold to God in some small measure thou hadst bequeathed to him that euer must haue thy vertues in admiration; that masked at least in them, I might haue found some more gracious acceptation? with that he imprisoned his looke for a while vpon Mopsa, who thereupon fell into a very wide smiling. Truely (sayd Pamela) Dorus I like well your mind, that can raise it selfe out of so base a fortune, as yours is, to thinke of the imitating so excellent a Prince, as Pyrocles was. Who shootes at the midday Sunne, though he be sure he shall neuer hit the marke; yet as sure he is, he shall shoote higher, then who aimes but at a bush. But I pray you Dorus (sayd she) tell me (since I perceiue you are well acquainted with that story) what Prince was that Euarchus father to Pyrocles of whom so much fame goes, for his rightly royall vertues, or by what waies hee got that opinion. And then so descend to the causes of his sending first away from him, and then to him for that excellent sonne of his, with the discourse of his life and losse: and therein you may (if you list) say something of that same Musidorus his cosin, because, they going together, the story of Pyrocles (which I only desire) may be the better vnderstood.

Incomparable Lady (sayd he) your commandement doth not only giue me the will, but the power to obey you, such influence hath your excellency. And first, for that famous king Euarchus, he was (at this time you speake of) king of Macedon, a kingdom, which in elder time had such a soueraintie ouer all the prouinces of Greece, that euen the particular kings therein did acknowledge (with more or lesse degrees of homage) some kind of fealty thereunto: as among the rest, euen this now most noble (and by you ennobled) kingdome of Arcadia. But he, when he came to his crown, finding by his latter ancestors either negligence, or misfortune, that in some ages many of those dueties had beene intermitted, would neuer stirre vp old titles (how apparant soeuer) whereby the publike peace (with the losse of many not guiltie soules) should be broken; but contenting himselfe to guide that shippe, wherein the heauens had placed him, shewed no lesse magnanimity in daungerlesse despising, then others in daungerous affecting the multiplying of kingdomes: for the earth hath since borne enow bleeding witnesses, that it was no want of true courage. Who as he was most wise to see what was best, and most iust in the performing

what he saw, & temperate in abstaining from any thing any way contrarie: so think I, no thought can imagine a greater heart to see and contemne danger, where danger would offer to make anie wrongfull threatning vpon him. A Prince, that indeed especiallie measured his greatnesse by his goodnesse: & if for any thing he loued greatnesse, it was, because therein he might exercise his goodnesse. A Prince of a goodly aspect, and the more goodly by a graue maiestie, wherewith his minde did decke his outward graces; strong of bodie, and so much the stronger, as he by a well disciplined exercise taught it both to do & suffer. Of age so as he was about fifty yeares when his Nephew Musidorus tooke on such shepheardish apparell for the loue of the worlds paragon, as I now weare.

This King left Orphan both of father & mother, (whose father and grandfather likewise had died yong) he found his estate, when he came to the age (which allowed his authoritie) so disioynted euen in the noblest & strongest lims of gouernment, that the name of a King was growne euen odious to the people, his authoritie hauing bin abused by those great Lords, and litle kings: who in those betweene times of raigning (by vniust fauouring those that were partially theirs, and oppressing them that would defend their libertie against them had brought in (by a more felt then seen maner of proceeding) the worst kind of Oligarchie; that is, when men are gouerned in deede by a few, and yet are not taught to know what those fewe be, to whom they should obey.

For they hauing the power of kings, but not the nature of kings, vsed the authoritie as men do their farmes, of which they see within a yeare they shal go out: making the Kings sword strike whom they hated, the Kings purse reward whome they loued: and (which is worst of all) making the Royall countenance serue to vndermine the royal soueraintie. For the Subiects could taste no sweeter fruits of hauing a king, then grieuous taxations to serue vaine purposes; Lawes made rather to finde faultes, then to preuent faults: the Court of a Prince rather deemed as a priuiledged place of vnbridled licentiousnesse, then as the abyding of him, who as a father, should giue a fatherly example vnto his people. Hence grew a verie dissolution of all estates, while the great men (by the nature of ambition neuer satisfied) grew factious among themselues: and the vnderlings, glad in deede to be vnderlings to them they hated least, to preserue them from such they hated most. Men of vertue suppressed, least their shining should discouer the others filthinesse; and at length vertue it selfe almost forgotten, when it had no hopefull end wherunto to be directed; old men long nusled in corruption, scorning them that would seeke reformation; yong men verie fault-finding, but verie faultie: and so to newfangleneſſe both of manners, apparell, and each thing els, by the custome of selfe-guiltie euill, glad to change though oft for a worse; marchandise abused, and so townes decaied for want of iust and naturall libertie; offices, euen of iudging soules, solde; publike defences neglected; and in summe, (lest too long I trouble you) all awrie, & (which wried it to the most wrie course of all) witte abused, rather to faine reason why it should be amisse, then how it should be amended.

In this, and a much worse plight then it is fit to trouble your excellent eares withall, did the king Euarchus find his estate, when he tooke vpon him the regiment: which by reason of the long streame of abuse, he was forced to establish by some euen extreme seueritie, not so much for the verie faults themselues, (which he rather sought to preuent then to punish) as for the faultie ones, who strong, euen in their faults, scorned his youth, and could not learne to disgest, that the man which they ſo long had vſed to maske their owne appetites, ſhould now be the reducer of them into order. But ſo ſoone as ſome fewe (but in deede notable) examples, had thundered a duetie into the ſubiects hearts, he ſoone ſhewed, no baſeneſſe of ſuſpition, nor the baſeſt baſeneſſe of enuy, could any whit rule ſuch a Ruler. But then ſhined foorth in deede all loue among them, when an awfull feare, ingendred by iuſtice, did make that loue moſt louely: his firſt and principall care being to appeare vnto his people, ſuch as he would haue them be, and to be ſuch as he appeared; making his life the example of his lawes, and his lawes as it were, his axioms ariſing out of his deedes. So that within ſmall time, he wanne a ſingular loue in his people, and engraffed ſingular confidence. For how could they chooſe but loue him, whom they found ſo truely to loue them? He euen in reaſon diſdaining, that they that haue charge of beaſtes, ſhould loue their charge, and care for them; and that he that was to gouerne the moſt excellent creature, ſhould not loue ſo noble a charge. And therefore, where moſt Princes (ſeduced by flatterie to build vpon falſe grounds of gouernment) make themſelues (as it were) another thing from the people; and ſo count it gaine what they get from them: and (as if it were two counter-ballances, that their eſtate goes hieſt when the people goes loweſt) by a fallacie of argument thinking themſelues moſt Kings, when the ſubiect is moſt baſely ſubiected: He contrariwiſe, vertuouſly and wiſely acknowledging, that he with his people made all but one politike bodie, whereof himſelfe was the head; euen ſo cared for them, as he would for his owne limmes: neuer reſtraining their libertie, without it ſtretched to licentiouſneſſe, nor pulling from them their goods, which they found were not imployed to the purchaſe of a greater good: but in all his actions ſhewing a delight in their welfare, brought that to paſſe, that while by force he tooke nothing, by their loue he had all. In ſumme (peereleſſe Princeſſe) I might as eaſily ſet down the whole Arte of gouernement, as to laie before your eyes the picture of his proceedings. But in ſuch ſort he flouriſhed in the ſweete comfort of doing much good, when by an occaſion of leauing his countrey, he was forced to bring foorth his vertue of magnanimitie, as before he had done of iuſtice.

He had onely one ſiſter, a Ladie (leſt I ſhould too eaſilie fall to partiall praiſes of her) of whom it may be iuſtly ſaid, that ſhe was no vnfit branch to the noble ſtocke whereof ſhe was come. Her he had giuen in mariage to Dorilaus Prince of Theſſalia, not ſo much to make a friendſhip, as to confirme the friendſhip betweene their poſteritie, which betweene them, by the likeneſſe of vertue, had beene long before made: for certainly, Dorilaus, could need no amplifiers mouth for the higheſt point of praiſe. Who hath not heard (ſaid Pamela) of the valiant, wiſe, and iuſt Dorilaus, whoſe vnripe death doth yet (ſo many yeares ſince) draw teares from vertuous eyes? And in deede, my father is wont to ſpeake of nothing with greater admiration, then of the notable friendſhip (a rare thing in Princes, more rare betweene Princes (that ſo holily was obſerued to the laſt of thoſe two excellent men. But (ſaid ſhe) go on I pray you. Dorilaus (ſaid he) hauing married his ſiſter, had his marriage in ſhort time bleſt (for ſo are folke wont to ſaie, how vnhappie ſoeuer the children after grow) with a ſonne, whom they named Muſidorus: of whome I muſt needes firſt ſpeake before I come to Pyrocles; becauſe as he was borne firſt, ſo vpon his occaſion grewe (as I may ſaie accidentally) the others birth. For ſcarcely was Muſidorus made partaker of this oft-blinding light, when there were found numbers of Southſayers, who affirmed ſtrange & incredible things ſhould be performed by that child; whether the heauens at that time liſted to play with ignorant mankind, or that flatterie be so presumptuous, as euen at times to borrow the face of Diuinitie. But certainly, so did the boldnesse of their affirmation accompanie the greatnesse of what they did affirme (euen descending to particularities, what kingdoms he shold ouercome) that the king of Phrygia (who ouer-superstitiously thought himselfe touched in the matter) sought by force to destroy the infant, to preuent his after-expectations: because a skilful man (hauing compared his natiuity with the child) so told him. Foolish man, either vainly fearing what was not to be feared, or not considering that if it were a worke of the superiour powers, the heauens at length are neuer children. But so he did, and by the aid of the Kings of Lydia and Crete (ioining together their armies) inuaded Thessalia, and brought Dorilaus to some behind-hand of fortune, when his faithfull friend and brother Euarchus came so mightily to his succour, that with some enterchanging changes of fortune, they begat of a iust war, the best child, peace. In which time Euarchus made a crosse mariage also with Dorilaus his sister, aud shortly left her with child of the famous Pyrocles, driuen to returne to the defence of his owne countrie, which in his absence (helped with some of the ill contented nobilitie) the mighty King of Thrace, and his brother, King of Pannonia, had inuaded. The successe of those warres was too notable to be vnknowne to your eares, to which it seemes all worthie fame hath glorie to come vnto. But there was Dorilaus (valiantly requiting his friends helpe) in a great battaile depriued of life, his obsequies being no more solemnized by the teares of his partakers, then the bloud of his enimies; with so piercing a sorrow to the constant heart of Euarchus, that the newes of his sonnes birth could lighten his countenance with no shew of comfort, although all the comfort that might be in a child, truth it self in him forthwith deliuered. For what fortune onely southsayers foretold of Musidorus, that all men might see prognosticated in Pyrocles, both Heauens & Earth giuing tokens of the comming forth of an Heroicall vertue. The senate house of the planets was at no time so set, for the decreeing of perfection in a man, as at that time all folkes skilfull therein did acknowledge: only loue was threatned, & promised to him, & so to his cousin, as both the tempest & hauen of their best yeares. But as death may haue preuented Pyrocles, so vnworthinesse must be the death of Musidorus.

But the mother of Pyrocles (shortly after her child birth) dying, was cause that Euarchus recommended the care of his onely sonne to his sister; doing it the rather because the warre continued in cruell heat, betwixt him and those euill neighbours of his. In which meane time those young Princes (the onely comforters of that vertuous widow) grewe on so, that Pyrocles taught admiration to the hardest conceits: Musidorus (perchaunce because among his subiects) exceedingly beloued: and by the good order of Euarchus (well performed by his sister) they were so brought vp, that all the sparkes of vertue, which nature had kindled in them, were so blowne to giue forth their vttermost heat, that iustly it may be affirmed, they enflamed the affections of all that knew them. For almost before they could perfectly speake, they began to receiue conceits not vnworthie of the best speakers: excellent deuises being vsed, to make euen their sports profitable; images of battailes, and fortificatiõs being then deliuered to their memorie, which after, their stronger iudgemẽts might dispence, the delight of tales being conuerted to the knowledge of all the stories of worthie Princes, both to moue them to do nobly, and teach them how to do nobly; the beautie of vertue still being set before their eyes, and that taught them with far more diligent care, then Grammaticall rules, their bodies exercised in all abilities, both of doing and suffering, and their minds acquainted by degrees with daungers, and in ſumme, all bent to the making vp of princely mindes: no ſeruile feare vſed towards them, nor any other violent reſtraint, but ſtill as to Princes: ſo that a habite of commaunding was naturalized in them, & therefore the farther from Tyrannie: Nature hauing done ſo much for them in nothing, as that it made them Lords of truth, whereon all the other goods were builded.

Among which nothing I ſo much delight to recount, as the memorable friendſhip that grew betwixt the two Princes, ſuch as made them more like then the likeneſſe of all other vertues, and made them more neere one to the other, then the neerenes of their bloud could aſpire vnto; which I thinke grew the faſter, and the faſter was tied betweene them, by reaſon that Muſidorus being elder by three or foure yeares, it was neither ſo great a difference in age as did take away the delight in ſocietie, and yet by the difference there was taken away the occaſion of childiſh contentions; till they had both paſt ouer the humour of ſuch contentions. For Pyrocles bare reuerence full of loue to Muſidorus, and Muſidorus had a delight full of loue in Pyrocles. Muſidorus, what he had learned either for bodie or minde, would teach it to Pyrocles; and Pyrocles was ſo glad to learne of none, as of Muſidorus: till Pyrocles, being come to ſixteene yeares of age, he ſeemed ſo to ouerrun his age in growth, ſtrength, and all things following it, that not Muſidorus, no nor any man liuing (I thinke) could peforme any action, either on horſe, or foote, more ſtrongly, or deliuer that ſtrength more nimbly, or become the deliuerie more gracefully, or imploy all more vertuouſly. Which may well ſeeme wonderfull: but wonders are no wonders in a wonderfull ſubiect.

At which time, vnderſtanding that the King Euarchus, after ſo many yeares warre, and the conqueſt of all Pannonia, and almoſt Thrace, had now brought the concluſion of all to the ſiege of Bizantium (to the raiſing of which ſiege great forces were made) they would needes fall to the practiſe of thoſe vertues, which they before learned. And therefore the mother of Muſidorus nobly yeelding ouer her owne affects to her childrens good (for a mother ſhee was in effect to them both) the rather that they might helpe her beloued brother, they brake off all delayes; which Muſidorus for his part thought alreadie had deuoured too much of his good time, but that he had once graunted a boone (before he knew what it was) to his deere friend Pyrocles; that he would neuer ſeeke the aduentures of armes, vntill he might go with him: which hauing faſt bound his hart (a true ſlaue to faith) he had bid a tedious delay of following his owne humour for his friends ſake, till now being both ſent for by Euarchus, and finding Pyrocles able euery way to go thorow with that kinde of life, he was as deſirous for his ſake, as for his owne, to enter into it. So therefore preparing a nauie, that they might go like themſelues, and not only bring the comfort of their preſence, but of their power to their deere parent Euarchus, they recommended themſelues to the Sea, leauing the ſhore of Theſſalia full of teares and vowes; and were receiued thereon with ſo ſmooth and ſmiling a face, as if Neptune had as then learned falſely to fawne on Princes. The winde was like a ſeruant, wayting behind them ſo iuſt, that they might fill the ſailes as they liſted; and the beſt ſaylers ſhewing themſelues leſſe couetous of his liberalitie, ſo tempered it, that they all kept together like a beautifull flocke, which ſo well could obey their maiſters pipe: without ſometimes, to delight the Princes eyes, ſome two or three of them would ſtriue, who could) either by the cunning of well ſpending the windes breath, or by the aduantageous building of their mouing houſes) leaue their fellowes behind them in the honour of ſpeede: while the two Princes had leaſure

to see the practise of that, which before they had learned by bookes: to consider the art of catching the winde prisoner, to no other end, but to runne away with it; to see how beautie, and vse can so well agree together, that of all the trinckets, where-with they are attired, there is not one but serues to some necessarie purpose. And (ô Lord) to see the admirable power and noble effects of Loue, whereby the seeming insensible Loadstone, with a secret beautie (holding the spirit of iron in it) can draw that hardharted thing vnto it, and (like a vertuous mistresse) not onely make it bow it selfe, but with it make it aspire to so high a Loue, as of the heauenly Poles; and thereby to bring forth the noblest deedes, that the children of the Earth can boast of. And so the Princes delighting their conceits with confirming their knowledge, seeing wherein the Sea-discipline differed from Land-seruice, they had for a day and almost a whole night, as pleasing entertainment, as the falsest hart could giue to him he meanes worst to.

But by that the next morning began a little to make a guilden shewe of a good meaning, there arose euen with the Sunne, a vaile of darke cloudes before his face, which shortly (like inke powred into water) had blacked ouer all the face of heauen; preparing (as it were) a mournfull stage for a Tragedie to be played on. For foorthwith the windes began to speake lowder, and as in a tumultuous kingdom, to think themselues fittest instruments of commaundement; and blowing whole stormes of haile and raine vpon them, they were sooner in daunger, then they could almost bethinke themselues of change. For then the traiterous Sea began to swell in pride against the afflicted Nauie, vnder which (while the heauen fauoured them) it had layne so calmely, making mountaines of it selfe, ouer which the tossed and tottring ship should clime, to be streight carried downe againe to a pit of hellish darknesse; with such cruell blowes against the sides of the ship (that which way so euer it went, was still in his malice) that there was left neither power to stay, nor way to escape. And shortly had it so disseuered the louing companie, which the day before had tarried together, that most of them neuer met againe, but were swallowed vp in his neuer-satisfied mouth. Some in deede (as since was knowne) after long wandring returned into Thessalia; other recouered Bizantium, and serued Euarchus in his warre. But in the ship wherein the Princes were (now left as much alone as proud Lords be when fortune failes them) though they employed all industrie to saue themselues, yet what they did, was rather for duetie to nature, then hope to escape. So ougly a darknesse, as if it would preuent the nights comming, vsurped the dayes right: which accompanied sometimes with thunders, alwayes with horrible noyses of the chafing windes) made the masters and pilots so astonished, that they knew not how to direct, and if they knew, they could scarcely (when they directed) heare their owne whistle. For the sea straue with the windes which should be lowder, and the shrouds of the ship with a ghastfull noise to them that were in it, witnessed, that their ruine was the wager of the others contention, and the heauen roaring out thunders the more amazed them, as hauing those powers for enimies. Certainly there is no daunger carries with it more horror, then that which growes in those floting kingdomes. For that dwelling place is vnnaturall to mankind, and then the terriblenesse of the continual motion, the desolation of the far-being from comfort, the eye and the eare hauing ougly images euer before it, doth still vexe the mind, euen when it is best armed against it. But thus the day past (if that might be called a day) while the cunningest mariners were so conquered by the storme, as they thought it best with striken sailes to yeeld to be gouerned by it: the valianteſt feeling inward disinayednesse, and yet the fearfullest ashamed fully to shew it, seeing that the Princes (who were to part from the greatest fortunes) did in their countenances accuse no point of feare, but encouraging them to do what might be done (putting their hands to euerie most painfull office) taught them at one instant to promise themselues the best, and yet to despise the worst. But so were they carried by the tyrannie of the winde, and the treason of the Sea, all that night, which the elder it was, the more wayward it shewed it selfe towards them: till the next morning (knowne to be a morning better by the houre-glasse, then by the day cleerenesse) hauing runne fortune as blindly, as it selfe euer was painted, lest the conclusion should not aunswere to the rest of the play, they were driuen vpon a rocke: which hidden with those outragious waues, did, as it were, closely dissemble his cruell minde, till with an vnbeleeued violence (but to them that haue tried it) the ship ranne vpon it; and seeming willinger to perish then to haue her course stayed, redoubled her blowes, till shee had broken her selfe in peeces; and as it were tearing out her owne bowels to feede the seas greedinesse, left nothing within it, but despaire of safetie, and expectation of a lothsome end. There was to be seene the diuerse maner of mindes in distresse: some sate vpon the top of the poupe weeping and wailing, till the sea swallowed them; some one more able to abide death, then feare of death, cut his owne throate to preuent drowning; some prayed, and there wanted not of them which cursed, as if the heauens could not be more angrie then they were. But a monstrous crie begotten of manie roaring voices, was able to infect with feare a minde that had not preuented it with the power of reason.

But the Princes vsing the passions of fearing euill, and desiring to escape, onely to serue the rule of vertue, not to abandō ones self, lept to a ribbe of the ship, which broken from his fellowes, floted with more likelyhood to do seruice, then any other limme of that ruinous bodie; vpon which there had gotten alreadie two brethren, well knowne seruaunts of theirs; and streight they foure were caried out of sight, in that huge rising of the sea, from the rest of the ship. But the peece they were on sinking by little and little vnder them, not able to support the weight of so manie, the brethren (the elder whereof was Leucippus, the yonger Nelsus) shewed themselues right faithfull and gratefull seruaunts vnto them; gratefull (I saie) for this cause: Those two gentlemen had bene taken prisoners in the great warre the king of Thrygia made vpon Thessalia, in the time of Musidorus his infancie; and hauing beene sold into another countrie (though peace fell after betweene these Realmes) could not be deliuered, because of their valour knowne, but for a farre greater summe, then either all their friends were able, or the Dowager willing to make, in respect of the great expences her selfe and people had beene put to in those warres; and so had they remained in prison about thirteene yeares, when the two young Princes (hearing speaches of their good deserts) found meanes both by selling all the Iewels they had of great price, and by giuing vnder their handes great estates when they should come to be Kings (which promises their vertue promised for them should be kept) to get so much treasure as redeemed them from captiuitie. This remembred, and kindly remembred by these two brothers, perchance helped by a naturall duetie to their Princes blood, they willingly left holde of the boord, committing themselues to the seas rage, and euen when they meant to die, themselues praying for the Princes liues. It is true, that neither the paine nor daunger, so moued the Princes hearts as the tendernesse of that louing part, farre

from glorie, hauing ſo few lookers on; far from hope of reward, ſince themſelues were ſure to periſh.

But now of all the royall Nauie they lately had, they had left but one litle peece of one ſhip, whereon they kept themſelues in all truth, hauing enterchanged their cares, while either cared for other, each comforting and counſelling how to labour for the better, and to abide the worſe. But ſo fell it out, that as they were caried by the tide (which there ſeconded by the ſtorme ran exceeding ſwiftly) Muſidorus ſeeing (as he thought) Pyrocles not well vpon the boord, as he would with his right hand haue helped him on better, he had no ſooner vnfaſtened his holde, but that a waue forciblie ſpoiled his weaker hand of hold, & ſo for a time parted thoſe friends, each crying to the other, but the noiſe of the ſea drowned their farewell. But Pyrocles (then careleſſe of death, if it had come by any means, but his owne) was ſhortlie brought out of the ſeas furie to the lands comfort, when (in my conſcience I know) that comfort was but bitter vnto him: and bitter indeed it fell out euen in it ſelfe to be vnto him.

For being caſt on land much bruiſed and beaten both with the ſeas hard farewel, and the ſhores rude welcome; and euen almoſt deadly tyred with the length of his vncomfortable labour, as he was walking vp to diſcouer ſome bodie, to whom he might go for reliefe, there came ſtraight running vnto him certaine, who (as it was after knowne) by appointment watched (with manie others) in diuerſe places along the coaſt: who laid hands of him, and without either queſtioning with him, or ſhewing will to heare him, (like men fearefull to appeare curious) or which was worſe, hauing no regard to the hard plight he was in (being ſo wet and weake) they caried him ſome miles thence, to a houſe of a principall officer of that countrie. Who with no more ciuilitie (though with much more buſineſſe then thoſe vnderfellowes had ſhewed) began in captious maner to put interrogatories vnto him. To which (he vnuſed to ſuch entertainment) did ſhortly and plainely anſwere, what he was, and how he came thither. But that no ſooner knowne, with numbers of armed men to guard him (for miſchiefe, not from miſchiefe) he was ſent to the kings Court, which as then was not aboue a dayes iourney off, with letters from that officer, containing his owne ſeruiceable diligence in diſcouering ſo great a perſonage, adding withall more then was true of his coniectures, becauſe he would endeare his owne ſeruice.

This countrie whereon he fell was Phrygia, and it was to the king thereof to whom he was ſent, a Prince of a melancholie conſtitution both of bodie & mind; wickedlie ſad, euer muſing of horrible matters; ſuſpecting, or rather condemning all men of euill, becauſe his mind had no eye to eſpie goodneſſe: and therefore accuſing Sycophantes of all men did beſt ſort to his nature; but therefore not ſeeming Sycophantes, becauſe of no euil they ſaid, they could bring any new or doubtfull thing vnto him, but ſuch as already he had bene apt to determine; ſo as they came but as proofes of his wiſedome: fearfull and neuer ſecure; while the feare he had figured in his mind had any poſſibilitie of euent. A tode-like retiredneſſe, and cloſeneſſe of mind; nature teaching the odiouſneſſe of poyſon, and the daunger of odiouſneſſe. Yet while youth laſted in him, the exerciſes of that age, and his humour (not yet fullie diſcouered) made him ſomething the more frequentable, and leſſe daungerous. But after that yeares began to come on with ſome, though more ſeldome ſhewes of a bloudie nature, and that the prophecie of Muſidorus deſtinie came to his eares (deliuered vnto him, and receiued of him with the hardeſt interpretation, as though his subiects did delight in the hearing thereof.) Then gaue he himselfe indeed to the full currant of his disposition, especiallie after the warre of Thessalia, wherein (though in truth wrongly) he deemed, his vnsucceſſe proceeded of their vnwillingneſſe to haue him prosper: and then thinking himselfe contemned, (knowing no countermine against contempt, but terrour) began to let nothing passe which might beare the colour of a fault, without sharp punishment: and when he wanted faults, excellencie grew a fault; and it was sufficient to make one guiltie, that he had power to be guiltie. And as there is no humour, to which impudent pouertie cannot make it selfe seruiceable, so were there enow of those of desperate ambition, who would build their houses vpon others ruines, which after should fall by like practises. So as seruitude came mainly vpon that poore people, whose deedes were not onely punished, but words corrected, and euen thoughts by some meane or other puld out of them: while suspition bred the mind of cruelty, and the effects of crueltie stirred a new cause of supition. And in this plight (full of watchfull fearefulneſſe) did the storme deliuer sweet Pyrocles to the stormy minde of that Tyrant, all men that did such wrong to so rare a straunger (whose countenance deserued both pitie and admiration) condemning themselues as much in their hearts, as they did brag in their forces.

But when this bloudy king knew what he was, and in what order he and his cosin Musidorus (so much of him feared) were come out of Thessalia, assuredly thinking (because euer thinking the worst) that those forces were prouided against him; glad of the perishing (as he thought of Musidorus, determined in publike sort to put Pyrocles to death. For hauing quite lost the way of nobleneſſe, he straue to clime to the height of terribleneſſe; and thinking to make all men adread, to make such one an enemie, who would not spare, nor feare to kill so great a Prince; and lastlie, hauing nothing in him why to make him his friend, he thought he would take him away from being his enemie. The day was appointed, and all things appointed for that cruell blow, in so solemne an order, as if they wold set forth tyranny in most gorgeous decking. The Princely youth of inuincible valour, yet so vniustly subiected to such outragious wrong, carying himselfe in all his demeanour so constantly abiding extremitie, that one might see it was the cutting away of the greatest hope of the world, and destroying vertue in his sweetest growth.

But so it fell out, that his death was preuented by a rare example of friendship in Musidorus: who being almost drowned, had bene taken vp by a Fisherman belonging to the kingdom of Pontus; & being there, & vnderstanding the ful discourse (as Fame was verie prodigall of so notable an accident) in what case Pyrocles was; learning withall, that his hate was farre more to him then to Pyrocles, he found means to acquaint himselfe with a noble man of that Countrie, to whom largely discouering what he was, he found him a most fit instrument to effectuate his desire. For this Nobleman had bene one, who in many warres had serued Euarchus, and had bin so mind-strikē by the beautie of vertue in that noble king, that (though not born his subiect) he euer profest himselfe his seruant. His disire therefore to him was, to keepe Musidorus in a strong Castle of his, and then to make the king of Phrigia vnderstand that if he would deliuer Pyrocles, Musidorus would willinglie put himself into his hands; knowing well, that how thirstie soeuer he was of Pyrocles bloud, he would rather drinke that of Musidorus.

The Nobleman was loth to preserue one by the losse of another, but time vrging resolution; the importunitie of Musidorus (who shewed a minde not to ouer-

ouerliue Pyrocles) with the affection he bare to Euarchus, ſo preuailed, that he caried this ſtrange offer of Muſidorus, which by that Tyrant was greedilie accepted.

And ſo vpon ſecuritie of both ſides, they were enterchanged. Where I may not omit the worke of friendſhip in Pyrocles, who both in ſpeech & countenãce to Muſidorus, well ſhewed, that he thought himſelfe iniured, and not relieued by him: aſking him, what he had euer ſeene in him, why he could not beare the extremities of mortall accidents as well as any man? and why he ſhould enuy him the glorie of ſuffering death for his friends cauſe, and (as it were) rob him of his owne poſſeſſion? But in this notable contention (where the conqueſt muſt be the conquerers deſtruction, and ſafety the punishment of the conquered) Muſidorus preuailed: becauſe he was a more welcome praye to the vniuſt king, and as chearefully going towards, as Pyrocles went frowardly frõward his death, he was deliuered to the king, who could not be enough ſure of him, without he fed his own eyes vpon one, whom he had begun to feare, aſſoone as the other began to be.

Yet becauſe hee would in one act, both make oſtentation of his owne felicitie (into whoſe hands his moſt feared enemy was fallen) and withall cut off ſuch hopes from his ſuſpected ſubiects (when they ſhould know certainlie he was dead) with much more skilfull crueltie, and horrible ſolemnitie hee cauſed each thing to be prepared for his triumph of tyrannie. And ſo the day being come, he was led forth by many armed men (who often had bene the fortifiers of wickedneſſe) to the place of execution: where comming with a mind comforted in that he had done ſuch ſeruice to Pyrocles, this ſtrange encounter he had.

The excelling Pyrocles was no ſooner deliuered by the kings ſeruants to a place of libertie, then he bent his wit and courage (and what would not they bring to paſſe?) how either to deliuer Muſidorus, or to periſh with him. And (finding he could get in that countrie no forces ſufficient by force to reſcue him) to bring himſelfe to die with him, (litle hoping of better euent) he put himſelfe in poore rayment, and by the helpe of ſome few crownes he tooke of that noble-man (who full of ſorow, though not knowing the ſecret of his intent, ſuffered him to go in ſuch order from him) he (euen he, borne to the greateſt expectation, and of the greateſt bloud that any Prince might be) ſubmitted himſelfe to be ſeruant to the executioner that ſhould put to death Muſidorus: a farre notabler proofe of his friendſhip, conſidering the height of his mind, then any death could be. That bad officer not ſuſpecting him, being arayed fit for ſuch an eſtate, and hauing his beautie hidden by many foule ſpots he artificiallie put vpon his face, gaue him leaue not onely to weare a ſword himſelfe, but to beare his ſword prepared for the iuſtified murther. And ſo Pyrocles taking his time, when Muſidorus was vpon the ſcaffold (ſeparated ſomewhat from the reſt as allowed to ſay ſomething) he ſtept vnto him, and putting the ſword into his hand not bound (a point of ciuility the officers vſed towards him, becauſe they doubted no ſuch enterpriſe) Muſidorus, ſaid he, die noblie. In truth, neuer man betweene ioy before knowledge what to be glad of, and feare after conſidering his caſe, had ſuch a confuſion of thoughts, as I had, when I ſaw Pyrocles, ſo neare me. But with that Dorus bluſhed, and Pamela ſmiled: and Dorus the more bluſhed at her ſmiling, and ſhe the more ſmiled at his bluſhing; becauſe he had (with the remembrance of that plight he was in) forgotten in ſpeaking of himſelfe to vſe the third perſon. But Muſidorus turned againe her thoughts from his cheekes to his tongue in this ſort: But, ſaid he, when they were with ſwordes in hands, not turning backes one to the other (for there they knew was no place of defence) but making it a preſeruation in not hoping to be preſerued, and now acknowledging themſelues ſubiect to death, meaning onely to do honour to their princelie birth, they flew amongſt them all (for all were enemies) and had quicklie either with flight or death, left none vpon the ſcaffold to annoy them. Wherein Pyrocles (the excellent Pyrocles) did ſuch wonders beyond beleefe, as was able to leade Muſidorus to courage, though he had bene borne a coward. But indeed iuſt rage and deſeperate vertue did ſuch effects, that the popular ſort of the beholders began to be almoſt ſuperſtitiouſlie amazed, as at effects beyond mortal power. But the king with angrie threatnings from out a window (where he was not aſhamed the world ſhould behold him a beholder) commaunded his guard and the reſt of his ſouldiers to haſten their death. But many of them loſt their bodies to looſe their ſoules, when the Princes grew almoſt ſo wearie, as they were ready to be conquered with conquering.

But as they were ſtill fighting with weake armes and ſtrong hearts, it happened, that one of the ſouldiers (commaunded to go vp after his fellowes againſt the Princes) hauing receiued a light hurt, more wounded in his heart, went backe with as much diligence, as he came vp with modeſtie: which another of his fellowes ſeeing, to picke a thanke of the king, ſtrake him vpon the face, reuiling him, that ſo accompanyed, he would runne away from ſo few. But he (as manie times it fals out) onlie valiant, when he was angrie, in reuenge thruſt him through: which with his death was ſtraight reuenged by a brother of his: and that againe requited by a fellow of the others. There began to be a great tumult amongſt the ſouldiers; which ſeene, and not vnderſtood by the people (vſed to feares, but not vſed to be bolde in them) ſome began to crie treaſon; and that voice ſtraight multiplying it ſelfe, the king (ô the cowardiſe of a guiltie conſcience) befo.e anie man ſet vpon him, fled away. Wherewith a bruit (either by arte of ſome well meaning men, or by ſuch chaunce as ſuch things often fall out by) ran from one to the other, that the king was ſlaine; wherewith certaine young men of the braueſt minds, cried with loud voyce, Libertie; and encouraging the other Citizens to follow them, ſet vpon the guard and ſouldiers, as chiefe inſtruments of tyrannie: and quicklie ayded by the Princes they had left none of them aliue, nor any other in the citie, who they thought had in any ſort ſet his hand to the worke of their ſeruitude, and (God knowes) by the blindneſſe of rage, killing many guiltleſſe perſons, either for affinitie to the tyrant, or enmitie to the tyrant-killers. But ſome of the wiſer (ſeeing that a popular licence is indeed the many-headed tyrannie) preuayled with the reſt to make Muſidorus their chiefe: chooſing one of them (becauſe Princes) to defend thē, and him becauſe elder and moſt hated of the Tyrant, and by him to be ruled: whom forthwith they lifted vp, Fortune (I thinke) ſmiling at her worke therein, that a ſcaffold of execution ſhould grow a ſcaffold of coronation.

But by and by there came newes of more certaine truth, that the king was not dead, but fled to a ſtrong caſtle of his, neare hand, where he was gathering forces in all ſpeed poſſible to ſuppreſſe this mutiny. But now they had runne themſelues too farre out of breath, to go backe againe the ſame careere; and too wel they knew the ſharpeneſſe of his memorie to forget ſuch an iniurie; therefore learning vertue of neceſſity, they continued reſolute to obey Muſidorus. Who ſeeing what forces were in the citie, with them iſſued againſt the tyrant, while they were in this heate; before practiſes might be vſed to diſſeuer them: and with them met the king, who likewiſe hoping litle to preuaile by time, knowing and finding his peoples hate, met him with litle delay in the field: where himselfe was slaine by Musidorus, after he had seene his onlie sonne (a Prince of great courage and beautie, but fostered vp in bloud by his naughtie father) slaine by the hand of Pyrocles. This victorie obtained with great, and truly not vndeserued honour to the two Princes, the whole estates of the countrie with one consent, gaue the crowne and all other marks of soueraignetie to Musidorus; desiring nothing more then to liue vnder such a gouernment as they promised themselues of him.

But he thinking it a greater greatnesse to giue a kingdome, then get a kingdome, vnderstanding that there was left of the bloud royall, & next to the succession, an aged Gentleman of approued goodnesse (who had gotten nothing by his cousins power but danger from him, & odiousnesse for him) hauing past his time in modest secrecy, & as much from intermedling in matters of gouernment, as the greatnesse of his bloud would suffer him, did (after hauing receiued the full power to his owne hands) resigne all to the Nobleman; but with such conditions, and cautions of the conditions, as might assure the people (with as much assurance as worldly matters beare) that not only that Gouernour, of whom indeed they looked for all good, but the nature of the gouernment, should be no way apt to decline to tyranny.

This doing set forth no lesse his magnificence, then the other act did his magnanimitie; so that greatly praised of all, and iustlie beloued of the new king, who in all both words and behauiour protested himselfe their Tenant, and Liegeman, they were drawne thence to reuenge those two seruants of theirs, of whose memorable faith, I told you (most excellent Princesse) in willingly giuing themselues to be drowned for their sakes; but drowned indeed they were not, but gate with painfull swimming vpon a rocke: from whence (after being come as neare famishing, as before drowning) the weather breaking vp, they were brought to the main land of Pontus; the same countrie vpon which Musidorus also was fallen, but not in so luckie a place.

For they were brought to the king of that countrey, a Tyrant also, not through suspition, greedinesse, or reuengefulnesse, as he of Phrygia, but (as I may terme it) of a wanton cruelty: inconstant in his choise of friends, or rather neuer hauing a friend but a playfellow; of whom when he was wearie, he could not otherwise rid himselfe then by killing them; giuing sometimes prodigally, not because he loued them to whom he gaue, but because he lusted to giue: punishing, not so much for hate or anger, as because he felt not the smart of punishment: delighted to be flattered, at first for those vertues which were not in him, at length making his vices vertues worthy the flattering: with like iudgement glorying, when he had happened to do a thing well, as when he had perfourmed some notable mischiefe.

He chaunced at that time (for indeed long time none lasted with him) to haue next in vse about him, a man of the most enuious disposition, that (I thinke) euer infected the aire with his breath; whose eyes could not looke right vpon anie happie man, nor eares beare the burthen of any bodies praise: contrarie to the natures of all other plagues, plagued with othes well being; making happinesse the ground of his vnhappinesse, & good newes the argument of his sorow: in sum, a man whose fauour no man could winne, but by being miserable. And so, because these two faithfull seruants of theirs came in miserable sort to that Court, he was apt enough at first to fauour them; and the king vnderstanding of their aduenture, (wherein they had shewed so constant a faith vnto their Lords) sodainlie falles to take a pride in making much of them, extolling them with infinite praises, and praising himselfe in his heart, in that he praised them. And by and by were they made great Courtiers, and in the way of minions, when aduauncement (the most mortall offence to enuie) stirred vp their former friend, to ouerthrow his owne worke in thē; taking occasion vpon the knowledge (newlie come to the Court) of the late death of the king of Phrygia destroyed by their two Lords, who hauing bene a neare kinsman to this Prince of Pontus, by this enuious Counsellour, partly with suspition of practise, partly with glorie of in-part reuenging his cousins death, the king was sodainly turned, and euerie turne with him was a downe-fall) to locke them vp in prison, as seruants to his enemies, whom before he had neuer knowne, nor (till that time one of his owne subiects had entertained and dealt for them) did euer take heed of. But now earnest in euerie present humour, and making himselfe braue in his liking, he was content to giue them iust cause of offence, when they had power to make iust reuenge. Yet did the Princes send vnto him before they entred into warre, desiring their seruants libertie. But he swelling in their humblenesse, (like a bubble blowne vp with a small breath, broken with a great) forgetting, or neuer knowing humanitie, caused their heads to be striken off, by the aduice of his enuious Counsellour (who now hated them so much the more as he foresawe their happinesse in hauing such, and so fortunate maisters) and sent them with vnroyall reproches to Musidorus and Pyrocles, as if they had done traiterouslie, and not heroically in killing his tyrannicall cousin.

But that iniurie went beyond all degree of reconcilement; so that they making forces in Phrygia (a kingdome whollie at their commandement, by the loue of the people, and gratefulnesse of the king) they entred his countrie; and whollie conquering it (with such deeds as at least Fame said were excellent) tooke the king; & by Musidorus commandement (Pyrocles heart more enclining to pitie) he was slaine vpon the tombe of their two true seruants; which they caused to be made for them with royall expences, and notable workmanship to preserue their dead liues. For his wicked seruant he should haue felt the like, or worse, but that his heart brake euen to death with the beholding the honour done to their dead carkasses. There might Pyrocles quietly haue enioyed that Crowne, by all the desire of that people, most of whom had reuolted vnto him: but he finding a sister of the late kings (a faire and well esteemed Lady) looking for nothing more, then to be oppressed with her brothers ruines, gaue her in mariage to the Nobleman his fathers olde friend, and endowed them with the Crowne of that kingdome. And not content with those publike actions, of princely, and (as it were) gouerning vertue, they did (in that kingdome and some other neere about) diuerse acts of particular trials, more famous, because more perilous. For in that time those regions were full both of cruell monsters, and monstrous men: all which in short time by priuate combats they deliuered the countries of.

Among the rest, two brothers of huge both greatnesse and force, therefore commonlie called Giants, who kept themselues in a castle seated vpon the top of a rock, impregnable, because there was no comming vnto it but by one narrow path, where one mans force was able to keepe downe an armie. These brothers had a while serued the king of Pontus, and in all his affaires (especiallie of warre, whereunto they were only apt) they had shewed as vnconquered courage, so a rude faithfulnesse: being men indeed by nature apter to the faults of rage, then of deceit; not greatly ambitious, more then to be well and vprightly dealt with; rather impatient of iniurie, then delighted with more then ordinarie curtesies; and in iniuries more ſenſible of ſmart or loſſe, then of reproch or diſgrace. Theſe men being of this nature (and certainely iewels to a wiſe man, conſidering what indeed wonders they were able to perfourme) yet were diſcarded by that vnworthy Prince, after manie notable deſerts, as not worthie the holding. Which was the more euident to them; becauſe it ſodainlie fell from an exceſſe of fauour, which (manie examples hauing taught them) neuer ſtopt his race till it came to an headlong ouerthow: they full of rage, retired themſelues vnto this caſtle: where thinking nothing iuſter then reuenge, nor more noble then the effectes of anger, that (according to the nature) full of inward brauerie and fierceneſſe, ſcarcelie in the glaſſe of reaſon, thinking it ſelfe faire, but when it is terrible, they immediatly gaue themſelues to make all the countrie about them (ſubiect to that king) to ſmart for their Lords follie: not caring how innocent they were, but rather thinking the more innocent they were, the more it teſtified their ſpite, which they deſired to manifeſt. And with vſe of euill, growing more and more euill, they tooke delight in ſlaughter, and pleaſed themſelues in making others wracke the effect of their power: ſo that where in the time that they obeyed a maiſter, their anger was a ſeruiceable power of the mind to do publike good; ſo now vnbrideled, and blind iudge of it ſelfe, it made wickedneſſe violent, and praiſed it ſelfe in excellencie of miſchiefe; almoſt to the ruine of the countrie, not greatly regarded by their careleſſe and loueleſſe king. Till now theſe Princes finding them ſo fleſhed in crueltie, as not to be reclaimed, ſecretly vndertooke the matter alone: for accompanied they would not haue ſuffered them to haue mounted; and ſo thoſe great fellowes ſcornefullie receiuing them, as fooliſh birds fallen into their net, it pleaſed the eternall iuſtice to make them ſuffer death by their hands: and ſo they were manifoldlie acknowledged the ſauers of that countrie.

It were the part of a verie idle Orator to ſet forth the nũbers of well deuiſed honors done vnto them: but as high honor is not onlie gotten and borne by paine and danger, but muſt be nurſt by the like, or elſe vaniſheth as ſoone as it appeares to the world: ſo the naturall hunger thereof (which was in Pyrocles) ſuffered him not to account a reſting ſeat of that, which euer either riſeth or falleth, but ſtill to make one occaſion beget another; whereby his doings might ſend his praiſe to others mouthes to rebound againe true contentmẽt to his ſpirit. And therfore hauing well eſtabliſhed thoſe kingdomes vnder good gouernors, and rid them by their valure of ſuch giants and monſters, as before time armies were not able to ſubdue, they determined in vnknowne order to ſee more of the world, and to imploy thoſe gifts eſteemed rare in them, to the good of mankind; and therfore would themſelues (vnderſtanding that the king Euarchus was paſſed all the cumber of his warres) go priuately to ſeeke exerciſes of their vertue, thinking it not ſo worthie to be brought to heroicall effects by fortune, or neceſſitie, (like Vlyſſes and Aeneas) as by ones own choice and working. And ſo went they away from verie vnwilling people to leaue them, making time haſte it ſelfe to be a circumſtance of their honor, and one place witneſſe to another of the truth of their doings. For ſcarcelie were they out of the confines of Pontus, but that as they rid alone armed, (for alone they went, one ſeruing the other) they met an aduenture; which though not ſo notable for any great effect they performed, yet worthie to be remembred for the vnuſed examples therin, as well of true naturall goodneſſe, as of wretched vngratefulneſſe.

It was in the kingdome of Galatia, the ſeaſon being (as in the depth of winter) verie cold, and as then ſodainelie growne to ſo extreame and foule a ſtorme, that neuer any winter (I thinke) brought forth a fowler child: ſo that the Princes were euen cõpelled by the haile, that the pride of the winde blew into their faces, to ſeeke ſome ſhrowding place which a certain hollow rocke offering vnto them, they made it their ſhield againſt the tempeſts furie. And ſo ſtaying there, till the violence therof was paſſed, they heard the ſpeach of a couple, who not perceiuing them, being hid within that rude canapie, held a ſtraunge and pitifull diſputation, which made them ſtep out, yet in ſuch ſort, as they might ſee vnſeene. There they perceiued an aged man, and a young, ſcarcelie come to the age of a man, both poorely arrayed, extreamely weather-beaten; the olde man blind, the young man leading him: and yet through all thoſe miſeries, in both there ſeemed to appeare a kind of nobleneſſe, not ſutable to that affliction. But the firſt words they heard, were theſe of the old man. Well Leonatus (ſaid he) ſince I cannot perſwade thee to leade me to that which ſhould end my griefe, and thy trouble, let me now intreat thee to leaue me: feare not, my miſerie cannot be greater then it is, and nothing doth become me but miſerie: feare not the daunger of my blind ſteps, I cannot fall worſe then I am: and do not I pray thee, do not obſtinately continue to infect thee with my wretchednes: but flie, flie from this region only worthie of me. Deare father (anſwered he) do not take away from me the only remnant of my happineſſe: while I haue power to do you ſeruice, I am not whollie miſerable. Ah my ſonne (ſaid he, and with that he groned, as if ſorrow ſtraue to breake his heart) how euill fits it me to haue ſuch a ſonne, and how much doth thy kindneſſe vpbraid my wickedneſſe? Theſe dolefull ſpeeches, and ſome others to like purpoſe (well ſhewing they had not bene borne to the fortune they were in,) moued the Princes to go out vnto them, and aske the younger what they were? Sirs (anſwered he with a good grace, and made the more agreeable by a certaine noble kind of piteouſneſſe) I ſee well you are ſtraungers, that know not our miſerie, ſo well here knowne, that no man dare know, but that we muſt be miſerable. Indeed our ſtate is ſuch, as though nothing is ſo needfull vnto vs as pitie, yet nothing is more daungerous vnto vs, then to make our ſelues ſo knowne as may ſtirre pitie: but your preſence promiſeth that crueltie ſhall not ouer-runne hate: and if it did, in truth our ſtate is ſunke below the degree of feare.

This old man (whom I leade) was lately rightfull Prince of this countrie of Paphlagonia, by the hard-hearted vngratefulneſſe of a ſonne of his, depriued, not onely of his kingdome (wherof no forraine forces were euer able to ſpoyle him) but of his ſight, the riches which Nature graunts to the pooreſt creatures. Whereby, and by other his vnnaturall dealings, he hath bene driuen to ſuch griefe, as euen now he would haue had me to haue led him to the top of this rocke, thence to caſt himſelfe headlong to death: and ſo would haue made me, who receiued my life of him, to be the worker of his deſtruction. But noble Gentlemen, ſaid he, if either of you haue a father, and feele what dutifull affection is engraffed in a ſonnes heart, let me intreat you to conueigh this afflicted Prince to ſome place of reſt and ſecuritie: amongſt your worthie acts it ſhall be none of the leaſt, that a king of ſuch might and fame, & ſo vniuſtlie oppreſſed, is in any ſort by you relieued.

But before they could make him anſwere, his father beganne to ſpeake. Ah my ſonne, ſaid he, how euill an Hiſtorian are you, that leaue out the chiefe knot of all the diſcourſe? my wickedneſſe, my wickedneſſe: and if thou doeſt it to ſpare my eares (the only ſenſe now left me proper for knowledge) aſſure thy ſelfe thou doeſt miſtake me: and I take witneſſe of that Sunne which you ſee (with that he caſt vp his blind eyes, as if he would hunt for light) and wish my selfe in worse case then I do wish my selfe, which is as euill as may be, if I speake vntrulie, that nothing is so welcome to my thoughts, as the publishing of my shame. Therefore know you Gentlemen (to whom from my heart I wish that it may not proue some ominous foretoken of misfortune to haue met with such a miser as I am) that whatsoeuer my son (ô God, that truth binds me to reproch him with the name of my son) hath said is true. But besides those truthes, this also is true, that hauing had in lawfull mariage, of a mother fit to beare royall children, this sonne (such a one as partly you see, and better shall know by my short declaration) and so enioyed the expectations in the world of him, till he was growne to iustifie their expectations (so as I needed enuie no father for the chiefe comfort of mortalitie, to leaue another ones-selfe after me) I was caried by a bastard sonne of mine (if at least I be bound to beleeue the words of that base woman my concubine, his mother) first to mislike, then to hate, lastlie to destroy, or to do my best to destroy this sonne (I thinke you thinke) vndeseruing destruction. What wayes be vsed to bring me to it, if I should tell you, I should tediouslie trouble you with as much poisonous hypocrisie, desperate fraud, smooth malice, hidden ambition, and smiling enuie, as in anie liuing person could be harboured: but I list it not; no remembrance of naughtinesse delights me but mine owne; and me thinks, the accusing his traps might in some maner excuse my fault, which certainlie I lothe to do. But the conclusion is, that I gaue order to some seruants of mine, whom I thought as apt for such charities as my selfe, to leade him out into a forrest, and there to kill him.

But those theeues (better natured to my sonne then my selfe) spared his life, letting him go to learne to liue poorely: which he did, giuing himselfe to be a priuate souldier in a countrey here by: but as he was ready to be greatly aduanced for some noble peeces of seruice which he did, he heard newes of me: who (drunke in my affection to that vnlawfull and vnnaturall sonne of mine) suffered my selfe so to be gouerned by him, that all fauours and punishments passed by him, all offices, and places of importance distributed to his fauorites; so that ere I was aware, I had left my selfe nothing but the name of a King: which he shortly wearie of too, with many indignities (if any thing may be called an indignitie, which was laid vpon me) threw me out of my seat, and put out my eyes; and then (proud in his tyrannie) let me go, neither imprisoning, nor killing me; but rather delighting to make me feele my miserie; miserie indeed, if euer there were anie; full of wretchednesse, fuller of disgrace, and fullest of guiltinesse. And as he came to the crowne by so vniust meanes, as vniustlie he kept it, by force of straunger souldiers in Cittadels, the neasts of tyrannie, and murderers of libertie; disarming all his owne countrimen, that no man durst shew himself a wel-willer of mine: to say the truth (I thinke) few of them being so (considering my cruell follie to my good sonne, and foolish kindnesse to my vnkind bastard:) but if there were any who felt a pitie of so great a fall, and had yet any sparkes of vnslaine dutie left in them towards me; yet durst they not shew it, scarcelie with giuing me almes at their doores; which yet was the onlie sustenance of my distressed life, no bodie daring to shew so much charitie, as to lend me a hand to guide my darke steps: till this sonne of mine (God knowes, worthy of a more vertuous, and more fortunate father) forgetting my abhominable wrongs, not recking daunger, and neglecting the present good way hee was in of doing himselfe good, came hither to do this kind office you see him performe towards me, to my vnspeakeable griefe; not onlie becaus his kindnesse is a glasse euen to my blind eyes of my naughtineſſe, but that aboue all griefes, it grieues me he ſhould deſperatelie aduenture the loſſe of his well-deſeruing life for mine, that yet owe more to Fortune for my deſerts, as if he would carie mudde in a cheſt of Chryſtall: for well I know, he that now raigneth, how much ſo euer (and with good reaſon) he deſpiſeth me, of all men deſpiſed; yet he will not let ſlip any aduantage to make away him, whoſe iuſt title (ennobled by courage & goodneſſe) may one day ſhake the ſeat of a neuer ſecure tyrannie. And for this cauſe I craued of him to leade me to the top of this rocke, indeed I muſt confeſſe, with meaning to free him from ſo ſerpentine a companion as I am. But he finding what I purpoſed, onely therein ſince he was borne, ſhewed himſelfe diſobedient vnto me. And now Gentlemen, you haue the true ſtorie, which I pray you publiſh to the world, that my miſchieuous proceedings may be the glorie of his filiall pietie, the onlie reward now left for ſo great a merite. And if it may be, let me obtaine that of you, which my ſonne denies me: for neuer was there more pity in ſauing any, then in ending me, both becauſe therin my agonie ſhall end, & ſo you ſhal preſerue this excellent young man, who elſe wilfully followes his owne ruine.

The matter in it ſelfe lamentable, lamentablie expreſſed by the old Prince (which needed not take to himſelfe the geſtures of pitie, ſince his face could not put off the markes thereof) greatly moued the two Princes to compaſſion, which could not ſtay in ſuch hearts as theirs without ſeeking remedie. But by and by the occaſion was preſented: for Plexirtus (ſo was the baſtard called) came thither with fortie horſe, onelie of purpoſe to murder this brother, of whoſe comming he had ſoone aduertiſement, and thought no eyes of ſufficient credite in ſuch a matter, but his owne, and therefore came himſelfe to be actor, and ſpectator. And as ſoone as he came, not regarding the weake (as he thought) gard of but two men, commaunded ſome of his followers to ſet their hands to his, in the killing of Leonatus. But the young Prince (though not otherwiſe armed but with a ſword) how falſely ſoeuer he was dealt with by others, would not betray himſelfe; but brauely drawing it out, made the death of the firſt that aſſayled him, warne his fellowes to come more warily after him. But then Pyrocles and Muſidorus were quicklie become parties (ſo iuſt a defence deſeruing as much as old friendſhip) and ſo did behaue them among that companie (more iniurious then valiant) that many of them loſt their liues for their wicked maiſter.

Yet perhaps had the number of them at laſt preuailed, if the king of Pontus (latelie by them made ſo) had not come vnlooked for to their ſuccour. Who (hauing had a dreame which had fixt his imagination vehemently vpon ſome great danger, preſently to follow thoſe two Princes, whom he moſt dearlie loued) was come in all haſte, following as well as he could their tracke with a hundred horſes in that cuntrie, which he thought (conſidering who then raigned) a fit place enough to make the ſtage of anie Tragedie.

But then the match had bene ſo ill made for Plexirtus, that his ill-led life, and worſe gotten honour ſhould haue tumbled together to deſtruction; had there not come in Tydeus and Telenor, with fortie or fiftie in their ſuite, to the defence of Plexirtus. Theſe two were brothers, of the nobleſt houſe of that countrie, brought vp from their infancie with Plexirtus; men of ſuch proweſſe, as not to know feare in themſelues, and yet to teach it in others that ſhould deale with them: for they had often made their liues triumph ouer moſt terrible daungers; neuer diſmayed, and euer fortunate; and truely no more ſetled in valure, then diſpoſed to goodneſſe and iuſtice, if either they had lighted on a better friend, or could haue learned to make friendſhip a child, and not the father of Vertue. But bringing vp (rather thē choice) hauing firſt knit their minds vnto him (indeed craftie enough, either to hide his faults, or neuer to ſhew them, but when they might pay home) they willingly held out the courſe, rather to ſatisfie him, then all the world; and rather to be good friends, then good men: ſo as though they did not like the euill he did, yet they liked him that did the euill; and though not counſellours of the offence, yet protectors of the offender. Now they hauing heard of this ſodaine going out with ſo ſmal a cōpanie, in a countrie full of euill-wiſhing minds toward him (though they knew not the cauſe) followed him; till they found him in ſuch caſe, as they were to venture their liues, or elſe he to loſe his: which they did with ſuch force of mind and bodie, that trulie I may iuſtly ſay, Pyrocles and Muſidorus had neuer till then found any, that could make them ſo well repeat their hardeſt leſſon in the feates of armes. And briefflie ſo they did, that if they ouercame not; yet were they not ouercome, but caried away that vngratefull maiſter of theirs to a place of ſecuritie, how ſoeuer the Princes laboured to the contrarie. But this matter being thus far begun, it became not the conſtancie of the Princes ſo to leaue it; but in all haſt making forces both in Pontus and Phrigia, they had in few dayes left him but onely that one ſtrong place where he was. For feare hauing bene the only knot that had faſtened his people vnto him, that once vntied by a greater force, they all ſcattered from him, like ſo many birds, whoſe cage had bene broken.

In which ſeaſon the blind king (hauing in the chiefe citie of his realme ſet the crowne vpon his ſonne Leonatus head) with many tears (both of ioy and ſorow) ſetting forth to the whole people, his owne fault and his ſons vertue, after he had kiſt him, and forc'd his ſonne to accept honour of him (as of his new-become ſubiect) euen in a moment died, as it ſhould ſeeme, his heart broken with vnkindneſſe and affliction, ſtretched ſo far beyond his limits with this exceſſe of comfort, as it was able no lōger to keep ſafe his vital ſpirits. But the new king (hauing no leſſe louingly performed all duties to him dead, then aliue) purſued on the ſiege of his vnnaturall brother, aſmuch for the reuenge of his father, as for the eſtabliſhing of his owne quiet. In which ſiege truly I cannot but acknowledge the proweſſe of thoſe two brothers, then whom the Princes neuer found in all their trauell, two of greater abilitie to performe, nor of abler skill for conduct.

But Plexirtus finding, that if nothing elſe, famine would at laſt bring him to deſtruction, thought better by humbleneſſe to creepe, where by pride he could not march. For certainly ſo had nature formed him, and the exerciſe of craft conformed him to all turningneſſe of ſleights, that though no man had leſſe goodneſſe in his ſoule then he, no man could better find the places whence arguments might grow of goodneſſe to another; though no man felt leſſe pitie, no man could tel better how to ſtirre pitie; no man more impudent to denie, where proofes were not manifeſt; no man more ready to confeſſe with a repenting maner of aggrauating his owne euill, where deniall would but make the fault fowler. Now he tooke this way, that hauing gotten a paſport for one (that pretended he would put Plexirtus aliue into his hands) to ſpeake with the king his brother, hee himſelfe (though much againſt the minds of the valiant brothers, who rather wiſhed to die in braue defence) with a rope about his necke, barefooted, came to offer himſelfe to the diſcretion of Leonatus. Where what ſubmiſſion he vſed, how cunningly in making greater the fault, he made the faultineſſe the leſſe, how artificiallie he could ſet out the torments of his owne conſcience, with the burdenſome cumber he had found of his ambitious deſires, how finely ſeeming to deſire nothing but death, as aſhamed to liue, he begg'd life in the refuſing it, I am not cunning enough to be able to expreſſe: but ſo tell out of it, that though at firſt ſight Leonatus ſaw him with no other eye, then as the murderer of his father; and anger already began to paint reuenge in many colours, ere long he had not only gotten pitie, but pardon; and if not an excuſe of the fault paſt, yet an opinion of a future amendment: while the poore villaines (chiefe miniſters of his wickedneſſe, now betrayed by the authour thereof,) were deliuered to manie cruell ſorts of death; he ſo handling it, that it rather ſeemed, he had more come into the defence of an vnremediable miſchiefe already committed, then that they had done it at firſt by his conſent.

In ſuch ſort the Princes left theſe reconciled brothers (Plexirtus in all his behauiour carying him in farre lower degree of ſeruice, then the euer-noble nature of Leonatus wold ſuffer him) and taking likewiſe their leaues of their good friend the king of Pontus (who returned to enioy their benefite, both of his wife and kingdome) they priuately went thence, hauing only with them the two valiant brothers, who would needs accompanie them through diuerſe places; they foure doing acts more daungerous, though leſſe famous, becauſe they were but priuate chiualries: till hearing of the faire & vertuous Queene Erona of Lycia, beſieged by the puiſſant king of Armenia, they bent themſelues to her ſuccour, both becauſe the weaker (and weaker as being a Lady) and partlie becauſe they heard the king of Armenia had in his companie three of the moſt famous men liuing, for matters of armes, that were knowne to be in the world. Wherof one was the Prince Plangus (whoſe name was ſweetned by your breath, peereleſſe Lady, when the laſt day it pleaſed you to mention him vnto me:) the other two were two great Princes (though holding of him) Barzanes and Euardes, men of Giant-like both hugeneſſe and force: in which two eſpeciallie, the truſt the king had of victorie was repoſed. And of them, thoſe brothers Tydeus and Telenor (ſufficient iudges in warlike matters) ſpake ſo high commendations, that the two Princes had euen a youthful longing to haue ſome trial of their vertue. And therefore as ſoone as they were entred into Lycia, they ioyned thēſelues with them that faithfully ſerued the poore Queene, at that time beſieged: and ere long animated in ſuch ſort their almoſt ouerthrowne hearts, that they went by force to relieue the towne, though they were depriued of a great part of their ſtrength by the parting of the two brothers, who were ſent for in all haſt to returne to their old friend and maiſter Plexirtus: who (willingly hood-winking themſelues from ſeeing his faults, and binding themſelues to beleeue what he ſaid) often abuſed the vertue of courage to defend his fowle vice of iniuſtice. But now they were ſent for to aduaunce a conqueſt he was about; while Pyrocles and Muſidorus purſued the deliuerie of the Queene Erona.

I haue heard (ſaid Pamela) that part of the ſtory of Plangus, whē he paſſed through this countrie: therefore you may (if you liſt) paſſe ouer that warre of Eronas quarrell, leaſt if you ſpeake too much of warre matters, you ſhould wake Mopſa, which might happily breed a great broile. He looked, & ſaw that Mopſa indeed ſate ſwallowing of ſleepe with open mouth, making ſuch a noiſe withall, as no body could lay the ſtealing of a nap to her charge. Whereupon, willing to vſe that occaſion, he kneeled down, & with hūble-heartedneſſe & hardy earneſtneſſe printed in his graces, Alas (ſaid he) diuine lady, who haue wrought ſuch miracles in me, as to make a Prince (none of the baſeſt) to think al principalities baſe, in reſpect of the ſheephook, which may hold him vp in your ſight; vouchſafe now at laſt to heare in direct words my humble ſute, while this dragon ſleepes, that keeps the golden fruite. If in my deſire I wiſh, or in my hopes aſpire, or in my imagination faine to my ſelf any thing which may be the leaſt ſpot to that heauēly vertue, which ſhines in all your doings; I pray the eternal powers, that the words I ſpeake may be deadly poyſons, while they are in my mouth, and that all my hopes, all my deſires, all my imaginations, may onely worke their own confuſion. But if loue, loue of you, loue of your vertues, ſeeke onely that fauour of you, which becommeth that gratefulneſſe, which cannot miſbecome your excellencie, O doo not: He would haue ſaide further, but Pamela calling aloud Mopſa, ſhe ſodainely ſtart vp, ſtaggering, and rubbing her eies, ran firſt out of the doore, and then back to them, before ſhe knew how ſhe went out, or why ſhe came in againe: till at length, being fully come to her little ſelfe, ſhe asked Pamela, why ſhe had called her. For nothing (ſaid Pamela) but that you might heare ſome tales of your ſeruants telling: and therfore now (ſaid ſhe Dorus) go on.

But as he (who found no ſo good ſacrifice, as obedience) was returning to the ſtory of himſelfe, Philoclea came in, and by and by after her, Miſo; ſo as for that time they were faine to let Dorus depart. But Pamela (delighted euen to preſerue in her memory, the words of ſo well a beloued ſpeaker) repeated the whole ſubſtance to her ſiſter, till their ſober dinner being come and gone, to recreat themſelues ſomething, (euen tyred with the noyſomnes of Miſos conuerſation) they determined to goe (while the heat of the day laſted) to bath themſelues (ſuch being the manner of the Arcadian nimphes often to doo) in the riuer of Ladon, and take with them a Lute, meaning to delight them vnder ſome ſhadow. But they could not ſtir, but that Miſo with her daughter Mopſa was after them: and as it lay in their way to paſſe by the other lodge, Zelmane out of her window eſpied them, and ſo ſtale down after them: which ſhee might the better do, becauſe that Gynecia was ſicke, and Baſilius (that day being his birth-day) according to his maner, was buſie about his deuotions; and therefore ſhe went after, hoping to finde ſome time to ſpeake with Philoclea: but not a word coulde ſhee beginne, but that Miſo would be one of the audience; ſo that ſhee was driuen to recommend thinking, ſpeaking, and all, to her eyes, who diligently performed her truſt, til they came to the riuers ſide, which of all the riuers of Greece had the price for excellent pureneſſe and ſweeteneſſe, in ſo much as the verie bathing in it, was accounted exceeding healthfull. It ranne vpon ſo fine and delicate a ground, as one could not eaſily iudge, whether the Riuer did more waſh the grauell, or the grauell did purifie the Riuer; the Riuer not running forth right, but almoſt continually winding, as if the lower ſtreames would returne to their ſpring, or that the Riuer had a delight to play with it ſelfe. The banckes of either ſide ſeeming armes of the louing earth, that faine would embrace it; and the Riuer a wanton nymph which ſtill would ſlippe from it: either ſide of the bancke being fringed with moſt beautifull trees, which reſiſted the ſunnes darts from ouer-much piercing the naturall coldneſſe of the Riuer. There was the But among the reſt a goodly Cypres, who bowing her faire head ouer the water, it ſeemed ſhe looked into it, & dreſſed her greene locks by that running Riuer. There the Princeſſes determining to bath thēſelues, though it was ſo priuiledged a place, vpō pain of death, as no bodie durſt preſume to come thither, yet for the more ſurety, they looked round about, and could ſee nothing but a water ſpaniell, who came downe the riuer ſhewing that he hunted for a ducke, & with a ſnuffling grace, diſdaining that his ſmelling force could not as well preuaile thorow the water, as thorough the aire,& therfore wayting with his eye, to ſee whether he could eſpie the duckes getting vp againe: but then a litle below them failing of his purpoſe,he got out of the riuer, & ſhaking off the water(as great men do their friends,now he had no further cauſe to vſe it)inweeded himſelfe ſo,as the Ladies loſt the further marking his ſportfulneſſe: & inuiting Zelmane alſo to waſh her ſelfe with them,& ſhe excuſing her ſelfe with hauing taken a late cold, they began by peece-meale to take away the eclipſing of their apparell.

Zelmane would haue put to her helping hand, but ſhe was taken with ſuch a quiuering, that ſhe thought it more wiſedome to leane her ſelfe to a tree and looke on, while Miſo and Mopſa (like a couple of foreſwat melters) were getting the pure ſiluer of their bodies out of the vre of their garments. But as the rayments went off to receiue kiſſes of the ground, Zelmane enuied the happineſſe of all, but of the ſmocke was euen iealous, and when that was taken away too, and that Philoclea remained (for her Zelmane onely marked) like a Dyamon taken from out the rocke, or rather like the Sun getting from vnder a cloud, and ſhewing his naked beames to the full view, then was the beauty too much for a patient ſight, the delight too ſtrong for a ſtayed conceipt: ſo that Zelmane could not chooſe but run, to touch, embrace and kiſſe her; But conſcience made her come to her ſelfe, and leaue Philoclea, who bluſhing, and withall ſmiling, making ſhamefaſtneſſe pleaſant, & pleaſure ſhamefaſt, tenderly moued her feet, vnwonted to feele the naked ground, till the touch of the cold water made a pretty kind of ſhrugging come ouer her body, like the twinkling of the faireſt among the fixed ſtars. But the riuer it ſelfe gaue way vnto her, ſo that ſhee was ſtreight breaſt high; which was the deepeſt that ther-about ſhe could be: & whē cold Ladon had once fully imbraced them, himſelfe was no more ſo cold to thoſe Ladies, but as if his cold complexion had bin heated with loue, ſo ſeemed he to play about euery part he could touch.

Ah ſweete, now ſweeteſt Ladon (ſayd Zelmane) why doſt thou not ſtay thy courſe to haue more full taſt of thy happines? But the reaſon is manifeſt, the vpper ſtreames make ſuch haſt to haue their part of embracing, that the neather (though lothly) muſt needes giue place vnto them. O happy Ladon, within whom ſhe is, vpon whom her beauty fals, thorough whom her eye pierceth, O happy Ladon, which art now an vnperfect mirror of all perfection, canſt thou euer forget the bleſſednes of this impreſſion? if thou do, then let thy bed be turned from fine grauell, to weeds and mud; if thou do, let ſome vniuſt niggards make weres to ſpoile thy beauty; if thou do, let ſome greater riuer fall into thee, to take away the name of Ladon. Oh Ladon, happy Ladon, rather ſlide then run by her, leaſt thou ſhouldeſt make her legs ſlip from her; & then, O happy Ladon, who would then call thee, but the moſt curſed Ladon? But as the Ladies plaid them in the water, ſomtimes ſtriking it with their hands, the water (making lines in his face) ſeemed to ſmile at ſuch beating, & with twenty bubbles, not to be content to haue the picture of their face in large vpon him, but he wold in each of thoſe bubbles ſet forth the miniature of them.

But Zelmane, whoſe ſight was gaine-ſayd by nothing but the tranſparent vaile of Ladon (like a chamber where a great fire is kept, though the fire be at one ſtay, yet with the continuance continually hath his heate encreaſed) had the coales of her affection ſo kindled with wonder, and blowne with delight, that now all her parts grudged, that her eyes ſhould doe more homage, then they, to the Princeſſe of them. In ſo much that taking vp the Lute, her wit began to bee with a diuine furie inſpired; her voice would in ſo beloued an occaſion ſecond her wit; her handes accorded the Lutes muſicke to the voice; her panting heart danced to the muſicke; while I thinke her feete did beate the time; while her bodie was the roome where it ſhould be celebrated; her ſoule the Queene which ſhould be delighted. And ſo together went the vtterance and the inuention, that one might iudge, it was Philocleas beautie which did ſpeedily write it in her eyes; or the ſence thereof, which did word by word endite it in her minde, whereto ſhe (but as an organ) did onely lend vtterance. The ſong was to this purpoſe.

WHat tong can her perfections tell,
In whoſe each part all pens may dwell?
Her haire fine threeds of fineſt gold
In curled knots mans thought to hold:
But that her fore-head ſayes in me
A whiter beautie you may ſee.
VVhiter indeed; more white then ſnow,
VVhich on cold winters face doth grow.
That doth preſent thoſe euen browes,
VVhoſe equall line their angles bowes,
Like to the Moone when after chaunge
Her horned head abroad doth raunge:
And arches be to heauenly lids,
VVhoſe winke each bold attempt forbids.
For the black ſtarres thoſe Spheares containe,
The matchleſſe paire, euen praiſe doth ſtaine.
No lampe, whoſe light by Art is got,
No Sunne, which ſhines, and ſeeth not,
Can liken them without all peere,
Saue one as much as other cleere:
VVhich onely thus vnhappie be,
Becauſe themſelues they cannot ſee.
Her cheekes with kindly claret ſpred.
Aurora-like new out of bed,
Or like the freſh Queene-apples ſide,
Blushing at ſight of Phœbus pride.
Her noſe, her chinne pure iuorie weares:
No purer then the pretie eares.
So that therein appeares ſome blood,
Like wine and milke that mingled ſtood.
In whoſe Incirclets if ye gaze,
Your eyes may tread a Louers maze.
But with ſuch turnes the voice to ſtray,
No talke vntaught can find the way.
The tippe no iewell needes to weare:
The tippe is iewell of the eare.
But who thoſe ruddie lips can miſſe?
VVhich bleſſed ſtill themſelues do kiſſe.
Rubies, Chirries, and Roſes new,

In worth, in taſt, in perfit hew:
VVhich neuer part but that they showe
Of precious pearle the double rowe,
The ſecond ſweetly-fenced ward,
Her heauenly-dewed tongue to gard.
VVhence neuer word in vaine did flowe.
Faire vnder theſe doth ſtately growe,
The handle of this precious worke,
The neck, in which ſtrange graces lurke.
Such be I thinke the ſumptuous towers
VVhich skill doth make in Princes bowers.
So good a ſay inuites the eye,
A little downward to eſpie,
The liuelie cluſters of her breſts,
Of Venus babe the wanton neſts:
Like pomels round of Marble cleere:
VVhere azurde veines well mixt appeere,
VVith deareſt tops of porphyrie.
Betwixt theſe two a way doth lie,
A way more worthie beauties fame,
Then that which beares the Milkie name.
This leades into the ioyous field,
VVhich onely ſtill doth Lillies yeeld:
But Lillies ſuch whoſe natiue ſmell
The Indian odours doth excell.
VVaſte it is calde, for it doth waſte
Mens liues, vntill it be imbraſte.
There may one ſee, and yet not ſee
Her ribbes in white all armed bee.
More white then Neptunes fomie face,
VVhen ſtrugling rockes he would imbrace.
In thoſe delights the wandring thought
Might of each ſide aſtray be brought,
But that her nauel doth vnite,
In curious circle, buſie ſight:
A daintie ſeale of virgin-waxe,
VVhere nothing but impreſſion lackes.
Her bellie their glad ſight doth fill,
Iuſtly entitled Cupids hill.
A hill moſt fitte for ſuch a maſter,
A ſpotleſſe mine of Alablaſter.
Like Alablaſter faire and ſleeke,
But ſoft and ſupple ſatten like.
In that ſweete ſeate the Boy doth ſport:
Loath, I muſt leaue his chife reſort.
" For ſuch a vſe the world hath gotten,
" The beſt things ſtill muſt be forgotten.
Yet neuer ſhall my ſong omitte

Her thighes, for Ouids song more fitte;
VVhich flanked with two sugred flankes,
Lift vp their stately swelling bankes;
That Albion cliues in whitenesse passe:
With hanches smooth as looking glasse.
But bow all knees, now of her knees
My tongue doth tell what fancie sees.
The knottes of ioy, the gemmes of loue,
Whose motion makes all graces moue.
Whose bought incau'd doth yeeld such sight,
Like cunning Painter shadowing white.
The gartring place vvith child-like signe,
Shewes easie print in mettall fine.
But then againe the flesh doth rise
In her braue calues, like christall skies.
Whose Atlas is a smallest small,
More white then whitest bone of all.
Thereout steales out that round cleane foote
This noble Cedars precious roote:
In shewe and sent pale violets,
VVhose steppe on earth all beautie sets.
But back vnto her back, my Muse,
VVhere Ledas swanne his feathers mewes,
Along whose ridge such bones are met,
Like comfits round in marchpane set.
Her shoulders be like two vvhite Doues,
Pearching vvithin square royall rooues,
VVhich leaded are vvith siluer skinne,
Passing the hate-spott Ermelin.
And thence those armes deriued are;
The Phœnix wings are not so rare
For faultlesse length, and staineleſse hewe,
Ah woe is me, my woes renewe.
Now course doth leade me to her hand,
Of my first loue the fatall band.
VVhere vvhiteneſſe doth for euer sit:
Nature herselfe enameld it.
For there vvith strange compact doth lie
VVarme snow, moist pearle, soft iuorie.
There fall those Saphir-coloured brookes,
VVhich conduit-like vvith curious crookes,
Sweet Ilands make in that sweet land.
As for the fingers of the hand,
The bloudy shaftes of Cupids warre,
VVith amatists they headed are.
Thus hath each part his beauties part,
But how the Graces doo impart
To all her limmes a speciall grace,

Becomming euerie time and place.
Which doth euen beautie beautifie,
And moſt bewitch the wrechedeye.
How all this is but a faire Inne
Of fairer gueſts, which dwell within.
Of whoſe high praiſe, and praiſefull bliſſe,
Goodneſſe the penne, heauen paper is.
The inke immortall fame doth lend:
As I began, ſo muſt I end.
No tongue can her perfections tell,
In whoſe each part all tongues may dwell.

But as Zelmane was comming to the latter end of her ſong, ſhee might ſee the ſame water-ſpaniell which before had hunted, come & fetch away one of Philocleas gloues; whoſe fine proportion, ſhewed well what a daintie gueſt was wont there to be lodged. It was a delight to Zelmane, to ſee that the dogge was therewith delighted, and ſo let him go a little way withall, who quickly caried it out of ſight among certaine trees and buſhes, which were verie cloſe together. But by and by he came againe, and amongſt the raiments (Miſo and Mopſa being preparing ſheets againſt their cõming out) the dog lighted vpon a little booke of four or fiue leaues of paper, and was bearing that away too. But then Zelmane (not knowing what importance it might be of) ran after the dog, who going ſtreight to thoſe buſhes, ſhe might ſee the dog deliuer it to a Gentleman who ſecretly lay there. But ſhe haſtily comming in, the Gentleman roſe vp, & with a curteous (though ſad) countenance preſented himſelfe vnto her. Zelmanes eies ſtreight willed her minde to marke him: for ſhe thought, in her life ſhe had neuer ſeene a man of a more goodly preſence, in whom ſtrong making tooke not away delicacie, nor beautie fierceneſſe: being indeed ſuch a right manlike man, as Nature often erring, yet ſhewes ſhe would faine make. But when ſhe had a while (not without admiration) viewed him, ſhe deſired him to deliuer backe the gloue and paper, becauſe they were the Ladie Philocleas; telling him withall, that ſhe would not willingly let them know of his cloſe lying in that prohibited place, while they were bathing themſelues; becauſe ſhee knew they would be mortally offended withall. Faire Ladie (anſwered he) the worſt of the complaint is already paſſed, ſince I feele of my fault in my ſelfe the puniſhment. But for theſe things I aſſure you, it was my dogs wanton boldnes, not my preſumption. With that he gaue her backe the paper: But for the gloue (ſaid he) ſince it is my Ladie Philocleas, giue me leaue to keepe it, ſince my hart cannot perſwade it ſelf to part from it. And I pray you tell the Lady (Lady indeed of all my deſires) that owes it, that I will direct my life to honour this gloue with ſeruing her. O villaine (cried out Zelmane, madded with finding an vnlooked-for Riuall, and that he would make her a meſſenger) diſpatch (ſaid ſhe) and deliuer it, or by the life of her that owes it, I wil make thy ſoule (though too baſe a price) pay for it. And with that drew out her ſword, which (Amazon-like) ſhe euer ware about her. The Gentleman retired him ſelf into an open place frõ among the buſhes; & then drawing out his too, he offred to deliuer it vnto her, ſaying withall, God forbid I ſhould vſe my ſword againſt you, ſince (if I be not deceiued) you are the ſame famous Amazon, that both defended my Ladies iuſt title of beautie againſt the valiant Phalantus, and ſaued her life in killing the Lion: therefore I am rather to kiſſe your hands, with acknowledgeging my selfe bound to obey you. But this curtesie was worse then a bastonado to Zelmane: so that againe with ragefull eyes she bad him defend him selfe, for no lesse then his life should answere it. A hard case (said he) to teach my sword that lesson, which hath euer vsed to turne it selfe to a shield in a Ladies presence. But Zelmane, harkening to no more wordes, began with such wittie furie to pursue him with blowes and thrusts, that Nature and Vertue commanded the Gentleman to looke to his safetie. Yet still courtesie, that seemed incorporate in his heart, would not be perswaded by daunger to offer any offence, but only to stand vpon the best defensiue gard he could; somtimes going backe, being content in that respect to take on the figure of cowardise; somtime with strong and well-met wardes; somtime cunning auoidings of his body; and somtimes faining some blowes, which himself puld backe before they needed to be withstood. And so with play did he a good while fight against the fight of Zelmane, who (more spited with that curtesie, that one that did nothing should be able to resist her) burned away with choller any motions, which might grow out of her own sweet disposition, determining to kill him if he fought no better; and so redoubling her blowes, draue the stranger to no other shift then to ward, & go backe; at that time seeming the image of innocencie against violence. But at length he found, that both in publike & priuate respects, who stands only vpō defence, stands vpō no defence: for Zelmane seeming to strike at his head, and he going to ward it, withall stept back as he was accustomed, she stopt her blow in the aire, and sodainly turning the point, ran full at his breast; so as he was driuen with the pōmell of his sword (hauing no other weapon of defence to beat it downe: but the thrust was so strong, that he could not so wholy beate it away, but that it met with his thigh, thorow which it ranne. But Zelmane retiring her sworde, and seeing his bloud, victorious anger was conquered by the before-conquered pittie; and hartily sorie, and euen ashamed with her selfe she was, considering how little he had done, who well she found could haue done more. In so much that she said, truly I am sorie for your hurt, but your selfe gaue the cause, both in refusing to deliuer the gloue, and yet not fighting as I know you could haue done. But (said she) becaus I perceiue you disdayne to fight with a woman, it may be before a yeare come about, you shall meet with a neere kinsman of mine, Pyrocles Prince of Macedon, and I giue you my worde, he for me shall maintaine this quarell against you. I would (answered Amphialus) I had many more such hurts to meete and know that worthy Prince, whose vertue I loue and admire, though my good destiny hath not bene to see his person.

But as they were so speaking, the yong Ladies came, to whom Mopsa (curious in any thing, but her own good behauiour) hauing followed and seene Zelmane fighting, had cried, what she had seene, while they were drying themselues, and the water (with some drops) seemed to weepe, that it should part from such bodies. But they carefull of Zelmane (assuring themselues that any Arcadian would beare reuerence to them) Pamela with a noble mind, and Philoclea with a louing) hastily hiding the beauties, whereof Nature was proude, and they ashamed) they made quick worke to come to saue Zelmane. But alreadie they found them in talke, and Zelmane carefull of his wound. But when they saw him they knew it was their cosin germain, the famous Amphialus; whom yet with a sweete-graced bitternesse they blamed for breaking their fathers commaundement, especially while themselues were in such sort retired. But he craued pardon, protesting vnto them that he had oney bene to seeke solitarie places, by an extreme melancholy that had a good while poſſeſt him,and guided to that place by his ſpaniel,where while the dog hunted in the riuer,he had withdrawne himſelfe to pacifie with ſleepe his ouerwatched eyes: till a dreame waked him, and made him ſee that whereof he had dreamed, and withall not obſcurely ſignified,that he felt the ſmart of his owne doings. But Philoclea (that was euen iealous of her ſelfe for Zelmane) would needes haue her gloue,and not without ſo mightie a lowre as that face could yeeld. As for Zelmane when ſhe knew,it was Amphialus,Lord Amphialus (ſaid ſhe) I haue long deſired to know you,heretofore I muſt confeſſe with more good will, but ſtill with honoring your vertue,though I loue not your perſon: and at this time I pray you let vs take care of your wound,vpon condition you ſhal hereafter promiſe,that a more knightly combat ſhalbe performed between vs. Amphialus anſwered in honorable ſort,but with ſuch excuſing himſelfe,that more and more accuſed his loue to Philoclea, and prouoked more hate in Zelmane. But Mopſa had alreadie called certain ſhepheards not far off(who knew & well obſerued their limits)to come and help to carrie away Amphialus,whoſe wound ſuffered him not without danger to ſtraine it: and ſo he leauing himſelfe with them,departed from them,faſter bleeding in his hart, then at his wound: which bound vp by the ſheetes,wherewith Philoclea had bene wrapped, made him thank the wound,and bleſſe the ſword for that fauour.

He being gone,the Ladies (with mery anger talking, in what naked ſimplicitie their couſin had ſeene them) returned to the lodge-ward: yet thinking it too early (as long as they had any day) to breake off ſo pleaſing a companie, with going to performe a cumberſome obedience, Zelmane inuited them to the litle arbour,only reſerued for her,which they willingly did: and there ſitting, Pamela hauing a while made the lute in his language, ſhew how glad it was to be touched by her fingers, Zelmane deliuered vp the paper,which Amphialus had at firſt yeelded vnto her: and ſeeing written vpon the backſide of it, the complaint of Plangus,remembring what Dorus had told her,and deſiring to know how much Philoclea knew of her eſtate, ſhe tooke occaſion in preſenting of it, to aske whether it were any ſecret, or no. No truely (anſwered Philoclea) it is but euen an excerciſe of my fathers writing, vpon this occaſion:He was one day ſomewhile before your comming hither) walking abroad,hauing vs two with him,almoſt a mile hence; and croſſing a hie way, which comes from the cittie of Megalopolis, he ſaw this Gentleman, whoſe name is there written, one of the propreſt and beſt-graced men that euer I ſawe, being of middle age and of a meane ſtature. Hee lay as then vnder a tree, while his ſeruants were getting freſh poſt-horſes for him.It might ſeeme he was tired with the extreme trauaile he had taken, and yet not ſo tyred, that he forced to take any reſt; ſo haſty he was vpon his iourney:and withall ſo ſorrowfull,that the verie face thereof was painted in his face; which with pitifull motions, euen groanes, teares, and paſſionate talking to himſelf,moued my Father to fal in talke with him: who at firſt not knowing him,anſwered him in ſuch a deſperat phraſe of griefe, that my Father afterward tooke a delight to ſet it down in ſuch forme as you ſee: which if you reade,what you doubt of,my ſiſter and I are able to declare vnto you. Zelmane willingly opened the leaues,and red it,being written Dialogue-wiſe in this manner.

Plangus. Baſilius.

Plangus. Alas how long this pilgrimage doth laſt?
What greater ills haue now the heauens in ſtore,
To couple comming harmes with ſorrowes paſt?

Long

Long since my voice is hoarce, and throte is sore,
With cries to skies, and curses to the ground,
But more I plaine, I feele my woes the more.
Ah where was first that cruell cunning found,
To frame of Earth a vessell of the minde,
Where it should be to self-destuction bound?
What needed so high sprites such mansions blind?
Or wrapt in flesh what do they here obtaine,
But glorious name of wretched humaine-kind?
Balles to the starres, and thralles to Fortunes raigne;
Turnd from themselues, infected with their cage,
Where death is feard, and life is held with paine.
Like players pla'st to fill a filthy stage,
Where change of thoughts one foole to other shewes,
And all but iests, saue onely sorrowes rage,
The child feeles that; the man that feeling knowes,
With cries first borne, the presage of his life,
Where wit but serues, to haue true tast of woes.
A Shop of shame, a Booke where blots be rife,
This bodie is: this bodie so composed,
As in it selfe to norish mortall strife,
So diuers be the Elements disposed
In this weake worke, that it can neuer be Made vniforme to any state reposed.
Griefe only makes his wretched state to see (Euen like a toppe which nought but whipping moues)
This man, this talking beast, this walking tree,
Griefe is the stone which finest iudgement proues:
For who grieues not hath but a blockish braine,
Since cause of griefe no cause from life remoues.

Basilius. How long wilt thou with monefull musicke staine
The cheerefull notes these pleasant places yeeld,
Where all good haps a perfect state maintaine?

Plangus. Curst be good haps, and curst be they that build
Their hopes on haps, and do not make dispaire
For all these certaine blowes the surest shield.
Shall I that saw Eronaes shining haire
Torne with her hands, and those same hands of snow
With losse of purest blood themselues to teare?
Shall I that saw those brests, where beauties flow,
Swelling with sighes, made pale with mindes disease,
And saw those eyes (those Sonnes) such showres to show,
Shall I, whose eares her mournfull words did seaze,
Her words in syrup laid of sweetest breath,
Relent those thoughts which then did so displease?
No, no: Dispaire my dayly lesson saith,

And saith, although I seeke my life to flie,
Plangus must liue to see Eronaes death,
Plangus must liue some helpe for her to trie
(Though in dispaire) for loue so forceth me.
Plangus doth liue, and shall Erona dye?
Erona dye? O heauen (if heauen there be)
Hath all thy whirling course so small effect?
Serue all thy starrie eyes this shame to see?
Let dolts in haste some altars faire erect
To those high powers, which idly sit aboue,
And vertue do in greatest need neglect.

Basilius. O man, take heed, how thou the Gods do moue
To cause full wrath, which thou canst not resist.
Blasphemous words the speaker vaine do proue.
Alas while we are wrapt in foggie mist
Of our selfe-loue (so passions do deceaue)
We thinke they hurt, when most they do assist.
To harme vs wormes should that high Iustice leaue
His nature? nay, him selfe? for so it is.
What glorie from our losse can he receaue?
But still our dazeled eyes their way do misse,
While that we do at his sweete scourge repine,
The kindly way to beat vs on to blisse.
If she must dye, then hath she past the line
Of lothsom dayes, whose losse how canst thou mone,
That doost so well their miseries define?
But such we are with inwarde tempest blowne
Of windes quite contrarie in waues of will:
We mone that lost, which had we did bemone.

Plangus. And shall she dye? shall cruell fier spill
Those beames that set so many harts on fire?
Hath she not force euen death with loue to kill?
Nay euen cold Death enflame with hot desire
Her to enioy where ioy it selfe is thrall,
Will spoyll the earth of his most rich attire.
Thus Death becomes a riuall to vs all,
And hopes with foule embracements her to get,
In whose decay Vertues faire shrine must fall.
O Vertue weake, shall death his triumph set
Vpon thy spoiles, which neuer should lye wast?
Let Death first dye; be thou his worthy let.
By what eclipse shall that Sunne be defaste?
What mine hath erst thrown down so faire a tower?
What sacriledge hath such a saint disgra'st?
The world the garden is, she is the flower
That sweetens all the place; she is the gueſt

of

Of rarest price, both heau'n and earth her bower.
And shall (ô me) all this in ashes rest?
Alas, if you a Phœnix new will haue
Burnt by the Sunne, she first must buildher nest.
But vvell you know, the gentle Sunne would saue
Such beames so like his owne, which might haue might
In him, the thoughts of Phaëtons damme to graue.
Therefore, alas, you vse vile Vulcans spight,
VVhich nothing spares, to melt that Virgin-waxe, VVhich while it is, it is all Asias light.
O Mars, for what doth serue thy armed axe?
To let that wit-old beast consume in flames
Thy Venus childe, whose beautie Venus lacks?
O Venus (if her praise no enuy frames,
In thy high minde) get her thy husbands grace.
" Sweete speaking oft a currish harte reclaimes.
O eyes of mine, where once she saw her face,
Her face which was more liuely in my heart;
O braine, where thought of her hath onely place;
O hand, which toucht her hand when we did part;
O lippes, that kist that hand with my teares sprent;
O toung, then dumbe, not daring tell my smart;
O soule whose loue in her is onely spent,
VVhat ere you see, think, touch, kisse, speake, or loue,
Let all for her, and vnto her be bent.

Basilius. Thy wailing words do much my spirits moue,
They vttred are in such a feeling fashion,
That sorrowes work against my will I proue.
Me-thinkes I am partaker of thy passion,
And in thy ease do glasse mine owne debilitie:
Selfe-guiltie folke most prone to feele compassion.
Yet Reason saith, Reason should haue abilitie
To hold these wordly things in such proportion,
As let them come or go with euen facilitie.
But our Desires tyrannicall extortion
Doth force vs there to set our chiefe delightfulnes,
VVhere but a baiting place is all our portion.
But still, although we faile of perfect rightfulnes,
Seeke we to tame these childish superfluities:
Let vs not winke though void of purest sightfulnes.
For what can breed more peeuish incongruities,
Then man to yeeld to female lamentations?
Let vs some Grammar learne of more congruities.

Plangus. If through mine eares pierce any consolation,
By wise discourse, sweete tunes, or Poets fiction;
If ought I cease these hideous exclamations,

VVhile that my ſoule, she, she liues in affliction;
Then let my life long time on earth maintained be,
To wrecched me, the laſt worſt malediction.
Can I, that knew her ſacred partes, reſtrained be
From any ioy? know fortunes vile diſplacing her,
In morall rules let raging woes contained be?
Can I forget, when they in priſon placing her,
VVith ſwelling heart in ſpite and due diſdainfulneſſe
She lay for dead, till I helpt with vnlacing her?
Can I forget from how much mourning painfulneſſe
VVith Diamond in window-glaſſe she graued,
Erona dye, and end this ougly painfulneſſe?
Can I forget in how ſtrange phraſe she craued
That quickly they would her burne, drowne, or ſmother,
As if by death she onely might be ſaued?
Then let me eke forget one hand from other:
Let me froget that Plangus I am called:
Let me forget I am ſonne to my mother,
But if my memory muſt thus be thralled
To that ſtrange ſtroke which conquer'd all my ſenſes,
Can thoughts ſtill thinking, ſo reſt vnappalled?

Baſilius. VVho ſtill doth ſeeke againſt him ſelfe offences,
VVhat pardon can auaile? or who imployes him
To hurt himſelfe, what shields can be defences?
VVoe to poore man: ech outward thing annoyes him
In diuers kinds; yet as he were not filled,
He heapes in outward griefe, that moſt deſtroyes him.
Thus is our thought with paine for thiſtles tilled:
Thus be our nobleſt parts dryed vp with ſorrow:
Thus is our minde with too much minding ſpilled.
One day layes vp ſtuffe of griefe for the morrow:
And vvhoſe good haps do leaue him vnprouided,
Condoling cauſe of friendship he will borrow,
Betwixt the good and shade of good diuided,
VVe pittie deeme that which but vveakenes is:
So are we from our high creation ſlided.
But Plangus leſt I may your ſickneſſe miſſe
Or rubbing, hurt the ſore, I here do end.
The aſſe did hurt when he did thinke to kiſſe.

When Zelmane had read it ouer, maruelling verie much of the ſpeech of Eronas death, and therefore deſirous to know further of it, but more deſirous to heare Philoclea ſpeake, Moſt excellent Ladie (ſaid ſhe) one may be little the wiſer for reading this Dialogue, ſince it neither ſets foorth what this Plangus is, nor what Erona is, nor what the cauſe ſhould be which threatens her with death, & him with ſorow: therefore I would humbly craue to vnderſtand the particular diſcourſe therof: becauſe (I muſt confeſſe) ſomething in my trauaile I haue hard of this ſtrange matter, which I would be glad to find by so sweet an authoritie confirmed. The truth is (answered Philoclea) that after he knew my father to be Prince of this country, while he hoped to preuaile something with him in a great request he made vnto him, he was content to open fullie the estate both of himselfe, and of that Lady; which with my sisters help (said she) who remembers it better then I, I will declare vnto you: & first of Erona (being the chiefe subiect of this discourse) this storie (with more tears and exclamations then I list to spend about it) she recounted.

Of late there raigned a king in Lydia, who had for the blessing of his mariage, this onely daughter of his, Erona; a Princesse worthie for her beautie, as much praise, as beautie may be praise-worthie. This Princesse Erona, being 19 yeares of age, seeing the countrie of Lydia so much deuoted to Cupid, as that in euerie place his naked pictures and images were superstitiously adored (either moued thereunto by the esteeming that could be no Godhead, which could breed wickednes, or the shamefast consideration of such nakednesse) procured so much of her father, as vtterlie to pull downe, and deface all those statues and pictures. Which how terribly he punished (for to that the Lydians impute it) quickly after appeared.

For she had not liued a yeare longer, when she was stricken with most obstinate Loue, to a young man but of meane parentage, in her fathers court, named Antiphilus: so meane, as that he was but the sonne of her Nurse, and by that means (without other desert) became knowne of her. Now so euill could she conceale her fire, and so wilfullie persewered she in it, that her father offering her the mariage of the great Tiridates king of Armenia (who desired her more then the ioyes of heauen) she for Antiphilus sake refused it. Many wayes her father sought to withdraw her from it; sometimes perswasions, somtimes threatnings; once hiding Antiphilus, and giuing her to vnderstand that he was fled the countrie: lastly, making a solemne execution to be done of another, vnder the name of Antiphilus, whō he kept in prison. But neither she liked perswasions, nor feared threatnings, nor changed for absence: & when she thought him dead, she sought all means (as well by poyson as knife) to send her soule, at least, to be maried in the eternall Church with him. This so brake the tender fathers heart, that (leauing things as he found them) he shortly after died. Then forthwith Erona (being seized of the crowne, and arming her will with authoritie) sought to aduance her affection to the holie title of matrimonie.

But before she could accomplish all the solemnities, she was ouertaken with a warre the king Tiridates made vpō her, only for her person; towards whom (for her ruine) Loue had kindled his cruell heart, indeed cruell and tyrannous: for (being far too strong in the field) he spared not man, woman, and child, but (as though there could be found no foile to set forth the extremitie of his loue, but extremitie of hatred) wrote, as it were, the sonets of his Loue in the bloud, and tuned them in the cries of her subiects; although his faire sister Artaxia (who would accompanie him in the armie) sought all means to appease his furie: till lastlie, he besieged Erona in her best citie, vowing to win her, or lose his life. And now had he brought her to the point either of a wofull consent, or a ruinous deniall, when there came thither (following the course which Vertue and Fortune led them) two excellent young Princes, Pyrocles and Musidorus, the one Prince of Macedon, the other of Thessalia: two Princes, as Plangus said (and he witnessed his saying with sighes and teares) the most accomplished both in bodie and mind, that the Sun euer look'd vpon. While Philoclea spake those words; ô sweet words (thought Zelmane to her selfe) which are not only a praise to me, but a praise to praise it selfe, which out of that mouth issueth.

Theſe two Princes (ſaid Philoclea) aſwell to help the weaker (eſpeciallie being a Ladie) as to ſaue a Greeke people from being ruined by ſuch, whom we call and count barbarous, gathering together ſuch of the honeſteſt Lycians, as would venture their liues to ſuccour their Princeſſe: giuing order by a ſecret meſſage they ſent into the citie, that they ſhold iſſue with all force at an appointed time; they ſet vpon Tiridates campe, with ſo well guided a fierceneſſe, that being of both ſides aſſaulted, he was like to be ouerthrowne: but that this Plangus (being Generall of Tiridates horſmen) eſpecially ayded by the two mightie men Euardes and Barzanes, reſcued the footmen, euen almoſt defeated: but yet could not barre the Princes (with their ſuccours both of men and victuall) to enter the citie.

Which when Tiridates found would make the warre long, (which length ſeemed to him worſe then a languiſhing conſumption) he made a challenge of three Princes in his retinue, againſt thoſe two Princes and Antiphilus: and that thereupon the quarrell ſhould be decided, with compact, that neither ſide ſhould help his fellow: but of whoſe ſide the more ouercame, with him the victorie ſhould remaine. Antiphilus (though Erona choſe rather to bide the brunt of warre, then venture him, yet) could not for ſhame refuſe the offer, eſpecially ſince the two ſtrangers that had no intereſt in it, did willingly accept it: beſides that, he ſaw it like enough, that the people (wearie of the miſeries of war) would rather giue him vp, if they ſaw him ſhrink, then for his ſake venture their ruine: conſidering that the challengers were farre of greater worthineſſe then himſelfe. So it was agreed vpon; and againſt Pyrocles was Euardes king of Bithinia; Barzanes of Hircania againſt Muſidorus, two men, that thought the world ſcarce able to reſiſt them: and againſt Antiphilus he placed this ſame Plangus, being his owne couſin germane, and ſonne to the king of Iberia. Now ſo it fell out, that Muſidorus ſlew Barzanes, and Pyrocles Euardes; which victory thoſe Princes eſteemed aboue all that euer they had: but of the other ſide Plangus tooke Antiphilus priſoner: vnder which colour (as if the matter had bene equall, though indeed it was not, the greater part being ouercome of his ſide) Tiridates continued his warre: and to bring Erona to a compelled yeelding, ſent her word that he would the third morow after, before the walles of the town ſtrike off Antiphilus head without his ſuite in that ſpace were granted; adding withall (becauſe he had heard of her deſperate affectiō) that if in the meane time ſhe did her ſelfe any hurt, what tortures could be deuiſed ſhould be laid vpon Antiphilus.

Then lo if Cupid be a God, or that the tyrannie of our owne thoughts ſeeme as a God vntovs: but whatſoeuer it was, then it did ſet forth the miſerableneſſe of his effects: ſhe being drawne to two contraries by one cauſe: for the loue of him commaunded her to yeeld to no other: the loue of him commaunded her to preſerue his life: which knot might well be cut, but vntied it could not be. So that loue in her paſſions (like a right make-bate) whiſpered to both ſides arguments of quarrell. What (ſaid he of the one ſide) doeſt thou loue Antiphilus, ô Erona? and ſhall Tiridates enioy thy bodie? With what eyes wilt thou looke vpon Antiphilus, when he ſhall know that another poſſeſſeth thee? But if thou wilt do it, canſt thou do it? canſt thou force thy heart? Thinke with thy ſelfe, if this man haue thee, thou ſhalt neuer haue more part of Antiphilus then if he were dead. But thus much more, that the affection ſhall be ſtill gnawing, and the remorſe ſtill preſent. Death perhaps wil coole the rage of thy affection: where thus, thou ſhalt euer loue, and euer lacke. Thinke this beſide, if thou marie Tiridates, Antiphilus is ſo excellēt a man, that long he cannot be from being in ſome high place maried; canſt thou ſuffer that too? If another kill him, he doth him the wrong: if thou abuſe thy body, thou dooſt him the wrong. His death is a worke of nature, and either now, or at another time he ſhal die. But it ſhalbe thy worke, thy ſhameſull worke, which is in thy power to ſhun, to make him liue to ſee thy faith falſified, and his bed defiled. But when Loue had well kindled that party of her thoughts, then went he to the other ſide. What (ſayd he) O Erona, and is thy Loue of Antiphilus come to that point, as thou doſt now make it a queſtion, whether he ſhall die, or no? O excellent affection, which for too much loue, will ſee his head off. Marke well the reaſons of the other ſide, and thou ſhalt ſee, it is but loue of thy ſelfe which ſo diſputeth. Thou canſt not abide Tiridates: this is but loue of thy ſelfe: thou ſhalt bee aſhamed to looke vpon him afterwards; this is but feare of ſhame, and loue of thy ſelfe: thou ſhalt want him as much then; this is but loue of thy ſelfe: he ſhalbe married; if he be well, why ſhould that grieue thee, but for loue of thy ſelfe? No, no, pronounce theſe words if thou canſt, let Antiphilus die. Then the images of each ſide ſtood before her vnderſtanding; one time ſhee thought ſhe ſaw Antiphilus dying: another time ſhe thought Antiphilus ſaw her by Tiridates enioyed: twenty times calling for a ſeruant to carry meſſage of yeelding, but before he came the mind was altered. She bluſht when ſhe conſidered the effect of granting; ſhe was pale, when ſhee remembred the fruits of denying. For weeping, ſighing, wringing her hands, and tearing her haire, were indifferent of both ſides. Eaſily ſhe would haue agreed to haue broken all diſputations with her owne death, but that the feare of Antiphilus furder torments ſtaied her. At length, euen the euening before the day appointed of his death, the determination of yeelding preuailed, eſpecially, growing vpon a meſſage of Antiphilus; who with all the coniuring termes he could deuiſe, beſought her to ſaue his life, vpon any conditiõs. But ſhe had no ſooner ſent her meſſenger to Tiridates, but her mind changed, & ſhe went to the two yong Princes, Pyrocles & Muſidorus, & falling downe at their feete, deſired them to try ſome way for her deliuerance; ſhewing her ſelfe reſolued, not to ouer-liue Antiphilus, nor yet to yeeld to Tiridates.

They that knew not what ſhe had done in priuate, prepared that night accordingly: & as ſometimes it fals out, that what is inconſtancy, ſeemes cunning; ſo did this change indeed ſtand in as good ſteed as a witty diſſimulatiõ. For it made the K. as reckles, as them diligent: ſo that in the dead time of the night, the Princes iſſued out of the towne; with whom ſhe would needes go, either to die her ſelfe, or reskew Antiphilus, hauing no armor, nor weapon, but affection. And I cannot tell you how, by what deuiſe (though Plangus at large deſcribed it) the concluſion was, the wonderfull valour of the two Princes ſo preuailed, that Antiphilus was ſuccoured, & the king ſlaine. Plangus was then the chiefe man left in the campe; and therefore ſeeing no other remedy, conueied in ſafety into her coũtry Artaxia, now Queene of Armenia; who with true lamentations, made knowne to the world, that her new greatneſſe did no way comfort her in reſpect of her brothers loſſe, whom ſhe ſtudied al meanes poſſible to reuenge vpon euery one of the occaſioners, hauing (as ſhe thought) ouerthrowne her brother by a moſt abhominable treaſon. In ſomuch, that being at home, ſhe proclaimed great rewards to any priuate man, and her ſelfe in mariage to any Prince, that would deſtroy Pyrocles and Muſidorus. But thus was Antiphilus redeemed, and (though againſt the conſent of all her nobility) married to Erona; in which caſe the two Greeke Princes (being called away by another aduenture) left them.

But now me thinkes as I haue read ſome Poets, who when they intend to tell ſome horrible matter, they bid men ſhun the hearing of it; ſo if I do not deſire you to ſtop your eares from me, yet may I wel deſire a breathing time, before I am to tel the execrable treaſon of Antiphilus, that brought her to this miſerie; and withall wiſh you all, that from all mankind indeed you ſtop your eares. O moſt happy were we, if we did ſet our loues one vpon another. (And as ſhe ſpake that word, her cheeks in red letters writ more then her tongue did ſpeake.) And therefore ſince I haue named Plangus, I pray you ſiſter (ſaid ſhe) helpe me with the reſt, for I haue held the ſtage long enough; and if it pleaſe you to make his fortune knowne, as I haue done Eronas, I will after take heart againe to go on with his falſhood; and ſo betweene vs both, my Lady Zelmane ſhall vnderſtand both the cauſe and parties of this Lamentation. Nay, I beſhrow me thē (ſaid Miſo) I will none of that, I promiſe you, as long as I haue the gouernement, I will firſt haue my tale, and then my Lady Pamela, my Lady Zelmane, and my daughter Mopſa (for Mopſa was then returned frō Amphialus) may draw cuts, and the ſhorteſt cut ſpeake firſt. For I tell you, and this may be ſuffered, when you are maried, you will haue firſt and laſt word of your huſbands. The Ladies laughed to ſee with what an eager earneſtnes ſhe looked, hauing threatning not only in her ferret eyes, but while ſhe ſpake, her noſe ſeeming to threaten her chin, and her ſhaking lims one to threaten another. But there was no remedie, they muſt obey: & Miſo ſitting on the ground with her knees vp, and her hands vpō her knees) tuning her voice with manie a quauering cough, thus diſcourſed vnto thē. I tell you true (ſaid ſhe) whatſoeuer you think of me, you wil one day be as I am; and I, ſimple though I ſit here, thought once my penie as good ſiluer, as ſome of you do: and if my father had not plaid the haſtie foole (it is no lie I tell you) I might haue had another-gaines husband then Dametas. But let that paſſe, God amend him: and yet I ſpeake it not without good cauſe. You are full in your tittle tattlings of Cupid: here is Cupid, and there is Cupid. I will tell you now what a good olde woman told me, what an olde wiſe man told her, what a great learned clearke told him, and gaue it him in writing; and here I haue it in my prayer booke. I pray you (ſaid Philoclea) let vs ſee it & read it. No haſt but good (ſaid Miſo) you ſhal firſt know how I came by it. I was a young girle of a ſeuen and twenty yeare old, & I could not go through the ſtreet of our village, but I might heare the young men talke: O the pretie litle eyes of Miſo: ô the fine thin lips of Miſo: ô the goodly fat hands of Miſo; beſides, how well a certaine wrying I had of my necke became me. Then the one would winke with one eye, and the other caſt dayſies at me: I muſt confeſſe ſeeing ſo many amorous, it made me ſet vp my peacockes taile with the higheſt. Which when this good old woman perceiued (ô the good wold woman, well may the bones reſt of the good wold woman) ſhe cald me to her into her houſe. I remember full well it ſtood in the lane as you go to the Barbers ſhop, all the towne knew her, there was a great loſſe of her: ſhe called me to her, and taking firſt a ſop of wine to comfort her heart (it was of the ſame wine that comes out of Candia, which we pay ſo deare for now a dayes, and in that good world was verie good cheape) ſhe cald me to her; Minion ſaid ſhe (indeed I was a prety one in thoſe dayes, though I ſay it) I ſee a number of lads that loue you: Well (ſaid ſhe) I ſay no more: do you know what Loue is; With that ſhe brought me into a corner, where there was painted a foule fiend I trow: for he had a paire of hornes like a Bull, his feet clouen, as manie eyes vpon his bodie, as my gray mare hath dappels, and for all the world ſo placed. This monſter ſate like a hangman vpon a paire of gallowes, in his right hand he was painted holding a crown of Laurel, in his left hand a purſe of money, & out of his mouth hung

hung a lace of two faire pictures, of a man and a woman, and ſuch a countenance he ſhewed, as if he would perſwade folkes by thoſe alurements to come thither and be hanged. I, like a tender hearted wench skriked out for feare of the diuell. Well (ſaid ſhe) this ſame is euen Loue: therfore do what thou liſt with all thoſe fellowes, one after another; & it reckes not much what they do to thee, ſo it be in ſecret; but vpon my charge, neuer loue none of them. Why mother (ſaid I) could ſuch a thing come frō the bellie of the faire Venus? for a few dayes before, our Prieſt (betweene him and me) had told me the whole ſtorie of Venus. Tuſh (ſaid ſhe) they are all deceiued: and therewith gaue me this booke, which ſhe ſaid, a great maker of ballads had giuē to an old Painter, who for a litle pleaſure, had beſtowed both booke and picture of her. Reade there (ſaid ſhe) and thou ſhalt ſee that his mother was a cow, & the falſe Argus his father. And ſo ſhe gaue me this booke, and there now you may reade it. With that the remembrance of the good olde woman, made her make ſuch a face to weepe, as if it were not ſorow, it was the carkaſſe of ſorow that appeared there. But while her teares came out, like raine falling vpon durtie furrowes, the latter end of her prayer booke was read among theſe Ladies, which contained this.

POore Painters oft vvith ſillie Poets ioyne,
To fill the world vvith ſtraunge but vaine conceits:
One brings the ſtuffe, the other ſtamps the coine,
Which breeds nought elſe but gloſes of deceits.
Thus Painters Cupid paint, thus Poets do
A naked God, blind, young vvith arrowes two.
Is he a God, that euer flies the light?
Or naked he, diſguis'd in all vntruth?
If he be blind, how hitteth he ſo right?
How is he young, that tam'd old Phœbus youth?
But arrowes two, and tipt with gold or lead?
Some hurt, accuſe a third with hornie head.
No, nothing ſo; an old falſe knaue he is,
By Argus got on Io, then a Cow:
What time for her Iuno her Ioue did miſſe,
And charge of her to Argus did allow.
Mercurie kill'd his falſe ſire for this act,
His damme a beaſt vvas pardon'd beaſtlie fact.
With fathers death, and mothers guiltie ſhame,
With Ioues diſdaine at ſuch a riuals ſeed:
The vvretch compeld, a runnagate became,
And learn'd vvhat ill a miſer ſtate doth breed:
To lie, to ſteale, to prie, and to accuſe,
Naught in himſelfe each other to abuſe.
Yet beares he ſtill his parents ſtately gifts,
A horned head, clouen feet, and thouſand eyes,
Some gazing ſtill, ſome winking wilie ſhifts,
With long large eares, where neuer rumour dies.
His horned head doth ſeeme the heauen to ſpight,
His clouen foot doth neuer tread aright.
Thus halfe a man, with man he dayly haunts,

Cloth'd in the shape which ſooneſt may deceiue:
Thus halfe a beaſt, ech beaſtly vice he plants,
In thoſe weake hearts that his aduice receiue.
He proules each place ſtill in new colours deckt,
Sucking ones ill, another to infect.
To narrow breaſts he comes all wrapt in gaine:
To ſwelling harts he shines in honours fire:
To open eyes all beauties he doth raine;
Creeping to each with flattering of deſire,
But for that Loue is worſt which rules the eyes,
Thereon his name, there his chiefe triumph lyes.
Millions of yeares this old driuell Cupid liues;
While ſtill more wreeth, more wicked he doth proue:
Till now at length that Ioue him office giues,
(At Iunos ſuite, who much did Argus loue)
In this our world a hang-man for to be,
Of all thoſe fooles, that will haue all they ſee.

The Ladies made ſport at the deſcription and ſtorie of Cupid. But Zelmane could ſcarce ſuffer thoſe blaſphemies (as ſhe took them) to be read, but humbly beſought Pamela ſhe wold performe her ſiſters requeſt of the other part of the ſtorie. Noble Lady (anſwered ſhe, beautifying her face with a ſweet ſmiling, and the ſweetneſſe of her ſmiling with the beauty of her face) ſince I am borne a Princes daughter, let me not giue example of diſobedience. My gouerneſſe will haue vs draw cuts, and therfore I pray you let vs do ſo: and ſo perhaps it will light vpon you to entertaine this companie with ſome ſtorie of your owne; and it is reaſon our eares ſhould be willinger to heare, as your tongue is abler to deliuer. I will thinke (anſwered Zelmane) excellent Princeſſe, my tongue of ſome value, if it can procure your tongue thus much to fauour me. But Pamela pleaſantlie perſiſting to haue Fortune their iudge, they ſet hands, & Mopſa (though at the firſt for ſqueamiſhneſſe going vp & downe, with her head like a bote in a ſtorme) put to her golden gols among them, and blind Fortune (that ſaw not the colour of them) gaue her the preheminence: and ſo being her time to ſpeake (wiping her mouth, as there was good cauſe) ſhe thus tumbled into her matter. In time paſt (ſaid ſhe) there was a king, the mightieſt man in all his countrie, that had by his wife, the faireſt daughter that did euer eat pap. Now this king did keepe a great houſe, that euerie body might come and take their meat freely. So one day, as his daughter was ſitting in her window, playing vpon a harpe, as ſweete as anie Roſe; and combing her head with a combe all of precious ſtones, there came in a Knight into the Court, vpon a goodly horſe, one haire of gold, and the other of ſiluer; and ſo the knight caſting vp his eyes to the window, did fall into ſuch loue with her, that hee grew not worth the bread he eate; till many a ſorie day going ouer his head, with Dayly Diligence and Grieſlie Grones, he wan her affection, ſo that they agreed to run away together. And ſo in May when all true harts reioyce, they ſtale out of the Caſtell, without ſtaying ſo much as for their breakfaſt. Now forſooth, as they went togither, oftē all to kiſſing one another, the Knight told her, he was brought vp among the water-Nymphs, who had ſo bewitched him, that if he were euer askt his name, he muſt preſently vaniſh away: and therfore charged her vpon his bleſſing, that ſhe neuer aske him what he was, nor whither he would.

And

And so a great while she kept his commandement; till once, passing through a cruell wildernesse, as darke as pitch; her mouth so watred, that she could not chuse but aske him the question. And then, he making the grieuousest complaints that would haue melted a tree to haue heard them, vanisht quite away: and she lay downe, casting forth as pitifull cries as any shrich-owle. But hauing laien so (wet by the raine, & burnt by the Sun) fiue dayes, and fiue nights, shee gat vp and went ouer many a high hill, and many a deepe riuer; till she came to an Aunts house of hers; and came, and cried to her for helpe: and she for pitty gaue her a Nut, and bad her neuer open her Nut, till she was come to the extreamest misery that euer tongue could speake of. And so she went, and she went, & neuer rested the euening, where she went in the morning; till she came to a second Aunt; and she gaue her another Nut.

Now good Mopsa (said the sweete Philoclea) I pray thee at my request keepe this tale, till my marriage day, and I promise thee that the best gowne I weare that day shalbe thine. Mopsa was very glad of the bargaine, especially that it should grow a festiuall Tale: so that Zelmane, who desired to find the vttermost what these Ladies vnderstood touching her selfe, and hauing vnderstood the danger of Erona (of which before she had neuer heard) purposing with her self (as soone as this pursuit she now was in, was brought to any effect) to succour her, intreated againe, that shee might know as well the story of Plangus, as of Erona. Philoclea referred it to her sisters perfecter remembrance, who with so sweet a voice, & so winning a grace, as in themselues were of most forcible eloquence to procure attention, in this maner to their earnest request soone condiscended.

The father of this Prince Plangus as yet liues, and his king of Iberia: a man (if the iudgement of Plangus may be accepted) of no wicked nature, nor willingly doing euill, without himself mistake the euil, seeing it disguised vnder some forme of goodnesse. This Prince, being married at the first to a Princesse (who both from her aunc̃esters, and in her selfe was worthy of him) by her had this son Plangus. Not long after whose birth, the Queene (as though she had performed the message for which she was sent into the world) returned againe vnto her maker. The king (sealing vp all thoughts of loue vnder the image of her memory) remained a widdower many yeres after; recompencing the griefe of that disioyning from her, in conioyning in himselfe both a fatherly and a motherly care toward her only child Plangus. Who being growne to mans age, as our owne eyes may iudge, could not but fertilly requite his fathers fatherly education.

This Prince (while yet the errors in his nature were excused by the greenenesse of his youth, which tooke all the fault vpon it selfe) loued a priuate mans wife of the principall City of that kingdome, if that may bee called loue, which he rather did take into himselfe willingly, then by which he was taken forcibly. It sufficeth, that the yong mā perswaded himself he loued her: she being a womā beautifull enough if it be possible, that the only outside can iustly entitle a beauty. But finding such a chase as only fled to bee caught, the young Prince brought his affection with her to that point, which ought to engraue remorse in her hart, & to paint shame vpon her face. And so possest he his desire without any interruption; he constantly fauouring her, and she thinking, that the enameling of a Princes name, might hide the spots of a broken wedlocke. But as I haue seene one that was sicke of a sleeping disease, could not be made wake, but with pinching of him: so out of his sinfull sleepe his mind (vnworthy so to be lost (was not to bee cald to it selfe, but by a sharpe accident. It fell out, that his many-times leauing of the court (in vndue times) began to be noted; and (as Princes eares be manifold) from one to another came vnto the king; who (carefull of his onlie sonne) sought, and found by his spies (the necessarie euill seruants to a king) what it was, whereby he was from his better delights so diuerted. Wherupon, the king (to giue his fault the greater blow) vsed such means by disguising himselfe, that he found thē (her husband being absent) in her house together: which he did, to make him the more feelingly ashamed of it. And that way he tooke, laying threatnings vpon her, and vpon him reproches. But the poore young Prince (deceiued with that young opinion, that if it be euer lawfull to lie, it is for ones Louer,) employed all his wit to bring his father to a better opinion. And because he might bend him from that (as he counted it) crooked conceit of her, he wrested him, as much as he could possiblie, to the other side: not sticking with prodigall protestations to set forth her chastitie; not denying his owne attempt, but thereby the more extolling her vertue. His Sophistrie preuailed, his father beleeued, and so beleeued, that ere long (though he were already stept into the winter of his age) he found himselfe warme in those desires, which were in his sonne far more excusable. To be short, he gaue himselfe ouer vnto it; and (because he would auoid the odious comparison of a young riuall) sent away his sonne with an armie, to the subduing of a Prouince lately rebelled against him, which he knew could not be a lesse worke then of three or foure yeares. Wherein he behaued him so worthilie, as euen to this countrie the fame thereof came, long before his owne comming: while yet his father had a speedier successe, but in a farre vnnobler conquest. For while Plangus was away, the old man (growing only in age and affection) followed his suit with all means of vnhonest seruants, large promises, and each thing else that might helpe to counteruaile his owne vnlouelinesse.

And she (whose husband about that time died) forgetting the absent Plangus, or at least not hoping of him to obtaine so aspiring a purpose, left no arte vnused, which might keepe the line from breaking, whereat the fish was already taken, not drawing him violently, but letting him play himselfe vpon the hooke, which he had so greedily swallowed. For, accompanying her mourning garments with a dolefull countenance, yet neither fogetting handsomnesse in her mourning garments, nor sweetnesse in her dolefull countenance; her words were euer seasoned with sighes, and any fauour she shewed, bathed in teares, that affection might see cause of pitie, and pitie might perswade cause of affection. And being growne skilfull in his humours, she was no lesse skilfull in applying his humours: neuer suffering his feare to fall to a dispaire nor his hope to hasten to an assurance: she was content he should thinke that she loued him; & a certaine stolne looke should sometimes (as though it were against her will) bewray it: But if therevpon he grew bold, he straight was encountred with a maske of vertue. And that which seemeth most impossible vnto me (for as neare as I can repeat it as Plangus told it) she could not onlie sigh when she would, as all can do, & weepe when she would, as (they say) some can do; but being most impudent in her heart) she could, when she wold, teach her cheeks blushing, and make shamefastnesse the cloke of shamelesnesse. In sum, to leaue out many particularities which he recited, she did not only vse so the spurre, that his desire ran on; but so the bit, that it ran on euen in such a careere as she would haue it; that within a while the king, seeing with no other eies but such as she gaue him, & thinking on no other thoughts, but such as she taught him; hauing at first liberal measure of fauors, thē shortened of thē, whē most his desire was inflam'd; he saw no other way but mariage to satisfie his longing, & her mind (as he thought) louing, but chastly louing: so that by the time Plangus returned from being notably victorious of the Rebels, he found his father, not only maried, but already a father of a ſonne and a daughter by this woman. Which though Plangus (as he had euery way iuſt cauſe) was grieued at; yet did his griefe neuer bring foorth either contemning of her, or repining at his father. But ſhe (who beſides ſhe was growne a mother, and a ſtepmother, did reade in his eyes her owne fault, and made his conſcience her guiltines) thought ſtill that his preſence caried her condemnation: ſo much the more, as that ſhe (vnchaſtly attempting his wonted fancies found (for the reuerence of his fathers bed) a bitter refuſall: which breeding rather ſpite then ſhame in her, or if it were a ſhame, a ſhame not of the fault, but of the repulſe, ſhe did not only (as hating him) thirſt for a reuenge, but (as fearing harme from him) endeuored to do harme vnto him. Therefore did ſhe trie the vttermoſt of her wicked wit, how to ouerthrow him in the foundation of his ſtrength, which was, in the fauour of his father: which becauſe ſhe ſaw ſtrong both in nature and deſert, it required the more cunning how to vndermine it. And therefore (ſhunning the ordinary trade of hireling ſycophants) ſhe made her praiſes of him, to be accuſations; & her aduancing him, to be his ruine. For firſt with words (neerer admiration then liking) ſhe would extoll his excellencies, the goodlineſſe of his ſhape, the power of his wit, the valiantneſſe of his courage, the fortunateneſſe of his ſucceſſes: ſo as the father might find in her a ſingular loue towards him: nay, ſhe ſhunned not to kindle ſome few ſparkes of iealouſie in him. Thus hauing gotten an opinion in his father, that ſhee was farre from meaning miſchiefe to the ſonne, then fell ſhe to praiſe him with no leſſe vehemency of affection, but with much more cunning of malice. For then ſhe ſets foorth the liberty of his mind, the high flying of his thoughts, the fitneſſe in him to beare rule, the ſingular loue the ſubiects bare him; thas it was doubtfull, whether his wit were greater in winning their fauours, or his courage in imploying their fauours: that he was not borne to liue a ſubiect-life, each action of his bearing in it Maieſty, ſuch a kingly entertainement, ſuch a kingly magnificence, ſuch a kingly heart for enterpriſes: eſpecially remembring thoſe vertues, which in a ſucceſſor are no more honoured by the ſubiects, then ſuſpected of the Princes. Then would ſhe by putting off obiections, bring in obiections to her husbands head, already infected with ſuſpition. Nay (would ſhe ſay) I dare take it vpon my death, that he is no ſuch ſonne, as many of like might haue bin, who loued greatneſſe ſo well, as to build their greatneſſe vpon their fathers ruine. Indeed Ambition, like Loue, can abide no lingring, and euer vrgeth on his owne ſucceſſes; hating nothing, but what may ſtop them. But the Gods forbid, we ſhould euer once dreame of any ſuch thing in him, who perhaps might be content, that you and the world ſhold know, what he cā do: but the more power he hath to hurt, the more admirable is his praiſe, that he will not hurt. Then euer remembring to ſtrengthen the ſuſpition of his eſtate with priuate iealouſie of her loue, doing him exceſſiue honor when he was in preſence, & repeating his prety ſpeeches & graces in his abſence; beſides, cauſing him to be imployed in all ſuch dangerous matters, as either he ſhould periſh in them, or if he preuailed, they ſhould increaſe his glorie: which ſhe made a weapon to wound him, vntill ſhe found that ſuſpition began already to ſpeake for it ſelfe, and that her husbands eares were growne hungry of rumours, and his eyes prying into euery accident.

Then tooke ſhe help to her of a ſeruant neare about her husband, whō ſhe knew to be of a haſty ambition, and ſuch a one, who wanting true ſufficiencie to raiſe him, would make a ladder of any miſchiefe. Him ſhe vſeth to deale more plainely in alleaging cauſes of iealouſie, making him know the fitteſt times when her huſband already was ſtirred that way. And ſo they two, with diuerſe waies, nouriſhed one humour, like Muſitians, that ſinging diuerſe parts, make one muſicke. He ſometime with fearefull countenance would deſire the king to looke to himſelfe; for that all the court and city were full of whiſperings, and expectation of ſome ſudden change, vpon what ground himſelfe knew not. Another time he would counſell the K. to make much of his ſon, and hold his fauour, for that it was too late now to keep him vnder. Now ſeeming to feare himſelfe, becauſe (he ſayd) Plangus loued none of them that were great about his father. Laſtly, breaking with him directly (making a ſorrowfull countenance, & an humble geſture beare falſe witneſſe for his true meaning) that he found, not only ſouldiery, but people weary of his gouernment, and all their affection bent vpon Plangus. Both he and the Queene concurring in ſtrange dreames, and each thing elſe, that in a mind (already perplexed) might breede aſtoniſhment: ſo that within a while, all Plangus actions began to be tranſlated into the language of ſuſpition.

Which though Plangus found, yet could he not auoid, euē contraries being driuē to draw one yoke of argument: if he were magnificent, he ſpent much with an aſpiring intent: if he ſpared, he heaped much with an aſpiring intent: if he ſpake curteouſly, he angled the peoples harts: if he were ſilent, he muſed vpon ſome daungerous plot. In ſum, if he could haue turned himſelfe to as many formes as Proteus, euery forme ſhould haue bin made hideous.

But ſo it fell out, that a meere trifle gaue them occaſion of further proceeding. The king one morning, going to a vineyard that lay along the hill whereupon his caſtle ſtood, he ſaw a vine-labourer, that finding a bough broken, tooke a branch of the ſame bough for want of another thing, and tied it about the place broken. The King asking the fellow what he did, Marry (ſaid he) I make the ſonne bind the father. This word (finding the king already ſuperſticious through ſuſpition) amazed him ſtreight, as a preſage of his owne fortune: ſo that, returning, and breaking with his wife how much he miſdoubted his eſtate, ſhe made ſuch gaine-ſaying aunſwers as while they ſtraue, ſtraue to be ouercome. But euen while the doubts moſt boiled, ſhe thus nouriſhed them.

She vnder-hand dealt with the principall men of that country, that at the great Parliament (which was then to be held) they ſhould in the name of all the eſtates perſwade the king (being now ſtept deeply into old age) to make Plangus, his aſſociate in gouernment with him: aſſuring them, that not onely ſhe would ioyne with them, but that the father himſelfe would take it kindly; charging them not to acquaint Plangus withall; for that perhaps it might be harmefull vnto him, if the king ſhould find, that he were a party. They (who thought they might do it, not only willingly, becauſe they loued him, and truly, becauſe ſuch indeede was the mind of the people, but ſafely, becauſe ſhe who ruled the king was agreed thereto) accompliſhed her counſell: ſhe indeed keeping promiſe of vehement perſwading the ſame: which the more ſhe and they did, the more ſhe knew her husband wold feare, and hate the cauſe of his feare. Plangus found this, and humbly proteſted againſt ſuch deſire, or will to accept. But the more he proteſted, the more his father thought he diſſembled, accounting his integrity to be but a cunning face of falſhood: & therefore delaying the deſire of his ſubiects, attended ſome fit occaſion to lay hands vpon his ſon: which his wife brought thus to paſſe.

She cauſed that ſame miniſter of hers to go vnto Plangus, and (enabling his words with

with great ſhew of faith, and endearing them with deſire of ſecrecie) to tell him, that he found his ruine conſpired by his ſtepmother, with certaine of the noble men of that countrey, the king himſelfe giuing his conſent, and that few dayes ſhould paſſe before the putting it in practiſe: withall diſcouering the very truth indeede, with what cunning his ſtepmother had proceeded. This agreeing with Plangus his owne opinion, made him giue him the better credit: yet not ſo far, as to flie out of his countrey (according to the naughty fellowes perſwaſion) but to attend, and to ſee further. Whereupon the fellow (by the direction of his miſtreſſe) told him one day, that the ſame night about one of the clocke, the king had appointed to haue his wife, and thoſe noble men together, to deliberate of their maner of proceeding againſt Plangus: and therefore offered him, that if himſelfe would agree, he would bring him into a place where ſhe ſhould heare all that paſſed; and ſo haue the more reaſon both to himſelfe, and to the world, to ſeeke his ſafety. The poore Plangus (being ſubiect to that onely diſaduantage of honeſt harts, credulity) was perſwaded by him: and arming himſelfe (becauſe of his late going) was cloſely conueied into the place appointed. In the meane time his ſtepmother, making al her geſtures cũningly counterfeit a miſerable affliction, ſhe lay almoſt groueling on the flower of her chãber, not ſuffering any body to comfort her; vntill they calling for her husband, and he held off with long enquiry, at length, ſhe told him (euen almoſt crying out euery word) that ſhe was weary of her life, ſince ſhe was brought to that plunge, either to conceale her husbands mother, or accuſe her ſonne, who had euer beene more deare, then a ſonne vnto her. Then with many interruptions and exclamations ſhe told him, that her ſonne Plangus (ſollici ing her in the olde affection betweene them) had beſought her to put her helping hand to the death of the king; aſſuring her, that though all the lawes in the world were againſt it, he would marry her when he were king.

She had not fully ſayd thus much, with many pitifull digreſſions, when in comes the ſame fellow, that brought Plangus: and running himſelfe out of breath, fell at the kings feete, beſeeching him to ſaue himſelfe; for that there was a man with a ſword drawne in the next roome. The king affrighted, went out, and called his gard, who entring the place, found indeed Plangus with his ſword in his hand, but not naked, but ſtanding ſuſpiciouſly inough, to one already ſuſpicious. The king (thinking he had put vp his ſworde becauſe of the noiſe) neuer tooke leaſure to heare his anſwere, but made him priſoner, meaning the next morning to put him to death in the market place.

But the day had no ſooner opened the eyes & eares of his friends & followers, but that there was a little army of them, who came, & by force deliuered him; although numbers on the other ſide (abuſed with the fine framing of their report) took armes for the king. But Plangus, though he might haue vſed the force of his friends, to reuenge his wrong, and get the crowne; yet the naturall loue of his father, and hate to make their ſuſpition ſeeme iuſt, cauſed him rather to chooſe a voluntarie exile, then to make his fathers death the purchaſe of his life: and therefore went he to Tiridates, whoſe mother was his fathers ſiſter, liuing in his Court eleuen or twelue yeares, euer hoping by his interceſſion, and his owne deſert, to recouer his fathers grace. At the end of which time, the warre of Erona happened, which my ſiſter with the cauſe thereof diſcourſed vnto you.

But his father had ſo deeply engraued the ſuſpition in his hart, that he thought his flight rather to proceed of a fearefull guiltines, then of an humble faithfulnes; & therfore continued his hate, with such vehemency, that he did euen hate his Nephew Tiridates, and afterwards his neece Artaxia, because in their Court hee receiued countenance, leauing no meanes vnattempted of destroying his son; among other, employing that wicked seruant of his, who vndertooke to empoison him. But his cunning disguised him not so well, but that the watchfull seruants of Plangus did discouer him. Whereupon the wretch was taken, and (before his well deserued execution) by torture forced to confesse the particularities of this, which in generall I haue told you.

Which confession autentically set downe (though Tiridates with solemne Embassage sent it to the king) wrought no effect. For the king hauing put the reines of the gouernment into his wiues hand, neuer did so much as reade it; but sent it streight by her to be considered. So as they rather heaped more hatred vpon Plangus, for the death of their seruant. And now finding, that his absence, & their reports had much diminished the wauering peoples affection towards Plangus, with aduancing fit persons for faction, and granting great immunities to the commons, they preuailed so farre, as to cause the sonne of the second wife, called Palladius, to be proclaimed successour, and Plangus quite excluded: so that Plangus was driuen to continue his seruing Tiridates, as he did in the warre against Erona, and brought home Artaxia, as my sister told you; when Erona by the treason of Antiphilus, But at that word she stopped. For Basilius (not able longer to abide their absence) came suddenly among them, and with smiling countenance (telling Zelmane he was affraid she had stolen away his daughters) inuited them to follow the Sunnes counsell in going then to their lodging; for indeede the Sun was ready to set. They yeelded, Zelmane meaning some other time to vnderstand the story of Antiphilus treason, and Eronas daunger, whose cause she greatly tendred. But Miso had no sooner espied Basilius, but that as spitefully, as her rotten voyce could vtter it, she set forth the sawcinesse of Amphialus. But Basilius only attended what Zelmanes opinion was, who though shee hated Amphialus, yet the nobility of her courage preuailed ouer it, and she desired he might be pardoned that youthfull error; considering the reputation he had, to be one of the best knights in the world; so as hereafter he gouerned himselfe, as one remembring his fault. Basilius giuing the infinit tearmes of praises to Zelmanes both valour in conquering, and pittifulnesse in pardoning, commanded no more words to bee made of it, since such he thought was her pleasure.

So brought he them vp to visite his wife, where betweene her and him, the poore Zelmane receiued a tedious entertainment; oppressed with being loued, almost as much, as with louing. Basilius not so wise in couering his passion, could make his tongue go almost no other pace, but to runne into those immoderate praises, which the foolish Louer thinkes short of his Mistresse though they reach farre beyond the heauens. But Gynecia (whom womanly modesty did more outwardly bridle) yet did oftentimes vse the aduantage of her sexe in kissing Zelmane, as she sate vpon her bed-side by her; which was but still more and more sweete incense, to cast vpon the fire wherein her heart was sacrificed: Once Zelmane could not stirre, but that, (as if they had beene poppets, whose motion stood onely vpon her pleasure) Basilius with seruiceable steppes, Gynecia with greedy eyes would follow her. Basilius mind Gynecia well knew, and could haue found in her hart to laugh at, if mirth could haue borne any proportion with her fortune. But all Gynecias actions were interpreted by Basilius, as proceeding from iealousie of his amorousnesse. Zelmane betwixt both (like the poore child, whose father while he beates him, will make him beleeue it is for loue; or like the ſicke man, to whom the Phiſition ſweares, the ill-taſting wallowiſh medicine he profers, is of a good taſte) their loue was hateſull, their curteſie troubleſome, their preſence cauſe of her abſence thence, where not only her light, but her life conſiſted. Alas (thought ſhe to her ſelfe) Deare Dorus, what ods is there betweene thy deſtiny and mine? For thou haſt to do in thy purſuite but with ſhepherdiſh folkes, who trouble thee with a litle enuious care, and affected diligence. But I (beſides that I haue now Miſo the worſt of thy diuels, let looſe vpon me) am waited on by Princes, and watched by the two wakefull eies of Loue and Iealouſie. Alas, incõparable Philoclea, thou euer ſeeſt me, but doſt neuer ſee me as I am: thou heareſt willingly al that I dare ſay, & I dare not ſay that which were moſt fit for thee to heare. Alas who euer but I was impriſoned in liberty, and baniſhed being ſtill preſent? To whom but me haue louers bin iaylours, & honor a captiuity?

But the night comming on with her ſilent ſteps vpon them, they parted each from other (if at leaſt they could be parted, of whom euery one did liue in another) and went about to flatter ſleepe with their beds, that diſdained to beſtow it ſelfe liberally vpon ſuch eyes which by their will would euer be looking: and in leaſt meaſure vpon Gynecia. Who (when Baſilius after long toſſing was gotten a ſleepe, and the cheerefull comfort of the lights remoued from her) kneeling vp in her bed, began with a ſoft voyce, and ſwolne hart, to renue the curſes of her birth; & then in a maner embracing her bed; Ah chaſteſt bed of mine (ſaid ſhe) which neuer heretofore couldſt accuſe me of one defiled thought, how cãſt thou now receiue this deſaſtred chãgeling? Happy, happy, be they only which be not: & thy bleſſednes only in this reſpect thou maieſt feele, that thou haſt no feeling. With that ſhe furiouſly tare off great part of her faire haire: Take here ô forgotten vertue (ſayd ſhe) this miſerable ſacrifice; while my ſoule was clothed with modeſty, that was a comely ornament: now why ſhould nature crowne that head, which is ſo wicked, as her only deſpaire is, ſhe cannot be enough wicked? More ſhe wold haue ſaid, but that Baſilius (awaked with the noiſe) took her in his armes, & began to comfort her; the good-man thinking, it was al for a iealous loue of him: which humour if ſhe would a litle haue maintained, perchance it might haue weakned his new conceiued fancies. But he finding her anſwers wandring from the purpoſe, left her to her ſelfe (glad the next morning to take the aduãtage of a ſleep, which a litle before day ouer-watched with ſorrow, her teares had as it were ſealed vp in her eyes) to haue the more conference with Zelmane, who baited on this faſhion by theſe two louers, & euer kept from any meane to declare her ſelfe, found in her ſelfe a dayly increaſe of her violent deſires; like a riuer the more ſwelling, the more his current is ſtopped.

The chiefe recreation ſhe could find in her anguiſh, was ſometime to viſite that place, where firſt ſhe was ſo happy as to ſee the cauſe of her vnhap. There would ſhe kiſſe the ground, and thanke the trees, bleſſe the ayre, & do dutifull reuerence to euery thing that ſhe thought did accompany her at their firſt meeting: then returne againe to her inward thoughts; ſometimes diſpaire darkning all her imaginations, ſometimes the actiue paſſion of loue cheering and cleering her inuention, how to vnbar that comberſome hinderance of her two ill-matched louers. But this morning Baſilius himſelfe gaue her good occaſion to go beyond them. For hauing cõbd and trickt himſelfe more curiouſly, then any time forty winters before, comming where Zelmane was, he found her giuen ouer to her muſical muſes, to the great pleaſure of the good old Baſilius, who retired himſelfe behind a tree, while ſhe with a moſt ſweete voice did vtter theſe paſſionate verſes:

LOued I am, and yet complaine of Loue:
As louing not, accus'd in Loue I die.
When pittie most I craue, I cruell proue:
Still seeking Loue, Loue found as much I flie.
Burnt in my selfe, I muse at others fire:
What I call wrong, I do the same, and more:
Bard of my will, I haue beyond desire:
I wayle for want, and yet am chokt with store.
This is thy worke, thou God for euer blind:
Though thousands old, a Boy entitled still.
Thus children do the silly birds they find,
With stroking hurt, and too much cramming kill.
Yet thus much Loue, ô Loue, I craue of thee:
Let me be lou'd, or els not loued be.

Basilius made no great haſt from behind the tree, till he perceiued ſhe had fully ended her muſicke. But then loth to looſe the precious fruite of time, he preſented himſelfe vnto her, falling downe vpon both his knees, and holding vp his hands, as the old gouerneſſe of Danae is painted, when ſhe ſuddenly ſaw the golden ſhowre, O heauenly woman, or earthly Goddeſſe (ſayd he) let not my preſence be odious vnto you, nor my humble ſuite ſeeme of ſmall weight in your eares. Vouchſafe your eies to deſcend vpon this miſerable old mã, whoſe life hath hitherto bin maintayned but to ſerue as an encreaſe of your beautifull triumphs. You only haue ouerthrowne me, & in my bondage conſiſts my glory. Suffer not your own worke to be deſpiſed of you, but looke vpon him with pitty, whoſe life ſerues for your praiſe. Zelmane (keeping a countenance aſcanſes, ſhe vnderſtood him not) told him, It became her euill to ſuffer ſuch exceſſiue reuerẽce of him, but that it worſe became her to correct him, to whom ſhe owed duety: that the opinion ſhe had of his wiſdome was ſuch, as made her eſteeme greatly of his words; but that the words themſelues ſounded ſo, as ſhe could not imagine what they might intend. Intend? (ſaid Basilius, proud that that was brought in queſtion) what may they intend, but a refreſhing of my ſoule, and a ſwaging of my heat, and enioying thoſe your excellencies, wherein my life is vpheld, & my death threatned? Zelmane lifting vp her face, as if ſhe had receiued a mortall iniury of him. And is this the deuotion your ceremonies haue bin bent vnto? ſayd ſhe: Is it the diſdaine of my eſtate, or the opinion of my lightneſſe, that haue emboldned ſuch baſe fancies towards me? enioying quoth you? now little ioy come to them that yeeld to ſuch enioying. Poore Basilius was ſo appalled, that his legges bowed vnder him; his eyes lookt as though he ſhould gladly hide himſelfe; and his old bloud going to his hart, a generall ſhaking all ouer his body poſſeſſed him. At length with a wan mouth; he was about to giue a ſtammering anſwer, when it came into Zelmanes head by this deuiſe to make her profit of his folly; and therefore with a relented countenance, thus ſayd vnto him: Your words (mighty Prince) were vnfit either for me to heare, or you to ſpeake: but yet the large teſtimony I ſee of your affection makes me willing to ſuppreſſe a great number of errors. Only thus much I thinke good to ſay, that the ſame words in my Lady Philoclea's mouth, as from one woman to another (ſo as there were no other body by) might haue had a better grace; and perchance haue found a gentler receipt.

Basilius

Basilius (whose senses by desire were held open, and conceipt was by loue quickned) heard scarcely halfe her answere out, but that (as if speedy flight might saue his life) he turned away, and ranne with all the speede his body would suffer him, towards his daughter Philoclea: whom he found at that time dutifully watching by her mother, and Miso curiously watching her; hauing left Mopsa to do the like seruice to Pamela. Basilius forthwith calling Philoclea aside, (with all the conjuring words which Desire could endite and Authoritie vtter) besought her she would preserue his life, in whom her life was begun; she would saue his gray haires from rebuke, and his aged mind from despaire; that if she were not cloyed with his companie, and that she thought not the earth ouer-burthened with him, she would coole his fierie griefe, which was to be done but by her breath. That in fine, whatsoeuer he was, he was nothing but what it pleased Zelmane; all the powers of his spirit depending of her: that if she continued cruell, he could no more sustaine his life, then the earth remaine fruitefull in the Sunnes continuall absence. He concluded, she should in one payment requite all his deserts: and that she needed not disdaine anie seruice (though neuer so meane) which was warranted by the sacred name of a father. Philoclea more glad then euer she had knowne her selfe, that she might by this occasion, enioy the priuate conference of Zelmane, yet had so sweete a feeling of vertue in her mind, that she would not suffer a vile colour to be cast ouer her faire thoughts, but with humble grace answered her father: That there needed neither promise nor perswasion to her, to make her do her vttermost for her fathers seruice: that for Zelmanes fauour, she would in all vertuous sort seeke it towards him: and that as she would not pierce further into his meaning, then himselfe should declare, so would she interpret all his doings to be accomplished in goodnesse: and therefore desired (if otherwise it were) that he would not impart it to her, who then should be forced to begin (by true obedience) a shew of disobedience: rather performing his generall commandement, which had euer beene, to embrace vertue, then any new particular, sprong out of passion, and contrary to the former. Basilius content to take that, since hee could haue no more (thinking it a great point, if by her meanes, he could get but a more free accesse vnto Zelmane) allowed her reasons, and tooke her proffer thankfully, desiring only a speedy returne of comfort. Philoclea was parting, & Miso streight behind her, like Alecto following Proserpina. But Basilius forced her to stay, though with much a do, she being sharpset vpon the fulfilling of a shrewd office, in ouer-looking Philoclea: and so sayd to Basilius, that she did as she was commanded, and could not answer it to Gynecia, if she were any whit from Philoclea: telling him true, that he did euill to take her charge from her. But Basilius (swearing he wold put out her eies, if she stird a foot to trouble his daughter) gaue her a stop for that while.

So away departed Philoclea, with a new field of fancies for her trauayling mind. For well she saw, her father was growne her aduerse party, & yet her fortune such, as she must fauour her Riuall; and the fortune of that fortune such, as neither that did hurt her, nor any contrary meane helpe her.

But she walkt but a little on, before she saw Zelmane lying vpon a banke, with her face so bent ouer Ladon, that (her teares falling into the water) one might haue thought, that she began meltingly to be metamorphosed to the vnder-running riuer. But by and by, with speech she made knowne, as well that she liued, as that she sorrowed. Faire streames (sayd she) that do vouchsafe in your cleerenesse to represent vnto me my blubbered face, let the tribute-offer of my teares vnto you, procure your ſtay a while with me, that I may beginne yet at laſt, to find ſome thing that pities me: and that all things of comfort and pleaſure do not flie away from me. But if the violence of your ſpring commaund you to haſte away, to pay your duties to your great Prince, the Sea, yet carry with you theſe few words, and let the vttermoſt ends of the world know them. A loue more cleere then your ſelues, dedicated to a loue (I feare) more cold then your ſelues, with the cleereneſſe layes a night of ſorrow vpon me; and with the coldnes enflames a world of fire within me. With that ſhe tooke a willow ſticke, and wrote in a ſandie banke theſe few verſes:

OVer theſe brookes truſting to eaſe mine eyes,
(Mine eyes euen great in labour vvith their teares)
I layde my face; my face wherein there lies
Cluſters of cloudes, which no Sunne euer cleares.
In watry glaſſe my watrie eyes I ſee:
Sorrowes ill eaſde, where ſorrowes painted be.

My thoughts impriſon'd in my ſecret woes,
With flamie breathes do iſſue oft in ſound:
The ſound to this ſtrange aier no ſooner goes,
But that it doth with Echoes force rebound,
And make me heare the plaints I would refraine:
Thus outward helps my inward griefe maintaine.

Now in this ſand I vvould diſcharge my mind,
And caſt from me part of my burdnous cares:
But in the ſand my tales foretold I find,
And ſee therein hovv well the vvriter fares.
Since ſtreame, aier, ſand, mine eyes and eares conſpire:
What hope to quench, where each thing blowes the fire?

And aſſoone as ſhe had written them (a new ſwarme of thoughts ſtinging her mind) ſhe was ready with her foote to giue the new-borne letters both death and buriall. But Philoclea (whoſe delight of hearing and ſeeing was before a ſtay from interrupting her) gaue her ſelfe to be ſeene vnto her, with ſuch a lightning of beauty vpon Zelmane, that neither ſhe could looke on, nor would looke off. At laſt Philoclea (hauing a litle muſed how to cut the threede euen, betweene her owne hopeleſſe affection, and her fathers vnbridled hope) with eyes, cheekes, and lips (whereof each ſang their part, to make vp the harmonie of baſhfulneſſe) began to ſay, My Father to whom I owe my ſelfe, and therefore, when Zelmane (making a womaniſh habite to be the Armour of her boldneſſe, giuing vp her life to the lips of Philoclea, and taking it againe by the ſweeteneſſe of thoſe kiſſes) humbly beſought her to keepe her ſpeach for a while within the Paradiſe of her mind. For well ſhee knew her fathers errand, who ſhould ſoone receiue a ſufficient anſwere. But now ſhe demaunded leaue not to looſe this long ſought-for commodity of time, to eaſe her heart thus farre, that if in her agonies her deſtinie was to be condemned by Philocleas mouth, at leaſt Philoclea might know, whom ſhe had condemned. Philoclea eaſily yeelded to graunt her owne deſire: and ſo making the greene banke

the ſituation, and the riuer the proſpect of the moſt beautifull buildings of Nature, Zelmane doubting how to begin, though her thoughts already had run to the ende, with a mind fearing the vnworthineſſe of euery word that ſhold be preſented to her eares, at length brought it forth in this maner.

Moſt beloued Lady, the incomparable excellencies of your ſelfe (waited-on by the greatneſſe of your eſtate) and the importance of the thing (whereon my life conſiſteth) doth require both many ceremonies before the beginning, and many circumſtances in the vttering my ſpeech, both bold and fearefull. But the ſmall opportunity of enuious occaſion (by the malicious eye hatefull Loue doth caſt vpon me) and the extreame bent of my affection (which will either breake out in words, or breake my heart) compell me, not only to embrace the ſmalleſt time, but to paſſe by the reſpects due vnto you, in reſpect of your poore caitifes life, who is now, or neuer to be preſerued. I do therefore vow vnto you, hereafter neuer more to omit all dutifull forme: do you only now vouchſafe to heare the matter of a minde moſt perplexed. If euer the ſound of Loue haue come to your eares, or if euer you haue vnderſtood, what force it hath had to conquer the ſtrongeſt hearts, and change the moſt ſetled eſtates: receiue here an example of thoſe ſtrange Tragedies; one, that in himſelfe containeth the particularities of all thoſe misfortunes: and from hencefoorth beleeue that ſuch a thing may be, ſince you ſhall ſee it is. You ſhall ſee (I ſay) a liuing image, and a preſent ſtory of what Loue can doe, when he is bent to ruine.

But alas, whither goeſt thou my tongue? or how doth my heart conſent to aduenture the reuealing his neereſt touching ſecret? But peace Feare, thou commeſt too late, when already the harme is taken. Therefore I ſay againe, ô onely Princeſſe, attend here a miſerable miracle of affection. Behold here before your eyes Pyrocles, Prince of Macedon, whom you onely haue brought to this game of Fortune, and vnuſed Metamorphoſis: whom you onely haue made neglect his countrie, forget his father, and laſtly, forſake to bee Pyrocles: the ſame Pyrocles, who (you heard) was betrayed by being put in a ſhippe, which being burned, Pyrocles was drowned. O moſt true preſage for theſe traytors, my eyes, putting me into a ſhip of Deſire, which dayly burneth, thoſe eyes (I ſay) which betraied me, will neuer leaue till they haue drowned me. But be not, bee not (moſt excellent Ladie) you that Nature hath made to bee the Load-ſtarre of comfort, bee not the Rocke of ſhipwracke: you whom vertue hath made the Princeſſe of felicitie, bee not the miniſter of ruine: you, whom my choiſe hath made the Goddeſſe of my ſafety, ô let not, let not, from you be powred vpon me deſtruction. Your faire face hath manie tokens in it of amazement at my words: thinke then what his amazement is, from whence they come: ſince no words can carry with them the life of the inward ſeeling. I deſire, that my deſire may bee waied in the ballances of Honour, and let Vertue hold them. For if the higheſt Loue in no baſe perſon may aſpire to grace, then may I hope your beautie will not be with pittie. If otherwiſe you bee (alas but let it be ſo) reſolued, yet ſhall not my death bee comfortleſſe, receiuing it by your ſentence.

The ioy which wrought into Pygmalions mind, while hee found his beloued, image was ſofter, and warmer in his folded armes, till at length it accompliſhed his gladneſſe with a perfect womans ſhape (ſtil beautified with the former perfections) was euen ſuch, as by each degree of Zelmanes words creepingly entred into Philoclea: till her pleaſure was fully made vp with the manifeſting of his being; which was such as in hope did ouercome Hope. Yet Doubt would faine haue playd his part in her mind, and cald in question, how she should bee assured that Zelmane was Pyrocles. But Loue streight stood vp and deposed, that a lie could not come from the mouth of Zelmane. Besides, a certaine sparke of honour, which rose in her well-disposed mind, made her feare to be alone with him, with whom alone she desired to be (with all the other contradictions growing in those minds, which neither absolutely clime the rocke of Vertue, nor freely sinke into the sea of Vanity) but that sparke soone gaue place, or at least gaue no more light in her mind, then a candle doth in the Sunnes presence. But euen sicke with a surfet ioy, and fearefull of she knew not what (as he that newly finds huge treasures, doubts whether he sleep or no; or like a fearefull Deere, which then lookes most about, when he comes to the best feede) with a shrugging kind of tremor through all her principall parts, she gaue these affectionate words for answer. Alas, how painefull a thing it is to a deuided mind to make a well-ioyned answer? how hard it is to bring inward shame to outward confession? and what handsomnesse trow you can be obserued in that speech, which is made one knowes not to whom? Shall I say ô Zelmane? Alas your words be against it. Shall I say Prince Pyrocles? wretch that I am, your shew is manifest against it. But this, this I may well say; If I had continued as I ought, Philoclea, you had either neuer bene, or euer bene Zelmane: you had either neuer attempted this change, set on with hope, or neuer discouered it, stopt with despaire. But I feare me, my behauiour ill gouerned, gaue you the first comfort: I feare me, my affection ill hid, hath giuen you this last assurance: I feare indeed, the weakenesse of my gouernment before, made you thinke such a maske would be gratefull vnto me: and my weaker gouernment since, makes you to pull off the visar. What shall I doo then? shall I seeke far-fetched inuentions? shall I labour to lay marble colours ouer my ruinous thoughts? or rather, though the pureneſſe of my virgin-mind be stained, let me keepe the true simplicity of my word. True it is, alas too true it is, ô Zelmane (for so I loue to call thee, since in that name my loue first began, and in the shade of that name my loue shall best lie hidden) that euen while so thou wert (what eye bewitched me I know not) my passions were fitter to desire, then to be desired. Shall I say then, I am sory, or that my loue must be turned to hate, since thou art turned to Pyrocles? how may that well bee, since when thou wert Zelmane, the despaire thou mightest not be thus, did most torment me. Thou hast then the victory: vse it with vertue. Thy vertue wan me; with vertue preserue me. Doost thou loue me? keepe me then still worthy to be beloued.

Then held she her tongue, and cast downe a self-accusing looke, finding, that in her selfe she had (as it were) shot out of the bow of her affection, a more quicke opening of her mind, then she minded to haue done. But Pyrocles so caried vp with ioy, that he did not enuy the Gods felicity, presented her with some iewels of right princely value, as some little tokens of his loue, and quality: and withall shewed her letters from his father king Euarchus, vnto him, which euen in the Sea had amongst his iewels bin preserued. But little needed those proofes to one, who wold haue fallē out with her self, rather then make any contrary coniectures to Zelmanes speeches; so that with such imbracements, as it seemed their soules desired to meet, and their harts to kisse, as their mouthes did: which faine Pyrocles would haue sealed with the chiefe armes of his desire, but Philoclea commanded the contrary; and yet they passed the promise of mariage.

And then at Philocleas intreaty, who was willing to purloine all occasions of remayning remaining with Zelmane, she told her the storie of her life, frō the time of their departing from Erona, for the rest she had already vnderstood of her sister. For (said she) I haue vnderstood, how you first in the companie of your noble cousin Musidorus, parted from Thessalia, and of diuerse aduentures, which with no more danger then glorie you passed through, till your comming to the succour of the Queene Erona; and the end of that warre (you might perceiue by my selfe) I had vnderstood of the Prince Plangus. But what since was the course of your doings, vntill you came, after so many victories, to make a conquest of poore me, that I know not, the fame thereof hauing rather shewed it by peeces, then deliuered any ful forme of it. Therfore, deare Pyrocles (for what can my eares be so sweetly fed with, as to heare you of you) be liberall vnto me of those things, which haue made you indeed precious to the world, and now doubt not to tell of your perils, for since I haue you heere out of them, euen the remembrance of them is pleasant. Pyrocles easily perceiued she was content with kindnesse, to put off occasion of further kindnesse; wherein Loue shewed himselfe a cowardly boy, that durst not attempt for feare of offending. But rather Loue proued himselfe valiant, that durst with the sword of reuerent dutie gaine-stand the force of so manie enraged desires. But so it was, that though hee knew this discourse was to entertaine him from a more straight parley, yet he durst not but kisse his rod, & gladly make much of that entertainement which she alotted vnto him: & therefore with a desirous sigh chastening his breast for too much desiring: Sweet Princesse of my life (said he) what Trophees, what Triumph, what Monuments, what Histories might euer make my fame yeeld so sweet a Musike to my eares, as that it pleaseth you to lend your minde to the knowledge of any thing touching Pyrocles, onely therefore of value, because he is your Pyrocles? And therfore grow I now so proud, as to thinke it worth the hearing, since you vouchsafe to giue it the hearing. Therefore (onelie height of my hope) vouchsafe to know, that after the death of Tiridates, and setling Erona in her gouernment, for setled we left her, howsoeuer since (as I perceiued by your speech the last day) the vngratefull treason of her ill-chosen husband ouerthrew her (a thing in truth neuer til this time by me either heard, or suspected) for who could thinke, without hauing such a mind as Antiphilus, that so great a beautie as Eronas (indeed excellent) could not haue held his affection? so great goodnesse could not haue bound gratefulnesse? and so high aduauncement could not haue satisfied his ambition? But therefore true it is, that wickednesse may well be compared to a bottomlesse pit, into which it is farre easier to keepe ones selfe from falling, then being fallen, to giue ones selfe any stay from falling infinitely. But for my cousin and me, vpon this cause we parted from Erona.

Euardes (the braue and mightie Prince, whom it was my fortune to kill in the combat for Erona) had three Nephewes, sonnes to a sister of his; all three set among the foremost rankes of Fame for great minds to attempt, and great force to perfourme what they did attempt, especially the eldest, by name Anaxius, to whom all men would willinglie haue yeelded the height of praise, but that his nature was such, as to bestow it vpon himselfe, before any could giue it. For of so vnsupportable a pride he was, that where his deedes might well stirre enuie, his demeanour did rather breed disdaine. And if it be true that the Gyants euer made war against heauen, he had bene a fit ensigne-bearer for that company. For nothing seemed hard to him, though impossible; and nothing vniust, while his liking was his iustice. Now he in these wars had flatly refused his aid; because he could not brooke, that the worthy Prince Plangus was by his choſen Tiridates preferred before him. For allowing no other weights, but the ſword and ſpeare in iudging of deſert, how much he eſteemed himſelfe before Plangus in that, ſo much would he haue had his allowance in his ſeruice.

But now that he vnderſtood that his vncle was ſlaine by me, I think rather ſcorne that any ſhould kill his vncle, then any kindneſſe (an vn-vſed gueſt to an arrogant ſoule) made him ſeeke his reuenge; I muſt confeſſe in maner gallant enough. For he ſent a chalenge vnto me to meet him at a place appointed, in the confines of the kingdome of Lycia, where he would proue vpon me, that I had by ſome treachery ouercome his vncle, whom elſe many hundreds ſuch as I, could not haue withſtood. Youth and ſucceſſe made me willing enough to accept anie ſuch bargaine, eſpeciallie, becauſe I had heard that your couſin Amphialus (who for ſome years hath vniuerſally borne the name of the beſt knight in the world) had diuerſe times fought with him, and neuer bene able to maiſter him; but ſo had left him, that euery man thought Anaxius in that one vertue of curteſie farre ſhort of him, in all other his match; Anaxius ſtill deeming himſelfe for his ſuperiour. Therfore to him I would go, and I would needs go alone, becauſe ſo I vnderſtood for certaine, he was; and (I muſt confeſſe) deſirous to do ſomething without the companie of the incomparable Prince Muſidorus, becauſe in my heart I acknowledge that I owed more to his preſence, then to any thing in my ſelfe, whatſoeuer before I had done. For of him indeed (as of any worldly cauſe) I muſt grant, as receiued, what euer there is, or may be good in me. He taught me by word, and beſt by example, giuing me in him ſo liuely an image of vertue, as ignorance could not caſt ſuch miſt ouer mine eyes, as not to ſee, and to loue it, and all with ſuch deare friendſhip and care, as (ô heauen) how can my life euer requite vnto him? which made me indeed find in my ſelfe ſuch a kind of depending vpon him, as without him I found a weakneſſe, and a miſtruſtfulneſſe of my ſelfe, as one ſtrayed from his beſt ſtrength, when at any time I miſt him. Which humour perceiuing to ouer-rule me, I ſtraue againſt it; not that I was vnwilling to depend vpon him in iudgement, but by weakeneſſe I wold not; which though it held me to him, made me vnworthie of him. Therfore I deſired his leaue, and obtained it; ſuch confidence hee had in me, preferring my reputation before his own tenderneſſe; & ſo priuatelie went frō him, he determining (as after I knew) in ſecret maner, not to be farre from the place, where we appointed to meete, to preuent any foule play that might be offered vnto me. Full loth was Erona to let vs depart from her (as it were) forefeeling the harmes which after fell to her. But I, (rid fully from thoſe cumbers of kindneſſe, and halfe a dayes iourney in my way toward Anaxius) met an aduenture, which (though in it ſelfe of ſmall importance) I will tell you at large, becauſe by the occaſion therof I was brought to as great cumber and danger, as lightly anie might eſcape.

As I paſt through a Laund (each ſide whereof was ſo bordered both with high timber trees, and copſes of farre more humble growth, that it might eaſilie bring a ſolitarie mind to looke for no other companions then the wild burgeſſes of the forreſt) I heard certaine cries, which comming by pawſes to mine eares from within the wood of the right hand, made me well aſſured by the greatneſſe of the crie, it was the voice of a man, though it were a verie vnmanlike voyce, ſo to crie. But making mine eare my guide; I left not many trees behinde me, before I ſawe at the bottome of one of them a gentle-man, bound (with manie garters hand & foot, ſo as well he might tumble and toſſe, but neither runne nor reſiſt he could. Vpon him(like ſo manie Eagles vpon an Oxe) were nine Gentlewomen; trulie ſuch, as one might wel enough ſay, they were handſome. Each of them held bodkins in their hands, wherewith continually they pricked him, hauing bene before hand vnarmed of anie defence from the waſte vpward, but onely of his ſhirt: ſo as the poore man wept and bled, cried and prayed, while they ſported themſelues in his paine, and delighted in his prayers as the arguments of their victorie.

I was moued to compaſſion, and ſo much the more that he ſtraight cald to me for ſuccour, deſiring me at leaſt to kill him, to deliuer him from thoſe tormenters. But before my ſelfe could reſolue, much leſſe any other tell what I would reſolue, there came in cholerike haſte towards me about ſeuen or eight knights; the foremoſt of which willed me to get me away, and not to trouble the Ladies, while they were taking their due reuenge, but with ſo ouermaiſtring a maner of pride, as trulie my heart could not brooke it: and therefore (anſwering them, that how I would haue defended him from the Ladies I knew not, but from them I would) I began a combate firſt with him particularlie, and after his death with the others (that had leſſe good maners) iointlie. But ſuch was the end of it, that I kept the field with the death of ſome, and flight of others. In ſo much as the women (afraid, what angrie victorie would bring forth) ran all away, ſauing onely one; who was ſo fierſht in malice, that neither during, nor after the fight, ſhe gaue anie truce to her crueltie, but ſtill vſed the litle inſtrument of her great ſpight, to the well witneſt paine of the impatient patient: & was now about to put out his eyes, which all this while were ſpared, becauſe they ſhould do him the diſcomfort of ſeeing who preuayled ouer him. When I came in, and after much adoe, brought her to ſome conference, (for ſometime it was before ſhe would hearken, more before ſhe would ſpeake; and moſt, before ſhe would in her ſpeech leaue off the ſharpe remembrance of her bodkin) but at length when I puld off my head-peece, and humblie entreated her pardon, or knowledge why ſhe was cruell; out of breath more with choller (which increaſed in his owne exerciſe) then with the paine ſhe tooke, much to this purpoſe ſhe gaue her griefe vnto my knowledge. Gentleman (ſaid ſhe) much it is againſt my will to forbeare any time the executing of my iuſt reuenge vpon this naughty creature, a man in nothing, but in deceiuing women. But becauſe I ſee you are young, and like enough to haue the power (if you wold haue the mind) to do much more miſchiefe then he, I am content vpon this bad ſubiect to reade a lecture to your vertue.

This man called Pamphilus, in birth I muſt confeſſe is noble (but what is that to him, if it ſhall be a ſtaine to his dead anceſtors to haue left ſuch an off-ſpring) in ſhape as you ſee, not vncomely (indeed the fit maske of his diſguiſed falſhood) in conuerſation wittily pleaſant, and pleaſantly gameſome; his eyes full of mery ſimplicitie, his words of heartie companableneſſe; and ſuch a one, whoſe head one would not thinke ſo ſtayed, as to thinke miſchieuouſlie: delighted in all ſuch things, which by imparting the delight to others, makes the vſer therof welcome; as, Muſike, Dauncing, Hunting, Feaſting, Riding, and ſuch like. And to conclude, ſuch a one, as who can keepe him at armes end, need neuer wiſh a better companion. But vnder theſe qualities lies ſuch a poyſonous Adder, as I will tell you. For by thoſe gifts of Nature and Fortune (being in all places acceptable) he creepes, nay (to ſay truly) he flies ſo into the fauour of poore ſilly women, that I would be too much aſhamed to confeſſe, if I had not reuenge in my hand, as well as ſhame in my cheeks. For his hart being wholie delighted in deceiuing vs, we could neuer be warned, but rather one bird caught, ſerued for a ſtale to bring in more. For the more he gat, the more ſtill he ſhewed, that he (as it were) gaue away to his new miſtreſſe, when hee betrayed his promiſes to the former. The cunning of his flatterie, the readineſſe of his teares, the infiniteneſſe of his vowes, were but among the weakeſt threeds of his net. But the ſtirring our owne paſſions, and by the entrance of them, to make himſelfe Lord of our forces; there lay his Maiſters part of cunning, making vs now ielous, now enuious, now proud of what we had, deſirous of more; now giuing one the triumph, to ſee him that was Prince of many, Subiect to her; now with an eſtranged looke, making her feare the loſſe of that mind, which indeed could neuer be had: neuer ceaſing humbleneſſe and diligence, till he had imbarked vs in ſome ſuch diſaduantage, as we could not returne drie-ſhod; & then ſodainly a tyrant, but a craftie tyrant. For ſo would he vſe his imperiouſneſſe, that we had a delightfull feare & an awe, which made vs loth to loſe our hope. And, which is ſtrangeſt (when ſometimes with late repentance I thinke of it) I muſt confeſſe, euen in the greateſt tempeſt of my iudgement was I neuer driuen to thinke him excellent, and yet ſo could ſet my mind, both to get and keep him, as though therein had laine my felicitie: like them I haue ſeene play at the ball, grow extreamely earneſt, who ſhould haue the ball, and yet euerie one knew it was but a ball. But in end, the bitter ſauce of the ſport was, that we had either our hearts broken with ſorow, or our eſtates ſpoyled with being at his direction, or our honours for euer loſt, partly by our owne faults, but principally by his faultie vſing of our faultes. For neuer was there man that could with more ſcornefull eyes behold her, at whoſe feete hee had lately laine, nor with a more vnmanlike brauerie vſe his tongue to her diſgrace, which lately had ſung ſonets of her praiſes: being ſo naturally inconſtant, as I maruell his ſoule findes not ſome way to kill his bodie, whereto it had bene ſo long vnited. For ſo hath he dealt with vs (vnhappy fooles) as wee could neuer tell, whether he made greater haſte after he once liked, to enioy, or after he once enioyed, to forſake. But making a glorie of his owne ſhame, it delighted him to be challenged of vnkindneſſe: it was a triumph vnto him to haue his mercie called for: & he thought the freſh colours of his beautie were painted in nothing ſo well, as in the ruines of his louers: yet ſo farre had we engaged our ſelues (vnfortunate ſoules) that we liſted not complaine, ſince our complaints could not but carie the greateſt accuſation to our ſelues. But euerie of vs (each for her ſelfe) laboured all means how to recouer him, while he rather dayly ſent vs companions of our deceit, then euer returned in any ſound & faithfull maner. Till at length he concluded all his wrongs with betrothing himſelfe to one (I muſt confeſſe) worthie to be liked, if any worthineſſe might excuſe ſo vnworthy a changeableneſſe; leauing vs nothing but remorſe for what was paſt, and deſpaire of what might follow. Then indeed the common iniurie made vs all ioyne in fellowſhip, who till that time, had employed our endeuours one againſt the other. For we thought nothing was a more condemning of vs, then the iuſtifying of his loue to her by mariage: then Deſpaire made Feare valiant, and Reuenge gaue Shame countenance: whereupon, we (that you ſawe here) deuiſed how to get him amõg vs alone: which he (ſuſpecting no ſuch matter of thẽ, whom he had by often abuſes, he thought, made tame to bee ſtill abuſed) eaſilie gaue vs oportunitie to do.

And a man may ſee, euen in this, how ſoone Rulers grow proud, and in their pride fooliſh: he came with ſuch an authority among vs, as if the Planets had done enough for vs, that by vs once he had bene delighted. And when we began in curteous maner, one after the other, to lay his vnkindneſſe vnto him, he ſeeing himſelfe con-confronted by ſo many (like a reſolute Orator) went not to deniall, but to iuſtifie his cruell falſhood, & all with ſuch ieſts, & diſdainfull paſſages, that if the iniurie could not be made greater, yet were our conceits made the apter to apprehend it.

Among other of his anſwers (forſooth) I ſhall neuer forget, how he wold proue it was no inconſtancie to chaunge from one loue to another, but a great conſtancie; and contrarie, that which we call conſtancie, to be moſt changeable. For (ſaid he) I euer loued my delight, and delighted alwayes in what was louelie: and whereſoeuer I found occaſion to obtaine that, I conſtantly followed it. But theſe conſtant fooles you ſpeake of, though their Miſtreſſe grow by ſickneſſe foule, or by fortune miſerable, yet ſtill will loue her, and ſo commit the abſurdeſt inconſtancie that may be, in chaunging their loue from faireneſſe to foulneſſe, and from lowlineſſe to his contrarie; like one not content to leaue a friend, but will ſtraight giue ouer himſelfe to his mortall enemie: where I (whom you call inconſtant) am euer conſtant; to Beautie, in others; and Delight in my ſelfe. And ſo in this iollie ſcoffing brauerie he went ouer vs all, ſaying he left one, becauſe ſhe was ouer-wayward: another, becauſe ſhe was too ſoone wonne: a third, becauſe ſhe was not merie enough: a fourth, becauſe ſhe was ouer gameſome: the fift, becauſe ſhe was growne with griefe ſubiect to ſickneſſe: the ſixt, becauſe ſhe was ſo fooliſh, as to be iealous of him: the ſeuenth, becauſe ſhe had refuſed to carie a letter for him to another that he loued: the eight, becauſe ſhe was not ſecret: the ninth, becauſe ſhe was not liberal: but to me, who am named Dido, and indeed haue met with a falſe Aeneas, to me, I ſay (ô the vngrateful villanie) he could find no other fault to obiect, but that (perdie) he met with manie fairer.

But when he had thus plaid the careleſſe Prince, we (hauing thoſe ſeruants of ours in readineſſe, whom you lately ſo manfully ouercame) laid hold of him; beginning at firſt but that trifling reuenge, in which you found vs buſie; but meaning afterwards to haue mangled him ſo, as ſhould haue loſt his credite for euer abuſing more. But as you haue made my fellowes flie away, ſo for my part the greatneſſe of his wrong ouer ſhadowes, in my iudgement the greatneſſe of any daunger. For was it not enough for him to haue deceiued me, and through the deceit abuſed me, and after the abuſe forſaken me, but that he muſt now, of all the companie, and before all the company, lay want of beauty to my charge? Many fairer? I trow euen in your iudgement, Sir, (if your eyes do not beguile me) not many fayrer; and I know (whoſoeuer ſayes the contrary) there are not many fayrer. And of whom ſhold I receiue this reproch, but of him, who hath beſt cauſe to know there are not manie fayrer? And therefore howſoeuer my fellowes pardon his iniuries, for my part I will euer remember, and remember to reuenge this ſcorne of all ſcornes. With that ſhe to him afreſh; and ſurely would haue put out his eyes (who lay mute for ſhame, if he did not ſometimes crie for feare) if I had not leapt from my horſe, and mingling force with intreaty, ſtayed her fury.

But while I was perſwading her to meekeneſſe, comes a number of his friends, to whom he forthwith cried, that they ſhould kill that woman, that had thus betrayed and diſgraced him. But then I was faine to forſake the enſigne, vnder which I had before ſerued, and to ſpend my vttermoſt force in the protecting of the Lady; which ſo well preuayled for her, that in end there was a faithful peace promiſed of all ſides. And ſo I leauing her in a place of ſecurity (as ſhe thought) went on my iourney towards Anaxius, for whom I was faine to ſtay two dayes in the appointed place, hee diſdaining to waite for me, till he was ſure I were there.

I did patiently abide his angrie pleasure, til about that space of time he came (indeed, according to promise) alone: and (that I may not say too litle, because he is wont to say too much) like a man, whose courage was apt to clime ouer any daunger. And assoone as euer he came neare me, in fit distance for his purpose, hee with much furie, (but with furie skilfullie guided) rad vpon me; which I (in the best sort I could) resisted, hauing kept my selfe readie for him, because I had vnderstood that he obserued few complemẽts in matter of armes, but such as a proud anger did indite vnto him. And so putting our horses into a full careere, we hit each other vpon the head with our Launces: I thinke he felt my blow, for my part (I must confesse) I neuer receiued the like: but I thinke though my senses were astonished, my mind forced them to quicken themselues, because I had learned of him, how litle fauour he is wont to shew in any matter of aduantage. And indeed he was turned, and comming vpon me with his sword drawne, both our staues hauing bene broken at that encounter: but I was so readie to answere him, that trulie I know not who gaue the first blow. But whosoeuer gaue the first, was quicklie seconded by the second. And indeed (excellentest Ladie) I must say trulie, for a time it was well fought betweene vs; he vndoubtedlie being of singular valour, (I would to God it were not abased by his too much loftinesse) but as by the occasion of the combate, winning and losing ground, we chaunged places, his horse hapned to come vpon the point of the broken speare, which fallen to the ground, chaunced to stand vpward, so as it lighting vpon his heart, the horse died. He driuen to dismount, threatned, if I did not the like, to do as much for my horse, as fortune had done for his. But whether for that, or because I would not be beholding to Fortune for any part of the victorie, I descended. So began our foot-fight in such sort that we were well entred to bloud of both sides, when there comes by that vnconstant Pamphilus, whom I had deliuered (easie to be knowne, for he was bare-faced) with a dozen armed men after him; but before him he had Dido (that Ladie, who had most sharpely punished him) riding vpon a palfrey, he following her with most vnmanlike crueltie; beating her with wands he had in his hand, she crying for sense of paine, or hope of succour: which was so pitifull a sight vnto me, that it moued me to require Anaxius to deferre our combate till another day, and now to performe the duties of knighthood in helping this distressed Lady. But he that disdaines to obey any thing but his passion (which he cals his mind) bad me leaue off that thought; but when hee had killed me, he would then (perhaps) go to her succour. But I well finding the fight would be long betweene vs (longing in my heart to deliuer the poore Dido) giuing him so great a blowe, as somwhat stayed him, (to terme it aright) I flatly ran away from him toward my horse, who trotting after the company, in mine armour, I was put to some paine, but that vse made me nimble vnto it. But as I followed my horse, Anaxius followed me; but his proud heart did so disdaine that exercise, that I had quickly ouer-runne him, and ouertaken my horse; being (I must confesse) ashamed to see a number of countrie folkes, who happened to passe thereby, who hallowed and howted after me as at the arranteſt coward that euer shewed his shoulders to his enemie. But when I had leapt on my horse (with such speedy agility, that they all cried; O see how feare giues him wings) I turned to Anaxius and aloud promised him to returne thither againe, as soon as I had relieued the iniuried Lady. But he rayling at me, with all the base words angrie contempt could endite; I said no more, but, Anaxius, assure thy self, I neither feare thy force, nor thy opinion. And so vsing no weapon of a knight as at that time but my spurres, I ranne in my knowledge after Pamphilus, but in all their conceits from Anaxius, which as far as I could heare, I might well heare testified with such laughters & games, that I was some few times moued to turne backe againe.

But the Ladies miserie ouer-balanced my reputation so that after her I went, and with six houres hard riding (through so wild places, as it was rather the cunning of my horse somtimes, then of my selfe, so rightly to hit the way) I ouergat them a little before night, neere to an old il-fauoured castle, the place where I perceiued they meant to performe their vnknightly errand. For there they began to strip her of her clothes, when I came in among them, and running through the first with a launce, the iustnesse of the cause so enhabled me against the rest (false-harted in their owne wrong doing) that I had, in as short time almost as I had bene fighting with only Anaxius, deliuered her frō those iniurious wretches: most of whom carried newes to the other world, that amongst men secret wrongs are not alwaies left vnpunished. As for Pamphilus, he hauing once seene, & (as it should seeme) remembred me, euen from the beginning began to be in the rereward, & before they had left fighting, he was too far off to giue them thanks for their paines. But whē I had deliuered to the Ladie a full libertie, both in effect, & in opinion, (for sometime it was before she could assure her selfe shee was out of their hands, who had laid so vehement apprehension of death vpon her) shee then told me, how as she was returning toward her fathers, weakely accompanied (as too soone trusting to the falshood of reconcilement) Pamphilus had set vpon her, & killing those that were with her, carried her selfe by such force, & with such manner as I had seene, to this place, where he meant in cruell & shamefull manner to kill her, in the sight of her owne Father; to whom he had alreadie sent word of it, that out of his castle window (for this castle, she said, was his) he might haue the prospect of his onely childes destruction, if my comming, whom (she said) he feared (as soone as he knew me by the armour) had not warranted her from that neere approching crueltie. I was glad I had done so good a deede for a Gentlewoman not vnhandsome, whome before I had in like sort helped. But the night beginning to perswade some retiring place, the Gentlewoman, euen out of countenance before she began her speach, much after this maner inuited mee to lodge that night with her father.

Sir (said she) how much I owe you, can be but abased by words, since the life I haue, I hold it now the second time of you: and therefore neede not offer seruice vnto you, but onely to remember you, that I am your seruant: and I would, my being so, might any way yeeld any small contentment vnto you. Now onely I can but desire you to harbour your selfe this night in this castle; because the time requires it; and in truth this countrie is verie daungerous for murthering theeues, to trust a sleeping life among them. And yet I must confesse, that as the loue I beare you makes me thus inuite you, so the same loue makes me ashamed to bring you to a place, where you shal be so (not spoken by ceremony but by truth) miserably entertained. With that shee told me, that though shee spake of her father (whom she named Chremes) she would hide no truth from me, which was in summe, that as he was of all that region the man of greatest possessions (and riches, so was he either by nature, or an euill receiued opinion, giuen to sparing, in so vnmeasurable sorte, that he did not onely barre himselfe from the delightfull, but almost from the necessarie vse thereof; scarcely allowing him selfe fitte sustenance of life, rather then he would spend of those goods for whose sake only he seemed to ioy in life. Which extreame dealing (descending from himselfe vpon her) had driuen her to put her selfe with a great Lady of that countrie, by which occasion she had stumbled vpon ſuch miſchances, as were little for the honor either of her, or her familie. But ſo wiſe had he ſhewed himſelfe therein, as while he found his daughter maintained without his coſt, he was content to be deafe to any noiſe of infamie: which though it had wronged her much more then ſhe deſerued, yet ſhe could not denie, but ſhe was driuen thereby to receiue more then decent fauours. She concluded, that there at leaſt I ſhould be free from iniuries, & ſhould be aſſured to her-ward to abound as much in the true cauſes of welcomes, as I ſhould find want of the effects thereof.

I, who had acquainted my ſelfe to meaſure the delicacie of foode and reſt, by hunger and wearineſſe, at that time well ſtored of both, did not abide long entreatie; but went with her to the Caſtle: which I found of good ſtrength, hauing a great mote round about it; the worke of a noble Gentleman, of whoſe vnthriftie ſonne he had bought it. The bridge drawne vp, where we were faine to crie a good while before we could haue aunſwere, and to diſpute a good while before aunſwere would be brought to acceptance. At length a willingneſſe, rather then a ioy to receiue his daughter, whome he had lately ſeen ſo neere death, & an opinion brought into his head by courſe, becauſe he heard himſelfe called a Father; rather then any kindneſſe that he found in his owne hart, made him take vs in; for my part by that time growne ſo wearie of ſuch entertainment, that no regard of my ſelfe, but onely the importunitie of his daughter made me enter. Where I was met with this Chremes, a driueling old fellow, leane, ſhaking both of head and hands, alreadie halfe earth, & yet then moſt greedie of Earth: who ſcarcely would giue me thankes for what I had done, for feare I ſuppoſe, that thankfulneſſe might haue an introduction of reward. But with a hollow voice, giuing me a falſe welcome, I might perceiue in his eye to his daughter, that it was hard to ſay, whether the diſpleaſure of her companie did not ouer-way the pleaſure of her owne comming. But on he brought me, into ſo bare a houſe, that it was the picture of miſerable happineſſe, and rich beggerie (ſerued onely by a companie of ruſticall villaines, full of ſweat & duſt, not one of them other, then a labourer) in ſumme (as he counted it) profitable drudgerie: and all preparations both for foode and lodging ſuch, as would make one deteſt nigardneſſe, it is ſo fluttiſh a vice. His talke of nothing but of his pouertie, for feare belike leaſt I ſhould haue proued a yong borrower. In ſumme, ſuch a man, as any enimie could not wiſh him worſe then to be himſelfe. But there that night bid I the burthen of being a tedious gueſt to a loathſome hoſt; ouer-hearing him ſometimes bitterly warne his daughter of bringing ſuch coſtly mates vnder his roofe: which ſhee grieuing at, deſired much to know my name, I thinke partly of kindneſſe, to remember who had done ſome thing for her, and partly, becauſe ſhee aſſured her ſelfe I was ſuch a one as would make euen his miſer-mind contented with what he had done. And accordingly ſhee demaunded my name, and eſtate, with ſuch earneſtneſſe, that I whome Loue had not as then ſo robbed me of my ſelfe, as to be another then I am, told her directly my name and condition: wherof ſhe was no more glad then her father, as I might wel perceiue by ſome ill fauoured cherefulneſſe, which then firſt began to wrinkle it ſelfe in his face.

But the cauſes of their ioyes were farre different; for as the ſhepheard and the butcher both may looke vpon one ſheepe with pleaſing conceipts, but the ſhepheard with minde to profit himſelfe by preſeruing, the butcher with killing him: So ſhe reioyced to finde that mine own benefits had me to be her friend, who was a Prince of ſuch greatneſſe, and louingly reioyced: but his ioy grewe (as I to my danger after perceiued) by the occaſion of the Queene Artaxias ſettting my head

to sale, for hauing slaine her brother Tiridates; which being the summe of an hundreth thousand crownes (to whosoeuer brought me aliue into her hands) that old wretch, (who had ouer-liued all good nature) though he had lying idly by him much more then that, yet aboue all things louing money, for monies owne sake determined to betray me, so well deseruing of him for to haue that which he was determined neuer to vse. And so knowing that the next morning I was resolued to go to the place where I had left Anaxius, he sent in all speed to a Captaine of a Garrison neere by; which though it belonged to the King of Iberia, (yet knowing the Captaines humor to delight so in riotous spending, as he cared not how he came by the meanes to maintaine it) doubted not that to be halfe with him in the gaine, he would play his quarters part in the treason. And therefore that night agreeing of the fittest places where they might surprise me the morning, the old caitiffe was growne so ceremonious, as he would needs accompanie me some myles in my way; a sufficient token to me, if Nature had made me apt to suspect; since a churles curtesie rarely comes, but either for gaine, or falshood. But I suffered him to stumble into that point of good manner: to which purpose he came out with all his clownes, horst vpon such cart-iades, and so furnished, as in good faith I thought with my self, if that were thrift, I wisht none of my friends or subiects euer to thriue. As for his daughter (the gentle Dido) she would also (but in my conscience with a farre better minde) prolong the time of farewell, as long as he.

And so we went on together: he so old in wickednesse, that he could looke me in the face, and freely talke with me, whose life he had alreadie contracted for: till comming into the falling of a way which ledde vs into a place, of each-side whereof men might easily keepe themselues vndiscouered, I was encompassed sodainly by a great troupe of enemies both of horse and foote, who willed me to yeeld my selfe to the Queene Artaxia. But they could not haue vsed worse eloquence to haue perswaded my yeelding, then that; I knowing the little good will Artaxia bare me. And therefore making necessitie & iustice my best sword and shield, I vsed the other weapons I had as wel as I could; I am sure to the little ease of a good number, who trusting to their number more then to their valure, & valuing money higher then equitie, felt, that guiltlesnesse is not alwaies with ease oppressed. As for Chremes, he with drew himself, yet so guilding his wicked conceits with his hope of gaine, that he was content to be a beholder, how I should be taken to make his pray.

But I was growne so wearie, that I supported my selfe more with anger then strength, when the most excellent Musidorus came to my succour; who hauing followed my trace as well as he could, after he found I had left the fight with Anaxius, came to the niggards Castle, where he found all burned and spoiled by the countrie people, who bare mortall hatred to that couetous man, and now tooke the time, when the castle was left almost without garde, to come in, and leaue monuments of their malice therein: which Musidorus not staying either to further, or impeache, came vpon the spurre after me (because with one voice many told him, that if I were in his company, it was for no good meant vnto me) and in this extremitie found me. But when I saw that cousin of mine, me thought my life was doubled, and where I before thought of a noble death, I now thought of a noble victorie. For who can feare that hath Musidorus by him? who, what he did there for me, how manie he killed, not straunger for the number then for the straunge blowes wherewith he sent them to a well deserued death, might well delight me to speake of, but I should so hold you too long in euerie particular. But in truth, there if euer, and euer, if euer any man, did Musidorus shew himself second to none in able valor.

Yet what the vnmeasurable excesse of their number would haue done in the end I know not, but the triall thereof was cut off by the chaunceable comming thither of the King of Iberia, that same father of the worthie Plangus, whom it hath pleased you sometimes to mention: who, not yeelding ouer to olde age his countrey delights, especially of hauking) was at that time (following a Merline) brought to see this iniurie offred vnto vs: and hauing great numbers of Courtiers waiting vpon him, was straight known by the souldiers that assaulted vs, to be their King, and so most of them withdrew themselues.

He by his authoritie knowing of the Captaines owne constrained confession, what was the motiue of this mischieuous practise; misliking much such violence should be offred in his countrie to men of our ranke, but chiefely disdaining it should be done in respect of his Niece, whom (I must confesse wrongfully) he hated, because he interpreted that her brother and she had maintained his sonne Plangus against him, caused the Captaines head presently to be striken off, and the old bad Chremes to be hanged: though truely for my part, I earnestly laboured for his life, because I had eaten of his bread. But one thing was notable for a conclusion of his miserable life, that neither the death of his daughter, who (alas poore Gentlewoman was by chaunce slaine among his clownes, while she ouerboldly for her weake sex sought to hold them from me, nor yet his own shameful end was so much in his mouth as he was led to execution, as the losse of his goods, and burning of his house: which often, with more laughter then teares of the hearers, he made pittifull exclamations vpon.

This iustice thus done, and we deliuered, the King in deede in royall sort inuited vs to his Court, not farre thence: in all points entertaining vs so, as truely I must euer acknowledge a beholdingnes vnto him: although the streame of it fell out not to be so sweet as the spring. For after some daies being there (curing our selues of such wounds as we had receiued, while I, causing diligent search to be made of Anaxius, could learne nothing, but that he was gone out of the countrie, boasting in euery place how he had made me run away) we were brought to receiue the fauour of acquaintance with this Queene Andromana, whom the Princesse Pamela did in so liuely colours describe the last day, as still me thinks the figure thereof possesseth mine eyes, confirmed by the knowledge my selfe had.

And therefore I shall neede the lesse to make you know what kind of woman she was; but this onely, that first with the raines of affection, and after with the verie vse of directing, she had made her selfe so absolute a maister of her husbands minde, that a while he would not, and after, he could not tell how to gouerne without being gouerned by her: but finding an ease in not vnderstanding, let loose his thoughts wholy to pleasure, entrusting to her the entire conduct of all his royall affaires. A thing that may luckily fall out to him that hath the blessing, to match with some Heroicall minded Lady. But in him it was neither guided by wisedome, nor followed by Fortune, but thereby was slipt insensibly into such an estate, that he liued at her vndiscreete discretion: all his subiectes hauing by some yeares learned, so to hope for good, and feare of harme, onely from her, that it should haue needed a stronger vertue then his, to haue vnwound so deepely an entred vice. So that either not striuing (because he was contented) or contented (because he would not striue) he scarcely knew what was done in his owne chamber, but as it pleased her Instruments to frame the relation.

Now we being brought knowen vnto her (the time that wee ſpent in curing ſome very dangerous wounds) after once we were acquainted, (& acquainted we were ſooner then our ſelues expected)ſhe continually almoſt haunted vs,till(and it was not long a doing) we diſcouered a moſt violent bent of affection: and that ſo ſtrangely,that we might well ſee, an euill minde in authoritie, dooth not onely follow the ſway of the deſires already within it, but frames to it ſelfe new deſires, not before thought of. For,with equall ardour ſhe affected vs both: & ſo did her greatnes diſdain ſhamefaſtneſſe,that ſhe was content to acknowledge it to both. For, (hauing many times torne the vaile of modeſtie) it ſeemed, for a laſt delight, that ſhe delighted in infamy: which often ſhe had vſed to her husbands ſhame, filling all mens eares(but his)with his reproch; while he hoodwinkt with kindneſſe) leaſt of all men knew who ſtrake him. But her firſt degree was, by ſetting forth her beauties,truely in nature not to be miſliked,but as much aduanced to the eye, as abaſed to the iudgement by art)thereby to bring vs (as willingly-caught fiſhes) to bite at her bait. And thereto had ſhee that ſcutchion of her deſires ſupported by certaine badly-diligent miniſters, who often cloyed our eares with her praiſes, and would needs teach vs a way of felicitie by ſeeking her fauour. But when ſhe found, that we were as deafe to them as dumb to her; then ſhe liſted no longer ſtay in the ſuburbs of her fooliſh deſires,but directly entred vpon them; making her ſelfe an impudent ſuter,authorizing her ſelfe very much with making vs ſee that all fauour & power in that realme,ſo depended vpon her,that now (being in her hands) we were either to keepe,or loſe our liberty,at her diſcretion; which yet a while ſhe ſo tempted,as that we might rather ſuſpect,then ſhe threaten. But when our wounds grew ſo, as that they gaue vs leaue to trauell, & that ſhe found we were purpoſed to vſe all meanes we could to depart thence, ſhe(with more & more importunatneſſe)craued, which in all good maners was either of vs to be deſired,or not granted. Truely (moſt faire & euery way excellent Lady)you would haue wondred to haue ſeene,how before vs ſhe would confeſſe the contention in her owne minde between that louely (indeed moſt louely)brownneſſe of Muſidorus his face,& this colour of mine,which ſhe (in the deceiuable ſtile of affection)would intitle beautifull: how her eyes wandred like a glutton at a feaſt)from the one to the other; & how her words would begin halfe of the ſentence to Muſidorus,& end the other halfe to Pyrocles: not aſhamed)ſeing the friendſhip betweene vs)to deſire either of vs to be a mediator to the other; as if we ſhould haue played one requeſt at Tennis betweene vs: and often wiſhing that ſhe might be the angle,where the lines of our friendſhip might meet; and be the knot which might tie our hearts together. Which proceeding of hers I do the more largely ſet before you(moſt deare Lady)becauſe by the foile thereof, you may ſee the nobleneſſe of my deſire to you,and the warrantableneſſe of your fauour to me.

At that Philoclea ſmiled, with a little nod. But(ſaid Pyrocles)when ſhe perceiued no hope by ſuite to preuaile, then (perſwaded by the rage of affection, and encouraged by daring to do any thing) ſhee found meanes to haue vs accuſed to the King, as though wee went about ſome practiſe to ouerthrowe him in his owne eſtate. Which becauſe of the ſtrange ſucceſſes wee had had in the Kingdomes of Phrigia, Pontus, and Galatia) ſeemed not vnlikely to him, who (but skimming any thing that came before him)was diſciplined to leaue the through-handling of all to his gentle wife: who foorthwith cauſed vs to be put in priſon, hauing (while we ſlept)depriued vs of our armes: a priſon, indeed iniurious,becauſe a priſon,but els well teſtifying affection,becauſe in al reſpects as cõmodious as a priſon might be: and in deede ſo placed, as ſhe might at all houres (not ſeene by many, though ſhe cared not much how many had ſeene her) come vnto vs. Then fell ſhe to ſauce her deſires with threatnings, ſo that we were in a great perplexitie, reſtrained to ſo vnworthie a bondage, and yet reſtrained by loue, which (I cannot tell how (in noble mindes, by a certain duty, claimes an anſwering. And how much that loue might moue vs, ſo much, and more that faultineſſe of her minde remoued vs; her beauty being balanced by her ſhameleſneſſe. But that which did (as it were) tie vs in a captiuitie, was, that to grant, had bin wickedly iniurious to him, that had ſaued our liues: and to accuſe a Lady that loued vs, of her loue vnto vs, we eſteemed almoſt as diſhonorable: and but by one of thoſe waies we ſaw no likelyhood of going out of that place, where the words would be iniurious to your eares, which ſhould expreſſe the maner of her ſuite: while yet many times earneſtnes died her cheekes with the colour of ſhamefaſtneſſe; and wanton languiſhing borrowed of her eyes the down-caſt looke of modeſtie. But we in the meane time farre from louing her, and often aſſuring her, that we would not ſo recompence her huſbandes ſauing of our liues; to ſuch a ridiculous degree of truſting her, ſhe had brought him, that ſhe cauſed him ſend vs word, that vpon our liues, we ſhould doo whatſoeuer ſhe commaunded vs: good man, not knowing any other, but that all her pleaſures were directed to the preſeruation of his eſtate. But when that made vs rather pittie, then obey his folly, then fell ſhe to ſeruile entreating vs, as though force could haue bene the ſchoole of Loue, or that an honeſt courage would not rather ſtriue againſt, then yeeld to iniurie. All which yet could not make vs accuſe her, though it made vs almoſt pine away for ſpight, to looſe any of our time in ſo troubleſome an idleneſſe.

But while we were thus full of wearineſſe of what was paſt, and doubt of what was to follow, Loue (that I thinke in the courſe of my life hath a ſport ſometimes to poyſon me with roſes, ſometimes to heale me with wormewood) brought foorth a remedie vnto vs: which though it helped me out of that diſtreſſe, alas the concluſion was ſuch, as I muſt euer while I liue, thinke it worſe then a wrack, ſo to haue bene preſerued. This King by this Queene had a ſonne of tender age, but of great expectation, brought vp in the hope of themſelues, and alreadie acceptation of the inconſtant people, as ſucceſſor of his fathers crowne: wherof he was as worthie, conſidering his parts, as vnworthie, in reſpect of the wrong was thereby done againſt the moſt noble Plangus: whoſe great deſerts now either forgotten, or vngratefully remembred, all men ſet their ſailes with the fauourable winde, which blewe on the fortune of this young Prince, perchaunce not in their harts, but ſurely not in their mouths, now giuing Plangus (who ſome yeares before was their onely champion) the poore comfort of calamitie, pittie. This youth therefore accounted Prince of that region, by name Palladius, did with vehement affection loue a yong Lady, brought vp in his fathers court, called Zelmane, daughter to that miſchieuouſly vnhappie Prince Plexirtus (of whome alreadie I haue, and ſometimes muſt make, but neuer honorable mention) left there by her father, becauſe of the intricate changeableneſſe of his eſtate; he by the motherſide being halfe brother to this Queene Andromana, and therefore the willinger committing her to her care. But as Loue (alas) doth not alwayes reflect it ſelfe, ſo fell it out that this Zelmane, (though truely reaſon there was enough to loue Palladius) yet could not euer perſwade her heart to yeeld thereunto: with that paine to Palladius, as they feele, that feele an vnloued loue. Yet louing indeed, and therefore conſtant, hee vſed

ſtill the interceſſion of diligence and faith, euer hoping, becauſe he would not put him ſelfe into that hell, to be hopeleſſe: vntill the time of our being come, and captiued there, brought foorth this ende, which truely deſerues of me a further degree of ſorrow then teares.

Such was there in my ill deſtinie, that this young Ladie Zelmane (like ſome vnwiſely liberal, that more delight to giue preſents, then pay debts) ſhe choſe (alas for the pitie) rather to beſtowe her loue) ſo much vndeſerued, as not deſired) vpon me, then to recõpence him, whoſe loue (beſides many other things) might ſeeme (euen in the court of Honour) iuſtly to claime it of her. But ſo it was (alas that ſo it was) whereby it came to paſſe (that as nothing doth more naturally follow his cauſe, then care to preſerue, and benefite doth follow vnfained affection) ſhe felt with me, what I felt of my captiuitie, and ſtreight laboured to redreſſe my paine, which was her paine: which ſhe could do by no better meanes, then by vſing the helpe therein of Palladius: who (true Louer) conſidering what, and not why, in all her commaundements; and indeed ſhee concealing from him her affection (which ſhee intituled cõpaſſion,) immediatly obeyed to imploy his vttermoſt credite to relieue vs: which though as great, as a beloued ſonne with a mother, faultie otherwiſe, but not hard-harted toward him, yet it could not preuaile to procure vs libertie. Wherefore he ſought to haue that by practiſe, which he could not by prayer. And ſo being allowed often to viſite vs (for indeed our reſtraints were more, or leſſe, according as the ague of her paſſion was either in the fit or intermiſſion) he vſed the oportunitie of a fit time thus to deliuer vs.

The time of the marying that Queene was euery yeare, by the extreame loue of her husbãd, & the ſeruiceable loue of the Courtiers, made notable by ſome publike honours, which did (as it were) proclaime to the world, how deare ſhe was to that people. Amõg other, none was either more gratefull to the beholders, or more noble in it ſelfe, then iuſts, both with ſword & launce, maintained for a ſeuen-night together: wherein, that Nation doth ſo excell, both for comelineſſe and ableneſſe, that from neighbor-countries they ordinarily come, ſome to ſtriue, ſome to learne, ſome to behold.

This day it happened that diuers famous Knights came thither frõ the Court of Helen, Queene of Corinth; a Lady, whom fame at that time was ſo deſirous to honor, that ſhe borrowed all mens mouthes to ioyne with the ſound of her Trumpet. For as her beautie hath wonne the prize frõ all women, that ſtand in degree of compariſon (for as for the two ſiſters of Arcadia, they are far beyond all conceit of compariſon) ſo hath her gouernment bene ſuch as hath bene no leſſe beautifull to mens iudgements, then her beautie to the eye-ſight. For being brought by right of birth, a woman, a yong woman, a faire woman, to gouerne a people, in nature mutinouſly proud, and alwaies before ſo vſed to hard gouernours, as they knew not how to obey without the ſworde were drawne. Yet could ſhe for ſome yeares, ſo cary her ſelfe among them, that they found cauſe in the delicacie of her ſex, of admiration, not of contempt: & which was notable, euen in the time that many countries about her were full of wars (which for old grudges to Corinth were thought ſtil would conclude there) yet ſo handled ſhe the matter, that the threatens euer ſmarted in the threatners; ſhe vſing ſo ſtrange, and yet ſo well-ſucceeding a temper, that ſhe made her people by peace, warlike; her courtiers by ſports, learned; her Ladies by Loue, chaſt. For by continuall martiall exerciſes without bloud, ſhe made them perfect in that blody art. Her ſports were ſuch as caried riches of Knowledge vpon the ſtream of Delight: & such the behauiour both of her selfe and her Ladies, as builded their chastitie not vpon waiwardnesse, but choice of worthinesse: So as it seemed, that court to haue bin the mariage place of Loue & Vertue, & that her selfe was a Diana apparelled in the garments of Venus. And this which Fame only deliuered vnto me, (for yet I haue neuer seene her) I am the willinger to speake of to you, who (I know) know her better, being your neere neighbour, because you may see by her example (in her self wise, & of others beloued) that neither folly is the cause of vehemēt loue, nor reproch the effect. For neuer (I think) was there any woman, that with more vnremouable determination gaue her self to the counsel of loue, after shee had once set before her mind the worthinesse of your cosin Amphialus; & yet is neither her wisedome doubted of, nor honor blemished. For (O God) what doth better become wisdome, then to discerne what is worthy the louing? what more agreable to goodnesse, then to loue it so discerned? & what to greatnesse of hart, then to be constant in it once loued? But at that time, that loue of hers was not so publikly known, as the death of Philoxenus & her search of Amphialus hath made it: but then seemed to haue such leasure to send thither diuerse choise knights of her court, because they might bring her, at least the knowledge, perchance the honor of that triūph. Wherin so they behaued themselues as for three daies they caried the prize; which being come from so far a place to disgrace her seruants, Palladius (who himselfe had neuer vsed armes) perswaded the Queene Andromana to be content (for the honor sake of her court) to suffer vs two to haue our horse & armour, that he with vs might vndertake the recouery of their lost honour: which she granted; taking our oth to go no further then her sonne, nor euer to abandon him. Which she did not more for sauing him, then keeping vs: and yet not satisfied with our oth, appointed a band of horsemen to haue eye, that we should not go beyond appointed limits. We were willing to gratifie the yong Prince, who (we saw) loued vs. And so the fourth day of that exercise, we came into the field: where (I remember) the manner was, that the forenoone they shold run at tilt, one after the other: the afternoone in a broad field in maner of a battell, til either the strangers, or that countrie Knights wan the field.

The first that ran was a braue Knight, whose deuise was to come in, all chayned with a Nymph leading him: his Impresa was Against him came forth an Iberian, whose manner of entring was, with Bagpipes in steed of trumpets; a shepheards boy before him for a Page, and by him a dozen apparelled like shepheards for the fashion, though rich in stuffe, who caried his Launces, which though strong to giue a launcely blow indeed, yet so were they coloured with hookes neere the mourne, that they pretily represented sheephooks. His owne furniture was dreft ouer with wooll, so enriched with Iewels artificially placed, that one would haue thought it a mariage betweene the loweſt and the higheſt. His Impresa was a Sheepe marked with pitch, with this woord Spotted to be knowne. And because I may tell you out his conceipt (though that were not done, till the running for that time was ended) before the Ladies departed from the windowes, among whom there was one (they say) that was the Star, whereby his course was onely directed. The Shepherds attending vpon PHILISIDES went among them, and sang an eclogue; one of them answering another, while the other shepherds pulling out recorders (which possest the place of pipes) accorded their musike to the others voice. The Eclogue had great praise: I onely remember sixe verses, while hauing questioned one with the other, of their fellow-shepheards sodaine growing a man of armes, and the cause of his so doing, they thus said.

Me

ME thought ſome ſtaues he miſt: if ſo, not much amiſſe:
For where he moſt would hit, he euer yet did miſſe.
Once ſaid he brake a croſſe; full well it ſo might be:
For neuer was there man more croſſely croſt then he.
But moſt cryed, O well broke: O foole full gaily bleſt:
VVhere failing is a ſhame, and breaking is his beſt.

Thus I haue digreſt, becauſe his manner liked me well: But when he began to run againſt Lelius, it had neere growne (though great loue had euer bene betwixt them) to a quarrell. For Philiſides breaking his ſtaues with great commendation, Lelius (who was knowne to be ſecond to none in the perfection of that art) ranne euer ouer his head, but ſo finely to the skilfull eyes, that one might well ſee he ſhewed more knowledge in miſſing, then others did in hitting. For with ſo gallant a grace his ſtaffe came ſwimming cloſe ouer the creſt of the Helmet, as if he would repreſent the kiſſe, and not the ſtroke of Mars. But Philiſides was much moued with it, while he thought Lelius would ſhew a contempt of his youth: till Lelius, (who therefore would ſatisfie him, becauſe he was his friend) made him know, that to ſuch bondage he was for ſo many courſes tyed by her, whoſe diſgraces to him were graced by her excellencie, and whoſe iniuries he could neuer otherwiſe returne, then honors.

But ſo by Lelius willing-miſſing was the oddes of the Iberian ſide, and continued ſo in the next by the excellent running of a Knight, though foſtred ſo by the Muſes, as many times the very ruſticke people left both their delights and profits to harken to his ſongs, yet could he ſo well performe all armed ſports, as if he had neuer had any other pen, then a Launce in his hand. He came in like a wilde man; but ſuch a wildeneſſe, as ſhewed his eye-ſight had tamed him, full of withered leaues, which though they fell not, ſtill threatned falling. His Impreſa was, a mill-horſe ſtill bound to goe in one circle; with this word, Data fata ſequutus. But after him the Corinthian knights abſolutely preuailed, eſpecially a great noble man of Corinth, whoſe deuice was to come without any deuice, all in white like a new Knight, as indeed he was; but ſo new, as his newnes ſhamed moſt of the others long exerciſe. Then another from whoſe tent I remember a birde was made flie, with ſuch art to carry a written embaſſage among the Ladies, that one might ſay, If a liue bird, how ſo taught? if a dead bird, how ſo made? Then he, who hidden, man and horſe in a great figure liuely repreſenting the Phœnix: the fire tooke ſo artificially, as it conſumed the bird, and left him to riſe as it were, out of the aſhes thereof. Againſt whom was the fine froſen Knight, froſen in deſpaire; but his armour ſo naturally repreſenting Ice, and all his furniture ſo liuely anſwering thereto, as yet did I neuer ſee any thing that pleaſed me better.

But the delight of thoſe pleaſing ſightes, haue caried me too farre into an vnneceſſary diſcourſe. Let it then ſuffice (moſt excellent Lady) that you know the Corinthians that morning in the exerciſe (as they had done the daies before) had the better; Palladius neither ſuffring vs, nor himſelf to take in hand the partie til the after noone; when we were to fight in troupes, not differing otherwiſe from earneſt, but that the ſharpeneſſe of the weapons was taken away. But in the triall Palladius (eſpecially led by Muſidorus, and ſomewhat aided by me) himſelfe truely behauing him ſelfe nothing like a beginner, brought the honour to reſt it ſelfe that night on the Iberian ſide: and the next day, both morning, and after-noone being kept by our partie. He (that saw the time fit for the deliuerie he intended) called vnto vs to follow him; which we both bound by oth, & willing by good-will, obeyed: and so the gard not daring to interrupt vs (he commaunding passage) we went after him vpon the spur to a little house in a forrest neere by: which he thought would be the fittest resting place, till we might go further from his mothers furie, wherat he was no lesse angrie, and ashamed, then desirous to obey Zelmane.

But his mother (as I learned since) vnderstanding by the gard her sonnes conueying vs away) forgetting her greatnesse, and resigning modestie to more quiet thoughts (flewe out from her place, and cried to be accompanied, for shee her-selfe would follow vs. But what she did (being rather with vehemencie of passion, then conduct of reason) made her stumble while she ran, & by her own confusion hinder her own desires. For so impatiently she commaunded, as a good while no body knew what she commaunded; so as we had gotten so farre the start, as to be already past the confines of her kingdome before she ouertooke vs: and ouertake vs she did in the kingdome of Bythinia, not regarding shame, or danger of hauing entred into anothers dominions: but (hauing with her about a threescore horse-men) streight commaunded to take vs aliue, and not to regard her sonnes threatning therein: which they attempted to do, first by speach, and then by force. But neither liking their eloquence, nor fearing their might, we esteemed few swords in a iust defence, able to resist many vniust assaulters. And so Musidorus incredible valour (beating downe all lets) made both me, and Palladius, so good way, that we had little to do to ouercome weake wrong.

And now had the victorie in effect without bloud, when Palladius (heated with the fight, and angrie with his mothers fault) so pursued our assaylers, that one of them (who as I heard since had before our comming bene a speciall minion of Andromanas, & hated vs for hauing dispossest him of her heart) taking him to be one of vs, with a traiterous blow slewe his yong Prince: who falling downe before our eyes, whom he specially had deliuered, iudge (sweetest Lady) whether anger might not be called iustice in such a case: once, so it wrought in vs, that many of his subiects bodies we left there dead, to wait on him more faithfully to the other world.

All this while disdaine, strengthened by the furie of a furious loue, made Andromana stay to the last of the combat: and when she saw vs light down, to see what help we might do to the helplesse Palladius, she came running madly vnto vs, then no lesse threatning, when she had no more power to hurt. But when she perceiued it was her onely sonne that lay hurt, and that his hurt was so deadly, as that already his life had lost the vse of the reasonable, and almost sensible part; then onely did misfortune lay his owne ouglinesse vpon her fault, and make her see what she had done, and to what she was come: especially, finding in vs rather detestation then pittie, (considering the losse of that young Prince) and resolution presently to departe, which still she laboured to stay. But depriued of all comfort, with eyes full of death, she ranne to her sonnes dagger, and before we were aware of it (who else would haue stayed it) strake her selfe a mortall wound. But then her loue, though not her person, awaked pittie in vs, and I went to her, while Musidorus laboured about Palladius. But the wound was past the cure of a better surgeon then my selfe, so as I could but receiue some fewe of her dying words, which were cursings of her ill set affection, and wishing vnto me many crosses and mischances in my loue, when soeuer I should loue, wherein I feare, and onely feare that her praiers is from aboue granted. But the noise of this fight, and issue thereof being blazed by the country people to some noble men thereabouts, they came thither, and finding the wrong offered vs, let vs go on our iourney, we hauing recõmended those royall bodies vnto them to be conueied to the King of Iberia. With that Philoclea, seeing the teares stand in his eyes with remẽbrance of Paladius, but much more of that which ther-

5 vpon grew, she would needes drink a kisse from those eyes, and he sucke another frõ her lips; wherat she blushed, and yet kissed him againe to hide her blushing: which had almost brought Pyrocles into another discourse, but that she with so sweete a rigor forbad him, that he durst not rebell, though he found it a great warre to keepe that peace, but was faine to goe on in his storie: for so she absolutely bad him, and 10 he durst not know how to disobey.

So (said he) parting from that place before the Sunne had much abased himselfe of his greatest height, we sawe sitting vpon the drie sandes) which yeelded at that time a verie hotte reflection) a faire Gentlewoman, whose gesture accused her of much sorow, aud euery way shewed she cared not what paine she put her body to,
15 since the better parte (her minde) was laide vnder so much agonie: and so was she dulled withal, that we could come so neare, as to heare her speeches, & yet she not perceiue the hearers of her lamentation. But wel we might vnderstand her at times say. Thou dost kill me with thy vnkinde falshood: and, It greeues me not to die, but it greeues me that thou art the murtherer: neither doth mine own paine so
20 much vexe me, as thy errour. For God knowes, it would not trouble me to be slaine for thee, but much it torments me to be slaine by thee. Thou art vntrue, Pamphilus, thou art vntrue, and woe is me therefore. How oft didst thou sweare vnto me, that the Sunne should loose his light, and the rockes runne vp and downe like little kiddes, before thou wouldest falsifie thy faith to me? Sunne therefore put out thy 25 shining, and rockes runne madde for sorrow, for Pamphilus is false. But alas the sun keepes his light, though thy faith be darkened; the rockes stand still; though thou change like a wethercocke. O foole that I am that thought I could graspe water, and binde the winde, I might well haue known thee by others, but I would not; and rather wished to learne poison by drinking it my selfe, while my loue helped thy 30 words to deceiue me. Well, yet I would thou hadst made a better choise when thou didst forsake thy vnfortunate Leucippe. But it is no matter, Baccha (thy new mistres) wil reuenge my wrongs. But do not Baccha, let Pamphilus liue happy though I dye.

And much more to such like phrase she spake, but that I (who had occasion to know some thing of that Pamphilus) stept to comfort her: and though I could not 35 doo that, yet I got thus much knowledge of her, that this being the same Leucippe, to whome the vnconstant Pamphilus had betrothed himselfe, which had moued the other Ladies to such indignation as I tolde you: neither her worthinesse (which in trueth was great) nor his owne suffering for her (which is woont to endeare affection (could fetter his fickleneſſe, but that before his mariage-daye appointed, he 40 had taken to wife that Baccha, of whome she complained; one, that in diuers places I had heard before blazed, as the most impudently vnchaste woman of all Asia; and withall, of such an imperiousnesse therein, that she would not sticke to employ them whome she made vnhappie with her fauour) to draw more companions of their follie: in the multitude of whome she did no lesse glorie, then a Captaine
45 would doo, of being followed by braue Souldiers: waiwardly proud; and therefore bold, because extremely faultie: and yet hauing no good thing to redeeme both these, and other vnlouely partes, but a little beautie, disgraced with wandering eyes, and vnwaied speeches; yet had Pamphilus (for her) left Leucippe, & withall, left his faith: Leucippe, of whom one looke (in a cleere iudgement) would haue bin more acceptable, then all her kindneſſes ſo prodigallie beſtowed. For my ſelfe, the remembrance of his cruell handling Dido, ioyned to this, ſtirred me to ſeeke ſome reuenge vpon him, but that I thought, it ſhould be a gaine to him to loſe his life, being ſo matched: and therefore (leauing him to be puniſhed by his owne election) we conueyed Leucippe to a houſe thereby, dedicated to Veſtall Nunnes, where ſhee reſolued to ſpend all her yeares (which her youth promiſed ſhould be many) in bewailing the wrong, and yet praying for the wrong doer.

But the next morning, we (hauing ſtriuē with the Sunnes earlineſſe) were ſcarcely beyond the proſpect of the high turrets of that building, when there ouertooke vs a young Gentleman, for ſo he ſeemed to vs, but indeede (ſweete Ladie) it was the faire Zelmane, Plexirtus daughter; whom vnconſulting affection (vnfortunately borne to me-wards) had made borrowe ſo much of her naturall modeſtie, as to leaue her more-decent rayments, and taking occaſion of Andromanas tumultuous purſuing vs, had apparelled her ſelfe like a page, with a pitifull crueltie cutting off her golden haire, leauing nothing, but the ſhort curles, to couer that noble head, but that ſhe ware vpon it a faire head-peece, a ſhield at her backe, and a launce in her hand, els diſarmed. Her apparell of white, wrought vpon with broken knots, her horſe, faire and luſtie, which ſhe rid ſo, as might ſhew a fearefull boldnes, daring to doo that, which ſhe knew that ſhe knew not how to doo: and the ſweeteneſſe of her countenance did giue ſuch a grace to what ſhe did, that it did make handſome the vnhandſomnes, and make the eye force the minde to beleeue, that there was a praiſe in that vnskilfulneſſe. But ſhe ſtraight approached me, and with fewe words (which borrowed the helpe of her counteahce to make themſelues vnderſtood) ſhe deſired me to accept her into my ſeruice; telling me ſhe was a noblemans ſonne of Iberia, her name Daiphantus, who hauing ſeen what I had done in that court, had ſtolne from her father, to follow me. I enquired the particularities of the maner of Andromanas following me, which by her I vnderſtood, ſhe hiding nothing (but her ſexe) from me. And ſtill me thought I had ſeene that face, but the great alteration of her fortune, made her far diſtant from my memorie: but liking verie well the yong Gentleman, (ſuch I tooke her to be) admitted this Daiphantus about me, who well ſhewed there is no ſeruice like his, that ſerues becauſe he loues. For though born of Princes bloud, brought vp with tendereſt educatiō, vnapt to ſeruice (becauſe a woman) and full of thoughts (becauſe in a ſtrange eſtate,) yet Loue enioyned ſuch diligence, that no apprentice, no, no bondſlaue could euer be by feare more readie at all commaundements, then that yong Princeſſe was. How often (alas) did her eyes ſay vnto me, that they loued? and yet, (I not looking for ſuch a matter) had not my conceipt open to vnderſtand them: how often would ſhe come creeping to me, betweene gladneſſe to be neare me, & feare to offend me? Truly I remember, that then I maruailed to ſee her receiue my commandements with ſighes, and yet do them with cheerefulneſſe: ſometimes anſwering me in ſuch riddles, as I then thought a childiſh inexperience: but ſince returning to my remembrance they haue come more cleere vnto my knowledge: and pardon me (onely deare Lady) that I vſe many words: for her affection to me deſerues of me an affectionate ſpeach.

But in ſuch ſort did ſhe ſerue me in that kingdom of Bythinia, for two monethes ſpace: in which time we brought to good end, a cruell warre long maintained betweene the king of Bythinia and his brother. For my excellent couſin, & I (diuiding our ſelues to either ſide) found meanes (after ſome triall we had made of our ſelues)

to get such credite with them, as we brought them to as great peace betweene thē-selues, as loue towards vs, for hauing made the peace. Which done, we entended to returne through the kingdome of Galatia, toward Thrace, to ease the care of our father and mother, who (we were sure) first with the shipwracke, and then with the other daungers we dayly past, should haue litle rest in their thoughts till they saw vs. But we were not entred into that kingdome, when by the noise of a great fight, we were guided to a pleasant vally, which like one of those Circusses, which in great Cities some where doth giue a pleasant spectacle of running horses; so of either side stretching it selfe in a narrow length was it hemd in by wooddy hilles; as if indeed Nature had meant therein to make a place for beholders. And there we beheld one of the cruellest fights betweene two Knights, that euer hath adorned the most martiall storie. So as I must confesse, a while we stood bewondred, another while delighted with the rare brauerie therof; till seeing such streames of bloud, as threatned a drowning of life, we galloped toward them to part them. But we were preuented by a dozen armed knights or rather villaines, who vsing this time of their extreame feebleness, altogether set vpon them. But common daunger brake off particular discord, so that (though with a dying weakness) with a liuely courage they resisted, and by our helpe draue away, or slue those murdering attempters: among whom we hapt to take aliue the principall. But going to disarme those two excellent knights, we found with no lesse wonder to vs, then astonishment to themselues, that they were the two valiant, and indeed famous brothers, Tydeus and Telenor; whose aduenture (as afterward we made that vngracious wretch confesse) had thus fallen out.

After the noble Prince Leonatus had by his fathers death succeeded in the kingdome of Galatia, he (forgetting all former iniuries) had receiued that naughty Plexirtus into a straight degree of fauour, his goodnesse being as apt to be deceiued, as the others craft was to deceiue. Till by plaine proofe finding, that the vngrateful man went about to poison him, yet would not suffer his kindnesse to be ouercome, not by iustice it selfe: but calling him to him, vsed words to this purpose. Plexirtus (saidhe) this wickednesse is found by thee; no good deedes of mine haue bene able to keepe it downe in thee: all men counsell me to take away thy life, likely to bring forth nothing, but as daungerous, as wicked effects, but I cannot find it in my heart, remembring what fathers sonne thou art: but since it is the violence of ambition, which perchaunce puls thee from thine owne iudgement, I will see, whether the satisfying that, may quiet the ill working of thy spirits. Not farre hence is the great citie of Trebisond; which, with the territorie about it, auncientlly pertained vnto this crowne, now vniustly possessed, and as vniustly abused by those, who haue neither title to hold it, nor vertue to rule it. To the conquest of that for thy selfe I will lend thee force, and giue thee my right: Go therefore, and with lesse vnnaturalnesse glut thy ambition there; and that done, if it be possible, learne vertue.

Plexirtus, mingling forsworne excuses with false-meant promises, gladly embraced the offer: and hastily sending backe for those two brothers (who at that time were with vs succouring the gracious Queene Erona) by their vertue chieflie (if not onlie) obtained the conquest of that goodlie dominion. Which indeed done by them, gaue them such an authoritie, that though he raigned, they in effect ruled, most men honouring them, because they only deserued honour; and manie, thinking therein to please Plexirtus, considering how much he was bound vnto them:

while they likewiſe (with a certaine ſincere boldneſſe of ſelf-warranting friendſhip) accepted all openly and plainely, thinking nothing ſhould euer by Plexirtus be thought too much in them, ſince all they were, was his.

But he who by the rules of his owne mind, could conſtrue no other end of mens doings, but ſelfe-ſeeking) ſodainly feared what they could do, and as ſodainlie ſuſpected, what they would do, and as ſodainly hated them, as hauing both might, and mind to do. But dreading their power, ſtanding ſo ſtrongly in their owne valour, and others affection, he durſt not take open way againſt them, and as hard it was to take a ſecret, they being ſo continually followed by the beſt, and euerie way ableſt of that region, and therefore vſed this diueliſh ſleight (which I will tell you) not doubting (moſt wicked man) to turne their owne friēdſhip toward him to their owne deſtruction. He (knowing that they well knew, there was no friendſhip betweene him and the new king of Pontus, neuer ſince he ſuccoured Leonatus and vs, to his ouerthrow) gaue them to vnderſtand that of late there had paſſed ſecret defiance betweene them, to meet priuately at a place appointed. Which though not ſo fit a thing for men of their greatneſſe, yet was his honour ſo engaged, as he could not go backe. Yet faining to find himſelfe weake by ſome counterfeit infirmitie, the day drawing neare, he requeſted each of them to go in his ſtead; making either of them ſweare to keepe the matter ſecret, euen each from other, deliuering the ſelfe ſame particularities to both, but that he told Tydeus, the king would meet him in a blew armour; and Telenor, that it was a blacke armour: and with wicked ſubtilty (as if it had bene ſo appointed) cauſed Tydeus to take a blacke armour, and Telenor a blew; appointing them wayes how to go, ſo as he knew they ſhold not meet, till they came to the place appointed, where each had promiſed to keep ſilence, leaſt the king ſhould diſcouer it was not Plexirtus: and there in a wait had hee laid theſe murtherers, that who ouerliued the other, ſhould by them be diſpatched: he not daring truſt more then thoſe with that enterpriſe, and yet thinking them too few, till themſelues by themſelues were weakened.

This we learned chieflie, by the chiefe of thoſe way-beaters, after the death of thoſe two worthie brothers, whoſe loue was no leſſe then their valour: but well we might find much therof by their pitifull lamentation, whē they knew their miſmeeting, and ſaw each other (in deſpite of the ſurgerie we could do vnto them) ſtriuing who ſhould run faſteſt to the goale of death: each bewayling the other, and more dying in the other, then in himſelfe: curſing their owne hands for doing, and their breaſts for not ſooner ſuffering: deteſting their vnfortunately-ſpent time in hauing ſerued ſo vngratefull a Tyrant, & accuſing their follie in hauing beleeued, he could faithfullie loue, who did not loue faithfulneſſe: wiſhing vs to take heed, how we placed our good will vpon any other ground, then proofe of vertue: ſince length of acquaintance, mutuall ſecrecies, nor height of benefits could bind a ſauage heart; no man being good to other, that is not good in himſelfe. Then (while any hope was) beſeeching vs to leaue the care of him that beſought, and onlie looke to the other. But when they found by thēſelues, and vs, no poſſibility, they deſired to be ioyned; and ſo embracing & crauing that pardon each of other, which they denied to themſelues, they gaue vs a moſt ſorowfull ſpectacle of their death; leauing few in the world behind thē, their matches in any thing, if they had ſoone enough knowne the ground & limits of friēdſhip. But with woful harts we cauſed thoſe bodies to be cōueyed to the next town of Bythinia, where we lerning thus much (as I haue told you) cauſed the wicked Hiſtorian to cōclude his ſtory with his owne wel-deſerued death.

But then (I must tell you) I found such wofull countenances in Daiphantus, that I could not but much maruell (finding them continue beyond the first assault of pitie) how the case of strangers (for further I did not conceiue) could so deepely pierce. But the truth indeed is, that partly with the shame and sorow she tooke of her fathers faultinesse, partlie with the feare, that the hate I conceiued against him, would vtterlie disgrace her in my opinion, whensoeuer I should know her, so vehemently perplexed her, that her faire colour decayed, and dayly and hastilie grew into the verie extreme working of sorowfulnesse: which oft I sought to learne, and helpe. But she as fearefull as louing, still concealed it; and so decaying still more and more in the excellencie of her faireneſſe, but that whatsoeuer weakeneſſe tooke away, pitie seemed to adde: yet stil she forced her self to waite on me, with such care and diligence, as might well shew had bene taught in no other schoole but Loue.

While we returning againe to embarke our selues for Greece, vnderstood that the mightie Otanes (brother to Barzanes slaine by Musidorus, in the battell of the sixe Princes) had entred vpon the kingdome of Pontus, partlie vpon the pretences he had to the crowne, but principally, because he wold reuenge vpon him (whom he knew we loued) the losse of his brother: thinking (as indeed he had cause) that wherſoeuer we were, hearing of his extremitie, we would come to relieue him; in spite wherof he doubted not to preuaile, not onely vpon the confidence of his owne vertue and power, but especiallie because he had in his companie two mighty Giants, sons to a couple, whō we slue in the same realme, they hauing bene absent at their fathers death, and now returned, willinglie entred into his seruice, hating (more then he) both vs, and that king of Pontus. We therefore with all speed went thitherward, but by the way this fell out, which whensoeuer I remember without sorow, I must forget withall, all humanitie.

Poore Daiphantus fell extreme sicke, yet would needs conquer the delicacie of her constitution, and force her selfe to waite on me: till one day going toward Pontus, we met one, who in great haste went seeking for Tydeus and Telenor, whose death as yet was not knowne vnto the messenger; who (being their seruant, and knowing how dearelie they loued Plexirtus) brought them word, how since their departing, Plexirtus was in present daunger of a cruell death, if by the valiantneſſe of one of the best knights of the world, he were not rescued: we enquired no further of the matter (being glad he shold now to his losse find what an vnprofitable treason it had bene vnto him, to dismember himself of two such friends) and so let the messenger parte, not sticking to make him know his maisters destruction by the falshood of Plexirtus.

But the griefe of that (finding a bodie alreadie brought to the last degree of weakneſſe) so ouerwhelmed the litle remnant of the spirits left in Daiphantus, that she fell sodainlie into deadlie sowndings; neuer comming to her selfe, but that withall she returned to make most pitifull lamentations; most straunge vnto vs, because we were farre from guessing the ground thereof. But finding her sickneſſe such as began to print death in her eyes, we made all haste possible to conuey her to the next towne: but before we could lay her on a bed, both we, and she might find in her selfe, that the harbingers of ouer-hastie death had prepared his lodging in that daintie bodie, which she vndoubtedlie feeling, with a weake chearfulneſſe, shewed comfort therein and then desiring vs both to come neare her, and that no bodie elſe might be present; with pale, and yet (euen in paleneſſe) louely lips; Now or neuer, and neuer indeed, but now is it time for me, ſaid ſhe, to ſpeake: & I thanke death which giues me leaue to diſcouer that, the ſuppreſſing whereof perchance hath bene the ſharpeſt ſpurre, that hath haſted my race to this end. Know then my Lords, and eſpeciallie you my Lord and maiſter Pyrocles, that your page Daiphantus is the vnfortunate Zelmane, who for your ſake cauſed my (as vnfortunate) louer and couſin Palladius, to leaue his fathers court, and conſequently, both him & my Aunt his mother, to loſe their liues. For your ſake my ſelfe haue become, of a Princeſſe a Page: and for your ſake haue put off the apparell of a woman, and (if you iudge not more mercifully) the modeſtie. We were amazed at her ſpeech, and then had (as it were) new eyes giuen vs to perceiue that, which before had bene a preſent ſtranger to our minds: for indeed forthwith we knew it to be the face of Zelmane, whom before we had knowne in the court of Iberia. And ſorow and pitie laying her paine vpon me, I comforted her the beſt I could by the tenderneſſe of good will, pretending indeed better hope then I had of her recouerie.

But ſhe that had inward embaſſadours from the tyrant that ſhortly would oppreſſe her: No, my deare maiſter (ſaid ſhe) I neither hope nor deſire to liue. I know you would neuer haue loued me (and with that word ſhe wept) nor, alas, had it bene reaſon you ſhould, conſidering manie wayes my vnworthineſſe. It ſufficeth me that the ſtrange courſe I haue taken, ſhall to your remembrance, witneſſe my loue: and yet this breaking of my heart, before I would diſcouer my paine, will make you I hope, thinke that I was not altogether vnmodeſt. Thinke of me ſo, deare maiſter, and that thought ſhall be my life: and with that languiſhingly looking vpon me: And I pray you (ſaid ſhe) euen by theſe dying eyes of mine (which are only ſorie to die, becauſe they ſhall looſe your ſight) and by theſe polled lockes of mine (which while they were long, were the ornament of my ſex, now in their ſhort curles, the teſtimonie of my ſeruitude:) and by the ſeruice I haue done you (which God knowes hath bene full of loue) thinke of me after my death with kindneſſe, though you cannot with loue. And whenſoeuer ye ſhall make any other Ladie happie with your well placed affection, if you tell her my follie, I pray you ſpeake of it, not with ſcorne, but with pitie. I aſſure you (deare Princeſſe of my life, for how could it be otherwiſe?) her words and her maner, with the liuely conſideration of her loue, ſo pierced me, that though I had diuerſe griefes before, yet me thought, I neuer felt till then, how much ſorow enfeebleth al reſolutiõ: for I could not chooſe but yeeld to the weakeneſſe of abundant weeping; in truth with ſuch griefe, that I could willinglie at that time haue chaunged liues with her.

But when ſhe ſaw my teares, O God, ſaid ſhe, how largely am I recompenced for my loſſes? why then (ſaid ſhe) I may take boldneſſe to make ſome requeſts vnto you. I beſought her to do, vowing the performance, though my life were the price thereof. She ſhewed great ioy: The firſt, ſaid ſhe, is this, that you will pardon my father the diſpleaſure you haue iuſtlie conceiued againſt him, and for this once, ſuccour him out of the danger wherein he is: I hope he will amend: and I pray you, whenſoeuer you remember him to be the faultie Plexirtus, remember withall that he is Zelmanes father. The ſecond is, that when you come once into Greece, you will take vnto your ſelfe this name (though vnluckie) of Daiphantus, and vouchſafe to be called by it: for ſo ſhall I be ſure, you ſhall haue cauſe to remember me: and let it pleaſe your noble couſin to be called Palladius, that I do that right to that poore Prince, that his name yet may liue vpon the earth in ſo excellent a perſon: and ſo betweene you, I truſt ſometimes your vnluckie page ſhall bee (perhaps with a ſigh) mentioned. Laſtlie, let me be buried here obſcurely, not ſuffering my friends to know my fortune, till (when you are ſafely returned to your owne countrie) you cauſe my bones to be conueyed thither, and laid (I beſeech you) in ſome place, where your ſelfe vouchſafe ſometimes to reſort. Alas, final petitions for ſuch a ſuter; which yet ſhe ſo earneſtlie craued, that I was faine to ſweare the accompliſhment. And then kiſſing me, and often deſiring me not to condemne her of lightneſſe, in mine armes ſhe deliuered her pure ſoule to the pureſt place: leauing me as full of agonie, as kindneſſe, pitie & ſorow could make an honeſt heart. For I muſt confeſſe for true, that if my ſtarres had not wholie reſerued me for you, there elſe perhaps I might haue loued, and (which had bene moſt ſtrange) begun my loue after death: whereof let it be the leſſe maruell, becauſe ſomewhat ſhe did reſemble you: though as farre ſhort of your perfection, as her ſelfe dying, was of her ſelfe flouriſhing: yet ſomething there was, which (when I ſaw a picture of yours) brought againe her figure into my remembrance, and made my hart as apt to receiue the wound, as the power of your beautie with vnreſiſtable force to pierce.

But we in wofull (and yet priuate) maner burying her, performed her commaundement: and then enquiring of her fathers eſtate, certainely learned that he was preſently to be ſuccoured, or by death to paſſe the need of ſuccor. Therfore we determined to deuide our ſelues; I, according to my vow, to helpe him, and Muſidorus toward the King of Pontus, who ſtood in no leſſe need then immediate ſuccour, & euen ready to depart one from the other, there came a meſſenger from him, who after ſome enquirie found vs, giuing vs to vnderſtand, that he truſting vpon vs two, had appointed the combate betweene him and vs, againſt Otanes and the two Giants. Now the day was ſo accorded, as it was impoſſible for me both to ſuccour Plexirtus, and be there, where my honour was not only ſo farre engaged, but (by the ſtraunge working of vniuſt fortune) I was to leaue the ſtanding by Muſidorus, whom better then my ſelfe I loued, to go ſaue him, whom for iuſt cauſes I hated. But my promiſe giuen, & giuen to Zelmane, and to Zelmane dying, preuailed more with me, then my friendſhip to Muſidorus: though certainely I may affirme, nothing had ſo great rule in my thoughts as that. But my promiſe caried me the eaſier, becauſe Muſidorus himſelfe would not ſuffer me to breake it. And ſo with heauie minds (more carefull each of others ſucceſſe, then of our owne) we parted; I toward the place, where I vnderſtood Plexirtus was priſoner to an ancient Lord, abſolutely gouerning a goodly Caſtle, with a large territorie about it, whereof he acknowledged no other ſoueraigne but himſelfe; whoſe hate to plexirtus grew for a kinſman of his, whō he malicioufly had murdered, becauſe in the time that he raigned in Galatia, he found him apt to practiſe for the reſtoring of his vertuous brother Leonatus. This old knight, ſtill thirſting for reuenge, vſed (as the way to it) a policy, which this occaſion I will tell you, prepared for him. Plexirtus in his youth had maried Zelmanes mother, who dying of that onely child-birth, he a widower, and not yet a king, haunted the Court of Armenia; where (as he was cunning to winne fauour) he obtained great good liking of Artaxia, which he purſued, till (being called home by his father) he falſly got his fathers kingdome; and then neglected his former loue: till throwne out of that (by our means) before he was deeply rooted in it, and by and by againe placed in Trebiſond, vnderſtanding that Artaxia by her brothers death was become Queene of Armenia, he was hotter thē euer in that purſuit, which being vnderſtood by this old knight, he forged ſuch a letter, as might be written from Artaxia, entreating his preſent (but verie priuate) repaire thither, giuing him faithfull promiſe of preſent mariage: a thing farre from her thought, hauing faithfullie and publikely proteſted, that ſhe would neuer marie anie, but ſome ſuch Prince who would giue ſure prooſe, that by his means we were deſtroyed. But he (no more wittie to frame, then blind to iudge hopes) bit haſtilie at the baite, and in priuate maner poſted toward her, but by the way hee was met by this knight, farre better accompanied, who quicklie laid hold of him, and condemned him to death, cruell enough, if any thing may be both cruell and iuſt. For hee cauſed him to be kept in a miſerable priſon, till a day appointed, at which time he would deliuer him to bee deuoured by a monſtrous beaſt of moſt vglie ſhape, armed like a Rhinoceros, as ſtrong as an Elephant, as fierce as a Lion, as nimble as a Leopard, and as cruell as a Tigre: whom he hauing kept in a ſtrong place, from the firſt youth of it, now thought no fitter match, then ſuch a beaſtlie monſter with a monſtrous Tyrant: proclaiming yet withal, that if any ſo well loued him, as to venture their liues againſt his beaſt, for him, if they ouercame, he ſhould be ſaued: not caring how many they were (ſuch confidence he had in that monſters ſtrength) but eſpeciallie hoping to entrap thereby the great courages of Tydeus and Telenor, whom he no leſſe hated, becauſe they had bene principall inſtruments of the others power.

I dare ſay, if Zelmane had knowne what daunger I ſhould haue paſſed, ſhe wold rather haue let her father periſh, then me to haue bidden that aduenture. But my word was paſt, and trulie, the hardneſſe of the enterpriſe was not ſo much a bit as a ſpurre vnto me; knowing well, that the iourney of high honour lies not in plaine wayes. Therfore, going thither, and taking ſufficient ſecuritie that Plexirtus ſhould be deliuered if I were victorious, I vndertooke the combate: and (to make ſhort, excellent Lady, and not to trouble your eares with recounting a terrible matter) ſo was my weakneſſe bleſſed from aboue, that without daungerous wounds I ſlue that monſter, which hundreds durſt not attempt: to ſo great admiration of many (who from a ſafe place might looke on) that there was order giuen, to haue the fight both by ſculpture and picture, celebrated in moſt partes of Aſia. And the old Noble-man ſo well liked me, that he loued me; only bewayling, my vertue had bene employed to ſaue a worſe monſter then I killed: whom yet (according to faith giuen) he deliuered, and accompanied me to the kingdome of Pontus, whither I would needs in all ſpeed go, to ſee whether it were poſſible for me (if perchance the day had bene delayed) to come to the combate: but that (before I came) had bene thus finiſhed.

The vertuous Leonatus vnderſtãding two ſo good friends of his were to be in that daunger, would perforce be one himſelfe; where he did valiantly, and ſo did the king of Pontus. But the truth is, that both they being ſore hurt, the incomparable Muſidorus finiſhed the combate by the death of both the Giants, and the taking of Otanes priſoner. To whõ as he gaue his life, ſo he got a noble friend, for ſo he gaue his word to be, and he is well knowne to thinke himſelfe greater in being ſubiect to that, then in the greatneſſe of his Principalitie.

But thither (vnderſtanding of our being there) flocked great multitudes of many great perſons, and euen of Princes; eſpeciallie thoſe, whom we had made beholding vnto vs: as, the Kings of Phrygia, Bythinia, with thoſe two hurt, of Pontus and Galatia, and Otanes the priſoner, by Muſidorus ſet free; and thither came Plexirtus of Trebiſond, and Antiphilus then king of Lycia; with as manie mo great Princes drawne either by our reputation, or by willingneſſe to acknowledge themthemſelues obliged vnto vs, for what we had done for the others. So as in thoſe parts of the world, I thinke, in many hundreds of yeares there was not ſeene ſo royall an aſſemblie: where nothing was let paſſe to do vs the higheſt honours, which ſuch perſons (who might commaund both purſes and inuentions) could performe. All from all ſides bringing vnto vs right royall preſents (which wee to auoid both vnkindneſſe and importunitie, liberallie receiued) & not content therewith, would needs accept, as from vs their crownes, and acknowledge to hold them of vs: with manie other exceſſiue honours, which would not ſuffer the meaſure of this ſhort leiſure to deſcribe vnto you.

But we quickly awearie thereof, haſted to Greece-ward, led thither partly with the deſire of our Parents, but haſtened principallie, becauſe I vnderſtood that Anaxius with open mouth of defamation had gone thither to ſeeke me, & was now come to Peloponneſus, where frō Court to Court he made enquirie of me, doing yet himſelf ſo noble deeds, as might hap to authorize an ill opiniō of me. We therefore ſuffered but ſhort delayes, deſiring to take this countrie in our way, ſo renowmed ouer the world, that no Prince could pretend height, nor begger lowneſſe, to barre him from the ſound thereof: renowmed indeed, not ſo much for the ancient praiſes attributed thereunto, as for the hauing in it Argalus and Amphialus (two knights of ſuch rare proweſſe, as we deſired eſpecially to know) and yet by farre not ſo much for that, as without ſuffering of compariſon for the beautie of you and your ſiſter, which makes all indifferent iudges, that ſpeake thereof, account this countrey as a temple of deities. But theſe cauſes indeed mouing vs to come by this land, we embarked our ſelues in the next port, whither all thoſe Princes (ſauing Antiphilus, who returned, as he pretended, not able to tarie longer from Erona) conueyed vs. And there found we a ſhip moſt royallie furniſhed by Plexirtus, who had made all things ſo proper (as well for our defence, as eaſe) that all the other Princes greatly commended him for it: who ſeeming a quite altered man) had nothing but repentance in his eyes, friendſhip in his geſture, and vertue in his mouth: ſo that we who had promiſed the ſweet Zelmane to pardon him, now not onely forgaue, but began to fauor; perſwading our ſelues with a youthfull credulity, that perchance things were not ſo euill as we tooke them, and as it were, deſiring our owne memorie that it might be ſo. But ſo were we licenſed from thoſe Princes, trulie not without teares, eſpecially of the vertuous Leonatus, who with the king of Pontus would haue come with vs, but that we (in reſpect of the ones young wife, and both their new ſetled kingdomes) would not ſuffer it. Then would they haue ſent whole fleetes to guard vs: but we, that deſired to paſſe ſecretly into Greece, made them leaue that motion, when they found that more ſhippes then one would be diſpleaſing vnto vs. But ſo committing our ſelues to the vncertaine diſcretion of the wind, we (then determining as ſoone as we came to Greece, to take the names of Daiphantus and Palladius, as well for our owne promiſe to Zelmane, as becauſe we deſired to come vnknowne into Greece) left the Aſian ſhore full of Princely perſons, who euen vpon their knees recommended our ſafeties to the deuotion of their chiefe deſires: among whom none had bene ſo officious (though I dare affirme, all quite contrarie to his vnfaithfulneſſe) as Plexirtus.

And ſo hauing ſailed almoſt two dayes, looking for nothing but when we might looke vpon the land, a graue man (whom we had ſeene of great truſt with Plexirtus, and was ſent as our principall guide) came vnto vs, and with a certaine kind manner mixt with ſhame, and repentance, began to tell vs, that he had taken ſuch a loue vnto vs (considering our youth and fame) that though he were a seruant and a seruant of such trust about Plexirtus, as that he had committed vnto him euen those secrets of his heart, which abhord all other knowledge; yet he rather chose to reueale at this time a most pernicious counsel, then by concealing it bring to ruine those, whom he could not choose but honour. So went he on, and told vs, that Plexirtus (in hope thereby to haue Artaxia, endowed with the great kingdome of Armenia, to his wife) had giuen him order when we were neare Greece, to find some opportunitie to murder vs, bidding him to take vs asleepe, because he had seene what we could do waking. Now sirs (said he) I would rather a thousand times lose my life then haue my remembrance (while I liued) poysoned with such a mischiefe: and therefore if it were only I, that knew herein the kings order, then should my disobedience be a warrant of your safetie. But to one more (said he) namely the Captaine of the ship, Plexirtus hath opened so much touching the effect of murdering you, though I think laying the cause rather vpō old grudge, thē his hope of Artaxia. And my selfe, (before the consideration of your excellencies had drawne loue and pitie into mind) imparted it to such, as I thought fittest for such a mischiefe. Therefore, I wish you to stand vpon your gard, assuring you, that what I can do for your safetie, you shall see (if it come to the push) by me performed. We thanked him, as the matter indeed deserued, & from that time would no more disarme our selues, nor the one sleep without his friends eyes waked for him: so that it delayed the going forward of their bad enterprise, while they thought it rather chaunce, then prouidence, which made vs so behaue our selues.

But when we came within halfe a dayes sayling of the shore, so that they saw it was speedilie, or not at all to be done. Then (& I remēber it was about the first watch in the night) came the Captaine and whispered the Councellour in the eare: But he (as it should seeme) disswading him frō it, the Captaine (who had bene a pyrate from his youth, and often blouded in it) with a loud voyce sware, that if Plexirtus bad him, he would not sticke to kill God himselfe. And therewith cald his mates, and in the kings name willed them to take vs aliue or dead; encouraging them with the spoyle of vs, which he said (and indeed was true) would yeeld manie exceeding rich iewels. But the Councellour according to his promise) commanded them they should not commit such a villanie, protesting that he would stand betweene them and the kings anger therein. Wherewith the Captaine enraged: Nay (said he) then we must begin with this traitor himselfe: and therewith gaue him a sore blow vpon the head, who honestly did the best he could to reuenge himselfe.

But then we knew it time rather to encounter, then waite for mischiefe. And so against the Captaine we went, who straight was enuironed with most part of the Souldiers and Mariners. And yet the trueth is, there were some, whom either the authoritie of the Councellour, doubt of the Kings mind, or liking of vs, made draw their swords of our side: so that quicklie it grew a most confused fight. For the narrownesse of the place, the darknesse of the time, and the vncertaintie in such a tumult how to knowe friends from foes, made the rage of swordes rather guide then be guided by their maisters. For my cousin and me, trulie I thinke we neuer performed lesse in any place, doing no other hurt then the defence of our selues, and succouring them who came for it, draue vs to: for not discerning perfectlie, who were for, or against vs, we thought it lesse euill to spare a foe, then spoile a friend. But from the highest to the lowest part of the shippe there was no place left, without cries of murdering, and murdered persons. The Captaine I hapt a while to fight withall, but was driuen to part with him, by hearing the crie of the Counsellour, who receiued a mortall wound, mistaken of one of his owne side. Some of the wiser would call to parley, and wish peace, but while the words of peace were in their mouthes, some of their euill auditors gaue them death for their hire. So that no man almost could conceiue hope of liuing, but by being last aliue: and therefore euerie one was willing to make himselfe roome, by dispatching almost any other: so that the great number in the ship was reduced to exceeding few, when of those few the most part wearie of those troubles leapt into the boat, which was fast to the ship: but while they that were first were cutting off the rope that tied it, others came leaping in so disorderlie, that they drowned both the boate and themselues.

But while euen in that litle remnant (like the children of Cadmus) we continued still to slay one another, a fire, which (whether by the desperate malice of some, or intention to separate, or accidentallie while all things were cast vp and downe) it should seeme had taken a good while before, but neuer heeded of vs, (who onely thought to preserue or reuenge) now violentlie burst out in many places, & began to maister the principall parts of the ship. Then necessitie made vs see, that a common enemie sets at one a ciuil warre: for that litle al we were (as if we had bene waged by one man to quench a fire) straight went to resist that furious enemie by all art and labour: but it was too late; for already it did embrace and deuour from the sterne to the waste of the ship: so as labouring in vaine, we were driuen to get vp to the prowe of the ship, by the worke of nature seeking to preserue life as long as we could: while truly it was a straunge and vglie sight, to see so huge a fire, as it quicklie grew to be in the sea, and in the night, as if it had come to light vs to death. And by and by it had burned off the mast, which all this while had proudly borne the saile (the wind, as might seeme, delighted to carie fire and bloud in his mouth) but now it fell ouer boord, and the fire growing nearer vs, it was not onely terrible in respect of what we were to attend, but insupportable through the heat of it.

So that we were constrained to bide it no longer, but disarming and stripping our selues, and laying our selues vpon such things, as we thought might helpe our swimming to the land (too farre for our owne strength to beare vs) my cousin and I threw our selues into the Sea. But I had swomme a verie litle way, when I felt (by reason of a wound I had) that I should not be able to bide the trauell, and therefore seeing the maste (whose tackling had bene burnt off) flote cleare from the ship, I swam vnto it, and getting on it, I found mine owne sword, which by chaunce, when I threw it away (caught by a peece of canuas) had hung to the mast. I was glad, because I loued it well; but gladder, when I saw at the other end the Captaine of the ship and of all this mischiefe; who hauing a long pike, belike had borne himselfe vp with that, til he had set himselfe vpon the mast. But when I perceiued him, Villaine said I, doest thou thinke to ouerliue so manie honest men, whom thy falshood hath brought to destruction? With that bestriding the mast, I gat by litle and litle towards him, after such a maner as boyes are wont (if euer you saw that sport) when they ride the wilde mare. And he perceiuing my intention, like a fellow that had much more courage then honestie, set himselfe to resist: but I had in short space gotten within him, and (giuing him a sound blow) sent him to feed fishes. But there my self remained, vntill by Pyrates I was taken vp, & among them againe taken prisoner, and brought into Laconia.

But what (said Philoclea) became of your cousin Musidorus? Lost, said Pyrocles.

Ah my Pyrocles, ſayd Philoclea, I am glad I haue taken you. I perceiue you louers do not alwayes ſay truly: as though I knew not your couſin Dorus the ſhepheard? Life of my deſires (ſaid Pyrocles,) what is mine, euen to my ſoule is yours: but the ſecret of my friend is not mine. But if you know ſo much, then I may trulie ſay, he is loſt, ſince he is no more his owne. But I perceiue, your noble ſiſter & you are great friends, and well doth it become you ſo to be. But go forward deare Pyrocles, I long to heare out till your meeting me: for there to me-ward is the beſt part of your ſtorie. Ah ſweet Philoclea (ſaid Pyrocles) do you thinke I can thinke ſo precious leiſure as this well ſpent in talking. Are your eyes a fit booke (thinke you) to reade a tale vpon? Is my loue quiet enough to be an hiſtorian? Deare Princeſſe, be gracious vnto me. And then he faine would haue remembred to haue forgot himſelfe. But ſhe with a ſweetly diſobeying grace, deſired him that her deſire (once for euer) might ſerue, that no ſpot might diſgrace that loue, which ſhortlie ſhe hoped ſhould be to the world warrantable. Faine he would not haue heard, till ſhe threatned anger: and then the poore louer durſt not, becauſe he durſt not. Nay, I pray thee, deare Pyrocles (ſaid ſhe) let me haue my ſtorie. Sweet Princeſſe (ſaid he) giue my thoughts a litle reſpite: and if it pleaſe you, ſince this time muſt ſo be ſpoiled, yet it ſhall ſuffer the leſſe harme, if you vouchſafe to beſtow your voyce, & let me know, how the good Queene Erona was betrayed into ſuch daunger, and why Plangus ſought me. For indeed I ſhould pitie greatly any miſchaunce fallen to that Princeſſe. I will, ſaid Philoclea ſmiling, ſo you giue me your word, your hands ſhall be quiet auditours. They ſhall, ſayd he, becauſe ſubiect. Then began ſhe to ſpeake, but with ſo pretie and delightfull a maieſty, when ſhe ſet her countenance to tell the matter, that Pyrocles could not chuſe but rebell ſo far as to kiſſe her. She would haue puld her head away, and ſpeake, but while ſhe ſpake he kiſt, and it ſeemed he fed vpon her words: but ſhe gat away. How will you haue your diſcourſe (ſaid ſhe) without you let my lips alone? He yeelded & took her hand. On this (ſaid he) will I reuenge my wrong: and ſo began to make much of that hand, when her tale, and his delight were interrupted by Miſo: who taking her time, while Baſilius backe was turned, came vnto them; and told Philoclea, ſhe deſerued ſhe knew what, for leauing her mother, being euill at eaſe, to keep companie with ſtrangers. But Philoclea telling her, that ſhe was there by her fathers commandement, ſhe went away muttering, that though her backe and her ſhoulders, and her necke were broken, yet as long as her tongue would wag, it ſhould do her errand to her mother: and ſo went vp to Gynecia, who was at that time miſerablie vexed with this maner of dreame. It ſeemed vnto her to be in a place full of thornes, which ſo moleſted her, as ſhe could neither abide ſtanding ſtill, nor tread ſafelie going forward. In this caſe ſhe thought Zelmane, being vpon a faire hill, delightful to the eye, & eaſie in apparance, called her thither: whither with much anguiſh being come, Zelmane was vaniſhed, & ſhe found nothing but a dead body like vnto her husband, which ſeeming at the firſt with a ſtrāge ſmel to infect her, as ſhe was readie likewiſe within a while to die, the dead bodie ſhe thought tooke her in his armes, and ſaid, Gynecia, leaue all, for here is thy onlie reſt.

With that ſhe awaked, crying, very loud, Zelmane, Zelmane. But remembring her ſelfe, and ſeeing Baſilius by, (her guiltie conſcience more ſuſpecting, then being ſuſpected, ſhe turned her call, & called for Philoclea. Miſo forthwith like a valiāt ſhrew (looking at Baſilius, as though ſhe would ſpeake though ſhe died for it) told Gynecia, that her daughter had bene a whole houre together in ſecret talke with Zelmane: And (ſayes ſhe) for my part I could not be heard, (your daughters are brought vp in such awe) though I told her of your pleasure sufficiently. Gynecia, as if she had heard her last doome pronounced against her, with a side looke and changed countenance, O my Lord (said she) what meane you to suffer these young folkes together. Basilius (that aymed nothing at the marke of her suspition) smilingly tooke her in his armes; sweet wife, said he, I thanke you for your care of your child: but they must be youthes of other mettall then Zelmane, that can endaunger her. O but; cried Gynecia, and therewith she stayed: for then indeed she did suffer a right conflict betwixt the force of loue, and rage of iealousie. Many times was she about to satisfy the spite of her mind, & tell Basilius, how she knew Zelmane to be far otherwise thē the outward appearance. But those many times were all put backe by the manifold obiections of her vehement loue. Faine she would haue bard her daughters hap, but loth she was to cut off her owne hope. But now, as if her life had bene set vpon a wager of quicke rising, as weake as she was, she gat vp; though Basilius (with a kindnesse flowing only from the fountaine of vnkindnesse, being indeed desirous to win his daughter as much time as might be) was loth to suffer it, swearing he saw sicknesse in her face, and therfore was loth she should aduenture the ayre.

But the great and wretched Lady Gynecia, possessed with those diuels of Loue and Iealousie, did rid her selfe from her tedious husband: and taking no body with her going toward them; O Iealousie, said she, the phrensie of wise folkes, the welwishing spite, and vnkind carefulnesse, the selfe-punishment for others fault, and selfe-miserie in others happinesse, the cousin of enuie, daughter of loue, and mother of hate, how couldest thou so quietly get thee a seat in the vnquiet heart of Gynecia, Gynecia (said she sighing) thought wise, and once vertuous? Alas it is thy breeders power which plants thee there: it is the flaming agonie of affection, that works the chilling accesse of thy feuer, in such sort, that nature giues place; the growing of my daughter seemes the decay of my selfe; the blessings of a mother turne to the curses of a competitor; and the faire face of Philoclea appeares more horrible in my sight then the image of death. Then remembred she this song, which she thought tooke a right measure of her present mind.

With two strange fires of equall heat possest,
The one of Loue, the other Iealousie,
Both still do worke, in neither find I rest:
For both, alas, their strengths together tie:
The one aloft doth hold, the other hie.
Loue wakes the iealous eye least thence it moues:
The iealous eye, the more it lookes, it loues.

These fires increase: in these I daylie burne:
They feed on me, and with my wings do flie:
My louely ioyes to dolefull ashes turne:
Their flames mount vp, my powers prostrate lie:
They liue in force, I quite consumed die.
One vvonder yet farre passeth my conceat.
The fewell small: how be the fires so great?

But her vnleasured thoughts ran not ouer the ten first words; but going with a pace not so much too fast for her body, as slow for her mind; she found them together, who after Misos departure, had left their tale, and determined what to say to Basilius. But full abashed was poore Philoclea (whose conscience now began to know cause of blushing) for first salutation, receiuing an eye from her mother, full of the same disdainefull scorne, which Pallas shewed to poore Arachne, that durst contend with her for the prize of well weauing: yet did the force of loue so much rule her, that though for Zelmanes sake she did detest her, yet for Zelmanes sake she vsed no harder words to her, then to bid her go home, and accompany her solitary father.

Then began she to display to Zelmane the storehouse of her deadly desires, when suddenly the confused rumor of a mutinous multitude gaue iust occasion to Zelmane to breake off any such conference (for well shee found, they were not friendly voices they heard) and to retire with as much diligence as conueniently they could towards the lodge. Yet before they could winne the lodge by twentie paces, they were ouertaken by an vnruly sort of clownes, and other rebels, which like a violent floud, were caried, they themselues knew not whither. But assoone as they came within perfect discerning these Ladies, like enraged beastes, without respect of their estates, or pity of their sexe, they began to runne against them, as right villaines, thinking ability to doo hurt, to be a great aduancement: yet so many as they were, so many almost were their minds, all knit together onely in madnesse. Some cried, Take; some, Kill; some, Saue: but euen they that cried saue, ran for company with them that meant to kill. Euery one commaunded, none obeyed, hee onely seemed chiefe Captaine, that was most ragefull.

Zelmane (whose vertuous courage was euer awake) drew out her sword, which vpon those il-armed churles giuing as many wounds as blowes, & as many deathes almost as wounds (lightning courage, and thundring smart vpon them) kept them at a bay, while the two Ladies got themselues into the lodge: out of the which Basilius (hauing put on an armour long vntried) came to proue his authoritie among his subiects, or at least, to aduēture his life with his deare mistresse, to whom he brought a shield, while the Ladies trēblingly attended the issue of this dangerous aduenture. But Zelmane made them perceiue the ods betweene an Eagle and a Kite, with such a nimble stayednesse, and such an assured nimblenesse, that while one was running backe for feare, his fellow had her sword in his guts.

And by and by was both her heart and helpe well encreased by the comming of Dorus, who hauing beene making of hurdles for his maisters sheepe, heard the horrible cries of this madde multitude; and hauing streight represented before the eyes of his carefull loue, the perill wherein the soule of his soule might bee, hee went to Pamelas lodge, but found her in a caue hard by, with Mopsa and Dametas, who at that time would not haue opened the entrie to his father. And therefore leauing them there (as in a place safe, both for being strong, and vnknowne) he ranne as the noise guided him. But when he saw his friend in such danger among them, anger and contempt (asking no counsell but of courage) made him runne among them, with no other weapon but his sheephooke, and with that ouerthrowing one of the villaines, tooke away a two-hand sword from him, and withall, helpt him from euer being ashamed of loosing it. Then lifting vp his braue head, and flashing terror into their faces, he made armes and legs go complaine to the earth, how euill their maisters had kept them. Yet the multitude still growing, and the very killing wearying them (fearing, least in long fight they shold be conquered with conquering) they drew backe towards the lodge; but drew backe in such sort, that still their terror went forward: like a valiant mastiffe, whom when his maister pulles backe by the taile frō

the beare(with whom he hath already interchanged a hatefull imbracemēt)though his paſe be backward,his geſture is forward, his teeth and eyes threatning more in the retiring,then they did in the aduancing: ſo guided they themſelues homeward, neuer ſtepping ſteppe backward, but that they proued themſelues maiſters of the ground where they ſtept.

Yet among the rebels there was a dapper fellow, a tayler by occupation, who fetching his courage onely from their going backe,began to bow his knees,and very fencer-like to draw neare to Zelmane. But as he came within her diſtance,turning his ſword very nicely about his crowne, Baſilius, with a ſide blow,ſtrake off his noſe. He(being a ſuiter to a ſeamſters daughter,and therefore not a litle grieued for ſuch a diſgrace)ſtouped downe,becauſe he had heard,that if it were freſh put to,it would cleaue on againe. But as his hand was on the ground to bring his noſe to his head, Zelmane with a blow, ſent his head to his noſe. That ſaw a butcher, a butcherly chuffe indeed (who that day was ſworne brother to him in a cup of wine)and lifted vp a great leauer, calling Zelmane all the vile names of a butcherly eloquence. But ſhe (letting ſlippe the blow of the leauer) hitte him ſo ſurely vpon the ſide of his face,that ſhe left nothing but the nether iawe,where the tongue ſtill wagged,as willing to ſay more, if his maiſters remembrance had ſerued. O (ſayd a miller that was halfe dronke) ſee the lucke of a good fellow, and with that word, ran with a pitchforke at Dorus: but the nimbleneſſe of the wine caried his head ſo faſt,that it made it ouer-runne his feete,ſo that he fell withall,iuſt betweene the legs of Dorus: who ſetting his foote on his necke (though he offered two milche kine, and foure fat hogs for his life)thruſt his ſword quite through, from one eare to the other; which tooke it very vnkindlie,to feele ſuch newes before they heard of them, in ſtead of hearing, to be put to ſuch feeling. But Dorus (leauing the miller to vomit his ſoule out in wine and bloud)with his two-hand ſword ſtrake off another quite by the waſte,who the night before had dreamed he was growne a couple,and (interpreting it that he ſhould be maried) had bragd of his dreame that morning among his neighbours. But that blow aſtoniſhed quite a poore painter,who ſtood by with a pike in his hāds. This painter was to counterfeit the skirmiſh betweene the Centaures and Lapithes, and had bin very deſirous to ſee ſome notable wounds,to be able the more liuely to expreſſe them; and this morning(being caried by the ſtreame of this company) the fooliſh fellow was euen delighted to ſee the effect of blowes. But this laſt (hapning neare him) ſo amazed him,that he ſtood ſtocke ſtill,while Dorus (with a turne of his ſword)ſtrake off both his hands. And ſo the painter returned, well skilled in wounds but with neuer a hand to performe his skill.

In this maner they recouered the lodge,and gaue the rebels a face of wood of the outſide. But they then(though no more furious,yet more couragious when they ſaw no reſiſter)went about with pickaxe to the wall,& fire to the gate,to get themſelues entrance. Then did the two Ladies mixe feare with loue,eſpecially Philoclea, who euer caught hold of Zelmane, ſo(by the follie of loue) hindering the ſuccour which ſhe deſired. But Zelmane ſeeing no way of defence,nor time to deliberate(the number of thoſe villaines ſtill encreaſing,and their madneſſe ſtill increaſing with their number) thought it onely the meanes to goe beyond their expectation with an vnuſed boldneſſe, and with danger to auoide daunger: and therefore opened againe the gate, and (Dorus and Baſilius ſtanding ready for her defence) ſhe iſſued againe among them. The blowes ſhe had dealt before (though all in generall were haſtie) made each of them in particular take breath, before they brought them ſodainly ouer-ne:re her, ſo that ſhe had time to get vp to the iudgement-ſeate of the Prince, which (according to the guiſe of that countrie) was before the court gate. There ſhe pauſed a while, making ſigne with her hand vnto them, and withall, ſpeaking aloud, that ſhe had ſom thing to ſay vnto thē, that wold pleaſe thē. But ſhe was anſwered a while with nothing but ſhouts and cries; and ſome beginning to throw ſtones at her, not daring to approch her. But at length, a yong farmer (who might do moſt among the countrie ſort, and was caught in a litle affection towards Zelmane) hoping by this kindneſſe to haue ſome good of her, deſired them, if they were honeſt men, to heare the woman ſpeake. Fie fellowes, fie, (ſaid he) what will all the maides in our towne ſay, if ſo many tall men ſhall be afraide to heare a faire wench? I ſweare vnto you by no little ones, I had rather giue my teeme of oxen, then we ſhould ſhew our ſelues ſo vnciuil wights. Beſides, I tell you true, I haue heard it of old men counted wiſdome, to heare much, and ſay little. His ſententious ſpeech ſo preuailed, that the moſt part began to liſten. Then ſhe, with ſuch efficacie of graceſulneſſe, and ſuch a quiet magnanimitie repreſented in her face in this vttermoſt perill, as the more the barbarous people looked, the more it fixed their looks vpon her, in this ſort began vnto them.

It is no ſmall comfort vnto me (ſaid ſhe) hauing to ſpeake ſomthing vnto you for your own behooſes, to finde that I haue to deale with ſuch a people, who ſhew indeede in themſelues the right nature of valure, which as it leaues no violence vnattempted, while the choller is nouriſhed with reſiſtance; ſo when the ſubiect of their wrath, doth of it ſelf vnlooked for offer it ſelfe into their hands, it makes them at leſt take a pauſe before they determine crueltie. Now then firſt (before I come to the principall matter) haue I to ſay vnto you; that your Prince Baſilius himſelfe in perſon is within this Lodge, and was one of the three, whom a fewe of you went about to fight withall: (and this ſhe ſaid, not doubting but they knew it well inough; but becauſe ſhe would haue them imagine, that the Prince might thinke that they did not know it) by him am I ſent vnto you, as from a Prince to his well approued ſubiects, nay as from a father to beloued children, to know what it is that hath bred iuſt quarrell among you, or who they be that haue any way wronged you? what it is with which you are diſpleaſed, or of which you are deſirous? This he requires: and in deed (for he knowes your faithfulneſſe) he commaunds you preſently to ſet downe, and to chooſe among your ſelues ſome one, who may relate your griefes or demaunds vnto him.

This (being more then they hoped for from their Prince) aſſwaged well their furie, and many of them conſented (eſpecially the yong farmer helping on, who meant to make one of the demaunds that he might haue Zelmane for his wife) but when they began to talke of their grieues, neuer Bees made ſuch a confuſed humming: the towne dwellers demanding putting downe of impoſts: the countrey fellowes laying out of commons: ſome would haue the Prince keepe his Court in one place, ſome in another. All cried out to haue new councellors: but whē they ſhould thinke of any new, they liked them as well as any other, that they could remember, eſpecially they would haue the treaſure ſo looked vnto, as that he ſhould neuer need to take any more ſubſidies. At length they fell to direct contrarieties. For the Artiſans, they would haue corne & wine ſet at a lower price, & bound to be kept ſo ſtill: the plowmē, vine-laborers, & farmers would none of that. The countrimē demanded that euery man might be free in the chief townes: that could not the Burgeſſes like of. The peaſants would haue al the Gentlemē deſtroied, the Citizens (eſpecially ſuch as Cookes, Barbers, and thoſe other that liued moſt on Gentlemen) would but haue them reformed. And of ech ſide were like diuiſions, one neighbourhood beginning to finde fault with another. But no confuſion was greater then of particular mens likings & diſlikings: one diſpraiſing ſuch a one, whom another praiſed, & demanding ſuch a one to be puniſhed, whom the other would haue exalted. No leſſe ado was there about chooſing him, who ſhould be their ſpokes-man. The finer ſort of Burgeſſes, as Marchants, Prentiſes, and Clothworkers, becauſe of their riches, diſdaining the baſer occupations, and they becauſe of their number as much diſdaining them: all they ſcorning the countrimens ignorance, & the countrymen ſuſpecting as much their cunning: So that Zelmane (finding that their vnited rage was now growne, not only to a diuiding, but to a croſſing one of another, and that the miſlike growne among themſelues did well allay the heat againſt her) made tokens againe vnto them (as though ſhe tooke great care of their well doing, and were afraid of their falling out) that ſhe would ſpeake vnto them. They now growne iealous one of another (the ſtay hauing ingendred diuiſion, and diuiſion hauing manifeſted their weaknes) were willing enough to heare, the moſt part ſtriuing to ſhew themſelues willinger then their fellowes: which Zelmane (by the acquaintance ſhe had had with ſuch kind of humors) ſoone perceiuing, with an angerleſſe brauery, & an vnabaſhed mildneſſe, in this maner ſpake vnto them.

An vnuſed thing it is, and I thinke not heretofore ſeene, ô Arcadians, that a woman ſhould giue publike counſel to men, a ſtranger to the country people, and that laſtly in ſuch a preſence by a priuate perſon, the regal throne ſhould be poſſeſſed. But the ſtrangeneſſe of your action makes that vſed for vertue, which your violent neceſſitie impoſeth. For certainely, a woman may well ſpeake to ſuch men, who haue forgotten all manlike gouernment: a ſtranger may with reaſon inſtruct ſuch ſubiects, that neglect due points of ſubiection: and is it maruaile this place is entred into by another, ſince your owne Prince (after thirtie yeares gouernment) dare not ſhew his face vnto his faithfull people? Heare therefore, ô Arcadians, and be aſhamed: againſt whom hath this zealous rage bin ſtirred? whither haue bene bent theſe manful weapõs of yours? In this quiet harmles lodge there be harbourd no Argians your ancient enimies, nor Laconians your now feared neighbours. Here be neither hard landlords, nor biting vſurers. Here lodge none, but ſuch, as either you haue great cauſe to loue, or no cauſe to hate: here being none, beſides your Prince, Princeſſe, & their children, but my ſelfe. Is it I then, ô Arcadians, againſt whom your anger is armed? Am I the mark of your vehement quarell? if it be ſo, that innocencie ſhal not be a ſtop for fury; if it be ſo, that the law of hoſpitalitie (ſo long & holily obſerued among you) may not defend a ſtraunger fled to your armes for ſuccour: if in fine it be ſo, that ſo many valiant mens courages can be enflamed to the miſchiefe of one ſilly woman; I refuſe not to make my life a ſacrifice to your wrath. Exerciſe in me your indignation, ſo it go no further, I am content to pay the great fauours I haue receiued among you, with my life, not ill deſeruing I preſent it here vnto you, ô Arcadians, if that may ſatisfie you; rather thẽ you (called ouer the world the wiſe & quiet Arcadians) ſhold be ſo vaine, as to attẽpt that alone, which all the reſt of your country will abhor; then you ſhold ſhew your ſelues ſo vngratefull, as to forget the fruite of ſo many years peaceable gouernment; or ſo vnnatural, as not to haue with the holy name of your natural Prince, any furie ouer-maſtred. For ſuch a helliſh madneſſe (I know) did neuer enter into your hearts, as to attempt anie thing againſt his perſon; which no ſucceſſor, though neuer ſo hatefull, will euer leaue (for his owne ſake)vnreuenged.Neither can your wonted valour be turned to ſuch a baſeneſſe,as in ſtead of a Prince,deliuered vnto you by ſo many royal aunceſtors, to take the tyrannous yoke of your fellow ſubiect,in whom the innate meanes will bring foorth rauenous couetouſneſſe,and the newneſſe of his eſtate,ſuſpectful crueltie. Imagin, what could your enimies more wiſh vnto you, then to ſee your owne eſtate with your owne hands vndermined? O what would your fore-fathers ſay, if they liued at this time, and ſaw their of-ſpring defacing ſuch an excellent principalitie, which they with much labour and bloud ſo wiſely haue eſtabliſhed? Do you thinke them fooles,that ſaw you ſhould not enioy your vines,your cattell,no not your wiues and children,without gouernment; and that there could be no gouernment without a Magiſtrate, and no Magiſtrate without obedience, and no obedience where euery one vpon his owne priuate paſſion, may interprete the doings of the rulers? Let your wits make your preſent example a leſſon to you. What ſweetneſſe (in good faith)find you in your preſent condition? what choiſe of choiſe finde you,if you had loſt Baſilius? vnder whoſe enſigne would you go,if your enimies ſhould inuade you? If you cannot agree vpō one to ſpeake for you,how will you agree vpon one to fight for you? But with this feare of I cannot tell what, one is troubled, and with that paſſed wrong another is grieued. And I pray you did the Sunne euer bring you a fruitfull harueſt,but that it was more hotte then pleaſant? Haue any of you children,that be not ſometimes cumberſome? Haue any of you fathers, that be not ſometime weariſh? What, ſhall we curſe the Sunne, hate our children,or diſobey our fathers? But what need I vſe theſe words,ſince I ſee in your countenances(now vertuouſly ſettled) nothing els but loue and dutie to him, by whom for your onely ſakes the gouernment is embraced. For all what is done, he doth not onely pardon you,but thanke you; iudging the action by the mindes, and not the mindes by the action. Your griefes,and deſires, whatſoeuer, and whenſoeuer you liſt,he will conſider of,and to his conſideration it is reaſon you ſhould refer them. So then,to conclude; the vncertaintie of his eſtate made you take armes;now you ſee him wel,with the ſame loue lay them downe. If now you end(as I know you will) he will make no other account of this matter,but as of a vehement, I muſt confeſſe ouer-vehement affection: the only continuance might proue a wickedneſſe. But it is not ſo,I ſee verie well,you began with zeale,and will end with reuerence.

The action Zelmane vſed, being beautified by nature and apparelled with skill, her geſtures being ſuch,that as her words did paint out her minde, ſo they ſerued as a ſhadow,to make the picture more liuely and ſenſible,with the ſweete cleerneſſe of her voice, riſing and falling kindly as the nature of the worde, and efficacie of the matter required,altogether in ſuch an admirable perſon, whoſe incomparable valour they had well felt, whoſe beautie did pierce through the thicke dulneſſe of their ſenſes, gaue ſuch a way vnto her ſpeach through the rugged wilderneſſe of their imaginations,who(beſides they were ſtricken in admiration of her,as of more then a humane creature) were coold with taking breath, and had learned doubtes out of leaſure, that in ſteed of roaring cries, there was now heard nothing, but a confuſed muttring,whether her ſaying were to be followed, betwixt feare to purſue,and lothneſſe to leaue: moſt of them could haue bene content,it had neuer bene begun,but how to end it (each afraide of his companion,) they knew not, finding it far eaſier to tie then to looſe knots. But Zelmane thinking it no euill way in ſuch mutinies,to giue the mutinous ſome occaſion of ſuch ſeruice, as they might thinke(in their owne iudgement)would counteruaile their treſpaſſe,withall,to take the more assured possession of their minds, which she feared might begin to wauer, Loiall Arcadians (said she) now do I offer vnto you the manifesting of your duties: all those that haue taken armes for the Princes safetie, let them turne their backs to the gate, with their weapõs bent against such as would hurt his sacred person. O weake trust of the many-headed multitude, whom inconstancie only doth guide to wel doing: who can set confidence there, where cõmpany takes away shame, and ech may lay the fault on his fellow? So said a crafty fellow amõg thẽ, named Clinias, to himself, when he saw the word no sooner out of Zelmanes mouth, but that there were some shouts of ioy with, God saue Basilius, & diuers of them with much iollity growne to be his guard, that but little before meant to be his murderers.

This Clinias in his youth had bene a scholler so farre, as to learne rather wordes then maners, and of words rather plentie then order; and oft had vsed to be an actor in Tragedies, where he had learned, besides a slidingnesse of language, acquaintance with many passions and to frame his face to beare the figure of them: long vsed to the eyes and eares of men, and to recken no fault, but shamefastnesse, in nature, a most notable Coward, and yet more strangely then rarely venturous in priuie practises.

This fellow was become of neere trust to Cecropia; Amphialus his mother, so that he was priuy to al the mischieuous deuises, wherewith she went about to ruine Basilius and his children, for the aduauncing of her sonne: and though his education had made him full of tongue, yet his loue to be doing, taught him in any euill to be secret; and had by his mistresse bene vsed (euer since the strange retiring of Basilius) to whisper rumours into the peoples eares: and this time (finding great aptnesse in the multitude) was one of the chiefe that set them in the vprore (though quite without the cõsẽt of Amphialus, who would not for all the Kingdõs of the world so haue aduentured the life of Philoclea.) But now perceiuing the flood of their furie began to ebbe, he thought it policie to take the first of the tide, so that no man cried lowder then he vpon Basilius. And some of the lustiest rebels not yet agreeing to the rest, he caused two or three of his mates that were at his commaundement to lift him vp, and then as if he had had a prologue to vtter, he began with a nice grauitie to demaund audience. But few attending what he said, with vehement gesture, as if he would teare the starres from the skies, he fell to crying out so lowde, that not onely Zelmane, but Basilius might heare him. O vnhappie men, more mad then the Giants that would haue plucked Iupiter out of heauen, how long shall this rage continue? Why do you not all throw downe your weapons, & submit your selues to our good Prince, or good Basilius, the Pelops of wisdom, and Minos of all good gouernment? when will you begin to beleeue me, and other honest & faithful subiects, that haue done all we could to stop your furie

The farmer that loued Zelmane could abide him no longer. For as at the first he was willing to speake of conditions, hoping to haue gotten great soueraintie, and among the rest Zelmane: so now perceiuing, that the people, once any thing down the hill from their furie, would neuer stay til they came to the bottome of absolute yeelding, and so that he should be nearer feares of punishment, then hopes of such aduancement, he was one of them that stood most against the agreement: and to begin withall, disdaining this fellow should play the preacher, who had bin one of the chiefest make-bates, strake him a great wound vpon the face with his sword. The cowardly wretch fell downe, crying for succour, and (scrambling through the legs of them that were about him) gat to the throne, where Zelmane tooke him, and comforted him, bleeding for that was paſt, and quaking for feare of more.

But as ſoone as that blow was giuen (as if Æolus had broke open the doore to let all his winds out) no hand was idle, ech one killing him that was next, for feare he ſhould do as much to him. For being diuided in minds and not diuided in companies, they that would yeeld to Baſilius were intermingled with them that would not yeeld. Theſe men thinking their ruine ſtood vpon it; thoſe men to get fauour of their Prince, conuerted their vngracious motion into their owne bowels, and by a true iudgement grew their owne puniſhers. None was ſooner killed then thoſe that had bene leaders in the diſobedience: who by being ſo, had taught them, that they did leade diſobediēce to the ſame leaders. And many times it fell out that they killed them that were of their owne faction, anger whetting, and doubt haſtening their fingers. But then came downe Zelmane; and Baſilius with Dorus iſſued, and ſomtimes ſeeking to draw together thoſe of their party, ſomtimes laying indifferētly among them, made ſuch hauocke (among the reſt Zelmane ſtriking the farmer to the hart with her ſword, as before ſhe had done with her eyes) that in a while all they of the contrary ſide were put to flight, and fled to certaine woods vpon the frontiers; where feeding wildly, and drinking only water, they were diſciplined for their dronken riots; many of them being ſlaine in the chaſe, about a ſcore onely eſcaping. But when theſe late rebels, now ſouldiers, were returned from the chaſe, Baſilius calling them togither, partly for policy ſake, but principally becauſe Zelmane before had ſpoken it (which was to him more then a diuine ordinance) he pronounced their generall pardon, willing them to returne to their houſes, and thereafter be more circumſpect in their proceedings: which they did moſt of them with ſharp marks of their folly. But imagining Clinias to be one of the chiefe that had bred this good alteration, he gaue him particular thanks, and withall willed him to make him know this frenzie had entred into the people.

Clinias purpoſing indeede to tell him the truth of all, ſauing what did touch himſelfe, or Cecropia, firſt dipping his hand in the blood of his wound, Now by this blood (ſaid he) which is more deare to me then al the reſt that is in my body, ſince it is ſpent for your ſafety: this tong (perchance vnfortunate, but neuer falſe) ſhall not now begin to lie vnto my Prince, of me moſt beloued. Then ſtretching out his hād, and making vehement countenances the vſhers to his ſpeeches, in ſuch maner of tearmes recounted this accident. Yeſterday (ſaid he) being your birth-day, in the goodly greene two mile hence before the citie of Eniſpus, to do honour to the day, were a foure or fiue thouſand people (of al conditiōs, as I think) gathered together, ſpending all the day in dancings & other exercciſes: & when night came, vnder tents and bowes making great cheare, and meaning to obſerue a waſſaling watch all that night for your ſake. Bacchus (the learned ſay) was begot with thunder: I thinke, that made him euer ſince ſo full of ſtur & debate. Bacchus indeed it was which founded the firſt trumpet to this rude Alarum. For that barbarous opinion being generally among them, to think with vice to do honor, & with actiuitie in beaſtlineſſe to ſhew abundance of loue, made moſt of them ſeeke to ſhew the depth of their affectiō in the depth of their draught. But being once wel chafed with wine (hauing ſpēt al the night, & ſome peece of the morning in ſuch reuelling) & imboldned by your abſented maner of liuing, there was no matter their eares had euer heard of that grew not to be a ſubiect of their winie conference. I ſpeake it by proofe: for I take witneſſe of the Gods (who neuer leaue periuries vnpuniſhed) that I oftē cried out againſt their impudencie, & (when that would not ſerue) ſtopt mine eares, becauſe I would not be partaker of their blasphemies, til with buffets they forced me to haue mine eares and eies defiled. Publike affaires were mingled with priuat grudges, neither was any man thought of wit, that did not pretende some cause of mislike. Rayling was counted the fruite of freedom, and saying nothing had his vttermost praise in ignorance. At the length, your sacred person (alas) why did I liue to heare it? alas howe do I breath to vtter it? But your commandement doth not only enioyn obedience, but giue me force: your sacred person (I say) fel to be their table-talke: a proud word swelling in their stomacks, & disdainful reproches against so great a greatnes, hauing put on the shew of greatnesse in their little minds: til at length the very vnbrideled vse of wordes hauing increased fire in their mindes (which God wot thought their knowledge notable, because they had at all no knowledge to condemne their owne want of knowledge) they descended (O neuer to be forgotten presumption) to a direct mislike of your liuing from among them. Whereupon it were tedious to remember their far-fetched constructiõs. But the summe was, you disdained them: and what were the pompes of your estate, if their armes maintained you not? Who would call you a Prince, if you had not a people? When certaine of them of wretched estates, and worse mindes (whose fortunes change could not impaire) began to say, that your gouernement was to be looked into; how the great treasures (you had leuied among them) had bene spent; why none but great men and gentlemen could be admitted into counsell, that the commons (forsooth) were too plaine headed to say their opinions: but yet their blood and sweat must maintaine all. Who could tell whether you were not betraied in this place, where you liued? nay whether you did liue or go? Therefore that it was time to come and see; and if you were here, to know (if Arcadia were growne lothsome in your sight) why you did not rid your selfe of the trouble? There would not want those that would take so faire a cumber in good parte. Since the Countrie was theirs, and the gouernement an adherent to the countrie, why should they not consider of the one as well as inhabite the other? Nay rather (said they) let vs begin that, which all Arcadia will followe. Let vs deliuer our Prince from daunger of practises, and our selues from want of a Prince. Let vs do that, which all the rest thinke. Let it be said, that we onely are not astonished with vaine titles, which haue their force but in our force. Lastly, to haue said and heard so much, was as dangerous, as to haue attempted: and to attempt they had the glorious name of libertie with thẽ. These words, being spoken (like a furious storme) presently carried away their well inclined braines. What I, and some other of the honester sort could do, was no more then if with a puffe of breath, one should go about to make a saile go against a mightie winde: or, with one hand, stay the ruine of a mightie wall. So generall grewe this madnesse among them, there needed no drumme, where each man cryed, each spake to other that spake as fast to him, and the disagreeing sound of so many voices was the chiefe token of their vnmeete agreement. Thus was their banquet turned to a battaile, their winie mirthes to bloudie rages, and the happie prayers for your life to monstrous threatning of your estate; the solemnizing your birth-day, tended to haue bene the cause of your funerals. But as a drunken rage hath (besides his wickednesse) that follie, that the more it seekes to hurt, the lesse it considers how to be able to hurt: they neuer wayed how to arme themselues but tooke vp euery thing for a weapon, that furie offered to their hands. Many swordes, pikes, and billes there were: others tooke pitchforkes and rakes, conuerting husbandrie to souldierie, some caught hold of spittes (things seruiceable for life) to be the instruments of death. And there was some ſuch one, who held the ſame pot wherein he dranke to your health, to vſe it (as he could) to your miſchiefe. Thus armed, thus gouerned forcing the vnwilling, and hartening the willing, adding furie to furie, and encreaſing rage with running, they came headlong toward this lodge: no man (I dare ſay) reſolued in his owne heart, what was the vttermoſt he would doo when he came hither. But as miſchiefe is of ſuch nature, that it cannot ſtand but with ſtrengthning one euill by an other, and ſo multiplie in it ſelf, till it come to the higheſt, and then fall with his owne weight: ſo to their mindes (once paſſed the boundes of obedience) more and more wickednesſe opened it ſelfe, ſo that they who firſt pretended to preſerue you, then to reforme you, (I ſpeake it in my conſcience, and with a bleeding hart) now thought no ſafetie for them, without murdering you. So as if the Goddes (who preſerue you for the preſeruation of Arcadia) had not ſhewed their miraculous power, and that they had not vſed for inſtruments, both your owne valour (not fit to be ſpoken of by ſo meane a mouth as mine) and ſome (I muſt confeſſe) honeſt minds, (whom alas why ſhould I mention, ſince what we did, reached not to the hundred part of our duty?) our handes (I tremble to think of it) had deſtroyed all that, for which we haue cauſe to reioyce that we are Arcadians.

With that the fellow did wring his hands, and wrang out teares: ſo as Baſilius, that was not the ſharpeſt piercer into masked minds, tooke a good liking to him; and ſo much the more as he had tickled him with praiſe in the hearing of his miſtres. And therefore pitying his wound, willed him to get him home, and looke well vnto it, & make the beſt ſearch he could, to know if there were any further depth in this matter, for which he ſhould be well rewarded. But before he went away, certaine of the ſhepheards being come (for that day was appointed for their paſtorals) he ſent one of them to Philanax, and another to other principall noble-men, and cities thereabouts, to make through-inquirie of this vprore, and withall, to place ſuch garriſons in all the townes and villages neere vnto him, that he might thereafter keepe his ſolitarie lodge in more ſecuritie, vpon the making of a fire, or ringing of a bell, hauing them in a readineſſe for him.

This, Clinias (hauing his eare one way when his eye was an other) had perceiued & therefore haſted away, with mind to tell Cecropia, that ſhe was to take ſome ſpeedie reſolution, or els it were daunger thoſe examinations would both diſcouer, and ruine her: and ſo went his way, leauing that little companie with embracements, and praiſing of Zelmanes excellent proceeding, to ſhew, that no decking ſets foorth any thing ſo much, as affection. For as, while ſhe ſtoode at the diſcretion of thoſe vndiſcreete rebelles, euery angry countenance any of them made, ſeemed a knife layde vpon their owne throates, ſo vnſpeakable was now their ioy, that they ſawe (beſides her ſafetie and their owne) the ſame wrought, and ſafely wrought by her meanes, in whom they had placed all their delights. What examples Greece could euer alledge of witte and fortitude, were ſet in the ranke of trifles, being compared to this action.

But as they were in the midſt of thoſe vnfained ceremonies, a Gitterne, il-played on, accompanied with a hoarce voice (who ſeemed to ſing mauger the Muſes, and to be merie in ſpite of Fortune) made them looke the way of the ill-noyſed ſong. The ſong was this.

A Hateſull cure with hate to keale:
A bloody helpe with blood to ſaue:

A foolish thing with fooles to deale:
Let him be bobd that bobs will haue.
But who by meanes of wiſdome hie
Hath ſau'd his charge? it is euen I.

Let others deck their pride with skarres,
And of their wounds make braue lame showes:
Firſt let them die, then paſſe the ſtarres,
When rotten Fame will tell their blowes.
But eye from blade, and eare from crie:
Who hath ſau'd all? it is euen I.

They had ſoone found it was Dametas, who came with no leſſe lifted vp countenance, then if he had paſſed ouer the bellies of all his enimies: ſo wiſe a point he thought he had performed, in vſing the naturall ſtrength of the caue. But neuer was it his doing to come ſo ſoone thence, till the coaſt were more aſſuredly cleare: for it was a rule with him, that after a great ſtorme there euer fall a fewe drops before it be fully finiſhed. But Pamela (who had now experienced how much care doth ſollicite a Louers heart) vſed this occaſion of going to her parents & ſiſter, indeed aſwel for that cauſe, as being vnquiet, til her eye might be aſſured how her ſhepheard had gone through the daunger. But Baſilius with the ſight of Pamela (of whom almoſt his head otherwiſe occupied, had left the wonted remembrance) was ſodainly ſtriken into a deuout kind of admiration, remembring the oracle, which (according to the fauning humour of falſe hope) he interpreted now his own to his own beſt, and with the willing blindneſſe of affection (becauſe his minde ran wholly vpon Zelmane) he thought the Gods in their oracles did principally minde her.

But as he was deepely thinking of the matter, one of the ſhepheards told him, that Philanax was already come with an hundred horſe in his cõpany. For hauing by chaunce rid not farre off the litle deſert, he had heard of this vprore, and ſo was come vpon the ſpurre (gathering a company of Gentlemen as faſt as he could) to the ſuccour of his Maſter. Baſilius was glad of it; but not willing to haue him, nor any other of the Noble men, ſee his Miſtreſſe) he himſelfe went out of the Lodge, and ſo giuing order vnto him of placing garriſons, and examining theſe matters; and Philanax with humble earneſtneſſe beginning to entreat him to leaue off this ſolitarie courſe (which alreadie had bene ſo daungerous vnto him,) Well (ſaid Baſilius) it may be ere long I will condiſcend vnto your deſire. In the meane time, take you the beſt order you can to keepe me ſafe in my ſolitarineſſe. But (ſaid he) do you remember, how earneſtly you wrote vnto me, that I ſhould not be moued by that Oracles authoritie, which brought me to this reſolution? Full well Sir (anſwered Philanax) for though it pleaſed you not as then to let me know, what the Oracles words were, yet all Oracles holding (in my conceipt) one degree of reputation, it ſufficed me to know, it was but an Oracle, which led you frõ your owne courſe. Wel (ſaid Baſilius) I will now tell you the wordes; which before I thought not good to do; becauſe when all the euents fall out (as ſome alreadie haue done) I may charge you with your incredulitie. So he repeated them in this ſort.

THy elder care ſhall from thy careſull face
By princely meane be ſtolne, and yet not loſt.

Thy yonger shall with Natures bliſſe embrace
And vncouth loue, which Nature hateth moſt.
Both they themſelues vnto ſuch two shall wed,
VVho at thy beer, as at a barre, shall plead;
VVhy thee (a liuing man) they had made dead.
In thine owne ſeat a forraine ſtate shall ſit.
And ere that all theſe blowes thy head do hit,
Thou, with thy wife, adultry shall commit.

For you forſooth (ſaid he) when I told you, that ſome ſupernaturall cauſe ſent me ſtrange viſions, which being confirmed with preſagious chaunces, I had gone to Delphos, & there receiued this anſwere, you replied to me, that the only ſupernaturall cauſes were the humors of my body, which bred ſuch melancholy dreames; and that both they framed a mind ful of cõceipts, apt to make preſages of things, which in themſelues were meerly chaunceable: and withall as I ſaie, you remember what you wrote vnto me, touching authoritie of the Oracle: but now I haue ſome notable triall of the truth thereof, which hereafter I will more largely cõmunicate vnto you. Only now, know that the thing I moſt feared is already performed; I mean that a forraine ſtate ſhould poſſeſſe my throne. For that hath bene done by Zelmane, but not as I feared, to my ruine, but to my preſeruation. But when he had once named Zelmane, that name was as good as a pully, to make the clock of his praiſes run on in ſuch ſort, that (Philanax found) was more exquiſite then the onely admiration of vertue breedeth: which his faithfull hart inwardly repining at, made him ſhrinke away as ſoone as he could, to go about the other matters of importance, which Baſilius had enioyned vnto him.

Baſilius returned into the Lodge, thus by him ſelfe conſtruing the oracle, that in that he ſaid, his elder care ſhould by Princely meane be ſtolne away from him, and yet not loſt, it was now perfourmed, ſince Zelmane had as it were robd from him the care of his firſt begotten child, yet was it not loſt, ſince in his hart the ground of it remained. That his yonger ſhould with Natures bliſſe embrace the loue of Zelmane, becauſe he had ſo commaunded her for his ſake to doo; yet ſhould it be with as much hate of Nature, for being ſo hatefull an oppoſite to the iealouſie he thought her mother had of him. The ſitting in his ſeate he deemed by her alreadie performed: but that which moſt comforted him, was his interpretation of the adulterie, which he thought he ſhold commit with Zelmane, whom afterwardes he ſhould haue to his wife. The point of his daughters mariage, becauſe it threatened his death withall, he determined to preuent with keeping them (while he liued) vnmaried. But hauing as he thought, gotten thus much vnderſtanding of the Oracle, he determined for three daies after to perfourme certaine rites to Apollo: and euen then began with his wife and daughters to ſing this Hymne, by them yearely vſed.

APollo great, whoſe beames the greater world do light,
And in our little world do cleare our inward ſight,
VVhich euer shine, though hid from earth by earthly shade,
VVhoſe lights do euer liue, but in our darkeneſſe fade;
Thou God, whoſe youth was deckt with ſpoile of Phythons skin:
(So humble knowledge can throw downe the ſnakish ſinne)

Latonas

Latonus ſonne, whoſe birth in paine and trauaile long
Doth teach, to learne the good what trauailes do belong:
In trauaile of our life (a short but tedious ſpace)
VVhile brickle houreglaſſe runnes, guide thou our panting pace:
Giue vs foreſightfull mindes: giue vs minds to obay
What foreſight tels; our thoughts vpon thy knowledge ſtay.
Let ſo our fruits grow vp that nature be maintaind:
But ſo our harts keepe down, with vice they be not ſtainde.
Let this aſſured hold our iudgements ouertake,
That nothing winnes the heauen, but what doth earth forſake.

Aſſoone as he had ended his deuotion (all the priuiledged ſhepherds being now come) knowing well inough he might lay all his care vpon Philanax, he was willing to ſweeten the taſt of this paſſed tumult, with ſome rural paſtimes. For which while the ſhepheards prepared themſelues in their beſt manner, Baſilius tooke his daughter Philoclea aſide, and with ſuch haſt, as if his eares hunted for words, deſired to know how ſhe had found Zelmane. She humbly anſwered him, according to the agreement betwixt them, that thus much for her ſake Zelmane was content to deſcend frō her former reſolution, as to heare him, whenſoeuer he would ſpeak; & further then that (ſhe ſaid) as Zelmane had not graunted, ſo ſhe neither did, nor euer would deſire. Baſilius kiſt her with more then fatherly thanks, and ſtraight (like a hard-kept warde new come to his lands) would faine haue vſed the benefite of that graunt, in laying his ſickneſſe before his only phyſition. But Zelmane (that had not yet fully determined with her ſelfe, how to beare her ſelfe toward him) made him in a few words vnderſtand, that the time in reſpect of the company was vnfit for ſuch a parley, and therefore to keepe his braines the buſier, letting him vnderſtand what ſhe had learned of his daughters, touching Eronas diſtreſſe (whō in her trauaile ſhe had knowne, and bene greatly beholding to) ſhe deſired him to finiſh the reſt, for ſo far as Plangus had told him; Becauſe ſhe ſaid (and ſhe ſaid truly) ſhe was ful of care for that Ladie, whoſe deſert (only except an ouer-baſe choiſe) was nothing agreeable to misfortune. Baſilius glad that ſhe would command him any thing, but more glad, that in excuſing the vnfitneſſe of that time, ſhe argued an intention, to graunt a fitter, obeyed her in this manner.

Madam (ſaid he) it is verie true, that ſince yeares enabled mee to iudge what is, or is not to be pitied. I neuer ſaw any thing that more moued me to iuſtifie a vehement compaſſion in my ſelfe, then the eſtate of that Prince, whom ſtrong againſt all his owne afflictions (which yet were great, as I perceiue you haue heard) yet true and noble loue had ſo pulled downe, as to lie vnder ſorrow for another. In ſo much as I could not temper my long idle pen in that ſubiect, which I perceiue you haue ſeene. But then to leaue that vnrepeated, which I find my daughters haue told you: It may pleaſe you to vnderſtand, ſince it pleaſeth you to demand, that Antiphilus being crowned, and ſo left by the famous Princes Muſidorus and Pyrocles (led thence by the challenge of Anaxius, who is now in theſe prouinces of Greece, making a diſhonorable enquirie after that excellent prince Pyrocles alreadie periſhed) Antiphilus (I ſay) being crowned, and deliuered from the preſence of thoſe two, whoſe vertues (while they were preſent, good ſchoolmaſters) ſuppreſſed his vanities, he had not ſtrength of mind enough in him to make long delay of diſcouering what maner of man hee was. But ſtreight like one caried vp to ſo hie a place, that hee looſeth the diſcerning of the ground ouer which he is; ſo was his mind lifted ſo far beyond the leuell of his owne diſcourſe, that remembring onely that himſelfe was in the high ſeate of a King, he could not perceiue that he was a king of reaſonable creatures, who would quickly ſcorne follies, and repine at iniuries. But imagining no ſo true propertie of ſouereigntie, as to do what he liſted, and to liſt what ſoeuer pleaſed his fanſie, he quickly made his kingdome a Teniſcourt, where his ſubiects ſhould be the balles, not in truth cruelly, but licenciouſly abuſing them, preſuming ſo far vpon himſelfe, that what he did was liked of euery bodie: nay, that his diſgraces were fauours, & all becauſe he was a King. For in Nature not able to conceiue the bounds of great matters (ſuddenly borne into an vnknowne Ocean of abſolute power) he was ſwayed withall (he knew not how) as euery winde of paſſiõs puffed him. Whereto nothing helped him better, then that poyſonous ſugar of flatterie: which ſome vſed, out of the innate baſeneſſe of their hart, ſtraight like dogges fawning vpõ the greateſt; others ſecretly hating him, and diſdaining his great riſing ſo ſuddenly, ſo vndeſeruedly (finding his humour) bent their exalting him onely to his ouerthrow; like the bird that caries the ſhel-fiſh high, to breake him the eaſier with his fall. But his minde (being an apt matter to receiue what forme their amplifying ſpeeches would lay vpõ it) daunced ſo pretie a muſick to their falſe meaſure, that he thought himſelfe the wiſeſt, the worthieſt, and beſt beloued, that euer gaue honor to a royall title. And being but obſcurely borne, he had found out vnbluſhing pedegrees, that made him not only of the blood royall, but true heire though vniuſtly diſpoſſeſt by Eronas aunceſtors, & like the fooliſh birde, that when it ſo hides the head that it ſees not it ſelfe, thinks no bodie elſe ſees it: ſo did he imagine, that no bodie knewe his baſeneſſe, while he himſelfe turned his eyes from it.

Then vaineneſſe (a meager friend to gratefulneſſe) brought him ſo to deſpiſe Erona, as of whome he had receiued no benefit, that within half a yeares mariage he began to pretend barrenneſſe: & making firſt an vnlawfull law of hauing mo wiues then one, he ſtill keeping Erona, vnder-hand, by meſſages ſought Artaxia, who no leſſe hating him, then louing (as vnluckie a choiſe) the naughtie King Plexirtus, yet to bring to paſſe what ſhee purpoſed, was content to traine him into falſe hopes, till alreadie his imagination had crowned him King of Armenia, & had made that but the foundation of more & more monarchies; as if fortune had only gotten eyes to cheriſh him. In which time a great aſſembly of moſt part of all the Princes of Aſia being to do honour to the neuer ſufficiently praiſed Pyrocles & Muſidorus, he would be one not to acknowledge his obligation (which was as great as any of the others,) but looking to haue bin yong-maſtered among thoſe great eſtates, as he was amõg his abuſing vnderlings. But ſo many valorous Princes, indeed far neerer to diſdaine him then otherwiſe, he was quickly (as ſtanding vpon no true ground, inwardly) out of countenance with himſelfe, till his ſeldom-comfortleſſe flatterers (perſwading him, it was enuie and feare of his expected greatneſſe) made him haſt away from that company, and without further delay appointed the meeting with Artaxia; ſo incredibly blinded with the ouer-bright ſhining of his royaltie, that he could thinke ſuch a Queene would be content to be ioyned-patent with an other to haue ſuch an husband. Poore Erona to all this obeied, either vehemencie of affection making her ſtoop to ſo ouerbaſe a ſeruitude, or aſtoniſhed with an vnlooked for fortune, dull to any behoofefull reſolution, or (as many times it falles out euen in great harts when they can accuſe none but themſelues) deſperatly bent to maintaine it. For ſo went ſhe on in that way of her loue, that (poore Lady) to be beyond beyond all other examples of ill set affection, she was brought to write to Artaxia, that she was content; for the publike good, to be a second wife, and yeeld the first place to her; nay to extoll him, and euen woo Axtaxia for him.

But Artaxia (mortally hating them both for her brothers sake) was content to hide her hate, till she had time to shew it: and pretending that all her grudge was against the two paragons of vertue, Musidorus and Pyrocles, euen met them halfe way in excusing her brothers murther, as not being principall actors; & of the other side, driuen to what they did by the euer-pardonable necessitie: and so well handled the matter, as though she promised nothing, yet Antiphilus promised himselfe all that she would haue him thinke. And so a solemne enteruiew was appointed: But (as the Poets say) Hymen had not there his saffron-coloured coat. For Artaxia laying men secretly (& easily they might be secret, since Antiphilus thought she ouer-ran him in loue) when he came euen ready to embrace her (shewing rather a countenance of accepting then offering) they came forth, and (hauing much aduantage both in number, valure, and forepreparation) put all his company to the sword, but such as could flie away. As for Antiphilus she caused him and Erona both to be put in yrons, hasting back toward her brothers tombe, vpon which she meant to sacrifice them; making the loue of her brother stand betweene her and all other motions of grace, from which by nature she was alienated.

But great diuersitie in them two quicklie discouered it selfe for the bearing of that affliction: for Antiphilus that had no greatnesse but outward, that taken away, was ready to fall faster then calamitie could thrust him; with fruitlesse begging of life (where reason might well assure him his death was resolued) and weake bemoning his fortune, to giue his enemies a most pleasing musike, with manie promises and protestations, to as litle purpose, as from a litle mind. But Erona sad indeed, yet like one rather vsed, then new fallen to sadnesse (as who had the ioyes of her heart alreadie broken) seemed rather to welcome then to shun that end of miserie, speaking litle, but what she spake was for Antiphilus, remembring his guiltlesnesse, being at that time prisoner to Tiridates, when the valiant Princes slue him: to the disgrace of men, shewing that there are women both more wise to iudge what is to be expected, and more constant to beare it when it is happened.

But her wit endeared by her youth, her affliction by her birth, and her sadnesse by her beautie, made this noble Prince Plangus, who (neuer almost from his cousin Artaxia) was now present at Eronas taking, to perceiue the shape of louelinesse more perfectlie in woe, then in ioyfulnesse (as in a picture which receiues greater life by the darkenesse of shadowes, then by more glittering colours) and seeing to like, and liking to loue, and louing straight to feele the most incident effects of loue, to serue and preserue. So borne by the hastie tide of short leasure, he did hastilie deliuer together his affection, and affectionate care. But she (as if he had spoken of a small matter, when he mentioned her life, to which he had not leasure to attend) desired him if he loued her, to shew it, in finding some way to saue Antiphilus. For her, she found the world but a wearisome stage vnto her, where she played a part against her will: and therefore besought him, not to cast his loue in so vnfruitful a place, as could not loue it self: but for a testimonie of constancie, & a sutablenesse to his word, to do so much comfort to her mind, as that for her sake Antiphilus were saued. He told me how much he argued against her tendring him, who had so vngratefully betrayed her, and foolishlie cast away himselfe. But perceiuing she did not onlie bend her verie good wits to speake for him against herself, but when ſuch a cauſe could be allied to no reaſon, yet loue would needes make it ſelfe a cauſe, and barre her rather from hearing, then yeeld that he ſhould yeeld to ſuch arguments: he likewiſe in whom the power of Loue (as they ſay of ſpirits) was ſubiect to the loue in her, with griefe conſented, and (though backwardly) was diligent to labor the helpe of Antiphilus: a man whom he not only hated, as a traytor to Erona, but enuied as a poſſeſſor of Erona. Yet Loue ſware, his hart, in ſpite of his hart, ſhold make him become a ſeruant to his riual. And ſo did he, ſeeking all the meanes of perſwading Artaxia, which the authority of ſo neare, and ſo vertuous a kinſman could giue vnto him. But ſhe to whom the eloquence of hatred had giuen reuenge the face of delight, reiected al ſuch motiõs; but rather the more cloſely impriſoning them in her chiefe city, where ſhe kept them with intention at the birth-day of Tiridates (which was very neare) to execute Antiphilus, & at the day of his death (which was about halfe a yeare after) to vſe the ſame rigor towards Erona. Plangus much grieued (becauſe much louing) attempted the humors of the Lycians, to ſee, whether they would come in with forces to ſuccor their Princeſſe. But there the next inheritor to the crown (with the true play that is vſed in the game of kingdomes) had no ſooner his miſtreſſe in captiuity, but he had vſurped her place, and making her odious to her people, becauſe of the vnfit election ſhe had made, had ſo left no hope there: but which is worſe, had ſent to Artaxia, perſwading the iuſticing her, becauſe that vniuſtice might giue his title the name of iuſtice. Wanting that way, Plangus practiſed with ſome deare friends of his, to ſaue Antiphilus out of priſon, whoſe day becauſe it was much nearer then Eronaes, and that he well found, ſhe had twiſted her life vpon the ſame threed with his, he determined firſt to get him out of priſon: and to that end hauing prepared all matters as well as in ſuch caſe he could, where Artaxia had ſet many of Tiridates old ſeruants to haue well-marking eyes, he conferred with Antiphilus, as (by the authority he had) he found meanes to do; & agreed with him of the time & maner, how he ſhould by the death of ſome of his iaylors eſcape. But all being well ordered, and Plangus willingly putting himſelfe into the greateſt danger, Antiphilus (who, like a bladder, ſweld ready to breake, while it was full of the wind of proſperity, that being out, was ſo abiected, as apt to be trod on by euery body) when it came to the point, that with ſome hazard, he might be in apparant likelihood to auoid the vttermoſt harme, his hart fainted, and (weake foole, neither hoping, nor fearing as he ſhould) gat a conceipt, that with bewraying this practiſe, he might obtaine pardon: and therefore, euen a little before Plangus ſhould haue come vnto him, opened the whole practiſe to him that had the charge, with vnpitied teares idely proteſting, he had rather die by Artaxias commandement, then againſt her will eſcape: yet begging life vpon any the hardeſt, and wretchedeſt conditions that ſhe would lay vpon him. His keeper prouided accordingly, ſo that whē Plangus came, he was like, himſelfe to haue bin entrapped: but that finding (with a luckie in-ſight) that it was diſcouered, he retired; and (calling his friends about him) ſtood vpon his gard, as he had good cauſe. For, Artaxia (accounting him moſt vngratefull, conſidering that her brother and ſhe had not only preſerued him againſt the malice of his father, but euer vſed him much liker his birth, then his fortune) ſent forces to apprehend him. But he among the martiall men had gotten ſo great loue, that he could not only keepe himſelfe from her malice, but worke in their minds a compaſſion of Eronas aduerſity.

But for the ſuccour of Antiphilus he could get no body to ioyne with him, the cõtempt of him hauing not bene able to qualifie the hatred; ſo that Artaxia might easily vpon him perfourme her will; which was (at the humble suite of all the women of that citie) to deliuer him to their censure, who mortallie hating him for hauing made a law of Polygamie, after many tortures, forst him to throw himselfe from a high Pyramis, which was built ouer Tiridates tombe, and so to end his false-hearted life, which had planted no strong thought in him, but that he could be vnkinde.

But Plangus well perceiuing that Artaxia stayed only for the appointed day, that the faire Eronas bodie (consumed to ashes should make a notorious testimonie, how deepely her brothers death was engrauen in her breast, he assembled good numbers of friends, whom his vertue (though a stranger) had tied vnto him, by force to giue her libertie. Contrariwise, Artaxia, to whom Anger gaue more courage then her sex did feare, vsed her regall authoritie (the most she could) to suppresse that sedition, & haue her will: which (she thought) is the most princelie thing that may be. But Plangus, who indeed (as all men witnesse) is one of the best Captaines (both for policie and valour) that are trayned in the schoole of Mars, in a conflict ouerthrew Artaxias power, though of farre greater number: and there tooke prisoner a base sonne of her brothers, whom she dearly affected, & then sent her word that he should run the same race of fortune (whatsoeuer it was) that Erona did: and happie was that threatning for her; for else Artaxia had hastened the day of her death, in respect of those tumults.

But now (some principall Noblemen of that countrie interposing themselues) it was agreed, that all persons else fully pardoned, and all prisoners (except Erona) deliuered, she should be put into the hands of a principall Nobleman, who had a castle of great strength, vpon oath, that if by the day two yeare from Tiridates death, Pyrocles and Musidorus did not in person combat, and ouercome two knights, whō she appointed to maintaine her quarell against Erona & them, of hauing by treason destroyed her brother, that then Erona should be that same day burned to ashes: but if they came, and had the victorie, she should be deliuered; but vpon no occasion, neither freed, nor executed till that day. And hereto of both sides, all tooke solemne oath, and so the peace was concluded; they of Plangus partie forcing him to agree, though he himselfe the sooner condiscended, knowing the curtesie of those two excellent Princes, not to refuse so noble a quarrell, and their power such, as two more (like the other two) were not able to resist. But Artaxia was more, and vpon better ground, pleased with this action; for she had euen newly receiued newes frō Plexirtus, that vpon the sea he had caused them both to perish, & therefore she held her selfe sure of the match.

But poore Plangus knew not so much, and therefore seeing his partie (as most times it falles out in like case) hungrie of any conditions of peace, accepted them; and then obtained leaue of the Lord, that indifferentlie kept her, to visite Erona, whom he found full of desperate sorow, not suffering neither his vnworthinesse, nor his wrongs, nor his death (which is the naturall conclusion of all worldlie acts) either to couer with forgetfulnesse, or diminish with consideration, the affection she had borne him: but euen glorying in affliction, & shunning all comfort, she seemed to haue no delight, but in making her self the picture of miserie. So that when Plangus came to her, she fell in deadlie traunces, as if in him she had seene the death of Antiphilus, because he had not succoured him: and yet (her vertue striuing) she did at one time acknowledge her selfe bound, and professe her selfe iniured; in steed of allowing the conclusion they had made, or writing to the Princes (as he wisht her to do) craving nothing but some speedie death to follow her in spite of iust hate) beloued Antiphilus.

So that Plangus hauing nothing but a rauisht kisse from her hand at their parting, went away toward Greece, whitherward he vnderstood the Princes were embarked. But by the way it was his fortune to intercept letters, written by Artaxia to Plexirtus: wherin she signified her accepting him to her husband, whom she had euer fauoured, so much the rather, as he had perfourmed the conditions of her mariage, in bringing to their deserued end her greatest enemies: withall, thanking the sea, in such tearmes as he might well perceiue it was by some treason wrought in Plexirtus ship. Whereupon (to make more diligent search) he tooke ship himselfe and came into Laconia, enquiring, and by his enquirie finding, that such a ship was indeed with fight and fire perished, none (almost) escaping. But for Pyrocles and Musidorus, it was assuredly determined that they were cast away: for the name of such Princes (especially in Greece) would quicklie else haue bene a large witnesse to the cõtrarie. Full of griefe with that, for the losse of such, who left the world poore of perfection: but more sorie for Eronas sake, who now by them could not be relieued. A new aduertisement from Armenia ouertooke him, which multiplied the force of his anguish. It was a message from the Nobleman who had Erona in ward, giuing him to vnderstãd, that since his departure, Artaxia (vsing the benfit of time) had besieged him in his Castle, demaunding present deliuerie of her, whom yet for his faith giuen, he would not, before the day appointed, if possiblie he could resist, which he foresaw, long he should not do for want of victuall, which he had not so wisely prouided, becausse he trusted vpon the generall oath taken for two yeares space: and therefore willed him to make haste to his succour, and come with no small forces; for all they that were of his side in Armenia were consumed, and Artaxia had encreased her might by mariage of Plexirtus, who now crowned king there, stickt not to glorie in the murder of Pyrocles and Musidorus, as hauing iust cause thereto, in respect of the deaths of his sister Andromana, her son his nephew, and his owne daughter Zelmane, all whose losse he vniustly charged them withall, and now openly stickt not to confesse, what a reuenge his wit had brought foorth. Plangus much astonished herewith, bethought him selfe what to do: for to returne to Armenia was vaine, since his friendes there were vtterly ouerthrowne. Then thought he of going to his father; but he had alreadie (euen since the death of his stepmother, and brother) attempted the recouering of his fauour, and all in vaine. For they that had before ioyned with Andromana to do him the wrong, thought now no life for them if he returned, and therefore kept him still (with new forged suspitions) odious to his father. So that Plangus reseruing that for a worke of longer time, then the sauing of Erona could beare, determinied to go to the mightie and good king Euarchus: who lately hauing (to his eternall fame) fully, not onely conquered his enemies, but established good gouernement in their countries, he hoped he might haue present succour of him, both for the iustnesse of the cause, and reuenge of his childrens death, by so hainous a treason murthered. Therfore with diligence he went to him, and by the way (passing through my countrey) it was my hap to find him, the most ouerthrowne man with griefe, that euer I hope to see againe. For still it seemed he had Erona at a stake before his eyes; such an apprehension he had taken of her daunger; which in despite of all the comfort I could giue him, he powred out in such lamentations, that I was moued not to let him passe till he had made full declaration, which by peeces my daughters & I haue deliuered deliuered vnto you. Faine he would haue had ſuccour of my ſelfe, but the courſe of my life being otherwiſe bent, I onely accompanied him with ſome that might ſafely guide him to the great Euarchus: for my part hauing had ſome of his ſpeeches ſo feelingly in my memorie, that at an idle time (as I told you) I ſet them downe dialogue wiſe, in ſuch maner as you haue ſeene. And thus excellent Lady, I haue obeyed you in this ſtorie, wherein if it well pleaſe you to conſider what is the ſtrange power of Loue, and what is due to his authoritie, you ſhall exerciſe therein the true nobleneſſe of your iudgement, and do the more right to the vnfortunate Hiſtorian. Zelmane (ſighing for Eronas ſake, yet inwardly comforted in that ſhe aſſured her ſelfe, Euarchus would not ſpare to take in hand the iuſt deliuering of her, ioyned with the iuſt reuenge of his childrens loſſe) hauing now what ſhe deſired of Baſilius, to auoyd his further diſcourſes of affection, encouraged the ſhepheards to begin, whom ſhe ſaw already ready for them.

The ſecond Eclogues.

THe rude tumult of the Eniſpians gaue occaſion to the honeſt ſhepheards to begin their Paſtorals this day with a daunce, which they called the skirmiſh betwixt Reaſon and Paſſion. For ſeuen ſhepheards (which were named the reaſonable ſhepheards) ioyned themſelues, foure of them making a ſquare, and the other two going a litle wide of either ſide, like wings for the maine battell, & the ſeuenth man formoſt, like the forlorne hope, to begin the skirmiſh. In like order came out the ſeuen appaſſionated ſhepheards, all keeping the pace of their foot by their voice and ſundry conſorted inſtruments they held in their armes. And firſt, the formoſt of the Reaſonable ſide began to ſing:

Reaſon. Thou rebell vile, come, to thy maiſter yeeld.

And the other that met with him anſwered:

Paſſion. No, Tyrant, no; mine, mine ſhall be the field.

R. Can Reaſon then a Tyrant counted be?
P. If Reaſon will, that Paſſions be not free.
R. But Reaſon will, that Reaſon gouerne moſt.
P. And Paſſion will, that Paſſion rule the roſt.
R. Your vvill is vvill, but Reaſon reaſon is.
P. VVill hath his will, when Reaſons will doth miſſe.
R. VVhom Paſſion leads vnto his death is bent.
P. And let him die, ſo that he die content.
R. By nature you to Reaſon faith haue ſworne.
P. Not ſo, but fellow-like together borne.
R. VVho Paſſion doth enſue, liues in annoy.
P. VVho Paſſion doth forſake, liues voyd of ioy.
R. Paſſion is blinde, and treads an vnknowne trace.
P. Reaſon hath eyes to ſee his owne ill caſe.

Then as they approched nearer, the two of Reaſons ſide, as if they ſhot at the other, thus ſang:

R. Dare Paſſions then abide in Reaſons light?
P. And is not Reaſon dim with Paſſions might?

R. O foolish thing, which glorie doth deſtroy.
P. O glorious title of a foolish toy.
R. VVeakneſſe you are, dare you vvith our ſtrength fight?
P. Becauſe our weakneſſe weakeneth all your might.
R. O ſacred Reaſon, helpe our vertuous toyles.
P. O Paſſion, paſſe on feeble Reaſons ſpoyles.
R. VVe with our ſelues abide a daylie ſtrife.
P. VVe gladly vſe the ſweetneſſe of our life.
R. But yet our ſtrife ſure peace in end doth breed.
P. VVe now haue peace, your peace we do not need.

Then did the two ſquare battailes meete, and in ſteed of fighting embrace one another, ſinging thus:

R. VVe are too ſtrong: but Reaſon ſeeks no blood.
P. Who be too weake, do faine they be too good.
R. Though we cannot orecome, our cauſe is iuſt.
P. Let vs orecome, and let vs be vniuſt.
R. Yet Paſſions yeeld at length to Reaſons ſtroke.
P. What ſhall we win by taking Reaſons yoke.
R. The ioyes you haue ſhall be made permanent.
P. But ſo we ſhall with griefe learne to repent.
R. Repent indeed, but that ſhall be your bliſſe.
P. How know we that, ſince preſent ioyes we miſſe?
R. You know it not: of Reaſon therefore know it.
P. No Reaſon yet had euer skill to ſhew it.
R. Then let vs both to heauenlie rules giue place.
P. Which Paſſions kill, and Reaſon do deface.

Then embraced they one another, and came to the king, who framed his prayſes of them according to Zelmanes liking; whoſe vnreſtrained parts, the mind & eye had their free courſe to the delicate Philoclea, whoſe looke was not ſhort in wel requiting it, although ſhe knew it was a hatefull ſight to her iealous mother. But Dicus (that had in this time taken a great liking of Dorus, for the good parts he found aboue his age in him) had a delight to taſte the fruits of his wit, though in a ſubiect which he himſelfe moſt of all other deſpiſed: and ſo entred to ſpeech with him in the maner of this following Eclogue.

Dicus. Dorus.

Dicus. Dorus, tell me, vvhere is thy wonted motion,
To make theſe woods reſound thy lamentation?
Thy Saint is dead, or dead is thy deuotion,
For vvho doth hold his loue in eſtimation,
To vvitneſſe that he thinks his thoughts delicious,
Thinkes to make each thing badge of his ſweet paſſion.

Dorus. But what doth make thee Dicus, ſo ſuſpicious.

Of my due faith, which needs must be immutable?
VVho others vertue doubt, themselues are vicious,
Not so; although my mettals were most mutable,
Her beames haue wrought therein most faire impression,
To such a force some change were nothing sutable.

Dicus. The heart well set doth neuer shunne confession:
If noble be thy bandes, make them notorious:
Silence doth seeme the maske of base oppression.
VVho glories in his loue, doth make Loue glorious:
But who doth feare, or bideth muet wilfully,
Shewes, guilty heart doth deeme his state opprobrious.
Thou then, that fram'st both wordes and voice most skilfully,
Yeelde to our eares a sweete and sound relation,
If Loue tooke thee by force, or caught thee guilefully.

Dorus. If sunnie beames shame heau'nly habitation,
If three leau'd grasse seeme to the sheepe vnsauorie,
Then base and sowre is Loues most high vocation.
Or if sheepes cries can helpe the Sunnes owne brauerie,
Then may I hope, my pipe may haue abilitie,
To helpe her praise, who decks me in her slauerie.
No, no: no words ennoble selfe nobilitie,
As for your doubts, her voice was it deceiued me,
Her eye the force beyond all possibilitie.

Dicus. Thy words well voyc'd, well grac'de had almost heaued me,
Quite from my selfe to loue Loues contemplation;
Till of these thoughts thy sodaine ende bereaued me,
Goe on therefore, and tell vs by what fashion
In thy owne proofe he gets so straunge possession,
And how possest he strengthens his invasion.

Dorus. Sight is his roote, in thought is his progression,
His childhood wonder, prentizeship attention,
His youth delight, his age the soules oppression,
Doubt is his sleepe, he waketh in inuention,
Fancie his foode, his clothing is of carefullnesse;
Beautie his booke, his play louer dissention:
His eyes are curious search, but vaild with warefullnesse
His wings desire oft clipt with desperation.
Largesse his hands could neuer skill of sparefulnesse
But how he doth by might, or by perswasion
To conquere, and his conquest how to ratifie,
Experience doubts, and schooles hold disputation.

Dicus. But so thy sheepe may thy good wishes satisfie
VVith large encrease, and wooll of fine perfection.

So she thy loue, her eyes thy eyes may gratifie,
As thou wilt giue our soules a deare refection,
By telling how she was, how now she framed is
To helpe, or hurt in thee her owne infection.

Dorus. Blest be the name, wherewith my mistres named is:
VVhose wounds are salues, whose yokes please more then pleasure doth:
Her staines are beames; vertue the fault she blamed is,
The hart, eye, eare here onely find his treasure doth.
All numbring artes her endlesse graces number not:
Time, place, life, wit, scarcely her rare gifts measure doth.
Is she in rage? so is the Sunne in sommer hot,
Yet harueſt brings. Doth she, alas! absent her selfe?
The Sunne is hid; his kindly shadowes cumber not.
But when to giue some grace she doth content her selfe,
O then it shines, then are the heau'ns distributed,
And Venus seemes, to make vp her, she spent herselfe.
Thus then (I say) my mischiefs haue contributed
A greater good by her diuine reflection,
My harmes to me, my bliſſe to her attributed.
Thus she is fam'd: her eyes are my direction,
Her loue my life, her anger my destruction:
Lastly what so she is, that's my protection.

Dicus. Thy safetie sure is wrapped in destruction,
For that construction thine own words do beare.
A man to feare a womans moodie eye,
Makes Reason lie a slaue to seruile sense,
A weake defence where weakneſſe is thy force:
So is remorse in follie dearly bought.

Dorus. If I had thought to heare blasphemous words,
My breast to swords, my soule to hell haue sold
I rather would, then thus mine eares defile
VVith words so vile, which viler breath doth breed.
O heards take heed; for I a woolfe haue found,
VVho hunting round the strongest for to kill,
His breast doth fill with earth of others woe,
And loden so pulls downe pull'd downe destroyes,
O shepheards boyes, eschue these tongues of venome,
VVhich do enuenome both the soule and senses.
Our best defenses are to flie these adders.
O tongues like ladders made to clime dishonour,
VVho iudge that honour, which hath scope to slaunder!

Dicus. Dorus you wander farre in great reproches,
So Loue encroches on your charmed reason,
But it is season for to end our singing.

Such anger (bringing: as for me, my fancie
In ſicke mans frenzie rather takes compaſſion,
Then rage for rage: rather my wish I ſend to thee,
Thou ſoone may haue ſome helpe, or chaunge of paſſion:
She oft her lookes, the ſtarres her fauour bend to thee,
Fortune ſtore, Nature health, Loue graunt perſwaſion.
A quiet mind none but thy ſelfe can lend to thee,
Thus I commend to thee all our former Loue.

Dorus. VVell do I proue, errour lies oft in Zeale,
Yet it is zeale, though errour, of true heart.
Nought could impart ſuch heats to friendly mind,
But for to find thy vvords did her diſgrace,
VVhoſe onely face the litle heauen is,
VVhich who doth miſſe, his eyes are but deluſions,
Barr'd from their chiefeſt obiect of delightfulneſſe,
Throwne on this earth, the Chaos of confuſions;
As for thy vvish, to my enraged ſpitefulneſſe,
The louely blow, with rare reward, my prayer is Thou maiſt loue her, that I may ſee thy ſightfulneſſe.
The quiet mind (whereof my ſelfe empairer is,
As thou doeſt thinke) ſhould moſt of all diſquiet me
Without her loue, then any mind who fairer is,
Her only cure from ſurfet woes can diet me:
She holds the ballance of my contentation:
Her cleared eyes, nought elſe in ſtormes can quiet me.
Nay rather then my eaſe diſcontentation
Should breed to her, let me for aye deiected be
From any ioy, which might her griefe occaſion.
VVith ſo ſweet plagues my happie harmes infected be:
Paine wils me die, yet vvill of death I mortifie:
For though life irkes, in life my loues protected be,
Thus for each change my changeleſſe heart I fortifie.

When they had ended to the good pleaſing of the aſſiſtants, eſpecially of Zelmane, who neuer forgat to giue due commendations to her friend Dorus, Baſilius called for Lamon to end his diſcourſe of Strephon & Klaius, wherewith the other day he marked Zelmane to haue bene exceedingly delighted. But him ſickeneſſe had ſtayed from that aſſembly: which gaue occaſion to Hiſtor & Damon two yong ſhepheards, taking vpon them the two friendly riuals names, to preſent Baſilius with ſome other of their complaints Eclogue-wiſe, and firſt with this double Seſtine.

Strephon. Klaius.

Strephon. Ye Gote-heard Gods, that loue the graſſie mountaines,
Ye Nymphs that haunt the ſprings in pleaſant vallies,
Ye Satyrs ioy'd with free and quiet forreſts,
Vouchſafe your ſilent eares to plaining muſike,

VVhich to my woes giue ſtill an earlie morning,
And drawes the dolor on till wearie euening.

Klaius. O Mercurie, foregoer to the euening,
O heauenly huntreſſe of the ſauage mountaines,
O louely ſtarre, entitled of the morning,
VVhile that my voice doth fill theſe wofull vallies,
Vouchſafe your ſilent eares to plaining muſike,
Which oft hath Echo tyr'd in ſecret forreſts.

Strephon. I that was once free burgeſſe of the forreſts,
Where shade from Sunne, and ſports I ſought at euening,
I that vvas once eſteem'd for pleaſant muſike,
Am banisht now among the monſtrous mountaines
Of huge deſpaire, and foule afflictions vallies,
Am growne a shrich-owle to my ſelfe each morning.

Klaius. I that vvas once delighted euerie morning,
Hunting the wild inhabiters of forreſts:
I that vvas once the muſike of theſe vallies,
So darkened am, that all my day is euening,
Hart broken ſo, that molehilles ſeeme high mountaines,
And fill the vales with cries in ſteed of muſike.

Strephon. Long ſince alas, my deadlie ſwannish muſike,
Hath made it ſelfe a crier of the morning,
And hath with wailing ſtrength clim'd higheſt mountaines:
Long ſince my thoughts more deſert be then forreſts:
Long ſince I ſee my ioyes come to their euening,
And ſtate throwne downe to ouertroden vallies.

Klaius. Long ſince the happie dwellers of theſe vallies,
Haue pray'd me leaue my ſtraunge exclaming muſike,
Which troubles their dayes worke, and ioyes of euening:
Long ſince I hate the night, more hate the morning:
Long ſince my thoughts chaſe me like beaſts in forreſts,
And make me wish my ſelfe laid vnder mountaines.

Strephon. Me ſeemes I ſee the high and ſtatelie mountaines,
Transforme themſelues to low deiected vallies:
Me ſeemes I heare in theſe ill chaunged forreſts,
The Nightingales do learne of Owles their muſike:
Me ſeemes I feele the comfort of the morning,
Turn'd to the mortall ſerene of an euening.

Klaius. Me ſeemes I ſee a filthy cloudy euening,
As ſoone as Sunne begins to clime the mountaines:
Me ſeemes I feele a noyſome ſent, the morning

VVhen I doo ſmell the flowers of theſe vallies:
Meſeemes I heare, when I doo heare ſweete muſicke,
The dreadfull cries of murdred men in forreſts.

Strephon I wish to fire the trees of all thoſe forreſts,
I giue the Sunne a laſt farewell each euening,
I curſe the fidling finders out of muſicke:
VVith enuie I doo hate the loftie mountaines;
And with diſpite deſpiſe the humble vallies;
I doo deteſt night, euening, day, and morning.

Klaius. Curſe to my ſelfe my praier is, the morning;
My fire is more then can be made with forreſts;
My ſtate more baſe, then are the baſeſt vallies
I wish no euenings more to ſee, each euening;
Shamed I hate my ſelfe in ſight of mountaines,
And ſtoppe mine eares, leſt I grow mad with muſicke.

Strephon For she whoſe parts maintainde a perfect muſicke,
VVhoſe beautie shin'de more then the blushing morning,
VVho much did paſſe in ſtate the ſtately mountaines,
In ſtreightneſſe paſt the Cedars of the forreſts,
Hath caſt me wretch into eternall euening,
By taking her two Sunnes from theſe darke vallies.

Klaius. For she, to whome compar'd, the Alps are vallies,
She, whoſe leaſt word brings frō the ſphears their muſick,
At whoſe approch the Sunne roſe in the euening,
VVho where she went bare in her forhead morning,
Is gone, is gone, from theſe our ſpoyled forreſts,
Turning to deſarts our beſt paſtur'de mountaines.

Strephon Theſe mountaines witneſſe shall, ſo shal theſe vallies,
Theſe forreſts eke, made wretched by our muſicke,
Klaius. Our morning hymne is this, and ſong at euening.

But, as though all this had bin but the taking of a taſte of their wailings, Strephon againe begā this Dizaine, which was anſwered vnto him in that kind of verſe which is called the crowne.

Strephon. Klaius.

Strephon I Ioy in griefe, and doo deteſt all ioyes:
Deſpiſe delight am tyr'd with thought of eaſe:
I turne my minde to all formes of annoyes,
And with the change of them my fancie pleaſe,
I ſtudie that which may me moſt diſpleaſe,
And indeſpite of that diſpleaſures might,

Embrace that most, that most my soule destroyes,
Blinded with beams, fell darkenesse is my sight:
Dwell in my ruines, feede with sucking smart
I thinke from me, not from my woes to part.

Klaius. I thinke from me, not from my woes to part,
And loath this time, call'd life, nay thinke, that life
Nature to me for torment did impart;
Thinke, my hard haps haue blunted deaths sharpe knife,
Not sparing me, in whom his workes be rife:
And thinking this, think nature, life, and death
Place Sorowes triumph on my conquerd heart,
VVhereto I yeeld, and seeke none other breath,
But from the sent of some infectious graue:
Nor of my fortune ought, but mischiefe craue.

Strephon Nor of my fortune ought but mischiefe craue,
And seeke to nourish that, which now containes
All what I am: if I my selfe will saue,
Then must I saue, what in me chiefly raines,
VVhich is the hatefull web of sorowes paines.
Sorow then cherish me, for I am sorow:
No being now, but sorow I can haue:
Then decke me as thine owne; thy helpe I borow,
Since thou my riches art, and that thou haste
Enough to make a fertill mind lie waste.

Klaius. Enough to make a fertill minde lie waste,
Is that huge storme, which powres it selfe on me:
Hailestones of teares, of sight a monstrous blast,
Thunders of cries; lightnings my wilde lookes be,
The darkened heau'n my soule, which nought can see,
The flying sprits which trees by rootes vp teare,
Be those despaires which haue my hopes quite wast.
The difference is; all folks those stormes forbeare,
But I cannot; who then my selfe should flie.
So close vnto my selfe my wrackes do lie.

Strephon So close vnto my selfe my wrackes doo lie,
But cause, effect, beginning, and the ende
Are all in me: what helpe then can I trie?
My ship, my selfe, whose course to loue doth bende,
Sore beaten doth her mast of comfort spend:
Her cable, Reason, breakes from anchor, Hope:
Fancie her tackling, torne away doth flie:
Ruine, the winde, hath blowne her from her scope:
Brused with waues of Cares, but broken is
On rocke, Despaire, the buriall of my blisse.

On

Klaius. On rocke, Despaire, the buriall of my blisse,
I long do plowe with plough of deepe desire:
The seede Fast meaning is, no truth to misse:
I harow it with Thoughts, which all conspire
Fauour to make my chiefe and only hire.
But, woe is me, the yeare is gone about,
And now I faine would reape, I reape but this Hatefully growne, Absence new sprong out.
So that I see, although my sight empaire,
Vaine is their paine, who labour in despaire.

Strephon Vaine is their paine, who labour in despaire:
For so did I, when with my angle VVill,
I sought to catch the fish Torpedo faire.
Eu'n then Despaire did Hope already kill:
Yet fancie would perforce employ his skill,
And this hath got; the catcher now is caught,
Lam'd with the angle, which it selfe did beare,
And vnto death, quite drownd in dolours, brought
To death, as then disguisd in her faire face.
Thus, thus, alas, I had my losse in chase.

Klaius. Thus, thus alas, I had my losse in chase,
VVhen first that crowned Basiliske I knewe,
VVhose footesteps I with kisses oft did trace,
Till by such hap, as I must euer rue,
Mine eyes did light vpon her shining hue,
And hers on me, astonisht with that sight.
Since then my hart did loose his wonted place,
Infected so with her sweet poysons might,
That, leauing me for dead, to her it went:
But ah her flight hath my dead reliques spent.

Strephon But ah her flight hath my dead reliques spent,
Her flight from me, from me, though dead to me,
Yet liuing still in her, while her beames lent
Such vitall sparke, that her mine eyes might see.
But now those liuing lights absented be,
Full dead before, I now to dust should fall,
But that eternall paines my soule haue hent,
And keepe it still within this body thrall:
That thus I must, while in this death I dwell,
In earthly fetters feele a lasting hell.

Klaius. In earthly fetters feele a lasting hell
Alas I doo; from which to finde release,
I would the earth, I vvould the heauens fell,
But vaine it is to thinke these paines should cease,

VVhere life is death, and death cannot breed peace.
O faire, ô onely faire, from thee alas,
These foule, most foule, desastres to me fell;
Since thou from me (ô me) O Sunne didst passe.
Therefore esteeming all good blessings toyes,
I ioy in griefe, and do detest all ioyes.

Strephon. I ioy in griefe, and do detest all ioyes,
But now an end, (ô Klaius) now an end:
For euen the hearbes our hatefull musike stroyes,
And from our burning breath the trees do bend.

So well were these wailefull cõplaints accorded to the passions of all the princelie hearers, while euery one made what he heard of another the ballance of his own fortune, that they stood a long while striken in a sad and silent cõsideration of them. Which the old Geron no more marking then condemning in them, desirous to set forth what counsels the wisdome of age had laid vp in store against such fancies (as he thought) follies of youth, yet so as it might not appeare that his words respected them, bending himselfe to a young shepheard named Philisides, (who neither had daunced nor sung with them, and had all this time laine vpon the ground at the foot of a Cypresse tree, leaning vpon his elbow with so deepe a melancholie that his sences caried to his mind no delight from any of their obiects) he strake him vpon the shoulder with a right old mans grace, that will seeme liuelier then his age will afford him. And thus began vnto him his Eglogue.

Geron. Philisides.

Geron. VP, vp Philisides, let sorowes go,
Who yeelds to vvoe, doth but increase his smart.
Do not thy heart, to plaintfull custome bring,
But let vs sing, sweet tunes do passions ease,
An old man heare, who would thy fancies raise.

Philisides. VVho minds to please the mind drown'd in annoyes
VVith outward ioyes, which inlie cannot sinke,
As well may think with oyle to coole the fire:
Or with desire to make such foe a frend,
Who doth his soule to endlesse malice bend.

Geron. Yet sure an end to each thing time doth giue,
Though vvoes now liue, at length thy vvoes must die:
Then vertue trie, if she can vvorke in thee
That which vve see in manie time hath wrought,
And weakest hearts to constant temper brought.

Philisides. Who euer taught a skillesse man to teach,
Or stop a breach, that neuer Cannon saw?
Sweet vertues law barres not a causefull mone.

Time

Time shall in one my life and ſorrowes end,
And me perchaunce your conſtant temper lend.

Geron. VVhat can amend where phyſicke is refuſde?
The wits abuſde with will no counſayle take.
Yet for my ſake diſcouer vs thy griefe.
Oft comes reliefe when moſt we ſeeme in trap.
The ſtarres thy ſtate, fortune may change thy hap.

Philiſides If fortunes lappe became my dwelling place,
And all the ſtarres conſpired to my good,
Still were I one, this ſtill ſhould be my caſe,
Ruines relique, cares web, and ſorowes foode:
Since she faire fierce to ſuch a ſtate me calles,
VVhoſe wit the ſtarres, whoſe fortune fortune thralls.

Geron. Alas what fals are falne vnto thy minde?
That there where thou confeſt thy miſchiefe lyes,
Thy wit doſt vſe ſtill ſtill more harmes to finde.
VVhom wit makes vaine, or blinded with his eyes,
VVhat counſell can preuaile, or light giue light?
Since all his force againſt himſelfe he tries.
Then each conceit that enters in his ſight,
Is made, forſooth, a Iurate of his woes,
Earth, ſea, ayre, fire, heau'n, hell, and gaſtly ſprite.
Then cries to ſenceleſſe things, which neither knowes
VVhat ayleth thee, and if they knew thy minde
VVould ſcorne in man (their king) ſuch feeble show's.
Rebell, Rebell, in golden fetters binde
This tyran Loue; or rather do ſuppreſſe
Thoſe rebell thoughts which are thy ſlaues by kinde.
Let not a glittring name thy fancie dreſſe
In painted clothes, becauſe they call it loue.
There is no hate that can thee more oppreſſe.
Begin (and halfe the worke is done) to proue
By riſing vp, vpon thy ſelfe to ſtand.
And thinke she is a she, that doth thee moue.
He water plowes, and ſoweth in the ſand,
And hopes the flickring winde with net to hold,
VVho hath his hopes laid vpon womans hand.
VVhat man is he that hath his freedome ſolde?
Is he a manlike man, that doth not know man
Hath power that Sex with bridle to withhold?
A fickle Sex, and true in truſt to no man,
A ſeruant Sex, ſoone proud if they be coi'd:
And to conclude, thy miſtreſſe is a woman.

Philiſides O gods, how long this old foole hath annoy'd

My wearied eares! O gods yet graunt me this,
That ſoone the world of his falſe tong be void.
O noble age who place their onely bliſſe
In being heard vntill the hearer dye
Vttring a ſerpents mind with ſerpents hiſſe.
Then who will heare a well autoriſde lye,
(And pacience hath) let him goe learne of him
VVhat ſwarmes of vertues did in his youth flye
Such hartes of braſſe, wiſe heads, and garments trim
VVere in his dayes: which heard, one nothing heares,
If from his words the falshood he do skim.
And herein moſt their folly vaine appeares,
That ſince they ſtill alledge, When they were yong:
It ſhewes they fetch their wit from youthfull yeares
Like beaſt for ſacrifice, where ſaue the tong
And belly nought is left, ſuch ſure is he,
This life-dead man in this old dungeon flong.
Olde houſes are throwne downe for new we ſee:
The oldeſt Rammes are culled from the flocke:
No man doth wish his horſe ſhould aged bee.
The ancient oke well makes a fired blocke:
Old men them ſelues, doe loue yong wiues to chooſe:
Only fond youth admires a rotten ſtocke.
VVho once a white long beard, well handle does,
(As his beard him, not he his beard did beare)
Though cradle witted, muſt not honour looſe.
Oh when will men leaue off to iudge by haire;
And thinke them olde, that haue the oldeſt mind,
VVith vertue fraught and full of holy feare!

Geron. If that thy face were hid, or I were blind,
I yet ſhould know a yong man ſpeaketh now,
Such wandring reaſons in that ſpeech I find,
He is a beaſt, that beaſtes vſe wil allow
For proofe of man, who ſprung of heau'nly fire
Hath ſtrongeſt ſoule, when moſt his raynes do bowe.
But fondlings fond, know not your owne deſire
Loth to dye yong, and then you muſt be old,
Fondly blame that to which your ſelues aſpire.
But this light choller that doth make you bold,
Rather to wrong then vnto iuſt defence,
Is paſt with me, my blood is waxed cold.
Thy words, though full of malapert offence,
I way them not, but ſtill will thee aduiſe
How thou from foolish loue maiſt purge thy ſenſe.
Firſt thinke they erre, that thinke them gayly wiſe,
VVho well can ſet a paſſion out to shew:
Such ſight haue they that ſee with goggling eyes.

Paſsion beares high vvhen puffing wit doth blow,
But is indeed a toy, if not a toy,
True cauſe of euils; and cauſe of cauſeleſſe woe.
If once thou maiſt that fancie gloſſe deſtroy
VVithin thy ſelfe, thou ſoone wilt be ashamed,
To be a player of thine owne annoy.
Then let thy mind with better bookes be tamed.
Seek to eſpie her faults as well as praiſe,
And let thine eyes to other ſportes be framed.
In hunting feareſull beaſts, do ſpend ſome dayes,
Or catch the birds with pitfals, or with lyme,
Or traine the foxe that traines ſo craftie layes.
Lie but to ſleepe, and in the earlie prime
Seeke skill of herbes in hilles, haunt brookes neare night,
And trie with bayt how fish will bite ſometime.
Go graft againe, and ſeeke to graft them right,
Thoſe pleaſant plants, thoſe ſweet and fruitfull trees,
VVhich both the pallate, and the eyes delight.
Cherish the hiues of wiſely painefull Bees:
Let ſpeciall care vpon thy flocke be ſtaid,
Such actiue mind but ſeldome paſsion ſees.

Philiſides. Hath any man heard vvhat this old man ſaid?
Truly not I, who did my thoughts engage,
VVhere all my paines one looke of her hath paid.

Geron was euen out of countenance, finding the words he thought were ſo wiſe, winne ſo litle reputation at this young mans hands; and therefore ſometimes looking vpon an old acquaintance of his called Maſtix, one of the repiningſt fellowes in the world, and that beheld no body but with a mind of miſlike (ſaying ſtill the world was amiſſe, but how it ſhould be amended he knew not) ſometimes caſting his eyes to the ground, euen aſhamed to ſee his gray haires deſpiſed, at laſt he ſpied his two dogges, whereof the elder was called Melampus, and the younger Lælaps, (indeed the iewels he euer had with him) one brawling with another; which occaſion he tooke to reſtore himſelf to his countenance, and rating Melampus, he began to ſpeake to his dogs, as if in them a man ſhould find more obedience then in vnbridled young men.

Geron. Maſtix.

Geron. DOwne, downe Melampus, what? your fellow bite?
I ſet you ore the flocke I dearelie loue,
Them to defend, not with your ſelues to fight.
Do you not thinke this vvill the vvolues remoue
From former feare, they had of your good minds,
When they ſhall ſuch deuided vveakneſſe proue?
VVhat if Lælaps a better morſell find
Then you earſt knew? rather take part with him

Then iarle: lo, lo, euen these how enuie blindes,
And then Lælaps let not pride make thee brim;
Because thou hast thy fellow ouergone,
But thanke the cause, thou seest, where he is dim.
Here Lælaps, here, indeede a gainst the foen
Of my good sheepe, thou neuer trew's time tooke:
Be as thou art, but be with mine at one.
For though Melampus like a wolfe do looke,
(For age doth make him of a woluish hew)
Yet haue I seene when well a wolfe he shooke.
Fo le that I am, that with my dogges speake grewe.
Come neere good Mastix, tis now full tway score
Of yeares (alas) since I good Mastix knew.
Thou heard'st euen now a yong man sneb me sore,
Because I red him, as I would my son.
Youth will haue will: Age must to age therefore.

Mastix. VVhat maruell if in youth such falts be done,
Since that we see our saddest Shepheards out
VVho haue their lesson so long time begonne?
Quickly secure, and easilie in doubt,
Either a sleepe be all if nought assaile,
Or all abroade if but a Cubb start out.
VVe shepherds are like them that vnder saile
Doe speake high words, when all the coast is cleare,
Yet to a passenger will bonnet vaile.
I con thee thanke to whom thy dogges be deare,
But commonly like curres we them entreate,
Saue when greate need of them perforce appeare.
Then him we kisse, whom late before we beatt
VVith such intemperance, that each way grows
Hate of the first, contempt of latter feate,
And such discord twixt greatest shepheards flowes,
That sport it is to see vvith how great arte,
By iustice worke they their owne faults disclose:
Like busie boyes, to vvin their tutors heart,
One saith, he mockes; the other saith, he playes,
The third his lesson mist, till all do smart.
As for the rest, how shepheards spend their dayes,
At blow-point, hotcocles, or else at keeles,
While, Let vs passe our time each shepheard sayes.
So small account of time the shepheard feeles,
And doth not feele, that life is nought but time,
And when that time is past, death holdes his heeles.
To age thus do they draw their youthfull prime,
Knowing no more, then vvhat poore tryall showes,
As fish sure tryall hath of muddie slime.
This paterne good, vnto our children goes,
For vvhat they see their parents loue or hate,

Their

Their firſt caught ſence prefers to teachers blows.
Theſe coklings cockred we bewaile too late,
VVhen that we ſee our offspring gaily bent,
VVomen man-wood, & men effeminate.

Geron. Fy man, fy man, what words hath thy toung lent?
Yet thou art mickle warſe then ere was I,
Thy too much zeale, I feare thy braine hath ſpent,
VVe oft are angrier, with the feeble ſlie
For buſineſſe, where it pertaines him not,
Then with the poiſnous todes that quiet lie.
I pray thee what hath ere the Parret got,
And yet they ſay he talkes in great mens bowers?
A Cage (guilded perchance) is all his lot,
VVho of his tongue the lickour gladly powrs,
A good foole call'd with paine, perhaps may be,
But euen for that ſhall ſuffer mightie Lowers.
Let ſwannes example ſiker ſerue for thee,
VVho once all birdes, in ſweetely ſinging paſt,
But now to ſilence turn'd his minſtrelſie.
For he would ſing, but others were defaſte;
The peacockes pride, the pyes pild ſtattery,
Cormorants glutt, Kites ſpoile, king fishers waſte.
The Falcons fierceneſſe, Sparrowes letchery,
The Cockows ſhame, the Gooſes good intent,
Euen turtle toucht he with hypocriſie.
And worſe of other more, till by aſſent
Of all the birdes, but namely thoſe were grieued,
Of fowles there called was a parliament.
There was the ſwan of dignitie depriued,
And ſtatute made he neuer ſhould haue voice,
Since when I thinke he hath in ſilence liued.
I warne thee therefore (ſince thou maiſt haue choice)
Let not thy toung become a firy match,
No ſword ſo bytes as that euill toole annoyes.
Let our vnpartiall eyes a litle watch
Our owne demeane, and ſoone we wonder ſhall,
That hunting faultes, our ſelues we did not catch.
Into our mindes let vs a little fall,
And we ſhall find more ſpots then Leopards ſkin.
Then who makes vs ſuch iudges ouer all?
But farewell nowe, thy fault is no great ſinne,
Come, come my curres, tis late I will goe in.

And away with his doggs ſtraight he went, as if he would be ſure to haue the laſt worde: all the aſſemblie laughing at the luſtineſſe of the old fellowe who departed muttering to himſelfe he had ſeene more in his daies then twentie of them. But Basilius, who neuer before had heard Philisides (though hauing seldome failed to be at these metings) desired him he would begin some Eclogue with some other of the shepheards according to the accustomed guise. Philisides though very vnwilling, at the Kings cõmaundement offred to sing with Thyrsis. But he directly refused him, seeing, he should within few dayes be maried to the faire Kala, & since he had gotten his desire he would sing no more. Then the king willed Philisides to declare the discourse of his own fortunes vnknowẽ to them as being a stranger in that countrie; but he prayed the king to pardon him, the time being farre too ioyfull to suffer the rehearsall of his miseries. But to satisfie Basilius some way, he began an Eclogue betwixt himselfe and the Echo, framing his voice so in those desert places as what wordes he would haue the Echo replie vnto, those he would sing higher then the rest; and so kindly framed a disputation betwixt himselfe and it, which with these hexameters in the following order he vttered.

Philisides. Echo.

Faire Rocks, goodly riuers, sweet woods, when shall I see peace? Peace.
Peace? what barrs me my tongue? who is it that comes me so ny? I.
Oh! I do know what gueſt I haue met; it is Echo. 't is Echo.
Well met Echo, approch: then tell me thy will too. I will too.
Echo, what do I get yelding my sprite to my grieues? Grieues.
What medicine may I finde for a griefe that drawes me to death? Death.
O poisonous medecin! what worse to me can be then it? It.
In what state was I then, when I tooke this deadly disease? Ease.
And what manner a mind which had to that humor a vaine? Vaine.
Hath not Reason enough vehemence the desire to reproue? Proue.
Oft proue I: but what salue, when Reason seeks to be gone? One.
Oh! what is it? what is it that may be a salue to my Loue? Loue.
What do louers seeke for, long seeking for to enioy? Ioy.
What be the ioyes which for to enioy they went to the paines? Paines.
Then to an earnest Loue what doth best victorie lend? Ende.
End? but I can neuer end, loue will not giue me the leaue? Leaue.
How be the minds disposed that can not tast thy physick? Sick.
Yet say againe thy aduise for th' euils that I told thee? I told thee.
Doth th' infected wretch, of his harme th' extremitie know? No.
But if he know not his harms what guides hath he whilst he be blind? Blind.
What blind guides can he haue that leanes to fancie? A fancy.
Can fancies want eyes, or he fall that steppeth aloft? Oft.
What causes first made these torments on me to light? Light.
Can then a cause be so light that forceth a man to go die? Yea.
Yet tell what light thing I had in me to draw me to die? Eye.
Eyesight made me to yeeld, but what first pierst to my eies? Eies.
Eies hurters, eies hurt; but what from them to me falles? Falles.
But when I first did fall, what brought most fall to my hart? Art.
Art? what can be that art that thou dost meane by thy speche? Speche.
What be the fruits of speaking art? what growes by the words? Words.
O much more then words: those words seru'd more me to blesse. Lesse.

Ob

Oh when shall I be knowne, where most to be knowne I do long? Long.
Long be thy woes for such newes, but how reck's she my thoughts? Oughts.
Then then what do I gaine, since vnto her will I do winde? VVinde.
VVinde, tempests, & stormes, yet in ende what giues she desire? Ire.
Silly reward! yet among women hath she of vertue the most. Most.
VVhat great name may I giue to so heau'nly a woman? A woe-man.
Wo, but seemes to me ioy, that agrees to my thought so. I thought so.
Thinke so, for of my desired blisse it is only the course. Curse.
Curs'd be thy selfe for cursing that which leades me to ioies. Toies.
VVhat be the sweet creatures where lowly demands be not heard? Hard.
VVhat makes them be vnkind? speake for th' hast narrowly pry'de? Pride.
VVhence can pride come there, since springs of beautie he thence? Thence.
Horrible is this blasphemy vnto the most holy. O lie.
Thou li'st false Echo, their minds as vertue be iust, Iust.
Mock'st thou those Diamonds which only be matcht by the gods? Ods.
Ods? what an ods is there since them to the heau'ns I preferre? Erre.
Tell yet againe me the names of these faire form'd to do euils. Deuils.
Deuils? if in hell such deuils do abide, to the hells I do go. Go.

Philisides was commended for the placing of his Echo, but little did he regard their praises, who had set the foundation of his honour there, where he was most despised: and therefore returning againe to the traine of his desolate pensiueneſſe, Zelmanes seeing no bodie offer to fill the stage, as if her long restrained conceits did now burst out of prison: she thus desiring her voice should be accorded to nothing, but to Philocleas eares, threw downe the burden of her minde in Anacreons kinde of verses.

My muse what ailes this ardour
To blase my onely secrets?
Alas it is no glory
To sing mine owne decaid state.
Alas it is no comfort,
To speake without an answere.
Alas it is no wisdome
To shew the wound without cure.

My muse vvhat ailes this ardour?
Mine eyes be dym, my lyms shake,
My voice is hoarse, my throte scercht,
My tong to this my roofe cleaues,
My fancy amazde, my thought dull'd,
My hart doth ake, my life faints,
My soule beginnes to take leaue.
So great a passion all feele,
To thinke a soare so deadly
I should so rashly rip vp.

My muse vvhat ailes this ardour?
If that to sing thou art bent,
Go sing the fall of old Thebes,
The vvarres of ougly Centaures,
The life, the death of Hector;
So may the song be famous,
Or if to loue thou art bent,
Recount the rape of Europe,
Adonis end, Venus net,
The sleepie kisse the Moone stale:
So may thy song be pleasant.

My muse vvhat ailes this ardour?
To blase my only secrets?
Wherein do only flourish
The sorie fruits of anguish.
The song thereof a last will,
The tunes be cryes, the words plaints,
The singer is the songs theame,

VVherein no care can haue ioy,
Nor eye receiue due obiect
Ne pleasure here, ne fame get.

My muse what ail's this ardour?
Alas she saith I am thine,
So are thy pains my pains too.
Thy heated hart my seat is Wherein I burne thy breath is
My voice, too hot to keepe in,
Besides lo here the author
Of all thy harmes: Lo here she,
That only can redresse thee,
Of her will I demaund help.

My muse I yeeld, my muse sing,
But all thy song herein knit,
The life we lead is all loue:
The loue we hold is all death,
Nor ought I craue to feede life,
Nor ought I seeke to shun death,
But onely that my goddesse
My life my death do count hers.

Basilius when shee had fully ended her song, fell prostrate vpon the ground, and thanked the Gods they had preserued his life so long, as to heare the very musicke they themselues vsed, in an earthly body. And thē with like grace to Zelmane neuer left intreating her, til she had (taking a Lyra Basilius helde for her) song these Phaleuciakes:

Reason, tell me thy mind, if here be reason
In this strange violence, to make resistance.
VVhere sweet graces erect the stately banner
Of vertues regiment, shining in harnesse
Of fortunes Diademes, by beauty mustred,
Say then Reason; I say, what is thy counsell?

Her loose haire be the shot, the brest the pikes be,
Skowts each motion is, the hands be horsmen,
Her lips are the riches the warres to maintaine,
VVhere well couched abides a coffer of pearle
Her legges carriage is of all the sweet campe:
Say then Reason; I say, what is thy counsell?

Her cannons be her eyes, mine eyes the walls be,
VVhich at first voly gaue too open entrie,
Nor ramper did abide; my braine was vp blowne,
Vndermin'd with a speech the piercer of thoughts.
Thus weakned by my selfe, no help remaineth:
Say then Reason; I say, what is thy counsell?

And now fame the herald of her true honour,
Doth proclaime with a sound made all by mens mouths,
That nature soueraine of earthly dwellers,
Commands all creatures, to yeeld obeysance
Vnder this, this her owne, her only dearling.
Say then Reason; I say, what is thy counsell?

Reason sighes, but in end he thus doth answere.

Nought

Nought can reason auaile in heauenly matters.
Thus natures Diamond receiue thy conqueſt,
Thus pure pearle, I do yeeld my ſenſes and ſoule.
Thus ſweete paine, I do yeeld, what ere I can yeeld,
Reaſon looke to thy ſelfe, I ſerue a goddeſſe.

Dorus had long he thought kept ſilence from ſaying ſomwhat which might tend to the glorie of her in whom all glorie to his ſeeming was included, but now he brake it, ſinging theſe verſes called Aſclepiadikes.

O ſweet woods the delight of ſolitarineſſe!
O how much I do like your ſolitarineſſe!
Where mans mind hath a freed conſideration
Of goodneſſe to receiue louely direction.
VVhere ſenſes do beholde th'order of heau'nly hoſte,
And wiſe thoughts do behold what the creator is:
Contemplation here holdeth his only ſeate:
Bounded with no limits, borne with a wing of hope
Clymes euen vnto the ſtarres, Nature is vnder it.
Nought diſturbs thy quiet, all to thy ſeruice yeelds,
Each ſight draws on a thought, thought mother of ſcience,
Sweet bird's kindly do graunt harmony vnto thee,
Faire trees shade is enough fortification,
Nor danger to thy ſelfe if be not in thy ſelfe.

O ſweete woods the delight of ſolitarineſſe!
O how much I do like your ſolitarineſſe!
Here nor treaſon is hid, vailed in innocence,
Nor enuies ſnakie eye, finds any harbor here,
Nor flatterers venimous inſinuations,
Nor comming humoriſts pudled opinions,
Nor courteous ruine of proffered vſury,
Nor time pratled away, cradle of ignorance,
Nor cauſeleſſe dutie, nor comber of arrogance,
Nor triſling title of vanitie dazleth vs,
Nor golden manacles, ſtand for a paradiſe,
Here wrongs name is vnheard: ſlander a monſter is,
Keepe thy ſprite from abuſe, here no abuſe doth haunt.
VVhat man grafts in a tree diſſmulation?

O ſweete woods the delight of ſolitarineſſe!
O how well I do like your ſolitarineſſe!
Yet deare ſoile, if a ſoule cloſ'd in a manſion
As ſweete as violets, faire as a lilly is,
Streight as Cedar, a voice ſtaines the Cannary birds,
Whoſe shade ſafely doth hold, danger auoideth her:
Such wiſedome, that in her liues ſpeculation:

Such goodneſſe that in her ſimplicitie triumphs:
VVhere enuies ſnaky eye, winketh or els dyeth,
Slander wants a pretext, flattery gone beyond:
Oh! if ſuch a one haue bent, to a lonely life,
Her ſteps glad we receiue, glad we receiue her eys.
And thinke not she doth hurt our ſolitarineſſe,
For ſuch company decks ſuch ſolitarineſſe.

The other Shepheards were offring themſelues to haue continued the ſports, but the night had ſo quietlie ſpent the moſt part of her ſelfe among them, that the king for that time licēſed thē. And ſo bringing Zelmane to her lodging, who would much rather haue done the ſame for Philoclea, of all ſides they went to counterfet a ſleepe in their bed, for a true one there agonies could not aforde them. Yet there they lay (ſo might they be moſt ſolitarie for the food of their thoughts) till it was neere noone the next day, after which Baſilius was to continue his Apollo deuotions, and the other to meditate vpon their priuate deſires.

The end of the ſecond Eclogues.

THE

THE THIRD BOOKE OF THE COVNTESSE OF PEMBROKES ARCADIA.

THis laſt dayes daunger, hauing made Pamelas loue diſcerne what a loſſe it ſhould haue ſuffered if Dorus had bene deſtroyed, bred ſuch tenderneſſe of kindneſſe in her toward him, that ſhe could no longer keep loue frō looking out through her eyes, and going forth in her words; whom before as a cloſe priſoner ſhe had to her heart onely committed; ſo as finding not onely by his ſpeaches and letters, but by the pitifull oration of a languiſhing behauiour, and the eaſilie diſciphered character of a ſorowfull face, that Deſpaire began now to threaten him deſtructiō, ſhe grew content both to pitie him, & let him ſee ſhe pitied him, as wel by making her own beautiful beames to thaw away the former ycineſſe of her behauiour, as by entertaining his diſcourſes (whenſoeuer he did vſe them) in the third perſon of Muſidorus; to ſo farre a degree, that in the end ſhe ſaid, that if ſhe had bene the Princeſſe whom that diſguiſed Prince had vertuouſlie loued, ſhe would haue requited his faith with faithfull affection: finding in her heart, that nothing could ſo hartily loue as vertue: with many mo words to the ſame ſence of noble fauour, and chaſt plainneſſe. Which when at the firſt it made that expected bliſſe ſhine vpon Dorus; he was like one frozen with extremitie of cold, ouer-haſtilie brought to a great fire, rather oppreſſed then relieued with ſuch a lightning of felicitie. But after the ſtrength of nature had made him able to feele the ſweetneſſe of ioyfulneſſe, that againe being a child of Paſſion, and neuer acquainted with mediocritie, could not ſet bounds vpon his happineſſe nor be content to giue deſire a kingdome, but that it muſt be an vnlimited monarchie. So that the ground he ſtood vpon being ouer-high in happineſſe, and ſlipperie through affection, he could not hold himſelfe from falling into ſuch an error, which with ſighes blew all comfort out of his breaſt, & waſht away all chearfulneſſe, of his cheare with teares. For this fauour filling him with hope, Hope encouraging his deſire, and Deſire conſidering nothing but oportunitie: one time (Mopſa being called away by her mother, and he left alone with Pamela) the ſudden occaſion called Loue, and that neuer ſtaid to aske Reaſons leaue, but made the too-much louing Dorus take her in his armes, offering to kiſſe her, and as it were, to eſtabliſh a trophee of his victorie. But ſhe, as if ſhe had bene readie to drinke a wine of excellent taſte and colour, which ſodainely ſhe perceiued had poyſon in it, ſo did ſhe put him away from her: looking firſt vp to heauen, as amazed to find her ſelfe ſo beguiled in him; then laying the cruell puniſhment vpon him of angrie Loue,& lowring beautie, ſhewing diſdaine, & a deſpiſing diſdaine, Away (ſaid ſhe) vnworthie man to loue, or to be loued. Aſſure thy ſelfe, I hate my ſelfe for being ſo deceiued; iudge then what I do thee for deceiuing me. Let me ſee thee no more, the only fall of my iudgement, and ſtaine of my conſcience. With that ſhe called Mopſa, not ſtaying for any anſwere (which was no other but a flood of teares) which ſhee ſeemed not to marke (much leſſe to pitie) and chid her for hauing ſo left her alone.

It was not a ſorow, but it was euen a death, which then laid hold of Dorus: which certainlie at that inſtant wold haue killed him, but that the feare to tarie longer in her preſence (contrary to her commandement) gaue him life to cary himſelfe away from her ſight, and to run into the woods, where throwing himſelfe downe at the foot of a tree, he did not fall to lamentation (for that proceeded of pitying) or grieuing for himſelfe (which he didno way) but to curſes of his life, as one that deteſted himſelfe. For finding himſelfe not only vnhappie, but vnhappie after being fallen frō all happineſſe:& to be fallen frō all happineſſe, not by any miſconceiuing, but by his owne fault, and his fault to be done to no other but to Pamela; he did not tender his owne eſtate, but deſpiſed it; greedily drawing into his mind, all conceits which might more and more torment him. And ſo remained he two dayes in the woods, diſdayning to giue his body food, or his mind comfort, louing in himſelfe nothing, but the loue of her. And indeed that loue onely ſtraue with the furie of his anguiſh, telling it, that if it deſtroyed Dorus, it ſhould alſo deſtroy the image of her that liued in Dorus: and when the thought of that was crept in vnto him, it began to winne of him ſome compaſſion to the ſhrine of that image, and to bewaile not for himſelfe (whō he hated) but that ſo notable a loue ſhold periſh. Then began he onlie ſo farre to wiſh his owne good, as that Pamela might pardon him the fault, though not the puniſhment: and the vttermoſt height he aſpired vnto, was, that after his death ſhe might yet pitie his errour, and know that it proceeded of loue, and not of boldneſſe. That conceit found ſuch friendſhip in his thoughts, that at laſt he yeelded ſince he was baniſhed her preſence, to ſeeke ſome means by writing to ſhew his ſorow and teſtifie his repentance. Therefore getting him the neceſſary inſtruments of writing, he thought beſt to counterfeit his hand (fearing that as alreadie ſhe knew his, ſhe would caſt it away as ſoone as ſhe ſaw it) and to put it in verſe, hoping that would draw her on to reade the more, chuſing the Elegiac as fitteſt for mourning. But neuer pen did more quakingly performe his office; neuer was paper more double moiſtened with inke and teares; neuer words more ſlowly maried together, and neuer the Muſes more tired then now with changes and rechanges of his deuiſes: fearing how to end, before he had reſolued how to begin, miſtruſting each word, condemning each ſentence. This word was not ſignificant, that word was too plaine: this would not be conceiued, the other would be ill conceiued: here ſorow was not enough expreſſed, there he ſeemed too much for his own ſake to be ſorie: this ſentence rather ſhewed arte then paſſion; that ſentence rather fooliſhly paſſionate, then forciblie mouing. At laſt, marring with mending, and putting out better then he left, he made an end of it; and being ended, was diuers times readie to teare it; till his reaſon aſſuring him; the more he ſtudied, the worſe it grew, he folded it vp, deuoutlie inuoking good acceptation vnto it; and watching his time, when they were all gone one day to dinner (ſauing Mopſa) to the other Lodge, ſtale vp into Pamelas chamber, and in her ſtandiſh (which firſt hee kiſſed; and craued of it a ſafe and friendly keeping) left it there, to be ſeen at her next vſing her inke (himselfe returning againe to be true prisoner to desperate sorow) leauing her standish vpon her beds head, to giue her the more occasion to marke it: which also fell out.

her

For she finding it at her after-noone returne, in another place then she left it, opened it. But when she saw the letter, her heart gaue her from whence it came. And therefore clapping it to againe, she went away from it, as if it had bene a contagious garment of an infected person: and yet was not long away, but that she wished she had read it, though she were loth to reade it. Shall I (said she) second his boldnesse so farre, as to reade his presumptuous letters? And yet (saith she) he sees me not now to grow the bolder thereby: & how can I tell whether they be presumptuous? The paper came from him, and therfore not worthy to be receiued? and yet the paper, she thought, was not guiltie. At last she concluded, it were not much amisse to looke it ouer, that she might out of his words picke some further quarell against him. Then she opened it, and threw it away, and tooke it vp againe, till (ere she were aware) her eyes would needes reade it, conteining this matter,

VNto a caitife wretch, whom long affliction holdeth,
and now fullie beleeues helpe to be quite perished;
Grant yet, grant yet a looke, to the last monument of his anguish,
O you (alas so I find) cause of his onlie ruine.
Dread not a vvhit (O goodlie cruell) that pitie may enter into thy heart by the sight of this Epistle I send:
And so refuse to behold of these strange wounds the recitall, least it might th'allure home thy selfe to returne, (Vnto thy selfe I do meane those graces dwell so vvithin thee, gratefulnesse, sweetnesse, holie loue, hartie regard) Such thing cannot I seeke (Despaire hath giu'n me my answere:
Despaire most tragicall clause to a deadlie request)
Such thing cannot he hope, that knowes thy determinate hardnesse, hard like a rich Marbell: hard, but a faire Diamond.
Can those eyes that of eyes drownd in most hartie flowing teares,
(teares and teares of a man) had no returne to remorse;
Can those eyes now yeeld to the kind conceit of a sorow, which inke onlie relates, but ne laments, ne replies?
Ah, that, that I do I not conceiue (though that to my blisse were)
More then Nestors yeares, more then a kings Diademe.
Ah, that that I do not conceiue, to the heauen when a mouse climes then may I hope t'achieue grace of a heauenlie Tiger.
But, but alas, like a man condemn'd doth craue to be heard speake,
Not that he hopes for amends of the desaster he feeles,
But finding th'approch of death with an inly relenting,
giues an adieu to the vvorld, as to his only delight:
Right so my boiling heart, enflam'd with fire of a faire eye,
bubling out doth breath signes of his hugie dolours:
Now that he finds to what end his life, and loue be reserued, and that he thence must part, where to liue onlie he liu'd.
O faire, O fairest, are such thy triumphes to thy faireneſſe?
can death beautie become? must I be such monument?

Muſt I be only the marke, ſhall prooue that vertue is angrie?
ſhall prooue that fierceneſſe can with a white Doue abide?
Shall to the vvorld appeare that faith and loue be rewarded vvith mortall diſdaine, bent to vnendly reuenge?
Vnto reuenge? O ſweet, on a wretch wilt thou be reuenged ſhall ſuch high Planets tend to the loſſe of a vvorme?
And to reuenge vvho do bend, vvold in that kind be reuenged, as th'offence vvas done, and go beyond if he can.
All my offence vvas loue: vvith loue then muſt I be chaſtned:
and vvith more, by the lawes that to reuenge do belong.
If that loue be a fault, more fault in you to be louely:
Loue neuer had me oppreſt, but that I ſaw to be lou'd.
You be the cauſe that I lou'd: vvhat Reaſon blameth a shadovv, that vvith a body 't goes? ſince by a body it is.
If that Loue you did hate, you ſhould your beauty haue hidden:
you ſhould thoſe faire eyes haue vvith a veile couered.
But ſoole, foole that I am, thoſe eyes would ſhine frō a darke caue.
vvhat veiles then do preuaile, but to a more miracle?
Or thoſe golden lockes, thoſe locks vvhich locke me to bondage, torne you ſhould diſperſe vnto the blaſts of a vvind.
But ſoole ſoole that I am, tho I had but a haire of her head found cu'n as I am, ſo I ſhould vnto that haire be a thrall.
Or with faire hands-nayls (ô hand which nailes me to this death)
you ſhould haue your face (ſince Loue is ill) blemiſhed.
O vvretch, vvhat do I ſay? ſhould that faire face be defaced?
ſhould my too-much ſight cauſe ſo true a Sun to be loſt?
Firſt let Cimmerian darkneſſe be my onl' habitation:
firſt be mine eyes puld out, firſt be my braine perished;
Ere that I ſhould conſent to do ſo exceſſiue a dammage
Vnto the earth, by the hurt of this her heauenly iewell.
O not, but ſuch loue you ſay you could haue afoorded, as might learne Temp'rance void of a rages euents.
O ſweet ſimplicitie: from vvhence ſhould Loue be ſo learned?
vnto Cupid that boy ſhall a Pedante be found?
Well: but faultie I was: Reaſon to my Paſſion yeelded,
Paſſion vnto my rage, Rage to a haſtie reuenge.
But what's this for a fault, for vvhich ſuch faith be abolisht, ſuch faith, ſo ſtaineleſſe, inuiolate, violent?
Shall I not? ô may I not thus yet refresh the rembrance, vvhat ſweet ioyes I had once, and what a place I did hold?
Shall I not once obiect, that you, you graunted a fauour vnto the man, whom now ſuch miſeries you award?
Bend your thoughts to the deare ſweet words which thē to me giu'n vvere:
thinke vvhat a vvorld is now, thinke vvho hath altred her heart.
VVhat? vvas I then worthy ſuch good, now vvorthy ſuch euill?
now fled, then cherished? then ſo nie, now ſo remote?
Did not a roſed breath, from lips more roſie proceeding, ſay, that I vvell ſhould find in vvhat a care I vvas had?

with

VVith much more: now what do I find, but Care to abhorre me,
Care that I ſinke in griefe, Care that I liue banished?
And banished do I liue, nor now vvill ſeeke a recou'rie, ſince ſo she vvill, whoſe will is to me more then a law.
If then a man in moſt ill caſe may giue you a farewell:
farewell, long farewell, all my wo, all my delight.

What this would haue wrought in her, ſhee her ſelfe could not tell: for, before her reaſon could moderate the diſputation betweene Fauour and Faultineſſe, her ſiſter, and Miſo, called her downe to entertaine Zelmane, who was come to viſite the two ſiſters; about whō, as about two Poles the skie of Beautie was turned: while Gynecia wearied her bed with her melancholie ſickneſſe, & made Miſos ſhrewdneſſe (who like a ſprite, ſet to keepe a treaſure, bard Zelmane from anie further conference) to be the Lieutenant of her iealouſie: both ſhe and her husband driuing Zelmane to ſuch a ſtraight of reſolution, either of impoſſible graunting, or daungerous refuſing, as the beſt eſcape ſhe had, was (as much as ſhe could) to auoyd their companie. So as, this day, being the fourth day after the vprore (Baſilius being with his ſicke wife, conferring vpon ſuch examinations, as Philanax, & other of his noblemen had made of this late ſedition, all touching Cecropia with vehement ſuſpition of giuing either flame or fewell vnto it) Zelmane came with her body, to finde her mind, which was gone long before her, and had gotten his ſeat in Philoclea: who now with a baſhfull chearefulneſſe (as though ſhe were aſhamed, that ſhe could not chooſe but be glad) ioyned with her ſiſter, in making much of Zelmane.

And ſo as they ſate deuiſing how to giue more feathers to the wings of Time, there came to the lodge dore ſixe maids, all in one liuery of ſcarlet peticotes, which were tuckt vp almoſt to their knees, the peticotes themſelues being in many places garniſhed with leaues, their legs naked, ſauing that aboue the anckles they had litle blacke ſilke laces, vpō which did hang a few ſiluer bels: like which they had a litle aboue their elbowes vpon their bare arms. Vpō their haire they ware garlands of roſes & gilliflowers; and the haire was ſo dreſt, as that came againe aboue the garlāds, enterchāging a mutuall couering: ſo as it was doubtfull, whether the haire dreſt the garlāds, or the garlands dreſt the haire. Their breaſts liberal to the eye; the face of the foremoſt of thē, in excellency faire; & of the reſt louelie, if not beautifull: & beautifull might haue bene, if they had not ſuffered greedy Phœbus, ouer-often, & hard, to kiſſe them. Their countenances full of a graceſull grauitie; ſo as the geſture matcht with the apparell, it might ſeeme a wanton modeſtie, & an entiſing ſoberneſſe. Each of thē had an inſtrumēt of muſike in their hands, which conſorting their well pleaſing tunes, did charge each eare with vnſenſibleneſſe, that did not lend it ſelfe vnto them. The muſike entring alone into the Lodge, the Ladies were all deſirous to ſee frō whence ſo pleaſant a gueſt was come: & therfore went out together; where before they could take the paines to doubt, much leſſe to aske the queſtion of their qualitie, the faireſt of them (with a gay, but yet diſcreet demeanor) in this ſort ſpake vnto them. Moſt excellent Ladies, (whoſe excellencies haue power to make cities enuie theſe woods, and ſolitarineſſe to be accounted the ſweeteſt companie) vouchſafe our meſſage your gracious hearing, which as it comes frō loue, ſo comes it from louelie perſons. The Maides of all this coaſt of Arcadia, vnderſtanding the often acceſſe that certaine ſhepheards of theſe quarters, are allowed to haue in this forbidden place; and that their rurall ſports are not diſdained of you, haue bin ſtirred vp with emulation to thē, & affection to you, to bring forth ſomething, which might as well breed your contentment: and therefore hoping that the goodneſſe of their intention, and the hurtleſneſſe of their ſex ſhall excuſe the breach of the commandement in cōming to this place vnſent for, they choſe out vs, to inuite both your princelie parents, and your ſelues, to a place in the woods about halfe a mile hence: where they haue prouided ſome ſuch ſports, as they truſt your gracious acceptations will interpret to be delightfull. We haue bene at the other Lodge, but finding thē there buſied in waightier affaires, our truſt is, that you yet will not deny the ſhining of your eyes vpō vs. The Ladies ſtood in ſome doubt whether they ſhold go or not, leaſt Baſilius might be angrie withall. But Miſo (that had bene at none of the Paſtorals, and had a great deſire to lead her old ſences abroad to ſome pleaſure) told them plainly, they ſhould nor will nor chooſe, but go thither, and make the honeſt country people know, that they were not ſo ſqueamiſh as folkes thought of thē. The Ladies glad to be warranted by her authoritie; with a ſmiling humbleneſſe obeyed her: Pamela only caſting a ſeeking looke, whether ſhe could ſee Dorus (who poore wretch, wandred halfe mad for ſorow in the woods, crying for pardon of her, who could not heare him) but indeed was grieued for his abſence, hauing giuen the wound to him through her owne hart. But ſo the three Ladies & Miſo went with thoſe ſix Nymphes, conquering the length of the way with the force of muſike, leauing onlie Mopſa behind, who diſgraced weeping with her countenāce, becauſe her mother would not ſuffer her to ſhew her new ſcoured face among thē. But the place appointed (as they thought) met them halfe in their way, ſo well were they pleaſed with the ſweet tunes & pretie conuerſation of their inuiters. There found they in the midſt of the thickeſt part of the wood, a litle ſquare place, not burthened with trees, but with a boord couered, and beautified with the pleaſanteſt fruits, that ſunburnd Autumne could deliuer vnto thē. The maids beſought the Ladies to ſit downe & taſt of the ſwelling grapes, which ſeemed great with child of Bacchus: and of the diuerſe coloured plums, which gaue the eye a pleaſant taſt before they came to the mouth. The Ladies would not ſhew to ſcorne their prouiſion, but eat and dranke a litle of their coole wine, which ſeemed to laugh for ioy to come to ſuch lips.

But after the collation was ended, and that they looked for the comming forth of ſuch deuiſes as were prepared for them, there ruſht out of the woods twenty armed men, who round about enuironed them, and laying hold of Zelmane before ſhe could draw her ſword, and taking it from her, put hoods ouer the heades of all foure, and ſo muffled, by force ſet them on horſeback and caried them away; the ſiſters in vaine crying for ſuccour, while Zelmanes heart was rent in peeces with rage of the iniurie, and diſdaine of her fortune. But when they had caried them a foure or fiue mile further, they left Miſo with a gagge in her mouth, and bound hand and foot, ſo to take her fortune: and brought the three Ladies (by that time the night ſeemed with her ſilence to conſpire to their treaſon) to a Caſtle about ten mile from the Lodges: where they were faine to take a boate which waited for them: for the Caſtle ſtood in the midſt of a great lake vppon a high rocke, where partlie by Arte, but principallie by Nature, it was by all men eſteemed impregnable. But at the Caſtle gate their faces were diſcouered, and there were met with a great number of torches, after whom the ſiſters knew their Aunt in law Cecropia. But that ſight increaſed the deadly terrour of the Princeſſes, loking for nothing but death, ſince they were in the power of the wicked Cecropia: who yet came vnto thē, making curteſie the outſide of miſchiefe,& deſiring them not to be diſcomforted: for they were in a place dedicated to their ſeruice, Philoclea (with a looke where Loue ſhined through the miſt of Feare) beſought her to be good vnto them, hauing neuer deſerued euill of her. But Pamelas high heart diſdained humbleneſſe to iniury, Aunt (ſayd ſhe) what you haue determined of vs I pray you do it ſpeedily: for my part I looke for no ſeruice, where I find violence.

But Cecropia (vſing no more words with them) conueyed them all three to ſeuerall lodgings (Zelmanes heart ſo ſwelling with ſpite, that ſhe could not bring forth a word) and ſo left them: firſt taking from them their kniues, becauſe they ſhould do themſelues no hurt, before ſhe had determined of them: and then giuing ſuch order that they wanted nothing but liberty, and comfort, ſhe went to her ſonne, who yet kept his bed, becauſe of his wound he had receiued of Zelmane, and told him, whom now he had in his power. Amphialus was but euen then returned from far countries, where he had wonne immortall fame, both of courage and curteſie, when he met with the Princeſſes, and was hurt by Zelmane, ſo as he was vtterly ignorant of all his mothers wicked deuiſes, to which he would neuer haue conſented, being (like a roſe out of a brier) an excellent ſonne of an euill mother: and now when hee heard of this, was as much amazed, as if he had ſeene the Sunne fall to the earth. And therefore deſired his mother that ſhe would tell him the whole diſcourſe, how all theſe matters had happened. Sonne (ſayd ſhe) I will doo it willingly, and ſince all ie done for you, I will hide nothing from you. And howſoeuer I might be aſhamed to tell it ſtrangers, who would thinke it wickedneſſe, yet what is done for your ſake (how euill ſoeuer to others) to you is vertue. To begin then euen with the beginning, this doting foole Baſilius that now raignes, hauing liued vnmaried till he was nigh threeſcore yeares old (and in all his ſpeeches affirming, and in all his doings aſſuring, that he neuer would marrie) made all the eyes of this country to be bent vpon your father, his onelie brother (but younger by thirtie yeares) as vpon the vndoubted ſucceſſor: being indeed a man worthie to reigne, thinking nothing enough for himſelfe: where this gooſe (you ſee) puts downe his head, before there bee anie thing neere to touch him. So that heholding place and eſtimation as heire of Arcadia, obtained me of my father the King of Argos, his brother helping to the concluſion, with proteſting his bachelerly intention: for elſe you may be ſure the King of Argos, nor his daughter would haue ſuffered their Royall bloud to bee ſtained with the baſe name of ſubiection. So that I came into this country as apparant Princeſſe thereof, and accordingly was courted, and followed of all the Ladies of this countrie. My port and pompe did well become a King of Argos daughter: in my preſence their tongues were turned into eares, and their eares were captiues vnto my tongue. Their eyes admired my Maieſty, & happy was he or ſhe, on whom I would ſuffer the beames thereof to fall. Did I go to Church? it ſeemed the very Goddes waited for me, their deuotions not being ſolemnized till I was ready. Did I walke abroad to ſee any delight? Nay, my walking was the delight it ſelfe: for to it was the concourſe; one thruſting vpon another, who might ſhew himſelfe moſt diligent and ſeruiceable towards me: my ſleepes were inquired after, and my wakings neuer vnſaluted: the very gate of my houſe full of principall perſons, who were glad, if their preſents had receiued a gratefull acceptation. And in this felicitie wert thou borne, the very earth ſubmitting it ſelfe vnto thee to be troden on as by his Prince; & to that paſſe had my husbands vertue (by my good helpe) within ſhort time brought it, with a plot we layd, as we ſhould not haue needed to haue waited the tedious worke of a naturall end of Basilius; when the heauens (I thinke enuying my great felicity) then stopt thy fathers breath, when he breathed nothing but power and soueraignty. Yet did not thy orphancy, or my widdowhood, depriue vs of the delightfull prospect, which the hill of honour doth yeeld, while expectation of thy succession did bind dependencies vnto vs.

But before (my sonne) thou wert come to the age to feele the sweetenesse of authoritie, this beast (whom I can neuer name with patience) falsely and foolishly married this Gynecia, then a young gyrle, and brought her to sit aboue me in al feasts to turne her shoulder to me-ward in all our solemnities. It is certaine, it is not so great a spite to be surmounted by strangers, as by ones owne allies. Thinke then what my mind was, since withall there is no question: The fall is greater from the first to the second, then from the second to the vndermost. The rage did swell in my heart, so much the more as it were faine to be suppressed in silence, and disguised with humblenesse. But aboue all the rest, the griefe of grieues was, when with these two daughters (now thy prisoners) she cut off all hope of thy succession. It was a tedious thing to me; that my eyes should looke lower then any bodies, that (my selfe being by) anothers voyce then mine, should be more respected. But it was insupportable vnto me, to thinke that not only I, but thou shouldst spend all thy time in such misery, and that the Sun should see my eldest son lesse then a Prince. And though I had bin a Saint I could not choose, finding the change this change of fortune bred vnto me, for now from the multitude of followers, silence grew to be at my gate, & absence in my presence. The guesse of my mind could preuaile more before, thē now many of my earnest requests. And thou (my deare sonne) by the fickle multitude no more then an ordinary person (borne of the mud of the people) regarded. But I (remembring that in all miseries weeping becomes fooles, and practise wise folks) haue tried diuers meanes to pull vs out of the mire of subiection. And though many times fortune failed me, yet did I neuer faile my selfe. Wild beastes I kept in a caue hard by the lodges, which I caused by night to be fed in the place of their pastorals, I as then liuing in my house hard by the place, and against the houre they were to meete (hauing kept the beastes without meate) then let them loose, knowing that they would seeke their foode there, and deuoure what they found. But blind Fortune hating sharpe-sighted inuentions, made them vnluckily to be killed. After I vsed my seruant Clinias to stir a notable tumult of countrie people: but those loutes were too grosse instruments for delicate conceits. Now lastly, finding Philanax his examinations grow dangerous, I thought to play double or quit; and with a sleight I vsed of my fine-witted wench Artesia, with other maides of mine, would haue sent these goodly inheritrixes of Arcadia, to haue pleaded their cause before Pluto, but that ouer-fortunatly for thē, you made me know the last day how vehemently this childish passion of loue doth torment you. Therefore I haue brought them vnto you, yet wishing rather hate then loue in you. For hate often begetteth victory; Loue commonly is the instrument of subiection. It is true, that I wold also by the same practise haue entrapped the parents, but my maids failed of it, not daring to tary long about it. But this sufficeth, since (these being taken away) you are the vndoubted inheritor, and Basilius will not long ouer-liue this losse.

O mother (sayd Amphialus) speake not of doing them hurt, no more then to mine eyes, or my hart, or if I haue any thing more deare then eyes, or hart vnto me. Let others find what sweetnesse they will in euer fearing, because they are euer feared: for my part, I will thinke my selfe highly intitled, if I may be once by Philoclea accepted for a ſeruant. Well (ſayd Cecropia) I would I had borne you of my mind, as well as of my body: then ſhould you not haue ſuncke vnder theſe baſe weakneſſes. But ſince you haue tied your thoughts in ſo wilfull a knot, it is happie my policy hath brought matters to ſuch a paſſe, as you may both enioy affection, and vpon that build your ſoueraignty. Alas (ſayd Amphialus) my hart would faine yeeld you thanks for ſetting me in the way of felicity, but that feare killes thē in me, before they are fully borne. For if Philoclea be diſpleaſed, how can I be pleaſed? if ſhe count it vnkindneſſe, ſhal I giue tokens of kindneſſe? perchance ſhe condemnes me of this action, and ſhall I triumph? perchance ſhe drownes now the beauties I loue with ſorrowfull teares, and where is then my reioycing? You haue reaſon (ſayd Cecropia with a fained grauity) I will therefore ſend her away preſently, that her contentment may be recouered. No good mother (ſayd Amphialus) ſince ſhe is here, I would not for my life conſtraine preſence, but rather would I die then conſent to abſence. Pretie intricate follies (ſayd Cecropia) but get you vp, and ſee how you can preuaile with her, while I go to the other ſiſter. For after we ſhall haue our hands full to defend our ſelues, if Baſilius hap to beſiege vs. But remembring her ſelfe, ſhe turned back and asked him what he would haue done with Zelmane, ſince now he might be reuenged of his hurt. Nothing but honorably, anſwered Amphialus, hauing deſerued no other of me, eſpecially being (as I hear (greatly cheriſhed of Philoclea: and therfore I could wiſh they were lodged together. O no (ſayd Cecropia) company confirmes reſolutions, & lonelineſſe breeds a wearines of ones thoughts, & ſo a ſooner conſenting to reaſonable profers.

But Amphialus (taking off his mother Philocleas kniues, which he kept as a relique, ſince ſhe had worne thē) gat vp, and calling for his richeſt apparell, nothing ſeemed ſumptuous inough for his miſtreſſes eyes: and that which was coſtly, he feared were not dainty: and though the inuention were delicate, he miſdoubted the making. As carefull he was too of the colour; leaſt if gay, he might ſeem to glory in his iniury, & her wrong; if mourning, it might ſtrike ſome euil preſage vnto her of her fortune. At length he took a garmēt more rich then glaring, the ground being black veluet, richly embrodered with great pearle, and precious ſtones, but they ſet ſo among certaine tuffes of cipres, that the cipres was like black clowds, through which the ſtars might yeeld a dark luſter. About his neck he ware a brode & gorgeous coller; whereof the peeces enterchāgeably anſwering; the one was of diamōds & pearle, ſet with a white enamell, ſo as by the cunning of the workman it ſeemed like a ſhining ice, and the other piece being of Rubies, and Opalles, had a fierie gliſtring, which he thought pictured the two paſſions of Feare & Deſire, wherein he was enchained. His hurt (not yet fully well) made him a litle halt, but he ſtraue to giue the beſt grace hee could vnto his halting.

And in that ſort he went to Philocleas chamber: whom hee found (becauſe her chamber was ouer-lightſome) ſitting of that ſide of her bedde which was from the window; which did caſt ſuch a ſhaddow vpon her, as a good Painter would beſtow vpon Venus, when vnder the trees ſhe bewailed the murther of Adonis: her hands and fingers (as it were) indented one within the other: her ſhoulder leaning to her beds head, and ouer her head a ſcarfe, which did eclipſe almoſt halfe her eyes, which vnder it fixed their beames vpon the wall by, with ſo ſteddie a maner, as if in that place they might well chaunge, but not mend their obiect: and ſo remayned they a good while after his comming in, he not daring to trouble her, nor ſhe perceiuing him, till that (a little varying her thoughts ſomething quickening her ſenſes) ſhe heard him as he happed to ſtirre his vpper garment: and perceiuing him, rose vp, with a demeanure, where in the booke of Beauty there was nothing to be read but Sorrow: for Kindnesse was blotted out, & Anger was neuer there.

But Amphialus that had entrusted his memory with long and forcible speeches, found it so locked vp in amazement, that he could pike nothing out of it, but the beseeching her to take what was done in good part, and to assure her selfe there was nothing but honour meant vnto her person. But she making no other aunswere, but letting her hands fall one from the other, which before were ioyned (with eyes something cast aside, and a silent sigh) gaue him to vnderstand, that considering his dooings, she thought his speech as full of incongruitie, as her answere would be voide of purpose: whereupon he kneeling downe, and kissing her hand (which she suffered with a countenance witnessing captiuity, but not kindnesse) he besought her to haue pity of him, whose loue went beyond the bounds of conceit, much more of vttering: that in her hands the ballance of his life or death did stand; whereto the least motion of hers would serue to determine, she being indeede the mistresse of his life, and he her eternall slaue; and with true vehemency besought her that he might heare her speake, whereupon she suffered her sweete breath to turne it selfe into these kind of words.

Alas cousin (sayd shee) what shall my tongue bee able to doo, which is informed by the eares one way, and by the eyes another? You call for pittie, and vse crueltie; you say, you loue me, and yet doe the effects of enmitie. You affirme your death is in my hands, but you haue brought me to so neare a degree to death, as when you will, you may lay death vpon me: so that while you saie, I am mistresse of your life, I am not mistresse of mine owne. You entitle your selfe my slaue, but I am sure I am yours. If then violence, iniurie, terror, and depriuing of that which is more deare then life it selfe, libertie, be fit orators for affection, you may expect that I will be easily perswaded. But if the neareneſse of our kinred breede any remorse in you, or there be any such thing in you, which you call loue toward me, then let not my fortune be disgraced with the name of imprisonment: let not my heart waste it selfe by being vexed with feeling euill, and fearing worse. Let not me be a cause of my parents wofull destruction; but restore me to my selfe; and so doing I shall account I haue receiued my selfe of you. And what I say for my selfe, I say for my deare sister, and my friend Zelmane: for I desire no wel-being, without they may bee partakers. With that her teares rayned downe from her heauenly eyes, and seemed to water the sweete and beautifull flowers of her face.

But Amphialus was like the poore woman, who louing a tame Doe she had, aboue all earthly things, hauing long played withall, and made it feede at her hand and lappe, is constrained at length by famine (all her flocke being spent, and she fallen into extreame pouertie) to kill the Deare, to sustaine her life. Many a pitifull looke doth she cast vpon it, and many a time doth she drawe backe her hand before she can giue the stroke. For euen so Amphialus by a hunger-starued affection, was compelled to offer this iniury and yet the same affection made him with a tormenting griefe, thinke vnkindnesse in himselfe, that hee could find in his heart anyway to restraine her freedome. But at length, neither able to graunt, nor denie, hee thus answered her. Deare Lady (sayd he) I will not say vnto you (how iustly soeuer I may do it) that I am neither author, nor accessary vnto this your withholding. For since I do not redresse it, I am as faulty as if I had begun it. But this I proteſt vnto you (and this proteſtation of mine, let the heauens heare, and if I lie, let them anſwer me with a deadly thunderbolt) that in my ſoule I wiſh I had neuer ſeene the light, or rather, that I had neuer had a father to beget ſuch a child, then that by my means thoſe eyes ſhold ouerflow their owne beauties, then by my means the skie of your vertue ſhould be ouerclowded with ſorrow. But woe is me, moſt excellent Lady, I find my ſelfe moſt willing to obey you: neither truely do mine eares receiue the leaſt word you ſpeake, with any leſſe reuerence, then as abſolute, and vnreſiſtable commandements. But alas, that tyrant Loue (which now poſſeſſeth the hold of all my life and reaſon) will no way ſuffer it. It is Loue, it is Loue, not I, which diſobey you. What then ſhall I ſay? but that I, who am readie to lie vnder your feete, to venture, nay to looſe my life at your leaſt commandement: I am not the ſtay of your freedome, but Loue, Loue, which ties you in your owne knots. It is you your ſelfe, that impriſon your ſelfe: it is your beauty which makes theſe caſtle walles embrace you: it is your owne eyes, which reflect vpon themſelues this iniury. Then is there no other remedy, but that you ſome way vouchſafe to ſatisfie this Loues vehemency; which (ſince it grew in your ſelfe) without queſtion you ſhall find it (far more then I) tractable.

But wi h theſe words Philoclea fell to ſo extreme a quaking, and her liuely whiteneſſe did degenerate to ſuch a deadly paleneſſe, that Amphialus feared ſome daungerous traunce: ſo that taking her hand, and feeling that it (which was wont to bee one of the chiefe firebrands of Cupid) had all the ſence of it wrapt vp in coldneſſe, he began humbly to beſeech her to put away all feare, and to aſſure her ſelfe vpon the vow hee made thereof vnto God, and her ſelfe, that the vttermoſt forces hee would euer employ to conquer her affection, ſhould bee Deſire, and Deſert. That promiſe brought Philoclea againe to her ſelfe, ſo that ſlowly lifting vp her eyes vpon him, with a countenance euer courteous, but then languiſhing, ſhe told him, that he ſhould do well to do ſo, if indeede he had euer taſted what true loue was: for that where now ſhe did beare him good will, ſhe ſhould (if he tooke any other way) hate, and abhor the very thought of him: aſſuring him withall, that though his mother had taken away her kniues, yet the houſe of death had ſo many dores, as ſhe would eaſily flie into it, if euer ſhe found her honour endangered.

Amphialus hauing the cold aſhes of Care caſt vpon the coales of Deſire, leauing ſome of his mothers Gentlewomen to waite vpon Philoclea, himſelfe indeede a priſoner to his priſoner, and making all his authoritie to bee but a footeſtoole to Humbleneſſe, went from her to his mother. To whom with words which Affection endited, but Amazement vttered, hee deliuered what had paſſed betweene him and Philoclea: beſeeching her to trie what her perſwaſions could doo with her, while he gaue order for all ſuch things as were neceſſary againſt ſuch forces, as he looked dayly Baſilius would bring before his caſtle. His mother bad him quiet himſelfe, for ſhe doubted not to take fit times. But that the beſt way was firſt to let her owne Paſſion a litle tire it ſelfe.

So they calling Clinias, and ſome other of their counſell, aduiſed vpon their preſent affaires. Firſt, he diſpatched priuate letters to all thoſe principall Lords & gentlemen of the country, whom he thought either alliance, or friendſhip to himſelfe might draw; with ſpeciall motions from the generall conſideration of duetie: not omitting all ſuch, whom either youthfull age, or youthlike minds did fill with vnlimited deſires: beſides ſuch, whom any diſcontentment made hungry of change, or an ouer-ſpended want, made want a ciuill war: to each (according to the counſell of his mother) conforming himſelfe after their humors. To his friends, friendlineſſe; to the ambitious, great expectations; to the diſpleaſed, reuenge; to the greedy, ſpoile: wrapping their hopes with ſuch cunning, as they rather ſeemed giuen ouer vnto them as partakers: then promiſes ſprong of neceſſity. Then ſent he to his mothers brother, the king of Argos: but he was as then ſo ouer-laid with war himſelfe, as from thence he could attend ſmall ſuccour.

But becauſe he knew how violently rumors do blow the ſailes of popular iudgements, and how few there be that can diſcerne betweene truth and truthlikeneſſe, betweene ſhewes and ſubſtance; he cauſed a iuſtification of this his action to be written, whereof were ſowed abroade many copies, which with ſome gloſſes of probability, might hide indeede the fouleneſſe of his treaſon; and from true common-places, fetch downe moſt falſe applications. For, beginning how much the duetie which is owed to the countrie, goes beyond all other dueties, ſince in it ſelfe it containes them all, and that for the reſpect thereof, not onely all tender reſpects of kinred, or whatſoeuer other friendſhippes, are to be laide aſide, but that euen long-held opinions (rather builded vpon a ſecret of gouernement, then any ground of truth) are to be forſaken. He fell by degrees to ſhew, that ſince the end whereto any thing is directed, is euer to be of more noble reckning, then the thing thereto directed: that therefore, the weale-publike was more to be regarded, then any perſon or magiſtrate that thereunto was ordained. The feeling conſideration whereof, had moued him (though as neare of kinne to Baſilius as could be, yet) to ſet principally before his eyes, the good eſtate of ſo many thouſands, ouer whom Baſilius raigned: rather then ſo to hoodwinke himſelfe with affection, as to ſuffer the realme to runne to manifeſt ruine. The care whereof, did kindly appertaine to thoſe who being ſubalterne magiſtrates and officers of the crowne, were to bee employed as from the Prince, ſo for the people; and of all other, eſpecially himſelfe, who being deſcended of the Royall race, and next heire male. Nature had no ſooner opened his eyes, but that the ſoyle whereupon they did looke, was to looke for at his hands a continuall carefulneſſe: which as from his childhood he had euer caried; ſo now finding that his vncle had not only giuen ouer all care of gouernment, but had put it into the hands of Philanax (a man neither in birth comparable to many, nor for his corrupt, proude, and partiall dealing, liked of any) but beſide, had ſet his daughters (in whom the whole eſtate, as next heires thereunto, had no leſſe intereſt then himſelfe) in ſo vnfit and il-guarded a place, as it was not onely dangerous for their perſons, but (if they ſhould be conueied to any forraine country) to the whole common-wealth pernicious: that therefore he had brought them into this ſtrong caſtle of his, which way, if it might ſeeme ſtrange, they were to conſider, that new neceſſities require new remedies: but there they ſhould be ſerued and honored as belonged to their greatneſſe, vntil by the generall aſſembly of the eſtates, it ſhould be determined how they ſhould to their beſt (both priuate, and publique) aduantage be matched; vowing all faith & duty both to the father and children, neuer by him to be violated. But if in the meane time, before the eſtates could be aſſembled, he ſhold be aſſailed, he wold then for his own defence take armes: deſiring al, that either tendred the daungerous caſe of their country, or in their harts loued iuſtice, to defend him in this iuſt action. And if the Prince ſhold command them otherwiſe, yet to know, that therein he was no more to be obeied, then if he ſhould call for poiſon to hurt himſelfe withall: ſince all that was done, was done for his ſeruice, howſoeuer he might (ſeduced by Philanax) interprete of it: he proteſting, that whatſoeuer he ſhould do for his owne defence, ſhould be againſt Philanax, and no way againſt Baſilius.

(ſeduced

To this effect, amplified with arguments and examples, and painted with rhetoricall colours, did hee ſow abroade many diſcourſes: which as they preuailed with ſome of more quicke then ſound conceipt, to run his fortune with him; ſo in many did it breed a cooleneſſe, to deale violently againſt him, & a falſe-minded neutrality to expect the iſſue. But beſides the wayes he vſed to weaken the aduerſe party, he omitted nothing for the ſtrengthning of his owne. The chiefe truſt whereof (becauſe he wanted men to keepe the field) he repoſed in the ſurety of his caſtle; which at leaſt would win him much time, the mother of many mutations. To that therfore he bent both his outward and inward eyes, ſtriuing to make Art ſtriue with Nature, to whether of them two that fortification ſhould be moſt beholding. The ſeat Nature beſtowed, but Art gaue the building: which as his rocky hardneſſe would not yeelde to vndermining force, ſo to open aſſaults he tooke counſell of skill, how to make all approches, if not impoſſible, yet difficult; as well at the foote of the caſtell, as round about the lake, to giue vnquiet lodgings to them, whom onely enmity would make neighbours. Then omitted he nothing of defence, as well ſimple defence, as that which did defend by offending, fitting inſtruments of miſchiefe to places, whence the miſchiefe might be moſt liberally beſtowed. Neither was his ſmalleſt care for victuals, as well for the prouiding that which ſhould ſuffice, both in ſtore and goodneſſe, as in well preſeruing it, and wary diſtributing it, both in quantity & quality; ſpending that firſt which would keepe leaſt.

But wherein he ſharpned his wits to the piercingeſt point, was touching his men (knowing them to be the weapon of weapons, & maiſter-ſpring (as it were) which makes all the reſt to ſtir; and that therfore in the Art of man ſtood the quinteſſence, and ruling skill of all proſperous gouernment, either peaceable, or military) hee choſe in number as many as without peſtring (and ſo daunger of infection) his victuall would ſerue for two yeare to maintaine; all of able bodies, and ſome few of able minds to direct, not ſeeking many commaunders, but contenting himſelfe, that the multitude ſhould haue obeying wittes, euery one knowing whom hee ſhould commaund, and whom he ſhould obey, the place where, and the matter wherein; diſtributing each office as neare as he could, to the diſpoſition of the perſon that ſhould exerciſe it: knowing no loue, daunger, nor diſcipline can ſuddenly alter an habite in nature. Therefore would he not employ the ſtill man to a ſhifting practiſe, nor the liberall man to be a diſpenſer of his victuals, nor the kind-harted man to be a puniſher: but would exerciſe their vertues in ſorts, where they might be profitable, employing his chiefe care to know them all particularly, & throughly, regarding alſo the conſtitution of their bodies; ſome being able better to abide watching, ſome hunger, ſome labour, making his benefit of each hability, & not forcing beyond power. Time to euery thing by iuſt proportion he allotted, and as well in that, as in euery thing elſe, no ſmall error winckt at, leaſt greater ſhould be animated. Euen of vices he made his profit, making the cowardly Clinias to haue care of the watch, which he knew his owne feare would make him very wakefully performe. And before the ſiege began, he himſelfe cauſed rumors to be ſowed, and libels to be ſpread againſt himſelfe, fuller of malice, then witty perſwaſion: partly to know thoſe that would be apt to ſtumble at ſuch motions, that he might cull them from the faithfuller band; but principally, becauſe in neceſſitie they ſhould not know when any ſuch things were in earneſt attempted, whether it were, or not of his owne inuention. But euen then before the enemies face came neare to breed any terrour) did he exercise his men dayly in all their charges, as if Daunger had presently presented his most hideous presence: himselfe rather instructing by example, then precept; being neither more sparing in trauell, nor spending in diet, then the meanest souldier: his hand and body disdaining no base matters, nor shrinking from the heauy.

The onely ods was, that when others tooke breath, he sighed; and when others rested, he crost his armes. For Loue passing thorow the pikes of Daunger, and tumbling it selfe in the dust of Labour, yet still made him remember his sweete desire, and beautifull image. Often when he had begun to commaund one, somewhat before halfe the sentence were ended, his inward gueſt did so entertaine him, that hee would breake it off, and a pretty while after end it, when hee had (to the maruell of the standers by) sent himselfe in to talke with his owne thoughts. Somtimes when his hand was lifted vp to do something, as if with the sight of Gorgons head he had bene suddenly turned into a stone, so would he there abide with his eyes planted, and hand lifted, till at length, comming to the vse of himselfe, he would looke about whether any had perceiued him; then would he accuse, and in himselfe condemne all those wits, that durst affirme Idlenesse to be the well-spring of Loue. O, would he say, all you that affect the title of wisdome, by vngratefull scorning the ornaments of Nature, am I now piping in a shadow? or doo slouthfull feathers now enwrap me? Is not hate before me, and doubt behind me? Is not daunger of the one side, and shame of the other? And doo I not stand vpon paine, and trauell, and yet ouer all, my affection triumphes? The more I stirre about vrgent affaires, the more me thinkes the very stirring breedes a breath to blow the coales of my loue: the more I exercise my thoughts, the more they encrease the appetite of my desires. O sweete Philoclea (with that he would cast vp his eyes wherein some water did appeare, as if they would wash themselues against they should see her) thy heauenly face is my Astronomie; thy sweete vertue, my sweete Philosophie: let me profit therein, and farewell all other cogitations. But alas, my mind misgiues me, for your planets beare a contrary aspect vnto me. Woe, woe is me they threaten my destruction: and whom do they threaten this destruction? euen him that loues them; and by what meanes will they destroy, but by louing them? O deare (though killing) eyes, shall death head his darte with the gold of Cupids arrow? Shall death take his aime from the rest of Beauty? O beloued (though hating Philoclea, how if thou beest mercifull, hath cruelty stolne into thee? Or how if thou beest cruell, doth cruelty looke more beautifull then euer mercy did? Or alas, is it my destinie that makes Mercie cruell: like an euill vessell which turnes sweet licour to sowernesse; so when thy grace fals vpon me, my wretched constitution makes it become fiercenesse. Thus would he exercise his eloquence, when she could not heare him, and be dumbe-striken, when her presence gaue him fit occasion of speaking: so that his wit could find out no other refuge, but the comfort and counsell of his mother, desiring her (whose thoughts were vnperplexed) to vse for his sake the most preuailing maners of intercession.

She seeing her sonnes safety depend thereon (though her pride much disdained the name of a desirer) tooke the charge vpon her, not doubting the easie conquest of an vnexpert virgin, who had already with subtiltie and impudencie begun to vndermine a monarchy. Therefore, weighing Philocleas resolutions by the counterpease of her owne youthfull thoughts, which shee then called to mind, shee doubted doubted not at leaſt to make Philoclea receiue the poyſon diſtilled in ſweet liquour, which ſhe with little diſguiſing had drunke vp thirſtily. Therefore ſhe went ſoftly to Philocleas chamber, and peeping through the ſide of the doore, then being a little open, ſhe ſaw Philoclea ſitting lowe vpon a cuſhion, in ſuch a giuen-ouer manner, that one would haue thought, ſilence, ſolitarineſſe, and melancholie were come there, vnder the enſigne of miſhap, to conquere delight, & driue him from his naturall ſeate of beautie: her teares came dropping down like raine in Sunſhine, and ſhe not taking heede to wipe the teares, they hong vpon her cheekes, & lips, as vpon cherries which the dropping tree bedeweth. In the dreſſing of her haire & apparell, ſhe might ſee neither a carefull art, nor an arte of careleſneſſe, but euen left to a neglected chaunce, which yet could no more vnperfect her perfections, then a Die any way caſt, could looſe his ſquareneſſe.

Cecropia (ſtirred with no other pitie, but for her ſonne) came in, and haling kindneſſe into her countenance, What ayles this ſweet Ladie, (ſaid ſhe) will you marre ſo good eyes with weeping? ſhall teares take away the beautie of that complexion, which the women of Arcadia wiſh for, and the men long after? Fie of this peeuiſh ſadneſſe; in ſooth it is vntimely for your age. Looke vpon your owne bodie, and ſee whether it deſerue to pine away with ſorrow: ſee whether you will haue theſe hands (with that ſhee tooke one of her hands and kiſſing it, looked vpon it as if ſhe were enamoured with it) fade from their whiteneſſe, which makes one deſire to touch them; and their ſoftneſſe, which reboundes againe a deſire to looke on them, and become drie, leane and yellow, and make euerie bodie wonder at the change, and ſay, that ſure you had vſed ſome arte before, which now you had left? for if the beauties had beene naturall, they would neuer ſo ſoone haue beene blemiſhed. Take a glaſſe, and ſee whether theſe teares become your eyes: although I muſt confeſſe, thoſe eyes are able to make teares comely. Alas Madame (anſwered Philoclea) I know not whether my teares become mine eyes, but I am ſure mine eyes thus beteared, become my fortune. Your fortune (ſayd Cecropia) if ſhe could ſee to attire her ſelfe, would put on her beſt raiments. For I ſee, and I ſee it with griefe, and (to tell you true) vnkindneſſe: you miſconſter euery thing, that only for your ſake is attempted. You thinke you are offended, and are indeede defended: you eſteeme your ſelfe a priſoner, and are in truth a miſtreſſe: you feare hate, and ſhall find loue. And truely, I had a thing to ſay to you, but it is no matter, ſince I find you are ſo obſtinately melancholy, as that you woo his fellowſhip: I will ſpare my paines, and hold my peace: and ſo ſtaied indeede, thinking Philoclea would haue had a female inquiſitiueneſſe of the matter. But ſhe, who rather wiſhed to vnknow what ſhe knew, then to burthen her hart with more hopeles knowledge, only deſired her to haue pity of her, and if indeede ſhe did meane her no hurt, then to graunt her liberty: for elſe the very griefe and feare, would proue her vnappointed executioners. For that (ſayd Cecropia) beleeue me vpon the faith of a kings daughter, you ſhall be free, ſo ſoone as your freedome may be free of mortall danger, being brought hither for no other cauſe, but to preuent ſuch miſchiefes as you know not of. But if you thinke indeed to winne me to haue care of you, euen as of mine owne daughter, then lend your eares vnto me, and let not your mind arme it ſelfe with a wilfulneſſe to be flexible to nothing. But if I ſpeake reaſon, let Reaſon haue his due reward, perſwaſion. Then ſweete neece (ſayd ſhe) I pray you preſuppoſe, that now, euen in the midſt of your agonies, which you paint vnto your ſelfe moſt horrible, wiſhing with ſighes, and praying with vowes, for a ſoone and ſafe deliuerie. Imagine neece (I ſay) that ſome heauenly ſpirit ſhould appeare vnto you, and bid you follow him through the doore, that goes into the garden, aſſuring you, that you ſhould thereby returne to your deare mother, and what other delights ſoeuer your mind eſteemes delights: would you (ſweet neece) would you refuſe to follow him, and ſay, that if he led you not through the chiefe gate, you would not enioy your ouer-deſired liberty? Would you not drinke the wine you thirſt for, without it were in ſuch a glaſſe, as you eſpecially fancied? tell me (deare neece) but I will anſwere for you, becauſe I know your reaſon & wit is ſuch, as muſt needs cõclude, that ſuch niceneſſe can no more be in you, to diſgrace ſuch a mind, then diſgracefulneſſe can haue any place in ſo faultleſſe a beauty. Your wiſdom would aſſuredly determin, how the mark were hit, not whether the bow were of Ewe or no, wherein you ſhot. If this be ſo, and thus ſure (my deare neece) it is, then (I pray you) imagine, that I am that ſame good Angel, who grieuing in your griefe, and in truth not able to ſuffer, that bitter ſighs ſhould be ſent forth with ſo ſweete a breath, am come to leade you, not only to your deſired, and imagined happineſſe, but to a true & eſſentiall happineſſe; not only to liberty, but to liberty with commandement. The way I will ſhew you (which if it be not the gate builded hitherto in your priuate choiſe, yet ſhall it be a doore to bring you through a garden of pleaſures, as ſweet as this life can bring foorth; nay rather, which makes this life to be a life: (My ſonne) let it be no blemiſh to him that I name him my ſon, who was your fathers own nephew: for you know I am no ſmall kings daughter) my ſonne (I ſay) farre paſſing the neerneſſe of his kinred, with neerneſſe of good-will, and ſtriuing to match your matchleſſe beauty with a matchleſſe affection, doth by me preſent vnto you the full enioying of your liberty, ſo as with this gift you will accept a greater, which is, this caſtell, with all the reſt which you know he hath, in honourable quantitie; and will cõfirme his gift, and your receipt of both, with accepting him to be yours. I might ſay much both for the perſon and the matter; but who will crie out the Sun ſhines? It is ſo manifeſt a profit vnto you, as the meaneſt iudgement muſt ſtraight apprehend it: ſo farre is it from the ſharpneſſe of yours, thereof to be ignorant. Therefore (ſweete neece) let your gratefulneſſe be my interceſſion, and your gentleneſſe my eloquence, and let me cary comfort to a hart which greatly needes it. Philoclea looked vpon her, and caſt downe her eye againe. Aunt (ſayd ſhe) I would I could be ſo much a miſtreſſe of my owne mind, as to yeeld to my couſins vertuous requeſt: for ſo I conſtrue of it. But my hart is already ſet (and ſtaying a while on that word, ſhe brought foorth afterwards) to leade a virgins life to my death: for ſuch a vow I haue in my ſelfe deuoutly made. The heauens preuent ſuch a miſchiefe (ſayd Cecropia.) A vow, quoth you? no, no, my deare neece, Nature, when you were firſt borne, vowed you a woman, and as ſhe made you child of a mother, ſo to do your beſt to be mother of a child: ſhe gaue you beautie to moue loue; ſhe gaue you wit to know loue; ſhe gaue you an excellent body to reward loue: which kind of liberall rewarding is crowned with an vnſpeakable felicitie. For this, as it bindeth the receiuer, ſo it makes happy the beſtower: this doth not impoueriſh, but enrich the giuer. O the ſweet name of a mother: O the comfort of comforts, to ſee your children grow vp, in whom you are (as it were) eternized: if you could conceiue what a hart-tickling ioy it is to ſee your owne little ones, with awfull loue come running to your lap, & like little models of your ſelfe, ſtill cary you about them, you wold thinke vnkindneſſe in your owne thoughts, that euer they did rebel againſt the mean vnto it. But perchance I ſet this bleſſednes before your eyes, as Captaines do victorie before their ſouldiers, to which they muſt come through many paines, grieues & dangers. No, I am cõtent you ſhrinke frõ this my counſell, if the way to come vnto it, be not moſt of all pleaſant. I know not (anſwered the ſweet Philoclea, fearing leaſt ſilence would offend for ſullenneſſe) what contentment you ſpeake of: but I am ſure the beſt you can make of it (which is mariage) is a burdenous yoke. Ah, deare neece (ſayd Cecropia) how much you are deceiued? A yoke indeed we all beare, layd vpõ vs in our creation, which by mariage is not increaſed but thus far eaſed, that you haue a yokefellow to help to draw through the cloddy cumbers of this world. O widow-nights, beare witneſſe with me of the difference. How often alas do I embrace the orphan-ſide of my bed, which was wont to be imprinted by the body of my deare husband, and with teares acknowledge, that I now enioy ſuch a liberty as the baniſhed mã hath; who may, if he liſt, wãder ouer the world, but is for euer reſtrained frõ his moſt delightful home? that I haue now ſuch a liberty as the ſeeled doue hath, which being firſt depriued of eyes, is then by the falconer caſt off? For beleeue me, neece, beleeue me, mãs experiẽce is womãs beſt eye-ſight. Haue you euer ſeene a pure Roſewater kept in a chriſtal glaſſe? how fine it looks? how ſweet it ſmels, while that beautifull glaſſe impriſons it? Breake the priſon, and let the water take his owne courſe, doth it not imbrace duſt, and looſe all his former ſweetneſſe, & faireneſſe? Truly ſo are we, if we haue not the ſtay, rather then the reſtraint of Chriſtalline mariage. My hart melts to thinke of the ſweet comforts, I in that happy time receiued, when I had neuer cauſe to care, but the care was doubled: when I neuer reioyced, but that I ſaw my ioy ſhine in anothers eyes. What ſhal I ſay of the free delight, which the hart might imbrace, without the accuſing of the inward conſcience, or feare of outward ſhame? and is a ſolitary life as good as this? then can one ſtring make as good muſicke as a conſort: then can one colour ſet foorth a beautie. But it may be, the generall conſideration of mariage doth not ſo much miſlike you, as the applying of it to him. He is my ſon, I muſt confeſſe, I ſee him with a mothers eyes, which if they doo not much deceiue me, he is no ſuch one, ouer whom Contempt may make any iuſt chalenge. He is comely, he is noble, he is rich; but that which in it ſelfe ſhould carie all comelineſſe, nobilitie, and riches, he loues you; and he loues you, who is beloued of others. Driue not away his affection (ſweete Lady) and make no other Lady hereafter proudly bragge, that ſhe hath robbed you of ſo faithfull & notable a ſeruant. Philoclea heard ſome peeces of her ſpeeches, no otherwiſe then one doth when a tedious pratler combers the hearing of a delightfull muſicke. For her thoughts had left her eares in that captiuity, and conueyed themſelues to behold (with ſuch eyes as imagination could lend them) the eſtate of her Zelmane: for whom how well ſhe thought many of thoſe ſayings might haue bin vſed with a far more gratefull acceptation. Therfore liſting not to diſpute in a matter whereof her ſelfe was reſolued, & deſired not to enforme the other, ſhe only told her, that whileſt ſhe was ſo captiued, ſhe could not conceiue of any ſuch perſwaſions (though neuer ſo reaſonable) any otherwiſe, then as conſtraints: and as conſtraints muſt needs euen in nature abhor them, which at her liberty, in their own force of reaſon, might more preuaile with her: and ſo faine wold haue returned the ſtrength of Cecropias perſwaſions, to haue procured freedome.

But neither her wittie words in an enemie, nor thoſe words, made more then eloquent with paſſions through ſuch lippes, could preuaile in Cecropia, no more then her perſwaſions could winne Philoclea to diſauowe her former vow, or to leaue the priſoner Zelmane, for the commaunding Amphialus. So that both ſides being deſirous, and neither graunters, they brake off conference. Cecropia ſucking vp more and more ſpite out of her deniall, which yet for her ſonnes ſake, ſhe diſguiſed with a viſard of kindneſſe, leauing no office vnperfourmed, which might either witneſſe, or endeare her ſonnes affection. Whatſoeuer could be imagined likely to pleaſe her, was with liberall diligence perfourmed: Muſickes at her window, and eſpecially ſuch Muſickes, as might (with dolefull embaſſage) call the mind to thinke of ſorrow, and thinke of it with ſweetneſſe; with ditties ſo ſenſibly expreſſing Amphialus caſe, that euery word ſeemed to be but a diuerſifying of the name of Amphialus. Daily preſents, as it were oblations, to pacifie an angrie Deitie, ſent vnto her: wherein, if the workmanſhip of the forme, had ſtriuen with the ſumptuouſneſſe of the matter, as much did the inuention in the application, contend to haue the chiefe excellencie: for they were as ſo many ſtories of his diſgraces, and her perfections; where the richneſſe did inuite the eyes, the faſhion did entertaine the eyes, and the deuice did teach the eyes, the preſent miſerie of the preſenter himſelfe awfully ſeruiceable: which was the more notable, as his authority was manifeſt. And for the bondage wherein ſhe liued, all meanes vſed to make knowne, that if it were a bondage, it was a bondage onely knit in loue-knots: but in hart alreadie vnderſtanding no language but one. The Muſicke wrought indeede a doleſulneſſe, but it was a doleſulneſſe to be in his power: the dittie intended for Amphialus, ſhe tranſlated to Zelmane: the preſents ſeemed ſo many tedious clogs of a thralled obligation: and his ſeruice, the more diligent it was, the more it did exprobrate (as ſhe thought) vnto her, her vnworthie eſtate: that euen he that did her ſeruice, had authoritie of commanding her, onely conſtruing her ſeruitude in his owne nature, eſteeming it a right, and a right better ſeruitude: ſo that all their ſhots (how well ſoeuer leuelled) being carried awrie from the marke, by the ſtorme of her miſlike, the Prince Amphialus affectionately languiſhed, and Cecropia ſpitefully cunning, diſdained at the barrenneſſe of their ſucceſſe.

Which willingly Cecropia would haue reuenged, but that ſhe ſaw, her hurt could not be deuided from her ſonnes miſchiefe: wherefore, ſhe bethought her ſelfe to attempt Pamela, whoſe beautie being equall, ſhe hoped, if ſhe might be won, that her ſons thoughts would rather reſt on a beautifull gratefulneſſe, then ſtill be tormented with a diſdaining beauty. Therefore, giuing new courage to her wicked inuentions, and vſing the more induſtry, becauſe ſhe had miſt in this, and taking euen precepts of preuailing in Pamela, by her fayling in Philoclea, ſhe went to her chamber, and (according to her owne vngracious method of ſubtile proceeding) ſtood liſtning at the dore, becauſe that out of the circumſtance of her preſent behauiour, there might kindly ariſe a fit beginning of her intended diſcourſe.

And ſo ſhe might perceiue that Pamela did walke vp & downe, full of deep (though patient) thoughts. For her looke & countenance was ſetled, her pace ſoft and almoſt ſtill of one meaſure, without any paſſionate geſture, or violent motion: till at length (as it were) awaking, & ſtrengthning her ſelfe, Well (ſayd ſhe) yet this is the beſt, and of this I am ſure, that howſoeuer they wrong me, they cannot ouer-maiſter God. No darknes blinds his eyes, no gayle bars him out. To whom then elſe ſhold I flie, but to him for ſuccor? And therwith kneeling down, euen where ſhe ſtood, ſhe thus ſaid: O al-ſeeing Light, & eternall Life of all things, to whom nothing is either ſo great, that it may reſiſt; or ſo ſmall, that it is contemned: looke vpon my miſery with thine eye of mercy, and let thine infinite power vouchſafe to limite out ſome proportion of deliuerance vnto me, as to thee ſhall ſeeme moſt conuenient. Let not iniurie, ô Lord, triumph ouer me, and let my faults by thy hand bee corrected, and make not mine vniuſt enemy the miniſter of thy Iuſtice. But yet, my God, if in thy wiſdome, this be the apteſt chaſtiſement for my vnexcuſable folly; if this low bondage bee fitteſt for my ouer-high deſires; if the pride of my not-inough humble hart, be thus to be broken, ô Lord, I yeeld vnto thy will, and ioyfully embrace what ſorrow thou wilt haue me ſuffer. Onely thus much let me craue of thee (let my crauing, ô Lord, be accepted of thee, ſince euen that proceedes from thee) let me craue, euen by the nobleſt title, which in my greateſt affliction I may giue my ſelfe, that I am thy creature, and by thy goodneſſe (which is thy ſelfe) that thou wilt ſuffer ſome beame of thy Maieſty ſo to ſhine into my mind, that it may ſtil depend cõfidently vpon thee. Let calamity be the exerciſe, but not the ouerthrow of my vertue: let their power preuaile, but preuaile not to deſtructiõ: let my greatnes be their pray: let my pain be the ſweetnes of their reuenge: let them (if ſo it ſeeme good vnto thee) vex me with more and more puniſhment. But, ô Lord, let neuer their wickedneſſe haue ſuch a hand, but that I may cary a pure mind in a pure body. (And pauſing a while) And ô moſt gracious Lord (ſayd ſhe) what euer become of me, preſerue the vertuous Muſidorus.

The other part Cecropia might well heare, but this latter prayer for Muſidorus, her hart held it, as ſo iewel-like a treaſure, that it would ſcarce truſt her owne lippes withall. But this prayer, ſent to heauen, from ſo heauenly a creature, with ſuch a feruent grace, as if Deuotion had borowed her body, to make of it ſelfe a moſt beautifull repreſentation; with her eyes ſo lifted to the skie-ward, that one would haue thought they had begun to flie thitherward, to take their place among their fellow ſtarres; her naked hands raiſing vp their whole length, and as it were kiſſing one another, as if the right had bene the picture of Zeale, and the left, of Humbleneſſe, which both vnited themſelues to make their ſuites more acceptable. Laſtly, all her ſenſes being rather tokens then inſtruments of her inward motions, altogether had ſo ſtrange a working power, that euen the hard-harted wickedneſſe of Cecropia, if it found not a loue of that goodneſſe, yet it felt an abathment at that goodneſſe, and if ſhe had not a kindly remorſe, yet had ſhe an yrkſome accuſation of her owne naughtineſſe, ſo that ſhe was put from the bias of her fore-intended leſſon. For well ſhe found there was no way at that time to take that mind, but with ſome, at leaſt, image of Vertue, and what the figure thereof was, her hart knew not.

Yet did ſhe prodigally ſpend her vttermoſt eloquence, leauing no argument vnproued, which might with any force inuade her excellent iudgement: the iuſtnes of the requeſt being, but for marriage; the worthineſſe of the ſuiter: then her owne preſent fortune, which ſhould not only haue amendment, but felicity: beſides falſely making her beleeue, that her ſiſter would thinke her ſelfe happy, if now ſhe might haue his loue which before ſhe contemned: and obliquely touching, what daunger it ſhould be for her, if her ſonne ſhould accept Philoclea in marriage, and ſo match the next heire apparant, ſhe being in his power: yet plentifully periuring how extreamely her ſonne loued her, and excuſing the little ſhewes he made of it, with the duetifull reſpect he bare vnto her, and taking vpon her ſelfe that ſhe reſtrained him, ſince ſhe found ſhe could ſet no limits to his paſſions. And as ſhe did to Philoclea, ſo did ſhe to her, with the tribute of gifts, ſeeke to bring her mind into ſeruitude: and all other meanes, that might either eſtabliſh a beholdingnes, or at leaſt awake a kindneſſe; doing it ſo, asby reaſon of their impriſonment, one ſiſter knew not how the other was wooed, but each might thinke, that only ſhe was ſought. But if Philoclea with ſweete and humble dealing did auoide their aſſaults, ſhe with the Maieſty of Vertue did beate them off.

But this day their ſpeech was the ſooner broken of, by reaſon that he, who ſtood as watch vpō the top of the keep, did not only ſee a great duſt ariſe (which the earth ſent vp, as if it would ſtriue to haue clowdes as wel as the aire) but might ſpie ſometimes, eſpecially, when the duſt (wherin the naked wind did apparell it ſelf) was caried a ſide from them, the ſhining of armour; like flaſhing of lightning, wherewith the clowdes did ſeeme to be with child; which the Sun guilding with his beames, it gaue a ſight delightfull to any, but to them that were to abide the terrour. But the watch gaue a quicke Alarum to the ſoldiers within, whō practiſe already hauing prepared, began each, with vnabaſhed harts or at leaſt countenances, to looke to their charge, or obedience, which was allotted vnto them.

Only Clinias and Amphialus did exceede the bounds of mediocrity: the one in his naturall coldneſſe of cowardiſe, the other in heate of courage. For Clinias (who was bold only in buſie whiſperings, and euen in that whiſperingneſſe rather indeede confident in his cunning, that it ſhould not bee bewraied, then any way bold, if euer it ſhould bee bewrayed) now that the enemy gaue a dreadfull aſpect vnto the caſtle, his eyes ſaw no terror, nor eare heard any martiall ſound, but that they multiplied the hideouſneſſe of it to his mated mind. Before their comming he had many times felt a dreadfull expectation, but yet his mind (that was willing to eaſe it ſelfe of the burden of feare) did ſomtime faine vnto it ſelfe poſſibility of let; as the death of Baſilius, the diſcord of the nobility, and (when other cauſe fayled him) the nature of chaunce ſerued as a cauſe vnto him: and ſometimes the hearing other men ſpeake valiantly, and the quietneſſe of his vnaſſailed ſenſes, would make himſelfe beleeue, that he durſt doo ſomething. But now, that preſent daunger did diſplay it ſelfe vnto his eye, and that a daungerous dooing muſt be the onely meane to preuent the danger of ſuffering, one that had marked him would haue iudged, that his eyes would haue run into him, and his ſoule out of him; ſo vnkindly did either take a ſent of danger. He thought the lake was too ſhallow, and the walles too thin: he miſdoubted each mans treaſon, and conie&tured euery poſſibility of misfortune, not only fore-caſting likely perils, but ſuch as all the planets together could ſcarcely haue conſpired: and already began to arme himſelfe, though it was determined he ſhold tary within dores; and while he armed himſelf, imagined in what part of the vault he would hide himſelfe, if the enemies wonne the caſtle. Deſirous he was, that euery body ſhould do valiantly, but himſelfe; and therefore was afraid to ſhew his feare, but for very feare would haue hid his feare; leaſt it ſhould diſcomfort others: but the more he ſought to diſguiſe it, the more the vnſutablneſſe of a weake broken voice to high braue words, and of a pale ſhaking countenance to a geſture of animating did diſcouer him.

But quite contrarily Amphialus, who before the enimies came, was careful, prouidently diligent, & not ſomtimes with out doubting of the iſſue; now the nearer danger approched (like the light of a glow-worme) the leſſe ſtill it ſeemed: and now his courage began to boile in choler, and with ſuch impatience to deſire to powre out both vpon the enemy, that he iſſued preſently into certaine boates he had of purpoſe and caryng with him ſome choiſe men, went to the fortreſſe he had vpon the edge of the lake, which hee thought would be the firſt thing, that the enemy would attempt, becauſe it was a paſſage, which commanding all that ſide of the country, and being loſt would ſtop victuall, or other ſupply, that might be brought into the caſtle, & in that fortreſſe hauing ſome force of horſemen, he iſſued out with two hundred horſe, & fiue hundred footmen, embuſhed his footmen in the falling of a hill, which was ouer ſhadowed with a wood, he with his horſmen went a quarter of a mile further; aſide hand of which he might perceiue the many troupes of the enemy, who came but to take view where beſt to encampe themſelues.

was

But as if the ſight of the enemy had bene a Magnes ſtone to his courage, he could not containe himſelfe, but ſhewing his face to the enemy, and his backe to his ſouldiers, vſed that action, as his onely oration, both of denouncing warre to the one, and perſwading helpe of the other. Who faithfully following an example of ſuch authority, they made the earth to grone vnder their furious burden, and the enemies to begin to be angry with them, whom in particular they knew not. Among whom there was a young man, youngeſt brother to Philanax, whoſe face as yet did not bewray his ſex, with ſo much as ſhew of haire; of a mind hauing no limits of hope, not knowing why to feare; full of iollity in conuerſation, and lately growne a Louer. His name was Agenor, of all that army the moſt beautifull: who hauing ridden in ſportfull conuerſation among the foremoſt, all armed ſauing that his beauer was vp, to haue his breath in more freedome, ſeeing Amphialus come a pretty way before his cõpany, neither ſtaying the commandement of the Captaine, nor recking whether his face were armed, or no, ſet ſpurs to his horſe, and with youthfull brauery caſting his ſtaffe about his head, put it then in his reſt, as carefull of comely carying it, as if the marke had beene but a Ring, and the lookers on Ladies. But Amphialus launce was already come to the laſt of his deſcending line, and began to make the ful point of death againſt the head of this young Gentleman, when Amphialus perceiuing his youth and beauty, Compaſſion ſo rebated the edge of Choller, that hee ſpared that faire nakedneſſe, and let his ſtaffe fall to Agenors vampalt: ſo as both with braue breaking ſhould hurtleſſie haue performed that match, but that the pittileſſe launce of Amphialus (angry with being broken) with an vnlucky counterbuffe full of vnſparing ſplinters, lighted vpon that face farre fitter for the combats of Venus; giuing not onely a ſudden, but a fowle death, leauing ſcarcely any tokens of his former beauty: but his hands abandoning the reynes, and his thighes the ſaddle, hee fell ſideward from the horſe. Which ſight comming to Leontius, a deare friend of his, who in vaine had lamentably cried vnto him to ſtay, when he ſaw him begin his careere, it was hard to ſay, whether pitty of the one, or reuenge againſt the other, held as then the ſoueraigntie in his paſſions. But while he directed his eye to his friend, and his hinde to his enemy, ſo wronglie-conſorted a power could not reſiſt the ready minded force of Amphialus: who perceiuing his il-directed direction againſt him, ſo payd him his debt before it was lent, that he alſo fell to the earth, onely happy that one place, and one time, did finiſh both their loues and liues together.

But by this time there had bene a furious meeting of either ſide: where after the terrible ſalutation of warlike noyſe, the ſhaking of hands was with ſharpe weapon: ſome launces according to the mettall they met, and skill of the guider, did ſtaine themſelues in bloud; ſome flew vp in peeces, as if they would threaten heauen, becauſe they fayled on earth. But their office was quickly inherited, either by (the Prince of weapons) the ſword, or by ſome heauy maſe, or biting axe; which hunting ſtil the weakeſt chaſe, ſought euer to light there, where ſmalleſt reſiſtãce might worſe preuent miſchiefe. The claſhing of armour, and cruſhing of ſtaues; the iuſtling of bodies, the reſounding of blowes, was the firſt part of that ill agreeing muſicke, which was beautified with the griſlineſſe of wounds, the riſing of duſt; the hideous falles and grones of the dying. The very horſes angrie in their maiſters anger, with loue and obedience brought foorth the effects of hate and reſiſtance, and with minds of ſeruitude, did as if they affected glory. Some lay dead vnder their dead maiſters, whom vnknightly wounds had vniuſtly puniſhed for a faithfull duty. Some lay vpon their Lords by like accidents, and in death, had the honour to be borne by them, whom in life they had borne. Some hauing loſt their commanding burthens, ranne ſcattered about the field, abaſhed with the madneſſe of mankind. The earth it ſelfe (wont to be a buriall of men) was now (as it were) buried with men: ſo was the face thereof hidden with dead bodies, to whom Death had come masked in diuerſe manners. In one place lay diſinherited heades, diſpoſſeſſed of their naturall ſeignories: in another, whole bodies to ſee to, but that their harts wont to be bound all ouer ſo cloſe, were now with deadly violence opened: in others, fowler deaths had ouglily diſplayed their trayling guts. There lay armes, whoſe fingers yet moued, as if they would feele for him that made them feele: and legges, which contrary to common reaſon, by being diſcharged of their burden, were growne heauier. But no ſword payed ſo large a tribute of ſoules to the eternall Kingdome, as that of Amphialus, who like a Tigre, from whom a company of Woolues did ſeeke to rauiſh a new gotten pray; ſo he (remembring they came to take away Philoclea) did labour to make valure, ſtrength, choller and hatred, to anſwer the proportion of his loue, which was infinite.

There died of his hands the old knight Æſchylus, who though by yeares might well haue bene allowed to vſe rather the exerciſes of wiſedome, then of courage; yet hauing a luſty body and a merry hart, he euer tooke the ſummons of Time in ieſt, or elſe it had ſo creepingly ſtolen vpon him, that he had heard ſcarcely the noiſe of his feete, and therefore was as freſh in apparell, and as forward in enterpriſes, as a farre yonger man: but nothing made him bolder, then a certaine prophecie had beene told him, that he ſhould die in the armes of his ſonne, and therefore feared the leſſe the arme of an enemy. But now when Amphialus ſword was paſſed through his throate, he thought himſelfe abuſed; but that before he died, his ſonne, indeede ſeeing his father begin to fall, held him vp in his armes, till a pitileſſe ſouldier of the other ſide, with a mace brained him, making father and ſon become twinnes in the neuer againe dying birth. As for Drialus, Memnon, Niſus and Policrates; the firſt hsd his eyes cut out ſo, as he could not ſee to bid the neare following death welcome: the ſecond had met with the ſame Prophet that old Æſchylus had, and hauing found many of his ſpeeches true, beleeued this to, that hee ſhould neuer bee killed, but by his owne companions: and therefore no man was more valiant then he againſt an enemy, no man more ſuſpicious of his friends: ſo as he ſeemed to ſleep in ſecurity, when he went to a battell, and to enter into a battell, when he began to ſleepe, ſuch gards hee would ſet about his perſon; yet miſtruſting thoſe verie gards leaſt they would murther him. But now Amphialus helped to vnriddle his doubts; for he ouerthrowing him from his horſe, his owne companions comming with a freſh ſupply, preſſed him to death. Niſus graſping with Amphialus, was with a ſhort dagger ſlaine. And for Policrates, while he ſhunned as much as he could, keeping only his place for feare of puniſhment, Amphialus with a memorable blow ſtrake off his head, where, with the conuulſions of death ſetting his ſpurres to his horſe, he gaue ſo braue a charge vpon the enemy, as it grew a prouerbe, that Policrates was onely valiant after his head was off. But no man eſcaped ſo well his hands as Phebilus did: for he hauing long loued Philoclea, though for the meanneſſe of his eſtate he neuer durſt reueale it, now knowing Amphialus, ſetting the edge of a riuall vpon the ſword of an enemy, he held ſtrong fight with him. But Amphialus had already in the daungerouſeſt places diſarmed him, and was lifting vp his ſword to ſend him away from himſelfe, when he thinking indeede to die, ô Philoclea (ſayd he) yet this ioyes mee, that I die for thy ſake. The name of Philoclea firſt ſtaied his ſword, and when he heard him out, though he abhord him much worſe then before, yet could he not vouchſafe him the honour of dying for Philoclea, but turned his ſword another way, doing him no hurt for ouer-much hatred. But what good did that to poore Phebilus, if eſcaping valiant hand, he was ſlaine by baſe ſouldier, who ſeeing him ſo diſarmed, thruſt him through?

But thus with the well-followed valure of Amphialus were the other almoſt ouerthrowne, when Philanax (who was the marſhall of the army) came in, with new force renuing the almoſt decayed courage of his ſouldiers. For crying to them (and asking them whether their backes or their armes were better fighters) he himſelfe thruſt into the preſſe, and making force and furie waite vpon diſcretion and gouernement, he might ſeeme a braue Lion, who taught his yong Lionets, how in taking of a pray, to ioyne courage with cunning. Then Fortune (as if ſhe had made chaſes inow of the one ſide of that bloudy Teniſcourt) went of the other ſide the line, making as many fall downe of Amphialus followers, as before had done of Philanaxis, they looſing the ground, as faſt as before they had won it, onely leauing them to keepe it, who had loſt themſelues in keeping it. Then thoſe that had killed, inherited the lot of thoſe that had beene killed; and cruell deaths made them lie quietly together, who moſt in their liues had ſought to diſquiet each other; and many of thoſe firſt ouerthrowne, had the comfort to ſee the murtherers ouerrun them to Charons ferrie.

Codrus, Cteſiphon, and Milo, loſt their liues vpon Philanax his ſword: but no bodies caſe was more pitied, then of a young eſquire of Amphialus, called Iſmenus, who neuer abandoning his maiſter, and making his tender age aſpire to actes of the ſtrongeſt manhood, in this time that his ſide was put to the worſt, and that Amphialus his valure was the onely ſtay of them from deliuering themſelues ouer to a ſhamefull flight, hee ſawe his maiſters horſe killed vnder him. Whereupon, asking no aduiſe of no thought, but of faithfulneſſe and courage, hee preſently lighted from his owne horſe, and with the helpe of ſome choiſe and faithfull ſeruants, gat his maiſter vp. But in the multitude that came of either ſide, ſome to ſuccour, ſome to ſaue Amphialus, hee came vnder the hand of Philanax: and the youth perceiuing hee was the man that did moſt hurt to his partie (deſirous euen to change his life for glorie) ſtrake at him, as hee rode by him, and gaue him a hurt vpon the leg, that made Philanax turne towards him; but ſeeing him ſo young, and of a moſt louelie preſence, he rather tooke pitty of him; meaning to take him priſoner, and then to giue him to his brother Agenor to bee his companion, becauſe they were not much vnlike, neither in yeares, nor countenance. But as hee looked downe vpon him with that thought, he ſpied where his brother lay dead, and his friend Leontius by him, euen almoſt vnder the ſquiers feete. Then ſorrowing not onely his owne ſorrow, but the paſt-comfort ſorrow which he fore-knew his mother would take (who with many teares, and miſgiuing ſighs had ſuffred him to go with his elder brother Philanax) blotted out all figures of pitty out of his mind, and putting forth his horſe (while Iſmenus doubled two or three more valiant, then well ſet blowes) ſaying to himſelfe. Let other mothers bewaile & vntimely death as well a s mine: he thruſt him through. And the boy fierce, though beautifull;and beautifull,though dying, not able to keepe his failing feete, fell downe to the earth,which he bit for anger,repining at his fortune, and as long as he could resisting death,which might seeme vnwilling to;so long he was in taking away his yong struggling soule.

Philanax him selfe could haue wished the blow vngiuen,when he saw him fal like a faire apple,which some vncurteous body(breaking his bow)should throw downe before it were ripe. But the case of his brother made him forget both that, & himselfe: so as ouerhastily pressing vpon the retiring enemies,he was(ere he was aware) further engaged then his owne souldiers could relieue him; where being ouerthrowne by Amphialus,Amphialus glad of him,kept head against his enemies while some of his men caried away Philanax.

But Philanax-his men as if with the losse of Philanax they had lost the fountaine of their valure,had their courages so dried vp in feare;that they began to set honour at their backs, and to vse the vertue of patience in an vntimely time: when into the presse comes (as hard as his horse, more affraide of the spurre, then the sworde could cary him) a Knight in armour as darke as blackenesse could make it, followed by none,and adorned by nothing; so farre without authority that hee was without knowledge. But vertue quickly made him knowne, and admiration bred him such authority, that though they of whose side he came knew him not, yet they all knew it was fit to obey him:and while he was followed by the valianteſt,hee made way for the vilest. For, taking part with the besiegers, he made the Amphialians bloud serue for a caparison to his horse, and a decking to his armour. His arme no oftner gaue blowes, then the blowes gaue wounds, then the wounds gaue deathes: so terrible was his force,and yet was his quickenesse more forcible then his force,and his iudgement more quicke then his quickenesse. For though his sworde went faster then eye-sight could follow it, yet his owne iudgement went still before it. There dyed of his hand, Sarpedon, Plistonax, Strophilus, and Hippolitus, men of great proofe in warres, and who had that day vndertaken the gard of Amphialus. But while they sought to saue him, they lost the fortresses that Nature had placed them in. Then slew he Megalus,who was a litle before proude,to see himself stained in the bloud of his enemies: but when his owne bloud came to be married to theirs, he then felt, that cruelty doth neuer enioy a goodcheape glory. After him sent he Palemon who had that day vowed(with fooliſh brauery)to be the death of ten: and nine already he hadkilled,and was careful to performe his(almost performed)vow,when the blacke knight helpt him to make vp the tenth himselfe.

And now the often-changing Fortune beganne also to chaunge the hew of the battels. For at the first, though it were terrible, yet Terror was deckt so brauelie with rich furniture, guilt swords, shining armours, pleasant pensils, that the eye with delight had scarce leasure to be affraide: But now all vniuersally defiled with dust, bloud, broken armour, mangled bodies, tooke away the maske, and sette foorth Horror in his owne horrible manner. But neither could daunger be dreadfull to Amphialus his vndismayable courage, nor yet seeme ougly to him, whose truely-affected minde, did still paint it ouer with the beauty of Philoclea. And therefore hee, rather enflamed then troubled with the increase of daungers, and glad to find a worthy subiect to exercise his courage, sought out this new knight, whom he might easily find: for he, like a wanton rich man, that throwes downe his neighbours houses, to make himselfe the better prospect, so had his sworde made him so spacious a roome, that Amphialus had more cause to wonder at the finding, then labour for the seeking: which, if it stirred hate in him, to see how much harme he did to the one side, it prouoked as much emulation in him, to perceiue how much good he did to the other side. Therefore, they approaching one to the other, as in two beautifull folkes, Loue naturally stirres a desire of ioyning, so in their two courages Hate stirred a desire of triall. Then began there a combat betweene them, worthy to haue had more large listes, and more quiet beholders: for with the spurre of Courage, and the bitte of Respect, each so guided himselfe, that one might well see, the desire to ouercome, made them not forget how to ouercome: in such time and proportion they did employ their blowes, that none of Ceres seruants could more cunningly place his flaile: while the left foote spurre set forward his owne horse, the right set backeward the contrary horse, euen sometimes by the aduantage of the enemies legge, while the left hand (like him that held the sterne) guided the horses obedient courage: All done in such order, that it might seeme, the mind was a right Prince indeede, who sent wise and diligent Lieutenants into each of those well gouerned partes. But the more they fought, the more they desired to fight; and the more they smarted, the lesse they felte the smarte: and now were like to make a quicke proofe, to whom Fortune or Valour would seeme most friendly, when in comes an olde Gouernour of Amphialus, alwayes a good Knight, and carefull of his charge; who giuing a sore wound to the Blacke Knights thigh, while hee thought not of him, with another blow slewe his horse vnder him. Amphialus cried to him, that hee dishonoured him: You say well (answered the olde Knight) to stand now like a priuate souldier, setting your credit vpon particular fighting, while you may see Basilius with all his hoste, his getting betweene you and your towne. He looked that way, and found that true indeede, that the enemy was beginning to encompasse him about, and stoppe his returne: and therefore causing the retreate to be sounded, his Gouernour ledde his men homeward, while hee kept himselfe still hindmost, as if hee had stood at the gate of a sluse, to let the streame goe, with such proportion, as should seeme good vnto him: and with so manfull discretion perfourmed it, that (though with losse of many of his men) he returned in himselfe safe, and content, that his enemies had felte, how sharpe the sworde could bite of Philoclea's Louer. The other partie being sorie for the losse of Philanax, was yet sorier when the Blacke Knight could not bee found. For he hauing gotten a horse, whom his dying maister had bequeathed to the word, finding himselfe sore hurt, and not desirous to be knowne, had in the time of the enemies retiring, retired away also: his thigh not bleeding bloud so fast, as his heart bledde reuenge. But Basilius hauing attempted in vaine to barre the safe returne of Amphialus, encamped himselfe as strongly as he could, while he (to his griefe) might heare the ioy was made in the towne by his owne subiect, that he had that day sped no better. For Amphialus (being well beloued of that people) when they saw him not vanquished, they esteemed him as victorious, his youth setting a flourishing shew vpon his worthinesse, and his great nobility ennobling his dangers.

But the first thing Amphialus did, being returned, was to visite Philoclea, and first presuming to cause his dreame to be song vnto her (which he had seen the night before he fell in loue with her) making a fine boy he had, accord the pretty dolefulnesse vnto it. The song was this:

NOw was our heau'nly vault depriued of the light
With Sunnes depart: and now the darkenesse of the night
Did light those beamy stars which greater light did darke:
Now each thing that enioy'd that firie quickning sparke
(VVhich life is cald) were mou'd their spirits to repose,
And wanting vse of eyes, their eyes began to close:
A silence sweet each vvhere vvith one consent embraste
(A musique sweete to one in carefull musing plaste)
And mother earth, now clad in mourning vveedes, did breath
A dull desire to kisse the image of our death:
When I, disgraced vvretch, not vvretched then, did giue
My senses such reliefe, as they which quiet liue,
Whose braines broile not in woes, nor breasts with beatings ake,
Which natures praise are wont in safest home to take.
Far from my thoughts vvas ought, vvhereto their minds aspire,
VVho vnder courtly pompes do hatch a base desire.
Free all my powers vvere from those captiuing cares,
VVhich heau'nly purest gifts defile the muddy cares.
Ne could my soule it selfe accuse of such a faulte,
As tender conscience might with furious pangs assault.
But like the feeble flower (vvhose stalke cannot sustaine
His vveighty top) his top downeward doth drooping leane:
Or as the silly bird in vvell acquainted nest
Doth hide his head vvith cares but only hovv to rest:
So I in simple course, and vnentangled mind
Did suffer drowsie lids mine eyes then cleare to blind;
And laying downe my head, did natures rule observe,
Which senses vp doth shut the senses to preserue.
They first their vse forgot, then fancies lost their force;
Till deadly sleepe at length possest my liuing coarse.
A liuing coarse I lay: but ah, my vvakefull mind
(Which made of heau'nly stuffe no mortall change doth blind)
Flevv vp vvith freer vvings of fleshly bondage free;
And hauing plaste my thoughts, my thoughts thus placed me.
Me thought, nay sure I vvas, I vvas in faireſt vvood
Of Samothea land; a land vvhich vvhilom stood,
An honour to the world, vvhile Honour vvas their end,
And vvhile their line of yeares they did in vertue spend.
But there I vvas, and there my calmie thoughts I fed
On Natures sweete repast, as healthfull senses led.
Her gifts my study vvas, her beauties vvere my sport:
My worke her vvorkes to know, her dwelling my resort.
Those lamps of heau'nly fire to fixed motion bound,
The euer-turning spheres, the neuer-mouing ground;
VVhat essence dest'nie hath; if fortune be or no;
Whence our immortall soules to mortall earth do stovv:
What life it is, and hovv that all these liues do gather,
VVithoutward makers force, or like an inward father.

Such

Such thoughts, me thought, I thought, and straind my single mind,
Then void of neerer cares, the depth of things to find;
When lo with hugest noise (such noise a tower makes When it blowne downe with wind a fall of ruine takes) (Or such a noise it was, as highest thunders send,
Or cannons thunder-like, all shot together, lend)
The Moone a sunder rent; whereout with sudden fall
(More swift then falcons stoope to feeding Falconers call)
There came a chariot faire by doues and sparrowes guided,
Whose stormelike course staid not till hard by me it bided.
I wretch astonisht was, and thought the deathfull doome
Of heauen, of earth, of hell, of time and place was come.
But streight there issued forth two Ladies (Ladies sure
They seemd to me) on whom did wait a Virgin pure.
Strange were the Ladies weedes; yet more vnfit then strange.
The first with cloth's tuckt vp as Nymphes in woods do range;
Tuckt vp euen with the knees, with bow and arrowes prest:
Her right arme naked was, discouered was her brest.
But heauy was her pace, and such a meagre cheere,
As litle hunting mind (God knowes) did there appeere.
The other had with art (more then our women know,
As stuffe meant for the sale set out to glaring show)
A wanton womans face, and with curld knots had twin'd
Her haire, which by the helpe of painters cunning, shin'd.
When I such guests did see come out of such a house,
The mountaines great with child I thought brought forth a mouse.
But walking forth, the first thus to the second sayd,
Venus come on: sayd she, Diane you are obayd.
Those names abasht me much, when those great names I heard:
Although their fame (me seemd) from truth had greatly iard.
As I thus musing stood, Diana cald to her
The waiting Nimph, a Nimph that did excell as farre
All things that earst I saw, as orient pearles exceede
That which their mother hight, or else their silly seede.
Indeed a perfect hew, indeed a sweet consent
Of all those Graces gifts the heauens haue euer lent.
And so she was attir'd, as one that did not prize
Too much her peereleſſe parts, nor yet could them despise.
But cald, she came apace; a pace wherein did moue
The band of beauties all, the litle world of Loue.
And bending humbled eyes (oeyes the Sunne of sight)
She waited mistresse will: who thus disclosde her spright,
Sweet Mira mine (quoth she) the pleasure of my mind,
In whom of all my rules the perfect proose I find,
To only thee thou seest we graunt this speciall grace
Vs to attend, in this most priuate time and place.
Be silent therefore now, and so be silent still
Of that thou seest: close vp in secret knot thy will.

She answer'd was with looke, and well perform'd beheſt:
And Mira I admirde: her shape ſonke in my breſt.
But thus with irefull eyes, and face that shooke with ſpite
Diana did begin. VVhat mou'd me to inuite
Your preſence (ſiſter deare) firſt to my Moony ſpheare,
And hither now, vouchſafe to take with willing eare.
I know full well you know, what diſcord long hath raign'd
Betwixt vs two; how much that diſcord foule hath ſtain'd
Both our eſtates, while each the other did deprave,
Proofe ſpeakes too much to vs that feeling triall haue.
Our names are quite forgot, our temples are defac'd:
Our offrings ſpoil'd, our prieſts from prieſthood are diſplac'd.
Is this the fruite of ſtrife? thoſe thouſand Churches hie,
Thoſe thouſand altars faire now in the duſt to lie?
In mortall minds our mindes but planets names preſerue:
No knees once bowed, forſooth, for them they ſay we ſerue.
Are we their ſeruants growne? no doubt a noble ſtaie:
Celeſtiall powers to wormes, Ioues children ſerue to clay.
But ſuch they ſay we be: this praiſe our diſcord bred,
VVhile we for mutuall ſpite, a ſtriuing paſſion fed.
But let vs wiſer be; and what foule diſcord brake,
So much more ſtrong againe let faſteſt concord make.
Our yeares do it require: you ſee we both do feele
The weakning worke of times for euer whirling-wheele.
Although we be diuine, our graundſire Saturne is
With ages force decay'd, yet once the heauen was his.
And now before we ſeeke by wiſe Apollos skill,
Our young yeares to renew (for ſo he ſayth he will)
Let vs a perfect peace betweene vs two reſolue:
Which leaſt the ruinous want of gouernment diſſolue,
Let one the Princeſſe be, to her the other yeeld:
For vaine equality is but Contentions field.
And let her haue the gifts that should in both remaine:
In her let beauty both, and chaſtneſſe fully raigne.
So as if I preuaile, you giue your gifts to me:
If you, on you I lay what in my office be.
Now reſteth only this, which of vs two is she,
To whom precedence shall of both accorded be.
For that (ſo that you like) hereby doth lie a youth
(She beckned vnto me) as yet of ſpotleſſe truth,
Who may this doubt diſcerne: for better, wit, then lot
Becommeth vs: in vs fortune determines not.
This crowne of amber faire (an amber crowne she held)
To worthieſt let him giue, when both he hath beheld:
And be it as he ſayth. Venus was glad to heare
Such proffer made, which she well shewd with ſmiling cheere.
As though she were the ſame, as when by Paris doome
She had chiefe Goddeſſes in beauty ouercome.

And

And smirkly thus gan say, I neuer sought debate
Diana deare; my mind to loue and not to hate
VVas euer apt: but you my pastimes did despise.
I neuer spited you, but thought you ouerwise.
Now kindnesse profred is, none kinder is then I:
And so most ready am this meane of peace to trie.
And let him be our iudge: the lad doth please me well.
Thus both did come to me, and both began to tell
(For both together spake, each loth to be behinde)
That they by solemne oath their Deities would binde,
To stand vnto my will: their will they made me knovv.
I that was first agast, vvhen first I saw their shovv,
Now bolder waxt, waxt proude, that I such sway must beare:
For neare acquaintance doth diminish reuerent feare.
And hauing bound them fast by Styx, they should obay
To all what I decreede, did thus my verdict say.
How ill both you can rule, vvell hath your discord taught:
Ne yet for ought I see, your beauties merit ought.
To yonder Nimph therefore (to Mira I did point)
The crowne aboue you both for euer I appoint.
I would haue spoken out: but out they both did cry;
Fie, fie, what haue we done? vngodly rebell fie.
But now we needes must yeelde, to that our oathes require.
Yet thou shalt not go free (quoth Venus) such a fire.
Her beauty kindle shall within thy foolish minde,
That thou full oft shalt wish thy iudging eyes were blind.
Nay then (Diana sayd) the chastnesse I will giue,
In ashes of despaire (though burnt) shall make thee liue.
Nay thou (sayd both) shalt see such beames shine in her face,
That thou shalt neuer dare seeke helpe of wretched case.
And with that cursed curse away to heauen they fled,
First hauing all their gifts vpon faire Mira spred.
The rest I cannot tell, for therewithall I wak'd,
And found with deadly feare that all my sinewes shak'd.
VVas it a dreame? O dreame, how hast thou wrought in me,
That I things erst vnseene should first in dreaming see?
And thou O traytour Sleepe, made for to be our rest,
How hast thou framde the paine wherewith I am oppresst?
O coward Cupid thus doost thou thy honour keepe,
Vnarmde (alas) vnwarn'd to take a man asleepe?

Laying not onely the conquests, but the heart of the conquerour at her feete.  But shee receiuing him after her wonted sorrowfull (but otherwise vnmoued) manner, it made him thinke, his good successe was but as a pleasant monument of a dolefull buriall: Ioy it selfe seeming bitter vnto him, since it agreed not to her taste.

Therefore, still crauing his mothers helpe to perswade her, hee himselfe sent for Philanax vnto him, whom hee had not onely long hated, but now had his hate greatly encreased by the death of his Squire Ismenus. Besides he had made him as one of the chiefe causes that mooued him to this rebellion, and therefore was enclined (to colour the better his action, and the more to embrewe the handes of his accomplices by making them guiltie of such a trespasse) in some formall sort to cause him to be executed: being also greatly egged thereunto by his mother, and some other, who long had hated Philanax, only becausse he was more worthy, then they to be loued.

But while that deliberation was handled, according rather to the humour then the reason of each speaker, Philoclea comming to knowledge of the hard plight wherein Philanax stood, she desired one of the gentlewomen appointed to waite vpon her, to go in her name, and beseech Amphialus, that if the loue of her had any power of perswasion in his mind, he would lay no further punishment, then imprisonment vpon Philanax. This message was deliuered euen as Philanax was entring to the presence of Amphialus, comming (according to the warning was giuen him) to receiue a iudgement of death. But when he with manfull resolution attended the fruite of such a tyrannicall sentence, thinking it wrong, but no harme to him that should die in so good a cause; Amphialus turned quite the fourme of his pretended speech, and yeelded him humble thankes, that by his meanes he had come to that happines, as to receiue a commandement of his Lady: and therefore he willingly gaue him liberty to returne in safety whither he would, quitting him, not only of all former grudge, but assuring him that he would be willing to do him any friendship and seruice: only desiring thus much of him, that he would let him know the discourse and intent of Basilius his proceeding.

Truely my Lord (answered Philanax) if there were any such knowne to mee, secret in my maisters counsell, as that the reuealing thereof might hinder his good succesſe, I should loath the keeping of my bloud, with the losse of my faith, and would thinke the iust name of a traytor a hard purchase of a few yeares liuing. But since it is so, that my maister hath indeede no way of priuie practise, but meanes openly and forcibly to deale against you, I will not sticke in few words to make your required declaration. Then told he him in what a maze of amazement, both Basilius and Gynecia were, when they mist their children and Zelmane. Sometimes apt to suspect some practise of Zelmane, becausse she was a stranger; somtimes doubting some reliques of the late mutiny, which doubt was rather increased, then any way satisfied, by Miso: who (being found, almost dead for hunger, by certaine countrey people) brought home word, with what cunning they were trayned out, and with what violence they were caried away. But that within a few dayes they came to knowledge where they were, by Amphialus his own letters sent abrode to procure confederates in his attempts. That Basilius his purpose was neuer to leauethe siege of this towne, till he had taken it, and reuenged the iniury done vnto him. That he meant rather to win it by time, and famine, then by force of assault: knowing how valiant men he had to deale withall in the towne: that he had sent order, that supplies of souldiers, pioners, and all things else necessary, should dayly be brought vnto him: so as, my Lord (sayd Philanax) let me now, hauing receiued my life by your grace, let me giue you your life and honour by my counsell; protesting vnto you, that I cannot chuse but loue you, being my maister his nephew; and that I wish you well in all causes but this. You know his nature is as apt to forgiue, as his power is able to conquer. Your fault passed is excusable, in that loue perswaded, and youth was perswaded. Do not vrge the effects of angrie victorie, but rather seeke to obtaine that constantlie by curteſie, which you can neuer aſſuredly enioy by violence. One might eaſily haue ſeene in the cheare of Amphialus, that diſdainefull choller would faine haue made the anſwer for him, but the remembrance of Philoclea ſerued for forcible barriers betweene anger, and angry effects: ſo as he ſayd no more, but that he would not put him to the trouble to giue him any further counſell: but that hee might returne, if he liſted, preſently. Philanax glad to receiue an vncorrupted liberty, humbly accepted his fauourable conuoy out of the towne; and ſo departed, not viſiting the Princeſſes, thinking it might be offenſiue to Amphialus, and no way fruitfull to them who were no way but by force to be reskued.

The poore Ladies indeede, not ſuffered either to meete together, or to haue conference with any other, but ſuch as Cecropia had already framed to ſing all their ſongs to her tune, ſhe herſelfe omitting no day, and catching hold of euery occaſion to moue forward her ſonnes deſire, and remoue their owne reſolutions: vſing the ſame arguments to the one ſiſter, as to the other; determining that whom ſhe could winne firſt, the other ſhould (without her ſonnes knowledge) by poyſon be made away. But though the reaſons were the ſame to both, yet the handling was diuerſe, according as ſhe ſaw their humours to prepare a more or leſſe aptneſſe of apprehenon. This day hauing vſed long ſpeech to Philoclea, amplifying not a litle the great dutifulneſſe her ſonne had ſhewed in deliuering Philanax: of whom ſhe could get no anſwer, but a ſilence ſealed vp in vertue, and ſo ſweetly graced, as that in one inſtant it caried with it both reſiſtance, and humbleneſſe: Cecropia threatning in her ſelfe to run a more rugged race with her, went to her ſiſter Pamela, who that day hauing wearied her ſelfe with reading, and with the height of her hart diſdaining to keepe companie with any of the Gentlewomen appointed to attend her, whom ſhe accounted her iaylors, was working vpon a purſe certaine roſes and lillies, as by the fineneſſe of the worke, one might ſee ſhe had borowed her wits of the ſorow that then owed thē, and lent them wholy to that exerciſe. For the flowers ſhe had wrought, caried ſuch life in thē, that the cunningeſt painter might haue learned of her needle: which with ſo prety a maner made his careers to & fro through the cloth, as if the needle it ſelf wold haue bin loth to haue gone frōward ſuch a miſtreſſe, but that it hoped to return thitherward very quickly againe: the cloth looking with many eyes vpon her, and louingly embracing the wounds ſhe gaue it: the ſheares alſo were at hand to behead the ſilke, that was growne too ſhort. And if at any time ſhe put her mouth to bite it off, it ſemed, that where ſhe had bin long in making of a roſe with her hands, ſhe wold in an inſtant make roſes with her lips; as the lillies ſeemed to haue their whiteneſſe, rather of the hand that made them, thē of the matter wherof they were made; & that they grew thereby the Suns of her eyes, and were refreſhed by the moſt indiſcōfort comfortable ayre, which an vnwares ſigh might beſtow vpon them. But the colours for the ground were ſo well choſen, neither ſullenly darke, nor glaringly lightſome, and ſo well proportioned, as that, though much cunning were in it, yet it was but to ſerue for an ornament of the principal worke; that it was not without maruell to ſee, how a mind which could caſt a careleſſe ſemblant vpon the greateſt conflicts of Fortune, could command it ſelfe to take care for ſo ſmall matters. Neither had ſhee neglected the daintie dreſſing of her ſelfe: but as if it had bin her mariage time to Affliction, ſhe rather ſeemed, to remember her owne worthineſſe then the vnworthineſſe of her husband. For well one might perceiue ſhe had not reiected the counſell of a glaſſe, & that her hands had pleaſed themſelues, in paying the tribute of vndeceiuing skill, to ſo high perfections of nature.

The ſight whereof ſo diuerſe from her ſiſter (who rather ſuffered ſorrow to dreſſe it ſelfe in her beauty, then that ſhe would beſtow any entertainment of ſo vnwelcome a gueſt, made Cecropia take a ſudden aſſuredneſſe of hope, that ſhe ſhould obtaine ſomewhat of Pamela: thinking (according to the ſquaring out of her owne good nature) that beautie, carefully ſet foorth, would ſoone proue a ſigne of an vnrefuſing harborough. Animated wherewith, ſhe ſate downe by Pamela, and taking the purſe, and with affected curioſitie looking vpon the worke, Full happie is he (ſayd ſhe) at leaſt if hee knew his owne happineſſe, to whom a purſe in this maner, and by this hand wrought, is dedicated. In faith he ſhall haue cauſe to account it, not as a purſe for treaſure, but as a treaſure it ſelfe, worthie to bee purſed vp in the purſe of his owne hart. And thinke you ſo indeede (ſayd Pamela halfe ſmiling) I promiſe you I wrought it, but to make ſome tedious houres beleeue, that I thought not of them: for elſe I valued it, but euen as a verie purſe. It is the right nature (ſayd Cecropia) of Beauty, to worke vnwitting effects of wonder. Truly (ſayd Pamela) I neuer thought till now, that this outward glaſſe, intitled Beautie, which it pleaſeth you to lay to my (as I thinke) vnguiltie charge, was but a pleaſant mixture of naturall colours, delightfull to the eye, as muſicke is to the eare, without any further conſequence: ſince it is a thing, which not onely beaſtes haue; but euen ſtones and trees many of them do greatly excell in it. That other things (anſwered Cecropia) haue ſome portion of it, takes not away the excellencie of it, where indeede it doth excell: ſince we ſee, that euen thoſe beaſts, trees, and ſtones, are in the name of Beauty onely highly praiſed. But that the beauty of humaine perſons be beyond all other things, there is great likelihood of reaſon, ſince to them onely is giuen the iudgement to diſcerne Beautie; and among reaſonable wights, as it ſeemes, that our ſexe hath the preheminence, ſo that in that preheminence, Nature counteruailes al other liberalities, wherein ſhe may bee thought to haue dealte more fauourably toward mankind. How do men crowne (thinke you) themſelues with glorie, for hauing either by force brought others to yeeld to their mind, or with long ſtudie, and premeditated orations, perſwaded what they would haue perſwaded? and ſee, a faire woman ſhall not onley commaund without authority, but perſwade without ſpeaking. She ſhall not neede to procure attention, for their owne eyes will chaine their eares vnto it. Men venture liues to conquere; ſhe conqueres liues without venturing. She is ſerued, and obeyed, which is the moſt notable, not becauſe the lawes ſo commaund it, but becauſe they become lawes themſelues to obey her; not for her parents ſake, but for her owne ſake. She need not diſpute, whether to gouerne by Feare or Loue, ſince without her thinking thereof, their loue will bring foorth feare, and their feare will fortifie their loue: and ſhee neede not ſeeke offenſiue, or defenſiue force, ſince her only lippes may ſtand for ten thouſand ſhields, and ten thouſand vneuitable ſhot goe from her eyes. Beautie, Beautie (deere Neece) is the crowne of the feminine greatneſſe; which gift, on whom ſoeuer the heauens (therein moſt niggardly) do beſtow, without queſtion, ſhe is bound to vſe it to the noble purpoſe, for which it is created: not onely winning, but preſeruing; ſince that indeede is the right happineſſe, which is not onely in it ſelfe happy, but can alſo deriue the happines to another. Certainly Aunt (ſayd Pamela) I feare me you will make me not only think my ſelfe fairer then euer I did, but think my fairenes a matter of greater valew then heretofore I could imagine it. For I euer (till now) conceiued theſe conqueſts you ſpeake of, rather to proceed from the weakeneſſe of the conquered, then from the ſtrength of the conquering power: as they ſay, the Cranes ouerthrow whole battels of Pygmees, not ſo much of their Craniſh courage, as becauſe the other are Pygmees, and that we ſee, yong babes thinke babies of wonderfull excellency, and yet the babies are but babies. But ſince your elder yeres, & abler iudgement, find Beauty to be worthy of ſo incomparable eſtimation, certainly me thinkes it ought to be held in deareneſſe, according to the excellency, and (no more then wee would do of things which we account precious) euer to ſuffer it to be defiled.

Defiled? (ſayd Cecropia) Mary God forbid that my ſpeech ſhould tend to any ſuch purpoſe, as ſhould deſerue ſo foule a title. My meaning is to ioyne your beauty to loue; your youth to delight. For truely, as colours ſhould be as good as nothing if there were no eyes to behold them: ſo is Beauty nothing, without the eye of Loue behold it: and therefore, ſo far is it from defiling it, that it is the only honoring of it, the only preſeruing of it: for Beauty goes away, deuoured by Time, but where remaines it euer flouriſhing, but in the hart of a true louer? And ſuch a one (if euer there were any) is my ſon: whoſe loue is ſo ſubiected vnto you, that rather thē breed any offence vnto you, it will not delight it ſelfe in beholding you. There is no effect of his loue (anſwered Pamela) better pleaſeth me then that: but as I haue often anſwered you, ſo, reſolutely I ſay vnto you, that he muſt get my parents conſent, and then he ſhall know further of my mind; for, without that, I know I ſhold offend God. O ſweet youth (ſayd Cecropia) how vntimely ſubiect it is to deuotion? No, no ſweete neece, let vs old folks thinke of ſuch preciſe conſiderations; do you enioy the heauen of your age, whereof you are ſure: and like good houſhoulders, which ſpend thoſe things that will not be kept, ſo do you pleaſantly enioy that, which elſe will bring an ouer-late repentance, when your glaſſe ſhall accuſe you to your face, what a change there is in you. Do you ſee how the ſpring-time is full of flowers, decking it ſelf with them, and not aſpiring to the fruits of Autumn? what leſſon is that vnto you but that in the April of your age, you ſhold be like April? Let not ſome of them for whom already the graue gapeth, and perhaps enuy the felicity in you, which themſelues cannot enioy, perſwade you to looſe the hold of occaſion; while it may not only be takē, but offers, nay ſues to be taken: which if it be not now taken, will neuer hereafter be ouertaken. Your ſelfe know, how your father hath refuſed all offers made by the greateſt Princes about you, & will you ſuffer your beauty to be hidden in the wrinkles of his peeuiſh thoughts? If he be peeuiſh (ſaid Pamela) yet is he my father, & how beautifull ſo euer I be, I am his daughter: ſo as God claimes at my hands obedience, and makes me no iudge of his imperfections.

These often replies vpon conſcience in Pamela; made Cecropia thinke, that there was no righter way for her, then as ſhe had (in her opinion) ſet her in liking of Beauty, with perſwaſion not to ſuffer it to be voide of purpoſe, ſo if ſhe could make her leſſe feeling of thoſe heauenly conceipts, that then ſhe might eaſily wind her to her crooked bias. Therefore, employing the vttermoſt of her miſchieuous wit, and ſpeaking the more earneſtly, becauſe ſhe ſpake as ſhe thought, ſhe thus dealt with her. Deare neece, or rather, deare daughter, if my affection and wiſh might preuaile therein, how much doth it increaſe (trow you) the earneſt deſire I haue of this bleſſed match, to ſee theſe vertues of yours knit faſt with ſuch zeale of Deuotion (indeede the beſt bond) which the moſt politicke wits haue found, to hold mans wit in well doing? For, as children muſt firſt by feare be induced to know that, which after (when they do know) they are moſt glad of: So are theſe bug-beares of opinions brought by great Clearks into the world, to ſerue as ſhewelles to keepe them from thoſe faults, whereto elſe the vanitie of the world, and weakeneſſe of ſenſes might pull them. But in you (Neece) whoſe excellency is ſuch, as it neede not to be held vp by the ſtaffe of vulgar opinions, I would not you ſhould loue Vertue ſeruilly, for feare of I know not what, which you ſee not: but euen for the good effects of vertue which you ſee. Feare, and indeede, fooliſh feare, and fearefull ignorance, was the firſt inuenter of thoſe conceipts. For, when they heard it thunder, not knowing the naturall cauſe, they thought there was ſome angry body aboue, that ſpake ſo loude: and euer the leſſe they did perceiue, the more they did conceiue. Wherof they knew no cauſe that grew ſtraight a miracle: fooliſh folkes, not marking that the alterations be but vpon particular accidents, the vniuerſality being alwayes one. Yeſterday was but as to day, and to morrow will tread the ſame footſteps of his foregoers: ſo as it is manifeſt inough, that all things follow but the courſe of their owne nature, ſauing onely Man, who while by the pregnancie of his imagination he ſtriues to things ſupernaturall, meane-while he looſeth his owne naturall felicity. Be wiſe, and that wiſdome ſhall be a God vnto thee; be contented, and that is thy heauen: for elſe to thinke that thoſe powers (if there be any ſuch) aboue are moued either by the eloquence of our prayers, or in a chafe at the folly of our actions; caries aſmuch reaſon as if flies ſhould thinke, that men take great care which of them hums ſweeteſt, and which of them flies nimbleſt.

She would haue ſpoken further to haue enlarged and confirmed her diſcourſe: when Pamela (whoſe cheekes were died in the beautifulleſt graine of vertuous anger, with eyes which gliſtered foorth beames of diſdaine) thus interrupted her. Peace (wicked woman) peace, vnworthy to breath, that doeſt not acknowledge the breathgiuer; moſt vnworthy to haue a tongue, which ſpeakeſt againſt him, through whom thou ſpeakeſt: keepe your affection to your ſelfe, which like a bemired dog, would defile with fauning. You ſay yeſterday was as to day. O fooliſh woman, and moſt miſerably fooliſh, ſince wit makes you fooliſh, What doth that argue, but that there is a conſtancie in the euerlaſting gouernour? Would you haue an inconſtant God, ſince we count a man fooliſh that is inconſtant? He is not ſeene you ſay, and would you thinke him a God, who might bee ſeene by ſo wicked eyes, as yours? which yet might ſee enough if they were not like ſuch, who for ſport-ſake willingly hood-winke themſelues to receiue blowes the eaſier. But though I ſpeake to you without any hope of fruite in ſo rotten a heart, and there be no body elſe here to iudge of my ſpeeches, yet be thou my witneſſe, ô captiuity, that my eares ſhal not be willingly guiltie of my Creators blaſphemie. You ſay, becauſe we know not the cauſes of things; therfore feare was the mother of ſuperſtition: nay, becauſe we know that each effect hath a cauſe, that hath engendred a true and liuely deuotion. For this goodly worke of which we are, & in which we liue, hath not his being by Chance; on which opinion it is beyond meruaile by what Chance any braine could ſtumble. For if it be eternall (as you would ſeeme to conceiue of it,) Eternity & Chance are things vnſufferable together. For that is chanceable which happeneth; and if it happen, there was a time before it happened, when it might haue not happened; or elſe it did not happen; and ſo if chanceable, not eternall. And as abſurd it is to thinke that if it had a beginning, his beginning was deriued from Chaunce: for Chaunce could neuer make all things of nothing: and if therewere ſubſtances before, which by chance ſhould meete to make vp this worke, thereon followes another bottomleſſe pitte of abſurdities. For then thoſe ſubſtances muſt needes haue bin from euer, and ſo eternall: and that eternall cauſes ſhould bring forth chanceable effects, is as ſenſible, as that the Sunne ſhould bee the author of darkeneſſe. Againe, if it were chanceable, then was it not neceſſarie; whereby you take away all conſequents. But we ſee in all things, in ſome reſpect or other, neceſſitie of conſequence: therefore in reaſon we muſt needes know that the cauſes were neceſſary.

Laſtly Chaunce is variable, or elſe it is not to be called Chaunce: but we ſee this worke is ſteady and permanent. If nothing but Chaunce had glewed thoſe peeces of this All, the heauie parts would haue gone infinitely downward, the light infinitely vpward, and ſo neuer haue met to haue made vp his goodly bodie. For before there was a heauen, or a earth, there was neither a heauen to ſtay the height of the ring, nor an earth, which (in reſpect of the round walles of heauen) ſhould become a center. Laſtly, perfect order, perfect beautie, perfect conſtancie, if theſe be the children of Chaunce, let wiſedome be counted the roote of wickedneſſe. But you will ſay it is ſo by nature, as much as if you ſayd, it is ſo, becauſe it is ſo: if you meane of many natures cõſpiring together, as in a popular gouernemẽt to eſtabliſh this faire eſtate; as if the Elementiſh and ethereall parts ſhould in their towne-houſe ſet downe the bounds of each ones office; then conſider what followes: that there muſt needes haue bene a wiſedome which made them concurre: for their natures being abſolute contrarie, in nature rather would haue ſought each others ruine, then haue ſerued as well conſorted parts to ſuch an vnexpreſſable harmonie. For that contrary things ſhould meete to make vp a perfection without a force and Wiſedome aboue their powers, is abſolutely impoſſible; vnleſſe you will flie to that hiſſed-out opinion of Chaunce againe. But you may perhaps affirme, that one vniuerſall Nature (which hath bene for euer) is the knitting together of theſe many parts to ſuch an excellent vnitie. If you meane a Nature of wiſdom, goodneſſe, and prouidence, which knowes what it doth, then ſay you that, which I ſeeke of you, and cannot conclude thoſe blaſphemies, with which you defiled your mouth, & mine eares. But if you meane a Nature, as we ſpeake of the fire, which goeth vpward, it knowes not why: and of the name of the ſea which in ebbing and flowing ſeemes to obſerue ſo iuſt a daunce and yet vnderſtands no muſicke, it is but ſtill the ſame abſurditie ſuperſcribed with another title. For this word, one, being attributed to that which is All, is but one mingling of many, and many ones; as in a leſſe matter, when we ſay one kingdome which containes many citties; or one citty which containes many perſons, wherein the vnder ones (if there be not a ſuperiour power and wiſedome) cannot by nature regard to any preſeruation but of themſelues: no more we ſee they do, ſince the water willingly quenches the fire, and drownes the earth; ſo farre are they from a conſpired vnitie: but that a right heauenly Nature indeed, as it were vnnaturing them, doth ſo bridle them.

Againe, it is as abſurd in nature, that from an vnitie many contraries ſhould proceed ſtill kept in an vnitie: as that from the number of contrarieties an vnitie ſhould ariſe. I ſay ſtill, if you baniſh both a ſingularitie, and pluralitie of iudgement from among them, then (if ſo earthly a mind can lift it ſelfe vp ſo high) do but conceiue, how a thing whereto you giue the higheſt, and moſt excellent kind of being (which is eternity) can be of a baſe & vileſt degree of being, and next to a not-being; which is ſo to be, as not to enioy his owne being? I will not here call all your ſenſes to witneſſe which can heare, nor ſee nothing, which yeeldes not moſt euident euidence of the vnſpeakeableneſſe of that Wiſedome: each thing being directed to an ende, and an end of preſeruation: ſo proper effects of iudgement, as ſpeaking and laughing are of mankind.

But what mad furie can euer ſo inueagle any conceipt, as to ſee our mortall and corruptible ſelues to haue a reaſon, and that this vniuerſalitie (whereof we are but the leaſt peeces) ſhould be vtterly deuoide thereof? as if one ſhould ſay, that ones foote might be wiſe, and himſelfe fooliſh. This heard I once alledged againſt ſuch a godleſſe mind as yours, who being driuen to acknowledge this beaſtly abſurditie, that our bodies ſhould be better then the whole world, if it had the knowledge, whereof the other were voide; he ſought (not able to anſwere directly) to ſhift it off in this ſort: that if that reaſon were true, then muſt it follow alſo, that the world muſt haue in it a ſpirit, that could write and reade too, and be learned; ſince that was in vs commendable: wretched foole, not conſidering that Bookes be but ſupplies of defects; and ſo are prayſed, becauſe they helpe our want, and therefore cannot be incident to the eternall intelligence, which needes no recording of opinions to confirme his knowledge, no more then the Sunne wants waxe to bee the fewell of his glorious lightfulneſſe. This world therefore cannot otherwiſe conſiſt but by a mind of Wiſedome, which gouerns it, which whether you will allow to be the Creator thereof, as vndoubtedly he is, or the ſoule and gouernour thereof, moſt certaine it is that whether he gouerne all, or make all, his power is aboue either his creatures, or his gouernement. And if his power bee aboue all things, then conſequently it muſt needes be infinite, ſince there is nothing aboue it to limit it. For beyond which there is nothing, muſt needes be boundleſſe, and infinite: if his power bee infinite, then likewiſe muſt his knowledge bee infinite: for elſe there ſhould be an infinite proportion of power which hee ſhould not know how to vſe; the vnſenſibleneſſe whereof I thinke euen you can conceiue: and if infinite, then muſt nothing, no not the eſtate of flies (which you with ſo vnſauerie ſcorne did ieſt at) be vnknowne vnto him. For if it were, then there were his knowledge bounded, and ſo not infinite: if knowledge and power be infinite, then muſt needes his goodneſſe and iuſtice march in the ſame ranke: for infiniteneſſe of power, and knowledge, without like meaſure of goodneſſe, muſt neceſſarily bring foorth deſtruction and ruine, and not ornament and preſeruation. Since then there is a God, and an all-knowing God, ſo as he ſees into the darkeſt of all naturall ſecretes, which is the heart of Man; and ſees therein the deepeſt diſſembled thoughts, nay ſees the thoughts before they be thought: ſince he is iuſt to exerciſe his might, and mightie to performe his iuſtice, aſſure thy ſelfe, moſt wicked woman (that haſt ſo plaguily a corrupted mind, as thou canſt not keepe thy ſickneſſe to thy ſelfe, but muſt moſt wickedly infect others) aſſure thy ſelfe, I ſay (for what I ſay dependes of euerlaſting and vnremoueable cauſes) that the time will come, when thou ſhalt know that power by feeling it, when thou ſhalt ſee his wiſedome in the manifeſting thy ougly ſhamefulneſſe, and ſhalt only perceiue him to haue bene a Creator in thy deſtruction.

Thus ſhe ſayd, thus ſhe ended, with ſo faire a maieſtie of vnconquered vertue, that captiuitie might ſeeme to haue authoritie ouer tyrannie: ſo fowlly was the filthineſſe of impietie diſcouered by the ſhining of her vnſtayned goodneſſe, ſo farre, as either Cecropia ſaw indeed, or elſe the guilty amazement of a ſelfe-accuſing conſcience, made her eyes vntrue iudges of their naturall obiect, that there was a light more then humaine, which gaue a luſtre to her perfections. But Cecropia, like a Batte (which though it haue eyes to diſcerne that there is a Sunne, yet hath ſo euill eyes, that it cannot delight in the Sunne) found a trueth, but could not loue it. But as great perſons are wont to make the wrong they haue done, to be a cauſe to doo the more wrong, her knowledge roſe to no higher point, but to enuie a worthier, worthier,and her will was no otherwiſe bent, but the more to hate, the more ſhee found her enemie prouided againſt her. Yet all the while ſhe ſpake (though with eyes caſt like a horſe that would ſtrike at the ſtirrop, and with colour which bluſhed through yellowneſſe) ſhe ſate rather ſtill then quiet, and after her ſpeech rather muttered,then replied: for the warre of wickedneſſe in her ſelfe, brought forth diſdainefull pride to reſiſt cunning diſſimulation; ſo as, ſaying little more vnto her,but that ſhe ſhould haue leyſure inough better to bethinke her ſelfe; ſhe went away repining,but not repenting: condemning greatly(as ſhe thought her ſons ouer-feeble humbleneſſe,and purpoſing to egge him forward to a courſe of violence. For her ſelfe,determining to deale with neither of them both any more in maner of a ſuter: for what maieſtie of vertue did in the one, that did ſilent humbleneſſe in the other. But finding her ſon ouer-apt to lay both condemnation,and execution of ſorrow vpon himſelfe,ſhe ſought to mitigate his mind with feigned delayes of comfort, who (hauing this inward ouerthrow in himſelfe) was the more vexed, that he could not vtter the rage thereof vpon his outward enemies.

For Baſilius taught by the laſt dayes triall,what dangerous effects choſen courages can bring forth,rather vſed the ſpade, then the ſword; or the ſword, but to defend the ſpade; girding about the whole towne with trenches; which beginning a good way off from the towne,with a number of well directed Pioners, he ſtill caryed before him till they came to a neere diſtance, where he builded Fortes, one anſwering the other, in ſuch ſort,as it was a pretie conſideration in the diſcipline of war, to ſee building vſed for the inſtrument of ruine, and the aſſayler entrenched as if he were beſieged. But many ſallies did Amphialus make to hinder their working. But they (exerciſing more melancholie, then choller in their reſolution) made him find, that if by the aduantage of the place, few are able to defend themſelues from many, that many muſt needes haue power (making themſelues ſtrong in ſeate) to repell few,referring the reuenge rather to the end,then a preſent requitall. Yet oftentimes they dealt ſome blowes in light skirmiſhes,each ſide hauing a ſtrong retiring place, and rather fighting with many alarums, to vexe the enemy, then for any hope of great ſucceſſe.

Which euery way was a tedious comber to the impacient courage of Amphialus: till the fame of this warre, bringing thither diuerſe, both ſtrangers, and ſubiects,as well of Princely,as noble houſes, the gallant Phalantus, who refrained his ſportful delights as then,to ſerue Baſilius(whom he honoured for receiued honors) when he had ſpent ſome time in conſidering the Arcadian manner in marching, encamping,and fighting,and had learned in what points of gouernement, and obedience their diſcipline differed from others,and ſo had ſatisfied his mind in the knowledges, both for the cutting off the enemies helpes,and furniſhing ones ſelfe,which Baſilius orders could deliuer vnto him, his young ſpirits (wearie of wanting cauſe to be wearie) deſired to keepe his valure in knowledge, by ſome priuate acte, ſince the publike policy reſtrained him;the rather,becauſe his old miſtreſſe Arteſia might ſee, whom ſhe had ſo lightly forſaken: and therefore demaunding and obtaining leaue of Baſilius; he cauſed a Heraulde to be furniſhed with apparell of his office, and tokens of a peaceable meſſage, and ſo ſent him to the gate of the towne to demaund audience of Amphialus: who vnderſtanding thereof, cauſed him both ſafely and courteouſly to bee brought into his preſence: who making lowly reuerence vnto him, preſented his Letters, deſiring Amphialus, that whatſoeuer they contayned, hee would conſider that hee was onely the bearer, and not the inditer. Amphialus with noble gentleneſſe aſſured him both by honourable ſpeeches, and a demeanure which anſwered for him, that his reuenge, whenſoeuer, ſhould ſort vnto it ſelfe a higher ſubiect. But opening the letters, he found them to ſpeake in this maner.

Phalantus of Corinth, to Amphialus of Arcadia, ſendeth the greeting of a hateleſſe enemie. The liking of martiall matters without any miſlike of your perſon, hath brought me rather to the companie, then to the mind of your beſiegers: where languiſhing in idleneſſe, I deſire to refreſh my mind with ſome exerciſe of armes, which might make knowne the doers, with delight of the beholders. Therefore, if there be any Gentleman in your Towne, that either for the loue of Honour, or honour of his Loue, will armed on horſebacke, with Launce, and ſword, winne another, or looſe himſelfe, to be a priſoner at diſcretion of the conquerour, I will to morrow morning by Sunne-riſing, with a trumpet and a Squire onely, attend him in like order furniſhed. The place I thinke fitteſt, the Iland within the Lake, becauſe it ſtandes ſo well in the view of your Caſtell, as that the Ladies may haue the pleaſure of ſeeing the combat: which though it be within the commaundement of your Caſtell, I deſire no better ſecurity, then the promiſe I make to my ſelfe of your vertue. I attend your aunſwere, and wiſh you ſuch ſucceſſe as may be to your honour, rather in yeelding to that which is iuſt, then in maintayning wrong by violence.

Amphialus read it with cheereſull countenance,& thinking but a little with himſelfe, called for inke and paper,and wrote this anſwer.

Amphialus of Arcadia, to Phalantus of Corinth, wiſheth all his owne wiſhes, ſauing thoſe which may be hurtfull to another. The matter of your letters ſo fit for a worthy mind,and the maner ſo ſutable to the nobleneſſe of the matter giue me cauſe to thinke how happy I might account my ſelfe, if I could get ſuch a friend, who eſteeme it no ſmall happineſſe to haue met with ſo noble an enemie. Your chalenge ſhall be aunſwered,and both time,place,and weapon accepted. For your ſecuritie from any treacherie (hauing no hoſtage worthie to counteruaile you) take my word, which I ſteeme aboue all reſpects. Prepare therefore your armes to fight, but not your hart to malice; ſince true valure needes no other whetſtone, then deſire of honour.

HAuing writte and ſealed his letter, he deliuered it to the Herauld, and withall tooke a faire chaine from off his owne necke, and gaue it him. And ſo with ſafe conuoy ſent him away from out his Citie: and he being gone, Amphialus ſhewed vnto his mother, and ſome other of his chiefe Counſellours, what he had receiued, and how hee had aunſwered: telling them withall, that hee was determined to aunſwere the challenge in his owne perſon. His mother with prayers authorized by motherly commaundement; his olde gouernour with perſwaſions mingled with reprehenſions (that hee would rather affect the glorie of a priuate fighter, then of a wiſe Generall) Clinias with falling downe at his feete, and beſeeching him to remember, that all their liues depended vpon his ſafetie, ſought all to diſſwade him. But Amphialus (whoſe heart was enflamed with courage, and courage enflamed with affection) made an imperious reſolution cutte off the tediousnesse of replies, giuing them in charge, what they shold do vpon all occasions, and particularly to deliuer the Ladies, if otherwise then well happened vnto him: onely desiring his mother, that she would bring Philoclea to a window, whence she might with ease perfectly discerne the combat. And so, as soone as the morning began to draw dew from the faireſt greenes to wash her face withall, against the approach of the burning Sunne, he went to his stable, where himselfe chose out a horse, whom (though he was neere twentie yeare old) he preferred for a peece of sure seruice, before a great number of yonger. His colour was of a browne bay, dapled thicke with blacke spots; his forhead marked with a white star; to which, in all his bodie there was no part sutable, but the left foote before; his mane and taile blacke, and thicke, of goodly, and well proportioned greatnesse. He caused him to be trimmed with a sumptuous saddle of tawnie, and gold ennamell, enriched with precious stones: his furniture was made into the fashion of the branches of a tree, from which the leaues were falling: and so artificially were the leaues made, that as the horse moued, it seemed indeed that the leaues wagged, as when the wind plaies with them; & being made of a pale cloath of gold, they did beare the straw-coloured liuerie of ruine. His armour was also of tawnie and gold, but formed into the figures of flames darkened, as when they newly brake the prison of a smokie fornace. In his shield hee had painted the Torpedo fish. And so appointed, he caused himselfe, with his trumpet and squire (whom hee had taken since the death of Ismenus) to be ferried ouer into the Iland: a place well chosen for such a purpose. For, it was so plaine, as there was scarcely any bush, or hillocke, either to vnleuell, or shadow it: of length and breadth enough, to trie the vttermost both of Launce and sword, and the one end of it facing the Castle, the other extending it selfe toward the campe, and no accesse to it, but by water: there could no secret trechery be wrought, and for manifest violence, either side might haue time inough to succour their party.

But there he found Phalantus, already waiting for him vpon a horse, milke white, but that vpon his shoulder and withers, he was freckned with red staines, as when a few strawberies are scattered into a dish of creame. He had caused his mane and taile to be died in carnation; his reynes were vine branches, which ingendring one with the other, at the end, when it came to the bit, there, for the bosse, brought forth a cluster of grapes, by the workeman made so liuely, that it seemed, as the horse champed on his bit, he chopped for them, and that it did make his mouth water, to see the grapes so neere him. His furniture behind was of vines, so artificially made, as it seemed the horse stood in the shadow of the vine, so pretily were clusters of rubie grapes dispersed among the trappers which embraced his sides. His armour was blew, like the heauen, which a Sun did with his rayes (proportionately deliuered) guild in most places. His shield was beautified with this deuice; A greyhound, which ouerrunning his fellow, and taking the hare, yet hurts it not when it takes it. The word was, The glory, not the pray.

But as soone as Amphialus landed, he sent his squire to Phalantus, to tell him, that there was the Knight, ready to know whether hee had any thing to say to him. Phalantus answered, that his answere now must bee in the language of launces; and so each attended the warning of the trumpets, which were to sound at the appointment of foure iudges, who with consideration of the same, had deuided the ground. Phalantus-his horse young, and feeling the youth of his maister, stood coruetting, which being well gouerned by Phalantus, gaue such a glittering grace, as when the

Sunne in a cleare day ſhines vpon a wauing water. Amphialus-horſe ſtood pawing vpon the ground, with his further foote before, as if he would for his maiſters cauſe begin to make himſelfe angry: till the trumpet ſounding together, Together they ſet ſpurres to their horſes, together tooke their Launces from their thighes, conueyed them vp into their reſts together, together let them ſinke downward; ſo as it was a delectable ſight, in a dangerous effect; and a pleaſant conſideration, that there was ſo perfect agreement, in ſo mortall diſagreement: like a muſicke made of cunning diſcords. But their horſes keeping an euen line their maſters had skilfully allotted vnto them, paſſed one by another without encountring, although either might feele the angry breath of other. But the ſtaues being come to a iuſt deſcent, but euen when the marke was ready to meet them, Amphialus was runne through the vamplate, and vnder the arme: ſo as the ſtaffe appearing behind him, it ſeemed to the beholders he had bene in danger. But he ſtrake Phalantus iuſt vpon the gorget, ſo as he battred the lamms thereof, and made his head almoſt touch the backe of his horſe. But either ſide hauing ſtayed the ſpur, and vſed the bit to ſtop ther horſes fury, caſting away the troncheons of their ſtaues, & drawing their ſwords, they attended the ſecond ſummons of the death-threatning trumpet, which quickly followed; and they aſſoone making their horſes aunſwer their hands, with a gentle gallop, ſet one toward the other, til being come in the neareneſſe of litle more then a ſtaues length. Amphialus truſting more to the ſtrength, then to the nimbleneſſe of his horſe, put him foorth with ſpeedie violence, and making his head ioyne to the others flanke, guiding his blow with diſcretion, and ſtrengthning it with the courſe of his horſe, ſtrake Phalantus vpon the head, in ſuch ſort, that his feeling ſenſe did both dazell his ſight, and aſtoniſh his hearing. But Phalantus (not accuſtomed to be vngratefull to ſuch benefits) ſtrake him vpon the ſide of his face, with ſuch force, that he thought his iaw had bene cut aſunder: though the faithfulneſſe of his armour indeede garded him from further damage. And ſo remained they awhile, rather angry with fighting, then fighting for anger, till Amphialus-his horſe, leaning hard vpon the other, and winning ground, the other horſe feeling himſelfe preſt, began to riſe a litle before, as hee was wont to do in his coruet: which aduantage Amphialus taking, ſet forward his owne horſe with the further ſpurre, ſo as Phalantus-his horſe came ouer with his maiſter vnder him. Which Amphialus ſeeing, lighted, with intention to helpe Phalantus. But his horſe that had faulted, rather with vntimely art, then want of force, gat vp from burdning his burden, ſo as Phalantus (in the fall hauing gotten his feete free off the ſtirrop) could (though ſomething bruiſed) ariſe, and ſeeing Amphialus neere him, he asked him, Whether he had giuen him any helpe in remouing his horſe. Amphialus ſayd No. Truely ſayd Phalantus, I asked it, becauſe I would not willingly haue fought with him, that had had my life in his mercy. But now (ſayd Phalantus) before we proceede further, let me know who you are, becauſe neuer yet did any man bring me to the like fortune. Amphialus liſting to keepe himſelfe vnknowne, told him he was a Gentleman, to whom Amphialus that day had giuen armour and horſe to trie his valour, hauing neuer before bene in any combat worthy remembrance. Ah (ſayd Phalantus in a rage) And muſt I be the exerciſe of your prentiſ-age? and with that, choler tooke awaye either the bruſe, or the feeling of the bruſe, ſo as he entred afreſh into the combat, & boiling into his armes the diſdaine of his hart, ſtrake ſo thicke vpon Amphialus, as if euery blow would faine haue bene foremoſt. But Amphialus (that many like trials had taught, great ſpending to leaue ſmall remnants) let paſſe the ſtorme with ſtrong wards, and nimble auoydings:

dings: till seeing his time fit, both for distance and nakednesse, he strake him so cruell a blow on the knee, that the poore Gentleman fell downe withall in a sowne.

But Amphialus, pittying approued valour, made precious by naturall curtesie, went to him, & taking off his head-peece to giue him aire, the yong Knight (disdaining to buy life with yeelding) bad him vse his fortune: for he was resolued neuer to yeeld. No more you shall (sayd Amphialus) if it be not to my request, that you will account your selfe to haue great interest in me. Phalantus more ouercome by his kindnesse, then by his fortune, desired yet once againe to know his name, who in his first beginning had shewed such furie in his force, and yet such stay in his furie. Amphialus, then named himselfe, telling him withall, he wold thinke his name much bettred, if it might be honored by the title of his friend. But no Baulme could be more comfortable to his wound, then the knowledge thereof was to his mind, when he knew his mishap should be excused by the renowmed valour of the other. And so promising each to other assuredne sse of good will, Phalantus (of whom Amphialus would haue no other raunsome, but his word of friendship) was conueyed into the campe, where he would but litle remaine among the enemies of Amphialus: but went to seeke his aduentures other-where.

As for Amphialus, he was receiued with triumph into the Castle; although one might see by his eyes (humbly lifted vp to the window where Philoclea stood) that he was rather suppliant, then victorious: which occasion Cecropia taking (who as then stood by Philoclea, and had lately left Pamela in another roome, whence also she might see the combat) Sweet Lady (sayd she) now you may see, whether you haue cause to loue my son, who then lies vnder your feete, when he stands vpon the necke of his braueſt enemies. Alas sayd Philoclea, a simple seruice to me, me thinks it is, to haue those, who come to succour me, destroyed: If it be my duty to call it loue, be it so: but the effects it brings forth, I confesse I account hatefull. Cecropia grew so angry with this vnkind answer, that she could not abstaine from telling her, that shee was like them that could not sleepe, when they were softly layed: but that if her son would follow her counsell, he should take another course with her: and so flang away from her.

Yet (knowing the desperate melancholy of Amphialus in like cases) framed to him a very thankfull message, powdring it with some hope-giuing phrases; which were of such ioy to Amphialus, that he (though against publike respect, and importunity of disswaders) presently caused it to bee made knowne to the campe, that whatsoeuer Knight would trie the like fortune as Phalantus did; he should in like sort be answered: so as diuers of the valianteſt, partly of themselues, partly at the instigation of Basilius, attempted the combat with him: and according to euery ones humour, so were the causes of the challenge grounded: one laying treason to his charge; another preferring himselfe in the worthinesse to serue Philoclea, a third, exalting some Ladies beautie beyond either of the sisters; a fourth, laying disgraces to loue it selfe, naming it the bewitcher of the witte, the rebell to Reason, the betrayer of resolution, the defiler of thoughts, the vnderminer of magnanimitie, the flatterer of vice, the slaue to weakenesse, the infection of youth, the madnesse of age, the curse of life, and reproch of death; a fifth, disdayning to cast at lesse then at all, would make the cause of his quarrell the causers of loue, and proclaime his blasphemies against womankind; that namely that sexe was the ouersight of Nature, the disgrace of reasonablenesse, the obstinate cowards, the slaue-borne tyrants, the shops of vanities, the guilded wether-cocks, in whom conſcience is but peeuiſhneſſe, chaſtity waywardneſſe, and gratefulneſſe a miracle. But all theſe challenges (how well ſo euer endited) were ſo well anſwered, that ſome by death taught others, though paſt learning themſelues; & ſome by yeelding gaue themſelues the lie for hauing blaſphemed; to the great griefe of Baſilius, ſo to ſee his Rebell preuaile, and in his owne ſight to crowne himſelfe with deſerued honour.

Whereupon thirſting for reuenge, and elſe not hoping to preuaile, the beſt of his campe being already ouerthrowne; he ſent a meſſenger to Argalus in whoſe approued courage and force, he had (and had cauſe) to haue great confidence, with a letter; requiring him to take this quarrell in hand, from which hee had hitherto ſpared him in reſpect of his late mariage. But now his honour, and (as he eſteemed it) felicity ſtanding vpon it, hee could no longer forbeare to chalenge of him his faithfull ſeruice.

The meſſenger made ſpeede, and found Argalus at a caſtle of his owne, ſitting in a parler with the faire Parthenia, he reading in a booke the ſtories of Hercules, ſhe by him, as to heare him reade; but while his eyes looked on the booke, ſhee looked on his eyes, and ſometimes ſtaying him, with ſome prety queſtion, not ſo much to bee reſolued of the doubt; as to giue him occaſion to looke vpon her. A happy couple, he ioying in her, ſhe ioying in her ſelfe, but in her ſelfe, becauſe ſhee enioyed him: both encreaſed their riches by giuing to each other; each making one life double, becauſe they made a double life one; where deſire neuer wanted ſatisfaction, nor ſatisfaction euer bred facietie; he ruling, becauſe ſhe would obey: or rather becauſe ſhe would obey, ſhe therein ruling.

But when the meſſenger came in with letters in his hand, and haſt in his countenance, though ſhe knew not what to feare, yet ſhe feared, becauſe ſhe knew not; but ſhe roſe, and went aſide, while he deliuered his letters and meſſage; yet a far off ſhe looked, now at the meſſenger, and then at her husband: the ſame feare, which made her loth to haue cauſe of feare, yet making her ſeeke cauſe to nouriſh her feare. And well ſhe found there was ſome ſerious matter; for her husbands countenance figured ſome reſolution betweene lothneſſe and neceſſitie: and once his eye caſt vpon her, and finding hers vpon him, he bluſhed; and ſhe bluſhed, becauſe hee bluſhed, and yet ſtreight grew pale, becauſe ſhe knew not why he had bluſhed. But when he had read, and heard, and diſpatched away the meſſenger (like a man in whom Honour could not be rocked aſleepe by affection) with promiſe quickly to follow; hee came to Parthenia, and as ſorie as might be for parting, and yet more ſorie for her ſorrow, he gaue her the letter to reade. She with fearefull ſlowneſſe tooke it, & with fearefull quickneſſe read it; and hauing read it, Ah my Argalus (ſayd ſhe) and haue you made ſuch haſt to anſwere? and are you ſo ſoone reſolued to leaue me? But hee diſcourſing vnto her, how much it imported his honour (which ſince it was deare to him, he knew it would be deare vnto her) her reaſon ouerclowded with ſorrow, ſuffered her not preſently to replie, but left the charge thereof to teares, and ſighes; which he not able to beare, left her alone, and went to giue order for his preſent departure.

But by that time he was armed and ready to go, ſhe had recouered a litle ſtrength of ſpirit againe, and comming out, and ſeeing him armed, and wanting nothing for his departure but her fearewell, ſhe ran to him, tooke him by the arme, and kneeling downe without regard, who either heard her ſpeech, or ſaw her demeanour, My Argalus, my Argalus (ſayd ſhe) do not thus forſake me. Remeber, alas, Remember that I haue intereſt in you, which I wil neuer yeeld ſhalbe thus aduentured. Your valour is already sufficiently knowne: sufficiently haue you already done for your country: ennow, ennow there are besides you to loose lesse worthie liues. Woe is me, what shall become of me, if you thus abandon mee? Then was it time for you to follow these aduentures, when you aduentured no body but your selfe, and were no bodies but your owne. But now pardon me, that now, or neuer, I claime mine owne; mine you are, and without me you can vndertake no danger: and will you endanger Parthenia? Parthenia shall be in the battell of your fight: Parthenia shall smart in your paine and your bloud must be bled by Pharthenia. Deare Parthenia (sayd he) this is the first time, that euer you resisted my will: I thanke you for it; but persuer not in it; and let not the teares of those most beloued eyes be a presage vnto me of that, which you wold not shold happen. I shall liue doubte not: for so great a blessing, as you are was not giuen vnto me, so soone to be depriued of it. Looke for me therefore shortly, and victorious; and prepare a ioyfull welcome, and I will wish for no other triumph. She answered not, but stood as it were thunder-striken with amazement: for true Loue made obedience stand vp against all other passions. But when he tooke her in his armes, and sought to print his heart in her sweete lippes, she fell in a sound, so as he was faine to leaue her to her Gentlewomen: and caried away by the tyrannie of Honour, though with many a backe-cast looke, and hartie grone, went to the campe. Where vnderstanding the notable victories of Amphialus he thought to giue him some daies respite of rest, because he would not haue his victory disgraced by the others wearinesse. In which dayes, he sought by all meanes (hauing leaue to parly with him) to disswade him from his enterprise: and then imparting his mind to Basilius, because he found Amphialus was inflexible, wrote his defie vnto him in this manner.

RIght famous Amphialus, if my perswasion in reason, or prayer in good will, might preuaile with you, you should by better meanes bee like to obtaine your desire. You should make many braue enemies become your faithfull seruants, and make your honour flie vp to heauen, being caried vp by both the wings of valure and iustice; whereof now it wants the latter. But since my suite, nor counsell can get no place in you, disdaine not to receiue a mortall chalenge, from a man so far inferiour vnto you in vertue, as that I do not so much mislike of the deede, as I haue the doer in admiration. Prepare therefore your selfe, according to the noble manner you haue vsed, and thinke not lightly of neuer so weake an arme, which strikes with the sword of iustice,

To this he quickely receiued this answere.

MVch more famous Argalus, I whom neuer threatnings could make afraide, am now terrified by your noble curtesie. For well I knowe, from what height of vertue it doth proceed, and what cause I haue to doubt such vertue bent to my ruine: but Loue, which iustifieth the vniustice you lay vnto me, doth also animate me against all dangers, since I come full of him by whom your selfe haue bin (if I be not deceiued) somtimes conquered. I will therefore attend your appearance in the Ile, carying this aduantage with me, that as it shall be a singular honour if I get the victorie, so there can be no dishonour in being ouercome by Argalus.

The chalenge thus denounced, and accepted, Argalus was armed in a white armour, which was al guilded ouer with knots of womans haire, which came downe from the crest of his head-peece, & spred it selfe in rich quantity ouer all his armor:

his furniture was cut out into the fashion of an Egle, whereof the beake (made into a rich iewell (was fastened to the saddle, the taile couered the crooper of the horse, and the wings serued for trappers; which falling of each side, as the horse stirred, the bird seemed to flie. His petrell and raines, were embrodered with feathers sutable vnto it: vpon his right arme he ware a sleeue, which his deare Parthenia had made for him, to be worne in a iustes, in the time that succesſe was vngratefull to their weldeserued loue: it was full of bleeding harts, though neuer intended to any bloudy enterprise. In his shield (as his own deuice) he had two Palme-trees, neere one another, with a word signifying, In that sort flourishing. His horse was of a firie sorrell, with blacke feete, and backe list on his back, who with open nostrels breathed war, before he could see an enemy: and now vp with one leg, and then with another, seemed to complaine of Nature, that she had made him any whit earthie.

But he had scarcely vewed the ground of the Iland, and considered the aduantages (if any were) thereof, before the Castell boate had deliuered Amphialus, in all points prouided to giue a hard entertainment. And then sending each to other their Squires in honourable maner, to know whether they should attend any further ceremonie; the trumpets sounding, the horses with smooth running, the staues with vnshaked motion, obediently performed their cholericke commandements. But when they drew neere, Argalus horse being hot, prest in with his head: which Amphialus perceiuing, knowing if he gaue him his side, it should be to his disaduantage, prest in also with him, so as both the horses and men met shoulder to shoulder, so as the horses (hurt as much with the striking, as being striken) tumbled downe to the earth, dangerously to their maisters, but that they by strength nimble, and by vse skilfull, in the falling shunned the harme of the fall, and without more respite, drew out their swords with a gallant brauerie, each striuing to shew himselfe the lesse endamaged, and to make knowne that they were glad, they had now nothing else to trust to, but their owne vertue. True it is, that Amphialus was the sooner vp, but Argalus had his sword out the sooner: and then fell they to the cruellest combat, that any present eye had seene. Their swords first, like Canons, battering downe the wals of their armour, making breaches almost in euery place for troupes of wounds to enter. Among the rest, Argalus gaue a great wound to Amphialus disarmed face; though part of the force of it Amphialus warded vpon his shield, and withall (first casting his eye vp to Philocleas Window, as if he had fetched his courage thence) feyning to entend the same sort of blow, turned his sword, and with a mightie reuerse, gaue a cruell wound to the right arme of Argalus, the vnfaithfull armour yeelding to the swords strong guided sharpnesse. But though the bloud accused the hurt of Argalus, yet would he in no action of his confesse it: but keeping himselfe in a lower ward, stood watching with timely thrustes to repaire his losse, which quickly he did. For Amphialus (following his fawning fortune) layd on so thicke vpon Argalus, that his shield had almost fallen peece-meale to the earth, when Argalus comming in with his right foot, and somthing stowping to come vnder his armour, thrust him into the belly daungerously, and mortally it would haue beene, but that with the blow before, Amphialus had ouer striken himselfe so, as he fell side-ward downe, and with falling saued himselfe from ruine. The sword by that meanes slipping aside, and not piercing more deepely. Argalus seeing him fall, threatning with voyce and sword, bad him yeeld. But he striuing without aunswere to rise, Argalus strake with all his might vpon his head. But his hurt arme not able to maister so sound a force, let the sword fall so, as Amphialus, though astonished with the blow, could arise: which Argalus considering, ranne in to grasp with him, and so closed together; falling so to the ground, now one getting aboue, and then the other; at length, both wearie of so vnlouely embracements, with a descending consent gate vp, and went to their swords: but happened each of his enemies: where Argalus finding his foes sword garnished in his bloud, his hart rase with the same sword to reuenge it, and on that blade to allie their blouds together. But his mind was euill wayted-on by his lamed force, so as he receiued still more & more wounds which made all his armour seeme to blush, that it had defended his maister no better. But Amphialus perceiuing it, and waying the small hatefulnesse of their quarrell, with the worthinesse of the Knight, desired him to take pitty of himselfe. But Argalus, the more repining, the more he found himselfe in disaduantage, filling his veines with spite in stead of bloud, and making courage arise against faintnesse (like a Candell, which a little before it goes out, giues then the greatest blaze) so did he vnite all his force, that casting away the little remnant of his shield, and taking his sword in both hands, he stroke such a notable blow, that he cleft his shield armour, and arme almost to the bone.

But then Amphialus forgat all ceremonies, & with cruell blowes made more of his best bloud succeed the rest; till his hand being stayed by his eare, his eare filled with a pitifull crie, the crie guided his sight to an excellent faire Lady, who came running as fast as she could, and yet because she could not as fast as she would, she sent her lamentable voyce before her: and being come, and being knowne to them both, to be the beautifull Parthenia (who had that night dreamed she saw her husband in such estate, as she then found him, which made her make such hast thither) they both maruailed. But Parthenia ran betweene them (feare of loue making her forget the feare of Nature) and then fell downe at their feete, determining so to part them, till she could get breath to sigh out her dolefull speeches: and when her breath (which running had spent, & dismayednesse made slow to returne) had by sobbes gotten into her sorrow-closed breast, for a while she could say nothing, but, ô wretched eyes of mine, ô wailefull sight, ô day of darkenesse: at length turning her eyes (wherein sorrow swamme) to Amphialus, My Lord (sayd she) it is sayd you loue; in the power of that loue, I beseech you to leaue off this combat, as euer your heart may find comfort in his affection, euen for her sake, I craue it: or if you be mortally determined, be so pitifull vnto me, as first to kill me, that I may not see the death of Argalus. Amphialus was about to haue answered, when Argalus, vexed with his Fortune, but most vexed that she should see him in that fortune. Ah Parthenia (sayd he) neuer till now vnwelcome vnto me, do you come to get my life by request? And cānot Argalus liue but by request? Is that a life? With that he went a side, for fear of hurting her, & wold haue begun the combat afresh. But Amphialus not only cōiured by that which held the Monarchie of his mind, but euen in his noble hart melting with cōpassion at so passionate a sight, desired him to withhold his hāds, for that he shold strike one, who sought his fauour, & would not make resistance. A notable example of the wonderfull effects of Vertue, where the conquerour sought for friendship of the conquered, and the conquered would not pardon the conquerour: both indeed being of that mind to loue each other for accepting, but not for giuing mercie, and neither affected to ouer-liue a dishonour: so that Argalus not so much striuing with Amphialus (for if he had had him in the like sort, in like sort he would haue dealt with him) as labouring against his owne power (which he chiefly despised) set himselfe forward, stretching his strength to the vttermost. But the fire of that strife, blowne with his inward rage, boyled out his bloud in such abundance, that hee was driuen to rest him vpon the pommell of his sword: and then each thing beginning to turne round in the daunce of Death before his eyes, his sight both dazled and dimmed, till (thinking to sit downe) he fell in a sound, Parthenia, and Amphialus both hastily went vnto him: Amphialus tooke off his helmet, and Parthenia laid his head in her lap, tearing off her linnē sleeues & partlet, to serue about his wounds: to bind which, she tooke off her hair lace, and would haue cut off her faire haire her selfe, but that the squires and iudges came in with fitter things for the purpose: while she bewayled her selfe with so lamentable sweetnesse, as was inough to haue taught sorrow to the gladdest thoughts, and haue engraued it in the minds of hardest mettall.

O Parthenia, no more Parthenia (sayd she) What art thou? what seest thou? how is thy blisse in a moment fallen? how art thou, euen-now before all Ladies the example of perfect happinesse, and now the gasing stocke of endlesse miserie? O God, what hath bene my desert to be thus punished? or if such haue bene my desert, why was I not in my selfe punished? O wandering life, to what wildernesse wouldest thou lead me? But Sorrow, I hope thou art sharp inough to saue my labour from other remedies. Argalus, Argalus, I will follow thee, I will follow thee.

But with that Argalus came out of his sound, and lifting vp his languishing eyes (which a painefull rest, and iron sleepe did seeke to locke vp) seeing her, in whom (euen dying) hee liued, and himselfe seated in so beloued a place, it seemed a little cheerefull bloud came vp to his cheekes, like a burning cole, almost dead, if some breath a little reuine it: and forcing vp (the best he could) his feeble voyce, My deare, my better halfe (sayd hee) I find I must now leaue thee: and by that sweete hand, and faire eyes of thine I sweare, that Death brings nothing with it to grieue me, but that I must leaue thee, and cannot remaine to answere part of thy infinit deserts, with being some comfort vnto thee. But since so it pleaseth him, whose wisedome and goodnesse guideth all, put they confidence in him, and one day we shall blessedly meet againe, neuer to depart: meane while liue happily, deare Parthenia, and I perswade my selfe, it will encrease the blessednesse of my soule, so to see thee. Loue well the remembrance of thy louing, and truly louing, Argalus: and let not (with that word he sighed) this disgrace of mine, make thee one day thinke, thou hadst an vnworthy husband. They could scarcely vnderstand the last words: for Death began to seaze himselfe of his heart, neither could Parthenia make answer, so full was her breast of anguish. But while the other sought to stanch his remedilesse wounds, she with her kisses made him happie: for his last breath was deliuered into her mouth.

But when indeede she found his ghost was gone, then Sorrow lost the witte of vtterance, and grew ragefull, and madde, so that shee tare her beautifull face, and rent her haire, as though they could serue for nothing, since Argalus was gone; till Amphialus (so moued with pittie of that sight, as that he honoured his aduersaries death with teares) caused her (with the helpe of her women that came with her partly by force, to be conueyed into the boat, with the dead body of Argalus, from which she would not depart. And being come of the other side, there she was receiued by Basilius himselfe, with all the funerall pompe of militarie discipline, trayling all their Ensignes vpon the ground, making these warlike instruments sound dolefull notes, and Basilius (with comfort in his mouth, and woe in his face) sought to perswade some ease into Parthenias mind: but all was as easefull to her, as the hand-handling of sore wounds: all the honour done, being to her but the triumph of her ruine, she finding no comfort, but in desperate yeelding to Sorrow: and rather determined to hate her selfe, if euer shee should find ease thereof. And well might she heare as she past through the Campe, the great prayses spoken of her husband, which all were recordes of her losse. But the more excellent he was (being indeed accounted second to none in all Greece) the more did the breath of those praises, beare vp the wings of Amphialus his fame: to whom yet (such was his case) that Trophe vpon Trophe, still did but build vp the monument of his thraldome; hee euer finding himselfe in such fauour of Philoclea, that she was most absent, when he was present with her; and euer sorriest, when hee had best successe: which would haue made him renounce all comfort, but that his mother, with diuersity of deuises, kept vp his hart.

But while he allayed thus his outward glorie, with inward discomfort, he was like to haue bin ouertaken with a notable treason, the beginning wherof (though meerely ridiculous) had like to haue brought forth vnto him a weeping effect.

Among other that attended Basilius in this expedition, Dametas was one; whether to be present with him, or absent from Miso: once, certaine it was without any mind to make his sword cursed by any widow. Now being in the campe, while each talke seemed iniurious, which did not acknowledge some duety to the fame of Amphialus, it fell out somtimes in cõmunication, that as the speech of heauen doth often beget the mentiõ of hell, so the admirable proweſſe of Amphialus (by a cõtrary) brought forth the remembrance of the cowardise of Clinias: in so much, as it grew almost to a prouerbe, As very a coward, as Clinias. Describing him in such sort, that in the end, Dametas began to thinke with himselfe, that if he made a chalenge vnto him, hee would neuer answer it; and that then he should greatly encrease the fauourable conceite of Basilius. This fancie of his he vttered to a yong Gentleman, that waited vpon Philanax, in whose friendship he had especiall confidence, because he haunted his company, laughing often merily at his speeches, and not a little extolling the goodly dotes of Mopsa. The young Gentleman as glad as if he had found a Hare sitting, egd him on, breaking the matter with Philanax, and then (for feare the humour should quaile in him) wrote a challenge himselfe for Dametas, and brought it to him. But when Dametas read it, putting his head on his shoulder, and somwhat smiling; he sayd, it was prettie indeed; but that it had not a loftie stile enough: and so would needes indite it in this sort.

O Clinias, thou Clinias, the wickedest worme that euer went vpon two legs; the very fritter of fraud, and seething pot of iniquitie: I Dametas, chiefe gouernour of all the royall cattell, and also of Pamela (whom thy Maister most perniciously hath suggested out of my dominion) do defie thee, in a mortall affray from the bodkin to the pike vpward. Which if thou doost presume to take in hand, I will out of that superfluous bodie of thine make thy soule to be euacuated.

The young Gentleman seemed dumbe-striken with admiration, and presently tooke vpon him to bee the bearer thereof, while the heate of the fit lasted, and hauing gotten leaue of Basilius (euery body helping on, to ease his mind ouercharged with melancholy) hee went into the towne according to the manner before time vsed, and in the presence of Amphialus deliuered this letter to Clinias; desiring to haue an answere, which might be fit for his reputation. Clinias opened it, read it; and in the reading, his bloud not daring to be in so daungerous a place, went out of his face, and hid it selfe more inwardly: and his very words (as if they were afraide of blowes) came very slowly out of his mouth: but, aswell as his panting breath would vtter it, he bad him tell the lowte that sent him, that hee disdained to haue any thing to do with him. But Amphialus, perceiuing the matter, tooke him aside, and very earnestly dealt with him not to shame himselfe; Amphialus only desirous to bring it to passe to make some sport to Philoclea, but not being able to perswade with him, Amphialus licenced the Gentleman, telling him, that by next morning he should haue answer.

The yong Gentleman (sory he had sped no better) returned to Dametas, who had fetched many a sower-breathed sigh, for feare Clinias would accept the chalenge. But when he perceiued by his trusty messenger, that this delay was in effect a denial, there being no disposition in him to accept it; then lo, Dametas began to speake his lowd voyce, to looke big, to march vp and downe, and in his march to lift his legges higher then he was wont, swearing by no meane deuotions, that the walles should not keepe the coward from him, but he would fetch him out of his cunnie-berrie: & then was hotter then euer to prouide himselfe of horse and armour, saying, hee would go to the Iland brauely addoubed, and shew himselfe to his charge Pamela. To this purpose many willing hands were about him, letting him haue reynes, pettrell, with the rest of the furniture, and very braue bases; but all comming from diuerse houses, neither in colour nor fashion, shewing any kinred one with another; but that liked Dametas the better: for that he thought would argue, that he was maister of many braue furnitures. Then gaue he order to a painter for his deuise; which was, a plowe with the oxen lewsed from it, a sword with a great number of armes and legges cut off; and lastly a great armie of pen and inke-hornes and bookes. Neither did he sticke to tell the secrete of his intent, which was, that hee had left off the plough, to do such bloudy deedes with his sword, as many inke-hornes and bookes should be employed about the historifying of them: and being asked, why he set no word vnto it, he said, that was indeed like the painter, that sayeth in his picture, Here is the dog, and there is the Hare: and with that he laughed so perfectly, as was great consolation to the beholders. Yet remembring, that Miso would not take it well at his returne, if he forgat his ducty to her, he caused in a border about to be written:

Miso mine owne pigsnie, thou shalt heare newes of Dametas.

Thus all things being condignely ordered, with an ill fauoured impatiencie he waited, vntill the next morning, that he might make a muster of himselfe in the Iland; often asking them that very diligently wayted vpon him, whether it were not pittie, that such a coward as Clinias, should set his runaway feete vpon the face of the earth?

But as he was by diuerse principall yong Gentlemen, to his no small glory, lifted vp on horsebacke, comes me a page of Amphialus, who with humble smiling reuerence deliuered a letter vnto him from Clinias: whom Amphialus had brought to this, first with perswasions (that for certaine, if he did accept the combat, Dametas would neuer dare to appeare, and that then the honour should be his) but principally threatning him, that if he refused it, he would turne him out of the town to be put to death for a traytor by Basilius: so as the present feare (euer to a coward moſt terrible) of being turned out of the towne, made him, though full vnwillingly, vndertake the other feare, wherein he had ſome ſhew of hope, that Dametas might hap either to be ſicke, or not to haue the courage to performe the matter. But when Dametas heard the name of Clinias, very aptly ſuſpecting what the matter might be, he bad the page carry backe his letter, like a naughty boy as he was: for he was in no humour, he told him, of reading letters. But Dametas is friend, firſt perſwading him, that for certaine it was ſome ſubmiſſion, tooke vpon him ſo much boldneſſe, as to open his letter, and to reade it alowd in this ſort.

Filthy driuell, vnworthy to haue thy name ſet in any letter by a ſouldiers hand written: could thy wretched heart thinke it was timerouſneſſe, that made Clinias ſuſpend a while his anſwer? No caitiffe, no: it was but as a Ram, which goes backe to returne with the greater force. Know therefore that thou ſhalt no ſooner appeare (appeare now if thou dareſt) I ſay thou ſhalt no ſooner appeare in the Iland (ô happy thou, if thou do not appeare) but that I will come vpon thee with all my force, and cut thee in peeces (marke, what I ſay) ioynt after ioynt, to the eternall terrour of all preſumptuous villaynes. Therefore looke what thou dooſt: for I tell thee, horrible ſmart, and paine ſhall be thy lot, if thou wilt needs be ſo foolish (I hauing giuen thee no ſuch cauſe) as to meete with me.

The terrible words Clinias vſed, hoping they would giue a cooling to the heate of Dametas-is courage: and ſo indeed they did, that he did grone to heare the thundring of thoſe threatnings. And when the Gentleman had ended the reading of them, Dametas told them, that in his opinion he thought this anſwer came too late, and that therefore he might very well go, and diſarme himſelfe: eſpecially conſidering, the other had in curteous maner warned him not to come. But they (hauing him now on horſebacke) led him vnto the ferry, and ſo into the Iland; the claſhing of his owne armour ſtriking miſerable feare into him, and in his mind thinking great vnkindneſſe in his friend, that he had brought him to a matter ſo contrary to his complexion. There ſtayed he but a little (the Gentlemen that came with him teaching him how to vſe his ſword and Launce, while he caſt his eye about, to ſee which way he might run away, curſing all Ilands for being euill ſituated) whē Clinias with a braue ſound of trumpets landed at the other ende: who came all the way debating with himſelfe, what he had deſerued of Amphialus to driue him to thoſe inconueniences. Sometimes his witte made him bethinke himſelfe what was beſt to be done: but feare did ſo corrupt his witte, that whatſoeuer he thought was beſt, he ſtill found daunger therein; fearefulneſſe (contrarie to all other vices) making him thinke the better of another, the worſe he found himſelfe, rather imagining in himſelfe, what words he would vſe (if he were ouercome) to get his life of Dametas, then how to ouercome, whereof hee could thinke with no patience. But oftentimes looking to the earth pitifully complayning, that a man of ſuch ſufficiencie (as he thought himſelfe) ſhould in his beſt yeares be ſwallowed vp by ſo baſe an element. Faine he would haue prayed, but he had not hart inough to haue confidence in prayer, the glittering of the armour, and ſounding of the trumpets giuing ſuch an aſſault to the weake-breach of his falſe ſenſes, that hee grewe from the degree of feare to an amazement, not almoſt to know what he did; till two iudges (choſen for the purpoſe) making the trumpets ceaſe, and taking the oath of thoſe champions, that they came without guile or witchcraft, ſet them at wonted diſtance, one from the other.

Then the trumpets ſounding, Dametas horſe (vſed to ſuch cauſes) when hee thought leaſt of the matter, ſtarted out ſo luſtily, that Dametas was iogd backe with head and body, and pulling withall his bridle-hand, the horſe (that was tender of mouth) made halfe a ſtop, and fell to bounding, ſo that Dametas threw away his Launce, and with both his hands held by the pummell: the horſe, halfe running, halfe leaping, till he met with Clinias: who fearing he ſhould miſſe his reſt, had put his ſtaffe therein before he began his careere: neither would he then haue begun, but that at the trumpets warning, one (that ſtood behind) ſtrake on his horſe, who running ſwiftly, the wind tooke ſuch hold of his ſtaffe, that it croſt quite ouer his breaſt, and in that ſort gaue a flat baſtonado to Dametas: who, halfe out of his ſadle, went neere to his old occupation of digging the earth, but with the creſt of his helmet. Clinias when he was paſt him, not knowing what he had done, but fearing leaſt Dametas were at his backe turned with a wide turne; and ſeeing him on the ground, he thought then was his time, or neuer, to treade him vnder his horſes feete; and withall (if he could) hurt him with his Launce, which had not broken, the encounter was ſo eaſy. But putting forth his horſe, what with the falling of the ſtaffe too low before the legs of the horſe, & the comming vpon Dametas, who was then ſcrambling vp, the horſe fell ouer and ouer, and lay vpon Clinias. Which Dametas (who was gotten vp) perceiuing, drew out his ſword, prying which way he might beſt come to kill Clinias behind. But the horſe that lay vpon him, kept ſuch a pawing with his feete, that Dametas durſt not approch, but very leyſurely; ſo as the horſe (being luſtie) gat vp, & withall fel to ſtrike, and leape, that Dametas ſtarted backe a good way, and gaue Clinias time to riſe, but ſo bruiſed in body, and broken in heart, that he meant to yeeld himſelfe to mercy: and with that intent drew out his ſword, intending when he came nearer, to preſent the pommell of it to Dametas. But Dametas, when he ſaw him come with his ſword drawne, nothing conceiuing of any ſuch intent, went back as faſt as his backe and heeles coūld leade him. But as Clinias found that, he began to thinke a poſſibility in the victory, and therefore followed with the cruell haſt of a preuailing coward; laying vpon Dametas, who did nothing but cry out to him to hold his hand: ſometimes that he was dead, ſometimes that he would complaine to Baſilius: but ſtill bare the blowes vngratefully, going backe, till at length he came into the water with one of his feete.

But then a new feare of drowning tooke him, ſo that not daring to go backe, nor to deliberat (the blowes ſtill ſo lighted on him) nor to yeeld (becauſe of the cruell threatnings of Clinias) feare being come to the extremity, fell to a madneſſe of deſpaire: ſo that (winking as hard as euer he could) he began to deale ſome blowes, and his arme (being vſed to a flaile in his youth) layd them on ſo thicke, that Clinias now began with lamentable eyes to ſee his owne bloud come out in many places, and before he had loſt halfe an ounce, finding in himſelfe that he fainted, cried out aloud to Dametas, that he yeelded. Throw away thy ſword then (ſayd Dametas) and I will ſaue thee; but ſtill laying on, as faſt as he could. Clinias ſtraight obeyed, & humbly craued mercy, telling him, his ſword was gone. Then Dametas firſt opened his eyes, and ſeeing him indeed vnweaponed, made him ſtand a good way off from it; and then willed him to lie downe vpon the earth as flat as he could. Clinias obeyed; and Dametas (who neuer could thinke himſelfe ſafe, till Clinias were dead) began to thinke with himſelfe, that if he ſtrake at him with his ſword, if he did not kill him at the firſt blow, that then Clinias might happe to ariſe, and reuenge himſelfe. Therefore he thought beſt to kneele downe vpon him, and with a great whittle hee had hauing disarmed his head) to cut his throate, which he had vsed so with Calues, as he had no small dexteritie in it. But while he sought for his knife, which vnder his armour he could not well find out, and that Clinias lay with so sleepish a quietnesse, as if he would haue beene glad to haue his throate cut for feare of more paine, the Iudges came in, and tooke Dametas from off him, telling him he did against the law of Armes, hauing promised life, if he threw away his sword. Dametas was loath to consent, till they sware, they would not suffer him to fight any more, when he was vp: and then more forced, then perswaded, he let him rise, crowing ouer him, and warning him to take heede how he dealt any more with any that came of his fathers kinred. But thus this combat of cowardes being finished, Dametas was with much mirth and melody receiued into the campe as victorious, neuer a Page there failing to waite vpon this Triumph.

But Clinias though he wanted hart to preuent shame, yet he wanted not wit to feele shame; not so much repining at it for the abhorring of shame, as for the discommodities that to them that are shamed, ensue. For well he deemed, it would be a great barre to his practise, and a pulling on of iniuries, when men needed not care, how they vsed him. Insomuch, that Clinias (finding himselfe the scorning-stocke of euery company) fell with repining to hate the cause thereof; and hate in a cowards hart, could set it selfe no other limites, but death. Which purpose was well egged on by representing vnto himselfe, what danger he lately was in; which still kept no lesse ougly figure in his mind, then when it was present: and quickly (euen in his dissembling countenance) might be discerned a concealed grudge. For though he forced in himselfe a farre more diligent officiousnesse toward Amphialus, then euer before, yet a leering eye vpon the one side at him, a countenance still framed to smiling before him (how little cause soeuer there was of smiling) and grombling behind him, at any of his commandements, with an vncertaine manner of behauiour: his words comming out, though full of flatterie, yet slowly, and hoarcely pronounced, might well haue blazed, what armes his false hart bare. But despised: because of his cowardlinesse, and not marked, because despised, he had the freer scope of practise. Which he did the more desperately enter into, because the daily dangers Amphialus did submitte himselfe vnto, made Clinias assuredly looke for his ouerthrow, and for his owne consequently, if he did not redeeme his former treason to Basilius, with a more treasonable falshood toward Amphialus. His chiefe care therefore was, to find out among all sorts of the Amphialians, whom either like feare, tediousnesse of the siege, or discontentment of some vnsatisfied ambition would make apt to dig in the same mine that he did: and some already of welthy weary folkes, and vnconstant youths (who had not found such sudden successe as they had promised themselues) he had made stoupe to his lure. But of none he made so good accoũt as of Artesia, sister to the late slaine Ismenus, & the chiefe of the sixe maides, who had trained out the Princesses to their banket of miserie: so much did the sharpnesse of her wit counteruaile (as he thought) any other defects of her sex: for she had vndertaken that dangerous practise by the perswasion of Cecropia, who assured her that the two Princesses should be made away; and then Amphialus would marry her: which she was the apter to beleeue, by some false perswasion her glasse had giuen her of her owne incomparable excellencies, and by the great fauour she knew he bare to her brother Ismenus, which (like a self-flattering woman) she conceiued was done for her sake. But when she had atchieued her attempt, & that she found the Princesses were so far from their intended death, as that the one of thẽ was like to be her soueraigne, and that neither her ſeruice had won of Amphialus much more then ordinary fauor, nor her ouer large offring her ſelfe to a mind otherwiſe owed, had obtained a looked-for acceptation; diſdaine to be diſdained ſpite of a fruſtrate hope, and perchance vnquenched luſt-growne rage, made her vnquiet thoughts find no other reſt, but malice: which was increaſed by the death of her brother, whom ſhe iudged neither ſuccoured againſt Philanax, nor reuenged vpon Philanax. But all theſe coles were well blowne by the company ſhe eſpecially kept with Zelmane all this time of her impriſonment. For finding her preſence vncheerfull to the mourning Philoclea, and condemned of the hie harted Pamela, ſhe ſpent her time moſt with Zelmane. Who though at the firſt hardly brooking the inſtrument of their miſerie, learning cunning in the ſchoole of aduerſitie, in time framed her ſelfe to yeeld her acceptable entertainment. For Zelmane, when ſhee had by that vnexpected miſchiefe her body impriſoned, he valure ouer maiſtred, her wit beguiled, her deſires barred, her loue eclipſed; aſſured of euil, fearing worſe, able to know Philocleas misfortune, & not able to ſuccour her, ſhe was a great while, before the greatneſſe of her hart could deſcend to ſorow, but rather roſe boyling vp in ſpite and diſdaine; Reaſon hardly making Courage beleeue, that it was diſtreſſed: but as if the walles would be afraid of her, ſo would her lookes ſhoote out threatning vpon them. But the ſetters of ſeruitude (growing heauier with wearing) made her feele her caſe, and the little preuailing of repining: & then griefe gate a ſeate in her ſoftned mind, making ſweetneſſe of paſſed comforts by due title claime teares of preſent diſcomforts: and ſince her fortune made her able to helpe as little as any body, yet to be able to waile as much as any body; ſolitarie Sorrow, with a continuall circle in her ſelfe, going out at her owne mouth, to come in againe at her owne eares. Then was the name of Philoclea graued in the glaſſe windowes, and by the fooliſh idolatrie of affection, no ſooner written, then adored; and no ſooner adored, then pitied: all the wonted praiſes (ſhe was wont to giue vnto her) being now but figures of rhetorike to amplifie the iniuries of misfortune; againſt which being alone, ſhe would often make inuectiue declamations, methodized only by raging ſorrow.

But when Arteſia did inſinuate her ſelfe into her acquaintance, ſhe gaue the gouernment of her courage to wit, and was content to familiarize her ſelfe with her: ſo much the rather, as that ſhe perceiued in her certaine flawes of il-concealed diſcontentment. Inſomuch that whē Zelmane wold ſweeten her mouth with the praiſes of the ſiſters, eſpecially ſetting forth their noble gratefulnes in neuer forgetting welintended ſeruices, & inuoking the iuſtice of the gods, not to ſuffer ſuch treaſures to be wrongfully hidden, & ſomtimes with a kind vnkindnes, charging Arteſia that ſhe had bin abuſed to abuſe ſo worthy perſons: Arteſia (though falſly) would proteſt, that ſhe had bin beguiled in it, neuer meaning other matter then recreation: & yet withal (by alleaging how vngratefully ſhe was dealt with) it was eaſie to be ſeene, it was the vnrewarding, and not the euill employing her ſeruice, which grieued her. But Zelmane (vſing her own bias to bowle neer the miſtreſſe of her own thoughts) was content to lend her beleefe, and withall, to magnifie her deſert, if willingly ſhe would deliuer, whom vnwillingly ſhee had impriſoned; leauing no argument which might tickle ambition, or flatter reuenge. So that Arteſia (puſht forward by Clinias and drawne onward by Zelmane) bound her ſelfe to that practiſe; wherein Zelmane (for her part) deſired no more, but to haue armour and weapons brought into her chamber, not doubting therewith to performe any thing, how impoſſible ſoeuer, which longing Loue can perſwade, and inuincible Valour dare promiſe.

But

But Clinias (whose faith could neuer comprehend the misteries of courage) perswaded Artesia while he by corruption had drawne the guard of one gate, to open it (when he would appoint the time) to the enemy: that she should impoyson Amphialus, which she might the easier do, because she herselfe had vsed to make the broaths, when Amphialus (either wearied or wounded) did vse such diet. And all things already were ready to bee put in execution, when they thought best to breake the matter with the two excellent sisters, not doubting of their consent in a thing so behoofefull to themselues: their reasons being, that the Princesses knowing their seruice, might be sure to preserue them from the fury of the entring soldiers: whereof Clinias (euen so) could scarcely be sufficiently certaine: and withall, making them priuie to their action, to bind them afterwards to a promised gratefulnesse towards them. They went therefore at one time, when they knew them to be alone, Clinias to Philoclea, and Artesia to Pamela: and Clinias, with no fewe words, did set foorth what an exploite was intended for her seruice. But Philoclea (in whose cleere mind treason could find no hiding place) told him, that she would be glad, if he could perswade her cosin to deliuer her, and that she would neuer forget his seruice therein: but that she desired him to lay downe any such way of mischiefe, for that (for her part) she would rather yeeld to perpetuall imprisonment, then consent to the destroying her cosin, who (she knew) loued her, though wronged her. This vnlooked for answere amazed Clinias, so that he had no other remedy in his mind, but to kneele downe to Philoclea, and beseech her to keepe it secret, considering that the intention was for her seruice: and vowing (since she misliked it) to proceed no further therein, she comforted him with promise of silence, which she performed.

But that little auayled: for Artesia hauing in like sort opened this deuice to Pamela, she (in whose mind Vertue gouerned with the scepter of Knowledge) hating so horrible a wickednesse, and streight iudging what was fit to doo; Wicked woman (sayd she) whose vnrepenting heart can find no way to amend treason, but by treason: now the time is come, that thy wretched wiles haue caught thy selfe in thine owne nette: as for me, let the Gods dispose of me as shall please them; but sure it shall be no such way, nor way-leader, by which I will come to liberty. This she spake something with a lowder voyce then she was wont to vse, so as Cecropia heard the noise; who was (sooner then Artesia imagined she would) come vp, to bring Pamela to a window, where she might see a notable skirmish happened in the Campe, as she thought, among themselues: and being a cunning fisher in troubled waters, streight found by their voyces and gestures, there was some matter of consequence, which she desired Pamela to tell her. Aske of her (sayd Pamela) and learne to know, that who do falshood to their superiours, teach falshood to their inferiours. More she would not say. But Cecropia taking away the each-way guilty Artesia, with feare of torture, gat of her the whole practise: so as Zelmane was the more closely imprisoned, and Clinias (with the rest of his corrupted mates, according to their merites) executed: For, as for Artesia, she was but lockt vp in her chamber, Amphialus not consenting (for the loue he bare to Ismenus) that further punishment should be layd vpon her.

But the noise they heard in the campe, was occasion of the famous Prince Anaxius, nephew to the Gyant Euardes whom Pyrocles slue: A Prince, of body exceedingly strong; in armes so skilfull and fortunate, as no man was thought to excell him; of courage that knew not howe to feare: parts worthie praise, if they had not beene guided by pride, and followed by vniuſtice. For by a ſtrange compoſition of mind, there was no man more tenderly ſenſible in any thing offered to himſelfe, which in the fartheſt-fet conſtruction, might be wreſted to the name of wrong; no man, that in his owne actions could worſe diſtinguiſh betweene Valour and Violence: So proud, as he could not abſtaine from a Thraſo-like boaſting, and yet (ſo vnluckie a lodging his vertues had gotten) he would neuer boaſt more then he would accompliſh: falſly accounting an vnflexible anger, a couragious conſtancie: eſteeming feare, and aſtoniſhment, righter cauſes of admiration, then Loue and Honour. This man had foure ſundrie times fought with Amphialus, but Mars had bene ſo vnpartiall an arbiter, that neither ſide gatte aduantage of the other. But in the end it happned, that Anaxius found Amphialus (vnknowne) in a great danger, and ſaued his life: whereupon (louing his owne benefit) began to fauour him, ſo much the more as thinking ſo well of himſelfe, he could not chooſe but like him, whom he found a match for himſelfe: which at laſt grew to as much friendſhippe towards him, as could by a proud heart be conceiued. So as in this trauell (ſeeking Pyrocles to be reuenged of his vncles death) hearing of this ſiege, neuer taking paines to examine the quarrell (like a man whoſe will was his God, and his hand his lawe, taking with him his two brothers (men accounted little inferiour to himſelfe in martiall matters) and two hundred choſen horſemen (with whom hee thought himſelfe able to conquere the world) yet commaunding the reſt of his forces to follow, he himſelfe vpon ſuch an vnexpected ſuddenneſſe entred in vpon the backe of Baſilius, that many with great vnkindneſſe tooke their death, not knowing why, nor how they were ſo murdred. There, if euer, did he make knowne the wonderfulneſſe of his force. But the valiant, and faithfull Philanax, with well gouerned ſpeed made ſuch head againſt him, as would haue ſhewed, how ſoone Courage falles in the ditch which hath not the eye of Wiſedom: but that Amphialus at the ſame time iſſued out, and winning with an abundance of courage one of the ſconſes, which Baſilius had builded, made way for his friend Anaxius with great loſſe of both ſides, but eſpecially of the Baſilians; ſuch notable monuments had thoſe two ſwords eſpecially left of their Maiſters redoubted worthineſſe.

There with the reſpect fit to his eſtate, the honour due to his worthineſſe, and the kindneſſe which accompanies friendſhip (made faſt by enterchaunged benefits) did Amphialus enforce himſelfe (as much as in a beſieged towne he could) to make Anaxius know, that his ſuccour was not ſo needefull, as his preſence gratefull. For cauſing the ſtreetes and houſes of the towne to witneſſe his welcome (making both ſouldiers and Magiſtrates in their countenances to ſhew their gladneſſe of him) hee led him to his mother, whom hee beſought to entertaine him with no leſſe loue and kindneſſe, then as one, who once had ſaued her ſonnes life, and now came to ſaue both life and honour. Tuſh (ſayd Anaxius, ſpeaking alowde, looking vpon his brothers) I am onely ſorie there are not halfe a dozen Kings more about you: that what Anaxius can do, might be the better manifeſted. His brothers ſmiled, as thogh he had ouer-modeſtly ſpoken farre vnderneath the pitch of his power. Then was he diſarmed at the earneſt requeſt of Amphialus: for Anaxius boiled with deſire to iſſue out vpon the enemies, perſwading himſelfe, that the Sun ſhould not be ſet, before he had ouerthrowne them. And hauing repoſed himſelfe, Amphialus asked him, whether he would viſite the yong Princeſſes. But Anaxius whiſpered him in the eare: In trueth (ſayd hee) deare friend Amphialus, though I am none of thoſe, that loue to ſpeake of themſelues, I neuer came yet in companie of Ladies, but that they fell in loue with me. And I that in my hart scorne them as a peeuish paltry sexe, not worthie to communicate with my vertues, would not doo you the wrong: since (as I heare) you do debase your selfe so much as to affect them. The curteous Amphialus could haue beene angry with him for those words; but knowing his humour, suffered him to daunce to his owne musicke: and gaue himselfe to entertaine both him and his brothers, with as cheerefull a manner, as could issue from a mind whom vnluckie loue had filled with melancholie. For to Anaxius he yeelded the direction of all. He gaue the watchword, and if any grace were graunted, the meanes were to be made to Anaxius. And that night when supper was ended, wherein Amphialus would needes himselfe waite vpon him, he caused in Boates vpon the Lake an excellent musicke to be ordered: which, though Anaxius might conceiue was for his honour, yet indeede he was but the Bricke-wall to conuey it to the eares of the beloued Philoclea.

The musicke was of Cornets, whereof one aunswering the other, with a sweete emulation, striuing for the glorie of musicke, and striking vpon the smooth face of the quiet Lake, was then deliuered vp to the castle walles, which with a proude reuerberation, spreading it into the aire; it seemed before the harmonie came to the eare, that it had enriched it selfe in trauaile, the nature of those places adding melodie to that melodious instrument. And when a while that instrument had made a braue proclamation to all vnpossessed mindes of attention, an excellent consort streight followed of fiue Violles, and as many voyces; which all being but Oratours of their maisters passions, bestowed this song vpon her, that thought vpon another matter.

THe Fire to see my wrongs for anger burneth:
The Aire in raine for my affliction weepeth:
The Sea to ebbe for griefe his flowing turneth:
The Earth with pittie dul his center keepeth:
Fame is with wonder blazed:
Time runnes away for sorrow:
Place standeth still amazed,
To see my night of euils, which hath no morrow.
Alas all only she no pittie taketh
To know my miseries, but chaste and cruell
My fall her glory maketh;
Yet still her eyes giue to my flames their fuell,
Fire, burne me quite till sense of burning leaue me:
Aire, let me draw thy breath no more in anguish:
Sea, drown'd in thee of tedious life bereaue me:
Earth, take this earth wherein my spirits languish.
Fame, say I was not borne:
Time, hast my dying hower:
Place, see my graue vptorne:
Fire, aire, sea, earth, fame, time, place shew your power.
Alas from all their helpes I am exiled:
For hers am I, and Death feares her displeasure.
Fie Death thou art beguiled:
Though I be hers, she makes of me no treasure.

But Anaxius (ſeeming awearie before it was ended) told Amphialus, that for his parthe liked no muſick, but the neighing of horſes, the ſound of trumpets, and the cries of yeelding perſons: and therefore deſired, that the next morning they ſhould iſſue vpon the ſame place, where they had entred that day, not doubting to make them quickly aweary of being the beſiegers of Anaxius. Amphialus, who had no whit leſſe courage, though nothing blowne vp with pride, willingly condiſcended, & ſo the next morning (giuing falſe alarum to the other ſide of the campe) Amphialus at Anaxius earneſt requeſt, ſtaying within the towne to ſee it garded, Anaxius and his brethrē, Lycurgus, and Zoilus, ſallied out with the beſt choſen men. But Baſilius (hauing bin the laſt day ſomwhat vnprouided) now had better fortified the ouerthrowne ſconſe; and ſo well had prepared euery thing for defence, that it was impoſſible for any valour from within, to preuaile. Yet things were performed by Anaxius beyond the credite of the credulous. For thriſe (valiantly followed by his brothers) did he ſet vp his banner vpon the rampire of the enemy: though thriſe againe by the multitude, and aduantage of the place, but eſpecially by the comming of three valiant Knights, he were driuen downe againe. Numbers there were that day, whoſe deathes and ouerthrowes were excuſed by the well knowne ſword of Anaxius: but the reſt, by the length of time & iniury of Hiſtorians, haue bin wrapped vp in darke forgetfulneſſe: only Treſſennius is ſpoken of, becauſe when all abandoned the place, he only made head to Anaxius; till hauing loſt one of his legs, yet not loſt the hart of fighting, Lycurgus (ſecond brother to Anaxius) cruellie murthered him; Anaxius himſelfe diſdayning any further to deale with him.

But ſo far had Anaxius at the third time preuailed, that now the Baſilians began to let their courage deſcend to their feete, Baſilius, & Philanax in vaine ſtriuing with reuerence of authority to bridle the flight of aſtoniſhment, and to teach Feare diſcretion: ſo that Amphialus, ſeeing Victory ſhew ſuch a flattering countenance to him, came out with all his force; hoping that day to end the ſiege.

But that fancie altered quickelie by the ſudden comming to the other ſide of three Knights, whereof the one was in white armour, the other in greene, and the third by his blacke armour and deuice ſtreight knowne to be the notable Knight, who the firſt day had giuen Fortune ſo ſhort a ſtoppe with his notable deedes and fighting hand to hand the deemed inuincible Amphialus. For the very cowards no ſooner ſaw him, but as borrowing ſome of his ſpirit, they went like young Eagles to the pray, vnder the wing of their damme. For the three aduenturers, not content to keepe them from their rampire, leapt downe among them, and entered into a braue combate with the three valiant brothers. But to whether ſide Fortune would haue beene partiall, could not be determined. For the Baſilians, lightened with the beames of theſe ſtrangers valure, followed ſo thicke, that the Amphialians were glad with ſome haſt to retire to the walles-ward: though Anaxius neither reaſon, feare nor example, could make him aſſwage the furie of his fight: vntill one of the Baſilians (vnworthy to haue his name regiſtred, ſince hee did it cowardly, ſideward, when he leaſt looked that way) almoſt cut off one of his legges: ſo as he fell downe, blaſpheming heauen, that all the influences thereof had power to ouerthrow him, and there death would haue ſeazed of his proud hart, but that Amphialus tooke in hand the blacke knight, while ſome of his ſouldiers conueied away Anaxius, ſo requiting life for life vnto him.

And for the loue and example of Amphialus, the fight began to enter into a new fitte of heate: when Baſilius (that thought inough to bee done for that day) cauſed

retraite to be sounded; fearing least his men following ouer-earnestly, might be the losse of those excellent Knights whom he desired to know. The knights as soone as they heard the retraite (though they were eagerly set, knowing that courage without discipline is nearer beastlinesse then manhood) drew backe their swords, though hungrie of more bloud: especially the blacke knight, who knowing Amphialus could not refraine to tell him, that this was the second time he escaped out of his hands, but that he would shortly bring him a bill of all the former accounts. Amphialus, seeing it fit to retire also (most of his people being hurt, both in bodies and harts) withdrew himselfe, with so well seated a resolution, that it was as far from anger, as from dismayednesse; answering no other to the blacke knights threats, but that when hee brought him his account, he should find a good pay-maister.

The fight being ceassed, and each side withdrawne within their strengths, Basilius sent Philanax to entertaine the strange knights, and to bring them vnto him, that he might acknowledge what honor was due to their vertue. But they excused thēselues, desiring to be knowne first by their deeds, before their names shold accuse their vnworthinesse: and though the other replied according as they deserued, yet (finding that vnwelcome curtesie is a degree of iniury) he suffered them to retire thēselues to a tent of their owne without the campe, where they kept themselues secret: Philanax himselfe being called away to another strange knight; strange not only by the vnlookedfornesse of his comming, but by the strange maner of his comming.

For he had before him foure damosels, & so many behind him, all vpon palfrayes and all apparelled in mourning weeds; each of them a seruant of each side, with like liueries of sorrow. Himselfe in an armour, all painted ouer with such a cunning of shadow, that it represented a gaping sepulcher, the furniture of his horse was all of Cypresse braunches: wherewith in olde time they were wont to dresse graues. His Bases (which he ware so long, as they came almost to his ankle) were embrodered onely with blacke wormes, which seemed to crawle vp and downe, as ready alreadie to deuoure him. In his shield for Impresa, he had a beautifull child, but hauing two heads; whereon the one shewed, that it was already dead: the other aliue, but in that case, necessarily looking for death. The word was, No way to be rid from death, but by death.

This Knight of the tombe (for so the souldiers termed him) sent to Basilius to demaund leaue to send in a damosell into the towne, to call out Amphialus, according as before time some others had done. Which being graunted (as glad any would vndertake the charge, which no bodie else in that campe was knowne willing to do) the damosell went in, & hauing with teares sobbed out a braue chalenge to Amphialus, from the knight of the Tombe, Amphialus, honourably entertaining the Gentlewoman and desiring to know the knights name (which the dolefull Gentlewoman would not discouer) accepted the chalenge, onely desiring the Gentlewoman to say thus much to the straunge knight from him, that if his mind were like to his title, there were more cause of affinity, then enemie betweene them. And therefore presently (according as he was wont) as soone as he perceiued the knight of the Tombe, with his Damosels and Iudge, was come into the Iland, hee also went ouer in accustomed maner: and yet for the curtesie of his nature, desired to speake with him.

But the Knight of the Tombe, with silence, and drawing his horse backe, shewed no will to heare, nor speake: but with Launce on thigh, made him knowe, it was fitte for him to go to the other ende of the Career, whence wayting the start of the vnknowne Knight,he likewiſe made his ſpurres claime haſte of his horſe. But when his ſtaffe was in his reſt, comming downe to meete with the Knight, now verie neere him, he perceiued the Knight had miſt his reſt: wherefore the curteous Amphialus would not let his Launce deſcend, but with a gallant grace, ran ouer the head of his therein friended enemie: and hauing ſtopped his horſe, and with the turning of him, bleſſed his ſight with the Window where hee thought Philoclea might ſtand, he perceiued the knight had lighted from his horſe, and throwne away his ſtaffe,angrie with his misfortune,as of hauing miſt his reſt, and drawne his ſword to make that ſupply his fellowes fault. He alſo lighted, and drew his ſword, eſteeming victorie with aduantage,rather robbed then purchaſed: and ſo the other comming eagerly toward him; he with his ſhield out,and ſword aloft, with more brauerie then anger,drew vnto him;and ſtraight made their ſwords ſpeake for them a pretie-while with equall fierceneſſe. But Amphialus (to whom the earth brought foorth few matches) hauing both much more skill to chooſe the places, and more force to worke vpon the choſen, had already made many windowes in his armour for death to come in at; when in the nobleneſſe of his nature abhorring to make the puniſhment ouergo the offence, he ſtept a little backe,and withall, Sir knight(ſaid he)you may eaſily ſee,that it pleaſeth God to fauour my cauſe; employ your valour againſt them that with you hurt: for my part,I haue not deſerued hate of you. Thou lyeſt falſe traytor,ſayd the other,with an angry, but weake voyce. But Amphialus, in whom abuſed kindneſſe became ſpitefull rage, Ah barbarous wretch(ſayd he)onely couragious in diſcurteſie; thou ſhalt ſoone ſee whether thy tongue hath betrayed the hart, or no: and with that redoubling his blowes, gaue him a great wound vpon his necke,and cloſing with him ouerthrew him, & in the fall thruſt him mortally into the body:and with that went to pul off his helmet,with intention to make him giue himſelfe the lie,for hauing ſo ſayd,or to cut off his head.

But the head-peece was no ſooner off, but that there fell about the ſhoulders of the ouercome knight the treaſure of faire golden haire, which with the face (ſoone knowne by the badge of excellency)witneſſed that it was Parthenia,the vnfortunatelie vertuous wife of Argalus; her beauty then euen in deſpight of the paſſed ſorrow, or comming death,aſſuring all beholders, that it was nothing ſhort of perfection. For her exceeding faire eyes,hauing with continuall weeping gotten a litle redneſſe about them;her roundy ſweetly ſwelling lips a litle trembling,as though they kiſſed their neighbor death;in her cheeks the whiteneſſe ſtriuing by litle & litle to get vpõ the roſineſſe of them, her necke,a neck indeed of Alablaſter,diſplaying the wound, which with moſt daintie bloud laboured to drowne his owne beauties; ſo as here was a riuer of pureſt red,there an Iland of perfitteſt white,each giuing luſtre to the other;with the ſweete countenance (God knowes) full of an vnaffected languiſhing: though theſe things to a groſly conceiuing ſenſe might ſeeme diſgraces,yet indeed were they but apparelling beautie in a new faſhion,which al looked-vpon thorough the ſpectacles of pittie,did euen encreaſe the lines of her naturall fairenes,ſo as Amphialus was aſtoniſhed with griefe,compaſſion,and ſhame,deteſting his fortune,that made him vnfortunate in victory.

Therefore, putting off his headpeece and gauntlet, kneeling downe vnto her, and with teares teſtifying his ſorrow,he offred his (by himſelfe accurſed) hands to helpe her:proteſting his life and power to be ready to doe her honour. But Parthenia(who had inward meſſengers of the deſired deathes approch) looking vpon him and ſtreight turning away her feeble ſight, as from a delightleſſe obiect, drawing out her words, which her breath (loath to depart from so sweet a body) did faintly deliuer, Sir (sayd she) I pray you (if praiers haue place in enemies) to let my maides take my body vntouched by you: the only honour I now desire by your meanes, is, that I haue no honor of you. Argalus made no such bargaine with you, that the hands which killed him, should helpe me. I haue of them (and I do not only pardon you, but thanke you for it) the seruice which I desired. There rests nothing now, but that I go liue with him, since whose death I haue done nothing but die. Then pawsing, and a litle fainting, and againe comming to her selfe, ô sweete life, well come (sayd she) now feele I the bands vntied of the cruell death, which so long hath held me. And ô life, ô death, answer for mee, that my thoughts haue not so much as in a dreame tasted any comfort; since they were depriued of Argalus. I come, my Argalus, I come: And, ô God hide my faults in thy mercies, and graunt (as I feele thou dost graunt) that in thy eternall loue, we may loue each other eternally. And this ô Lord: But there Atropos cut off her sentence: for with that, casting vp both eyes and hands to the skies, the noble soule departed (one might well assure himselfe) to heauen, which lift the body in so heauenly a demeanure.

But Amphialus (with a hart oppressed with griefe, because of her request) withdrew himselfe, but the Iudges, as full of pity, had bene all this while disarming her, and her gentlewomen with lamentable cries, labouring to stanch the remediless wounds: and a while she was dead before they perceiued it; death being able to diuide the soule, but not the beauty from that body. But when the infallible tokens of death assured them of their losse, one of the women would haue killed her selfe, but that the squire of Amphialus perceiuing, by force held her. Others that had as strong passion, though weaker resolution, fell to cast dust vpon their heads, to teare their garments: all falling vpon the earth & crying vpon their sweet mistres; as if their cries could perswade the soule to leaue the celestiall happinesse, to come againe into the elements of sorrow: one time calling to remembrance her vertue, chastnesse, sweetnesse, goodnes to them: another time accursing thēselues, that they had obeyed her, they hauing bene deceiued by her words, who assured them, that it was reuealed vnto her, that she should haue her harts desire in the battell against Amphialus, which they wrongly vnderstood. Then kissing her cold hands and feete, wearie of the world, since she was gone, who was their world, the verie heauens seemed with a cloudie countenance, to loure at the losse, and Fame it selfe (though by nature glad to tell such rare accidents, yet) could not choose but deliuer it in lamentable accents, & in such sort went it quickly all ouer the Campe: &, as if the aire had bene infected with sorrow, no hart was so hard, but was as subiect to that contagion; the rarenesse of the accident, matching together (the rarely matched together) pittie with admiration, Basilius himselfe came forth, and brought the faire Gynecia with him, who was come into the campe vnder colour of visiting her husband; & hearing of her daughters: but indeed Zelmane was the Sainct, to which her pilgrimage was intended: cursing, enuying, blessing, and in her hart kissing the walles which imprisoned her. but both they with Philanax, & the rest of the principall Nobility, went out, to make Honour triumph ouer Death, conueying that excellent body (whereto Basilius himselfe would needs lend his shoulder) to a Church a mile from the Campe, where the valiant Argalus lay intombed; recommending to that sepulcher the blessed reliques of faithfull and vertuous Loue, giuing order for the making of the marble images, to represent them, and each way enriching the tombe; vpon which, Basilius himselfe caused this Epitaph to be written.

The Epitaph.

His being was in her alone:
And he not being, she was none.

They ioy'd one ioy, one griefe they grieu'd,
One loue they lou'd, one life they liu'd.
The hand was one, one was the sword
That did his death, her death afford.

As all the rest, so now the stone
That tombes the two, is iustly one.

ARGALVS & PARTHENIA.

Then with eyes full of teares, and mouthes full of her praises, returned they to the campe, with more and more hate against Amphialus: who (poore Gentleman) had therefore greater portion of woe then any of them. For that courteous heart, which would haue grieued but to haue heard the like aduenture, was rent with remembring himselfe to be the author: so that his wisdome could not so far temper his passion, but that he tooke his sword, counted the best in the world (which with much bloud he had once conquered of a mighty Giant) and brake it into many peeces (which afterwards he had good cause to repent) saying, that neither it was worthy to serue the noble exercise of chiualrie, nor any other worthy to feele that sword, which had stroken so excellent a Lady: and withall, banishing all cheerefulnesse of his countenance, he returned home. Where he gate him to his bed, not so much to rest his restlesse mind, as to auoid all company, the sight wherof was tedious vnto him. And then melancholy (only rich in vnfortunate remembrances) brought before him all the mishaps, with which his life had wrestled: taking this, not onely as a confirming of the former, but a presage of following miserie; and to his heart (already ouercome by sorrowfulnesse) euen trifling misfortunes came, to fill vp the rolle of a grieued memorie, labouring only his wits to pierce farther & farther into his owne wretchednesse. So as all that night (in despite of darknesse) he held his eyes open; and the morning when the delight began to restore to each boy his colour, then with curtaines bard he himselfe from the enioying of it: neither willing to feele the comfort of the day, nor the ease of the night: vntill his mother (who neuer knew what loue meant, but onely to himward) came to his bed side, and beginning with louing earnestnesse to lay a kind chiding vpon him, because he wold suffer the weaknesse of sorrow, to conquer the strength of his vertues; he did with a broken peecemeale speech (as if the tempest of passion vnorderly blew out his words) remember the mishaps of his youth, the euils he had bene cause of, his rebelling with shame, &

that ſhame increaſed with ſhamefull accidents, the deaths of Philoxenus & Parthenia, wherin he found himſelfe hated of the euer-ruling powers, but eſpecially (and ſo eſpecially, as the reſt ſeemed nothing when he came to that) his fatall loue to Philoclea: to whom he had ſo gouerned himſelfe, as one that could neither conquer, nor yeeld; being of the one ſide a ſlaue, and of the other iaylor: and withall, almoſt vpbrayding vnto his mother the little ſucceſſe of her large hoping promiſes, he in effect finding Philoclea nothing mollified, and now himſelfe ſo caſt downe, as hee thought him vnworthy of better. But his mother (as ſhe had plentifull cauſe) making him ſee, that of his other griefes there was litle or no fault in himſelfe, and therefore there ought to be little or no griefe in him; when ſhe came to the head of the ſore, indeed ſeeing that ſhe could no longer patch vp her former promiſes (he taking a deſperat deafneſſe to all delaying hopes) ſhe confeſt plainly, that ſhe could preuaile nothing: but the fault was his owne, who had marred the yong Girle by ſeeking to haue that by praier, which hee ſhould haue taken by authoritie. That as it were an abſurd cunning to make hie ladders to go in a plaine way; ſo was it an vntimely and fooliſh flattery, there to beſeech, where one might commaund, puffing them vp by being beſought, with ſuch a ſelfe-pride of ſuperiority, that it was not (forſooth) to be held out, but by a denial. O God (ſayd Amphialus) how well I thought my fortune would bring forth this end of your labors? aſſure your ſelfe, mother, I will ſooner pull out theſe eyes, thē they ſhall looke vpon the heauenly Philoclea, but as vpō a heauen, whence they haue their light, and to which they are ſubiect, if they wil powre downe any influences of cōfort, ō happy I: but if by the ſacrifice of a faithfull hart, they will not be called vnto me, let me languiſh, and wither with languiſhing, and grieue with withering, but neuer ſo much as repine with neuer ſo much grieuing. Mother, ō Mother, luſt may well be a tyrant, but true loue where it is indeed, it is a ſeruant. Accurſed more then I am, may I be, if euer I did approch her, but that I freezed aſmuch in a fearefull reuerence, as I burned in a vehement deſire. Did euer mans eye looke thorough loue vpon the maieſty of vertue, ſhining through beautie, but that he became (as it well became him) a captiue; and is it the ſtile of a captiue to write, Our will and pleaſure?

Tuſh, tuſh ſonne (ſaid Cecropia) if you ſay you loue, but withall you feare; you feare leaſt you ſhould offend; Offend? and how know you, that you ſhould offend? becauſe ſhe doth denie; Denie? now by my truth, if your ſadneſſe wold let me laugh, I could laugh hartily, to ſee that yet you are ignorant, that No, is no negatiue in a womans mouth. My ſonne, beleeue me, a woman, ſpeaking of women: a louers modeſty among vs is much more praiſed, then liked: or if we like it, ſo well we like it, that for marring of his modeſtie, he ſhal neuer proceed further. Each vertue hath his time: if you commaund your ſouldier to march formoſt, & he for curteſie put others before him, would you praiſe his modeſty? loue is your generall: he bids you dare: and will Amphialus be a daſtard? Let examples ſerue: do you thinke Theſeus ſhould euer haue gotten Antiope with ſighing and croſſing his armes? he rauiſhed her, and rauiſhed her that was an Amazon, and therefore had gotten a habite of ſtoutneſſe aboue the nature of a woman; but hauing rauiſhed her, he got a child of her. And I ſay no more, but that (they ſay) is not gotten with out conſent of both ſides. Iole had her owne father killed by Hercules, and her ſelfe rauiſhed, by force rauiſhed, and yet ere long this rauiſhed, and vnfathered Lady could ſportfully put on the Lions skin vpon her owne faire ſhoulders, and play with the club with her owne delicat hands: ſo eaſily had ſhe pardoned the rauiſher, that ſhe could not but delight in thoſe weapons of rauiſhing.

But aboue all, marke Helen daughter to Iupiter, who could neuer brooke her manerly-wooing Menelaus, but disdained his humblenesse, and lothed his softnes. But so well she could like the force of enforcing Paris, that for him she could abide what might be abidden. But what? Menelaus takes hart, he recouers her by force, by force carries her home, by force inioyes her; and she, who wold neuer like him for seruiceablenes, euer after loued him for violẽce. For what can be more agreeable, then vpon force to lay the fault of desire, & in one instant to ioyne a deare delight with a iust excuse or rather the true cause is (pardon me ô woman-kind for reuealing to mine own son the truth of this mistery) we thinke there wants fire, where we find no sparkles at least of fury. Truly I haue known a great Lady, long sought by most great, most wise, most beautiful, most valiãt persons; neuer won, because they did ouer-superstitiously sollicite her: the same Lady brought vnder by another, inferiour to all thẽ in all those qualities, only because he could vse that imperious maisterfulnes, which nature giues to men aboue women. For indeede (son, I confesse vnto you) in our very creation we are seruants: and who prayseth his seruants shall neuer be well obeyed: but as a ready horse streight yeelds, when he finds one that will haue him yeeld, the same fals to bounds when he feeles a fearful horsman. Awake thy spirits (good Amphialus) and assure thy selfe, that though she refuseth, she refuseth but to endeere the obtaining. If she weepe, and chide, and protest, before it be gotten, she can but weepe, and chide, and protest, when it is gotten. Thinke, she wold not striue, but that she meanes to trie thy force: and my Amphialus, know thy selfe a man, and shew thy selfe a man; and (beleeue me vpon my word) a woman is a woman.

Amphialus was about to answer her, when a Gentleman of his made him vnderstand, that there was a messenger come, who had brought a letter vnto him from out of the campe: whom he presently calling for, tooke, opened, and read the letter, importing this:

TO thee Amphialus of Arcadia, the forsaken Knight wisheth health, and courage, that by my hand thou maiest receiue punishment for thy treason, according to thine own offer, which wickedly occasioned, thou hast proudly begun, and accursedly maintained. I will presently (if thy mind faint thee not for his owne guiltinesse) meete thee in thy Iland in such order, as hath by the former beene vsed: or if thou likest not the time, place, or weapon, I am ready to take thine own reasonable choise in any of them: so as thou do performe the substance. Make me such answer as may shew that thou hast some taste of honour: and so I leaue thee, to liue till I meete thee.

Amphialus read it, and with a deepe sigh (according to the humour of inward affliction) seemed euen to condemne himselfe, as though indeed his reproches were true. But howsoeuer the dulnesse of Melancholy would haue languishingly yeelded thereunto, his Courage (vnused to such iniuries) desired helpe of Anger to make him this answer.

FOrsaken Knight, though your nameles challenge might carry in it selfe excuse for a man of my birth & estate, yet herein set your hart at rest, you shall not be forsaken. I wil without stay answer you in the wonted maner, and come both armed in your foolish threatnings, and yet the more fearelesse, expecting weake blowes, where I find so strong words. You shall not therefore long attend me in the Iland, before proofe teach you, that of my life you haue made your selfe too large a promise. In the meane time, Farewell.

This

This being written, and deliuered, the messenger told him that his Lord would (if he liked the same) bring two Knights with him to be his Patrons. Which Amphialus accepted, and withall shaking off (with resolution) his mothers importunate dissuasions, he furnished himselfe for the fight, but not in his wonted furniture. For now (as if he would turne his inside outward) he would needes appeare all in blacke; his decking both for himselfe, and horse, being cut out into the fashion of very rags: yet all so daintily ioyned together with precious stones, as it was a braue raggednesse, and a rich pouertie: and so cunningly had a workeman followed his humour in his armour, that he had giuen it a rustie shew, and yet so, as any man might perceiue was by art, & not negligence; carying at one instant a disgraced handsomnesse, and a new oldnesse. In his shield he bare for his deuise, a Night, by an excellent painter excellently painted, with a Sunne with a shadow, and vpon the shadow with a speech signifying, that it only was barrd from inioying that, whereof it had his life: or, From whose I am, banished. In his crest he caried Philocleas kniues, the only token of hir forced fauour.

So past he ouer into the Iland, taking with him the two brothers of Anaxius; where hee found the forsaken Knight, attired in his owne liuerie, as blacke as sorrow it selfe could see it selfe in the blackest glasse: his ornaments of the same hew, but formed into the figure of Rauens, which seemed to gape for carrion: onely his raynes were snakes, which finely wrapping themselues one within the other, their heads came together to the cheekes and bosses of the bit, where they might seeme to bite at the horse, and the horse (as he champte the bit) to bite at them, and that the white foame was ingendred by the poysonous furie of the combate. His Impresa was a Catoblepta which so long lies dead, as the Moone (whereto it hath so naturall a sympathie) wants her light. The word signified that The Moone wanted not the light, but the poore beast wanted the Moones light. He had in his headpeece, a whippe, to witnesse a selfe-punishing repentance. Their very horses were cole-blacke too, not hauing so much as one starre to giue light to their night of blackenesse: so as one would haue thought they had bene the two sonnes of Sorrow, and were come thither to fight for their birth-right in that sorie inheritance.

Which alliance of passions so moued Amphialus (already tender minded by the afflictions of Loue) that without staffe or sword drawne, he trotted fairely to the forsaken Knight, willing to haue put off this combat, to which his melancholy hart did (more then euer in like occasion) misgiue him: and therefore saluting him, Good Knight (sayd he) because we are men, and should know reason why we doo things; tell me the cause, that makes you thus eager to fight with me. Because I affirme (answered the forsaken Knight) that thou dost most rebellious iniurie to those Ladies, to whom all men owe seruice. You shall not fight with me (sayd Amphialus) vpon the quarrell: for I confesse the same too: but it proceeds from their owne beautie, to inforce Loue to offer this force. I maintaine then (sayd the forsaken Knight) that thou art not worthie so to loue. And that confesse I too (sayd Amphialus) since the world is not so richly blessed, as to bring forth any thing worthy thereof. But no more vnworthy then any other, since in none can be a more worthy loue. Yes, more vnworthy then my selfe (sayd the forsaken Knight) for though I deserue contempt, thou deseruest both contempt, and hatred.

But Amphialus by that thinking (though wrongly, each indeede mistaking other) that he was his riuall, forgat all mind of reconciliation, and hauing all his thoughts bound vp in choller, neuer ſtaying either iudge, trumpet, or his owne launce, drew out his ſword, and ſaying, Thou lyeſt falſe villaine vnto him; his words and blowes came ſo quicke together, as the one ſeemed a lightning of the others thunder. But he found no barren ground of ſuch ſeede: for it yeelded him his owne with ſuch encreaſe, that though Reaſon and Amazement go rarely together, yet the moſt reaſonable eyes that ſaw it, found reaſon to be amazed at the fury of their combat. Neuer game of death betted played; neuer fury ſet it ſelfe forth in greater brauery. The curteous Vulcan, when he wrought at his more curteous wiues requeſt Æneas an armour, made not his hammer beget a greater ſound, then the ſwords of thoſe noble Knights did, they needed no fire to their forge, for they made the fire to ſhine at the meeting of their ſwords, and armours, each ſide fetching ſtill new ſpirit from the caſtle window, and carefull of keeping their ſight that way as a matter of greater conſideration in their combat, then either the aduantage of Sunne or wind: which Sunne and wind (if the aſtoniſhed eyes of the beholders were not by the aſtoniſhment deceiued) did both ſtand ſtill to be beholders of this rare match. For neither could their amazed eyes diſcerne motion in the Sunne, and no breath of wind ſtirred, as if either for feare it would not come among ſuch blowes, or with delight had his eyes ſo buſie, as it had forgot to open his mouth. This fight being the more cruell, ſince both Loue and Hatred conſpired to ſharpen their humours, that hard it was to ſay, whether Loue with one trumpet, or Hatred with another, gaue the lowder alarum to their courages. Spite, rage, diſdaine, ſhame, reuenge, came waiting vpon Hatred: of the other ſide came with loue-longing Deſire, both inuincible Hope, and feareleſſe Deſpaire, with riuallike Iealouſie, which (although brought vp within doores in the ſchoole of Cupid) would ſhew themſelues no leſſe forward, then the other duſtie band of Mars, to make themſelues notable in the notableneſſe of this combat. Of either ſide Confidence, vnacquainted with Loſſe, but aſſuring truſt to ouercome, and good experience how to ouercome: now ſeconding their terrible blowes with cunning labouring the horſes, to winne ground of the enemie; now vnlooked-for parting one from the other, to winne aduantage by an aduantageous returne. But force againſt force, skill againſt skill, ſo enterchangeably encountred, that it was not eaſie to determine, whether enterpriſing, or preuenting came former: both, ſometimes at one inſtant, doing and ſuffring wrong, and choller no leſſe riſing of the doing, then of the ſuffring. But as the fire, the more fuell is put to it, the more hungrie ſtill it is to deuoure more: ſo the more they ſtrake, the more vnſatisfied they were with ſtriking. Their verie armour by peecemeale fell away from them: and yet their fleſh abode the wounds conſtantly, as though it were leſſe ſenſible of ſmart, then the ſenſleſſe armour: their bloud in moſt places ſtayning their blacke colour, as if it would giue a more liuely colour of mourning, then blacke can do. And ſo a long ſpace they fought, while neither vertue nor fortune ſeemed partiall of either ſide: which ſo tormented the vnquiet hart of Amphialus, that he reſolued to ſee a quicke end: and therefore with the violence of courage, adding ſtrength to his blow, he ſtrake in ſuch wiſe vpon the ſide of the others head, that his remembrance left that battered lodging: ſo as he was quite from himſelfe, caſting his armes abrode, and readie to fall downe; his ſword likewiſe went out of his hand; but that being faſt by a chaine to his arme, he could not looſe. And Amphialus vſed the fauour of occaſion, redoubling his blowes: but the horſe (weary to be beaten, as well as the maiſter) carried his maiſter away, till he came vnto himſelf. But then who could haue ſeene him, might

might well haue discerned shame in his cheekes, and reuenge in his eyes: so as setting his teeth together with rage, he came running vpon Amphialus, reaching out his arme, which had gathered vp the sword, meaning with that blow to haue cleaued Amphialus in two. But Amphialus seeing the blow comming, shunned it with nimble turning his horse aside; wherewith the forsaken Knight ouer-strake himselfe so, as almost he came downe with his owne strength. But the more hungrie of his purpose, the more he was bard the food of it: disdaining the resistance, both of force and fortune, he returned vpon the spurre againe, and ranne with such violence vpon Amphialus, that his horse with the force of the shocke rose vp before, almost ouerturned: which Amphialus perceiuing, with rayne and spurre put forth his horse; and withall gaue a mightie blow in the descent of his horse, vpon the shoulder of the forsaken Knight; from whence sliding, it fell vpon the necke of his horse, so as horse and man fell to the ground: but he was scarce downe before he was vp on his feete againe, with braue gesture shewing rising of courage, in the falling of fortune. But the curteous Amphialus excused himselfe, for hauing (against his will) kild his horse. Excuse thy selfe for viler faults (answered the forsaken Knight) and vse this poore aduantage the best thou canst; for thou shalt quickly finde thou hast needs of more. Thy folly (sayd Amphialus) shall not make me forget my selfe: and therewith (trotting a little aside) alighted from his horse, because he would not haue fortune come to claime any part of the victory. Which curteous act would haue mollified the noble heart of the forsaken Knight, if any other had done it, besides the taylor of his mistresse: but that was a sufficient defeazaunce for the firmest bond of good nature; and therefore he was no sooner alighted, but that he ranne vnto him, reentring into as cruell a fight, as eye did euer see, or thought could reasonably imagine; farre beyond the reach of weake words to be able to expresse it. For what they had done on horsebacke, was but as a morsell to keepe their stomackes in appetite, in comparison of that, which now (being themselues) they did. Nor euer glutton by the change of daintie diet could be brought to fresh feeding (when he might haue bene satisfied before) with more earnestnesse, then those (by the change of their manner of fight) fell cleane to a new fight, though any else would haue thought they had had their fill already. Amphialus being the taller man, for the most part stood with his right legge before; his shield at the vttermost length of his arme; his sword hie, but with the point toward his enemy. But when he strake, which came so thick, as if euery blow would striue to be foremost, his arme seemed still a postillion of death. The forsaken Knight shewed with like skill, vnlike gesture, keeping himselfe in continuall motion, proportioning the distance betweene them to any thing that Amphialus attempted: his eye guided his foote, and his foote conueighed his hand; and since nature had made him something the lower of the two, he made art follow, and not striue with nature: shunning rather then warding his blowes; like a cunning mastiffe, who knowes the sharpnes of the horne & strength of the Bull; fights low to get his proper aduantage; answering mightines with nimblenes, and yet at times imploying his wonderfull force, wherein he was second to none. In summe, the blowes were strong, the thrusts thicke, and the auoydings cunning. But the forsaken Knight (that thought it a degree of being conquered to be long in conquering) strake him so mightie a blow, that he made Amphialus put knee to the ground, without any humblenesse. But when he felt himselfe striken downe, and saw himselfe striken downe by his riuall, then shame seemed one arme, and disdaine another; fury in his eyes, and reuenge in his heart; skill and force gaue place,and they tooke the place of skill and force: with ſo vnweariable a manner, that the forſaken Knight alſo was driuen to leaue the ſterne of cunning,and giue himſelf wholly to be guided by the ſtorme of fury : there being in both (becauſe hate would not ſuffer admiration)extreame diſdaine to find themſelues ſo matched.

What(ſayd Amphialus to himſelfe) am I Amphialus, before whom ſo many monſtersand Gyants haue falne dead, when I onely ſought cauſeleſſe aduentures? and can one Knight now withſtand me in the preſence of Philoclea,and fighting for Philoclea?or ſince I loſt my liberty,haue I loſt my courage?haue I gotten the heart of a ſlaue as well as the fortune? If an army were againſt me in the ſight of Philoclea, could it reſiſt me? O beaſt,one man reſiſts thee: thy riuall reſiſts thee,or am I indeed Amphialus? haue not paſſions kild him,and wretched I (I know not how) ſucceeded into his place? Of the other ſide,the forſaken Knight with no leſſe ſpite, fell out with himſelfe; Haſt thou broken (ſayd he to himſelfe) the commandement of thy onely Princeſſe to come now into her preſence, and in her preſence to proue thy ſelfe a coward? Doth Aſia and Egypt ſet vp Trophies vnto thee, to bee matched here by a traytor? O noble Barſanes, how ſhamed will thy ſoule be, that he that ſlew thee, ſhould be reſiſted by this one man? O incomparable Pyrocles , more grieued wilt thou be with thy friends ſhame , then with thine owne impriſonment , when thou ſhalt know how little I haue bin able to do for the deliuery of thee ,and thoſe heauenly Princeſſes. Am I worthy to be friēd to the moſt valorous Prince that euer was entituled valorous, and ſhew my ſelfe ſo weake a wretch? No, ſhamed Muſidorus, worthie for nothing,but to keepe ſheepe,get thee a ſheephooke againe,ſince thou canſt vſe a ſword no better.

Thus at times did they,now with one thought,then with another , ſharpen their ouer-ſharpe humors;like the Lion that beates himſelfe with his owne taile,to make himſelfe the more angrie. Theſe thoughts indeede not ſtaying , but whetting their angrie ſwords , which now had put on the apparell of Crueltie: they bleeding ſo aboundantly , that euery body that ſaw them , fainted for them , and yet they fainted not in themſelues : their ſmart being more ſenſible to others eyes , then to their owne feeling. Wrath and Courage barring the common ſenſe from bringing any meſſage of their caſe to the mind: Paine, Wearineſſe,& Weakneſſe, not daring to make knowne their caſe (though already in the limits of death) in the preſence of ſo violent furie: which filling the veines with rage, in ſteede of bloud , and making the mind miniſter ſpirites to the body , a great while held out their fight, like an arrow ſhotte vpward by the force of the bow , though by his owne nature hee would go downeward. The forſaken Knight had the more wounds , but Amphialus had the ſorer ; which the other (watching time and place) had cunningly giuen vnto him. Who euer ſaw a well-mand Galley fight with a tall ſhip,might make vnto himſelfe ſome kind of compariſon of the difference of theſe two Knights ; a better couple then which the world could not bragge of. Amphialus ſeemed to excell in ſtrength,the forſaken Knight in nimbleneſſe;and yet did the ones ſtrength excell in nimbleneſſe,& the others nimbleneſſe excell in ſtrength : but now, ſtrength & nimbleneſſe were both gone,and exceſſe of courage onely maintained the fight. Three times had Amphialus with his mighty blowes driuen the forſaken Knight to goe ſtaggering backward , but euery one of thoſe times hee requited paine with ſmart and ſhame with repulſe. And now,whether he had cauſe, or that ouer-much confidence(an ouer-forward ſcholler of vnconquered Courage) made him thinke he had cauſe,he began to perſwade himſelfe he had the aduantage of the combat, though the aduantage he tooke himselfe to haue, was only that he should be the later to die: which hope, Hate (as vnsecret as Loue) could not conceale, but drawing himselfe a litle backe from him, brake out in these maner of words.

Ah Amphialus (said the forsaken knight) this third time thou shalt not escape me, but thy death shall satisfie thy iniurie and my malice, and pay for the crueltie thou shewedst in killing the noble Argalus and the faire Parthenia. In troth (said Amphialus) thou art the best knight that euer I fought withall, which would make me willing to grant thee thy life, if thy wit were as good as thy courage; (that besides other follies) layest that to my charge, which most against my will was committed. But whether my death be in thy power, or no, let this tell thee; and vpon the word wayted a blow, which parted his shield into two peeces; & despising the weake resistãce of his alreadie broken armour, made a great breach into his heart side, as if he wold make a passage for his loue to get out at.

But paine rather seemed to increase life, then to weaken life in those champions. For the forsaken knight comming in with his right leg, & making it guide the force of the blow, strake Amphialus vpon the bellie so horrible a wound, that his guts came out withall. Which Amphialus perceiuing (fearing death, onely because it should come with ouerthrow) he seemed to coniure all his strength for one moments seruice; and so, lifting vp his sword with both hands, hit the forsaken knight vpon the head, a blow, wherewith his sword brake. But (as if it would do a notable seruice before it died) it preuayled so, euen in the instant of breaking, that the forsaken knight fell to the ground, quite for that instant forgetting both loue and hatred: & Amphialus (finding himselfe also in such weakenesse, as he looked for speedy death) glad of the victorie, though litle hoping to enioy it, puld vp his visar, meaning with his dagger to giue him death; but in stead of death, he gaue him life: for, the aire so reuiued his spirits, that comming to himselfe, and seeing his present danger, with a life conquering death, he tooke Amphialus by the thigh, and together rose himselfe and ouerturned him. But Amphialus scrambled vp againe, both now so weake indeed, as their motions rather seemed the after drops to a storm, thē any matter of great fury.

But Amphialus might repent himselfe of his wilfull breaking his good sword: for, the forsaken knight (hauing with the extremitie of iustlie-conceiued hate, and the vnpitifulnesse of his owne neare-threatning death, blotted out all complements of curtesie) let flie at him so cruellie, that though the blowes were weake, yet weakenesse vpon a weakned subiect, proued such strength, that Amphialus hauing attempted in vaine, once or twise to close with him, receiuing wound vpon wound, sent his whole burthen to strike the earth with falling, since he could strike his foe no better in standing: giuing no other tokens of himselfe, then as of a man euen ready to take his oath to be deaths true seruant.

Which when the hardie brothers of Anaxius perceiued, not recking law of armes, nor vse of chiualrie, they flew in to defend their friend, or reuenge their losse of him. But they were forthwith encountred with the two braue companions of the forsaken knight, whereof the one being all in greene, both armour and furniture, it seemed a pleasant garden, wherein grew Orange trees; which with their golden fruites, cunningly beaten in and embroydered, greatly inriched the eye-pleasing colour of greene. In his shield was a sheep feeding in a pleasant field, with this word without feare or enuie. And therfore was called the Knight of the sheepe. The other knight was all in milke white, his attiring elsse all cut in stars, which made of cloth of siluer, and siluer spangles, each way seemed to cast manie aspects. His deuice was the verie Pole it selfe, about which manie starres stirring, but the place it selfe left void. The word was, The best place yet reserued. But these foure knights inheriting the hate of their friends, began a most fierce combat: the forsaken knight himselfe not able to helpe his side, but was driuen to sit him downe, with the extreame faintnesse of his more and more fainting body. But those valiant coupies seeking honour by dishonouring, and to build safetie vpon ruine, gaue new appetites to the almost glutted eyes of the beholders: and now bloud began to put sweat from the full possession of their outsides, no aduantage being yet to be seene; onely the knight of the sheepe seeming most deliuer, and affecting most all that viewed him, when a companie of souldiers sent by Cecropia, came out in boates to the Island; and all came running to the destruction of the three knights, whereof the one was vtterlie vnable to defend himselfe.

But then did the other two knights shew their wonderfull courage and fidelitie. For turning backe to backe, and both bestriding the blacke forsaken knight (who had fainted so long til he had lost the feeling of faintnesse) they held play against the rest, though the two brothers vnknightly helped them; till Philanax (who watchfully attended such traiterous practises) sent lik ewise ouer, both by boat and swimming, so choice a number as did put most of the other to the sword. Onely the two brothers with some of the braueſt of them, carying away the body of Amphialus, which they would rather haue died, then haue left behind them.

So was the forsaken knight (laid vpon clokes) caried home to the campe. But his two friends knowing his earnest desire not to be knowne, couering him from any bodies eyes, conueyed him to their owne tent: Basilius himselfe conquering his earnest desire to see him, with feare to displease him, who had fought so notablie in his quarell. But Fame set the honour vpon his backe, which he would not suffer to shine in his face: no mans mouth being barraine of praises to the noble knight, that hast battered the most esteemed knight in the world: euerie body praying for his life, and thinking that therein they prayed for themselues. But he himselie, when by the diligent care of friends, and well applyed cunning of Surgeons, he came to renew againe the league betweene his mind and bodie; then fell he to a fresh warre with his owne thoughts, wrongfully condemning his manhood, laying cowardise to himselfe, whom the impudentest backebiter would not so haue wronged. For his courage (vsed to vse victorie as an inheritance) could brooke no resistance at any time: but now that he had promised himselfe not only the conquest of him, but the sealing of the walles, and deliuerie of Pamela, though he had done beyond all others expectation, yet so short was he of his owne, that he hated to looke vpon the Sunne, that had seene him do so weakely: and so much abhorred all visitation or honour, whereof he thought himselfe vnworthy, that he besought his two noble friends to cary him away to a castle not far off, where he might cure his wounds, and neuer be knowne till he made succesſe excuse this (as he thought) want in him. They louingly obeyed him, leauing Basilius and all the campe verie sorie for the parting of these three vnknowne knights, in whose prowesse they had reposed greatest truſt of victorie.

But they being gone, Basilius and Philanax gaue good order to the strengthning of the siege, fortifying themselues, so as they feared no more any such sodaine onset, as that of Anaxius. And they within (by reason of Anaxius hurt, but especiallie of Amphialus-is) gaue thēselues only to diligent watch & ward, making no sallies out, but committing the principall truſt to Zoilus & Lycurgus. For Anaxius was yet forced to keepe his chamber. And as for Amphialus, his bodie had such wounds, & he gaue such wounds to his mind, as easilie it could not be determined, whether death or he made the greater haste one to the other: for when the diligent care of cunning Chirurgians had brought life to the possession of his owne right, Sorow and Shame (like two corrupted seruants) came waiting of it, perswading nothing but the giuing ouer of it self to destructiō. They laid before his eyes his present case, painting euery peece of it in most vgly colours: they shewed him his loue wrapped in despaire, his fame blotted by ouerthrow; so that if before he languished, because he could not obtaine his desiring, he now lamented, because he durst not desire the obtaining. Recreant Amphialus (would he say to himselfe) how darest thou entitle thy selfe the louer of Philoclea, that hast neither shewed thy selfe a faithfull coward, nor a valiant rebell, but both rebellious and cowardly, which no law can quite, nor grace haue pitie of? Alas life, what litle pleasure thou doest me, to giue me nothing but sense of reproch, and exercise of ruine? I would (sweet Philoclea) I had died, before thy eyes had seene my weakenesse: and then perchance with some sigh thou wouldest haue confessed, thou hadst lost a worthy seruant. But now, caytife that I am, what euer I haue done, serues but to build vp my riuals glorie. To these speeches he would couple such gestures of vexation, & would fortifie the gestures with such effects of furie, as sometimes offring to teare vp his wounds, sometimes to refuse the sustenance of meat, and counsell of Physitions, that his perplexed mother was driuen to make him by force to be tended, with extreame corsey to her selfe and annoyance to him: till in the end he was contented to promise her, he would attempt no violence vpon himself, vpon condition he might be troubled by no body but only his Physitions: his melancholy detesting all companie, so as not the very Chirurgians nor seruants durst speake vnto him in doing him seruice: only he had prayed his mother, as she tendred his life, she would procure him grace, and that without that, she would neuer come at him more.

His mother, who had confined all her loue onely vnto him, set only such about him, as were absolutely at her commandement, whom she forbad to let him know any thing that passed in the castle, till his wounds were cured, but as she from time to time should instruct them: she (for her self) being resolued, now she had the gouernement of all things in her owne hands, to satisfie her sons loue by their yeelding, or satisfie her owne reuenge in their punishment. Yet first, because she wold be the freer from outward force, she sent a messenger to the campe to denounce vnto Basilius, that if he did not presentlie raise his siege, she would cause the heads of the three Ladies, prisoners, to be cut off before his eyes. And to make him the more feare a present performance, she caused his two daughters and Zelmane to be led vnto the walles, where she had made a scaffold, easie to be seene by Basilius: and there caused them to be kept, as ready for the slaughter, till answer came from Basilius. A sight full of pitie it was, to see those three (all excelling in all those excellencies, wherewith Nature can beautifie any body: Pamela giuing sweetnesse to maiestie, Philoclea enriching nobleness with humbleness, Zelmane setting in womanly beauty manlike valour) to be thus subiected to the baseſt iniurie of vniust fortune. One might see in Pamela a willingnesse to die, rather thē to haue life at others discretion, though sometimes a Princelie disdaine would sparkle out of her Princelie eyes, that it should be in others power to force her to die. In Philoclea a prety feare came vp, to endamaske her rosie cheekes: but it was such a feare, as rather seemed a kindly child to her innate hūbleneſſe, then any other dismayednesse: or if she were dismayed, it was more for Zelmane, then for her self; or if more for her self, it was because Zelmane should lose her. As for Zelmane, as she went with her hands bound (for they durst not aduenture on her well knowne valour, especiallie among a people, which perchaunce might be moued by such a spectacle to some reuolt) she was the true image of ouermaistered courage, and of spite, that sees no remedy. For her breast swelled withall, the bloud burst out at her nose, and she looked paler then accustomed, with her eyes cast on the ground, with such a grace, as if she were fallen out with the heauens, for suffering such an iniurie. The lookers on were so moued withall, as they misliked what themselues did, and yet still did what themselues misliked. For some glad to rid themselues of the dangerous annoyãce of this siege, some willing to shorten the way to Amphialus his succession (whereon they were dependants) some and the greatest some, doing because others did, and suffering because none durst begin to hinder, did in this sort set their hands to this (in their owne conscience) wicked enterprise.

But when this message was brought to Basilius, and that this pitifull preparation was a sufficient letter of credite for him to beleeue it, he called vnto him his chiefe Councellours: among which, those he chieflie trusted were Philanax and Kalander lately come to the campe at Basilius commandement, and in himselfe wearie of his solitarie life, wanting his sonnes presence, & neuer hauing heard from his beloued guests since they parted from him.) Now in this doubt what he should do, he willed Kalander to giue him his aduise: who spake much to this purpose. You commaund me sir (said he) to speake, rather because you will keepe your wonted graue and noble maner, to do nothing of importãce without counsel thẽ that in this cause (which indeed hath but one way) your mind needs to haue any counsel: so as my speech shal rather be to confirme what you haue already determined, then to argue against anie possibilitie of other determination. For what sophistical scholler can find any question in this, whether you will haue your incõparable daughters liue, or die? whether since you be here to cause their deliuerãce, you will make your being here the cause of their destruction? for nothing can be more vnsensible, then to thinke what one doth, and to forget the end why it is done. Do therefore as I am sure you meane to do, remoue the siege, & after seeke by practise, or other gentle meanes, to recouer that which by force you cannot: & therof is indeed (when it please you) more counsell to be taken. Once, in extremities the winning of time is the purchase of life, and worse by no meanes then their deaths can befall vnto you. A man might vse more words, if it were to any purpose to gyld gold, or that I had any cause to doubt of your mind: but you are wise, and are a father. He said no more, for he durst not attempt to perswade the marying of his daughter to Amphialus, but left that to bring in at another consultation. But Basilius made signe to Philanax, who standing a while in a maze as inwardly perplexed, at last thus deliuered his opinion.

If euer I could wish my faith vntried, & my counsell vntrusted, it should be at this time, when in truth I must cõfesse I wold be content to purchase silence with discredite. But since you command, I obey: only let me say thus much, that I obey not to these excellent Ladies father, but to my Prince: & a Prince it is to whõ I giue coũsel. Therefore as to a Prince I say, that the graue & (I well know) true-minded counsell of my Lord Kalander had come in good time when you first tooke armes, before all your subiects gate notice of your intention, before so much bloud was spent, & before they were driuen to seeke this shift for their last remedie. But if now, this force you away, why did you take armes? since you might be sure when euer they were in extreextremitie they would haue recourse to this threatning? And for a wise man to take in hand that which his enemy may with a word ouerthrow, hath in my cõceit great incongruitie, & as great, not to forethinke what his enemie in reason will do. But they threatẽ they will kill your daughters. What if they promised you if you remoued your siege, they would honorably send home your daughters? would you be angled by their promises? truly no more ought you be terrified by their threatnings. For yet of the two, promise binds faith more then threatning. But indeed a Prince of iudgement ought not to consider what his enemies promise, or threaten, but what the promisers & threatners in reason will do: and the neareſt coniecture thereunto, is what is best for their owne behoofe to do. They threaten if you remoue not they will kill your daughters, and if you do remoue, what suretie haue you but that they will kill them, since if the purpose be to cut off all impediments of Amphialus his ambition, the same cause will continue when you are away; and so much the more encouraged, as the reuenging power is absent, and they haue the more oportunitie to draw their factious friends about them: but if it be for their securitie onelie, the same cause will bring forth the same effect: and for their securitie they will preserue them. But it may be said, no man knowes what desperate folkes will do: it is true, & as true that no reason nor policie can preuent what desperate folks wil do: and therfore they are among those dangers, which wisdome is not to recken. Onlie let it suffice to take away their despaire, which may be by granting pardon for what is past; so as the Ladies may be freelie deliuered. And let them that are your subiects trust you that are their Prince; do not you subiect your selfe to trust them, who are so vntrustie as to be manifest traitors. For if they find you so base-minded, as by their threatning to remoue your force, what indignitie is it, that they would not bring you vnto still by the same threatning? since then if loue stirre them, loue will keepe them from murthering what they loue; and if ambition prouoke them, ambitious they will be when you are away, as well as while you are here: take not away your force, which bars not the one, & bridles the other. For as for their shewes and words, they are but feare-babes, not worthy once to moue a worthie mans conceit, which must still consider what in reason they are like to do. Their despaire I graunt you shall do well to preuent, which as it is the last of all resolutions, so no man fals into it while so good a way as you may offer, is open vnto thẽ. In summe, you are a Prince, and a father of a people, who ought with the eye of wisdome, the hand of fortitude, and the heart of iustice, to set downe all priuate conceits, in comparison of what for the publike is profitable.

He would haue proceeded on, when Gynecia came running in amazed for her daughter Pamela, but mad for Zelmane: and falling at Basilius feet, besought him to make no delay; vsing such gestures of compassion in steed of stopped words, that Basilius, otherwise enough tender minded, easilie granted to raise the siege, which he saw daungerous to his daughters; but indeed more carefull for Zelmane, by whose besieged person, the poore old man was straightlie besieged: so as to rid him of the famine of his mind, he went in speed away, discharging his souldiers: only leauing the authority, as before, in Philanaxis hands; he himselfe went with Gynecia to a strong Castle of his, where he tooke counsell how first to deliuer Zelmane, whom he called the poore stranger, as though onlie Law of hospitalitie moued him, & for that purpose sent diuerse messengers to traffike with Cecropia.

But she by this means rid of the present danger of the siege (desiring Zoilus and Lycurgus to take the care, till their brother recouered, of reuictualling & furnishing the citie, both with men, and what else wanted, against any new occasion should vrge them, she her selfe disdayning to hearken to Basilius, without he would graunt his daughter in mariage to her sonne, which by no meanes he would be brought vnto) bent all the sharpnesse of her malicious wit, how to bring a comfortable grant to her sonne, whereupon she well found no lesse then his life depended. Therefore for a while she attempted all means of eloquent praying, and flattering perswasion, mingling sometimes gifts, somtimes threatnings, as she had cause to hope, that either open force, or vndermining, would best win the castle of their resolution. And euer as much as she did to Philoclea, so much did she to Pamela, though in manner sometimes differing, as she found fit to leuell at the ones noble height, and the others sweet lowlinesse. For though she knew her sonnes heart had wholly giuen it selfe to Philoclea, yet seeing the equall gifts in Pamela, she hoped, a faire grant wold recouer the sorow of a faire refusall: cruelly intending the present impoysoning the one, as soone as the others affection were purchased.

But in vaine was all her vaine oratorie imployed. Pamelas determination was built vpon so braue a rocke, that no shot of hers could reach vnto it: and Philoclea (though hūblie seated) was so inuironed with sweet riuers of cleare vertue, as could neither be battered, nor vndermined: her wittie perswasions had wise answers; her eloquence recompenced with sweetnesse; her threatnings repelled with disdaine in the one, and patience in the other; her gifts either not accepted, or accepted to obey, but not to bind. So as Cecropia in nature violent, cruell, because ambitious; hatefull, for old rooted grudge to their mother, & now spiteful, because she could not preuaile with girles, as she counted them; lastly, drawne on by her loue to her sonne, and held vp by a tyrannicall authoritie, forthwith followed the byas of her owne crooked disposition, and doubling & redoubling her threatnings, fell to confirme some of her threatned effects: first withdrawing all comfort, both of seruants and seruice from them. But that those excellent Ladies had bene vsed vnto, euen at home, and then found in themselues how much good the hardnesse of education doth to the resistance of miserie. Then dishonouring vsing them both in diet, and lodging, by a contempt to pull downe their thoughts to yeelding. But as before, the consideration of a prison had disgraced all ornaments, so now the same consideration made them attend all diseasfulnesse. Then still as she found those not preuaile, would she go forward with giuing them terrours, sometimes with noises of horror, sometimes with sodaine frightings in the night, when the solitarie darknesse thereof might easier astonish the disarmed senses. But to all Vertue and Loue resisted, strengthened one by the other, when each found it selfe ouer-vehemently assaulted. Cecropia still sweetning her fiercenesses with faire promises, if they would promise faire; that feeling euill, and seeing a way farre better, their minds might the sooner be mollified. But they that could not taste her behauiour, when it was pleasing indeed, could worse now, when they had lost all taste by her iniuries.

She resoluing all extremities, rather then faile of conquest, pursued on her rugged way: letting no day passe, without new and new perplexing the poore Ladies minds, and troubling their bodies; and still swelling, the more she was stopped, and growing hot with her owne doings; at length abhominable rage caried her to absolute tyrannies, so that taking with her certaine old women (of wicked dispositions, and apt for enuie-sake to be cruell to youth and beautie) with a countenance impoysoned with malice, flew to the sweete Philoclea, as if so many Kites should come about a white Doue, & matching violent gestures, with mischieuous threat-

threatnings, she hauing a rod in her hand (like a furie that shold carrie wood to the burning of Dianas temple) fell to scourge that most beautifull body: Loue in vaine holding the shield of Beautie against her blind crueltie. The Sunne drew clouds vp to hide his face from so pitifull a sight; and the verie stone walles did yeeld drops of sweat for agonie of such a mischiefe: each senceless thing had sense of pittie; only they that had sense, were senseless. Vertue rarely found her worldly weakenesse more, then by the oppression of that day: and weeping Cupid told his weeping mother, that he was sorie he was not deafe, as well as blind, that he might neuer know so lamentable a worke. Philoclea, with tearefull eyes, and sobbing breast (as soone as her wearinesse rather then compassion, gaue her respite) kneeled down to Cecropia, and making pittie in her face honourable, and torment delightfull, besought her, since she hated her (for what cause she tooke God to witnesse she knew not) that she would at once take away her life, & not please her selfe with the tormenting of a poore Gentlewoman. If (said she) the common course of humanitie cannot moue you, nor the hauing me in your own walls, cannot claime pittie: nor womanly mercie, nor neere alliance, nor remembrance (how miserable so euer now) that I am a Princes daughter; yet let the loue (you haue often told me) your sonne beares me, so much procure, that for his sake, one death may be thought enough for me; I haue not liued so many yeares, but that one death may be able to conclude them: neither haue my faults (I hope) bene so many but that one death may satisfie them. It is no great suite to an enemie, when but death is desired. I craue but that, and as for the graunting your request, know for certaine you lose your labours, being euery day furtherof-minded from becomming his wife, who vseth me like a slaue. But that in stead of getting grace, renued againe Cecropias fury: so that (excellent creature) she was newly againe tormented by those hellish monsters: Cecropia vsing no other words, but that she was a proud and vngratefull wench: and that she would teach her to know her owne good, since of her self she would not conceiue it. So that with silence and patience (like a faire gorgeous armour, hammered vpon by an ilfauored Smith) she abode their pittilesse dealing with her: till, rather reseruing her for more, then meaning to end, they left her to an vncomfortable leisure, to consider with her self her fortune; both helpelesse her self, being a prisoner, & hopelesse, since Zelmane was a prisoner: who therein onely was short of the bottome of miserie, that she knew not how vnworthily her Angell, by these deuils was abused: but wanted (God wot) no stings of griefe, when those words did but strike vpon her heart, that Philoclea was a captiue, & she not able to succour her. For well she knew the confidence Philoclea had in her, & well she knew, Philoclea had cause to haue confidence: and all troden vnder foot by the wheele of senseless Fortune. Yet if there be that imperious power in the soule, as it can deliuer knowledge to another, without bodily organs; so vehement were the workings of their spirites, as one met with other, though themselues perceiued it not, but only thought it to be the doubling of their owne louing fancies. And that was the only worldly thing, whereon Philoclea rested her minde, that she knew she should die beloued of Zelmane, and should die, rather then be false to Zelmane. And so this most daintie Nimphe, easing the paine of her mind with thinking of anothers paine; and almost forgetting the paine of her bodie, through the paine of her minde, she wasted, euen longing for the conclusion of her tedious tragedie.

But for a while she was vnuisited, Cecropia employing her time in vsing the like crueltie vpon Pamela, her heart growing not onely to desire the fruit of punishing them,but euen to delight in the punishing them. But if euer the beames of perfection shined through the clowds of affliction, if euer Vertue tooke a bodie to shew his (els vnconceiuable)beautie,it was in Pamela. For when Reason taught her there was no resistance, (for to iust resistance first her heart was enclined) then with so heauenly a quietnesse,and so gracefull a calmnesse, did she suffer the diuers kindes of torments they vsed to her, that while they vexed her faire bodie, it seemed, that she rather directed,then obeyed the vexation. And when Cecrõpia ended,and asked whether her heart would yeeld: she a little smiled, but such a smiling as shewed no loue, and yet could not but be louely. And then, Beastly woman (said she) followe on, do what thou wilt, and canst vpon me: for I know thy power is not vnlimitted. Thou maist well wracke this sillie bodie, but me thou canst neuer ouerthrow. For my part,I will not do thee the pleasure to desire death of thee: but assure thy selfe, both my life and death, shall triumph with honour, laying shame vpon thy detestable tyrannie.

And so, in effect,conquering their doing with her suffering,while Cecropia tried as many sorts of paines, as might rather vexe them, then spoile them(for that shee would not do while she were in any hope to winne either of them for her sonne) Pamela remained almost as much content with triall in her selfe, what vertue could do,as grieued with the miserie wherein she found her selfe plunged, onely sometimes her thoughts softned in her,when with open wings they flewe to Musidorus. For then she would thinke with her self, how grieuously Musidorus would take this her miserie; and she,that wept not for her selfe, wept yet Musidorus teares, which he would weepe for her. For gentle Loue did easlier yeeld to lamentation, then the constancie of vertue would els admitte. Then would she remember the case wherein she had left her poore shepheard, and she that wished death for her selfe, feared death for him; and she that condemned in her selfe the feebleneſse of sorrow, yet thought it great reason to be sorie for his sorow: and she that long had prayed for the vertuous ioyning themselues together, now thinking to die her selfe, hartely prayed,that long time their fortunes might be seperated. Liue long my Musidorus (would she say) and let my name liue in thy mouth, in thy heart my memorie. Liue long,that thou maist loue long the chast loue of thy dead Pamela. Then would she wish to her selfe,that no other woman might euer possesse his hart: and yet scarcely the wish was made a wish, when her selfe would finde fault with it, as being too vniust,that so excellent a man should be banished from the comfort of life. Then would she fortifie her resolution,with bethinking the worst, taking the counsell of vertue, and comfort of loue.

So these Diamonds of the world whom Nature had made to be preciously set in the eyes of men, to be the chiefe workes of her workemanship, the chiefe ornaments of the world,and Princesses of felicitie,by rebellious iniurie were brought to the vttermost distresse that an enemies hart could wish, or a womans spite inuent: Cecropia daily in one or other sort punishing them, still with her euill torments giuing them feare of worse,making the feare it selfe the forest torment of all; that in the end wearie of their bodies, they should be content to bestow them at her appointment. But as in labour,the more one doth exercise it, the more by the doing one is enabled to do; strength growing vpon the worke, so as what at first would haue seemed impossible,after growes easie: so these Princesses second to none, and far from any second,only to be matched by themselues, with the vse of suffering their mindes,gate the habit of suffring so,as all feares and terrors were to them but

ſummons to a battaile, whereof they knew before hand they would be victorious, & which in the ſuffering was painefull, being ſuffered, was a trophee to it ſelfe: wherby Cecropia found her ſelfe ſtill further off: for where at firſt ſhe might perchaunce haue perſwaded them to haue viſited her ſonne, and haue giuen him ſome comfort in his ſickneſſe, drawing neere to the confines of Deaths kingdome, now they proteſted, that they would neuer otherwiſe ſpeake to him, then as to the enemy, of moſt vniuſt cruelty towards them, that any time or place could euer make them knowe.

This made the poiſon ſwel in her cankred breaſt, perceiuing that (as in water) the more ſhe graſped the leſſe ſhe held: but yet now hauing run ſo long the way of rigor, it was too late in reaſon, & too contrary to her paſſion, to returne to a courſe of meekeneſſe. And therefore (taking counſell of one of her olde aſſociates who ſo far excelled in wickedneſſe, as that ſhe had not only loſt al feeling of conſciẽce, but had gotten a very glory in euill) in the ende they determined, that beating, & other ſuch ſharp dealing did not ſo much pull downe a womans hart, as it bred anger, and that nothing was more enemy to yeelding, then anger; making their tender harts take on the armour of obſtinacy: (for thus did their wicked mindes blind to the light of vertue, and owly eied in the night of wickedneſſe interpret of it) and that therefore that was no more to be tried. And for feare of death (which no queſtion would do moſt with them) they had bene ſo often threatned, as they began to be familiarly acquainted with it, and learned to eſteeme threatning words to be but words. Therfore the laſt, but beſt way now was, that the one ſeeing indeed the others death, ſhold perceiue, there was no dallying meant: & then there was no doubt, that a womans ſoule would do much, rather then leaue ſo beautiful a body.

This being concluded, Cecropia went to Philoclea and told her, that now ſhe was to come to the laſt part of the play: for her part, though ſhe found her hard-hearted obſtinacie ſuch, that neither the ſweetneſſe of louing meanes, nor the force of hard meanes could preuaile with her, yet before ſhe would paſſe to a further degree of extremity, ſhe had ſought to win her ſiſter; in hope that her ſonne might be with time ſatisfied with the loue of ſo faire a Lady; but finding her alſo rather more then leſſe wilfull, ſhe was now minded that one of their deathes ſhould ſerue for an example to the other, that deſpiſing worthy folks was more hurtfull to the deſpiſer, then the deſpiſed: that yet becauſe her ſonne eſpecially affected her, and that in her owne ſelfe ſhe was more inclinable to pittie her, then ſhe had deſerued, ſhe would begin with her ſiſter; who that afternoone ſhould haue her head cut off before her face; if in the meane time one of them, did not pull out their il-wrought ſtiches of vnkindeneſſe, ſhe bad her looke for no other, nor longer time thẽ ſhe told her. There was no aſſault giuen to the ſweete Philocleas mind, that entred ſo far, as this: for where to all paines and dangers of her ſelfe, fore-ſight (with his Lieutenant Reſolution) had made ready defence, now with the loue ſhe bare her ſiſter, ſhe was driuen to a ſtay, before ſhe determined: but long ſhe ſtayed not, before this reaſon did ſhine vnto her, that ſince in her ſelfe ſhe preferred death before ſuch a baſe ſeruitude, loue did teach her to wiſh the ſame to her ſiſter. Therefore croſſing her armes, and looking ſide-ward vpon the ground, Do what you will (ſaid ſhe) with vs: for my part, heauen ſhall melt before I be remoued. But if you will follow my counſell, for your owne ſake (for as for prayers for my ſake I haue felt how litle they preuaile) let my death firſt ſerue for example to win her, who perchaunce is not ſo reſolued againſt Amphialus, and ſo ſhall you not onely iuſtlie puniſh me, (who indeede do hate both you and your ſonne) but, if that may moue you, you ſhall do more vertuouſly in preſeruing one moſt worthy of life, and killing an other moſt deſirous of death: laſtly in winning her, in ſteed of a peeuiſh vnhappie creature, that I am, you ſhall bleſſe your ſonne with the moſt excellent woman in all praiſe-worthy things, that the world holdeth. But Cecropia, (who had already ſet downe to her ſelfe what ſhe would do) with bitter both termes, and countenaunce, told her, that ſhe ſhould not need to woo death ouer-eagerly: for if her ſiſter going before her did not teach her wit, herſelf ſhould quickly follow. For ſince they were not to be gotten, there was no way for her ſonnes quiet, but to knowe that they were paſt getting. And ſo ſince no intreating, nor threatning might preuayle, ſhe bad her prepare her eies for a new play, which ſhe ſhould ſee within fewe houres in the hall of that caſtle.

A place in deed ouer fit for ſo vnfit a matter: for being ſo ſtately made, that the bottome of it being euen with the ground, the roofe reached as hie as any part of the caſtle, at either ende it had conuenient lodgings. In the one ende was (one ſtorie from the ground) Philoclea's abode, in the other of euen height, Pamelas, & Zelmanes in a chamber aboue her: but all ſo vaulted of ſtrong and thickly built ſtone, as one could no way heare the other: each of theſe chambers had a litle windowe to looke into the hall, but becauſe the ſiſters ſhould not haue ſo much comfort, as to looke one to another, there was (of the outſides) curtaines drawne, which they could not reach with their hands, ſo barring the reach of their ſight. But when the houre came that the Tragedie ſhould beginne, and curtaynes were withdrawne from before the windowes of Zelmane, and of Philoclea: a ſufficient challenge to call their eyes to defende themſelues in ſuch an incounter. And by and by came in at one ende of the hall, with about a dozen armed ſouldiers a Ladie, led by a couple, with her handes bound before her: from aboue her eyes to her lippes muffled with a faire kerchiefe, but from her mouth to the ſhoulders all bare: and ſo was led on to a ſcaffold raiſed a good deale from the floore, & all couered with crimſin veluet. But neither Zelmane, nor Philoclea needed to be told who ſhe was: for the apparell ſhe ware, made them too well aſſured, that it was the admirable Pamela. Whereunto the rare whiteneſſe of her naked necke gaue ſufficient teſtimonie to their aſtoniſhed ſenſes. But the faire Lady being come to the ſcaffold, and then made to kneele downe, and ſo left by her ynkind ſupporters, as it ſeemed that ſhe was about to ſpeake ſomewhat (whereunto Philoclea, poore ſoule, earneſtly liſtned, according to her ſpeach euen minding to frame her minde, her heart neuer till then almoſt wauering to ſaue her ſiſters life) before the vnfortunate Ladie could pronounce three wordes, the executioner cut off the ones ſpeech, and the others attention, with making his ſworde do his cruell office vpon that beautifull necke. Yet the pittileſſe ſworde had ſuch pittie of ſo precious an obiect, that at firſt it did but hit flatlong. But little auailed that, ſince the Ladie falling downe aſtoniſhed withall, the cruell villaine forced the ſword with another blow to diuorce the faire marriage of the head and bodie.

And this was done ſo in an inſtant, that the verie act did ouerrun Philocleas ſorrow (ſorrow not being able ſo quickly to thunderbolt her heart thorough her ſenſes, but firſt onely oppreſt her with a ſtorme of amazement) but when her eyes ſawe that they did ſee, as condemning themſelues to haue ſeene it, they became wearie of their owne power of ſeeing: and her ſoule then drinking vp woe with great draughts, ſhe fell downe to deadly traunces: but her waiting iaylors with cruell pittie brought lothed life vnto her; which yet many times tooke his leaue as though he would indeed depart: but when he was ſtayed by force, he kept with him deadly Sorrow, which thus exerciſed her mourning ſpeech. Pamela my ſiſter, my ſiſter Pamela, woe is me for thee, I would I had died for thee. Pamela neuer more ſhal I ſee thee: neuer more ſhall I enioy thy ſweet companie, and wiſe counſel. Alas, thou art gone to beautifie heauen, and haſt left me here, who haue nothing good in me, but that I did euer loue thee, and euer will lament thee. Let this day be noted of all vertuous folkes for moſt vnfortunate: let it neuer be mentioned, but among curſes; and curſed be they that did this miſchiefe, and moſt accurſed be mine eyes that beheld it. Sweete Pamela; that head is ſtriken off, where only wiſedome might be ſpoken withall; that bodie is deſtroyed, which was the liuing booke of vertue. Deare Pamela how haſt thou left me to all wretchedneſſe and miſerie? Yet while thou liuedſt, in thee I breathed, of thee I hoped. O Pamela, how much did I for thy excellencie honour thee, more then my mother, and loue thee more then my ſelfe? Neuer more ſhall I lie with thee: neuer more ſhall we bathe in the pleaſant riuer together: neuer more ſhall I ſee thee in thy ſhepheard apparell. But thou art gone, and where am I? Pamela is dead; and liue I? O my God, And with that ſhe fell againe in a ſowne, ſo as it was a great while before they could bring her to her ſelf againe; but being come to her ſelfe, Alas (ſaid ſhe) vnkind women, ſince you haue giuen me ſo many deathes, torment me not now with life: for Gods ſake let me goe, & excuſe your hands of more blood. Let me follow my Pamela, whom euer I ſought to follow. Alas Pamela, they will not let me come to thee. But if they keepe promiſe, I ſhall tread thine owne ſteps after thee. For to what am I borne (miſerable ſoule) but to be moſt vnhappie in my ſelfe, & yet more vnhappie in others? But ô that a thouſand more miſeries had chanced vnto me, ſo thou haddeſt not died: Pamela, my ſiſter Pamela. And ſo, like lamentable Philomela complained ſhe the horrible wrong done to her ſiſter, which if it ſtird not in the wickedly cloſed mindes of her tormentors, a pittie of her ſorrow, yet bred it a wearineſſe of her ſorrow: ſo as only leauing one to preuent any harme ſhe ſhould do her ſelfe, the reſt went away, conſulting againe with Cecropia, how to make profit of this their late bloudie act.

In the ende, that woman that vſed moſt to keepe company with Zelmane, tolde Cecropia, that ſhe found by many moſt ſenſible proofes in Zelmane, that there was neuer woman ſo loued another, as ſhe loued Thiloclea: which was the cauſe that ſhe (further then the commandement of Cecropia) had cauſed Zelmanes curtaines to be alſo drawne: becauſe, hauing the ſame ſpectacle that Philoclea had, ſhe might ſtand in the greater feare for her, whom ſhe loued ſo well: and that indeed ſhe had hit the needle in that deuiſe: for neuer ſaw ſhe creature ſo aſtoniſhed as Zelmane, exceedingly ſory for Pamela, but exceedingly exceeding that exceedingneſſe in feare for Thiloclea. Therefore her aduice was, ſhe ſhould cauſe Zelmane to come & ſpeake with Philoclea. For there being ſuch vehemencie of friendſhip between them, it was moſt likely both to moue Zelmane to perſwade, & Philoclea to be perſwaded. Cecropia liked well of the counſell, & gaue order to the ſame woman to go deale therein with Zelmane, & to aſſiure her with oth, that Cecropia was determined Philoclea ſhold paſſe the ſame way that Pamela had done, without ſhe did yeeld to ſatisfie the extremitie of her ſonnes affectiō: which the womā did, adding thereunto many (as ſhe thought) good reaſons to make Zelmane thinke Amphialus a fit match for Philoclea.

But Zelmane (who had from time to time vnderſtood the cruell dealing they had vſed to the ſiſters, & now had her owne eyes wounded with the ſight of ones death) was ſo confuſed withall (her courage ſtill rebelling againſt her wit, deſiring ſtil with force to do impoſſible matters) that as her deſire was ſtopped with power, ſo her conceit was darkned with a miſt of deſire. For blinde Loue; and inuincible valure ſtill would cry out, that it could not be, Philoclea ſhould be in ſo miſerable eſtate, and ſhe not relieue her: and ſo while ſhe haled her wit to her courage, ſhe drew it from his owne limits. But now Philocleas death (a word able to marſhall all his thoughts in order) being come to ſo ſhort a point either with ſmall delay to be ſuffred, or by the giuing her ſelfe to another to be preuented, ſhe was driuen to thinke and to deſire ſome leaſure of thinking: which the woman granted for that night vnto her. A night that was not halfe ſo blacke, as her minde; not halfe ſo ſilent, as was fit for her muſing thoughts. At laſt, he that would faine haue deſperatly loſt a thouſand liues for her ſake, could not finde in his heart, that ſhe ſhould looſe any life for her owne ſake; and he that deſpiſed his owne death in reſpect of honour, yet could well nye diſpence with honour it ſelfe in reſpect of Philocleas death: for once the thought could not enter into his hart, nor the breath iſſue out of his mouth, which could conſent to Philocleas death for any bargaine. Then how to preuent the next degree to death (which was her being poſſeſt by another) was the point of his minds labour: and in that he found no other way, but that Philoclea ſhould pretend a yeelding vnto Cecropias requeſt; and ſo by ſpeaking with Amphialus, and making faire (but delaying) promiſes, procure libertie for Zelmane; who only wiſht but to come by a ſword, not doubting then to deſtroy them al, and deliuer Philoclea: ſo little did both the men, and their forces ſeeme in her eyes, looking down vpon them from the high top of affections tower.

With that minde therefore (but firſt well bound) ſhee was brought to Philoclea, hauing already plotted out in her conceit, how ſhe would deale with her: and ſo came ſhe with hart and eyes, which did each ſacrifice either to Loue vpon the altar of Sorow: and there had ſhe the pleaſing diſpleaſing ſight of Philoclea: Philoclea, whō already the extreame ſence of ſorow had brought to a dulneſſe therin, her face not without tokens that beautie had bene by many miſeries cruelly battered, & yet ſhewed it moſt the perfection of that beautie, which could remaine vnouerthrowne by ſuch enemies. But when Zelmane was ſet downe by her, and the women gone away (becauſe ſhe might be the better perſwaded when no body was by, that had heard her ſay ſhe would not be perſwaded) then began firſt the eyes to ſpeake, and the harts to crie out: Sorow a while would needes ſpeake his owne language without vſing their tongues to be his interpreters. At laſt Zelmane brake ſilēce, but ſpake with the onely eloquence of amazement: for all her long methodized oration was inherited onely by ſuch kinde of ſpeeches. Deare Ladie, in extreame neceſſities we muſt not. But alas vnfortunate wretch that I am, that I liue to ſee this day. And I take heauen and earth to witneſſe, that nothing: & with that her breaſt ſwelled ſo with ſpite and griefe, that her breath had not leaſure to turne it ſelfe into words. But the ſweet Philoclea that had alreadie dyed in Pamela, & of the other ſide had the heauineſſe of her hart ſomething quickned in the moſt beloued ſight of Zelmane, gheſſed ſomewhat at Zelmanes mind; and therfore ſpake vnto her in this ſort: My Pirocles (ſaid ſhee) I knowe this exceeding comfort of your preſence, is not brought vnto mee for any good-will that is owed vnto me: but (as I ſuppoſe) to make you perſwade me to ſaue my life with the ranſome of mine honour: although no bodie ſhould be ſo vnfit a pleader in that cauſe as your ſelfe, yet perchance you would haue me liue. Your honour? God forbid (ſaid Zelmane) that euer, for any cauſe, I ſhould yeeld to any touch of it. But a while to pretend ſome affection, till time, or my libertie might work ſomething for your ſeruice: this, if my aſtoniſhed ſenſes would giue me leaue, I would faine haue perſwaded you.

To what purpoſe my Pyrocles? (ſaid Philoclea) of a miſerable time what gaine is there? Hath Pamelas example wrought no more in me? is a captiue life ſo much worth? can euer it goe out of theſe lips, that I loue any other but Pyrocles? ſhall my tongue be ſo falſe a traitor to my heart, as to ſay I loue any other but Pyrocles? And why ſhould I do all this? to liue? O Pamela, ſiſter Pamela, why ſhould I liue? onely for thy ſake Pyrocles I would liue: but to thee I know too well I ſhall not liue; and if not to thee, hath thy loue ſo baſe allay, my Pyrocles, as to wiſh me to liue? for diſſimulation, my Pyrocles, my ſimplicitie is ſuch, that I haue hardly bene able to keep a ſtraight way, what ſhall I do in a crooked? But in this caſe there is no meane of diſſimulation, not for the cunningeſt: preſent anſwer is required, and preſent performance vpon the anſwer. Art thou ſo terrible ô death? No my Pyrocles; and for that I do thanke thee, and in my ſoule thanke thee; for I confeſſe the loue of thee is herein my chiefeſt vertue. Trouble me not therefore deare Pyrocles, nor double not my death by tormenting my reſolution: ſince I cannot liue with thee, I will die for thee. Only remember me, deare Pyrocles, and loue the remembrance of me: and if I may craue ſo much of thee, let me be thy laſt loue, for though I be not worthy of thee (who indeed art the worthieſt creature liuing) yet remember that my loue was a worthy loue. But Pyrocles was ſo ouercome with ſorow (which wiſdome and vertue made iuſt in ſo excellent a Ladies caſe, full of ſo excellent kindneſſe) that words were aſhamed to come forth, knowing how weake they were to expreſſe his mind, and her merit: and therfore ſo ſtayed in a deadly ſilence, forſaken of hope, and forſaking comfort: till the appointed guardians came in, to ſee the fruites of Zelmanes labour: and then Zelmane warned by their preſence, fel againe to perſwade, though ſcarcely her ſelfe could tell what; but in ſumme, deſirous of delayes. But Philoclea, ſweetly continuing conſtant, and in the end puniſhing her importunitie with ſilence, Zelmane was faine to end. Yet crauing another times conference, ſhe obtained it, and diuerſe others; till at the laſt Cecropia found it was to no purpoſe, & therfore determined to follow her owne way. Zelmane yet ſtill deſirous to win (by any means) reſpite, euen waſted with ſorow, & vncertaine, whether in worſe caſe in her preſence, or abſence, being able to do nothing for Philocleas ſuccour, but by ſubmitting the greateſt courage of the earth to fall at the feet of Cecropia, & craue ſtay of their ſentence till the vttermoſt was ſeene, what her perſwaſions might do.

Cecropia ſeemed much to be moued by her importunitie, ſo as diuers dayes were wonne of painefull life to the excellent Philoclea: while Zelmane ſuffered ſome hope to cheriſh her mind, eſpecially truſting vpon the helpe of Muſidorus, who (ſhe knew) would not be idle in this matter, till one morning a noiſe awaked Zelmane, from whoſe ouer-watchfull mind, the tired body had ſtolne a litle ſleepe: & ſtraight with the firſt opening of her eyes, Care taking his wonted place, ſhe ran to the window which looked into the hall (for that way the noyſe guided her) & there might ſhe ſee (the curtaine being left open euer ſince the laſt execution) ſeuen or eight perſons in a cluſter vpon the ſcaffold: who by and by retiring themſelues, nothing was to be ſeene thereupon, but a baſen of gold pitifully enamelled with bloud, and in the midſt of it, the head of the moſt beautifull Philoclea. The horribleneſſe of the miſchiefe was ſuch, as Pyrocles could not at firſt beleeue his owne ſenſes, but bent his wofull eyes to diſcerne it better: where too well he might ſee it was Philocleas ſelfe, hauing no veile, but beautie ouer her face, which ſtill appeared to be aliue; ſo did thoſe eyes ſhine, euen as they were wont, and they were wont more then any other: and ſometimes as they moued, it might well make the beholder thinke, that death therein had borowed her beautie, and not they any way diſgraced by death, ſo ſweet and piercing a grace they caried with them.

It was not a pitie, it was not an amazement, it was not a ſorow which then laid hold on Pyrocles, but a wilde furie of deſperate agony, ſo that he cried out, O tyrant heauen, traitor earth, blind prouidence, no iuſtic, how is this done? how is this ſuffered? hath this world a gouernment? If it haue, let it powre out all his miſchiefs vpon me, and ſee whether it haue power to make me more wretched then I am. Did ſhe excell for this? haue I prayed for this? abhominable hand that did it; deteſtable deuill that commanded it; curſed light that beheld it: & if the light be curſed, what are then mine eyes that haue ſeene it? And haue I ſeene Philoclea dead, and do I liue? and haue I liued, not to helpe her, but to talke of her? and ſtand I ſtill talking? And with that (caried with the madneſſe of anguiſh, not hauing a readier way to kill himſelfe) he ran as hard as euer he could with his head againſt the wall, with intention to braine himſelfe: but the haſte to do it made the doing the ſlower. For as he came to giue the blow, his foote tript, ſo as it came not with the full force: yet forcible enough to ſtrike him downe; and withall to depriue him of his ſence, ſo that he lay a while comforted by the hurt, in that he felt not his diſcomfort.

And when he came againe to himſelfe, he heard, or he thought he heard a voyce which cried, Reuenge, Reuenge vnto him; whether indeed it were his good Angell, which vſed that voyce to ſtay him from vnnaturall murdering of himſelfe; or that his wandering ſpirits lighted vpon that conceit, and by their weakneſſe ſubiect to apprehenſions) ſuppoſed they heard it. But that indeed, helped with Vertue, and her valiant ſeruant Anger, ſtopped him from preſent deſtroying himſelfe: yeelding in reaſon and manhood, firſt to deſtroy man, woman and child, that were any way of kinne to them that were acceſſarie to this crueltie; then to raze the Caſtle, and to builda ſumptuous monument for her ſiſter, and a moſt ſumptuous for herſelfe, and then himſelfe to die vpon her tombe. This determining in himſelfe to do, and to ſeeke all meanes how (for that purpoſe) to get out of priſon: he was content a while to beare the thirſt of death: & yet went he againe to the window, to kiſſe the beloued head with his eyes, but there ſaw he nothing but the ſcaffold, all couered ouer with ſcarlet, and nothing but ſolitarie ſilence to mourne this miſchiefe. But then, Sorow hauing diſperſt it ſelfe from his heart, into all his noble parts, it proclaimed his authoritie, in cries and teares, & with a more gentle dolefulneſſe could powre out his inward euill.

Alas (ſaid he) and is that head taken away too, ſo ſoone from mine eyes? What, mine eyes, perhaps they enuie the excellencie of your ſorow? Indeed, there is nothing now left to become the eyes of all mankind, but teares: and woe be to me, if any exceed me in wofulneſſe. I do coniure you all my ſenſes, to accept no obiect but of ſorow, be aſhamed, nay, abhorre to thinke of comfort. Vnhappie eyes you haue ſeene too much, that euer the light ſhould be welcome to you: vnhappie eares, you ſhall neuer heare the muſike of muſike in her voyce: vnhappy hart that haſt liued to feele theſe pangs. Thou haſt done thy worſt, World, and curſed be thou, and curſed art thou, ſince to thine owne ſelfe thou haſt done the worſt thou couldeſt do. Exiled Beautie, let onely now thy beautie be blubbered faces. Widowed Muſike, let now thy tunes be rorings, and lamentations. Orphane Vertue, get thee wings, and flie after her into heauen; here is no dwelling place for thee thee. Why liued I, alas? Alas why loued I? to die wretched, and to be the example of the heauens hate? And hate and ſpare not, for your worſt blow is ſtriken. Sweet Philoclea, thou art gone, and haſt caried with thee my loue; and haſt left thy loue in me, and I wretched man do liue; I liue, to die continually, till thy reuenge do giue me leaue to die: and then die I will, my Philoclea, my heart willingly makes this promiſe to it ſelfe. Surely he did not looke vpon thee, that gaue the cruell blow: for no eye could haue abidden to ſee ſuch beautie ouerthrowne by ſuch miſchiefe. Alas, why ſhould they deuide ſuch a head from ſuch a body? no other bodie is worthy of that head; no other head is worthy of that body: O yet, if I had taken my laſt leaue, if I might haue taken a holy kiſſe from that dying mouth. Where art thou Hope, which promiſeſt neuer to leaue a man while he liueth? tel me, what canſt thou hope for? nay tell me, what is there which I would willinglie hope after? Wiſhing power (which is accounted infinite) what now is left to wiſh for? She is gone, and gone with her all my hope, al my wiſhing. Loue, be aſhamed to be called loue: cruel Hate, vnſpeakeable Hate is victorious ouer thee. Who is there now left, that can iuſtifie thy tyrannie, & giue reaſon to thy paſſion? O cruell diuorce of the ſweeteſt mariage that euer was in Nature: Philoclea is dead, and dead is with her all goodneſſe, all ſweetneſſe, all excellencie. Philoclea is dead, and yet life is not aſhamed to continue vpon the earth. Philoclea is dead: ô deadlie word, which containeth in it ſelfe the yttermoſt of all my misfortunes. But happie word when thou ſhalt be ſaid of me, and long it ſhall not be, before it be ſaid.

Then ſtopping his words with ſighes, drowning his ſighes in teares, and drying againe his teares in rage, he would ſit a while in a wandering muſe, which repreſented nothing but vexations vnto him: then throwing himſelfe ſometime vpon the floore, and ſometimes vpon the bed: then vp againe, till walking was wearieſome & reſt loathſome: and ſo neither ſuffering food, nor ſleepe to help his afflicted nature, all that day and night he did nothing but weepe Philoclea, ſigh Philoclea, and crie out Philoclea; till as it happened (at that time vpō his bed) toward the dawning of the day, he heard one ſtirre in his chamber, by the motion of garments; and with an angrie voyce asked, Who was there? A poore Gentlewoman (anſwered the partie) that wiſh long life vnto you. And I ſoone death to you (ſaid he) for the horrible curſe you haue giuen me. Certainely (ſaid ſhe) an vnkind anſwer, and farre vnworthie the excellencie of your mind, but not vnſutable to the reſt of your behauiour. For moſt part of this night I haue heard you (being let into your chamber, you neuer perceiuing it, ſo was your mind eſtranged from your ſenſes) and haue heard nothing of Zelmane, in Zelmane, nothing but weake waylings, fitter for ſome nurſe of a village, then ſo famous a creature as you are. O God (cried out Pyrocles) that thou wert a man that vſeſt theſe words vnto me. I tell thee I am ſorie, I tell thee I will be ſorie in deſpite of thee, & all them that would haue me ioyfull. And yet (replied ſhe) perchaunce Philoclea is not dead, whom you ſo much bemone. I would we were both dead on that condition, ſaid Pyrocles. See the folly of your paſſion (ſaid ſhe) as though you ſhould be nearer to her, you being dead, and ſhee aliue; then ſhee being dead, and you aliue: and if ſhe be dead, was ſhe not borne to die? what then do you crie out for? not for her, who muſt haue died one time or other; but for ſome fewe yeares: ſo as it is time and this world, that ſeeme ſo louely things, and not Philoclea vnto you. O noble ſiſters (cried Pyrocles) now you be gone (who were the onely exalters of all womankinde) what is left in that ſex, but babling and buſineſſe? And truely (ſaid ſhe) I will yet a little longer trouble you. Nay, I praie you do (ſaid Pyrocles) for I wish for nothing in my short life but mischiefs & cumbers: and I am content you shall be one of them. In truth (said she) you would thinke your selfe a greatly priuiledged person, if since the strongest building, & lastingest monarchies are subiect to end, only your Philoclea (because she is yours) should be exempted. but indeed you bemone your self, who haue lost a friend; you cannot her, who hath in one act both preserued her honour, and left the miseries of this world. O womans philosophie, childish follie (said Pyrocles) as though if I do bemone my selfe, I haue not reason to do so, hauing lost more then any monarchie, nay then my life can be worth vnto me. Alas (said she) comfort your selfe, Nature did not forget her skill, when she had made them: you shal find many their superiours, and perchance such, as (when your eyes shall looke abroad) your selfe will like better.

But that speech put all good maners out of the conceit of Pyrocles; in so much, that leaping out of his bed, he ran to haue striken her: but comming neare her (the morning then winning the field of darkenesse) he saw, or he thought he saw, indeed, the verie face of Philoclea; the same sweetnesse, the same grace, the same beautie: with which caried into a diuine astonishment, he fell downe at her feet. Most blessed Angell (said he) well hast thou done to take that shape, since thou wouldest submit thy selfe to mortall sence; for a more Angelicall forme could not haue bin created for thee. Alas, euen by that excellent beautie, so beloued of me, let it be lawfull for me to aske of thee, what is the cause that she, that heauenly creature, whose forme you haue taken, shold by the heauens be destined to so vnripe an end? Why should vniustice so preuaile? Why was she seene to the world so soone to be rauished from vs? Why was she not suffered to liue, to teach the world perfection? Do not deceiue thy selfe (answered she) I am no Angell; I am Philoclea, the same Philoclea, so truly louing you, so truly beloued of you. If it be so (said he) that you are indeed the soule of Philoclea, you haue done well to keepe your owne figure: for no heauen could haue giuen you a better. Then alas why haue you taken the paines to leaue your blissefull seate to come to this place most wretched, to me, who am wretchednesse it selfe, and not rather obtaine for me, that I might come where you are, there eternally to behold, and eternally to loue your beauties? You know (I know) that I desire nothing but death, which I onely stay, to be iustly reuenged of your vniust murtherers. Deare Pyrocles (said she) I am thy Philoclea, & as yet liuing: not murdered, as you supposed, and therefore be comforted. And with that gaue him her hand. But the sweet touch of that hand seemed, to his astrayed powers so heauenly a thing, that it rather for a while confirmed him in his former beleefe: till she wit[h] vehement protestations (and desire that it might be so, helping to perswade that it w[as] so) brought him to yeeld; yet doubtfully to yeeld to this height of all comfort, that Philoclea liued: which witnessing with teares of ioy, Alas (said he) how shall I beleeue mine eyes any more? or do you yet but appeare thus vnto me, to stay me from some desperate end? For alas I saw the excellent Pamela beheaded: I saw your head (the head indeed, and chiefe part indeed of all Natures works) standing in a dish of gold, too meane a shrine (God wot) for such a relike. How can this be, my onely deare, and you liue? or if this be not so, how can I beleeue mine owne senses? and if I cannot beleeue them, why should I now beleeue these blessed tidings they bring me?

The truth is (said she) my Pyrocles, that neither I (as you find) nor yet my deare sister is dead: although the mischieuously suttle Cecropia vsed sleights to make either of vs thinke so of other. For, hauing in vaine attempted the farthest of her wicked eloquence eloquence, to make eyther of vs yeeld to her sonne, & seeing that neither it, accompanied with great flatteries, and riche presents, could get any ground of vs, nor yet the violent way she fell into of cruelly tormenting our bodies, could preuayle with vs, at last, she made either of vs thinke the other dead, & so hoped to haue wrested our mindes to the forgetting of vertue: & first she gaue to mine eyes the miserable spectacle of my sisters (as I thought) death: but indeed it was not my sister: it was onely Artesia, she who so cunningly brought vs to this misery. Truly I am sory for the poore Gentlewoman, though iustly she be punished for her double falshood: but Artesia muffled so, as you could not easily discerne her; and in my sisters apparell (which they had taken from her vnder colour of giuing her other) did they execute: And when I (for thy sake especially deare Pyrocles) could by no force, nor feare be won, they assayed the like with my sister, by bringing me downe vnder the scaffold & (making mee thrust my heade vp through a hole they had made therein) they did put about my poore neck a dish of gold, wherout they had beaten the bottom, so as hauing set bloud in it, you sawe how I played the part of death) God knowes euen willing to haue done it in earnest) and so had they set me, that I reached but on tiptoes to the ground, so as scarcely I could breathe, much lesse speake: And truely if they had kept me there any whit longer, they had strangled me, in steed of beheadding me: but then they tooke me away, and seeking to see their issue of this practise they found my noble sister (for the deare loue she vouchsafeth to beare me) so grieued withall, that shee willed them to do their vttermost crueltie vnto her: for she vowed, neither to receiue sustenance of them that had bene the causers of my murther: and finding both of vs, euen giuen ouer, not like to liue many houres longer, and my sister Pamela, rather worse then my selfe, (the strength of her heart worse bearing those indignities) the good woman Cecropia (with the same pittie as folkes keepe foule, when they are not fatte inough for their eating) made vs know her deceipt, and let vs come one to another; with what ioy you can well imagine, who I know feele the like; sauing that we only thought our selues reserued to miseries, & therefore fitter for condoling, then congratulating. For my part, I am fully perswaded, it is but with a little respite, to haue a more feeling sense of the torments she prepares for vs. True it is, that one of my guardians would haue me to beleeue, that this proceeds of my gentle cousin Amphialus: who hauing heard some inkling that we were euill entreated, had called his mother to his bedside, from whence he neuer rose since his last combate, and besought, and charged her vpon all the loue she bare him, to vse vs with al kindnesse: vowing, with al the imprecations he could imagine, that if euer he vnderstood for his sake, that I receiued further hurt then the want of my libertie, he would not liue an houre longer. And the good woman sware to me that he would kill his mother, if he knewe how I had bene dealt with; but that Cecropia keepes him from vnderstanding things how they passe, onely hauing heard a whispering, and my selfe named, he had (of abundance, forsooth, of honourable loue) giuen this charge for vs. Whereupon this enlargement of mine was growne: for my part I know too well their cunning (who leaue no money vnoffered that may buy mine honour) to beleeue any word they say, but (my deare Pyrocles) euen looke for the worst, and prepare my selfe for the same. Yet I must confesse, I was content to robbe from death, and borrow of my miserie the sweet comfort of seeing my sweet sister, and most sweete comfort of thee my Pyrocles. And so hauing leaue, I came stealing into your chamber: where (O Lord) what a ioy it was vnto me, to heare you solemnise the funeralls of the poore Philoclea. That

I my ſelfe might liue to heare my death bewailed ? and by whome ? by my deere Pyrocles. That I ſaw death was not ſtrong enough to diuide thy loue from me ? O my Pyrocles, I am too well payde for my paines I haue ſuffered : ioyfull is my woe for ſo noble a cauſe; and welcome be all miſeries, ſince to thee I am ſo welcome. Alas how I pittied to heare thy pittie of me; and yet a great while I could not finde in my heart to interrupt thee, but often had euen pleaſure to weepe with thee: and ſo kindly came forth thy lamentations, that they inforced me to lament too, as if indeed I had bene a looker on, to ſee poore Philoclea dye. Till at laſt I ſpake with you, to try whether I could remoue thee from ſorrow, till I had almoſt procured my ſelfe a beating. And with that ſhe pretily ſmiled, which mingled with her teares, one could not tell whether it were a mourning pleaſure, or a delightfull ſorrow : but like when a few Aprill drops are ſcattered by a gentle Zephyrus among fine coloured flowers. But Pyrocles, who had felt (with ſo ſmall diſtance of time) in himſelfe the ouerthrow both of hope and deſpaire, knew not to what key he ſhould tune his minde, either of ioy, or ſorrow. But finding perfite reaſon in neither, ſuffred himſelfe to be caried by the tide of his imagination, and his imaginations to be raiſed euen by the ſway, which hearing or ſeeing, might giue vnto them : he ſaw her aliue, he was glad to ſee her aliue : he ſaw her weepe, he was ſorie to ſee her weepe: he heard her comfortable ſpeeches, nothing more gladſome: he heard her prognoſticating her owne deſtruction, nothing more dolefull. But when he had a little taken breath from the panting motion of ſuch contrarietie in paſſions, he fell to conſider with her of her preſent eſtate, both comforting her, that certainly the worſt of this ſtorme was paſt, ſince alreadie they had done the worſt, which mans wit could imagine : and that if they had determined to haue killed her, now they would haue done it : and alſo earneſtly counſelling her, and enabling his counſels with vehement prayers, that ſhee would ſo farre ſecond the hopes of Amphialus, as that ſhee might but procure him libertie; promiſing then as much to her, as the liberalitie of louing courage durſt promiſe to himſelfe.

But who could liuely deſcribe the manner of theſe ſpeeches, ſhould paint out the lightſome colours of affection, ſhaded with the deepeſt ſhadowes of ſorrow, finding then betweene hope and feare, a kinde of ſweetneſſe in teares : till Philoclea content to receiue a kiſſe, and but a kiſſe of Pyrocles, ſealed vp his moning lips, and cloſed them vp in comfort: and her-ſelfe (for the paſſage was left betweene them open) went to her ſiſter: with whome ſhee had ſtayed but a while, fortifying one another (while Philoclea tempered Pamelas iuſt diſdaine, and Pamela ennobled Philocleas ſweete humbleneſſe) when Amphialus came vnto them : who neuer ſince he had heard Philoclea named, could be quiet in himſelfe, although none of them about him (fearing more his mothers violence then his power) would diſcouer what had paſſed : and many meſſages he ſent to know her eſtate, which brought anſwers backe, according as it pleaſed Cecropia to indite them, till his heart full of vnfortunate affection, more and more miſgiuing him, hauing impatiently borne the delay of the nights vnfitneſſe, this morning he gat vp, and though full of wounds (which not without danger could ſuffer ſuch exerciſe) he apparelled himſelfe, and with a countenance, that ſhewed ſtrength in nothing but in griefe, he came where the ſiſters were; and weakely kneeling downe, he beſought them to pardon him, if they had not bene vſed in that caſtle according to their worthineſſe, and his duetie; beginning to excuſe ſmall matters, poore Gentleman, not knowing in what ſort they had bene handled.

But Pamelas high heart (hauing conceiued mortall hate for the iniurie offered to her and her ſiſter) could ſcarcelie abide his ſight, much leſſe heare out his excuſes; but interrupted him with theſe words. Traitor (ſaid ſhe) to thine owne blood, and falſe to the profeſſion of ſo much loue as thou haſt vowed, do not defile our eares with thy excuſes; but purſue on thy crueltie, that thou and thy godly mother haue vſed towards vs: for my part, aſſure thy ſelfe, and ſo do I anſwer for my ſiſter (whoſe mind I know) I do not more deſire mine owne ſafetie then thy deſtruction. Amazed with this ſpeech, he turned his eye, full of humble ſorrowfulneſſe, to Philoclea. And is this (moſt excellent Ladie) your doome of me alſo? She, ſweet Ladie, ſate weeping: for as her moſt noble kinſman ſhe had euer fauoured him, and loued his loue, though ſhe could not be in loue with his perſon; and now partly vnkindneſſe of his wrong, partly pitie of his caſe, made her ſweet mind yeeld ſome teares, before ſhe could anſwere; and her anſwere was no other, but that ſhe had the ſame cauſe as her ſiſter had. He replied no further, but deliuering from his heart two or three (vntaught) ſighes, roſe, and with moſt low reuerence, went out of their chamber: and ſtraight by threatning torture, learned of one of the women, in what terrible maner thoſe Princeſſes had bene vſed. But when he heard it, crying out, O God; and then not able to ſay any more (for his ſpeech went backe to rebound woe vpon his heart) he needed no iudge to go vpon him: for no man could euer thinke anie other worthy of greater puniſhment, then he thought himſelfe. Full therefore of the horribleſt deſpaire, which a moſt guiltie conſcience could breed, with wild lookes promiſing ſome terrible iſſue, vnderſtanding his mother was vpon the top of the leads, he caught one of his ſeruants ſwords from him, and none of them daring to ſtay him, he went vp, caried by furie, in ſteed of ſtrength; where ſhe was at that time, muſing how to go thorough with this matter, and reſoluing to make much of her Neeces in ſhew, and ſecretly to impoyſon them; thinking ſince they were not to be wonne, her ſonnes loue would no otherwiſe be mitigated.

But when ſhe ſaw him come in with a ſword drawne, and a looke more terrible then the ſword, ſhe ſtreight was ſtricken with the guiltineſſe of her owne conſcience: yet the well knowne humbleneſſe of her ſonne ſomewhat animated her, till he, comming nearer her, and crying to her, Thou damnable creature, onely fit to bring forth ſuch a monſter of vnhappineſſe as I am; ſhe fearing he would haue ſtriken her (though indeed he meant it not, but onely intended to kill himſelfe in her preſence) went backe ſo far, til ere ſhe were aware, ſhe ouerthrew her ſelfe from ouer the Leads, to receiue her deaths kiſſe at the ground: and yet was ſhe not ſo happie as preſently to die, but that ſhe had time with helliſh agonie to ſee her ſonnes miſchiefe (whom ſhe loued ſo well) before her end; whē ſhe confeſt (with moſt deſperate, but not repenting mind) the purpoſe ſhe had to impoyſon the Princeſſes, and would then haue had them murdered. But euery body ſeeing, & glad to ſee her end, had left obedience to her tyranny.

And (if it could be) her ruine increaſed woe in the noble heart of Amphialus, who when he ſaw her fall, had his owne rage ſtayed a litle with the ſodainneſſe of her deſtruction. And was I not enough miſerable before (ſaid he) but that before my end I muſt be the death of my mother? who how wicked ſoeuer, yet I would ſhe had receiued her puniſhment by ſome other. O Amphialus, wretched Amphialus, thou haſt liued to be the death of thy moſt deare companion and friend Philoxenus, and of his father, thy moſt carefull foſter-father. Thou haſt liued to kill a Lady with thine owne hands, and ſo excellent and vertuous a Lady as the faire *Partheni*a was: thou haſt liued to ſee thy faithful Iſmenus ſlaine in ſuccouring thee, and thou not able to defend him: thou haſt liued to ſhew thy ſelfe ſuch a coward, as that one vnknown knight could ouercome thee in thy Ladies preſence: thou haſt liued to beare armes againſt thy rightful Prince, thine own vncle: thou haſt liued to be accounted, & iuſtly accounted a traitor, by the moſt excellēt perſons that this world holdeth: thou haſt liued to be the death of her, that gaue thee life. But ah wretched Amphialus, thou haſt liued for thy ſake, and by thy authoritie, to haue Philoclea tormented. O heauens, in Amphialus caſtle, where Amphialus commaunded; tormented, tormented? Torment of my ſoule, Philoclea tormented; and thou haſt had ſuch comfort in thy life, as to liue all this while. Perchance this hand (vſed onely to miſchieuous acts) thinks it were too good a deed to kill me; or elſe filthy hand, onely worthy to kil women, thou art affraid to ſtrike a man. Feare not cowardly hand, for thou ſhalt kill but a cowardly traitor; and do it gladly; for thou ſhalt kill him whom Philoclea hateth. With that furiouſlie he tare open his doublet, and ſetting the pommel of the ſword to the ground, and the point to his breaſt, he fell vpon it. But the ſword more mercifull then he to himſelf, with the ſlipping of the pommel, the point ſwarued, and razed him but vpon the ſide: yet with the fall, his other wounds opened ſo, as he bled in ſuch extremitie, that Charons boat might verie well be caried in that floud: which yet he ſought to haſten by this means. As he opened his doublet & fel, there fell out Philocleas kniues, which Cecropia at the firſt had taken from her, & deliuered to her ſonne; & he had euer worne them next his heart, as the onely relike he had of his Saint: now ſeeing them by him (his ſword being ſo, as weakeneſſe could not well draw it out from his doublet) he tooke the kniues, and pulling one of them out, and manie times kiſſing it, and then, firſt with the paſſions of kindneſſe and vnkindneſſe melting in teares: O deare kniues, you are come in a good time, to reuēge the wrong I haue done you all this while, in keeping you from her bleſſed ſidē, and wearing you without your miſtreſſe leaue. Alas, be witneſſe with me, yet before I die (and well you may, for you haue laine next my heart) that by my conſent, your excellent miſtreſſe ſhould haue had as much honour as this poore place could haue brought forth for ſo high an excellencie; and now I am condemned to die by her mouth. Alas, other, farre other hope would my deſire often haue giuen me; but other euent it hath pleaſed her to lay vpon me. Ah Philoclea (with that his teares guſhed out, as though they would ſtriue to ouerflow his bloud) I would yet thou kneweſt how I loue thee. Vnworthie I am, vnhappie I am, falſe I am; but to thee alas, I am not falſe. But what a traitor am I, any way to excuſe him, whom ſhe cōdemneth? Since there is nothing left me, wherin I may do her ſeruice, but in puniſhing him, who hath ſo offended her. Deare knife, then do your noble miſtreſſes commandement. With that, he ſtabbed himſelfe into diuerſe places of his breaſt and throte, vntill thoſe wounds (with the old, freſhly bleeding) brought him to the ſenceleſſe gate of death. By which time, his ſeruants hauing (with feare of his fury) abſtained a while from comming vnto him, one of them (preferring dutifull affection before fearefull dutie) came in, and there found him ſwimming in his owne bloud, giuing a pitifull ſpectacle, where the conqueſt was the conquerours ouerthrow, and ſelfe-ruine the onely triumph of a battaile, fought betweene him and himſelfe. The time full of daunger, the perſon full of worthineſſe, the maner full of horror, did greatly aſtoniſh all the beholders: ſo as by and by, all the towne was full of it, and then of all ages came running vp to ſee the beloued body; euerie bodie thinking their safetie bled in his wounds, and their honor died in his destruction.

But when it came, (& quickly it came) to the eares of hi sproud friend Anaxius, (who by that time was growen well of his wound, but neuer had come abroad, disdaining to abase himselfe to the companie of any other but of Amphialus) he was exceedingly vexed, either with kindnesse, or (if a proud heart be not capable thereof) with disdaine, that he, who had the honor to be called the friend of Anaxius, should come to such an vnexpected ruine. Therefore, then comming abroad, with a face red in anger, and engrained in pride, with liddes raised, and eyes leuelling from top to toe of them that met him, treading, as though he thought to make the earth shake vnder him, with his hand vpon his sword; short speeches, and disdainfull answers, giuing streight order to his two brothers, to go take the oath of obedience, in his name, of all the souldiers, and Citizens in the towne: and withall, to sweare them to reuenge the death of Amphialus, vpon Basilius. He himselfe went to see him, calling for all the surgeons and physicions there; spending some time in viewing the body, and threatning them all to be hanged, if they did not heale him. But they (taking view of his wounds, and falling downe at Anaxius feete) assured him, that they were mortall, and no possible meanes to keepe him aboue two daies aliue: and he stood partly in doubt, to kill, or saue them, betweene his owne furie, and their humblenesse. But vowing, with his owne hands to kill the two sisters, as causers of his friends death: when his brothers came to him, and told him they had done his cõmaundement, in hauing receiued the oath of alleageance, with no great difficultie: the most part terrified by their valure, and force of their seruants, and many that had bene forward actors in the rebellion, willing to do any thing, rather then come vnder the subiection of Basilius againe; and such fewe as durst gainsay, being cut off by present slaughter.

But withall (as the chiefe matter of their comming to him) they told Anaxius, that the faire Queene Helen was come, with an honourable retinue, to the towne: humbly desiring leaue to see Amphialus, whome she had sought in many places of the world; & lastly, being returned into her own countrie, she heard together of the late siege, and of his combat with the strange Knight, who had dangerously hurt him. Wherupon, full of louing care (which she was content euen to publish to the world, how vngratefully soeuer he dealt with her) she had gotten leaue of Basilius, to come by his frontiers, to cary away Amphialus with her, to the excellentest surgeon then knowen, whom she had in her countrey, but so old, as not able to trauaile: but had giuen her soueraigne annointments, to preserue his body withall, till he might be brought vnto him: and that Basilius had graunted leaue: either naturall kindnesse preuailing ouer all the offences done, or rather glad to make any passage, which might leade him out of his countrie, & from his daughters. This discourse Lycurgus vnderstanding of Helen, deliuered to his brother, with her vehement desire to see the bodie, and take her last farewell of him. Anaxius, though he were fallen out with all womankind (in respect of the hate he bare the sisters, whome he accounted murtherers of Amphialus) yet at his brothers request, graunted her leaue. And she (poore Lady) with grieuous expectation, and languishing desire, caried her faint legs to the place where he lay, either not breathing, or in all appearance breathing nothing but death.

In which piteous plight when she saw him, though Sorow had set before her mind the pitifullest conceit thereof that it could paint, yet the present sight went beyond all former apprehensions: so that beginning to kneele by the bodie, her ſight ranne from her ſeruice, rather then abide ſuch a ſight; and ſhe fell in a ſowne vpon him, as if ſhe could not chooſe but dye of his wounds. But when her breath (aweary to be cloſed vp in woe) broke the priſon of her faire lips, and brought memorie (with his ſeruant ſenſes) to his naturall office, ſhe yet made the breath conuey theſe dolefull wordes with it. Alas (ſaid ſhe) Amphialus, what ſtrange diſaſters be theſe, that hauing ſought thee ſo long, I ſhould be now ſorie to finde thee? that theſe eyes ſhould looke vpon Amphialus, and be grieued withall? that I ſhould haue thee in my power without glory, and embrace thee without comfort? How often haue I bleſt the meanes that might bring me neere thee? Now, woe worth the cauſe that brings me ſo neere thee. Often, alas, often haſt thou diſdained my teares: but now, my deare Amphialus, receiue them: theſe eyes can ſerue for nothing elſe, but to weepe for thee; ſince thou wouldeſt neuer vouchſafe them thy comfort, yet diſdaine not them thy ſorrow. I would they had bene more deare vnto thee; for then hadſt thou liued. Woe is me that thy noble heart could loue who hated thee, and hate who loued thee. Alas, why ſhould not my faith to thee couer my other defects, who only ſought to make my Crowne thy foot-ſtoole, my ſelfe thy ſeruant? that was all my ambition; and alas thou diſdaineſt it to ſerue them, by whome thy incomparable ſelfe wert diſdained. Yet (ô Philoclea) where-ſoeuer you are, pardon me, if I ſpeake in the bitterneſſe of my ſoule, excellent may you be in all other things (and excellent ſure you are ſince he loued you) your want of pittie, where the fault onely was infiniteneſſe of deſert, cannot be excuſed. I would, ô God, I would that you had granted his deſerued ſuite of marrying you, and that I had bene your ſeruing-maide, to haue made my eſtate the foile of your felicitie, ſo he had liued. How many weary ſteps haue I trodden after thee, while my onely complaint was, that thou wert vnkinde? Alas I would now thou wert to be vnkind. Alas why wouldeſt thou not commaund my ſeruice, in perſwading Philoclea to loue thee? Who could, or (if euery one could) who would haue recounted thy perfections ſo well as I? who with ſuch kindly paſſions could haue ſtirred pittie for thee as I? who ſhould haue deliuered not only the words, but the teares I had of thee? and ſo ſhouldeſt thou haue exerciſed thy diſdaine in me, and yet vſed my ſeruice for thee.

With that the body mouing ſomwhat, and giuing a grone ful of deaths muſick, ſhe fell vpon his face, and kiſt him, and withall cried out. O miſerable I, that haue onely fauour by miſerie: and then would ſhee haue returned to a freſh careere of complaints, when an aged and wiſe Gentleman came to her, and beſought her, to remember what was fit for her greatneſſe, wiſdome, and honour: and withall, that it was fitter to ſhew her loue, in carying the body to her excellent Surgeon, firſt applying ſuch excellent medicines as ſhe had receiued of him for that purpoſe, rather then onely ſhew her ſelf a woman-louer in fruitleſſe lamentations. She was ſtreight warned with the obedience of an ouerthrowne minde, and therefore leauing ſome ſurgeons of her owne to dreſſe the body, went her ſelfe to Anaxius, and humbling her ſelfe to him, as lowe as his owne pride could wiſh, beſought him, that ſince the ſurgeons there had vtterly giuen him ouer, that he would let her carie him away in her litter with her, ſince the worſt he could haue ſhould bee to die, and to die in her armes that loued him aboue all things; and where he ſhould haue ſuch monuments erected ouer him, as were fit for her loue, and his worthines: beſeeching him withall, ſince ſhe was in a countrey of enemies (where ſhee truſted more to Anaxius valour, then Baſilius promiſe) that he would cõuey them ſafely out of thoſe territories.

Her

Her reaſons ſomething moued him, but nothing throughly perſwaded him, but the laſt requeſt of his help: which he ſtreight promiſed, warranting all ſecuritie, as long as that ſword had his maſter aliue. She as happy therein as vnhappineſſe could be (hauing receiued as ſmall comfort of her own ſurgeons as of the others) cauſed yet the bodie to be eaſily conueyed into the litter: all the people then beginning to roare and crie, as though neuer till then they had loſt their Lord. And if the terror of Anaxius had not kept them vnder, they would haue mutinied, rather then ſuffered his bodie to be caried away.

But Anaxius him ſelfe riding before the litter, with the choyce men of that place they were affraid euen to crie, though they were ready to crie for feare; but (becauſe that they might do) euery bodie forced (euen with harming themſelues) to do honour to him: ſome throwing themſelues vpon the ground; ſome tearing their clothes, and caſting duſt vpon their heads, and ſome euen wounding themſelues, & ſprinckling their owne bloud in the aire.

The generall conſort of whoſe mourning, perfourmed ſo the naturall tunes of ſorrow; that euen to them (if any ſuch were) that felt not the loſſe, yet others griefe taught them grief; hauing before their compaſſionat ſenſe ſo paſſionate a ſpectacle of a yong man, of great beautie, beautified with great honor, honoured by great valure, made of ineſtimable value, by the noble vſing of it, to lye there languiſhing, vnder the arreſt of death, & a death, where the maner could be no comfort to the diſcomfortableneſſe of the matter. But when the bodie was carried through the gate, & the people (ſauing ſuch as were appointed) not ſuffred to go further, thē was ſuch an vniuerſall crie, as if they had all had but one life, & all receiued but one blow.

Which ſo moued Anaxius to conſider the loſſe of his friend, that (his mind apter to reuenge, then tenderneſſe) he preſently giuing order to his brother to keepe the priſoners ſafe, & vnuiſited, till his returne frō conueying Helen he ſent a meſſenger to the ſiſters, to tell them this curteous meſſage: that at his returne with his own hāds; he would cut off their heads, & ſend them for tokens to their father.

This meſſage was brought vnto the ſiſters, as they ſate at that time together with Zelmane, conferring how to carrie themſelues, hauing heard of the death of Amphialus. And as no expectation of death is ſo painful, as where the reſolution is hindred by the intermixing of hopes, ſo did this new alarum, though not remoue, yet moue ſomwhat the conſtancy of their mindes, which were ſo vnconſtantly dealt with. But within a while, the excellent Pamela had brought her minde againe to his old acquaintance: and then, as carefull for her ſiſter (whom moſt deerely ſhe loued.) Siſter (ſaid ſhe) you ſee how many acts our Tragedie hath: Fortune is not yet awearie of vexing vs: but what? A ſhip is not counted ſtrong for byding one ſtorme: It is but the ſame trumpet of death, which now perhaps giues the laſt ſound: and let vs make that profit of our former miſeries, that in them we learned to dye willingly.

Truely ſaid Philoclea, deare ſiſter, I was ſo beaten with the euils of life, that though I had not vertue enough to deſpiſe the ſweetneſſe of it, yet my weakneſſe bredde that ſtrength, to be wearie of the paines of it: onely I muſt confeſſe, that little hope, which by theſe late accidents was awaked in me, was at the firſt angrie withall. But euen in the darkeneſſe of that horrour, I ſee a light of comfort appeare; & how can I tread amiſſe, that ſee Pamela ſteppes? I would onely (O that my wiſh might take place) that my ſchoole-Miſtres might liue, to ſee mee ſay my leſſon truely. Were that a life, my Philoclea? ſaid Pamela. No, no (ſaid ſhe) let it come, and put on his worſt face: for at the worſt it is but a bug-beare. Ioy is it to me to ſee you ſo well reſolued, and ſince the world will not haue vs, let it loſe vs. Onely (with that ſhee ſtayed a little, and ſighed) onely my Philoclea, (then ſhe bowed downe, & whiſpered in her eare) only Muſidorus, my ſhepheard, comes betwene me and death, & makes me thinke I ſhould not dye, becauſe I know he would not I ſhould dye. With that Philoclea ſighed alſo, ſaying no more, but looking vpon Zelmane: who was walking vp and downe the chamber, hauing heard this meſſage from Anaxius, and hauing in time paſt heard of his nature, thought him like enough to performe it, which winded her againe into the former maze of perplexitie. Yet debating with her ſelfe of the manner how to preuent it, ſhe continued her muſing humour, little ſaying, or indeede, little finding in her hart to ſay, in a caſe of ſuch extremitie, where peremptorily death was threatned: and ſo ſtayed they; hauing yet that comfort, that they might tarie togither. Pamela nobly, Phyloclea ſweetely, and Zelmane ſadly, and deſperately none of them entertaining ſleep, which they thought ſhould ſhortly begin neuer to awake.

But Anaxius came home, hauing ſafely conducted Helen, and ſafely hee might well do it: For though many of Baſilius Knights would haue attempted ſomething vpon Anaxius, by that meanes to deliuer the Ladies; yet Philanax, hauing receiued his maſters commaundement, and knowing his word was giuen, would not conſent vnto it. And the black-Knight (who by them was able to carry abroade his woundes) did not knowe thereof; but was bringing force, by force to deliuer his Lady. So as Anaxius, interpreting it rather feare, then faith, and making euen chance an argument of his vertue, returned: and as ſoone as hee was returned, with a felon hart calling his brother vp with him, he went into the chamber, where they were all three together; with full intention to kill the ſiſters with his owne handes, and ſend their heads for tokens to their father: Though his brothers (who were otherwiſe enclined) diſſwaded him: but his reuerence ſtayed their perſwaſions. But when hee was come into the chamber, with the very wordes of cholerike threatning climing vp his throte, his eyes firſt lighted vpon Pamela; who hearing hee was comming, and looking for death, thought ſhe would keepe her owne maieſtie in welcomming it; but the beames thereof ſo ſtrake his eyes, with ſuch a counterbuffe vnto his pride, that if his anger could not ſo quickly loue, nor his pride ſo eaſily honor, yet both were forced to finde a worthineſſe.

Which while it bred a pauſe in him, Zelmane (who had readie in her minde both what and how to ſay) ſtept out vnto him, and with a reſolute ſtayedneſſe) void either of anger, kindneſſe, diſdaine, or humbleneſſe) ſpake in this ſort. Anaxius (ſaid ſhe) if Fame haue not bene ouerpartiall to thee, thou art a man of exceeding valour. Therefore I do call thee euen before that vertue, & will make it the iudge betweene vs. And now I do affirme, that to the eternall blot of all the faire actes that thou haſt done, thou doeſt weakely, in ſeeking without daunger to reuenge his death, whoſe life with danger thou mightſt perhaps haue preſerued: thou doeſt cowardly, in going about by the death of theſe excellent Ladies, to preuent the iuſt puniſhment that hereafter they by the powers, which they better then their father, or any other could make, might lay vpon thee and doſt moſt baſely, in once preſenting thy ſelfe as an executioner; a vile office vpon men, and in a iuſt cauſe: beyond the degree of any vile worde, in ſo vniuſt a cauſe, and vpon Ladies, and ſuch Ladies. And therefore, as a hangman. I ſay, thou art vnworthy to be counted a knight, or to be admitted into the companie of Knights. Neither for what, I ſay, will I alleadge other reaſons of wiſdome, or iuſtice, to proue my ſpeech, becauſe I know thou doſt diſdaine to be ſpied to their rule, but euen in their own virtue (where of how much glorieſt)

glorieſt) I will make my tryall: & therefore defie thee, by the death of one of vs two to proue or diſproue theſe reproches. Chuſe thee what armes thou likeſt, I only demaund, that theſe Ladies (whom I defend) may in libertie ſee the combat.

When Zelmane began her ſpeech, the excellencie of her beautie & grace, made him a litle content to heare. Beſides that, a new leſſon he had read in Pamela had already taught him ſome regard. But when ſhe entred into brauery of ſpeech, hee thought at firſt, a mad & rayling humor poſſeſt her; till, finding the ſpeeches hold well together, & at length come to flat challenge of combat, he ſtood leaning back with his body & head, ſometimes with bent browes looking vpō the one ſide of her, ſometimes of the other, beyond maruell maruelling, that he, who had neuer heard ſuch ſpeeches from any knight, ſhould be thus rebuffed by a woman; & that maruel made him heare out her ſpeech: which ended, he turned his head to his brother Zoilus, & ſaid nothing, but only lifting vp his eyes, ſmiled. But Zelmane finding his mind, Anaxius (ſaid ſhe) perchance thou diſdaineſt to anſwere me, becauſe (as a woman) thou thinkeſt me not fit to be fought withall. But I tell thee, that I haue bin trayned vp in martiall matters, with ſo good ſucceſſe, that I haue many times ouercome brauer Knights then thy ſelfe: and am well knowne to be equall in feates of armes, to the famous Pyrocles: who ſlue thy valiant Vncle, the Giant Euardes. The remembrance of his Vncles death ſomething netled him, ſo as he anſwered thus.

Indeede (ſayd he) any woman may be as valiant as that coward, and trayterly boy, who ſlue my Vncle trayterouſly, and after ranne from me in the plaine field. Fiue thouſand ſuch could not haue ouercome Euardes, but by falſhood. But I ſought him all ouer Aſia, following him ſtill from one of his cony holes to another, till comming into this Countrie, I heard of my friends being beſieged, and ſo came to blow away the wretches that troubled him. But whereſoeuer the miſerable boy flie, heauen, nor hell, ſhall keepe his heart from being torne by theſe hands. Thou lyeſt in thy throate (ſayd Zelmane) that boye, where euer he went, did ſo noble acts, as thy heart (as proud as it is) dares not thinke of, much leſſe performe. But to pleaſe thee the better with my preſence, I tell thee, no creature can be neerer of kinne to him, then my ſelfe: and ſo well we loue, that he would not be ſorier for his owne death then for mine: I being begotten by his father, of an Amazon Ladie. And therefore, thou canſt not deuiſe to reuenge thy ſelfe more vpon him, then by killing me: which if thou dareſt do, manfullie doo it, otherwiſe, if thou harme theſe incomparable Ladies, or my ſelfe without daring to fight with me, I proteſt before theſe Knights, and before heauen and earth (that will reueale thy ſhame) that thou art the beggarlieſt daſtardly villaine, that diſhonoureth the earth with his ſteps: and if thou letteſt me ouerliue them, ſo will I blaze thee. But al this could not moue Anaxius, but that he onely ſaid, Euill ſhould it become the terrour of the world to fight, much worſe to ſcold with thee.

But (ſaid he) for the death of theſe ſame (pointing to the Princeſſes) of my grace I giue them life. And withall, going to Pamela, and offering to take her by the chin, And as for you, Minion (ſaid he) yeeld but gently to my will, and you ſhall not onlie liue, but liue ſo happilie, He would haue ſaid further, when Pamela, diſpleaſed both with words, matter and maner, putting him away with her faire hand, Proud beaſt (ſaid ſhe) yet thou playeſt worſe thy Comedie, then thy Tragedie. For my part, aſſure thy ſelfe, ſince my deſtinie is ſuch, that at each moment my life and death ſtand in equall ballance, I had rather haue thee, and thinke thee far fitter to be my hangman, then my husband. Pride and anger would faine haue cruellie reuenged so bitter an answer, but already Cupid had begun to make it his sport, to pull his plumes: so that, vnused to a way of curtesie, and put out of his byas of pride, he hastilie went away, grumbling to himselfe; betweene threatning & wishing; leauing his brothers with them: the elder of whom Lycurgus, liked Philoclea, & Zoilus wold needs loue Zelmane, or at least, entertaine thēselues with making them beleeue so. Lycurgus more braggard, & neere his brothers humour, began, with setting forth their blood, their deeds, how many they had despised of most excellent women; how much they were bound to them, that would seeke that of them. In summe, in all his speeches, more like the bestower then the desirer of felicitie. Whō it was an excellent pastime (to those that would delight in the play of vertue) to see with what a wittie ignorance she would not vnderstand: & how, acknowledging his perfections, she would make that one of his perfections, not to be iniurious to Ladies. But when he knew not how to replie, then would he fall to touching and toying, still viewing his graces in no glasse but self-liking. To which Philoclea's shamefastnesse and humblenesse, were as strong resisters as choller and disdaine: for though she yeelded not, he thought she was to be ouercome: and that thought a while stayed him from further violence. But Zelmane had eye to his behauiour, and set it in her memorie vpon the score of reuenge, while she her selfe was no lesse attempted by Zoilus; who lesse full of brags was forwardest in offring (indeed) dishonorable violence.

But when after their fruitlesse labours they had gone away called by their brother, (who began to be perplexed between new conceiued desires, and disdaine to be disdained) Zelmane (who with most assured quietnesse of iudgement looked into their present estate) earnestly perswaded the two sisters, that to auoide the mischiefes of proud outrage, they would onely so farre sute their behauiour to their estates, as they might winne time; which as it could not bring them to worse case then they were, so it might bring forth inexpected reliefe. And why (said Pamela) shall we anie longer flatter aduersitie? Why should we delight to make our selues any longer balles to iniurious Fortune, since our owne parents are content to be tyrants ouer vs, since our owne kinne are content trayterously to abuse vs? Certainly in mishap it may be some comfort to vs that we are lighted in these fellowes hands, who yet will keepe vs from hauing cause of being miserable by our friends meanes. Nothing grieues me more, then that you, noble Ladie Zelmane, (to whō the world might haue made vs able to do honour) should receiue onely hurt by the contagion of our miserie. As for mee and my sister, vndoubtedly it becomes our birth to thinke of dying nobly, while we haue done or suffered nothing, which might make our soule ashamed at the parture from these bodies. Hope is the fawning traytor of the mind, while vnder colour of friendship, it robs it of his chiefe force of resolution. Vertuous and faire Ladie (said Zelmane) what you say is true, and that truth may well make vp apart in the harmonie of your noble thoughts. But yet the time (which ought alwayes to be one) is not tuned for it; while that may bring forth any good, do not barre your self thereof: for then wil be the time to die noblie, when you cannot liue noblie. Then so earnestlie shee perswaded with them both, to referre them-selues to their fathers consent (in obtaining whereof they knew some while would be spent) and by that meanes to temper the mindes of their proud woers; that in the end Pamela yeelded to her becaus she spake reason; and Philoclea yeelded to her reason becaus she spake it.

And

And so when they were againe solicited in that litle pleasing petition, Pamela forced her selfe to make answere to Anaxius, that if her father gaue his consent she would make her selfe beleeue, that such was the heauenly determination, since she had no meanes to auoide it. Anaxius (who was the most franke promiser to himselfe of successe) nothing doubted of Basilius consent, but rather assured himselfe, hee would be his Orator in that matter: and therefore hee chose out an officious seruant (whom he esteemed verie wise, because he neuer found him but iust of his opinion) and willed him to be his Embassadour to Basilius, and to make him know, that if he meant to haue his daughter both safe and happie, and desired himselfe to haue such a sonne in lawe, as would not onely protect him in his quiet course, but (if he listed to accept it) would giue him the monarchie of the world, that then he should receiue Anaxius, who neuer before knew what it was to pray any thing. That if he did not, he would make him know, that the power of Anaxius was in euerie thing beyond his will, and yet his will not to be resisted by any other power. His seruant with smiling and cast-vp looke, desired God to make his memorie able to containe the treasure of that wise speech; and therefore besought him to repeate it againe, that by the oftener hearing it, his mind might be the better acquainted with the diuinesse therof, and that being graciouslie graunted, he then doubted not by carying with him in his conceit, the grace wherewith Anaxius spake it, to perswade rockie minds to their owne harme: so litle doubted he to win Basilius to that, which he thought would make him thinke the heauens opened, when he heard but the proffer thereof. Anaxius grauely allowed the probabilitie of his coniecture, and therefore sent him away, promising him he should haue the bringing vp of his second sonne by Pamela.

The messenger with speed perfourmed his Lords commaundement to Basilius, who by nature quiet, and by superstition made doubtfull, was loth to take any matter of armes in hand, wherein already he had found so slowe successe; though Philanax vehemently vrged him thereunto, making him see that his retiring backe did encourage iniuries. But Basilius betwixt the feare of Anaxius might, the passion of his loue, and iealousie of his estate, was so perplexed, that not able to determine, he tooke the common course of men, to flie onely then to deuotion, when they want resolution: therefore detaining the messenger with delayes, he deferred the directing of his course to the counsell of Apollo, which because himselfe at that time could not well go to require, he entrusted the matter to his best trusted Philanax: who (as one in whom obedience was a sufficient reason vnto him) went with diligence to Delphos, where being entred into the secret place of the Temple, & hauing perfourmed the sacrifices vsuall, the spirit that possest the prophecying woman, with a sacred furie attended not his demand, but as if it would argue him of incredulitie, told him, not in darke wonted speeches, but plainly to be vnderstood, what he came for, and that he should returne to Basilius, and will him to denie his daughters to Anaxius and his brothers, for that they were reserued for such as were better beloued of the Gods. That he should not doubt, for they should returne vnto him safely and speedily. And that he should keepe on his solitarie course, till both Philanax and Basilius fullie agreed in the vnderstanding of the former prophecie: withal commanding Philanax from thenceforward to giue tribute, but not oblatiõ to humane wisdome.

Philanax then finding that reason cannot shew it selfe more reasonable, then to leaue reasoning in things aboue reason, returnes to his Lord, and like one that preferred truth before the maintayning of an opinion, hid nothing from him, nor from thenceforth durſt any more diſſwade him from that which he found by the celeſtiall prouidence directed; but he himſelfe looking to repaire the gouernment as much as in ſo broken an eſtate by ciuill diſſention he might, and fortifying with notable arte, both the Lodges, ſo as they were almoſt made vnapprochable, hee left Baſilius to bemone the abſence of his daughters, and to bewaile the impriſonment of Telmane: yet whollie giuen holily to obey the Oracle, he gaue a reſolute negatiue vnto the meſſenger of Anaxius, who all this while had waited for it, yet in good termes deſiring him to ſhew himſelfe, in reſpect of his birth and profeſſion, ſo princelie a Knight, as without forcing him to ſeeke the way of force, to deliuer in noble ſort thoſe Ladies vnto him, and ſo ſhould the iniurie haue bene in Amphialus, and the benefite in him.

The meſſenger went backe with this anſwere, yet hauing euer vſed to ſuger any thing which his Maiſter was to receiue, he told him, that when Baſilius firſt vnderſtood his deſires, he did ouer-reach ſo farre all his moſt hopefull expectations, that he thought it were too great a boldneſſe to hearken to ſuch a man, in whō the heauens had ſuch intereſt, without asking the Gods counſell, and therefore had ſent his principall Councellerto Delphos, who although he kept the matter neuer ſo ſecret, yet his diligence, inſpired by Anaxius priuiledge ouer all worldly things, had found out the ſecrete, which was, that he ſhould not preſume to marie his daughters to one, who already was enrolled among the demie-gods, and yet much leſſe he ſhould dare the attempting to take them out of his hands.

Anaxius, who till then had made Fortune his creator, and force his God, now began to find another wiſdome to be aboue, that iudged ſo rightlie of him: and where in this time of his ſeruants wayting for Baſilius reſolution, he and his brothers had courted their Ladies, as whom they vouchſafed to haue for their wiues, he reſolued now to dallie no longer in delayes, but to make violence his Oratour, ſince he had found perſwaſions had gotten nothing but anſwers. Which intention he opened to his brothers, who hauing all this while wanted nothing to take that away but his authoritie, gaue ſpurres to his running; and (vnworthy men) neither feeling vertue in themſelues, nor tendering it in others, they were headlong to make that euill conſort of loue and force, when Anaxius had word, that from the Tower there were deſcried ſome companies of armed men, marching towards the towne; wherefore he gaue preſent order to his ſeruants and ſouldiers, to go to the gates and walles, leauing none within but himſelfe and his brothers: his thoughts then ſo full of their entended pray, that Mars-his lowdeſt trumpet could ſcarcely haue awaked him.

But while hee was directing what hee would haue done, his youngeſt brother Zoilus glad that he had the commiſſion, went in the name of Anaxius, to tell the ſiſters, that ſince he had anſwere from their father, that he and his brother Lycurgus ſhould haue them in what ſort it pleaſed them, that they would now graunt them no longer time, but preſentlie to determine, whether they thought it more honourable comfort to be compelled, or perſwaded. Pamela made him anſwere, that in a matter whereon the whole ſtate of her life depended, and wherein ſhe had euer anſwered, ſhe would not lead, but follow her parents pleaſure; ſhe thought it reaſon ſhe ſhold, either by letter, or particular meſſenger vnderſtand ſomthing from thē ſelues & not haue their beleefe bound to the report of their partiall ſeruant, & therfore as to their words, ſhe & her ſiſter had euer a ſimple & true reſolution, ſo againſt their vniuſt force, God they hoped, would either arme their liues, or take away their liues. Well Ladies (ſaid he) I will leaue my brothers, who by and by will come vnto you, to be their owne embaſſadors, for my part, I muſt now do my ſelfe ſeruice. And with that turning vp his muſtachoes, and marching as if he would begin a pauen, he went toward Zelmane. But Zelmane (hauing had all this while of the meſſengers being with Baſilius, much to do to keepe thoſe excellent Ladies from ſeeking by the paſport of death, to eſcape thoſe baſe dangers whereunto they found themſelues ſubiect) ſtill hoping that Muſidorus would finde ſome meanes to deliuer them; and therefore had often both by her owne example, and comfortable reaſons, perſwaded them to ouerpaſſe many inſolent indignities of their proud ſuters, who thought it was a ſufficient fauour not to do the vttermoſt iniurie, now come againe to the ſtreight ſhe moſt feared for them, either of death or diſhonor, if heroicall courage would haue let her, ſhe had bene beyond her ſelf amazed: but that yet held vp her wit, to attend the vttermoſt occaſion, which euen then brought his hairie forehead vnto her: for Zoilus ſmacking his lips, as for the Prologue of a kiſſe, and ſomething aduancing himſelfe, Darling (ſaid he) let thy heart be full of ioy, and let thy faire eyes be of counſell with it, for this day thou ſhalt haue Zoilus, whom many haue longed for; but none ſhall haue him, but Zelmane. And oh, how much glory I haue to thinke what a race will be betwene vs. The world, by the heauens, the world will be too little for them: And with that, he would haue put his arme about her necke, but ſhee withdrawing her ſelfe from him, My Lord (ſaid ſhee) much good may your thoughts do you, but that I may not diſſemble with you, my natiuitie being caſt by one that neuer failed in any of his prognoſtications, I haue bene aſſured, that I ſhould neuer be apt to beare children. But ſince you will honor me with ſo hie fauor, I muſt only deſire that I may performe a vow which I made among my countriwomen, the famous Amazons, that I wold neuer mary none, but ſuch one as was able to withſtand me in Armes: therefore, before I make mine owne deſire ſeruiceable to yours, you muſt vouchſafe to lend me armour and weapons, that at leaſt, with a blow or two of the ſword, I may not find my ſelfe periured to my ſelfe. But Zoilus (but laughing with a hartie lowdneſſe) went by force to embrace her; making no other anſwer, but ſince ſhe had a mind to trie his Knighthood, ſhe ſhould quickly know what a man of armes he was: and ſo, without reuerence to the Ladies, began to ſtruggle with her.

But in Zelmane then Diſdaine became wiſdome, and Anger gaue occaſion. For abiding no longer aboad in the matter, ſhe that had not put off, though ſhe had diſguiſed, Pyrocles, being farre fuller of ſtrong nimbleneſſe, trip t vp his feeet, ſo that he fell downe at hers. And withall (meaning to purſue what ſhe had begun) puld out his ſword which he ware about him: but before ſhe could ſtrike him withall, he gat vp, and ranne to a faire chamber, where he had left his two brethren, preparing themſelues to come downe to their miſtreſſes. But ſhe followed at his heeles, and euen as he came to throw himſelfe into their armes for ſuccor, ſhe hit him with his owne ſword, ſuch a blow vpon the waſte, that ſhe almoſt cut him aſunder: once, ſhe ſundred his ſoule from his body, ſending it to Proſerpina, an angry Goddeſſe againſt rauiſhers. But Anaxius, ſeing before his eyes the miſerable end of his brother, fuller of deſpite then wrath, and yet fuller of wrath then ſorow, looking with a wofull eye vpon his brother Lycurgus, Brother, ſaid he, chaſtiſe this vile creature, while I go downe, and take order leaſt further miſchiefe ariſe: and ſo went downe to the Ladies, whom he viſited, doubting there had bene ſome further practiſe then yet he conceiued. But finding them onely ſtrong in pacience, he went and lockt a great Iron gate, by which onely any bodie might mount to that part of the Caſtle, rather to conceale the ſhame of his brother, ſlaine by a woman, then for doubt of any other anoyance, and then went vp to receiue ſome comfort of the execution, he was ſure his brother had done of Zelmane. But Zelmane no ſooner ſaw thoſe brothers, of whom Reaſon aſſured her ſhe was to expect reuenge, but that ſhee lept to a target, as one that well knew the firſt marke of valure to be defence. And then accepting the oportunitie of Anaxius going away, ſhe waited not the pleaſure of Lycurgus, but without any words (which ſhe euer thought vaine, when reſolution tooke the place of perſwaſion) gaue her owne hart the contentment to be the aſſailer. Lycurgus, who was in the diſpoſition of his nature hazardouſe, & by the luckie paſſing through many dangers, growne confident in himſelfe, went toward her, rather as to a ſpoile, then to fight, ſo farre from feare, that his aſſuredneſſe diſdained to hope. But when her ſword made demonſtrations aboue all flatterie of arguments, and that he found ſhe preſt ſo vpon him, as ſhewed that her courage ſprang not from blinde deſpairé, but was garded both with cunning and ſtrength: ſelf-loue then firſt in him diuided it ſelfe from vain-glory, and made him finde that the world of worthineſſe had not his whole globe compriſed in his breſt, but that it was neceſſarie to haue ſtrong reſiſtance againſt ſo ſtrong aſſailing. And ſo betweene them, for a fewe blowes, Mars himſelfe might haue bin delighted to looke on. But Zelmane, who knew that in her caſe, ſlowneſſe of victory was litle better then ruine, with the bellowes of hate, blew the fire of courage, and he ſtriking a maine blow at her head, ſhe warded it with the ſhield, but ſo warded, that the ſhield was cut in two peeces, while it protected her, & withall ſhe ran in to him, and thruſting at his breaſt, which he put by with his target, as hee was lifting vp his ſword to ſtrike againe, ſhe let fall the peece of her ſhield, and with her left hand catching his ſword of the inſide of the pommell, with nimble and ſtrong ſleight, ſhee had gotten his ſword out of his hand before his ſence could conuey to his imagination, what was to be doubted. And hauing now two ſwords againſt one ſhield, meaning not fooliſhly to be vngratefull to good fortune, while he was no more amazed with his being vnweapned, then with the ſuddainneſſe thereof, ſhe gaue him ſuch a wound vpon his head, in deſpite of the ſhields ouer-weake reſiſtance, that withall he fell to the ground, aſtoniſhed with the paine, & agaſt with feare. But ſeeing Zelmane ready to conclude her victory in his death, bowing vp his head to her, with a countenance that had forgotten all pride, Enough excellent Lady, ſaid he, the honor is yours: Whereof you ſhal want the beſt witneſſe, if you kil me. As you haue taken from men the glory of manhood, returne ſo now againe to your own ſex, for mercy. I will redeeme my life of you with no ſmall ſeruices, for I will vndertake to make my brother obey all your cõmandements. Grant life I beſeech you, for your own honor, and for the perſons ſake that you loue beſt. Zelmane repreſt awhile her great hart, either diſdaining to be cruel, or pitiful, & therfore not cruel: & now the image of humane condition, began to be an Orator vnto her of cõpaſſion, when ſhe ſaw, as he lifted vp his armes with a ſuppliãts grace, about one of thẽ, vnhappily tied, a garter with a Iewel, which (giuẽ to Pyrocles by his aunt of Theſſalia, & greatly eſteemed by him) he had preſented to Philoclea, & with inward rage promiſing extreame hatred, had ſeene Lycurgus with a proud force, & not without ſome hurt vnto her, pull away from Philoclea, becauſe at entreatie ſhe would not giue it him. But the ſight of that was like a cyphar, ſignifying all the iniuries which Philoclea had of him ſuffred, & that remẽbrãce feeding

vpon wrath, trod downe all conceits of mercie. And therefore saying no more, but No villaine, die: it is Philoclea that sends thee this token for thy loue. With that she made her sword drinke the bloud of his heart, though he wresting his body, & with a countenance prepared to excuse, wold faine haue delayed the receiuing of deaths Ambassadours. But neither that stayed Zelmanes hand, nor yet Anaxius crie vnto her, who hauing made fast the iron gate, euen then came to the top of the staires, when, contrary to all his imaginations, hee saw his brother lie at Zelmanes mercie. Therefore crying, promising, and threatning to her to hold her hand: the last grone of his brother was the only answer he could get to his vnrespected eloquence. But then Pitie would faine haue drawne teares, which Furie in their spring dried, and Anger would faine haue spoken, but that Disdaine sealed vp his lippes; but in his heart he blasphemed heauen, that it could haue such a power ouer him; no lesse ashamed of the victorie he should haue of her, then of his brothers ouerthrow: and no more spited, that it was yet vnreuenged, then that the reuenge shold be no greater then a womans destruction. Therefore with no speach, but such a groning crie, as often is the language of sorowfull anger, he came running at Zelmane, vse of fighting then seruing in stead of patient consideration what to do. Guided wherewith, though he did not with knowledge, yet did he according to knowledge, pressing vpon Zelmane in such a well defended maner, that in all the combats that euer she had fought, she had neuer more need of quicke senses, and ready vertue. For being one of the greatest men of stature then liuing; as hee did fullie answere that stature in greatnesse of might, so did he exceed both in greatnesse of courage, which with a countenance formed by the nature both of his mind and bodie, to an almost horrible fiercenesse, was able to haue caried feare to any mind, that was not priuie to it selfe of a true and constant worthinesse. But Pyrocles, whose soule might well be separated from his bodie, but neuer alienated from the remembring of what was comely, if at the first he did a litle apprehend the daungerousnesse of his aduersarie, whom once before he had something tried, and now perfectly sawe, as the verie picture of forcible furie: yet was that apprehension quicklie stayed in him, rather strengthening then weakning his vertue by that wrestling; like wine, growing the stronger by being moued. So that they both, prepared in hearts, and able in hands, did honour solitarinesse there with such a combat, as might haue demaunded, as a right of fortune, whole armies of beholders. But no beholders needed there, where manhood blew the trumpet, and satisfaction did whet as much as glorie. There was strength against nimblenesse; rage, against resolution; furie, against vertue; confidence, against courage; pride, against nobleneſse: loue in both, breeding mutuall hatred, and desire of reuenging the iniurie of his brothers slaughter, to Anaxius, being like Philocleas captiuitie to Pyrocles. Who had seene the one, would haue thought nothing could haue resisted; who had marked the other, wold haue maruelled that the other had so long resisted. But like two contrarie tides, either of which are able to carie worlds of ships, and men vpon them, with such swiftnesse, as nothing seemes able to withstand them: yet meeting one another, with mingling their watrie forces, & strugling together, it is long to say whether stream gets the victorie: So betweene these if Pallas had bene there, she could scarcelie haue told, whether she had nursed better in the feates of armes. The Irish greyhound against the English mastiffe: the sword-fish, against the whale; the Rhinoceros against the Elephant, might be models, and but models of this combat. Anaxius was better armed defensiuelie: for (beside a strong caske brauely couered, wherewith he couered his head)he had a huge ſhield, ſuch perchance, as Achilles ſhewed to the pale walles of Troy, wherewithall that great body was couered. But Pyrocles, vtterly vnarmed for defence, to offend had the aduãtage: for, in either hand he had a ſword, and with both hands nimbly performed that office. And according as they were diuerſly furniſhed, ſo did they differ in the maner of fighting. For Anaxius moſt by warding, and Pyrocles oftneſt by auoyding, reſiſted the aduerſaries aſſault. Both haſtie to end, yet both often ſtaying for aduantage. Time, diſtance, and motion, cuſtome made them ſo perfect in, that as if they had bene fellow Counſellers, and not enemies, each knew the others mind, and knew how to preuent it. So as their ſtrength fayled them ſooner then their skill, and yet their breath failed thē ſooner then their ſtrength. And breathleſſe indeed they grew, before either could complaine of any loſſe of bloud.

So that conſenting by the mediation of neceſſitie, to a breathing time of truce, being withdrawne a litle one frō the other, Anaxius ſtood leaning vpon his ſword, with his grim eye ſo ſetled vpon Zelmane, as is wont to be the looke of an earneſt thought. Which Zelmane marking, and according to the Pyroclean nature, fuller of gay brauerie in the midſt, then in the beginning of danger; What is it (ſaid ſhe) Anaxius, that thou ſo deepely muſeſt on? Doth thy brothers example make thee thinke of thy fault paſt, or of thy comming puniſhmēt? I thinke (ſaid he) what ſpitefull God it ſhould be, who enuying my glorie, hath brought me to ſuch a wayward caſe, that neither thy death can be a reuenge, nor thy ouerthrow a victorie. Thou doeſt well indeed (ſaid Zelmane) to impute thy caſe to the heauenly prouidence, which will haue thy pride find it ſelfe (euen in that whereof thou art moſt proud) puniſhed by the weake ſexe which thou moſt contemneſt.

But then, hauing ſufficiently reſted themſelues, they renewed againe their combat, far more terrible then before: like nimble vaulters, who at the firſt & ſecond leape do but ſtirre, and (as it were) awake the fiery and aerie parts, which after in the other leapes they do with more excellencie exerciſe. For in this pauſing, each had brought to his thoughts the maner of the others fighting, and the aduantages, which by that, and by the quality of their weapons they might worke themſelues; and ſo againe repeated the leſſon they had ſaid before, more perfectly, by the vſing of it. Anaxius oftner vſed blowes, his huge force (as it were) more delighting therin, and the large protection of his ſhield animating him vnto it. Pyrocles, of a more fine and deliuer ſtrength, watching his time when to giue fit thruſts; as, with the quicke obeying of his body, to his eyes quicke commandement, he ſhunned anie harme Anaxius could do to him: ſo wold he ſoon haue made an end of Anaxius, if he had not found him a man of wonderful, & almoſt matchleſſe excellencie in matters of armes. Pyrocles vſed diuerſe faynings to bring Anaxius on into ſome inconuenience: but Anaxius keeping a ſound maner of fighting, neuer offered but ſeeing faire cauſe, and then followed it with well gouerned violence. Thus ſpent they a great time, ſtriuing to do, and with ſtriuing to do, wearying themſelues more thē with the verie doing, Anaxius finding Zelmane ſo neare vnto him, that with litle motion he might reach her, knitting all his ſtrength together, at that time mainlie foyned at her face. But Zelmane ſtronglie putting it by with her right hand ſword, comming in with her left foote and hand, would haue giuen a ſharpe viſitation to his right ſide, but that he was faine to leape away. Whereat aſhamed, (as hauing neuer done ſo much before in his life.)

How

How this combate ended, how the Ladies by the cõming of the discouered forces were deliuered, and restored to Basilius, and how Dorus againe returned to his old maister Dametas is altogether vnknowne. What afterward chaunced, out of the Authors owne writings and conceits hath bene supplied, as followeth.

AFter that Basilius (according to the oracles promise) had receiued home his daughters, and setled himselfe againe in his solitarie course and accustomed companie, there passed not many daies ere the now fully recomforted Dorus hauing waited a time of Zelmanes walking alone towards her little Arbor, tooke leaue of his maister Dametas husbandrie to follow her. Neere whereunto ouertaking her, and sitting downe together among the sweet flowers whereof that place was verie plentifull, vnder the pleasant shade of a broad-leaued Sycamor, they recounted one to another their strange pilgrimage of passions, omitting nothing which the open harted friendship is wont to lay forth, where there is cause to communicate both ioyes & sorows, for indeed there is no sweeter tast of friendship, then the coupling of soules in this mutualitie either of condoling or comforting: where the oppressed minde findes it selfe not altogether miserable, since it is sure of one which is feelingly sorie for his miserie: & the ioyful spēds not his ioy, either alone, or there where it may be enuied: but may freely send it to such a well grounded obiect, from whence he shall be sure to receiue a sweete reflection of the same ioy, and, as in a cleere mirror of sincere good wil, see a liuely picture of his own gladnesse. But after much discourse on either part, Dorus (his heart scarce seruing him to come to the point, whereunto his then comming had bene wholy directed, as loth in the kindest sort to discouer to his friend his owne vnkindnesse) at length, one worde emboldening another made knowne to Zelmane, how Pamela vpon his vehement oath to offer no force vnto her, till he had inuested her in the Duchie of Thessalia, had condiscended to his stealing her away to the next sea port. That besides the strange humors shee saw her father more and more falling into, and vnreasonable restraint of her libertie, whereof shee knew no cause but light grounded iealousies, added to the hate of that manner of life, and confidence shee had in his vertue, the chiefest reason had wonne her to this, was the late danger shee stoode in of loosing him, the like whereof (not vnlike to fall if this course were continued) she chose rather to dye then againe to vndergoe. That now they waited for nothing else, but some fit time for their escape, by the absence of their three lothsome companions, in whom follie ingendred suspicion. And therefore now, said Dorus, my deere Cosin, to whome nature began my friendship, education confirmed it, and vertue hath made it eternall, here haue I discouered the verie foundation whereupon my life is built: be you the Iudge betwixt mee and my fortune. The violence of loue is not vnknowne to you: And I know my case shall neuer want pittie in your consideration. How all the ioyes of my heart do leaue mee, in thinking I must for a time be absent from you, the eternall trueth is witnesse vnto mee, I know I should not so sensibly feele the pangs of my last departure. But this enchantment of my restlesse desire hath such authoritie in my selfe aboue my selfe, that I am become a slaue vnto it, I haue no more freedome in mine owne determinations. My thoughts are now all bent how to carrie away my burdenous blisse. Yet, most beloued Cosin, rather then you should thinke I doe herein violate that holie band of true friendship, wherein I vnworthie am knit vnto you, commaund mee stay. Perchaunce the force of your commaundement may worke such impression into my heart, that no reaſon of mine owne can imprint into it. For the Gods forbid, the foule word of abãdoning Pyrocles, might euer be obiected to the faithful Muſidorus. But if you can ſpare my preſence, whoſe preſence no way ſerues you, and by the diuiſion of theſe two Lodges is not oft with you: nay if you can thinke my abſence may, as it ſhall, ſtand you in ſtead, by bringing ſuch an armye hither, as ſhall make Baſilius, willing or vnwilling, to know his owne happe, in graunting you Philoclea: then I will cheerefullie goe about this my moſt deſired enterpriſe, and ſhall thinke the better halfe of it alreadie atchieued, being begun in the fortunate houre of my friends contentment. Theſe words, as they were not knit together with ſuch a conſtant courſe of flowing eloquence, as Dorus was wont to vſe: ſo was his voice interrupted with ſighes, & his countenance with enterchanging colour diſmayed. So much his own heart did finde him faultie to vnbend any way the continuall vſe of their deare friendſhip. But Zelmane, who had all this while gladly harkened to the other tydings of her friends happie ſucceſſe, when this laſt determination of Dorus ſtrake her attentiue eares, ſhe ſtayed a great while oppreſſed with a dead amazemẽt. There came ſtreight before her minde, made tender with woes, the images of her own fortune. Her tedious longings, her cauſes to deſpaire, the comberſome folly of Baſilius, the enraged iealouſie of Gynecia, her ſelfe a Prince without retinue; a man annoyed with the troubles of woman-kind; lothſomly loued, and dangerouſly louing; And now for the perfecting of all, her friend to be taken away by himſelfe, to make the loſſe the greater by the vnkindneſſe. But within a while ſhe reſolutely paſſed ouer all inward obiections, and preferring her friends profit to her own deſire, with a quiet but hartie looke, ſhe thus anſwered him. If I bare thee this Loue vertuous Muſidorus, for mine owne ſake, and that our friendſhip grew becauſe I for my part, might reioyce to enioy ſuch a friend, I ſhould now ſo thoroughly feele mine owne loſſe, that I ſhould call the heauens and earth to witneſſe, how cruelly ye rob me of my greateſt comfort, meaſuring the breach of friendſhip by mine owne paſſion. But becauſe indeede I loue thee for thy ſelfe, and in my iudgement iudge of thy worthineſſe to be loued, I am content to build my pleaſure vpon thy comfort: And then will I deeme my hap in friendſhip great, when I ſhall ſee thee, whom I loue happie. Let me be onely ſure, thou loueſt me ſtill, the onely price of true affection: go therefore on, worthie Muſidorus, with the guide of vertue, and ſeruice of fortune. Let thy loue be loued, thy deſires proſperous, thy eſcape ſafe, and thy iorney eaſie. Let euery thing yeeld his help to thy deſert, for my part abſence ſhall not take thee from mine eyes, nor afflictions ſhall barre me from gladding in thy good, nor a poſſeſſed hart ſhall keepe thee from the place it hath for euer allotted vnto thee. Dorus would faine haue replied againe, to haue made a liberall confeſſion that Zelmane had of her ſide the aduantage of well performing friendſhip: but partly his owne griefe of parting from one he loued ſo dearely, partly the kinde care in what ſtate he ſhould leaue Zelmane, bred ſuch a conflict in his minde, that many times he wiſhed, he had either neuer attempted, or neuer reuealed this ſecrete enterpriſe. But Zelmane, who had now looked to the vttermoſt of it, and eſtabliſhed her minde vpon an aſſured determination, My only friend ſaid ſhe, ſince to ſo good towardneſſe, your courteous deſtinies haue conducted you, let not a ceremoniall conſideration of our mutuall loue, be a barre vnto it. I ioy in your preſence, but I ioy more in your good, that friendſhip brings foorth the fruits of enmitie, which preferres his owne tenderneſſe, before his friends domage. For my part, my greateſt griefe herein ſhalbe, I can be no further ſeruiceable vnto you.

O Zelmane said Dorus with his eyes euen couered with water, I did not think so soone to haue displayed my determination vnto you, but to haue made my way first in your louing iudgemēt. But alas as your sweet disposition drew me so far: so doth it now strengthen me in it. To you therefore be the due commendation giuen, who can conquere me in Loue, and Loue in wisdome. As for mee, then shall goodnesse turne to euill, and vngratefulnes be the token of a true heart, when Pyrocles shall not possesse a principall seat in my soule, when the name of Pyrocles shall not be held of me in deuout reuerence.

They would neuer haue come to the cruell instant of parting, nor to the il-faring word of farewell, had not Zelmane seene a farre off the old Basilius, who hauing performed a sacrifice to Apollo, for his daughters, but principally for his mistresse happy returne, had since bene euery where to seeke her. And now being come within compasse of discerning her, he began to frame the louelyest countenance he could, stroking vp his legges, setting his beard in due order, and standing bolt vpright. Alas said Zelmane, behold an euill fore-token of your sorrowfull departure. Yonder see I one of my furies, which doth daylie vexe me, farewell, farewell my Musidorus, the Gods make fortune to waite on thy vertues, and make mee wade through this lake of wretchednesse. Dorus burst out into a floud of teares, wringing her fast by the hand. No, no, said he, I go blindfold, whither the course of my ill happe carries me: for now too late my hart giues me this our separating can neuer be prosperous. But if I liue, attēd me here shortly with an army. Thus both appalled with the grieuous renting of their long Combination, (hauing first resolued with thēselues, that whatsoeuer fell vnto them, they should neuer vpon no occasion vtter their names for the cōseruing the honour of their Royal parētage, but keepe the names of Daiphantus & Palladius, as before had been agreed between thē) they tooke diuerse waies: Dorus to the lodg-ward, wher his heauy eyes might be somthing refreshed; Zelmane towards Basilius: saying to her selfe with a skornefull smiling: Yet hath not my friendly fortune depriued me of a pleasant companion. But he hauing with much search come to her presence, Doubt & Desire bred a great quarel in his mind. For his former experience had taught him to doubt: & true feeling of Loue made doubts dangerous, but the working of his desire had ere long wonne the field. And therefore with the most submissiue maner his behauiour could yeeld: O Goddesse, said hee towardes whom I haue the greatest feeling of Religion, be not displeased at some shew of deuotion I haue made to Apollo: since he (if he know any thing) knowes that my heart beares farre more awful reuerēce to your selfe then to his, or any other the like Deity. You wil euer be deceiued in me, answered Zelmane: I wil make my selfe no competitor with Apollo, neither can blasphemies to him be duties to me. With that Basilius tooke out of his bosome certaine verses he had written, and kneeling downe, presented them to her. They contained this:

PHæbus farewell, a sweeter Saint I serue,
The high conceits thy heau'nly wisdomes breed,
My thoughts forget: my thoughts which neuer swerue
From her, in whome is sowne their freedomes seede,
And in whose eyes my dayly doome I reede.

Phæbus farewell, a sweeteer Saint I serue,
Thou art farre off, thy kingdome is aboue:

She heau'n on earth with beauties doth preſerue.
Thy beames I like, but her cleare rayes I loue:
Thy force I feare, her force I ſtill do proue.

Phœbus yeeld vp thy title in my mind:
She doth poſſeſſe, thy Image is defaſte,
But if thy rage ſome braue reuenge will find,
On her, who hath in me thy temple raſte,
Employ thy might, that she my fires may taſte.
And how much more her worth ſurmoũteth thee,
Make her as much more baſe by louing me.

This is my Hymne to you, ſaid he, not left me by my aũceſtors, but begun in my ſelfe. The temple wherin it is daylie ſung, is my ſoule: & the ſacrifice I offer to you withall, is all whatſoeuer I am. Zelmane, who euer thought ſhe found in his ſpeeches the ill taſte of a medicine, & the operation of a poyſon, would haue ſuffred a diſdainful looke to haue bene the onely witneſſe of her good acceptation; but that Baſilius began a freſh to lay before her many pitifull praiers, and in the end to conclude that he was fully of opinion it was onely the vnfortunateneſſe of that place that hindred the proſperous courſe of his deſires. And therfore ſince the hateful influence which made him embrace this ſolitary life, was now paſt ouer him (as he doubted not the iudgement of Philanax would agree with his) and his late miſhaps had taught him how perillous it was to cõmit a Princes ſtate to a place ſo weakely guarded: he was now inclined to returne to his pallace in Mantinea, and there he hoped he ſhold be better able to ſhew how much he deſired to make all he had hers: with many other ſuch honny words which my pen growes almoſt weary to ſet downe: This indeede neerely pierced Zelmane. For the good beginning ſhe had there obtained of Philoclea made her deſire to continue the ſame trade, till vnto the more perfecting of her deſires: & to come to any publike place ſhe did deadly feare, leſt her mask by many eyes might the ſooner be diſcouered, and ſo her hopes ſtopped, and the ſtate of her ioyes endaungered. Therefore awhile ſhe reſted, muſing at the dayly chaunging labyrinth of her owne fortune, but in her ſelf determined it was her only beſt to keep him there: & with fauors to make him loue the place, where the fauours were receiued, as diſgraces had made him apt to chaunge the ſoyle.

Therefore caſting a kind of corner looke vpon him, It is truly ſaide, (ſaid ſhe) that age cooleth the bloud. How ſoone goodman you are terrified before you receiue any hurt? Do you not knowe that daintineſſe is kindly vnto vs? And that hard obtaining, is the excuſe of womans graunting? Yet ſpeake I not as though you were like to obtaine, or I to grant. But becauſe I would not haue you imagin, I am to be wonne by courtly vanities, or eſteeme a man the more, becauſe he hath handſome men to waite of him; when he is affraid to liue without them. You might haue ſeene Baſilius humbly ſwell, and with a lowly looke, ſtand vpon his tiptoes; ſuch diuerſitie her words deliuered vnto him. O Hercules aunſwered he; Baſilius afraid? Or his bloud cold, that boyles in ſuch a fornace? Care I who is with mee, while I enioy your preſence? Or is any place good or bad to me, but as it pleaſeth you to bleſſe or curſe it? O let me be but armed in your good grace, and I defie whatſoeuer there is or can be againſt me. No, no, your loue is forcible, and my age is not without vigour. Zelmane thought it not good for his ſtomacke, to receiue a ſurfet of too much fauour, and therefore thinking he had enough for the time, to keepe him from any ſodaine

ſodaine remouing, with a certaine gracious bowing downe of her head toward him, ſhe turned away, ſaying, ſhe would leaue him at this time to ſee how temperately he could vſe ſo bountifull a meaſure of her kindneſſe. Baſilius that thought euerie drop a floud that bred anie refreſhment, durſt not further preſſe her, but with an ancient modeſtie left her to the ſweet repaſt of her owne fancies. Zelmane aſſoone as he was departed, went toward Pamelas lodge in hope to haue ſeene her friend Dorus, to haue pleaſed her ſelfe with another painefull farewell, and further to haue taken ſome aduiſe with him touching her owne eſtate, wherof before ſorow had not ſuffered her to thinke. But being come euen neere the Lodge, ſhe ſaw the mouth of a caue, made as it ſhould ſeeme by Nature in deſpite of Arte: ſo fitlie did the rich-growing marble ſerue to beautifie the valt of the firſt entrie. Vnderfoot the ground ſeemed minerall, yeelding ſuch a gliſtering ſhew of gold in it, as they ſay the riuer Tagus caries in his ſandy bed. The caue framed out into many goodly ſpacious roomes ſuch as the ſelf-liking men, haue with long and learned delicacie found out the moſt eaſefull. There ran through it a litle ſweet riuer, which had left the face of the earth to drowne her ſelf for a ſmall way in this darke, but pleaſant manſion. The verie firſt ſhew of the place entiſed the melancholie mind of Zelmane to yeeld her ſelfe ouer there to the floud of her owne thoughts. And therfore ſitting downe in the firſt entrie of the Caues mouth, with a ſong ſhe had lately made, ſhe gaue a dolefull way to her bitter affects, ſhe ſung to this effect:

SInce that the ſtormie rage of paſſions darke
(Of paſſions darke, made darke by beauties light)
VVith rebell force, hath cloſde in dungeon darke
My mind, ere now led foorth by reaſons light:

Since all the things which giue mine eyes their light,
Do foſter ſtill the fruits of fancies darke:
So that the vvindowes of my inward light
Do ſerue, to make my inward powers darke:

Since, as I ſay, both mind and ſences darke
Are hurt, not helpt, with piercing of the light:
VVhile that the light may ſhew the horrors darke,
But cannot make reſolued darkneſſe light:
I like this place, where at the leaſt the darke
May keepe my thoughts from thought of wonted light.

Inſteed of an inſtrument, her ſong was accompanied with the wringing of her hands, the cloſing of her weary eyes, and euen ſometime cut off with the ſwelling of her ſighes, which did not ſuffer the voyce to haue his free and natiue paſſage. But as ſhe was a while muſing vpon her ſong, raiſing vp her ſpirits, which were ſomething falne into the weakneſſe of lamentation, conſidering ſolitarie complaints do no good to him whoſe helpe ſtands without himſelf, ſhe might a farre off, firſt heare a whiſpering ſound, which ſeemed to come from the inmoſt part of the caue, & being kept together with the cloſe hollowneſſe of the place, had as in a truncke the more liberall acceſſe to her eares, and by and by ſhe might perceiue the ſame voice deliuer it ſelfe into muſicall tunes, & with a baſe Lyra giue forth this ſong:

HArke plaintfull ghoſts, infernall furies harke
Vnto my woes the hatefull heauens do ſend,
The heauens conſpir'd, to make my vitall ſparke
A wretched wracke, a glaſſe of Ruines end.

Seeing, Alas, ſo mightie powers bend
Their irefull shot againſt ſo weake a marke,
Come caue, become my graue, come death, and lend
Receipt to me, within thy boſome darke.

For what is life to dayly dying mind,
VVhere drawing breath, I ſucke the ayre of woe:
VVhere too much ſight makes all the body blind,
And higheſt thoughts downeward moſt headlong throw?
Thus then my forme, and thus my ſtate I find,
Death wrapt in flesh, to liuing graue aſſign'd.

And pawſing but a litle, with monefull melodie it continued this octaue:

Like thoſe ſicke folkes, in whom ſtrange humours flowe,
Can taſte no ſweets, the ſower only pleaſe:
So to my mind, while paſſions dayly grow,
VVhoſe fierie chaines, vpon his freedome ſeaze,
Ioyes ſtrangers ſeeme, I cannot bide their show,
Nor brooke ought elſe but well acquainted woe.
Bitter griefe taſtes me beſt, paine is my eaſe,
Sicke to the death, ſtill louing my diſeaſe.

O Venus, ſaid Zelmane, who is this ſo well acquainted with me, that can make ſo liuely a portracture of my miſeries? It is ſurely the ſpirit appointed to haue care of me, which doth now in this dark place beare part with the cõplaints of his vnhappie charge. For if it be ſo, that the heauẽs haue at all times a meaſure of their wrathfull harmes, ſurely ſo many haue come to my bliſſleſſe lot, that the reſt of the world hath too ſmall a portiõ, to make with cauſe ſo waileful a lamẽtation. But (ſaid ſhe) whatſoeuer thou be, I will ſeeke thee out, for thy muſike well aſſures me we are at leaſt hand fellow prentiſes to one vngracious maſter. So raiſe ſhe & went guiding herſelf by the ſtill playning voice, till ſhe ſaw vpon a ſtone a little waxe light ſet, and vnder it a peece of paper with theſe verſes verie lately (as it ſhould ſeeme) written in it:

HOw is my Sunne, whoſe beames are shining bright
Become the cauſe of my darke ougly night?
Or how do I captiu'd in this darke plight,
Bewaile the caſe, and in the cauſe delight?

My mangled mind huge horrors ſtill do fright,
VVith ſenſe poſſeſt, and claim'd by reaſons right:
Betwixt which two in me I haue this fight,
VVhere who ſo winnes, I put my ſelfe to flight.

Come

Come clowdy feares cloſe vp my daſeled ſight, Sorowes ſucke vp the marow of my might,
Due ſighes blowe out all ſparks of ioyfull light,
Tyre on deſpaire vpon my tired ſprite.
An end, an end, my dull'd pen cannot write,
Nor maz'd head thinke, nor faltring tongue recite.

And hard vnderneath the Sonnet, were theſe words written:

This Caue is darke, but it had neuer light.
This vvaxe doth waſt it ſelfe, yet painleſſe dies.
Theſe words are full of woes, yet feele they none.

I darkned am, who once had cleareſt ſight.
I waſte my heart, which ſtill new torment tries.
I plaine with cauſe, my woes are all mine owne.

No Caue, no waſting waxe, no words of griefe,
Can hold, ſhew, tell my paines without reliefe.

She did not long ſtay to reade the words, for not farre off from the ſtone ſhe might diſcerne in a darke corner, a Ladie lying with her face ſo proſtrate vpon the ground, as ſhe could neither know, nor be knowne. But (as the generall nature of man is deſirous of knowledge, and ſorow eſpecially glad to find fellowes,) ſhe went as ſoftly as ſhe could conuey her foot, neare vnto her, where ſhe heard theſe words come with vehement ſobbings from her. O darkneſſe (ſaid ſhe) which doeſt light-ſomlie (me thinkes) make me ſee the picture of my inward darkneſſe: ſince I haue choſen thee to be the ſecrete witneſſe of my ſorowes, let me receiue a ſafe receipt in thee; and eſteeme them not tedious, but if it be poſſible, let the vttering them be ſome diſcharge to my ouerloden breaſt. Alas ſorow, now thou haſt the full ſacke of my conquered ſpirits, reſt thy ſelfe a while, and ſet not ſtill new fire to thy owne ſpoyles: O accurſed reaſon, how many eyes thou haſt to ſee thy euils, and how dim, nay blind thou art in preuenting them? Forlorne creature that I am! I would I might be freely wicked, ſince wickedneſſe doth preuaile, but the footſteps of my ouer-trodden vertue lie ſtill as bitter accuſations vnto me. I am deuided in my ſelf, how can I ſtand? I am ouerthrowne in my ſelfe, who ſhall raiſe me? Vice is but a nurſe of new agonies, and the vertue I am diuorced from, makes the hatefull compariſon the more manifeſt. No, no, vertue, either I neuer had but a ſhadow of thee, or thou thy ſelfe art but a ſhadow. For how is my ſoule abandoned? How are all my powers layd waſte? My deſire is pained, becauſe it cannot hope, and if hope came, his beſt ſhould be but miſchiefe. O ſtrange mixture of humane mindes; onely ſo much good left, as to make vs languiſh in our owne euils. Ye infernall furies, (for it is too late for me, to awake my dead vertue, or to place my comfort in the angry Gods) ye infernall furies I ſay, ayde one that dedicates her ſelfe vnto you, let my rage be ſatisfied, ſince the effect of it is fit for your ſeruice. Neither be afraid to make me too happie, ſince nothing can come to appeaſe the ſmart of my guilty conſcience. I deſire but to aſſwage the ſweltring of my helliſh longing, deiected Gyneeia. Zelmane no ſooner hard the name of Gynecia, but that with a cold ſweat all ouer her, as if she had bene ready to tread vpon a deadly stinging Adder, she would haue withdrawne her selfe, but her owne passion made her yeeld more vnquiet motions, then she had done in comming. So that she was perceiued, and Gynecia sodainlie risen vp, for indeed it was Gynecia, gotten into this Caue, (the same Caue, wherein Dametas had safelie kept Pamela in the late vprore) to passe her pangs, with change of places. And as her mind ran stil vpon Zelmane, her piercing louers eye had soone found it was she. And seeing in her a countenance to flie away, she fell downe at her feete, and catching fast hold of her: Alas (said she) whither, or from whom doest thou flie away? The sauagest beasts are wonne with seruice, and there is no flint but may be mollified: How is Gynecia so vnworthie in thine eyes? or whome cannot abundance of loue make worthie? O thinke not that crueltie, or vngratefulnesse, can flowe from a good mind! O weigh, Alas! weigh with thy selfe the new effects of this mightie passion, that I vnfit for my state, vncomely for my sexe, must become a supplyant at thy feete! By the happie woman that bare thee, by all the ioyes of thy heart, and successe of thy desire, I beseech thee turne thy selfe to some consideration of me, and rather shew pitie in now helping mee, then in too late repenting my death, which hourely threatens me. Zelmane imputing it to one of her continuall mishaps, thus to haue met with this Ladie, with a full wearie countenance; Without doubt Madame, said she, where the desire is such, as may be obtained, and the partie well deseruing as your selfe, it must be a great excuse that may well colour a deniall; but when the first motion caries with it a direct impossibilitie, then must the only answer be, comfort without help, & sorow to both parties; to you not obtaining, to me not able to graunt. O said Gynecia, how good leisure you haue to frame these scornefull answers? Is Gynecia thus to be despised? Am I so vile a worme in your sight? no, no, trust to it hard-hearted Tigre, I will not be the only Actor of this Tragedie: since I must fall, I will presse downe some others with my ruines: since I must burne, my spitefull neighbours shall feele of my fire. Doest thou not perceiue that my diligent eyes haue pierced through the clowdie maske of thy disguisement? Haue I not told thee, ô foole (if I were not much more foole) that I know thou wouldest abuse vs with thy outward shew? Wilt thou still attend the rage of loue in a womans hart? the gyrle thy well chosen mistresse, perchance shall defend thee, when Basilius shall know how thou hast sotted his mind with falsehood, and falsely sought the dishonour of his house. Beleeue it, beleeue it vnkind creature, I will end my miseries with a notable example of reuenge, & that accursed cradle of mine shall feele the smart of my wound, then of thy tyranny, and lastly (I confesse) my selfe of mine owne work. Zelmane that had long before doubted her selfe to be discouered by her, and now plainlie finding it, was as the prouerbe saith, like them that hold the wolfe by the eares, bitten while they hold, and slaine if they loose. If she held her off in these wonted termes, she saw rage would make her loue worke the effectes of hate; to grant vnto her, her heart was so bound vpon Philoclea, it had bene worse thē a thousand deaths. Yet found she it was necessarie for her to come to a resolution, for Gynecias sore could bide no leasure, & once discouered, besides the danger of Philoclea, her desires should be for euer vtterly stopped. She remēbred withall the words of Basilius, how apt he was to leaue this life, & returne to his court, a great bar to her hopes. Lastly she considered Dorus enterprise might bring some strange alteration of this their well liked fellowship. So that encompassed with these instant difficulties, she bent her spirits to thinke of a remedie, which might at once both saue her from them, and serue her to the accomplishmēt

of her only pursuite. Lastly, she determined thus, that there was no way but to yeeld to the violence of their desires, since striuing did the more chase them. And that following their owne current, at length of it selfe it would bring her to the other side of her burning desires.

Now in the meane while the diuided Dorus, long diuided betweene loue and friendship, and now for his loue diuided frō his friend, though indeed without preiudice of friendships loyaltie, which doth neuer barre the mind from his free satisfaction: yet still a cruell iudge ouer himself, thought he was somewayes faultie, and applied his minde how to amend it, with a speedie and behouefull returne. But then was his first studie, how to get away, whereto already he had Pamelas consent, confirmed and concluded vnder the name of Mopsa in her owne presence, Dorus taking this way, that whatsoeuer he would haue of Pamela he would aske her, whether in such a case it were not best for Mopsa so to behaue her selfe, in that sort making Mopsas enuie, an instrument of that she did enuie. So hauing passed ouer his first and most feared difficultie, he busied his spirites how to come to the haruest of his desires, whereof he had so faire a shew. And thereunto (hauing gotten leaue for some dayes of his maister Dametas, who now accompted him as his sonne in lawe,) he romed round about the desart, to finde some vnknowne way, that might bring him to the next Sea port, as much as might be out of all course of other passengers: which all very well succeeding him, & he hauing hired a Barke for his liues traffick, and prouided horses to carrie her thither, returned homeward, now come to the last point of his care, how to go beyond the loathsome watchfulnesse of these three vncomely companions, and therein did wisely consider, how they were to be taken with whom he had to deale, remembring that in the particularities of euery bodies mind & fortune, there are particular aduantages, by which they are to be held. The muddy mind of Dametas, he found most easily stirred with couetousnes. The curst mischieuous heart of Miso, most apt to be tickled with iealousie, as whose rotten braine could thinke well of no body. But yong mistresse Mopsa, who could open her eyes vpon nothing, that did not all to bewonder her, he thought curiositie the fittest baite for her. And first for Dametas, Dorus hauing employed a whole dayes worke, about a ten mile off from the Lodge (quite contrarie way to that he meant to take with Pamela) in digging and opening the ground, vnder an ancient oke that stood there, in such sort as he might longest hold Dametas greedy hopes, in some shew of comfort, he came to his maister, with a countenance mixt betweene chearfulnesse and haste, & taking him by the right hand, as if he had a great matter of secrecie to reueale vnto him: Maister (said he) I did neuer thinke that the Gods had appointed my mind freely brought vp, to haue so lōging a desire to serue you, but that they minded thereby to bring some extraordinarie fruit to one so beloued of them, as your honestie makes me think you are. This bindes me euen in conscience, to disclose that which I perswade my selfe is alotted vnto you, that your fortune may be of equall ballance with your deserts. He said no further, because he wold let Dametas play vpon the bit a while, who not vnderstanding what his words intended, yet well finding they caried no euill newes, was so much the more desirous to know the matter, as he had free scope to imagine what measure of good hap himselfe would. Therefore putting off his cap to him, which he had neuer done before, and assuring him he shold haue Mopsa, though she had bin all made of cloth of gold, he besought Dorus not to hold him long in hope, for that he found it a thing his heart was not able to beare. Maister, answered Dorus, you haue so satisfied me, with promising me the vttermoſt of my deſired bliſſe, that if my dutie bound me not, I were in it ſufficiently rewarded. To you therfore ſhall my good hap be conuerted, and the fruite of all my labor dedicated. Therwith he told him, how vnder an anciẽt oke, (the place he made him eaſily vnderſtand, by ſufficient marks he gaue vnto him) he had found digging but a litle depth, ſcatteringly lying a great number of rich Medailles, and that piercing further into the ground, he had met with a great ſtone, which by the hollow ſound it yeelded, ſeemed to be the couer of ſome greater vault, & vpon it a boxe of Cypreſſe, with the name of the valiant Ariſtomenes grauen vpon it: & that within the boxe, he found certaine verſes, which ſignified that ſome depth againe vnder that all his treaſures lay hidden, what time for the diſcord fell out in Arcadia, he liued baniſhed. Therewith he gaue Dametas certaine Medailles of gold he had long kept about him, and asked him becauſe it was a thing much to be kept ſecret, and a matter one man in twentie howers might eaſily performe, whether he would haue him go & ſeeke the bottom of it, which he had refrained to do till he knew his mind, promiſing he would faithfully bring him what he found, or elſe that he himſelfe would do it, and be the firſt beholder of that comfortable ſpectacle. No man need doubt which part Dametas would chooſe, whoſe fancie had already deuoured all this great riches, and euen now began to grudge at a partner, before he ſaw his owne ſhare. Therfore taking a ſtrong iade, loden with ſpades and mattockes, which he meant to bring backe otherwiſe laden, he went in all ſpeed thitherward, taking leaue of no body, only deſiring Dorus he would looke well to the Princeſſe Pamela. promiſing him mountaines of his owne labour, which neuertheleſſe he litle meant to performe, like a foole, not cõſidering, that no man is to be moued with part, that neglects the whole. Thus away went Dametas, hauing alreadie made an image in his fancie, what pallaces he would build, how ſumptuouſlie he would fare, & among all other things imagined what money to employ in making coffers to keep his money: his ten mile ſeemed twiſe ſo manie leagues, and yet contrarie to the nature of it, though it ſeemed long, it was not weariſome. Many times he curſed his horſes want of cõſideration, that in ſo important a matter wold make no greater ſpeed: many times he wiſhed himſelfe the backe of an aſſe, to helpe to carie away the new ſought riches (an vnfortunate wiſher, for if he had aſwell wiſhed the head, it had bene graunted him.) At length being come to the tree, which he hoped ſhould beare ſo golden Acornes, downe went all his inſtruments, and forthwith to the renting vp of the hurtleſſe earth, where by and by he was caught with the lime of a few promiſed Medailles, which was ſo perfect a pawne vnto him of his further expectation, that he deemed a great number of howers well employed in groping further into it, which with logs and great ſtones was made as cumberſome as might be, till at length with ſweatie browes he came to the great ſtone. A ſtone, God knowes, full vnlike to the couer of a Monument, but yet there was the Cipreſſe box with Ariſtomenes grauen vpon it, and theſe verſes written in it.

A Banisht man, long bard from his deſire
By inward lets, of them his ſtate poſſeſt,
Hid here his hopes, by which he might aſpire
To haue his harmes with wiſedomes helpe redreſt.

Seeke then and ſee, what man eſteemeth beſt,
All is but this, this is our labours hire:

Of

Of this we liue, in this we finde our rest,
VVho hold this fast no greater wealth require.
Looke further then, so shalt thou finde at least,
A bait most fit, for hungrie minded guest.

He opened the box, and to his great comfort read them, and with fresh courage went about to lift vp that stone. But in the meane time: ere Dametas was halfe a mile gone to the treasure ward, Dorus came to Miso, whom he found sitting in the chimneis end, babling to her selfe, and shewing by all her gestures, that shee was loathsomly wearie of the world, not for any hope of a better life, but finding no one, good, neither in minde nor bodie, where-out shee might nourish a quiet thought, hauing long since hated each thing else, began now to hate her selfe. Before this sweete humourd Dame, Dorus set himselfe, and framed towards her such a smiling countenance, as might seeme to be mixt betweene a tickled mirth, and a forced pittie. Miso, to whome cheerefulnesse in others, was euer a sauce of enuie in her selfe, tooke quickly marke of his behauiour, and with a looke full of foreworne spite: Now the Diuell, said shee, take these villaines, that can neuer leaue grenning, because I am not so faire as mistresse Mopsa, to see how this skip-iacke lookes at me. Dorus that had the occasion he desired, Truely mistresse aunswered he, my smiling is not at you, but at them that are from you, and in deede I must needes a little accord my countenance with others sport. And therewithall tooke her in his armes, and rocking her to and fro, In faith mistresse, said he, it is high time for you, to bid vs good night for euer, since others can possesse your place in your owne time. Miso that was neuer voide of malice enough to suspect the vttermost euill, to satisfie a further shrewdnesse, tooke on a present mildnesse, & gentlie desired him, to tell her what he meant: for, said shee, I am like enough to be knauishly dealt with, by that churle my husband. Dorus fell off from the matter againe, as if he had meant no such thing, till by much refusing her intreatie, and vehemently stirring vp her desire to know, he had strengthened a credit in her to that he should say. And then with a formall countenance, as if the conscience of the case had touched himselfe: Mistresse, said he, I am much perplexed in mine owne determination, for my thoughts do euer will me to do honestly, but my iudgement failes me what is honest: betwixt the generall rule, that entrusted secrecies are holilie to be obserued, and the particular exception, that the dishonest secrecies are to be reuealed: especially there, where by reuealing they may either be preuented, or at least amended. Yet in this ballance, your iudgement wayes me downe, because I haue confidence in it, that you will vse what you know moderately, and rather take such faults as an aduantage to your owne good desert, then by your bitter vsing it, be contented to be reuenged on others with your own harmes. So it is mistresse, said he, that yesterday driuing my sheepe vp to the stately hill, which lifts his head ouer the faire Citie of Mantinea, I hapned vpon the side of it, in a little falling of the ground which was a rampier against the Sunnes rage, to perceiue a yong maid, truly of the finest stamp of beautie, & that which made her beautie the more admirable, there was at all no art added to the helping of it. For her apparell was but such as Shepheards daughters are wont to weare: and as for her haire, it hoong downe at the free libertie of his goodly length, but that sometimes falling before the cleare starres of her sight, shee was forced to put it behind her eares, and so open againe the treasure of her perfections, which that for a while had in part hidden. In her lap there lay a Shepheard, ſo wrapped vp in that wel-liked place, that I could diſcerne no peece of his face, but as mine eyes were attent in that her Angelike voice ſtrake mine eares with this ſong:

MY true loue hath my hart, and I haue his,
By iuſt exchange, one for the other giu'ne.
I hold his deare, and myne he cannot miſſe:
There neuer was a better bargaine driu'ne.

His hart in me, keepes me and him in one,
My hart in him, his thoughts and ſenſes guides:
He loues my hart, for once it was his owne:
I cherish his, becauſe in me it bides.

His hart his wound receiued from my ſight:
My hart was wounded, with his wounded hart,
For as from me, on him his hurt did light,
So ſtill me thought in me his hurt did ſmart:
Both equall hurt, in this change ſought our bliſſe:
My true loue hath my hart and I haue his.

But as if the Shepheard that lay before her, had bene organes, which were only to be blowne by her breath, ſhe had no ſooner ended with the ioyning her ſweete lips together, but that he recorded to her muſike this rurall poeſie:

O VVords which fall like ſommer deaw on me,
O breath more ſweete, then is the growing beane,
O tongue in which, all honyed liquors bee,
O voice that doth, the Thrush in ſhrilneſſe ſtaine,
Do you ſay ſtill, this is her promiſe due,
That she is myne, as I to her am true.

Gay haire, more gay then ſtraw when harueſt lyes,
Lips red and plum, as cherries ruddy ſide,
Eyes faire and great, like faire great oxes eyes,
O breaſt in which two white sheepe ſwell in pride:
Ioyne you with mee, to ſeale this promiſe due,
That she be mine, as I to her am true.

But thou white skinne, as white as cruddes well preſt,
So ſmooth as ſleekeſtone-like, it ſmoothes each part,
And thou deare flesh, as ſoft as wooll new dreſt,
And yet as hard, as brawne made hard by art:
Firſt fower but ſay, next fowre their ſaying ſeale,
But you muſt pay, the gage of promiſt weale.

And with the concluſion of his ſong, he embraced her about the knees, O ſweete Charita ſaid he, when ſhall I enioy the reſt of my toyling thoughts? And when ſhall your your bliffull promiſe now due, be verified with iuſt performance? with that I drew neerer to them, and ſaw (for now he had lifted vp his face to glaſſe himſelfe in her faire eyes) that it was my maiſter Dametas, but here Miſo interrupted his tale, with rayling at Dametas, with all thoſe exquiſite termes, which I was neuer good ſkold inough to imagine. But Dorus, as if he had bin much offended with her impacience, would proceed no further till ſhe had vowed more ſtilneſſe. For ſaid he, if the firſt drumme thus chafe you, what will you be when it comes to the blowes? Then he told her, how after many familiar entertainments betwixt them, Dametas, laying before her, his great credit with the Duke, and withall giuing her very faire preſents, with promiſe of much more, had in the end, concluded together to meete as that night at Mantinea, in the Oudemian ſtreete, at Charitas vncles houſe, about tenne of the clocke. After which bargaine Dametas had ſpied Dorus, and calling him to him, had with great brauery told him all his good happe, willing him in any caſe to returne to the old witch Miſo (for ſo in deede miſtreſſe of liueliueſſe, and not of ill will he termed you) and to make ſome honeſt excuſe of his abſence, for ſayde he, kiſſing Charita, if thou didſt know what a life I lead with that driuell, it would make thee euen of pittie, receiue me into thy onely comfort. Now Miſtreſſe ſayde he, exerciſe your diſcretion, which if I were well aſſured of, I would wiſh you to goe your ſelfe to Mantinea, and (lying ſecret in ſome one of your goſſyps houſes, till the time appoynted come) ſo may yon finde them together, and vſing mercie, reforme my Maiſter from his euill wayes. There had nothing more enraged Miſo, then the prayſes Dorus gaue to Charitas beautie, which made her iealouſie ſwell the more, with the poyſon of enuy. And that being increaſed with the preſents ſhe heard Dametas had giuen her (which all ſeemed torne out of her bowells) her hollow eyes, yeelded ſuch wretched lookes, as one might well thinke Pluto at that time, might haue had her ſoule very good cheape. But when the fire of ſpite had fully caught hold of all her inward partes, then whoſoeuer would haue ſeene the picture of Alecto, or with what manner of countenance Medea kild her owne children, needed but take Miſo for the full ſatisfaction of that point of his knowledge. She that could before ſcarce go, but ſupported by crutches, now flew about the houſe, borne vp with the wings of Anger, there was no one ſort of mortall reuenge, that had euer come to her eares, but preſented it ſelfe nowe to her gentle mind. At length with few words, for her words, were choakt vp with the riſing of her reuengefull heart, ſhe ran downe, and with her owne hands ſadled a mare of hers, a mare that 7 yeare before had not bin acquainted with a ſadle, and ſo to Mantinea ſhe went, caſting with her ſelf, how ſhe might couple ſhame with the puniſhmēt of her accurſed husband: but the perſon is not worthy in whoſe paſſion I ſhould too long ſtand. Therefore now muſt I tell you that Miſtreſſe Mopſa (who was the laſt party Dorus was to practiſe his cunning withal) was at the parting of her parents, attending vpō the Princeſſe Pamela, whom becauſe ſhe found to be placed in her fathers houſe, ſhe knew it was for ſuſpicion the Duke had of her. This made Mopſa with a right baſe nature (which ioyes to ſee anie hard hap happen to them, they deeme happie) grow proud ouer her, and vſe great oſtentation of her own diligēce, in prying curiouſly into each thing that Pamela did. Neither is there any thing ſooner ouerthrowes a weak hart, then opiniō of authority, like too ſtrōg a liquor for ſo feeble a glaſſe, which ioined it ſelf to the humor of enuying Pamelas beauty, ſo far, that oft ſhe would ſay to her ſelf, if ſhe had bin borne a Princeſſe as well as Pamela, her perfections then ſhould haue bene as well ſeene as Pamelas, with this manner of woman, and placed in theſe termes, had Dorus to play his laſt part, which hee would quickly haue diſpatched in tying her vp in ſuch a maner, that ſhe ſhould litle haue hindred his enterpriſe. But that the vertuous Pamela (whē ſhe ſaw him ſo minded,) by countenance abſolutelie forbad it, reſolutely determining, ſhe would not leaue behinde her any token of wrong ſince the wrong done to her ſelfe was the beſt excuſe of her eſcape. So that Dorus was compelled to take her in the maner hee firſt thought of, and accordingly Pamela ſitting muſing at the ſtrange attempt ſhee had condiſcended vnto, and Mopſa hard by her, (looking in a glaſſe with very partiall eyes) Dorus put him ſelfe between them, and caſting vp his face to the top of the houſe, ſhrugging all ouer his bodie, and ſtamping ſomtimes vpon the ground, gaue Mopſa occaſion (who was as buſie as a Bee to know any thing) to aske her louer Dorus what ayled him, that made him vſe ſo ſtrange a behauiour, he, as if his ſpirits had beene rauiſhed with ſome ſupernaturall contemplation, ſtood ſtill mute, ſomtimes rubbing his forhead, ſometimes ſtarting in himſelfe, that he ſet Mopſa in ſuch an itche of inquirie, that ſhee would haue offred her maydenhead, rather then be long kept from it. Dorus not yet aunſwering to the purpoſe, ſtill keeping his amazement. O Hercules, ſaide he, reſolue me in this doubt. A tree to graunt ones wishes? Is this the cauſe of the Kinges ſolitarie life? Which parte ſhall I take? Happie in either, vnhappie becauſe I cannot know which were my beſt happ. Theſe doubtful ſelfe ſpeches, made Mopſa yet in a further longing of knowing the matter, ſo that the pretie pigge, laying her ſweete burthen about his neck, my Dorus, ſaid ſhe, tell mee theſe wordes, or els I know not what will befall mee, honny Dorus tell them me. Dorus hauing ſtretched her mind vpon a right laſte, extreamly loued Mopſa, ſaid he, the matters be ſo great, as my harte failes me in the telling them, but ſince you hold the greateſt ſeat in it, it is reaſon your deſire ſhould adde life vnto it. Therewith he told her a farre fet tale how that many millions of yeres before Iupiter fallen out with Apollo had throwne him out of heauen, taking from him the priuiledge of a God. So that poore Apollo was faine to leade a verie miſerable life, vnacquainted to worke and neuer vſed to begge, that in this order hauing in time learned to be Admetus heardman, he had vpon occaſion of fetching a certaine breede of beaſtes out of Arcadia, come to that verie deſart, where wearied with trauaile, and reſting himſelfe in the boughes of a pleaſant Aſhe tree, ſtoode little off from the lodge, he had with pittifull complaints gotten his father Iupiters pardon, and ſo from that tree was receiued againe to his golden ſpheare. But hauing that right nature of a God, neuer to be vngratefull, to Admetus he had graunted a double life, and becauſe that tree was the chappel of his proſperous prayers, he had giuen it this qualitie, that whatſoeuer of ſuch eſtate, and in ſuch maner as he then was, ſate downe in that tree, they ſhould obtaine whatſoeuer they wiſhed. This Baſilius hauing vnderſtoode by the oracle, was the onely cauſe which had made him trie, whether framing himſelfe to the ſtate of an heardman, he might haue the priuiledge of wiſhing onely graunted to that degree, but that hauing often in vaine attempted it, becauſe in deede he was not ſuch, he had now opened the ſecret to Dametas, making him ſweare he ſhould wiſh according to his direction. But becauſe ſaid Dorus, Apollo was at that time with extreame griefe muffled round about his face, with a skarlet cloake, Admetus had giuen him, and becauſe they that muſt wiſh muſt be muffled in like ſorte, and with like ſtuffe, my maſter Dametas is gone I know not whither, to prouide him a ſkarlet cloake, and to morrow doth appoint to returne with it, my Miſtreſſe I cannot tell how, hauing gotten ſome inckling of it, is trudged to Mantinea, to get her selfe a cloake before him: becauſe ſhe would haue the firſt wiſh. My maſter at his parting, of great truſt told me this ſecret, commaunding me to ſee no bodie ſhould clime that tree. But now my Mopſa, ſaid he, I haue here the like cloak of mine own, and am not ſo verie a foole as though I keepe his cõmandement in others to barre my ſelfe, I reſt onely extremely perplexed, becauſe hauing nothing in the world I wiſh for, but the enioying you & your fauour, I think it a much pleaſanter conqueſt to come to it by your own conſent, then to haue it by ſuch a charming force as this is. Now therefore chooſe ſince haue you I will, in what ſort I ſhall haue you. But neuer child was ſo deſirous of a gay puppet, as Mopſa was to be in the tree, & therefore without ſqueamiſhneſſe, promiſing all he would, ſhe coniured him by all her precious Loues, that ſhe might haue the firſt poſſeſſion of the wiſhing tree, aſſuring him that for the enioying her he ſhould neuer neede to clime farre. Dorus to whom time was precious, made no great ceremonies with her, but helping her vp to the top of the tree, frõ whence likewiſe ſhe could ill come down without help, he muffled her round about the face, ſo truely that ſhe her ſelfe could not vndo it. And ſo he told her the manner was, ſhe ſhould hold her mind in continuall deuotion to Apollo, without making at all any noiſe, till at the fartheſt within twelue houres ſpace, ſhe ſhould heare a voice call her by name three times, & that till the third time ſhee muſt in no wiſe anſwere; & then you ſhal not need to doubt your comming downe, for at that time ſaid he, be ſure to wiſh wiſely, & in what ſhape ſoeuer he come vnto you, ſpeake boldly vnto him, and your wiſh ſhall haue as certaine effect, as I haue a deſire to enioy your ſweet Loues: in this plight did he leaue Mopſa, reſolued in her hart, to be the greateſt Lady of the world, & neuer after to feede of worſe then furmentie. Thus Dorus hauing deliuered his hands of his three tormentors, tooke ſpedily the benefit of his deuiſe, and mounting the gracious Pamela vpon a faire horſe he had prouided for her, he thruſt himſelfe forthwith into the wildeſt part of the deſart, where he had left markes to guide him frõ place to place to the next ſea port, diſguiſing her verie fitly with ſcarfs although he reſted aſſured, he ſhould meet that way with no body, till he came to his barke, into which he ment to enter by night. But Pamela who al this while, tranſported with deſire & troubled with feare had neuer free ſcope of iudgement to looke with perfect conſideratiõ into her own enterpriſe, but euen by the lawes of loue, had bequeathed the care of her ſelf vpon him to whõ ſhe had geuẽ her ſelf. Now that the pang of deſire with euident hope was quieted, & moſt part of the feare paſſed, reaſon began to renew his ſhining in her hart, & make her ſee her ſelf in her ſelf; & weigh with what wings ſhe flew out of her natiue country; & vpõ what ground ſhe built ſo ſtrange a determinatiõ. But loue fortified with her louers preſence kept ſtill his own in her hart. So that as they ridde together with her hand vpon her faithful ſeruants ſhoulder, ſodainly caſting her baſhful eyes to the ground, and yet bending her ſelf towards him,) like the clyent that commits the cauſe of al his worth to a wel truſted aduocate,) from a milde ſpirit ſaid vnto him theſe ſweetely deliuered wordes: Prince Muſidorus, (for ſo my aſſured hope is I may iuſtlie call you, ſince with no other my heart would euer haue yeelded to goe; And if ſo I doe not rightlie tearme you, all other wordes are as bootleſſe, as my deede miſerable, and I as vnfortunate, as you wicked) my Prince Muſidorus I ſaye now that the vehement ſhewes of your faithfull Loue towardes mee, haue brought my minde to aunſwere it, in ſo due a proportion, that contrarie to all generall rules of reaſon, I haue layde in you, my eſtate, my life, my honour: it is your part to double your former care, and make me ſee your vertue no leſſe in preſeruing then in obtaining: and your faith to be a faith asmuch in freedome, as bondage. Tender now your owne workemanshippe; and so gouerne your loue towards me, as I may still remaine worthie to be loued. Your promise you remember, which here by the eternall giuers of vertue, I coniure you to obserue, let me be your owne as I am, but by no vniust conquest; let not our ioyes which ought euer to last, be stayned in our own consciences, let no shadow of repentance steale into the sweet consideration of our mutuall happinesse. I haue yeelded to bee your wife, stay then till the time that I may rightly bee so; let no other defiled name burden my heart. What should I more saye? If I haue chosen well, all doubt is past, since your action onely must determine, whether I haue done vertuously or shamefully in following you. Musidorus that had more aboundaunce of ioye in his hart, then Vlisses had what time with his owne industrie he stale the fatall Palladium, imagined to bee the only relike of Troies safetie, taking Pamelas hand, & many times kissing it, What I am, said he, the Gods I hope will shortly make your owne eyes Iudges; and of my mind towards you, the meane time shalbe my pledge vnto you, your contentment is dearer to me then mine owne, & therfore doubt not of his mind, whose thoughts are so thralled vnto you, as you are to bend or slack them as it shall seeme best vnto you. You do wrong to your selfe, to make any doubt that a base estate could euer vndertake so high an enterprise; or a spotted minde bee able to behold your vertues. Thus much onely I must confesse, I can neuer doe, to make the world see you haue chosen worthily, since all the world is not worthy of you. In such delightfull discourses, kept they on their iourney, mayntaining their hearts in that right harmonie of affection, which doth enterchangeably deliuer each to other the secret workings of their soules, till with the vnused trauaile, the Princesse being weary, they lighted downe in a faire thicke wood, which did entise them with the pleasantnes of it to take their rest there. It was all of Pine trees, whose brode heads, meeting together, yeelded a perfit shade to the ground, where their bodies gaue a spacious and pleasant roome to walke in, they were set in so perfect an order, that euery way the eye being full, yet no way was stopped. And euen in the middest of them, were there many sweete springs, which did loose themselues vpon the face of the earth. Here Musidorus drew out such prouision of fruits, & other cates, as he had brought for that dayes repast, and layd it downe vpon the faire Carpet of the greene grasse. But Pamela had much more pleasure to walke vnder those trees, making in their barkes prettie knottes, which tyed together the names of Musidorus and Pamela, sometimes entermixedly changing them, to Pammedorus and Musimela, with twentie other flowers of her trauailing fancies, which had bound them selues to a greater restraint, then they could without much paine well endure, and to one tree more beholding to her then the rest, she entrusted the treasure of her thoughts in these verses:

DO not disdaine, ô streight vp-raised Pine,
That wounding thee, my thoughts in thee I graue:
Since that my thoughts, as streight as streightnesse thine
No smaller wound, alas! far deeper haue.

Deeper engrau'd, which salue nor time can saue,
Giu'n to my heart, by my fore wounded eyne:
Thus cruell to my selfe, how canst thou craue
My inward hurt should spare thy outward rine?

Yet

Yet ſtill faire tree, lift vp thy ſtately line,
Liue long, and long witneſſe my choſen ſmart,
VVhich harde deſires, (harde by my ſelfe) impart.

And in this growing barke growe verſes myne.
My heart my word, my word hath giu'n my hart.
The giuer giu'n from gift ſhall neuer part.

Vpon a roote of the tree, that the earth had left ſomething barer then the reſt, ſhe wrate this couplet:

SVVeete roote ſay thou, the roote of my deſire
VVas vertue cladde in conſtant loues attire.

Muſidorus, ſeing her fancies drawne vp to ſuch pleaſaunt contemplations, accompanied her in them, and made the trees aſwell beare the badges of his paſſions; as this ſong engraued in them did teſtifie:

YOu goodly pines, which ſtill with braue aſſent,
In natures pride your heads to heau'nward heaue,
Though you beſides ſuch graces earth hath lent,
Of ſome late grace a greater grace receiue,

By her who was (O bleſſed you) content
VVith her faire hand, your tender barkes to cleaue,
And ſo by you (O bleſſed you) hath ſent,
Such piercing words as no thoughts els conceaue:

Yet yeeld your graunt, a baſer hand may leaue
His thoughts in you, where ſo ſweete thoughts were ſpent,
For how would you the miſtreſſe thoughts bereaue
Of waiting thoughts all to her ſeruice ment?

Nay higher thoughts (though thralled thoughts) I call
My thoughts then hers, who firſt your ryne did rent.
Then hers, to whom my thoughts a lonely thrall
Ryſing from lowe, are to the higheſt bent;
VVhere hers, whom worth makes higheſt ouer all
Comming from her, cannot but downward fall.

While Pamela ſitting her downe vnder one of them, and making a poſie of the fayre vndergrowing flowers, filled Muſidorus eares with the heauenly ſound of her muſicke, which before he had neuer heard, ſo that it ſeemed vnto him a new aſſault giuen to the caſtle of his heart, already conquered: which to ſignifie, and with all replie to her ſweete notes, hee ſang in a kinde of ſtill, but rauiſhing tune a fewe verſes, her ſong was this, and his replie followes:

Pamela. Like diuers flowers, whose diuers beauties serue
To decke the earth with his well colourd weede,
Though each of them, his priuate forme preserue,
Yet ioyning formes one sight of beautie breede.

Right so my thoughts, whereon my hart I feede:
Right so my inward parts, and outward glasse,
Though each possesse a diuers working kinde,
Yet all well knit to one faire end do passe:
That he to whome these sundrie gifts I binde,
All what I am, still one, his owne, do finde.

Musidorus All what you are still one, his owne to finde,
You that are borne to be the worldes eye,
What were it els, but to make each thing blinde?
And to the sunne with waxen wings to flie?

No no, such force with my small force to trye
Is not my skill, or reach of mortall minde.
Call me but yours, my title is most hye:
Hold me most yours, then my long suite is signde.

You none can claime but you your selfe aright,
For you do passe your selfe, in vertues might.
So both are yours: I, bound with gaged hart:
You onely yours, too farre beyond desart.

In this vertuous wãtonnesse, suffring their minds to descend to ech tender enioying their vnited thoughts, Pamela hauing tasted of the fruits, & growing extreame sleepie, hauing bin long kept frõ it, with the perplexitie of her dangerous attempt, laying her head in his lap, was inuited by him to sleepe with these softly vttered verses:

Lock vp, faire liddes, the treasure of my hart:
Preserue those beames, this ages onely light:
To her sweete sence, sweete sleepe some ease impart,
Her sence too weake to beare her spirits might.

And while ô sleepe thou closest vp her sight,
(Her sight where loue did forge his fairest dart)
O harbour all her parts in easefull plight:
Let no strange dreame make her faire body start.

But yet ô dreame, if thou wilt not depart
In this rare subiect from thy common right:
But wilt thy selfe in such a seate delight,

Then take my shape, and play a louers part:
Kisse her from me, and say vnto her spirit,
Till her eyes shine, I liue in darkest night.

The sweete Pamela was brought into a sweete sleepe with this song which gaue Musidorus oportunitie at leasure to behold her excellent beauties. He thought her faire forehead was a field where all his fancies fought; and euery haire of her head seemed a strong chaine that tied him. Her fairer liddes then hiding her fairer eyes, seemed vnto him sweete boxes of mother of pearle, rich in themselues, but containing in them farre richer Iewels. Her cheekes with their colour most delicately mixed would haue entertained his eyes somewhile, but that the roses of her lippes (whose separating was wont to be accompanied with most wise speeches) now by force drew his sight to marke how pretily they lay one ouer the other, vniting their deuided beauties: and thorough them the eye of his fancy deliuered to his memorie the lying (as in ambush) vnder her lippes of those armed rankes, all armed in most pure white, & keeping the most precise order of militarie discipline. And lest this beautie might seeme the picture of some excellent artificer, foorth there stale a soft breath, carrying good testimonie of her inward sweetnesse: and so stealingly it came out, as it seemed loath to leaue his contentfull mansion, but that it hoped to be drawne in againe to that well closed paradise, which did so tyrannize ouer Musidorus affects, that he was compelled to put his face as lowe to hers, as he could, sucking the breath with such [illegible]y, that he did determine in himselfe, there had bene no life to a Camæleons, if he might be suffered to enioy that food. But long he was not suffered being within a while interrupted by the comming of a companie of clownish villaines, armed with diuers sorts of weapons, and for the rest both in face and apparell so forewasted, that they seemed to beare a great conformitie with the sauages; who miserable in themselues, taught to encrease their mischiefes in other bodies harmes, came with such cries as they both awaked Pamela, and made Musidorus turne vnto them full of a most violent rage, with the looke of a shee Tigre, when her whelpes are stolne away.

But Zelmane whome I left in the Caue hardly bestead, hauing both great wittes and stirring passions to deale with, makes me lend her my penne awhile to see with what dexteritie she could put by her dangers. For hauing in one instant both to resist rage and go beyond wisedome, being to deale with a Ladie that had her wits awake in euery thing, but in helping her owne hurt, she saw now no other remedie in her case, but to qualifie her rage with hope, & to satisfie her wit with plainnesse. Yet lest too abrupt falling into it, should yeeld too great aduantage vnto her, she thought good to come to it by degrees with this kind of insinuation. Your wise, but very darke speeches, most excellent Lady, are wouen vp in so intricate a maner, as I know not how to proportiō mine answer vnto them: so are your prayers mixt with threates, and so is the shew of your loue hidden with the name of reuenge, the naturall effect of mortal hatred. You seeme displeased with the opinion you haue of my disguising, and yet if be not disguised, you must needes be much more displeased. Hope then (the onely succour of perplexed mindes) being quite cut off, you desire my affection, and yet you your selfe thinke my affection alreadie bestowed. You pretend crueltie, before you haue the subiection, and are iealous of keeping that, which as yet you haue not gotten. And that which is strangest in your iealousie, is both the vniustice of it, in being loath that should come to your daughter, which you deeme good, and the vaynnesse, since you two are in so diuers respects, that there is no necessitie one of you should fall to be a barre to the other. For neither (if I be such as you fancie) can I marrie you, which must needes be the onely end I can aspire to in her: neither neede the marrying of her keepe me from a gratefull consideration how much you honor me in the loue you vouchsafe to beare me. Gynecia, to whom the fearefull agonies shee still liued in, made any small repriuall sweete, did quickly finde her words falling to a better way of comfort, & therefore with a mind readie to shew nothing could make it rebellious against Zelmane, but too extreme tyrāny, she thus said: Alas too much beloued Zelmane, the thoghts are but outflowings of the mind, & the tongue is but a seruant of the thoughts, therefore maruaile not that my words suffer contrarieties, since my minde doth hourely suffer in it selfe whole armies of mortall aduersaries. But, alas, if I had the vse of mine own reason, then should I not neede, for want of it, to finde my selfe in this desperate mischiefe, but because my reason is vanished, so haue I likewise no power to correct my vnreasonableneſſe. Do you therfore accept the protection of my minde, which hath no other resting place, and driue it not, by being vnregarded to put it selfe into vnknowne extremities. I desire but to haue my affection answered, and to haue a right reflection of my loue in you. That graunted, assure your selfe mine owne loue will easily teach mee to seeke your contentment: and make me thinke my daughter a very meane price to keepe still in mine eyes the foode of my sprits. But take heede that contempt driue me not into despaire, the most violent cause of that miserable effect. Zelmane that already sawe some fruit of her last determined fancie (so farre as came to a mollifying of Gynecias rage) seeing no other way to satisfie suspicion, which was held open with the continuall prickes of loue, resolued now with plainneſſe to winne trust, which trust shee might after deceiue with a greater subtletie. Therefore looking vpon her with a more relenting grace, then euer she had done before, pretending a great bashfulneſſe before she could come to confeſſe such a fault, she thus sayd vnto her: Most worthy Lady, I did neuer thinke, till now, that pitie of another could make me betray my selfe, nor that the sound of words could ouerthrow any wise bodies determination. But your words (I thinke) haue charmed me, and your grace bewitched me. Your compassion makes me open my hart to you, & leaue vnharboured mine own thoughts. For proofe of it, I will discloſe my greatest secret, which well you might suspect, but neuer know, & so haue your wandring hope in a more painful wilderneſſe, being neither way able to be lodged in a perfect resolution. I will, I say, vnwrap my hidden estate, & after make you iudge of it, perchance director. The truth is, I am a man: nay, I will say further to you, I am borne a Prince. And to make vp your minde in a through vnderstanding of me since I came to this place, I may not deny I haue had some sprinkling of I know not what good liking to my Lady Philoclea. For how could I euer imagine, the heauens would haue rayned down so much of your fauour vpon me? & of that side there was a shew of possible hope, the most comfortable Counsellor of loue. The cause of this my changed attyre, was a iourney two yeares agoe I made among the Amazons, where hauing sought to trye my vnfortunate valure, I met not one in all the Countrey but was too hard for me, till in the end in the presence of their Queene Marpesia, I hoping to preuayle against her, challenged an old woman of foureſcore yeares, to fight on horseback to the vttermost with me. Who hauing ouerthrowne me, for the sauing of my life, made me sweare I should go like an vnarmed Amazon, till the comming of my beard did, with the discharge of my oath, deliuer me of that bondage. Here Zelmane ended, not cōming to a full concluſion, because she would see what it wrought in Gynecias mind, hauing in her speech sought to winne a beliefe of her, &, if it might be, by disgrace of her self to diminish Gynecias affectiō.

For

For the first it had much preuailed. But Gynecia, whose end of louing her, was not her fighting, neither could her loue too deepely grounded receiue diminishment; and besides shee had seene her selfe, sufficient proofes of Zelmanes admirable prowesse. Therefore sleightly passing ouer that point of her fained dishonor, but taking good hold of the confessing her manly sexe, with the shamefast looke of that suitor, who hauing alreadie obtained much, is yet forced by want to demaund more, put foorth her sorrowfull suite in these words: The gods, said shee, reward thee for thy vertuous pittie of my ouerladen soule, who yet hath receyued some breath of comfort, by finding thy confession to maintaine some possibilitie of my languishing hope. But alas! as they who seeke to enrich themselues by minerall industrie, the first labour is to finde the myne, which to their cheerefull comfort being found, if after any vnlooked for stop, or casuall impediment keepe them from getting the desired vre, they are so much the more greeued, as the late conceiued hope addes torment to their former want. So, falles it out with mee happie or hapleſſe woman (as it pleaseth you to ordayne) who am now either to receyue some gue rdon of my most wofull labours, or to returne into a more wretched darknesse, hauing had some glimmering of my blisfull Sunne, O Zelmane, tread not vpon a soule that lyes vnder your foote: let not the abasing of my selfe make me more base in your eyes, but iudge of me according to that I am, and haue bene, and let my errors be made excusable by the immortall name of loue. With that, vnder a fained rage, tearing her clothes, she discouered some partes of her faire body, which if Zelmanes hart had not bene so fully possest as there was no place left for any new gueſt, no doubt it would haue yeelded to that gallant assault. But Zelmane so much the more arming her determination, as she sawe such force threatened, yet still remembring shee must wade betwixt constancie and curtesy, embracing Gynecia, and once or twise kissing her, Deare Ladie, sayd she, he were a great enemy to himselfe, that would refuse such an offer, in the purchase of which a mans life were blessedly bestowed. Nay, how can I euer yeeld due recompence, for so excessiue a fauour? but hauing nothing to giue you but my selfe, take that: I must confesse a small, but a very free gift what other affection soeuer I haue had, shall giue place to as great perfection, working besides vppon the bond of gratefulnesse. The gods forbid I should be so fooliſh, as not to see, or so wicked as not to remember, how much my small deserts are ouerballanced by your vnspeakable goodnesse. Nay happy may I well accompt my mis-hap among the Amazons, since that dishonor hath bene so true a path to my greatest honor, and the chaunging of my outward rayment, hath clothed my minde in such inward contentation. Take therefore noble Lady as much comfort to your hart, as the full commandement of me can yeeld you: wipe your faire eyes, and keepe them for nobler seruices. And now I wil presume thus much to say vnto you, that you make of your selfe for my sake, that my ioyes of my new obtained riches may be accomplished in you. But let vs leaue this place, least you be too long missed, and henceforward quiet your mind from any further care, for I will now (to my too much ioy) take the charge vpon me, within fewe dayes to worke your satisfaction, and my felicitie. Thus much she sayde, and withall led Gynecia out of the Caue, for well she sawe the boyling minde of Gynecia did early apprehend the fitnesse of that lonely place. But indeede this direct promise of a short space, ioyned with the cumbersome familiar of womankind, I meane modestie, stayed so Gynecias minde, that she tooke thus much at that present for good payment: remaining with a painefull ioy, and a wearysome kinde of comfort,not vnlike to the condemned priſoner, whoſe mind ſtill running vpon the violent arriuall of his cruell death,heares that his pardon is promiſed, but not yet ſigned. In this ſort they both iſſued out of that obſcure manſion: Gynecia alreadie halfe perſwaded in her ſelfe(ô weakneſſe of humane conceit)that Zelmanes affectiõ was turned towards her. For ſuch alas! we are all, in ſuch a mould are we caſt, that with the too much loue we beare our ſelues, being firſt our own flatterers,wee are eaſily hooked with our own flattery,we are eaſily perſwaded of others loue.

But Zelmane who had now to play her prize, ſeeing no way things could long remaine in that ſtate,& now finding her promiſe had tyed her tryall to a ſmall compaſſe of time,began to throw her thoughts into each corner of her inuention, how ſhe might atchieue her liues enterpriſe: for well ſhee knew deceit cannot otherwiſe be maintained but by deceit: and how to deceiue ſuch heedfull eyes, and how to ſatisfie,and yet not ſatisfie ſuch hopefull deſires, it was no ſmall skill. But both their thoughts were called from themſelues,with the ſight of Baſilius, who then lying down by his daughter Philoclea, vpon the faire,though naturall,bed of greene-graſſe,ſeeing the ſunne what ſpeede he made, to leaue our Weſt to do his office in the other Hemiſphere, his inward Muſes made him in his beſt muſicke, ſing this Madrigall.

VVHy doeſt thou haſte away
O Titan faire the giuer of the day?
Is it to carrie newes
To VVeſterne wights, what ſtarres in Eaſt appeare?
Or doeſt thou thinke that here
Is left a Sunne, whoſe beames thy place may vſe?
Yet ſtay and well peruſe,
VVhat be her gifts, that make her equall thee,
Bend all thy light to ſee
In earthly clothes encloſde a heauenly ſparke.
Thy running courſe cannot ſuch beauties marke:
No, no, thy motions be
Haſtened from vs with barre of shadow darke,
Becauſe that thou the author of our ſight
Diſdainſt we ſee thee ſtaind with others light.

And hauing ended,Deere Philoclea,ſaid he, ſing ſomething that may diuert my thoughts from the continuall taske of their ruinous harbour: She obedient to him, and not vnwilling to disburden her ſecret paſſion, made her ſweete voice be heard in theſe words:

O Stealing time the ſubieƈt of delaie,
(Delay, the racke of vnfram'd deſire)
VVhat ſtrange deſſein haſt thou my hopes to ſtaie,
My hopes which do but to mine owne aſpire?

Mine owne? ô word on whoſe ſweet ſound doth pray
My greedy ſoule, with gripe of inward fire:
Thy title great, I iuſtly challenge may,
Since in ſuch phraſe his faith he did attire.

O time, become the chariot of my ioyes:
As thou draweſt on, ſo let my bliſſe draw neere.
Each moment loſt, part of my hap deſtroyes.

Thou art the father of occaſion deare:
Ioine with thy ſonne, to eaſe my long annoyes.
In ſpeedie helpe, thanke-worthie friends appeare.

Philoclea brake off her ſong, aſſoone as her mother with Zelmane came neere vnto them riſing vp with a kindly baſhfulneſſe, being not ignorant of the ſpite her mother bare her, and ſtriken with the ſight of that perſon, whoſe loue made all thoſe troubles ſeeme faire flowers of her deareſt garland, nay rather all thoſe troubles made the loue increaſe. For as the arriuall of enemies makes a towne ſo fortifie it ſelf, as euer after it remaines ſtronger, ſo that a man may ſay, enemies were no ſmal cauſe to the townes ſtrength: So to a mind once fixed in a well pleaſed determination, who hopes by annoyance to ouerthrow it, doth but teach it to knit together all his beſt grounds, and ſo perchance of a chanceable purpoſe, make an vnchangeable reſolution. But no more did Philoclea ſee the wonted ſignes of Zelmanes affection towards her; ſhe thought ſhe ſaw another light in her eyes, with a bold and careleſſe looke vpon her, which was wont to be dazeled with her beautie; and the framing of her curteſies rather ceremonious then affectionate, and that which worſt liked her, was, that it proceeded with ſuch quiet ſetledneſſe, as it rather threatned a full purpoſe, then any ſodaine paſſion. She found her behauiour bent altogether to her mother, and preſumed in her ſelfe, ſhe diſcerned the well acquainted face of his fancies now turned to another ſubiect. She ſaw her mothers worthineſſe, and too well knew her affection. Theſe ioyning their diuerſe working powers together in her mind, but yet a prentiſe in the painefull myſterie of paſſions, brought Philoclea into a new trauerſe of her thoughts, and made her keepe her carefull looke the more attentiue vpon Zelmanes behauiour, who indeed (though with much paine, and condemning her ſelfe to commit a ſacrilege againſt the ſweet Saint that liued in her inmoſt temple) yet ſtrengthening her ſelfe in it, being the ſureſt way to make Gynecia bite of her other baites, did ſo quite ouer-rule all wonted ſhewes of loue to Philoclea, and conuert them to Gynecia, that the part ſhe played did worke in both a full and liuely perſwaſion: to Gynecia ſuch exceſſiue cõfort, as the being preferred to a riuall doth deliuer to ſwelling deſire: But to the delicate Philoclea, whoſe calme thoughts were vnable to nouriſh any ſtrong debate, it gaue ſo ſtinging a hurt, that fainting vnder the force of her inward torment, ſhee withdrew her ſelfe to the Lodge, and there wearie of ſupporting her owne burthen, caſt her ſelfe vpon her bed, ſuffering her ſorow to melt it ſelfe into abundance of teares; at length cloſing her eyes, as if each thing ſhe ſaw was a picture of her miſhap, and turning vpon her heart ſide, which with vehement panting, did ſummon her to conſider her fortune, ſhe thus bemoned her ſelfe.

Alas Philoclea, is this the price of all thy paynes? Is this the reward of thy giuen-away libertie? Hath too much yeelding bred crueltie? Or can too great acquaintance make mee helde for a ſtraunger? Hath the chooſing of a companion made mee left alone? Or doth graunting deſire cauſe the deſire to bee neglected? Alas, deſpiſed Philoclea, why diddeſt thou not holde thy thoughtes in their ſimple courſe and content thy ſelf with the loue of thine owne vertue, which would neuer haue betrayed thee? Ah ſillie foole, didſt thou looke for truth in him, that with his owne mouth confeſt his falſhood? for plaine proceeding in him, that ſtill goes diſguiſed? They ſay the falſeſt men will yet beare outward ſhewes of a pure mind. But he that euen outwardly beares the badge of trecherie, what helles of wickedneſſe muſt needs in the depth be contained? But ô wicked mouth of mine how dareſt thou thus blaſpheme the ornament of the earth, the veſſell of all vertue? O wretch that I am that wil anger the Gods in diſpraiſing their moſt excellēt work! O no, no, there was no fault but in me, that could euer thinke ſo high eyes would looke ſo low, or ſo great perfections would ſtaine themſelues with my vnworthineſſe. Alas, why could I not ſee? I was too weake a band to tie ſo heauenlie a heart: I was not fit to limit the infinite courſe of his wonderfull deſtinies. Was it euer like that vpon onelie Philoclea his thoughts ſhould reſt? Ah ſillie ſoule that couldeſt pleaſe thy ſelfe with ſo impoſſible an imagination! An vniuerſall happineſſe is to flowe from him. How was I ſo inueigled to hope, I might be the marke of ſuch a mind? He did thee no wrong, O Philoclea, he did thee no wrong, it was thy weakneſſe to fancie the beames of the ſunne ſhould giue light to no eyes but to thine! And yet ô Prince Pyrocles, for whom I may well begin to hate my ſelfe, but can neuer leaue to loue thee, what triumph canſt thou make of this conqueſt? What ſpoyles wilt thou carie away of this my vndeſerued ouerthrow? could thy force find out no fitter field then the feeble mind of a poore mayd, who at the firſt ſight did wiſh thee all happineſſe? Shall it be ſaid the mirror of mankind hath bene employed to deſtroy a hurtleſſe Gentlewoman? O Pyrocles, Pyrocles, let me yet call thee before the iudgement of thine owne vertue, let mee be accepted for a plaintiffe in a cauſe which cōcerns my life: what need hadſt thou to arme thy face with the inchāting maske of thy painted paſſions? what need hadſt thou to fortifie thy excellencies with ſo exquiſite a cunning, in making our owne arts betray vs? what needeſt thou deſcend ſo far from thy incōparable worthineſſe, as to take on the habite of weake womankind? Was all this to winne the vndefended Caſtle of a friend, which being wonne, thou wouldeſt after raze? Could ſo ſmall a cauſe allure thee? or did not ſo vniuſt a cauſe ſtop thee? O me, what ſay I more, this is my caſe, my Loue hates me, vertue deales wickedlie with me, and he does me wrong, whoſe doing I can neuer account wrong. With that the ſweete Lady turning her ſelfe vpon her wearie bed, ſhe happely ſaw a lute, vpon the bellie of which Gynecia had written this ſong, what time Baſilius imputed her iealous motions to proceed of the doubt ſhe had of his vntimely loues. Vnder vvhich vaile ſhe contented to couer her neuer ceaſing anguiſh, had made the Lute a monument of her mind, which Philoclea had neuer much marked, til novv the feare of a competitor more ſtirred her, then before the care of a mother. The verſes vvere theſe:

MY Lute within thy ſelfe thy tunes encloſe,
Thy miſtreſſe ſong is now a ſorow's crie,
Her hand benumb'd vvith fortunes daylie blowes,
Her mind amaz'd can neither helpe apply.
VVeare theſe my words as mourning weeds of woes,
Blacke inke becomes the ſtate wherein I die.
And though my mones be not in muſike bound,
Of written griefes, yet be the ſilent ground.

The

The world doth yeeld such ill consorted showes,
With circled course, which no wise stay can trie,
That childish stuffe which knowes not friends from foes,
(Better despisde) bewonder gasing eye.
Thus noble gold, downe to the bottome goes,
When worthlesse corke, aloft doth floting lie.
Thus in thy selfe, least strings are lowdest found,
And lowest stops do yeeld the highest sound.

Philoclea read them, and throwing downe the Lute, Is this the legacie you haue bequeathed me, ô kinde mother of mine, said she? did you bestow the light vpon me for this? or did you beare me to be the Author of my buriall? A trim purchase you haue made of your owne shame; robbed your daughter to ruine your selfe? The birds vnreasonable, yet vse so much reason, as to make neasts for their tender young ones; my cruell mother turnes me out of mine owne harbour; alas, plaint boores not, for my case can receiue no help, for who should geue mee helpe? shall I flie to my parents? they are my murtherers: shall I go to him, who alreadie being wonne and lost, must needs haue killed all pitie? Alas, I can bring no new interceissions, he knowes already what I am is his. Shall I come home againe to my selfe? O me contemned wretch; I haue giuen away my selfe. With that the poore soule beat her breast as if that had bene guilty of her faults, neither thinking of reuenge, nor studying for remedy, but (sweet creature) gaue griefe a free dominion, keeping her chamber a few dayes after, not needing to faine her self sicke, feeling euen in her soule the pangs of extreme paine. But litle did Gynecia recke that, neither when she saw her go away from them, neither when she after found that sickneesse made her hide her faire face: so much had fancie preuayled against nature. But ô you that haue euer knowne, how tender to euery motion loue makes the louers heart, how he measures all his ioyes vpon her contentment: & doth with respectful eye hang all his behauiour vpon her eyes: iudge I pray you now of Zelmanes troubled thoughts, when she saw Philoclea, with an amazed kind of sorow, carie away her sweet presence, and easily found (so happie a coniecture vnhappie affection hath) that her demeanour was guilty of that trespasse. There was neuer fooliish soft-hearted mother, that forced to beat her child, did weepe first for his paines, and doing that she was loth to do, did repent before she began, did find halfe that motion in her weake mind, as Zelmane did, now that she was forced by reason to giue an outward blow to her passions, and for the lending of a small time, to seeke the vsurie of all her desires. The vnkindneesse she conceiued, Philoclea might conceiue, did wound her soule, each teare she doubted she spent, drowned all her comfort. Her sickeneesse was a death vnto her. Often would she speake to the image of Philoclea which liued and ruled in the highest of her inward part, and vse vehement othes and protestations vnto her; that nothing should euer falsifie the free chosen vow she had made. Often would she desire her that she would looke wel to Pyrocles hart, for as for her she had no more interest in it to bestow it any way: Alas would she say, onlie Philoclea hast thou not so much feeling of thine own force, as to know no new Conquerour can preuaile against thy conquests? Was euer any dazeled with the Moone, that had vsed his eyes to the beames of the Sunne? Is he caried away with a greedie desire of Acornes, that hath had his senses rauished with a garden of most delightfull fruits? O Philoclea, Philoelea, be thou but as mercifull a princesse to my mind, as thou art a true poſſeſſour, and I ſhall haue as much cauſe of gladneſſe as thou haſt no cauſe of miſdoubting. O no, no, when a mans owne hart is the gage of his debt, when a mans owne thoughts are willing witneſſes to his promiſe; laſtly, when a man is the Iayler ouer himſelfe; there is litle doubt of breaking credite, and leſſe doubt of ſuch an eſcape. In this combate of Zelmanes doubtfull imaginations, in the end reaſon well backed with the vehement deſire to bring her matters ſoone to the deſired hauen, did ouer-rule the boyling of her inward kindneſſe, though as I ſay with ſuch a manifeſt ſtrife, that both Baſilius and Gynecias well waiting eyes, had marked her muſes had labored in deeper ſubiect then ordinarie, which ſhe likewiſe perceiuing they had perceiued, awaking her ſelfe out of thoſe thoughts, and principallie caring how to ſatisfie Gynecia (whoſe iudgement and paſſion ſhe ſtood moſt in regard of) bowing her head to her attentiue eare, Madame (ſaid ſhe) with practiſe of my thoughts, I haue found out a way by which your contentment ſhal draw on my happineſſe. Gynecia deliuering in her face as thankefull a ioyfulneſſe as her heart could hold, ſaid, it was then time to retire themſelues to their reſt, for what with riding abroad the day before, and late ſitting vp for Eclogues, their bodies had dearelie purchaſed that nights quiet. So went they home to their Lodge, Zelmane framing of both ſides bountifull meaſures of louing countenances to eithers ioy, and neithers iealouſie; to the eſpeciall comfort of Baſilius, whoſe weaker bowels were ſtraight full with the leaſt liquor of hope. So that ſtill holding her by the hand, and ſometimes tickling it, he went by her with the moſt gay conceits that euer had entred his braines, growing now ſo hearted in his reſolution, that he litle reſpected Gynecias preſence. But with a luſtier note then wonted, clearing his voice, & chearing his ſpirits, looking ſtill vpon Zelmane (whom now the Moone did beautifie with her ſhining almoſt at the full) as if her eyes had bene his ſong-Booke, hee did the meſſage of his mind in ſinging theſe verſes:

VVHen two Sunnes do appeare,
Some ſay it doth betoken wonders neare,
As Princes loſſe or change:
Two gleaming Sunnes of ſplendour like I ſee,
And ſeeing feele in me
Of Princes heart quite loſt the ruine ſtrange.

But now each where doth range
VVith vglie cloke the darke enuious night:
VVho full of guiltie ſpite,
Such liuing beames ſhould her blacke ſeat aſſaile,
Too weake for them our weaker ſight doth vaile.

No ſayes faire Moone, my light
Shall barre that vvrong, and though it not preuaile
Like to my brothers rayes, yet thoſe I ſend
Hurt not the face, vvhich nothing can amend.

And by that time being come to the Lodge, and viſited the ſweet Philoclea, with much leſſe then naturall care of the Parents, and much leſſe thē wonted kindneſſe of Zelmane, each party full fraught with diuerſly working fancies, made their pillowes weake weak props of their ouer-loden heads. Yet of all other were Zelmanes braines most turmoyled, troubled with loue both actiue and passiue; and lastlie, and especially with care, how to vse her short limited time to the best purpose, by some wise and happie diuerting her two louers vnwelcome desires. Zelmane hauing had the night her only counseller in the busie enterprise she was to vndertake, & hauing all that time mused, and yet not fullie resolued, how she might ioyne preuayling with preuenting, was offended with the dayes bold entrie into her chamber, as if he had now by custome growne an assured bringer of euill newes. Which she taking a Citterne to her, did lay to Auoras charge with these well sung verses:

AVrora now thou shewst thy blushing light,
(Which oft to hope layes out a guilefull baite,
That trusts in time, to find the way aright
To ease those paines, which on desire do vvaite.

Blush on for shame: that still with thee do light
On pensiue soules (in steed of restfull baite)
Care vpon care (in steed of doing right)
To ouer-pressed breasts, more grieuous waight.

As oh! my selfe, whose woes are neuer light,
(Tide to the stake of doubt) strange passions baite,
While thy knowne course, obseruing natures right,
Stirres me to thinke what dangers lie in waite.
For mischiefes great, day after day doth show:
Make me still feare, thy faire appearing show.

Alas said she, am not I runne into a strange gulfe, that am faine for loue to hurt her I loue? And because I detest the others, to please them I detest? O only Philoclea, whose beautie is matched with nothing, but with the vnspeakeable beautie of thy fairest mind, if thou didst see vpon what a racke my tormented soule is set, litle would you thinke I had any scope now to leape to any new chaunge; with that with hastie hands she got her selfe vp turning her sight to euerie thing, as if chaunge of obiect might help her inuention. So went she againe to the Caue, where forthwith it came into her head, that should be the fittest place to perfourme her exploit, of which she had now a kind of confused conceit, although she had not set downe in her fancie, the meeting with each particularity that might fall out. But as the painter doth at the first but shew a rude proportion of the thing he imitates, which after with more curious hand he drawes to the representing each lineamēt: so had her thoughts beating about it continuallie, receiued into them a ground-plot of her deuise, although she had not in each part shapte it according to a full determination. But in this sort hauing early visited the mornings beautie, in those pleasant desarts, she came to the King and Queene and told them, that for the performance of certaine her countrie deuotions, which onely were to bee exercised in solitarinesse, she did desire their leaue she might for a few dayes lodge her selfe in the caue, the fresh sweetnesse of which did greatlie delight her, in that hote countrie; and that for that smal space, they wold not otherwise trouble themselues in visiting her, but at such times as she would come to waite vpon them, which should be euerie day at certaine houres, neither ſhould it be long, ſhe would deſire this priuiledged abſence of them. They whoſe minds had already taken out that leſſon, perfectly to yeeld a willing obedience to all her deſires, with conſenting countenance made her ſoone ſee her pleaſure was a law vnto them. Both indeed inwardlie glad of it, Baſilius hoping that herdeuiding her ſelfe from them, might yet giue him ſome freer occaſion of comming in ſecret vnto her, whoſe fauourable face had lately ſtrengthened his fainting courage. But Gynecia of all other moſt ioyous, holding her ſelfe aſſured that this was but a prologue to the play ſhe had promiſed her. Thus both flattering themſelues with diuerſlie grounded hopes, they rang a bell which ſerued to call certaine poore women which euer lay in cabins not farre off, to do the houſhold ſeruices of both Lodges, and neuer came to either but being called for: and commanded them to carie forthwith Zelmanes bed and furniture of her chamber into the pleaſant caue; and to decke it vp as finelie as it was poſſible for them, that their ſoules reſt might reſt her bodie to her beſt pleaſing maner: that was with all diligence performed of them, and Zelmane already in poſſeſſion of her new choſen lodging, where ſhe like one of Veſtaes nunnes, entertaind her ſelfe for a few dayes in all ſhew of ſtraightneſſe, yet once a day comming to do her dutie to the King and Queene, in whom the ſeldomneſſe of the ſight encreaſed the more vnquiet longing, though ſomewhat qualified, as her countenance was decked to either of them with more comfort then wonted. Eſpeciallie to Gynecia, who ſeeing her whollie neglecting her daughter Philoclea, had now promiſed her ſelfe a full poſſeſſion of Zelmanes heart, ſtill expecting the fruit of the happie and hoped for inuention. But both ſhee and Baſilius kept ſuch a continuall watch about the precinctes of the Caue, that either of them was a bar to the other from hauing any ſecret communing with Zelmane. While in the meane time the ſweete Philoclea forgotten of her father, deſpiſed of her mother, and in apparance left of Zelmane had yeelded vp her ſoule to be a pray to ſorow and vnkindneſſe, not with raging conceit of reuenge as had paſſed through the ſtout and wiſe heart of her mother, but with a kindlie meekneſſe taking vpon her the weight of her owne woes, and ſuffering them to haue ſo full a courſe as it did exceedinglie weaken the eſtate of her bodie: aſwell for which cauſe, as for that ſhe could not ſee Zelmane, without expreſſing (more then ſhe would) how far now her loue was impriſoned in extremitie of ſorow, ſhe bound her ſelfe firſt to the limits of her owne chamber, and after, (griefe breeding ſickneſſe) of her bed. But Zelmane hauing now a full libertie to caſt about euerie way, how to bring her conceiued attempt to a deſired ſucceſſe, was oft ſo perplexed with the manifold difficultie of it, that ſometimes ſhe would reſolue by force to take her away, though it were with the death of her parents, ſometimes to go away her ſelfe with Muſidorus and bring both their forces, ſo to win her. But laſtlie, euen the ſame day that Muſidorus by feeding the humour of his three lothſome gardiens, had ſtolne away the Princeſſe Pamela (whether it were that loue meant to match them euerie way, or that her friends example had holpen her inuention, or that indeed Zelmane forbare to practiſe her deuiſe till ſhee found her friend had paſſed through his.) The ſame day, I ſay, ſhe reſolued on a way to rid out of the the Lodge her two cumberſome louers, & in the night to carie away Philoclea: whereunto ſhe was aſſured her owne loue no leſſe then her ſiſters, would eaſilie winne her conſent. Hoping that although their abrupt parting had not ſuffered her to demand of Muſidorus which way he meant to direct his iourney) yet either they ſhold by ſome good fortune, find him: or if that courſe fayled, yet they might well recouer ſome towne of the Helots, neare the frontiers of Arcadia, who being newlie againe vp in armes armes againſt the Nobilitie, ſhe knew would be as glad of her preſence, as ſhe of their protection. Therefore hauing taken order for all things requiſite for their going, & firſt put on a ſleight vnder-ſute of mans apparell, which before for ſuch purpoſes ſhe had prouided, ſhe curiouſly trimmed her ſelfe to the beautifying of her beauties, that being now at her laſt triall, ſhe might come vnto it in her braueſt armour. And ſo putting on that kinde of milde countenance, which doth encourage the looker on to hope for a gentle anſwer, according to her late receiued maner, ſhe left the pleaſant darkneſſe of her melancholie caue, to go take her dinner of the king and Queene, and giue vnto them both a pleaſant food of ſeeing the owner of their deſires. But euen as the Perſians were anciently wont to leaue no riſing Sun vnſaluted, but as his faire beames appeared clearer vnto them, would they more hartelie reioyce, laying vpon them a great foretoken of their following fortune: So was there no time that Zelmane encountred their eyes with her beloued preſence, but that it bred a kind of burning deuotion in them, yet ſo much the more gladding their greedy ſoules, as her countenance were cleared with more fauour vnto them, which now being determinately framed to the greateſt deſcent of kindneſſe, it took ſuch hold of her infortunate louers, that like children about a tender father, from a long voyage returned, with louelie childiſhneſſe hang about him, and yet with ſimple feare meaſure by his countenance, how farre he accepts their boldneſſe: ſo were theſe now throwne into ſo ſeruiceable an affection, that the turning of Zelmanes eye was a ſtrong ſterne enough to all their motions, wending no way, but as the inchanting force of it guided them. But hauing made a light repaſt of the pleaſant fruits of that countrie, enterlarding their food with ſuch maner of generall diſcourſes, as louers are wont to couer their paſſions in, when reſpect of a third perſon keepes them from plaine particulars, at the earneſt entreatie of Baſilius, Zelmane, firſt ſaluting the Muſes with a baſe Viall hung hard by her, ſent this ambaſſade in verſified muſike to both her ill-requited louers.

BEautie hath force to catch the humane ſight:
Sight doth bewitch the fancie euill awaked.
Fancie we feele, includes all paſſions might,
Paſſion rebeld, oft reaſons ſtrength hath ſhaked.

No wonder then, though ſight my ſight did taint,
And though thereby my fancie was infected,
Though (yoked ſo) my mind with ſickneſſe faint,
Had reaſons weight for paſſions eaſe reiected.

But now the fit is paſt: and time hath giu'n
Leaſure to weigh what due deſert requireth.
All thoughts ſo ſprung, are from their dwelling driu'n,
And wiſdom to his wonted ſeate aſpireth.
Crying in me: eye-hopes deceitfull proue:
Things rightlie priz'd, loue is the band of loue.

And after her ſong with an affected modeſtie, ſhe threw downe her eye, as if the conſcience of a ſecret graunt her inward mind made, had ſodainly caſt a baſhfull vayle ouer her. Which Baſilius finding, and thinking now was the time to vrge his painfull petition, beſeeching his wife with more carefull eye to accompanie his ſicklie daughter Philoclea, being rid for that time of her, who was content to graunt him any ſcope, that ſhe might after haue the like freedome, with a geſture gouerned by the force of his paſſiõs, making his knees his beſt ſupporters he thus ſaid vnto her.

If either, ſaid he, ó Lady of my life, my deadly pangues could beare delay, or that this were the firſt time the ſame were manifeſted vnto you, I would now but maintaine ſtill the remembrance of my misfortune, without vrging any further reward, then time and pitie might procure for me. But (alas) ſince my martyrdome is no leſſe paineſull, then manifeſt, and that I no more feele the miſerable danger, then you know the aſſured truth thereof: why ſhould my tongue denie his ſeruice to my heart? Why ſhould I feare the breath of my words who dayly feele the flame of your works? Embrace in your ſweet conſideration I beſeech you, the miſerie of my caſe, acknowledge your ſelfe to be the cauſe, and thinke it is reaſon for you to redreſſe the effects. Alas, let not certaine imaginatiue rules, whoſe truth ſtands but vpon opinion, keepe ſo wiſe a mind from gratefulneſſe & mercie, whoſe neuer fayling lawes nature hath plãted in vs. I plainly lay my death vnto you, the death of him that loues you, the death of him whoſe life you may ſaue, ſay your abſolute determination, for hope it ſelf is a paine, while it is ouermaſtered with feare, & if you do reſolue to be cruell, yet is the ſpeedieſt condemnation, as in euils, moſt welcome. Zelmane who had fullie ſet to her ſelfe the traine ſhe ſhould keepe, yet knowing that who ſooneſt means to yeeld doth well to make the braueſt parlie, keeping countenance aloft. Noble Prince (ſaid ſhe) your words are too well couched to come out of a reſtleſſe mind, and thanked be the Gods, your face threatens no daunger of death. Theſe are but thoſe ſwelling ſpeeches, which giue the vttermoſt name to euery trifle, which all were worth nothing, if they were not enamelled with the goodly outſide of loue. Truly loue were verie vnlouely, if it were halfſo deadly, as your louers (ſtill liuing) tearme it: I thinke well it may haue a certaine childiſh vehemẽcie, which for the time to one deſire will engage all the ſoule, ſo long as it laſteth. But with what impatience, you your ſelfe ſhew, who confeſſe the hope of it a paine, & think your own deſire ſo vnworthy, as you wold faine be rid of it, & ſo with ouermuch loue ſue hard for a haſtie refuſall. A refuſall! (cried out Baſilius, amazed with all, but pierced with the laſt.) Now aſſure your ſelfe, whenſoeuer you vſe that word definitiuely, it will be the vndoubted doome of my approching death. And thẽ ſhal your owne experience know in me, how ſoone the ſpirits dried vp with anguiſh, leaue the performance of their miniſterie, whereupon our life dependeth. But alas what a crueltie is this, not only to torment, but to thinke the torment ſleight? The terribleſt tyrants would ſay by no man they killed, he dyed not; nor by no man they puniſhed, that he eſcaped free; for of all other, there is leaſt hope of mercy where there is no acknowledging of the paine: & with like cruelty are my words breathed out from a flamie heart, accounted as meſſengers of a quiet mind. If I ſpeake nothing, I choake my ſelfe, & am in no way of reliefe: if ſimplie, neglected: if confuſedly not vnderſtood: if by the bending together all my inward powers, they bring forth any liuely expreſſing of that they truly feele, that is a token, forſooth, the thoughts are at too much leaſure. Thus is ſilence deſperate, follie puniſhed, and wit ſuſpected. But indeed it is vaine to ſay any more, for words can bind no beliefe. Lady, I ſay, determine of me, I muſt confeſſe I cannot beare this battell in my mind, & therfore let me ſoone know what I may account of my ſelf, for it is a hell of dolours, when the mind ſtill in doubt for want of reſolution, can make no reſiſtance.

Indeed

Indeed (answered Zelmane) if I should graunt to your request, I should shew an example in my selfe that I esteeme the holy band of chastitie to be but an imaginatiue rule, as you termed it: & not the truest obseruance of nature, the most noble commandement that mankind can haue ouer themselues, as indeed both learning teacheth, and inward feeling assureth. But first shal Zelmanes graue become her mariage bed, before my soule shall consent to his owne shame, before I will leaue a marke in my selfe of an vnredeemeable trespasse. And yet must I confesse that if euer my heart were stirred, it hath bene with the manifest and manifold shewes of the miserie you liue in for me. For in trueth so it is, nature giues not to vs her degenerate children, any more generall precept, then one to helpe the other, one to feele a true compassion of the others mishap. But yet if I were neuer so contented to speake with you (for further neuer ô Basilius neuer looke for at my hands) I know not how you can auoid your wiues iealous attendance, but that her suspition shall bring my honour into question. Basilius whose small sailes the least wind did fill, was forthwith as far gone into a large promising himselfe his desire, as before he was striken down with a threatned deniall. And therfore bending his browes as though he were not a man to take the matter as he had done; What (said he) shall my wife become my mistresse? Thinke you not that thus much time hath taught me to rule her? I will mew the Gentlewoman till she haue cast all her feathers, if she rouse her self against me. And with that he walked vp & downe, nodding his head, as though they mistooke him much that thought he was not his wiues maister. But Zelmane now seeing it was time to conclude; Of your wisdome & manhood (said she) I doubt not, but that sufficeth not me, for both they can hardly tame a malicious tongue, & impossibly bar the freedome of thought, which be the things that must be only witnesses of honor, or iudges of dishonor. But that you may see I do not set light your affection, if too night after your wife be assuredly asleep, wherof by your loue I coniure you to haue a most precise care, you will steale handsomly to the caue vnto me, there do I grant you as great proportion as you will take of free cõference with me, euer remembring you seeke no more, for so shall you but deceiue your self, and for euer loose me. Basilius that was old enough to know that womẽ are not wont to appoint secret night meetings for the purchasing of land, holding him selfe alreadie an vndoubted possessor of his desires, kissing her hand, & lifting vp his eyes to heauen, as if the greatnesse of the benefite did go beyond all measure of thanks, said no more, least stirring of more words, might bring forth some perhaps contrarie matter. In which trance of ioy, Zelmane went frõ him, saying she would leaue him to the remembrance of their appointment, & for her she would go visite the Lady Philoclea, into whose chamber being come, keeping still her late taken on grauity, & asking her how she did, rather in the way of dutiful honor, then any speciall affectiõ, with extreame inward anguish to thẽ both, she turned frõ her, & taking the Queene Gynecia, led her into a bay window of the same chamber, determining in her selfe, not to vtter to so excellent a wit as Gynecia had, the vttermost point of her pretẽded deuise, but to keepe the clause of it for the last instant, whẽ the shortnesse of the time should not giue her spirits leasure to looke into all those doubts, that easily enter to an open inuention. But with smiling eyes, and with a deliuered ouer grace, fayning as much loue to her, as she did counterfeit litle loue to Philoclea, she began with more credible then eloquent speech to tell her, that with much consideration of a matter so nearely importing her own fancie, and Gynecias honor, she had now concluded that the night following should be the fittest time for the ioyning together ther their ſeuerall deſires, what time ſleepe ſhould perfectly do his office vpon the King her husband, and that the one ſhould come to the other into the caue. Which place, as it was the firſt receit of their promiſed loue, ſo it might haue the firſt honour of the due performance. That the cauſe why thoſe few dayes paſt, ſhe had not ſought the like, was, leaſt the new change of her lodging, might make the Duke more apt to marke any ſodaine euent: which now the vſe of it would take out of his mind. And therefore now moſt excellent Lady (ſaid ſhe) there reſteth nothing but that quicklie after ſupper, you traine vp the king to viſite his daughter Philoclea, & then fayning your ſelfe not well at eaſe, by your going to bed, draw him not long to be after you. In the meane time I will be gone home to my lodging, where I will attend you, with no leſſe deuotion, but as I hope with better fortune, then Thisbe did the too much louing and too much loued Pyramus. The bloud that quickely came into Gynecias faire face, was the only anſwer ſhe made, but that one might eaſily ſee, contentment and conſent were both to the full in her; which ſhe did teſtifie with the wringing Zelmane faſt by the hand, cloſing her eyes, and letting her head fall, as if ſhe would giue her to know, ſhe was not ignorant of her fault, although ſhe were tranſported with the violence of her euil. But in this triple agreement did the day ſeeme tedious of all ſides, till his neuer erring courſe, had giuen place to the nights ſucceſſion: And the ſupper by each hand haſted, was with no leſſe ſpeed ended, when Gynecia preſenting a heauie ſleepineſſe in her countenance, brought vp both Baſilius and Zelmane to ſee Philoclea, ſtill keeping her bed, and farre more ſicke in mind then bodie, and more grieued then comforted with any ſuch viſitation. Thence Zelmane wiſhing eaſefull reſt to Philoclea, did ſeeme to take that nights leaue of this princelie crue, when Gynecia likewiſe ſeeming ſomewhat diſeaſed, deſired Baſilius to ſtay a while with his daughter, while ſhe recommended her ſickneſſe to her beds comfort, indeed deſirous to determine againe of the manner of her ſtealing away; to no leſſe comfort to Baſilius, who the ſooner ſhe was aſleepe, the ſooner hoped to come by his long purſued praye. Thus both were bent to deceiue each other, and to take the aduantage of either others diſaduantage. But Gynecia hauing taken Zelmane into her bed-chamber, to ſpeake a litle with her of their ſweet determination: Zelmane vpon a ſodaine (as though ſhe had neuer thought of it before.) Now the Gods forbid (ſaid ſhe) ſo great a Ladie as you are ſhould come to me: or that I ſhould leaue it to the hands of fortune, if by either the ill gouerning of your paſſion, or your husbands ſodaine waking, any daunger might happen vnto you. No if there be any ſuperioritie in the points of true loue, it ſhall be yours: if there be anie daunger, ſince my ſelfe am the authour of this deuiſe, it is reaſon it ſhould be mine. Therefore do you but leaue with me the keyes of the gate, and vpon your ſelfe take my vpper garment, that if any of Dametas houſe ſee you, they may thinke you to be my ſelf, and I will preſently lie downe in your place, ſo muffled for your ſuppoſed ſickneſſe, as the King ſhall nothing know me. And then as ſoone as he is aſleepe, will I (as it much better becomes me) waite vpon you. But if the vttermoſt of miſchiefes ſhould happen, I can aſſure you the kings life ſhall ſooner pay for it, then your honour. And with the ending of her wordes, ſhe threw off her mantell, not giuing Gynecia any ſpace to take the full image of this new chaunge into her fancie. But ſeeing no readie obiection againſt it in her heart, and knowing that there was no time then to ſtand long diſputing; beſides remembring the giuer was to order the maner of his gift, yeelded quicklie to this conceit, indeed not among

among the ſmalleſt cauſes, tickled thereunto by a certaine wanton deſire, that her husbands deceit might be the more notable. In this ſort did Zelmane nimbly diſaraying her ſelfe, poſſeſſe Gynecias place, hiding her head in ſuch a cloſe maner, as grieuous and ouerwatched ſickneſſe is wont to inuite to it ſelfe the ſolace of ſleepe. And of the other ſide the Queene putting on Zelmanes outmoſt apparell, went firſt into her cloſet, there quicklie to beautifie her ſelfe with the beſt and ſweeteſt night deckings. But there caſting an haſty eye ouer her precious things, which euer ſince Zelmanes comming, her head otherwiſe occupied had left vnſeene, ſhe hapned to ſee a bottle of gold, vpon which downe along were graued theſe verſes:

Let him drinke this, whom long in armes to fold
Thou doeſt deſire, and with free power to hold.

She remembred the bottle, for it had bene kept of long time by the kings of Cyprus, as a thing of rare vertue, and giuen to her by her mother, when ſhe being verie young maried to her husband of much greater age, her mother perſwaded it was of propertie to force loue with loue effects, had made a precious preſent of it to this her beloued child, though it had bene receiued rather by tradition to haue ſuch a qualitie, then by any approued experiment. This Gynecia (according to the common diſpoſition, not only (though eſpecially) of wiues, but of all other kinds of people, not to eſteeme much ones owne, but to thinke the labour loſt, employed about it) had neuer cared to giue to her husband, but ſuffered his affection to run according to his owne ſcope. But now that loue of her particular choiſe had awaked her ſpirits, and perchaunce the verie vnlawfulneſſe of it had a litle blowne the coale; among her other ornaments with glad mind ſhe tooke moſt part of this liquor, putting it into a faire cup, all ſet with diamonds: for what dares not loue vndertake, armed with the night, and prouoked with luſt? And thus downe ſhe went to the Caue-ward, guided onely by the Moones faire ſhining, ſuffering no other thought to haue any familiarity with her braines, but that which did preſent vnto her a picture of her aproching cõtentmẽt. She that had long diſdained this ſolitary life her husband had entred into, now wiſhed it much more ſolitarie, ſo ſhe might only obtaine the priuate preſence of Zelmane. She that before wold not haue gone ſo farre, eſpeciallie by night, and to ſo darke a place, now tooke a pride in the ſame courage, and framed in her mind a pleaſure out of the paine it ſelfe. Thus with thicke doubled paces ſhe went to the Caue, receiuing to her ſelf, for her firſt contentment, the only lying where Zelmane had done; whoſe pillow ſhe kiſt a thouſand times, for hauing born the print of that beloued head. And ſo keeping with panting heart her trauelling fancies ſo attentiue, that the wind could ſtirre nothing, but that ſhe ſtirred her ſelfe, as if it had bene the pace of the longed for Zelmane, ſhee kept her ſide of the bed; defending onely and cheriſhing the other ſide with her arme, till after a while waiting, counting with her ſelfe how many ſteppes were betwixt the Lodge and the Caue, and oft accuſing Zelmane of more curious ſtay then needed, ſhe was viſited with an vnexpected gueſt.

For Baſilius, after his wife was departed to her fained repoſe, as long as hee remayned with his daughter, to giue his wife time of vnreadying her ſelfe, it was eaſily ſeene it was a verie thorny abode he made there: and the diſcourſes with which he entertained his daughter, not vnlike to thoſe of earneſt players, when, in the middeſt of their game, trifling queſtions be put vnto them, his eyes ſtill looking about, and himselfe still changing places, begin to speake of a thing, and breake it off before it were halfe done. To any speech Philoclea ministred vnto him, with a sodaine starting and casting vp his head, make an answer farre out of all Grammer: a certaine deepe musing, and by and by out of it: vncertaine motions, vnstayed graces. Hauing borne out the limit of a reasonable time with as much paine as might be, he came darkeling into his chamber, forcing himselfe to tread as softly as hee could. But the more curious he was, the more he thought euery thing creaked vnder him: and his mind being out of the way, with another thought, and his eyes not seruing his turne in that darke place, each Coffer or Cupbord he met, one saluted his shinnes, another his elbowes: sometimes readie in reuenge to strike them againe with his face. Till at length, fearing his wife were not fullie asleepe, he came lifting vp the cloathes as gently as (I thinke) poore Pan did, when, in steed of Ioles bed he came into the rough embracings of Hercules; and laying himselfe downe, as tenderly as a new Bride, rested awhile with a verie open eare, to marke each breath of his supposed wife. And sometimes he himselfe would yeeld a long fetched sigh, as though that had bene a musike to drawe on another to sleep, till within a verie litle while, with the other parties well counterfeit sleepe (who was as willing to be rid of him, as he was to be gone thence (assuring himselfe hee left all safe there, in the same order stale out againe, and putting on his night gowne, with much groping and scrambling, he gat himselfe out of the litle house, and then did the Moone-light serue to guide his feet. Thus with a great deale of paine, did Basilius go to her whom he fled, and with much cunning left the person for whom he had employed all his cunning. But when Basilius was once gotten (as he thought) int a cleare coast, what ioy he then made, how each thing seemed vile in his sight, in comparison of his fortune, how farre already he deemed himselfe in the chiefe tower of his desires, it were tedious to tell: once his heart could not choose but yeeld this song, as a fairing of his contentment.

GEt hence foule Griefe, the canker of the mind:
Farewell Complaint, the misers only pleasure,
Away vaine Cares, by which few men do find
Their sought-for treasure.

Ye helpless Sighes, blow out your breath to nought,
Teares, drowne your selues, for woe (your cause) is wasted,
Thought, thinke to end, too long the fruit of thought
My mind hath tasted.

But thou, sure Hope, tickle my leaping heart.
Comfort, step thou in place of wonted sadnesse:
Fore-felt Desire, begin to sauour parts
Of comming gladnesse.

Let voyce of Sighes into cleare musike run,
Eyes, let your Teares with gazing now be mended,
In steed of Thought, true pleasure be begun,
And neuer ended.

Thus

Thus imagining as then with him selfe, his ioyes so held him vp, that he neuer touched ground. And like a right old beaten souldiour, that knewe well enough the greatest Captaynes do neuer vse long Orations, when it comes to the very point of execution, as soone as he was gotten into the Caue, and to the ioyfull (though silent) expectation of Gynecia, come close to the bed, neuer recking his promise to looke for nothing but conference, he lept into that side reserued for a more welcome guest. And laying his louingst hold vpon Gynecia: O Zelmane, said he, embrace in your fauor this humble seruant of yours: hold within me my heart, which pants to leaue his maister to come vnto you. In what case poore Gynecia was, when she knew the voice, and felt the bodie of her husband, faire ladies, it is better to knowe by imagination then experience. For streight was her minde assaulted, partly with the being depriued of her vnquenched desire, but principallie with the doubt that Zelmane had betrayed her to her husband, besides the renewed sting of iealosie, what in the meane time might befal her daughter. But of the other side, her loue with a fixed perswasion she had, taught her to seeke all reason of hopes. And therein thought best before discouering of her selfe, to marke the behauiour of her husband; who, both in deedes and wordes stil vsing her, as taking her to be Zelmane, made Gynecia hope that this might be Basilius owne enterprise, which Zelmane had not stayed, least she should discouer the matter which might be performed at another time. Which hope accompanyed with Basilius maner of dealing, (he being at that time fuller of liuelier fancies, then many years before he had bene) besides the remembrance of her daughters sickenesse, and late strange countenance betwixt her and Zelmane, all comming together into her mind, which was loath to condemne it self of an vtter ouerthrow, made her frame her selfe, not truly with a sugred ioy, but with a determinate patience to let her husband thinke he had found a verie gentle and supple-minded Zelmane; which he good man making full reckening of, did melt in as much gladnesse as shee was oppressed with diuers vngratefull burthens.

But Pyrocles who had at this present no more to play the part of Zelmane, hauing so naturally measured the maner of his breathing, that Basilius made no doubt of his sound sleeping, and laine a preatie while with a quiet vnquietnesse to performe his entended enterprise, as soone as by the debate betwixt Basilius shinnes and the vnregarding formes, he perceiued that he had fully left the Lodge: after him went he with stealing steps, hauing his sword vnder his arme (still doubting lest some mischaunce might turne Basilius backe againe) downe to the gate of the Lodge. Which not content to locke fast, he barred and fortified with as many deuises, as his wit and haste would suffer him, that so he might haue full time both for making readie Philoclea, and conueying her to her horse, before any might come in to finde them missing. For further ends of those ends, and what might ensue of this action, his loue and courage well matched neuer looked after, holding for an assured ground, that whosoeuer in great things will thinke to preuent all obiections, must lye still, and do nothing. This determination thus wayed, the first part thus perfourmed, vp to Philocleas chamber dore went Pyrocles, rapt from himselfe with the excessiue fore-feeling of his (as he assured himselfe) neere comming contentment. What euer paines he had taken, what daungers he had runne into, and especially those sawcie pages of loue, doubts, griefes, languishing hopes, and threatning despaires, came all now to his minde, in one ranke to beautifie his expected blisfulnesse, and to serue for a most fit sawce, whose soureneſſe might giue a kinde of life to the delightfull cheare his imagination fed vpon. All the great eſtate of his father, all his owne glorie, ſeemed vnto him but a trifling pompe, whoſe good ſtands in other mens conceit, in cõpariſon of the true comfort he found in the depth of his mind, and the knowledge of any miſerie that might enſue this ioyous aduenture, was recked of but as a ſlight purchaſe of poſſeſſing the top of happineſſe: for ſo farre were his thoughts paſt through al perils, that already he conceiued himſelfe ſafely arriued with his Lady at the ſtately pallace of Pella, among the exceeding ioyes of his father, & infinite congratulations of his friends, giuing order for the royall entertayning of Philoclea, and for ſumptuous ſhewes & triumphes againſt their mariage. In the thought wherof as he found extremitie of ioy, ſo well found he that extremitie is not without a certaine ioyfull paine, by extending the heart beyond his wonted limits, and by ſo forcible a holding all the ſenſes to one obiect, that it confounds their mutuall working, not without a charming kind of rauiſhing them, from the free vſe of their owne function. Thus grieued onely with too much gladneſſe, being come to the doore, which ſhould be the entrie to his happineſſe, he was met with the latter end of a ſong, which Philoclea like a ſolitarie Nightingale, bewailing her guiltleſſe puniſhment, & helpleſſe miſfortune, had newly deliuered ouer, meaning none ſhould be iudge of her paſſion, but her owne conſcience. The ſong hauing bene accorded to a ſweetly playd on Lute, contained theſe verſes, which ſhe had lately with ſome art curiouſly written, to enwrap her ſecret and reſolute woes.

VErtue, beautie, and ſpeach, did ſtrike, wound, charme,
My hart, eyes, eares, with wonder, loue, delight:
Firſt, ſecond, laſt, did binde, enforce, and arme,
His workes, showes, ſuites, with wit, grace, and vow's might.

Thus honor, liking, truſt, much, farre, and deepe,
Held, pearſt, poſſeſt, my iudgment, ſenſe, and will,
Till wrong, contempt, deceipt, did growe, ſteale, creepe,
Bandes, fauour, faith, to breake, defile; and kill.

Then griefe, vnkindneſſe, proofe, tooke, kindled, tought,
Well grounded, noble, due, ſpite, rage, diſdaine,
But ah, alas! (In vayne) my mind, ſight, thought,
Doth him, his face, his words, leaue, shunne, refraine,
For no thing, time, nor place, can looſe, quench, eaſe,
Mine owne, embraced, ſought, knot, fire, diſeaſe.

The force of loue to thoſe poore folke that feele it, is many wayes verie ſtrange, but no way ſtranger, then that it doth ſo enchaine the louers iudgement vpon her that holdes the raines of his mind, that whatſoeuer ſhe doth is euer in his eyes beſt.

And

And that beſt, being by the continuall motion of our changing life, turned by her to any other thing, that thing againe becommeth beſt. So that nature in each kinde ſuffring but one ſuperlatiue, the louer only admits no poſitiue. If ſhe ſit ſtill, that is beſt, for ſo is the conſpiracie of her ſeuerall graces held beſt together to make one perfect figure of beauty. If ſhe walke, no doubt that is beſt, for beſides the making happie the more places by her ſteps, the very ſturring addes a pleſing life to her natiue perfectiõs. If ſhe be ſilent, that without compariſon is beſt, ſince by that means the vntroubled eye, moſt freely may deuour the ſweetneſſe of his obiect. But if ſhe ſpeake, he will take it vpon his death that is beſt, the quinteſſence of each word, being diſtilled downe into his affected ſoule: Example of this was well to be ſeene in the giuen-ouer Pyrocles, who with panting breath, and ſomtime ſighes, not ſuch as ſorrowe reſtrayning the inward parts doth make them glad to deliuer, but ſuch as the impacience of delay, with the vnſuretie of neuer ſo ſure hope, is wont to breath out nowe being at the doore, of the one ſide, hearing her voice, which he thought if the Philoſophers ſaid true of the heauenly ſeuen ſphered harmony, was by her not only repreſented, but farre ſurmounted, and of the other hauing his eyes ouerfilled with her beautie, (for the king at his parting had left the chamber open, and ſhe at that time lay, as the heate of that countrie did well ſuffer, vpon the top of her bed, hauing her beauties eclipſed with nothing but with a faire ſmocke, wrought all in flames of aſh-colour ſilke & gold, lying ſo vpon her right ſide, that the left thigh downe to the foot, yeelded his delightfull proportion to the full view, which was ſeene by the help of a rich lampe, which thorow the curtaines a litle drawne caſt forth a light vpon her, as the Moone doth when it ſhines into a thinne wood;) Pyrocles I ſay was ſtopped with the violence of ſo many darts, caſt by Cupid altogether vpon him, that quite forgetting him ſelfe, and thinking therein alreadie he was in the beſt degree of felicitie, he would haue loſt much of his time, and with too much loue omitted the enterpriſe vndertaken for his loue, had not Philocleas pitifull accuſing of him forced him to bring his ſpirits againe, to a new bias, for ſhe laying her hand vnder her faire cheek, vpon which there did priuily tickle the ſweet drops of her delightfull though ſorrowfull teares, made theſe words waite vpon her moanefull ſong. And hath that cruell Pyrocles ſaid ſhe, deſerued thus much of me, that I ſhould for his ſake lift vp my voice in my beſt tunes, and to him continually, with powring out my plaint, make a diſdained oblation? Shall my ſoule ſtill do this honour to his vnmercifull tyrannie, by my lamenting his loſſe, to ſhew his worthineſſe and my weakneſſe? He heares thee not ſimple Philoclea, he heares thee not; and if he did, ſome harts grow the harder, the more they find their aduantage. Alas what a miſerable conſtitution of minde haue I! I diſdaine my fortune, & yet reuerence him that diſdaines me. I accuſe his vngratefulneſſe, and haue his vertue in admiration. O yee deafe heauens, I would either his iniurie could blot out mine affection, or my affection could forget his iniury. With that giuing a pitifull but ſweet ſhriche, ſhee tooke againe the lute, and began to ſing this Sonnet, which might ſerue as an explaning to the other:

THe loue which is imprinted in my ſoule
With beauties ſeale, and vertue faire diſguiſ'de,
With inward cries puts vp a bitter role
Of huge complaints, that now it is deſpiſ'de.

Thus thus the more I loue, the wrong the more
Monſtrous appeares: long trueth receiued late,
VVrong ſturres remorſed griefe, griefs deadly ſore
Vnkindneſſe breedes, vnkindneſſe foſtreth hath.

But ah the more I hate, the more I thinke
VVhome I doe hate, the more I thinke on him,
The more his matchleſſe giftes do deepely ſinck
In to my breſt, and loues renewed ſwimme,
VVhat medcine then, can ſuch diſeaſe remoue,
VVhere loue drawes hate, and hate engendreth loue?

But Pyrocles that had heard his name accuſed, & cõdemned by the mouth, which of all the world, and more then all the world, he moſt loued: had then cauſe enough to call his minde to his home, & with the moſt haſte he could (for true loue feares the accident of an inſtant) to match the excuſing of his fault, with declaration of his arrand thither. And therefore blowne vp & downe with as many contrary paſſions, as Æolus ſent out windes vpon the Troian reliques, guided vpõ the ſea by the valiant Æneas, he went into her chamber with ſuch a pace as reuerent feare doth teach, where kneeling downe, & hauing prepared a long diſcourſe for her, his eyes were ſo filled with her ſight, that as if they would haue robbed all their fellowes of their ſeruices, both his hart fainted, and his toung fayled in ſuch ſort, that he could not bring forth one word, but referred her vnderſtanding to his eyes language. But ſhe in extremitie amazed to ſee him there, at ſo vndue a ſeaſon, & aſhamed that her beautifull body made ſo naked a proſpect, drawing in her delicate limmes into the weake guard of the bed, and preſenting in her face to him ſuch a kinde of pittifull anger, as might ſhew, this was only a fault, therfore becauſe ſhe had a former grudge vnto him, turning away her face frõ him ſhe thus ſaid vnto him: O Zelmane or Pyrocles, (for whether name I vſe it much skils not, ſince by the one I was firſt deceiued & by the other now betrayed) what ſtrange motion is the guide of thy cruel minde hither? Doſt thou not thinke the day torments thou haſt giuen me ſufficient, but that thou doeſt enuie me the nights quiet? Wilt thou giue my ſorrowes no truce, but by making me ſee before mine eyes how much I haue loſt, offer me due cauſe of confirming my plaint? Or is thy hart ſo full of rancour, that thou doſt deſire to feed thine eyes with the wretched ſpectacle of thine ouerthrowne enemie, & ſo to ſatiſfie the full meaſure of thy vndeſerued rage, with the receiuing into thy ſight the vnreleuable ruines of my deſolate life? O Pyrocles, Pyrocles for thine own vertues ſake, let miſeries be no muſique vnto thee, & be content to take to thy ſelfe ſome colour of excuſe, that thou didſt not know to what extremitie thy inconſtancie, or rather falſhood hath brought me. Pyrocles to whom euery ſillable ſhe pronounced, was a thunderbolt to his hart, equally diſtraught betwixt amaſement & ſorow, abaſhed to ſee ſuch a ſtop of his deſires, grieued with her paine, but tormented to find himſelfe the author of it, with quaking lips, & pale cheere, alas diuine Lady ſaid he, your diſpleaſure is ſo contrary to my deſert, & your words ſo farre beyond all expectatiõs, that I haue leaſt abilitie now I haue moſt need, to ſpeake in the cauſe vpõ which my life dependeth. For my troth is ſo vndoubtedly conſtant vnto you, my hart is ſo aſſured a witneſſe to it ſelfe, of his vnſpotted faith, that hauing no one thing in me, whereout any ſuch ſacriledge might ariſe, I haue likewiſe nothing in ſo direct a thing thing to say for my selfe, but sincere & vehement protestations, for in truth, there may most words be spent, where there is some probabilitie, to breed of both sides cõiectural allegatiõs. But so perfect a thing as my loue is of you, as it suffers no questiõ, so it seemes to receiue iniury by additiõ of any words vnto it. If my soule could haue bene polluted with trechery, it would likewise haue prouided for it selfe, due furniture of colourable answers, but as it should vpõ the naked conscience of his vntouched duty, so I must confesse it is altogether vnarmed against so vniust a violẽce as you lay vpon me: alas! let not the paines I haue taken to serue you, be now accoũted iniurious vnto you, let not the dangerous cunning I haue vsed to please you be deemed a treason against you, since I haue deceiued them whom you feare for your sake, do not you destroy me for their sake; what can I without you further do? Or to what more forwardnesse can any counsel bring our desired happinesse? I haue prouided whatsoeuer is needful for our going. I haue rid them both out of the lodge, so that there is none here to be hinderers or knowers of our departure, but onely the almightie powers, whom I inuoke as triers of mine innocencie, & witnesses of my wel meaning. And if euer my thoughts did receiue so much as a fainting in their affections: if they haue not continually with more & more ardour, frõ time to time pursued the possession of your sweetest fauour; if euer in that possession they receiued either spot, or falshood: then let their most horrible plagues fall vpon me, let mine eyes be depriued of the light which did abase the heauenly beames that strake thẽ, let my falsified toung serue to no vse but to bemone mine own wretchednes, let my hart impoisoned with detestable treason, be the seate of infernall sorrow, let my soule with the endlesse anguish of his conscience become his owne tormentor. O false mankind cried out the sweet Philoclea. How can an impostumed hart but yeld forth euil matter by his mouth? Are oathes there to be beleeued, where vowes are brokẽ? No no, who doth wound the eternal iustice of the Gods, cares little for abusing their names: & who in doing wickedly doth not feare due recõpẽcing plagues doth little feare that inuoking of plagues, wil make them come euer a whit the sooner. But alas what aileth this new conuersatiõ, haue you yet another sleight to play, or do you think to deceiue me in Pyrocles forme, as you haue done in Zelmanes? Or rather now you haue betrayed me in both, is some third sex left you, into which you can transforme your self to inueigle my simplicitie? Enioy, enioy the conquest you haue already wonne: & assure your selfe you are come to the farthest point of your cunning. For my part vnkind Pyrocles, my onely defence shalbe beleefe of nothing, my comfort my faithfull innocencie, & thẽ punishment I desire of you shalbe your own conscience. Philocleas hard perseuering in this vniust condẽnation of him, did so ouerthrowe all the might of Pyrocles minde (who saw that time would not serue to proue by deeds, & that the better words he vsed, the more they were suspected of deceitfull cunning.) That voide of all counsell, and depriued of all comfort, finding best deserts punished, and neareſt hopes preuented, he did abandon the succour of himselfe, and suffered griefe so to close his hart, that his breath fayling him with a deathfull shutting of his eyes, he fell downe at her bedside, hauing had time to say no more, but oh whom doest thou kill Philoclea? She that litle looked for such an extreame euent of her doings, start out of her bed, like Venus rising from her mother the sea, not so much stricken downe with amazement, and griefe of her fault, as lifted vp with the force of loue and desire to helpe, she laide her faire body ouer his breast, & throwing no other water in his face, but the streame of her teares, nor giuing him other blowes but the kissing of her welformed mouth, her onely cries were theſe lamentations: O vnfortunate ſuſpicion, ſaid ſhe, the verie meane to looſe that we moſt ſuſpect to looſe. O vnkind kindneſſe of mine, which returnes an imagined wrong with an effectuall iniury. O foole to make quarell my ſupplicatiō, or to vſe hate as the mediator of loue, childiſh Philoclea, haſt thou thrown away the Iewell wherein all thy pride conſiſted? Haſt thou with too much haſt ouerrun thy ſelfe? Then would ſhe renew her kiſſes: And yet not finding the life returne, redouble her plaints in this manner: O diuine ſoule, ſaid ſhe, whoſe vertue can poſſeſſe no leſſe then the higheſt place in heauen, if for mine eternall plague, thou haſt vtterly left this moſt ſweet manſion, before I follow thee with Thisbes puniſhment for my raſh vnwarineſſe, heare this proteſtation of mine: That as the wrong I haue done thee proceeded of a moſt ſincere, but vnreſiſtable affection: ſo led with this pitifull example, it ſhall end in the mortall hate of my ſelfe, and (if it may be) I will make my ſoule a tombe of thy memorie. At that word with anguiſh of minde and weakneſſe of bodie encreaſed one by the other, & both augmented by this fearefull accident, ſhe had falne downe in a ſound, but that Pyrocles then firſt ſeuering his eye liddes, and quickly apprehending her danger, to him more then death, beyond all powers ſtriuing to recouer the commandement of all his powers, ſtayed her frō falling: and then lifting the ſweet burthen of her body in his armes, laid her againe in her bed. So that ſhe, but then the Phyſition, was now become the patient: and he, to whom her weakneſſe had bene ſeruiceable, was now enforced to do ſeruice to her weakneſſe, which performed by him with that hartie care, which the moſt carefull loue on the beſt loued ſubiect in greateſt extremitie could employ, preuailed ſo farre, that ere long ſhe was able (though in ſtrength exceedingly deiected) to cal home her wandering ſenſes, to yeeld attention to that her beloued Pyrocles had to deliuer. But he lying downe on the bed by her, holding her hand in his, with ſo kind an accuſing her of vnkindneſſe, as in accuſing her he condemned himſelf, began frō point to point to diſcouer vnto her all that had paſſed betweene his loathed louers & him. How he had entertained, & by entertaining deceiued, both Baſilius & Gynecia: & that with ſuch a kind of deceipt, as either might ſee the cauſe in the other, but neither eſpie the effect in themſelues. That all his fauors to them had tended onely to make them ſtrangers to this his actiō: & al his ſtrangeneſſe to her to the final obtaining of her long promiſed, & now to be performed fauor. Which deuiſe ſeeing it had ſo well ſucceeded to the remouing all other hinderances, that onely her reſolution remained for the taking their happie iourny, he coniured her by all the loue ſhe had euer borne him, ſhe would make no longer delay to partake with him what ſoeuer honors the noble kingdom of Macedon, & al other Euarchus dominiōs might yeeld him, ſpecially ſince in this enterpriſe he had now waded ſo far, as he could not poſſibly retire himſelf back, without being ouerwhelmed with danger & diſhonor. He needed not haue vſed further perſwaſiō: for that only coniuratiō had ſo forcibly bound al her ſpirits, that could her body haue ſeconded her mind, or her mind haue ſtrēgthened her body, without reſpect of any worldly thing, but only feare to be againe vnkind to Pyrocles, ſhe had cōdiſcended to go with him. But raiſing her ſelfe a litle in her bed, & finding her own vnabilitie in any ſort to endure the aire: My Pyrocles ſaid ſhe (with teareful eyes & a pitiful coūtenāce, ſuch as wel witneſſed ſhe had no will to deny any thing ſhe had power to performe) if you can conuey me hence in ſuch plight as you ſee me; I am moſt willing to make my extreameſt danger a teſtimonie, that I eſteeme no danger in regard of your vertuous ſatisfaction. But ſhe fainted ſo faſt, that ſhe was not able to vtter the reſt of her conceiued ſpeech: which

alſo

alſo turned Pyrocles thoughts from expecting further anſwere, to the neceſſary care of reuiuing her, in whoſe fainting himſelf was more then ouerthrown. And that hauing effected with all the ſweet meanes his wits could deuiſe, though his higheſt hopes were by this vnexpected downfall ſunke deeper then any degree of diſpaire: yet leſt the appearance of his inward griefe might occaſion her further diſcomfort, hauing racked his face to a more comfortable ſemblance, he ſought ſome ſhewe of reaſon, to ſhew ſhe had no reaſon, either for him, or for her ſelfe ſo to be afflicted. Which in the ſweete minded Philoclea, whoſe conſideration was limited by his words, & whoſe conceit pierced no deeper then his outward countenance, wrought within awhile ſuch quietneſſe of mind, & that quietneſſe againe ſuch repoſe of bodie, that ſleep by his harbingers weakneſſe, wearineſſe, & watchfulneſſe, had quickly take vp his lodging in al her ſenſes. Then indeed had Pyrocles leaſure to ſit in iudgement on himſelfe, and to heare his reaſon accuſe his raſhneſſe, who, without forecaſt of doubt, without knowledge of his friend, without acquainting Philoclea with his purpoſe, or being made acquainted with her preſent eſtate, had falne headlong into that attempt, the ſucceſſe whereof he had long ſince ſet downe to himſelfe as the meaſure of all his other fortunes. But calling to minde how weakely they do that rather finde fault with what cannot be amended, then ſeeke to amend wherein they haue bene faultie: he ſoone turned him from remembring what might haue bene done, to conſidering what was now to be done, & when that conſideration failed what was now to be expected. Wherin hauing runne ouer all the thoughts, his reaſon called to the ſtricteſt accounts, could bring before him, at length he lighted on this: That as lõg as Gynecia bewraied not the matter (which he thought ſhe wold not doe, aſwell for her owne honour and ſafetie, as for the hope ſhe might ſtill haue of him, which is loth to die in a louers heart) all the reſt might turne to a pretie meryment, and enflame his louer Baſilius, againe to caſt about for the miſſed fauour. And as naturally the heart ſtuffed vp with wofulneſſe, is glad greedilie to ſucke the thinneſt aire of comfort: ſo did he at firſt, embrace this conceit as offering great hope, if not aſſurance of well doing, till looking more nearely into it, and not able to anſwer the doubts and difficulties he ſaw therin more and more ariſing, the night being alſo far ſpent, his thoughts euen wearie of his owne burthens, fell to a ſtraying kind of vncertaintie: and his mind ſtanding only vpon the nature of inward intelligences, left his body to giue a ſleeping reſpite to his vitall ſpirits, which he, according to the qualitie of ſorow, receiued with greater greedineſſe then euer in his life before: according to the nature of ſorow, I ſay, which is paſt cares remedie. For care ſtirring the braines, and making thin the ſpirits, breaketh reſt: but thoſe griefs wherein one is determined there is no preuenting, do breed a dul heauineſſe which eaſily clothes it ſelfe in ſleepe. So as laid downe ſo neare the beautie of the world Philoclea, that their necks were ſubiect each to others chaſte embracements, it ſeemed loue had come thither to lay a plot in that picture of death how gladly, if death came, their ſoules would go together.

The third Eclogues.

Hyrſis not with many painted words nor falſified promiſes, had won the conſent of his beloued Kala, but with a true and ſimple making her know he loued her not, forcing himſelfe beyond his reach to buy her affection, but giuing her ſuch pretie preſents, as neither could wearie him with the giuing, nor ſhame her for the taking. Thus the firſt Strawberies he could find, were euer in a cleane waſht diſh ſent to Kala, thus poeſies of the ſpring flowers were wrapt vp in a litle greene ſilk and dedicated to Kalas breaſts, thus ſomtimes his ſweeteſt Creame, ſomtimes the beſt Cakebread his mother made, were reſerued for Kalas taſte. Neither would hee ſtick to kil a lamb when ſhe would be content to come ouer the way vnto him. But then lo, how the houſe was ſwept & rather no fire thē any ſmoke left to trouble her. Then loue ſongs were not daintie, when ſhe would heare them, and as much manerlie ſilence when ſhe would not: in going to Church great worſhip to Kala. So that all the pariſh ſaid, neuer a maide they knew ſo well wayted on: and when dauncing was about the Maypole, no body taken out but ſhe, and he after a leape or two to ſhewe her his owne actiuitie, would frame all the reſt of his dauncing, onely to grace her. As for her fathers ſheepe, he had no leſſe care of them then his owne: ſo that ſhe might play her as ſhe would, warrāted with honeſt Thyrſis carefulneſſe. But if he ſpied Kala fauourd any one of the flocke more then his fellowes, then that was cheriſhed: ſhearing him ſo (when ſhorne he muſt be) as might moſt become him: but while the wooll was on, wrapping within it ſome verſes, wherein Thyrſis had a ſpecial gift, & making the innocent beaſt his vnweeting meſſenger. Thus conſtantly continuing, though he were none of the fayreſt, at length he wanne Kalas heart, the honeſteſt wench in all thoſe quarters. And ſo with conſent of both parents (without which neither Thyrſis would ask, nor Kala grant) their marying day was appointed, which becauſe it fell out in this time, I thinke it ſhall not be impertinent, to remember a little our ſhepheards, while the other greater perſons, are either ſleeping or otherwiſe troubled. Thyrſis mariage time once known, there needed no inuiting of the neighbours in that valley, for ſo well was Thyrſis beloued, that they were all ready to doe him credit, neither yet came they like Harpies to deuoure him: but one brought a fat pigge, the other a tender kidd, the third a great gooſe: as for cheeſe, milke, & butter, were the goſſips preſents. Thither came of ſtrange ſhepheards only the melancholy Philiſides, for the vertuous Coridon had long ſince left off all ioyfull ſolemnities. And as for Strephon and Klaius, they had loſt their miſtreſſe, which put them into ſuch extreme ſorrowes as they could ſcarcely abide the light of the day, much leſſe the eyes of men. But of the Arcadian borne ſhepheards, thither came good old Geron, young Hiſtor, though vnwilling, and vpright Dicus, merie Pas and iolly Nico. As for Dametas they durſt not preſume (his pride was ſuch) to inuite him: and Dorus they found might not be ſpared. And thereunder a bower was made of bowes (for Thyrſis houſe was not able to receiue thē) euery one placed according to his age. The women (for ſuch was the maner of the countrey) kept together to make good cheare among themſelues, from which otherwiſe a certaine painful modeſtie reſtraines them, and there might the ſadder matrons giue good counſell to Kala: who poore ſoule wept for feare of that ſhe deſired. But among the ſhepheards was all honeſt libertie, no feare of dangerous tel-tales, who hunt greater prayes, nor indeede mindes in them to giue tel-tales any occaſion; but one queſtioning with another of the manuring his ground, and gouerning his flock, the higheſt point they reached to was, to talke of the holineſſe of mariage, to which purpoſe aſſoone as their ſober dinner was ended, Dicus in ſteede of thanks, ſang this ſong with a cleare voice and cheerfull countenance.

LEt mother earth now decke her ſelfe in flowers,
To ſee her of-ſpring ſeeke a good increaſe,

where

VVhere iusteſt loue doth vanquish Cupids powers
And ware of thoughts is ſwallow'd vp in peace
VVhich neuer may decreaſe,
But like the turtles faire,
Liue one in two, a well vnited paire,
VVhich that no chance may ſtaine,
O Himen long their coupled ioyes maintaine.

O heau'n awake shew forth thy ſtately face,
Let not theſe ſlumbring clowds thy beauties hide,
But with thy cheereſull preſence helpe to grace
The honeſt Bridegrome, and the bashfull Bride,
VVhoſe loues may euer bide,
Like to the Elme and Vine,
VVith mutuall embracements them to twyne:
In which delightfull paine,
O Himen long their coupled ioyes maintain.

Yee Muſes all which chaſte affects allow,
And haue to Thyrſis shewd your ſecret skill,
To this chaſte loue your ſacred fauours bow,
And ſo to him and her your giftes diſtill,
That they all vice may kill:
And like to lillies pure,
May pleaſe all eyes, and ſpotleſſe may endure.
VVhere that all bliſſe may raigne,
O Himen long their coupled ioyes maintaine.

Yee Nymphes which in the waters empire haue,
Since Thyrſis muſike oft doth yeeld your praiſe,
Graunt to the thing which we for Thyrſis craue.
Let one time (but long firſt) cloſe vp their daies,
One graue their bodies ſeaze:
And like two riuers ſweete,
VVhen they though diuers do together meete:
One ſtreame both ſtreames containe,
O Himen long their coupled ioyes maintaine.

Pan, father Pan, the god of ſilly sheep,
VVhoſe care is cauſe that they in number grow,
Haue much more care of them that them do keep,
Since from theſe good the others good doth flow,
And make their iſſue show
In number like the heard
Of yonglings, which thy ſelfe with loue haſt reard.
Or like the drops of raine.
O Himen long their coupled ioyes maintaine.

Vertue (if not a God) yet Gods chiefe part,
Be thou the knot of this their open vow,
That ſtill he be her head, ſhe be his hart,
He leane to her, ſhe vnto him do bow:
Each other ſtill allow:
Like Oke and Miſtletoe.
Her ſtrength from him, his praiſe from her do growe.
In which moſt louely traine,
O Himen long their coupled ioyes maintaine.

But thou foule Cupid fyre to lawleſſe luſt,
Be thou farre hence with thy empoiſon'd dart,
VVhich though of glittring golde, ſhall heere take ruſt,
VVhere ſimple loue, which chaſtneſſe doth impart,
Auoides thy hurtfull arte.
Not needing charming skill,
Such mindes with ſweet affections for to fill,
VVhich being pure and plaine,
O Himen long their coupled ioyes maintaine.

All churliſh wordes, ſhrewd anſwers, crabbed lookes,
All priuateneſſe, ſelfe-ſeeking, inward ſpite,
All waiwardneſſe, which nothing kindly brookes.
All ſtrife for toyes, and clayming maſters right.
Be hence aye put to flight,
All ſtyrring husbands hate
Gainſt neighbors good for womanish debate
Be fled as things moſt vaine,
O Himen long their coupled ioyes maintaine.

All peacock pride, and fruits of peacocks pride,
Longing to be with loſſe of ſubſtance gay,
VVith retchleſneſſe what may thy houſe betide,
So that you may on hyer ſlippers ſtay,
For euer hence away:
Yet let not ſlutterie,
The ſinke of filth, be counted huſwifery:
But keeping wholeſome meane,
O Himen long their coupled ioyes maintaine.

But aboue all, away vile iealouſie,
The euill of euils iuſt cauſe to be vniuſt,
(How can he loue ſuſpecting treacherie?
How can she loue where loue cannot win truſt?)
Goe ſnake hide thee in duſt,
Ne dare once shew thy face,
VVhere open harts do hold ſo conſtant place,
That they thy ſting reſtraine,

O Himen long their coupled ioyes maintaine.

The earth is deckt with flowers, the heau'ns displaid,
Muses grant gifts, Nymphes long and ioyned life,
Pan store of babes, vertue their thoughts well staid,
Cupids lust gone, and gone is bitter strife,
Happie man, happy wife.
No pride shall them oppresse,
Nor yet shall yeeld to lothsome sluttishnesse,
And iealousie is slaine:
For Himen will their coupled ioyes maintaine.

Truly Dicus, sayd Nico, although thou didst not graunt me the price the last day, when vndoubtedly I wan it, yet must I needs say, thou for thy part hast sung well and thriftilie. Pas straight desired all the companie they would beare witnesse, that Nico had once in his life spoken wisely; for, sayd he, I will tell it his father, who will be a glad man when he heares such newes. Very true, sayd Nico, but indeed so would not thine in like case, for hee would looke thou shouldest liue but one houre longer, that a discreete word wandred out of thy mouth. And I pray thee (sayd Pas) gentle Nico, tell me what mischaunce it was that brought thee to taste so fine a meate? Mary goodman blockehead sayd Nico, because hee speakes against iealousie, the filthie traytor to true affection, and yet disguising it selfe in the rayment of loue. Sentences, Sentences, cried Pas. Alas how ripe witted these young folkes be now adayes! But well counselled shall that husband be, when this man comes to exhort him not to be iealous. And so shall hee, answered Nico, for I haue seene a fresh example, though it be not very fit to be knowne. Come, come, said Pas, bee not so squeamish, I know thou longest more to tell it, then we to heare it. But for all his wordes Nico would not bestowe his voice till he was generally entreated of all the rest. And then with a mery mariage looke he sang this following discourse, for with a better grace he could sing then tell:

A Neighbour mine not long ago there was,
(But nameless he, for blameless he shall be)
That maried had a tricke and bonny lasse
As in a sommer day a man might see:
But he himselfe a foule vnhandsome groome,
And farre vnfit to hold so good a roome.

Now whether mou'd with selfe vnworthinesse,
Or with her beautie fit to make a pray,
Fell iealousie did so his braine oppresse,
That if he absent were but halfe a day,
He gest the worst (you wot what is the worst)
And in himselfe new doubting causes nurst.

VVhile thus he fear'd the silly innocent,
VVho yet was good, because she knew none ill,

Vnto his house a iollie shepheard went,
To whome our prince did beare a great good will,
Because in wrestling and in pastorall
He farre did passe the rest of shepheards all.

And therefore he a courtier was benamed,
And as a courtier was with cheere receiued,
(For they haue tongues to make a poore man blamed,
If he to them his dutie misconceiued)
And for this Courtier should well like his table,
The goodman bad his wife be seruiceable.

And so she was, and all with good intent,
But fewe dayes past while she good maner vsde,
But that her husband thought her seruice bent
To such an end as he might be abusde.
Yet like a coward fearing strangers pride,
He made the simple wench his wrath abide.

VVith chumpish lookes, hard words, and secret nips,
Grumbling at her when she his kindnesse sought,
Asking her how she tasted Courtiers lips,
He forst her thinke that which she neuer thought.
In fine he made her gesse, there was some sweet,
In that which he so fear'd that she should meet.

VVhen once this entred was, in womans hart,
And that it had enflam'd a new desire,
There rested then, to play a womans part,
Fuell to seeke and not to quench the fire:
But (for his iealous eye she well did finde)
She studied cunning how the same to blinde.

And thus she did. One day to him she came,
And (though against his will) on him she leand,
And out gan cry, ah well away for shame,
If you helpe not our wedlocke will be staind,
The goodman starting, askt what did her moue?
She sigh'd and saide, the bad guest sought her loue.

He little looking that she should complaine
Of that, whereto he feard she was enclinde,
Busing her oft, and in his hart full faine,
He did demaund what remedy to finde;
How they might get that gueſt, from them to wend,
And yet the prince (that lou'd him) not offend.

Husband, quoth she, go to him by and by,

And

And tell him you do find I do him loue:
And therefore pray him that of curteſie
He will abſent himſelfe, leaſt he should moue
A young girles heart, to that were shame for both,
VVhereto you know, his honeſt heart were loath.

Thus shall you shew that him you do not doubt,
And as for me (ſweet husband) I muſt beare.
Glad was the man when he had heard her out,
And did the ſame, although vvith mickle feare.
For feare he did, leaſt he the young man might
In choller put, vvith vvhom he vvould not fight.

The Courtlie Shepheard much agaſt at this,
Not ſeeing earſt ſuch token in the vvife,
Though full of ſcorne, vvould not his dutie miſſe,
Knowing that euill becomes a houshold ſtrife,
Did go his vvay, but ſoiourn'd neare thereby,
That yet the ground hereof he might eſpie.

The vvife thus hauing ſetled husbands braine,
VVho vvould haue ſworne his ſpouſe Diana vvas,
VVatched vvhen she a further point might gaine,
VVhich litle time did fitly bring to paſſe.
For to the Court her man was call'd by name.
VVhither he needs muſt go for feare of blame.

Three dayes before that he muſt ſure depart,
She vvritten had (but in a hand diſguiſde)
A letter ſuch, vvhich might from either part
Seeme to proceed, ſo vvell it vvas deuiſde.
She ſeald it firſt, then she the ſealing brake,
And to her iealous husband did it take.

VVith vweeping eyes (her eyes she taught to vweepe)
She tolde him that the Courtier had it ſent:
Alas (quoth she) thus vvomens shame doth creepe.
The goodman read on both ſides the content,
It title had, Vnto my onely Loue:
Subſcription vvas, Yours moſt, if you will proue.

The piſtle ſelfe ſuch kind of vvords it had,
My ſweeteſt ioy, the comfort of my ſprite,
So may thy flockes increaſe thy deare heart glad,
So may each thing, euen as thou wisheſt light,
As thou wilt deigne to reade, and gently reed
This mourning incke, in vvhich my heart doth bleed.

Long haue I lou'd (alas thou worthy art)
Long haue I lou'd, (alas loue craueth loue)
Long haue I lou'd thy ſelfe, alas my heart
Doth breake, now tongue vnto thy name doth moue,
And thinke not that thy anſwer anſwer is,
But that it is my doome of bale or bliſſe.

The iealous wretch muſt now to Court be gone:
Ne can he faile, for Prince hath for him ſent:
Now is the time we may be here alone,
And giue a long deſire a ſweet content.
Thus ſhall you both reward a louer true,
And eke reuenge his vvrong ſuſpecting you.

And this vvas all, and this the husband read
VVith chaſe enough, till she him pacified:
Deſiring, that no griefe in him he bread,
Now that he had her words ſo trulie tried:
But that he vvould, to him the letter show,
That vvith his fault he might her goodneſſe know.

That ſtraight vvas done vvith many a boyſtrous threat,
That to the King he vvould his ſinne declare,
But now the Courtier gan to ſmell the feat,
And vvith ſome vvords vvhich shewed litle care,
He ſtaid vntill the goodman vvas departed,
Then gaue he him the blow vvhich neuer ſmarted.

Thus may you ſee, the iealous wretch was made
The Pandar of the thing he moſt did feare,
Take heede therefore, how you enſue that trade,
Leaſt the ſame markes of iealouſie you beare.
For ſure, no iealouſie can that preuent,
VVhereto two parties once be full content.

Behold, ſaid Pas, a whole dicker of wit: he hath pickt out ſuch a tale with intention to keepe a husband from iealouſie, which were enough to make a ſanctified husband iealous, to ſee ſubtilties ſo much in the feminine gender. But, ſaid he, I will ſtrike Nico dead, with the wiſe words ſhall flow out of my gorge. And without further entreatie thus ſang:

WHo doth deſire that chaſte his wife should be,
Firſt be he true, for truth doth truth deſerue:
Then ſuch be he, as she his worth may ſee,
And one man ſtill credit with her preſerue.

Not toying kinde, nor cauſeleſſie vnkinde,
Not ſtirring thoughts, nor yet denying right,

Not spying faults, nor in plaine errors blind,
Neuer hard hand, nor euer raines too light.

As farre from want, as farre from vaine expence,
(The one doth force, the latter doth entice)
Allow good companie, but keepe from thence
All filthy mouthes that glory in their vice.
This done, thou hast no more, but leaue the rest
To vertue, fortune, time and womans breast.

Well cõcluded, said Nico, whẽ he hath done all, he leaues the matter to his wiues discretion. Now whensouer thou marriest, let her discretion decke thy head with Actæons ornament, Pas was so angrie with his wish, being indeed towards mariage, that they might perchance haue fallen to buffets, but that Dicus desired Philisides (who as a stranger sate among them, reuoluing in his mind all the tempests of euill fortunes he had passed) that he would do so much grace to the company, as to sing one of his countrie songs. Philisides knowing it no good maners to be squeamish of his comming, hauing put himself in their company, without further study began to vtter that, wherewith his thoughts were then (as alwaies) most busied: and to shew what a stranger he was to himselfe, spake of himselfe as of a third person, in this sort:

THe lad Philisides
Lay by a riuers side,
In flowrie field a gladder eye to please:
His pipe was at his foot,
His lambes were him besides,
A widow turtle neare on bared root
Sate wayling without boot.
Each thing both sweet and sad
Did draw his boyling braine
To thinke, and thinke with paine
Of Miras beames eclipst by absence bad.
And thus, vvith eyes made dimme
VVith teares, he said, or sorow said for him:
O earth, once answer giue,
So may thy stately grace
By North, or South still rich adorned liue,
So Mira long may be
On thy then blessed face,
VVhose foot doth set a heau'n on cursed thee,
I aske, now answer me.
If th'author of thy blisse
Phœbus, that shepheard high
Do turne from thee his eye,
Doth not thy selfe, when he long absent is,
Like rogue, all ragged go,
And pine away vvith daylie wasting woe?
Tell me you vvanton brooke,

So may your ſliding race
Shun loathed-louing bankes with cunning crooke?
So in you euer new
Mira may looke her face,
And make you faire vvith shadow of her hue:
So vvhen to pay your due
To mother ſea you come,
She chide you not for ſtay,
Nor beat you for your play,
Tell me if your diuerted ſprings become Abſented quite from you,
Are you not dried? Can you your ſelues renew?
Tell me you flowers faire
Cowſlop and Columbine,
So may your Make this wholſome ſpring time aire
VVith you embraced lie,
And lately thence vntwine:
But with dew drops engender children hie:
So may you neuer aie,
But pull'd by Miras hand,
Dreſſe boſome hers, or head,
Or ſcatter on her bed.
Tell me, if husband ſpring time leaue your land,
VVhen he from you is ſent,
VVither not you, languisht with diſcontent?
Tell me, my ſilly pipe,
So may thee ſtill betide
A cleanly cloth thy moiſtneſſe for to vvipe:
So may the cheries red
Of Miras lips deuide
Their ſugred ſelues to kiſſe thy happie head:
So may her eares be led,
Her eares where Muſike liues,
To heare, and not deſpiſe
Thy liribliring cries,
Tell, if that breath, which thee thy ſounding giues,
Be abſent farre from thee,
Abſent alone canſt thou then piping be?
Tell me my lambe of gold,
So maiſt thou long abide
The day well fed, the night in faithfull folde:
So grow thy vvooll of note,
In time that richlie dy'd
It may be part of Miras peticote,
Tell me, if vvolues the throte
Haue caught of thy deare damme,
Or she from thee be ſtayd,
Or thou from her be ſtrayd,

Canſt

Canst thou, poore lambe, become anothers lamme?
Or rather till thou die
Still for thy Dam with bea-waymenting crie?
Tell me ô Turtle true,
So may no fortune breed
To make thee nor thy better-loued rue:
So may thy blessings swarme
That Mira may thee feede
With hand & mouth; with lap & breast keep warme,
Tell me if greedy arme,
Do fondly take away
With traitour lime the one,
The other left alone:
Tell me poore wretch, parted from wretched pray
Disdaine not you the greene,
Wayling till death shun you not to be seene?
Earth, brooke, flowr's, pipe, lambe, Doue
Say all, & I with them,
Absence is death, or worse, to them that loue.
So I vnlucky lad
Whom hilles from her do hemme,
What fits me now but teares, & sighings sad?
O fortune too too bad,
I rather would my sheepe
Thad'st killed with a stroke,
Burnt Caban lost my cloke,
Then want one hower those eyes which my ioyes keepe.
Oh! what doth wailing winne?
Speech without end were better not beginne.
My song climbe thou the wind,
Which holland sweet now gently sendeth in,
That on his wings the leauell thou maist find
To hit, but Kissing hit
Her ear's the weights of wit.
If thou know not for whom thy Maister dies,
These markes shall make thee wise:
She is the heardesse faire that shines in darke,
And giues her kids no food, but willow's barke.
This said, at length he ended
His oft sigh-broken dittie,
Then raise, but raise no legs: which faintnesse bended,
With skinne in sorow died,
With face the plot of pitie,
With thoughts which thoughts their own tormẽtors tried.
He rase, & streight espied
His Ramme, who to recouer
The Ewe another loued,
With him proud battell proued.

He enuied such a death in sight of louer,
And alwayes westward eying,
More enuyed Phœbus for his westerne flying.

The whole companie would gladlie haue taken this occasion of requesting Philisides in plainer sort to discouer vnto them his estate. Which he willing to preuent (as knowing the relation thereof more fit for funerals then the time of a mariage) began to sing this song he had learned before he had euer subiected his thoughts to acknowledge no Maister, but a Mistresse.

AS I my little flocke on Ister banke
(A litle flocke; but well my pipe the couth)
Did piping leade, the Sunne alreadie sanke
Beyond our world, and ere I got my booth,
Each thing with mantle blacke the night doth scoth;
Sauing the glow worme, which would curteous be
Of that small light oft watching shepheards see.

The welkin had full niggardly enclosed
In coffer of dimme clowds his siluer groates,
Icleped starres; each thing to rest disposed,
The caues were full, the mountaines void of goates:
The birds eyes closd closed their chirping notes.
As for the Nightingale wood-musikes King,
It August was, he daind not then to sing.

Amid my sheepe, though I saw nought to feare,
Yet (for I nothing saw) I feared sore;
Then found I which thing is a charge to beare,
As for my sheepe I dradded mickle more
Then euer for my selfe since I was bore.
I sate me downe: for see to go ne could,
And sang vnto my sheepe least stray they should.

The song I sang old Lanquet had me taught,
Lanquet, the shepheard best swift Ister knew,
For clearkly reed, and hating vvhat is naught,
For faithful heart, cleane hands, and mouth as true:
With his sweet skill my skilleſſe youth he drew,
To haue a feeling taste of him that sits
Beyond the heauen, far more beyond your wits.

He said, the Musike best thilke powers pleasd
VVas iumpe concord betweene our wit and will:
VVhere highest notes to godlinesse are raisd,
And lowest sinke not downe to iote of ill:
VVith old true tales he wont mine eares to fill,
How shepheards did of yore, how now they thriue,

Spoiling

Spoiling their flock, or while twixt them they striue.
He liked me, but pitied lustfull youth:
His good strong staffe my slippry yeares vpbore:
He still hop'd well because he loued truth;
Till forste to part, with heart and eyes euen sore,
To worthy Coriden he gaue me ore,
But thus in okes true shade recounted he,
VVhich now in nights deepe shade sheep heard of me.

Such maner time there was (what time I n'ot)
VVhen all this Earth, this damme or mould of ours
VVas onely won'd with such as beasts begot:
Vnknowne as then were they that builded towers:
The cattell wild, or tame, in natures bowers
Might freely rome, or rest, as seemed them:
Man was not man their dwellings into hem.

The beastes had sure some beastly policie:
For nothing can endure where order n'is.
For once the Lion by the Lambe did lie.
The fearefull Hinde the Leopard did kisse.
Hurtles was Tygers pawe and Serpents hisse.
This thinke I well, the beast with courage clad,
Like Senators a harmelesse empire had.

At which whether the others did repine,
(For enuie harbreth most in feebleste hearts)
Or that they all to changing did incline,
(As euen in beasts their dammes leaue changing parts)
The multitude to Ioue a suite imparts,
VVith neighing, blaying, braying, and barking,
Roring, and howling for to haue a King,

A King, in language theirs they said they would:
(For then their language was a perfect speech)
The birdes likewise with chirps, and puing could Cackling, and chattering, that of Ioue beseech.
Onely the owle still warnd them not to seech
So hastily that which they would repent:
But saw they would, and he to deserts went.

Ioue wisely said (for wisdome wisely sayes)
O beasts, take heed what you of me desire.
Rulers will thinke all things made them to please,
And soone forget the swinke due to their hire,
But since you will, part of my heau'nly fire
I will you lende; the rest your selues must giue,
That it both seene and felt may with you liue.

Full glad they were and tooke the naked sprite,
VVhich straight the Earth ycloathed in his clay:
The Lion, hart; the Ounce gaue actiue might;
The Horse, good shape; the Sparrow, lust to play;
Nightingale, voice, entising songs to say.
Elephant gaue a perfect memorie:
And Parot, ready tongue, that to applie.

The Foxe gaue craft; the Dog gaue flatterie;
Asse, patience; the Mole, a working thought;
Eagle, high looke; VVolfe secret crueltie:
Monkie, sweet breath; the Cow, her faire eyes brought;
The Ermion, whitest skinne, spotted with nought;
The sheepe, mild-seeming face; climing, the Beare;
The Stagge did giue the harme-eschewing feare.

The Hare, her sleights; the Cat, his melancholy;
Ante, industrie; and Connie, skill to build;
Cranes, order; Storkes, to be appearing holie;
Camæleon, ease to change; Ducke, ease to yeeld;
Crocodile, teares, which might be falsely spild:
Ape great thing gaue, though he did mowing stand,
The instrument of instruments, the hand.

Each other beast likewise his present brings:
And (but they drad their Prince they ought should want)
They all consented were to giue him wings;
And ay more awe towards him for to plant,
To their owne worke this priuiledge they grant,
That from thenceforth to all eternitie,
No beast should freely speake, but onely he.

Thus Man was made; thus Man their Lord became:
VVho at the first, wanting, or hiding pride,
He did to beasts best vse his cunning frame;
VVith water drinke, hearbs meat, and naked hide.
And fellow-like let his dominion slide;
Not in his sayings saying I, but we:
As if he meant his Lordship common be.

But when his seate so rooted he had found,
That they now skilld not, how from him to wend;
Then gan in guiltlesse earth full many a wound,
Iron to seeke, which gainst it selfe should bend,
To teare the bowels, that good corne should send.
But yet the common Damme none did bemone;
Because (though hurt) they neuer hard her grone.

Then gan the factions in the beasts to breed;
VVhere helping weaker sort, the nobler beasts,
(As Tygers, Leopards, Beares, and Lions seed)
Disdaind with this, in deserts sought their restes;
VVhere famine ruine taught their hungrie chests,
That craftily he forst them to do ill,
VVhich being done he afterwards would kill.

For muthers done, which neuer erst was seene,
By those great beasts, as for the weakers good,
He chose themselues his guarders for to been,
Gainst those of might, of whom in feare they stood,
As horse and dogge, not great, but gentle blood:
Blith were the commons cattell of the field,
Tho when they saw their foen of greatnesse kild.

But they or spent, or made of slender might,
Then quickly did the meaner cattell find,
The great beames gone, the house on shoulders light:
For by and by the horse faire bitts did bind:
The dogge was in a coller taught his kind.
As for the gentle birds like case might rewe
VVhen falcon they, and gossehauke saw in mew,

VVorst fell to smallest birds, and meanest heard,
VVhome now his owne, full like his owne he vsed.
Yet first but wooll, or feathers off he teard:
And when they were well vs'de to be abused,
For hungrie teeth their flesh with teeth he bruse:
At length for glutton taste he did them kill:
At last for sport their sillie liues did spill.

But yet ô man, rage not beyond thy neede:
Deeme it no glorie to swell in tyrannie.
Thou art of blood; ioy not to see things bleede:
Thou fearest death; thinke they are loth to die.
A plaint of guiltlesse hurt doth pierce the skie.
And you poore beasts, in patience bide your hell,
Or know your strengths, and then you shall do well.

Thus did I sing, and pipe eight sullen houres
To sheepe, whom loue, not knowledge, made to heare,
Now fancies fits, now fortunes balefull stowers.
But then I homewards call'd my lambkins deare:
For to my dimmed eyes began t'appeare
The night growne old, her blacke head waxen gray,
Sure shepheards signe, that morne should soone fetch day.

ACcording to the nature of diuerſe eares, diuerſe iudgements ſtreight followed: ſome praiſing his voice, others his words fit to frame a paſtorall ſtile, others the ſtrangeneſſe of the tale, and ſcanning what he ſhould meane by it. But old Geron (who had borne him a grudge euer ſince in one of their Eclogues he had taken him vp ouer-bitterly) tooke hold of this occaſion to make his reuenge, & ſaid, He neuer ſaw thing worſe proportioned, then to bring in a tale of he knew not what beaſtes at ſuch a ſport-meeting, when rather ſome ſong of loue, or matter for ioyful melody was to be brought forth. But ſaid he, This is the right conceipt of young men, who thinke, then they ſpeake wiſelieſt, when they cannot vnderſtand themſelues. But little did the melancholike ſhepheard regard either his diſpraiſes, or the others praiſes, who had ſet the foundation of his honour there, where he was moſt deſpiſed. And therefore he returning againe to the traine of his deſolate penſiueneſſe, Geron inuited Hiſtor to anſwere him in Eclogue-wiſe; who indeed hauing bene long in loue with the faire Kala, and now by Lalus ouergone; was growne into a deteſtation of mariage. But thus it was.

Geron. Hiſtor.

Geron. IN faith, good Hiſtor, long is your delay,
From holy mariage ſweete and ſureſt meane:
Our foolish laſt in honeſt rules to ſtay,
I pray thee do to Lalus ſample leane:
Thou ſeeſt, how friſke, and iolly now he is,
That laſt day ſeem'd, he could not chew a beane.
Beleeue me man, there is no greater bliſſe,
Then is the quiet ioy of louing wife;
VVhich who ſo wants, halfe of himſelfe doth miſſe.
Friend without change, playfellow without ſtrife,
Foode without fulneſſe, counſaile without pride,
Is this ſweet doubling of our ſingle life.

Hiſtor. No doubt to whom ſo good chance did betide,
As for to finde a paſture ſtrawed with gold,
He were a foole, if there he did not bide.
VVho would not haue a Phœnix if he could?
The humming VVaſpe, if it had not a ſting,
Before all flies the vvaſpe accept I would.
But this bad world, few golden fields doth bring,
Phœnix but one, of Crowes we millions haue.
The VVaſpe ſeemes gay, but is a combrous thing.
If many Kalaes our Arcadia gaue,
Lalus example I would ſoone enſue,
And thinke, I did my ſelfe from ſorrow ſaue.
But of ſuch wiues we finde a ſlender crew;
Shrewdneſſe ſo ſtirres, pride ſo puffes vp the heart,
They ſeldome ponder what to them is due.
VVith meager lookes, as if they ſtill did ſmart;
Puiling, and whimpring, or elſe ſcolding flat,
Make home more paine then following of the cart.
Either dull ſilence, or eternall chat;
Still contrarie to what her husband ſayes;

If he do praise the dog, she likes the cat.
Austere she is, when he would honest playes;
And gamesome then, when he thinkes on his sheepe;
Shee bids him goe, and yet from iorney stayes,
She warre doth euer with his kinsfolke keepe,
And makes them fremb'd, who friends by nature are,
Enuying shallow toyes with malice deepe,
And if forsooth there come some new found ware,
The little coine his sweating browes haue got,
Must goe for that, if for her lowres he care:
Or els; Nay faith, mine is the luckleſt lot,
That euer fell to honeſt woman yet:
No wife but I hath ſuch a man, God wot,
Such is their ſpeech, who be of ſober wit;
But, who do let their tongues shew well their rage,
Lord, what bywords they ſpeake, what ſpite they ſpit?
The houſe is made a very lothſome cage,
Wherein the birde doth neuer ſing but cry,
With ſuch a will as nothing can aſſwage.
Deerely the ſeruants do their wages buy,
Reuil'd for ech ſmall fault, ſometimes for none:
They better liue that in a gaile do lie.
Let other fowler ſpots away be blowne;
For I ſeeke not their shame, but ſtill me thinkes,
A better life it is to lie alone.

Geron. Who for ech fickle feare from vertue shrinks,
Shall in his life embrace no worthy thing:
No mortall man the cuppe of ſuretie drinks.
The heau'ns do not good haps in handfuls bring,
But let vs pike our good from out much bad:
That ſtill our little world may know his king.
But certainly ſo long we may be glad,
While that we doo what nature doth require,
And for th'euent we neuer ought be ſad.
Man oft is plagu'd with aire, is burnt with fire,
In water drownd, in earth his buriall is;
And shall we not therefore their vſe deſire?
Nature aboue all things requireth this,
That we our kind doo labour to maintaine;
Which drawne-out line doth hold all humane bliſſe
Thy father iuſtly may of thee complaine,
If thou do not repay his deedes for thee,
In granting vnto him a grandſires gaine.
Thy common-welth may rightly grieued be,
Which muſt by this immortall be preſerued,
If thus thou murther thy poſteritie,
His very being he hath not deſerued,

VVho for a selfe-conceipt will that forbeare,
VVhereby that being aye must be conserued.
And God forbid, women such cattell were,
As you paint them: but well in you I finde,
No man doth speake aright, who speakes in feare.
VVho onely sees the ill is worse then blind.
These fiftie winters maried haue I beene;
And yet finde no such faultes in womankind.
I haue a wife worthie to be a Queene,
So well she can command, and yet obay;
In ruling of a house so well shee's seene.
And yet in all this time betwixt vs tway,
VVe beare our double yoke with such consent,
That neuer past foule word, I dare well say.
But these be your loue-toyes, which still are spent
In lawlesse games, and loue not as you should,
But with much studie learne late to repent.
How well last day before our Prince you could Blinde Cupids workes with wonder testifie?
Yet now the roote of him abase you would.
Goe to, goe to, and Cupid now applie,
To that where thou thy Cupid maist auowe,
And thou shalt finde, in women vertues lie.
Sweet supple mindes which soone to wisdome bow
VVhere they by wisdomes rule directed are,
And are not forst fond thraldome to allow.
As we to get are fram'd, so they to spare:
VVe made for paine, our paines they made to cherish:
VVe care abroade, and they of home haue care.
O Histor, seeke within thy selfe to florish:
Thy house by thee must liue, or els be gone:
And then who shall the name of Histor nourish?
Riches of children passe a Princes throne;
Which touch the fathers hart with secret ioy,
When without shame he saith, these be mine owne.
Marrie therefore; for mariage will destroy
Those passions which to youthfull head doo clime,
Mothers and Nurses of all vaine annoy.

He spake these words with such affection, as a curious eye might easily haue perceiued he liked Thyrsis fortune better then he loued his person. But then indeed did all arise, and went to the women, where spending all the day, and good part of the night in dauncing, carolling and wassalling, lastly, they left Thyrsis, where he long desired to be left, and with many vnfained thanks returned euerie man to his home. But some of thē hauing to crosse the way of the two Lodges, might see a Lady making dolefull lamentations ouer a bodie which seemed dead vnto them. But me thinks Dametas cries vnto me, if I come not the sooner to cōfort him, he will leaue of his golden worke, that hath already cost him so much labour and longing.

The end of the third Booke.

THE FOVRTH BOOKE OF THE COVNTESSE OF PEMBROKES ARCADIA.

(·)

THe almighty wisdome euermore delighting to shew the world, that by vnlikeliest meanes greatest matters may come to conclusion: that humane reason may be the more humbled, and more willingly giue place to diuine prouidence: as at the first it brought in Dametas to play a part in this royall pageant, so hauing cõtinued him stil an actor, now that all things were grown ripe for an end, made his folly the instrument of reuealing that, which farre greater cunning had sought to conceale. For so it fell out that Dametas hauing spent the whole day in breaking vp the cumbersome worke of the Pastor Dorus, and feeling in all his labour no paine so much, as that his hungrie hopes receiued anie stay, hauing with the price of much sweat and wearinesse gotten vp the huge stone, which he thought should haue such a golden lining, the good man in the great bed that stone had made, found nothing but these two verses, written vpon a broad peece of velume:

Who hath his hire, hath well his labour plast:
Earth thou didst seeke, and store of earth thou hast.

What an inward discountenance it was to maister Dametas, to find his hope of wealth turned to poore verses, for which he neuer cared much, nothing can describe but either the feeling in ones selfe the state of such a mind Dametas had, or at least the bethinking what was Midas fancie, when after the great pride he conceiued to be made Iudge betweene Gods, he was rewarded with the ornament of an Asses eares. Yet the deepe apprehension he had receiued of such riches, could not so sodainlie loose the colour that had so throughly died his thicke braine, but that he turned & tossed the poore bowels of the innocent earth, till the commingon of the night, and the tediousnesse of his fruitlesse labour made him content rather to exercise his discontentation at home then there. But forced he was (his horse being otherwise burthened with digging instruments) to returne as he came, most part of the way on foot: with such grudging lamentations as a nobler mind would (but more noblie) make for the losse of his mistresse. For so far had he fed his fooliſh soule with the expectatiõ of that which he reputed felicitie, that he no lesse accounted himselfe miserable, then if he had fallen from such an estate his fancie had embraced. So then home againe went Dametas, punished in conceite, as in conceite he had erred, till he found himselfe there from a fancied losse falne to essential miserie. For entring into his house three houres within night, in steede of the lightsome countenaunce of Pamela, which gaue such an inwarde decking to that Lodge, as proudest pallaces might haue cause to enuie it; and of the gratefull conuersation of Dorus, whose wittie behauiour made that lonelinesse to seeme full of good company: in steede of the loud scolding of Miso, and the busie rumbling vp and downe of Mopsa, which though they were so short, as quite contrarie to the others praiseworthinesse, yet were they farre before them in filling of a house: he found nothing but a solitarie darknesse: which as naturally it breedes a kinde of irksome gastfulfulnesse, so it was to him a most present terrour, remẽbring the charge he had left behind, which he well knew imported no lesse then his life vnto him. Therfore lighting a candle, there was no place a mouse could haue dwelled in, but that he with quaking diligence sought into. But when he saw he could see nothing of that he most cared for, then became he the right paterne of a wretch deiected with feare: for crying & howling, knocking his head to the wall he began to make pitiful cõplaints, where no body could heare him: & (with too much dread he shold not recouer her) leaue all cõsideratiõ how to recouer her. But at length looking like a she goat, when she casts her kid, for verie sorow he tooke in his own behalf, out of the Lodge he wẽt running as hard as he could, hauing now receiued the verie forme of hanging into his consideration. Thus running as a man would gladly haue run frõ himselfe, it was his foolish fortune to espie, by the glimmering light the moone did then yeeld him, one standing aloft amõg the boughs of a faire Ash. He that would haue asked coũsel at that time of a dog, cast vp his face, as if his tooth had bin drawing: and with much bending his sight, perceiued it was mistresse Mopsa, fitly seated there for wit & dignitie. There (I will not say with ioy, for how could he taste of ioy, whose imagination was fallen frõ a pallace to a gallowes?) But yet with some refreshing of comfort, in hope he should learne better tidings: of her he began to crie out; O Mopsa, my beloued chicken, here am I thine owne father Dametas, neuer in such a towardnesse of hanging, if thou canst not helpe mee. But neuer a word could his eloquence procure of Mopsa, who indeed was there attending for greater matters. This was yet a new burthen to poore Dametas, who thought all the world was conspired against him: and therfore with a silly choler he began another tune. Thou vile Mopsa, said he, now the vengeance of my fatherly curse light ouerthwart thee, if thou do not straight answer me. But neither blessing nor cursing could preuaile. Mopsa, who was now great with child with the expectation of her May-game hopes, and did long to be deliuered with the third time being named. Which by and by followed. For Dametas rubbing his elbow, stamping & whining, seeing neither of these take place, began to throw stones at her, and withall to coniure her by the name of hellish Mopsa. But when he had named her the third time, no chime can more sodainly follow the striking of a clocke, then she, verily thinking it was the God, that vsed her fathers voyce, throwing her armes abroad, and not considering she was muffled vpon so high a tree, came fluttring downe like a hooded hawke; like enough to haue broken her necke, but that the tree full of boughes tossed her frõ one bough to another, and lastly well bruised brought her to receiue an vnfriendly salutation of the earth. Dametas, as soone as she was downe, came running to her, and finding her so close wrapt, pulled off the scarlet cloake: in good time for her, for with the soreneſse of the fall, if she had not had breath giuen her, she had deliuere d a foolish

soule to Pluto. But then Dametas began a fresh to desire his daughter not to forget the paines he had taken for her in her childhood (which he was sure she could not remember) and to tell him where Pamela was. O good Apollo, said Mopsa, if euer thou didst beare loue to Phaetons mother, let me haue a king to my husband. Alas, what speakest thou of Phaeton, said Dametas? If by thy circumspect meanes I find not out Pamela, thy father will be hanged to morow. It is no matter though he be hanged, answered Mopsa: do but thou make Dorus a king, and let him be my husband, good Apollo, for my courage doth much pricke me toward him. Ah Mopsa, cried out Dametas, where is thy wit? Dost thou not know thy father? How hast thou forgotten thy selfe? I do not aske wit of thee, mine owne God, (sayd she) but I see thou wouldest haue me remember my father, and indeed forget my selfe. No, no, a good husband. Thou shalt haue thy fill of husbands (said Dametas) and do but answer me my question. O I thanke thee (said Mopsa) with all my heart hartilie; but let them be all kings. Dametas seeing no other way preuayle, fell downe on his knees, Mopsa, Mopsa, (said he) do not thus cruelly torment me: I am alreadie wretched enough, alas either helpe me, or tell me thou canst not. She that would not be behind Apollo in curtesie, kneeled downe on the other side, I will neuer leaue tormenting thee (said Mopsa) vntill thou hast satisfied my longing, but I will proclaime thee a promise-breaker, that euen Iupiter shall heare it. Now by the fostering thou hast receiued in this place saue my life (said Dametas.) Now by the faire Ash (answered Mopsa) where thou didst receiue so great a good turne, graunt post haste to my burning fancie. O where is Pamela, said Dametas? O a lustie husband, said Mopsa. Dametas that now verilie assured himselfe, his daughter was mad, began vtterly to despaire of his life, and therefore amazedlie catching her in his armes, to see whether he could bring her to her selfe, he might feele the waight of a great cudgell light vpon his shoulders, and for the first greeting he knew his wife Misos voice, by the calling him ribalde villaine, and asking him whether she could not serue his turne as well as Charita? For Miso hauing according to Dorus counsell, gone to Mantinea, and there harboured her selfe in an old acquaintance house of hers, as soone as ten of the clocke was striken (where she had remayned closely all that while, I thinke with such an amiable cheare, as when iealous Iuno sate crosse-legged, to hinder the child-birth of her husbands loue) with opē mouth she went to the Magistrate appointed ouer such matters, and there with the most scolding inuectiue, her rage rather then eloquence could bring forth, she required his ayde to take Dametas, who had left his dutie to the king and his daughter, to commit adulterie in the house of Charitas vncle, in the Oudemian streete. But neither was the name of Charita remembred, nor any such street knowne. Yet such was the generall mislike all men had of Dametas vnworthy aduancement, that euerie man was glad to make himselfe a minister of that, which might redound to his shame, and therefore with Panike cries & laughters, there was no suspected place in all the citie but was searched for vnder the title of Dametas; Miso euer formost encouraging them with all the shamefull blasings of his demeanour, encreasing the sport of hunting her husband, with her diligent barking, till at length hauing alreadie done both him and her selfe as much infamous shame, as such a tongue in such an action might performe, in the end not being able to find a thing that was not, to her mare again she went, hauing neither suspitiō nor rage any thing mitigated. But (leauing behind her a sufficient comedie of her tragicall fancies) away homeward she came, imputing the not finding her husband, to any chaunce rather then to his innocencie. For her heart being apt to receiue and nouriſh a bitter thought, it had ſo ſwallowed vp a determinate condemnation, that in the verie anatomie of her ſpirits one ſhould haue found nothing but diuelliſh diſdaine, and hateſull iealouſie. In this ſort grunting out her miſchieuous ſpite, ſhe came by the tree, euen as Dametas was making that ill-vnderſtood interceſſion to his fooliſh Mopſa. As ſoone as ſhe hard her husbands voyce, ſhe verily thought ſhe had her play: and therfore ſtealing from her mare as ſoftlie as ſhe could, ſhe came creeping and halting behind him, euen as he thinking his daughters litle wits had quite left her great nowle; began to take her in his armes; thinking perchance her feeling ſence might call her mind-parts vnto her. But Miſo who ſaw nothing but thorough the colour of reuengefull anger, eſtabliſhed vpon the fore-iudgement of his treſpaſſe, vndoubtedlie reſoluing that Mopſa was Charita, Dorus had told her of, mumping out her hoarſe chafe, ſhe gaue him the woodden ſalutation you heard of. Dametas that was not ſo ſenſible in any thing as in blowes, turned vp his blubbered face like a great lowt new whipt: Alas thou woman, ſaid he, what hath thy poore husband deſerued to haue his owne ill lucke loaden with thy diſpleaſure? Pamela is loſt, Pamela is loſt. Miſo ſtill holding on the courſe of her former fancie, what telleſt thou me naughtie varlet of Pamela, doeſt thou thinke that doth anſwer me, for abuſing the lawes of mariage? Haue I brought thee children, haue I bene a true wife vnto thee, to be deſpiſed in mine old age? And euer among ſhe would ſauce her ſpeeches with ſuch Baſtonados, that poore Dametas began now to thinke, that either a generall madding was falne, or elſe that all this was but a viſion. But as for viſions the ſmart of the cudgell put out of his fancie: and therefore againe turning to his wife, not knowing in the world what ſhe meant, Miſo (ſaid he) hereafter thou maiſt examine me, do but now tell me what is become of Pamela. I will firſt examine this drab, ſaid ſhe, and withall let fall her ſtaffe as hard as ſhe could vpon Mopſa, ſtill taking her for Charita. But Mopſa that was already angrie, thinking that ſhe had hindred her from Apollo, leapt vp and caught her by the throate, like to haue ſtrangled her, but that Dametas from a condemned man was faine to become a iudge and part this fray, ſuch a picture of a rude diſcord, where each was out with the other two. And then getting the oportunitie of their falling out to hold himſelfe in ſuretie, who was indeed the verieſt coward of the three, he renued his earneſt demaund of them. But it was a ſport to ſee, how the former conceits Dorus had printed in their imaginations, kept ſtill ſuch dominion in them, that Miſo though now ſhe found and felt it was her daughter Mopſa, yet did Charita continually paſſe through her thoughts, which ſhe vttered with ſuch crabbed queſtions to Dametas, that he not poſſiblie conceiuing any part of her doubt, remained aſtoniſhed, and the aſtoniſhment encreaſed her doubt. And as for Mopſa, as firſt ſhe did aſſuredly take him to be Apollo, and thought her mothers comming did mar the bargaine: ſo now much talking to & fro had deliuered ſo much light into the myſty mould of her capacity, as to know him to be her father. Yet remained there ſuch footſteps of the foretaken opinion, that ſhe thought verilie her father and mother were haſted thither to get the firſt wiſh. And therefore to whatſoeuer they asked of her, ſhe would neuer anſwer, but embracing the tree, as if ſhe feared it had bene running away, nay, ſayes ſhe, I will haue the firſt wiſh, for I was here firſt: which they vnderſtood no more, then Dametas did what Miſo meant by Charita: till at length with much vrging them, being indeed better able to perſwade both, then to meet hand to hand with either, he preuailed ſo much with them, as to bring them into the Lodge to ſee what loſſe their negligence had ſuffered. Then indeed the neare neigbourhood they bare to themſelues, made them leaue other toyes, & looke into what dangerous plight they were all falne, aſſoone as the king ſhold know his daughters eſcape. And as for the womē they began afreſh to enter into their brawling, whether were in the fault. But Dametas who did feare that among his other euils, the thunderbolt of that ſtorme would fall vpon his ſhoulders, ſlipt away from them, but with ſo maigre a cheare as might much ſooner engender laughter then pitie. O true Arcadia, would he ſay (tearing his haire and beard, and ſometime for too much wo, making vnwelcome ſomerſaults) how dareſt thou beare vpon thee ſuch a felonious traitor as I am? And you falſe-hearted trees, why would you make no noiſe, to make her vngracious departure knowne? Ah Pamela, Pamela, how often whē I brought thee in fine poſies of all coloured flowers, wouldeſt thou clap me on the cheeke, and ſay thou wouldſt be one day euen with me? Was this thy meaning to bring me to an euen paire of gallowes? Ah ill taught Dorus, that cameſt hither to learne good maners of me? Did I euer teach thee to make thy maiſter ſweat out his hart for nothing, & in the meane time to run away with thy miſtreſſe? O my dun cow, I did thinke ſome euill was towards me euer ſince the laſt day thou didſt run away from me, and held vp thy taile ſo pitifully: did not I ſee an Eagle kill a Cuckoe, which was a plaine foretoken vnto me Pamela ſhould be my deſtruction? O wife Miſo (if I durſt ſay it to thy face) why didſt thou ſuſpect thy husband, that loueth a peece of cheeſe better then a woman? And thou litle Mopſa, that ſhalt inherite the ſhame of thy fathers death, was it time for thee to clime trees, which ſhould ſo ſhortly be my beſt burial? ô that I coud liue without death, or die before I were aware! ô hart, why haſt thou no hands at commandement to diſpatch thee? O hands why want you a heart to kill this villanie. In this ſort did he inuey againſt euery thing, ſometimes thinking to run away, while it was yet night: but he that had included all the world within his ſheepcote, thought that worſe then any death: ſometime for dread of hanging he meant to hang himſelfe: finding as indeed it is, that feare is far more painefull to cowardiſe, then death to a true courage. But his fingers were nothing nimble in that action, & any thing was let enough thereto, he being a true louer of himſelf without any riuall. But laſtlie, guided by a farre greater conſtellation then his owne, he remembred to ſearch the other lodge, where it might be Pamela that night had retired her ſelf. So thither with trembling hammes he caried himſelfe, but employing his double key which the king for ſpeciall credit had vnworthily beſtowed vpō him, he found all the gates ſo barred, that his key could not preuaile, ſauing onlie one trapt doore which went downe into a vault by the celler, which as it was vnknowne of Pyrocles, ſo had he left it vnregarded. But Dametas that euer knew the Butterie better then any other place, got in that way, and paſing ſoftlie to Philocleas chamber, where he thought moſt likely to find Pamela, the doore being left open he entred in, and by the light of the lampe he might diſcerne one on the bed by her: which he although he tooke to be Pamela, yet thinking no ſuretie enough in a matter touching his necke, hee went hard to the bed ſide of theſe vnfortunate louers, who at that time being not much before the breake of day (whether it were they were ſo diuinely ſurpriſed, to bring this whole matter to the deſtined concluſion, or that the vnreſiſtable force of their ſorowes had ouerthrowne the wakefull vſe of their ſenſes) were as then poſſeſſed with a mutuall ſleepe, yet not forgetting with vinie embracements, to giue any eye a perfect modell of affection. But Dametas looking with the lampe in his hand but neither with ſuch a face nor mind vpon theſe excellent creatures, as Pſyche did vpon her vnknowne louer, and giuing euery way freedome to his fearfull eyes, did not onely perceiue it was Zelmane, and therefore much different from the Ladie he ſought: but that this ſame Zelmane did more differ from the Zelmane he and others had euer taken her for, wherein the change of her apparell chieflie confirmed his opinion; ſatisfied with that, and not thinking it good to awake the ſleeping Lyon, he went downe againe, taking with him Pyrocles ſword (wherewith vpon his ſleight vnderſute Pyrocles came only apparelled thither) being ſure to leaue no weapon in the chamber, and ſo making the doore as faſt as he could on the out ſide, hoping with the reuealing of this (as he thought greater fault) to make his owne the leſſe, or at leaſt that this iniurie would ſo fill the kings head, that he ſhould not haue leyſure to chaſtiſe his negligence (like a foole not cõſidering that the more rage breeds the crueller puniſhment) he went firſt into the kings chamber, and not finding him there, he ran downe crying with open mouth, the king was betrayed, and that Zelmane did abuſe his daughter. The noiſe he made, being a man of no few words, ioyned to the yelping ſound of Miſo, and his vnpleaſant inheritrix brought together ſome number of the ſhepheards, to whom he without any regard of reſeruing it for the Kings knowledge, ſpattered out the bottome of his ſtomacke, ſwearing by him he neuer knew that Zelmane, whõ they had taken all that while to be a woman, was as arrant a man as himſelfe was, whereof he had ſeene ſufficient ſignes and tokens; and that he was as cloſe as a Butterflie with the Ladie Philoclea. The poore men iealous of their Princes honour, were ready with weapons to haue entred the Lodge; ſtanding yet in ſome pauſe, whether it were not beſt, firſt to heare ſome newes from the king himſelfe, when by the ſodaine comming of other ſhepheards, which with aſtoniſhed lookes ran from the one crie to the other, their griefes were ſurcharged with the euill tidings of the kings death. Turning therefore all their minds and eyes that way, they ranne to the Caue where they ſaid he lay dead, the Sunne beginning now to ſend ſome promiſe of comming light, making haſte, I thinke to be ſpectator of the following tragedies. For Baſilius hauing paſt ouer the night more happie in contemplation then action, hauing had his ſpirits ſublimed with the ſweet imagination of embracing the moſt deſired Zelmane, doubting leaſt the Caues darkneſſe might deceiue him in the dayes approch, thought it now ſeaſon to returne to his wedlocke bed, remembring the promiſe he had made to Zelmane, to obſerue due orders towards Gynecia. Therefore departing, but not departing without bequeathing by a will of words, ſealed with manie kiſſes, a full gift of all his loue and life to his miſconceiued bedfellow, he went to the mouth of the caue, there to apparell himſelfe; in which doing the motion of his ioy could not be bridled from vttering ſuch like words: Bleſſed be thou, ô night, ſaid he, that haſt with thy ſweete wings ſhrowded me in the vale of bliſſe, it is thou that art the firſt gotten child of time, the day hath bin but an vſurper vpon thy delightful inheritance, thou inuiteſt all liuing things to comfortable reſt, thou art the ſtop of ſtriſe, and the neceſſarie truce of approching battels. And therewith he ſang theſe verſes, to confirme his former praiſes.

O Night, the eaſe of care, the pledge of pleaſure,
Deſires beſt meane, harneſt of hearts affected,
The ſeate of peace, the throne which is erected,
Of humane life to be the quiet meaſure.

Be victor ſtill of Phœbus golden treaſure:
VVho hath our ſight with too much ſight infected,
VVhoſe light is cauſe we haue our liues neglected,
Turning all natures courſe to ſelfe diſpleaſure.

Theſe ſtately ſtarres in their now shining faces,
VVith ſinleſſe ſleepe, and ſilence wiſdomes mother,
VVitneſſe his wrong which by thy helpe is eaſed:

Thou art therefore of theſe our deſart places
The ſure refuge, by thee and by no other
My ſoule is bliſt, ſence ioyde, and fortune rayſed.

And yet farther would his ioyes needs breake forth. O Baſilius (ſaid he) the reſt of thy time, hath bene but a dreame vnto thee: it is now onely thou beginneſt to liue now only thou haſt entred into the way of bliſſefulneſſe. Should fancie of mariag, keepe me from this paradiſe? or opinion of I know not what promiſe bind me frō paying the right duties to nature & affection? O who would haue thought there could haue bene ſuch difference betwixt women? Be iealous no more ô Gynecia, but yeeld to the preheminence of more excellent gifts, ſupport thy ſelf with ſuch marble pillers as ſhe doth, decke thy breaſt with thoſe Alablaſter bowles that Zelmane doth: then accompanied with ſuch a title, perhaps thou maiſt recouer the poſſeſſion of my otherwiſe inclined loue. But alas Gynecia, thou canſt not ſhew ſuch euidence, therefore thy plea is vaine. Gynecia heard all this he ſaid, who had caſt about her Zelmanes garmēt, wherin ſhe came thither, & had followed Baſilius to the Caues entrie, full of inward vexation, betwixt the deadlie accuſation of her owne guiltineſſe, and the ſpitefull doubt ſhe had Zelmane had abuſed her. But becauſe of the one ſide (finding the king did thinke her to be Zelmane, ſhe had libertie to imagine it might rather be the kings owne vnbridled enterpriſe, which had barred Zelmane, then Zelmanes cunning deceiuing of her, and that of the other if ſhe ſhould headily ſeeke a violent reuenge, her owne honour might be as much intereſſed, as Zelmane endaungered: ſhe fell to this determination. Firſt with fine handling of the King to ſettle in him a perfect good opinion of her, and then as ſhe ſhould learne how things had paſſed, to take into her ſelfe new deuiſed counſell, but this being her firſt action, hauing giuen vnlooked for attendance to the King, ſhe heard with what partiality he did preferre her to her ſelf, ſhe ſaw in him how much fancy doth not only darken reaſon but beguile ſence, ſhe found opiniō Miſtreſſe of the Louers iudgement, which ſeruing as a good leſſon to her good conceit, ſhe went out to Baſilius, ſetting her ſelfe in a graue behauiour and ſtatelie ſilence before him: vntil he (who at the firſt thinking her by ſo much ſhadow as he could ſee to be Zelmane, was beginning his louing ceremonies) did now being helped by the peping light, wherwith the morning did ouercome the nights darkneſſe, know her face and his error, which acknowledging in himſelf with ſtarting backe from her, ſhe thus with a modeſt bitterneſſe ſpake vnto him: Alas my Lord, well did your words diſcipher your mind, and well be thoſe words confirmed with this geſture. Verie lothſome muſt that woman be, from whom a man hath cauſe to go backe; and litle better liked is that wife, before whom the husband preferres them he neuer knew. Alas hath my faithfull obſeruing my part of dutie made you thinke your ſelfe euer a whit the more exempted? Hath that which ſhould claime grateſulneſſe, bene a cauſe of contempt? Is the being the mother of Pamela become an odious name vnto you? If my life hitherto led haue not auoided ſuſpition, if my violated truth to you be deſeruing of any puniſhment, I refuſe not to be chaſtiſed with the moſt cruell torment of your diſpleaſure, I refuſe not miſerie, purchaſed by mine owne merite. Hard I muſt needs ſay (although till now I neuer thought I ſhould haue had cauſe to ſay) is the deſtinie of womankind, the triall of whoſe vertue muſt ſtand vpon the louing of them that employ all their induſtrie not to be beloued. If Zelmanes young yeares had not had ſo much grauity hidden vnder a youthfull face, as your gray haires haue bene but the vizar of vnfitting youthfulneſſe, your vicious minde had brought ſome fruits of repentance, & Gynecia might then haue bene with much more right ſo baſely deſpiſed.

Baſilius that was more aſhamed to ſee himſelfe ſo ouertaken, then Vulcan was, when with much cunning hee proued himſelfe a Cuckold, began to make certaine extrauagant excuſes: but the matter in it ſelfe hardly brooking any purgation, with the ſodainneſſe of the time, which barred any good conioyned inuention, made him ſometimes alleage one thing, to which by and by he would bring in a contrary, one time with flat denial, another time with mitigating the fault; now braue, then humble, vſe ſuch a ſtammering defenſiue, that Gynecia, the violẽce of whoſe ſore indeed ran another way, was content thus to faſten vp the laſt ſtitch of her anger. Well, well my Lord, ſaid ſhe, it ſhall well become you ſo to gouerne your ſelfe, as you may be fit rather to direct me, then to be iudged of me; and rather to be a wiſe maiſter of me, then an vnskilfull pleader before me. Remember the wrong you haue done is not onlie to me, but to your children, whom you had of me: to your countrey, when they ſhall find they are commaunded by him, that cannot commaund his owne vndecent appetites: laſtlie, to your ſelfe, ſince with theſe paines you do but build vp a houſe of ſhame to dwell in: if from thoſe moueable goods of nature (wherewith, in my firſt youth my royall parents beſtowed me vppon you) bearing you children, and increaſe of yeares haue withdrawne me; conſider I pray you, that as you are cauſe of the one, ſo in the other, time hath not left to worke his neuer failing effects in you. Trulie, trulie (ſir) verie vntimelie are theſe fires in you: it is time for vs both to let reaſon inioy his due ſoueraignтie. Let vs not plant anew thoſe weeds, which by natures courſe are content to fade.

Baſilius that would rather then his life the matter had bene ended, the beſt rhetorike he had, was flat demanding pardon of her, ſwearing it was the verie force of Apollos deſtinie which had caried him thus from his owne bias; but that now like as farre trauellers were taught to loue their owne countrie, he had ſuch a leſſon without booke, of affection vnto her, as he would repay the debt of this error with the intereſt of a great deale more true honour then euer before he had done her. Neither am I to giue pardon to you, my Lord (ſaid ſhe) nor you to beare honour to me. I haue taken this boldneſſe for the vnfained loue I owe vnto you, to deliuer my ſorow vnto you; much more for the care I haue of your well doing, then for any other ſelfe fancie. For well I know that by your good eſtate my life is maintained, neither, if I would, can I ſeparate my ſelfe from your fortune. For my part therefore I claime nothing but that which may be ſafeſt for your ſelfe; my life, will, honor, and whatſoeuer elſe, ſhall be but a ſhadow of that bodie. How much Baſilius owne ſhame had found him culpable, and had alreadie euen in ſoule read

reade his owne condemnation, so much did this vnexpected mildnesse of Gynecia captiue his heart vnto her, which otherwise perchaunce would haue growne to a desperate careleſneſſe. Therefore embracing her, and confeſſing that her vertue ſhined in his vice, he did euen with a true reſolued minde vowe vnto her, that as long as he vnworthie of her did liue, ſhee ſhould be the furtheſt and onely limit of his affection. He thanked the deſtinies, that had wrought her honour out of his ſhame, and that had made his own ſtriuing to go amiſſe, to be the beſt meane euer after to hold him in the right path. Thus reconciled to Baſilius great contentation, who began ſomething to marke himſelfe in his owne doings, his hard hap guided his eye to the cup of golde, wherein Gynecia had put the lickourment for Zelmane, and hauing failed of that gueſt, was now carrying it home againe. But he whom perchaunce ſorrow, perchaunce ſome long diſaccuſtomed paines, had made extremely thirſtie, tooke it out of her hands, although ſhe directly told him, both of whom ſhee had it, what the effect of it was, and the little proofe ſhee had ſeene thereof; hiding nothing from him, but that ſhe meant to miniſter it to another pacient. But the Duke, whoſe belly had no eares, and much drouth kept from the deſiring a taſter, finding it not vnpleaſant to his pallate, dranke it almoſt off, leauing verie little to couer the cuppes bottome. But within awhile that from his ſtomacke the drinke had deliuered to his principall veines his noyſome vapors, firſt with a painfull ſtretching, and forced yawning, then with a darke yellowneſſe dying his skinne, and a cold deadly ſweat principally about his temples, his bodie by naturall courſe longing to deliuer his heauie burthen to his earthly damme, wanting force in his knees, which vtterly abandoned him, with heauie fall gaue ſome proofe whether the operation of that vnknowne potion tended. For with pang-like grones, and gaſtly turning of his eyes, immediatly all his limmes ſtiffened, and his eyes fixed, he hauing had time to declare his caſe onely in theſe wordes. O Gynecia I dye. Haue care: of what or how much further he would haue ſpoken, no man can tell. For Gynecia hauing well perceiued the changing of his colour, and thoſe other euill ſignes, yet had not looked for ſuch a ſodaine ouerthrow, but rather had bethought her ſelfe what was beſt for him, when ſhe ſodainly ſaw the matter come to that periode, comming to him, and neither with any cryes getting a word of him, nor with any other poſſible meanes, able to bring any liuing action from him, the height of all ouglie ſorrowes did ſo horribly appeare before her amazed minde, that at the firſt, it did not onely diſtract all power of ſpeech from her, but almoſt wit to conſider, remaining as it were quicke buried in a graue of miſeries. Her painfull memorie had ſtreight filled her with the true ſhapes of all the fore-paſt miſchiefes, her reaſon began to crye out againſt the filthie rebellion of ſinfull ſenſe, and to teare it ſelfe with anguiſh, for hauing made ſo weake a reſiſtance, her conſcience a terrible witneſſe of the inward wickedneſſe, ſtill nouriſhing this debatefull fire; her complaint now not hauing an end to be directed vnto ſomething to disburden ſorrow, but a neceſſarie downfall of inward wretchedneſſe. She ſaw the rigour of the lawes was like to lay a ſhamefull death vpon her, which being for that action vndeſerued, made it the more inſupportable, and yet in depth of her ſoule moſt deſerued, made it more miſerable. At length, letting her tongue go as her dolorous thoughts guided it, ſhe thus with lamentable demeanour ſpake.

O bottomleſſe pit of ſorrow, in which I cannot containe my ſelfe, hauing the firebrands of all furies within me, ſtill falling, and yet by the infiniteneſſe of it

neuer falnē. Neither can I ridde my ſelfe, being fettred with the euerlaſting conſideration of it. For whither ſhould I recommend the protection of my diſhonored fall? to the earth? it hath no life, and waites to be encreaſed by the reliques of my ſhamed carcaſſe: to men? who are alwayes cruell in their neighbours faults, and make others ouerthrow become the badge of their ill masked vertue? to the heauens? ô vnſpeakable torment of conſcience, which dare not looke vnto them. No ſinne can enter there, oh there is no receipt for polluted mindes. Whither then wilt thou leade this captiue of thine, ô ſnakie deſpaire? Alas, alas, was this the free-holding power that accurſed poyſon hath graunted vnto me, that to be held the ſurer it ſhould depriue life? was this the folding in mine armes promiſed, that I ſhould folde nothing but a dead bodie? O mother of mine, what a deathfull ſucke haue you geuen me? O Philoclea, Philoclea, well hath my mother reuenged vpon me my vnmotherly hating of thee. O Zelmane, to whom yet (leaſt any miſerie ſhould faile me) remaine ſome ſparkes of my deteſtable loue, if thou haſt (as now alas! now my minde aſſures me thou haſt) deceiued me, there is a faire ſtage prepared for thee, to ſee the tragicall end of thy hated louer. With that word there flowed out two riuers of teares out of her faire eyes, which before were drie, the remembrance of her other miſchiefes being dryed vp in a furious fire of ſelfe deteſtation, loue onely according to the temper of it melting it ſelfe into thoſe brinie tokens of paſſion. Then turning her eyes againe vpon the bodie, ſhee remembred a dreame ſhee had had ſome nights before, wherein thinking herſelfe called by Zelmane, paſſing a troubleſome paſſage, ſhee found a dead bodie which told her there ſhould be her onely reſt. This no ſooner caught hold of her remembrance, then that ſhee determining with her ſelfe, it was a direct viſion of her fore-appointed end, tooke a certaine reſolution to embrace death, aſſoone as it ſhould be offred vnto her, and no way to ſeeke the prolonging of her annoyed life. And therefore kiſſing the cold face of Baſilius; And euen ſo will I reſt ſaid ſhee, and ioyne this faultie ſoule of mine to thee, if ſo much the angrie gods will graunt mee.

As ſhee was in this plight, the Sunne now climing ouer our Horizon, the firſt Shepheards came by, who ſeeing the King in that caſe, and hearing the noiſe Dametas made of the Lady Philoclea, ranne with the doleſull tydings of Baſilius death vnto him, who preſently with all his companie came to the Caues entrie where the Kings body lay. Dametas for his part more glad for the hope he had of his priuate eſcape, then ſorie for the publike loſſe his Countrie receiued for a Prince not to be miſliked. But in Gynecia, nature preuailed aboue iudgement; and the ſhame ſhe conceiued to bee taken in that order, ouercame for that inſtant the former reſolution, ſo that aſſoone as ſhe ſaw the formoſt of the paſtorall troupe, the wretched Princeſſe ranne to haue hid her face in the next woods, but with ſuch a minde, that ſhe knew not almoſt her ſelfe what ſhe could wiſh to bee the ground of her ſafetie. Dametas that ſaw her runne away in Zelmanes vpper rayment, and iudging her to be ſo, thought certainly all the ſpirites in hell were come to play a Tragedie in theſe woods, ſuch ſtrange change he ſawe euery way. The King dead at the Caues mouth; the Queene (as he thought) abſent; Pamela fled away with Dorus; his wife and Mopſa in diuers franzies. But of all other things Zelmane conquered his capacitie, ſodainly from a woman growne to a man; and from a lockt chamber gotten before him into the fields, which he gaue the reſt quickly to vnderſtand; for in ſteede of doing any thing as the exigent required, he began

began to make circles, and all those fantasticall defences that he had euer heard were fortifications against Diuels. But the other Shepheards who had both better wittes, and more faith, forthwith deuided themselues, some of them running after Gynecia, and esteeming her running away, a great condemnation of her owne guiltinesse, others going to their Prince, to see what seruice was left for them either in recouerie of his life, or honoring his death. They that went after the Queene, had soone ouertaken her, in whom now the first feares were stayed, and the resolution to die had repossessed his place in her minde. But when they saw it was the Queene, to whom besides the obedient duetie they ow'de to her state, they had alwayes caried a singular loue, for her courteous liberalities, and other wise and vertuous parts, which had filled all that people with affection and admiration. They were all sodainly stopped, beginning to aske pardon for their following her in that sort, and desiring her to be their good Ladie, as she had euer bene. But the Queene who now thirsted to be ridde of her selfe, whom she hated aboue all things with such an assured countenaunce as they haue, who alreadie haue dispensed with shame, and digested the sorowes of death, she thus said vnto them. Continue, continue, my friends: your doing is better then your excusing, the one argues assured faith, the other wāt of assurance. If you loued your Prince, when he was able and willing to doo you much good, which you could not then requite to him; doo you now publish your gratefulnes, when it shal be seene to the world, there are no hopes left to leade you vnto it. Remēber, remēber you haue lost Basilius, a Prince to defend you, a Father to care for you, a cōpanion in your ioyes, a friend in your wants. And if you loued him, shew you hate the author of his losse. It is I, faithfull Arcadians, that haue spoyled the Countrie of their protector. I, none but I, was the minister of his vnnaturall end. Cary therefore my blood in your hands, to testifie your owne innocencie, neither spare for my titles sake, but consider it was he that so entituled me. And if you thinke of any benefits by my meanes, thinke with it that I was but the instrument and he the spring. What stay ye Shepheards whose great Shepheard is gone? you neede not feare a woman, reuerence your Lords murtherer, nor haue pittie of her, who hath not pittie of her selfe. With this she presented her faire neck; some by name, others by signes, desired them to do iustice to the world, duty to their good king, honour to themselues, and fauour to her. The poore men looked one vpon the other, vnused to be arbiters in Princes matters, and being now falne into a great perplexitie, betwixt a Prince dead and a Princesse aliue. But once for them she might haue gone whither she would, thinking it a sacriledge to touch her person, when she finding she was not a sufficient oratour to perswade her own death by their hands, well, said she, it is but so much more time of miserie, for my part I wil not giue my life so much pleasure from hēce forward as to yeeld to his desire of his own choise of death; since all the rest is taken away, yet let me excel in miserie. Leade me therefore whither you will; only happy, because I can not be more wretched. But neither so much wold the honest Shepheards do, but rather with many teares bemoned this encrease of their former losse, till she was faine to leade thē, with a very strange spectacle, either that a Princesse should be in the hands of shepheards, or a prisoner should direct her gardiens: lastly, before either witnes or accuser, a Lady condemne her selfe to death. But in such monefull march they went towards the other Shepheards, who in the meane time had left nothing vnassayed to reuiue the King, but all was bootlesse; and their sorrows encreased the more they had suffred any hopes vainly to arise. Among other trials they made to know at leaſt the cauſe of his end, hauing eſpied the vnhappie cup, they gaue the little liquor that was left to a dogge of Dametas, in which within a ſhort time it wrought the like effect; although Dametas did ſo much to recouer him, that for verie loue of his life he daſht out his braines. But now all together and hauing Gynecia among them, who to make her ſelfe the more odious, did continually record to their mindes the exceſſe of their loſſe, they yeelded themſelues ouer to all thoſe formes of lamentation that dolefull images do imprint in the honeſt, but ouer-tender hearts; eſpecially when they thinke the rebound of the euil falles to their owne ſmart. Therefore after the auncient Greeke manner, ſome of them remembring the nobilitie of his birth, continued by being like his Aunceſtors: others his ſhape, which though not excellent, yet fauour and pittie drew all things now to the higheſt point; others his peaceable gouernement, the thing which moſt pleaſeth men reſolued to liue of their owne; others his liberalitie, which though it cannot light vpon all men, yet all men naturally hoping it may be they, make it a moſt amiable vertue. Some calling in queſtion the greatneſſe of his power, which encreaſed the compaſſion to ſee the preſent change, (hauing a dolefull memorie how he had tempered it with ſuch familiar curteſie amõg them, that they did more feele the fruites, then ſee the pompes of his greatneſſe) all with one conſent giuing him the ſacred titles of good, iuſt, mercifull, the father of the people, the life of his Countrie, they ranne about his bodie, tearing their beardes and garments; ſome ſending their cryes to heauen, other inuenting praticular howling muſicke; manie vowing to kill themſelues at the day of his funerals, generally giuing a true teſtimonie, that men are louing creatures when iniuries put them not from their naturall courſe: and how eaſily a thing it is for a Prince by ſucceſſion, deepely to ſinke into the ſoules of his ſubiects, a more liuely monument then Mauſolus Tombe. But as with ſuch hartie lamentation, they diſperſed among thoſe woods their reſounding ſhrikes, the Sunne the perfecteſt marke of time, hauing now gotten vp two houres iourney in his daily changing Circle, their voice helped with the onely aunſwering Echo, came to the eares of the faithfull and worthie Gentleman Philanax: who at that time was comming to viſite the King, accompanied with diuers of the worthie Arcadian Lords, who with him had viſited the places adioyning for the more aſſurance of Baſilius ſolitarineſſe, a thing after the late mutinie he had vſually done, and ſince the Princeſſes returne more diligently continued, which hauing now likewiſe perfourmed, thinking it as well his duetie to ſee the King as of good purpoſe, being ſo neare, to receiue his further direction: accompanied as aboue ſaide he was this morning comming vnto him, when theſe vnpleaſant voices gaue his minde an vncertaine preſage of his neere approching ſorrowe. For by and by he ſaw the bodie of his dearely eſteemed Prince, and heard Gynecias lamenting: not ſuch as the turtle-like loue is wont to make for the euer ouer-ſoone loſſe of her onely loued make, but with curſings of her life, deteſting her owne wickedneſſe, ſeeming onely therefore not to deſire death, becauſe ſhee would not ſhew a loue of any thing. The Shepheards, eſpecially Dametas, knowing him to be the ſecond perſon in authoritie, gaue foorthwith relation vnto him, what they knew and had proued of this dolorous ſpectacle, beſides the other accidents of his children. But he principally touched with his maiſters loſſe, lighting from his horſe with a heauie cheare, came and kneeled downe by him, where finding he could do no more then the Shepheards had for his recouerie, the conſtancie of his minde, ſurpriſed before he might call together his best rules, could not refraine such like words. Ah deare maister, said hee, what change it hath pleased the Almighty Iustice to worke in this place! How soone (not to your losse, who hauing liued long to nature, & to time longer by your well deserued glorie, but longest of all in the eternall mansion you now possesse.) But how soone I say to our ruine, haue you left the fraile barke of your estate? O that the words I in most faithfull dutie deliuered vnto you, when you first entred this solitarie course, might haue wrought as much perswasion in you, as they sprang from truth in me perchaunce your seruant, Philanax should not now haue cause in your losse, to bewaile his owne ouerthrow. And therewith taking himselfe; and indeed euill fitteth it me (said he) to let go my heart to womannish complaints, since my Prince being vndoubtedly well, it rather shewes loue of my selfe, which makes me bewaile mine owne losse. No, the true loue must bee proued in the honour of your memorie, and that must be shewed with seeking iust reuenge vpon your vniust and vnnaturall enemies, and farre more honorable it will be for your Tombe, to haue the blood of your murtherers sprinkled vpon it, then the teares of your friends. And if your soule looke downe vpon this miserable earth, I doubt not it had much rather your death were accompanied with well deserued punishment of the causers of it, then with the heaping on it more sorowes with the end of them, to whom you vouchsafed your affection, let them lament that haue wouen the web of lamentation; let their owne deathes make them crie out for your death, that were the authors of it. Therewith carying manfull sorow and vindicatiue resolution in his face, he rose vp, so looking on the poore guiltlesse Princesse transported with an vniust iustice, that his eyes were sufficient Heraulds for him, to denounce a mortall hatred. She (whom furies of loue, firebrands of her conscience, shame of the world, with the miserable losse of her husband, towards whom now the disdaine of her selfe bred more loue; with the remembrance of her vision, wherewith she resolued assuredly the Gods had appointed that shameful end to be her resting place, had set her mind to no other way but to death) vsed such like speeches to Philanax, as shee had before to the shepheards; willing him not to looke vpon her as a woman, but a monster; not as a Princesse, but a traitor to his Prince; not as Basilius wife, but as Basilius murtherer. She told him how the world required at his hands, the iust demonstration of his friendship, if he now forgot his Prince, he should shew he had neuer loued but his fortune: like those vermine that sucke of the liuing bloud, and leaue the bodie assoone as it is dead, poore Princesse needlesly seeking to kindle him, who did most deadlie detest her, which he vttered in this bitter answere. Madame (said he) you do well to hate your selfe, for you cannot hate a worse creature; and though we feele enough your hellish dispositon, yet we need not doubt you are of counsell to your self of much worse then we know. But now feare not, you shall not long be cumbred with being guided by so euill a soule, therefore prepare your selfe that if it be possible you may deliuer vp your spirit so much purer, as you more wash your wickednesse with repentance. Then hauing presently giuen order for the bringing from Mantinea, a great number of tents, for the rece it of the principall Arcadians: the maner of that countrie being, that where the Prince died, there should be orders taken for the countries gouernment, & in the place any murther was committed, the iudgement shold be giuen there, before the bodie was buried, both concurring in this matter, and alreadie great part of the Nobility being ariued, he deliuered the Princesse to a Gentlemā of great trust, and as for Dametas taking from him the keyes of both the Lodges, calling him the moth of his Princes estate, & onely spot of his iudgement, he caused him with his wife and daughter, to be fettered vp in as manie chaines and clogs, as they could beare, and euerie third houre to be cruellie whipt, till the determinate iudgement shold be giuē of all these matters. That done, hauing sent already at his comming, to all the quarters of the countrie to seeke Pamela, although with small hope of ouertaking them, he himselfe went well accompanied to the Lodge where the two vnfortunate Louers were attending a cruell conclusion of their long, painfull, and late most painfull affection. Dametas clowniſh eyes, hauing bene the only discouerers of Pyrocles stratagem, had no sooner taken a full view of thē (which in some sights would rather haue bred any thing, then an accusing mind) and locked the doore vpon these two young folkes, now made prisoners for loue, as before they had bene prisoners to loue; but that immediatly vpon his going downe (whether with noise Dametas made, or with the creeping in of the light, or rather that as extreme griefe had procured his sleepe, so extreame care had measured his sleep, giuing his sences a very early saliue to come to thēselues) Pyrocles awaked; and being vp, the first euill hansell he had of the ill case wherein he was, was the seeing himselfe depriued of his sword, from which he had neuer separated himselfe in any occasion, and euen that night first by the kings bed, and then there had laid it, as hee thought safe: putting great part of the trust of his well doing in his owne courage so armed. For indeed the confidence in ones selfe is the chiefe nurse of magnanimitie, which confidence notwithstanding doth not leaue the care of necessarie furnitures for it: and therefore of all the Grecians Homer doth euer make Achilles the best armed. But that, as I say, was the first ill token: but by and by he perceiued he was a prisoner before anie arrest, for the dore which he had left open, was made so fast of the outside, that for all the force he could employ vnto it, he could not vndo Dametas doing; then went he to the windowes, to see if that way there were any escape for him and his deare Ladie, but as vaine he found all his employment there, not hauing might to breake out but only one barre; wherein notwithstanding he strained his sinewes to the vttermost. And that he rather tooke out to vse for other seruice, then for any possibilitie he had to escape; for euen then it was that Dametas hauing gathered together the first comming shepheards, did blabber out what he had found in the Lady Philocleas chamber. Pyrocles markingly hearkened to all that Dametas said, whose voice and mind acquaintance had taught him sufficiently to know. But when he assuredly perceiued that his being with the Ladie Philoclea was fullie discouered; & by the folly or malice, or rather malicious folly of Dametas her honour therein touched in the highest degree; remēbring withall the cruelty of the Arcadian lawes, which without exception did condemne all to death, who were found (as Dametas reported of them) in act of mariage without solemnitie of mariage; assuring himselfe besides the law, the king and the Queene would vse so much more hate against their daughter, as they had found themselues sotted by him in the pursute of their loue. Lastly, seeing they were not only in the way of death, but fitly incaged for death, looking with a hartie griefe vpon the honour of loue, the fellowlesse Philoclea (whose innocent soule now enioying his owne goodnesse did little know the danger of his euer faire then sleeping harbor) his excellent wit strengthened with vertue, but guided by loue, had soone described to himselfe a perfect vision of their present condition, wherin hauing presently cast a resolute reckening of his owne part of the miserie, not only the chiefe but sole burthen of his anguish cōsisted in the vnworthy case, which was like to fall vpō the best deseruing Philoclea.

He

He saw the misfortune not the mismeaning of his work, was like to bring that creature to end, in whom the world (as he thought) did begin to receiue honour; he saw the weake iudgement of man, would condemne that as death-deseruing vice in her, which had in troth neuer broken the bonds of a true liuing vertue, & how often his eye turned to his attractiue adamant, so often did an vnspeakeable horrour strike his noble heart to consider so vnripe yeares, so faultlesse a beautie, the mansion of so pure goodnesse, should haue her youth so vntimely cut off, her naturall perfections vnnaturally cõsumed, her vertue rewarded with shame; sometimes he would accuse himself of negligence, that had not more curiously looked to all the house entries, & yet could he not imagine the way Dametas was gotten in, and to call backe what might haue bin to a man of wisdõ & courage, caries but a vain shadow of discourse; somtimes he could not chuse but with a dissolution of his inward might lamentably consider with what face he might looke vpon his (till then) ioy Philoclea, when the next light waking shold deliuer vnto her, shold perchãce be the last of her hurtlesse life. And that the first time she should bend her excellent eyes vpon him, she should see the accursed author of her dreadful end; & euen this consideration more thẽ any other, did so set it selfe in his well disposed mind, that dispersing his thoughts to all the wayes that might be of her safety, finding a very small discourse in so narrow limits of time & place, at lẽgth in many difficulties he saw none beare any likelihood for her life, but his death. For then he thought it wold fal out, that when they found his bodie dead, hauing no accuser but Dametas, as by his speech he found there was not, it might iustly appeare that either Philoclea in defending her honour, or else he himself in despaire of atchieuing, had left his carcasse proof of his intent, but witnes of her clearnesse, hauing a small while stayed vpõ the greatnesse of his resolution & looked to the furthest of it: Be it so (said the valiãt Pyrocles:) neuer life for better cause, nor to better end was bestowed, for if death be to follow this doing, which no death of mine could make me leaue vndone, who is to die so iustly as my self? and if I must die, who can be so fit executioners as mine owne hands? which as they were accessaries to the doing, so in killing me they shall suffer their owne punishment. But then arose there a new impediment, for Dametas hauing caried away any thing, which he thought might hurt as tender a man as himselfe, he could find no fit instrument which might giue him a finall dispatch, at length making the more haste, least his Lady should awake, taking the yron barre, (which being sharper something at the one end then the other, he hoped ioyn'd to his willing strength, might breake off the feeble threed of mortallitie: truly (said he) fortune thou hast well perseuered mine enemy, that will graunt me no fortune, to be vnfortunate, nor let me haue an easy passage now I am to trouble thee no more. But, said he, ô bar blessed in that thou hast done seruice to the chamber of the paragon of life, since thou couldest not help me to make a perfecter escape, yet serue my turne I pray thee, that I may escape frõ my selfe, therwithall yet once looking to fetch the last repast of his eyes, and new againe transported with the pitifull case he left her in, kneeling downe he thus prayed. O great maker and great ruler of this world (said he) to thee do I sacrifice this bloud of mine, and suffer (Lord) the errours of my youth, to passe away therin, and let not the soule by thee made, and euer bending vnto thee, be now reiected of thee, neither be offended that I do abandon this body, to the gouernment of which thou hadst placed me, without thy leaue, since how can I know but that thy vnsearchable mind is, I should so do, since thou hast taken from me all meanes longer to abide in it? And since the difference stands but in a short time of dying, thou that hast framed my ſoule inclined to do good, how can I in this ſmall ſpace of mine, benefite ſo much all the humane kind, as in preſeruing thy perfecteſt workmāſhip, their chiefeſt honour? O iuſtice it ſelfe, howſoeuer thou determineſt of me, let this excellent innocencie not be oppreſſed! Let my life pay her loſſe, ô Lord giue me ſome ſigne that I may die with this comfort. (And pawſing a litle as if he had hoped for ſome token) and whenſoeuer to the eternall darkneſſe of the earth ſhe doth follow me, let our ſpirits poſſeſſe one place, and let them be more happie in that vniting. With that word ſtriking the barre vpon his heart ſide with all the force he had, and falling withall vpon to giue it the thorower paſſage, the barre in troth was too blunt to do the effect, although it pierced his skinne, and bruiſed his ribs verie ſore, ſo that his breath was almoſt paſt him. But the noiſe of his fall draue away ſleepe from the quiet ſences of the deare Philoclea, whoſe ſweet ſoule had an early ſalutation of a deadly ſpectacle vnto her, with ſo much more aſtoniſhment, as the falling aſleepe but a little before ſhe had retired her ſelfe from the vttermoſt point of wofulneſſe, & ſaw now againe before her eyes the moſt cruell enterpriſe that humane nature can vndertake, without diſcerning any cauſe therof. But the liuely print of her affection had ſoone taught her not to ſtay long vpon deliberation in ſo vrgent a neceſſitie, therefore getting with ſpeed her weake, though well accorded limmes out of her ſweetned bed, as when Iuels are haſtilie pulled out of ſome rich coffer, ſhee ſpared not the nakedneſſe of her tender feet, but I thinke borne as faſt with deſire as feare caried Daphne, ſhe came running to Pyrocles, and finding his ſpirits ſomthing troubled with the fall; ſhe put by the barre that lay cloſe to him, and ſtraining him in her moſt beloued embracement, My cōfort, my ioy, my life (ſaid ſhe) what haſte haue you to kill your Philoclea with the moſt cruell tormēt that euer Lady ſuffered? Do you not yet perſwade your ſelfe that any hurt of yo' s is a death vnto me? And that your death ſhould be my hell? Alas, if any ſodaine miſlike of mee (for other cauſe I ſee none) haue cauſed you to loath your ſelfe, if any fault or defect of mine hath bred this terribleſt rage in you, rather let me ſuffer the bitterneſſe of it, for ſo ſhall the deſeruer be puniſhed, mankind preſerued from ſuch a ruine, and I for my part ſhall haue that comfort, that I die by the nobleſt hand that euer drew ſword. Pyrocles grieued with his fortune, that he had not in one inſtant cut off all ſuch deliberation, thinking his life only reſerued to be bound to be the vnhappie newes-teller: Alas (ſaid he) my only ſtarre, why do you this wrong to God, your ſelfe, and me, to ſpeake of faults in you; no, no, moſt faultleſſe, moſt perfect Ladie, it is your excellencie that makes me haſten my deſired end, it is the right I owe to the generall nature (that though againſt priuate nature) makes mee ſeeke the preſeruation of all that ſhe hath done in this age, let me, let me die. There is no way to ſaue your life (moſt worthy to be cōſerued) then that my death be your clearing, then did he with far more paine and backward loathneſſe, then the ſo neare killing himſelfe was (but yet driuen with neceſſitie to make her yeeld, to that he thought was her ſafety) make her a ſhort, but pithie diſcourſe, what he had heard by Damcetas ſpeeches, cōfirming the reſt with a plaine demōſtration of their impriſonment. And thē ſought he new means of ſtopping his breath; but that by Philocleas labor, aboue her force, he was ſtayed to heare her. In whom a man might perceiue what ſmal difference in the working there is, betwixt a ſimple voidneſſe of euill, & a iudiciall habite of vertue. For ſhe, not with an vnſhaked magnanimity, wherwith Pyrocles wayed and deſpiſed death, but with an innocent guiltleſneſſe, not knowing why ſhe ſhold feare to deliuer her vnſtained ſoule to God, helped with the true louing of Pyrocles, which made made her thinke no life without him, did almoſt bring her minde to as quiet attending al accidents, as the vnmaſtred vertue of Pyrocles. Yet hauing with a prety paleneſſe (which did leaue milken lines vpon her roſie cheekes) paid a litle duty to humane feare, taking the Prince by the hand, and kiſſing the wound he had giuen himſelfe; O the only life of my life, and (if it fall out ſo) the comfort of my death, ſaid ſhe, farre, farre from you, be the doing me ſuch wrong, as to thinke I will receiue my life as a purchaſe of your death, but well may you make my death ſo much more miſerable, as it ſhall any thing be delaied after my onely felicitie. Doe you thinke I can accompt of the moment of death, like the vnſpeakeable afflictions my ſoule ſhould ſuffer, ſo oft as I call Pyrocles to my minde, which ſhould be as oft as I breathed? Should theſe eyes guide my ſteps, that had ſeene your murder? ſhould theſe hands feed me that had not hindred ſuch a miſchiefe? Should this heart remaine within me, at euery pant to count the cõtinuall clock of my miſeries? O no, if die we muſt, let vs thanke death, he hath not deuided ſo true an vnion! And truly my Pyrocles, I haue heard my father, and other wiſe men ſay, that the killing ones ſelfe is but a falſe colour of true courage, proceeding rather of a feare of a further euil, either of torment or ſhame. For if it were a not reſpecting the harme, that would likewiſe make him not reſpect what might be done vnto him: and hope, being of all other, the moſt contrary thing to feare: this being an vtter baniſhment of hope, it ſeemes to receiue his ground in feare. Whatſoeuer (would they ſay) comes out of diſpaire, cannot beare the title of valure, which ſhould be lifted vp to ſuch a height, that holding al things vnder it ſelfe, it ſhould be able to maintaine his greatneſſe euen in the midſt of miſeries. Laſtly they would ſaie, God had appointed vs Captaines of theſe our bodily forts, which without treaſon to that Maieſty, were neuer to be deliuered ouer till they were redemaunded. Pyrocles, who had that for a lawe vnto him, not to leaue Philoclea in any thing vnſatisfied, although he ſtil remained in his former purpoſe, and knew that time would grow ſhort for it, yet hearing no noiſe (the ſhepheardes being as then run to Baſilius) with ſetled and humbled countenance, as a man that ſhould haue ſpoken of a thing that did not cõcerne himſelfe, bearing euẽ in his eyes ſufficient ſhewes, that it was nothing but Philocleas danger, which did any thing burthen his heart, farre ſtronger then fortune, hauing with vehement embracings of her, got yet ſome fruit of his delayed end, he thus aunſwered the wiſe innocencie of Philoclea. Lady moſt worthie not only of life, but to be the very life of all things the more notable demonſtrations you make of the loue, ſo farre beyond my deſert, with which it pleaſeth you to ouercome fortune, in making me happie; the more am I euen in courſe of humanitie (to leaue that loues force, which I neither can nor will leaue) bound to ſeeke requitals witneſſe, that I am not vngrateful to do which the infiniteneſſe of your goodneſſe being ſuch as it cãnot reach vnto it, yet doing al I can, & paying my life, which is all I haue, though it be farre (without meſure) ſhort of your deſert, yet ſhal I not dye in debt, to mine own dutie. And truly the more excellent arguments you made, to keepe me from this paſſage, imagined far more terrible then it is; the more plainly it makes me ſee what reaſon I haue, to preuent the loſſe not only of Arcadia, but all the face of the earth ſhould receiue, if ſuch a tree (which euen in his firſt ſpring, doth not onely beare moſt beautifull bloſſoms, but moſt rare fruits) ſhould be ſo vntimely cut off. Therfore, ô moſt truely beloued Lady, to whom I deſire for both our goods, that theſe may be my laſt words, geue me your conſent euen out of that wiſedome which muſt needs ſee, that (beſides your vnmatched betterneſſe, which perchaunce you will not ſee) it is fitter one die then both. And since you haue sufficiently shewed you loue me, let me claime by that loue, you wil be content rather to let me die contentedly, then wretchedly: rather with a cleare & ioyful conscience, then with desperate condemnation in my selfe, that I accursed villaine, should be the meane of banishing from the sight of men the true example of vertue. And becaus there is nothing left me to be imagined, which I so much desire, as that the memory of Pyrocles may euer haue an allowed place in your wise iudgement, I am content to draw so much breath longer, as by answering the sweete obiections you alledged, may bequeath (as I thinke) a right conceite vnto you, that this my doing is out of iudgement, and not sprong of passion. Your father you say, was wont to say, that this like action doth more proceed of feare of further euil or shame, then of a true courage: Truly first, they put a very gessing case, speaking of them who can euer after come to tel, with what mind they did it. And as for my part, I call the immortall truth to witnesse, that no feare of torment can apall me: who know it is but diuerse manners of apparelling death: & haue long learned, to set bodily paine but in the second forme of my being. And as for shame, how can I be ashamed of that, for which my wel meaning conscience wil answere for me to God, and your vnresistable beautie to the world? But to take that argument in his owne force, and graunt it done for auoiding of further paine or dishonor, (for as for the name of feare, it is but an odious title of a passion, giuen to that which true iudgement performeth) graunt, I say, it is, to shunne a worse case. & truly I do not see, but that true fortitude, loking into al humaine things with a persisting resolution, carried away neither with wonder of pleasing things, nor astonishment of the vnpleasant, doth not yet depriue it selfe of the discerning the difference of euil, but rather is the only vertue, which with an assured tranquilitie shunnes the greater by the valiant entring into the lesse. Thus for his countries saftie he wil spend his life, for the sauing of a lim, he wil not niggardly spare his goods; for the sauing of all his bodie, he wil not spare the cutting of a limme, where indeed the weake harted man wil rather die, then see the face of a surgeon: who might with as good reason say, that the constant man abides the painfull surgery, for feare of a further euill: but he is content to waite for death it selfe, but neither is true; for neither hath the one any feare, but a well chooSing iudgement; nor the other hath any contentment, but onely feare; and not hauing a heart actiuely to performe a matter of paine, is forced passiuely to abide a greater damage. For to do, requires a whole hart; to suffer falleth easilieSt in the broken minds. And if in bodily torment thus, much more in shame; wherein since valure is a vertue, and vertue is euer limited, we must not runne so infinitely, as to thinke the valiant man is willingly to suffer any thing, since the verie suffering of some things is a certaine proofe of want of courage. And if any thing vnwillingly among the chiefest may shame go: for if honour be to be held deere, his contrarie is to be abhorred, and that not for feare, but of a true election. For which is the lesse inconuenient, either the losse of some yeares more or lesse (for once we know our liues be not immortall) or the submitting our selues to each vnworthie miserie, which the fooliSh world may lay vpō vs? As for their reason, that feare is contrarie to hope, neither do I defend feare, nor much yeeld to the authoritie of hope; to either of which great inclyning shewes but a feeble reason, which must be guided by his seruants; and who builds not vpon hope, shall feare no earthquake of despaire. Their last alleaging of the heauenly powers, as it beares the greatest name, so it is the onely thing, that at all bred any combate in my minde. And yet I do not see, but that if God hath made vs

maisters of any thing, it is of our owne liues; out of which without doing wrong to any bodie, we are to issue at our owne pleasure. And the same argument would asmuch preuaile to say we should for no necessitie lay away from vs, any of our ioynts, since they being made of him, without his warrant we should not depart from them; or if that may be, for a greater cause we may passe to a greater degree. And if we be Lieutenants of God, in this little Castle, do you not thinke we must take warning of him to giue ouer our charge when he leaues vs vnprouided of good meanes to tarrie in it? No certainly do I not, answered the sorowfull Philoclea, since it is not for vs to appoint that mightie Maiestie, what time he will help vs: the vttermost instant is scope enough for him, to reuoke euery thing to ones owne desire. And therefore to preiudicate his determination, is but a doubt of goodnesse in him, who is nothing but goodnesse. But when in deede he doth either by sickenesse, or outward force lay death vpon vs, then are we to take knowledge that such is his pleasure, and to know that all is well that he doth. That we should be maisters of our selues, we can shew at all no title, nor claime; since neither we made our selues, nor bought our selues, we can stand vpon no other right but his gift, which he must limite as it pleaseth him. Neither is there any proportion betwixt the losse of any other limme and that, since the one bends to the preseruing all, the other to the destruction of all; the one takes not away the minde from the actions for which it is placed in the world, the other cuts off all possibilitie of his working. And truely my most deare Pyrocles, I must needes protest vnto you, that I cannot thinke your defence euen in rules of vertue sufficient. Sufficient and excellent it were, if the question were of two outward things, wherein a man might by natures freedome determine, whether he would preferre shame to paine; present smaller torment, to greater following, or no. But to this (besides the comparison of the matters valures) there is added of the one part a direct euill doing, which maketh the ballance of that side too much vnequall: since a vertuous man without any respect, whether the griefe be lesse or more, is neuer to do that which he can not assure himselfe is allowable before the euerliuing rightfulnesse; but rather is to thinke honours or shames, which stand in other mens true or false iudgements, paines or not paines, which yet neuer approach our soules, to be nothing in regard of an vnspotted conscience. And these reasons do I remember, I haue heard good men bring in, that since it hath not his ground in an assured vertue, it proceedes rather of some other disguised passion. Pyrocles was not so much perswaded as delighted, by her well conceiued and sweetely pronounced speeches; but when she had cloased her pittifull discourse, and as it were sealed vp her delightfull lippes, with the moistnesse of her teares, which followed still one another like a precious rope of pearle, now thinking it hye time. Be it as you say (saide he most vertuous beautie) in all the rest, but neuer can God himselfe perswade me, that Pyrocles life is not well lost, for to preserue the most admirable Philoclea. Let that be if it be possible written on my Tombe, and I will not enuye Codrus honour. With that he would againe haue vsed the barre, meaning if that failed, to leaue his braines vpon the wall. When Philoclea now brought to that she most feared, kneeled downe vnto him, and embracing so his legges, that without hurting her, (which for nothing he would haue done) he could not ridde himselfe from her, shee did with all the coniuring words, which the authoritie of loue may lay, beseech him, he would not now so cruelly abandon her, he would not leaue her comfortlesse in that miserie, to which he had brought her. That then in deede she would euen in her soule accuse him, to haue most fouly betrayed her; that then she should haue cause to curse the time that euer the name of Pyrocles came to her eares, which otherwise no death could make her do. Will you leaue me, said she, not onely dishonoured as supposed vnchaste with you, but as a murderer of you? Will you giue mine eyes such a picture of hell, before my neere approaching death, as to see the murdred Bodie of him I loue more then all the liues that nature can giue? With that she sware by the hyest cause of all deuotions, that if he did perseuere in that cruell resolution, she would (though vntruly) not onely confesse to her father, that with her cõsent this acte had bene committed, but if that would not serue (after she had puld out her owne eyes, made accursed by such a sight) she would giue her selfe so terrible a death, as she might thinke the paine of it would counteruaile the neuer dying paine of her mind. Now therefore kill your selfe, to crowne this vertuous action with infamy: kill your selfe to make me (whom you say you loue) as long as I after liue, change my louing admiration of you, to a detestable abhorring your name. And so indeed you shall haue the ende you shoote at, for in steede of one death, you shall giue me a thousand, and yet in the meane time, depriue me of the helpe God may send me. Pyrocles euen ouerwayed with her so wisely vttered affection, finding her determination so fixed, that his ende should but depriue them both of a present contentment, and not auoide a comming euill (as a man that ranne not vnto it, by a sodaine qualme of passion, but by a true vse of reason, preferring her life to his owne) nowe that wisdome did manifest vnto him, that waye would not preuaile, he retired himselfe, with as much tranquilitie from it, as before he had gone vnto it. Like a man, that had set the keeping or leauing of the bodie, as a thing without himselfe, and so had thereof a freed and vntroubled consideration. Therefore throwing away the barre from him, and taking her vp from the place, where he thought the consummating of all beauties, verie vnworthily lay, suffering all his sences to deuoure vp their chiefest foode, which he assured himselfe they should shortly after for euer be depriued of: well, said he, most deere Ladie, whose contentment I preferre before mine owne, and iudgement esteeme more then mine owne, I yeeld vnto your pleasure. The gods send you haue not wonne your owne losse. For my part they are my witnesses, that I thinke I do more at your commaundement, in delaying my death, then another would in bestowing his life. But now, said he, as thus farre I haue yeelded vnto you, so graunt me in recompence thus much againe, that I may finde your loue in graunting, as you haue found your authoritie in obtaining. My humble suite is, you will say I came in by force into your Chamber, for so am I resolued now to affirme, and that will be the best for vs both; but in no case name my name, that whatsoeuer come of me, my house be not dishonored. Philoclea fearing least refusall would turne him backe againe, to his violent refuge, gaue him a certaine countenance, that might shew she did yeeld to his request, the latter part whereof indeed she meant for his sake to performe. Neither could they spend more words together, for Philanax, with twentie of the noblest personages of Arcadia after him, were come into the Lodge, Philanax making the rest stay below, for the reuerence he bare to womanhood, as stillie as he could came to the dore, and opening it, drew the eyes of these two dolefull louers vpon him. Philoclea closing againe for modestie sake, within her bed the riches of her beauties, but Pyrocles tooke hold of his barre, minding at least to dye, before the excellent Philoclea should receiue any outrage. But Philanax rested awhile awhile vpon himselfe, striken with admiration at the goodly shape of Pyrocles, whom before he had neuer seene, and withall remembring besides others the notable act he had done (when with his courage and eloquence, he had saued Basilius, perchaunce the whole state from vtter ruine) he felt a kind of relenting minde towards him. But when that same thought came waited on with the remembrance of his maisters death, which he by al probabilities, thought he had bin of Counsell vnto with the Queene, compassion turned to hatefull passion, and left in Philanax a strange medley, betwixt pitie and reuenge, betwixt lyking and abhorring. O Lord, said he to himselfe, what wonders doth nature in our time, to set wickednesse so beautifully garnished? and that which is strangest, out of one spring to make wonderfull effectes both of vertue and vice to issue? Pyrocles seeing him in such a muse, neither knowing the man, nor the cause of his comming, but assuring himselfe, it was for no good, yet thought best to begin with him in this sort. Gentleman said he, what is the cause of your comming to my Lady *Philoclea*s chamber? is it to defend her from such violence, as I might goe about to offer vnto her? if it be so, truly your comming is vaine, for her owne vertue hath bene a sufficient resistaunce, there needes no strength to be added to so inuiolate chastitie, the excellencie of her mind makes her bodie impregnable. Which for mine own part I had soone yeelded to confesse, with going out of this place (where I found but little comfort being so disdainfully receiued) had I not bene, I know not by whom presently vpon my cõming hither, so locked into this chamber, that I could neuer escape hence: where I was fettred in the most guilty shame, that euer man was, seeing what a paradice of vnspotted goodnesse, my filthy thoughts sought to defile. If for that therfore you come, already I assure you your errand is performed; but if it be to bring me to any punishmẽt whatsoeuer, for hauing vndertaken so vnexcusable presumption. Truly I bear such an accuser about me of mine own cõscieẽce, that I willingly submit my self vnto it. Only this much let me demand of you, that you wil be a witnes vnto the king what you heare me say, & oppose your selfe, that neither his sodaine fury, nor any other occasion may offer any hurt to this Lady; in whom you see nature hath accomplished so much, that I am faine to lay mine owne faultinesse, as a foile of her purest excellency. I can say no more, but looke vpon her beauty, remember her bloud, consider her yeares, and iudge rightly of her vertues, and I doubt not a gentlemans mind, will then be a sufficient instructer vnto you, in this I may tearme it miserable chaunce, happened vnto her by my vnbridled audacitie. Philanax was content to heare him out, not for any fauour he owed him, but to see whether he would reueale any thing of the originall cause, and purpose of the kings death. But finding it so far from that, that he named Basilius vnto him, as supposing him aliue, thinking it rather cunning then ignorance: Yong man, said he, whom I haue cause to hate, before I haue meane to know, you vse but a point of skill, by confessing the manifest smaller fault, to be beleeued hereafter in the deniall of the greater. But for that matter, all passeth to one end, & hereafter we shal haue leasure by torments to seeke the truth, if the loue of truth it selfe will not bring you vnto it. As for my Lady Philoclea, if it so fal out as you say, it shal be the more fit for her years, & comely for the great house she is come of, that an ill gouerned beautie hath not cancelled the rules of vertue. But howsoeuer it be, it is not for you to teach an Arcadian, what reuerent duty we owe vnto any of that progeny. But, said he, come you with me without resistance, for the one cannot auaile, and the other may procure pitie. Pitie? said Pyrocles, with a bitter smiling, disdained with so curriish an answere: no, no, Arcadian, I can quickly haue pitie of my ſelfe, and I would thinke my life moſt miſerable, which ſhould be a gift of thine. Only I demaund this innocent Ladies ſecuritie, which vntill thou haſt confirmed vnto me by an oath, aſſure thy ſelf, the firſt that layes hands vpon her ſhall leaue his life, for a teſtimony of his ſacriledge. Philanax with an inward ſcorne thinking it moſt manifeſt they were both, he at leaſt, of counſel with the kings death, Wel, ſaid he, you ſpeake much to me of the king: I do here ſweare vnto you, by the loue I haue euer borne him, ſhe ſhall haue no worſe, howſoeuer it fal out, then her owne parents. And vpō that word of yours I yeeld ſaid the poore Pyrocles, deceiued by him that ment not to deceiue him, Then did Philanax deliuer him into the hands of a noble man in the cōpany, euery one deſirous to haue him in his charge, ſo much did his goodly preſēce (wherin true valure ſhined) breed a delightfull admiration in all the beholders. Philanax himſelfe ſtayed with Philoclea, to ſee whether of her he might learne ſome deſcloſing of this former concluſion. But ſhe ſweet Lady whome firſt a kindly ſhamfaſtneſſe had ſeparated from Pyrocles, (hauing bene left in a more open view then her modeſty would well beare) then the attending her fathers cōming, & ſtudying how to behaue her ſelf towards him for both their ſafeties, had called her ſpirits all within her: now that vpon a ſodaine Pyrocles was deliuered out of the chamber from her, at the firſt ſhe was ſo ſurprized with the extreame ſtroke of the wofull ſight, that like thoſe that in their dreames are taken with ſome vgly viſion, they would faine cry for help, but haue no force, ſo remained ſhe a while quite depriued not only of ſpeech, but almoſt of any other liuely actiō. But whē indeed Pyrocles was quite drawn frō her eyes, & that her vitall ſtrēgth begā to return vnto her, now not knowing what they did to Pyrocles, but according to the nature of loue) fearing the worſt, wringing her hands, & letting abundance of teares be the firſt part of her eloquēce, bending her amber-crowned head ouer her bed ſide to the hard-harted Philanax: O Philanax, Philanax, ſaid ſhe, I know how much authoritie you haue with my father: there is no man whoſe wiſdō he ſo much eſteemes, nor whoſe faith ſo much he repoſeth vpon. Remember how oft you haue promiſed your ſeruice vnto me, how oft you haue giuen me occaſion to beleeue that there was no Lady in whoſe fauor you more deſired to remaine: and if the remembrance be not vnpleaſant to your mind, or the rehearſall vnfitting for my fortune, remember there was a time when I could deſerue it. Now my chaunce is turned, let not your truth turne. I preſent my ſelfe vnto you, the moſt humble and miſerable ſuppliant liuing, neither ſhall my deſire be great: I ſeeke for no more life then I ſhal be found worthy of. If my bloud may waſh away the diſhonor of Arcadia, ſpare it not, although through me it hath indeed neuer bene diſhonored. My only ſute is, you wil be a meane for me, that while I am ſuffered to enioy this life, I may not be ſeparated from him, to whom the Gods haue ioyned me, and that you determine nothing of him more cruelly then you do of me. If you rightly iudge of what hath paſt, wherein the Gods (that ſhould haue bene of our mariage) are witneſſes of our innocencies: then procure, we may liue together. But if my father will not ſo conceiue of vs, as the fault (if any were) was vnited, ſo let the puniſhment be vnited alſo. There was no man that euer loued either his Prince, or any thing pertaining to him with a truer zeale then Philanax did. This made him euen to the depth of his heart receiue a moſt vehemēt griefe, to ſee his maſter made as it were more miſerable after death. And for himſelfe, calling to mind in what ſort his life had bin preſerued by Philoclea, what time takē by Amphialus he was like to ſuffer a cruel death, there was nothing could haue kept him from falling to all tender pitie,

pitie, but the perfect perſwaſion he had, that all this was ioyned to the packe of his maiſters death, which the miſconceiued ſpeech of mariage made him the more beleeue. Therefore firſt muttering to himſelfe ſuch like words: The violence the gentleman ſpake of, is now turned to mariage: he alledged Mars, but ſhe ſpeakes of Venus. O vnfortunate maiſter. This hath bene that faire diuell Gynecia: ſent away one of her daughters, proſtituted the other, empoyſoned thee, to ouerthrow the diademe of Arcadia. But at length thus vnto her ſelfe he ſaid: If your father, Madame, were now to ſpeake vnto, truly there ſhould no body be found a more readie aduocate for you, then my ſelfe. For I would ſuffer this fault, though very great to be blotted out of my minde, by your former led life, your benefit towards my ſelfe, and being daughter to ſuch a father. But ſince among your ſelues you haue taken him away, in whom was the only power to haue mercie, you muſt now be clothed in your owne working: and looke for none other, then that which dead pitileſſe lawes may allot vnto you. For my part, I loued you for your vertue, but now where is that? I loued you in reſpect of a priuate benefit, what is that in compariſon of the publike loſſe? I loued you for your father, vnhappy folks you haue robbed the world of him. Theſe words of her father were ſo little vnderſtood by the onely well vnderſtanding Philoclea, that ſhe deſired him to tell her, what he meant to ſpeake in ſuch darke ſort vnto her of her lord and father, whoſe diſpleaſure was more dreadful vnto her, then her puniſhment: that ſhee was free in her owne conſcience, ſhee had neuer deſerued euill of him, no not in this laſt fact: wherein if it pleaſed him to proceed with patience, he ſhould finde her choiſe had not bene vnfortunate. He that ſaw her words writtē in the plaine table of her faire face, thought it impoſſible there ſhould therein be contained deceit: and therfore ſo much the more abaſhed: Why, ſaid he, Madame, would you haue me thinke, you are not of conſpiracy with the Princeſſe Pamelas flight, and your fathers death? with that word the ſweet Lady gaue a pitifull cry, hauing ſtreight in her face & breaſt abundance of witneſſes, that her hart was far from any ſuch abhominable conſent. Ah of all ſides vtterly ruined Philoclea, ſaid ſhee, now in deed I may well ſuffer all conceit of hope to dye in me. Deare father, where was I, that might not do you my laſt ſeruice before ſoone after miſerably following you? Philanax perceiued the demonſtration ſo liuely & true in her, that he eaſily acquited her in his heart of that fact, and the more was moued to ioyne with her in moſt hartie lamentation. But remembring him, that the burthen of the ſtate, and puniſhment of his maſters murderers, lay all vpon him: Well, ſayd he, Madame, I can do nothing, without all the ſtates of Arcadia: what they will determine of you, I knowe not, for my part your ſpeeches would much preuaile with me, but that I find not how to excuſe your giuing ouer your body to him, that for the laſt proofe of his treaſon, lent his garments to diſguiſe your miſerable mother, in the moſt vile fact ſhe hath cōmitted. Hard ſure it will be to ſeparate your cauſes, with whom you haue ſo neerely ioyned your ſelfe. Neither do I deſire it, ſaid the ſweetly weeping Philoclea: whatſoeuer you determine of him, do that likewiſe to me; for I knowe, from the fountaine of vertue nothing but vertue could euer proceed; onely as you find him faultleſſe, let him find you fauorable, and build not my diſhonor vpō ſurmiſes. Philanax feeling his hart more & more mollifying vnto her, renewed the image of his dead maiſter in his fancy, & vſing that for the ſpurres of his reuēgefull choller, went ſuddēly, without any more ſpeech, from the deſolate Lady, to whom nowe fortune ſeemed to threaten vnripe death, and vndeſerued ſhame among her leaſt euils. But Philanax leauing good guard vpon the Lodge, went himselfe to see the order of his other prisoners, whom euen then as he issued, he found increased by this vnhoped meanes.

The noble Pamela hauing deliuered ouer the burthen of her fearfull cares to the naturall ease of a well refreshing sleepe, reposed both mind & bodie vpon the trusted support of her princely shepheard, when with the braying cries of a rascall cõpany she was robbed of her quiet, so that at one instãt she opened her eyes, & the enraged Musidorus rose from her, enraged betwixt the doubt he had what these men would go about, and the spite he conceiued against their ill-pleasing presẽce. But the clownes, hauing with their hideous noyse brought them both to their feet, had soone knowledge what guests they had found, for in deed these were the skummy remnant of those rebels, whose naughtie minds could not trust so much to the goodnesse of their Prince, as to lay their hangworthie necks vpon the constancy of his promised pardon. Therefore when the rest (who as sheepe had but followed their fellowes) so sheepishly had submitted themselues, these only committed their safetie to the thickest part of those desert woods, who as they were in the constitution of their mindes little better then beasts, so were they apt to degenerate to a beastly kind of life, hauing now framed their gluttonish stomacks to haue for food the wilde benefites of nature, the vttermost end they had, being but to draw out (as much as they could) the line of a tedious life. In this sort vagabonding in those vntroden places, they were guided by the euerlasting Iustice, vsing themselues to be punishers of their faults, and making their owne actions the beginning of their chastizements, (vnhappily both for him and themselues) to light on Musidorus. Whom as soone as they saw turned towards them, they full well remembred it was he, that accompanied with Basilius, had come to the succour of Zelmane: and had left among some of them bloudie tokens of his valour. As for Pamela, they had many times seene her. Thus first sturred vp with a rusticall reuenge against him, and then desire of spoyle, to help their miserable wants, but chiefly thinking it was the way to confirme their owne pardon, to bring the Princesse backe vnto her father (whom they were sure he would neuer haue sent so farre so sleightly accompanied) without any other denouncing of warre, set altogether vpon the worthie Musidorus. Who being before hand almuch enflamed against them, gaue them so braue a welcome, that the smart of some made the rest stand further off, crying and prating against him, but like bad curres, rather barking then cloasing; he in the meane time placing his trembling Lady to one of the Pyne trees, and so setting himselfe before her, as might shewe the cause of his courage grew in himselfe, but the effect was onely employed in her defence. The villaines that now had a second proofe, how ill wards they had for such a sword, turned al the course of their violẽce into throwing darts and stones, in deede the only way to ouermaister the valour of Musidorus. Who finding them some alreadie touch, some fall so neere his chiefest life Pamela, that in the end some one or other might hap to do an vnsuccourable mischiefe, setting all his hope in dispaire, ran out from his Lady among them. Who streight like so many swine, when a hardie mastife sets vpon them, dispersed themselues. But the first he ouertooke, as he ran away, carying his head as farre before him, as those maner of runnings are wont to doe, with one blowe strake it so cleane off, that it falling betwixt the hands, and the body falling vpon it, it made a shew as though the fellow had had great haste to gather vp his head againe. Another the speed he made to runne for the best game, bare him ful butt against a tree, so that tumbling backe with a brused face, and a dreadfull expectation, Musidorus was straight vpon him: & parting with his sword one of his legs from him, left him to make a roring lamētation that his morter-treading was marred for euer. A third finding his feet too slowe, aswell as his hands too weake, sodainly turned backe, beginning to open his lippes for mercie. But before he had well entred a rudely compiled oration, Musidorus blade was come betweene his iawes into his throat, and so the poore man rested there for euer with a verie euill mouth full of an answer. Musidorus in this furious chase would haue followed some other of these hatefull wretches, but that he heard his Lady crie for helpe, whom three of this villanous crue, had (whiles Musidorus followed their fellowes) compassing about some trees, sodainely come vpon and surprised, threatning to kill her if she cried, and meaning to conuey her out of sight, while the Prince was making his bloud-thirstie chase. But she that was resolued, no worse thing could fall vnto her, then the being depriued of him, on whom she had established all her comfort, with a pitifull cry fetched his eyes vnto her: who then thinking so many weapons thrust into his eyes, as with his eyes he sawe bent against her, made all hartie speed to her succour. But one of them wiser then his companions, set his dagger to her Alablaster throat, swearing if he threw not away his sword, he would presently kill her. There was neuer poore scholler, that hauing in steed of his booke some playing toy about him, did more sodainely cast it from him, at the child-feared presence of a cruell Schoolmaister, then the valiant Musidorus discharged himselfe of his onely defence, when he saw it stood vpō the instant point of his Ladies life. And holding vp his noble hands to so vnworthy audience, O Arcadians, it is I that haue done you the wrōg, she is your Princesse (said he) she neuer had will to hurt you, and you see she hath no power. Vse your choller vpō me that haue better deserued it, do not your selues the wrong to do her any hurt, which in no time or place will euer be forgiuen you. They that yet trusted not to his curtesie, bad him stand further off from his sword, which he obediently did. So farre was loue aboue all other thoughts in him. Then did they call together the rest of their fellowes, who though they were few, yet according to their number possessed many places. And then began these sauage Senators to make a consultation, what they shold do: some wishing to spoile them of their iewels and let them go on their iourney (for that if they caried them backe, they were sure they should haue least part of their pray) others preferring their old homes to any thing, desired to bring them to Basilius as pledges of their surety: and there wanted not which cried the safest way was to kill thē both; to such an vnworthy thraldome were these great and excellēt personages brought. But the most part resisted to the killing of the Princesse, fore-seeing their liues would neuer be safe after such a fact committed: and began to wish rather the spoile then death of Musidorus: when the villaine that had his leg cut off, came scrawling towards them, & being helped to them by one of the companie, began with a groning voice, and a disfigured face, to demaund the reuenge of his bloud, which since he had spent with them in their defence, it were no reason he should be suffered by them to die discontented. The only contentment he required was that by their helpe with his owne hands he might put his murtherer to some cruell death, he would faine haue cried more against Musidorus, but that the much losse of bloud helped on with this vehemencie, choked vp the spirits of his life, leauing him to make betwixt his body and soule an ill fauoured partition. But they seeing their fellow in that sort die before their faces, did swell in new mortall rages: All resolued to kill him, but now onely considering what maner of terrible death they should inuent for him. Thus was a while the agreement of his ſlaying, broken by diſagreement of the maner of it; and extremitie of cruelty grew for a time to be the ſtop of cruelty. At lēgth they were reſolued, euery one to haue a peece of him, & to become all aſwell hangmen, as iudges: when Pamela tearing her haire, and falling downe among them, ſometimes with all the ſort of humble prayers, mixt with promiſes of great good turnes (which they knew her ſtate was able to performe) ſometimes threatning them, that if they kild him and not her, ſhe would not only reuenge it vpon them, but vpon all their wiues and children: bidding them conſider that though they might think ſhe was come away in her fathers diſpleaſure, yet they might be ſure he would euer ſhew himſelfe a father, that the Gods would neuer if ſhe liued, put her in ſo baſe eſtate, but that ſhe ſhould haue abilitie to plague ſuch as they were, returning afreſh to prayers & promiſes, and mixing the ſame againe with threatnings, brought thē who were now growne colder in their fellowes cauſe, who was paſt aggrauating the matter, with his cries) to determine with themſelues there was no way, but eyther to kill them both or ſaue them both. As for the killing, alreadie they hauing anſwered themſelues that that was a way to make them Citizens of the woods for euer; they did in fine conclude they would returne them backe againe to the king, which they did not doubt, would be cauſe of a great reward, beſides their ſafetie from their fore-deſerued puniſhment. Thus hauing either by fortune, or the force of thoſe two lovers inward working vertue, ſetled their cruell hearts to this gentler courſe, they tooke the two horſes, and hauing ſet vpon thē their princely priſoners, they returned towards the lodge. The villaines hauing decked all their heads with lawrell branches, as thinking they had done a notable act, ſinging and ſhowting, ran by them, in hope to haue brought them the ſame day againe to the king. But the time was ſo farre ſpent, that they were forced to take vp that nights lodging in the middeſt of the woods. Where while the clownes continued their watch about thē, now that the night, according to his darke nature, did ad a kind of deſolation to the penſiue hearts of theſe two afflicted louers, Muſidorus taking the tender hand of Pamela, and bedeawing it with his tears, in this ſort gaue an iſſue to the ſwelling of his hearts griefe. Moſt excellent Lady ſaid he; in what caſe thinke you am I with my ſelfe, how vnmercifull iudgemēts do I lay vpon my ſoule, now that I know not what God hath ſo reuerſed my wel meaning enterpriſe, as in ſteed of doing you that honour which I hoped (& not without reaſon hoped) Theſſalia ſhold haue yeelded vnto you, am now like to become a wretched inſtrument of your diſcōfort? Alas how contrarie an end haue all the inclinations of my mind taken! my faith falles out a treaſon vnto you, and the true honour I beare you, is the field wherein your diſhonour is like to be ſowne! But I inuoke that vniuerſall and onlie wiſdome (which examining the depth of hearts, hath not his iudgement fixed vpon the euent) to beare teſtimonie with me that my deſire though in extreameſt vehemencie, yet did not ſo ouercharge my remēbrance, but that as far as mans wit might be extēded, I ſought to preuent all things that might fall to your hurt. But now that all the euil fortunes of euill fortune haue croſſed my beſt framed intēt, I am moſt miſerable in that, that I cannot only not giue you help, but which is worſt of all, am barred from giuing you counſell. For how ſhould I open my mouth to counſell you in that, wherein by my counſell you are moſt vndeſeruedly fallen? The faire & wiſe Pamela, although full of cares of the vnhappie turning of this matter, yet ſeeing the griefe of Muſidorus onlie ſtirred for her, did ſo tread downe all other motions with the true force of vertue, that ſhe thus anſwered him, hauing firſt kiſſed him, which before ſhe had

loue ſo commanding her, which doubted how long they ſhould enioy one another; or of a liuely ſparke of nobleneſſe, to deſcend in moſt fauour to one, when he is loweſt in affliction. My deare, and euer deare Muſidorus (ſaid ſhe) a greater wrong do you to your ſelf, that wil torment you thus with griefe for the fault of fortune, ſince a man is bound no further to himſelfe, then to do wiſely; chance is onely to trouble them that ſtand vpon chance. But greater is the wrong (at leaſt if any thing that comes from you may beare the name of wrong) you do vnto me, to thinke me either ſo childiſh, as not to perceiue your faithfull faultleſneſſe; or perceiuing it, ſo baſely diſpoſed, as to let my heart be ouerthrowne, ſtanding vpon it ſelf in ſo vnſpotted a pureneſſe. Hold for certain, moſt worthy Muſidorus, it is your ſelf I loue, which can no more be diminiſhed by theſe ſhowers of euill hap, then flowers are marred with the timely raines of Aprill. For how can I want comfort that haue the true and liuing comfort of my vnblemiſhed vertue? And how can I want honour, as long as Muſidorus in whom indeed honour is, doth honor me? Nothing bred from my ſelf can diſcomfort me: and fooles opinions I will not recken as diſhonour. Muſidorus looking vp to the ſtarres, O mind of minds (ſaid he) the liuing power of all things, which doeſt with al theſe eyes behold our euer varying actiõs, accept into thy fauorable eares this praier of mine: If I may any lõger hold out this dwelling on the earth which is called a life, grant me ability to deſerue at this Ladies hands the grace ſhe hath ſhewed vnto me, grant me wiſdome to know her wiſdome, and goodneſſe ſo to encreaſe my loue of her goodneſſe, that all mine owne choſen deſires, be to my ſelfe but ſecond to her determinations. Whatſoeuer I be, let it be to her ſeruice, let me herein be ſatisfied, that for ſuch infinite fauours of vertue, I haue ſome way wrought her ſatisfaction. But if my laſt time approcheth, and that I am no longer to be amongſt mortall creatures, make yet my death ſerue her to ſome purpoſe, that hereafter ſhe may not haue cauſe to repent her ſelf that ſhe beſtowed ſo excellent a mind vpon Muſidorus. Pamela could not chuſe but accord the cõceit of their fortune to theſe paſſionate prayers, in ſo much that her conſtant eyes yeelded ſome teares, which wiping from her faire face with Muſidorus hand, ſpeaking ſoftlie vnto him, as if ſhe had feared more any body ſhould be witneſſe of her weakneſſe, then of any thing elſe ſhe had ſayd, You ſee, ſaid ſhe, my Prince and onely Lord, what you worke in me by your too much grieuing for me. I pray you thinke I haue no ioy but in you, and if you fill that with ſorow, what do you leaue for me? What is prepared for vs we know not; but that with ſorow we cannot preuent it, we know. Now let vs turne frõ theſe things, & think you how you will haue me behaue my ſelf towards you in this matter. Muſidorus finding the authoritie of her ſpeech confirmed with direct neceſſitie, the firſt care came to his mind was of his deare friend and couſin Pyrocles: with whom long before he had concluded what names they ſhould beare, if vpon any occaſion they were forced to giue themſelues out for great men, and yet not make thẽſelues fully known. Now fearing leaſt if the Princeſſe ſhould name him for Muſidorus, the fame of their two being together, would diſcouer Pyrocles; holding her hand betwixt his hands a good while together: I did not thinke moſt excellent Princeſſe, ſaid he, to haue made anie further requeſt vnto you, for hauing bene alreadie to you ſo vnfortunate a ſuiter, I know not what modeſtie can beare anie further demand. But the eſtate of one yong man, whom (next to you, far aboue my ſelfe) I loue more then all the world, one worthie of all wel being for the notable conſtitution of his mind, and moſt vnworthy to receiue hurt by me, whom he doth in all faith & conſtancy loue, the pitie of him onely goes beyond all reſolutiõ to the contrarie. Then did he to the Princeſſe great admiration tell her the whole ſtorie as farre as he knew of it, and that when they made the grieuous diſiunction of their long companie, they had concluded, Muſidorus ſhold entitle himſelf Paladius Prince of Iberia, and Pyrocles ſhould be Daiphantus of Lycia.

Now (ſaid Muſidorus) he keeping a womans habit is to vſe no other name then Zelmane, but I that find it beſt, of the one ſide for your honor, you went away with a Prince and not with a ſhepheard: of the other ſide accounting my death leſſe euill then the betraying of that ſweet friend of mine, will take this meane betwixt both, and vſing the name of Paladius, if the reſpect of a Prince will ſtop your fathers furie, that will ſerue as well as Muſidorus, vntill Pyrocles fortune being ſome way eſtabliſhed, I may freely giue good proof that the noble coũtry of Theſſalia is mine: and if that will not mitigate your fathers opinion to mewards (nature I hope working in your excellencies will make him deale well by you) for my part the image of death is nothing fearfull vnto me: and this good I ſhall haue reaped by it, that I ſhal leaue my moſt eſteemed friend in no danger to be diſcloſed by me. And beſides (ſince I muſt confeſſe, I am not without a remorſe of her caſe) my vertuous mother ſhall not know her ſonnes violent death hid vnder the fame will go of Paladius. But as long as her yeares now of good number, be counted among the liuing, ſhe may ioy her ſelf with ſome poſſibility of my returne. Pamela promiſing him vpon no occaſion euer to name him, fell into extremitie of weeping, as if her eyes had bene content to ſpend all their ſeeing moiſtneſſe, now that there was ſpeech of the loſſe of that, which they held as their chiefeſt light. So that Muſidorus was forced to repaire her good counſels with ſweet conſolations, which continued betwixt them vntill it was about midnight, that ſleepe hauing ſtolne into their heauie ſences and now abſolutely commanding in their vitall powers, left them delicately wound one in anothers armes quietly to waite for the comming of the morning: which as ſoone as ſhe appeared to play her part, laden (as you haue heard) with ſo many well occaſioned lamentations. Their lobbiſh guard (who all night had kept thẽſelues awake, with prating how valiant deeds they had done when they ran away: and how faire a death their fellow had died, who at his laſt gaſpe ſued to be a hangman) awaked them, and ſet them vpon their horſes, to whom the very ſhining force of excellent vertue, though in a verie harriſh ſubiect, had wrought a kind of reuerence in them; Muſidorus as he rid among them (of whom they had no other hold but of Pamela) thinking it want of a wel ſquared iudgemẽt, to leaue any meane vnaſſayed of ſauing their liues, to this purpoſe ſpake to his vnſeemely gardians, vſing a plaine kind of phraſe to make his ſpeech the more credible. My maiſters (ſaid he) there is no man that is wiſe, but hath in whatſoeuer he doth ſome purpoſe wherto he directs his doings, which ſo long he followes, till he ſee that either that purpoſe is not worth the paines, or that another doing caries with it a better purpoſe. That you are wiſe in what you take in hand, I haue to my coſt learned: that makes me deſire you to tell me what is your end in carying the Princeſſe & me backe to her father. Pardon ſaid one, reward cried another. Well (ſaid he) take both; although I know you are ſo wiſe to remember, that hardly they both will go together, being of ſo contrary a making, for the ground of pardon is an euill, neither any man pardons but remembers an euill done, the cauſe of reward is the opinion of ſome good act, and who ſo rewardeth, that holds the chiefe place of his fancie. Now one man of one companie, to haue the ſame conſideration both of good and euill, but that the conceit of pardoning, if it be pardoned, will take away the mind of rewarding, is verie hard,

if not impossible. For either euen in iustice will he punish the fault as well as reward the desert, or else in mercie ballance the one by the other: so that the not chastising shall be a sufficient satisfying. Thus then you may see that in your owne purpose, rests great vncertainty. But I will graunt that by this your deed you shall obtaine your double purpose. Yet consider I pray you whether by another meane, that may not better be obtained, and then I doubt not your wisdomes will teach you to take hold of the better. I am sure you know, any bodie were better haue no need of a pardon then enioy a pardon; for as it caries with it the suretie of a preserued life, so beares it a continuall note of a deserued death. This therefore (besides the daunger you may run into, my Lady Pamela being the vndoubted inheritrix of this state, if she shall hereafter seeke to reuenge your wrong done her) shall be continually cast in your teeth, as men dead by the law: the honester sort will disdaine your companie, and your children shall be the more basely reputed of, and you your selues in euery sleight fault hereafter, as men once condemned, apest to be ouerthrowne. Now if you wil (I doubt not you wil, for you are wise) turne your course, & gard my Lady Pamela thitherward, whither she was going: first you need not doubt to aduenture your fortunes where she goes, and there shall you be assured in a countrey as good and rich as this, of the same maners and language, to be so far from the conceit of a pardon, as we both shall be forced to acknowledge we haue receiued by your meanes what soeuer we hold deare in this life. And so for reward iudge you whether it be not more likelie, you shall there receiue it where you haue done no euill, but singular & vndeserued goodnesse; or here where this seruice of yours shal be diminished by your dutie, and blemished by your former fault. Yes I protest and sweare vnto you, by the faire eyes of that Lady, there shall no Gentlemen in all that country be preferred: you shall haue riches, ease, pleasure, and that which is best to such worthy mindes, you shall not be forced to crie mercie for a good fact. You only of all the Arcadians, shall haue the praise in continuing in your late valiant attempt, and not basely be brought vnder a halter for seeking the libertie of Arcadia. These words in their mindes, who did nothing for any loue of goodnesse, but only as their senses presented greater shewes of profite, began to make them wauer, and some to clap their hands and scratch their heads, and sweare it was the best way. Others that would seeme wiser then the rest to capitulate what tenemẽts they shold haue, what subsidies they shold pay: others to talk of their wiues, in doubt whether it were best to send for them, or to take new where they went: most (like fooles) not readily thinking what was next to be done, but imagining what cheare they would make when they came there, one or two of the least discourses beginning to turne their faces towards the woods which they had left. But being now come within the plaine neare to the Lodges, vnhappily they espied a troupe of horsemen. But then their false hearts had quickly for the present feare, forsaken their last hopes, and therefore keeping on the way toward the Lodge, with songs of cries and ioy, the horsmen, who were some of them Philanax had sent out to the search of Pamela, came galloping vnto them; maruelling who they were that in such a generall mourning, durst sing ioyfull tunes, and in so publike a ruine weare the lawrell tokens of victorie. And that which seemed straungest, they might see two among them vnarmed like prisoners, but riding like Captaines. But when they came nearer, they perceiued the one was a Ladie, and the Lady Pamela. Then glad they had by hap found that which they so litle hoped to meete withall, taking these clownes (who first resisted thẽ, for the desire they had to be the deliuerers of the two excellent prisoners, learning that they were of those rebels, which had made the daungerous vprore, as well vnder colour to punish that, as this their last withstanding them, but indeed their principall cause being, because they themselues would haue the onely praise of their owne quest, they suffered not one of thē to liue. Marie three of the stubbornest of them they left their bodies hanging vpon the trees, because their doing might carie the likelier forme of iudgement. Such an vnlooked for end did the life of iustice worke, for the naughty minded wretches, by subiects to be executed, that would haue executed Princes: and to suffer that without law, which by law they had deserued. And thus these yong folkes twise prisoners, before any due arrest, deliuered of their iaylours, but not of their iayle, had rather change then respite of miserie, these souldiers that tooke them with verie few words of entertainment, hasting to carie them to their Lord Philanax: to whom they came, euen as he going out of the Ladie Philocleas chamber, had ouertaken Pyrocles, whom before he had deliuered to the custodie of a Nobleman of that countrie. When Pyrocles led towards his prison, saw his friend Musidorus, with the noble Ladie Pamela in that inexpected sort returned, his griefe, (if any griefe were in a mind, which had placed euerie thing according to his naturall worth) was verie much augmented, for besides some small hope he had, if Musidorus had once bene cleare of Arcadia, by his dealing and authoritie to haue brought his onely gladsome desires to a good issue: the hard estate of his friend did no lesse, nay rather more vexe him then his owne. For so indeed it is euer found, where valure and friendship are perfectly coupled in one heart, the reason being, that the resolute man, hauing once digested in his iudgement the worst extremity of his own case, and hauing either quite expelled or at least repelled all passion, which ordinarilie followes an ouerthrowne fortune, not knowing his friends mindes so well as his owne, nor with what patience he brookes his case, (which is as it were the materiall cause of making a man happie or vnhappie) doubts whether his friend accompts not himselfe more miserable, and so indeed bee more lamentable. But assoone as Musidorus was brought by the souldiers neere vnto Philanax, Pyrocles not knowing whether euer after hee should be suffered to see his friend, and determining there could be no aduantage by dissembling a not knowing of him, leapt sodainlie from their hands that held him, and passing with a strength strengthened with a true affection, through them that encompassed Musidorus, he embraced him as fast as he could in his armes. And kissing his cheekes; O my Paladius (said he) let not our vertue now abandon vs; let vs proue our minds are no slaues to fortune, but in aduersitie can triumph ouer aduersity. Deare Daiphantus answered Musidorus (seeing by his apparell his being a man was reuealed) I thanke you for this best care of my best part: but feare not, I haue kept too long companie with you to want now a thorow determination of these things; I well know there is nothing euill but within vs, the rest is either naturall or accidentall. Philanax finding them of so neare acquaintance, began presently to examine them apart: but such resolution he met within them, that by no such meanes he could learne further then it pleased them to deliuer. So that he thought best to put them both in one place, with espiall of their words and behauiour, that way to sift out the more of these forepassed mischiefs. And for that purpose gaue them both vnto the Nobleman, who before had the custodie of Pyrocles, by name Sympathus, leauing a trustie seruant of his owne to giue diligent watch to what might passe betwixt them. No man that hath euer passed thorow the schoole of affection, needs doubt what a tormenting griefe it was to the noble Pamela, to haue the companie of him taken from her, to whose vertuous companie she had bound her life. But weighing with her selfe, it was fit for her honour, till her doing were clearely manifested, that they should remaine separate, kept downe the rising tokens of griefe; shewing passion in nothing but her eyes, which accompanied Musidorus euen vnto the tent, whither he and Pyrocles were led. Then with a countenance more princely then she was wont, according to the wont of highest hearts (like the palme tree striuing most vpward, when he is most burthened) she commaunded Philanax, to bring her to her father and mother, that she might render them account of her doings. Philanax shewing a sullen kind of reuerence vnto her, as a man that honoured her as his Maisters heire, but much misliked her for her (in his conceit) dishonourable proceedings, told her what was past, rather to answer her, then that he thought she was ignorant of it. But her good spirit did presently suffer a true compassionate affliction of those hard aduentures: which with crossing her armes, looking a great while on the ground, with those eyes which let fall many teares, she well declared. But in the end remembring how necessarie it was for her, not to lose her selfe in such an extremitie, she strengthened her well created heart, and stoutly demaunded Philanax, what authoritie then they had to lay hands of her person, who being the vndoubted heire, was then the lawfull Princesse of that kingdome. Philanax answered, her Grace knew the ancient lawes of Arcadia bare, she was to haue no sway of gouernement till she came to one and twentie yeares of age, or were maried. And maried I am, replyed the wise Princesse, therefore I demaund your due alleageance. The gods forbid (said Philanax, Arcadia should be a dowrie of such mariages. Besides, he told her, all the States of her country were euil satisfied touching her fathers death; which likewise according to the statutes of Arcadia, was euen that day to be iudged of, before the body were remoued to receiue his Princely funerals. After that past, she should haue such obedience, as by the lawes was due vnto her, desiring God she would shew her selfe better in publike gouernement, then she had done in priuate. She would haue spoken to the Gentlemen and people gathered about her: but Philanax fearing least thereby some commotion might arise, or at least a hinderance of executing his maisters murderers, which he longed after more then any thing, hasted her vp to the Lodge, where her sister was, and there with a chosen companie of Souldiers to garde the place, left her with Philoclea, Pamela protesting they layd violent hands of her, and that they entred into rebellious attemptes against her. But high time it was for Philanax so to do: for alreadie was all the whole multitude falne into confused and daungerous diuisions.

There was a notable example, how great dissipations, Monarchall gouernement is subiect vnto. For now their Prince and guide had left them, they had not experience to rule, and had not whom to obey. Publike matters had euer bene priuatelie gouerned, so that they had no liuely taste what was good for themselues. But euerie thing was either vehemently desirefull, or extreamely terrible. Neighbours inuasions, ciuill dissention, crueltie of the comming Prince, and whatsoeuer in common sence caries a dreadfull shew, was in all mens heads, but in few how to preuent: harkening on euery rumour, suspecting euerie thing, condemning them whom before they had honoured, making strange and impossible tales of the kings death, while they thought themselues in danger, wishing nothing but safety, assoone as perswasion of safety tooke them, desiring further benefites, as amendment of forepassed faultes (which faultes notwithstanding none could tell either the grounds or effects of) all agreeing in the vniuersall names of liking or misliking, but of what in especiall points, infinitely disagreeing. Altogether like a falling steeple, the parts whereof, as windowes, stones, and pinnacles were well, but the whole masse ruinous. And this was the generall case of all, wherin notwithstanding was an extreame medley of diuersified thoughts; the great men looking to make themselues strong by factions, the Gentlemen some bending to them, some stāding vpon thēselues, some desirous to ouerthrow those few which they thought were ouer them, the souldiers desirous of trouble, as the nurse of spoyle, and not much vnlike to them, though in another way, were all the needie sort, the rich fearfull, the wise careful. This composition of conceites, brought forth a dangerous tumult, which yet would haue bene more daungerous, but that it had so manie parts, that no body well knew against whom chiefly to oppose themselues. For some there were that cried to haue the state altered, and gouerned no more by a Prince; marie in the alteration, many would haue the Lacedamonian gouernment of a few chosen Senatours; others the Athenian, where the peoples voyce held the chiefe authority. But these were rather the discoursing sort of men, then the actiue, being a matter more in imagination then practise. But they that went neerest to the present case, (as in a countrie that knew no gouernement without a Prince) were they that stroue whom they should make. Whereof a great number there were that would haue the Princesse Pamela presently to enioy it: some disdaining that she had as it were abandoned her owne countrie, enclining more to Philoclea: and there wanted not of them, which wished Gynecia were deliuered, and made Regent till Pamela were worthily maried. But great multitudes there were, which hauing bene acquainted with the iust gouernment of Philanax, meant to establish him as Lieutenant of the state: and these were the most popular sort, who iudged by the commodities they felt. But the principall men in honour and might, who had long before enuied his greatnesse with Basilius, did much more spurne against any such preferment of him. For yet before their enuy had some kind of breathing out his rancour, by laying his greatnesse as a fault to the Princes iudgement, who shewed in Dametas he might easilie be deceiued in mens value. But now if the Princes choice, by so many mouthes should be confirmed, what could they obiect to so rightly esteemed an excellencie? They therefore were disposed, sooner to yeeld to any thing, then to his raising: and were content (for to crosse Philanax) to stop those actions, which otherwise they could not but thinke good. Philanax himselfe, as much hindred by those, that did immoderately honour him, (which brought both more enuie, and suspition vpon him) as by them that did manifestly resist him (but standing onely vpon a constant desire of iustice, and a cleare conscience) went forward stoutly in the action of his maisters reuenge, which he thought himselfe particularly bound to. For the rest, as the ordering of the gouernment, he accounted himselfe but as one, wherein notwithstanding he would employ all his loyall endeuour.

But among the Noblemen, he that most openly set himselfe against him, was named Timautus, a man of midle age, but of extreame ambition, as one that had placed his vttermost good in greatnesse, thinking small difference by what meanes he came by it. Of commendable wit, if he had not made it a seruant to vnbrideled desires. Cunning to creepe into mens fauours, which he prized onely as they were were ſeruiceable vnto him. Hee had bene brought vp in ſome ſouldierie, which he knew how to ſet out with more then deſerued oſtentation. Seruile (though enuious) to his betters: and no leſſe tyrannically minded to them he had aduantage of. Counted reuengefull, but indeed meaſuring both reuenge and reward, as the partie might either helpe or hurt him. Rather ſhameleſſe then bold, and yet more bold in practiſes, then in perſonall aduentures. In ſumme, a man that could be as euill as he liſted, and liſted as much as any aduancement might thereby be gotten. As for vertue, he counted it but a ſchoole name. He euen at the firſt aſſembling together, finding the great ſtroke Philanax caried among the people, thought it his readieſt way of ambition, to ioyne with him: which though his pride did hardly brooke, yet the other vice carying with it a more apparant obiect, preuailed ouer the weaker, ſo that with thoſe liberall proteſtations of friēdſhip, which men that care not for their word are wont to beſtow, he offered vnto him the choiſe in mariage of either the ſiſters, ſo he would likewiſe help him to the other, and make ſuch a partition of the Arcadian eſtate. Wiſhing him, that ſince he loued his maiſter, becauſe he was his maiſter, which ſhewed the loue began in himſelfe, he ſhould rather now occaſion was preſented, ſeeke his owne good ſubſtantially, then affect the ſmoke of a glory, by ſhewing an vntimely fidelitie to him that could not reward it; and haue all the fruit he ſhould get in mens opinions, which would be as diuerſe, as many; few agreeing to yeeld him due praiſe of his true heart. But Philanax, who had limited his thoughts in that he eſteemed good (to which he was neither caried by the vaine tickling of vncertaine fame, nor from which he would be tranſported by enioying any thing, wherto the ignorāt world giues the excellent name of goods) with great miſlike of his offer, he made him ſo peremptorie an anſwer, not without threatning, if he found him foſter any ſuch fancie, that Timautus went with an inward ſpite from him, whom before he had neuer loued; and meaſuring all mens marches by his owne pace, rather thought it ſome further fetch of Philanax (as that he would haue all to himſelfe alone) then was any way taken with the louely beautie of his vertue; whoſe image he had ſo quite defaced in his owne ſoule, that he had left himſelfe no eyes to behold it, but ſtaid waiting fit oportunitie to execute his deſires both for himſelfe and againſt Philanax, which by the bringing backe of Pamela, the people being deuided into manie motions (which both with murmuring noyſes, and putting themſelues in ſeuerall troupes, they well ſhewed) he thought apt time was laid before him, the waters being (as the prouerbe ſaith) troubled, and ſo the better for his fiſhing. Therefore going amongſt the chieſeſt Lords, whom he knew principally to repine at Philanax, and making a kind of conuocation of them, he inueighed againſt his proceedings, drawing euerie thing to the moſt malicious interpretation, that malice it ſelfe could inſtruct him to do. He ſaid, it was ſeaſon for them to looke to ſuch a weed, that elſe would ouergrow them all. It was not now time to couſult of the dead, but of the liuing: ſince ſuch a ſlie Wolfe was entred among them, that could make iuſtice the cloake of tyrannie, and loue of his late maiſter the deſtruction of his now being children. Do you not ſee (ſayd hee) how farre his corruption hath ſtretched, that hee hath ſuch a number of raſcalles voyces to declare him Lieuteuant, readie to make him Prince, but that he inſtructs them, matters are not yet ripe for it? As for vs, becauſe we are too rich to be bought, he thinks vs the fitter to be killed. Hath Arcadia bred no man but Philanax? is ſhe become a ſtepmother to all the reſt, and hath giuen all her bleſſings to Philanax? Or if there be men amongſt vs, let vs ſhew wee diſdaine to be ſeruants to a ſeruant. Let vs make him know, we are farre worthier not to be ſlaues, then he to be a maiſter. Thinke you he hath made ſuch haſte in theſe matters, to giue them ouer to another mans hand? Thinke you, he durſt become the Iaylor of his Princeſſe, but either meaning to be her maiſter, or her murtherer? And al this for the deare good wil (forſooth) he beares to the kings memorie, whoſe authoritie as he abuſed in his life, ſo he would now perſeuer to abuſe his name after his death. O notable affection, for the loue of the father to kill the wife, and diſinherite the children! O ſingle-minded modeſtie to aſpire to no leſſe then to the Princely Diademe! No, no, he hath vired all this while, but to come the ſooner to his affected end. But let vs remember what we be, in qualitie his equals, in number farre before him; let vs deliuer the Queene and our naturall Princeſſes, and leaue them no longer vnder his authoritie; whoſe proceedings would rather ſhew that he himſelfe had bene the murtherer of the King, then a fit Gardien of his poſterity. Theſe words pierced much into the minds, alreadie inclined that way; inſomuch that moſt part of the Nobilitie confirmed Timautus ſpeech, and were readie to execute it: when Philanax came among them, and with a conſtant, but reuerent behauiour, deſired them they would not exerciſe priuate grudges in ſo common a neceſſitie. He acknowledged himſelfe a man, and a faultie man, to the clearing or ſatisfying of which, hee would at all times ſubmit himſelfe, ſince his end was to bring all things to an vpright iudgement, it ſhould euill fit him to flie the iudgement. But ſaid he, my Lords, let not Tymautus rayling ſpeech (who whatſoeuer he findes euill in his owne ſoule, can with eaſe lay it vpon another) make me looſe your good fauour. Conſider that all well doing ſtands ſo in the middle betwixt his two contrary euils, that it is a readie matter to caſt a ſlaunderous ſhade vpon the moſt approued vertues. Who hath an euill tongue, can call ſeueritie, crueltie, and faithfull diligence, diligent ambition. But my end is not to excuſe my ſelfe, nor to accuſe him: for both thoſe, hereafter will be time enough. There is neither of vs, whoſe purging or puniſhing may ſo much import to Arcadia. Now I requeſt you, for your owne honours ſake, and require you by the dutie you owe to this eſtate, that you do preſently (according to the lawes) take in hand the chaſtiſement of our maiſters murtherers, and laying order for the gouernement: by whom ſoeuer it be done, ſo it be done, and iuſtly done, I am ſatisfied. My labour hath bene to frame things ſo, as you might determine: now it is in you to determine. For my part, I call the heauens to witneſſe, the care of my heart ſtands to repay that, wherin both I, and moſt of you were tyed to that Prince; with whom all my loue of worldly action is dead.

As Philanax was ſpeaking his laſt words, there came one running to him with open mouth, & fearful eyes, telling him, that there were a great nũber of the people, which were bent to take the yong men out of Simpathus hands, & as it ſhould ſeeme by their acclamations, were like enough to proclaime them Princes. Nay, ſaid Philanax, (ſpeaking aloud, and looking with a iuſt anger vpon the other Noblemen) it is now ſeaſon to heare Timautus idle ſlaunders, while ſtrangers become our Lords, and Baſilius murtherers ſit in his throne. But whoſoeuer is a true Arcadian, let him follow me. With that he went toward the place he heard of, followed by thoſe that had euer loued him, & ſome of the Noblemen. Some other remayning with Timautus, who in the meane time was conſpiring by ſtrong hand to deliuer Gynecia, of whom the weakeſt guard was had. But Philanax where he went, found them all in an vprore, which thus was falne out. The greateſt multitude of people, people, that were come to the death of Basilius, were the Matineans, as being the neareſt Citie to the lodges. Among theſe, the chiefe man both in authoritie and loue was Kalander, he that not long before had bene hoſt to the two Princes, whō though he knew not ſo much as by name, yet beſides the obligation he ſtood bound to them in, for preſeruing the liues of his ſonne & nephew, their noble behauiour had bred ſuch loue in his heart towards them, as both with teares he parted from them, when they left him (vnder promiſe to returne) and did keepe their iewels and apparell as the relikes of two demy-gods. Among others, he had entred the priſon, and ſeene them, which forthwith ſo inueſted his ſoule, both with ſorow & deſire to helpe them (whom he rendred as his children) that calling his neighbors the Mantineans vnto him, he told them all the prayſes of thoſe two young men, ſwearing, he thought the Gods had prouided for them better, then they thēſelues could haue imagined. He willed them to cōſider, that when all was done, Basilius children muſt enioy the ſtate; who ſince they had choſen, and choſen ſo, as all the world could not mend their choiſe, why ſhould they reſiſt Gods doing, & their Princeſſes pleaſure? This was the only way to purchaſe quietneſſe without bloud, where otherwiſe they ſhould at one inſtant crowne Pamela with a Crowne of gold, & a diſhonored title: which whether euer ſhe wold forget, he thought it fit for thē to weigh: ſuch (ſaid he) heroicall greatneſſe ſhines in their eyes, ſuch an extraordinarie maieſty in all their actions, as ſurely either fortune by parētage, or nature in creation, hath made them Princes. And yet a ſtate alreadie we haue, we need but a man, who ſince he is preſented vnto you by the heauenly prouidence, embraced by your vndoubted Princeſſe, worthie for their youth, of compaſſion, for their beautie, of admiration, for their excellent vertue to be Monarkes of the world, ſhall we not be content with our owne bliſſe? ſhall we put out our eyes becauſe another man can not ſee? or rather like ſome men, when too much good happens vnto them, they thinke themſelues in a dreame, and haue not ſpirits to taſte their owne goods? No, no, my friends, beleeue me, I am ſo vnpartiall, that I know not their names, but ſo ouercome with their vertue, that I ſhall then thinke, the deſtinies haue ordained a perpetuall flouriſhing to Arcadia, when they ſhall allot ſuch a gouernour vnto it. This ſpoken by a man graue in yeares, great in authoritie, neare allyed to the Prince, & known honeſt, preuailed ſo with all the Mantineans, that with one voyce they ran to deliuer the two Princes. But Philanax came in time to withſtand thē, both ſides yet ſtanding in armes, & rather wanting a beginning, then minds to enter into a bloudie conflict. Which Philanax foreſeeing, thought beſt to remoue the priſoners ſecretlie, and if neede were, rather without forme of iuſtice to kill them, then againſt iuſtice (as he thought) to haue them vſurpe the ſtate. But there againe aroſe a new trouble. For Sympathus (the noble man that kept them) was ſo ſtricken in compaſſion with their excellent preſence, that as he wold not falſifie his promiſe to Philanax, to giue them libertie, ſo yet would he not yeeld them to himſelfe, fearing he would do them violence. Thus tumult vpon tumult ariſing, the Sun (I thinke) awearie to ſee their diſcordes, had already gone downe to his Weſterne lodging. But yet to know what the poore ſhepheards did, who were the firſt deſcryers of theſe matters, will not to ſome eares perchance be a tedious digreſſion.

Here ends the fourth Booke or Act.

The fourth Eclogues.

THE ſhepherds finding no place for thē in theſe garboyles, to which their quiet hearts (whoſe higheſt ambition was in keeping thēſelues vp in goodneſſe) had at ail no aptneſſe, retired themſelues from among the clamorous multitude: and as ſorow deſires companie, went vp together to the Weſterne ſide of a hill, whoſe proſpect extended it ſo far, as they might well diſcerne many of Arcadias beauties. And there looking vpon the ſunnes as then declining race, the poore men ſate penſiue of their preſent miſeries, as if they found a wearineſſe of their wofull words; till at laſt good old Geron (who as he had longeſt taſted the benefits of Baſilius gouernmēt ſo ſeemed to haue a ſpeciall feeling of the preſent loſſe) wiping his eyes and long white beard bedeawed with great drops of teares, began in this ſort to complaine. Alas poore ſheepe (ſaid he) which hitherto haue enioyed your fruitfull paſture, in ſuch quietneſſe as your wooll amōgſt other things hath made this countrie famous, your beſt dayes are now paſt: now you muſt become the victuall of an armie, and perchaunce an armie of forraine enemies: you are now not onely to feare home-Wolues, but alien Lyons; now (I ſay) now that our right Baſilius is deceaſed. Alas, ſweet paſtures, ſhal ſouldiers that know not how to vſe you, poſſeſſe you? Shall they that can not ſpeake Arcadian language be Lords ouer your ſhepheards? For alas with good cauſe may we looke for any euill, ſince Baſilius our onely ſtrength is taken from vs. To that all the other ſhepheards preſent vttered pitifull voyces, eſpeciallie the verie borne Arcadians. For as for the other, though humanitie moued them to pitie humane caſes, eſpeciallie in a Prince, vnder whom they had found a refuge of their miſeries, and iuſtice equally adminiſtred: yet could they not ſo naturally feele the liuely touch of ſorow. Neuertheleſſe, of that number one Agelaſtus notably noted among them, aſwell for his skill in poetrie, as for an auſterely maintained ſorowfulneſſe, wherewith he ſeemed to deſpiſe the works of nature, framing an vniuerſall complaint in that vniuerſall miſchiefe, vttered it in this Seſtine:

SInce vvayling is a bud of cauſefull ſorow,
Since ſorow is the follower of euill fortune,
Since no euill fortune equals publike damage:
Now Princes loſſe hath made our damage publike;
Sorow, pay we to thee the rights of Nature,
And inward griefe ſeale vp with outward wailing.

VVhy ſhould we ſpare our voice from endleſſe wailing,
VVho iuſtly make our harts the ſeate of ſorow?
In ſuch a caſe where it appeares that nature
Doth adde her force vnto the ſting of fortune:
Chooſing alas! this our threatre publike,
VVhere they would leaue trophees of cruell damage.

Then ſince ſuch pow'rs conſpir'd vnto our damage
(VVhich may be knowne, but neuer helpt with wayling)
Yet let vs leaue a monument in publike
Of willing teares, torne haires, and cries of ſorow.

For

For loſt, loſt is by blowe of cruell fortune
Arcadias gemme, the nobleſt childe of nature.

O nature doting old, O blinded nature,
How haſt thou torne thy ſelfe! ſought thine owne damage!
In graunting ſuch a ſcope to filthy fortune,
By thy impes loſſe to fill the world with wailing.
Caſt thy ſtepmother eyes vpon our ſorow,
Publique our loſſe: ſo, ſee, thy ſhame is publique.

O that we had; to make our woes more publique,
Seas in our eyes, & braſen tongues by nature,
A yelling voice, & hearts compoſ'd of ſorow,
Breath made of flames, wits knowing nought but damage,
Our ſports murdering our ſelues, our muſiques wailing,
Our ſtudies fixt vpon the falles of fortune.

No, no, our miſchiefe growes in this vile fortune,
That priuate paines can not breath out in publique
The furious inward griefs with hellish wailing:
But forced are to burthen feeble nature
VVith ſecret ſenſe of our eternall damage,
And ſorow feede, feeding our ſoules with ſorow.

Since ſorow then concludeth all our fortune
VVith all our deaths shew we this damage publique.
His nature feares to die who liues ſtill wailing.

It ſeemed that this cõplaint of Agelaſtus had awaked the ſpirits of the Arcadians, aſtoniſhed before with exceedingneſſe of ſorow. For he had ſcarcely ended, when diuerſe of them offred to follow his example, in bewayling the general loſſe of that countrie which had bene aſwell a nurſe to ſtraungers, as a mother to Arcadians. Among the reſt one accounted good in that kinde, and made the better by the true feeling of ſorowe, roared out a ſong of lamentation, which (as well as might be) was gathered vp in this forme:

SInce that to death is gone the shepheard hie,
VVho moſt the ſilly shepheards pipe did pryſe,
Your doleſull tunes ſweet Muſes now applie.

And you ô trees (if any life there lies
In trees) now through your porous barkes receaue
The ſtrange reſound of theſe my cauſefull cries:
And let my breath vpon your braunches cleaue,
My breath diſtinguish'd into words of woe,
That ſo I may ſignes of my ſorrow leaue.
But if among your ſelues ſome one tree grow,
That apteſt is to figure miſerie,
Let it embaſſage beare your grieues to show.

The weeping Mirrhe I thinke will not denie
Her help to this, this iuſteſt cauſe of plaint.
Your doleſull tunes ſweet Muſes now applie.

And thou poore Earth, whom fortune doth attaint,
In Natures name to ſuffer ſuch a harme,
As for to looſe thy gemme, and ſuch a Saincť,
Vpon thy face let coaly Rauens ſwarme:
Let all the Sea thy teares accounted be:
Thy bowels with all killing mettals arme.
Let gold now ruſt, let Diamonds waſt in thee:
Let pearls be wan with woe their damme doth beare:
Thy ſelfe henceforth the light doo neuer ſee.
And you, ô flowers, which ſometimes Princes were,
Till theſe ſtraunge altrings you did hap to trie,
Of Princes looſſe your ſelues for tokens reare.
Lilly in mourning blacke thy whiteneſſe die:
O Hyacinthe let Ai be on thee ſtill.
Your doleſull tunes ſweet Muſes now applie.

O Echo, all theſe woods with roaring fill,
And do not onely marke the accents laſt,
But all, for all reach out my wailefull will:
One Echo to another Echo caſt
Sound of my griefes, and let it neuer end,
Till that it hath all woods and waters paſt,
Nay to the heau'ns your iuſt complaining ſend,
And ſtay the ſtarres inconſtant conſtant race,
Till that they do vnto our dolors bend:
And aske the reaſon of that ſpeciall grace,
That they, which haue no liues, ſhould liue ſo long,
And vertuous ſoules ſo ſoone ſhould looſe their place?
Aske, if in great men good men do ſo throng,
That he for want of elbow roome muſt die?
Or if that they be skant, if this be wrong?
Did VViſdome this our wretched time eſpie
In one true cheſt to rob all Vertues treaſure?
Your doleſull tunes ſweete Muſes now applie.

And if that any counſell you to meaſure
Your dolefull tunes, to them ſtill playning ſay,
To well felt griefe, plaint is the onely pleaſure.
O light of Sunne, which is entit'led day,
O well thou doeſt that thou no longer bideſt;
For mourning light her blacke weedes may diſplay
Q Phœbus with good cauſe thy face thou hideſt,
Rather then haue thy all-beholding eye
Fowl'd with this ſight, while thou thy chariot guideſt.

And

And well (me thinks) becomes this vaultie skie
A stately tombe to couer him deceased.
Your dolefull tunes sweet Muses now applie.

O Philomela with thy brest oppressed
By shame and griefe, help, help me to lament
Such cursed harmes as cannot be redressed.
Or if thy mourning notes be fully spent,
Then giue a quiet eare vnto my plaining:
For I to teach the world complaint am bent.
You dimmy clowds, which well employ your staining
This cheerefull aire with your obscured cheere,
Witnesse your wofull teares with daily rayning.
And if, O Sunne, thou euer didst appeare,
In shape, which by mans eye might be perceiued;
Vertue is dead, now set thy triumph here.
Now set thy triumph in this world, bereaued
Of what was good, where now no good doth lie:
And by thy pompe our losse will be conceiued.
O notes of mine your selues together tie:
With too much griefe me thinks you are dissolued,
Your dolefull tunes sweet Muses now applie.

Time euer old, and yong is still reuolued
Within it selfe, and neuer tasteth end:
But mankind is for aye to nought resolued.
The filthy snake her aged coat can mend,
And getting youth againe, in youth doth flourish:
But vnto Man, age euer death doth send.
The verie trees with grafting we can cherish,
So that we can long time produce their time:
But man which helpeth them, helplesse must perish.
Thus, thus the mindes, which ouer all do clime,
When they by yeares experience get best graces,
Must finish then by deaths detested crime.
We last short while, and build long lasting places:
Ah let vs all against foule Nature crie:
We Natures workes do help, she vs defaces.
For how can Nature vnto this reply?
That she her child, I say, her best child killeth?
Your dolefull tunes sweet Muses now apply.

Alas, me thinks, my weakned voice but spilleth,
The vehement course of this iust lamentation:
Me thinks, my sound no place with sorrow filleth.
I know not I, but once in detestation
I haue my selfe, and all what life containeth,
Since Death on Vertues fort hath made inuasion.

One word of woe another after traineth:
Ne do I care how rude be my inuention,
So it be seene what sorrow in me raigneth.
O Elements, by whose (men say) contention,
Our bodies be in liuing power maintained,
VVas this mans death the fruit of your dissention?
O Phisicks power, which (some say) hath restrained
Approch of death, alas thou helpest meagerly,
VVhen once one is for Atropos distrained.
Great be Phisitions brags, but aid is beggerly,
VVhen rooted moisture failes, or groweth drie,
They leaue off all, and say, death comes too eagerly.
They are but words therefore that men do buy
Of any, since God Æsculapius ceased.
Your dolefull tunes sweete Muses now apply.

Iustice, iustice is now (alas) oppressed:
Bountifulnesse hath made his last conclusion:
Goodnesse for best attire in dust is dressed.
Shepheards bewaile your vttermost confusion;
And see by this picture to you presented,
Death is our home, life is but a delusion.
For see alas, who is from you absented?
Absented? nay I say for euer banished
From such as were to dye for him contented?
Out of our sight in turne of hand is vanished
Shepheard of shepheards, whose well setled order
Priuate with wealth, publike with quiet garnished.
VVhile he did liue, farre, farre was all disorder;
Example more preuailing then direction,
Far was homestrife, and far was foe from border.
His life a law, his looke a full correction:
As in his health we healthfull were preserued,
So in his sickenesse grow our sure infection.
His death our death. But ah; my Muse hath swarued,
From such deepe plaint as should such woes descrie,
VVhich he of vs for euer hath deserued.
The stile of heauie hart can neuer flie
So high, as should make such a paine notorious:
Cease Muse therefore: thy dart ô Death applie,
And farewell Prince, whom goodnesse hath made glorious.

Many were readie to haue followed this course, but the day was so wasted, that onely this riming Sestine deliuered by one of great account among them, could obtaine fauour to be heard.

FArewell O Sunne, Arcadias clearest light:
Farewell O pearle, the poore mans plenteous treasure.
Farewell O golden staffe, the weake mans might:
Farewell O ioy, the ioyfulls onely pleasure.

VVisdome farewell, the skilleſſe mans direction:
Farewell with thee, farewell all our affection.

For what place now is left for our affection,
Now that of pureſt lampe is quench'd the light,
VVhich to our darkned mindes was beſt direction?
Now that the mine is loſt of all our treaſure?
Now death hath ſwallow'd vp our worldly pleaſure,
VVe Orphans made, void of all publique might?

Orphans in deede, depriu'd of fathers might:
For he our father was in all affection,
In our well doing placing all his pleaſure,
Still ſtudying how to vs to be a light.
As well he was in peace a ſafeſt treaſure:
In warre his wit & word was our direction.

VVhence, whence alas, ſhall we ſeeke our direction?
VVhen that we feare our hatefull neighbors might,
VVho long haue gap't to get Arcadians treaſure.
Shall we now finde a guide of ſuch affection,
VVho for our ſakes will thinke all trauaile light,
And make his paine to keepe vs ſafe his pleaſure?

No, no, for euer gone is all our pleaſure;
For euer wandring from all good direction;
For euer blinded of our cleareſt light;
For euer lamed of our ſured might;
For euer baniſh'd from well plac'd affection;
For euer robd of all our royall treaſure.

Let teares for him therefore be all our treaſure,
And in our wailfull naming him our pleaſure:
Let hating of our ſelues be our affection,
And vnto death bend ſtill our thoughts direction:
Let vs againſt our ſelues employ our might,
And putting out our eyes ſeeke we our light.

Farewell our light, farewell our ſpoiled treaſure:
Farewell our might, farewell our daunted pleaſure:
Farewell direction: farewell all affection.

The night began to caſt her darke Canopie ouer them, and they euen wearie with their woes bended homewards: hoping by ſleepe, forgetting them ſelues, to eaſe their preſent dolours: when they were met with a troupe of twentie horſe, the chiefe of which asking them for the King, and vnderſtanding the hard newes, thereupon ſtayed among them expecting the returne of a meſſenger whom with ſpeede he diſpached to Philanax.

The end of the fourth Booke.

THE FIFTH BOOKE OF THE COVNTESSE OF PEMBROKES ARCADIA.

THE daungerous diuision of mens mindes, the ruinous renting of all estates, had nowe brought Arcadia to feele the pangs of vttermost perill (such conuulsions neuer comming, but that the life of that gouernmēt drawes neere his necessarie period) when to the honest and wise Philanax, equally distracted betwixt desire of his maisters reuenge & care of the estates establishment, there came (vnlooked for) a Macedonian Gentleman, who in short, but pithy manner deliuered vnto him, that the renowmed Euarchus, King of Macedon, purposing to haue visited his olde frend and confederate the King Basilius, was now come within halfe a mile of the Lodges, where hauing vnderstood by certaine Shepheards, the sodain death of their Prince, had sent vnto him, (of whose authoritie & faith he had good knowledge) desiring him to aduertise him, in what securitie he might rest there for that night, where willingly he would (if safely he might) helpe to celebrate the funerals of his auncient companion & allie, adding he need not doubt, since he had brought but twenty in his company, he would be so vnwise as to enter into any forcible attempt with so small force. Philanax hauing entertayned the Gentleman, aswell as in the middest of so many tumults he could, pausing awhile with himselfe, considering how it should not onely be vniust, and against the lawe of Nations, not well to receiue a Prince whom good will had brought among them, but (in respect of the greatnesse of his might) very dangerous to giue him any cause of due offence; remembring withall the excellent trials of his equitie, which made him more famous then his victories, he thought he might be the fittest instrument to redresse the ruines they were in, since his goodnesse put him without suspition, and his greatnesse beyond enuie. Yet weighing with him selfe how hard many heads were to be bridled, and that in this monstrous confusion such mischiefe might be attempted, of which late repentaunce should after be but a simple remedy: he iudged best first to knowe how the peoples mindes would sway to this determination. Therefore desiring the Gentleman to returne to the King his maister, and to beseech him (though with his paynes) to stay for an houre or two, where he was, till he had set things in better order to receiue him: he himselfe went first to the Noblemen, then to Kalander and the principall Mantineans, who were most opposite vnto him; desiring them, that that as the night had moſt bleſſedly ſtayed them frō entring into ciuil bloud, ſo they would be contēt in the night to aſſemble the people together, to heare ſome newes, which he was to deliuer vnto them. There is nothing more deſirous of nouelties, then a man that feares his preſent fortune. Therefore they, whom mutuall diffidence made doubtfull of their vtter deſtruction, were quickly perſwaded to heare of any new matter, which might alter at leaſt, if not helpe the nature of their feare. Namely the chiefeſt men, who as they had moſt to loſe, ſo were moſt iealous of their owne caſe, and were already growne as weary to be followers of Timautus ambitiō, as before they were enuiers of Philanax worthineſſe. As for Kalander & Sympathus, as in the one a vertuous friendſhip had made him ſeeke to aduance, in the other a natural commiſeration had made him willing to protect the excellēt (though vnfortunate) priſoners, ſo were they not againſt this conuocation. For hauing nothing but iuſt deſires in them, they did not miſtruſt the iuſtifying of them. Onely Timautus laboured to haue withdrawne them from this aſſembly, ſaying, it was time to ſtop their eares from the ambitious charmes of Philanax. Let them firſt deliuer Gynecia, and her daughters, which were fit perſons to heare, and then they might begin to ſpeake. That this was but Philanax comming, to linke broyle vpō broyle, becauſe he might auoyd the anſwering of his treſpaſſes, which as he had long intended, ſo had he prepared coloured ſpeeches to diſguiſe them. But as his wordes expreſſed rather a violence of rancour, then any iuſt ground of accuſation, ſo pierced they no further, thē to ſome partiall eares, the multitude yeelding good attētiō to what Philanax would propoſe vnto them: Who, like a man whoſe beſt building was a well-framed conſcience, neither with plauſible wordes, nor fawning countenance, but euen with the graue behauiour of a wiſe father, whom nothing but loue makes to chide, thus ſayd vnto them. I haue (ſayd he) a great matter to deliuer vnto you, and thereout am I to make a greater demaund of you: But truely ſuch hath this late proceeding bene of yours, that I know not what is not to be demaunded of you. Me thinkes I may haue reaſon to require of you, as men are wont among Pirates, that the life of him that neuer hurt you, may be ſafe. Me thinkes I am not without apparence of cauſe, as if you were Cyclopes or Cannibals, to deſire that our Princes body, which hath thirtie yeares maintained vs in a flouriſhing peace, be not torne in peeces, or deuoured among you, but may be ſuffered to yeeld it ſelfe, which neuer was defiled with any of your blouds, to the naturall reſt of the earth. Me thinkes, not as to Arcadians, renowmed for your faith to Prince, and loue of countrey, but as to ſworne enemies of this ſweet ſoyle, I am to deſire you, that at leaſt, if you will haue ſtraungers to your Princes, yet you will not deliuer the ſeignorie of this goodly Kingdome to your noble Kings murtherers. Laſtly, I haue reaſon, as if I had to ſpeake to mad men, to deſire you to be good to your ſelues: For before God, what either barbarous violence, or vnnaturall follie, hath not this day had his ſeate in your mindes, and left his footſteps in your actions? But in troth I loue you too well, to ſtand long diſplaying your faults: I would you your ſelues did forget them, ſo you did not fall againe into them. For my part, I had much rather be an Orator of your prayſes. But now (if you will ſuffer attentiue iudgement, and not foreiudging paſſion, to be the waigher of my wordes) I will deliuer vnto you what a bleſſed meane the Gods haue ſent vnto you, if you liſt to embrace it. I thinke there is none amōg you ſo young, either in yeares, or vnderſtāding, but hath heard the true fame of that iuſt Prince Euarchus king of Macedon. A Prince with whom our late maiſter did euer hold moſt perfect alliance. He, euen he, is this day come, hauing but twentie horſe with him, within two myles of this place, hoping to haue found the vertuous Basilius aliue, but now willing to do honour to his death. Surely, surely the heauenly powers haue in so full a time bestowed him on vs, to vnite our diuisions. For my part therefore I wish, that since among our selues we can not agree in so manifold partialities, we do put the ordering of all these things into his hands, aswell touching the obsequies of the King, the punishment of his death, as the mariage and crowning of our Princesse. He is both by experience and wisedome taught how to direct: his greatnesse such, as no man can disdaine to obey him: his equitie such, as no man neede to feare him. Lastly, as he hath all these qualities to helpe, so hath he (though he would) no force to hurt. If therefore you so thinke good, since our lawes beare that our Princes murther be chastised before his murthered body be buried, we may inuite him to sit to morow in the iudgement seate; which done, you may after proceede to the buriall. Whē Philanax first named Euarchus landing, there was a muttring murmur among the people, as though in that euill ordered weaknes of theirs he had come to conquer their countrey. But when they vnderstood he had so small a retinue, whispring one with another, and looking who should begin to confirme Philanax proposition, at length Sympathus was the first that allowed it, then the rest of the Noblemen, neither did Kalander striue, hoping so excellent a Prince could not but deale graciously with two such young men, whose authoritie ioyned to Philanax, all the popular sort followed. Timautus still blinded with his owne ambitious hast (not remembring factions are no longer to be trusted, then the factious may be perswaded it is for their owne good) would needes striue against the streame, exclaiming against Philanax, that now he shewed who it was, that would betray his countrey to straungers. But well he found, that who is too busie in the foundation of an house, may pull the building about his eares. For the people alreadie tyred with their owne diuisions, (of which his clampring had bene a principall nurse) and beginning now to espye a hauen of rest, hated any thing that should hinder them from it: asked one another whether this were not he, whose euill toung no man could escape? whether it were not Timautus that made the first mutinous Oration, to strengthen the troubles? whether Timautus, without their consent, had not gone about to deliuer Ginecia? And thus inflaming one another against him, they threw him out of the assemblie, and after pursued him with stones and staues, so that with losse of one of his eyes, sore wounded and beaten, he was faine to flye to Philanax feete, for succour of his life: giuing a true lesson, that vice it selfe is forced to seeke the sanctuarie of vertue. For Philanax who hated his euill, but not his person, and knew that a iust punishment might by the maner be vniustly done; remembring withall, that although herein the peoples rage might haue hit rightly, yet if it were nourished in this, no man knew to what extremities it might extend it selfe: with earnest dealing, and employing the vttermost of his authoritie, he did protect the trembling Timautus. And then hauing taken a generall oath, that they should in the nonage of the Princesse, or till these things were settled, yeeld full obedience to Euarchus, so farre as were not preiudiciall to the lawes, customes, and liberties of Arcadia: and hauing taken a particular bond of Sympathus (vnder whom he had a seruaunt of his owne) that the prisoners should be kept close, without conference with any man: he himself honorably accompanied with a great number of torches went to the king Euarchus, whose comming in this sort into Arcadia had thus fallen out.

The wofull Prince Plangus receiuing of Basilius no other succours but onely certaine taine to conduct him to Euarchus, made all possible speede towardes Byzantium, where he vnderstood the King, hauing concluded all his warres with the winning of that towne, had now for some good space made his abode. But being farre gone on his way, he receiued certaine intelligence, that Euarchus was not onely some dayes before returned into Macedon, but since was gone with some haste to visit that coast of his countrey that lay towards Italy. The occasion giuen by the Latines, who hauing alreadie gotten into their handes, partly by conqueste, and partly by confederacie, the greatest part of Italie, and long gaped to deuoure Greece also (obseruing the present oportunitie of Euarchus absence, and Basilius solitarinesse, which two Princes they knew to be in effect the whole strength of Greece) were euen ready to lay an vniust gripe vpon it, which after they might beautifie with the noble name of conqueste. Which purpose though they made not knowne by any solemne denouncing of warre, but contrariwise gaue many tokens of continuing still their former amitie: yet the staying of his subiectes shippes, traffiking as Marchants into those partes, together with the dayly preparation of shipping, and other warlike prouisions in Portes, most conuenient for the transporting of souldiers, occasioned Euarchus (not vnacquainted with such practises) first to suspect, then to discerne, lastly, to seeke to preuent the intended mischiefe. Yet thinking warre neuer to be accepted, vntill it be offered by the hand of necessitie, he determined so long openly to hold them his friends, as open hostilitie bewrayed them not his enemies; not ceasing in the meane time by letters and messages to moue the States of Greece by vniting their strength, to make timely prouision against this perill: by many reasons making them see, that, though in respect of place some of them might seeme further remoued from the first violence of the storme, yet being imbarked in the same ship, the finall wracke must needs be common to them all. And knowing the mighty force of example, with the weake effect of faire discourses not waited on with agreeable actions, what he perswaded them, himselfe performed, leauing in his owne realme nothing either vndone or vnprouided, which might be thought necessary for withstanding an inuasion. His first care was to put his people in a readinesse for warre, and by his experienced souldiers to traine the vnskilfull to martiall exercises. For the better effecting whereof, as also for meeting with other inconueniences in such doubtful times incident to the most setled states, making of the diuerse regions of his whole kingdome so many diuisions as he thought conuenient, he appointed the charge of them to the greatest, and of greatest trust he had about him: arming them with sufficient authoritie to leauie forces within their seuerall gouernements, both for resisting the inuading enemy, and punishing the disordered subiect. Hauing thus prepared the body, and assured the heart of his countrey against any mischiefe that might attaint it, he then tooke into his carefull consideration the externall partes, giuing order both for the repairing and increasing his nauy, and for the fortifying of such places, especially on the sea coast, as either commoditie of landing, weakenesse of the countrey, or any other respect of aduantage was likeliest to draw the enemy vnto. But being none of them who thinke all things done, for which they haue once giuen direction, he followed euery where his commandement with his presence, which witnesse of euery mans slacknesse or diligẽce, chastising the one, & encouraging the other, suffered not the fruite of any profitable counsell for want of timely taking to be lost. And thus making one place succeede another in the progresse of wisdome & vertue, he was now come to Aulon a principall port of his realme, when the poore Plangus extreamely wearied with his long iourney (desire of succouring Erona no more relieuing, then feare of not succouring her in time aggrauating his trauell) by a lamentable narration of his childrens death, called home his cares from encountring forreine enemies, to suppresse the insurrection of inward passions. The matter so hainous, the maner so villanous, the losse of such persons, in so vnripe yeares, in a time so daungerous to the whole state of Greece, how vehemētly it moued to griefe and cōpassiō others, only not blind to the light of vertue, nor deafe to the voyce of their country, might perchance by a more cuuning workman in liuely colours be deliuered. But the face of Euarchus sorrow, to the one in nature, to both in affection, a father, & iudging the world so much the more vnworthily depriued of those excellēcies, as himself was better iudge of so excellēt worthines, can no otherwise be shadowed out by the skilfullest pencell thē by couering it ouer with the vaile of silēce. And indeed that way himself tooke, with so patient a quietnes receiuing this pitifull relation, that all words of weakenes suppressed, magnanimitie seemed to triumph ouer misery. Only receiuing of Plangus perfit instruction of all things cōcerning Plexirtus & Artaxia, with promise not only to aide him in deliuering Erona, but also with vehemēt protestatiō, neuer to returne into Macedon, till he had pursued the murtherers to death: he dispatched with speed a ship for Byzātium, cōmāding the gouernour to prouide all necessaries for the war against his owne comming, which he purposed should be verie shortly. In this ship Plangus would needs go, impatient of stay, for that in many dayes before he had vnderstood nothing of his Ladies estate. Soone after whose departure, newes was brought to Euarchus, that all the ships detained in Italie were returned. For the Latines finding by Euarchus proceedings their intēt to be frustrate (as before by his sodaine returne they doubted it was discouered) deeming it no wisedome to shew the will, not hauing the abilitie to hurt, had not only in free & friendly maner dismissed them, but for the time wholly omitted their enterprise, attending the oportunitie of fitter occasion. By meanes whereof Euarchus, rid frō the cumber of that war (likely otherwise to haue stayed him longer) with so great a fleete as hast would suffer him to assemble, forthwith imbarqued for Byzantium. And now followed with fresh winds he had in short time run a long course, when on a night encountred with an extreame tempest, his ships were so scattered, that scarcely any two were left together. As for the Kings owne ship, depriued of all company, sore brused, and weather-beaten, able no longer to brooke the seas churlish entertainment, a litle before day it recouered the shore. The first light made thē see it was the vnhappy coast of Laconia: for no other country could haue shown the like euidēce of vnnaturall war. Which hauing long endured betweene the nobility and the Helotes, and once compounded by Pyrocles, vnder the name of Daiphantus, immediatly vpon his departure had broken out more violently then euer before. For the King taking the oportunitie of their Captaines absence, refused to performe the conditions of peace, as extorted from him by rebellious violence. Whereupon they were againe deepely entred into warre, with so notable an hatred towardes the very name of a King, that Euarchus (though a straunger vnto them) thought it not safe there to leaue his person, where neither his owne force could be a defence, nor the sacred name of Maiestie, a protection. Therefore calling to him an Arcadian (one that comming with Plangus had remained with Euarchus, desirous to see the warres) he demaunded of him for the next place of suretie, where he might make his stay, vntill he might heare somewhat of his fleete, or cause his ship to be repaired. The Gentleman glad to haue this occasion of doing seruice to Euarchus, and honour to Basilius (to whom he knew he ſhould bring a moſt welcome gueſt) told him, that if it pleaſed him to commit himſelfe to Arcadia, (a part whereof lay open to their vew) he would vndertake ere the next night were far ſpent to guide him ſafely to his maſter Baſilius. The preſent neceſſitie much preuailed with Euarchus, yet more a certaine vertuous deſire to trie, whether by his authoritie he might withdraw Baſilius from burying himſelfe aliue, and to imploy the reſt of his old yeares in doing good, the onely happie action of mans life. For beſides the vniuerſall caſe of Greece, depriued by this meanes of a principall piller, he weighed and pitied the pitifull ſtate of the Arcadian people, who were in worſe caſe then if death had taken away their Prince. For ſo yet their neceſſitie would haue placed ſome one to the helme: now, a Prince being, and not doing like a Prince, keeping and not exerciſing the place, they were in ſo much more euill caſe, as they could not prouide for their euil. Theſe rightly wiſe & vertuous conſiderations eſpecially moued Euarchus to take his iourney towards the deſert, where arriuing within night, and vnderſtanding to his great griefe, the newes of the Princes death, he wayted for his ſafe conduct from Philanax: in the meane time taking his reſt vnder a tree, with no more affected pompes, then as a man that knew, howſoeuer he was exalted, the beginning and end of his body was earth. But Philanax as ſoone as he was in ſight of him, lighting from his horſe, preſented himſelfe vnto him in all thoſe humble behauiours, which not onely the great reuerēce of the partie, but the conceit of ones owne miſerie, is wont to frame. Euarchus raſe vp vnto him with ſo gracious a countenaunce, as the goodneſſe of his minde had long exerciſed him vnto: carefull ſo much more to deſcend in all curteſies, as he ſaw him beare a low repreſentation of his afflicted ſtate. But to Philanax, aſſoone as by neare looking on him, he might perfectly behold him, the grauitie of his countenaunce, & yeares, not much vnlike to his late deceaſſed, but euer beloued maſter, brought his forme ſo liuely vnto his memorie, and reuiued ſo all the thoughts of his wonted ioyes within him, that in ſteede of ſpeaking to Euarchus, he ſtood a while like a man gone a farre iourney frō himſelf, calling as it were with his minde an account of his loſſes: imagining that this paine needed not, if nature had not bin violently ſtopped of her owne courſe: & caſting more louing then wiſe conceits, what a world this would haue bin, if this ſudden accident had not interrupted it. And ſo far ſtrayed he into his rauing melancholie, that his eyes nimbler then his toung, let fall a ſloud of teares, his voyce being ſtopped with extremitie of ſobbing, ſo much had his friendſhip caried him to Baſilius, that he thought no age was timely for his death. But at length taking the occaſion of his owne weeping, he thus did ſpeake to Euarchus. Let not my teares moſt worthily renowmed Prince make my preſence vnpleaſant, or my ſpeech vnmarked of you. For the iuſtneſſe of the cauſe, takes away the blame of any weakeneſſe in me; and the affinitie that the ſame beareth to your greatneſſe, ſeemes euen lawfully to claime pitie in you: A Prince of a Princes fall, a louer of iuſtice, of a moſt vniuſt violēce. And giue me leaue excellēt Euarchus to ſay, I am but the repreſenter of all the late floriſhing Arcadia, which now with mine eyes doth weepe, with my toung doth complaine, with my knees doth lay it ſelf at your feete, which neuer haue bin vnready to carie you to the vertuous protecting of innocents. Imagine, vouchſafe to imagine, moſt wiſe and good King, that here is before your eyes, the pitifull ſpectacle of a moſt dolorouſly ending tragedie: wherein I do but play the part of all the new miſerable prouince, which being ſpoiled of their guide, doth lye like a ſhip without a Pilot, tumbling vp and downe in the vncertaine waues, till it either runne it ſelfe vpon the rockes of ſelfe-diuiſion, or be ouerthrowne by the ſtormie winde of forreine force. Arcadia finding her ſelfe in theſe deſolate termes, doth ſpeake, and I ſpeake for her, to thee not vainly puiſſant Prince, that ſince now ſhe is not onely robbed of the naturall ſupport of her Lord, but ſo ſuddenly robbed, that ſhe hath not breathing time to ſtand for her ſafetie: ſo vnfortunately, that it doth apall their mindes, though they had leiſure: and ſo miſchieuouſly, that it doth exceede both the ſuddenneſſe and infortunateneſſe of it: thou wilt lend thine arme vnto her, and as a man, take compaſſion of mankind, as a vertuous man chaſtice moſt abhominable vice, and as a Prince protect a people, which all haue with one voyce called for thy goodneſſe: thinking, that as thou art onely able, ſo thou art fully able, to redreſſe their imminent ruines. They do therefore with as much confidence as neceſſitie, flie vnto you for ſuccour, they lay themſelues open to you: to you, I meane your ſelfe, ſuch as you haue euer bene: that is to ſay, one, that hath alwayes had his determinations bounded with equitie. They onely reſerue the right to Baſilius bloud; the maner to the auncient preſcribing of their lawes. For the reſt without exception, they yeeld ouer vnto you, as to the elected protectour of this kingdome, which name and office they beſeech you till you haue layd a ſufficient foundation of tranquilitie to take vpon you; the particularitie both of their ſtatutes and demaundes you ſhall preſently after vnderſtand. Now only I am to ſay vnto you, that this countrey falls to be a faire field, to prooue whether the goodlie tree of your vertue, will liue in all ſoiles. Here I ſay will be ſeene, whether either feare can make you ſhort, or the likerouſneſſe of dominion make you beyond iuſtice. And I can for concluſion ſay no more but this, you muſt thinke vpon my wordes and your anſwere, depend not only the quiet, but the liues of ſo many thouſands, which for their auncient confederacie, in this their extreame neceſſity, deſire neither the expence of your treaſure, nor hazard of your ſubiects, but onely the benefit of your wiſedome, whoſe both glory and encreaſe ſtandes in the exerciſing of it. The ſumme of this requeſt was vtterly vnlooked for of Euarchus, which made him the more diligent in marking his ſpeech, and after his ſpeech take the greater pauſe for a perfect reſolution. For as of the one ſide, he thought nature required nothing more of him then that he ſhould be a helpe to them of like creation, and had his heart no whit commaunded with feare, thinking his life well paſſed, hauing ſatisfied the tyrannie of time with the courſe of many yeares, the expectation of the world with more then expected honour, laſtly the tribute due to his owne minde with the dayly offering of moſt vertuous actions: ſo of the other he wayed the iuſt reproch that followed thoſe who eaſily enter into other folkes buſineſſe, with the opinion might be conceiued, loue of ſeignorie rather then of iuſtice, had made him embarke himſelfe thus, into a matter nothing pertaining to him, eſpecially in a time when earneſt occaſion of his owne buſineſſe ſo greatly required his preſence. But in the end wiſedome being an eſſentiall and not an opinionate thing, made him rather to bend to what was in it ſelfe good, then what by euill mindes might be iudged not good. And therein did ſee, that though that people did not belong vnto him, yet doing good which is not incloſed within any termes of people did belōg vnto him, & if neceſſity forced him for ſome time to abide in Arcadia, the neceſſitie of Arcadia might iuſtly demaund ſome fruite of abiding. To this ſecret aſſurance of his owne worthineſſe (which although it be neuer ſo well cloathed in modeſtie, yet alwayes liues in the worthyeſt mindes) did much puſh him forward, ſaying vnto himſelfe, the treaſure of thoſe inward giftes he had, were beſtowed by the heauens vpon him, to be beneficiall and not idle. On which determination reſting and yet willing before he waded ded any further, to examine well the depth of the others proffer; he thus with that well appeased gesture, vnpassionate nature bestoweth vpon mankind, made answere to Philanax most vrgent petition. Although long experience hath made me know, all men (and so Princes which be but men) to be subiect to infinite casualties, the very constitution of our liues remaining in continuall chaunge: yet the affaires of this countrey, or at least my meeting so iumply with them, makes me abashed with the straungenesse of it. With much paine I am come hither to see my long approued friend, and now I finde if I will see him, I must see him dead: after, for mine owne security, I seeke to be warranted mine owne life: and there suddenly am I appointed to be a iudge of other mens liues, though a friend to him, yet am I a straunger to the countrey, and now of a straunger you would suddenly make a director. I might obiect to your desire my weakenesse, which age perhaps hath wrought in minde and bodie: and iustly I may pretend the necessitie of mine owne affaires, which as I am by all true rules most nearely tyed, so can they not log beare the delay of my absence. But though I would and could dispence with these difficulties, what assurance can I haue of the peoples will? Which hauing so many circles of imaginations can hardly be inclosed in one point. Who knowes a people, that knowes not sudden opinion makes them hope, which hope if it be not answered, they fall in hate? Chusing and refusing, erecting, and ouerthrowing, according as the presentnesse of any fancie caries them. Euen this their hastie drawing to me, makes me thinke they wilbe as hastily withdrawen from me, for it is but one ground of inconstancie, soone to take or soone to leaue. It may be they haue heard of Euarchus more then cause: their own eyes wilbe perhaps more curious iudges, out of heare say they may haue builded many conceits, which I can not, perchaunce will not performe, then will vndeserued repentance be a greater shame and iniurie vnto me, then their vndeserued proffer is honour. And to conclude I must be fully informed, how the patient is minded, before I can promise to vndertake the cure. Philanax was not of the moderne mindes, who make suters magistrates: but did euer thinke the vnwilling worthy man, was fitter then the vndeseruing desirer. Therefore the more Euarchus drew backe, the more hee found in him that the cunningest pilot doth most dread the rockes, the more earnestly he pursued his publique request vnto him. He desired him not to make any weake excuses of his weakenesse, since so many examples had well proued his minde was strong to ouerpasse the greatest troubles, and his bodie strong inough to obey his minde; and that so long as they were ioyned together, he knew Euarchus would thinke it no wearisome exercise, to make them vessels of vertuous actiõs. The dutie to his countrey, he acknowledged, which as he had so setled, as it was not to feare any sudden alteration, so since it did want him, as well it might endure a fruitfull as an idle absence. As for the doubt he conceiued of the peoples constancie in this their election, he sayd it was such a doubt as all humane actions are subiect vnto: yet as much as in politique matters, which receiue not Geometricall certainties, a man may assure himselfe there was euident likelyhood to be conceiued, of the continuance, both in their vnanimitie, and his worthinesse: whereof the one was apt to be held, and the other to hold, ioyned to the present necessitie, the firmest band of mortall mindes. In summe, he alledged so many reasons to Euarchus his minde, (alreadie inclined to enter into any vertuous action) that he yeelded to take vpon himselfe the iudgement of the present cause, so as he might finde in deede that such was the peoples desire out of iudgement and not faction. Therfore mounting on their horses, they hasted to the lodges, where they found, though late in the night, the people wakefullie watching for the issue of Philanax Embassage. No man thinking the matter would be well done, without he had his voice in it, and each deeming his owne eyes the best gardiens of his throate in that vnaccustomed tumult. But whē they saw Philanax returne, hauing on his right hand the king Euarchus, on whom they had now placed the greatest burthen of their feares, with ioyfull shoutes and applauding acclamations, they made him and the world quickly know, that one mans sufficiencie is more auailable then ten thousands multitude. So euill ballanced be the extremities of popular mindes: and so much naturall imperiousnesse there restes in a well formed spirit. For as if Euarchus had bene borne of the Princelie bloud of Arcadia, or that long and well acquainted proofe had ingrafted him in their country, so flocked they about this straunger, most of them alreadie, frō deiected feares, rising to ambitious considerations, who should catch the first hold of his fauour. And then from those crying welcomes to babling one with the other, some praysing Philanax for his succeeding paine, others liking Euarchus aspect, and as they iudged his age by his face, so iudging his wisedome by his age, Euarchus passed through them like a man that did neither disdaine a people not yet was anie thing tickled with their flatteries. But alwayes holding his owne, a man might reade a constant determination in his eyes. And in that sort dismounting among them, he forthwith demanded the cōuocation to be made, which accordinglie was done, with as much order and silence; as it might appeare, Neptune had not more force to appease the rebellious winde, then the admiration of an extraordinarie vertue hath, to temper a disordered multitude. He being raised vp vpon a place more high then the rest, where he might be best vnderstood, in this sort spake vnto them. I vnderstand said he, faithfull Arcadians, by my L. Philanax, that you haue with one consent, chosen me to be the iudge of the late euils hapned: orderer of the present disorders: and finallie protector of this countrie, till therein it be seene what the customes of Arcadia require. He could say no further, being stopped with a generall crie, that so it was; giuing him all the honorable titles, and happie wishes they could imagine. He beckned vnto them for silence, and then thus againe proceeded, well said he, how good choise you haue made, the attending must be in you, the proofe in me. But because it many times fals out, we are much deceiued in others, we being the first to deceiue our selues, I am to require you, not to haue an ouershooting expectation of me, the most cruell aduersarie of all honourable doings. Nor promise your selues wonders out of a sudden liking: but remember I am a man, that is to say, a creature, whose reason is often darkned with errour. Secondly, that you will lay your hearts voyde of foretaken opinions: else whatsoeuer I do or say, will be measured by a wrong rule, like them that haue the yellow Iaundise, euery thing seeming yellow vnto them. Thirdly, whatsoeuer debates haue risen among you, may be vtterly extinguished, knowing that euē among the best men are diuersities of opiniōs, which are no more in true reason to breed hatred, then one that loues black, should be angrie with him that is cloathed in white, for thoughts and conceits are the verie apparell of the minde. Lastly, that you do not easilie iudge of your iudge, but since you will haue me to commaund, thinke it is your part to obey. And in reward of this, I wil promise and protest vnto you, that to the vttermost of my skill; both in the generall lawes of nature, especially of Greece, and particular of Arcadia (wherein I must confesse I am not vnacquainted) I will not onely see the passed euils duly punished, and your weale hereafter established; but for your defence in it, if neede shall require, I wil imploy the forces and treasures of mine owne countrey. In the meane time, time, this shalbe the first order I will take, that no man vnder paine of grieuous punishment, name me by any other name but Protectour of Arcadia. For I will not leaue any possible colour, to any of my naturall successours, to make claime to this, which by free election you haue bestowed vpon me. And so I vow vnto you, to depose my selfe of it assoone as the iudgement is passed, the King buried, and his lawfull successour appointed. For the first whereof, I meane the trying which be guiltie of the Kings death, and these other haynous trespasses, because your customes require such hast I will no longer delay it, then till to morrow as soone as the Sunne shall giue vs fit oportunitie. You may therefore retire your selues to your rest, that you may be readier to be present, at these so great important matters. With many allowing tokens was Euarchus speech heard, who now by Philanax (that tooke the principall care of doing all due seruices vnto him) was offered a lodging made readie for him, (the rest of the people aswell as the small commoditie of that place would suffer, yeelding their weary heads to sleepe) when loe the night throughly spent in these mixed matters, was for that time banished the face of the earth, and Euarchus seeing the day begin to disclose his cõfortable beauties, desiring nothing more, then to ioyne speed with iustice, willed Philanax presently to make the iudgement place be put in order: & assoone as the people (who yet were not fully dispersed) might be brought together, to bring forth the prisoners and the Kings bodie. Which the maner was, should in such cases be held in sight, though couered with blacke veluet, vntill they that were accused to be the murtherers were quitted or condemned, whether the reason of the law were to shew the more gratefull loue to their Prince, or by that spectacle, the more to remember the iudge of his dutie. Philanax who now thought in himselfe, he approched by the iust reuenge he so much desired, went with all care & diligence to performe his charge. But first it shalbe well to know, how the poore and Princely prisoners, passed this tedious night. There was neuer tyrant exercised his rage with more grieuous torments, vpon any he most hated, thẽ afflicted Gynecia did crucifie her owne soule, after the guiltinesse of her heart was surcharged with the suddennesse of her husbãds death, for although that effect came not from her minde, yet her minde being euil, and the effect euill, she thought the iustice of God had for the beginning of her paines coupled them together. This incessantly boyled in her breast, but most of all, when Philanax hauing closely imprisoned her, she was left more freely to suffer the firebrands of her owne thoughts, especially when it grew darke, and had nothing left by her but a little lampe, whose small light to a perplexed minde, might rather yeeld fearefull shadowes, then any assured sight. Then began the heapes of her miseries, to weygh down the platforme of her iudgement, then began despaire to lay his ougly clawes vpon her, she began then, to feare the heauenly powers (she was wont to reuerence) not like a child, but like an enemie, neither kept she her selfe from blasphemous repyning against her creation. O Gods would she cry out, why did you make me to destruction? If you loue goodnesse, why did you not giue me a good minde? Or if I cannot haue it without your gift, why do you plague me? Is it in me to resist the mightinesse of your power? Then would she imagine she saw strange sights, and that she heard the cries of hellish ghosts, then would she skritch out for succour, but no man comming vnto her she would faine haue killed her self, but knew not how. At sometimes againe, the very heauinesse of her imaginations would close vp her senses to a little sleepe: but then did her dreames become her tormentours. One time it would seeme vnto her, Philanax was haling her by the haire of the head, and hauing put out her eyes, was ready to throw her into a burning fornace. Another time she would thinke she saw her husband making the complaint of his death to Pluto, and the magistrates of that infernall region, contending in great debate, to what eternall punishment they should allot her. But long her dreaming would not hold, but that it would fall vpon Zelmane: to whom she would thinke she was crying for mercy, and that she did passe away by her in silence without any shew of pitying her mischiefe. Then waking out of a broken sleepe, and yet wishing she might euer haue slept, new formes, but of the same miseries, would seaze her minde, she feared death, and yet desired death, she had passed the vttermost of shame, & yet shame was one of her cruellest assaulters, she hated Pyrocles as the originall of her mortall ouerthrow: & yet the loue she had conceiued to him, had still a high authoritie of her passions. O Zelmane, would she say (not knowing how neare he himselfe was to as great a daunger) now shalt thou glut thy eyes, with the dishonoured death of thy enemie! Enemie alas enemy, since so thou hast well shewed, thou wilt haue me account thee, couldest thou not aswell haue giuen me a determinate deniall, as to disguise thy first diguising, with a double dissembling? Perchaunce if I had bene vtterly hopelesse, the vertue was once in me, might haue called together his forces, and not haue bene led captiue to this monstrous thraldome of punished wickednesse. Then would her owne knowing of good inflame anew the rage of despaire: which becomming an vnresisted Lord in her breast, she had no other comfort but in death, which yet she had in horrour, when she thought of. But the wearisome detesting of her self, made her long for the dayes approch, at which time she determined to continue her former course, in acknowledging any thing which might hastē her end: Wherein although she did not hope for the end of her torments, feeling already the beginning of hell agonies; yet according to the nature of paine, the present being most intollerable, she desired to change that, and put to aduēture the ensuing. And thus rested the restlesse Gynecia; no lesse sorrowfull, though lesse ragēfull were the mindes of the Princesse Pamela, & the Lady Philoclea, whose onely aduantages were, that they had not consented to so much euill, and so were at greater peace with themselues: and that they were not left alone, but might mutually beare part of each others woes. For when Thilanax not regarding Pamelas Princely protestations, had by force left her vnder gard with her sister, and that the two sisters were matched, aswell in the disgraces of fortune, as they had bene in the best beauties of nature: those things that till then, bashfulnesse and mistrust had made them hold reserued one from the other, now feare, the vnderminer of all determinations, and necessitie the victorious rebell of all lawes, forced them enterchangeably to lay open. Their passions then so swelling in them, as they would haue made Auditors of stones, rather then haue swallowed vp in silence, the choking aduentures were fallen vnto them. Truely the hardest hearts, which haue at any time thought womans teares to be a matter of sleight compassiō (imagining that faire weather will quickly after follow) would now haue bene mollified: and bene compelled to confesse, that the fairer a Diamond it, the more pitie it is it should receiue a blemish. Although no doubt, their faces did rather beautifie sorrow, then sorrow could darken that, which euen in darknesse did shine. But after they had so long, as their other afflictions would suffer them, with dolefull ceremonies bemoned their fathers death: they sate downe together apparrelled as their misaduentures had found them. Pamela in her iourneying weedes now conuerted to another vse: Philoclea onely in her night gowne, which she thought should be the rayment of her funerals. But when the excellent creatures, had after much

panting(with their inward trauell) gotten ſo much breathing power, as to make a pitifull diſcourſe one to the other,what had befallen them, & that by the plaine cõparing the caſe they were in,they throughly foũd, that their grieues were not more like in regard of themſelues,then like in reſpect of the ſubiect(the two Princes (as Pamela had learned of Muſidorus) being ſo minded , as they would euer make both their fortunes one)it did more vnite ,& ſo ſtrengthen their lamentation: ſeeing the one could not be miſerable , but that it muſt neceſſarily make the other miſerable alſo . That therefore was the firſt matter their ſweet mouthes deliuered , the declaring the paſſionate beginning , troubleſome proceeding, and daungerous ending, their neuer ending loues had paſſed . Andwhen at any time they entred into the prayſes of the yong Princes,too long it would haue exerciſed their toungs, but that their memory forthwith warned them,the more prayſeworthy they were,the more at that time they were worthy of lamentation. Then againe to crying and wringing of hands;& then a new,as vnquiet griefe ſought each corner , to new diſcourſes,frõ diſcourſes to wiſhes,from wiſhes to prayers. Eſpecially the tender Philoclea,who as ſhe was in yeares younger , and had neuer lifted vp her minde to any opinion of ſoueraignetie,ſo was ſhe the apter to yeeld to her misfortune;hauing no ſtronger debates in her minde, then a man may ſay a moſt wittie childhood is wont to nouriſh: as to imagine with her ſelfe , why Philanax and the other noble men , ſhould deale ſo cruelly by her,that had neuer deſerued euill of any of them . And how they could finde in their hearts,to impriſon ſuch a perſonage,as ſhe did figure Pyrocles, whom ſhe thought all the world was boũd to loue,as well as ſhe did.But Pamela,although endued with a vertuous mildneſſe,yet the knowledge of her ſelfe, and what was due vnto her,made her heart full of a ſtronger diſdaine,againſt her aduerſitie.

So that ſhe ioyned the vexation for her friend , with the ſpite to ſee her ſelfe as ſhe thought rebelliouſly detained , and mixed deſirous thoughts to helpe , with reuengefull thoughts if ſhe could not helpe . And as in pangs of death,the ſtronger heart feeles the greater torment , becauſe it doth the more reſiſt to his oppreſſour; ſo her minde, the nobler it was ſet, and had already embraced the higher thoughts, ſo much more it did repine ; and the more it repined , the more helpleſſe wounds it gaue vnto it ſelfe . But when great part of the night was paſſed ouer the dolefull Muſicke of theſe ſweete Ladyes complaints , and that leaſure though with ſome ſtrife , had brought Pamela to know , that an Eagle when ſhe is in a Cage, muſt not thinke to do like an Eagle,remembring with themſelues , that it was likely the next day,the Lords would proceede againſt thoſe they had impriſoned. They imployed the reſt of the night , in writing vnto them, with ſuch earneſtneſſe as the matter required , but in ſuch ſtiles as the ſtate of their thoughts was apt to faſhion . In the meane time , Tyrocles and Muſidorus, were recommended to ſo ſtrong a guard, as they might well ſee it was meant , they ſhould pay no leſſe price then their liues, for the getting out of that place , which they like men indeede , (fortifying courage with the true Rampier of patience) did ſo endure , as they did rather appeare gouernours of neceſſitie , then ſeruaunts to fortune. The whole ſumme of their thoughts reſting vpon the ſafetie of their Ladies , and their care one for the other: wherein (if at all) their hearts did ſeeme to receiue ſome ſoftneſſe . For ſometimes Muſidorus would feele ſuch a motion to his friend , and his vnworthy caſe , that he would fall into ſuch kinde ſpeeches . My Pyrocles would he ſay , how vnhappy may I thinke Theſſalia , that hath bene as it were , the middle way to this euill eſtate of yours ? For if you had not bene there brought vp , the Sea ſhould not haue had this power, thus to seuer you from your deare father. I haue therefore, (if complaints do at any time become a mans heart) most cause to complaine, since my countrey, which receiued the honour of Pyrocles education, should be a step to his ouerthrow, if humane chaunces can be counted an ouerthrow to him, that standes vpon vertue. Oh excellent Musidorus answered Pyrocles, how do you teach me rather, to fall out with my selfe, and my fortune, since by you I haue receiued all good, you onely by me this affliction? to you and your vertuous mother, I in my tendrest yeares, and fathers greatest troubles, was sent for succour. There did I learne the sweete mysteries of Philosophie; there had I your liuely example, to confirme that which I learned; there lastly had I your friendship, which no vnhappinesse can euer make you say, but that hath made me happy. Now see how my destinie (the Gods know) not my will, hath rewarded you: my father sendes for you away out of your land, whence but for me you had not come: what after followed, you know. It was my loue not yours, which first stayed you here; and therefore if the heauens euer held a iust proportion, it were I and not you, that should feele the smart. O blame not the heauens, sweete Pyrocles sayd Musidorus, as their course neuer alters, so is there nothing done by the vnreachable ruler of them, but hath an euerlasting reason for it. And to say the truth of these things, we should deale vngratefully with nature, if we should be forgetfull receiuers of her giftes, and diligent Auditors of the chaunces we like not. We haue liued, and haue liued to be good to our selues, and others: our soules which are put into the stirring earth of our bodies, haue atchieued the causes of their hither comming: They haue knowne, and honored with knowledge, the cause of their creation, and to many men (for in this time, place, and fortune, it is lawfull for vs to speake gloriously) it hath bene behouefull, that we should liue. Since then eternitie is not to be had in this coniunction, what is to be lost by the separation, but time? which since it hath his end, when that is once come, all what is past is nothing: and by the protracting nothing gotten, but labour and care. Do not me therefore that wrong, (who somthing in yeares, but much in all other desertes, am fitter to dye then you) as to say, you haue brought me to any euill: since the loue of you, doth ouerballance all bodily mischiefes, and those mischiefes be but mischiefes to the baser mindes, too much delighted with the kennell of this life. Neither will I any more yeeld to my passiō of lamenting you, which howsoeuer it might agree to my exceeding friendship, surely it would nothing to your exceeding vertue. Adde this to your noble speech my deare Cosin, sayd Pyrocles, that if we complaine of this our fortune, or seeme to our selues faultie, in hauing one hurt the other, we shewe a repentaunce of the loue we beare to these matchlesse creatures, or at least a doubt, it should be ouer dearely bought, which for my part (and so dare I answere for you) I call all the Gods to witnesse, I am so farre from, that no shame, no torment, no death, would make me forgo the least part of the inward honour, essentiall pleasure, and liuing life, I haue enioyed in the presence of the faultlesse Philoclea. Take the preheminence in all things, but in true louing, answered Musidorus, for the confession of that no death shall get of me. Of that answered Pyrocles soberly smiling, I perceiue we shall haue a debate in the other world, if at least there remaine any thing of remembraunce in that place. I do not thinke the contrarie sayd Musidorus, although you know, it is greatly held, that with the death of bodie and sences (which are not onely the beginning, but dwelling and nourishing of passions, thoughts and imaginations) they fayling, memorie likewise failes, which riseth onely out of them: & then is there

left nothing, but the intellectuall part or intelligence, which voide of all morall vertues, which ſtand in the meane of perturbations, doth only liue in the contemplatiue vertue, and power of the omnipotent good, the ſoule of ſoules, and vniuerſall life of this great worke, & therefore is vtterly void, from the poſſibility of drawing to it ſelfe, theſe ſenſible conſiderations. Certainly anſwered Pyrocles, I eaſily yeeld, that we ſhall not know one another, and much leſſe theſe paſſed things, with a ſenſible or paſſionate knowledge. For the cauſe being taken away, the effects followe. Neither do I thinke, we ſhall haue ſuch a memory, as now we haue, which is but a relicke of the ſẽſes, or rather a print the ſẽſes haue left of things paſſed in our thoughts, but it ſhall be a vitall power of that very intelligence; which as while it was here, it held the chiefe ſeate of our life, and was as it were the laſt reſort, to which of all our knowledges, the higheſt appeale came, and ſo by that meanes was neuer ignorant of our actions, though many times rebelliouſly reſiſted, alwayes with this priſon darkened: ſo, much more being free of that priſon, and returning to the life of all things, where all infinite knowledge is, it cannot but be a right intelligence, which is both his name and being, of things both preſent and paſſed, though voide of imagining to it ſelfe any thing, but euen growne like to his Creator, hath all things, with a ſpirituall knowledge before it. The difference of which is as hard for vs to conceiue, as it had for vs, when we were in our mothers wombes, to comprehend (if any body would haue tolde vs) what kind of light we now in this life ſee, what kind of knowledge we now haue, yet now we do not only feele our preſent being, but we conceiue what we were before we were borne, though remembrance make vs not do it, but knowledge, and though we are vtterly without any remorſe of any miſery we might then ſuffer. Euen ſuch and much more ods, ſhall there be at that ſecond deliuery of ours; when voide of ſenſible memory, or memoratiue paſſion, we ſhall not ſee the colours', but lifes of all things that haue bene or can be: and ſhall (as I hope) knowe our friendſhip, though exempt from the earthly cares of friendſhip, hauing both vnited it, and our ſelues, in that high and heauenly loue of the vnquencheable light.

As hee had ended his ſpeech, Muſidorus looking with a heauenly ioy vpon him, ſang this ſong vnto him, hee had made before loue turned his muſe to another ſubiect.

Since natures workes be good, and death doth ſerue
As natures worke: why ſhould we feare to die?
Since feare is vaine, but when it may preſerue,
Why ſhould we feare, that which we cannot flie?

Feare is more paine, then is the paine it feares,
Diſarming humane minds, of natiue might:
While each conceite, an ougly figure beares,
Which were not euill, well vew'd in reaſons light.

Our owly eyes, which dimm'd with paſſions be,
And ſcarce diſcerne the dawne of comming day,
Let them be clearde, and now begin to ſee,
Our life is but a ſtep, in duſtie way.
Then let vs hold, the bliſſe of peacefull mind,
Since this we feele, great loſſe we cannot find.

Thus did they like quiet Swannes, ſing their owne obſequies, and vertuouſly enable their minds againſt all extremities, which they did thinke would fall vpon them, eſpecially reſoluing, that the firſt care they would haue, ſhould be by taking the fault vpon themſelues, to cleare the two Ladies, of whoſe caſe (as of nothing elſe that had happened) they had not any knowledge. Although their friendly hoſte, the honeſt gentleman Kalander, ſeeking all meanes how to helpe them, had endeuored to ſpeake with them, and to make them know who ſhould be their iudge. But the curious ſeruant of Philanax forbad him the entry, vpon paine of death. For ſo it was agreed vpon, that no man ſhould haue any conference with them, for feare of new tumults. Inſomuch that Kalander was conſtrayned to retire himſelfe, hauing yet obtained thus much, that he would deliuer vnto the two Princes, their apparell and iewels, which being left with him at Mantinea (wiſely conſidering that their diſguiſed weedes, which were all as then they had, would make them more odious in the ſight of the iudges) he had that night ſent for, and now brought vnto them. They accepted their owne, with great thankfulneſſe, knowing from whence it came, and attired themſelues in it againſt the next day, which being indeed rich and Princely, they accordingly determined to maintaine the names of Palladius and Daiphantus, as before it is mentioned. Then gaue they themſelues to conſider, in what ſort they might defend their cauſes, for they thought it no leſſe vaine to wiſh death, then cowardly to feare it, till ſomething before morning, a ſmall ſlumber taking them, they were by and by after called vp to come to the aunſwere, of no leſſe then their liues imported. But in this ſort was the iudgement ordered. As ſoone as the morning had taken a full poſſeſſion of the Element, Euarchus called vnto him Philanax, and willed him to draw out into the middeſt of the greene (before the chiefe lodge) the throne of iudgement ſeate, in which Baſilius was wont to ſit, and according to their cuſtomes, was euer carried with the Prince. For Euarchus did wiſely conſider, the people to be naturally taken with exterior ſhewes, farre more then with inward conſideration of the materiall points. And therefore in this new entrie into ſo entangled a matter, hee would leaue nothing which might be either an armour or ornament vnto him, and in theſe pompous ceremonies he well knew a ſecret of gouernment much to conſiſt. That was performed by the diligent Philanax, and therein Euarchus did ſet himſelfe all cloathed in blacke, with the principall men, who could in that ſuddenneſſe prouide themſelues of ſuch mourning rayments. The whole people commaunded to keepe an orderly ſilence of each ſide, which was duly obſerued of them, partly for the deſire they had to ſee a good concluſion of theſe matters, and partly ſtriken with admiration, aſwell at the graue and Princely preſence of Euarchus, as at the greatneſſe of the cauſe, which was then to come in queſtion. As for Philanax, Euarchus would haue done him the honour to ſit by him, but hee excuſed himſelfe, deſiring to be the accuſer of the priſoners in his maiſters behalfe; and therefore ſince hee made himſelfe a partie, it was not conuenient for him to ſit in the iudiciall place. Then was it a while deliberated, whether the two young Ladies, ſhould be brought forth in open preſence, but that was ſtopped by Philanax, whoſe loue and faith, did diſcend from his maiſter to his children, and only deſired, the ſmart ſhould light vpon the others, whom hee thought guiltie of his death and diſhonour, alleaging for this, that neither wiſedome would, they ſhould bee brought in preſence of the people, which might hereupon grow to new vprores: nor iuſtice required, they ſhould be drawne to any ſhame, till ſome body accuſed them. And as for Pamela, he he proteſted the lawes of Arcadia, would not allow any iudgement of her, although ſhe her ſelfe were to determine nothing till age or marriage enabled her. Then the Kings body being layd vpon a Table, iuſt before Euarchus, and all couered ouer with blacke, the priſoners, namely the Queene, and two young Princes, were ſent for to appeare in the Protectors name: which name was the cauſe they came not to knowledge, how neare a kinſemã was to iudge of them, but thought him to be ſome Nobleman, choſen by the Country, in this extremity. So extraordinary courſe, had the order of the heauens produced at this time, that both nephew and ſon, were not only priſoners, but vnknowne, to their vncle and father, who of many yeares had not ſeene thẽ. And Pyrocles was to pleade for his life before that throne, in which throne lately before he had ſaued the Kings life. But firſt was Gynecia led forth, in the ſame weeds that the day and night before ſhe had worne, ſauing that inſtead of Zelmanes garment in which ſhe was found, ſhe had caſt on a long cloak, which reached to the ground of ruſſed courſe cloath, with a poore felt hat, which almoſt couered all her face, moſt part of her goodly haire (on which her hands had layd many a ſpitefull hold) ſo lying vpon her ſhoulders, as a man might well ſee, had no artificiall careleſneſſe. Her eyes downe on the ground, of purpoſe not to looke on Pyrocles face, which ſhe did not ſo much ſhun, for the vnkindneſſe ſhe conceiued of her owne ouerthrow, as for the feare, thoſe motions in this ſhort time of her life, ſhould be reuiued, which ſhe had with the paſſage of infinit ſorowes mortified. Great was the compaſſion the people felt, to ſee their Princeſſe ſtate, and beauty, ſo deformed by fortune and her owne deſert, whom they had euer found a Lady moſt worthy of all honour. But by and by the ſight of the other two priſoners, drew moſt of the eyes to that ſpectacle. Pyrocles came out led by Sympathus, cloathed after the Greeke maner, in a long coate of white veluet, reaching to the ſmall of his legge, with great buttons of Diamonds all along vpon it: His neck without any coller, not ſo much as hidde̅ with a ruffe, did paſſe the whiteneſſe of his garments, which was not much in faſhiõ vnlike to the crimſon rayment, our Knights of the order firſt put on. On his feet he had nothing but ſlippers, which after the auncient maner, were tied vp with certaine laces, which were faſtened vnder his knee, hauing wrapped about (with many prety knots) his naked legs. His faire auberne haire (which hee ware in great length, and gaue at that time a delightfull ſhew, with being ſturd vp & downe with the breath of a gentle wind) had nothing vpon it, but a white Ribbin, in thoſe dayes vſed for a Diademe. Which rolled once or twice about the vppermoſt part of his forehead, fell downe vpon his backe, cloaſed vp at each end with the richeſt pearle were to be ſeene in the world. After him followed another Nobleman, guiding the noble Muſidorus, who had vpon him a long cloake, after the faſhion of that which we call the Apoſtles mantle, made of purple Satten; not that purple which we now haue, and is but a counterfet of the Getulian purple (which yet was farre the meaner in price and eſtimation) but of the right Tyrian purple, which was neareſt to a colour betwixt our murry and ſcarlet. On his head, which was blacke and curled, he ware a Perſian Tiara, all ſet downe with rowes of ſo rich Rubies, as they were inough to ſpeake for him, that they had to iudge of no meane perſonage.

In this ſort with erected countenances, did theſe vnfortunate Princes ſuffer themſelues to be ledde, ſhewing aright by the compariſon of them and Gynecia, how to diuers perſons, compaſſion is diuerſly to be ſtirred. For as to Gynecia, a a Lady knowne of great eſtate, and greatly eſteemed, the more miſerable repreſentation was made of her ſudden ruine, the more mens hearts were forced to bewaile ſuch an euident witneſſe of weake humanity: ſo to theſe men, not regarded becauſe vnknowne, but rather (beſides the deteſtation of their fact) hated as ſtrangers, the more they ſhould haue fallen downe in an abiect ſemblance, the more in ſteed of compaſſion they ſhould haue gotten contempt: but therefore, were to vſe (as I may terme it) the more violence of magnanimitie, and ſo to conquer the expectation of the lookers, with an extraordinarie vertue. And ſuch effect indeede it wrought in the whole aſſemblie, their eyes yet ſtanding as it were in ballance, to whether of them they ſhould moſt direct their ſight. Muſidorus was in ſtature ſo much higher then Pyrocles, as commonly is gotten by one yeares growth. His face now beginning to haue ſome tokens of a beard, was compoſed to a kinde of manlike beautie. His colour was of a well pleaſing browneneſſe, and the features of it ſuch, as they caried both delight and maieſtie: his countenaunce ſeuere, and promiſing a minde much giuen to thinking. Pyrocles of a pure complexion, and of ſuch a chearefull fauour, as might ſeeme either a womans face on a boy, or an excellent boyes face in a woman. His looke gentle and baſhfull, which bred the more admiration, hauing ſhewed ſuch notable proofes of courage. Laſtly, though both had both, if there were any oddes, Muſidorus was the more goodly, and Pyrocles the more louely. But aſſoone as Muſidorus ſaw himſelfe ſo farre forth led among the people, that he knew to a great number of them his voyce ſhould be heard, miſdoubting their intention to the Princeſſe Pamela, (of which he was more carefull then of his owne life,) euen as he went (though his leader ſought to interrupt him) he thus with a lowde voyce ſpake vnto them. And is it poſſible ô Arcadians, ſayd he, that you can forget the naturall dutie you owe to your Princeſſe Pamela? hath this ſoyle bene ſo little beholding to her noble Auncеſters? hath ſo long a time rooted no ſurer loue in your hearts to that line? Where is that faith to your Princes bloud, which hath not onely preſerued you from all daungers heretofore, but hath ſpread your fame to all the nations in the world? Where is that iuſtice the Arcadians were wont to flouriſh in, whoſe nature is to render to euery one his owne? Will you now keepe the right from your Prince, who is the onely giuer of iudgement, the key of iuſtice, and life of your lawes? Do you hope in a few yeares, to ſet vp ſuch another race, which nothing but length of time can eſtabliſh? Will you reward Baſilius children with vngratefulneſſe, the verie poyſon of manhood? Will you betray your long ſetled reputation, with the fowle name of traytours? Is this your mourning for your Kings death, to encreaſe his loſſe with his daughters miſerie? Imagine your Prince do looke out of the heauens vnto you, what do you thinke he could wiſh more at your handes then that you do well by his children? And what more honour I pray you can you do to his obſequies, then to ſatisfie his ſoule with a louing memorie, as you do his body with an vnfelt ſolemnitie? What haue you done with the Princeſſe Pamela? Pamela the iuſt inheretrix of this Countrey, Pamela whom this earth may be happie, that it ſhall be hereafter ſayd, ſhe was borne in Arcadia, Pamela in her ſelfe your ornament, in her education your foſter child, and euery way your onely Princeſſe, what account can you render to your ſelues of her? Truly I do not thinke that you all know what is become of her: ſo ſoone may a Diamond be loſt? ſo ſoone may the fayreſt light in the world be put out? But looke, looke vnto it, ô Arcadians, be not ſo wilfully robbed of your greateſt treaſure, make not your ſelues miniſters to priuate ambitions, who do but vſe your ſelues to put on your your owne yokes. Whatsoeuer you determine of vs (who I must confesse are but straungers) yet let not Basilius daughters be strangers vnto you. Lastly, howsoeuer you barre her from her publike soueraignte, (which if you do, little may we hope of equitie where rebellion raignes) yet deny not that childs right vnto her, that she may come and do the last duties to her fathers body. Deny not that happines (if in such a case there be any happinesse) to your late King, that his body may haue his last touch of his deerest child. With such like broken maner of questions and speeches, was Musidorus desirous as much as in passing by them he could, to moue the people to tender Pamelas fortune. But at length, by that they came to the iudgement place, both Sympathus and his guider had greatly satisfied him, with the assurance they gaue him, this assembly of people had neither meaning nor power, to do any hurt to the Princesse, whom they all acknowledged as their soueraigne Lady. But that the custome of Arcadia was such, till she had more yeares, the state of the countrey to be guided by a Protector, vnder whom, he and his fellow were to receiue their iudgement. That eased Musidorus hart of his most vehement care, when he found his beloued Ladie to be out of daunger. But Pyrocles assoone as the Queene of the one side, he and Musidorus of the other, were stayed before the face of their iudge, (hauing onely for their barre the Table on which the Kings bodie lay) being nothing lesse vexed with the doubt of Philoclea, then Musidorus was for Pamela, in this sort with a lowly behauiour, and onely then like a suppliant, he spake to the Protector. Pardon me most honoured Iudge, saith he, that vncommaunded I begin my speech vnto you, since both to you and me, these wordes of mine shall be most necessary. To you hauing the sacred exercise of iustice in your hand, nothing appertaines more properly, then truth nakedly and freely set downe. To me, being enuironed round about with many daungerous calamities, what can be more conuenient, then at least, to be at peace with my selfe, in hauing discharged my conscience, in a most behouefull veritie. Vnderstand therefore, and truly vnderstand, that the Lady Philoclea (to whose vnstained vertue it hath bene my vnspeakeable miserie, that my name should become a blot) if she be accused, is most vniustly accused of any dishonorable fact, which by my meanes she may be thought to haue yeelded vnto. Whatsoeuer hath bene done, hath bene my only attempt, which notwithstanding was neuer intended against her chastitie. But whatsoeuer hath bene informed, was my fault. And I attest the heauens, to blaspheme which I am not now in fit tune, that so much as my comming into her chamber, was wholly vnwitting vnto her. This your wisedome may withall consider, if I would lye, I would lye for mine owne behoose, I am not so olde, as to be wearie of my selfe; but the verie sting of my inward knowledge ioyned with the consideration I must needes haue, what an infinite losse it should be to all those who loue goodnesse in good folkes, if so pure a child of vertue should wrongfully be destroyed, compels me to vse my tongue against my selfe, and receiue the burden of what euill was, vpon mine owne doing. Looke therefore with pittifull eyes vppon so faire beames, and that misfortune which by me hath fallen vppon her, helpe to repayre it with your publike iudgement, since whosoeuer deales cruelly with such a creature, shewes himselfe a hater of mankind, and an enuier of the worlds blisse. And this petition I make, euen in the name of iustice, that before you proceed further against vs, I may know how you conceiue of her noble, though vnfortunate action, and what iudgement you will make of it. He had not spoken his last word, when all the whole people both of great and low estate, confirmed with an vnited murmure Pyrocles demaund, longing (for the loue generally was borne Philoclea) to know what they might hope of her. Euarchus though neither regarding a prisoners passionate prayer, nor bearing ouerplausible eares to a many headed motion, yet well enough content, to winne their liking with things in themselues indifferent, he was content: first, to seeke as much as might be of Philocleas behauiour in this matter: which being cleared by Pyrocles, & but weakly gainsayd by Philanax (who had framed both his owne and Dametas euidence most for her fauour, and in truth could haue gone no further then coniecture,) yet finding by his wisedome, that she was not altogether faultlesse, he pronounced, she should all her life long, be kept prisoner among certaine women of religion like the Vestall Nunnes, so to repay the touched honour of her house, with well obseruing a strict profession of chastitie. Although this were a great preiudicating of Pyrocles case, yet was he exceedingly ioyous of it, being assured of his Ladies life; and in the depth of his mind not sorie, that what end soeuer he had, none should obtaine the after enioying that Iewell, whereon he had set his liues happines. After it was by publike sentence deliuered, what should be done with the sweete Philoclea, the lawes of Arcadia bearing, that what was appointed by the Magistrates in the nonage of the Prince, could not afterwards be repealed) Euarchus still vsing to himselfe no other name but protector of Arcadia, commaunded those that had to say against the Queene Gynecia to proceed, because both her estate required she should be first heard, and also for that she was taken to be the principall, in the greatest matter they were to iudge of. Philanax incontinently stepped foorth, and shewing in his greedie eyes, that he did thirst for her bloud, began a well thought on discourse of her (in his iudgement) execrable wickednesse. But Gynecia standing vp before the iudge, casting abroad her armes, with her eyes hidde vnder the bredth of her vnseemely hat, laying open in all her gestures the despairefull affliction, to which all the might of her reason was conuerted, with such like words stopped Philanax, as he was entring into his inuectiue oration. Stay, stay Philanax, said she, do not defile thy honest mouth, with those dishonorable speeches thou art about to vtter, against a woman, now most wretched, lately thy Mistresse. Let either the remembrance how great she was, moue thy hart to some reuerence; or the seeing how low she is, stirre in thee some pitie. It may be truth doth make thee deale vntruly; and loue of iustice frames vniustice in thee, do not therefore (neither shalt thou neede tread vpon my desolate ruines. Thou shalt haue that thou seekest; and yet shalt not be oppressour of her, who cannot choose but loue thee, for thy singular faith to thy maister. I do not speake this to procure mercie, or to prolong my life, no no, I say vnto you I will not liue, but I am onely loth, my death should be engreeued with any wrong thou shouldest do vnto me. I haue bene too painefull a iudge ouer my selfe, to desire pardon in others iudgement. I haue bene too cruell an executioner of mine owne soule, to desire that execution of iustice should be stayed for me. Alas, they that know how sorow can rent the spirits, they that know what firy hels are cõtained in a self condemning mind, need not feare that feare can keepe such a one, from desiring to be separated from that, which nothing but death can separate. I therfore say to thee (ô iust Iudge) that I and only I, was the worker of Basilius death. They were these hands that gaue vnto him that poisonous potion, that hath brought death to him, and losse to Arcadia, it was I and none but I, that hastened his aged yeares, to an vnnaturall end, and that haue made all his people orphans of their royall father. I am the subiect that haue killed my Prince, I am the wife that haue murdered my husband, I am a degenerate woman, an vndoer of this countrey, a shame of my children. What wouldst thou haue sayd more, oh Philanax? and all this I graunt, there resteth then nothing else to say, but that I desire you, you will appoint quickly some to rid me of my life, rather then these hands, which else are destenied vnto it, and that indeed it may be done with such speed as I may not long die in this life, which I haue in so great horrour: with that she crossed her armes, and sate downe vpon the ground, attending the Iudges answer. But a great while it was, before anie bodie could be heard speake, the whole people concurring in a lamentable crie, so much had Gynecias words and behauiour stirred their hearts to a dolefull compassion, neither in troath could most of them in their iudgements tell, whether they should be more sorie for her fault or her miserie: for the losse of her estate, or losse of her vertue. But most were most moued, with that which was vnder their eyes: the sense most subiect to pitie. But at length the reuerent awe they stood in of Euarchus, brought them to a silent wayting his determination, who hauing well considered the abhomination of the fact, attending more the manifest proofe of so horrible a trespasse; confessed by her selfe, and proued by others; then any thing relenting to those tragicall phrases of hers (apter to stirre a vulgar pitie, then his mind, which hated euil, in what colours so euer he found it) hauing considered a while with the principall men of the countrey, and demaunded their allowance, he definitinely gaue this sentence. That whereas both in priuate and publike respects, this woman had most hainously offended, (in priuate, because mariage being the most holy coniunction that fals to mankind, out of which all families, and so consequently all societies do proceede, which not onely by communitie of goods, but communitie of children, is to knit the minds in a most perfect vnion, which who so breakes, dissolues all humanitie, no man liuing free from the daunger of so neare a neighbour, she had not onely broken it, but broken it with death, and the most pretended death that might be: In publike respect, the Princes persons; being in all monarchall gouernements the very knot of the peoples welfare, and light of all their doings, to which they are not only in conscience, but in necessitie bound to be loyal, she had traiterously empoisoned him, neither regarding her countreys profite, her owne dutie, nor the rigor of the lawes.) That therefore, as well for the due satisfaction to eternal iustice, and accomplishment of the Arcadian statutes, as for the euerlasting example to all wiues and subiects, she should presently be conueyed to close prison, and there be kept with such food as might serue to sustaine her aliue, vntill the day of her husbands buriall, at which time, she should be buried quicke, in the same tombe with him: that so his murder might be a murder to her selfe, and she forced to keepe companie with the body from which she had made so detestable a seuerance; and lastly death might redresse their disioyned coniunction of marriage. His iudgement was receiued of the whole assembly, as not with disliking, so with great astonishmēt, the greatnesse of the matter and person as it were ouerpressing the might of their conceits. But when they did set it to the beame, with the monstrousnesse of her ougly misdeed, they could not but yeeld in their harts, there was no ouerballancing. As for Gynecia, who had already setled her thoughts, not onely to looke but long for this euent, hauing in this time of her vexation, found a sweetnes in the rest she hoped by death, (with a countenance witnessing she had beforehand so passed through all the degrees of sorow, that she had no newe looke to figure forth any more) rase vp, and offered forth her faire hands to be bound or led as they would, being indeed troubled with no part of this iudgement, but that her death was as ſhe thought long delayed. They that were appointed for it conueyed her to the place ſhe was in before, where the guard was releeued, and the number encreaſed to keepe her more ſure for the time of her execution: None of them all that led her, though moſt of them were ſuch, whoſe harts had bene long hardened with the often exerciſing ſuch offices, being able to barre teares frō their eyes, and other manifeſt tokens of compaſſionate ſorrow. So goodly a vertue is a reſolute conſtancie, that euen in euill deſeruers, it ſeemes that partie might haue bene notably well deſeruing. Thus the excellent Lady Gynecia, hauing paſſed fiue and thirtie yeares of her age, euen to admiration of her beautifull mind and bodie, and hauing not in her owne knowledge, euer ſpotted her ſoule with any wilfull vice, but her immoderat loue of Zelmane, was brought, firſt by the violence of that ill anſwered paſſion, and then by the diſpairing conceit ſhe tooke of the iudgement of God in her husbands death and her owne fortune, purpoſely to ouerthrow her ſelfe, and confirme by a wrong confeſſion, that abhominable ſhame, which with her wiſedome, ioyned to the truth, perhaps ſhe might haue refelled. Then did Euarchus aske Philanax, whether it were he that would charge the two yong priſoners, or that ſome other ſhould do it, and he ſit according to his eſtate, as an aſſiſtant in the iudgement. Philanax told him as before he had done, that he thought no man could lay manifeſt the naughtineſſe of thoſe two yong men, with ſo much either truth or zeale as himſelfe, and therfore he deſired he might do this laſt ſeruice to his faithfully beloued maſter, as to proſecute the traiterous cauſers of his death and diſhonour; which being done, for his part he meant to giue vp all dealing in publike affaires, ſince that man was gone who had made him loue them. Philanax thus being readie to ſpeake, the two Princes were commanded to tell their names, who anſwered according to their agreements, that they were Daiphantus of Lycia, and Palladius Prince of Iberia. Which when they had ſaid, they demanded to know by what authoritie they could iudge of them, ſince they were not onely forreiners and ſo not borne vnder their lawes, but abſolute Princes, and therefore not to be touched by lawes. But aunſwer was preſently made them, that Arcadia lawes, were to haue their force vpon any were found in Arcadia: ſince ſtrangers haue ſcope to know the cuſtomes of a countrey, before they put themſelues in it: & when they once are entred, they muſt know, that what by many was made, muſt not for one be broken. And ſo much leſſe for a ſtraunger, as he is to looke for no priuiledge in that place, to which in time of neede, his ſeruice is not to be expected. As for their being Princes, whether they were ſo or no, the beleefe ſtood in their own words, which they had ſo diuerſely falſified, as they did not deſerue beleefe. But what ſo euer they were, Arcadia was to acknowledge them but as priuate men, ſince they were neither by magiſtracy nor alliance to the princely bloud, to claime any thing in that region. Therefore if they had offended, (which now by the plaintife and their defence was to be iudged) againſt the lawes of nations; by the lawes of nations they were to be chaſtiſed: if againſt the peculiar ordinances of the prouince, thoſe peculiar ordinances were to lay hold of them. The Princes ſtood awhile vpon that, demaunding leaſure to giue perfect knowledge of their greatnes; but when they were anſwered, that in a caſe of a Princes death, the lawe of that countrey had euer bene, that immediate triall ſhould be had: they were forced to yeeld, reſolued that in thoſe names, they would as much as they could, couer the ſhame of their royall parentage, and keepe as long as might be (if euill were determined mined againſt them) the euill newes from their carefull kinsfolke, wherein the chiefe man they conſidered was Euarchus: whom the ſtraunge and ſecret working of iuſtice had brought to be the iudge ouer them, in ſuch a thadow, or rather pit of darkeneſſe, the wormiſh mankind liues, that neither they know how to foreſee, nor what to feare: and are but like tenisbals, toſſed by the racket of the higher powers. Thus both ſides ready, it was determined, becauſe their caſes were ſeparated. Firſt Philanax ſhould be heard againſt Pyrocles, whom they termed Daiphantus, and that heard, the others cauſe ſhould follow, and ſo receiue together ſuch iudgement, as they ſhould be found to haue deſerued. But Philanax that was euen ſhort breathed at the firſt, with the extreame vehemencie he had to ſpeake againſt them, ſtroking once or twiſe his forehead, and wiping his eyes, (which either wept, or he would at that time haue them ſeeme to weepe,) looking firſt vpon Pyrocles, as if he had proclaimed all hatefulneſſe againſt him, humbly turning to Euarchus, (who with quiet grauitie, ſhewed great attention) he thus began his oration. That which all men, who take vpon them to accuſe another, are wont to deſire (moſt worthy Protector) to haue many proofes of faultes in them they ſeeke to haue condemned: that is to me in this preſent action, my greateſt comber, and annoyance. For the number is ſo great, and the qualitie ſo monſtrous, of the enormities this wretched young man hath committed, that neither I in my ſelfe, can tell where to begin (my thoughts being confuſed with the horrible multitude of them) neither do I thinke your vertuous eares will be able to endure the report: but will rather imagine, you heare ſome tragedy inuented of the extremitie of wickedneſſe, then a iuſt recitall of a wickednes indeed committed, for ſuch is the diſpoſitiō of the moſt ſincere iudgements, that as they can beleeue meane faults, and ſuch as mans nature may ſlide into, ſo when they paſſe to a certaine degree, nay when they paſſe all degrees of vnſpeakeable naughtineſſe, then finde they in themſelues a hardneſſe to giue credit, that humane creatures can ſo from all humanitie be transformed. But in my ſelf, the ſtrength of my faith to my dead maſter will helpe the weakeneſſe of my memorie; in you, your excellent loue of iuſtice will force you to vouchſafe attention: and as for the matter, it is ſo manifeſt, ſo pitifull euidences lye before your eyes of it, that I ſhall neede to be but a briefe recounter, and no rhetoricall enlarger of this moſt harmefull miſchiefe. I will therefore, in as few wordes, as ſo huge a treſpaſſe can be cōteined, deliuer vnto you the ſumme of this miſerable fact: leauing out a great nūber of particular tokens of his naughtines, and only touching the eſſentiall points of this dolefull caſe. This man, whom to begin withall I know not how to name, ſince being come into this countrey, vnaccompanied like a loſt pilgrime, from a mā grew a woman, from a woman a rauiſher of women, thence a priſoner, and now a Prince. But this Zelmane, this Daiphātus, this what you will, (for any ſhape or title he can take vpon him, that hath no reſtraint of ſhame) hauing vnderſtood the ſolitarie life my late maſter liued, and conſidering how open he had laid himſelfe to any traiterous attempt, for the firſt maske of his falſehood, diſguiſed himſelfe like a woman: which being the more ſimple & hurtleſſe ſexe, might eaſier hide his ſubtle harmefulneſſe. And preſenting himſelf to my maſter, the moſt curteous Prince that liued, was receiued of him with ſo great graciouſneſſe, as might haue bound not only any gratefull minde, but might haue mollified any enemies rancour. But this venimous ſerpent, admitted thus into his boſome, as contagion will eaſily finde a fit body for it, ſo had he quickly fallē into ſo neare acquaintance with this naughty womā, whō euē now you haue moſt iuſtly condēned, that this was her right hand, ſhe ſaw with no eyes but his, nor seemed to haue any life but in him, so glad she was to find one more cunning then her selfe, in couering wickednesse with a modest vaile. What is to be thought passed betwixt two such vertuous creatures, whereof the one hath confessed murder, and the other rape, I leaue to your wise consideration. For my hart hastes to the miserable point of Basilius murder, for the executing of which with more facilitie, this yong nimph of Dianas bringing vp, fained certaine rites she had to performe, so furious an impiety had caried him from all remembrance of goodnes, that he did not only not feare the Gods, as the beholders and punishers of so vngodly a villany, but did blasphemously vse their sacred holy name, as a minister vnto it. And forsooth a Caue hereby was chosen, for the temple of his deuotions, a Caue of such darkenesse, as did prognosticate, he meant to please the infernall powers, for there this accursed caytife, vpon the altar of falshood, sacrificed the life of the vertuous Basilius. By what meanes he trayned him thither, alas I know not, for if I might haue knowne it, either my life had accompanied my maister, or this fellowes death had preserued him. But this may suffice, that in the mouth of this Caue, where this traytor had his lodging and chappell, when already maister sheepeheard his companion, had conueyed away the vndoubted enheritrix of this cuntry, was Gynecia found by the dead corps of her husband, newly empoysoned, apparelled in the garments of the young Lady, and ready no question to haue fled to some place, according to their consort, but that she was by certaine honest shepheards arrested: while in the meane time, because there should be left no reuenger of this bloudy mischiefe, this noble Amazon, was violently gottē into the chāber of the Lady Philoclea, whereby the mingling (as much as in him lay) of her shame with his misdeede, he might enforce her to be the accessary to her fathers death, & vnder the countenance of her and her sister (against whom they knew we would not rebell) seaze as it were with one gripe into their treacherous hands, the regiment of the mightie prouince. But the almighty eye preuented him of the end of his mischiefe, by vsing a villaine Dametas hand, to inclose him in there, where with as much fortification as in a house could be made, he thought himselfe in most securitie. Thus see you most iust iudge, a short & simple story of the infamous misery, falne vpon this country. Indeed infamous, since by an effeminate man, we should suffer a greater ouerthrow, then our mightiest enemies haue bin euer able to lay vpon vs. And that all this, which I haue sayd is most manifest, aswell of the murdering of Basilius, as the rauishing of Philoclea (for those two parts I establish of my accusation) who is of so incredulous a mind, or rather who will so stoppe his eyes from seeing a thing clearer then the light, as not to hold for assured so palpable a matter. For to begin with his most cruell misdeed, is it to be imagined, that Gynecia (a woman though wicked, yet witty) wold haue attempted and atchieued an enterprise, no lesse hazardous then horrible, without hauing some counsellor in the beginning, and some comforter in the performing? Had she, who shewed her thoughts were so ouerruled with some strange desire, as in despite of God, nature and womanhood, to execute that in deedes, which in words we cannot heare without trembling? had she I say no practise to leade her vnto it? Or had she a practise without conspiracy? Or could she conspire without some body to conspire with? And if one were; who so likely as this, to whom she communicated I am sure her mind, the world thinkes her bodie? Neither let her words taking the whole fault vpon her selfe, bee herein any thing auaileable. For to those persons who haue vomited out of their soules all remnants of goodnesse, there restes a certaine pride in euill, and hauing else no

ſhadow of glorie left them, they glorie to be conſtant in iniquitie, and that God knowes muſt be held out to the laſt gaſpe, without reuealing their accomplices. As thinking great courage is declared, in being neither afeard of the heauens, nor aſhamed of the world. But let Gynecias action die with her ſelfe, what can all the earth aunſwere for his comming hither? Why alone, if he be a Prince? How ſo richly Iewelled if he be not a Prince? Why then a woman if now a man? Why now Daiphantus, if then Zelmane? Was all this play for nothing, or if it had an ende, what ende but the ende of my deare maiſter? Shall we doubt ſo many ſecrete conferences with Gynecia, ſuch fained fauour to the ouer-ſoone beguiled Baſilius, a Caue made a lodging, and the ſame lodging made a temple of his religion, laſtly ſuch changes and trauerſes, as a quiet Poet could ſcarſe fill a poeme withall, were directed to any leſſe ſcope, then to this monſtrous murder? O ſnakie ambition, which can wind thy ſelfe in ſo many figures, to ſlide thither thou deſireſt to come! O corrupted reaſon of mankind, that can yeeld to deforme thy ſelfe with ſo filthie deſires! And ô hopeleſſe be thoſe minds, whom ſo vnnaturall deſires do not, with their owne ouglineſſe ſufficiently terrifie! But yet euen of fauour let vs graunt him thus much more, as to fancie that in theſe foretold things, fortune might be a great Actor, perchance to an euill end, yet to a leſſe euill ende all theſe entangled deuiſes were entended. But I beſeech your Ladiſhippe, my Lady Daiphantus tell me, what excuſe can you find for the chaunging your lodging with the Queene, that very inſtant ſhee was to finiſh her execrable practiſe? How can you cloake the lending of our cloake vnto her, was all that by chance too? Had the ſtarres ſent ſuch an influence vnto you, as you ſhould bee iuſt wearie of your lodging and garments, when your Prince was deſtenied to the ſlaughter? What ſay you to this, ô ſhamefull and ſhameleſſe creature? fit indeede to bee the diſhonour of both ſexes. But alas, I ſpend too many words in ſo manifeſt and ſo miſerable a matter. They muſt be foure wild horſes (which according to our lawes are the executioners of men which murder our Prince) which muſt decide this queſtion with you. Yet ſee ſo farre had my zeale to my beloued Prince tranſported me, that I had almoſt forgotten my ſecond part, and his ſecond abhomination, I meane his violence offred to the Lady Philoclea: wherewith as if it had well become his womanhood, he came brauing to the iudgement ſeat, indeed our lawes appoint not ſo cruell a death (although death too) for this fact as for the other. But whoſoeuer well wayes it, ſhall find it ſprong out of the ſame fountaine of miſchieuous naughtineſſe, the killing of the father, diſhonouring the mother, and rauiſhing the child. Alas could not ſo many benifits receiued of my Prince, the iuſtice of nature, the right of hoſpitalitie, be a bridle to thy luſt, if not to thy cruelty? Or if thou hadſt as ſurely thou haſt) a heart recompenſing goodneſſe with hatred, could not his death, which is the laſt of reuenges, ſatisfie thy malice, but thou muſt heape vpon it the ſhame of his daughter? Were thy eyes ſo ſtonie, thy breaſt ſo tygriſh, as the ſweete and beautifull ſhewes of Philocleas vertue, did not aſtoniſh thee? O wofull Arcadia, to whom the name of this mankind curtiſan, ſhall euer be remembred as a procurer of thy greateſt loſſe! But too farre I find my paſſion, yet honeſt paſſion hath guided mee; the caſe is euery way too too much vnanſwerable. It reſteth in you ô excellent protector to pronounce iudgement, which if there bee hope that ſuch a young man may proue profitable to the world, who in the firſt exerciſe of his owne determination, farre paſſed the arranteſt ſtrumpet in luxurioufneſſe, the cunningeſt forger in falſehood, a player in diſguiſing, a Tyger in crueltie, a Dragon in ingratefulnes; let him be preſerued like a iewell, to do greater miſchiefe. If his youth be not more defiled with trecherie, then the eldeſt mans age, let I ſay his youth, be ſome cauſe of compaſſion. If he haue not euery way ſought the ouerthrow of humaine ſociety, if he haue done any thing like a Prince, let his naming himſelfe a Prince, breede a reuerence of his baſe wickedneſſe. If he haue not broken all lawes of hoſpitalitie, and broken them in the moſt deteſtable degree that can be, let his being a gueſt, be a ſacred protection of his more then ſauage doings: or if his whoriſh beauty, haue not bene as the hie way of his wickedneſſe, let the picture drawne vpon ſo poyſonous a wood, be reſerued to ſhew how greatly colours can pleaſe vs. But if it is as it is, what ſhould I ſay more, a very ſpirit of helliſh naughtineſſe, if his act be to be puniſhed, and his defiled perſon not to be pittied, then reſtore vnto vs our Prince, by duly puniſhing his murderers, for then we ſhall thinke him and his name to liue, when we ſhall ſee his killers to die. Reſtore to the excellent Philoclea her honour, by taking out of the world her diſhonour, and thinke that at this day, in this matter are the eyes of the world vpon you, whether any thing can ſway your mind from a true adminiſtration of iuſtice. Alas though I haue much more to ſay, I can ſay no more, for my teares and ſighes interrupt my ſpeech, and force me to giue my ſelfe ouer to my priuate ſorrow. Thus when Philanax had vttered the vttermoſt of his malice, he made ſorrow the cauſe of his concluſion. But while Philanax was in the courſe of his ſpeech, and did with ſuch bitter reproches defame the Princely Pyrocles, it was well to be ſeene, his heart was vſed to beare ſuch iniuries, and his thoughts ſuch, as could arme themſelues better againſt any thing then ſhame. For ſometimes bluſhing, his bloud with diuerſe motions comming and going, ſometimes cloaſing his eyes, and laying his hand ouer them, ſometimes giuing ſuch a looke to Philanax, as might ſhew he aſſured himſelfe, he durſt not ſo haue ſpoken if they had bene in indifferent place: with ſome impatiencie he bare the length of his Oration: which being ended, with as much modeſt humbleneſſe to the Iudge, as deſpitefull ſcorne to the accuſer, with words to this purpoſe, he defended his honour.

My accuſers tale, may well beare witneſſe with me, moſt rightfull Iudge, in how hard a caſe, and inuironed with how many troubles, I may eſteeme my ſelfe. For if he, who ſhewes his tongue is not vnacquainted with rayling, was in an agony in the beginning of his ſpeech, with the multitude of matters he had to lay vnto me, wherein notwithſtanding the moſt euill could fall vnto him, was, that he ſhould not do ſo much euill as he would; how combred do you thinke may I acknowledge my ſelfe, who in things no leſſe importing then my life, muſt be mine owne aduocate, without leaſure to anſwer, or foreknowledge what ſhould be obiected? In things I ſay promoted with ſo cunning confuſion, as hauing mingled truths with falſehoods, ſurmiſes with certainties, cauſes of no moment with matters capitall, ſcolding with complayning, I can abſolute neither graunt nor denie, neither can I tell, whether I come hither to be iudged, or before iudgement to be puniſhed, being compelled to beare ſuch vnworthy words, farre more grieuous then any death vnto me. But ſince the forme of this gouernment, allowes ſuch tongue liberty vnto him, I will picke aſwell as I can out of his inuectiue thoſe few points, which may ſeeme of ſome purpoſe in the touching of me, hoping that by your eaſie hearing of me, you will ſhew, that though you hate euill, yet you wiſh men may proue themſelues not euill; ſo in that he hath ſayd, you will not way ſo much what he hath ſayd, as what he hath proued, remembring, that truth is ſimple and naked, and that if he had had guided himselfe vnder that banner, he needed not out of the way haue sought so vilde and false disgracings of mee, enough to make the vntruest accusation beleeued. I wil therefore, vsing truth as my best eloquence, repeate vnto you as much as I know in this matter, and then by the only cleerenesse of the discourse, your wisedome I know will find, the difference betwixt caulling suppositon, and direct declaration. This Prince Paladius and I being enflamed with loue, (a passion farre more easily reprehended then refrained) to the two peereless daughters of Basilius, and vnderstanding, how he had secluded himselfe from the world, that like Princes, there was no accesse vnto him, we disguised our selues, in such forms, as might sooneſt bring vs to the reuealing of our affections. The Prince Palladius, had such euent of his doings, that with Pamelas consent he was to conuey her out of the thraldome she liued in, to receiue the subiection of a greater people then her owne, vntill her fathers consent might be obtayned. My fortune was more hard, for I bare no more loue to the chaste Philoclea, then Basilius deceiued in my sexe, shewed to me, insomuch that by his importunacy, I could haue no time to obtayne the like fauour of the pure Philoclea, till this policie I found, taking vnder colour of some deuotions, my lodging, to drawe Basilius thither, with hope to enioy me, which likewise I reuealed to the Queene, that she might keepe my place, and so make her husband see his error. While I in the meane time, being deliuered of them both, & hauing lockt so the dores as I hoped if the immaculate Philoclea would condiscend to go with me, there should be none to hinder our going. I was made prisoner there, I know not by what meanes, when being repelled by her diuine vertue, I would faineſt haue escaped. Here haue you the thread to guide you in the Labyrinth, this man of his toung, had made so monstrous. Here see you the true discourse, which he mountebanke fashion doth make so wide a mouth ouer. Here may you conceiue the reason, why the Queene had my garment, because in her going to the caue, in the Moone-shine night, she might be taken for me, which he vseth as the knot of all his wise assertions: so that as this double minded fellowes accusation was double, double likewise my answer must perforce be, to the murther of Basilius, & violence offred to the inuiolate Philoclea. For the first, O heauenly gods, who would haue thought any mouth could haue bene found so mercenarie, as to haue opened so sleight proofes of so horible matters? his first argument is a question who would imagine that Gynecia would accomplish such an Acte, without some accessaryes? and if any, who but I? Truely I am so farre from imagining any thing, that till I sawe these mourning tokens, and heard Gynecias confession, I neuer imagined the King was deade. And for my part so vehemently, and more like the manner of passionate, then guiltie folks, I see the Queene persecute her selfe, that I thinke condemnation may goe too hastily ouer her, considering the vnlikelyhood, if not impossibilitie, her wisedome, and vertue so long nouriſhed, should in one moment throw downe it selfe to the vttermost end of wickednesse. But whatsoeuer she hath done (which as I say, I neuer beleeued) yet how vniustly should that aggrauate my fault. She found abroad, I within dores, (for as for the wearing my garment I haue tolde you the cause) she seeking as you say to escape, I locking my selfe in a house: without perchaunce the conspiracie of one poore straunger, might greatly enable her attempt, or the fortification of the Lodge (as the trimme man alleaged) might make me hope to resist all Arcadia. And see how trecherously he seekes to draw from me, my chiefest clearing, by preuenting the credit of her words, wherewith ſhe had wholie taken the fault vpon her ſelfe. An honeſt and vnpartiall examiner, her words may condemne her, but may not abſolue me. Thus voide of all probable allegation, the crauen crowes vpon my affliction, not leauing out any euill, that euer he hath felt in his owne ſoule, to charge my youth withall. But who can looke for a ſweeter breath out of ſuch a ſtomacke? or for honny from ſo filthie a Spyder? What ſhould I ſay more? if, in ſo inhumane a matter, which he himſelfe confeſſeth, ſincereſt iudgements are loatheſt to beleeue, & in the ſeuereſt lawes proofes clearer then the Sunne are required, his reaſons are onely the skumme of a baſe malice, my aunſwers moſt manifeſt, ſhining in their owne truth, there remaine any doubt of it, becauſe it ſtands betwixt his affirming and my denyall, I offer, nay I deſire, and humbly deſire I may be graunted the tryall by combat, wherein let him be armed and me in my ſhirt, I doubt not Iuſtice will be my ſhield, & his hart will ſhew it ſelfe as faint as it is falſe.

Now come I to the ſecond part of my offence towards the young Lady, which howſoeuer you tearme it, ſo farre forth as I haue told you, I confeſſe, and for her ſake hartily lament. But if herein I offred force to her, loue offred more force to me. Let her beautie be compared to my yeares', and ſuch effects will be found no miracles. But ſince it is thus as it is, and that iuſtice teacheth vs not to loue puniſhment, but to fly to it for neceſſitie: the ſalue of her honour (I meane as the world will take it, for elſe in truth it is moſt vntouched) muſt be my mariage, and not my death, ſince the one ſtoppes all mouthes, the other becomes a doubtfull fable. This matter requires no more words, and your experience I hope in theſe caſes ſhall neede no more, for my ſelfe me thinks I haue ſhewed alreadie too much loue of my life to beſtow ſo manie. But certainly, it hath bene loue of truth, which could not beare ſo vnworthie falſhood, and loue of iuſtice, that would brooke no wrong to my ſelfe nor other, and makes me now, euen in that reſpect to deſire you, to be moued rather with pittie at a iuſt cauſe of teares, then with the bloudie teares this Crocodile ſpends, who weepes to procure death, and not to lament death. It will be no honour to Baſilius tombe, to haue guiltleſſe bloud ſprinckled vpon it, and much more may a Iudge ouer-weigh himſelfe in crueltie, then in clemencie. It is hard, but it is excellent, where it is found, a right knowledge, when correction is neceſſarie, when grace doth more auaile. For mine owne reſpect, if I thought in wiſedome I had deſerued death, I would not deſire life: for I know nature will condemne me to dye, though you do not; and longer I would not wiſh to draw this breath, then I may keepe my ſelfe vnſpotted of any horrible crime; onely I cannot, nor euer will deny the loue of Philoclea, whoſe violence wrought violent effects in me: with that he finiſhed his ſpeech, caſting vp his eyes to the Iudge, & croſſing his hands, which he held in their length before him, declaring a reſolute patience in whatſoeuer ſhould be done with him. Philanax like a watchfull aduerſarie curiouſly marked all that he ſaid, ſauing that in the beginning he was interrupted by two Letters were brought him from the Princeſſe Pamela, and the Lady Philoclea: who hauing all that night conſidered and bewailed their eſtate, carefull for their mother likewiſe, of whome they could neuer thinke ſo much euill, but conſidering with themſelues that ſhe aſſuredly ſhould haue ſo due tryall by the lawes, as either ſhe ſhould not neede their help, or ſhould be paſt their help, They looked to that which neereſt touched them, and each wrate in this ſort for him, in whome their liues ioy conſiſted,

The humble hearted Philoclea wrate much after this maner.

MY Lords, what you will determine of me, it is to me vncertaine, but what I haue determined of my selfe I am most certaine, which is no longer to enioy my life, then I may enioy him for my husband, whom the heauens for my highest glorie, haue bestowed vpon me. Those that iudge him, let them execute me. Let my throate satisfie their hunger of murder. For alas what hath he done, that had not his originall in me? Looke vpon him I beseech you with indifferencie, and see whether in those eyes all vertue shines not. See whether that face could hide a murder. Take leasure to know him, and then your selues will say, it hath bene too great an inhumanitie, to suspect such excellencie. Are the gods thinke you deceiued in their workemanship? Artificers will not vse Marble but to noble vses. Should those powers be so ouershot, as to frame so precious an Image of their owne, but to honorable purposes? O speake with him, ô heare him, ô know him, and become not the putters out of the worlds light. Hope you to ioy my fathers soule with hurting him he loued aboue all the world? Shall a wrong suspicion make you forget the certaine knowledge of those benefits, this house hath receiued by him? Alas, alas, let not Arcadia for his losse, be accursed of the whole earth and of all posteritie. He is a great Prince, I speake vnto you that which I know, for I haue seene most euident testimonies. Why should you hinder my aduauncement? who if I haue past my childhood hurtlesse to any of you, if I haue refused no bodie to do what good I could, if I haue often mitigated my fathers anger, euer sought to maintaine his fauour towards you, nay if I haue held you all as fathers and brothers vnto me, rob me not of more then my life comes vnto. Teare not that which is inseparably ioyned to my soule; but if he rest misliked of you, (which ô God, how can it be) yet geue him to me, let me haue him, you knowe I pretend no right to your state. Therefore is it but a priuate petition I make vnto you. Or if you be hard hartedly bent, to appoint otherwise (which oh sooner let me dye, then know) then to end as I began, let me by you be ordered to the same end: without for more crueltie, you meane to force Philoclea to vse her owne hands to kill one of your Kings children.

Pamelas Letter (which she meant to send to the generall assembly of the Arcadian Nobilitie,) (for so closely they were kept, as they were vtterly ignorant of the new taken orders) was thus framed.

IN such a state my Lords you haue placed me, as I can neither write nor be silent; for how can I be silent, since you haue left me nothing but my solitarie words to testifie my miserie? and how should I write (for as for speech I haue none but my Iaylor, that can heare me) who neither can resolue what to write, nor to whom to write? What to write is as hard for me to say, as what I may not write, so little hope haue I of any successe, and so much hath no iniurie bene left vndone to me-wards. To whom to write, where may I learne, since yet I wot not how to entitle you? Shall I call you my Soueraignes? set downe your lawes that I may do you homage. Shall I fall lower, and name you my fellowes? shew me I beseech you the Lord and maister ouer vs. But shall Basilius heire, name her selfe your Princesse? Alas I am your prisoner. But whatsoeuer I be, or whatsoeuer you be, ô all you

» beholders of theſe dolefull lines, this do I ſignifie vnto you, and ſignifie it with a » hart, that ſhall euer remaine in that opinion. The good or euill you do to the excel» lent Prince was taken with me, and after by force from me, I will euer impute it as » either way done to mine owne perſon. He is a Prince, and worthie to be my huſ-
» band, and ſo is he my husband by me worthily choſen. Beleeue it, beleeue it, either » you ſhall be traytors for murdering of me, or if you let me liue, the murderers of » him ſhall ſmart as traytors. For what do you thinke I can thinke? Am I ſo childiſh, » as not to ſee, wherein you touch him you condemne me? Can his ſhame be with» out my reproach? no nor ſhall be, ſince nothing he hath done, that I will not a-» uowe. Is this the comfort you bring me in my fathers death, to make me fuller of » ſhame then ſorow? Would you do this, if it were not with full intention to preuent
» my power with ſlaughter? And ſo do I pray you, it is hye time for me, to be weary

Many blots had the teares of the ſweet Ladies made in their letters, which many times they had altred, many times torne and written anewe, euer thinking ſome thing either wanted, or were too much, or would offend, or which was worſt, would breede denyall: but at laſt, the daye warned them to diſpatch, which they accordingly did, and calling one of their guard (for no body els was ſuffered to come neere them) with great entreaty, they requeſted him, that he would preſent them to the principall Noblemen and Gentlemen together. For they had more confidence in the numbers fauour, then in any one, vpon whom they would not laye the liues they held ſo precious. But the fellow truſtie to Philanax, who had placed him there, deliuered them both to him, (what time Pyrocles began to ſpeake) which he ſodainly opened, and ſeeing to what they tended, by the firſt words, was ſo farre from publiſhing them (whereby he feared in Euarchus iuſt minde, either the Princeſſes might be endangered, or the priſoners preſerued, of which choiſe he knew not which to thinke the worſt) that he would not himſelfe reade them ouer, doubting his owne hart might be mollified, ſo bent vpon reuenge. Therefore vtterly ſuppreſſing them, he lent a ſpitefull eare to Pyrocles, and aſſoone as he had ended, with a verie willing heart deſired Euarchus he might accept the combat: although it would haue framed but euill with him. Pyrocles hauing neuer found any match neere him, beſides Muſidorus. But Euarchus made aunſwere, ſince bodily ſtrength is but a ſeruant to the minde, it were verie barbarous and prepoſterous, that force ſhould be made iudge ouer reaſon. Then would he alſo haue replied in words vnto him, but Euarchus who knew what they could ſay, was alreadie ſaid, taking their arguments into his minde, commaunded him to proceede againſt the other priſoner, and that then he would ſentence them both together. Philanax nothing the milder for Pyrocles purging himſelfe, bur rather (according to the nature of arguing, eſpecially when it is bitter) ſo much the more vehemēt, entred thus into his ſpeech againſt Muſidorus, being ſo ouergone with rage, that he forgate in this oration

oration his preciſe methode of oratorie. Behold moſt noble protector, to what a ſtate Arcadia is come, ſince ſuch manner of men, may chalenge in combat the faithfulleſt of the nobilitie, and hauing merited the ſhamefulleſt of all deaths, dare name in marriage the Princeſſes of this countrie. Certainly my maiſters, I muſt ſay, you were much out of taſte, if you had not rather enioy ſuch Ladies, then be hangd. But the one you haue as much deſerued, as you haue diſhonoured the other. But now my ſpeech muſt be directed to you good maiſter Dorus, who with Pallas help pardie, are lately growne Palladius. Too much this ſacred ſeate of iuſtice graunts vnto ſuch a fugitiue bondſlaue, who in ſteede of theſe examinatiõs, ſhould be made confeſſe with a whippe, that which a halter ſhould puniſh. Are not you he Sir, whoſe ſheepehooke was prepared to be our Scepter? In whom lay the knot of all this tragedie? or els perchaunce, they that ſhould gaine little by it were dealers in the murder, you onely that had prouided the fruits for your ſelfe, knewe nothing of it, knewe nothing: hath thy companiõ here infected thee with ſuch impudencie, as euen in the face of the world to denie that which al the world perceiueth? The other pleads ignorance, & you I doubt not will alleage abſence. But he was ignorant, when he was hard by, and you had framed your abſence, iuſt againe the time the acte ſhould be committed, ſo fit a lieutenant he knew he had left of his wickedneſſe, that for himſelfe his ſafeſt meane, was to cõuey away the Lady of vs all, who once out of the countrie, he knew we wold come with oliue brãches of interceſſion vnto her, and fall at his feete to beſeech him to leaue keeping of ſheepe, and vouchſafe the tyrannizing ouer vs, for to think they are Princes, as they ſay (although in our lawes it behooues them nothing) I ſee at all no reaſon. Theſe iewels certainly with their diſguiſing ſleights, they haue pilfred in their vagabonding race. And thinke you ſuch Princes ſhould be ſo long without ſome followers after them? Truly if they be Princes, it manifeſtly ſhewes their vertues ſuch, as all their ſubiects are glad to be rid of them. But be they as they are, for we are to cõſider the matter, and not the men. Baſilius murder hath bin the cauſe of their comming, Baſilius murder they haue moſt trecherouſly brought to paſſe; yet that I doubt not, you will deny as well as your fellow. But how will you denie the ſtealing away the Princeſſe of this Prouince, which is no leſſe then treaſon? So notably hath the iuſtice of the gods prouided for the puniſhing of theſe malefactors, as if it were poſſible, men would not beleue the certaine euidences of their principall miſchiefe, yet haue they diſcouered them ſelues ſufficiently for their moſt iuſt ouerthrow. I ſay therefore (to omit my chiefe matter of the Kings death) this wooluiſh ſheepheard, this counterfeit Prince hath trayterouſly contrary to his alleageance (hauing made himſelfe a ſeruant & ſubiect) attempted the depriuing this cuntry of our naturall Princeſſe: and therefore by all right muſt receiue the puniſhment of traytors. This matter is ſo aſſured as he himſelfe will not deny it, being taken and brought back in the fact. This matter is ſo odious in nature, ſo ſhameful to the world, ſo cõtrarie to all lawes, ſo hurtfull to vs, ſo falſe in him, as if I ſhould ſtand further in declaring or defacing it, I ſhould either ſhewe great doubts in your wiſedome, or in your iuſtice. Therefore I will transferre my care vpon you, & attend to my learning and comfort) the eternall example you will leaue to all mankind of diſguiſers, falſifiers, adulterers, rauiſhers, murderers, and traitors. Muſidorus while Philanax was ſpeaking againſt his coſin and him, had looked round about him, to ſee whether by any meanes he might come to haue caught him in his armes, and haue killed him; ſo much had his diſgracing words filled his breaſt with rage. But perceiuing himſelf ſo garded as he ſhould rather ſhewe a paſſionate act, then performe his reuenge, his hand trembling with deſire to ſtrike,& all the veines in his face ſwelling,caſting his eyes ouer the iudgement ſeat: O Gods ſaid he, and haue you ſpared my life to beare theſe iniuries of ſuch a driuel? Is this the iuſtice of this place, to haue ſuch men as we are,ſubmitted not only to apparent falſehood, but moſt ſhameful reuiling? But marke I pray you the vngratefulneſſe of the wretch, how vtterly he hath forgotten the benefits both he & all this countrey hath receiued of vs. For if euer men may remember their own noble deeds,it is then when their iuſt defence, and other vniuſt vnkindneſſe doth require it. I omit our ſeruices done to Baſilius in the late warre with Amphialus, importing no leſſe then his daughters liues,& his ſtates preſeruatiō: were not we the men that killed the wilde beaſts which otherwiſe had killed the Princeſſes,if we had not ſuccoured them? Cōſider if it pleaſe you,where had bene Daiphantus rape,or my treaſon, if the ſweete beauties of the earth, had then bin deuoured? Either thinke them now dead,or remēber they liue by vs. And yet full often this teltale can acknowledge the loſſe they ſhould haue by their taking away, while maliciouſly he ouerpaſſeth who were their preſeruers, neither let this be ſpoken of me, as if I meant to ballance this euill with that good, for I muſt confeſſe that ſauing of ſuch creatures was rewarded in the acte it ſelfe: but onely to manifeſt the partial iangling of this vile pickthanke.But if we be the traytors,where was your fidelitie, O onely toung-valiant Gentleman, when not onely the young Princeſſe,but the King himſelfe was defended from vttermoſt perill,partly by me, but principally by this excellent yong mans both wiſdome and valure? Were we that made our ſelues againſt hundreds of armed men, openly the ſhields of his life, like ſecretly to be his impoyſoners? Did we then ſhewe his life to be dearer to vs then our owne, becauſe we might after robbe him of his life, to dye ſhamefully? Truely,truely maiſter orator,whoſoeuer hath hyred you to be ſo buſie in their matters, who keepe honeſter ſeruaunts then your ſelfe, he ſhould haue bid you in ſo manie raylings, bring ſome excuſe for your ſelfe, why in the greateſt neede of your Prince, to whome you pretend a miraculous good will, you were not then as forward to do like a man your ſelfe, or at leaſt to accuſe them that were ſlacke in that ſeruice, but commonly they vſe their feete for their defence,whoſe toung is their weapon. Certainly a verie ſimple ſubtiltie it had beene in vs, to repoſe our liues in the daughters, when we had killed the father. But as this Gentleman thinkes to winne the reputation of a copious talker by leauing nothing vnſaide which a filthie minde can imagine,ſo thinke I (or els all words are vaine) that to wiſe mens iudgement,our cleereneſſe in the Kings death is ſufficiently notorious. But at length when the marchant hath ſet out his guilded baggage, laſtly he comes to ſome ſtuffe of importance,& ſaith,I conueyed away the Princeſſe of this countrie. And is ſhe in deede your Princeſſe?I pray you then whom ſhould I wait of els, but her that was my miſtres by my profeſſed vow, & Princeſſe ouer me while I liued in this ſoile? Aske her why ſhe went; aske not me why I ſerued her. Since accounting me as a Prince,you haue not to do with me,taking me as her ſeruant,then take withall that I muſt obey her. But you wil ſay, I perſwaded her to flie away. Certainly I wil for no death deny it,knowing to what honor I ſhould bring her frō the thraldome by ſuch fellowes counſell as you,ſhe was kept in. Shall perſwaſion to a Prince grow treaſon to a Prince? It might be error in me, but falſhood it could not be,ſince I made my ſelfe partaker of whatſoeuer I wiſhed her vnto. Who will euer counſell his King,if his counſell be iudged by the euent, and if it be not found wiſe,

wise, shall therefore be thought wicked? But if I be a traitor, I hope you will grant me a correlatiue, to whom I shall be the traitor. For the Princesse against whom the treasons are considered, I am sure will auow my faithfulnesse, without you will say that I am a traitor to her, because I left the countrie; & a traitor to the countrie, because I went with her. Here do I leaue out my iust excuses of loues force, which as thy narrow hart hath neuer had noble roome enough in it to receiue, so yet to those manlike courages, that by experience know how subiect the vertuous minds are to loue a most vertuous creature, (witnessed to be such by the most excellent giftes of nature) will deeme it a veniall trespasse, to seeke the satisfaction of honourable desires. Honourable euen in the curiousest points of honour, wherout there can no disgrace nor disparagement come vnto her. Therefore ô Iudge, who I hope doest know what it is to be a Iudge, that your end is to preserue, and not to destroy mankind, that lawes are not made like lime-twigges or nets, to catch euerie thing that toucheth them, but rather like sea-markes, to auoid the shipwracke of ignorant passengers, since that our doing in the extreamest interpretation is but a humane error, and that of it you may make a profitable euent (we being of such estate, as their parents would not haue misliked the affinitie) you will not I trust at the perswasion of this brabler, burne your house to make it cleane, but like a wise father, turne euẽ the fault of your children to anie good that may come of it: since that is the fruit of wisdome, and end of all iudgements. While this matter was thus handling, a silent and as it were astonished attention, possest all the people. A kindlie compassion moued the noble Gentleman Simpathus, but as for Kalander, euerie thing was spoken either by or for his owne deare guests, moued an affect in him: sometimes teares, sometimes hopefull lookes, sometimes whispering perswasions in their eares, that stood by him, to seeke the sauing the two yong Princes. But the generall multitude waited the iudgement of Euarchus, who shewed in his face no motions, either at the ones or others speech, letting passe the flowers of rhetorike, and onlie marking whither their reasons tended, hauing made the question to be asked of Gynecia, who continued to take the whole fault vpon her selfe, and hauing caused Dametas, with Miso and Mopsa (who by Philanax order had bene held in most cruell prison) to make a full declaration, how much they knew of these passed matters, and then gathering as assured satisfaction to his owne mind as in that case he could, not needing to take leasure for that, whereof a long practise had bred a well grounded habite in him, with a voice and gesture directed to the vniuersall assemblie, in this forme pronounced sentence. This waightie matter, wherof presentlie we are to determine, doth at the first consideration yeeld two important doubts. The first, whether these men be to be iudged: the secõd, how they are to be iudged. The first doubt ariseth, because they giue themselues out for Princes absolute: a sacred name, & to which anie violence seemes to be an impietie. For how can any lawes, which are the bonds of all humane societie, be obserued, if the law-giuers, and law-rulers be not held in an vntouched admiration? But hereto although alreadie they haue bene sufficientlie answered, yet thus much againe I will repeat vnto you. That whatsoeuer they be or be not, here they be no Princes, since betwixt Prince and subiect there is as necessarie a relation as betweene father and sonne, and as there is no man a father, but to his child, so is not a Prince a Prince, but to his owne subiects. Therefore is not this place to acknowledge in them anie principalitie, without it should at the same time by a secret consent confesse subiection. Yet hereto may be obiected, that the vniuersall ciuilitie, the law of nations (all mankind being as it were coinhabitors or world-citizens together)hath euer required publike persons should be of all parties especially regarded, since not only in peace, but in warre,not only princes, but heralds and trumpets, are with great reason exempted from iniuries. This point is true, but yet so true,as they that will receiue the benefit of a custome, must not be the first to breake it. For then can they not complaine, if they bee not helpt by that which they themselues hurt.If a Prince do actes of hostilitie,without denouncing warre, if he breake his oath of amitie, or innumerable such other things contrary to the law of armes, he must take heed how he fall into their hands whom he so wrongeth, for then is curtesie the best custome he can claime; much more these men, who haue not only left to do like Princes, but to be like Princes, not onely entred into Arcadia, and so into the Arcadian orders, but into domesticall seruices, and so by making themselues priuate, depriued themselues of respect due to their publike calling. For no proportion it were of iustice, that a man might make himselfe no Prince when he would do euill, and might anew create himselfe a Prince, when he would not suffer euill. Thus therefore by all lawes of nature and nations, and especiallie by their owne putting themselues out of the sanctuarie of them, these young men cannot in iustice auoide the iudgement: but like priuate men must haue their doings either cleared, excused, or condemned. There resteth then the second point, how to iudge well. And that must vndoubtedly be done,not by a free discourse of reason and skill of philosophie: but must be tied to the lawes of Greece, and municipall statutes of this kingdome. For although out of them these came, and to them must indeed referre their off-spring, yet because philosophicall discourses stand in the generall consideration of things, they leaue to euerie man a scope of his owne interpretation. Where the lawes applying themselues to the necessarie vse, folde vs within assured bounds, which once broken, mans nature infinitely rangeth. Iudged therefore they must be, and by your lawes iudged. Now the action offereth it selfe to due ballance, betwixt the accusers twofold accusation and their answere accordinglie applied. The questions being the one of a fact simplie, the other of the qualitie of a fact. To the first they vse direct deniall, to the second qualification and excuse. They deny the murther of the king; and mighty against presumptions bring forth some probable answers, which they do principally fortifie with the Queenes acknowledging her selfe only culpable. Certainly as in equalitie of coniectures, we are not to take hold of the worse, but rather to bee glad we may find any hope that mankind is not growne monstrous (being vndoubtedly lesse euill a guiltie man should escape, then a guiltlesse perish) so if in the rest they be spotlesse, then is no farther to be remembred. But if they haue aggrauated these suspitions with new euils, then are those suspitions so farre to shew themselues, as to cause the other points to be throughly examined, and with lesse fauour wayed, since this no man can denie, they haue bene accidentall, if not principall causes of the kings death. Now then we are to determine of the other matters, which are laid to them, wherein they do not denie the fact, but denie, or at least diminish the fault, but first I may remember (though it were not first alleaged by them) the seruices they had before done, truly honorable, and worthie of great reward,but not worthy to counteruaile with a following wickednesse. Reward is proper to well doing, punishment to euill doing, which must not be confounded, no more then good and euill are to be mingled. Therfore hath bene determined in all wisdomes, that no man because he hath done well before, should haue his present euils spared, but rather so much the more punished, as hauing shewed he knew how to be good, would againſt his knowledge be naught. The fact then is nakedly without paſſion, or partiality to be viewed: wherin without all queſtion they are equally culpable. For though he that tearmes himſelfe Daiphantus, were ſooner diſappointed of his purpoſe of conueying away the Lady Philoclea, then he that perſwaded the Princeſſe Pamela to flie her countrie, and accompanied her in it: yet ſeeing in cauſes of this nature, the will by the rules of iuſtice ſtandeth for the deed, they are both alike to be found guiltie, and guiltie of hainous rauiſhment. For though they rauiſhed them not from themſelues, yet they rauiſhed thē from him that owed them, which was their father. An act puniſhed by all the Grecian lawes, by the loſſe of the head, as a moſt execrable theft. For if they muſt die, who ſteale from vs our goods, how much more they, who ſteale from vs that, for which we gather our goods, and if our lawes haue it ſo in the priuate perſons, much more forcible are they to be in Princes children, where one ſteals as it were the whole ſtate and well being of that people, being tied by the ſecret of a long vſe, to be gouerned by none but the next of that bloud. Neither let any man maruell, our anceſtors haue bene ſo ſeuere in theſe caſes, ſince the example of the Phenician Europa, but eſpecially of Grecian Helene, hath taught them, what deſtroying fires haue growne of ſuch ſparkles. And although Helene was a wife, & this but a child, that booteth not, ſince the principall cauſe of marying wiues is, that we may haue childrē of our own. But now let vs ſee how theſe yong men (truly for their perſons worthie of pitie, if they haue rightlie pitied themſelues) do go about to mitigate the vehemencie of their errours. Some of their excuſes are common to both, ſome peculiar onely to him that was the ſhepheard. Both remember the force of loue, and as it were the mending vp of the matter by their mariage: if that vnbrideled deſire which is intituled loue, might purge ſuch a ſickneſſe as this, ſurely we ſhould haue many louing excuſes of hateſull miſchiefe. Nay rather no miſchiefe ſhould be committed, that ſhould not be vailed vnder the name of loue. For as well he that ſteales might alleage the loue of mony; he that murders the loue of reuenge, he that rebels, the loue of greatneſſe, as the adulterer the loue of a woman. Since they do in all ſpeeches affirme they loue that, which an ill gouerned paſſion maketh them to follow: but loue may haue no ſuch priuiledge. That ſweet and heauenly vniting of the minds, which properly is called loue, hath no other knot but vertue, and therefore if it be a right loue, it can neuer ſlide into any action that is not vertuous. The other, and indeed more effectuall reaſon is, that they may be maried vnto them, & ſo honorably redreſſe the diſhonor of them, whō this matter ſeemeth moſt to touch. Surely if the queſtiō were, what were conuenient for the parties, and not what is iuſt in the neuer changing iuſtice, there might much be ſaid in it. But herein we muſt conſider, that the lawes looke how to preuent by due examples, that ſuch things be not done: and not how to ſalue ſuch things whē they are done. For if the gouernors of iuſtice ſhall take ſuch aſcope, as to meaſure the foote of the law by a ſhew of conueniency, and meaſure that conueniency not by the publike ſocietie, but by that which is fitteſt for them which offend: young men, ſtrong men, and rich men, ſhall euer find priuate conueniences how to palliate ſuch committed diſorders, as to the publike ſhall not only be inconuenient, but peſtilent. The mariage perchance might be fit for them, but verie vnfit were it to the ſtate, to allow a patterne of ſuch procurations of mariage. And thus much do they both alleage. Further goes hee that went with the Princeſſe Pamela, and requireth the benefit of a Counſeller, who hath place of free perſwaſion; & the reaſonable excuſe of a ſeruant, that did but wait of his miſtreſſe,

Without all queſtion, as counſellours haue great cauſe to take heed how they aduiſe any thing, directly oppoſit to the forme of that preſent gouernement, eſpecially when they do it ſinglie without publike allowance, ſo yet is the caſe much more apparant: ſince neither ſhe was an effectuall Princeſſe, her father being then aliue, and though he had bene dead, ſhe not come to the yeares of authoritie, nor he her ſeruant in ſuch maner to obey her, but by his own preferment firſt belonging to Dametas, and then to the king, and therefore if not by Arcadia lawes, yet by houſhold orders, bound to haue done nothing without his agreement. Thus therefore ſince the deeds accompliſhed by theſe two, are both abhominable and inexcuſable, I do in the behalfe of iuſtice, and by the force of Arcadia lawes pronounce, that Daiphantus ſhall be throwne out of a high tower to receiue his death by his fall. Palladius ſhall be beheaded, the time before the ſunne ſet: the place, in Mantinea: the executioner, Dametas: which office he ſhall execute all the dayes of his life, for his beaſtly forgetting the carefull duty he owed to his charge. This ſaid, he turned himſelfe to Philanax, and two of the other Noblemen, commanding them to ſee the iudgement preſently performed. Philanax more greedie then any hunter of his praie, went ſtraight to lay hold of the excellent priſoners, who caſting a farewell looke one vpon the other, repreſented in their faces as much vnappalled conſtancy, as the moſt excellent courage can deliuer in outward graces. Yet if at all there were any ſhew of change in them, it was that Pyrocles was ſomewhat nearer to baſhfulneſſe, and Muſidorus to anger; both ouer-ruled by reaſon & reſolution. But as with great number of armed men, Philanax was deſcending vnto them, and that Muſidorus was beginning to ſay ſomething in Pyrocles behalfe, behold Kalander, that with armes caſt abroad, and open mouth came crying to Euarchus, holding a ſtranger in his hand that cryed much more then he, deſiring they might be heard ſpeake before the priſoners were remoued, euen the noble Gentleman Simpathus aided them in it, and taking ſuch as he could commaund, ſtopped Philanax betwixt entreaty and force, from carying away the Princes, vntill it were heard what new matters theſe men did bring. So againe mounting to the Tribunall, they hearkened to the ſtrangers vehement ſpeech, or rather appaſſionate exclaiming. It was indeed Kalodulus, the faithfull ſeruant of Muſidorus, to whom his maiſter, when in deſpite of his beſt grounded determinations he firſt became a ſlaue to affection, had ſent the ſhepheard Menalcas to be arreſted: by the help of whoſe rayment in the meane time he aduanced himſelfe to that eſtate, which he accompted moſt high, becauſe it might be ſeruiceable to that fancie, which he had placed moſt high in his mind. For Menalcas hauing faithfully performed his errand, was as faithfully impriſoned by Kalodulus. But as Kalodulus perfourmed the firſt part of his dutie in doing the commandement of his Prince: ſo was he with abundance of ſincere loyaltie extreamely perplexed when he vnderſtood of Menalcas the ſtraunge diſguiſing of his beloued maiſter. For as the acts he and his couſin Pyrocles had done in Aſia, had filled all the eares of the Theſſalians and Macedonians with no leſſe ioy then admiration: ſo was the feare of their loſſe no leſſe grieuous vnto them, when by the noiſe of report they vnderſtood of their lonely committing themſelues to the ſea, the iſſue of which they had no way learned. But now that by Menalcas he perceiued where he was, geſſing the like of Pyrocles, comparing the vnuſedneſſe of this act with the vnripeneſſe of their age, ſeeing in generall coniecture they could do it for nothing that might not fall out dangerous: he was ſomewhile troubled with himſelfe, what to do, betwixt doubt of their hurt, and doubt of their diſpleaſure. Often

he was minded (as his safest and honestest way) to reueale it to the king Euarchus: that both his authoritie might preuent anie domage to them, and vnder his wings he himselfe might remaine safe. But considering a iourney to Byzantium (where as yet he supposed Euarchus lay) would require more time, then he was willing to remaine doubtfull of his Princes estate, he resolued at length to write the matter to Euarchus, and himselfe the while to go into Arcadia: vncertaine what to do when he came thither, but determined to do his best seruice to his deare maister, if by anie good fortune he might finde him. And so it happened, that being euen this day come to Mantinea, and as warily and attentiuelie as he could, giuing eare to all reports, in hope to heare something of them he sought, he straight receiued a strange rumour of these things: but so vncertainlie, as popular reports carie so rare accidents. But this by all men he was willed, to seeke out Kalander a great Gentleman of that countrie, who wold soonest satisfie him of all these occurrents. Thus instructed he came euen about the midst of Euarchus iudgement to the desert: where seeing great multitudes, and hearing vnknowne names of Palladius and Daiphantus, and not able to presse to the place where Euarchus sate, he enquired for Kalander, and was soone brought vnto him, partly becausse he was generally knowne vnto all men, and partlie becausse he had withdrawne himselfe from the preasse, when he perceiued by Euarchus words whither they tended, being not able to endure his guests condemnation. He enquired forthwith of Kalander the cause of the assemblie; and whether the fame were true of Euarchus presence: who with manie teares made a dolefull recitall vnto him, both of the Amazon and shepheard, setting forth their naturall graces, and lamenting their pitifull vndoing. But his description made Kalodulus immediately know the shepheard was his Duke, and so iudging the other to be Pyrocles, and speedilie communicating it to Kalander, who he saw did fauour their case, they brake the preasse with astonishing euerie man with their cries. And being come to Euarchus, Kalodulus fell at his feet, telling him those he had iudged, were his owne Sonne and Nephew; the one the comfort of Macedon, the other the only stay of Thessalia. With many such like words, but as from a man that assured himselfe in that matter he should need small speech. While Kalander made it knowne to all men, what the prisoners were to whom he cried they should salute their father, and ioy in the good hap the gods had sent them; who were no lesse glad, then all the people amazed at the strange euent of these matters. Euen Philanax owne reuengefull heart was mollified, when he saw frō diuerse parts of the world so neare kinsmen should meete in such a necessitie. And withall the fame of Pyrocles and Musidorus, greatly drew him to a compassionate conceit, and had already vnclothed his face of all shew of malice. But Euarchus staid a good while vpon himselfe, like a valiant man that should receiue a notable encounter, being vehementlie stricken with the fatherlie loue of so excellent children, and studying with his best reason, what his office required: at length with such a kind of grauitie, as was neare to sorow, he thus vttered his mind: I take witnesse of the immortall gods (said he) ô Arcadians, that what this day I haue said, hath bene out of my assured perswasion, what iustice it selfe and your iust lawes require. Though strangers then to me, I had no desire to hurt them, but leauing aside all considerations of the persons, I weighed the matter which you committed into my hands, with my most vnpartiall and fartheſt reach of reason. And thereout haue condemned them to lose their liues, contaminated with so manie foule breaches of hospitality, ciuility & vertue. Now contrary to all expectations,

I find them to be my onely ſonne and nephew, ſuch vpon whom you ſee what gifts nature hath beſtowed: ſuch who haue ſo to the wonder of the world heretofore behaued themſelues, as might giue iuſt cauſe to the greateſt hopes, that in an excellent youth may be conceiued. Laſtly, in few words, ſuch, in whom I placed all my mortall ioyes, and thought my ſelfe now neare my graue, to recouer a new life. But alas, ſhall iuſtice halte? Or ſhall ſhe winke in ones cauſe, which had Lynces eyes in anothers? Or rather ſhall all priuate reſpects giue place to that holy name? Be it ſo, be it ſo, let my gray haires be laid in the duſt with ſorow, let the ſmall remnant of my life be to me an inward and outward deſolation, and to the world a gazing ſtocke of wretched miſery: but neuer, neuer let ſacred rightfulneſſe fall: it is immortall, and immortally ought to be preſerued. If rightly I haue iudged, then rightly I haue iudged mine owne children: vnleſſe the name of a child ſhould haue force to change the neuer changing iuſtice. No, no, Pyrocles and Muſidorus, I preferre you much before my life, but I preferre iuſtice as farre before you, while you did like your ſelues, my body ſhould willingly haue bene your ſhield, but I cannot keep you from the effects of your one doing: nay, I cannot in this caſe acknowledge you for mine: for neuer had I ſhepheard to my nephew, nor euer had woman to my ſon, your vices haue degraded you from being Princes, and haue diſanuld your birthright. Therefore, if there be any thing left in you of Princely vertue, ſhew it in cõſtant ſuffering, that your vnprincely dealing hath purchaſed vnto you. For my part I muſt tell you, you haue forced a father to rob himſelfe of his children. Do you therefore, ô Philanax, and you my other Lords of this countrie, ſee the iudgement be rightly perfourmed in time, place and maner, as before appointed. With that, though he would haue refrained them, a man might perceiue the teares drop downe his long white beard. Which moued not only Kalodulus and Kalander to roring lamentations, but all the aſſembly dolefully to record that pitifull ſpectacle, Philanax himſelfe could not abſtaine from great ſhewes of pitying ſorow, and manifeſt withdrawing from performing the kings commandement. But Muſidorus hauing the hope of his ſafety, and recouering of the Princeſſe Pamela, which made him moſt deſirous to liue, ſo ſodainly daſhed; but eſpecially moued for his deare Pyrocles, for whom he was euer reſolued his laſt ſpeech ſhould be, and ſtirred vp with the rage of vnkindneſſe, he thus ſpake: Enioy thy bloudy cõqueſt tyrannicall Euarchus, ſaid he; for neither is conuenient the title of a king to a murtherer, nor the remembrance of kindred to a deſtroyer of his kindred. Go home and glory, that it hath bene in thy power, ſhamefully to kill Muſidorus. Let thy flattering Orators dedicate Crownes of Lawrell vnto thee, that the firſt of thy race, thou haſt ouerthrowne a Prince of Theſſalia. But for me I hope the Theſſalians are not ſo degenerate from their anceſtors, but that they will reuenge my iniurie, and their loſſe vpon thee. I hope my death is no more vniuſt to me, thẽ it ſhall be bitter to thee; howſoeuer it be, my death ſhall triumph ouer thy cruelty, neither as now would I liue, to make my life beholding vnto thee. But if thy cruelty hath not ſo blinded thine eyes, that thou canſt not ſee thine owne hurt, if thy heart be not ſo diuelliſh, as thou haſt no power but to torment thy ſelfe; then looke vpon this young Pyrocles with a manlike eye, if not with a pitifull: Giue not occaſion to the whole earth to ſay, ſee how the Gods haue made the tyrant teare his owne bowels! Examine the eyes and voyces of all this people, and what all men ſee, be not blind in thine owne cauſe. Looke, I ſay, looke vpon him, in whom the moſt curious ſearcher is able to find no fault: but that he is thy ſonne. Beleeue it, thy owne ſubiects will deteſt thee, for robbing

robbing thē of ſuch a Prince, in whō they haue right as well as thy ſelf. Some more words to that purpoſe he wold haue ſpokē, but Pyrocles who often had cald to him did now fully interrupt him, deſiring him not to do him the wrōg to giue his father ill words before him, willing him to conſider it was their owne fault, & not his vniuſtice, and withal, to remēber their reſolution of well ſuffering all accidents, which this impatiencie did ſeeme to varie frō: & then kneeling downe with all humblenes, he took the ſpeech in this order to Euarchus If my dayly praiers to the almighty Gods, had ſo far preuailed, as to haue granted me the end whereto I haue directed my actions; I ſhould rather haue bene now a comfort to your mind, then an example of your iuſtice; rather a preſeruer of your memorie by my life, then a monumēt of your iudgemēt by my death. But ſince it hath pleaſed their vnſearchable wiſdōs to ouerthrow all the deſires I had to ſerue you, & make me become a ſhame vnto you; ſince the laſt obedience I can ſhew you is to die: vouchſafe yet ō father (if my fault haue not made me altogether vnworthy ſo to tearme you) vouchſafe I ſay to let the few and laſt words your ſonne ſhall euer ſpeake, not be tedious vnto you. And if the remembrance of my vertuous mother, who once was deare vnto you, may beare any ſway with you, if the name of Pyrocles haue at any time bin pleaſant, let one requeſt of mine, which ſhal not be for mine own life, be graciouſly accepted of you. What you owe to iuſtice is performed in my death: a father to haue executed his only ſon, will leaue a ſufficiēt exāple for a greater crime then this. My bloud will ſatisfie the higheſt point of equitie, my bloud will ſatisfie the hardeſt hearted in this countrie. Ō ſaue the life of this Prince; that is the only all I will with my laſt breath demand of you. With what face will you looke vpon your ſiſter, when in reward of nouriſhing me in your greateſt need, you take away, and in ſuch ſort take away that which is more deare to her then all the world, and is the onely comfort wherewith ſhe nouriſheth her old age? O giue not ſuch an occaſion to the noble Theſſalians, for euer to curſe the match that their Prince did make with the Macedon bloud. By my loſſe there follows no publike loſſe, for you are to hold the ſeate, and to prouide your ſelfe perchance of a worthier ſucceſſour. But how can you or all the earth recompence that domage that poore Theſſalia ſhall ſuſtaine? who ſending out (whom otherwiſe they would no more haue ſpared then their owne eyes) their Prince to you, and you requeſting to haue him, by you he ſhould thus diſhonorably be extinguiſhed. Set before you I beſeech you, the face of that miſerable people, when no ſooner ſhall the newes come that you haue met your Nephew, but withall they ſhall heare that you haue beheaded him. How many teares they ſhall ſpend, how many complaints they ſhall make, ſo many iuſt execrations will light vpon you. And take heed ō father, (for ſince my death anſwers my fault, while I liue I will call vpon that deare name) leaſt ſeeking too preciſe a courſe of iuſtice, you be not thought moſt vniuſt: in weakning your neighbours mightie eſtate, by taking away their only piller. In me, in me this matter began, in me let it receiue his ending. Aſſure your ſelf no man will doubt your ſeuere obſeruing the lawes, when it ſhall be knowne Euarchus hath killed Pyrocles. But the time of my euer farewell approcheth, if you do thinke my death ſufficient for my fault, and do not deſire to make my death more miſerable then death: let theſe dying words of him, that was once your ſonne, pierce your eares. Let Muſidorus liue, and Pyrocles ſhall liue in him, and you ſhall not want a child. A child, cried out Muſidorus, to him that killes Pyrocles? with that he fel againe to intreate for Pyrocles, and Pyrocles as faſt for Muſidorus, each imploying his wit how to ſhew himſelfe moſt worthie to die, to ſuch an admiration of all the beholders, that moſt of thē examining the matter by their owne paſſions, thought Euarchus (as often extraordinary excellencies, not being rightly conceiued, do rather offend then pleaſe) an obſtinate hearted man, and ſuch an one, who being pitileſſe, his dominion muſt needs be inſupportable. But Euarchus that felt his owne miſerie more then they, and yet loued goodneſſe more then himſelfe, with ſuch a ſad aſſured behauiour as Cato killed himſelfe withall, when he had heard the vttermoſt of that their ſpeech tended vnto: he commaunded againe they ſhould be caried away, riſing vp from the ſeate (which he would much rather haue wiſhed ſhould haue bene his graue) and looking who would take the charge, whereto euerie one was exceeding backward. But as this pitifull matter was entring into, thoſe that were next the Dukes bodie, might heare from vnder the veluet wherewith he was couered, a great voice of groning. Whereat euerie man aſtoniſhed (and their ſpirits appalled with theſe former miſeries, apt to take any ſtrange conceit) when they might perfectly perceiue the bodie ſtirre. Then ſome began to feare ſpirits, ſome to looke for a miracle, moſt to imagine they knew not what. But Philanax and Kalander, whoſe eyes honeſt loue (though to diuerſe parties) held moſt attentiue, leapt to the table, and putting off the veluet couer, might plainely diſcerne, with as much wonder as gladneſſe, that the Duke liued. For ſo it was, that the drinke he had receiued, was neither as Gynecia firſt imagined, a loue potion, nor as it was after thought a deadly poiſon, but a drinke made by notable Arte, and as it was thought not without naturall magicke, to procure for thirtie houres ſuch a deadly ſleepe, as ſhould oppreſſe all ſhew of life. The cauſe of the making of this drinke had firſt bene, that a Princeſſe of Cyprus, grandmother to Gynecia, being notablie learned, (and yet not able with all her learning to anſwer the obiections of Cupid) did furiouſly loue a yong nobleman of her fathers Court. Who fearing the kings rage, and not once daring either to attempt or accept ſo high a place, ſhe made that ſleeping drinke, and found meanes by a truſty ſeruant of hers (who of purpoſe inuited him to his chamber) to procure him, that ſuſpected no ſuch thing, to receiue it. Which done, he no way able to reſiſt, was ſecretly caried by him into a pleaſant chamber, in the midſt of a garden ſhe had of purpoſe prouided for this enterpriſe, where that ſpace of time, pleaſing her ſelfe with ſeeing and cheriſhing of him, when the time came of the drinkes end of working, and he more aſtoniſhed then if he had falne from the cloudes, ſhe bad him chooſe either then to marie her, and to promiſe to flie away with her in a barke ſhe had made ready, or elſe ſhe would preſently crie out, and ſhew in what place he was, with oth he was come thither to rauiſh her. The Nobleman in theſe ſtraights, her beautie preuailed, he maried her, and eſcaped the realme with her. And after many ſtrange aduentures, were reconciled to the king her father, after whoſe death they raigned. But ſhe gratefully remembring the ſeruice that drinke had done her, preſerued in a bottle (made by ſingular Arte long to keepe it without periſhing) great quantity of it, with the foretold inſcription, which wrong interpreted by her daughter in law the Queene of Cyprus, was giuen by her to Gynecia at the time of her mariage; and the drinke finding an old bodie of Baſilius, had kept him ſome houres longer in the trance, then it wold haue done a yōger. But a good while it was, before good Baſilius could come againe to himſelfe: in which time Euarchus more glad thē of the whole worlds Monarchy, to be rid of his miſerable magiſtracy, which euen in iuſtice he was now to ſurrēder to the lawfull Prince of that country; came from the Throne vnto him, and there with much a do made him vnderſtand

how these intricate matters had fallen out. Many garboyles passed through his fancie before he could be perswaded Zelmane was other then a woman. At length remembring the Oracle which now indeed was accomplished (not as before he had imagined) cõsidering all had fallen out by the highest prouidence, & withall weighing in all these matters his owne fault had bene the greatest. The first thing he did, was with all honorable pompe to send for Gynecia: who (poore Lady) thought she was leading forth to her liuing buriall: and (when she came) to recount before all the people, the excellẽt vertue was in her, which she had not only maintained all her life most vnspotted, but now was cõtẽted so miserably to die, to follow her husband. He told thẽ how she had warned him to take heed of that drinke: and so with all the exaltings of her that might be, he publikely desired her pardon for those errors he had cõmitted. And so kissing her, left her to receiue the most honorable fame of anie Princesse throughout the world, all men thinking (sauing onely Pyrocles and Philoclea, who neuer bewrayed her) that she was the perfect mirrour of all wifely loue. Which though in that point vndeserued, she did in the remnant of her life daylie purchase, with obseruing all dutie and faith to the example and glorie of Greece: so vncertaine are mortall iudgements, the same person most infamous, and most famous, and neither iustly. Then with Princely entertainement to Euarchus, and manie kind words to Pyrocles, whõ still he dearly loued though in a more vertuous kind, the mariage was concluded, to the inestimable ioy of Euarchus, (towards whom now Musidorus acknowledged his fault) betwixt the peerelesse Princes and Princesses. Philanax for his singular faith euer held deare of Basilius while he liued, and no lesse of Musidorus, who was to inherite that kingdome, and therein confirmed to him and his the second place of that Prouince, with great increase of his liuing to maintaine it. Which like proportion he vsed to Kalodulus in Thessalia: highlie honouring Kalander while he liued: and after his death continuing in the same measure to loue & aduãce his son Clitophon. But as for Sympathus, Pyrocles (to whom his father in his owne time gaue the whole kingdome of Thrace) held him alwaies about him, giuing him in pure gift, the great Citie of Abdera. But the solemnities of these mariages with the Arcadian pastoralles, full of manie comicall aduentures hapning to those rurall louers; the strange stories of Artaxia and Plexirtus, Erona and Plangus, Helene and Amphialus, with the wonderfull chances that befell them: The shepheardish loues of Menalcas with Kalodulus daughter; the poore hopes of the poore Philisides in the pursuit of his affections; the strange cõtinuance of Klaius and Strephons desire. Lastly, the sonne of Pyrocles, named Pyrophilus, aud Melidora, the faire daughter of Pamela by Musidorus, who euen at their birth entred into admirable fortunes; may awake some other spirit to exercise his pen in that, wherewith mine is already dulled.

of Arcadia.

CERTAINE SONETS VVRITTEN BY SIR PHILIP SIDNEY:

Neuer before printed.

SInce shunning paine, I ease can neuer find:
Since bashfull dread seekes where he knowes me harmed:
Since will is won, and stopped eares are charmed:
Since force doth faint, and sight doth make me blind.

Since loosing long, the faster still I bind:
Since naked sence can conquer reason armed:
Since heart in chilling feare with yce is warmed:
In fine, since strife of thought but marres the mind,

I yeeld, ô Loue, vnto thy loathed yoke,
Yet crauing law of armes, whose rule doth teach,
That hardly vsde, who euer prison broke,
In iustice quit, of honour made no breach:
Whereas if I a gratefull gardien haue,
Thou art my Lord, and I thy vowed slaue.

WHen Loue puft vp with rage of hy disdaine, Resolu'd to make me patterne of his might,
Like foe, vvhose wits inclin'd to deadly spite,
Would often kill to breed more feeling paine.

He would not arm'd with beautie, only raigne
On those affectes which easily yeeld to sight,
But vertue sets so high, that reasons light,
For all his strife can onlie bondage gaine.

So that I liue to pay a mortall fee,
Dead palsie sicke of all my chiefest parts:
Like those vvhom dreames make vglie monsters see,
And can crie helpe with nought but grones and starts:
Longing to haue, hauing no wit to wish,
To staruing minds such is God Cupids dish.

To the tune of Non credo gia che piu infelice amante.

THe fire to see my wrongs for anger burneth:
The aire in raine for my affliction weepeth:
The sea to ebbe for griefe his flowing turneth:
The earth with pitie dull the center keepeth:
Fame is with wonder blazed:
Time runnes away for sorow:
Place standeth still amazed
To see my night of euils, which hath no morow.
Alas, a louely she no pitie taketh,
To know my miseries, but chaste and cruell:
My fall her glorie maketh,
Yet still her eyes giue to my flames their fuell.

Fire burne me quite, till sense of burning leaue me:
Aire let me draw no more thy breath in anguish:
Sea drownd in thee, of tedious life bereaue me:
Earth take this earth, wherein my spirits languish.
Fame say I was not borne:
Time haste my dying hower:
Place see my graue vptorne:
Fire, aire, sea, earth, fame, time, place, shew your power.
Alas, from all their helpe I am exiled,
For hers am I, and death feares her displeasure.
Fie death, thou art beguiled,
Though I be hers, she makes of me no treasure.

To the same tune.

THe Nightingale as soone as Aprill bringeth
Vnto her rested sense a perfect waking,
While late bare earth, proud of new clothing springeth,
Sings out her woes, a thorne her song-booke making:
And mournfully bewailing,
Her throate in tunes expresseth
What griefe her breast oppresseth,
For Thereus force on her chaste will preuailing.
O Philomela faire, ô take some gladnesse,
That here is iuster cause of plaintfull sadnesse:
Thine earth now springs, mine fadeth,
Thy thorne without, my thorne my heart inuadeth.

Alas she hath no other cause of anguish
But Thereus loue, on her by strong hand wrokne,
Wherein she suffring all her spirits languish,
Full womanlike complaines her will was brokne.

But I who dayly crauing,
Cannot haue to content me,
Haue more cauſe to lament me,
Since wanting is more woe then too much hauing.
O Philomela faire, ô take ſome gladneſſe,
That here is iuſter cauſe of plaintfull ſadneſſe:
Thine earth now ſprings, mine fadeth:
Thy thorne without, my thorne my heart inuadeth.

To the tune of Baſciami vita mia.

SLeepe Babie mine, Deſire nurſe Beautie ſingeth:
Thy cries, ô Babie, ſet mine head on aking:
The Babe cries way, thy loue doth keepe me waking.

Lully, lully, my babe, hope cradle bringeth
Vnto my children alway good reſt taking:
The babe cries way, thy loue doth keepe me waking.

Since babie mine, from me thy watching ſpringeth,
Sleepe then a litle, pap content is making:
The babe cries nay, for that abide I waking.

To the tune of the Spaniſh ſong, Se tu ſeñora no dueles de mi.

OFaire, ô ſweet, when I do looke on thee,
In vvhom all ioyes ſo well agree,
Heart and ſoule do ſing in me.
This you heare is not my tongue,
Which once ſaid what I conceaued,
For it was of vſe bereaued,
With a cruell anſwer ſtong.
No, though tongue to roofe be cleaued,
Fearing leaſt he chaſtiſde be,
Heart and ſoule do ſing in me.

O faire, O ſweete, &c.
Iuſt accord all muſike makes;
In thee iuſt accord excelleth,
Where each part in ſuch peace dwelleth,
One of other beautie takes.
Since then truth to all minds telleth,
That in thee liues harmonie,
Heart and ſoule do ſing in me.

O faire, O ſweet, &c.
They that heau'n haue knowne, do ſay

That

That who so that grace obtaineth,
To see what faire sight there raigneth,
Forced are to sing alway;
So then since that heauen remaineth,
In thy face I plainly see,
Heart and soule do sing in me.

O faire, O sweete, &c.
Sweete thinke not I am at ease,
For because my cheefe part singeth,
This song from deathes sorrow springeth:
As to Swanne in last disease:
For no dumbnesse nor death bringeth
Stay to true loues melody:
Heart and soule do sing in me.

These foure following Sonnets were made when his Ladie had paine in her face.

THe scourge of life, and deaths extreame disgrace,
The smoke of hell, the monster called paine,
Long sham'd to be accurst in euery place,
By them who of his rude resort complaine.
Lyke crafty wretch by time and trauell tought,
His vgly euill in others good to hide,
Late harbers in her face whom nature wrought,
As treasure house where her best gifts do bide.
And so by priuiledge of sacred seate,
A seate where beauty shines and vertue raignes,
He hopes for some small praise since she hath great,
Within her beames wrapping his cruell staines.
Ah saucy paine let not thy errour last,
More louing eyes she draws, more hate thou hast.

VVO, wo, to me, on me returne the smart:
My burning tongue hath bred my mistresse paine,
For oft in paine to paine my painefull heart
With her due praise did of my state complaine.
I praisde her eyes whom neuer chance doth moue,
Her breath which makes a sower answer sweete,
Her milken breasts the nurse of child-like loue,
Her legges (O legges) her ay well stepping feete.
Paine heard her praise, and full of inward fire,
(First sealing vp my heart as pray of his)
He flies to her, and boldned with desire,
Her face (this ages praise) the thiefe doth kisse.
O paine I now recant the praise I gaue,
And sweare she is not worthy thee to haue.

Thou paine the onely gueſt of loath'd conſtraint,
The child of curſe, mans weakneſſe foſter-child,
Brother to woe, and father of complaint:
Thou paine, thou hated paine, from heau'n exilde,
How holdſt thou her, whoſe eyes conſtraint doth feare,
VVhom curſt do bleſſe, whoſe weakeneſſe vertues arme,
VVho others woes and plaints can chaſtly beare:
In whoſe ſweete heau'n Angels of high thoughts ſwarme.
VVhat courage ſtrange hath caught thy caitife hart,
Fear'ſt not a face that oft whole harts deuowres,
Or art thou from aboue bid play this part,
And ſo no helpe gainſt enuy of thoſe powers?
If thus alas: yet while thoſe partes haue wo,
So ſtay her toung, that she no more ſay no.

And haue I heard her ſay? ô cruell paine!
And doth she know what mould her beautie beares?
Mournes she in truth, and thinks that others faine?
Feares she to feele, and feeles not others feares?
Or doth she thinke all paine the minde forbeares?
That heauie earth, not fierie ſprites may plaine?
That eyes weepe worſe then hart in bloodie teares?
That ſenſe feeles more then what doth ſenſe containe?
No, no, she is too wiſe, she knowes her face
Hath not ſuch paine as it makes others haue:
She knows the ſickneſſe of that perfect place
Hath yet ſuch health, as it my life can ſaue.
But this she thinks, our paine hye cauſe excuſeth,
VVhere her who should rule paine, falſe paine abuſeth.

Tranſlated out of Horace, which beginnes
Rectiùs viues.

YOu better ſure shall liue, not euermore
Trying high ſeas, nor while ſeas rage you flet,
Preſſing too much vpon ill harbourd shore.

The golden meane who loues, liues ſafely free
From filth of foreworne houſe, and quiet liues, Releaſt from Court, where enuie needes muſt be.

The windes moſt oft the hugeſt Pine-tree greeues:
The ſtately towers come downe with greater fall:
The higheſt hills the bolt of thunder cleeues:

Euill happes do fill with hope, good happes appall
VVith feare of change, the courage well preparde:
Fowle VVinters as they come, away they shall.

Though

Though present times and past with euils be snarde,
They shall not last: with Citherne silent muse,
Apollo wakes, and bow hath sometime sparde.

In hard estate with stowt shew valor vse,
The same man still in whom wise doome preuailes,
In too full winde draw in thy swelling sailes.

Out of Catullus.

Nulli se dicit mulier mea nubere malle,
Quam mihi non si se Iupiter ipse petat,
Dicit sed mulier Cupido quæ dicit amanti,
In vento aut rapida scribere oportet aqua.

VNto no body my woman saith she had rather a wife be,
Then to my selfe, not though Ioue grew a suter of hers.
These be her words, but a womans words to a loue that is eager,
In wind or waters streame do require to be writ.

Qui sceptra sæuus duro imperio regit,
Timet timentes, metus in Authorem redit.

Faire seeke not to be feard, most louely beloued by thy seruants,
For true it is, that they feare many whom many feare.

LIke as the Doue which seeled vp doth flie,
Is neither freed, nor yet to seruice bound,
But hopes to gaine some helpe by mounting hie,
Till want of force do force her fall to ground.

Right so my minde caught by his guiding eye,
And thence cast off, where his sweete hurt he found,
Hath neuer leaue to liue, nor doome to dye,
Nor held in euill, nor suffered to be sound.

But with his wings of fancies vp he goes,
To hie conceits whose fruits are oft but small,
Till wounded, blind, and wearied spirite, lose
Both force to flie and knowledge where to fall.
O happie Doue if she no bondage tried:
More happie I, might I in bondage bide.

E. D.

PRometheus when first from heauen hie,
He brought downe fire, ere then on earth not seene,
Fond of Delight, a Satyre standing by,
Gaue it a kisse, as it like sweete had beene.

Feeling forthwith the other burning power,
VVood with the ſmart with showts and shryking shrill,
He ſought his eaſe in riuer, field, and bower,
But for the time his griefe went with him ſtill.

So ſilly I with that vnwonted ſight
In humane shape an Angell from aboue,
Feeding mine eyes, the impreſſion there did light,
That ſince I runne and reſt as pleaſeth loue,
The difference is, the Satires lippes, my hart,
He for a while, I euermore haue ſmart.

A Satyre once did runne away for dread,
With ſound of horne, which he him ſelfe did blow,
Fearing and feared thus from himſelfe he fled,
Deeming ſtrange euill in that he did not know.

Such cauſeleſſe feares when coward minds do take,
It makes them flie that which they faine would haue:
As this poore beaſt who did his reſt forſake,
Thinking not why, but how himſelfe to ſaue.

Euen thus might I for doubts which I conceaue
Of mine owne wordes, my owne good hap betray,
And thus might I for feare of may be, leaue
The ſweete purſute of my deſired pray.
Better like I thy Satyre deereſt Dyer,
Who burnt his lips to kiſſe faire shining fire.

MY miſtreſſe lowers and ſaith I do not loue:
I do proteſt and ſeeke with ſeruice due,
In humble mind a conſtant faith to proue,
But for all this I can not her remoue
From deepe vaine thought that I may not be true.

If othes might ſerue, euen by the Stygian lake,
VVhich Poets ſay, the gods them ſelues do feare,
I neuer did my vowed word forſake:
For why should I, whom free choiſe ſlaue doth make?
Elſe what in face, then in my fancie beare.

My Muſe therefore for onely thou canſt tell,
Tell me the cauſe of this my cauſeleſſe woe,
Tell how ill thought diſgrac'd my doing well:
Tell how my ioyes and hopes thus fowly fell
To ſo lowe ebbe that wonted were to flowe.

O this it is, the knotted straw is found
In tender harts, small things engender hate:
A horses worth laid wast the Troyan ground:
A three foote stoole in Greece, made Trumpets sound,
An Asses shade ere now hath bred debate.

If Greekes themselues were mou'd with so small cause,
To twist those broyles, which hardly would vntwine:
Should Ladies faire be tyed to such hard lawes,
As in their moodes to take a lingring pawse?
I would it not, their mettall is too fine.

My hand doth not beare witnesse with my hart,
She saith, because I make no wofull laies,
To paint my liuing death, and endlesse smart:
And so for one that felt god Cupids dart,
She thinks I leade and liue too merrie daies.

Are Poets then the onely louers true?
VVhose hearts are set on measuring a verse:
Who thinke themselues well blest, if they renew
Some good old dumpe, that Chaucers mistresse knew,
And vse but you for matters to rehearse.

Then good Apollo do away thy bowe:
Take harp and sing in this our versing time:
And in my braine some sacred humour slowe:
That all the earth my woes, sighes, teares may know,
And see you not that I fall now to ryme.

As for my mirth, how could I but be glad, whilst that me thought I iustly made my bost
That onely I the onely Mistresse had:
But now, if ere my face with ioy be clad:
Thinke Hannibal did laugh when Carthage lost.

Sweet Ladie, as for those whose sullen cheare,
Compar'd to me, made me in lightnesse found:
Who Stoick-like in clowdie hew appeare:
Who silence force to make their words more deare:
Whose eyes seeme chaste, because they looke on ground:
Beleeue them not for Phisicke true doth finde,
Choler adust is ioyed in woman-kinde.

IN wonted walkes, since wonted fancies change,
Some cause there is, which of strange cause doth rise:
For in each thing wherto mine eye doth range,
Part of my paine me seemes engraued lyes.

The Rockes which were of constant mind, the marke
In clyming steepe, now hard refusall show:
The shading woods seeme now my Sunne to darke,
And stately hilles disdaine to looke so low.

The restfull Caues now restlesse visions giue,
In Dales I see each way a hard assent:
Like late mowne meades, late cut from ioy I liue.
Alas sweete Brookes do in my teares augment:
Rockes, woods, hilles, caues, dales, meads, brookes, answere me,
Infected mindes infect each thing they see.

IF I could thinke how these my thoughts to leaue,
Or thinking still my thoughts might haue good end:
If rebell sence would reasons law receaue;
Or reason foyld would not in vaine contend:
Then might I thinke what thoughts were best to thinke:
Then might I wisely swimme or gladly sinke.

If either you would change your cruell hart,
Or cruell (still) time did your beautie staine:
If from my soule this loue would once depart,
Or for my loue some loue I might obtaine,
Then might I hope a change or ease of minde,
By your good helpe, or in my selfe to finde.

But since my thoughts in thinkiug still are spent,
With reasons strife, by senses ouerthrowne,
You fairer still, and still more cruell bent,
I louing still a loue that loueth none.
I yeeld and striue, I kisse and curse the paine:
Thought, reason, sense, time, you, and I, maintaine.

A Farewell.

OFT haue I musde, but now at length I finde,
Why those that die, men say they do depart:
Depart, a word so gentle to my minde,
Weakely did seeme to paint deaths ougly dart.

But now the starres with their strange course do binde
Me one to leaue, with whome I leaue my hart.
I heare a crye of spirits faint and blinde,
That parting thus my chiefest part I part.

Part of my life, the loathed part to me,
Liues to impart my wearie clay some breath.

But

But that good part, wherein all comforts be,
Now dead, doth shew departure is a death,
Yea worse then death, death parts both woe and ioy,
From ioy I part still liuing in annoy.

FInding those beames, which I must euer loue,
To marre my minde, and with my hurt to please,
I deemd it best some absence for to proue,
If further place might further me to ease.

My eyes thence drawne, where liued all their light,
Blinded forthwith in darke dispaire did lye,
Like to the Molde with want of guiding sight,
Deepe plunged in earth, depriued of the skie.

In absence blind, and wearied with that woe,
To greater woes by presence I returne,
Euen as the flye, which to the flame doth goe,
Pleased with the light, that his small corse doth burne:
Faire choice I haue, either to liue or dye
A blinded Molde, or else a burned flye.

The 7. Wonders of England.

NEere VVilton sweete, huge heapes of stones are found,
But so confusde, that neither any eye
Can count them iust, nor reason reason trye,
What force brought them to so vnlikely ground.

To stranger weights my mindes waste soile is bound,
Of passion hilles reaching to reasons skie,
From fancies earth passing all numbers bound,
Passing all ghesse, whence into me should fly
So mazde a masse, or if in me it growes,
A simple soule should breed so mixed woes.

The Bruertons haue a Lake, which when the Sunne, Approching warmes (not else) dead logges vp sends,
From hideous depth, which tribute when it ends,
Sore signe it is, the Lords last thred is spun.

My lake is sense, whose still streames neuer runne,
But when my Sunne her shining twinnes there bends,
Then from his depth with force in her begunne,
Long drowned hopes to watrie eyes it lends:
But when that failes, my dead hopes vp to take,
Their master is faire warn'd his will to make.

We haue a fish, by ſtrangers much admirde,
Which caught, to cruell ſearch yeelds his chiefe part:
(With gall cut out) cloſde vp againe by art,
Yet liues vntill his life be new requirde.

A ſtranger fish, my ſelfe not yet expirde,
Though rapt with beauties hooke, I did impart
My ſelfe vnto th' Anatomy deſirde,
In ſteed of gall, leauing to her my hart:
Yet liue with thoughts cloſde vp, till that she will
By conqueſts right in ſteed of ſearching kill.

Peake hath a Caue, whoſe narrow entries finde,
Large roomes within, where droppes diſtill amaine:
Till knit with cold, though there vnknowne remaine,
Decke that poore place with Alablaſter linde.

Mine eyes the ſtreight, the roomie caue, my minde,
VVhoſe clowdie thoughts, let fall an inward raine
Of ſorrowes droppes till colder reaſon binde
Their running fall into a conſtant vaine
Of trueth, farre more then Alablaſter pure,
VVhich though deſpiſde, yet ſtill doth truth endure.

A field there is, where if a ſtake be preſt,
Deepe in the earth, what hath in earth receipt,
Is chang'd to ſtone, in hardneſſe, cold, and weight,
The wood, aboue doth ſoone conſuming reſt.

The earth, her eares: the ſtake is my requeſt:
Of which, how much may pierce to that ſweet ſeate,
To honor turnd, doth dwell in honors neſt,
Keeping that forme, though void of wonted heate:
But all the reſt, which feare durſt not applie,
Failing themſelues, with withered conſcience dye.

Of ships, by shipwrack caſt on Albion coaſt,
Which rotting on the rockes, their death do dye:
From wodden bones, and bloud of pitch doth flie
A bird which gets more life then ship had loſt.

My ship, deſire, with winde of luſt long toſt,
Brake on faire cleeues of conſtant chaſtitie:
Where plagu'd for rash attempt, giues vp his ghoſt,
So deepe in ſeas of vertue beauties ly.
But of this death flies vp a pureſt loue,
Which ſeeming leſſe, yet nobler life doth moue.

Theſe

These wonders England breedes, the last remaines,
A Ladie in despite of nature chaste.
On whome all loue, in whom no loue is plaste,
Where faireneſſe yeelds to wiſdomes shorteſt raines.

An humble pride, a ſkorne that fauour ſtaines:
A womans mould, but like an Angell graſte,
An Angells mind, but in a woman caſte:
A heauen on earth, or earth that heauen containes:
Now thus this wonder to myſelfe I frame,
She is the cauſe that all the reſt I am.

To the tune of Wilhemus van Naſſaw, &c.

VVHo hath his fancie pleaſed, with fruits of happie ſight,
Let here his eyes be raiſed
On natures ſweeteſt light.
A light which doth diſſeuer,
And yet vnite the eyes,
A light which dying neuer,
Is cauſe the looker dyes.

She neuer dies but laſteth
In life of louers hart,
He euer dies that waſteth
In loue, his chiefeſt part.
Thus is her life ſtill guarded,
In neuer dying faith:
Thus is his death rewarded,
Since she liues in his death.

Looke then and dye, the pleaſure
Doth anſwere well the paine:
Small loſſe of mortall treaſure,
Who may immortall gaine.
Immortall be her graces,
Immortall is her minde:
They fit for heauenly places,
This heauen in it doth binde.

But eyes theſe beauties ſee not,
Nor ſence that grace deſcryes:
Yet eyes depriued be not,
From ſight of her faire eyes:
Which as of inward glorie
They are the outward ſeale:
So may they liue ſtill ſorie
Which die not in that weale.

But who hath fancies pleased,
With fruits of happie sight,
Let here his eyes be rayſed
On natures ſweeteſt light.

The ſmokes of Melancholy.

VVHo hath euer felt the change of loue,
And knowne thoſe pangs that the looſers proue,
May paint my face without ſeeing mee,
And write the ſtate how my fancies bee,
The lothſome buds growne on ſorrowes tree.

But who by hearesay ſpeakes, and hath not fully felt
What kind of fires they be in which thoſe ſpirits melt,
Shall geſſe, and faile, what doth diſpleaſe,
Feeling my pulſe, miſſe my diſeaſe.

O no, O no, try all onely shewse
The bitter iuice of forſaken woes, where former bliſſe preſent euils do ſtaine,
Nay former bliſſe addes to preſent paine,
While remembrance doth both ſtates containe.

Come learners then to me, the modell of misbappe,
Engulfed in deſpaire, ſlid downe from fortunes lappe:
And as you like my double lot,
Tread in my ſteppes, or follow not.

For me alas I am full reſolu'd,
Thoſe bands alas shall not be diſſolu'd,
Nor breake my word though reward come late,
Nor faile my faith in my failing fate,
Nor change in change, though change change my ſtate.

But alwayes one my ſelfe with eagle eyde trueth to ſtie, vp to the ſunne, although the ſunne my wings do frie:
For if thoſe flames burne my deſire,
Yet shall I die in Phœnix fire.

VVHen to my deadlie pleaſure,
When to my liuelie torment,
Ladie mine eyes remained,
Ioyned alas to your beames.

With violence of heau'nly
Beautie tied, to vertue,

Reaſon

Reason abasht retyred,
Gladly my senses yeelded.

Gladly my senses yeelding,
Thus to betray my harts fort,
Left me deuoid of all life.

They to the beamie Sunnes went,
Where by the death of all deaths,
Finde to what harme they hastned.

Like to the silly Syluan,
Burn'd by the light he best liked,
When with a fire he first met.

Yet, yet, a life to their death,
Lady you haue reserued,
Lady the life of all loue.

For though my sense be from me,
And I be dead who want sense,
Yet do we both liue in you.

Turned anew by your meanes,
Vnto the flowre that ay turnes,
As you, alas, my Sunne bends.

Thus do I fall to rise thus,
Thus do I dye to liue thus,
Changed to a change, I change not.

Thus may I not be from you:
Thus be my senses on you:
Thus what I thinke is of you:
Thus what I seeke is in you:
All what I am, it is you.

To the tune of a Neapolitan song, which beginneth: No, no, no, no.

NO, no, no, no, I cannot hate my foe,
Although with cruell fire,
First throwne on my desire,
She sackes my rendred sprite.
For so a faire, a flame embraces
All the places,

where that heat of all heates ſpringeth,
That it bringeth
To my dying heart ſome pleaſure,
Since his treaſure
Burneth bright in faireſt light. No, no, no, no.

No, no, no, no, I cannot hate my foe,
Although, &c.
Since our liues be not immortall,
But to mortall
Fetters tyed, do waite the hower of deathes power.
They haue no cauſe to be ſorie,
who with glorie
End the way, where all men ſtay. No, no, no, no.

No, no, no, no, I cannot hate my foe,
Although, &c.
No man doubts, whom beautie killeth,
Faire death feeleth,
And in whome faire death proceedeth,
Glorie breedeth:
So that I in her beames dying,
Glorie trying,
Though in paine, cannot complaine. No, no, no, no.

To the tune of a Neapolitan Villanell.

ALL my ſenſe thy ſweetneſſe gained,
Thy faire haire my heart enchained,
My poore reaſon thy words moued,
So that thee like heauen I loued.

Fa la la leridan, dan dan dan deridan:
Dan dan dan deridan deridan dei:
while to my minde the out ſide ſtood,
For meſſenger of inward good.

Now thy ſweetneſſe ſowre is deemed,
Thy haire not worth a haire eſteemed:
Reaſon hath thy words remoued,
Finding that but words they proued.

Fa la la leridan dan dan dan deridan,
Dan dan dan deridan deridan dei,
For no faire ſigne can credit winne,
If that the ſubſtance faile within.

No

No more in thy ſweetneſſe glorie,
For thy knitting haire be ſorie:
Vſe thy words but to bewaile thee,
That no more thy beames auaile thee.
Dan, dan,
Dan, dan,
Lay not thy colours more to view,
Without the picture be found true.

Wo to me, alas she weepeth!
Foole in me, what follie creepeth,
Was I to blaſpheme enraged,
Where my ſoule I haue engaged.
Dan, dan,
Dan, dan,
And wretched I muſt yeeld to this,
The fault I blame her chaſtneſſe is.

Sweetneſſe ſweetly pardon folly,
Tye me haire your captiue holly,
Words, ô vvords of heauenlie knowledge,
Know my words their faults acknowledge.
Dan, dan,
Dan, dan.
And all my life I will confeſſe,
The leſſe I loue, I liue the leſſe,

Tranſlated out of the Diana of Montemaior in Spaniſh. VVhere Sireno a ſhepheard pulling out a litle of his Miſtreſſe Dianas haire, wrapt about with greene ſilke, who now had vtterlie forſaken him: to the haire he thus bewaild himſelfe.

VVHat changes here, ô haire,
I ſee ſince I ſaw you:
How ill ſits you this greene to weare,
For hope the colour due.
Indeed I well did hope,
Though hope were mixt with feare,
No other ſhepheard ſhould haue ſcope,
Once to approch this heare.

Ah haire, how many dayes,
My Diane made me ſhew,
VVith thouſand prety childiſh plaies,
If I ware you or no,
Alas how oft with teares,
O teares of guileſull breaſt,

She ſeemed full of iealous feares,
Whereat I did but ieaſt.

Tell me ô haire of gold,
If I then faultie be,
That truſt thoſe killing eyes, I would,
Since they did warrant me.
Haue you not ſeene her mood,
What ſtreames of teares she ſpent,
Till that I ſware my faith ſo ſtood,
As her words had it bent?

Who hath ſuch beautie ſeene
In one that changeth ſo?
Or where ones loue ſo conſtant bene?
Who euer ſaw ſuch woe?
Ah haire are you not grieu'd,
To come from whence you be,
Seeing how once you ſaw I liu'd,
To ſee me as you ſee?

On ſandie banke of late,
I ſaw this woman ſit,
Where ſooner die then change my ſtate,
She with her finger writ:
Thus my beleefe vvas ſtaid,
Behold Loues mightie hand
On things, were by a woman ſaid,
And written in the ſand.

The ſame Sireno in Montemaior holding his miſtreſſe glaſſe before her, looking vpon her while ſhe viewed her ſelfe, thus ſang:

OF this high grace with bliſſe conioyn'd
No further debt on me is laid,
Since that in ſelfe ſame mettall coin'd,
Sweet Ladie you remaine well paid.
For if my place giue me great pleaſure,
Hauing before me Natures treaſure,
In face and eyes vnmatched being,
You haue the ſame in my hands ſeeing,
What in your face mine eyes do meaſure.

Nor thinke the match vneu'nly made,
That of thoſe beames in you do tarie:
The glaſſe to you but giues a shade,
To me mine eyes the true shape carie.

For

For such a thought most highlie prized,
Which euer hath Loues yoke despised:
Better then one captiu'd perceiueth,
Though he the liuely forme receiueth:
The other sees it but disguised.

RIng out your belles, let mourning shewes be spread,
For loue is dead:
All Loue is dead, infected
With plague of deepe disdaine:
Worth as nought worth reiected,
And Faith faire scorne doth gaine.
From so vngratefull fancie,
From such a femall franzie,
From them that vse men thus,
Good Lord deliuer vs.

Weepe neighbours, weepe, do you not heare it said,
That Loue is dead:
His death-bed peacocks follie,
His winding sheete is shame,
His will false-seeming holie,
His sole exectour blame.
From so vngratefull, &c.

Let Dirge be sung, and Trentals rightly read,
For Loue is dead:
Sir vvrong his tombe ordaineth:
My mistresse Marble-heart,
Which Epitaph containeth,
Her eyes were once his dart.
From so vngratefull, &c.

Alas, I lie: rage hath this errour bred,
Loue is not dead.
Loue is not dead, but sleepeth
In her vnmatched mind:
where she his counsell keepeth,
Till due desert she find.
Therefore from so vile fancie,
To call such wit a franzie,
Who loue can temper thus,
Good Lord deliuer vs.

THou blind mans marke, thou fooles selfe chosen snare,
Fond fancies scum, and dregs of scattred thought,
Band of all euils, cradle of causelesse care,
Thou vveb of will, whose end is neuer wrought.

Deſire, deſire I haue too dearely bought,
With priſe of mangled mind thy worthleſſe ware,
Too long, too long aſleepe thou haſt me brought,
Who should my mind to higher things prepare.

But yet in vaine thou haſt my ruine ſought,
In vaine thou madeſt me to vaine things aſpire,
In vaine thou kindleſt all thy ſmokie fire.

For vertue hath this better leſſon taught,
Within my ſelfe to ſeeke my onelie hire:
Deſiring nought but how to kill deſire.

Leaue me ô Loue, which reacheſt but to duſt,
And thou my mind aſpire to higher things:
Grow rich in that which neuer taketh ruſt:
What euer fades, but fading pleaſure brings.

Draw in thy beames, and humble all thy might,
To that ſweet yoke, where laſting freedomes be:
Which breakes the clowdes and opens forth the light,
That doth both ſhine and giue vs ſight to ſee.

O take faſt hold, let that light be thy guide,
In this ſmall courſe which birth drawes out to death,
And thinke how euill becommeth him to ſlide,
Who ſeeketh heau'n, and comes of heau'nly breath.
Then farewell world, thy vttermoſt I ſee,
Eternall Loue maintaine thy life in me.

Splendidis longum valedico nugis.

WHen the right vertuous E. W. and I were at the Emperours Court together, we gaue our ſelues to learne horſmanſhip of Ion Pietro Pugliano, one that with great commendation had the place of an Eſquire in his ſtable: and he acording to the fertilneſſe of the Italian wit, did not onely affoord vs the demonſtration of his practiſe, but ſought to enrich our minds with the contemplations therein, which he thought moſt precious. But with none I remember mine eares were at any time more loaden, then when (either angred with ſlow paiment, or moued with our learnerlike admiration) he exerciſed his ſpeech in the praiſe of his facultie. Hee ſaide ſouldiers were the nobleſt eſtate of mankind, and horſmen the nobleſt of ſouldiers. Hee ſaide they were the maiſters of warre, and ornamentes of peace, ſpeedie goers, and ſtrong abiders, triumphers both in Campes and Courtes: nay to ſo vnbeleeued a point he proceeded, as that no earthly thing bred ſuch wonder to a Prince, as to be a good horſe-man. Skill of gouernment was but a Pedanteria in compariſon: then would he adde certaine praiſes, by telling what a peereleſſe beaſt the horſe was, the onely ſeruiceable Courtier without flatterie, the beaſt of moſt beautie, faithfulneſſe, courage, and ſuch more, that if I had not bene a peece of a Logician before I came to him, I thinke he would haue perſwaded me to haue wiſhed my ſelfe a horſe. But thus much at leaſt with his no few words he draue into me, that ſelfe-loue is better then any guilding, to make that ſeeme gorgeous wherein our ſelues be parties. Wherin if Puglianos ſtrong affection and weake arguments will not ſatisfie you, I will giue you a neerer example of my ſelfe, who I know not by what miſchaunce in theſe my not old yeares and idleſt times, hauing ſlipt into the title of a Poet, am prouoked to ſay ſomething vnto you in the defence of that my vnelected vocation, which if I handle with more good will, then good reaſons, beare with me, ſince the ſcholler is to be pardoned that followeth the ſteps of his maiſter. And yet I muſt ſay, that as I haue more iuſt cauſe to make a pitifull defence of poore Poetrie, which from almoſt the higheſt eſtimation of learning, is falne to be the laughing ſtocke of children, ſo haue I need to bring ſome more auaileable proofes, ſince the former is by no man bard of his deſerued credite, the ſillie later hath had euen the names of Philoſophers vſed to the defacing of it, with great daunger of ciuill warre among the Muſes. And firſt trulie to all them that profeſſing learning inueigh againſt Poetrie may iuſtlie be obiected, that they go verie neare to vngratefulneſſe, to ſeeke to deface that which in the nobleſt nations and languages that are known, hath bene the firſt light giuer to ignorance, & firſt nurſe, whoſe milk litle & litle enabled thē to feed afterwards of tougher knowledges. And wil you play the Hedgehogge, that being receiued into the denne, draue out his hoſte? or rather the Vipers, that with their birth kill their parents? Let learned Greece in any of his manifold Sciences, be able to ſhew me one booke before Muſæus, Homer and Heſiod, all three nothing elſe but Poets. Nay, let anie Hiſtorie be brought, that can ſay any writers were there before them, if they were not men of the ſame skill, as Orpheus, Linus, and ſome other are named, who hauing bene the firſt of that countrie that made pennes deliuerers of their knowledge to the poſteritie, may iuſtly challenge to be called their Fathers in learning. For not onely in time they had this prioritie, (although in it ſelfe antiquitie be venerable) but went before them, as cauſes to draw with their charming ſweetneſſe the wild vntamed wits to an admiration of knowledge. So as Amphion was ſaid to moue ſtones with his Poetrie to build Thebes, and Orpheus to be liſtened to by beaſts, indeed ſtony and beaſtly people. So among the Romans were Liuius Andronicus, and Ennius, ſo in the Italian language, the firſt that made it to aſpire to be a treaſure-houſe of Science were the Poets Dante, Bocace, and Petrarch. So in our Engliſh were Gower and Chawcer, after whom, encouraged and delighted with their excellent foregoing, others haue followed to beautifie our mother tongue, as well in the ſame kind as other artes. This did ſo notably ſhew it ſelfe, that the Philoſophers of Greece durſt not a long time appeare to the world, but vnder the maske of Poets. So Thales, Empedocles, and Parmenides, ſang their naturall Philoſophie in verſes. So did Pythagoras and Phocillides their morall Counſels. So did Tirteus in warre matters, and Solon in matters of policie, or rather they being Poets, did exerciſe their delightfull veine in thoſe points of higheſt knowledge, which before them lay hidden to the world. For that wiſe Solon was directlie a Poet, it is manifeſt, hauing written in verſe the notable Fable of the Atlanticke Iſland, which was continued by Plato. And trulie euen Plato whoſoeuer well conſidereth, ſhall find that in the bodie of his worke though the inſide and ſtrength were Philoſophie, the skinne as it were and beautie, depended moſt of Poetrie. For all ſtands vpon Dialogues, wherein he faignes manie honeſt Burgeſſes of Athens ſpeake of ſuch matters, that if they had bene ſet on the racke, they would neuer haue confeſſed them: beſides his Poeticall deſcribing the circumſtances of their meetings, as the well ordering of a banquet, the delicacie of a walke, with enterlacing meere Tales, as Gyges Ring and others, which, who knowes not to be flowers of Poetrie, did neuer walke into Apollos Garden. And euen Hiſtoriographers, although their lippes ſound of things done, and verity be written in their foreheads, haue bene glad to borow both faſhion and perchaunce weight of the Poets. So Herodotus entituled his Hiſtorie by the name of the nine Muſes, & both he and all the reſt that followed him, either ſtale, or vſurped of Poetrie, their paſſionate deſcribing of paſſions, the many particularities of battels which no man could affirme, or if that be denied me, long Orations put in the mouths of great kings and Captaines, which it is certaine, they neuer pronounced. So that truly neither Philoſopher, nor Hiſtoriographer could at the firſt haue entred into the gates of popular iudgmēts, if they had not takē a great paſport of Poetrie, which in all Nations at this day, where learning flouriſheth not, is plaine to be seene: in all which they haue some feeling of Poetrie. In Turkie, besides their Law-giuing Diuines, they haue no other writers but Poets. In our neighbour countrie Ireland, where truely learning goes verie bare, yet are their Poets held in a deuout reuerence. Euen among the most barbarous and simple Indians, where no writing is, yet haue they their Poets, who make and sing songs, which they call Arentos, both of their Ancestors deeds, and praises of their Gods. A sufficient probabilitie, that if euer learning come among them, it must be by hauing their hard dull wittes softened and sharpened with the sweete delights of Poetrie, for vntill they find a pleasure in the exercise of the mind, great promises of much knowledge, will little perswade them that know not the fruits of knowledge. In Wales, the true remnant of the ancient Brittons, as there are good authorities to shew, the long time they had Poets which they called Bardes: so thorough all the conquests of Romanes, Saxons, Danes, and Normans, some of whome did seeke to ruine all memorie of learning from among them, yet do their Poets euen to this day last: so as it is not more notable in the soone beginning, then in long continuing. But since the Authours of most of our Sciences, were the Romanes, and before them the Greekes, let vs a little stand vppon their authorities, but euen so farre as to see what names they haue giuen vnto this now scorned skill. Among the Romanes a Poet was called Vates, which is as much as a Diuiner, foreseer, or Prophet, as by his conioyned words Vaticinium, and Vaticinari, is manifest, so heauenly a title did that excellent people bestow vppon this heart-rauishing knowledge, and so farre were they caried into the admiration thereof, that they thought in the chaunceable hitting vppon of any such verses, great foretokens of their following fortunes were placed. Whereuppon grew the word of Sortes Virgilianæ, when by sodaine opening Virgils booke, they lighted vppon some verse of his, as it is reported by manie, whereof the Histories of the Emperours liues are full. As of Albinus the Gouernour of our Iland, who in his childhood met with this verse:

Arma amens capio, nec sat rationis in armis.

And in his age performed it, although it were a very vaine and godlesse superstition as also it was, to thinke spirits were commanded by such verses, whereupon this word Charmes deriued of Carmina, commeth: so yet serueth it to shew the great reuerence those wits were held in, and altogether not without ground, since both the Oracles of Delphos and Sybillas prophecies, were wholly deliuered in verses, for that same exquisite obseruing of number and measure in the words, and that high flying libertie of conceit proper to the Poet, did seeme to haue some diuine force in it. And may not I presume a little farther, to shew the reasonablenesse of this word Vates, and say that the holy Dauids Psalmes are a diuine Poeme? If I do, I shall not do it without the testimonie of great learned men both ancient and moderne. But euen the name of Psalmes will speake for me, which being interpreted, is nothing but songs: then that it is fullie written in meeter, as all learned Hebritians agree, although the rules be not yet fully found. Lastly and principally, his handling his prophecie, which is meerely Poeticall. For what else is the awaking his musicall Instruments, the often and free changing of persons, his notable Prosopopœias, when he maketh you as it were see God comming in his maiestie, his telling of the beasts ioyfulnesse, and hilles leaping, but a heauenly Poesie, wherein almost he sheweth himselfe a passionate louer of that vnspeakable and euerlasting beautie, to be seene by the eyes of the mind, onely cleared by faith? But truly now hauing named him, I feare I seeme to prophane that holie name, applying it to Poetrie, which is among vs throwne downe to so ridiculous an estimation. But they that with quiet iudgements will looke a litle deeper into it, shall find the end and working of it such, as being rightly applied, deserueth not to be scourged out of the Church of God. But now let vs see how the Greekes haue named it, and how they deemed of it. The Greekes named him ποιητὴν, which name hath, as the most excellent, gone through other languages, it commeth of this word ποιεῖν, which is to make: wherein I know not whether by lucke or wisedome, wee Englishmen haue met with the Greekes in calling him a Maker. Which name, how high and incomparable a title it is, I had rather were knowne by marking the scope of other sciences, then by any partiall allegation. There is no Arte deliuered vnto mankind, that hath not the workes of nature for his principall obiect, without which they could not consist, and on which they so depend, as they become Actors and Players, as it were, of what Nature will haue set forth. So doth the Astronomer looke vppon the starres, and by that he seeth, set downe what order Nature hath taken therein. So doth the Geometrician and Arethmetician in their diuerse sorts of quantities. So doth the Musitian in times tell you, which by Nature agree, which not. The naturall Philosopher thereon hath his name, and the morall Philosopher standeth vpon the naturall vertues, vices, or passions of man: and follow nature saith he, therein, and thou shalt not erre. The Lawyer saith, what men haue determined. The Historian, what men haue done. The Grammarian, speaketh onely of the rules of speech, and the Rhetoritian and Logitian, considering what in nature will sooneſt proue, and perswade thereon, giue artificiall rules, which still are compassed within the circle of a question, according to the proposed matter. The Physitian weigheth the nature of mans bodie, and the nature of things helpfull or hurtfull vnto it. And the Metaphysicke though it bee in the second and abstract notions, and therefore be counted supernaturall, yet doth he indeed build vpon the depth of Nature. Onely the Poet disdaining to be tied to anie such subiection, lifted vp with the vigour of his owne inuention, doth grow in effect into another nature: in making things either better then Nature bringeth forth, or quite anew, formes such as neuer were in nature: as the Heroes, Demi-gods, Cyclops, Chymeras, Furies, and such like; so as he goeth hand in hand with Nature, not inclosed within the narrow warrant of her gifts, but freely ranging within the Zodiacke of his owne wit. Nature neuer set forth the earth in so rich Tapistrie as diuerse Poets haue done, neither with so pleasant riuers, fruitfull trees, sweete-smelling flowers, nor whatsoeuer else may make the too much loued earth more louely: her world is brasen, the Poets onely deliuer a golden. But let those things alone, and go to man, for whom as the other things are, so it seemeth in him her vttermost cunning is imployed: and know whether shee haue brought forth so true a louer as Theagenes, so constant a friend as Pylades, so valiant a man as Orlando, so right a Prince as Xenophons Cyrus, and so excellent a man euery way, as Virgils Aeneas. Neither let this be iestingly conceiued, because the works of the one be essentiall, the other in imitation or fiction: for euery vnderstanding knoweth the skill of each Artificer standeth in that Idea, or foreconceit of the worke, & not in the worke it selfe. And that the Poet hath that Idea, is manifest, by the deliuering thē forth in such excellency

as he had imagined them: which deliuering foorth, alſo is not whollie imaginatiue, as wee are wont to ſay by them that build Caſtles in the aire: but ſo farre ſubſtantiallie it worketh, not onely to make a Cyrus, which had bene but a particular excellencie, as nature might haue done, but to beſtow a Cyrus vppon the world to make many Cyruſſes, if they will learne aright, why and how that maker made him. Neither let it be deemed too ſawcie a compariſon, to ballance the higheſt point of mans wit with the efficacie of nature: but rather giue right honour to the heauenly maker of that maker, who hauing made man to his owne likeneſſe, ſet him beyond, and ouer all the workes of that ſecond nature, which in nothing he ſheweth ſo much as in Poetrie; when with the force of a diuine breath, he bringeth things forth ſurpaſſing her doings: with no ſmall arguments to the incredulous of that firſt accurſed fall of Adam, ſince our erected wit maketh vs know what perfection is, and yet our infected wil keepeth vs from reaching vnto it. But theſe arguments will by few be vnderſtood, and by fewer graunted: thus much I hope will be giuen me, that the Greekes with ſome probabilitie of reaſon, gaue him the name aboue all names of learning. Now let vs go to a more ordinarie opening of him, that the truth may bee the more palpable: and ſo I hope, though wee get not ſo vnmatched a praiſe, as the Etimologie of his names will graunt, yet his verie deſcription, which no man will denie, ſhall not iuſtly be barred from a principall commendation. Poeſie therefore, is an Arte of Imitation: for ſo Ariſtotle tearmeth it in the word μίμησις, that is to ſay, a repreſenting, counterfeiting, or figuring forth to ſpeake metaphorically. A ſpeaking Picture, with this end, to teach and delight. Of this haue bene three generall kinds, the chiefe both in antiquitie and excellencie, were they that did imitate the vnconceiuable excellencies of God, ſuch were Dauid in his Pſalmes, Salomon in his Song of Songs, in his Eccleſiaſtes and Prouerbes. Moſes and Debora in their Hymnes, and the writer of Iob. Which beſide other, the learned Emanuell Tremelius, and Fr. Iunius do entitle the Poeticall part of the Scripture: againſt theſe none will ſpeake that hath the holie Ghoſt in due holie reuerence. In this kind, though in a full wrong Diuinitie, were Orpheus, Amphion, Homer in his Hymnes, and manie other both Greekes and Romanes. And this Poeſie muſt be vſed by whoſoeuer will follow Saint Paules counſaile, in ſinging Pſalmes when they are merie, and I know is vſed with the fruit of comfort by ſome, when in ſorowfull pangs of their death-bringing ſinnes, they find the conſolation of the neuer-leauing goodneſſe. The ſecond kind is of them that deale with matter Philoſophicall, either morall, as Tirteus, Phocilides, Cato: or naturall, as Lucretius, and Virgils Georgikes; or Aſtronomicall, as Manilius and Pontanus; or Hiſtoricall, as Lucan: which who miſlike, the fault is in their iudgement, quite out of taſte, and not in the ſweet food of ſweetly vttered knowledge. But becauſe this ſecond ſort is wrapped within the folde of the propoſed ſubiect, and takes not the free courſe of his owne inuention, whether they properly bee Poets or no, let Grammarians diſpute; and go to the third indeed right Poets, of whom chieflie this queſtion ariſeth: betwixt whom and theſe ſecond, is ſuch a kinde of differrence, as betwixt the meaner ſort of Painters, who counterfeit onely ſuch faces as are ſet before them, and the more excellent, who hauing no law but wit, beſtow that in colours vpon you, which is fitteſt for the eye to ſee, as the conſtant, though lamenting looke of Lucretia, when ſhee puniſhed in her ſelfe anothers fault: wherein he painteth not Lucretia, whom he neuer ſaw, but painteth the outward beautie of ſuch a vertue. For theſe third be they, which moſt properlie do imitate to teach and delight: and to imitate, borow nothing of what is, hath bene, or ſhall be, but range only, reyned with learned diſcretion, into the diuine conſideration of what may be & ſhould be. Theſe bee they that as the firſt and moſt noble ſort, may iuſtly bee termed Vates: ſo theſe are wayted on in the excellenteſt languages and beſt vnderſtandings, with the fore deſcribed name of Poets. For theſe indeed do meerely make to imitate, and imitate both to delight and teach, and delight to moue men to take that goodneſſe in hand, which without delight they would flie as from a ſtranger; and teach to make them know that goodneſſe whereunto they are mooued: which being the nobleſt ſcope to which euer any learning was directed, yet want there not idle tongues to barke at them. Theſe be ſubdiuided into ſundry more ſpeciall denominations. The moſt notable be the Heroicke, Lyricke, Tragicke, Comicke, Satyricke, Iambicke, Elegiacke, Paſtorall, and certaine others: ſome of theſe being tearmed acording to the matter they deale with, ſome by the ſort of verſe they liked beſt to write in: for indeed the greateſt part of Poets, haue apparelled their Poeticall inuentions, in that numbrous kind of writing which is called Verſe. Indeed but apparelled Verſe, being but an ornament, and no cauſe to Poetrie, ſince there haue bene manie moſt excellent Poets that neuer verſified, and now ſwarme many verſifiers that need neuer anſwer to the name of Poets. For Xenophon who did imitate ſo excellentlie as to giue vs Effigiem iuſti imperij, the portraiture of a iuſt Empire, vnder the name of Cyrus, as Cicero ſaith of him, made therein an abſolute heroicall Poeme. So did Heliodorus in his ſugred inuention of that picture of loue in Theagenes and Chariclea, and yet both theſe wrote in Proſe: which I ſpeake to ſhew, that it is not ryming and verſing that maketh a Poet, (no more then a long gowne maketh an Aduocate, who though hee pleaded in armour, ſhould bee an Aduocate and no Souldier:) but it is that faining notable images of vertues, vices, or what elſe, with that delightfull teaching, which muſt be the right deſcribing note to know a Poet by. Although indeed the Senate of Poets haue choſen verſe as their fitteſt rayment: meaning as in matter they paſſed all in all, ſo in manner to go beyond them: not ſpeaking table-talke faſhion, or like men in a dreame, wordes as they chanceable fall from the mouth, but peaſing each ſillable of each word by iuſt proportion, according to the dignity of the ſubiect. Now therefore it ſhall not be amiſſe, firſt to weigh this latter ſort of Poetrie by his workes, and then by his parts; and if in neither of theſe Anatomies hee be condemnable, I hope we ſhall receiue a more fauourable ſentence. This purifying of wit, this enriching of memorie, enabling of iudgement, and inlarging of conceit, which commonly we call learning, vnder what name ſo euer it come forth, or to what immediate end ſoeuer it be directed, the finall end is, to leade and draw vs to as high a perfection, as our degenerate ſoules, made worſe by their clay lodgings, can be capable of. This according to the inclination of man, bred many formed impreſſions: for ſome that thought this felicity principallie to be gotten by knowledge, and no knowledge to be ſo high or heauenly, as acquaintance with the ſtarres; gaue themſelues to Aſtronomie: others perſwading themſelues to be Demi-gods, if they knew the cauſes of things, became naturall and ſupernaturall Philoſophers. Some an admirable delight drew to Muſicke: and ſome the certaintie of demon-demonſtration to the Mathematikes: but all one and other hauing this ſcope to know, and by knowledge to lift vp the mind from the dungeon of the bodie, to the enioying his owne diuine eſſence. But when by the ballance of experience it was found, that the Aſtronomer looking to the ſtarres might fall in a ditch: that the enquiring Philoſopher might bee blind in himſelfe: and the Mathematician might draw forth a ſtraight line with a crooked heart. Then loe did Proofe, the ouer-ruler of opinions make manifeſt, that all theſe are but ſeruing ſciences; which as they haue a priuate end in themſelues, ſo yet are they all directed to the higheſt end of the miſtreſſe knowledge, by the Greekes ἀρχιτεκτονική, which ſtands as I thinke, in the knowledge of a mans ſelfe, in the Ethicke and Politicke conſideration, with the end of well doing, and not of well knowing onely. Euen as the Sadlers next end is to make a good ſaddle, but his further end, to ſerue a nobler faculty, which is horſmanſhip: ſo the horſmans to ſouldierie: and the ſouldier not onely to haue the skill, but to perfourme the practiſe of a ſouldier. So that the ending end of all earthly learning, being vertuous action, thoſe skilles that moſt ſerue to bring forth that, haue a moſt iuſt title to be Princes ouer all the reſt: wherein if wee can ſhew, the Poet is worthy to haue it before any other competitors, among whom principallie to challenge it, ſtep forth the morall Philoſophers, whom me thinkes, I ſee comming towards me, with a ſullen grauitie, as though they could not abide vice by day-light, rudely cloathed, for to witneſſe outwardly their contempt of outward things, with bookes in their hands againſt glorie, whereto they ſet their names: ſophiſtically ſpeaking againſt ſubtiltie, and angrie with any man in whom they ſee the foule fault of anger. Theſe men caſting larges as they go of definitions, diuiſions, and diſtinctions, with a ſcornefull interrogatiue, do ſoberly aske, whether it be poſſible to finde any path ſo ready to leade a man to vertue, as that which teacheth what vertue is, and teacheth it not onely by deliuering forth his verie being, his cauſes and effects, but alſo by making knowne his enemy vice, which muſt be deſtroyed: and his cumberſome ſeruant Paſſion, which muſt be maſtered: by ſhewing the generalities that containes it, and by the ſpecialities that are deriued from it. Laſtly, by plaine ſetting downe how it extends it ſelfe out of the limits of a mans owne little world, to the gouernment of families, and maintaining of publike ſocieties. The Hiſtorian ſcarcely giues leaſure to the Moraliſt to ſay ſo much, but that he loaden with old Mouſe-eaten Records, authoriſing himſelfe for the moſt part vpon other Hiſtories, whoſe greateſt authorities are built vppon the notable foundation Heare-ſay, hauing much a do to accord differing writers, and to picke truth out of partiality; better acquainted with a thouſand yeares ago, then with the preſent age, and yet better knowing how this world goes, then how his owne wit runnes; curious for Antiquities, and inquiſitiue of Nouelties, a wonder to young folkes, and a Tyrant in table-talke; denyeth in a great chaſe, that any man for teaching of vertue, and vertuous actions, is comparable to him. I am Teſtis temporum, lux veritatis, vita memoriæ, magiſtra vitæ, nuncia vetuſtatis. The Philoſopher, ſaith hee, teacheth a diſputatiue vertue, but I do an actiue. His vertue is excellent in the daunger-leſſe Academie of Plato: but mine ſheweth forth her honourable face in the batels of Marathon, Pharſalia, Poictiers, and Agincourt. Hee teacheth vertue by certaine abſtract conſiderations: but I onely bid you follow the footing of them that haue gone before you. Old aged experience goeth beyond the fine witted

Philosopher: but I giue the experience of manie ages. Lastly, if he make the song booke, I put the learners hand to the Lute, and if he be the guide, I am the light. Then would he alleage you innumerable examples, confirming storie by stories, how much the wisest Senators and Princes haue bene directed by the credite of Historie, as Brutus, Alphonsus of Aragon, (and who not if need be.) At length, the long line of their disputation makes a point in this, that the one giueth the precept, and the other the example. Now whom shall we find, since the question standeth for the highest forme in the schoole of learning to be moderator? Trulie as me seemeth, the Poet, and if not a moderator, euen the man that ought to carie the title from them both: and much more from all other seruing sciences. Therefore compare we the Poet with the Historian, and with the morall Philosopher: and if he go beyond them both, no other humane skill can match him. For as for the Diuine, with all reuerence he is euer to be excepted, not onely for hauing his scope as farre beyond anie of these, as Eternitie exceedeth a Moment: but euen for passing each of these in themselues. And for the Lawyer, though Ius be the daughter of Iustice, the chiefe of vertues; yet because he seekes to make men good, rather formidine pœnæ, then virtutis amore: or to say righter, doth not endeuor to make men good, but that their euill hurt not others, hauing no care so he be a good citizen, how bad a man he be. Therefore as our wickednesse maketh him necessarie, and necessitie maketh him honourable, so is he not in the deepest truth to stand in ranke with these, who all endeuour to take naughtinesse away, and plant goodnesse euen in the secretest cabinet of our soules: & these foure are all that any way deale in the consideration of mens manners, which being the supreame knowledge, they that best breed it, deserue the best commendation. The Philosopher therfore, and the Historian, are they which would win the goale, the one by precept, the other by example: but both, not hauing both, do both halte. For the Philosopher setting downe with thornie arguments the bare rule, is so hard of vtterance, and so mystie to be conceiued, that one that hath no other guide but him, shall wade in him till he be old, before he shall find sufficient cause to be honest. For his knowledge standeth so vpon the abstract and generall, that happie is that man who may vnderstand him, and more happy that can applie what he doth vnderstand. On the other side, the Historian wanting the precept, is so tied not to what should be, but to what is, to the particular truth of things, and not to the generall reason of things, that his example draweth no necessary consequence, and therefore a lesse fruitfull doctrine. Now doth the peereless Poet performe both: for whatsoeuer the Philosopher saith should be done, he giues a perfect picture of it by some one, by whom he presupposeth it was done, so as hee coupleth the generall notion with the particular example. A perfect picture (I say) for he yeeldeth to the powers of the mind an image of that whereof the Philosopher bestoweth but a wordish description, which doth neither strike, pierce, nor possesse the sight of the soule so much, as that other doth. For as in outward things to a man that had neuer seene an Elephant, or a Rinoceros, who should tell him most exquisitely all their shape, colour, bignesse and particular markes, or of a gorgious pallace an Architecture, who declaring the full beauties, might well make the hearer able to repeate as it were by roat all he had heard, yet should neuer satisfie his inward conceit, with being witnesse to it selfe of a true liuing knowledge: but the same man, assoone as he might see those beasts well painted, or that house well in modell, should

ſhould ſtraightwaies grow without neede of any deſcription to a iudicial comprehending of them, ſo (no doubt) the Philoſopher with his learned definitions, be it of vertues or vices, matters of publike policie or priuate gouernement, repleniſheth the memorie with many infallible grounds of wiſedome, which notwithſtanding lye darke before the imaginatiue and iudging power, if they be not illuminated or figured forth by the ſpeaking picture of Poeſie. Tully taketh much paines, and manie times not without Poeticall helps to make vs know the force, loue of our countrey hath in vs. Let vs but heare old Anchiſes, ſpeaking in the middeſt of Troyes flames, or ſee Vliſſes in the fulneſſe of all Calipſoes delights, bewaile his abſence from barraine and beggarly Ithecæ. Anger (the Stoikes ſaid) was a ſhort madneſſe: let but Sophocles bring you Aiax on a ſtage, killing or whipping ſheepe and oxen, thinking them the Armie of Greekes, with their chieftaines Agamemnon, and Menelaus: and tell me if you haue not a more familiar inſight into Anger, then finding in the ſchoolemen his Genus and Differences. See whether wiſdome & temperance in Vliſſes and Diomedes, valure in Achilles, friendſhip in Niſus and Eurialus, euen to an ignorant man carie not an apparant ſhining: and contrarily, the remorſe of conſcience in Oedipus; the ſoone repenting pride in Agamemnon; the ſelfe deuouring crueltie in his father Atreus; the violence of ambition in the two Theban brothers; the ſowre ſweetneſſe of reuenge in Medea; and to fall lower, the Terentian Gnato, and our Chaucers Pander ſo expreſt, that we now vſe their names, to ſignifie their Trades: And finally, all vertues, vices, and paſſions, ſo in their owne naturall ſtates, laid to the view, that we ſeeme not to heare of them, but clearely to ſee through them. But euen in the moſt excellent determination of goodneſſe, what Philoſophers counſell can ſo readily direct a Prince, as the faigned Cyrus in Xenophon, or a vertuous man in all fortunes: as Æneas in Virgill, or a whole Common-wealth, as the Way of Sir Thomas Moores Eutopia. I ſay the Way, becauſe where Sir Thomas Moore erred, it was the fault of the man, and not of the Poet: for that Way of patterning a Common-wealth, was moſt abſolute, though he perchaunce hath not ſo abſolutely performed it. For the queſtion is, whether the fained image of Poetrie, or the regular inſtruction of Philoſophie, hath the more force in teaching. Wherein if the Philoſophers haue more rightly ſhewed themſelues Philoſophers, then the Poets haue attained to the high toppe of their profeſſion (as in truth, Mediocribus eſſe poetis non Dij, non homines, non conceſſere columnæ,) it is (I ſay againe) not the fault of the Art, but that by fewe men that Art can be accompliſhed. Certainly, euen our Sauiour Chriſt could as well haue giuen the morall common places of vncharitableneſſe and humbleneſſe, as the diuine narration of Dines and Lazarus, or of diſobedience and mercie, as that heauenly diſcourſe of the loſt child and the gacious Father, but that his thorough ſearching wiſdome, knew the eſtate of Dines burning in hell, and of Lazarus in Abrahams boſome, would more conſtantly as it were, inhabit both the memorie and iudgement. Truly for my ſelfe (me ſeemes) I ſee before mine eyes, the loſt childes diſdainfull prodigalitie turned to enuy a Swines dinner: which by the learned Diuines are thought not hiſtoricall acts, but inſtructing parables. For concluſion, I ſay the Philoſopher teacheth, but he teacheth obſcurely, ſo as the learned onely can vnderſtand him, that is to ſay, he teacheth them that are alreadie taught. But the Poet is the foode for the tendreſt ſtomacks, the Poet is indeed, the right popular Philoſopher. Whereof Eſops Tales giue good proofe, whoſe prettie Allegories ſtealing vnder the formall Tales of beaſtes, makes many more beaſtly then beaſtes: begin to heare the ſound of vertue frō thoſe dumbe ſpeakers. But now may it be alleaged, that if this imagining of matters be ſo fit for the imagination, then muſt the Hiſtorian needes ſurpaſſe, who brings you images of true matters, ſuch as indeed were done, and not ſuch as fantaſtically or falſly may be ſuggeſted to haue bin done. Truly Ariſtotle him ſelf in his diſcourſe of Poeſie, plainly determineth this queſtiō, ſaying, that Poetrie is φιλοσοφώτερον & σπουδαιότερον, that is to ſay, it is more Philoſophical, & more then hiſtory. His reaſon is, becauſe Poeſie dealeth with καθόλυ, that is to ſay, with the vniuerſall conſideratiō, & the Hiſtory with καθ' ἕκαστον the particular. Now ſaith he, the vniuerſall wayes what is fit to be ſaid or done, either in likelihood or neceſſitie, which the Poeſie cōſidereth in his impoſed names: & the particular only marketh whether Alcibiades did or ſuffered this or that. Thus far Ariſtotle. Which reaſon of his, as al his is moſt full of reaſon. For indeed if the queſtiō were, whether it were better to haue a particular act truly or falſly ſet downe, there is no doubt which is to be choſen, no more then whether you had rather haue Veſpatians Picture right as he was, or at the Painters pleaſure nothing reſēbling. But if the queſtiō be for your own vſe and learning, whether it be better to haue it ſet down as it ſhould be, or as it was; then certainly is more doctrinable, the fained Cyrus in Xenophon, then the true Cyrus in Iuſtin: & the fained Æneas in Virgil, then the right Æneas in Dares Phrigius: as to a Ladie that deſired to faſhion her countenāce to the beſt grace, a Painter ſhould more benefit her to portrait a moſt ſweet face, writing Canidia vpō it, then to paint Canidia as ſhe was, who Horace ſweareth was ful ill fauored. If the Poet do his part aright, he wil ſhew you in Tantalus Atreus, & ſuch like, nothing that is not to be ſhunned: in Cyrus, Æneas, Vliſſes, each thing to be followed: where the Hiſtorian boūd to tel things as things were, cannot be liberall, without he wil be Poeticall of a perfect patterne, but as in Alexander or Scipio himſelf, ſhew doings, ſome to be liked, ſome to be miſliked; & then how will you diſcerne what to follow, but by your owne diſcretion, which yau had without reading Q Curtius. And whereas a man may ſay, though in vniuerſall conſideration of doctrine, the Poet preuaileth, yet that the Hiſtorie in his ſaying ſuch a thing was done, doth warrant a man more in that he ſhall follow. The anſwer is manifeſt, that if he ſtand vpon that was, as if he ſhould argue, becauſe it rained yeſterday, therefore it ſhould raine to day, then in deede hath it ſome aduantage to a groſſe conceit. But if he know an example onely enformes a coniectured likelihood, & ſo go by reaſon, the Poet doth ſo far exceed him, as he is to frame his example to that which is moſt reaſonable, be it in warlike, politike, or priuate matters, where the Hiſtorian in his bare, was, hath many times that which we call fortune, to ouerrule the beſt wiſedome. Many times he muſt tell euents, whereof he can yeeld no cauſe, or if he do, it muſt be poetically. For that a fained example hath as much force to teach, as a true example (for as for to moue, it is cleare, ſince the fained may be tuned to the higheſt key of paſſion) let vs take one exāple wherin an Hiſtorian & a Poet did concurre. Herodotus & Iuſtin do both teſtifie, that Zopirus, King Darius faithful ſeruant, ſeeing his maiſter long reſiſted by the rebellious Babilonians, fained himſelfe in extreame diſgrace of his King, for verifying of which, he cauſed his owne noſe & eares to be cut off, & ſo flying to the Babylonians was receiued, & for his known valure ſo farre credited, that he did find meanes to deliuer thē ouer to Darius. Much like matter doth Liuy record of Tarquinius & his ſonne. Xenophon excellently fained ſuch another ſtratagem, performed by Abradates in Cyrus behalfe. Now would I faine know, if occaſion be preſented vnto you, to ſerue your Prince by ſuch an honeſt diſſimulatiō, why you do not as wel learne it of Xenophons fiction, as of the others veritie: and truely ſo much the better, as you ſhal ſaue your nose by the bargaine. For Abradates did not counterfet so far. So then the best of the Historian is subiect to the Poet, for whatsoeuer actiō or factiō, whatsoeuer counsell, pollicie, or warre stratagem the Historian is bound to recite, that may the Poet if he list with his imitation make his owne; beautifying it both for further teaching, & more delighting as it please him: hauing all frō Dante his heauē to his hell, vnder the authority of his pen. Which if I be asked what Poets haue done so? as I might wel name some, so yet say I, and say againe, I speake of the Art and not of the Artificer. Now to that which commonly is attributed to the praise of Historie, in respect of the notable learning is got by marking the successe, as though therein a man should see vertue exalted & vice punished: truly that commendation is peculiar to Poetrie, and farre off from Historie; for indeed Poetrie euer sets vertue so out in her best colours, making fortune her wel-waiting handmaid, that one must needes be enamoured of her. Well may you see Vlisses in a storme and in other hard plights, but they are but exercises of patience & magnanimity, to make thē shine the more in the neare following prosperitie. And of the contrary part, if euil men come to the stage, they euer goe out (as the Tragedie writer answered to one that misliked the shew of such persons) so manicled, as they litle animate folkes to follow them. But the Historie being captiued to the truth of a foolish world, is many times a terror from wel-doing, & an encouragement to vnbridled wickednesse. For see we not valiant Milciades rot in his fetters? The iust Phocion & the accomplished Socrates put to death like traytors? The cruell Seuerus liue prosperously? The excellent Seuerus miserably murthered? Sylla & Marius dying in their beds? Pompey & Cicero slaine then when they would haue thought exile a happinesse? See we not vertuous Cato driuen to kill himselfe, & Rebell Cæsar so aduaunced, that his name yet after 1600 yeares lasteth in the highest honor? And marke but euen Cæsars owne words of the forenamed Sylla, (who in that onely did honestly to put downe his dishonest tyrannie) Literas nesciuit: as if want of learning caused him to do wel. He meant it not by Poetrie, which not content with earthly plagues, deuiseth new punishments in hell for tyrants: nor yet by Philosophy, which teacheth Occidentes esse, but no doubt by skil in Historie, for that indeed can afford you Cipselus, Periander, Phalaris, Dionisius, & I know not how many more of the same kennel, that speed wel inough in their abhominable iniustice of vsurpatiō. I cōclude therfore that he excelleth historie, not only in furnishing the mind with knowledge, but in setting it forward to that which deserues to be called & accounted good: which setting forward & mouing to wel-doing, indeed setteth the Lawrel crown vpō the Poets as victorious, not onely of the Historian, but ouer the Philosopher, howsoeuer in teaching, it may be questionable. For suppose it be graunted, that which I suppose with great reason may be denied, that the Philosopher in respect of his methodicall proceeding, teach more perfectly then the Poet, yet do I think, that no man is so much φιλοφιλόσοφος, as to compare the Philosopher in mouing with the Poet. And that mouing is of a higher degree then teaching; it may by this appeare, that it is well nigh both the cause and effect of teaching. For who will be taught, if he be not moued with desire to be taught? And what so much good doth that teaching bring foorth, (I speake still of morall doctrine) as that it moueth one to do that which it doth teach. For as Aristotle saith, it is not γνῶσις but πρᾶξις must be the frute: & how πρᾶξις can be without being moued to practise, it is no hard matter to consider. The Philosopher sheweth you the way, he informeth you of the particularities, as well of the tediousnesse of the way, as of the pleasant lodging you shall haue when your iourney is ended, as of the manie by-turnings that may diuert you from your way.

But this is to no man but to him that will reade him, & reade him with attentiue ſtudious painfulneſſe, which conſtant deſire whoſoeuer hath in him, hath alreadie paſt halfe the hardneſſe of the way: and therefore is beholding to the Philoſopher, but for the other halfe. Nay truely learned men haue learnedly thought, that where once reaſon hath ſo much ouer-maſtered paſſion, as that the minde hath a free deſire to do well, the inward light each minde hath in it ſelfe, is as good as a Philoſophers booke, ſince in Nature we know it is well, to do well, and what is well; and what is euill, although not in the words of Art which Philoſophers beſtow vpon vs: for out of naturall conceit the Philoſophers drew it; but to be moued to do that which we know, or to be moued with deſire to know. Hoc opus, hic labor eſt. Now therein of all Sciences I ſpeake ſtill of humane (and according to the humane conceit) is our Poet the Monarch. For he doth not onely ſhew the way, but giueth ſo ſweete a proſpect into the way, as will intice any man to enter into it: Nay he doth as if your iourney ſhould lye thorough a faire vineyard, at the verie firſt, giue you a cluſter of grapes, that full of that taſte, you may long to paſſe further. He beginneth not with obſcure definitions, which muſt blurre the margent with interpretations, and load the memorie with doubtfulneſſe: but he commeth to you with words ſet in delightfull proportion, either accompanied with, or prepared for the well enchaunting skill of Muſicke, and with a tale forſooth he commeth vnto you, with a tale, which holdeth children from play, and old men from the Chimney corner; and pretending no more, doth intend the winning of the minde from wickedneſſe to vertue; euen as the child is oftē brought to take moſt wholſome things by hyding them in ſuch other as haue a pleaſant taſte: which if one ſhould begin to tell them the nature of the Alloes or Rhabarbarum they ſhould receiue, would ſooner take their phiſicke at their eares then at their mouth, ſo is it in men (moſt of which are childiſh in the beſt things, till they be cradled in their graues) glad they will be to heare the tales of Hercules, Achilles, Cyrus, Æneas, & hearing them, muſt needes heare the right deſcription of wiſdome, valure, and iuſtice; which if they had bene barely (that is to ſay Philoſophically) ſet out, they would ſweare they be brought to ſchoole againe; that imitation whereof Poetrie is, hath the moſt conueniencie to nature of all other: in ſo much that as Ariſtotle ſaith, thoſe things which in themſelues are horrible, as cruell battels, vnnaturall monſters, are made in poeticall imitation, delightfull. Truely I haue knowne men, that euen with reading Amadis de Gaule, which God knoweth, wanteth much of a perfect Poeſie, haue found their hearts moued to the exerciſe of curteſie, liberalitie, and eſpecially courage. Who readeth Æneas carying old Anchiſes on his backe, that wiſheth not it were his fortune to performe ſo excellent an Act? Whom doth not thoſe words of Turnus moue, (the Tale of Turnus hauing planted his image in the imaginatiō) fugientem hæc terra videbit? Vſque adeone mori miſerum eſt? Where the Philoſophers (as they thinke) ſcorne to delight, ſo muſt they be content little to moue; ſauing wrangling whether Virtus be the chiefe or the only good; whether the contemplatiue or the actiue life do excell; which Plato & Boetius wel knew: and therefore made miſtreſſe Philoſophie verie often borrow the masking raiment of Poeſie. For euen thoſe hard harted euill men, who thinke vertue a ſchoole name, & know no other good but indulgere genio, & therefore deſpiſe the auſtere admonitions of the Philoſopher, & feele not the inward reaſon they ſtand vpon, yet will be content to be delighted, which is all the good, fellow Poet ſeemes to promiſe; & ſo ſteale to ſee the forme of goodneſſe, (which ſeene, they cannot but loue) ere themſelues be aware, aware, as if they tooke a medicine of Cheries. Infinite proofes of the ſtrange effects of this Poeticall inuention might be alleaged: onely two ſhall ſerue, which are ſo often remembred, as I thinke all men know them. The one of Menemus Agrippa, who, when the whole people of Rome had reſolutely deuided themſelues from the Senate, with apparant ſhew of vtter ruine, though he were for that time an excellent Orator, came not among them vpon truſt either of figuratiue ſpeeches, or cunning inſinuations, and much leſſe with far fet Maximes of Philoſophie, which eſpecially if they were Platonike, they muſt haue learned Geometrie before they could well haue conceiued: but forſooth, he behaueth himſelfe like a homely and familiar Poet. He telleth them a tale, that there was a time, when all the parts of the bodie made a mutinous conſpiracie againſt the belly, which they thought deuoured the frutes of each others labour: they concluded they would let ſo vnprofitable a ſpender ſtarue. In the end, to be ſhort, for the tale is notorious, and as notorious that it was a tale, with puniſhing the belly they plagued themſelues; this applied by him, wrought ſuch effect in the people, as I neuer read, that only words brought foorth: but then ſo ſudden and ſo good an alteration, for vpon reaſonable conditions, a perfect reconcilement enſued. The other is of Nathan the Prophet, who when the holie Dauid, had ſo farre forſaken God, as to confirme adulterie with murther, when he was to do the tendreſt office of a friend, in laying his owne ſhame before his eyes; ſent by God to call againe ſo choſen a ſeruant, how doth he it? but by telling of a man whoſe beloued lambe was vngratefully taken from his boſome. The application moſt diuinely true, but the diſcourſe it ſelfe fained; which made Dauid (I ſpeake of the ſecond & inſtrumental cauſe) as in a glaſſe ſee his owne filthineſſe, as that heauenly Pſalme of mercie well teſtifieth. By theſe therefore examples and reaſons, I thinke it may be manifeſt, that the Poet with that ſame hand of delight, doth draw the minde more effectually then any other Arte doth. And ſo a concluſion, not vnfitly enſue, that as vertue is the moſt excellent reſting place for all worldly learning to make his end of, ſo Poetry being the moſt familiar to teach it, & moſt Princely to moue towards it, in the moſt excellent worke, is the moſt excellent workeman. But I am content not onely to decipher him by his workes (although workes in commendation and diſpraiſe, muſt euer hold a high authoritie) but more narrowly will examine his parts, ſo that (as in a man) though altogether may carrie a preſence full of maieſtie & beauty, perchance in ſome one defectuous peece we may finde blemiſh: Now in his parts, kindes, or ſpecies, as you liſt to terme them, it is to be noted, that ſome Poeſies haue coupled together two or three kindes, as the Tragicall and Comicall, whereupon is riſen the Tragicomicall, ſome in the maner haue mingled proſe and verſe, as Sanazara and Boetius; ſome haue mingled matters Heroicall and Paſtorall, but that commeth all to one in this queſtion, for if ſeuered they be good, the coniunctiõ cannot be hurtfull: therefore perchaunce forgetting ſome, and leauing ſome as needeleſſe to be remembred. It ſhall not be amiſſe, in a word to cite the ſpeciall kindes, to ſee what faults may be found in the right vſe of them. Is it then the Paſtorall Poeme which is miſliked? (For perchaunce where the hedge is loweſt they wil ſooneſt leap ouer) is the poore pipe diſdained, which ſometimes out of Melibeus mouth, can ſhewe the miſerie of people, vnder hard Lords and rauening ſouldiers? And againe by Titerus, what bleſſedneſſe is deriued to them that lye loweſt, from the goodneſſe of them that ſit higheſt? Sometimes vnder the prettie tales of Wolues & ſheepe, can include the whole conſiderations of wrong doing, & patience; ſometimes ſhew that contentions for trifles, can get but a trifling victorie, where perchaunce a man may see, that euen Alexander & Darius, when they straue who should be Cocke of this worlds dunghill, the benefit they got, was, that the after-liuers may say, Hæc memini & victum frustrà contendere Thirsim. Ex illo Coridon, Coridon est tempore nobis. Or is it the lamenting Elegiack, which in a kinde heart would moue rather pittie then blame, who bewaileth with the great Philosopher Heraclitus, the weakenesse of mankind, and the wretchednesse of the world: who surely is to be praised either for compassionate accompanying iust causes of lamentations, or for rightly painting out how weake be the passions of wofulnesse? Is it the bitter but wholesome Iambick, who rubbes the galled minde, in making shame the Trumpet of villanie, with bold and open crying out against naughtinesse? Or the Satirick, who Omne vafer vitium ridenti tangit amico, who sportingly neuer leaueth, til he make a man laugh at follie; and at length ashamed, to laugh at himselfe; which he cannot auoid, without auoiding the follie? who while Circum præcordia ludit, giueth vs to feele how many headaches a passionate life bringeth vs to? How when all is done, Est Vlubris animus si nos non deficit æquus. No perchaunce it is the Comick, whom naughtie Play-makers and stage-keepers, haue iustly made odious. To the arguments of abuse, I will after answer, onely thus much now is to be said, that the Comædy is an imitation of the common errors of our life, which he representeth in the most ridiculous and scornefull sort that may be: so as it is impossible that any beholder can be content to be such a one. Now as in Geometrie, the oblique must be knowne as well as the right, and in Arithmetick, the odde as well as the euen, so in the actions of our life, who seeth not the filthinesse of euill, wanteth a great foile to perceiue the beautie of vertue. This doth the Comœdie handle so in our priuate and domesticall matters, as with hearing it, we get as it were an experience what is to be looked for of a niggardly Demea, of a craftie Dauus, of a flattering Gnato, of a vain-glorious Thraso: and not onely to know what effects are to be expected, but to know who be such, by the signifying badge giuen them by the Comædient. And litle reason hath any man to say, that men learne the euill by seeing it so set out, since as I said before; there is no man liuing, but by the force truth hath in nature, no sooner seeth these men play their parts, but wisheth them in Fistrinum, although perchance the sack of his owne faults lie so behind his back, that he seeth not himselfe to dance the same measure: whereto yet nothing can more open his eyes, then to see his owne actions contemptibly set forth. So that the right vse of Comædie, will I thinke, by no bodie be blamed; and much lesse of the high and excellent Tragedie, that openeth the greatest wounds, and sheweth foorth the Vlcers that are couered with Tissue, that maketh Kings feare to be Tyrants, and Tyrants manifest their tyrannicall humors, that with stirring the affects of Admiration & Commiseration, teacheth the vncertaintie of this world, & vpon how weake foundations guilden rooses are builded: that maketh vs know, Qui sceptra sæuus duro imperio regit, Timet timentes, metus in authorem redit. But how much it can moue, Plutarch yeeldeth a notable testimony of the abhominable Tyrant Alexander Pheræus, from whose eyes a Tragedie well made and represented, drew abundance of teares, who without all pittie had murthered infinite numbers, & some of his own bloud: so as he that was not ashamed to make matters for Tragedies, yet could not resist the sweete violence of a Tragedie. And if it wrought no further good in him, it was, that he in despight of himselfe, withdrew himselfe from hearkening to that which might mollifie his hardened heart. But it is not the Tragedie they do mislike,

for

for it were too absurd to cast out so excellent a representation of whatsoeuer is most worthie to be learned. Is it the Lyricke that most displeaseth, who with his tuned Lyre, and well accorded voice, giueth praise, the reward of vertue, to vertuous acts? who giueth morall precepts and natural Problemes, who sometime raiseth vp his voyce to the height of the heauens, in singing the laudes of the immortall God? Certainly I must confesse mine owne barbarousnesse, I neuer heard the old Song of Percy and Douglas, that I found not my heart moued more then with a Trumpet; and yet is it sung but by some blind Crowder, with no rougher voice, then rude stile: which being so euill apparelled in the dust and Cobweb of that vneuill age, what would it worke, trimmed in the gorgeous eloquence of Pindare? In Hungarie I haue seene it the manner at all Feastes and other such like meetings, to haue songs of their ancestors valure, which that right souldierlike nation, thinke one of the chiefest kindlers of braue courage. The incōparable Lacedemonians did not only carrie that kind of Musicke euer with them to the field, but euen at home, as such songs were made, so were they all content to be singers of them: when the lustie men were to tell what they did, the old men what they had done, and the young what they would do. And where a man may say, that Pindare many times praiseth highly Victories of small moment, rather matters of sport then vertue, as it may be answered, it was the fault of the Poet, and not of the Poetrie; so indeed the chiefe fault was, in the time and custome of the Greekes, who set those toyes at so high a price, that Philip of Macedon reckened a horse-race wonne at Olympus, among his three fearefull felicities. But as the vnimitable Pindare often did, so is that kind most capable and most fit, to awake the thoughts from the sleepe of idlenesse, to embrace honourable enterprises. Their rests the Heroicall, whose verie name I thinke should daunt all backbiters. For by what conceit can a tongue be directed to speake euil of that which draweth with him no lesse champions then Achilles, Cyrus, Aeneas, Turnus, Tideus, Rinaldo, who doeth not onely teach and moue to a truth, but teacheth and mooueth to the most high and excellent truth: who maketh magnanimitie and iustice, shine through all mistie fearefulnesse and foggie desires. Who if the saying of Plato and Tully be true, that who could see vertue, would be wonderfully rauished with the loue of her beautie. This man setteth her out to make her more louely in her holliday apparell, to the eye of anie that will daine, not to disdaine vntill they vnderstand. But if any thing be alreadie said in the defence of sweete Poetrie, all concurreth to the maintaining the Heroycall, which is not onely a kinde, but the best and most accomplished kindes of Poetrie. For as the Image of each Action stirreth and instructeth the minde, so the lofty Image of such worthies, most enflameth the minde with desire to be worthie: and enformes with counsaile how to be worthie. Onely let Aeneas be worne in the Tablet of your memorie, how he gouerneth himselfe in the ruine of his Countrie, in the preseruing his olde Father, and carying away his religious Ceremonies, in obeying Gods Commandement, to leaue Dido, though not onely all passionate kindnesse, but euen the humane consideration of vertuous gratefulnesse, would haue craued other of him: how in stormes, how in sports, how in warre, how in peace, how a fugitiue, how victorious, how besieged, how besieging, how to straungers, how to Allies, how to enemies, how to his owne. Lastly, how in his inward selfe, and how in his outward gouernment, and I thinke in a minde most preiudiced with a preiudicating humor, He will be found in excellencie fruitfull. Yea as Horace saith, Melius, Chrisippo, & Crantore: but truely, I imagine it falleth out with these Poet-whippers, as with some good womẽ, who often are sicke, but in faith they cannot tell where. So the name of Poetrie is odious to them, but neither his cause nor effects, neither the summe that containes him, nor the particularities descending from him, giue any fast handle to their carping dispraise. Since then Poetrie is of all humane learnings the most ancient, and of most fatherly antiquitie, as from whence other learnings haue taken their beginnings; Since it is so vniuersall, that no learned nation doth despise it, nor barbarous nation is without it. Since both Romane and Greeke gaue such diuine names vnto it, the one of propheſying, the other of making; and that in deede that name of making is fit for him, considering, that where all other Arts retaine themselues within their subiect, and receiue as it were their being from it. The Poet onely, onely bringeth his owne stuffe, and doth not learne a Conceit out of a matter, but maketh matter for a Conceit. Since neither his description, nor end, containing any euill, the thing described cannot be euill; since his effects be so good as to teach goodnesse, and delight the learners of it; since therein (namely in morall doctrine the chiefe of all knowledges) he doth not onely farre passe the Historian, but for instructing is well nigh comparable to the Philosopher, for mouing, leaueth him behind him. Since the holy Scripture (wherein there is no vncleannesse) hath whole parts in it Poeticall, and that euen our Sauiour Christ vouchsafed to vse the flowers of it: since all his kindes are not onely in their vnited formes, but in their seuered dissections fully commendable, I thinke, (and thinke I thinke rightly) the Laurell Crowne appointed for triumphant Captaines, doth worthily of all other learnings, honour the Poets triumph. But because we haue eares as well as toungs, and that the lightest reasons that may be, will seeme to waigh greatly, if nothing be put in the counterballance, let vs heare, and as well as we can, ponder what obiections be made against this Art, which may be worthie either of yeelding, or aunswering. First, truely I note, not onely in these μυσομύσοι Poet-haters, but in all that kinde of people who seeke a praise, by dispraising others, that they do prodigally spend a great many wandring words in quips and scoffes, carping and taunting at each thing, which by stirring the splene, may stay the braine from a through beholding the worthinesse of the subiect. Those kinde of obiections, as they are full of a verie idle easinesse, since there is nothing of so sacred a maiestie, but that an itching tongue may rub it selfe vpon it, so deserue they no other answer, but in steed of laughing at the ieast, to laugh at the ieaster. We know a playing wit can praise the discretion of an Asse, the comfortablenesse of being in debt, and the iolly commodities of being sicke of the plague. So of the contrarie side, if we will turne Ouids verse, Vt lateat virtus, proximitate mali, that good lye hid in nearnesse of the euil Agrippa will be as mery in the shewing the vanitie of Sciẽce, as Erasmus was in the commending of folly: neither shall any man or matter, escape some touch of these smiling Raylers. But for Erasmus and Agrippa, they had an other foundation then the superficiall part would promise. Marry these other pleasaunt fault-finders, who will correct the Verbe before they vnderstand the Nowne, and confute others knowledge, before they confirme their owne, I would haue them onely remember, that scoffing commeth not of wisedome? so as the best title in true English they get with their meriments, is to be called good scoles: for so haue our graue fore-forefathers euer termed that humorous kinde of iesters. But that which giueth greateſt ſcope to their ſcorning humour, is ryming and verſing. It is alreadie ſaid, (and as I thinke truly ſaid) it is not ryming and verſing that maketh Poeſie: One may be a Poet without verſing, and a verſifier without Poetrie. But yet preſuppoſe it were inſeparable, as indeed it ſeemeth Scalliger iudgeth truly, it were an inſeparable commendation. For if Oratio, next to Ratio, Speech next to Reaſon, be the greateſt gift beſtowed vpon Mortalitie, that cannot be praiſeleſſe, which doth moſt polliſh that bleſſing of ſpeech; which conſidereth each worde, not onely as a man may ſay by his forcible qualitie, but by his beſt meaſured quantitie: carying euen in themſelues a Harmonie, without perchaunce number, meaſure, order, proportion, be in our time growne odious. But laie aſide the iuſt praiſe it hath, by being the onely fit ſpeech for Muſicke, (Muſicke I ſay, the moſt diuine ſtriker of the ſenſes.) Thus much is vndoubtedly true, that if reading be fooliſh without remembring, Memorie being the onely treaſure of knowledge, thoſe words which are fitteſt for memorie, are likewiſe moſt conuenient for knowledge. Now that Verſe farre exceedeth Proſe, in the knitting vp of the memorie, the reaſon is manifeſt, the wordes (beſides their delight, which hath a great affinitie to memorie) being ſo ſet as one cannot be loſt, but the whole worke failes: which accuſing it ſelfe, calleth the remembrance back to it ſelfe, & ſo moſt ſtrongly confirmeth it. Beſides one word, ſo as it were begetting an other, as be it in rime or meaſured verſe, by the former a man ſhall haue a neere geſſe to the follower. Laſtly, euen they that haue taught the Art of memory, haue ſhewed nothing ſo apt for it, as a certaine roome deuided into many places, well & throughly knowne: Now that hath the verſe in effect perfectly, euery word hauing his naturall ſeat, which ſeat muſt needes make the word remembred. But what needes more in a thing ſo knowne to all men? Who is it that euer was ſcholler, that doth not carry away ſome verſes of Virgil, Horace, or Cato, which in his youth he learned, and euen to his old age ſerue him for hourely leſſons; as Percontatorem fugito nam garrulus idem eſt, Dum tibi quiſq; placet credula turba ſumus. But the fitneſſe it hath for memorie, is notably proued by all deliuery of Artes, wherein for the moſt part, from Grammer, to Logike, Mathematikes, Phiſike, and the reſt, the Rules chiefly neceſſarie to be borne away, are compiled in verſes. So that verſe being in it ſelfe ſweete and orderly, and being beſt for memorie, the onely handle of knowledge, it muſt be in ieſt that any man can ſpeake againſt it. Now then goe we to the moſt important imputations laid to the poore Poets, for ought I can yet learne, they are theſe. Firſt, that there being manie other more fruitfull knowledges, a man might better ſpend his time in them, then in this. Secondly, that it is the mother of lies. Thirdly, that it is the nurſe of abuſe, infecting vs with many peſtilent deſires, with a Sirene ſweetneſſe, drawing the minde to the Serpents taile of ſinfull fanſies; and herein eſpecially Comedies giue the largeſt field to eare, as Chaucer ſaith, how both in other nations and in ours, before Poets did ſoften vs, we were full of courage, giuen to martiall exerciſes, the pillers of manlike libertie, and not lulled aſleepe in ſhadie idleneſſe with Poets paſtimes. And laſtly and chiefly, they cry out with open mouth, as if they had ouer-ſhot Robinhood, that Plato baniſhed them out of his Common wealth. Truely, this is much, if there be much trueth in it. Firſt to the firſt. That a man might better ſpend his time, is a reaſon in deede: but it doth as they ſay, but petere principium. For if it be, as I affirme, that no learning is ſo good, as that which teacheth & moueth to vertue, and that none can both teach and moue thereto ſo much as Poeſie, then is the concluſion manifeſt; that inke and paper cannot be to a more profitable purpoſe imployed. And certainly though a man ſhould graunt their firſt aſſumption, it ſhould follow (me thinke) verie vnwillingly, that good is not good, becauſe better is better. But I ſtill and vtterly deny, that there is ſprung out of earth a more fruitfull knowledge. To the ſecond therefore, that they ſhould be the principall lyers, I anſwere Paradoxically, but truely, I thinke truely: that of all writers vnder the Sunne, the Poet is the leaſt lyer: and though he would, as a Poet can ſcarcely be a lyer. The Aſtronomer with his couſin the Geometrician, can hardly eſcape, when they take vpon them to meaſure the height of the ſtarres. How often thinke you do the Phiſitians lie, when they auerre things good for ſickneſſes, which afterwards ſend Charon a great number of ſoules drownd in a potion, before they come to his Ferrie? And no leſſe of the reſt, which take vpon them to affirme. Now for the Poet, he nothing affirmeth, and therefore neuer lieth: for as I take it, to lie, is to affirme that to be true, which is falſe. So as the other Artiſtes, and eſpecially the Hiſtorian, affirming many things, can in the clowdie knowledge of mankind, hardly eſcape from manie lies. But the Poet as I ſaid before, neuer affirmeth, the Poet neuer maketh any Circles about your imagination, to coniure you to beleeue for true, what he writeth: he citeth not authorities of other hiſtories, but euen for his entrie, calleth the ſweete Muſes to inſpire vnto him a good inuention. In troth not labouring to tel you what is, or is not, but what ſhould, or ſhould not be. And therefore though he recount things not true, yet becauſe he telleth them not for true, he lieth not: without we will ſay, that Nathan lied in his ſpeach before alleaged to Dauid, which as a wicked man durſt ſcarce ſay, ſo think I none ſo ſimple, would ſay, that Eſope lied in the tales of his beaſts: for who thinketh that Eſope wrote it for actually true, were wel worthie to haue his name Chronicled among the beaſts he writeth of. What child is there, that comming to a play, and ſeeing Thebes written in great letters vpon an old doore, doth beleeue that it is Thebes? If then a man can arriue to the childes age, to know that the Poets perſons and doings, are but pictures, what ſhould be, and not ſtories what haue bin, they will neuer giue the lie to things not affirmatiuely, but allegorically and figuratiuely written; and therefore as in hiſtorie looking for truth, they may go away full fraught with falſhood: So in Poeſie, looking but for fiction, they ſhall vſe the narration but as an imaginatiue groundplat of a profitable inuention. But hereto is replied, that the Poets giue names to men they write of, which argueth a conceit of an actuall truth, and ſo not being true, prooueth a falſhood. And doth the Lawier lye then, when vnder the names of Iohn of the Stile, & Iohn of the Nokes, he putteth his Caſe? But that is eaſily anſwered, their naming of men, is but to make their picture the more liuely, and not to build anie Hiſtorie. Painting men, they cannot leaue men nameleſſe: we ſee we cannot plaie at Cheſts, but that we muſt giue names to our Cheſſemen; and yet me thinkes he were a verie partiall Champion of truth, that would ſay we lyed, for giuing a peece of wood the reuerend title of a Biſhop. The Poet nameth Cyrus and Æneas, no other way, then to ſhew what men of their fames, fortunes, and eſtates, ſhould do. Their third is, how much it abuſeth mens wit, training it to wanton ſinfulneſſe, and luſtfull loue. For in deede that is the principall if not onely abuſe, I can heare alleaged. They ſay the Comedies rather teach then reprehend amorous conceits. They ſay the Lirike is larded with paſſionate Sonets, the Elegiake weepes the want of his miſtreſſe, and that euen to the Heroicall, Cupid hath ambitiouſly climed.

clined. Alas Loue, I would thou couldest as well defend thy selfe, as thou canst offend others: I would those on whom thou doest attend, could either put thee away, or yeeld good reason why they keepe thee. But graunt loue of beautie to be a beastlie fault, although it be very hard, since onely man and no beast hath that gift to discerne beautie, graunt that louely name of loue to deserue all hatefull reproches, although euē some of my maisters the Philosophers spent a good deale of their Lampoyle in setting forth the excellencie of it, graunt I say, what they will haue graunted, that not onely loue, but lust, but vanitie, but if they list scurrilitie, possesse many leaues of the Poets bookes, yet thinke I, when this is graunted, they will finde their sentence may with good maners put the last wordes foremost; and not say, that Poetrie abuseth mans wit, but that mans wit abuseth Poetrie. For I will not denie, but that mans wit may make Poesie, which should be ποιητικὴ, which some learned haue defined figuring forth good things to be φανταστικὴ: which doth contrariwise infect the fancie with vnworthy obiectes, as the Painter should giue to the eye either some excellent perspectiue, or some fine Picture fit for building or fortification, or containing in it some notable example, as Abraham sacrificing his sonne Isaack, Iudith killing Holofernes, Dauid fighting with Golias, may leaue those, & please an ill pleased eye with wanton shewes of better hidden matters. But what, shall the abuse of a thing, make the right vse odious? Nay truly though I yeeld that Poesie may not onely be abused, but that being abused by the reason of his sweete charming force, it can do more hurt then any other armie of words, yet shall it be so farre from concluding, that the abuse should giue reproch to the abused, that contrariwise, it is a good reason, that whatsoeuer being abused, doth most harme, being rightly vsed (and vpon the right vse, each thing receiues his title) doth most good. Do we not see skill of Phisicke the best rampier to our often assaulted bodies, being abused, teach poyson the most violent destroyer? Doth not knowledge of Law, whose end is, to euen and right all things, being abused grow the crooked fosterer of horrible iniuries? Doth not (to go in the highest) Gods word abused, breede heresie, and his name abused, become blasphemie? Truely a Needle cannot do much hurt, and as truely (with leaue of Ladies be it spoken) it cannot do much good. With a sword thou mayest kill thy Father, and with a sword thou mayest defend thy Prince and Countrey: so that, as in their calling Poets, fathers of lyes, they sayd nothing, so in this their argument of abuse, they proue the commendation. They alledge herewith, that before Poets began to be in price, our Nation had set their hearts delight vpon action, and not imagination, rather doing things worthie to be written, then writing things fit to be done. What that before time was, I thinke scarcely Sphinx can tell: since no memorie is so auncient, that hath not the precedence of Poetrie. And certaine it is, that in our plainest homelinesse, yet neuer was the Albion Nation without Poetrie. Marry this Argument, though it be leuelled against Poetrie, yet is it indeed a chain-shot against all learning or bookishnesse, as they commōly terme it. Of such mind were certaine Gothes, of whom it is written, that hauing in the spoyle of a famous citie, taken a faire Librarie, one hangman belike fit to execute the fruits of their wits, who had murthered a great number of bodies, would haue set fire in it. No sayd another very grauely, take heed what you do, for while they are busie about those toyes, we shall with more leisure conquer their countries. This indeed is the ordinary doctrine of ignorance, and many wordes sometimes I haue heard spent in it: but because this reason is generally against all learning, as well as Poetrie, or rather all learning but Poetrie, becauſe it were too large a digreſſion to handle it, or at leaſt too ſuperfluous, ſince it is manifeſt that all gouernement of action is to be gotten by knowledge, & knowledge beſt, by gathering many knowledges, which is reading; I onely with Horace, to him that is of that opinion, Iubeo ſtultum eſſe libenter: for as for Poetrie it ſelf, it is the freeſt from this obiection, for Poetrie is the Companion of Camps. I dare vndertake, Orlando Furioſo, or honeſt king Arthur, will neuer diſpleaſe a ſouldier: but the quidditie of Ens and Prima materia, will hardly agree with a Corcelet. And therefore as I ſayd in the beginning, euen Turkes and Tartars, are delighted with Poetes. Homer a Greeke, flouriſhed, before Greece flouriſhed: and if to a ſlight coniecture, a coniecture may be appoſed, truly it may ſeeme, that as by him their learned men tooke almoſt their firſt light of knowledge, ſo their actiue men receiued their firſt motions of courage. Onely Alexanders example may ſerue, who by Plutarch is accounted of ſuch vertue, that fortune was not his guide, but his footeſtoole, whoſe Actes ſpeake for him, though Plutarch did not: indeede the Phœnix of warlike Princes. This Alexander, left his Scholemaiſter liuing, Ariſtotle behind him, but tooke dead Homer with him. He put the Philoſopher Calliſthenes to death, for his ſeeming Philoſophicall, indeede mutinous ſtubburneſſe, but the chiefe thing he was euer heard to wiſh for, was, that Homer had bene aliue. He well found he receiued more brauerie of minde by the patterne of Achilles, then by hearing the definition of fortitude. And therefore if Cato miſliked Fuluius for carrying Ennius with him to the field, it may be anſwered, that if Cato miſliked it, the Noble Fuluius liked it, or elſe he had not done it, for it was not the excellent Cato Vticenſis, whoſe authoritie I would much more haue reuerenced: but it was the former, in truth a bitter puniſher of faultes, but elſe a man that had neuer ſacrificed to the Graces. He miſliked and cried out againſt all Greeke learning, and yet being foureſcore yeares old, began to learne it, belike fearing that Pluto vnderſtood not Latine. Indeed the Romane lawes allowed no perſon to be carried to the warres, but he that was in the ſouldiers Role. And therefore though Cato miſliked his vnmuſtred perſon, he miſliked not his worke. And if he had, Scipio Naſica (iudged by common conſent the beſt Romane) loued him: both the other Scipio brothers, who had by their vertues no leſſe ſurnames then of Aſia and Affricke, ſo loued him, that they cauſed his bodie to be buried in their Sepulture. So as Catoes authoritie being but againſt his perſon, and that anſwered with ſo farre greater then himſelfe, is herein of no validitie. But now indeede my burthen is great, that Plato his name is layd vpon me, whom I muſt confeſſe of all Philoſophers, I haue euer eſteemed moſt worthie of reuerence; and with good reaſon, ſince of all Philoſophers he is the moſt Poeticall: yet if he will defile the fountaine out of which his flowing ſtreames haue proceeded, let vs boldly examine with what reaſons he did it. Firſt truly a man might maliciouſly obiect, that Plato being a Philoſopher, was a naturall enemy of Poets. For indeede after the Philoſophers had picked out of the ſweete myſteries of Poetrie, the right diſcerning true points of knowledge, they forthwith putting it in methode, and making a Schoole Art of that which the Poets did onely teach by a diuine delightfulneſſe, beginning to ſpurne at their guides, like vngratefull Prentices, were not content to ſet vp ſhop for themſelues, but ſought by all meanes to diſcredit their maiſters, which by the force of delight being barred them, the leſſe they could ouerthrow them, the more they hated them. For indeed they found for Homer, ſeuen Cities ſtraue who ſhould haue him for their Citizen, where many Cities baniſhed Philoſophers, as not fit members to liue among them. For onely repeating certaine of Euripides Verſes, many Athenians had their liues ſaued of the Syracuſans, where the Athenians themſelues thought many Philoſophers vnworthie to liue. Certaine Poets, as Simonides, and Pindarus, had ſo preuailed with Hiero the firſt, that of a Tyrant they made him a iuſt King: where Plato could do ſo little with Dioniſius, that he himſelfe of a Philoſopher, was made a ſlaue. But who ſhould do thus, I confeſſe ſhould requite the obiections made againſt Poets, with like cauillations againſt Philoſophers: as likewiſe one ſhould do, that ſhould bid one reade Phædrus or Simpoſium in Plato, or the diſcourſe of loue in Plutarch, and ſee whether any Poet do authoriſe abhominable filthineſſe as they do. Againe, a man might aske, out of what Common-wealth Plato doth baniſh them, in ſooth, thence where he himſelfe alloweth communitie of women. So as belike this baniſhment grew not for effeminate wantonneſſe, ſince little ſhould Poeticall Sonets be hurtfull, when a man might haue what woman he liſted. But I honour Philoſophicall inſtructions, and bleſſe the wittes which bred them: ſo as they be not abuſed, which is likewiſe ſtretched to Poetrie. Saint Paule himſelfe ſets a watch-word vpon Philoſophie, indeede vpon the abuſe. So doth Plato vpon the abuſe, not vpon Poetrie. Plato found fault that the Poets of his time, filled the world with wrõg opiniõs of the Gods, making light tales of that vnſpotted eſſence; and therefore would not haue the youth depraued with ſuch opinions: herein may much be ſayd; let this ſuffice. The Poets did not induce ſuch opinions, but did imitate thoſe opinions alreadie induced. For all the Greeke ſtories can well teſtifie, that the verie religion of that time, ſtood vpon many, and many faſhioned Gods: not taught ſo by Poets, but followed according to their nature of imitation. Who liſt may reade in Plutarch, the diſcourſes of Iſis and Oſiris, of the cauſe why Oracles ceaſſed, of the diuine prouidence, and ſee whether the Theologie of that nation, ſtood not vpon ſuch dreames, which the Poets indeede ſuperſticiouſly obſerued. And truely ſince they had not the light of Chriſt, did much better in it then the Philoſophers, who ſhaking off ſuperſtition, brought in Atheiſme. Plato therefore, whoſe authoritie, I had much rather iuſtlie conſtrue then vniuſtlie reſiſt, meant not in generall of Poets, in thoſe words of which Iulius Scaliger ſayth; Quæ authoritate barbari quidam atque inſipidi abuti velint ad Poetas è Republica exigendos. But onely meant to driue out thoſe wrong opinions of the Deitie: whereof now without further law, Chriſtianitie hath taken away all the hurtfull beliefe, perchaunce as he thought, nouriſhed by then eſteemed Poets. And a man neede go no further then to Plato himſelfe to know his meaning: who in his Dialogue called Ion, giueth high, and rightly, diuine commendation vnto Poetrie. So as Plato baniſhing the abuſe, not the thing, not baniſhing it, but giuing due honour to it, ſhall be our Patron, and not our aduerſarie. For indeede, I had much rather, ſince truely I may do it, ſhew their miſtaking of Plato, vnder whoſe Lyons skinne they would make an Aſſe-like braying againſt Poeſie, then go about to ouerthrow his authoritie; whom the wiſer a man is, the more iuſt cauſe he ſhall finde to haue in admiration: eſpecially ſince he attributeth vnto Poeſie more then my ſelfe do; namely, to be a verie inſpiring of a diuine force, farre aboue mans wit, as in the forenamed Dialogue is apparant. Of the other ſide, who would ſhew the honours haue bene by the beſt ſort of iudgementes graunted them, a whole ſea of examples would preſent themſelues; Alexanders, Cæſars, Scipioes, all fauourers of Poets: Lælius, called the Romane Socrates himſelfe a Poet; ſo as part of Heautontimeroumenon in Terence, was ſuppoſed to be made by him.

And euen the Greeke Socrates, whom Appollo confirmed to be the onely wise man, is sayd to haue spent part of his old time in putting Esopes Fables into Verses. And therefore full euill should it become his Scholler Plato, to put such wordes in his maisters mouth against Poets. But what needes more? Aristotle writes the Arte of Poesie, and why, if it should not be written? Plutarch teacheth the vse to be gathered of them, and how, if they should not be read? And who reades Plutarches either Historie or Philosophie, shall finde he trimmeth both their garmentes with gardes of Poesie. But I list not to defend Poesie with the helpe of his vnderling Historiographie. Let it suffice to haue shewed, it is a fit soyle for prayse to dwell vpon: & what dispraysc may set vpō it, is either easily ouercome, or transformed into iust commendation. So that since the excellencies of it may be so easily and so iustlie confirmed, and the low creeping obiections so soone trodden downe, it not being an Art of lyes, but of true doctrine; not of effeminateneſſe, but of notable stirring of courage; not of abusing mans wit, but of strengthening mans wit; not banished, but honored by Plato; let vs rather plant more Laurels for to ingarland the Poets heades (which honour of being Laureate, as besides them onely triumphant Captaines were, is a sufficient authoritie to shew the price they ought to be held in) then suffer the ill fauoured breath of such wrong speakers once to blow vpon the cleare springs of Poesie. But since I haue runne so long a Carreir in this matter, me thinkes before I giue my penne a full stop, it shall be but a little more lost time, to inquire why England the Mother of excellent mindes should be growne so hard a stepmother to Poets, who certainely in wit ought to passe all others, since all onely proceedes from their wit, being indeed makers of themselues, not takers of others. How can I but exclaime, Musa mihi causas memora quo numine laso. Sweet Poesie that hath aunciently had Kings, Emperours, Senatours, great Captaines, such as besides a thousands others, Dauid, Adrian, Sophocles, Germanicus, not onely to fauour Poets, but to be Poets: and of our nearer times, can present for her Patrons, a Robert King of Sicill, the great King Fraunces of Fraunce, King Iames of Scotland; such Cardinals as Bembus, and Bibiena; such famous Preachers & Teachers, as Beza and Melanchthon; so learned Philosophers, as Fracastorius, and Scaliger; so great Orators, as Pontanus, & Muretus; so piercing wits, as George Buchanan; so graue Counsellours, as besides many, but before all, that Hospitall of Fraunce; then whom I thinke that Realme neuer brought forth a more accōplished iudgemēt, more firmly builded vpō vertue: I say these with nūbers of others, not only to reade others Poesies, but to Poetise for others reading; that Poesie thus embraced in all other places, should onely finde in our time a hard welcome in England, I thinke the very earth laments it, & therfore deckes our soyle with fewer Laurels thē it was accustomed. For heretofore, Poets haue in England also flourished: & which is to be noted, euen in those times whē the Trūpet of Mars did sound lowdest. And now that an ouer faint quietneſſe should seeme to strow the house for Poets, they are almost in as good reputatiō, as the Montebankes at Venice. Truly euen that, as of the one side it giueth great praise to Poesie, which like Venus (but to better purpose) had rather be troubled in the net with Mars, thē enioy the homely quiet of Vulcā. So serueth it for a peece of a reason, why they are lesse grateful to idle Englād, which now cā scarce endure the paine of a pen. Vpon this necessarily followeth, that base mē with seruile wits vndertake it, who thinke it enough if they can be rewarded of the Printer: and so as Epaminondas is sayd with the honour of his vertue to haue made an office, by his exercising it, which before was contēptible, to become highly respected: so these mē no more but setting setting their names to it, by their owne disgracefulnesse, disgrace the most gracefull Poesie. For now as if all the Muses were got with child, to bring forth bastard Poets: without any cõmission, they do post ouer the banks of Helicon, til they make the Readers more wearie then post-horses; while in the meane time, they Queis meliore luto finxit præcordia Titan, are better contẽt to suppresse the out-flowings of their wit, then by publishing them, to be accounted Knights of the same order. But I that before euer I durst aspire vnto the dignitie, am admitted into the companie of the Paper-blurrers, do find the verie true cause of our wanting estimation, is want of desert, taking vpon vs to be Poets in despite of Pallas. Now wherein we want desert, were a thank-worthy labour to expresse. But if I knew I should haue mended my selfe, but as I neuer desired the title, so haue I neglected the meanes to come by it, onely ouer-mastered by some thoughts, I yeelded an inckie tribute vnto them. Marie they that delight in Poesie it selfe, should seeke to know what they do: & how they do especially looke thẽselues in an vnflattering glasse of reason, if they be inclinable vnto it. For Poesie must not be drawn by the ears, it must be gẽtly led, or rather it must leade, which was partly the cause that made the anciẽt learned affirme, it was a diuine gift and no humane skill, since all other knowledges lie readie for anie that haue strength of wit: A Poet no industrie can make, if his owne Genius be not caried into it. And therefore is an old prouerb, Orator fit, Poeta nascitur. Yet confesse I alwayes, that as the fertilest ground must be manured, so must the highest flying wit haue a Dedalus to guide him. That Dedalus they say both in this and in other, hath three wings to beare it selfe vp into the aire of due commendation: that is, Arte, Imitation and Exercise. But these neither Artificiall Rules, nor imitatiue patternes, we much comber our selues withall. Exercise indeed wee do, but that verie fore-backwardly; for where we should exercise to know, we exercise as hauing knowne: and so is our braine deliuered of much matter, which neuer was begotten by knowledge. For there being two principall parts, Matter to be expressed by words, and words to expresse the matter: In neither, we vse Arte or Imitation rightly. Our matter is, Quodlibet, indeed though wrongly perfourming Ouids Verse:

Quicquid conabor dicere, Versus erit.

Neuer marshalling it into any assured ranke, that almost the Readers cannot tell where to find themselues. Chaucer vndoubtedly did excellently in his Troilus and Crescid: of whom truly I know not whether to maruell more, either that he in that mystie time could see so clearely, or that we in this cleare age, go so stumblinglie after him. Yet had he great wants, fit to be forgiuen in so reuerent an Antiquitie. I account the Mirrour of Magistrates, meetly furnished of beautifull parts. And in the Earle of Surreis Lirickes, many things tasting of a noble birth, and worthy of a noble mind. The Shepheards Kalender hath much Poetrie in his Eclogues, indeed worthy the reading if I be not deceiued. That same framing of his stile to an old rusticke language, I dare not allow: since neither Theocritus in Greeke, Virgil in Latine, nor Sanazara in Italian did affect it. Besides these, I do not remember to haue seene but few (to speake boldly) printed that haue Poeticall sinewes in them. For proose whereof, let but most of the Verses be put in Prose, and then aske the meaning, and it will be found, that one Verse did but beget another, without ordering at the first, what should be at the last, which becomes a confused masse of wordes, with a tingling sound of rime, barely accompanied with reason. Our Tragedies and Comedies, not without cause cried out against, obseruing rules neither of honeſt ciuilitie, nor skilfull Poetrie. Excepting Gorboduck (againe I ſay of thoſe that I haue ſeene) which notwithſtanding, as it is full of ſtatelie ſpeeches, & well ſounding phraſes, climing to the height of Seneca his ſtile, and as full of notable moralitie, which it doth moſt delightfully teach, and ſo obtaine the verie end of Poeſie. Yet in truth, it is verie defectious in the circumſtances, which grieues me, becauſe it might not remaine as an exact modell of all Tragedies. For it is faulty both in place and time, the two neceſſarie companions of all corporall actions. For where the Stage ſhould alway repreſent but one place; and the vttermoſt time preſuppoſed in it, ſhould be both by Ariſtotles precept, and common reaſon, but one day; there is both many dayes and many places, inartificiallie imagined. But if it be ſo in Gorboducke, how much more in all the reſt, where you ſhall haue Aſia of the one ſide, and Affricke of the other, and ſo many other vnder-kingdomes, that the Player when he comes in, muſt euer begin with telling where he is, or elſe the tale will not be conceiued. Now you ſhall haue three Ladies walke to gather flowers, and then we muſt beleeue the ſtage to be a garden. By and by we heare newes of ſhipwracke in the ſame place, then we are too blame if we accept it not for a rocke. Vpon the backe of that comes out a hideous monſter with fire and ſmoke, and then the miſerable beholders are bound to take it for a caue: while in the meane time two armies flie in, repreſented with foure ſwords and bucklers, and then what hard hart will not receiue it for a pitched field. Now of time, they are much more liberal. For ordinarie it is, that two yong Princes fall in loue, after many trauerſes ſhe is got with child, deliuered of a faire boy: he is loſt, groweth a man, falleth in loue, & is ready to get another child; & all this in 2 houres ſpace: which how abſurd it is in ſence, euen ſence may imagine: & Art hath taught, & all ancient exãples iuſtified, & at this day the ordinary players in Italie wil not erre in. Yet will ſome bring in an exãple of Eunuch in Terence, that containeth matter of 2 dayes, yet far ſhort of twentie yeares. True it is, and ſo was to be played in two dayes, and ſo fitted to the time it ſet forth. And though Plautus haue in one place done amiſſe, let vs hit it with him, and not miſſe with him. But they will ſay, how then ſhall we ſet forth a ſtorie which containes both many places, and many times? And do they not know that a Tragedie is tied to the lawes of Poeſie, and not of Hiſtorie: not bound to follow the ſtorie, but hauing libertie either to faine a quite new matter, or to frame the Hiſtorie to the moſt tragical conueniencie. Againe many things may be told, which cannot be ſhewed: if they know the difference betwixt reporting and repreſenting. As for example, I may ſpeake though I am here, of Peru, and in ſpeech digreſſe from that, to the deſcription of Calecut: but in action I cãnot repreſent it without Pacolets horſe. And ſo was the maner the anciẽts took, by ſome Nuntius, to recount things done in former time or other place. Laſtly, if they will repreſent an Hiſtorie, they muſt not (as Horace ſaith) begin ab ouo, but they muſt come to the principal point of that one action which they will repreſent. By exãple this will be beſt expreſſed. I haue a ſtory of young Polydorus, deliuered for ſafeties ſake with great riches by his father Priamus, to Polymneſtor king of Thrace, in the Troian warre time. He after ſome yeares, hearing of the ouerthrow of Priamus, for to make the treaſure his owne, murthereth the child, the body of the child is taken vp, Hecuba, ſhe the ſame day findeth a ſleight to bee reuenged moſt cruelly of the Tyrant. Where now would one of our Tragedy-writers begin, but with the deliuerie of the child? Then ſhould he ſaile ouer into Thrace, and ſo ſpend I know not how many yeares, and trauell numbers of places. But where doth Euripides? euen with the finding of the bodie,

the reſt leauing to be told by the ſpirit of Polydorus. This needs no further to be enlarged, the dulleſt wit may conceiue it. But beſides theſe groſſe abſurdities, how all their Playes be neither right Tragedies, nor right Comedies, mingling Kings and Clownes, not becauſe the matter ſo carieth it, but thruſt in the Clowne by head and ſhoulders to play a part in Maieſticall matters, with neither decencie nor diſcretion: ſo as neither the admiration and commiſeration, nor the right ſportfulneſſe is by their mongrell Tragicomedie obtained. I know Apuleius did ſomewhat ſo, but that is a thing recounted with ſpace of time, not repreſented in one moment: and I know the Ancients haue one or two examples of Tragicomedies, as Plautus hath Amphitrio. But if we marke them well, we ſhall find that they neuer or verie daintilie match horne-pipes and funeralles. So falleth it out, that hauing indeed no right Comedie in that Comicall part of our Tragedie we haue nothing but ſcurrilitie vnworthie of anie chaſte eares, or ſome extreme ſhew of doltiſhneſſe, indeed fit to lift vp a lowd laughter and nothing elſe: where the whole tract of a Comedie ſhould be full of delight, as the Tragedie, ſhould be ſtill maintained in a well raiſed admiration. But our Comedients thinke there is no delight without laughter, which is verie wrong, for though laughter may come with delight, yet commeth it not of delight, as though delight ſhold be the cauſe of laughter: but well may one thing breed both together. Nay in themſelues, they haue as it were a kind of contrarietie: For delight we ſcarcely do, but in things that haue a conueniency to our ſelues, or to the generall nature. Laughter almoſt euer commeth of things moſt diſproportioned to our ſelues & nature. Delight hath a ioy in it either permanent or preſent. Laughter hath only a ſcornfull tickling. For example, we are rauiſhed with delight to ſee a faire woman, and yet are farre from being moued to laughter. We laugh at deformed creatures, wherein certainely we cannot delight. We delight in good chaunces: we laugh at miſchaunces. We delight to heare the happineſſe of our friends and Countrie, at which he were worthie to be laughed at that wold laugh: we ſhall cõtrarily ſometimes laugh to find a matter quite miſtaken, & go downe the hill againſt the byas, in the mouth of ſome ſuch men, as for the reſpect of them, one ſhal be heartily ſorie, he cannot chooſe but laugh, and ſo is rather pained, then delighted with laughter. Yet denie I not, but that they may go well together: for as in Alexanders picture well ſet out, we delight without laughter, and in twenty mad Antickes we laugh without delight: So in Hercules painted with his great beard and furious countenance in a womans attire, ſpinning at Omphales commandement, it breeds both delight and laughter: for the repreſenting of ſo ſtrange a power in Loue, procures delight, and the ſcornfulnes of the action ſtirreth laughter. But I ſpeake to this purpoſe, that all the end of the Comical part, be not vpõ ſuch ſcornful matters as ſtir laughter only, but mixe with it that delightful teaching, which is the end of Poeſie. And the great fault euen in that point of laughter, and forbidden plainly by Ariſtotle, is, that they ſtir laughter in ſinfull things, which are rather execrable then ridiculous: or in miſerable, which are rather to be pitied then ſcorned. For what is it to make folkes gape at a wretched begger, and a beggerly Clowne: or againſt law of hoſpitality, to ieſt at ſtrangers, becauſe they ſpeake not Engliſh ſo well as we do? What do we learne, ſince it is certain, Nil habet infœlix paupertas durius in ſe, Quàm quod ridiculos homines facit. But rather a buſie louing Courtier, and a hartleſſe threatning Thraſo; a ſelfe-wiſe ſeeming ſchoolemaiſter; a wrie transformed Traueller: theſe if we ſaw walke in ſtage names, which we play naturallie, therein were delightfull laughter, and teaching delightfulneſſe, as in the other the Tragedies of Buchanan do iuſtly bring forth a diuine admiration. But I haue lauiſhed out too many words of this play-matter; I do it, becauſe as they are excelling parts of Poeſie, ſo is there none ſo much vſed in England, and none can be more pitifully abuſed: which like an vnmannerly daughter, ſhewing a bad education, cauſeth her mother Poeſies honeſty to be called in queſtion. Other ſort of Poetrie almoſt haue we none, but that Lyrical kind of Songs and Sonets; which Lord, if he gaue vs ſo good minds, how well it might be employed, and with how heauenly fruits, both priuate & publike, in ſinging the praiſes of the immortall beauty, the immortall goodneſſe of that God, who giueth vs hands to write, and wits to conceiue: of which we might well want words, but neuer matter: of which we could turne our eyes to nothing, but we ſhould euer haue new budding occaſions. But trulie many of ſuch writings as come vnder the banner of vnreſiſtable loue, if I were a miſtreſſe, would neuer perſwade me they were in loue: ſo coldly they apply fiery ſpeeches, as men that had rather read louers writings, & ſo caught vp certaine ſwelling phraſes, which hang together, like a man that once told me the wind was at Northweſt and by South, becauſe he would bee ſure to name winds enough, then that in truth they feele thoſe paſſions, which eaſily as I thinke, may be bewrayed by that ſame forcibleneſſe or Euergia (as the Greeks call it) of the writer. But let this be a ſufficient, though ſhort note, that we miſſe the right vſe of the materiall point of Poeſie. Now for the outſide of it, which is words, or (as I may tearme it) Diction, it is euen wel worſe: ſo is it that hony-flowing matron Eloquence, apparelled, or rather diſguiſed in a Curtiſan-like painted affectatiõ. One time with ſo farre-fetcht words, that many ſeeme monſters, but muſt ſeeme ſtrangers to any poore Engliſhman: another time with courſing of a letter, as if they were bound to follow the methode of a Dictionarie: another time with figures & flowers, extreamely winter-ſtarued. But I would this fault were onely peculiar to Verſifiers, and had not as large poſſeſſion among Proſe-Printers: and which is to be maruelled among many Schollers, and which is to be pitied among ſome Preachers. Truly I could wiſh, if at leaſt I might be ſo bold to wiſh, in a thing beyond the reach of my capacitie, the diligent imitators of Tully and Demoſthenes, moſt worthy to be imitated, did not ſo much keep Nizolian paper-books of their figures & phraſes, as by attentiue tranſlation, as it were, deuour them whole, & make thẽ wholly theirs. For now they caſt ſuger and ſpice vpon euery diſh that is ſerued at the table: like thoſe Indians, not content to weare eare-rings at the fit and naturall place of the eares, but they will thruſt iewels through their noſe and lips, becauſe they will bee ſure to be fine. Tully whẽ he was to driue out Catiline, as it were with a thunderbolt of eloquence, often vſeth the figure of repetition, as Viuit & vincit, imo in ſenatum venit, imo in ſenatum venit, &c. Indeed inflamed, with a well grounded rage, he would haue his words (as it were) double out of his mouth, and ſo do that artificially, which we ſee men in choller do naturallie. And we hauing noted the grace of thoſe words hale them in ſometimes to a familiar Epiſtle, when it were too much choller to be chollerike. How well ſtore of Similiter Cadenſes doth ſound with the grauitie of the Pulpit, I would but inuoke Demoſthenes ſoule to tell, who with a rare daintineſſe vſeth them. Truly they haue made me thinke of the Sophiſter, that with too much ſubtilty would proue two Egges three, & though he might be counted a Sophiſter, had none for his labour. So theſe men bringing in ſuch a kind of eloquence, well may they obtaine an opinion of a ſeeming fineneſſe, but perſwade few, which ſhold be the end of their fineneſſe. Now for ſimilitudes in certain printed diſcourſes

I thinke

I think al Herberists, all stories of beasts, foules & fishes are rifled vp, that they may come in multitudes to waite vpon any of our cõceits, which certainly is as absurd a surfet to the eares as is possible. For the force of a similitude not being to proue any thing to a contrarie disputer, but only to explaine to a willing hearer, when that is done, the rest is a most tedious pratling, rather ouerswaying the memorie from the purpose wherto they were applyed, then anie whit enforming the iudgement already either satisfied, or by similitudes not to be satisfied. For my part, I do not doubt, when Antonius and Crassus, the great forefathers of Cicero in eloquence, the one (as Cicero testifieth of them) pretended not to know Arte, the other not to set by it (because with a plaine sensibleness they might win credit of popular eares, which credite is the neareste step to perswasion, which perswasion is the chiefe marke of Oratorie) I do not doubt, I say, but that they vsed these knacks verie sparingly, which who doth generally vse, anie man may see, doth daunce to his owne musike, and so to be noted by the audience, more carefull to speake curiously then truly. Vndoubtedly (at least to my opinion vndoubtedly) I haue found in diuerse small learned courtiers a more sound stile, thẽ in some professors of learning, of which I cã guesse no other cause, but that the courtier following that, which by practise he findeth fittest to nature, therin (though he know it not) doth according to Art, though not by Arte: where the other vsing Arte to shewe Art, & not hide Art (as in these cases he should do) flyeth from nature, and indeed abuseth Arte. But what? me thinks I deserue to be pounded for straying from Poetrie to Oratorie: but both haue such an affinity in the wordish consideration, that I thinke this digression will make my meaning receiue the fuller vnderstanding: which is not to take vpon me to teach Poets how they should do, but only finding my selfe sicke among the rest, to shew some one or two spots of the common infection growne among the most part of writers; that acknowledging our selues somewhat awrie, we may bend to the right vse both of matter and maner. Whereto our language giueth vs great occasion, being indeed capable of any excellent exercising of it. I know some will say it is a mingled language: and why not so much the better, taking the best of both the other? Another will say, it wanteth Grãmer. Nay truly it hath that praise that it wants not Grãmer; for Grammer it might haue, but it needs it not, being so easie in it selfe, and so void of those cumbersome differences of Cases, Genders, Moods and Tenses, which I thinke was a peece of the tower of Babylons curse, that a mã should be put to schoole to learne his mother tongue. But for the vttering sweetly and properly the conceit of the mind, which is the end of speech, that hath it equally with anie other tongue in the world: and is particularly happie in compositions of two or three words together, neare the Greeke, farre beyond the Latine, which is one of the greatst beauties can be in a language. Now of versifying there are two sorts, the one ancient, the other moderne: the ancient marked the quantitie of each sillable, and according to that framed his verse: the moderne, obseruing only number, with some regard of the accent; the chiefe life of it standeth in that like sounding of the words, which we call Rime. Whether of these be the more excellent, would beare manie speeches, the ancient no doubt more fit for Musicke, both words and time obseruing quantity, & more fit, liuely to expresse diuerse passions by the low or loftie sound of the well-weighed sillable. The latter likewise with his rime striketh a certaine musicke to the eare: & in fine, since it doth delight, though by another way, it obtaineth the same purpose, there being in either sweetnesse, & wanting in neither maiesty. Truly the English before any Vulgare lãguage, I know is fit for both sorts: for, for the ancient, the Italian is so full of vowels, that it must euer be cumbred with Elisions. The Dutch so of the other side with Consonants, that they cannot yeeld the sweet sliding, fit for a verse. The French in his whole language hath not one word that hath his accent in the last sillable sauing two, called Antepenultima; and litle more hath the Spanish, and therefore verie gracelesly may they vse Dactiles. The English is subiect to none of these defects. Now for Rime, though we do not obserue quãtity, yet we obserue the accent verie precisely, which other languages either cannot do, or will not do so absolutely. That Cæsura, or breathing place in the midst of the verse neither Italian nor Spanish haue: the French and we neuer almost faile of. Lastly, euen the verie Rime it selfe the Italian cannot put it in the last sill. ble, by the French named the Masculine Rime, but still in the next to the last, which the French call the Female; or the next before that, which the Italian Sdrucciola: the example of the former, is Buono, Suono, of the Sdrucciola, is Femina, Semina. The Frẽch of the other side hath both the Male, as Bon, Son; & the Female, as Plaise, Taise; but the Sdrucciola he hath not: where the English hath al three, as Due, True; Father, Rather; Motiõ, Potion, with much more which might be said, but that alredy I find the triflings of this discourse is much too much inlarged. So that since the euer praise-worthy Poesie is full of vertue, breeding delightfulnesse, & voyd of no gift that ought to be in the noble name of learning, since the blames laid against it are either false or feeble, since the cause why it is not esteemed in England, is the fault of Poet-apes, not Poets. Since lastly, our tongue is most fit to honour Poesie, & to be honoured by Poesie, I coniure you all that haue had the euill lucke to reade this inke-wasting toy of mine, euen in the name of the nine Muses, no more to scorne the sacred mysteries of Poesie: no more to laugh at the name of Poets, as though they were next inheritors to fooles; no more to iest at the reuerent title of a Rimer, but to beleeue with Aristotle, that they were the ancient Treasurers of the Grecians diuinity, to beleeue with Bembus, that they were first bringers in of all ciuility: to beleeue with Scalliger, that no Philosophers precepts can sooner make you an honest man, then the reading of Virgill; to beleeue with Clauserus, the Trãslator of Cornutus, that it pleased the heauẽly deity by Hesiod & Homer, vnder the vaile of Fables to giue vs all knowledge, Logicke, Rhetoricke, Philosophy naturall & morall, & Quid non? To beleeue with me, that there are many mysteries contained in Poetry, which of purpose were written darklie, least by prophane wits it should be abused: to beleeue with Landin, that they are so beloued of the gods, that whatsoeuer they write, proceeds of a diuine fury. Lastly, to beleeue themselues when they tell you they will make you immortall by their verses. Thus doing, your name shall flourish in the Printers shops: thus doing you shall be of kin to many a Poeticall Preface: thus doing, you shall be most faire, most rich, most wise, most all: you shall dwell vpon Superlatiues: thus doing, though you be Libertino patre natus, you shall sodainly grow Herculea proles. Si quid mea Carmina possunt. Thus doing, your soule shall be placed with Dantes Beatrix, or Virgils Anchises. But if (fie of such a But) you be borne so neare the dul-making Cataract of Nilus, that you cannot heare the Planet-like musike of Poetry, if you haue so earth-creeping a mind, that it cãnot lift it self vp to loo e to the skie of Poetry, or rather by a certain rusticall disdaine will become such a mome, as to be a Momus of Poetrie: thẽ though I wil not wish vnto you the Asses eares of Midas, nor to be driuẽ by a Poets verses as Bubonax was to hang himself, nor to be rimed to death, as is said to be done in Irelãd, yet thus much curse I must send you in the behalfe of all Poets, that while you liue, you liue in loue, and neuer get fauour, for lacking skill of a Sonet, and when you die, your memorie die from the earth for want of an Epitaph.

ASTRO-

ASTROPHEL AND STELLA,

VVRITTEN BY THE NOBLE KNIGHT SIR PHILIP SIDNEY.

1

LOuing in truth, and faine in verſe my loue to ſhow,
That ſhe (deare ſhe) might take ſome pleaſure of my paine:
Pleaſure might cauſe her reade, reading might make her know,
Knowledge might pitie winne, and pitie grace obtaine;

I ſought fit words to paint the blackeſt face of woe,
Studying inuentions fine, her wits to entertaine:
Oft turning others leaues, to ſee if thence would flow
Some freſh and fruitfull ſhowers vpon my ſunne-burn'd braine.

But words came halting forth, wanting Inuentions ſtay,
Inuention Natures child, fled ſtep-dame Studies blowes,
And others feete ſtill ſeem'd but ſtrangers in my way.

Thus great with child to ſpeake, and helpleſſe in my throwes,
Biting my trewand pen, beating my ſelfe for ſpite,
Foole, ſaid my Muſe to me, looke in thy heart and write.

2

Not at the firſt ſight, nor with a dribbed ſhot
Loue gaue the wound, which while I breathe will bleed:
But knowne worth did in mine of time proceed,
Till by degrees it had full conqueſt got.

I ſaw and liked, I liked but loued not,
I loued, but ſtraight did not what Loue decreed:
At length to Loues decrees, I forc'd, agreed,
Yet with repining at ſo partiall lot.

Now euen that footſtep of loſt libertie
Is gone, and now like ſlaue-borne Muſcouite,
I call it praiſe to ſuffer Tyrannie;

And now employ the remnant of my wit,
To make me ſelfe beleeue, that all is well,
While with a feeling skill I paint my hell.

3

Let daintie wits crie on the Sisters nine,
That brauely maskt, their fancies may be told:
Or Pindares Apes, flaunt they in phrases fine,
Enam'ling with pied flowers their thoughts of gold:

Or else let them in statelier glorie shine,
Ennobling new found Tropes with problemes old:
Or with strange similies enrich each line,
Of herbes or beastes, which Inde or Afrike hold.

For me in sooth, no Muse but one I know:
Phrases and Problemes from my reach do grow,
And strange things cost too deare for my poore sprites.

How then? euen thus: in Stellas face I reed,
What Loue and Beautie be, then all my deed
But Copying is, what in her Nature writes.

Vertue alas, now let me take some rest,
Thou setst a bate betweene my will and wit,
If vaine loue haue my simple soule opprest:
Leaue what thou likest not, deale not thou with it.

Thy scepter vse in some old Catoes brest;
Churches or schooles are for thy seate more fit:
I do confesse, pardon a fault confest:
My mouth too tender is for thy hard bit.

But if that needs thou wilt vsurping be,
The litle reason that is left in me,
And still th'effect of thy perswasions proue:

I sweare, my heart such one shall shew to thee,
That shrines in flesh so true a Deitie,
That Vertue, thou thy selfe shalt be in loue.

5

It is most true, that eyes are form'd to serue
The inward light: and that the heauenly part
Ought to be king, from whose rules who do swerue,
Rebels to Nature striue for their owne smart.

It is most true, what we call Cupids dart,
An image is, which for our selues we carue;
And, fooles, adore in temple of our hart,
Till that good God make Church & Churchman starue.

True, that true Beautie Vertue is indeed,
Whereof this Beautie can be but a shade,
Which elements with mortall mixture breed:

True, that on earth we are but pilgrims made,
And should in soule vp to our countrey moue:
True, and yet true that I must Stella loue.

Some

6

Some Louers ſpeake when they their Muſes entertaine,
Of hopes begot by feare, of wot not what deſires:
Of force of heau'nly beames, infuſing helliſh paine:
Of liuing deaths, deare wounds, faire ſtormes & freeſing fires:

Some one his ſong in Ioue, and Ioues ſtrange tales attires,
Bordred with buls & ſwans, powdred with golden raine:
Another humbler wit to ſhepheards pipe retires,
Yet hiding royall bloud full oft in rurall vaine.

To ſome a ſweeteſt plaint, a ſweeteſt ſtile affords,
While teares powre out his inke, & ſighs breathe out his words:
His paper pale diſpaire, and paine his pen doth moue.

I can ſpeake what I feele, and feele as much as they,
But thinke that all the Map of my ſtate I diſplay,
When trembling voice brings forth that I do Stella loue.

7

When Nature made her chiefe worke, Stellas eyes,
In colour blacke, why wrapt ſhe beames ſo bright?
Would ſhe in beamie blacke, like painter wiſe,
Frame daintieſt luſtre, mixt of ſhades and light?

Or did ſhe elſe that ſober hue deuiſe,
In obiect beſt to knit and ſtrength our ſight,
Leaſt if no vaile theſe braue gleames did diſguiſe,
They ſun-like ſhould more dazle then delight?

Or would ſhe her miraculous power ſhow,
That whereas blacke ſeemes Beauties contrary,
She euen in blacke doth make all beauties flow?

Both ſo and thus, ſhe minding Loue ſhould be Placed euer there, gaue him this mourning weed,
To honor all their deaths, who for her bleed.

8

Loue borne in Greece, of late fled from his natiue place,
Forc'd by a tedious proofe, that Turkiſh hardned hart,
Is no fit marke to pierce with his fine pointed dart:
And pleaſd with our ſoft peace, ſtaid here his flying race.

But finding theſe North clymes do coldly him embrace,
Not vſde to frozen clips, he ſtraue to find ſome part,
Where with moſt eaſe & warmth he might employ his art:
At length he perch'd himſelf in Stellas ioyfull face,

Whoſe faire skin, beamy eyes like morning ſun on ſnow,
Deceiu'd the quaking boy, who thought from ſo pure light,
Effects of liuely heat, muſt needs in nature grow.

But ſhe moſt faire, moſt cold, made him thence take his flight
To my cloſe heart, where while ſome firebrands he did lay,
He burnt vnwares his wings, and cannot fly away.

9

Queene Vertues court, which some call Stellas face,
Prepar'd by Natures choiseſt furniture,
Hath his front built of Alablaſter pure;
Gold is the couering of that ſtately place.

The doore by which ſometimes comes forth her Grace,
Red Porphir is, which locke of pearle makes ſure:
Whoſe porches rich (which name of cheekes endure)
Marble mixt red and white do enterlace.

The windowes now through which this he au'nly gueſt
Looks ouer the world, and can find nothing ſuch,
Which dare claime from thoſe lights the name of beſt.

Of touch they are that without touch doth touch,
Which Cupids ſelfe from Beauties mind did draw:
Of touch they are, and poore I am their ſtraw.

10

Reaſon, in faith thou art well ſeru'd, that ſtill
Wouldſt brabling be with ſence and loue in me:
I rather wiſht thee clime the Muſes hill,
Or reach the fruite of Natures choiſeſt tree,

Or ſeeke heau'ns courſe, or heau'ns inſide to ſee:
Why ſhouldſt thou toyle our thornie ſoile to till?
Leaue ſenſe, and thoſe which ſenſes obiects be:
Deale thou with powers of thoughts, leaue loue to will.

But thou wouldſt needs fight both with loue and ſence,
With ſword of wit, giuing wounds of diſpraiſe,
Till downe-right blowes did foyle thy cunning fence:

For ſoone as they ſtrake thee with Stellas rayes,
Reaſon thou kneel'dſt, and offeredſt ſtraight to proue
By reaſon good, good reaſon her to loue.

11

In truth, ô Loue, with what a boyiſh kind
Thou doeſt proceed in thy moſt ſerious wayes:
That when the heau'n to thee his beſt diſplayes,
Yet of that beſt thou leau'ſt the beſt behind.

For like a child that ſome faire booke doth find,
With guilded leaues or colourd Velume playes,
Or at the moſt on ſome fine picture ſtayes,
But neuer heeds the fruit of writers mind:

So when thou ſaw'ſt in Natures cabinet
Stella, thou ſtraight lookſt babies in her eyes,
In her cheekes pit thou didſt thy pitfould ſet:

And in her breaſt bopeepe or couching lyes,
Playing and ſhining in each outward part:
But, foole, ſeekſt not to get into her hart.

Cupid

12

Cupid, becauſe thou ſhin'ſt in Stellas eyes,
That from her lockes, thy daunces none ſcapes free,
That thoſe lips ſweld, ſo full of thee they bee,
That her ſweete breath makes oft thy flames to riſe,

That in her breaſt thy pap well ſugred lies,
That her Grace gracious makes thy wrongs, that ſhe
What words ſo ere ſhe ſpeake perſwades for thee,
That her cleare voyce lifts thy fame to the skies.

Thou counteſt Stella thine, like thoſe whoſe powers
Hauing got vp a breach by fighting well,
Crie, Victorie, this faire day all is ours.

O no, her heart is ſuch a Cittadell,
So fortified with wit, ſtor'd with diſdaine,
That to win it, is all the skill and paine.

13

Phœbus was Iudge betweene Ioue, Mars, and Loue,
Of thoſe three gods, whoſe armes the faireſt were:
Ioues golden ſhield did Eagle ſables beare,
Whoſe talents held young Ganimed aboue:

But in Vert field Mars bare a golden ſpeare,
Which through a bleeding heart his point did ſhoue:
Each had his creaſt, Mars caried Venus gloue,
Ioue on his helme the thunderbolt did reare.

Cupid then ſmiles, for on his creſt there lies
Stellas faire haire, her face he makes his ſhield,
Where roſes gueuls are borne in ſiluer field.

Phœbus drew wide the curtaines of the skies,
To blaze theſe laſt, and ſware deuoutly then,
The firſt, thus matcht, were ſcantly Gentlemen.

14

Alas haue I not paine enough my friend,
Vpon whoſe breaſt a fiercer Gripe doth tire,
Then did on him who firſt ſtale downe the fire,
While Loue on me doth all his quiuer ſpend,

But with your Rubarb words ye muſt contend,
To grieue me worſe, in ſaying that Deſire
Doth plunge my wel-form'd ſoule euen in the mire
Of ſinfull thoughts, which do in ruine end?

If that be ſinne which doth the maners frame,
Well ſtaid with truth in word and faith of deed,
Readie of wit and fearing nought but ſhame:

If that be ſinne which in fixt hearts doth breed
A loathing of all looſe vnchaſtitie,
Then Loue is ſinne, and let me ſinfull be.

15

You that do ſearch for euerie purling ſpring,
VVhich from the ribs of old Parnaſſus flowes,
And euerie floure not ſweet perhaps, which growes
Neare thereabouts, into your Poeſie wring.

You that do Dictionaries methode bring
Into your rimes, running in ratling rowes:
You that poore Petrarchs long deceaſed woes,
VVith new-borne ſighes and denifend wit do ſing.

You take wrong waies thoſe far-fet helpes be ſuch,
As do bewray a want of inward tuch:
And ſure at length ſtolne goods do come to light.

But if (both for your loue and skill) your name
You ſeeke to nurſe at fulleſt breaſts of Fame,
Stella behold, and then begin to endite.

16

In nature apt to like when I did ſee
Beauties, which were of manie Carrets fine,
My boiling ſprites did thither ſoone incline,
And, Loue, I thought that I was full of thee:

But finding not thoſe reſtleſſe flames in me,
VVhich others ſaid did make their ſoules to pine:
I thought thoſe babes of ſome pinnes hurt did whine,
By my ſoule iudging what Loues paine might be.

But while I thus with this Lyon plaid,
Mine eyes (ſhall I ſay curſt or bleſt) beheld
Stella; now ſhe is nam'd, need more be ſaid?

In her ſight I a leſſon new haue ſpeld,
I now haue learn'd Loue right, and learn'd euen ſo,
As who by being poiſond doth poiſon know.

17

His mother deare Cupid offended late,
Becauſe that Mars growne ſlacker in her loue,
VVith pricking ſhot he did not throughly moue,
To keepe the pace of their firſt louing ſtate.

The boy refuſde for feare of Marſes hate,
VVho threatned ſtripes, if he his wrath did proue:
But ſhe in chafe him from her lap did ſhoue,
Brake bow, brake ſhafts, while Cupid weeping ſate:

Till that his grandame Nature pittying it,
Of Stellas browes made him two better bowes,
And in her eyes of arrowes infinit.

O how for ioy he leapes, ô how he crowes,
And ſtraight therewith like wags new got to play,
Fals to ſhrewd turnes, and I was in his way.

18

With what ſharpe checkes I in my ſelfe am ſhent,
When into Reaſons audite I do go:
And by iuſt counts my ſelfe a banckrout know
Of all thoſe goods, which heau'n to me haue lent:

Vnable quite to pay euen Natures rent,
Which vnto it by birthright I do ow:
And which is worſe, no good excuſe can ſhow,
But that my wealth I haue moſt idly ſpent.

My youth doth waſte, my knowledge brings forth toyes,
My wit doth ſtriue thoſe paſſions to defend,
Which for reward ſpoile it with vaine annoyes.

I ſee my courſe to looſe my ſelfe doth bend:
I ſee and yet no greater ſorow take,
Then that I looſe no more for Stellas ſake.

19

On Cupids bow how are my heart-ſtrings bent,
That ſee my wracke, and yet embrace the ſame?
When moſt I glorie, then I feele moſt ſhame:
I willing run, yet while I run, repent.

My beſt wits ſtill their owne diſgrace inuent:
My verie inke turnes ſtraight to Stellas name;
And yet my words, as them my pen doth frame,
Auiſe themſelues that they are vainely ſpent.

For though ſhe paſſe all things, yet what is all
That vnto me, who fare like him that both
Lookes to the skies, and in a ditch doth fall?

O let me prop my mind yet in his growth,
And not in Nature, for beſt fruits vnfit:
Scholler, ſaith Loue, bend hitherward your wit.

20

Flie, fly, my friends, I haue my death wound; fly,
See there that boy, that murthring boy I ſay,
Who like a theefe, hid in darke buſh doth ly,
Till bloudie bullet get him wrongfull pray.

So Tyran he no fitter place could ſpie,
Nor ſo faire leuell in ſo ſecret ſtay,
As that ſweete blacke which vailes the heau'nly eye:
There himſelfe with his ſhot he cloſe doth lay.

Poore paſſenger, paſſe now thereby I did,
And ſtaid pleaſd with the proſpect of the place,
While that blacke hue from me the bad gueſt hid:

But ſtraight I ſaw motions of lightning grace,
And then deſcried the gliſtring of his dart:
But ere I could flie thence, it pierc'd my heart.

21

Your words my friend (right healthfull cauſtiks) blame
My young mind marde, whom Loue doth windlas ſo,
That mine owne writings like bad ſeruants ſhow
My wits, quicke in vaine thoughts, in vertue lame:

That Plato I read for nought, but if he tame
Such coltiſh yeeres, that to my birth I owe
Nobler deſires, leaſt elſe that friendly foe,
Great expectation, weare a traine of ſhame.

For ſince mad March great promiſe made of me,
If now the May of my yeares much decline,
What can be hoped my harueſt time will be?

Sure you ſay well, your wiſdomes golden mine,
Dig deepe with learnings ſpade, now tell me this,
Hath this world ought ſo faire as Stella is?

22

In higheſt way of heau'n the Sunne did ride,
Progreſſing then from faire twinnes gold'n place:
Hauing no ſcarfe of clowds before his face,
But ſhining forth of heate in his chiefe pride;

When ſome faire Ladies by hard promiſe tied,
On horſebacke met him in his furious race,
Yet each prepar'd with fannes wel-ſhading grace,
From that foes wounds their tender skinnes to hide.

Stella alone with face vnarmed marcht,
Either to do like him which open ſhone,
Or careleſſe of the wealth becauſe her owne:

Yet were the hid and meaner beauties parcht,
Her daintieſt bare went free; the cauſe was this,
The Sunne which others burn'd, did her but kiſſe.

23

The curious wits ſeeing dull penſiueneſſe
Bewray it ſelfe in my long ſetled eyes,
Whence thoſe ſame fumes of melancholy riſe,
With idle paines, and miſſing ayme, do gueſſe.

Some that know how my ſpring I did addreſſe,
Deeme that my Muſe ſome fruit of knowledge plies:
Others, becauſe the Prince my ſeruice tries,
Thinke that I thinke ſtate errours to redreſſe.

But harder Iudges iudge ambitions rage,
Scourge of it ſelfe, ſtill climing ſlipprie place,
Holds my young braine captiu'd in golden cage.

O fooles, or ouer-wiſe, alas the race
Of all my thoughts hath neither ſtop nor ſtart,
But only Stellas eyes and Stellas hart.

24

Rich fooles there be, whoſe baſe and filthy hart
Lies hatching ſtill the goods wherein they flow:
And damning their owne ſelues to Tantals ſmart,
Wealth breeding want, more bliſt, more wretched grow.

Yet to thoſe fooles heau'n ſuch wit doth impart,
As what their hands do hold, their heads do know,
And knowing Loue, and louing lay apart,
As ſacred things, far from all daungers ſhow.

But that rich foole who by blind Fortunes lot,
The richeſt gemme of Loue and life enioyes,
And can with foule abuſe ſuch beauties blot;

Let him depriued of ſweet but vnfelt ioyes, (Exil'd for ay from thoſe high treaſures, which He knowes not) grow in only follie rich.

25

The wiſeſt ſcholler of the wight moſt wiſe,
By Phœbus doome, with ſugred ſentence ſayes,
That Vertue if it once met with our eyes,
Strange flames of Loue it in our ſoules would raiſe.

But for that man with paine this truth deſcries,
Whiles he each thing in ſenſes ballance wayes,
And ſo nor will, nor can behold thoſe skies,
Which inward ſunne to Heroicke minde diſplaies.

Vertue of late with vertuous care to ſter
Loue of her ſelfe, tooke Stellas ſhape, that ſhe
To mortall eyes might ſweetly ſhine in her.

It is moſt true, for ſince I her did ſee,
Vertues great beautie in that face I proue,
And find th'effect, for I do burne in loue.

26

Though duſtie wits dare ſcorne Aſtrologie,
And fooles can thinke thoſe Lampes of pureſt light,
Whoſe numbers weighs greatneſſe eternitie,
Promiſing wonders, wonder do inuite:

To haue for no cauſe birthright in the skie,
But for to ſpangle the blacke weeds of night:
Or for ſome brawle, which in that chamber hie,
They ſhould ſtill daunce to pleaſe a gazers ſight.

For me, I do Nature vnidle know,
And know great cauſes, great effects procure:
And know thoſe Bodies high raigne on the low.

And if theſe rules did faile, proofe makes me ſure,
Who oft fore-iudge my after-following race,
By only thoſe two ſtarres in Stellas face.

27

Becauſe I oft in darke abſtracted guiſe,
Seeme moſt alone in greateſt companie:
With dearth of words, or anſwers quite awrie,
To them that would make ſpeech of ſpeech ariſe.

They deeme, and of their doome the rumour flies,
That poiſon foule of bubling pride doth lie:
So in my ſwelling breaſt that only I
Fawne on me ſelfe, and others do deſpiſe:

Yet pride I thinke doth not my ſoule poſſeſſe,
Which lookes too oft in his vnflattring glaſſe:
But one worſe fault Ambition I confeſſe,

That makes me oft my beſt friends ouerpaſſe,
Vnſeene, vnheard, while thought to higheſt place
Bends all his powers, euen vnto Stellas grace.

28

You that with allegories curious frame,
Of others children changelings vſe to make,
With me thoſe paines for Gods ſake do not take
I liſt not dig ſo deepe for braſen fame.

When I ſay, Stella, I do meane the ſame
Princeſſe of Beautie, for whoſe only ſake,
The raines of Loue I loue, though neuer ſlake,
And ioy therein, though Nations count it ſhame.

I beg no ſubiect to vſe eloquence,
Nor in hid wayes do guide Philoſophie:
Looke at my hands for no ſuch quinteſſence;

But know that I in pure ſimplicitie,
Breathe out the flames which burne within my heart,
Loue onely reading vnto me this art.

29

Like ſome weake Lords, neighbord by mighty kings,
To keepe themſelues and their chiefe cities free,
Do eaſly yeeld, that all their coaſts may be Ready to ſtore their campes of needfull things:

So Stellas heart finding what power Loue brings,
To keepe it ſelfe in life and liberty,
Doth willing graunt, that in the frontiers he
Vſe all to helpe his other conquerings:

And thus her heart eſcapes, but thus her eyes
Serue him with ſhot, her lips his heralds arre:
Her breaſts his tents, legs his triumphall carre:

Her fleſh his food, her skin his armour braue,
And I, but for becauſe my proſpect lies
Vpon that coaſt, am giu'n vp for a ſlaue.

30

Whether the Turkish new-moone minded be
To fill his hornes this yeare on Christian coast:
How Poles right king meanes without leaue of hoast,
To warme with ill-made fire cold Moscouy.

If French can yet three parts in one agree,
What now the Dutch in their full diets boast,
How Holland hearts, now so good townes be lost,
Trust in the shade of pleasing Orange tree.

How Vlster likes of that same golden bit,
Wherewith my father once made it halfe tame,
If in the Scotch Court be no weltring yet.

These questions busie wits to me do frame;
I cumbred with good maners, answer do,
But know not how, for still I thinke of you.

31

With how sad steps, ô Moone, thou climb'st the skies,
How silently, and with how wanne a face,
What may it be, that euen in heau'nly place
That busie archer his sharpe arrowes tries?

Sure if that long with Loue acquainted eyes
Can iudge of Loue, thou feel'st a Louers case;
I reade it in thy lookes, thy languisht grace
To me that feele the like, thy state descries.

Then eu'n of fellowship, ô Moone, tell me
Is constant Loue deem'd there but want of wit?
Are Beauties there as proud as here they be?

Do they aboue loue to be lou'd, and yet
Those Louers scorne whom that Loue doth possesse?
Do they call Vertue there vngratefulnesse.

32

Morpheus the liuely sonne of deadly sleepe,
Witnesse of life to them that liuing die:
A Prophet oft, and oft an historie,
A Poet eke, as humours fly or creepe,

Since thou in me so sure a power doest keepe,
That neuer I with close vp sense do lie,
But by thy worke (my Stella) I descrie,
Teaching blind eyes both how to smile and weepe.

Vouchsafe of all acquaintance this to tell,
Whence hast thou Iuorie, Rubies, pearle and gold,
To shew her skin, lips, teeth and head so well?

Foole, answers he, no Indes such treasures hold,
But from thy heart, while my sire charmeth thee,
Sweet Stellas image I do steale to mee.

33

I might, vnhappie word, ô me, I might,
And then would not, or could not see my bliſſe:
Till now wrapt in a moſt infernall night,
I find how heau'nly day wretch I did miſſe.

Hart rent thy ſelfe, thou doeſt thy ſelfe but right,
No louely Paris made thy Hellen his:
No force, no fraud, robd thee of thy delight,
Nor Fortune of thy fortune author is:

But to my ſelfe my ſelfe did giue the blow,
While too much wit (forſooth) ſo troubled me,
That I reſpects for both our ſakes muſt ſhow:

And yet could not by riſing Morne foreſee
How faire a day was neare, ô puniſht eyes,
That I had bene more fooliſh or more wiſe.

34

Come let me write, and to what end? to eaſe
A burthned hart, how can words eaſe, which are
The glaſſes of thy dayly vexing care?
Oft cruell fights well pictured forth do pleaſe.

Art not aſham'd to publiſh thy diſeaſe?
Nay, that may breed my fame, it is ſo rare:
But will not wiſe men thinke thy words fond ware?
Then be they cloſe, and ſo none ſhall diſpleaſe.

What idler thing, then ſpeake and not be hard?
What harder thing then ſmart, and not to ſpeake?
Peace fooliſh wit, with wit my wit is mard.

Thus write I while I doubt to write, and wreake
My harmes on Inks poore loſſe, perhaps ſome find Stellas great powrs, that ſo confuſe my mind.

35

What may words ſay, or what may words not ſay,
Where truth it ſelfe muſt ſpeake like flatterie?
Within what bounds can one his liking ſtay,
Where Nature doth with infinite agree?

What Neſtors counſell can my flames alay,
Since Reaſon ſelfe doth blow the cole in me?
And ah what hope, that hope ſhould once ſee day,
Where Cupid is ſworne page to Chaſtity?

Honour is honour'd, that thou doeſt poſſeſſe
Him as thy ſlaue, and now long needy Fame
Doth euen grow rich, naming my Stellas name.

Wit learnes in thee perfection to expreſſe,
Not thou by praiſe, but praiſe in thee is raiſde:
It is a praiſe to praiſe, when thou art praiſde.

36

Stella, whence doth this new assault arise,
A conquerd golden ransackt heart to winne?
Whereto long since through my long battred eyes,
Whole armies of thy beauties entred in.

And there long since, Loue thy Lieutenant lies,
My forces razde, thy banners raisd within:
Of conquest, do not these effects suffice,
But wilt now warre vpon thine owne begin?

With so sweete voice, and by sweete Nature so
In sweetest strength, so sweetly skild withall,
In all sweete stratagems, sweete Arte can show,

That not my soule, which at thy foot did fall,
Long since forc'd by thy beames, but stone nor tree
By Sences priuiledge, can scape from thee.

37

My mouth doth water, and my breast doth swell,
My tongue doth itch, my thoughts in labour be:
Listen then Lordings with good eare to me,
For of my life I must a riddle tell.

Toward Auoras Court a Nymph doth dwell,
Rich in all beauties which mans eye can see:
Beauties so farre from reach of words, that we Abase her praise, saying she doth excell:

Rich in the treasure of deseru'd renowne,
Rich in the riches of a royall hart,
Rich in those gifts which giue th'eternall crowne;

Who though most rich in these and euerie part,
Which make the patents of true worldly blisse,
Hath no misfortune, but that Rich she is.

38

This night while sleepe begins with heauy wings
To hatch mine eyes, and that vnbitted thought
Doth fall to stray, and my chiefe powres are brought
To leaue the scepter of all subiect things.

The first that straight my fancies error brings
Vnto my mind, is Stellas image, wrought
By Loues owne selfe, but with so curious drought,
That she, me thinks, not onely shines but sings.

I start, looke, hearke, but what in closde vp sence
Was held, in opend sense it flies away,
Leauing me nought but wailing eloquence:

I seeing better sights in sights decay,
Cald it anew, and wooed sleepe againe:
But him her host that vnkind guest had slaine.

39

Come ſleepe, ô ſleepe, the certaine knot of peace,
The baiting place of wit, the balme of woe,
The poore mans wealth, the priſoners releaſe,
Th'indifferent Iudge betweene the high and low;

With ſhield of proofe ſhield me from out the preaſe
Of thoſe fierce darts, diſpaire at me doth throw:
O make in me thoſe ciuill warres to ceaſe;
I will good tribute pay if thou do ſo.

Take thou of me ſmooth pillowes, ſweeteſt bed,
A chamber deafe to noiſe, and blind to light:
A roſie garland, and a wearie hed:

And if theſe things, as being thine by right,
Moue not thy heauy grace, thou ſhalt in me
Liuelier then elſe-where Stellas image ſee.

40

As good to write as for to lie and grone,
O Stella deare, how much thy power hath wrought,
That haſt my mind, none of the baſeſt, brought
My ſtill kept courſe, while other ſleepe to mone.

Alas, if from the height of Vertues throne,
Thou canſt vouchſafe the influence of a thought
Vpon a wretch, that long thy grace hath ſought;
Weigh then how I by thee am ouerthrowne:

And then, thinke thus, although thy beautie be Made manifeſt by ſuch a victorie,
Yet nobleſt Conquerours do wreckes auoid.

Since then thou haſt ſo farre ſubdued me,
That in my heart I offer ſtill to thee,
O do not let thy Temple be deſtroyd.

41

Hauing this day my horſe, my hand, my launce
Guided ſo well, that I obtain'd the prize,
Both by the iudgement of the Engliſh eyes,
And of ſome ſent from that ſweet enemie Fraunce.

Horſemen my skill in horſmanſhip aduaunce:
Towne-folkes my ſtrength, a daintier iudge applies
His praiſe to ſleight, which from good vſe doth riſe:
Some luckie wits impute it but to chaunce:

Others, becauſe of both ſides I do take
My bloud from them, who did excell in this,
Thinke Nature me a man of armes did make.

How farre they ſhot awrie? the true cauſe is,
Stella lookt on, and from her hau'nly face
Sent forth the beames, which made ſo faire my race.

O eyes

42

O eyes, which do the Spheares of beautie moue,
Whose beames be ioyes, whose ioyes all vertues be,
Who while they make Loue conquer, conquer Loue,
The schooles where Venus hath learn'd Chastitie.

O eyes, where humble lookes most glorious proue,
Only lou'd Tyrants, iust in cruelty,
Do not, ô do not from poore me remoue,
Keepe still my Zenith, euer shine on me.

For though I neuer see them, but straight wayes
My life forgets to nourish languisht sprites;
Yet still on me, ô eyes, dart downe your rayes:

And if from Maiestie of sacred lights,
Oppressing mortall sense, my death proceed,
Wrackes Triumphs be, which Loue (high set) doth breed.

43

Faire eyes, sweet lips, deare heart, that foolish I
Could hope by Cupids helpe on you to pray;
Since to himselfe he doth your gifts apply,
As his maine force, choise sport, and easefull stay.

For when he will see who dare him gainesay,
Then with those eyes he lookes, lo by and by
Each soule doth at Loues feet his weapons lay,
Glad if for her he giue them leaue to die.

When he will play, then in her lips he is,
Where blushing red, that Loues selfe them doth loue,
With either lip he doth the other kisse:

But when he will for quiets sake remoue
From all the world, her heart is then his rome,
Where well he knowes, no man to him can come.

44

My words I know do well set forth my mind,
My mind bemones his sense of inward smart;
Such smart may pitie claime of any hart,
Her heart, sweete heart, is of no Tygres kind:

And yet she heares, and yet no pitie I find;
But more I crie, lesse grace she doth impart,
Alas, what cause is there so ouerthwart,
That Nobleness it selfe makes thus vnkind?

I much do guesse, yet find no truth saue this,
That when the breath of my complaints doth tuch
Those daintie dores vnto the Court of blisse,

The heau'nly nature of that place is such,
That once come there, the sobs of mine annoyes
Are metamorphosd straight to tunes of ioyes.

45

Stella oft ſees the verie face of wo
Painted in my beclowded ſtormie face:
But cannot skill to pitie my diſgrace,
Not though thereof the cauſe her ſelfe ſhe know:

Yet hearing late a fable, which did ſhow
Of Louers neuer knowne, a grieuous caſe,
Pitie thereof gate in her breaſt ſuch place,
That from that ſea deriu'd teares ſpring did flow.

Alas, if Fancy drawne by imag'd things,
Though falſe, yet with free ſcope more grace doth breed
Then ſeruants wracke, where new doubts honor brings;

Then thinke my deare, that you in me do reed
Of Louers ruine ſome ſad Tragedie:
I am not I, pitie the tale of me.

46

I curſt thee oft, I pitie now thy caſe,
Blind-hitting boy, ſince ſhe that thee and me
Rules with a becke, ſo tyrannizeth thee,
That thou muſt want or food, or dwelling place.

For ſhe proteſts to baniſh thee her face,
Her face? O Loue, a Rogue thou then ſhouldſt be!
If Loue learne not alone to loue and ſee,
Without deſire to feed of further grace.

Alas poore wag, that now a ſcholler art
To ſuch a ſchoole-miſtreſſe, whoſe leſſons new Thou needs muſt miſſe, and ſo thou needs muſt ſmart.

Yet Deare, let me his pardon get of you,
So long (though he from booke my che to deſire)
Till without fewell you can make hot fire.

47

What haue I thus betrayed my libertie?
Can thoſe blacke beames ſuch burning markes engraue
In my free ſide? or am I borne a ſlaue,
Whoſe necke becomes ſuch yoke of tyranny?

Or want I ſenſe to feele my miſerie?
Or ſprite, diſdaine of ſuch diſdaine to haue?
Who for long faith, tho dayly helpe I craue,
May get no almes but ſcorne of beggerie.

Vertue awake, Beautie but beautie is,
I may, I muſt, I can, I will, I do
Leaue following that, which it is gaine to miſſe.

Let her do: ſoft, but here ſhe comes, go to,
Vnkind, I loue you not: O me, that eye
Doth make my heart giue to my tongue the lie.

Soules

48

Soules ioy, bend not thoſe morning ſtarres from me,
Where Vertue is made ſtrong by Beauties might,
Where Loue is chaſtneſſe, Paine doth learne delight,
And Humbleneſſe growes one with Maieſtie.

What euer may enſue, ô let me be
Copartner of the riches of that ſight:
Let not mine eyes be hel-driu'n from that light:
O looke, ô ſhine, ô let me die and ſee.

For though I oft my ſelfe of them bemone,
That through my heart their beamie darts be gone:
Whoſe cureleſſe wounds euen now moſt freſhly bleed:

Yet ſince my death-wound is already got,
Deare Killer, ſpare not thy ſweet cruell ſhot:
A kind of grace it is to ſlay with ſpeed.

49

I on my horſe, and Loue on me doth trie
Our horſmanſhips, while by ſtrange worke I proue
A horſman to my horſe, a horſe to Loue;
And now mans wrongs in me poore beaſt deſcrie.

The raine wherewith my Rider doth me tie,
Are humbled thoughts, which bit of Reuerence moue,
Curb'd in with feare, but with guilt boſſe aboue
Of Hope, which makes it ſeeme faire to the eye.

The Wand is Will, thou Fancie Saddle art,
Girt faſt by memorie, and while I ſpurre
My horſe, he ſpurres with ſharpe deſire my hart:

He ſits me faſt, how euer I do ſturre:
And now hath made me to his hand ſo right,
That in the Manage my ſelfe takes delight.

50

Stella, the fulneſſe of my thoughts of thee
Cannot be ſtaid within my panting breaſt,
But they do ſwell and ſtruggle forth of me,
Till that in words thy figure be expreſt.

And yet as ſoone as they ſo formed be,
According to my Lord Loues owne beheſt:
With ſad eyes I their weake proportion ſee,
To portrait that which in this world is beſt.

So that I cannot chuſe but write my mind,
And cannot chuſe but put out what I write,
While theſe poore babes their death in birth do find:

And now my pen theſe lines had daſhed quite,
But that they ſtopt his furie from the ſame,
Becauſe their forefront bare ſweet Stellas name.

51

Pardon mine eares, both I and they do pray,
So may your tongue ſtill fluently proceed,
To them that do ſuch entertainment need,
So may you ſtill haue ſomewhat new to ſay.

On ſilly me do not the burthen lay,
Of all the graue conceits your braine doth breed;
But find ſome Hercules to beare, in ſteed
Of Atlas tyr'd, your wiſedomes heau'nly ſway.

For me, while you diſcourſe of courtly tides,
Of cunning fiſhers in moſt troubled ſtreames,
Of ſtraying wayes, when valiant errour guides:

Meane while my heart confers with Stellas beames,
And is euen irkt that ſo ſweet Comedie,
By ſuch vnſuted ſpeech ſhould hindred be.

52

A ſtrife is growne betweene Vertue and Loue, While each pretends that Stella muſt be his:
Her eyes, her lips, her all, ſaith Loue do this,
Since they do weare his badge, moſt firmely proue.

But Vertue thus that title doth diſproue,
That Stella (ô deare name) that Stella is
That vertuous ſoule, ſure heire of heau'nly bliſſe:
Not this faire outſide, which our hearts doth moue.

And therefore, though her beautie and her grace
Be Loues indeed, in Stellas ſelfe he may
By no pretence claime any maner place.

Well Loue, ſince this demurre our ſute doth ſtay,
Let Vertue haue that Stellas ſelfe; yet thus,
That Vertue but that body graunt to vs.

53

In Martiall ſports I had my cunning tride,
And yet to breake more ſtaues did me addreſſe:
While with the peoples ſhouts I muſt confeſſe,
Youth, lucke, and praiſe, euen fild my veines with pride.

When Cupid hauing me his ſlaue deſcride,
In Marſes liuerie, prauncing in the preſſe:
What now ſir foole, ſaid he, I would no leſſe,
Looke here, I ſay, I look'd and Stella ſpide:

Who hard by made a window ſend forth light,
My heart then quak'd, then dazled were mine eyes,
One hand forgat to rule, th'other to fight.

Nor trumpets ſound I heard, nor friendly cries;
My Foe came on, and beat the aire for me,
Till that her bluſh taught me my ſhame to ſee.

54

Becauſe I breathe not loue to euerie one,
Nor do not vſe ſet colours for to weare,
Nor nouriſh ſpeciall lockes of vowed haire,
Nor giue each ſpeech a full point of a grone.

The courtly Nymphs, acquainted with the mone
Of them, who in their lips Loues ſtanderd beare;
What he? ſay they of me, now I dare ſweare,
He cannot loue: no, no, let him alone.

And thinke ſo ſtill, ſo Stella know my mind,
Profeſſe in deed I do not Cupids art;
But you faire maides, at length this true ſhall find,

That his right badge is but worne in the hart:
Dumbe Swannes, not chatring Pies, do Louers proue,
They loue indeed, who quake to ſay they loue.

55

Muſes, I oft inuoked your holy ayde,
With choiſeſt flowers my ſpeech to engarland ſo;
That it deſpiſde in true but naked ſhew,
Might winne ſome grace in your ſweet grace arraid.

And oft whole troupes of ſaddeſt words I ſtaid,
Striuing abroad a foraging to go;
Vntill by your inſpiring I might know,
How their blacke banner might be beſt diſplaid.

But now I meane no more your helpe to trie,
Nor other ſugring of my ſpeech to proue,
But on her name inceſſantly to crie:

For let me but name her whom I do loue,
So ſweete ſounds ſtraight mine eare and heart do hit,
That I well find no eloquence like it.

56

Fy ſchoole of Patience, Fy, your leſſon is Far far too long to learne it without booke:
What, a whole weeke without one peece of looke,
And thinke I ſhould not your large precepts miſſe?

When I might reade thoſe letters faire of bliſſe,
Which in her face teach vertue, I could brooke
Somewhat thy lead'n counſels, which I tooke,
As of a friend that meant not much amiſſe:

But now that I alas do want her ſight,
What, doſt thou thinke that I can euer take
In thy cold ſtuffe a flegmatike delight?

No Patience, if thou wilt my good, then make
Her come, and heare with patience my deſire,
And then with patience bid me beare my fire.

57

Wo, hauing made with many fights his owne
Each ſence of mine, each gift, each power of mind,
Growne now his ſlaues, he forſt them out to find
The thoroweſt words, fit for woes ſelfe to grone,

Hoping that when they might find Stella alone,
Before ſhe could prepare to be vnkind,
Her ſoule arm'd but with ſuch a dainty rind,
Should ſoone be pierc'd with ſharpneſſe of the mone.

She heard my plaints, and did not only heare,
But them (ſo ſweete is ſhe) moſt ſweetly ſing,
With that faire breaſt making woes darkneſſe cleare:

A prety caſe I hoped her to bring
To feele my griefes, and ſhe with face and voice,
So ſweets my paines, that my paines me reioyce.

58

Doubt there hath bene when with his golden chaine,
The Oratour ſo farre mens harts doth bind,
That no pace elſe their guided ſteps can find,
But as he them more ſhort or ſlacke doth raine.

Whether with words this ſoueraignty he gaine,
Cloth'd with fine tropes, with ſtrongeſt reaſons lin'd,
Or elſe pronouncing grace, wherewith his mind
Prints his owne liuely forme in rudeſt braine:

Now iudge by this, in piercing phraſes late,
The anatomy of all my woes I wrate,
Stellas ſweete breath the ſame to me did reed.

O voice, ô face, maugre my ſpeeches might,
Which wooed wo, moſt rauiſhing delight,
Euen thoſe ſad words, euen in ſad me did breed.

59

Deare, why make you more of a dog then me?
If he do loue, I burne, I burne in loue:
If he waite well, I neuer thence would moue:
If he be faire, yet but a dog can be.

Litle he is, ſo litle worth is he;
He barks, my ſongs thine owne voyce oft doth proue:
Bid'n perhaps he fetcheth thee a gloue,
But I vnbid, fetch euen my ſoule to thee.

Yet while I languiſh, him that boſome clips,
That lap doth lap, nay lets in ſpite of ſpite,
This ſowre-breath'd mate taſt of thoſe ſugred lips.

Alas, if you graunt only ſuch delight
To witleſſe things, then Loue, I hope (ſince wit Becomes a clog) will ſoone eaſe me of it.

When

60

When my good Angell guides me to the place,
Where all my good I do in Stella see,
That heau'n of ioyes throwes onely downe on me
Thundred disdaines and lightnings of disgrace:

But when the ruggedst step of Fortunes race
Makes me fall from her sight, then sweetly she
With words, wherein the Muses treasures be,
Shewes loue and pitie to my absent case.

Now I wit-beaten long by hardest Fate,
So dull am, that I cannot looke into
The ground of this fierce Loue and louely hate:

Then some good body tell me how I do,
Whose presence, absence, absence presence is;
Blist in my curse, and cursed in my blisse.

61

Oft with true sighes, oft with vncalled teares,
Now with slow words, now with dumbe eloquence
I Stellas eyes assaid, inuade her eares;
But this at last is her sweet breath'd defence:

That who indeed infelt affection beares,
So captiues to his Saint both soule and sence,
That wholly hers, all selfnesse he forbeares,
Then his desires he learnes his liues course thence.

Now since her chast mind hates this loue in me,
With chastned mind, I straight must shew that she Shall quickly me from what she hates remoue.

O Doctor Cupid, thou for me reply,
Driu'n else to graunt by Angels sophistrie,
That I loue not, without I leaue to loue.

62

Late tyr'd with wo, euen ready for to pine
With rage of Loue, I cald my Loue vnkind;
She in whose eyes Loue though vnfelt doth shine,
Sweet said that I true loue in her should find,

I ioyed, but straight thus watred was my wine,
That loue she did, but loued a Loue not blind,
Which would not let me, whom she loued, decline
From nobler course, fit for my birth and mind:

And therefore by her Loues authority,
Wild me these tempests of vaine loue to flie,
And anchor fast my selfe on Vertues shore.

Alas, if this the only mettall be
Of Loue, new-coind to helpe my beggery,
Deare, loue me not, that ye may loue me more.

63

O Grammer rules, ô now your vertues show;
So children still reade you with awfull eyes,
As my young Doue may in your precepts wise
Her graunt to me, by her owne vertue know.

For late with heart most high, with eyes most low,
I crau'd the thing which euer she denies:
She lightning Loue, displaying Venus skies,
Least once should not be heard, twise said, No, No.

Sing then my Muse, now Io Pean sing,
Heau'ns enuy not at my high triumphing:
But Grammers force with sweet successe confirme:

For Grammer sayes (ô this deare Stella nay,)
For Grammer sayes (to Grammer who sayes nay)
That in one speech two Negatiues affirme.

First song.

Doubt you to whom my Muse these notes entendeth,
Which now my breast orecharg'd to Musicke lendeth:
To you, to you, all song of praise is due,
Only in you my song begins and endeth.

Who hath the eyes which marrie state with pleasure,
Who keepes the key of Natures chiefest treasure:
To you, to you, all song of praise is due,
Only for you the heau'n forgate all measure.

Who hath the lips, where wit in faireneſſe raigneth,
Who womankind at once both deckes and stayneth:
To you, to you, all song of praise is due,
Onely by you Cupid his crowne maintaineth.

Who hath the feet, whose step of sweetneſſe planteth,
Who else for whom Fame worthy trumpets wanteth:
To you, to you, all song of praise is due,
Onely to you her Scepter Venus granteth.

Who hath the breast, whose milke doth passions nourish,
Whose grace is such, that when it chides doth cherish,
To you, to you all song of praise is due,
Onelie through you the tree of life doth flourish.

Who hath the hand which without stroke subdueth,
Who long dead beautie with increase reneweth:
To you, to you, all song of praise is due,
Onely at you all enuie hopeleſſe rueth.

Whe

Who hath the haire which looſeſt faſteſt tieth,
VVho makes a man liue then glad when he dieth:
To you, to you, all ſong of praiſe is due:
Only of you the flatterer neuer lieth.

Who hath the voyce, which ſoule from ſences ſunders,
Whoſe force but yours the bolts of beautie thunders:
To you, to you, all ſong of praiſe is due:
Only with you not miracles are wonders.

Doubt you to whom my Muſe theſe notes intendeth,
Which now my breaſt orecharg'd to Muſicke lendeth:
To you, to you, all ſong of praiſe is due:
Only in you my ſong begins and endeth.

64

No more, my deare, no more theſe counſels trie,
O giue my paſſions leaue to run their race:
Let Fortune lay on me her worſt diſgrace,
Let folke orecharg'd with braine againſt me crie.

Let clouds bedimme my face, breake in mine eye,
Let me no ſteps but of loſt labour trace:
Let all the earth with ſcorne recount my caſe,
But do not will me from my Loue to flie.

I do not enuie Ariſtotles wit,
Nor do aſpire to Cæſars bleeding fame;
Nor ought do care, though ſome aboue me ſit:

Nor hope, nor with another courſe to frame,
But that which once may win thy cruell hart
Thou art my Wit, and thou my Vertue art.

65

Loue by ſure proofe I may call thee vnkind,
That giu'ſt no better eare to my iuſt cries:
Thou whom to me ſuch my good turnes ſhould bind,
As I may well recount, but none can prize:

For when nak'd boy thou couldſt no harbour find
In this old world, growne now ſo too too wiſe:
I lodg'd thee in my heart, and being blind
By Nature borne, I gaue to thee mine eyes.

Mine eyes, my light, my heart, my life, alas,
If ſo great ſeruices may ſcorned be:
Yet let this thought thy Tygriſh courage paſſe:

That I perhaps am ſomewhat kinne to thee;
Since in thine armes, if learnd fame truth hath ſpread,
Thou bear'ſt the arrow, I the arrow head.

66

And do I ſee ſome cauſe a hope to feede,
Or doth the tedious burd'n of long wo
In weakened minds, quicke apprehending breed,
Of euerie image, which may comfort ſhow?

I cannot brag of word, much leſſe of deed,
Fortunes wheeles ſtill with me in one ſort ſlow,
My wealth no more, and no whit leſſe my need,
Deſire ſtill on the ſtilts of feare doth go.

And yet a mid all feares a hope there is,
Stolne to my heart ſince laſt faire night, nay day,
Stellas eyes ſent to me the beames of bliſſe,

Looking on me, while I lookt other way:
But when mine eyes backe to their heau'n did moue,
They fled with bluſh, which guiltie ſeem'd of loue.

67

Hope, art thou true, or doeſt thou flatter me?
Doth Stella now begin with piteous eye,
The ruines of her conqueſt to eſpie:
Will ſhe take time, before all wracked be?

Her eyes-ſpeech is tranſlated thus by thee:
But failſt thou not in phraſe ſo heau'nly hie?
Looke on againe, the faire text better trie:
What bluſhing notes doeſt thou in margine ſee?

What ſighes ſtolne out, or kild before full borne?
Haſt thou found ſuch and ſuch like arguments?
Or art thou elſe to comfort me forſworne?

Well, how ſo thou interpret the contents,
I am reſolu'd thy errour to maintaine,
Rather then by more truth to get more paine.

68

Stella, the onely Planet of my light,
Light of my life, and life of my deſire,
Chiefe good, whereto my hope doth only aſpire,
World of my wealth, and heau'n of my delight.

Why doeſt thou ſpend the treaſures of thy ſprite,
With voice more fit to wed Amphions lyre,
Seeking to quench in me the noble fire,
Fed by thy worth, and blinded by thy ſight?

And all in vaine, for while thy breath moſt ſweet,
With choiſeſt words, thy words with reaſons rare,
Thy reaſons firmly ſet on Vertues feet,

Labour to kill in me this killing care:
O thinke I then, what paradiſe of ioy
It is, ſo faire a Vertue to enioy.

69

O ioy, too high for my low ſtile to ſhow:
O bliſſe, fit for a nobler ſtate then me:
Enuie, put out thine eyes, leaſt thou do ſee
What Oceans of delight in me do flow.

My friend, that oft ſaw through all maskes my wo,
Come, come, and let me powre my ſelfe on thee;
Gone is the winter of my miſerie,
My ſpring appeares, ô ſee what here doth grow.

For Stella hath with words where faith doth ſhine,
Of her high heart giu'n me the monarchie:
I, I, ô I may ſay, that ſhe is mine.

And though ſhe giue but thus conditionly
This realme of bliſſe, while vertuous courſe I take,
No kings be crown'd, but they ſome couenants make,

70

My Muſe may well grudge at my heau'nly ioy,
If ſtill I force her in ſad rimes to creepe:
She oft hath drunke my teares, now hopes to enioy
Nectar of Mirth, ſince I Ioues cup do keepe.

Sonets be not bound prentiſe to annoy:
Trebles ſing high, as well as baſes deepe:
Griefe but Loues winter liuerie is, the Boy
Hath cheekes to ſmile, as well as eyes to weepe.

Come then my Muſe, ſhew thou height of delight
In well raiſde notes, my pen the beſt it may Shall paint out ioy, though but in blacke and white.

Ceaſe eager Muſe, peace pen, for my ſake ſtay,
I giue you here my hand for truth of this,
Wiſe ſilence is beſt muſicke vnto bliſſe.

71

Who will in faireſt booke of Nature know,
How Vertue may beſt lodg'd in beautie be,
Let him but learne of Loue to reade in thee
Stella, thoſe faire lines, which true goodneſſe ſhow.

There ſhall he find all vices ouerthrow,
Not by rude force, but ſweeteſt ſoueraigntie
Of reaſon, from whoſe light thoſe night-birds flie;
That inward ſunne in thine eyes ſhineth ſo.

And not content to be Perfections heire
Thy ſelfe, doeſt ſtriue all minds that way to moue:
Who marke in thee what is in thee moſt faire.

So while thy beautie drawes the heart to loue,
As faſt thy Vertue bends that loue to good:
But ah, Deſire ſtill cries, giue me ſome food.

72

Desire, though thou my old companion art,
And oft so clings to my pure Loue, that I
One from the other scarcely can descrie,
While each doth blow the fier of my hart;

Now from thy fellowship I needs must part,
Venus is taught with Dians wings to flie:
I must no more in thy sweet passions lie;
Vertues gold now must head my Cupids dart.

Seruice and Honor, wonder with delight,
Feare to offend, will worthie to appeare,
Care shining in mine eyes, faith in my sprite.

These things are left me by my only Deare;
But thou Desire, because thou wouldst haue all,
Now banisht art, but yet alas how shall?

Second song.

Haue I caught my heau'nly iewell,
Teaching sleepe most faire to be?
Now will I teach her that she,
When she wakes, is too too cruell.

Since sweet sleep her eyes hath charmed,
The two only darts of Loue:
Now will I with that boy proue
Some play, while he is disarmed.

Her tongue waking still refuseth,
Giuing frankly niggard No:
Now will I attempt to know,
What No her tongue sleeping vseth.

See the hand which waking gardeth,
Sleeping, grants a free resort:
Now will I inuade the fort;
Cowards Loue with losse rewardeth.

But ô foole, thinke of the danger,
Of her iust and high disdaine:
Now will I alas refraine,
Loue feares nothing else but anger.

Yet those lips so sweetly swelling,
Do inuite a stealing kisse:
Now will I but venture this,
Who will read must first learne spelling.

Oh sweet kisse, but ah she is waking,
Lowring beautie chastens me:
Now will I away hence flee:
Foole, more foole, for no more taking.

73

Loue ſtill a boy, and oft a wanton is,
School'd onely by his mothers tender eye:
What wonder then if he his leſſon miſſe,
When for ſo ſoft a rod deare play he trie?

And yet my Starre, becauſe a ſugred kiſſe
In ſport I ſuckt, while ſhe aſleepe did lie,
Doth lowre, nay, chide; nay, threat for only this:
Sweet, it was ſaucie Loue, not humble I.

But no ſcuſe ſerues, ſhe makes her wrath appeare
In Beauties throne, ſee now who dares come neare
Thoſe ſcarlet iudges, threatning bloudy paine?

O heau'nly foole, thy moſt kiſſe-worthie face,
Anger inueſts with ſuch a louely grace,
That Anger ſelfe I needs muſt kiſſe againe.

74

I neuer dranke of Aganippe well,
Nor euer did in ſhade of Tempe ſit:
And Muſes ſcorne with vulgar braines to dwell,
Poore Layman I, for ſacred rites vnfit.

Some do I heare of Poets furie tell,
But (God wot) wot not what they meane by it:
And this I ſweare by blackeſt brooke of hell,
I am no pick-purſe of anothers wit.

How falles it then, that with ſo ſmooth an eaſe
My thoughts I ſpeake, and what I ſpeake doth flow
In verſe, and that my verſe beſt wits doth pleaſe?

Gueſſe we the cauſe, what is it thus? fie no:
Or ſo? much leſſe: how then? ſure thus it is:
My lips are ſweet, inſpired with Stellas kiſſe.

75

Of all the kings that euer here did raigne,
Edward named fourth, as firſt in praiſe I name,
Not for his faire outſide, nor well lined braine;
Although leſſe gifts impe feathers oft on Fame

Nor that he could young-wiſe, wiſe-valiant frame
His Sires reuenge, ioyn'd with a kingdomes gaine:
And gain'd by Mars, could yet mad Mars ſo tame,
That Ballance weigh'd what ſword did late obtaine.

Nor that he made the Flouredeluce ſo fraid,
Though ſtrongly hedg'd of bloudy Lyons pawes,
That wittie Lewis to him a tribute paid.

Nor this, nor that, nor any ſuch ſmall cauſe,
But only for this worthy knight durſt proue
To looſe his Crowne, rather then faile his Loue.

76

She comes, and ſtreight therewith her ſhining twins do moue,
Their rayes to me, who in her tedious abſence lay
Benighted in cold wo, but now appeares my day,
The onely light of ioy, the onely warmth of Loue.

She comes with light and warmth, which like Aurora proue
Of gentle force, ſo that mine eyes dare gladly play
With ſuch a roſie morne, whoſe beames moſt freſhly gay
Scorch not, but onely do darke chilling ſprites remoue.

But lo, while I do ſpeake, it groweth noone with me,
Her flamie gliſtring lights increaſe with time and place;
My heart cries ah, it burnes, mine eyes now dazled be:

No wind, no ſhade can coole, what helpe then in my caſe,
But with ſhort breath, long lookes, ſtaid feet and walking hed,
Pray that my ſunne go downe with meeker beames to bed.

77

Thoſe lookes, whoſe beames be ioy, whoſe motion is delight,
That face, whoſe lecture ſhewes what perfect beautie is:
That preſence, which doth giue darke hearts a liuing light:
That grace, which Venus weepes that ſhe her ſelfe doth miſſe:

That hand, which without touch holds more then Atlas might;
Thoſe lips, which make deaths pay a meane price for a kiſſe:
That skin, whoſe paſſe-praiſe hue ſcorns this poore terme of white:
Thoſe words, which do ſublime the quinteſſence of bliſſe:

That voyce, which makes the ſoule plant himſelfe in the eares:
That conuerſation ſweet, where ſuch high comforts be,
As conſterd in true ſpeech, the name of heau'n it beares,

Makes me in my beſt thoughts and quietſt iudgement ſee,
That in no more but theſe I might be fully bleſt:
Yet ah, my Mayd'n Muſe doth bluſh to tell the beſt.

78

O how the pleaſant aires of true loue be Infected by thoſe vapours, which ariſe
From out that noyſome gulfe, which gaping lies
Betweene the iawes of helliſh Iealouſie.

A monſter, others harme, ſelfe-miſerie,
Beauties plague, Vertues ſcourge, ſuccour of lies:
Who his owne ioy to his owne hurt applies,
And onely cheriſh doth with iniurie.

Who ſince he hath, by Natures ſpeciall grace,
So piercing pawes, as ſpoyle when they embrace,
So nimble feet as ſtirre ſtill, though on thornes:

So manie eyes ay ſeeking their owne woe,
So ample eares as neuer good newes know:
Is it not euill that ſuch a Deuill wants hornes?

Sweet

79

Sweet kiſſe, thy ſweets I faine would ſweetly endite,
Which euen of ſweetneſſe ſweeteſt ſweetner art:
Pleaſingſt conſort, where each ſence holds a part,
Which coupling Doues guides Venus chariot right.

Beſt charge, and braueſt retrait in Cupids fight,
A double key, which opens to the heart,
Moſt rich, when moſt his riches it impart:
Neaſt of young ioyes, ſchoolmaſter of delight,

Teaching the meane, at once to take and giue
The friendly fray, where blowes both wound and heale,
The prettie death, while each in other liue.

Poore hopes firſt wealth, oſtage of promiſt weale, Breakefaſt of Loue, but lo, lo, where ſhe is,
Ceaſe we to praiſe, now pray we for a kiſſe.

80

Sweet ſwelling lip, well maiſt thou ſwell in pride,
Since beſt wits thinke it wit thee to admire;
Natures praiſe, Vertues ſtall, Cupids cold fire,
Whence words, not words, but heau'nly graces ſlide.

The new Pernaſſus, where the Muſes bide,
Sweetner of muſicke, wiſedomes beautifier:
Breather of life, and faſtner of deſire,
Where Beauties bluſh in Honours graine is dide.

Thus much my heart compeld my mouth to ſay,
But now ſpite of my heart my mouth will ſtay,
Loathing all lies, doubting this Flatterie is:

And no ſpurre can his reſty race renew,
Without how farre this praiſe is ſhort of you,
Sweet lip, you teach my mouth with one ſweet kiſſe.

81

O kiſſe, which doeſt thoſe ruddie gemmes impart,
Or gemmes, or frutes of new-found Paradiſe,
Breathing all bliſſe and ſweetning to the heart,
Teaching dumbe lips a nobler exerciſe.

O kiſſe, which ſoules, euen ſoules together ties
By linkes of Loue, and only Natures art:
How faine would I paint thee to all mens eyes,
Or of thy gifts at leaſt ſhade out ſome part.

But ſhe forbids, with bluſhing words, ſhe ſayes,
She builds her fame on higher ſeated praiſe:
But my heart burnes, I cannot ſilent be.

Then ſince (deare life) you faine would haue me peace,
And I, mad with delight, want wit to ceaſe,
Stop you my mouth with ſtill ſtill kiſſing me.

82

Nymph of the gard'n, where all beauties be:
Beauties which do in excellencie paſſe:
His who till death lookt in a watrie glaſſe,
Or hers whom naked the Trojan boy did ſee.

Sweet gard'n Nymph, which keepes the Cherrie tree,
Whoſe fruit doth farre th'Eſperian taſt ſurpaſſe:
Moſt ſweet-faire, moſt faire-ſweet, do not alas,
From comming neare thoſe Cherries baniſh me:

For though full of deſire, emptie of wit,
Admitted late by your beſt-graced grace,
I caught at one of them a hungrie bit;

Pardon that fault, once more graunt me the place,
And I do ſweare euen by the ſame delight,
I will but kiſſe, I neuer more will bite.

83

Good brother Philip, I haue borne you long,
I was content you ſhould in fauour creepe,
While craftily you ſeem'd your cut to keepe,
As though that faire ſoft hand did you great wrong.

I bare (with Enuie) yet I bare your ſong,
When in her necke you did Loue ditties peepe;
Nay, more foole I, oft ſuffered you to ſleepe
In Lillies neaſt, where Loues ſelfe lies along.

What, doth high place ambitious thoughts augment?
Is ſawcineſſe reward of curteſie?
Cannot ſuch grace your ſilly ſelfe content,

But you muſt needs with thoſe lips billing be?
And through thoſe lips drinke Nectar from that toong;
Leaue that ſir Phip, leaſt off your necke be wroong.

Third ſong.

If Orpheus voyce had force to breathe ſuch muſickes loue
Through pores of ſenceleſſe trees, as it could make them moue:
If ſtones good meaſure daunc'd, the Theban walles to build,
To cadence of the tunes, which Amphyons lyre did yeeld,
More cauſe a like effect at leaſtwiſe bringeth:
O ſtones, ô trees, learne hearing, Stella ſingeth.

If Loue might ſweet'n ſo a boy of shepheard brood,
To make a Lyzard dull to taſte Loues daintie food:
If Eagle fierce could ſo in Grecian Mayd delight,
As his light was her eyes, her death his endleſſe night:
Earth gaue that Loue, heau'n I trow Loue refineth:
O beaſts, ô birds looke, Loue, lo, Stella ſhineth.

The birds, beasts, stones and trees feele this, and feeling Loue:
And if the trees, nor stones stirre not the same to proue,
Nor beasts, nor birds do come vnto this blessed gaze,
Know, that small Loue is quicke, and great Loue doth amaze:
They are amaz'd, but you with reason armed,
O eyes, ô eares of men, how are you charmed!

84

High way since you my chiefe Parnassus be,
And that my Muse to some eares not vnsweet,
Tempers her words to trampling horses feet,
More oft then to a chamber melodie.

Now blessed you, beare onward blessed me
To her, where I my heart safelest shall meet,
My Muse and I must you of dutie greet
With thankes and wishes, wishing thankfully.

Be you still faire, honourd by publike heed,
By no encrochment wrongd, nor time forgot:
Nor blam'd for bloud, nor sham'd for sinfull deed.

And that you know, I enuy you no lot
Of highest wish, I wish you so much blisse,
Hundreds of yeares you Stellas feet may kisse.

85

I see the house, my heart thy selfe containe,
Beware full sailes drowne not thy tottring barge:
Least ioy by Nature apt sprites to enlarge,
Thee to thy wracke beyond thy limits straine.

Nor do like Lords, whose weake confused braine,
Not pointing to fit folkes each vndercharge,
While euerie office themselues will discharge,
With doing all, leaue nothing done but paine.

But giue apt seruants their due place, let eyes
See Beauties totall summe summ'd in her face:
Let eares heare speech, which wit to wonder ties.

Let breath sucke vp those sweetes, let armes embrace
The globe of weale, lips Loues indentures make:
Thou but of all the kingly Tribute take.

Fourth song.

Onely ioy, now here you are,
Fit to heare and ease my care:
Let my whispering voyce obtaine,
Sweete reward for sharpest paine:
Take me to thee, and thee to me.
No, no, no, no, my Deare, let be.

Night hath cloſd all in her cloke,
Twinckling ſtarres Loue-thoughts prouoke:
Danger hence good care doth keepe,
Iealouſie it ſelfe doth ſleepe:
Take me to thee, and thee to me.
No, no, no, no, my Deare, let be.

Better place no wit can find,
Cupids yoke to looſe or bind:
Theſe ſweet flowers on fine bed too,
Vs in their beſt language woo:
Take me to thee, and thee to me.
No, no, no, no, my Deare, let be.

This ſmall light the Moone beſtowes,
Serues thy beames but to diſcloſe,
So to raiſe my hap more hie;
Feare not elſe, none can vs ſpie:
Take me to thee, and thee to me.
No, no, no, no, my Deare, let be.

That you heard was but a Mouſe,
Dumbe ſleepe holdeth all the houſe:
Yet a ſleepe, me thinkes they ſay,
Yong folkes, take time while you may:
Take me to thee, and thee to me.
No, no, no, no, my Deare, let be.

Niggard Time threats, if we miſſe
This large offer of our bliſſe:
Long ſtay ere he graunt the ſame:
Sweet then, while each thing doth frame:
Take me to thee, and thee to me.
No, no, no, no, my Deare, let be.

Your faire mother is a bed,
Candles out, and curtaines ſpread:
She thinkes you do letters write:
Write, but let me firſt endite:
Take me to thee, and thee to me.
No, no, no, no, my Deare, let be.

Sweet alas, why ſtriue you thus?
Concord better fitteth vs:
Leaue to Mars the force of hands,
Your power in your beautie ſtands:
Take thee to me, and me to thee.
No, no, no, no, my Deare, let be.

VVo to me, and do you ſweare
Me to hate, but I forbeare,
Curſed be my deſtines all,
That brought me ſo high to fall:
Soone with my death I will pleaſe thee.
No, no, no, no, my Deare, let be.

86

Alas, whence came this change of lookes? if I
Haue chang'd deſert, let mine owne conſcience be
A ſtill felt plague, to ſelfe condemning me:
Let wo gripe on my heart, ſhame loade mine eye.

But if all faith, like ſpotleſſe Ermine ly
Safe in my ſoule, which only doth to thee
(As his ſole obiect of felicitie)
With wings of Loue in aire of wonder flie.

O eaſe your hand, treate not ſo hard your ſlaue:
In iuſtice paines come not till faults do call,
Or if I needs (ſweet Iudge) muſt torments haue,

Vſe ſomething elſe to chaſt'n me withall,
Then thoſe bleſt eyes, where all my hopes do dwell,
No doome ſhould make once heau'n become his hell.

Fift ſong.

While fauour fed my hope, delight with hope was brought,
Thought waited on delight, and ſpeech did follow thought:
Then grew my tongue and pen records vnto thy glory:
I thought all words were loſt, that were not ſpent of thee:
I thought each place was darke but where thy lights would be,
And all eares worſe then deafe, that heard not out thy ſtorie.

I ſaid, thou wert moſt faire, and ſo indeed thou art:
I ſaid, thou art moſt ſweet, ſweet poiſon to my heart:
I ſaid, my ſoule was thine (ô that I then had lyed)
I ſaid, thine eyes were ſtarres, thy breaſts the milk'n way,
Thy fingers Cupids ſhafts, thy voyce the Angels lay:
And all I ſaid ſo well, as no man it denied.

But now that hope is loſt, vnkindneſſe kils delight,
Yet thought and ſpeech do liue, though metamorphoſd quite:
For rage now rules the raines, which guided were by Pleaſure.
I thinke now of thy faults, who late thought of thy praiſe,
That ſpeech falles now to blame, which did thy honour raiſe,
The ſame key op'n can, which can locke vp a treaſure.

Thou then whom partiall heauens conspir'd in one to frame,
The proofe of Beauties worth, th'enheritrix of fame,
The mansion seat of bliſſe, and iuſt excuſe of Louers;
See now thoſe feathers pluckt, wherewith thou flew moſt high:
See what clouds of reproch shall darke thy honours skie,
Whoſe owne fault casts him downe, hardly high seat recouers.

And ô my Muſe, though oft you luld her in your lap,
And then a heau'nly child gaue her Ambroſian pap:
And to that braine of hers your hidneſt gifts infuſed,
Since she diſdaining me, doth you in me diſdaine:
Suffer not her to laugh, while both we ſuffer paine:
Princes in ſubiects wrongd, muſt deeme themſelues abuſed.

Your Client poore my ſelfe, shall Stella handle ſo?
Reuenge, reuenge, my Muſe. Defiance trumpet blow:
Threat'n what may be done, yet do more then you threat'n.
Ah, my ſute granted is, I feele my breaſt doth ſwell:
Now child, a leſſon new you shall begin to ſpell:
Sweet babes muſt babies haue, but shrewd gyrles muſt be beat'n.

Thinke now no more to heare of warme fine odourd ſnow,
Nor blushing Lillies, nor pearles ruby-hidden row,
Nor of that golden ſea, whoſe waues in curles are brok'n:
But of thy ſoule, ſo fraught with ſuch vngrateſulneſſe,
As where thou ſoone might ſt helpe, moſt faith doſt moſt oppreſſe,
Vngrateſull who is cald, the worſt of euils is ſpok'n:

Yet worſe then worſt, I ſay thou art a theefe, a theefe?
Now God forbid. A theefe, and of worſt theeues the cheefe:
Theeues ſteal for need, & ſteale but goods, which paine recouers,
But thou rich in all ioyes, doeſt rob my ioyes from me,
Which cannot be reſtor'd by time nor induſtrie:
Of foes the ſpoile is euill, far worſe of conſtant louers.

Yet gentle English theeues do rob, but will not ſlay;
Thou English murdring theefe, wilt haue harts for thy pray:
The name of murdrer now on thy faire forehead ſitteth:
And euen while I do ſpeake, my death wounds bleeding be:
Which (I proteſt) proceed from only Cruell thee,
Who may and will not ſaue, murder in truth committeth.

But murder priuate fault ſeemes but a toy to thee,
I lay then to thy charge vniuſteſt Tyrannie,
If Rule by force without all claime a Tyran showeth,
For thou doeſt lord my heart, who am not borne thy ſlaue,
And which is worſe, makes me moſt guiltleſſe torments haue,
A right full Prince by vnright deeds a Tyran groweth.

Lo you grow proud with this, for tyrans make folke bow:
Of foule rebellion then I do appeach thee now;
Rebell by Natures law, Rebell by law of reason,
Thou sweetest subiect wert borne in the realme of Loue,
And yet against thy Prince thy force dost dayly proue:
No vertue merits praise, once toucht with blot of Treason.

But valiant Rebels oft in fooles mouthes purchase fame:
I now then staine thy white with vagabunding shame,
Both Rebell to the Sunne, and Vagrant from the mother;
For wearing Venus badge, in euery part of thee,
Vnto Dianaes traine thou runaway didst flie:
VVho faileth one, is false, though trusty to another.

What is not this enough? nay farre worse commeth here;
A witch I say thou art, though thou so faire appeare;
For I protest, my sight neuer thy face enioyeth,
But I in me am chang'd, I am aliue and dead:
My feete are turn'd to rootes, my hart becommeth lead,
No witchcraft is so euill, as which mans mind destroyeth.

Yet witches may repent, thou art far worse then they,
Alas, that I am forst such euill of thee to say,
I say thou art a Deuill though clothed in Angels shining:
For thy face tempts my soule to leaue the heau'n for thee,
And thy words of refuse, do powre euen hell on mee:
Who tempt, and tempted plague, are Deuils in true defining.

You then vngratefull thiefe, you murdring Tyran you,
You Rebell run away, to Lord and Lady vntrue,
You witch, you Diuill (alas) you still of me beloued,
You see what I can say; mend yet your froward mind,
And such skill in my Muse you reconcil'd shall find,
That all these cruell words your praises shall be proued.

Sixt song.

O you that heare this voice,
O you that see this face,
Say whether of the choice
Deserues the former place:
Feare not to iudge this hate,
For it is void of hate.

This ſide doth beauty take,
For that doth Muſike ſpeake,
Fit oratours to make
The ſtrongeſt iudgements weake:
The barre to plead their right,
Is only true delight.

Thus doth the voice and face,
Theſe gentle Lawyers wage,
Like louing brothers caſe,
For fathers heritage:
That each while each contends,
It ſelfe to other lends.

For beautie beautifies,
VVith heauenly hew and grace,
The heauenly harmonies;
And in this faultleſſe face,
The perfect beauties be
A perfect harmony.

Muſicke more loftly ſwels
In ſpeeches nobly placed:
Beauty as farre excels,
In action aptly graced:
A friend each party drawes,
To countenance his cauſe:

Loue more affected ſeemes
To beauties louely light,
And wonder more eſteemes
Of Muſike wondrous might:
But both to both ſo bent,
As both in both are ſpent.

Muſike doth witneſſe call
The eare, his truth to trie:
Beauty brings to the hall,
Eye-iudgement of the eye,
Both in their obiects ſuch,
As no exceptions tutch.

The common ſence, which might Be Arbiter of this,
To be forſooth vpright,
To both ſides partiall is:
He layes on this ſide chiefe praiſe,
Chiefe praiſe on that he laies.

The

Then reason Princesse by,
Whose throne is in the mind,
Which Musicke can in sky
And hidden beauties find,
Say whether thou wilt crowne,
With limitlesse renowne.

Seuenth song.

Whose senses in so euill consort, their stepdame Nature laies,
That ranishing delight in them most sweete tunes do not raise;
Or if they do delight therein, yet are so closde with wit,
As with sententious lips to set a title vaine on it:
O let them heare these sacred tunes, & learne in wonders schooles,
To be in things past bounds of wit fooles, if they be not fooles.

Who haue so leaden eyes, as not to see sweet beauties show,
Or seeing, haue so wodden wits, as not that worth to know;
Or knowing, haue so muddy minds, as not to be in loue;
Or louing, haue so frothy thoughts, as easly thence to moue:
O let them see these heauenly beames, and in faire letters reede
A lesson fit, both sight and skill, loue and firme loue to breede.

Heare then, but then with wonder heare; see but adoring see,
No mortall gists, no earthly fruites, now here descended be:
See, do you see this face? a face? nay image of the skies,
Of which the two life-giuing lights are figured in her eyes:
Heare you this soule-inuading voice, and count it but a voice?
The very essence of their tunes, when Angels do reioyce.

Eight song.

In a groue most rich of shade,
Where birds wanton musicke made,
May then yong his pide weedes showing,
New perfumed with flowers fresh growing,

Astrophel with Stella sweete,
Did for mutuall comfort meete,
Both within themselues oppressed,
But each in the other blessed.

Him great harmes had taught much care,
Her faire necke a foule yoke bare,
But her sight his cares did banish,
In his sight her yoke did vanish.

Wept they had, alas the while,
But now teares themselues did smile,
While their eyes by loue directed,
Enterchangeably reflected.

Sigh they did, but now betwixt
Sighs of woes were glad sighs mixt,
With armes crost, yet testifying
Restlesse rest, and liuing dying.

Their eares hungry of each word,
Which the deere tongue would afford,
But their tongues restraind from walking,
Till their harts had ended talking.

But when their tongues could not speake,
Loue it selfe did silence breake;
Loue did set his lips asunder,
Thus to speake in loue and wonder:

Stella soueraigne of my ioy,
Faire triumph her of annoy,
Stella starre of heauenly fier,
Stella loadstar of desier.

Stella, in whose shining eyes,
Are the lights of Cupids skies,
Whose beames where they once are darted,
Loue therewith is streight imparted.

Stella, whose voice when it speakes,
Senses all asunder breakes;
Stella, whose voice when it singeth,
Angels to acquaintance bringeth.

Stella, in whose body is
Writ each character of blisse,
Whose face all, all beauty passeth,
Saue thy mind which yet surpasseth.

Graunt, ô graunt, but speech alas,
Failes me, fearing on to passe,
Graunt, ô me, what am I saying?
But no fault there is in praying.

Graunt, ô deere, on knees I pray,
(Knees on ground he then did stay)
That not I, but since I loue you,
Time and place for me may moue you.

Neuer season was more fit,
Neuer roome more apt for it;
Smiling ayre allowes my reason,
These birds sing; now vse the season.

This

This small wind which so sweete is,
See how it the leaues doth kisse,
Eche tree in his best attiring,
Sense of loue to loue inspiring.

Loue makes earth the water drinek,
Loue to earth makes water sinke;
And if dumbe things be so witty,
Shall a heauenly grace want pitty?

There his hands in their speech, faine
Would haue made tongues language plaine;
But her hands his hands repelling,
Gaue repulse all grace excelling.

Then she spake; her speech was such,
As not eares but hart did tuch:
While such wise she loue denied,
As yet loue she signified.

Astrophel sayd she, my loue
Cease in these effects to proue:
Now be still, yet still beleeue me,
Thy griefe more then death would grieue me.

If that any thought in me,
Can taste comfort but of thee,
Let me fed with hellish anguish,
Ioylesse, hopelesse, endlesse languish.

If those eyes you praised, be
Half so deere as you to me,
Let me home returne, starke blinded
Of those eyes, and blinder minded.

If to secret of my hart,
I do any wish impart,
Where thou art not formost placed,
Be both wish and I defaced.

If more may be sayd, I say,
All my blisse in thee I lay;
If thou loue, my loue content thee,
For all loue, all faith is meant thee.

Trust me while I thee deny,
In my selfe the smart I try,
Tyran, honour doth thus vse thee,
Stellas selfe might not refuse thee.

Therefore, Deere, this no more moue,
Least though I leaue not thy loue,
Which too deep in me is framed,
I should blush when thou art named.

Therewithall away she went,
Leauing him to paſsion rent,
With what she had done and ſpoken,
That therewith my ſong is broken.

Ninth ſong.

Go my flocke, go get you hence,
Seeke a better place of feeding,
Where you may haue ſome defence
For the ſtormes in my breaſt breeding,
And showers from mine eyes proceeding.

Leaue a wretch, in whom all wo
Can abide to keepe no meaſure,
Merry flocke, ſuch one forgo,
Vnto whom mirth is diſpleaſure,
Only rich in miſchiefes treaſure.

Yet alas before you go,
Heare your wofull maiſters ſtory,
Which to ſtones I els would show:
Sorrow onely then hath glory,
When tis excellently ſory.

Stella fierceſt shepherdeſſe,
Fierceſt but yet faireſt euer;
Stella whom ô heauens do bleſſe,
Tho againſt me shee perſeuer,
Tho I bliſſe enherit neuer.

Stella hath refuſed me,
Stella who more loue hath proued,
In this caitife hart to be,
Then can in good eawes be moued
Toward Lamkins beſt beloued.

Stella hath refuſed me,
Aſtrophel that ſo wel ſerued,
In this pleaſant ſpring muſt ſee
While in pride flowers be preſerued,
Himſelfe onely winter-ſterued.

Why alas doth she then ſweare,
That she loueth me ſo dearely,
Seing me ſo long to beare
Coles of loue that burne ſo clearely;
And yet leaue me helpleſſe meerely?

Is that loue? forsooth I trow,
If I saw my good dog grieued,
And a helpe for him did know,
My loue should not be beleeued,
But he were by me releeued.

No, she hates me, wellaway,
Faining loue, somewhat to please me:
For she knowes, if she display
All her hate, death soone would seaze me,
And of hideous torments ease me.

Then adieu, deere flocke adieu:
But alas, if in your straying
Heauenly Stella meete with you,
Tell her in your piteous blaying,
Her poore slaues vniust decaying.

87

When I was forst from Stella euer deere,
Stella food of my thoughts, hart of my hart,
Stella whose eyes make all my tempests cleere,
By iron lawes of duty to depart:

Alas I found, that she with me did smart,
I saw that teares did in her eyes appeare;
I saw that sighes her sweetest lips did part,
And her sad words my saddest sence did heare.

For me, I wept to see pearles scattered so,
I sighd her sighes, and wailed for her wo,
Yet swam in ioy, such loue in her was seene.

Thus while the effect most bitter was to me,
And nothing then the cause more sweet could be,
I had bene vext, if vext I had not beene.

88

Out traytour absence, darest thou counsell me,
From my deare Captainesse to run away?
Because in braue array heere marcheth she,
That to win me, oft shewes a present pay?

Is faith so weake? or is such force in thee?
When Sun is hid, can starres such beames display?
Cannot heau'ns food once felt, keepe stomakes free,
From base desire on earthly cates to pray.

Tush absence while thy mistes eclipse that light,
My Orphan sence flies to the inward sight,
Where memory sets foorth the beames of loue.

That where before hart loued and eyes did see,
In hart both sight and loue now coupled be;
Vnited powers make each the stronger proue.

89

Now that of absence the most irksome night,
With darkest shade doth ouercome my day;
Since Stellas eyes wont to giue me my day,
Leauing my Hemisphere, leaue me in night,

Each day seemes long, and longs for long-staid night,
The night as tedious, wooes th'approch of day;
Tired with the dusty toiles of busie day,
Languisht with horrors of the silent night;

Suffering the euils both of the day and night,
While no night is more darke then is my day,
Nor no day hath lesse quiet then my night:

With such bad mixture of my night and day;
That liuing thus in blackest winter night,
I feele the flames of hottest sommer day.

90

Stella thinke not that I by verse seeke fame,
Who seeke, who hope, who loue, who liue but thee;
Thine eyes my pride, thy lips mine history:
If thou praise not, all other praise is shame.

Nor so ambitious am I, as to frame
A nest for my yong praise in Lawrell tree:
In truth I sweare, I wish not there should be Graued in mine Epitaph a Poets name:

Ne if I would, I could iust title make,
That any laud to me thereof should grow,
Without my plumes from others wings I take.

For nothing from my wit or will doth flow,
Since all my words thy beauty doth endite,
And loue doth hold my hand, and makes me write.

Stella, while now by honours cruell might,
I am from you, light of my life mis-led,
And that faire you my Sunne, thus ouerspred,
With absence Vaile, I liue in Sorowes night.

If this darke place yet shew like candle light,
Some beauties peece as amber coloured hed,
Milke hands, rose cheeks, or lips more sweet, more red,
Or seeing gets blacke, but in blacknesse bright.

They

They pleaſe I do confeſſe, they pleaſe mine eyes,
But why? becauſe of you they models be,
Models ſuch be wood-globes of gliſtring skies.

Deere, therefore be not iealous ouer me,
If you heare that they ſeeme my hart to moue,
Not them, ô no, but you in them I loue.

92

Be your words made (good Sir) of Indian ware,
That you allow me them by ſo ſmall rate?
Or do you cutted Spartanes imitate,
Or do you meane my tender eares to ſpare?

That to my queſtions you ſo totall are,
When I demaund of Phenix Stellas ſtate,
You ſay forſooth, you left her well of late,
O God, thinke you that ſatisfies my care?

I would know whether ſhe ſit or walke,
How cloth'd, how waited on, ſighd ſhe or ſmilde,
Whereof, with whom, how often did ſhe talke,

With what paſtime, times iourney ſhe beguilde,
If her lips daignd to ſweeten my poore name,
Say all, and all, well ſayd, ſtill ſay the ſame.

Tenth ſong.

O deare life, when ſhall it be,
That mine eyes thine eyes may ſee?
And in them thy mind diſcouer,
VVhether abſence haue had force
Thy remembrance to diuorce,
From the image of the louer?

Or if I me ſelfe find not,
After parting ought forgot,
Nor debard from beauties treaſure,
Let no tongue aſpire to tell,
In what high ioyes I ſhall dwell,
Only thought aymes at the pleaſure.

Thought therefore I will ſend thee,
To take vp the place for me;
Long I will not after tary,
There vnſeene thou maiſt be bold,
Thoſe faire wonders to behold,
VVhich in them my hopes do cary.

Thought see thou no place forbeare,
Enter brauely euery where,
Seaze on all to her belonging;
But if thou wouldst garded be,
Fearing her beames, take with thee
Strength of liking, rage of longing.

Thinke of that most gratefull time,
When my leaping hart will clime,
In my lips to haue his biding,
There those roses for to kisse,
Which do breath a sugred blisse,
Opening rubies, pearles deuiding.

Thinke of my most Princely power,
When I blessed shall deuower,
With my greedy licorous sences,
Beauty, musicke, sweetnesse, loue
While she doth against me proue
Her strong arts, but weake defences.

Thinke, thinke of those dalyings,
When with Douelike murmurings,
With glad moning passed anguish,
We change eyes, and hart for hart,
Each to other do depart,
Ioying till ioy make vs languish.

O my thought my thoughts surcease,
Thy delights my woes increase,
My life melts with too much thinking;
Thinke no more but die in me,
Till thou shalt reuiued be,
At her lips my Nectar drinking.

93

O fate, ô fault, ô curse, child of my blisse,
What sobs can giue words grace my griefe to show?
What inke is blacke inough to paint my wo?
Through me, wretch me, euen Stella vexed is.

Yet truth (if Caitifs breath may call thee) this Witnesse with me, that my soule stumbling so,
From careles nesse did in no maner grow,
But wit confus'd with too much care did misse.

And do I then my selfe this vaine scuse giue?
I haue (liue I and know this) harmed thee,
Tho worlds quite me, shall I me selfe forgiue?

Onely

Only with paines my paines thus eaſed be,
That all thy hurts in my harts wracke I reede;
I cry thy ſighs;my deere,thy teares I bleede.

94

Griefe find the words,for thou haſt made my braine
So darke with miſty vapors,which ariſe
From out thy heauy mould,that inbent eyes
Can ſcarce diſcerne the ſhape of mine owne paine.

Do thou then (for thou canſt) do thou complaine,
For my poore ſoule,which now that ſickneſſe tries,
Which euen to ſence,ſence of it ſelfe denies,
Though harbengers of death lodge there his traine.

Or if thy loue of plaint yet mine forbeares,
As of a caitife worthy ſo to die,
Yet waile thy ſelfe,and waile with cauſefull teares,

That though in wretchedneſſe thy life doth lie,
Yet groweſt more wretched then thy nature beares,
By being placed in ſuch a wretch as I.

95

Yet ſighs,deere ſighs,indeede true friends you are,
That do not leaue your left friend at the wurſt,
But as you with my breaſt I oft haue nurſt,
So gratefull now you waite vpon my care.

Faint coward ioy no longer tarry dare,
Seeing hope yeeld when this wo ſtrake him furſt:
Delight proteſts he is not for the accurſt,
Though oft himſelfe my mate in arme he ſware.

Nay ſorrow comes with ſuch maine rage, that he Kils his owne children, teares finding that they
By loue were made apt to conſort with me.

Only true ſighs,you do not go away,
Thanke may you haue for ſuch a thankfull part,
Thanke-worthieſt yet when you ſhall breake my hart.

96

Thought with good cauſe thou likeſt ſo well the night,
Since kind or chance giues both one liuerie,
Both ſadly blacke,both blackly darkned be,
Night bard from Sun,thou from thy owne Sun light;

Silence in both diſplaies his ſullen might,
Slow heauineſſe in both holds one degree,
That full of doubts,thou of perplexity;
Thy teares expreſſe nights natiue moiſture right.

In both a mazefull ſolitarineſſe:
In night of ſprites the gaſtly powers to ſtur,
In thee or ſprites or ſprited gaſtlineſſe:

But but (alas) nights ſide the ods hath fur,
For that at length yet doth inuite ſome reſt,
Thou though ſtill tired, yet ſtill dooſt it deteſt.

97

Dian that faine would cheare her friend the Night,
Shewes her oft at the full her faireſt face,
Bringing with her thoſe ſtarry Nimphs, whoſe chace
From heauenly ſtanding hits each mortall wight.

But ah poore Night in loue with Phœbus light,
And endleſly diſpairing of his grace,
Her ſelfe (to ſhew no other ioy hath place)
Silent and ſad in mourning weedes doth dight:

Euen ſo (alas) a Lady Dians peere,
With choiſe delights and rareſt company,
Would faine driue cloudes from out my heauy cheere.

But wo is me, though ioy it ſelfe were ſhe,
She could not ſhew my blind braine waies of ioy,
While I diſpaire my Sunnes ſight to enioy.

98

Ah bed, the field where ioyes peace ſome do ſee,
The field where all my thoughts to warre be traind,
How is thy grace by my ſtrange fortune ſtaind!
How thy lee ſhores by my ſighes ſtormed be!

With ſweete ſoft ſhades thou oft inuiteſt me
To ſteale ſome reſt, but wretch I am conſtraind, (Spurd with loues ſpur, though gold and ſhortly raind
With cares hard hand) to turne and toſſe in thee.

While the blacke horrors of the ſilent night,
Paint woes blacke face ſo liuely to my ſight,
That tedious leaſure makes each wrinckled line:

But when Aurora leades out Phœbus daunce,
Mine eyes then only winke, for ſpite perchance,
That wormes ſhould haue their Sun, and I want mine.

99

When far ſpent night perſwades each mortall eye,
To whom nor art nor nature graunteth light,
To lay his then marke wanting ſhafts of ſight,
Cloſ'd with their quiuers in ſleeps armory;

With windowes ope then moſt my mind doth lie,
Viewing the ſhape of darkneſſe and delight,
Takes in that ſad hue, which with th'inward night,
Of his mazde powers keepes perfit harmony:

But when birds charme, and that ſweete aire, which is Mornes meſſenger, with roſe enameld skies
Cals each wight to ſalute the floure of bliſſe;

In tombe of lids then buried are mine eyes,
Forſt by their Lord, who is aſham'd to find
Such light in ſenſe, with ſuch a darkned mind.

100

O teares, no teares, but raine from beauties skies,
Making thoſe Lillies and thoſe Roſes grow,
Which ay moſt faire, now more then moſt faire ſhow,
While gracefull pitty beauty beautifies.

O honied ſighs, which from that breaſt do riſe,
Whoſe pants do make vnſpilling creame to flow,
Wing'd with whoſe breath, ſo pleaſing Zephires blow,
As can refreſh the hell where my ſoule fries.

O plaints conſeru'd in ſuch a ſurged phraiſe,
That eloquence it ſelfe enuies your praiſe,
While ſobd out words a perfect Muſike giue.

Such teares, ſighs, plaints, no ſorrow is, but ioy:
Or if ſuch heauenly ſignes muſt proue annoy,
All mirth farewell, let me in ſorrow liue.

101

Stella is ſicke, and in that ſicke bed lies
Sweetneſſe, which breathes and pants as oft as ſhe:
And grace ſicke too, ſuch fine concluſions tries,
That ſickeneſſe brags it ſelfe beſt graced to be.

Beauty is ſicke, but ſicke in ſo faire guiſe,
That in that palaneſſe beauties white we ſee,
And ioy which is inſeperate from thoſe eyes:
Stella now learnes (ſtrange caſe) to weepe in thee.

Loue moues thy paine, and like a faithfull page
As thy lookes ſturre, comes vp and downe to make
All folkes preſt at thy will thy paine to aſſwage,

Nature with care ſweates for her darlings ſake,
Knowing worlds paſſe, ere ſhe enough can find
Of ſuch heauen ſtuffe, to cloath ſo heauenly amind.

102

Where be thoſe Roſes gone, which ſweetned ſo our eyes?
Where thoſe red cheeks, which oft with faire encreaſe did frame
The height of honor in the kindly badge of ſhame?
Who hath the crimſon weeds ſtolne from my morning skies?

How doth the colour vade of thoſe vermillion dies,
Which Nature ſelfe did make, and ſelfe engraind the ſame?
I would know by what right this paleneſſe ouercame
That hue, whoſe force my hart ſtill vnto thraldome ties?

Galleins adoptiue ſonnes, who by a beaten way
Their iudgements hackney on, the fault on ſickneſſe lay,
But feeling proofe makes me (ſay they) miſtake it furre:

It is but loue which makes his paper perfit white,
To write therein more freſh the ſtory of delight,
While beauties reddeſt inke Venus for him doth ſturre.

103

O happie Tems, that didſt my Stella beare,
I ſaw thy ſelfe with many a ſmiling line
Vpon thy cheerefull face, ioyes liuery weare:
While thoſe faire planets on thy ſtreames did ſhine.

The bote for ioy could not to daunce forbeare,
While wanton winds with beauties ſo deuine
Rauiſht, ſtaid not, till in her golden haire
They did themſelues (ô ſweeteſt priſon) twine.

And faine thoſe Æols youth there would their ſtay
Haue made, but forſt by Nature ſtill to flie,
Firſt did with puffing kiſſe thoſe lockes diſplay:

She ſo diſcheueld, bluſht; from window I
With ſight thereof cride out; ô faire diſgrace,
Let honor ſelfe to thee graunt higheſt place.

104

Enuious wits what hath bene mine offence,
That with ſuch poyſonous care my lookes you marke,
That to each word, nay ſigh of mine you harke,
As grudging me my ſorrowes eloquence?

Ah, is it not enough, that I am thence,
Thence, ſo farre thence, that ſcarcely any ſparke
Of comfort dare come to this dungeon darke,
Where rigours exile lockes vp all my ſenſe?

But if I by a happy window paſſe,
If I but ſtars vpon mine armour beare,
Sicke, thirſty, glad (though but of empty glaſſe:)

Your morall notes ſtraight my hid meaning teare,
From out my ribs, and puffing proues that I
Do Stella loue, fooles who doth it deny?

Eeleuenth song.

VVho is it that this darke night,
Vnderneath my window playneth?
It is one who from thy sight,
Being (ah) exild, disdayneth
Euery other vulgar light.

VVhy alas, and are you he?
Be not yet those fancies changed?
Deere when you find change in me,
Though from me you be estranged,
Let my chaunge to ruine be.

Well in absence this will dy,
Leaue to see, and leaue to wonder:
Absence sure will helpe, if I
Can learne, how my selfe to sunder
From what in my hart doth ly.

But time will these thoughts remoue:
Time doth worke what no man knoweth,
Time doth as the subiect proue,
With time still the affection groweth
In the faithfull Turtle doue.

What if you new beauties see,
Will not they stir new affection?
I will thinke thy pictures be,
(Image like of Saints perfection)
Poorely counterfeting thee.

But your reasons purest light,
Bids you leaue such minds to nourish?
Deere, do reason no such spite,
Neuer doth thy beauty florish
More, then in my reasons sight.

But the wrongs loue beares, will make
Loue at length leaue vndertaking;
No the more fooles it do shake,
In a ground of so firme making,
Deeper still they driue the stake.

Peace, I thinke that some giue eare,
Come no more, least I get anger.
Bliss, I will my bliss forbeare,
Fearing (sweete) you to endanger,
But my soule shall harbour thee.

VVell, be gone, be gone I ſay,
Leſt that Argus eyes perceiue you,
O vniuſt fortunes ſway,
VVhich can make me thus to leaue you,
And from lowts to run away.

105

Vnhappie ſight, and hath ſhe vaniſht by
So neere, in ſo good time ſo free a place?
Dead glaſſe dooſt thou thy obiect ſo imbrace,
As what my hart ſtill ſees thou canſt not ſpie?

I ſweare by her I loue and lacke, that I
Was not in fault, who bent thy dazling race
Onely vnto the heau'n of Stellas face,
Counting but duſt what in the way did lie.

But ceaſe mine eyes, your teares do witneſſe well,
That you guiltleſſe thereof, your Nectar miſt:
Curſt be the page from whence the bad torch fell,

Curſt be the night which did your ſtrife reſiſt,
Curſt be the Cochman which did driue ſo faſt,
With no worſe curſe then abſence makes me taſt.

106

O abſent preſence Stella is not here;
False flattering hope, that with ſo faire a face,
Bare me in hand, that in this Orphane place,
Stella, I ſay my Stella, ſhould appeare.

What ſaiſt thou now, where is that dainty cheere,
Thou toldſt mine eyes ſhould helpe their famiſt caſe?
But thou art gone now that ſelfe felt diſgrace,
Doth make me moſt to wiſh thy comfort neere.

But heere I do ſtore of faire Ladies meete,
Who may with charme of conuerſation ſweete,
Make in my heauy mould new thoughts to grow:

Sure they preuaile as much with me, as he
That bad his friend but then new maim'd, to be Mery with him, and not thinke of his woe.

107

Stella ſince thou ſo right a Princeſſe art
Of all the powers which life beſtowes on me,
That ere by them ought vndertaken be,
They firſt reſort vnto that ſoueraigne part;

Sweet

Sweete for a while giue reſpite to my hart,
Which pants as though it ſtill ſhould leape to thee:
And on my thoughts giue thy Lieftenancy
To this great cauſe, which needs both vſe and art.

And as a Queene, who from her preſence ſends
Whom ſhe imployes, diſmiſſe from thee my wit,
Till it haue wrought what thy owne will attends.

On ſeruants ſhame oft Maiſters blame doth fit;
O let not fooles in me thy workes reproue,
And ſcorning ſay, ſee what it is to loue.

108

When ſorrow (vſing mine owne fiers might)
Melts downe his lead into my boyling breſt,
Through that darke fornace to my hart oppreſt,
There ſhines a ioy from thee my only light;

But ſoone as thought of thee breeds my delight,
And my yong ſoule flutters to thee his neſt,
Moſt rude diſpaire my daily vnbidden gueſt,
Clips ſtreight my wings, ſtreight wraps me in his night,

And makes me then bow downe my head, and ſay,
Ah what doth Phœbus gold that wretch auaile,
Whom iron doores do keepe from vſe of day?

So ſtrangely (alas) thy works in me preuaile,
That in my woes for thee thou art my ioy,
And in my ioyes for thee my only annoy.

The end of Aſtrophel and Stella.

HER MOST EXCELLENT MAIESTIE VVALKING IN VVANSTEED GARDEN, AS SHE PASSED DOWNE INTO THE

groue, there came ſuddenly among the traine, one apparelled like an honeſt mans wife of the countrey, where crying out for iuſtice, and deſiring all the Lords and Gentlemen to ſpeake a good word for her, ſhe was brought to the preſence of her Maieſtie, to whom vpon her knees ſhe offred a ſupplication, and vſed this ſpeech.

The Suiter.

MOſt faire Lady; for as for other your titles of ſtate ſtatelier perſons ſhall giue you, and thus much mine owne eies are witneſſes of, take here the complaint of my poore wretch, as deeplie plunged in miſerie, as I wiſh to you the higheſt point of happineſſe.

One onely daughter I haue, in whom I had placed all the hopes of my good hap, ſo well had ſhe with her good parts recompenced my paine of bearing of her, and care of bringing her vp: but now alas that ſhe is come to the time I ſhould reape my full comfort of her, ſo is ſhe troubled with that notable matter, which we in countrey call matrimony, as I cannot chuſe but feare the loſſe of her wits, at leaſt of her honeſty. Otherwomen thinke they may be vnhappily combred with one maiſter husband, my poore daughter is oppreſſed with two, both louing her, both equally liked of her, both ſtriuing to deſerue her. But now laſtly (as this iealouſie for ſooth is a vile matter) each haue brought their partakers with them, and are at this preſent, without your preſence redreſſe it, in ſome bloudy controuerſie; now ſweete Lady helpe, your owne way guides you to the place where they encomber her: I dare ſtay here no longer, for our men ſay in the countrey, the ſight of you is infectious.

And with that ſhe went away a good pace, leauing the ſupplication with her Maieſtie, which very formallie contained this.

Supplication.

Moſt gracious Soueraigne,

To one whoſe ſtate is raiſed ouer all,
VVhoſe face doth oft the braueſt ſort enchaunt,
Whoſe mind is ſuch, as wiſeſt minds appall,
VVho in one ſelfe theſe diuerſe gifts can plant;
How dare I wretch ſeeke there my woes to reſt,
VVhere eares be burnt, eyes dazled, harts oppreſt?

Your ſtate is great, your greatneſſe is our shield,
Your face hurts oft, but ſtill it doth delight,
Your mind is wiſe, your wiſedome makes you mild,
Such planted gifts enrich euen beggers ſight:
So dare I wretch, my bashfull feare ſubdue,
And feede mine eares, mine eyes, my hart in you.

Herewith

Herewith the woman-ſuiter being gone, there was heard in the woods a confuſed noyſe, and forthwith there came out ſix ſheapheards with as many foſters haling and pulling, to whether ſide they ſhould draw the Lady of May, who ſeemed to encline neither to the one nor other ſide. Among them was Maiſter Rombus a ſchoolemaiſter of a village thereby, who being fully perſwaded of his owne learned wiſedome, came thither, with his authority to part their fray; where for aunſwer he receiued many vnlearned blowes. But the Queene comming to the place where ſhe was ſeene of them, though they knew not her eſtate, yet ſomething there was which made them ſtartle aſide and gaze vpon her: till old father Lalus ſtepped forth (one of the ſubſtantialleſt ſhepheards) and making a legge or two, ſaid theſe few words.

Lalus the old ſhepheard.

May it pleaſe your benignity to giue a litle ſuperfluous intelligence to that, which with the opening of my mouth, my tongue and teeth ſhall deliuer vnto you. So it is right worſhipfull audience, that a certaine ſhe creature, which we ſhepheards call a woman, of a minſicall countenance, but by my white Lambe not three quarters ſo beautious as yore ſelfe, hath diſanulled the braine pan of two of our featiouſt yong men. And wil you wot how? by my mother Kits ſoule, with a certaine franſicall maladie they cal Loue, when I was a yong man they called it flat follie. But here is a ſubſtantiall ſchoole-maiſter can better diſnounce the whole foundation of the matter, although in ſooth for all his loquence our young men were nothing dutious to his clarkeſhip; Come on, Come on Maiſter ſchoole-maiſter, be not ſo baſhleſſe, we ſay, that the faireſt are euer the gentleſt: tell the whole caſe, for you can much better vent the points of it then I.

Then came forward Maiſter Rombus, and with many ſpeciall graces made this learned oration.

Now the thunderthumping Ioue transfund his dotes into your excellent formoſitie, which haue with your reſplendent beames thus ſegregated the emnitie of theſe rurall animals: I am Potentiſſima Domina, a ſchoole-maiſter, that is to ſay, a Pedagogue, one not a litle verſed in the diſciplinating of the iuuentall frie, wherein (to my laud I ſay it) I vſe ſuch geometricall proportion, as neither wanted manſuetude nor correction, for ſo it is deſcribed.

Parcare Subiectos & debellire ſuperbos.

Yet hath not the pulchritude of my vertues protected me from the contaminating hands of theſe plebeians; for comming, ſolummodo to haue parted their ſanguinolent fray, they yeelded me no more reuerence, then if I had bin ſome Pecorius Aſinus. I, euen I, that am, who am I? Dixi verbus ſapiento ſatum eſt. But what ſayd that Troian Æneas, when he ſoiorned in the ſurging ſulkes of the ſandiferous ſeas, Hæc olim memonaſſe iuuebit. Well well, ad propoſitos reuertebo, the puritie of the veritie is, that a certaine Pulchra puella profectò elected and conſtituted by the integrated determination of all this topographicall region, as the ſoueraigne Lady of this Dame Maias month, hath bene quodammodo hunted, as you would ſay, purſued by two, a brace, a couple, a caſt of yong men, to whom the crafty coward Cupid had inquam deliuered his dire-dolorous dart.

But here the May Lady interrupted his ſpeech, ſaying to him:

Away away you tedious foole, your eyes are not worthy to looke to yonder Princelie ſight, much leſſe your fooliſh tongue to trouble her wiſe eares. May Lady.

At which Maister Rombus in a great chafe cried out:

Rombus. O Tempori, ô Moribus! in profession a childe, in dignitie a woman, in yeares a Lady, in cæteris a maid, should thus turpifie the reputation of my doctrine, with the superscription of a foole, ô Tempori, ô Moribus!

But here againe the May Ladie saying to him,

May Lady. Leaue off good Latine foole, and let me satisfie the long desire I haue had to feede mine eyes with the only sight this age hath graunted to the world.

The poore scholemaister went his way backe, and the Lady kneeling downe said in this maner:

May Lady. Do not thinke (sweete and gallant Lady) that I do abase my selfe thus much vnto you becausé of your gay apparell, for what is so braue as the naturall beauty of the flowers, nor becausé a certaine Gentleman hereby seekes to do you all the honour he can in his house; that is not the matter, he is but our neighbour, and these be our owne groues, nor yet becausé of your great estate, since no estate can be cõpared to be the Lady of the whole moneth of May as I am. So that since both this place and this time are my seruants, you may be sure I wold looke for reuerence at your hands if I did not see something in your face which makes me yeeld to you; the troth is, you excell me in that wherein I desire most to excell, and that makes me giue this homage vnto you, as to the beautifullest Lady these woods haue euer receiued. But now as old father Lalus directed me, I wil tel you my fortune, that you may be iudge of my mishaps and others worthinesse. Indeed so it is, that I am a faire wench or else I am deceiued, and therefore by the consent of all our neighbours haue bene chosen for the absolute Lady of this mery moneth, with me haue bene (alas I am ashamed to tell it) two yong men, the one a forrester named Therion, the other Espilus a shepheard very long euen in loue forsooth, I like them both, and loue neither, Espilus is the richer, but Therion the liuelier: Therion doth me many pleasures, as stealing me venison out of these forrests, and many other such like prettie and prettier seruices, but withall he growes to such rages, that sometimes he strikes me, sometimes he railes at me. This shepheard Espilus of a mild disposition, as his fortune hath not bene to do me great seruice, so hath he neuer done me any wrong, but feeding his sheepe, sitting vnder some sweete bush, sometimes they say he records my name in doleful verses. Now the question I am to aske you faire Ladie, is, whether the many deserts and many faults of Therion, or the verie small deserts and no faults of Espilus be to be preferred. But before you giue your iudgement (most excellent Ladie) you shall heare what each of them can say for them selues in their rurall songs.

Thereupon Therion chalenged Espilus to sing with him, speaking these sixe verses:

Therion.

Come Espilus, come now declare thy skill,
Shew how thou canst deserue so braue desire,
Warme well thy wits, if thou wilt win her will,
For water cold did neuer promise fire:
Great sure is she, on whom our hopes do liue,
Greater is she who must the iudgement giue.

But

But Espilus as if he had bene inspired with the Muses, began forthwith to sing, whereto his fellow shepheards set in with their recorders, which they bare in their bags like pipes, and so of Therions side did the foresters, with the comets they wore about their neckes like hunting hornes in baudrikes.

Espilus.

Tune vp my voice, a higher note I yeeld,
To high conceipts the song must needes be high,
More high then stars, more firme then flintie field
Are all my thoughts, in which I liue or die:
Sweete soule, to whom I vowed am a slaue,
Let not wild woods so great a treasure haue.

Therion.

The highest note comes oft from baseſt mind,
As shallow brookes do yeeld the greatest sound,
Seeke other thoughts thy life or death to find;
Thy stars be fal'n, plowed is thy flintie ground:
Sweete soule let not a wretch that serueth sheepe,
Among his flocke so sweete a treasure keepe.

Espilus.

Two thousand sheepe I haue as white as milke,
Though not so white as is thy louely face,
The pasture rich, the wooll as soft as silke,
All this I giue, let me possesse thy grace,
But still take heede least thou thy selfe submit
To one that hath no wealth, and wants his wit.

Therion.

Two thousand deere in wildest woods I haue,
Them can I take, but you I cannot hold:
He is not poore who can his freedome saue,
Bound but to you, no wealth but you I would:
But take this beast, if beasts you feare to misse,
For of his beasts the greatest beast he is.

Espilus kneeling to the Queene.

Iudge you to whom all beauties force is lent.

Therion.

Iudge you of Loue, to whom all Loue is bent.

But as they waited for the iudgement her Maiestie should giue of their deserts, the shepheards and foresters grew to a great contention, whether of their fellowes had sung better, and so whether the estate of shepheards or forresters were the more worshipfull. The speakers were Dorcas an olde shepheard, and Rixus a young foster, betweene whom the schoole-maister Rombus came in as moderator.

Dorcas the shepheard.

Now al the blessings of mine old grandam (silly Espilus) light vpon thy shoulders for this honicombe singing of thine; now of my honestie all the bels in the towne could not haue ſung better, if the proud heart of the harlotrie lie not downe to thee now, the ſheepes rot catch her, to teach her that a faire woman hath not her faire-neſſe to let it grow ruſtiſh.

Rixus the foſter.

O Midas why art thou not aliue now to lend thine eares to this drivle, by the precious bones of a hunts-man; he knowes not the bleaying of a calfe from the ſong of a nightingale, but if yonder great Gentlewoman be as wiſe as ſhe is faire, Therion thou ſhalt haue the prize, and thou old Dorcas with young maiſter Eſpilus ſhall remaine tame fooles, as you be.

Dorcas. And with cap and knee be it ſpoken, is it your pleaſure neighbor Rixus to be a wild foole?

Rixus. Rather then a ſleepiſh dolt.

Dorcas. It is much refreſhing to my bowels, you haue made your choiſe, for my ſhare I will beſtow your leauings vpon one of your fellowes.

Rixus. And art not thou aſhamed old foole, to liken Eſpilus a ſhepheard to Therion of the noble vocation of huntſ-men, in the preſence of ſuch a one as euen with her eye only can giue the cruell puniſhment?

Dorcas. Hold thy peace, I will neither meddle with her nor her eyes, they ſayne in our towne they are daungerous both, neither will I liken Therion to my boy Eſpilus, ſince one is a theeuiſh proller, and the other is as quiet as a lambe that new came from ſucking.

Rombus the ſchoole-maiſter.

Heu, Ehem, hei, Inſipidum, Inſcitium vulgorum & populorum. Why you brute Nebulons haue you had my Corpuſculum ſo long among you, and cannot yet tell how to edifie an argument? Attend and throw your eares to me, for I am grauidated with child, till I haue endoctrinated your plumbeous cerebroſities. Firſt you muſt diuiſionate your point, quaſi you ſhould cut a cheeſe into two particles, for thus muſt I vniforme my ſpeech to your obtuſe conceptions; for Prius diuidendum oratio antequam definiendum exemplum gratia, either Therion muſt conquer this Dame Maias Nimphe, or Eſpilus muſt ouerthrow her, and that ſecundum their dignity, which muſt alſo be ſubdiuiſionated into three equall ſpecies; either according to the penetrancie of their ſinging, or the meliority of their functions, or laſtly the ſuperancy of their merits De ſinging ſatis. Nunc are you to argumentate of the qualifying of their eſtate firſt, and then whether hath more infernally, I meane deepely deſerued.

Dorcas. O poore Dorcas, poore Dorcas, that I was not ſet in my young dayes to ſchoole, that I might haue purchaſed the vnderſtāding of maſter Rombus miſterious ſpeeches. But yet thus much I concerne of them, that I muſt euen giue vp what my conſcience doth find in the behalfe of ſhepheards. O ſweete hony milken Lommes, and is there any ſo flintie a hart, that can find about him to ſpeake againſt them, that haue the charge of ſuch good ſoules as you be, among whom there is no enuy, and all obedience, where it is lawfull for a man to be good if he liſt, and hath no outward cauſe to withdraw him frō it, where the eye may be buſied in conſidering the works of nature, and the hart quietly reioyced in the honeſt vſing them. If templation as Clarks ſay, be the moſt excellent, which is ſo fit a life for Templers as this is, neither ſubiect to violent oppreſſion, nor ſeruile flatterie, how many Courtiers thinke you I haue heard vnder our field in buſhes make their wofull complaints, ſome of the greatnes of their Miſtriſſe eſtate, which dazled their eyes and yet burned their harts;

ſome

some of the extremitie of her beauty mixed with extreame cruelty, some of her too much wit, which made all their louing labours folly. O how often haue I heard one name sound in many mouthes, making our vales witnesses of their dolefull agonies! So that with long lost labour finding their thoughts bare no other wooll but dispaire, of yong Courtiers they grew old shepheards. Well sweete Lams I will ende with you as I began, he that can open his mouth against such innocent soules, let him be hated as much as a filthy fox, let the tast of him be worse then mustie cheese, the sound of him more dradfull then the howling of a wolfe, his sight more odible then a toade in ones porreage.

Rixus. Your life indeede hath some goodnesse.

Rombus the schoole-maister.

O tace, tace, or all the fat wil be ignified, first let me dilucidate the very intrinsicall maribone of the matter. He doth vse a certaine rhetoricall inuasion into the point, as if in deed he had conference with his Lams, but the troth is he doth equitate you in the meane time maister Rixus, for thus he sayth, that sheepe are good, ergo the shepheard is good, An Enthimeme à loco contingentibus, as my finger and my thumbe are Contingenter: againe he sayth, who liueth well is likewise good, but shepheards liue well, Ergo they are good; a Sillogisme in Darius king of Persia a Coniugatis; as you would say, a man coupled to his wife, two bodies but one soule: but do you but acquiescate to my exhortation, and you shall extingnish him. Tell him his maior is a knaue, his minor is a foole, and his conclusion both, Et ecce homo blanc atus quasi liliũ.

Rixus. I was saying the shepheards life had some goodnesse in it, because it borrowed of the countrey quietnesse something like ours, but that is not all, for ours besides that quiet part, doth both strengthen the body, and raise vp the mind with this gallant sort of actiuity. O sweet contentation to see the long life of the hurtlesse trees, to see how in streight growing vp, though neuer so high, they hinder not their fellowes, they only enuiously trouble, which are crookedly bent. What life is to be compared to ours where the very growing things are ensamples of goodnesse? we haue no hopes, but we may quickly go about them, and going about them, we soone obtaine them; not like those that haue long followed one (in troth) most excellent chace, do now at length perceiue she could neuer be taken: but that if she stayed at any time neare the pursuers, it was neuer meant to tarry with them, but only to take breath to fly further from them. He therefore that doubts that our life doth not far excell all others, let him also doubt that the well deseruing and painefull Therion is not to be preferred before the idle Espilus, which is euen as much to say, as that the Roes are not swifter then sheepe, nor the Stags more goodly then Gotes.

Rombus. Bene bene, nunc de questione prepositus, that is as much to say, as well well, now of the proposed question, that was, whether the many great seruices and many great faults of Therion, or the few small seruices and no faults of Espilus, be to be preferred, incepted or accepted the former.

The May Lady.

No no, your ordinarie braines shall not deale in that matter, I haue already submitted it to one, whose sweete spirit hath passed thorough greater difficulties, neither will I that your blockheads lie in her way.

Therefore ô Lady worthy to see the accomplishment of your desires, since all your desires be most worthy of you, vouchsafe our eares such happinesse, & me that particular fauor, as that you will iudge whether of these two be more worthy of me, or whether I be worthy of them: and this I will say, that in iudging me, you iudge more then me in it.

This being ſaid, it pleaſed her Maieſty to iudge that Eſpilus did the better diſerue her: but what words, what reaſons ſhe vſed for it, this paper, which carieth ſo baſe names, is not worthy to containe. Sufficeth it, that vpon the iudgement giuen, the ſhepheards and forreſters made a full conſort of their cornets and recorders, and then did Eſpilus ſing this ſong, tending to the greatneſſe of his owne ioy, and yet to the comfort of the other ſide, ſince they were ouerthrowne by a moſt worthy aduerſarie. The ſong contained two ſhort tales, and thus it was.

Siluanus long in loue, and long in vaine,
At length obtaind the point of his deſire,
VVhen being askt, now that he did obtaine
His wished weale, what more he could require:
Nothing ſayd he, for moſt I ioy in this,
That Goddeſſe mine, my bleſſed being ſees.

VVhen wanton Pan deceiu'd with Lions skin,
Came to the bed, where wound for kiſſe he got,
To wo and shame the wretch did enter in,
Till this he tooke for comfort of his lot,
Poore Pan (he ſayd) although thou beaten be,
It is no shame, ſince Hercules was he.

Thus ioyfully in choſen tunes reioyce,
That ſuch a one is witneſſe of my hart,
Whoſe cleereſt eyes I bliſſe, and ſweeteſt voyce,
That ſee my good, and iudgeth my deſert:
Thus wofully I in wo this ſalue do find,
My foule miſhap came yet from faireſt mind.

The muſike fully ended, the May Lady tooke her leaue in this ſort.

Lady your ſelfe, for other titles do rather diminiſh then adde vnto you. I and my litle companie muſt now leaue you, I ſhould do you wrong to beſeech you to take our follies well, ſince your bountie is ſuch, as to pardon greater faults. Therefore I willl wiſh you good night, praying to God according to the title I poſſeſſe, that as hitherto it hath excellently done, ſo hence forward the floriſhing of May, may long remaine in you and with you.

FINIS.
